KIRBY: One thing I mentioned earlier only in passing was that reporting on Kashmir was one of my responsibilities. Each of the embassy officers working on external affairs also had a domestic component to his portfolio. And my domestic reporting responsibilities were two-fold. One was Kashmir politics because although it was domestic, it was also part of the India-Pakistan imbroglio. (Because I had served in Madras earlier, I reported on South India matters as seen from the New Delhi perspective.) Kashmir was an active part of my dossier, and I had been to Kashmir a number of times. In both Pakistan and India the top leaders were still feeling their way. Prime Minister Gandhi had been in power for a while, but as I said earlier, she was in the middle of a leadership challenge from the "old guard" leaders in India. Yahya Khan, a less strong leader than the man he had replaced, Ayub Khan, was already being criticized for having less moxie, less control in Pakistan. It was apparent to me that each of these somewhat weakened leaders was going to have to "hang-tough" on anything that happened vis-a-vis each other. To make a long story short, that is what happened. The posturing over the hijacking on both sides further clouded the air in India-Pakistan bilateral relations and deepened the mood of pessimism in the subcontinent. However, if things had not begun to bubble in East Pakistan at the time, I think the hijacking incident might have just passed into history and never been heard of again. As it was, it was just one of the elements in the gathering storm.

Q: Just a mind-set as an Indian hand, had you and maybe your other Indian hands a long time ago taken a look at the map and the demographics and written East Pakistan off as something that eventually would go, and where did you think it might go?

KIRBY: I was privileged to be able to make an official trip around East Pakistan in March of 1970 from New Delhi. One of the things people in my job did was to visit the territory in neighboring countries for orientation. Similarly, the India watchers in our embassy in Pakistan used to visit us. Dennis Kux and Steve Palmer used to come over and consult on India. So, at the invitation of the Consul General and his staff in Dhaka and with the concurrence of Ambassador McFarlane in Rawalpindi; I went over for a fairly lengthy trip to East Pakistan in March of 1970. The Consulate General couldn't have been nicer in showing me around. I shared my perceptions with our diplomats in Dhaka and went back to Delhi and told Ambassador Keating and his staff that over the long haul the Pakistani government would not be able to hold the eastern wing. I said I didn't know how long it would take, but that cauldron was bubbling. The Consulate General in Dhaka had perceived this too, of course. I said that it was just a matter of time. I don't want to mislead you, I didn't say it was going to happen during my watch in Delhi or that it was going to happen within the next year. I do remember saying I could not put a time on it, but that the dissidence was farther advanced than some might think. I speculated that the developing tension would pose important policy questions for Washington. I said I thought the U.S. should reflect on how we would relate to the crisis when the balloon finally went up. I wasn't predicting that it would go up in 1970 or '71, but I did say I thought it would go up relatively soon. As a matter of fact, as it turned out, it was almost a year to the day that I said that in Delhi that the crisis actually exploded on the 25th or 26th of March 1971, when the riots started in Dhaka and the Pakistani army responded. From the Pakistan government's point of view, it was all down hill from that point on. Those who were trying to bring independence to Bangladesh saw it in very different terms, of course.

Q: From your point of view, was independence of Bangladesh the only real option or did you see India maybe making a move to take it over?

KIRBY: Of India wanting to incorporate East Pakistan into India? I saw no move in that direction at all, although it is a good question. I saw no move in that direction, and I am absolutely persuaded that that was the last thing that would be on any sane Indian policy maker's mind. Rhetorically, there may have been some Bengalis in India's predominantly Hindu West Bengal who argued that East and West Bengal should be reunited in the Indian Union. There were doubtless some Bengalis who thought it would be nice to get the old historic Bengali cultural entity back together. I don't know what the Indian archives will show, and I may be proved wrong some day, but I can't believe serious Indian policy makers would have considered taking East Bengal on for two reasons. One of the greatest problems of governance for New Delhi at the time was West Bengal and Communist influence in West Bengal. Delhi had great problems with that. Mrs. Gandhi's party, the Indian National Congress, was not able to form a government in Calcutta during part of that period. They would not have wanted to add that impoverished East Bengal, which had some leftist effervescence of its own, to the Indian Union. The other, and perhaps more important, thing was that the Indian Government would not have wanted to add 100 plus million Muslims to the Indian Union at that time. Bluntly put, I'm absolutely convinced of that.

Q: How did this thing play out? You had your hijacking, you were seeing the atmospherics, there were riots in the beginning of 1971.

KIRBY: And the Pakistani army cracked down rather firmly in East Pakistan. That then led to an enormous number of refugees from East Pakistan into India. I'm still calling it East Pakistan at this stage, because that's what it was up until late 1971. In the refugee numbers game it's very hard to know exactly where truth lies. We were hearing upwards of 11-12 million refugees from East Pakistan flooding into India by mid-1971. The UN system and USAID got engaged in feeding many of these refugees. I'd say there were a very large number of refugees. The Indians - I don't know whether they still deny it, although they denied it at the time -- got involved in the very early stages of supplying the Mujahideen, the "freedom fighters" in East Pakistan. They supplied them weaponry and other types of support, and although Indian policy makers denied it for a long time, the Indian army itself supported the Mujahideen along the frontier and perhaps across the frontier from time to time. The thing that validated such support in Indian eyes was the flow of refugees into India. My own belief is that the Indians, convinced that the Pakistanis couldn't hold it and shouldn't hold East Bengal probably would have assisted the process once dissidence broke out even without the refugees. In their own eyes, however, the Indians were morally justified doing it once the refugee flow started. In the Indian Government's view, the conflict in East Pakistan had to be brought to an end quickly and successfully, i.e., with the emergence of a new, independent political entity in East Pakistan.

Q: While this was happening...here we have a series of Foreign Service posts that are involved. One is our Consulate General in Dhaka, our Consulate General in Calcutta which was in the receiving area also in the Bengali area of India, the Embassy where you were and our Embassy in Rawalpindi/Islamabad. Within our business, how did you see the various actors, our people, looking at this thing?

KIRBY: Number one, all things considered, I think there was pretty good coordination during that year among the U.S. Foreign Service posts in the region. There was a fair amount of travel back and forth so that we could, to the extent possible, share information, be on the "same sheet of music," etc. I used to go to Pakistan fairly frequently during that period to brief on the view from Delhi. Ambassador Carol Laise, in land-locked Nepal, had a very real reason to worry about overland her life-line from the port of Calcutta up to Kathmandu. She asked me to come up to Kathmandu fairly frequently during that year of 1971 to talk about war/peace prospects. Some from our Embassy in Pakistan came over to see us in Delhi. There was good coordination in the field, I think. But you're wondering how did the various American officials in South Asia see the developing crisis, is that it?

Q: But you are pointing out something that is very important. One can get the impression, when one is not an India-Pak "hand" that these two embassies would sit and glare at each other, XXX this is not what you're telling me.

KIRBY: This is important. I think historically, that's the way it often was, alas, between our embassies in New Delhi and Rawalpindi-Islamabad. Although that 1965 war was a short-lived conflict, sitting down in Madras, looking at the telegrams from our embassies in the two countries, I sometimes had the impression they were talking about two different wars. You did very much sense a "we-they" kind of orientation. I will not say to you there weren't sometimes differing perceptions during the 1971 war, because there were. (I'd like to come back to that later.) Nor am I going to say that, during our time it was perfect, not like the "bad old says" -- it wasn't. I do believe, however, that during this period we're talking about, to the extent possible embassies New Delhi and Rawalpindi-Islamabad made an effort to be objective, i.e., not to be driven by clientitis. I did say to my Deputy Chief of Mission, Galen Stone, to Lee Stull the political counselor, and to Ambassador Keating, that I thought we should be especially careful with Washington, not to be perceived to be falling into Indian Government traps, if you will, and becoming spokesmen for the Indian point of view. In Delhi the embassy team agreed that we were all working for the American government and that to the extent possible our two embassies should avoid taking pot shots at each other, as had sometimes been done in the past. Although I'd have to go back and look at the files to be absolutely sure, I do believe during that prolonged crisis the two embassies were not taking nasty cracks at each other in telegrams. I don't know what people said to each other on the telephone to Washington, but we didn't telephone that much in those days, in any case.

Q: Particularly we had in the earlier period people of high caliber, high powered people -- Chester Bowles, George Ball in Washington, Galbraith -- a lot of ego was involved.

KIRBY: A lot of ego was involved in the 1960's. I think that was mercifully played down in the 1971 crisis. In retrospect I think that Embassy New Delhi, and Embassy Rawalpindi conducted themselves very well. Part of the proof of this is that not only did the two embassies engage directly all during the crisis by traveling back and forth and so on, but that once the crisis was over and U.S. relations plummeted with both sides, Pakistan and India, relations between the two embassy teams continued to be very, very good in 1972 and beyond. We continued to visit Rawalpindi and they continued to visit us in New Delhi. We continued to try, as much as possible, to arrive at common perceptions etc., to the extent possible. Now, did perceptions differ? Well, they did to some extent, of course. Each embassy, I think in a very professional way, put forward its point of view. As you would expect, there were some differences. By and large our Embassy in Pakistan was, understandably, reporting what the Pakistanis were saying to the effect that, "you Americans are our allies and you must recognize that the Indian colossus is aiding some dissidents to pinch off half our country." As a general proposition, Embassy Islamabad didn't fall into that trap of seeing the crisis in East Pakistan as largely Indian-inspired. But still, the voice of our Embassy in Pakistan would have been on the side of trying to get the Indians to stand down and cease their assistance to the East Pakistan dissidents. From Delhi, we too argued with the Indian Government that it shouldn't be involved militarily, etc. The U.S. Government said that to them in Washington, and we said that to them in Delhi. But, we also reported to Washington from Delhi our view that the die was cast, that inexorable process was in train with the certain result that East Pakistan would become independent. While our Embassy couldn't say exactly when the denouement would come, when the crisis began to unfurl we said, "There is going to be an independent Bangladesh." This was not a value judgment on Embassy New Delhi's part -- that's simply the way we were convinced it was going to turn out. We said that it probably was going to come about by war, but that one way or another it was happening. And, then we offered our views on how the U.S. should relate to the crisis. I think the view from our embassy in Pakistan was that maybe it wasn't inexorable, if the Indians didn't push things too far. These were honest and reasonable perceptions, it seems to me. I think they both were highly professional perceptions and judgments.

Q: Now this was the high Kissinger period. What were you getting from there? Because Kissinger was always looking at things in a completely different light than say maybe our embassies. He was thinking in terms of bi-products of American, Soviet, Chinese relationships. Were you getting anything, cold water saying you guys are off the track?

KIRBY: What we were getting from Washington was, in the vernacular, "tell those Indians to behave!" You've doubtless read Kissinger's memoirs where he writes about the "tilt" toward Pakistan and the reasons for it. I can't speak to private communications that the Ambassador might have had with Washington that I didn't see, but in the normal cable traffic, I really think it was simply, "tell those Indians not to get involved militarily, not to make things more difficult for Pakistan" -- a fairly reasonable approach on the whole. Which is what we in Embassy Delhi believed we should be saying too. We believed that the U.S. should be trying to prevent war. We didn't think it would work necessarily, but we did it with stout heart -- trying to talk the Indians out of complicating Pakistan's crisis. Our view was that if the Indians thought it was an inexorable process, then they should let the inexorable process run its course without getting aggressively involved or otherwise roiling the waters. That was the general policy line from Washington -- to do what we could to prevent conflict in the subcontinent. With a possibly different view of the likely outcome, we in Delhi believed this to be in general the right policy line. Our major differences with Washington came later when war finally broke out. At that point we in Delhi wouldn't have wanted the U.S. to tilt as openly towards Pakistan as was done.

Q: How did you find Ambassador Keating from your perspective? I know later when he went to Israel, he was getting quite old and he wasn't as engaged. Or was this when he was in Israel?

KIRBY: No. He went to Israel after India. He was in India from 1969-1972.

Q: We're really talking about a man with an honorable career but who was just getting too old. How did you find him at that time? Was he a personage of some figure taking control or was this pretty much in the hands of professionals?

KIRBY: I was, and am, extremely fond of Ambassador Keating. I had not known him before we went out there. My wife and I got to know him very well in Delhi and traveled with him on one occasion to Kashmir, and on another to South India. We found him to be genial and warm and a very honorable gentleman. I don't think it was so much a question of advanced age -- he was 69 when he went to New Delhi, and he stayed there three years, so he must have been close to 72 when he left. I had never previously seen him except in photos and on television when he was in the Senate, so I can't compare the pre-New Delhi person with the man we knew in Delhi. I suspect that his personality was always that of being a rather genial presiding figure, presiding deity, rather than a nuts and bolts policy figure, if you will. And that's the role he played in the Embassy. He was engaged. Ambassador Keating came to the office every day, he held country team meetings, and senior staff meetings, he received visitors, and within the parameters he and the DCM had worked out, he would sign off as authorizing officer on telegrams to Washington which addressed major issues. But the embassy was run essentially by the Deputy Chief of Mission and the Embassy counselors and agency heads. They were a very senior and very powerful group in India, but a very collegial group on the whole. I'm not implying they took anything away from the Ambassador; that appeared to be how he wished to operate. He saw himself as the front man, meeting and greeting visitors, going to see the Prime Minister, and sometimes meeting other senior ministers in the Indian government like the Foreign Minister. If he was not a vigorous "hands-on" type, which he was not, it always struck me that he was always a genial presiding officer, a genial "Chairman of the Board". It always seemed to me and my wife that it was a pity that Ambassador Keating, if he was to be Ambassador to India, was not there in better days, that he was not there during a non-war situation when U.S.-Indian relations were good, where he could sort of go with the flow and enjoy the place. He had an immense liking for India, always claiming that he had asked President Nixon, who had earlier lost out on his Senate race to Bobby Kennedy, to send him to India because Keating, a lawyer, had been a mid-fortyish Brigadier General who had served in India in the China-Burma-India theater in World War II. And he had formed a great liking for India at that time. So, he had a genuine liking for India. It was just not in the cards that he and Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi would get along well in the then prevailing political circumstances. There was not particularly good chemistry between this particular female Prime Minister and an older American ambassador. I just always wished that he had been there during easier and better days. But, he didn't do a bad job.

Q: Did you find during this crisis and the war that your Indian sources either dried up on you or turned sour?

KIRBY: Dramatically to the contrary. It was extraordinary the extent to which my working and social relationships held up through the war. I'm not saying, "hey, look at me," but there may be a lesson for all of us in this. Sources didn't dry up; I had worked at cultivating them. I just want to give one or two examples to illustrate this. The first occurred a month or two before the outbreak of direct India-Pakistan conflict. Without going into all the details, some rather dramatic armed incident occurred in East Pakistan which caused the Pakistani Government to argue that common sense suggested that elements of the Indian Army had to have gone across the border into East Pakistan to bring the incident about. It could not have happened any other way, they charged and, indeed, I privately thought that was probably the case. The previous day on instructions from Washington, the Ambassador had been in to discuss that incident with the Indian Foreign Minister. The event had happened three or four days before. The incident occurred, and Embassy Delhi was reasonably certain, and Washington was reasonably certain, that the Indians had brought about whatever that development was. Under instructions, the Ambassador went in to see the Foreign Minister who looked him in the eye and said, "No, we were not involved...we could not have been involved...for the following reason," etc. I pondered the matter long and hard and put together some pieces of the puzzle that were available to me. I concluded once again, that it couldn't have happened any other way but through Indian involvement. So I picked up the telephone that day after the Ambassador had appropriately done his job, by discussing the matter with the Foreign Minister at some length. And I called somebody in the Foreign Office and asked to see him that afternoon: "I know you're a busy man, but..." And he said, "Yes, do come at about 5:00, although I am busy." I went in late in the day and I sort of sank down in the chair, looked him in the eye, called him by his nickname, and said, "I don't care what your government is saying, I don't care what you tell me here...I know that the following happened in the following way." And then I laid out my speculation while saying, "I know," and it was a wonderful moment. This person looked me in the eye and said, "I am not going to lie to you. You are absolutely right except for two small details." And then he clarified those details. He didn't want to lie. This man was fiercely protective of Indian policy, but he didn't want a fib on our particular personal record. He knew how things were going to go in East Pakistan; he was very much an Indian spokesman, but with a diplomat whom he respected and a friend for whom I believe he had some affection, he didn't want to prevaricate, so he confirmed what I already knew. And, to his credit, by the way, because he deserved it, he later went on to the very highest diplomatic posts that India has to offer. To repeat, he deserved to; he's that kind of man -- a good professional. And when the chips were down, people like that knew the limits of what they could tell me. Maybe some would say that he went over the line, although I don't think so. He knew I had the essence of the matter and was reporting it to Washington anyway, and he presumably wanted me to get it just right. His reading of me and our relationship was such that he did not want to prevaricate under these circumstances. In my mind, that was a highly professional judgment on his part. No, sources didn't dry up, i.e., good professional sources. Of course, there were things that people couldn't and wouldn't tell you, but on the other hand, if you'd spent two years laying the groundwork, you'd probably go away from most conversations knowing as much as you needed to to have a reasonably accurate picture.

The other illustrative incident I might recall was perhaps a little more showy and dramatic. Many of the American Embassy staff were not then getting invitations from Indians, but my wife and I were invited to a fairly high, senior Indian official's house during that period for dinner. And I was very surprised because this was someone whom I had found rather contentious at times. I liked to talk with him and engage him. He and I used to bicker over policy, then shake hands and have a drink. But, we'd argue fiercely. Anyway, he invited us to dinner. And I asked my wife, "What's that about?" And she said, "Well, he's inviting us to dinner." I said, "Yeah, but why right now?" It was either during the war or perhaps the week after the war. We arrived and found that the guests were mostly Indian officials and politicians; we were the only foreigners there. Our host came to the door and quite deliberately, threw one arm around each of us as he led us in and said, in a booming voice that everyone could hear, "I've been worried about you. I wonder how these Indians are treating you during this time of crisis." This was a very senior Indian official. That was his way of saying: OK, this is a middle grade officer from an embassy which represents a serious power in the world. We may not like U.S. Government policy, but the U.S. is a serious power, and this is an officer who has always dealt with us fairly and told us exactly where his government stood. All the Indians at the dinner then relaxed and we were immediately drawn into a typical spirited, though friendly, discussion. I was very fond of India but decided early on that as an American representative I would not mix friendship with policy. When you disagreed, you said so. And if you disagreed, you fought like hell, openly. Put the agenda right there out on the table. My wife and I took great pains to do that every place we'd been. I think it works every place. We have never pretended something we didn't believe. If we didn't agree with a given Indian policy, we would say so. We always defended American policy. The Indians knew exactly where we stood. And I think this was a dramatic example of how you can get through difficult times. We were circulating all during the crisis and after the crisis was over when the guns were stilled, i.e., when U.S.-India relations went into decline because of an Indian perception that America had tilted toward Pakistan during the conflict.

Q: Why don't we stop at this point and I'll add a few things. We'll basically start immediately before the guns started going off. What we did when the war went on, follow through with the aftermath. I have a couple of questions I'd like to ask. Did you have any connection or revive anything from the Station Chief, the CIA or anything like that? Did they play any role for information gathering and then did the tone from Washington change? We're thinking about the Enterprise and the tilt and all that. And the post-war period. And then something I'd like to take up before we leave India, would be about how you saw on your side, India and nuclear activities. We'll pick that up then. OK?

KIRBY: Very good.

Q: As you mentioned before, the war was about to start. How did it hit the Embassy? Just prior to this were you all kind of knowing it was going to happen? Was it just a matter of time?

KIRBY: I think that those who followed these things closely believed from about April-May of 1971 on, that a clash between India and Pakistan over East Pakistan (Bangladesh) was inevitable. The political counselor and one or two others and I in our private conversations and in the telegrams we sent to Washington said, "In our best judgment, it will happen." The only question was when. As I said in our earlier conversation, our feeling in Delhi at the Embassy, and it certainly was the feeling of our authorities in Washington and, I think, that of other friendly governments as well, that whether or not we thought a conflict was inevitable, the thrust of our diplomacy should be to do everything we could to try to assist our two friends in the subcontinent to avoid conflict if it were at all possible. There was never any doubt in my mind that war was just about inevitable. The reason I kept using "well-nigh inevitable" is that one can always hope for a miracle. I did not think that miracle would be forthcoming. I was not surprised when war broke out on the third of December, 1971.

Q: Did you sense, through your visits and all, that there was a difference in attitudes between our Consul General in Dhaka (Arch Blood was the Consul General at the time) but on the ground watching the Pakistanis in what was a fairly brutal repression of dissident forces, what the Embassy in Rawalpindi/Islamabad was reporting?

KIRBY: You're asking whether there was any difference between the two? You know, I haven't gone back and looked at telegraphic traffic for that period. And I would have to do that before I could answer that with any real sense of confidence. I don't remember any sharp differences, but of course Dhaka was reporting the firm Pakistani Army crackdown.

Q: It's not really the reporting from the cables. What I'm think about that you were talking to everybody and I guess everybody was talking to everybody else?

KIRBY: As I had mentioned last time, I had myself gone to what was then East Pakistan, in March of 1970 and had had a nice trip there. That was approximately one year before the conflict broke out. After that I was privy to the analysis, the telegraphic reporting the things that all Foreign Service posts in the region were sending to Washington. But I didn't make any trips myself to Dhaka and East Pakistan after March, 1970. My memory of it is -- and again I underline memory because I haven't re-read the telegraphic traffic -- I don't recall any sharp differences between Dhaka and Rawalpindi. I do recall that our people in Dhaka shared the view that East Pakistani, or Bengali dissidence would continue, and that in the fullness of time it would be difficult for Pakistan, i.e., the government in West Pakistan, to hold onto the East. I think that was their bottom line view. Over in Rawalpindi -- but again, to get a firm view of this, you would have to talk to people who were over in the Embassy in Rawalpindi at the time -- my memory is that our embassy recognized that it would be a difficult task, but that it was perhaps understandable if a sovereign state like Pakistan tried to hold itself together and hold the constituent parts together. That would have been the embassy's analysis, that the Pakistani Government had the legal right to try to maintain the country's integrity.

Q: It was our obvious policy to try to stop everyone from fighting. What were you tasked with? I mean you at the Embassy, what were you tasked with doing?

KIRBY: As I recall it, the Embassy in New Delhi got fairly steady instructions from Washington, i.e., the State Department and the White House, to weigh in with the Indians, to try to persuade the Indian government not to do anything that might exacerbate the situation, not to cause the situation in the region to deteriorate. And so in that regard, the Ambassador, the Deputy Chief of Mission, operating under those instructions went in very frequently to see the Foreign Minister, and the Foreign Secretary to argue against adventurism if you will. I believe they also saw the Prime Minister during that period. Certainly, at my level, I was doing the same thing. I was seeing what would equate with our Assistant Secretary level and Director level in the Foreign Ministry, making the same points. I also accompanied the Ambassador and the Deputy Chief of Mission on calls on the Foreign Secretary and the Foreign Minister.

Q: What were you getting in response?

KIRBY: What we were getting in response was that it was not at all an Indian affair. They said that India had nothing to do with this. It was purely indigenous, bubbling up spontaneously out of the hearts and desires of the East Bengalis (the people of East Pakistan) Of course, India was doing nothing to affect the situation one way or the other, they said. The Indian government privately offered the observation, as I recall, that they thought that sentiment in East Pakistan was so strong that over time the government in West Pakistan would not be able to prevail and would not be able to keep East Pakistan within an united Pakistan.

Q: You were being told this. What was your feeling as far as Indian influence within East Pakistan?

KIRBY: It was quite clear from the beginning that India was not playing a passive role.

Q: What about the Central Intelligence Agency? This is exactly the sort of time when it's supposed to play a major role, I think. You know you're trying to find out what our intentions are. Was there cooperation? What were you getting out of this source?

KIRBY: I frankly don't know what the ground rules are for responding to or commenting on a question like that even in this kind of interview. I'm struck by the fact in successive U.S. Administrations extending pretty much over my professional lifetime, when the government spokesman is asked this kind of question, his response is always, "We don't comment on these matters."

Q: We're out of the business and it is unclassified. We're not trying to expose sources but at the same time, I think it's perfectly fair to make a judgment about this as an instrument.

KIRBY: Sure. I think maybe the question is particularly relevant in this case. You indicated at one stage that you want to go on later and touch briefly on the "U.S. Enterprise" in the Bay of Bengal. I am reasonably certain that Henry Kissinger wrote in his memoirs that one of the reasons for the "Enterprise" episode was that we felt we had to make a gesture to warn the Indians about our concern that they were prepared, not only to see an independent Bangladesh emerge from the war, but perhaps also to attack West Pakistan frontally in an effort to break up Pakistan. And he says, either in his memoirs or elsewhere, that it was in information gathered by the CIA that triggered our concern. I want to come back to the matter of the war in the west in a minute because I think U.S. perceptions of what might happen in that sector were critical to how the U.S. addressed the overall war. But my point here is that since the former Secretary of State introduced this whole question of intelligence reports in public examination of U.S. policy toward the war, maybe your question is in fact relevant to our discussion. I don't have...my memory of it is...and I'm notably not "goody-goody", I believe in being precise in my judgments.

My memory of the war and of the events preceding it is that all elements of the Embassy in New Delhi where I was serving along with the constituent posts at the Consulates General in India, were working in pretty close harmony. There was a very good meshing of all elements of the mission and a very good exchange of information. There was good debate on points where we were uncertain. It was a cooperative and rather seamless undertaking among the various elements of the mission. My own feeling, all during my time in India, and perhaps this arose because I had dedicated so much time to the subcontinent, my own feeling was that there was a lot out in the open there for any diplomatic establishment to find if you just dug and looked for it. If you actively looked around, sniffed the air, talked to people, and put the pieces together that you could get the story or the major elements of what was going on without recourse to unusual means of obtaining information, if you follow me. So, as a South Asian hand, I felt, if I may say so, that I pretty much knew what was going on. We talked earlier in these sessions about what an Embassy officer does, what his daily fare is like. I found that by using our normal resources, our normal contacts, we were able to follow the story, including its all-important policy aspects, pretty well. But having said that, I will go back and repeat that it was a very competent mission, very well staffed, at every level, and I think it meshed unusually well.

Q: In your contacts with the military attachés and all, did you feel that the Indian military had almost its own agenda as regards what was happening there as opposed to the politicians? I mean, I won't say a great discrepancy, but the military really wanted...this was a chance to have at the Pakistanis, whereas the government may have had a different aim. How did you see that?

KIRBY: The short answer is no. I did not feel that the Indian military in its corporate self had a separate agenda, one separate from the politicians. Incidentally, I assume that is still the case today, although I'm not familiar with the Indian army today -- I haven't followed it in recent years. During the period we're talking about, however, the Indian army always struck me as being a very professional organization which was professionally well led. It was an army that had a pretty sophisticated view of the Indian constitution and was willing to stick by it. While I don't have any specific memory of such a case, I suppose you could have found individual military officers, just like you find individual politicians in any country at any time, who perhaps are a little bit out of the main stream of their government's policy line and want to go for the jugular, or want to go for broke toward a "final solution" of one kind or another. But, the leadership of the Indian military appeared faithfully to carry out government policy. I didn't get a sense of a separate military agenda. I remember talking with General Manekshaw, who was the Indian Chief of Staff in 1970 and 1971. I used to see him informally occasionally. I don't remember if the war clouds were actually gathering at the time of the particular conversation that now I refer to although relations with Pakistan were tense all during my time in India. General Manekshaw said, "Look, I've always said to my senior officers, 'We're soldiers. We have certain skills that we are very proud of. As long as we stick to our assigned tasks, we will continue to do well and to merit the nation's applause. But if we somehow step out of our role and get involved in politics, and try to do some of the things our neighbor's army is doing, we'd make a hash of running the government just as they have.'" So, his line was that India's civilian leadership ran the government and should make the final decisions on war and peace. As I say, there may possibly have been individual officers who were more militant than the leadership, but overall I found a responsible group which was willing to do whatever the civilian leadership decided to do.

I would suppose, however, that the Chief of Staff and other military people must have given advice to the politicians in the councils on war and peace.

Q: Well, how did this play out? The war clouds are gathering. The Pakistanis sent their army in. How did they send in their army? Did they have to go over Indian territory or how did they work?

KIRBY: They had a sizeable force there in East Pakistan already. Supply, re-supply and re-positioning was a terrible problem for them because East Pakistan was far away from the West Pakistani heartland. Looking at the map, it's a long distance between the old West Pakistan and the Eastern wing. I don't recall with total clarity how the re-supply problem was resolved in normal times, in peacetime, Pakistan had fairly automatic over-flights over India. They had to notify the Indian authorities any time they were overflying India, but it was a fairly automatically granted right. I remember that as the pre-war crisis deepened, there was discussion in the Indian government about whether they should withdraw near-automatic overflight rights. I don't remember how that worked out in the pre-war period. I do remember that Pakistan had a major problem because, among other things, it didn't have available all the air transport necessary to do all the re-provisioning they would have liked to do. Then, too, there were divided councils in the Pakistan Government about how heavily they should crack down in the East.

Q: How did the actual war come about? As seen by the Embassy.

KIRBY: As the subcontinent slipped toward war in the summer and fall, an eventual war appeared inevitable, as I commented earlier. You might recall the visit to India and Pakistan in July 1971 of Henry Kissinger, who was then National Security Advisor to the President. He came to both countries. We didn't know it at the time although we learned it during his trip, this itinerary was part of his first trip to China. But first he stopped off in India for a day, maybe a day and a half, and then went on to Pakistan for a similar period. Like other levels of U.S. officialdom throughout the subcontinent's crisis, Kissinger went to India and Pakistan to argue for a stand-down and peace on the subcontinent. I remember our internal talks in the Embassy conference room in New Delhi, where I was asked to make a presentation. I remember very vividly saying, "Mr. Kissinger, unless a miracle occurs there will be a war in the subcontinent by the end of 1971 and I for one, do not foresee that miracle." That is very vivid in my mind. And then, all through the autumn you could see the two countries edging toward war. Without going into great detail, I remember the step up in propaganda on both sides, the re-positioning of troops, the flow of refugees from East Pakistan into Eastern India which put further pressures on India, and then some evidence of skirmishing on or near the eastern border. Then in November there was an incident in East Pakistan which involved the Indians. The Indian Prime Minister went before Parliament and said that the Indian military was not involved, but it was clear that they were because that event could not have happened in that way if they weren't directly involved. I think an Indian plane was shot down, but I have forgotten the precise details. So you could see India and Pakistan steadily moving toward war. Mrs. Gandhi, in October, had taken her so-called "last trip for peace" where she went to Bonn, London and Washington to plead India's case. Back in August, the Indians had shocked the West -- although it wasn't too great a surprise -- by concluding a new agreement with the Soviet Union for aid and support. So all of these factors were clearly moving the region toward war. In the end, Pakistan decided to attack. They did, on the evening of December 3, 1971 by trying to take out India's air defense system in west and north-central India. It was a fairly halfhearted effort to take out some of the air potential of the Indians in Western India. They bombed some Indian air bases and a couple of big radar centers. That's the way the war began. One can still speculate on what the Pakistanis, by attacking, thought they were going to get out of all this. My view at the time, and my view today is that since it was so clear by December 1971, that East Pakistan could not be held, the Pakistani leadership decided to make a gesture in the West to try to save national honor, but not with a serious intent of wanting to provoke a major and problematical conflict with India in the West, if it could be avoided.

Q: Was there any change in how the Embassy operated? Because I take it war was declared.

KIRBY: Whether there was an actual declaration or not, I do not recall, it was certainly a war, even if only a brief one. War came. The Pakistanis attacked and Mrs. Gandhi spoke to the nation on the radio about midnight, saying, in effect, that the war was on. She then made a formal statement in Parliament the next day, a very important statement which alleged that war had been thrust on India, and said that India would protect itself. The statement indicated, as I recall, that a free and independent entity would emerge from East Pakistan, but then, very importantly, asked that, "We (India) seek no wider war."

Q: The war started by a Pakistani attack although much led up to this. What did we do then, after this?

KIRBY: When you're in a war-time situation, an Embassy does a lot of things simultaneously. The consular section was busy looking after the American community in India -- e.g., sending out warden notices, telling people to stand in place or take shelter because we didn't know how extensive the war was going to be. That's on one side of the embassy's business. All of us in the political section were trying to analyze what was going on and reporting developments to Washington. Once war came, the critical question we focused on was not whether Pakistan could hold East Pakistan, because it was clear they could not, but, rather, whether India would use the Pakistani attack as an excuse to make major war on Pakistan in the West. The central question was whether India would use the Pakistani attack as an excuse to try to scatter Pakistan to the four winds. Once war came, the central thrust of American diplomacy and that of the rest of the world was to try to prevent that from happening -- to keep India from using the war as an excuse to break up West Pakistan. It was Indian intent on this matter we were looking and listening for. When Mrs. Gandhi spoke to the nation around midnight, we were all seeking some hint as to what India intended to do in the West. My memory of it is that we didn't get anything on that in the radio broadcast that night, however. Obviously we were scrambling around seeing every Indian official we could to pose the question: "How's India going to respond in the West?" The next big public opportunity to get some clue on that was when the Prime Minister was scheduled to speak in the Lower House of the Parliament at about noon on Saturday. The war broke out on Friday, the third of December and she was to speak, it was announced, on Saturday morning to give a policy statement. I was in the diplomatic gallery, filled to overflowing as you would expect, when the Prime Minister spoke at noon on Saturday. She said that Bangladesh would be free and made the case that it was an indigenous struggle. She insisted that Bangladesh would be free -- there was to be no doubt of that. The key phrase, however, was, "We seek no wider war", I reported to my Embassy, and we reported to Washington, that assuming that the Prime Minister was sincere -- and we said we thought that it might well be for a variety of reasons -- then India would be prepared (we thought) to undertake a holding action in the West to see what Pakistan did in that sector. If Pakistan were so incautious as to engage the main Indian forces in the West then that would be a different story, and a major war would ensue. We in the Embassy thought that, "We seek no wider war" should be taken very seriously and that we should push the Indians to live up to it. That same Saturday afternoon the Indian Foreign Secretary, T.K. Kaul held a number of meetings with the Ambassadors of the major powers. When he met with our Ambassador that afternoon, Kaul drew particular attention to Mrs. Gandhi's statement, "We seek no wider war". The American Ambassador who had not always received 100% truthful information from his Indian interlocutors that year, if one can be fair about it, pressed and said, "Do you mean it?" The answer was, "Yes, we do, it depends upon what the Pakistanis do." So we were urging from New Delhi to Washington and to our Embassy in Rawalpindi that the Pakistanis should be persuaded not to give the Indians an excuse to enlarge the war. We didn't think the Indians saw it in their interest to try to break up Pakistan. I never believed, then or now, that Mrs. Gandhi thought it in India's interest to break up Pakistan. I never thought that predominant Indian opinion favored breaking up Pakistan, although there were times when Mrs. Gandhi and other Indians were so irritated with Pakistan they might well have had emotional tugs in the opposite direction. But I didn't feel in 1971 that India saw it as truly in its interest to try to break up Pakistan. Thus things developed about the way I expected them to on that front. There were some skirmishes with Pakistan in the West, and in Jammu and Kashmir. In the end, the Pakistanis, interestingly enough, once "honor was served" (my phrase, not theirs) did not commit to battle their newest military equipment or their most elite troops. In effect, they didn't engage the Indians seriously in the West, and the Indians didn't try to go in and open up the war further. But, during those two weeks of the formal war, the thrust of our diplomacy was to try to ensure that there would be "no wider war".

Q: Did you have any feeling in New Delhi, the White House -- Nixon, Kissinger, were coming down a little heavy on the Pakistani side, or were you pretty much left to do your traditional role of both trying to get everybody to come to the peace agreement?

KIRBY: I'd have to go back and read all the documents of the period to be able to give you a full answer to that, which I haven't done. I think we were in Delhi largely allowed to get on with our task. Certainly the White House had been irritated with what it believed to have been India's facilitative role in the Bangladesh imbroglio all through the summer and fall. But, there was not a daily hammering from Washington. When war came, our instructions were to try to persuade the Indian Government not to make it a "wider war," as I said earlier. Kissinger himself writes of Washington's "tilt" toward Pakistan. I think that refers largely to the gesture -- and it wasn't more than a gesture -- of sending the "Enterprise" into the Bay of Bengal.

Q: This was a one-carrier task force?

KIRBY: Yes. This was not a serious gesture, but it damaged our future relations with India.

Q: It was just enough to annoy and not enough to be effective, was it?

KIRBY: I think that's accurate, yes. And it was addressed at something that wasn't happening, the "wider war" in the West. It was a warning to India not to break up West Pakistan after the Indian leadership had already declared themselves publicly against a "wider war." By extrapolating from what Mr. Kissinger and others have said, it would appear that in the "Enterprise" episode, the audiences for that gesture were China, in the first instance, and the Soviet Union, in the second.

Q: India had just signed an agreement with the Soviet Union which was more military materials and all that. What was the role of the Soviet Union or Soviet Embassy during this war?

KIRBY: Nobody quite knew from the rather anodyne language of the friendship treaty with the Soviet Union of August, 1971, what its actual content might be. Nobody quite knew what the full dimensions of the agreement were, exactly what it committed the Soviet to. The assumption was that it certainly committed them to providing military equipment (no doubt about that) and various types of unspecified diplomatic support, we supposed. Whether if the Indians had gotten into a tight corner with the Pakistanis -- which, in my view, could not have happened given the preponderance of forces on the Indian side -- in the very unlikely event that China would have intervened directly in the conflict -- whether that might have brought the Soviets more actively into play no one knows. That was always a question hanging in the air. Perhaps one of the reasons the Indians signed the agreement was to deter others from entering the fray. What did the Soviets do? Not very much that I recall. The Soviet Embassy was very, very large at that time, very elephantine in its work patterns and so on. They got "around town" but not very effectively or not very imaginatively. While they were at least visible on the Delhi scene, the Soviet Embassy and its personnel were not much of a factor in this short war. If the war had gone on longer, maybe that would have changed. As I said, it was about a two-week war. The fighting lasted for a week or ten days, and then it was over. And so the Indians really didn't have to call in all of their diplomatic chips. But the signing of that agreement with the Soviets in August -- going back to something you asked earlier -- was another of the irritants to the West. It was another irritant which further persuaded the White House that the Indians were friendlier to the Soviets than they were to the West and that they were up to something they shouldn't be.

Q: When the war petered out, did we have any role in the final terms, the refugees, any of the other fall-out consequences?

KIRBY: Well, we'd had a lot to do with the refugees all during that year as they were pouring into India in the spring, summer and fall. We had our AID people working on food and other refugee assistance, we assisted UNDP, Senator Kennedy, in his capacity as chairman of the Senate's Subcommittee on Refugees, came to India to see how the U.S. could best focus its refugee assistance.

Q: You were saying you were providing food to the refugees?

KIRBY: Yes. Food and various kinds of assistance to the refugees. The U.S. put in a lot of support at that time. In the aftermath of the war in late 1971 and through most of 1972 The U.S. tried to work with India and Pakistan to ameliorate the effects of the war. The U.S., and others too, tried to be helpful to New Delhi and Rawalpindi as we advanced thoughts for peaceful accommodation that the two sides later tried to put the Simla Accord to serve as a framework for their relations. We offered ideas on how they could relax tensions. One subject was repatriation of prisoners of war, so that all the prisoners of war in Bangladesh could be repatriated to Pakistan, and so on. We played an active diplomatic role in trying to bring the two sides together on such practical matters.

Q: Did you find any change in attitudes in connections in dealing with the Indian government after the war as opposed to before the war?

KIRBY: Certainly, bilateral relations went into a deep freeze by mid-1972. Indian-U.S. relations suffered all through 1971 as war was pending and then given the Indian perception of Washington's tilt towards Pakistan, yes, bilateral relations began to be cut back in several spheres, affecting many programs and policies. My wife and I didn't notice any great change in our own contacts with Indians, however. We had been in India a long time. We knew a lot of Indians, both official and non-official, whom we knew on a friendly and personal basis as I said in an earlier segment of this interview. They always knew that we represented the United States. We were always very, very clear about that. We were very, very direct in speaking out to them when we saw things that we didn't agree with in Indian policy. But, no, relations were friendly right up until we left in September, 1972 -- the personal relations were still just terrific. People continued to have us to their house for dinner. The son of a very senior diplomat -- the son himself was a distinguished diplomat and became India's Foreign Secretary in later years -- and his wife did the generous, hospitable, traditional Indian thing the day we left of spending our last hours in Delhi with us at our house. They weren't the only ones. There were others there, too, staying with us until it was time to go to the airport. This was their way of showing that these ties of friendship were sacred and had not been touched by any of this.

Q: What was your impression of the Indian government after the creation of Bangladesh? Was it a stronger basis, I mean, did this change things at all?

KIRBY: Mrs. Gandhi's government stayed pretty much what it had been, although it was somewhat, if only temporarily, strengthened by the experience. Coming through the war with Pakistan successfully (from the Indian point of view), and helping with the emergence of Bangladesh, Mrs. Gandhi was perceived in India as being the victor, as being a successful leader. While that image would fade somewhat later, for the immediate 1972-1973 period the successful war strengthened her hand in intra-mural Indian politics. As I mentioned in earlier segments, prior to the 1971 crisis she had been hard pressed by the conservative old-timers in her party. Some called them the "old guard", some called them the "barons...the king makers" in the Indian National Congress Party. They had presented a real challenge to her in 1969-1970 as they sought to get her out of power. As I say, the events of late 1971 strengthened her hand within the Indian National Congress Party and within the country for the short term. A couple of years later, she would face a different kind of political challenge, and a major one. But for that period just after the war, I think that she was more self-confident, as were the people around her.

Q: What was the impression at the Embassy of the future of Bangladesh? Was that going to change the equation in the area or not?

KIRBY: I don't think that we thought it was going to change the power equation in any significant way. In fact there were many among us who argued that if Pakistan could get over its chagrin, swallow its pride, move forward from the loss of East Pakistan, a slenderized West Pakistan could be a more coherent purposeful country than it had been able to be while trying to manage different culture and people, the East Bengalis, who lay several hundred miles away. We thought that during its early years, a newly independent Bangladesh, by definition, would require a lot of diplomatic, economic, and financial support to get going in the world. We thought it would particularly need India's strong support. We also thought that the time would come, sooner than the Indians believed, when they and Bangladesh would begin quarreling over the apportionment of eastern waters, and other such noisome matters.

DAVID BLAKEMORE
Rotation Officer
Calcutta (1965-1966)

David Blakemore was born in 1941 in New York State. He graduated from Valparaiso in 1962 and joined the Foreign Service in 1965. He served overseas in Saudi Arabia, India, Korea, Bangladesh and Nigeria, as well as the staff director of the Board of Examiners and Deputy Team Leader in the Inspection Corps in Washington DC. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in the winter of 1997.

BLAKEMORE: I was assigned to Calcutta. Then in good State Department fashion, to get off language probation, I studied French. My years of literary French from high school and college, after about five months, were transformed into the ability to speak French reasonably well. Then they sent me to Calcutta and I never have been in a French speaking country except as a tourist. The accomplishment of actually being able to think and deal in a foreign language was something I was quite proud of, but now it's gone. All I can tell you is that it is almost entirely gone.

Q: You were in Calcutta from when to when just by years?

BLAKEMORE: My wife and I arrived in Calcutta in November 1965 and left there in November 1966, one year.

Q: How did Calcutta strike you when you arrived there?

BLAKEMORE: We were appalled. Neither one of us had been out of the United States except to Canada. We had no awareness at an emotional level, perhaps at an intellectual level, but not at an emotional level of how serious poverty can be. The oppressive poverty and the heat, humidity and the dirt of India really was something that we were not prepared for and we both went into kind of an emotional tail spin for a while. As we were coming out of that, after a year of getting our feet on the ground and adjusting, we were transferred. Which is too bad.

Q: When you were in Calcutta during this year, what were the political currents in India at that particular time.

BLAKEMORE: It was an interesting time, I guess everybody says that. Domestically this was the year in which Prime Minister Shastri died at a summit meeting in Tashkent with the Soviet leadership. Indira Gandhi came from nowhere and was elected as Prime Minister of India. It was exciting to watch happen. On the international side the Indian moral superiority established by Nehru was still in full swing. The Vietnam war and our participation in it was extremely unpopular in India and there were regular demonstrations in front of the consulate general in Calcutta and I'm sure elsewhere in India against U.S. involvement in that war. Those were a little frightening too although they would not be to me now having seen demonstrations elsewhere, but again I had never seen that sort of thing. We lived near the consulate, right next door. It was kind of scary at first. You got used to it as it was something that happened fairly regularly.

Q: Did you have much contact with Indians? You were there such a short time.

BLAKEMORE: Not as much as I would have liked to have. Because the experience of living overseas and interacting with foreigners was so new, the really useful contact with Indians came in the consulate general with the Indian staff. Of course they are in a sense "tame" Indians. They were experienced American handlers but I developed a great fondness for several Indian employees at the consulate.

I was on a rotational assignment meaning that I was supposed to spend my two years in Calcutta moving around from one section to the other: consular, economic, political and admin. I started in consular and I was the only consular officer. Calcutta was still a fairly active port at that time and the United States still had a merchant marine. There were some challenging seamen in trouble cases.

Q: Can you give an example or do any cases stick in mind?

BLAKEMORE: I don't really remember a lot of detail. Nothing really romantic or anything. The seamen cases were all new to me and also there were a lot of young Americans wandering aimlessly around South Asia.

Q: It was part of the life in those days. They could get out and go out to smoke pot and have a good time for a year.

BLAKEMORE: The hippie-type people. They were interested in Indian religions, fascinated by them. The Indians were extremely tolerant as long as the young people stayed out of trouble, stayed away from criminal activity.

The senior Indian consular employee was a real life saver for me because despite what I thought was a very well done consular course here in the training in Washington, I didn't know what I was doing in interpreting consular regulations. If it had been Manila and I had been doing non-immigrant visas then there would have been a boring sameness to it but I would have gotten familiar with a relatively small body of regulations that applied. But I was doing immigrant visas, non-immigrant visas, welfare and whereabouts, protection of American citizens, seamen and shipping. All that was on my plate ostensibly. I would make ad hoc decisions: here is what we are going to do. The senior FSN would say okay, nodding his head from side to side and walk off. He would come back a few minutes later and say “you know, you might want to look at what it says in the regulations.” He would draw me back from the brink yet again. He was a wonderful guy. That was kind of a scary experience, but it was a good experience and there were no major catastrophes.

Q: Who was consul general?

BLAKEMORE: Bill Hitchcock.

Q: How did he operate?

BLAKEMORE: He was very democratic I would say. He and his wife were interested in our welfare as young people in the Service. As I think about it, he maintained a pretty good balance between a certain aloofness required for good leadership and a lot of interaction with everybody. His deputy, Bernie Korgan, whom my wife worked for as a secretary, was terrific and had very much a mentor mentality. He and his wife took us under their wing and took very good care of us socially and in helping us understand what we were dealing with. They helped us deal with the culture shock and depression that went with it. It was a very nice feeling in the office.

Q: How does one operate in a place? I am talking about you are now in sort of the mental health field anyway, but looking back on that (I have never served in a Calcutta-type place) I would think that ones reaction would be to almost reject it and go to the polo playing set or the other one would be to go into acute depression. For an American this must be very difficult.

BLAKEMORE: We thought it was difficult, and there is no question we were both depressed. One of my reactions was to drink more than I normally did and more than I should have. My wife spent a lot of time shut up in the apartment for the first few months, not really venturing out to do much. It was a tricky time and, as I say, we were beginning to come out of it. We traveled some in northern India and we made some friends who worked for USIA in Delhi. We took the train across northern India to Delhi and met them and then drove with them to Srinagar in Kashmir. It was a wonderful trip and we began to see beyond the poverty and the dirt to the fabulous richness in this culture and to get in touch with some of that: to visit temples and to appreciate some Indian art, both modern and not so modern, even Indian music. We ran out of time.

Q: Why were you moved so quickly?

BLAKEMORE: Let me just finish what I did while I was there. The consular section took up seven months of the year then a permanent replacement came and I moved on to the political section during the election and covered four states in northeastern India during the election. I never got to the area. It's odd, it is sort of a blank in my memory, how little interaction I had with Indian politicians and Indian people at least during the consular phase of my work. It was pretty much an in-the-office job which is very puzzling to me now. How do you do political work in the office?

All the people in my class who were on rotational assignments were what was called central complement. That meant that they were extra gift employees for the post. The post didn't have to pay for us. We were paid for out of a Washington pool of money which dried up after about a year and nearly all of us were moved. It is a great example of the idiocy of government budgeting. Just because there is no more money in this pocket, you spend a tremendous amount of money from another pocket to move everybody. The expense of moving is so great. Anyway, that is what happened. Most of us were moved within the geographic bureau. I was in the Near East and South Asian bureau and we were moved from Calcutta to Jeddah.

When we arrived at the airport, there on the tarmac was my friend from the A100 course who had earned 17 dollars, or something, for having one of the worst posts. He was greatly amused that I had now joined him in Jeddah. At the time, and we are now talking about November 1966, it was the capital of Saudi Arabia and it was the city that tolerated and dealt with foreigners within Saudi Arabia. Nonetheless, it presented us with a new and interesting form of culture shock in the form of restrictions on our personal activity at post by the fundamentalist conservative monarch regime. For example, my wife could not drive. She could not go downtown in clothing that did not cover her arms entirely. Jeddah, if anything, was hotter than Calcutta and equally humid, which always surprises people, but it is right on the Red Sea. No alcohol. Of course, we had plenty of it but it wasn't publicly available. Christian services were conducted on the embassy grounds in a way that made us feel that we were participating in some evil clandestine activity. So as I say, it was another form of culture shock.

PHILIP MERRILL
USAID
New Delhi (1965-1966)

Phillip Merrill was born in Baltimore in 1934. He went to Cornell University, where he majored in government. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: The quantifiers often make this mistake. Well, you then left in what, '65?

MERRILL: Yes, we spent 1965 in India. Ellie had been Senator Ken Keating's press secretary and he was defeated by Bobby Kennedy in 1964. It is worth noting that Keating ran a million votes ahead of Barry Goldwater in New York State and Kennedy ran a million votes ahead of Keating.

She went to work for the National Committee for an Effective Congress, a public interest and also very effective private lobbying operation on Capital Hill run out of a town house at 421 New Jersey Avenue.

The principal, Maurice Rosenblatt, can not be easily captured in words. Every pretty girl or attractive woman in Washington seemed to have worked for him at one time or another. He had not only immense personal charm but perhaps the best political insight of any person I have ever met. He knew everyone on Capital Hill. The house was always full of Senators. We have remained permanent personal friends.

Ellie and I were trying to have a child and not succeeding. Essentially the idea of going to India for a year or two appealed to us. There was an adventurous context to it. I did not want to work for Bowles again, but an offer had surfaced from the new AID director there, John P. Lewis, to work for him. We decided to accept for the sheer fun of it. It turned out to be a fascinating experience which we have never regretted.

I ought to insert here that just before the Crockett period I was asked to develop an answer for the State Department to a thoroughly vicious book called "None Dare Call It Treason" by right wing activist Phyllis Schlafly.

The book was a totally unfounded McCarthy type assault on the patriotism and integrity of the entire Department with the general idea that we were all traitors helping the Communists advance around the world.

It was easy enough to demolish. I simply took it apart charge by charge and replaced each one with the facts. I got some help from James Greenfield, subsequently the managing editor of the New York Times, who was then Assistant Secretary for Public Affairs, and the result was quite satisfactory.

Mrs. Schlafly was a right wing kook then and I suppose she hasn't changed much since. I found particularly interesting the demagogic basis which provided her book with credibility.

What she did was cite as factual evidence every kind of crazy charge made by anyone in the Congressional Record, but in such a way that it appeared to be demonstrated proof by a Congressional committee. Of course anyone can testify before Congress, and Congressmen themselves insert all kinds of material into the record simply as favors to supporters. The technique still occasionally works.

We spent a month traveling in Asia on the way out to India. I learned to surf in Hawaii and we stopped in Vietnam which was just heating up. We traveled by land, that is, riding the local buses across Cambodia. We visited Angkor Wat, the 13th century Khmer civilization ruins that are one of the great wonders of the world. We crossed the Thai border at Aranyaprathet, subsequently the site of so much bloodshed, and took the train to Bangkok.

We thought Cambodia was a perfectly peaceful place where the bananas and the breadfruit hung from trees and most people were happy and well-fed. The kind of sheer terror and genocide that eventually developed there never crossed our minds as even a remote possibility.

I remember at one point literally counting 21 people and innumerable baskets of fish in a Volkswagen micro-van. Two of the 21 were us.

We stopped in Burma, which even then was a closed society, and got a good briefing from the ambassador, who had plenty of time to spare. He spent most of it putting together and taking apart a Rolls-Royce in his front yard.

The Burmese had simply turned completely inward. After World War II Burma was the most advanced of the British east Asian colonies. Who would have thought that war torn Malaysia, with its ethnic rivalries, would have prospered as a free society while Burma simply went back in time as a socialist one.

Anyway, we traveled on through Bangladesh and entered India via the extremely colorful road in to Calcutta from Dum-Dum airport. And we stopped for a day in Chittagong, still the end of the earth, because I liked the sound of the name and got off the plane when it landed there.

The year in India was dominated by the fact of the Indian-Pakistani war of 1965. We loved living in India and traveled the length and breadth of it, sometimes on business, sometimes by Volkswagen, visiting game parks, fording rivers, and seeing the country.

We became close friends with Ken and Gloria Bailey, then the U.S. Army attaché, and took a trip with them into the Himalayas above the Kulu Valley in North Central India. The four of us, on horseback, were turned back by Chinese border guards at 13,000 feet. The only reason I am doing this history is because these border guards evidently didn't want anything to do with the United States in 1965. Otherwise we would all still be in a Chinese prison.

I also flew for a while. I used to be a private pilot and the Royal Indian Air Force let me fly with one of their training squadrons in Tiger Moths. That was kind of fun because it is an open cockpit biplane, and you can hang upside down Red Baron style.

India was still part of the British Empire then and we used to toast the Queen in the Officers Mess after flights. I still think To the Queen is the only proper toast. The AID job did not really work out as well as I had hoped for a number of reasons, the principal one being the change in atmosphere due to the war.

Q: This was in India?

MERRILL: AID had a staff of several hundred people. It was literally larger than the entire rest of the embassy. It even had its own building. I thought the staff should be orders of magnitude smaller. I recall exactly that there were 89 professional technical people on the payroll to supervise various contracts. These were government employees in various engineering disciplines.

All of this should have been contracted out to Bechtel or Halliburton, with perhaps two or three coordinators or checkers on the Mission staff.

The government has no business hiring directly experts on building dams. It is a waste of money. They do not get the best engineers. There are not enough of them to supervise or build anything, and their cost ought to be carried by the Indians themselves.

If the host country is not willing to pay for the technical assistance part, that is for the people, then the assistance will be close to worthless, because they will not place a high value on it. I don't want to take that to incorporate the very poorest basket cases in the world where there may be issues of charity.

Q: Bangladesh or something like that.

MERRILL: My cousin is currently ambassador in Bangladesh and I had been there before. There are 120 million people in Bangladesh, and they are more capable than many realize. For example, the Soviet Union, which at one point was the largest producer of ball bearings in the world, mostly for the military, bought for their most advanced systems bearings from Bangladesh. The quality was better. I was really thinking more of the Central African countries. Bangladesh is more like India. Too many people but a great deal of talent.

Q: Essentially what was your job at AID? Were you considered sort of a management expert having gone through this Crockett period?

MERRILL: I was considered a bright young guy who could help get control of the AID program. In the context of the time, the war took precedence over everything else. AID got put on the back burner.

I recall spending a fascinating week in Calcutta with Robert Nathan, then a very well respected world class economist, who headed his own consulting firm and who, like John Lewis, was a development expert. The idea was to help the Indians create a modern development program for Calcutta. Some things just can not be done.

Calcutta was not subject to the influence of modern American foreign assistance. It needed everything. That does not mean the Indians could not do something for Calcutta. I am an optimist, not a pessimist.

But when you have tens of thousands of people sleeping on the streets, the management tools of a Western civilized society, no matter how well intentioned, are not particularly relevant. We can not even deal with our homeless here in our own country, not that they stem from the same reasons.

In any case I did some AID type work. I did some military analysis work. At the end of a year the situation on the ground had changed.

Q: This is foreign policy. Whatever you are doing some of these programs don't work, because what you plan is changed by events. I mean all these developing countries are difficult places.

MERRILL: I agree but with a slight nuance of difference. We still have long term interests, such as helping representative government thrive in India.

Q: We don't have permanent friends but we have permanent interests.

MERRILL: That was said by Lord Palmerston about British policy. We do have ongoing interests in most countries in most areas of the world, although there can be radical shifts.

There is going to be a radical shift after the unification of North and South Korea, particularly if Korea maintains itself as a nuclear power. The current thinking in the State Department is they won't. Personally I do not believe that. And with a unified South Korea with nuclear capacity the relationships among China, Russia, and Japan are sure to be very different.

Look at our relationship to Germany and Japan between 1941 and 1951. Who in 1941 would have believed that 10 years later both would be allies and NATO would be two years old?

The skill of a good Foreign Service officer is in taking what is central out of a complex situation and expressing it in terms that can be implemented.

So I came back from India after a year. The war had ended and the AID program was in a different mode. I could spend another year because it was a two year contract. Or I could look on it as a wonderful year, but a second would have been repetitive and very bureaucratic. John Lewis also left.

Of course I took advantage of Chet's position as ambassador there and talked it over with him. We had the same view of the AID program as being necessary and desirable but excessively top heavy in administration, and not subject to easy change. So I arranged to come back to the State Department proper in INR, the Bureau of Intelligence and Research.

Then I had a wonderful conversation with some bureaucrat six levels down in the administrative section who insisted that I had signed a contract to stay for two years and couldn't go, regardless of what made sense. I suggested he look at the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution.

Q: Involuntary servitude.

MERRILL: Exactly. He refused to sign off on the last piece of paper. I pointed to all the paperwork that was already completed. I told him that Ellie and I had had an extraordinarily happy year in India and I would not let him spoil it. I said I had a plane ticket back to the United States, and another job.

Somebody else was already moving into our house there and I was leaving on a date certain. If you don't want me to leave, you can call the FBI, send the United States Marines, send the Indian National Guard, or don't approve the ticket. I'll pay for it myself. You worry about the paperwork. Of course they ended up paying for the ticket.

We spent a great month en route home traveling through Afghanistan, where everybody carried a rifle, and through the Southern republics of what was then the Soviet Union, including stops in Tashkent and Samarkand which I had always wanted to visit. We also stopped in other parts of Russia, including Moscow and St. Petersburg, and then visited a number of the satellites behind the Iron Curtain.

I particularly remember New Year's eve in a private home in Budapest. We were taken out on the town to a night club. There were a number of Russian officers also present. The management brought out an old 48 star American flag, placed it on our table, and the band kept playing the Star Spangled Banner. There were, needless to say, no Russian flags presented.

I came back as what was then called, the actual title, Senior Intelligence Analyst for South Asia. This meant that I was not quite the senior intelligence analyst for south Asia, but the second in INR handling the area.

My boss was an extremely bright person named Tom Thornton, a first class academic intellect, who had a position in the civil service and thus was not subject to transfer. He was the Near East and South Asia director in INR, reflecting the Department's organization which combined for administrative purposes the Near East and South Asia under one Assistant Secretary.

Fortunately for me Tom's academic expertise was on South Asia, not the Middle East, although he was responsible for both. I say fortunately because it was helpful to have an immediate superior with academic depth where I had only practical experience.

Q: I want to go back to India, not in detail. You had gone through the Foreign Service looking at Argentina, Mexico and other countries. You had been around and here you were essentially in an AID environment. Did you note anything different about the way AID management or the AID bureaucracy was different from what you'd observed in other parts of the Foreign Service?

MERRILL: What a wonderful question. It was not different but exaggerated. The size of the program was so large in India, so much greater than the programs in Mexico and Argentina and most other countries, that it had a character of its own

Other programs were smaller and more narrowly political or humanitarian. The program in India was the largest part of a worldwide effort to counter Soviet power projection in the third world, and to develop a competitor to China.

It was the largest AID program we had in the world. With the advantage of hindsight, it was the most successful one, meaning India, with all its strengths and weaknesses, is still a democratic country. Indeed, it is the only other country in the world besides the United States that has 200,000,000 middle class people living in the first world; this despite 700 million living in the 7th century.

Given the frozen attitude towards China, the fact that Japan had dropped as kind of an unanticipated WW II bonus baby onto our side of the seemingly monolithic Communist world, and the adverse circumstances developing in Indonesia, there was a significance to the AID program in India that transcended all others.

One thought not only in terms of doing good through standard economic development assistance. One thought in terms of a world wide challenge which the totalitarian states appeared to be winning.

They were even or ahead of us in space and Khrushchev really thought they were going to beat us in the ability to deliver real services to real people. This was the spirit of that age. The AID program in India was thus the largest and most representative of the ideological battle for Asia, Africa, and Latin America -- all part of the same ongoing competition in the Toynbee sense of challenge and response.

At the time I was somewhere between appalled and disappointed. I think Chet expected me, even though I wasn't working directly for him, to be able to do more than I could. I referred earlier to the 89 full time engineers. There were also a bunch of program officers. There was an immense amount of paperwork. All the program officers were bureaucrats in the sense that they wanted to make sure that all the and "t's" were properly crossed.

What they met were comrades in arms in India. Here was the legacy of the British civil service. They both loved paperwork. They both wanted to make certain the forms were filled out exactly right.

Let me provide some flavor for Indian paper work. You could stand by an Indian Airlines plane with a capacity of 100 people. There could be two people on board. You had a valid ticket. The plane would take off without you, because the manifest said it was full. I am not joking. This has actually happened to Ellie and me.

Why did the plane take off? Because the clerk standing there with the manifest is a minor civil servant. He has a career. He loses that job and he is a dead man. He literally starves. Does he care whether the plane is full? No! He cares what's on the manifest. If the manifest says the plane is full, the plane is full.

What is the risk to the clerk of changing the manifest or letting people go aboard who are not on the manifest? The risk to him is his whole life. He's not going to take that risk. This is a country in which a whole village will celebrate because one of its youths was accepted into the Army. It is a country where job seekers have cards that say high school fail which means they had some high school but failed. Now when this culture and AID's huge bureaucratic culture met, it was a take.

Q: A love match.

MERRILL: So the rigidity of the bureaucracy was extremely troublesome. I do not want to sit behind a desk filling out forms. Time behind a desk is wasted time. The AID culture is to make certain all the forms are exactly right. It's what happens when you keep picking at and beating up on a bureaucracy. What is eventually left is a kind of a sludge.

But the worst part was that the fundamental thing they were doing was off target. There was too much government to government assistance and not enough government to private industry assistance. We are in the business of developing free institutions, private enterprises, free markets. That's what we were trying to make work in India. In fact we-- actually they-- succeeded. The fact that American policy over several decades helped India to maintain independence, territorial integrity, and democracy is among our great Cold War victories. That doesn't alter, however, the issue of AID bureaucracy.

The electrical engineer on the AID payroll had the self-protective interest of filling out the paperwork, living well in India with a bunch of servants, and above all not screwing up. If a particular project is finished he gets a share of the credit. If not it is the fault of what the British used to call the bloody wogs. Does he report to someone whose job it is to get this dam built, to get this electric system operating, to get this bunch of wells completed? No!

Q: I think this is a tendency to transpose the large bureaucracy which exists to countries rather than to be more project oriented.

MERRILL: The whole AID mission way of operating was wrong. But we still had a wonderful year in India, made even more interesting because of the war. We bought a Volkswagen and drove the length and breadth of India. We forded rivers. We visited the Kulu Valley in North central India. We were up in Kashmir.

Ellie and I followed the Ganges to its headwaters camping out all the way on beaches in the canyons with a 22 for protection. What that would have done in what is classic tiger country I hate to think about. The Ganges starts at a little town called Devraprayag at about 10,000 feet in a small vale. It's like following the Colorado to the headwaters. We went to Indian game parks. We explored the width, length and breadth of India visiting ruins and temples, great game parks, and marvelous ancient carved cities such as Kajaharo. It was a marvelous year.

GALEN L. STONE
Counselor for Political Economic Affairs
New Delhi (1965-1968)

Ambassador Galen L. Stone grew up in Massachusetts. After attending Harvard University and serving in the U.S. Army, he joined the Foreign Service. His career included positions in Germany, France, India, Vietnam, Laos, Austria, and Washington, DC, and an ambassadorship to Cyprus. He was interviewed on April 15, 1988 by Malcolm Thompson.

Q: I notice from the Biographical Register that subsequent to this in the early sixties you were in New Delhi. Would you care to comment on that assignment, on that tour of duty?

STONE: Yes indeed. I was fortunate enough to be assigned to the British Imperial Defense College on the 1964 course. This was run on a calendar year basis and the student body was made up of forty British, ten from each military service and ten government civilians; twenty from the Commonwealth, there were two Indian officers and three Pakistanis, headed by a Lieutenant General, and four from the U.S.: one from each military service and I from the Foreign Service. It just so happened that one of the closest friends on the course that I made was an Indian Brigadier, and subsequently, on being assigned to India, this friendship proved invaluable, because it gave me an entrée into the Indian Army.

The Indian Army is the element in India that really holds the country together. The Indian military have had a remarkably apolitical record, serving the civilian government of the day; but not, as in Pakistan, assuming a direct responsibility for Government. My time there initially was involved with the Indian military. We had our own military mission to India at the time which had the strange acronym of USMSMI, the United States Military Supply Mission to India. In every other country, we had a MAAG, a Military Assistance Advisory Group, but the Indians made it very clear that they didn't want our advice. They thought that they knew what they wanted to do, so they insisted that the name of the organization be different.

Would you like me to talk about both phases of my assignment there? My first assignment there was as Counselor for Political Economic Affairs External. This was the result of Ambassador Chester Bowles' effort to try and apply in India a different embassy organizational structure in the belief that it was more appropriate to that country. I think in many respects he was right. The decisions, for example, on the location of a new steel mill, and in what site in India it would be placed, etcetera, had many political as well as economic considerations involved.

In my capacity in charge of the external side, I was involved with India's relations with the rest of the world - both economic and political. This made me the principal embassy with working level contact with the Ministry of External Affairs; the Indian governments' equivalent of the State Department. This became of particular importance during the Indian war with Pakistan in 1965. At that time the Indian army attacked across the borders of Punjab toward Lahore, there were some six-hundred Americans there. I was dealing with the Indian government and trying to persuade them to hold their fire on Lahore airport, in order to permit our planes to land and evacuate American citizens. My principal contact in the Ministry of External Affairs, Suvendra Alirajpur, called me late one night. He said that he had done his best to get in touch with the Indian Chief of Staff, but he was very sorry to say that he had just not been able to do it and so there was nothing that could be done.

I went back and drafted a telegram to inform everyone that we just simply couldn't do it. In the meantime, of course, we had pre-positioned air craft in Tehran to perform the evacuation. I had delivered my telegram to the code room, went back to my office, and the phone was ringing. Alirajpur told me he had just spoken to the Chief of Staff and they would hold their fire on Lahore airport for one hour the following morning. So, I rushed down, stopped the earlier telegram and got off another one, and American planes landed at ten minute intervals. We evacuated six hundred Americans from Lahore that following morning and the operation went off without a hitch.

Q: Refresh my memory, was this prior to the Indian War with China?

STONE: This was after the Indian war with China. The Indian war with China was in September of 1961. There were several Indo-Pakistan wars, the first one in 1965 was The Rann of Kutch. The war that I am speaking of now was in September of 1966. This was a period of further and increased difficulties between India and Pakistan over Kashmir which were made all the more poignant by the fact that we had substantially assisted in the military equipping of the Pakistani army. We were embarrassed to find an American tank captured from the Pakistanis on display at Connaught Circus in New Delhi. It took us awhile to get that removed, but it did not help our image in India one whit. In May 1968, I had been pulled out of India and sent to Saigon as Chief of the Political section. I thought at the time that this was a bit of madness on the part of the personnel authorities, but the Counselor for Political Affairs was a man with whom I had worked with before in Germany, Arch Calhoun, and he asked for me particularly to be his number two in the Political section. I therefore was immersed in Vietnamese affairs with no prior experience in that area whatsoever.

I served there for eighteen months when a new political appointee was named to go as Ambassador to India, Senator Kenneth Keating, who had been defeated for reelection to the Senate by Robert Kennedy. They wanted to have in India an officer who had had recent India experience, so I was ordered, on return from a very brief leave in the United States to see my family to go back to Saigon by way of New Delhi to be vetted by the new Ambassador. Subsequently a month or so later I was transferred to New Delhi as the Deputy Chief of Mission. In 1971, relations between India and Pakistan further worsened and you had the second major Indo-Pakistan war with the focus on East Pakistan, or what later became the newly independent country of Bangladesh.

The American embassy played a very critical role during this period. As events unfolded, we were the only country that had excellent communications between New Delhi and Dacca and so the message calling for the surrender of the Pakistan army was in fact transmitted over our lines to the Consulate General in Dacca, and then delivered to General Niazi, the Senior Pakistani Commander in East Pakistan.

This was a very difficult period and during much of this time I was chargé d'affaires. I recall in particular addressing the Indian Defense College at a time when we were severely criticized for tilting toward Pakistan. It was a difficult job to defend American interest at that point. In fact, I understand that one of the questions that you were going to ask me later on was my greatest frustrations in my career. My greatest frustration occurred during this period. I was on the verge of resigning from the Foreign Service because I was so upset with the decision to send the Enterprise task force into the Bay of Bengal as an overt threat to the government of India.

Q: I had a question that I wanted to ask you about Ambassador Bowles. I happened to be in the Department in personnel during the period when Bowles was being prepared to go out to New Delhi; and I believe this was the second time in the early sixties when he had been Under Secretary in the Kennedy administration. The rumor around Washington was that he had fallen out with the President and the inner circle and so they said "Well let's send Chester back to New Delhi." He was quite happy to go there I presume. He caused quite a furor in personnel because he picked up several additional people that he wanted on his staff, for which there was no position. The Executive Director for the Middle East was very outraged at the fact that he had to find money to finance these people. I was put in the position of going up and trying to persuade the individual who was working on Bowles' staff that these people were not necessary, and being told that the Ambassador wanted them and that positions were to be found for them. I wonder how they worked out? One was a retired Army Colonel who was to be his political - military advisor, and that upset the Pentagon greatly because they had a whole staff of Generals and Colonels out there already.

STONE: They did decide that they wanted Chester Bowles out of the State Department; although I think he deserves great credit as the individual principally responsible for the appointment of Ambassadors in the early stages of the Kennedy administration. I mean people like Reischauer who went to Japan and Badeau who went to Egypt, people outside of the Foreign Service in many cases, but also people who the Foreign Service thoroughly respected for their professionalism and their knowledge of the area to which they were assigned. In addition working with the President, he finally got the Congressman from Brooklyn, John J. Rooney to agree to place some career officers in the major Embassies. It was during that period that Chip Bohlen was assigned to Paris, and Fred Reinhardt to Italy as Ambassador. Bowles was asked what job he would accept and he said the one job he would take would be to go back to India.

Now in terms of the people you are asking about, the Colonel that he took was named Grant Williams. He was a very fine military officer and very effective, he also had two staff aides that he brought in from outside the service. One was a man named Douglas Bennet whose father had been a close colleague of Bowles at Yale University, and had been his principal associate when Bowles was running the Office of Price Administration during the Second World War. Doug Bennet did extremely well, he was rather low-keyed, but he was an excellent staff aide and he later went on to be the Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations. The other one was a young man named Dick Celeste. Celeste is today the Governor of the State of Ohio.

Q: Very interesting, as you know it has always been a problem with Ambassadors who choose to take people outside of the normal Foreign Service staffing pattern and generally arrange to do so. This naturally causes some problems in the Department. Would you care to comment any further on your tour in Saigon? How were things looking then? Was there light at the end of the tunnel?

STONE: Well, when I arrived there, it was just after what was known as "mini-Tet." The Tet Offensive had occurred in late February of 1968, the mini-tet came in May. I arrived just after that. I had only been there about ten days having had no prior involvement with that area at all.

In fact every other person who was assigned to the country was required to take as a minimum a three weeks orientation course before taking up their assignment. I was told that I didn't need to have that course, that they wanted me out there immediately and I could learn on the job. Well, within ten days of my arrival I was told I was in charge of the visit of the Secretary of Defense, the preparation of briefing papers and everything else, and it was very much a case of being thrown into the water and having to do your best to keep your head above it. Fortunately that visit came off well. One's existence in those days in Saigon with no families for distraction was pretty intense. We worked probably fourteen hours a day, seven days a week. There was just no break at all. The only break that I took was during the lunch hour, when I would go to Circle Sportif, which had a magnificent Olympic-sized swimming pool, and swim laps and work out my frustrations in the water. I was responsible for twenty-four junior Foreign Service officers, eighteen of whom were trained in the Vietnamese language, and these young fellows were going out in the countryside in jeeps with pistols on their hips to talk to the local headman and provincial officials, to do our best to keep a finger on the pulse of what was happening in Vietnam. We were really in competition with the wire services, because Washington did not want to be surprised by and story that came out of Vietnam. We just worked flat-out and filed a tremendous number of telegrams and reports to keep Washington fully abreast of the situation. There wasn't much light at the end of the tunnel, really.

Q: Was this during the period of Ambassador Lodge or Ellsworth Bunker?

STONE: Ellsworth Bunker was the Ambassador, and Sam Berger was the Deputy Ambassador. They had two Ambassadorial positions there at the time.

Q: This followed then the overthrow of Diem?

STONE: Oh yes! This was long after the overthrow of Diem. This was President Thieu's time, and to me the most satisfactory part of my assignment there was a result of trying to fix appointments with President Thieu and other top officials of the Vietnamese government. For this purpose, I was expected to deal with the Protocol Officer of the Palace. I soon found out that this man was totally ineffectual and I could never be sure which end was up.

By chance I met a distant relative of the President who worked in his inner office, and a fellow with whom I felt very much on the same wavelength. I arranged with the Signal Corps to have a direct telephone line installed between his office and mine, so we could do business over the telephone, which saved an immense amount of time. This man has remained a close friend and at the present time is a senior officer in one of our largest corporations, living outside Chicago and making a great success as a businessman.

Q: Was General Westmoreland in charge, or was it still General Taylor?

STONE: No, Westmoreland had just left and General Clayton Abrams was the new commander. He would regularly attend the embassy country team meetings. I had the pleasure of accompanying him on Christmas day of 1968. We flew to Tay Ninh which was very close to the Cambodian border because we had an indication that the Viet Cong might release three American prisoners. We wanted to arrange this release without any political implications, so I was asked to accompany him. We flew to Tay Ninh and we stayed there on the ground until these three soldiers eventually were released and got back to our lines.

Q: With the changing Generals from say Westmoreland to Abrams, did you notice - or was there a marked difference in the relationships between the army and the embassy, or was it more or less smooth?

STONE: I wasn't there during the Westmoreland period so I can't speak to that situation. The relationships when I was there between the civilians and the military were excellent; very close working relationships between Ambassador Bunker and General Abrams. I chaired one of the committees which was involved in joint military - civilian operations. We had very close working relationships with the military, and by and large they went along very well.

Q: Very good, anything else that you would like to talk about in hindsight about your year in Vietnam? Was there anything that looking back on you wish that you had done differently, or wish that you would have seen the embassy handle differently?

STONE: I wish that I could have had a certain period of time to prepare for that assignment, I had none at all. I really felt like a bit of an ignoramus as far as that part of the world was concerned. I had read and studied almost nothing about it during my earlier career of even in college, so that it was all relatively new. I found it a very fascinating and interesting part of the world and I can well understand why a number of our officers have made it their area of specialization.

I quite enjoyed the Vietnamese as people. They are a dynamic people, hard working. At that time, I had very close relations with the U.S. military. A field force commander used to come and pick me up with his helicopter on the roof of the embassy and I joined him in making his rounds of various divisional and other unit headquarters, getting briefings on what was going on and this was a very stimulating experience.

Q: It's been said that many of our top ranking officers in the policy making positions had, like yourself, very little experience in Southeast Asia and particularly in Vietnam. That may be one of the reasons that perhaps our policies did not work out; that you were not alone in your lack of basic training and understanding of the area. Do you think that is a fair comment?

STONE: Well, I think there is some truth to that, but after all, the policy is set not by the embassy but by Washington. The mistake in Vietnam was partly that we allowed ourselves to get out in front of the South Vietnamese. We were really taking over and fighting the South Vietnamese's war for them, rather than supporting them from behind to the extent I think we should have. It was certainly a great tragedy and the thing that upsets me the most when I look back on it is the criticism of the U.S. military. Today you have films like Platoon which in my mind depict the seamiest side of the U.S. military in Vietnam and are not a true reflection of the caliber of the army that we fielded at that time.

I personally believe from what I saw that we had an excellent and well run army that was functioning in the field. Of course we did not turn loose the ability that we had to fight the enemy and, as you may have heard, the other night, Mr. Nixon was saying that the thing that he felt was the greatest mistake during his Presidency was not bombing Hanoi and Haiphong which he thought would have brought the war to a much more rapid end.

Q: Do you think it's fair to say that the objectives were ever clearly delineated so that the military was really put in an impossible position?

STONE: Yes I would. After that I went back to India and that was the period which was to me, the most frustrating of my Foreign Service career as I mentioned earlier. When the word came that we were sending the aircraft carrier Enterprise task force into the Bay of Bengal, I really felt that all I had been working for in terms of improving relationships between the United States and India was being totally jeopardized almost overnight. I seriously considered resigning from the Foreign Service at that point. I discussed the matter with Ambassador Keating. I recalled a colleague who had preceded me at the Imperial Defense College in London, David Ness, who resigned from the Foreign Service because of a policy difference relation to Egypt when he was the Chargé d'affaires there. I remember that the day after he resigned, there was a front page story in the New York Times, and after that Mr. Ness was never heard from again! I finally concluded that I could be more effective by remaining in the service and doing my best to do what I felt was right, rather than submitting my resignation.

Q: That raises an interesting question that I was going to ask you about later, but we might as well touch on it now. What can an officer do when he does disagree with the governments' policy? In this case, what actions were you able to take - if any - to express your dissatisfaction with the policy that you were supposed to carry out?

STONE: Well, I made my feelings very clear in my messages to Washington, but I was overruled. At that point, once the decision is made, if you are a good Foreign Service Officer you simply carry out your instructions as best you can. If it becomes a matter of such conscience for you that you simply can't do it, then you have no choice but to resign. I think that many career officers have been in that position. While you may not like it, you have to do the very best you can to defend your government's interest as reflected by those in responsibility at the time.

Q: I thoroughly agree, but I think that today it must be very difficult for officers in controversial areas such as Central America and the Middle East to live with that problem?

STONE: My son was a member of a congressional staff group that was sent to El Salvador to observe the recent parliamentary elections. The main reaction he returned with was astonishment at the extent to which events in El Salvador are being run out of the U.S. Embassy. So sometimes, as we all know happened during the period that I was in Southeast Asia, our embassies do play a remarkably involved role in the events of other countries.

CHAS W. FREEMAN, JR.
Vice Consul
Madras (1965-1968)

Ambassador Chas W. Freeman, Jr. was born in Washington, DC in 1943. He received a bachelor's degree from Yale University in 1963 and joined the Foreign Service in 1965. His career included positions in India, Taiwan, China, Thailand, Saudi Arabia, and Washington, DC. Ambassador Freeman was interviewed in 1995 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: I agree. Your first assignment was to Madras. You were in Madras from when to when?

FREEMAN: I entered the Foreign Service in December of 1965. Sometime around March of 1966, I departed for Madras, and I was there until September of 1968. I had a variety of assignments there. That was the period when junior officers were rotated between sections, so that much of the first period there was spent in three- to four-week stints, rotating around what was then a very large consulate general. I did consular work throughout, but after a period of doing it full time at the outset, I rotated to the economic section, then to the political section, the administrative section, and to USIS.

There were several things that happened that convinced Ambassador Bowles that I was a very poor consular officer, but had other talents. So this resulted eventually in my being thrown out of the State Department and given to USIS. And I'll describe those incidents.

Q: Before we get to that, could you talk a little about your impression of India, from the southern point of view. What was the situation in Madras within the consular district, and how did you all deal with it?

FREEMAN: Well, that's an interesting question. Madras (then the State of Madras, later renamed Tamil Nadu to take account of Tamil linguistic self-expression) was very much at odds with the north, on many fronts. Specifically, the issue of adoption of Hindi as a national language, in part to overcome what was perceived as the unfair advantage of Tamils in the Indian administrative service and Indian foreign service because of their superior English, was stoutly resisted by people in Tamil Nadu. Just before I arrived, there had been riots on that subject.

Every time there were polls done in India at that time on matters related to the West and the United States and American viewpoints, there was a clear pattern. The most virulent anti-Western sentiment was in the Calcutta consular district, in the eastern part of India. In Delhi and the central region, there was a somewhat more favorable, but still strongly anti-Western, feeling. In Bombay, there was more neutrality, a split 50-50 between the anti-Western, pro-Western side of it. In Madras, sentiment was overwhelmingly pro-Western.

For some reason, southerners have traditionally been outward looking. And I think the reasons for that probably have to do with history. Most of the South was never subjugated by the Mughals, and not subject to the forced imposition of Islam. There are very large Christian communities, some of them dating from the earliest days of the apostles. Saint Thomas was supposedly martyred just outside Madras. And there were colonies of Nestorian Christians established, with subsequent connections to the Syrian Maronites, in Kerala. Later, during the Portuguese and British and, to some extent, French periods of influence in the South, very large numbers of Harijans (untouchables) converted to Christianity. Others converted to Islam, but they did so voluntarily, for the same reason they converted to Christianity, either out of crass motives of wishing to do business with Arab traders, or, more likely, because of the attractions of the nominally egalitarian spirit of Islam and its emphasis on communal prayer and solidarity.

So the South was, at once, more authentically Hindu, since Hinduism had not been subject to foreign (meaning Islamic) influences, less virulently torn by what the Indians call communal tensions (meaning sectarian tensions), and more comfortable with India's past and then relationships with a world still dominated by European powers and North America.

And so it was a congenial environment in which to work, which, however, had its shocking element for someone from a Puritan background in the United States. Indian society is fiercely hierarchical and greatly divided by caste. And while Islam and Christianity abjure the idea of caste, both, in the Indian context, end up respecting it and, to some extent, practicing it within their own ranks. It is a society in which one can feel comfortable talking with local people, but at the same time, one is never far away from the recognition of difference.

One example. In the district of the city called Adyar, which was at that time very much a Brahmin concentration, I developed a number of friends, just ordinary Indians. And they did me the great honor, on several occasions, of inviting me over to their house to dinner. A Brahmin may serve food to anyone, whereas he may not receive food from anyone but a Brahmin. And in the South, Brahmins can be polluted merely by contact with the shadow of someone of no caste. Well, obviously, Westerners have no caste, so to be invited to a home for a traditional meal, in a very traditional Hindu household, was quite an honor. The second time that I went to dinner with Mr. Ramanathan and his family, I had forgotten to recover some books that I had loaned to him. So on the way home, I turned the car around, and my wife and I went back to his house to collect the books, only to discover a Brahmin priest spreading cow dung and cow urine over all the places in which we had been, and chanting various incantations to purify the household we had polluted.

So one had friendships and contacts, and Indians were people with whom I developed a great rapport and for whom I developed a great affection, but at the same time, one was always conscious of the barrier of caste and nationality.

The South, however, I would say, was, at that time at any rate, for someone who arrived knowing no Tamil (although I did manage to learn a fair amount, enough so I could get up and introduce a speech in it). I was very careful never to test in it, because I had no desire to spend the rest of my career floating between Colombo and the Deccan, but for someone who didn't know an Indian language, it was probably the most congenial of all environments.

Q: What about, at that time, '66-'68, the problem, as we saw it, or did we see it then, of Kerala?

FREEMAN: Kerala had a Communist government that was very unfriendly to the United States. Politics in south India, as elsewhere, and I actually demonstrated this very convincingly in the 1967 election, is largely caste based. In Kerala, the Communist leadership was essentially Brahmin. On a working level, we had a satisfactory relationship with them. They didn't cause us the sorts of problems that were caused by the Communists in West Bengal, for example.

The issue of caste. Let me just digress for a minute. The '67 election was coming along, I think it was in the spring, and I decided to do something that you never could do these days and that was probably quite improper, which was to use my visa interviews for a random sample of educated Indians, with a view to ascertaining the political and economic conditions of various camps. I developed a twenty-question little form that I could, I thought, quite discreetly run through with every fifth visa applicant and then file. I tabulated the whole thing and cross referenced and whatnot, and I built what was in effect an electoral model based on caste.

In '67, Howie Schaffer was then the political counselor for internal affairs, or perhaps he was first secretary dealing with internal affairs. Tony Quainton was then dealing with external affairs in Delhi. The embassy and the consulate general in Madras, which was headed by a man named

Albert Franklin, who had learned Tamil and later became quite a scholar of things Tamil after his Foreign Service career, had reached a series of predictions based essentially on the normal Foreign Service reporting style, which was a combination of interviews with eminent people and reading the press, with which my results did not agree, because I thought there was a real sea change going on.

A party named Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam (DMK), which was a Tamil nationalist group, I thought was going to win the election in Madras. I thought that there would be quite different results in Kerala than were predicted. And I thought they weren't far off in what is now called Karnataka, what was then called Mysore. In Andhra Pradesh, I thought they were off, too. These were the four provinces we dealt with. Pondicherry was then a separate entity as well.

So I wrote, not knowing the term because it hadn't been invented, through what was in effect the dissent channel, an airgram, taking issue with the embassy and my own consulate general's political section's estimates of the forthcoming election.

I made a mistake in the airgram; I didn't put a summary in, which was duly noted by the inspectors later.

But other than that, I had the pleasure of being entirely right, and also suffered the pain of it, since my consul general had introduced this airgram by saying, "Here's this piece that some young man on my staff has done, with which I totally disagree, but nevertheless it may be of interest, and so I'm allowing him to submit it." He was quite embarrassed when I turned out to be right and he turned out to be wrong.

So, on that basis, probably incorrectly, I gained some minor reputation in the embassy as an expert on south Indian politics, which stood me in good stead when Ambassador Bowles found me wanting as a consular officer.

Q: How'd they find you wanting as a consular officer?

FREEMAN: Well, let me say, first of all, that I greatly enjoyed consular work. I enjoyed it for many reasons. It gives you access to elements of society and the authority structure that you don't gain any other way -- visits to prisons, dealings with the police, dealings with the court authorities, ship captains and the like.

Q: Hospitals.

FREEMAN: Hospitals, hotel management, all of these really rather essential, real elements of a society that most of the Foreign Service doesn't come in contact with. And so I enjoyed it greatly. The visa-interview business frankly paled after a while, but I did find, as I said, a way to put that to some use.

Let me talk a little bit about the consular experience, a couple of anecdotes, since those are always fun, before I get into the question of why Ambassador Bowles took a dislike to me as a consular officer, correctly.

I had been in Madras about three or four weeks, and I was made the duty officer for the consulate general. In the middle of the night, around one o'clock, I got a call from the captain of the USS Manhattan, which was a supertanker engaged in the grainlift to India. At that time, we were supplying enormous quantities of surplus grain to India. And he said that his cook on the ship had died. He had chugged two bottles of vodka, on a bet, and had died of alcohol poisoning. The captain wanted me to come down and pick up the body. And so I asked him where he was. Was he anchored within the harbor or within the harbor jurisdiction?

He said, "Yes."

And I said, "Well, in that case, I'm afraid you'll have to report this matter to the harbor authorities, because there'll have to be an investigation. Furthermore, I don't have at home any facilities for storing a dead body, even if I could gain access to it. And, finally, the consulate does not have any cold storage."

So he said, "What should I do?"

I said, "Well, stick him in the meat locker overnight, if you can't get the harbor authorities to come out."

So he did.

The Indian medical profession, which did an autopsy on this poor fellow, was just thrilled. Madras was a dry state. Chronic alcoholism probably existed, but was seldom seen. So they called doctors from all over south India to observe the advanced effects of alcoholism in this corpse.

This delayed the autopsy for some time. Finally, the Manhattan was allowed to sail, even though the autopsy hadn't been officially completed.

In the meantime, I was in touch with this man's estranged wife in Baton Rouge, through the Department of State, and ascertained that he had always wanted to be buried at sea. Well, that posed a bit of a problem, because the Manhattan had left, and he hadn't yet been released by the Indian authorities.

So I investigated and found that I could hire a tug boat for this purpose, if his estate were willing to pay. And that was agreed.

So, one afternoon, I arrived with my Brahmin consular assistant (and you have to realize that touching corpses is deeply polluting) down at the dock, where the Indian police promised to deliver this corpse, suitably fixed up for burial at sea. We waited and waited. Half an hour after the police were supposed to turn up, up came a taxi with a police officer in the front seat next to the driver, and sticking out of the back window were two bloody white feet. I opened up the back, and there was this man, wrapped in a sheet, but much the worse for having been autopsied all over the place. I had hired some coolies to carry the body aboard and provide the due ceremony.

They took one look at this and ran away. My consular assistant, of course, would not touch the body. I took it out of the taxi and laid it on the sidewalk, and sent my consular assistant to buy some iron rods and rope. I had with me an American flag and a Bible. And I carried the thing myself onto the tugboat. The tugboat captain was none too pleased. I put it on the transom of the boat, put the bars in the sheet, with the body, and then tied the whole thing up with rope. And we set sail.

Well, I had read the regulations, and as they then read, I realized that when you do a burial at sea, you're supposed to provide the exact latitude and longitude, taken from a real sighting. You have to do it with a sextant. The captain assured me that he had done that at the Merchant Marine Academy, thirty years before, in Bombay.

So we got underway. And the whole experience was too unnerving for the captain. I discovered then that, whereas you cannot drink in Madras Harbor, because it's under the jurisdiction of the state authorities, once you passed the then three-mile limit, you were on the high seas and you could drink. And the captain proceeded to get absolutely smashing drunk.

In the end, my Brahmin assistant wouldn't touch the corpse. I laid the flag over it, read the ceremony, and gave it a good, solid kick with my foot. It went tumbling overboard, and I watched it sink into the depths.

The captain then took a sighting, which turned out later to be somewhere in downtown Singapore, about 1,500 miles away. But I went home and recorded the moral equivalent of our position.

And of such things was consular life made.

However, in the Madras jail was a notorious smuggler, a man of some distinction, a University of Virginia graduate, a Korean War ace, who had been arrested before in India. This was his second arrest. The first one was when he was operating a B-24 out of Abu Dhabi.

Q: Which was the Liberator, a large, four-engine bomber.

FREEMAN: He used this to bomb the beach south of Bombay with gold ingots, which his confederates in India would then pick up. Gold in India at that time was twice the international price.

Q: And Abu Dhabi was one of the crucial states, a smuggler's paradise. They used to watch the people loading dhows, you know, small box, bent over, as they shuffled off to the...

FREEMAN: Exactly. So he did this successfully for quite a while, and then one day was spotted by Indian radar. MiGs scrambled, and he was forced south, in the direction of Goa. And as he went, he bombed the beach with these ingots, the evidence. He made a lot of villagers very happy, I'm sure. But he was forced down in Goa, arrested for various charges: illegal entry, illegal use of airspace, illegal operation of aircraft. It turned out that the aircraft somehow had a lien on it, or was owned perhaps by the Tata group. So that became an exhibit in yet another series of suits.

Q: Tata being a big shoe...

FREEMAN: No, Tata being a great Indian industrial steel and iron combine.

This was long before I was around, '64, '65. He was taken to New Delhi and put in a minimum-security prison. He managed to persuade the authorities that the engines of this aircraft had to be turned over, due to its age, every day, or they would freeze up. He disconnected the gas gauge in the aircraft, which was in a hangar. He would turn the motors over, adding a little bit more gas each day, until he had a full tank. And then he simply took off, right across Palam Airfield, and flew to Pakistan, hugging the ground in such a way that the much faster MiGs were unable to get him.

This was ten days before the outbreak of the '65 Indo-Pak War. And it became a cause celebre in the Lok Sabha, the lower house of the Indian Parliament. It was charged that he was definitely a CIA agent and that he had taken the Indian war plans to Pakistan, which was why the Indians got a drubbing. So he was quite something.

He was arrested in Bombay sometime in 1965, again, having entered with a false passport from Ceylon (Sri Lanka now), with jewels taped between his toes.

Since his port of entry was Madras, he was eventually sent to Madras. He was in the central government prison. And he was very badly abused, partly because of the political controversy surrounding him, I am sure. In any event, he was beaten frequently. He wasn't given a good diet. And, of course, I assumed the duty of visiting him and getting him some food, which I paid for myself, and lending him books, since he was a voracious reader, and got to know him a bit.

I was deeply disturbed by the discriminatory treatment he was being subjected to, since I think national treatment is a basic principle of consular affairs. So, after going to see the local authorities in the central prison system, I wrote to the embassy an OM (operations memorandum, a form which doesn't exist any more, I think), detailing this and asking for intervention by the embassy, preferably the ambassador, at a sufficiently high level to gain appropriate treatment for him and end the abuse.

I got back a very nice note from Ambassador Bowles, which said something to the effect that he couldn't believe that his beloved liberal, democratic, constitution-minded Indian friends could really be doing any such thing, and that he didn't propose to do anything about it.

Being a hot-headed young man with a legal background, although not yet a law degree, I took issue with this. So I slapped another OM on top of that, detailing further abuse, referring to Bowles' note and enclosing it, and sent it to the Department. It went up to Dean Rusk.

And then I went on R & R in Hong Kong. While I was in Hong Kong, Dean Rusk reprimanded Bowles and insisted that he go in and see the prime minister on this subject, which clearly didn't make him very happy.

That was one transgression.

A second was the niece of the Dalai Lama, who had been issued with something short of a passport, and obviously there was high political interest.

Q: A Dalai Lama, I might say, who had escaped from Tibet when the Chinese came in and took over Tibet. And so he was a major political figure as well as a religious figure at that time.

FREEMAN: That's right. In the 1950s, the United States, through the CIA, had played some role in fomenting insurrection in Tibet, which led to the events, since the Dalai Lama actually was in Tibet for some time after the Chinese recovery of Tibet. This series of events, revolt in Tibet, led to his fleeing to Dharmasala, and that was where he was in residence. But he was of great political interest in a Cold War, anti-China context.

His niece turned up at the consulate with a travel document issued by the Indian authorities, which described her as a stateless person of Tibetan origin.

I went to the local passport authorities and asked some questions, obviously looking for a way to give her a visa to the United States, but doubting that this document met the definition of a passport, since a passport must give you a right of reentry into the country where it is issued, or to somewhere, or it is not valid. And I was told that no such right was conferred by this document. Obviously, as a matter of practice, she would be readmitted, given the nasty state of relations between China and India at that time, since they'd fought a war in 1962. But I could not, in good conscience, rule that this was a passport, within the meaning of U.S. law and regulations, and I ruled that it was not.

I was then asked by Bowles to reconsider that and reverse it. And I declined to do so, which did not endear me to him, either.

Finally, on the plus side, I had been involved in Madras with various youth groups, students and the like, and got involved with the All-India Youth Congress local branch. This resulted in my being the co-keynote speaker, the first foreigner, certainly the first foreign diplomat and American, along with the Indian vice president, V. V. Ghiri, at a mass meeting of the All-India Youth Congress in Madras.

So Bowles looked at this and decided that I was an absolute disaster as a consular officer, from his perspective, but I was all right at public relations and political reporting. While I was in Hong Kong, he reassigned me to USIS, which turned out to be one of the kindest things that anyone has ever done for me, because I enjoyed that experience enormously.

In fact, I think one of the things that has gone wrong with the Foreign Service is greater separation of USIS from State over the years. USIS offers opportunities, at very young ages, for officers to run programs, manage things. And this is something at which many in the Foreign Service don't get a chance to try themselves until they are in a very senior position, and often they're catastrophically incompetent as managers. It's particularly true with political and economic officers.

At any rate, I became the university programs officer. We had a very active program of outreach and use of American Fulbrighters, visiting scholars, and Indians with university degrees from the United States. I helped to perfect something called an Interdisciplinary Seminar on American Civilization, which was a four-day program for Indian graduate students and faculty on that subject, which also included in it a segment on the Vietnam War. And I'm remiss in not mentioning that.

In 1966, the first year I was in Madras, someone in one of the youth groups that I was involved with told some friends that I was very interested in China. This led to an invitation to address the university at Guntur, Andhra Pradesh, on the Vietnam War, in defense of U.S. policy.

Before I entered the Foreign Service, when I was in law school, I was a minor, somewhat active, but not terribly prominent, participant in what became the teach-in movement against the Vietnam War. I thought the war was a mistake. (I believe that we entered the war for the wrong reasons, stayed there for the wrong reasons and got out for the wrong reasons. So I find nothing ennobling about the experience.)

Suddenly, I was confronted with the question of how far I was committed to the advocacy role of the Foreign Service. I thought there were three ethical choices. One, I could duck the invitation to speak, by saying that I was unavailable, sick, or something, but I felt that would be both morally incorrect and fruitless, because sooner or later, someone else would invite me. Two, I could refuse it, in which case, having taken Uncle Sam's nickel, I would be untrue to the role that I was embarked on professionally, and really should resign from the Foreign Service. Three, I could accept it and be, like a lawyer in a courtroom, an advocate for a client whose moral and political judgment I privately questioned. In the end, I decided that the only proper course, consistent with remaining in the Foreign Service, was to accept. And I did.

I used maps, drawing from the INR Latin American director's inspiration and my own legal training, to draw up a pretty powerful presentation, which, without saying so, left the audience with the impression that the only reason we were in Vietnam was to defend Mother India against godless Chinese communism.

And this was a resounding success. Indian views and knowledge of Southeast Asia were so narrow and shallow that this presentation shifted campus opinion, overnight, from ninety percent against the war to ninety percent in favor.

So Ambassador Bowles, when he assigned me to USIS, also had this in mind.

Q: I think we might point out for the record, Ambassador Bowles was one of the preeminent public-relations types. That was his background, so this was an important factor for him.

FREEMAN: I think he was an extremely fine man. I don't blame him at all for getting rid of me. I think I probably would have done the same thing as ambassador. And I consider it a stroke of good fortune that he thought of USIS, rather than exile to some less relevant place.

But at any rate, as a young man now of twenty-three or twenty-four, I suddenly found myself with dozens of Foreign Service nationals to supervise, a large budget, programs to run, recruitment of speakers to do, and my own speaking program, under circumstances in which I was essentially left alone to do what I wanted to do.

There was, in fact, a political appointee, oddly, as cultural affairs officer in Madras at that time, someone who had been a museum director, who, for one reason or another, he just never really took hold and ended up getting a doctor's certificate that stated that, for his health, he had to spend at least half a day at the beach, resting each day. He would occasionally call in and ask me whether anything was going on of note. And I would tell him no, I had everything under control. So, in effect, I ended up running a good deal of the cultural operation, which was much larger than the university outreach program.

Q: What was your impression of the Indian educational system, at the university level, of knowledge of the United States? Were there courses?

FREEMAN: The Indian educational system, at that time, was running on fossil knowledge from the British era. Professors tended not to do independent research of any consequence, and would often use the same lecture notes for thirty years without significant change. The Indian educational system put tremendous emphasis on knowledge of British literature, British history. The whole English prism through which India saw the outside world was reinforced by the educational system. Knowledge of the United States was poor. Attitudes toward the United States reflected British condescension. And while there was, thanks to USIS, the Ford Foundation, and others, some effort being made, which I think later bore fruit, to introduce American studies more widely into the Indian university system, they were essentially nonexistent, except at a few places. There were two centers: one at Poona, in Maharashtra, which was in the Bombay consular district; and the other, Osmania University, in Hyderabad, in Andhra Pradesh, which was under the Madras consulate general. The Osmania University Center was a library of American studies, in which USIS was involved. But basically Indian education was not even really directed very much at India, certainly not at Southeast Asia, or Asia more broadly. It was, to a good extent, a relic of the British Empire, with all of the narrowness of focus that implies.

Let me digress here. When the British took over India (the British East India Company, initially), in the eighteenth century and nineteenth century, they were faced with the question of how one should administer such a vast domain. And to do this they invented the idea of the modern civil service by drawing on the writings of the French philosophers, who had drawn in turn on the Jesuit Matteo Ricci and other reporting on the Chinese system, including the civil service system in China. That is a system that, for millennia, has been based on a written examination, of some difficulty, in the classics, and which has ranks and grades through which one progresses, on merit and by further examination. The British decided to adopt a variant of this system. They looked around for the classics that might be the subject of the examination process they were initiating. Clearly, Latin and Greek, which were the classics in Europe, were not relevant to the Indian situation. They didn't wish to adopt the Sanskrit classics, for obvious reasons. Therefore they decided they would have to find English classics. Well, no one thought, at that time, that there were any classics in English. It was a vernacular, spoken on a small island that had become prominent through trade and conquest, but it didn't have classics. The anointment of Shakespeare as the classic playwright and poet, along with others like Donne and so forth, and the recognition of the British novel as a classic were really done for the invention of what became the Indian civil service.

Q: That's very interesting.

FREEMAN: So the Indian civil service examination was very heavy on Shakespeare and British quotations, Dr. Johnson and the like. The university system was directed at training people to pass this examination. So all Indians came out of university able to quote prodigious quantities of Shakespeare. The educational system emphasized rote memorization, which is actually quite a useful thing, although our system doesn't appreciate it. And so the whole focus was British India and consistent with the imperial tradition.

So I tried to introduce the thought that the United States was not just a wayward group of British colonists, but something different and new. That the American Constitution was not the atrocity that they had thought. That there was a war of independence, rather than a rebellion. That this rather strange country, which had emerged after World War II as the dominant power in the world, had its own interesting history and cultural characteristics, including some which were quite opposite to the Indian common view of them.

For example, Indians believed firmly that the United States was an irreligious country, when one of the most notable things about America is the extraordinary practice of religion (I won't say adherence to religious principles).

Q: But compared to others...

FREEMAN: Compared to others, we are churchgoers. And we are very much influenced, even American Catholics, by the Puritan heritage.

So it was possible to present these seminars and have quite an effect. Since the base of knowledge was so low and the presuppositions were so demonstrably false, one could make quite an impact.

I think probably the seminars were fairly superficial. But then a wise man from the East, somewhere in Massachusetts, I think, said once that if something's worth doing, it's worth doing superficially. So that was the approach we took.

Q: Did you feel the hand of the Soviets down there, as far as their program there, what they were pushing? Was there much soil in which to flourish?

FREEMAN: The Soviets were very much a presence in Madras, with a large consulate general, a KGB resident, who was nominally the cultural attaché, funneling money to the Communist Party and quite effectively infiltrating the educational system. India's economy, beginning in the '50s, began to be tied more and more closely to the Soviet economy. There were ruble-rupee trade arrangements, which tended to skew Indian trade in the direction of the Russians. The Indian government was Socialist by inclination, inclined to central planning, and followed many Russian models. I say the Indian leadership was Socialist by inclination; their socialism was British Fabian socialism. But since the Fabians had never managed to produce anything practical, the only model they could see was the Russian one, and that was the one they followed.

But, yes, the Russians were there and active, politically, culturally, and economically. They were the major source of military technology for the Indians, for example. In the south, because of the fact that the south was out of strike range from Pakistan or China, at that time, the Indians have concentrated many of their munitions plants, a major tank factory, for example, at Avadi, outside of Madras, and at Aradi Bangalore.

Q: Did you find yourselves going head-to-head with the Soviets on things, with the students or with other groups? Or did you do your thing and they did their thing?

FREEMAN: We did our thing; they did theirs. They actually had most of the cards, I would say, given the favorable disposition of the central government toward them. But we didn't cross swords with them very often.

Q: Was the Indian bureaucracy difficult to deal with? I've never served in India, but Indians I've met, I think, could be absolutely insufferable in bureaucratic things. But maybe it's a different...

FREEMAN: The Indian bureaucracy is a rigidly stratified one, very rule bound. I remember that, for example, to gain customs clearance and admission of goods through the port required fifty-seven signatures. I discovered this because the expediter, whose name was Hamid, a South Indian Muslim, appeared to be taking a terribly long time carrying things through the port. So I decided to walk through the process with him, and at this point found out why things did take a long time.

Attitudinally, however, the Indian administrative service, as a service, is an elite civil service, with terribly bright people, who, if you are able to deal with them as intellectual equals, respond.

So I found them, yes, a bit preachy and self-righteous and sanctimonious, but then this was the era of Lyndon Johnson in the United States, so they had no monopoly on sanctimony.

LINDSEY GRANT
Political/Economic Officer
New Delhi (1965-1968)

After graduating from Cornell University, Lindsey Grant served in the Navy until he joined the Foreign Service in 1949. His foreign posts included Hong Kong, Taipei, New Delhi, and Cyprus. This interview was conducted on January 31, 1990.

Q: Then should we move on to India for a while and then get back?

GRANT: Sure. I don't have much to say about India, but I'd be delighted to discuss it.

Q: Just say what you did there in India, your major concerns, and we'll move on. We'll come back to the rest.

GRANT: I went to India in a swap with Jake Jacobson as the guy in the Embassy who was supposed to be dealing with the Indians about everything in the east: China, Vietnam, and so on. For part of the time, I had the whole communist world. This was sort of a technical assignment. It was not a terribly demanding assignment. It was nothing like the Asian Communist Affairs assignment. (I think Bill Bundy was delighted to see me go, since I'd been sort of a thorn in the flesh. I kept saying, "We're on the wrong course in Vietnam.") I didn't do much and had a thoroughly good time. It was an extraordinary civilization to get three years of exposure to.

Q: How about your Indian counterparts? They had their own rhetoric about Vietnam and opposed to the United States there. Their membership in the International Control Commission was not a very positive one from at least our point of view. But how about your contacts within the Indian bureaucracy? How did they feel about what we were doing in Vietnam?

GRANT: I went in and spoke my piece, which was the U.S. official position, and they spoke their piece. We didn't bloody our swords too much. I mean, we both just reiterated positions. They obviously didn't convince the United States, nor we them.

Interestingly enough, I had some very close friendships there, some of whom I kept with until very recently, even though we did disagree in many ways. On the perception of China, I think that they recognized in some degree that we had something for them to learn. One of the people, V.R. Narayan, who was later ambassador here, was ambassador in China for a while. He was the director of that part of the foreign office most of the time I was there. We had really fairly frank and profitable exchanges about China. They would actually call me up and say, "We've got something here that we'd like your reaction on." For instance, there would be an occasional shooting at the passes and border points. I can recall their actually asking me if I'd come by and discuss it, to get our reading as to whether this presaged anything bigger. They knew that we had some capabilities to tell whether the Chinese had moved up some military capabilities that they should know about.

And on an even more personal basis, I got a call once in some real agitation. They had their equivalent of FBIS, Foreign Broadcasting Service.

Q: This is an outfit that overtly monitors broadcasts, translates it, and distributes it.

GRANT: Right. They had their own version, their own operation of the same sort, and they had a message from Peking that was taking the Pakistan side in spades, wild language, right during a very tense period with Pakistan. I think it was just after the brief war in 1966, I guess that was -- '65?

They called me in and said, "What do you make of this? What are the Chinese doing?" I remember looking at it and being totally incredulous, and saying, "I think you've got the wrong dateline on this. Why don't you call your office up in Simla and see if that thing didn't come out of Pakistan, rather than Peking?" And it had. And they were rather appreciative. So there was actually a rather close relationship. But that doesn't mean anything in foreign affairs terms.

Q: How did they see the role of China in Vietnam?

GRANT: They did not consider this to be a Chinese initiative or thing. In this sense, although obviously I didn't say as much, they shared my evaluation of it. The Chinese were doing this with the Vietnamese because they didn't dare not to, did not want the Russians to upstage them -- which the Russians did, anyway. There was a lot of tension between Vietnam and China. I knew it, and they did, and I think that they perceived this as being basically an intra-Vietnamese hassle that we shouldn't be in.

Q: It's a doctrine that is now discarded, but every once in a while crops up, and that is the domino theory, which was to the effect that if the North Vietnamese win here, particularly early on, this means that obviously Cambodia and Laos will come under their suzerainty, which it has up to a point, and that means that there will be increased pressure on Thailand and Malaysia and Singapore and all. Was there any feeling of this? And this could be a threat to India itself, because they're a democracy. Did they feel that there was anything to this?

GRANT: If they did, they didn't say it. They didn't admit it. Yes, the domino theory, of course, was perhaps the most important part of the rationale we used, and we'll never know if in Thailand the people had begun to perceive that you couldn't stop this wave, if they would have collapsed. The Thai don't like the Vietnamese and don't particularly want to give up. So I'm not sure they would have caved at all. After all, if this had happened in the 1950s, it might have been even more of a threat, but the lines were fairly well drawn, and I think the perception of China as not being just part of a monolith that was going to engulf them, and the perception of the North Vietnamese as being Vietnamese was pretty well advanced.

The Indians would simply say they didn't believe it. They didn't worry if the countries wanted to go communist. They didn't worry about it, and they didn't think that this was a threat to them. What they may have felt internally is somewhat different, because, after all, the Chinese example led to the formation of the Communist Party of India (Marxist/Leninist). From the Congress Party's perspective, that had a good result and a bad result. The good result was that it split the Communist Party. The bad result was that it created a much more virulently struggle-prone party in East India, a Communist Party. So they had some evidence that there could be spin-off effects like this, but they never admitted it.

JOHN W. SHIRLEY
Press Attaché, USIS
New Delhi (1965-1969)

John W. Shirley was born in England to American parents in 1931. He graduated from Georgetown University in 1957 and served in the U.S. Air Force overseas from 1954 to 1956. After entry into USIA his postings abroad have included Yugoslavia, Trieste, Rome, New Delhi, and Poland, with an ambassadorship to Tanzania. Mr. Shirley was interviewed in 1989 by G. Lewis Schmidt.

SHIRLEY: I apparently passed the test and was told to get to Delhi as quickly as I could. I arrived in Delhi, and I remember being met by my colleague, Merrill Miller. Merrill took us to our hotel, which was the Delhi Claridge, not London Claridge, I'm sorry to say. I went to bed at about 4:00 in the morning -- planes in Delhi always arrive at that time. Two hours later, I got a call to report to the Embassy. A car fetched me, and off I went. When I arrived, I was told to report to the Ambassador's office where we learned that Indian and Pakistani forces had clashed in the Punjab and that there was a war on. Would I please get to work?

I had a glimmering of where the Punjab was, and I knew that Indians and Pakistanis did not get on particularly well. Happily, my grandfather -- I have an English mother and her father was a career officer in the British Army -- had spent 20 years in India, and I had been brought up by him until I was six. I was steeped in the lore of British India, but it was Mr. Kipling's India, not Mr. Nehru's. Still it got me by the first weeks, and I did know quite a lot about the military situation which fascinated me.

Within 24 hours we had 50 American correspondents on the ground, and within 48 hours perhaps 75 or 80. I did a morning briefing and afternoon briefing, always after consulting with the Defense Attaché, with the Ambassador, with the DCM, and with the Political Counselor, trying quickly to learn what was going on and working out how to say it without getting the Embassy creamed by the Indians who weren't telling anyone anything. I worked harder and with greater pleasure and more enthusiasm than I ever had in my life before. It was a glorious week or ten days of really being engaged and very quickly getting to know my way around.

If you should ask me--which you haven't--which tour I considered my best tour professionally, at which stage I performed the most efficiently, at which stage I found my work the most satisfying, and at which stage in my life I had the greatest chief, I would pick those three years in India with Chester Bowles.

It's curious in life how one sometimes has chemistry with a person, even if one has very different views of the world. Chester Bowles was a liberal's liberal, and I was a prototypical Tory, but we got on famously.

There were some interesting people on Ambassador Bowles' personal staff. Dick Celeste, who is now Governor of Ohio, was his aide. Doug Bennet, who is now president of National Public Radio, formerly Director of AID, formerly Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations, was his principal speechwriter, although Doug left shortly after I arrived when I took on that responsibility.

You know, press attachés do not, as a rule, make their careers by disagreeing with the chief of mission, or by arguing in a senior staff meeting, arguing against something which an ambassador proposes. But Chester Bowles always encouraged me to do just that, and always listened, even when I was speaking nonsense. He also taught me whatever I know about writing. You'll remember that Chester Bowles and Bill Benton were the founders of Benton and Bowles, and that they practically invented market research. And Ambassador Bowles knew how to write. Initially, it was a terrifying experience to write for him, but I learned how to let myself into his mind. By the middle of my three-year tour, I was able to write for him things which he changed very little. What he changed always made it more felicitous, but in the main he let stand what I put before him. I also had the opportunity in Delhi to be Staff Aide for quite long periods when I would be both Staff Aide and Press Attaché. It was a fine opportunity to get an overview of the work of an embassy, to understand the responsibilities of an ambassador, and to learn what a diplomatic mission could and could not do. The experience served me extremely well in later years.

When I was a chief of mission myself, I thought back on those early years in the Foreign Service and on the lessons learned from Chester Bowles. We became close personal friends. Our house in Connecticut is only a 20-minute drive from his, so I continued to see him after he retired. When he retired, he asked me to leave the Service and do a column with him, but I couldn't afford it. I'm sorry we didn't have that experience together. There was so much more that I could have learned from him, but he was already in bad health and perhaps it would not have worked.

I might add about my Delhi experience that Bill Miller was PAO. There are so many Bill Millers, but I refer to Delhi Bill Miller.

Q: One of them has died. Bombay Bill Miller died.

SHIRLEY: Yes, I heard that. Delhi Bill Miller was a good PAO. He understood that it was valuable for him to have a press attaché who was close to the ambassador, as I think I was. I kept him abreast of everything that went on in the chancery, and we saw each other at least once a day. A lesser man might not have enjoyed the fact that one of his subordinates spent more time with the ambassador than he did.

Q: At this time, of course, Henry Kissinger made his famous statement that, "I guess we're leaning toward Pakistan." Did that happen while you were there, and did you have to put up with the reaction to that statement?

SHIRLEY: I don't remember that Kissinger said it, but there was a general feeling in India that we had a pro-Pakistani bias. I think it was probably right that we did, and I think we had a pro-Pakistani bias for good reasons, the most public of which was that the Indians constantly gave us a bad time.

Indians have a tendency to moralize, which at best is irritating and, at worst, maddening. I remember an incident, and I was very much involved in this, which illustrates the point.

In 1967, the crop had been catastrophic and about 40 million people in Bihar and Uttar Pradesh were threatened with famine. A congressional delegation came: Congressman Pogue, who was then Chairman of the House Agricultural Committee; Congressman--now Senator--Dole; and then-Senator Miller of Iowa. Ambassador Bowles sent Herb Spivack, the Political Counselor, and me with the delegation to tour the famine-struck areas. The group returned to the U.S. persuaded that help was needed.

After a long travail, Lyndon Johnson signed off on an agreement to give India ten million tons of grain. And on that day Indira Gandhi sent a birthday cable to Ho Chi Minh. Lyndon hit the roof, and justifiably so. Ambassador Bowles had to use every bit of his considerable political influence in Washington not to have us go back on the agreement.

But it was that kind of thing which made Indians difficult to deal with and which no doubt contributed to our pro-Pakistan "tilt."

Q: Yes. I must confess that my own contact with the Indians has been very limited, and yet it's been enough so that I have almost automatically been irritated with Indian contacts. I've had a few very good Indian friends, but of all the people's I've encountered, they probably irritate me more than any other foreign people I know. Do you have any other observations about your tour in India, or any observations on the general efficacy of the USIA program there?

SHIRLEY: Yes, much more so than in Italy. Virtually everything the post did in India was worthwhile.

Q: "Span".

SHIRLEY: Yes. "Span," for instance, was an excellent, widely read magazine. We also had a good twice-monthly news- paper. The cultural program, at least exhibits and cultural presentations, that sort of thing, was rather less important, and money spent on such things was probably wasted. On the other hand, funds for the exchange program were well handled and yielded good returns.

The USIS post in India had an impact in both the long and short term. We certainly did everything we could to make known our views through the press, tried to insure that our views were accurately reflected, and spent a good deal of time working with the Indian intellectual community.

Q: Well, of course, first of all, the program in India cannot be a mass program in the usual sense of the word because there is such a vast difference in educational opportunities for the very low classes in India and the poor, as compared with the more or less elite. But you really feel that the program that USIS carried out in India did, then, have a substantial effect upon those people who were in the educated and knowledgeable class?

SHIRLEY: Yes. I think that it had the effect of bringing to a limited number of people information and views they otherwise would not have had, or would not have considered. The role of Ambassador Bowles in the USIS context was critical, of course. He was an excellent PAO. The combination of the USIS program, bolstered by the work of an exceptional ambassador, made a difference.

I might tell you an anecdote.

One evening I was at the German Embassy at a dinner. One of the house servants came and called me to the phone. Dick Celeste was on the line and he said that I was to drop my knife and fork and come to the Embassy. I made my excuses and left. I walked into the Ambassador's office and was told that we had "a walk-in," which was the term we used to describe a defector. I asked who it was, and was told: "Stalin's daughter."

That was the evening that Svetlana Alliluyeva walked into the Embassy and made a little bit of history.

We managed to get her out of India the same night, on a Qantas flight to Rome. There the story broke. I started getting telephone calls from every news organization in the United States, but I couldn't say anything as we were deep in talks with the Swiss about obtaining asylum for her there. I could not even say, "no comment," or "I really don't have anything for you on that," since that would have been tantamount to an admission. For hours I just had to fake it. I couldn't lie to the press, but I could dissimulate: "What? Can't hear you. Bad connection," and so on.

Q: I had forgotten. When the story finally broke, was the Swiss connection then disconnected? Did she go immediately to the United States?

SHIRLEY: No. She stayed in Rome only a few hours, after about twelve hours in the air from Delhi to Rome. The USG used those hours to negotiate with the Swiss.

A small parenthesis here about good diplomacy. Bowles did not want to put Secretary Rusk in the position of having to decide what to do with her, so he made the decision for him. He sent a flash cable to Rusk, but timed it so that he would receive it when Svetlana was already on the way from the Embassy to the airport. We knew, of course, that from the arrival of the cable in the Operations Center until the time somebody with sufficient authority to wake up the Secretary of State could be found, it would be too late for Rusk to involve himself in the decision. Bowles gave Rusk deniability which he needed since he was involved at the time in a sensitive negotiation with the Soviets.

Q: How long was she in Switzerland?

SHIRLEY: Six or seven weeks. Then she came to the United States. Since then, she's been bouncing around.

Q: Well, do you think that pretty well covers your experience in Delhi, then? Do you want to go on to subsequent activities?

SHIRLEY: I think exhaustively for the unfortunate person who has to listen to this tape.

WILLIAM D. MILLER

Public Affairs Officer, USIS
New Delhi (1965-1970)

William D. Miller served with the Central Intelligence Agency before he transferred to the U.S. Information Agency (USIS) in 1962. He served in India and Japan. This interview was conducted in 1989.

MILLER: In the subcontinent, India and Pakistan were at each others throats, and for some period of time India and China were also at loggerheads or even at war. And we had the same sorts of problems in that area as in the Near East but the dimensions were quite different.

Q: The time that China attacked India was that while you were there or before you went out there?

MILLER: No, that was before. I think it was 1962.

Q: My memory gets hazy too when I try to remember just when these different things occurred.

MILLER: The United States did come to India's aid for a period during that time and our prestige increased. But it wasn't a lasting thing in India.

They also had a tremendous problem in the subcontinent in particular tied to poverty, population growth, food supply, and that sort of thing. You may remember there were dire predictions of world famine at that time. The overriding U.S. objective at that time was to protect and preserve the Indian experiment in democracy. During the latter half of the Sixties the United States was pouring tremendous resources into India in an attempt to alleviate some of her more pressing problems, such as those listed above, without which democracy could not survive.

The primary USIS role was to alter Indian attitudes which might impede the tremendous effort being made by the United States and, to a lesser degree, other western governments to help India to cope with its massive problems. A lesser, but still important, USIS objective was to ensure that the tremendous and costly U.S. effort was understood within India.

Q: At the time you were in IAN and later in India, USIS had access to large amounts of -- I guess they didn't call it Garicoa anymore -- local currency at the disposal of the U.S. government.

MILLER: PL 480. Excess rupees. All through the '60s and into the '70s, the amount of PL 480 aid that we were giving to India was such that we were generating tremendous amounts of Indian currency owned by us. And it became apparent fairly early in the game that we were never going to use these currencies to any extensive degree, because to do so would absolutely bankrupt the economy of the country that we were trying to help. This was true not only in India but to a lesser extent in Pakistan and Ceylon and even Afghanistan. During my tenure in India this became a very important problem. It also provided us with some opportunities that any other USIS post in the world would love to have had. In other words, we had more money than we could spend so long as we could spend it in rupees.

Q: Were you paying the Indian employees out of that fund?

MILLER: Yes, and ourselves to the extent that we spent money in India.

I was transferred to India in 1965 and stayed there for five years. And throughout that period I was constantly bombarded by Washington and visitors from Washington -- visitors from the White House, Cabinet members, Congressmen, other important political figures. And they always wanted to see the PAO to find out how we could spend more of these Indian rupees.

It was a crazy situation because the budget we received in Washington was in dollars. And so to the extent that we spent more money in India, it inflated the agency's budget even though what we were spending was blocked funds which could not be used in any other manner. And as you remember the Agency was having a very hard time getting a budget of any kind out of Congress during that period. So we had to be careful on the one hand, but we had all kinds of pressures on the other hand to spend more.

All of the expenses of the Indian program with very few exceptions were paid in rupees, including our allowances, including the parts of our salary that we spent inside India and including a vast program that we had going out there.

We printed all of our own publications in India and we had a number of publications that no other post could afford to have because of the rupee situation. We had, for example, the American Reporter, a weekly tabloid type newspaper. We printed about 500,000 copies in, as I recall, 14 languages. We had SPAN, a monthly magazine which we printed in the 100,000 copies and on which we spared almost no effort as far as quality went, to the extent that throughout the period of the '60s SPAN won the top national award in India as the best produced magazine in India. And I think at some point after I left there they disqualified SPAN from the competition in that because it was clear that they were going to continue to win it. We made our own movies. We had a large exhibit program -- made all of our exhibits. We republished selected American books. In fact, we produced in India practically the entire media spectrum: print, electronic and visual. All of it paid for with blocked Indian rupees.

Q: Did you have your own motion picture studios do the processing there too?

MILLER: Most of it in Bombay, yes. We used Indian studios for the processing.

Q: Who was your MOPIX officer at that time?

MILLER: Oh, gee. I forget. That's a terrible thing to say. But I'll think of it and fill it in at a later time. We had several. They were all very good.

Q: It wasn't Darryl Dance was it?

MILLER: Yes, Darryl Dance. He was the main -- he was there through most of the period that I was there. He was very good. Allen Fisher was there for a time. At least one other. We made radio programs. Just about every form of communication we did locally.

Q: You say you produced radio programs too?

MILLER: Yes.

Q: Did you have any trouble getting those placed on Indian radio?

MILLER: Very little. Our relationships with All- India Radio were very good as were our relationships with practically all of the media in India. And I guess the thing was that India was so poor at that point that they were grasping for any information they could get. Communication in India was our biggest problem as it was for the government too. We did very little in the television field because we were -- in a country of 500 million people in which there were only 5,000 television sets. And they were almost entirely in the hands of people who were experimenting with what future programming might be and that sort of thing. So television didn't really reach opinion makers to any great extent. So we did provide their television service with programming. But we did very little else in that field.

But radio was a big field. But even there in India with 565,000 villages, towns and villages, there were about that many (565,000) radio sets in the whole country. So you figure an average of one per village and when you consider that probably half of those sets or more than half were in the major cities, Bombay, Calcutta, New Delhi and Madras, most of the villages didn't have any radio.

Q: What were the particular themes or objectives that you were stressing in your regular programming?

MILLER: Development was one theme. There was some resistance as there always will be to the size of the American development effort, not on the part of the government but on the part of significant segments of the population. The communist party was quite substantial in India and leftist sentiments were fairly prevalent. The Soviets had a gigantic information cultural program. All of it trying to undercut the things that the United States was doing. So explaining the motives and the methods of our developmental effort were very important to us.

Our second major objective was political -- democracy. India at that time was the world's largest democracy. And we were the world's oldest. And we tried to keep drawing on that.

A third was investment, foreign investment. The Indians were very fearful of the amount and types of foreign investments going into India. One counter to this we used was to show how the United States in its formative days had accepted and encouraged a great deal of foreign investment and it had not affected the freedom of action in any major way.

Q: Did your motion pictures follow much the same kind of thing? Were you stressing development?

MILLER: Yes, very much so.

Q: You weren't producing feature films I take it.

MILLER: No, no.

Q: Documentaries.

MILLER: Documentaries mainly on the AID program. We had incidentally our own AID information officer there. We had a labor information officer. We had a variety of luxuries in the field of information that other posts couldn't afford although the number and types were decreasing during the whole period I was there. As I mentioned, the pressure to get rid of rupees was countered by another pressure to cut the Agency's budget and this adversely affected our Indian program. When I went there we had 70 Americans and 535 local employees. Year by year we were called upon to make one ten percent cut after another. So that in five years we ended up with 38 Americans and probably about 400 Indians even though all of the Indians were paid nothing but rupees and were really costing the American taxpayer nothing. Incidentally, on that score our books program and several other programs actually were providing dollar income to the United States. We had a massive program for reprinting significant American books which we did and sold for rupees in India, sold for a very minimal cost. But they did use up rupees and the royalties for these books were paid in the United States in dollars. So a significant amount of dollars were repatriated in that fashion. There were some other dollars repatriated in other ways. For example, allowances which were budgeted in dollars were paid in rupees out there. So it cost nothing and the dollars were kept in the United States.

We had programs in all the major cities in India. We had branch posts in Calcutta, Bombay, Madras and also a branch post for Northern India in New Delhi. And then we had a number of sub-posts which were really cultural centers in the smaller cities like Hyderabad, Bangalore, Trivandrum, Patna and Lucknow. And while I was there, however, the sub-posts came under fire because after they had been in place, India had passed a law saying there could be no new cultural centers put in any cities that did not have a consulate.

And the Russians in violation of that law were building a gigantic cultural center in Trivandrum which collapsed, the building collapsed, before it was completed killing a number of workmen. This called attention to the fact that they were doing this in contravention of law. Mrs. Gandhi's reaction to that was to not only say the Soviets could not continue to build this, but that all of our centers had to be closed if they were not in an area that had a consulate. So we ended up closing six which had been in existence for some period of time. It was a very unfair thing because Russian information cultural effort was not limited or even primarily devoted to their specific Russian centers. They had more than 500 Indo-Russian cultural societies around the country which were completely dominated by the Soviets, and were operating outside the law.

I think we did fairly well in India in explaining the AID effort. We were there during the period called the Green Revolution during which time the AID effort in the agricultural field was extremely successful. And I think the success was in part at least due to our efforts in publicizing what they were doing and in changing Indian attitudes toward more modern methods of agriculture.

Q: You had your AID information officers; they didn't have their own information officer on their staff?

MILLER: No, we handled their information.

Q: In some countries it was the other way around. They had their own information officers and sections.

MILLER: We handled it and I think they were very pleased with what we did. And the AID information effort survived, at least during my tenure there, all of the cuts that we had to make. The labor information program did not. The program remained but the American information officer did not.

Q: You mentioned earlier that there was a lot of antipathy towards the United States, not the government so much but among the populace. Or was it the other way around?

MILLER: Well, among parts of the populace. I would say by and large the entire populace was -- well, if you took 90 percent of the Indian population was apathetic about any of this because they don't know anything about it. I mentioned the difficulties of getting information out. You're just not going to reach 90 percent of the population. Their main objective in life is survival. And they're apolitical really. Of the other ten percent I would say maybe one percent or one-tenth of that, ten percent of the ten percent, was anti-western, anti-American. And about probably half of the others had values similar to our own and were fairly sympathetic to things we were doing although almost all of them were suspicious of gigantic America and all of its resources. They didn't want us to bring overbearing influence on India. We did not.

Q: Were you there at the time that India exploded its atomic device?

MILLER: No, that was after my --

Q: That was after your time.

MILLER: Yeah, there were indications when we were there that India was working on it. I'm glad you brought that up because that was a major problem. The efforts on our part to limit nuclear proliferation were resented by most thinking Indians. Frank Moraes was one of India's top journalists at the time. Once in my home Joe Kraft the American columnist was visiting from the United States. I had Joe over to the house to meet with several Indian newsmen including Frank. They got onto the nuclear question and Frank Moraes who was a dove in everything you could imagine got very worked up about this in the course of the evening over quite a few drinks which he managed to imbibe at that period in his life. By nine o'clock in the evening he was just --

Q: Sloshed.

MILLER: Yeah. But Frank became very upset about the fact that it was the white vest that was trying to impose a nuclear bomb moratorium on little brown brother. It was the first time that

Frank had really gotten this idea, i.e., that India must build a nuclear device as a matter of national pride, across to me. I tested this proposition over and over again in subsequent conversations with others and found there was this sort of feeling throughout the country, not only on the bomb but on other things. They felt that we sort of were treating them as not quite up to our standards and so forth. It's something we hadn't --

Q: He must have been of Portuguese extraction, partly, at least.

MILLER: Yes, he was.

Q: His name, was it pure Portuguese or was it part Indian?

MILLER: Oh, he was Indian. He was Indian. But there was some Portuguese in his blood. He was of Goan extraction.

Q: Psychological.

MILLER: Not only that, in appearance and so on. He was living with an American woman, an American newspaper woman out there, a very fine person. He didn't get married to her. Frank was a Catholic. So that's the Portuguese influence. His wife had gone insane and she was still alive and being treated in some institution. But she was absolutely hopeless. But because she was alive he did not divorce and marry the American woman. He also has a son Dom Moraes. Frank is dead now. But Dom the last I hear was living in England married to an English woman and is a very fine writer on his own and a poet. It was really largely through a book that Don wrote that I learned about Frank's wife and all the troubles that they had had. Let's see, do you want to lead me on to something? I'm rambling here.

Q: Well, that's all right.

MILLER: Well, one thing we did manage to do somewhat towards the end of my stay there, in the last couple of years: we were able to convert some of the rupees into general resources for the agency program in the area. The PAO from Afghanistan came down at one point and said he was very hard put for any materials, particularly exhibit materials. And so we became a resource for him. By agreement with India on the use of these rupees we couldn't make things and export them. But we could if we made exhibits in India, once we were finished with them we could send them off so long as they eventually returned to India.

Q: I see. Another post could use them.

MILLER: Another post could use them. And so we after that, we were very conscious of the needs of Afghanistan and later Nepal. And then during the NASA moon landing, the subcontinent was pretty well left out of the direct participation because of the lack of television. They didn't see the moon landing there on television. We did bring it in on the Voice of America and rebroadcast the Voice signal such as it was. But we decided that in order to fill this void we would have a major exhibits program trying to show India just what was happening. One of our Indian employees in the Exhibits section suggested that we make a full scale model of the lunar LEM.

Q: The Landing something --

MILLER: Module.

Q: Module.

MILLER: All right. Whatever it was. But the LEM. And we made -- well, we tried and tried to get from NASA the dimensions and all that sort of thing. For some reason they wouldn't give them to us. We did have a model about five or six inches high that was billed as a -- I think it was 1/49th scale. So our boys laboriously measured everything on that and multiplied by 49 and we built a model out of plywood. But it looked just like the real thing. And we put it up in the backyard of the USIS building there, Bahawalpur House which had very sizeable grounds around it. We attracted more than the million Indian visitors over a very short period of time including all the important Indians, the entire diplomatic corps there, which also, by the way, included the Soviet Ambassador who when he looked at it turned to me and said, is the real module that big? He couldn't believe that we had landed something that size on the moon. But we also had motion pictures showing various space feats that we put on pseudo television screens so that they could pretend that they were looking at space activity. Some of them really thought they were watching the real thing. But after we had that in New Delhi the other posts wanted it. So we built copies of it and sent it to major posts throughout India. Then there was a demand from other posts in the area and we ended up building quite a few copies of that and really somewhat in contravention of the spirit of the agreement, sending them to various places around the world. Several of the astronauts came to India after the landing. We have pictures of them climbing our plastic model. They were very impressed with this thing.

Q: They were?

MILLER: Yes.

Q: That was probably -- I think Armstrong was one who came.

MILLER: Yeah.

Q: Because he also came to Thailand while I was there.

MILLER: I believe that's right, yeah.

Q: I've forgotten who the other two or three were. In Thailand quite an incident occurred because the leading television correspondent for the Thais who was sort of the Edward R. Murrow of Thailand had been devoting a great deal of his time to space activities. He was considered among the Thais the leading expert in the field other than the scientists. He tried to go up and approach Armstrong to ask a question, and the security people just elbowed him aside as if he were any old peon. He became completely disillusioned, and it cost us a lot of good will in Thailand. The security people just threw him aside. He never got a chance. Therefore, he said I'm not going to do anything about promoting this activity in Thailand. I'm not even going to cover the astronauts from this point on.

MILLER: Oh, for heavens sake.

Q: So we had a little trouble. Actually, we got a little footage in Thailand but most of it we covered ourselves. They wouldn't take it on the Thai TV.

MILLER: John Glenn was with us a couple of times. Did he come to Thailand?

Q: He didn't come while I was there. He may have before or later.

MILLER: He was in Burma at one point at some astronauts conference they had in Burma, and he stopped by India on the way home. We met him at the airport, my wife and I about, I guess it was seven o'clock in the evening, and he left New Delhi at roughly five the next morning. And during the period of time he was there we had a press conference. We had him on the radio. We had several other interviews. And I've forgotten what else. But he was busy all of the time that he was there practically, very cooperative, very helpful. I finally took him out to the airport at about four o'clock in the morning. And we sat in this empty airport and he was wondering what he could get to take home to his wife. Everything was closed. The Indian people at the airport opened up all the shops and he went around buying presents for his wife. He had a great time. He was a very interesting and as I said cooperative fellow. He came back a couple of years later when he was Vice President of R.C. Cola. And he brought his wife with him this time. Once again they were very cooperative with our program.

RICHARD N. VIETS
Commercial Officer
Madras (1965-1967)

Science Officer/Political/Economic Officer
New Delhi (1967-1972)

Ambassador Richard N. Viets was born in 1930 in Vermont. He served in the U.S. Army and attended Georgetown University and Harvard University. He joined USIA in 1955 and served in Afghanistan, Tunisia and after a break reentered the Foreign Service in 1962 serving in Japan, India, Romania, Israel, and was ambassador to Tanzania and Jordan. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy 1990-1992.

Q: To move on, you then were assigned...you were going to spend quite a bit of time in India. First in Madras (1965-67) and New Delhi (1967-72). What were you doing in Madras?

VIETS: Again, I was assigned there as a commercial officer. It took me a little more than five minutes to realize that the potential for American exports in South India during that period was so limited as to perhaps occupy an American officer's activities about five or ten percent of the time. Fortunately, several months after my arrival, a State Department inspection team blew into town as part of their overall India inspection tour, and I was able to prevail on their good sense that this position should be abolished.

Our Consulate General in Madras covers a territory about the size of West Germany, four southern states of India, with, I think, a population of about 400 million people. That meant a great deal of travel. Again, I happened to be fortunate enough to be working with a group of people who didn't like to be away from their homes too frequently, so I spent a lot of time moving around south India, which is a fascinating part of the world. In consequence, I did a lot of both political and economic reporting.

Q: What were our interests in that area?

VIETS: Again, and this is always hard for anyone today to understand the passions which drove so much of American policy and preoccupied and dominated the activities of so many American posts abroad, one of the major preoccupations was our concern about Soviet influence in India. It was certainly a legitimate concern, but should never have become a dominant concern. We had a huge intelligence representation in India at that point. We spent an awful lot of time monitoring what the Soviets were doing, and they spent an awful lot of time monitoring what we were doing.

Q: Was India sort of going on despite it all like Old Man River?

VIETS: Yes. But you will recall this was also an important era of India's own political history. Nehru had just passed from the scene. Prime Minister Shastri had succeeded him. Shastri was a rather weak figure who, you may recall, died of a heart attack while on a trip to Tashkent. To many people's surprise, within the US establishment at least, a lady named Indira Gandhi succeeded him.

She was clearly the candidate of the political bosses in India at that point. They thought they were going to be able to dominate her and manipulate events as they desired. So we also devoted quite a lot of time trying to figure out whether India in political, economic and philosophical terms. We were still hoping that we could influence the Indians to embrace the so-called market economy, which we called private enterprise in those days. So a lot of time was spent working with American businessmen and Indian politicians who were favorably disposed to freeing up the economy from its layers and layers of British inspired bureaucracy and Indian refinements thereof.

There was also a major presence throughout India of USIS. We had library operations in those days in Trivandrum down in Kerala State...in each of the capitals of the four southern Indian states that our consular district embraced.

Q: You mention Kerala State. This was one of those red blotches on the map.

VIETS: Kerala had a "Communist" government. That was a period in which there had been a major split in the Communist Party between a faction of the party that supported Moscow and a faction which supported Beijing. So you had this wonderful CPI, Communist Party of India, divided into two groups. One was what we called "Right" and one was "Left," "Right" being Moscow. We wasted a lot of time on that.

Q: I'm sure there were other things we could have been doing, but in those days the word "communism" would suck us into paying too much attention to it at the expense of other issues.

VIETS: We did have some major American economic projects going on. I should have said at the outset that another big preoccupation, certainly mine, was our AID program, economic assistance program, in India which at that point was of a value of hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars. Much of it was in the form of food aid. In 1966-67, India went through a very severe famine and the United States came to India's rescue in a stupendously generous fashion. I can remember going down to the port in Madras and looking out and seeing 70, 80 American ships sitting at anchor filled with grain waiting to come into the port.

Q: How was the delivery system? Often getting grain to the right place is crucial.

VIETS: Compared to other parts of the world that I lived in I think it was relatively efficient. The Indians had, thanks to the British, an extremely good rail network which covered all of south India. And their road system also was still in relatively good shape. The grain losses in India were in the storage of it where rats and weevils get to it. Often, as you know, it would just be stored outside. There were inadequate covered storage facilities. But in terms of transporting and distributing those food grains to feed hungry people and their hungry live stock, I think one has to give very high marks to the Indians for the way they handled the crisis.

Q: When you were in Madras what was the officers you worked with and your own attitude towards the Indians? Was it positive or sort of "Oh my God, these are difficult people"?

VIETS: I think both of the above. I had a life long love affair with India, less so with Indians, but certainly with the country. It is such a fascinating series of cultures and civilizations. The topography is magnificent, of course, from the Himalayas to the coast lines. All those wonderful hill stations, tea plantations, etc.

I think that no American who has served in India has not left considerably older because of the need to find secret reservoirs of patience and understanding which he might not have had when he came. But also I doubt if any American who really made the effort to get out and know something about India hasn't left much the richer for it. It is a remarkable civilization.

Q: Was there a difference between when you were in Madras and moving around attitude towards Americans and all than there was when you got up to New Delhi which is much more a capital which often reflects the central party, etc.?

VIETS: Yes. To begin with south Indians...there are major Christian communities in south India, especially in Kerala, so there exists a different ethic towards such things as private enterprise in south India than in north India. South Indians are a more sophisticated, in a sense more worldly group of people than the north Indians are. These are terrible generalizations but there is some validity to them, I think.

But you put your finger on, I think, the principal differences...in New Delhi you were in a capital with layers of bureaucrats and politicians many of whom were not very competent and were driven by the most confused and confusing economic and political philosophies. We were all, ourselves, under the spell of Chester Bowles.

Q: He was Ambassador there from 1963-69.

VIETS: Well, he was Ambassador there twice. I got him the second time around. He had amassed...it was a very large mission in those days in New Delhi...and he had amassed without question the most capable group of people I ever worked with anywhere during my Foreign Service career, which certainly includes the city of Washington! He had an eye for talent.

Q: How old were some of those people?

VIETS: Well, for example, the current head of National Public Radio was one of his people; the current head of AIPA, Tom Dine was one of his people; the current head of the Foreign Service Institute was one of his people; there must have been 30 or 40 future ambassadors who were on his staff; the Governor of Ohio, Dick Celeste, was one of his people. The Foreign Service today, at least my generation, is just studded with Bowles graduates.

Q: What was his method of operation and how did you view him in his relations with the Indians?

VIETS: It is a complicated question and a complicated answer and I will try to simplify it by saying that he was impassioned to imbue American principles and ideals into the Indian political consciousness and mainstream. He was a great democrat, as you know, both in terms of being a great member of the Democratic Party, and a democrat in the political philosophical sense of the word as well.

A man of formidable intellect and energy and that combination always, of course, is nothing to trifle with. So he worked seven days a week, eighteen or twenty hours a day, coming up with idea, after idea, after idea, on how to knit US institutions with Indian institutions.

He always said that he got much of his inspiration from his pattern of surrounding himself with fairly young, energetic people. We were all in our 30s or early 40s at that point. Once or twice a week he would have eight or ten of us to his home for dinner and we would sit out there in that lovely back garden of his and argue far into the night with him. I had two wonderful years with him in that garden listening to argument, debate and dissent on everything under the sun that was going on, both in India and elsewhere.

As a consequence, he missed very few tricks and we, as a consequence, were the beneficiaries of a lot of practical political wisdom on his part. He was one of the most open ambassadors I have ever known. If he had just come from spending a couple of hours with the Prime Minister, we would hear about the most privileged elements of that conversation. This was not always true in other embassies in which I served. But his influence led me to try to emulate him in many ways when I became an Ambassador.

Q: How do you think your work related to the Indians?

VIETS: They were devoted to him. Partly because they felt they had co-opted him, and certainly much of the bureaucracy in Washington was convinced of this fact, and it was probably true. It was a mutual co-option I would say. But India, for him, became an important center of the universe and he managed to divert huge amounts of American resource to that country. For example, at one point, we had a rupee account amounting to a couple of billion dollars stashed in the coffers of the Indian Central Bank.

Q: We are still living off them.

VIETS: Yes. Senator Moynihan, while he was Ambassador, finally had the good sense to negotiate a framework of agreements that led to this huge rupee debt owed to the US to be channeled into productive things that finally got rid of the bulk of it. But we were an enormously important player in India in those days.

Q: There is the saying that when the Democratic Party is in, India gets the tip, and when the Republicans are in, it seems to go to Pakistan. Did you have any feeling towards this?

VIETS: No, I think that is not a particularly thoughtful comment. There are many factors at play here. I think that various administrations, going back to the Nehru era and perhaps up to and including the present...although I am less certain of myself now because I keep an eye only occasionally on US-Indian relations, I am not intimately involved with it anymore...but I think that every administration had its frustrations in dealing with the Indians, who are, as I said earlier, inordinately frustrating human beings.

The Pakistanis, on the other hand, have a somewhat crisper approach to their relationship with the US. They know what they want and they are prepared to make the necessary accommodations to get it. In consequence, over years I think that the Pakistanis have done rather better in managing their relationships with the United States than the Indians have. But it is a hell of a complicated subject to open up on.

While I was in India, of course, we had two Indo-Pak wars. One in 1969 and one in 1971. During the second one there was a major American bias toward support of the Pakistanis. Henry Kissinger was, more than any other person, responsible for this. I can recall Kissinger, who at that time was National Security Adviser for Nixon, coming out to India. I was the control officer for his visit. At that time I was working in the Ambassador's office. I had stayed on in India because when Bowles left and a new Ambassador had arrived, Senator Kenneth B. Keating, he had pinned my arms behind my back and knocked me against the wall and said that I was going to stay and be his principal assistant. I agreed to do it for a year and ended up doing it for three. That is why I was in India for so long.

In the summer of 1981 Kissinger visited India on his way to China, via Pakistan. This was the famous secret first trip to China. As I said, I was appointed his control officer for the visit. We had come up with the idea that he meet with a group of Indians who had been his students at Harvard, in his celebrated Harvard seminar. So we pulled in 20, 25 Indians from around the country who had studied under him. We were very frustrated at that point because we had been sending message after message to Washington saying that the Indians and Pakistanis were on the way to war and Washington wasn't listening and didn't believe us. The Washington policy mandarins thought we were reflecting Indian attitudes and not our own best estimates.

In any case I remember vividly getting these guys for breakfast around a huge table in the Ashoka Hotel, and Kissinger showed up and remembered most of them. He sat down and went around the room in his professorial fashion asking each of them to make a forecast of what was going to happen in the next four months. Every single one of them came up with a four or five minute analysis of why war was inevitable.

Q: The war was over what issue?

VIETS: The war resulted in the fragmentation of East Pakistan into the new nation of Bangladesh. Its causes are complicated and some are still murky, but in sum the Indians were dabbling around in East Pakistani politics and the Pakistanis were dabbling around in Punjab things. A long story.

In any case I was sitting beside Kissinger and could palpably feel his anger rising because he didn't want to hear any of this. When we finally completed the circle he just preemptively stood up and said in so many words that he was ashamed that he had made so little impact in their capacity to analyze situations rationally and none of them knew what he was talking about. There wasn't going to be any war, and if there was, it was all India's fault, etc. It was quite a performance by this man and he stalked out leaving these poor fellows all looking at one another and wondering...

Q: In interviews in general what I have absorbed is that Kissinger tends to make up his mind, and also there was a bigger plan as far as he was concerned. He was in Pakistan and this was going to screw things up.

VIETS: That is right. We, of course, were not aware of his maneuverings at that point.

Q: When he came was he asking you and others what was going to happen?

VIETS: Oh, sure. But as I said, there was hardly a day that a very thoughtful cable didn't go out of our mission forecasting what was going to happen. It didn't fit in with his scheme of things. I must say that I doubt very much if Henry Kissinger spent a hell of a lot of time learning the intricacies of South Asian politics. He did not have any particular love for the Indians to begin with. He had had various encounters with them and apparently felt they were a hopeless species.

In this type of interview I don't want to get too deeply into analyzing Mr. Kissinger. I subsequently worked for him as the head of the so-called S/S-S, Executive Secretariat, in the Department when he came over from the White House to be Secretary of State. I spent a year there, so I had a ring side seat observing how he worked and operated. He certainly was one of the most fascinating figures in post-war American political history. He is a person of exceptional talent and knowledge, but also a man who was not nearly as wise, I think this is the word I want to use, as he managed to make the world believe. US policy, as a consequence, enjoyed both the benefits and the downside of that man's power.

Q: As the war clouds gathered how did you see the other side of the moon...our Embassy in Islamabad, and how were they reporting?

VIETS: Well, both Embassies made major efforts to keep our lines open without necessarily including Washington. We visited one another very frequently. We worked out some elements of our disagreements without spilling any blood on the floor. But there remained some basic policy differences which led to opposing policy analyses and recommendations from the two missions. I am not sure, as I look back on it...and I would need to refresh my memory by going back and reading some of the telegrams of the period from both missions...but I am not sure how good a job either of us really did in seeing these issues through the optic of our own national interests as opposed to perhaps doing a splendid job of articulating the views of the governments to which we were accredited. I would like to think that we did a reasonable job in interpreting these events and analyzing them and recommending courses of actions that served American interests. But we will leave that judgement to the diplomatic historians!

Q: Wasn't there also some emotion as to how the West Pakistanis were putting down their colleagues in what we now call Bangladesh?

VIETS: Yes, there was a lot of butchery going on.

Q: Including reports from our Consul General, Richard Blood and others. This was a pretty emotional thing.

VIETS: Indeed it was. Since we were bankers to both parties, we had some responsibility.

Q: Here was a Senator, Kenneth Keating, coming who was not a great intellect as others had been and didn't come from having a significant role in foreign policy formulation in the Senate. In fact, if I recall, he was a defeated senator, wasn't he?

VIETS: Yes, by Bobby Kennedy.

Q: This was his first ambassadorial assignment. How was he received and how did he operate and what was his role?

VIETS: To begin with, his appointment flowed from the fact that he and Richard Nixon had entered the House of Representatives together and were founding members of the Marching and Chowder Society and were very close friends. Keating, by the time he got to India, had clearly begun to have some major reservations about aspects of President Nixon's behavior, etc. However, he still remained a loyal and close friend. That was the genesis of his appointment.

The Indians, I think, were ambivalent about the appointment. In the first instance they always wanted to think they were getting an ambassador, as most countries do, who could pick up the phone and get the President on the other end. Keating certainly could do this, although he wisely, because of his political background, was aware of the fact that if you excessively used this entree those who guard the portals of power will insure your access over time is eroded, especially when you are 7 or 8 thousand miles away.

The quality of persons with whom he was dealing with, for example, the top echelon of the Foreign Ministry were all Oxford, Cambridge educated men, very intelligent, worldly, suave, urbane, sophisticated, experienced men in the world of politics and economics and it didn't take them very long to figure out that Keating was not an intellectual heavyweight. But he had some damn strong people standing behind him. So he was made to look much better, I think, than he was.

He was an enormously personable fellow, an Irish politician who really knew how to press the flesh very well. He loved the social side of his job.

He used his Senate method of operation by appointing a chief of staff who was responsible for everything. I had both the great fortune and the misfortune of being anointed by him to this position. Keating refused for a long, long time to adhere to the traditional patterns of managing an embassy, and I as a fairly young and junior officer found myself effectively running the place. The good Ambassador used to devote a couple of hours in the morning to the office, then retire to his swimming pool until late afternoon, followed by a siesta for a couple of hours. He would then start his social rounds, the high point of his day. I am afraid he did not work very hard, which meant that the rest of us put in some mighty long hours. Fortunately, after several months of 20 hour days a very professional DCM, Galen Stone, arrived in New Delhi and picked up the reins as the traditional deputy Ambassador.

Q: Did he have any opinions of how things were going? Did he listen to others?

VIETS: He would listen very carefully. I am hearing my voice echo here and realize I am perhaps drawing a picture of something of a fool. He was not by any stretch of the imagination. He was shrewd. He had a lot of experience in the political world and in Washington. He had an enormous range of contacts in this country. In every part of our society Ken Keating knew people who counted. He was perfectly happy to use those contacts whenever they could be helpful.

To his credit he recognized that, as politicians who survive do, I think, he had some bright people working for him and he listened to them and took their advice. I respect him for that.

Q: How did he feel about this coming war? This is one of those times when there was a lot of emotion at home over India and Bangladesh.

VIETS: He had no trouble understanding what was coming down the pike and supported fully those officers on his staff who were writing the telegrams that made these forecasts and policy recommendations. He backed them to the hilt and was back in Washington very frequently to argue the case in his own fashion. But I fear that he was written down by the policy level people in Washington as being a little fey and growing old and a bit forgetful. People in this city were concerned because they knew he was a close friend of the President and thus he was accorded respect due to his position and his age, but I don't think he made any great impact in a personal sense either here or in India.

Q: Looking at policy situations, here you have a nice test case. You have two countries with which we have considerable interest in -- Pakistan and India -- and they are heading towards war. What can we do and all that. We have a National Security Adviser who has his eyes fixed on China and almost anything else is passed over. It is often said that you don't really need a powerful ambassador because other things happen, but really in the Washington sense, had this been somebody else who had not only political clout but who was at the peak of his or her powers, that could have made some difference.

VIETS: Well, I agree with you. As you were posing this I was quickly thinking of people I had worked with who could have made more of a difference. Sam Lewis, for example. I was his DCM in Tel Aviv for a couple of years. There is a man who had intellect, energy and the forcefulness of personality and the respect of his audience in Washington at the policy level who would have made a difference had he been in India. I am certain of it. I could name other people. You are right. I do not subscribe to the prevailing theory that ambassadors are an anachronism and are the personification of the irrelevancy of the Foreign Service institution as it has developed. I agree that ambassadors are in some respects a useless institution, but there are certain moments when they really earn their keep and can make an enormous difference in the formation of policy and perhaps even more importantly to the implementation and conduct of that policy. But they have to have that combination of intellect and experience and the capacity to come back to this city and make people listen to them. Otherwise the bureaucracy in this city is so huge and so divisive and fractionated and self-important and arrogant that it will just get its own way. I have always thought that this was a capital waiting to be told what to do. Ambassadors, like certain generals and admirals, still have that potential to represent the difference between stupidity in policy and policy that is acute and germane to US national interests. Unfortunately, I am not sure there are too many people about these days who meet my criteria for this, but the potential role is there for the person with the right mix of qualifications.

Q: It does also point up a problem. There is nothing worse in Washington as far as clout goes than to have lost an election.

VIETS: Well, you get what you deserve. I think the myopia of the political wisdom of using defeated political candidates as an Ambassadorial resource was even more sharply drawn when Keating decided that he wanted to go to Israel. He had wanted to come out to India because he had served there as an officer in World War II and had enjoyed it very much. He knew it could be a great life and indeed for him it was. He had a huge staff in his residence, a beautiful residence and a couple of swimming pools, airplanes at his disposal, etc. After 3 years he decided he wanted to go to Israel, primarily I think because of the warm and fuzzy feelings he had generated with his New York Jewish constituency. He mistakenly calculated this popularity could be transferred and re-packaged in Israel. Alas for him, it couldn't be, and he died an unhappy and frustrated man.

Q: India must have been as viceregal as one could get.

VIETS: That is right, and he enjoyed it. But as I say he decided that he wanted to go to Israel and the President thought that was fine. Well, that killed him, quite literally. If you can think of any more stupid thing to do then send a man in failing health, elderly, unable to muster much energy and toss him into the vortex of the Middle East and make sure he is there during a major war, that is pretty smart.

Q: Was this the 1973 war?

VIETS: Yes.

Q: How did the Embassy react, particularly thinking of the political officers? This was the time we were going through the tilt towards Pakistan. Was there sort of a revolt of allegiance on the line or something of this nature?

VIETS: No, no, no. If you are asking about the Indo-Pak war, our energies over night refocused into trying to end the war. It was essentially US good offices that brought that conflict to a relatively rapid end. It is a shining hour in American diplomacy and I hope you don't ask me for too many details about how we did it because my memory is fading!

Q: Could you describe what you and others were doing?

VIETS: To begin with, we were the main communications link between Islamabad; Dacca, the provincial capital of East Pakistan and now the capital of Bangladesh; and New Delhi. We got right into the middle of it by trying to quickly defuse the situation. We arranged cease-fires, we were even the communicators of "don't bomb during this period because red cross people are going to be moving in and evacuating patients from hospitals," etc. We did everything you could dream of that a negotiator could do who had the best communication system of anybody in the world at that point...not what it is today, but still so much better than either one of the adversaries had.

I think we were essentially trusted by both sides. Better said, I think the people on the scene were trusted. I don't think Washington was particularly trusted by either capital, but the force of personality of the people we had in New Delhi and Islamabad and our bona fides had been amply demonstrated to our respective host governments. And personal trust as always, even in issues of war, become terribly, terribly important.

Q: The Soviets, I take it, played no real role in the war.

VIETS: No. There may have been some rumblings and threats, but I don't recall any major Soviet role.

Q: But you found dealing with the Indians that they didn't feel we were on the side of the Pakistanis because of this? How did our role in ceasing the hostilities play out?

VIETS: As in all wars, there comes a point when the advice of the military to their civilian political masters becomes the dominant element in decision making. Our Deputy Chief of Mission in New Delhi, Galen Stone, had established exceptional rapport with the military chiefs in India during that period. Also our CIA liaison with the Indians was of the highest order at that point. The combination of these two factors, I think played a critical role in ending the war. Galen could sit down with the military chiefs individually and go through things. Our Station chief could do that with his intelligence opposite numbers at the top and they in turn could go to their political masters. They wanted to end the war. They had no ambitions to become occupiers of East Pakistan. They were taking casualties and were concerned about a potential long term guerilla activity that could go on along the frontier. No soldier wants to continue a war. It is the politicians who were the...

Q: I know you have to quit at this point.

VIETS: I am getting ready to make a trip to Romania and promised to go over to the Department to meet with some people and had better do so.

Q: Well, then come on back.

Today is July 6, 1990 and this is a second interview with Ambassador Richard N. Viets. Picking up where we left off before, I wonder if you could tell me your impression at the time of how we treated India as regards to Vietnam? You were there at the time and India was sort of the burr under everybody's saddle, at least from our point of view. How did we look at it and how did we deal with this?

VIETS: We swallowed hard. I think that both the Washington foreign policy bureaucracy, as well as certainly our Embassy in New Delhi, accepted the fact that we could not in any foreseeable conditions modify Indian views regarding our role in Vietnam. But as in all conditions of this sort, there are always anomalies and aberrations. One that immediately comes to mind is the fact that the Indians made available to us, certainly during the seven years I was there and I left in 1972, facilities at their naval bases in Cochin and Bombay, for flotillas of US warships that had been on patrol off Vietnam and were on their way back to Europe or the US and they would put into Cochin or Bombay for several days of R&R, refueling, etc. We made no effort to hide the fact that these ships were coming from combat patrols in Vietnamese waters.

Q: I assume there was a general feeling of "let's cool it" as far as talking about this anywhere. If you were faced with criticism about doing more with India this was not something one would drag up to show Indian support in Congress or the press.

VIETS: Your point is well taken. The Indians were of some value to us in the ICC operation in Vientiane and certainly there were individual Indian diplomats who I think understood with greater clarity than perhaps their political masters did, what was going on and quietly were helpful to us. But over all, as I said a minute ago, I think we just gritted our teeth and muddled on.

Q: In a way this gives a certain feeling that there was some sophistication in what we were doing because there is the tendency, either the new people coming in or because of Congressional pressure, to go charging around and try to do what you can't do. But you felt things were well enough under control so that you didn't have to deal with people who wanted to convert the heathen?

VIETS: I think it was, to borrow the cliché, more of a damage control operation. What we were spending more time doing was insuring that the Indians didn't publicly take us on in various arenas around the world on Vietnam, as opposed to trying to proselytize and swing them around to our point of view.

Q: I would like to ask a couple of questions. You mentioned that you had this position where you were moved up and at your rank dealing at a much higher level. One of the things I am interested in is how the Foreign Service operates. How did this sit with your fellow officers at the Embassy over a period of time?

VIETS: That is always a question better put to others, not the individual.

Q: How did you feel about it?

VIETS: It wasn't easy for anyone. I think in the circumstances, people in that mission...and as mentioned earlier it was a huge operation. My recollection is that there was something like 800 Americans throughout the whole country at that point. Certainly one of the biggest missions we had anywhere in the world. Many of those people, of course, were AID folks out in the countryside, but still the Embassy, itself, was enormous with 20 odd agencies represented there.

People, I think, in general...those who showed up for work every day...understood pretty well that what we were dealing with was (a) an ambassador who had no background at all for the task that confronted him, (b) was beginning to show signs of failing health and certainly did not have a great deal of energy and (c) like many political appointees was rather more interested in the ceremonial aspects of the job and the perquisites than he was in most of the substance. I don't want to completely diminish Ambassador Keating. He had, I think, the good sense, which I can't say for every political ambassador, to listen very carefully to sound advice that was given to him by his professional subordinates. Rarely would he override them. And he was prepared to stick his neck out on policy issues when one could have easily seen it would be better for him to remain quiet. In any case, people understood I think quite well the nature of his role and personality and knew that somebody had to be there to borrow Donald Regan's famous phrase, "to sweep up after him." Certainly that was one of my jobs.

He also had made very clear from his day of arrival that he wanted to run that mission as he had run his Senate office. He wanted to work through one person and what happened after that didn't bother him much as long as it was done. It was only after being there quite a few months that he became more sensitive to the fact that one person really had to be the DCM, and not this young personal assistant staff aide. But still behind closed doors more often than not he would use me as his transmission belt to the DCM on many, many issues.

I was very fortunate to be working with Galen Stone, under whom I had served a couple of years earlier in New Delhi when he had been political counselor and I was one of the political officers on his staff. We had developed a very close personal relationship in addition to a professional relationship. When Keating began to look for a new DCM, he was the person who I pushed hardest with Keating. Ultimately Keating hired him. So here were two men who both had some professional standards and who were also close personal friends. I think by in large it worked very well.

Q: It works sometimes when this sort of situation happens when a political appointee brings his own staff aide from outside. Then there is an immediate cutoff from the professional ranks.

VIETS: Well there I have to give Keating great credit. He could have done the same thing. He didn't. He knew he would be better served to use people within the system. And I think he was. His successor arrived with an outside fellow who took over the job I was doing and I think it was very, very hard for everybody for a long time.

EDDIE DEERFIELD
Madras (1966-1969)

Mr. Deerfield was born in Nebraska and raised in Nebraska and Illinois. He was educated at the University of Illinois and Northwestern University. After service in the US Army Air Corps in WWII and work with a Chicago TV station, Mr. Deerfield joined the USIA Foreign Service in 1966 serving abroad in Madras, Islamabad, Blantyre, Vancouver, Kampala, Lagos and Calcutta. Mr. Deerfield submitted his personal memoir in 2012.

DEERFIELD: I was forty-two years old when I arrived at the American Consulate in Madras in 1966 with the title Information Officer to begin my first overseas assignment. As I looked back on my years as a Chicago Times reporter, WGN-TV news editor, and corporate public relations executive, I wasn't sure if I had made the right career decision. Ted Sills, president of the PR firm, had declined my letter of resignation and granted me two years leave of absence, fully expecting me to return. Our first home overseas was called "Mayfair," built large and gracious in the British Colonial style, although it wasn't long before we were introduced to floods caused each year by cyclones. My first speaking engagement in Madras was to address a crowd attending the inauguration of an American space exploration exhibit. Chief Minister Annadurai (the position of chief minister in India is equivalent to that of governor in the U.S.) was guest of honor.

I traveled through the four states of southern India to meet with the media and a wide variety of audiences. I made book presentations, spoke to Rotary and Lions Club members, cut ribbons at dedications, inaugurated a basketball team tournament, moderated a discussion on the role of small business in India, and even presented a typewriter to an association of journalists. I met with and exchanged views with the vice president of India and the chief minister of Maharashtra when they visited Madras for a ceremonial function. I lectured extensively at colleges in Madras, Bangalore, Hyderabad, Trivandrum and smaller communities. I worked in harmony with scores of editors of Indian newspapers to tell America's story. My intent was not to defend our role in the Vietnam War but to explain the events leading up to our involvement and our rationale for being there. I arranged a grant for the editor of an Indian pro-communist newspaper in Madras to visit the United States. On his return, that paper's editorials were far more reasonable and less critical of the U.S. than they had been. An event that gained considerable favorable publicity was the presentation of the American annual Helms Trophy to India's Krishnan, recognized as the year's most outstanding international tennis player. It was covered in English language journals, as well as in the local language press. In another project, I escorted a group of journalists from Calcutta on a visit to a NASA (National Aeronautics and Space Agency) flight center in South India and briefed Ambassador Chester Bowles when he brought a delegation from New Delhi to Madras.

It's difficult to gauge the effects of public diplomacy. It's as much an art as it is a science. The Communist Party was strong in parts of South India, particularly in the state of Kerala. There were frequent protest marches ending at our American Cultural Center in Trivandrum. Recognition that I was making an impact came about in a very unusual way. About a year after I arrived in Madras, the Soviet Union's news agency TASS sent a story to the Indian media accusing me of being the CIA (Central Intelligence Agency) chief for south India. Disinformation was one of the USSR's (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) Cold War weapons. The tactic of naming me as a master spy didn't work because I had earned the trust of my Indian contacts.

Mary Lee was often at the microphone as chief guest at various charitable and social events. We found time to visit the Taj Mahal under the light of a full moon, and, on another holiday, spent a memorable week at an island palace in Jaipur in a suite with dazzling stained glass windows. It was time to move on to another country. Our son, Scott, was now three years old. Much of his education in the ensuing years as we served in hardship posts was at boarding schools in Europe and the U.S.

ROBERT J. KOTT
Peace Corps Volunteer
Deccan Plateau (1966-1969)

Mr. Kott was born and raised in New York City. He earned degrees from St. John's University in New York City and from the University of Oregon. After service with the Peace Corps in India, Mr. Kott joined the Foreign Service in 1971. An African specialist, Mr. Kott served in, Togo and Cameroon as Economic and Political Officer and in Malawi and Senegal as Deputy Chief of Mission. He also served in Indonesia and Canada. Mr. Kott was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q: Why don't you say a little bit more about your Peace Corps experience? You were in a village in India?

KOTT: Indeed. Yes. It was eye opening, life-changing one might say. It was basically a general community development program, in those days Peace Corps programs were less focused and more general than they eventually grown into. We were specifically supposed to be working in agricultural development, right out of New York City. Had to learn what a cow and a tree was, before I could do that. But anyway, basically, we were there to be change agents, working with government counterparts in areas that were newly brought under irrigation. The Indian government was irrigating at a furious rate back in those days, in the early stages of the "green revolution," so called. They were introducing the miracle crops: miracle wheat, hybrid corn, hybrid sorghum. I was on the Deccan Plateau in southern India, a sorghum producing area. And they wanted us to help the government efforts to introduce to the farmers the hybrid crops, so as to take better advantage of the newly irrigated fields that were being brought into production, at the great expense to the Indian government of course.

Q: You refer to it as "we." Were there several Peace Corps volunteers working in the same village, doing this kind of work, or were you pretty much by yourself?

KOTT: Both. Generally, we were assigned individually to the village, but the group that I came in with; we were trained as a group and was divided into two areas in the state, so that there might have been 12 of us within a 20 mile radius in one part of the state and 12 of us in another similar situation. As it turned out, I had been assigned to a city, rather than to a village, and that proved not to be so very productive for a number of reasons, but largely a Peace Corps experience really is one of a village experience, and so after about a year in the city, I wasn't very happy, don't forget I was not being terribly productive there, I moved out to a village where there was another Peace Corps volunteer from my group and a good friend of mine, and worked with him, doing what I earlier described plus other general community development-type projects. He helped start a cooperative through a grant from the CARE (Cooperative for Assistance and Relief Everywhere). That proved to be very productive and lasted a number of years and may still be in existence as far as I know. Introducing things as hybrid chicken and that sort of thing, the usual Peace Corps experience. He left earlier and I stayed behind and remained in the village by myself.

Q: India must have had quite an impact on you if you decided to do South Asia graduate work at the University of Oregon. Was it that experience...?

KOTT: Yes, absolutely. India is the kind of place, I think most people would agree, you either hate it or you love it. If you can last more than a week in India, you probably love it and fall in love with it. Upon arrival, my only culture shock that I can remember in my whole life, of course it was my first real overseas experience other than student trips to Europe, after about three days got over culture shock and on we went. India is a way of life, it's an existence, Hinduism, even though it is not a completely Hindu country of course, is so over-compassing, it's not just a religion, it's a way of being. Obviously if you are with and amongst the people and in a rural setting and participate as most Peace Corps volunteers do, speak a little of the local language, it grows on you. To this day, it still is my first love, even though I never got reassigned back there as a Foreign Service officer, I always wanted to but I didn't.

Q: What years were you in India?

KOTT: The end of 1966 until the beginning of 1969. Effectively just over two years, it sounds like four years but it was just over two years.

Q: Because I was in Pakistan in 1965, when there was a war between Pakistan and India, but that war didn't last very long and the next wars did not clear until 1971, which resolved in Bangladesh. So India must have been, it was peaceful time...

KOTT: Yes it was relative peace, it was going through, it was just coming out of a great drought and famine that occurred in the mid '60s. After the fact, I learned in the chartered India aircraft, that took our Peace Corps group and another Peace Corps group to India from JFK in New York, was sitting, in the first class compartment, Mrs. Gandhi, Prime Minister of India of the day, who was returning after visiting Lyndon Johnson in Washington, asking for American wheat. And apocryphally Lyndon grabbed the lady by the sari and said, "If you want my wheat you take my Peace Corps volunteers." That is how we got up to something like 1,400-1,500 Peace Corps volunteers in India when I was there. It was certainly the largest Peace Corps program in the world. Of course I found out later that Mrs. Lillian Carter was in India as a volunteer, the mother of the would-be President, in Maharashtra state, not terribly far from where I was. I didn't know her at the time, of course. There were huge numbers of volunteers there. We had four Peace Corps administrative offices around the country: New Delhi, Bombay, Calcutta and Bangalore. My group and others were assigned to Bangalore region, that is how big it was.

ANTHONY QUAINTON
External Relations Officer
New Delhi (1966-1969)

India, Nepal, Ceylon Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1969-1972)

Ambassador Anthony Quainton was born in Washington state in 1934. He graduated from Princeton University in 1955, Oxford University in 1958 and joined the Foreign Service in 1959. He served at overseas posts in Australia, Pakistan, India, France, Nepal and as ambassador to the Central African Republic, Nicaragua, Kuwait and Peru. Ambassador Quainton has also served as the Deputy Inspector General, Assistant Secretary of State for Diplomatic Security, and the Director General of the Foreign Service. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: You were in India from 1966 until when?

QUAINTON: Until the summer of 1969.

Q: Since these two posts have been a little like cats and dogs, could you tell me what your impression was of the embassy when you first got there?

QUAINTON: Chester Bowles abolished the political and economic sections in his embassy and redealt the cards to create an external section and an internal section. There was a counselor external and a counselor internal and a minister political/economic who was beneath the DCM but above the counselors. I was assigned to a position in the external section covering India's relationship with its neighbors. Now, this was essentially India's relationship with Pakistan, about which I knew something from my previous assignment, but also India's relationship with Nepal, Sri Lanka, etc. I covered not only India's political relationships but also economic relationships. Everybody in the external section did both political and economic work just as everyone in the internal section, whether they were previously economic officers or political officers, were expected to do both. So every economic officer had to do political reporting on at least one state of the Indian union and every political officer had to report on at least one industry or sector. An interesting way to divide up the embassy. It had many, many beneficial effects in terms of people breaking out of some rather narrow boxes. In any case, I arrived as the Pakistan expert and consequently was regarded with some suspicion by Chester Bowles.

Q: Okay, let's talk about the job a bit more before we move on to other things. What was the general feeling within the embassy?

QUAINTON: The embassy was made up of the most talented group of officers that I served with over my entire 38 year career. It is not clear to me how they were all assembled, but both in the external and internal sections and in the CIA station there were a series of officers almost all of whom went on to quite remarkable careers. Many of the Foreign Service officers became ambassadors. They had remarkable careers and they were a very dynamic team of individuals. Indeed, one of them is now returning to India as ambassador, Dick Celeste, who went on to be governor of Ohio. He was one of the special assistants that Chester Bowles brought out. Bowles brought out some young non-career men whom he had heard about or knew, and he also surrounded himself with a very talented group of Foreign Service officers. I was never part of Bowles' inner circle. I think he regarded me with some suspicion as having come from the enemy. In the course of almost three years, I only set foot into his office twice, which is not very often for a third tour officer.

Q: For a third tour officer dealing with political matters you would expect to have a few more encounters I would think.

QUAINTON: He was very open, however, at the personal level. He cared about junior officers a great deal and had a series of small dinners at his house for junior officers and their wives where they got a chance to talk. He, of course, had such an extraordinary political career, himself, coming to New Delhi for the second time after having been under secretary of state. He was a man of extraordinary vision who passionately loved India. He genuinely believed that India was the hope for democracy in Asia and in contrast to the communist Chinese. He felt India was a country on which we should put all of our chips and he never could understand why Washington would want to put any chips on a military dictatorship such as that across the border in Pakistan. He inspired the embassy with his enthusiasm for India. It was not just a political enthusiasm but also a cultural enthusiasm. Mrs. Bowles wore a sari almost all the time, and quite a lot of the wives in the embassy also wore saris. The identification with India was extraordinary.

We were all encouraged to travel. There were a fair number of good language officers in both the external and internal sections who spoke Hindi and/or Urdu. The Bowles' were plugged into the cultural life of the country. There were Indian cultural events at the residence or Indian public monuments around New Delhi to which guests were invited. There was a real sense of excitement about India. Every new arrival in the embassy was to attend a week-long orientation course which promoted India, Indian culture and religion. It was far better than anything FSI did in terms of giving one an understanding for the culture. The result was that people with very few exceptions loved India, loved working in the embassy, and felt that they were making a difference. This was almost entirely a result Bowles' leadership.

Unfortunately, I think, he did not have a lot of credibility in Washington or in the Indian foreign ministry. He was perceived as being a useful tool by the Indian government: their ambassador to Washington as much as our ambassador to them. Washington, I think, had the same perception. I can still remember at the time of the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968, Bowles immediately went to see the prime minister, Indira Gandhi, to lecture her on the importance of India's speaking out against the invasion. Shortly after, the ambassador returned from her office, the Indian foreign secretary called the DCM and wanted to know if the ambassador was speaking under instructions or not. Well, if they call up to find out, you know that they don't know when their "great friend" is speaking and when the United States government is speaking. I think there was always that question. Bowles could be quite tough with the Indians because he believed so much that they must take the right course in order to give the leadership of which their democracy was capable. The Indians were smart enough to know that he had been sent to India to get him out of Washington...

Q: This is very much the feeling that he represented a burr under the Johnson saddle.

QUAINTON: That's right, so he was moved out. He was already beginning to raise questions about the Vietnam war, etc. There was, I think, a sense within the embassy among some officers that he would go too far in pushing his views. We were inspected in New Delhi, and I was asked to give a dinner for the inspectors with mid-level officers invited. So, we invited eight or 10 mid-level officers from the external and internal sections. The inspectors asked, as they usually do, about morale and other things. At one point they asked what were the officers' impressions of Chester Bowles. One of the internal officers said, "Well, he is a wonderful man, but he is cooking the books." The inspector asked him to explain that. "Well, let me give you an example. We are trying to promote the green revolution..."

Q: Explain what the green revolution was.

QUAINTON: The major effort that AID was making at this time was to promote an agricultural revolution in major third world countries by the introduction of new grains and the encouragement of the use of inputs, fertilizer, water, advanced seeds. The goal was to raise production so that countries like India and Pakistan would be self-sufficient and not dependent on the outside world for food. In any event, the criticism of this particular officer was that in order to get USAID resources, the Indians were required to commit to massive development of their fertilizing industry. This officer said the Indian commitment was completely spurious. The Indians promised to produce by 1972, or whatever the date was, an enormous quantities of urea, and there was no possibility of that happening, in this officer's view. But, he asserted, the ambassador knew that what the Indians were promising was unachievable, but nonetheless told Washington the targets would (be met). His goal was insure the continued flow of AID resources. Well, that kind of mistrust, the overstating of the case, was the darker side of Bowles' enormous enthusiasm for India.

Q: What about you? You have been in the Foreign Service long enough to have some feel for things, what was your feeling?

QUAINTON: I was quite captivated by India. Having been in Pakistan helped because I was already accustomed to much of the culture, much of the way of organizing one's life with servants, etc. and the language was familiar. Many of the problems were also familiar, as I had worked on them from the other side. So, it was an easy transition into a country which we found endlessly fascinating culturally, politically, historically. The history of the Raj had always captivated my imagination. The culture of the country went back 5,000 years. One was surrounded by Mogul India, British India, Independent India.

My wife and I traveled to all corners of India while we were there. We found middle class Indians, with whom we interacted, fascinating and wonderful people to know, and we have retained a number of close friends over the years. We had our fourth child while in India (One of our children died in Pakistan while we were there in a tragic domestic accident.), so my wife was much engaged with our youngest daughter. But, she also wrote a literary column for a magazine called The Weekend Review, edited by a young journalist, Sarwar Lateef. There was a very much more open intellectual environment than in Pakistan. The Pakistanis were open in a social sense, but there wasn't nearly the same dynamism that you found in Indian intellectual circles. In New Delhi, there was an enormous range of newspapers, magazines, artistic programs, etc. which made Delhi a fascinating place in which to live and work. We had almost three years there before coming back to the India desk in the Department.

Q: How did you find dealing with Indian officials as opposed to say dealing with Pakistani officials? Did you find a different breed of cat?

QUAINTON: Indians officials were always less direct. At least for me, they were always pretty accessible. We rarely got a straight yes or no answer on things about which we were seeking their support. The whole stance of their foreign policy was critical of America: critical of our support for Pakistan and of our arming of the Pakistanis, of our policy in Vietnam, and of the Cold War stance adopted by the United States. So, there was always an edge to any dialogue with an Indian official because of their perception of the wrong headedness of American policy. It was not as easy, therefore, to deal with Indian officials as it was with the Pakistanis. Officials of the foreign ministry are a very self-conscious elite, very impressive people, but very status conscious. There was an occasion when we were invited to a dinner given by the external counselor, Galen Stone, who subsequently became our ambassador to Cyprus, at which a group of senior officials were invited with their wives. The most senior official, who eventually became foreign secretary of India some 15 years later, went around the table to see how the place cards had been distributed and moved himself to the right hand of the hostess because he had not been appropriately placed. He was by some months senior in service to one of the other joint secretaries that had been invited. It was quite clear that he was not going to let the hostess make a mistake about seniority. I think this attitude, this enormous sense they had of where they stood in their hierarchal system, was always a frustration in dealing with the Indians.

Q: What about the attitude of those Indians you were dealing with towards the Soviet Union? The Indians often seemed to take a much more benevolent and tolerant view of the Soviets than we did.

QUAINTON: India's relations with the Soviet Union had many facets. The Soviets were prepared to provide India weapons systems which we were not. They were able to demonstrate their friendship in tangible ways which were important to the Indians. I think a lot of Indians thought that the Soviets were being constantly provoked by the Americans in the context of the Cold War. The Indians never thought much of communism but they certainly had a strong view about decolonization, and the Soviet Union was on their side. We were always much less strident in speaking out against colonialism and imperialism. The Indians had lived through both and this fact was absolutely central to their sense of who they were. They saw themselves as the leader of the process of change in the third world. The Soviet Union spoke the same language for their own reasons and that made for a relationship with Moscow which had an emotional dimension that could never be achieved with the United States, even though we, in other respects, shared many of the same objectives. We were always more nuanced in how we expressed our objectives, and, of course, we were supporting Pakistan.

Q: Did Vietnam intrude much as far as your work went?

QUAINTON: It didn't intrude at all. There was another officer in the embassy who handled Asia and it certainly wasn't a subject on which I spent any time at all. I really focused on India's relations with Pakistan and Nepal. I did have an opportunity to go on the first official delegation to Timphu, the capital of Bhutan. It was part of my reporting responsibilities and it was decided in 1967 that we should make an official visit. Ambassador Galbraith had crossed the border into Bhutanese territory but had not gone to any cities. The external counselor (Galen Stone) and I and the consul from Calcutta all traveled to Bhutan in 1967 and again in 1969. It was a small moment in history, the opening of U.S. relations with this very, very isolated little country. I still remember the counselor cashing the first traveler's cheque in the history of Bhutan. Calling on the finance minister in his office in a palace in the center of Timphu, the counselor asked how he could cash a traveler's cheque. The finance minister got a tin box the size of your tape recorder out of his desk and asked, "How much do you want?" It was a country with no banks. It was a historic moment. It was a lovely country with wonderful people, but very much under the influence of India. The Indian rupee was the legal currency at the time and everything operated within parameters set by the Indians.

Q: In this period of time, 1966-69, you were watching Indo-Pak relations. Were there any developments? Were we trying to play any role?

QUAINTON: I don't remember major negotiating issues. Kashmir, of course, was the central issue, always the central issue. Kashmir and the arms relationship were the subjects most frequently discussed. We never made any significant effort to resolve the Kashmir dispute. I think the embassy in New Delhi accepted the Indian position that Kashmir was an integral part of India and that it should stay so because to have further partition along religious lines would be divisive of the secular democracy which the Indians stood for. So, we were not well placed to be intermediaries between India and Pakistan concerning Kashmir.

Q: Well, having visited Kashmir from the other side, what was your feeling towards the rights and wrongs of what is known as the Kashmir dispute?

QUAINTON: Fundamentally, I believed that the Indians were in the wrong on this. It was evident that Kashmir was largely Muslim and if given a choice would choose either independence or accession to Pakistan, and in the 1960s, probably the latter. The Kashmiris felt no great loyalty to either secular or Hindu India as represented by New Delhi. I accepted the Indian view that it was by sleight of hand that the Indians arranged the accession of Kashmir to the Indian union shortly after independence. In any event, the reality was that the Indians were there and clearly had no intention of leaving. The whole rationale of their modern secular state rested on their ability to demonstrate that Hindus, Muslims and others could live together within a common framework. That was not a subject on which there was then or now any possibility of compromise on the Indian side.

Q: Did you think that Bowles bought the Indian position?

QUAINTON: Most people in the embassy saw the injustice of India's trying to hang on to the Muslim population of Kashmir even though they would have liked to have gone elsewhere. On the other hand, we saw the force of the Indian argument for the preservation of the Indian union. Most people in the embassy were not directly engaged on this subject. It was a compartmentalized kind of embassy and everyone had a great deal of positive work to do. Kashmir was entirely secondary. Remember, in 1965-66, U.S. aid to India was over a billion dollars. Our programs were so big and our engagement with India so extensive that as long as they weren't fighting the Pakistanis, we were content to get on with our business.

Q: You were on the India desk from when to when?

QUAINTON: I began on the India desk in late 1969 and stayed there for three years until going to Paris in the summer of 1972. The first year I spent as the junior political officer responsible for Indian affairs. After a year, I moved up to be the senior of two political officers in the office of India, Nepal, and Ceylonese Affairs.

Q: What were your responsibilities when you first arrived?

QUAINTON: The office actually had four India desk officers, two economic and two political, as well as officers who handled Nepal and Sri Lanka. So it was quite a sizeable staff. Having just come from New Delhi I spent a good deal of time on India-Pakistan relations. There was always a constant need for briefing papers to go up to the deputy assistant secretary and the assistant secretary, Joe Sisco at the time. There was the notetaking at meetings when the Indian ambassador would come or be summoned for a demarche of some kind. The ambassador or Indian DCM were the only two senior Indian officials who regularly came into the Department. I was a notetaker at a variety of levels, right up to the Secretary, although more typically it was with Mr. Sisco or the deputy assistant secretary.

Q: Coming from New Delhi where your universe revolved around India and Pakistan, where did you find interest in India in the Department? Did you see a difference?

QUAINTON: Well, in Washington it was fairly clear that India was not terribly popular. Notwithstanding the efforts that Chester Bowles had made to portray India to a Washington audience as the great democracy of Asia that deserved almost unreserved U.S. support, the India-Soviet relationship constantly reared its ugly head. Since our foreign policy was largely a zero sum foreign policy at the time and remained so for years thereafter, to the degree the Soviets were perceived as having an important foothold in India, we were perceived to have thereby lost in some significant degree. So there was a constant battle within the Washington community about the extent to which we should sustain our support for India, our extensive economic and our limited military assistance. There was always a strong Pakistan lobby because of the close Pakistan-U.S. relationship that lasted right through the entire time that I was on the India desk.

Clearly the three years that I spent there became increasingly difficult in political terms. The Indo-Pakistan crisis of 1971, which resulted in the separation of Bangladesh from Pakistan, was a traumatic event, as was the tilt of Dr. Kissinger towards Pakistan, and the behind scenes efforts to establish a relationship with China through Pakistan. This negotiation with China was entirely unknown to us on the India desk throughout the crisis period, or at least until the time of Dr. Kissinger's actual visit to Beijing passing through Pakistan. On the India desk, we just couldn't understand why the U.S. was not speaking out against Pakistani actions in East Pakistan.

The 1971 crisis had been building throughout 1970 with the Pakistan elections, which Bhutto did not allow to be won by the Bangladesh leader, Sheik Mujibur Rahman. We were constantly surprised at the lack of criticism of Pakistan for the suppression of the results of the elections, particularly given our commitment to democracy, our interests in the area, and our support for Indian democracy. Instead, criticism of India became increasingly strident throughout the course of 1971 and on into 1972 for what India was seen to have done to bring about the dismemberment of an ally of the United States. Pakistan, as you will remember, was still a member of CENTO at the time. Indian policy played very badly in the Washington environment of the time and when Mrs. Gandhi came to the White House in the summer of 1971, she was received very coolly, even though she appealed for American understanding of the enormous burden India was carrying as a result of Bengali refugees into India.

Q: You mention the Pakistan lobby. The Indian leadership are very sophisticated people and I would think that they would know how to play the Washington lobby game.

QUAINTON: The Indians were never successful in playing our political system well. Nor were they successful in playing the American public very well. They fretted, chafed enormously under the constant bad publicity which they received focused on the poverty of the Indian masses, the alleged abuses of the Indian maharaja class, the complaints about the India-Soviet relationship, and their willingness to acquire advanced weapons systems, mainly MIGs and other advanced aircraft from the Soviet Union, and the constant drum beat of criticism of non-alignment. The Indians were inordinately proud of non-alignment. It had been Nehru's vision of the world which Mrs. Gandhi continued throughout her tenure as prime minister. India wanted to stand above the Cold War and in so doing tried to maintain a balanced relationship with the two super powers. But, in fact, we saw this attempt at balance as a tilt towards the Soviet Union. We didn't accept the concept of parity between the superpowers. The White House, i.e., Kissinger, believed those who were not with us were almost by definition against us. Kissinger saw India as a Soviet surrogate over which we could have very little influence. So, although the Indians tried very hard with a small section of the Congress to build a pro-Indian constituency, they were never successful. They made their case worse because of their constantly complaining about our relationship with Pakistan. Nothing we could do in Pakistan suited the Indians. Every weapon system, every spare part we provided was seen as aimed at them, and they constantly berated us for a policy of supporting an authoritarian military regime, which was hostile to India, when in New Delhi's view, we ought to be supporting a democratic regime in India.

Q: Did you find in India's non-aligned stance in this period a lot of criticism of the United States but not of the Soviet Union, which when you get right down to it was a rather nasty, brutish empire?

QUAINTON: There is no doubt that India's criticism of the Soviet Union was always extremely nuanced. They took it for granted that we would appreciate their democracy, since they were a democracy and we were a democracy we were on the same side, and consequently they didn't need to posture and play up to us. They never saw it as being in their interest to criticize the authoritarian regime of the Soviet Union. We were never comfortable with that posture. We always wanted to hear words of support, praise and encouragement for ourselves, and the Indians were reluctant to praise us. Rather, they were quick to criticize faults in our society, but not in that of the Soviet Union, as they eventually found faults in our foreign policy, particularly our policy in Vietnam, which they saw as a legitimate struggle for national liberation by the Vietnamese people, which we in the eyes of many Indians were brutally trying to suppress. So, they always gave the Soviet Union the benefit of the doubt, although Mrs. Gandhi did speak out strongly at the time of the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968.

Q: In your contacts with people in the Indian embassy did they seem concerned about the fact that our two nations weren't really able to reach common understandings?

QUAINTON: Well, they were concerned because they saw the lack of rapport leading to a tilt towards Pakistan. They never understood our relationship with Pakistan. They refused willfully to understand it. They had already fought a couple of wars with Pakistan. It was not surprising that there was a certain level of paranoia, and they had fought a war with the Chinese, who were closely allied with the Pakistanis, so from an Indian point of view, American policy seemed quite hostile. We were never willing to help them in substantial military ways, although we continued throughout this period to provide enormous amounts of food aid and economic assistance, but that aid never in their minds balanced out our failure to support their strategic interests. Dr. Kissinger's view, reenforced by the Bangladesh war in 1971-72, that India had hegemonic desires in the region that the United States ought to oppose Indian strategic interests at the same time we praised India for its democracy. We also found the Indian economic system much more like the Soviet system and constantly criticized it. Of course, there were enormous differences between India and the Soviet Union, but there was a strong statist tradition in India, major industries were in the hands of the state, and the rhetoric of the Congress Party was socialistic. All of this we found objectionable. So there were all sorts of grounds for our concerns about India, as they had found grounds for their concerns about us. It was, in short, a very unhappy time.

The most unhappy moment during this time was Mrs. Gandhi's official visit to Washington in the late summer of 1971 as we strove to pull the Indians back from their confrontation with Pakistan which had been building up over the summer as a result of the flood of Pakistani refugees into India. We believed that the Indians were stimulating the flow of refugees in order to create a pretext for an invasion. That view, I think, was the view of Dr. Kissinger, but it was not the view of the India desk, which took much more seriously the legitimacy of the problems that India faced from more than 100,000 refugees. India had a real interest of stanching the flow of refugees. But that was not the view seen at the top of the national security system. Indeed, there were serious divisions of view throughout 1971 about Indian policy and the extent to which we should acknowledge the legitimacy of the Indian problems. We at the State Department did not know that Dr. Kissinger was engaged throughout much of this period in building a secret relationship with the Chinese relying on the Pakistanis. He regarded that initiative as a transcendent U.S. national interest, much more important than any short term relationship with India. I believed very passionately that our policy was wrong and wrote a number of dissent channel memos at the time criticizing the thrust of our policy towards the subcontinent and the tilt towards Pakistan, particularly at the time of war between India and Pakistan.

Q: Did you feel at the time that you were on the desk that our relationship with India and Pakistan was being orchestrated from the national security council and Dr. Kissinger?

QUAINTON: To a considerable extent in the Indo-Pakistan crisis, Dr. Kissinger called the shots from the White House. I think it is also fair to say that although the State Department had a more nuanced view of what was going on, Joe Sisco disliked the Indians intensely. He was a man who could not stand to be patronized and the Indians were marvelous patronizers of American officials, always treating them as though they were slightly dim-witted when it came to understanding the true realities of the world in which we lived. This was a constant underlying irritant in conversations with the Indians. The tendency that they had, and still have to some degree, of preaching about the tradition of Indian civilization, 5000 years against our cheeky 200. This constant Indian desire to put us down, perhaps arising from their own insecurity, cultural and otherwise, always made any dialogue with the Indians extremely difficult. We always saw them as posturing in ways that were not very agreeable.

In the Department there was not nearly the same enthusiasm for the Pakistani regime of Yahya Khan that was found in the White House. But, then the State Department was cut out, except at the very highest levels, from Dr. Kissinger's clandestine diplomatic efforts.

Q: What was causing the influx of refugees coming from what was then East Pakistan into Bengal?

QUAINTON: I think there was no question that a substantial part was the direct product of a very brutal regime of the East Pakistan military governor. Indian propaganda efforts may have encouraged that flow or at least made people more fearful of their lives and more disposed to flee. The migrants were almost exclusively Hindus. But the conditions in East Pakistan were really pretty difficult. There was a lot of internal fighting and reprisals against the Hindu population which led them to flee a truly oppressive and abusive Pakistani military government. This all has to be put against the background of the extraordinary migrations of only 25 years before in which millions of Indian Muslims and Hindus fled across the border mainly in the Punjab in the west but also across the border in Bengal.

Q: You were saying that elements in our government thought that the Indians were encouraging this refugee flow. Where was that coming from?

QUAINTON: I am not sure I can tell you the answer to that. Intelligence played an important role throughout the crisis. I think embassy reporting, our reading of the Indian press, and what we learned through our intelligence sources suggested that the Indians were not entirely unhappy that there was such a large refugee flow. Certainly at the time of the actual war and the despatch by us of the Enterprise to the Bay of Bengal it was Dr. Kissinger's very strong belief on the basis of the intelligence that he had seen that India was prepared to march into West Pakistan with a view of breaking up the West Pakistan state as it had already succeeded in breaking up a united Pakistan. I think those of us who saw the same intelligence felt it could be read in different ways, that contingency planning did not necessarily indicate intent, but that was a debate which was not joined until the United States was already committed to a particular policy with regard to the Indo-Pakistan conflict.

Q: So, the Dr. Kissinger school felt from its intelligence readings that India was planning to absorb East Pakistan, is that right?

QUAINTON: No, we were fearful that India was going to dismember West Pakistan. Certainly the Pakistanis fed us a great deal of information to that effect. There was close intelligence cooperation with the Pakistanis, and they were quick to report the machinations of Indian embassy officers. There was a large new Indian consulate general in Dacca, and this fanned the fears in Washington that the Indians had entirely nefarious intentions when it came to the existence of Pakistan. Dr. Kissinger and other believed that it was their desire to disable the Pakistani state permanently so that it would not pose any future threat. I don't think the Indians had such grandiose plans, but the Pakistanis certainly feared the Indians and used those fears to play on our own dislike of Indian policies in other areas.

Q: Was this a policy issue that was being fought within the Near Eastern bureau by various people within the bureau?

QUAINTON: There were differences of view in the Near Eastern bureau, particularly in the South Asian part which was composed of the two offices of Indian affairs and Pakistan affairs. There only other players were the assistant secretary, Joe Sisco, and the deputy assistant secretary, Chris Van Hollen. There was certainly a fair amount of difference of view between the two office directors and their staffs, although less than in the field where the two embassies became very passionate defenders of their respective governments throughout this crisis. The ambassador in Pakistan, Joseph Farland, a political appointee, was a strong believer in the good intentions, in the word of honor of Yahya Khan.

Q: Was it at that point that Arch Blood, who was the consul general in Dacca, was taking a different approach?

QUAINTON: That's right. He certainly described to Washington the brutality of the West Pakistani military in East Pakistan, and he documented it well. He urged on Washington a strong policy critical of the Islamabad regime, a policy which was not at all popular at the time.

Q: How did this play? Within the Department of State, if you have a professional consul general who is making a case which was not fabricated, there was a nasty Pakistan government regime there, and you have a political ambassador in Islamabad which would tend to make him somewhat suspect as an objective reporter, I would think that the professional ranks would tilt in the favor of India.

QUAINTON: I think the professional ranks did tilt in favor of India. Even so, Blood was perceived as being too emotionally engaged, and the image of dispassionate analysis, which the Foreign Service cultivates was not served by his strongly expressed views. I think he was conveying accurately the reality that we were dealing with, but his passion reached a level which led Dr. Kissinger to discount the reporting from East Pakistan as an extreme case of localitis and Arch Blood as somebody who couldn't see the larger picture, the totality of U.S. security interests. Of course, the China dimension was just as unknown to Arch Blood as it was to us on the desk.

Q: How did Mrs. Gandhi's visit turn out?

QUAINTON: The visit went extremely badly in substantive terms. Mrs. Gandhi was very feisty, very critical of the United States' tacit support for Pakistan. She denied any intention of using military action against West Pakistan but certainly didn't rule out the use of force in East Pakistan, notwithstanding our strong urging that she exercise restraint. She did not see us as willing to play a constructive role with Pakistan in stopping the flow of refugees or doing things that met India's immediate economic or political interests. We saw her as someone who had made up her mind to go after Pakistan. There really wasn't a very effective dialogue between the two governments at the time, although on the surface the visit seemed to have gone quite well, culminating in a formal state dinner at the White House.

Q: Was this a full state dinner?

QUAINTON: No, this was an official visit. But it was done with some style and the President gave a dinner in her honor.

Q: But, this was set up especially to try to work on this problem?

QUAINTON: Yes, she was invited to come.

Q: Did you get involved in the visit?

QUAINTON: Oh, we were deeply involved in the preparation of papers for the visit. Whether they were used or not one never knew. Certainly no one at the desk level sat in on the meetings. I think the country director was involved, Dave Schneider.

Q: On the India side of things did you find yourself having trouble dealing with Joe Sisco?

QUAINTON: No, actually Sisco was an officer who liked plain talk. He certainly was capable of it himself. He didn't try to suppress dissenting views within his own bureau. How far he reflected them above him I can't say. He did not, himself, have an entirely happy relationship with Dr. Kissinger. I think Dr. Kissinger saw him as one of the few State Department officers capable of independently managing an area of foreign policy. Joe Sisco didn't ask for a whole lot of advice from those above him. I still remember a meeting in the Situation Room at the White House called to discuss the Pakistan crisis. I was there as a Department notetaker. The meeting began not discussing South Asia but a problem of which I had no knowledge, dealing with the Egyptians. Sisco on his own authority had cabled the ambassador instructing him to see the president of Egypt on some matter or other. Dr. Kissinger came into the meeting and said, "Before we start talking about South Asia, I would like to comment on Egypt. Joe, I saw your cable which unfortunately was not cleared by the White House. I want to remind you of one thing. In this government we sing as a chorus, there are no solo voices." The great solo voice, himself, speaking. So, there was a fair amount of stress between Kissinger and Sisco, more in personal terms than in policy terms, but it ultimately spilled over, I think, into the policy arena.

Q: The Indians sent troops into East Pakistan?

QUAINTON: They did indeed.

Q: How did we react to this?

QUAINTON: We put tremendous pressure on the Indians to stop their advances. It was all over within a matter of days. East Pakistan fell, Bangladesh was proclaimed and then our efforts were to get the Indians out as quickly as possible. It was clear to us that there was no possibility of recreating a united Pakistan, although we didn't recognize Bangladesh for some time. I forget the exact timing. Our primary goal then was to get the Indians out as quickly as possible.

Q: Did we see Mrs. Gandhi, the prime minister, as somebody who was going to be around for a long time? Were we looking for more friendly people?

QUAINTON: Historically, we had always looked for sympathetic voices in the Congress Party. We assumed Mrs. Gandhi was firmly rooted, but it had been a constant effort, I believe, of some elements of the U.S. government to try to support less radical elements in the Congress Party than those represented by Nehru and then by Mrs. Gandhi. One of the great shadows over her visit was the fact that she had learned some time before the visit of covert operations against her father during the 1950s and felt that this was indicative of the real intentions of the United States government towards her and the Congress Party of which she was the leader.

Q: How did this come out that we were doing something against her father?

QUAINTON: Well, I think she learned of politicians who had been his opponents had been helped by the United States government in a variety of ways, financial and otherwise, which she thought was entirely improper. I never knew the details. Clearly these were not things publicly discussed. She certainly believed we had acted in this way, but whether or not we did is not a matter of public record.

ROBERT BAUER
Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
New Delhi (1967)

Mr. Bauer was born in Austria. During the Nazi period he was a devout anti-Nazi, and worked with the French in providing anti-German broadcasts to the world. He came to the United States in 1939, working initially in Cincinnati broadcasting to Europe, and subsequently with the USIA and Voice of America. During his career with USIA Mr. Bauer served in Vienna, Teheran, and Paris, and in Cairo and New Delhi he served as Cultural Affairs Officer. In Washington, he was the first Director of USIA's Foreign Press Center. Mr. Bauer was interviewed by Cliff Groce in 1989.

BAUER: No, that was done; that was the end of Egypt altogether. That was '67, and then I came back to the States, back to USIA. At the last minute I was asked to go to India. Dan Oleksiw had created new jobs there in which he appointed cultural affairs officers—to deal with foreign affairs. My job was to travel all over India to give lectures and talks about American foreign policy.

Q: As a cultural affairs officer?

BAUER: Yeah.

Q: It doesn't sound logical, but –

BAUER: There was another one who appointed to do economics, a third one to do art, and so forth. The problem I had is, I got in the midst of the Indo-Pakistan war, in which of course we sided with Pakistan official, and I had to defend the policy in India. Somebody said, "Why don't you go to Rome and tell the Pope that Martin Luther was right?" (Laughter) I said, "Give me a plane ticket and I'll go!" (Laughter) That would be easier.

Q: That's impossible!

BAUER: Oh, it was fascinating! It was fascinating. My wife traveled with me quite a bit, and we had very interesting moments.

Q: How did they receive these lectures? Did they even attend?

BAUER: Oh, yes, they did attend. I found a formula, a basic one. I came in, and after I was introduced I said to them, "Let me tell you this. I was once a lawyer, and a lawyer is used to being told, 'You hear both cases before you make your judgment.' So I am here today to give you the view of the United States government on the basic crisis. You will probably disagree with me, but what I have to tell you is the basic tenets of American foreign policy and how we view the crisis on the subcontinent." That usually did it.

Q: That disarmed them.

BAUER: What could they do—shoot me? I remember I spoke to all the members of the High Court in Nagpur, and they were all in their black robes, and the CAO who came with me said, "They'll probably hang you right now!" (Laughter) At the end, the presiding judge got up, and said, "Sir, we want to tell you that we of course all disagree with you, but as professionals we'd say you didn't make a bad case. Now let's go and have tea." (Laughter) So you could do it that way. On one or two occasions it got rougher, when they tried to show their anger. And in fact once the chairman said, "You don't have the floor now. We don't want to hear what you have to say." I said, "All right, goodbye. I'm leaving." That happened, too. It was a tough assignment but it was very interesting—all over India, into various universities all over the place.

LARRY LESSER
Consular Officer
New Delhi (1967-1969)

Lawrence Lesser was born in New York in 1940. He received his BA from Cornell University and his MA from the University of Minnesota. He was in the Peace Corps in Enugu, Nigeria in 1964 and 1965. His foreign assignments included New Delhi, Ouagadougou, Brussels, Kigali, and Dhaka. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on August 12, 2002.

Q: You went to India, where in India?

LESSER: New Delhi.

Q: You were there from when to when?

LESSER: I was there from early '67 to early '69.

Q: What was your impression of India from your vantage point when you got there?

LESSER: Well, my vantage point was the embassy and it was almost only the embassy for reasons which are easy to explain. I was supposed to be going into a two-year rotational program where you'd be in four different sections of the embassy. That program didn't remain in force for very long and the embassy couldn't easily accommodate me in that program because there was a staffing crisis in the consular section. As a result, I went into the consular section less than two months after I got there and I stayed there the whole time. It was just a two-officer section, hard to believe now. Only two American officers in consular affairs and with one of them, the senior one, rotating very rapidly I couldn't go out, couldn't travel around, couldn't take much leave. We didn't have much money anyway, so it may have been for the best. So, I saw India primarily from the vantage point of people who came to the embassy and most of them of course were coming trying to get visas to go to the United States. In my travels, well, India was coming out of a very serious drought and famine disaster not specifically in the New Delhi area, but further east especially in Bihar state. It was a country that was definitely struggling. Indira Gandhi was the Prime Minister. I wasn't involved in political or economic reporting, you know, and I never became an expert. The fact that Indira was the Prime Minister meant that relations at the very top were uneasy. She was very suspicious of the U.S. government, and there were a few incidents during that two-year period which exacerbated it. One was the defection of Stalin's daughter in New Delhi which happened just before I started working in the consular section. A few weeks later and I might have been the consular officer who issued her a visa. Another incident was the head of the Smithsonian who was a birdwatcher in the Himalayas in India and Nepal and became suspected of being really a spy because of the stories in the late '60s about CIA money going into otherwise innocent organizations to help finance their being able to see whatever they saw and write reports on whatever they wrote. But in India it was interpreted as hostile activity. The Israeli six-day war, India took a position that was more pro-Arab than the Arab countries and Indira was criticized for that in the Indian parliament, but once again, it was an uneasy thing. Shortly after my tour there, the AID mission, which actually was responsible for something like 1,000 staff and contract employees, was radically cut and U.S. relations became much less close. We also had at that time a very serious question of what to do with the extremely large rupee accounts the U.S. government had accumulated through the PL-480 food program. They couldn't be spent by the U.S. government as fast as they were accumulating and it gave the U.S. government an inordinate influence over the stability of the Indian economy. That issue wasn't resolved until some years later.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

LESSER: Chester Bowles. A man in history and a great man I think.

Q: Did you run across him at all?

LESSER: Yes, I did. He was very accessible to everybody and most of his country team meetings were rather large affairs, not just limited to agency and section chiefs. Anyway, I was de facto section chief for consular affairs a lot of the time because as I said we had a vacancy in the senior position so I represented the consular section. One small footnote-to-history anecdote, I mentioned that the Indian government took a position that was more anti-Israeli than the Arab countries in the '67 war and Ambassador Bowles was concerned about that because he loved India and Mrs. Bowles loved India and they were beloved by enormous numbers of Indians, including the cosmopolitan ones at the top and including regular folks. So, he said he was going back to the States to do a little lobbying and he says essentially what I'm going to do is, the Indians will have been there and I'm going to come in after them and say, don't pay attention to what the Indians just told you. They don't really know sometimes how to advance their own interests. The Indians will sound very hawkish and anti-Israel, which may be problematical for the U.S. government, but when push comes to shove, the Indians aren't going to make a lot of trouble on these things. Don't take what they say, their public statements, too seriously. Don't let their foolish statements affect our assistance programs because India is in desperate need and the programs are working. Family planning is working; food production programs are working. The small business financing is working. That was a kind of a visionary view. Even at my tender age of late '20s I thought, at some point somebody's got to take what the Indians say at face value. They have to make their own case and they have to be accountable for what they say. Of course we did go through a lot of years of uneasy relations with India.

Q: I mean it's always been one of the peculiar things, that, here you have this major democracy, really major democracy and the United States and yet they were essentially estranged for a very long time.

LESSER: Yes, indeed. Bowles used to say frequently and it still appears in rhetoric that we are the world's two largest democracies.

Q: Yes. There also has been an underlying theme of the relationship that a number of our ambassadors have sort of fallen in love with India and have you might say given India essentially a free ride as far as we're concerned, well, don't pay any attention to what they say, let's keep, you know, supporting India and all rather than, play it cool both as far as assistance and all that. There were times when Indira and her father turned to the Soviet Union.

LESSER: Well, let me tell you a story about that although it's not from my personal experience but it is reflected in Bowles's writings. I haven't read his version of it, so let me just give my recollection of what he said to the country team. Bowles had two tours of duty as ambassador to India. I was there during his second one. He was suffering from Parkinson's disease and he was beginning to show some effects in terms of not being able to go for long meetings. He was an excellent golfer, for example, but he only would play a few holes because it was as much as his constitution would permit. A few years earlier, Nehru was the prime minister and Kennedy was the president and Bowles's great plan was to address exactly what you're talking about, Stu, and try to get a much better relationship between India and the United States as the world's two great democracies. He put together a package and it was going to involve military assistance as well as economic assistance and he got approval from the highest level of the Indian government to discuss it with President Kennedy. He arranged a trip to Washington in order to bring the matter up. He was scheduled to meet with Kennedy on November 23, 1963, but Kennedy was shot in Dallas the day before. So, Bowles came back to India. He didn't have a personal relationship with LBJ, but even so, he put the agenda back together again after several months and he scheduled a trip to go and talk to LBJ about an historic shift by which India would reduce its closeness to the Soviet Union and come closer to us. The week before he was to go Nehru died, and Shastri became the interim prime minister, but he didn't have anything like Nehru's power and it was out of the question that he could carry the Indian government into a historic shift of alliances. So, the opportunity was lost once and for all. Bowles told the embassy staff that in addition to the bad luck that made this proposal not happen, he really believed also, and I think he was right, that to make really historic shifts you probably need a crisis. You need everybody to know that the old system is intolerable, that it's broken down irrevocably. You couldn't have made that case on relations with India because India was too remote from the United States and not strategically at the very forefront of our interests. It would be hard to get the attention of people who are very busy worrying about putting out fires or addressing crises around the world when India wasn't one. Still, Bowles thought he got close and that he might just have been able to carry it off if it hadn't been for those accidents of history - the untimely deaths of JFK and Nehru.

Q: We had a Secretary of State, Dean Rusk, who was consumed by Vietnam.

LESSER: Yes, that's true and he was also really no particular friend of Chester Bowles. Bowles had been exiled to India by the Kennedy administration. There you are.

Q: Now, in the visa section, in the first place, in the consular function, let's take the visa side first. Who was coming, there is a considerable Indian population in the United States today, but that came later on.

LESSER: Well, when you see the people with Indian names who are the heads of cutting edge corporations, dot-coms particularly, but technologically advanced companies, most of those guys got their visas in the late '60s.

Q: Was it mainly students?

LESSER: Yes, more yes than no. We had a very high demand and the largest number were for students. We also had exchange visitors who were sort of the same thing as students, except their sponsorship is different. There was a trickle of tourists and a trickle of business people and of course we had immigrants. The Immigration and Naturalization Act was seriously amended - the end of national quotas occurred during the period I was there and the changeover occurred so that instead of having the largest number of immigrant visas available to people of European origin, it was evenly spread across the entire world according to demand with a maximum of 25,000 from any one country. I don't remember what the world total was, but something like 170,000. There was going to be a mad rush for visas from countries like India where many people could qualify and would want to go for the opportunities. I actually experienced a big wave of applications from Indians at the beginning of the big updraft so that of course gets to what you were saying, that the largest number occurred later. It was more or less directly as a result of the change in the act.

Q: Were you finding any problems with the people who came to you for visas?

LESSER: Every consular officer has this statutory problem that a person applying for a non-immigrant visa, including student visas of course, is presumed to be an intending immigrant unless they can establish to the satisfaction of the consular officer at the time of application that they're going for a legitimate short-term purpose. Well, that can be tricky. If you have a young, bright Indian student who is a recent graduate from the Indian Technological Institute in Kanpur, and he now wants to go for graduate study and you ask him, what do you want to do with your life after that. He hasn't been coached and he might say, gee I don't know, but it sure would be nice to work for one of the technologically advanced companies - for IBM or Dupont or a pharmaceutical company, and you would have to tell him, well, I'm very sorry in that case you can't get a non-immigrant visa, you can't get a student visa, you'll have to get an immigrant visa. He might say, well, fine, then give me one. You say, not so fast, we don't have them to give because the process, we're backed up. We've got several years wait of people who are already qualified and you haven't prequalified yet. Of course, every Indian student worth his salt already knows that and they would never be so foolish to answer a question like that. It's a little foolish of a consular officer to ask it also, because what are we trying to do here? A young person's life is all before him. It seems to me you don't want to ask him to make a silly commitment.

Q: Well, I think this is one of the things when one tries to be as relaxed, well, it depends where you are. But it's a highly qualified; I was in Korea in the '70s and we had a lot of people, you didn't know what they're going to do, but you never know where a student is really going to end up. As long as they weren't going to some fly-by-night school in order to bypass the immigration regulations, but it depends on the consular officer.

LESSER: Yes, it depends on a lot of things. During the time I was there a fellow with an Indian surname won the Nobel Prize in chemistry. He was a researcher at the University of Michigan or Michigan State (to the best of my recollection) and he was an American citizen. He had been in earlier years a student visa applicant and had changed status and had become a Nobel Prize winning scientist in the United States. The Indian newspapers had banner headlines saying "Indian wins Nobel Prize for chemistry." They said, he's an Indian and he won it and it's a pity that the brain drain, which was a popular term at the time, had occurred and we had lost his brain to America. A day or two later one of the Indian papers had an editorial comment which said, we didn't lose his brain, he's got an American brain. If he had stayed in India, who are you kidding, he never could have done the work that produced the Nobel Prize because our labs aren't equipped and our culture doesn't encourage people to that level of excellence. So, the world is a better place because he went to America where he could do what he was so well equipped to do. We should take pride in it, too, but it's not an issue, it's not something that we should say, shows that we shouldn't let fellows like him get away. I thought, there's an awful lot of common sense there.

Q: Absolutely. Did you have problems with brides going over and that sort of thing?

LESSER: You mean?

Q: Indian young women who are being sent to get married and that sort of thing?

LESSER: You know, I don't recall it as a problem. I understand that it could have been a question. I had a couple of amusing incidents with American men who came over to India to find a bride and bring her back over.

Q: How did that work?

LESSER: One fellow in particular said he had tried American wives and they talk back too much and they just don't mind. He had now studied the matter and he was going to get an Asian bride, and India looked like a very good place for it. He was enough self-conscious to ask me if I was married and I said I was. He said, "Is your wife American?" I said, "She is." He said, "Well, your wife may not be like that, but the law of averages or the statistical average says that American women don't make good wives and Asian women do. I wish you well in your marriage, Mr. Lesser, but I tried it and it didn't work and I want an Asian bride now." So, he came back a couple of months later with a young woman from South India who had been at an orphanage. She was, I guess she must have been 16 or 17, but she looked younger. She didn't speak a word of English. She only spoke Malayalam and believe me this fellow didn't speak any Malayalam. But he had selected her. She was very pretty and she looked very alert and it looked to me like given his terms of reference, he'd probably done very well, but now what about her. I thought she's probably doing well, too, because she's an orphan. She has no real future in India and she looks like she's bright and capable and all she needs is a chance. Now I thought he was deluded if he thought he could bring her to the States and have her wait on him hand and foot and be undyingly grateful that he had brought her to America. It seemed to me that it wouldn't take but a few years before she would learn to drive, learn to watch TV, learn to go to the supermarket, learn to make friends, and figure out what her rights were. If he wasn't a good husband, then he would be an ex-husband and she would have her green card and eventually become a citizen. So, I didn't have any great compunctions about it. There were incidences like that.

I'm very proud to be an American and to have represented the U.S. government, but we're individuals first. We're human beings and we have to think about how best to conduct our own lives. I'm satisfied that I found a good way to conduct mine and I want to be respectful of people I encounter along the way and give them every opportunity to fulfill their own potential.

Q: Did you find this in conflict with your duties as a consular officer?

LESSER: It could be. It could be if you took a very literal and very non-flexible view that your duties were you could be denying people things that a closer analysis would show it would be to everyone's advantage - not just to that individual's advantage, but to everyone's advantage - to have ruled a different way. Certainly the Indian, one time Indian, now American, who won the Nobel Prize in chemistry, the world's a better place because he did that work. A very inflexible consular officer might have said I don't think you're coming back to India and I'm not going to let you go to America. Who would have benefitted? Nobody at all.

Q: During the late '60s and all was the time of the hippie Americans and you know one of the things that inspires them to get out there with the backpacks with hashish and drugs and all this. As a consular officer, did you get involved in the protection and welfare of these?

LESSER: Yes, Mr. Stu Kennedy, I did. Around the embassy I was nicknamed the "hippie control officer." We didn't have a great many hippies in New Delhi, and the Indian authorities were pretty reasonable. They didn't want to load up their jails with scruffy looking Americans, but from time to time an American would get arrested because he was troublesome to a landlord or misbehaved or lost his mind.

One little anecdote about hippies. I got interviewed one time by the AP correspondent. He might have been a stringer. He asked me about hippies and I told him a little bit about hippies. He was referred to me because I was the consular officer. I said, "I don't actually see very many hippies because they don't like to come to the embassy." Then it occurred to me to mention to him, "By the way, not all the hippies are Americans anyway." He said, "Oh, that's an interesting angle. What percentage are Americans?" I said, "Look, for beginners I don't know how many Americans there are because as I already told you they don't check in with the embassy, and I certainly don't know how many are not American." He said, "Well, you'd be in the best position to make an estimate." He kind of badgered me and I was a young guy and kind of naive. I said I don't know, I don't know. I said finally, "If I had to pick a number out of the air or out of my ear I would say maybe 30% to 40% are American and not more." He said, "Okay, thanks." He wrote an article in which he said blah, blah, less than 40% of the hippies are Americans. Fortunately, he didn't say that that was an official figure given to him by an embassy representative. So, I figured I was out of the woods on that one, but he did say it as though it was the definitive truth. End of story.

Some months later we had some hippie problems that brought a senior police officer to my office, saying they needed a little more cooperation, a little better: "We want to coordinate with you on how to deal with an influx of hippies who are breaking laws." I received him and we talked and I said at one point, "By the way, you know, I hope you're going to other embassies, too because not all of the hippies are Americans." He said, "Oh, we know that. Less than 40% are Americans." I said, "Where did you find that out?" He said, "What do you mean?" I told him the story and I said I'd be very interested if it turned out I was right and somebody had done a study and confirmed it. But, I said, I have my suspicions. He said, "Oh, yes, we did do a study and it is right." I didn't think he was sincere and I think he was embarrassed. I don't think anybody ever did a study because it's hard to study, and who cares?

Q: Was there, did you have any problems with American born women marrying Indian students coming back and then having children and having problems leaving the country and not getting along with the family and that sort of thing?

LESSER: I can't say we didn't, but I don't remember any. That seems to me to be something that happened later for the most part. There must have been isolated cases, but I don't remember any.

Q: Often I think particularly you have a society such as India where the family is very close. If sonny boy goes off and marries a foreign wife and comes back and she finds that she's supposed to wait on her mother-in-law and all this and American women don't cotton to this.

LESSER: Yes, indeed. Well, you see, my American visitor who wanted an Indian wife understood that. Yes, I know it happened, it happened, a version of that happened with some good friends of ours there, but it wasn't a consular case.

Q: Were there any provocations problems while you were there?

LESSER: I don't think so. It was a very peaceful time really, even though at the level of the highest politics there were tensions between the United States and India. Not much happened at ground level. We did have what turned into a public order problem on the day that the new immigration law went into effect because Indian visa marketers, visa fixers, had been drumming up business and saying that the United States was going to be recruiting laborers to come. We knew we were going to get a lot of inquiries, but we underestimated just how large the crowd was going to be and we had more than 1,000 people at the door clamoring to get in. We only had a small office really. We hadn't even printed up enough copies of the information, but most of those people, that wouldn't have done much except I guess you could have gotten them to leave if you said, here take this and come back when you're ready. We did actually have to call in the marine security guards to close down the building and get help from the Indian police to disperse the crowd. Of course it wasn't a hostile crowd; these were people who wanted to be Americans.

Q: Under the old immigration law, I used to, you know I was in Dhahran in the '50s and we had people working for airlines on Bahrain where I used to go and these Indians would come up to me and ask were their immigration applications coming along. I dutifully looked over and said, well, it's moved up. Instead of having to wait 112 years, you only have to wait 110 years and they'd smile, you know, progress was being made.

LESSER: Good one.

Q: Did you and your wife, were you able to have any Indian friends or not?

LESSER: Yes, I would say in India it's not difficult to get around in the kind of cosmopolitan level of Indian society. People like to have American friends. I guess I should say liked, but I think it's probably still true and so we did some entertaining, although I was in a nonrepresentational position. It wasn't part of my job. We got a lot of invitations. Indians also, the wealthy class of Indians, can entertain lavishly, so it's not like a couple of my posts in Africa where your African friends really could not invite you to their homes, they just weren't set up that way. In India you had people who were like pashas and they were also well traveled. There's a kind of an international class. I'm sure you hear this in a lot of the interviews. International people are more like each other than they are like the man in the street in their country of origin.

Q: Now, we're moving up to 1969. Did our involvement in Vietnam cause any problems?

LESSER: It was pretty distant in my official life. Again as a consular officer, I'm sure Vietnam figured importantly in our bilateral relations with India, but none of that filtered down to me. Now, that was also the period when Robert Kennedy and then Martin Luther King, Jr. were assassinated. So we, 1968 was a seminal year in America and I wasn't home in the US for a single day of that year and I feel as though that's a hole in my life. I didn't, for that matter know much about the '68 democratic convention where Mayor Daley's minions beat up the demonstrators. I was very distant from that. We were of course generally aware of it, but we didn't have CNN then and so for the most part we got just bulletins on a current basis and the fuller story you didn't get until several days later. If I can get back to the question that triggered all of those reflections, Vietnam was also pretty distant. There was a little pressure on Foreign Service people to volunteer to go to Vietnam. We would get circulars from the Department saying that we're going to give you some career advantages if you volunteer, and I went home to my wife one day and said, you know, I really feel as though I have to consider volunteering to go there. Even though I had very serious reservations about the war, and was very dubious about the kinds of statements - the body counts and McNamara types of things that justified our continued involvement there and said that we were winning and there was light at the end of the tunnel. Even so, I thought well, if people like me don't volunteer to go there, then we're leaving it to the people who I think have poor judgment, so I should volunteer, shouldn't I? My wife said, "Well, if you feel that way, then go ahead and do it, but when you come back you'll have to find a different wife." By this time I had two children; my daughter was born in India. My son had been born in Nigeria. I had very strong family feelings. I thought, okay, I read you loud and clear and I didn't volunteer and the Department didn't twist my arm to go.

Q: Well, then 1969, whither? Where did you go then?

RICHARD PODOL
Program Officer, USAID
New Delhi (1967-1970)

Richard Podol was born in Chicago in 1928. He attended the University of Iowa, where he received his B.A., M.A. and Ph.D. He became involved in the Foreign Service in 1954. Mr. Podol has worked in India, Tanzania, Bangladesh, Zaire, and Uganda. He was interviewed by W. Haven North in September 1996.

PODOL: I just moved down the road to India.

Q: To do what? What was your position?

PODOL: I was the Chief of the Program Office.

Q: You left the technical area and moved into Mission management, right?

PODOL: Right. To show you sometimes how recruiting was done, when I was in Nepal still, Ernie Stern, whom I had known from Turkey days and was the Deputy in India, came up to Nepal on a visit. We got to talking and he said, "We're looking for a Program Officer. How would you like to try it?" I said, "Sure." Over the objections of AID Washington, who didn't think I was qualified, the Mission Director - who was very well-known: John Lewis - agreed and I came down. This was the time when India was the largest AID program, other than, of course, Vietnam.

Q: It was a very exciting time, with those people to work for, the stars in the development business?

PODOL: Absolutely. It was a very high-powered Mission.

Q: Tell us about your work there.

PODOL: Mostly, working with the Indians was a very different experience from anything that I had had before. The Indians had a very superior attitude toward foreigners. In fact, they could be very arrogant, until you got to know them well. They are the most philosophical and intellectually-minded people that I have ever known. This is the way they approached any kind of situation: from an intellectual, philosophical point of view. Their knowledge base is far superior to that of we Americans, in their fields: philosophy, for example. But their hands-on experience was minimal.

Let me give you an example. We had a Minerals Advisor. This was a huge Mission. We had a Minerals Advisor. His grandfather had been a very well-known American philosopher. In fact, there's a building at the University of California named after him. The first time he met his new counterpart, he was asked, "Are you related to so and so?" He said, "Yes, he was my grandfather." The man said, "Well, I've read all his books" and he started quoting chapters of verse from his grandfather's works. And the guy said, "Gee, what have I gotten myself into?" This was a geologist. They went out in the field and our guy started pointing out certain rock formations and the Indian was lost. He had not done field work. His academic work was in the university, in the classroom, not the field work. This turned out to be very typical of India at that time. The Indians in the laboratory did excellent work, but they would not go out on the field and get their shoes dirty, or their hands muddied. You had to drag them out of the laboratory into the fields on the research side. It's the same mentality I mentioned earlier: we've got peons that can go out and do that kind of work; we don't have to do it. I found that, if you wanted to work with Indians on something like economics, you couldn't have a more skilled group of people. Today, you want software engineers? Get Indians. Their mentality is such that they do brilliant work in this field. But you want people to go out and survey the field? That's where they're lagging. That's changing today.

Q: Let's look at the larger picture of why we had such a major program in India. You were in the Program Office, so you were writing the strategic plans.

PODOL: Actually, I don't know that there was such a thing at that time. In fact, this was the time we set up the first Evaluation Officer positions. We didn't have that either. Why were we in India? Because India was of political importance. I'd come there just after the border war they had with China, so this increased our AID efforts there. We were trying to move India over to the Western side from their generally neutral position, and sometimes their anti-American position. So we had this enormous program - PL 480 as well as dollar programs.

Q: What was the strategy or the concept behind what you decided to do or not to do?

PODOL: This was here in the days when AID did everything and, you name the field, we were into it in India.

Q: Such as?

PODOL: Labor Unions.

Q: What other areas?

PODOL: We were into developing - this was one of our special efforts - an Indian university of technology. We were trying to develop six agriculture universities.

Q: You mentioned mining.

PODOL: Yes, and science. We were developing curriculum for high school science programs. The National Science Foundation was involved in training teachers. You did much of it in India. You brought people out because the payoff was so much greater.

Q: You were heavily in the macroeconomic aspect of it.

PODOL: Oh, yes. And trying to get India to adopt certain macroeconomic policies.

Q: Were you involved in those discussions?

PODOL: No. This was John Lewis, the Mission Director. This was his field. Getting India to devalue, for example. Indira Gandhi was Prime Minister and she wasn't exactly pro-American in any shape or form, so it was difficult to work with her.

Q: What kind of program were you trying to cover or promote? What did you think were important?

PODOL: We had a major export promotion project, too. My interest personally was in institution building. The Indians are very good at setting up organizations. If you go to India, you will find a society or an organization for every subject imaginable and they function. So, to get the Indians to organize, to set up institutions, was a norm in that country. Also, the Indian university system, unlike other developing countries, was close to 100 years old. So you had second or third generation people who had graduated from a British-style university, that kind of a background. So you had a tremendous pool of basic manpower. Participant training and institutions were, I think, the best thing we could do. Our influence over Indian macroeconomic policy was very limited. That was an interference in their sovereignty. We had a Participant Training Branch that was part of the Program Office, with two Americans and 12 Indians in it. We published a monthly journal that was distributed all over the country. We held return participant seminars and surprised everybody. We'd have a return participant seminar with an industrial topic and get 75 or 80 people in attendance.

Q: Do you remember any figures about how many participants you had?

PODOL: I don't.

Q: But it was very large?

PODOL: Very large. The two most successful institutions - and I was back in India in '92 and '93 and they functioned - we developed and trained the staff of one of the Indian Institutes of Technology. They had set these up in different parts of the country. It's now the leading MIT of India. A major program was trying to establish agriculture universities. Now you got into a real political hassle. India has a federal system, as does the United States. When you talk about agriculture universities, they are state institutions. The states had an Agriculture Extension Service and an Agriculture Research Service. As you set up a university on an American model, Extension Research would go to that university and out of the hands of your traditional civil servants. So you ran into enormous resistance in trying to organize agriculture through the agriculture university. In some states, it worked very well and, in others, it never got much off the ground because of the resistance.

Q: What were the specifics? You mean bringing the three elements together?

PODOL: Bringing education and extension and research together in one institution or organization, merging them under the university, as we do in the United States.

Q: Where did this work?

PODOL: It worked best in the Punjab. Why, and I think this is important, the Punjab in the '60s was very unsettled and refugee-centered. In the 1947 partition of India, the Muslims who had lived in the Punjab picked themselves up and went to Pakistan. The Sikhs that were living across the new border, in what was now Pakistan, came into India's Punjab. So, you had a refugee type situation, which in effect upset the stability of the old system, the old way of thinking, and which made people, in my mind, very much more receptive to change. I've seen this elsewhere also. So, it worked very well in the Punjab.

Q: Were there other places it worked?

PODOL: It worked moderately well in other places, too, in India. Punjab was the ideal situation. They did excellent research, which was put in the farmer's fields and used.

Q: What did you feel about the effectiveness of the university program in general?

PODOL: I thought it was very effective. If you look at what's happened in the last 30 years, India is now self-sufficient in food grains.

Q: Do you attribute that in large measure to the university program?

PODOL: Well, how can you say? But they did have a significant impact on it, but there are a lot of factors that geared up - there were a lot of other things that were done, too.

Q: Do you remember how many universities you were working with?

PODOL: I think we tried five or six. The Punjab, when I left, was the one that was successful further on. Some of the others are still in existence and are working, but not at as high a level of effectiveness.

Q: What other institutions were you associated with? Science and Technology-

PODOL: Those are the two that stand out.

Q: Were there others in other fields?

PODOL: We worked in the labor movement.

Q: What about Public Administration, your specialty? Were there any programs in that area?

PODOL: We had a Public Administration Advisor. We were working with the Public Administration Institute, but I can't really recall any significant results.

Q: What other aspects of the program stand out in your mind? You talked about the problem of institutional development as being your interest. What were you trying to do? How do you view that subject in that context?

PODOL: In the first year, I was trying to learn the job, so it took me a while to settle in on this. My interest is in what I just mentioned: trying to see that we could have the resources to do the research program and the Indian Institute of Technology program. By 1968, the cutbacks in personnel had started. My function then was implementing "BALPA," to come up with a new plan, a staffing pattern for the Mission, based on the cutbacks that were required. I think we had something like 125 direct hire and I don't know how many contract people. The other unique element was local currency. Because of the PL 480 program, which I'll get to in a minute, we had unlimited local currency to use in our program. My counterpart in the Ministry of Finance would go to the Parliament and say, "This is American money, so we can't deny it to them." We would tell Washington, "This is Government of India money, so they can do as they wish." It worked out very well. In fact, in dollar terms, we had more Indian rupees than we did dollars to carry out our Technical Assistance Program. We could do all kinds of studies, hire competent Indian personnel because of these rupees. The Mission Director at the time asked me, "How many Indians are we paying the salary for?" When I told him, he said, "Bury it." There were hundreds, including contract people. All our contractors had Indian staffs. One thing that I didn't mention was that family planning was one of our largest programs. This was the time when it was just getting started, family planning.

Q: Was it making an impact at that time?

PODOL: Yes, it was just beginning to do so. We got into the usual arguments. All you had to do was distribute contraceptives. No, you had a social problem and you had to work on the social side of changing attitudes. We had that big debate going on with Washington.

Q: What was the Indian reaction to all this debate? What was their view?

PODOL: They thought, given the Indian way of thinking, that it was a social problem, which it was. How do you get people to limit their family size? And Washington was pushing all their colored condoms. The big Indian program was the vasectomies in railroad stations.

Q: Were we involved in that?

PODOL: No. We weren't involved-

Q: Not even with the local currency?

PODOL: Well, our local currency was going everywhere, so, indirectly, I suppose we were.

Q: Also, India was the pioneer in the whole community development area. Was any of that going on while you were there?

PODOL: No.

Q: It had come to an end?

PODOL: Right.

Q: Do you have any recollection of the results of that effort or why it collapsed?

PODOL: Not any strong ones. People felt it was a failure. I don't recall why they felt it had failed.

Q: But we were not involved in anything like that?

PODOL: No, not at that time. In the villages, you had a power structure that made change very difficult. The caste system relegated large numbers of villagers to serve in menial activities. Back on PL 480, we were generating the bulk of these rupees through imports of wheat, primarily, because India was deficient and had back to back droughts in, I think, '64-'65. So, we might bring in $300-400 million in grain. At one time, we owned a very substantial portion of the Indian rupee, at least on paper. We gave them back eventually. The other program was PL 480 Title II. We had the largest Title II program anywhere - I don't know about Vietnam. We were feeding, at one time, over 20 million Indians under Title II, all being carried out under organizations like CARE. I remember two people coming out from OMB and saying, "How can you do this? We can't afford to do this. We're going to get out of this activity." Of course, we never did. We still have a Title II program in India.

Q: This was for schoolchildren mostly?

PODOL: You name it, but, yes, there were more in school feeding than anything else, but you name it. It was effective. We were feeding 20 million people. Not all of them were needy. I remember going into one industrial conclave and we were feeding the families of the workers. These were people fully employed. These weren't the poor. With 20 million people to feed.

Q: Do you know how much the budget was for this?

PODOL: No, I don't remember the dollar figures.

Q: Why was it so hard to get out of?

PODOL: Politics, both on the U.S. and the Indian side. If we got out, the Indians would think we were abandoning them. And then the power of the voluntary agencies, lobbying back here for continuation of their programs.

Q: This was your first experience with Program Office work? What was your experience doing that kind of work, compared to being an expert on public administration?

PODOL: Let's say I really liked both but from a different standpoint. Being a field person working with people 100 percent, that was great. Great experience, you made a lot of friends, had a lot of freedom to do what you wanted to do, if you had the right boss. That was great. You could see things happening. You could see that you had accomplished something. When you move into Mission management, you're one step removed and you can't say that you've done it. You could step back and look at the larger picture of what you're doing and see a total program and how it's impacting and maybe say that you've had some influence on that total program and the direction in which it's going. And I liked management.

Q: Is that a big step, I guess?

PODOL: We had, I think, three or four Americans and a dozen or so Indians.

Q: How have you thought of them as staff?

PODOL: Excellent. They provided all the number crunching. They did an excellent job. I was back there in '93 and '94 and one former employee of mine was still working for the AID Mission as the Budget Officer. They're good, really good. This is the kind of thing they really do well.

Q: At that time, you say, we could do almost anything. What was the development philosophy that you were getting out of the Washington guidance, or wasn't there any?

PODOL: I don't remember anything special.

Q: This was prior to the New Directions?

PODOL: Yes.

Q: But you don't recall any particular-

PODOL: No, this was still in the days when we recruited Mission Directors from outside. We had very powerful individuals in their own right, very respected. John Lewis had been on the Council of Economic Advisors, he'd written a book on Indian development. Who was going to challenge him? Nobody in Washington was going to challenge him.

Q: How did you find him to work for?

PODOL: He was fine, a fine person to work for.

Q: What was his particular passion or drive in terms of working in India, do you know at all?

PODOL: One, because of his background: macroeconomic policy. And second, working with the poor. He had a feel for both and he was interested in both.

Q: Could you elaborate on those two, what he was trying to do?

PODOL: With India, there were two issues. One was loosening up the restrictions on imports. The Indians were preaching self-sufficiency. So, one of the policy aims we had was to loosen up and try and get them to stop building inefficient industries that couldn't stand on their own feet, and allow imports, instead of import substitution, which was their policy. The other was the devaluation of the Indian rupee, which tied in with imports and exports.

Q: What was he trying to do?

PODOL: This is why he was supporting family planning programs, Title II programs, working with labor unions, and agriculture programs that would reach the small farmer. Most farms, they were small farms. So agriculture, because it was geared to the small farm, agriculture research-

Q: That went beyond university projects and-?

PODOL: In the states in which there was no university, we worked with the agriculture extension system and agriculture credit.

Q: But otherwise, you were working through the university?

PODOL: That was the thrust where the Mission was going, though it hadn't abandoned the old approach because the Indians hadn't abandoned it yet.

Q: You were working with extension services in each of these areas as well?

PODOL: Not in all the states, no. That was beyond our capability.

Q: Were there any particular regions of India, apart from the Punjab, where you thought things were working better?

PODOL: Maharashtra, the Western part of India.

Q: Were there factors that could explain that?

PODOL: No, I can't say that there were, except the sea coasts had been involved with foreign trade and foreigners for centuries--so much more exposed to outside ideas than Bihar and U.P.

Q: Okay. You were in India for two years?

PODOL: Until 1970 - April '67 until June 1970, three years.

Q: Let's move on from India. What was the next assignment?

HERBERT G. HAGERTY
Political Officer
New Delhi (1967-1970)

Herbert G. Hagerty was born in New Jersey in 1932. He graduated from Columbia University in 1954 and from the University of Pennsylvania with a MA in 1956 before joining the US Navy. After joining the Foreign Service, Hagerty served overseas in India, Norway, the United Kingdom, Pakistan, and Sri Lanka. In Washington DC, he served as the Director of the Office of Pakistan, Afghanistan, and Bangladesh Affairs and as the Director of the Office of Intelligence Liaison. Hagerty was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: Which is about lieutenant colonel? Did you have any idea after two years you were getting ready to go?

HAGERTY: FSR-4 was more the equivalent of major or lieutenant commander in the military. And yes, I was ready to go. Early in 1967, Carol asked me one day if I would like to go to the domestic politics job opening up soon in Delhi. She thought I would be the ideal person for it, and I agreed!

Q: Sounds great. How did your wife feel about this?

HAGERTY: She seemed excited about the opportunity it afforded me it, but her own transition to not having her own job and to Foreign Service life in India went badly. Sadly, our marriage broke up there a year later.

Q: In Washington?

HAGERTY: No, in New Delhi.

Q: Well, then you went out when?

HAGERTY: Went out in June '67, right in the middle of the Six-Day War in the Middle East.

Q: Okay, we're going to pick this up in 1967 when you're off to New Delhi as political officer. Great.

This is August 3, 2001. Herb, you were in India from '67 to when?

HAGERTY: Until June '70.

Q: Okay, let's talk a bit about what were sort of the India-American relations at the time you went out there in '67?

HAGERTY: Well, Mrs. Gandhi had just visited from Washington while I was Desk Officer. Lyndon Johnson was making an effort to have a decent relationship with India, but India was going through some difficult times. There had been monsoon failure a couple of years before resulting in serious food problems, which the PL480 program was helping meet. PL480 wheat going into Calcutta, for instance, was keeping Calcutta from draining the countryside of food. And India needed massive foreign assistance to support its ambitious development plans. The relationship we had with Pakistan, of course, was a factor in our limited relationship with India. I heard Carol Laise once muse that the U.S. relationship with India and Pakistan was like a man's relationship with a wife and a mistress: India, "the mistress," and Pakistan, "the wife."

Ambassador Bowles at the time had decided that his political officers didn't know enough economics and his economic officers didn't know enough politics, so he created two political-economic sections, one dealing with India's internal affairs and the with, India's external policies. He expected us to be able to talk about economics as well as our political work. We referred to them jokingly as "gynecology" and "dermatology wings." My responsibilities were for Indian domestic politics, as well as the internal politics of Indian-held Kashmir.

Q: Okay, before we move on to what you were seeing and working there, how did you view Bowles as an ambassador?

HAGERTY: He was well motivated with regard to India, but his vision of India was one that India kept failing to meet. He wanted India to be more open to free enterprise, less caught up in a socialistic planned economy, more focused on what he regarded as the real world, rather than being blinded by Soviet largesse and continuing to be caught up in anti-imperialist struggles. At that stage of his career, however he was really without much influence in Washington. He had held a senior position in the Kennedy administration; he and FDR Junior had been instrumental in Kennedy's West Virginia primary victory. He expected more as a reward -- the UN job, for instance. When the jobs finally got passed out, he didn't get Secretary of State, and he didn't get the UN job, but he got the Deputy Secretary position under Rusk, and then found himself frequently out of the loop and isolated. When the ambassadorship to India opened again -- he had served in that position once before -- he decided that's where he wanted to go because he really didn't have any other place to go. But he didn't have much influence from there either.

Q: Well, let's talk about your job. I mean, both politically and economically, why don't we talk about the economics first. How much of a planned economy was it and how was it producing?

HAGERTY: Well, the conventional wisdom at the time may have proven to be correct, which is that the Indian planners knew where they had been, and where they wanted to go. But their problem was that between where they had been and where they wanted to go was the space of from five to ten years during which they never quite knew where they were. So the planning process would sometimes go askew. They would have resources aimed at a particular target, but their record-keeping, their database was such that they could end up, for instance, in some years having a glut of engineers having started out on the assumption that they could never have too many engineers. But at that stages, they couldn't get the resources shifted in time, and the real cost to produce a widget was never quite understood in the State sector. All of the problems of the Soviet economy (less the authoritarian style) were present in this kind of economy where a market place didn't establish what you had to pay and what it cost you to produce. Nonetheless, with the help of foreign assistance, they were doing remarkable things;

Q: Well, were you observing again on the economic side, was there appreciation among the economic movers and shakers that the Soviet economy really stunk. I mean no doubt about I. Outside of producing military weapons, the USSR just wasn't delivering to its people. I mean did they as they were looking at what they were doing, did they really have a cold objective eye on what was happening in these other countries' economies?

HAGERTY: You know, I think so, but I also had the feeling that the Indians were locked into their suspicion of free market forces. It had been free market forces as far as they were concerned that had driven the period of imperialism that imposed Westerner rule on them and so forth. It was Nehru's perception that the whole industrial revolution, which India was in the process of attempting for itself, had resulted in a squeeze of the lower classes in the West while resources were being mobilized. India couldn't afford that and have a democratic government as well, so the only way to deal with it was to do it with a planned economy.

Q: The politics of the thing. Can you give sort of a broad-brush treatment of how you saw Indian politics in '67 to '70 period?

HAGERTY: Well, these were Mrs. Gandhi's first years in power. She had come to power and then won an election in which she really lost her large parliamentary majority, so she headed essentially a minority government dependent on certain independents and on occasional temporary alliances across the party lines. So, her efforts to consolidate her power were badly undermined by the fact that she hadn't done well in the elections. It was the first time that the Congress Party had lost its overwhelming majority in the Parliament. In India's multi-national system, a plurality of the vote usually delivered a seat in the Lok Sabha. Congress had always pulled 42% or 43% of the popular vote, and in that kind of a shootout, that guaranteed the seat. But in '67, there was much more cooperation among the opposition parties to put up the strongest candidate; the result was that in many instances, the vote for the Congress Party candidate was not large enough to take the seat. The party was also weakened because of Mrs. Gandhi's own failures as a domestic politician to keep the party a vital force in national affairs.

Q: How at this point did you see Mrs. Gandhi as an Indian politician, not on the international scene, but in India?

HAGERTY: She was a crafty, single-minded politician. But, she effectively destroyed the party she had inherited from her father and from his generation her failure to keep the Congress Party itself revitalized within. Her often high-handed activities eventually cost her power, and then eventually cost even more – her life. The period known as “The Emergency,” which followed her conviction of electoral irregularities and eventual suspension of democracy for partisan advantage, resulted in a brief period of totalitarian government in India.

Q: Well, did you see her as someone who really didn't have much of a common touch, sort of the daughter of a high class family who lived in sort of an imperial cocoon or something of this nature?

HAGERTY: Not quite, not quite, because she was cutthroat in her politics. For instance, she was chosen by a group of senior party elders who were referred to as “the syndicate” and included four major figures in the party, each strong regional bases, south, west, east and north. They assumed that she would be malleable. In the end, by playing them off against each other, she undercut each one of them, not denying them their power bases, but reducing their influence at the center. In the process, she suspended intra-party elections, locking in the then-party leaders but denying access to a younger generation for what became years.

It was an interesting time to be there because my job was following parliament and national politics. I was in the visitor's gallery for Question Hour almost every day when it was in session. I wrote about the parliament and talked incessantly with MPs. I used to describe my job as a reasonably well-paid gossip. I would very often begin the day by having have tea with two or three MPs before parliament convened at 11 A.M. They were great talkers. My predecessors in the job had established a pattern of this kind of working level contact with MPs, and I fit right into their gossip network. I knew what was going on well enough that I could be a good sounding board for them, as they would talk to me about domestic politics. I was discreet, so I didn't reveal what “A” told me to “B,” respecting their confidences. Then I traded gossip with the parliamentary correspondents of the Delhi press, pooling info with them about the political situation.

Q: You know, how would you describe the dynamics of parliament during this period of time?

HAGERTY: Well, even with the vast majority shattered, in the parliamentary system, everything depends upon the “whip,” that is, governing depends upon the majority holding, so that for minority parties, particularly when they began to feel that some of their own strength, get close to being a force on the floor of parliament, they continued to be frustrated by their exclusion from the policy process. All they could do was raise ugly questions during “Question Hour,” occasionally launch protests, walk out of the parliament, protest outside, and get their members arrested.

Q: You say, Indira Gandhi destroyed the Congress Party. How did that come about?

HAGERTY: The Congress Party, like lots of parties in India and throughout the ‘Third World,’ was organized on the concept of democratic centralism. Each level of the party, from the bottom to the top, elected members of the next higher group in a pyramid shape. It cost ‘eight annas’ (half of one Rupee) to be a member and to be eligible to vote within the party for the next echelon in the party’s pradesh or state committee, and so forth up the line. Before Mrs. Gandhi’s ‘reign,’ intra-party elections were held regularly, each time rejuvenating its various echelons and enabling the party to keep in touch with political reality in India. But from the time Mrs. Gandhi came to power, the party stopped doing that. Intra-party elections stopped being held, and tended to atrophy with all the same face at the top and at all other levels. There was virtually no popular input from the district level up through to the All-India Congress Committee and its smaller, all-powerful, executive, the Congress Working Committee.

Q: Well, what was in her calculation in doing this?

HAGERTY: I never quite understood that except that she wanted to control the existing system. I think she didn’t trust her own ability to manage an evolving system in which she would have to deal infusions of with new blood. She had control of the people with whom she worked, and she had in fact destroyed the so-called “syndicate” of older party leaders who had put her in power and then had attempted to control her, essentially cutting them off at the knees, one after another -- S. K. Patil from Bombay, Atulya Ghosh from Calcutta, K. Kamaraj Nadar from Madras, and Sanjiva Reddy from Andhra, I knew them all. They remained as elder statesmen with regional power but with limited influence on national affairs, as she went her own way, taking the party with her. She was Nehru’s daughter, and India is a society in which even today, maharajas or others powerful families exercise a lot of influence. For instance, when I served later in Pakistan, the Maharaja of Baroda, whom I knew as a Member of the Indian Parliament, visited a spokesman and sponsor of the Indian cricket then touring Pakistan. At my house, my servants treated him as if he were the maharaja in “old” India, and most of them were born after ‘Partition.’ Nonetheless, they virtually prostrated themselves in his presence.

Indira Gandhi’s position as her father’s daughter (and only offspring) was part of her mystique. She was also ruthless in the way she played politics. She abided no innovation, and substantive policy was not her game. Rather, maneuver and manipulation were her game. Ambassador Bowles had no dialogue with her at all.

Q: While you were there during part of the, did Kissinger come out?

HAGERTY: Yes, I was the Embassy Control Officer for the Nixon visit in 1969, and Kissinger was along on that visit, not as Secretary of State but rather as NSC advisor. That was a monster visit. Nixon was coming from the splashdown of the lunar landing in the Pacific, stopping on the way in Thailand and Vietnam on the way to Delhi. He went on thereafter to a few hours in Lahore, Pakistan and a visit to Romania. The visit to Delhi lasted 23 hours. Five Boeings came in serially, three of them filled with journalists, one the backup plane, and one - Air Force One - with the first-term Nixon White House on board -- Erhlichman, Haldemann, you name them, plus two Assistant Secretaries of State, Joe Sisco and Marty Hillenbrand, plus a lot of other NSC people, Hal Saunders, and others. While Kissinger was going to participate in the main talks, of course, his interest beyond that was in meeting with former students. So, he avoided lots of the ceremonial parts of the visit.

Q: How did the Nixon visit go with Indira Gandhi?

HAGERTY: It went reasonably well. We didn't expect much from the visit, and I don't think Nixon expected much more than his hopes that he would draw bigger crowds than Eisenhower drew during his 1959 visit. At this point, former Senator Keating had become ambassador in India, a Nixon appointee, having lost his seat as senator from New York. The visit ended was essentially a pro forma stop, without much serious content.

An interesting sidelight on the visit: we'd had a difficult time as we were dealing with Indian protocol people getting Indian permission to use the Nixon Presidential limo, which was one of two leapfrogging from post to post while the president was traveling. The Indian side took umbrage, insisting that Nixon would be safe in the Indian President's Rolls Royce Silver Cloud. At my suggestion, our White House negotiator denied that security was our reason for preferring our own car. It was communications, i.e., the President's need to be in touch with US military forces around the world. Only his car would do for that. He then said the President could not have his own car, he would decline to stay as a guest at the Indian President's official residence.

That led them to refer the issue to Mrs. Gandhi. When they came back, they agreed to our request; the communications argument carried the day, they said. But later, via a Member of Parliament, I learned that when Indira Gandhi learned of our position, she simply said, "Okay, let him have his car. If he gets killed here, it's his car, not ours!"

Q: Did you find that the parliamentarians played much of a role in the thrust of India or not?

HAGERTY: Not really; individual MPs did play much of a role, and those in the opposition had virtually no influence. Indian Parliament, like the mother of Parliaments in London, doesn't have the kind of committees in which you have minority and majority members and so forth. There would be an ad hoc committee established to deal with a specific piece of legislation, but it was dominated by the Congress Party. And the Congress Party had usually been able to ram through everything the leadership wanted. There was very little effort to persuade, to do the kind of coalition stuff that George H. Bush has to do everyday on everything he wants to get through the US Congress. That just is not the Indian (or British) system. For the opposition parties, it was very frustrating thing; their leaders resorted demagoguery, creating uproars in parliament and pitching for headlines the next day to embarrass or criticize the government. And through it all, the government majority just rolled on. During the 1100 AM “Question Hour,” ministers often answered members’ questions with a fair amount of information. The government rotated ministries to respond to questions on a daily basis, as in the British system. Certain subjects were up for certain days. And at noon, at the end of “Question Hour,” there would be a time – called “Zero Hour” in the local parlance -- for tabling special motions, before moving on to the day’s legislative agenda. “Zero Hour” was often tumultuous, as the opposition used it to call for setting aside time for special debates on subjects of interest aimed at embarrassing Government or influencing public opinion. Such debates, which the Speaker could grant or not grant, gave all of the players a sense of participating in this drama that went on and on and on and was widely reported in the newspapers and in the press and on the Indian TV. But, mostly, the Government steamrolled its way into its legislative agenda. With little effort given to coalition building or attempting in terms of attempting to produce national consensus.

Q: Well, what was in it for the people out of power?

HAGERTY: Well, all MPs had a public role to play. They had a sense of being important and were able to help constituents seeking access to Government; many of their living expenses were covered, including free postal services and Delhi housing at government expense. And they received a modest income. What you should understand also is that most of the people who were on opposition benches had, at one time or another, been part of the Congress Party -- other than the communists or right-wing Hindu nationalists, that is. Most of those in parties to the immediate left of the Congress Party – members of the several socialist parties and those representing regional parties -- had been in the Indian National Congress prior to Independence. Those socialists who left Congress found that Nehru in power wasn’t socialist enough for them. They felt that he’d sold out that side of his ideology for power. They had worn homespun khadi cloth and been politicians all their lives, and that’s what they saw as their “karma.”

While it was expensive to run for office, MP were in a position to hope to be ministers, in time, at the state or federal level, to live reasonably well until then, and – still only 20 years after independence had been attained -- to be part of the effort to create a new and proud nation. The bulk of the private sector required government permits to get anything done, and money could deliver permits. What was remarkable to me was that, yes, there was corruption, but its incidence was remarkably low considering the stakes. They were still operating in the pre-independence mode, but government had become a “Permit Raj.”

Q: Did we have any issues while we were trying to get votes you know I mean were we just reporting or were we saying it would be kind of nice if you voted on this bill or that bill?

HAGERTY: The Embassy did not lobby MP’s per se but counted on our ability to ensure that they were aware of our views and of the reasons for our policies. For instance, a member of the upper house whom I knew well was clearly being lobbied by foreign drug companies, with his foreign travel being paid by them because he was on the committee dealing with a patent reform bill that was before the Parliament. A very substantial part of the world’s pharmaceuticals are derived from natural products produced in India. I wouldn’t have urged him how to vote, but I certainly made sure he was aware of how important patents are to the US drug industry. In respect to this side of my job, my role was to explain U.S. policies, often in answer to their questions. So I would explain why we were doing something, what its background was, and what our aims were. I could provide USIA books, excerpts from the Wireless File, and Unclassified USG publications; I could make arrangement for them to meet the Ambassador or other colleagues, and will as US officials and Congressman visiting India.

But the main point of my job was to stay on top of what the Indian Parliament and the Indian Government were doing and how the political system was operating. Many of them, of course, were aware that the person in my position could recommend politicians for so-called "Leader Grants" to the U.S. to visit and travel around the US; every year we'd send at least one and sometimes two parliamentarians on those grants. But that was 'peanuts.' The lower house had 538 members, upper house, 238. I may have come to know 60-70, from both houses, including a handful of lesser ministers but none of the full Ministers or Ministers of State (totaling another 60 or so), since they would be the Ambassador's preserve. I also knew and met with party and regional figures not in Parliament.

Q: How did you find the sort of dealing and conversing with Indians? Indians tend to, they're worse than we are at least in my opinion as far as being both moralistic and talking a lot?

HAGERTY: They're politicians, and I think Indian politicians are a bit different in their own turf. Yes, they are preachy when they get outside India, as preachy as our politicians can be. But on a one-to-one basis, when I'd call on them and spend 25 or 40 minutes over tea talking about the news of the day, they enjoyed talking. They especially liked talking to somebody who understood their system and who could understand their questions and feedback. And, as I have said, they often used me as a sounding board, since they rarely talked across party lines (and I did). I had an interesting kind of relationship with many of them and saw them often.

Q: Were you I think you'd have to be careful that you didn't overwhelm our India desk back in the States with too much information. I imagine you'd sort of have to.

HAGERTY: Yes, David Schneider, but an early boss of mine in the Foreign Service and later Ambassador to Bangladesh, had also done this job in Delhi several years ahead of me. His key word of advice was, "You have to know everything that is going on in Delhi, but Washington doesn't. It's up to you to distill and interpret it." And that's what I did, reporting by Telegram when timeliness warranted, otherwise by pouched Airgrams. These reports circulated among people in the Department and other Executive Branch agencies who were interested or specializing in India -- some more voraciously than others. For every telegram I wrote, I must have written ten airgrams. I also kept in touch with the India "desk" in Washington by pouched "Official-Informal" letters (long before the advent of 'Official-Informal' cables, secure phone links with Washington, and before e-mail.

Q: Was anybody else I'm talking about other embassies, the Soviets or the Brits doing this or were you pretty much alone?

HAGERTY: There were maybe six what I called "serious" missions in Delhi, that is, embassies keeping close tabs on Indian politics as we were doing. I traded information and political 'gossip' all the time with four of them, i.e., my British, Australian, Canadian, and New Zealand counterparts (even though the last two, from smaller embassies, were spread very thin, with more rank and wider areas of responsibility. Also occasionally the French, more often the Yugoslavs, who were very well plugged in Nonaligned matters and who were more than happy to be trading political gossip. To these I would add the Japanese, the Chinese, and the Soviets, but I had little opportunity do any trading with them. Representatives from these “serious” embassies were invited, with me, as “foreign guests” to periodic and well-publicized All-India Congress Committee meetings, held in various places in India. So I would go off to Jabalpur or Goa or someplace else in India for one of these gatherings where I’d spend a week on the edge of a large Congress Party gathering and trading impressions and information with my Commonwealth and Yugoslav counterparts. Usually there were Russians in attendance also, but we tended to ignore each other. My British counterpart, by the way, was much later to serve as HMG’s ambassador in Paris, then in Washington.

Q: While you were working on domestic politics did you get hit with, I mean we were going right out to Vietnam at that time.

HAGERTY: Oh sure. Whenever my colleagues and I talked with Indian officials, including MPs, we were called upon to defend US policies and actions in Vietnam and elsewhere. You may remember that it was during this period that India closed down our USIA libraries in various places in-country largely in response to US criticism of remarks by the Indian deputy foreign minister made on a visit to Hanoi. An interesting sidelight to this was that when we checked our files, we had virtually no documents signed by the Indian government ever authorizing us to establish those libraries; all we found was a report that Pandit Nehru “nodded” when informed by an earlier US Ambassador of our intent to establish these centers.

Q: Did you feel that you were in semi hostile territory, what was sort of your gut impression?

HAGERTY: No, I don’t think so. I always felt that Indians had a great deal of respect for the United States. In those early years of the Indian Republic, knowledge that the United States had supported Indian independence, even to the annoyance of His Majesty’s Government, was widely known among Indians with whom we were dealing. On the far left, there were those who were hostile to us, like with Communist Party MPs with whom I would never meet and who doubtless would not have welcomed my attention. But I knew who they were so that when they would demonstrate in front of the American embassy, I’d be the embassy officer who would be sent to greet them by name. I’d say, “Hello, Mr. Gupta, how are you? Do you have a petition for us? I’ll make sure that the petition goes to Washington so that the President is aware of it” -- that sort of thing. Sometimes they would appear a little embarrassed by my greeting, perhaps fearful that their colleagues would sense they had a prior relationship with me. So be it; their comfort was not my concern. But I didn’t feel there was much hate.

It was a golden time in lots of ways. The post-Kennedy period had sort of revolutionized a sense of the American image. We really thought we were out there on the front lines of the ‘Cold War’ and on the ‘war on poverty.’ The AID mission was huge, and we were part of a World Bank consortium providing billions to Indian development efforts. We had helped to sponsor the “green revolution” and were moving in other areas, such as public health and PL-480 food aid. We had more than 1,200 Peace Corps Volunteers in country; the largest single Peace Corps program at the time, prompting Indians widely to refer to healthy chickens in India as 'Peace Corps chickens.' At the time, I used to remind Indians that while one out of every seven human beings was an Indian, one out of every six Peace Corps Volunteers was in India. It was an exciting and pleasant place to live and work.

Q: What about down south, in Kerala?

HAGERTY: Yes, Kerala had elected a communist government in 1959, as I said before, and Indira Gandhi, as President of the Congress Party, had persuaded her father to oust that government when demonstrations threatened its hold on government, exercising a provision in the 1950 Indian constitution to impose six-month periods of central rule and Parliamentary control of its finances in such circumstances. But years later, when Kerala again elected the Communist Party to power, Communist rule there it became the norm; the state has communist governments to this day.

Q: They were just another one of the opposition.

HAGERTY: Yes, they were just another of the many opposition parties at the center. In fact, of the opposition parties, that party -- the more militant, originally Maoist-influenced Communist Party Marxist (CPM) -- has for a long time governed in the Indian states of Kerala and West Bengal, as I have said before. Many have suggested they are the best administered governments at the state level in India. And as you know, the Communist Party had earlier split; with the other wing under more direct Moscow influence. But even they were hardly Bolsheviks. The terminology, as indeed their platform, was outdated.

Q: Were you looking at the, I don't know what you want to call them, the divisions or do you want to call them tribal, caste, and you know, I mean the whole hodge podge of mixed up India? Were these?

HAGERTY: Well, these identities help to explain the workings of Indian politics in the way that ethnic and racial considerations play out in urban politics in much of the US. You know, the electoral tickets are balanced in India in caste, ethnic, and sub-regional terms. One additional factor is that the Indian constitution reserves legislative seats for Scheduled Tribes and Scheduled Castes, former "Untouchables," who made up the 23% of Indian society at the very bottom of the social scale. That percentage applies also to places reserved for university admissions, government jobs, etc. But because twenty-three percent of the Lower House of parliament is also reserved for them, it also meant -- and continues to mean -- that these lower caste office-seekers run against each other for those reserved seats; they would be unlikely to win any non-reserved seats. This has kept the lower castes divided politically. And when elected, then they have been often been up for 'grabs,' suborned, bribed, and that sort of thing, for their votes in Parliament and in state assemblies.

Q: We had the one visit of Nixon and that was about it, or did you have a lot of congressional delegations and that sort of thing?

HAGERTY: Not a lot, but some. Senator Javits and Foreign Relations Committee people came, I remember. I looked after them. There were others more concerned about the aid program and economic matters (of policy), but I didn't get to deal with them. Ambassador Bowles, a former Congressman, and later Ambassador Keating, a former senator, attempted – often in vain -- to encourage more Congressional visitors.

Q: You were dealing obviously with domestic politics, but was there a war going on over the cables between our embassy, I guess, in Karachi in those days, I mean between our embassy in Pakistan and our embassy in India?

HAGERTY: Yes, well, the U.S. Ambassadors in New Delhi and Islamabad inevitably were in competition with each other for Washington's attention. Later, when I was the Pakistan Director in Washington, I was at the other end of that, and I'll talk about that at another time perhaps. But each embassy, in its advocacy of policy options tended to look at them from the prism of that originating capital, recommending what the Ambassador perceived was the best thing for US relations with that country. Also, you should never forget that ambassadors are also interested in their own records of achievement during their time as chief of mission, so that they were looking out for that, too. It's clear when countries are as antithetical as India and Pakistan can be, the perceptions of the two embassies are going to be almost as different as the perceived interests of those two countries. That requires the sorting out in Washington of what is in the U.S. interest in the region, whether or not it is in the US best interests with one or the other country. I should also add that while Embassy and Consulate political reporting doubtless influenced Washington perceptions, the Embassy's advocacy on policy was essentially separate from our day-to-day reporting of Indian political and economic affairs.

Q: I don't know if it really pertains, again I speak of somebody whose been off to one side on this, but in a way I always had the feeling that the Republicans were particularly interested in and more amenable to Pakistan and the often military government whereas the Democrats got more entranced with India. I mean, did you have any feeling of that?

HAGERTY: I think there had been a popular impression that Democratic administrations in Washington tended to favor India, and Republican administrations, Pakistan. But I think that folklore died. The Roosevelts were vocal advocates of Indian independence, but I don't see that a consistent partisan favoritism has existed at all in recent years. During the early Cold War years, for instance, John Foster Dulles and his alliances (with Pakistan among others) were looked upon with scorn in India, but Eisenhower wasn't. He had a fantastic visit to India in 1959, was well thought of and in many ways was highly revered. When Kennedy came into office, the perception was that relations with India would get a boost, and then John Galbraith made sure that lots of people believed that because he was involved, too. But Johnson seemed to have a soft spot for Pakistan, in part the result of his personal relationship with Ayub Khan. But this alleged partisan favoritism was riddled with so many exceptions that over time it didn't seem to hold water.

Q: Okay, well, then why don't we move on.

HAGERTY: I can remember the effect in India, the assassination of Martin Luther King.

Q: Oh, yes, well, talk about that.

HAGERTY: That was quite moving. It was understood in India that King quoted so much from Mohandas Gandhi and organized nonviolent protest. I think Indians did feel that there was a loss in his death. I looked after Mrs. King when she came out to accept the Nehru Medal, an annual award that the Indian government introduced after King's death for an outstanding foreigner I think she was rather remarkably moved, and this was some months later, at the outpouring of sorrow and affection in India at the time.

Q: Well, this does bring up a subject. You were there at the height of our, the racial situation in the United States.

HAGERTY: The civil rights movement, yes.

Q: Yes, the whole civil rights movement. How did that play in India because I mean, for one, they probably have a worse caste system than we have in some ways, but, two, would they identify with people of color? I mean, how did this work in the circles that you moved in?

HAGERTY: Yes, they did identify with people of color and kept from exercising their rights in any country abroad. As newly independent, they had quite explicitly drawn on constitutional provisions in effect in other liberal democracies, including our own, in drafting their own 1950 constitution. For instance, following Gandhi's example, they had declared "Untouchability" unenforceable. No doubt that discrimination based on caste still enjoys the force of tradition in small rural villages where there are separate for those with caste and those without. Ordinary people in those areas have to live and survive, and so it exists even though no court or police force can enforce it. But with world news available by radio everywhere in India, informed Indians were sympathetic that the Administration and the US courts were trying to do the right thing. I think that went a long way. (The anti-US "left" was something else!)

India has a federal system, in some ways similar to ours. State leaders do things that the national government doesn't necessarily approve of, and we're seeing more and more of that as time goes by. Indians understood something about how federal systems operate, even if there are differences between ours and theirs in terms of residual powers. In India, all powers unspecified in the constitution reside with the central government, unlike our system where the reverse is true.

Q: A question that I forgot to ask. In the parliamentary system, was there an upper house?

HAGERTY: Yes. The upper house (Rajya Sabha or House of the States) is elected the way the US Senate was elected before 1912, that is by the state legislatures for six-year terms, with one-third expiring every two years -- like the US Senate. Thus the upper house -- with about 240 members -- reflects the composite political balance of the state assemblies. In the days when the Congress Party had majorities in every state assembly, the upper house also reflected that Congress dominance. Increasingly in the '60s and into the '70s, as more and more state legislatures have come under the control of opposition or purely regional parties, this has changed the balance in the Rajya Sabha. Today, nearly all Indian states have coalition governments, and the Congress Party – even in control of some states – has lost its national dominance. The national government in Delhi is now a coalition of seventeen essentially regional parties represented in the lower house (Lok Sabha, or House of the People), the upper house, and in those assemblies.

Q: Did you find that you spent much time with members of the upper house?

HAGERTY: Yes and no. Upper house members often gave me a different perspective. There were times when their party positions made them a better source of information, more authentic. They lived a more relaxed pace, since all real power was vested in the lower house. I had good contacts in both houses, but I spent most of my time with the more numerous members of the Lok Sabha, a number of them I came to regard as friends. I got on very well with Atal Behari Vajpayee, then an opposition leader but now prime minister. In 1971, when he was visiting Copenhagen, he arranged to come to Oslo, where I was then posted, and to have lunch with me. And I saw him in later years whenever I visited India from Pakistan.

LEONARD H. ROBINSON, JR.
Associate Peace Corps Director
Bangalore (1967-1970)

Mr. Robinson was born and raised in North Carolina. After graduating from Ohio State University he joined the Peace Corp, serving first in India and later at Peace Corps Headquarters in Washington, D.C. His varied career took him to Capitol Hill, to AID and to the State Department as Deputy Assistant Secretary for African Affairs. Mr. Robinson was also active in a number of private organizations having to do with African Development and with Population Programs. Mr. Robinson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

ROBINSON: I was in Washington during spring break of 1967. In March of 1967 I had come to Washington to see some friends, in particular a white guy named Fred Madison who worked for the Peace Corps in Washington and his wife. Fred had come to India two or three times on Peace Corps assignments, and he was a really neat, cool guy. He loved Jazz, and he, Artie and I developed a great relationship. He invited me to come down and spend spring break with him. One very cold day in March 1967 he said “Let’s go down to Peace Corps headquarters. I want to introduce you to some people.” He wanted to introduce me to Sepoy Lewis, the founder of Africare, who was a legend in the Peace Corps at the time. I was 22 years old. I turned 23 that April. So he took me down to the Peace Corps office. I ran into all these people whom I had known in India in the Peace Corps who were now officers in the Peace Corps in Washington. “Great to see you, Lenny. We need people like you to go back overseas and be associate directors or directors.” I said, “I am in graduate school.” But then it came to me: if I were selected to go back overseas, Peace Corps was an automatic deferment during your tour in the agency. It did not mean that you could not be drafted after you got back from your experience either as a volunteer or a Peace Corps professional. But it would provide a deferment during your service with the Peace Corps; it would have bought me some time. I did a quick calculation. If I took a position as a Peace Corps professional, by the time I got back -- it would have been a three or four year assignment- I would be 26. Once you turned 26, you were no longer of draftable age. I couldn't be conscripted. So I went through a series of interviews that week. I had opportunities to go to South Korea, Micronesia, or back to India as an associate Peace Corps director. I said, "This is pretty neat."

In those days, the final staffing decisions were made by the deputy Peace Corps director. At this time, the deputy Peace Corps director was a guy named Brent Ashenbrenner who had been my director in India when I was a volunteer. He and I worked closely together, particularly during the time when I was trying to get President Johnson to shift special PL-480 food grains to maize, in order to help me out with my poultry farming demonstrations. Brent and I had become close. I had established a rapport with him.

I walked into his office Friday evening at 6:30 in March of 1967. Brent said, "Lenny, it is good to see you again. You have gone through this Washington headquarters here and everybody wants you. But the decision I have made is that if you want to come back to the Peace Corps, we want you to go back to India." It was a miracle. A dream come true.

Q: Back in the brier patch in a way.

ROBINSON: It did put me back in the brier patch, but I was going back as a Peace Corps professional. More importantly it was my ticket out of Vietnam. Yes, I had to go back to SUNY Binghamton and negotiate a leave of absence from graduate school. What I did there was to say, "Look, I am going to work on my master's thesis," because it was on an aspect of the Indian caste system. So the India assignment fit very neatly. SUNY Binghamton gave me a three or four year leave of absence.

So I accepted the Peace Corps position as associate program director for India, for South India. I was 23 years old at the time. I went back to SUNY Binghamton, negotiated the leave of absence and my academic work towards my credentials. I came back to Washington in June, 1967 to undergo Peace Corps training for a three month period before going to India. That is how I dealt with Vietnam and the draft situation. As I said, it changed my life.

Q: You are off to India. Tell us about the program in 1967?

ROBINSON: The Peace Corps had been growing exponentially by this point. There were a little over a thousand Peace Corps volunteers in India in 1967 and it peaked to about 2500 during my time. I had 600 volunteers in my region alone.

Q: Were you married in 1967?

ROBINSON: I was married on October 31, 1966, to someone I had known in college. What we both hadn't realized was that I had changed -- dramatically. In retrospect, I think my marriage in part was due to a feeling of being lonely and distanced from American society. When I got back from India, I mentioned that it was difficult for me to speak English without thinking about what I wanted to say because I had become so immersed in India and its language style. I felt out of touch socially. My wife-to-be was someone that I could communicate with, that I could relate to. I think that I unconsciously clung to her for emotional and psychological support during this difficult period of re-adjustment. She was a familiar person, a familiar voice. We married in October of 1966. But shortly after we got to Binghamton it became very clear that I wasn't the same Leonard Robinson that either of us had known before my stay in India. We had difficulty relating to each other and so that marriage ended rather quickly.

Q: When you returned to India, how were U.S.-India relations?

ROBINSON: As I said earlier, during the time of the Johnson administration, there were great ideological struggles between India and the United States, primarily because of the Cold War. "Games" were being played between India, the Soviet Union and the United States. For example the PL-480 "food for peace" program was highly controversial, despite the fact that there had been a drought-created famine in India in 1965-1966. Indira Gandhi was the prime minister. She and Lyndon Johnson had their issues. So there were some degrees of tension between the United States and India. The Peace Corps was more often than not criticized by various elements in Indian society as being a spy network for the CIA. We were not welcomed in all strata of Indian society. Yet at the same time the Peace Corps was growing in India by leaps and bounds. In fact, in retrospect, I think we got too big.

Q: Was there an attempt at Peace Corps headquarters before you went out to India, to keep a distance from the State Department? Did you talk to people at the State Department or was this sort of a no-no?

ROBINSON: There was a veil that came from the Foreign Service side, not from the Peace Corps side. We had been oriented by the Peace Corps -- first during my training as a volunteer, and then a staff member when I went back the second time -- to believe that the Peace Corps was different. The Peace Corps openly, consciously embraced the people in the society where we worked. It was a people-to-people program. The Foreign Service was portrayed as elitist, standoffish. They lived in their own enclaves and compounds behind mud walls, so to speak. Very few of them could speak the native language. So there were cultural and stylistic difference in mode of operation between the Foreign Service officers and the Peace Corps members.

AID officials or AID per se were viewed differently. We looked upon the embassy as being THE Foreign Service. AID officials were American Government officials working on an international basis. There was an affinity as well, because AID officials cast themselves as being expert technicians as opposed to new Peace Corps volunteers who were lay people with three months' training. We really didn't know that much. Peace Corps volunteers in India and elsewhere around the world felt a little like second class American citizens. In India, Chester Bowles was just leaving as ambassador when I got there to be followed by Kenneth Galbraith.

Chester Bowles and his wife, Sally Bowles, broke the mold. They were infinitely famous. They were famous in New Delhi and India because they reached out to the Indian community. Sally was responsible for helping sweeper women. These were people who kept the streets and alleyways clean all around Indian communities. They were the lower caste people. Because of being bent over all their lives sweeping, a lot of them developed serious chronic back problems.

Sally introduced the long handled broom in and around Old Delhi, and got these women to change from the small broom that forced them to stoop over to a “stand up” broom. That was a small but very significant innovation on her part. She wore a Sari.

Chester Bowles encouraged Foreign Service officers to learn Hindi or Urdu, and to reach out to the community after working hours. “Get out from behind the desk; get out from the embassy compound. “ Chester Bowles refused to live in the official ambassador’s residence in New Delhi, but he did give permission to the Peace Corps to allow volunteers to use the swimming pool which was behind the ambassador’s residence. When I went to New Delhi, that was one of the places where we could go and have some fun. So we could use the ambassador’s pool, but the commissary and its swimming pool were off limits.

During my first tour, there was an American consulate in Calcutta. Both in Delhi and sometimes in Calcutta there were movies shown one or twice a week, I think, at one of the U.S. government buildings. In Delhi, it might have been at the old USIS (United States Information Service Agency) building. But the movies were only for Foreign Service officers and their wives and dependents. If you had your identification card as a Peace Corps volunteer, you could also attend. We took advantage of that. That was the one little perks that we did have. Otherwise we had to go see Hindi movies. Sometimes they had subtitles, but most of the time they did not. It that was a great way to learn Hindi.

By the time I returned in July of 1967, the relationship between the Peace Corps and the embassy had evolved. It was a more mature relationship. There was interaction at the professional level between Peace Corps directors, associate Peace Corps directors and their families and Foreign Service officers. From the ambassador on down, there was interaction. By policy, Peace Corps still did not use the commissary. We were encouraged to purchase on the local market. You could order, in the case of India, goods from Singapore, or from Kuala Lumpur. A lot of us did that.

Initially I was based in Bangalore. Bangalore was the regional headquarters for the Peace Corps in southern India. After a year we got so big that I moved my office to Madras to really concentrate on the states of Karnataka and Andhra Pradesh. We had an American consulate in Madras. I developed a very close relationship with all of the officials from the consul general on down as well as with the Public Affairs officer (PAO).

Q: The Public Affairs officer was the head of the USIA at the post.

ROBINSON: That’s right. In Madras, I played tennis with consulate officials. We socialized a lot with American officials and businessmen, such as the Bank of America people who had an office in Madras. We socialized with Indians; we socialized with everybody.

I had a membership in the Madras Club which was an old British club, that had admitted Americans over the years. My membership in the Madras Club was sponsored by two consulate officials. I remember one of them in particular whose name was Bill Keough. Bill Keough was the executive officer of the American consulate. He and his family were extremely nice to me. I think he may have even helped me identify the house and office when we set up our Peace Corps operation in Madras. The American consulate was in a brand new consulate building, built in a prominent spot right in downtown Madras -- Mount Road to be exact. One afternoon, I think this was probably mid-1968, I was having a conversation one afternoon with the political officer who was my tennis partner. We were sitting in his office. I remember very vividly that he had his blinds almost closed, but there were rays of sun coming in. Out of the blue he said, "You know, Lenny, we could use people like you." I did a double take, and I leaned forward in my seat and I said,

"What did you say?"

"We could use people like you. You know I work for the agency, and we could really use people like you." In fact, that is when I learned that he was the station chief for the consulate in Madras. Even though I had some sense of the agency while I was a Peace Corps volunteer in Bahawalpur, I had not focused on learning about intelligence gathering when I was a Peace Corps director in south India. So this exchange shocked me for several reasons. For one, the Peace Corps, as written in its basic authorizing legislation, could not have any contact whatsoever with intelligence organizations. There was a strict rule about that. As I mentioned earlier, there was a newspaper that was published every two weeks in Bombay which incessantly criticized and castigated the Peace Corps for being a spy ring of the United States government. I did know that our intelligence officers had an Indian counterpart who shadowed them. They knew who were our intelligence officers and we knew who they were. That was by agreement.

So I became a little concerned because he was a tennis partner of mine, and we spent a lot of time together during my first year and a half in Madras. I was concerned that the Indian intelligence apparatus might come to the conclusion that Leonard Robinson, the Peace Corps director, was passing on information to somebody inside the consulate general's office in Madras. So I stood up and said, "I think you have compromised me, and I won't have anything else to do with you. I did not know that you were who you now have revealed that you are." So with that I walked out of his office, and I never saw him socially again. I didn't play tennis with him. I wanted the break to be abrupt because I did not want whoever might be watching from the other side to continue to have an impression that I was in bed with American intelligence agents.

That did not stop me, however, from socializing with other officers from the consulate. We had very good relationships. The Peace Corps had an excellent relationship in south India not only with the American Consulate but also with all Indian government officials. I also had a very good relationship with the PAO, which I developed over the 1968-1970 period. He is the one who encouraged me to take the Foreign Service exam and to join the Foreign Service.

During this period, Peace Corps executives did carry an official passport, and were classified as Foreign Service Reserve officers. So I already had one foot in the Foreign Service. One day, the PAO said, "We would really like to have someone of your talent working for the United States Information Agency." When I returned to Washington in 1970 to be the Peace Corps director for minority recruiting under Joseph Blatchford, who was the Peace Corps director then, I had the option at the time of joining USIS because of the PAO in Madras, and I'll get to that in a few moments.

Q: I would like to talk a little bit about what the Peace Corps was doing in southern India. What were the activities and where did you fit in?

ROBINSON: The Peace Corps in south India was innovative. It was dynamic. We had a group of professionals who were committed to the Peace Corps. Paul Zimmerman was the regional director. Paul Zimmerman was really my first professional supervisor. He and his wife, Margo, were terrific. He was very innovative. His managerial style was good. I think he was an attorney by training. On the staff, we had a guy named Tom Carter who is now with AID, and Tom Ariens, John Croney and myself. As I said, Paul Zimmerman was the regional director and he had four associate directors. They were experts in one field or another. Our Peace Corps volunteers were involved in community development and intensive agricultural production, particularly in rice and maize cultivation. We had volunteers in poultry farming, which was my field of expertise. We had Peace Corps volunteers who were working in commercial markets, particularly in "supermarkets". That was one of the projects that Tom and I supervised. We had Peace Corps volunteers working in well construction which was very important in terms of having sufficient water for human consumption as well as for irrigation of agricultural fields. Southern India produced a lot of food for the entire subcontinent.

We had Peace Corps volunteers in teacher training. We had Peace Corps volunteers who were teaching English as a second language.

I said that the Peace Corps in south India was innovative; I think we were probably the first program anywhere in the world to conduct a training program totally in country. Usually Peace Corps volunteers were trained somewhere in and around the United States or in Hawaii and then brought to the country. I first proposed this to a Peace Corps meeting for all Peace Corps directors when it was held in New Delhi, "You know, we need to establish a Peace Corps training capability in India, because India is a tough country to understand from far away." India was culturally so different from the United States. A lot of our volunteers had a tough time adjusting. We also decided to assign volunteers to towns and villages in clusters, so that they could learn the language. We had come to recognize that when we had more than two volunteers stationed in the town, or in close same proximity, they tended to gravitate towards each other and they wouldn't learn the local language. They didn't feel comfortable integrating into local society.

So we set up a Peace Corps training program whereby trainees were brought to south India. They had been trained in a large city like Madras or Bangalore in groups. But we changed that so that rather than staying in a hotel, we assigned each trainee to an Indian family for the entire three month training period. We believed that with an immediate immersion through living with an Indian family right from the beginning, the volunteers would get through the initial cultural shock successfully. The immersion also made acclimation to village living easier. They would learn the language faster. They would learn the cultural mores and folkways and the nuances and idiosyncrasies quicker. They would adjust and adapt quicker. So that is what we did in south India, and it worked.

That is not to say we didn't have any problems. We did assign volunteers to work on their own in various locations, but we put them within the proximity of probably six miles of each other. We would concentrate volunteers in an area so that we could have an impact particularly in terms of agricultural projects. We wanted to see an early impact. We also assigned a counterpart to each of our volunteers, so that they could work together as a pair. So we did a lot of innovative things that made the Peace Corps more popular and more acceptable.

If a volunteer decided to leave for whatever reason, it created a problem because we had worked so hard to make sure that the Peace Corps was understood prior to a volunteer's assignment. When my volunteer partners and I got to India during my first assignment, the local people didn't quite understand what this Peace Corps concept was all about. The concept of volunteerism simply did not exist in Indian society. The Indians didn't reach out and help each other because of the caste system. So they didn't understand what the Peace Corps' basic philosophy was all about. They were suspicious of us. "You will come and help us? What do you mean you will come and help us? You know, we don't have people in our own society to do that for the most part; so why would you come from 12,000 miles away to help total stranger?"

But in south India, we made sure that there was a demand for the Peace Corps volunteers. We said that "He or she is coming to work with you, to help you get some problems solved, to move in a certain direction in terms of technology and expertise, etc." We did such a good job of that, that when a Peace Corps volunteer decided to terminate his or her tour early, an Indian official would usually call me or send me a letter or telegram and ask, "So and so is leaving, what are we going to do? We need to have somebody come and replace this Peace Corps volunteer." That was the kind of problem to have.

We also tried to initiate a domestic Indian Peace Corps by encouraging government officials to develop Peace Corps-like programs that would be staffed by Indians themselves utilizing the American model. We did have some volunteers, both male and female, who could not handle the loneliness. It was a small number, but in two or three cases we did get to the point where we had to make the decision to send them back to the United States because they were not adjusting well; they were not coping well with their circumstances.

Q: Could you have brought them back to a city and let them work in a city where they would have more companionship?

ROBINSON: It would have been difficult because no jobs had been identified for them. The assignment of Peace Corps volunteers was really tied to the identification of a very specific task or series of tasks which required the training they had received. When someone decided abruptly to leave, because they were lonely or whatever, it was difficult to get them transferred to another town or a city or even in Madras where Peace Corps headquarters is located.

I had one Peace Corps volunteer who came from Seattle. Stuart was his name. He came to me out of the blue one Friday and said, "I have gotten this telegram from my girlfriend, and she is feeling lonely. She says she has found somebody else. If I can just get on a plane and fly back to Seattle for the weekend, I am sure I can fix this up and I will come back." I said, "Stuart, you can't get to Seattle in a weekend, and come back to south India." He clearly had flipped out. So we send him back permanently.

I had a very attractive woman from Akron, Ohio. It is amazing how you can remember some people's names. Her name was Adrian. She was just lonely. She just couldn't adjust. I had her based in Mudhol which is a big city in the middle of Karnataka. It was culturally very rich, but she couldn't make it there. She asked to go home, so we sent her back to the States. I think that the Peace Corps in India had impact in general, but in south India, we had a tremendous impact. The issues and problems that we encountered were not insurmountable.

Q: How did you deal with the local politicians? Did your program appear to be like patronage for the local bosses and that in a way involve you in the political process. How did this work?

ROBINSON: That is a very astute question. My answer will draw both on my experiences as a volunteer and as a director. Peace Corps volunteers became status symbols. We were invited to all the weddings. Everybody wanted to have an American in their social settings. Since we were outsiders to a very structured society based on an interpretation of Hinduism including the caste system, we had access to all levels of that society. We consciously encouraged that opportunity by reaching out as Peace Corps volunteers to all the people across the spectrum of Indian society. The idea of having an Indian counterpart assigned to each volunteer was designed to cushion the potential political impact of having a foreigner in their midst. If the Peace Corps volunteer was successful in establishing a good working relationship with his or her Indian counterpart, a lot of the potential political tension dissipated over time. Yes, we were agents of change. We were agents of action. We were agents of information. Change obviously connotes bringing new ideas to the table. "What do you mean the block development officer won't bring in the seeds and fertilizers and pesticides that he promised you? Let's get on our bike and ride into town and see what the hell is going on." Without the Peace Corps volunteer's presence, the Indian farmers or the Indian Ag extension officers stationed in that village wouldn't have gone to town to raise those questions. So the volunteer brought an element of activism. Sometimes that backfired. I think I mentioned to you that my block development officer, Mr. Yardov, was perfectly content to let me and my first partner in the Peace Corps just sit there and vegetate for weeks until we jumped on our bikes and ran into town and said, "We came here to help, not to sit here and eat all day and sip tea." We had to confront him. That was unheard of in Indian society. "The Americans have confronted the block development officer." He was a power at that level, but we were able to penetrate that aura. The Peace Corps volunteers did help to stir the pot. There may have been a number, but I cannot recall any instance where we had to pull a Peace Corps volunteer out of a village because he or she raised so much hell politically in terms of trying to get things done that it caused the local authorities to want to expel them from the community. Because of the sensitivities conveyed to Peace Corps trainees during their training programs, most volunteers had some sense of how to handle these situations without causing undue damage. They knew that they were outsiders, visitors, guests. They understood that they could not go in and change things immediately.

We did have an instance in Patna, the capital of Bihar, in a Peace Corps program to train mechanics who worked in the maintenance garages of UNICEF and UNESCO vehicles. We trained Indian mechanics on how to do maintain that fleet differently or more efficiently. We had one volunteer, from Utah, who did not adjust very well to his new cultural environment. He was so frustrated by his inability to persuade, to influence his Indian coworkers to adopt certain measures that he started kicking them. The word got back to us. I was a Peace Corps volunteer leader at this point—not a Peace Corps director. But there were quite a large number of Peace Corps volunteers living around Patna -- almost ten of us and we heard about this incident. We were the older group. We heard about what was going on, and so we talked to this guy. “You can’t kick them to try to get them to do what you want to do. That is ridiculous. Work with them.” But we eventually had to recommend to the Peace Corps office in Calcutta to get him out of the country. He was almost taken out in a strait jacket. He had just flipped out.

I think that we were successful in India. We generally succeeded in having Peace Corps volunteers who worked well with their co-workers and their counterparts which allowed them, when they left, not to create a vacuum in terms of their expertise. They were able to influence subtly that intangible that we all strive for—e.g. the ability and willingness to adopt certain traits that the Peace Corps volunteer had brought with him or her, so that once he or she departed the scene, the Indians would continue to conduct themselves in a way that was a little bit better because of their expertise they had acquired from the volunteer. We always asked the Peace Corps volunteers to look at the intrinsic. You can’t measure it. You might see it, but you might also not see it. But it was part of the subtle evaluation of the influence that a Peace Corps volunteer might have had over two years. But we also used to tell them, “If you come back a year from now, will you see that some of the things you did as a Peace Corps volunteer that really rubbed off on the local people? If you are not able to do that, then that means you worked in a vacuum. You spent two years in India; you spent two years in a village; you did your thing, but what did you leave behind in terms of physical evidence that if you return in a year or two you can say that you helped initiate that?”

Q: Of course, this Peace Corps international volunteerism was a new thing for us. It was part of the 1960s and its youth activism. Did you find that while you were in India, that a counterpart action was developing within the educated class in India. In other words were Indian young people taking a look at your program and saying that they didn’t want to do things the same old way; they wanted to get involved.

ROBINSON: Some, but minimally. As a volunteer I met perhaps maybe eight Indian men that might have taken on some of our attitudes. There were no women in my group. In Indian society you just did not have much contact with single women. But we did have these eight guys who hung around us. Victor Benny who was an Anglo-Indian; he was a hotel manager—well educated, very smart. Another Indian worked for USIS. He was probably the highest ranking Indian in USIS, Patna. Then there were a group of guys who came from the upper class, or upper middle class. Tharseen was one of them, and there were others. They watched us and observed. Relationships with them evolved beyond just a status symbol. They were seen as hanging out with the Americans. They could claim that they knew us. We became friends with their families. My partner Arnie and I knew an Indian family in Lucknow quite well; we used to spend much time with them, as well as another two or three Indian families in the Dargeen area. In Calcutta, we became friendly with some middle class Indian families. So, I would say that we did have a positive influence on certain Indians in terms of their attitude towards their own society. We used to have great intellectual conversations all the time, about Indian culture and mores, especially the caste system, and Hinduism and how people were treated etc.

Q: Were you getting any commentaries from you volunteers in south India? The Vietnam war was at its height and protests were at their height. Just by definition Peace Corps volunteers were not enthusiastic supporters of the war, to say the least. Did you have problems keeping your group under control?

ROBINSON: We didn't have any protests among the Peace Corps volunteers. That is a very interesting question because I have a number of reactions. One, the "domino" effect was a theory that was espoused a great deal among our politicians in the 1960s; it was their rationale about why we needed to be in Vietnam; e.g. to check the spread of communism. Bihar is not too far from China and the Soviet Union. You could sort of see the possibility of "dominos" falling right in front of your face. So being in South-East Asia generated a different kind of feeling about Vietnam than when I was back in the United States. We knew that Peace Corps volunteers were completing their tours as volunteers, returning to the States and being drafted and in many cases being killed on active duty; that was a reality that impacted all of us. When we flew from Bangkok to Hong Kong in August of 1966, we flew over Da Nang. I remember that clearly. We flew on a Pan Am flight on a clear day with some puffy white clouds. The captain came on the broadcasting system and said, "We are flying over Da Nang, and we are at 35,000 feet." We all said, "God, we don't want to come back to this place. We don't want to be down on the ground there." There was a clear dichotomy between those men who served in the Peace Corps in the early to mid-1960s as opposed to those who served in the late 1960s.

In the early 1960s, people joined the Peace Corps because they were committed to a spirit exemplified by the Peace Corps. Vietnam was not an issue at the time. But in the late 1960s, men were coming to the Peace Corps who were not as committed to its idealism as was my generation. They were in the Peace Corps because it was a way to escape the draft that would most likely have them end in Vietnam. So there was a different attitude that we had to deal with. The volunteers were smart, savvy. They were concerned about the war.

As I said, we didn't have problems in India with Peace Corps volunteers demonstrating in front of consulates or the embassy in Delhi. Quite frankly, outside of my social interactions with Indians and Americans in and around Bangalore and Madras, there wasn't a lot of intense discussion about Vietnam. I don't ever recall the threat of volunteers protesting or anything like that. The real problem that we had, relative to Vietnam, was the fact that the male volunteers were hard to keep engaged in their jobs. A lot of them were biding their time. Just hanging out killing time. I would say that once every six weeks, I was in my Jeep Cherokee riding all over south India, checking on the Peace Corps volunteers; I would guess that maybe 20% of the male volunteers were not pulling their weight. They were not as engaged as Peace Corps volunteers as their predecessors had been during my time, because, as I said, they didn't have that intensive commitment and loyalty to the Peace Corps precepts. That was due to Vietnam. The volunteers of the late 1960s were overseas just biding their time.

Q: Your area of southern India included Kerala? It was a Marxist state that everybody in the Foreign Service knew because it was the one Marxist state in India, and we all sort of looked at that crosswise. Did we do anything there? How did that work out?

ROBINSON: We had Peace Corps volunteers in Kerala. I remember a trip that Tom Carter and I took to Kerala to check on the Peace Corps volunteers throughout the state. There was an Indian official in Kerala who was very well educated, very intelligent, with tremendous vision. He and Tom Carter had an incredible relationship which continues to this day. He understood Americans and their zest for volunteerism. He was the champion supporter for the Peace Corps in Kerala. We didn't have any political problems because the Peace Corps was apolitical and so recognized. We were not tied to U.S. foreign policy per-se, not to the U.S. intelligence apparatus. At our headquarters in Bangalore, we made sure that we maintained philosophically and in terms of our operating policy that separation between U.S. foreign policy and the Peace Corps. We tenaciously clung to our Congressional mandate to put Peace Corps volunteers in India without regard to ideology. So I think that this Indian official saw this commitment and staked his political reputation and obviously his career on encouraging Peace Corps volunteers to serve in Kerala. Because of his trusted relationship with Tom Carter we got along well in Kerala. We didn't have any political problems.

Q: When you left south India in 1970, what was the state of the Peace Corps operation?

ROBINSON: The state of the Peace Corps operation in southern India in 1970 was excellent. Joe Blatchford and his wife, Winnie, visited southern India in the early 1970s. He and his wife stayed with me in Madras. We toured a number of Peace Corps volunteer sites together. The whole program in south India was deemed successful for all the reasons I have conveyed to you. When I left south India in May of 1970, I think my primary concern was that the Peace Corps program had gotten too big. I could routinely get on a plane to fly from Madras to Bangalore or from Bangalore to Delhi or elsewhere, and I would see a Peace Corps volunteer on the same plane. Same on any train; I would run into a Peace Corps volunteer. We went from less than a hundred volunteers when I was a Peace Corps volunteer in 1964-1965, to about 400 volunteers when I left my first tour in India. By the time I left India in 1970 we had an estimated 2500 volunteers throughout India. That was too many volunteers, too many Americans. Many of the volunteers were mistaken for what we used to call "world travelers" as opposed to hippies. As I mentioned earlier, a lot of hippies came to India in the 1960s. Peace Corps volunteers were by and large clean cut, well mannered, but there were a lot of Americans who were traveling through India who were hippies, but became identified as Peace Corps volunteers. Who were these scruffy Americans showing up all over our country? That became a major public relations problem for us and may well have contributed to the government of India asking the Peace Corps to leave India in the mid-1970s. "We no longer need you; we have grown out of the need for the Peace Corps." I think in part that view was reinforced because we had become too visible.

Q: Then when you left in 1970, where did you go?

ROBINSON: I came back to Washington. Joe Blatchford, when he visited south India, said to me, "Lenny, I would like for you to come back to the States when your tour is over here and head up our minority recruitment division at headquarters. We don't have enough Peace Corps volunteers who represent the mosaic of America. We need to be more diversified. I think that you can come back and lead the effort to have the Peace Corps revitalized, re-energized by recruiting more African-Americans, Hispanics and native Americans etc."

So that is what I did. I came back and headed up the minority recruitment effort of the Peace Corps. I was 26 years old when I arrived back in the United States in May of 1970. As I said, Joe Blatchford had offered me the position of director of minority recruitment; he made lots of promises about new resources. I had some definite ideas about how to go about diversifying. I really thought it was important for the Peace Corps to look like America.

Bill Dial was the Peace Corps' regional director for North Africa, the Near East and Southeast Asia; he became my mentor. Bill Dial said, "John Howser who is the deputy Peace Corps director thinks that you are too young to be director of minority recruitment. So he is trying to negate Joe Blatchford's promise to you to make you the director." He said, "Now I have told John Howser that he is wrong, that you are very mature, very bright, etc., etc.. So Howser has agreed to see you before making the final decision about whether or not you are going to get this Peace Corps position." I was sitting in Bill Dial's office and he picked up the telephone and he called John Howser and said, "John, Lenny Robinson is sitting right here. I am going to send him upstairs to you." So I went right upstairs and sat down with John Howser. I said, "Mr. Howser, I understand that you think I am too young to be the director for minority recruitment. I'm here to try to dispel all of your misgivings." That is the way I opened up the conversation. After ten minutes John Howser looked at me and said, "I was wrong. I am approving you as the Peace Corps director for minority recruitment." I accepted the position and got settled in Washington DC.

I became the director of minority recruiting for the Peace Corps. I had lots of ideas and a tremendous amount of energy. I felt a tremendous amount of pressure. I was just 26 when I had my first encounter with an ulcer. I felt a tremendous amount of pressure to succeed in the Washington milieu. I did not have the pressure of Vietnam service because I was 26 and therefore no longer eligible for the draft. I could not be drafted. But I was always a hard charging guy who wanted to succeed and to make a difference.

I inherited a minority recruiting operation that was in a state of inaction -- not disarray, but inaction. I had a wonderful staff of recruiters around the country and I had a wonderful staff in Washington. I wanted to have what I call an immediate impact. That drive took its toll on me in terms of the ulcer.

Ultimately we came up with some creative programs to strengthen minority recruitment. But I was frustrated by the lack of support that I got from Joe Blatchford, which was reflected in the lack of resources, despite his promises. So after being in that position for a year and a half I resigned as director of minority recruitment in late 1971. I walked in to Joe Blatchford's office and I said, "Joe, you have not lived up to your promises." I was cocky, admittedly. By this time I was 27. I said to Joe in sort of a flip way, "Look, you have not given me any of the resources or any of the political support that you promised me when you offered me this job. Quite frankly, I have other things to do. I want to join the Foreign Service and therefore I resign from the Peace Corps" He was shocked. He said, "I know that you want to be in the Foreign Service. I will pick up the telephone and call Secretary of State Rogers, and make sure that you get into the Foreign Service." I said, "No, don't make any more promises because I know you won't follow through." I turned around and I picked up my briefcase and I walked out. Now I walked out in part because I had two other job offers, one of which was to be director of minority affairs for USIA. That came about thanks to the PAO in Madras with whom I had become friends while serving in south India.

Q: Before we end the discussion about your Peace Corps service, let me ask what were some of the challenges you encountered in getting minority recruitment. I would think this would be a big problem because particularly at that time, most of the minorities were focused on domestic issues and not on overseas service to help others.

ROBINSON: There are a lot of things I could say about that. First of all, you recall in the 1960s there was a great deal of political change in America from John F. Kennedy's assassination to Martin Luther King's to Robert Kennedy's. The whole civil rights movement really took off in the mid to late 1960s. There was tremendous volatility in American society. All of that impacted people of color and African-Americans in particular. So I think that there was clearly a suspicion about being in any international program or in any program administered by the U.S. government. Secondly, a lot of African-Americans were more interested in getting an education as opposed to volunteering for two years. Peace Corps paid almost nothing. When I returned from India as a Peace Corps volunteer, I collected a check for about $2000; after I paid taxes on it, it was probably about $1800, leaving maybe $1600 to buy my first car. There were no immediate incentives. You could gain a modicum of vision if you could look positively to the potential multiplier effect of having served as a Peace Corps volunteer. But what did that mean to your career, for your earning power? What did it mean for your ability to understand how people live in cultures other than your own? When I was a Peace Corps volunteer in India in 1965, I was the only African-American in my program. There had been one before me in 1962-1963 whose name was Nominy Robinson. Then there was one other who joined the Peace Corps whom I met behind the American embassy at the swimming pool in early 1966. I recall when we met each other. He said, "Oh you must be the one in the south," and I said, "Oh, you must be the one in the north."

During the time that I was a Peace Corps director, I had maybe three working on my projects; maybe in the entire country there were no more than four or five. So in India we had very few African-Americans or people of color serving in the Peace Corps. There is no question that the Peace Corps was bereft of people of color. The idea of living overseas, the pressures to get an education, to begin to earn money and to help out their parents economically, all of these factors were of tremendous cultural, political importance in the United States at the time.

Just from the advertising, one could have easily reached the conclusion that the Peace Corps was for whites only. I took a look at that in 1970. One of the first things I did was to look at all of the Peace Corps advertising, the brochures, the commercials we had on television. There was one subject on color among all of that media stuff we had, so the perception was, the image was the Peace Corps was lily white. We changed all of that. We developed ads and commercials and brochures that reflected more of the diversity, more of the mosaic of America in the Peace Corps. My father and mother and my parent's best friend who was the president of A&T University. said to me in unison, "Oh, man, you are interested in joining the Peace Corps and going to India. That is worth two Ph.D.s. That kind of exposure, that sort of immersion." So I had encouragement to join the Peace Corps. I had this tremendous family support to join the Peace Corps. They clearly understood the potential impact of such a move. Interestingly enough, during the time Sergeant Shriver was the first Peace Corps director, we had a large number of prominent, well-educated African-Americans like C. Payne Lucas and Joseph Kennedy, Ambassador Williams who had been our ambassador to Ghana, all had been Peace Corps directors. Samuel DeWitt Proctor was the president of A&T University where my father taught. He later became the Peace Corps director in Nigeria. So there were lots of very prominent African-Americans in the Peace Corps at the administrative level.

That didn't necessarily help to bring volunteers in. We had a few, but not nearly as many as I would have hoped for. The Peace Corps today is still struggling today with this diversity issue. Obviously more people of color have joined in the past ten or fifteen years. One of the things we did was to clearly try to tie service in the Peace Corps with furthering the volunteer's education. I initiated a master's degree program with Texas Southern University in Texas and with Atlanta University in Atlanta. We created a master's degree program in international affairs in order to allow the Peace Corps volunteers to get not only a master's degree, but also two years of Peace Corps service. That worked very well in terms of increasing the numbers for Peace Corps volunteers. But with all the things happening in our society, plus the economic pressures that so many African-Americans and people of color faced, there was a lot of competition for volunteers. A lot of them went to college on scholarships or student loans, and they felt tremendous pressure to make money after graduating. Because of the impact of the civil rights movement, a lot of the corporations were reaching out to African-Americans, and they were being recruited. So the graduating minority student was being offered lots of opportunities to make money in corporate America as opposed to volunteerism in the Peace Corps; most of them went with corporate America.

EUGENE H. BIRD
Economic Officer
Bombay (1967-1970)

Commercial Attaché
New Delhi (1970-1972)

Eugene H. Bird was born in Spokane, Washington, in 1925. He received a bachelor's degree in journalism from the University of Washington. During World War II, he served in the U.S. Navy as a mechanical engineer. Following the war, Mr. Bird attended journalism school at the University of Oregon. His Foreign Service career included positions in India, Israel, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, and Egypt. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on June 2, 1994.

Q: Today is June 2, 1994. Gene, I just got you out of Cairo when you were evacuated from there. So we then move to Bombay, where we have you serving from 1967 to 1970. What was the situation in Bombay and in India in 1967?

BIRD: India was not a popular place for American policymakers at that point. It had been neutral for so long in the Cold War. This was a very deliberate neutrality, heavily slanted toward relations with the Soviet Union. At the time I arrived, the East Germans had the most pretentious Consulate General in Bombay. We'd been there a long, long time, of course. Bombay was an old post [for us]. The British colonial structure was still very much in place. The Breech-Kandy Club was founded by the people who had built the Suez Canal in the 1860's and 1870's. They had come to Bombay to continue what you might say was the "aid" program from Britain to rebuild the structure of imperial India. They had built the great gateway where Queen Victoria arrived. It was still a post that had overwhelming problems in terms of trying to relate to what was happening politically in Western India.

The Maharashtra, the Marathas, had ruled India, as they kept reminding us at every party, before the British came to power. So they were the last of the Indians to rule India. When independence came, they tried to assert themselves as true Hindus, so the RSS, the Maharat-Singh party, was very strongly in evidence in the Bombay and Poona areas. We tried to work the economic and commercial side. They were natural traders. They wanted relations with the United States. I had a very close friend who had gone to school with me back here in the United States. He had been a newspaper reporter for "The Hindu," which was [the major paper]. V. S. Vencataramani, or "Ram," as he was known, had become a Carnegie Fellow here in the United States. He had taught at Duke University and later on got the chair in American history at New Delhi University. He was, of course, a very interesting person to our Embassy and to ourselves, because he understood America and the politics of India very well, although he was from Southern India, which put him in a different class than Northern Indians, as such, who are the real rulers of India.

It was a fascinating time because we had Chester Bowles [as Ambassador]. He had been appointed to come out here by President Kennedy. I had a lot of Indian friends back here in the United States. So my assignment to Bombay was a natural appointment in some ways. I quickly gravitated toward doing quite a lot of reporting on what was really "happening."

Q: What was your position at the Consulate General?

BIRD: I was the Economic Officer -- the number three man at the Consulate General.

Q: Who was Consul General [at the time]?

BIRD: I was going to say Dan Ford, but I can fill this in later. Edward Cheney was my immediate boss. Later on, he died in the Philippines in an airplane crash while working for the Embassy there as DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission]. Cheney let me roam all over Western India. We used to say that we had the largest Consulate General in the world, and I think that that's probably true in terms of population. I don't remember the exact figures, but it was close to 200 million people in the consular district. It extended to the far South, far East, and far North of India. It was a part of India which was modernizing very, very rapidly. The center or "spark plug" for the Indian emergence into the 20th century was really in Bombay more than in Calcutta or Madras, which were pretty sleepy towns in comparison to Bombay, which was building skyscrapers and so on.

I got to know [people in] the J. R. V. Tata Group very well. Of course, one of the great issues was [nuclear] proliferation, even in those days. I arrived there in October, 1967. Already it was clear that India was on the path of building her first atomic weapon. We had on the staff [of the Consulate General] an officer of the [U. S.] Atomic Energy Commission. He tried to maintain contact with the Indians. Westinghouse was building the Tarapur civilian nuclear reactor.

The important thing was to try and get India aboard as far as inspection of that reactor was concerned. India had signed the Non-Proliferation Treaty. They had every reason to respect [the treaty], I suppose, but it was very clear, from the very large resources that they were putting into the atomic energy area that they had not just power in mind but they also intended to use it to make themselves into an atomic power like China. Whenever you'd get into a discussion with the Tata's or others, they would usually turn you off and say, "No, no, we're just on the civilian side." There were indications from all kinds of scientists that they were doing work that would lead directly to a bomb. So containing [that effort] was one of the issues that came up politically between the United States and India. Of course, the Indians would point across the Himalaya Mountains and say, "China already has the bomb. We have already fought one war with her and are likely to fight another. We don't want to be naked."

That was the bottom line, even though everyone knew that they really felt, back in those days, that Pakistan -- this was before the independence of Bangladesh -- was going to disappear. They felt that Pakistan could not be sustained and the Kashmir issue was constantly erupting, even as it does today. It's strange how these things keep coming back.

All of these political factors, coupled with the drive for India to find oil offshore -- the best place that India had to search for oil -- were included in the work of the Consulate General.

We had an enormous group of AID [Agency for International Development] people in the country and a very large Peace Corps. I think that there were 700 Peace Corps people [in India], and a lot of them were in our consular district. Mrs. Carter [President Carter's mother] was with the Peace Corps in India for a time. All of these matters introduced me to a whole new stretch of territory as far as the Foreign Service was concerned. We hadn't had Peace Corps people in the Middle East in general. We had [the nuclear] proliferation issue [in India] but we didn't really deal with it directly. We had an atomic energy person who could tell you in minute detail exactly how the Indians were going about [their atomic energy program], probably not directly using American technology, but they had an enormous number of people coming back from universities here in the United States and in the Soviet Union who had specialized in various aspects of nuclear physics and so on.

[The Bombay assignment] was a very interesting break from the Middle East, from the Arab-Israeli dispute itself, and from developments in the oil sector in the Middle East. India is a country, as was expressed by the director of the Census in India, of 650-750 million people. If 1% of us are geniuses, he said, this means six million geniuses. What other country has six million geniuses, he asked. This is an example of the rather bumptious attitude of some Indians, which is one of the reasons why many Foreign Service Officers and others were somewhat turned off by India.

Q: Were you "turned off" or not?

BIRD: No. I thoroughly enjoyed the culture. When we arrived [in 1967], there were no facilities for our children to go to school in Bombay. Here was a city of one million people that had no American "College." Every place else in the world with a large population has an American College in the country somewhere. We had the International School in New Delhi, but we chose instead to send both of our children to southern India, three days away by train, to a place called Koticanal. I guess that my attitude was reflected in the attitude of my children as they grew up. They both graduated from Koticanal and both went to Carleton College. Both chose to go back to India for their "junior year abroad" or their post-graduate period, although my son also went to AUB [American University of Beirut] to a college. So there was an attachment by the whole family to India. That is representative, I think, of a lot of people who got involved in India and the Indian culture as such.

Of course, Indian politics to me were absolutely fascinating because the Congress Party was in the course of breaking up. I had the opportunity, even as the number three officer in the Consulate General in Bombay, to meet the son of Mrs. Gandhi [She was then Prime Minister] and to talk to one or two of the cabinet ministers who were especially interesting to the Economic and Agricultural Section. The Indian elite, or literati, and the huge movie industry there were of special interest. India produced, and probably still does, more feature films than any other country in the world.

Indian movies were extremely long and used an enormous amount of Kodak film. Kodak was very important in India. The Kodak representatives would come in and rub their hands in glee over how much they were selling in India.

It looked to me as if India was at a "turning point" where it was going to make a "great leap forward." The steel industry was in place at that time. There was an aircraft industry of sorts, and they were still trying to maintain independence of the West, so far as computers were concerned. Indians had won two Nobel prizes in physics and mathematics already, and they had a great capability as computer programmers. They were just starting in this area. IBM [International Business Machines] was trying to maintain its presence in India. Later on, they had to sell out to their employees but continued to sell to India indirectly. However, they were giving India very low cost computers which were obsolete in the West, so they would "remanufacture" them. It was a perfect way for the Indians to learn exactly how to manufacture their own computers.

One of the personalities whom I remember who came in at that time was a rather well known entrepreneur from California who had decided to move to [the Republic of] Korea and build a lot of his high tech equipment in Korea at that early stage. He was checking out [other places] and he'd come to Hong Kong, Singapore, Sri Lanka, and then to Bombay, where he spent two or three weeks recruiting various industries to make exactly what he needed, as he said, at "50 cents on the dollar." He said that India was the lowest cost place to produce high tech material in the world, at that point.

We knew that India was going to become a factor in international business and, therefore, in international politics, in some sense. Of course, we couldn't foresee that two years later the Indo-Pakistan War would occur. When I moved up to New Delhi in 1970, it looked like another series of clashes between East and West Pakistan that would be solved by electing an East Pakistani president of East Pakistan, nominally, leaving the real power with the West Pakistanis.

Of course, it didn't work out that way at all. The military in [West] Pakistan moved against the East Pakistanis. The East Pakistanis declared their independence, and we went through the war...

Q: I'd like to get back to that later, but let's go back to Bombay. You were in the commercial capital of India. Am I right in saying that the commercial [people in Bombay] were quite different from the "politicians"?

BIRD: Yes. They didn't like the politics of Mrs. Gandhi at all. They didn't like the politics of the Congress Party, the "Laski" socialism that underlay everything that the Congress Party did. Of course, the Congress Party broke up while I was there in Bombay. We literally had a ringside seat at the breakup, with Mrs. Gandhi sitting two rows in front of me at a three-day conference of the Congress Party. That was when the Congress Party split and became the Congress Party (I) [for Indira Gandhi] and the old Congress Party headed by some of the high "pooba's" of the period under Nehru.

Mrs. Gandhi was opposed by people like Tata and others, but they always bet on both sides, just as many Americans, especially Texans, do. They'll put money into both the Democratic and Republican Parties. She knew how to do that. So it wasn't difficult for her. She was a great politician. She knew how to count, as Tip O'Neill used to say. She knew how to count how many people she had on her side and she was a very rough politician with anyone who opposed her. She was very effective. After all, she'd been raised by Nehru as his political daughter. It was a very fascinating moment for India, but it was also a fascinating moment for U. S.-Indian relations. Ambassador Chester Bowles made a practice of sending telegrams to Washington, explaining away the more obstreperous efforts of Indian politicians to show how "anti-colonial" they were by being anti-American or by being close to Moscow.

The "Moscow connection" between India and the Soviet Union was very, very close. There was a favorite story that was told at the time. It was apocryphal, of course, but it represented pretty well the feelings there. The story is that an attempt was made at Tashkent [in the Soviet Union] to bring India and China together on Russian ground and settle their conflict. The President [Prime Minister?] of India went to Tashkent, where he reportedly had what appeared to be a fatal heart attack. The story which went the rounds was that the Russians went to the head of the Indian delegation [in Tashkent] and said, "We have a Russian volunteer who is willing to give up his heart. He has the right blood type and so forth, if you can't find another candidate elsewhere. But this one fits, and he's willing to die so that your President [Prime Minister?] may live." The Indians went into a huddle and came back out and said, "No, no. What would happen to American aid [to India] if we had a President [Prime Minister?] with a Russian heart?" The Indians loved to tell that story.

Q: Did you have the feeling when you were in Bombay -- and I'll ask the same question when we move to your time in New Delhi -- that Ambassador Bowles was a "bleeding heart" liberal who developed "localitis" [in India] and got so involved with the local cause that he didn't see that, in a way, he was "selling out the store" by always trying to explain why the Indians were trying to "stick their finger in our eye." I know that he was not regarded very highly in Washington. People laughed at him.

BIRD: On the professional level, I think that you're right. He, of course, came from that category of liberals from the Northeast [of the U. S.] who do have a bleeding heart regarding the Third World. I remember that when he was appointed, there was a real struggle within the Kennedy administration. He had been brought into the [Department of State] as Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs, as I remember it -- I don't recall exactly. He was quite high ranking. I had a friend who was being considered for appointment as Ambassador, Gale Jiryu. He came back from meetings with Bowles on several occasions, puzzled as hell because Bowles would call him over and they would have a wonderful discussion of the whole world situation. My friend was waiting for appointment. There were rumors that he was going to be appointed as Ambassador to Algeria, but Under Secretary Bowles would never tell him. He would come back and say he was puzzled, as he thought that Bowles was going to tell him that time. I suppose that Bowles was a typical political appointee in many ways. He brought a lot of [intellectual] baggage with him. That baggage initially caused him a lot of problems with Congress regarding his confirmation as Ambassador to India, as a lot of people probably recognized that he would do just that -- be a "bleeding heart." I think that maybe people like that are sometimes like Latin American politicians who are sent out to be ambassadors somewhere simply to get them out of the country. In a way I suppose that [President] Kennedy felt that Bowles "fit" India very well and that he would, perhaps, repair relations with India. However, once he [Bowles] got to India, it was pretty obvious that he was India's representative in Washington, rather than America's representative in New Delhi.

Q: Did this bother you?

BIRD: I suppose not as much as it would have, before I served under him. I don't think that any [American] Ambassador to India at that time would have been very effective, with all of the issues before us, including nuclear proliferation, anti-Americanism, and the attempt to destabilize Pakistan, which was a great concern of ours. The Pakistanis helped that along to a considerable extent, of course, when they fell into that trap. I don't think that any Ambassador would have been very effective in opposing the direction in which India was going.

[In a situation like that] you have two choices: you can attempt to [exert] influence, which is what we're attempting to do with China at the present time, for example. Or you can "confront" [the other country] and let it go to a "cold war" type situation and hope that things will improve some day. At this time India was still a very new country [as an independent state]. It was a big country and was very important to us from the standpoint of opposing China. There wasn't any doubt about that. We forget how we were concerned about the possibility that China would not stop with Tibet but would continue into India. This was a little bit silly in a way because, looking not just at the geography but at the demography of the whole area, the Indian Communist Party was pretty powerful, or seemed to be.

I suppose it was worth playing this card -- sending a person like Bowles -- and letting him be a "soft" Ambassador. You don't have to take him seriously back in Washington. He wasn't taken that seriously, even by President Kennedy, over the long run. I think that one of the problems is that here was a country [India] which is very important to us, alongside a country that we didn't want to see them take over [Pakistan]. It was a Kuwait-type situation. We didn't want India to succeed in her attempts to destabilize and take over or break up Pakistan. That was really her aim, strategically.

When the break came, when the civil war [in Pakistan] started, everyone knew what was going to happen. Essentially, the Bangladeshis were not going to stay with Pakistan. In many ways they were closer to India than they were to West Pakistan. They are today. Strategically, it made sense for us to attempt to stand back and let things happen as they probably would.

By that time, of course, Ken Keating had been appointed Ambassador [to India]. He was another politician but a very different personality. He never really related to the Indians or, more precisely, the Indians never really related to him. He was a very interesting man to work for, and I worked very closely with him.

Q: You served in [the Embassy] in New Delhi from 1970 to 1972? What was your assignment there?

BIRD: I was Commercial Counselor for a while and then, when they [Washington] sent a new Commercial Counselor, I became the Commercial Attaché. I had, I suppose, a minor role [to play] in terms of many things on the political side. However, in other ways the "Birla's" and the "Big Banya's," as they call them, the large entrepreneurs in India, were very important in terms of the politics of Mrs. Gandhi.

I remember that one Saturday Ambassador Keating called me in and said, "G. D. Birla is coming in. I want you to stand by." Birla made a pitch that the Indian Air Force wanted to buy Phantoms [F-4 fighter aircraft]. He said that they wanted to stop being so dependent on the Russians.

Q: At that time the Phantom was the top of the line.

BIRD: The Vietnam War was under way and they [the U. S. Air Force and Navy] were using a lot of them there. They were very well-known as high quality aircraft. The Israelis had gotten some and so on. Ambassador Keating said afterwards, "Do you think that he's as well-connected as he pretends? Is he bringing us a message from Mrs. Gandhi?" This was just before the war with Pakistan. We wouldn't have been able to discuss it then, after the war began, because relations [with India] went sour. I replied to the Ambassador, "Yes. I think that he's probably down there, talking with Mrs. Gandhi's people or perhaps with her right now as to your reaction to this." Of course, nothing ever came of it, the point being that even Ambassador Keating was probably not taken all that seriously in Washington, any more than Ambassador Bowles was, in terms of recommendations that [either of them] made on our strategic relationship with India, which was the real issue.

Q: Of course, most of the time that you were in India, Nixon was President, and Kissinger was sitting at his right hand. Both of them really had a certain disdain for India, didn't they?

BIRD: Oh, yes, and didn't really understand it. They appointed people with equal disdain. I remember [William H.] Sullivan, who was then one of the [Deputy] Assistant Secretaries for East Asian Affairs.

BIRD: Yes. He came to India when we were trying to coordinate policy. The Vietnam War was at its height. I remember walking up to him afterwards and saying, "You know, I've been in NEA [Bureau of Near East Affairs] for a long time. I've seen the breakoff of the Bureau of African Affairs. We wonder if India really doesn't belong in Southeast Asia, rather than with NEA." This issue has come up recently when the Department was forced to create a Bureau of South Asian Affairs, as you know. Sullivan looked at me and said, "We don't want 'em [India]." I'll never forget the look on his face. He's a very abrupt personality.

The attitude toward India and Indian politicians was that they were essentially anti-American and devious. Down in Southeast Asia they had a name for anyone who was of Indian background or even anyone who was devious at all and not to be trusted. They call them a "Malabari."

This consciousness of not being able to make the Indians hew to a particular line came through with [Secretary of State] Kissinger when he came to India and we had a chance to talk to him. One of the nice things about political ambassadors, I think, is that they feel like reaching out to their staff and making use of them in the same way that a CEO [Chief Executive Officer] would in a company -- I mean a good one. Both Bowles and Keating used to have visitors like William Buckley or Kissinger or others who came through talk to a staff meeting of the section heads in the Embassy. There would be 20 or 25 people there because we had something like 700 American employees in the Embassy at that time, including all of the different agencies. I remember that there were 47 [U. S. Government agencies] with more than 700 people -- an incredible number.

Within a few years one-third of all of the currency in India was going to be in the hands of the U. S. Government. This was ridiculous. We were pouring wheat into India and had been since 1954 [1951?]. However, we really didn't have a strategic policy toward India. We struggled with this [issue] over the years. I think that Ambassador Bowles' appointment, in a sense, was an attempt to develop a new policy toward India.

Ambassador Keating's appointment was a step backward. I think that he was simply a failed politician who was sent out by Nixon and Kissinger, neither one of whom really had much regard for him. I heard a lot of stories about the attitude of Kissinger toward Keating. Later on, when Keating became Ambassador to Israel, Kissinger made fun of Keating, as he made fun of a lot of people. [Kissinger] made a lot of enemies, in many ways.

Did I tell you this story about when Kissinger came to New Delhi? We had a meeting with all of the heads of section [in the Embassy] in the "safe" conference room upstairs in the Embassy. We were given an hour and each of us was allowed only one question. Kissinger was accompanied by Bill Quandt, who was his bag carrier. My question to him was: "Mr. Secretary, do you think that a Tashkent [type meeting] is going to be necessary in the Middle East?" I meant, of course, that you had to bring the Russians in. Kissinger understood the question right away and didn't ask for any explanation at all. He replied, "Well, you have to understand that because of my ethnic background I have deliberately stayed away from anything having to do with the Middle East." What a change from [then to] now when we have so many people who are very closely connected with Israel in one way or another or are very closely bound to Zionism, who are in charge of our policy. I face them every day now.

Kissinger went on and spent 12 minutes out of the whole hour on this one question. Of course we couldn't record [his remarks] and weren't supposed to take notes in these sessions. Nevertheless, I made a few notes afterwards. In typical Kissinger fashion he started out by saying no, that he didn't think that a Tashkent type of conference was necessary or desirable in the Middle East to resolve the Arab-Israel dispute. But by the end of his comments he was saying, in effect, "Yes." He had argued himself around to the point where he was saying that it might, of course, be useful to bring the Russians [into the negotiations], as they have been brought in during the post Cold War period.

Many of us had felt for a decade or more that our contacts with the Russians -- and I had some in India and had had some contacts with them in Cairo which indicated very much that they'd like to be invited to the negotiating table, that they could be very useful, and that we could start to reduce the competition in terms of munitions shipments to the area if we'd only do the same.

Kissinger, of course, came from a tradition of confronting the Russians on every occasion and "doing them in" whenever possible and not cooperating with them on anything. You can say that that was necessary in that period but, looking back, I think that the Cold War might have been ended earlier by using some of these regional areas where we had similar or parallel interests.

Q: When you were in New Delhi, you were then up against the political class of Indians. Did you have the feeling -- and this was the time when India had very close relations with the Soviets -- that the Indians you talked to, for example, the people in the Congress Party and so forth, felt comfortable with this [relationship with the Soviet Union]? Did they realize the enormity of the Soviet problem, how they dealt with their minorities, how their economy [functioned] and all that?

BIRD: Well, if I can jump back to Bombay for just a moment, one of the people there in the film industry used to show [privately] films that were rejected for [general] showing in India. Usually, they were a little too "R"-rated, shall we say. He would invite small groups in to see these films. As a result, I got on a list of people interested in films and so on in the film industry.

One night we were invited, not to his small, but to his large theater. It turned out that it was the 50th anniversary of something in Russia [possibly 1967, the 50th anniversary of the Communist Revolution of 1917]. The Russians had a celebration of Lenin. They had spent a lot of money turning out these films in English. They were absolutely horrible. It was kind of a disaster because they got some of the Indian film stars there. The Indian film stars told stories that were somewhat anti-Russian. In front of a [Soviet cabinet] minister from Moscow, who had been sent down to tour with this film. They'd invited all kinds of people there, but the theater wasn't full. A lot of people just didn't come. One of the Indian film stars told this story about Tashkent and the Soviet part in it, with the Soviet cabinet minister on stage. I think that in New Delhi [Indian political figures] certainly realized, even people from the Congress Party and people around Indira Gandhi, that they were essentially oriented toward the West. I got to know her son...

Q: Which one -- Sanjay or Rajiv?

BIRD: Rajiv. I got to know both of them, but not that well. Right in the center of New Delhi there was a place where you could go and fly in gliders. We'd go over there. I had had a private pilot's license at one time but didn't keep it up. We would just take rides. Rajiv would be around, on occasion. I think that people [like him] were very oriented toward Western tastes and Western ideas. However, they recognized a certain, native nationalism. I came to the conclusion that they were escaping from the colonial heritage, really. I think that, in terms of that, India has come a long way over the past 25 years. The Indian Army and Air Force wanted the best [equipment available]. They would probably have preferred British equipment to anything else, reflecting typical, post-colonial ideas. However, when it came time to buying [civil] aircraft, they bought Boeing [jets]. They didn't buy Ilyushins or anything like that. Of course, that was [a reflection of the influence of] J. R. D. Tata, I suppose. The point is that there was a lot of Western -- and especially American -- orientation in Indian society.

Q: You're talking, obviously, about the Indians who found it very hard to reject the colonial heritage. At the same time, as was the case with lots of countries in Africa, far more dangerous to their economy than the Soviet system was following the English Socialist/Fabian/Laski system. To me it sounds as if this was a far more pernicious influence in the post-colonial world than the threat of Communism. There was a very poor distribution of goods and all that. Was this your feeling?

BIRD: Oh, yes. They would make [certain] decisions. I got to know the head of the State Trading Company, who was an entrepreneur par excellence in many ways. He had come from the old Indian Civil Service [ICS].

At the time that India became independent, I remember M. S. Vankaramani telling me, "You know that the great strength of India is in her 850 members of the ICS. They really run India." That was probably still true [when I was in India]. Even in those days there were still probably 50 to 100 of them from the original ICS. The new [post independence] ICS was not viewed with the same, high regard. However, the old ICS was the equivalent for all of India, I suppose, of the American Foreign Service in terms of American foreign affairs. It [the old ICS] was an elite.

Q: We've already referred to it, but can we talk a little more about the war between India and Pakistan over Bangladesh or East Pakistan? Were you there at the time? How was this building up and what were the contacts with our Embassy in Rawalpindi [now Islamabad, in West Pakistan] and all of that?

BIRD: Yes, I was there. Sidney Sober was one of the key people in the [American] Embassy in Rawalpindi at that point. He made two or three trips when the crisis erupted. At first we didn't take it too seriously. I went down to Calcutta a couple of times and talked with Herb Gordon, who was down there as Consul General, as I recall. We felt that there were very close relations between the two Bengals -- East Pakistan and the State of Bengal [in India], whose capital was in Calcutta. They were the same people. In many ways they shared the same kind of geography -- low-lying, rice-growing peoples of the river deltas and estuaries. They had the same disregard for both Delhi -- on the part of [the Bengalis] in Calcutta -- and on the part of the [leaders of] East Pakistan for their Muslim brothers in West Pakistan. I suppose that what was kind of shocking to me was that we did a lot in trying to stop the separation of the two states, East and West Pakistan. However, I think that we recognized -- right from the start -- that it was inevitable. It is these inevitable situations which we face in Bosnia and Serbia. We probably didn't want to recognize Bosnia-Herzegovina quite as rapidly as we did. And we certainly didn't recognize Bangladesh as rapidly as we might have.

Of course, the breakup of a country is always very difficult for outside powers. However, seeing this [situation] develop, we essentially wrung our hands and stuck with our West Pakistan friends, who were all generals. We had given Pakistan a lot of things, including a submarine which, of course, they should have returned the year before but didn't do. It was discovered on the morning that war broke out between India and Pakistan, lying off the major Indian naval base of Vyzak. It was sunk immediately by the Indians. It was the equivalent, I suppose, of the United States becoming involved in the war. That's the way the Indians played it.

Leading up to it [the war], I think that it was like leading up to the 1967 War [in the Middle East] which I had witnessed and which [resulted in my coming] to India. We didn't do nearly enough. Whether that's because we didn't have a president who was willing to get involved in a situation of this kind, [I don't know]. We didn't do nearly enough to try for a peaceful resolution of it. Maybe there was no peaceful resolution possible. The West Pakistani generals were our friends. Essentially, we warned India, "Don't try to take over all of West Pakistan." It would have been a great mistake for India to do that, of course. However, the fact was that everyone knew that there was going to be a war and that things were on the slippery slope for several weeks if not months before.

Q: Were you getting anything from Washington?

BIRD: From the desk officer, yes. But from the White House, no, I don't think that there were any warnings to the Indians not to encourage civil war [in East Pakistan].

Q: What were our feelings prior to the collapse of East Pakistan and to the reports of atrocities? Were they dismissed, believed, or how did we feel?

BIRD: I think that they [the atrocity reports] were dismissed in Washington. I didn't see any change at all as a result of this. We knew that that sort of thing was going to happen. It was inevitable when you have a small group of military, trying to maintain power with a very large, demographic imbalance against them. The fact was that we allowed American-made planes to be used to reinforce East Pakistan. We allowed the use of a lot of American technology in that war, even though there had been these reports of human rights violations.

Q: Was our Embassy in New Delhi playing a role, asking what about these reports?

BIRD: Ambassador Keating was a political appointee, of course, but he had Galen Stone as his DCM, and he had a pretty strong Political Section. They reported honestly what was being told to our "scouts," shall I say, people who were reporting to us on what was happening in Dacca. Part of [this information] came from Indian Intelligence, I'm sure, but as far as recommendations were concerned, by the time the killings started, there was very little that one could do. We went out to the airport after the war was over, and Mujib was released. He was flown to London first. He had been in West Pakistani hands for a time. The Indians sent a plane to pick him up, and he came in on an Indian aircraft to the airport in New Delhi.

My son and I went out to the airport, curious to see this figure, Mujib. Later on my son and another person wrote a book, called, "The Unfinished Revolution in East Pakistan," because he went in there right after the war was over. He was 18 then, maybe closer to 19. He went in with a CBS [Columbia Broadcasting System] camera crew. He became a "gaffer," holding cameras and that sort of thing for several weeks. The Indian Army helped them cross the border. They had to wait for some time for visas to get out of India and into East Pakistan or Bangladesh.

They got to Dacca. He didn't interview Mujib, but he later on wrote this book on East Pakistan.

I suppose that we could have done more, earlier, but there was very little that could be done to prevent the breakup of Pakistan. A lot of our Pakistani friends said, later on, "You know, we're stronger now because..."

Q: How about this famous "tilt" toward Pakistan and sending the USS ENTERPRISE, a nuclear powered aircraft carrier, to the Bay of Bengal? How did that play in New Delhi and at our Embassy?

BIRD: I blame that a little on the professional [diplomats] back here [in Washington] because it seems to me that ideas like that occur at the NSC [National Security Council] level -- maybe at the level of Sid Sober and others -- but essentially this was a warning to India not to interfere too much in this situation. Obviously, they were at war. We would sit there in New Delhi and watch the Indian aircraft and an occasional Pakistani aircraft come flying over, but they didn't venture out very much after the first few days. We had a blackout. It was a time when events had overtaken the policymakers, quite frankly, and nobody was in control.

In the Embassy we never really understood why a carrier was sent into the area.

Q: It just sounds like...

BIRD: It was action.

Q: "Don't just stand there, do something." Was there a problem explaining what the [deployment of the carrier meant] and was this trying to put the best face on this?

BIRD: Thank God I didn't have the responsibility for explaining it to the Indians. I suppose you could have said that [this was done] for the protection of American interests and so forth. I don't think that we would ever have threatened the Indians with using the carrier. It would have been a useless thing in the first place.

Q: Absolutely. Well, one last thing I'd like to talk about before we move on to your last post. What about Vietnam? Was this something that always was there -- I mean, our actions in Vietnam?

BIRD: Well, Bill Sullivan had come over [to New Delhi] primarily in hopes of finding a useful way to get the Indians to help in the negotiation of a solution to the Vietnam War. There had been a proposal -- nothing formal, I suppose, nothing contained in one despatch. The Embassy [in New Delhi] had always sought Indian help in terms of Vietnam. India is a big country, and it had a lot of interests there [in Vietnam]. It turned out that they made a lot of money out of Vietnam. A lot of the Malabaris, a lot of the Indians in Southeast Asia went to Saigon and took the United States for a lot of money.

Q: I was Consul General in Saigon during part of this. We used to refer to the Black Market as the Bank of India, meaning Indian tailors engaged in running all kinds of illegal activities.

BIRD: They were probably helping the Viet Cong in the long run. So India was involved. You could go to Eastern India -- I never did this -- and, on occasion, you could see the B-52 raids, the flashes on the horizon. It was that close to Northern Laos and North Vietnam.

I think that India was probably trying to help us. I think that it was a situation in which Mrs. Gandhi saw an opportunity. She didn't have much opportunity, however, because I don't think that the Vietnamese would listen to India any more than we would. Frankly, that's a sad thing in terms of her efforts in the field of foreign relations. Her efforts hadn't been very successful or consistent over the years. I think that she tended to move toward Moscow because she didn't want to be too close to the West. She was a neutral leader and saw herself as a great neutral leader. And, of course, when that effort failed for many, many reasons, it became an obsession with her to become a leader in some fashion or other in the "Third Force."

Where is India now, you have to say? I don't think that India has made great advances in economic terms but in terms of world politics India is less important today than she was.

CLARENCE SWIFT GULICK
Assistant Director for Development Policy, USAID
New Delhi (1967-1972)

Clarence Swift Gulick was born in Brooklyn, New York, and raised in Milburn and Maplewood, New Jersey. He received a bachelor's degree in economics and political science from Swarthmore University and attended graduate school at Harvard University. In January of 1943, he began active duty in the U.S. Navy. His Foreign Service career included positions in India, Ireland, Pakistan, and Nigeria. Mr. Gulick was interviewed by W. Haven North on February 1, 1996.

Q: What was your assignment then?

GULICK: The same assignment; Assistant Director for Development Policy.

Q: So you went from Nigeria directly to India?

GULICK: Yes. In India the office consisted of the program office proper, which mostly worked on the technical assistance program, and an economic office which was fairly large as those went. I think we had four: say one and a half American economists and three or four Indian, quite good, economists in the economic office, and the little unit that ran the non-project loan commodity aid.

Q: And that was part of that office too?

GULICK: Yes, three pieces.

Q: You were in India how long?

GULICK: Oh, over five years; from '67 to '72.

Q: What was the main line of your efforts in India? What was the effort there, the policy? What were you trying to accomplish?

GULICK: We were generally pushing for - we were still functioning in the context of the consortium for aid to India. I should have mentioned that earlier, because I was very much involved in starting the consortium the '58/'59 period. We were following along with substantial DLF projects and commodity aid, fairly substantial amounts of commodity aid. Of course PL 480 particularly, actually the couple of years before I got there was extremely large. The Indians had a severe drought for two years, I think '64/'65 and we had provided them with a great deal of grain enabling them to fend off a famine. Most of our 300 plus people were involved in the technical assistance program which again was pretty largely continuing with the emphasis was pretty well established before I got there. The biggest single activity was in agriculture; especially the agricultural universities. We helped set up by providing university teams to five new agricultural universities in India, which were a new phenomenon for them. We had a substantial team from five US universities working each one of them. Also in education we were helping, along with other people, with the establishment of one of the Indian technical universities. We had some agricultural teams working on research and training and demonstrations of improved practices in several areas. We also had a substantial non-project commodity import loan and a number of DLF capital projects, e.g., a cooperative fertilizer factory.

Q: When was the period of the new rice and Green Revolution?

GULICK: This was in process then, it had started before. The Ford Foundation had always had a very large agricultural technical assistance program there and we were working closely with that, actually supporting them. They had helped the Indians develop the program for rapid adoption of the new rice varieties.

Q: Were you involved in that?

GULICK: No, not directly very much, but, of course, the agricultural universities were supporting it, and the extension services and demonstration teams that we had fit right in with that.

Q: Was there any particular Mission view about the Green Revolution and its potential or problems or issues?

GULICK: No, no, everybody was very enthusiastic about it. We were a little concerned that, some others were, about the equity and the small farmers and so forth; but it proved to be almost as quickly adopted by them as by the bigger farmers and was equally successful. We had a big capital projects program there, which was ongoing. There were a few major projects: we had a major fertilizer project which was, I guess, the first major fertilizer project done outside the public sector. It was in the cooperative sector.

Q: How did it work?

GULICK: Pretty well, as far as I know. I think it's still working. We got the American cooperatives to support it and an American company, which was very well regarded by all our technical people, who did the design and supervision and another American company to provide the major equipment. So it was very carefully planned and was effective. The nuclear power station that we helped finance was already functioning by the time I got there, but there were some continuing issues.

Q: That was working satisfactory?

GULICK: Reasonably well, Yes.

Q: You were there during the Johnson administration?

GULICK: Yes, the end of it.

Q: I raise this point, because I gather there was some issue of President Johnson and Indira Gandhi over PL 480 assistance that he held up.

GULICK: Yes, the issues on that were before my time.

Q: What were the issues on that?

GULICK: Well, it was also part of this whole business with the Bell-Mehta agreement, the World Bank led consortium, and the major commitment of continuous substantial aid to the current 5 year plan. It included: mainly the liberalization and raising the farmer's price of grain and reduction of the compulsory grain sales to the state and so on. And perhaps most important, the fertilizer: making available fertilizer, encouraging private distribution of fertilizer and encouraging private sector production of fertilizer. Also pushing hard on the small irrigation programs particularly in the Punjab and other areas. There were quite a lot of rather specific measures, but the ones that were controversial were the liberalization type ones. Johnson, really Orvill Freeman, who was Secretary of Agriculture at that time, got Johnson excited about insisting on Indian performance on these things sort of month by month and releasing the food that they needed gradually in view of adequate performance in these various respects. It was probably pretty much resented by all of the Indians. Some mixed feelings though, because most of the people, the people above the purely bureaucratic level, agreed that these things should be done.

Q: I understand that Johnson held up the PL 480 agreement, which infuriated Indira Gandhi.

GULICK: I'm sure that's true. I don't know the details on that.

Q: And the consequence she then determined that she would never be dependent on US food assistance. Did you ever hear that story?

GULICK: Well, there were certainly desires to become less dependent announced periodically.

Q: Was that happening while you were there?

GULICK: The dependence decreasing? No,...well, the dependence on PL 480 was decreasing, because the food production was rapidly increasing. Of course that was the whole point.

Q: But there was a big distribution problem wasn't there ?

GULICK: Just before I got there, the end of this drought, there was a major public distribution relief program, which was very well done. No one really starved even though the crop failure was very widespread and very severe. That was really just about over by the time I got there, and by then there was a lot of mutual congratulation about how well it had been handled.

Q: Who was the Director then?

GULICK: John Lewis. I think he had been there for about a year, actually quite a bit more. He had gone there fairly early in Bell's administration. He came over from the Budget Bureau or the Council of Economic Advisors and was sent out there. He had indicated he might like me to come out there before I went to Nigeria.

Q: What was his main interest?

GULICK: He was very much involved in all this Bell-Mehta agreement, and Chester Bowles was ambassador at the time. He and Bowles had known each other before and were very close. He wasn't there yet when Hollis and I went out, I don't think.

Q: Were there any other major issues that you had to deal with in that five year period?

GULICK: Well, family planning became an issue. The whole health program had been developed: a fairly substantial health education and health program planning, rural health planning and so forth. The program had been developed and then one of our all too frequent wind shifts happened in Washington and the whole rug was pulled out from under that. Sort of like the steel mill again - when it was pretty far down the track. All we wanted to do was family planning. John had to handle that, but it was a bad show. Our public health man, who had been working on the health program really, in effect, quit after that.

Q: And this was in the year of the Basic Human Needs emphasis?

GULICK: Yes I guess so.

Q: What was the government's attitude towards the thrust of family planning?

GULICK: They were very annoyed by having the program, which had been carefully planned, all of a sudden jerked out. They were interested in family planning. The Ford Foundation had been working with family planning but they didn't want anything to do with us in health anymore after that. We got involved in an attempt to support a substantial stepping up their family planning program. We continued with sort of modest technical assistance activities to the extent they wanted it, but they didn't really want it.

Q: You say they wanted out of the health program?

GULICK: The health people in the Indian government felt really betrayed by this business and they didn't trust us. They didn't want to count on us for anything.

Q: They were discouraged with our shift away from health to the Indian family planning.

GULICK: Yes!

Q: We were dropping health ourselves?

GULICK: Yes, they had been just been working up with us quite a major program in health education and rural health and so on, and all of a sudden it was pulled out after really we had pretty much committed ourselves to it. So we had people there trying to develop interest in family planning, and they did to some extent; but it was a rather awkward period for several years there. Then we got involved in an effort to encourage a substantial increase in their budget for family planning. Maury Williams was the Assistant Administrator by then. He arranged, at some international meeting to offer up to $20,000,000 to support an increase in the budget for the family planning program. So for the last year '71/'72, we were developing a program to try to take advantage of that offer, and it was eventually successful.

Q: Were you dealing with a separate agency in the Indian government, not with the health people?

GULICK: No no, it was the health people.

Q: I see. Were you joining the health and family planning as a common program, or was it just pure family planning.

GULICK: Yes.

Q: And there wasn't a concept of integrated...

GULICK: The Indians did, but we didn't.

Q: I see. So our policy was not to relate the two?

GULICK: Well, I'm sure we were in favor of relating them, but we weren't supporting the health program, only family planning.

Q: I see. Were there other shifts at that time?

GULICK: No. There were three main things that we didn't do, that the Indians felt we welshed on: the steel mill in the first place, and then the commitment to provide non-project aid in support of this Bell-Mehta agreement. We made the first year's level; but we never made the level we were supposed to after that.

Q: We continued, but with a reduced amount?

GULICK: Yes, and then the health program.

Q: So we backed off and they thought we had reneged on our original understandings?

GULICK: Yes.

Q: I see.

GULICK: I don't know, I've never been sure how much that really surprised anybody but they always cited this at anytime...

Q: Did we have anything to do with the community development at that time, or did that pretty much pass by?

GULICK: We never did have much to do with that directly. The Ford Foundation was very much involved in early stages of that and went right along. I remember I went out there in 1957, January, for my first visit. We had one person on mission staff who was following it and that was it.

Q: Were we still working with agricultural colleges? That was still a major activity?

GULICK: Oh, yes. That was the major activity in the agricultural sector.

Q: How was that working out?

GULICK: On the whole very well. Better some places than other places, but generally well. Punjab was very successful.

Q: We had five university contracts?

GULICK: Five contracts.

Q: Which one did you think was most impressive?

GULICK: I think the Punjab project. They had a very dynamic and aggressive Vice Chancellor there, but they were all pretty good. I'm trying to remember there was one that was not going quite so smoothly, maybe that was Orissa. Of course, there were always from time to time problems on staffing and there were others things that didn't go to well.

Q: Any sense of what the contribution of those programs were to agricultural involvement in the country?

GULICK: Oh, they were very considerable. Everyone agreed that they were very successful, I think. The Indians were very enthusiastic. In detail, I think, through the staffing of the extension service, the research programs and so on. The universities had important research functions too, although the Indian Council of Agricultural Research has it's own major program. We helped a little, I guess, setting up the Indian Center for Research in the Semi-arid Tropics (ICRISAT) which was an activity of the global agricultural research program. That became a very good institution. We didn't directly have much to do with it. I don't think we provided any technical people for it, but a number of our agriculture university teams were cooperating with it, and did some very good work apparently.

Q: Apart from the family planning and the agricultural institutional involvements, were there any other main lines of technical assistance and commodity import programs?

GULICK: There were some capital projects: the main one that I remember, the big one that was going on that was being negotiated when I was there, was the fertilizer factory.

Q: What was your experience working with the Indian government? How did you find that?

GULICK: Well, there were a great many very good people, both technically competent and able to take initiative and terribly dedicated. Two people I knew pretty well killed themselves by overworking: one was the Planning Commission chap-P. Pant, and the other was the chap who was the first Indian I met when I started working on India in Washington here. He was the Indian Economic Minister here- Govindan Nair. He later became the Finance Secretary of the Government of India. That's where he was when I was in India. He died very young, both of them died very young from, at least, partly overwork. And quite a few other people I knew in the Finance Ministry and the Economy Industry Ministry were very good. There were a lot of very good people.

Q: What about the bureaucracy?

GULICK: Well, that was the bureaucracy, but they were the top of course. The bureaucracy in India is pretty bureaucratic. And certainly a lot of the bureaucrats in the ministries that had responsibility for running public sector industries and so on, had an interest in public sector industries. Surprisingly a lot of the people with professional training were pretty liberal and welcomed many of the liberalization measures that were being encouraged by the foreigners.

Q: What was your sense of the Indian attitude towards the United States or the Americans?

GULICK: It was pretty good. I guess, the Peace Corps got started fairly early on there. I remember seeing Peace Corps people in '56. They were generally quite well received. It depended a lot on where we were at with India/Pakistan relations. When they were fighting we were generally not very sympathetic to the Indians, and as I say we never did have a substantial military program there. We kept leaning on them somewhat on Kashmir with some justification. So from the overall political standpoint, and then, of course, the end was really the reason why I left there, when Bangladesh split off from Pakistan. The Indians sympathized with the Bangladeshis and we "tilted", according to Nixon's term, toward the Pakistanis. The Indians, I think, really resented pretty much our attitude on that and didn't believe it was well founded.

Q: Why did we tilt towards Pakistan?

GULICK: Well, just because the Pakistanis were our boys weakening Afghanistan and so forth. We had substantial bases in Pakistan and a military assistance program. When did the Russians move into Afghanistan? So we made gestures even sending a fleet, ships out to roam around the Indian ocean as sort of an implication that we might actually help the Pakistani try to suppress Bangladesh. Meanwhile the Indians weren't actually participating at all, but a whole flock of refugees, 10,000,000 of them, came across the border from Bangladesh to India and they had to put them all in camps and feed them, and they were scared stiff that they would stay, that they wouldn't go back.

Q: Were you involved in any emergency...

GULICK: No, no. We weren't sympathetic and sort of kept treating the Indians as though they were kind of responsible for this insurrection in Bangladesh, not quite that, but our official line was quite hostile to India at that time, and we cut off all aid.

Q: We cut off all aid?

GULICK: All financial aid, not existing technical assistance projects, but everything else. Not food, at least not voluntary agency food; but all the capital aid we cut off.

Q: And the commodity import program?

GULICK: Yes.

Q: This was at the end of your period?

GULICK: Yes, in '72. I always thought that the intelligence that the administration based its decisions on in that respect was very bad. I saw some things suggesting that we thought that the Indians were actually about to attack Pakistan or get involved in military actions against Pakistan in connection with that, and I just don't believe there was anything to that at all.

Q: Anything else on the India experience that stands out at this point? You traveled around the country I guess. How did you find the conditions generally? How would you characterize what you saw?

GULICK: Well, pretty much the way it is. Our attitudes towards India on what's going on economically in India and even politically to some extent seemed to go through cycles. Sometimes everything is great and other times you would think everything is going to hell in the hand basket. The Indians sometimes would allow it themselves, but they always exaggerate it one way or both ways. Generally, I thought they were making pretty good progress, needed to liberalize more; but there were still as many or more poor people as there ever were. The population has more than doubled, since I've been working on India. Much more, almost tripled! There is the top half maybe, or more, doing pretty well, and there's a much bigger middle class and well to do class than there was; but there's still a very large number of people who are at the bottom of nowhere. Politically certainly the trend over this whole period had been that the Congress party has weakened various other parties that have come along. The present Congress government is really a minority government. It depends on the tolerance of a number of minority parties; it may well not form the next government after the next elections, if things go the way they look like they might. I keep running into people who think India is going to break apart; but I've never really thought any particular break that I could think of was very likely in India. People talk about Bengal breaking away, but Bengal has more interest in a united India than any other region probably. Communal difficulties seem now to be certainly worse than they seemed to be some years ago.

Q: One of the earlier projections about India's population growth was such that it was going to double and triple and so on as you suggested, but that it was never going to be able to feed this number of people, in other words that it was going to be a real disaster case.

GULICK: I remember fairly early on we got a few people from the University of Illinois, I think, regarded as experts on overall economic and agricultural potential, to come out and make a very careful estimate of the potential with current or immediately imminent technology of how many people India could feed. At that time the population of India was about 400 million. Now it's about one billion. At that time they estimated that it could with, like I say, current and maybe available technology and reasonable investment and so forth, support eight times that population. So that would double a few times.

Q: But that is contradictory of what other people were implying at that time, that there was no chance that they could feed themselves.

GULICK: It may have been less than 400 million at the time. But anyway it involved fully exploiting the water potential, the water resources and high yielding varieties and optimum fertilizing and so on. It was probably optimistic, but it was based on the types of land and how much land, and the potential of water and so on. I think it wasn't probably totally out of the ballpark. Anyway, so far they have been keeping up; in fact they are exporting grain now.

Q: What would you say were the major factors in being able to keep up?

GULICK: Well, better use of the water and high yielding varieties. Those were the main things. Fertilizer was important too.

Q: You think that the US assistance program contributed anything?

GULICK: Yes, we and the Ford Foundation together certainly did.

Q: The Ford Foundation and the US together.

GULICK: Yes.

Q: Mostly in which areas, you say?

GULICK: Aside from the policy areas, which were very important, which they might have done anyway. They certainly got some strong pushes from both the Ford Foundation and us and the World Bank. The improved varieties, more and better use of fertilizer, and we helped with some of the irrigation programs. I'm sure the continuing research is important and gets more important as time goes on. I would be skeptical whether they could really get to eight times as much without some really difficult periods. So far the population growth hasn't really slowed down; the death rate is going down as fast as the birth rate, and the birth rate hasn't gone down anywhere near what we would hope that it would. But they are getting more active again now. They had that big reverse on the family planning. It sort of backfired contributing to Indira's loss of power. They really were getting pretty close to compulsory vasectomization.

Q: Was that during your time?

GULICK: Just after it. We had gotten some indications that there were dangerous tendencies before I left.

Q: Had we taken a position on that?

GULICK: No, well, our position was that family planning should be voluntary. That was their policy too, but particularly under Sanjay Gandhi's influence, it got to be so that pressure for performance on the local authorities was extreme - and probably resulted in a certain amount of winking at coercion of various sorts.

Q: Anything more on the India thing?

GULICK: I guess not.

RICHARD T. DAVIES
Calcutta (1968-1969)

After graduating from Columbia College in 1942, Ambassador Richard T. Davies served in the U.S. Army in World War II. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1947, Ambassador Davies has held positions in Moscow, Paris, Kabul, Calcutta and Warsaw. He was interviewed by Peter Jessup on November 9 1979.

DAVIES: Yes, I was there from the beginning of 1965 to the middle of 1968. Actually the terms were two years. Near the end of the second year I told the Department...

Well, Marks was there by then, and I spoke with him. I said I'd like to stay. He agreed, so I told the Department and I stayed for the third year, but then I really had to go back. I was trying to find a job, and finally they said, how about Calcutta? I had never been in Calcutta. We'd been in Delhi, Madras, Bombay and several other places during the tour in Afghanistan, but I had never gotten that far East.

It sounded pretty interesting, and Calcutta is a great city, a large city.

So we went off to Calcutta in the summer of 1968, in August, and my gosh, when we got there Pam Am was still landing in Calcutta - Pan Am One, around-the-world flights - and we came in, and we came in in the midst of one of the worst monsoon storms they had had there in years. The airport was awash, and the water was coming down in sheets, and they had to bring a van out to the plane, and we managed to get into that, my wife and I, and I guess we had all four kids with us then.

The residence was ankle deep in water.

Of course the problem with Calcutta is that the drains, which were put in at the end of the last century or the beginning of this century, have been stopped up for years, and the Hooghly River...

Well, in the first place it was all swamp - bamboo swamp - to begin with, mango trees, that kind of thing, a very swampy ground. And they built up the river bank to keep it from flooding so badly, but then the harbor has silted up, covering up the outlets of most of the drains, so the drainage system is practically nonexistent. And nothing has happened since the British left, and they didn't do much, because the capital was moved up to Delhi from Calcutta in the early years of this century, and after they left Calcutta they weren't keeping it up, they were working on Delhi, not on Calcutta.

So whenever we had these bad monsoon rains the water was up to your ankles or knees in the street, and we came right in the middle of that.

Well, but it was all right. We managed to get into the Consulate. Our office in Calcutta is one of the two or three oldest in our service. We set up an office there shortly after we achieved our independence.

There was a great triangular trade - shipping ice from New England to Calcutta, and picking up hemp there, I suppose, and tea and taking it to the spice islands, taking it to Indonesia, and picking up spices from there and bringing them back to New England.

Unless I am mistaken - maybe my memory is no longer quite so accurate on this - maybe the first consular officer who was appointed by the United States was supposed to go to Calcutta and he died at sea before he got there. In those years you know it took you several months to get there.

So this is a very old office, and the situation in Bengal then was fascinating, because they had President's rule. In India, when one of the states proves to be ungovernable, the Prime Minister recommends President's rule.

They had that in Bengal; they hadn't been able to elect a government, and Bengal of course is the turbulent part of India. But a new election was set - I guess it was set for January, and indeed in January they had the election, and the communists were elected there. There are three communist parties: there is the Moscow Communist Party, the Communist Party Marxist, which is the one that was elected in Bengal, which had had some ties with China before the Chinese invasion, and they were broken after that. But it is independent of Moscow, it has nothing to do with Moscow. Then there is the Communist Party Marxist-Leninist, the so-called Naxalites, who were violent, a violent group.

This of course was in the middle of the Vietnam War, and every Saturday and Sunday there was a demonstration outside the Consulate, where crowds gathered.

Everybody knew the rules of the game; as long as we had somebody there to receive a petition they'd come and give a petition, and stand and shout outside. But it was all right, there was never any violence.

Q: Not the type of danger of today.

DAVIES: No. There were dangers in the city, and there could be riots.

Q: But I mean they weren't likely to burn down the...

DAVIES: No, it was a safety valve, and the police were good, they would give us warning ahead of time, up until the communist takeover that is. But then they took over, and they were a good, strong party. This young fellow - well, not so young - Jhota Basu, was the head of the party, and he is now Chief Minister in Bengal. He won the election there fair and square. At that time they were in a coalition with other parties.

We were on a street called Harrington Street. Of course most of the streets in Calcutta, which is fundamentally a British city, were named after Englishmen. The Consulate and the British High Commission were located on Harrington Street. Who Harrington was I don't know. But when the communists won they changed the name of the street to Ho Chi Minh Street - Ho Chi Minh Sarani - and we didn't know what to do, but finally we had to print that on our letterhead. I mean what the heck, what do you do?

So, Ho Chih Minh Street it was.

We had an annex on another street nearby with a different name, and we were thinking of making that the chief address, but it would be silly. What can you do? They had us.

It was a fascinating place. India of course is just a world apart, a delightful place to serve, I think in many ways, very discouraging in many ways too. But you have to understand that this civilization has been going on there for 6000 years, and there is a great deal of misery. Actually of course it's a very mixed thing, because the population is so much larger than it ever was. It has become exponentially larger. So many more people are alive today, subsisting in that same territory, than there ever were in any previous historical epoch.

Q: Was Sister Teresa working there?

DAVIES: Oh, yes indeed. My wife and a lot of the women in the consulate corps went and helped her, whether they were Catholic or not, it didn't make any difference. She was very active there, and Malcolm Muggeridge was in the process at that point of making a BBC documentary about her, which was the way she first came to world attention. Well, she was known, but she was known primarily through the Kennedy's. She came here several times under the auspices of the Ethel and Joseph Kennedy Foundation for Retarded Children. She may have started a house in Boston, I don't know. But she's got several in this hemisphere, in Latin America primarily. But she is a remarkable woman, she is just absolutely fantastic.

Q: Who was the Ambassador in Delhi then?

DAVIES: When we got there it was Chester Bowles.

Q: Oh, he was still there.

DAVIES: He was there on his second tour. He'd been Undersecretary in the State Department.

Q: Kennedy...

DAVIES: He was shoved out of there and went back to Delhi. Wonderful man - he and his wife were just great people. He had - what do you call it?

Q: Parkinson's disease.

DAVIES: Yes, Parkinson's.

Q: The beginning of it?

DAVIES: He had the beginning of it, and he was one of the first people who were getting this L-Dopa drug, which kept it very much under control. He is still alive.

Q: Yes, lives in Essex, Connecticut.

DAVIES: But he can't speak now. I think he can take anything in, but he can't control any longer his nervous system now. But he was still playing golf, he was very active and doing a lot of things - a wonderful man.

At the end of that year the election came along, and when Nixon was elected Ken (Kenneth B.) Keating was sent there, and he was very nice. He was a widower at that point, and he was married while he was there, but after we left. Very nice man.

Q: Yes, I served under him in Israel.

DAVIES: Right, yes.

Q: He died.

DAVIES: Yes. I quite liked him, what little I saw of him. I only saw him two or three times. He came down there once, and we went up to Delhi for a couple meetings. He had been there during the war, and he knew something about India. He had been a pilot in the Air Force, or a staff officer. So he knew something about the place.

So that was good. And for children in particular India is a wonderful place.

Q: Really?

DAVIES: Oh, my goodness, just terrific, just terrific. Afghanistan had been great, and India was the same; for kids up to I would say 15 years of age it's just wonderful, because the servants are very good with children, they like children, and they are childlike themselves in a way I suppose, and there is so much to do.

Q: What was the gap between service in Kabul and service in Calcutta? I mean how many years had elapsed? Had all the children been born?

DAVIES: Oh, all except one had been born. The third was born in Kabul, but he didn't remember it at all, and actually the second one didn't remember it too well. John, the oldest boy, remembered. Well, the second one remembered too, he was just a baby when we got there. We had left Kabul in 1958.

Q: So it was ten years later.

DAVIES: Yes, ten years later. And we went back there. At Christmas or New Year's we went up to Kashmir, and spent a week in a houseboat there in the middle of Dal Lake, wonderful. And then from there we went to Kabul, because this third boy who had been born there always wanted to know, where is this place?

Q: "Where was I born?"

DAVIES: Right, so we took him back up there and showed him actually the building and the room where he was born. He was born in the doctor's office in the compound there, so we showed him that.

Bruce Laingen, who is now in the Foreign Ministry in Teheran, was DCM there at that time. I had known him before.

But for kids it's just great, they really enjoyed themselves. The oldest two were in school here, and they came out during the summer and for Christmas vacation, and then they were there in the summer again, in the summer of 1969, when I was asked to come back here. So the two older ones spent a fair amount of time (there). The two younger ones were there all year and they went to school, the Anglo-American School there in Calcutta, and they just loved it, it was great.

Well, in the summer of 1969, I got a telegram from Elliot Richardson asking me to come back. He was changing the policy planning staff to what he called the planning and coordination staff, and he wanted me to...

First he asked me to come back to be interviewed, so I did, and then he said he'd like to have me come back and work on Soviet...

So I didn't know what to do. We were planning to stay in Calcutta. We would like to have stayed there.

Q: You had been there how long, a year?

DAVIES: Just a year. Actually by the time I left it was 13 months. I didn't know what to do, as I say the family was quite happy there, we were settled, and you know you hate to move more often than you have to. But Elliot was very persuasive, so I said okay, I'll come back.

So we moved back here again, and I went to work in this planning and coordination staff, which was...

WILLIAM ANDREAS BROWN
Political/Economic Officer

New Delhi (1968-1970)

Ambassador William Andreas Brown was born in Winchester, Massachusetts in 1930. He joined the "Holloway Program" which was part of the Naval Reserve Officers Training Program and went to Harvard University, graduating with a Magna cum Laude degree. In 1950 he went to Marine Corps basic training in Virginia and later served in Korea. His Foreign Service career took him to a multitude of places including Honk Kong, Taiwan, Singapore, Malaysia, USSR, India, the UK, and Israel. His career includes an ambassadorship to Israel as well as several positions in the State Department, Environmental Protection Agency. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in November of 1998.

Q: I'd just like to get one thing clear. You were in the embassy in New Delhi from 1968 until when?

BROWN: From 1968 to 1970. At this time, let's review what was happening. President Nixon had written an article in the quarterly publication, "Foreign Affairs." For someone like myself, who was reading the tea leaves at the time, this was a very important article. It contained a clear hint of a possible breakthrough in U.S.-China relations. Nixon had in his pocket, as it were, President Ceausescu of Romania, an enemy of the Soviet Union and fairly well disposed to the Chinese communists, in terms of the tactics of the time. Nixon probably had very little use for Ceausescu otherwise, but anything that played all right was acceptable.

We had a burgeoning war in Vietnam. Our casualties were getting dramatically higher, and the anti-war movement was growing in the United States. We could observe a growing Indian-Soviet relationship which was really getting close now. It was increasingly clear that this relationship was gaining momentum. Tension between India and Pakistan was rising. The Indians had an embassy in China, but the Sino-Indian relationship was also becoming more tense. The Chinese and the Indians had an outstanding border controversy, featuring conflicting claims to territory along the frontier. A few, short years before, in fact six years previously, there had been a Sino-Indian War [1962]. The Indians had rearmed with our help and had deployed armies up in the Himalayas. This was all serious stuff.

As I said, I found myself in a fascinating position. Here we had been stonewalled, politely stonewalled, but nonetheless stonewalled by the Soviet desk of the Indian Foreign Ministry and welcomed by the Chinese desk. We were getting good information. I was reporting on Tibetan refugee affairs, which brought me to strange places in India, including Buddhist areas. Ambassador Keating dearly loved to travel. One of the key places that he wanted to visit was the forbidden Shangri-la of Bhutan.

"Tiki" Kaul, an experienced, high level Indian diplomat and former Ambassador to the Soviet Union, was, by now, the Foreign Secretary [most senior civil servant] in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. India had a Foreign Minister, who was pro-Soviet. I don't recall his name. Tiki was referred to by the British Ambassador to Moscow at the time as "that snake in the grass." [Laughter] I'll never forget that Tiki Kaul invited Ambassador Keating to call at the Foreign Ministry, and I went along as note-taker. Tiki was gracious and well-spoken. He said to Ambassador Keating: "I understand that you're getting around the country and are getting to see places." Ambassador Keating said, "Oh, yes, it's wonderful to see your country," and so forth. Tiki said, "I have something that you possibly might be interested in. How would you like to go to Bhutan?" Nominally Bhutan was an independent country, but you couldn't get there except with the help of the Indians. They kept an iron grip on travel to that restricted area.

Ambassador Keating's face lighted up. He was just delighted at this prospect. Tiki said, "It's difficult to get you in, but we could provide you with a helicopter. If the weather's all right..." By this time Ambassador Keating was on Cloud Nine. The hook came later in the conversation. Tiki said, "You know, you have an awful lot of USIS branches around India. They're nice people. However, we've been thinking that the Soviets are fairly restricted, as things stand now. You'll probably be seeing more Soviet information offices in the future." In other words, he was saying: "Grin and bear it. The Soviets want to expand, and we're going to let them expand." That was the real purpose of the invitation to Ambassador Keating to call on Tiki Kaul.

Off I went with Ambassador Keating and Len Lefkow in an Indian helicopter to Bhutan. This was later on in my tour in India, after I'd been there for a while. By this time APOLLO IX had landed on the Moon. So we carried with us a speck of Moon dust, a fragment of the surface of the Moon. Having learned some Himalayan ways myself, I drilled Ambassador Keating on how to greet the King of Bhutan. I was first coached by the Chief of Protocol of Bhutan on what to do. Then I got a white, silk scarf and took Ambassador Keating into a side room to practice handling it. Remember, Keating was a man in his 70s. He was expected to toss this scarf and spread it with his hands. He was having difficulty doing this. So I said to Ambassador Keating: "Imagine that it's opening day at Yankee Stadium and you're tossing out the first baseball. Toss the scarf like this and spread it," which he finally did.

On the side we got an earful, from the Bhutanese, about Indian imperialism, colonialism, and domination. The Bhutanese were the recipients of Indian money, defense assistance, and so on, but the Indians kept them under very tight control. The younger, nationalistic Bhutanese resented the way they were treated.

The King and Queen of Bhutan were estranged. They had separate palaces and we stayed at the Queen's palace I remember that there was a beautiful, full moon that night. We had the film of the APOLLO moon landing with us, which we projected for a group of Bhutanese monks, using a projector owned by a Japanese agronomist. The monks would look at the film and then at the full, bright moon. They had trouble believing that astronauts had landed on the moon. It was truly a magic setting for the projection of the film.

We then flew from Bhutan to Sikkim [another kingdom North of India]. We were wined and dined by the ruler of Sikkim, Palden Thondup Namgyal and his American wife, Hope Cooke, a graduate of Sarah Lawrence College.

I soon realized that we were in a setup to some extent. She had arranged a program, which they reviewed for us in a cursory manner. Ambassador Keating was nodding politely. However, I was uneasy to learn that there was to be a side meeting to meet Sikkim civil servants, at the Palace but without the royal presence. I knew, from what I had read, that there was a certain amount of anti-Indian agitation in Sikkim. I was very concerned about this, but the program had been laid on, and we had to go through with it.

From the palace we went to a function hosted by the Indian High Commissioner. I went straight to him and said, "Something bad has happened, and I want you to know about it." I knew that he was aware of it. I said, "We here to make courtesy calls. We don't wish to become involved in domestic politics. The American Ambassador has no knowledge of local politics, and we don't want to become involved in it." The Indian High Commissioner said, "Thank you very much. I'm aware of what you're talking about. You have to realize, Mr. Brown, and please tell your Government, that a half hour's flight away, as the crow flies, are 50,000, heavily armed, Chinese troops. This is strategic territory for us, and that's why we are here. We suffered what we did in 1962, and we're not about to let that happen again. If His Majesty (as he sarcastically called the King) wants to have democracy (which the ruler had said that he wanted) he can have one man, one vote." From this I inferred that the High Commissioner was hinting that India could easily put enough Hindus in Sikkim to throw out the ruler in an election.

That night there was a celebration. His Majesty got drunk and made some inappropriate remarks. In her own way Queen Hope Cooke was always sarcastically knifing the Indians in our presence. These remarks were duly related to the Indians. So, some years later [1975], I was not surprised but I was saddened to hear that both the King and Queen were tossed out of Sikkim and Sikkim was annexed by India.

Those trips gave me the visual, hands on feel for what China looked like, from an Indian strategic point of view. The Indians considered this a very serious matter. That was part of the explanation for the kind of relatively open exchanges on China I had with the Indians.

In this regard, by 1969 or 1970 Paul Kreisberg, the outgoing Director of Asian Communist Affairs in the Department, which is a different name for the non-Taiwan China desk in the Bureau of East Asian Affairs, came to see me in the course of travel elsewhere. In a very secretive manner he called me aside and said, "Bill, the Warsaw Talks between ourselves and the Chinese have reached a stage where, I believe, a breakthrough can take place if American leadership is strong enough and courageous enough. We're going to bring you back to the Department to be Deputy Director of that office. So bear that in mind."

Meanwhile, all kinds of things were happening in India. For instance, through another channel I heard that the Dalai Lama wanted to make a visit to the United States. I said to those who told me this: "I don't think that this is going to work out." They said, "What do you mean? We have a very special relationship with the Tibetans," which they did. I said, "Well, I don't know about that. I haven't been involved in political relationships with the Dalai Lama, if you will. I have been in contact with him on refugee rehabilitation matters. I can tell you that I don't think that Washington is going to be in the mood to receive him in the United States." However, I dutifully cabled back to the Department of State that the Dalai Lama was interested in visiting the U.S. Shortly before I left India, I received an instruction saying that I should go to the Dalai Lama's brother, who was then up in Darjeeling, India, and tell him that it would not be opportune at this time for the Dalai Lama to come to the U.S. The brother was the eminence grise of the Tibetan cabinet.

So I flew from New Delhi to Calcutta and took the train up to Darjeeling. I was given a sumptuous feast by the Dalai Lama's brother and then, as diplomatically as I could, had to break the news that now was not the time for such a visit. The brother took it with a wooden face, as he was my host. He said that he understood. I got on the train and came back down to Calcutta. I felt very sad because I had great affection for the Dalai Lama. However, I sensed that something was afoot in U.S.-PRC relations. And it was.

Q: Would you explain for the historian why, from the Washington point of view, this proposed visit by the Dalai Lama to the United States was not considered opportune?

BROWN: The Dalai Lama was and is the spiritual leader of the Tibetan people. He fled from Tibet to India in 1959 and has lived in exile since then. U.S. support for the Dalai Lama and his movement was one of the many bones of contention between ourselves and Beijing. For its part Beijing had crushed the efforts by the Tibetan people to achieve independence or resist Chinese domination. The Chinese communists brutally overwhelmed the country, had the territory firmly in hand, and were going through the process of destroying Buddhist monasteries, subjecting the Tibetan people to Chinese rule, and stationing Chinese cadres in the country. Now, on top of it all, in the mid-late nineteen-sixties they applied the Cultural Revolution to Tibet, so that the destructive and vindictive aspect of the Cultural Revolution was in full force there.

However, much as I sympathized with the Dalai Lama and Tibetans more generally, I felt that Washington would not be in a mood to receive him in the United States at that time. And Washington wasn't in the mood to receive him because President Nixon and Henry Kissinger were looking for a breakthrough in U.S.-PRC relations [Addendum: For a perspective of U.S. covert operations - some of which involved cooperation with Chiang Ching-kuo's security apparatus on Taiwan - to assist Tibetan resistance to the Chinese Communist takeover of Tibet, see Jay Taylor, The Generalissimo's Son, Harvard University Press, 2000. See also Thomas Laird, Into Tibet: the CIA's First Atomic Spy and His Secret Expedition to Lhasa, Grove Press 2002 which is about Douglas S. Mackiernan, who had been stationed under cover as a Vice Consul in Urumchi, Xinjiang, aided a Kazak rebellion against the invading People's Liberation Army, escaped to Tibet and was mistakenly killed by Tibetan border guards in 1950 while attempting to cross into India. In this latter connection, while in New Delhi I was contacted by a Kazak who described himself as the "Dalai Khan," leader of some 600 Kazaks who had fled to India in 1950 and a colleague of Mackiernan. I helped arrange the transfer of these Kazaks for resettlement in Turkey.]

I sensed an ongoing tension between India and Pakistan. I am no expert on Pakistan but I sensed that another Indo-Pakistani War would come. The situation between the two countries was getting that tense.

While I was in India, some other things happened. We developed a very close friendship with the Polish Ambassador to India, Romuald Spakowski, whose son was in the graduating class at the American International School in New Delhi. As fate would have it, the young man fell in love with our eldest daughter. She didn't really reciprocate this feeling. She was willing to be good friends, but no more. The young man, who was called "Kay," committed suicide just before we left India. Literally, a day or two before our departure from India we went over to his parents' home, and there was Kay's dead body resting on a block of ice. His parents were almost beside themselves. We had to bid them farewell. It was one of the most emotional, traumatic occasions in my diplomatic career. Kay's father was a professional diplomat who had been Polish Ambassador to the United States. He was a member of the Central Committee of the Polish Communist Party.

The Ambassador's son hated the Gomulka regime. He was now 21 and was of an age to be drafted into the Polish Army. He didn't want to go back to Poland and was doing increasingly strange things, to the point that his parents had us over to dinner "en famille" because Kay was beginning to dispose of his personal possessions. He was beginning to express himself in strange ways. This was disturbing, but it didn't occur to us that he was about to commit suicide. However, Kay's death happened shortly thereafter.

So, on a personal basis, we left India very, very distraught. Ambassador Spasowski was later assigned Ambassador to the United States for a second time. He defected in Washington in 1981, saying, in effect: "Let Poland be Poland." [See Romuald Spasowski, The Liberation of One, Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1986]

All in all, it was a very exciting tour in India. I got to see parts of India, thanks to the Tibetan refugee job, and travels by Ambassador Keating, which no American diplomat ever saw. Although I had a specialty area, that is, Sino-Soviet affairs, I had a much broader education in so many ways.

Q: I have a couple of questions. From what you said, I gather that Ambassador Kenneth Keating, in a way, was all right. Here was an Ambassador who really wasn't involved in political affairs. Your job was to keep him happy. He wanted to travel. So it was almost as if he was out in his own playground or something like that.

BROWN: Not really...

Q: I've used the wrong term. The point is that he really wasn't very much engaged in India.

BROWN: If Ambassador Keating were here, he would say that he visited so many of the Indian states and so many Governors, he gave so many speeches, and he got around a lot. He would say that he went to see Madame Gandhi when the occasion arose, and so forth. However, the fact of it was that we had a big, well-functioning embassy. He was an older man. He was to go on to Israel as Ambassador, after he had completed his tour as Ambassador to India. I think that he was wise enough to realize: "My goodness, I have this finely honed staff here in the embassy in New Delhi. They know India and will do the right thing by me and will 'program me' in the right way. So why not?"

Q: I wonder if you could do a little comparison here. You went from a highly professional embassy in Moscow, which has always been considered a place, even before World War II, for real professionals. Did you find the situation comparable in any way in India? India is a big power. There are Americans who feel strongly about India, and yet, much to India's dismay, Indian relations with the United States have remained on the back burner. What about the staff of the embassy in New Delhi and how they handled things?

BROWN: The staff of the embassy in New Delhi was top level at the State Department professional level and at the AID [Agency for International Development] level. We had top notch people there. It was a very large Mission. AID had a budget worth hundreds of millions of dollars. It had a very large staff, branches, and so forth. USIS [United States Information Service] had a large operation. Ambassador Bowles had his own newspaper, a bi-weekly or monthly. It was incredible. This publication had a readership estimated at over 500,000. We could take on the Soviet Union in the Ambassador's corner or column.

Ambassador Bowles was a political appointee, riding a great wave of his past accomplishments, including friendship with India. India was a democracy. India's leadership at the time was increasingly characterized by having a chip on its shoulder, in terms of the United States. In a sense, this was understandable in the sense that Indians both took and resented our aid. However, India had a free press, to which we had access. We traveled the length and breadth of the land and invested a lot of money in India. We had specialists there, including a Science Attache who was busily engaged with the Indians on scientific business. In that connection, I began to feel a bit disturbed when I saw that we were cooperating, in fact, with the Indians on a small weather satellite missile program. Pretty soon the Indians were asking for access to the Lincoln Laboratory and its missile gyroscope facility in Massachusetts.

We were also a bit concerned about the workings of our nuclear agreement with the Indians for peaceful uses of atomic energy. The Indians had a CANDU nuclear reactor, a Canadian reactor. There were increasingly troublesome signs that spot inspections were not doing so well. Somehow, it seemed that our inspectors did not quite get there in time to carry on truly spot inspections and were made to feel not very welcome. They were asked if they could postpone their inspections for a couple of days, and there was that secret aspect of the Indians' nuclear and missile work in connection with weather satellites and related missiles. This attitude was disturbing. However, the momentum of such cooperation continued. So it was a mix of attitudes.

We had a Consulate General in Calcutta which was dealing with a popularly elected, communist-controlled state government, which promptly named the street in which our Consulate General was located, "Ho Chi Minh Street." We had a flourishing Consulate General in Bombay. We ran into the phenomenon to which you alluded. Some people who visited India came away with less than favorable impressions, shall we say.

I was to run into that attitude when I returned to the U.S. and called on the Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, Winthrop Brown. In the past he had been DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] in New Delhi. When I mentioned India, he launched on to a very negative monolog.

Q: Well, despite the fact that India is a democracy and all that, I think that Dennis Kux wrote a book called, "The Strange Democracy." Some people fell in love with India, but I would say that there was not much warmth in the attitudes of other Americans toward India, back in Washington.

BROWN: As you said, some Americans fell in love with India. This was during the Vietnam War and the period of the flower children. Some of the graduates of the American School in India went into their experimental stages, and so forth. There were Americans who were living in "Ashrams" [student dormitories], dressing like Indians, and seeking the guidance of Indian gurus. India was often described as the world's largest, parliamentary democracy.

The fact was, and is, that India had a sense of its manifest destiny. Indians felt frustrated. They felt that they were THE power in the area and that they ought to be respected and dominant and treated as such. Instead, we were balancing an India-Pakistan relationship. We were selling arms to Pakistan. Later on, there was the feeling in the U.S. that Pakistan was accommodating us, first in SEATO [Southeast Asian Treaty Organization], and later in the breakthrough to communist China. You may remember that it was from Pakistan that Dr. Henry Kissinger flew into China, using a Pakistani aircraft. The Pakistanis helped in all of this. During the Indo-Pakistani War in the fall of 1971 we saw Madame Indira Gandhi fabricate the further dismemberment of Pakistan. This very significantly contributed to the breaking away of the Eastern portion of Pakistan, which became Bangladesh.

Q: What impression did you get from the people who were dealing with Prime Minister Indira Gandhi at this time?

BROWN: The American Government was very upset with her.

Q: Both President Nixon and President Johnson before him.

BROWN: They were very upset with her, but she was upset with us. I'll give you an example. President Nixon had come to India in the summer of 1969 and then went on to Romania. It was his first, worldwide trip as a president. I know that he visited Southeast Asia and India. I've forgotten whether he went on to Pakistan but I think that his next stop was Romania. Not too long thereafter, during the autumn of 1969, we had the trip by the APOLLO Astronauts to India. They visited Bombay.

By now I had been the Motorcade Officer for the President Nixon visit, and I was to be Control Officer for the visit of the APOLLO Astronauts. I went to the Indian Foreign Ministry to notify them that a major visit was coming up. We would bring the Astronauts to India to visit Bombay. We found that Indian noses were out of joint. They asked why the Astronauts weren't visiting New Delhi and why hadn't the Indians been consulted on this. New Delhi was the capital of India. How about the Astronauts coming to New Delhi? I had to shift around and say that Bombay had been selected. I got an earful. In fact, Mrs. Gandhi's nose was out of joint. She objected to the way this visit came across. We told her government that there was going to be a visit by the Astronauts, and this is the city that they are going to come to.

I had quite a time dealing with these objections. As an embassy staff officer, I had to work my Ambassador into the program. I went down to Bombay and called on the authorities there, having first called on the Chief of Protocol, who was a very supercilious, senior Brahmin [high caste] diplomat, an ex-Ambassador. In Bombay I also called on the Police Commissioner, who promptly informed me that he was well aware of the details of President Nixon's visit to New Delhi, but this was Bombay, and the visit of the Astronauts was not going to be handled in the way the Presidential visit had been handled. He said that he, the Police Commissioner, would be in control. We were most welcome, but the communications arrangements would be under his control. He would also control the motorcade and the whole thing. I had to inform him, as diplomatically as I could, that we were looking into all of this, but there was an American capsule around the astronauts including our own communications and our own security. I said that in Belgrade, Yugoslavia, even as we spoke, enthusiastic crowds were breaking the lines. Enthusiastic crowds had broken the lines in Kinshasa, [Zaire, at the time; now Congo]. We had real, security concerns.

Twirling his British-type moustache, he lectured me. He said, "I've handled the Pope and other dignitaries here. I have over 10,000 Police officers, and this will be done my way." I said, "Thank you very much, but it will also be done THIS way." The negotiations on arrangements went right down to the wire.

We have a very peculiar, American style. Later, as an American ambassador I was to get an earful on how high-level visits are handled. The trip to India by the Astronauts turned out to be a fabulous visit in terms of crowd turn-out. There were half a million people on the great public park in Bombay and the streets and sidewalks along the astronauts' routes were jammed. However, I went right down to the wire on program details.

Half an hour before the Astronauts landed, the Indian Chief of Protocol informed me that it would be inappropriate for the American Ambassador to speak, as he was scheduled to do, in introducing the Astronauts at this great gathering. I said, "Look, he's the American Ambassador. It's only proper that he introduce" the astronauts. The Chief of Protocol said, "It's all a political show. You set this visit for Bombay, where Prime Minister Indira Gandhi's political opposition is located. This is a political, trumped-up show." I said, "Sir, if that's the case, I'll use my short wave radio and call off the whole visit. We are not involving ourselves in any political show whatsoever. If you consider this a political show, I'll scrap this visit right now, and the Astronauts can fly to Dacca," which was then in East Pakistan.

He said, "No, no." I said, "I want to get it very straight from you, sir. This is not being handled as a 'political show' visit." He said, "That's right." I said, "Therefore, the American Ambassador can introduce the Astronauts," and that's the way it worked out. But we got into real hardball with the Indians in this respect.

I learned from both visits by President Nixon and by the Astronauts of the special atmosphere that pervades, when you get a really high level visit. I'll never forget how we learned of the Nixon visit. The then Charge d'Affaires (Ambassador Keating either hadn't arrived in India or was out of town.) called a whole bunch of us into a room. He said, "I want to introduce Mr. Ron Walker from the White House staff. We're going to have a visit by President Nixon. This matter is still SECRET right now, but Ron Walker is the advance man. Walker, in his southern accent, said, "You all have been chosen to work on the preparations. I don't care about your rank or anything else. You're considered the best in this embassy. You're going to be my team. Our mission, ladies and gentlemen, is quite simple. We're going to turn this town on for Richard Nixon, the President of the United States." And that's how it went.

That was the occasion for my second meeting with Henry Kissinger [at the time, President Nixon's National Security Adviser] at the airport. The temperature was 110 or 120 degrees Fahrenheit. Some of my officers were fainting from heat exhaustion. I sprinted across the field and called out: "Dr. Kissinger! Do you remember that I handled you in Moscow? Here, sir, is your limo. Please get in." He said, "Yes. Maybe the next time it will be a visit to the Antarctic."

I watched how that visit was handled from the inside. It was a model for a Presidential or other high level visit. It was awesome to behold. A key player from the Embassy was Herb Hagerty.

Q: From your recollections and those of your colleagues, what was the chemistry between President Nixon and Prime Minister Gandhi?

BROWN: It was cool. Nobody ever made a state visit to New Delhi in July. It just wasn't done. The temperature is scorching. Everybody goes to the mountains. However, India was on President Nixon's route, and the Indians went through the motions of civility. Madame Gandhi was civil. I doubt whether they conducted any serious business. The Indians were pretty sharp. They saw this visit for what it was. It was a stop en route elsewhere.

Q: What was the real concern about the Indian-Soviet alliance that was developing? Did we see it as likely to go anywhere in particular?

BROWN: We saw it as against our interests. Of course, India was a significant, regional power, appearing to line up with the hated, Soviet empire. There was the question of the Soviet naval presence in the Indian Ocean. Were we going to have access visits to Indian ports by U.S. Navy ships, as opposed to visits by Soviet Navy ships? Would the Indian Ocean become what the Indians wanted, an Indian lake? Or perhaps an Indo-Soviet lake? There was the question of the status of Diego Garcia, a British base established especially for the convenience of U.S. Navy visits to the Indian Ocean (later, a staging bases for B-52 missions against Iraq). We were concerned that one result of this possible, Indian-Soviet alliance might be the dismemberment of Pakistan. That would not necessarily be in our interest. We were concerned about the impact of an Indian-Soviet alliance might have on the Non-Aligned Movement, of which India was still one of the three co-founders. You may recall, the Non-Aligned Movement was established by India, Yugoslavia, and Indonesia. A further slide of the Non-Aligned Movement toward the Soviets would be deleterious to our interests.

We were very unhappy about the trend of events. Remember that we considered India quite a prize.

Q: Well, India was and is the largest democracy in the world.

BROWN: Yes, and India had a potential impact on its smaller, weaker neighbors. Quite clearly, India had larger ambitions in the area of the sub-continent and the Indian Ocean. India had a significant military establishment, which one could not dismiss. It was weak in many ways but strong in others.

In the emerging scenario, which I sensed was coming, that is, a breakthrough in U.S.-China relations, where would India fit in such a situation? First of all, what would be the result of a war between India and Pakistan? Secondly, if Pakistan were defeated, and China were to go to war with India, where would that put the U.S.? Thirdly, where would all of this fit within the big game, the Sino-Soviet-U.S. triangle? Where would India fit in such a case? So this was an area of considerable concern.

Q: What were you getting from your Indian colleagues about events in China at this time?

BROWN: I was getting a professional assessment of the situation there, and the Indians were open to questions. In other words, if we had a question, we could pose it to them, and they would do their best to answer it. Like everybody else, they were terribly restricted in their embassy in Beijing. (Remember, at this time we had no mission in Beijing.) However, they were considering, as we were, what the effect of the Cultural Revolution would be. What power cliques were emerging in the Cultural Revolution? Where was the Cultural Revolution taking China? What did this mean in terms of Chinese military strength?

Here, now, we were getting into a sensitive area. Sensitive for both sides. What would the Cultural Revolution mean in the Sino-Soviet context? One had to be very careful there, because we knew that our Indian contacts were professional analysts and that their colleagues were very interested in developing, at the request of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi, deeper relations, including military relations, between India and the Soviet Union. And this would be done, at our expense.

Q: Were we at all considering the idea at this time that maybe China was interested in normalizing relations with the United States? This might happen, and what would be the effect on India? Or was this pretty far-fetched?

BROWN: When the new, Nixon administration entered office, and even during the dying days of the previous, Johnson administration, there were these periodic meetings called the Warsaw Talks between the U.S. and China. As Paul Kreisberg confided to me in great secrecy at the time, the Chinese communist representatives at those talks were beginning to use language for the professional readers of Chinese tea leaves which gave people like Kreisberg a sense that an evolution of U.S.-China relations was a possibility.

Whether the State Department, at a higher level, fully understood this was something else again. Maybe in the next session we'll consider that. I doubt that William Rogers, the new Secretary of State, had any feel for this or any inkling of this. Even at the level of Marshall Green, the Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian Affairs, and his principal advisers, as well as others in between, such as the Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs and so forth, this remains to be examined. However, in the view of Paul Kreisberg, the Director of an office in the Bureau of East Asian Affairs, or Don Anderson, an officer like myself who had been China-trained and Chinese language-trained, the material for progress in U.S.-Chinese relations was there. By now Don Anderson had reached the level of an interpreter at the Warsaw Talks. Don replaced me as the Sino-Soviet specialist in New Delhi. Kreisberg, Anderson, and I felt that this material ought to be examined.

At the time I left the embassy in New Delhi, the Third Indo-Pakistani War had not yet taken place. However, a renewal of hostilities was looming, and we were thinking about it. As soon as I got back to Washington, I was among those who argued that we had to think, in very real terms, about what would happen if another Indo-Pakistani War broke out? The professional estimate was that India would defeat Pakistan, as it had before, by virtue of India's military might and the strange configuration of Pakistan between East and West Pakistan, with India in between the two sections. So we thought that the Indians would defeat the Pakistanis. The question then was: would the Chinese communists join in the fight to save the Pakistanis? If they did, would this precipitate an armed confrontation between India and China? If so, where did the U.S. stand?

Remember, that in the 1962 Indo-Pakistani War, J. Kenneth Galbraith was then U.S. Ambassador to India. The U.S. rushed to India's aid.

Q: Oh, yes.

BROWN: We armed the newly-formed Indian divisions up in the Himalayan Mountains. Commitments were made by the U.S., and so forth.

Q: We moved a lot of equipment up there.

BROWN: Yes. However, already the memory of that support was fading, and India was looking elsewhere for assistance, in the wake of the meeting with Soviet Prime Minister Kosygin in Tashkent. I have already alluded to the development of this relationship between India and the Soviet Union.

The China aspect was very much a dynamic factor in India's moves. The situation was moving, and for a reason. It wasn't just a casual move. It related to India's fear and loathing of the Chinese communists.

Q: Did you sense, from where you were sitting in the Bureau of East Asian Affairs, any disquiet or unhappiness with this relationship between India, Pakistan, and China might be orphaned by developments in the Palestine area? Did you perceive anything of that nature?

BROWN: Do you mean while I was there in the Bureau of East Asian Affairs?

Q: Did some of your colleagues express disquiet or concern about the prospect that the Department of State might lose sight of the relationship between India, Pakistan, and China because of developments in Palestine?

BROWN: There was a whole cadre of Middle Eastern specialists. Developments in India and Pakistan came under the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs [NEA]. There were people such as Haggerty and others who were trained in Hindi or in Urdu, such as Tony Quainton. They had made a significant investment of their time in learning the language and were significantly respected in this regard. They were professionals in their field.

As long as I served in India, I was nominally under NEA, as an embassy officer in New Delhi. However, I had this special field of concentration. I was working for somebody else, as well. They weren't rating me on this, as least as far as Officers Efficiency Reports [OERs] were concerned, but that's where I was heading. That's where I saw the future and that's what I was looking forward to. I had some special lines into that field.

Q: That's your own interest. However, were your fellow officers saying: "Those guys in NEA are so focused on Arab-Israeli affairs that we're not getting answers or information..."

BROWN: No, I don't remember that. At the time I remember that the Desk Officer for India was Howie Schaefer. Howie would give you an instant answer...

Q: He is being interviewed right now by Tom Stern.

BROWN: Well, give him my regards. Here was a guy who was on top of the situation and who served in both Pakistan and India. He was very much involved in it. He may have been frustrated about attitudes above him in NEA. However, at my level, as far as attention to India and Pakistan was concerned, I can't remember hearing any complaint about getting attention from Joe Sisco [Assistant Secretary in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs] because Joe Sisco had his attention directed elsewhere.

Q: Well, I thought that we might stop at this point. We're now up to 1970, and you were going back to Washington.

BROWN: I went back to the Department of State to be Deputy Director of the Office of Asian Communist Affairs (ACA) in the Bureau of East Asian Affairs. Because the China desk handled Taiwan affairs, it was a separate entity from the Office of Asian Communist Affairs. The ACA desk handled what we now call the People's Republic of China, Hong Kong, Macao, and Mongolia, as a separate area.

LEONARDO M. WILLIAMS
Junior Officer Trainee, USIS
New Delhi (1969-1970)

Leonardo Williams was born in Alabama. He was raised in Alabama, Washington, D.C and Minnesota and was educated at St. John's College (MN), University of Wisconsin and Georgetown University. After joining the Foreign Service in 1968, he served as USIA Public Affairs and Information Officer in India, Pakistan, Czechoslovakia, Greece and Yugoslavia. His Washington assignments dealt primarily with operations of USIA. Mr. Williams was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

Q: You went to New Delhi from when to when?

WILLIAMS: I got there summer of '69 and stayed until summer of '70. I was there only a year.

Q: How did you find Delhi? First on the job side and then on the Indian side.

WILLIAMS: For the first three months I was in shock. I had never been out of the country before and so I was just trying to cope with all these new things that were coming at me. The work was interesting. I got involved in a lot of different things. It was much different from what I had been told to anticipate. I spent about three months of that time in other parts of India than Delhi. I spent a month down in Madras and went on a tour with an American high school rock band through south India. It was really interesting and fun. I went to Jaipur and Jodhpur and gave lectures on American literature and life.

Q: How did you find the Indian reception of what we were having to say? The Vietnam War was at its apogee at this point.

WILLIAMS: Yes. And there was a fair amount of criticism about that. But audiences were generally receptive and interested in America. They didn't rule out interacting with me. Given my age, I was the youngest member of the USIS mission and so I got a lot of questions. They were critical of American imperialism and involvement. But I didn't find it an environment that was particularly... It wasn't difficult to the point of being dangerous or anything like that. It was more a gentleman's disagreement. The thing that caused the biggest flap while I was there was a speech that the ambassador gave in which he made reference to India not being covered by the American nuclear umbrella, which led to bouts of outrage that I don't think he anticipated given the kind of neutral stance that the Indians had adopted. But I didn't have anything to do with that.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

WILLIAMS: Kenneth Keating. He had been a senator from New York. He was the ambassador the whole time I was there.

Q: I always think of an Indian audience as being rather disputatious, arguing. Did you find that your arguing skills were honed? Or did this come into play?

WILLIAMS: It did on occasion, but I found that it wasn't always that way. Sometimes they were passive. Then you didn't know how much they understood of what I said. The audiences that I had were mostly outside of Delhi in the smaller cities in the hinterlands. The racial situation in the United States generated more interest and engagement often than foreign policy. I think that's in part because of their caste system. They're coming at it from a caste mentality and we're coming at it from a class/racial... But we're all talking about color. So, there was always this effort to get on the same wavelength.

Q: How did you handle this? Could one sort of say, "Well, you've got the same problem we have and we're working on it and you're not?"

WILLIAMS: I would never say they're not. One time, a guy criticized me for talking about the racial situation in the U.S. He got up and said, "You're American and you come here and you talk to us about the racial problems of the black people in America. But you're white." Obviously, it was strictly a color thing in his mind. I said, "No, I'm not white. I'm black." The house came down. But the only thing we could do is... I wasn't really there to try to get them to change their system but to make them understand how ours worked. To the extent that they found what we were trying to do and their understanding of it was distorted and they were basing their criticism on lack of understanding of what it's really like and what we were trying to do about it at the time. As far as their caste system, you can make the point about fairness and all people in every society should be treated equally but I wasn't going to harangue them on their caste system specifically.

Q: How did you feel after your year in Delhi? Was this a good career?

WILLIAMS: I was still in the holding mode on that. I began to enjoy Delhi after I had been there about six months. I was used to it and started to enjoy it a little bit more when I realized that you really can survive in this environment and do all kinds of intriguing things.

Q: One year is a pretty short time. It strikes me as being a little too short to plunk you in and then yank you out again.

WILLIAMS: Yes. But it was only a training assignment. They had a vacancy for a regular job... They didn't have any for me to go into in Delhi. So, I was sent to Karachi after that.

SLATOR CLAY BLACKISTON, JR.
Deputy Principal Officer
Calcutta (1969-1971)

Slator Clay Blackiston, Jr. was born in Virginia on September 19, 1918 and raised in New York. He received a bachelor's degree from the University of Virginia and served as a U.S. Navy pilot during World War II. He entered the Foreign Service in 1947. Mr. Blackiston's career included positions in Stuttgart, Amsterdam, Port-au-Prince, Jerusalem, Beirut, Tunis, Jeddah, Cairo, Amman, Calcutta, and Washington, DC. This interview was conducted in September of 1992.

Q: You left there about 1969 and then went to Calcutta. What were you doing in Calcutta? You were there for sixteen months.

BLACKISTON: I was the Deputy Principal Officer and for a long period of time, one six months and one some other length, I was acting head there. Everything you have ever heard about Calcutta is true. It has a certain charm in a sort of macabre way. It is really human degradation at its utmost but on the other hand they have a racetrack, all sorts of clubs and social life. This is all going on in the midst of hundreds of thousands of people sleeping on the streets. Interestingly enough, contrary to our street people here, many of these people have some sort of job; they are collecting rags, collecting this or that, they are doing something.

Q: What were the main purposes of our Consul General?

BLACKISTON: Calcutta has gone down since then, but it was a large consulate. Our consular district comprised the states of West Bengal, Orissa, Bihar, and Assam, and Mizoram, Tripura, Nagaland, and states like that. It was well over 100 million people. Calcutta, and our consular district, was a center of the iron and steel industry; not in Calcutta, but in our district, in Bihar. Calcutta is the center of the jute industry; also there is a lot of manufacturing. We had American firms there; for instance, Union Carbide made batteries and carbon black and things like that, Remington made typewriters there. There were all sorts of things produced there. Of course it was a port and had been the capital of India until 1912; it had a lot of manifestations of the Raj still around -- stately mansions that had deteriorated with a lot of people living in them, maharajahs' palaces and such. So in a way it was quite interesting and I had the opportunity to travel around India a great deal. We were the principle post reporting on the iron and steel industry, jute, and tea grown up in Assam. There were a number of other products for which our district was important.

Also it was a listening post for developments in Bhutan, which later was admitted to the United Nations, and Sikkim, which was nominally independent but which ultimately India occupied. As you probably know the Gyalmo of Sikkim was Hope Cooke who was the adopted daughter of Ambassador Seldom Chapin. We knew her, she came to Calcutta -- a lot of these people including the Bhutanese royal family would come down, people from Nepal, they all have houses down there. They come down for the horse racing season because there was this big race track, so we did have contact with them. Sir Edmund Hillary would come through there, we met him. A lot of fairly interesting people.

Q: What were our relations with the Bengali government? This was the time when the Vietnam was going strong and we were pretty cool toward the Indian government.

BLACKISTON: We were having trouble all the time. We were having demonstrations literally daily. There would be a big mob at the maidan, which is sort of like Central Park. There was a joke from Dick Davies, who was the first consul general when I was there -- we had a baseball team my son played on, down at one end of the maidan there would be a big demonstration and people up here would be playing baseball -- the joke was "well that's down there." India has three communist parties; there is the Communist Party of India, which was the initial party and founded by British communists, then there is the CPI-M, Marxist, and then the CPI Marxist-Leninist. That last group are Maoists and they had conducted some assassinations of landowners in a certain district of West Bengal, up in the north, from which initially they took the name Naxalites. They cut off the heads of these people. There was tremendous turbulence in West Bengal. The head of the CPI-M was a guy named Jyoti Basu who now is the Chief Minister of West Bengal; he's a communist. His father, he told me once, studied in the United States. He was not an unpleasant guy. The Bengalis -- there were a lot of fairly wealthy, social, people who didn't seem to feel horrified that they could have a communist government. They seem to be able to work around it, live and let live. That was the situation. After I retired, for some years I escorted leader grantees around, and I escorted the Mayor of Calcutta and his wife, it was just three days that he was here, and he is a communist too. And his name is also Basu; same name, a common one in Bengal, he is undoubtedly Bengali, that was murdered here by the carjacker.

We had to get permission from the Indian government to go to Assam; they never let us go to Nagaland. I was with Ambassador Keating and Dick Viets in Shillong at a dinner party at the governor's residence with the former Indian Ambassador to the United States, his name was Nehru. I don't think he was related to the Nehrus but the same name. He had a Romanian-Jewish wife as I remember; he was then the Governor of Assam. Ambassador Keating said that he would like to go to Nagaland. The Governor said, "You will never get to go to there." The situation in India is that there is a Governor of each state who is a figurehead except when the local legislature can't form a government and then they have what is known as "President's rule" and he names a person to take over. It may have been that at that time that was the situation in Assam and he was Governor. Keating was taken back by this and tried to get an indication of the reason. The Nagas were originally headhunters but most of them had been converted by American missionaries, Methodists, and they were favorably disposed to the United States. But the Indians, including Mrs. Nehru's P.P., had it in their brain that somehow we were working with the Nagas to get them to separate from India. And this happened time after time after time in one form or another; we were always being charged with working for a breakup of India.

It happened in another instance. In Madras, which is another consular district -- incidentally, Tom Recknagel was the Consul General down there; we work together in the Smithsonian, in Armed Forces History -- we built a very large consulate general with a USIS Library in the same building. I personally would never put a library in...

Q: Because they tend to burn them down.

BLACKISTON: You have got it. I would never...and I played a role when I was in charge and they talked about putting the USIS library in the consulate general in Calcutta. I said, "No way, we are going to turn this place into a fortress and we are not going to have the USIS library." You see when I was in charge there we had two bombs, one in the visa section and one in the library. They had used batteries and an explosive charge with an alarm clock and put it up behind a couch and set fire to the room; it didn't do too much damage. This consulate general was quite a large building. Madras is the capital of Tamil Nadu, the state of the Tamils. The Tamils do have something of a separatist tendency in India, but they are also the ones that revolted in Sri Lanka and from Tamil Nadu they had been given support. It was said that the reason we built this building was that when Tamil Nadu separates it will be our Embassy. What I am trying to convey here is this high suspicion of the Indians that makes it very difficult to deal with them.

I can go on about this because I think that this is fairly important. You could get on quite well with the Indian people, the businessmen and everything, but particularly in the central government -- it must be a legacy of this guy named Krishna Menon who hated our guts and who must have stashed that Foreign Ministry and other things with all sorts of crypto-communists and left-leaning, difficult types -- so I found that many Indian government officials were not very pleasant to deal with. I traveled a lot in India -- it was said that in the partition India got the civil service and Pakistan got the army. I have talked with Indian civil servants -- the Indian civil service was considered a really elite group but I have had current Indian civil servants tell me, I think one in Manipur, that the standard had gone down.

Q: Well I am sure it has, it is inevitable.

BLACKISTON: The interesting thing is that they inherited a system from the British and they continued it. It is a system whereby the district commissioner is a sort of local king. He does everything; he is a magistrate, he is head of the police, he is the development officer, he is everything.

LEONARD J. SACCIO
Director, USAID
New Delhi (1969-1972)

Ambassador Leonard J. Saccio began his career in the Foreign Service as deputy general counsel for the Foreign Aid Program in the mid-1950s. He went on to serve in Brazil, San Salvador, and India. Ambassador Saccio was interviewed by Mel Spector on September 30, 1990.

Q: Oh, yes. He's a career Foreign Service officer -- was until he became Secretary of Defense.

SACCIO: I don't know that there's much to say different as far as the operation of embassies in any of these places. India was, here again, a sad matter, because they appointed Senator Keating. He was senator and he was the man who claimed that he had the pictures of the missiles in Cuba, and then he ran as chief justice of New York Court of Appeals. Of course, he claimed he got more votes than anybody else in any office that ever ran in New York state, because he was the only one running. And, of course, they had to vote for him, no matter whether they voted for the Democrat or the Republican.

I don't know why they sent him to India, except that you had Nixon there who gave him that job. Let me see, I got to Delhi, India in '69 or '70. No, who would have sent him there? I was appointed to Colombia in Nixon's Administration. Wasn't he elected in '68?

Q: Yes.

SACCIO: Well, they sent Keating to India, and he had no know-how or understanding of India. He was following Bowles, who was very close and sympathetic and empathetic of the whole Indian operation, and his wife went around in saris and sandals and rode around on bicycles. And when Keating came in, he said, "I want you people to get dressed as Americans. None of this stuff; no sandals. And I don't like beards." Some of our AID people . . .

Q: But you had that nice AID building by the time you got there.

SACCIO: Right next door. And we had enough trouble with that, because everything had to be secure about the embassy. But people who wanted to come to see me as the AID director, they would go into the AID building without any trouble. The man in charge of security would shake his head, "How did this guy get in? You keep controls with the embassy." But they were joined, you see. What could we do? You could go down the basement and come up from the other side.

Q: Yes, we had that underground passage.

SACCIO: But he was a sad case for an ambassador if he was to have any influence. But aside from that, our policy was pretty poor stuff, because we never made up our mind whether we were going to be with Pakistan to support their prejudices against India and building up their armaments, or be on the Indian side, or be on both sides, or try not to be involved, and Mrs. Gandhi was against the Americans, anyway, just culturally. She was brought up in London School of Economics, and palsy-walsy with the Russians and had a whole combination of military assistance and plants and all that kind. There was no way that Keating responded to any of that, because he didn't know, and he wasn't helped by Washington in any way. Anytime we sent something to Pakistan, we had a crisis.

When Churchill and I first got there in 1969, we were invited by the minister, who was my counterpart on the economic side. His daughter was getting married, and they had these cottages, as you well know, with the gardens all around. I think it was the first day we were there, the second evening. We went there dressed up to the garden, and there was Mrs. Gandhi seated on one of those awful stuffed chairs that they have in all these Latin American or less-developed places. I don't know why.

Q: Yes, a symbol of affluence.

SACCIO: Yes. Nothing clean, no nice stuff. Just big, fat furniture.

Q: Which, in that climate, is the worst thing; it's so hot. The big stuffed, served you out in the garden.

SACCIO: Yes. And rugs on the lawn. And we passed the reception line, the bride and groom. The minister took us and introduced us to Mrs. Gandhi, and she smiled and he left. Apparently, people were doing that. They were going first to the reception line and stopping and chatting with her. And we were all alone at that point, nobody with us, and she wanted to know who we were.

And I said, "I'm the new minister in charge of the AID program." She froze, looked the other way, and there we stood, both of us. We didn't know what the hell to do. We were saved, but not too soon, by somebody coming along. We sat down in front of her, not knowing what to do, and then somebody came along, and we decided to move on.

Q: Why do you think she acted quite like that?

SACCIO: Because she was definitely against the U.S.

Q: Against the U.S. or against the AID program?

SACCIO: Against the U.S. and the AID program. She didn't mind the money. She didn't refuse our aid. She didn't refuse the food. It was on the aftermath of President Johnson putting the screws on India in one of the successive monsoon failures in which he laid down the law, "You either do something about your agriculture, or we're not giving you any food."

There were freighters coming in every day in the ports of Calcutta and Bombay with food, and he imposed this on them. Obviously, he had to do it, because he was talking to the head of the state. And the stuff came in. PL 480 poured in and created the billions of rupees and the funds that nobody knew what to do with, because all we needed was $50,000 to take care of the embassy needs at that point.

There was still a grudge, except there were some knowledgeable Indians who said "President Johnson did the right thing. Now we have a growing agriculture. We're doing rice, we're doing this, we're doing that, and we're doing malaria." But she was against us, just like any Latin American leftist would be, prejudiced against the capitalist nation. Because she was brought up as a socialist, educationally, as well, and that was it.

Well, the aftermath of that was that I told the people in the embassy, "We know that; we expected that." Nobody warned me about it. Why would they warn me? They didn't know we were going to the reception or I didn't ask.

The man who they put as my counterpart was the top-level civil service. You know, they talk about the steel structure. He was very close to Mrs. Gandhi; a great economist. One of the better Indians who didn't go into politics for money. He eventually moved over to the United Nations and became one of their officers. Either that or the Bank. I think it was probably the World Bank.

I would sit down and review the week with him, and we'd describe what's going on, what had to be done, running through all the programs. And he appointed a secondary man from his office and said that, on the day-to-day matters, you can work with one of his aides, which I understood perfectly. He had other things to do. And we worked on the population program all up and down, and some of the boys in the embassy said -- oh, Funari, who became my deputy, was there when we arrived. He told the Indian native help in an assembly hall, introducing me as the new director, he said, "His name is Saccio, my name is Funari, but you're not going to have spaghetti every day." They laughed. [Laughter]

He told me that Mrs. Gandhi had a secretarial aide who took notes on every meeting and was her calendar scheduler. He identified the man so I knew what he looked like, so when the AID director, the former head of Michigan State...

Q: Hannah.

SACCIO: John Hannah came on a visit. We made a call on Mrs. Gandhi with the ambassador, and they sat right in front of her and I sat on the side. I was supposed to go with them. And she talked, and she turned around to me and smiled. Oh, there goes my good friend; he must have said something. [Laughter] Because, you know, we were working entirely on a non- political basis.

There were two crises. One, Keating's alarm clock did not work, so he didn't get to the airport to see her off to the United States. He blamed his Foreign Service officer, who was a gal, who was his immediate aide, and who he tried to screw at any chance. You know, he was 79 or something, but he wanted his women, just like Gandhi, as a matter of fact. And he blamed her, you see, because she had not awakened him or something, as if she were living with him, which, of course, was not so. She hated him.

Q: Was he living then in Roosevelt House, in the main residence, or was he where Bowles used to live?

SACCIO: Not where Bowles used to live, because he was in the mansion.

Q: Oh, that's right, because he wouldn't do that. I see.

SACCIO: The other small crisis came when she made a speech down in the southern part of India and "all these Peace Corps people and all the CIA spies" and all that.

Q: She said that?

SACCIO: In a speech.

Q: Oh, my lord.

SACCIO: And Keating was unable to handle it, because, being brought up the way he was, he would not even admit there were CIA people in the country. In a staff meeting, he asked the CIA guy, or anybody else who was in there, "What do I say if they say we have CIA?" And there was dumb silence, even from the station chief. He was adrift, you see. Nobody had briefed him, and he didn't have sense enough to realize everybody knows that we have agents all over the place. But in those days, you would cover here, cover there. It was a lot of nonsense. But any rate, he had a real rough time. But the program was a good one, but an almost impossible one, because back in 1920, the population was 150 million. When we were there, it was 500 million, and it is now 850 million. The international conference just the other day of aid-giving people, the industrialist stated, "The developed countries ought to do something about this. Give aid to the less-developed countries."

Q: In the field of population, is that correct?

SACCIO: No, everything. But the whole point was, they said in that -- whether explicitly or otherwise -- they said the population is just taking over. When you have a situation like in Indonesia, India, China, what have you, the Chinese do something about it. The Indians try to do something, and one of the reasons Mrs. Gandhi was considered a tyrant was because she went around with vasectomies and all that all over the place and was very brutal, at least according to critics, of pushing people out of Bombay and out of Calcutta. It was, "Get back in the countryside."

They wanted to build an atomic bomb and nuclear capability, and they wouldn't take any advice or guidance of the United States. And when they opened their first atomic nuclear plant outside of Bombay, the ambassador wasn't even invited. I mean, this was a national operation and the Diplomatic Corps was all invited, and we had helped with some of the materials and so forth. And Stone, who was the DCM -- what was his name, Galen Stone?

Q: Galen.

SACCIO: Galen Stone moved heaven and earth and said, "He should be up on the platform, not sitting on the first row or the second row of the audience." So it was an impossible case of nobody liking anybody, and only the people at the technical level, let us say, had contacts that meant anything, some of the political officers and so forth.

The CIA would never open its mouth in a meeting. The guy would sit there and listen to us. Once I burst out, and Galen Stone said, "Keep quiet, Len. Keep quiet." I said, "What the hell are you fellows sitting in here listening to us, and you won't say a damn word or what's going on? I mean, why the hell are you here, spying on us?" I told them so. When the ambassador was away, and I was in charge, I made it quite clear in the open meeting. I said, "You got anything to report on?"

Well, we were doing some quite good work. But I tried to find out what projects had been in operation in India over a period of years to see what had happened when somebody was talking about a milking operation, a dairy operation. Going back to Washington, it's impossible to get the archives.

SACCIO: If there was, they said that it's too difficult to get at that sort of stuff and dig it out.

Q: Well, I think it's notorious that the institutional memories of both State and AID are some of the worst in Washington -- I mean, the worst in the U.S. Government.

SACCIO: Well, there was no permanence of responsibility. They put out, four years later, the book on diplomatic correspondence.

Q: And even that is badly censored. That isn't a good record.

SACCIO: It's criticized all over the place.

Q: Have we left India?

SACCIO: Well, India, I think, is pretty much here our inability to work with socialist countries shows up, as elsewhere. You just recall the word "socialist," and then you close your mind. The fact is that we're just as socialist as any of them, because we have all kinds of safety nets, economic safety nets.

Of course, this is 20-20 hindsight, because I've been reading much more about all these things since I retired, having to teach international law. We have no concept that we can work with these people, even though they are socialists, in theory and in theology. Leave out the communists. We have government-owned operations all over the place. The S&L, of course, is an example.

That's what I considered one of our failures, and that's because domestic rhetoric is always against us. We cannot say anything good because we have to base it on freedom, freedom of the individual, the open market, things of this kind. Again, I say this after the fact, but this is what became very difficult to deal with in these countries. Now, I understand AID has gone for attempting to develop entrepreneurship in business, which is very important, and that would be the way, I imagine, to resolve some of these problems. And poor old Gorbachev is now faced with it, because how do you create a body of people like that right off in 500 days? [Tape recorder turned off]

We had a debate between AID and State about assistance to Africa, and we were bound up by the European policy not to interfere with the colonies of Western Europe.

On university contracts, I can go back to India, if we have a little time. I found that some of these contracts were just shells. We had a man there. In some cases, we had three or four professors, and they were teaching some course or something. But they were not integrated. They were not in management positions and they were not in administrative positions.

On the basic top-level university which devoted to agriculture, we had a professor there. He and his wife, nicely settled, retired from some state university. We went up there and he had breakfast for us, and I asked him what he did. He said, "Well, I'm looking into the development of peas."

I said, "Do you sit with the faculty or the board?"

"Well, once in a while they call me in."

I said, "For Christmas sake. What the hell are you . . ." Here we have a contract with the university, and we have one man who could just be one of the professors, but nothing more. Maybe one of the research men, but nothing having to do with the whole plan of the university, the education, the effect on development, all that sort of thing. And I said to the very nice guy who was the agricultural chief at the AID program, "What's this guy doing?"

"Well, you know, you can't . . ."

"My gosh."

Q: Well, whose fault do you think that was? Was it that it wasn't planned well by the AID mission, or the person wasn't adequate for the job that was chosen?

SACCIO: No, no. Apparently, at this point, whatever they did for the university had...

I can't say of anything before, because I don't recall getting in any deeper. But I said, "This man has to leave, because he has no purpose here."

And they said, "Well, look. His wife is here, and the situation at home." You know, personal things like that.

I said, "Well, I'm sorry. He stays to the end of the whatever term there is, and nobody goes in."

One fellow, who was the contract man for the university -- I forget whether it was Illinois -- with Orissa, a state of India off on the Bengal side. I had an interview with him when I first came. I said, "How is it going."

"Well, we're having problems."

I said, "Well, what are they?"

"Well, we recommend that the faculty be permanent and not part time or slipshod, that they be given salaries, that they have a fixed curriculum, and that they have to follow it."

I said, "Would you kindly write those down on a piece of paper?"

"Sure, I'd be delighted."

I said, "Now, you go back and tell them if they don't do this, you're going to cut out the contract. Because we're not staying here just for you to be frustrated and not doing anything."

"Well, you know, they have problems with money."

I said, "I know they have problems. And if you're going to do anything for them, you have to tell them that this is what we suggest. And if they don't do it, there's no point in your being there or saying we have an AID program." Incidentally, it worked.

Another instance in the AID program, we had a very good guy on economics and statistics. He was the brother of the opera conductor, Rudel. His name was Rudel, too.

Q: Oh, yeah. I knew him. Rudel. I see him every now and then. He and I live about ten blocks apart. Julius Rudel is his brother.

SACCIO: He told me how it was set up, and he had about 15 Indians working in his office maintaining statistics showing where the possibilities for shrimp development for small business, for export to make dollars. And they kept books over the period of months and years and so forth, showing how things would be developed and how they were going. I said, "Well, what do you do now?"

He said, "Well, we continue to do this."

I said, "Well, what about the Indian government? What are they going to do?"

"Well, we're going to try to get them to do the same." I said, "You could advertise that you have this. If they're going to do it, I want you to transfer the whole bunch of Indians over to the ministry and put them over there."

"Oh, that would be catastrophic, because they won't get paid." [Laughter]

I said, "I don't care. You can't have these guys here. They're beautiful, they're lovely, they're having a great time, and they obviously want to continue to work for the United States embassy. What greater prestige and what greater pay would they get?" And, of course, we were paying out rupees, of which we had millions.

Q: Hundreds of millions.

SACCIO: That professor from Columbia came down to report what we had there. So Rudel said, "No, that's impossible."

So I said, "Well, I have to see the economic minister, and I'll just tell him. Would you kindly arrange for my appointment?"

So we had an appointment for a fixed time, and we went in there and he made us wait literally three-quarters of an hour in the small anteroom. Whether it was small or big, didn't make any difference, but there we sat. They sent out a messenger, "Pretty soon," and so forth.

Finally, he had me come in. I think I had somebody with me, one of the officers -- maybe Rudel. I told the Minister this work had been going on very nicely, it's very important, and I thought it's at a stage that we ought to transfer it over to him."

He looked at me and finally got around to apologizing for making me wait out there, because he had to be briefed. "You know, here in India, we're slow. We're not as fast as you people are."

I said, "Oh, I can understand that. But we would like to make this transfer and put these people in your ministry and make them continue to work and make it useful to your people."

He said, "We can't do that." And this went on.

So I laid down the law. I said, "If you don't, we'll dispense with the whole operation. Do you want it or you don't?"

We became great friends, because he was one of the top civil servants who went from the head of one agency to another. He went from agriculture to be the civil servant of defense, which is no small job in the way of prestige. He wasn't very happy, but we did become friends after he became secretary of defense, because we weren't transferring our soldiers to him. [Laughter] But the difficult of moving this sort of stuff on is...

Q: Do you feel that we aren't tough enough on this, that we keep things going too long?

SACCIO: It's hard, because, obviously, it was a very difficult problem to switch 15 people and put them in an Indian ministry, pay them the same as they've been paid, considering what the rest of the guys in that ministry were getting.

GEORGE G.B. GRIFFIN
Calcutta (1969-1972)

George G.B. Griffin was born in Turkey in 1934. He graduated with a BA from the University of South Carolina in 1957, and served in the U.S. Navy as a lieutenant overseas from 1957 to 1959. After entering the Foreign Service in 1959, his postings abroad have included Naples, Colombo, Calcutta, Islamabad, Lahore, Kathmandu, Kabul, Lagos, Seoul, Nairobi and Milan. Mr. Griffin was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: Excuse me. You were in Calcutta from when to when?

GRIFFIN: I got there in September of 1969, and left in August of '72, so I was there for three years. I'll talk about the Bangladesh war later, but now want to get into what preceded it. In 1969, there was lots of ferment in India, especially in the northeast, which was my territory. There was the rise of the so-called Naxalites. They were extreme communists, supposedly faithful to Beijing, as opposed to Moscow – much more extreme than the Trotskyites. Murder was their program of choice. If they could get to Indian officials, they would kill them. And they certainly didn't like American officials. It was essentially terrorism, but they had a fair amount of support in the countryside among poor people. They were a huge movement, and got along with the communist parties.

Bengal was the headquarters of the Communist Party of India-Marxist, as opposed to the Communist Party of India. There were at least five communist parties in West Bengal. So I decided to make a study in depth. I used to go see the head of the CPI-M, Jyoti Basu, who wouldn't talk much to other Westerners. I would go to his house at about five o'clock in the morning as he was having what they call "bed tea." It was the only time he would see me; maybe he didn't want anybody else to see me with him. He eventually became Chief Minister of West Bengal, as I predicted. Everybody else had doubts because he is a Communist.

Anyway, the Naxalites became such a huge problem that Mrs. Gandhi finally sent in the Indian army. Sam Manikshaw was Chief of Staff of the Indian Army at the time – a four star general – and was given a fifth star during the Bangladesh war. He is a Parsi, and a really interesting guy. I saw him often during his visits to Calcutta, as I had made good contacts with the head of the Eastern Army Command, his deputy, and other Indians who were friends of his. He taught me a lot, taught Mrs. Gandhi a lot, taught many people a lot about how an army does security work on its own soil. He made a speech to a big crowd in Calcutta warning people that he was coming with force. He said we are the Army. We don't know how to do police work. We won't arrest you; we will shoot you. If you get in our way, you are going to be dead. Make no mistake, it is not going to be pretty. We will not waste time arresting people. If you stand up against us, we will shoot you with whatever firepower we can muster. He marched the army through Calcutta, which is a hard place to march because it's so crowded, but he did it. Literally, in two months he broke the back of the Naxalite movement. It still exists. It still exists in the countryside, but is being handled mostly by police now.

Manikshaw was clever, and he mounted an effective campaign. There may be some lessons in that for us today. Several human rights people complained. Some democrats in India were upset about martial law. Mrs. Gandhi's response was that it certainly was martial law, and that the army was put in charge because the police couldn't hack it. But the Naxalites still exist in both India and in Nepal, so they are not totally under control.

In the period leading up to the 1971 Bangladesh war, we got to know the Chogyal and Gyalmo of Sikkim. The Gyalmo was an American named Hope Cooke from New York, who happened to be an acquaintance of my wife. We used that tie to wangle an invitation up for...

Q: You are remarried by this time.

GRIFFIN: Yes, I should have mentioned that. I did remarry. A lovely young lady from Washington came to see me in Calcutta, and stayed. We were married in Kathmandu.

Anyway we were invited to Gangtok, the capital of Sikkim, for a New Years' celebration in January. We were personal guests of Chogyal and his wife. The price of admission was an American turkey for their family New Years' dinner, which I managed to import from Denmark or someplace. The traditional ceremonies in the celebrations were very colorful, moving, and fascinating in a sort of Himalayan way. Unfortunately, the Chogyal was a nice guy who was beginning to fail. Hope Cooke wasn't much help to him. I don't know if you ever met her, but she leads tours of New York these days. She had learned a tradition that says one may not speak loudly in the presence of the king, so she whispered. I couldn't hear her very well, and had the worst time trying to figure out what she was talking about. It was made worse by the fact that she would whisper behind her hand. But the Chogyal was into the sauce. He would start with brandy at ten in the morning and, never quit. He eventually was thrown out. The Indians essentially marched in and took over the country. They said the Chogyal was a dictator, and that Sikkim couldn't be run by Sikkimese. Now, he's dead. It was a sad story. It was a beautiful little spot.

I also worked on Bhutan. Ambassador Keating had been to Bhutan a year before I got to Calcutta. He had been flown up in an Indian Army helicopter. The capital of Bhutan moves, according to where the king is. Thimpu seemed to be used most. The next year – the year I got there – Keating asked for the same facilities to go back to Bhutan. The Indians replied that they would assign another helicopter to take him, but that it would not be free. They said it would cost $7,000. The Ambassador didn't have that much in his travel budget and couldn't get it out of Washington, so he decided not to go, hoping to shame them into offering it free. It didn't work. So the Embassy decided to send three of us by the cheapest means available. Political Counselor Lee Stull, Harmon Kirby, a second secretary in the Political Section, and I went by USG car. Actually we flew to Siliguri, where we were met by a Consulate vehicle that took us the rest of the way.

At that time, there were no tourist facilities in Bhutan – no hotels, no inns, nothing. The only way to go was by royal invitation, which meant staying in a royal guest house. They were quite charming to look at from the outside but they had no heat. It was cold. I think it was in the spring or fall, but we are talking 6-8,000 feet. They did have running water, and servants to build a fire under the boiler. The best way to get warm was to take a shower and leap into bed under a big quilt. It is a friendly, beautiful country, totally unspoiled, rather like 16th century Switzerland.

The first night, we got only as far as the border village of Phuntsholing, where there was a royal guest house, with four Swiss men already there. They were all entomologists – bug chasers. They explained that nobody had ever catalogued the bugs in Bhutan. They were invited under the special relationship between Switzerland and Bhutan. It is called the Switzerland of the East for very good reasons, including high mountains. They had special permission to catalogue Bhutan's insects.

Phuntsholing is down in the lowlands, in the terai part of Bhutan. After supper, the Swiss asked us to let them turn on all the lights, open all the windows, take down all the screens and see what they could catch. We were invaded big time. Stuff whizzing around. They were the happiest Swiss I have ever seen. They had big barrels of cotton wool and gallons of formaldehyde. Ever bug they caught was thrown into a barrel. They filled up four the first night. We crossed paths with them for the next week all over Bhutan. Everywhere that we went, they went.

Q: Was there any political concern about Bhutan? Were we looking at any relationship?

GRIFFIN: Yes. We wanted the Bhutanese to vote favorably on issues of concern to the United States at the United Nations. We were there in 1969 or maybe '70. Memories were still very fresh of the Chinese invasion of northeast India in 1962. We were guests of the King, though the Queen was the one whom we met, and who organized our itinerary. The King never made himself available to us, perhaps because we weren't the Ambassador. We stayed in her guest house in Paro, and in his in Thimpu. Our escort officer was a young foreign service officer. He took us to an isolated village to show us some old stone fortifications, rather like Rumeli Hisar in Istanbul. There was a wall that went down to a river bed. He said this was where the Bhutanese had stopped the last Tibetan invasion. We looked rather surprised, so he went on to describe the invasion, and to stress that the Bhutanese were tougher and stronger than the awful Tibetans, who were egged on by the Chinese, of course. He said the Tibetans had guns, but the Bhutanese only had bows and arrows. Now the Bhutanese at that time were world famous archers – and still are. Anyway, he claimed that their bows and arrows in this fort had stopped the Tibetans, though they did torch the village. He showed us some of the damage. I asked him for the date of this battle, assuming it was a couple of hundred years ago. He replied that it was only ten years before the Chinese incursion in 1962. Nonetheless, the Indians were concerned that the Chinese might march through Bhutan, though they know that marching through Bhutan is a whole lot easier said than done. It is really almost impossible because of the Himalayan terrain.

One morning we watched some archery contests. The contestants were hitting bulls eyes literally a hundred yards away. I don't know how they did it. We called on several ministers, including the Minister of Tourism. He asked us for advice, noting that the only foreign exchange Bhutan was earning was from the sale of postage stamps. The postage stamps were all made in Philadelphia, which cost foreign exchange, so the net gain was not very much. He said the King wanted to bring in tourists. I jumped in to advise him to study the different experiences of Nepal and Sikkim. I argued that Bhutan should not follow the Nepal model. That would bring in nothing but very low-rent tourists. I said, "You don't want that." Secondly, I advised against Sikkim's example in road building, in which the Indians used too much dynamite, causing massive rock slides and killing hundreds of workers. I urged him to charge their tourists lots of money. That way, they could afford to build hotels. I said Bhutan is a beautiful country, which could attract plenty of tourists, but they should make sure that the quality of those tourists is high and that they are people who will spend lots of money. He said, "Good point." So, instead of having a free stay at the royal guest house, we were socked with a steep bill as we were leaving. He took my advice to heart, and Bhutan's tourism has done exactly what I proposed. You can't spend less than $2,000 in the country, even for two days. And they have preserved the quite spectacular natural beauty of the place.

One evening, we were invited to the home of the Indian Political Officer – the equivalent of an ambassador – for dinner. One of the guests was an Indian mountain climber. He was an Army colonel, who commanded the Indian Army Mountain Warfare School in Kashmir. He bragged that he had just climbed Kanchenjunga, the third highest peak in the world, east of Everest, on the China border. He showed us some slides of the climb, which was supposed to be secret. The mountain is considered sacred by the Bhutanese, and the official line remains that no one has ever climbed it. Moreover, the Chinese didn't want Indians climbing it because it overlooked Tibet. The mountain has a cliff face on the north side, which is considered unclimbable. The Chinese wanted to climb it themselves, but that is possible only through Sikkim or Bhutan, and the Indians wouldn't let them. The colonel said that, if the Chinese had learned about his expedition, they would have considered it a spy mission. Two Chinese military bases – an airbase and an army base – can be seen from the peak. We decided not to publicize it.

Just west of Bhutan in Sikkim is the Natu La Pass, a place that General Westmoreland visited when he was in Vietnam. He was trying to develop programs with the Indians to spy on China. He was driven up to Natu La, which is at 14,000 feet, because helicopters can barely make it and the weather was bad. Westmoreland was worried about the narrow roads where, when two vehicles met, they had to stop and inch by each other, with a cliff on one side and a long drop on the other. He asked his host if they ever lost vehicles. The Indian general slapped him on the knee and said, "You ought to see it! Bloom, bloom, bloom! Trucks make a bigger noise than jeeps. Every day we lose some!" He said that part of it was altitude acclimation. At 14,000 feet, some troops can't function.

Before the Bangladesh war, our Consulate General was already watching over the border into then-East Pakistan. Archer Blood was our Consul General in Dacca, and his political officer was Scott Butcher. We made jokes about Blood and Butcher as things began going badly wrong there. In 1971, the East Bengalis were up in arms because they had been robbed by Zulfikar Ali Bhutto in the elections. Their man Sheikh Mujib had won the election nationwide by the numbers, but Bhutto convinced Ayub Khan and other West Pakistanis not to give Mujib a chance to run Pakistan. The idea of a Bengali as head of the Government of Pakistan was something they really couldn't tolerate. They are really rather racist about Bengalis in West Pakistan. So things were in ferment, to put it mildly, and the Pakistan Army was rather stupidly cracking down. In mid-1971 we started getting waves of refugees into northeastern India. At one point it reached a figure of ten million, according to the Indians. We tried to check that figure several ways, and I must say I couldn't argue with it. Huge numbers of people. I went many times to the border area, where there were enormous refugee camps. I took several American politicians there, including Senator Ted Kennedy. He and Republican Congressman Peter Frelinghuysen from New Jersey were the most interested and involved at the time.

When things really got bad, we began to see American refugees as well. They realized it was unsafe for them as well, especially the missionaries. Some had been there so long that their teenaged kids had never been outside of East Pakistan in their lives. They weren't sure what to do, but Arch Blood and his staff advised them to get out because the way things were going it looked like there was going to be blood everywhere, so they agreed to leave. We had our hands full helping refugees, but I still had to report on the situation. As the crisis grew, a lot of American reporters began to arrive. By the time the war broke out, there were well over 400 of them in Calcutta. My boss assigned me as the chief Consulate briefer for them. That was quite useful to me, because we shared information. Some of them remain friends today.

I should mention that my Consul General at the time was Herb Gordon. He had been Political Counselor in New Delhi, and then was transferred directly to Calcutta. My first Deputy Principal Officer was Slator Blackiston, an Arabist who had transferred from Qatar. He came to India because several posts in the Arab world were closed after the '67 war, leaving less assignments available for officers who had spent most of their time in that area. Slator was not a happy camper, and his first efficiency report on me was not a good one. I complained because I watched the Consul General sign it without reading it. He was getting into a car to go to the airport on home leave and didn't read it before he signed it. So I filed an official grievance. I was advised by a friend in Washington who worked in that office not to do that because it would identify me as a trouble maker. Maybe; but I was right, and the result was a special inspection team from the Inspector General's office. By the time they arrived, the war was getting hot. I was up to my eyeballs in alligators, as they say, trying to cope with frantic reporting and briefing. One day an inspector stuck his head in my office and said, "Mr. Griffin, we've been trying for four days to interview you." I said, "I'm busy. I have to get out a Flash message." He insisted, telling me that their whole purpose was me. He said if I didn't talk to him, I would soon be out of a job. I got the message. I not only stayed and was promoted repeatedly, but the CG lost his career. So I was vindicated, and it was good for me. But not for him, I fear.

Q: Did we talk about Bengal, I mean the consular district of Calcutta. You mentioned your contacts. I was wondering because I would think that as overwhelming poverty is around you, it has to gnaw at your soul.

GRIFFIN: It does. And yet, let me make a broad observation. India gets two kinds of visitors, including us foreigners who live there for a few years. One type is people who are so put off by poverty that they really get ill and can't stand it, and want to run away from it as fast as they can. The other is those who see it, but say well, maybe something can be done about it. They see the other side of that coin – the more colorful India, the hospitable India, the friendly India. I fall into the second category. We have many Indian friends. Indians and Americans have almost the same image abroad – that is, arrogant and not very nice, until you get to know them. Anybody who comes to America and spends time, especially in the middle of the country, will say, "Oh, Americans are so friendly. Everybody says hello to you. Everywhere you go, people are friendly and say hi." It's rather similar in India.

Before I forget, I should say here that our daughter Schuyler was born at a very nice hospital in Calcutta during the lead-up to the Bangladesh war. She has returned to India a few times over the years, and enjoys it as much as Chrissie and I do.

Now, about the poverty there. What do you do about it? Well, for one thing, we have official programs trying to do something about it. We did make a huge difference a couple of times in India. There was a famine in 1966 in eastern India, especially in Bihar, the state just west of Bengal, and in Orissa, just south of there – both grain growing areas. They had a long drought, and people were starving by the hundreds of thousands, if not millions. We mounted a huge PL-480 grain shipment program, which saved lots of lives. People were still grateful for it when I got there in 1969. There were many other programs. But things got reversed during the Bangladesh war when Mrs. Gandhi shut down our USIS libraries and said she didn't need any more PL-480 aid, thank you very much. That situation was eventually cleared up by Ken Galbraith when he was Ambassador. He managed to strike an agreement which absolved the Indian debt of nine billion dollars to the U.S. That turned attitudes around. So we have done a lot for India over time. The USIS libraries didn't come back, but I think you can see that in today's India, it hasn't stopped Indians from finding out about American culture.

Q: What about sort of the standard parties, the congress parties and the other parties?

GRIFFIN: Well, as I said, Calcutta was a hotbed of communism. If you lived in Calcutta – that goes back to your question about poverty – you would know why. Most people are very poor. Estimates of the number of people sleeping on the streets varies from three to seven hundred thousand every night. Some of them have another place they could sleep, so they are there by choice. But the choice may be a hot-as-hell little room, or the much cooler street. This means that they also do what you would call toilet functions on the street, with no privacy. Yes that gets to you. But, on the other hand, we knew that begging was a racket in Calcutta – a huge racket, and some of the beggars live very well. I wouldn't call them wealthy, but they certainly have homes off the street. There was a guy with no legs and no arms on a little cart every day at the main intersection in Calcutta. He went home to a nice house and family every night. He spent his days on the street begging, and collected a fair amount of money. So there is that, but after awhile you start to ignore that part of it.

Yes, we had what my wife thought was an inordinate number of servants. But when you stop to think about it, we had two full time servants, and then when she had a baby, we got a third. When you figure how many others those people were supporting, we were the sole income for 36 people. The sweeper, who was from Orissa, didn't have his family in Calcutta. He sent money home, rather like Hispanic immigrants do here today. We led the charge in raising salaries, to the consternation of some people in the Consulate who thought we were already paying too much.

Of course, poverty led to some of the politics. But the Communist Party was also strong in southern and western India. As was the Congress party, which lost Bengal to the CPI-M. They thought it would come back, but they lost in Bihar and the next state west, Uttar Pradesh, which are the biggest Hindi-speaking states. They were the core of the Congress Party for years and years. That has changed. They have become BJP supporters. The Communist Party may have won because one of its tenets is secularism. The BJP is promoting Hinduism. That won't fly with most Indians. They don't want their politics to be religious. They have watched Pakistan, and say they don't want to be like it. There are many Muslims in Calcutta. Some of them are people who didn't want to live in East Pakistan. They may be on the low end of the economic scale, but they are there nonetheless.

Q: So what was going on in East Pakistan?

GRIFFIN: Archer Blood, the Consul General in Dhaka, got in trouble for honest reporting. We heard that he ran afoul of Ambassador Joseph Farland in Islamabad, a political appointee and former Coca Cola Company executive. Arch was accused of going native and siding too much with the Bengalis. But then things began to snowball. Refugees started coming across into India, fleeing from the fighting. In the monsoon season, which would have been in June, July, and maybe August of 1971, hundreds of thousands of refugees streamed into West Bengal and Assam, as well as further north and east into Tripura and Burma. I went out to the West Bengal border one day, and found the land flooded as far as the eye could see. On the water were hundreds of rowboats loaded with people and their belongings, piled as high as they could without sinking, all looking for dry ground. At about the same time, resident Americans began to leave East Pakistan. The families of Consulate General personnel in Dacca were evacuated. Political Officer Scott Butcher pouched me all his biographic files for safekeeping.

At some point, it was evident that the Indians were planning a military move into East Pakistan. They closed air corridors between East and West Pakistan, so the Pakistanis had to fly around the southern tip of India to get from one side to the other. Tensions kept building up. A large group of American missionaries was evacuated by ship from Cox's Bazaar and Chittagong to Calcutta, where we helped them find temporary lodging and onward transportation. Then the American press began to appear. The first one was a journalist with whom I'm still in touch – Barrie Dunsmore. He was an ABC TV News correspondent stationed in Rome, and came out to see how big a story was developing. His trip led to others and, eventually, at the height of the war, there were something like 800 American correspondents in Calcutta. So as these events mounted, I dropped my scheduled tasks and focused entirely on the East Pakistan crisis.

The outflow of refugees increased steadily in the Fall of 1971, climbing to an estimated total of ten million people at one point. Several Senators and Congressmen came out to check on the situation. One was Republican Representative Peter Frelinghuysen of New Jersey, who was Chairman of the Near East/South Asia Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. Another was Senator Ted Kennedy of Massachusetts. I took them out to refugee camps, as far as we were allowed to go. We weren't allowed into Assam or Tripura, so they only saw what was in West Bengal. More journalists came, and started getting in trouble. And then things got even more interesting for me.

Among the refugees was a group of politicians...

Q: Who would be Bengali politicians?

GRIFFIN: That's right. East Bengali politicians. They got together in Calcutta and formed a Bangladesh government in exile. In the midst of this, in early July 1971, Henry Kissinger made his secret trip to China to prepare the way for President Nixon. He came first to India and then to West Pakistan, where he disappeared for several days. We heard that he had fallen ill, but thought he was trying to talk sense to General Yahya and address other urgent problems of South Asia. Later we learned that he had other things on his mind.

In any case, it was decided in Washington (after a proposal by the Indian Ambassador there, and with the concurrence of Ambassador Farland in Islamabad) to respond positively to a feeler from the East Pakistanis in Calcutta. The Department instructed the post to give them a message, and I was selected to do it in secret meetings with a representative of the Bangladesh government in exile. The Department said it would be too official if the Consul General did so. This caused me instant problems with the Indian police tasked with keeping an eye on us. They may not have been fully briefed by New Delhi, and began to track my every movement. I almost couldn't go to the bathroom without being followed, which got to be very irritating. I found a way to evade them and meet the Bangladeshi the first time, which they didn't like. At the same time, I was building better access to senior Indian officials. That included all the military commanders – from Indian Army chief General Sam Manikshaw, to Eastern Commander General Arora, to his deputy Lieutenant General Jackie Jacob – and the governors and chief ministers of West Bengal and the other states, plus Calcutta Police Chief Ranjit Gupta, whose men were assigned to follow me.

Q: Did New Delhi have a problem?

GRIFFIN: I have never tracked this down fully, but the East Pakistanis in exile – they thought up the name Bangladesh – were probably, if not put together by, at least facilitated by New Delhi – the Government of India – which didn't want an American diplomat nosing around their handiwork. I wasn't authorized to negotiate with anybody; I was essentially a messenger. I carried messages to and from the Bangladesh exiles. Henry Kissinger wrote about all this in his book "White House Years." Years later, he autographed my copy and wrote "Thanks for your help, George" in the margin.

Meanwhile, the war drums kept pounding. The Indians were playing a cat-and-mouse game with us. They wanted us to know certain things, but not others, so we played along while trying to find out what we were missing. The journalists were all over me too, realizing that I knew some things they didn't know. I encouraged them, because they knew other things I wanted to know. For example, they would sneak across the border during or after Indian military activities, and then come back and tell me about it. So I had a fair exchange of information with some top American and British reporters that you know or have heard of. It got to be quite a mob scene. My office wouldn't hold them all. I had to give them appointments to see me in small groups. It was the only way I could get my other work done.

Q: As you were doing this and acting, as you say, as reporter and as messenger, were you getting any feel for what the State Department was doing? It had this kind of opening which was the apple of the National Security Advisor's, Henry Kissinger's, eye.

GRIFFIN: Well, there are several ways to say it. We were at the end of the food chain. From our perspective, the Department, Embassy New Delhi, and Embassy Islamabad were squabbling about what our stance should be. In particular, Ambassadors Farland (in Islamabad) and ex-Senator Kenneth Keating (in New Delhi) seemed to us to be snarling at each other. We kept adding free advice to our reports that we should all cooperate, as we're on the same team. But differing views has been a problem between those two embassies ever since Pakistan was created. Embassy New Delhi finally arranged a meeting, asking Islamabad to send its political counselor. He didn't come, but his deputy did – my friend Bill Simmons. I was invited too, so I went to Delhi and sat in a series of meetings mostly chaired by Lee Stull, the Political Counselor. Dick Viets was the Ambassador's staff aide at the time, and Galen Stone was the DCM. They and lots of others, including the CIA station chief, got involved. But we ran into a buzz saw. Bill Simmons said Ambassador Farland was upset because we didn't grasp that East Pakistan was internal Pakistani business. He suggested that we shut up and do our jobs tracking India, which seemed primed to attack our CENTO ally Pakistan. We said, "Wait a minute!" I'm still a friend of Bill's.

Frustrated, I went back to Calcutta and kept doing my job. One evening my wife and I were invited to supper a trois by the deputy commandant of Eastern Command, a fascinating gentleman named Major General J. F. R. Jacob. After the war, he was promoted, and became the highest ranking Jew ever in the Indian Army – something he is rightly proud of. He's from Bombay and is now a senior member of the ruling BJP. Jackie and I got to be pretty thick after a couple of false starts. At supper that night he showed us some of his prized Chinese artifacts, and we talked a lot about art. Finally, he said, "Don't you have to go to the bathroom? Go through the bedroom." It took me a few moments to understand, but once in his bedroom I found a huge map of the region on his wall...

GRIFFIN: ...on which all of the Indian military formations were carefully plotted – all of them. I didn't have a camera, but I had a pretty good memory. I studied the map for as long as I dared, then raced to the Consulate and filed the news that there were troops where we didn't know there were troops, and many more than we had thought. Jacob was a disciple of the storied German General Heinz Guderian, who revolutionized armored warfare in World War II, and what the Indians did was rather remarkable. They took over East Pakistan almost without firing a shot. They did it by transporting an entire division across the Brahmaputra River by tank. Tanks that could swim. Soviet tanks. They did it covertly. Nobody tracked them. I guess we didn't have good real-time satellite imagery in those days, and didn't pick it up until I saw his map. It showed a whole division east of the Brahmaputra River that we didn't know about. They just rolled into Dacca one day, and that was it. The Pakistanis surrendered or fled in various ways. The Indians let some of them go without shooting them, but most were sent back to the West Wing, as it had been called before, by ship and plane.

Q: Was there concern on our part about the brutality of the West Pakistani troops in the East?

GRIFFIN: Quite a bit, and every time Embassy Islamabad said it was an internal Pakistani affair we sent in a report showing how those "internal" problems had spilled over into India. People were fleeing in all directions from the nastiness, including several million refugees who came in India and into our consular district. We couldn't count them, but we certainly saw refugees as far as the eye could see on the many occasions we went to the border in West Bengal. There were many Americans and other foreigners who came out of East Pakistan to Calcutta and spoke to us. There were lots of photographs and enough other evidence to document the brutality of the West Pakistanis. Later, when I was transferred to Islamabad, I met some East Bengalis who had been in the government in West Pakistan. They were locked up during the war and eventually repatriated, but they had some horror tales of their own to tell.

Q: The whole time you were there was a time of great concern about Vietnam. How was this playing in Calcutta and with the Indians?

GRIFFIN: The Indians didn't like our involvement in Vietnam. One of their top diplomats was a representative on the international observer group.

Q: ICC or something.

GRIFFIN: Yes, so they were paying close attention. Now, as an aside – remind me to come back to the USS Enterprise – my second marriage took place in Kathmandu.

Q: I don't want to go into details obviously about the separation from your first wife...

GRIFFIN: Yes, and divorce.

Q: So were you in Calcutta by yourself?

GRIFFIN: Initially.

Q: That allowed you time to go out and do all this.

GRIFFIN: That's right.

Q: In times of crises, this is very handy.

GRIFFIN: Until a very pretty American girl showed up several months after I arrived and decided to stay. I won't get into all that, although it's quite a funny story. After a couple of months, we agreed to get married, but that proved not to be feasible in Calcutta, so she took off. She went first to Kathmandu, where I gave her an introduction to my old boss in NEA, Ambassador Carol Laise. When she told Carol that we wanted to get married, which seemed impossible in Calcutta, she said, "You can get married here. Tell George to come up." So I did, and we tied the knot in Carol's living room, where she and Ellsworth Bunker were married. The reason I mention this is because you asked about Vietnam. You may recall that, as a wedding present, President Johnson gave them an Air Force plane to visit each other, which they did with some frequency. The Government of India insisted that every flight stop in Calcutta on the way to and from Kathmandu and Saigon. So, partly because they had been so helpful to us, I made sure I was at Dum Dum Airport each time the plane landed. So I saw quite a bit of both Ambassadors Bunker and Laise in Calcutta. He had been Ambassador to India in the 1950s, and was well known in New Delhi. The Indians often wanted to talk to him officially, and sometimes sent a minister from New Delhi to meet with him at Dum Dum. So sometimes the extent of my conversation with him was, "Hello, Mr. Ambassador. The Minister here wants to talk to you." So yes, New Delhi was paying attention. Moreover, there was speculation that, if the Indians invaded East Pakistan, it would become their Vietnam because there was no way they could control it. But they were clever enough to go in, throw out the West Pakistanis, and then get out themselves.

Q: As you were seeing this develop, was this a scenario that India may annex the whole thing?

GRIFFIN: Yes, some people expected that would happen. But to me, it was clear that the Indian military did not want to do that, and was advising its political leadership that it wouldn't work. It would be far too difficult to control the East Bengalis. One Indian general, probably the head of Eastern Command, General Arora, who is a Sikh, told me, "If the West Pakistanis, who are also Muslims, can't control those people, we surely cannot, and we shouldn't try." There were no Bengalis at the top of the Indian military; the generals were all from other parts of India. But even the West Bengalis were saying, with some dismay, "Well, you know, they're Bengalis like us. So they're hard to control."

Q: Bengalis within the state of India were sort of a difficult lump to digest?

GRIFFIN: And proud of it. Calcutta was the capital of British India until 1911, and some Bengalis think it still is. I was given a crash course in Hindi a few weeks before I went to Calcutta. Once there, I was accorded a teacher to continue lessons. I quickly discovered that it was useless, because the only state in our consular district where Hindi was spoken was Bihar. Even there, they preferred Bihari. And Bengalis absolutely refused to speak it. English was fine, but not Hindi; no. So I saw no reason to keep learning it while living in Bengal, and dropped the Hindi lessons. After awhile I didn't have time anyway.

At the time, the population of West Bengal was somewhere around 46 million. Now, it is probably close to 90 million. The population of East Pakistan was close to 80 million at that time, so the Hindus would have been outnumbered by Muslims, something they certainly didn't want.

In any case, the war was over and done with very quickly. It began on the 16th of December 1971, and was over by Christmas Eve. Christina and I had invited some of the American journalists over for Christmas, trying to make them feel at home, but they realized the war was over, and they were gone. Only a handful stayed around to report on the mopping up.

Q: Was there fighting along any of the other borders of India and Pakistan, or was it pretty well...?

GRIFFIN: Yes, in the West there was some reciprocal bombing, and a few tank and artillery battles, especially in Punjab, in the southern deserts, and some in Kashmir. But most of the activity was in the East. The Pakistanis could not fight a two-front war, as their supply lines were too extended to reach their troops in the East Wing.

Q: It's an impossible situation.

GRIFFIN: The Pakistanis sent all their warplanes to Iran when things got hot because they didn't want them destroyed by the Indian Air Force. They were far outnumbered and, while they consider themselves better pilots and dogfighters than the Indians, they knew the Indian equipment was more massive, some of it was newer, and they couldn't afford to lose their best equipment. Basically, the Pakistanis were armed by us, and the Indians by the Soviets. When we suspended our military assistance program, the Pakistanis turned to China.

Q: When this was started, did the Indians make their intentions known that they were going to help create a state, or was this sort of up in the air?

GRIFFIN: It was certainly not clear to me at first. But evidently someone in Washington thought it was in the cards. In the midst of the war, I got a call from one of the generals at Eastern Command asking why we were sending an aircraft carrier into the Bay of Bengal. I asked Embassy New Delhi what was going on. Ambassador Keating in turn called the State Department and, in much more colorful language, asked if it were true. It turned that the USS Enterprise had been ordered into the Bay of Bengal without informing the Ambassador. He was livid.

Q: This was, of course, Henry Kissinger trying to send a signal. It's one of those stupid diplomatic moves that didn't do anything, but it sounded like a guy who was trying to manipulate things.

GRIFFIN: It was supposed to be a show of force. To warn the Indians that if they invaded we would do something. Well, we didn't do anything. The ship went a short way into the Bay of Bengal, then turned around and left. That was it. They didn't fly a plane off it, as far as I know. But nobody told us about it until it was almost over with.

Q: Did that tilt towards Pakistan that came out later, did that hit you while you were there?

GRIFFIN: Yes, and Kissinger argues that that was the only thing that saved all of Pakistan from being invaded by India. There certainly was talk at that time that the Indians would go all the way, just as there is right this minute, with the Indians growling again at the Pakistanis for the latest shoot-'em-up in Kashmir. It always comes up. They have fought two and a half wars, so it's not unusual for the idea to come up. But most of my Indian contacts would argue what I said earlier – that Pakistan is indigestible. India is already the world's second largest Muslim country and has a big enough problem with it. Do they want to absorb more? No.

Q: It doesn't make any sense. While you were there, because it's still hanging around, what was your feeling, and your colleagues' who were sort of Indian hands and South Asian hands, about Kashmir, the equity of this? How did you feel about this?

GRIFFIN: In Calcutta I was paying little attention to Kashmir, except in the context of the eastern mini-states in my territory. That is, Nagaland Assam, Tripura, Manipur, Meghalaya, and the other small, money-poor states up there. Some of them had a status similar to Kashmir, though Kashmir is an entirely different case. But no, I didn't get into that issue until I was transferred to Pakistan, where it was almost topic number one.

At a Congress Party meeting in Patna, the capital of Bihar, I was brought over to meet Prime Minister Gandhi. I asked her about the status of those northeastern territories. The subject was fresh to me because we were dealing with a request from Billy Graham, the evangelist, to go to Assam to preach. I knew that, in Mrs. Gandhi's eyes, American missionaries were responsible for a lot of the troubles in those parts, pushing people to agitate for independence, or at least self-governing status within the Indian Republic. Some of our contacts were bemoaning the fact that some of the tribal languages, costumes, and customs were disappearing. I asked her what she thought about that. She said, "It is part of India, and must be fully integrated. Everybody there is an Indian; not a Naga; not an Assamese. They must have loyalty to the nation first." She didn't tell me that that should include learning Hindi, but she certainly talked that way in public speeches.

However, she did add, "If you are arguing for keeping these people clean or pure tribals, then why should an American missionary go there?" She said he would be doing the same thing that any Indian political officer would do. She meant that both would try to change the tribals, something I couldn't argue with. During the same period, there were some incidents in Orissa, which have been reflected in recent news. Do you remember last year when an American missionary and his son were killed along a road in Orissa?

Q. Yes, I do.

GRIFFIN: Well, we had some similar problems there. I remember Consul General Herb Gordon lecturing one of the missionaries who came to see him. The missionary said the lives of his group were in danger, and asked my boss to send officers there to check on the situation and protect them. The CG asked exactly what they were doing, saying he presumed they were proselytizing. The missionary said, no, they were helping the poor, and sometimes told people a bit about the Bible and about what God can do. The CG said that proved his point. They were proselytizing, which they knew was prohibited in India. He said there was not much we could do to help them. The man was furious. He wrote back to his headquarters in the U.S., and his church complained to the Department, but nobody ordered us to do anything, and I don't think they should have. This is something that will come up again and again, given the beliefs of some of our major politicians today. Moreover, the Department now has people working on these issues.

Q: How did you find dealing with the people in Calcutta, the officials and all? Were they a different breed of cat from what you, I guess, experienced later on? The New Delhi bureaucrats who were sort of superior? American and the Indian officials don't seem to mix very well.

GRIFFIN: At a personal level, all over India, we still have lots of friends. Most Indians are very hospitable and warm, and we still stay in touch with many of them. Indians in general, and especially Indians abroad, are like Americans. They appear arrogant, they know everything, they are not always very nice people, so you don't think you want to know them. But if you do get to know them – the same with Americans – you can find good friends. Of the officials and politicians that I encountered, I found the Bengalis the easiest to deal with. For example, Jyoti Basu, the leader of the Communist Party (Marxist-Leninist), a supposed Maoist offshoot of the pro-Soviet Communist Party of India. He eventually was elected Chief Minister of West Bengal, a job he kept for 20-odd years. As Country Director for India, I went back to see him a couple of times. He was a typical Bengali politician. Okay, he had a Communist label, but he was a politician in the same way that any of his counterparts, the governors of American states, is. I may have made a mistake in arguing that he was a nationalist a la Ho Chi Minh. He knew his people, came from there, and dealt with them accordingly. I said we should almost forget the party label in the case of someone who knew what was best for the people of Bengal. He certainly did. He cleaned up much of the mess in the state – a mess left to him by the Congress Party, which had gotten old and tired and corrupt. I wrote a long airgram – a useful format that no longer exists, thanks to computers – describing the underlying causes of the rise of the communists and the decline of the Congress Party, that Tony Quainton, then India Desk Officer, tried to help me publish in a scholarly journal.

Q: Were we sort of observing the atrophy of the Congress Party?

GRIFFIN: I think so. They have kept going. The Congress Party still exists. But when you have to turn to an Italian stewardess to head the Party, something's wrong, it seems to me.

Q: This is Rajiv Gandhi's wife, Sonia.

GRIFFIN: Yes, Sonia Gandhi. While she has not become Prime Minister, she has become head of the Congress Party. I still don't think she will be elected Prime Minister. Back to Calcutta: of course I knew the local Congress Party leadership too. One of them, Siddhartha Shankar Ray, eventually came here as Ambassador when I was Country Director in the early 1990's. While at first he wasn't happy to see me, we became decent friends and got along fine. Yes, the Party had gone to sleep, and was getting ossified.

Q: Did you feel you were a different breed of cat in Calcutta than our political officers in Delhi?

GRIFFIN: I guess I always behaved a bit differently from some of my colleagues. Maybe that's what got me in trouble and got me the CIA label. I can be a bit pushy when I try to meet people and get information. For years, I prided myself on the number of people I knew, and among them the relatively large number with whom I could have fruitful conversations. That said, there were excellent political officers in New Delhi. I knew and dealt with them all, and some I still see. Harman Kirby, for example, came to lunch last Sunday. In 1970, he had the eastern India bailiwick, and some external affairs, such as Pakistan. That is why he was in that meeting in New Delhi, along with his boss, Lee Stull, the political counselor. That's why I went with both of them to Bhutan. I haven't mentioned those sidebars.

Q: Well, why don't you mention Bhutan.

GRIFFIN: Ambassador Keating was accredited to Bhutan as well as India. He had made annual visits to the mountain kingdom by Indian Army helicopter. The Consulate had a watching brief for Bhutan and Sikkim, so I knew the Bhutanese and the Sikkimese official representatives in Calcutta. They both had offices there, as each Indian state, for example, has an office in New Delhi and a guest house where the chief minister stays when he goes to the capital. The Ambassador was planning to go to Bhutan again in 1970 until the Indians, who flew him there before gratis, told the Embassy it would cost $7,000, or something like that. Apparently there wasn't that much in the Ambassador's travel budget. He didn't want to go by road, and asked the Bhutanese for help, but they didn't have a helicopter. When he decided that somebody needed to go, Lee Stull volunteered, and asked Harman Kirby and me to go with him. We flew to Siliguri, where we were picked up by a car from the Consulate and drove the rest of the way. It was hysterical. The first night we stayed in a government guest house just inside the Bhutanese border in the terai, the lowland part of Bhutan. There were the three of us and four Swiss entomologists. Bhutan was called the Switzerland of the East by some, but this was the first time to anybody's recollection that serious entomologists had been allowed into the country, and they were happy as pigs in mud. They turned on all the lights in the guest house and insisted that we leave all the windows wide open. There were no screens. They hung netting all over the place, and readied big 100-gallon barrels to be stuffed with insects, formaldehyde, and cotton wool. When the bugs started flying in, there were repeated shouts of "I've never seen one of those!" We had to dodge beetles as big as your hand half the night until they filled up one of the barrels. We crossed paths with them throughout our stay in Bhutan. They were everywhere catching bugs.

Q: What was the status of Bhutan at that time?

GRIFFIN: As it still is. It's an independent kingdom, considered to be under the hegemony of India. The Chinese thought about seizing Bhutan when they invaded India in 1962, but chose not to. It is on the border of Tibet, which is very sensitive to the Chinese, so they pay close attention to it. We were taken to see a sacked mountain village, said to be the result of the last Chinese invasion. When I asked if that was 100 years ago, I was told it was in 1963, or something like that. Our guide, a young officer from the Foreign Ministry said, "We fought them off with bows and arrows." Obviously it was not the main Chinese army, but the Bhutanese are quite proud of their archery skills. I used to be a pretty good archer myself, but I couldn't compete with them. Since our trip, they have moved to high-tech like everybody else, but in those days we saw things that would have been at home in medieval Europe. They had short ones and long ones, including a five-foot bow with probably close to a 200-pound pull. They could send an arrow what seemed half a mile with incredible accuracy.

Part of the purpose of our trip was to seek Bhutanese support at the UN, which meant trying to distance them from the Indians. We weren't very successful, but we tried. We also wanted to see as much of that very exotic country as we could. There are not very many shops in the country. Most were on the main street – a dirt road – of Paro. It is one of the capital cities; there are multiple capitals, depending on where the king is, or was. I almost bought a bedspread for my wife until I found out the price – $6,000 – so I said they could keep it. The shopkeeper said, "Senator Percy bought three of them last year." I replied that the Senator was a bit better off than I was.

When we went to see the Minister of Tourism, who was looking for help in developing that industry, I offered to put him in touch with some experts. They were no hotels in the country, so we stayed in royal guest houses everywhere. Bhutan's primary foreign exchange income then was (and may still be) postage stamps, most of which were printed in Philadelphia. I suggested that they could do much better. I was amazed by one stamp with a 3D picture of American astronauts, until I learned that they were made in Philadelphia. I cautioned the Minister about two things: (1) to avoid the example of Nepal, which just invited the world in, and was overwhelmed by hippies and so-called world travelers; and (2) to prohibit large-scale dynamiting in building roads, which killed too many workers and caused landslides. I said, "Charge an arm and a leg." Well, my God, they moved quickly. They immediately sent over a rather pricey bill for our stay in the royal guest houses. Their prices are still very high, but it's kept most non-spenders out.

Bhutan now has other problems which were not so evident in those days, though you could see it happening next door in Darjeeling and in Sikkim. That is the large numbers of Nepalese who have moved in. According to our guide, slavery was abolished in Bhutan around 1960; one of the last places on earth where it was officially abolished. Many of the slaves were Nepalese, which has caused some bilateral problems, though the issue has quieted recently.

The other interesting place was Sikkim. My wife had known Hope Cooke, the Chogyal's wife, when she was a teenager. They invited us up for their New Year's celebrations one year. The price of admission was an American frozen turkey. That was just before the Chogyal went into a physical decline. He was eventually removed by the Indians and died, and she moved back to New York. It was an idyllic little existence, but he was probably not cut out to be a king. Certainly he was not able to deal effectively with the Byzantine political moves of the Indians and the Chinese. He talked a good line and tried to walk a fine line, but he drank too much, which made him fuzzy-headed. He was a nice guy – not a take charge type. After I left Calcutta, the Indians de-throned him, creating a bit of a stir, which died down pretty quickly. It was a bit like Goa and the other small territories India took over, and the Chinese didn't react.

Q: While you were in Calcutta, did you have any dealings with the students? Universities are often difficult places to penetrate.

GRIFFIN: They are. I was a little long in the tooth for hanging around campuses, but I did make contact with a few professors and secondary school teachers. Most of the students I met were crypto-Naxalites or real Communists, who were writing newspapers and pamphlets, some of which eventually became official party organs. I had “discussions” with some of them. They tended to yell at me that I was a representative of murderers and butchers, so I would call them muddle-headed and other names. We didn’t much see eye to eye. Many of them had left school and gone into street politics to become known and effective. So, it wasn’t so much on the campus as it was away from the campus.

Q: What about Mother Theresa?

GRIFFIN: Mother Theresa mounted a refugee relief effort during the Bangladesh war. She had Indian and expatriate ladies making bandages and putting together packages of things, especially for babies – milk and other things. My wife was involved in that effort during the war, and stayed on to help in Mother Theresa’s work with abandoned babies and the dying poor afterward. During the war, she found that the way many Americans and Europeans “helped” the refugee effort was to empty their medicine cabinets and donate mostly expired medicines, or diet and birth control pills! There were literally shiploads of things like that to be sorted out. Some of it was extremely dangerous. People had literally just dumped...

Q: I know. They did this with medicines and everything else.

GRIFFIN: So that took a lot of our time. Then the Indians made things more difficult by slapping import duties on shiploads of blankets and tents. These were brand new and well packaged, so we went screaming in to complain, pointing out that it was not commerce, but a donated relief effort. It didn’t get sorted out until the whole thing was over. Meanwhile some of our USAID people were upset when refugees came into town and sold donated blankets and tents on the street. My argument to them – and I remember that Senator Kennedy and Congressman Frelinghuysen agreed with me – was, “Look, if that’s a way they can get money to buy something they really need, what’s the matter with it?”

I took an American automobile to Calcutta, which was not the cleverest thing to do, but I was relatively broke and didn’t know what else to do. Eventually I sold it for a fairly decent profit to a young fellow who fancied himself a race car driver. Since I wasn’t allowed to keep the profit, I decided to donate it to Mother Theresa, as the rules allowed. Chrissie took me to see her, and she gave us a personal tour of her establishment. She explained how her nuns took in people off the street in their last throes. She added that she was trying to ensure that such populations would not increase, by promoting the so-called “rhythm method.” Years later she disavowed that position, and became just as insistent as the current Pope about doing nothing to interfere with the reproduction process. But at that time she showed us in detail how it worked, so I thought my money was going to the right place.

Q: Both with your family and others at the Consulate General, the extreme poverty that surrounded one in Calcutta must have had an effect.

GRIFFIN: It does. It is everywhere. I guess you develop kind of a blind eye to it. Since I grew up in Turkey, I was not unaccustomed to poverty, and it certainly exists in America in Washington and elsewhere. So, it wasn't really new to me. In Turkey, my father would hand out a few coins here and there to outstretched hands on his way to his office. Many Indians do the same. For awhile I did too, but then decided to give to recognized charities, and stop handing out money to people on the street, unless it was a kid to "guard your car." Basically a bribe to keep him and other kids from ripping off your...

Q: And keeping him from ripping you off.

GRIFFIN: Right. So a few paisa there would do. Then there were the rackets. The main drag in Calcutta is called Chowringhe. It is a street lined with big hotels, restaurants, and so forth, and also full of beggars who know where the money is. Especially those who mutilate children to induce you to give them money. I learned to close my eyes to that and ignore it. I was proud of the fact that we had official programs to try to help poor people. I knew that on my pitiful salary I couldn't do that much by myself, so I was proud to work for a government that was trying to help people. That was my attitude, but as far as Americans in general go, there are two attitudes when faced with India. One is "Oh, my God, this awful! I can't stand it. Get me out of here." The other is "I love it! It's so colorful! Life is vibrant." I tend to be in the second category. I found India a wondrous place and enjoyed most of it. Now, the population of India has trebled in my official lifetime, which is saying something. When I first went to Colombo in 1962, the population of India was less than 400 million. It is over a billion now, and you can see it everywhere. It's not only the crowds on the streets everywhere, but the pollution, which is getting seriously worse. It's amazing how close people can live and survive in all that, but India needs to do something about its population growth rate. The Chinese did. Many people have complained, but it has worked fairly well. The Japanese did. The Indians have not, and they're paying a price for it, and will continue to pay a price. In Pakistan and Bangladesh the populations are increasing at an even more rapid rate than in India. Some people say so they can be of equal size some day, able to stand up to India, but that's a sad attitude.

Q: Then you left there in 1972?

GRIFFIN: I left Calcutta in '72, yes.

WALTER A. LUNDY
Political/Economic Officer
New Delhi (1969-1973)

Walter A. Lundy, Jr. was born in Georgia in 1933. After receiving his bachelor's degree from the University of Georgia in 1954 and serving in the US Air Force from 1954-1958, he received his master's degree from Georgetown University in 1961. His career has included positions in Colombo, Saigon, Hue, New Delhi, Teheran, and Seoul. Mr. Lundy was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in September 2005.

Q: I see that your next assignment was to the embassy in New Delhi so maybe we ought to move ahead to that unless you have something else you'd like to say about your assignment to the desk? How long were you there, on the desk?

LUNDY: I was on the desk for a year and a half, and then I was in India for three and a half years. The job became vacant in New Delhi in September. There was not another candidate for the job. I did not want to go out that soon. My wife had just given birth to our younger daughter, our third child, and we were not really ready to go back overseas. And there was no one to replace me on the desk. A compromise was worked out; we went out in December.

Q: Of '69?

LUNDY: Yes.

Q: OK and stayed until the summer of '73?

LUNDY: Until August of '73, to be more precise..

Q: OK, well why don't you talk a little bit about...unless there is something else that should be said about your time in NEA on the...?

LUNDY: No, I don't think so.

Q: What was your job in New Delhi and...?

LUNDY: Perhaps I should start off by saying that I'm not sure I had one. Given my experience on the desk, if ever any assignment should have worked out for me, that one should have. Instead, New Delhi was my worst assignment. Undoubtedly I was a bit cocky thinking I could put to good use my experience on the desk, but I learned soon after arriving there was very little for me to do. The AID mission was enormous; there was a very active and highly competent Treasury attaché, Larry Viet, who became one of my best friends. He very much fit the pattern of talented Treasury officials we discussed earlier. There was an agricultural attaché and an assistant attaché. The AID mission had an office of some seven or eight program economists. It was one of our biggest AID establishments overseas, surpassed only by Vietnam. There just wasn't much left for the economic section to do. We also had a commercial section headed by a counselor with two, and sometimes three, commercial officers under him.

Q: So the economic section aside from all these other people consisted of you and..?

LUNDY: A counselor and two other officers.

Q: Two other officers and you, so the economic section was left with transportation...?

LUNDY: Civil air.

Q: Civil Air. Not much reporting.

LUNDY: Not really, maritime reporting for whatever it was worth. There just was not much to do. We did some state by state reporting which I...

Q: Indian states?

LUNDY: Indian states, which I guess as much as anyone I inspired, having borrowed the idea from the provincial reporting that we had done in Vietnam. We suggested this type of reporting when I was on the desk, and I suppose it was my idea more than anyone else's. We also had economic and commercial officers at each of the three consulates, in Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras. State by state reporting at least encouraged the economic officers to get out into the countryside. This educated us all about economic conditions outside the largest cities, but I can't say this kind of reporting ever attracted much attention in Washington. When I arrived in Delhi, only one of the reports from the Embassy's consular district had been completed. I did reports on all the states in the region.

Q: Did you sort of coordinate that at the embassy in New Delhi to the extent that there were inputs from the consulates?

LUNDY: No, the consulates in those days had editorial freedom; they reported directly to Washington. That was changed while I was there. Most of their substantive reporting was funneled through New Delhi starting in either 1971 or '72.

Q: And this was the period from late '69 to '73, which included the Bangladesh War?

LUNDY: Yes, the Bangladesh War occurred, but it did not much affect the work of the economic section. I only remember doing some of the political/military reporting during the war to help out our over worked colleagues. I attended some of the Indian military briefings just because the political section was spread out very thin during that crisis period.

Q: Who was the U.S. ambassador during this period?

LUNDY: Kenneth Keating most of the time.

Q: Former congressman from New York and later senator.

LUNDY: A very admirable individual but not an on hands manager by any means.

Q: So the DCM was responsible for coordination.

LUNDY: The DCM did the coordination, such as it was. Morale was very low in New Delhi; relationships between the various sections were not very friendly. At the grunt level we certainly communicated with the Treasury and Agricultural Department representatives and with the AID economists, but there were just too many people and not enough meaningful work to go around. One of my great weaknesses is when I don't have enough to do I get in trouble.

Q: So you got in trouble then?

LUNDY: I made a lot of people made, yes.

Q: You made suggestions?

LUNDY: Such as pointing out that my job really ought to be abolished, but that is bureaucratically never a very popular stand.

Q: Were you able to travel?

LUNDY: Yes, because of the surplus rupees, there was enough travel money.

Q: India is such an enormous country and diverse in many ways.

LUNDY: Yes, very much so, extremely interesting.

Q: It makes sense to travel. New Delhi, like Washington, is not America. I don't think New Delhi is Indian, it might be the Punjab but...

LUNDY: No, I traveled quite a bit. That part of the job I certainly enjoyed. New Delhi is as Indian as any of the big cities. It is in the heart of Hindustan. There are vast cultural and linguistic differences within India. English is surviving in the Indian subcontinent because the educated elites from various regions need it to communicate with each other.

Q: You were not really involved in India's external economic or other relations?

LUNDY: To some extent; we certainly reported on trade. Our own trade problems with India, however, particularly textiles on which we had placed import quotas, were handled mostly in Washington.

Q: Trade policy issues, you really didn't get into that?

LUNDY: I didn't really get much into that, but I probably should have tried harder than I did to become involved in trade policies, in retrospect. India wasn't very important in international trade back then. The idea of export led growth, which already was showing considerable success in East Asia, had not penetrated Indian economic development planning. Indian policy makers thought the potential internal market was so vast that the country could activate its own economic growth engine. Indo-U.S. economic relations were based more than anything on surplus rupees and U.S. assistance levels. Our surplus rupee problem was the turf of the Treasury attaché. The large AID mission, of course dominated our aid policy. I was involved, but only in a subordinate role. I can't say I didn't learn a fair amount during those years in Delhi, however. I was the Treasury Attaché's backup and put in quite a bit of time in the commercial section when they were shorthanded.

I did pick up some more interesting work my final year in Delhi when I took over narcotics reporting. India was a major producer of opium poppies, supplying a large chunk of the world export market for legal opium. The Indians kept opium production under tight control. As far as we could determine, the country was not a major supplier of opium for illicit heroin production. Washington was very interested in opium production and export everywhere because of the growing worldwide heroin addiction problem. American pharmaceutical companies were concerned that their source of legal opium imports from India be preserved.

Q: The green revolution was under way and things...

LUNDY: The green revolution was underway, and it was succeeding, but the agricultural attaché was responsible for the reporting and analysis of the “green revolution”.

Q: To what extent was there an effort to integrate all of these different economic activities of the U.S. government? Was there a minister for economic and commercial affairs that supervised everything?

LUNDY: Just an economic counselor.

Q: Who reported to the DCM, and who did the Treasury attaché report to?

LUNDY: The DCM.

Q: The same for the Agricultural attaché and the Commercial counselor?

LUNDY: The commercial counselor’s position was a bit more prestigious but while I was there much of the time the commercial counselor was a Department of Commerce employee. His relationship to the economic counselor was ambiguous. The Treasury and Department of Agriculture attaches, as well as the Commercial counselor and his assistants, attended our staff meetings, but they carefully guarded their turf and considered themselves independent. The whole economic/commercial reporting effort was supposed to be coordinated by the economic counselor, but he had little muscle.

Q: And the AID mission was pretty much out on its own?

LUNDY: Yes, very much out on its own. In the aftermath of the Bangladesh war, however, our aid to India was drastically lowered. Most of the AID staff departed. Our aid effort in India was reduced to almost nothing more than humanitarian assistance. We were unhappy over the Indian invasion of East Bengal.

Q: Or East Pakistan.

LUNDY: East Pakistan, sorry that is what I meant to say. .

Q: OK. I served in Pakistan a little bit before this at the time of the '65 war. OK, well it sounds like that was not a great assignment for you.

LUNDY: It was not a great assignment. The opportunity came up for assignment to Tehran. I had come back to India after home leave in 1972 supposedly for another two years. Then the NEA Bureau asked me if I would be interested in the number two economic job in Iran, and I jumped at the opportunity.

Q: So that was a direct transfer?

LUNDY: Yes, a direct transfer.

Q: In '73?

LUNDY: In August, '73.

Q: OK, so anything else we ought to say about India. Between Washington and New Delhi, you devoted about five years to Indian affairs.

LUNDY: Five years, a large chunk of my career spent on India. The year and a half in Washington I enjoyed, but probably the less said the better about the larger portion spent in India. To add more would mean getting into problems involving personalities, and that is never productive.

RICHARD McKEE
Staff Aide
New Delhi (1969-1974)

Richard McKee was born in Pennsylvania in 1941. He attended Cornell University for a BA, the University of Virginia for a MA and then joined the Foreign Service in 1965. McKee served overseas in Bolivia, India, Pakistan, Tunis, Morocco, Saudi Arabia and Turkey. McKee also served as the Office Director for the Arab Peninsula and on the Board of Examiners. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

Q: Well where'd you go, your first post?

MCKEE: It was all New Delhi, I was in New Delhi for five years, '69 to '74.

Q: Well I think this might be a good place to stop, we'll stop at this point and we'll pick it up next time, you're going out in what year now? '60...

MCKEE: '69, summer of '69.

Q: '69, good. And we'll talk about New Delhi, and we'll mention, if you were picking up, while you were there, taking Urdu and all, were you picking up, well I can ask you now, were you picking up any emanations of the Vietnam war, I mean things, you'd been away, did that?

MCKEE: Oh, yes, it was a hell of a year, '68, '69 was a hell of a year in Washington. There were demonstrations practically every day, and clearly opposition to the war had come front and center.

Q: What, did you get involved in any of this, or were you sort of a political observer on the side, or busy doing other things?

MCKEE: Well, you know, I took my responsibilities very seriously. Later, when I became a supervisor, more than once had to remind subordinates that when you're working for the U.S. government, privately you can voice your doubts, but you had to be very careful about who you voice those doubts to. Publicly you support the policy.

Q: Okay. So we'll pick this up in 1969, you're off to New Delhi. Great.

Today is the 28th of May, 2002. We're off to New Delhi in 1969. How long were you in New Delhi?

MCKEE: Five years.

Q: Good God! To '74? I don't know, maybe we'll come here, but how did this assignment come about?

MCKEE: I had mentioned earlier to you that I got very good advice from my boss in Latin America about marrying a Latin American woman, which was to get the hell out of Latin America. Wanting to do so, I remember very distinctly putting in to study a hard language, Arabic, Farsi, or Turkish. As the roll of the dice would have it, it was Hindi, and also Urdu, so I did that for a year in the old, unventilated, ill-lit buildings rented by FSI in Rosslyn.

Q: In the garage.

MCKEE: No, this was actually above the garage. I remember that I was up, several floors up, still pretty grim surroundings. But then after that year, I qualified in Hindi and Urdu actually, at a low level. I think the Hindi was 3/3, and the Urdu was 2/2. The assignment was for four years to New Delhi. As things worked out, I stayed an extra year because Daniel Patrick Moynihan came and I was having a lot of fun. So I stayed, all told, five years.

Q: Okay. Well let's see, 1969, what was the situation, let's talk about India when you went there, both vis a vis relations with the United States and India in the world and internally.

MCKEE: Well, India at that point, politically, was still recovering from the death of Nehru and then the death of Prime Minister Shastri, who had succeeded him and lasted only about fifteen months before dying in Tashkent. Mrs. Gandhi had been chosen by the Congress Party barons to lead the party. They were thinking that she was some malleable young lady, and she turned out to be indeed far from that. But when I was there she was asserting herself. For example, soon after I got there she decreed that the Congress Party government would end the privy purses that were given out to the princes. This was seen as a sharp move to the left. She had never been fond of the United States. She in many ways had both rightist disdain for our sort of humble-jumble society, and of course she had a leftist disdain, maybe a socialist disdain for our economic system. But nonetheless, relations at that point were very good. Chester Bowles was still Ambassador. He was very popular. The Peace Corps had over seven hundred volunteers in India. The AID mission was all over, including in about a half a dozen state agricultural universities with teams from some of our state agriculture universities. There was a program between the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and the Indian Institute of Technology in Kanpur, which was going very well. All of this in the context of a contest with the Soviets for the affections of the Indians. However, as the situation went from bad to worse in East Pakistan, culminating in essentially the disenfranchisement of the East Pakistanis before Bhutto became Prime Minister, when Yahya Khan was still there. Hundreds of thousands of refugees poured into India. And we, in that famous phrase, tilted toward Pakistan in that conflict.

Q: Well I'd like to go back earlier, before the '69, what, when you went out there, what was your job?

MCKEE: That was actually curious. I was supposed to be an economic officer, but I was hauled into the front office to be the Staff Aide to the Staff Aide to the Ambassador. The Staff Aide was Richard Viets, and the Ambassador was Chester Bowles. And that's what I did. Bowles left and Ken Keating came, but I stayed in that position for about six months. I was not really very successful in it, and shifted over to the economic section, the section where I spent about a year and a half.

Q: What, when you arrived in '69, what was the perception of Indira Gandhi, from our perspective?

MCKEE: I don't think Americans had a very clear view of Indira Gandhi at that point. Nixon made a visit, he came to India, soon after he was elected he came to India in '69, but it was pretty clear that he and Mrs. Gandhi did not get along well. I think the U.S. government saw her as a possibly transitory figure on the left and not well disposed to the United States.

Q: Did the Vietnam war, this is at the very height of the anti-Vietnam business, did that, how did that play out when you arrived?

MCKEE: Well, it was a very negative factor. I mean the Indians thought that we were dead wrong and had no compunctions about telling us so. That certainly didn't go down well in Washington.

Q: Did, how did, what was your impression of Chester Bowles and how he dealt and perceived the Indian government at that time?

MCKEE: I was there only at the very end, and I don't think our tours overlapped by more than six or eight weeks, so I'm really hesitant to say anything. He was an iconic figure. He'd been Ambassador before, certainly loved it. He was a controversial figure, as was Steb, his wife, in the American community. Steb always dressed in a sari and there was a sort of going native feeling about them, and it went down badly with an awful lot of Foreign Service Officers.

Q: It's almost a tradition of our Ambassadors very much of serving the Indian side of things and all. Was that something that we were seeing, do you think?

MCKEE: Oh, I think that that was perceived in Washington, yes. I think that our reporting, our political and economic reporting was seen as being unduly generous to the Indians. We had a huge AID mission there, there were a lot of jobs on the line. So it did color the quality of the reporting.

Q: I might add that I saw reports that, there was a feeling today where tensions were extremely high between India and Pakistan that our embassies seemed to be dueling with each other, the one in Islamabad and the one in New Delhi. Was there all that feeling when you got there?

MCKEE: Absolutely. One was seen as either an Indian partisan or a Pakistani partisan, and that played out between the two embassies. As the conditions in East Pakistan deteriorated, that became stronger and stronger. You had the Embassy in Delhi reporting that the Indians were being forced by the influx of refugees and by the need to secure their eastern border to take steps which would effectively assist the rebels. Our Ambassador, Joe Farland in Islamabad at that time, was very close to the Yahya Kahn, who was telling him that it would all be over shortly and it was just a bunch of disgruntled malcontents.

Q: How did you find, as a Staff Assistant to the Staff Assistant, how did you find dealing with the, did you get involved with the Indian Foreign Ministry or the bureaucracy down there?

MCKEE: Not at that time, I did later on when I was in the political section, and the economic section, but I didn't as a Staff Aide.

Q: By the way, you mentioned MIT and the Indian...

MCKEE: Institute of Technology at Kanpur.

Q: Were we seeing at that time India as being one of the world's great repositories of sort of engineering minds and scientific minds or not?

MCKEE: No, no, I think that was a much later perception. I think at that time India was seen as, and this is very much a fallacy, as democratic India that was the response to Communist China. By assisting India we were showing that a democracy could also deliver the goods.

Q: How did we see, the sort of marriage between the Soviet Union and India was seen to be, not a marriage made in heaven, they seem to be on different sides, it almost seems like they were, the relations between the two seem to be more designed as against the United States than you know a natural liking for each other.

MCKEE: Well I think that's true, the linkage between the two was very much an elite thing. It goes back to Nehru, who visited the Soviet Union in the '20s or in the '30s. There was this sort of romantic Fabian leftism, anti-imperialist rhetoric and what have you. And then after the '60-'62 war between India and China, Russia, the Soviet Union, was very much seen in New Delhi as the counterbalance to China, and later also to Pakistan. One of my jobs was to put together this massive report on East Bloc economic and technical assistance to India every year. No question in my mind that the Russian technicians and their families, Russian diplomats, were seen as racist and cheap and were generally quite unpopular. The more sophisticated Indians realized that they were getting second rate technology, that they could get better technology from the United States. But we had declined after a long almost theological fight to permit one of our steel companies to transfer technology for a steel mill to India, and that still rankled. The decision that had been made in the mid-'60s then, but the bitter residue certainly was still there. The Russians built two steel mills for the Indians.

Q: In those days steel mills were considered to be the crown jewels or whatever, they were a great project, they looked big, and they employed a lot of people.

MCKEE: Exactly. Even if, as in the case of India, it was cheaper to import the coal from Poland than it was to use Indian coal, and the economics of it didn't really make much sense.

Q: Did you, when you arrived at the embassy, was there a strong cadre of what you would call Indian hands or was there a cadre of subcontinent hands?

MCKEE: Subcontinent hands, but there were some very impressive people there. Herb Hagerty was in his second or third tour there, Grant Smith had been raised there. His father was an AID officer. A very distinguished guy, his name has escaped me now, had the burdensome title of Minister Counselor for Economic and Political Affairs. Later went on to be Consul General in Munich.

Q: Well the sort of the love affair was more at the Ambassadorial level than within the ranks or not? Was the Ambassador kind of set the tone?

MCKEE: Well Bowles certainly was a romantic about India, I think. And then he left, and of course Ken Keating came. Ken was a very different kind of figure, but there were certainly people in the AID mission and in the embassy who were emotionally committed to the success of India, and economic development.

Q: You moved there for about a year to the economic section?

MCKEE: A year, year and a half.

Q: When was that?

MCKEE: Well let's see, I arrived in the summer of '69, it would have been in early '70, and I probably stayed for the summer of '71, so about a year and a half.

Q: What was your impression of the economics that were driving India?

MCKEE: Well I think I, I think I shared the general appreciation that, as Patrick Moynihan who later became Ambassador, said, socialism is a luxury that only rich countries could afford. India really couldn't afford this sort of state socialist autarkic system that was prevalent there. There is a very strong memory in my mind. There was a Sikh entrepreneur, Manmohan Singh. Not the very well known Manmohan Singh, but another Manmohan Singh. But he was a Carrier, air conditioning, refrigeration representative in India, and was once called upon to testify before a committee of the Loksabha, which was my main beat. I covered domestic politics.

Q: The Loksabha being...

MCKEE: Being the lower house of the Indian Parliament, the House of the People. And about joint ventures and partnership and things like that. And I actually got to sit in on the session as an observer committee, I thought it was really fascinating, because here was this very sharp entrepreneur-capitalist, very much at home in the West, explaining to fairly ignorant Members of Parliament, but also others who were quite committed ideologically that just because you put in fifty-one percent of a venture didn't mean that you ran it, ran roughshod over the representatives of forty-nine percent. It wasn't like a democratic system where fifty-one percent gives you total control. Then there was the whole question about technology transfer, which these parliamentarians clearly envisioned as, "You pay some money and then somebody gives you a whole bunch of documents and then you go out and do stuff." They really didn't have a clue about how dynamic a process it was. Manmohan Singh kept it up, and it was clearly missionary work, because except for very small minority communities like the Parsis, most didn't have a clue when it came to the larger market-oriented world.

Q: In a way, almost somewhat unlike the Chinese, who seem to have this sort of thing at their finger, many of them have it at their fingertips.

MCKEE: Part of it may be that the way the caste system works, very gruesome. Some groups do one thing and some groups do another, those who do politics, some do economics. Those who do export-import trade in Bombay or in the ports don't do agriculture production. I don't know, but certainly there were, because there were very sophisticated people in terms of the Indian merchant community, and like the Chinese there were diaspora Indians with whom you could set up relationships. Actually the foreign trade of both countries considered as a percentage of GNP was a joke.

Q: Well this is deliberate, wasn't it? It was self-production and self internal-selling and that sort of thing.

MCKEE: Import substitution was a huge theme when I was there. I often thought that precious foreign exchange was always one word in Indian-English, because you never saw foreign exchange without the adjective “precious.” The idea that we should be self-sufficient and not depend on the west for anything.

Q: Were you seeing India as having something that if they were to take sort of government controls off they could take off, or at that point was the economy such that, they weren't ready for that?

MCKEE: I think that the feeling was very strongly that if they took off the controls, the economy would take off. There were some true success stories, but not so much in the industrial-commercial field. The introduction of triple-dwarf wheat by American AID experts in Punjab meant that every year the harvest was up by fifteen to twenty percent from what it had been. But one of the underlying reasons for that was land reform. In East Punjab, as opposed to Pakistani Punjab, there were very few farms that were larger than forty acres, and they were intensively farmed. Land reform, particularly in Punjab and then in western Uttar Pradesh, was carried out in a way that ensured that those who received the land also received capital and fertilizer and technical assistance. It was not just enough to give a peasant a piece of land, they'd lose it in no time. You've got to give them all these other things as well, make them available.

Q: Well, were you there when there was the shift from being a food deficit country to a food surplus country?

MCKEE: Yes, yes. In the mid-'60s, we had shipped massive amounts of grain to both India and Pakistan because the monsoon failed two years in a row, and certainly by the early '70s, '71, India was self-sufficient in grain.

Q: Did, was this the beginning of that monumental surplus of counterpart money and all?

MCKEE: Well the counterpart money was really built up in the '60s by the shipments of grain. I think I may have mentioned the great accomplishment of Daniel Patrick Moynihan as Ambassador was to reach an agreement whereby those funds were dissipated over a relatively short period of time, about ten or twelve years.

Q: Was that, when you were dealing with sort of the economy of the relations, was that seen as sort of an indigestible problem?

MCKEE: Oh, absolutely, and especially after the Indo-Pakistan War, when of course our relations reached rock bottom. The Left and the Congress and the two-odd Communist Parties beat us over the head with the PL-480 rupees every day.

Q: Well now, when did you move to the political section?

MCKEE: I must have moved to the political section in summer of '72.

Q: Well then let's go back to the '71 war.

MCKEE: Maybe '71, my memory's not...

Q: Well let's talk about the '71 war, how did, was there a feeling within the Embassy and with yourself and all that eventually, I mean this thing can't last, India can't sit by and watch this and it was almost inevitable that they would get involved?

MCKEE: Oh, very much so. And we were privy to the reporting coming out of our Consulate General in Dacca. Who was there...?

Q: Arch Blood.

MCKEE: Arch Blood was there. And it was very clear that conditions in East Pakistan were going from bad to worse. To some extent I'm sure that RAW, the Indian intelligence agents, exacerbated the situation. In many ways they really didn't have to. The Pakistan Army was doing quite enough on its own to exacerbate it. And I think the sentiment in the Embassy was that the Indians were forced to intervene finally in December of '71.

Q: How, how did that, it was done rather quickly, wasn't it?

MCKEE: Once the Indian Army intervened, I think it was done in a manner of six weeks.

Q: Was there concern, did this spill into the other borders with West Pakistan?

MCKEE: Well I've never been quite sure how that would have happened. Certainly Henry Kissinger was quite concerned that the Indians would move across and would move into West Pakistan, but for whatever reason Indians decided not to do so. Possibly because we sent our aircraft carrier, I think it was the Enterprise, into the Bay of Bengal.

Q: How did that tilt towards Pakistan affect, sort of the carrier came and all that. Was there sort of a freeze on contacts, did it have any real effect that you saw?

MCKEE: Social relations were occasionally bad. I remember one night that I drank too much and actually decked an Indian journalist who, I thought was getting obnoxious about Vietnam and Bengal and all of that. The Indians had a very professional Foreign Service. Obnoxious sometimes, and condescending, but professional, so there was every effort made to maintain a sort of civility.

Q: Did, was there any concern on behalf of the American community in the Embassy during the war that you...

MCKEE: Oh, absolutely. First of all, we all had to cover up our windows with black paper or black paint. Ditto with the headlights of our cars. The Australians were so afraid of being taken for Americans that they sort of had large Australian flag decals that they put on their cars. We were very unpopular.

Q: Did, was there, I don't want to say rebellion, but was there unhappiness in the Embassy because of that sort of pro-Pakistan on the part of Henry Kissinger and company?

MCKEE: I really don't recall. It's logical to infer that but I don't recall it.

Q: Part of the reason behind our siding with Pakistan was to show civility to China.

MCKEE: We know now.

Q: We know now. But you didn't know then.

MCKEE: It's really inconceivable. I mean it's not for nothing that "Nixon to China" has become a stock phrase in politics.

Q: What about as an economic officer, how did you find your Indian counterparts, do you remember...

MCKEE: My specialized, special area shows you how elaborate the Embassy staffing was and how large in those days. My special area was into two fields, one was the Soviet bloc economic assistance, and the other one was barter trade, what was called rupee trade. So many pairs of badly made Indian shoes for so many Russian tanks that didn't fire straight. I did a lot of writing on essentially non-monetized trade.

Q: Were you sort of able to, in some way or another get a feel about the shoddy goods that were being created?

MCKEE: Oh, yes, they were quite visible. At one point, the state trading agency, one of many, had cut a deal with the Bulgarians, and in return for some product that they sent to Bulgaria they got back all of this Bulgarian brandy which was undrinkable stuff. Whenever you went to the state hotel, that's what they tried to get you to take, because they had boxcars full of the stuff.

Q: How about, what sort of social relations did you find, were you able to make good contact or was it a time when you were kind of being frozen out socially?

MCKEE: No, my memory is that social contacts remained very strong. Yes, occasional sharp exchanges, but Indians quite willing to take refuge in that old line 'We like you, it's your government we can't stand.'

Q: Did you feel there was much understanding on the part of Indians into what made the United States tick, I mean the Indians who counted?

MCKEE: I think there wasn't much understanding. The great change in the Immigration Act took place only in '66, '67, and so the impact had not at all been felt.

Q: Prior to that I think there were a hundred...

MCKEE: Hundred a year.

Q: Hundred a year. In the whole Asia-Pacific triangle.

MCKEE: It was per country, but it was a hundred a year for India, a hundred a year for Pakistan. And of course the changes that took place in the '60s then opened the way. By '69, '70, '71 the brain drain had become a concern in India. It was more brain drain towards Europe, particularly England, than there was brain drain towards the United States.

Q: Well Indians with wealthy family were sending their sons to England for education.

MCKEE: Still. Yes. I think that was beginning to change even at that time. Again the impact of something like having Ohio State people at the state university. MIT, had a tremendous trickle-down effect on the way that Indians thought, but they were a typical post-colonial society in that sense, educationally.

Q: When you moved to the political section, what piece of the action did you have?

MCKEE: Domestic politics, almost everything except Kashmir, coordinating the reporting of the three consulates general. It was a marvelous job.

Q: Oh, I would think it would be.

MCKEE: Traveled a lot. I was myself responsible for reporting on state politics in the Delhi consular district, which was a big job. There were very bright officers in the consulates, Peter Burleigh in Calcutta, for example.

Q: Was Karelia, is that the way you pronounce it, or Karalla, was that a place we were looking at closely because it was communist?

MCKEE: Kerala was famous as the first governmental unit to vote in a Communist government a free election. It had much more to do with the case and communal character of the province than it had to do with Communism. Kerala was a particular concern. We had a library at Trivandrum. USIS had a library there, that was part of the Madras consular district. It was a place that did get a lot of attention.

Q: Did we see, were we concerned about a communist, increasing communist influence in India, or did we see it sort of as almost a self-sealed political system?

MCKEE: The latter, I think. For one thing, the Communist Party was split in two between the pro-Moscow and the pro-Chinese tendencies. And there certainly were any number of leftists in the congress. I remember meeting V. K. Krishna. There was a feeling that they would not prevail. For awhile, we got rather romantic about this Swatantra party, which was a right-wing party, not right-wing in the Hindu nationalist sense, but right-wing in terms of free enterprise. And they, they actually did reasonably well in a couple of elections.

Q: What was our impression at the time of the importance of religion as a political influence?

MCKEE: Oh, I laughed at this recent “Foreign Service Journal” piece where this guy argues that we should have religious attachés, religious affairs attachés, because I think we were acutely aware of the importance of religion. For one thing, we knew very well that Gandhi had very deftly manipulated religious symbols in order to mobilize the Hindu masses against the British. The spinning wheel, the technique of self-sacrifice and all of that. And then of course we were quite aware of Hindu-Muslim tensions. Not in Kashmir at that time, but very much in other parts of the country. I remember once I had to go down to the front office. I enjoyed sitting down with Patrick Moynihan and explaining that in Uttar Pradesh only maybe fifteen percent of the people were Muslims, but then they’re split between these two major groups. I was going on and on, getting mired very much in the details. But one of the great things about Moynihan, because of his own love for local politics in New York and Boston and elsewhere was that, he was quite willing to get down to the complexities in politics.

Q: How about Kashmir, was that playing much of a role when you were there?

MCKEE: Well it certainly was a bone of contention between the two countries, it was an area that first Harmon Kirby and then Grant Smith reported on, because it was a sort of a function of the Indian-Pakistani relationship. We kept an eye on politics in Kashmir. There wasn’t much violence, if any, at that time. For us Embassy staffers it was a great place to go on holiday. The Ambassador could not go, as I recall. The State Department held that if he were to go it would be seen as showing that we endorsed the Indian claim, which we didn’t. We didn’t endorse anybody’s claim.

Q: But you could all take, go get your houseboat on the Lake of Kashmir.

MCKEE: And did so.

Q: I guess India and Pakistan were so involved in East Pakistan and Kashmir, off the radar almost?

MCKEE: I guess, yes, certainly it was called a cease-fire line, there was a U.N. presence in Kashmir from ’47 onward, and even though the ’65 war had been essentially over Kashmir, in the early ’70s it was Bengal that was the focus of tensions.

Q: Was there any thought, or anybody talking about India maybe taking over east Bengal? I mean, East Pakistan?

MCKEE: Certainly there was, I think the Pakistanis played on that fear. We were always sort of skeptical in the Embassy, because essentially it would have meant adding forty or fifty million Muslim voters. What would be the point? Bengal was already a difficult problem; a united Bengal would be an even more difficult problem. And there was so much bad blood between the Hindu Bengalis who had left and the Muslims there.

Q: This is talk, but my analysis, it probably wasn’t going to happen.

MCKEE: It probably was not gonna happen.

Q: How did you find, when you were a political officer, getting around and talking to local politicians and all this?

MCKEE: Very easy. As I talk to young Foreign Service Officers setting out at the receptions that we give our A-100 classes, one of the few things I lament, but one of the things I do lament, is that it was so much more difficult everywhere to have that kind of fairly free and easy exchange with host country nationals, which was very much the rule thirty years ago.

Q: Part of it's travel money...

MCKEE: Part of it is travel money, but most of it is security. And to some extent, in particular parts of the world, the Muslim world for example, it is a really sharp increase in anti-Americanism.

Q: Did events in Vietnam, but you left before the collapse came.

MCKEE: That's right, the collapse was in '75.

Q: But the peace treaty, did that seem to, these accords, did that seem to help relations with India at the time?

MCKEE: Well, I think so, but, really, realistically we were in the doghouse for quite a long time after '71. And you remember the whole infrastructure was shot away, the Peace Corps left, the agriculture university people left, the AID mission became a shell of its former self, and by then our relations became very thin indeed.

Q: Was this basically Indira Gandhi, was this the economics, or what was driving this?

MCKEE: Nationalist sentiment very broadly. We had backed the wrong horse in 1971 and we should be made to pay for it. But Mrs. Gandhi had moved into her most autocratic stage at that point. Let's see, I think, I can't remember now whether her two-year emergency started or ended in '77, but she was moving towards this period of essentially declaring herself Empress of India.

Q: Well then, well you left there in '74. Did you consider yourself by that time a sub-continental hand or something?

MCKEE: Oh, one of my superiors wrote a very flattering efficiency report. He called me "Mr. India." And after five years I sort of did feel like Mr. India. Although there were other people whose knowledge was much greater than mine.

Q: Well where'd you go then?

DONALD M. ANDERSON
Political Officer
New Delhi (1970-1972)

Donald M. Anderson was born and raised in Sioux City, Iowa. He received a bachelor's degree in government from Louisiana State University and served in the U.S. Army in the 1950s. Mr. Anderson joined the Foreign Service in 1958. His career included positions in Hong Kong, New Delhi, Paris, Beijing, and Shanghai. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

Q: Then you went to New Delhi where you were for two years, '70 to '72. What were you doing?

ANDERSON: I was in the external section of the political section. Back in those days...in the bad old days...I think it was Galbraith back in the early '60s decided he needed a China specialist and a Soviet specialist in his political section. So there was a Chinese language officer position in the embassy in Delhi, and I went out as the China specialist, which would have kept me busy about 5% of my time. Actually, my bailiwick, as it turned out, was India's relations with Asia, and the communist world -- Soviet-India relations, Indian-Chinese, Vietnam, and Eastern Europe.

Q: This harks back to some time before because you are looking at India. How did we figure...was it '62 the war between China and India where the Chinese gave the Indians a bloody nose for a while and we stepped in and helped with supplies? As a China watcher, but let's say by the time you got to India, what was the feeling? Why did this war take place? It was relatively minor, but it was a little war.

ANDERSON: Oh, it was.

Q: Why did it take place? And what was behind it?

ANDERSON: It's a very complex subject, and it's also a very emotional subject. I mean, you could only have one view if you talk to Indians, and you could get in great trouble if you didn't. My own view is that India was basically...it's a very strategic area. It's a very high mountain area, and the British for many years used to probe up into that area. McMahan was up in that area. It's sort of the roof of the world where you are looking down into the other side. And I think the Indians were in a sense carrying on the British tradition of pushing forward into areas for strategic advantage, and the Chinese reacted. The Chinese were much better prepared, and the Indians were really badly prepared. They got a bloody nose and lost some territory -- the Aksai Chin. It was quite strategic to China. You have to look at a map, but it connects two parts of China. And they also lost some territory over in the eastern part as well.

Q: In the first place, Kenneth Keating was the ambassador at the time. What was your impression of him, and of the embassy?

ANDERSON: Keating was a nice fellow, a good New York...

Q: He'd been senator from New York.

ANDERSON: I would not rate him as a good ambassador. Like many political ambassadors, particularly an ex-Congressman who becomes ambassador, it's a very personal thing, and the relationship is a very personal relationship. But I mean, he didn't do any great harm, and as I say, he was a pleasant individual. I got along with him quite well. The embassy itself was huge, but it's a huge country. I must say, the two years I spent in Delhi were not among the two happiest years in my life.

Q: In dealing with the Indians, they in some ways mirror us. They get very moralistic, and preach. Was this a problem as far as dealing with them?

ANDERSON: Yes, it was. They are a very prickly people, and have a very strong sense of national dignity. They would get very huffy about what we would often times consider minor things. I found that frequently hard to deal with. I was denounced from the floor of parliament. I was sitting up in the diplomatic gallery at one of their parliament question and answer sessions, and was wearing white pants which is sort of traditional, but it was a very boring day and I was slumped down and the seats were rather small and I'm long-legged, so it appeared that I had my knees on the back of the chair in front of me. And whoever the parliamentarian was that was speaking turned around and pointed at me, and denounced me because the American had no sense of respect for the Indian parliament, etc., etc.

Q: Caused you to sit up anyway.

ANDERSON: I sat up a bit, but I didn't move because I did not have my knees on the back of the chair, and they sent someone around to remonstrate with me.

Q: In the first place, what was India's relations with the Asian world that you were dealing with? And also, how did you go about and collect information?

ANDERSON: It was a very difficult time for American diplomats at that time. The whole Bangladesh thing was developing, and the United States, particularly Henry Kissinger, was tilting very heavily toward Pakistan.

Q: The phrase, I don't know where it started, but that we were tilting toward Pakistan.

ANDERSON: The Indians were furious, and when the Indians are furious they can be in their own glorious pompous self. And Indira Gandhi was rising in power, so it was a very abrasive type of relationship. India was neutral but leaning quite heavily toward the north in the Vietnam situation. They had a Consulate General from North Vietnam, and a Consulate General from South Vietnam. The North Vietnamese consulate eventually became an embassy. I used to talk to the South Vietnamese about India's Vietnam policy, and they were trying to involve themselves in some sort of peace process. I used to fool around with the Russians just to try and...I mean they wanted to talk to me because they thought I was a China expert, and I wanted to talk to them just to see what they were doing with the Indians because they were very, very heavily involved. It was interesting, I ascertained who their China specialist was, who, I think a legitimate Soviet Foreign Ministry type who had served in China, but dull as dishwater, and I was very quickly passed off to another, much livelier individual. He was not a China specialist, but he was with the KGB.

...and then with the Indo-Pak war, the Christmas War in December, I also was involved to a degree with Indo- Pakistani relations, and to a degree with Pakistan because curiously the Minister of the Pakistani High Commission was a friend of mine whom I had known in Washington.

Q: They kept their missions open, didn't they, during this war?

ANDERSON: Yes, they did. But the diplomats were under house arrest. Once or twice we went over and played bridge with the Pakistani Minister in his house. It wasn't a terribly strenuous job. A lot of social life, and a lot of exchanging scuttlebutt.

Q: Did you get any feel for the, I won't say tensions, but the varying points of view between our embassy in New Delhi, and our embassy in...where was it, in Rawalpindi at that time?

ANDERSON: Islamabad.

Q: There was also a political appointee in Pakistan, wasn't there at the time?

ANDERSON: I can't remember.

Q: Did you get a feel that New Delhi was sending in its thing, and Rawalpindi was sending in its thing to Washington and they're looking at the local, rather than you might say the American interests?

ANDERSON: Actually, serving in the embassy in Delhi you began to take on the color of India. Islamabad was writing back to an essentially receptive audience. They were objective in terms of what was happening, and there's no question Pakistan started the war. It was a very difficult time on both sides, and our relations with Pakistan in many respects were strained as well. But basically their support for an independent Bangladesh was viewed favorably...I mean not their support for India, but Bangladesh. Whereas India saw itself as supporting the independence of Bangladesh, and they were taking in literally millions of refugees from Bangladesh and trying to feed them. We did help. We did have C-130 flights come in with tents and stuff, but it was getting the Indian perspective on the whole conflict. It was very difficult to get much vibration back to Washington. They didn't want to hear much about India. And, of course at that time, the Indians were saying a lot of very nasty things about us.

Q: What about the very controversial move of putting the nuclear carrier Enterprise into the Bay of Bengal, or something like that? How did that play at our embassy? Were we saying, go away, go away, or something like that?

ANDERSON: Yes, exactly. The unanimous embassy view in Delhi was it was really dumb.

Q: What's a carrier going to do, except to stir up emotions. This was Kissinger, wasn't it?

ANDERSON: Yes, Kissinger.

Q: Kissinger wasn't Secretary of State at that time, was he?

ANDERSON: I think he was still just NSC.

Q: Yes, but very much calling the shots as far as this one.

ANDERSON: Yes.

Q: What was your impression of the Indian Foreign Ministry, and the people there?

ANDERSON: The Indian Foreign Ministry is basically quite a good professional corps, and in many of the posts where I have served I've had a good contact, a good friend frequently, among Indian diplomats. They're generally quite professional.

It's rather interesting...I don't know, maybe this happens to Americans too, but I found that I frequently had very good relations and rather good personal relations with Indian diplomats in third country posts. If I met the same guy back in New Delhi when he was in the Foreign Ministry, he became a pain in the ass.

Q: Well, we all pick up the coloration of...

ANDERSON: But they're good.

Q: Did you get any feel for the Indian view of China? Were they still wary? How did they feel, because the Cultural Revolution was in full swing.

ANDERSON: The worst part of the violence had pretty well stopped. The Gang of Four was still very much in the saddle.

Q: Yes, little red books waving.

ANDERSON: The Indians, I think, view China with a mixture of awe, envy, and contempt. There are some very good China scholars in India, and obviously it's a country that's very poor. So they feel a sense of competition. These are the two huge land masses in Asia, the two great population bases. And I think I mentioned, there's a feeling that China gets treated better than India. That the West, and in particular the United States, doesn't recognize the importance of India and accept India's logical hegemonic position in South Asia, which doesn't make India very popular with its neighbors. The '62 war at that time in '72, still was a very sore point. For example, Taiwan used to launch propaganda balloons from Quemoy and Matsu off the China coast, and the propaganda balloons would sometimes get picked up in the upper air currents and would sail clear across China, and across the Himalayas, and drop in India. Some guy would find one of these propaganda balloons and every time some Indian parliamentarian would get up and give a speech about, "these terrible Chinese are delivering these propaganda balloons to us, and what is the government going to do to stop this?" So it's just a very minor thing.

In the '62 war all the Chinese restaurants in New Delhi changed their names to Japanese. The first page of the menu would have about five Japanese dishes and the rest of the menu was all Chinese.

JAMES H. BAHTI
Political/Economic Officer
Bombay (1970-1972)

James H. Bahti was born and raised in Michigan. He received a bachelor's degree in engineering from the Michigan Tech in 1948. He entered the Foreign Service in 1955 and has served in Bonn, Hamburg, Cairo, Bombay, Dhahran, and Alexandria. This interview took place on March 26, 1990.

Q: You were then sent to Bombay?

BAHTI: I said, "Look, I would like to get out the Arab world for a while. I am too emotionally involved in it. I would like to stay in the Bureau but how about something else?" They said I could go to Karachi, Bombay or a third post, perhaps in Iran. So I said I would go to Bombay. I became the deputy to the consul general in Bombay from 1970 to 1972. It was a very rewarding experience. I learned early on to see the country, see it early because at the end of your tour you don't have time. We did a lot of traveling, most of it official, but not all of it. I say a great deal, not only of our consular district, but other parts of India. AID had an excellent program in Delhi which lasted a week covering cultural, social, history which my wife and I were encouraged to take. My boss Dan Braddock was on his last tour, a very fine gentleman.

I think the most fortunate part of this tour was that prior to my departure I had asked my college, Michigan Tech, to give me a list of the alumni living in India; several lived in the Bombay area, and one in particular I found almost by chance. He had the name Shah, which is a name held by perhaps ten million other Indians, and I was walking down the street one rainy monsoon day shortly after my arrival with my wife. I saw the name Shah and I said, "Oh, he is one of the Michigan Tech guys" and I walked to the door and said, "I am looking for an Arvind Shah who went to Michigan Tech". He said, "I'm Arvind Shah and I went to Michigan Tech". They were fairly well-to-do, they did not need us for anything, we just became good friends. We still see them, their kids are in school in the States. It was a delightful introduction. They would take us to their religious observances, if we wanted to go. They did not push anything on us, they were very relaxed. They loved to gamble with three card Indian poker, they did not drink, they did not eat meat, but did not care if we did. They would come to our house and we would serve meat but have plenty of vegetarian dishes too. It was one of the most rewarding tours I have had in getting to know the host country.

Fortunately, or unfortunately, after less than two years I was offered the principal officer job in Dhahran. My boss at that time was David Bane who had been ambassador to Gabon. He said, "Jim, it is always better to be number one than number two." That had been my conclusion after about thirty seconds. My wife said "Fine" so we bundled up our cats and our household effects and went off to Dhahran.

In Bombay I supervised both the small economic and small political sections and did some political reporting myself.

Q: What was your impression of the Indian officials with whom you dealt and the situation in that part of India at that time?

BAHTI: Generally competent. Some of them tended to be a little preachy, pious almost, but not many. That was a time that the troubles between India and Pakistan broke out again, the fall of 1971 and so there was a degree of unpleasantness, the officials got a little stiff. Some would refuse to accept invitations because of our policy. I reminded one of them that they had very short memories, that we had come to their help when the Chinese invaded India, but that was then, and this was now. The consul general's secretary was stoned, but not really hurt, she had stones thrown at her as a foreigner. When our friends, the Shahs gave a party, they would hustle around saying "Don't discuss the situation" meaning the political situation, they did not want us to be embarrassed. But a few people got, not nasty, but highly critical. The press vastly distorted what we were doing for Pakistan. The refugee program - the refugees from Bengal or from what became Bangladesh became quite a problem, so we were fairly active in tracking that, but obviously not as active as our people in Calcutta would have been. There was a lot of activity of support for the refugees from East Bengal. It was an interesting time to be there. It is a fascinating country -- you could spend your life there and just begin to scratch the surface.

GORDON W. EVANS
Program Development Officer, USAID
New Delhi (1970-1973)

Gordon W. Evans was born in New York State in 1932. Evans received a BS from Antioch College in 1955 and a MA from the University of Pennsylvania in 1957. Evans joined the Foreign Service working for USAID in 1958 as an Overseas Intern. Evans worked in the Near East/South Asia Bureau, Ghana, Nigeria, India and as liaison to the United Nations. Evans also oversaw operations in East and West Africa. This interview was conducted by Barbara S. Evans in 1998.

Q: What were your responsibilities when you arrived in India?

EVANS: We arrived in New Delhi in September 1970 to accept the post of Program Development Officer. This indeed was an eye-opener. India was a very substantial recipient of U.S. assistance. The program was in its third decade of implementation. Since the early 1950s, the U.S. had supported a growing Indian development effort. There were nearly 1,100 U.S. and local employees of the USOM. USOM was used because India did not want to change it to USAID. Over $400 million of U.S. assistance flowed to India's 15 states annually. USOM's program office employed over 20 Indian economists, programmers, and implementation officers. They had such a wide experience and competence that the Program Development Officer, my role, was largely that of supervision.

Side note: In 1960 upon returning from Kathmandu, Nepal to Karachi, Pakistan through New Delhi, India, I visited the Indian Institute of Public Administration. The Deputy there said, "Why don't you call upon Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru? He has open house each morning at his residence before Parliament." Presuming a cast of thousands the next morning, I was surprised when I found myself alone with him in his rose garden. He said, "Please tell Dr. Morgan that I still keep on my desk always the bust of Lincoln that he brought me in 1950. It gives me confidence when confronting the myriad of secessionist problems throughout our land."

Twenty-three years later, I brought the International House's World Council (alumni) for three days of meetings in New Delhi. Our scheduled 15 minute session with Nehru's daughter, Prime Minister Indira Gandhi, turned out to last for over an hour, because our first question turned her on. We asked, "What was Macaulay's impact in the 19th century on Indian education?" In summary, she said, "My dear friends, it was devastating! He led us away from our values and traditions. He was obsessed with industrialization, with wealth, with material progress. He was the arrogant justifier of the British Empire." Indira Gandhi was assassinated tragically by two of her Sikh guards one year later.

Q: Who was your Mission Director?

EVANS: We had Leonard Saccio, a fascinating Italian-American who had for a period of time been the former Acting Administrator of AID in Washington. He was the Director when we arrived and he was replaced by Korea's USAID Director, Howard Houston in 1971. Director Saccio used a very interesting proven technique before he signed any agreement, implementation order, or even official letter. He would call me in and with the document before him fire off three or four questions as to how the project was faring and how this new agreement would assist its development further. If all the answers were solid, he would sign it. If there was any uncertainty in my response, we would go back to the drawing board. Princeton's professor of economic development, John Lewis, personally had shaped U.S. assistance during his USOM directorship in the 1960s. India had been an effective member of the World Bank's consortium of donors since the late 1950s. USOM's policy dialogue with the GOI was focused on liberalization of import controls and foreign private investment. Most other donors (and there were literally, if you include the not-for-profits, hundreds) were in full support of this framework. GOI took steps toward liberalization. I'm convinced it never would have on its own. Senior Indian officials always did their homework. Negotiating sessions with them were formal and constructive, whether involving PL480, program lending, capital projects, or technical assistance. Since there were over 100 programs and projects in the early 1970s, I'll just touch on three.

Q: What three projects have you chosen?

EVANS: It was hard. There are at least 15 that were my favorites, but we're going to look at the agriculture universities, family planning, and U.S. owned local currency support for low cost housing throughout India. On the agriculture university front, as noted earlier, the American Arthur Ernest Morgan, who was the first Chairman of the Tennessee Valley Authority and a friend, had joined Dr. Radhakrishnan's (later President of India) Higher Education Task Force in 1950. Morgan was the only American on the task force. A central recommendation of this task force was the establishment of outstanding agricultural and engineering universities in each of what became India's 15 states. Over 20 years later, when we arrived in New Delhi, it was exciting to work on the advancement of this program, implemented by nearly 10 U.S. Land Grant Universities ranging from Kansas State University to the University of Tennessee. The majority of Indian faculty were trained in the States at one of these sister institutions. They returned with real insight into the power and resilience of American agriculture. Hence these Indian agriculture universities were very receptive to the Green Revolution sweeping the world in the latter part of the 1960s and certainly in the 1970s. The Revolution was based on solid crop research, the optimum use of irrigation water, and the maximization of the growing cycle. India tied in effectively with these western consortium supported research stations. I would mention especially ICRISAT, which concerned itself with semiarid agriculture research near Hyderabad, India, and IRRI, powerfully focused on rice, in Los Banyos, Philippines. We also supported hundreds of U.S. owned local currency research projects at each of these U.S. assisted agriculture universities. India, known as an empty rice bowl early in the 20th century, has only had to import grains once in the past 30 years to the best of my knowledge.

On the family planning front, John Cool and Alvin Roseman were two forceful leaders in support of a dynamic Indian population program. Perhaps less sensitive then than now, foreign assistance in support of population growth limitation had to be administered carefully. Urban India is as sophisticated as most societies on Earth, but how to reach the then 600 million rural Indians? Both program lending and U.S. local currency grants made contraception widely available. The policy was to never have a shortage of contraceptives - at least condoms. A more ambitious and hence controversial program was Indian's Health Ministry's support of the 333 clubs throughout the land. Though voluntary, fertile Indian couples were encouraged to limit their families to three children. If that number was exceeded, the men were encouraged to have a vasectomy when they reached 33 years of age. If one examines the policy and supply structure of our four decades of family planning assistance, it has been [recently] said that 15 million less Indians will have been born by the year 2000.

The third project is the low cost housing program. It used the millions of dollars of U.S. owned local currency. The researcher in the next century may not realize how we came by so much local currency, but in the period of the 1960s and 1970s, even the late 1950s, there was a plan for India to purchase our imports with local currency. We owned the local currency and we had limitations on how much of it we could sell or revert to the U.S. Treasury. So, we had literally millions of dollars of local currency in New Delhi in support of our development effort. This low cost housing program is just one example. The Delhi-based coordinator came out of the Bombay banking community. He was a dynamo. By streamlining the grant procedure, he was able to approve thousands of applications within three days of receipt at low or no interest. Each day he notified his approval to a cluster of pre-approved banks so that implementation could begin at once. Hundreds of thousands of simple homes were constructed while creating a repayment fund for the Indian Housing Authority for relending in future decades. The typical Indian bureaucrat could learn a lot from this man. He had worked closely with the Tatas in the Tata steel industry in addition to his banking experience and was one of the most charismatic and galvanizing individuals that I've met in my AID career.

Q: What changed the program in India?

EVANS: At last, our honeymoon of assistance to India was over in early December 1971 when the GOI military actively supported the creation of an independent Bangladesh in what was up until then the former East Pakistan. The Secretary of State, Henry Kissinger, who I was later to work for, when he left State, announced at a news conference that the U.S. would tilt toward Pakistan. This was not well-received in New Delhi. The U.S. government terminated all PL480 and commodity import programs overnight. A tribute to the GOI's maturity, however, was not to ask all Americans to leave the country at once. Instead, they methodically phased out one or two technical assistance projects each month over a period of two years. I often said that destiny made me one of the most deprogramming officers in the AID ranks.

But the Evans family thoroughly enjoyed our nearly three years in India. Ambassador Kenneth B. Keating was from my hometown of Rochester, New York. He was very kind to us, as was his DCM, Galen Stone. USOM Director Howard Houston was a non-career political appointee with compassion, commitment, and quiet intelligence.

Q: What was your general feeling about assistance to India?

EVANS: In India, we had seen U.S. assistance received graciously. It was utilized effectively in massive programs and projects. The growth rate in India never has equaled that of the People's Republic of China, but it has been based on a relatively democratic experiment and has been people-oriented and consistent over the decades. We were there at the ending of an era with unilateral termination of our assistance. On my last three week tour through India of AID projects, Indian project directors were truly sad that U.S. assistance was ending. Although they too felt that perhaps they could run these institutions, programs and projects on their own. They expressed time and time again their appreciation for our constant support in the early decades after independence. We left India with a very solid feeling of what U.S. resources had done over a period of nearly 25 years.

In January 1973, I accepted the chiefship of AID's liaison with the United Nations in AID/W's PPC.

R. GRANT SMITH
India Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1970-1972)

Political Officer
New Delhi (1972-1975)

R. Grant Smith was born on Long Island in 1938. He graduated from Princeton University in 1960. He later earned a master's degree from Columbia University. He joined the Foreign Service in 1963 and held positions in Pakistan, Nepal, and India. In 1995 he began his ambassadorship in Tajikistan. Ambassador Smith was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: Today is April 29, 1999. Grant, you came back in 1970 to work in what, the India-

SMITH: The India Desk.

Q: India Desk. And you did that from when to when?

SMITH: Until the summer of 1972.

Q: What did the India Desk consist of? I mean, was it large?

SMITH: Well, then as now, it covers India, Nepal, and Sri Lanka, as well as the Maldives and Bhutan. Then we had a director, a deputy director, two political officers (I was the junior of the two). The deputy director was also the senior economic officer, and there was a junior economic officer, plus there was a Desk officer for Sri Lanka and one for Nepal.

Q: This was an interesting time, wasn't it, for being on India? Kissinger was in the White House and was interested in the China via Pakistan connection, and India seemed to be getting sort of short shrift. Did you feel that, or was this a fair way of saying it, or how would you describe it?

SMITH: Well, the key event of the two years I was there was the December 1971 India-Pakistan War, and the key action that we took during that war that affected our relations with India for many years thereafter - if not still - was the dispatch of the carrier task force headed by the Enterprise to the Indian Ocean during the war. And it was something that, when it happened, we on the Desk didn't know about. We found out about it later. It was done by Kissinger, and he always made clear in the little book he wrote when he commented on this, that this had been done "in the context of the relationship with China." In other words, Pakistan was an ally of China, and because of our new opening to China and the relationship that Pakistan had in establishing that opening, he didn't think that we could stand by in the situation which could have occurred towards the end of that conflict, which was that India succeeded in liberating Bangladesh and would then turn to Pakistan.

Q: This was later. It didn't start in '70, did it?

SMITH: No, the events which led up to it started in March of 1971.

Q: What area were you dealing with in India?

SMITH: Particularly as we looked at political aspects of the cultural relationship, scientific relationship, Peace Corps, and things like that, all of which were... Well, it wasn't an easy a time for any of those. Certainly the AID program was declining in size; the Peace Corps was declining in size; so there were political elements to all of this.

Q: Who was sort of "Mr. India" in the State Department at that time?

SMITH: Dave Schneider was the country director, and I guess you could say he was Mr. India. The deputy assistant secretary in the NEA front office was Chris Van Hollen, who of course covered all of South Asia.

Q: Well, just to get it into the picture, who was India's prime minister at that time?

SMITH: Well, that was Indira Gandhi.

Q: And who was our ambassador?

SMITH: Ken Keating.

Q: Ken Keating.

SMITH: Right.

Q: What was your impression? I mean, you had been in Belize, and all of a sudden you're dealing with India. What was your impression of what we were getting out of India, and also that always tricky relationship between India and Pakistan as far as within our own internal State Department? Were you feeling a sense of rivalry, or what were you picking up?

SMITH: Well, of course, this was a time in India-Pakistan relations... Well, our relations had gone through a number of cycles with Pakistan, and there was one particular cycle that lasted up until 1965, the 1965 India-Pakistan War. And of course I'd left the area, although not having worked specifically in India immediately before the India-Pakistan War - I left the area just at that time - and we did not support Pakistan in the 1965 war. We were always criticized by Pakistan for that. Of course, our relationship with India had been framed by the 1962 Sino-Indian War, where we did help India, but not as much as they wanted. So there were, as there have been always when I've worked on these issues in Washington, questions of sales of particular pieces of military equipment to Pakistan, resuming the sales or one-time sales - those were very much issues during that period in Washington. I must admit I don't remember all the details right now.

Q: What were you picking up as you sort of arrived on the Desk, as what did we really think about Indira Gandhi at that particular point?

SMITH: My recollection is that we were still learning about her. She'd come to power as a compromise candidate after the death of Shastri, and she was put on the throne by some of the old party bosses, expecting that they would be able to manipulate her, and turned out to be a very strong person in her own right. And this was a process that was going on while I was there. I don't remember the exact dates of specific events, and I believe it was during that period she nationalized the banks and also withdrew the privy purses from the princes, the former princely rulers. So she was in the process, in that period, of establishing herself more firmly, taking these very populist actions that won her public support, didn't have that much effect in terms of long-term development of the country (although the banks had some effect, certainly), but were very clearly taken for populist reasons.

Q: And for you, I imagine they sliced the pie up in a certain way - what part of the Indian-American relations did you have?

SMITH: Well, as I say, being the junior political officer, I was doing a lot of the political aspects of the cultural relationship - Peace Corps, AID, things like that. I was fortunate in the first few months that I was there to be involved in the visit of an Indian parliamentary delegation headed by the speaker of Parliament, and both involved in planning the visit and actually went along also as an escort officer, which as far as I was concerned was a wonderful opportunity, because I got to arrange a schedule for them to see the midterm elections in the United States, which gave me, of course, an opportunity to do that, and did a lot of things that aren't necessarily the common way that things are done. For instance, as I recall, we pooled our resources in San Francisco and invited the head of the Field Poll to come and give a presentation on the polling there in San Francisco at a lunchtime presentation, which went very well. It also gave me the opportunity to get to know these members of the delegation, because I subsequently went to India, and of course, we were old buddies.

Q: How did you find it? I mean, I always had the impression that the upper class of the Indians had picked up a certain amount of disdain for the Barbarian American, picked up both internally and also from their British colleagues. Did you sense any with this delegation that came through, or were they a different breed of cat?

SMITH: Perhaps among some of them, but not among most of them, because the delegation was headed by the speaker, who was a Sikh from one of the main Sikh groups, and the other members were not, for the most part, ones that would fall into that category. I know very much what you mean, and I remember being convinced both on this occasion, later in India, and later other places, that to understand a recently independent view of the United States, you have to go back and look at the mother country's view of the United States. In the case of India, very much, the London School of Economics' view of the United States certainly affected Nehru and a generation of senior Congress Party officials and bureaucrats.

Q: I've often felt that the London School of Economics and its predecessors did more damage to the Third World than Lenin, Marx, and the whole group.

SMITH: Well, India is certainly an example of that, because unlike many Third World countries it was large enough to have a continental economy and to turn inward and try to do everything itself in a way that many other countries could not.

Q: Well, how did you and your colleagues see the situation before the Bangladesh thing, which at that time was East Pakistan? How did you see that situation developing?

SMITH: Well, of course it began, as I recall, in March of 1971 with the crackdown by the Pakistan military in East Pakistan, as it was then, which came after the election in Pakistan, which had actually resulted in a majority for the main politician from East Pakistan, Sheikh Mujibur Rahman. The crackdown by the Pakistan military immediately resulted in this massive flood of refugees, and we're talking about a magnitude that, looking at present-day situations, makes present day numbers, as bad as they are, seem small, because there were 10 million altogether that came into India from Bangladesh, including the poor peasants but also the Bengali leadership. And one of the things that I was very involved with was organizing the money to transfer, as I recall, to UNHCR [United Nations High Commission for Refugees] to help these, although the Indians, I believe, did not want to call them refugees. They were "temporarily displaced persons," because the Indians did not want these people to stay; they wanted them to go home, and they did not want to give them full refugee status. The whole purpose of Indian policy was to create a situation in which they could go home. Pakistan has always accused India of masterminding this whole thing so that it would divide Pakistan, split off East Pakistan and become independent. My view was much more that the Pakistan army, the West Pakistanis, were responsible for the events that precipitated everything, but once those happened and the refugees began to flow, then India, yes, Indira Gandhi, made a very hard-nosed decision that India would do what was necessary to stop this problem, and what was necessary to stop this problem involved training, equipping the Bengalis to be fighters in East Pakistan, supporting them with the Indian Army, which before the war actually started was, as I recall, operating across the border into East Pakistan. So India, pressured by this massive flow of refugees, did everything to force that conflict in East Pakistan, and its whole objective then was to hold to the west and to liberate East Pakistan - which it did quite quickly.

Q: Did you have any feeling as the situation was developing, you and your colleagues, that we were giving too much support for the Pakistan position and too little for the Indian position on this?

SMITH: Very much a sense that we were not addressing the fundamental problem of this massive flow of refugees and what do you do about it - and the human rights violations which had occurred in East Pakistan, which were very fully covered by our team which was then in Dhaka, reported on. Mrs. Gandhi visited Washington in November, 1971. I was there the day she was received at the White House. It was an unusually warm day, and people were quipping about Indian summer, and of course I reminded them about the real meaning of Indian summer, but she was coming as a last minute effort to try to get support so that this problem could be resolved diplomatically rather than as it ultimately was. And she spoke about the problems that India was facing, and Nixon, as I recall, really pretty much dodged that issue. There had been a cyclone in Orissa in Eastern India, and he spoke about concern about that. Well, you know, in absolute terms, yes, there was a lot of death and destruction from that cyclone in Orissa, but compared to the 10 million people that had flowed into India from Bangladesh, this was very small, and he pretty much ignored that. And I think that reflected the kind of policy that was going on. People were not really focusing on the bigger problem.

Q: Did you see the Bangladesh, still called East Pakistan, situation sort of coming out the way it did? Was there a thought that India might just plain annex this and have a greater Bengal or anything like that?

SMITH: I don't remember specifically considering that issue at that time. I remember in looking at it later and being convinced that India definitely did not want to have East Pakistan - Bangladesh - become part of India. India did want a relationship with East Pakistan, and the bottom line for India in that relationship would be that this kind of thing never happen again, that Bangladesh would never cause this kind of problem for India again, that there would never be a huge inflow. And of course, after Independence there still was a substantial Hindu population in Bangladesh, and there were a lot of problems left over from the war and before the war between the two. But no, I didn't have the impression that India wanted to annex Bangladesh. India wanted primacy in South Asia, wanted that to be recognized, although when you speak of India, there are a lot of different factions in India and different people wanted different things; but the majority position I don't think was that they wanted to take over the other countries of South Asia.

Q: How did the Gandhi trip go when she came here, outside of the fact that Nixon seemed to be dodging?

SMITH: She didn't get what she wanted, and she went home, and things progressed towards war.

Q: Did you get any feel for the tension between our embassy and - what was the capital of Pakistan then - Islamabad?

SMITH: Islamabad

Q: And in the consulate general in Dhaka with Archer Blood, did you get any feel for sort of that these two were not speaking the same language?

SMITH: My recollection is that that was a problem, but you should put Arch Blood on tape.

Q: We have Arch Blood on tape.

SMITH: Yes.

Q: I was wondering whether we were looking at... One of the major tensions in the world is between Pakistan and India, and to have Pakistan in the Near Eastern Bureau at that time (it's now changed) and India being in the-

SMITH: No, everything was in the Near East-South Asia Bureau, so there was no problem of a scene.

Q: Okay, it was the Near East -

SMITH: - South Asia Bureau, and there was no problem of a scene. Chris Van Hollen was the deputy assistant secretary for South Asia, the senior person working on South Asia.

Q: Did you find, being part of this bureau, that Palestine sort of seemed to absorb most of the tension - I mean the problems of Israel and the Arab world? Did that seem to pretty well absorb the energies and attention of the principals?

SMITH: Yes. There always has been that problem, and I think the only time that there was somebody heading the Near East-South Asia Bureau who was really interested in South Asia was actually before I joined the Foreign Service, was Phil Talbot, who was there early in the Kennedy Administration, who was a South Asianist. But after that, certainly, there was a problem getting attention for South Asia, and I was in the bureau later; I know that that was a problem.

Q: How about when the Enterprise was sent to... "Steam" isn't the right term, but it used nuclear power, but its task force to go into the Indian Ocean? How did that hit you all?

SMITH: It hit us pretty hard. And you should interview some of the people who got together and formed a particular group to protest. But it wasn't clear the exact purpose of it. One of the problems was, and I think often is in the question of ship movements, that ship movements are done and not explained - which is probably part of the idea. But certainly India saw this as a threat to India, and there was a lot of misinformation about exactly how far it went. Actually, it didn't go very far into the Indian Ocean. I don't remember; at one time I learned the exact level to which it went, but it wasn't very far up into the Indian Ocean at all. But they saw this as a direct threat to India, that the U.S. had sent a very powerful task force, presumed to have nuclear weapons, to threaten India in a situation where India believed itself to be completely in the right and where India - I don't remember the exact timing now, but it became very clear after India succeeded in Bangladesh, that it was not going to begin an all-out offensive against Pakistan; it was just going to hold as far as Pakistan went. It wanted a cease-fire then: hold in the west, win in the east, cease-fire. And the purpose of sending the Enterprise was, I believe, because we did not know that that was the Indian [intent] or were not convinced or sure that that was what India planned to do, and if India had planned to turn against Pakistan then all out, that would have concerned us.

Q: At the time, just sort of the personal feelings of those on the Indian Desk - did you feel that India was justified in what it was doing?

SMITH: Yes, in what it was doing in East Pakistan in a Realpolitik kind of way, India was playing a very hardheaded game and could get away with it and was justified.

Q: Did you find after this episode was over - you were there until '72 - did you feel a real lowering of relations or a hardening of relations?

SMITH: Yes, well I was not only there until 1972 but in 1972 went to New Delhi, so the answer is yes. I spent much of the three years I was in India, from '72 to '75, explaining the Enterprise. It produced a very difficult time in our relationship.

Q: Was there anything else that you were dealing with during the '70-72 period that you think we ought to talk about?

SMITH: One thing happened during that conflict that may have had an effect on down the line, and that was that, in looking at the flow of military equipment, we looked - I learned personally, not only at military sales but also at commercial sales of items on the munitions list. And I remember that Chris Van Hollen was very embarrassed at one point, went up to testify, and he knew about FMS [Foreign Military Sales], but he hadn't looked at commercial sales. And there were some commercial sales going on to Pakistan, so we had to cut those off, obviously, and we also looked at some things going on to India that were spare parts for, for instance, Super Constellations that we believed were being used for marine reconnaissance, which gets into a whole other area of commercial sales, cutoff of spare parts in times of tension, use of commercial items for military purposes. And I think that the Indians were probably already determined to, whenever possible, not be overly reliant on one supplier, probably for both military and commercial aircraft, for example. I don't know how much notice they took of what they did, but if they did, it probably confirmed their policy, which later meant, of course, that they always bought both Boeing and Airbus and on the military side probably a variety of weapons systems.

Q: How about relations with the Soviets during this time? Was this a little early, or were they making overtures to the Soviets?

SMITH: Well, they already had an established relationship with the Soviet Union. You need to look at the exact year. An Indo-Soviet treaty was signed. I believe it was in this period. I've always interpreted it as guaranteeing Soviet neutrality or better in times of conflict. Some people have put much more emphasis on the Soviet support than I think is warranted because I think India was fairly self-reliant, but I think it was very reassuring to India to have in the back pocket this treaty with the Soviet Union of neutrality or better in time of conflict. That was important and something that, when added to the Soviet military supply relationship with India, to the Soviet position on Kashmir (of vetoing things that India didn't like on Kashmir) was very useful. I don't remember the exact details of the Security Council consideration of the India-Pakistan War of 1971, but I do remember that the Soviets took the Indian side and prevented any resolution from being adopted in the Security Council which would have demanded cease-fire and withdrawal before India achieved its objectives.

Q: Were you on the Desk when we opened relations - Kissinger's secret mission and Nixon going to China? Was that while you were there?

SMITH: Yes.

Q: Did that seem, from your vantage point, did that one catch us by surprise and, two, did that have any effect on our relationship?

SMITH: Well, it certainly caught me by surprise on the Desk. And I think that it did have a long-term impact on our relationship, but the biggest single thing, again, was the Enterprise, and that was related to it all. Of course, our relationship with India about China had always been very complex, that we had supported India in the Sino-Indian War, provided India with some materiel, but not as much as they wanted, and had had some cooperative relationships in other areas with India vis-à-vis China which were quite significant.

Q: Well, you left the Desk in '72 and off, what, to New Delhi?

SMITH: To New Delhi.

Q: To '75.

SMITH: Right.

Q: What was your job?

SMITH: In the Political Section in New Delhi at that time, there was a position which I like to call India and her Neighbors: it was India's relationships with the countries of South Asia, which I managed to add a little bit on Kashmir to, but basically, it was India-Pakistan, and a little bit on India-Nepal, India-Sri Lanka, and India-Bangladesh.

Q: Was there any development while you were on the Desk with Sri Lanka or Nepal?

SMITH: I don't remember anything in specific while I was on the Desk. I do have some impressions of India's relationships with those countries, but I don't remember anything specific on the Desk.

Q: Well, what's your impression of relationship with...

SMITH: Well, particularly with Nepal. It has been a very complex relationship over the years, and Nepal has a terrible inferiority complex as far as India is concerned, feels very... Well, India has been very heavy-handed with Nepal, and Nepal reacts - let's put it that way. I may have mentioned this earlier - when India put the king back on the throne in 1951, an Indian second secretary participated in Nepalese cabinet meetings. That Indian second secretary, I think he was, was Krishna Rasgotra, who, when I was on the India Desk in Washington, was their DCM - later was their foreign secretary, some years later - and was ambassador to Nepal, in fact, at one point. Just the idea of sending this person back to Nepal who had such a relationship there gives an idea of the nature of that dynamic between India and Nepal. India had very definite objectives with Nepal. Indian intervention in Sikkim in 1972-73-74 (I forget the exact year.), where India went into a country - it wasn't an independent country - to an entity whose status was uncertain and, essentially, deposed the ruler because of the Nepalese-speaking majority there. But Nepal always saw that as, you know, potentially threatening, the kind of thing that India could do elsewhere. One of the key issues in the India-Nepal relationship was water. There had been some very good books written about this. When I was in Nepal, 1965-65, we learned about a very large potential hydroelectric scheme, which involved taking a river which has a large S in it and drilling a tunnel across - huge hydroelectric potential. I was some years later - and in fact I think it was in the early '80s - told that that project alone was as much as the total installed electric generating capacity in north India. But of course that power had to be sold to India, and that produced a very complex negotiation, with the Nepalese not wanting to be totally reliant on India for market and India not wanting to be reliant on Nepal as the source of this - as a result of which the project has never been done, although this is the one kind of project that could be tremendously beneficial for India and Nepal.

Q: Sri Lanka - did that raise anything on our radar in those days?

SMITH: No, Sri Lanka did not become... As far as India-Sri Lanka relations were concerned, there wasn't a great issue. That only began after 1983.

Q: That was when the Tamil -

SMITH: That was when that really began, but before that period, in '72-75, I went to Colombo and didn't see anything particular to comment on. There had been historic issues there. Indian Tamils - not just the Sri Lankan Tamils, but the Indian Tamils - historic issue, but nothing big.

Q: When you were in New Delhi, was Keating still the ambassador?

SMITH: Keating was the ambassador when I arrived. Moynihan came while I was there and left while I was there, and Saxbe arrived. So I served under three ambassadors while I was there.

Q: Keating later went on to -

SMITH: Israel.

Q: - Israel, got there just in time, I guess, for the October War of '73, didn't he; but what was the feeling about Keating at that point? I've heard people say that he was getting to be an old man and really wasn't that plugged in, in a way - or not? Or did you have that feeling?

SMITH: I've served under a lot of ambassadors in New Delhi, and I was only there briefly while Keating was there. I don't remember that he was terribly engaged, but with a few exceptions, a lot of the ambassadors there were not terribly engaged. He had had a difficult time during the India-Pakistan War. He had a very difficult last meeting with Mrs. Gandhi. She sort of fidgeted, answered the telephone, and gave very short answers, didn't really engage at all. I don't remember whether other people were walking in and out of the room, but it would have been consistent with what I remember hearing about the conversation. And that, of course, was after the Enterprise and the war, so you can understand maybe why it happened that way.

Q: How was the embassy when you arrived there in '72? Were they feeling sort of at odds with Washington and all, would you say?

SMITH: At odds with Washington and demoralized, and something else was going on, because of course we had had an enormous mission in India during the 1960s. You had the military buildup after the '62 war. We'd had a military mission there. Then you had the very large AID and U.S. agriculture activities there during the '60s, as we provided large amounts of aid, particularly food aid, PL-480 - very large AID mission - and all of this was winding down. I should get the figures for you. My wife tells of going to her first American women's club meeting when she was there and there being 200 people, and when she left there were 30. It's that kind of enormously... Peace Corps was on the way out. In fact, as I mentioned before, it was declining before the India-Pakistan War, and that was sort of the final nail in the coffin. The reason it was declining before the war was explained to me by a retired Indian state official, the father of the wife of a colleague in the Indian Foreign Ministry. And this retired state official said to me, "You know, when the Peace Corps was bringing BA generalists with enthusiasm, that was fine; what we were getting was enthusiasm. When they started trying to send us technically trained people, you know, we have lots of technically trained people." So the Peace Corps was already declining for a variety of reasons, and the war stopped it.

AID was already declining, and dwindled to almost nothing after that period, that three-year period. The military mission was already much smaller and by the time I was there was down to one or two or three people. So the nature of our relationship had already begun to change, and the war just brought it down to a very different relationship from the kind it had been in the 1960s.

Q: You were watching India's relations with its near neighbors. With Pakistan by half and all, did you see a changed India as far as its attitudes toward neighbors, or was this of secondary interest to the Indian government?

SMITH: Well, certainly as far as Pakistan is concerned. Pakistan was and is the main issue for India, and there was, is, a hard line there in the Indian government, which I think after the 19- (end of tape)

Q: Yes, you were saying the main concern in India-

SMITH: - was Pakistan. It's always been true that the way ahead in the Indian Foreign Ministry is to be tough on Pakistan. You aren't going to get ahead by broaching compromises on Pakistan. And I think after the 1971 War that was reinforced. The Simla agreement at the end of the 1971 War, in July of 1972, was as far as India was concerned a tremendous step forward because it basically said India-Pakistan issues shall be resolved bilaterally. And in the negotiation of that, Bhutto had refused some language which would have even more firmly established the Indian point of view, but that much he accepted, and that pretty much did establish the Indian point of view on that. So it was a period where India had won a war, it felt, could be fairly firm with Pakistan. The '65 War had not gone nearly as well with India. It was fought to a stalemate. The '71 War had gone fairly well. The Indians were proud of their success, at their secularism. They would always point out that their Army chief during the time of the Bangladesh War was a Parsi. The Indian Air Force chief, as I recall, was a Christian. The handover was to a Sikh. There was quite a religious variety in the Indian military. However, there was a lot of focus internally, within India, in this period because Mrs. Gandhi had certainly won the 1971 election, which occurred just before the war. She'd had an overwhelming victory in the 1971 election. We always thought that those populist issues that she'd succeeded at before - the privy purses, the bank nationalization - had had a major effect. The Bangladesh War reinforced her position. But then she began to have trouble. And there's been a lot written recently, of course, about the 1973 nuclear explosion and how one reason for the timing of that may have been problems she had domestically.

Q: How were your contacts with the Indian Foreign Ministry?

SMITH: Yes, I had good relations with the Indian Foreign Ministry. We did a lot with them socially. We actually made fairly good friends there. There was a group in the Indian Foreign Ministry that were of similar age. Many of them come into the Indian Foreign Service together, so they all knew each other, and we got to know them quite well. We had good relations. They probably all thought I worked for the CIA because I was so active, but no, we had very good relations, relations that we've kept up over the years afterwards.

Q: So this almost... "anti-Americanism" is probably not the right term, but coldness towards America didn't particularly rub off in the officialdom.

SMITH: You had to work at it, but if you worked at it, it was okay. And my approach was always not only to work with those officials that I had to know but also people who were interested in these issues outside of the Foreign Ministry, which would include professors, newspaper columnists, people like that. And in many cases, they were of that same age group, perhaps had gone to the same universities as the people in the Foreign Ministry. It was a pleasant time in that sense. As I said, it took work, but it was possible. Sometimes, some things weren't possible. I was never able to visit Sikkim, and I was told basically that I wasn't going to be able to visit Sikkim because they were too suspicious of me.

Q: What about the other confrontational relationship that you probably had to deal with, and that is with our embassy in Islamabad. There must have been a counterpart who dealt with Pakistan-Indian relationships. How did that work?

SMITH: I don't remember that as being a particularly confrontational time. I visited Pakistan once or twice during that period, visited all of the neighboring countries, in fact - except China - during that period. I don't remember it being a particularly tense relationship. I was trying to think back about it, and I just don't remember it being that bad, although I'm sure that we did disagree about these key issues of, usually, arms supply.

Q: Did the hand of Henry Kissinger weigh pretty heavily, did you feel, on our relations, from your vantage point, or not?

SMITH: Yes, they did, and we never really recovered from the dispatch of the Enterprise. Of course, during two of the three years I was there, Moynihan was the ambassador, and Moynihan had an access in Washington which was very useful. And I think, you know, if anybody could get a point across in Washington, he probably could.

Q: How did you explain the Enterprise to your Indian colleagues?

SMITH: I explained it very much in the lines I mentioned earlier, that they should see this as part of our relationship with China. They should recognize that even though the Indian intent during this period may have been very clear to Indians, to deal with East Pakistan and call it finished, it wasn't necessarily clear to others on the outside - but also to explain, to get in some of the details of... The Enterprise really had just barely got into the Indian Ocean.

Q: And it wasn't that big a deal, either, in a way.

SMITH: That's right. But I do think that it... Well, and perhaps even today, it is still a factor in our relations.

Q: What was your impression of Ambassador Moynihan?

SMITH: Well, actually, for about three months, I was his staff assistant and was offered the job on a longer-term basis, and instead I really... The job in the Political Section had been one I had been after for a long time and would like to return to it. He was an ambassador who could deal with those Indian politicians and officials of the London School of Economics background and otherwise, could deal with them on an equal footing because of his own intellectual background. It was fascinating to watch him work the issues in Washington, in many cases, to write a telegram, then go back to Washington to negotiate the response. It was fascinating to watch him in his dealings with the press, because this was a period in which within India he had very low visibility. He only gave one press conference while he was there, and that was just before he left. And he was asked a question about Diego Garcia. This is probably in his book. He quipped that he didn't know why India was getting so worked up about the Indian Ocean. "It's only a chance of history that it was called the Indian Ocean. It could have been called the Madagascar Sea." But he did spend a lot of time with the American press. We noticed that... He wrote his own telegrams, I should back up and say. He was somebody who would... I remember learning as an undergraduate in college that Woodrow Wilson had a portable typewriter and used to sit there in the White House and type things. Well, Moynihan had a portable electric typewriter in his office, and he worked sort of ten to two and four to eight. He would sit there in the evening and write these long cables. Sometimes they'd be about a meeting he'd had. Sometimes they'd be about an issue. And sometimes they would appear in the New York Times within a couple of days.

Q: Well, I'm sure, with his background, if it was good enough for the State Department, it was good enough to go off to the-

SMITH: The one that I remember the most was one he did about the return of the South Building to the Indian government. The South Building had been constructed with PL-480 funds for the use of AID. AID was shrinking dramatically, had no use for this building, which was in the southern part of New Delhi, and had decided to turn it back to the Indian government as provided for in the original agreement on the use of PL-480 funds. And at the last minute AID Washington had second thoughts, and he sent back this blistering cable that talked about great empires building these enormous buildings in their period of decline, which he called an "edifice complex." But of course, he always says that his biggest achievement, the one for which he will always be remembered, is his ending the rupee problem.

Q: Yes, would you explain what it was?

SMITH: Yes, let me say that Moynihan was somebody who would jump into an issue and work on it. Sometimes he would only work on it briefly. In fact, we often thought that he was ideally suited to be a senator. But in this case, he worked the issue thoroughly through to the end. The issue concerned this enormous quantity of Indian rupees we'd accumulated by selling wheat during the 1960s to India for rupees in those two years of drought. The rupees, a very small percentage we could use for our administration, but most of them could only be used by joint agreement and, in fact, were piling up faster than we were spending them - the interest on them was piling up faster than we were spending - and the amount was enormous. I think it was something like more than the total amount of money in circulation in India. The Indian press and public opinion saw this as a threat to economic stability in India, although in fact it couldn't be used without the approval of the government of India. In economic terms it didn't mean anything, but in political terms it meant a great deal. So Moynihan negotiated an agreement under which we turned back two-thirds of the rupees, and he handed over a check of that amount to the Indian government, the largest check ever written. At the time, he thought that we had saved enough to continue our educational and cultural programs, our scientific research programs (which were funded with rupees), through the end of the century. He was a few years off. The money ran out sooner than that, but the concept was to take a major political problem the heart of which was this infinite amount of rupees and turn it into a finite issue that would end in a certain amount of years, which he succeeded in doing.

I sometimes had an impression that after that and after the Kissinger visit (the details of which I don't remember much of now but that would have been in 1974), he sort of lost interest. So he left and was replaced by Saxbe.

Q: I take it then that Moynihan did not fall into... I won't call it "the trap," but certainly the pattern that a number of our ambassadors have, of coming to India and becoming so entranced with it that their objectivity is at least seriously in question as far as people who deal with Indian affairs back in Washington or even on their own staff are concerned.

SMITH: I certainly don't think he was perceived in Washington the way Chester Bowles was seen. Chester Bowles was seen as a total apologist for India, and Moynihan was not that. He was on occasion -

Q: Galbraith a bit, too.

SMITH: Yes, but Moynihan was certainly critical of individual Indians. I can remember some very, very critical cables that he wrote. I think to get a full impression of this you need to go back and review the telegrams of the time, which now should be available.

Q: Did you get any feel for the Moynihan-Indira Gandhi relationship?

SMITH: I don't recall. I probably did, but I don't recall. It was better than the Keating relationship, definitely, but I don't recall that it was particularly warm. I could be wrong.

Q: I can't think of anything; I'm just thinking that Mrs. Gandhi didn't take fools lightly, and I don't think Moynihan did either. They may have sat there and had self-satisfied smirks on their face in each other's company, but-

SMITH: If you've done one of these with Dave Schneider - he was DCM - he would have a much better recollection.

Q: Oh, the nuclear explosion - did that sort of change things as far as the relationships, how we viewed India at the time?

SMITH: I think it definitely did. I must admit, I've recently been reading articles about this, so I'm not sure what I remember myself and what I read in the articles, but before that we had had a relationship with the Indian atomic energy establishment, which ended abruptly with that. We cut off all contacts - as to the Canadians, from whose heavy water reactor the plutonium raw material may have come. I think the Indians were surprised, probably, by our reaction. The Indian explanation of this as a peaceful nuclear explosion was seen widely as an example of typical Indian posturing. Indians, Indian diplomats, have always had a troubled relationship with Americans and many Westerners, and this was an area which was a particular issue, I think, because it was just so transparent.

Q: Yes, were there any other problems or issues during this '72 to '75 period?

SMITH: There probably were, but I'm not sure that I remember them. I did manage to get up to Kashmir a couple of times. We were still a bit careful about how we traveled to Kashmir, but I did get up there a couple of times on vacations and managed to call on the governor and other officials whom I knew - from Washington, in fact. I also managed to travel around the southern part of the country a fair amount, doing speaking for USIS. And the latter was during the Watergate period. The Indian interest in Watergate was considerable. It was not like the situation in Europe, where they didn't really understand it - France, "affaire des plombiers." The Indians related to it in an interesting way, because here is a president who is being accused of abusing his office, of elements of "imperial presidency," and ultimately has to resign. And in India they have a leader who is being accused of abusing power, later more than at that time but already at that time, being challenged in the court about various things involving election practices, is removing chief ministers around the country; so the Indians followed it very closely, and I often thought that they related to it in the sense that, Gee, they can do that in the United States, maybe we can do that here.

Q: It's interesting, isn't it, because I know the European - I was in Greece at the time, and there was no real understanding of this. I mean, "Everybody does this, and what's the big deal?"

SMITH: It was always difficult in India, because with the parliamentary system, they didn't understand our system, so in talking about it, you had to do some basic Civics 101 to explain the American system. But they were very interested in it. And of course the Indians have always had journalists in Washington. There has been a group of Indian correspondents in Washington, so they were getting a lot of reporting about it. There's a considerable amount of reporting in the Indian press on international things, and a fair amount on the United States.

Q: How do we view the Kashmir problem? It really goes back to '48, doesn't it? I mean, essentially a done deal, with a lot of squabbling but probably little is going to change there?

SMITH: Well, I think that after the 1971 War, we did, that the 1971 War brought an end to a U.S. policy which had initially been one of supporting a plebiscite and later had been one of trying to work out agreements. In 1963, after the Sino-Indian War in particular, we tried to broker an agreement between India and Pakistan, even suggesting dividing Kashmir - deals there. But in 1971, with the Simla agreement, which says "issues between the two countries shall be resolved bilaterally," I was one who advocated, no, let them do it. Third parties can be available, but they said they're going to do it bilaterally, and the easy way for the United States to handle the problem in both countries is to say Simla. And later on, in 1982, I advocated that line as well.

Q: Were we still trying to get in there, felt we could make our good offices?

SMITH: In Kashmir?

Q: Yes.

SMITH: Not after '71. Up until '71, yes, but after '71, we backed off. I certainly favored our backing off, and I think we did back off.

Q: Well, then, in '75, where did you go?

SMITH: I spent a year at the Council on Foreign Relations.

SALLY GROOMS COWAL
Special Assistant, USIS
New Delhi (1971-1973)

Ambassador Sally Grooms Cowal was born in Oak Park, Illinois in 1944. After graduating from DePauw University she joined the United States Information Service as Foreign Service Officer. Her service included assignments as Cultural and Public Affairs Officer at US Embassies in India, Colombia, Mexico and Israel. She subsequently held a number of senior positions in the Department of State, including Assistant Secretary for Latin American Affairs and Deputy Political Counselor to The American Ambassador to the United Nations. In 1991 she was appointed Ambassador to Trinidad and Tobago. Ambassador Cowal was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy August 9, 2001.

Q: Then you were in India from when to when?

COWAL: I was in India from 1971 to 1973.

Q: Who was our ambassador in India?

COWAL: Well, our ambassador was Kenneth Keating, and then Keating was – before the end of my tour, Keating was replaced by Moynihan, and Moynihan fired the PAO, and that was my boss. So that was kind of the end of my assignment, also. I was coming to the end of my assignment in any case, but after all of this happened, we decided to speed that up a little bit. Of course, by then, I was absolutely gung ho, going to be a Foreign Service officer.

Q: Well, this is fun of it. So many people enter this flytrap. They think they'll come in and try it for a little while.

Q: And very few really leave, I mean.

COWAL: Right.

Q: Well, okay, how did you see the state of relations between India and the United States, 1971? The Vietnam War was kind of running down.

COWAL: Oh, no, it was extremely difficult, because if you'll recall, Henry Kissinger was the secretary of state, and Kissinger – in fact, some I think secret dispatches came out indicating that Kissinger had instructed ambassadors at the State Department, or whoever he had instructed, that our policy should be one of tilting toward Pakistan.

Q: This is over the Bangladesh peace ...

COWAL: Bangladesh, but it really had to deal with larger issues in the world ...

Q: Opening to China.

COWAL: ... and the opening to China. The Soviet Union and India had become quite closely affiliated, and so this was more than just Bangladesh, but the Bangladesh war really made that even more difficult. I had a fascinating time in India. One of the things that – I had, obviously, a multiplicity of jobs as sort of a catch-all ...

Q: Who was your PAO?

COWAL: A wonderful man named Dan Alexi, who was a sort of larger-than-life figure, huge Ukrainian American, six-foot-five-inches tall, and had been for 10 years the USIA area director for East Asia, meaning the whole Vietnam buildup. Then, after 10 years, he and the assistant director for the Near East, whose name was Alan Carter, sort of changed areas. And Alan went and became PAO in Vietnam, which had been the largest post in Dan's area, and Dan became PAO in India, which was the largest post in Alan's area, so these were the two giants of the agency, around which whole satellites sort of revolved.

So it was wonderful to work for him because it was not only focused on this huge post in India, but also at that point he was around 50, I guess. He had been in the Foreign Service maybe 20 years, maybe 25 years. He had risen, obviously, to the pinnacle of what you could do in USIA. He must have been a minister counselor or whatever he was at that point, had all of the intrigue and politics and power that within this rather small – but for us it was our whole world at USIA. Being able to sort of be mentored by somebody like this and following somebody like this around, two steps behind.

Q: ... I'm doing this because ...

COWAL: Absolutely, absolutely, so it was a chance to learn from a real master, and he had lots of enemies. He had as many enemies as he had friends, but it was fascinating. The first, I guess they had put a little – he hadn't had a special assistant, but the whole post, clearly, in this huge operation, and he had eliminated branch PAOs who had run their own little empires, because he thought the whole thing ought to run more centrally, out of one philosophy, and a country team, and so on and so forth. So the special assistant job was really supposed to make sure that these now four branch posts, which had no PAOs, which had cultural affairs offices and information officers, were nonetheless part of the central team. So I traveled to each of those posts every month.

So I saw, of course, the whole country, which was wonderful, because out of every month I would spend three days in Madras, three days in Bombay, three days in Calcutta, or so. So I made the circuit, and of course I would use the opportunity to see what was around those places, so I really think I was in all of the Indian states. That was a fascinating experience.

Q: How were you received? Usually, somebody who comes from the head office is considered a son of a bitch from outside.

COWAL: Right, well, it was rough, and the fact that I worked for Dan, who was not everybody's cup of tea, in a way made it rougher. But in other ways, I think being a young female made it easier, because I wasn't perceived as a heavy or a threat, and so I would hear things. And, of course, I was good eyes and ears. I mean, he also wanted to know what they were thinking and what they were doing and whether they were onboard with his program or they weren't, so I guess I was a little spy in some ways.

But when I wasn't out traveling in these places, one of my jobs was to work with the information officer every day, or the press officer, to do a media reaction summary of the Indian press, which if you know anything about it, was a very lively press. I think there were seven dailies in English and countless numbers in Indian languages, which I didn't read but which we had people who read and analyzed and so on. So each day, we were responsible for preparing a telegram to the department about what the media reaction in India was to important events, whether that was Vietnam or the conflict in South Asia or whatever it was. I guess there were certain themes that we covered every day.

Because the Ambassador was a former senator from New York, Keating, who was not in agreement with Henry Kissinger and with American policy, because he thought it was the wrong policy in terms of India, being a politician he thought – well, they didn't have – they, meaning Kissinger and Nixon – didn't have to pay any attention to him. But they would have to pay attention, in a democracy, to the media – what was the free press saying? – because he was a politician.

So this was a cable that he cared more about than he cared about the cables that his political section was preparing about their conversations with Indian government officials or whatever. This was the most important thing for him every day, and so he wanted to see it, personally. One of my jobs, then, was to go every afternoon – we were in a separate building. USIS was across town from the embassy. But I would have to get in the car every afternoon and ride over to the ambassador's residence, which was next to the chancellery. And the ambassador would be at his swimming pool, this being his after-lunch little break from the workday, and I would go out to the swimming pool and sit there with him while he read through this cable. He would have the newspapers piled up next to him. He would have been reading them on his sort of lunch break, and he would often want us to throw things into this cable that weren't already in it.

So it was a very nice also exposure to much more than a junior officer would normally have to the ambassador, and to someone whom I watched being a loyal servant who nonetheless disagreed in many ways with his government's policy, and that was a very, very, very interesting experience.

Q: Well, you're giving me a view of Ambassador Keating that I haven't gotten from others, because most people talk about him as sort of, well, a nice man but out of his element and getting on in years.

COWAL: Well, I say, in some ways, that was the case. The very fact that he wasn't in his office at 2:30 in the afternoon, but in his swimming pool. But he was very sharp. I mean, he was quite sharp, and he was quite disturbed about some aspects, and of course we were running into this war. I had a very interesting experience, also, of meeting Mrs. Gandhi, who at that point, they knew we were tilting toward Pakistan, and there was absolutely no love lost.

We had full diplomatic relations, but the Indians had always thought of the Americans as their best friends. I mean, every place that you went as an American diplomat, people would say to you – and I'd get a lot of lecturing and stuff, too. I mean, I would be out there working with women's groups or university groups or something, and people would always say to you, "Oh, you're not like the British," because of course they didn't like the British. "You're so friendly, Americans are so accessible."

But they would hark back to these days when Chester Bowles was the ambassador, and Chester Bowles' wife's name was Sally, so being named Sally was always helpful. Nice Americans like Sally Bowles were named Sally and were very sympathetic to India, and we were in clearly a different policy environment, but despite the fact that there was a lot of love and respect for the United States, we were clearly at a very different point, politically. And that made it difficult for embassy officials – I mean, particularly higher-up officials like Keating – to have I think a real dialog or a real impact. We were kind of shut out.

But I got a chance to meet Mrs. Gandhi in a very interesting way. It was one of these trips around the country, coming back from one of these trips, and I was on a puddle-jumping plane. I couldn't get the direct flight from I think it was Bombay to Delhi. So I had to get a plane that went from Bombay to Ahmedabad, Pune to wherever. It was a puddle jumper, and it was a DC-3, and everybody describes to you their days of flying around in the third world in the early '70s, and it was a plane that was loaded with peasants and chickens and munitions, I actually remember. So every time this plane landed, and I think it was like three stops between Bombay and New Delhi, they would get all the passengers off the plane, and then they would unload whatever cargo was being taken to this place. And while you were off the plane, you had to stand under a tin roof.

You can imagine the tarmac in a little provincial airport in India and it's 45 degrees centigrade and you're under the roof, waiting for them to tell you that you can get back on the plane. So as we were standing there, and I was probably the only foreign passenger on the plane. So we're standing there under the roof, and the pilot, the cockpit window was open, and the pilot is sort of hanging out the window, kind of waiting for them to do whatever they're doing to his airplane, and so I waved, and the pilot waved back.

So we got back on the plane and we took off, and the stewardess came back and she said, "Well, the pilot would like to know if you'd like to come up to the cockpit." So I said, "Sure, I'd like to come up to the cockpit." So I spent the rest of the trip riding between the pilot and the copilot, I'm sure against absolutely every civil aviation regulation in the world. The pilot was Rajiv Gandhi's best friend. The pilot was not Rajiv, but if you remember, Rajiv was an Indian Airlines pilot. So that put me into the social circle of this group of young Indians, many of whom were married to foreigners, as was Rajiv Gandhi, of course, married to Sonia, to an Italian woman.

So I came to know people outside of the embassy circuit by having met the pilot on this Indian airlines plane and having met Rajiv and having Rajiv take me one day to meet his mother. She revealed no great foreign policy secrets to me, but we had tea or something. Those are the kinds of things that if you talk about career-enhancing moves, at a point when Mrs. Gandhi wasn't seeing anybody, the fact that I had been invited to tea at Mrs. Gandhi's house I suppose gave me a certain notoriety, if nothing else.

I also think that being a woman worked greatly to my advantage, because it was at a time when there were very few women out there. It was very much ahead of the curve. After all, we admitted very few women to begin with. Very few women wanted this career, number two, and then we hadn't admitted any married women. There was – in a Foreign Service class of 100, there would be two or three women, very, very few. And those, the minute they got married, had to get out. So the number who stuck with it more than five years was minuscule.

So I don't know that I understood it then, but I would say almost from that point on, if you were a woman and you were good and you were somewhat gutsy, or you had a certain amount of panache or something, you were on a very fast track, I would say. I'm sure there were lots of roadblocks, but I'm also sure that for every one of those roadblocks, there was a push that a man would not have had. So I think it was helpful to me.

Q: I interviewed Frances Cook, very much that experience. When you went around to these various parts, was USIS able to sort of key our message to the Tamil-speaking area or to the Sikh area. In other words, it's such a diverse country. Could we fine-tune our message?

COWAL: Well, yes and no. One of the reasons why Dan, my boss, had eliminated the branch PAO position was that he was trying to save positions. Although he had 45 officers, he felt that there was a need to get beyond the bureaucracy and get beyond these whole little establishments in each of these places, where you replicated what was already going on in New Delhi, and you had exactly the same thing working around the consul general, in the same way that they all worked around the ambassador. And that what we desperately needed was to get out into the sticks more – not to the sticks. We were under no illusion – it was already 500 million Indians – that we were reaching everybody. but we had a very, I think it was early for the agency, very strict look at what our objectives were and who our audiences were, and how we would convince those audiences of those objectives, of those messages.

One of the ways that we would do that is we would target universities and university students and university professors and university faculty. Therefore, he took the four positions, which had been these bureaucratic let's-run-these-little-posts positions, and he made them what he called resident specialists. The Indians respond very well to intellectual things and academic things. They're very learned people, and so we had an expert on history and an expert in economy and an expert in foreign policy and another – literature, maybe. They were Foreign Service officers, but who had PhDs in these respective subjects so that they could get easy access to university classes and classrooms and faculty.

Again, Dan made lots of friends and lots of enemies because he would say, very openly, "Well, these are second-raters for second-rate audiences." But he was recognizing that every once in a year you would get John Kenneth Galbraith out to lecture and you wouldn't get him to the university in Bangalore, because he'd do one lecture and it would be at Delhi University or something. So the fact that we would have an economist on our staff who could respond to these thousands of requests of, "Please come and talk to us about the American economy."

Those were the days when we were doing the first currency convertibilities, and there was a whole lot of discussion about where was America's economy going, and it was ...

Q: One of the Nixon shocks.

COWAL: It was one of the Nixon shocks, and so there was probably 100 requests a week for a speaker, and, again, the speakers were just a vehicle. The vehicle was to get Americans into these university settings so that we could, yes, talk about the American economy, but also, knowing that traveling Americans do exemplify American values and you do understand more about us if you come to know us. In this huge country, I think what we were trying to do was sort of paint a pointillist portrait, sort of put color dots on people's maps of what the United States was all about. Because for all that we might have been tilting toward Pakistan, India was tilting toward the Soviet Union, no question about it, and shutting out America. So that was the battle that we saw.

Q: Well, I would have thought that there would be almost a natural disconnect between the Soviets and the Indians, and the way of thinking, culture, style, everything else. I mean, the politicians could make the calculation, but I would think that – and this would be a real nice wedge that we could hammer away at all of the ...

COWAL: Yes, and to a certain extent, that was true, and one of the things that we did to exacerbate that wedge was we had a lot of what we originally called Leader Grants, which came to be called the International Visitor Program grants, and of course those were to send people from India to the United States – leaders, and those might be government people. But they might also be academics or businesspeople or scientists or scholars, or whatever.

We came up with this notion that we would send as many of them as we could to the United States via a short stay in Russia. Everybody said, “Well, why are you doing that?” Well, we were doing that precisely because somebody would have a couple of not very interesting and positive days in Russia and then go to the United States.

Q: How could you both justify and get the Soviets to agree to let these people through?

COWAL: Well, in many cases – we didn’t do this with all our grantees, but we did it with a number of them, and they were people who had contacts and links and whatever in the Soviet Union, and the Soviets were working very hard on this. We had a big information center, I think they had a bigger one. I mean, it was a real battle for the minds of men, in those days, and they were trying to address the Indian society with the fact that Communism was the answer to the economic woes of India, and I think they were making certain inroads.

I don’t think there was a whole lot – I mean, we had so many advantages. We had the English language. We had the natural tendency of Indians, I think, to be pro-American, the two world’s largest democracies, and all these kinds of things. But we had a real battle. So we sent some people to make the point fairly clearly that they were very different kinds of society and we were very different kinds of people.

I don’t think there was any particular love lost between the Russians and the Indians, but it was also very convenient. If you wanted to get more from the United States, couldn’t you do that by indicating that you were really about to go sleep with the Russians, and so it was a gain. I mean, after all, Nehru was one of the founders of non-alignment, and they saw that as their only salvation, along with some other great leaders – Tito and Nasser and Sukarno and Nkrumah was the five, and the Bandung was the morning of the world, and that was, what, in ‘68 or so? And so this was very shortly into the beginnings of the non-aligned movement, and that’s where India really saw itself, and it was trying to balance these two forces so as to get taken in by neither, or to get involved in neither’s battles in Asia or anywhere else.

Q: What about the universities? One of the legacies of the British rule was that a lot of the Indian professors and leaders and all went through the London School of Economics and were tainted with Fabian Marxist – my personal prejudice is this is much worse than Communism to Africa and all over. It loused a lot of these societies up for decades. But I would think that India, you would have your professors talking Marxist or extreme socialist talk to their students.

COWAL: You’re thinking right. And there were certainly parts of India and some universities that were much more of that tendency than others. There were places where we couldn’t go and where we weren’t welcome and where we weren’t invited, and lots of places where we were. It was a battleground.

Q: Well, what were the elite universities, as we saw them, at that time?

COWAL: Oh, gosh, my memory sort of fades.

Q: You mentioned Delhi University.

COWAL: Delhi University was certainly one of them. I can't any longer remember. If you put a list of them in front of me I suppose I could. Benares was good. I mean, the technical institutes, the Indian institutes of technology were super, and I think they had five campuses, or so. They, of course, eschewed Marxist rhetoric to teach technical skills, and when you think about it and you think about how important Indians have been in this country in terms of our high-tech revolution, how many Indians are today in the United States either working at Microsoft or teaching.

I think I heard something not so long ago about the professors of engineering at U.S. universities, there's a huge percentage of them who are Indian born and Indian trained. Those come out of these very, very, very good technical universities. One of the things that I've always been very lucky at in my Foreign Service career has been basically to be in places which counted, to be in places which were important, and where in some ways the history of the world was going to be written, and where there was a decidedly strong culture and the country had an idea of what it was and where it had come from and what its history was. Certainly, India was my first and extremely powerful experience in that regard.

Q: How did the East Pakistan – it happened on your watch.

COWAL: Yes, it did.

Q: Can you tell me how that hit us, how we responded, how the people in the embassy, the policy from Washington and how you all felt about it?

COWAL: I recall that the ambassador saw this coming and was kind of ineffective in doing anything about it, basically. I think that affected the whole staff. I don't remember there being great morale. What I remember, interestingly, and I've gotten to know – I mean, I somehow, again being a pretty junior officer, nonetheless I swam every day at lunch time. I would swim with the DCM (deputy chief of mission), the political counselor and the econ counselor. They had a big swimming pool at the embassy, and I would go over there and swim.

So these guys became my friends, or at least somebody that I knew more than a junior officer would have known anyone like that in this enormous embassy, but somehow, Galen Stone was the DCM, Dick Viets was the ambassador's special assistant. All of these people of course went on to their own formidable careers, I would say, in the Foreign Service. So I had a tremendous experience in meeting all of these people.

I would say that people in India, the American officers in India, kind of sometimes fell too much into three categories. I mean, the ones were those who were still living with this notion of the '50s and '60s, the romanticized India, that we're best friends, we'll be best friends forever, they look to us, we must support our little Indian brothers. We'll wear saris and try to be as Indian as anyone else.

Then there was the whole category of people who really wanted to bash the Indians, who really didn't understand why Mrs. Gandhi was not Nehru, although he had been difficult enough for us, but why she was this particularly difficult woman who seemed to be particularly interested in going her own way. So that was a second category. Then the third category were those who were there for the good time, and a very good time could be had.

One of the things, and this gets into Moynihan and actually the firing of my boss and all the rest of it, but we lived on these rupees. I mean, at one point, I think the United States owned 10 percent of all the rupees in the world because of the PL-480 programs, where we had sold India large amounts of food in the '60s and they had paid us in rupees, which we kept in accounts in New Delhi. That's one of the reasons why we had such an enormous presence in India, because we had no other way to spend all these blocked rupees. So not only did we have 500 people working for USIS, but probably 5,000 working for USAID (United States Agency for International Development) and of course an enormous Peace Corps and an enormous everything else. You could imagine. It was all running on this funny money. It was all running on rupees.

So AID not only ran its AID projects, but AID had a staff house for its staff to live in in New Delhi, which rivaled the Ritz Carlton hotel next to me. Here we were in the middle of extreme poverty, and AID officers who lived on a compound, associated only with one another, had their own swimming pools and bowling alleys and restaurants and commissaries and all this kind of middle class America, but upper middle class America, sort of writ large. I think there were a certain number of people who were out there for that.

I should be more generous than that. I mean, it sounds like everybody fit into one of these three categories, but there was an awful lot of that, of the people who lamented what had been, the people who hated every day about where they were, because they hated this government, and then the people who were just kind of along for the ride. It was an extremely difficult time. I felt sorry for the ambassador and his country team in trying to really put this forward. Then, when you knew that the policy from Washington was to sort of side with the enemy of the country where you were, and the country knew that, too, made it a very difficult situation.

Q: Galen Stone was a DCM?

COWAL: Yes.

Q: Now, I've known Galen close to the time – I was consul general in Saigon, '69, '70, and he was the political officer, the head of the political section there. I would have thought he would have brought over some of this real resentment about Mrs. Gandhi and of her considerable spanking of what we were doing in Vietnam.

COWAL: Yes, well, I think he was one of those. But I think what Galen was, you also saw in folks like that the sort of Foreign Service aristocracy, in a way. Galen came from an enormously wealthy, patrician, New England family. So you also saw – part of the good parts of this, in some ways, were as we got onto sort of a war footing, which we did, there was a rallying around the American community to support one another. Keating didn't have a wife. Galen had a lovely wife, and they became kind of like George and Laura Bush these days, to us there. After all, this went on for weeks, this discussion about whether there would be a war, wouldn't there be a war, how it would come, whether it would involve Americans, whether we would be targeted, whether we should evacuate. We never evacuated, but we would talk about that.

That was very interesting, too, being there with the first male spouse in the Foreign Service, because they would have community meetings and so on, and they would say things like, "Well, we're evacuating dependents." And then they would, in the next breath, say, "The women and children will be evacuated." Of course, irony of ironies, the place where we were to be evacuated was Iran, because that was then our anchor and our friend.

My husband was extremely interested in going to Iran. It was a place that he wanted to visit. In fact, he's no longer a lawyer. He works in design and architecture and so on, all of which came out of this experience of being sort of freed from what he had been expected to do, which was to be a lawyer and provide for a family. Women's liberation is also men's liberation, which is something that I learned. At any rate, he was very anxious to go to Iran, because he wanted to go to Isfahan and see all these beautiful mosques and all this kind of stuff. So he kept running around this meeting saying, "Now, what are we talking about here? Who are we evacuating, because I want to be on that plane."

It was kind of funny, and he did it with a certain lightheartedness, but we also sort of knew what we were doing, and that was we were stretching everybody's minds around a new concept of who was working and who wasn't working here, and who was the dependent and who was the officer. I think whenever you're in a crisis, like the one we're in right now in the United States, sometimes things rise to the surface that otherwise sort of stayed buried. That was the, I guess, leitmotif through those years, was the personal story of Tom and me meeting people and shaking them up about what the Foreign Service was about, and what the roles of men and women were about. It was interesting.

Q: Here's a lawyer, how did he fit in? I mean, he's young in this fascinating country, how did he make his way?

COWAL: Well, I think he did a terrific job at it, actually. I can remember some funny little anecdotes. We had been there a couple of months and he got sick, as a lot of people did in India. I mean, he didn't get real sick, but he picked up whatever it was that was going around and ate something or ...

Q: The food in a Delhi deli or something.

COWAL: Yes, whatever. So he one morning found himself at sick call, seeing an embassy nurse, one of those things about third world posts, where you line up sort of for sick call. The nurse said, "Okay, your name is Tom Grooms, and where do you work?" And he said, "Oh, I don't work, I'm a dependent." She looked at him and he had this sort of law school furrowed brow and was already beginning to get a little gray hair, although he was in his mid 20s. She kind of looked at him and she looked at him again and she said, “Who is your father?” Because she couldn’t imagine that anybody was there as a dependent. He obviously wasn’t 15 years old, he was a grown man, and so what was he doing sponging off of some father at age – Tom must have been 25, 26 at that point.

Again, by heading straightforwardly into these conversations, rather than hiding from them, I think we provided a service. We had a role to play. Tom decided that he couldn’t find work as a lawyer, after trying for a couple of months, and that he wasn’t going to stay home everyday, and that something he had always been interested in, sort of avocationally was design. So he went out and got himself – well, first, he did our house. He needed to keep busy, so of course we were assigned an embassy flat like every other junior officer, and, of course, because it was India, it was the size of my house today, and that was probably the smallest house anybody had. But it was enormous. It was a two flat, and we had the downstairs and another Foreign Service officer lived upstairs from us.

So we were assigned all the embassy furniture like everybody else’s, and Tom got to know all of the markets in Delhi, because he decided that he would slipcover this furniture and paint these walls and put in these plants. So, for the first two or three months, I think that’s what he did. He made that his project. He needed something to do. He knew everything about where to find anything in Delhi. I mean, he had been there, and he didn’t speak any Indian languages, but there’s enough English spoken anywhere in Delhi that you can kind of make your way around.

Pretty soon, everybody was coming to see our house. A couple months after that, he went to work for a big interior design company in Delhi, which wanted to get as a slice of its business the American embassy business, or any embassy business, because a lot of people came and said, “Oh my God, why do I want red velvet chairs in the middle of this tropical country?” So he built it into a little specialty business, and then left after a year and went back to school at the Parsons School of Design in New York City. He got a degree in environmental design and today runs a federal design awards program. It sponsors competitions for the best new federal building and the best stamp and the best bridge, and the best this, that and the other thing. He has never practiced law one day since. It led him into a whole new turn and course in his life, but not without some controversy, I suppose. I don’t know, it was interesting.

Q: Well, going back now to the – could you explain for the listener what was the issue, and what were we doing? I mean, what were our concerns with these Pakistanis?

COWAL: Well, it was one of the many chapters in the long-running war between the Indians and Pakistanis. It starts, certainly, with the partition, and geographically, deciding that religion should rule over geography in terms of deciding how the subcontinent would get carved into two separate states. It left the province of East Bengal, which was Muslim dominated, was made part of Pakistan, which was 1,500 miles away to the west, with the whole of India in between. I mean, that was certainly what began this whole thing, and what I think remained at the core of it. The ethnicity and the religion cut different ways, also, because the Bengalis, whether they were East Bengalis or West Bengalis, also had certain things in common as Bengalis, being within the Indian culture, very literate people, very cultured people. They're the poets and the writers and the artists.

The Bengalis in East Bengal became ever more dissatisfied to be ruled by people who were quite different than they were. I don't know about so much ideologically, but certainly culturally, and 1,000 miles a way. So there were constant attempts by the East Bengalis to get out of East Bengal and to go into West Bengal. I mean, I think it was a refugee issue as well, that they were then overrunning West Bengal, which didn't get along all that well with the central government of India either, because West Bengal had a Communist-dominated government.

I was way below the pay grade where the real issues were I dealt with on a daily basis, but I think the tensions just kept escalating and escalating. It was not anything that the United States was particularly a part of, except insofar as we were seen to be supporting Pakistan in this.

Q: Well, I mean, also our people out of the Consulate General in Calcutta were involved, but were Indians trying to make us support the separatism? Was this something we felt we were under pressure from the Indians to do?

COWAL: Yes, I think we were, and I think we were under pressure from the Pakistanis not to do that. Forgive me for not being all that involved in what was actually going on there. From our point of view, it was simply one of the many issues in which the Indians found a reason to criticize U.S. policy. At the end of the day, I think we were much more worried about a major conflagration in South Asia in which somehow we would be asked to take sides than we were about anything else. I think that we allowed the coming into being of Bangladesh, then, when it finally became sort of inevitable that this is what would happen. I think the United States responded sort of immediately to grant diplomatic recognition to this new country and to begin an aid program and to do all sorts of things. And we've had pretty good relationships with Bangladesh ever since, as far as I know.

Q: Did you observe or get involved with the perpetual tension between our embassy in Pakistan and in India? There's almost a tradition of these telegrams coming in from both places.

COWAL: Oh, yes. Right.

Q: And somebody up there is talking to somebody who is on the Indian desk who is also – or maybe the Pakistan desk. They had an interconnecting door, and what they would usually do is take these telegrams, coming from almost like two hostile powers, and sit down and try to resolve the thing so it didn't get any farther up in the ...

COWAL: In a way, it was a beleaguered embassy. A whole lot of people, I think, and starting with the ambassador, felt that we weren't listening enough to the Indians and to their genuine concerns about this refugee problem that they were experiencing. I think those of us who were on the Indian side of the border, I think most of us sympathized with the Indians.

I remember taking one trip to Pakistan during the time I was in India, and I had to go over and deliver something. Maybe I was a courier, I don't remember. It was not a big, high-level trip, but I had two or three days I think in Karachi and Islamabad, and coming back and thinking that India was a much better place than Pakistan. For all that India could be difficult, both difficult just on the creature comfort level, and overwhelming. India is overwhelming in so many ways. It was kind of round and complex, whereas Pakistan seemed to me to be narrow and straight, and a single line, sort of motivated much more by Muslim fanaticism – or maybe it wasn't fanaticism in those days – but it seemed like a sharp edge, and India seemed like a round ball.

There was so much in India. There were even so many religions in India. I mean, after all, there were 60 million Muslims in India. It was not as if it was all Hindus, and the multiplicity of cultures in India, with the south Indians and the north Indians and the Bengalis and the Gujaratis, and it should not have been surprising. After all, it's 1,800 miles long and 1,200 miles wide. That's bigger than the European continent, so clearly there would be distinctions, but I came back saying, "Oh, I wouldn't want to serve in Pakistan at all."

Q: So you caught the disease ...

COWAL: Right, I caught the disease, to that point. I thought, "That's black and white. It's very sharp, and this is so much richer, and it's more complex, and it's got so many more strands." So I got caught up in it to that extent of thinking it was quite a wonderful place.

Q: Particularly during this difficult time when the United States was picking up some flak from the Indians because of Kissinger – he had a broader game that he was playing.

COWAL: Right.

Q: He could have played it better, but anyway, he was doing it. What were you getting from your young pilots' association, and how did that go?

COWAL: Well, I think by then I was pretty much – remember, this is before e-mail and cell phones, so our communication, I would occasionally get visitors from Washington who had been colleagues of mine. I think that during those years that I was in India, the antipathy to the policy in Vietnam deepened and became rather dominant, but I was out of that. I was away from that.

So I was more or less focused at home and doing what I was doing in India and not any longer particularly connected to the larger world with Young Officers'.

Q: What about the crowd around Rajiv Gandhi and all of that? Was this affecting your social relations at all? Contacts with the young Indians?

COWAL: Well, it was sort of my social life. I guess I determined I became one of those people early on in a Foreign Service career who said I'm not here to associate with Americans, simply because if that's what I wanted to do, the gene pool at home is larger. So if I want to associate with Americans, I think I'll live in Arlington, Virginia and have American friends. I'm here to know something about the rest of the world. Whether that's altogether India or – I had a lot of German friends, I had a lot of British friends, I had Australian friends.

I mean, we were all kind of a broader international community, and I also reacted unhappily to this. A big post like India or Mexico where I later served can really have its little Americana section, and I think the joy of being a USIS officer was probably you couldn't do that job unless you were out. I mean, an admin officer, by definition sort of needs to stick close to whatever the assignment is, and a consular officer I have great sympathy for, because I think they have to interact, more than anybody else, obviously with people from the country where they're representing, but also in extremely difficult ways. Whereas, basically, a USIS officer might get into ideological arguments with somebody, but is there bringing goodies, whether it's a film or a speaker or a chance to go abroad or a book for the library.

So you're out in quite the nicest way, really trying to win friends and influence people. I spent as much time as I could out of the office. My social friends were not at the American embassy, and my work colleagues were at the Indian Institute of International Relations in different universities around the country.

Q: Did you feel a divide with the people you knew in the political class who were following the pro-Soviet line, or anti-American line?

COWAL: I don't think I was that involved in it, other than being at dinners at embassy residence or dinners at the PAO's house. We were always trying to engage people who didn't necessarily agree with us, who were the editors of the newspapers or the Foreign Ministry people. I had friends who I still have, but they were mostly, I would say, nongovernmental friends in India. One of our best friends was a dentist and is still there. Obviously, he is still there, he's an Indian, and I see him and his wife whenever I go, and we remain friends. I suppose of any country, if you walk away and 30 years later you've still got a half a dozen people that you would call friends and care about and who care about you, that may come down to being what it's all about, what a lot of it is all about.

I think I was always one of these people who threw myself passionately into wherever I was. I watched Foreign Service officers who more or less came in and said, "Well, it's an inbox and an outbox. So today it's an inbox and an outbox in New Delhi, and tomorrow it will be an inbox and an outbox in Islamabad, and not really a whole lot of difference here. I know what I'm doing. I'm professional, I'm good, I know how to do it, but I'm not going to let it really affect me."

It was always the opposite for me. I always threw myself into it as if there were no tomorrow, as if I were always going to be there. I mean, this was my life, and it was as if I were never going to leave, although I knew of course in some part of my mind that I was going to leave. So I really made friends with people in the community, just the way you make friends with anybody in Arlington, Virginia. You went to a swimming pool and you made friends, and you went to dinner and you made friends, and you did what you would normally do, and you made friends.

Q: Well, how did this work when Daniel Moynihan came as ambassador?

COWAL: Well, that was very interesting, watching a power struggle, essentially. Moynihan came and he – well, first of all, his name was Daniel Moynihan and my boss's name was Dan Alexi, and they were both like six-foot, five-inches tall. I think it was clear who was going to dominate, because I had the sense that my boss, among everybody on the country team, was the strongest person on that country team, in many ways. He was intellectually extremely bright, but he also had quite a forceful personality, and I wasn't a member of a country team until many years after that, so I was obviously never at a meeting. But I've been then, of course, a member of a lot of country teams and run some also, and it doesn't matter whether it's the military guy or the PAO or the ConGen (consulate general), there's usually somebody who emerges, maybe in opposition to the ambassador, maybe with the ambassador, but there's another power player there. And I think that was the head of USIS, which had its own operation and so on.

The first meeting that Moynihan had of this country team, which I suppose was the first or second day he was in Delhi, he immediately started on this idea that we should give back these rupees, because we had too many of them. It was sort of obscene, it was unseemly. We couldn't pretend that India was a sovereign country while we had all of these, and so on. So he expressed this as a point of view, and then he went around the table, because he wanted to know what every member of the country team thought about it.

When he got to my boss, my boss said he absolutely agreed with him, and that in fact he thought that given what U.S. policy was toward India, the fact that we had all of this money was misleading to the Indians in terms of how important they really were to us. It was clear that to Nixon and Kissinger they weren't very important, and yet the fact that we spent so much money in aid and we had a $10 million USIS budget and we had these huge things that we were doing, it really was unfair to the Indians, because it mislead them about our real interest in this country, which was pretty little at this point.

So he said, "I completely agree with you, and, in fact, last week in my Washington consultation, I made the decision to cut 10 percent of our staff, and Moynihan said, "You're cutting my staff?" And Dan said, "Well, sir, it's my program responsibility," and that was it. The meeting ended, apparently, on that note, and the ambassador gave him 72 hours to pack up and get out.

I watched from a pretty close-up view what I can only assume was a power struggle. Whether it did so infuriate the ambassador or whether he figured that the way you get to be the top dog is to immediately make sure everyone knows who's boss, and you won't tolerate, especially, the guy who might be the power center being there. It was quite a lesson.

Q: It must have been a real cold shock or whatever you want to call it to the entire embassy to have this.

COWAL: Right, and I can remember, of course, the meeting ended, the ambassador didn't say anything. Dan came back to our office and he had a deputy PAO and he had me and he had a couple of other people who were close to him, senior staff close to him. He called us in and he said, "Well, I've just had my first brush-up with the ambassador here." He said, "I don't know, I'll have to go see the old man and work it out." I think within an hour he had a call from the DCM, giving him this message, and nobody was going to buck the ambassador, so that's what happened, and it was pretty amazing.

I guess that was April, and I was supposed to leave in June and then go to language school, and I just decided that I wanted to leave sooner rather than later, that I didn't want to wait around for a new PAO to come.

Q: You really wouldn't have had a chance to do anything.

COWAL: No.

Q: People must have been huddled in the halls.

COWAL: Yes, they must have been. We were all just in such shock. Dan – our Dan – was a giant guy. He was a real leader and I guess he immediately picked up the phone and called the head of USIA, who I think by then was Jim Keogh, I think, and told him what had happened, but never bucked it. I mean, didn't say, "So you have to convince them." In those days, we said, "The ambassador is the head of the country team, and if the ambassador wants you out, you're out, and what's the point in trying to stay."

He said, "It will ruin USIS if I try to stay. What I need to do is get out so we'll make the deputy the acting PAO and I'll come home and I hope you'll have a job for me."

Q: What did he do?

COWAL: He became the head of the inspection corps for USIA. He's alive and living in Florida, and we're still in touch, but I don't think he ever really did anything of great note after that. I mean, it pretty much finished him. Those were the days when there was really no integration in the Foreign Service. I mean, the highest thing that a USIA officer could aspire to be was the PAO, and if you were the PAO in the biggest place, you had no where else to go, I mean, really. That was, I think, one of the best things about the integration of State and USIA is that it should give a little bit more recognition to some of the really extraordinary people who chose to make their careers in USIA, and that didn't happen in the '70s.

So he would have been a wonderful DCM, he would have been a wonderful ambassador, but that was just never in the cards. He never expected it to be and it never was. I think he probably worked another five years or so and then retired.

Q: Could you talk a little about the Indian members of USIS?

COWAL: Oh, gosh, terrific people, terrific people. USIS has its strange and wonderful complexities, because it seemed to me that as the American officers, we should always be prepared to tell our local staffs what it was we were trying to do, period, and then we needed very much to count on our local staffs to tell us who we needed to get that message to and how we would get it to them.

So, if I tell you that my job is to convince Indians that the U.S. economy is strong and vibrant, and that's one of my messages, the U.S. is number one, I would expect the Indian staff to be able to say, "Okay, if you really want to get that message across in India, the people who carry the economic message are the podiatrists,” or whatever it is, because when anybody goes to their foot doctors, that’s when they talk about economics – or the barbers, or whatever. But something that wouldn’t be obvious to you from the outside, necessarily – and you know that the one magazine that every podiatrist reads, or the one radio program that they all listen to is so and so. So this is your message, here’s who you have to get it to, and here’s how you’re going to get it to them.

I’ve always thought that, and it always worked extremely well for me, but I had the luxury of thinking that because we had in India a staff that was absolutely intellectually and educationally prepared to engage in that kind of a dialog. I think in many third world countries, one of the best things the American embassy has is its staff, because it’s usually regarded as a position of some prestige, and so in many countries, I thought our local staff was far better than our American staff, just because what are the alternatives to you as a middle-class person in India? Where do you go and work, for the Dodridge or for the American embassy? And an awful lot of people chose the American embassy, either because they idealistically believed in what we were trying to do, and I think many and most did, or because it was just a damn good place to work, competed very well with salaries and prestige offered anywhere else.

We had a number of spectacular people on the staff, and they were also your window on the world. To be a friend of Kamla Kapur’s, who was the librarian, and enormously savvy, had her master’s in library science from Cornell or something, but had been running this very prestigious American library for 25 years by the time I got there. There wasn’t a member of India’s intellectual elite who didn’t know who Kamla Kapur was, because she was their gateway to getting – before the Internet and stuff, people would call her routinely from the president’s office, or from the university or from the Foreign Ministry and say, “We absolutely need to get this speech that Henry Kissinger delivered. Kamla, can you help us?”

I mean, you could meet anybody you wanted through Kamla Kapur. One of the other things that I did was I was the PAO’s liaison to the senior Indian staff, and so I met with them I guess once a week or so, and we would have a dialog about what they thought about American policy, and how we could accomplish it, and how we could best get the message across, and what was good about the message, and what would never go over about the message. Again, that was a very important experience for me that carried me through my whole Foreign Service career, is where would I go for help and how would I learn. What was the crash course in learning what we were all about in Colombia or anywhere else – ah, it was the good people on your local staff. So we had spectacular people.

Q: Well, we’ll stop at this point and, next time, you’re leaving India in 1973 and you’re off to do what?

COWAL: To study Spanish and go to Colombia.

STEPHEN E. PALMER, JR.

Madras (1971-1973)

Stephen E. Palmer, Jr., was born in Superior, Wisconsin. He received a bachelor's degree from Princeton University in 1944. He immediately entered the U.S. Marine Corps, where he served as an education officer. He later received a master's degree from Columbia University. His Foreign Service career included positions in India, Yugoslavia, Cyprus, Israel, the United Kingdom, Pakistan, and Switzerland. Mr. Palmer was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on June 31, 1995.

Q: What was your impression during that time of the reporting of the outlook of our embassy in New Delhi?

PALMER: My recollection of it was that it was honest and fair, and they acknowledged that the Indians had utilized some stooges from East Pakistan. In fact, the bottom line for India was a weaker Pakistan, so that's what they were after, and that's what they got.

Q: Then you served in Madras from '71 to '73. Can you do a little compare and contrast what you noted up in the Pakistan capital. Here you were in a southern Indian major city. The attitudes of the people?

PALMER: First of all one has to differentiate between the north Indian's establishment which pretty much was reflected in their diplomats and their diplomacy, and the South Indians who were not as, if you will, nearly as nationalistic. Madras was an eye opener for me by virtue of its ethnic diversity and the innate friendliness of the people towards the United States. They were friendly towards everybody, they're a friendly people. And especially in the case of Madras and people from Kerala, striving for a high degree of education, competence in the arts, as well as in science. So it was a relatively, given my previous career, a quiet two years, a very different two years. My major responsibilities were public speaking and going all around south India calling on party leaders, prime ministers, chief secretaries, and cabinet officials of the four states in South India. A lot of time on the road. Very quiet, we never received any flash messages there. There were a lot of interesting things. It was a period of concentration on commercial expansion of the United States' concerns; there was quite a lot of emphasis on that and with some success.

I worked very closely with our able USIS people, who ran a successful press placement program, a thriving library, etc. We had just arrived in Madras -- having driven there from Islamabad via Delhi in our Volkswagen beetle -- when I was called up to greet Mahalia Jackson at the airport. The temperature and the humidity both were 100, and, tired from the trip, I half-fainted on the air strip. She gave a marvelous rendition of Christian gospel songs to a puzzled but appreciative Hindu audience.

There was interest, of course, in the Tamil separatists in Sri Lanka, some of whom we learned later were supported by the Indian government, the national government. My sources, including really close friends like the chief secretary of Tamil Nadu, were open about everything but that. If they knew, which is problematic, but that was really hard to get to. In any case, it wasn't as vividly a dangerous situation as it later became in Sri Lanka.

On the commercial promotion side, I well remember I was in Kerala calling on a whole bunch of ministers because there had been a cabinet reshuffle after a state election, including the Minister of Commerce who was one of the communist ministers. He was very friendly and we had a good general talk. I got some biographic information that we lacked on him. Then, he said, "Palmer, I want your help." I said, "What can we do?" "I want a razor blade factory, but I want American razor blade factory, I don't want any Russian, they're no good. We've got to have American razor blade factory." I put him in touch with Joe Gillette. I don't think they came to a deal, but what was significant was that this communist minister was reaching out for American investments.

Q: Kerala all that time was our concern because it had a communist government.

PALMER: Yes. Sometimes the chief minister was a communist, and sometimes he wasn't. There was a great deal of flux in their shifting among the various factions. There were at least two significant communist factions, one of which was deemed to be pro-Soviet, and the other was deemed to be pro-Chinese. At least we in the post in Madras, and New Delhi also, never regarded the Kerala communists as any seriously inimical to our interests.

Q: Were you there when, or maybe you were just coming, when there was the famous tilt towards Pakistan of sending the aircraft Enterprise into the Gulf of Bengal?

PALMER: It was not long after I arrived, and that was the occasion of the first, and only, demonstration against the consulate during my two years there. We were warned by I guess the chief secretary, or maybe the senior police official, probably the latter, that there would be a demonstration and that he would ensure proper protection. So we buttoned up the place -- it was during working hours -- and we didn't send people home, but we asked the public to leave the USIS library which was part of the same building complex. This demonstration approached, we could hear some shouting and I was looking down from a second story window. It was a straggly bunch, there may have been 15 people, they had a placard or two, and they were shouting about American imperialism. One of them came up to the steps and the embassy admin officer said, "If they want to talk we should receive them." And they wanted to talk. I didn't go down but the political officer went down, and they had a little friendly debate and the demonstrators wandered off. That was the big demonstration, in contrast to the sort of thing that happens in Delhi.

Q: What was your impression of our embassy in Delhi, and what they wanted out of you? Keating, was he the ambassador?

PALMER: He was, but then he was replaced not too long after I arrived by Moynihan. He was a very colorful chief of mission. He visited us in Madras, had quite substantive visits, stayed with us a couple of days and a couple of nights. He and I were mutual admirers, you might say, and we got along well. The embassy gave all of its consuls general a great deal of autonomy. I think for one thing, the distance was so great. And another thing as far as Madras was concerned, unless there were important state elections coming up, or a navy visit, or something like that, it was off the radar screen pretty much. The embassy was always very supportive. Galen Stone was the DCM, and he was very supportive and helpful. So we had a great relationship. Again, I visited the other GCS, and my Calcutta colleague visited me, so we could all appreciate each other's problems a little better.

A footnote on Madras. Service in South India was not without health risks. I was afflicted by something which gave me considerable pain and discomfort in my right torso. Our local consulting physician diagnosed it as a muscle spasm. But while I was on a short field trip in Andhra Pradesh, I began to feel really rotten. My driver perceived that I was quite ill and took me to a hospital in Vellore, Tamil Nadu, which had been established by missionaries. There a bright doctor from Kerala diagnosed it as schistosomiasis, which had eaten away some of my insides. He prescribed the right drugs. While I was recovering at home in Madras, our temporary secretary -- the wife of the admin officer -- brought out classified materials. Much later, she told me that she found me to be very cranky. Years later, however, after unrelated divorces, she consented to marry me.

BETTY JANE JONES
Calcutta (1971-1974)

Betty Jane Jones was born and raised in Wisconsin. She majored in government at Beloit College and entered the Foreign Service in 1954. Her career included positions in Italy, Germany, India, Israel, the United Kingdom (England), and assignments related to the United Nations in Washington, DC and New York. This interview was conducted on March 8, 1993.

Q: Well, let's get back to Calcutta. You were there during the period when East Pakistan peeled off from Pakistan proper. How did that play at the Consulate General level?

JONES: We were in a very interesting position because, of course, the Bengalis in West Bengal, where we were, were very sympathetic to East Bengal. We also had all of the thousands of refugees in our consular district. They poured over from the east mainly into West Bengal, and it was a tremendous job to deal with them, to house them and feed them. I rather admired the Indians, how they handled it. Because we would have felt that they had to have much more elaborate set ups for this, whereas the Indians were prepared to do it in such a way that provided the minimal, but did take care of them. In Calcutta, I was head of the Economic Section, and in that connection got involved in some of the aid that we provided during that period. We would meet with the Indian officer who was in charge of assessing the requirements. There were other consulates there who were involved also. We would report what the situation was. I went to the airport many times to meet shipments when they came in to be sure that they were received and dealt with adequately. I also toured the refugee camps with many visiting VIPs. The upheaval was tremendous. Of course, after the war, the Indians made no bones about it. They wanted these people to go back. Many of course wanted to go back, but there was no question that West Bengal, which still had refugees from the days of partition, didn't want any more. We were not very popular at the time, because the government supported Pakistan as an ally. The U.S. was quite supportive of Pakistan to the extent that the Indians felt that we were one-sided and although our personal relations with people were OK, you did hear about it periodically. There were some demonstrations at the USIS library, but nothing that ever caused us any real difficulty.

Q: Were you given any instructions from our Embassy in New Delhi on this? You were doing your bit with the refugees...

JONES: Yes. We also had a window on the situation because there were many correspondents and journalists who came to cover this, and of course the border was a sieve. They would go over and we had no means...

Q: Our consulate had closed in Dacca at that point? We evacuated...

JONES: I know we evacuated some people because some of them came. I don't remember if it was closed entirely. It may have been. I think it was. Because we had two evacuations. One from Chittagong by ship, and one when they flew people out from Dacca to Calcutta. We took care of them before they moved on. These journalists would go over, and then they would come and talk to us, and we could then report on what they had to say on what the situation was. So that was an interesting aspect of it. But sympathies certainly were all with the Bengalis. It was felt that the Pakistanis had stolen the elections and that the right was all on the side of what became the Bangladeshis.

Q: You left Calcutta, and that war just in time to go to Jerusalem. People must have been thinking of you as Typhoid Mary?

JONES: Even funnier than that was the Ambassador in India was Ambassador Keating and he moved from there to Israel. In fact, he said to me one day: "Everywhere we go, they seem to have a war." Yes, I went on a direct transfer to Jerusalem.

HERBERT E. WEINER
Labor Counselor
New Delhi (1971-1975)

Herbert E. Weiner is from the Bronx, New York. He was a teacher in Brooklyn, New York before entering the U.S. Army. His career included positions in India, the United Kingdom, and Australia. Mr. Weiner was interviewed on June 18, 1991 by Robert Schrader.

Q: Okay, Herb, now that you have given us some indication of what was the role and the function in your earliest experience, how would you compare or contrast that with your assignments in later years as the labor function became a more established part of regular Foreign Service operations?

WEINER: Subsequently as the labor function became more established and better known, it started to run into some bureaucratic problems. In a subsequent assignment in Sydney for example we had no real place for the Labor Attaché in either the Political or the Economic Section. So I still functioned largely on my own, and functioned relatively freely. But as the issues became better known other sections started to get involved. The Commercial Section would start to get involved; the Political Officer would start to get involved in issues; there was this overlapping, and sometimes there was friction over who did what; so the Labor Attaché had to establish a sort of unique relationship with the head of the particular mission if you will. In my case in Sydney it was with the Consul General. In subsequent years over a period of time the Labor Attaché became more and more oriented towards the political section. Sometimes for bureaucratic reasons and other times largely because the issues that were dominant in his field were political, he began to be moved into the Political Section. Some Labor Attachés saw this as an advantage because this gave them, they thought, more clout because the Political Sections were usually the more powerful sections in the Embassy. At the same time in subsequent years I found this restricting. For example in New Delhi I found that what happened was that as political officers tried to limit the Labor Attaché into specific labor-political issues the Labor Attaché's function was beginning to get a little bit squeezed. Labor-political issues were not clearly all party political, the more familiar framework to some political counselors. Labor issues frequently crossed all lines - economic, political, as well as technical lines. And so in many situations the labor function really did not fit, or fitted very uneasily, into an orthodox embassy Political Section. In my case in New Delhi the Ambassador really decided the scope and the implications of what the Labor Attaché did - in New Delhi called Labor Counselor - was just too broad for any one section. So the Labor Attaché was moved from the Political Section into the Ambassador's Section and was directly responsible to the DCM (Minister) and to the Ambassador with his own representational budget and his own bureaucratic responsibilities; and his own authority to act on somewhat the same level as the Political and Economic Counselor; but that was not generally the case in embassies.

Q: Now, Herb, you have talked about relations with other elements of the Foreign Service establishment in the embassy. Do you have anything to say about your own experience with other U.S. Government agencies that were a part of the U.S. mission operation in the countries in which you served?

WEINER: Well, in addition to the embassy there were the other agencies which had a labor interest. There was AID (Agency for International Development); there was the USIS (United States Information Service); and there was the CIA (Central Intelligence Agency); and there were also often other agencies beyond these when you got into places like India where we had vast assistance programs in the health field, and we got involved with HEW people, where you would get involved with some Treasury people who were concerned with monetary policy and so forth. In the technical assistance field, particularly as I recall it in India, we had very large labor programs. As a result the Labor Attaché or Labor Counselor, as he was known there, in a sense became an advisor to these and other AID programs, generally at the embassy policy level. These would be training programs such as sending people to the United States for training in technical skills, or bringing labor practitioners to India to run all sorts of training programs, say in labor education, labor-management cooperation, disputes settlement, productivity improvement, etc. The Labor Attaché was even involved as an advisor obtaining union-management cooperation in the AID programs for birth control and family planning. That came to be accepted because although you had labor officers in AID technical programs there were often general political and economic implications in AID programs. Since the Labor Counselor was in the Ambassador's office he frequently had the ear of the Minister or the Ambassador on the broader implications of these issues. In the case of USIS, the Labor Counselor nominated people to come to the United States, particularly under the international visitor program as a way of building affinity between the United States and the host country; and also arranged for others traveling under other auspices, e.g. the ILO, to visit and establish relationships in the U.S. This would often come down to the question of selecting leading trade union figures, people interested in labor affairs in academia or in the government, as well as employers and managers, to visit the United States to look at American labor practice and get an understanding of American politics and history. In other words, the Labor Counselor was engaged in a multifaceted effort of trying to generally orient his host country labor community into the way the United States looked at the world, the way its democracy functions, the way labor-management relations were conducted, the attitudes of the United States to the host country and so forth. This became very important because it was hoped that people who visited the United States would, over time, become leaders in their communities with personal relationships in the U.S. and thereby develop a sympathetic understanding of the U.S. Yet, there was a rather delicate element the Labor Attaché faced. Because of the nature of the Cold War there was a tendency in other countries, particularly in less developed areas, well, even in Western Europe and in Britain, to see spies all over the place. This was sort of a general attitude. There was a tendency to see conspiracies, and to see the CIA behind everything; in India this included among some the failure of the monsoon. Together with this there was also a tendency to appear even-handed politically by equating the KGB and the CIA and the U.S. and the USSR as simple political competitors, rather than as protagonists of democracy vs. dictatorship.

Because the Labor Attaché was functioning in a non-governmental area and nobody was quite sure what his function was, there was a tendency to think of labor attachés as spies or CIA agents. Local communist parties would feed or generate these suspicions about labor attachés as part of a Cold War tactic. In my personal experience, I have never worked with the CIA; never had anything to do with it. I had enough on my plate to take care of what I saw as my own work. From time to time I might have known who the CIA station chief was. But I can honestly say that I never had a real working relationship with one, and we used to be very careful to keep to our own patches to avoid any semblance of working cooperatively, working in tandem, or being a working team of any sort.

ROBER SCHRADER
Labor Officer
New Delhi (1971-1975)

Roger Schrader has also served in New Zealand and The United Kingdom. He was interviewed on June 18, 1991 by Herbert Weiner.

Q: Roger, there were a couple of incidents which were extremely important, I think crucial, in which I was involved. One was our relationship with India while I was Labor Counselor in India in the early 70's. This was when the Nixon Administration implemented the U.S. opening to the People's Republic of China and the period when the Indians, and Mrs. Gandhi in particular, who took it very personally, resented the American "tilt" toward Pakistan. Traditionally and historically the Indian role and the impact on its non-alignment policy had been related to its relationships to China and the Soviet Union. India saw itself as getting on with the Soviet Union as a counterpoise to its relationship with China. When Secretary Kissinger had developed with President Nixon the opening to China and preparations were underway for President Nixon and Kissinger to go to China and when they stopped off in Pakistan, India's bete noire, in the process as far as the Indians were concerned good relationships with the United States were practically at an end. AID programs began getting closed down, not on an American initiative, but rather by Mrs. Gandhi herself. As a matter of fact we kept the AID mission almost intact for almost a year after the Indo-Pak War of 1971. The Indian Government sharply began to cut back acceptance of U.S. aid or cooperative working relationships with U.S. officials. The interesting thing about this was that at that time the AFL-CIO took a position, which while not absolving Mrs. Gandhi for what her attitudes were toward the United States and the Soviet Union, was one that the Indians and Mrs. Gandhi saw as being somewhat understanding of India's bitter reaction to U.S.-Pakistan cooperation in the "opening to China". In the end as a result of this the only really effective link between the United States and India was at the trade union level. For example grants for other than trade unionists were not accepted by the Indian Government. The Indian authorities made it difficult for these people to get the exit permits to leave the country, but Indian officials used to say that, well, at least the American trade unionists understand them. So the labor link became one of the more essential links, and the only channel for expressing American views on issues in India. This was essentially done through the Indian National Trade Union Congress and the AFL-CIO.

Subsequently during my tour in London, which preceded Roger Schrader's, a different issue came up which persisted for a long time. As Roger has pointed out there was considerable left wing agitation in the British labor movement over cruise missiles and particularly nuclear testing and the CND (the Committee for Nuclear Disarmament) was quite active and quite vocal. This went hand in hand with a general decline in the influence of the Labour Party at the time. The Labour Party lost an election very badly in November 1979 after a long period in power, and there was a general feeling in the electorate that ran against the trade unions for a whole host of reasons. Mainly this popular feeling crystallized around the issue that trade union power had become excessive, and Mrs. Thatcher developed it effectively as a political issue in her election campaign. This raised a much larger issue that persisted for almost a dozen years afterwards, which actually involved the leadership of Neil Kinnock as leader of the Labor Party, who had been a unilateral nuclear disarmer. Feelings began to develop in the U.S., particularly those with a policy interest in the subject, that possibly the special relationship between Britain and the United States would be weakened significantly if a Labor Government were elected. This was a new development that had never existed before in my experience since World War II. Britain and the United States had been seen in both countries as the closest allies; and, now in the 1980's for the first time, one could say that there were feelings of serious concern in the United States, even among people even who were considered visceral friends of British labor, and had had long held feelings toward the British labor movement, over what would happen to the relationship with the United States under a Labour Government. This has been to a large extent since alleviated with the movement of the Labour Party and the trade union movement closer to the political center. But throughout this period from my arrival in August 1977 until I left on October 26, 1980, the general focus of the Labor Attaché was the question of where Britain would stand if there were a Labour Government and where it would stand on the issue of unilateral nuclear disarmament.

Although the AFL-CIO (and its predecessor AFL) and the British Trade Union Congress have had formal fraternal relations since 1895, there were serious strains between the two since World War II over East-West relations and labor contact. The AFL-CIO eschewed any dealings with Communist controlled labor fronts, while British unions leaned toward "contact" for a variety of reasons. However, by 1979 after some delicate minuets on both sides the TUC sent a high level economic delegation to the AFL-CIO breaking the ice. The idea was to discuss important economic issues which faced both of them and resume a useful dialogue between the world's two largest free trade union centers, while avoiding the strains generated by the politics of how to deal with the "Cold War" in the international labor arena.

SCHRADER: The development of this particular issue had a spin-off in terms of the relationship between the British trade union movement and the AFL-CIO in the United States. During this period many of the leaders and significant elements in the British trade union movement were adamantly opposed not only to the foreign policy and defense policy of the Thatcher Government, but of the United States and of the NATO countries. The AFL-CIO was seen by many of these elements as a strong and staunch supporter of these issues and that perception was which was real caused a considerable freeze in the relationships between the two organizations. During the time that I was there in the early years this began to thaw with the exchange of delegations which was instituted by the AFL-CIO and the TUC at the level of the respective economic committees of the two organizations. This was done principally because both sides, that was elements of both sides who wanted to continue the relationship and rebuild it realized that there were so many frictions on the political issues that there really would be no incentive for discussions to take place at that level simply because there would be so much disagreement on the basic issues. The wiser heads on both sides decided that the better choice would be to get together on economic issues and to discuss these. This was continued during the first year that I was in London with some success. The existence of an American trade union fraternal delegate at the annual TUC Conference persisted during this whole period. It was not shut off at least during my time there. However, there were some pretty uneasy situations where the AFL-CIO representative was confronted with either large blocks of delegates walking out of the conference hall or lack of applause and in some case boos about things that this person would say, so the relationship was a very uneasy one during these years caused in large part by the hard left's view or antagonism towards the views of the AFL-CIO on foreign policy and defense issues, with which both the United States Government and the British Government under Thatcher were in pretty solid agreement.

Q: This concludes the recollections of Roger Schrader and Herbert Weiner on the origins of the Labor Attaché Program, the significance it played in our diplomatic activities at posts where we were assigned and some of the major issues with which we were confronted of greater or lesser significance. We may add to this in the future but at this point we have run out of talk.

ARCHIE M. BOLSTER
Ambassador's Executive Assistant
New Delhi (1972-1974)

Archie M. Bolster was born in Iowa in 1933. He received his BA from the University of Virginia and served in the U.S. Navy from 1955 to 1958 as an overseas lieutenant. His foreign postings included Cambodia, Tabriz, Tehran, New Delhi and Antwerp. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on January 24, 1992.

Q: Then you went to New Delhi for two years. What were you doing there?

BOLSTER: I was the executive assistant to the Ambassador and then worked subsequently in the political section.

Q: Who was the Ambassador you were working for?

BOLSTER: I was actually working for the Chargé d'Affaires because just before I went out to India, Keating, who had been the Ambassador, resigned and came back to the States. So I worked for the Chargé who was Galen Stone. I found India just a fascinating place, again for some of the same things I had been studying...land reform, agricultural reform. The chance to learn a little bit about that was interesting.

Q: You arrived just after the last major Indo-Pak war. Wasn't that so?

BOLSTER: Yes.

Q: The one in 1971 fought over Bangladesh. How was that playing out when you were there?

BOLSTER: Well, there was a lot of criticism of the US because we had sent the carrier, Enterprise up into the...

Q: This was our tilt towards Pakistan as Kissinger put it.

BOLSTER: Yes, that was brought up all the time by the Indians. There was just a litany of complaints about that. It was a bit of a difficult time because everything that we did was scrutinized so carefully to see again if we were still tilting. No matter what we said there was something wrong with it.

Of course, if we were too friendly with the Indians we would get complaints at our Embassy in Islamabad that we were tilting towards India now. Any conversation you had in India seemed to eventually lead to the Indo-Pak differences in one way or another.

Q: It sounds sort of like Israel and the Arab world.

BOLSTER: Yes. It really is. I felt there was a tendency to consciously play off Americans against the Soviets. The Indians made such a show of being friendly to the Soviets during this period. The President of the Soviet Union came to visit. Mrs. Gandhi went to Moscow. There were quite a few visits and agreements back and forth. It seemed that the Indians were trying to tell us that despite all we had done for them don't think they are in our pocket.

Q: Developing a close relationship with the Soviet Union in a way looking at it even at the times basically was unnatural. I mean here is a democracy wrestling with the problems of a huge country all split up and all and yet trying to appear close to what was a totalitarian empire. A completely different system.

BOLSTER: True but the relationship was a counter weight to China too because there was the fighting on the border in 1962 with the Chinese. So that was still in the Indian mind too. They needed Soviet ties as a balance against China. If the Chinese again thought of doing anything along the border they would know the Soviets would help India. So it was part of the great power balancing game again.

But it was also a time when the US was winding down its AID program. I always loved the play on words that Ambassador Moynihan used when he came later...I, of course, was working for and under him. He called the fact that we had had this AID program which was now declining, but just at the time that we were declining. We had this enormous AID complex that was built out there away from the city that had apartments, offices, bowling alley, etc. He called this the "edifice complex"; when a program is declining it gets enormous buildings. Then we had to decide what to do with these buildings because they were only partly used and the program was winding down. So eventually we worked out a way to present it to the Indians to be used by them.

We also during his time handed back the largest amount of foreign exchange ever transmitted in one check which was surplus rupees that were turned back to the Indians. By giving them aid for which people...they used the aid to buy tractors and people paid for the tractors and all these rupees that paid for the tractor purchase with USAID was then put into a fund to be used in joint projects of the Indian and US governments. Particularly for developments in India but also for...we purchased all kinds of furniture and...

Q: Oh, I remember we were all told to try to buy tickets through our rupee fund.

BOLSTER: Yes, that is right. We tried every way we could possibly think to use the money. But there were billions of dollars in rupees that could never be used. So Moynihan worked out a way to hand back most of these rupees to the Indian government. In effect saying that you don't need to worry that we are going to demand dollars for these, you just have them back. This will erase one of the problems overhanging our relationship. So that was done when I was there.

Q: What was your impression...Moynihan was one of these, now a Senator, who had been Ambassador to the United Nations and had joined a host of other American Ambassadors who are basically political appointees who found India a delightful stage, or appeared to be, to demonstrate their, among other things, their ego. How did you find Moynihan as an Ambassador?

BOLSTER: Well he thoroughly enjoyed his tour there, I think, because he is always provocative and has so many ideas. He is a really intellectual giant. He benefitted greatly from being in India, just absorbing information about this fascinating country and the surrounding area. He visited other countries. He went to Bhutan, Nepal. He did a lot of traveling and, I think, learned a tremendous amount while he was there.

I think he was a bit frustrated, particularly at the beginning because whatever he said might be picked apart by the local press, so he began to have a very low profile after his first few weeks and months there. He wanted to be in a learning mode and not rock the boat. But then he gradually became more influential.

But I think he found it a little bit tough to deal with Indians because they were so unpredictable as to how they would react to things and not necessarily open to a typical Irish warm embrace. They are very aloof in some ways and have their own way of doing things and don't want to be pressured or pushed into doing things our way.

So it was a bit of a trial for him in that sense, but he did learn a lot during the time he was there.

Q: Did we have any major issues or problems during this period of time when you were there?

BOLSTER: Yes, we certainly had one which was the explosion of a nuclear weapon by the Indians before I left. That was a major development. Aside from that I don't think there were any really serious problems. There was the constant reiteration of problems over relations with Pakistan. Every time something was going to be done for one country or the other, there was criticism in the other country. Every year when we had to make decisions about military assistance there were the debates of who was getting more, who was going to have the upper hand, etc. So there were constant problems like this, but it just became something you got used to because it was constantly there.

Q: There has been this saying that as far as India and Pakistan are concerned that when the Democrats are in they are more Indian and when the Republicans are in they are more Pakistani. Did you have any feel that there was more of an affinity of one of our Presidents from one Party or other for one or the other side?

BOLSTER: Not really. Of course, you would have to say that Moynihan is an example of someone who is going back and forth. He worked for Democratic and Republican Presidents.

Q: And now he is a Democratic Senator.

BOLSTER: Of course there were major developments back here in the domestic political scene that had their echoes out there. The Watergate scandal had occurred and this was debated everywhere, but particularly in India because as a democracy and with particular interest in Britain and the US, they analyzed every tiny detail.

Q: Did they understand the Watergate business? I was in Greece at the time and they really never understood what the fuss was about.

BOLSTER: Oh, I don't think most people understood it, no. Not really.

Q: I am not saying understood all the complications, but why the Americans should get so upset over a president lying and doing a little bit of political espionage.

BOLSTER: Yes, that was considered to be sort of a typical American overreaction. But it did have quite an effect on us in the Embassy because it was such a major issue coming up all the time.

Q: Had the recognition of China already happened before you arrived? The Kissinger trip and then the Nixon trip used Pakistan as sort of a channel.

BOLSTER: Yes, I think that had happened. There was a lot of eyebrow raising on that...

Q: Because you were pushing two buttons, China and Pakistan, on that one.

BOLSTER: Yes. But then again I think the Indians always felt it was unnatural for us not to have had relations with China anyway. They had their problems with China over this border issue, but I think they still thought that it was strange that we for so long had cut ourselves off from the Chinese.

Q: Sometimes there is a policy or view of the situation in Washington which is quite different from the view at the Embassy. Did you have any problem like that?

BOLSTER: No, I think if anything people in the Embassy were unhappy that so little was thought about India in Washington. India was such a big country and had been so important and we had big names as Ambassadors in the past, sent large Embassy staffs... There was gradually a sort of feeling that India was being ignored back in Washington no matter was being reported. It was sort of in one ear and out the other.

Q: I assume this still remains the case today?

BOLSTER: All these speeches about wonderful relations between the two main democracies, etc. were constant fixtures in speeches but in plain fact India was becoming less important to the US by the day. It affected relationships a great deal.

Also against the background of the Vietnam War...we have to look at that too because the Indians were very much opposed to our involvement in Vietnam. There was constant criticism of our fighting there. We had demonstrations at the Embassy.

Q: Did you find that a reporting cable would go out from Islamabad and then it would be almost necessary for New Delhi to send out its cable? In a way the Embassies really were almost like foreign powers instead of representing the same United States.

BOLSTER: Yes that is right. It was more than just India, Pakistan and the US because you would get Ambassadors in other countries weighing in. Tehran, for example, had views. Sri Lanka had views, although, of course, less important in the big picture. People in Moscow would come in with their analysis of the situation. You sometimes would get a dozen info addressees on cables and files were just filled with analyses from all these posts. But I think that is a typical problem in our Foreign Service. We tend to get too many different views from all over the place. Everyone wants to get into the act and you end up with a tremendous number of cables flying back and forth. People hardly have time to read it all there is so much material.

Q: Then you left from there and from 1974-76 went back to Tehran again.

BOLSTER: Yes.

CHARLES W. McCASKILL
Economic Commercial Officer
Bombay (1972-1976)

Madras (1976-1979)

Charles W. McCaskill was born in Camden, South Carolina in 1923. After completing two years of study at the Citadel, he entered the U.S. Army, and returned to graduate in 1947. Mr. McCaskill then attended the University of South Carolina, where he received a master's degree in history and political science. He joined the Foreign Service in 1950, serving in Germany, Greece, Cyprus, Iran, and India. Mr. McCaskill was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 7, 1993.

Q: I must say I've never known anybody who really stuck to one area, Near Eastern Affairs, as you did the entire time. And you really covered it. You went to Bombay, 1972 to 1976. What about this assignment?

McCASKILL: I had completed four years in Iran, and the Department informed me that the Number Two job in the Consulate General there was open and asked if I would like to be assigned there. It was considered a pretty good job. This was before open assignments, when things were much easier I thought. I accepted and went there in July of 1972 on direct transfer from Iran.

While I went on direct transfer, the Department authorized some consultation in Washington which enabled me to visit my mother who died before I would have gotten home on leave the next year. This was one of the reasons I loved NEA; we may have been in-bred and incestuous, but NEA looked out for its own. I think Howie Schaffer, who was NEA Personnel Officer at the time, was behind it. I have never discussed it with him, but I have always been grateful to him or whoever did it.

To get back to Bombay, the job turned out to be a good job, and we stayed there until March, 1976 when I went over to Madras as Consul General.

Q: What were you doing in Bombay?

McCASKILL: I was economic-commercial, but more economic than commercial, since we had a full-time commercial officer. It was a relatively big consulate general, and I backed up the Consul General in many ways. I helped supervise the consular section sometime, since we had lots of consular work there. The job was really a Deputy Principal Officer job, and I believe it was actually called that before I left.

Q: Who was Consul General most of the time?

McCASKILL: David Bane for about half of my tour. He was succeeded by Bill Courtney. David had been Ambassador in Gabon, and before that Consul General in Lahore. He told me he thought the Bombay job was underrated. Bombay was an exciting city in which to serve: big, dirty, crowded, filthy, but exciting and fascinating with lots of interesting people who were easily accessible.

Q: What was the situation in Western India at the time you were there?

McCASKILL: Things were not altogether easy for Americans then. Remember that this was just after the Indo-Pak War in 1971, when the U.S. tilted toward Pakistan.

Q: This was Kissinger's famous tilt toward Pakistan.

McCASKILL: Yes. You may remember that the Soviets rushed in in support of the Indians. There was considerable anti-Americanism all over India. Still we could get around and see people. The Indians had a way of giving us the needle whenever they could; they professed not to understand how we could support Pakistan over India, "the largest democracy in the world." They never let us forget that. And Soviet influence was strong.

Q: You say that Soviet influence was strong. Who was the Prime Minister?

McCASKILL: Indira Gandhi.

Q: I would have thought that the mating of India and the Soviet Union an unlikely one.

McCASKILL: It was an unlikely mating, but the Soviets were quick to exploit the situation. For example, India had been in the midst of a severe drought when I arrived. The monsoon had not been good, and the wheat and rice crops had both been off for a number of years. The so-called

"Green Revolution" had not yet taken hold and India needed wheat rather badly. Who provided this wheat? The Soviet Union. And at a time when the Soviets were buying wheat from us. A Greek merchant captain whose ship brought "Soviet" grain to India told me in Bombay that he was certain that the wheat being shipped to India from the Soviet Union was American wheat. We did not pursue this since but it is an interesting question. He told me he had seen American ships unloading American wheat into the same facility out of which he loaded wheat for India. Indira Gandhi publicly stated that the Soviets were always a friend in need for India. When India needed friends in 1971, she said, and the Soviets were there. By the time I got there, the Soviets were the principal arms supplier for India, whether by grant or on credit. The huge steel mill in eastern India was built by the Soviets. It served the Indians right, but I understood from some Indian business friends that India got old, outdated technology in the steel mill. You'd see Soviet missions of various kinds all over the country.

Q: Were the Indian intellectuals comfortable? Were the people you talked to comfortable with talking about their great brother, the Soviets?

McCASKILL: The people we socialized with did not see a lot of the Soviets. The Indian educated elite much preferred Americans to Soviets, there was no doubt of that. But journalists, for example, felt comfortable with Soviets and with the Indo-Soviet friendship. I will tell you an interesting anecdote that illustrates Indian thinking.

I was having lunch one day with the editor of an Indian paper in Bombay, a very nice, likeable man supposedly very close to Indira Gandhi. He said to me that we Americans had never understood nonalignment. Americans had always felt that nonalignment means being equidistant from the great powers, being, in fact, in the middle. Indians felt that nonalignment did not mean equal distance between the great powers and that, in fact, "you can be more equidistant or less equidistant." I know what he meant, but it struck me at the time as rather humorous and typical of the fuzzy wuzzy way Indians tended to think -- more equidistant or less equidistant!!

Q: Particularly in the upper classes the Indians enjoy talking. Was this a strain sometimes? As a consular officer did you find things got talked to death?

McCASKILL: No. Indians were really very good conversationalists, very good company, if more than a little self-righteous and insensitive at times. As I think I noted, upper class Indians felt much closer to the United States than to the Soviet Union and the Soviets. Upper class Indians liked good food, good conversation and good company. But, as I said, they could be insensitive and even rude.

One evening at a lovely dinner party, shortly after we had arrived in Bombay, a young Parsi doctor was telling me, in perfect English, how much he and his wife loved the U.S. They loved the U.S. and the American people he said, but "I don't like your President very much." I was so taken aback by this that I didn't defend my President adequately, and it bothered me. It never dawned on him that it was rude of him to say something like that to an American diplomat.

While I never had the occasion to use it, I decided that if another Indian ever said that to me, I would reply that I knew lots of Americans who loved India and the Indian people, but didn't like Indira Gandhi very much.

Still, we left more good, close friends in India than we did in any of our other posts, so I may be the one who is being insensitive here.

Q: You were there during the Watergate period. Was there understanding of what it was all about. I was in Greece at the time and the Greeks never understood what Watergate was about.

McCASKILL: The Indians did not understand Watergate. Most Indian politicians are corrupt, so they could not understand what Watergate was all about.

Q: Watergate was sort of small potatoes from most other countries' point of view.

McCASKILL: As big as India is, it could be terribly parochial in many ways. India bought some feed grains from us in late 1973 or thereabouts, and found that one shipment had Jimsonweed in it. Jimsonweed, known as "loco weed" in the American West, is poisonous to humans. Indians bought the grain for human consumption, so people receiving it had to pick out every grain of the Jimsonweed before they could eat it. This received a tremendous play in the press all over India, with the press implying if not stating openly that we had taken the Indians on this or that we had had some evil motive in selling India grain that was laced with Jimsonweed.

In fact, India had bought very cheap, inferior feed grains which were known to our grain people in the States to contain Jimsonweed. The GOI had cut corners and was then trying to blame us for what happened. It was a good example of getting what you pay for. That is the kind of thing that would get a tremendous press play in India, while Watergate received no attention.

Q: Did the ConGen staff adopt a wait-and-see, "this too shall pass" attitude at this time. These things come and go with Indo-American relations.

McCASKILL. I think we did, since things seemed to be improving. But Mrs. Gandhi never really liked us, and we had that to contend with.

Q: How did we view the Communist Party? Did we see the communists ever taking over India?

McCASKILL: No. The party was there and from time to time would lead demonstrations by the consulate protesting such things as the Allende ouster in Chile. We would always close the gates when demonstrations occurred and disregard the demonstrators. Once when I was in charge the young Political Officer suggested that we accept the demonstrators' petition. I think it was one of those "Allende" demonstrations. I refused to accept it on the ground that accepting it would imply involvement that we were not guilty of. The Embassy telephoned down to ask how I was handling it and agreed entirely with my approach.

There were actually two communist parties in India: the CPI, the Communist Party of India, the "usual" type party, and the Marxist party, the CPM.

*Q: Patrick Moynihan was the Ambassador for a while when you were there. Did you get any feel for how he operated?
Or was he too far away?*

McCASKILL: I need not say that Ambassador Moynihan was and is a great mind, admired far and near for his great intellect. But he was a difficult man to work for. I knew his staff aide rather well, and he told me just how unpredictable, how volatile Moynihan was. It was impossible for the staff aide to predict his reactions. I think his main goal when he went to India was to negotiate the Indian indebtedness to us off the books. I've forgotten the precise figure, but on the books, we had something like 2-3 billion dollars of PL 480 money. Moynihan felt that our relations with India would never improve as long as the Indians felt indebted to us. It was a tough negotiation, but it was a successful one and he and the economic staff of the Embassy deserved a lot of credit.

Indians liked him because they saw him as a real intellectual. But on the personal side, being in Bombay was about as close as I wanted to be to him, 3-4 hours away by air.

Q: We are continuing November 11, 1993. You were in Madras from 1976 to 1979. What were you doing there?

McCASKILL: I was Consul General in Madras. The previous incumbent, Jack Eaves, left rather suddenly to become DCM in Kathmandu. When Jack left, Ambassador Saxbe, who had replaced Moynihan, asked me to go to Madras as CG. I was ready to leave Bombay, and I felt that South India was sufficiently different from Western India that it would be like a new assignment. And of course there was the satisfaction of going from Number Two to Number One.

Q: How did you find your staff there?

McCASKILL: The American staff when I arrived there was adequate, with some strong points and some weak ones. The young administrative officer was quite good, the best member of the staff. The Indian national staff was outstanding, easily the best national staff of my career.

Q: We're talking about 1976 to 1979. Could you tell me in the first place what your consular district covered? And what was the situation, economic and political?

McCASKILL: The Madras Consular District consisted of four states: Tamil Nadu, Andhra Pradesh, Karnataka, and Kerala. Each had its separate language. At the time of my transfer, Tamil Nadu was governed from Delhi, under what was called "President's Rule". The leader of the regional party in power in Tamil Nadu was at odds with Mrs. Gandhi and she summarily dismissed him and initiated rule of the state from Delhi.

This was during the period of the "Emergency", the suspension of parliamentary government in India and rule by Indira Gandhi. This authoritarian rule, for which "The Emergency" was a euphemism, had been imposed in 1975 by Mrs. Gandhi, when she took the full rule of the country into her hands, really executing a bloodless coup. This was a very dark day for India. I should point out that "President's Rule", under which the government in Delhi could dismiss a state government, did not start with the Emergency; I do not know its history, but it is the kind of thing that could come from the Brits.

Anyway, when I arrived in Madras, Tamil Nadu was under President's Rule. There were two men from Delhi, very senior career civil servants, actually running the state. I established rather good contacts with one of them, an excellent man by the name of P. K. Dave, as I mentioned a senior career government official.

The consular district had a population of 150 million people. Andhra Pradesh and Karnataka were generally in Mrs. Gandhi's camp (Mrs. Gandhi's party was the Congress Party, the old party of her father); at the time I arrived, the Congress Party was in power in Kerala, but with a very slim majority. The communists were very strong in that state, as you may recall. When Mrs. Gandhi lifted President's Rule in Tamil Nadu, another regional party was elected and governed the state for a number of years. A regional party was elected in Andhra Pradesh a few years later. Interestingly, the leaders in both states were movie actors, said to derive their political power from their exposure throughout their states in movies.

We need not go into the details here, but the leader of Tamil Nadu had had a very long movie career in which he always played the good guy, and in his films, good always triumphed over evil. His movies were quite simple but the villagers reportedly loved them. Local Madras pundits told me that the villages tended to blur the movie man with the real man. Whatever the reason he was Chief Minister, which was the title of the leader of the state government, a good many years.

Q: As the Consul General, was there much interest in the American connection? How did you deal with these poor states?

McCASKILL: I like to think I was fairly well known and relatively popular. We had lots of travel money left over from the counterpart funds, and I tried to visit each state capital every six months for three or four days. I had three Indian national political employees: one for Andhra Pradesh, one for Karnataka, and one for Tamil Nadu and Kerala. They all were excellent, and knew whom I should see and whom I should not see. They would make appointments ahead of time, USIS would get my visit and maybe a picture, in the papers. It was a very good public relations operation, even if I do say so. We used to joke in the office that I was probably the best known foreigner in South India, which was something when you consider the size of the area.

On the personal side, I liked the South very much. It was a great tourist area, with lots to be seen, including some magnificent old Hindu temples. I set up a train trip for Ambassador Saxbe, on which we had several private railway cars which were dropped off in a tourist center, and later tacked on to the back of another train a day later. It was a wonderful way to travel, and sort of took us back to the days of the British Raj. Word of the trip got around, and a number of other people in the Embassy asked me to arrange one for them. It was a once-in-a-lifetime kind of thing, something that could probably only be done in India. As a footnote, the Indian Railways were quite good, and the service provided for the VIP bogey was outstanding.

Q: Didn't Kerala have a communist government at one time, and wasn't that an irritant to us, a communist government in this big democracy during the Cold War. I recall that it was the focus of a lot of attention. Did you give Kerala more attention because of that, or had our concerns dissipated?

McCASKILL: Our concerns regarding that had largely dissipated by then. I don't remember specifically but it is my general recollection that my relations with those communists I met were fairly cordial. I don't recall meeting many of them, in fact.

The Soviets had a big consulate in Madras, and their CG and I became fairly good friends. He mentioned one time, I suppose at a party, that he was traveling over to Kerala. I kidded him that he went to Kerala a lot more than I did, and I asked what he did there; did he call on all those communist leaders over there? He responded quite openly that "of course" he did. You call on the Congress people, he said to me, and I call on the Communists. He went on good-naturedly, "What do you think I do?" This man and his wife were very decent, likable people, and we figured that he was probably a career foreign service type; his number two was a bull, however, as subtle as a 47-ton tank. We concluded that he was KGB.

To return to your original question, I don't recall that we were concerned about Kerala when I was there. I think we had learned to live with it. As you know, India took some getting used to, but it could also be a wonderful, fascinating place to serve. Obviously I was not a career subcontinent type, but I did learn to love India.

As a footnote, Krishna Menon, who succeeded in antagonizing nearly everybody at the UN in the late 1950s and early 1960s was a typical, fuzzy Keralan.

Q: Later, particularly today, the Tamil problem spills over to Sri Lanka. How did we look on the Tamil separatist movement at that time?

McCASKILL: We did not focus on it when I was there. There had been language riots in Tamil Nadu as recently as 1966-69, and resentment on the language issue continues below the surface to this day. But I don't recall any focus on the separatist movement. Once I asked a close friend, a London School of Economics graduate, if the language problem bothered him. I was surprised when he answered affirmatively and vigorously. But I don't remember seeing anything on the separatist movement then.

Q: Madras must have seemed far, far from Delhi in many ways. How did we look upon Indira Gandhi at that time? What was the general opinion of how she was governing?

McCASKILL: Mrs. Gandhi was the Congress Party. She was, surprisingly, fairly popular in Tamil Nadu. After she imposed the Emergency in 1975, when she would call elections was the burning question. I think I mentioned that the Congress was strong in Andhra and Karnataka, less so in Kerala. Intellectuals and educated Indians deeply resented the imposition of authoritarian rule, and repudiated Indira Gandhi at the ballot box when she called elections for 1977. We concluded, I think, that she had so cut herself off from the electorate that she had no idea that she would be so soundly rejected. It was obviously a gross miscalculation on her part.

I personally went to India with no preconceived notions about her or the country, and I left loving the country and with a very low opinion of her. She was a very political animal, but I didn't think she was terribly smart. She certainly had no vision of where the country would go, or where it needed to go, except to keep her in power. I was always surprised that such a big country produced so few leaders; American Indiaologists could probably explain this, but I never could. In a country of 600 million then -- it's considerably bigger now -- there were very few political leaders. The Indian business community was an outstanding group, and I knew some very able businessmen in Bombay and Madras but they avoided politics.

Q: We obviously have all kinds of differences with the Indians. When you called on Congress Party leaders, what would you talk about? Was there anything special you were pitching? Or was it really just how things were going?

McCASKILL: Much of our discussions concerned the general situation in the states, or a particular situation between states. And a great deal of local stuff. I would not have dared, on an official call, to ask one of them what he thought of Mrs. Gandhi, for example. Overly-sensitive Indians would have been quick to consider that interfering. I would take my time, and sometimes some very interesting material would come out. I would sometimes get into state elections, but one had to be careful since they were so sensitive about what they considered interference in internal affairs. I think I actually generated some trust among some of my contacts. The Chief Minister of Tamil Nadu, the movie actor to whom I referred, and I were fairly close. He had needed eye surgery, and I went out of my way to help his people arrange things for him and to give him a good reception, even though he was the equivalent of a state governor.

A word on the "prickly" relationship; It was prickly, but at the same time it was a sort of love-hate relationship between Indians and Americans. They seemed almost hurt that we didn't give them more attention. And they never forgot the tilt of 1971. They could never understand why the world's greatest democracy did not support the world's largest democracy.

Q: You mentioned the press. How did you deal with the press? Did it worry you that there were land mines everywhere you stepped as far as the press was concerned?

McCASKILL: Yes. I had to be very careful. I did not deal with the press any more than I had to, and I left that to our very good USIS office in Madras. I actually stayed away from the press fairly much. I did have one incident when I was on a speaking tour in an isolated provincial town and something I said was taken out of context and blown up in the press all over the country.

When Ambassador Saxbe arrived in India in early 1975, he let it be known that he was not really looking for Mrs. Gandhi to persuade her of anything or to offer her anything. He had not come to India bearing gifts, he let it be known, and he had no US assistance to be "forced" on India. He sort of put it out that if Mrs. Gandhi wanted him, he would be on the golf course playing golf or in Kashmir fishing. I thought his approach was just right for the time. The Indians were very sensitive to what they perceived as our "forcing" aid on them, and I think Ambassador Saxbe played it just right.

Q: Over the years, Indians have perceived that the Republicans have tilted more to Pakistan and Democratic administrations are more inclined to support India. You were in Madras when the Carter Administration came in. In addition to the hoped-for tilt, Carter had a personal tie with India through his mother who had served in the Peace Corps there. In your area, did you see any positive or negatives about the Carter Administration?

McCASKILL: I think there was the feeling that you described, that the Democrats were more pro-India than the Republicans, and in general, our relations were better under Carter. Remember, too, that Mororji Desai had succeeded Mrs. Gandhi, and that was a definite plus as far as our relations were concerned. The most impressive thing Carter did was the appointment of Ambassador Goheen to Delhi. Ambassador Goheen was born in India, the son of a medical missionary. I think some of his grandparents had been missionaries. He had long, deep ties with India, and a deep affection for the country and the people. He said when he presented his credentials that he was deeply touched to be representing his country in the land of his birth.

I think he was tremendously effective, as word of his "Indian connection" was widespread. He and I went to Andhra Pradesh to what had been a TB sanitarium where his father had performed thoracic surgery many years before. Dr. Goheen's first patient was found and attended the program the sanitarium had set up. Ambassador Goheen told me that his family's long ties with India meant a great deal to him and he was indeed very proud of them.

To repeat for emphasis, he was a fine ambassador and a fine man, and I was glad I had the chance to work for him. Also as I noted, the Indians interpreted his appointment as an indication that we wanted to improve relations, and they welcomed him.

Q: Were relations pretty steady when you left in 1979?

McCASKILL: Yes, pretty steady. As I said, the Desai Government was much more favorably disposed toward us than Indira Gandhi had been. Carter made an official visit in 1979, and while there was one flap during his stay, things were in general upbeat.

ALBERT E. HEMSING
Public Affairs Officer, USIS
New Delhi (1973-1976)

After working for the Economic Cooperation Administration in 1953, Albert E. Hemsing transferred to the United States Information Agency. His career included positions in Germany and India. This interview was conducted in 1989.

Q: Suddenly, while you were Chief Inspector, there was need for a public affairs officer in New Delhi, India. You were given that assignment. Tell me what were the circumstances.

HEMSING: Another weird turn of fate. I had only sporadically kept in touch with Irving Kristol since our college days. He was then editor of Commentary, now of Public Interest. On a trip to New York to see our daughter, I called Irving and we had lunch. Irving had always hated to go abroad, except to England. He questioned me about life overseas and I told him that I had enjoyed my assignments, but that I was bored now in Washington.

A few days later the Agency was abuzz with the news that Dan Oleksiw had been fired by Daniel Moynihan, the new Ambassador to India.

Next thing I knew, Kristol called me to say that Moynihan had called him, asking whether Irving knew anyone to head USIS India -- presumably someone from the outside. Was I interested, he asked me, and I said yes.

As a result, Moynihan requested me. The story went around that he and I were old pals, which was nonsense. We had both gone to the same East Harlem high school, but at different times, and to City College, a fact we only discovered at a reception earlier at Axel Springer's palatial suite in Berlin. Subsequently we met once more at a party at the George McGhees, in Bonn.

Moynihan, it turned out, had not only fired Dan, his Minister for Public Affairs, but also his DCM and Economic and Political Counselors. A clean sweep.

The Agency agreed to the assignment, it was at my level, and I was due out. So, suddenly, bang! There we were, Esther and I, in India. Once again my career conflicted with hers. When I first got word about India, on the very day, she too was bursting with news. For five years she had worked her way up to head of publications for the American Association of Colleges for Teacher Education. Now AACT had bought an NEA journal and asked Esther whether she would be interested in becoming its editor. But, we sold our house in Old Town and left for India. Our daughter was taken care of since she was at Sarah Lawrence College.

We arrived in New Delhi in June 1973 to horrible heat and dust, but to a wonderful old British "bungalow" at 10 Tilak Marg, in central Delhi, away from the Embassy compound.

Q: This was your first assignment in the so-called Third World.

HEMSING: That's right. It was a very exciting experience, both on the colorful streets of Delhi, and in the embassy itself. Moynihan had assembled a splendid staff of career people, with David Schneider as DCM. We were soon a team, and I was never to experience there any of the back-biting and internecine warfare I had come to take for granted in Bonn.

The USIS program was, of course, huge in American and Indian staff and facilities.

Q: The largest, I believe.

HEMSING: Yes. Remember that at about that time we made a gift to the Indian Government of $2.5 billion dollars worth of rupees, 25 percent of the entire Indian currency in circulation. The sum was left over from our food aid to India, after the previous five years of famine.

Q: The so-called Public 480 Law.

HEMSING: Yes. But we kept enough rupees to run the embassy and USIS for years to come.

With those rupees, USIS ran a book publishing program and put out a glossy monthly magazine called SPAN. We ran a fine USIS library in New Delhi and in five other cities. Dan Oleksiw had carefully guarded these from the restructuring and weeding out that Alan Carter, the former area director, had demanded of his posts under his "Informat" scheme.

When Moynihan realized that I commanded lots of rupees in my budget, and that these would buy U.S.-India round trip air tickets, he prevailed on me -- it took little prevailing -- to invite his coterie of star-name intellectuals over to lecture. We put on a series under the title "Modern Society and Traditional Government," that was supposed to give Indian intellectuals food for thought about their own situation. I acted as moderator, and we filled the large auditorium of the USIS library in Delhi over a period of months.

Any PAO would be in seventh-heaven with such resources.

Q: The post, in fact, was important enough -- still is, I'm sure -- so that it commanded the title not of public affairs officer, or counselor, but minister.

HEMSING: Yes. In protocol terms I was number three at the embassy, second only to Dave Schneider, the Deputy Chief of Mission, or DCM.

Q: We were talking about India and your rank there.

HEMSING: Yes. India was a total immersion in the Third World for Esther and me, and until this day we're glad not to have left the Foreign Service without this correction of our Europe-centered experience.

I found that I liked the Indians, but almost in inverse proportion to their socio-economic status. Some of the people on top were pretty intolerable. But Esther and I soon came to appreciate the decency of the average Indian, a human quality that transcends the language barrier and social distance. Despite their history of colonialism, communal strife and poor government, I can never see them really knuckling under, deep inside, to a dictator.

And they didn't knuckle under when Indira Gandhi turned dictator with the "emergency laws." I experienced six months of that before we left in January 1976. In no time at all my morning breakfast chore, looking over ten Indian newspapers, became easy. Using the threat of withholding newsprint, entirely controlled by the state, the papers were soon "Gleichgeschaltet," put on the same track, as the Nazis called it. I spent part of that time on the trail of the Indian Press Chief, (his office had become the censor's office), pulling American journalists out of the jug, e.g. Lewis Simon of the Washington Post. All of India turned to the BBC and VOA for news during that period.

Q: What about Moynihan?

HEMSING: Moynihan was great fun to work with, but not at his best as Ambassador. The robes of Senator fit him better.

Faced with an issue, Pat always went through a bedding-down process, throwing off ideas a-mile-a-minute, wise and foolish. Thank God he did not surround himself with yes-men. He needed and I suppose, still needs independent minds to do battle with. In the end, he would listen to reason, and do the necessary.

Even at the very end. As he was leaving Delhi to return to Harvard (Harvard had extended his tenure beyond the usual limits), he asked for a Sunday morning press meeting with the handful of American and foreign press there.

I arrived early and found him pounding away on his typewriter in the secluded pool-side house of his residence. He was not to be disturbed, he was making notes for his press conference. But his copy was being retyped by a secretary in the living room, where the meeting was to take place. Looking over his text, I was horrified. He attacked Indira Gandhi, he attacked Third World slavishness to the outworn ideas of British Socialism of the 30s, and he attacked the UN for being the sounding board of these ideas and the handmaiden of anti-Americanism. The UN, I remember, was described as a dead carcass of man's hope.

Soon Dave Schneider arrived and he was equally horrified. We marched into the pool house and remonstrated with Pat, saying he must wait until he got back home to say his piece. "All right, since you leave me nothing to say, I'll say nothing," was the reply.

My guess is that, had we not stopped him, he would probably never have been named as our Ambassador to the UN, the position he used as a stepping-stone to the Senate. But, as often happens in our business, I found no hint of memory of that occasion the one time I asked his help as Senator. That was in connection with the rumpus at Radio Free Europe.

Moynihan found it impossible to suffer fools, which is, also, part of any ambassador's job when it comes to maintaining necessary contacts with government officials and fellow diplomats. He scared Indira Gandhi off with his reputation as an intellect. She saw Moynihan only twice, I believe, during his entire stay.

William Saxbe was quite a contrast as Ambassador, with his love of country music and his spittoon, within easy aim of his stand-up desk in the embassy. Former governor of Ohio and U.S. Attorney General, Saxbe the politician proved to be the more effective Ambassador. Of course, for much of his time U.S.-Indian relations were "on hold" because of India's emergency rule. I regretted leaving his staff at that juncture, when I resigned from the Agency.

ROBERT C. HANEY
India Inspection Team, USIS
(1973-1974)

Information Officer, USIS
New Delhi (1974-1977)

Robert Haney was born in Iowa in 1921. After attending from the University of Iowa in 1943, he fought in World War II in the U.S. Army. After the end of the War, he worked in France with the Paris Herald. He later graduated from the University of Iowa with a Bachelor's in French. Since joining the foreign service in 1951, his career has included positions in Paris, Washington, Belgrade, Mali, Saigon and Warsaw. Mr. Haney was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on September 21, 2001.

Q: You went on an inspection to India.

HANEY: Yes, in '73, I went with a USIA inspection team to India. The head of the team was a former USIA officer. He had been Agency policy chief and ended up as ambassador in Tegucigalpa. India is a big post, one of the biggest in the world. And the branch posts in Madras, Bombay and Calcutta were larger than most USIS establishments anywhere. We were there for more than a month, as I recall. I visited all the posts. The ambassador heading the inspection had to return to Washington early, and I was put in charge. I wound up the inspection and sent off the report. Subsequently, I was asked to go back to India for six weeks as head of a two-man team to help the post come into compliance with some of the recommendations of the inspection report.

Q: During your inspection in '73, what was your impression of the USIA operation in India?

HANEY: Dan Oleksiw, the former area director for the Far East, had gone to the field by that time as PAO in India. Daniel Patrick Moynihan arrived as the new ambassador. By the time I got there, Moynihan and Oleksiw had arranged a divorce of convenience. Oleksiw was sitting in the PAO's residence, a well-appointed, large house on a big lot in downtown New Delhi, awaiting orders bringing him back to Washington. The new public affairs officer, Al Hemsing, hadn't arrived yet. It was a bit awkward to carry out an inspection where there was no public affairs officer; the deputy PAO was in charge.

Oleksiw had a large staff, both in New Delhi and in the branch posts. The inspectors felt that the outgoing PAO was given to micro-management, even of operations in the branches. The PAO in Calcutta told me that he and his staff felt that they ought to check with New Delhi before they visited the men's room, the control from New Delhi was so tight. The inspectors concluded that the branches should have a freer rein. India is a vast country, and the regional differences are relevant to carrying out an information and cultural program.

The local Indian staff was well educated, fluent in English as well as Hindi (and/or Urdu), well trained - the best I have ever seen in the many USIS posts where I have served or visited.

Educated Indians thought so highly of employment with USIS that we had some locals working in the USIS press section, for example, who were fully as competent, and just as highly regarded, as Indians in good positions in the media world.

Q: You were there from when to when?

HANEY: I was assigned to New Delhi in '74, first as information officer, subsequently as policy officer when the IO job was abolished following a reshuffling of the staffing as a result of the inspection. I left New Delhi in '77.

Q: How were relations between India and the United States?

HANEY: They were tolerable. There was at that time no big issue, as there is now regarding Kashmir and precarious Pakistani-Indian relations, a serious concern because both countries are now nuclear powers.

Q: How did you find the intellectual climate? Did the Indians in New Delhi have the equivalent of an intellectual class such as existed in France?

HANEY: Yes, but it wasn't really intellectual attainment that determined who belonged to the class. The caste system is still paramount.

Q: Brahmin, and so on.

HANEY: Yes. I've served in some very interesting countries. Mary and I both feel that our favorite post was Yugoslavia. We had good relations with ordinary Yugoslavs, it's a beautiful country, and we traveled extensively.

Q: My wife and I have the same feeling.

HANEY: On the other hand, I can't imagine any other country so complicated or so fascinating as India. It is mind-boggling. Many foreigners, and particularly Americans, are put off when they are exposed to India because it is a land of so many contradictions. Indians seem able to hold in their heads at the same time two notions that we would consider mutually exclusive. I think Americans are more methodical, more "rational," so this is hard to get used to when you first go out there. You also are put off by the scale of squalor on the one hand and awed by the natural and man-made beauty on the other. Just walking down the street in New Delhi or in Calcutta you may smell the open sewer one moment and the next moment you smell jasmine.

The failure in Indian society and culture to communicate from top to bottom and vice versa is a hindrance to the cohesion of the country. It's difficult to conceive of a land in which there are 22 languages used by the inhabitants for day-to-day communication, yet the link language is foreign: English. It is a challenge to try to understand a country where there are such vast differences in outlook, social and economic standing, religion and languages.

In Kerala (southwest India), the inhabitants use an alphabet (Malayalam) in which all of the characters are composed of curved lines. In New Delhi (Hindi), the characters incorporate both straight and curved lines. In Malayalam, written language was first cut on palm leaves. If you cut a straight line on a palm leaf, the leaf is going to split. So every mark has to be curved to preserve the record. There are many such anomalies in Indian culture.

When India became independent in 1947, statesmen of the new country had to write a constitution. It manages to embody some of the same contradictions that pop up in less formal aspects of life in India. Indian leaders who were fans of Abraham Lincoln opted for flexible means of dealing with threats to the state. Indians who wished to emulate their former British masters retained the colonial power's provisions for declaring a state of emergency. The result was that the constitution has sections that are like a car with the brake and the accelerator on the same pedal.

Q: Were you in USIA able to make significant contacts among the ruling class, or was America considered almost beneath them?

HANEY: Indians, whatever their class, take a great interest in the United States. Over the years, this interest was promoted by Americans and Indians alike after some nimble mind invented the phrase, "the world's two biggest democracies." It's got a ring to it that has seduced many a speech writer, not to speak of herds of newspaper correspondents. I was first faced with the dilemma it posed when I was asked to draft a speech at our embassy in New Delhi for an officer who shall remain nameless. He wanted that phrase stuck in the speech somewhere.

Our countries are both big - India big enough to account for most of a subcontinent; the United States three times as large. India comes out way on top in regard to population. So both countries are fairly described as "big democracies," if all you're concerned about is size and nominal form of government.

Q: How did our message fit? Were we getting whatever our message was across to the Indians? They had had a very close relationship with the Soviets.

HANEY: The relationship with the Soviets was more a matter of convenience at the time. There is—or was while I was there—among the upper class a great deal of admiration for the United States for human rights, for democracy, for its institutions, its education. A certain amount of British snobbery has persisted in the Indian whose family is able to send him to England for his higher education. There is an apocryphal story of the son in a well-to-do family that spoke English as well as Hindi. They sent this young man to England to be educated, and he didn't make it. But when he came back and entered Indian life again, he had calling cards made, with his name, of course, and the honorific, "Oxford, failed." Unfortunately, many at that level in Indian society became confused about where the sun rises - over the Bay of Bengal, or over the English Channel. Also, unfortunately, the successful upper class has little connection with the great mass of Indians at the lower economic and social levels.

The Indian government under Mrs. Gandhi teetered from democracy toward authoritarianism in 1975 when a judge in Mrs. Gandhi's home constituency found her landslide victory in the 1971 elections invalid because civil servants had illegally aided her campaign. She reacted to demands for her resignation as prime minister by persuading the president of India to declare a state of emergency. She ordered the arrest of her critics, including all opposition leaders except the communists. Opposition newspapers were shut down.

Early during the state of emergency, Mary and I attended a reception given by a well-to-do Sikh who had extensive connections in upper-level New Delhi society. The occasion was the visit to New Delhi of Daniel J. Boorstin, Librarian of Congress. Guests included the editor of the daily Hindustan Times, closed down by Mrs. Gandhi, and other anti-government figures. Also present were a number of Mrs. Gandhi's staunch supporters. Views on both sides were strongly held, but the discussion of the state of emergency at that reception was civil, even cordial. It brought home to us how tightly bound and insulated were the members of the upper class in India.

Q: In our looking at this, where this stratum seems to run horizontally and not vertically, were we making attempts to penetrate down below what one might call the "chattering class," getting down to the businessman, the working class, and even farther down?

HANEY: Yes, we were. Our efforts were directed to representatives of what might be called "the middle class" - professionals, businessmen, educators - who were not at the top of the caste system, as well as to the upper class. In my view, this "middle class" is a more important audience, because that thin layer on top is not really going to determine where India goes.

During the emergency, things were pretty tight. Mrs. Gandhi's agents were harsh and cruel. Her son, Sanjay, was responsible for rooting out illegal residents and for carrying out sterilization in the poor "inner city" community of New Delhi where there were many Muslims. Not far from our house, his men came and bulldozed a small settlement on the edge of the city where people were living in what looked like large crates. This was in a section of "dense, mixed jungle" (as the map of New Delhi described it). The squatters had carved out a little site for themselves and were living there under desperate conditions.

It was summertime. Mary had gone home to Washington for a bit to see the kids, who were in school here. One evening, when I was reading a book in our house on Kotilya Marg, I heard some sort of cackling laughter in our little courtyard. The windows were shut because the air conditioning was on. I resumed reading, and I heard the noise again quite distinctly. I went out through the kitchen into the courtyard, and there was a completely naked woman who was obviously out of her mind. She was talking gibberish. I got the houseboy to come down from his quarters behind the house. He persuaded the woman to leave. I think she was from the squatters' settlement that had been razed by Sanjay's people.

By early 1977, Mrs. Gandhi believed that things had cooled down enough to remove restrictions, free political prisoners, and hold elections. In March, I was flying to Calcutta to consult with the USIS post there. During the flight, at just about the point where you can see Mount Everest on a clear day, I noticed that one passenger after another was buzzing for the stewardess. She would turn up at the passenger's seat, lean over to hear what the problem was, and then go forward to the pilots' compartment and let herself in. In a minute or so, she would come out and return to say something to the passenger. By then, the "stewardess" light was on again, over another passenger's seat. This was a puzzling activity that continued as more passengers summoned the stewardess.

I finally figured out what was happening. Final results of the election that Mrs. Gandhi had at last allowed were coming in on the radio in the pilots' compartment. Passengers were asking the stewardesses for the latest results, and the stewardesses were relaying the news, one passenger at a time. The excitement was provoked by the election results - Mrs. Gandhi and her Congress Party were losing. Morarji R. Desai, the opposition leader, won in a landslide, unseating the Congress Party, which had been dominant since "freedom at midnight" on August 15, 1947, when the Indian Empire was dissolved and India became independent.

The unexpected results of the election (Mrs. Gandhi, for one, certainly failed to anticipate what would happen) caused me to think again about "the world's two biggest democracies." A lot of Indians, many of them illiterate and living in poverty, had taken to heart the promise of democracy and gone to the polls to vote for what they thought was best for them. The election, and the defeat of the Congress Party for the first time since Indian independence, showed that democracy had indeed taken root in the subcontinent. Maybe I won't hesitate to use that phrase if I'm ever asked again to write a speech about India.

Q: How about the professional classes, the business people? How was our rapport with them?

HANEY: I would say, "good." They were eager to take advantage of technical advances from the United States. As a result, there is now a "Silicon Valley" in Bangalore/Hyderabad in southern India. Many Indians skilled in computers have come to the United States to work, a "brain drain" that is of concern to the mother country. American "outsourcing" of such skills more often ends up in India than anywhere else.

Q: How about the universities? Were we able to make much of a dent or were the universities hotbeds of Marxism, as they are in so many parts of the world?

HANEY: I wouldn't say they were "hotbeds of Marxism." We did have contacts there. USIA managed a cultural-exchange program involving both Indian and American students and professors, as well as professional men and women in cultural or social organizations. We had no trouble at all making that kind of contact.

Q: I often think that these exchange programs are probably the best thing we do across the board on the whole diplomatic scale.

HANEY: I agree.

Q: You left there when?

HANEY: In October '77.

DENNIS KUX
Deputy Country Director for Nepal and India
Washington, DC (1972-1977)

Ambassador Dennis Kux was born in England in 1931 and raised in New York, New York. He received a bachelor's degree in history from Lafayette College in Pennsylvania in 1952. He entered the U.S. Army in 1952, where he worked as a prisoner of war interrogator. His Foreign Service career included positions in Pakistan, India, Turkey, and the Ivory Coast. Ambassador Kux was interviewed by Thomas Stern on January 13, 1995.

Q: In 1972 you were assigned as Deputy Country Director for India and Nepal. Was this an assignment that you were interested in?

KUX: Yes and no. Actually, I had been interested in doing something on a broader or global scale. One possibility was working with Claus Ruser. That would have been a "mixed bag." I questioned whether his program was going anywhere. I was asked whether I would be interested in working on the India desk. One consideration was the impact of a particular assignment on my career. The buzz phrase at the time was "program management." You had to be a boss supposedly to enter senior ranks. I was then at the top of the mid-level as an O-3. As it turned out, it didn't matter. I was promoted to FSO-2 in June, 1974 without having managed anything. In fact, the conventional wisdom about what gets you ahead is often wrong.

Anyway, I took the job on the India desk. It turned out to be a very interesting and challenging. About three or four days after I got there in mid-1972, I was given a task on a subject about which I knew nothing. This was to coordinate an interagency study for the White House on the Indian nuclear problem. This was before the Indians set off their first nuclear device. The study was commissioned by Kissinger, then the National Security Adviser. One of the ways that he kept the bureaucracy busy was having them do studies. This study was useful -- at least to the participants -- although I don't know that it led to anything.

So I spent the next couple of months in interagency meetings, learning about what the nuclear program was in India, what this meant to the non proliferation agreement, and what the U. S. could and should do about it, including predictions of whether India would proceed with its test program. I learned a lot about nuclear power and other uses by talking with experts of which there were plenty. I didn't try to become an expert. I would get somebody in to talk me through one aspect or another of the issue. The end product was called NSSM (National Security Study Memorandum) 202; it just sat in the NSC until the Indians tested two years later.

During the first year on the desk I was just a member of the team. The Country Director was Dave Schneider, whom I had worked for before and highly respected. The way he structured the office was that he didn't really have a deputy. Desk officers dealt with him on specific issues, as needed. That was the right approach because it cut out an unnecessary layer of supervision in what was a fairly small office. I think that there were six of us. I was the senior officer dealing with India. Initially, that meant dealing with the nuclear problem. Then there were various other tasks. There was another fellow working on India who didn't work for me. We both worked for Dave [Schneider], who in 1973 went to India as DCM when Pat Moynihan went out as Ambassador. Bruce Laingen became the Country Director for a very brief period. Then there was a change "upstairs" [in the Bureau of South Asian Affairs], and Bruce became a Deputy Assistant Secretary. I became the Country Director from the summer of 1973 to 1977 -- four years.

The country director's role goes back to changes in the mid 1960s, when Dean Rusk assigned principal responsibility to country directors to lead the U. S. Government team, which dealt with a specific country or area. The intention was that the country director not just be the person who dealt with the country in the State Department. He or she was to be the interagency coordinator. The country directorate was to be the focal point for everything that went on between the United States and a specific country. The Country Director did not make policy, but did frame the issues for the policy makers and then was the person who carried out that policy in the day-to-day work involving that country. He or she was the "back stopper" for the Embassy and was to be very much the hub or focal point of the US government's dealings with the country.

He or she would have an unquestioned right to know what was going with the country of responsibility -- except for CIA matters which were handled a level higher. So, except for the Agency, the Country Director was supposed to be involved or aware of everything that was going on within the U. S. Government concerning a given country. This was generally accepted by the other agencies. Sometimes, you had to assert yourself, but the concept wasn't usually challenged.

That was the theory, and for India, Nepal and Sri Lanka, the three countries in the directorate, it was the reality. I was assertive about the responsibilities of the country director. Three things were very important in the case of India. One aspect was working very closely with the people who worked on Pakistan, because so much of U. S.-Indian relations were involved in the dispute with Pakistan. We really had to have a very close relationship. Our office was right next door to that of the Country Director for Pakistan and we made it a point to get along.

Secondly, there was the effort to define policies for the countries concerned. This really meant India, since relations with the two other countries, Sri Lanka and Nepal, more or less ran themselves, although we had desk officers. The idea was to use the Country Director position to work out policy approaches for India and to bring the whole community interested in India in the U. S. Government into this process. I think that we had a weekly interagency meeting, not just on India but for South Asia as a whole. We did India and Pakistan together deliberately. There had been an Office of South Asian Affairs previously, which was split in half.

Thirdly, I was in very close contact with the our Embassy in New Delhi. We had "political" Ambassadors there -- Pat Moynihan for the first couple of years that I was Country Director and Bill Saxbe for the last couple of years. Both were "high fliers," who dealt directly with National Security Adviser and later Secretary of State Kissinger and the White House. This meant I dealt with the DCM, Dave Schneider for most of the time. We constantly kept in touch. At that time we didn't use "Official-Informal" cables. We wrote letters to each other every week. We figured out the time table which the diplomatic pouch followed and timed our correspondence to make the pouch. That was very helpful in terms of keeping in touch and knowing what was going on. It worked pretty well.

I might at this stage just briefly comment on the informal communication system used by Department of State officials. In the State Department, an outgoing telegram always carries the signature of the Secretary of State. The "authorizing officer" is usually somebody down the line. But in effect, a telegram is an official order. It doesn't necessarily involve a policy directive or an instruction. However, sometimes you can't give the recipient the full background; the cable might never be "cleared." Often you can't tell the whole story and explain all the ramifications or bureaucratic politics in the background]. So a telegram doesn't convey the whole picture. To get around this limitation and keep the Embassy in India fully informed, in light of the poor telephone communication, we resorted to letters. We could have sent such a letter by telegram, but "Official-Informal" telegrams were frowned on at that time, because other people could read them. Letters, on the other hand, were strictly private. No one else saw them, and we could say whatever we wanted. If we knew the addressee well, as I did in the case of Schneider, we were totally frank. This was a very good way of keeping the Embassy well informed. In turn, we got from them similar correspondence, indicating what they were interested in. It was a useful system.

Today this exchange takes place on the telephone. What unfortunately happens is that the system can be misused. That was harder for India because communications were so bad. It was not like in Europe, where American diplomats just picked up the telephone. That has security risks because there is often "intercepts" of open conversations by the Soviets, or whoever. Then, classified phones were rare; today it is better. I remember seeing Warren Christopher -- then Deputy Secretary of State -- pick up a phone at the end of a negotiating session with the Turks when I was in Ankara in 1978-80. He called Peter Tarnoff, who was then the Executive Secretary of the Department of State in Washington. Christopher went over everything that happened during the day on the open line. He asked Tarnoff about what was going on in Washington. It was an appalling breach of security. People forget that their telephonic conversations are heard by many. Today, the situation is better, with "secure" telephones, as long as people remember to use them.

However, the important thing for historians is that with "Official-Informal" correspondence there is a record -- a copy is kept in the files where they can be found. I have learned this in my own research, going through Embassy files, which are retained in the National Archives. Most of the official-informal letters are kept either in the Embassy or Country Director files. Ambassadors Moynihan and Saxbe's relations with their counterparts, the U. S. Ambassadors to Pakistan, were in relative harmony, unlike earlier times. Ambassador Moynihan had gone out to New Delhi in 1972. Pakistan had just split into two countries. India was the big player in the region. Our relations with India were terrible because of the position we had taken during the 1971 war. But there were not any particular difficulties between our embassies. They were not vying for support from Washington. That made my relationship with the Country Director for Pakistan, Peter Constable, a whole lot easier. Furthermore, we were friends. That also made it easier. We basically saw the situation in the same way. We differed a bit on arms supplies for Pakistan, but it was a comfortable relationship.

Secretary of State Kissinger felt -- and he turned out to be correct -- that the "sirens of disaster" who said that we had "lost" India by tilting toward Pakistan in 1971 were wrong. He thought that India, in order to maintain its room for maneuver, would want to have a better relationship with the United States, and would not want to be totally tied to the Soviets. But that happened slowly.

Ambassador Moynihan said that in the past we had a relationship with India with sharp ups and downs. What we now wanted, he said, was a steady relationship on a plateau. He termed this a "mature relationship" at the time. Kissinger had time for India, especially when he became Secretary of State in 1973. He considered it a big country worthy of attention. Indeed, much to our surprise, when the Indians appointed as their Ambassador to the U. S. a man who was known for his closeness to the Soviet Union, T.K. or "Tiki" Kaul -- to whom we almost did not give agreement because of his pro-Russian leanings -- Kissinger received him often. I was new of the desk and I don't remember the details of agreeing to Kaul's appointment. It was the White House that raised some questions, presumably based on intelligence reports. In any case, Ambassador Kaul saw Kissinger at the State Department often, and went to Indian Embassy functions. There were only about half dozen Embassies that he showed this much interest in. He had time for India because, as he would mention at meetings, India was a big and important country.

By 1974 India's relationship with Pakistan was less of a problem for us. Pakistan was weak after the 1971 war. The Kashmir problem was quiescent. Pakistan seemed to accept India as the leading power in the subcontinent. So the situation was relatively calm during this four-year period.

When Kissinger went out to India, sometime in 1974, he made a major speech in New Delhi. He used these speeches as an important way of articulating policies. I think that Ambassador Moynihan prepared a draft along with Mark Palmer, who was a Kissinger speech writer. Mark had previously served in India and had a good sense for South Asia.

Basically, what Kissinger said, without expressing any regret for past U. S. policy, was that we accepted India as the major power in South Asia. This is what the Indians wanted to hear. However, as Indians are what they are, they chose not to hear it. Kissinger was in India about three days. And the Prime Minister, Mrs. Indira Gandhi, in her inimitable fashion left New Delhi after the first day. The Embassy in New Delhi was caught quite by surprise. She made a point of snubbing Kissinger. I am sure that Henry must have loved that. However, Ambassador Moynihan felt that Kissinger's going out to India and some of these other developments were his and President Nixon's way of trying to improve our relations with India, after our "tilt" toward Pakistan. And relations did improve to some extent. As I now look back on it, 20 years later, and after I have written a book on the U. S. and India, the situation seems quite different than it did at the time. We had achieved a low level of harmony. There wasn't much going on between India and the United States. We did not have an aid program. We had suspended aid, and India retaliated by kicking the AID people out. India cut back the Peace Corps program, and we closed it down entirely. There was very little U. S. investment in India. We had no military assistance program -- hadn't had since 1965. So there really wasn't much going on bilaterally.

My comment on the cessation of military assistance in 1965 needs a little amplification. In 1967 we permitted the sale of spare parts for previously acquired U. S. equipment, which really affected Pakistan, but did not resume aid as such. Then Nixon, as a favor to Pakistan, agreed to what was called a "one-time exception" in 1970 for what I recall were some aircraft and some APC's [Armored Personnel Carriers]. In 1975 he lifted the arms embargo but did not resume aid. He also agreed to finish a program with the Indians of providing radar equipment, which had been suspended back in 1965. We got caught up in this. We tried to have a certain amount of symmetry in our relations with India and Pakistan. However, basically, in the 1972-77 period, there wasn't anything going on.

There was a different situation regarding economic aid. There was the economic aid bureaucracy -- the AID bureaucracy -- which was eager to get back into India. It had been a big program for them. Ambassador Moynihan did not really want this to happen because he felt that U. S. assistance was too large, its mission too "bloated," and too arrogant. He called it the "age of the Demi-Raj." He saw this symbolized by the headquarters of the AID Mission in New Delhi, which was located in a big building on the outskirts of New Delhi. With much ceremony he handed over the keys of this building to the Indian Government. They turned it into a "Five Star" hotel. He wanted to make sure that it wouldn't be reopened again.

It was an interesting exercise. Under the terms of our arrangement with India, we had an enormous amount of foreign currency -- in Indian rupees and the Indians built the AID office building. It was put up with local currency [rupees], on the understanding that when we no longer had any use for it, the Government of India would take possession of it. So our returning the building to the Indians wasn't a "gift." Ambassador Moynihan concluded that we weren't going to have an aid program for the foreseeable future and announced that we were giving the former AID Headquarters building back to the Indians. At that point Senator Fulbright got wind of this. He wrote a letter expressing outrage that we were giving away this building and so forth and asked what was happening. At the time the Assistant Secretary for Near East and South Asia Affairs was Joe Sisco. Sisco was more concerned about the Congressional pressure than the Indians. So there was a great stirring around to see "How can we stop this?". Some people said: "This is a crazy thing that Moynihan is doing." Well, there wasn't much that we could do. We sent out a telegram -- a good, bureaucratic telegram -- asking him about his plans and whether he was sure about it. He came back with a wonderful telegram to the State Department. The telegram was called "The Edifice Complex." He gave a copy of it to the "New York Times" correspondent in New Delhi and a story appeared in the "New York Times" a few days later. He gave the keys to the building to the Indians with great flourish, and that was the end of it. To me it was an example of how the State Department, on the one hand, caved in to Congressional pressure and tried to stop something that made sense. On the other hand, there was a "political" Ambassador who could ignore the State Department, by going public on an issue.

I had a mixed mind about the resumption of an assistance program. While I thought that we should be helping the Indians, I believed the Indians should ask for aid -- and this was more or less a point of theology. What had happened in the past was that the Indians, with the somewhat curious psychology they have, had worked us into a situation where they appeared to be doing us a favor by accepting aid from the U. S. The Indian elite resented receiving U. S. aid because it put them in a relationship of dependency with us. After a long history of being a British colony, they didn't want to renew that kind of relationship. And so, while the aid did good, and I think that it was helpful to India, it engendered bad feeling and became a political liability.

That problem did not exist in other places, for example, not in Pakistan. That country is relatively small, it knows it is dependent, and doesn't have any hang-ups about it. There was also no problem with having aid programs in Nepal and Sri Lanka because the psychology of the recipients was different from the psychology of the Indians. In the case of Nepal there was a situation where foreign aid from the United States and other countries supported the only development that was going on in the country. Whether it did any good -- and how much good it did -- is somewhat questionable. Economic aid was not useful to us as a political tool in Nepal. Every country looks at its own situation. In the case of Nepal it felt itself squeezed by India. It is almost totally dependent on India. It seeks to broaden its options and relieve this pressure by having as much of a relationship with China as it can get away with -- and as many other countries as possible. The United States is a major power. Nepal wanted as broad a relationship with us as possible. So the Nepalese were delighted at the U. S. presence, wanted us to be involved, and welcomed it as a way to offset the Indians.

Sri Lanka, on the other hand, was a bizarre or paradoxical case. It had a woman Prime Minister at the time, Mrs. Bandaranaike. She, like Mrs. Indira Gandhi, was a Leftist. Sri Lanka's voting record at the UN was about the same as India's. But Sri Lanka, unlike India, got along with the Nixon administration. Nixon and Kissinger both liked Mrs. Bandaranaike. The AID people also liked the Sri Lankans; so the U. S. put aid money into Sri Lanka. We were giving Sri Lanka quite a bit of economic assistance. I remember a dinner at the Sri Lankan Ambassador's house with Deputy Director of the AID Agency -- Johnny Murphy. He was quite conservative and was just bubbling over about Sri Lanka. Relatively speaking, Sri Lanka got a larger share of economic aid than one would think. However, the Sri Lankan Government played us right. They were a small country and needed the help. Of all the South Asian countries they had the highest standard of living, literacy, and so forth, and they made the best use of the assistance resources. AID could carry out projects there more effectively than in India and certainly than in Nepal. So Sri Lanka got a lot of aid and used it well. We had a surprisingly good relationship with a country that was not oriented towards us politically. Again, this was related to their situation. They felt isolated, because India was so big, but did not feel as isolated as Nepal did. The Sri Lankans also wanted a relationship with the U. S. We did not use the assistance program as a tool to achieve some political goal there.

With India we went through my whole tour without an aid program. We put some assistance allocation back into the AID budget and announced that we had done this. I think it was something like $75 million. Then the Prime Minister, Mrs. Gandhi, would complain from time to time about U. S. interference in India. She would make a speech here or there, alleging that the CIA was interfering in Indian internal affairs. We would complain. The Indian Government would say that she was misquoted, that she had been speaking in Hindi and the translation was wrong. We would threaten not to restart the aid program. Finally, after Ambassador Moynihan had left India and Ambassador Saxbe was there, we had enough. This was in 1975 or 1976. After Mrs. Gandhi said something that really annoyed us, we announced that we were withdrawing money to support an aid program in India from the budget. And we actually did that. In other words, not giving aid became a message, but this applied only to India. We continued, as we do to this day, to provide aid through voluntary agencies -- school lunch programs, and things like that. This amounts to about $100 million a year.

We can talk about the surplus local currency available to us in India in terms of the policy issue. India stopped purchasing food from the U. S. under the PL 480 program during the crisis of 1971. India stopped it, we didn't. They told us that they didn't need food anymore. Then, in 1973, I believe, they had a poor harvest. India decided to spend its own money to purchase food, rather than ask us for any more PL 480 assistance. It was a policy decision on their part that they would never get into the position which they had been in during the 1960's, when they were heavily dependent on the United States and when, in their view, they had to beg us for food. In any case, it fortunately turned out that the poor Indian harvest of 1973 was a one-year exception, following which food production went up again.

Ambassador Moynihan's major achievement was to resolve the "rupee" problem. This dated back to the first food arrangement we had with India back in 1951. The Indians had worked out an arrangement so that the surplus food was not grant aid. But the Indians couldn't pay it back immediately. They undertook to pay us back in local currency [rupees]. Basically, this use of these funds was restricted to U. S. Embassy local currency expenses. By 1973 because of the large food shipments, especially in the 1960s, the situation was that we owned something like $3.0 billion in Indian rupees, or 20 percent of India's outstanding currency. The money that we owned was in a bank account which drew interest. So we were earning more every year in interest than we were spending for Embassy purposes. I think that we were earning about $100 million (in rupees) in interest and spending only $70 million. This could have gone on forever.

We need to remember that our account was not real money; our rupees were an accounting charge and not real cash. It only became actual cash when we spent it. It was a debt on the Indian books, but the use of it was very limited. It wasn't as if we could really "pull the plug" on the rupee. However, they thought that we could. The Indians were very, very concerned about it, particularly since relations between the two countries were tense. Ambassador Moynihan was very concerned and, to his credit, worked hard to solve this issue. He was concerned that the next time things went wrong between the United States and India, the Indians would simply wipe out the debt in these accounts. After all, it was money held in Indian banks -- mostly in the Government Reserve Bank. They could have simply blocked these accounts totally, and this would have made our relations even worse.

Ambassador Moynihan obtained approval for negotiations with the Indian Government on this issue. He was very clever about the way he handled the negotiations. First, it was a negotiation with the U. S. Government, and then with the Indians. Within the U. S. Government it was a question of how much of the balance owed us we would keep and how much we would write off. The negotiating package which the U. S. Government approved was that we would keep $2.0 billion and write off $1.0 billion. Moynihan said nothing about this. He just let the bureaucracy in the Treasury and State Departments work its will. He didn't think that this package would be negotiable with the Indians. He thought that the balance would have to be the other way around.

Ambassador Moynihan played no role in the intra US Government negotiations. He intentionally decided not to do so. Tactically, he was clever. He let the U. S. bureaucracy come up with its "negotiating" package. The NEA Assistant Secretary [of the Bureau of Near East and South Asian Affairs] said that we would be guided by the position of the Treasury Department. So the argument within the U. S. Government was not very vigorous. However, Ambassador Moynihan returned to Washington, and this is where a political Ambassador can be effective, went out to San Clemente [the Nixon residence in California] and saw President Nixon. He had been head of domestic policy for Nixon and had access. He said that he talked to President Nixon for about 45 seconds and got him to agree to "turn the package around." Kissinger wasn't really involved.

The decision therefore was that we would keep $1.0 billion [in rupees] and would "write off" $2.0 billion. It was a "two to one" split the other way. We then negotiated that with the Indians. On the Embassy side was Ambassador Moynihan, the Economic Counselor, and a very good Economic Officer in Washington, Don Born, a good friend of mine. He was basically the "back stopper." I was involved, but he did the work. It got very, very complicated. There were a lot of details. Ambassador Moynihan had to deal with the political aspect of the negotiations.

The U. S. domestic politics of this issue were difficult because India was not popular, and there were people within the U. S. Government who would have liked to block the deal. And in the Congress. There was a very creative use of a target of opportunity on Ambassador Moynihan's part. A Catholic missionary named Robert Barrett walked into the Embassy in New Delhi one day and asked whether it would be possible to get an endowment for a Catholic Medical Center in Bangalore, India, which he wanted to set up and name for John McCormack, the former Speaker of the House of Representatives. It was not the sort of thing that the Indians wanted to accept. They wanted the $1.0 billion or any other money in this pool strictly limited for use by the Embassy and not for other uses, and particularly not this type of an endowment. However, Ambassador Moynihan, who is not only clever but savvy politically, found out that Barrett not only knew John McCormack but also Senator Ted Kennedy and George Meany of the AFL/CIO, the whole Irish Catholic American network. Moynihan was able to get the active support of these people for this memorial for John McCormack and because of this their support for the rupee deal. Moynihan persuaded the Indians to agree to make an exception, so that $100 million worth of rupees would be used for the John W. McCormack Memorial Medical Center.

One day, in the country director's office, the phone rang, and John McCormack was on the phone. He had just retired as Speaker of the House of Representatives. He said: "What can I do to get the rupee deal through? Whom do you want me to speak to?" There was also a phone call from Senator Kennedy's office. There was another call from George Meany's son-in-law, asking: "What do you want the lobbyist of the AFL/CIO to do?" These phone calls turned out to be very helpful, because pretty soon we found ourselves with a big problem in Congress. The problem was that Senator Harry Byrd, from Virginia, tried to kill the whole agreement. He said that this was being handled as an executive agreement, which meant that Congress didn't have to approve it. Senator Byrd slipped through the Senate a motion that this agreement would have to be voted on. It was the "Byrd Amendment" to some piece of legislation, which was accepted by the Senate. Senator Byrd's position was that this was a U. S. "giveaway" even though the funds were really not available for general expenditures. Byrd was also anti-Indian and was unhappy that we would be giving away $2.0 billion to "those people." This was the kind of argument that we had never really intended to make. We were keeping $1.0 billion. It was something of a fluke that we had this money. The local currency account was always hard to explain. If we didn't complete the agreement, we would always be running the risk of losing it all.

At least twice Senator Byrd got this amendment passed, and we then came back and worked very hard on Congress. We were able to get the situation turned around thanks in part to the Barrett project. We also had President Nixon's help, surprisingly, given the fact that Nixon was not regarded as a "friend" of India. By this time Nixon was on his way out, in the aftermath of "Watergate". We got active assistance from the White House congressional team. So this arrangement was eventually approved, and Ambassador Moynihan, with a typical flourish, gave the Indians what was then the world's largest check for $2.0 billion worth of rupees. This made the Guinness "World Book of Records." It was Moynihan's main achievement while he was in India.

In terms of other noteworthy things, there were two main issues. One was the U. S. reaction to the Indian nuclear test. It could be considered poetic justice that I was the Country Director, since I had written a paper on this issue. I was around, two years later, when it actually happened. The Indian nuclear test took place in May, 1974. Ambassador Moynihan was still in India at the time.

Kissinger's reaction was that it had happened, and there wasn't not a hell of a lot that we could do about it. He said: "Let's not make the situation worse." This was reflected in his toning down the draft press statement which we had prepared regarding the Indian nuclear test. We learned of this about 4:00 AM [Washington time]. We worked up a strong draft statement condemning the test over the telephone with various people. The object was to make a statement in the next couple of hours. Kissinger was then on a "shuttle" trip in the Middle East. All major business in the Department was sent to him for his approval. A couple of hours after the draft statement was sent to him, we received back a "watered down" version of the statement, which was then made public as the U. S. Government's reaction to the Indian nuclear test.

My personal view of India's nuclear policy was that, although Mrs. Gandhi had come out of the 1971 crisis as the "Empress of India" and was at the peak of her power, she screwed up. By 1974 she had become unpopular and was in trouble politically. I felt that she regarded the Indian nuclear test as a way of boosting her power and improving her domestic political position by showing that India could be a world power. The nuclear capability was seen as a major symbol of power. In typical Indian fashion -- doing things differently than others -- that this was not a nuclear weapon. It was described as a "peaceful explosion." Indeed, all they did was to set off a peaceful nuclear device. It was an underground explosion. India had signed the Limited Test Ban Treaty and was not authorized under the treaty to conduct an explosion in the atmosphere. It would have broken the treaty if they had done so. They set up a bomb in a hole in Rajasthan and exploded it there.

Just as Moynihan was leaving India, the Indian nuclear explosion took place. Within the U. S. Government this had strong repercussions. Until then, the liberals had been pro-Indian, and the conservatives had been anti-Indian. The liberals were mostly strong anti-nuclear proliferation people. While the conservatives weren't in favor of nuclear proliferation, it wasn't a key issue for them. The liberals who used to be pro-Indian and favored better relations with India turned sour on India after the test. The people that had been anti-Indian weren't exactly for India, but they were not as negative on the Indians as the liberals became.

The Indian nuclear explosion set off alarm bells in the nuclear non-proliferation community. It felt that, if India could proceed with an explosion unchallenged, then other countries could as well. If India were not punished, others will want to do the same thing. The fact was that India hadn't violated any agreements with the U.S. The Canadians felt that the Indians had violated an agreement with them, since India had used a reactor which Canada had given them for research purposes to produce the uranium used in the nuclear test. The Indians said that they had not violated the agreement with the Canadians, and they were technically correct. The Canadian reactor had been given to India before the NPT [Non-Proliferation Treaty] was negotiated. There were "peaceful use" requirements in the Indian-Canadian agreement, but the Indians said that this explosion was for "peaceful use." The fact that the NPT said that there was no difference between a peaceful test and a military test was irrelevant, legally speaking. The Indians had a reasonable, legal case, but the Canadians also had a strong case. Canadian Prime Minister Trudeau had warned the Indian Prime Minister, Mrs. Gandhi, that if they proceeded with a nuclear test, using Canadian furnished supplies and equipment, Canada would react. Canada did, cutting off its nuclear help to India. There was pressure from the "non-proliferation people" that the U.S. do the same, because we had been giving India some technical assistance on nuclear matters. There was a close relationship with the AEC's [Atomic Energy Commissions] in the two countries.

A couple of days after the Indian explosion took place Secretary of State Kissinger -- incorrectly -- said that we were not like Canada and that we had not helped India. When the nuclear experts dug into the details, they discovered that the U. S. government in fact had provided India with some fairly limited help in the form of "heavy water." The U. S. Government had provided this assistance in the 1950's. We, like Canada, had warned the Indians that they should not use these materials for a nuclear explosion; we would regard such action as a breach of the agreement. This was a unilateral statement, because there wasn't any bilateral agreement. This is an action that we took 12 years after the fact. The Indians took our warning but didn't respond to it.

The State Department was asked by Senator Ribicoff whether there was any U. S. "heavy water" used by the Indians in generating the explosion. Through a screw-up we sent out an erroneous reply to him, which said, "No" because it had evaporated. In fact, the U. S. "heavy water" was used in the Indian preparations for the explosion, because the "heavy water" could not have evaporated by that time. The next thing we heard was a blast in "The New York Times," with Senator Ribicoff charging the Nixon administration with deceit and lying. With Watergate at high tide, this was a serious allegation.

We were not nuclear experts -- and this is typical of the way you operate as a Country Director -- but we worked very closely with the scientific people. In effect, the Ribicoff inquiry was joint action responsibility between the regional (NEA) and functional (Science) bureaus because it involved a highly technical question. I said: "What is Ribicoff doing," and DAS Myron Kratzer, the key man in the science bureau, said, "We have screwed up." I asked: "What do you mean?" He said, in effect, that our expert in OES had given an answer that was incorrect and had screwed it up. In layman's language we had in effect said that my Chevrolet" -- this is back in 1974 -- "can get the equivalent of 300 miles to the gallon." Kratzer said that what we wrote was nonsense -- it was wrong. The facts were way off. In fact, he said, anybody in the nuclear field -- any nuclear expert -- would know that this was nonsense.

What had happened -- and I think that people don't realize how often this happens in government -- was that in getting the information relayed from the Atomic Energy Commission through OES to our office, which prepared the draft letter answering Ribicoff's query on the Indian nuclear explosion, there was a garble on the numbers. The erroneous information was passed on by one secretary to another secretary. Our assumption in NEA was that we had obtained the correct information. The mistake in transmission involved how rapidly this "heavy water" evaporated. The people in OES who knew the situation hadn't reviewed the final reply and so the wrong information got into this letter. We, frankly, didn't pay enough attention to the details.

All hell broke loose. You have to remember the time. This happened during the "Watergate" affair -- the summer of 1974. This incident was then cited as another example of deceit by the Nixon administration. Matters were made worse because Secretary of State Kissinger misspoke and the Department misspoke about US involvement. This was what started the campaign to get the administration to tighten up its nuclear policy. Even more fundamentally, the Indian nuclear test triggered a whole new approach to our nuclear policy. I think that we were not concerned about reprocessing of nuclear waste at the time. The Indian action led to a change in our overall approach. We insisted that there be safeguards -- what are called "full scope safeguards" -- on all nuclear transactions. Up until this time the safeguards were limited to one aspect which was considered the "dangerous part." Indeed, at the time reprocessing of plutonium was not considered a dangerous process. Today, reprocessing is regarded as an enormous sin and strict limitations are applied to it. It was the Indian explosion which triggered a review of our non-proliferation policies; that led to a global policy that took effect during the Carter administration.

Various efforts were made to punish the Indians. We had very little leverage for doing this because we didn't have very much going on. Congress passed a measure that required the U. S. henceforth to vote against all international loans to India. That had no practical effect because we accounted for only 20 or 25 percent of the votes in the World Bank. The US was essentially left with symbolic actions because we had no assistance programs for India. The people in Washington who didn't like India had an opportunity to vent their spleens. I think the Indians made a monumental strategic blunder. Ambassador Moynihan told Mrs. Gandhi that -- this was not part of his instructions -- when he went in to give her the U.S. reaction to the Indian nuclear explosion in his personal view India had just made a strategic blunder. In effect he said: "It is certain that up until this point you had total dominance over Pakistan. By 'going nuclear' you will prompt them to 'go nuclear,' and they will be able to offset your advantage. Going nuclear is the only way they can equal you. Now you have given them the excuse to go nuclear themselves. And some day, some mad 'Mogul,' some mad general in Islamabad will pick up the phone and tell you, 'If you don't give me Kashmir, I'm going to obliterate New Delhi.'" Ambassador Moynihan reported, "Mrs. Gandhi sat there, looked out the window, and said nothing."

Although a bit exaggerated, Moynihan was right. This is, indeed, exactly what has happened. Pakistan has gone nuclear. The Indians, I think, were very ill advised to proceed with their explosion. They got the worst of all worlds. They let the world know that they were capable of triggering an explosion, but in a military sense, they did not have a weapon or a delivery system. So they didn't really develop a military nuclear capability. They have gradually come around to that, some 20 years later. By insisting that the Indian nuclear explosion was a "peaceful" program they violated the spirit of the NPT [Non-Proliferation Treaty] which asserts that there is no such thing as a "peaceful" program. The Indians got everybody mad at them and they didn't get any of the benefits. They didn't acquire "Great Power" status, which they might have done, had they done what the Chinese Communists have done.

The explosion was not useful even for domestic political purposes. A year later the second major event during this period occurred. Mrs. Gandhi got into great political trouble. She started losing elections and then lost her own seat in Parliament on a technical challenge to her election. This was an allegation that she had used government-owned jeeps to campaign. It was a trivial charge. She was threatened with being pushed out of office. So, rather than accept this, she invoked a national emergency and imposed a quasi-dictatorship. This was in 1975. Ambassador Moynihan had left, and Ambassador Bill Saxbe had replaced him. Her action then finished the job of losing all of India's liberal supporters in the United States.

India had set off a nuclear device. It was no longer a democratic country. As Ambassador Moynihan said: "The only thing they have to offer now that they are no longer the world's largest democracy are communicable diseases." This infuriated the Indians, but it was true. So you had the liberals and "The New York Times" beating up on the Indians.

During the Ford administration, Secretary of State Kissinger consistently held the view that India's domestic policies were its own affair, unless they impinged on us. Therefore he took no exception to what happened. I sat in on a meeting after the Emergency was imposed during which he told Ambassador Kaul that: "We did not disapprove of your actions." The Ford administration was beaten up by the liberals for not condemning Mrs. Gandhi's declaration of a national emergency.

I stayed in the Country Director's job at the start of the Carter administration. I stayed on for the first four or five months -- until the summer of 1977. There was a turnaround in policy. When Carter came in, things looked really bad for US-India relations because he wanted to emphasize nuclear non proliferation -- and he criticized President Ford on that issue. And President Carter emphasized human rights and democracy.

Then, to people's surprise, Mrs. Gandhi decided to have an election. She proved that she wasn't anti-democratic because she lost the election in February, 1977. I don't think that she would have called the election had she known that she was going to lose it. She was thrown out of office. There was a new government in India. The opposition, which was cobbled together very quickly, was less "pro-Moscow. It was headed by an 81-year-old gentleman -- Morarji Desai -- who had been considered "pro-American." He was a moralist like President Carter. He was a supporter of Mahatma Gandhi. He disliked nuclear testing and said that there would never be another nuclear test while he was in office. He made that very clear, and it looked as if we were in for a period of better relations.

We wrote a paper for the transition team, but I don't think that India was much on their mind. It was assumed that relations between India and the United States would get better. President Carter's mother had served in India in the Peace Corps. Of course, it didn't happen immediately, but Mrs. Gandhi announced that there would be elections before Carter was inaugurated. That changed the atmosphere.

The one single event that happened during the first few months of the Carter administration, and I was involved in that, was that the President of India died. The President of India is a figurehead -- a ceremonial chief of state. The question came up of sending a delegation to attend the funeral. President Carter decided to send his mother, Mrs. Lillian Carter. I went along for the trip. That was clearly a sign of interest by President Carter in India. This was the first and only such trips that I ever went on. We traveled on "Air Force One" [the aircraft assigned to the President by the Air Force]. We left Washington at 10:00 AM. My boss was on the plane -- the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, Adolph ("Spike") Dubs, a very fine man who was unfortunately killed later in Kabul [Afghanistan]. Along was also Tom Thornton, the South Asia expert on the NSC [National Security Council] staff. On board were a Congressman from Nebraska, Senator Percy [Republican, Illinois], and the Assistant Press Spokesman for the White House. There were just four "official" members of the delegation: Mrs. Carter, Senator Percy, the Congressman, and "Spike" Dubs. Then there were three of us who were not members of the delegation: the Country Director and myself, and Tom Thornton, who was a friend of mine. We had a briefing for Ms. Lillian, who turned out to be pretty shrewd. I was much impressed with her. Senator Percy wanted to get into a big, substantive discussion with Mrs. Gandhi, still the Prime Minister of India. We argued with him and said that the best thing to do with Mrs. Gandhi was just to attend the funeral and not to engage in any substantive talks, which is what "Miss Lillian" did. We were in New Delhi for a day and then went down to Bombay. "Miss Lillian" went off -- I didn't go with her -- to visit the place where she had worked in the Peace Corps as a nurse. The whole trip went so fast. It was like a blur.

The appointment of Bob Goheen as Ambassador was also a sign of interest in India. Goheen was the former President of Princeton. More than that, he had been born in India, was the son of missionary parents, and felt very much attached to India. This was seen as a sign of interest in India on the part of the new administration. I sat in on his meeting with Secretary of State Vance whom he knew very well. I didn't sit in at his meeting with President Carter. According to Goheen, Carter said that all he wanted from India was a signal that India was not going to explode another nuclear device. When Ambassador Goheen called on Prime Minister Morarji Desai, the Prime Minister said: "You have my word that there will be no further nuclear tests." That set the relationship on what was seen to be a much better basis.

We also held a private meeting in London with the Indians in 1977 on the nuclear question between Joe Nye, the new top nuclear man at State, and Jagat Mehta, the Indian Foreign Secretary. I went along and attended. The main hope was to persuade the Indians to agree to put all of their nuclear facilities under international inspection, under a system of foolproof safeguards set up by the IAEA [International Atomic Energy Administration]. This involved some presidential letters. The meeting in London was not successful, but we did express our concerns about nuclear explosions. Nevertheless, there was a feeling that we were on a better course in terms of our relations with India. The Indians said that they wanted, in their terms, a "more balanced bilateralism," -- i.e. a more balanced kind of non alignment, which was less pro-Soviet.

Let me now just briefly discuss Nepal and Sri Lanka. During most of the time that I was on the desk, Carol Laise our Ambassador to Nepal. She was very much the "Queen Bee." She had been the Country Director and had been Ambassador about four years by the time I was assigned to South Asian Affairs. She had all the issues at her fingertips, although there weren't many. They were basically assistance issues and personnel matters. They were matters which could be handled at the Country Director level, unlike India, which went to the Secretary of State. There really wasn't much at issue in Nepal. That is pretty much what I meant when I said that Nepal "ran itself."

To illustrate the kinds of problems we had with Nepal, there was an issue about climbing Mt. Everest. Traditionally, the Nepalese do not decide which Americans would be approved to climb the mountain. They left that to the American Alpine or Mountaineering Club, which is a very "establishment" kind of organization.

Some fellow from Alaska, who turned out to be a kook, wanted to climb Mt. Everest. He didn't get the approval from the American Alpine Club; so he protested and got his Senator to approach the State Department to complain. The Nepalese Desk Officer in the State Department was "bamboozled" by this guy. I really didn't pay any attention to him. He passed the issue to the Nepalese Embassy in Washington and said, in effect: "We are taking no position on what the American Alpine Club says." The Nepalese Embassy took that to mean that we were endorsing this guy, this kook, who then went out to Nepal and started putting up crosses half way up Mt. Everest. These were 50 foot crosses, and they created a problem. I remember that our Nepalese Desk Officer and the Embassy in Kathmandu were all upset. As I said, until then I had not really gotten into how this matter had been handled.

Then the people in the American Alpine Club started writing letters and making phone calls to Secretary of State Vance to find out what was going on. They knew Vance. They said: "Why did you 'disenfranchise' the American Alpine Club?" So we said: "We made a mistake." This was the point. On matters like this the Country Director could decide things. We had made the mistake, so we could unmake the mistake. So we wrote a diplomatic note to the Nepalese Embassy in Washington, saying that we were canceling this proposed climb of Mt. Everest and that we were "re-recognizing" the American Alpine Club. We suggested that the Embassy follow their recommendations. The Nepalese Government promptly took the approval away from this kook, kicked him out of the country, and that was the end of the story. As Country Director, I could deal with matters like that.

In the case of Sri Lanka, Chris Van Hollen was the Ambassador. He had been the Deputy Assistant Secretary for South Asia Affairs prior to that. There was more going on in Sri Lanka. Ambassador Van Hollen was very active. In this case he pretty much worked with the Desk Officer for Sri Lanka. I didn't have much direct contact with him, although I signed letters to him which were drafted by the Desk Officer. They worked very effectively as a team and there were few problems. I spent, I would say, 85-90% of my time as Country Director on India, and very little time, directly, on Sri Lanka and Nepal. It didn't mean that they weren't part of the office for which I was responsible, but the relationship with Sri Lanka and Nepal took very little of my time unless there was a visit. As far as visits were concerned, I met Mrs. Bandaranaike [Prime Minister of Sri Lanka], up in New York. She was there in connection with the annual UN meetings. I sat in on a 30-minute "non conversation" between her and Kissinger. She hardly said anything other than "Yes" or "No."

The Deputy Assistant Secretary probably spent no time at all on Sri Lanka and Nepal, nor did the Assistant Secretary, except for an occasional situation. Still, they liked the Sri Lankan and Nepalese Ambassadors. But on a day-to-day, the fact is that our relations with Sri Lanka and Nepal were handled at the Desk officer level. We had very competent Desk Officers. I found that the more competent a subordinate, the less I had to do with these countries. In one or two cases the subordinate turned out to be weak, and I suddenly found myself spending a lot more time on the smaller countries, simply because I wasn't satisfied with the work that was being done.

We had a change in Assistant Secretaries while I was in NEA -- from Sisco to Roy Atherton. Sisco was someone who had been very much involved with the Indians during the crisis over the 1971 war. Sisco was also involved in everything that might involve the "Seventh Floor" [the Secretary of State and other, senior officers of the Department] and anything of major significance. He was directly involved in Indian issues. For example, he read such things as my nuclear paper.

Atherton was less involved, although he had served in India. He was much more involved in the Middle East and left issues more to the Deputy Assistant Secretaries and the Country Directors. Sisco kept his fingers on everything. Roy Atherton was absorbed with the Middle East and the Middle East peace process. He was involved in "shuttle" trips to the area and spent a lot of time on the road. But I didn't think that it was a problem. If you needed to get to someone, you could always see Joe Sisco, who was then the Under Secretary for Political Affairs. Kissinger was also available for Indian issues. So I never felt that we missed any opportunities because of a lack of access to senior officers of the Department. The process actually worked more informally than an organization chart would suggest. We didn't always have to go to a more senior level. If the desk officer for a small country is competent, he or she didn't need the Country Director. It's not as if there was a "void." If you needed higher authority, you got the help. If you didn't, you did your own work. Roy Atherton was available when he was around. If he wasn't, we usually went to someone on the "Seventh Floor".

My first Deputy Assistant Secretary was Sid Sober, who had come back to Washington from Pakistan. He was briefly a Deputy Assistant Secretary for South Asia and then moved up to be senior Deputy Assistant Secretary. Bruce Laingen then moved up to be the Deputy Assistant Secretary dealing with South Asia. He was there about a year. He never was confirmed in the job because Secretary Kissinger decided on a program called "GLOP," -- Global Perspectives. Kissinger felt that the people in the Department were too insular and that the regional bureaus were too inbred. He always wanted to have at least one of the Deputy Assistant Secretaries come from another area. So Larry Eagleburger [Under Secretary of State for Management] refused to confirm Bruce Laingen in the job as Deputy Assistant Secretary, since he basically had only served in South Asia. Eventually, Eagleburger insisted on Bruce Laingen going to Europe. They assigned "Spike" Dubs, who had been DCM and chargé d'affaires in Moscow, as Deputy Assistant Secretary for South Asian Affairs.

That made a big difference to me as Country Director for India. I forget when "Spike" Dubs came in -- maybe in 1975 or 1976 -- during the latter half of my time working on India. Until then I had been working for superiors who were very knowledgeable about South Asia. So my latitude for action was reduced.

There was a period when Armin Meyer was acting Deputy Assistant Secretary for South Asian Affairs. He had just come back from Japan, where he had been Ambassador. No one was in the job, so he handled it for a while. He had served in the region earlier. When "Spike" Dubs came in as Deputy Assistant Secretary in 1975, it made a big difference to me, because "Spike" didn't know much about South Asia. He was a good boss, who treated his subordinates well and gave us a lot of leeway. Not that he wasn't in charge. You talked things over with him, but you had an opportunity to express your views.

While commenting on the process during my tour in NEA, I should refer back to our Ambassadors in India. We had two Ambassadors who were very high powered [Galbraith and Moynihan]. It was very different with Ambassador Saxbe. I used to call him "a canny cornball." He had been a Senator from Ohio and Attorney General. He was put in at the end of the Watergate Affair because nobody could accuse him of being in President Nixon's "pocket." He knew India, having visited the country on several occasions. He liked India. He didn't know a lot about the normal processes of diplomacy. He believed in operating as an Ambassador the way he would as a Senator -- namely, by calling in the "New York Times" or "Washington Post" correspondent and making a point, rather than going to the Foreign Minister. He also didn't believe in "calling" on other ambassadors or Indian Government officials. His attitude was: "Well, if they need me, they know where I am." He was unique.

President Nixon, in fact, had told Ambassador Moynihan not to be "public." So Moynihan gave one press conference during his two years in India, and that was the day before he left. Moynihan had no press exposure in India, which is very unlike him. Ambassador Moynihan kept a low profile. He found it very frustrating, but he did it.

Ambassador Saxbe came in when Ford was President. Saxbe was politically more powerful than Moynihan. At that time Moynihan had not been elected Senator. He was an academic who had worked his way up to the White House and become a public personality. However, Ambassador Saxbe had been a Senator and an Attorney General. He didn't really owe anybody anything. President Ford asked him what he wanted to do. He said, "Go to India." He was delighted to go to India. He went and said publicly: "We are ready for whatever relationship the Indians are ready for."

After a while in Delhi, he became upset. He said that he had been reading the Indian papers and saw all of the official criticism of the United States. Yet the same officials would come to the Embassy and ask for help so their children can study in the United States. He called in the correspondent of the "New York Times." He said: "I don't understand this country. On Monday the President of India criticizes the United States in a speech. On Tuesday he is over at my house for dinner, telling me what a wonderful country we have, and can I help him get his son into Harvard. What is it, what do they want?" Naturally, this made good copy and soon appeared as a NY Times story, stirring up a diplomatic fuss.

We finally had to tell Saxbe: "We appreciate your views and we agree with them. But don't give them to the 'New York Times.'" Actually, I think that Ambassador Saxbe was quite effective, because he made the policy point that the Indians were not all that important for us. For a variety of reasons the Indians had an exaggerated view of their importance to the US. Ambassador Saxbe helped to get bring them down to earth.

Saxbe was in India during a difficult time -- the "emergency". Since there wasn't much going on bilaterally, he traveled and played golf a lot -- and complained when the Indians criticized us. I remember one telegram that he sent in. He was pushing to get us to withdraw the offer of economic aid. It is an unusual ambassador who will take such a stand.

The embassy staff rather liked him. He basically had the same staff that Ambassador Moynihan had. Moynihan had a very good team in New Delhi. The staff found it quite different, working for Ambassador Saxbe. He let the Embassy run itself. He had the same DCM [David Schneider]. He brought out a couple of staff aides. Normally, a "political" ambassador is allowed one aide. In fact, Ambassador Saxbe had two. One of them had been his personal assistant for years and the other was a fellow who had been the head of management at the Department of Justice. There was great concern that this person, who was considered a "high powered", was going to try to run the embassy.

In fact, the staff did have some trouble with the former Justice man, at first, but then it worked out all right. John Reager was the administrative officer, and he was a fairly tough cookie.

Saxbe was Ambassador to India for a couple of years. He "did his own thing." When he wanted to listen to us, he did. When he didn't, he didn't. With both Moynihan and Saxbe as ambassadors, I got to see Secretary of State Kissinger quite a bit. Both would come back to Washington for consultations, more often than most career ambassadors. I remember that on one occasion Ambassador Saxbe was supposed to see Secretary Kissinger at 9:00 AM on a Saturday morning. So I came into the Department. At 8:50 AM I had a phone call from Kissinger's office, saying that he wasn't ready to receive Ambassador Saxbe. Kissinger's aide said: "As a matter of fact, he is "on hold." Saxbe said: "What does that mean?" So we waited about 10 minutes, and he said: "Look, I have an appointment at 10:00 AM. Call back and say that I will stay around until 9:30 AM and then I am leaving." So I called Kissinger's office. I was told: "Saxbe can't leave at 9:30. The Secretary has put him 'on hold,'" Saxbe was sitting there. I told him: "They say you can't leave." He said: "The hell I can't. Tell him that I'm leaving at 9:30," which was only a few minutes from then. I put the phone down. Five minutes later, I got another phone call: "Tell Saxbe that he should be up here in five minutes. The schedule has been rearranged." So, five minutes later, we were in Kissinger's office. Kissinger's first question was: "You were going to play golf, weren't you?" Saxbe said: "Yes, I have an appointment with Senator Fulbright at 10:00 AM."

I remember one thing about briefing both Moynihan and Saxbe. Papers were of no particular use. What mattered was your oral presentation during the minute and a half or two minutes on the way from the office to the office of whomever you were seeing. Both would ask: "What is the main point? What should I say about this or that?" This was particularly true of Saxbe.

The main issue that Saxbe took up with Kissinger was the arms sale to Pakistan. Kissinger was pushing for such assistance. It was the big issue at the time. Saxbe would walk right in and say to Kissinger: "What's all this about arms to Pakistan?" This put Kissinger on the defensive. When he started into his usual presentation on this matter, Saxbe said: "That's the most stupid thing I have ever heard of." Kissinger wasn't expecting this. Saxbe was unique!

Both Moynihan and Saxbe were pretty independent of Washington -- Saxbe, in particular. Moynihan was in the White House loop. I remember that we got him all excited about arms to Pakistan when he was departing from India, but he didn't raise the issue with President Ford. He probably wouldn't have raised it, anyway, because this was something that Secretary Kissinger wanted to do. Saxbe, on other hand, trod "where angels feared to walk." He couldn't have cared less. He used to say: "I can always go home."

One of the Kissinger innovations was the institution of "Joint Commissions" with different countries. He became interested in having a joint India-US commission. We first heard about it from the Indians who had wanted a joint commission. We had always said that it was not the American way of doing things. The Indians had a joint commission with the Soviets. That is the way the Soviets operated. The Indians wanted one with us.

They said: "Your Secretary has agreed to it." We said: "This is nonsense. We don't want this." Then we checked and found that Kissinger had indeed agreed to it.

We didn't want a joint commission because we didn't want to have all aspects of our relations with India controlled by the Indian Government. Our point was that there should be "people to people" contacts, and private businesses should be free to deal with Indian counterparts, instead of dealing with the government all the time. But Kissinger had already agreed so we had to work out an agreement. The reason he agreed, I assume, was that a commission cost us little and was a way to make the Indians a bit happier. So Eric Gonsalves -- the DCM at the Indian Embassy -- and I then set about negotiating an agreement on the joint commission. We developed a draft and talked our way through it. He said: "This is an advantage for you because, in fact, if an American does business in India today, at any level, the Indian government is going to become involved. So this way, if you get things done through the Joint Commission, you then have the government's blessing. If you don't do this, there's no system now for giving you the government's blessing. Today it is very hard for Americans to get anything done in India."

I accepted that but said: "Let us try to set up a rational structure that at least will do no harm or make things worse." He said: "That sounds reasonable." We decided to set up a system without a formal structure. The Joint Commission, as such, was the Secretary of State and the Indian Foreign Minister. We figured that since the Indian Foreign Minister always came to the UN every year, they would meet once every year. And once every two years the Secretary of State, we thought, was about right for the Secretary to go to New Delhi. The real work of the Joint Commission, such as it was, would be done by Sub-Commissions. There would be no staff and no formal organization. Nothing. There would be three Sub-Commissions: one on science and technology, because we had a large "rupee financed" program of science projects in India, amounting to about $20 million a year. It was handled by the Science Attaché in New Delhi. The Subcommission on Science and Technology would go over programs, assign priorities, and so forth.

The second Sub-Commission was to work in the field of education and culture. This was an area that in which we had some interest -- doing more on educational exchanges, getting Indian scholars to come to the US, etc. Each side could set up its part the way it wanted to. We didn't try to make it parallel. We then arranged to include various U. S. agencies on our side. We had one representative from USIS [United States Information Agency], one from the arts and museums, one from the publishing sector -- some private, some public.

Then there was a Sub-Commission on Economics and Trade, which was strictly governmental. The Indians wanted a mixed private-public Sub-Commission, but we did not agree with this, because a governmental sub-commission could only talk about policy issues and some general current problems. As a result, we set up a parallel, private sector Sub-Commission, called the Joint Business Council. I think that the U. S. side consisted of representatives from the Indian Subsection of the International Chamber of Commerce. Orville Freeman was the first head of that. The Indian Chamber of Commerce then set up a similar group.

So this Joint Commission got under way. Bob Goheen was the first head of the U. S. team of the Sub-Commission on Education and Culture. I think that the Assistant Secretary for OES [Bureau of Environmental and Scientific Affairs] was the head of the U. S. element of the Sub-Commission on Science and Technology. The Assistant Secretary for Economic Affairs was the head of the U. S. element of the Sub-Commission on Economics and Trade.

Before the first meeting of the Joint Commission, which was held during the visit to Washington of Chavan in 1976, the Indian Foreign Minister, Kissinger had the three chairmen of the U.S. elements of the three sub-commissions up to his office. He said: "I wish you well and good luck. But let me tell you one thing: don't come asking for any money. I am not going to give you any. You figure out how you are going to finance anything that you agree to." In fact, the sub-commissions are now 20 years old. They are still functioning. I think that they have achieved their goal. They have done no harm. They have done some good. The Indians feel that it has been a reasonable institution. I think that we did a reasonably good job of negotiating it in such a way that it has created no permanent bureaucracy.

These sub-commissions did things that might not have happened without them, particularly in the education and cultural fields. In the mid 1980s they decided on an "India Here" program in the United States, with big exhibits. It provided a venue which had not previously existed. They would consider from time to time, "What can we do" and "What should we do"? I think that was a good thing. In practical terms, as Gonsalves said, it provided a vehicle to get approval for some science projects. It provided a vehicle to get approval for anything that was decided on in the cultural area. The Sub-Commission on Economics and Trade faded out. The U S. private business sector never did very much with this. The structure still exists, but the wonderful thing about it is that there is nothing to the structure. It is a mechanism which can be used or not used. Once or twice it was interesting.

DEAN RUST
Staff Assistant to Director, Arms Control and Disarmament Agency
Washington, DC (1974-1976)

Mr. Rust was born and raised in Ohio, and was educated at Bowling Green University and Ohio State University. In 1970 he joined the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency in Washington, D.C. and worked with that Agency until his retirement in 2005. An expert in nuclear and conventional disarmament issues, Mr. Rust was a major participant in the US government's international treaty negotiations during five Presidential Administrations.

Q: You did that for how long?

RUST: About 2 ½ years, until late '76.

Q: All right, let's talk a bit about Fred Iklé. How did he operate, and how did you see him?

RUST: Well, Fred was known as an intellectual, not necessarily somebody who was all that comfortable in the policy milieu of Washington. A brilliant guy who had been with Rand and had written about strategic nuclear issues. And of course the most important thing going on in arms control was negotiations with the Soviet Union. One of the reasons he became a favorite with me is because after the Indian nuclear test of May 1974, Fred was clearly the leader within the executive branch on nuclear non proliferation issues. While still engaged on U.S. Soviet stuff, Fred saw the spread of nuclear weapons to other countries as suddenly a very dominant issue. Kissinger, who was then the Secretary of State, yawned when the Indians conducted the nuclear test in 1974. But Fred saw this as a direct threat in terms of weapons spreading to other countries beyond the five then declared nuclear weapons states. So he took it on as a crusade. He was tough and wasn't afraid of Kissinger, and ACDA made a big difference in those years (1973-76) on U.S. nuclear nonproliferation policy. Iklé was particularly strong on questioning the role of plutonium in civil applications, fearing that its widespread use even in the U.S. would help foster its use overseas. A stockpile of plutonium, even if nominally for civil use, can also provide the basis for a nuclear weapons program. He feared that extensive use of plutonium for peaceful applications would seriously increase the risk of nuclear proliferation and supported efforts to weigh the pros and cons, along with strengthened controls to ensure the security and safety of plutonium where it was used.

In State, the Politico-Military (PM) Bureau handled nonproliferation. I believe George Vest was the head of PM. Vest and Iklé collaborated quite a little bit. ACDA had much more of the functional expertise that you needed in order to do this nuclear proliferation business. PM and ACDA teamed up pretty well, once Fred got the State Department's attention. As Iklé's Staff Assistant from 74-76, I was able to see a lot of the policy studies and memoranda that the ACDA

Director dealt with. Because of Iklé's interest in nuclear arms non proliferation, I learned a lot and started to interact with the ACDA policy people in this area.

Q: What was the state of nuclear non proliferation in '74 when you were there. I mean what did this mean and were there any underpinnings to this?

RUST: Well, between 1945 when the United States developed nuclear weapons and through 1970, that is 25 years, five countries had become nuclear weapons states. The Soviets followed the U.S. then the British, the French and then the Chinese in '64. The nuclear non proliferation treaty was negotiated in the mid 60's. It came into force in 1970; that treaty drew a line in the sand. It was based on the assumption that proliferation would contribute to instability and increase the risk of nuclear war. It said "let's stop proliferation where we are." Under the treaty, states that didn't have weapons pledged not to get them, and to accept international inspections. Countries that had nuclear weapons (the Five) pledged not to transfer the possession of nuclear weapons to others and not to assist others in the acquisition of nuclear weapons; they also agreed to try to negotiate an end to the nuclear arms race and to reduce their own nuclear arsenals. So that is where we were when the Indians conducted a nuclear test in 1974. This test was kind of a rude awakening because people thought that by that time, i.e. after the NPT had entered into force. most countries had accepted the notion that it was not a good idea for proliferation not to go beyond the five.

Q: Was India a signatory to the NPT?

RUST: No. And the fact is that in 1970, when the treaty entered into force, not everybody embraced it initially. Fifty or sixty states joined. Many countries like the Indians said, "Hey, this is a discriminatory treaty... it allows some states to keep their weapons, but it requires others who join it to forswear their acquisition. We are not going to be party to that." Of course, the truth is many countries did join the treaty despite its discriminatory nature, while others wanted to keep the nuclear option open. The Chinese, a neighbor of India, had nuclear weapons. And of course India always followed a somewhat independent path in its foreign policy.

Q: How did we view the Chinese at that time?

RUST: The Chinese were a non-player during the negotiations. The U.S. of course had not recognized "mainland" China at this point and it wasn't even in the UN. The Chinese criticized the treaty as a condominium between the U.S. and the Soviets. The U.S. and Soviets were seen by the Chinese as two countries who were trying to deny other countries the right to get their own nuclear weapons. "The U.S. and Soviets want to rule the world." Chinese propaganda suggested that nuclear proliferation would be a positive development as it would break U.S.-Soviet hegemony. In reality, I suspect the Chinese were more cautious about proliferation after getting their own bomb in 1964. But you would never know that from their stated positions. In the long run, China joined the NPT (1991) and changed its position considerably, although it's generally accepted that Pakistan's nuclear weapons program was aided by China during the 1980's.

Q: How did you deal, let's stick to this early period, Israel?

RUST: Well, a lot of countries didn't join the treaty at this early stage. The Israelis were not particularly unusual in that regard. There were a lot of states in the Middle East, Arab states included, that were not in the treaty.

Q: When did we realize the Israelis had a nuclear bomb?

RUST: The Israelis had acquired the Dimona reactor from the French in the 1950's, I believe. It was not under international safeguards and by some time in the 1970's it was pretty clear that it had operated long enough to produce sufficient plutonium for nuclear weapons. I don't recall the dates, but there was a leak out of the U.S. intelligence community in the late 1970's that Israel likely possessed X number of weapons, and of course the famous case of the Israeli nuclear technician Mordecai Vanunu who spilled his guts for the London Sunday Times in the 1980s. I don't know when the U.S. knew for sure. I didn't have the clearances to know that information and I couldn't reveal it even if I did. My own guess is it was sometime in the 70s they probably had some, but of course they have never admitted to having nuclear weapons and have said only that they won't be the first to introduce nuclear weapons into the Middle East.

Q: Well I was just wondering. We have been preaching and yet we have taken one significant country and put it to one side, which is not only awkward, but hypocritical.

RUST: Well again, in the 60s and 70s we didn't put them aside. The double standard criticism of setting the Israelis to one side is more pertinent to the 80s, 90s and today. But the bottom line is that since around 1980 we have essentially just "gone through the motions" in encouraging NPT adherence for not only Israel, but also for India and Pakistan. They have always been the three hardest cases; they said from the beginning that they weren't going to give up the right to acquire their own weapons, and thus they weren't going to join the treaty. In principle, we continue to maintain U.S. support for universal NPT adherence, i.e. all states joining the Treaty -- while recognizing there is little near-term prospect of action by Israel, India and Pakistan. They are the only three that have never joined the treaty. Today, there are 188 parties to the NPT. North Korea had joined it but has withdrawn. As far as hypocrisy is concerned, U.S. nonproliferation diplomacy has labored under that charge from the beginning since we are encouraging others to forego something we believe remains essential to our own security. There's also a little truth to the charge in regards to Israel, but it's a fact of life under the regime generally for the U.S. Thankfully, there are many non-nuclear weapon state NPT parties who agree generally with the U.S. on the importance of the NPT and whose diplomacy is not hypocritical on these matters.

Q: While you were doing this staff assistant work, I take it you found it from your perspective a harmonious relationship between George Vest at PM and Fred Iklé at ACDA.

RUST: Yeah, pretty much. While ACDA was an independent agency, it was small and not Cabinet level. ACDA Directors could be influential only if they worked collegially with senior levels at State and NSC. They would exercise their independence only when the stakes appeared to be worth it. So there were times when Fred took different positions than George on some key issues, but by and large, particularly at the assistant secretary and assistant director levels, good working relationships were the norm.

Iklé did take a pretty strong stand on the importance of preventing the spread of enrichment and reprocessing technology. The 1974 Indian test awakened people to this technology issue; enrichment and reprocessing are parts of the civil nuclear fuel cycle, but are also critical to producing fissile material for weapons. So there is that old dichotomy of nuclear energy. It can have peaceful applications but it can also have horrific military applications. Some of these far-reaching policies that Iklé was pushing occasionally ran into some problems with our European allies and with Japan. But PM hung in there with ACDA and Congress was also pushing for strong action. So the "clientitis" that generally pervades the regional bureaus of State was generally overcome. In general, the mid-1970s saw the beginning of the broadening of the nuclear nonproliferation regime beyond the NPT and IAEA. The latter was formed in 1957, but its responsibilities significantly expanded once the NPT entered into force as all non-nuclear parties were required by the NPT to negotiate safeguards agreements with the IAEA.

A couple other things happened during Iklé's tenure that were quite significant from a nonproliferation perspective. In July or August 1974, we negotiated agreements with Israel and Egypt to provide them nuclear power reactors. This happened just before Nixon resigned. These agreements contained strong nonproliferation controls, some of which are still discussed today, for example in the case of Russia's sale of a power reactor to Iran. That said, the sales never came to fruition, because the continued aftermath of the May 1974 Indian test caused U.S. policy to tighten beyond those conditions that were to apply to the sales to Egypt and Israel. The other major development was the creation of the Nuclear Suppliers Group, known at that time as the London Club. Initially, there were 7 states; today there are 45 and it continues serving as an effective nonproliferation tool. The first 18 months of meetings were held in general secrecy, due to concern about criticism from developing countries about a suppliers cartel. The purpose of the group was to establish common rules so that recipients couldn't play one supplier off another, which had the effect of commercial considerations trumping nonproliferation when it comes to selling nuclear material and equipment.

Q: Did your office in ACDA look for aggressive sellers of nuclear producing equipment? I am thinking particularly of France and Germany and all. Were we looking out for the salesmen in the 1970's?

RUST: Yes. We would get reports that would indicate, for example, that a firm in Germany was talking to the Brazilians about selling them sensitive nuclear technology. Whenever that happened we would go to the German government and point out the risks of selling these guys reprocessing and enrichment technology. At that time Brazil was not in the NPT, nor was Argentina. We were tracking about 10-12 countries; we called them the "dirty dozen" at one time.

Q: We were quite concerned I think in later years about the nuclear policies of Brazil and Argentina. Nobody could figure out what the hell they wanted. It seemed as though they were in competition about who could acquire the biggest nuclear toys.

RUST: Well that is right. We always realized that technology control and denial of themselves were not going to solve this thing. But what you were buying was time. If you flip forward 10-15 years from the mid 70s to 1990, you find that the political leaders in both governments had realized that competition among the two of them in the military applications of nuclear energy would not be good for the hemisphere, was not good for their security. So both states ultimately accepted comprehensive international safeguards and joined, first the Latin American Nuclear Weapon Free Zone Treaty, and then the NPT. So today they are highly respected members of the non proliferation community. We bought ourselves some time, because we were able to discourage a lot of transfers and sensitive technologies back in the 70s and early 80s -- at least in the case of Latin America.

Q: Even at that time we had commercial firms that could profit by stepping over the edge or getting very close to the edge.

RUST: Yes, absolutely. Remember this is in the aftermath of the energy crisis of '73, the oil crisis. People were looking more to nuclear reactors for generation of electricity. These sales were worth hundreds of millions of dollars and there was fierce commercial competition among countries that could manufacture reactors for export. For example, the West Germans might say, "Hey, if you buy our reactor, we will sweeten up the deal with a pilot enrichment or reprocessing plant." That's when the suppliers got together, at U.S. initiative, to agree on common rules such a halt in the export of facilities for enrichment and reprocessing. That way, Brazil was not able to use the appeal of a $500 million power reactor sale to gain these extra technologies. You see power reactors are not directly applicable to proliferation. It is the special technologies that can produce fissile material for weapons, e.g. reprocessing of spent fuel to acquire plutonium and enrichment of uranium to high levels of the isotope U-235. We need to keep those technologies out of the hands of states whose nonproliferation bona fides are suspect. Recall that in the 1970's France hadn't even joined the NPT. So nobody knew if they were on board this non proliferation game or not. The French were among the original 7 members of the nuclear suppliers group, which began to meet in 1975. As of the mid 70s then there was pretty much agreement that nobody would be selling enrichment or reprocessing facilities or technology to anybody as part of a commercial deal.

Q: You mentioned the IAEA earlier. These are the inspectors. They got the Nobel Prize in 2005, but where did they stand in the 1970's?

RUST: Well, let me go back a little. The origins of the IAEA date to the 1950s. Dwight Eisenhower proposed in 1953 his atoms for peace program. The essence of this program was to encourage limited commerce among nations for peaceful nuclear applications, but only under international inspections. That was the International Atomic Energy Agency. The IAEA statute was agreed upon in '57. It was given a dual responsibility - to promote the so-called peaceful nuclear atom as well as to verify its peaceful use. It slowly developed a safeguard system. By the time the NPT came along in 1970, the treaty negotiators decided to require all the non nuclear states that joined the NPT to negotiate a safeguards agreement with the IAEA to help verify the NPT undertaking not to acquire nuclear weapons. So by the mid 70s, the IAEA was negotiating safeguards agreements with every NPT party. The safeguard system was still in the rudimentary stage, but it was beginning to grow at that time. The United States was putting a lot of money into helping develop the technology that would provide a reasonable assurance that countries were using nuclear facilities only for peaceful purposes, and not trying to divert these facilities for military operations.

Q: Were U.S. firms on board? Was there a problem of rogue operations or not?

RUST: No, in U.S. firms I would say not. They did resent the fact that U.S. national legislation often made it more difficult for them to sell than it would for French or German firms, so they did want a level playing field. That was part of the purpose of the nuclear suppliers group, i.e. to make sure all nations selling power reactors were doing so under the same conditions. U.S. firms knew that it was in their interest to have strong nonproliferation controls, because you don't want a peaceful sale to end up helping somebody with a nuclear bomb. That outcome would severely erode public confidence in nuclear commerce. So by and large over the years nuclear industry in the United States has been fairly supportive of strong export controls. They want to be able to compete and sell, but they understand that anything that has nuclear energy involved in it has the potential for misuse. So you have to have strong controls.

Q: How about Congress. You mentioned Scoop Jackson. I think Richard Perle was his man at one point. Did they have a different agenda than ACDA?

RUST: Not on proliferation. Scoop's interest was on strategic arms control. Those interested in proliferation in the Congress were John Glenn in the Senate, and Alan Cranston but less so. In the House you had a guy named Jonathan Bingaman from New York and a couple others. These Members got very involved after the India test of '74. There was concern that some U.S. supply to India had been used to produce the plutonium for its '74 peaceful nuclear explosion. So yes, Congress became involved in a big way in tightening U.S. nuclear export controls. The laws passed in the 1970's not only upgraded U.S. controls on nuclear exports, but they also called for certain punitive measures (e.g. cutoff of economic and security assistance) against other countries that engaged in proliferation acts such as a nuclear explosion or acquisition of enrichment or reprocessing equipment. Congress was an ally of ACDA; at that time it believed strongly in the importance of an independent Agency to promote arms control and nonproliferation. Like ACDA, the Congress was always pushing the rest of the Executive branch to take strong stands on these issues.

Q: There are always competing interests within the Executive branch.

RUST: Commercial pressures. You name it. And a little sub-Cabinet agency like ACDA could easily be overwhelmed much of the time. The Executive branch would rally in the immediate aftermath of a dramatic proliferation event like the 74 Indian test, but interest would wane over time. But if a Member of Congress persists, the Administration has to pay attention. So ACDA and certain Members of Congress often found themselves working in support of the same agenda. And ACDA staff would help reformulate Congressional initiatives into something that the Administration could actually support. Congress was very active in the '75, '76, '77, '78 time frame.

Q: What about the Pentagon at this point? Did they have sort of spies in your office or observers or not?

RUST: At this stage of the evolution of U.S. nuclear non proliferation policy, they weren't that big a player.

Q: Did you get any feel for James Schlesinger as Secretary of Defense, and Fred Iklé, I see as sort of intellectuals. I was wondering if you had any feel for the chemistry. How did they interplay with each other?

RUST: I can't speak to their personal interaction. As to policy interaction between ACDA and DOD, it was almost exclusively in the strategic nuclear area. i.e. following up on the 1972 Nixon-era SALT and ABM treaties. DOD got involved in nuclear nonproliferation then only around the time of an NPT Review Conference, the first of which occurred in 1975, five years after the NPT entered into force. At Review Conferences you have to discuss implementation of the NPT, i.e. what each party is doing to fulfill their obligations under the Treaty. For the U.S. and the other nuclear weapon powers who were party at that time -- the UK and USSR -- that meant primarily describing their actions to limit and bring down their nuclear arsenals. So Defense became very much interested in laying out our record of compliance as well as defending ourselves against critics. So the diplomacy and policy development surrounding a Review Conference saw the Pentagon -- both OSD and the Joint Chiefs -- directly engaged. On other issues, e.g. Pakistan and India, ACDA and State occasionally butted heads, and in that context ACDA would try to court DOD, believing that DOD would be a natural ally when it came to taking tough positions on nuclear nonproliferation issues. If anyone should be concerned about others getting the bomb, it should be those responsible for the defense of the United States. But I don't think we were very successful over the years. They certainly started to play a bigger role when the rogue states began to emerge as proliferation threats, which wasn't until the late 1980's/early 1990'. But until this Administration, DOD was always helpful at the time of Review Conferences. This Administration came in with a bias against Treaties generally; and chafed at those provisions of the NPT that required the existing nuclear weapons to progress toward nuclear disarmament. Thus, they weren't all that cooperative in connection with the 2005 NPT Review Conference in showing flexibility and a sympathetic ear toward those who believed the nuclear weapon states should be doing more. Of course, the Administration's opposition to the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty and its withdrawal from the ABM Treaty were significant departures from traditional arms control and, right or wrong, made U.S. NPT diplomacy leading to the 2005 Conference very difficult.

Q: Had the Soviets pretty well joined the choir by this time? Had they realized that the nuclear weapon states were the big boys and we must not let these little guys screw things up?

RUST: Yeah, we often remarked during the cold war that, regardless of differences on other matters, the U.S. and the Soviets tended to agree on nonproliferation. It was not in either of their interest for other countries to get the bomb. We cooperated on nonproliferation even in those very tense times including the Soviet shootdown of the KAL commercial airliner. Reagan had Soviet leaders dying on him; there was a lot of instability in the relationship until Gorbachev. There is still a lot of cooperation and common ground, but as the nonproliferation regime evolved and the USSR collapsed you began see more tactical differences in how to deal with cases like Iran for example. It's almost always been the case frankly that the U.S., Canada, Australia take the hard line, the Europeans are in the middle, and the Soviets and now Russia and China take the weakest approach. Japan would go along with the evolving consensus and it wasn't until the North Korean nuclear and missile threat escalated that Japan could be counted on to become more active. Of course, the current U.S. Administration has added a wrinkle by reversing 30 year old policies and seemingly to "accept" the nuclear programs of India, Israel, and Pakistan while focusing almost exclusively on rogue proliferation. The jury is still out on this shift, but I note that the Administration is not getting much of a push-back on this shift from other countries.

In the bureaucracies of the 1970's we found ourselves fighting often with the predecessors of today's Department of Energy. The Atomic Energy Commission dated to the 1950's I think. Well around 1973-74, the Congress decided the AEC should be split into a regulatory body -- the Nuclear Regulatory Commission -- and a promotional body -- first called the Energy Research and Development Administration which became the Department of Energy under President Carter. NRC regulated U.S. nuclear exports and ERDA later DOE promoted international cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy. So ACDA was often at odds with the nuclear energy promotion people, who were concerned that too strict export controls would lead to the loss of nuclear business to other countries and in the long run deal the U.S. out of any influence on international nuclear policies. State found itself in the middle of a lot of these disputes. The Department of Commerce would also get involved in so-called dual-use nuclear stuff that it licensed. I do recall, however, that cooperation was good when it came to trying to shut down illegal procurement from countries like Pakistan.

Q: I can see an average U.S. Citizen saying at the time: These arms control and nonproliferation types are just a bunch of liberal goody two shoes who are trying to get everyone to live in peace. When actually you are playing the nasty sons of bitches, or not?

RUST: Certainly when it came to nuclear proliferation ACDA played the nasty. That is the President of the United States said that the spread of nuclear weapons to additional countries undermines the security of the United States. It didn't matter to ACDA that taking a tough line might upset bilateral relations with a country or would cost the loss of commercial opportunities. That was our job. That's why ACDA was created in 1961 by President Kennedy, with strong support from the Congress. The State Department was conflicted; Energy and Commerce were pushing U.S. exports out the door. Of course, any effort to deny other countries their sovereign right to acquire what they believe is necessary for their defense is not an easy task. But nuclear weapons have a unique capacity to destroy and undermine U.S. security. If ACDA makes the case and senior policy-makers decided in favor of State or Energy -- so be it. But it was our statutory responsibility to make the nonproliferation argument.

Q: Having been a creature of the State Department I can see exactly why. There are so damn many reason why you can't do something because you have got other priorities. You needed somebody with a focus.

RUST: Certainly, State has functional responsibilities, but more than anything else it is an organization that is designed to promote U.S. interests through use of bilateral country channels. There was a proliferation and arms control responsibility in State/PM, but it was one of many responsibilities for the PM Assistant Secretary. For years, OES had nuclear nonproliferation along with promoting nuclear energy cooperation. They did a great job given this conflicted functional responsibility, but the bottom line is they had to take an approach that met the approval of others in State such as the country desk. ACDA was independent and had the resources - physicists, engineers, chemists -- who knew the technical aspects of the business. Military officers and foreign service officers were detailed to the agency. International relations specialists swelled its civil service ranks. U.S. Administrations have viewed nuclear weapons as dangerous for a long time. President Eisenhower in the 1950's supported a comprehensive nuclear test ban. That concern evolved into support for a separate agency. Even Dean Rusk, the Secretary of State in 1961, was perfectly comfortable with the creation of a separate agency and giving Bill Foster who was its first director independent authority to negotiate with the Soviets on nuclear issues.

JOSEPH P. O'NEILL
Calcutta (1974-1977)

Joseph P. O'Neill was born in New York in 1935. From 1953-1956 he served in the US Army. After joining the Foreign service in 1961 he served positions in Laos, Vietnam, Thailand, the Philippines, India, Portugal, Ethiopia, Djibouti, Sudan, and Eritrea. Mr. O'Neill was interviewed by Thomas Dunnigan in May 1998.

O'NEILL: So, we decided to go out to Calcutta. When we said, "Josephine and I are going to Calcutta, 99% of the Department was happy for us. One percent (most of the people I was working for in the Visa Section) wasn't because I didn't finish the full two year tour." I was almost 40 years old. I knew how to do things. I didn't have to go and bother people. I went out to Calcutta.

Q: What did you go out as?

O'NEILL: I went out as a consular officer. At that time, we had a terrible problem in Calcutta. It was called the "Harcos-Fletcher" matter. Two guys trying to smuggle narcotics in Calcutta had been caught on the King George naval dock. They had not been arrested for smuggling, but had been arrested for trespassing on military property, spying, and held under the Official Secrets Act. The case received so much domestic political pressure that Henry Kissinger had to take it up personally with Indira Gandhi.

This case, I'd like to say, went on for almost two years. I had to visit them in the jail every day. While they were in jail, they went on a hunger strike. They had to be force fed, which I had to watch. The jails in Calcutta were terrible. Finally, we arranged for them to be under house arrest, which they had to pay for. My wife had to go out and buy all their food and bring it in. I had to attend High Court hearings and actually answer questions before My Lord, Justice Talukdar. I forget all the paraphernalia that I had to say, that I was only here to provide comfort to two American citizens, not in any way to observe the proceedings, which I was absolutely positive were being conducted as if it were before the Supreme Court in Washington. Boy, I really put the grease on that one. I spent two years at Court and three years in Calcutta.

The consul general who was just leaving was a nice guy. The deputy consul general in Calcutta was not terribly industrious. I became the de facto number two. I was taking care of the Consular Section and the Harcos-Fletcher matter, which had Secretary of State's interest and Embassy Delhi's interest because everybody was afraid they would die in Indian custody. There was a time when they were really possibly going to die. We finally had them put under house arrest. That was what led to Josephine being the purveyor of all their foods and other necessities.

Then I started to travel on normal consular business. I went to Bihar, to Orissa, all over our consular district. Each place I went, I would sit down as I did in Cebu and I would write long bios on everybody I met. There was a bio form at that time. As time went on, down toward the end of our two years, they asked us to extend, and we did for a third year. So, we did three years in Calcutta. I received a Meritorious Honor Award out of that. But I found the Indians, if you approached them on an intellectual basis, and told them you weren't interested in propaganda, and you talked to them about what was going on that affected them and their relationship with us, you could get a decent dialogue - not a dialogue where you would [have a meeting of the minds] because we still had the Vietnam War. The Vietnam War was going on. And they were very proud that the Vietnamese were beating us. Occasionally, when they would annoy me, I would say, "And I know how well you did against the Chinese." The Chinese had recently beaten them in a border fight. That would really get them. Sometimes I would say, "You know, Calcutta was very important in this fight against the Chinese because the Chinese had sent down scouts who got as far as Calcutta and went back and said, 'If we take Calcutta, we'll lose.'" After a while, they left me alone as it regards Vietnam.

I just want to go back for one thing: Vietnam and the Tet offensive. When the Tet offensive happened, I was in Chiang Mai, but they called me back because we had a number of officers in Hue. Some of our officers in Quang Tri had been under the gun for weeks and weeks, been shelled and the rest. That was Steve Ledogar and Dick Brown. They had to leave. There were others. So, I went back. They were still bringing Marines into Hue when I went in with them. A number of people, German doctors, innocent civilians, had been killed for no reason. I'm not talking about priests. I'm just talking about normal people who had been killed.

Q: They ran amuck.

O'NEILL: I don't know what they were doing. They seemed to have lost discipline. Of course, to retake the old city of Hue, which the Marines went in and took terrible casualties, but the other point is that the Vietnamese marines who went in with our Marines (not immediately, but following up) took great casualties. Of course, I think, psychologically, the United States lost the war when Robert Kennedy started saying that "Our boys are dying and no Vietnamese are dying" and then Cronkite went out and said, "There's a possibility we can't win this." We lost it.

But then they were back to Calcutta, the consul general and I did all the reporting. I did a lot more than he did. He did the analytical stuff. I did the grunt work primarily because as a consular officer, you get around to see everybody and nobody says to the American consul, "You can't come in." They'll say that to the economic officer or the political officer, maybe even say that to the consul general, but somebody in that family is going to need a visa.

Q: How well do we understand that.

O'NEILL: I understand it and used it.

Q: Did the ambassador visit Calcutta very often?

O'NEILL: Yes. Fortunately, by that time, Galbraith (His son is now ambassador in the Balkans) used to come up on a regular basis, primarily to go to Orissa to go swimming. The other ambassadors came up to see us occasionally and the DCM came up to see us, too.

Q: You had a huge consular district.

O'NEILL: Yes. We couldn't visit most of it because the Indians wouldn't let us. The Department for some ungodly reason was very interested in knowing what was happening among the tribes up on the Burmese border.

Q: In the northeast there?

O'NEILL: Yes, up around Assam and Nagoland. I have no idea why. There were human rights violations out there. I had met a number of Italian priests who were up that way, and Irish Christian Brothers. My uncle was an Irish Christian Brother. So, I had a good entree to that level. The archbishop of Calcutta was made a cardinal while I was there and was a friend of the family and had been to the house, and had Josephine's cooking, as everybody else did in that town. It was just intellectually a very stimulating post. For the first time, we had a democratic communist takeover.

Q: I think Bengal was communist controlled.

O'NEILL: Yes. Well, it became communist controlled and never has left communist control. Jyoti Basu. But he was a communist who played golf. He was a communist who liked his Scotch and water. He was a man who loved the finer things in life.

Q: Did you have any personal security problems there in Calcutta?

O'NEILL: The Naxalites were still wandering around the area. The consul general had a bodyguard.

Q: Explain them a bit.

O'NEILL: Naxalites were really anarchists, very, very outside the realm of the communist, Marxist party. They were really beyond the pale. They really believed in killing their enemies. They had killed a lot of people. They were being fought by the West Bengal armed police, which were paramilitary. The fight was really run from the rank of sergeant to about captain by Anglo-

Indians. They were "mean mothers." I mean, they were really bad. They had no compunction. Naxalites never went to trial. They were always killed in fights. It was difficult for me to understand some of it because they were in a corner with their hands behind their back and they were still "allegedly fighting." It was very, very difficult fighting. Most of these officers eventually immigrated to England or to Australia or Canada. They had no future in India because they were "Anglo."

Q: Was there any effect of our Pakistan tilt in those days?

O'NEILL: They never could understand why we were pro-Pakistani. I said, "You mean because they support us in the United Nations, they buy our weapons, they engage in trade with us, etc. and you holler at us, you're against us every time, against us over this and that?" "We have a right to be like that. We're Indians, we're Bengalis." I said, "We have a right to make our own friends." "Oh, you only want people who like you?" "That's what friends are for." The Indian general in charge (interestingly, Jewish) of that area was another friend of mine who had been in charge of an armored division going across into Bangladesh. He now was in charge of all Indian troops in that area. We had some very interesting conversations. He only got annoyed at me once because I got to know many of his middle rank officers. He felt that I was pumping them for information, which I was. But we had a good professional relationship. It was not a personal relationship. But he understood exactly what I was doing. He had a very low opinion of politicians and especially Indian politicians. He knew they were all bribable. This was, by the way, during the time when Mrs. Gandhi took over the whole government. She and her son ran it: forced sterilization, etc.

Q: She declared a state of emergency.

O'NEILL: That's right. It again shows you the value of consulates. [At times], had better information [from Calcutta] about what was going on in Delhi than the people in Delhi. They had very fine officers there, but Indian politicians would return home to Calcutta. It was easier for us to see them and they to see us in my house. I remember having a man by the name of Kamal Nath, who I think has finally been caught by his own government for misappropriation of funds. He came and gave us great information on Thanksgiving Day about Indian atomic energy research. He didn't know he was giving it. We had talked about a number of things. Afterwards, I remember saying to David Korn, who was probably the best writer in the whole Foreign Service, absolutely without par, "Well, I'm not going to write this, am I? You're going to write it, aren't you?" He said, "Well, if you write it, I have to rewrite it, so let me do it." So, he did it. He left out this piece. He had sent it out without showing it to me. I forget what I was doing the next day. I came up and I said to him, "We're got to report this." He said, "Yes, I guess we have to." I said, "Why don't we just to report it EXDIS [exclusive distribution] since it's sensitive?" The result was a beautiful cable from the ambassador in New Delhi (a professor from Ohio or someplace), or I guess it was written by the DCM, saying how much they appreciated the first cable and how much they appreciate our sensitivity in sending this other cable separately and restricted. David Korn said, "You know, luck to the goddam Irish." The Agency was upset that we beat them on this. The chief of station tried to take some of my sources. He eventually did after I left.

But it was for me a very stimulating thing. The poverty was atrocious. We met Mother Theresa before she came in November.

Q: I was going to ask you whether you had met Mother Theresa.

O'NEILL: We did. We met her and her nuns. Again, the previous consular officer was just a real asshole, a jerk, and was making these poor nuns go through all the things that had to be done to get into the States. So, I gave them all B-1 visas and said, "Now, make sure you enter through New York." I put a little note: "Under the patronage of Francis Cardinal Spellman." Never had another bit of trouble, not legal, but correct

The Bengali is really a terribly interesting person. He loves poetry, politics, and is not terribly interested in a great deal of profitable or economic work. But in all this, he is a ferment for India. The old saying "What Bengal thinks today India thinks tomorrow" is or was at the time I was there very, very accurate. You could see the swings in mood, the beginning of Indira Gandhi and her son pushing too far, pushing the Bengali to do something which they hate to do: work. It was just that sort of ferment in the society which caught on. In that period under martial law, Mrs. Gandhi was able to do so many economic things. It has been forgotten, but there were useful things done. The Indian bureaucracy was and continues to be inefficient, ineffective, and corrupt. I think that will be an inhibiting factor in anything that happens for the foreseeable future.

Q: What was the religious situation like in the Calcutta region when you were there? Was it Hindu dominant? Was there much antipathy toward the Muslims? Were there any Muslims or others there?

O'NEILL: The Muslims were not a problem in Calcutta at the time I was there because they were so few. Their presence was barely noted. There was an Anglo-Indian community which was primarily Protestant-Catholic, but of no political influence, nor [were there Muslims] into Mizoland or into Assam or Nagoland. There were animists and Christians and they were a problem which was beginning at that time. I think David Korn pointed out to Delhi and Washington that the movement of Bengalis out of Bangladesh into that area was going to cause friction, which we see by today's paper does cause friction. I don't see religion in that area being a problem. I would not say the same for places like Bombay or in that particular area because they were adjacent to Pakistan. There is still a significant Muslim-

Q: Now, the Bengalis moving out of Bangladesh would be Muslim?

O'NEILL: Absolutely, but they were not moving into Bengali Hindu areas. They were moving into tribal areas to the north, where the land is rich and where there is work and, more importantly, where there is water.

Q: What was the position of the Soviets when you were there in Calcutta?

O'NEILL: It's amazing. It will always amaze me both in Calcutta and in Ethiopia how they have such a good intelligent system, many contacts with the people, and still don't know what the hell is going on. In every case when I was there, any time there was a political controversy, they were always wrong. I knew the Soviet officer who was head of intelligence. He was a guest at my house. He was sent back to Moscow because he had so misreported the situation. I had a very excellent relationship with the number two at the Russian consulate general, which was big. [Calcutta] had Polish, Bulgarian, everybody was there. There was a big Eastern presence, plus an Iranian presence. Everybody was in Calcutta because at one time it was a stopover for all the planes going to and from Europe. Everybody refueled there. The next refueling place was in Bombay. I don't think the East Bloc was terribly effective. In fact, I think they were bad. They did not associate with the people. Anything they did was in a very formal or within a narrow parameter, but there was no personal interplay between-

Q: Even though Bengal was ruled by communists at the time?

O'NEILL: West Bengal at that time was not ruled by the communists, but was eventually ruled by the communists alone. Very, very bad relations. The other thing is, they had one token mixed marriage in their community. A Russian girl married somebody from Mongolia. In our community, which was much smaller, there were a number of mixed marriages: mine, a fellow who was married to an Indian girl. Somebody would come up and say, "Isn't it great that you have more mixed marriages in your community than the Russians?" We would say, "We really don't give a damn. We don't sleep for politics. We sleep for passion." Always shook them.

Q: What about the Chinese communist influence?

O'NEILL: They had a very difficult time. In fact, if I recall correctly, they had no representation in Calcutta. It was something that the Indians did not like to talk about. They knew that they were beaten by the Chinese. They felt aggrieved that after all the political support that they had given the Chinese during the Vietnam War, the Indians only sent a medical unit during the Korean War, they had always been a friend of China, voted for their entry into the United Nations, had tried to do all sorts of things for them, but when it came to a border dispute, they wouldn't acquiesce to India's point of view and then had beaten them badly. What hurt was that those units that did well against the Chinese were the Gurkhas, tribal units, not Hindu regiments. The Sikhs did well against them.

Q: Was there a Vietnamese presence in Calcutta?

O'NEILL: No, there wasn't a Vietnamese presence in Calcutta. There was one in Delhi, but it was a Saigon presence. I was going to be called back to go to Laos (1975) to help them evacuate in those final days, but I was involved in this Harcos-Fletcher matter. I was the only one who was accredited by the courts to attend these official secret trials. Delhi and Washington considered that more important than me going back to Laos.

Q: Did we have a Peace Corps presence there in that area?

O'NEILL: There was no Peace Corps.

Q: Because the Indians didn't want it.

O'NEILL: They didn't want it. They had left at some time. I can't remember when they had left, but we did not have a Peace Corps presence.

Q: Your tour in Calcutta ended in 1977, I believe?

O'NEILL: Yes.

VIRGINIA CARSON-YOUNG
Consular Officer
New Delhi (1974-1978)

Virginia Carson-Young was born in Pullman, Oregon. She received a bachelor's degree from the University of Washington in 1952. Her career as a Foreign Service officer included positions in India, Hong Kong, Mexico, Romania, and Peru. Ms. Carson-Young was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 29, 1991.

Q: So you worked in India from when to when?

CARSON-YOUNG: From 1974-78.

Q: What was the situation from your perspective in India when you got there?

CARSON-YOUNG: Well, it was a two-person consular section. My training had been sketchy. I actually was trained by the FSNs in New Delhi.

Q: Foreign Nationals in India.

CARSON-YOUNG: I had a staff of nine. My boss was a man named Dick White, who has long since retired. He was a man who paid very little attention to the work. He would slip out of the office and be gone much of the time. I was so anxious to succeed...I chose India actually. I fell into the assignment. I was having lunch with some old Foreign Service friends and someone, whom I didn't know, (he turned out to be Howie Schaffer, who was the Personnel person for NEA) said, "Ginny, now you are in the Foreign Service. What would you like to do?" I said, "Well, I would love to go to India some time. It has always been a place of fascination for me." I ran into him in the hall about a week later and he said, "I think that assignment is going to work out." So that is how it happened.

I am sure Dick White was very, very skeptical of the kind of help he was going to get from this 46-year-old inexperienced consular officer. But I got there and was very eager, energetic, and loved it. He came in to me after one or two days on the job and said, "We have an American citizen streaking in the Ashoka Hotel, would you go down and take care of her." I said, "Sure." Then I thought, "Streaking, that must mean drugs of some kind." I called the Indian doctor who was the consultant for the Embassy and someone that I had met. He was a Sikh in a pink turban, a Harvard educated physician. I said, "Would you go with me to the Ashoka Hotel? I think I have a problem down there." So he did.

We went down and by then the woman was in her room. She was wearing a bikini, a sleeveless cardigan that came down below her knees, platform-soled shoes, a big hat, dark glasses and carried a cane. There were three men in the room. The place was blue with smoke. She fell in love with the pink turban. She would have followed the doctor anywhere. He said it was drugs. She had money and was from a very good New York family. The hotel was willing to keep her in the hotel if she would just keep her clothes on and behave herself. That, then, became my first American citizen services case.

From then on, Dick White would ask me to do a variety of things. I did non-immigrant visas in the morning, I did immigrant visas and petitions for immigration in the afternoon, and one of the local employees would thread his way up through the non-immigrant visa crowd to have me do notarials or take care of Americans. I was just swamped, but it was exciting.

Q: What was the visa situation in India from the American perspective at that time?

CARSON-YOUNG: Well, of course India is a very mixed society. There is a thin veneer, deeper now, but then rather thin, of educated, sophisticated, rather wealthy and middle class Indians. Then there is this huge population of people who are less well-off. So there is a lot of pressure to get that non-immigrant visa to get to the United States. And many of them never returned to India, or if they did, it was as an immigrant married to an American. So the NIV line was a challenge.

I must say, after being there for four years, the one thing that I realize now that I did was to develop a very rigid attitude towards students, particularly. I am more generous towards non-immigrant visa applicants now than I was then. I got to the point that I felt that I knew the Indians so well...and I had lots of Indian friends and we talked about how they were trying to get out, or trying to get their children out...so my student visa refusal rate just skyrocketed. I now think that that was wrong. If it is a bona fide person going to a bona fide school, I believe you should give them the benefit of the doubt.

Q: Just to go into this for a bit because what you are describing is a fairly typical reaction. An officer can go one of two ways. One is to continue to get tougher and tougher and take great pride in it and another is to develop more tolerance. Why, looking back on this, would a first time officer get so strict?

CARSON-YOUNG: Well, I think a lot of it was a certain amount of arrogance. I believed that I knew, and in fact, I think I did know, what their intent was. The law says you must deal with intent. And many of them did not intend to return. But as we know, our immigration laws as far as non-immigrants are concerned can be very legitimately interpreted strictly or loosely. It is really up to us. If I thought, as I did then, that they were not going to come back, they didn't get a student visa. I even turned down a fellow who had a scholarship to Yale. He had a U.S. resident brother who was his sponsor. I believed the family was grooming him to follow in his brother's footsteps. I was probably right. But, I now believe, also wrong.

In the beginning I would lose sleep over visas that I had denied. I later began to lose sleep over some that I had issued. For students, in particular, I would now give them the benefit of the doubt.

Q: Well, I am just wondering, I will just throw this out to you...I think part of the reaction, I notice this with new officers, there is a tendency when you first arrive there that these are the rules and you sort of take shelter behind them. You are so worried about making a mistake that refusing sometimes seems almost easier, or you can develop a righteousness...

CARSON-YOUNG: Yes, righteousness is a good word.

Q: ...and one of the factors I think is that most of us are not used to being lied to and this really gets to you.

CARSON-YOUNG: I was just going to say that one of my junior officers, a very bright young woman who worked with me in Mexico, said, "Oh, they are such liars, if they would just stop lying to me!" I said, "Helen, if they told you the truth, you absolutely wouldn't grant the visa." It is not correct, but it is understandable, why they misrepresent the facts to us.

Q: What were you seeing on the immigrant side?

CARSON-YOUNG: Oh, Stu, we had two fraud rings that developed in my first two years in India. One of them perpetrated by a local employee, (I think he may have been involved in both of them) but in any case, one was for non-immigrant visas and the other one for immigrant visas.

Part of the problem was my supervisor, Mr. White, who in the beginning was doing the immigrant visas in the afternoon. He was a very disinterested and lazy man. He would bring 15 to 20 immigrants into his office and have them all swear that this was the truth and then apparently just blindly sign their papers.

I am not sure who brought it to my attention, but it had to be one of the Indian employees. But there were obvious fraud indications, some quite blatant, such as white outs on the information section. We began to see duplications of sponsors and bank letters, similar to what you found in Korea. We could tell by the names. I remember one that caught my attention. It was a Hindu marrying a Muslim and that just didn't happen.

We also found that we were sending a lot of nurses to the United States under the old non-preference category which was current at that time. The Indian nursing degree was considered equivalent to U.S. training and there was no other exam they had to take. Actually, I queried the Department several different times about a possible way to refuse these young woman who were not nurses. They often came back to file a petition for a spouse, maybe a year or two later, when they had gotten their green card. They were not working as nurses, but as nurses' aides, because they couldn't pass the RN examination. At that time the Department's answer was no, if they have the degree, they qualify. Then we found out that a local employee was adding spouses' names to the records of these nurses. We found out when one of them came back to file a petition for a new husband and we said, "But you are already married. We have already sent your husband to the United States to join you." She was unaware that another fellow had gone as her husband. The local employee who was involved in altering the records was allowed to resign. I am not sure...you know in those days, they really didn't want to fire people for fraud. I remember, I worked with the security officer and interviewed the employee, but we really didn't have any proof, so he resigned. The same thing happened to Mr. White, as a matter of fact.

Q: He had to resign?

CARSON-YOUNG: He was involved in the NIV fraud side. He had a girlfriend who worked, I think, with a travel agent. I first learned about it when...because I did all of the NIVs...I came in one morning and there was a stack of passports on the counter with visas in them. I asked the local employee, "What is all this?" He said, "Oh, Mr. White approved those." I looked at them, and they were all Gujaratis, out of our consulate district.

Q: A Gujarati is?

CARSON-YOUNG: From a province in India where they would have applied in Bombay. They would have had to be physically present and come in for an interview in our consular district. I sure didn't remember seeing them, and Mr. White wouldn't have normally done the interview. I went in to Mr. White and said, "What is all this." He said, "Oh, I know I shouldn't have, but I felt sorry for them and I think they are okay." They were supposedly going as cultural people-to-people ambassadors, when you could tell from the applications that they were farmers and peasants. And then similar things happened to people in the Punjabi area, which was in our consular district. Issuances that I didn't know anything about. So I tried to check up on them.

I often went off on fraud interviews at the request of the INS. I don't know if you ever had this sort of experience. We have a reciprocal agreement with INS that if they ask a consular officer to make an investigation of an individual who has applied for adjustment of status in the United States, we have an obligation to do that. Now, we can plead lack of staff, funds, etc., but my understanding is that we have to find a way to fit the investigation into our schedule. At least, in India that was the way it was handled.

So I would wait until I had maybe a dozen or more cases. They were almost all from a general area, the Punjab, where the people were bright, aggressive and jobless. They, quite understandably, were the ones who were making up stories about visiting a cousin, managed to get a visitor's visa and, in most cases, were either claiming work experience in India that would qualify them for resident status in the United States, or were marrying an American in order to stay in the United States, but were already married in India and had never divorced.

So I would go in an Embassy car, with a driver, and one of my local employees and my stack of files, and a cooler with drinks and sandwiches and spend sometimes a week or ten days on the road, stopping wherever we landed. My assistant was a born detective. He loved tracking a case, going from village to village, finding out the facts. I did not know in the beginning that the reports I sent back had to be made available to the attorney for the immigrant who was trying to adjust. So, at one point I remember I went to the Windsor Hotel in Ludhiana, which was one of our bad areas. The man who was trying to adjust had claimed experience as a cook at the Windsor Hotel in Ludhiana. The Windsor Hotel sounds like a nice place. Well, it was a little hole in the wall, and it was dark. I went there about 11 o'clock in the morning. I had to go downstairs to speak with the manager. My assistant and I were holding hands, since I was a little bit frightened. I got back to what they called the kitchen, but it was really an area outside. Here was this little man, the present cook, wearing a dhoti, squatting over a pot and stirring it. I took a photograph of him, and wrote up the report. I said, "It is to Ajit Singh's credit that he never worked in a crummy place like this." They had no records of him ever working there. Well, of course, my language was made available to the attorney representing Mr. Singh.

But, back to my fraud cases, I checked up on the NIV applicants whose passports I'd found on the counter. It was in some cases almost a year after the visitor's visas had been issued by Mr. White. I would go to the home address and say, "Is your husband here?" The woman of the house would say, "Oh, no. He has a job in the United States."

So I came back to the Embassy and went to the Personnel Officer and said, "You know, Dick White signed all of these visas. He is on home leave and has been given an extension of his assignment in order to come back. I wondered how wise an idea that was, since I had been told that he had been involved in some kind of illegal activities, even before I arrived in India." And she said, "Well, is this McCarthy days? Is this guilt by co incidence? Have all of your visa applicants come back?" And I backed off. I didn't want to be the bell ringer. Mr. White had been very nice to me. I know now that I went to the wrong person.

Q: From a practical point of view, a personnel officer is the last person to be interested in anything else...

CARSON-YOUNG: In fact, when Mr. White's problems became known in Washington, the DCM then heard about them and called me. I said, "Yes, I have had some misgivings." He said, "Why didn't you come to me?" Well, I didn't know who to see.

In fact I sometimes wonder...I had it happen in another post where the Consul General, actually in Hong Kong, found out that one of my superiors was often drunk on the job and not really performing and said, "Why didn't you come to me?" Stu, I just don't know. When do you go rat on your boss?

Q: It is a major problem and there is no real answer because you are damned if you do and damned if you don't.

CARSON-YOUNG: Part of it makes me angry because I thought in both these cases, if you, Mr. DCM or supervisor, ever bothered to come down to the consular section, you would have perhaps known that this was going on. But it is so often the case that the Ambassador, the DCM, the person that I report to, really doesn't have any idea what is going on in my section.

Q: How did this non-immigrant problem sort itself out, or did it?

CARSON-YOUNG: Mr. White's girlfriend was an Anglo-Indian whom he lived with, on the U.S. compound. She was given a visa, but again, not by me. She went to the United States. She had a letter of recommendation as a housekeeper written on Embassy stationery and signed by Mr. White. She went to work for a woman in Maryland. This woman apparently knew something about immigration law, because she wrote the Department and said, "I don't really understand this. This woman was recommended by somebody in the Embassy, but she isn't really an experienced housekeeper. She doesn't work, makes long distance calls on my phone to Mr. White back in India. I am wondering what is going on."

This letter was received in the embassy mail room, and as a matter of routine, routed to Mr. White to answer. The Indian employee who opened the mail in our section brought it to me and said, "What do we do about this?" I said, "You give it to Mr. White. I am not going to intervene." But apparently someone in the Department had also contacted the front office, because I was later asked about the letter. As a result, I went through the previous visa applications for the period of time in question. I knew that the woman had gone to the United States, although I only heard about it after she left. I never did find an application. But after this inquiry, Mr. White produced an application form. I could tell that it was after the fact, because the photograph showed the woman with her hair cut short, which was after she went to the United States. So I am sure they had communicated and he said, "Look I have to get something in the file to show that the visa was properly issued." He had obviously come in and just stamped the visa, without any application. She then came back to India, I assumed at his request, but things were already on track. An inspection was imminent. The front office just decided that it was time for Mr. White to go, and he was allowed to resign.

So that was my first two years in the Foreign Service. Two fraud rings, the immigrant side and NIV side.

Q: What happened the second two years?

CARSON-YOUNG: The second two years was with a different supervisor, a woman who was well experienced in consular work. It was a much different scene, although extremely busy. I think if anybody asked me what the main problem is in consular work, it is being asked to do more with less. Not just due to the recent budget crunch, but for 20 years I have been told to "do more with less." I like to say I was replaced by two men when I left Delhi: they finally recognized the need for an additional officer to deal with increasing volume, and increasing fraud. Sadly, I have recently learned that the FSN whom I referred to as the "born detective" is now himself in jail for visa fraud in India.

Q: Looking at it in overall terms, something that I have noticed in the Virginia area is the growth of Indian population here. This was always a tremendous potential...India has lots of people who are poor. Were you feeling the multiplier effect of the ones who got into the United States...I am talking as someone who was in Korea. I was in Korea at the time that the multiplier effect started. GI wives went over, but all of a sudden the people were sending for relatives and it was just booming. Was this happening then?

CARSON-YOUNG: Have you heard the phrase "The motel Patels?"

Q: No.

CARSON-YOUNG: Patel is a very common, Gujarati, Indian family name and it is an example of how Indian society works. They work together, for their families, and their villages and extended family. The original Patel, I don't know who that was, but he managed to come to the United States, get together enough money and buy a motel. He then petitioned for a family member to come and manage the motel because he needed an assistant who spoke Gujarati, and he listed other required qualities that he knew his cousin had. Then he sold the motel to the cousin, and that began the chain. It had proliferated to the point that when my present husband and I were driving across the United States in 1984, stopping in motels wherever we ended up for the night, it quite often would be a person of Indian origin behind the desk. I would say, "Is your name Patel?" Quite often the response was affirmative.

I found that this sort of cooperation, or collusion, lacking in the case of Romanians. (My last actual assignment was in Romania.) The Romanians reflect years of suspicion and fear, not only under the communists but for centuries. They have not on the whole, been a cohesive sort of society. They don't help each other. With Indians it is almost always the case that if one "makes it," in the U.S., then they will try to bring the rest of the family and extended family and even village members to join them.

Q: I found that Romanian experience reflected pretty much in my five years in Belgrade with the Yugoslavs. It would be within the family, but not much beyond that.

The second two years would have been when to when?

CARSON-YOUNG: That was 1976-78.

Q: How did you find as far as our immigrant laws dealing with Indians... sometimes you have these laws made up by American lawmakers and plunked down into a completely different society...did they mesh?

CARSON-YOUNG: Actually the Indians had great advantages because there are many of them who are very well-educated. At that time we were processing doctors, scientists and teachers quite readily. And actually Fifth Preference under the old law, for brothers and sisters of citizens, was current. So the pattern of going as a student, becoming a scientist or an engineer, putting in your resident time and then petitioning for all of your siblings, was very common at that time. But they changed the U.S. immigration law during the time I was in India so that doctors had a more difficult time. We tried to process the many doctors who had already qualified, before the cut-off date.

In the waiting room in New Delhi, everyone was mashed in together, immigrant and non-immigrant. I remember I told one young man that he would not be receiving the student visa that he sought and he fainted at the window. I had 11 doctors waiting for immigrant visas, jump to take care of him.

Q: With this heavy work load and all, did you feel it was doing things to you?

CARSON-YOUNG: It is just terribly stressful. We are playing God. We are making decisions that affect people's lives. Before I went to India, they gave me a mace can to keep in my desk drawer, in case a visa applicant became violent.

Q: A mace can contains liquid which you squirt into somebody's eyes and it knocks him out, or something.

CARSON-YOUNG: Yes. In those days, we interviewed at desks in an office. In fact, the counter-type interview was mandated during the time I was in India, and I was just thunderstruck. I said that I was not a postal clerk and was not going to sit on a stool. But, of course, it is a more efficient way of conducting large numbers of interviews.

In any case, I had the mace can in my drawer for four years and never used it. I never had anyone become violent. But I had grown men cry. I had men bring in their fathers to testify for them, men in their forties. And you know, at that time Mrs. Gandhi was very important. The official Indian attitude was very anti-American, and they talked about the "brain drain." And it was quite true. We were processing a significant number of doctors and scientists as U.S. immigrants. But it seemed really ironic to me that when the phone would ring, I would be on the visa line and just grab the phone and be talking and reviewing documents at the same time, it would often be Mrs. Gandhi's office calling to say "What did you mean? The Minister's relative must be granted the visa."

Ambassador William Saxbe who was a former Attorney General, former Senator, was one of the three different Ambassadors that I served under, in India. He used to tell the story that whenever he called on a Cabinet member they inevitably stated quite proudly that they had sons, daughters, nieces, nephews, resident in the United States. When the President of India died, this was during the Carter Administration, and Ms. Lillian, the President's mother, was leader of the official delegation...

Q: She had been a Peace Corps volunteer in her sixties.

CARSON-YOUNG: Yes, for the funeral, two of the Indian President's three children came on Air Force One with Ms. Lillian. They were permanent residents of the United States. The third came from Britain, where he was a resident. So even the very important people in India will often have children who are permanent residents elsewhere. The opportunities abroad are often greater.

During this time that I feel I had gotten so righteous about visa applicants, I decided there were certainly some who had come back, however. I had friends who were doctors and scientists and educated people who had studied abroad and returned to India. So I decided that I would do a little informal survey myself and ask "Why did you come back?" I asked at parties, and other social occasions, so it wouldn't appear to be official (which it, of course, wasn't). Some of the reasons given, especially by the medical people, was that life was easier, you could live more comfortably in India, you could have servants, a big house, you didn't have the pressures of life overseas. But the most common thread was, "My father would not permit me (to remain abroad)." So I decided the real question I ought to ask at the interview window was, "How heavy is your father? Will your father let you stay?"

ARTHUR MEAD
Foreign Agricultural Service
Washington, DC (1975)

Arthur Mead was born and raised in Wisconsin and educated at the University of Wisconsin and American University. After service in the U.S. Army in World War II, he joined the U.S. Department of Agriculture and was involved in its overseas relief and grain storage operations, including the administration of Title I, Public Law 480. During his career Mr. Mead dealt with many overseas programs, including those concerning India and Vietnam. Mr. Mead was interviewed by Ray Ioanes in 1994.

Q: Just like the auto manufacturers. Why are there only three of them? Now we should get into how the law is implemented.

MEAD: That's right. So the private trade channels were used and if Continental Grain sold a cargo of wheat to Japan for dollars on a strictly commercial basis, without use of Title I, and sold a cargo of wheat to India under the Title I program, the procedure was basically the same. They would make the sale with the specified class and quality of wheat, move it to port, have the proper inspections, arrange to have it loaded aboard ship, have the relevant documents, go to the bank and get paid under a letter of credit.

The terms and conditions of the sale, the documents, loading arrangements were the same. The financing was the difference. In the commercial sale, dollars were paid by the buyer. Under Title I, USDA paid the seller through the Federal Reserve and the foreign government paid the U.S. in the equivalent value in their local currencies upon delivery through U.S. ports. The sellers of the grain in their operations outlined above would be working with the recipient country in such operations and that will be woven in I'm sure as we discuss the details of the Title I program. This highly compressed version of a sale makes it appear simple, which it is not. Meanwhile, USDA was monitoring the Title I sale, as we no doubt we will mention from time to time.

Q: It seems to me that is one of the things we need to talk about because before anything could happen we had to have an agreement between us and the recipient country.

MEAD: That is correct.

Q: And who did that?

MEAD: When the program started obviously all the finer points and procedures were not in place in great detail. Therefore the early agreements, such as Turkey and Yugoslavia, were conducted on a more ad hoc informal basis while basically getting to the point we later arrived at through more formal procedures. Fortunately, as you can attest to better than I, there was a consensus among the affected U.S. agencies to proceed promptly with the program without having come to agreement on all the details of operation. So your original architects went through with the early negotiations.

Q: At the request of the foreign government?

MEAD: Yes, there always had to be a request by the foreign government involved. That part of the procedures has not changed. If I think of it later on I might discuss this point when India returned to the program about 1975 after declaring itself to be self sufficient. You have indicated an interest to cite India's experience in the program so we will be getting to this.

Q: Always, as I remember, the initiative was dependent on the receiving country to make the request as opposed to our saying to them, "We are going to offer you a program."

MEAD: Typically, a proposal would be made by country X and it would be discussed with officials of the embassy. They would go back and forth, depending on the complexity of the commodity situation and the experience of the negotiating parties. When the request was put together it would be sent to Washington by the embassy by cable and distributed to the appropriate agencies. The Foreign Agricultural Service in USDA would take the responsibility for program formulation. Program coordinators would review it through the department in terms of commodity impact, effect on commercial trade etc. and deal with other agencies on matters that affected them, such as the use of the currencies. What I am saying is that the program coordinator took on all the necessary clearances and executive branch negotiation to structure a proposal suitable to be submitted to an interagency committee (which I'll talk about later), for review and approval. The in house negotiations often were more difficult than the negotiations with the foreign government, and I believe many people would understand this statement. Once approved, in a form that may resemble the original proposal, it was sent back to the embassy with specific negotiating instructions. The Embassy often would come back to us because of problems in the negotiations, but essentially it was negotiated at the host country by the U.S. team. If successful, it was signed. We had, remember, a government to government agreement which was published in the treaty series as an international agreement. USDA issued a press release on the commodity aspects of the agreement and there usually was some announcement or ceremony, or whatever, at the host country capital.

Once the agreement was signed, say for $50 million worth of wheat, $50 million of rice, etc., then the Foreign Agricultural Service operations people would, again with the foreign country, go into implementation with the private trade.

Before going into the implementation and movement of commodities through private trade, I must add that the formal agreement under Title I focused heavily on the commodity composition. But this was a sale for foreign currency, which meant that upon shipment the Indians, for example, would deposit rupees into a US account for the equivalent of the market value of those commodities. These could be used for a variety of purposes, both for the US and the host country.

The original law provided for currency use for agricultural market development, the purchase of strategic materials, procurement for common defense, which meant military assistance to countries seen as security countries in the U.S. view, the purchase of goods and services for friendly countries, the promotion of economic development (in the recipient country), payment of U.S. obligations abroad, and for financing Fulbright educational exchange programs. Over the years, at the time of legislative hearings and/or extensions of the program, many additional uses were authorized. In most cases, the bulk of the currencies were loaned or granted back to the host country for economic development.

Q: The bulk of the currencies?

MEAD: Yes. I emphasize that this was true in most cases. Obviously, there were exceptions, the most notable would be Vietnam where the currencies were used almost exclusively for military support.

Q: I believe the American Science foundation was getting funds out of this program.

MEAD: Yes, that was one of the many uses legislated over time.

Q: Okay, I think we are ready for the purchase authorization.

MEAD: Let's move a commodity. The commodity has to be bought; it has to be shipped. The country would use either its own buying mission like India and Israel chose to do, or in some cases, particularly the smaller countries, they would purchase commodities and book vessels through an agent. The country, itself, or an agent would apply to the USDA for a purchase authorization, which was a financing document that enabled the country to purchase and ship a certain value of a particular kind of commodity. While the value would govern, the authorization was keyed to a quantity. Depending on the country and commodities involved, the authorization may cover the entire amount in the agreement or could be issued in increments if the amounts warranted that approach.

We noted earlier and briefly how the agreements were negotiated. We should add here that they normally covered one year and would specify the amounts of each commodity with the approximate quantity. In any event, the purchase authorization also specified an approximate quantity and a specific value as indicated above. It would be very specific for the time period during which the commodity would be purchased and the time period during which it would be shipped (placed aboard ship). It dealt with quality factors, inspection arrangements and such pick and shovel work necessary to make delivery through the port.

The Foreign Agricultural Service had a monitoring function over these arrangements, including how the commodity and shipping space tenders were conducted, tenders meaning the document used by the country mission or agent to solicit bids for the services requested.

Q: Didn't we have a price review?

MEAD: That was one of the crucial elements in the monitoring function. This was particularly important both for commodity prices and for rates for shipping space so that the prices and rates were reasonable and within current price and rate structures. With the billions of dollars involved in the aggregate, it was imperative that there should not be any windfall for the parties to the transactions.

Q: How did we know the commodities got shipped, were unloaded and in correct amount to the foreign recipient?

MEAD: There were reporting requirements under the agreement. We had the agricultural attaché service overseas to work with the foreign government in seeing that we had proper accounting of the commodities. There were bills of lading, which we mentioned earlier, as the crucial documents among those that the commodity supplier presented to the bank for payment. It would indicate the kind and amount of the commodity loaded aboard the vessel. At the other end, the recipient country had reporting obligations on the unloading and disposition of the goods. Again, we had the agricultural attachés working with the foreign government; the attachés were Foreign Agricultural Service personnel.

And title passed to the foreign government at US ports, and that point is important later on when Vietnam fell, if we decide to discuss that episode.

Q: Checking on the arrivals was helpful in responding to inquiries from the Hill and the public was it not?

MEAD: Absolutely. We had our share of inquiries but the one we most often received was, "I know a first mate on the SS Marine Devil and he saw PL 480 grain being transferred in port to a Russian ship." In other words, the grain was intercepted and thus did not get discharged to the recipient country. We would check it time and time and time again and never could verify that first mate or the transfer of grain. But it was necessary that we respond to this kind of question. After quite some time I believe we stopped following up on the transfer of grain to Russian ships unless there appeared to be something new or different in the inquiry.

Q: The thing I do remember here was that we almost got into trouble because we had a unit tabulating the bills of lading and somehow or other they got crossed up in their work so they didn't tabulate for a while. GAO learned about this and we put hordes of people on it to tabulate those bills of lading in a hurry. Fortunately, everything balanced out. I think that is one of the things you and I are proud of. We handled those huge tonnages of commodities going all over the world and there never was a scandal about misuse of the commodities. I think, as you said before, this was due in large measure to the fact that they were not given away but were sold for foreign currency. So there was a self-policing action to it that helped us very much.

MEAD: A detail helpful to deal with this issue is the fact that under Title I the goods on the recipient end also used the normal distribution channels. The wholesaling in each country would vary but the commodities would be handled in the customary manner. There would be instances, like India, where some of the grains normally would be retailed through fair price, or ration, shops so that the poor could have access to basic foods at reduced prices. The point is that the commodities were handled in the traditional manner and this was a plus in terms of keeping abreast of what was happening.

This preserved the normal trade channels emphasized in the legislation which had as part of its rationalization its positive effect on market development for American agricultural exports. But back to your main point, there were a lot of people helping out to see that things were handled properly and we must give credit to all those people.

Q: I think there were programs where commodities were distributed with a label on them, "Gift from the US Government" or similar information.

MEAD: That was true for donation programs (not Title I) where commodities were given directly to relief recipients who did the best they could with what they received. On occasion, they would sell or barter one commodity to get something they needed most. I do not know how often this happened but I can see how it could occur from time to time.

Q: That was a different program, but every once in a while some of those would turn up in a commercial market.

MEAD: This is not to say that we didn't have our own problems working out purchasing and shipping arrangements with some countries, especially some who had only modest commercial experience or had customs that were not consistent with our regulations. The Title I commodities did not have the gift information on the bags and containers and much was shipped in bulk, of course, but the recipient country was obligated under the agreement to publicize the nature of U.S. assistance.

Q: Yes, I do recall the two countries where that happened and we sat in on the purchase sessions to make sure they were handled right. Unfortunately all countries are not modeled on the same principles and the result is that their system of oversight is not as careful as it should be. But you are absolutely right. I think there were only two or three such cases.

MEAD: There was a lot of money involved; we are talking tens of billions of dollars; so we were fortunate.

Q: At the initiation of the program were the first programs fairly well scattered; were they mostly in Europe; where were they and when did the whole thing start?

MEAD: We mentioned surpluses after the war and that the Korean conflict got us out of trouble (supply wise) for a little while. Then we reverted into the same surplus situation with the American farmer geared up to produce and we had beaucoup commodities. The industrialized countries of Europe and Japan were still in the process of recovery on the one hand, and on the other hand we had India, African nations, Indonesia and many other developing countries which had rapidly increasing populations and insufficient production. They lacked the hard currency to make commercial purchases of food. There was hunger and while some countries were not directly affected by the war, they hadn't progressed economically.

Q: As I recall, because of the war and because of the shortage of foreign exchange, our first two programs, as I remember, were in Turkey and Yugoslavia.

MEAD: Turkey was the first one. I don't recall whether Yugoslavia was the second one.

Q: Yugoslavia was the second program. Were there other programs at that time in Europe?

MEAD: Sure. As we noted Europe was recovering. We had programs in Japan, and in Europe we had programs in the UK, France, Italy, Germany, Greece, and Spain. Those, I believe were the major ones of those we now classify as industrialized nations. So we had programs in these countries which sounds rather strange, given their strong economies today.

On the other hand, the amounts programmed to these countries were not so large in relation to their populations and the capacity to absorb the goods.

Q: How about Egypt and Israel?

MEAD: Egypt and Israel early on were attractive political countries. They started right off and continued with very appreciable volume, although Egypt was out of the program for a number of years after the 1967 war. My understanding is that Israel was phased out of PL 480 some years after we left the scene and its overall assistance continued under general foreign aid authorizations. Egypt continued on as a PL 480 customer.

Q: How about Africa? It just seems to me except for Egypt, none of the programs were major in size.

MEAD: I guess technically Egypt is in Africa, but we tend to consider it Middle East, particularly for political purposes. If you set Egypt aside, you could find a complete blank for Africa under Title I until about 1961 I believe.

A major problem in Africa was that most countries had severe logistical problems; and they didn't have much of a trade system compatible with Title I which is geared to using existing trade channels that we have emphasized in our earlier discussions.

We should not give the impression, however, that Africa was sitting out in left field with all the action on other continents, including Latin America, which we have not mentioned in the process of indicating the nature of early programming. There were donations under PL 480 that suited Africa better and to jump a couple of decades or so, we have witnessed the droughts in Ethiopia and similar countries on TV and the huge response to these critical food shortages.

Q: To a certain extent they were in the stage of the European colonial government leaving, so some of them didn't gain their independence during this period or a little later.

MEAD: That was true. A number of African countries participated in Title I later on, especially the northern tier of countries and the remaining countries relied heavily on donations from the U.S. and other contributors.

Q: Incidentally, I really don't remember much of a controversy regarding the possibility of interference with the private markets in the range of countries you have mentioned.

MEAD: Countries like India, Indonesia and Egypt did not have a significant history of commercial trade. You had people undernourished and they were an outlet for food for extra consumption. Their inability to have monetary reserves to purchase commodities on a commercial basis also was a major factor.

Q: Art, why don't we try to get some feeling about the size of this program over the years? How about giving us a run down.

MEAD: The numbers will show that the program took off quickly given the task of shaping program procedures and working toward agreements which were formal international instruments. The law was enacted in mid 1954 and by 1956 the value of exports under Title I approached a half billion dollars and tonnage of nearly 4 million metric tons (mmt). You will recall in our description of the programs that you had to negotiate the agreement, then get the authorizations going to permit sales to be made and shipments to be placed on vessels, which also had to be booked. So there was a lead time involved before tonnages would be shipped and values could be calculated. And we are talking about export market values, not the larger costs usually designated as CCC cost or cost to the U.S. government. You started with Turkey and Yugoslavia and by 1956 some of the larger agreements such as with India and Brazil were signed to give further impetus to the magnitudes. In 1957, shipments totaled 8 million metric tons (mmt) and 900 million dollars.

Q: That's a pretty fast take off. Could I interject a few things. It is true that first agreement with Turkey was negotiated in the Sheraton Hotel. I can remember being a part of it and making the mistake of negotiating in tons of wheat instead of dollars. When I got back to the office, Pat O'Leary saw the mistake I had made and he just grinned and said, "That's okay, we can take care of it." But, thereafter the agreements were in dollar values.

MEAD: But the negotiations were discussed in terms of volume and then you just translated that into dollars. That is the only way you can control it because you have to issue a financial document and you can't exceed the amount noted in the document. Your caper was easily taken care of through the control of the purchase authorizations, especially at a time when the price of wheat was pretty stable and we were just starting to use the $700 million authorization. To continue with magnitudes, Title I exports on an annual basis reached the 10 million metric tons (mmt) as we entered the 1960s and soon reached the $1 billion level in export market value.

I should emphasize at this point that total U.S. agricultural exports (annually) reached only $4 billion so Title I alone was at 25 per cent of the total. Jumping into the future and we will probably get to this later, total PL 480 exports, that is all Titles, were only about 10 per cent of exports in the 70s and about 5 per cent in the 80s. There were huge increases in ag exports in those decades, as we know, but this would illustrate how important PL 480 was in the 50s and 60s.

Q: The origin of three-year agreements is interesting. It came about, as you know, primarily because we were specially interested in India. We were interested in taking this classic case of a country which could provide a subliminal outlet for grain and help build the nutrition of the country. In our conversations with them they pointed to the fact that our first agreement was a one year agreement. Once they had decided to try to give their people a better diet, they needed more assurance than one year to get it done. And that was the reason for the first three year agreement. I understand that we then added a four year agreement...

MEAD: In 1960.

Q: How big was that agreement?

MEAD: I believe it ran about 16 million tons. That's big time for an agreement, particularly when you are relatively early in the program. When we signed the agreement, we only formally committed ourselves to the first year's value because we had no where near enough money in the till; but with the commitment to sign for the value of the last three years when the PL 480 authorization was increased by the Congress.

Q: Over a four year period?

MEAD: Yes. The first year was signed in May, 1960 with a market value of nearly $200 million and the remainder was formally signed in December for more than $1 billion.

Q: Your commodities in that first 900 million dollars of the overall program for all countries; do you have tonnage figures on those?

MEAD: The $900 million was the value of exports for 1957 with tonnage of 8 million metric tons. In terms of relative shares of the program, wheat started out as the major commodity and would dominate programming throughout the program. Next would come rice, feed grains, cotton, and vegetable oils. At that time I would estimate that for wheat we were accounting for more than 50 percent of total U.S. exports; cotton, probably a third; high in vegetable oils; and significant quantities of feed grains.

In this early period, we had non-price support commodities, like fruit and poultry, tallow, frozen beef, which later on were minimized because they had a direct and full impact on the PL 480 budget. The typical commodities like the grains did not result in full budget costs since there were storage and other costs that we would have to bear if we hadn't moved them out of stocks. So the non-price support commodities in later years were virtually eliminated when the program was placed on a budget ceiling within the Executive branch. And we may touch on that if we discuss how the program decreased in the late 1960s.

While we are in the commodity area we can mention that tobacco was regularly programmed and was defensible for some time as a means of budget support for recipient countries. For certain countries, this commodity translated into revenue in a short period of time. It later became an emotional issue in the U.S. as you well know, and was legislated out of the program.

Q: Well, cotton and tobacco both share the concept of turning raw material into jobs as you move from the raw material to the finished product. But in a sense we did the same thing because you move from wheat to flour to bread. So your value adds there too, but not quite as much.

MEAD: Now that you mention flour, it reminds me that we didn't move nearly as much flour under Title I than we thought we should. India didn't take one bag of flour under Title I despite our efforts, Sen. Humphrey, and the flour millers among others. I recall also that we had one devil of a time to get Egypt to take a certain quantity of their requirements in the form of flour. And some of the lesser developed countries such as Indonesia had mills built and therefore in time phased out of flour to straight wheat.

Getting back to magnitudes, the early sixties saw large agreements with Egypt and Pakistan and a number of new countries. Those developments, along with the mid 60s India droughts, put the annual tonnage under Title I to 16 million metric tons (mmt), or three or four times the annual volume in most of the 80s. At this time the portion of wheat going under Title I was well over 50 per cent of U.S. exports which again emphasizes the importance of the program. My rough calculations for the decade 1959 through 1968 put Title I wheat exports at 50 per cent of total U.S. wheat exports for that entire period, and put India imports of wheat at 45 per cent of Title I for that decade. The portions are even more dramatic when you consider that total U.S. exports included both wheat and wheat flour and as I noted just above, India took wheat only and many of the countries were shifting from flour to wheat.

As we start getting through the sixties and into the 70s, mention is appropriate of the changes made in 1966 when a major legislative overhaul was enacted with the greater emphasis on revising Title I. The overhaul provided for the phase out of foreign currency sales during a five year period ending in 1971 and phasing into longer term dollar sales, (recognizing that 20 year dollar sales were legislated in the early sixties, but not implemented in magnitudes comparable to the foreign currency sales). The dollar sales under the new legislation were longer term, with longer grace periods and low interest rates, and the foreign currency sales as we knew it would disappear.

There were provisions for a limited number of the old type currency uses to be provided for under the dollar sales under particular circumstances. This allowed, for example, for the U.S. to continue military support for Vietnam. The new legislation also called for self help provisions and the deletion of the surplus concept in principle. In fact, the word surplus could not be found in the new text. Nonetheless, the procedure for determining PL 480 availability did not change in reality. This will be discussed as we get into the worldwide shortages in the early 70s (this also occurred in the mid sixties Indian droughts) when the Title I program was reduced sharply.

The Title I program dropped steadily from its high of 16 million tons in 1965 to an average of about 8 million tons in the early 70s. There were several reasons for this drop. In the case of India, the two successive droughts ended with fairly normal monsoons; India participated in the advances in production brought about by the so-called Green Revolution, along with other countries; some Eastern European countries were legislated out of the program. Other donor countries came on the scene to share in the food aid business, helped by the birth of the World Food Program in the early 60s; and the creation of the Food Aid Convention negotiated during the Kennedy Round of multilateral trade negotiations as a new convention of the International Wheat Agreement; and the imposition by the Office of Budget and Management of budget limits for the PL 480 programs. We saw Title I drop to 5 million tons in 1973 and to less than 2 million tons in 1974 because of the commodity crisis world wide, with production trouble in Russia, again in India, and the anchovy supply difficulty among other commodity considerations.

Q: This is why we should get to how those requirements grew and how the requirements were met in terms of imports and increased domestic production. India was a classic case of whether we succeeded or failed in achieving the promise of increased consumption under the Title I program. We should look at this in some detail for our satisfaction and the satisfaction of others looking into the history of the India experience.

MEAD: Yes, we can examine India along those lines and it might be useful to recount how PL 480 was reduced in 73 and 74 and the decision making process at that time.

Q: Well, 1972-73 was the time of the huge Soviet purchases from everywhere, not just the United States.

MEAD: Yes. India declared itself self-sufficient at the end of the sixties. They were out of the Title I program for a few years, but came back in 1975 and for a brief time thereafter. As I recall, India was not very happy to get back into food aid after having being able to say it was self-sufficient. They came to see Secretary Butz several times, but were reluctant to make a request for the assistance. The Secretary and I would do a lot of listening and it became a bit awkward. But we had the rule of needing a request and we were not innovative enough to develop a way to offer them a program without acknowledgment of a request. My recollection was that they had something less than one million tons in mind for Title I. After they got over the problem of making a request they then asked that the agreement be negotiated in Washington. That was not what USDA wanted to do, given the history of New Delhi negotiations which could get prolonged and complicated; I can remember, for a particular agreement, sending a curt cable to the agricultural attaché to get the agreement signed and I'm sure he showed it to the Indians to get things moving.

State pressed strongly for the request of the Indians and we had to negotiate in Washington. We did this regularly with the Israelis but their negotiations were very informal, and obviously Israel was a special case. The negotiations with India in 1975 were formal; I was the Head of the U.S. delegation and we had other U.S. agencies represented and India had its several representatives. India wanted to make changes in the format of the agreement to emphasize that this was a dollar deal, which it was on a long term, low interest basis. But they wanted to make it look like a harder deal. We indicated that they could be a bit imaginative in the way they handled their announcement as long as they didn't go overboard, but we had to keep our agreements intact. They were not in a hurry to sign the agreement since they were buying wheat from us commercially and keeping their ships busy.

One tough issue dealt with was the fact that India had earlier borrowed wheat from Russia to be repaid in kind. We did not want them to repay wheat to Russia while they were importing concessional (soft sale) Title I wheat from us. After a lot of haggling back and forth, there was an unpublished side note developed that said that the issue would not arise. And the issue did not arise. Noting the commercial purchases of wheat by India, there was a specific UMR provided for in the agreement as one of the conditions for fulfilling the agreement. It may have been the first time in this final agreement but I am not positive about that point. It was not an issue with them as they had already taken the position that there would be times when commercial imports would be necessary. There were times, also, when they would export some wheat and I suspect this came when they had accumulated substantial stocks and were not in a position, in their view, to utilize such stocks for domestic consumption.

In any event, we were not more successful than New Delhi in crafting a prompt negotiation. In this case we could not send a cable to ourselves telling ourselves to get going.

Q: Art, in this discussion we should highlight India as a classic case of whether we succeeded or failed in achieving the promise of increased consumption. So I think we are going to want to trace that in some detail for our own satisfaction, if not for the satisfaction of others in history.

MEAD: I agree. In doing this I would hope we could make our point without a lengthy narrative but with a chart and some figures that would illustrate the point. From my experience and some reading over recent years, I don't believe the development economists have been able to be very precise in assessing the effects of PL 480. My own experience dealing with the various countries is that those countries that had the will to use the program as effectively as possible were able to do so. India was one of those countries.

The chart on the preceding page is pretty simple. It shows the trend of India's grain production from 1950 to 1990 as well as the ups and downs of imports for that period. The production line is essentially upward for the entire period. The peaks and valleys of imports correspond with the vagaries of the monsoons but we need to acknowledge some progress in the Green revolution.

Production dipped sharply in the mid sixties with the two successive droughts and the imports rose very dramatically as PL 480 came to the rescue.

This happened again in the mid seventies but the magnitudes were much smaller. During the earlier droughts USDA interceded into the development business as Secretary Freeman worked directly with the Indian Agriculture Minister, and sent USDA people like Martin Abel, Lester Brown, Sherman Johnson among others to India to assess the situation and cooperate in proposals. As an aside from development issues, the Department also sent logistical experts to India as well, arranging for special unloading equipment so that the huge increase in grain imports could be discharged efficiently in India ports. I also recall the Secretary lending his position in the effort to find alternative sources of protein to send overseas, especially in smaller packaging under the donation programs. He discussed this effort with an official of the New Orleans Experiment Station and later put him on his staff in Washington. Dr. Aaron Altshul was that official.

This might be the best time to deal with the subject of possible disincentives on recipient countries as a result of the Title I program. Over the years there would be, from time to time, a program that was engineered less than skillfully that may have had an adverse effect on local production. And there were cases when the U.S. and the recipient country could have managed the timing of the commodity movement better; and some of that might adversely affect our commodity situation. A fair amount of that kind of criticism came from academia, political scientists, some voluntary agencies among others. My own view was that much of this become sort of fashionable. We are talking about nearly one thousand agreements signed through 1975 covering about 17 billion dollars and 200 million metric tons with scores of countries. For the most part, the voluntary agencies were well administered and well meaning in their participation in the program, but there were a few (some based abroad) who may have felt that criticism of Title I would result in greater authorizations for their programs or specific contributions from private individuals and groups. On the other hand, I could name individuals from volunteer groups that were very helpful to PL 480, especially in terms of representation before the Congress.

Back to the main objective here; to augment the chart, a review of India's production over the years would demonstrate that country's accomplishments in grain production, including milled rice. These are mainly USDA figures covering all grain, including milled rice. The UN Food and Agriculture Organization uses the term cereals to include the same commodities. If one is researching figures on their own, sometimes rice will be reported in paddy form (instead of milled) which is a figure which would increase the quantity by approximately 30 per cent, depending on what the milling rate was. While the chart will suffice for some readers, others may like to see an array of numbers, which will follow. For 1949/1950, production was about 47 million metric tons (mmt) and 65 mmt a decade later; ten years later in 1969/1970 it was 86 mmt although during that decade it was only 65 mmt during the two years of the drought; increased to 105 mmt by 1979/1980, again having a decrease half way through the decade which led to the 1975 Title I program discussed above; 1989/1990 was 162 mmt; and 1994/1995 was 172 mmt. These are very substantial and steady increases, which percentage wise, were about the same during Title I activity and after it ceased. If one reviews PL 480 activity statistically for India, there will be imports every year since Title I ceased, those being donation and volunteer agency programs as well as project and emergency programs under the World Food Program. Another aspect of trade and aid that is relevant to this line of discussion relates to the imports of wheat on a commercial basis by India from the U.S., and to some extent other sources, when the food supply requirements were not secure. The records show that at the time of the renewal of Title I in 1975 the Indians bought several million tons for hard currency and they did that from time to time thereafter as conditions warranted that kind of response by the India government. The point here is that the Indians acted to take care of requirements and they were acting to sustain certain levels of consumption by the populace.

One further point is that while India may have declared itself self sufficient, the question to me becomes one of the definition of self-sufficiency. To a large degree, at least in my view, to India self-sufficiency meant that India would be able to sustain a particular level of consumption without further need of commercial imports or concessional imports such as Title I. It did not mean that the populace was eating so much better. Food surveys conducted by FAO show that tens of millions were considered malnourished in India, meaning that they could not perform in a normal manner on the basis of the calories they were consuming. The percentage of malnourished, however, would be higher in a number of countries in Africa.

I recall, for example, that during the early years of the so-called self sufficiency India was holding reserve or buffer stocks of about 20 million tons of grain. One could speculate as to why India did not distribute some of this for increased consumption. The answer might be that it would be costly, as is normal in direct distribution programs, and it also might raise consumption expectations for the populace that the government would have to maintain. This is mentioned merely as possible motives and not to be construed as criticism. Overall, India would receive high marks for its efforts.

Q: We had been talking about India. I would ask you to for any comment you wanted to make on the use of the currency generated by Title I in India for economic development.

MEAD: I believe we mentioned earlier that the amounts of foreign currencies made available to India were very large given the enormity of the program. Most of them were loaned or granted to India for economic development with emphasis on agriculture. If I didn't say so earlier, the executive branch tried to maximize grants so as to mitigate the inevitable obligation to repay them. Some people could foresee a political problem in the accumulation of these obligations. Unfortunately, the word grant was a dirty word on the hill and therefore most of the currencies were on a loan basis.

The Agency for International Development had the responsibility for administering the currencies and that agency earmarked them for general development and the agriculture sector for new crop varieties, irrigation, credit facilities, storage, fertilizer programs, and on and on. I am sure much good was done but I have not run across a good definitive analysis of the effect of the currency use programs on development. It is far easier to find good analyses of the effect of currency use for education, scientific research etc.

But the lack of analysis on development in India by virtue of the currencies doesn't bother me, knowing how many lives were saved merely by managing the food aid export endeavors.

I read a publication prepared by AID that took account of the 40th anniversary of PL 480 and it did not give specifics on the currency aspects of the program. Let us just conclude that AID did its job. Also in some defense of academics and others, there was a lot going in countries like India, Indonesia, Thailand, Korea, and others where consortia were established to develop and monitor development strategies and to try to achieve some coordination or at least some consultation for maximum impact. Thus there were funds and projects and whatever injected and managed by the World Bank and other international financial institutions. It would be difficult to separate the various aid components and their relative effect. There were bilateral programs besides the U.S. and thus the creation of consortia. What I can report on was the problem of the great accumulation of Indian rupees in U.S. hands which some people in both governments felt was an embarrassment. It was finally agreed to give them back to India and get the so called embarrassment behind us. The agreement was framed so that certain U.S. uses such as agricultural market development were protected. Senator Moynihan was Ambassador to India at that time and he took on the consultations on the Hill. I accompanied him on this mission and found him very flexible in his presentations. He got the job done with the truth of the matter being that influential people like the Chairmen of the Agriculture committees were less than enthusiastic. They did, however, refrain from open opposition to the proposal.

Q: The reason why I think the somewhat detailed discussion of India is important is that there is a body of thought out there that says you are kidding yourself if you think the program you ran helped India. Rather it gave them a disincentive to increase production on their own. I, for one, say that is not true. I think the increase in numbers that you gave tend to support that and your reference to the analysis of the effect of the currencies also falls in the favorable category. I also want to second what you said about the role Secretary Freeman had in helping India during the bad droughts. He was very active in sending the departmental people to India on the side of what I would call technical assistance to convince them that they had to raise returns to the Indian grain producer. They had to allocate their resources of input to the areas of land in the country that gave the greatest promise of increased yield per acre. That was done. I think Freeman really went out of his way to try to meet the charge that we were just stuffing them with things we couldn't use ourselves. Getting away from India would you tell me in your own judgment as we moved along, is PL 480 now a memory more than anything else in terms of those of us who worked on it during its heyday. I take it has about run its course. Would you agree?

MEAD: There is no question that the program is comparatively insignificant when you are talking numbers and relative effect of the food aid programming. I can remember when we would have to develop a rationale for continuing PL 480 each time we were preparing legislation to extend the program and increase its authorizations. It was easy because it seemed intolerable for us to do otherwise while producing great surpluses, there were great needs in many countries, and our commercial programs had not taken off as yet. So it was simple to rationalize that we should continue to support this program. It is true we were phasing out of countries like Brazil, Japan, Korea, Taiwan. But there were countries like Indonesia and India, where the additional commodities had minimal effect on commercial shipments.

But now the value of PL 480 exports is probably around 5 percent of total U.S agricultural exports at best, as against 25 or 30 per cent in our day; and in terms of wheat it probably is less than 10 percent of U.S. wheat exports against the 50 and 60 per cent or more that Title I accounted for in many years. So it doesn't have the impact that it had at the time you and I were heavily involved in this program. I can't comment on the character of the program now, Obviously it is quite small relatively, but there may be some advantages because of eastern Europe programming, for example.

I can't comment on USDA's rationale for the program since it has such large programs for export credit and other commercial type incentives. With the reduced AID appropriations and further cuts very likely, I can see AID's desire to have some assets to further its objectives; and I can see State's desire, possibly, to use the program for eastern Europe as I mentioned above.

Q: Art, unless you have something else to add, Jim Howard, who has been sitting here patiently reminds me that you probably have a comment on the role of the White House over the years in the food programs. I take it Jim is right and would you like to comment at this time?

MEAD: When I was approached on doing this interview, I did have the idea I would spend some time on the decision making process, but that idea has diminished in value after this session with you with the emphasis on India; and that suited me. In setting the scene for our discussion we did indicate the various objectives of the legislation.

Q: I have to agree with you. It seems to me during the period beginning when Johnson became president that there was a change in the direction of the White House towards approval of individual programs and perhaps even of individual shipments to countries, from time to time. Do you recall that?

MEAD: Yes, I do. The classic one, of course, was India where the President was not enamored of Indira Gandhi.

Q: Why wasn't he endeared?

MEAD: The Indians have always been a bit independent. I am not a student of the UN but India may have been a leader in the nonaligned countries and therefore comments made in places like the UN and others were not particularly pleasing to the United States. There was a special issue at this juncture.

Q: I think in this case it was the Vietnam War.

MEAD: Yes, that is true. We got to the point, which you probably know better than I, where individual shipments of grain to India under signed agreements had to be cleared by the White House. This was during the droughts and we were trying to keep the pipeline reasonably full. The approvals were hard to come by. I believe Secretary Freeman probably said to you and others of his inner circle something like "I just can't go to LBJ and ask him to resume shipments because he will throw me out of his office." People referring to this episode usually called it the short leash policy. Is that where self-help started?

So there was a heavy White House involvement then. Vietnam, of course, got special treatment during LBJ and continued through Nixon. There was not much difference because that was the high priority, and in terms of assistance, food aid was secondary only to bullets. You just had to maximize shipments to Vietnam.

If we can leave LBJ and go to Nixon, what the Nixon Administration did was to identify the 13 or 14 major aid recipients--Egypt, Israel, India, Indonesia, Korea etc. and decided to approach each country with an overall assistance package, including Title I. A Presidential memorandum on the total aid package was the procedure. On occasion, like with Israel, you could get a waiver, and that was White House involvement on the fast track. I referred to the reluctance of Secretary

Freeman to approach LBJ; I recall an Assistant Secretary in USDA in the Nixon administration being asked to expedite White House clearance of some issue. He said if he called Haldeman on the matter it would end up at the bottom of his basket.

DAVID A. KORN
Consul General
Calcutta (1975-1977)

Ambassador David A. Korn was born and raised in Missouri. He entered the Foreign Service in 1957. His career included positions in France, Lebanon, Mauritania, Israel, and India, and ambassadorships to Ethiopia and Togo. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

Q: You made not a complete geographical switch but you left your desk job to suddenly go to Calcutta as Consul General.

KORN: It was sort of a two year time out. I wanted to get away from the Arabs and Israelis and see another part of the world. And that was what I did. There wasn't much going on in Calcutta. Well, I was there during the time of the emergency and the cancellation of democracy by Indira Gandhi. She shut India's system of democracy down the week after I arrived and reopened it about a month before I left and then was thrown out of office.

Q: Did that effect your work at all?

KORN: Oh yes. The country was thrown into chaos and Indians were reluctant to talk to Americans. The United States was under suspicion. We had an AID program and all that. They would come to the Consulate for receptions, etc. but they wouldn't talk.

Q: You were feeling you were really in a repressive regime at the time.

KORN: Yes. It wasn't a blood thirsty type of regime, but people were arrested and kept in jail, etc. This certainly affected the whole atmosphere.

Q: So relations were almost at a standstill.

KORN: Yes.

Q: How was it dealing as Consul General and living with your staff in Calcutta which one always thinks of as being one of the most difficult places as far as seeing poverty, etc.

KORN: Very difficult psychologically, yes. The poverty that was there was overwhelming and the sights, sounds and smells were overwhelming as well. You couldn't go anywhere without seeing beggars, people mutilated, children with diseases, people living on the streets, and that sort of thing. Calcutta is a place that defies description really. It is an extraordinary city. There are many very interesting, intelligent people there. There is a great culture there. But there is also the poverty there that leaves one absolutely speechless.

Q: Did you have a problem with morale at the post?

KORN: Most of the Westerners who lived there shielded themselves simply by trying to ignore the situation. You had to develop certain psychological defenses against it, otherwise you couldn't ... The Indians had their own cultural defenses against it--the philosophy that one is poor and miserable because of what one has done in a previous life so if you are a well-off Indian you obviously merited it. The situation does pose problems of adjustment for Westerners.

Q: You came back to Washington for a relatively short period in Policy Planning. Is that correct?

KORN: Yes. From '77 to '82, about five years.

Q: You were in Policy Planning for what, about two years?

KORN: A year. Actually I spent most of that year working with Roy Atherton when he was Assistant Secretary and then he became Ambassador-at-Large for the Middle East Peace negotiations, but I went with Roy on various trips. The Carter Administration had come in and launched the Middle East Peace effort.

Q: Did you look upon this as a professional having dealt with this before as a continuing of the Kissinger process or was this really a somewhat different approach?

KORN: This was something entirely different. Kissinger was step by step--you get a disengagement agreement, you go for another disengagement agreement. But Kissinger, if he had a vision of where this was going to end never shared it with any of his associates, much less the public. Kissinger never defined, he didn't really think that the Israelis were going to withdraw from all of Sinai and he wasn't going to press them to do so. In a way what Carter did was a continuation, but in another way it was not. Because Kissinger was not trying for an overall solution. He was trying to calm things down perhaps to prepare the ground. But if he was preparing the ground, it was ground for something not as far reaching as Carter.

Q: What was your impression as you were there? You had obviously been dealing with the affairs and served in many of the countries. Did you feel that this was going anywhere or was this a bit naive?.

KORN: For those of us who had worked on the Arab-Israeli problem before it was really hard to imagine that Carter was going to achieve this goal of peace; an overall settlement that he announced. There seemed to be a great element of unreality to the policy discussions we would have. After a meeting with Roy Atherton and later on with Hal Saunders, we had discussions on how the agreement was going to be structured and I think I was not the only one who felt that this was really a kind of day dreaming exercise. There was so little reality to back it up. And it would have remained that way had not Sadat broken with the other Arabs and decided to go to Jerusalem and Carter was able to lead him little by little to accept the idea of a peace agreement now and not 20 years in the future. But if Sadat had not been willing to go all the way to break with the other Arabs this would not have occurred. The whole business of a Geneva Peace Conference was absolutely unrealistic. Carter for the first ten months of his presidency was going for just getting a conference to convene at Geneva. We were going to worry about what we do at Geneva after we got there. It was a desperate, unrealistic effort and would have collapsed right there if it had not been for Sadat.

Q: What was our analysis of why Sadat did this?

KORN: If you are asking me at the time, I would not be able to recall. I can give you an after the fact thought. Certainly Sadat had the view that Nasser had made a mistake in challenging the West and siding with the Soviet Union and that Nasser had brought great ruin on Egypt through the '67 war and through the war of attrition that followed it. He felt that the way to bring Egypt out of its difficulties was to reach an agreement with Israel and to re-establish good relations with the West--that was where the money was and there is where prosperity would come, it would not come from the Soviet Bloc.

Q: Do you remember how we reacted when he first did this? This certainly wasn't in our game plan. Were we wondering where this was going to go? Was there general rejoicing?

KORN: Some of the people in NEA were not particularly happy with this. I myself was concerned at a certain point that Sadat was going further than he could afford to go. That he would be overthrown. And that the Peace Treaty that we were sponsoring and pushing very hard for after Camp David could end up getting Sadat thrown out. That did not happen. It happened later that got him assassinated. So there was that concern.

Q: You moved in '78 to Director of Israeli Affairs. Was that sort of right in the middle of the process?

RAZVIGOR BAZALA
Deputy Public Affairs Officer, USIS
New Delhi (1975-1978)

Mr. Bazala was born in Germany but immigrated to the United States while he was still young. He joined the Foreign Service in 1970 and served in Warsaw, South Vietnam, New Delhi, Belgrade, Jamaica, Macedonia, Bosnia, and Washington, DC including working as a special assistant to the White House for the Iran-Contra Affairs. Mr. Bazala was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in July of 2011.

BAZALA: Although I ended up in Vietnam because I was bidding out of cycle, that worked to my advantage in seeking a transfer in the spring of 1975. USIA had just approved the establishment of a new position to the staff of USIS New Delhi's North India Branch.

Assignments for the summer had already been made, and few officers with appropriate backgrounds were still available. A good word from several senior colleagues resulted in my assignment to become the deputy PAO of the branch. We planned to arrive in New Delhi in August.

I knew very little about India prior to my assignment there, but very much looked forward to serving in New Delhi where the North India Branch was located in the new four-story USIS headquarters building. It had a staff of three FSIOs and more than 40 Indian employees who conducted programs in the states of Uttar Pradesh, Rajasthan, Himachal Pradesh, Punjab, and the Indian-government controlled area of Jammu and Kashmir. The branch housed the largest USIA library overseas and had a 200 seat auditorium with state of the art audio and visual equipment. Three percent of India's then 600 million people, or about 18 million spoke English. Many had higher educations. The libraries of USIS India's four branches were fully occupied every day. The number of our program activities was also among the largest in the world.

Indira Gandhi, the daughter of India's first Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru, was prime minister when we arrived in August 1975. Several months earlier she had declared a national emergency, and almost overnight about a quarter of a million of her political 'opponents' were arrested, most without charges. Some schools were converted into prisons to create enough cells to jail them all. The key question was whether the world's largest democracy would transition to a one-party dictatorship. In the context of the cold war that divided the globe between East and West, the critical issue was whether Mrs. Gandhi's emergency would move India toward the Soviet camp.

Prior to transferring to New Delhi, I took 100 hours of Hindi language training; it wasn't much, but it served as a useful introduction to several key elements of Indian culture. USIA had contracts with several private language teaching firms to delink the timing of USIA personnel transfers from FSI's rigid language training schedule. Thus I was able to fit in some Hindi training between my assignments without regard to FSI's calendar.

My instructor at the private language school I attended near Dupont Circle in Washington was a young Indian graduate student at Georgetown University who taught part time. That she was not your run-of-the-mill foreign exchange student became abundantly clear one day after class when I saw her leave the building as I rounded the corner and drove by in front of it. As she moved toward a black Cadillac stretch limousine double-parked at the entrance, a liveried driver opened the rear passenger door and bowed as my instructor entered the vehicle.

The following morning I mentioned that I had witnessed her departure the previous day and was totally taken by surprise when she invited Sylvia and me to join her and her husband for dinner at their home where we would learn more about her background. Her address was in the heart of an area known as Embassy Row in Washington. She added that her father also lived there. When we arrived at the residence we learned that her father just happened to be the Indian Ambassador to the United States. After cocktails we were directed to the dining room where the four of us gathered at the end of a table that the following evening would be set for 32 guests. Language training rarely result in events as unusual as this one.

Over a wonderful Indian meal we learned much about what we could expect when we got to New Delhi, and our hosts offered candid observations on contemporary India. Some issues were brushed over lightly such as the emergency and India's relations with China, the Soviet Union and Pakistan. Unsurprisingly, my instructor summarized Indo-American relations as mutually beneficial. The dinner at the Indian Ambassador's residence helped me better understand India's growing strategic importance even though in the mid 1970s, many considered the subcontinent an economic basket case that had the potential to degenerate into a humanitarian disaster on an unprecedented scale.

The term 'failed state' had not yet been coined, but many observers, among them Lester Brown, an American ecological expert who gained global renown with his writing on India, projected massive starvation in the future as India's rapid population growth would soon outstrip the capacity of the nation's agriculture to meet its needs for food. Fortunately that scenario did not come to pass. By the late 1960s, India had already started importing high yield, disease resistant, rapidly maturing varieties of rice that yielded up to three harvests a year. It was also implementing policies to mechanize agriculture, expand irrigation and increase fertilizer and pesticide applications to crops. Consequently, despite the growth of its population by more than 400 million over the next four decades, India has experienced no large-scale starvation, although a sizeable proportion of the population continues to be significantly undernourished.

America also sold agricultural produce, primarily grains, to India under Public Law 480 (PL480) that was intended to promote sustained U.S. agricultural exports. Also known as "Food for Peace," the law, in the words of President Kennedy, provided for the sale of food "to help people around the world whose friendship and good will we want." PL 480 also provided a significant benefit to Americans serving in India who could buy the rupees the Indian government paid for American agricultural commodities at the U.S. embassy rate of 65 for one U.S. dollar, far higher than the official exchange rate. That enabled us all to become consumers of a broad range of India's fine handicrafts and art; the most sought were hand-woven silk and wool carpets. The extremely favorable exchange rate also made it possible for us to afford a domestic staff of five full and part time employees whose earnings supported a total of 37 including their dependents.

The declaration of emergency on June 26, 1975, however, generated concerns in Washington about whether India would continue to function as a democratic parliamentary government. The emergency restricted the extent to which Indians could voice their views on a great number of subjects. So while USIS was able to bring in a large number of guest speakers to address influential Indians on topics related to governance and economics, we had to warn them that what they said could be interpreted by Indian officials as interference in internal Indian affairs. Despite such concerns, we still had opportunities to conduct substantive programs and communicate with influential Indian audiences. USIS faced no real barriers to the conduct of its program activities during the emergency.

I think Mrs. Gandhi believed the emergency would enable her to overcome opposition to policies she wanted to pursue but was unable to gain the parliamentary majority required to make them the law of the land. Under the emergency, Mrs. Gandhi ruled by decree, but she did not want to take authoritarian governance to extremes. She was very conscious of the image of India as a democratic nation. Rather than attempting to establish a one party dictatorship, she called for parliamentary elections in March 1977, less than two years after she declared her emergency. She did so under the misguided conviction that the result would serve to endorse her policies.

When her Minister of Agriculture Jagjivan Ram, the most prominent “untouchable” politician in the nation announced his break with the Congress party she headed, Indians across the nation concluded that Indira Gandhi had already lost the election. He aligned himself with the newly formed Janata coalition party that her political opponents pulled together from their jail cells. I was having dinner with Indian contacts in Jaipur, Rajasthan when news of his resignation broke on the radio. That set the entire neighborhood abuzz, and I could hear the exuberant reactions to it of people on the street below. Ram commanded the votes of the bulk of the nation’s 88 million untouchables (casteless Hindus). In following him, they contributed overwhelmingly to Gandhi’s ouster.

Imprisonment had galvanized Gandhi’s opposition. Politicians who did not communicate very well with each other in Parliament discovered behind bars they had enough in common to form an unprecedented coalition. Almost as soon as the opposition was released from jail to mount their election campaigns, however, the coalition they had formed began to fragment, and it did not survive much beyond the 1977 election that brought it briefly to power.

We experienced our second presidential visit when Jimmy Carter arrived in India on New Years Day 1978. It was less than a year after the election ended the emergency, and he welcomed India’s adherence to its democratic roots. The language of the official communiqué issued at the conclusion of his visit contained much boilerplate and little of substance. Its opening line, “The President and the Prime Minister held extensive and useful talks in the spirit of mutual confidence, candor and friendship,” bland as it was, indicated that U.S.-Indian relations were back on track, which was enough to make an otherwise uneventful and routine visit a U.S. foreign policy success.

While short on substance, arrangements for President Carter’s visit had the entire embassy jumping. There was major tension between a member of the White House advance team and an Indian government official over plans for the movement of vehicles in the presidential motorcade. That resulted in the embassy administrative officer barring the non-government advance team member from playing any role in arrangements for the visit. For all presidential travel overseas, many advance team members, all ardent supporters of the administration, volunteered their services to assist with arrangements for those trips to experience in some way something of their drama. I felt sorry for the ostracized guy, but he really had no clue how to get the job done without offending Indian officials whose cooperation the embassy needed to make the visit a success.

My task was to develop the First Lady’s public schedule and work with her staff to select an appropriate school to receive Mrs. Carter’s gift of a stereo record player and speakers following a speech she delivered about the welfare of children and refugees. My parents were visiting us at the time, and I was able to arrange for a photo of them with her when she stopped at a local market to get a hint of life on the streets of New Delhi. Later she was gracious enough to autograph it for them.

India's payment of its PL480 debt in rupees provided USIS New Delhi enough rupees to cover a wide range of in-country program costs. They included air fare and first-class accommodations in five-star hotels for Indian participants in the two- or three-day seminars we hosted in their conference facilities. During the U.S. bicentennial celebrations in 1976, for example, we conducted several seminars on American history and democracy. In support of those events, USIS India acquired the rights to such distinguished works as Daniel Boorstin's nicely boxed trilogy "The Americans: The Democratic Experience" and had several thousand copies reprinted in India for distribution to seminar participants and all Indian university and public libraries across the nation. We also reprinted a number of other academic works about the United States and its history, culture, arts and science in support of our country plan objectives. PL 480 rupees provided resources to develop programs far exceeding USIA's limited dollar budget for them and allowed us to mount activities on a scale simply unimaginable to USIS posts elsewhere.

Support for American Studies was a core element of USIS programming in India for years. The programs contributed significantly to an expansion of Indian interest in our society, and the American Studies experts we recruited to conduct them were among the most capable and competent in the U.S. It is important to recall that Mrs. Gandhi's emergency only lasted 18 months. After the elections of March 1977, the political situation in the country quickly returned to pre-emergency democratic norms, and once again India became a very fluid environment of intellectual give and take.

USIS India's budget allowed the North India Branch to schedule programs for between 60 to 70 American academic, professional, political, business, and cultural experts annually. We programmed in Delhi and in other major cities in North India including Jaipur, Jodhpur, Udaipur, Lucknow, Allahabad, Varanasi, Srinagar, Chandigarh, Amritsar and Simla because we considered it important to establish a broad USIS presence in India to reach the ethnically, spiritually, economically and politically diverse leadership of all regions in North India.

There were always a few Indian participants in our seminar and lecture programs who displayed a certain intellectual arrogance. At the same time, there were clear-thinking Indians who understood the nature of the problems of their society and knew that ideological posturing was insufficient for solving them. I will never forget an education seminar in which a participant asserted that in order to attain literacy for the entire population the government would have to establish a school for 200 students every ten minutes through the end of the century. The enormous magnitude of that task highlighted dramatically the scope of the economic and social development challenges India faced. Thirty five years later, despite enormous progress toward that objective, universal literacy remains a distant goal although one or two states in India have actually achieved it recently.

Daniel Patrick Moynihan, whose assignment as U.S. ambassador to India ended in 1975, noted that there was a subset of India's population about the size of the population of France that had the income and education levels of the French. He was convinced that there was significant potential for economic growth in India as long as that segment of the population had opportunities to apply their skills and resources to expanding the nation's productivity. In the years since Moynihan expressed that view, the nation's economic output has mushroomed. In spring 2011, I returned to India for the first time in 32 years with Sylvia who was a member of the Office of Inspector General team that inspected embassy operations in India. We were both overwhelmed by the contrasts between the Indian economies of 1976 and 2011 and the enormous tangible growth that occurred over the intervening years, a strong echo of Moynihan's assertion.

William B. Saxbe who succeeded Moynihan was ambassador when we arrived in New Delhi. He was typical of political appointee ambassadors. A former Ohio Republican senator, he served as President Nixon's attorney general during the last days of the Watergate scandal and was named ambassador to India by President Ford after that. He held the post for little more than a year and a half. After the announcement of Gandhi's emergency he became frustrated by the deterioration in the U.S. relationship with India over trade and political issues. Saxbe said he particularly enjoyed hunting and trout fishing in Kashmir during his brief tour. He brought little more to the job than experience from a brief trip to India while he served in the Senate.

Robert Goheen, a political appointee nominated by President Carter to be ambassador to India succeeded Saxbe. He, however, was of a distinctly different order. Born in India, the son of American missionaries serving there, Goheen became a welcome figure across the country and a strong counter to the image many Indian intellectuals had of America as crassly materialistic. Indians generally regarded him as someone who had a deeper understanding of India than the non-Foreign Service officer that President Carter might otherwise have nominated to the post. Such an ambassador most likely would have been someone similar to Saxbe, or a politician who lost a recent election or was a major contributor to the president's election campaign. Goheen was a former president of Princeton University and he found several members of the Indian cabinet were Princeton alumni.

USIS programming in the late 1970s was largely targeted to the population Moynihan cited as the source of its economic advancement. We endeavored to implement a modified version of the two-step communication flow theory to reach as broad a segment of that population as possible. The theory posits that the impact of a message is amplified when it is delivered it to "message multipliers" who are opinion leaders regarded as influential by others. Our objective was to include Indian message multipliers as participants in USIS programs. We frequently saw the messages we communicated to program participants echoed more widely in newspaper and journal commentaries, media interviews, academic publications and briefing memoranda they prepared for their audiences whose numbers sometimes were incalculable multiples of the participants our programs reached directly. General disagreement with our messages could have the opposite effect of course, but at least that opened the door to us considering refinements to subsequent program activities touching on those subjects.

USIA was able to recruit fine speakers for all our programs because many of them had strong personal interest in India. A number of them placed travel to India among their top personal priorities and the invitations to become USIA speakers gave them the opportunity to fulfill that objective. Most were also aware that they could not talk condescendingly to Indians whose own academic and intellectual achievements were comparable to theirs in many cases. Generally, our speakers proved to be effective in communicating with Indians both through our programs and socially.

One event that facilitated greater communication with our Indian audiences was the end of U.S. involvement in Vietnam in 1975. It cleared the air for us to some extent. We no longer had to address that matter in every question and answer session following an American speaker's presentation, for example, or in the ambassador's meetings with the press. I think that applied to USIS operations around the globe. Justifying America's Vietnam policy was excess baggage that posts everywhere were glad to shed.

Our programs exposed leading government and academic economists to a range of development models that could help India achieve rapid growth. Economic speakers often cited Brazil as a relevant example of the country most likely to end its status in the third world. Even though Brazil did not achieve that goal much before the turn of this century, our programs underscored ways India could harness its potential more fully based on market economics, abandonment of import substitution, barring limits to the freedom of expression, and implementing programs to expand higher education.

During the cold war, a top global priority of USIA was to undermine the ideological appeal of communism. Centrally planned economies that abolished free enterprise and authoritarian governments that restricted political expression and violated basic human rights were anathemas. Communism and Indian democracy proved not to be a good fit, and the danger that the Soviets would score significant political gains in India did not materialize. To some extent, the Indians had a strategy of threatening to shift their foreign and economic policies toward the East as a way to foster changes in U.S. policies toward India.

It was India's Nehru, along with Nasser of Egypt, Tito of Yugoslavia, Nkrumah of Nigeria, and Sukarno of Indonesia who founded the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) in 1961. Their objective was to provide developing nations leverage in negotiating their way between East and West. That sometimes involved playing the two sides against each other to avoid being lodged in either camp. Ultimately, however, the deck was stacked against the East. The Soviet Union really did not have much more to offer India and other third world countries than military equipment, and it was largely the export of U.S. agricultural commodities that kept India afloat during most the 1960s and 1970s. I don't know the extent to which India was then thinking about its future relationship with China, but after the Sino-Soviet split in the mid-1960, it could anticipate it would no longer be dealing with a government that marched in lockstep with the Soviets on international affairs.

During the emergency, Indira Gandhi's younger son Sanjay found authoritarianism appealing. Some Indians claimed it was he who really called the shots during the emergency although he held no official or elected position. As his mother's advisor, however, he was able to exercise power arbitrarily. He called for the cleansing of New Delhi slums that led to the forced resettlement of a quarter of a million people. He also initiated a widespread family planning program to limit population growth. Forced vasectomies of impoverished illiterate unmarried men to meet arbitrary quotas generated extensive popular opposition to Indira Gandhi's Congress party. Some attributed her defeat in the 1977 election to men who 'voted with their balls' to sweep her out of office. Sanjay also proved inept as a businessman. He came up with the idea to manufacture a people's car, the widely heralded Maruti, but not one ever rolled off the assembly line. He died in 1980 at the age of 33 when he lost control of the small aircraft he was piloting; it crashed over his mother's residence six months after she returned to power.

Sanjay's death turned the spotlight on his older brother Rajiv as his mother's successor. A pilot for Indian Airlines, the nation's domestic carrier, Rajiv remained aloof from politics until the death of his brother. He was the pilot of the turbo-prop Indian Airlines aircraft I was aboard several times on the Delhi-Jaipur-Jodhpur-Udaipur route to conduct USIS program events in those Rajasthan cities. Unless there was a plain-clothes air marshal on board, no security detail accompanied the son of India's most powerful woman. I was impressed by his lack of pretense as he entered the cockpit or walked through the terminal after landing, just another man in the crowd seemingly unconcerned about the people around him.

I met Rajiv once during the emergency at a gospel concert USIS programmed in New Delhi. A staffer at the West German embassy called my office to request permission to record the concert from backstage. I checked with the singers who had no objection and conveyed that back to the German embassy. I assumed it was the German I would encounter as the auditorium filled for the concert. He was there alright, but to my surprise sitting under headphones at the controls of a professional 12" reel-to-reel tape recorder was an Indian who had set up microphones and was testing their audio quality. The German introduced him as Rajiv Gandhi.

Rajiv spent the entire concert in front of the recorder playing the role of audio engineer. Once again, he was unaccompanied by security personnel. After the concert, he packed up his gear, thanked me for the opportunity to record it for his private use, climbed into the German's open jeep and drove off into the night with only the German as an escort. I found his modesty impressive indeed. After his mother was assassinated in 1984, he succeeded her until 1989. In 1991, he, too, was assassinated as he campaigned to be re-elected prime minister. Rajiv's wife Sonja, an Italian by birth, is now head of India's leading Congress party, and there is speculation that Rajiv and Sonja's son will eventually take a place on the nation's political stage.

Many of our Indian program participants held points of view that differed sharply from those expressed by our speakers, but a larger number, among them graduates of U.S. universities, shared their views. In fact, several speakers had been their professors. Consequently while there may have been sharp intellectual counterpoints to the positions our speakers articulated, their views often contributed to the opening of serious dialogue about the substantive issues of U.S.-Indian bilateral relations. India's relationship with Pakistan and U.S. attitudes toward and support for both countries during their 1971 war did come up regularly in question and answer sessions following our programs. I think Indians were well aware of the differences between American attitudes and approaches toward both countries, but that never became a focal issue in our programs while we were in India.

As far as Kashmir is concerned, there was a lull in tensions generated by overlapping Indian and Pakistani territorial claims in the region during our tours. The North India Branch of USIS exploited that lull to conduct programs in Srinagar, the heart of India's Jammu and Kashmir state. We also had some wonderful personal experiences there as well. Srinagar is a lovely city located a mile above sea level and a great place to escape to in the summer when daytime temperatures in New Delhi reach 115F and drop to a 'cool' 92F at night. In Kashmir, pre-monsoon temperatures rarely rose above the mid 80s.

Arranging New Delhi's large number of programs required the assistance of a highly educated Indian staff that had strong linkages to the academic and government leadership of the nation. When I arrived at post, the program management staff was headed by Sohinder Singh Rana, who I consider the finest host-country USIS employee with whom I worked in my career. Assisting him were three other outstanding managers, Vinay Shukla, M.L. Kapoor, and K.K. Anand, all middle-aged men. Their classmates were among the most prominent people in Indian society, including current secretaries of government ministries and heads of university faculties. Such contacts enabled them to marshal appropriate audiences across Indian society to engage in discussions with our expert speakers.

Two newly hired program managers were university graduates in their early 20s. Tony Jesudasan was a laid back, personable ball of energy ready to set the world on fire. Prabhi Gupta was the first woman professional on the North India Branch staff. Branch PAO Ed Shulick hired them to help broaden the focus of USIS programming and to reach out to the successor generation that we believed was waiting for opportunities to move the nation in new directions. My job was also a new position that reflected the planned expansion of North India Branch operations. The senior program managers were most comfortable and effective in reaching out to influential senior and mid-career professionals in government and the private sector. Both Tony and Prabhi had the skills, energy and the outlook required to expand the reach of USIS programs to new and younger audiences.

We had the good fortune of meeting Prabhi several times after our tours in India, and I remember her telling us about her aspiration to become an FSO. We had no doubt she could achieve that goal given how effective she became as a USIS program manager and how well we worked together for three eventful years. She was a competent professional who moved comfortably between her society and ours. Prabhi met Howard Kavalier, a junior State Department FSO who arrived in New Delhi in 1978. They married in 1980, and after she became a U.S. citizen she passed the U.S. Foreign Service exams in 1990 and became an FSO. Following several overseas assignments as a tandem couple, Prabhi, Howard, and their two daughters arrived in Nairobi, Kenya in August 1998, just weeks before the terrorist bombing that destroyed the U.S. embassy there. Prabhi was one of the 11 Americans who lost their lives in that attack; her death was a great loss to the Foreign Service community.

Our family enjoyed our tour in India immensely. Everything about it contrasted with our experiences in the U.S. The sights, sounds, colors, smells, music, arts, and the vast array of handicrafts all proved eye-opening and heightened our awareness of the richness and variety of human expression. The food was out of this world. Our three years in India provided a range of unique experiences. For example, we saw the Taj Mahal a number of times, as monsoon rains fell, under a full moon at midnight and at various times of day when differing illumination revealed contrasts in the structure that we had not previously noticed.

We drove through the Rajasthan desert with embassy colleagues to attend the annual Pushkar Camel Fair in November. Ajmer, the city in which it is held, is also a major Hindu religious pilgrimage site. We observed the trading of thousands of camels and were awakened by their haunting bleats during the night, as well as the sale and purchase of much other livestock. Parents, counseled by tribal elders, arranged the marriages of prepubescent girls. We consumed easy to chew slices of cane sugar chopped from canes longer than six feet. The streets of Ajmer were carpeted in white during the fair; sad to say, but after the thousands of visitors swallowed the sugar water in the inch-thick cane slices purchased as snacks, they expectorated the remaining fibers as they walked through the town. A number of embassy wives were cajoled into participating in a tug-of-war with local women who easily outmatched them. Driving back to New Delhi from Ajmer we passed clusters of vultures lurking in trees along the highway waiting to feast on the next road-kill or whatever else in the area was soon to expire. The anticipation of death and remains being ravenously devoured by those creatures made for a somewhat unsettling ride through the next 50 miles of isolated Rajasthan countryside.

Another interesting experience was our three-hour trip on the narrow-gauge railway from Kalka to Simla (now Shimla), the summer capital of the British Empire in the late 19th century. Most administrative agencies and the headquarters of the Empire's India Army relocated there to "find an agreeable refuge from the burning plain of Hindoostan" at an altitude of 7,200 ft. in the eastern Himalayas. The ride up the mountain offered grand views of landscape dominated by pine forests and rhododendron. The colonial city that replaced the small Indian village at the top boasted many buildings of the imperial era that are now a major tourist attraction. The neo-gothic Viceregal Lodge of the Indian Institute for Advanced Study was the venue for several USIS programs while I served in India. The town was cool in the blistering pre-monsoon heat and picturesque when covered by light snow in winter.

Early in January 1978 after President Carter left India, we along with my parents found ourselves on the beach in Goa, a former colony on the west coast near Bombay that the Indian army invaded in December 1961 to liberate it from Portuguese rule and annex it to India. It was favored by international winter tourists, among them nudists and marijuana smokers. With two kids and my parents in tow, we avoided them without having to go far out of our way to do so. Several five-star hotels had opened recently, and we enjoyed the luxury they offered on the beautiful beaches stretched out before them.

The Bombay newspapers we read over breakfast on a sunlit patio with temperatures in the mid-70s reported that a massive snowfall had covered the American northeast. Father was grateful that shoveling snow a foot deep in New Jersey would not be on his agenda for the next week. We basked in the pleasure of being in subtropical India while America was in the depth of winter.

One of our family's most pleasant experiences in India was spending a week on a houseboat on Srinagar's Dal Lake. The houseboat was 70 feet long and entirely made of wood. Boats in name only, they were actually floating homes docked along the lake shore away from the city with permanent links to plumbing and electricity. They could be accessed only by small taxi boats from the urban end of the lake, all of which bore names on plaques. I recall that one we used on several occasions was "The Happy Rose of Japan", which struck me as amusingly incongruous.

In 1976 our daughter was approaching five years of age and our son had just turned three. They loved being on the boat. Airfare was reasonable so we brought our ayah along to take care of them while Sylvia and I ventured out and about. The Mughal Gardens were nearby and worth several visits. There were no public demonstrations or open hostilities and no gun fire anywhere in the region at that time, unlike in recent years. USIS held several seminars at Srinagar's Lake Palace Hotel and flew participants up to escape the insufferable heat of the lowlands in summer. We had no difficulty gathering participants for our activities in Kashmir between June and September.

One of the most important events of our lives was Sylvia's entry into the Foreign Service as a State Department consular officer in the middle of my tour in New Delhi. Fortunately, her first assignment was New Delhi. Without an available open position there, she would have been assigned elsewhere. That would have disrupted our lives in a major way and made us a "split tandem." Married FSOs both assigned to the same post are called a "tandem" couple. If both serve at different posts, they are a split tandem, a situation we hoped to avoid but could not several times later in our careers.

Sylvia flew back to Washington to take the six week A-100 course in June 1976. A few days before she departed a mosquito bit me on the top of my left foot as I lay on my back on the couch in the living room reading a book. When it started to itch, I rubbed it distractedly with the heel of my right foot opening a sore as I continued reading. Several days later it became infected, probably from something in the water of the embassy swimming pool. I went to the embassy nurse who gave me erythromycin tablets to counter it. After several days, the infection appeared to have cleared up and I did not take all the prescribed pills, a major mistake.

A few days later, I flew to Srinagar to manage a seminar we conducted there. The evening I arrived, I noted a black spot on my right calf. Looking in the mirror before I went to bed that night, I found some pus in the corners of my eyes. The following morning there were red blotches on both legs up to my hips. As I flew back to Delhi that day, a Sunday, I became apprehensive. The black spot on my calf had enlarged significantly. I arrived at our apartment in mid-afternoon and checked myself out. I also exposed my leg to our illiterate cook and asked him what he thought. He replied, "I think you ought to see a doctor, sahib," a conclusion I ought to have reached myself. I wondered, however, whether a doctor was available on a Sunday afternoon. I called the British embassy and its doctor, a Sikh physician married to an Irish woman, was in the office. He said I could come in and see him.

Unable to maintain a passive expression when he examined me, he told me to check into the British embassy dispensary immediately. Fortunately, we had an ayah to look after the children, or I don't know how I would have managed without Sylvia there. I entered the clinic within an hour and spent the following five waiting to see what effect triple doses of erythromycin would have on my condition. Fortunately I responded well and was discharged without any further complications at the end of the fifth day.

Just weeks later, the children and I flew to Washington for home leave and to reunite with Sylvia who after the A-100 course was completing consular training. We traveled on July 4, the bicentenary of American Independence, and with Washington ten hours behind time in New Delhi arrived early enough to have dinner with Sylvia at her sister's apartment in Georgetown before heading to the Mall to watch the massive fireworks display to mark the anniversary.

Sylvia knew nothing of my medical condition before I arrived, however. I was still recovering and the trip exhausted me. Regretfully I told her I was too tired to attend the display. Much to Sylvia's disappointment, our travel over almost 5,000 miles got us there in time to see it, but we missed out on a grand ceremony to mark 200 years of American independence.

Fortunately Sylvia did not have much competition for the only position available in New Delhi and began her Foreign Service career as a rotational officer at the embassy. State Department junior officers served several months of their first years at an embassy in the political, economic, consular and administrative sections of the embassy to give them a broad overview of embassy operations.

Our home leave that followed was a series of pleasant stays with Sylvia's parents in Athens, Georgia; a week on the beach in Pawleys Island, South Carolina; and a stay with my parents in Maplewood, New Jersey. Months later after returning to New Delhi I encountered the British embassy physician who treated my infected leg at a social function. We exchanged pleasantries for several moments and he then let me know that had I not responded as well as I did, he was two days away from recommending that my leg be amputated at the knee. That left me with my mouth hanging open; another guest extended him a greeting and he turned away to acknowledge it.

In addition to issuing visas, consular officers also deal with Americans abroad who may encounter a countless range of problems that require the services of the consulate while they are traveling. A certain segment of the American population was turned on by images of India generated by pop culture icons that may have visited the country but didn't really have much of a clue. A number of drug-tripping Americans sought enlightenment from Indian gurus, Maharishi Mahesh Yogi among them who English rock band, the Beatles, almost made a household name in the 1970s during their encounter with transcendental meditation. There were also adventure-seekers on magical, mystery tours that did things they thought they would be free to do in India that turned out to be against the law even there. The problems they got into took much of Sylvia's time during her assignment in New Delhi and made for some very interesting conversations over dinner.

As much as we enjoyed serving in India, things could be exasperating. The country is the size of the U.S. east of the Mississippi River and had a population of more than 600 million in 1975. You could say almost with certitude that there were only a few places in India at an altitude under 5,000 feet where you were not within sight of another human being. That was particularly annoying when you had to pull off the road after not encountering a gas station with a rest room anywhere along the previous 100 miles and sought privacy to respond to the call of nature. Within moments after you alighted from your vehicle, half a dozen or more people would pop into view just as you prepared to do the needful (a Indian English colloquialism). It was as surprising as it was inevitable.

Livestock on public arteries, primarily cattle on streets and roads anywhere in the country, was another bane of our existence. You simply do not mess around with sacred cows no matter where they are including at the bus stop in front of the USIS building in the heart of downtown New Delhi. The beasts paid absolutely no heed to anything, motorized vehicles included. At least they made no effort to board buses as far as I know. Every time we drove out of town we had to be alert for cows that wandered around aimlessly and could almost be counted upon to step out onto the open road in front of us as we approached them at 50 mph or more.

But that was not all. As in England, Indians drive on the left side of the road, which made negotiating your way at “roundabouts” (traffic circles) challenging, as was crossing the street and having to look to the right rather than the left to see if anyone was bearing down on you. You also had to worry about motor scooters with families of five or six as passengers, motor scooter taxis and bicycle rickshaws (pedi-cabs). They would pull out into intersections with no thought of slowing down, let alone stopping or even looking right or left. Why bother? It’s a question of fate; either you make it or you don’t. We were just grateful not to be fated to take one out in a traffic accident while driving in India.

Moving through traffic with the inevitable three-wheeled scooters or pedi-cabs, of which there are still hundreds of thousands in India, was also challenging. The growth of traffic has been exponential over the past 30 years. There are now lane markers on major roads, but they have absolutely no bearing on the way Indian traffic moves. Traffic patterns resemble the flows of schools of fish in the sea. Vehicles not only tailgate each other, but they also ‘sidegate’, transforming a four-lane road into five or six. That everyone generally gets to where they are going without scrapes dents, or bodily injury may be considered nothing less than miraculous.

Heavy pollution in winter was largely generated by burning dried cow ‘patties’ or dung that was the common source of fuel for heat and cooking. They issued great quantities smoke and unpleasant odors and were for us one of the most unpleasant things about India. In March 2011 I got the impression that cow dung is no longer commonly burned for heating, at least not in major urban areas, although since the temperatures were already in the mid-80s I cannot say with certitude that is the case. Fortunately we were able to make the adjustments necessary to survive on-the-ground reality in New Delhi and elsewhere across north India in the mid 1970s.

As you can see, life in the Foreign Service overseas is a mixed bag and that makes this a good place to review some of the practical advantages of overseas assignments for Foreign Service officers that add to the variety and richness of professional and personal experiences life abroad can offer. First of all, embassies provide mission personnel furnished housing. Only one of the residences we occupied in our careers -- in Jamaica with a one-acre lot and swimming pool -- came close to matching the home we bought in McLean, Virginia in 1978, however. In general, a brick, two-story, four-bedroom, three-bathroom house with a two-car garage on a quarter acre lot in almost any suburb in the U.S. is more appealing than most quarters leased by the embassy General Services office in almost any country in the world.

At some posts, the availability of property approaching U.S. standards was limited; in others, costs for such housing far exceeded embassy funds available for housing. Officers could find their own housing at some posts if the properties met embassy-mandated security standards and did not exceed the post’s housing allowance. In communist Poland and Yugoslavia, the flats and houses embassy staffs occupied were acquired through negotiations between the embassy administrative sections and the Foreign Ministries.

Second, officers who own homes in the U.S. can rent them out while serving abroad. We did so with our Annandale condo while we were in India and our house in McLean during our later tours in Yugoslavia and Jamaica. We also rented out our house during Sylvia's tour as deputy chief of mission in Sarajevo, Bosnia while I served as regional PAO in USIA's European division.

Third, the Department covers the costs of secondary education of dependent children whose parents are posted in countries that do not have international schools or do not offer a secondary education curricula geared to prepare them for college education in the U.S. Our son Alex had just completed his high school sophomore year when Sylvia joined me in Jamaica a year after my tour there began. Because its British-based education system did not meet the college prep requirement, we enrolled him in a boarding school in Connecticut that was well regarded by Foreign Service families. Had we desired, we could have placed him in an international school abroad and covered out of pocket any expenses that exceeded the State Department's education allowance.

After Alex finished high school and entered Emory University in Atlanta he remarked that his prep school had filled its mission; he observed that it prepared him better for college than public schools did for many of his classmates, which compensated us somewhat for the unwelcome absences of our son spanning two of our years in Kingston. And we compensated him with flights to Kingston for every break in the school year especially at Christmas when temperatures in Jamaica were in the mid-80s and the surf in the Caribbean was just right.

Another practical advantage of Foreign Service life was the possible sale of personally owned vehicles prior to departing an overseas post. In our experience, depending on the country, you had the option of selling to other diplomats or third-country citizens in communist Poland and Yugoslavia and selling to any potential buyer at market price elsewhere. With far more cars available around the world today than 30 or 40 years ago, market prices for previously owned vehicles abroad may no longer differ significantly from those domestically. Back in the day, however, there were tales of used American cars going for several times their purchase price primarily because import duties were that high or other restrictions limited the availability of personally owned vehicles in the countries in which they were sold. Over the years during my career, however, Department regulations placed increasing limits on the sales of personally owned vehicles abroad at the end of overseas tours. We were satisfied to break even with the sales of three of our cars overseas.

ALBERT A. THIBAUT, JR.
Political Officer
New Delhi (1975-1978)

Albert A. Thibault, Jr. was born in Massachusetts on August 5, 1941. He received his BA from the University of Windsor in Canada in 1962, his MA from the University of Toronto in 1963, and another MA from the University of Pennsylvania in 1964. He entered the Foreign Service in 1969. His career has included positions in Guinea, Sri Lanka, Pakistan, India, Nepal, and Saudi Arabia.

Q: Well then, you came back in '75.

THIBAULT: That's right, I came back in '75 and spent a few weeks on the Iran desk. The only thing I remember about that is Charlie Naas, who was the office director, called me in, welcomed me, and pointed to my desk. I was only there while they were scurrying around to place me elsewhere in NEA. And he immediately said, "Well, you'll be working on ...," I forget what it was. I said, "I know nothing about Iran." He paused and looked me in the eye, saying, "You're an FSO, aren't you?" I said, "Yes." He said, "End of discussion." He was right. That brief exchange told me instantly what being a U.S. Foreign Service officer is all about, including esprit de corps. I have never forgotten it.

After that then I went, as I mentioned before, to be desk officer for Sri Lanka in what was then and now is still known as INS, the Office of India, Nepal, Sri Lanka Affairs in the then NEA. Today it's in SA, the Bureau of South Asian Affairs.

Q: Were you it for THIBAULT: For Sri Lanka and the Maldives. I should have mentioned the Maldives. I never made it to the Maldives when I was stationed there but the ambassador in Colombo was also accredited to the Maldives.

Q: Well then, you were doing this for how long?

THIBAULT: In INS? I was there for three years, 'til '78. I was two years desk officer for Sri Lanka, one year as political officer for India and then I went into Hindi language training for a year at FSI prior to being assigned to New Delhi.

NATALE H. BELLOCCHI
Economic Counselor
New Delhi (1976-1979)

Ambassador Natale H. Bellocchi was born in Little Falls, New York in 1926. He received a degree in industrial management from Georgia Tech in 1944 and was soon drafted into the U.S. Army to serve in a rifle platoon during the Korean War. His Foreign Service career included positions in Hong Kong, Laos, Vietnam, Taiwan, Japan, India, and an ambassadorship to Botswana. Ambassador Bellocchi was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on March 21, 1995.

Q: Then in '76, where to?

BELLOCCHI: India--Indja.

Q: You were in India from '76 to when?

BELLOCCHI: '79. That's when our three year cycle for overseas tours started. I was the economic counselor.

Q: How did you find India at that time? India is both a fascinating place, but for Americans I think Indians can be very difficult to deal with.

BELLOCCHI: Sure, but they can also be very good friends. You can make some good personal relationships. You can also meet many that have you crawling up the wall. But it's a big country, and they're not without their pride. I think that if you take that into account, you really can make some good friends. It is an open democratic country. I got there when Gandhi had declared an emergency. During much of the time I was there we were in this emergency period. Then she permitted open elections and got defeated. The Janata party won, and it was the first non-congress government that they had there, so all of that was very fascinating. Politically there was a lot of change taking place. Economically, still very difficult for American companies to do business there. And there was some animosity because there had been some rather unfriendly exchanges. India was considered to be too close to the Soviet Union as you remember in those days. They weren't really a friend even though they were a democracy. So there were these kinds of strains in the political relationship, but you still could do a lot of work there. I spent a lot of my time negotiating the reopening of our AID program.

Q: What was the situation in India? Why would we want an AID program at that point?

BELLOCCHI: Well, we'd had one. We had a very huge AID program there, and then we didn't get the right kind of treatment I guess. We thought they favored the Soviet Union, or whatever it was. We cut out most of our aid except for PL 480 humanitarian assistance. Our AID people were interested in getting back into the aid business in India, certainly a place that needed it. I think there were many also that wanted to reopen our participation in World Bank projects, for example, multilateral arrangements. Our AID people were more interested in the bilateral, but we at the embassy were more interested in staying away from the political problems that the AID program had had in the past, and that we join multilateral projects more than bilateral. It was about 50-50 actually when it finally came out. We joined some irrigation projects, but it was a long sticky process.

Q: Why would India...I mean it certainly had the intellectual know-how, why would it need AID projects?

BELLOCCHI: They needed capital. They didn't need the technical assistance. They're very capable in the scientific areas especially, but they needed the capital for things that had to be done, especially things out in the countryside, the irrigation projects for example, big infrastructure projects. They needed outside assistance, they needed capital, they needed some technical know-how. They didn't have the kind of companies that could do some of that kind of work. They relied mostly on multilateral AID so that they could maintain political control.

Q: Dealing with AID sometimes can almost be like a foreign power. I'm talking about the American AID program.

BELLOCCHI: You better believe it.

Q: Can you give your impressions? This is the first time you're really up against AID in a non-wartime situation. I mean, there you are, you're the economic counselor, and AID says, "We want to do some projects."

BELLOCCHI: That was by far the toughest task we had. Negotiating with the Indians was not easy. They're very good negotiators, and it took a long stretch of time. But quite frankly the differences between State and AID were far greater.

Q: What was our concern? I mean, what were the problems?

BELLOCCHI: Our objective was that AID didn't get back in the position they were in before, where they were so dominant in this whole area that it caused us political problems. The Indians do not want to have a foreign power telling them what to do. And AID was telling them what to do, and they had a lot of money to back them up. I think the concern of the embassy was that we restart the AID program in a gradual way, and we do it to the greatest extent possible through multilateral rather than bilateral means to avoid the political problems of the past. And the multilaterals did a good job in those days. World Bank irrigation projects, and dams, and all these other things were pretty good. AID didn't agree with that, of course. They preferred the bilateral, and they wanted direct control over projects themselves. So that was our biggest battle.

Number two was the amount. I think State in those days said, let's start small because we feel that the aid to India process has got to be developed, and its got to progress gradually, or it's going to become an even greater political problem, so let's not go overboard. But in those days AID was thinking in terms of a billion dollar AID program again in India. No way did we want that.

Q: In a way did you have the feeling that AID was looking for a place to play after it lost its big ____ in Vietnam?

BELLOCCHI: That's right, and thank goodness Egypt came up and drained some of their attention to take the pressure off India. I was in Laos in the '60s when our military contingent left after the Geneva Agreement. Our military people left, our AID people came back in, and the influx of aid was so fast, and so large, that it overshadowed the departure of the military by far. They can really take over a place in no time at all.

Q: I mean this was very much in the mind, a large bureaucracy, and large bureaucracies cause problems.

BELLOCCHI: They're very good at this. I remember them going to a fellow at Yale University to come up with a study on why there ought to be a very large AID program in India. They searched around the country and got the kind of study they wanted and they had him write it. So we had to overcome that. My name was mud with the AID program in those days, but I think we succeeded. Bob Goheen was the ambassador who was born and raised in India. A former president of Princeton University. And he sided with us and helped us a great deal to keep the AID monster from taking over. As the economic counselor in the embassy, my office was in a little portion of the new embassy we had there. The ambassador's office, the DCM's office, the reception area, and the conference room on one side, and on the other side was what was built to be the AID director's office with a little kitchenette, and a shower, and all this business, and a place for the secretary. The economic counselor had always occupied that little suite of offices. Why? Because when it was built the AID director said he wasn't about to move into the embassy. He had a much better office. So it was the economic counselor's office, it was quite an office.

Q: How about commercial ties with India?

BELLOCCHI: We had a commercial attaché in the embassy. But in those days, no, not very much. Coca Cola had been bounced out because they had done what they should do, they'd appointed an Indian director for Coca Cola India and he promptly got involved in politics. When Gandhi lost the election, boom, out he went, and Coca Cola was finished for some years. I think they're back in now, but there were a lot of problems for our companies. It was very difficult to do business in India.

Q: Was it because it was essentially a socialist type government?

BELLOCCHI: No, very bureaucratic. It was very, very difficult to weave your way through the bureaucracy. And there wasn't any great incentive to take in the American and foreign companies. It was still that great feeling that the foreigners would try to control their economy. They had a lot of barriers against that happening. The barriers, of course, prevented our companies from operating the way they wanted to operate. The fellow that was the head of the economic department in the Ministry of Finance, and the one we had the most to do with, is now the Minister of Finance, Monmohan Singh. A very bright guy.

Q: How about Soviet penetration of the market?

BELLOCCHI: They had that special trade deal with the Soviets, the Rupee-Ruble Trade, and we devoted a lot of time trying to figure out what exchange rate was being used between the two so we could measure how much that was. The Indians took quite a beating on that, frankly, but they were paying off their military procurement salaries(?).

Q: Then after India, where?

BELLOCCHI: Hong Kong.

FRED CHARLES THOMAS, JR.
Commercial Attaché
New Delhi (1977-1978)

Fred Charles Thomas Jr. was born in Arizona in 1927. He served overseas with the Army for two years before graduating from Bucknell University in 1951. He has served at overseas posts in Korea, Pakistan, Germany, Vietnam, and India, as well as the Office of Strategic Research in Washington DC. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1995.

Q: Then what did you do?

THOMAS: The Department, nobody wanted me back here. Nobody wanted any of us back here. When I got back, I went into the Department, and I was told to stay on leave, administrative leave, which meant you didn't pay for it. We couldn't keep staying with relatives. We decided get back into our own house. There were no jobs at the Department. The oil crisis was still brewing. It was the mid-'70s, late '70s, and they had all these research projects going, on petroleum and the shortage of oil. I was sent out to do that. It was just make-work. I ended up doing research on oil, going out to the Department of Energy. I had these clearances, and these clearances let me go to a lot of places and see a lot of documents. But it was no job, really.

I kicked around with nothing really to do. They talked about giving me some more Chinese to bring my Chinese back, there was no job in Beijing at the time.

I was a year in limbo with no real job. It was more than that. They ended up giving me a research INR type job, which was dullsville, sort of intelligence analysis, which I found not my thing.

Desai had taken over in India, and they thought there was a big break in India, with Desai in.

Q: Desai was the new president who replaced Indira Gandhi.

THOMAS: Not president but the prime minister.

Q: And it looked like a swing to more friendly with the United States.

THOMAS: They thought there would be more commercial opportunities that I could maybe get some American investments, do what I'd done in Germany. What I'd been able to accomplish in Germany preceded me. I said, "If that's what I've got to do to get out of the country and get a post." I agreed to go off to New Delhi into that job.

Right after I got there, Desai turned out to be even worse than Indira had been. He insisted that Coca-Cola turnover their formula. He wanted some things out of IBM that they weren't willing to give him. Both of them closed up shop and walked out. When they did it, nobody was interested in investing anything in India. I had the Delhi belly for months on end.

Q: Delhi belly being a term for sort of like a mild-grade dysentery.

THOMAS: The ambassador to India was a man named Goheen, a Greek scholar out of Princeton. We had a fellow named Wyles, I think, who was the administrative counselor who was an ex-chief in the Navy. We had some type of foreigner, who had an American passport, who was running the commissary. The prices in the commissary were horrendous, with everybody up in arms about the costs and prices. We'd been there two weeks when I went to a meeting. Wyles was back in this country on TDY, arranging for another four-year tour (he'd been there four years), to stay on in India. Everybody was screaming about the costs at the commissary, etc. I got up and made a speech about what I'd found out about the commissaries in Germany and Karachi. According to law, the commissary really belonged to the membership. If you looked at the constitution of the commissary in India, it put all the real power in the hands of the ambassador's administrative counselor. That didn't mean that constitution had to stay that way, because the law stated that the membership had a right to change the constitution any way they wanted. The first thing you had to do was rewrite the constitution.

I got a big hand of applause from everybody when I made this little speech. Consequently I was elected to chair a committee to change the constitution of the commissary. I turned around and asked for volunteers to sit on the committee. No officers volunteered; only one officer's wife offered to be on the committee. Everybody else was a clerk, a code clerk or a clerk of some type, on this committee.

Within about three or four days after this thing was set up, I got a call from this young Princetonian who had the same job Moorefield had. He'd been brought out there (tennis anyone? good looking, handsome boy, with a young wife) as aide to Ambassador Goheen. He came in to tell me what the ambassador wanted in that constitution.

I looked at this young man and said, "I wasn't elected by the ambassador. I was elected by the membership of the club. Once we've decided on the constitution, I'll send a draft around for the ambassador to look at. If he doesn't like it, he can tell me so. But, until then, well, let's not worry about what the ambassador wants in it. Right now, I'm worried about what the people who're serving here want in it."

He went back and told the ambassador. That didn't make me very popular with the ambassador.

The constitution was rewritten. In the meantime, my job was nothing, really. I wasn't getting anybody to invest. My boss, Bryant, who was the senior commercial attaché...

Q: Edward Bryant.

THOMAS: He looked on me as trouble, in the commercial sense, because I had a fairly senior rank, and I was a third wheel there, and, you know, they really didn't need me. I was always coming up with new ideas, and who likes new ideas; they only cause problems.

I just said, "Well, what the hell. I don't like this post, anyway. I'm not getting along or going to get along very well with Goheen. So I'm going to get myself out of here, if I can. But, in the meantime, I'll do what I can."

So we rewrote the constitution. It put the power into the hands of an elected board. There was to be a chairman of the board who was to be elected by the membership. The ambassador put out word that he wanted to make sure that I was not elected chairman of the board of that commissary. He got somebody to agree to run, who was head of the NSA unit there. He was a guy who got up and made a funny speech. At the meeting after he was elected, I was asked "Was there any job I preferred to have, because I'd arranged all this?"

I said, "Yes, I'd like to be chairman of the by-laws committee."

It's one thing to have a constitution, but the next thing, in terms of power, is the by-laws. I said, "I'd like volunteer to sit on the by-laws committee."

Well, by this time, all the officers in the place were coming around on the q.t. and saying, "Go to it. We're all for you." They didn't want to be openly for me, because the ambassador was backing Wyles, who was the guy fighting me.

In the meantime, I wasn't given a house to live in.

Q: You were in Delhi from when to when?

THOMAS: I arrived there in, let's say, October of '77, and departed in June of '78. I had the school year with my kids there.

Goheen had left on home leave; I went in to make my final call on Arch Blood; I apologized for not having accomplished anything, in terms of my job there. He said, "Oh, you've accomplished a lot. What you did for this commissary and the morale here has been worth, you know..."

I took off for Washington. There was no real job back here, really. They kept kicking me from pillar to post. Suddenly, at a Christmas party here, I met someone from a large corporation; he heard I was a China linguist and that I was looking around; I was sort of fed up with bureaucracy. He said he thought he could line up a job with his corporation, and a new big contract they had in China. This was the winter of '78, Christmas time, and I listened to him.

In the spring of '79, I just decided I'd had it. I retired in June, with no written commitment, but an oral commitment, that I would be hired by this company to go to China for them.

Just as I retired, the Chinese pulled the rug out from under this company and a lot of others. They got scared they were spending too much money, and they cancelled all these contracts. I'd retired, suddenly, into what I thought was going to be a job. It wasn't a job, because it disappeared.

I tried to start a consulting business on China. I was just getting started, when I was hit from the rear in a terrible automobile accident. It was two to three years before I came out of the shock from that, the trauma.

I said, "Well, what the hell. I'm going to enjoy my retirement." I became involved in local political affairs.

That was pretty much my State Department career.

Q: Well, I want to thank you very much. Fred. This has been very illuminating.

TERESITA C. SCHAFFER
Office of the Science Advisor
New Delhi (1977-1979)

Ambassador Schaffer was born in New York and later educated in France. She received her undergraduate degree from Bryn Mawr College and joined the Foreign Service. Her Foreign Service career took her to Israel, Pakistan, India, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka, and the Maldives. Ambassador Schaffer was interviewed by Thomas Stern in September 1998.

Q: In 1977, you moved with Delhi for reasons already described. Was there any curiosity in Delhi about your transfer?

SCHAFFER: There was a noticeable absence of inquiries on what happened in Pakistan, both from our colleagues and our Indian contacts. That was helpful.

As soon as I had arrived, I reported for duty to the Science Advisor's office. The Ambassador was Bob Goheen, former President of Princeton University. He had been educated in India because his parents had been missionaries there. His daughter had been a classmate of mine during high school and college.

The first DCM I worked for was David Schneider; he was followed by Arch Blood. My immediate boss was Tom Varevalobich. Tom was a rocket scientist; he had worked on the space program at a jet propulsion laboratory. He was the Counselor for Scientific Affairs, but reported to the Economic Counselor. He was eminently qualified for the position because he had spent two years at Indian Institute of Technology at Kamper at a time when the U.S. assistance was being provided that institution. A number of the donors selected a technological institute to support and the U.S. chose the Institute of Technology at Kamper. At the time I arrived, he was very friendly with Dhawan who was the head of the Indian space program; that friendship may indeed have first developed in graduate school.

I said that the Science Office was part of the Economic Section. It had been part of the Political Section, which had responsibility for following nuclear development in India. The change was made to accommodate the Schaffers, so that I would not be working even indirectly for Howie. I think that in either organizational structure, the supervision of the Science Counselor was very relaxed; neither the Political or Economic Counselors gave very close supervision to the Science Counselor. Certainly the Economic Counselor did not spend much time on scientific affairs.

The whole Embassy was somewhat different from organizational structures with which I was familiar. For example, technically I was working for the Department of Health and Human Services (HEW). My position had been filled by that Department as far back as anyone can recollect; my salary was paid by HEW. Tom's position on the other hand was part of the State Department's complement, but in the Delhi structure, I reported to him.

A lot of my responsibilities were related to projects in the scientific-technological area which had been originally funded by excess rupees generated by our PL-480 program -- which had been a huge resource. There were different local currency accounts; one of those was designated for funding of cooperative research between India and the U.S. India was not the only country which funded many projects through PL-480, but most of the innovative uses for the local currencies stemmed from India. Much of the research was done by the Indian health agencies. Most of my contacts were with the health bureaucracy.

The Indian bureaucratic system was and is cumbersome. That is true pretty much across the board. The project approval process is very long; they have a clearance process that makes ours look efficient. In the case of health research, there was special concern about the acceptability of the project to the Indian population. On several occasions, senior scientists supported a proposal whole-heartedly, but they had to clear it with the Ministry of Finance, the Foreign Office, the assistance agency and in some cases, the Home Ministry. They had tried to convince these bureaucrats not to object. So to get a new project approved tended to take a long time.

Actually, the most interesting example of this process was a project not in the health field. NOAA (National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration) -- a part of the Department of Commerce -- had a major project titled MONEX (Monsoon Experiment.) This was part of the first world-wide weather experiment -- global atmospheric research program (GARP). The NOAA people wanted to come to India during the monsoon season to conduct a number of experiments. They wanted to base an aircraft in Delhi which could take atmospheric soundings, to assign a TDYer to supervise the project, and to measure ocean temperatures -- although that part of the experiment did not require Indian participation since NOAA had its own ships well outside the territorial limits. The Embassy was requested to make the necessary arrangements. This involved us with a whole new part of the bureaucracy -- the Meteorological Office. That Department was fully supportive; they saw the benefits that might accrue to India from the American project. They hoped that the findings might improve their predictive capabilities. But the proposal included a number of unusual requests. We, as Americans are wont to do, proceeded in typical legal fashion. The State Department and NOAA were anxious to have a "Memorandum of Understanding" which would spell out the terms under which the project would operate. One of the more complicated requests related to the special aircraft, but technically, when it took off to take soundings, it was leaving India and when finished its experiments would have to re-enter India. That required at least multiple entry visas; preferably visa requirements might have been waived as well as a customs waiver for the aircraft, which was loaded with scientific equipment. The problem that we had anticipated -- access for Indian scientists to the data collected by NOAA -- was taken care of very early and never did raise its head. But there were many other agencies that had to put their fingers in the pie. Someone drafted the memorandum; as I recall it, it was very long, filled with "whereas's". This had to be reviewed by the government's legal staff, especially the legal advisor to the Minister for External Affairs. The difference in time between Washington and Delhi was useful in this case. When I got to the office in the morning, I could expect a cable proposing some language changes. I would take those to the legal division, who would in turn give me their proposed changes. I would send those to Washington who would review them while I slept -- although I did have a couple of phone calls at unusual hours.

On one day -- an Indian holiday -- we got a zinger. There was a clause that seemed to be quite innocuous; it turned out to be quite the opposite. It was a liability clause and included a reference to applicability of U.S. law to this project. I took it to the Ministry, where the Legal Advisor happened to be in his office despite the holiday -- despite the fact that I was recovering from amoebas. The Legal Advisor read the proposed language and said he could not agree unless he had a memorandum from the Department's Legal Advisor spelling out what the pertinent section of U.S. law might be. He ended the conversation by asking that I query Washington to see whether that clause was really necessary -- in light of his threat to require additional information and a prolonged review period. Fortunately, our lawyers agreed to delete that clause.

Unlike my predecessor, who was a PhD scientist from the National Institutes of Health (NIH), my only science background was the inevitable course taken to fulfill the science requirement in college. I did not find my lack of background to be a major impediment. I was quite forthright about my lack of knowledge; people seemed to accept that I was a Foreign Service Officer who could provide good liaison between the two scientific groups -- Indian and American. Furthermore, by the end of my tour, I had become quite familiar with some issues -- including some that were important to our cooperative program and also of personal interest to me. For example, I became quite familiar with malaria and its eradication and contraceptive research. I think I achieved a level of familiarity with those programs which gave me considerable credibility. I could summarize accurately the status of research on those subjects, as well as others. I knew the issues involved, although I did not pretend to be scientifically qualified.

An interesting story about my not having a Ph.D. has to do with an American colleague. During an inspection of Embassy Delhi, one of the inspectors was Felix Bloch -- before he became well known. I first met Felix at a "meet the Inspectors" party -- probably at the DCM's or the Administrative Counselor's house. Felix was assigned to review the work of the Science Office, including an interview with me, since I was technically in an out-of-State assignment. I introduced myself to Felix. His immediate response was that he heard about me and some of the comments had been negative.

That was an inauspicious start. I decided to seek an early appointment with Felix. I got one and at the appointed time, I went to the office Bloch was using. The conversation had only begun when I reminded him of his comments at the party. I asked what the problem was. He told me that his information had come to him from his wife, who worked at the National Science Foundation -- or similar organization. She had told him that there was unhappiness in the NSF because I had been up front about my lack of a Ph.D. I told Felix that it was all true; I didn't have a Ph.D. and saw no reasons to hide the fact. Furthermore, I thought it important for my contacts to understand my background, especially since I was in contact with scientists that were on the cutting edge. I could provide good administrative and liaison services; that seemed enough for my contacts. I thought it was important not to misrepresent myself.

Felix's comment was that some quarters in Washington felt that I should have been more discreet. In light of his subsequent history, that was an interesting suggestion. [Felix Bloch was accused of espionage in 1989. The case never went to trial.]

Our office made connections between Indian and American scientists, tried to shepherd projects through the Indian approval process, and tracked them and followed their reporting requirements once they were approved. We also supported visiting American scientists, when they came to explore the possibility of finding an Indian partner or to consult with their counterpart.

We also were the action office for the Indo-US Subcommission on Science and Technology. That commission met a couple of times during my Delhi tour. Its main function was to provide policy guidance to the various joint research efforts. As it so often happens, the policy guidance was broad enough to encompass almost all proposals.

I kept contact with senior officials in the Indian Health Ministry and the ministry that received the American assistance funds, as well as the leading researchers in the Indian Council for Medical Research and the All-Indian Institute for Medical Sciences. I traveled around the country, visiting many of the leading health institutions. Tom worried about other research activities, particularly those in the space program. If we had visitors who might have needed escorting or more assistance than my staff and I usually provided, we did provide that, even if some of the work could have been done by travel agencies.

The vast majority of people I was dealing with wanted projects to succeed. They were all senior level officials. That was an interesting feature of my unusual role in the Embassy. The Indian Foreign Office was very particular about what the rank of visitors might be. Relatively junior officers like me would never be received by senior officials of that Ministry. Its rule was the Joint Secretaries -- the rough equivalent of deputy assistant secretaries in our system -- would only receive people at the Counselor or higher level. In my case, I had no reason to work with the Foreign Ministry, but I had routine access to Secretaries -- the rough equivalent of our Under Secretaries -- of the Ministries which were of interest to me. They didn't care that I was only a First Secretary.

A couple of years ago, when my son was at Columbia University, he had a graduate assistant in one of his economic courses. That was an Indian who was the son of the Secretary of the Health Ministry when I was in Delhi. The assistant asked my son whether he was related to Teresita Schaffer; he said his father remembered her from her work of twenty-five years earlier. That was very rewarding.

Where we were helpful was not in the commentary we might have had on scientific issues -- American or Indian scientists obviously had a better background for that. We were most useful in finding ways to engage the Indian bureaucracy. That is a science in itself, although no advanced degrees are granted to experts in this field. There is a system -- a very elaborate system with some aspects of chaos -- which I finally learned. It was our responsibility to be able to follow a paper trail and know who would have to “sign off” on proposals. We knew which officials were friendly and which were difficult; what each senior official was interested in; what sensitivities might exist on Indian-American scientific cooperation. During this time, it was not uncommon to have sudden eruptions of controversy over certain scientific endeavors. For example, in the 1960s and early 1970s, there had a couple of projects that became passionately controversial. It was alleged that we were giving yellow fever to some mosquitoes and then releasing those carriers on certain parts of India. That was a pure canard, but it was typical of the controversies that might arise at any time from some innocent project. It should be noted that these disturbances were always generated by political forces that were trying to blacken the U.S.’ reputation.

I was somewhat lucky in that during my tour, not many new controversies arose. I had inherited some old “chestnuts” that became active. There is one interesting one which did come up during my tour which concerned some work being done on monkeys. Manufacturing polio vaccine required rhesus monkeys, which could be found only in India and Nepal. So a supply of monkeys was needed by the National Institute of Health. The International Primate Protection League, an American organization, which was strongly opposed to the use of primates for research purposes, took up the cudgels on this issue. It got in touch with like-minded spirits in India and Nepal. This group created a sufficiently vocal outcry that the Nepalese Government banned the export of these monkeys. The Indians also considered restrictions. NIH of course became alarmed and sent a senior official -- Dr. Ben Blood (whose son subsequently joined the Foreign Service) -- to Delhi. He reached a somewhat vague understanding with the Indians which left many questions unanswered. The issue had extraordinary resonance in India. Not only was the issue ripe for those who wanted to smear US-Indo scientific relations, but more importantly monkeys represent spiritual and ritual values dear to Hindu hearts. In one tradition, one of the important deities appears as a monkey, in one of its manifestations. So monkeys appear in a classic epic which are so central to the Hindu religion. Monkeys had a level of Indian respect that was not accorded to other animals.

This monkey issue had been around for many years before my arrival -- ever since the polio vaccine was developed. So although the issue had been around for many years, it all of a sudden became a hot potato.

I came away from that assignment with a mixed feeling about the science programs. I felt that some useful research was done; there were undoubtedly some marginal projects in part because the U.S. agencies did not view available rupees as a scarce resource. It was a complicated process, because some of the rupees were actually appropriated by the U.S. Congress. Some of the projects required a dollar appropriation which, however, were spent in rupees. Dollar appropriations were hard to come by; the rupee appropriations were viewed quite differently by executive agencies and the Congress.

Some of the collaborative projects were quite fascinating. For example, we had some pharmacological research on traditional herbs; there was study -- I think at Benares Hindu University -- which attempted to use Western measuring techniques to assess the effectiveness of non-Western -- e.g., yoga -- therapeutic methods to cure stress-related diseases. The Indians were trying to measure results in ways which would make their findings significant to Western scientists.

We were often subjected to criticism that we carried out research in India which could not have taken place in the U.S. I don't believe that during my time that was done at all. The Indians were very sensitive on this score. If I remember correctly, this accusation was made against one program which dealt with the prevention of cataracts. Cataracts are a frequent occurrence in India, with its very bright sunny days and the lack of adequate medical attention for many people. It was -- and is -- not unusual to have "eye camps" where people with cataracts came to have them removed. One of our projects called for the shipment of these removed cataracts to the U.S. for research. There were many questions concerning "why Indians and not Americans?" I was satisfied that the accusations had no merit. The removal of the cataracts was of benefit to the Indian patients and did not represent an imperialistic attitude. The main reason why the project was established in India was because so many Indians had cataract problems. I was not aware of any pressure having been applied to Indians to undertake unnecessary surgery; it would have been foolish to do so in light of the vast need for such surgery.

In essence, I had no problems with any of the projects we were undertaking. With the rare exception of some "boondoggles", I thought the projects with which I was familiar were worthwhile and designed to increase human knowledge. NIH sponsored research was based on protocols which demanded that the experiments in India use the same standards as if they were conducted in NIH. I am not sure that had always been the case, but it certainly was during my tour. As you can well imagine, the Indian government was very careful, given its population sensitivities about being treated as "guinea pigs." So it gladly accepted the NIH protocols.

I might just mention President Carter's visit in 1978. It was 47 hours, 45 minutes long! The Carters were programmed for every minute of that time. The program for a presidential visit indicates what is to be done in 3-5 minute increments. Every second is accounted for. I was in charge of Mrs. Carter's program. The stated reason I was given this assignment was her interest in social welfare issues; we had the best Embassy contacts with that community. I was also the only female member of the country team, which I think may have been the real reason for my selection.

My whole experience with a trip by a First Lady was fascinating. First came the pre-visit planning. I had never been involved in a presidential visit and the planning was an eye-opener. One member of the White House's advance team represented Mrs. Carter. The advance team was quite nice. I talked to one colleague who had been through the Nixon visit to Poland; he thought that the contrast between the two White House staffs could not have been greater. The Carter people could say "Please" and "Thank you" which apparently were foreign words to the Nixon crowd.

The Carters originally planned to come in November 1977, but sometime in October, the White House asked for a postponement and scheduled the visit for New Year's Day. We first had a pre-advance team, then an advance team and then the visit itself. The Embassy was asked to submit a schedule for the President, for the First Lady and for the Carters together. We did and proposed a number of events. The events that we did propose for Mrs. Carter were approved and were built in her final schedule.

I particularly remember two events. One was a luncheon to be hosted by Mrs. Goheen. I wanted to include in the guest list people with considerable substance in Mrs. Carter's fields of interest, who all happened to be women. We also suggested to the advance team that Mrs. Carter visit a community center in Delhi which had a lot of interesting programs for young people. After we sent these suggestions to Washington, we didn't hear for week after week, despite our periodic reminders. Silence!

Entirely unrelated to the Carter visit we hosted Mary King, the Director of the Peace Corps. We had been told that she was a close friend Rosalynn Carter. I was the escort officer for Ms. King primarily because she wanted to see what was being done by the Indians in the health field. So I took the opportunity to discuss our problem with Ms. King. After a meeting, in the Embassy car that we were using, I told her the state of play and how much we needed help to move Mrs. Carter's program forward. I told her that we had not heard anything from Washington in months and wondered whether we had taken the right approach. I asked Ms. King whether our selection of possible events might be of interest to Mrs. Carter. I got a funny look from her. She said that Mrs. Carter would like our suggestions, but her staff would hate them. I then asked what could be done to bring this matter to a close. Ms. King volunteered to see what she could do about it.

Eventually, again after a prolonged period, the White House permitted us to proceed with the planning of the visit including the events that we had proposed. So we put together the guest list for the luncheon. It was an A-level list. For example, we had Ela Bhatt, who was internationally famous for having organized rag-pickers into a union in Bombay. There was one woman who had been one of Gandhi's collaborators; she was also a very interesting newspaper columnist. So all of the guests had serious credentials in one field or another.

Just before Mrs. Carter landed, the Prime Minister asked to have his daughter invited to the luncheon. We agreed. A few days earlier, I had heard from the traveling party that it wished press representatives -- one Indian and one American -- to be included. I suggested the Los Angeles Times correspondent -- Sharon Rosenhouse, who was Delhi based -- and Rami Chhabra, who was a prominent female columnist for a number of the Indian papers. Her main topics were social issues, which I thought that Mrs. Carter would be interested in. There followed a lot of communications between us and the White House; finally we were instructed to invite The New York Times correspondent -- Bill Borders -- and a representative of the India wire services. He turned out to be one of the "mousiest" guys I have ever met.

So at the table, there sixteen high powered women; the journalists, both men, got each end of the table. In the course of preparing this luncheon, I was told that I could not be included at the table, but that I could listen in on the conversation which was to take place after lunch. The purpose for inviting the reporters of course was to get good press coverage. Bill Borders, who was very congenial and a good reporter and who has risen in The New York Times ladder, told me ahead of time that he had never covered a lady's luncheon. I assured him that the women were experts in their fields and could answer any substantive questions that he might have. He called me in the evening after the luncheon -- he was a "pool" reporter for the luncheon who had to post for public view his story. His only question was how one spelled “pomegranate” -- the juice of which had been served at the luncheon. So his story went into great depth about the yellow roses and silver elephants that he found on the table, spectacular saris and pomegranate juice. I thought that was outrageous!! I really resented the superficiality of the report since I had worked so hard to make the luncheon as substantive as possible; I thought that people would view the whole event as having backfired.

The same thing happened at another event -- a press interview which Mrs. Carter’s staff asked to be set up. They would screen the reporters who wished to attend. They selected five Indian journalists -- all very reputable. In briefing these journalists, the staff pointed out that Mrs. Carter was not a “Women’s Page” type. She was a “person of substance” prepared to discuss foreign policy as well as domestic issues. Unfortunately, that stimulated these journalists to ask questions about Latin American and the Middle East. She gave non-answers -- quite properly, I think. She realized that for her to express an opinion on these issues would have made headlines around the world, which would not have been very helpful to her husband and his administration. Toward the end of the interview, someone raised a question about care for the elderly. Then she expressed her views -- some of which were quite interesting. Those insights were very quotable - - interesting and “substantive.” But unfortunately, that discussion only lasted for about five minutes and was overshadowed by the other topics. I thought Mrs. Carter’s staff had missed a golden opportunity not only to “show case” Mrs. Carter, but also to have on the record her views on issues which were of great interest to the Indian audience.

Despite my comments about the Carter visit, I must say that I did not encounter in my tour many prejudices about women in foreign affairs. Of course, there are always individuals who for one reason or another have a closed mind on this question -- they think women’s minds are made of mush. There were some men I called on who were somewhat surprised by the visit of a woman FS officer. After the initial shock, they seemed to be able to figure out what to do with me. But in general, I did not notice much prejudice. In some respect, that reflects the nature of my contacts. Many were Indian women who were involved in interesting things. As a general statement, I would say that women professionals have to learn to compensate for some of these prejudices. I think it was somewhat easier for me to work in India than in Pakistan, partly because the Indians were accustomed to woman leadership -- i.e. Mrs. Gandhi -- but also because, in general, urban sophisticated Indian society is open-minded on this issue.

All in all, the Carters’ visit was useful. The impact was rather mixed. The visit became almost instantly a “cause” because of an unfortunate incident. A photo op was set up for the President and his principal advisors after they had finished their meeting with the Indian Prime Minister and his Cabinet. Unfortunately, the microphone sitting in front of Carter had not been turned off. So his confidential discussions with a member of his staff could be overheard by a audience. He said that he thought that “a very cold, firm letter should be sent to them.” That quote was blared in the press the next day, which was not at all helpful to the President’s purposes.

In other respects, the visit was a memorable and colorful event. Good Presidential visits can capture the imagination of the indigenous population. I should mention here another aspect of the visit which I found very interesting. There was at least one slip between the principals and the staff. We had been urging the staff to program the President to visit a village. Vajpayee tried to dissuade the President, but in light of Carter's own background and his mother's service in India, we thought such a visit was a natural. The White House staff was very opposed; they were afraid that the village would be nothing but dust and dirt. Goheen, as a precaution, asked the Embassy staff to identify a number of villages that might be appropriate for a Presidential visit. The Agricultural Attaché was deeply involved; I think he had a village in mind before the question was even raised. Soon after the Carters landed, the President went for a walk in the gardens of the Prime Minister's residence. The Prime Minister was said to have told Mr. Carter that he just had to see a typical Indian village. Carter readily agreed. So the village visit became part of the program. At 5:30 a.m. the next morning, the advance team, which included my husband, went to a village near Delhi. They prepared the way for the visit. On the following morning, President Carter and his entourage showed up in this village. The White House could not have imagined the photo ops that this visit generated; the village was very colorful. The Carters were greeted like royalty; they had a red mark put on their foreheads; they were draped with garlands and bright red shawls. The mist was still rising over the village making for a very wonderful romantic background. The Carters got the grand tour of the village, which had been selected because it was not too much of a show-case, but nevertheless was interesting. The most interesting feature of this village was a bio-gas processor, which provided the village with a steady source of fuel. The good news was that, because the visit was not planned very much in advance, there was no attempt made to change the nature of the village. All the Indian government had time to do was to level off a field at the edge of the village for a parking area. Presidential attention to this village -- or any other -- pays considerable dividends in that it captures the imagination of both Indian and American publics.

Carter also gave a speech at the Ram Lila grounds, which is one of the premier public assembly places in Delhi. A huge crowd gathered there; I think I can fairly say, that with the exception of the open mike incident, the visit had a positive impact on US-India relations. Carter developed a personal bond with the Indian leaders which is always the hope on these trips. Unfortunately, the basic policy issue remained unresolved -- for a number of years after the visit.

As I said, my assignment as Mrs. Carter's "sherpa" provided me an opportunity to see the Ambassador frequently. I would brief on the status of our planning and he would make some very helpful suggestions. He wanted to make sure that the visit would go well. I also had meetings with Mrs. Goheen, who was the hostess at the lunch I described earlier. She was not involved in reviewing Mrs. Carter's every step, but she was always available if we needed her. Both Goheens are wonderful people -- very approachable, low key. So the Embassy staff never had any problems knocking on their doors for advice and ideas.

I always thought that during my tour, Bob Goheen's finest hour -- within the American community -- was when he was confronted by a suicide by a young Marine Guard. That event was deeply unsettling to the Embassy community and especially the other Marines. Allegedly, this Marine took the ultimate step because he had an altercation with his girl friend while he was standing watch; he then called another Marine to cover his post then went outside the Embassy and shot himself. We had a memorial service in the Embassy, presided by Goheen. Since the dead man was military, there was a certain amount of spit and polish to the ceremony, including the first row filled by the Marines and an empty chair. Goheen was the son of missionaries; he himself was a classics scholar who was also a professor and then President of Princeton University. He was somewhat shy, but on the occasion of the memorial service, he spoke with tremendous dignity, using quotations from Greek and other classical sources, which created an atmosphere of respect and humanity. He also wrote a personal note to the parents of the Marine. The Ambassador was not a politician -- slapping backs and kissing babies -- but someone who rose to the occasion when the community needed to mend quickly.

I have been asked from time to time what special challenges a Foreign Service Officer meets when he or she is married to a Foreign Service Officer. In our case, this was not a problem. Both Howie and I had professional jobs which satisfied us. Mine, as I have mentioned earlier, was a little unusual for an FSO, but it was very educational because it got me involved in areas that a normal assignment would never have touched. That was fun. Indian household help was plentiful and competent. We lived ten minutes from the Embassy allowing me to go home for lunch to see the kids who were still quite young. We had a wonderful Indian nursing school within walking distance from the house. Howie had been in India for six years during an earlier period -- before we were married. That made it much easier to establish relations since many of our contacts had known Howie from his previous tour.

Of course, my workload was quite heavy, not only with my Embassy job, but also as the hostess of the Schaffer household and mother of two young boys. It was a very busy schedule. The kids were sent to an Indian nursery school, which used primarily English as the instruction language. There was a class for Hindi, which my oldest son attended and learned to read children's books - as well as the English texts. One of the most memorable recollections I had is their appearance in the school's Ramayana play. The school enrolled kids between the ages of 2 ½ and six. Ramayana is one of the great Indian epics. Every year the school put on this dramatic production. It was pantomime; the kids did not speak, but there was an oral narrative provided by a faculty member. It was a spectacular presentation. My younger boy, who at the time was 3 ½ was a town's person -- like most of the younger children. He was dressed in a white "Kurta pyjama" -- long embroidered shirt and slightly tight pants. My oldest son, then five, had a big part. He was Lakshman, the King's brother. He wore a series of elaborate costumes because the story is very complicated and involved. The old King dies and is succeeded by Ram who marries Sita, but then he has to go off to war, leaving his wife with his brother. The brother draws a magic circle around Sita's tent to protect her from evil spirits. Sita was of course elaborately dressed -- a five year old bedecked in a yellow sari. Sita is captured by the demon Ravana and rescued by monkey King Hanuman. It was one of the most wonderful kids' dramatic performances I have ever witnessed. It was performed at the school which was housed in a building with a roof, but no wall, on the grounds of a villa near us. The classrooms were essentially little alcoves which were protected from the rain, but open to the elements otherwise. Schools closed on heavy rainy days because the courtyard would be flooded and then very muddy -- one couldn't get easily to the classroom. I still have some great still shots from that play.

Delhi was and is a very busy city; there is always a lot going on. As we did in Pakistan, we frequently mixed guest lists; we would have some people who worked with Howie and some who worked with me. I think this process made for more interesting occasions since the conversation could, and did, range over a good number of subjects. As I suggested earlier, my role as hostess enabled me to establish contacts with people in such places as the Foreign Ministry who would have deigned only to see Counselors or above, but socially they would engage in conversations with me. So the tandem-couple concept worked quite well for us.

I had some relationship with AID, although not as much as I had in Pakistan. I worked mainly with the population staff. We had just resumed assistance to India, after a six year hiatus which began in 1971 as a consequence of the war. It was a very small program; we did not have a family planning program as such -- to the best of my recollection -- but we did have on the AID staff an officer -- P. Balakrishnan -- who was a real authority on family planning in general and on Indian efforts in particular. He subsequently emigrated to the U.S. and became an American citizen; I believe he now works for AID as an American officer. He was a first-rate professional whom AID managed to retain even when it had no family planning program. There was still considerable interest in Washington on reports about the Indian efforts; that gave me an opportunity to delve into the subject in some depth. I was particularly interested because I had just observed a rather tumultuous period in the Pakistani family planning program. I remember especially a trip I took with Gladys Gilbert, the American officer responsible for family planning issues in AID. We visited a training program for traditional midwives. I will never forget the one sentence which was the essence of the program. The gentleman who was running the educational part of the program explained to us in great detail all the knowledge they were trying to impart to these midwives. They were sitting in the shade of a tree; they were probably around fifty years old, but looked many years older. They were dressed in ragged saris, all hunched over with heads covered by scarves, heavy silver bangles draped around their arms, huge silver earrings; many were toothless or had many teeth missing. The educator explained how they were teaching these women such things as anatomy and physiology and the progress of pregnancy, including fetal development. At one stage, he stopped and leaned back on his chair and said something along these lines: "But you know, the one thing we really want them to remember is that before the baby is delivered, take off your bangles and wash your hands."

I found my two years in Delhi highly rewarding. I would have stayed on had we had a chance. In fact, we were expecting to stay for a third year; I would have loved it. My tour was wonderful and I had a great experience. I think my acquaintance with science programs was useful to me in subsequent assignments, especially when I was a deputy assistant secretary for South Asia and was trying to resolve the controversy surrounding a U.S. – India agreement on scientific cooperation.

My experience in Delhi also made me quite skeptical of the idea that the Foreign Service can grow its own scientific specialists. This has been an issue for many years and has arisen again most recently. Conventional wisdom in some quarters is, that because science is becoming important in exponential leaps, it is important for the Foreign Service needs to have its own cadre of Foreign Service Science Officers. I accept the premise that science is the future, but draw the opposite conclusion. Even if the Department were able to recruit university graduates with degrees in one of the sciences, these officers would have trouble maintaining an up-to-date knowledge of what is going on in their field, much less in other scientific fields. Without that current knowledge, it is unlikely that the Foreign Service Officer could make much of a contribution. Raising your own scientists in the Foreign Service might well result in an officer unqualified to be either. The better model is to bring people into the Service for short tours. Tom Varevalobich may not have been best example, although he was quite knowledgeable having been a research scientist himself. But he could speak with his Indian counterparts with a credibility that no Foreign Service science officer could have engendered. Unfortunately, Tom never figured out how the Foreign Service worked. That was a major gap because that knowledge is important to anyone who wishes to make a contribution. He had to use people like myself to bridge the gap; so we had a reciprocal relationship; he explained the scientific factors involved and I helped him to understand the Department and the Foreign Service. That made us a pretty good team, all things considered.

I do think that the practice of bringing experts into the Foreign Service -- for no more than five years -- is probably the better option than “growing your own” or other possibilities. This program would enable the Department to be much more selective in its recruitment -- i.e. find the “right” scientist for a particular position. For example, if the scientific area of interest in India was in physics, then you could recruit someone with a Ph.D. in that study. If there is an opening in Geneva concerned with the World Health Organization, then the Department might well seek someone with public health credentials. Or in Tokyo, perhaps a material scientist or an engineer might be more appropriate than a Ph.D. in chemistry. Of course, it is quite likely that the requirements of the job will vary from time to time, so that it will not always be filled by people with the same background. The short-term recruitment offers more flexibility in a fast moving subject area; bringing a scientist into the Foreign Service for a career will sooner or later turn him into a generalist thereby losing the great advantage of the flexibility necessary to follow a very active field. I have no doubt that some of the recruited scientists would turn out to be outstanding generalists with a plus based on their knowledge of a scientific area. But I suspect that those people were generalists at heart from the outset who brought that aspiration with them into the Foreign Service along with their scientific knowledge. We can always use generalists with an extra dimension. But if we need scientists, let’s get them for a short tour because that is precisely what the Department needs.

Just some final thoughts about my two years in Delhi. I did learn to speak Hindi; that gave me a lot of enjoyment. The spoken language is almost identical with every-day Urdu. The language used in newscasts, for example, includes extraordinary words which makes it quite different from Urdu. I learned to read even though it was a different alphabet. I used Hindi a lot during my field trips to north India; I practically never used it with my government contacts -- almost all of whom were from south India where an almost entirely different language is spoken. If there had been a useful vernacular, it would probably have been Tamil, which I did not learn.

HOWARD B. SCHAFFER
Political Officer
New Delhi (1977-1979)

Ambassador Howard B. Schaffer was born in New York in 1929. He graduated from Harvard University and then served overseas in the US Army before joining the Foreign Service in 1955. Overseas, Schaffer served in Malaysia, India, Korea, Pakistan, Cyprus, and as Ambassador to Bangladesh. In Washington DC, he served in the Office of Personnel, as the Country Director for Nepal, India, and Sri Lanka, and as the Deputy Assistant Secretary for South Asia. Ambassador Schaffer was interviewed by Thomas Stern in 1997.

SCHAFFER: The second change was a psychological one. I discussed at some length while reviewing my first tour in Delhi the sense of historical importance that my colleagues and I experienced. That feeling had much to do with the leadership and enthusiasm provided by Ambassadors Galbraith and Bowles. They made us--Bowles particularly-- feel that we were serving in an important enterprise and that in terms of broad U.S. interests, India was one the most significant nations. We felt part of an historical change in the U.S.-India relationship. Bowles made a serious and successful effort to gather a very talented staff.

That feeling of participation in something important had disappeared when I started my second tour in Delhi. For almost all personnel, Delhi was just another post--an assignment of a specific duration before proceeding to another post. The feeling of being part of something special had completely dissipated. The view that India was a very important country to U.S. interests had lost its edge. Goheen, obviously interested in India in light of his experience there as a youth, did not inspire the same sense of excitement and concern that Bowles had done. I thought that the morale of the staff was not low, but didn't have the spirit that prevailed in the Galbraith and Bowles eras. There was no sense of excitement.

I was probably more interested in India than most of my colleagues. I liked the country and I had visited much of India. Nevertheless, I felt some sense of disappointment with the embassy atmosphere existing in 1977, even though I was serving in my second tour in a position of greater responsibility than I had during the first one. I was also in general disappointed to some extent with Indian attitudes. I don't think I felt comfortable in this atmosphere and certainly I remembered the Galbraith and Bowles periods as being much more exciting and rewarding. I thought that I had learned something about India in the 1960s. By the mid-1970s, fewer important issues were dealt with in government-to-government channels. There was no sense any longer that what happened in India was very important to the U.S. There were people who scoffed at Bowles for his stress on India's importance. Yet most of the embassy officers in the 1960s recognized that they were witnessing, even taking part in some very important developments. We may have been wrong, but we were convinced that the fate of India was very important to the U.S.

The political reporting, in my recollection, consisted in part of reports which would include contributions from our three constituent posts. These reports tended to be "think-pieces" longer-range points of view. We also sought to have occasional--at least annual--meetings with the political officers from constituent posts. These meetings would often go beyond issues of Indian domestic policies; we used to invite political officers from embassies in adjoining countries--particularly Pakistan. Embassy officers traveled around to the constituent posts and would occasionally draft joint reports with consulate officers to be sent to the embassy.

This was still the era when constituent posts could submit their political reports directly to the Department, with a copy to the embassy. If we had any comments, we would supplement the constituent post's report with an analysis of our own, usually after consultation with the consul general. This process was supported by the embassy because the alternative would have been to send all reports to the embassy and have it forward them. That would have been very cumbersome and time consuming. I always considered the relationship between my section and the political officers in the consulate generals excellent. We did have some differences of views, which we discussed in a collegial manner; I don't recall any occasion when our views and those of a CG were so far apart that we felt "something had to be done."

The Desai government was a great improvement in many respects over the Gandhi regime both in its international and domestic policies. However, I and others felt that this new government was never in the same category with the regimes of the 1960s led by Nehru, Shastri and Mrs. Gandhi.

My other concern related to the embassy's staffing. By 1977, as I have suggested before, there were a good number of officers who were not committed to India, but viewed the assignment as just another posting. They were not as interested in India or their tasks as their predecessors had been in the 1960s. Also, I thought that the embassy staffing was less specialized and talented than I remembered it in the 1960s. That naturally had some impact on my attitude towards the embassy in 1977. I think it might be interesting to compare my views of the situation with those of some of my colleagues. However, I recognize that a second tour in a country will always recall the "good old times." The second tour is somewhat of an anti-climax, particularly in my case since I had served in the embassy headed by Chester Bowles. You can't go home again. This disappointment was not overcome by the fact that I was in a much more senior position in my second tour, although as I discussed earlier, in my first tour I had a very interesting and important portfolio. Second tours in the same city tend to disappoint.

You have asked me what my Pakistani experience did for my analysis of India. It was important in that in the eyes of my colleagues and some Indians I came to be regarded as a Pakistan expert. But I have to note that the Pakistan situation which I knew so well changed soon after my arrival in Delhi. It was only about seven weeks after my transfer that Zulfikar Ali Bhutto was overthrown by General Mohammad Zia ul-Haq. After that, there was a prolonged period of martial law.

My wife, who had been a first secretary in the embassy's economic section--the number two position--was unable to accompany me to Delhi when I transferred. She was told that the needs of the post would have to take priority. The chief of the section was on leave so that my wife had to remain to submit the required economic reports. Therefore, this led me to make frequent trips to Islamabad from Delhi until mid-July (about 2 months) when Tezi was released and I was able to drive the whole family to Delhi. Eventually, she was assigned as science attaché.

I was in Islamabad for the famous--or infamous--4th of July party of 1977. That came only hours before the overthrow of Zulfikar Ali Bhutto by General Zia. My wife and I may be the only people in the Foreign Service who simultaneously were included in both the Indian and Pakistani diplomatic lists--one as principal and the other as spouse.

I don't think that my tour in Pakistan changed my views of India. It may have given me a better appreciation of the general South Asia scene, but I don't believe that my general observations on Indian policies were very different after my Pakistan tour. I do believe that the Pakistan experience gave me a better understanding of India-Pakistan relations. I have always thought that it was important for each embassy to be staffed by officers who had had experience in the other one sometime in their career. It is particularly true for political officers and the DCMs. When I served in PER, I did try to arrange for such assignments in the early 1970s. I was successful to some extent. There are in fact now a number of officers who have served in both India and Pakistan; efforts continue - although fitfully - to provide that dual experience to our officers. I was able to pursue this objective later as well when I served in NEA--especially after I became deputy assistant secretary. Then I tried very hard to encourage the system and the officers to accept the concept of assignments to both Pakistan and India.

I think that by the late 1970s, there was a cadre of South Asia experts, although it was rather thin. The main problem was that senior positions - from DCM to section chiefs - were often given to officers with very little experience in the area. Under such circumstances, it is very difficult to build a sturdy cadre of experts in South Asia--even if it is one of several specialties that an officer might have. Our officers are no fools; they see who is assigned to Delhi and Islamabad as DCM or political counselor or as chief of the economic section. They notice that, too often, the assignment is given to someone with European or East Asian or Middle East experience. That discouraged officers from undertaking expertise in the area since as they saw it they would not necessarily be assigned to leadership jobs following many years in the "vineyard."

Language capability is an important factor in this. It always seemed to me that a young officer who speaks Japanese can look forward to a satisfactory career specializing in at least East Asia and probably Japan. If he is any good, eventually he can aspire to be the DCM or the political or economic counselor or the consul general in one of the other Japanese cities, if he maintains his language skills. Unfortunately, in South Asia, we have a different situation. Language skills are not nearly as important as they are in Japan. On the other hand, South Asia has five embassies to Japan's one.

There is another issue that I have found interesting. There was a time during my PER tour when experienced Japan experts were given preferential treatment in assignments outside Japan. That policy was viewed as bringing Japanese experience to bear on the activities of some of our larger embassies--London, Paris and even New Delhi. My only experiences in seeking assignments for South Asian specialists outside the area were generally unsuccessful. I looked for countries with large Indian or Pakistani populations; it then was made clear to me that the last thing those embassies wanted was someone who had long experience in India or Pakistan. People were afraid that such an officer would identify himself or herself with the South Asian minority populations at the expense of his or her interest in the broader view that an embassy should take.

My Indian contacts seemed not to be adversely affected by my Pakistan assignment. Indeed, I was welcomed back very warmly. Several of my previous contacts had of course moved along during the ten years since my last tour in Delhi. Many had been promoted to very important positions--e.g. members of Parliament became Cabinet ministers. In no way did I ever sense on the part of anybody--members of Parliament, Cabinet and sub-Cabinet officers, journalists, academics--that my tour in Pakistan created any barrier between my interlocutors and myself. In fact, I believe the reverse was actually the case.

The Pakistanis would be more suspicious if an officer had served in Delhi. I think that was certainly true in my case, even though it had been many years since I had served in India before I reached Islamabad. I should also say that while in Pakistan and while the India desk officer, I visited India on many occasions, so that I was able to maintain contacts with Indian officials.

Let me turn to the political situation in Delhi when I arrived in 1977. I would characterize it as very disappointing because the Janata Party--the former opposition coalition which won the Parliamentary elections in 1977--was never able to get its act together properly. One of the problems was that it consisted of a variety of different parties that had coalesced around their shared opposition to Mrs. Gandhi and the state of emergency she declared in 1975. The party included right-wing Hindu components and radical socialists. It was very difficult for such a government to pull all of these disparate views together to support any meaningful program.

I think the political situation in India had gone through a transformation in the intervening ten years since my last tour. The Congress Party, severely weakened in the 1967 elections - just at the end of my first tour - had regained a strong position in the early 1970s under Mrs. Gandhi's leadership and did again regain dominance a few years later after the steam had run out of the Janata coalition. I should note that Janata in 1977 included what is now the ruling party in India--the Bharatiya Janata Party, which had earlier been called the Jana Sangh. In 1977, it was part of the Janata coalition and campaigned as part of the coalition.

One would think that the emergence of a real multi-party system would make political analysis more interesting than it was in 1967 when the Congress Party was the dominant force in India. But in fact, I don't think that happened because the political situation under Congress Party dominance, and particularly after the death of Nehru, was fluid; it had several factions which had to be carefully followed. The fact that one party was so dominant did not mean that it was a monolithic institution.

The new situation in 1977 was analytically interesting, but not more challenging than that which existed in the mid-1960s. The embassy's political section followed events with the same care that it exhibited in the mid-1960s, even though by mid-1970s, it was smaller than it had been. I think it is fair to say that in the mid-1960s the Political Section staff was bloated; therefore it was not surprising that it was reduced in size. Even then, I can't say that in 1977 it was a lean or taut unit, but we had fewer officers dealing with the domestic political situation than was true ten years earlier.

During the 10 years I was away from India I think there was a growing disillusion that stemmed from the inability of the country to stage the economic break-through that many planners and economic commentators had believed possible. There was an upsurge of hope when a democratic government took power in 1977, but that proved to be short-lived. Basic problems had not been solved as the Indians had hoped in the 1950s and early 1960s. As far as domestic politics were concerned, there was considerable disarray. Mrs. Gandhi played her cards carefully in the hopes of returning to power. Originally that ambition seemed far fetched, but as time went on, her chances appeared to improve. Prime Minister Desai was viewed as a great disappointment. I certainly felt that way because I had been an Desai admirer. I thought that he was a strong man who, if given the opportunity to become prime minister, could give India the stronger lead that it needed. But by the time Desai became prime minister, he was 81 years old--born in 1896. By that time, he just didn't have the forcefulness that he exhibited earlier in his life. He became very inflexible, which was a major drawback for someone who had to manage a coalition that included representation from the extreme right and the extreme left. Desai had built a good reputation as chief minister of Bombay and finance minister in the central government but did not live up to his billing when he became prime minister. He just could not provide the leadership that the country needed in the mid-1970s.

On the international scene, under Desai and Foreign Minister Atal Behari Vajpayee (now the prime minister) India made an effort to implement a "good neighbor" policy toward other South Asia countries. The government put considerable emphasis on improving relations with Pakistan. India tends to be a bully in its relations with the smaller countries in the region. The Janata Party, in the short time it was in office, made a serious effort to focus on ways that would help improve relations in the area. These efforts were received well by all South Asian capitals, including Islamabad. We of course gave these efforts our warmest support and encouragement, even though the idea did not emanate from us. India did do its utmost to become the "regional influential" that we had hoped. By opening closer relations with its neighbors, India, in the 1977-79 period, was viewed by its neighbors, except Pakistan, as a friend and not as an antagonist. They therefore lent greater support to India in international forums.

We indeed were surprised by this good neighbor policy and the inclusion of Pakistan in it, as were many other observers. Desai, when in opposition, had publicly scourged Pakistan; he was considered by many Pakistanis to be a strong Hindu communalist; they did not expect that Desai would give much positive attention to India-Pakistan relations. Furthermore, the Indian foreign minister had been a leader in the Hindu communal party and was seen--and properly so--as a communalist who had never expressed any views in which Pakistan could find the slightest bit of comfort. His appointment as foreign minister was viewed with considerable dismay in Islamabad.

So it was very surprising when the new government began the "good neighbor" policy. We were surprised as were the other countries in the area and, I am sure, many Indians. It was probably the only important contribution that the Desai government made to Indian foreign policy. Unfortunately, when Mrs. Gandhi returned to power in 1980, she overturned this positive policy.

I must say that I never got a very good explanation for the position taken by Desai. I suspect that every government wants to go down in history remembered for some bold initiative which would distinguish it from others. But why this government of all governments chose to go in this new direction has never been satisfactorily explained to me. But in fact, it was so preoccupied with its domestic concern, that it was never able to play as a significant role in that area as it had in mind.

I might add parenthetically that I had known Atal Behari Vajpayee very well from my first tour in Delhi. Then he was a leader of the Jana Sangh party and I used to see him regularly. As political counselor, I was able to carry on a dialogue with other members of Parliament who had become Cabinet officers; these were old friends who had been promoted. I just picked up where we had left the relationship ten years earlier. Other embassy staff members would see these Cabinet officers as part of their duties; I would see them to have political discussions. Unfortunately, due to protocol considerations, I was not able to do so with the foreign minister-- only an ambassador may see a foreign minister in the Indian scheme of things and in most other places as well. We would chat sometimes at large parties, but it was not possible for me to see Vajpayee officially.

There were some positive results from the Indian foreign policy initiatives. There was a considerable warming of India-Pakistan relations. Tensions were very much reduced and at times, the relations were actually amiable. As I recall, one of the more gratifying aspects of this new situation was that it became much easier for Indians and Pakistanis to visit each other. We were very much encouraged by these developments, as I said. They fitted well into the long-standing American policy of supporting efforts to improve India-Pakistan relations. The U.S. has been less concerned, except for certain occasions, about India's relations with other neighbors. It should be noted that the change in U.S. administrations, with Jimmy Carter becoming president, certainly had an impact on our Indian policy. The Carter administration viewed India in a more favorable manner than had previous administrations. There were several reasons for this which in some respects meshed with the advent of the Janata Party and the temporary downfall of Mrs. Indira Gandhi. Washington was very interested in what National Security Advisor Brzezinski called "regional influentials." Under this concept, the U.S. focused its attention on leading countries in various regions of the world. In South Asia, that meant, to the Carter administration, India--not India and Pakistan, but solely India. This new policy was spelled out vigorously and vividly a few months after my arrival in Delhi. In January 1978, Jimmy Carter came to India. He avoided going to Pakistan. Instead he flew directly from Iran to India, passing right over Pakistan. Pakistan in addition to being governed at the time by a military dictatorship, didn't qualify as a "regional influential."

The Carter administration's position was very important because until then all important American visitors--such as Eisenhower and Nixon--included both countries. I was quite pleased with this new approach. I agreed that India was the most important country in the region--certainly more important for the United States than Pakistan, especially when the latter was governed by the authoritative regime of General Zia ul-Haq. Moreover, the Carter administration embraced a global agenda which for the first time paid considerable attention to the subject of human rights as a significant foreign policy issue. In India, it found a government that had just come to power having won an election over a briefly authoritarian regime headed by Mrs. Gandhi. So it was a wonderful nexus of the objectives of the two countries. Even before the leaders met in New Delhi, the President and the Prime Minister started a frequent correspondence. The visit in a way was a demonstration of this new connection as well as a gesture indicating how high India rated on our agenda--at the expense of Pakistan.

Carter's visit was unusual. It had been delayed by some domestic political problems in Washington. He arrived in fact on January 1, 1978. We had the rather dubious pleasure of having not one, but two White House advance teams--the first one having paved the way for the postponed visit. The major issue between the U.S. and India at the time concerned the delivery of fuel to Tarapur, a nuclear reactor. It was the Indian tail wagging the American dog. On the first day during a break, Carter was huddled with Brzezinski and Cyrus Vance, then the Secretary of State. They were unaware that a microphone near them was open and transmitting their comments. I was in the room and heard Carter say something about sending a cold, hard note to the Indians about the fuel problem. The story subsequently got world headlines.

Aside from that, there was considerable rapport between the president and his team and the Indians. Carter came with a very large group; we got the usual static about the treatment of White House staff. This was my first experience with presidential visits. I thought it was a sight to be seen. The visit featured a major Carter speech which in part addressed the major issues. Before his departure, Carter signed what became known as the "Delhi Declaration" which lauded Indian democracy and underlined the importance of such a political structure. The Declaration was drafted to emphasize the special relationship between Washington and Delhi.

We were very busy in the period before Carter's arrival. I had my full share of those preparations - drafting briefing papers, etc. I also vividly remember being called on because I spoke Hindi and could find my way around. I was rushed to look over a nearby village which might become a venue for a presidential visit. The village was included in Carter's itinerary at the last minute--after Desai had persuaded him following his arrival in New Delhi that in order to understand India one had to get out of the major cities and observe village life. So I raced to this village, which was spruced up a little making it as presentable as possible for the president of the United States in the short time available.

I have another vivid memory of that trip. As I said, President and Mrs. Carter arrived on January 1. We had worked very hard throughout the holidays trying to prepare for the visit. Briefing books had been drafted including a schedule with appropriate comments about each event. These were sent to Teheran in time to be aboard Air Force 1 as it flew from Iran to India. I decided that I had worked hard enough in the preceding weeks and I went to bed early on the eve of the Carter arrival. Around 10:45, I got a call from DCM Arch Blood who was the control officer for the visit. He said that we had a real problem; the embassy had just received a message saying that the Presidential party wanted a description of the route that the President would be taking from the airport to the Presidential Palace where he would be staying. It turned out what they really needed was some kind of poop-sheet which would enable the staffers to answer any presidential question about where he was going and what he might see on the way. Blood said that I knew the area well; he asked that I come to the embassy right away and do something about the White House request. So I got dressed and went to the embassy. It must have been about 11:30 when I got there. I sat down with my typewriter, outlining a scenario for the motorcade trip from the airport. I have to say that my knowledge of all the neighborhoods that the motorcade would pass through was rather sketchy. So I made much of it up. As I was typing, I suddenly heard firecrackers and bells announcing the arrival of the New Year. I finally finished my message and gave it to Blood who sent it to Teheran.

A few days later, Arch called me into his office and said that he really had to compliment me. He had been told by members of the presidential party that of all the papers they had been given to read, my travelogue on the trip from the airport to the Palace was by far the best.

The visit was interesting and successful. One usually characterizes all presidential visits with those adjectives, but I do believe that the Delhi visit really merited that description. I have described the microphone incident, which was really the only flaw in the visit. We had some exciting incidents. One of the more disreputable Cabinet ministers somehow manage to slip by the guards and entered the president's bedroom in the Palace. So he had an unscheduled meeting with Carter.

In those days, posts like Delhi were much more isolated than they are today--primarily because of the great improvement in recent years in communications and information dissemination. For us to have access to telephones--set up by the White House Communication Agency--which actually worked so that we could talk to Washington and if we wished, family and friends -- was great boon. And when Air Force One arrived, we felt that we were no longer isolated, but really at the heart of U.S. foreign policy. That made the visit exciting and gratifying even though as in all presidential visits there was considerable silliness.

Let me now turn to the political issues I dealt with while I was in Delhi. The Kashmir issue was pretty dormant. While I was still in Pakistan, an agreement had been reached between the government of India and the leadership of the Kashmiri group--Sheikh Abdullah-- which had represented the views of the political majority in Kashmir during the entire post-independence period. While Abdullah was alive, Kashmir was not on the government's agenda, either as a domestic issue or as a bone of contention between Pakistan and India.

I did visit Kashmir and found the state in the late 1970s far different from what it had been ten years earlier. By my second Indian tour, Kashmir had a government which had been popularly chosen, led by someone who had the confidence of the majority of the Valley people.

The other important difference was that those Kashmiris who had wished for an early settlement of the dispute either through Kashmir's independence or by accession to Pakistan had pretty much given up hope as the result of the 1965 and 1971 India-Pakistan wars. They became more reconciled to having a permanent connection with India. At the same time, under both Bhutto and Zia, the Pakistanis decided to put Kashmir on the back-burner, as provided for in the India-Pakistan agreement of 1972.

I always hoped, especially in the aftermath of the 1965 war, that the issue of Kashmir could be quietly set aside. I did not anticipate any permanent settlement which could be agreed to by both sides. That would have involved signing a piece of paper which would inevitably have been opposed by many in India and Pakistan. So the best we could have hoped for was quiet. For that it was important that the Indians manage Kashmir in a reasonable fashion. The need for a "kinder and gentler" state government was important because for so long Kashmir had been in the hands of instruments of New Delhi who had little popular support and governed the state in a corrupt and arbitrary way. So Kashmir was not a subject of particular attention in the late 1970s. It did not rate very high on the embassy's agenda during the two years I served a political counselor.

I mentioned earlier our difficulties with nuclear fuel for an Indian power plant. In 1974, India staged its first nuclear explosion--for "peaceful purposes." In those days many serious people thought that nuclear explosions could be used for civilian projects--we know better now. But in our view, the distinction that the Indians were trying to make was not acceptable; we saw all nuclear explosions as having proliferation dangers. The important part of this story was that the Indian explosion triggered a renewed interest in efforts to bring about an international non-proliferation regime. The Ford administration, when Kissinger was the secretary of State, was obliged to take note of Congressional and American public concern about the Indian action and adjust its policies in light of this concern.

As I have mentioned, the issue of nuclear fuel arose because the United States had a contractual obligation to provide the fuel--low grade enriched uranium--to twin nuclear power plants in Tarapur, whose construction the U.S. had financed through its assistance programs in 1963. Under this agreement, India was obliged to buy its nuclear fuel from the U.S. which in turn was obliged to sell it to India. In the late 1970s following the Indian test, Congress passed legislation which required, after an 18-month grace period, that all nuclear fuel and technology deliveries cease to any country which was not a signatory to the 1968 Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT). If a country had not signed the NPT, it could still acquire American fuel if it allowed international inspection of all of its nuclear facilities. This policy for India became very complicated. The Indians took the position that we were obliged to honor an international agreement to provide the fuel. We said we were sorry, but the U.S. legislation would not allow us to do so. Efforts were made to convince the Indians to make enough concessions to allow the U.S. to resume its deliveries. We managed to get waivers through Congress, but the Indians did not move far enough to satisfy the requirements of the legislation and our deliveries eventually ceased. This dispute became a very sore point in U.S.-India relations.

I was certainly berated by my Indian contacts. Senior officials, like Joe Nye and Tom Pickering, came to Delhi to try to work out some kind of mutually agreeable arrangement. The Indians also sent delegations to Washington, but no agreement was ever reached. Finally, after my departure for the India country director position in the Department, a deal was struck--the French became India's supplier of nuclear fuel. My view was two-fold. I found it highly regrettable that this issue arose at a time when U.S.-India relationship had greatly improved and further collaboration seemed quite possible, especially as the U.S. was wedded to the doctrine of regional influentials. I was especially concerned that so much of the relationship--even at the presidential level--was devoted to this disagreement about nuclear fuel deliveries. The tail of Tarapur was indeed wagging the dog of U.S.-Indian ties. Secondly, I had to confess--to myself if not to my Indian contacts--that the Indians had a strong case. How could the U.S. retroactively apply domestic legislation which barred the delivery of fuels contracted for ten years earlier. It was of course a lost cause for the U.S.; we could not do anything about deterring the Indians from their path. Congress would not allow a waiver to exempt India from the legislation. I think the whole episode was regrettable, particularly since the administration did not make a major effort to revise the draft legislation. For example, the administration did not make a very strong case to exempt some of our activities under a grandfather clause which would have excluded from the legislation the signed obligation to provide fuel to Tarapur. We should not have been in a position to violate an international agreement. I don't know why a greater effort was not made; it may have been an oversight or a concern that Congress would be hard-nosed about exemptions. But I was not in Washington at the time the issue emerged, so I can't comment on what might have happened or not happened. I was in New Delhi when the legislation was enacted and it was only later that I found myself in the Department dealing with such difficulty with the consequences of our position.

I should comment on Sino-Indian relations because there was an important development during my second tour in Delhi. As I mentioned, Atal Behari Vajpayee was the foreign minister. He sought an improvement in Sino-Indian relations, which had been pretty much in deep freeze following the 1962 war. That freeze was made icier by the Chinese attitude during the India-Pakistan wars in 1965 and 1971. The PRC took Pakistan's side on both occasions and made some threatening noises. Fortunately, Beijing did not take any military actions against India, which would have been a great danger to the Indians. Vajpayee visited the PRC--I think that it was the first visit by a high-ranking Indian government official since 1962. The visit proved disastrous because just at the time Vajpayee landed, the Chinese launched an invasion of Vietnam. There was obviously no attention paid in Beijing to the fact that the Indian foreign minister was a guest at the time. Naturally for the Indians, this Chinese action raised the specter of the actions the PRC had taken against India in 1962. It also displayed, quite clearly, PRC indifference to Indian attitudes. Once the invasion started, the Indian foreign minister departed in haste before he could have any meaningful talks.

While I was in New Delhi, the United States established formal diplomatic ties with the PRC. Kissinger had famously visited the PRC in 1971, followed by Nixon in 1972. But it was not until 1978 that we opened an embassy in Beijing. We did have some lower level representation, but no ambassador and no formal diplomatic relationship until then. I visited Beijing when I was political counselor in Pakistan and met with George Bush, who was then head of our office there. Our decision to establish formal diplomatic ties came as a surprise to the Indians; most unwelcome surprise. They did not relish an improvement in U.S.-Chinese relations. They still viewed both China and Pakistan as the principal challengers to Indian hegemony. They viewed the establishment of U.S.-PRC relations as a step which made the world more dangerous for them © part of what they called the Washington-Beijing-Islamabad axis. The Indians were very serious about this analysis.

I think we erred in not advising the Indians about our move in advance. It came much sooner than expected in Delhi. We had informed them of the possibility in a very low key way, which probably led the Indians to believe that nothing was imminent. So the rapidity with which we established diplomatic relations caused anguish in Delhi. I think they felt they were misled. They berated us when we opened an embassy in Beijing, but I don't think the issue was paramount nor did it have any lasting influence. After all, there had been a period of several years during which, as I said, we did have representation in Beijing and the PRC had a comparable presence in Washington. There was I think much more Indian anguish in 1971 after the Kissinger visit to China particularly since he had taken off from Pakistan for the PRC--after stopping in Delhi a few days earlier without saying anything about his plans.

I stayed in Delhi long enough to witness the replacement of Prime Minister Desai, who was succeeded by a former deputy PM in the Janata government, Charan Singh. In fact, I was planning to transfer in early July, 1979 to take up my new assignment as country director for India, Nepal, and Sri Lanka. When the Indian government began to show signs of serious internal dissension, I was asked by the Department and the Ambassador to remain in Delhi until the crisis was resolved. The last message I sent to the Department reported that the president of India had asked Charan Singh to form a new government. So Desai and I left at about the same time, just as we arrived at about the same time. I should note that earlier departures of mine had also coincided with the fall of governments in Korea and Pakistan.

On a different subject, I should note that we had a good numbers of CODELs [congressional delegations]. They were not particularly a burden, at least not on the political section, although there were some Congressmen who were quite demanding. Despite that, from my point of view, these visits were quite manageable, which was a plus because I must say that they were not particularly useful. I found that many visitors - congressmen and senators included - had a very limited interest in India. They had very little to say to us or to the Indians. They wasted a lot of time on trivial pursuits--e.g. shopping. My impression was that a visit to India was a status symbol for a congressman. On the other hand, Indian parliamentarians whom we put in contact with a U.S. member of Congress had a different impression. An Indian parliamentarian does not have an office; at best he or she might have a personal assistant. He or she was certainly not the beneficiary of the aura of power which American Members of Congress enjoy. The Indian Parliamentarian had a much more humble position, even though he was much more affluent than the average Indian. So sometimes it was rather awkward bringing the politicians of the two countries together.

I will not forget the visit of a Congressman from Long Island--Lester Wolff, the chairman of a subcommittee that was concerned with South Asian issues. He was especially difficult. He arrived in Delhi at the head of a rather large CODEL. He was very unhappy with the kind of treatment provided by the embassy--he didn't like the hotel we had arranged for him, among many other things. He claimed that he was awakened early every morning by the sound of pile drivers which were working on the construction of an annex to the hotel. At some stage, he came to the embassy with his large group--obviously determined to make life as difficult as possible for the embassy. Ambassador Goheen is a thorough gentleman--a mild mannered man who was highly regarded by the whole staff for his character if not for his leadership. He began the embassy's presentation to the CODEL, as is customary. He said in these remarks that he regretted having so few CODELs; he wished that more members of Congress would visit India. Chairman Wolff replied by declaring sourly that the poor treatment that he and his colleagues had received would explain why so few congressmen had come to India. At that point, I must admit that I felt real anger; I think my face really reddened. I was tempted to get up and throttle Wolff. I found his comments entirely unwarranted and certainly not a subject for discussion in a large meeting. Fortunately, Goheen accepted Wolff's outburst with good grace and apologized for any inconvenience that Wolff or other members of the delegation might have encountered. As I said, I don't think the CODELs were particularly helpful, in either providing members with a better appreciation of India or the parliamentarians a better understanding of U.S. policies, as seen by Congress, or of governmental processes.

I traveled around India frequently. I did address some audiences--the text was never cleared with anybody. In the Q & A time, I had to field some hostile questions, even during a period of relative good will between Washington and Delhi. The Vietnam war was over; so that removed an important problem from the agenda. So there were no particular points of friction, except on the issue of nuclear fuel supply. The Desai government sought what it called "genuine non-alignment," which from our point of view distanced India from the Soviet Union. In fact, it practiced "genuine non-alignment" in its relations with the two super-powers. Their version of non-alignment was certainly more balanced than the so-called non-alignment Mrs. Gandhi had practiced in the past and would practice again in the future.

We had a military supply relationship, which expanded Indian choice for weapons beyond the Soviet Union. But in the two years we are now discussing, there were no critical developments in the Cold War which would have required an Indian decision as to which bloc it would support. As a general rule, throughout the Cold War, whenever U.S.-Soviet animosities intensified, it led to some weakening of U.S.-Indian relations because in almost all cases, India tended to support the USSR position. When detente came along, it would generally be accompanied by better U.S.-India relations.

During those two years I had contacts with diplomats from various countries, including Soviets and Chinese. In the wake of the Nixon visit to China, we were allowed to develop a relationship with the PRC [People's Republic of China] embassy. At first, the contacts were exceedingly formal and stiff. You would visit the PRC embassy and be escorted to the office of the person you had come to see. There you would be served tea, but the conversation would be stilted and very guarded. The only satisfaction an American diplomat got was that he or she was doing something which only a few years earlier would have been inconceivable. It was particularly interesting because the PRC embassy was located just across the street from the U.S. embassy. What was once forbidden, if nearby, territory, became less mysterious and sinister.

Over an extended period, the atmosphere became much more conducive to normal contacts. I don't remember how often I met with PRC diplomats; it was not frequent, and never particularly useful, but it was an interesting break from the past.

We had some relationships with the Soviets, but that had been a practice of long-standing. While I served in Delhi, Afghanistan went through the "Great Saur Revolution"--in April 1978-- which brought a communist regime to power. The Indians were less concerned with developments in Afghanistan than we would have liked them to be. They viewed events in Kabul as an internal Afghan matter and they looked at the situation to an important extent through the prism of their relationship with Pakistan. We have to remember that after the revolution, a civil war broke out in Afghanistan leading eventually to the Soviet invasion. As I recall, the Indian position was to favor the Afghan government in power because they believed that a leftist government would be less inclined to favor Pakistan--certainly less than the Islamic forces that were then trying to oust the communists. But the issue was not very significant in U.S.-India relations--and did not become so until the Soviets made their move in December 1979. By that time I had left India.

We were in touch with other diplomats as well, particularly the British and the French. This was a relationship of long standing and we continued it during my stewardship as political counselor. We would exchange views periodically, at various levels, from the ambassador down.

As an embassy, we paid less attention to the various ramifications of Indian foreign policy than had been the case during my previous tour. Then Bowles was determined to use his embassy staff as a means to feed his much broader interest in international relations. He made sure that among the staff, there were experts on the PRC, the Soviet Union, etc. By the time I returned, those experts had left and were not replaced--as part of a general reduction in staffing that the Department had to undertake in response to budgetary cut-backs.

I look back on my second tour in India as, at least partially, a lost opportunity for the U.S. and for India. I believe that much could have been done to cement the relationship between the two countries had it not been for the nuclear fuel issue.

Also, it was somewhat frustrating to deal with an Indian government which just could not get its act together. The Desai government's program was never properly spelled out, let alone carried out. In fact, the failure of the Janata government was such that it set the stage for the return to power by Mrs. Gandhi, which took place a few months after my departure from Delhi. Mrs. Gandhi, during her second tour as prime minister, did seek to establish better relations with the U.S.--at least on the surface. She visited the U.S. in 1982. With her in power, one could not expect any fundamental improvement in U.S.-India ties, however. She carried too much anti-American baggage from her first term as PM and even earlier.

On the other hand, Mrs. Gandhi was much more interested than was Janata in India's role on the world stage. What she did or tried to do was often damaging to U.S. interests. She supported the policy of establishing closer relations with non-aligned countries governed by leftist elements--including Cuba. India was still a factor in the UN, although perhaps not as active as it had been in the past. There used to be at least annual visits from a high level U.S. government official just prior to the convening of the General Assembly to discuss issue of mutual interests that might arise during the session. India was still a player with whom the world had to reckon.

AINSLIE EMBREE
Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
New Delhi (1977-1980)

Ainslie Embree was born in Nova Scotia, Canada. During World War II, he served as navigator in the Royal Canadian Air Force. He began his career in India immediately after the war as a missionary. Upon completion of this work, he studied at the graduate level at Columbia University and Duke University. Mr. Embree's career focused primarily on India, . He was interviewed by Dorothy Robins-Mowry on October 20, 1990.

Q: What then was the way you were recruited to go out to New Delhi for USIS?

EMBREE: During these years at Columbia and indeed at Duke, I'd become very involved in American academic life affecting India. I was president of the American Institute of Indian Studies. I was very much involved in promoting Indian studies in American colleges, not just at Columbia but elsewhere and I'd written on India. I think my first acquaintance, real acquaintance, with the embassy in Delhi came through Margaret Clapp who was the CAO in Delhi and I got to know Margaret well, partly because I was in New Delhi at that time as the Senior Scholar with the American Institute of India Studies. So I got to know her in a professional way. But then we got to know each other very well. In fact, having a Wellesley wife --

Q: I didn't realize Sue was Wellesley.

EMBREE: -- strengthened the ties. Then I knew the subsequent CAOs after that. So I got some sense of what they did, but I really didn't know very much. But what I did have involvement with in 1977-78 was the new American Ambassador to India, Robert Goheen. As you know, the Cultural Affairs Officer was regarded in some sense as the Ambassador's prerogative to have whom he wanted as a CAO. And since he knew me, he wrote and asked if I would be interested in being nominated for the job.

Q: So you were recruited by Goheen. He, of course, came out of Princeton and has his own missionary background.

EMBREE: And so we had very similar interests in many ways and he knew that I was greatly interested in India. This was a change, of course, having somebody go as CAO who was identified wholly as an Indian specialist. Margaret Clapp, for example, had been an American historian, and most CAOs I suppose, had been in American studies.

My immediate predecessor whom I knew very well, Jim Roach, had worked on India. So it was a little odd having somebody whose identification was completely with Indian studies going out as American CAO. I didn't know that at the time oddly enough. I thought it was a natural thing to get somebody who knew India.

Q: It makes sense.

EMBREE: It makes sense in some ways. I went out without any training at all in what a CAO was. I wasn't sure when I was going, but they called and said that there was an investigating team, I forget what it was called, from the State Department going out to look at what was happening in the educational cultural programs in India. And they wanted me to go out that week to be in Delhi before they arrived so that I would be able to meet them. It was somewhat of a peculiar decision. These two young men who arrived to investigate what was going on in the American Center knew nothing about its work in India and the person who was to talk to them was somebody who'd arrived exactly 24 hours before. In a way it was a good introduction to the way the State Department worked because the young men knew absolutely nothing about India.

They were traveling around in a car and they expressed strong disagreement that we were spending so much money teaching Indians to speak English. And I said, we don't spend a penny teaching Indians to speak English. And they said, how do they know English so well then if we don't teach them?

But indeed trying to explain to them the cultural relations with India was an interesting introduction for me. The point I was going to make was I went out as Cultural Affairs Officer knowing almost nothing about the office and what one was to do except what I had picked up from knowing Jim Roach and Margaret Clapp. I had been out a week once before that in which I had talked to people, but that was all the introduction I had. I guess where I differed was that I knew a great many people in India. I was not an unknown.

Q: You were not a novice of the community in which you were going to work.

EMBREE: No, not at all. I knew the Indian academic world very well.

Q: Who was your Public Affairs Officer when you went out?

EMBREE: Jay Gildner.

Q: Yes.

EMBREE: And I will tell the story again whether it's on the tape or not. When I mentioned to an old retired officer that I was going out to be the cultural counselor, he asked who the public affairs officer was. When I said, Gildner, whom I hadn't met at the time, he commented that he didn't think I would get on well in India. "You get along very well at a place like Columbia," he said, "because your superiors are even more inefficient and incompetent about business than you are, whereas Gildner has a reputation for being the most efficient Foreign Service officer in public affairs."

Well, it turned out I got along extremely well with Jay. Indeed, he was efficient, everything that people said, but he also appreciated my knowledge of India and that I had easy access to journalists and academics and lots of people in government and society, through purely personal contacts.

Q: This was the heritage of all your previous years.

EMBREE: It was the heritage of all my previous years that I knew all people like Mrs. Gandhi and so on. So it was a very different experience than other people have had.

Q: So you arrived really obviously not a stranger in New Delhi, but a stranger within the Embassy framework of operation.

EMBREE: A complete stranger within the framework of Embassy operations. I knew nothing at all, even what I was supposed to do. I was fortunate, of course, in having extremely good Indian assistants in the office. Shanta Chenoy was very well known and had worked there for many years. Shanta knew everybody in the Indian social and political world. Then Jay Gildner himself, of course. I realize now that he was very glad to have a Cultural Affairs officer who didn't want to manage things particularly, but who really wanted to be a --

Q: A cultural officer.

EMBREE: A cultural officer and to deal with people. So that really what I did was to meet with people, particularly academics, journalists and politicians. Those were the three groups I had most to do with, and with whom I had easy access. But I had very little involvement, oddly enough, with the management side of USIS.

Q: They didn't insist that you become involved in that.

EMBREE: No, I was involved in that sort of thing only when we had visitors or speakers and I entertained them, but I didn't have to get involved in day to day management. I'm sure other Cultural Affairs officers were much more involved.

The other thing, of course, that I was very involved in, from the very beginning, was USEFI, perhaps more than most other CAOs had been. Before I went out, there had been some very serious charges made against the director of the US Educational Foundation. As soon as I got there I was told by Jay Gildner, that the Ambassador wanted me to investigate the charges very carefully. And this again was part of the embarrassment of knowing people because, of course, I had known the Director for many years, as well as all the other people in USEFI. And this occupied a great deal of energy the first six months or so. I became deeply involved in all aspects of the USEFI program.

Q: What did they do?

EMBREE: You mean in terms of the investigation?

Q: No, no. First tell me, USEFI plays what role?

EMBREE: USEFI still plays an important role in India, but it used to be, perhaps next to Japan, the biggest US educational foundation anywhere. It used to have a large number of fellowships, both Fulbright scholars going to India, and Fulbright scholars coming here. In addition, it had many other programs funded through the Office of Education. This, of course, was all supposedly PL 480 money. There were also many summer groups of teachers in addition to the regular Fulbrights, and junior years abroad. It was an extremely active program.

I should have said I'd had one other personal involvement with USIS and USEFI before this. Back in the spring of 1977 I'd been asked to go out by CIES to visit all the Fulbright scholars in South Asia including Afghanistan, India, Nepal, Pakistan, and Sri Lanka. I had at that time a very interesting look at the Fulbright program. I don't think many other persons had had a chance of visiting all of them. I'd also at that same time visited the USIS centers in all the South Asian countries.

Q: Well, you really then had your training if not in that week before you went out to India after you were recruited, you had your training in this kind of --

EMBREE: That was an extraordinarily good training because indeed I had met all the public affairs officers and all the CAOs that were there in that time.

Q: And became an independent thinker about what was happening?

EMBREE: I made a long report on my trip which I suppose is in the files somewhere.

Q: Do you have a copy of that report? They would love to have it attached to this ultimately if you could ever find it.

EMBREE: If I can find it. I'm not sure they do have a report. But it must be somewhere in the files of CIES. Yes, I did look at it very carefully and made certain recommendations, a number of which were followed. The question that had interested me most when I was there was the particular role of American Fulbrighters as teachers.

I had grave doubts about the utility of Americans being actually teachers in Indian colleges. I obviously went at this from the point of view of having been one for so many years myself.

Q: I was going to say that's a contradiction, isn't it?

EMBREE: It was a contradiction except that I was aware, having been there for so many years, what the difficulties, perhaps the impossibilities, of going into the Indian or Pakistan situation and in a year doing anything effective. The best young scholars I met in Fulbright were very frustrated realizing that they were standing up in front of a class, but the students were not going to be examined on anything they were teaching. That they were really supernumeraries and not, as they had obviously assumed they would be, actively involved in the Indian educational program.

Q: Was this because they were Americans or foreigners? Or was this by nature of the system?

EMBREE: It's all three things. It's the nature of the system that South Asian university education is very much a matter of lecturing. What the instructor does is prepare the students for examination. And it's very difficult for American teachers to think of themselves as preparing people for examinations which they don't set and they're not involved in, in any way.

Q: Is this at the secondary level as well as at the university level, or are we really talking about the universities?

EMBREE: We're talking about the universities, colleges.

Q: With my background in Japan, certainly what I know of American teachers who go out to teach at universities is that they are equally frustrated because the students really do not have to perform. And they're really advised that they can never fail a student no matter how little or how badly anyone does. This is very frustrating for American professors.

EMBREE: It was very frustrating because most Indian universities are made up of many colleges with the university setting the curriculum and exams for the colleges. So you're teaching a curriculum that's been set by somebody else to take exams that will be set by somebody else.

Q: So that allows you no initiative and no freedom of action as an educator.

EMBREE: The other side of it is that many Indian students are very anxious in personal terms to meet the American professors and learn from them. Good students value this very highly, but it's an extra. It's not part of the system. It was that sort of thing that I was raising questions about on the Fulbright program, not the research part, but the teaching part.

Q: That's fighting the local system.

EMBREE: Yes. This was another great source of unhappiness. Many of the people, both old and young Americans, got the impression that they were going out to help change the Indian system and bring it to some new and better level.

Q: Kind of an imperialist notion.

EMBREE: It was indeed a kind of imperialist notion. I once stated in a report that the Ford Foundation and the Fulbright program became the successors of British imperialism and of missionaries. And again, since I had experience with having gone there to do good to the Indians, I understood this very well. And this was enormously frustrating when the young Americans realized that there was no conceivable opportunity of their bringing about any changes in the Indian system. It certainly needed changes but it would have to come from within. Foreigners were becoming increasingly irrelevant to the process which is of course what I had discovered in 1958, 20 years ago.

Q: And why you left?

EMBREE: Why I left. But I think most people still went out as late as '78 with this sense that they were going to bring about improvements and change.

Q: Well, this is very difficult. Americans always like to do good don't they?

EMBREE: I thought the process of sending out American scholars to teach was becoming counter productive at times.

Q: But interestingly, the Indians still clamor to come to the United States to get an education.

EMBREE: That's the other side of it, of course. Obviously, I had a great deal of involvement in scholars coming and going to India. Indians, in the late '60s, had come to resent American scholars for a whole variety of reasons and didn't want them involved in research or in the whole Indian education process. I'd run into this as President of the American Institute of Indian Studies.

Q: Is this just Americans?

EMBREE: All people, but Americans were obviously more than any other. But there was a fundamental difference between, say, the Russians, the Germans, the British and the French, because they all had country-to-country arrangements, whereas we were essentially free enterprise. Our scholars went out on their own. Even the Fulbrighters were essentially on their own. And the Indian government wanted more of an exchange controlled by the government. They especially grew disenchanted with the fact that American scholars were mostly in the social sciences. They were involved in Indian life, studying Indian life.

What the Indians wanted was reciprocity and control, and this led to the creation of the Indo-American Subcommission, of which I had been a member before I became cultural counselor. It was set up in 1976, and it was to be the great breakthrough of government to government operations on the cultural level.

Q: It's the Indo-American Subcommittee on Education and Culture.

EMBREE: Yes. It didn't work out the way the Indian side hoped because while it was strictly government on their side, wholly controlled by the government, our side wasn't. Ours was a quasi-governmental institution which the Indians had difficulty understanding. The fact that the Indo-American Subcommittee got its money from the American government, had very close relations with the American Centers, but that it was from our point of view a private enterprise, Indians found baffling and this always leads to suspicion that we're not what we seem. An important aspect of the Subcommittee was that the Indians wanted to send scientists here and they wanted us to send scientists.

Q: Physical scientists.

EMBREE: Physical scientists, which many of us knew was not going to work. While Indian scientists want to come to the United States, not many American scientists want to go to India unless they have a special interest say in bugs or germs or some aspect of the flora and fauna.

Q: And this could be considered in some instances a negative interest, couldn't it? But you've now brought up the Indo-American Subcommittee. Explain a little bit about what went on with this. I think you were involved in the development of some exhibits and some other things during that period of time.

EMBREE: The Indo-American Subcommittee on Education and Culture was one of the half dozen commissions set up at the time. Technically, they were all under the Secretary of State from our side, but in fact involved various people. The Education and Cultural one, I think it's fair to say, is the one that was most active in India, and it had a number of aspects. One was sending Indians to the United States who were essentially selected by the Indian government. They emphasized training in science. Their counterparts on our side were selected not in any sense by the government, but by the CIES, the same group ultimately that ran the Fulbright. But it was strictly a private enterprise. Academics did the choosing and it was in no sense controlled by USIS, except that USIS supplied the money.

The other aspect of the cultural program that was very important was that it was to be mutual. Anything we did in India the Indians were to do with their counterparts here. And this became very much involved in museums, for example. It wasn't a matter of us sending our experts to India to do things for the Indians. It had to have reciprocity and their people coming not just to learn but to actually do something. This can be very difficult for obvious reasons. And out of this came a number of exhibits, one very interesting one on science-technology. But the big one, of course, was the festival in India which was run by the Indo-American Subcommittee but also by the cultural counselor's office. It was a very complicated operation and it worked remarkably well.

But again from the Indian side it brought up many of the difficulties inherent in our relationships that from our side it was essentially private groups, the National Gallery, the Metropolitan and so on, with the American [more or less private] side of the Subcommittee doing the negotiating, but always negotiating with government institutions in India. Ted Tanen was running the Subcommittee, he came essentially as a private individual, but was obviously supported by the American Center.

Q: And of course he came out of the American government.

EMBREE: He came out of the American government to add to the confusion -- to the Indians he was just one more government officer. Although in his own eyes, rightfully so, he was no longer a government official.

Q: The Festival of India I think was the first of the grand festivals which have followed so that it did set a very important pattern for cultural exchanges which are still going on in the United States.

EMBREE: It was enormously successful in terms of what it brought over. However, the question the Indians still ask me was what effect did it have on Indo-American relations. This strikes me as a question we can ask of a lot of our cultural exchanges.

Q: Well, now some very spectacular things went to India under these auspices. The New York Philharmonic went, did it not?

EMBREE: The New York Philharmonic went -- the biggest US program that went. There was a long and complicated story about the festival because we were supposed to have an American festival in India. We ran into great difficulties on this because the person most involved on the Indian side, who is now a curator of the National Museum in Delhi, insisted that just as our side had very largely determined what we wanted from the Indian museums, they should have equal claim from the American side which seemed all right on the surface. But of course what people like Stella Kramnisch and the others who were arranging it, Cory Welch and the others, wanted were Indian artifacts, great Indian sculpture, paintings.

When it came to the American festival in India, what Sahare and the others demanded were impressionist paintings from the Metropolitan. And some of us had the difficult and unsuccessful task of explaining that it's perfectly true that we sent our people to ask for things from the Indian museum but they were Indian things, it was Indian culture. It was very difficult to persuade our Senators and Representatives to pay for an exhibit of French impressionist paintings in India [when our exhibit in India was supposed to be of things American]. But furthermore, that it would be very hard indeed to get the museums to lend their very valuable paintings. We could, in fact, have gotten a very splendid display of American paintings, the great 19th century painters, but the Indian side rejected this.

Q: They didn't want those?

EMBREE: They didn't want American paintings. And they said it was inferior painting and it was insulting, and so on, that we were offering them second rate American materials when they were sending us the very greatest of Indian artifacts, which was true, but it made for difficult relations.

Q: Well, it was part of the negotiations rather than part of the --

EMBREE: Another thing that happened at the same time was that a well-known American critic Katherine Kuh got involved. (This discussion relates to the American attempt to select from Indian art what a U.S. art critic felt was best in Indian art, but the American felt that what Indians felt was best in their paintings was second rate in American judgment -- a situation similar to the disagreement of the Indians in being asked to accept 19th century American painters.) One of the things the Indians asked us to do was to have an exhibit of modern Indian painting and sculpture in America, which those of us involved readily agreed to. We thought it was a great idea. But it soon became apparent that we would have to have an American critic of some stature make the selection, that the American galleries would not agree to exhibiting materials that they hadn't been involved in selecting.

So Katherine Kuh came out. She was a very redoubtable woman. And she looked at all of the art that the Indians said was representative of their finest artists, all famous names, the names everyone knew. She looked at them and said they were second rate and derivative from American art. She went around the country and found what she said were wonderful stuff by unknown artists, and she refused to take any of the famous Indian artists. And of course this led to an impasse because the Indians wouldn't agree to her selection. Ms. Kuh is still annoyed with those of us who were involved and she claims that we didn't stand up for artistic principles.

Q: Well, modern art has long been a -- modern American art, modern art of any kind, has long been a very controversial issue. It hinges on what people consider art and what they do not consider art.

EMBREE: Her argument was that modern art has its own validity in the country of origin, but it doesn't have validity in another country that simply copies, unless you're willing to look very closely at creativity. It was a very interesting critique. Some of the people that she said then were the best people in India are now recognized as indeed outstanding.

Q: So she's been validated.

EMBREE: She was right, and I often wondered if she knows. But it was one of those interesting problems in cultural exchange that never gets the headlines or I don't think even gets written up in our accounts.

Q: There was also a problem as I remember it about the different facilities at museums in India, Americans are fussy about humidity and temperature controls and general protection of the art which they have. The facilities in most of the, if not all, of Indian museums is at a very different level.

EMBREE: This was a very delicate matter. We had to say that even if we could have persuaded the US government to pay for an exhibit of French impressionist paintings, the Metropolitan would never under any circumstances allow those paintings to be exhibited under Indian conditions, without humidity and temperature controls. They said, "we allow you to take our sculptures which are just as valuable as your paintings, but there's no reciprocity."

Q: This is always one of the difficult aspects. I think one of the interesting projects which grew out of this -- we're still really talking about the Indo-American Subcommission and the negotiations -- was the big project of Aditi.

EMBREE: Yes, it was a very interesting project.

Q: Because that was not just an art or cultural exchange. It had other implications.

EMBREE: There are many implications. I was one of those who would not have approved of Aditi, because I knew that there were many people in India who were very strongly opposed to this.

Q: What is Aditi, Ainslie?

EMBREE: It was a show, I think is the best word, that was set up by a very enterprising young entrepreneur in Delhi called Sethi. It was made up of street musicians, street village theater people, street magicians and performers, really the poorest level of Indian society.

Q: This is side two. We're talking about Aditi.

EMBREE: It was a very interesting item in our whole cultural exchange. There are many people in India who accuse the entrepreneur who had arranged Aditi that it was exploiting the most vulnerable people in India, the children who were entertainers, beggars in effect, people who had no place in normal Indian art or culture, but who were not only village performers but were extremely poor. Sethi had been very successful in arranging shows of these people, attended at first very largely by foreigners. And then, as often happens in India, when the upper classes realized that foreigners were interested in these things, they became interested in them, too.

And at that point he suggested that it be taken to America as part of the festival. There was very strong opposition, largely I think it's fair to say, from Marxist groups who said this was double exploitation. It was exploitation of extremely poor and vulnerable people by an Indian entrepreneur catering to the exploitive Americans. It was, however, a great success in Washington. People whom I respect said nothing had given them as much sense of India as did these performances. Sethi received a great deal of criticism when they went back because the people were literally thrown back to where they had been.

There was one pathetic story in the newspaper. One little girl was asked what she had liked about America. She said, "I was able to use soap everyday." She had never used soap before in her life and she would never get it again because it was so expensive.

But it was one of those cases in which perhaps some of us were too sensitive to Indian criticisms because it did make an impression here. I think one would still have to ask the validity of using these kinds of people for this purpose, bringing them here and then just throwing them back where they were found.

Q: Well, I remember when this was going on, the arrangements in Washington were very carefully developed with home hospitality and care of these children so that there could be no question about their well-being while they were in the United States. But, of course, any kind of cultural exchange especially when it involves people from two very different kinds of cultures can create all kinds of problems. I think some years there was the same kind of problem with some of the religious dancers out of Bali who when they went home were in effect never again considered truly religious dancers. They'd been contaminated. I don't know how you get over this kind of combination of seclusion and outreach of culture which should provide better understanding of what's going on in that particular society.

EMBREE: Yes, I think that's true. The criticism made of Aditi was that it didn't give a true picture of the Indian society. It gave the impression that these children, the dancers and musicians, occupied as important a place in Indian society as they had in Washington. They were treated very well, as you say, and they all loved it. But the argument is that this gave the impression that Indians valued them the way Americans had, whereas that's not the case. They have no place in Indian culture at all. Any place they have was due to the westerners having taken them up.

Q: Of course, it's always very sad. But it's always very hard to go home again.

EMBREE: Oh, yes. Some people said of the story, that at least the little girl had soap once in her life.

Q: That's very hard. Ainslie, I know that one of the things you did incessantly was entertain almost every night. How poor Sue ever managed I don't know, but you had a house full of people. This was not only because of your generous spirit but also because of your interest in people. It was certainly one of the great ways in which you contributed to the cultural programs of all kinds at the Embassy.

EMBREE: It's just something that comes very naturally to us. We both like entertaining. One of the interesting features, we did an enormous amount of entertaining, but we never had a real cook when we were in Delhi. But Sue would be able to manage with her people by being a good boss.

Yes, I think it was very interesting the whole question of entertaining. It plays a very important role in India. I was able to entertain people because of knowing as many people as I did and able to get to know new people. I think one of the things that Americans do well, on the whole, is entertaining, and it occupies a much larger place in India than many people realize.

One of the things that many people don't know in the outside world is all the other embassies get very large entertaining allowances. Somebody used to say to me, well, it's easy for you to entertain since the government is paying for it. And I never told any of my American friends that the American government is very niggardly with everybody from the Ambassador down compared to other governments.

Q: It all comes out of your own pocket.

EMBREE: Yes, I discovered that a third secretary at the Canadian Embassy had a larger entertaining allowance than any of us did in the American Center. It's one of those things that you can't make a case for because what an outcry there would be in Washington if we suggested larger entertainment allowances.

Q: They always suspect somehow you're going to misuse it.

EMBREE: Yes, it's a very important aspect of American diplomacy that I think we do well at the personal level. And some of the young people were very good indeed. I may say in passing that I became very impressed indeed by the caliber of people in the American Embassy in Delhi when I was there, from the Ambassador down. One would expect it at the high level, but it was the younger people -- the political officer, economic officers were absolutely first rate.

One of the criticisms that I've heard from people who should know better is that there were no people in the American Embassy who spoke an Indian language. This was untrue.

Q: Who spoke Hindi?

EMBREE: Ambassador Goheen. Arch Blood, the DCM, spent an hour every day studying Hindi. There were half a dozen of the younger people who had taken training in South Asian studies in this country who were fluent. We had an extraordinarily well trained staff in the Embassy. And I think something that gets the least publicity and the least credit is how good our Embassy people are. I was interested in this being an outsider.

Q: Is there anything you'd like to say about Ambassador Goheen? He was after all a remarkable individual for that particular job. Did you find in observing him any particular elements which you thought either very good or maybe not so good? He is one of those political appointees who was ideally suited for the country to which he was appointed.

EMBREE: India, of course, had such an interesting series of political ambassadors, an extraordinary group going way back to people like Loy Henderson. The most famous, of course, were Chester Bowles and Pat Moynihan. I would have argued that Goheen from the Indian point of view was an excellent ambassador. But I always remember a comment made about Galbraith when he was there by the British High Commissioner. I asked him what he thought of Galbraith. He said, well, it's difficult to judge a man like Galbraith. I'm never sure -- "He's the most brilliant ambassador I ever met, but I'm not sure whether he's the American ambassador to India or the Indian ambassador to America, and I'm not sure that he knows which he is." And this is an interesting sidelight on the role the American ambassadors used to play. Chester Bowles, for example, played a role that no other American ambassador has ever played. He had instant access to Nehru. He lectured the people at all levels in the Indian government, hectored them on what to do and so on. And reading his stuff, it's amazing. You can't imagine anybody now doing that.

Q: Well, of course, he was there at an unusual time.

EMBREE: Yes, he was there at an interesting time.

Q: He was the right man for that kind of time.

EMBREE: Yes, it wouldn't have worked later on. It didn't work the second time.

Q: Yes.

EMBREE: Moynihan was famous and it didn't work. Moynihan once said that he had never been asked to speak at an Indian university. But that again was part of the time. Goheen was very popular and this was partly because his parents had been missionaries there. I once mentioned to Goheen before I knew what the facts were, the only two Americans who had been knighted in India had been missionaries. He said, my grandfather was one. Who was the other one? I thought that was a great put down!

Q: That'll teach you! Ainslie, what were your working relations with the Embassy? Did you have to get involved in staff meetings or do any of those other administrative chores? Jay Gildner and the Ambassador with his confidence in you freed you from this kind of daily --

EMBREE: I suppose I did attend one or two staff meetings. I had a friendly relationship for two reasons. One was Goheen himself, of course. The other was his personal assistant, Marshall Booton, whom I had known very well.

Let me tell you a story. The day I arrived in Delhi a wire came in from the White House congratulating me which created some unhappiness. But people didn't notice the initials. It was Tom Thornton who was working in the White House and thought it would be amusing to send me a cable signed with the President's name.

Q: And Tom, of course, was a National Security staff member.

EMBREE: Yes, but people thought it was really from the President.

Q: Yes, it's like all these messages from the Secretary of State that go out on the State Department telegrams saying personal message.

EMBREE: I had very close relations, working relationships, with the Embassy people and the Voice of America people. They knew I had access to journalists and so on and I think that was useful.

Q: You were a good door opener.

EMBREE: Yes, I suppose I was a good door opener for them.

Q: Ainslie, what languages do you speak?

EMBREE: Just Hindi. But the kind of people we deal with in Delhi speak English. I think I would have said that was one argument for a Cultural Affairs Officer who's not a career person, but who has some kind of other associations and I think is recognized in this way. So I was useful to a number of people and I used to write, needless to say, things for Ambassador Goheen. I wrote him one important speech and I'd forgotten that I'd written it. And I heard him giving a speech and I went up to him and I said, Bob, that was a wonderful speech. He said, "Aren't you being a little immodest?" I'd genuinely forgotten.

Q: That raises a very important question which has got to do with a cultural officer, the top cultural officer in one of the top countries coming from outside the Foreign Service. The Foreign Service officers who aspire to promotion up the cultural line sometimes find this a very distressing situation. I don't know how you balance the two off unless what you do is really balance it off. But obviously, from everything you say you bring credentials and knowledge of people which a Foreign Service officer would rarely have in a particular country because none stay there that long.

EMBREE: There were people in India who had been around there a long time. People like Craig Baxter knew South Asia well, and there were others. But even in that case the outsider has advantages in terms of how he can meet people and the fact that he's recognized as an outsider. Even though I had the same rank as the rest, people knew I really wasn't one of them.

Q: They still admired you because you were Ainslie Embree.

EMBREE: Well, they knew I had these other connections. I had university connections and so on. I would argue for the independent person. I'm not sure about the ambassadorial level. I would certainly always have said we were extremely lucky we had the people we had, especially Goheen who was greatly respected by Indians. They liked his style. When they wanted to say nice things about Goheen, they would say it was because he was born here, he's like us. All they meant was he was mannerly and didn't bang the table and knew how to be polite.

Q: Ainslie, during your time in India, were there any delicate diplomatic policy matters that came up that impinged upon what you were doing?

EMBREE: Not really. After I had been there a week or so, the Patriot, the communist paper, published a fierce denunciation of me saying they were going to expose my connections with the RSS, the right wing Hindu organization. And if I wasn't out of India in 24 hours and so on. What had happened I discovered is that they had confused me with Walter Anderson who indeed is the best expert on right wing organizations, who is now in our Embassy in New Delhi. This raised an interesting question. I was surprised by it but some of my very close Indian friends, some in high places, called me and said if you want us to, we will write to the newspaper and say that these charges are absurd. The one man who was the vice chancellor at Delhi said, "You know our country. The best thing to do is to not say a word, for you not to reply and for none of us to reply." He said, "I know that many of us are going to call you personally, but we're not going to say a word to the newspapers, will you mind?" Of course he was perfectly right. Within a week it was a joke. No, I was not involved in anything delicate.

On one occasion a man came from Kabul, a reporter from an English newspaper. He said he had information he wanted to give me. It soon became apparent the information was meant for the CIA chief. And I had protested that this was not my kind of information, that I wanted no connection with it. He insisted and he took his little book out to verify it and said, "Oh my God, I was to see you about a cultural matter." He had turned the wrong page. No, I think I can say I was not involved in anything that -- oh, there were some attacks, continuing attacks, on American scholars.

Q: Was this from organs like the Patriot?

EMBREE: The Patriot or in Parliament with people denouncing American scholars for being engaged in espionage.

Q: Well, this is part of that larger disinformation operation which has always been particularly severe in India.

EMBREE: We never made any public statements. We too used our own channels.

Q: Sometimes it's the best way of making it go away.

EMBREE: Yes.

Q: What do you consider your most successful undertaking? Do you have a most successful?

EMBREE: I don't have a most successful. One of the things that I started that I think has died out, Goheen or maybe it was Jay Gildner, had the idea that we should try to get young Indians who would be leaders in 20 years to meet their counter- parts from America. And we started one program of bringing some together. It was very difficult in either country to say who were the 20 leaders, or who are the young people who are going to be leaders, especially difficult in India.

But I did set up one seminar which I thought was a very good idea called the Chester Bowles Seminar in which we invited some bright young Americans and some bright young Indians. It was much easier for me to identify the bright young Indians from contacts I had. It was extremely difficult to identify bright young Americans. And, of course, it always raised the question of money. How are we going to get ten Americans? We did get ten in the end, taking people who were in India. And it was very interesting and to some extent it achieved what I think we wanted to achieve. And that was to get people who would know each other through the years. I think that could have been a very successful thing if it had been maintained.

Q: Yes.

EMBREE: Of course, like many of these ventures it was personal and too much depended upon one person.

Q: Well, funds shift and priorities shift, but maybe you weren't there long enough.

EMBREE: Another thing I was greatly involved in and interested in was the American Research Center in Hyderabad. I think that is one of the most worthwhile of all our endeavors. I think it as important as the US Educational Foundation, itself.

Q: Now, this has got to do with American Studies.

EMBREE: American Studies. People often laugh when they learn somebody who had never taken a course in American history was running a big program in American Studies. It's an excellent library and it's something that has come in for a great deal of criticism. Why do we have this expensive venture, people have asked. By American standards, it's not an expensive venture, but it's the best library of American literature and history I think in Asia, probably better than in Japan, at least I've been told it is. And it's of enormous importance for Indian scholars who want to work on the United States. It could be of even more value for scholars throughout the area. Some people did come from Southeast Asia, but it is hard for Pakistanis to get there. If I had one institution I'd want to make sure survived, it would be the American Studies Research Center. I think it's very important. The great problem is getting competent Americans to be the directors. We had the wrong approach, I'm convinced, of trying to get a Fulbrighter to go out and run it for two years. It didn't work. We couldn't get the right people. It would have been much better if we'd got a good Indian to be director and an American to go out as a resident scholar for two years. I think we could have done that, and I think we still could if we were going to put more money in. But we couldn't get first class Americans to go for two years for small pay. It just wasn't in the cards.

Q: Well, I visited the Hyderabad Center and I've also sent out people as part of that selection process. So I know what you are speaking about, that it is very difficult. But certainly the results are also excellent. In the one educational exchange project in which I was involved, I think this was after you had left India, we used the Center to bring together scholars from all over South Asia, including Pakistan, at a time when we weren't even sure that the Paks would be allowed in. But because of the nature of the Center and what the project was all about, it worked.

EMBREE: I think we could do much more with that. I think that could become a really great center. Again, I think that's one place where a non-professional CAO could play a big role. One of the things that I found interesting with American Foreign Service officers in the Embassy or in the USIS, it doesn't take long before they get out of touch with the United States, especially the American academic world. And then when you think of it, what they knew about American academic life from being a student. You get out of touch quickly. I think there's an enormous advantage in USIS of having an academic who really is into the American scene.

Q: Academic scene.

EMBREE: Yes.

Q: Well, you know, and I speak from the point of view of the Foreign Service officer, one finds that there's a certain amount of conflict, almost emotional resentment, between the academics who are in country and the Embassy. Part of this has got to do with the so-called perks which one has which they don't realize are not necessarily coming straight out of the government. I found that particularly true in Iran. But I think you're very right about the knowledge, the internal knowledge, of how universities work, who pushes which button and all of those things.

EMBREE: There is also, of course, ignorance on the part of the academics. I was attacked in Delhi by American academics for not pushing some particular policy that was clearly against American government policy. I remember having a very bitter argument with an American political scientist of some repute. I explained to him not only did I have no conceivable way of affecting the policy, that even the Ambassador --

Q: You're talking about political issues.

EMBREE: Political issues that were decided in Washington and we were carrying out. Academics have very little knowledge of how the government works, that the Ambassador is the agent of the State Department and the State Department is the agent of the Administration.

Q: That's right.

EMBREE: American academics, as you know, have a fashion of criticizing the government. I was talking just recently with a young woman, very well known, who referred to one of my former colleagues, Paul Kreisberg, as a CIA agent. And I said, well, Paul Kreisberg was a very high ranking officer, why would he be a CIA agent? She said, well, he was giving information about Indian politics to the American government. I said, that's what he was paid for.

Q: That's his job.

EMBREE: And she couldn't get this through her head. I said, you know, if he knew anything of value to the American government or the Indian government, of course, he would communicate it. He'd be a very poor Foreign Service officer if he didn't. And this shocked her. And she said, well, you wouldn't. And I said, well, if I knew anything that I thought would be of value, yes, of course.

I have great misgivings about second raters, especially in a country like India. They're terribly conscious, for example, of our American academics who go to India that they're often not our best people -- that we don't get the people out there whose books they read.

Q: Oh, dear. Let me ask you about one other element and then maybe we will -- two other elements. You traveled a great deal when you were CAO.

EMBREE: I traveled a lot to Calcutta and Madras. I was very involved with the Calcutta people. Now, you raise a very interesting question into the whole way, you know, what I knew my job was. I didn't do very much pushing, so to speak. I spoke when I was asked to speak. Now, this was a very difficult position for me because all I am professionally qualified to speak on is India. And they would ask me to speak on India. And as you know, this was not looked upon with great favor. But I really wasn't qualified to talk about American subjects.

Q: So you did talk about India?

EMBREE: Actually, what I talked about a great deal was human rights and foreign policy, remember it's the Carter days. So I could give the President's line, which I wholly agreed with, and at the same time not have to pretend knowledge of American policy judgment.

Q: This is very true. And when you do travel around, which I always enjoyed doing, it gives you a wonderful opportunity to really see what's going on instead of being bound in the capital city. And you with your background would be particularly good at this. Well, how did you find living? Are there any comparisons about living -- I'm not even talking about your life as a missionary teacher and then your life in the Embassy, but I mean living -- what was it? A decade later in India? Did you find that there were many changes?

EMBREE: Oh, yes. There were great changes in India itself, enormous changes. We went to India in 1948. We didn't have a flush toilet. We didn't have a refrigerator. They hadn't even heard about air conditioners. None of the helps to living which became commonplace later on. In our early days we would have been very embarrassed to live in the kind of splendor we lived in in Delhi. We had got over that meanwhile. We realized the Indians didn't care. I don't think it was the least barrier to our friendships with Indians that we lived in the peculiarly large house.

Q: You had a very particular house. As I recall, it had lots of columns.

EMBREE: Lots of columns, yes. So there was tremendous change in our own lifestyle. But in that sense the change in India itself, the prosperity in India, the growth of the middle class, nobody would have foreseen when we went to India in '48. That's a change in Delhi, basically in Delhi, and in other big cities.

Q: The urban centers.

EMBREE: The urban centers. India now has a very affluent middle class.

Q: And you can see this. It's interesting when you travel around and make these observations. Has there been any special impact of this stint in the diplomatic service on your subsequent thinking or your subsequent academic career?

EMBREE: Oh, yes, I'm sure. It's linked me in a very interesting way with the academics, all of whom came through Delhi. I know virtually every American academic who came to India the two years I was there. It's also a very important link with the people in Washington, my involvement at the Foreign Service Institute.

Q: You lecture there from time to time?

EMBREE: I lecture regularly. Now, that comes about actually through connections I had made with Sid Sober and one or two others at an earlier period when I was lecturing for USIS in Pakistan.

Q: So you crossed country boundaries?

EMBREE: Yes, that was before I was CAO. I didn't when I was CAO.

One interesting thing that happened when you're speaking of diplomatic matters. Bhutan was very anxious to start a program in the United States of sending their young people in the service. And Senator Percy was a great friend of Bhutan and he was pushing this both in Washington and indeed in Delhi. And so I readily agreed that I would go to Bhutan and help them select some people to go study in the United States. They had no idea how to do it. The only catch was that the Indian government wouldn't let me go. Nobody wanted to say this publicly, especially the Bhutanese education minister. However, Senator Percy didn't know and he thought I had refused to help the Bhutanese.

Q: Too bad somebody couldn't whisper in the good Senator's ear of the niceties.

EMBREE: He probably didn't realize the close rein Indians kept on where certain Americans go. That was the other side of it, by the way, that I was watched more carefully by the Indian government than I think other people would have been, because they knew me and I had been there before. They sometimes used to check my guest lists of who went to my house.

Q: Before the guests arrived.

EMBREE: Oh, yes. Often before the guests arrived.

Q: One does not necessarily think of India with such a strong surveillance program. Did Sue have any special feeling about this second stint in India?

EMBREE: She was very unwilling to go because she remembered our former life and thought that was fine when we were young, but why go through that again? So she was somewhat dumbfounded when she arrived and discovered we had two freezers and two refrigerators in our kitchen.

Q: Happily surprised.

EMBREE: Happily surprised. She played a very interesting role. Mrs. Goheen once said to me, you know, there are only two real Embassy wives in Delhi. I said, what do you mean? She said, Sue and I are the only two women who act like old fashioned Embassy wives.

Q: That raises a whole issue, which we will not go into in this interview, about this change which is very true.

EMBREE: It was true. Of course, both Mrs. Goheen and Sue had been used to entertaining for their husbands always and continued to fit in with the pattern. She enjoyed the years.

Q: She didn't teach again?

EMBREE: No, she didn't teach. She didn't have any formal kind of activity, but she was very involved with some of the young Embassy wives who were very interested in learning about India and doing things.

ROBERT F. GOHEEN
Ambassador
India (1977-1980)

Ambassador Robert F. Goheen was born and raised in India as a child of missionaries and served two tours in the U.S. Army. After returning to the U.S. to work for the War Department, he was sent to the Philippines and later to India. Ambassador Goheen served as president of Princeton University from 1957-1972. He was ambassador to India from 1977-1980. He was interviewed by Fredrick Aandahl on December 15, 1988.

Q: I wonder if I could jump ahead a few years and ask what were the immediate circumstances of your appointment by President Carter?

GOHEEN: I was astounded by it because I'm not active in any political party and I don't have any money to contribute to politics, to speak of. Though I was a very, very minor and ardent Carter backer, I don't think I had ever really come to his attention. I did know Cyrus Vance, the incoming Secretary of State, and he knew that I knew a lot about India. It turned out further that on the panel that reviewed possible ambassadorial appointments that the President established, I chanced to have two good friends. One was Dean Rusk and the other was Ann Martindell.

So I had some prejudiced witnesses working for me, but I suspect I knew as much about India as most people who could have been available for that job.

Q: In getting ready to see you here, I looked up and saw what a distinguished group of predecessors you had.

GOHEEN: I certainly did.

Q: Henry Grady, Loy Henderson, Chester Bowles, George Allen, John Sherman Cooper, Ellsworth Bunker, Kenneth Galbraith, Kenneth Keating, Daniel Moynihan, and William Saxbe.

GOHEEN: It was a very distinguished group. It was a terrific group. I knew all of those people except Grady. I never met him. I had, one way or another, known all the rest of them.

Q: When you compare it with the list of politicians or big contributors at many other posts, India, apparently, has been reserved for people who were active in public affairs in the broader sense.

GOHEEN: I think that's been true, yes.

Q: I wondered, also, were you interviewed by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee?

GOHEEN: I was, but they were very gentle with me. They didn't push me at all. But again, I knew a few people on that committee.

Q: Well, you've been strategically located for a long time, so you know almost everybody, I should think. Of course, you've been to India a great many times, but when you returned to India, did you find any great surprises from what you had seen earlier? You came, I guess, a few years after separation.

GOHEEN: Well, from about 1957, when I became President of Princeton, until going there 20 years later as ambassador, I must have been back to India seven or eight times, so that I had seen the progressive industrialization around the bigger cities and the second-tier cities, seen the growth of traffic, and development of pollution and all those other things that were happening. And so there's no surprises visually or in terms of just being there.

I went at an extraordinarily interesting time because India had, since independence, been governed by a single part, the Congress Party, which, to be sure, under Mrs. Gandhi, split off and became Congress (I). But it really was a continuity of one party controlling the country. And then there was this tremendous uprising of popular antagonism to her and her policies in early 1977 that led to the election of a new composite Janata Government, the People's Government. So, I went in as a whole new regime came into office, full of enthusiasm, full of promise. We were all very optimistic about the restoration of democracy in India.

And then over the next almost four years that I was there, I saw two further governments. Thus, in my short span as ambassador, there were more changes in government in independent India than it had had in its whole history before. That helped to make the job fascinating.

Q: Mrs. Gandhi was still the principal politician even when she was out of office.

GOHEEN: She was quite quiet for awhile and then she began to assert herself. By strange coincidence, I had come to know her a little bit when she came to this country with her father. Let's see, that would have been in the Kennedy period, 1962, I guess it was. By chance my wife and I were up in New Haven for the Yale-Princeton football game weekend with Whitney Griswold, then President of Yale, and his wife. Among the other house guests there, besides the two of us, were Indira Gandhi. Then she was a quite young, apparently non-political person. Young, being my age then, you know, 40-something. Also a guest was Dorothy Norman, an older woman, who had written a lot about India and was a friend of the Nehru family. So, I had, as I say, come to know Mrs. Gandhi a bit.

When I got to New Delhi, after presenting my credentials and getting to know the people in the new Janata Government, I felt it was incumbent on me also to get to know the leaders of the various opposition parties, of which she was far and away the most important. I called on her, and she appreciated that, though the government didn't appreciate it entirely.

Q: You mean the Indian Government?

GOHEEN: The Indian Government, yes. Our government thought it was the right thing for me to do.

Q: Yes, I would expect that.

GOHEEN: She appreciated my call, and we developed, I wouldn't say a terribly warm relationship, but a very good, fairly candid relationship for discussions together. She never gave me the kind of grief she gave some other ambassadors. She could be very, very short with them, they told me, and impervious to any real discussion. But I never had that problem with her. Later, I had to deal with her a lot during the last year I was there because she came back in office in January of 1980. I was there right through to December; I was there for 12 months when she was the Prime Minister.

Q: What was the principal focus of U.S. policy toward India in your tenure?

GOHEEN: Well, President Carter had a very genuine interest and concern about the Third World. And he had a particular interest and concern about India. I think it was because his mother had served there in the Peace Corps and had an, apparently, very moving and worthwhile experience. He had caught a lot of that feeling; so, a major effort was to try to show the goodwill of the United States toward this new, restored democracy of India and our desire to work and cooperate with them, stand together for human rights, and things like that. That concern was reflected in the fact that India was one of the few countries that the President visited. He came in the winter of 1978 to visit in New Delhi.

Q: Had he been in India before?

GOHEEN: No. He had never been there before. The President, Cyrus Vance, and Roy Atherton all came out together. They had first gone to Tehran which was not, I think in retrospect, a terribly successful visit. They had a pleasant time but they really didn't understand what was going on there. Then they came to India and had on the whole a good visit there, because of the President's great interest.

The big issue between us, through the whole time from before I got there until after I left, was the discrepancy in nuclear proliferation policy between the two countries. India, you know, had exploded a nuclear device in 1974 which they called a peaceful nuclear explosion. And that so shocked people in this country and members of the Congress that there was a great push on to tighten American nuclear export policy. That came afoul of a contractual agreement which we had made back in 1963 to supply uranium fuel to two power reactors built by General Electric a little bit north of Bombay at a place called Tarapur.

And so this issue of maintaining our commitment to supply fuel to these reactors, to that real contractual obligation, came up against legislation which was trying to cut off all of that and which, in effect, did cut off that kind of supply unless there was a Presidential waiver. Well, over a period of time, we got two Presidential waivers because the President wanted to keep good relations with India and he also respected the contractual obligation.

But the nuclear doves in Congress were so strong that there was no real chance of keeping the supply relationship alive after those two shipments. This was a very thorny area of amicable enough discussion that never approached agreement on resolving the issues, though we tried many different ways of coming to a solution. So, when I left office in January of 1981, I certainly left that big, unresolved, and festering problem behind me.

Q: What was going on with regard to Pakistan on this?

GOHEEN: Well, about March of 1979 we became aware that Pakistan not only seemed to be pursuing a course toward nuclear armament, but was definitely doing so, that it had managed clandestinely to get information and material from Europe and was developing an enrichment capability. The Carter Administration then invoked legislation, the Symington amendment, which terminated economic aid to Pakistan for awhile, trying to put the screws on Pakistan without, I think, any real success. Of course, we in India thought it was a good thing that our government was doing.

But when the Russians invaded Afghanistan in late December of 1979, that whole arrangement got turned tippy-turvy. It came to seem to the President, and Brzezinski in particular, critically important to back up Pakistan, show our commitment to helping it as an endangered forward line state. The President offered to provide Pakistan $400 million economic and arms aid almost immediately. That's what General Zia described as peanuts, if you remember; in his view, it wasn't nearly enough.

But that issue of our willingness to arm Pakistan, in the last year that I was in India, was a very sore point in our relations with India because, from the Indian standpoint, every time we arm Pakistan, as we have in the past, Pakistan has used those arms to attack India and not to defend against communism or anything else. So they are very sensitive to American arms supply for Pakistan.

At the very same time our people were running around in China trying to talk with the Chinese about closer relations, including the supply of various kinds of arms. That also made the Indians very nervous because they still remember all too vividly getting whipped in that 1962 border war with China; they remain very suspicious of the Chinese. So, part of my task was to try to convince the Indian Government, Mrs. Gandhi, that the United States really did care for India. We were not going against India by trying to have better relations with China and by helping Pakistan. And that was my message. That was what I kept trying to sell week after week.

Q: Did you get good support from the Department?

GOHEEN: Yes. It was a wonderful Administration to work with, at least for me, because I knew that Cyrus Vance saw at least some of my cables and the President was very receptive. I saw him before I went out to India, I saw him every time I came back. I saw the Secretary every time I came back. And, you know, a lot of ambassadors don't manage to do that.

Q: No. It helps a great deal.

GOHEEN: Yes. It helps an enormous amount.

Q: Did you have good relations with the desk also?

GOHEEN: Yes. For this history, I would record that I was tremendously well impressed by the professional Foreign Service with whom I dealt both at the desk and in the field. I really had wonderful colleagues and, with very, very few exceptions, they were people of high caliber and intelligent, dedicated people. I really enjoyed it.

Q: One of the perennial cases where there is friction is between the ambassador and the deputy chief of mission.

GOHEEN: I had a wonderful DCM, whom I inherited. He had run the embassy for, I guess, the better part of a year. Saxbe left as soon as Ford lost the election.

Q: I sort of lost track of Saxbe.

GOHEEN: Saxbe was put in by the Ford people, or maybe by Nixon just before he went out. And Bill was out there with a mandate, really, not to do anything. The Nixon people really pretty much washed their hands of India following the Bangladesh debacle, and the infamous tilt toward Pakistan, and things like that. Bill Saxbe was a very able and nice guy, but he went out there with a mandate not to do anything, just to represent. And he had a wonderful time playing golf, and shooting, and buying rugs, and doing all those things. But as soon as Ford lost the election, he packed up and came home.

So his DCM, David Schneider, who is a real veteran of the South Asia service -- a wonderful fellow and Yale alumnus -- was the DCM when I arrived. And he and his nice wife, Ann, really broke me in. I had never been an Ambassador. I didn't know what an Ambassador did. They were wonderful and I was awfully sorry when they left. He went back to Washington for a brief stint, and then ended up being our ambassador in Bangladesh.

But his successor was an equally fine person who had been, in many people's view, given a very bum deal by the Kissinger people. His name was Archer Blood. Arch was our consul general in Calcutta at the time of the troubles leading to Bangladesh breaking free. He would send back to Washington cables about the genocide that was going on and on. Those messages were very inconvenient for Mr. Kissinger, who was trying to promote a very close relationship with Pakistan as a bridge to China. So, Blood got brought home, and I think he served in the Personnel office for a short time; I'm not quite sure of that. Then he was sent off to the Army War College. That's where he was when I took office.

As you know, I think they regularly let an ambassador consider a number of possibilities for his DCM and I talked with a number of very able and nice people. But I thought that Blood, of the ones I talked with, was the one that I could work most easily with and whose judgment I had high respect for. So Archer Blood and his nice wife came to New Delhi and served as the DCM the rest of my time there. He was an excellent DCM. Very, very professional but, you know, good breadth and good judgment.

So, as I say, I had luck. I had wonderful colleagues. And it's as true of my principal political officers, economic officers, junior political officers, and AID director. They were really high class people.

Q: How were the local employees? Were there problems, as we have had in some other countries?

GOHEEN: No. We had, I would say, minor employment problems. I guess it was during more or less the last year and a half of my time in New Delhi that the State Department undertook a world-wide reorganization of positions for foreign nationals. Getting this world-wide perspective to actual local and regional scenes involved a good deal of strain, and argument, and contention. But over time, the necessary adjustments were made. Harry Barnes was the Director General at that time, and he proved to be a very good person to work with on that set of problems. But the Indians who were helping do our political and economic reporting seemed to me to be very able and very easy to relate to.

Q: I was going to ask further about the efforts you made to better the relationship between India and Pakistan.

GOHEEN: Well, I'm fairly pessimistic about the ability of the United States or any external power to change that situation, other than either to rile it up by supplying arms or doing something nice for the other party, to which the second party always reacts negatively, or by staying out of the way. Arthur Hummel went to be ambassador in Islamabad the same time I went to New Delhi. And Art, you know, is a seasoned professional. We got to meet and know each other in Washington a bit before I went out. We were mutually determined that our embassies would not be sources of friction. Let the Indians and the Pakistanis have their frictions; we were not going to work against each other.

Q: There is a tendency for U.S. missions to represent the local government.

GOHEEN: I think that we managed that very well. We were aided by the fact that we knew and liked each other. And then annually there was a chiefs of mission meeting where we could get together and talk. My senior political officer had served there and his had served in India, so all those things helped, I think. The British found it out before us and we found it out afterwards -- namely, that our ability to bring about good relations between India and Pakistan is extremely limited. They are going to be governed by their direct perceptions of each other, which still tend to be very suspicious and, at quite a deep level, antagonistic. I think we're going to have to see another generation come. Now, this may be Ms. Bhutto's generation. I don't know.

Q: She's certainly a change from all the other people.

GOHEEN: I had hoped that with young Rajiv coming into office, we would see a greater relaxation toward Pakistan on his part. In both countries people take a lot of their cues from the leadership, I think, more than here. It looked for a short time as though that was going to happen. Then, for one reason or another, partly the Punjab problem, he found it expedient, or necessary, or desirable to become very tough-minded toward Pakistan. He feels, and I guess he thinks he has evidence, that Zia condoned the training of Sikh militants in Pakistan. That, of course, inflamed his thought and Indian thought. He may have been right. Zia, in turn, thought India was aiding people opposing his government and working for a democratic Pakistan, which probably was right, too, so that there were all these tensions.

Q: In that period, Afghanistan had not yet become such a problem as it is now.

GOHEEN: I do not believe that the Afghanistan issue initially was a big issue between India and Pakistan. It was, initially, a very big issue between our government and India's. When the Russians moved into Afghanistan in December of 1979, a care-taker government led by Charan Singh was in power, about to turn over authority to Mrs. Gandhi's government which was just then being formed. Her party had won the parliamentary election but she was not in office yet. The Ministry of External Affairs apparently fumbled around and tried to get Charan Singh to authorize a statement about India's response to the Afghan situation, but he wouldn't do it.

Some people, whom I know but won't name, got to Mrs. Gandhi and persuaded her to authorize a text which was just terrible. You may remember that it was read as part of the U.N. debate when India abstained from the general condemnation of Russia for that invasion. This statement made the point that the other superpower -- I forget the exact wording -- had built up its military forces in the Indian Ocean to the extent that one should not be surprised that the USSR felt some need to react to that threatening presence. Well, you know, that was ridiculous and self-serving. I have good, personal evidence that she never really knew what she was approving. I mean, she trusted these two fellows and, in effect, said, "If it's all right with you, it's okay."

So, this was a terrible blow. I mean, you can imagine the American reaction to that Indian statement coming at a time when the President was worked up about this enormous new menace that the Soviet Union had come to be. Remember, he said he had not realized how dangerous it could be until this move into Afghanistan.

I came back from Delhi for consultations very shortly after the invasion, while the Charan Singh government was still in office and before Mrs. Gandhi had taken office. So, I was in Washington and about to return to India on the day of the debate in the U.N. when this statement was read by India's permanent representative there. I got a copy of it at the State Department moments before I was to make a farewell call on the President at the White House.

So, I had a copy of it, and I went over there, and I said I had to see Brzezinski quickly. He came out and I said, "Do you know about this?" He said, no, he didn't know about it. I said, "Well, here's the statement." I've forgotten what he said, but it was something like, "Oh, my God." I said, "Who is going to tell the President about it?" He said, "You are."

So, we went in to meet the President and, after the ceremonial picture taking and politeness, we were alone, the three of us. I told the President and he exploded. I had not thought of him as an irascible person in any of my previous contacts with him, but he just exploded. He got livid and even cursed. I then had to work to calm him down. I said, "You know, we know very little about this situation. Mrs. Gandhi's government isn't officially in office yet. The Charan Singh government is going out. For goodness sakes, don't do anything and please don't say anything until I get back to New Delhi and can look into this and report more fully on it." After fuming some more, he accepted that, which was good.

I was able then to call on Mrs. Gandhi and also tell off the two guys who wrote that statement; the latter probably did no good. I made the point to her that, if she had approved this, she had very badly misinterpreted the sure American reaction to it. She said she hadn't meant to alienate us, and she felt that we, perhaps, were overreacting. She was convinced diplomacy was the way to get the Russians out, rather than threatening them, and India was committed to trying to do that. So I was able to report all that back to the Department; maybe it did some good.

She never got credit in this country for the fact that she did stand up against the Russians. Gromyko made a special trip to New Delhi in January or early February to try to get the Indian Government to endorse what the Russians had done in Afghanistan, and she flatly refused to do it. But the fact that she wouldn't come out and pick up the cudgels against the Russians was always held against her by many people in this country.

Q: Well, this is a good example of how advantageous it is to have an excellent ambassador who can see the President.

GOHEEN: Yes, sure.

Q: Most of them are cut off, except for completely ceremonial affairs.

GOHEEN: Yes, sure. If it hadn't been for his interest in India, I'm sure I wouldn't have seen him.

Q: Were you visited often by congressional delegations?

GOHEEN: I would have liked to have had more because my feeling was that Congress generally ignored India except to complain about problems. I wanted them to realize that this is a real, functioning democracy and that it has a lot of the same problems that we do. Often there, as here, it is hard to get a clear party line and sometimes policy isn't absolutely consistent because you have all these political forces at work.

Q: I suppose the embassy was concerned very much in keeping track of at least the major party.

GOHEEN: We had several congressional delegations but, as I say, I would have welcomed more. I think most of the visits were worthwhile in terms of congressmen getting a better sense of what the Indian government was like and what the country was like. There are a few individuals who were, obviously, boondoggling, but I don't think of any delegation being a waste of time.

Q: They are always getting stories in the paper about junkets of one sort or another.

GOHEEN: One congressman, whom I won't name, embarrassed us all by asking where he could get dirty pictures. You know, it was incredible. I didn't know where to get them. We had to ask our social secretary who she said she knew people who could get him some.

Q: I'm reminded of the story of one of the crazy politicians of the 1950s who gave De Gaulle an exploding cigar. Fortunately, the Eiffel Tower didn't collapse and we were all right. You didn't have too much concern about international terrorism like we've certainly had in the last few years.

GOHEEN: No, not at all. Every now and then we'd get a threat that some Japanese Red Army people were passing through India. They would tighten up security around the embassy for awhile, but I never worried about it. After the Iran fiasco we got a certain amount of demonstrating from Iranian students. There were lots of Iranian students in India. They would show up, often accompanied by people from the Communist Party of India -- all bussed out and probably paid three rupees; mill around; shout slogans and threats outside the residence and the chancery and then depart. I never felt any more threatened by them than I had felt threatened by some demonstrations here at Princeton. Some of our security people wanted me to take a lot of precautions that I thought were silly. I didn't do it, except for the residence because of my wife being there. I was never personally troubled.

Obviously, this wasn't terrorism, but mob action. Things got much more serious in Islamabad. Just before we were to spend the better part of the week there with the Hummels, the chancery in Islamabad was attacked by a mob and burned.

Q: I had forgotten that episode.

GOHEEN: It was attacked by some Pakistani fanatics who thought that the United States had been involved in some violence at the Black Mosque in Mecca. I don't remember the details. Some pilgrims were killed and somehow some Muslim in Islamabad thought the United States had had something to do with that. So, they took out their anger on our embassy at Islamabad. Obviously, somebody must have organized and planned the attack; they devastated that place and Zia's troops were very, very slow to react. We were very lucky that we didn't lose a bunch of people there. But anyhow, obviously, the Hummels didn't want any guests just then; they had their hands full. So, we never got to Islamabad. I've been there at other times, but not on that trip.

Q: I was going to ask about the seizure of the embassy in Tehran. Was there much impact on the Indian Government?

GOHEEN: The Indian Government, ever since its founding, has made a point of cultivating the Arabian and Muslim states. It stands to reason, when they've got an internal minority of 90-plus million Muslims and Muslim Pakistan not too friendly on their western border, that they should want to have good relations with the Gulf states, with Egypt, and Morocco, with Libya, the whole bunch of Islamic states.

When the Shah was overthrown, India quickly appointed a Shi'ite ambassador to Tehran in the hope that he could be a door opener, or a good link, between New Delhi and Tehran. I don't think it really worked. I don't think that at that time the Iranian people cared about their neighbors at all; they didn't care what anybody felt. They had their own agenda and, beyond their internal agenda, it was to spread their fundamentalism through the Arab world and wherever else they could.

Q: Any public sentiments you could see? I imagine the government kept at arms length.

GOHEEN: Well, it was a mixed reaction. The Shah had cultivated relations with India carefully and even aggressively. He looked upon his country and India as being the two principal secular nations and modernizing nations in that part of Asia. He thought that they had a common agenda in keeping down the mullahs and other reactionaries so as to speed economic progress. He put a lot of money, for example, into a big iron mine down on India's western coast at Kudremukh. He put other money into extending the Rajasthan Canal. He and Mrs. Gandhi met at various times and, apparently, got along pretty well.

So, he wasn't looked on by Indians as the kind of villain that many other people saw him to be. Indeed, I would think that, because he really did stand for a secular state and Indians sometimes feel as though they are the only secular power around in a vast sea of Islam from Indonesia through to Morocco, there must have even been disappointment for some Indians in the turn of fortunes in Iran, though they wouldn't say that. They surely didn't say that publicly.

Q: How did your background in classical studies, educational administration, and scholarly foundations affect your contacts with government and people of India?

GOHEEN: Well, I think classical studies give you an appreciation for history. They give you a sense of appreciation for people other than your own kind of people. As a classicist, you need to try to reach out and understand how the Greeks thought, or the Romans thought, which isn't always the way we think. There is a certain amount of training in that. I also think scholarly research tends to develop an attentive and analytical habit of mind which is useful in many walks of life.

Q: Did you get at all into philology?

GOHEEN: No. I'm not a philologist. I was more a historian of ideas and literary critic. But as a scholar, you have to learn to take some complicated data, break them down, analyze them, come to some conclusions. The general utility of that showed in the Second World War. Many academic people ended up in staff positions in the various services because they had been taught to think critically and analytically, and to write.

The university presidency was, obviously, important in two ways. You learn to manage -- or lead, if not manage -- a large, complex human organization. There are a lot of personnel problems you have to be sensitive to, and that was valuable. In a university president's life in a university like this there are also always many external relationships, plus entertaining, and making speeches of general import rather than specifically internal import -- all, the same kinds of things an ambassador has to do.

Q: You have to be very flexible, too.

GOHEEN: Yes.

Q: In fact, I was wondering how you allocated your time among all the duties of an ambassador in a country of 800 million, with the Agency for International Development, and the USIS, and the Atomic Energy Programs, Agriculture, CIA, Treasury, and Defense. You were the universal man.

GOHEEN: You learn to try to size up your chief lieutenants in all those areas and how much you can rely on them; make clear to them that you expect them to raise their problems with you and not to run around corners; and meet with them often, sometimes with a full staff, but also in terms of their particular concerns. Every Monday we would have a staff meeting of the principal heads of these organizations.

I want to say two things. One of the things I liked was that Delhi was the kind of embassy in which I could roll up my sleeves and get right into the middle of things, especially in political affairs, but also into some of the economic issues, because I knew something about them and my officers knew that I knew. I think maybe at times they wished I would leave more of that to them, but they were nice and tolerant of my intruding on their reporting duties. I appreciated that, and I think I had good relations with all of them.

Because, as you said, it's such an enormous and diverse country, I felt it was a mistake to stay in Delhi all the time. I guess about every month and a half, usually with my wife, I would go off for four or five days, sometimes more, to some other part of India to meet with the government officials there, to talk with politicians and press there, meet with the Rotary Club, do all those things, just try to get a feel of this enormous country.

Q: Did you go by car, or train, or plane, or all of them?

GOHEEN: Well, we did all of those things. In North India we had a nice arrangement. We, often, would fly to our destination, but I would send an embassy driver ahead to be there to meet us and drive us around for the days we were in that area. Or, if it was near one of the consulates, the consul general would provide the transportation for us. He would usually come with me, although they couldn't always do that. I really felt that I had a much better sense of that extraordinary country that way than I ever would have had if I had just sat in Delhi. It's like sitting in Washington.

Q: Yes, very much so.

GOHEEN: You get to see things through such a narrow lens, such a special kind of lens, in any nation's capital.

Q: Something inside the beltway.

GOHEEN: And you can't ignore that, but it certainly isn't representative of the country.

Q: Did you make many speeches to Indian audiences?

GOHEEN: I never got my Hindi to the point where I could speak it that way, though I studied Hindi while I was there. I'm sorry to find that I'm losing it every month. I talked in English to Chambers of Commerce, and Rotary Clubs, and Foreign Affairs Clubs in all the major cities and many of the minor cities like Bhopal, and Indore, and Miraj, and places like that. That was part of it. I didn't go around the country just to sightsee; I went to represent the country and you do that, partly, by speaking.

Q: I suppose you had a security man with you occasionally, or at least in the appropriate places.

GOHEEN: I'm sure the Indian government almost always had somebody watching; I didn't always know about it. Certain cities, like Bombay, used to trouble me because the city government made a terrific fuss, providing us with motorcycle escorts and security people; we would have been happier to come and go quietly as we did in Madras. They never paid any attention to us while we were in Madras, that we knew of, although the security agencies probably had somebody watching over us.

Q: In retrospect, have you figured out what your most significant accomplishment was in your four years there?

GOHEEN: I don't think I really accomplished anything of terrible import. I think that I probably served....I think I helped the Carter Administration project its and my concern that India and Indians understand that the United States really cared about their country, and that we were not just bent on building up Pakistan at India's expense. I think I helped a little bit in this country, especially with respect to some of the members of Congress -- getting them to begin to realize that India is an enormously powerful country, as well as a great big one, and that it has a great capacity in that part of the world to affect what goes on, so that it is in our interest to be on good terms with this almost major power. It is far and away the strongest military and economic force between Aden and Singapore.

Q: Well, those were major accomplishments. What goes with it, usually, are frustrations.

GOHEEN: Yes. You can get frustrated. People don't listen sometimes, but I didn't experience any deep frustrations. I mean, I knew that, in terms of affecting Indian policy and what not, as an ambassador, the most I could do would be, at best, to soften it at the edges a little bit or to keep it from clashing with our policies where they differed in such ways as to produce heat. I knew too much about the subcontinent to think I could create peace between India and Pakistan or that I could help American and Indian interests come into absolute alignment. I mean, it would be nice if you could do those things, but that's beyond the pale. I never thought I could do those things.

Q: Why don't we take a specific example. Was there anything that American industry, or your embassy, or the Indian authorities could have done to prevent the Union Carbide disaster at Bhopal?

GOHEEN: I was shocked by that. I visited that plant. I'm not a scientist or technologist; so, I'm in no position to say whether it was well run or not. Interestingly enough, however, it was a piece of collaboration of which both Indian business and the Indian Government were very proud. It was a successful kind of collaboration until this dreadful accident occurred. Now I think it remains very much a matter of dispute whether it was negligence that caused the accident.

Q: That's up to a jury in India to decide.

GOHEEN: Yes. The Union Carbide people are convinced it was an act of sabotage and they know who did it, but the Indian Government doesn't want to recognize that; so, it remains a very disputed case. But the consequences were terrible, including the fact that it is all hung up in the courts. The poor people who have suffered have gotten no compensation at all to speak of.

Q: A lot of them will have died before they ever get compensation.

GOHEEN: Sure, yes. It is very, very tragic.

Q: My final question, is there anything else you wish to talk about or any question I forgot to ask you?

GOHEEN: No, I think I've said everything that I want to. I can just add that it was, for me, a tremendous experience, both personally and professionally -- if I can at all now claim to have become a foreign affairs professional. You know, when you get asked to be the ambassador of your country, which you love, to the land of your birth, which you also love, it's a tremendous thing. When I had to present my credentials and make a short speech, the way the ambassador always has to, I really choked up. It just grabbed me inside. And I continue to feel a tremendous sense of privilege in having had that opportunity.

At the same time, I tried to discipline myself very hard to keep my eye on the interests of the United States. My job was to represent the interests of the United States and not let my affection for India overly color my activity. I tried to do that. I also tried to help people in this country understand better what some of India's interests are and what some of its problems are. And I think developing that kind of understanding of divergent interests is, again, a service to American interests. So I enjoyed the opportunity. I don't know how well I did, but it was a great opportunity and I enjoyed it immensely.

BILHA BRYANT
Commercial Counselor
New Delhi (1977-1981)

Bilha Bryant was born in 1934 in Bulgaria. Bryant served in the Israeli Army and worked in the private sector before joining the Israeli Foreign Service in 1959. Bryant resigned from the Israeli Foreign Service and married Edward (Ted) Bryant in 1963. With her husband, Bryant was assigned overseas to Mozambique, Ethiopia, Pakistan, Korea and India. Bryant then began to work for the State Department and served in the Soviet Bureau, Eastern European Affairs and Congressional Relations. Bryant was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: You were in New Delhi from when to when?

BRYANT: We got to New Delhi in-let's see- June of '77 to June '81.

Q: How did you find New Delhi at this point?

BRYANT: Most people could not believe that we actually loved Karachi and were even more amazed that we wanted to go back to this part of the world. The fact was that Karachi had a wonderful school for the girls, we had really good friends both in the ConGen, especially our Consul General and wife Gordon and Marian Tiger, and among the "natives," we had a wonderful house and we were just happy in Karachi.

So I thought of New Delhi in similar terms. When we arrived to New Delhi during monsoon, we had a house designated for us and ready for occupancy. And we liked the house and the vast garden. The house was actually an old English bungalow, quite large with intricate arrangement of rooms, but charming and comfortable. We actually settled down quite quickly and though the weather was horrendous, we were looking forward to our life there. We'd been there a week or so when one morning the cook called me to ask for something. As we finished discussing the menu for a dinner party in the foyer, since the kitchen was away from the house, and we both left, the whole ceiling of the foyer caved in. I am not exaggerating. Another minute and it could have killed us both. And for the next week I couldn't stop crying. And you know I'm a big, strong woman and I don't cry easily. I was so upset. Mind you, before we got into the house, we were given temporary quarters for three weeks so that they could fix our permanent house. This must have been the straw that broke the camel's back: having had to move three times in two years and then that happens. I must have had a mild nervous breakdown. Monsoon time in New Delhi is difficult as it is: you look out of your air conditioned house at the beautiful green gardens expecting to go out into the fresh air, but instead you go out into 120 heat with 99 humidity.

The embassy in New Delhi was quite large as was the city and the embassy community was dispersed. Perhaps this was the reason that nobody offered to help us, even to show us where the most essential places are.

Q: Who was the ambassador at that time?

BRYANT: Ambassador Goheen, who was in a way an old Indian hand, because his parents had been missionaries in India.

Q: He was from Princeton?

BRYANT: Yes. He was actually the youngest president of Princeton University. Both the Ambassador and Mrs. Goheen were very nice.

Q: I was wondering whether that set the tone?

BRYANT: Very possibly. Normally somebody at the top says, "Well now, look, we want to make sure that newcomers are shown around and helped to settle down." If no volunteers were available, then make it part of embassy regulations. Archer Blood was DCM, and I think at this point he was not very happy with his career. This again colored the whole atmosphere in the embassy. Once a month Archer Blood gave a reception for all newcomers. If you were to miss his reception, you would have to wait for a month for the next group to arrive. New Delhi was a large city with a large embassy, and you were expected to make your own way, which thanks to having lived before in the sub-continent, we happily did. The ambassador was not very social as well; he was an intellectual and not the life of a party. Since Indian hosts usually served dinner not before 10 p.m., the ambassador accepted few dinner invitations. Indians are extremely hospitable, especially when it comes to important Americans and other foreigners and they cared deeply that we attend their lavish dinners. My Indian friends would often ask me to try and convince the ambassador to accept an invitation promising to serve dinner by 9 p.m. I also remember during dinners at the residence, when Ambassador Goheen would whisper to me, "Bilha, try to get them out of here by ten." But Indians never even arrive until about 10 or later. So socially it wasn't working very well in the embassy. And politically was not much easier: we were still tilting toward Pakistan and the Indians resented it openly. The first thing an Indian will ask me at cocktail parties "How are you, Mrs. Bryant? I understand you have lived in Karachi. How does that compare with New Delhi? You like India better, don't you?" Of course, in my case, I did not like India better; Karachi was friendly, comfortable and life much easier for us. I must admit though that we found India to be one of the most fascinating countries we have ever lived in, much more interesting than Pakistan. In India, wherever you turned, whatever you looked at was history, culture, civilization and even beauty. Since Ted was commercial counselor for all of India, we were able to travel a great deal all over the country. I can't tell you how much we enjoyed this.

Q: How did you find dealing with the Indians? I'm talking about the class that you were dealing with, I guess the political class.

BRYANT: Well, Indians are intelligent, quick and smart. They are hospitable and friendly, but they are definitely opinionated and quite defensive. As soon as we arrived to India, we met a great number of Indian businessmen and industrialists. They appeared open and easy to talk to provided the subject was agreeable to them. But anything that may be construed as criticism towards India, even complaining about the monsoon, is taken as an insult to the country. I mean, we were very careful when we talked about India's economy or the political system. What I did find, however, was that the women in India were well educated, independent, ambitious, career-oriented and free to pursue their interest. It was certainly not so with Pakistani Muslim women of the same class. Those women were doctors and professors and teachers. They were fascinating to meet socially. But here again the conversation had to be on their term. When we happened to talk about the hard life of Indian women in the villages and I would ask, "Why do you have so many children? I mean, after all, there are now ways to-" the answer was "Oh, but India is such a rich country. There is a lot of food for everybody." Well, of course there was a lot of food for people who lived in certain sections of New Delhi. There was very little food in the poor suburbs of New Delhi and in the villages across India. There was very little room in their small huts for them and their many children. Movies that you see about India are actually very accurate. But Indians will never, never admit there are poor people in India. "We are taking good care of ourselves." Then they bring up the subject of American Blacks and the "terrible" treatment they receive here. In the late '70s and early '80s -maybe things have changed since then-most conversations were controversial, unless we talked about the beautiful saris, wonderful Indian food and of course the music. They have many things to be proud of, but their arrogance overshadows their achievements. It's interesting to compare them with Indians in the United States who contribute to American life in so many ways, from science to food without much fuss. But this is only my humble opinion made while living there for four years and getting to know the people very well. After all, we were out, and I don't exaggerate, every night of the week. We would first go to a cocktail party and then arrive at the dinner party by 9-9:30 still being some of the first guests. Dinner will not be served until midnight.

Q: How does one manage with this?

BRYANT: Not very well, really. I managed by trying to have a nap every day, but poor Ted! It was really very difficult on him because the next morning he had to get up early and go to the office by 8. That's why a lot of our American colleagues drew the line there. They said, "That's all, if they don't serve dinner by 9, we leave." I see pictures of us in India. I tell you we looked very tired, extremely tired. In addition, the weather in India is enervating. There is a very short period of the year when it's really comfortable; by February; New Delhi is already very hot. We had 12 air conditioners in our house, so if the electricity was going we were fine. Beautiful gardens surrounded the house. Because of the water we all had stomach problems quite often in India. You tried to be careful and always drink bottled water, but then the waiters would put a piece of ice in your glass, and that's it.

Q: After this assignment, in '81, what happened?

ARCHER K. BLOOD
Deputy Chief of Mission
New Delhi (1977-1981)

Archer K. Blood was born in Illinois in 1923. He entered the Foreign Service in 1947 after studying law at the University of Virginia. His career included positions in Thessaloniki, Munich, Athens, Algiers, Bonn, Dacca, and New Delhi. This interview was conducted on by Henry Precht on June 27, 1989.

Q: When you arrived in India and set yourself up as DCM, they obviously knew that you had been the dissenting consul general in Dacca.

BLOOD: With the Indians, of course, that was very much of a plus.

Q: Yes. Did that help you?

BLOOD: Yes, it did. Oh, publicly nothing was ever said about it, but the newsmen were aware of it, and the Indian foreign office people were aware of it. I think I was looked upon as somebody who was not hostile to India.

Q: Were we generally off to a good start with India in the Carter Administration and Ambassador --

BLOOD: Oh, absolutely.

Q: Was he a popular figure there?

BLOOD: Yes, we were off to a good start because his arrival coincided almost exactly with the end of the emergency in the election of the Desai government and Mrs. Gandhi's departure and the restoration of human rights and democracy in India. So that was very much a plus. Then Desai and Jimmy Carter had a rather interesting relationship through letter writing that went a little further than most of the letters written from head of state to head of state.

So it was a good time to arrive there. But then, of course, things began to disintegrate to some extent because of the nuclear issue, for one, and then because of the dissolution of the Janata government fell apart or were voted out.

Q: Talk about the nuclear issue a little bit.

BLOOD: That was the major issue that we as the embassy had with India during the time that I was there.

Q: What prompted the Indians to go nuclear? Was it their experience with East Pakistan and the United States at that time? Our tilting policy towards Pakistan government?

BLOOD: Well, I think there are a couple reasons. One was the Chinese went nuclear in 1964. And India now thinks of themselves in the same league with China rather than in the league with Pakistan. There is often speculation that when we sent the Enterprise task force into the Bay of Bengal in 1971, that the Indians thought that if perhaps they had nuclear weapons, maybe we would have hesitated to make any such show of force. I think it's primarily because the Chinese did it. Also, I think it was a matter of prestige.

Remember, the Indians exploded a nuclear device, but they haven't gone that extra step of making nuclear weapons. They could, but they haven't.

Q: A nuclear device, nuclear weapons --

BLOOD: Well, yes. They have shown they can do it, but they have stopped short so they can get the best of both worlds. They have proven that they are technically capable, and they can still inveigh against nuclear weapons.

Q: You don't think they've stockpiled nuclear weapons?

BLOOD: No, I don't.

Q: I mean, you don't think that in your heart of hearts, or you think there is evidence of that?

BLOOD: I don't think so. I think we have been following that as closely as we can. But, of course, they could on short notice make nuclear weapons.

Q: What efforts did we make, and how would you evaluate those efforts in trying to dissuade them from going nuclear?

BLOOD: Well, that was well before I was ever in India, so I don't know.

Q: When did the bomb --

BLOOD: It was 1974. I got there in 1977.

Q: They had already done the explosion.

BLOOD: And they had stopped.

Q: So what was the issue?

BLOOD: The issue was not that. The nuclear issue was Congress had passed the Nuclear Nonproliferation Act of 1978 which said that after a eighteen-month grace period, the United States would be obliged to stop shipments of nuclear material to any country which did not have all of its nuclear facilities under IAEA safeguards or which did not --

Q: Permit its --

BLOOD: Join the Nonproliferation Treaty which would amount to the same thing.

Q: We are discussing the U.S.-India nuclear issue. Continue.

BLOOD: As I was saying, the Nuclear Nonproliferation Act of 1978 obliged the United States to, after eighteen-months grace period, to suspend shipments of nuclear material to any country that didn't put all its nuclear facilities under IAEA safeguards or adhere to the Nonproliferation Treaty which is the same thing because signatories of the Nonproliferation Treaty have to put all their facilities under safeguards.

We had an agreement with India whereby we would provide slightly enriched uranium to be used as fuel in two nuclear power reactors near Bombay, a place called Terapore (PHONETIC). These facilities were under IAEA safeguards. And the Indians had agreed not to reprocess into plutonium any of the fuel or to look elsewhere for a supplier. The problem was that India had other nuclear facilities which were not under safeguard. Facilities which they developed on their own without foreign help. They refused to put these under safeguard.

So under the terms of the Act, when the Indians applied for new shipments of enriched uranium, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission voted against the shipment. Under the law, the president could decide in the national interest to go ahead with the shipment anyhow, but the Congress could veto the president's action by a vote of both houses of Congress.

President Carter authorized the shipment. The House voted against the shipment, and the Senate by a very close vote, two votes I think, sustained the president. So that shipment went forward, but it was very clear to everybody as a result of these events that that would be the last shipment. And it was.

Then we went into a sort of never-never land with the Indians in which time the Soviets offered to supply them. But the end result which took place well after I left India was that the Indians agreed to get their enriched uranium from France. The facilities are still under safeguard, but the other Indian facilities are not under safeguard so we have ceased to be a supplier to India in the nuclear field and without any influence in the nuclear field any more.

Q: Should we have conducted ourselves differently on that issue? Should we have --

BLOOD: No, I think the . . . There was never any disagreement in the embassy and in the State Department that we should keep trying to negotiate with the Indians. The trouble was that this legislation had this guillotine effect, you know. If by a certain time the Indians don't do something, boom, you've got to cut it off.

Q: Could we have prevailed if we hadn't had that humiliating deadline for the Indians?

BLOOD: Perhaps, perhaps. But the Indians feel very strongly about this. They feel the Nonproliferation Treaty is discriminatory because it distinguishes the nuclear haves from the have-nots. And also the U.S. action went further than the actions of any other nuclear supplier like the Soviets or the French or the Germans or the British by insisting that all facilities be under safeguard. I think it was a poorly conceived bit of legislation. It has caused the same problem in a number of other countries like Argentina and Brazil where we have cut off assistance, and those countries have merely just gone to another country for assistance.

Q: Do you know, did we make an effort with the French to prevent that?

BLOOD: Oh, no. We would much prefer the French to the Soviets as a supplier.

Q: Right.

BLOOD: No, no, no.

Q: We didn't encourage the French to replace us though, did we?

BLOOD: I don't know whether we encouraged it, but we certainly welcomed it.

Q: Really?

BLOOD: Yes. Oh, no, the idea was not to cut them off from the supplier. The idea, of course, was to use that as leverage, that was the Congressional intent. It was never the embassy viewpoint, the embassy just had to live with the law. It really exacerbated our U.S.-Indian relations.

Q: Was the law --

BLOOD: And see the Indians could claim it was ex post facto. Here we were with an agreement that was supposed to last until 1993, and we were changing the conditions upon which we provided the shipment. When we initially made this agreement, we weren't that stringent. We suddenly decided to apply very, very stringent conditions.

Q: Was the law designed, written, with India in mind?

BLOOD: No, not particularly. I think it was in part because the Indian explosion in 1974 had triggered a lot of concern that countries could use their peaceful nuclear power system to get the material for nuclear weapons. India was the first country that did that. That was the concern - that other countries would follow suit.

Q: You don't think Israel did that as well?

BLOOD: Beg your pardon?

Q: Israel?

BLOOD: No, Israel, I think, has just secretly set out to do it. They don't have a peaceful nuclear -

Q: I see.

BLOOD: Nuclear power system in Israel. I mean, power reactors and all.

Q: Your discussions with Indians over this failure to reach any kind of an agreement, did this seriously distort our bilateral relationship during your period there?

BLOOD: Oh, yes, it did.

Q: I mean, it really made life difficult for you as a . . .

BLOOD: Oh, not in personal terms, no.

Q: Right.

BLOOD: We found Indians very, very friendly and cooperative. No, not in personal terms but in official terms, yes.

Q: Were there other issues with the Indians where we had harmonious and productive relationships? I mean, how would you characterize it after that happy beginning?

BLOOD: Happy beginning. Well, it turned sour not only because of the nuclear issue but also because of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan which suddenly made Pakistan very important in our eyes because that was the only way you could get aid to the Afghan resistance was through Pakistan. When I went out to India, it was sort of a nice situation in that our relations with India were much better than our relations with Pakistan at the time.

Q: Probably in consequence --

BLOOD: Because again because the nuclear issue with Pakistan.

Q: Right.

BLOOD: And human rights, and the fact that they didn't have a functioning democracy there. So that was sort of the interesting -- I had never been in that situation before.

But with the Soviet invasion, suddenly Pakistan became very important to us, and India became relatively unimportant. And the Indians sensed that and didn't like and were pretty unhappy about it.

Q: The Indians, of course, didn't react nearly the way we did to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

BLOOD: No, no, they didn't.

Q: What did they think of our reaction? I mean, how did they --

BLOOD: Oh, thought it was exaggerated. They thought by helping the resistance against the Soviets, we were just prolonging the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan and that we should cease. If we wanted the Soviets out, we shouldn't help the resistance.

Q: How should the Soviets be driven out then?

BLOOD: They argued that they would just leave. When the resistance petered out, they would just leave the communist government in place and pull out.

Q: And they had no concern with a communist government in Afghanistan?

BLOOD: No.

Q: Did they really care what government was in Afghanistan? How important was Afghanistan to New Delhi?

BLOOD: Well, remember, Afghanistan traditionally had bad relations with Pakistan. So I think India would like to see a government there that is not on friendly terms with Pakistan which is unlikely to happen. The earlier governments had not been, the communist government was not.

Q: Pretty sure thing in other words.

BLOOD: Yes.

Q: Our AID program, it ended when you arrived in -- I mean, the substantial AID program . . .

BLOOD: It began again when I was in India. We started a new program again.

Q: But on a much smaller scale.

BLOOD: Much smaller scale. About a 100 million a year. Very small staff.

Q: Not at all lauding it over the embassy.

BLOOD: No, no. Nice relationship. AID was in its place.

Q: How were your relationships with the Soviets in New Delhi? There they were presumably somewhat like the (inaudible) as they were in Afghanistan, that is --

BLOOD: Oh, no, no where near as close as in Afghanistan.

Q: But, I mean, they were superior position to you in the eyes of the Indians, no? I mean, the Indians preferred the Soviets because of their aid program much as the Afghans had in your earlier stay in that country.

BLOOD: Well, in India there is sort of a dual track operating. Indians appreciate Soviet military sales and aid and consistent diplomatic support that the Soviet Union has given to India. At the same time, they really prefer Westerners to Soviets. They are democrats themselves. They like our ways of life, our institutions much more than the Soviets. The aim of most Indians is to visit the United States or live in the United States, many of them. They are quite capable of making the distinction on sort of the geopolitical level and on the personal level.

Q: Well, did you have any kind of relationship with the Soviets in India?

BLOOD: No, no more than the usual you would have in most posts where you bumped into them very occasionally. They were represented there by Yuli Vorontsov, who had been in Washington, who was the first deputy Soviet foreign minister and is now concurrently serving as Soviet ambassador to Afghanistan. Very able fellow.

Q: What about Indian politics at this stage? How well do you think our embassy understood the Indian scene? Was it a country where you could get behind what's in the press and really get an appreciation for the dynamics of politics?

BLOOD: I think we could pretty well. I think generally we tended to underestimate the extent of the swings in the pendulum. For instance, to underestimate the Janata victory in '77 and Mrs. Gandhi's return victory in the end of 1979. We could call it right as to the winner, but we tended to be more --

Q: Cautious.

BLOOD: Maybe cautious, you know, and say instead of a seventy-thirty victory, we would say maybe a fifty-five-forty-five or sixty-forty or something like that.

Q: When Mrs. Gandhi came back was Ambassador Goheen stay the full four years?

BLOOD: Yes. No. Ambassador Goheen resigned shortly after President Reagan was elected in November 1980. He actually left the first of January in 1981.

Q: Right. So you had a new ambassador?

BLOOD: No, we didn't. I served as chargé until I left.

Q: Uh huh. So you dealt with Madame Gandhi then?

BLOOD: Yes.

Q: Tell us something about what was your impression of her.

BLOOD: Well, she is very hard to figure because she could be --

Q: Did you talk to her chargé in the first place?

BLOOD: Well, I never -- the times that I visited her, I think, were always in accompanying --

Q: Someone else?

BLOOD: Visitors, yes, like congressmen, Jeane Kirkpatrick, somebody like that. I don't think Washington ever asked me to seek an appointment with her on my own, so I didn't. I wasn't rebuffed by her, but it just was not requested.

Q: What was your impression of her? How did you . . .

BLOOD: Remarkable woman. I mean, she -- a woman of moods. I think the moods though could be politically guided. I've seen her very charming when say somebody like Chuck Percy, Senator from Illinois, came. Very friendly, chatting family and all that. Very warm in her own home. I've seen her when she received Jean Kirkpatrick, and Jean Kirkpatrick was doing her best to be nice and gracious, and Mrs. Gandhi was cold as an iceberg from the very beginning. I mean, she just decided she didn't want to have anything to do with Jeanne Kirkpatrick and made it probably cruelly obviously apparent.

Q: But an able woman, intelligent?

BLOOD: Oh, extremely intelligent, yes. Tough, tough.

Q: Attitude toward the United States?

BLOOD: Very frank like most Indians. She tells what she thought. I like that. I mean, if she thought we were doing the wrong thing, the wrong idea, she would waste no time in telling that.

HUGH BURLESON
Deputy Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Madras (1978-1979)

Policy Officer, USIS
New Delhi (1979-1982)

Mr. Burleson was born in South Dakota and raised in California. After graduating from the University of California, Berkeley, he served in the US Army before joining the United States Information Agency in 1957. A specialist in Southeast Asia Affairs, Mr. Burleson served variously as Policy Officer and Public Affairs Officer in Niigata, Tokyo, Saigon, Madras, New Delhi and Seoul. He also had several tours at USIA Headquarters in Washington, DC. Mr. Burleson was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt in 1996.

Q: And what were you doing after that?

BURLESON: I had a direct transfer in summer '78 from Tokyo to Madras, India. Some of the documents I have here go into that in this file. Cliff Forster had wanted me to stay. I was, of course, still interested in staying in Japan but it was pretty clear that the Agency felt I was already too highly specialized in Japanese affairs and wanted me to become more of a generalist.

Q: So, in other words, if you understood Japanese better than most other people, the Agency says, "Just get out of there!"

BURLESON: Right, exactly. It's an argument, I guess, that was becoming endemic: generalist versus specialist; but back in Washington, they felt that you could become too enamored of the country, if you stayed too long. People used to ask me, "Well, aren't you too pro-Japanese?" and I would say, "Well, you know, when you have been in Japan and dealt with the Japanese as much as I have, it's easier to spot the difference between beauty spots and warts." But, anyway, Agency Personnel gave me the choice of PAO Chad or DPAO Madras, and used the strategy of calling me, like, at 2 a.m. and 3 a.m. in the morning when my defenses were down. I checked on the Chad situation, and found they were having a civil war there. So, I decided for Madras, which meant not just covering one state but all four states of southern India. I went to work there as DBPAO in the Summer of '78. It was to be a three-year tour. I got heavily involved in programs, program planning, and actually leading program teams. The DBPAO or BPAO would go out with Indian staff (we had 50 total) and all sorts of equipment, plus maybe an American speaker, or whatever.

Q: Did you go out into the villages?

BURLESON: Not into the villages; the major cities. As for the villages -- if there were any target audiences in the villages, we would send them invitations to come into the cities to attend the program. Quite few of programs were on the southwest coast of India, in Bangalore, or other major cities in the south. It was quite interesting; fascinating. One experience in Bangalore I remember, just about that time -- in late '78, I guess. In California, there was this Bakke case, about preferential treatment for minorities. Bakke was trying to get into a California medical school, but was blocked by affirmative action quotas.

Q: The Republicans were trying to do away with affirmative action...

BURLESON: Yes... wanted to knock it down. And this had quite a resonance in India because they had had their own minorities' affirmative action for a number of years, and it was just as controversial there as it became in the United States. It happened that we had planned a program in Bangalore on this issue and the timing was perfect. The Supreme Court decision came in on the Bakke case just then, so we had all of the judges from the area at this program, and it worked out beautifully. Good debate, with a video on the topic.

Q: Did you do any lecturing on that case?

BURLESON: I chaired the programs, but we had American speakers. If we were showing a film on this type of an issue or a video, I would help to explain the issues and guide the discussion, but I didn't do full-blown lectures because it wasn't an area of my expertise.

Q: How effective do you think that program was? You say you figured you had some success on it.

BURLESON: I think it was as effective as it could be expected. You know, there was a long history of antagonism between India and the United States over foreign policy, and the Indians some time earlier had opted for semi-alignment with the Soviet Union in the Cold War. So, it was an uphill battle, and the Soviets, of course, were in India in a big way ... very actively running disinformation programs that we had to deal with. So, I think we did pretty well.

We usually had an American speaker and were able to team him with an Indian cospeaker. We did one such program with the grandson of Mahatma Gandhi. And so, we had ongoing impact but it's hard to point to any brilliant successes.

Q: How did you measure the impact? Did you find the difference in the treatment by the Press or...?

BURLESON: Where you see press articles that say, "Well, we should consider this aspect of the situation and not just what the Soviets are saying", or something like that. Yeah, we could see moderating tones on certain issues. But India is a very complex situation.

Q: It is! Did you find any really vehement feeling on the part of the Indian population on the things you were dealing with, either pro or con, so far as the Soviet Union was concerned, and as far as what the Americans were expounding?

BURLESON: There were quite pro-Soviet people that sometimes attended our programs and were approaching issues from way out in the left field, attacking what our guest speaker was saying.

Q: And they came to the session...

BURLESON: Yeah, sometimes...

Q: . . . and trying to disrupt what you were saying?

BURLESON: No, not in that sense. It was an intellectual debate.

Q: Did they participate in that debate or was it...?

BURLESON: Yes. They would participate, sometimes like shooting arrows -- as if they had come to puncture everybody else's balloons, but not in terms of stopping or trying to stop the debate totally. They were just getting in their own two bits worth.

I was in Madras only eleven months. As I said, it was a direct transfer and I got delayed home leave in the Spring of '79 and went back to Madras after home leave. In the summer of '79 they had an opening in New Delhi for the Policy Officer position, and PAO Jay Gildner said he wanted me for that job because of my experience in Japan. That sparked another debate in Washington.

There were some... saying that the point of my being in Madras was to give me more generalist and program management experience; and now I was proposing to go back into a policy slot. Well, my experience in Japan was that policy slots didn't mean just sitting there thinking there was a lot of program involvement and management. So, I argued that I felt it wouldn't make me too much of a specialist!

Anyway, Jay Gildner and I prevailed, and I went up to New Delhi for two years more as a Policy Officer. It turned out that the Policy Officer was again in charge of the computerized records system. At that stage, we were just beginning to install our own computer and automate our own procedures. So, it was very much a management position, overseeing the planning and staffing of the DRS. It involved two trips back to Washington for training on the computerization process. I felt it was excellent experience for me.

HERBERT LEVIN
Political Counselor
New Delhi (1979-1981)

Herbert Levin entered the Foreign Service in 1956 and has served in Taichung, Hong Kong, Taipei, Tokyo, Dar es Salaam, Colombo, and New Delhi, as well as at the Bureau of Economic Affairs, NSC, NIC, and for Japanese Affairs. This interview was conducted in 1994.

LEVIN: Near the end of my assignment in Colombo, the American Ambassador in New Delhi, Robert Goheen, former President of Princeton University, etc., needed a DCM. I was not anxious to have another South Asian assignment and I was therefore not particularly interested to go to New Delhi. But apparently he had rejected various candidates and he had met me though we had no previous association of any kind. The DG's office worked out that I was to go to Delhi for a short time as Political Counselor (he was needed back in Washington), the DCM was going to become Ambassador someplace, then I would be already at post ready to move into the DCM slot.

This was all wired up by the DG's office and the South Asia Bureau. I had not known this but the decision was being made in Washington to recognize Beijing. This would mean the withdrawal of the Ambassador, and the downgrading of the Embassy in Taipei. The East Asian Bureau wanted me to go to Taipei to be the Chargé when the Ambassador was withdrawn, so I got frantic phone calls to change the assignment. I would have much preferred Taipei for obvious reasons. I said, "Well you guys in Washington go and fight it out. I'd been asked to do this in Delhi, I've said okay, now you're calling and asking me to go to Taipei. It's really not up to me to start walking out on this. You work it out in Washington."

Ambassador Goheen had not wanted other candidates, whoever they were, he did want me and I had accepted. So we went to Delhi. This worked out badly because my friends in the East Asian Bureau were annoyed with me for not going to Taipei, somebody else was pulled out in mid-tour elsewhere to go there and they were disappointed with me.

I got to New Delhi and the DCM, for reasons that had nothing to do with me, was denied his ambassadorship. He stayed as DCM as an extremely embittered person, and retired thereafter, a very unhappy man. I stayed for two years as Political Counselor and never became DCM. India was professionally challenging and the Indians were serious people with whom to do business. But from the standpoint of positions and promotions, New Delhi was not a plus for me.

Q: Goheen wasn't there very long.

LEVIN: He was there for the full time that I was there. He had been born in India, as had, I think, his father and his grandfather, they were a long line of committed Indian missionaries. He had received his education through high school in India; he went to the Kodaikanal School in Tamil Nadu. The village where his family had their mission was not far from Bombay. He had served on various boards and commissions to assist India, to provide scholarships for Indians, this kind of thing, his whole life. He had always gone back for visits and maintained his connection with the village.

He had been a Professor of Greek and Latin. He had gone to Princeton. He was a scholar, and had remained at Princeton teaching Greek and Latin and became President. His interests in India were personal and sentimental, to assist India with the best academic training, etc. I think he was pleased to be back in India. He had his children come out, his grandchildren, he took them all down to the village. The villagers, when they visited Delhi, were always cheerfully received by him which was a great honor for humble rural people in India.

I don't think he thought of Indian-American relations as an area where he was now the instrument of trying to get the Indians to do things in the American interest that they might not want to do, and to stop doing things that we didn't want them to do. I think that was a difficult role for him. He saw himself as a friend of India and someone who wanted to help India. I don't think he saw himself as a friend of India who was there to try and advance American interests, even if it made the Indians a little bit grumpy. I think that was a role uncongenial for him.

His wife was a nice person but India was his inheritance, not hers. I think she found the climate difficult. She had children and grandchildren in the U.S. and wasn't around a great deal of the time. Goheen was a nice man, a courteous man, always accessible, always approachable, but I'm not sure it was the happiest time for him.

Q: His outlook was entirely different from his successor, Harry Barnes who, the way it was described to me, was to accentuate the positive and eliminate the negative. And whatever the Indians wanted, we were going to give it to them.

LEVIN: I would say that Goheen didn't want to be the cutting edge. It wasn't how he had run his life. Even if we were doing something to assist the Indians, I don't think Goheen would want to push himself to the fore on that. As a President of Princeton, a high quality but small university, he had not had to take on prominent heavy fund-raising burdens as many university presidents have. He wasn't used to going around pressing people to do this and not to do that. He was a person a bit above the fray, highly respected, fair minded, who people would come to with a problem and he would advise them and they would follow his advice.

He was U.S. Ambassador in a country which had had a nuclear explosion and was working against the NonProliferation Treaty; it was backing terrorists in Bangladesh and Sri Lanka; it was using transit and trade agreements with the Nepalese to try and squeeze them into concessions in violation of its UN commitments and international law, etc. Bob Goheen had a clear understanding of these things but I don't think that he considered himself the instrument to work against them. That was just not the way he had run his successful and respected life.

We saw a lot of India, visited Pakistan, Bangladesh, etc.

Q: You'd mentioned that the Indian government was supporting terrorism in Bangladesh, the wisdom given in the American press is: oh well, this split up between east and west Pakistan occurred because of the evil terrorist religious fanatics in Pakistan, who hated the poor people in the eastern part of the country.

LEVIN: The split occurred long before I got to India. The basis for the split was the West Pakistanis contempt and cruelty towards the Bengalis, no doubt of that. At the same time, it was quite clear that the Indians looked upon this as an opportunity to split Pakistan. They did everything they could to worsen the situation, to make each side more distrustful of the other, and they achieved their goal.

The reason for the split was West Pakistani stupidity and bad treatment of the Bengalis, but the Indians certainly acted upon it as an opportunity, not a problem.

Q: To get back to the embassy a little bit, I'd had New Delhi described by a guy who spent 9 years in India, all told, that it's a place where people were never very happy. But you had mentioned that the DCM, the Deputy Chief of Mission, had been very, very embittered. Did he have any influence on this? Because at one time there was a scandal similar to what was going on in Tanzania. Where the husband of the Naval Attaché, or the Assistant Attaché, found the guys running the commissary at the embassy lining their pockets, had everything but cyclosound pictures of them doing it, and the DCM didn't want anything done, he let them walk with their pensions.

LEVIN: No, there was nothing like that when I was in India. I also think that DCM probably would have been very starchy, proper and correct faced with something like that. His disappointment was that he considered that he should receive an ambassadorship, and the people who were handing out ambassadorships didn't think so. But he had been led to believe he would be an ambassador, so his embitterment was personal.

He did take this out on people around. I understood his disappointment and was naturally sympathetic but since I was there to take his job, in a sense I was the symbol of his not getting an ambassadorship. I kind of accepted this as the sort of thing that just happens on occasion. I think that he considered that I was disappointed with him for not getting his ambassadorship, and I didn't become DCM, so our relationship was not good.

He went after people in the mission, for no reason that I could see. He bragged about how he was getting rid of people, he had fights with secretaries who then entered formal grievances against him. He was a melancholy figure.

Q: Who were some of these people that he was bragging he was getting rid of?

LEVIN: He just went after our Commercial Counselor. I think this was a "class clash" in an almost English sense. The Counselor was a bit of a New England aristocrat, though not a personal snob. He was fastidious in the way he dressed, the way he conducted his personal relations, and so forth. I don't know what part of the country the DCM was from, but any kind of personal formality and set dignity was not acceptable to him.

He just resented the Counselor and would say so, "I'm out to get him," giving no reason. The Commercial Counselor, I think, was professionally a rather effective person. But he also got into fights with secretaries over little things. There were actually formal grievance procedures. It was a sad conclusion to both of these careers.

Q: A couple questions on New Delhi, he's the Commercial Counselor, though people had described him as taking bribes for recommending corrupt Indian businessmen to American companies. One of these Indian businessmen was a known Russian agent, the kind who sold Soviet black money in India.

LEVIN: I never heard of anything like that. If that had been true then the Counselor would have been whisked out for security reasons. That must have been a different era. In a security case, the subject leaves instantly. That didn't happen for he finished his career there.

In Delhi, we had a black officer, who had been recruited into the Foreign Service without passing the examination, as an administrative specialist. He had not done well as administrative specialist, so they gave him the consular course and sent him out as the head of the Consular section, which was very active in New Delhi.

Q: He had not passed the exam?

LEVIN: No, he had come in through some special recruitment program because there weren't enough black officers. The fellow was manifestly incompetent. The organization of the consular section in a busy place like New Delhi consists of a number of people "manning the line," doing interviews. The chief of the Section does some interviews, but primarily he backs up the line interviewers when there are appeals or complicated transactions. This person often wasn't in his office and never manned the line. There was great bitterness and unhappiness on the part of his subordinates, both career consular officers and FSO spouses employed as consular assistants.

This had nothing to do with me. I was Political Counselor, and this was in the Consular section; these staff members would go to the DCM and complain. I may have been acting DCM part of the time.

It also turned out that the fellow had evaded getting a medical clearance for his wife to come to Delhi. She would not have been cleared because she was a very serious alcoholic, and home all the time. She would bribe her servants to get alcohol for her. Our Embassy doctors were not supposed to take care of her because she had come out without a medical clearance. At the same time she was an American and she was a sick person. But this fellow successfully stopped every attempt to get him out of there so his wife could be treated. They would appeal on the basis of prejudice. From the standpoint of the officers in the Consular Section, this man wasn't doing his job, so they couldn't do theirs properly.

Delhi was a large post with a number of highly competent black officers from State, USIS, AID and so forth. What it demonstrated to me was that if you depart from a single standard for admission, and you bring people in other ways, when you have had a single standard that's worked pretty well -- you're not doing the privileged individual any kindness. It isn't just the question of bringing in someone slightly less efficient, it affects a lot of people around them. This was a melancholy situation, this woman drinking herself to death, a guy not doing his job, and many people affected professionally, personally and even emotionally by this.

Q: There was a large AID presence there and a big CIA station. How did all these groups interact and how did things work, you had people buying books for the Library of Congress, all this stuff?

LEVIN: The Library of Congress office that bought books and also provided American materials was very good. They traveled around and they were responsible folks. That was a well-run operation, favorably regarded in the region.

The AID mission was relatively small. India doesn't have a shortage of trained people. Therefore, it wasn't necessary to have a large number of American technicians. You could hire good Indian technicians. The handling of funds and the decision making on the projects required Americans. There were also high quality Indian staff who were employees within the AID mission itself.

It was a well-run mission, it was responsive, we worked with them. They would drop by if they were thinking of doing something and ask if there were any political problems or other factors that they should take into account. We would go to them if we were going to have a traveler calling on provincial officials, looking into local politics and ask AID about projects in that area and what should we know about them. I would say that was a good relationship with the AID mission. I don't think they were at all uncomfortable with their role as an instrument of U.S. foreign policy, albeit of a longer range and more public nature than other U.S. Government activities in India.

When I arrived there Mrs. Gandhi was out of office, having disgraced herself, by declaring "The Emergency," with her undemocratic activities. The government that was in office fell in a parliamentary way by losing a vote of confidence. India was going to vote. In a country as large as India, with paper ballots and an historically strong commitment to honest ballot counting and handling, it takes a while to get the ballots printed and to get them distributed. In the interim there was a caretaker government. In Britain or Japan, this might be for only a few weeks. In India, it actually takes a few months to get this all cranked up. Indians know how to do it and they do it well but it takes time.

The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, Christmas '79, took place while this caretaker government was in office. The politicians were out in the provinces electioneering to become the government. Therefore, a lot of important decisions were actually being made by the career Indian civil servants. During this period the embassy got along with these career ICS officials very well. We well knew that when there were governments in power in India that felt their interests were served by being highly critical of the United States and internationally noncooperative, the Indian civil servants would do their job and support that. What this '79 interlude demonstrated was that if there ever was a government that leaned the other way, the ICS would support that.

What was illuminating was that here the ICS was kind of left on its own and they were in many areas quite cooperative with the U.S. One could ask, why be surprised? If the ICS could send their kids abroad for education they didn't send them to Moscow, they sent them to the United States. Nevertheless, it was a positive moment, considering that the usual dialogue with the Indians is not without problems.

My point is that after the Russians went into Afghanistan, the responses of the Indian government were pretty much determined by the senior civil service; the career military, intelligence, and foreign ministry officials across the board were extremely cooperative. India had developed an intimate relationship with the Soviet Union, because they did not have good relations with China, had eternal quarrels with Pakistan, and therefore they cultivated the Soviet Union to give them a powerful friend in the region.

The specter of the Russian army in the Khyber Pass was as frightening to the Indians as it was to the Pakistanis. The Indian military told the Pakistani military, if you want to move your troops from the Indian border to the Afghan border, we will pull back from the Pakistan border so that you will know nothing could possibly happen there. The Indian military was very concerned about the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

Indian intelligence was also cooperative with us. But when Mrs. Gandhi won the election and came into office, this turned completely around within 24 hours. The Indian Permanent Representative in the United Nations gave a pro-Soviet speech about how this move into Afghanistan was understandable and necessary; India just flipped the other way very fast.

You could say, India is a democracy, they're supposed to obey their elected leadership. But this also suggested something about Mrs. Gandhi and her long term ruling group's view of the world, their view of where India's interests lie. She came into office having thought through what she was going to do. And so things became normally acrimonious with the U.S. again. I make no pretense of keeping up with Indian internal politics but noticed that India banned our supply flights to the Middle East during the Iraq-Kuwait war despite UN resolutions so I wonder if anything fundamental has changed.

ALBERT A. THIBAUT, JR.
Political Officer
New Delhi (1979-1983)

Albert A. Thibault, Jr. was born in Massachusetts on August 5, 1941. He received his BA from the University of Windsor in Canada in 1962, his MA from the University of Toronto in 1963, and another MA from the University of Pennsylvania in 1964. He entered the Foreign Service in 1969. His career has included positions in Guinea, Sri Lanka, Pakistan, India, Nepal, and Saudi Arabia.

Q: You went out, then, to India. I take it you went to India in '79?

THIBAUT: In summer of '79, yes. I was there for four years, from summer of '79 to summer of '83.

Q: What were relations like with India when you arrived in '79?

THIBAUT: I was political officer again in the section, again covering domestic, domestic politics, in a much larger section than I had had in Colombo. As I arrived, we were in the final months of the Desai government. He had been displaced and one of his colleagues in the cabinet, a man by the name of Charan Singh, became prime minister, with elections scheduled to be held in January. He was presiding over an interim government, a caretaker government. So this was a time of politicking. So Mrs. Gandhi was then campaigning and we got early exposure to her line of thinking because she was critical of the government for cozying up to the Americans. Then of course, in November, I believe, the Soviets moved into Afghanistan.

Q: Actually, I think it was Christmas, around Christmas.

THIBAUT: Christmas, yes, could be.

Q: Yeah, November was the hostage crisis in Iran.

THIBAUT: Shortly before that, Ambassador Spike Dubs was killed in Kabul. By the way, he had been deputy assistant secretary for South Asia in NEA. So he was very well known in our office and a great guy. The impact of his murder was just devastating in Kabul. That was before the Soviets moved in. Yeah, Christmas, I guess it was. Christmas of '79, when the Soviets occupied Kabul and Spike was killed just a few months before that, a short time before that. Then the Indian election itself was held within two or three weeks of the Soviet occupation and Mrs. Gandhi won overwhelmingly. A real seesaw: She had been so dominant during the Emergency, was just swept out of office, left with only a handful of seats in Parliament and then came back with an overwhelming majority. So it's a reflection of how dissatisfied the public was with the Desai government. And then she made comments about the Soviet occupation which just aroused tremendous anger in the United States. A very understanding and soft response to the occupation of a neighboring country, after all, just nearby, by a superpower. And that, as I say, fed into the very negative climate that had been longstanding so far as public opinion and Congressional opinion towards India were concerned. A lot of it was focused on Mrs. Gandhi, the new prime minister. She tried then to backpedal in later statements. The one I'm mentioning was at the United Nations, by a UN representative. But it was very difficult. It set the tone. I mean her attitude was confrontational and during the campaign she wrapped herself in this mantle of nationalism, Indian nationalism, and was highly critical of India's neighbors for "making eyes", which is an expression in Hindi, towards the United States. She singled out a small country like Bhutan. I can't imagine a smaller country than Bhutan and yet it was depicted as a threat to Indian security. Yet, India, by treaty, controlled Bhutanese foreign policy, literally. That's the kind of rhetoric she was willing to engage in.

Q: How did the Iranian takeover of our embassy and the Iranian revolution play in India? You were in place by that time.

THIBAULT: That may have taken place a little earlier. That was in '78, wasn't it, '78 or '79?

Q: The revolution was '78ish. The takeover of the embassy was in November '79. Shortly thereafter was the burning of our embassy in Islamabad.

THIBAULT: That was in 1980. That was after the attack on the Great Mosque in Mecca. There was no sympathy towards the Khomeini government in India. There was a concern as to what it meant for Islamic opinion in India. After all, India has the second largest population of Muslims after Indonesia. So there's always a concern about what Indian Muslim opinion might be. Now the Iranians are Shias; most Indian Muslims are Sunnis. So there was certainly no endorsement or hailing of the Embassy seizure. It was a clear violation of diplomatic status of the embassy, holding of hostages. That said, they were not inclined to be critical of the Iranians in any public comments. They deplored, they'd regret, they'd call for a resolution of the issue, but no strong condemnation. Again, I think, reflecting uncertainty over Indian Muslim opinion as well. But as I said this was quickly overshadowed by the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan.

Q: Indira Gandhi made mollifying remarks about Soviet actions and all that. But what about in actuality? During the time you were there, how were the Indians, as we could sound it, feeling about the Soviets moving into that area?

THIBAULT: Well, the media generally took their lead from the government. One of the striking contrasts between my time in India in the early Eighties and my time in India in the early two thousands was how much the media had changed. But at that time the Indian media followed their government's line quite closely. The commentators, who are quite influential in India, all tended to echo the government, to some extent. There were some exceptions, but generally speaking.

Q: Is there any particular reason for this? Are they paid?

THIBAULT: I think there was a feeling that the Soviets were longstanding friends. The Treaty of Friendship had been very helpful to India after the war with Pakistan in the early Seventies. The Soviets had been willing to provide arms to India when we were providing arms to Pakistan. There was a feeling that the Soviets were a dependable friend of India and this attitude led to a soft-pedaling of their comments on the Soviet action. That said, there was absolutely no enthusiasm for the occupation of Afghanistan and very considerable concern with what it could mean over the longer term for India itself and for its impact on Pakistan, and therefore also its impact on the Pakistan-U.S. relationship. So as they worked this out, there was very real discomfort with the Soviet occupation, particularly since it gave us a handle or leverage and a rationale for turning our relations with Pakistan around and for beginning to develop a military supply relationship. And that sort of, in their view, brought the Cold War closer to their borders than had been the case before. But as I say, their public line was relatively muted.

Q: How did you find dealing with the Indian government? You know, at your level. And with the media and movers and shakers.

THIBAULT: I didn't deal much, being focused on domestic politics, with the foreign ministry or the government ministries. I spent a lot of time with Indian politicians, journalists. Our consular district for Delhi was, and still is, northern India. So I often traveled with the ambassador and others and by myself to neighboring states. And at the personal level, there was very rarely any of this tension that existed between the two governments, from my earliest exposure to India to the present. There's no connection between them. People would relate to you on a personal basis. Having access to them was not a problem. They'd often be flattered that an American diplomat was seeking them out and seeking their views. So that was never an issue, that was never an issue.

Q: Who were the ambassadors?

THIBAULT: The first ambassador when I was there was Ambassador Robert Goheen, former president of Princeton, who was born in India of missionary parents. In fact he was very proud that when his children were there they were the fifth generation of the family to have an experience in India. His family had first come in the 1860's or '70's. But he was appointed by President Carter. The second ambassador was Ambassador Harry Barnes, a career ambassador, the first career ambassador, in fact one of the few career ambassadors we've had to India since relations were established there.

Q: How did you see him? How did he help us?

THIBAULT: Which one? Goheen or Barnes?

Q: Barnes.

THIBAULT: Barnes was very, was extremely active. And being well aware of the sort of the big issues that stymied relations between Washington and Delhi, he set out to identify areas of cooperation which previous ambassadors had not emphasized. So in scientific collaboration, in education, in culture and generally in non-political areas, he sought to begin a process of interaction across a whole range of significant members of the elite, to the extent that that was possible. He was very successful in getting funding for this approach and in launching these through bilateral agreements at the technical level and India was a very fertile field for that. So that was his emphasis. I should add he's an excellent, in fact an outstanding, linguist. So he made it a point of learning Hindi. He was very visible, traveled extensively. He was an outstanding ambassador.

Q: Were you seeing, or was it indeed a fact, there were a good number of the young people in India, the educated group, were going to the United States, as opposed to going to say the UK or somewhere else like that? Or was that happening?

THIBAULT: That was happening, significantly. There was a tremendous demand for education in the United States. I remember well, to harken back to my previous stint as desk officer, when Prime Minister Morarji Desai came to Washington, of course we prepared all the briefing papers, these were for meetings at the White House. Then the first, or I don't know about the first, but one of the issues that he raised was student visas. I wasn't present but my office director told me that President Carter and the U.S. officials at the table were taken aback - there was nothing in the briefing papers about that. And it was sort of a mark of Desai's quirkiness; he hadn't told anyone in his own entourage he would raise it. They were all staring at him. What the hell is this about student visas? And then he launched into a long explanation of how a consular officer in Madras, today Chennai, was systematically denying visas to worthy Indians. The President, believe me, worked fast to inquire what was going on. What happened was, the consular officer, someone in his late fifties for whom it was his second tour and his last assignment was claiming that all the Indians were intending immigrants, had no intention of returning, and denying visas wholesale. I was later on the Board of Examiners and, as I recall, I don't think there's an age cutoff for new officers.

Q: No, there isn't but you have to be able to complete two tours.

THIBAULT: Well, but I mean he was in sort of the, he was retiring after his second tour. He just didn't like being in India. The result of this arbitrariness coming to the President's personal attention was actually extremely beneficial for the longer term because it was made very clear to him, and more generally, that it was not appropriate for him and others to assert, in effect, that "You're studying computer science, or you're studying dentistry or electrical engineering, and you know that these jobs, most of these degrees don't exist in India or don't pay well, so therefore your true intention must be to remain in the United States." Today our presumption is different, and it was clarified as a result of this incident, namely that it is not a legitimate question to ask or assumption to make in judging the visa applicant. But it reflected, as I say, this tremendous pressure to study in the United States. Most of these young people, young men but there were many women as well, came from well established families from all over India. So they were an important, if you will, part of a pro-American constituency.

Q: All right, let's do something off of this. Students get a look at us and we're a very attractive country.

THIBAULT: And the fact is, of course, many, many, many of them remained in the United States and the Indian-American community now is quite large, and we have reaped the benefit of this twenty years later, if I can fast-forward. Because they're now quite influential in our own society, in our own economy, and they are a real bulwark of the U.S.-India relationship but this was not so obvious then. More broadly, consular officers are typically the first point of contact between the United States and local people. That, too, is not always recognized. So the guidelines reminding officers of what are the appropriate assumptions to make which they receive from the Consular section chief and from the mission leadership as a whole are really critical because that impact, that initial interaction, has ripple effects many, many times over than just the one-on-one discussion with an individual visa applicant.

Q: And, unfortunately, we're going through a very bad patch, now, the security thing and we're shooting ourselves in the foot in the Arab world with this. Well, did you find as went around the political parties, what were they, were there real issues or were this jockeying for positions of influence or jobs or not?

THIBAULT: Among the political parties? Well, the Indian parties for the most part are well established and have been there a long time and they tend to be identified with either particular areas of the country or particular interest groups. At that time the Congress Party, led by the Prime Minister, Indira Gandhi, was the dominant influence, inherited from the time of the independence movement. Most of the parties there were sort of split-offs from Congress, had split off over time, their leaders had set up their own groups, or they were regional parties, which are important in India. So, yeah, they had genuine and well established differences, based on those interests. But what was more important was their commitment to the democratic process and system. For India, that is really crucial, given the diversity of the country, that this is how you reconcile policy questions and issues, through a process of democratic mediation in which the opposition has a legitimate and respected role, that they are very free to criticize, to offer their own ideas and that they have access to the media and to the public channels of communication. That was all there.

The one group that was particularly influential and just strenuously anti-American was the Communist Party of India. Again, there are several communist parties and one is called the CPI-ML, Marxist Leninist, who were prominent in Bengal, much easier to deal with. But this Communist Party of India was the pro-Soviet party and their relationship with the Soviets through the Soviet embassy and the Soviet cultural center and so-called Friendship Societies, was very powerful. And they had newspapers, one particularly, called the Patriot, which were subsidized by the Soviets and we could see that. The minute the Soviet Union collapsed and this support ended, the paper folded. Suddenly the CPI, which still exists became a relatively tiny, tinny voice compared to what it had been before.

I particularly single them out and remember them because they mounted a specific campaign to deny the assignment of our new political counselor, who would have been my boss as section head, a fellow by the name of George Griffin. George had served in Calcutta in 1970-71, at the time of the East Pakistan War. The claim, again, had been made by communists, not by anyone else, that he was in touch with Pakistanis trying to undermine the Indian policy in what was then East Pakistan, what is today Bangladesh. At the time, in 1980, he was in Kabul, Afghanistan. We had not yet broken relations with the Kabul government. But his family was living in Delhi and he was stationed in Kabul as a political officer and periodically he would visit his family in Delhi as there were direct flights between Delhi and Kabul. So based on his experience, his knowledge of the region, the fact that he's a very fine officer, the Bureau decided he should be assigned as political counselor in Delhi, which made a lot of sense. When that became known, a tremendous press campaign against George Griffin was mounted, in which he was depicted as a CIA agent out to subvert the Indians. Here, it was claimed, he had been subverting them, subverting India in Calcutta, here he was conspiring with reactionary forces in Kabul and now he was going to play the same game in Delhi itself. It finally became such a drumbeat that the government specifically asked that he not be assigned, refused to accredit him as political counselor, before he arrived. We retaliated, we responded by denying then their assignment of a political counselor but it left a very bad taste in peoples' mouths. But the communists were a very loud, very vocal, and very anti-American element in the political spectrum.

Q: Did you have, see a problem from time to time that the Indians and the Americans tend to preach at each other. They're both, in some ways they preach past each other.

THIBAULT: Oh, that's been a consistent feature of our relationship. Again, excepting the last few years and when we get to that point in our dialogue, we'll have to discuss it.

Q: They've really changed.

THIBAULT: They've really changed but for a long time, for a long time, that was absolutely the case, absolutely the case, yeah.

Q: Well, did you notice this? Was there a way of getting around this or did you have to sort of listen to the sermon before you could get to the point?

THIBAULT: Well, I heard plenty of this in Delhi and traveling around northern India but you would never let these things go unanswered. Not that you would respond with a sermon of your own, but to whatever the kernel of their complaint was, you - at least my approach was - sought to address that, so that they would understand that there's a rebuttal, if you will. It varied a lot depending on the individual and maybe even categories of individuals. If you were with the politicians, you found much less of it. They were pragmatists who had survived a lot to be where they were. The journalists, on the other hand, tended to be the lecturing type and of course there were the academics, but also many plain citizens would sound off.

Q: How about the academic connection. In so many places, academia, including the United States, seems to be the last refuge of the theoretical Marxists, of the sort of anti-American line of thought. Was that evident?

THIBAULT: There was plenty of that. Particularly since there were a lot of newspapers in Delhi and in other major cities, all in English. They had to fill those pages and there's always an editorial page. So academics were often called on to contribute their thinking to that. And so when the issues were on international affairs there was very often an anti-American tinge to that or, as they would phrase it, a "non-aligned" perspective.

Q: What was the situation as regards the Sikhs? Was that the Punjab? Because this later cost the prime minister her life. But how did the situation, while you were there, how did we see this?

THIBAULT: Punjab was part of my beat, if you will, and I often went there, up to Amritsar and Jullundur, occasionally to Chandigarh, the state capital, but that's just an artificial town, or it was at that time. I heard a lot of grievance against Mrs. Gandhi, sort of against the system. A feeling that Sikhs were discriminated against. A lot of it were echoes of what I had heard in Sri Lanka from Tamils. But this was several years before so many Sikhs moved into an extremist and very violent phase. It's just a reminder that you have to be very careful in dealing with minorities, in any society. In many ways, it was hard to understand their grievance. Sikhs are among the most prosperous Indians and Punjab is among the most prosperous states in India. Also the Sikhs, unlike the Tamils in Sri Lanka, have long exercised a role and had a visibility on the national scene out of proportion to their numbers. The national government had always gone out of its way to accommodate the Sikhs, such as by creating a Sikh majority state, and this with very little public or Hindu opposition.

A lot of it was wrapped up in internal Sikh politics and again, just as in Sri Lanka, where the Buddhist monks were the seedbed of a lot of this very aggressive form of Sinhalese nationalism, and likewise the mullahs in Islamic countries, in the Sikh environment, the Sikh religious men and holy men - technically there's no priesthood for Sikhs - were very active. And then of course you had political factions. You had Sikhs aligned with the Congress Party and you had other Sikhs who were against it. And you know in poor countries where politics is a zero-sum game in many cases, any advantage to you is at the expense of someone else. And so unless you're careful in how you manage this and unless you're inclusive as well, you can generate a lot of resentment and a sense of grievance. And I think this is what happened in Punjab.

Q: At this time and again we're talking up to '83, did the expatriate Sikh communities in Canada or the United States play any role?

THIBAULT: No, that would be, that was after, particularly after the Indian siege on the Golden Temple, which I believe was in '83. So that event really generated enormous resentment overseas. And again, the Tamil parallel is striking, because your most militant Tamils, so far as Sri Lanka is concerned, typically are the ones who tend to be overseas and provide the funding and the support, like the Irish in America for the IRA.

Q: And other groups. And, of course, the Sikhs and the Tamils killed two Gandhis.

THIBAULT: Two Gandhis, that's right.

Q: You were there when Ronald Reagan came in.

THIBAULT: He was in '81, yes, right.

Q: Do you recall, how was he portrayed? This is kind of a shocker to people, a movie actor and all this, all of a sudden president of the United States, coming out of the right wing. Now it's not as extreme right wing as we see today, but in those days it was the extreme right wing of the Republican Party. Is this in a way a problem to explain it or is this a matter of concern, or what?

THIBAULT: I think there was a shock, after Carter, who, as I say, personally had made gestures reaching out to India that Reagan would succeed him. That said, Mrs. Gandhi was very much a pragmatist and she did not make any special effort to criticize, if you will, our new choice of a president. There was concern that the Republican administration would provide more arms to Pakistan. That's really the touchstone of the U.S.-India relationship.

Q: Well it seems the Democrats give money or are more friendly to India, Republicans more to Pakistan. It's not really true, THIBAULT: No, it's not true.

Q: But it's one of those political urban legends.

THIBAULT: That's right. In fact historically, and I think many Indians will tell you this, now, that relations with the United States have been best under Republican administrations. And, surprisingly enough, that was the case with Reagan, as well because he acted to put Tarapur behind us. Remember I mentioned that this had been the sore point when Carter and Desai met. They had been unable to resolve it, in spite of all the flowery expressions of good will and personal admiration and so forth and so the issue just floundered there, poisoning the relationship. To Reagan's credit, he said, "We gotta do something about it" and in a very short period of time we came up with a policy whereby we stepped out of the picture, the French stepped in, and we didn't continue insisting on safeguards for their reactors even though we had stopped supplying fuel, which had been the line beforehand. I mean the nonproliferation theologians populated the Democratic administration and were much more muted during the Republican administration. That made a significant impact and there was also a very good meeting between Reagan and Mrs. Gandhi at Cancun.

Q: I talked to, I think it was Steve Eisenbraun and Steve was in Washington, describing the work that went into a Gandhi-Reagan meeting. The idea being that Ronald Reagan could charm, I won't say the pants off anyone, it's not true but anyway he's a real charmer and it was genuine. The thought, you know, let's sort of let these two get together and it worked at the time.

THIBAULT: It worked and Mrs. Gandhi herself, who made a very successful visit to Washington, could be equally charming. And again, coming back to Harry Barnes, who was Reagan's ambassador in New Delhi, as I said, Harry's concept was to identify specific areas for cooperation. He was doing this, to a major extent he was giving the lead to this but the administration was prepared to follow him, or at least it was a give and take with the administration, saying why don't we try this. Now this had never happened with Carter. And then the shock of the Afghanistan issue had died down, we had overcome it. And then, of course, Mrs. Gandhi died in '84, when Reagan was still president.

Q: Had we started getting very close to Pakistan and arming the mujahideen in Afghanistan while you were on this tour in India?

THIBAULT: We had. After the invasion of Afghanistan the administration had sent out two envoys. One was Clark Clifford to New Delhi and the other was Zbigniew Brzezinski to Pakistan.

The Pakistanis were as much under the nuclear gun as the Indians were and we had terminated our military and arms supply relationship with them under the Symington Amendment, as we had for India. Not that we had had any with India and therefore the impact was all the greater for Pakistan. But we reversed this on a dime when, after the Soviet invasion, both in Congress and in the administration, the view was we had to work with General Zia, the president, the dictator of Pakistan. So Brzezinski came out. He offered $400 million worth of military assistance. Zia became famous for rejecting this, saying it was peanuts, given the risks that Pakistan was asked to assume in confronting a superpower in the neighboring territory. So we went back to the drawing board and we agreed to what the Pakistanis really wanted, which was F-16's, which was then a more powerful, potent aircraft than what India had. So this created enormous uproar in India. This was in '80, '81. The covert dimension of the relationship with Pakistan, which was led by the Agency, I think developed more in the mid-Eighties, '84, '85, '86, with Pakistan. By definition, that was very much less visible than had been the case before. By that time we had a new prime minister in India, anyway, Rajiv Gandhi, the son of Indira, who was much less abrasive than his mother had been and represented a new generation, very much a difference in tone than had been the case earlier.

Q: Well one more question on this period. Did Kashmir play any role while you were there?

THIBAULT: Other than being just a longstanding issue, no I don't recall that it was an element we followed closely or impacted the bilateral relationship. The militants who, to this day, infiltrate and attack in Indian Kashmir itself were not a factor at that time. So, no, I would not say it was.

From Delhi I went to Karachi, Pakistan.

J. MICHAEL SPRINGMANN
Foreign Commercial Service
New Delhi (1980-1982)

Mr. Springmann transferred to the Foreign Service from the Commerce Department and served in Stuttgart, New Delhi, Jeddah and in Washington, DC in the Bureau of Intelligence and Research. This interview was conducted in March of 1994.

Q: Well, coming from this rather unpromising thing, when you went out to India you were one of the first commercial...

SPRINGMANN: I was the first commercial officer.

Q: How were you received there? And what was the setup at the embassy?

SPRINGMANN: Well, it was kind of a mess actually. Ambassador Goheen left shortly after I arrived, and the new guy, Harry Barnes, came in with the idea there was nothing bad in India, we're going accentuate the positive and eliminate the negative. The way he ran the embassy was to have an inner-circle staff meeting which was basically the political counselor and economic counselor, and the guy from USIS, and I guess Priscilla Bouton from AID too. And then following this meeting they would have a major meeting of all the section heads at the embassy (which was quite a lot). And I think this is more for show than anything else because I got the impression the real meeting was prior to this big staff meeting.

Q: Well, this is normal management. I mean, you want to get the information out, but you really have to have the operating council.

SPRINGMANN: There was a certain amount of resentment that the commercial counselor wasn't in the inner-circle. Commerce always felt, and I to some extent felt, that you were not really entirely accepted by State. In practice, I think one of the reasons why they excluded the commercial counselor was the guy had serious problems.

Q: Who was this?

SPRINGMANN: Edward W.M. Bryant. I had been warned about him by the commercial attaché in Bonn before I left Washington to go out there. He said he had worked with him before, and it was the only place where he had ever broken a tour because of personality conflicts with this guy. When I got there he was all smiles at first, and then I found out that he was leaving classified material on the secretary's desk after she went home at night so she would get a security violation because he didn't like her. People started asking me, have you gone down to the communications section to get the cable traffic so you could find out what was going on in your own section. I said, I hadn't gotten to that yet but I do feel excluded. He worked directly with the local staff, bypassed me entirely. Then I started hearing from the defense attaché's office, and the CIA Station, and from a couple of embassies around town, that this guy was altogether too tight with certain corrupt Indian business men. And I started keeping my eyes open and found out that he was giving these grossly inflated evaluations -- something called World Traders Data Report, which is a government Dun & Bradstreet report for businesses doing business in other parts of the world. It's a service of the U.S. government. And one of these corrupt local business men was a known Russian agent and a conduit for Soviet black money in India. I started to rewrite these things because this was my job at the time and he went through the ceiling, and screamed and yelled and carried on. And eventually had a summit, in which I was not a participant, between him, the econ counselor, and the head of the CIA station. Afterwards, we were toning these reports down considerably, and weaving enough in enough of the truth so that a savvy American business man could read between the lines, that Mr. X had major business dealings with state owned concerns in Czechoslovakia, Hungary, the Soviet Union, and if they were smart enough they would stay away from these guys.

Q: In this unpromising atmosphere, what were you doing?

SPRINGMANN: Not a whole hell of a lot. I wanted to go out and travel, and they really didn't want me to do that. I did get a couple of trips out and talked to local business men. I tried to do some reporting on my own. And, again, much like I was in Commerce, I was sort of sitting in the corner marking time, and tried to break out of it as best I could.

Q: What was the Indian market for American goods?

SPRINGMANN: Not all that good. The Indians at the time had major restrictions on imports. For example, heart pacemakers required permission of some government agency before they could be imported. Their idea was to save foreign exchange, and to promote production of similar products among Indian businesses to try to lift them up by their boot straps. You could get stuff into the country if you, for example, wanted to set up a hotel downtown, and you wanted to import milkshake mixers, bake ovens, and whatever, because this was a service that foreign tourists expected and were used to in their own countries and wanted to see this in India. And this was a major foreign exchange earner for the country once the hotel was up and running, so they could get permission to bring the stuff in. But by and large it had to be something that the Indians didn't make themselves. At the time the Indians were promoting a lot of investment, hey, we have the largest pool of trained manpower in the world; we're the second largest democracy in the world, and on and on.

And Harry Barnes got into this, and started pushing with the second commercial counselor, Hal Lucius, to promote American investment in India, and to promote Indian investment in the United States, and do everything possible to say India is the greatest country in the world, bar none, which flew in the face of reality. It got to the point where they weren't reporting the truth about India to Washington, and as I heard a couple years later, the Defense Attaché opened up his own back channel to Washington to let the Defense Department know exactly what the hell was going on in the country.

Q: Were there trade fairs, and things like that?

SPRINGMANN: Not really. The Indian market wasn't big enough, or sophisticated enough for that. They occasionally would have a catalogue show where American companies would send literature about their products to the embassy, and we would find space in a hotel, or in USIS's America House downtown. And they would occasionally send over an American industry trade expert to answer questions. But by and large it was mostly personal contact with Indian firms who were interested in the few American products they could import. Or it was hand-holding for American companies who were coming over trying to find an honest, capable agent. Or it was doing these World Trader's Data Reports trying to find a company as a suitable contact for an American firm.

Q: Would you find that the Indian bureaucracy was difficult to deal with, or not?

SPRINGMANN: We didn't deal all that much with the Indian bureaucracy except once there was a major trade complaint where an American firm claimed it was being screwed out of a major contract with the Indian government. Somebody was bribing government employees, and that came to naught, but we did have a couple meetings with government officials. We also had a lot of complaints about tourists that the consular section couldn't resolve, essentially, that they had paid for something downtown and it hadn't been shipped a year later. And the local who dealt with this didn't really want to make waves with her countrymen. I finally pushed and pushed her and got her mad as hell, and I said, look, tell these guys that they're going to resolve this thing to everybody's satisfaction, or we're going to do a WTDR -- World Trader's Data Report -- on the company, and as one section of it on whether to recommend it to American businesses, we're going to line out this complete problem that they're having with Mr. X in Iowa., and to tell the firm that it's business with American firms or tourists would likely dry up. And she hated it, and I sent the threats out and it proved marvelous, it resolved the issues in short order.

Q: Indian-American relations are always touchy. Did we find that decisions about allowing commerce into India, was this purely economic, or was the feeling sometimes there were political calculations?

SPRINGMANN: Oh, it was political. This is what Barnes was trying to do. He was trying to show the Indians we really want to be your buddies, and to do this we're going to eliminate negative reports about your country, and we're going to be circumspect about what we tell business men about your country. And they were organizing reverse trade missions of Indians to tour the United States to promote what a great place the Subcontinent was to do business. And, of course, Indians who had seen India and had gotten the hell out, were the most vicious, and the most vocal, of critics of this policy, aside from me, and the science counselor, or the econ counselor.

Q: It's always one of the big problems that there's always the commercial and the political side. The political side wants to show, it's always handy if you can show your country is a good market for goods. Whereas, the commercial side, we want to sell. In a way, I suppose, at least from a Congressional point of view, the genesis of the reinstitution of the Foreign Commercial Service to give some teeth to the idea that we really want to sell abroad as opposed to we want to show that we're a big warm friendly type from the ambassador on down. But this wasn't working then.

SPRINGMANN: On the surface it was working. I mean, the Indians thought it was great, and the Americans who were getting a trip to India thought it was great, I guess up to a point. But I don't know that anything concrete ever came out of it, and when it came down to specifics...there was one case where the ambassador would not weigh in, neither he nor Marion Creekmore, who became Deputy Assistant Secretary for Near East and South Asia. There was an American company involved with a local Indian firm, and they made solar products, and they had worked up a number of things that would be good for the Indian market -- for example, a solar powered water pump for villages that were no where near an electric line, which was a lot of villages in India. And they wanted help from the American embassy in dealing with the Indian government. Apparently there was a provision where you could get a subsidy if you brought in foreign technology, and adapted to Indian conditions, and got an Indian firm to manufacture the stuff, all of which the American company had done. And they wanted help from the embassy in getting the stuff up and running, and out to the villages in India. And Creekmore and Barnes would not get involved with this. I'd even set up a demonstration in front of the embassy where their pump was connected to a hose in this lily pond in front of the building. And with the subsidy which the Indian government could give if it wanted to, it would have been a commercially viable proposition, and but for unexplained reasons, the Ambassador and DCM didn't want to get involved in a concrete example of commercial cooperation between India and the U.S.

Q: Why not?

SPRINGMANN: I've never gotten an explanation. Creekmore just wouldn't talk about it.

Q: How about Bryant?

SPRINGMANN: Bryant was gone by that time, and his successor, Hal Lucius, didn't want to get involved because he might have antagonized the Ambassador. (Hal wanted another promotion so he wouldn't be selected out.) And I just threw up my hands and said, look, we're here to do stuff for American businesses. This is a concrete example of what we can do, it's not splashy, it doesn't make the front page of the newspaper but it gets stuff done, and improves everybody's lot. Still, nothing was ever done.

Q: Were the Japanese doing much better than we were, or not?

SPRINGMANN: I didn't see all that many Japanese there at all. The competition apparently was French, and there was all this grumbling about, oh, these French are bribing the Indians, they're doing this, or they're doing that. And basically the French were getting in and finding who the hell they could contact, and greasing his palm, and getting the stuff done.

Q: By this time Congress had passed laws making a criminal activity for American firms to bribe foreign officials. What was your impression of what this was doing to American business practices.

SPRINGMANN: People who followed them literally got no where, people who were smart and who let their Indian agent deal with this, and kept themselves at arm's length, got things done. Monroe Aderhold apparently wrote an analysis of this that he said pissed off Senator William Proxmire. As an example of how things worked, there was this one German business man who was very clever. He told me there are three kinds of bribes: the bribe that just reminds the official you're dealing with that you exist; there's the bribe for moving your papers from the bottom of the pile to the top of the pile; and there's the absolutely corrupt bribe where you pay somebody off to get a contract that by rights should have gone to somebody else. The German guy from MAN, Maschinenfabrik-Augsburg-Nuernberg, a major truck maker, was very clever. He had Indians on the payroll for various things, paying them for information from the inside, and he learned about a contract to bid on, one that his competitor would like as well. The German said, I can't forbid him not to sell this information to somebody else, it would just make him run all the faster to my competition. So he paid him to delay disseminating the information that he had just sold for a couple of weeks until MAN had prepared the necessary paperwork for its bid. I think this was incredibly clever and sophisticated.

Q: What would you tell American business men?

SPRINGMANN: Just that. That officially you're not supposed to do this. If your Indian agent does it without your knowledge, you're squeaky clean. And by and large this is a corrupt part of the world, and there are ways of getting things done that are not quite as legal as they might seem, but then they're not absolutely unlawful and immoral as some people would allege.

Q: Then you left there in about 1982.

SPRINGMANN: Yes, they jerked me out a year early because I had pissed off Bryant about his alleged corrupt activities and he apparently talked to Lucius and FCS management which pulled me out a year early. Eventually, I grieved this and won but I was back in DC.

MARY JO FURGAL
Assistant Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
Madras (1980-1983)

Ms. Furgal was born and raised in Illinois. She attended a number of colleges and universities in the US and Austria, including the University of Chicago, where she pursued Library Science Studies. She entered the USIA Foreign Service in 1978 and served as Cultural Affairs Officer in Colombo, Madras, Katmandu, Dhaka, Bucharest and Harare as well as in Washington, DC. Her assignments were primarily tandem assignments with her Foreign Service Officer husband. Ms. Furgal was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2008.

Q: Madras. Okay. Let's talk about Madras, '80 to '82?

FURGAL: '83

Q: '83. What was Madras like at that time?

FURGAL: Climatically, it was very hot but not that much different, I guess, from Sri Lanka. However, it was very much bigger than Sri Lanka. It was a very conservative city. It was the capital of the state of Tamil Nadu and the consular section at that time had the four southern states. There were four or five consulates in India at that time and USIS had four officers in Madras alone. It's gone back up to two or three now but a couple of years after I left it went down to three then to two and, at one point, I think they only had one. Of course that was after USIS was absorbed into the State Department. It's starting to build back up a little bit now.

Q: What were you doing there?

FURGAL: Well, I guess you could say I was an assistant cultural affairs officer at that time.

Q: In the first place, what about that tip of, southern tip of India? Where did it fit sort of politically? Was it- what was the political situation?

FURGAL: Well, it didn't have a communist government as the neighboring state of Kerala. Kerala was the only communist state in India at that time; that's intriguing because it also had the lowest birth rate and the highest literacy rate, especially for women. Of course, this was the '80s and McCarthyism was over by that time but politicians found that odd, the fact that the communist government seemed to be doing a slightly better job than India did in some of the other states.

Q: Well was that, you know, for us sitting there did we see that it's because they probably had a better government or?

FURGAL: It's a good question.

Q: Or was it cultural or?

FURGAL: I think the reasons are varied perhaps somewhat ethnically but also religiously. In addition to the Hindu majority, there was a sizable group of Syrian Christians down there. I don't know how the political section would answer your question but I was very junior at that time. I wasn't really that involved in political matters at post nor was I, before I joined the Foreign Service. I think probably that's one of the reasons that if we had been one big happy family at that time I probably wouldn't even have gone into the State Department; My interests and- my background were not in political or economic affairs; I had was always more interested in the cultural, educational and historical events

Q: Cultural side. Fair enough.

FURGAL: Student exchange type of programs.

Q: Well, who was consul general?

FURGAL: Doug Cochran.

Q: And how big was the post?

FURGAL: I think it was one of the smallest we were ever in. There were only 12 people and that was everybody from the one chap in the code room, whatever they called it at the time.

Q: Communicator.

FURGAL: Communicator, right. And this consul general had his own American secretary and we had four people in USIS. There was only one consular officer; maybe one and a half because the other half worked in other offices occasionally... So it was small.

Q: Well, what were you up to?

FURGAL: Well, mainly cultural and educational programs. I was lucky I survived because my late boss, who will remain nameless, was an alcoholic. He was only pulled out after the inspectors came to India and talked to the people in Embassy New Delhi. The inspectors happened to call the consular general one day when my boss was berating his secretary. She just burst into tears and he was finally removed but before that junior officers were just swinging in the wind... And if I hadn't been tenured I probably wouldn't have survived. He never came back from lunch sober. It was pretty bad.

Q: How does this work? I mean, was this sort of a conspiracy of silence or what?

FURGAL: I think so. One of the big differences we noticed after coming back to the U.S. for a couple of years and then going back out, was that there was a lot less drinking in the '90s I don't know how you found that but when we first went in, I was almost 40; being the oldest in the class, I was from that generation of women who had benefited from the change, i.e. that an officer could be married. You know how it was in the old days; if a woman married, she could not be an officer. That was one reason, among others, that I turned down my first chance to join USIA. In 1968, I was still single but I was dating at that time; years later we decided to try it again and it worked.

You'd have cocktails and you'd have wine and you'd have drinks after dinner. When we went back in '90, many people didn't drink or would just have wine with dinner; there wasn't the constant pressure or supply of alcohol - I think partially it was a social change in the United States also.

But we liked Madras, despite my problem boss. I had been an East Asian Studies major at the East West Center, which is probably the major reason I came into the State Department. I'd never even heard of such a career- that is, USIA or the Foreign Service, although I grew up in Chicago. We were lower middle class, I suppose, and no one in our family had ever had professional careers. I was the first girl to go to college so when one of my professors out at the East West Center said why don't you take the Foreign Service exam, I did and that's how it all started.

Q: Early 1980s, were we sort of treading water, did you feel, sort of culturally in India or were we doing something? What were we up to?

FURGAL: Well, the kind of work I did at that time emphasized cultural and educational exchange programs. The U.S. Government was still funding more of these programs than now. Now this was Madras and we're quite a distance from the capital in New Delhi. In New Delhi, even USIA would have gotten more involved in the political scene. My boss was pretty useless at that point. I think it was his last overseas tour; there were problems with his children and his wife was an enabler, in the current jargon. But my colleague left post a day early so he wouldn't have to say goodbye to him. On top of that, I had a dependent husband and this man was verbally abusive to my husband because he couldn't imagine a man letting a woman support him. We couldn't join the Madras Club because I was the officer and my husband was my dependent so we got in as associate members. But we had some very good Indian friends and we became involved in the local culture, picked up a love of Carnatic music and Bharata Natyam dancing. And we made useful contacts, that way. We also had an active Fulbright program and East West Center program, plus other long and short term exchanges I joined the Zonta Club, which is to women what the Elks and the Moose are to men They didn't let women join Rotary in those days. I met local "movers and shakers" that way, important contacts for future programs. I think my most significant accomplishment in Madras, the most long lasting, was in cooperation with the Fulbright office, in Delhi. We had a small one in Madras run by a very competent woman who eventually came over here and worked for the Academy for Educational Development here in DC; she ended up as their head... We put on a program that brought together important women leaders from a variety of groups doing social work, what educated and affluent Indian women did at the time. The Fulbright Commission in New Delhi sponsored a speaker, the local Fulbright Commission and USIS put on the program, and a rich local businessman sponsored a lunch and printed material. The end result was an organization called the Joint Action Council for Women, which eventually put up a shelter for battered women. It lasted for years after I left in '83, maybe good 15, 20 years. I'm not sure what it's called now and how it's working but it was the most successful project I was involved with in Madras.

Q: Were they having the situation in- where you were one reads about of women, you know, the husband's family essentially kills the wife after she's paid her dowry or something like that?

FURGAL: I don't think that happened as much in the south. You still hear about it occasionally in the north of the country but it's not as common now as it used to be... Indian women, for the past several decades are much more educated. There's an emerging middle class which is probably bigger than this country just because there's a billion people there. But I think in the rural areas there's still that kind of spousal abuse.

Q: Did you have a library?

FURGAL: Yes, yes, and we kept it open for quite awhile.

Q: How was it used?

FURGAL: Oh, very well. I can't tell you, how many times years later, Indians of all backgrounds would say to me that's where they first learned about the United States and realized what this country is all about. They were free to go into the American Center and use whatever they wanted and read whatever they wanted and the staff just left them alone. We used to joke about denying access to a British woman married to an Indian journalist who used to publish the diatribes against the United States. She'd come in and do her research in our library so we were a little amused and annoyed at the same time. Of course, nobody ever did; she was free to come and go. The library was very well used. That's why I felt bad when they started closing down the libraries in a lot of countries. We lost a good opportunity to inform and influence at the same time.

Q: I think we made a terrible mistake on cutting down on the whole cultural field because this is so important.

FURGAL: It depends on how you define "culture." I could go to a Chinese concert here but I'd still read the newspapers about their human rights record. So if you had to choose one thing, I would keep the student exchanges. Not that I disliked the other USIS programs; I did a lot of them over the years. We did the speaker programs through which professors from the U.S. would come overseas and lecture but those generally have a very short term appeal. It also depends on the professors; the exchanges can do them more good because they go back with an increased insight into whatever country they lectured in. But if I had to choose one or two programs which I'd prefer not to, I'd go for the long term student/ university exchanges and the American libraries rather than the one or two week programs..

Q: Yes. Did you find, having been in Sri Lanka, was there much of a Tamil connection? I mean, were the Tamils of India a different breed of cat in a way?

FURGAL: I'm sure that in the '70s and '80s there was a lot more sympathy for the Tamils in Sri Lanka than there is now. I'm not a foreign relations expert, as you know, and as some of the people you interview tend to be, but it seemed, at least among the people I knew, sophisticated English speakers of various ethnicities, the mood changed in the 1990s after Rajiv Gandhi was assassinated.

Q: Well he was assassinated by a Tamil down in that area.

FURGAL: - I was in the Maldives at that time, it happened when I was in Sri Lanka the second time and was accredited to the Maldives. But we visited India a lot because we had friends there and since we stayed in the subcontinent, we were able to visit on our own when we wanted to;. We spent holidays there in Madras with friends who would come down to Sri Lanka. Because of this frequent contact, we knew that opinions about the Tamils in general changed when Indira Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi were both killed.

Q: Despite the fact that you had a very difficult supervisor, how did you work? I mean, did you have to sort of avoid him? Was this sort of duck and run out of the office and find somewhere else to work?

FURGAL: Well, there were four of us as we also had a deputy branch PAO (Public Affairs Officer). - It worked out but we never really related professionally. - I remember only one time we actually sat down and chatted as two professionals would. I was probably not that much younger than him; he was probably in his 50s at that point and by the time I arrived, I was probably 41. But it was difficult, however, especially for my husband because he had been a professional; he had passed the Foreign Service exam, both the written and oral portions, and the Selection Board just hadn't gotten down to his name on the list.

Q: What was he doing there?

FURGAL: He taught social work for awhile at the school of social work in Madras. He's a very self sufficient sort but he became bored after a while; so he became a communicator just to get his foot in the door because he had done that kind of work in Vietnam. I was alone in Madras about a year and a half while he was in Kathmandu. The assignments panel placed him at least as close to India as they could. There's, maybe not now but then, there was a lot of lip service given to tandems and a lot of resentment of tandems also.

Q: Yes, I know. It was, at the beginning it was a difficult program for a lot of people to swallow.

FURGAL: I can imagine. I looked on the Oral History citation that you gave me to see what keywords would lead a future researcher to cultural relations or tandems, the areas I know more about. I imagine that your submissions are pretty heavily weighted toward political and economic officers. I suppose that's what most of the books are written about. I don't think anybody will find mine because I can't say too much about those issues.

Q: But we are, you know, who knows how people will look at this, but I have a certain bias and I've always felt that the cultural section, particularly if this is your program, the exchange program, but also the libraries and all have probably had more of an impact than- well, I won't say than any other but probably a longer lasting impact because I think we have a very good story to sell.

FURGAL: I quite agree. The libraries and the way people talk about them even now, what they had meant to them when they were young students, is very impressive and touching. Being a professional librarian before the Foreign Service, I guess I look at the libraries a little differently than other cultural affairs officers might. We tried to recruit a Fulbrighter to come as a librarian; the university libraries in South Asia needed and wanted professional assistance. Some of those libraries looked like the reject room at the Chicago Public Library; books were in such ragged shape. It's ironic because one of the most famous early librarians in the world was an Indian by the name of Ramanujan. In the early part of the last century, he had devised a unique method of cataloging books. It wasn't the Dewey or the Library of Congress systems, which are widely used now. An additional problem was that the Indian libraries were not well-funded.

Q: Well, you were there- during the time you were there did you get any feel for the students? Did you feel they were getting- university students particularly- did you feel they were getting a pretty good education or was it a mill or how did you- did you get any feel for this?

FURGAL: This was the early '80s but I think throughout the South Asian universities that we were familiar with, the best students would come out of the science and technology faculties. Now, this is before computers, by and large. There were excellent lecturers and professors in all faculties, i.e. the fine arts, languages, social sciences, history but they tended to attract students in the three-year B.A. Program. There was a four year honors program from which you had to graduate in order to get a Fulbright grant because the four-year program was comparable to our system. The three year programs tended to emphasize history and languages, subjects for use in their own system but the students from those faculties were not quite as competitive on an overall basis. The Indian Institutes of Technology (IIT) were on par with our institutes of technology, such as the Illinois Institute of Technology in Chicago But I'm not sure about MIT, (Massachusetts Institute of Technology, not being a scientist. Students from the IITs (Indian Institutes of Technology) mostly left India for further studies or employment. I had a yoga teacher who was the only one in his class who was still in Madras.

Q: How stood the computer at that time? As an instrument? Was there much of it or-?

FURGAL: I think what we had were Wangs and we had machines of some sort in the library but I'm not sure they were even computers.

Q: They were probably just essentially word processing.

FURGAL: Could be. I don't remember when I got my first computer overseas.

Q: Okay. Well then you left in '83?

FURGAL: Eighty-three.

MICHAEL PISTOR
Public Affairs Officer, USIS
New Delhi (1980-1984)

Mr. Pistor was born in Oregon and raised in Arizona. After graduating from the University of Arizona and serving with the US Army, in 1959 he joined the United States Information Agency. He served as Public Affairs Officer in Tehran, Kampala, Douala, London and New Delhi. He also held senior positions at USIA headquarters in Washington before being appointed Ambassador to Malawi in 1991. Ambassador Pistor was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: Then in 1980 you left.

PISTOR: In 1980 I left to go to a wonderful job, which was PAO in India.

Q: You did that from 1980 to?

PISTOR: To 1984, four years.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

PISTOR: When Shirley and I arrived, the ambassador was Robert Goheen, who'd been president of Princeton and had been born in India. He was very ill, so he stayed with us only a couple of months before he came back to the United States. . After an interim— we got very lucky and Harry Barnes was named as our ambassador. Harry Barnes is a dedicated officer who doesn't take 'no' or 'maybe' for an answer if he has his mind set on something.

I think he in a sense almost single-handedly brought Indians and Americans, each of whom had a lot to say about the other, together. It was a remarkable feat because the Indians have feelings about the United States that make it difficult to communicate clearly, and Americans certainly have those same feelings about Indians. This was true in the foreign affairs establishments in both countries, and Harry just cut through a lot of that, convincing his people in Washington, I think, that this was a serious country that needed to be treated a little differently than it had been. We also had the very good luck of having at that time an equally direct, effective career Ambassador to Pakistan, Ron Spiers.

Of course, we had couple of months, less than a year, left of Carter before we had the Reagan Administration. Somehow Mrs. Gandhi, who had just come back to power, sensed that it was necessary to warm up relationships with the United States a little more than they had been. She met President Reagan in Cancun early in his administration and actively flirted with him. It made good copy in the papers, batting her eyes and so forth, and he was a great charmer himself. So both countries, through the personalities of their leaders, decided that we'd have a friendlier, at least a less barbed, relationship than we had, muting the problems of Pakistan, China, Kashmir and the others. It was a remarkable time to be there and a good time for us to have an ambassador as active as we did with Harry Barnes.

In Pakistan, Ron Spiers talked candidly to the Pakistanis. I think maybe nobody had done that before. So having these two men who were, both of them, a little bit on the maverick side but both of them clearly intent on pursuing US policies vigorously and clearly, made our job some days entertaining, always interesting, and sometimes with that wonderful kind of frustration you get in India - impossible. The USIS program was a very large one, and remained a large program because of the rupee situation— they were running out, but we still had lots of this PL-480 money; it was in rupees and the idea was to spend it. This meant that the USIS programs in India weren't pinched. I don't think we were extravagant, but we were able to do things that we couldn't have done in other countries, where our program budgets had been steadily declining.

Q: What was the role of the Soviet Union during this period?

PISTOR: They still considered India really their best independent friend. The Indians felt themselves to be more independent of the Soviets than we thought. But it was fraying some. The goods that the Indians got from the Soviets weren't terribly good in their eyes, and the goods that the Soviets got from the Indians weren't all that good in their eyes. Neither country made terribly good toothpaste, for example. I think what it was was a formal and professed friendship, and the profession was stronger than the actuality, and the coolness between the United States and India was really less than its actuality. We found ourselves agreed more than we thought we would in a number of ways.

Q: In this '80-to-'84 period did any issues sort of come to a head between the United States and India that caused problems?

PISTOR: There was always the nuclear problem, and we were telling them, "Don't experiment, don't do this," until we heard that rumble. Also, there were always tensions between India and Pakistan which always drew us in some way, so there were tensions. But Mrs. Gandhi did try during this time to be friendlier than she had been to the United States and to not use us as an international whipping boy.

I think we too during that period were less testy than we had been with India. And Mrs. Gandhi was having an awful lot of increasing domestic problems. Punjab was on the boil. I finished my tour only two or three months before her assassination. That trouble in the north had been brewing for some time, and you could watch it happening, and the same thing was true with Kashmir, which was giving her terrible headaches. So while we had tensions, she was much more concerned about what was going on in her own country. She made a trip to the United States that was a pretty good one. I don't remember the time exactly. Again, she was trying to....

Q: There had been this Indira Gandhi and the Kissinger-Nixon team had never gotten along.

PISTOR: They'd never gotten along, and this was a time to put that behind us. Also, we had George Schultz as Secretary of State, who made the first Secretary of State visit in years, and George Bush as Vice President also made an Indian stop, and other dignitaries, Congressmen and Senators also made trips to India. They went to Pakistan as well, of course, but they made this Indian stop, so things were looking up in our relationship.

Q: What was your impression of dealing with the Indian media?

PISTOR: The Indian media during the time we were there was changing. The Indian magazines were getting better, and we thought that part of this was because our own magazine, Span, had shown the way for quality journalism.. India Today, a magazine modeled on Time, was objective and very well edited. Even the cheesier magazines, which remained cheesy in content, were less so in production. So things were getting better. The major newspapers, the ones we saw, were well written, but (unsurprisingly) contentious.

There was no overt censorship in India, press censorship, but there was this curious business that the international wires came into the Indian government which then decided what stories to put out on the wire in India. But the larger newspapers' editors and columnists and senior writers all got news from abroad. They were reading British and American papers, so you would find editorials about a big international subject that nobody else in India knew anything about. The government was able to limit the circulation of news it didn't or didn't like, by manipulating the flow through its official news service. Another device was the allotment of paper for newsprint. If a newspaper displeased the government, it could find its newsprint supply reduced, constricting its circulation and therefore its revenue. So while there wasn't formal censorship, there was a government hand in the preparation and dissemination of the news.

Q: Did you have any problems dealing with the media?

PISTOR: No. There were some editors and columnists I wouldn't trust as far as I could throw them, and there were others who were very trustworthy and very professional, sharp journalists, interesting, open minded and well informed.. They didn't all agree with one another, so it was an open and lively area. But there were some quite senior journalists whom you had to be very, very careful about, because they would stick the shiv in as readily as not.

Q: In some ways they were creatures of a different era.

PISTOR: You're exactly right. Some of these senior ones had been there throughout the Nehru and...

Q: Krishna Menon.

PISTOR: That's right. We used Krishna Menon and John Foster Dulles, who were very much alike, as examples. We used to say to Indian friends, "One reason our countries don't get along is that we are so closely related. We tend to have the same faults as well as the same virtues, so we're each preaching to the other and neither likes it." This is very true, and it's also one of the things that made it fun to be there. It was not only that the establishment was changing but the elder ones had been LSE....

Q: The London School of Economics, its influence was much worse than Marxism throughout the colonial world.

PISTOR: Well it's certainly stronger. Of course, Krishna Menon, for example, was one of the inventors of pocket editions, indeed Penguin Books, as a Londoner. Of course, I think I benefited from having been Student Affairs Officer in London in the '60s, getting a taste of Indian intellectual life at the LSE and elsewhere.

Q: Did you find yourself up against what the British would call the chattering class, the French call intellectuals, a group that not only talked a lot and played with ideas but also had some actual influence on the government? Did you find that in India?

PISTOR: Yes, but to a lessening degree because the new generation of the educated elite was more pragmatic, less Left-leaning than its elders, but also less sophisticated, less worldly in the European-American way. They had always been there in the Indian political mixture, but they were getting more and more vocal and stronger. And the chattering- class types weren't so much dying out as being less influential. I'd love to go back now and see how they're doing. Some members of the chattering class were more than entertaining; they were serious intellectuals. Some of the magazines reflected this. But they were often wrong and sometimes ignorant, a word they would never accept, ignorant about the United States. They tended to think of us as flawed Englishmen, as less sophisticated Englishmen, and they were dead wrong.

Q: How about the exchange program? This is particularly designed to get leaders who might have this erroneous idea to get to the United States and find out who are we.

PISTOR: I think it's been through the years a successful program, attracting people who may not have made it to the cabinet, but people who would be chancellors of the universities or heads of departments, or senior civil servants working their way into the political and administrative mix, who have had their eyes opened about the United States through the exchange program. We also had the advantage - this was just the beginning in the '80s - of the immigration into the United States of middle-class, educated Indians in our own institutions. So it was a time of change where the chattering classes were not paramount and not as cocksure as they had been and where the energetic Indians in the professions, including the foreign service and the civil service, and in business have adjusted their views of the United States and indeed adjusted their views of the market and their views of the polity generally.

Q: Was there much in the way of American studies in the universities? This has always struck me as being one of the problems of the residue of sort of European education and colonial things where American studies has... They know a lot about "home," being either France or Great Britain, but they don't know much about the United States.

PISTOR: Again changing, but you're essentially right. This is the history of their association with us. But there have been active American studies programs in India for 40 years, and there is an American studies center in Hyderabad. But the problem has been that it has attracted people who are into literary studies and not those who are historians or political scientists or economists, and that's what we wanted in American studies, to be able to get people studying these subjects to get involved, and that was one of our efforts, to stimulate interest among the professions so the center wouldn't that it wouldn't be primarily a place of literary studies.

Even then, not so much now but then, there was a terrible snobbery about what university you had gone to. It had to be British to be really worthwhile in the eyes of a lot of people, and there was constant chivying about how to rate, how to rank and how to compare. I think we've done good work since in that regard.

Q: Was it beginning sort of to penetrate Indian - we're talking about upper classes, the ruling group - in particularly the fields of business, business administration, technology? Electronics and computer was just really coming to the fore, which the Indians have taken to like a duck to water.

PISTOR: They used to do it then too when they could.

Q: The United States is the place to plug into, not England or....

PISTOR: In my day, the early '80s, we could sense the change of direction. It was the time of a shift from that elder generation with its fixed ideas, the chattering classes of those days— anti-colonial, anti-imperialist, anti-United States, all of apiece, and again under the influence of the London School of Economics and old fashioned British socialism. Those people were fading and indeed young people of the educated elites were more apt to want to go into business or technology than into the liberal arts. They wanted to make money and make an individual mark. The United States was indeed the place to go, and they certainly knew it then.

Q: Was there or had there really been much Soviet influence within Indian society, or was this something that was strictly a government-to-government thing?

PISTOR: I don't think it took very well. The effort was there. But go to Calcutta, as communist or radical Red governments had close relationships with Soviet officialdom and intellectuals and so forth, but Bengalis remained Bengalis, however Red. They didn't cotton so much to these northerners. They seemed much more at home with Americans than with Russians. The Russians really were quite foreign and didn't know how not to be foreign and were therefore awkward.

Q: Well, Americans have had a very long relation with India, from missionaries to business people. It goes back really to....

PISTOR: So American informality and directness connect in India certainly better than the Russians.

Q: Speaking of connecting, obviously you'd be sort of on the front line of dealing with people as Public Affairs Officers. Indians get exasperated with us and we get exasperated with them. You must have gotten preached to a great deal.

PISTOR: Oh, indeed, I did, and that's why I used Krishna Menon and John Foster Dulles as examples. But don't forget I had all that experience in England too, and if you've ever been preached to, it's by members of the chattering classes in England. The British have no compunction about telling you— always exempting you yourself— that you come from an appalling kind of society. These members of the chattering classes in India took on these same attitudes. In a sense it was familiar, but, yes, we got preached to, preached at. But we Americans are, you know, pretty preachy as well.

Q: Despite the fact that Ronald Reagan and Indira Gandhi were doing their best to be nice to each other, I would have thought that Reagan, in his first term - here he was a Hollywood cowboy - talking about a bigger Navy, etcetera, etcetera, this would have allowed the Indians to say we're such a warlike people.

PISTOR: Oh, yes, and I remember when we had the little problem with the island of Grenada. There was a real furor in the Indian press about our imperial adventure there, and I remember talking to a man named Indir Malhotra, who was one of the editors of the Times of India. Indir was somebody you absolutely know would be on the side of castigating the Americans for these dastardly deeds and this imperialist move, and he said, "When are you going to leave?" And I said, "Just as soon as we saw off the end of the runway." Grenada caused a furor, but the Indir Malhotras of the press were sanguine about the Russians in Afghanistan. Generally, however, because Mrs. Gandhi wanted to get along, we got along. And because of the undercurrent of private cooperation and understandings, we didn't have the split that we otherwise would have had.

Q: How did you find the American nongovernmental agencies there? There are a number, Ford and others, who have had very long experience in India. Was there any feel of cooperation, or did they do their thing and you did your thing and that was that?

PISTOR: There was a great deal of cooperation with American business interests in India. And of course we had very cordial relations with the foundations, Rockefeller, Ford and the others. We cooperated with them and with their representatives in India in all of our branch posts, too.

Q: What about your various posts? Did you find a library was a major plus?

PISTOR: Yes, and as USIS libraries were being wound down in other parts of the world when the Agency decided that they weren't as effectual as they had been, Indians who can read English have continued to patronize our libraries, which have always been enormously popular with serious readers. These libraries in India have continued to provide comfortable and familiar venues for the other things we do, the seminars and the lectures and the cultural events and discussion sessions. Calcutta also had a student center of many years standing in the university area, a little walk-up place that was not pretentious but was awfully good. Convinced communists who wanted to meet a real American would hang out at the student center, which was (and is) very lively and percolating all the time.

Q: Did you get involved at all with Bollywood?

PISTOR: I didn't get much involved in that. One of the things we did in India: you could always pull in the intellectual crowd for film festivals of one kind or another. We did one on John Huston and John Huston's movies based on novels or short stories. One of them was The Man Who Would Be King. The Indian actor Said Jeffery had been one of its stars, and he and I hoped we could arrange for him to go to Mexico to interview John Huston on videotape about this and his other movies. We almost made it but we didn't— the project fell through. That's as close as I ever got to Bollywood. Our branch post in Bombay, however, had quite a number of Bollywood connections of one kind or another.

Q: What about Charlie Wick and his influence during the time you were in Bombay?

PISTOR: I was already in New Delhi when Charles Wick became director of USIA. Our first experience with his style was a big film extravaganza of his— other people must have talked about this, too— Let Poland Be Poland.

Q: Yes, we've had people talk about that.

PISTOR: We got these imperious telegrams from Washington saying, "Put this on." Well, India was not the place to put it on. It would have been entirely counterproductive. I don't think Wick understood this, but Jock Shirley, who was his senior career man there in Washington, had been posted in India himself, understood the delicacy of the thing, and we were able to finesse it so we didn't have to show it. Wick was scheduled to visit us, but it was scratched and he went to Morocco instead. I was furious because, you know, you can rent Morocco. You can get those policemen with the goggles and you can get the horsemen and you can do all this stuff, but in India things can go off the rails easily, so it's difficult to demonstrate its exoticism without risking disaster.

Then we had a visit from the Secretary of State. The gorgeous embassy residence is not big enough to take a Secretary of State and his entourage, and also I think George Schultz, a modest man, didn't want to bother people, so he was booked into the Sheraton Hotel, which had just been remodeled. The hotel was putting him in its grandest suite and they swore that the suite would be ready in plenty of time, no problem, for the Secretary of State. Of course, the day came and the suite was not ready, and they had to put him somewhere else in the hotel.

At USIS we noted that disaster, and in its wake we got a telegram saying Wick was coming after all. I was afraid that when he got to the airport the customs official would not recognize his passport or hold up his luggage, for starters. But things went swimmingly. And also, because we had seen the experience of the Secretary of State, we put Wick in the grand suite too, but we had our own paint crew and our own carpenters ready if the need arose. Because we wanted to leave nothing to chance, we went over the Wick needs two or three times with the manager of the hotel and all of the relevant hotel staff. The Wick suite was in splendid order. Charles Wick had a very good time in India. He visited Mrs. Gandhi, who batted her eyes at him a little bit and sat kind of close to him on the sofa, or leaned toward him on the sofa, which is a good sign in the newspaper pictures. Everybody looks at the paper to see how far she is away from the visiting dignitary. So the cozy pose was very pleasing to Director Wick.

There was in India a wonderful big organization, which I haven't talked about, the Indo-US Subcommission on Education and Culture. It had a lot of PL-40 money, and members on the American side were PBS, the Metropolitan Museum and the Rockefeller Foundation, among others. On the Indian side were the National Museum, the Ministry of Education and as Chairman to represent Mrs. Gandhi, a senior member of this group you've been talking about: an LSE-trained Socialist Brahmin chattering- class leader, who in all his active years had been staunchly opposed to the United States but was quite a charming person.

I must say that the Indo-US Subcommission on Education and Culture did a number of noteworthy things to celebrate our two cultures. They brought Merce Cunningham and his dance company, who also brought with him John Cage. You might ask what did the Indians think of Merce Cunningham and John Cage; again, India's a big enough place so that you can find the an appreciative audience for even the most esoteric production.

Q: Would you explain the type of dance?

PISTOR: Merce Cunningham runs an internationally celebrated avant garde dance company. He has been a well known dancer and choreographer himself for many years. John Cage is a very well-known and always controversial American composer who uses things like radios and airplane propellers and whatever you want, very avant-garde. He and Cunningham were also in partnership with American painters. Jasper Johns was one of them. So was Robert Rauschenberg. We had other, not so avant garde, cultural exchanges as well. There are Indians crazy about theater, and there's active theater in India itself, and we brought to India plays by John Steinbeck and Sam Shepherd. Cultural ties were active and interesting in those days..

Wick's arrival coincided with one of the Subcommission's large projects, India Week at the Metropolitan Museum in New York, and concurrent events in Washington. Part of this was to be not only the marvelous exhibition at the Metropolitan, but a tour through India by the New York Philharmonic under Zubin Mehta. Not only these events, but a wonderful exhibit called "Aditi" which was - how would you put it?— peasant sculpture and design and street musicians and entertainers, scheduled to come to the United States and perform or demonstrate their crafts on the Mall.

But before they came to the States, I approached Aditi's director-coordinator with the idea of a Subcommission party for Wick at one of the Mogul sites in New Delhi, which could preview Aditi. He and I described the idea to the Subcommission's Indian Secretary, who was very tempted, but after some time reluctantly turned it down. So I thought, since they're not going to do it themselves, I will, so we had the party at my house, which had a large lawn.

As he stepped out of his car, Wick was greeted by a man who jumped through a flaming hoop, and then was escorted by costumed horsemen on pretend horses. We had actual snake charmers, we had puppet snake charmers, we had a levitator, we had dancers, we had musicians. The Aditi party was a spectacular success. And provided Wick with a great introduction to India.

Q: Did you have a Fulbright program there?

PISTOR: We had a very large and respected Fulbright program of many years' standing. Also, along with the established Fulbright program, there was a new initiative— the Hubert Humphrey Fellowships— one in which senior, mid-level and a little above, professionals would go to the United States for a year. I met some recently returned Fellows, among them a regional railway chief and a senior veterinarian. The Humphrey program attracted stimulating and very interesting professionals on their way up. .

Q: It sounds like you hit it at the right time.

PISTOR: I certainly did. It was just a wonderful time.

Q: Because we've had some real ups and downs.

PISTOR: We've had some real downs when nobody would talk to you, nobody would come to your house, but it was an open time when we were there and people were eager to see us.

Q: Did you run across problems of the closed economic system, it's hard to bring things in and all that?

PISTOR: We lived in pretty much privilege.

Q: I was just wondering whether, on the intellectual side, bringing books or movies or that sort of thing, and I'm talking about the cultural exchange between two countries. Was this a problem?

PISTOR: No. As I say, one of our great successes was film festivals. The American MPAA has had some difficulties with India, and people are worried about copyright infringements, so we have always had problems, but there was an Oxford University Press in India, Reader's Digest had an Indian version, and Doubleday and others had arrangements. We always had to be alert to piracy, but the legitimate organizations thrived there. American textbook people were regulars at the book fair in New Delhi, for example.

We'd find sudden problems, because the Government of India is often arbitrary and the place itself is often arbitrary, so you'd find you couldn't do something and then you'd have a problem to work out. But the question of films, exchanges with books and magazines and so forth was pretty easy.

Q: On the cultural side, was there any American TV show or things?

PISTOR: Television was just in its infancy there, but it would show old Hopalong Cassidy movies. Whatever was cheap and syndicated you'd be able to get. Also, New Delhi had a film festival which they hoped to rival Cannes. The festival organizers invited Robert Wise, the veteran American director. I guess he's best known for The Sound of Music, and he did other important films over a long and distinguished career. He and his wife went to India on the Festival's ticket. We didn't see him at first, didn't even know he was there. But suddenly we did know he was there because the Indians, when they realized he was not Robert Wiseman, who did the "Kitticut Follies," a documentary about a mental hospital, cut him off. They said, "What are you talking about, Sound of Music, for God's sake!. We're intellectuals."

And so poor Robert Wise, this wonderful director, got to New Delhi and found himself with no lecture to give or anything. They actually just dumped him. Fortunately they dumped him into our lap. He's a wonderful man and he had a lot of good stories to tell, including the fact that he was the editor of Citizen Kane. We organized lectures for him and he did very well.

Manny American artistic or intellectual notables went to India under somebody's sponsorship or another. I remember again when we had a problem because sometimes Indian sponsors didn't follow up terribly well, and so we had Dan Boorstin, the Librarian of Congress. He got to New Delhi and his program had fallen apart, and he was not a man to take that lightly. I think he called the ambassador or somebody. Anyway, we were able to get him connected again, and he lectured then under our auspices, which was wonderful for us, and he was very good at it. So we had a lot of exchanges and then you'd have sudden glitches, but they tended not to be serious ones.

Q: I guess you were all used to it.

PISTOR: Yes, by that time..

It was wonderful to be in India because we had the resources to do creative things, including the mock-up of the space shuttle, that toured India and went to a number of scientific institutions, which burned the Soviets terribly. They were very upset over that. And the large-scale model was a credit to the imagination and skill of our local Indian staff.

W. GARTH THORBURN
Agricultural Counselor
New Delhi (1980-1986)

Q: So, from there, you went on to New Delhi.

THORBURN: I went to Delhi.

Q: And how was that? What were you doing in New Delhi?

THORBURN: Delhi was very, very good, very interesting. When I got there, we were assigned, we covered Nepal and Sri Lanka as well. I went up to Nepal a couple of times, and I didn't think it was useful, because there was really nothing going on there, and they had a very good AID (Agency for International Development) mission. So if I needed information, I called.

I was trying to increase our exports to India in the '60s and '70s when we had PL (Public Law) 480, India imported a lot of wheat from us. But they came up with some good programs of their own and produced a lot of wheat and rice. They weren't self-sufficient, but with the low intake of calories, they were at their level, maybe 1,500 calories a day, and if you see some of the Indians with their concave chests, you know that they aren't well fed.

We tried very, very hard with certain things – soybean, wheat, nuts. We had a very, very interesting group of people whom we sent to California to buy almonds and pistachios from the United States, and it turned out to be very, very successful. We monitored very, very closely the monsoons, because the size of the crops, the major crops, pulses, wheat and rice, dependent upon rainfall. Monitoring it, we had a very good idea when they would have a shortfall.

One year, I can't remember exactly when, probably in '88, they had a short crop of wheat and we managed to export about 1.5 million tons of wheat at $250 a ton if I remember, so we did pretty well that year. I think that year, we probably did about $1 billion of exports to India. I had an excellent staff and I was very, very, very satisfied with my time there, as I spent seven and a half years there. When you spend seven and a half years anyplace, it's enjoyable.

Q: You talked a little bit about what it was like getting around the country and flying versus driving. Could you talk about that a little bit for the oral history?

THORBURN: Well, most people liked to visit the Taj Mahal, and that was not too bad a drive, but you took your life into your hands if you did that. As a matter of fact, the secretary of state came to visit and some of our people went down to accompany him, and on the way back, five or six were killed in an automobile accident – of our embassy staff. So you just take your life into your hands if you drive anywhere in India.

Making trips to Kerala, Tamil Nadu, to Calcutta, anywhere, we would fly from Delhi to that city, rent a car, go out into the boondocks and visit in order to gather information to make estimates of what's going on. But driving in India was worse than driving in Rome. It was unbelievable and terrible.

Q: So, after India, then you transferred on?

THORBURN: I was transferred to Turkey for three and a half years, and that was my last assignment in the Foreign Service.

STEPHEN EISENBRAUN
India Desk Officer

Washington, DC (1981-1983)

Mr. Eisenbraun was born in central Iowa in 1947 and graduated from the University of Northern Iowa and SAIS. He served in Dhaka, Lahore, Freetown and Mombasa. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2004.

Q: Given your later career, had you been reading about India and the Raj and all that, the Kipling, the John Masters, the other things of that nature?

EISENBRAUN: I didn't read very much of that in high school, but I remember it was about my freshman year of college I read a long novel about China, it was The Sand Pebbles.

Q: Right. What sort of history were you taking?

EISENBRAUN: I took a number of America history courses, but my specialization, as much as it could be, developed into Asian studies. The school was just starting a foreign areas program and I was one of the first to sign up for it. That was the influence of taking the China course with Cheng hsi ling. Another course was a survey on India by another influential professor of mine named Emily Brown. After that, there were courses on the recent history of China and India, and another on modern Indian literature taught by a visiting professor from Cambridge University in the UK. So those were the kinds of courses I took, even during two summer sessions. They were general survey courses more than really specialized courses.

Q: So this takes us to '73 I guess?

EISENBRAUN: Yes. Teaching and living on the campus at Foxcroft was very satisfying and comfortable, but I was ambitious and wanted to go to graduate school, see the world, and work somewhere in Washington. I spent the fall of '72 applying to graduate schools and other programs and then in the spring of '73, I was accepted at Johns Hopkins, SAIS, and also got a fellowship to go to India to study Hindi. I was keenly aware that I didn't have any foreign experience, nor foreign language, and I had to make up for that in some way. Fortunately, the professor from the University of Northern Iowa, Emily Brown, who was the India specialist and the one who had offered me the graduate assistantship some years earlier, was on the board of the American Institute of Indian Studies, headquartered at the University of Chicago, and she suggested I apply for one of the Institute's nine-month fellowships in India to study Hindi. I know she was instrumental in making certain the board selected me for a fellowship.

So then I got the fellowship to India to study Hindi for a year at Delhi University and also got admitted to Johns Hopkins SAIS in Washington to pursue a master's degree in international relations. I visited SAIS, explained to admissions that I had this fellowship offer in hand, and asked if they would defer my entrance for a year. I also said, you know, I'm going to be studying Hindi out there and I'd like to use Hindi to fulfill the language requirement at SAIS. At that time, SAIS didn't teach Hindi. They do now and they have a developing South Asia department, but they didn't then. The assistant dean in charge of admissions, Roger Leeds, said, all right.

Luckily, I went home and wrote a letter to Leeds saying thank you for deferring me for a year to go to India and thank you for agreeing that I could use Hindi to fulfill my language requirement. That's important because a year later when I showed up to start SAIS, they said, we don't teach Hindi, so you'll need to start a different language. But I said, no, Roger Leeds (who's still at SAIS these 30 some years later) said I could. I produced a copy of the letter that I had written to him. To SAIS's credit, the school said, oops, I guess we'll have to honor what Leeds said. They not only allowed me to take Hindi, they provided tutoring as well. So I am quite grateful to SAIS for that and to Roger Leeds.

Q: Well then, you were there taking Hindi at Delhi University?

EISENBRAUN: Yes, concurrently with classes at the American Institute of Indian Studies. We had Institute classes in the morning and university classes in the afternoon. Fortunately, we lived during the first months within walking distance of the campus in a building named Riviera Apartments, can you believe, because elegant, as the name implied, they weren't.

Q: What was your impression of Delhi University and India at the time?

EISENBRAUN: We arrived in August of 1973 and I had done a lot of reading, certainly, about India and teaching about India, so I thought I knew something about the country. Well, I didn't know enough. We were both in for huge culture shock; it was very unsettling and we were told, well, go out and find an apartment. It better be close to Delhi University because you'll be taking classes there. And what? Just go out and find an apartment in Delhi? And around the university, which we discovered was not the most Westernized part of the city. I mean, it was so daunting. But we did it somehow. By the third day, I got horribly sick with dysentery, the first of many, many, times I got sick like that in the years to come in South Asia. I was laid up, absolutely flat out. I used to say that if I hadn't been too sick to get out of bed, I would have gone to the airport and caught a plane home, but I couldn't. Subsequently, I spent about 10 years in South Asia. But at any rate, it is fair to say that the year I spent in India changed my life. It broadened my horizons, it changed my perspective on international affairs, and it verified for me that I wanted to join the Foreign Service.

I had chosen SAIS with the idea of the Foreign Service, and India helped solidify that career direction. Although Delhi University was about 30 miles from the US Embassy, I met a few people at the Embassy and became convinced that the Foreign Service was the way to go. And also, one of the other people in the program had this in mind, too. So it turns out four of us took the Foreign Service written exam at the embassy in New Delhi in December of 1973. Four of us took the written exam, three of us passed it, and two of us eventually passed the orals and came into the Foreign Service. Amazing, huh, considering the odds.

A week or so before I departed the States in the summer of 1973 I went to a party in Reston, Virginia, and met one of the guests, a professor at Syracuse University. I told him that I was going off to study in India. He noted that Daniel Patrick Moynihan was the Ambassador in New Delhi at that time and that he also was a former faculty member at Syracuse. So, my new friend said, you've got to look up Pat and Liz, they're good friends of mine. He took out his card and wrote on the back, Pat, you've got to meet Steve and his wife Jane. You'll really enjoy them. He said present this at the embassy. Well, even to me, as naïve as I was about the Foreign Service, I couldn't imagine such a thing but now looking back after 35 years, I find what happened even more amazing. In the middle of September, my wife and I made our way out to the American Embassy and presented that card, just a business card from this professor, and said, I'd like to meet the Ambassador. Eventually, a young Foreign Service Officer, John Yates, came down and talked to us and set up an appointment.

Q: Is John around? I tried to get ahold of him to finish an interview. Do you know where he is no?

EISENBRAUN: No, I don't. I know he became an Ambassador in West Africa, and I know a bit about his career, but I'm sorry I don't know where he is now. At that time, Yates was a special assistant to Daniel Patrick Moynihan. He said, I'll do what I can. We were sharing an apartment six blocks from the main campus of Delhi University, 30 miles from the embassy. And so I was given an appointment, I forget how that was communicated to me, I guess it was a letter. Now, given how the Foreign Service works, if that wasn't unusual enough, a few days before the appointment, there came a knock on the door of the apartment, and a Marine guard in uniform presented a letter to me from Yates, saying we're really sorry but someone else has come to town—it might have been Pearl Buck—and so the Ambassador was sorry he wouldn't be able to see me on the scheduled day but would the following day at 4:00 pm be all right?

The next day we arrived at the embassy and we were shown in to Moynihan. He was quite cordial and invited us to sit down on the sofa and have a drink. He had a Scotch and water. It was about 5:00 in the afternoon. Well, we all know from our Foreign Service experience that this just doesn't happen. I was just a kid at school. I mean, what is he doing? Well, he carried on a monologue for about 45 minutes about the issues he was dealing with and humorous anecdotes regarding India and the bureaucracy and this, that and the other, which we just listened. Finally, he got to the point and asked how we knew professor so-and-so? I said, I don't know him. I just met him at a party a couple of weeks ago before we got on the plane to come out here but he said to look you up. Moynihan, with a distracted tone in his voice, replied, well, isn't that very interesting. What are you doing in India? I said, well, I'm a student at Delhi University. He replied, well, it was nice of you to look me up, and that was the end of the meeting. That incident still qualifies as one of the more bizarre things that happened to me in my pre-Foreign Service days.

Q: Well, how did you find being an American in India in '73? This was after the creation of Bangladesh, Kissinger particularly had sent the Enterprise into the Indian Ocean and yes, it wasn't a great time, I mean, for Americans.

EISENBRAUN: No, it wasn't. Americans were not appreciated at any level in India. Just as you said, the residual antagonism from 1971 was alive in everyone's mind. So much so that in our orientation by the American Institute of Indian Studies, they said, you're going to be harassed on campus and maybe it's better to say you're Canadian. Well, we were harassed in some cases, yes. Students surrounded me on two or three occasions, eight, 10 students who jeered at me and so forth. But I never felt in danger. It was just pranksterism, you might say. But we felt antagonism from almost every sector of Indian society, especially the smaller bureaucrats and, let's say, bank officials, for example. We got a monthly fellowship stipend, and we were required to deposit the money in our local bank, the Punjab National Bank, and then we had to make withdrawals from that account in order to have access to cash. We all felt that the bank officials were antagonistic to us, cold and harsh. On one occasion, I signed and presented my withdrawal slip, but the clerk just swept it away and sneered, that's not your signature, go away. I said, hotly, that that is my signature, and that's my money in the bank and I need it. He just repeated, go away. In the end, the bank manager came and gave it to me grudgingly. We all had these kinds of experiences.

So, I have to say, we felt a good deal of antagonism because we were Americans, but I have to qualify that. India's a very friendly country to Americans in general and there were many people who were extremely gracious and helpful to us. Any foreigner can be adopted by Mother India if they want, welcomed into peoples' homes and so forth. That eventually happened to us. I must say a large part of that had to do with my wife, Jane, who played the flute and started taking more flute lessons because flute is big in India. Because she was into modern dance in the States, she started taking some Indian classical dance lessons and pretty soon we were going to classical dance concerts all over the city.

Eventually we left the apartment we were sharing with another American couple on the program, and moved in with an Indian family. So then we began to learn a lot something about Indian life. It took a lot of time to become culturally more adjusted to India, especially from a student's point of view because they don't think too highly of foreign students or didn't at that period, let alone American foreign students. But we learned to adjust. Eventually, we lived with two different Indian families; first with a Christian family and then with a high caste Brahmin family that did everything very formally, including dressing in coat and tie for dinner. They always referred to us as Mr. Eisenbraun and Mrs. Eisenbraun.

We learned that Indians were just as frustrated with daily life in India as we were, in their having to cope with traffic and the buses and the bureaucrats that would treat them harshly too. The first family we lived with, the Dayals, asked us to try to buy them black market cooking oil and rice from local merchants, as the quality of these products available via the ration cards all people had to use was really poor and inadequate. For example, most products were adulterated, that is, the rice was cut with small rocks. I was unsuccessful in getting anything on the black market, however.

Q: Well then, how'd you find Hindi?

EISENBRAUN: In fact, it's almost impossible to learn good Hindi in Delhi. That's not where you should go to learn Hindi. The institute that brought us to India acknowledged that, but for political reasons, I suppose, that's where the classes were. One of the reasons it's so hard to learn Hindi in Delhi is that Delhi is such a cosmopolitan city that it draws from all over India, especially from North India. There is a very large Sikh community and they speak Punjabi primarily. All these other groups in Delhi were speaking variations of something the British in their colonial days called Hindustani, a little bit of Urdu, a little bit of Hindi, a little bit of Punjabi and you sort of mix them all together and it comes out Hindustani. That was not what they were teaching at the Institute, nor at Delhi University. They were trying to teach us classical, proper Hindi. You could learn Hindi in school and you could read it in the newspaper and you could hear it on All India Radio, but nobody spoke it. Well, the very well-educated did, but that's it. So I was hearing things on the bus while riding back and forth to classes, or stuff in the bazaars, and I would try that stuff out in class. The professors would recoil in horror at what came out. So in fact I didn't learn a whole lot of Hindi. I learned a lot about India, but I didn't learn very much Hindi.

I should say too that with that last family, the high caste Brahmin family, the Shashadris, I invited a few of the friends I had met from Delhi University to their home and that was an education for me because I discovered how socially conscious the Indians are, very class conscious. I suppose every society is but the Indians are especially so. These students suddenly got very self-conscious because they realized they were in a proper Brahmin home and they were being judged. The lady of the house, Mrs. Shashadri, she was very gracious. She had in her youth been the private secretary to a maharaja's wife and had traveled to Paris and London. After meeting my friends, she would analyze the students and give her opinion, and to her, the most important factor was not the quality of their English, but the quality of their Hindi. These students at Delhi University had perfect English, very upper class English from the best of missionary schools. But she judged them on their Hindi and she insisted on speaking to them in proper Hindi.

I met a lot of Indian students, and here's how I did it. It wasn't so much in the classes for Hindi, because they were for foreign students from various countries around Asia. Those students were interesting as well. However, to meet Indians I tried to audit a few courses at the Delhi School of Economics. The concept of auditing a class doesn't exist at Indian Universities, but I tried it in an international economics course, and the professor let me do it. So I sat there and listened to his lectures day after day and I monitored a couple of other classes too. After class, it was a tradition that the students would leave the lecture and go down to the coffee shops around the classroom buildings and have coffee or tea and gossip. I was an object of curiosity, so students would sort of hang around me and start asking me questions.

The students were pretty friendly, actually. The students were a bit pointed in their questions. One of the students asked, early on, why are you studying here in India when every one of us has the goal of studying in America? It doesn't make sense. I replied that I'm going to be studying international relations at Johns Hopkins but I wanted to come to India and broaden my horizons and learn something about Hindi; it seems reasonable to me. But they said, it doesn't seem reasonable to us because Hindi isn't important. They went on, saying that there's only one conclusion; you have to be a spy. They weren't joking. They said you must have an ulterior motive, you can't be here as a student and clearly you don't know as much economics as we do. That was certainly true; they were sophisticated students of economics and I was not. My reply was, well, if you think I'm a spy, what secrets do you think the U.S. government is going to learn here in this coffee shop and around the campus? Well, they had to laugh and acknowledge that there probably wasn't much to learn. So we had a good time and I got to be quite friendly with a number of students, and those friendships continued for a good number of years.

Q: Well then, after this year, you came back where? You went to SAIS?

EISENBRAUN: I did, yes. I must say just for a moment, when the fellowship was finished in April, my wife and I went up into the foothills of the Himalayas to a missionary language school.

In the summer months, the school was in the hills at about 8,000 feet among the pine trees, looking out over the 20,000 foot snow caps in the distance. I attended for a couple of months. The other students were missionaries from around India. We enjoyed living in the mountains, and getting to know the missionaries, but I couldn't compete with them because they really did know a lot of Hindi. I learned the 23rd Psalm and the Lord's Prayer and other famous Biblical passages in Hindi, and they sound as good in Hindi as they do in English.

I came back to the States in the summer of '74, just in time to witness on television the resignation of Richard Nixon. Then I drove up to Washington from Florida and presented myself for the oral exam to the Foreign Service.

Q: Did you get any feeling, I realize you're the brand new boy on the block, but did you get any feel for the power relationship within NEA, one, for Bangladesh vis a vis India-Pakistan and two, India-Pakistan, well I mean, what we call the sub-continent and the Arab-Israeli problem?

EISENBRAUN: Bangladesh didn't count in the power relationships within the NEA bureau. It was just a humanitarian disaster to deal with. Kissinger actually went out to Bangladesh; he stopped through en route to another destination and probably didn't even spend overnight. But he did show up and he made some comment, probably an aside, of Bangladesh as a basket case, and unfortunately, that's what stuck as the essence of the American policy attitude. Bangladeshis even today, 30 years later, remember Kissinger's basket case comment.

Q: Well, you know, I mean, this is something that lingers on with me. I've never served there, or been there, but you know, I mean, it was kind of referred to as a basket case.

EISENBRAUN: Well, it was economically. Their needs were infinite and they were confused, and mind you, the best of their entire generation had just been massacred by the Pakistani army, so there were really valid reasons why the country was in chaos. It's just unfortunate that Sheikh Mujib, who had such potential because of his initial popularity, squander his great opportunity to start the country on a sound basis. Of course, within NEA, looking at South Asia, they were- it was always a balancing act between Pakistan and India, you know, trying to be friendly with both. In Pakistan there was Zulfikar Ali Bhutto who was in charge and things weren't going so well over there either.

Q: Yes. And you have the very chilly relationship with Mrs. Gandhi, I guess.

EISENBRAUN: That's right. Mrs. Gandhi had no relationship with President Ford, but Nixon and Gandhi detested each other. Partly that's because they were two very powerful personalities, practitioners of real politic who probably were very similar and probably could have been good friends under other circumstances, but they were rivals in world politics. Nixon was certain that Mrs. Gandhi had misled him over Indian intentions of attacking Pakistan when she came to Washington in December of '71. And apparently she—we can check this in the archives, I guess—but she basically assured him that Indian intentions were not belligerent but that they couldn't live forever with the 10 million Bengali refugees in West Bengal, to say nothing of the political uproar on their Eastern border. The United States in the early '70s was quite partial to Pakistan, and Mrs. Gandhi couldn't stomach it. Pakistan under Ayub Khan, and Yahya Khan later, was willing to be friendly with the United States, and they were easy to deal with because they were relatively straightforward military men. We could provide them with military assistance, and India at the same time was friendly with the Soviet Union and the Soviets provided a good deal of military assistance and technology to India. So we had our own Cold War going on in South Asia. Bangladesh was essentially a humanitarian project, but we wanted to keep them at arm's length politically. We had no national interest in Bangladesh besides humanitarian.

Q: So often one's first contact is with your language teachers. Were you picking up something about Bangladesh in your-

EISENBRAUN: I'm glad you reminded me about my language instructor. Minoti Roy; she was Hindu and she was from Calcutta. She had never been to Bangladesh herself. She was brand new to FSI, and I was her first and only student for most of the year, except that a fellow named Ron Hagen came in for a few months about halfway through the year. Minoti and I got along really well. She took it upon herself to teach me about Bengali culture. Not Bangladesh culture only, but the culture of greater Bengal, which included the Indian state of West Bengal with its capital of Calcutta. Historically, the whole area of East India that was Bengali speaking was called Bangladesh, or the land of the Bengali or Bangla-speaking peoples. The West Bengal state in India as well as East Pakistan, it was all known as Bangladesh in the old days. She stressed to me that the Hindus of West Bengal in India felt a little bit put out that these upstarts, when they declared their independence in 1971, called their country Bangladesh, because the Indians in Calcutta said, we're Bangladesh, too.

Minoti decided it was her mission in life to make sure that I spoke the best Bengali I possibly could and to make sure my accent at least was right. I'm a pretty mediocre language student, but I'd had the Hindi study, and she said that that made me sound more like a Hindi speaker trying to learn Bengali, rather than an American. I thought she was being nice and just trying to build up my confidence, but in fact I heard this comment later when I got to Bangladesh. So, achingly, hour after hour, she worked on that accent. When I got done, those of us in the Foreign Service will understand, I ended up with a three-three in Bengali, but I had a better accent than that score would suggest.

Q: What about the hand of India while you were there?

EISENBRAUN: India presumably did exercise a tremendous influence clandestinely in Bangladesh. We heard rumors, I can't tell you exactly how truthful those rumors were, that the Indian intelligence service was controlling a lot of political events and funneling money to leaders. The Bangladeshis felt intimidated by this great country around them.

Q: Well, talking about Bangladesh being surrounded on three sides, what about these areas in India bordering on Bangladesh? Could you find out or?

EISENBRAUN: I had no way of knowing from my posting in Dhaka what was going on in those states.

Q: But was there any spillover?

EISENBRAUN: No, there wasn't much spillover, although there were rebel insurgencies in some of the remote areas. They continue today. India was afraid that some of the remote areas of their northeast would break away, so they wanted to make sure that Bangladesh was within their sphere of interest.

Q: At that particular point, what was the attitude of the Pakistanis towards the United States?

EISENBRAUN: The Pakistan government was rather disillusioned with the United States because there had been twenty years or more of hot and cold relationships from Washington. We had been quite supportive during the Cold War and we had supported them in '71 when they had their war with India, but then we had backed off a number of times and this period of '78-'79, my first year there, we were, because of the military overthrow of the elected government, we were pretty cool to the Pakistanis. I think that we had curtailed a good part, maybe all, military aid. It manifested itself on the provincial level in that it was sometimes difficult to get prior permission to go out on these travels. But in the end, I don't think I was ever denied. When I got out into the districts and met the local officials, the Deputy Commissioners and the Superintendents of police and others, they were always pleasant enough. Proper; I wouldn't say-- they were not effusive, but they were accessible. The Pakistani people were very friendly, and even farmers knew a lot about the American-Pakistani relationship. They knew that America had been a close friend at one time and wasn't so friendly anymore, so there was always this question, why can't America be steadfast in its friendship? But they were predisposed to be friendly.

Q: I mean, was there-

EISENBRAUN: What, repercussions? What was the explanation? I don't know specifically what the Pakistan senior authorities told the Americans in Islamabad or Washington. Basically, their story was that it took time to get from the cantonment in Rawalpindi to embassy in Islamabad, a distance of a dozen miles or so. I think they always denied that they had anything except the best of intentions. It's undoubtedly true that it caught them as much by surprise as it did us. But it did take them an awfully long time; I think they were afraid the fury of the mob would turn on them, so they lingered until the situation resolved itself.

However, to repeat, the police saved us in Lahore. As it turned out, down at the USIS center, the American and local employees got up to the roof, and that included all the patrons who were in the library too. No one died or was seriously injured. They all got up to the roof and eventually off the building. The center was reduced to a smoldering hulk, though.

The story was not quite over, however. We all dispersed to our homes for the night. A phone line was established with Islamabad from people's homes. We got the word that night that Washington had ordered the evacuation of all non-essential Americans from the country for the following evening. We were told that a Pan Am 747 had been leased to come to Islamabad to pick up all dependents. That plane had a maximum capacity of around 300, maybe 350 seats. But there were more than 350 Americans in Pakistan, so it had to be decided on the spot, who went and who stayed. Who were official Americans? We were told, figure it out. As far as Lahore was concerned, they said that PIA had agreed to bring a special flight into the airport. The plane had 40 seats, so identify 40 people to be evacuated on that flight that would go up to Islamabad to meet the Pan Am flight. That was it. This was less than a two-minute order, and then the line was dead.

So, Fuller and I convened at the office early the next morning. The interior was okay, but the exterior was a shambles, a mess. The parking lot was filled with burned cars. The Pakistan Government sent around a cleaning force, even though we had not asked for it, and they cleaned up the exterior in a few hours, towing the cars out of public sight, and by noon, the consulate looked pretty good. Glass was reinstalled in the windows. I don't believe we ever asked for this, it was just provided, and we were back in operation. I guess the Pakistani authorities didn't want any evidence of this trouble to be tinder, you might say, for further demonstrations. Of course, they couldn't help the smoking building down at USIS. As for our work, the challenge was to figure out how to communicate with all the Americans and let them know that some of them, but not all, were going to be evacuated that night.

It didn't sit well with us, but we decided somehow that the American teachers didn't qualify as official Americans, that is, as U.S. government employees. We thought that's what it was defined as. We had to define it ourselves. The school was operating independently in that crisis; this is not a nice chapter in the relationships there among the Americans. They just made their own decisions. In fact, what they did is, the American teachers got in cars and headed for the Indian border 15 miles away. From there, they went to Amritsar and New Delhi. They were out of the country fast as far as I understand. I was pretty ashamed, you know, that the consulate didn't think of them first.

But still the question was, who are official U.S. government-funded people? Well, they were the U.S.-funded scientists at the malaria research lab and their families and there were some other U.S.-funded contractors around, plus the consulate staff and families; it wasn't hard to find 35 or 40 people. So we were calling and saying you're all being evacuated tonight. There's no choice, you have to leave with one suitcase. You've got to go. Everyone's in shock. That was Thanksgiving day, yes, and there had been plans for a huge American community picnic. I know that in our house, our cook was planning to cook about seven or eight turkeys that somehow they had found around the community and so the decision was okay, cook the turkeys. In the meantime, my wife was frantically packing, getting ready to fly off to the States. But who knew what would happen in Washington? There was no communication with the States. We were unable to call anybody in the States; that was impossible in those days.

We established a rallying point, the same apartment complex where we'd been evacuated to the night before. We had a departure of something like 7:30 in the evening and the army said, you gather your people and we will transport everybody in army trucks to the airport. And we're leaving right on time. They did. Everyone gathered in a chaotic and tearful scramble.

The army trucks arrived, and the soldiers said, get in right now. No one argued. There was a convoy of about five or six trucks, big ones. Totally anonymous. I mean, they're army, of course, but otherwise the canvas was down and they didn't want anyone to know that there were Americans inside. They drove through the dark and foggy night to the airport. We expected that we would go through the usual check-in procedure. What's this? No. The trucks went around to a far entrance off on the field. They had no more pulled onto the end of a runway than a small propeller plane landed and pulled up to us, keeping its engines running. All this was in minutes. We got off the trucks and the army said, get on this plane as fast as possible. People exchanged a few hugs and kisses, and it was all over in minutes. The engines never stopped. The plane turned around and roared back down the runway, leaving just four of us standing in the dark on the field.

The four were the Fuller, the consul general, Lundstead, the consular officer, Jim Larkin, the admin officer, and me. We sent away our communicator and the secretary. It was crazy for us to make that decision, but in our haste we thought, well, all of our communications went through Islamabad and that's destroyed, so what do we need a communicator for? Well, we didn't realize how valuable a communicator was, because they do more than communicate electronically. We didn't have a clue how to make up a diplomatic bag, for example.

And so we just waved good-bye to the plane. It was about 8:00 at night. What do we do? We're in shock. I said, you know, I've got all these turkeys back at the house. So we came back to my place and had a big Thanksgiving dinner. Afterward, Lundstead said, I don't want to go back to the empty apartment at the compound where all the families had just left, can I stay with you?

So he stayed in the guest bedroom and he said he slept in his clothes. I did not, at first, but I had this vivid dream in the middle of the night; I dreamed that the phone rang and that somebody on the other end said, they're coming for you to finish you off. That was it, and I put the phone down. Then I awakened. The dream was so vivid that I believed it. I jumped up and got dressed and ran to tell Jeff, and there he was with his clothes on too. It's three in the morning. But then we began to realize this was a dream, so I got back in bed. I think I kept my clothes on, though, just in case I had to flee. I had that same dream the second night and the third night. Well, the third time around I recognized I'm having a dream, so I didn't jump up and get dressed.

Q: I'm still asking the question. Did you come up with any answer?

EISENBRAUN: Well, I want to tell you the thoughts of the Pakistanis on this subject. Art Hummel invited anyone on his staff and at the consulates to send in an analysis. He said you can send it directly to Washington, bypassing the embassy, which had reestablished communications. So I took this on as a big challenge. I thought, this is my chance to be George Kennon, you know, and explain it. Not that I had any original ideas, particularly, but I had the privilege of talking to a lot of very sophisticated Pakistanis in Lahore, a lot of people who were very thoughtful and very articulate. So I explored their thoughts—this was, after all, the topic everyone wanted to discuss anyway. Everybody in Lahore I talked with, whatever his or her position on the political spectrum, thought the same thing, which was this.

The Soviets really had a strategic plan in mind and they ultimately wanted access to a warm water port and Karachi was that warm water port, the main commercial port of Pakistan. Working with the connivance of the Indian Government, the Soviets had in mind the dismemberment of Pakistan in the effort to get their port in Karachi. Mind you, the Pakistanis were still just recovering from the 1971 war, so complete dismemberment didn't seem so radical a concept. They'd already been cut in half by India in 1971. The invasion of Afghanistan was only the first step in the master plan, they thought, and Pakistan was in mortal danger. My contacts pointed out that the Americans must agree because they were sending in considerable military and economic assistance.

I spent a lot of time drafting what I thought was a good cable and send it in. It went under my name because I was the head of the office, and I slugged it, at the Ambassador's direction, for the NSC (National Security Council) at the White House and for the Secretary of State. The embassy put in its own analysis, as I'm sure Karachi and Peshawar did.

So, Fuller was gone for the month of January, and then I was slated to go to the States for the month of February because my wife was due to give birth.

In the first days of January, 1980, a cable came from the Secretary of State ordering every post in the Islamic world to destroy all of its classified material, or ship some of the vital material immediately back to Washington. The point was, within a couple of days, don't have any classified at post beyond a working file that it could be burned—and this is really important—in five minutes. Because Washington fully expected more attacks. Who knew what post would be overrun next? .

It's hard to imagine, but in the small consulate in Lahore, classified wasn't really destroyed. Virtually nothing, only maybe ten percent of what we held, as it turned out. Fuller felt that our holdings were of historical significance. They went back 20-some years, and there was a lot of fascinating archival information, and he said it just wasn't appropriate to destroy it. And second, it just wasn't feasible to box it up and ship it back because we were barely functioning with diplomatic pouches. Also our classified and our unclassified were mixed together to a large extent. Imagine file after file after file, things all mixed together.

On the roof of the consulate there were five burn barrels. You may remember the era when there were burn barrels in of our consulates and embassies around the world. I'll bet that few posts ever tried to use one of those barrels. We decided to try one out. The idea was that in an emergency you just dumped everything you had, even typewriters, in there, absolutely anything; and then light the fuse. Fuller said, let's use one of them and see what happens.

We gathered some of the classified material and half-filled one burn barrel and lit it. Well, that was quite a show. It worked. It was like a Saturn rocket going the opposite way, with its tail of fire going up into the air and the rocket theoretically going down into the ground. The flare went up 20 feet or something. It was just unbelievable and created quite a spectacle. People going by on the street no doubt wondered what on earth was happening. You couldn't get within 10 or 15 feet of the burn barrel, and there was no way of putting it out.

Well, we were mighty impressed. Fuller said, well, in five minutes time if we had to we could bring up all our files to the roof and use the other four burn barrels. We could dump everything in there indiscriminately and light the fuses and that's five minutes. The cable from Washington asked for a written compliance cable from the ranking officer saying we were down to five minutes. Fuller drafted it under his name and sent it, certifying that we had complied. But we hadn't complied. We may have been the only post that didn't comply Fuller went back to Washington, leaving me in charge. The mood was tense. After all, on one side of us was Iran where the hostages were being held. The Soviets were invading to the northwest of us and the fighting was pretty fierce and refugees were coming into Pakistan. We had our own worries because we were convinced that the demonstrators would finish the job and burn us out. We knew that all the perpetrators of the attack were still out there in Lahore, probably passing by our consulate every day, rankled by the fact that the flag was still flying. So we felt deep in our bones it was a given that there was another attack coming. I know that Islamabad felt that way too, even more so. So, while life appeared to go back to normal, deep inside we felt that they were coming for us again, this time with a lot of gasoline.

I was in charge and I didn't know the extent of our classified holdings. The communications officer, Dick Gary, came to me a couple days after Fuller departed and said, you know, back there in the vault is an incredible amount of classified stuff. As you know, in our missions abroad, nobody goes back into those deep areas of the communications center except for the communications people themselves. He invited me back and showed me file after file, whole cabinets. And in the outer officer area by my desk and in Fuller's office there were other files thick with historical material with the classified and unclassified put together that went back 10, 15 years. I hadn't even realized what was back in the secure area. Dick asked, how could we have sent that cable saying we were down to five minutes destruction time? Clearly, this whole building is full of classified.

So, we had a meeting, the four of us. We agreed we couldn't live with this subterfuge. We had to tell Islamabad, this is national security information here, we can't keep it. So it was agreed that I would go up to the embassy and tell the DCM the situation. Mind you, I'm telling you stuff that was kept really quiet at the time, but I don't know that it has to be so quiet 25 years later. This was awfully sensitive at the time. I flew up to Islamabad and met with the DCM.

Q: But during this time you're talking about, you had Iran doing its thing, the Soviets doing their thing in Afghanistan, was India pretty quiet? I mean, because they're right, 17 miles away or something. Did you feel any threat from them?

EISENBRAUN: Yes, the people in Lahore felt a threat. They were sure that the Soviets were going to roll into the Punjab next. They were sending division after division of their best troops into Afghanistan. What, just to fight the Afghans and to subdue them? The Pakistanis couldn't understand why the Soviets would expend all this effort on the Afghans. There had to be another purpose. The Pakistanis were sure that the Soviets would be striking next into the Punjab and that the Indians were going to cooperate in some fashion. So there was a lot of tension in Lahore. On the other hand, it seems reasonable from the Indian point of view that they were about as shocked as anyone else with the Soviet invasion. It's one thing for the Indian government to have a close military supply relationship with the Soviets and to be allowed to produce some of the materials under license that the Soviets allowed them to do, some of the war materials, but it was quite another to have the Soviets really in their backyard. And after all, India has for decades seen itself as the major player on the South Asian subcontinent and Pakistan as a nuisance. From the Indian point of view, Pakistan was an important rival but still it was India's sphere of influence. And the Soviets weren't any more welcome than the Americans were within their sphere.

Q: I would assume.

EISENBRAUN: So, in fact, I think that the great tension felt in Lahore regarding India was perhaps unfounded. It turned out to be unfounded, in fact, because nothing ever happened, but I don't think that India was doing anything belligerent to fan the flames. But nevertheless there was a palpable sense of tension.

Well then, at the end of January came and I went off to the States and attended the birth of my daughter, Annie, in Iowa.

I barely made it. She was born in the middle of a snowstorm a day or two after I arrived. I stayed several weeks in Iowa. In addition to new daughter Annie, I had to get reacquainted with my 18-month-old son John, who was OK, having recovered from his ear and intestinal infections. Then I had to return to Pakistan in three weeks, leaving my wife Jane to cope with a newborn and a toddler, all camping out with her mother.

So then it was the latter part of February when I returned to Pakistan. I stopped in Washington for some days and talked to people in the NEA (Near Eastern Affairs) bureau, and got caught up on what had happened in Pakistan in my absence. I asked the desk officer, the country director and then the principal DAS, Peter Constable, whether by chance they'd seen my cable from Lahore on the issue of Soviet intentions in Afghanistan. But they all said, no, they couldn't remember having seen it. I went over to the NSC (National Security Council) where a friend, Tom Thornton, was handling South Asia, and over a lunch of sandwiches in his office I asked if he had seen the cable. No, he said he couldn't recall any cable like that. So anyway, I left Washington with a little lesson in humility that not a soul could even recall my cable. In fact, I think probably what happened is that it went directly from my pen to the archives and was never read. Someday maybe I'll do a Freedom of Information request and try to find it.

Well, I flew back out to Pakistan at the end of February. Fuller told me it had been pretty quiet in Lahore while I had been gone, and we settled down to business as usual for a few days. Then, the Ambassador called Fuller up to Islamabad.

Q: Then, the rest of the time you were in Lahore, what was developing particularly as the Afghan conflict was concerned, its impact on where you were?

EISENBRAUN: Well, it never affected our lives very much in Lahore. After the great scare in the winter and spring of 1980 that the Soviets would come marching in, things went pretty much back to normal. We were aware that there were literally, what? Millions of refugees in the northwest frontier province a couple of hundred miles away from Lahore, but no refugees had made their way down to Lahore. I did go out and do a little bit more traveling. Travelled up to the northwest area near the frontier and I did see some refugees on the road but they never made their way into the heart of the Punjab. We were aware that a resistance force had been developed, the mujahidin, Afghan freedom fighters, who were back in the country fighting, and everyone knew that the Americans were helping supply them, but the details I wasn't aware of. There's a book out now called Charlie Wilson's War, which describes Charlie Wilson, the congressman on the appropriations committee who took it as his personal mission to fund the mujahidin. Wilson had to overcome a great deal of skepticism and inertia even in Washington before sufficient resources went out to turn the tide against the Soviets and that took years. But we weren't aware of that in Lahore. All we knew was that American assistance was flowing.

I continued as acting principal officer until July, when a really fine gentleman named John Brims, who had been the deputy in Karachi, was named the consul general. So he came up and we got along really well.

Months and months dragged on in the spring of '80, February, March, April and the dependents were not being allowed to come back. After these shocks of the December-January period, Pakistan settled into pretty much into business as usual, and our fears began to recede that there would be another attack. There was a lot of pressure mounting to bring the families back. It became obvious eventually why the families weren't being brought back because there was this hostage rescue attempt being planned in Washington. That happened, I think, in April of '80. I got no advance warning, of course, because it was, after all, a super secret event. Seems to me it was a Friday afternoon when I heard, and I was at the swimming pool. A call got to me that the DCM was anxious to talk to me. What's going on? He said there's been this rescue attempt in Iran to try to get all the hostages out, but it went wrong and so you should inform the Punjab government and ask for extra security for the consulate. So we got another big contingent of police around the office. The Pakistanis were really very receptive to any security requests we asked for. There was a worry that there would be some kind of retaliation against the United States for this rescue attempt. There was none, however. Afterwards, it was obvious why the families hadn't been allowed to come back for so long.

During this same period, the Chinese premier made an official visit to Pakistan, and General Zia brought him down to Lahore, and the governor held a banquet. It was the only time I was at the governor's mansion in Lahore, which is really quite a splendid place. I was invited to this official dinner, and I think the Pakistani protocol people kind of had fun with the seating assignments, because although there were hundreds of guests, they seated me next to the Iranian consul. This while the hostage crisis was in full swing. Now, it just so happened I knew the Iranian pretty well from prior to the days when the Shah had fled and the Iranians were the only other consulate in Lahore. The diplomats at the Iranian Consulate had been very friendly with the Americans, and his wife used to bring their kids to play at our house. So, how could I give him the cold shoulder a few months later, even though officially I was not supposed to talk to him? He was pretty nervous and I was kind of nervous. Eventually, I asked how's your family? He seemed relieved and replied, well they're back in Teheran, and how's yours? I told him of the birth of my daughter in the States. He seemed grateful that I had acknowledged his presence, and we chatted a little further about the weather and so forth. I didn't report it to Washington.

In early part of June of 1980 the families were allowed to come back and they did. I should say it was kind of dramatic in my case. My wife flew first to Athens with my oldest son, who was 18 months old, and the newest baby, Annie, who was six months old. They intended to visit American friends there for a few days. But while there my son, John, got seriously ill and had to have an operation. So at the last second, I was allowed to fly to Athens to join them. The operation turned out all right, and I was able to accompany them back to Pakistan.

After my wife returned to Lahore, she saw all her old friends and we were back on the social circuit. I had kind of dropped off because I didn't have the energy or the interest to run around to all the parties, and I don't think I was quite as interesting as my wife was, anyway.

The third year, 1981 to '82, was pretty uneventful. The dramatic events of the previous year tended to recede a bit. I was recruited to be the political officer on the India desk in the Department starting in the summer of '81. That was still in the days when the American government was using its excess rupies from India and Pakistan, and the government allowed those posted in India and Pakistan to travel on the Cunard Lines across the Atlantic. There was only a small contingent of us that knew about this travel prospect because the Foreign Service was not advertising it, but I know about a dozen officers and their families who were able to take advantage of that travel. Strangely, Cunard put a caveat on this travel which said one had to go first class, there wasn't any tourist class that they would accept. So the four of us in my family went back across on the Queen Elizabeth II in July of '81, first class. That was a nice way of going back to the States. And so we arrived back in the States in July of '81 and I took up my duties on the India desk.

Q: I was just thinking, you were on the India desk from when to when?

EISENBRAUN: Summer of '81 to the summer of '83.

Q: Did you find it, I mean, having been immersed in Pakistan, how it was it at the India desk?

EISENBRAUN: I was familiar with India because I had been out in the region for the previous five years and had been a student in India for a year, so India was not a foreign country to me. But it was a completely different type of work to come back and learn how to function in the Washington bureaucratic environment. India is such a big country with such diverse interests to Americans, from political to scientific to military to commercial affairs, and it was a huge challenge to learn about all these things.

Q: Well then, were you picking up what the Indian reaction to the Soviet incursion into Afghanistan during this period?

EISENBRAUN: It was not something that dominated our relationship with India, but the Indian Government never lost an opportunity to protest all of the aid we were providing Pakistan. The Indian reaction to Afghanistan did not seem different from the Washington perspective than I had mentioned previously, that it, India did not like to see the Soviets in Afghanistan any more than we did.

Q: Who was the prime minister when you were on the India desk?

EISENBRAUN: Indira Gandhi., who did not have warm feelings for the United States. Most of her coolness probably came from her 1971 experience when she hadn't gotten along well with Richard Nixon and she didn't feel that the United States was sympathetic to India's plight in the events that led to the creation of Bangladesh. I imagine she didn't understand why the Americans didn't give her-or India-its due as a world power. As a matter of fact, she was not alone in that regard. Probably every intellectual in India who dealt with foreign policy, and all those who didn't deal with foreign policy for that matter, couldn't figure out why it was that the Americans couldn't understand that India was on the verge of being a super power and accord them the status they deserved. They wanted even then to be on the UN Security Council, for example, and we would have nothing of it. They were developing a blue water navy, but we saw that as a potential threat. We were focusing a lot of attention on China because Nixon had opened up China some years earlier, and Soviet affairs occupied Washington's attention, not India. In strategic terms, Washington saw India as a friend of the Soviets, so that kept our relationship cool. The Indians couldn't understand how we wouldn't have a bigger strategic point of view and accommodate their interests more. But their interests and our interests hardly ever matched. They saw themselves as the preeminent power in their part of the world, and we were unwilling to recognize that to the extent that they wanted. So there was always tension in the relationship.

Q: We'll pick up some of the other issues later that came up during that period. Great.

Today is May 2, 2005. Steve, we're talking about when you were on the India desk from '81 to '83. Did anyone at the Department look at the relationship with Indira Gandhi figure out how best to make the relationship a little more friendly?

EISENBRAUN: Funny that you should ask that question because that's just what I had planned to talk about. In our relations with India in 1981, we were still recovering from the early 1970s when Mrs. Gandhi got such a frosty reception in Washington. The relationship had not improved very much, especially as we became more friendly with Pakistan after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Also, another major constraint to better relations had to do with India's nuclear program. They had exploded what they called a peaceful nuclear device in 1974; actually I was in India as a student at that time and I saw the outburst of national pride among the students at Delhi University. Even though India said it was a peaceful detonation without military implications, India continued its nuclear research, and some of it had to do with weapons research. We were quite concerned with a particular power plant in India, named Tarapur, that did not have safeguarded fuel, for example.

I came onto the desk in August of '81, just at the time that a new American was named the Ambassador to India. This was Harry Barnes, the first career Foreign Service officer to be named to New Delhi. Harry was a very vigorous and ambitious individual, and he had it in mind from the first day that he was going to do everything in his power to improve the relationship between India and the U.S. He had a variety of ideas for that. Central to his plan was to get Mrs. Gandhi invited to Washington, not on a working visit but on an official, full blown state visit. In one way or another, his whole focus in that first year of his in office was to get her to Washington and he was successful. She came in July of 1982.

A state visit wasn't all Harry had in mind for improving relations. He was not going out to India just to be a representative of the U.S. He was going out there as an active agent for change, positive change. Another of his initiatives for improving relations involved developing a number of bilateral commissions. I don't mean to do injustice to Harry here, but I don't remember how many he created, four or five of them; one for cultural matters, another for commercial affairs, and there must have been some kind of a political commission. His intent was to get very distinguished people from India and America, movers and shakers, who would be able to meet together on a periodic basis and develop programs that would tie the two countries together in such a way that their mutual interests would trump the larger bilateral strains.

He reiterated his goals for the commissions once to me personally as we sat together in Roosevelt House, the Ambassador's residence in New Delhi. I was on a visit to India in September 1982, and over a drink, he had asked me if I had any ideas how he could be more effective in Washington. I said he needed to find some way to be more critical of India, as he had developed a reputation in the Department as India's greatest cheerleader. He ignored my point, saying, Steve, you just don't quite understand that the whole point is to develop closer relations, using the commissions, and here he put his fingers together to form a web, to create an intermeshing of the important institutions and personalities in New Delhi and New York and Washington. His mission was to improve the relationship and I think by and large he did so within the greater constraints that he couldn't really control, that is, the greater strategic issues.

But anyway, I was jumping ahead. The first I spent on the desk was nothing but, in one way or another, developing Harry's relationship all through Washington and New York, wherever there were influential people that needed to know something about India. Harry would in some way or another contrive to meet everybody on Capitol Hill, in the business community, in the arts and cultural world, you name it. Of course the big business community didn't really care about India at that time because India had closed, essentially, its borders to major foreign trade and investment. Harry had only limited success with the business leaders in America, but he tried. His ultimate goal was to introduce Indians to these people.

His efforts happened to coincide with one of these strange events that happen in American popular culture occasionally when certain countries become the fad, and India was immensely popular just then, having caught the American imagination in the early '80s, evidenced by the fact that the movie Gandhi came out in 1982 and won the Academy Award as the Best Picture of the Year. Well, Harry was very happy to take advantage of that public interest.

Let me spend a fair amount of time describing the preparations for and then the execution of Indira Gandhi's visit to the United States in the summer of 1982. That visit is a case study, I think, of how American foreign policy sometimes is made.

Q: Can you first, if you don't mind, what had happened to sour the relationship when she came in 1971 when Nixon was president, just to put the issue in contrast.

EISENBRAUN: Yes, we talked about that earlier, but it's probably worthwhile to just review that for a moment. Mrs. Gandhi came to Washington in December of 1971 and met Kissinger and Nixon at the White House, and the issue was, essentially, the civil war that was going on between East and West Pakistan and those who would say that there was genocide in East Pakistan, in what became Bangladesh. At the time, there was a huge outflow of refugees, up to 10 million of them, into India, primarily into neighboring West Bengal. Mrs. Gandhi said this cannot be tolerated, first on a humanitarian basis and then economically. Her country could not absorb 10 million refugees, and there were terrible things, anyway, being perpetrated by the Pakistani army upon the civilians in what became Bangladesh.

For American strategic reasons, we did not want India to intervene in that situation, which would essentially mean some kind of a conflict, a war between India and Pakistan. We didn't want that instability in South Asia, largely because Nixon and Kissinger were working secretly with Pakistan as a conduit to China. Pakistan and China always had had a close relationship, and Nixon had his goal of being able to open up the doors to China. Kissinger actually flew from Peshawar to China, all facilitated by the Pakistanis. So that's the immediate concern, that we didn't want to have anything jeopardizing the basic stability and relationship of the South Asian countries. We didn't want a war between India and Pakistan that would likely result in the breakup of Pakistan, and who knew how far India would take this because India was going to prevail by force of numbers and who knew if they would keep moving and not just dismember East and West Pakistan but dismember West Pakistan, too. No one knew for sure.

So this was not in American strategic interest to have a war, and I think Mrs. Gandhi we didn't want a war. She thought, however, that she had all the right on her side. The Pakistani army was committing genocide in East Pakistan and why couldn't the American see that? Plus, she had the economic burden of the 10 million refugees. She felt that she had all the cards in her hand, and couldn't understand why the Americans would be so obstinate. And not only obstinate but belligerent. The Americans sent the carrier Enterprise into the Bay of Bengal as a warning to the Indians not to go too far. The clear intent was to tell the Indians, don't go too far vis-à-vis the Pakistanis.

Q: This was the so-called tilt toward Pakistan.

EISENBRAUN: That was the tilt toward Pakistan, that's right. So Mrs. Gandhi felt that she was not treated with proper respect in Washington, that Washington simply did not understand the politics of South Asia, and that only confirmed her hostility anyway toward Americans over the years that went way back to when her father was prime minister when we always favored Pakistan as far as she could see. Then the Americans were equally antagonized because they thought they had assurances from her that there would be no war, and within weeks she attacked. So each side felt betrayed.

So now that ill-will lingered, that legacy. That was '71 and so now it was '81, 10 years later. You'd think in 10 years things would calm down and cool off, but they didn't sufficiently. There was still a great deal of antagonism in New Delhi and in Washington and you know, India didn't matter as much then as it does now. India is now emerging onto the world as a major player, and it is now a nuclear power and so forth, but in the early 80s, India didn't matter quite as much then to American strategic planners, who had their eyes fixed on China and the Soviet Union and the Middle East. And so India was second or third tier.

Well, Harry Barnes, looking at his relationship as Ambassador, was going to change the relationship as much as possible. He lobbied the Indian government to open up their country to American investment and trade. He had to work both sides. To say nothing of the political relationship, he wanted to impress upon the Indians that we had no choice strategically but to support Pakistan when the Soviets had invaded Afghanistan, but he also argued to the Indians that look, you shouldn't really be so antagonistic about this because you don't want the Soviets on your doorstep either. Fine to be friendly with them, but the Soviets had gone too far and they're threatening your interests in South Asia and so we're merely doing essentially your bidding and you don't have to do anything except recognize it, be friendlier to us. He had a fairly strong argument there, he wasn't whistling in the wind. In addition to all the commissions he was developing and all the other arguments he was making to policymakers, I think it's fair to say that the idea of Mrs. Gandhi coming on a state visit originated with him. I can't remember any other element within the U.S. government that was leading this. I think it was Harry Barnes; he created it and he made it happen.

He was aided in this by the fact that there was a very friendly, gregarious president, Ronald Reagan, in the White House. Several of us had a chance to meet him a couple of times in this period. The White House started this practice; I don't know if other administrations had done it, of the President meeting the Ambassador and his family before their going out overseas, and including desk officers in the Oval Office meeting.

Q: I think he was the only one.

EISENBRAUN: He may have been. And getting a photograph taken and sitting down for 15, 20 minutes and chitchatting, and it was nice to include the desk officer in this. So in October of '81 Harry Barnes and his wife and I believe his daughter, we all went over to the White House to the Oval Office. I just watched, but at one point, someone motioned that I should join one of the photographs but I said no. Obviously, this was Harry Barnes and his family's time. I think that was the first time that Harry had met President Reagan, but not the last as I'll tell later, but anyone who met him, even for five minutes, could be charmed by him because he was just such a nice guy. I think Harry Barnes realized this was a great political asset, that if Prime Minister Gandhi and President Reagan could get together, she too could be charmed, regardless of her famous reserve. Turned out to be the case.

Did you want to ask a question?

Q: Oh, no, no, no. I think this is excellent.

EISENBRAUN: I think it's a case study in the making of foreign policy, where the personal relationships factor in. Because it runs contrary to a lot of what we learn in graduate school about the making of foreign policy. We learn so much about the institutional pressures or the historical pressures and the military alliances and the commercial relationships and so forth. Those are the determinants of foreign policy. And of course they are. And so it's true also in this case, we're talking about the history of 1971 as a factor in '81 and the strategic relationships in Pakistan, Soviet invasion, these were major background factors. But there sometimes is a personal factor too, as there was in this case.

As background, let me point out that it's a bureaucratic miracle when any foreign leader gets invited to the White House as part of a state visit. I think the Gandhi visit in '82 was the first of the Reagan Administration.

OK, so in the weeks in the summer of '82 leading up to the visit, we on the desk were engulfed in the creation of all the papers that go into the briefing books, both for the State Department officials and for the White House. Anyone who's worked at the State Department at the desk level knows that it's all encompassing for months in advance, and I didn't do all the papers; I was one of about four who worked on various aspects, but I did the political papers, or I did the first drafts because they were massaged a lot on the way up the line, too. Still, I was able to observe some of the ad hocism that developed.

Secretary of State Alexander Haig resigned suddenly in the summer of '82 over issues related to Israel and Lebanon. George Shultz became the Secretary of State a week or ten days before Mrs. Gandhi was to arrive in the latter part of July. Harry Barnes had had a meeting scheduled with the Secretary to give him a short brief a few days before the visit. It turned out that now it wasn't Haig but George Shultz getting the briefing. It happened to be Shultz's first day in office. I went up there to join the briefing with Harry. Shultz said, well, I'm certainly pleased, Harry, that you're here to tell me a bit about this coming visit, because I don't really know a lot about the America-India relationship. That was Harry's opportunity to give Shultz the lecture on the importance of the improving the relationship, which Shultz didn't disagree with.

Mrs. Gandhi's office communicated to the embassy that she wanted to send a personal and secret envoy to Secretary of State Shultz to talk about this visit a few days before she arrived. This envoy's visit was not to be made known even to the Indian Embassy in Washington. Utterly secret. The Americans said OK. There was a lot of curiosity about the meaning of all this because there was no advance briefing about what the secret envoy's mission was going to be about.

Now, I am sorry to say for historic purposes I do not remember the name of the imminent individual. He was an elderly and distinguished gentleman. I'm smiling as I recall this gambit; we on the desk kind of believed the ploy at the time, or at least were willing to play along with the game. Now, looking back after 23 years, I think, I silly--how could this man's visit be secret to the Indian Ambassador in Washington? But that's what the Indians in New Delhi were asking us to believe. So, the afternoon that he was scheduled to come to the Department, I was sent down to the lobby to meet him. As I entered the C street lobby, I saw coming in the door Hemant (HK) Singh, the first secretary for political affairs from the Embassy, and my principal contact and good friend. I had been meeting him almost every day to go over details of the visit. Here he was, walking in the lobby all by himself just when the "secret" envoy was to arrive. I was astonished, I'm playing the game, so I stepped behind a pillar. Fortunately, HK went on into the Department apparently for some other meeting, and he missed me hiding behind the pillar.

I then walked out of the C Street entrance and stood on the sidewalk under the portico, not knowing exactly what was going to happen next. I expected a limo to pull up, but instead, here came this elderly Indian gentleman strolling around the corner and up the drive by himself. I assumed that this must be the man, so I walked down and said I believe you are here to see Secretary Shultz. He replied, yes indeed. I said, well, I believe he's waiting for you. We walked into the building, and there wasn't much of a check-in process in those days, and I took him up in the secretary's private elevator, which had been pre-arranged. We got out on the seventh floor in the anteroom in front of the secretary's office, and there were four or five officials out there; you know, the logical people who would attend such a meeting. But somebody from the secretary's office said no, no, no, this has to be a small meeting. So, the only Americans who went in were assistant secretary Veliotis and myself, with Shultz. None of us knew what the agenda was.

I'd like to report that it was earth shaking. It was not. The envoy was relaxed and friendly and reported that Mrs. Gandhi was looking forward to her visit and constructive talks, and she hoped the Americans were doing the same. There was no bombshell, nothing else; it was merely that she was coming with an open mind and a friendly smile. However, we thought this was pretty important.

Q: Oh, absolutely.

EISENBRAUN: This news relaxed us, and although he and Shultz spent a few minutes reviewing some of the major issues to be discussed, there wasn't any real substance to it. The envoy had only one message, and he had given it, so he took his leave, and I escorted him back to the Department entrance, where he walked off down the street.

Q: Actually, it was a very clever move, I mean, to set the tone because otherwise it could have been a bit like two suspicious dogs sniffing each other.

EISENBRAUN: Well, that's right. I see it as the personal side of the making of foreign policy, and also another example of the ad hoc nature of foreign policy because it came up suddenly only a few days before the visit. But there was more that took everyone by surprise.

Mrs. Gandhi arrived in New York. Let me tell a little vignette about where she stayed. A skilled, young and beautiful lady named Gail who worked in protocol handled the logistical details of the visit. Gail later became President Reagan's personal secretary. Anyway, the issue was that Mrs. Gandhi let it be known that she would stay only at the Carlyle Hotel in a particular suite. We were told her family, the great Nehru family had been coming to New York for a 100 years and they had always stayed in that suite and so she was going to stay there again. As luck would have it, there was someone else booked in that suite. Since the Carlyle is a pretty fancy if discreet place, I imagine that that guest was important too. Somehow, Gail worked it out, and Mrs. Gandhi got her suite. That's neither here nor there, I just thought it was an interesting little side story of the visit.

Anyway, Mrs. Gandhi arrived in New York for a day before coming to Washington. I went up to join the American entourage escorting her to Washington. We had done all our papers for the White House, the Secretary was briefed to the extent he deemed necessary, everything was set. Then we were told by the White House that they had a different idea than we did of how the meetings were going to be conducted at the White House. We had provided extensive background papers and talking points for those meetings, which we assumed the principals, including the President, would use as they conducted the meetings. The White House or NSC staff, however, decided to change the plan.

We were told that President Reagan and his people were not going to play a substantive role in the meetings. The President planned to turn everything over to his secretary of state. But that isn't how we had prepared any of our briefing books. Secretary Shultz didn't have adequate material to conduct the entire process himself. At the last minute, the office director, Howie Schaffer had to recast everything almost single-handedly. Howie told me later that that was the hardest day of his 30-some years in the Foreign Service. .

The ad hocism didn't stop there. The next morning we all went to the White House to enjoy the impressive welcoming ceremony of a major leader on a State visit, with its colonial marching band and speeches, and twenty-one gun salute, and so forth. Somehow we learned that at the very last moment the White House had decided that President Reagan was going to have a one-on-one meeting with Mrs. Gandhi in the Oval Office after the pageantry. There were to be no handlers, no notetakers, no one else. That hadn't been in the plan, as far as I knew. It occurs to me now that such a meeting might have been planned all along, and the White House hadn't considered it important to tell us at State, but I don't think so because of what developed after the receiving line and the two leaders went off to the Oval Office and shut the door.

What were they going to talk about? Anyway, as the receiving line ended, a few of us were invited to step into a smaller room off the grand foyer, maybe the Red Room. The few of us were the Vice President, George H.W. Bush, Secretary Shultz, the First Lady, the Indian Ambassador and the Indian Foreign Minister, and maybe a half dozen others, including my wife and me. We just stood around, waiting on the President and Mrs. Gandhi. There was nothing to do but stand around. Nobody even sat down, and there weren't enough chairs anyway. I remember introducing myself to the Vice President, and introducing my wife to him, and we chatted for a moment about the nice weather.

In the meantime, Nancy Reagan took Shultz aside to a corner, and talked earnestly and quietly to him, and he listened intently with hardly any question or comment that I could see. Remember, he had not been on the job more than a week or so. This may have gone on for 45 minutes, this standing around, with Nancy off in the corner with Shultz. Sometimes she gestured with her finger, emphasizing a point, and he listening like a schoolboy. I have no idea what she was talking about but whatever it was it was really serious.

I was enjoying just standing around observing all this, and then, unfortunately, I was called away and had to go out to the foyer by the grand staircase, where there was a phone. It was someone in protocol calling from State. The question was, what to do with Mrs. Gandhi's son Rajiv, who had come on the visit with his family, although he was not listed as an official member of the delegation. Protocol had assumed he would take part in the White House meetings, after the one-on-one. Now, protocol had learned that Rajiv was not to be in the meetings, so what to do with him? I suggested, or maybe I just agreed, that he would go around and see the monuments with a car and an escort.

By the time I was finished with that meeting and had walked around back to the Red Room, the Oval Office meeting had concluded, and it was time for my wife and me to leave. Historians will have to look into the archives to see if there is any record of that one-on-one meeting, but as we understood it at the time there was no observer. I can only imagine that President Reagan used his personal charm, and I don't think there was any guile to it, I'll bet; it was just that he was interested in getting to know this lady. I suspect they didn't talk very much about bilateral relations, either. I don't know what they talked about and in the week that followed, there was no readout, no report. Perhaps no one knows. That's hard to believe. Does our government work that way? Whatever, I'm sure the full brunt of his charm was brought to bear, and I think it worked, because it turned out to be a really pleasant week-long visit. There were no tensions that I can remember. She was true to her word; she was friendly. And of course the President looked like he was having the time of his life.

The White House really made an effort to impress and show respect to the leaders of India. The conductor of the New York Philharmonic at that time was Zubin Mehta, originally from India. It was a natural for the whole Philharmonic Orchestra to come to the White House to give a concert on the eveing of the State Dinner, to which my wife and I were invited. We were told this had never been done in the history of the White House. Fortunately, it was a beautiful night, and the concert was held out on the south lawn.

My desk colleague, Dan Waterman and his wife, also attended from the office. We didn't have any idea how one should arrive at the White House, and we never thought to get protocol's advice. I changed into my tux in the men's room at State and strolled over to the White House gate behind the Old Executive Office Building, and my wife drove downtown in our little VW Rabbit. Fortunately, at that hour, about 6:30 pm, it was easy for her to find a parking place around the White House. Mrs. Waterman had done the same, and the four of us met up at the gate without any advance planning.

In the meantime, there is this long parade of big black limosines lined up coming into the White House. All the other guests were savvy enough to have figured out that one rented a limosine for the evening. Quite stately and slowly, they went up the drive, stopped under the portico and as the guests stepped out and handed the invitation to a doorman, their names were announced on a loudspeaker. But we didn't have a car, so the four of us just strolled up the driveway. Fortunately, we did get in because we had our invitations. .

The evening was quite something. Our office had been asked to suggest people for the guest list, but our list had been small, and there were several hundred guests present. The trouble with White House dinners like this is that there is no guest list posted, so you don't know who else is there unless you recognize a face. You only learn when the guest list is published in the paper the next morning. You just have to mingle and find out who is who. The singer Wayne Newton and his wife were there, and my wife and I hit it off with them and later sitting with them during the concert.

Q: Well, how did the rest of the tour go?

EISENBRAUN: The rest of the tour went without a hitch. I was lucky enough to be part of the group that travelled with Mrs. Gandhi to Los Angeles and Honolulu. It is standard that the White House offered one of the Presidential planes for the in-country part of the visit, and the plane we used was also Air Force One when the President was onboard. She flew to Los Angeles, and the California governor, Jerry Brown, was waiting for her and so was the mayor of Los Angeles, Tom Bradley. I think she had a very fine visit in Los Angeles, marred from her side just slightly by the fact that there's a large Sikh community in California and so there were noisy demonstrations outside of the hotel demanding that she recognize their interest in a separate homeland for the Sikh community in India. I don't know to what extent Mrs. Gandhi was affected by them. It certainly didn't appear that she even paid any attention. She essentially set her own agenda in California, and we had little to do but sightseeing for a day. Howie and I took a stroll down Rodeo Drive to the Beverly Hills Hotel. I know Mrs. Gandhi had a meeting with Armand Hammer, who was a real friend of India and the Nehru family, going back decades. He was the chairman of one of the major oil companies.

Q: Occidental.

EISENBRAUN: Occidental, that's it

Q: This is tape six, side one with Steve Eisenbraun. Yes.

EISENBRAUN: A lot of her meetings in California were personal, although there was a big reception in the evening. Amazingly we saw some of the same Indians and Americans at the events in Los Angeles as we had in Washington, including Zubin Mehta.

Ten we flew on to Hawaii and by the time we got there all the major meetings were over and it was just- time to relax and have a good time. Some wealthy Americans in Hawaii gave an elegant dinner for her and she presented a baby elephant to the zoo. That brought an end to her seven days or so in the States. Mrs. Gandhi was relaxed, friendly and joking at the zoo in her presentation of the elephant, and you could see that the Indian delegation thought this visit had been a great success. She had been received lavishly and that had made a difference, I think, in the relationship between New Delhi and Washington. So this helped Harry Barnes in his quest for improved relations.

I want to recount an incident in Hawaii after Mrs. Gandhi departed. Harry Barnes had engineered a luncheon with Admiral Robert Long, the Commander of the U.S. Pacific Command, at his hilltop office overlooking Pearl Harbor. Howie and I joined the lunch, but all I remember of it now is that at the end, Admiral Long asked Howie and me if we had had a chance to visit the Battleship Arizona memorial during the trip. We said no, there hadn't been time, and the plane was leaving in an hour or two. He replied, you can't leave without seeing the Arizona, and he turned to his aide and ordered, Lieutenant, use a staff car and escort these people down to Pearl and to the memorial! So the lieutenant did, moving us through the various security checkpoints rapidly enough that we got to join a tourist boat out to the memorial and then get to neighboring Hickam Field in time for the flight. I am grateful to Admiral Long for making that visit possible, as I haven't been back to Hawaii since. I am doubly grateful also because, at that time, there was a veteran volunteering at the memorial that had been at Pearl Harbor during the attack on December 7, 1941. He answered lots of questions about that day and about serving on a submarine from the war, also berthed there. I wanted to tell this story for the benefit of my oldest son, John, who is now a lieutenant in the navy and serves on a nuclear submarine in the Pacific.

OK, almost immediately after returning to Washington, I began preparations for a long trip out to India. I spent three weeks or so on that trip, going to all the major cities before heading off to Lahore again, then London. Everywhere, the topic of discussion was Mrs. Gandhi's trip. Many astute Indians asked what had been achieved by the visit. On most visits, it would be standard to sign some kind of agreement or come to some understanding of how relations would be improved, but there was none of that to point to. In this case, it was mostly atmospherics. Some of the observers in India probably didn't share the same enthusiasm that I was conveying, that oh, this had been a very fine visit and that this will make a difference, at least in the short run, in bilateral relations.

I found the situation there troubling for Mrs. Gandhi. Everywhere I went, after they talked about the visit, political leaders of all stripes talked about how difficult Mrs. Gandhi's political situation was in India and that she had serious trouble with this Sikh rebel movement in the Punjab that was seeking an independent homeland called Khalistan. That was the group which had demonstrated in front of her hotel in Los Angeles and that she had ignored. I heard also that the Congress Party that she headed was not being responsive to people's needs on the local level and that it was a shadow of what it had been in its heyday under her father, Jawaharlal Nehru. I was surprised. I think it's fair to say this kind of reporting was not coming out of the embassy in Delhi in great quantity.

I remember I came back to Washington and wrote a trip report entitled Political Potholes for Mrs. Gandhi in which I noted the Sikh problem and the lack of responsiveness of the party. That paper should be in the archives and probably still sits there. I'm curious what exactly I said in light of what happened a few years later, that is, the assassination of Mrs. Gandhi by members of her Sikh bodyguard.

Maybe I can turn to just a few other items during my tenure as desk officer and then we'll put that era to rest.

Q: By the time she made her state visit, I believe there had been a serious incident at the Golden Temple. Had that happened yet or not? I can't remember.

EISENBRAUN: No, that happened in June, 1984. Sikh militants had taken over the Golden Temple in Amritsar, the holiest spot for Sikhs, and the Indian army was called to flush them out.

Q: How about Bhopal? When did that happen?

EISENBRAUN: December 1984. Poisonous gases leaked out of a pesticide plant, causing approximately 2,000 deaths, the worst industrial accident in history.

Q: What company was that?

EISENBRAUN: It was the American-owned Union Carbide company.

Q: Union Carbide, yes.

EISENBRAUN: Are there any other questions before?

Q: No, no.

EISENBRAUN: There are a few other personal things that were kind of interesting during that tenure. One, of course, was the movie, Gandhi, which had its American premiere in Washington in the winter following Mrs. Gandhi's visit. That would have been late '82 or early '83.

Q: It was a British production?

EISENBRAUN: Yes, it was a British film, with its world premiere in New Delhi. The Washington event was held at the Uptown Theater on Connecticut Avenue, if you know it. The event was a pretty glittering thing. Virtually nobody at the working level at State was being invited, but I was able to get tickets for my wife and me and Howie and his wife, Tezi.

This is how that happened. There was a gentleman who was Under Secretary for Cultural Affairs in the Reagan administration by the name of Daniel Terra. He was an influential man on the arts scene from Chicago. He took a major interest in India during the two years I was on the India desk, and certainly was a figure in the social side of the Gandhi visit. I had become friendly with his office staff, including his secretary. OK, so the movie premiere was coming and nobody that we knew of in the State Department was being invited. So I called up Daniel Terra's secretary and pointed this out and said, it sure would be nice if a couple of tickets could be made available. She said you're absolutely right. So she made six to eight tickets available to us. It was only through her good will that she did it, not because we were important.

I think it was supposed to be a 7:30 pm event, so about six we were at the Department and our wives were meeting us separately, just like the White House dinner. We all got in a taxi together to head up to Connecticut Avenue. The traffic was at a virtual standstill, with little movement from Dupont Circle on. We could see a spotlight reflecting off the clouds, and we said, gee, there must be something important going on, I wonder what it is? We were so naïve. As it turned out, the spotlight was for the film, and all the traffic was backed up because of the film and all these limousines and VIPs and so forth arriving and, once again, we were caught completely by surprise, but somehow we did manage to get in. Afterwards, there was a beautiful reception at the Corcoran Gallery of Art, where I met the director, Sir Richard Attenborough. Ben Kingsley, the actor who played Gandhi and who won the Oscar some weeks later as best actor for his performance as Mahatma Gandhi, was not at that reception. I listened to Attenborough as he described the filming in India. He reminded us that Hindus believe in reincarnation. He said that when they filmed at the actual locations where Gandhi had done many of his famous things, there were people around who could still remember seeing the real Gandhi doing the same things, and some people declared he had been reborn.

Q: By the way, on the movie, you know, you get these movies and then all of a sudden a country that's portrayed or something turns it into, you know, takes umbrage at something. I remember I was in Yugoslavia when Lawrence of Arabia came out and the Turks were making a big fuss about it. We had a- we were showing the movie in our embassy club and they were being- we couldn't open it up to the diplomats because the Turks were raising bloody hell. And I was just wondering whether- did the Indians seem to like, I mean, really care for the movie?

EISENBRAUN: I believe so. I never heard a word of criticism from anyone in India. Maybe my memory has dimmed on this, but I remember nothing but praise from the Indian side for this movie, this sympathetic portrayal of Mahatma Gandhi and the fight for independence. I don't know that it was so appreciated, though, in Pakistan because Mohammad Ali Jinnah, the political leader that led the creation of Pakistan, and who was a rival of Gandhi's, was not treated very sympathetically in the film. I certainly heard this from my Pakistani friends, that they didn't appreciate his portrayal.

Q: I might mention this offhand. A USIA (United States Information Agency) officer whose name I forget but I knew he played the British general who brought about the massacre.

EISENBRAUN: In Amritsar.

Q: Yes. He got very, very British and they drafted him for that.

EISENBRAUN: Wow.

Q: Yes.

EISENBRAUN: Yes, that is a very dramatic moment in the film and a terrible moment in history, too.

Now, just a few other things, just fun, but I have to tell them. At another point during my two years, this would have been after the Gandhi visit, I got another call from Daniel Terra's secretary one morning and she said the undersecretary is going to be meeting with the actor Danny Kaye in a few minutes and would you go down to the entrance and meet him and escort him up? I said sure. So I dropped my pencil and went down to the lobby, the same where I had hid behind the pillar when the Indian gentleman had come. Well, in this case I went again outside the doors and this time there was a red carpet put out; some real VIP was coming into the building, but it wasn't there for Danny Kaye. This limousine pulls up and he peeked out the door, saying to me, is it OK to get out, seeing the red carpet.

He's passed on now, so there's a generation that perhaps doesn't even know who I'm talking about, but Danny Kaye was a major Hollywood actor that I recognized immediately. He said to me, is it OK to get out, and I replied, sure, come on in. We went upstairs, and Terra invited me to come in for the meeting. Danny Kaye was there because he was the UNICEF Ambassador of goodwill, and he was a good friend of India and he'd either just been to India or was just about to go. We spent the rest of the morning, at least an hour and a half, being entertained, as Kaye told us story after story.

One story was about this big European palace where he had met some king, and Kaye said he didn't have a clue what to do, and he made this into a sidesplitting monologue. He got up and mimicked or pantomimed what he had done; this long walk up to the throne, stumbling and mumbling. All the while I was thinking, what a lucky guy I am, because I grew up watching Danny Kaye in movies like White Christmas with Bing Crosby

Q: No.

EISENBRAUN: Yes, I think so.

Q: I wouldn't swear to this.

EISENBRAUN: I think so.

Q: It was Bing Crosby and Fred Astaire.

EISENBRAUN: I'm sure it was Danny Kaye in White Christmas. Whatever the case, I grew up watching Danny Kaye in movies, and here I was sitting in the State Department, lucky enough to spend all morning with him. I got a photo shot with him, which is on my office wall at home, along with the photo of the Reagan reception for Mrs. Gandhi.

Sometime in that second year, Walt Rostow, the former national security advisor for Lyndon Johnson, was asked to go on a speaking tour to India. He called up the desk asked to get a briefing in person from the desk officer, that is, me, before going to India. To the younger people listening to this or reading this, they may not even be sure who Walt Rostow was, but he was quite a controversial figure during the Vietnam War because he was a super hawk and that made him very a lightning rod for criticism during Lyndon Johnson's presidency. And here I was, talking to Walt Rostow on the phone, and he said I want to come in and get a briefing about current events in India and our bilateral relationship. And I said to him, well, I'm happy to talk to you but on the other hand, there are more senior people above me you should speak with. He said no, I do not want to meet anyone more senior, I don't want to shake their hand or even know I'm in the building. They'll just give me a line, I don't want to have to hear a line, I want to have a candid, off the record, chitchat. I said okay.

Well, I told my boss, but we followed Rostow's instructions. I went down and met him in the lobby and he came up to my office and we shut the door and nobody came in to shake his hand, no one said a word. I'm sitting there one on one for an hour or more with the former national security advisor. He asked very perceptive questions about India. I wanted to ask him about Vietnam but was too timid until he brought it up. He said people didn't understand our position in Vietnam, and he spoke with passion about the memory. I thought, here I am, a kid from Iowa, seven or eight years into the Foreign Service, and first it's Danny Kaye and now it's Walt Rostow.

In the spring of '82, before the Gandhi visit, around mid-afternoon, my colleague who handled the science and technology matters walked into my office and said, can you imagine this? I just got off the phone with NASA (National Air and Space Administration) and it turns out that America is launching a communications satellite for India from Cape Canaveral tomorrow at 2:00 in the morning. NASA's sending a private jet down to observe the launch and they're asking me if I want to go along. He said, are you crazy, at 2:00 in the morning? That was his attitude. I said, well, wait a minute. I'll go. He said, well, if you want to, here's the NASA telephone number. So I walked into Howie's office and said, hey, let's go down to Cape Canaveral tomorrow. He said great, let's go. So the next day we went over to National Airport, where NASA had this Lear jet for the Indian Ambassador to the UN and us, plus a NASA guide.

En route to Cape Canaveral, a great storm came up that forced the plane to land somewhere remote in Georgia. NASA was fast on its feet and got us to a local Marriott for dinner until the storm abated. Then we had to fly way out into the Atlantic to go around the storm before we could land in Florida. The storm caused the postponement of the launch until the next night at 2:00 am. We were put up at a little Holiday Inn on Cocoa Beach. As a kid, I had gotten up early each time for the first space launches, such as John Glenn's and others, which were all televised.

The question became what to do with us for a day while we waited. So NASA put together an inside tour of the space center that included quite a bit of going around to the original launch pads where the Redstone rockets sent Alan Shepherd into orbit and then where John Glenn was launched. In 1982, these sites had fallen into disrepair, with grass growing out of the launch pad and they had been abandoned, basically, for the bigger launch pads being prepared for the space shuttle, which had not been launched yet.

That night at 2:00 in the morning we all got on the bus and went to an observation spot about a half mile away from the launch site. For people who haven't observed a night launch, it is something else. The brightness of the rocket, and this wasn't even the largest rocket that's in the American inventory, but it was just, I mean, I had no idea how bright the glare would be from the exhaust and how it lit up the entire landscape from horizon to horizon, , like the second coming of Christ. And then, as bright as it had been, the rocket disappeared in the clouds and the glare faded away.

Q: Well, back just a touch to this time, this '81 to '83 period. In December of '79 the Soviets invaded Afghanistan and a war was developing there. How were relations as we observed them between India and the Soviet Union during this period?

EISENBRAUN: Well, I touched on that earlier. The relationship continued to be close.

Q: Basically I really was asking, by '81 things had developed. Where did the relationship stand while you were on the desk?

EISENBRAUN: The Soviets had given the Indians license to produce locally many military items, such as a fighter jet, if my memory is accurate. This was a potentially destabilizing element in South Asia, and the commercial relationship was fairly strong as well. There were a lot of really bright Indian students who were being sent to Moscow for training at no cost to the students. I met some of these students later. They said that although they appreciated the free education, but they had had virtually no interchange with the Soviet people. The Indians said they sensed a certain degree of condescension from the Soviets. I don't know that that people-to-people relationship paid off very much. The Indians got educated, but it didn't buy the Soviets any particular goodwill.

A phrase we often used in our briefings was that we sought "a constructive" relationship. By that we meant we know it's not going to be warm and friendly despite one-on-one meetings in the White House and so forth, there were great strategic barriers to having a seriously close relationship. But hopefully the relationship wouldn't deteriorate into verbal insults and trouble back and forth either. And so the middle ground was a constructive relationship. If anyone goes back to look at our talking points, if they're ever possible to find, you will see that word constructive appearing a lot. I know that was one of Howie Schaffer's favorite phrases.

I don't remember whether this was prior to or after Mrs. Gandhi's visit. Anyway, she gave a speech in which she blamed the foreign hand for whatever the trouble was at that moment in India. Well, that's code in India for either interference from Pakistan or interference from America. In this case it was pretty clear that she meant America. Her remarks broke in Washington in the morning, and Larry Eagleburger as Under Secretary for Political Affairs called in the Indian Ambassador, a man named Narayan who later became the president of India. I was there as the note taker, and I have to tell this about Eagleburger, he was a master at controlling situations either with brilliance, humor or toughness. In this case there was hardly any pleasantries, he simply shook the Ambassador's hand and sat him down and there was silence for a moment or two. It was Eagleburger's meeting, so the Indian was waiting.

Then, Eagleburger dropped the palm of his hand down on his leg very hard and sudden, and he got the angle just right, so the report was like a shotgun going off. We all jumped a foot in the air. Then he said I don't want anymore of this nonsense. What is this foreign hand baloney we're hearing from Mrs. Gandhi in New Delhi? I won't stand for it. That's crazy and you know it and I won't have it and you go tell her so. And that was the end of the meeting. The Indian said, yes, sir, and left.

Q: Spell her first name.

EISENBRAUN: Well, it's an adopted name from Nigeria, Aduah. On my last day of work a year later, a few of us went for beers as a farewell, and she admitted then that her original first name had been Patricia, but there are few who knew that.

So, back on my first day in August, 1992, Aduah said she really needed help, because she said, frankly I'm not a very good writer, not so good at drafting things, but I'm good with people and policy ideas. And that she was—superb, actually, as I learned from working with her. She said help me out. Okay, I said, that's fine. As it turned out, almost unbelievably, I ended up at first with the same portfolio that I had at just left at IO/UNP, because Senator Simon had the same interests, UN peacekeeping, Somalia, apartheid., but his interests ranged over the whole African continent, of course.

I was able to draw on the knowledge I had gained in the two previous years. First off, she asked me to do a briefing paper for Senator Simon on the Somalia situation. She said he'll be meeting with some senior people when he gets back from the August recess. Well, it was exactly the same type of assignment I'd had in the State Department. I discovered it was a lot easier writing a briefing memo on the committee staff, because I didn't have to clear it with anybody; I just showed it to Aduah. She made a couple of worthwhile suggestions and it went to Senator Simon.

When we did bigger briefing papers, there was one clearance to be obtained and that was from the committee staffer on the other side, the Republican side of the committee. At that time the ranking Republican member was Senator Jesse Helms. Helms had a good fellow doing African work. Tom Callahan. I just bumped into him the other day and he's working in the Department himself now, 13 years later, as an appointee. So anyway, that was the only clearance needed. On the smaller matters, I worked just with Aduah, putting her thoughts on paper, and adding my own. We worked well together. Anyone could have worked well with her. She had the kind of inclusive personality that brought people to her, and everyone wanted to help her and be associated with her.

Since I mentioned Senator Helms and his staff, it's worth a minute to note that, as I learned, it was unusual to have someone friendly, like Tom Callahan, on the republican staff in Helms' office. People on the democratic staff said that his previous staffers had been so uncooperative, so mean, frankly, that no one could work with them, and someone high ranking, I don't know who, had put his foot down and instructed Helms to restructure his committee staff.

Helms and his previous staff had caused a lot of grief at State over the years. I remember in 1983 going up with the new India desk office director, Victor Tomseth, to meet with a few of Helms' people when, if memory serves, Helms was planning a hearing on the issue of a separate homeland for the Sikhs in India, some of whom were fighting the Indian Government. Victor's point was that these radical Sikhs were terrorists, and that to give them the recognition of a hearing before the SFRC would cause trouble in our bilateral relations with India. The Helms staffers were indifferent to this; in fact, causing trouble for U.S. foreign policy may have been their primary purpose in the proposed hearing. Victor said he knew something about terrorists from his days as a hostage in Iran and that the proposed hearing would not be a good thing; they replied, sneering, well, you weren't a real hostage anyway because you were held at the Foreign Ministry. (Victor had been the second ranking hostage and had been at a meeting at the Foreign Ministry when the embassy was attacked.) That's the kind of people they were. By the way, Victor, a modest gentleman if there ever was one, would not have mentioned his experience as a hostage, but he had been asked to do it by someone higher at State.

BARBARA J. GOOD
Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
Calcutta (1981-1984)

Barbara J. Good joined the Foreign Service in 1951 and served in La Paz, Rome, Buenos Aires, Kobe/Osaka, Paris, Calcutta, Amman, and Washington, DC. This interview took place on May 25, 1993.

Q: Before we go back to the Reagan-Bush thing, you worked in Calcutta, didn't you, for a couple of years, what were you doing?

GOOD: I was then very fortunate to be accepted on detail to USIS in Calcutta as Cultural Affairs Officer for 2 1/2 years from 1981 to 1984. The education and cultural program is one of the most effective ways of putting a human face on America and Americans in foreign lands and is a central and indispensable vehicle for promoting our international objectives in the political, social, commercial, economic and trade arenas.

My previous multilateral experience contributed significantly to my role as CAO with responsibilities as Director at the American University Center (AUC) and the libraries in both the AUC and the American Center (AC). Serving in a highly intellectual city was unique; one of the most rewarding experiences of my 37 years in the Foreign Service. Perhaps the most impressive element was related to collaboration with high-level Foreign Service Nationals (FSN) who worked in USIS American Centers. Calcutta Bengali FSNs are among the most intelligent, creative and work-oriented employees of any USIS operation in the world. As a result we were able to accomplish outstanding programs and relations with leaders throughout our Consular district.

At the AUC, in addition to presenting dissemination of key U.S. foreign and economic concepts (in order to challenge Marxist world views as subscribed to by important elite groups in Calcutta), I was required to strengthen and increase both educational and cultural programs and projects in the arts. I had to achieve this goal by expanding programs which stressed their inter-relationship, and carried out U.S. policy on advancing human rights for all minority groups with particular emphasis on rights of women by developing contacts with experts in this field in Eastern India. After 4 months in office my boss described my accomplishments as a remarkable job in both adapting to and being productive in a totally new job and cultural environment; an environment demanding enough to test the capabilities of even experienced officers. USIS Calcutta was much larger than many single-country posts in the Near East/South Asia, and a review of my work requirements indicated both the deep substance and considerable variety of work as Program Officer, that I charted for myself at the beginning of my assignment.

During USIS's planned Reduction in Force (RIF) I was able to play a special role. This was an extremely difficult period for FSNs and members of my staff at the AUC who felt particularly vulnerable inasmuch as one of the options was to close the Center. Allaying their fears and apprehensions in a city with practically no employment opportunities presented a challenge in winning their confidence and trust in helping to cushion the blow of the RIF.

With a reduction in the Indian personnel force the work situation became even more demanding of my patience and perseverance, especially since we lost such outstanding FSNs who were artists and cultural affairs experts.

My concern for human rights and women's rights in particular, resulted in my calling for an extension of post audiences to include Indian women prominent in business, social, political and educational fields. As a result of my contact with such people, and the women and men of Calcutta's media world, I was invited to discuss human rights issues with them in media sessions.

In addition to facing the frustrations arising from the continued deterioration of basic facilities of communications and transport in Calcutta, the AC and the AUC were subject to an unprecedented number of anti-American demonstrations, sometimes numbering one a day. Often students who participated in these demonstrations would tell me that they would join us in our international visitor dialogue programs right after their demonstrations ended. As an example of Indian resentment of U.S. foreign policy, AC's Library was attacked and ransacked on June 23, 1982 by 300 students protesting against an American who was alleged to have tried to destroy a mosque in Israel. But many Indian AC participants supported us and denounced the students' action. One Indian participant in an AUC program denounced our role in promoting foreign policy with press releases because he said they had enough toilet paper in their bathroom and didn't need our press releases for that purpose!

Also, for nearly eight months during this period the post was without a Branch PAO, obliging me to often assume important management responsibilities (including the Acting Branch PAO). On human rights and social processes I helped to lay the groundwork for a linkage with Jadavpur University's Department of International Relations and an American University and was able to convince USIS to send an international legal expert and activist Professor Richard Lillich. His visit marked the highpoint of the post's activities in the field of human rights since the 1981 Human Rights Day seminar resulted in a publication of the seminar papers on human rights implementation. His lecture at Calcutta University was tied in with that institution's 125th anniversary. Audiences were challenged to take a more active role locally in the enforcement of human rights. One of the AC's supporters -international lawyer Subrata Roy Chowdhury, who also served as legal adviser to Prime Minister Indira Gandhi, took off two weeks from his job to work with our task force and help to put this program together effectively. While it took two years to strengthen contacts and initiate long range programs in the field of human rights, I believe we finally developed a strong group of academics, social workers and legal experts working together to increase the enforcement of human rights. As a result of one of our programs there was interest in procedural aspects in utilizing international law in India with the ultimate goal of establishing a human rights law institute in Calcutta.

I was invited to address the Women's Christian College in Madras on the inauguration of their course in women's studies, having been instrumental in advising them on how to set up the women's studies course. This was related to my former position when I was assigned to the Secretariat for the U.S. National Commission for UNESCO and worked to convince UNESCO to broaden internationally women's studies.

In previous seminars I presented papers on women's rights and social justice in the U.S. I played a leadership role in organizing and participating in Hyderabad American Studies Research Center's Seminar on "Indian Perspectives of the Women's Movement in the U.S." I was then instrumental in organizing a follow-up seminar in Calcutta on "Women, Family and Social Change." I invited some of the leading Indian women experts whom I had met at the UN when I was Alternate Delegate to the UN Commission on the Status of Women and other leaders of successful organizations throughout India to participate in the seminar in order to provide a more positive view in Calcutta of efforts underway to improve the status of women. Given group rivalries, this took considerable time and patience in gaining the confidence of the leaders of these organizations and convincing them to work together. As a result of this seminar I worked with FSNs and US Consul General George Sherman and his wife Nancy to establish a Women's Resource Center. This coalition of women's nongovernmental organizations comprised both traditional entities along with the more newly established radical feminist groups. This was obvious proof of what American CAOs can provide in "institution building" and with highly talented FSNs you can achieve far more.

Through a series of programs with this network of NGOs and social workers we sought to improve the status of women and minimize misperceptions of the women's movement in the U.S. by providing a forum for similar organizations to exchange ideas and resolve mutual problems.

Working with Indian colleagues at the AUC we were successful in carrying out an "alternative programming" concept to counter the influence of predominantly doctrinaire Soviet Marxist ideology in academic circles in Calcutta. The Center provided a forum for such ideologues, primarily academics, to interact with proponents of alternatives to Marxism.

Since many Bengalis thoroughly support American jazz, the American University Center developed a Jazz Club in Calcutta. When I was Director I was able to increase the knowledge and support of American jazz because this is a field I have focused on for decades, especially since this is one of the most unique contributions the U.S. has made to the world -- jazz, a truly classical style of music. It was my pleasure to introduce visiting American jazz musicians and describe the history and background at our jazz festivals where thousands of jazz lovers joined us. When I lectured in South Asia last January the members of the Jazz Club held a special party for me and we played many jazz tapes with primary focus on my brother Jerry Good, a jazz musician who formed a group titled the San Francisco Jazz Express. When I was assigned in Calcutta the Jazz Club requested his group visit them, but USIS couldn't afford to fund him. Unfortunately, Jerry died in 1990 at 55. In reflection of my fascinating assignment in Calcutta it was particularly gratifying to have been invited to deliver lectures in Calcutta as well as outside our Consular District and to moderate seminars at Calcutta University or participate in poetry reading programs for the public and media organized by local groups. In sum, I felt totally at home in public diplomacy and when I return to Calcutta these days it is like going home to family.

Now that I am working against female sexual slavery with the Coalition Against Trafficking Women and the International Abolitionist Federation, I am still in contact with women leaders and NGOs in India such as the All Bengal Women's Union which has spent decades rescuing women who are forced into prostitution, educating them and finding them careers and husbands.

HARRY G. BARNES JR.
Ambassador
India (1981-1985)

Ambassador Barnes was born in Minnesota and raised in Minnesota and New York. He was educated at Amherst College and Columbia University. After service in the US Army in World War II, he joined the Foreign Service and was posted in 1950 to Bombay, India. His other foreign posts include Prague, Moscow, Kathmandu and Bucharest. He served as United States Ambassador to Romania (1974-1977; India (1981-1985) and Chile (1985-1996) in addition to having several senior level assignments at the State Department in Washington. Ambassador Barnes was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: You've told us your very first assignment in the Foreign Service was to Bombay in 1951. Thirty years later you will serve as Ambassador from 1981 to 1985. [Editor's Note: Ambassador Barnes presented his credentials on November 17, 1981 and departed post in June 1985.] Before you went to post, what was the situation in India? Who was the prime minister? How were relations? What was going on there?

BARNES: The Prime Minister at the time was Indira Gandhi who had been ousted from office by elections some years earlier and had come back on an abolish poverty platform, and in part on the basis of not very great competence of the party that had taken her place. The attitude in Washington, because of the extreme, I would say non-alignment, approach of India, plus by that time you were beginning to get the spill over from the Afghan situation and the India government, if anything, was "understanding" about the Soviet motives for moving into Afghanistan. Whereas the United States was just beginning to figure out ways to dislodge the Soviets from there, which of course was a preoccupation for a number of years after that. All in all a negative cast, perception from the U.S. government's standpoint. Does the name Bud McFarlane mean anything to you? He was National Security Advisor. I mention him because about the time I was getting ready to go to India later in the year, he made a trip to Pakistan and to India, and brought back, not surprisingly in the context I was describing, pretty negative impressions of the Indian situation and its potential for complicating, if not harming, the U.S. policy as seen at that time.

Q: As you prepared for your congressional hearings and all, what issues did you perceive were going to be particularly important?

BARNES: Security, in the context I was talking about, the Afghan situation and Indian sympathy, if not actual support, for the Soviet position. Indo-Pakistan relations in the sense that Pakistan was seen, the phrase varied, as a key bulwark against Soviet intentions. Domestically, inhospitable Indian attitudes toward foreign investment in general, but American investment in particular. A series of problems or complaints from the American side, which were matched in their own way by the Indian side. The atmosphere was something between sour and...can't think of a good next sour word.

Let me recount one aspect that modifies what I just said. My appointment as Ambassador to India came through somewhere like June or so, and I spent the next couple of months with the usual preparations for an ambassador, but also spent some time at FSI with Hindi language lessons. In roughly October of that year there was an international gathering at Cancun, Mexico. I've forgotten under whose auspices it was held but it happened to include among the invited guests as heads of government, heads of state, both President Reagan and Indira Gandhi. Somebody in the White House was wise enough, at least in my judgment, to figure out that it would not be a good idea not to have the President meet with Indira Gandhi. He was in any case schedule to meet with General Zia-ul-Haq, who at that point was the President of Pakistan. That idea went ahead with a certain amount of fear and trepidation on the part of various people in both the White House and at State. Not only would they not hit it off, but they would not hit it off so badly that a bad situation might be made worse. Dick Allen, who was the National Security Advisor, at that period and I talked after the meeting so I could get a fill in for how it went and in essence what he said was that it was remarkable how well they got on, much to everyone's surprise, and I think he said, or may be its my own imagination at this point, that it may have surprised the two of them themselves. So, I set off for Delhi at the end of that year with a somewhat better chance at good atmospherics than what I mentioned earlier.

Q: Well, Ronald Reagan was known for his charm. He got along extremely well with (British Prime Minister) Margaret Thatcher, (German Chancellor) Helmut Kohl. Particularly coming after the Nixon period, Kissinger got no where with Indira Gandhi. Did you find, this is jumping ahead a bit, that the Gandhi-Reagan relationship made your work a little easier?

BARNES: Definitely. Some months later, again with the Pakistan element in mind, the White House was drawing up its list of state visits for the ensuing year, 1982. Because of the continuing concern over Afghanistan it was deemed important to invite (President) Zia to pay a state visit to the United States and there was some discussion in Washington, which we in (New) Delhi took part, if you are inviting (President) Zia, should you invite Indira Gandhi? Or do you need to invite Gandhi just in case, to avoid other complications from the Indian standpoint? So, the decision was "yes" let's invite Indira Gandhi as well. So, we then began in Delhi quite and active period of preparing the ground, ideas, and proposals to send back to Washington as to what could be considered possible topics, possible approaches, and possible discussion themes. In brief I think again, going back to Cancun, they had a reasonably pleasant, satisfactory discussion with each other in Washington. The state dinner went well; in fact all the atmospherics were positive. A couple of things were decided upon in terms of programs which might be considered to be undertaken particularly in the area of science and agriculture.

Q: When you went to post could you describe the embassy, some of the people, your DCM. How well versed were they in Indian affairs?

BARNES: The DCM was actually someone 4. The previous DCM was scheduled to leave. Marion Creekmore, do you know him? We had a pretty good mix of people who had a background in South Asia, which I found useful. We had a good Science Attaché, because science was one of the areas we needed to work on. Without grading individuals, we had a good to very good staff of people.

Q: What was the political situation inside India when you got there?

BARNES: Indira Gandhi, as I said, was back in power, after having been out for a couple of years as I mentioned earlier. Pakistan, from the Indian standpoint, continued to be, from the Indian standpoint, a threat and there were increasing incidents in Kashmir, which the Indians were convinced were Pakistani sponsored or encouraged, which was probably correct.

One issue that came up fairly soon was that of supply of nuclear fuel to an Indian east coast reactor, it was one that had been constructed with American blessing, if not American assistance a number of years earlier. But then the Indians had detonated their own nuclear explosion which in effect was one of the causes which contributed to the non-proliferation legislation in this country. But that was pre-NPT (Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty), but the question already arose from the U.S. standpoint whether the U.S. could continue to provide nuclear fuel to that reactor as we had undertaken to do earlier or whether the Indian action cancelled that obligation. The solution, if that is the right word, which was worked out in that period, and I was involved in some of that, was that the French government would supply the fuel with American acquiescence. This was agreeable to the Indians and I became involved in some negotiations with the French ambassador in (New) Delhi. But as is obvious now, for the last year or so, the efforts of this Administration to try to work out a different type of nuclear deal with India, the problem has not gone away yet.

Q: During your tour in India, what was your impression of the Congress Party? Was it sort of getting too old, been around too long?

BARNES: Indira Gandhi was such a dominant figure that she is almost a substitute, vocabulary-wise, for the Congress Party at that point. There were other people who were prominent at the state level and to some extent at the national level, but almost anything that was important in the area of foreign policy, not to mention domestic, involved her, or could involve her. So, you can talk about the Congress Party, but it did not have that much meaning as a political party in terms of the overall policies of the government.

Q: Talking about the time you were there, the Soviets and the Indians had a pretty close relationship in a number of areas, but it never seemed like a very good fit. Would you comment on that?

BARNES: Perhaps there was a contradiction. It wasn't a warm relationship, but it was warm enough to serve both countries purposes. It is useful from the Soviet standpoint to have a major non-aligned country "understand" Soviet interests, Soviet concerns, and so on. But Indira Gandhi, at the same time, made it quite clear that she was the Prime Minister of India and India was not a Soviet satellite state and India would not necessarily do "A," "B," or "C" just because the Soviets wanted it done. And although I don't...in fact I know I can't prove...my own guess at the time was that she and the Congress Party leadership were upset with the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. They didn't mind the distraction that might provide for the Pakistanis. From their standpoint, such a distraction might deflect Pakistani attention from Kashmir. She wasn't in anyway interested in India becoming or even appearing to become a Soviet satellite. I think part of the reasons she and Ronald Reagan got along well was that she knew it was in India's interest to have a better rather than a worse relationship with the United States. That didn't mean that she like much of what the United States did in that area, or elsewhere, or liked superpowers in general.

Q: Now, the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan in December of 1979 and you arrived in India a year later. Was this at all a subject of discussion or concern in India at the time, or was there an acceptance of the Soviet move?

BARNES: I would say on the whole it was...I would make a distinction between acceptance and acquiesce. It is not something the Indians would have sought. It is not something, as I think I implied earlier, that they therefore welcomed. But because of the Pakistan element it was useful to India, which seemed a pretty utilitarian approach.

Q: There is this Foreign Service image that relations between the embassies in Islamabad and New Delhi were contentious. How did that work during your ambassadorship?

BARNES: It didn't, in the sense that it wasn't contentious. I think there were two or three ambassadors in Islamabad during the time I was in India [Editor's Note: While Ambassador Barnes was in New Delhi, U.S. ambassadors to Pakistan were Ronald Spiers (1981-1983) and Deane Hinton (1983-1986)]. We exchanged visits; I went to Pakistan at least a couple of times. We tried to keep each other posted on things that were going on that we thought were relevant. I didn't feel any animosity...sure you get a certain amount, I suppose you would call it, of localities but it didn't, to the best of my recollection, distract us that much from what we were both attempting to do. Dean Hinton was there part of the time; Ron Spiers part of the time. Am I missing anyone else?

Q: India is a large country with an ancient and storied culture. How did your staff respond to such an absorbing place?

BARNES: My best recollection is that the staff on the whole was able to become comfortable in the Indian milieu. Not unexpectedly, there were common concerns about health and for people who had not been in South Asia before, just a certain amount of adjustment to the sheer numbers of people. I don't recall any particular problems.

Q: How many consulates did we have in India? What was their relationship to the embassy?

BARNES: Bombay, Madras, and Calcutta. I was fortunate to have good consul generals in these posts during most of that period. I tried to travel to the consulates a couple of times a year. Part of my visit would be to travel to areas outside of the consulate city; to other parts of the consular district. Usually the consul general would come along. Periodically we would get together in Delhi and coordinate our activities.

Q: One of the Indian states, Kerala, had a communist government. Were we at all concerned?

BARNES: Two states. Kerala on the west coast south of Bombay, in which the communist party of India; there are two communist parties in India, had a leading role in the state government. The other was West Bengal, Calcutta, and that was what was called the CPM, Communist Party-Marxist, which is in the present government and is as a matter of fact playing an important role. It is major coalition party for the current Congress-led government. They could even bring the government down, if they thought an issue important enough. It is a little hard to tell what the "Marxist" label means these days.

Q: While you were there, did we feel these local communist governments had close ties to the Soviet system, agents of the Soviet Union, or were they pretty much Indian?

BARNES: Pretty much Indian and not Soviet agents.

Q: What was it like to deal with the Indian government? I had some dealings with the Indian Consul General in Saigon. A difficult interaction. It seems like the Americans and the Indians both like to preach. (laughter)

BARNES: We both are very aware of our own capabilities and our own, should I say, righteous approach to problems. It may be unkind to Americans, but sometimes we resent anyone else preaching, since we assume we have sole right to the preaching platform.

Q: Did you find that we often were talking past each other?

BARNES: I guess I would make two comments. One, you had to keep reminding yourself particularly with certain people, certain Indians, that this was a trap you could fall into, getting overly preachy yourself. Secondly, you want to be, if not sympathetic, at least smart enough to understand what it was that the Indians were getting at and what the real problems were and what were only the surface problems. But on the whole, I found in my own interaction with people in government that you could set up a good working relationship and that there was sometimes a latent and sometimes a more openly expressed admiration for the United States and a certain, not regret, but at least a certain wish, that the relationship between the two countries was better than it was; that it ought to be better than is often was. There were periods, as for example after the Gandhi visit to the U.S. when we began to work on more cooperative projects than the sort that had been worked on in earlier years, earlier administrations. The sense that really we did indeed, not only in words, but also in terms of activities, had a lot in common. That helped.

Q: Did you find in covering India with its multiple parties and vast size that you were on the road a lot?

BARNES: Yes, but it was deliberate on my part, because of the size and diversity of the country, I thought I needed to have some sense first hand, albeit limited, of what the regional variations were or the variations, in any, in intensity of the particular issues. That is why I relied a lot on the consulates general (CG), including the trips I would make periodically and calling in the CGs to Delhi.

Q: You have a reputation of being adept at languages. You had some FSI Hindi, how useful was it?

BARNES: It was not as useful as I hoped it would be when I first started studying it, because “too many” Indians with whom I dealt were even in some ways more fluent than I in English. On the other hand, I did give occasional talks in Hindi, particularly in the rural areas, the Hindi speaking parts of India. Outside of Delhi I could use Hindi as well. I think I got a certain amount, how should I say, credit because I had made an effort to try to understand and use the language.

Q: Did you find the London School of Economics socialism was pervasive among government people, as with other former British colonies, such as in Africa?

BARNES: As much as anything I would say it was a feeling perhaps in good part inherited from the British times, but also from socialism, the role of government was important, not just in terms of necessarily government institutions, including economic institutions, but also in the sense that India couldn't allow its economic structure or economic activities to be unduly influenced by foreigners. This applies to the Soviets as well as to ourselves. Let me add one more thing which I think is more a British inheritance perhaps, although some of it goes back to Nehru's time. That is the feeling that government control or often government regulation of almost every part of economic life was necessary to safeguard the Indian people from exploitation. That may be more Fabian, I'm not sure.

Q: What sort of role did the Soviet Ambassador have? How about your relations with him?

BARNES: Our relationship was not very frequent; polite, but not a great deal of contact.

Q: Were the British pretty active there?

BARNES: Yes, the British were definitely involved and I had very close relations with the various British ambassadors.

Q: How about China?

BARNES: China, let me put it this way, friendly enough, not the point of being able to get useful, for me anyway, insights into life in India. This was still was still a period, which would last for a number of years, of tension between India and China which grew out of the early 1960s war between India and China in the Himalayas. On the other hand at one point, I wanted to get visas for China. My father-in-law was born in China of missionary parents and my wife and I and my parents-in-law wanted to take advantage of their being in Delhi visiting us to go on to China to see if we couldn't see any of the places which he had been associated as a child. So, we had the Chinese Ambassador and his wife come up to our house for tea on afternoon to solicit their support for Chinese visas. That was very non committable in terms of talking about anything very serious, very pleasant in terms of a cup of tea on an afternoon.

Q: Were there any particular issues between China and India at this time?

BARNES: No, aside from that very general atmospherics. As the two countries began to develop their economies, the relationship between the two began to change ever so imperceptively. On October 31, 1984, Indira Gandhi was assassinated. I had gotten to know Rajiv (Gandhi) the first couple of years I was there and continued to see a certain amount of him after he became Prime Minister, more than I saw or was able to see Indira. He began fairly early on in his prime ministership to loosen some of the government controls on economic activity and to at least begin thinking about other ways to organize society; over what we discussed earlier as the Fabian approach. He was invited fairly early on in his prime ministership in June 1985 to the U.S.. He had a very useful and successful visit in terms of the overall relationship, opening possibilities which had not been there with his mother. So when you are talking about Indian development, that marks, perhaps not a watershed, but at least a start.

Q: While you were there were you looking at various ethnic divisions in politics and society. After all, it was her Sikh bodyguard that killed her.

BARNES: I would say on politics you have a somewhat more open approach taken by Rajiv, than had ever been taken by Indira. He was clearly not only Prime Minister, but part of the Nehru-Gandhi dynasty. But he also was more of a listener and more of an innovator than his mother was. From our standpoint, we thought we should find opportunity in that change in attitude through visits that we could encourage in government and the private sector.

Q: Were we concerned that this huge and diverse country might split apart?

BARNES: No. Let me qualify that. In his mother's case, with Indira, she of course was assassinated by some angry, disaffected Sikhs who felt that her approach, her policies toward Sikh aspirations for a separate state, something even more Sikh than the state of Punjab. Yet, I don't know many of us foreign observers who can claim credit for having foreseen, before the assassination, that there were tensions there that were increasing as a matter of fact. Of course, one could go back to Gandhi to recognize the role assassination played in Indian politics. Rajiv would later be assassinated.

But a Moslem separatism, not a major force, aside from the fact that Kashmir was a case apart. Kashmir was not just a Moslem-Hindu issue, but it was Kashmiri versus various parts of India. The rest of the country, no. You had had going back to Nehru's time agitation in a number of parts of the country for what were called linguistic states, that is, in the Bombay area what ought to be predominate were the Marathi speakers; or in that in Madras that ought to be predominate were the Tamil speakers in the south. You sometimes got questions then of where the boundaries should be drawn, but that pretty much was settled on Nehru's watch by the 1960s.

Indira Gandhi at one level gave a stand-offish appearance, regal may not be the right word, but it has an element of that. At one point during our stay there, I decided to try an experiment, so to speak, I asked her to dinner and was surprised that she accepted. Not only did she accept, but she brought her son, Rajiv and her grandchildren, one of whom is now that head of the Congress Party, Rahul. And a good time was had by all, to all appearances.

Q: Let's talk about Pakistan and Kashmir. Did we have a plan or a stand on the issues, or did we hope the whole thing would go away?

BARNES: I, of course, was indirectly involved in Pakistan. The visits I mentioned were about four or five in number and it was hard to think about American interests in India without having to be aware of American interests in Pakistan. My overall impression of U.S. policy at the time was that if, with our assistance, continued pressure and in fact increased pressure could be brought on the Soviets, then they might go away. But I don't think that anyone at that time, I'm talking about the mid-1980s obviously, expected the Soviet Union to collapse in the way it did five years out.

You see, this ties into Pakistan because of the situation in Afghanistan. I guess my point was that U.S. policy toward Pakistan was that Pakistan is a front line state and Pakistan's help is needed in order to be able to carry on the proxy war in Afghanistan. That was the be all and end all. Not a great deal of concern or worry about what was happening inside Pakistan.

Q: Did you perceive within the United States either a Pakistan or Indian lobby or a congressional bloc that felt strongly about our relations one way or the other.

BARNES: I would say as a general generality that given the Cold War context, a feeling that we had to do all we could to support Pakistan because the brave Pakistanis were fighting the Soviets. With India I found, I'm thinking now of the American congress, I found a willingness to recognize, in some cases to remember from an earlier era, that the U.S. had, potentially anyway, a long-term interest in India. That if India were a success, then that success would be important in a global sense, that is, with a willingness to recognize that there was an Indian potential that was important to the U.S. and not relatively short-term which was the case in Pakistan. I couldn't give you an exact number of what later became in effect a sort of congressional India-favorable caucus, which was already taking shape at that point. I think to some extent Indira Gandhi's visit to the United States, and then Rajiv's accession later, helped people think about the fact that the situation regarding India was more complicated than there might be more benefits, interest that we had than we might initially suspect.

Q: On the nuclear issue, how did it stand at the time you were there?

BARNES: The nuclear issues, aside from the supply of fuel that I mentioned was not a major issue. This was before people started to talk about non-proliferation.

Q: How did the news of the assassination of Indira Gandhi come to you and what did we do?

BARNES: I was at a session of teachers and administrators at the American school, which was a couple of blocks from the Embassy. Do you know Delhi by the way? Couple of blocks from the Embassy talking over school problems when suddenly someone dashed in and said "Indira Gandhi's been shot!" That's how I found out.

Q: How did we see the political situation? Did Rajiv seem an obvious replacement?

BARNES: There was no question it would be Rajiv. It did not take any great foresight to come to that conclusion. To the extent that we knew him, and not many Americans did, I probably knew him as well, and that wasn't very well, as much as any other American in that brief period. We had an awareness that he had some diversity of thinking on major issues, modernization in a broad sense as important, more so than his mother did. So in a sense a hope that the relationship between the United States and India could become much more, should I say, positive. The potential was there, more than the case with his mother.

Q: Within the government, did you find any of the ministries more friendly toward the United States, think of Foreign Affairs, the military, the commercial?

BARNES: What they called External Affairs, obviously, beyond that some of the science-related ministries, because we placed some emphasis on scientific cooperation - that was one of the things that come up during Indira Gandhi's visit to the States in '84. That would include agriculture where there had been an earlier history of collaboration.

Slight diversion, the U.S. had in the early '50s provided on an emergency basis a large amount of food grains. In fact, it is not an exaggeration to say, as some Indians said at the time, that India was one ship load or so away from, if not starvation, at least very serious food supply problems. There was an agreement reached some years after that called the P.L. 480 agreement where the U.S. and India agreed on how the funds that India had paid for the grain, which had not been free, but it was very reduced prices; some of those funds were set aside to be used in ways the two governments could decide. So, you had things like scientific exchanges, cultural exchanges, that sort of thing which were financed by those so called surplus rupees. That was an important to mention and became more important in terms of how to cooperate using other resources while they still were available.

GILBERT L. COREY World Bank
New Delhi (1981-1985)

Dr. Gilbert L. Corey was raised in Colorado. He received a bachelor's degree in civil engineering from Colorado State University. He served in the U.S. Army during World War II. After working with the Agricultural Research Service and teaching at the University of Idaho, he received a call from Colorado State University to go to Pakistan and work for the Agency for International Development. Dr. Corey also served in Pakistan. He was interviewed by Samuel H. Butterfield on April 22, 1996.

COREY: One day someone in the World Bank called me and wanted someone's address because they needed a couple of engineers for India. As a result of that, I was able to transfer to the World Bank and went to India for four years "on loan" to the World Bank from USAID. Technically it was called a "transfer" where a person working for the US Government can temporarily transfer to an international agency for a period of time. That was one of my most satisfying experiences in the field of irrigation. India is such a large country with so many different types of irrigation systems and problems. I went there for two years and then was extended for another two years. I was not looking forward to coming back to Washington to my old job, because someone else had filled it. However, according to the terms of the transfer the Agency had to keep a job open upon a return from a transfer....Okay, the reason the World Bank needed people in India was that the World Bank provides loans to many countries, but in India at the time, this was in early 80's, the programs in India were very large and there were many in the field of irrigation. So contrary to the way the World Bank generally works, they wanted to put several technical people in India. In the World Bank system of operation, you must go out and supervise a project every six months. There must have been twenty projects in India in irrigation, needing supervision every six months. Traveling from Washington, DC didn't make a lot of sense. There were four or five of us in New Delhi to do this. I was selected because of my experience beforehand in Pakistan and in AID, Washington -- and I had been to India on project design and evaluation for AID -- so I was known to the people in the World Bank in India.

Based on my experience, the first thing my supervisor wanted me to do, when I first went to India, was to review their research program. The World Bank in India had contracted with several consultants to do little pilot research programs around India.

There must have been three or four such programs in India. Some of the engineers in the Indian Government didn't seem to think some of the research programs were relevant. So, I was given a rather tough assignment to do this review because they were pet projects for whomever the contractors were and the contractors were not residents in India. They would come every three or four months to see how things were going and they had agencies in India operating these projects. I was allowed to spend, I don't know, probably three months reviewing these projects, going out in the field, seeing what they were doing and seeing if they made sense.

Well in India, after my experience in Pakistan, I was able to better understand what the farmers' problems with irrigation more readily than, I think, somebody that hadn't had that experience in Pakistan. Certainly I knew the Pakistani irrigation system, which is also a part, as I said, of the northern India system. What I found and what I wrote in my report was that a lot of the research that was going on did not make sense at all for the Indian system. One researcher was trying to make it possible for a farm, through modern devices, to determine exactly the moisture content of the soil and the evapo-transpiration rates of its crops. He was able to put the exact amount of water needed on those crops based on evaporation, evaporation that he had calculated using standard formulas which relate evaporation to measured weather parameters. Immediately I looked at how does the farmer get his water. Well, he got the water haphazardly, through a system where he had to bribe people to get his share. How could this expand to even five farmers, to say nothing of all the irrigation system? So I reported that the project didn't make any sense. In another case I found that individuals in the World Bank were trying to get the Indians to install the Pakistani irrigation system in India. As I said, the Pakistan system is a system deficient in water, maybe only half enough water for the land it commands. I am not complaining about that system; it is a good system for the condition where there is lot of land and not enough water, but in the many systems of India there is plenty of water to cover the land. And, they were trying to put that system in all of India. In fact, the central Government of India had passed a rule that it should be installed all over India, which was wrong, wrong. I finally got that stopped also .

Another project that was interesting was being conducted on a large irrigation canal system, the Rajasthan Canal (I guess they now call it the Indira Gandhi Canal). The pilot project that was being operated by the Bank and being championed as a great success. The canal that has an erratic supply of water, which means that sometimes the canals are full and sometimes not - maybe half the supply - because the canal system is fed from the Punjab in India and the Punjabis do not necessarily always pass the same amount of water down to the Rajasthanies. So the man who designed the project took one branch of the canal system and he was going to make this one reliable. He was going to take the fluctuations out of this one branch. He gave them less water but they are going to know exactly when they'd get it. They were to get, say, only nine irrigations when everybody else would probably get twelve on the average but we are going to know the dates of irrigation. I was amazed that I could only get one person in the World Bank to agree with me that this wouldn't work either. It will work for the one branch but you cannot spread it because you cannot take the fluctuations out of the canal system for all the system. You just can't do it unless you store water some place. The Indians themselves knew that. I would talk to them, the chief engineer- - yes, he knew that, but this is working, the World Bank is happy -- and so the next thing I know they are going to do it to another branch. They were going to expand it and I went to ask to the engineer (I had nothing to do with this project, other than to go and look at it and tell them what I thought.) Well, they tried it in another branch and it was probably partly successful.

Well, the last thing I heard before I left India, was that the project had failed because the other farmers had gone to the head of that pilot canal with their clubs and other weapons and carried out what they call a "rasta roka" which means they closed the road. They would just sit there and would not let anybody pass. They said: until you change this system we are not going to move from here. So the farmers put a stop to it. Because they could see that it wasn't fair. It's amazing that you can see these kind of projects going on and is basically because... as the Governor of Oregon once said: "Man is not smart enough." Not enough experience and knowledge about how things work, I guess. So that was another project that.....

It was also interesting for me in India working for the World Bank, and of course, I had friends over in the USAID mission. At that time, the World Bank and USAID were trying to operate more cooperatively and we got some things going. One project that I was involved with in India involved research. Typically what the World Bank would do in an irrigation project was to have a big project that spent a lot of money on lining canals or other construction. For example, maybe a hundred million dollars project with ninety eight million dollars for construction and two million dollars would be to do a little research, pilot studies. AID got in that kind of mode a little bit too. Well, the problem with that is that two million dollars is a lot harder to manage than the ninety eight million dollars for government organizations that are in the business of construction. There is not the problem of making it all ethical and everything like that but these little research projects were just causing havoc with these people because they didn't know how to do it. You have an Irrigation Department doing a research project. Well, I would always tell them: hire the local university and get them to do the part of the research that you can't do. In one of the projects that I was managing for the World Bank I went to the project and said: We are going to have the USAID project people and the World Bank projects people here and we are going to go all over this research and see what you are doing. I was amazed to learn that USAID, in their project, had called for some of the same things that the World Bank had called for. We had two organizations independently doing the same thing with different sources of money. So I suggested cooperation they were very happy to see this because they were under the impression that they had to keep the programs separate. They knew that someone else was working on it but mine is USAID, and yours is World Bank....

Q: They and the Indians?

COREY: Yes, the Indians, they would not go and rock the boat for, I assume they felt they would lose something if it became known that there was duplication. But it was a lot of fun.

R. GRANT SMITH
Political Counselor
New Delhi (1982-1984)

R. Grant Smith was born on Long Island in 1938. He graduated from Princeton University in 1960. He later earned a master's degree from Columbia University. He joined the Foreign Service in 1963 and held positions in Pakistan, Nepal, and India. In 1995 he began his ambassadorship in Tajikistan. Ambassador Smith was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: Well, in '82, whither?

SMITH: In early 1982, not in the normal rotation cycle, there was a sudden and unexpected vacancy in the job of political counselor in New Delhi, and they asked me to come to New Delhi.

Q: That sounds like kind of fun, wasn't it?

SMITH: Coming back to New Delhi, yes.

Q: You did that from '82 to when?

SMITH: '84.

Q: Why don't we cover this period, then I think -

SMITH: Okay, fine.

Q: What was India like coming back? I mean, you had left in, what, '75.

SMITH: Yes, came back in '82. Well, I used to tell people, "Well, I left in '75. Indira Gandhi was prime minister. I came back in 1982. Indira Gandhi's prime minister. Plus ça change... [The more things change...]" In fact, a lot had happened domestically in the meantime, in the sense that the Congress Party had lost an election in 1977, in fact had lost an election because of what began just weeks before I'd left in 1975, which was the Declaration of Emergency and the limitation of civil rights during that Emergency and the active, coercive, family planning program during that Emergency period. They'd lost the 1977 election. A coalition opposition government was in power that lasted fairly briefly. By the time I got back in '82, Mrs. Gandhi was back in power, and a lot of the same players. The relationship with Pakistan probably hadn't changed all that much.

Of course, the big even that had affected our relationship with Pakistan, and therefore our relationship with India, had been the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. And that colored things a great deal during this period, in the sense that we - particularly under the Reagan Administration - had come out in full support of Pakistan. The Indians had opposed even the very limited package of support that Carter had proposed, and of course very much opposed the support to Pakistan which Reagan was providing.

Q: I would have thought the Indians would have not been happy about the Soviets moving into Afghanistan.

SMITH: They weren't happy, but they were even less happy about our relationship with Pakistan and our rearming of Pakistan. It varied, of course, from Indian to Indian, including some of their diplomats. They had very different view on what the Soviets had done. India, as I recall, had a somewhat ambivalent position on the whole thing, but they were definitely against what we were doing in support of Pakistan, because their line was basically, this is like the situation before 1965; Pakistan wants those weapons to use against us, not against the Russians, but against us.

Q: Who was your ambassador during this period?

SMITH: The whole time I was there it was Harry Barnes.

Q: Now Harry Barnes was a professional. How was he as ambassador?

SMITH: I had worked for Harry Barnes once before, when he was DCM in Kathmandu in 1964-65. Harry Barnes was very good to work for. He spoke Hindi. He wanted people in his embassy to speak Hindi. In fact, he insisted that I - or encouraged me to - have a month of brush-up Hindi before I came out. He encouraged everybody to get out, to travel. I often thought that his approach to India was very much that this was a country with which there was a lot we could do. There were a lot of areas of common interest. He wasn't sure quite which one was going to work, so he pushed on this broad range of issues, drove us crazy sometimes because there was an element of not setting priorities. But in retrospect, it was probably pushing on a broad range of issues to see which would work, and some of the ones worked which people did not expect to work, such as the beginning of a relationship in the defense area. He would go around to see the science advisor in the Ministry of Defense, and I accompanied him on several of these calls. We sort of entered by the back stairway, because the idea of the American ambassador calling on the Ministry of Defense was very strange, so we'd sort of come in the back way, get taken upstairs separately. But we were discussing sort of the beginning of a relationship in the high-tech area.

Q: Were we beginning to see an India that was beginning to connect to... You mentioned that they said they had a lot of people technically trained. I was wondering whether you were beginning to see India looking towards what was to become the computer age. They had a very talented population evidently?

SMITH: I think it was the beginning of the end for the India which had been created under Nehru, with all of the statist economic controls, the London School of Economics approach to economics. The former Indian ambassador in Washington, L. K. Jah had been brought back to dismantle many of the controls that he had put in place. This was something we saw a great deal of later, but it was beginning in that period, as I recall. Again, there are others who would remember that aspect of it better than I would Q: Was Mrs. Gandhi's confrontation with the Sikhs taking place at that point?

SMITH: Yes, that occurred during that period, and I had some Sikh friends. One of them had been the speaker of Parliament who had come to the United States on that Parliamentary delegation in 1970, a leader in the Congress Party in Punjab - just devastated by this. And her action in sending troops into the Golden Temple in Amritsar later led to terrible things, but certainly when I was there, the Sikh reaction to this was uniform, very, very negative.

Q: What brought about this confrontation?

SMITH: Well, there were a group of Sikhs who reportedly had received some support from Mrs. Gandhi or the Congress Party earlier on in a game of power politics or balancing factions within the state of Punjab, a group of Sikhs who wanted independence for a Sikh state - Kalistan - and they were not supported by the majority of the people of Punjab, but some of them did have weapons and they were killing people.

Q: And the Golden Temple, which is, well, the equivalent to a shrine in Jerusalem or the Kaaba in Mecca, wasn't it?

SMITH: For the Sikhs, yes.

Q: And why did she send troops in?

SMITH: Well, my recollection is that some of these militants were holed up in there, and she could have probably handled it differently, but she ended up sending troops in.

Q: I would have thought Amritsar would have had particular overtones, because wasn't this the place where the British -

SMITH: 1919.

Q: What was it, General... Anyway, it's a name -

SMITH: Jallianwala Bagh, yes.

Q: - mowed down a lot of people, and it's one of those climactic moments of Indian nationalism and all.

SMITH: That's right.

Q: And I would have thought that one would be a little careful about messing around down there.

SMITH: Yes, but on the other hand... Well, she certainly faced a problem, of these armed Sikhs - their arms, presumably, were coming through Pakistan - not supported by the majority of the Sikh population but very definitely undertaking terrorist acts in Punjab. And India has faced problems before, particularly in border areas and groups wanting independence, particularly in the northeast, and historically has dealt with those with a combination of firmness and tact - very hard-nosed dealing with the counterinsurgency and then at some point negotiating - and has tended to adopt that approach elsewhere.

Q: Well, as political counselor, were you looking at India and looking not to glory in it but just to see that this was a state that could divide up? Were there fissures in India along religious lines or regional lines?

SMITH: I don't think that we were looking at it that way. It's a good question. Interestingly enough, it was a better question in the late 1950s, and by the 1980s very few people saw the likelihood of India breaking up. In the late 1950s, both Indians and foreign observers saw this as a real possibility. Jim Grant, who was later head of UNICEF, told me in Delhi once - he had served in our mission there in the AID mission in the late '50s. John Sherman Cooper, one of the ambassadors in that period, and he said that it was right after the creation of the linguistic states in India. That was done in 1957, so it must have been the '57-58 period. He said the ambassador drew his country team together and asked two questions: one, will India still be united in 10 years and, two, if it is united, will it still be a democracy? And the country team split fairly evenly on the first question and was fairly uniform on the second question that if it was still united it would not still be a democracy. And by 25 years later, if you had done the same thing, I don't think the country team would have felt that India was likely to split up, and would also have felt that democracy was extremely well-established there - parliamentary democracy in the sense of elections and the system that they had. So that was not something that we were looking at that much. In the case of the issue of Kalistan, I think we were convinced that the Indian government would prevail, partly because we didn't see great support for it within the Sikh community. It had arisen in part because of splits within the Sikh community. The Sikh community was very divided, but it wasn't largely supporting this.

Q: Was there a strong "old Indian hand" cadre that was working on India at this time in our own Foreign Service and all?

Q: I'm not talking about going way back, but I mean people who had been around a couple of tours and all that. In other words, was there a cadre or was it pretty much people coming in on excursion tours?

SMITH: Well, let's see. Marion Creekmore was the DCM. His background was not South Asia. Harry Barnes was the closest to an old India hand at that point. I was political counselor. I had served in both Pakistan and Nepal and previously in India. In the political section, my labor counselor was an old India hand. I don't remember who else we had there. Ernie Heck was there during that period, I think. She was an old India hand. So yes, we did have some.

Q: How were relations down south, the Tamil side and all?

SMITH: The problem began in that period, in the sense that it was 1983 when you had the... I don't remember the exact sequence, but there was a killing, bodies were brought back in Colombo, riots in Colombo, a lot of killing of Tamils. It was a problem which had been going on for some years, and it suddenly became very clear the extent of alienation between the Tamil and the Singhalese community in those riots in the summer of 1983, which was what later led to the establishment of the guerilla groups and the current civil war that's going on there. But it was something that had its origins, many people think, in the policies of S. W. R. D. Bandaranaike in 1956, when he was first elected under a Sinhala-only policy, emphasizing the Singhalese language and culture and dividing the educational systems - because before that they had been educated together, and after that they were educated separately. So it goes back a long way, but it really bubbled to the surface in 1983.

Q: How did you find American relations with India by this time?

SMITH: Improved. Harry Barnes was working on them hard, and I don't remember the nature of our economic relationship in this particular period, but I do remember that he was working very hard on things like building a military relationship, a lot of very active personal diplomacy, quiet diplomacy - not only quiet, in the sense that with his Hindi language capability he had some public diplomacy as well. I accompanied him in October of 1982 on a trip to Kashmir, which may have been one of the first ones in some time by an American ambassador. It was a very good trip. Before we went, he said, "Grant, I'll only go to Kashmir if you tell me what to say about the Kashmir issue." And I said, "Mr. Ambassador, the answer is very easy. There's one word: Simla." And later, and I think Ron Spiers was in Pakistan at the time, and they later collaborated on a joint statement on the anniversary of Simla. I shouldn't say later; it must have been before. In the summer of 1982 they collaborated on a joint statement on the anniversary of Simla. That was a particular period of close coordination of the policies between the two ambassadors. It seems to me, in fact, that they each gave lectures at the other's defense colleges, so that Harry Barnes went over and lectured in Quetta and Ron Spiers came over and lectured at the National Defence College.

Q: Well, there are some times when political ambassadors make good sense, particularly if they're well connected, but in a case like this, to have two professionals, they're less likely to have their egos on the line and get, you know, caught up as being overly friendly to the country. They're more likely to see things in a little more objective sense. Would you say that, or is that a fair statement?

SMITH: I think so, and of course Harry had served in the area before and served in India before and knew Hindi, had ways of doing things that people hadn't thought of. At one point there was an American singer of south Indian classical music, and Harry had him give a concert at Roosevelt House and went through the government of India book and invited everybody with a south Indian name. And people came to that who had not been to the American ambassador's house ever before or for years, and wouldn't have come under any other circumstances. So it was brilliant.

Q: It was.

SMITH: It really was. And I think he had a kind of a relationship there that was extremely useful. I can't say that his relationship... You should talk to him about his relationship with Mrs. Gandhi, but he did have a good relationship with Mrs. Gandhi's advisors, the foreign minister, the foreign secretary, other secretary and minister level people around the government.

Q: As political counselor, obviously you were following the parties there. How did you see the Congress Party? Did you feel it was sort of running out its time? The usual over-corruption or over-cronyism, the whole thing? How did you see it?

SMITH: Again, I have some trouble distinguishing what I saw when, because I was back in India '88 to '91, but yes, we did at that point see that the Congress Party was winding down, in the sense that it had lost its monopoly, and Mrs. Gandhi's way of running the party was killing it by over-centralization, over-control, that the life was going out of the party.

Q: It's the usual thing that happens when a leader of personal magnetism has been in too long.

SMITH: Well, it wasn't just her; it was her family, because she had been in, she had been out, she had come back - she had come back with the help of her son, Sanjay Gandhi, her younger son, who had died in a plane crash before I got there in '82, as I recall. And then she was promoting Rajiv, who... You know, the joke that went around Delhi was that Sanjay was a good politician but a bad pilot, and Rajiv was a good pilot but... He was very personable, however, and he certainly, in certain situations, could put things across very well. Sanjay was probably part of the problem in running the Congress Party, and Rajiv was not able to reorganize, revitalize the party to bring it back. It's not clear if anybody can. The problem was that the Congress Party had been built as an independence party, as an umbrella independence party, and that aura continued for many years. They had the benefit until 1964 of Nehru being there, and then for many years Mrs. Gandhi, so it had a continuity of leadership which benefited it tremendously in winning elections, but organizationally it had a very difficult transition to make, which it didn't make very successfully.

Q: Well, then, is there any other issue that you think we should cover on India in this particular '82-84 period? Why don't we stop at this point, and we'll put at the end, you're leaving India in '84, and where are you going?

SMITH: I actually came back to the State Department to head the Office of Multinational Force and Observer Affairs in the Bureau of Near East and South Asian Affairs, which was the backstop for the Sinai force.

Q: Good, I'd like to talk about that next time.

SMITH: Yes, there had been a long-run issue of American ship visits. This was part of the overall question of having some kind of a contact between our militaries, or contact on military defense issues. And there was a problem with ship visits. The Indian Navy was always very prickly about the U.S. Navy, since 1971 in particular, and we had not been able to have ship visits because the Indians had developed a questionnaire that you had to submit on ship visits which asked, "Has the ship called, or will it call, at a port not under the control of a littoral state" or something to that effect. It was a complicated bit of wording which really meant, "Has this ship been to or is it going to Diego Garcia," which was a base to which the Indians objected considerably. The U.S. Navy policy was never to say where the ship had been or where it was going, and therefore no U.S. naval ships were visiting, even though we had a fair number of ships that were going through the area that weren't going to Diego Garcia. And we were turning ourselves inside out trying to come up with a formulation that would allow us to have some contact, because this was obviously an important area, and the fact that we had ships that weren't going to Diego Garcia, it seemed we ought to be able to make something of that. And we were wrestling with all of this language. I remember a very long telegram that we did that was convoluted, and Harry took it, and at the very end we added, "Of course, we could always just say no." And it came back, and the Navy finally accepted that, when we had a ship that wasn't going to Diego Garcia and hadn't been there, we'd just say "No." And it worked. That was the beginning of some minor contact between our navies, which in fact was beginning to bear fruit when we had the second atomic explosion last year.

Q: All right, we'll pick this up then in 1984, when you're off to multi-peacekeeping affairs. Great.

CONSTANCE J. FREEMAN
Economic Officer
New Delhi (1983-1985)

Constance Freeman was born in Washington, DC in 1945 and graduated from American University and the University of Denver. She served with the Peace Corps in Brazzaville and Yaounde and with the Foreign Service in New Delhi and Nairobi. She was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

Q: After a year, in '83, where did you go?

FREEMAN: I went to India as the economic officer, third in line under the counselor in the New Delhi Embassy.

Q: You were there from when to when?

FREEMAN: That would have been from July of '83 until about June '85, so I spent about two years in India. I was the officer in charge of trade and the investment portfolio.

Q: Which I would think would have been a very frustrating one, wasn't it?

FREEMAN: Yes. Again, I didn't feel like there was a huge amount of content.

Q: From what I've understood, although it's beginning maybe to loosen up a bit, India was not very amenable to foreign trade.

FREEMAN: Or even AID. AID was just going back in then. I was also sort of the AID liaison officer, which was a logical job that I fell into, with my development economics background. We were four people in the economic section.

My colleague, who was sworn in as ambassador to Bangladesh today, had what I felt was the poorer of the portfolio, because he was dealing with the Bank and with the Fund, essentially with the financial side. He had a special endowment they were trying to work on to [get] the last of the rupees that had been generated through PL480 food before they were completely used, as a part of either the Indian's budget or for the embassy. [He wanted] to get them into some kind of a foundation or endowment so that they could continue to generate an income to support some of the Library of Congress and other projects that had been done there.

What I did in India, the project that was most interesting and that ultimately got [me] promoted or off probation, was I worked on a tax treaty. I used to say the tax treaty had been in the works since almost the time I was born; it was that old. And we've continued to try to work on negotiating a tax treaty. And then I got the textiles portfolio. Textiles is a very nasty portfolio anywhere, and this was the middle '80s, and we had just established a new U.S. policy on textiles that was completely unilateral and violated both our multilateral agreements and our own bilateral agreements.

Q: Textiles are probably the most political of all commodity arrangements, particularly on the Republican side, where this was part of the Republican southern strategy. I don't want to put words in your mouth, but did you have the feeling that this was domestically politically driven?

FREEMAN: Oh, yes. Oh, yes. It had nothing to do with international relations at all. And that's why it was so egregious in terms of violating all of our agreements. Nobody cared about that.

But the hardest thing for me was, this thing started like in November, and we got people saying we should go and do calls. You know, call what? What is this, a diplomatic call? I didn't know anything more about textiles than that I wore them. Essentially, the calls were: "We are going to enforce a quota on you, pending negotiations, because you have sprung our computer, and your exports of men's and boys' shirts have exceeded one percent of the U.S. market. Therefore, we are enforcing a unilateral quota." But none of the language said that; it was a lot of technical language in the cable. And so I was supposed to go in and do these calls. The first time I went, I went with the commercial counselor, and he knew something about it, but it was still way over my head. By the third call, I was having to do it alone, because nobody else wanted to touch it. I still didn't understand, and Washington wouldn't tell me. I kept sending cables and calls and saying, "For God's sake, will somebody brief me on this?" And nobody knew, in the embassy, what it meant, either. Nobody could figure this out; what did it really mean.

I can remember, on this third time, going in to the same joint secretary, Saberwa was his name, and he started to holler at me again. I looked at him, and I said, "Mr. Saberwa, I am really sorry, but I am delivering this on instructions. I don't know what I'm doing. And I can't get Washington to tell me what all this is about. Could you explain to me why you're angry?" And he loved it. I like to say that the problem between the Americans and the Indians is we out-arrogant each other. And so the best way to get along well with Indians is to throw yourself on their mercy and say, "I am here to learn, please teach me." In this case, there was no game-playing; I was there to learn. So Saberwa taught me textiles. He had been doing textiles forever. He knew every back-room agreement that had ever been made, every conversation that had been in the halls, etc., clearly from the Indian viewpoint, but he really knew his stuff very well. And so he taught me, because nobody in the U.S. would help.

Finally, when I went back on R&R, and I went around and did consultations and talked to people in USCRN, then they would talk to me. But nobody would send anything out on their cables or on the phone.

Q: Why was that?

FREEMAN: Because our new textile policy was so domestically driven that it did in fact violate both our multilateral and bilateral agreements. We were in the wrong, and we couldn't acknowledge that publicly. We'd only sort of do it in the back room. Nobody in the embassy in New Delhi and nobody in the consulates wanted to deal with this issue, so it went to the most junior officer in the economic section.

Q: What was known in government terms as the flack-catcher.

FREEMAN: That's right. I finally figured it out, with Saberwa's help and all kinds of documents and getting the agreements and poring through them. So I wrote the press releases, and I gave the constituent posts the language they could use to deal with inquiries. And we dealt with hand looms and all kinds of other things. Textiles was my biggest account there.

Then we had textiles negotiations. The team came through, and they were on their third country, and they didn't want to do any negotiations. They just wanted to close this down and go shopping, and what they wanted me to do was take them shopping. I sat at the table, on the American side, and wanted to crawl under it, because the behavior of the delegation was so egregious and so arrogant and so overbearing that it was truly embarrassing.

I remember I had a wonderful boss, George Kenny, and he was very good at figuring out how to train people. I came back and I was so angry, I was spitting-fire angry. And so he said, "Well, write it up. Write it down. If they're that bad, we'll send a memo to the DCM and have him make some representations in Washington." And I came back to him with what I'd written up. He looked at me and said, "You're repeating yourself. I need some substance here." By the third draft, I'd worked out the fury, and we had something we could send to the DCM. Nothing ever happened with it, because nobody was going to powder these textiles people. Everybody runs scared on the textiles people. So it taught me a lot.

On that delegation was a Customs guy, and he was trying to determine what customs to levy. There was an exception for hand looms. But hand looms were defined as something that could be made with a machine, but a machine that was hand- or foot- operated, not electricity-operated. And so they were woven, and then there would be stitching on places around the side. This guy looked at this, and he said, "I cannot tell whether that's made with a machine run by electricity or a machine run by a foot pedal. They'll all have duties on them." In doing so, he put masses of factories out of business, or potentially out of business. And they all showed up on my doorstep, with all these poor little textiles workers. We were able to get turned around by the [time the] next high-level delegation came, by appealing to them that this had been far too arbitrary.

That was essentially the substance of what I did in India. Going to India was going home for me, in a way, because I had traveled the whole country doing my Ph.D. work before. Perhaps the biggest thing for me was to make the switch between my weekends and vacations, where I became very Indian, and my weekdays at the embassy, where I had to put back on my American clothes, accent, demeanor, and culture. So it was good experience in many ways.

Q: How did you find the Indian bureaucracy at that point, and dealing with them?

FREEMAN: The Indian bureaucracy wasn't so bad when you were there on an official level. Certainly, if you were the most junior economic officer, with the ambassador and the DCM, and really trying to get things done, that was hard. And it was hard when I was a student trying to move around the country. But I don't remember being unduly upset by the bureaucracy per se. But remember that I'd lived in India and traveled all over. My dictum when I lived there before was: "I assume nothing will work. If it works, I'll be ecstatic, and if it doesn't work, then that's just the way things go. That's the way it is." So I just don't remember that as being a real issue.

Q: I realize you were in the economic section and relatively junior within this very large embassy, but during this, you might say, high-Reagan period, did you get a feeling about how relations were between the United States and India at that time?

FREEMAN: They weren't great. Harry Barnes was our ambassador, and I think he smoothed a lot of that over. When I was there, we had thousands of congressional delegations. Vice President Bush had come through just before I arrived. We had Maureen Reagan there. We had lots and lots and lots of visitors. That's what I remember the best, the idiocy of control-officering everybody in the world, and everybody wanting to go shopping. That was always a problem for me. I couldn't take anybody shopping, because I hated shopping, so I didn't know where to go. I mean, it just wasn't my bag.

My great frustration, again, was textiles, because nobody tried in any way, shape, or form to see the Indian viewpoint on this, and we were violating our agreements. So I experienced it, lived it, and knew it in that context. But I don't remember feeling as deeply embarrassed about what we were doing in our policy as I have in some other countries in some other situations. And I don't think it was that bad.

Q: There just weren't the issues. Vietnam had gone, and there was no particular India- Pakistan thing where we had to tip in one way or the other, although there might have been the army using Pakistan as a conduit for weapons into Afghanistan, which might have...

FREEMAN: But I wasn't really a part of that, remember. It wasn't one of the issues that was particularly pressing for me. I spent those two years really living, to the extent that I possibly could, as an Indian, and doing these economic issues that I had. I loved being back in India. I wasn't hugely challenged in my job. I spent my first three or four years in the State Department thinking this is really not hard enough, and being relatively bored. I wasn't in subsequent years.

Q: That's often the pattern. You're marking time, or you're overwhelmed. When you were dealing with textiles and you had a delegation coming out, did you just keep your mouth shut, or did you say, you know, our agreement states such and such? Did anybody else raise the issue, or did they just go ahead, pound the table, make their points, and walk off?

FREEMAN: The Indians could make those arguments for themselves. I didn't have to [do so] for them. The problem with our delegations was they didn't even listen. They pounded the table, and they essentially said, "We have the power. If you don't come to an agreement with us, we will continue to enforce these much lower quotas. If you negotiate with us, you might get a better deal. And that's it. We're not interested in talking about anything else." In all fairness, the Indians can go on and on and on and on. And these guys had been to four negotiations before. This was like their fifth country. They were exhausted. And they were trying to defend an indefensible policy. The only defense for the policy was U.S. domestic pressure. So I felt like crawling [under] the table. I don't remember how much I argued with them one on one. Probably not a great deal, because I was too junior, and I was the embassy control officer, after all. There was a State Department person on the delegation that came out, and I think I discussed it at length with [him]. State didn't have a lead role in this. This was USTR and company.

Q: USTR is the U.S. trade representative. Why don't we quit at this point.

FREEMAN: Okay.

Q: I'll pick it up next time in '83?

FREEMAN: We're into '85, and I'm about ready to leave India to go back and take over the Liberia desk in the State Department.

Q: So we'll pick it up then.

ROBERT GOLDBERG
Consular Officer/Ambassador's Staff Assistant
New Delhi (1983-1985)

Mr. Goldberg was born and raised in Baltimore, Maryland and educated at Gettysburg College and the University of Chicago. He accompanied his Foreign Service wife on her assignment to Tokyo before entering the Foreign Service in 1983 as Foreign Service Officer. A Chinese language specialist, Mr. Goldberg served both in the State Department of State in Washington, D.C. and abroad dealing primarily with Economic and Chinese affairs. His overseas posts include Tokyo (as spouse), New Delhi, Hong Kong, Guangzhou and Beijing, where he served twice, once as Deputy Chief of Mission. Mr. Goldberg was interviewed by David Reuther in 2011.

Q: So when did you arrive in New Delhi?

GOLDBERG: July of 1983. I went straight to the consular section. Frankly I wasn't suitable as a consular officer. Years later, as a mission manager, I tried to give new consular officers a sense of why the job is so important – and so difficult, especially when you have to say no. Somebody once compared it to being a second lieutenant in the Second World War where you were expendable. You led your troops into battle and if you got shot it didn't really matter. I treated the work much too casually. When people tell you that you are the interface with the community in the country in which you are serving, well, that is absolutely the case. How you handle that is absolutely critical in terms of soft diplomacy.

Q: Now the consular business covers two kinds of visas, immigrant (IV) and non-immigrant (NIV), and also provides assistance to Americans. What were your responsibilities in New Delhi?

GOLDBERG: I did it all at one point or another. Because at that time in New Delhi, we had two junior officers who did just about all the interviewing. We had a deputy who was uncomfortable on the line. The senior consular official, the consul general when I was there, only liked to issue visas and do third or fourth interviews and run visas through the visa machine. We did eventually get a third officer, who was only comfortable doing American citizen services. New Delhi was high volume and fraud post.

You just got very tired of hearing the same stories over and over again. I was on the line in 1984 when the first group of people came out of Iran post-revolution. One of the few places they were allowed to travel was to India. So they would get on a plane in Tehran and they would fly to New Delhi where they were picked up and bussed over to the American Embassy consular section where they would be refused en masse. I got interesting bribes from the Iranians, like nuts and raisins, the very best in the world. But all we could do on the spot was refuse them as Iranian cases had to be referred to Washington. The only Iranian visa issued in my time in Delhi – that I know about – came through the intervention of Betsy Barnes, the Ambassador's wife. She had taken up the case of a young woman who wanted to go to the States to become a doctor. Looking back, I regret just how cavalier I and my other FSO junior associate were. On some days, our refusal rate averaged 80%, which was unconscionable, really. We used to talk about it. Our mantra was: they have got other options, and as a matter of fact that was true, but I think we could have handled our work and ourselves better.

Q: Was your assignment one of those rotational ones through the various sections of the embassy?

GOLDBERG: Yes. Before I went to the front office in July 1984 I was actually acting consul general. Remember, I was like one year out of A-100. The consul general had left and the deputy had gone on leave and the guy I was working with didn't want to take on the responsibility. I was full of myself. So I took on that responsibility. Of course no good deed goes unrewarded – it turned out to be the busiest period for us in terms of consular work - Mrs. Gandhi was assassinated [October 31, 1984] after the assault on the Golden Temple in Amritsar and parts of Delhi and Uttar Pradesh were burned. We had a lot of Sikhs coming into the mission asking for visas because they feared they would be killed if they remained in the city. The political section officers would come down to the consular section to talk to them about conditions in the Punjab.

Q: How did Mrs. Gandhi's assassination affect your work or the environment you were operating in?

GOLDBERG: Most of the Sikhs we used to see were Punjabis who were going out to California and Washington state farms through marriages that were not strictly legal. In fact in one of my IV interviews I found someone who actually married his sister. Not his cousin sister which was a fairly common term for a close relationship in India but actually married his sister in order to get to the States earlier than would have been possible legally. Now, what we had was a significant increase in Sikhs who were trying to get to the States on NIVs. There were no scheduled appointments in those days so we just tried to work through whoever came in during the course of the day.

Q: Why would the assassination affect Sikhs, the Sikh community in that way?

GOLDBERG: Well because it was her Sikh bodyguards who had been involved in Mrs. Gandhi's assassination. The outrage in New Delhi in particular was considerable. In fact there were blockades on some of the roads we used to travel to get back to our home – the specific purpose was to yank Sikhs out of their cars and beat them up. The AID [Agency for International Development] deputy director at the time Mrs. Gandhi was assassinated was on his way back from a visit somewhere in Uttar Pradesh and along the way he had seen some Sikhs being very violently assaulted and beaten to death.

Q: So you rotated out of the consular section.

GOLDBERG: I rotated out of the consular section in July 1984, I think, and went on to become a staff assistant to Harry Barnes [who served as Ambassador to India from November 1981 to June 1985] who had been Ambassador to Romania and was the Director General of the Foreign Service, when the Foreign Service Act of 1980 was passed. He brought the “up and out” ethos of the military, transformed the way we brought people in, increased the diversity of the Foreign Service, and the way we evaluated officers. He was a very thoughtful individual. Harry is still around. He must be 85 or 86. I haven't heard from him in about 25 years.

Q: What kind of atmospherics did he project in the embassy?

GOLDBERG: He was sort of distant and aloof. I mean he was one of these giant figures of the Foreign Service. Dean Hinton was the ambassador in Pakistan, and he and Barnes were reporting very different perspectives on South Asia to the Department without engaging one another in a dialogue – it reached the point where the Department sent out a notice to both posts to cease and desist from the bickering and urged – well frankly directed – them to coordinate some of the things they were sending in. Divergence of opinion, sure, but outright sniping, no and the arguing seemed to suggest each had a vested interest in demolishing the arguments of the other. Reg Murphy was the Assistant Secretary for what was then the Bureau of Near East and South Asian affairs at the time and he tried to mediate.

Barnes' DCM before I got to the front office was Marion Creekmore who was approachable, a very easygoing guy, well-liked by everyone in the mission. Barnes might not have interacted well with the embassy community but Creekmore more than made up for this in terms of that management, mentoring, and lifting spirits. Grant Smith was the political counselor at that time. Grant eventually became ambassador to three of the "-stans" after the breakup of the Soviet Union. George Kenney, an older and old style FSO, was the economic counselor. I got to know him a little bit when I was staff assistant. Grant left in July 1984, as did Marion. Marion was replaced by Gordon Streeb whom I liked immensely, but who was clearly in Harry Barnes' shadow in a way that Marion wasn't. Grant was replaced by Stan Escudero.

Stan was a wonderful briefer, had this wonderful voice. The briefing that he did in the aftermath of Mrs. Gandhi's death and a few other things, they were just first rate. I don't think he got along all that well with Barnes because they had some differences in analysis. Stan could never be as well versed on South Asian issues as Barnes; he came in cold, thought he knew the issues and in fact needed a bit more humility in dealing with someone like Barnes. When you think you know the issues but don't really, it's probably better to listen, which Stan didn't do very well at first. But I liked Stan a lot. He was a terrific person.

Q: From your perch there in the front office, what feeling did you get about U.S.-Indian relations?

GOLDBERG: A time of great possibility. Mrs. Gandhi had been essentially anti-American for a long time. Harry Barnes was the "Black Hand" who was trying to sabotage India in the Punjab area. Shortly before I got there the Embassy had put out a notice about Americans not traveling in the Punjab. Barnes had a very difficult relationship with Mrs. Gandhi and her ministers. When she was assassinated, there was a sense that Rajiv would be a very different prime minister, somebody who had a broad perspective on the world. I don't know how we got that idea because all we knew about him after his brother had died in a plane crash – the brother was the heir apparent – was that Rajiv liked to fly planes – he was a pilot – and had little interest in politics. But we had a vested interest in portraying him as a progressive and a reformer. Meanwhile Dean Hinton in Pakistan was arguing that this guy is a lightweight and not to be trusted. It turns out that he was an incredible lightweight.

But as I say there was this sense of possibility the year that I was staff aide, and Barnes tried his best, as did other members of the mission, to interest Rajiv, India's ministers and governors in a better friendlier relationship with the United States. The whole time I was up in the front office we were working in that direction. I subsequently came to view Rajiv as incompetent. He was easily manipulated by Congress party politicians right up to the time that he was assassinated [May 21, 1991]. Barnes had reasonably good access and talked about how American and India could work together to enrich the lives of the people of India.

Q: As a junior rotational officer in the embassy, what were your specific duties when you were in the front office?

GOLDBERG: Much of it was monitoring the paper flow before it got to Barnes, carrying messages to the sections that he wanted transmitted. The last four or five months I wrote four or five speeches for him, and that was great opportunity. And I traveled with him on three of his trips, so it was a very productive period for me. When we left, Barnes had a farewell lunch for Sally and me at which he said he hoped I would become a South Asian hand. Sally blanched at that idea. We never did get back to South Asia.

Q: There are three consulates in India: Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras at that time. Did the ambassador make it a point to visit those places?

GOLDBERG: At least twice a year. He was very good about that.

Q: How would he get around? Did the DAO [Defense Attaché Office] have its own airplane?

GOLDBERG: No, we flew commercially. I accompanied him to Calcutta and to Bombay. Those were great trips. I also accompanied him on his ill-fated trip to somewhere in Uttar Pradesh where he fell and broke his shoulder. They had to do the X-ray in the veterinary office because that was the only machine that was working. To his credit he continued with his trip with his arm bound up before we got back to New Delhi. He was in great pain at the time. But he was well aware of the need to get out and about in the country. Was he similarly attentive to the needs of others in the American community, even the unofficial American community? I never got the sense that he was. I know in fact on our trips I can only recall one time when he addressed the Embassy staff.

Q: One of the big events for any embassy is the July 4th party. Being up in the front office you must have gone through one or more.

GOLDBERG: Yeah, one. Actually there were two events on that occasion. One was an Embassy function. Then the other was a broader community function. I worked on the Embassy function, which was funded through donations made by officers and their families. The embassy wasn't that large at that time. I mean it had a fair number of officers, but it wasn't that large – maybe fifty State, and however many more from other agencies. We had the equivalent of a community liaison office. I don't really recall that as a separate office at that time. We did have volunteer spouses working on that event

Q: As the junior rotational officer you did consular, front office, was there a third rotation?

GOLDBERG: No, those were the only rotations that I had. And I spent most of my assignment in the front office. I was there for 24 months, ten months in consular. That was long enough for me, and I think it was long enough for the poor Indians who had to endure my boorish ways. But the front office was really terrific work.

ERNESTINE S. HECK
Political Officer
New Delhi (1983-1986)

Ernestine S. Heck was born in Oregon in 1940. She received her bachelor's degree from Oregon State in 1962. Her career has included positions in Bombay, Saigon, Teheran, Niamey, Katmandu, New Delhi, Colombo, and Madras. Mrs. Heck was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in December 1997.

HECK: I was assigned back to India via about five months of a course to remind me how to speak Hindi. So I went off to take Hindi for four months, I guess, and left Washington in early May of 1983.

Q: How effective did you find this emphasis on Hindi was. I've heard people say they spoke it more in Rosslyn where they got the training than they did when they got to India.

HECK: Well, we'll cover India tomorrow or next time, but I would say that in three years in New Delhi at that point as a political officer covering internal politics, which is what I went into, I only had one long-term - I mean by that an hour or more - interview with a government official in Hindi in three years. He was an untouchable, what we would call an untouchable, a harijan it was called then and now a dalit, but he was a government official, he was an Indian civil servant. It's called the Indian Administrative Service, the IAS, the people who run the country, the follow-on to what used to be the ICS, the British and Indian civil service that ran India before independence. I think he did it as a political statement, because I know that everybody coming into the IAS has to speak or be able to pass a certain amount of tests in English even if he wasn't particularly comfortable. Other than that, I used it on the streets. I used a little bit of it at first, as my predecessor did and I suspect my successor, because I was the official Hindi language officer for the embassy, I used it to establish that I knew something about India and that I wasn't just a dilettante, and then I would go into English, and that's basically the way it went for all of us. Certainly if the idea is communication, any educated Indian's English is going to be better than my Hindi. I did take lessons every day for an hour before I went to work every morning of the three years I was there, so I did keep it up, but I would make one point. In the embassy at the same time - now, as a Hindi language officer or as the official language officer, I got an extra ten percent in my salary for being the Hindi language officer. My first ambassador there was Harry Barnes, who had been in India off and on for at that point, I think, 36 years, who had been studying Hindi off and on for 36 years and who was a tremendous linguist, so that was always intimidating. But what was really intimidating was our science counselor, whose name was Ahmad Meer, who had been born in Lucknow. At independence in 1947 when his relatives, when his parents, went off to Pakistan, he had been left behind with an aunt in old New Delhi, so he was raised up until the age of university in old Delhi speaking Hindi all the time. Then he went to the United States, got his Ph.D., became an American citizen, was back as the science counselor. If there ever had been a real emergency needing Hindi, would they have come to me or to Ahmad Meer? Well, the answer is pretty obvious. So I always felt guilty about my ten percent pay on that.

Q: But you took it.

HECK: But I took it.

Q: Okay, Ernie, we'll pick this up next time in 1982. We've already talked about your use of Hindi, but then we'll pick up. You were in New Delhi from '82 to when?

HECK: From 1983, May of '83, until July of '86.

Q: Today is the 18th of August 1998. Ernie, after some hiatus we're back in business. We were talking about going to New Delhi in '83. You had had a Hindi course?

HECK: I had had a second Hindi course. I had done the original Hindi course in 1972, and as soon as I knew I had a 3-3 (useful level), I quit and got married. This was shortly after women were allowed to be married and be in the Foreign Service. So what I had in the spring of '93 was a refresher course to get me into shape for going off to New Delhi.

Q: So in '83 what was your job?

HECK: I was head of the internal political section, general political reporting section of the political section in New Delhi. At that point we had internal, external, pol-mil, labor and I guess that was it, four different sections.

Q: How were relations with India at this point and a little about the political situation when you arrived, and then we can talk about developments?

HECK: I got there toward the end of, although we did not know it at the time, the end of Mrs. Gandhi's period in office. When she had first become Prime Minister, her relationship with the then President of the United States was not very good at all. By 1983 things were slightly better but only slightly, and we were always seen in India as being pro-Pakistani. It has been a sort of roller coaster thing, American-Indian relationships, and it had been a no-win sort of situation, a zero sum game because of what we did with Pakistan. In the spring of '83 things were pretty good. She had been to the United States, and she had had a relatively good experience. Of course, President Reagan could charm the birds out of the trees if he so wished. I got there during the middle of the Secretary of State's visit. George Shultz was in town when I got there, and in fact I had to come out a bit early because they needed cannon fodder for the overnight operation center. So I would say that things were in a slightly better situation in the spring of '83 than they had been. However, it was still difficult. We were always seen as a possible ruiner of plans Indian. The foreign hand was shorthand to mean American and other imperialistic intervention or interference in things. Certainly working with the Foreign Ministry - and luckily I did not have to do anything much with that because I was covering internal politics, but I sure heard a lot of it from members of Parliament - sometimes I felt like we were under Chinese water torture with little drops of barbs coming down on us daily.

Q: Was the Foreign Ministry a bit or more so than I understand in Mexico? In Mexico they give the extreme left, the intellectuals, free play to play around because we have very close relations. The Mexicans can do their macho thing by sticking us there. I was wondering whether you had this feeling that there was something of that in the Foreign Ministry.

HECK: Oh, to a certain extent, yes definitely. The number of younger officers who had come out of JNU, which is Jawaharlal Nehru University, was probably larger than from many other universities, and they tended to have a leftist slant to things from their own background. There was also a certain amount of sort of castism, I suppose, a certain amount of supercilious Brahmanism. At least, that's what we would see it as at times. But it's like all things in India. You can find anything in India. In many ways the Indians and the Americans are an awful lot alike, and there is good and bad in all sorts of places. I do think that it was difficult to deal with bureaucracy at times, and certainly it was difficult to deal with politicians at times in the early '80s.

Q: Can you talk about the politics of the early '80s and how you got around and dealt with the internal politics and how we saw it with American interests.

HECK: Well, first of all, I should say that the idea of reporting on internal politics was something whose time had passed by the time I got there, although I hated to admit it. Being a political officer in India in the '60s, say, was more sexy in a sense and it was when this sort of system was set up. I did the same thing, of course, that political officers covering internal politics in India in the '60s had done. The difference was that it really didn't matter to have me or other embassy reporters going out into the countryside to report on what specific districts or district leaders thought about any policy in New Delhi, for two reasons: one, because power was so centralized in the hands of Mrs. Gandhi and the Cabal that ran the Congress Party at that time; and two, because our reporting function back to Washington had sort of been superceded. We were doing the same job the New York Times reporter was doing except the New York Times reporter got a lot larger spread and was probably read first in Washington because it got into the paper, it got into the operations center, and it got spread around. A few years later, of course, we were completely superceded by satellite television. So being an internal political reporter in India today just doesn't have the urgency or sense of urgency that it did before. In fact, the job has really atrophied since I left it. But what I did was a lot of traveling. First of all, we have three consulates general plus the embassy in India, so in terms of political reporting, the country was quartered, but, of course, Embassy New Delhi had control over everything that went out from the regional consulates general. My reporting area, therefore, was northern India or northwestern India. It comprised Kashmir, Rajasthan, Madhya Pradesh, Punjab, Uttar Pradesh, and Delhi City. First of all, Punjab was off limits to us by the time I got there. There was an insurgency of some import going on at the time. The Akali Dal, the Sikh Party, which had a strong religious bent to it, was running rampant through the area, and although it was perfectly safe for us to go to large parts of the state of Punjab, the embassy front office had decreed that we could not. So Punjab, absolutely the most interesting political problem in the area at the time, was off limits except for what we could report from New Delhi. So that left me the rest of it. Kashmir, large parts of it, were off limits because the army wouldn't let us into it, but we could go to the Vale of Kashmir where Srinagar, the capital, is. And that left us the rest of the area. I did a lot of traveling. I was out in places like Gorakhpur, which is in the northern part of Uttar Pradesh in the sugar belt near the border with Nepal. I did a lot of coverage of Uttar Pradesh. Of course, the population of Uttar Pradesh is huge. At that point it was about 121,000,000 people as I remember, so it was larger than many countries and very important. It was at that point the linchpin upon which the Congress Party depended to run the country. Of course, some years later, 15 years later, it's totally non-Congress in terms of the parties that hold power there, and the whole Congress Party strategy has shifted, but at that time it was very important. So I spent a lot of time in places like Allahabad and Benares and so on. Then I divided the rest of my district with the other political reporter from the internal political side, so we had a sort of division of half and half of the region. We probably traveled once every six weeks or so for perhaps a week at a time.

Q: Sometimes part of the reporting is to get out and meet people who may come up later on, and make your mark and all with them and all. Did you have feeling of that or picking out comers and cultivating them a bit?

HECK: We did a certain amount of that, but really if you're traveling in that area, we might get back to a place once every eight or ten months. It didn't really give us a chance to do that in depth. We did it certainly in New Delhi, and we relied on the entire mission for that sort of information, lots of it from, for instance, USIA, the USIS office there. We had at that point a counselor of embassy who was the labor counselor. That position has been downgraded, but we relied on other sections of the embassy to fill us in on different groups of people in the country. Remember, even then the population was almost 920,000,000 in the country, and it's very hard to pick out people, but, yes, we did the best we could on that.

Q: What were the issues between the United States and India that from your perspective the embassy was concerned about?

HECK: From my perspective the thing that mattered most was the Indo-Pak relationship, what India might or might not do in terms of nuclear proliferation, what it might do in terms of fighting with Pakistan over Kashmir, most definitely what it was doing in the state of Punjab to diffuse the situation in Punjab. There was a great deal of belief in the country at the time that Pakistan was arming and aiding the Sikh insurgency movement, and in fact there is truth to that just as India aids and abets various things that go on in Pakistan. There is a great deal of clandestine work back and forth across the border, I think. Certainly it always reminded me of that cartoon strip that used to run many years ago and maybe still does in Mad Magazine with the spy versus spy. There was a good deal of that back and forth. We were always seen, the United States was always seen, as trying to somehow get our own spies in the Indian hierarchy, particularly in the military and in the nuclear establishment and so on. But we were viewed with suspicion. Political officers as a group were viewed with suspicion as being the people who somehow corrupted Indians. This in fact, of course, has always been a game that is played, the great game that has gone on for many years, of course, but the political section per se was not really part of this. For instance, my house had belonged to my predecessor and his predecessor for a number of years. The theory was that we were very close - well, we were within a mile and a half or two miles of parliament building. Therefore, if anyone could get the members of Parliament over for lunch, it would be us, so we had this house which was very close to the embassy. This house was watched constantly. There was a member of the intelligence who ran a little bicycle repair shop across the street and who would occasionally come over and ask to get the names of the guests and certainly wrote down every license number and so on. In those days we did not have gate guards. Later in my tour we did, but he would come over occasionally and open the gate. The real reason, of course, was to find out who was coming in and out of it. So we were very closely watched, and I was watched everywhere I went in country, as were the other members of the political section. I remember one time being out in Allahabad and the local person from the intelligence community actually escorted us around town on sort of a motorbike. He drove through town, but he insisted on sitting in on all of the appointments also, or he would find a way to get into them - let's put it that way - if not in the room, then in the outer room, and you could be sure that he heard every word.

Q: It really does sound much more like a police state. You're giving me not a positive face to that.

HECK: Oh, I don't mean to do that, but India changed a great deal beginning a few years later. India is a democracy. It's just a different kind of democracy than the United States and much different from European democracy, but it's a country that has been independent now for 50 years. Of course, in those days, '35 or whatever, '36, it has never had a coup. There had been rumors, at least a rumor, that Mrs. Gandhi attempted to do that after she was obviously losing power the first time in the '70s. It never happened. The military is scrupulous about this, and I have great faith in Indian democracy, but it was a much more authoritarian kind of democracy than we had, and Mrs. Gandhi was a very authoritarian sort of a woman. You know that, as she moved into power after Lal Bahadur Shastri died in 1966, January of '66, she was placed in power by the king makers of the party because they wanted somebody pliant. They learned to their horror shortly thereafter that Mrs. Gandhi may have been the housekeeper and chatelaine for her father but she was not pliant. By the time I got there in 1983, she was very, very much in charge of the country. They all kowtowed to her tremendously in her party. She, on the other hand, was distrustful of people. She was certainly distrustful of Americans and the United States. She ran a very closely held government. She made the decisions, and often they were made on very personal reasons. I could always see in her where so many men get their opinions about women in politics or women in any sort of official position or women in a professional position. She reacted to things on a very visceral level, and personal opinions of another person's worth or non-worth got in the way sometimes of logical thought. She was something to me of a caricature of what a woman is seen as by a lot of men. In any case, she died shortly thereafter, and things changed drastically in India. She was assassinated by the Sikhs. I should say that she had caused a terrible massacre in Amritsar, which is the holy city of the Sikhs, at the Golden Temple, which is the holiest of holies. It's like having a shoot-out at St. Peter's or at the Kaaba. It is not the sort of place where one would want to have soldiers, and the Indian army was directed and did mount an attack there against Jarnail Bhindranwale, who was this sort of charismatic, almost Rasputin figure who was the political and religious leader of a lot of Sikhs, not of the rational, middle-ground, middle-class Sikhs, but of the people who were his followers. The problem in Punjab had been one of economy as much as anything else, and I suppose that's true of many revolutions, is it not, or insurgencies rather. But Punjab is and was a very rich farming state with a finite amount of land, and the men who were the farmers or that had some farming families were able to send their young, particularly their young men, to local colleges giving them an education. When they got out of college, there were no particular jobs for them nor was there land anymore to divide, because the land had already been divided to a fare-thee-well. So here you have a pretty well educated - this is not Princeton, but I mean educated - class and no place to go, and that's where the trouble, I think, started as much as anything. But in any case, when she ordered her troops into the Golden Temple and they got Bhindranwale, killed Bhindranwale, and a number of other followers, the die was cast and it was only a matter of time before the Sikhs got to her. They did so the following October when she was assassinated as she crossed from her private house into her office area. She was assassinated by one of her own guards, who was a Sikh. Her son and heir was at that time in the East, in the Calcutta consular area, I think actually in the Calcutta area at the time - I'll have to look that up. He was flown home immediately.

Q: This was ...

HECK: This was Rajiv Gandhi, and he was flown home immediately and was administered the oath of office by the President, who was a Sikh, Giana Zail Singh, but the trouble had already started. The fires were already seen around town, and several thousand Sikhs lost their lives in the following days in New Delhi as well as all over the country in various places. So once again there were lots of Sikh refugees in New Delhi living in the gurdwaras, the Sikh temples, and being cared for basically by the Sikh community although there were other organizations helping them. The difference this time - this is, I suppose, indicative of what was happening - in the past when there had been killings of Sikhs - and this had been going on for years - those who were killed or affected tended to be the poor. This time, as a very wealthy industrialist said to me, this time we were all targets. On the ring road, which is the peripheral road around New Delhi, cars were being stopped and Sikhs were just being pulled out and killed on the spot. This very important and wealthy Sikh businessman recounted stories of them trying to come over his wall. What had happened to some of his neighbors in an integrated, I mean the wealthy areas of New Delhi are certainly not of one religion; everybody lives together - but they were being targeted. They were being targeted by the Communist Party, it is believed by many. A certain number of members of Parliament were accused, and I think rightly so, of actually leading bands to do this sort of nefarious thing. The remains of what happened after the death of Mrs. Gandhi have been with the country for many, many years, and it's only recently, I would say, that the wounds have been somewhat healed. The distrust is always there at some level or another because of the same sorts of things that drive ethnic and religious violence in other parts of the country, as memories are long. But certainly today the situation has calmed down greatly. The Akali Dal is part of Parliament. The state is rich, Punjab is rich, the Sikhs are doing well. If there were members of the Congress Party leading demonstrations and leading mobs, it certainly wasn't the official policy of the government of the country nor of the Congress Party. So, unlike some other places I have served in, one could never say that the ruling party was part of this problem; it was not.

Q: Prior to the assassination of Indira Gandhi, was there any of what happens in some other countries where the Indians pay quite a bit of attention to political developments and other things in the United States and get a little bit miffed, because if anything happens in India outside of the assassination of the prime minister, it's going to be on page 23 or something?

HECK: Oh, of course, and isn't this true of most of the world?

Q: Oh, Canadians, of course, go bananas, but I was just wondering.

HECK: Yes, well, first of all, when I first went to India in 1963 and when I went back in 1983, something had changed but it was still there. Certainly in the '60s India was 15 years at that point out of being a colony, and it had tremendous hang-ups and feelings of inferiority left over from the colonial experience, from the way the Indians were treated by the British, with the racial thing. Skin color, of course, matters as much in India as it does anywhere in the world despite what Indians would like to tell you about this, and you can tell this by reading the ads in the paper on Sunday that ask for white-complexioned brides because that's the highest form of praise. The darker you are, the harder it is to marry your daughters off and the more you have to pay for this privilege. In any case, when I first went to India, I can remember going into a pharmacy near where I lived and people trying to shove me to the front of the line. It wasn't because I was a woman; it was because I was a white woman. It was terrible. That had changed by the time I got to India in '83, and that was certainly a change for the better, but still there was this dichotomy about how people in general felt about the West. What they called Europeans (we were Europeans, Americans were Europeans), what they felt about color, how they treated some of my colleagues who were not white but were brown or black or yellow was a real problem. Certainly they were tremendously thin-skinned when it came to what was in the paper - I mean here in the United States. As you know, the big papers that have correspondents there full-time, like the Post and the New York Times, tend to do stories from time to time that are just sort of filler, color stories, you know, about elephants and monkeys and sadhus and so on. This really set people off, of course, because India has a huge middle class and it did even then, and there are more Ph.D.s from India in the United States doing all sorts of fantastic things in all sorts of industries than you can shake a stick at. The number of doctors and other professionals that India provides to the rest of the world is a huge one. So, of course, when you put that with all of their relatives back in India and then they hear that the New York Times is running another story on some sadhu who is sitting in a tree or whatever, of course, they tended to be mad. The stories about their politics, about Indian politics, about Indian economy very often have a feel about them which indicates that we think we're superior, and it's a problem. There are many things about Indian economy, of course, where we have a great deal to teach India, I think. But, yes, you're right. Of course, the Indians were very, very sensitive about what we said about them and how we wrote about it and how we showed it in the movies and newspapers and TV and so on.

Q: How about the embassy? I wonder if you could talk about, one, who was the ambassador and how he or she operated, and then, two, often there's the feeling of those who haven't served in the area that people who serve in India get sort of India-centric and those who serve in Pakistan get Pakistan-centric. I was wondering whether this has kind of worn off or not. We're talking about the '83 to '86 period.

HECK: Well, first of all, I had two ambassadors during that period. Harry Barnes was the first one, and the second one was John Gunther Dean. Both of them were very much professional ambassadors. Harry Barnes had served in India several times. He spoke very good Hindi. He knew a great deal about Indian politics, Indian economic things. He was concerned about human rights violations, for instance, in Punjab, and if he had to talk about that, he could do it in Hindi. He was very, very good, and because of the fact that he had served there several times, he had a long memory. He could drop things from his own past. John Gunther Dean had never served in India. However, this was his fifth embassy, I think four of them as ambassador and one as a permanent chargé, so he was most definitely one of our most senior officers. We certainly didn't lack for professional guidance from either one of them. Much depended on the larger state of Indian-American relationships. I personally feel that it's important in India to have somebody who has professionalism. However, because the country is so big and because the government feels that we have neglected them, India as a government over the course of 50 years has wanted more than anything to have an ambassador who has the ear of the White House, and this can swing. Career ambassadors don't have the ear of the White House quite as much as political ambassadors, and we've had a whole series of political ambassadors in India. Some of them who have had the ear of the White House have been there in times when we were basically cut off and there was nothing left to do but play golf. That would be in the late '70s, for instance. But I was certainly pleased with my ambassadors and the way they handled things.

Q: I have spoken to John Gunther Dean about doing an oral history with him, but he's in Paris and so I haven't had a chance to do this, but I've heard from others that he was pretty authoritarian. How did you find that he ran the embassy?

HECK: Well, I think both of the ambassadors under whom I served left a lot of the running to their DCMs, who were obviously very senior men. John Gunther Dean took no nonsense from people. If he thought you were doing a good job, he gave you a lot to do, and he was very, very helpful to me and to some others I know. On the other hand, I have seen him eat consuls general for breakfast and spit them out when he didn't like the way the man in question was handling things. So, yes, he was - and is, I suppose - somewhat authoritarian. On the other hand, any man who has had that many embassies, I guess, also has something of a right to be so. He worked very hard in India, and he certainly cultivated ministers and all the proper people. He was very professional.

Q: Did you find any problem with some of our reporters - I won't say 'going native' is the wrong term - but getting sort of infatuated with the kaleidoscope that is India?

HECK: Well, this goes back to the very beginning, and all sorts of ambassadors on both sides of the fence, I think, have been accused of clientitis. The so-called Delhi-wallahs or India-wallahs in the Foreign Service who go from several posts or have had several posts in South Asia, I don't think they are like that, because they in many cases have served in several of the countries in the region and they can look at it in a pretty professional way. But it has been a problem, yes. But is it not a problem in other countries?

Q: Oh, yes, but I think...

HECK: The India/Pakistan thing, though, because of the great divide, has been particularly egregious. If you have served in Pakistan very often, you see things from the Pakistani way. Certainly governments, administrations here in Washington, are seen as being friends of one or the other. The Democrats are seen, or have been seen, as being pro-Indian much more than pro-Pakistani, and the Republicans pro-Pakistani. I have heard political appointees in Republican administrations saying, "Well, Pakistanis are real men. They wear pants; they don't wear those diapers." Of course, the Prime Minister of India, when it was Lal Bahadur Shastri, wore a dothi and it does look like a rather large sheet, or messy diaper. But those days, I think, are somewhat behind us. Certainly after Mrs. Gandhi died and her son, Rajiv, became Prime Minister, and Rajiv saw "The foreign hand" that got behind everything.

Q: You're raising your hand and...

HECK: I'm raising my hand openly, because at that point in the mid-'80s a raised hand, an open hand like this, was the sign of the Congress Party, and it was on every political poster for elections that would come up if it were a Congress Party thing. The symbol of the Congress Party has changed so many times - well, there have been many of them - but at that point this was the sign, the open hand. So when Rajiv Gandhi talked about the foreign hand, he meant American usually, sometimes British, but definitely outside intervention or interference, we would laugh about it and show the open hand. But Rajiv Gandhi was a youngish, a very young, man at that point, of course. He was a very pleasant man. He was a well educated man. He didn't have the personality-type hang-ups that his mother did, and he was a welcome breath, I think, for a lot of people when he came in as Prime Minister. He had been an airline pilot. He has or had an Italian wife, and he had always said he didn't want anything to do with politics. It was his younger brother, Sanjay, who was supposed to be the politician in the family, and he made a point to let his family know that he wanted nothing to do with politics. He was only pulled into it unwillingly by his mother after his brother was killed in a - was it skydiving? It was an acrobatic thing in May of 1983, I guess, '82 maybe; it must have been May of '82. In any case, he was killed because his plane went up early in the morning and got knocked around by a monsoon. So when Sanjay was killed, she started putting pressure on Rajiv, and he, against his will I think, finally acquiesced, and he became her right hand. So when she was killed, he then became the leader of the party and by extension became the Prime Minister. He was, as I said, lower key, more modern. Well, he was a post-independence baby, and he didn't have the history in his mind the way his mother did of the incarcerations during the fight for independence, of the battle for independence and all the things that made Mrs. Gandhi what she was. So he was looked on hopefully by everyone, I think, not only in his party, of course, but in the various diplomatic missions around town, that this was going to be a new ballgame, and to a certain extent, I guess, it was. But he was still the leader of the Congress Party, and the Congress Party remains to this day a party of old men in many cases. So he wasn't able to just modernize everything, but he did a lot of modernization in ways that I suppose anyone living today would appreciate. He tried to bring them to use modern technology, for instance, and to become part of the 20th century, because the party itself was still sort of mired in the past. He tried to modernize the party and the government and he tried to modernize the country. The problem is, of course, that India is so huge and the party was so entrenched at that time that to do any of this is a very long-term problem. Like turning around a big tanker, it takes time and space. So when I left in 1986, he was almost two years into being Prime Minister. Things still looked very much part of the old way, but he was trying. He brought a lot of young men into the Parliament and into the office of the headquarters of the Congress Party. Some of them like Rajaish Pilot, for instance, had been one of his flying companions. There were a couple of pilots that he brought in who were like him, men in their early or mid 30s, and there was a whole series of men in their early or mid 30s whom he brought into Parliament. They were becoming increasingly important at that time when I left India in 1986. Some of them are still in Parliament.

Q: Well, in '83 to '86 we were pretty heavily involved in supporting the Mujahideen in Afghanistan and using Pakistan as the conduit for getting equipment there and all. Did this set off nerves in New Delhi while you were there?

HECK: Yes, to an extent. Anything that we did in or with Pakistan was always suspect, as I have said. India was more supportive of the government of Afghanistan than certainly we or the Pakistanis were. They supported the then head of government. They had direct air transport: Indian airlines flew from New Delhi into Kabul. It was one of the few airlines that did. The Foreign Ministry was often vociferous in its support for the President of Afghanistan and the government there and of the Soviet presence in Afghanistan. One of the things that we did which was very annoying to them was that we briefed the foreign press once a week on what was happening in Afghanistan. That meant not only the American representatives of the American papers but also the Indian representatives of those American papers, so very often it would be an Indian correspondent coming in to receive this briefing, it would be the person from Australian radio, it would be journalists from any of the foreign press that happened to be there, and there is a large press corps based in New Delhi which covers all of South Asia for various nations. So we would have Japanese and we would have Australians in and the Americans and representatives of American papers and so on. When I was in New Delhi, even though I was doing internal politics, I usually gave the briefing because I had been the Afghan desk officer and I had a better background and feel for these events and people than perhaps some of the colleagues who would do it normally. So for my tour I did this. In the past if anyone came down from New Delhi, from the embassy in New Delhi...

HARRY A. CAHILL
Consul General
Bombay (1983-1987)

Harry A. Cahill was born in New York, New York and raised in New England. He received a bachelor's degree in English from Manhattan College and served in the U.S. Army. His Foreign Service career included positions in India, Norway, Poland, Yugoslavia, Uruguay, Colombia, and Bombay. Mr. Cahill was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 29, 1993.

CAHILL: In December, 1983, I arrived in Bombay, India as Consul General.

Q: When you got the job how did you see your job from talking with people and getting ready to go out? What were our interests in Bombay when you were there 1983-87?

CAHILL: Principal areas of interest were economic and commercial. India's industrial might, huge population, resources of talented people and tremendous market size were very visible. Since mid-1991, liberalizing economic reforms have greatly spurred foreign business interest in India, but in my time activity was already strong. As time passed I got more and more into the political scene, observing internal and international trends. I will always admire Bombay for being independent and outspoken. The city powers the rest of India as the real business, artistic, press capital. Unlike Delhi where yes-men abound, Bombay can be vehemently critical. It also appreciates Western culture. The New York Philharmonic was greeted languidly in Delhi but with a roar in Bombay. Some of the most vicious politics in India played in Bombay along with some of the best thinking in literature, arts, medicine and nuclear physics.

Q: Was this a Bombay area nationality trait or was this just a center where a lot of things were happening and a lot of people were mixing together?

CAHILL: There are a number of nationalities in India. Maybe I could say there are several Indias, each with different traits. Bombay was the historic gateway to the West. All kinds of doers come together there. The driving cultural and economic forces are there. One observes the eclectic architecture, "Bollywood" where 900 feature films are completed each year, and the sizable news media complex. The great mix of elements gives off heat and generates forward motion.

Q: As consul general there what were your main duties at that time?

CAHILL: Doing all I could to improve economic/commercial ties with India, feeling the pulse of the political scene in the west of India, winning the people's friendship for America.

Q: Talking about commercial ties, how did you find India as a market? What were the problems and what were the opportunities and how did we meet these?

CAHILL: Market opportunities were good. Consumer goods imports were tightly regulated but other sectors were open and hungry. Especially sought by India were joint investment-technology ventures. In one week, for example, I inaugurated Indo-US ventures in pharmaceuticals, computers and Barbie doll manufacture. The middle class of India has a buying power that equals the average American. This market segment numbers over 300 million people. India is the twelfth largest industrial power in the world. Its pool of capable engineers, designers, accountants, doctors is enormous. American producers find excellent partners. Through their Indian branches, US firms sold very profitably to the Soviet bloc, companies like Xerox, Eli Lilly, Helena Rubenstein et al.

Problems included overwhelming government bureaucracy, a growing thirst for bribes, a protectionist mind-set that produced myriad regulations, poor infrastructure, volatile labor unions, and demagogic politicians who could interfere at any time. Our message: liberalize the economy and all India gains.

Our political concern focused on over-reliance on the Soviets and on internal ethnic friction. Abetted by political leaders including Mrs. Gandhi, the latter problem steadily worsened. We saw riots in Bombay which had never happened before. I worked with government officials, party people and police. When street fighting erupted they would call for prayers for rain to keep the mobs out of the streets. Terrible heat and humidity incite tempers. Needed are jobs and economic opportunities. Here American investment helps. Bombay was and is a fascinating laboratory. The most crowded city, it has very little crime.

Q: How did you find your dealings with the government people there on the economic/commercial side? Obviously some things were done in Delhi like tariffs and things of this nature.

CAHILL: Parliament consists of representatives from all over India. Reps from Bombay and western India have a lot to say. Powerful ministers and other leaders come from the western regions. Many of the largest firms are headquartered in Bombay and other western cities. All this means clout at the top. The consulate worked to build rapport with the power brokers and technocrats in western India. They were usually accessible, they listened.

Q: How did you find the embassy support of your efforts to increase American commerce in the Bombay area?

CAHILL: They did their thing and we did ours. When support was asked it was given in both directions as needed.

Q: Who were your ambassadors?

CAHILL: Harry Barnes was the first, a solid career officer who cared about his people. He was interested in non-government organizations. He transferred the rupee fund from the old AID days to a trust fund whose funds support continuing activities. Commerce was not a top priority. He was replaced by John Gunther Dean midway in my tour.

Q: I always think of him as being a very hard nosed operator, very active person. How did you find him?

CAHILL: I did not work closely with him. His style was different from most of the professional ambassadors I have known.

Q: Were there any major problems that you had to deal with while you were in Bombay?

CAHILL: Certain international incidents caused stress. One was the bombing of Libya in retaliation for terrorist acts. A large crowd of protesters came to the consulate. I met this group and explained why we had to act as we did. We had to protect innocent women and children from being blown out of airplanes. Such a scene was repeated after various events. I always met the demonstration leaders head on in the consulate courtyard. The Polish auction days helped me pitch my voice.

Q: How did the leaders of the demonstrators respond?

CAHILL: They backed away. News of events came early and gave time to prepare. The news of Libya came at sunset, always around 6:30 in Bombay because of latitude. I worried about the press reaction and realized I could blunt popular reaction if I could steer newspaper reporting. On entering a new country I always put priority on making friends with the news media and police. I definitely include the indigenous language press in this. That evening I walked fast through some streets and alleys to the home of India's top newspaper cartoonist. A smiling, small man with a twinkle in his eye answered my knock. Laxman's humorous, cutting cartoons normally straddled five columns on the front page of the Times of India which in turn straddled all of India. People absorbed his cartoon each day before they looked at the headlines. "Laxman, my friend, let's talk." We sat down and I explained what a menace this slimy, megalomaniac rat was to the world. That night Laxman went to work with pen and paper, and the next morning his big cartoon was devastating. Reagan looked like a mature, cautioning uncle on the left. Across and down the page was a swaggering, stunted, wild-eyed midget wearing an enormous general's hat. He waved weapons in both hands. India chuckled at this silly scene and much of the Libyan tension was defused.

Q: That shows you what can be done. You know the person and you know the impact and you save up for the big things.

CAHILL: You don't sit and hide in your residence shuffling paper. You work constantly to build up key contacts, build a wide and alert operational base. Problems appear at any moment. I remember one elderly American couple who sailed into the harbor in a small yacht. They were going around the world by themselves. They took photos of the harbor and were promptly nabbed as Pakistani spies. One phone call to Bombay's police chief freed them. I still get Xmas cards from the couple, now safely moored in San Diego, expressing thanks for the "miracle" that delivered them.

There are little and big things. In all, we received full, rapid support from the right people. And we always tried to move fast. For example, a large public relations disaster was averted when the New York Philharmonic visited India for the first time, led by Bombay's own son Zubin Mehta. The public and the press soured on the group when they complained of cockroaches in Delhi's leading state-owned hotel. Then when they arrived in Bombay there was a bomb plot scare. The theater was to be bombed. The total group of 171 persons met in their hotel ballroom and announced they were not going to sacrifice their lives. No concert. I could visualize the lasting image of spoiled Americans whining and running home, braggart America collapsing again. I brought in the police chief and his top officers to assure that all would be well. They spoke to no avail. Then from the ballroom stage I listened and dialogued for three hours. It was like the scenario from "Twelve Angry Men". One by one they crossed over, agreed to play. That night the performance started 104 minutes late but was the best, most inspired and rousing concert of the tour. The news media gave them a tremendous ovation for art and for courage.

Theater was important in Bombay. Another setback almost came with the Minnesota Opera Company who were to do "Once Upon a Mattress".

Q: A musical comedy based on the story of the princess and the pea.

CAHILL: Right. I found the cast in despair at the PAO's house shortly after arrival. "We changed planes in Frankfurt and all our equipment, costumes, musical instruments, props, everything, stayed on the plane and was lost. We have nothing." Our USIS people advised them to cancel and go home, an attitude that still saddens me. I told the group that giving up was a terrible mistake. I waxed on about the greatest theater thrill in my life being at Washington's old Arena stage where there were no props and the audience's imagination soared. "We'll improvise. You will be the greatest!" So we did. The next night the knights all wore white shirts and ties. The queen wore somebody's big bathrobe. The king wore a bandanna round his head. The cast waited behind the curtain as the audience also waited and grew restless. Then I balanced on the lip of the stage, looked up into the darkness and extolled: "We are so very fortunate because tonight we are going to have one of the great experiences of our lives. We are so lucky, you and I, to be here because tonight we are going to see something marvelous in the theater. There are no props but we are going to rise above that and be with these great performers." Etc, etc. All schmaltz. It worked. We had a warmed-up audience, totally sympathetic. And an inspired performance. Fantastic reviews praised the very talented and brave Americans.

Overall, our relations with the news media turned very positive. So much of this depends on personal relations, friendships, better communication between "us and them". One tabloid in Bombay had a long history of playing to the Soviets and bashing America. Behind this was a gifted, brilliantly witty publisher-editor who was a charming rogue. His biting humor demolished us. I soon made it my business to know him and found him quite likeable. I came to know his family. We became friends and the tone of his paper changed. He started praising our projects. But the worst blow to the Russians came when he put me in the seat of honor at his granddaughter's coming of age party and placed our Soviet counterparts in the back of the hall.

Q: Well, that is great. It shows what consul generals, or somebody in our business, can do. These things do have an impact and you act as a bridge to get them to understand the local milieu.

CAHILL: Take bad scenes and turn them around. Keep thinking, take new initiatives, seek ways to expand our influence. Listen to others, respect others. Reach out. Get the American view across. Become part of meaningful organizations. They can use you for their and your mutual benefit. In Sri Lanka the Buddhists invited me to speak in Singhalese at temples and hand out graduation certificates to the children who completed religious training courses. Later, Buddhist leaders helped us greatly when we initiated the 100th anniversary celebrations of Colonel Olcott's landing in Ceylon. He was the American Civil War officer who did much to save Buddhism in Asia. For three days in 1980, the country spent its energy in parades, poster contests, speeches, etc. commemorating the great help America had given Lanka. Lanka's President led the main march as massed bands played Union army tunes. I scoured the USIS library and forwarded the scores. Young and old got the message that America was an old and faithful friend. The Communist Party leader came to me and said: "This is gold, absolute gold, for America." In India there were so many organizations. I tried to be active in important ones whether purely Indian or a blend of foreign and Indian. Many speeches made at many Rotary and Lions Clubs, prize giving at sports clubs and race tracks, judging the Miss India and Miss Diamond Queen and Miss Secretary contests, serving as trustee-director on hospital and school boards, being the first non-Japanese chief guest at the Bonsai festival and the first non-Brit to lead the annual Scots Caledonian Ball. I wrote articles for leading Indian newspapers, my favorite being a feature story on India's aid program to the United States. True. India gave us many things from money for our Revolution to Vivien Leigh for our movies. There were long days. I remember one Friday night attending four receptions and three dinners, then heading to airport for a pre-dawn plane to Gujarat for a big wedding weekend involving industrial and political chiefs. After the wedding ceremony one tycoon said: "Do come with us in our airplane. We'll inspect our main complex in Madhya Pradesh." So I landed somewhere in middle India, explored an industrial city in a jungle, and hopped aboard the Frontier Mail train at midnight, arriving back in Bombay just in time to begin a business Monday.

For official travel I changed the traditional "entourage" approach. One used to take a big American vehicle with driver, interpreter and various post personnel and go off into the countryside. This used up many resources, lost much time bouncing over rural highways, and often seemed pretentious. I would go alone, flying to points and being met by local hosts. This was very much appreciated and respected, and we saved enough money and other resources to get many of our staff out into the field.

A crucial part of our work was visas. As my all-time favorite consular officer, Stu, you know this well. America's image was shaped very much in by the way we handled visas. Bombay posed challenges. Every day the visa waiting line outside the consulate stretched for blocks up the main street. We were vulnerable to criticism for having people stand in rain or sun for many hours. This was a sad spectacle for passing traffic. America was cruel.

I opened the gates at 6 a.m. and completely absorbed the long line by circling it around our large courtyard out of sight of the street. In heavy pressure seasons as in late summer when students poured in prior to going off to college in the US, I would enter the courtyard around 7 a.m. and issue visas myself, doing the interviews as I walked along the column. Young students were important clients. Their families worried about them being alone and at the mercy of the western barbarians in the big consulate. I also learned that students, both poor and rich, would camp outside the gates on Sunday nights to beat the crunch on Monday mornings. This made me start my Sunday night visa sessions. I would bring these kids from the street into the lobby, interview and sign approval. The word got around. The consulate's reputation as a caring bunch of humans soared.

OWEN CYLKE
Deputy Mission Director, USAID
New Delhi (1983-1987)

Mr. Cylke was born and raised in New Jersey and educated at Yale University. After a tour with the Peace Corps in Ethiopia, he joined USAID in 1966 and served several years in Washington, where he dealt with African matters. In 1968 he was posted to Nairobi, the first of his overseas posts, which include Kabul, Cairo and New Delhi. In all, he dealt with environmental and development matters with USAID. Following retirement Mr. Cylke continued work in his field, including holding the Presidency of the Association of Big Eight Universities, which also dealt with developmental and environmental matters in the developing world. Mr. Cylke was interviewed by W. Haven North in 1996.

Q: What year now?

CYLKE: This was 1983. Just in clear terms, are you interested in cultural studies about AID?

Q: Sure.

CYLKE: I was the deputy director of the mission. They decided to bring another director in. The bureau actually put forward my name for director, even though there was never any reasonable prospect that that was going to come. I can't remember the dynamics of that, but my name was put forward. I think, in the career sense, while that wasn't ever going to happen- It's interesting: once having been proposed for that, you were considered eligible for assignments later on that perhaps you wouldn't have been considered for if your name hadn't been put forward. Just in terms of anybody's career was a mix of some internal merit which you have, in terms of performance, but it's also luck and timing and how the whole situation. I couldn't have gone to Egypt in 1983 if the director hadn't come out in 1983. AID doesn't operate very much at interim kinds of things. I do recall, when I went to Egypt, seeing the front lines, that Priscilla Bouton had gone to India in 1979. While it wasn't a conscious part of my thinking, I can remember back saying, "Oh, isn't that nice, we're on the same schedule." I had always wanted to go to India one way or another, whether it was director in some other kind of capacity. In 1983, Tony Ford was the assistant administrator of the Egypt bureau. She thought I had done a good job there for four years. She thought I had a stressful fourth year under an outside director, where I was more or less representing bureau interests with what they considered to be an unknown. She thought that she would try to help me to do whatever I wanted to do in my next career step, which was not untypical of the way in which the system worked. I had said I wanted to go to India and she said she'd see what she could do. Joe Wheeler was dead set to get me to go to Sudan. He called me on the phone.

Sudan had a romantic part of my imagination from having been a Peace Corps volunteer and traveled there in the summer. The president of the African Development Bank had been Sudanese. I think there's a country in Africa which presents itself in I don't want to say romantic terms, but in- It's a country worthy of your attention. But in the ethos of Egypt, it's a country. It's a little town up the Nile. Being promoted to Khartoum from Cairo was the image among Egyptians was, "You're being sent out to the wilderness." I had always wanted to go to India and, frankly, the schooling and everything else was there.

As it turned out, I went to India. But I do remember the few moments there when I thought I was going to go to the Sudan. To me, and I'll say this, I think that going to India was the most exciting thing that happened to me in my professional career, bar none, and this was before I ever got there - just because of the development history. An awful lot of development theology, not just for AID, but for the world, had been written out of the Indian experience. So, when people talked about development, an awful lot of what they were talking about came out of India.

Q: Can you give some examples of that?

CYLKE: The best one came out of the Africa bureau and that was working with John Mellor and his wife, whose name was Unra Tele. We'd done a lot of work in Africa and stuff. I'd worked a lot with both of them and got to know them a lot. I'd read all of John's business about agricultural-led growth strategies and all of this kind of business. John was quite a powerful personality - one of the great people.

Anyway, when I was appointed to this job, I went to the library, which I really hadn't done, I don't think, in any other country, and gotten every book that I could get my hands on, on the culture, on the society. I was just captured by this thought of going to India and talked to lots of different people. Also, it was a dramatic change for me because I'd never really served in an AID mission. I had been the deputy director in Afghanistan and the deputy director in Egypt. In both cases, largely inside jobs. Your technical divisions were outside and your director was outside. You were in an operational position. So it was a very different role, going to India.

When I went to India, I consciously spent at least the first four months traveling and expanding my mind. India's quite an expansive place. The thing that strikes you was, one, how (inaudible) it is. I was just there and we had the same notice. I've been doing a lot of traveling in East Asia. When you go to the Philippines, they talk about Malaysia. When you go to Malaysia, they talk about Taiwan. When you go to Taiwan, they talk about Korea. They're all benchmarking off each other. When you go to India, they're benchmarking off the last five year plan. They don't benchmark off China. They're not benchmarking off Europe. It's internal, they're benchmarking off India.

Q: Introverted.

CYLKE: Very introverted kind of place. So, that is interesting because you're putting yourself into a society which has its own raison d'être and its own kind of- Every society does, but really a big universe unto itself. So, I spent some time looking around.

Now, the program at that time- Remember, the program had been closed and, following one of the Pakistani wars, reopened. We had a PL480 level of about $100 million and we had a program level, I think, of $125 million when I got there. I think it was down to about $75 million and down to $50 million. It became the bank for other kinds of interests in the Agency. They just kept peeling away at the Asian missions to finance other needs of the Asians. When I was there, it was $125 million. There was enormous investment in rural areas. We had a huge forestry program. We had a huge irrigation program. We had a huge agricultural research program. We had a very large health program. But it was largely what the Agency had become, I think, over a set of years, for all kinds of policy directions. It's what India wasn't, development was.

Two things during my time got my attention focused on other kinds of opportunities. One was my own perception that I thought that the development community in India, the people that everyone respected so much, were all in their 80s. There were all these old gurus wandering around with kind of Fabian notions of the organization of the world. I thought, frankly, that they had had their time. A lot of their ideas had petered out. We didn't have any distinctive view as to what you did about a country with 400 million people below the poverty line. We worked away at it. We had lots of earnest people come out and say, "Well, I want to run a pilot project in village X to see what we should do." That was always what was going on, a very presumptive kind of thing. We didn't have a major resource level. With the poverty question, it seems to me you had two options. You either had to have a blind insight or you had to have a heck of a lot of money. We had neither an insight nor a lot of money. I thought that, frankly, we were spending an awful lot of money on what was straight out budget support dressed up as irrigation and dressed up as forestry. But it was money that was just moving right through the Indian government budget. We were converting that $100 million into rupees. They were getting $100 million of foreign exchange, which was probably buying computers from Japan. We were getting local currency construction and we weren't getting any policy out of it. I traveled all over the country with our engineers, who were reviewing these projects. I can remember standing on many dusty roads with a local employee, saying, "Now, let's see, you've written down that there's a crack in this irrigation canal. When on your schedule do you ever get back to this place?" We calculated that it was sometime after his retirement, given the schedule of site visits. So, it seemed to me a rather-

Q: These were sector grants?

CYLKE: These were loans for the irrigation construction program in the state of Maharashtra. They would have maybe- As I said, they were really public works programs. There were maybe 20 sites. Remember, the Indians wouldn't accept any technical assistance. So, we had no technical assistance contractors. We had a couple people in the mission. They had interesting discussions with counterparts about irrigation technology. But the program wasn't structured to see those replicated, as I said earlier, in any systematic way, against the "irrigation," if you want to call it that, policy or practices and procedures of the Ministry.

Q: But it was reviewed like a capital project?

CYLKE: Reviewed like capital projects. That's exactly what they were. That bothered me. I want to say, in India, it was probably the most exciting time in my career also. The mission was terrific. Very strong technical people, very strong. My perception of management I think is worth mentioning. This is the only time I was a director, so I'll mention my perception of management. At the time when we had a lot of money, a billion dollars and John Lewis was director, it seemed to me that the nature of the dialogue was really between the director's office and the Ministry of Finance. It was on policy issues. The technical divisions, in a certain sense, were technical advisors to the director for the carrying out of certain programs. But the program was really focused on that level and on what had to happen. What happened subsequently was that that resource level went away. The Indians were very, very proud about their- They didn't like policy interference. We ended up in a role of almost pretending that we were having more policy influence than we were for Washington's purposes. We weren't having much impact. But we had such a strong staff that my own management perception, which I didn't go to India with but which I came away with, was a sense that the role of the director and the program office in fact was to support the technical divisions. But the only thing we really had of currency was really smart guys in the technical divisions. In a certain sense, the dialogue changed and it was the head of our health division or the head of our forestry division who was carrying the dialogue because the currency that we had were ideas. I don't think we had a program structure to take advantage of those ideas, but it was one heck of a good staff.

I'll give a couple examples. Rogers Beasley, who you may or may not know, I think it was his only four years in AID, he was a Rockefeller fellow and a missionary in Liberia, walked 20 miles into his first assignment in Liberia. He was a graduate of the University of the South at Sewanee and had this kind of mixed true commitment to what was going on and also a superb leader. If you went to Rogers' house-

Q: What was his position?

CYLKE: He was the head of the health pop office. If you went to Rogers' office on any night, anybody who was anybody in the health field was at Rogers' home. I mean, he ran a salon at his house. The head of our forestry division was a guy named David Heesen. He's now in the Egypt mission. Rogers was an older guy and I will come back with a funny story. I remember, he was greatly resented by everyone in our program and PD shops. They said he didn't know the AID rules and he didn't like project papers and he didn't do that. I argued back. I said, "Look, if you look at this mission, there were more health projects put out of that mission in my four years there than any other sector." Rogers knew how to get everyone else to do that stuff, including myself. I mean, he brought more assignments to me than I care to even remember. Worthy causes dropped at my desk. He was a true development entrepreneur in that sense. (Inaudible) in his career. The Agency had at that time people coming in from universities. We had two of these guys in the mission from universities, one from Idaho and one from Montana in our forestry division. That place was one of the happiest offices. They were excited. They had ideas and they, too, had made themselves, I think unquestionably, World Bank, anybody who came to town, wouldn't go anywhere without coming into our forestry division and talking to these guys. It was social and forestry. It was how to get agroforestry going in the country. But it was structured much like the irrigation portfolio. All the programs were based on states. They had four or five major $60 million social and forestry projects going, with three technical advisors for the country, out talking to these people. In a technical assistance one to one basis, perhaps having some impact on their counterpart. But again, my sense was we weren't structured against changing the norms under which the entire program ran. The Indians were pretty resistant to wanting us to even get into that position. But that was another good division.

Similarly, in irrigation, we had a top flight group of guys. That unit was headed up by a guy named Ed Stains. The other area was agresearch. That was really stuck in the old Indian agresearch system.

If you don't mind, there are a couple of stories here that I think are well worth telling. It was the 25th anniversary of the founding of the first agriculture university in India when I was there in 1984. For all the prickliness of the Indian government about not wanting policy and not wanting to thank anybody for anything, there were two things that happened that I thought were interesting.

The Indian government invited the deans- We had founded the agricultural university system in India, modeled on the American land grant system. Six different American universities were involved with that. They all had counterpart institutions around India. The Indian government, at their expense, not our expense, invited the sitting deans of those six universities to come to India at their expense for three weeks to celebrate the 25th anniversary of the founding of these universities. Well, that was really something.

Q: This was at the time we were doing the CDIE review of USAID experience with of the land grant colleges in developing countries.

CYLKE: In 1984, they all showed up in Delhi. First of all, I was just so impressed to meet these people. I had a subsequent job after leaving AID. I was with the Midwest University Consortium. I learned a lot about the power of agricultural deans, which I didn't know at this time. But they were a pretty powerful group of folks. I was really impressed with them. Most of them had not had any touch with India. These were the current sitting deans. I had one experience which was just interesting. We split up and we traveled out to the different universities. So I went out with a fellow who was the dean of the University of Illinois, who subsequently became the president of Oklahoma State University and helped bring me into this Consortium. Very hard-charging guy, who had no use for international- Didn't know what it was, didn't know about it, really thought it was a pain in the neck, but he was there. He was told he was supposed to be there. So we went out to one of the universities in Orissa, which had fallen somewhat into disrepair. His questioning was all, "Why did people come here 20 years ago? What was it about? What drove my faculty to want to be here?" He'd run his finger over the dust on a lab. I talked a lot about what I thought drove people, which was a mix, I think, of almost missionary spirit, development- There was a whole mix of patterns of things which I know more about from not direct observation but indirect observation. The next night, we went up to Pantnagar University, which was the class act of the universities which the University of Illinois had founded. I swear, 500 people were there to meet him. He did not sleep that night because- In India, they have the expression of "coming into your darshan," standing within the grace of a great man. He was representing something that was incredibly important. He was up the entire evening with people who wanted to come in and shake his hand and talk to him about what the University of Illinois had meant to their country, to their careers, to their life. This guy just was transformed. This rarely happens, but it's one of those moments where he understood what the whole development experience had really been. It was a very, very moving kind of experience. I was quite taken with the Indians reception.

Another story along that line. I got a cable from Washington, asking me if I couldn't go and get the Indians to thank us for 25 years of PL480. Well, thinking about the last thing you would ever want to ask for, that's it. I'll give you an example. When I was there the first year, there was an election in India. It wasn't nasty, but it's interesting to tell you the impact that PL480 had on that country. There was a full-page ad in the newspapers, in both the Hindi papers, and I suppose in other languages in other cities, and in the English press. It showed a cornucopia of food like we would see at Thanksgiving time, with vegetables and things falling out. It said, "Remember the sour taste of PL480." This was a campaigning poster. "Remember the sour taste of PL480. The Congress party brought you the sweet taste of self-sufficiency." So, the PL480 program still had that kind of currency in the political milieu. In that kind of milieu, I had no more intention of asking the Indians to thank us for PL480 than going to the moon. But it being India and India being the kind of country that it was, there was a local employee who felt a stronger obligation to adhere to the Washington masters than I did, which was always the case. They were watching us Americans to make sure that we followed our policy directions. He obviously sent it over to the- One day, I'm sitting in my office and I get a letter from the Prime Minister's office, saying that the PL480 experience was one of the profound experiences in the Indian independence, that it was a tribute to the relations between the countries, and India's strength today and the memories of a billion people are rooted in it. It was the most incredible letter I've ever read. So, you just take those couple of stories.

Q: Do you have that letter?

CYLKE: No, but AID must have it because ____ came out and we had a big celebration, so it must have gone back into the Washington records. But AID, more than in any other country I served in, had a profound effect on that country's consciousness and the United States standing with that country at its independence and through those famine years, not just providing the PL480, but building the agricultural research system, had a profound effect which lasts until today. I think it's true for a lot of AID directors because we're the United States, so there's an element of that. But there was certainly no one, and it really hit me, the power of an AID director, there was no one I couldn't see in India. And there was no institution we hadn't touched, whether it was a development bank, the Fertilizer Corporation, the agriculture universities, the major hotels in Delhi were all built with Cooley loans. Remember, the Cooley loans were- Years ago, the PL480 loans were more used to the PL480 being local currency generations from the sale of the commodity. In the old days, the loans were actually repaid in local currencies, rather than dollars. That had been invested in private activities in India. Bob Blakely was a young project officer in India in those days. He ran the Cooley loan program and Bob's name was like some kind of saint in the private sector. The Taj Hotel was always known as "Bob's Hotel." So, I think as people think about this era, we had a profound effect, not only in what we did - building an agricultural research extension system, the green revolution, that whole phenomenon - but it also seared not only the conscience of individuals that participated, but I think we are part of the political cultural history of that era in India and closer identified in their minds. That's something for the United States to be proud of. I was going to say something else about that, but it just slipped out of my mind.

Q: Despite the fact that Lyndon Johnson cut off PL480 assistance?

CYLKE: There is a tape of interviews that I did with John Lewis. There is a tape of a two hour interview with John Lewis as director, which was a fabulous conversation, which Peter Thormann and I did as an interview- John Peter set up an interview series for us, with people who had been prominently involved with AID development. The other one was John Cole Cool, which is another fabulous tape about how the AID mission worked in those days. John told me that the actual shipments were authorized by the President of the United States. This was big time stuff in those days. When you asked for the comparison with Egypt, I think that, in fact, it was life and death. So, we had enormous leverage at that time. Much of the political reaction to outsiders hadn't gone up to the same height and pitch that it did in later years as well. But the resources were enormous. I mean, we're talking about significant resources. So, I thought that was important.

Anyway, to go back to the program men, if you didn't have the resources to put on the table- I didn't think we had any particular insight on poverty. We had some interesting insights on irrigation this and irrigation that. But my sense was that, and maybe this was just puffing myself up, India's not just another country. India's a billion people. India's a development phenomenon in a certain sense. They certainly have relevance beyond their own borders. I think part of the problem between the United States and India was that we were the leader of the capitalist world and they were the leader of the developing world. Therefore, we ended up taking postures with each other that weren't rooted in our bilateral relationship but really affected our multilateral relationship. I heard from many people in the State Department that some of the antipathy toward India that's famous within the State Department and famous within the Foreign Ministry of India, the Indian policy coterie in the Foreign Policy Ministry was largely communist or at least anti-U.S.

"Communist" is the wrong word, but pro-Russian. Most of the people I knew, I really didn't like India (inaudible) came out of the (inaudible), came out of the United Nations forums, where there was tremendous tension on each side representing these different interests. Most people who hadn't served in India came away with a very different flavor for India.

Q: The leadership was non-aligned?

CYLKE: Yes, movement and all of the kind of business led to lack of understanding. At that time, Peter McPherson told me that he wanted me to be interested in science and technology. That was echoed to me by the Ambassador when I climbed off the airplane. He wanted me to be interested in science and technology. Now, I don't know that I ever fully understood either of their interests. I'm going to tell you how my interest evolved and why I think it's important when I come to it. The Ambassador's interest, I think, came from the sense that India has a significant science and technology community. In India, that science and technology community is equated with independence. In other words, coming to be an independent country, that India really prided itself on, was one, coming to independence, keeping a secular state, and three, being a scientific state. It's an important part of the finding consciousness of the nation, like we have in our society a sense of the role of the individual. And they were very important politically. And, of course, India has a bomb. So, you put all those things together and we had enormous interest in the Indian science and technology community. Most of the PL480 local currency resources which were left in India were devoted to science and technology projects between the United States and India. They weren't managed by AID, by the way. We had a science and technology office with three American officers in it when I was there. So, I said to the mission, "We're going to do this." The mission said, "Yes, but we're looking to you to defend these interests on science and technology. We want you to defend us and make a case for why we should stay in irrigation and forestry. That's your job as the AID director. You represent us. We expect you to go off and fly your sword with Peter McPherson and the Ambassador. Priscilla stood up to them after all and we're looking to you to do that." So, that's an interesting challenge for a mission director, I think. It tests your leadership skills.

Q: You were being asked to get out of those sectors?

CYLKE: I was being told to put more and more attention toward science and technology. McPherson made it absolutely clear that that's where he wanted us to move. Now, on the Ambassador's side, I think there was this political ambition. You may know better than I. I can't recall now what was driving Peter. But that was his image of what he wanted to have happen in India. When I first got there, in the first year, the pressure wasn't that strong and I had always gone wanting to do this poverty business. I must have spent two months of my first year there in Bihar, which is medieval. I was going to make Bihar my equivalent of the Helmand Valley kind of conversation we had (inaudible) Afghanistan. The poorest of the poor kind of thing. But then I began to wonder, "What are we doing? What are we achieving?"

So, the science thing came to me in a funny kind of way. We had a large agricultural research portfolio. As far as you could see, the research was pretty crummy. It was a remnant of the old ag university program. What stuck me was, I got interested in biotechnology. The reason I got interested was not so much the fact that biotechnology, I thought, was a whiz-bang thing, but for three reasons.

The people wondering about our technology were interdisciplinary in their approach. They were willing to talk to other disciplines, which the ag folks weren't willing to do. Two, they were global in their perspective. They all understood that biotechnology was a global science and it really got me tuned into the fact that there were global systems and how they really worked. It was important for India to become part of the global network, not just an autarkic thing. It wasn't enough to just build their capacity internally. Three, the biotech people (inaudible) clearly with on the user of the technology, on the private sector. We were going to use this stuff. But clearly, the Indian research community wasn't focused on it. It was a straight science exercise. So, I began to wonder, I think myself, for my own thinking, about the role that a technology orientation might play in trying to promote simply the idea of modernization in India. I think I really kind of decided that, if we had an agenda in India, it was really connecting them somehow to (inaudible) called "waves" or development waves or to technology systems or to something external to India that could begin- We weren't going to be able to finance change in India. This wasn't Egypt. We weren't going to make the policy change. My sense was, if you could somehow move India into- I began to become interested in global systems. At that time in the United States, there was a lot of work going on at the state level with science and technology, of cooperation between business, universities, NSF research institutions. It was a tremendous effort state by state to build this kind of technology capability where (inaudible) kind of phenomenon in Boston or the Silicon Valley kind of phenomenon. It was a very big movement in the United States, very richly financed. We ran seminars in a number of different states. India had a science citadel.

Q: The rationale for this may relate back to your earlier observation about the fact that the older generation, the university people who had had a link with the U.S. were now bowing out...

CYLKE: And losing that kind of connection. There was not a dynamic connection. It was becoming apathetic.

Q: The scientific research work was becoming significant I remember hearing about India-

CYLKE: They were leaders.

Q: They were getting 20 years behind and the government was to try to bring them into the modern development?

CYLKE: Absolutely. If you don't mind, I'm going to take a step ahead to post-AID, to something that really typifies what I'm trying to say. After I left AID and I was working for the Association of Big Eight Universities, I was invited out by the Thai mission, which was working as a partnership idea, to help create a petroleum college in Thailand. I took this vice chancellor of the university all over the U.S. because they wanted to do a project of some kind with him. I found that the Thais put up a 10 story building and put $10 million worth of equipment into it. They wanted a U.S. partner for this university. They said they were not going to pay fees, they were not going to pay overheads. They would pay the faculty salary. They wanted half their faculty to be Americans and they wanted the seal of the American university on their diploma. That's what they wanted. So, this was tough. To even get an American university to talk to us was tough. As it turns out, we got the University of Oklahoma. I want to talk about this for a second. I was down at the University of Oklahoma one day. We were going around and around and the president of the university said to me, "What these guys want me to do is invest in Thailand." I said, "I had never articulated it that way, but, yes, I guess that's what they want." Our whole conversation before that over three or four months had been about contracts and grants. The American university mentality was really organized around contracting. "There weren't any contracts and grants so why am I talking to you?" Two weeks later, he called me and said, "Come on back down. We're in." I said, "Well, why are you in?" He said, "Well, there ain't much of a petroleum industry here. There's going to be a big petroleum industry in Thailand. To the extent we have an obligation to train engineers. They are increasingly there. Our companies are there. Phillips is there. If we're going to stay alive, we'd better be there." Well, the interesting part of this conversation was, I had a meeting with Ronald Roskens, who was the big AID president from Nebraska, with the president of Kansas State, and (Thai word) University. We went in and Roskens said what you would have expected. And Ralph Smuckler was there, who had been very involved with this kind of work and was a good friend of mine. I got to know Ralph in India. Actually, I had him come out and do some evaluation. He had done a lot of work even subsequently with the ADP. They said almost what you would expect them to say. They said, "Mr. Chancellor, our job is to build your capacity, not to stay there. It's to build your institutional capacity and to go away," which was in fact a very legitimate AID objective over the years. It was something I think you and I fought for. The chancellor looked down and he said, "Well, that's a great strategy to keep us permanently second class." We all leaned back in our chair and said, "What?" He said, "If I'm going to be a first-rate university and I'm not connected to the important industrial centers of the world, if I'm not part of Houston, if that isn't part of my daily work and daily thing, you're really telling me that I should stay a second class university. I'm interested in being a first-class university." Well, very interesting. So here's a university in Thailand which is saying, "To be first rate, we have to be a global university. We want American universities as part of our faculty, 50/50 are the faculty. We'll pay their salaries, but we think it's to their advantage, so we don't want them on a contract. We don't want to pay them to be here. We want a joint venture university." On their diplomas at this college today, you have "Case Western, University of Michigan and Oklahoma." They're the three partners. There is a big academic issue as to how they're teaching. They're teaching a course at a time, six weeks a course. So, a faculty member doesn't give up a year or two to go out. He goes out for six weeks, teaches his course, and goes home and then directs research from (inaudible). But they thought what would happen was, the teacher would come once or twice, be interested in Thailand, and go away. The problem is that teachers who have taken the thing now won't give up their slots to other faculty members to participate. They say they are getting more publications out of their students there than are in the States, as a matter of fact. It's a recruiting source for home.

Right next to it, there's another business school, which is Northwestern Business School. So, when you stand on the front steps of the Regent Hotel in Thailand and look across the golf course, there's two towers that appear. One is Northwestern University and the other is the University of Oklahoma, Case Western and joint venture. Permanently established on an entirely different premise, created by the globalization of the world economy. We couldn't have done it 20 years ago. But it seems to me, those are development and political investments of an inestimable value.

That kind of issue is what got me interested also in development cooperation. I want to come back to India. Themes I got interested in were technology. I think a lot of us in the development community failed to recognize or don't want to recognize or haven't hit our consciousness right, that in most of the developing countries today, the largest productive sector is the industrial sector, even in many African countries. It's amazing to me. And for a long time - the Asian countries for 20 years have been industrial-led economies. And yet for one reason or another, I don't think the development communities put a sufficient investment into understanding that process, partly because it's private sector, partly ideological. There were all kinds of reasons. But we haven't made the same investment in understanding that development phenomenon that we made in the rural sector and in the agricultural sector. We're just not as sophisticated about it. We don't get it. We feel awkward about it. So, I was interested in- And technology is key to that. So, I began to integrate this interest in technology in a larger development paradigm of industrial-led economies. What do we know about it and what makes it tick?

Second, globalization. There are world technology systems that operate outside. I started this in India, but I'm seeing it clearer now. An awful lot of what's happening in the world economy is not being run by nation-states, not even being run by international organizations, but being run by industry protocol, university relationships, etc., etc.

Third, my own sense in India that, increasingly, development assistance was not the appropriate tool. We didn't have the resources to do it. But we weren't taking sufficient account ourselves of the institutions that we ourselves had built in these countries. We'd made a tremendous investment, but we never woke up to say that, having educated all these people and having built all these institutions, India in fact was a different place than it was the day before yesterday. Those institutions could be put into play with other institutions, particularly in the globalizing kind of environment, which led me to this whole notion of development cooperation rather than development assistance.

The argument that graduation is a misguided kind of notion, that development is as important in the United States and Taiwan today as it was before. They don't need development assistance. Part of their development problem is that they are wasting too much money. There is overinvestment, which is creating environmental problems. But the perspective that we in the development discipline can bring to bear on the problem, which is not necessarily sectoral-specific, it's multi-sectoral, was a broader appreciation of how these different things play into democracy, into pricing policy, into income distribution, into these issues, which lots of technical ministries don't take into account. You have the ability to really begin to think about a context within which development goes forward. Development cooperation doesn't mean just stepping back, but it means you can still engage in a conscious and purposeful development promotion effort, but you don't have to have as much money. You can do it by trying to make connections, insights, exchanges, workshops or whatever it might be. I think India really set that stage for what is now my work, which was the concern for industrial-led growth and the role of technology, the power of globalization and global systems and the fact that the economic paradigm really extends outside the borders of any country. You have to think much more consciously about that.

Thirdly, a different way of doing business was required in India. They were still a development assistance candidate. We didn't have the resources to play that role. But they had the maturity of institutions that you really couldn't treat in an assistance relationship. Anyway, there is something about an assistance relationship which isn't right for a mature country, in a certain sense.

Having said that, and I will shut up, that leaves out, to a certain extent, 600 million people in India. That seers at me constantly, but I think I rationalized it myself as an AID director in recognizing that we were not the most important thing in India. So, what we thought about it- What India really needed at a certain point was some leadership, some new ideas, some kind of way of getting new ideas into the system. The kinds of programs in which we engaged ourselves, like with biotechnology, offered the promise of a wave of fresh air, a different way of thinking about problems, into that system. I couldn't see that we had much to offer on the poverty side, except standing witness to it, which can often be important in and of itself. But the Indian system, in a certain sense, it's such an important part of the polity of the country, having an American stand witness to the poverty situation I didn't think was adding- That's a pretty shorthand philosophy,

Q: Let's go back to what we specifically tried to do in the science and technology area.

CYLKE: I don't think I did as much as I'm doing now. I was just coming to learn it. My basic interest we started out with was - and we got a lot of political play on this - to promote a program for private sector R&D. The thought there was, "How could you make technology relevant to development?" So, you wanted to move away from the science community and closer to what I'd call the technology community, the R&D community, and commercial R&D. My thought there again was, one, international. How do you connect this extraordinary capability to international current so that they could get the new technology ideas flowing into the country to the private sector? Not just for private sector because private sector is the marketplace so that your technology agenda gets shaped in response to what the society really needs. We called this first program, which financed collaborative R&D, "PACT," the Program for the Acceleration of Commercial Technologies. I remember being quite proud that, in the times of India that they authorized the project, the (inaudible) was "PACT is a fact." I don't think AID had had a lead editorial in the Times of India in 15 years. What it captured was that Indian leadership was just focused on this issue: how do we become a modern country? As the program shrunk down toward $50 million, $50 million worth of irrigation investment was a drop in the bucket. I think the Indians perceived that - and they had no problem in allocating resources to this question - that, if they could get themselves connected to the $25 billion a year U.S. R&D machine, that that was value. So, spending $3 or 4 million on a commercial R&D program that brought them closer into that network which gave them access to that, their goal was- They knew they weren't going to get another $100 million in budgetary resources out of me. I think they saw the leverage inherent to getting themselves to become part of the global technology machine. So, as far as the Indian government went, this was a very popular program. I think they thought they were getting high leverage out of it.

Q: Can you explain the program a little more?

CYLKE: Then we went on from that. That program financed- I have to say, the individual activities that were financed were almost trivial. There was an alternator. There was an AIDS testing kit, which got commercialized and out into the marketplace. These were joint ventures.

The individual projects were kind of interesting, but the real thing was trying to get the Indian science community to become cognizant that it had to become much more closely related to the marketplace. So, my policy goal, if you will, was internationalizing it and getting them closer to demand sources. But, of course, in doing that, you had to fund something. So, there were a whole raft of R&D kinds of activities.

We were catching a wave in India. I'll tell you a story about that. The chairman of ICICI, which is the second largest development bank in India, who was Minister, who is now in charge of all the export strategy for India - quite a gentleman - became seized with this idea. I'll tell two stories on this because little stories are nice.

Seized with this idea. Jim Norris, who was one of the paragons of AID, and I have enormous regard for Jim, just thought this was bunk. So, I came out to India and I took him on a tour. At the end of it, he said, "You know, really, this couldn't- This is interesting, what you're doing, but it doesn't work anyplace else." That may even be true because there are very few places with that rich of an S&T community. We went in to see Rogue in his office. The president of this bank looked Jim in the eye and said, "There were three great moments in history. Christ, Buddha, and the opening of the technology era." I remember, Jim just said, "Get me out of here." I want to say just for the record, Haven, though this record may become obscure in a library somewhere, that Tom Nicastro, who was the head of our technology office in India, who is now the office director for a lot of different things in the Soviet Union, was the AID director in Chile, where he ran the technology program, was interested in globalization and development cooperation, was the office director for this area and was one of the brightest, best managers, best people motivators that I've ever worked with.

The other thing was that the Ministry of Finance- This was tricky business, too. Because in all of our other programs, we had a counterpart. We had the Ministry of Industry or we had something else. Here, we really didn't have a counterpart. The money was in the bank and Tom Nicastro traveled India-wide. We picked a city. We put a lot of money into Bangalore, which is now India's science city. I don't want to say we sparked it, but there are people in Bangalore who will say we sparked it. We got R&D funds put down there. We got state Ministry of Industry and Science and Technology to work together on collaborative programs. Tom Nicastro visited 10 cities in India before he picked Bangalore. This was before anyone was talking Bangalore. We created R&D funds, industrial extension programs to get technologies out to small enterprise, etc.

But let me tell one other story of Rogers Beasley, who brought problems to my desk. He was a missionary and he met a guy in India who was making vaccines for horses. He was a big horse racer. If you met him, he'd be the last person on earth you'd think an AID director would encounter. He (inaudible) horses in his backyard and everything. He made the vaccines because there was no quality vaccine for his horses. Rogers convinced this guy that his destiny was to make human vaccine. There were no private vaccine facilities in India. Rogers told me that anyone who got injected by an Indian-made vaccine at that time was taking their life in their hands, out of the public vaccine system. So Rogers delivered this guy to me and told me I should solve his problem and turn him into a private vaccine manufacturer and then vanished and went on to another project. So, this was a project that I had to develop for this guy, who developed more projects in India but we all did his work for him. Fantastic experience because he came to me and one of the questions was, he couldn't get certified. So, how do you get certified? So I told him, "One thing you do is you start wearing a tweed jacket rather than a white suit. Get that stuff (inaudible) out of your office and get some books in there and look like you're a laboratory rather than a racehorse entrepreneur." Damned if he didn't put books in his office and damned if he didn't get certified! Incredible. There are now three or four private vaccine things, but he carved the way. He was making polio vaccine, smallpox, the regular range of vaccines. That's another thing that we did. I thought it was the break of that statist, government-sponsored, inward-looking kind of thing.

Q: Was the U.S. involved in that?

CYLKE: We funded- We gave him $500,000.

Q: Was it connected with the U.S. vaccine?

CYLKE: Well, this was a tricky bit of business, now that you remind me. I forget the name of the drug company who had the polio formula, but they wanted $3 million for it. I think he got it, in typical Indian fashion, through the back door, through a Romanian. I don't think he was prepared to pay. India's going to have to come into that market. Part of their problem in being commercial, of course, is people are afraid to do business with India because they're afraid of trademark piracy, etc., which is- If you are going to enter into a global economy, there are all kinds of global rules which are going to come to bear as well. But, in that case, no. We found that we couldn't fund it because there was no rationale for the pricing. My lawyers and people couldn't verify a price that was fair. The drug company was going to get what it could get. We couldn't establish what a reasonable price was.

Q: You weren't involved in any technical aspects?

CYLKE: We tried. Our guidance was largely internal financing, working with the Minister of Economy, getting money for him, getting him his approvals. I, with Rogers, did all the interaction with the Department of Biotechnology, which had to give him his certifications. It was what I'd call good, old-fashioned AID networking. It wasn't finance. It was AID auspices which were so important in that kind of activity.

We had some technological. As I say, we had some people out from CDC and other kinds of people. He was making animal vaccines. He got his technical advice here and there. What he really needed was guidance and encouragement on moving down the road. I'd say we gave him more financial advice and AID connections and plead his case in front of the powers to be in India more than anything else. We did a lot of vaccine programs. We did a lot of health research work, mostly vaccine. A vaccination program with the Embassy.

That then gets you into the whole issue of, if you're cooperating with the Embassy, you're probably doing something wrong. I think most people in AID feel that, if you collaborated with the Department of Commerce or you collaborated with somebody, there was something wrong. On my side, there was perhaps financing some things with the Embassy, with the science department, that maybe I was doing because there was pressure. Not just (inaudible) which I rationalized. I think that AID, and I see it today, there's a reluctance in the Asia bureau today to deal with APEC. When you ask, "Why," they say, "Because they'll pick our pocket." It seems to me we're in business to spend development resources. APEC opens doors. The Asian-Pacific Economic Cooperation Forum. I'm working on environmental issues. They have a clean production initiative. I was at a meeting the other day. We've given them our agenda, but AID doesn't want to identify too closely with it because AID, I think, historically does not like ideas brought to it; it likes to fund its own ideas. I think we're very (inaudible). I think the institution still is, to its detriment.

Q: Was there a health program with which we were in any way connected?

CYLKE: Absolutely. We had a health program that was like our irrigation program. It was financing individual health clinics around the country. Again, it was straight budget support for health clinics. I've seen to many health clinics being built next to other health clinics. Frankly, there weren't irrigation or forestry or health projects; there were rural works projects. There were anti-poverty programs. We were providing budget support. A guy by the name of- A former AID officer who worked for the Berger Company, who worked on the Southern Africa report with me. He was the head of the Mekong Delta Commission at one point. His name will come back to me. I've worked with him on several sector loans over the years. I met him in that context. We turned our health program into a sector program. A health sector program where the objective was organized around, as I say, vaccine criteria: how much money they put into vaccine immunization, lowering the age limits of the children that they'd get the vaccines to. We turned our program into a sector program, which I thought was easier than pricing issues. But there were performance criteria that the states would move to- Only when they met the criteria, our money would then flow into the budget support for the program, but only at that point. I think it was one of the first health sector programs and, yes, it was absolutely related in that way.

Q: Was it effective?

CYLKE: I think so. I think it's been evaluated and considered quite effective. The problem with AID, of course, is you never know because we're all starting programs and evaluating somebody else's dream.

Q: But was it implemented enough during your time?

CYLKE: The impact was that we got the age at which the vaccination program in the country targeted at the right ages and the right vaccines. I think we did that. However, having said that, I'd have to be honest, we also had a population program. That's worth mentioning. We got nowhere in four years. I wore out my pants sitting outside secretary's offices, trying to talk about population issues, to zero avail in India. If you wanted to buy contraceptives, budget support again, you could. But if there was a policy issue that was not on the table, it was population, period. We did some programs, but Mike Jordan, who is now retired, was an eminent AID population officer and in that era was considered one of the top two or three population officers. I think Mike just broke his back. Mike left India without much taking place. But we provided budget support to some family planning programs. But Mike was trying to get the private sector distribution of contraceptives. He had lots of innovative kinds but they were not on the table.

Q: This was a cultural resistance?

CYLKE: Political, government. Not cultural. This was political. They really didn't want the United States Government fooling around in this area.

Q: The government was active in this area of family planning?

CYLKE: Of India. That's probably the only- The family planning program was the government's (inaudible).

Q: But the government was supporting that?

CYLKE: Yes, they supported the program and they'd take budget support. They just didn't want you talking about or being seen near- They considered it politically volatile enough that they didn't want any foreigners near that program. It comes out of the attitude about the North preaching to them about population issues and their natural resistance to it came out of the forces sterilization thing that Mrs. Gandhi's son being engaged in that issue. It was considered to be much too sensitive an issue for donor countries to be telling them what to do. It was a very popular political issue, too, within the country, foreigners telling them about their- To be honest, I had no success- I gave up. I wouldn't go with Mike to any more meetings.

Q: But you did provide budget support?

CYLKE: We provided budget support, but I can't say it was important. It was budget support. After I left, in this last administration- The other problem in India, its strength and its distrength was, you had this elaborate political structure, administrative structure. The merit of it was, you had the Indian Administrator of Service, which was a small, elite service like our Foreign Service, where everyone turned over their jobs every three or four years. Everyone knew each other. Things could happen. You'd pick up the telephone. Everybody knew everyone. But you met some of the most stubborn officers that you've ever met in your entire life. So, Walter, I think, ran into this. The Agency's gone into this big program kind of notion for population, so they went to UP, which would be the seventh largest country in the world, Upper Pradesh, if it were. They had a break. They had an administrative officer to let them in. Got transferred. I know they're not expending any money. It just shut down again. So, part of it is the luck of the draw and who your officer is. There's a lot of autonomy in that Indian system. But, frankly, family planning is one very, very, very tough issue. Of course, you have 10 states that are larger than any country in Europe. So, they are different. Upper Pradesh is not a simple place and it's a much more backward place than lots of other states. India has this interesting situation where the southern states are probably more progressive than the northern states. But the politics are in the north.

Q: You made a passing reference about AIDS, which was-

CYLKE: We did an AIDS testing kit, but- Don't ask me why not, but it was not a conscious part of the program. We weren't pushed to do it. I don't know that AID was in AIDS work as such in '87.

Q: That's interesting that you would have that. Was that picked up by anybody?

CYLKE: It was also in Thailand.

Q: But I mean in India.

CYLKE: Well, you know how active this program is, as a matter of fact, my wife told me just yesterday that PAT, the organization out in Seattle to help (inaudible), they now have a permanent office in Delhi, basically organized around commercializing technologies. They're also very active in Thailand around the same thing, not just providing technical assistance, but actually commercializing commercial technologies like AIDS diagnostics and things of that nature.

Q: But you don't know what happened to your intervention at that point?

CYLKE: No. (Inaudible) my wife's firm, which was John Snow, was commissioned to do an evaluation of the AIDSCAP program a number of years ago. I was reading the findings and what struck me was the amount of control an AID director has on a global issue. I read that evaluation. You had a director in a country with a very high AIDS problem in Africa, in Uganda, that didn't want to deal with AIDS. You had an enormous AIDS program in another country in Africa, Cameroon, which had maybe the smallest incidence of AIDS on the continent, with a very large AIDS program, essentially directed by the predilection of the AID director. You've always had this tension within the Agency. I happen to know these people. I think they had a very good reason for what they were doing. But it casts into play this tension between what you were asking me earlier, the role of the Washington bureaucracy. Well, if the Agency thinks AIDS is important, there's a certain legitimacy to me to think that the Agency ought to say to their director, "Dammit, you're going to do it." On the other hand, you can say, why should you follow the foolish (inaudible) of some kind of Washington thing when you're on the ground and see it? So, I don't know if there's any right answer to that question. You just hope you're dealing with informed people who are not dealing with either their personalities or turf and seriously trying to address the issues. I was reading and it just jumped out at me as an example of the power of the AID director to (inaudible) the program.

Q: Let's return back to India and your own situation. How did you see your own relationships in your situation?

CYLKE: I thought, by and large, I was blessed. The deputy assistant administrator - deputies were always the good guys in the end - was Rocky Staples. Rocky was an unusual person, who had an unusual place in his heart for India and I think had a strange tolerance for me. I think he was intrigued, when I first went there, with my interest in Bihar and the poverty thing. He was interested in the move toward technology thing. He was just enormously supportive. I think his feeling was that, if the director had passion for his country, was doing his homework and was connected, that was worth investing in. Whether it was the most important problem or not the most important problem, it was probably the highest return because you were going to get the most energy out of him on that.

My clear perception as director was - and it's a different perception than you had as deputies - that the only clear guidance from Washington was "no waves." If everything goes along and it's kind of quiet, you can pretty much do whatever you like to do, excepting the fact that you take guidance from somewhere. I want to mention that, too. I felt very independent.

Q: At the same time, you had an administrator who was pushing service and technology?

CYLKE: That's right. I convinced myself that that was an important place to be. So, I didn't feel pressed. Some of my staff would say it's just because I caved in. Who knows? But I did attend a mission director's conference when I was in India, which is apropos of this. One of these TRG- This consulting firm that does this management stuff for AID. It was a mission director's conference and they asked us who our boss was. It split four ways. Twenty-five percent of the officers raised their hand and said they thought their boss was the assistant administrator of their regional bureau. Twenty-five percent said they thought their boss was the Ambassador. Twenty-five percent said they thought their boss was the administrator of the Agency. And twenty-five percent said they were all factors to be taken into account. Part of that was regional. I wouldn't want to say that, but I think part of that reflected history of bureaus. The Asia directors felt very independent. I think the big mission tradition - Nigeria probably had that tradition, too - but the big mission tradition was very, very different. Your Latin America directors were much more sensitive to the Ambassadors, I think, than other kinds of people. So there was an element of that. But I think it was interesting, there was almost an even kind of split. I felt very strongly that the AID director's job was truly a unique job. You had this unique opportunity to represent not just your agency, but in a certain sense you were representing the American university system, you were representing the American technology system. We had a magnificent platform of stuff that you could represent.

And you were a representative. You were - and I'll go back to that Frank Pinder comment - I was surprised at my own ability to step out of the mission and be an outside actor because I had never really done that before. But I remember other directors. I think I mentioned earlier, Roger Ernst in Egypt, who used to pass out the card of who you had to see every week. He used to give every officer five names of who they were to talk to during the week to report back on. He was outside. I considered my job every bit as much administering the AID program, but it was so well run that there wasn't much to administer. I mean, you didn't need a deputy. We had very competent local staff, extremely competent, too competent. They were almost more in charge and therefore very rigid in changing. But the mission was pretty responsible.

Q: Were you an independent agent?

CYLKE: I was an independent agent. I don't know what I would have given it before. I thought it was comfortable, but I had to be responsive to Peter. I certainly had to be responsive to my Ambassador. My assistant administrator was not insignificant. I mean, one controlled my career, one controlled my daily health. If you're not in tune with the Ambassador, you're going to be ill.

So, I think it was a mix of all those things. But I think it's important because, with that kind of a mandate, you really are outside-moving. I have to say that I don't think the Agency ever asks a director what AID India was or the power or the authority or the representational value of that. I would say an awful lot of my influence was stuff that had nothing to do with projects, but I was judged, in terms of obligations, in terms of numbers, and in terms of projects, but in fact, that had very little to do with my daily life. I reviewed projects. If anybody knows me, I had my input into projects. But it's not how I was defining my influence in the country. They were part of it. But an awful important part of it was making connections, looking for the waves, looking for the opportunities, trying to move ideas out there. I think most successful AID directors were there. There was nothing in your EER really that had much to do with that and not much reward for that, I don't think, in the EER system, as a matter of fact.

Q: But you represented the development interest?

CYLKE: Absolutely. I definitely perceived myself every bit as much a member of the country team in that context, representing the development thing, as- I don't know how others felt about it. I felt that being part of the country team was important. I enjoyed it. It was a separate job from my job of administering the AID program. I think that was important.

The question of how do you move a mission to a different way of thinking about a problem? There are certainly directors who are more skilled at that than I because of my own kind of tendency to dominate a conversation or whatever. There are other directors that I've worked with - George Carner, I think, is the quintessential kind of leadership by consensus and engagement kind of person, which was a different kind of personality than myself. Tom Nicastro in my mission. That kind of a person. My sense was that you weren't going to push this mission around by saying, "This is the sector you're going to be in." It wasn't going to move that way.

It happened that it was my wife, but, in both Egypt and in India, we ran a development library center. It was really important to me for a number of reasons. I want to mention it. It was sponsored by CDIE, so it's a blurb for CDIE in that sense. I put a lot of stock in it. One, I asked the librarian to do three things for me. One was, I wanted to run a seminar series. I wanted somebody to bring ideas into this mission on a regular basis that weren't filtered to me through some client that we had for a project. So, every Wednesday afternoon, we had someone in the mission talking about something. I first heard of AIDS, if you want to know the truth, in the AID mission from a guy from the State of Massachusetts, who Tom Nicastro ran down somewhere, who was in India on some subject and came in and gave a two hour talk about what was really going on in the United States on this issue. We had Indians in. We had others in. Over time, when I knew where I wanted the mission to go, there were more of those conferences on topics that I was interested in than others. That's one way to let a mission know what a director is interested in.

Secondly, the collection. We built collection around the ideas. We had a first-class collection on what was going on in the United States in terms of state university business cooperation and technology. I think we had everything that was published in every state in the United States. It allowed our officers to move his agenda because he had something to work with and we used that aggressively.

Third, we had a publication series. I wanted the mission to be identified with important ideas. I was trying to put us across as a serious development institution, not just an aid institution. So we did that. I think it took the program office some time to figure out what was happening - that, in fact, the agenda of the mission was being set down in a library every Wednesday afternoon by who was coming through the door, not by their sending memos out and around the office. But I think it had a tremendous impact on the mission. It became a place where lots of people in the mission interacted with each other. That library is still going in the India mission. It's smaller. It still plays that role in that mission.

In Egypt, in fact, it played the role where it was like the development community club. You would always find people from the Ford Foundation or the World Bank when they came out because it was a place to go. There were had tables. We had the books, we had the materials. But it was also where they could run into people and talk. It was a place where you always knew you could meet somebody who was going to be talking about it. In Egypt, it was less Egyptianized at bringing Egyptians into the mission than in India, where we really made it into that. It was that notion, that if you're going to be a development partner and not just an assistance, and your influence is going to come through your ideas, then you had to not only have a place where ideas could get collected, but you had to present yourself as that kind of institution. We built quite a nice physical facility. It gives a signal that that's what you are, as opposed to something else. Actually, Mary Thormann, and Peter Thormann, who was in the Africa bureau did a nice job for us. We wanted to put out a brochure on the mission and our programs and she suggested that we put it out in the format of a college catalogue. I thought that was very effective. There were other mission directors, like in Egypt, who wanted to put it out in the form of a business annual report. That's the image they wanted to get across. We put ours out with our projects described as if they were courses in a college catalogue. It reeked of that kind of an atmosphere. I think that's the only legitimacy that the AID mission in India has, is the quality of its ideas. That's our currency today.

Q: How did you find working with the Indian people, the bureaucracy and so on?

CYLKE: My son told me - and he was only 10 or 11 in those days - but I can remember the first few days, when I would come home every night - and it went on for four years - Chris would say, "Oh, here he comes. It's the best day of his life again." Partly the job. I think the AID director's job is one of the best public service jobs that the United States Government has to offer. That's not saying that I wouldn't have enjoyed being an Ambassador either. But I think that, in foreign affairs work, I can't think of another job- Don Gardner told me once that what he liked about it (he was my first boss in AID) was that it was a nice mix of academic, because you were at the state of the art of all kinds of important ideas about economics, about politics, about science, management. You had interesting management tasks and assignments. You had larger operations to run, budgets to operate. But the interesting thing that distinguished it from university, which had both of those aspects to a certain extent, was that you could actually put your money behind some ideas and actually test things out and get them done. For a person of an academic mindset but not a research scholar, it was the best- It's an applied job. And then the AID director's position gives you a unique platform, partly because of our history in these countries and partly because you do represent the United States Government.

Q: The Agency gave you the latitude for innovation?

CYLKE: Yes, but I had never traveled in any country- In fact, I travel a tremendous amount now with this United States-Asian Environmental Partnership, in Taiwan, Korea, the Philippines. I think it's also our attitude. I still marvel at the willingness of people to allow a stranger to walk into their office and engage them in an hour and a half conversation about something that may not even be terribly practical, about "What do you think is really happening in this country in terms of environmental protect" and the time that they'll give you. I think that AID officers are largely very skilled at- You don't pull that off easily. You have to have something interesting to say to engage someone. I think, as development people and the ability to share ideas and move them around, I still enjoy this job with no money to hand out. My wife has been known to say, "Owen, you treated AID like it was your own New Yorker magazine. You're living the experience rather than reading it." That's certainly one of the joys I think we all got out of it. But you're also moving ideas around and putting people together. That's what I think the aid business it.

Our formal counterpart was the Ministry of Finance. They were Jesuits in a certain sense. Their job was to capture donor money for the budget. There was no doubt about what they considered their job to be. They'd put up with almost any conversation you wanted to have, but they had their eye on the ball. They wanted money captured for the AID budget and they were skilled at it. I had a problem with them which is instructive, in that, when I got there- A lot of our federal government agencies under fund their international programs and they come to AID to fund them. We were trying to fund a lot of United States Government participation in different science activities in India with the AID budget. The Indians said there was just no way they were going to play that. McPherson was behind this. He was supportive. AID was supportive of this. The Indians said, "No dice. These were supposed to be 50/50 mutual things. This isn't our AID program. This is our science collaboration. We're putting up our 50 percent. You guys go to Paris and pledge $100 million to India. Then you come back and want to fund your share of a mutual program out of what you pledged. You're double counting and playing games." Lots of governments aren't sophisticated enough to make that argument. I have to tell you, Washington just told me never to repeat that argument again when I told them. They didn't want to hear it from the Indians. We do want to play both sides.

So the Indians played tough with me in the Ministry of Finance in terms of their accounting things. My work with the private sector they would let me do as long as I could find an accountable entity in the Indian government budget. That's where I would do an awful lot of work with this one development bank. They were in the Indian government budget. As long as it was in the budget, the Indians had no problem. You could do anything you wanted to. So then I could go out and work with the private sector and what I had was essentially a development- On the technology stuff, we had a small loan fund that was run down there. That was fine. If I had tried to actually take it out to the private sector, I would have been in a lot of trouble.

What we did in India was, also, they didn't make any distinction between grants and loans. It made no difference to them whether it was a grant or a loan. At the end of the year, very often there was some extra money around. We used to trade with PPC for loan money, for grant money. We'd stick grant-loan money into the Indian budget. Then we had what we called the "mechanism," which was directly obligated grant funds outside that never showed in the ODA.

Q: Explain that.

CYLKE: If I had an ODA of $25 million, the Indians knew it. If, at the end of the fiscal year, I could find some mission that couldn't obligate $5 million in loan funds - and, generally, there were no grant funds around at the end of the fiscal year, but there were all these loan funds floating around. If I could get my hands on the $5 million grant, I would always take it, add it up to my ODA and then the $5 million that I would have already- I had my $25 million, my grant money then I directly obligated to American institutions in the United States. Never showed it in the ODA and the Indians never knew I really had it. That's where we had all of our flexibility. The controller, whose name was Hickman or something like that, he told me that Rumpelstiltskin could turn straw to gold. I remember, he came and told me this one day. He called it the "mechanism." He said, "Look, there's missions trying to give away loan money. Just take it. The Indians don't make a distinction between the grant money. We already have our grant money. It's not obligated. Then we'll just directly obligate it outside of the ODA." That's where we got our flexibility. Otherwise, the Indians watched the ODA like a hawk.

Having said that, however, there was no level that I think the United States Government could have ever achieved to have gotten the political leverage that we wanted. There was no price that you could conceivably pay for that. The Ambassador told me once, when our level was cut one year, that he'd send in a message to Washington that would say anything, except that a reductional level would hurt the political relationship, because that's just not true. In fact, he argued that it might improve the relationship because it would take away opportunities to wrangle with the Indian government over issues. I think he was right. But he was very supportive on the importance of the program, etc. But he wouldn't go so far as to say the level was sensitive to the relationship. So, the Ministry of Finance, they were pretty permissive with me, but there had to be an understanding about my understanding about how the budget was used.

I happen to like Indian administrative officers because this was the most sophisticated group of government officials you're going to find probably in the world, as stubborn as they could be. A conversation with them was always just- You know, you had to be sheriff when you wanted with an Indian government official if he was the Indian administrative service. He was probably a hell of a lot smarter than you were. But incredibly frustrating experience sometimes because they like to fence. You spent a lot of time dancing around issues, where people, I thought, were just enjoying fencing with me rather than coming down on the issues. I think that, basically, our relationships with government were less satisfactory than our relationships with industry associations, banks, almost anything other than the government bureaucracy. Not because it was just sluggish. If you hit the right officer, you had a good day. But if you hit the wrong officer-

Q: This was true in the States as well.

CYLKE: That's a good point. That's an interesting point, too. The Indian system, of course, is different than a lot of other governments because, as we said, the states were political entities. In lots of the countries I had served in, you had decentralized government in the sense that the administrative, executive powers were passed down. In India, it was different. So you had half the states of a different political party. Each state had its own parliament, had its own government, and half of them were of a different political party than the center. The Indian administrative service was interesting because there was no central service. Everyone was in a state service. The central service was staffed by people in deputation from the states. That was done consciously in India to break down the notion of a strong center running the country. That totally doesn't quite work that way because there's lots of people who finagle a way to make sure they stay in the center for their careers. But there was no such thing as a central service. They called it the "kodder" or some state kodder. State governments were small and, as a result, pretty easy to maneuver through. You had comparable quality at the leadership level because those guys were the same people that were at the center. But it was smaller. In fact, now that you ask me the question- I wasn't enamored of the irrigation and the forestry program, so I didn't spend as much time at that stop. But when I did go out and visit with those people, you worked your way through that much easier. But I was increasingly moving the program away from the set of government relationships into private industry association and private sector kind of relationship. So, my mind probably wasn't as much on- The Ministry of Health, I think anyone in Indian history will tell you, was impossible. The Ministry of Agriculture was behind the times. The Ministry of Irrigation was pretty good. The Ministry of Forestry was pretty good. They were straight technical ministries. They were relatively new, technically competent, I guess, with engineers and people who knew their business pretty well.

Q: The Ministry of Health was impossible?

CYLKE: Impossible.

Q: In what way?

CYLKE: The Health Ministry's everywhere. Their education system brings you to look at the cell, rather than its systems. So, I don't think that people are trained as managers. Public health is an understated issue, as we all know. It's very clinical and, as a result, I don't think people think in abstractions very easily. So, it's very hard to talk policy and programs, I think, with ministries of health. So, you could talk technically with somebody, but that didn't get anything done. So, I don't know that that was India's Ministry of Health. I think I feel that way about health generally.

Q: Was there another dimension in the Indian experience?

CYLKE: I think the India experience- I want to say that I worked for two Ambassadors who had a golden rule and that was that there would be no disagreement between offices on the country team, period. If there were professional differences, they wanted to hear those out, but here would be no tension. That was the only rule. If there was tension, you were going to be out of that country.

With both the Ambassadors, that was their starting rule. I've never worked in another country where the relationship within the country team was as positive as it was in India. It was explicit: there was no fooling around about it. Dean picked it up from his predecessor. I felt as comfortable with the Department of Commerce and with the science people as with anybody else.

In fact, our health program was developed with the science office and we offered to turn- We made a proposal once - a screwy one, but we made it anyway - to merge the ag attach 's office with the ag section. Washington couldn't cope with that. And there were other issues in other agencies - they don't want to give up their space, etc. You know it all. But intellectually and professionally, there was no- It was diametrically opposed, anything you try to get done in Washington interagency-wise. This is an impossible place to try to get anything done as far as I can see, interagency-wise. I have to give credit to both the Ambassadors. Both the Ambassadors shared what we were trying to do-

Q: Who were the Ambassadors?

CYLKE: Harry Barnes, who is now with the Carter Center and does peace stuff, and my DCM in India is the head of programs at the Carter Center, development programs. The other DCM in India was his predecessor in charge of development programs. It's an India mafia down there. Then John Gunther Dean came, who was kind of the cardinal of Ambassadors and had a reputation of being very prickly and whatever it was. Harry Barnes was a no necktie kind of character and John Gunther Dean was a tuxedo character, so they were different personalities. But both were absolutely supportive of the AID program, but in context. It wasn't the aid level that was important to them; it was the content of what we were doing. Neither one of them was very interested in the question of the level and perhaps, in bureaucratic terms, should have fought harder for the level over the years. So that was one character of the relationship. Secondly, I think, was the quality of the mission, both Americans and Indian staff.

I think there is an issue today- I think that the Agency thinks it's failing for some reason and thinks it isn't producing results and isn't having achievement, and it is. I think the Agency as a bureaucracy takes graduation and diminishing resources as a sign of failure when, in fact, the departure from Asia should be a sign for great jubilation. We ought to stand up and take credit for it. If I haven't mentioned to you, what I'm doing currently is, I'm working for the U.S.-Asian Environmental Partnership. I'm working for an Indian research organization, which I joined out of kind of a sense of psychic symmetry of working for a developing country, a development institution in the United States. But I was recently asked to look at a graduation project in Indonesia. I think I mentioned it, maybe, on another tape, where there was such pride on the thing- But I don't know that this whole results thing. Everything isn't driving AID down the medical road to looking at the smallest cell and there are some big ideas out there, which are still aborning and the one that we're working on in the AAP is, if you have an industrial-led development paradigm. Asia has done pretty well on the growth side, done pretty well on the poverty side, done pretty well on the income distribution side. But you're going to have continuing growth at 12 to 15 percent. There's going to be an environmental disaster. I think the statistic is, in 2010, 80 percent of the industrial stock of Indonesia is going to be stuff that isn't on the ground today. You probably have an opportunity to get in front of that industrial thing with a set of ideas which could really change the whole progress of industry. That's a big idea. The Agency seems to be saying, "No, we don't want to deal with that kind of a big idea. We're calling it the 'clean revolution' to relate it to the kind of transformation of the agricultural sector two generations ago. We want to know that you've actually improved the environment in some microclimate, in some geography," which it seems to me is not AID's job. That, it seems to me, is the government's job, to fix the environment in Village X. Our job is to set the development context within which the government spends its money. I think the Agency's moved around from those major abstractions. Do you hear the word "policy dialogue" in the Agency even anymore? Not much. I don't even think it's a word of currency. I think it's an old-fashioned word. So, I think that the Agency is missing something by not focusing on some of the big development imperatives and ideas that are shaping the world, and focusing too much on - and it's almost an infrastructure result - how many health clinics did we get built?

We're talking about graduation here for a moment. I think the United States Government has a continuing development interest in whatever you want to call them, fast-growing or modernizing countries that are no longer really assistance candidates. One of the notions is, how do you keep it going so that we have an environment? To me, an endowment is a substitute for aid. In other words, how do we create a pot of funds, which we can give away like we did before, but it won't be appropriated funds anymore; there will be an endowment of funds. (Inaudible) have the same kind of people doing the same kind of work with the same kind of mentality. I think development cooperation work is a different kind of work. It really is a partnering kind of job. It's a linkage kind of job. It's an information flow job. The dramatic returns formed by the globalization of the world economy. The notion of a successor to AID simply being AID with the pot of funds coming from an endowment- When you focus on the endowment, that's what it ends up. It still will be a bureaucratic kind of system with AID rules, giving out our money. Somehow, I don't think that's-

Q: It would be a resource for funding programs?

CYLKE: I don't see that as a good organizing principle. It seems to me that that is more an argument for how does an agency stay alive, or how does an agency keep going? That isn't the issue. The issue really is how does the United States Government continue to project or promote development outcomes in our changing environment? That's why I, frankly, and this is heresy, I'm not as frightened by the notion of the State Department becoming engaged in AID work. It frightens me because I don't think they're ready for it. But the notion of getting mainstream development concern into our diplomatic service is not a bad idea.

It's the sense that, as the Agency - this current Agency, given its major substantive thrust - if it was looking for a region of the world where there had been success, where there was still a development situation (inaudible) the language they define it with, the promise is success. It seems to me that South Asia is such a place, where it's a coherent group of countries and people from India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka and Nepal, where there is a great mass of poor people. All countries, democracies of one kind or another- They're the kind of development issues that the Agency articulates (inaudible due to static) success: women's groups, gender issues, population issues. You name the issue. There seems to be such discouragement about development. It seems to me that one of the mistakes that AID has made in a certain sense and that the development banks make is not looking at South Asia as (inaudible), just mashing it into the Near East and Asia bureaus - with South Asia with 1.5 billion people, sitting there - where what we mean by development was born, a lot of ideas were born, massive numbers of poor people. But almost all democracies are making significant progress. It just occurred to me that South Asia was a (inaudible).

I don't know that most of the world isn't progressing. There may be parts of Africa that are progressing which I'm not familiar with. But if you look at East Asia, while there are still development issues there, some modern issues and even some older kinds of issues, there are countries which have reached an economic state where development system doesn't look like it's going to be long for this world. Eastern Europe and Russia are different phenomenon than what we traditionally thought of in the developing world. They're no longer present in South America. They have Africa and Central America, the two places where AID (inaudible). We still have sizable programs, however, in South Asia. It's just that we never conceptualized them as a whole. Yet you look at microenterprise development work that's going on in India and Bangladesh or the population problem, which is really rooted in that part of the world. But they're all fledgling democracies. Each one of those countries has development as a central core of its national identity, development promotion. I really don't have much more to say about it. It seems to me that it's a part of the world that we never thought of as a part of the world development. It has the potential of a success story that's really important for the Agency.

Q: You're talking about development assistance. How do you characterize the difference?

CYLKE: Well, if you're talking about East Asia, for most of us, in AID context, we're talking about the two AID countries which were remaining, which were Indonesia and the Philippines. We're out of Thailand now. We have a program in Cambodia and we may do something in Vietnam. But, basically, AID's presence is in the Philippines and Indonesia. The Indonesia program, I think, is generally accepted by most people within the Agency. It's moving into a development phase-out strategy. Within five years, we'll no longer have a development assistance program in Indonesia. Philippines, perhaps a little bit longer for historical, political reason more than a current political reason. But we don't have a presence in East Asia as a region any longer. There may be the beginnings of some kind of a program in Indochina, but I can't believe it will ever be terribly significant because of resource restraints. They're all countries that have grown eight to twelve percent a year. There are classic graduate countries where I would argue separately that there's a continuing development interest. South Asia are all countries with the majority of their populations still living in poverty - and with a billion people sitting in India and were an important part of our global aspirations vis a vis population. It is our continuing interest in getting a majority of the people out of poverty. There's probably as much development experimentation going on with regard to small scale enterprise, population programs- I think each country in the region, except Nepal, has had a female president. Probably the only part of the world. Pakistan has one. India's had one. Bangladesh has had one. And Sri Lanka's had one. It was never conceptualized as a coherent region.

Q: What about the content of the program? You talked about wanting a continuing development relationship with the East Asia countries.

CYLKE: I think the more traditional AID portfolio range of interest: population issues-

Q: Technical assistance?

CYLKE: Yes. I would think those kind of programs still make sense. There's still time for it in that part of the world as well. India is slightly different, but Bangladesh and those kinds of countries. It's not much, but it seems to me that they're cut off. If you talk about coherent regions in the world, and I don't know how many there are, South Asia has always gotten short shrift. Yet, if I were the administrator of the Agency, with all the things I want to do, you get that whole panoply of stuff that the Agency says it wants to do, some of which is out of sync with where we are. It doesn't have much to do with Russia or doesn't have much to do with Eastern Europe or doesn't have much to do with East Asia anymore. We're not even in South America. So they're really talking about Africa. Africa has a certain kind of downward spoke (inaudible) when people think about it. They're unhappy they're not optimistic. And yet here's a region of the world that's the same kinds of issues as Africa, where one could be quite optimistic and where one could take enormous pride for work that was done over the last 40 years and where work is still going on. They're all democracies, but with majorities of the population in poverty. It is a coherent region. It's not just six countries. They're, in fact, five countries that have to learn to live together for "their development purposes." If you look at the Ganges and its relationship to Nepal and to Bangladesh, and for security reasons as you look to the relationship between India and Pakistan and Sri Lanka. So, there are both security reasons and development reasons to think of that as a coherent region. It's a simple thought, but-

Particularly, as an agency, they're continually, I think, not thinking well enough of itself. I think there's a current depression in the Agency. An awful lot of that is rooted in the hard times that the Agency as an agency is having, as opposed to, I think, some of the more optimistic premises you can have about what's happening with development. I think that the Agency has not put together concern for its own downfall. I think (inaudible) with the Congress about success that they've had (East Asia) and successes which they could have in places like South Asia. One of the reasons is South Asia doesn't seem to arise on the Congressional (inaudible) is a place of incredible importance. It doesn't have the same trade resonance that East Asia has and it doesn't have the same security resonance which Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union had. But there are still 1.5 billion people sitting in that part of the world. There are certainly security issues vis a vis the atomic weaponry between India and Pakistan. And it's a coherent region both ethnologically and natural resource-wise, particularly when you look at water flows between those parts of the world. (Inaudible) opposed to the Middle East, where I think one can be quite optimistic. It's a fertile ground for learning development. India, internally, I think, in the industrial sector (inaudible) 15 percent a year. It's incredible. There's still 600 million people in poverty that have to be moved, but there's a dynamic going on in all those countries now, since the collapse of the wall, have all pretty much gotten their policy house in order. They're outward-looking, export oriented. They're taking the IMF stuff kind of seriously. I think they're all on the right track. I think it's a place where development dollars would be well spent.

Q: We may come back to some of that in a minute. Then you finished up in India?

CYLKE: I finished in India in the summer of 1987. I was assigned to FVA to be the deputy to Julia Block, when Walter Bollinger moving to the Africa bureau as the deputy assistant administrator. That's what I did. I came back and there was not an assistant administrator. By the time I got back, I guess, Julia was appointed assistant administrator for the Asia bureau. So, I came in and was, for almost a year and a half, the acting assistant administrator for the bureau. There was also really no administrator. Allen Woods had just been appointed administrator and was sick for the better part of that time. I found that FVA was at that stage, not on anyone's radarscope at any rate. So, in a year and a half, I don't think I had a one on one conversation with the administrator of the Agency. At any rate, we were in charge of a bureau and expected to be responsible. It's interesting to finally get a senior leadership position in Washington and find out there wasn't any Washington there.

Q: In India, did you have any dealings with BIFAD?

CYLKE: Not anything sharp. The gentleman who was the head of the BIFAD board, a former president of the University of Florida, whose name escapes me - a very gentlemanly guy who was (inaudible) out to India three different time. But my sense in India (we never got anywhere) was that the ag universities were the wrong place to put money in the Indian project. They were much too inward-looking, underfunded, autarkic, unconnected to real development outcomes. In India, they were so much more connected to a scientific agenda than what I call "technology agenda" that they were the wrong institutions to work for. I think BIFAD was disappointed I didn't see the world that way, but we never really put a BIFAD program together.

Q: But those were the institutions in which we had made a big investment in the earlier period.

CYLKE: We had, but my sense was, if you wanted to lead them out, you almost had to set a competing concept agenda. As you'll recall, I talked about biotechnology because they were willing to work interdisciplinary, they were willing to work against an outcome with the private sector, and they were willing to work internationally. I don't think you can run any kind of a technology program which isn't internationally connected. I just don't see how you can. The scientific endeavor now is without borders. I think the Choo Long Kuan University situation, where they said, "How can we run a first-class university without having a root in Houston" really defines the future much more than a autarkic system, which says, "We're going to run our own research thing in Pantnagar and the heck with the rest of the world and the heck with what the output of our scientific research is for."

Q: From my understanding, they became more and more out of date, irrelevant and more introverted, is that correct?

CYLKE: I think so. In India, the ag university system was just- We were funding individual research projects when I got to India that you couldn't see were dynamically connected to anything. That's not to put a blanket on all those universities and the work they were doing, but I didn't see that there was any wave there to ride in terms of trying to get them up a notch. The notch that I could see was trying to move another research agenda which might create a leadership cadre for how scientific research ought to be conducted in the country. As I said, the keys to that, I thought, were interdisciplinary kinds of connections. The ag universities out there wouldn't talk to the biology departments of other universities. It had to be connected to the international community and I say "private sector," but what I really mean is being connected to the users of technology and what the demands for scientific research (inaudible).

Q: Let's go back then to your work with this association.

CYLKE: Then I left the Association. I want to mention Henrietta Olson Fore because I thought she was a unique person. And how idea emerged from different places. Henrietta went to a mission director's conference and said, "Hey, look, the Africa bureau has an initiative. They have the-" whatever it was.

Q: African Development Fund.

CYLKE: Russia's getting the money because there's Russia. If we're out of this, then we better develop an initiative or we're not going to be in business any longer. That's the bureaucratic side of it. So the mission directors of the Asia bureau decided that the one common theme throughout their region was the environment and that they ought to shape some kind of initiative around the environment. So the impetus for it really came from a bureaucratic drive of Henrietta. What she then brought to that initiative was a sense that it shouldn't just be a rubric. AID for too long, I think, has- Any of us who have worked in the Agency for a long time know that, if someone says, "Our initiative's now going to be X," we could line up any program that we had ongoing under X with facility, which I think was always frustrating to people who ran the Agency. You'd read this for a long time and then all of a sudden say, "Guess what? We've been doing what you wanted us to do all along anyway." So she wanted it to be more than rubric. She really wanted to start an initiative which would be driven by her vision of the environment.

Secondly, she really wanted to engage the private sector, not just from a sales point of view. I think her sense was that development wasn't happening just because development agencies promoted development. Development happened because people - universities, private sector institutions, states, etc. - had a reason in today's global economy to be engaged. Her sense was that one role for AID was to create a development context, within which lots of these disaggregated ideas, that being driven by internal institutional purposes could be aggregated around a development goal to a development outcome. I think that was an interesting approach to this development cooperation idea. It is a counterpoint to the idea of creating a foundation. To my notion, I kept creating a foundation to create a pot of funds, which would still be administered largely as AID administers a pot of funds. Her idea was that, instead of that, or as an alternative to that, you created a context and some momentum or initiative around which lots of independent actors, spending their own funds, would continue to spend their own funds to their own interests, but within some kind of a context.

He asked me to join that program. I've been with it now for five years. I did it though the Tata Energy Research Institute, which is an Indian policy research organization incorporated in the United States. I often said I joined them rather than another institution for psychic symmetry, to be associated with a Third World development institution incorporated in the United States. I also like the idea that the head of it was 10,000 miles away, probably. But his feeling of incorporating in the United States is an incomplete vision, but an interesting vision. He believed he would never be taken seriously as long as he was perceived strictly as an Indian organization and that he had to incorporate in the United States in order to be taken as an equal and not treated as a small boy, if you will, by the other institutions. I think that was an uninteresting kind of vision. He's never really been able to fulfill the idea of what role he really plays in the United States as an Indian institution, other than a representation office for his office in India. But the notion of how you get that done, how you get rid of the donor industrialized world sense of "we are the leaders; we know better; we know more-" If you're going to have a development cooperation relationship, where you're not in the assistance relationship giving away money, you've got to find some way to break that cultural hierarchical relationship as well with much more mutual respect. I think that's what he was after. So, I gladly identified with him, even though it's an employment perch for strategic planning work that I'm doing for the US(inaudible).

There, I will just say two or three things. One of our key ideas was- Environment to me is almost like food aid. Most development people don't like environment either because I think they fear a special pleading foreign interests which, while important, gets disproportionate attention in the development context. I think it's a legitimate concern. Our argument is that it's not so much an environmental program as a development program concerned about economic growth. That, if you have economic growth at 12 percent a year in East Asia, where 80 percent of the industrial stock of the country can be stuff that is now on the ground today in just 20 years, that you won't have the opportunity to get in front of that development agenda with sustainability kinds of concerns. Our sense was, they had the growth pattern down, they had the poverty issue pretty well dealt with, income distribution was dealt with, they hadn't dealt with democracy and the environment. Our interests was, "How do you build a sustainable development paradigm," not, "How do you promote the environment as such?" Number one. So it was an economic issue.

Secondly, a big issue. For some reason, I don't think the Agency has put its mind around this shift in developing countries. I think we all know it happened, but there's no consciousness of it. I started looking at when did these countries become industrial-led as opposed to agricultural-led. It's over some significant period of time. Indonesia's been led by industry now for almost 15 years. And yet I don't think the Agency or the development community's ever come to put the same attention on understanding that phenomenon, how it works, what its relationship to employment, to wages, to the environment, etc. really are. It's the same way we made the investment in the natural resource side. Mike Rock at Winrock kind of coined the notion of "clean revolution" to rhyme with "green revolution." His argument was that there's the potential in Asia to think about a restructuring of the industrial sector, which would be profound in its impact on the way in which development occurs in those countries as the restructuring of the agricultural sector was two generations ago around the green revolution. (Inaudible) come to believe that there are forces at work in the world which offer that which are dependent on things like, since 1984, private sector firms adopting a concern for the environment, for whatever reason that is different than 1984. The localization now has a way of spreading some of those ideas on a global stage which didn't exist before, partly through the desegregations of manufacturing, where so much of American manufacturing is taking place in Indonesia or in India or in China. Increasingly, you see it in child labor kinds of issues. You're seeing it in the environment. Projecting the values of Europe onto those people through the marketplace, not through international organizations, not through national governments. A big movement's called the "International Standards Organization." They have an international quality marker. There's now an international environmental quality marker. You see private banks now imposing environmental criteria because they're afraid of liability issues. I think there's a whole new phenomenon taking place under the rubric of private ordering, which gets added onto what national governments can do, what international organizations can do, which I know we in the development community and the political science community aren't yet up to getting onto. I guess my sense is that there's a real opportunity here for the Agency - because I think AID's way ahead on this issue of the World Bank, the Asian Development Bank, APEC, and ASIAN - to get itself organized around a big idea, sustainable development, in a practical kind of way. In a situation where development cooperation will work, the issue isn't more development assistance funds, the problem is, there's so much money being invested that what's the consequence going to be for the environment? Whether we like it or not, the East Asian development model is the model of choice which AID, the World Bank and everyone is pushing on the world. That's the development model of choice and yet it's being done without any real concern for the environmental consequence of what it is we're promoting. So I think there's a real case to be made that's not just an Asian phenomenon, but a worldwide phenomenon. It mixes an interesting development problem with a tremendous opportunity with a different way of doing business. I don't want to go into great length on this because it's post-AID, but I think it had the beginnings of articulating a different way of doing business and thinking about development that AID could do at a dramatically lower cost. In integrating, I worked with the private sector so that it's trade in aid in its best sense. It's not AID trying to play the role of commercial-

Q: But, you know, an interesting point on the Egypt program was that the Embassy and the Ambassador were pushing you to get more assistance out to the masses and the individuals and not to the infrastructure?

CYLKE: That was not coming from within the Agency. There would have been a context where they would have quarreled with the policy. But the Egyptians, one, didn't pay any attention to our policy interventions and did allow us to yak on about it, so there wasn't any tension at the Embassy.

But I will say that the Embassy did have impact. The Embassy in India had a tremendous impact on the structure of our program. They wanted it to go toward the higher-end technology kinds of issues. That was clearly rooted not only in the Ambassador's personal perceptions about AID. The United State's Government's posture in India was organized around that. Whether it was the ag office or the science office or the economic office, it was clearly around that. There happened to be a coincidence of interests between he and the administrator on that issue. But I never had a sharp disagreement with State.

Q: Were there any particular projects or programs that you were personally associated with or helped bring about that you particularly feel a lot of satisfaction with?

CYLKE: I'd have to go get my resume and look at it! There were all kinds of programs that we worked on over the years that I think I was- Frankly, I think the program we're working on now, if you want to know the truth, is the most satisfying program that I've worked on in a long time because I think (and I think I've had some responsibility for it) it is now associated with an important development idea. The idea of development activities which aren't associated with an important broader, upscale development goal aren't as satisfying to me. I think that it's not the role of the United States Government to be financing specific projects which are government responsibilities - more setting the table or setting the context. That's where I'm coming from.

Therefore, in India, I thought, although it wasn't my major area of interest was in technology relationships, where I think we had some modest success in trying to get a tremendous investment which the Indians had in science, moved more consciously toward being concerned about the end product use of that. I would say the stuff we did with the health sector, of trying to get up above building health clinics and building specific activities, to trying to affect the context within which that happened. I guess I call that "sectoral programming." The Agency had other words for it. They were program loans in the old days. I think program loans, which dealt with macroeconomic things, were probably successful in some countries, may require even larger amounts of resources to be effective. The IMF has almost co-opted that as an area. The notion of sectoral programming around ideas like health, where you would try to get what I'd say the effective "spigot of the faucet," in different countries was probably the most successful stuff that I was associated with as I look back on it. I attribute that to AI and Princeton Lyman, who gave me the chance to work on sectoral programming. The whole notion of non-project lending (inaudible), but I think agricultural sector lending, health sector lending, population sector lending, (inaudible) the criteria is probably more useful than-

You've asked the question a couple of times about specific projects or programs or things that you're associated with and I haven't answered that question well in any kind of (inaudible), Haven, so I'm going to- I don't think the projects in the end are what I was interested in, or what really makes the difference. So, I think, while all the projects are individually sensible and made some sense, I think the notion that a project is going to change the world- To me, while we carry out our craft in project context - and, as I said earlier, I wonder sometimes about the whole context of the project and whether there isn't a different abstraction we could bring to bear, whether it's portfolios or themes or something- My memory of my career with AID, I don't think, is tied up with individual projects, even though I'm sure I could go through my resume and look at a set of projects which I thought were really important. That's what we accomplished perhaps. That's what I happened to be fortunate enough to be associated with. But, as I look back over my career, I was associated with what happened in the Sahel, which in development was one of the big dramas of our time: what do you do with people in marginal lands who are going to be consistently - that was Ethiopia, the Sahel - at the mercy of non-productive agricultural land, where the educational systems and commercial systems aren't there. What do you do with those in those situations to give people a tolerable life expectancy or life expectation that is totally inconsistent with the geography in which they live? I think that the Sahel, Ethiopia, those kinds of circumstances were really important and interesting for me to be associated with.

Secondly, associated with a set of political circumstances where the same question arises, where the political circumstances was not going to give rise, whether that was the Southern Africa circumstance, which now looks promising, Afghanistan, which looks discouraging, Mozambique. That whole set of other issues that I had the opportunity to be associated with related to the Sahel and the political ones, it seems to me, equally related. How do you create life expectations or help to participate in defining life expectations in very difficult kinds of environments?

India just gives you a chance to be associated with a huge hunk of humanity organized around democratic premises, with 600 million poor people operating with one foot in the 20th century, with 200 million people operating at the same level of economy as the people in East Asia. 600 million people outside of it, where the 600 people are not forgotten. They're a fundamental part of the political process, almost to the detriment of the political process. But just having the opportunity to sit in that environment, which was the cradle of what we even mean by the word "development," where people first started thinking about it at the end of the 50s.

Egypt, the largest assistance program the United States Government had launched since the Marshall Plan, with modest success on changing the fundamentals of Egypt. But again a very well run program where I could find all kinds of projects which had success and were professionally managed and run by AID, some of which are going to be terribly important in an infrastructure kind of sense, but going to be (inaudible) to the kind of country it's going to be.

Currently, my engagement with an environmental issue, which has broadened out to a whole concern for is there a growth pattern which can be made more consistent with the environmental aspirations of the world and a whole set of new issues.

Finally, I think the food aid association was an interesting one. So, that's all from my own perspective. They were four or five really broad- Which I had the privilege to be associated with and to learn from. Now, the question really is whether I had enough to learn from, but whether the Agency had something to learn from that. The way we're organized right now, we're all bureaucrats. I think the decline of PPC is a tragedy. There's no central repository. And it's not the Global bureau because they're tied up with managing projects. Except maybe in population, I don't see any truly global kinds of ideas coming forth. But the Agency doesn't have a central think tank. I can't discern any kind of organizing- It seems adrift from or even uninterested in the main currents of what's happening in the development world. What are the main themes? What are the main places? What are the main ideas? Because it's caught in a survival battle of trying to catch a project or a country or a smaller idea which might be appealing to someone on the Hill.

PRUDENCE BUSHNELL
Administrative Officer
Bombay (1984-1986)

Ambassador Bushnell was born in Washington, DC into a Foreign Service family. She was raised in Washington and at Foreign Service posts abroad and received degrees from Russell Sage College and the University of Maryland. After working as a clerk at Embassies Teheran and Rabat, she became a Foreign Service Officer in 1981 and subsequently served in several posts before serving as Ambassador to Kenya 1996 – 1999. There she experienced the bombing of the Embassy by al Qaeda. In 1999 she was named Ambassador to Guatemala, where she served until 2002. During her career, the Ambassador served in several senior positions in the Department in Washington. Ambassador Bushnell was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: Today is the 27th of July, 2005. Alright, you were in Dakar for two years, then off to Bombay which is now called what?

BUSHNELL: Mumbai

Q: I suspect it will stay Bombay for most people for a long time. Anyway, you were in Bombay from when to when?

BUSHNELL: 1984 to 1986 as the Administrative Officer.

Q: First, let's go to India as a whole and then we'll go to Bombay. What was the state of India, particularly the vis a vis, U.S. and Indian relations at that time?

BUSHNELL: Indira Gandhi was the Prime Minister and angry at the U.S. Relations were not good. She threw out American businesses, for example. There were significant strains between the Indian government and the United States government, which made us all the more grateful that we were in Bombay and not New Delhi. Bombay was a very cosmopolitan city, home of "Bollywood," and movie stars, as well as Parsees – Zoroastrians who had fled Persia many years before and who had a significant impact on the culture in Bombay. I found New Delhi to be far less friendly.

Q: From other interviews I learned there wasn't a lot of love lost I think there. How did you find it in Bombay?

BUSHNELL: The city was overwhelming. Twenty million people (at that time) on a narrow peninsula. There was scarcely any room so there were very few houses left. Instead, you had high-rise buildings and lots and lots and lots of people in the streets, sleeping, raising families and doing everything. It was also a practice in Bombay to honk your horn when the traffic light turned from red to green. So, you had a cacophony of noise, odors, heat and overwhelming population. Dick and I had a conversation about six weeks after arrival about how we were going to survive this experience, and we decided that the way was to get out of Bombay as frequently as possible. We traveled a lot around western India, which was terrific.

Professionally, I found it challenging, because I was the first woman to hold the position of Admin Officer. A lot of Indians felt very uncomfortable dealing with a woman and made no bones about it. The first time I met the Chief of Police he stared and said, "I can't believe the United States of America would send a woman to do this job"! The status of women was abominable. In addition, there were tensions among the FSNs that I had not seen in Senegal. I found it difficult to form teams among the people with whom I worked at the Consulate. It's not that I didn't enjoy most of the people as individuals, I just couldn't get the supervisors to see themselves as part of a larger team. So I stopped even having staff meetings. I've always regretted that. I think I should have put more effort into it.

Q: Well, sometimes you're up against something bigger and a two year assignment is too short to change the culture.

BUSHNELL: Well, there was an awful lot going on at the time, as well. Bombay was the point in my career when I began facing disasters. Twice when I was "acting" in the absence of the Consul General, we had crises. First, when Mrs. Gandhi was assassinated and then when the Union Carbide plant in Bhopal, which was in our consular district, experienced a chemical leak that killed I don't know how many people, and injured thousands and thousands more. The British Consul General was assassinated during our tour, and we had the fall-out from President Reagan's decision to bomb Libya. Lots of demonstrations in front of the consulate. I was the post security officer, so Harry Cahill, our CG would always send me out to face them. "You're such a nice lady, they won't know what to do, and they certainly won't harm you," he would say.

Q: The assassination of Indira Gandhi, what happens when the head of state, well the prime minister of the state is assassinated? Do we automatically bring the flag down -

BUSHNELL: Ah, interesting that you ask that, because that was "the" issue of the day, whether to bring the flag down. I was so happy when dusk finally came, and I could pull that flag off the flagpole. Rumors were rampant about whether or not the Prime Minister had actually been killed, and the Indian government was stonewalling, so we didn't know what to do with the flag during most of the day. Fortunately, the Public Affairs Officer, Alan Gilbert, had prior experience when President Sadat was assassinated in Egypt. Alan called me and recounted that when our embassy in Cairo lowered the flag before the Foreign Ministry, it got into a heap of trouble. His advice to me was, "Don't lower the flag no matter what until the Indian government lowers its flag." And, that was absolutely the correct instruction.

Q: Yeah. It's the sort of thing you wouldn't think about really.

BUSHNELL: Or you think, who cares and who's watching? But, lots of people were watching. We had crowds in front of the consulate demonstrating, because we had not lowered the flag. Later, the Chief of Protocol telephoned to complain that we had. I was just grateful that we'd abided by the rules of protocol.

Q: What was the reaction in Bombay? This was Sikhs who killed Mrs. Gandhi. This is obviously not a Sikh area, but what was the reaction there?

BUSHNELL: There was the natural horror that people experience when your head of state is assassinated. There wasn't any kind of hate; people were sad and left it at that.

Q: You mentioned that the area was what? Was it Parsee? What was the prominent religion?

BUSHNELL: Hinduism, then Islam. Parsees originally came from Iran and were Zoroastrians, which I think, was the first monotheistic religion in the world.

Q: Were there religious-based riots?

BUSHNELL: Not as many as you hear about now. The fundamentalist Hindu Party had almost no political power. That said, I always had the feeling in Bombay that a spark could ignite at any time because of the density of the population.

Q: I would think that you as the Administrative Officer and responsible for people and security officer, that Americans driving there must have given you great concern.

BUSHNELL: Few of us had cars and a shuttle took people to and from work. The consulate motor pool was large enough to accommodate those who wanted to rent a vehicle and hire a driver. Taxis were also plentiful – and dangerous.

Q: Just steam right through the crowd?

BUSHNELL: Yep. Or that you wouldn't run into a wall. We actually did not lose anybody from a traffic accident.

Q: With your local staff, you're saying you almost had to deal with them individually. This must have been very difficult, wasn't it? Could you communicate to, because there's times when you just want to tell everybody, we're going to be doing this, or we've got this problem coming up or something?

BUSHNELL: Well, I would have meetings, but people would sit in silence. After, people would phone me but they wouldn't say much of anything in front of anyone. It was rather frustrating. But, we got a lot accomplished, including finding properties, which was an excruciating task. Housing was going at something like $3,000 a square foot – this was 1982, mind you. A lot of landlords wanted offshore payment so they wouldn't have to pay taxes, which we, of course, were prohibited from doing. This diminished my negotiating leverage considerably. But it was OK to offer cash, so I did. One landlord picked up $96,000 in hundred rupee notes that we had put in two or three liquor boxes.

Q: How about on the local staff. What about women? At most posts women are the backbone of our foreign national staff, because we usually offer a better deal for women than most other businesses. How about in Bombay?

BUSHNELL: Let's see. My secretary was a woman, as well as the personnel, protocol and travel people. Also, the head consular FSN.

Q: Bhopal. This sent shock waves around the world. In a way, I got the feeling that the Indians really enjoyed this. I mean, it's the wrong term, but I mean this is a chance to really stick it to the United States and to capitalism and all that. When it happened, did the embassy realize that they had a horrible situation on their hands? Were they sending any help down or instructions or how did it work?

BUSHNELL: The embassy took over, although when the Union Carbide CEO, Warren Anderson, came rushing in, he stopped at the Consulate. I remember strongly advising him not to go to Bhopal but he did. He was arrested within minutes and, once he was plunked in jail, it became a bilateral issue that was dealt with in Delhi.

Q: You said a British Consul General was killed. Why?

BUSHNELL: You know, I don't know that we ever found out. I think it was thought originally that it was an act of terrorism, but then, ultimately, there were rumors that this was private.

Q: Although you were the Administrative Officer, you getting reflections from, I would imagine the consular section would. Isn't, this is the area of India where all the motel people came?

BUSHNELL: Yes, from Gujarat. We had huge, long visa lines. I remember I wanted to put in new bathrooms, because we had inadequate facilities. I thought I was being really clever when I sent a cable to Delhi talking about the number of toilets we had, the average number of visa applicants we had per day, the average time they were in the waiting room and, therefore, the average number of flushes the toilets had. And therefore, after oh six zillion flushes, we needed new toilets, and they sent back another cable saying, "Nice cable, nice try, no money." We had money for security after our embassy in Beirut was blown up in 1983, but not for toilets in Bombay!

As a result of the Inman Commission which looked into the vulnerabilities of overseas embassies, Congress gave funding for security upgrades. I spent my last year taking apart and rebuilding the consulate, especially the consular section. The consulate was a former Maharaja palace and looked like one, so we had to work carefully. And I had a really good time. We needed to put in watch towers, so I went out to a local architect to see if he could design something in keeping with the architecture. It looked like it was part of the original design. Yeah, it was a great deal of fun. I enjoyed being Admin Officer, actually.

Q: Well, you're doing things.

BUSHNELL: Right and fairly autonomously. You know, if you're taking care of people's needs, and providing good services, by and large people leave you alone to do your job, and I really enjoyed that.

Q: You mentioned you were a security officer and dealing with the police and all. Are you saying you had problems?

BUSHNELL: Some. But, ultimately, I had good relations. The police official I dealt with most was the head of the traffic police. And I thought, oh what a job you have! I got along with him very well. The Bombay International School was right across the street, and the children would use the consulate grounds as their play ground. They literally had to dodge cars careening around the corner. I wanted to get a traffic policeman to stop the traffic as the children walked across the street, which I ultimately did.

We also had lots of bomb threats, so I got to know the people with the sniffer dogs pretty well. I found that after a couple of encounters I would get along well with whomever I needed to. But it took a huge amount of energy. When we got on a plane to leave Bombay, I felt a huge weight lift off of me. Part came from relief from the responsibilities but also from expending so much effort to get the kind of attention I needed from Indian officials – getting them to deal with me, whatever they thought, and with respect.

Q: What were the bomb threats about?

BUSHNELL: Our policies. U.S.-Indian relations were not very good. Plus, the sub-continent has never been the safest area of the world. Airplane hijackings were fairly frequent, and I think it was then that the Air India flight was hijacked. It was a high-threat environment, and the bomb threats just became a part of it.

Q: Did you get involved with Bollywood; this is the movie industry in Bombay.

BUSHNELL: No, not really. We did enjoy lots of other aspects of Indian art. So much of it is public art. The huge posters advertising movies were all done by hand and some were just incredible. The architecture in Bombay was also amazing. When I first went there, all I saw were buildings with green mold oozing down because of the effects of humidity on the limestone. But, once you began to look beyond, there was amazing architecture.

Q: That's a big arch there isn't there?

BUSHNELL: Yes, called the Gateway to India.

Q: What was your husband doing there?

BUSHNELL: He did some consulting work with the embassy, and he served as a consular associate at the consulate. In those days, associates could work the visa lines, so that's what he did. For one year he was the principal of the Bombay International School. He was good. He did the job that needed to be done, and I think people were very grateful.

Q: What was his impression of the visa lines?

BUSHNELL: Overwhelming. After we returned to the United States and we were in some store, I heard my husband's name being called, and it was an Indian woman who came up and said, "I want to thank you for the visa you gave me. I got another one." [laughter]

Q: What about the Soviets? Were they still doing their thing? I mean, they had very close relationships with the Indians, certainly up in New Delhi. How was that played out in Bombay?

BUSHNELL: I didn't get involved in political issues. The CG didn't talk about them in staff meetings. The Soviets were not players in my world. My only encounter was a Russian who came at the signing the condolence book for the assassinated Prime Minister. The CG had broken his arm and wanted me with him to sign the book. My instructions were to sign the book ahead of the Soviets. It was critically important. It seemed pretty silly, but okay. The only Indian woman present – the only other woman in that mass of people -- either deliberately or inadvertently helped me cut short the rigid protocol, which gave me a great spot in the long line waiting to sign the condolence book. The Soviet CG then arrived with a huge wreath and jumped the queue. I was not going to cede my place, so we literally stepped up to the table together, facing the television cameras. He had two choices: elbow me out of the way or behave like a gentleman, which is what he did. So, I got there first. Another triumph for our side!

Q: But it does show these little games that are played, that sometimes can be in some people's eyes important.

BUSHNELL: I suppose. I found it a little amusing. Had I been a man, it would never have played out that way.

Q: No. What was social life like there?

BUSHNELL: We had a nice community and would get together often. The consulate rented a beach hut –you can’t do this anymore --a few miles out of town. Representational events also came frequently because Bombay was India’s commercial capital.

Q: I was wondering whether you found that since Bombay was a big commercial center and there’s some people with lots of money in India.

BUSHNELL: Oh, incredible.

Q: Did you get addicted to Indian movies or not?

BUSHNELL: No, I got addicted to Indian food. Bombay had wonderful restaurants. I learned what a difference freshly ground spices make. Also, Dick and I traveled at every opportunity.

Q: How was the head of the embassy there?

BUSHNELL: Pretty light. Harry Barnes was ambassador the first year, and I can’t remember the name of the ambassador the second year. He was a political person, a non-career person. Harry Barnes had a very light touch. His replacement did not. He would no longer allow Bombay to send cables out -- everything had to go through Delhi for clearance before going out, so you had a different atmosphere.

Q: How about the administrative side?

BUSHNELL: Very light. I was almost autonomous. The most interaction I had was with the budget people and the regional security officer was when we were doing the physical upgrades. The embassy and consulate admin sections orbited their own universes -- didn't even have annual conferences.

Q: Today is the 28th of July, 2005. Pru, I’d like to ask one question going back to India. Can you talk a little about being an Administrative Officer and the bureaucracy? I saw some of this when I served in the Gulf. Can you talk a little about your experiences with Indian bureaucracies as an Administrative Officer?

BUSHNELL: A lot of Indians maintained vestiges of the Brits as they ruled in the 30’s and 40’s. Everything stopped for tea, for example. Airline reservations had to be confirmed in person and noted by hand in a huge logbook. This part has changed, of course, but when computers first came in, you had to show up to confirm the reservation in the log book and in the computer.

Q: I’m trying to capture periods. How about custom clearances?

BUSHNELL: I had to personally sign every single coupon that went on our pouch bags. You were not allowed to use a signature stamp; you had to personally sign each of the four tickets that went on each pouch. I kept a stack at the side of my desk to sign a bunch at a time. Couldn't use initials, had to be your full name and mine is long. Thank goodness I didn't have a middle name..

Literally millions of commuters would come to Bombay every day. Their lunches would be sent to them from their homes through an extraordinary system of pickup and delivery. Imagine millions of lunch boxes that have to be personally delivered to the office and then returned to the home before the end of the day. The "tiffin" boxes, as they were called, would be picked up at the homes by bicyclists, organized at the local train station to go to specific spots where they would be redistributed and delivered by bicycle. After lunch, the reverse. It was extraordinary.

Another example of incredible efficiency is the fact that traffic actually flowed in a city that size crammed into that small an area. There were huge numbers of people in rickshaws, bullock carts, donkey carts, trucks, bicycles, buses and feet, yet traffic moved.

ANTHONY KERN
Labor Attaché
New Delhi (1984-1986)

Tony Kern was born to immigrant parents (from Yugoslavia). He completed high school in Pennsylvania. He went to Duquesne University and Southeastern University. His postings have taken him to Barbados and India. He was interviewed in 1993 by Morris Weisz.

Q: Well, let's discuss that, because it's an interesting thing. One of the problems is -- and I'm closer to the old AFL position because of my history -- that if you decide to open up your relations with the communists, to what degree are you interfering with your contacts with the anti-Communists? For instance in Vienna it would have made no difference, because they were already way ahead of the American movement in their contacts with the Hungarians especially. But I don't know that that's so in a country like India, where I was permitted, or rather nobody disagreed with my decision, to attend meetings at which Communist speakers appeared, so that I could answer them. I used to lecture at conferences of that sort. But I would not have wanted to open up a contact with a Communist trade union because it might have affected adversely my relations with the other unions to the extent that the other unions were so anti-communist. So you do have to balance these things. In any event, I gather that in the Department [of State] and among the regular Labor Attaché Corps there was a feeling that we shouldn't arbitrarily say, "No," just like we shouldn't arbitrarily say, "Yes." I mean, that is the problem.

KERN: That's the problem.

Q: And that is something that some of our Labor Attaché friends were not willing to go that far and the AFL-CIO was not willing to go that far? They didn't trust us to use intelligently a policy which permitted that tactic.

KERN: Absolutely true. You certainly can talk to the more traditional democratic unions and get their sentiment on this, but we didn't even go to that degree at all.

Q: You then served for a couple of years as Tony's deputy?

KERN: Yes, two years.

Q: And then?

KERN: From there I went to India.

Q: How well I know!

KERN: Which was a fantastic assignment. Unfortunately abbreviated. I was there for about two years, and I was medevaced twice and on the second time back, the Embassy doctor met me at the airport and he said, "Tony, that's it. They're sending you back home." So that came to a short tour.

Q: Was it a full two years as a matter of fact?

KERN: Yes.

Q: It seemed like less to me. It's too bad, because I feel and I feel you do, that it's not until the second tour that you really get to know India. It's such a big country.

KERN: It's a huge country and you're sort of waiting around trying to get a sense of direction. We were all benefiting from Krishnan's guidance, but still you had to absorb it and analyze everything and that was part of the problem. I did travel a fair amount though. In that two year period I got up to Gorakhpur, which was up on the northern border attending a railway conference. It was a long train ride, about twelve hours, and I was in this little compartment with four other people.

Q: Which railroad union was that, the Northern?

KERN: The Northern. And I recall riding, and I was kind of shivering.

Q: Who was the head of the union at that time? This fat fellow, what's his name.

KERN: Yes, his name I . . .

Q: Did you go with Krishnan?

KERN: No, Cheenu [V. Srinivasan] was with me at that time.

Q: We're using these names. You'd better identify them.

KERN: Cheenu was the deputy Indian local in the Embassy who was working in the labor section at that time.

Q: And later succeeded our friend. . .

KERN: That's right. He later succeeded Krishnan. As I was sitting up, they threw in a big canvas thing, which looked like a pillow, so I figured, well all right. I tried to prop that up at the end of the bunk and used that as a pillow. When I woke up the next morning, it was very cold. I put my head out of the curtain and I saw people stuffing the blankets into this canvas thing which I thought was a pillow. (laughter)

Q: Well, after two years, you would have learned!

KERN: Yes, the third year I would have learned!

Q: Say something about the trade union situation and what you had to do during that period in India.

KERN: I don't think the alignment changed. The INTUC, Indian National Trade Union Congress, was allied with the Congress Party.

Q: Tony, don't forget that this is your interview so when you say that it hadn't changed much, you mean it hadn't changed much from the time I know, but please describe it.

KERN: I'm talking to Morrie [Weisz, who served as Labor Counselor in New Delhi 1966-72] and I'm saying that I don't think the situation changed in the, what, twenty intervening years?

Q: Almost, yes.

KERN: At that point, if there was any excitement there, it was speculation that Rajiv Gandhi would tell the INTUC that they were no longer an integral part of the Congress Party and that they could go off on their own. There was a large INTUC Congress at that point and Rajiv Gandhi was addressing it and there was a lot of excitement or tension, really, or concern that he might use that speech as the occasion to separate the Congress Party and the INTUC. He hinted around at it in his speech and he obviously was just teasing the trade unionists. He never made that kind of a break.

The other dominant trade union organization was the HMS [Hind Mazdoor Sabha trade union organization], somewhat aligned to the BJP [Hindu-nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party], although they continued to maintain that they were separate and distinct.

Q: From the BJP, really?

KERN: Yes.

Q: At that time. That was different from my experience. The HMS was closer to the Socialist Party. That's interesting. And what about the relations of those unions to the AFL-CIO and the effort to get American trade union help?

KERN: It never materialized. Before I went over, naturally I talked to Chuck Gray, who was in charge of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute (AAFLI), and he gave me a little briefing about the relationship which was cool at best. I never could understand why until subsequently when I came back on home leave, I stopped by to see Chuck again, and I said, "Gee, I don't understand." In that intervening time I'd tried to get more trade unionists to come over and tried to get AAFLI to set up an office there. AAFLI had been banned or thrown out some time earlier. I talked to Kanti Mehta who was the head of the INTUC and he said, "Sure Tony, we can try." They were open and receptive and I mentioned this to Chuck. INTUC was willing to work with the Indian bureaucracy to get AAFLI to come back legally. And Chuck wouldn't respond to it. He said, "You know that son of a bitch, we paid big dollars for him to have eye surgery and he never even thanked us." And I think that was the reason that AAFLI kept out of India. They resented the fact that Kanti Mehta didn't express appreciation for this.

Q: Well, I may be wrong, but Kanti got in touch with me when he came here and my impression was that he was paying for that himself. Did they say that the AFL-CIO paid for that?

KERN: Paid for that eye surgery, yes. Chuck was very direct about that, and he resented the fact that he never even got a note saying "Thank you." It sounds crazy, but I swear that was it.

Q: That might have been the reason for what? For the AFL-CIO or the AAFLI not working with the INTUC or what?

KERN: Yes, for the strained relationship. There really wasn't any kind of relationship at all that I could detect. I tried to get trade unionists to come over. It's tough, you know, traveling almost twenty-four hours to get there. But there was no receptivity on the part of Chuck Gray to set up an AAFLI office there. The Embassy was all for it.

Q: The Embassy was for setting it up. I thought the government of India wasn't too happy about the prospect.

KERN: That's right, absolutely true. But Kante said he was willing to work with the government to support the return of AAFLI.

Q: But Chuck would not apply or what?

KERN : He wouldn't apply. He absolutely wouldn't make the effort. And I think it all had to do with the eye surgery. Isn't that amazing?

Q: Yes, that is amazing. Let's get to the Krishnan [issue], that I want to mention. Krishnan was, of course as we have discussed, the assistant to a series of labor officers beginning with Burgess in 1956 until Krishnan retired in about 1986. We all admire him greatly and he certainly was wonderful and there's not a disagreement among all of us who worked with him that he was a great contribution to whatever success we had.

KERN: Right.

Q: How do you feel about whether he displayed any biases between the unions that he was working with or whether he was able to cover up those feelings that he had for or against the union in connection with his work? Now I want to get comment on the general area of the Foreign Service national working for a labor officer.

KERN: In the situation with Krishnan, I think his service was invaluable. I think it would have taken each Labor Attaché an inordinately long period of time to find their way around that immensely complex country. I don't think we could have functioned very effectively. I think he was straightforward in terms of unions. I think he had a bias toward INTUC and that reflected his predilection toward the Congress Party as the Party of Independence and the Party of Freedom. But I think he kept it in check so that it really didn't result in any kind of distorted activities on the part of the labor section at the Embassy.

Q: Well I asked you that question without any prompting because I didn't want you to know how I felt about it and I agree with you entirely. And so does everybody else. We had a series of Labor Attachés, some of whom were pro-AFL, so pro-CIO, some independent and all that, and every one of us seems to agree, 1) that personally Krishnan was pro-Congress Party and 2) that it did not interfere with the wonderful relations he had with the HMS and the other unions and with management. And I think that is a remarkable feat.

KERN: You're absolutely right. You mention management and that's true. We met with the Tatas and the other big industrial families there.

Q: That is so different from the case with respect to other countries where the Foreign Service nationals sometimes had limited usefulness because of relations they had with one side or the other. I hope some of the research in this field will reflect the value and limitations of having Foreign Service nationals work for them.

KERN: The only area of concern, I think, at one point I was trying to get some information for our Defense Attachés, and I asked Krishnan if he could try to line up some unions involved in defense activities that were related, and we never did get near those unions. That was the only place where I would have a little negative comment.

Q: Well, was that due to an unwillingness to try to do it or the Indian Government's really being very worried about that?

KERN: I don't know. I'm sure the Indian Government would have had restrictions and concerns about that, but I don't know if he really made the effort. That's the only question mark I've had. I would say, "Listen, you know we have AFGE, which represents military bases all over the U.S. Maybe we can get them to interact with their Indian counterparts." Nothing happened on that.

Q: Well, let me go over some of these points that are raised in our questionnaire. Before I cover the subject matters, I now have a series of questions that go into your reactions on the basis of your total Foreign Service career, so let's bring you home from India. Do you have any other comments to make? Anything on AID or USIA in India?

KERN: Yes, the AID Mission was interesting. I made courtesy rounds shortly after I got there, calling on all of the counselors and all of the heads of the agencies there. I arranged to see the AID Mission Director. I was ushered into his office and he said, "Kern, before you say one word, I don't have a goddamned dime for you." (laughter)

Q: Oh Tony, I'm afraid that you suffered from the amount of money that I got from them. They and USIA used to pay for a whole lot of my travel.

KERN: There was nothing there.

Q: Sorry, buddy! (laughter) But they had so much more money when I was there than they had when you were there and we had a limited travel budget for the Embassy and they got good value for the money they gave because I used to give lectures and I also commented on the AID projects. I don't feel guilty about it. Sorry, Tony.

KERN: He never did give me a dime.

Q: Were there any projects you were interested in that they could have helped you on? Because the AID program by that time had gone down.

KERN: Yes, it was really down and the amount of discretionary funds they had was virtually nil. They really didn't have anything to work with.

Q: Yes, AID went down pretty much. What about the USIA where we did have a whole lot of cooperation from them and even just before you came there, they had me coming out for lecture tours and things like that.

KERN: They were very good about that. They were very, very receptive and frankly I always found USIA overseas to be much more receptive to the labor program than the AID folks.

Q: Well, in countries like India, it just makes so much sense for them to feel as though they're getting into the nitty-gritty of the society if they have people coming over as AMPARTS.

KERN: You recall the Bhopal chemical disaster there, where several thousand people died. I had been contacted by the University of Arizona, which had received seven million dollars from Union Carbide to set up a program in Bhopal, but they needed Embassy assistance. So I worked with the various ministries to try to get them established. We got them residency permits and they were setting up a training school for the blind and another training school for vocational education: electricians, carpenters, and other needed kinds of skills and training. But we never got beyond the residency permit. They couldn't get the approval from the government to move forward because of their concern that this might somehow compromise the lawsuit they had with Union Carbide. And I guess the Arizona reps. were there about six months and then folded up and went back home. I always thought this was a sad development.

Q: Did you have regular meetings with management people or did it have to wait for some strike to happen? Did they call upon you other than when they were in trouble, management people?

KERN: No, again you're talking about Krishnan's invaluable assistance. I'd just ask Krishnan, "Can you meet with management people in every town?" and we did. We met with the Tatas. I've forgotten the other major industrial family there. And with the Tata family, not some underling. Chemical plants, anyplace, electronic plants, so I had fairly good access to management. . .

Q: Are you talking about the Birlas as the other one?

KERN: That's the other one, right.

Q: I think, as a matter of fact, they're supposed to be bigger in terms of size than the Tatas, but those two companies really. . .

KERN: Monster companies.

Q: And they both have a social conscience that doesn't interfere with their profit making, but they do that. And that's something that's lacking in many other countries. And the Tatas especially, and the Birlas also. It's fascinating for a person like me, who comes out of a conflict situation between labor and management on everything, although that's changing now, to see how they operated, to see, which I'll mention now because I may forget about it later, to see that the Tatas operating as a steel corporation against the government-owned steel operation would assign one of their prime labor relations specialists to work for the Indian Government's rival steel corporation, as they did with this very interesting guy for a number of years. It is just unusual.

KERN: Yes, they were very progressive companies, very much so.

Q: But they did exploit their people. Well, that's part of the business, isn't it?

KERN: That's true of India though.

Q: On the other hand, the degree of exploitation is not as much. Well, you then came back from India. If you think of anything else you'd like to say about it, by all means do before we're finished. And before your retirement, what did you do?

KERN: I was the Labor Advisor. . .

Q: Do you want to say anything about your illness? Was it caused by India?

KERN: No. It was not caused [by India]. It was a pre-existing condition.

Q: You're okay now?

KERN: Yes. So I came back from India and served as the labor advisor for the ARA Bureau and then for the Africa Bureau. Both of these assignments, I think, gave me more access to the AFL-CIO and their activities as well as the various regional institutes. And I also at that point had more interaction with the USIA and AID bureaucracies in Washington, and that was an eye-opener..

Q: Headquarters. Sally Dupree [of USIA] and company?

KERN: Sally's fine. Sally's wonderful. We always worked well [together], but the other divisions over there [at USIA] were absolutely anti-union. At one point I had a short assignment at USIA. This kind of hostility didn't make sense. So I talked to Tom Kahn who headed up the International Department at the AFL-CIO, and I said, "Tom, we ought to get together and we'll bring all these people together, tell them what you're doing, how you're doing it, let them question you, go back and forth." And he said, "Fine. I'll arrange for it."

So I contacted the USIA folks who said, "Sure. We're willing to do it. We'll get the bus." Well it was a rainy day and the bus was about forty-five minutes late, so it started off bad. We finally get out to the Meany Center and had a very nice luncheon hosted by the AFL-CIO. We had what I thought was a good exchange of questions and answers. As we were heading back to the USIA Headquarters, I said, "Now wasn't that helpful?" I just got sneers and they said, "He was just trying to buy us off." And I said, "Ah, hell." I gave up at that point. They were so anti-AFL-CIO, it was pathetic.

Q: It's interesting, because out in the field, just like your experience, mine was that they saw this as a necessary part of their job, whereas in the headquarters. . .

KERN: . . .they resisted.

Q: Right.

KERN: And again, I think it was a question of power. This was money being siphoned off from more "worthy" projects [like] bringing in dancers or whatever.

Q: Yes. How much of this was due to just the battle for money for their programs and how much of it was a sort of an intellectual bias that they felt that the arts and the fancy stuff was more important? They were looking down on. . . .

KERN: Oh it was intellectual bias. They made no pretenses of knowing anything about labor overseas or domestically.

Q: Do you have any comments on how that could be corrected other than your valiant efforts to get them together? (laughter) What has to be put into the USIA? I think under the present administration, it's more likely to be helped, but. . .

KERN: It's hard. If you don't come from a working-class background, it's hard to relate. And I think that's the problem they've had over there. I'm not condemning all of them, but enough of the folks in the [USIA] headquarters office just do have this intellectual bias.

Q: Well this has changed so much from the days when I was active. I wonder whether we can put part of the blame on the fact that they do not have a full-time active headquarters man like Joe Glazer. When Joe was there, he was very effective with the operations people. And we don't have. . . Is [Thomas] Stillitano [still there]?

KERN: Yes, Tom. I don't know if he is still. . . .

Q: He doesn't work full-time.

KERN: He never did. But Tom was the kind of personality you need. He's very outgoing, gregarious. Just great.

Q: Oh, sure, but what is the reason that he hasn't had as much of an effect on the bureaucracy of USIA as a person like Joe Glazer did?

KERN: Well, one thing, I think, was that Tom realized there was no future for labor at USIA, and consequently he was looking to his career future. So he would do what he could, but he had other activities, which I think were more important to him than labor. I frankly think that he made the correct personal assessment in that setting. I think it is a kind of an intellectual, maybe a class bias. I think if you look through the background there, you won't find people that really know what's going on in America. They do tend to be pseudo-sophisticates. They do like the arts and entertainment world and the communications world and I think that anything other than that is kind of an intrusion on their real world. So that's where we run into a problem.

Q: That's interesting. How would you compare the AIFLD and the AALC in terms of personality, program, effectiveness? You had dealings with both.

KERN: Yes, I had that unique experience. By far the AIFLD operation was more dynamic, better funded, and had a very dynamic leader in Bill Doherty. As I said earlier, I really am amazed at Bill's ability to know what's going on politically throughout all of Latin America. Just immensely impressive. And the people he knew, not just trade union leaders, but people in management and government. He played a very vital role and I have tremendous admiration for him and the folks that worked for him.

Q: Staff, yes. What about Irving Brown? It wasn't in your period though, of course, but didn't Irving Brown have the same sort of relationships with leadership in Africa?

KERN: North Africa. That's my understanding, yes. I don't know that he had any kind of influence in sub-Saharan Africa, but Pat O'Farrell, who was his deputy, also had that kind of knowledge of people in sub-Saharan Africa, but he didn't have the program and he didn't have the money, and I think, more importantly, Africa was not that important to us. Latin America was; therefore, it had all the attention. All the assistant secretaries knew Bill Doherty and Bill knew them as well as folks on the National Security Council and the White House. And that was because Latin America was important to us. Africa wasn't. And consequently Pat didn't have that kind of inter-relationship with the hierarchy of the U.S. Government. He was a very able man and he did well and he plugged away in supporting "democratic" unions. Some were really marginal, borderline, but I think it's paid off. For example, in Zambia, Fred Chaluba who was the president of the Zambian Trade Union Congress, became president, I think, about a year ago. He unseated Kenneth Kaunda, who was almost president for life there, in a fair election.

In South Africa, Pat [O'Farrell] really had problems trying to work with COSATU, the big black trade union movement. Pat was working more with -- I've forgotten the name of it -- the National Association of African Workers. There was a smaller trade union movement which was black. He ran into problems with AID. They had hired an outside contractor, Arnold Zack, -- You may know him. -- to evaluate the program. He came back with a very, very negative report and with suggestions which would have, in effect, I think, destroyed AALC as an entity. Zack, I think, was buying off on recommendations made by the COSATU Trade Union Movement and in particular Cyril Ramaphosa, who was a very strong, very articulate trade union leader there, that they would deal only with the AFL-CIO. Pat tried to make the argument that the AALC was part and parcel [of the AFL-CIO], as it was, and Zack kept pushing that program, trying to push that idea through the AID bureaucracy, not realizing fully that [AFL-CIO President Lane] Kirkland wasn't going to accept that argument.

Q: Isn't that parallel to the Indian situation where one time the INTUC said, "We want to deal with the AFL-CIO. We don't want to deal with the alleged CIA connection"?

KERN: That's right. There's a similarity.

Q: Is that a qualm we should give some weight to in our work with our people? Or should we just say, "Look, you work with the German Stiftungen [German Assistance Institutes]," which receive funds from the German Government. What is there about American Government support?" In India they say, "The [U.S.] Government is supporting the AAFLI and therefore we don't want to have anything to do with them. We want to deal with the trade unions," whereas they don't raise that question about the Stiftungen or the British Council.

KERN: Right. I think the difference was that our trade union movement was "tainted" by the CIA. And I think -- Who was it? -- the Church Committee came out and indicated that the CIA had funded various trade union activities overseas.

Q: The question is, "What did they fund them for? For undermining the government or for carrying on anti-Communist activities?" That's the point.

KERN: Right. We know that they were being funded to carry out anti-Communist activities and to support democratic unions. But in many parts of the world, it wasn't seen that way. It was seen as being a CIA agent. I think one of the few good things that Reagan did was to create the National Endowment for Democracy. He was up front. Money went from the Congress, money went to the USIA, and then automatically it went to the four institutes. And it was up-front and there was nothing devious about it. And I think that was a very positive step forward.

Q: Isn't that the case now with the AID thing? The AID funds go directly to the institutes. What's wrong about that? The CIA connection, so far as I know, hasn't existed for years.

KERN: That's true. Absolutely true.

Q: And when it did exist, it was exposed and that's finished now.

KERN: Going back to my time in Barbados, for example, on some occasions my visits would be preceded by announcements in some local left wing rag about "the great destabilizer" coming to the country now with CIA connections. I recall talking to a really left-wing union in Saint Lucia. I had at that time one of these thick watches. You know, the self-winding ones with the [large] mechanism. I was sitting there talking, and I noticed that the union president kept staring at my watch. I said, "Do you think this is a microphone in here?" And he says, "Yes, brother." (laughter) I said, "Here, take it and put it away somewhere." But that was the kind of mentality that was present. It was this CIA taint which I think really distorted [things] and in many cases made the AFL-CIO's work much more difficult, and ours as well, in trying to convince them that this was not true.

Q: Tony, it's almost six o'clock and I would like to stop now and go over the other questions possibly at dinner and tell you what I think it would be a good idea for you to cover and ask you what you'd like to cover. So should we stop this at this point? Thank you.

KERN: All right

BRUCE F. DUNCOMBE
Economic Officer
New Delhi (1985-1987)

Bruce F. Duncombe was born in Massachusetts in 1937 and graduated from Amherst College and the University of Minnesota. He entered the Foreign Service in 1979. His career included posts in Abidjan, Cairo, New Delhi, Jakarta, Lagos and Abuja. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: Today is the 6th of May, 2002. You're off to India, 1985. What were you going to be doing? You are going right to New Delhi, is that right?

DUNCOMBE: That is correct.

Q: What did you do?

DUNCOMBE: I was, again, what they call, a finance and development officer, basically number two in the economic section. I was responsible for Macao economics, again writing the budget report, balance of payments assessments, and that sort of thing. It turned out that one of the major things I worked on and a lot of the embassy worked on, was technology transfer. Several years earlier, a memorandum of understanding had been worked out with the Indians, that ostensibly would provide a framework for transferring to them, very sensitive advanced technologies. These were technologies that were controlled for national security reasons. Because of the very friendly relationship that existed between India and the Soviet Union, this was a very, very sensitive area. The number two in the commercial section, the commercial attaché, and I spent an enormous amount of time dealing with that particular question.

Q: Before we move into that, how would you describe the relations between India and the United States, at this particular juncture?

DUNCOMBE: I would answer that by jumping ahead to when I was in Indonesia. After having served in India for a couple of years, I went to Indonesia. After having experienced the two of them, who are both leaders in the non-aligned movement, the way I would describe it from my Indonesian viewpoint is that India was non-aligned with the Soviet Union, and Indonesia was non-aligned with the west.

Q: Who was the ambassador? How did you find the embassy at that time?

DUNCOMBE: The ambassador was John Gunther Dean, a career ambassador. The embassy itself was designed by Edward Durrell Stone, if I remember correctly. It was supposed to be an architectural marvel, but it was a very unpleasant building to work in, physically, in my opinion. I don't know if you have ever been in the embassy?

Q: No, I've seen pictures.

DUNCOMBE: It has an open courtyard in the middle, with a duck pond. All the offices are located around this open courtyard. So, in winter, it does get cold in New Delhi. Whenever you wanted to go from your office to the restroom or somebody else's office, you went from a heated room, out into a place that was quite cold. In summer, where it gets hot and humid, you went from an air conditioned room into a place that was very hot and humid, to get anywhere else in the building.

Q: There was not an internal corridor?

DUNCOMBE: There were internal corridors, but it was all in the open courtyard. Architecturally, it was supposed to be a very interesting building, and maybe it was. In terms of a physical building to operate in, it left a lot to be desired, in my opinion.

Q: Who was the economic counselor?

DUNCOMBE: For the first year I was there, it was George Kenney. He retired. The embassy and the bureau wanted me to become the new economic counselor. Senior assignments would not release the position, therefore, a new senior officer counselor was brought in two months before I got promoted to the senior service, which is one of the great ironies of life.

Q: Again, and again. How did you find John Gunther Dean, while you were there?

DUNCOMBE: John Gunther Dean is a very capable man, a very opinionated man, and can be, when he wants to be, very charming. At other times, he can be very difficult.

Q: I've been interviewing him. When he comes back from Paris, we go over to the Kenwood Country Club. We haven't covered India yet. He is reluctant to do that, because he was removed from there, for medical reasons, which rankle him very much.

DUNCOMBE: That was after I left. I have heard scenarios about his departure, but I would not want to say anymore about that because I was not in the embassy when he was invited by Secretary Shultz to...

Q: While you were there, he was a strong ambassador?

DUNCOMBE: Absolutely.

Q: He had been through an awful lot. He lived in Lebanon, Laos, Vietnam, the whole thing. How did you find the Indian authorities, the government level, that you dealt with?

DUNCOMBE: They could be very accommodating at times, and very difficult at other times. As I say, India was non-aligned, as I came to describe it. Others may not want to describe it that way. India was non-aligned with the Soviet Union. The relationships with the United States, which were proper, I would not characterize as necessarily cordial.

Q: Moving to this technical transfer, why would we want to put anything into the hands of the Indians, who were militarily supplied by the Soviet Union? I would think this would be counterproductive.

DUNCOMBE: I think for foreign policy reasons, many people were interested in improving our relationship with the Indians, and cooperation with high technology matters. They have many, many capable people, who are capable of very sophisticated technological work. This was seen as an avenue that could advance a more cooperative arrangement. For instance, one of the issues we spent an enormous amount of time working on was whether or not they would be able to get a CRAY super computer. The Indians wanted this for purposes of doing meteorological studies to map and predict monsoons. Our people were concerned, since they had a nuclear program, that the Indians would, on an unauthorized basis, use it for purposes of nuclear modeling. How one does nuclear modeling is beyond my technical competence to assess, but this stress was right there.

Toward the end of my tour, we had agreed that we would license a CRAY XMP24, a very sophisticated super computer, that they would be able to use for meteorological research. But, there was going to have to be a cleared American on site 24 hours a day, to monitor the use of this particular piece of equipment. Jumping ahead to my Indonesia experience, in view of the problems we had had with Indians on this, I was quite surprised when I arrived in Indonesia, to discover that the Indonesians had one of these computers. It was being used at IPTN, their aircraft plant, for aerodynamic modeling for development of an indigenous Indonesian aircraft. There was no American presence to monitor the security of the use of this XMP24. The science attaché and myself were asked by Washington to, in fact, do security assessments, to be sure that it was not being used for unauthorized purposes, which we in fact did not have the technical competence to do. We did, for a few months, make periodic trips to Bandung, where it was located. We were able to report back to Washington, that there were security cameras in place, and there was controlled access, at least in principal, to the facility where the computer was operated. People in Washington wanted to monitor whether or not it was being used for unauthorized purposes; we said they were going to have to send out people who had technical skills that far exceeded any technical skills any of us in the embassy would have.

But, it reflects, in my view, the fact that India, while non-aligned, was non-aligned with the Soviet Union. There were lots of security concerns. Whereas, Indonesia, again non-aligned, was non-aligned with the west. In terms of my dealings with the government in these two countries, it was like night and day in terms of the access one had, and the kind of cooperative arrangements, and the quality of the discussions, you should have with your counterparts in the host government.

Q: Well, looking at the India economy, the budget and all that, how did you find their figures?

DUNCOMBE: Good.

Q: I mean, what you got was pretty good?

DUNCOMBE: I don't recall having any real problems with the numbers, the way I had problems with the numbers in Egypt.

Q: Looking at the budget and all, did this seem to be a well run government?

DUNCOMBE: The Indian concept was self reliance. To that extent, they had a national plan and state enterprises. They had all sorts of incentives for people to locate in various parts of the country, where it didn't necessarily make a lot of sense for them to locate their economic activity. There were virtually no imported goods in India, during the time I was there. Rajiv Gandhi was seen as a great performer on the economic front, but that was only in comparison with his predecessors, not in comparison with what one would think of as liberal economic thinking and openness to market forces and competition, and that sort of thing.

Q: Were we trying to break down the barriers, or were we just sort of relaxed, saying, "This is the way you're doing it, good luck.?"

DUNCOMBE: Our message, to the extent that message could be heard, was that this kind of centralized planning that you have and the notion of self reliance, as opposed to economic competition, is in large part responsible for what even the Indians would refer to as the Hindu rate of growth, a slow rate of economic growth. But, it was based on being more or less self sufficient.

Q: Did we have a commercial officer there?

DUNCOMBE: Yes, a very large commercial section. There was a commercial counselor, and there was a commercial attaché.

Q: If they are self-reliant and don't buy anything, what were we doing? What were our commercial people doing in India?

DUNCOMBE: Trying to develop traditional markets. There were no imported consumer goods. There were some industrial raw materials and other products that did need to be imported. It was a very difficult market. In many respects, it was quite difficult to get a beat on the Indian economy in New Delhi, because New Delhi, like Washington, is a political capital, and is not an economic capital. The economic capital is basically Bombay. The Bank of India is in Bombay. To the extent there was an American business community, it was in Bombay, not in New Delhi.

Q: Did you get out and see Indian factories, and that sort of thing?

DUNCOMBE: Some.

Q: I was wondering, what was your impression of what you were seeing?

DUNCOMBE: Not the cutting edge of being modern. Having said that, I never visited Hindustan Aeronautical, where they were, for instance, assembling Mig jets. This was off-limits. But, one of the high-tech issues we had with them was they wanted to import composite materials, from the United States, in order to develop an Indian fighter aircraft. They insisted they would be able to keep what they were developing as the indigenous Indian aircraft, separate from the Hindustan Aeronautical plant that was operated in conjunction with the Soviets. You can just see the kind of tension that was just below the surface.

Q: During this time, looking at the newspapers, were the Indians beating us over the head about things, with the United States as sort of the natural target?

DUNCOMBE: I don't remember that. At this juncture, I would not really say that the press was in control of the government. It was a pretty free press. There was criticism of the government in the press. There were lots of newspapers. I would not regard looking at it from, not having been there for 15 years now... My recollection is not that we thought there was an Indian press, there was a government spokesperson, putting out whatever the government was telling them ought to be the official line.

Q: Was Indian society relatively open to Americans? Were you seeing each other, that sort of thing, or was it pretty formal?

DUNCOMBE: No. Aside from government contacts that were sometimes very cordial, sometimes very stiff... Let me put it that way. We lived in an Indian neighborhood, albeit just two or three blocks from the embassy compound. We had a number of friends in the neighborhood. I saw them socially, frequently. We visited many Indian homes in New Delhi. I traveled around the country, and visited many Indian homes.

Q: Were there any things that the United States was closely involved with, such as agricultural changes or working on population? Was any of this going on?

DUNCOMBE: I can't remember at this juncture. There was a small U.S. AID program in India. I say small, in comparison to Egypt, where I had just come from. It was small in comparison to Indonesia, where I was about to go. It wasn't minuscule. It must have had maybe a dozen or two direct hire Americans involved in it. Quite frankly, I don't remember at this juncture just what the focus of their activities was.

Q: In looking at the economy, did the class system intrude?

DUNCOMBE: Oh, absolutely. Just as an example, thinking about the situation in our own home. I very distinctly recall one day, while we were waiting for lunch, one of my daughters looking around, assuming she can see through the walls, counted there were seven people working for us in our house. There was the chocidar, who was the guard that tended the front gate. Then, there was the gardener who raked the leaves on the lawn, but the gardener would not sweep the front walk. So, there was an outdoor sweeper who came every day to sweep the walkways, in the front and the back of the house. But, the outdoor sweeper does not do the indoor sweeping, so you had the indoor sweeper, who essentially dusted and vacuumed and that sort of thing. Then, you had the cook, and then you had the dohbi, who did the washing. I don't remember what the person was called who did the ironing. But, the person who does the washing doesn't do the ironing. Basically, if I have remembered them all, there were seven such people. We did not have a driver. We drove ourselves. In fact, we almost never drove, because we lived in walking distance of the school and my office. In the two years we were in India, I think we only put about 4,000 miles on our automobile.

Q: How did you find the Foreign Service national staff there in your section?

DUNCOMBE: Oh, very capable.

Q: I would imagine they would be.

DUNCOMBE: Very capable. India basically had at that time maybe 850 million people. I thought of it in terms of three different countries. There was a country of 150 million people, that were well educated, modern people, just like you and I. There were another 300 million people who aspired to that status. Some of them had a good deal of opportunity to have upward mobility into this modern, well-educated population. Then, there were approximately 400 million people living in the stone age.

Q: Were we trying to do anything, that you recall, from the embassy point of view, rather than the AID point of view, toward helping the wholeness, or anything like that? Were there any embassy-run programs, maybe by the wives?

DUNCOMBE: We had a very active bilateral program of educated, cultural and scientific exchange outside the AID program. I helped negotiate the formal agreement for funding these exchanges.

Q: Well, in 1987, you left for Indonesia?

DUNCOMBE: That is correct.

Q: Was this relief that you left India, or did you like India? How did you feel about it?

DUNCOMBE: I enjoyed India very much. In fact, I had extended for a third year, and then I got promoted. I said, "Well, that's nice, but I'm here for a third year." Then, I started getting contacted from various offices in Washington about other job possibilities. I said, "Well, if Washington is going to regard me as mobile, I will regard myself as mobile." I had no particular interest in returning to Washington, but the economic counselor position in Indonesia suddenly became vacant. With the support of the ambassador and the DCM, once I had made the necessary contacts, I was allowed to curtail my tour of duty, back to two years in India, and move onto the economic counselor position in Indonesia. As I said earlier, when George Kenney retired, the bureau in Washington and the embassy had wanted to make me the counselor in India, but senior assignments would not release it. I preferred to be the head of the section, rather than number two. I was able to line up the Indonesia assignment. The embassy concurred in letting me move on.

Q: Who was the DCM when you were there?

DUNCOMBE: Gordon Streeb.

Q: Where is he now, do you know?

DUNCOMBE: He is retired, and I believe with the Carter Center in Atlanta.

Q: So, in 1987, you were off to Indonesia?

DUNCOMBE: That is correct.

EDDIE DEERFIELD
Branch Public Affairs Officer, USIS

Calcutta, India (1985-1988)

Mr. Deerfield was born in Nebraska and raised in Nebraska and Illinois. He was educated at the University of Illinois and Northwestern University. After service in the US Army Air Corps in WWII and work with a Chicago TV station, Mr. Deerfield joined the USIA Foreign Service in 1966 serving abroad in Madras, Islamabad, Blantyre, Vancouver, Kampala, Lagos and Calcutta. Mr. Deerfield submitted his personal memoir in 2012.

DEERFIELD: I was facing mandatory retirement in 1988 at the age of 65. I had been asked to return to Washington for my final tour of duty, but wanted to finish in the field, preferably in India where I had started my diplomatic career two decades earlier. The position of Branch Public Affairs Officer in Calcutta was open, professionally a step down from my previous assignment as Country PAO in Lagos, but at this stage a career move upward was not of paramount importance. Our posts in India have always had outstanding staffs of national personnel and Calcutta was among the better of the best. Our Indian staff's relationships with the media, university and cultural communities was strong and enabled me to accept speaking engagements and meet local leaders throughout northeast India for exchanges of views on a wide variety of America-oriented subjects. I moderated a seminar for journalists on "Media Power in a Democracy;" conducted briefings for journalists on American foreign policy; inaugurated art exhibitions; addressed Rotary Club meetings, spoke to students and faculty at numerous colleges, met with members of the Indo-American Society and chaired a seminar on the American political system. We introduced Calcutta audiences to visiting American entertainers sponsored by the U.S. Information Agency. This included performances of the musical, "Once Upon A Mattress" and a country music band called the "New Grass Revival".

Mary Lee met with Mother Teresa and offered to help by teaching English as a second language to novices coming from villages and she also raised money for the Holy Order. My biggest surprise in the Calcutta assignment was an invitation to play a role in film director Bijoy Chatterjee's production of Dristidaan based on a story by Tagore. After getting clearance from our embassy in New Delhi, I accepted and was cast as an eminent British surgeon in India during the Victorian Era. I tried to save the eyesight of a young woman going blind because of lack of proper care. Mary Lee had a walk-on role as a patron at a chemist shop.

As scheduled, I retired in Calcutta in 1988 on August 24 when I reached the age of 65.

JOHN D. STEMPEL Consul General Madras (1985-1988)

Dr. John D. Stempel served in Guinea, Burundi, Zambia, Tehran, and Madras as well as at AF (Ghana), Operations Center, DOD, and NEA. This interview was conducted in 1993.

Q: Well, during your time in Madras, what aspects of south Indian politics did the US have the most interest in?

STEMPEL: Well, there were two. One was politics and one was economic. First, we were very interested in the Tamil insurrections in Sri Lanka. Now Madras, of course, is the center of Tamil Nadu, "Tamil state," so there was a lot back and forth that had allegedly been helping their colleagues across the water and we kept a very close watch on that.

Aside from that, my mission, my main goal, was to ease consular problems on the one hand, because of all the Indians who wanted to come to the States, and to build up the business and science collaboration with south India. In the three years I was there we tripled the collaboration in money terms. We were strong supporters of the scientific effort down there, to the point of working with the embassy in Delhi to try and get the Indian telephone industries to sign a $12 billion contract. That was two years after the telephone divestiture took place and we couldn't get the Americans to organize it, so we got only half the business.

Q: How was it working with the ambassador there, John Gunther Dean? Did you have a good working relationship with him?

STEMPEL: I had a superb working relationship with Ambassador Dean, I think. I saw very clearly what he was trying to do and I supported it. I think he had a lot of confidence in me. In fact, it got so good in effect that the last year or so of my consul generalship, it was almost impossible to get him to pay the ritual visits to the south that he was supposed to do. I would say, "Mr. Ambassador, you really need to go over to Bangalore and talk to these people." "But John we have so much trouble up here and you are doing a good job. Go in and tell them you have my blessings, etc." So it was a very good relationship. Others have said that he was difficult to work with. And he could be firm. But I never minded that because I always felt I knew where I stood and if he didn't like something I was doing he would tell me and I would change it. Or I would try to convince him it was wrong. I had some success in that. You know, we really didn't want to do it the way he wanted because of various negative consequences. He was good to work for.

Q: During that time what kind of relationship did the US and India have? I know there was some problems when we bombed Libya, etc.

STEMPEL: Yes, but actually our relationships were on the upswing. I was in Washington for Rajiv Gandhi's visit in June, 1985. By the time I got to India, everything was on the up and up. We went through it and loved it. It was a terrific time for us. The other thing is that most of the southerners, those in south India, have a really different view of the federal government. They look at it with a certain amount of suspicion and in fact were much more sympathetic to the American views on things like the bombing of Libya. They understood why we were doing it. Well, put it this way, they were at least willing to understand my explanations of that kind of thing. I had some severe doubts about it when it first started too, and it turns out it was quite the right thing to do, I think. But they were not always with their own government.

I remember, it is a very small issue, but in 1987 when the Indian Davis Cup team, and then it was quite good with the Amritraj brothers and Ramesh Krishnan, had won their first round match and was scheduled to play Israel. The Indian government had had a long history of pulling them out before really difficult matches and they didn't recognize Israel. Anyway we helped show P.R. Reddy, the vice president of the International Tennis Association, the steps to take and I got with the ambassador and we helped them out with the Indian government so they could play Israel. They played Israel and beat them, beat the Australians and went on playing in the Davis Cup finals against the Swedes. I think the United States got a fair amount of credit among the tennis circles for helping them out in doing that. A year later they sort of disemboweled themselves tennis-wise. But these were the kinds of things that were going on.

Two or three of the key businessmen on the Indo-American Business Council were based in Madras or Bangalore, which were cities in my territory. I worked very closely with the commercial side of it. That was sort of a new thing for me, but it flowed directly from my own interest of economic development.

ANNE O. CARY
Economic/Commercial Officer
New Delhi (1987-1989)

Anne O. Cary was born in Washington, DC in 1952 and raised in New Jersey. She received a degree in international economics from the University of Wisconsin in 1973. Ms. Cary's Foreign Service career included positions in Brussels, Belgium; Port-au-Prince, Haiti; Paris, France; Addis Ababa, Ethiopia; New Delhi, India; Casablanca, Morocco; and Washington, DC. She was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on November 30, 1995.

Q: ...Maybe we should stop at this point and pick it up...with your departure for India. You were there from when to when?

CARY: From 1987-89.

Q: Today is March 21, 1996. Okay Anne, we are off to India. It is always interesting how tandem assignments work. How did it work out at this point?

CARY: This is exactly why we ended up in India. John Craig, who I had worked with in Haiti and who knew both of us, felt we should be in NEA, because he was in NEA and thought the Near East Asian Bureau was a great place. He contacted us very early on in the bidding process and said, "We have two jobs in India." Mine was going to be basically econ/commercial/trade policy officer and for John it was the staff assistant position to Ambassador John Gunther Dean. It sounded interesting. People said fascinating things about India, so we bid on it and were assigned. We had bid on a couple of other countries. There were two jobs in Barbados which also sounded interesting. I had specifically called to see if there would have been a conflict because John would have been political officer and I would have been econ and head of section. First they said no but then called back and said, yes, we couldn't do this. There were a number of possible jobs...you just go down the list...the bidding tool is useful because they do it by post so you just go down and look for two jobs in the same post. We were always able to identify four or five reasonable positions. India was a reasonable chance for me to go to a large econ section with a lot of issues. John was less thrilled about being staff assistant, but it was supposed to be for only one year after which he was to go into the political section.

Q: You went out to India in 1987. As you saw it and what you got from the embassy, what was happening in India internally and vis-a-vis the United States?

CARY: Relationships between the US and India are strained. A lot has to do with the non-proliferation situation. India has exploded a nuclear device and would not sign the non-proliferation treaty. Because of this we were very careful about what we would sell them in terms of technology transfer. They had a well established relationship with the Soviets and were receiving a lot of, particularly military and aviation equipment from them. The tension between India and Pakistan was such that the United States wanted to balance things off and made sure there wasn't the possibility for another war. Also, India was a leader of the non-aligned countries and almost as a given would say no to anything the US proposed in international forums. Rajiv Gandhi was prime minister. They were just in the first steps of economic liberalization which was of major concern to the US. Companies would just look at this 900 million people market and salivate saying, "If I only sold one whatever to each Indian, I would make it." And the Indian market was very, very closed. We were working to open up the Indian market, to liberalize it. There was an ongoing joint economic commission that didn't do much but would push a bit on liberalization each time it met. There were a number of issues that had political overtones, Union Carbide's involvement in the Bhopal disaster, for one.

Q: This was where a couple of thousand people died from the emissions of a chemical plant.

CARY: The litigation continued during my time there.

Also, Delhi was a huge mission and had agencies represented that I didn't even know had people overseas like the Library of Congress. There were a lot of DEA, Drug Enforcement Agency, people. The Afghan war was also going on. There was a lot going on. Then you also have the immigration issues, the brain drain and a lot of high tech exchanges going on.

Q: Would you explain the brain drain.

CARY: Indian schools produced large numbers of very well educated graduates with no jobs whatsoever in India. There is a large number who seek to immigrate to the United States. There is resentment that the US is taking the best from India; there is resentment that the United States gains from India's spending scarce money to educate her people and then India obtains no benefit from it. Of course, on the other side, there are no jobs for these people and it is a very frustrating situation for them.

Q: What was your impression of John Gunther Dean as an ambassador. He is one of the imperial ambassadors and had been around a good bit. People talked about him as difficult but effective as an ambassador. I was wondering with the Indians, he doesn't sound like the type that would work very well.

CARY: He left under duress from India while we were there. It was a very difficult situation. This was his fifth ambassadorial post. He had sort of done everything and been everywhere and his lack of contact with the Department and regular communication became a problem. He would basically make his own policy in many instances. Reagan nominated a replacement as a recess appointment, a person named John Hubbard, president emeritus of USC, who had been a "Scholars for Reagan" fund raiser. John Dean just did not believe that this was going to happen. They could not possibly replace him and he really did not accept it when it did happen. It was a very sad end of a career.

Q: He was of German birth, rather you might say Germanic and a very serious hard charging individual. It would strike me that this would not be a very good mix with the Indians, but one never knows about these things. What was your impression?

CARY: He had some very good relations with key people in the Indian government. He had a formal manner which I think appealed to some of the elite. He wore white shirts with French cuffs and a jacket through the hot season. In India from mid-March until October, nobody wears a tie. Everybody is in bush jackets. Most of the Indian government offices were not air conditioned. Dean was meticulous about his personal appearance and damn the weather.

I saw him on a number of instances with the Indian government bringing up mostly trade issues that were really of key interest to us. A big irritant was India's quota on the number of American films which could come in.

Q: The Indian film industry is the largest in the world isn't it?

CARY: Yes.

Q: It always seems to be the same movie, but...

CARY: Yes, after four hours of singing and dancing in wet saris.

So, Ambassador Dean could be very effective on certain issues when he chose to be. But, as I said, at that point he was just not being involved necessarily on all the issues and if he didn't like the instructions, he didn't necessarily follow them. This made it very difficult for the people on his staff. If the ambassador doesn't make the point it is very hard at a lower level for the point to carry any conviction whatsoever.

The ceremonial part, which is a big part of an Ambassador's job, went well because the Indians were very much into ceremony, as was John Gunther Dean. When we were going to post, somebody partly in jest told me to take my white gloves, because the Ambassador insisted on them in the receiving line. I took them but never used them. However, it was just a level below that in terms of being absolutely appropriate. He had very strong feelings about the importance of family. People whom he believed didn't respect family had a harder time. We were okay because we were married and had these two kids who were the same age as his grandkids. So, we did get to see him because John was his staff assistant. In fact, we saw him a lot. We were frequently invited to the residence where everything was served with white gloves.

But, during that time, it was very difficult because there was a real gulf between him and the Department. When you lead a mission saying we are going to do it my way, the rest be damned, it is hard on the staff, hard on the DCM as well.

Q: Did you see any conflict from your perspective or maybe from chats with people in other ones, with our embassy at Islamabad?

CARY: No. This again was an odd time because Arnie Raphael was killed at that time.

Q: He was our ambassador and blown up in an airplane with Zia, the President of Pakistan, an assassination.

CARY: And a number of other people. They never did quite figure out what really happened. And also because of all the US arms being channeled to the Afghan rebels, there was a special ambassador for Afghanistan which was covered out of Washington. So, you more or less had two ambassadors dealing with the same issue because for Pakistan at the time, the Afghan war was the biggest issue. There was a great divide...people would go over to Islamabad and say this is wonderful, it is so different from India. Muslim society is so much easier.

Q: There are Muslim societies and Muslim societies. But, as so often happens between these two embassies the main issue was not Kashmir or something of that nature?

CARY: No. Kashmir closed just as we were leaving. In fact, various parts of India were closed. Darjeeling was closed because of guerrilla fighting much of the time. You couldn't go into the Punjab because of internal problems. There were an awful lot of Indian internal problems at that point. A lot of terrorists, a lot of killing of each other, intercommunal violence. It was probably the most violent place I have ever lived. Every spark could strike something. There were just so many people. You stop to change a tire and all of a sudden you have 200 people and somebody shoves somebody else and you have a fight. It was much in contrast to the image of Gandhi's India, India had nothing to do with non-violence.

Q: Your responsibility was trade. I would think that this would be a very difficult job. One, the Indian is bureaucratic. Two, the Indian is just plain difficult to deal with in the business sense, for us. We are trying to break into something where the international politics aren't in our favor. They would prefer to have somebody else as their main customer. Could you tell me how you went about your work?

CARY: We had a lot of really difficult trade issues. The people I dealt with on a regular basis, particularly, Anwal Hoda, who headed their GATT section and is actually in the GATT secretariat now, was just superb. He had been doing GATT issues for 20 years. He had written a book on it. He knew the issues cold and if you just walked in, he was going to get you. He would quote sections of the agreement verbatim or of previous panel reports. His expertise meant he could say, 'don't you remember five years ago when we had this same dispute?'

We had a lot of ongoing trade disputes. Almonds was a big one issue, concerning the tariff for almonds. We finally did negotiate it successfully with the Indians. I found the Indian International Service, which is staffed on the basis of a highly competitive exam, had excellent people. So the working relationship was very good. I found they were just as sharp as they could be, did their homework, knew their issues and they knew what your position was going to be. Now, they didn't change their position, so negotiating was very frustrating. You would move one inch and then go back and debate it again when we thought we were ready to move on.

We negotiated a Science and Technology agreement. Intellectual property rights were a main concern for us both because there is an awful lot of piracy of US films and US music in India and we were trying to get the Indians to change the law. On the patent side we had major battles. India didn't provide product patent protection. For US pharmaceutical companies this was the main issue. In the GATT rounds, improving intellectual property was a key US goal and we were very far apart. That was really a lot of the nuts and bolts that I was working on.

You could see where the Indian position had come from, straight from the economic socialism of the planned economy. The state should be able to get some benefit, the individual shouldn't get all the money from an invention. Something that was good for mankind should be spread out. So, they allowed that if something was good, then anybody could make it. Overlaid on this system was an incredibly extensive and corrupt license system where they figured out if they needed ten thousand teaspoons they would give licenses to people to manufacture ten thousand teaspoons. So there was no competition and quality was absolutely miserable. But, they felt the Western system was not equitable and left people out, so they refused to provide the same kind of intellectual property protection that we thought was important, except in computers. The Indians excel in computer software. Indians hold many copyrights. They provide copyright protection for 50 years as opposed to the 17 of a patent. So, you could see things changed when their interests were at stake.

The other interesting thing about working with the Indians Services, both civil service and the international side, was they were very thinly staffed on many issues. The ambassador, the DCM, head of the econ section and I all had Hoda as a contact, because he was the person who made the decisions. The minister merely would confirm them. So in essence, the Indians did with one person what we did with 4.

Q: The politicians were pretty much politicians and that was what they did.

CARY: Right, and they really didn't get involved with these decisions at all. The Permanent Secretary made the decisions. So that was the person we had to deal with. In one way you might say that probably we were overstaffed if we had so many people dealing with one contact. It also worked on the foreign affairs side. There were two people basically on the America desk.

Q: You mentioned intellectual and patent rights. What weapons did we have to deal with them and what was the outcome of some of these issues?

CARY: Super 301, which is a US trade law saying that if countries don't provide adequate protection for intellectual property rights or use unfair trade practices, they can be cited and the US can take retaliatory action against them. And India was cited. We spent so much time going back and forth working with the Special Trade Representative's Office at USTR in terms of what unfair trading practice India should be cited for because there were lots of things to choose from. We were all absolutely shocked at the end. USTR cited India for unfair trade practices for the insurance industry, which had been nationalized some years earlier. We were surprised because none of the insurance companies had ever said they wanted back in the market. Under the terms of the Trade Act specific dates were set for when they must make progress hold talks. The Indians said they were not going to talk about this although they eventually did sit down and talk. There was a lot of posturing. It was watchlisted for intellectual property rights. As is often the case when the US acts under mandated fiat you get these laws passed which would restrict your action so somebody comes up with a way to maneuver around it. The watchlist was a maneuver to avoid citing a country, because once you have actually cited a nation then the incentive to negotiate is gone. You retaliate, they retaliate back and it is a trade war. So, what you want to do is keep the pressure on to keep things improving. India was one of 20 countries that were watchlisted the first year the trade law went into effect in 1988. There was an awful lot of back and forth with the desk, with USTR, who really was the office calling the shots on who was going to be listed. They were out on a regular basis negotiating various things.

Then, on the other side we had technology transfers because Reagan had signed an agreement with Rajiv that we were going to transfer technology. A sensitive issue was the super computer. The Indians really wanted to buy a Cray.

Q: The Cray being at that time the top of the line computer with tremendous capacity.

CARY: The Defense Department said over our dead bodies. But, we had the Presidential agreement to work it out. So, we negotiated with the Indian government, with Cray, and among the various concerned US agencies. We had members from the Defense Department and State and other interested agencies on how to put in safeguards so the Indians couldn't use it for any nuclear stuff. The Indians were also testing a long range missile. They weren't successful while I was there. They kept trying but it didn't quite work out. Their argument for being able to buy the Cray stemmed from the fact that they had already been successful in developing their own technology and US efforts to prevent missile and nuclear research were futile. "Listen, we know how to do this. We want it for weather patterns because the monsoon is the single most important element in the economy and weather patterns are so complex that you need a supercomputer to be able to work them out."

At the same time they were working on parallel processing to create a supercomputer. The concept was to put together enough computers, hooking them up together rather than the more complex way the Cray supercomputer worked and being able to do the same type of calculations with the same speed, which is what they needed.

There was an Indian project working on that and they were having some success. In the end, we finally did sign an agreement to sell them a Cray with safeguards on the Cray which nobody was really happy with but it allowed them to get the Cray. Cray was not at all happy about it because they had an ongoing involvement in something that they didn't feel they should be involved -- basically limiting the runs of the program so they could be monitored in a way which made it tedious and traceable to do the type of calculations needed for nuclear development. The agreement was a compromise about how you deal with technology transfer when politics has said we will do this now, how do we do it to keep our security risks well covered. In India at this time there were lots and lots of Russians everywhere doing everything. The Soviet Union was becoming less and less of a threat and a lot of our personnel were involved in watching Soviets than they were dealing with the Indians. A lot of people thought that the Indian trading relationship with the Soviet Union benefited India. The Indians got all of this good military stuff for selling the Soviets lousy consumer products.

Q: Looking at the Soviet Union and looking at what you are saying about India, I would have thought that the Indian would be basically a more sophisticated country in trading practices than the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union wouldn't have much to offer outside of military hardware.

CARY: Well, military hardware was what the Indians wanted. And they gave them a production line for the MiG fighter jet. That was important to the Indians just to have this type of thing. So they would sell them their pretty miserable consumer goods.

They sent people to the Soviet Union to study for a while and then brought them back and would work on projects. What was happening was the technology in India was advancing so rapidly. They were doing so much and the government was helping it. They were doing everything they could to bring these people in. The econ section got involved when Microsoft wanted to bring over about 50 Indian software engineers for a 3-5 year period. Of course, most of them were in their early '20s and there was the problem of whether or not they would return to India. We said, "Why don't you just do what a lot of other software companies were doing -- establishing companies in India and working through direct satellite hookups? You would have these engineers who were being paid very well by Indian standards who would be working on all problems for the US and would just go back and forth in instantaneous communication." But Microsoft didn't believe that would work. They had to come and learn the Microsoft philosophy and could only do that by living and working in the US at headquarters. Microsoft really wasn't used to "no". I think they got 35 visas out of 50, which is really very good. The Microsoft lawyers kept saying, "We know they will come back." We replied that they couldn't know that and couldn't guarantee it. It was raised at higher levels because obviously Microsoft was a very important US company and they didn't understand why the US government wasn't trying to help them. It became a fairly sensitive issue. We had to work with the consular section and, of course, you can not tell a consular officer what to do and to whom to issue a visa, nor was anybody inclined to do that. We all had a lot of respect for how they were making their decisions.

Q: Here the Indians were building up an army on Soviet equipment, and, of course, the Gulf War hadn't yet happened which was to happen a couple of years later, but certainly with Syria vs. Israel and all, Soviet military equipment just didn't seem to be as good as American equipment. Did you get a feeling that the Indians realized the difference in equipment?

CARY: Oh, absolutely, they wanted very much to buy US, but we just wouldn't sell them the level that they wanted.

Another issue which I was involved in, we called it “shake and bake,” and it was a combined accelerator vibration testing system used for testing satellites. India was building its own satellites. The whole television system was done through satellite. They wanted to launch on US vehicles. They wanted to adequately test the satellites before spending a lot of money to send them up. We got into games about what percentage of the satellite were US parts or Soviet parts. We spent more than three years in negotiation on that. And whether we would sell them radiation hardened chips to put in their satellites. That was another proliferation concern. Congress was very much tuned to the concerns and every time you talk about a sale of high technology equipment to India they would turn around and say, “No, you can’t.” During the negotiations the US team went through some of the Indian facilities where they were building their satellites to see how they would control the chips to make sure they could account monthly for each and every chip and prove where everyone of these things were. It was ridiculous, our policy on so many things, because they could be used for nuclear testing. Anything that could possibly be used for nuclear testing was really sensitive, overly so, in my view. Specially as we had gone through three or four rounds on these radiation hardened microchips and the industry guy who was on the negotiating team said, “You know, we don’t manufacture them separately anymore...all they have to do is buy them.” I am sure the Indian knew this too, but to the Indians it was the principle that was important...You will sell these to us because we are a worthy ally.

Q: Was there ever a time after the negotiations that your Indian colleagues would join you in a drink and let their hair down and tell you what they really felt about the situation?

CARY: The business community certainly did that. But officials, no. Nobody would ever criticize their government. They had no problems. The civil service just did not get involved in talking politics or anything. There was just no advantage in that. When you got into the internal troubles and human rights, it became much more emotional. Criticism was just not possible for officials. The reply to US criticism was, "You don’t understand what is going on.

Q: Did you get involved with the problem of child labor?

CARY: Yes.

Q: Will you talk about that?

CARY: The requirement to limit imports of goods was not yet part of US trade law, but we were very concerned about child labor and slavery because it is a major component in certain Indian industries...rug making is one of the major industries, but also mining. Child labor is just everywhere because the wage in India is a real problem. No one person earns enough money to support a family so everybody has to work including the kids and they do. It becomes a very emotionally charged issue. Parents say, “Well, we will starve if we send them to school. We can’t afford to send them to school. Although school is free you have to have books, shoes, clothes.” Most of India is hideously poor and people simply couldn’t do that. I would visit mills...they had a few top of the line textile mills that are all automated, but most of the textiles industry in India is hand loomed.. Little kids, 7, 8, 9 years old sit at the loom and work it or knot the rugs. Some worked outside, but a lot of it was just very unhealthful. There was no education and no future for these children. People would say that we have enough educated people, we don't need any more, we can't give jobs to the ones we have. And what else do you do to keep people alive? I certainly don't believe child labor is the answer, but they really did believe there was no alternative. If you were smart that was good and they would try if they had a smart kid and sacrifice everything to get that kid to school and to keep him in school.

The other sensitive social issue was dowry. It was illegal to charge dowry, which is what the bride's family gives the groom. It is a huge amount, two or three year's salary worth of presents. The bride, herself, will have her jewelry, which is hers and that doesn't go into the family. But 95 percent of the marriages are still arranged marriages and part of the negotiation is how much we are going to get...the set of dishes, clothes, stove, refrigerator, motorbike, television, etc. When the average Indian earns maybe $50 a month, a pretty decent middle class wage...some kids may earn $10 a month, which is possible. But the families would agree to this marriage with the payment of say $1000. The couple would be married and if the bride's family didn't come up with what they had promised, or if indeed they did come up with what they promised but the groom's family decided they wanted more, it was not at all infrequent, the bride's life could be in danger. At least one woman a day was burned to death in what were called dowry deaths. Either the dowry hadn't been paid or more usually, they wanted more and the bride's family couldn't do anything about it. They couldn't afford it and it was just unacceptable for her to go back home. She was stuck. It was just a horrible situation.

Q: Did that come up in our relationship at all?

CARY: Yes, in the human rights report. Another issue that came up as was female infanticide.

Q: I would have thought under this system that some people would cut off the problem at the beginning, no girls or something.

CARY: Yes. They used amniocentesis, for example.

Q: This is a way of testing for the sex of a child.

CARY: A study was made and out of 8,000 abortions cases following amniocentesis, 7,999 were female fetuses. It was unquestionably used for sex selection. If you didn't have a son, you were nothing. Some families, because they couldn't afford the dowries, would kill their baby girls. There was an awareness that this wasn't acceptable. The Indian press, which was very odd, very undisciplined, would report these things. They found it pretty awful. There was one case of suttee, which is a widow throwing herself on a funeral pyre of her husband, when we were there. It was very unusual though. A 19 year old girl. It had been illegal for years. The British had outlawed it and the Indian constitution doesn't allow it and it really hadn't been practiced for a long time. Now, granted, as a childless widow, her life was not worth a whole lot in a village. But, she indeed did commit suttee, suicide, and it raised a lot of attention. People would talk about whether this was a good thing or a bad thing. Whether she should be allowed to do it, more because it was such a miserable life for a childless widow. If you have sons you are okay and are going to be protected. But if you are childless there is nothing to protect you.

Q: As a female moving up to the higher ranks of a Foreign Service officer, what was your impression of the role of professional women in India at that time?

CARY: There were not very many, particularly at the higher ranks. This is ironic because India had been led by a female prime minister. There was a deputy secretary (relatively high rank) at the Foreign Office. I can't think of any women in trade ministry. There were a couple in commerce. Indian unmarried female foreign service officers couldn't live. I remember one woman in particular, who was the deputy secretary in the Foreign Office, and I asked her if she would go overseas and she said, "No, I can't really because I am not married and it is just unacceptable for a woman to live on her own. If I marry somebody in the foreign service, then that would work out and we could go and I could keep working." There was not a taboo about married women working, but she couldn't live alone. I thought that was an interesting thing. There were, certainly, some women who were out, but most not. Most of the women who worked were very poor women. They were hauling dirt in 115 degree weather in a sari. The poverty in India to me was much worse than Ethiopia. Although, you get to a certain level and how miserable is miserable, it is not a contest. But, there seemed to be an acceptance of it because, of course, with the Hindu philosophy, if you are an untouchable it is because that is what you deserved. So, there is no need for society to feel sorry for you because you have earned that position and you have to work to be better, to move up in the next reincarnation. It was very much a family orientated system where anything outside the family didn't matter. The rest of the world's troubles just really couldn't be your concern.

Now, to me, as a way of living, I found that very, very difficult. You understand that in a country with so many people where there isn't enough for everybody that the way people protect themselves is different. The common spaces were just filthy. People would spit, people would urinate in the corners and staircases. This in a government building. Then you would go into a lovely office, nicely appointed with carpets on the floor. It was a real land of contrasts.

Q: On the more frivolous side, but important to us, how did the clash between the movie moguls work out?

CARY: Well, Jack Valenti...

Q: Jack Valenti was the president, and has been for many, many years, of the American Movie Producers Association.

CARY: India imposed a quota of about 100 US films a year going into India. We felt that was just ridiculous. There shouldn't be any quota at all. The censors would eliminate an awful lot of what could go in because you could not show a kiss on the screen and no nudity. You could blow everybody to smithereens, that was okay, but no sex whatsoever was allowed. Certain films the director wouldn't allow any cuts so they weren't imported, but most producers or directors didn't care about what happened to a film in international, particularly "third-world" distribution. But, India had a strict quantitative limitation and we were able to get that increased and MPAA was happy. But, Jack Valenti was there every step of the way with letters and phone calls.

Q: Of course, you couldn't work reciprocity because nobody would cross the street to see an Indian movie.

CARY: That was our point. India can send as many films as it wants to the US. There are a few, obviously that have won best foreign film, but most of the 400 odd films are of limited or no interest to the US audience. I did go down to Bombay and call on the film studios, because the other movie issue was piracy. There was an awful lot of pirated copies of movies on video coming in and the Indian film makers didn't like this because it cut down on the people who went to see their films.

Q: We are talking about video tapes.

CARY: Yes. The other thing was pornography was coming in. I was surprised at the subterfuge that went on. The smugglers would put a regular movie for 15-20 minutes at the beginning of the tape and then put a pornographic film on after that with the idea that the censors were not going to sit there and really look through more than 20 minutes before they pass it.

Q: I would have thought there would be a thriving pornographic industry in India. They invented pornography in a way.

CARY: I can remember going with my mother to Khajuraho, which has erotic carvings all over the temples walls. The guide went on at great length about them. But, again, their idea of pornography is just very different. Sex isn't necessarily pornographic, although kissing is. But, the other is all in a married sense.

Q: Where there any other issues you had to deal with? What was life like in the embassy? Big embassies often have their problems.

CARY: It worked very well as a matter of fact. There was a science section...the people I worked with most frequency were the military side, the intelligence, and the commercial section. This was a Foreign Service Commercial post as well and they had three people there. We worked very, very well together. It is not unusual to have a good relationship between the econ section and the commercial section, but we worked very, very well together. They were very good about inviting me to functions or making sure that I met with the business community. Sometimes the economic and commercial our interests conflicted. With the technology side we were trying to restrict sales and the business community is trying to sell. The military side was also very cooperative.

Q: How did you find the Indian business community?

CARY: Extravagant. Here you had one of the contrasts of India with people lying on the streets begging and people literally dripping diamonds, emeralds and gold threaded saris stepping over them to go to parties. The business community had an awful lot of money and for certain things would spend it so lavishly. At the hotels we would be invited to just huge events, 5,000 people to a wedding. There was very conspicuous consumption. particularly of items which could not be legally imported. I remember being in on wealthy business man's home where he was pushing Johnny Walker Black I can remember somebody saying, "Oh, yes, somebody from one of the other embassies sold it to me." And, I thought, that is one of the reasons why we are closing down our commissary. We closed it to all non-Americans at that point.

New Delhi was really like Washington 20 years ago when no business people lived there. Most of the business community would come to lobby and commute by Air India or the internal airlines. Because of the security problems throughout the country you were physically searched every time you got on an airplane. It was very thorough. The business community would make "air dashes" up and down the country.

Q: You left there when John Hubbard was ambassador.

CARY: Yes. He was the political appointee that gives the bad name to political appointees. He was in his mid-'70s and had been involved with educational exchanges in India, so his appointment did make some sense. But he had the title of ambassador and had no interest at all in being an ambassador. He really didn't believe there were some things that he had to do as ambassador. It was in contrast to John Gunther Dean who took the business seriously. He might not say what you wanted him to say, but he did go see the people and say it. Hubbard approach was just..."are you kidding, I'm not going to do this." He liked the social aspects of it. He had more girl friends come and stay at the residence, as well as his ex-wife with whom he had a good relationship. You had to ask, "Who is at the residence today?" And he was not confirmed. He was a recess appointment who was not confirmed. So, he left after less than a year when the Bush administration came in.

Q: And you left about that time too, didn't you?

CARY: Yes. We left in the summer of 1989.

SUSAN KEOGH
Political Officer
New Delhi (1988-1990)

Mrs. Keogh was born and raised in the United Kingdom and educated at the University of Dublin, the University of Cape Town and the National Defense University. After several years of teaching English abroad, she married State Department Foreign Service Officer Dennis Keogh and accompanied him on his assignments in Mbabane, Bogotá, Niamey and Cape Town, meanwhile continuing her profession at these posts. After the death of her husband, Mrs. Keogh joined the State Department as a Foreign Service Officer and served several tours in Washington as well as in New Delhi, Asmara (Deputy Chief of Mission), Quebec City (Consul General), Lima, and LaPaz. Her assignments included Country Desk Officer, Public Affairs, Human Rights and Anti-Narcotics Officer. Mrs. Keogh was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2013.

Q: Well, then you moved on to India.

KEOGH: Yes.

Q: Where did you go in India and when?

KEOGH: We went to New Delhi from 1988 to 1990. I was in the Political Section, covering the human rights portfolio and multilateral affairs. I was also the Tibet person, the Bhutan person, and I covered India's regional foreign relations. It was a period when India was very closely allied with the Soviet Union. And so there was considerable tension in our relations.

Q: What was the political state of India when you got there?

KEOGH: It was a few years after Indira Gandhi was killed, after the terrible reprisals on Sikhs. There were frequent communal massacres and violence all across the Punjab. Then the war in Kashmir broke out. As the human rights officer I was not only reporting on bride burnings and child labor and those kinds of things. I was also trying to follow what was happening in Srinagar, where up to a million people were demonstrating in the streets because of the unresolved territorial dispute that had gone on since 1947.

Q: Because it broke out into war, was there any solution possible?

KEOGH: Well, a temporary UN mandate put most of Kashmir under India pending a referendum. Of course this never happened and is still unresolved. I didn't get the sense that the Kashmiris wanted to be either part of Pakistan or India, they wanted their autonomy. But it became bloody as they took to the streets and the Indian Army and police tried to suppress the demonstrations.

Q: How did you know about the situation there?

KEOGH: One source was close to home. Unwittingly, just prior to the conflict breaking out, I had arranged a vacation for my three older children in Srinagar! Having recently had another child, I could not travel with them, so they went on a package tour with a guide that included Ladakh – the 'roof of the world' – and a house boat on the Dal Lake. They flew up to Ladakh and climbed mountains, got altitude sickness and generally had a memorable trip. They were coming down in a taxi from Ladakh to Srinagar when a lot of army officers started riding in their taxi -- they knew something was up. Small towns en route had pictures of the Ayatollah Khomeini everywhere. When they got to Srinagar the demonstrations were starting. They were able to get on a plane and leave. They went to the RSO (regional security officer) to tell him their story. And after that, the Embassy put a travel ban on Srinagar. It was really the beginning of the conflict.

Q: Who was the ambassador at the time?

KEOGH: John Gunther Dean, then William Clark.

Q: I would think being a human rights officer in India at almost any time would be difficult because the Indians like to preach to the United States and the United States likes to preach to the Indians.

KEOGH: The Indian Government was very sensitive to outsiders criticizing their handling of 'internal affairs.'

Q: Would you go down and talk to the police commissioner or something?

KEOGH: Well, initially I had to find out what was going on. So I read the newspapers and spent a lot of time developing contacts and talking to human rights lawyers and to press people and to women's groups. Later on, to dissident Kashmiri policeman and others who were worried about the situation there and would unburden themselves because they were trying to stop the violence. As the human rights officer you meet some of the finest people in the society, some real fighters for truth and justice. One person I met early on was Ravi Nair - he was a young human rights lawyer who documented human rights abuses. He'd been in prison 26 times, mostly under Indira Gandhi - an outspoken and fearless advocate. He wanted India to be a better place that protected its people.

Q: Did you find that you had problems within the embassy? It doesn't help relations when the government knows that something's going to be published in the world about their internal affairs. And I would think that the elders from the Political Section would say lay off, you're not helping.

KEOGH: The political section worked closely together and helped each other. At that time our relations with India were quite complicated anyway. I never felt anybody was trying to suppress or divert anything.

Q: It's almost like you're saying we didn't really care. I mean the Indians were snuggling up to the Soviet Union so we didn't really have to play nice with them.

KEOGH: Not at all. Everyone understood the strategic importance of India in the region and in the world. There was huge concern about instability in that region, as there still is. The conflict in Kashmir and confrontation with Pakistan were only two areas of concern – the Russians were leaving Afghanistan, harassed by the Mujahadeen, the conflict with the Tamil Tigers was going on to the south, relations with Nepal and Bangladesh were shaky. It was a dangerous period.

Q: What about China? The border was not resolved, was it? Still isn't.

KEOGH: No. There's still a stand-off near the McMahon Line. Both sides patrol and have built infrastructure. My only involvement was when I had the Tibet brief. I used to go up by train from Delhi to Dharamsala where there were about 35,000 Tibetans. Refugees were still coming all the time from Lhasa. I was restricted to talking about human rights and refugee issues. Not politics, because the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan community were allowed to stay in India on a refugee basis. They had to be careful not to be overtly political because the Indians didn't want China to react.

Q: The Dalai Lama has been played up as a very benevolent personage. What was your impression of him?

KEOGH: He's a great man. While he has fought for Tibetans' freedom and welfare, he's a realist - he recognizes that autonomy within China is the only option. He was never, as the Chinese said, a "splitist." Some younger Tibetans want to push for independence, but that's not the Dalai Lama's position. Underlying his globe-trotting public image, he's plain. He sees himself as a simple monk. His preference for a separation between the political and religious leadership has now happened, so he is freer to teach and promote human happiness.

Q: Well, what was your impression of Indian treatment of the Tibetans?

KEOGH: They treated the Tibetans carefully. They had freedom to live and work and practice Buddhism. They set up their own schools. They had their own structures, like a parliament. The Indians walked a fine line. But they basically did the right things by the Tibetans.

Q: What did you do when you left India?

KEOGH: We came back to the U.S. in 1990. I was to be the Deputy Public Affairs Advisor for the Middle East Bureau. Ten days before I started, Saddam Hussein had invaded Kuwait. I was one of the people who spoke to the press and prepared guidance for the Seventh Floor and did public speaking during the First Gulf War.

LOUISE TAYLOR
India Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1988-1990)

Ms. Taylor was born and raised in Illinois and educated at Wellesley College, George Washington University and Boston University. After joining the Foreign Service of USIA, Ms. Taylor served in Washington and abroad in the field of Cultural and Information. Her foreign posts include Moscow, Kabul, Tel Aviv and Rabat. She also served in Washington as USIA Desk Officer for Afghanistan/Pakistan and for South Asia and as Policy Officer for Eastern Europe and Newly Independent States. Ms. Taylor was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: In '88, you left.

TAYLOR: We did.

Q: Whither?

TAYLOR: We came back here. We were exhausted. Four years in Israel is just exhausting. It wipes you out. I had been on the go for four straight years without ever sitting down and catching my breath. So we came- (end of tape)

Q: You were saying you had moved into the...

TAYLOR: I took up India. I went back to South Asia after the Middle East. I think many people feel after four years in a place like Israel you have to get away from those issues. My agency wanted me to take a position that was more directly involved with Israel. I just felt I had to step away from this from a while. It was too intense. It was too all encompassing. It just dominates your life. My heart was left back in South Asia from my Afghan days. The India desk came open. In those days, it involved India and Sri Lanka. India was our largest country program in the entire world, perhaps exceeded by Germany by one or two officers. Otherwise, India was our most enormous program with the most resources. I wanted that challenge. I wanted to work on those issues again. The other little country that came with it was Sri Lanka. I had never been to Sri Lanka. I got to make a visit out there. There was conflict there even at that time. The Tamil Tigers was already geared up for a big fight – still is. I just had the most extraordinary trip to Sri Lanka. I had never realized, small though it is, what a remarkable vibrant society of well educated people with lots of different things to say and opinions on everything, very artistic, very dynamic, on the move. Your heart just goes out to them. Here are these people with all this talent and they don't have the desperate situation that the Arabs and the Israelis do yet they're fighting it out in the same way. I've never been to Ireland, but I assume that I would have a similar reaction there.

So, I spent two years working in Washington, '88-'90, when South Asia was still within the NEA family fold. Years later, when I came back to South Asia, South Asia had been spun off from NEA in the Department of State, which I think is a terrible mistake. I think that at the time in the late '80s and all through the '80s, NEA had been such a strong bureau and it benefited from people serving everywhere from Bangladesh to Morocco and the flow through of people and officers with this kind of experience just strengthened all of us. I was in a position as India country officer – I don't know how it fell to me, but I was the USIA NEA representative to the NEA weekly meetings over at State. This was when USIA was still an independent agency. We were by this time, thanks to Charlie Wick, down on Fourth Street, which is truly the end of the earth. Charlie had moved us out of this wonderful address that we had a block from the White House on Pennsylvania Avenue. Due to his machinations with his real estate buddies, he had gotten us into this slum.

Q: Why did he do that?

TAYLOR: My feeling is that he had this personal business relationship with the guys, the Antonelli brothers, the famous Antonelli brothers, who owned all the parking lots in Washington at one time and had rather shady construction deals. They owned this building that we moved into. Charlie sold us and everybody else on the idea because of two things. He said, "Well, it will bring us closer to the Voice of America," which we still owned at that time. And it will consolidate all of the little USIA annexes which were around town. Our television studios were here. There were various other people around, just as the State annexes are all over town. Well, we were all supposed to be in this one building. Of course, that never happened. Up until consolidation with the State Department, we were still all over the place. Of course, the building turned out to be an immediate slum. It started falling apart. The towel racks in the ladies room fell off the wall within the first week that we moved in. It was just a horrible place. Plus, it was in the middle of nowhere. It turned out also that USIA had been on the GAO's list to move into some new building someplace within a five year period sometime in the '80s. At one point, that was to have been what is now called the Reagan Building. At another point, it was to have been some other nice new building in a better location. In any case, he sold us out on that. There are still people on Fourth Street. It's between C and D on Fourth Street.

Q: There is no restaurant nearby.

TAYLOR: There is a McDonald's [laughter]. It's the pits. You greet a foreign visitor in the USIA building – and we have many high level foreign visitors who come to visit us – and you tromp them through this lobby and then down these dismal hallways to offices. Of course, the place right now is half deserted because most people have moved to the State Department. It's sort of like a tomb. Then you walk in the lobby and there is literally a McDonald's right in the lobby of a foreign affairs building with the smell of cheeseburgers wafting out. It's no more than 30 feet away. If you have the occasional Arab visitor that thinks that the hegemonic power has its McDonald's everywhere, this certainly proves it to them.

Q: In the '88-'90 period, how were relations from your perspective with India?

TAYLOR: I have always felt that we have never paid enough attention to India. The Indians know this. They are a very talented, huge country with potentially great influence. All of my briefing papers used to say, "India has the largest emerging middle class of any country in the world. Some 250 million people qualify as the middle class," probably bigger now with the whole Internet explosion, which has benefited India greatly. They have one of the most talented, educated peoples in the world. We have the oldest democracy. They have the biggest democracy. We have kept this country on the margins forever. While I was India country officer, USIA had lots of money. We were always looking for more; but we had a lot of money. We had a lot of people in four different places in India. We had a lot of programs going on. There were quasigovernmental entities like the Indo-U.S. Subcommission on Education and Culture... The Smithsonian had a number of subgroups working on special projects in India. Everybody in town was doing something special related to India. It was really more than I could keep up with as the country officer for India. Because we did have money, you were only limited by your time and by the staff that you had. I don't want to say we had everything, but we could do a lot. I had the feeling that I was almost as overwhelmed as I was in Israel. All of a sudden I inherited Pakistan, Afghanistan, and Bangladesh, and Nepal. The officer who had those countries went off to language training for a full year. This was a sudden thing. There was no one to replace him for another year's cycle. So, I had all of these countries. Of course, Pakistan and India were the two big ones. But little Bangladesh was very active. Our people out in Bangladesh had a tremendously active program going on. Keeping up with all of this was a strain for me. Nevertheless, it was a very exciting job. It was terrific. I learned so much.

R. GRANT SMITH
Deputy Chief of Mission
New Delhi (1988-1991)

R. Grant Smith was born on Long Island in 1938. He graduated from Princeton University in 1960. He later earned a master's degree from Columbia University. He joined the Foreign Service in 1963 and held positions in Pakistan, Nepal, and India. In 1995 he began his ambassadorship in Tajikistan. Ambassador Smith was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: Well, you went out to India as DCM in 1988?

SMITH: Right.

Q: Who was your ambassador there?

SMITH: I served under three ambassadors there, but for the first few months I was there it was John Gunther Dean, and then we had Jack Hubbard. They had somebody there in an interim appointment for 11 months. And then Bill Clark for the end.

Q: Bill Clark. Okay. Well, we'll pick this up in 1988, when you go out to be DCM to John Gunther Dean. Great.

SMITH: Okay, good. Thank you.

Q: Today is August 5, 1999. Grant, you were in India as DCM?

SMITH: As DCM.

Q: From when to when?

SMITH: August, 1988, till the summer of 1991.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

SMITH: Well, we had three different ambassadors - John Gunther Dean when I arrived; Jack Hubbard for eleven months; and then Bill Clark.

Q: How did you get the job?

SMITH: I'd been country director, and I think probably if you look through, run a statistical analysis, you'll find that a fair number of times the country director becomes a DCM in a significant-sized country. And in fact, since I'd been working with John Gunther Dean as country director, it was sort of logical that I'd move on to be DCM.

Q: How did things work out between you and John Gunther Dean? He was a gentleman who's had about every assignment. He's had many major and very, very difficult assignments, including Cambodia at the time -

SMITH: I was only there for a couple of months when he was there. I arrived in August, as I recall, and he left in September or October, came back to the States, was here for a month or so, came back and sort of packed out, and left in November - would be my recollection. But there wasn't much overlap in the field, and if you want to talk to someone who was his DCM in the field, you ought to talk to Gordon Streehan, who was my predecessor in Delhi.

Q: Where is he now?

SMITH: He's retired. I believe he's at the Carter Center, along with another former DCM there, Craig Creekmore - and Harry Barnes.

Q: Yes, I've tried to get hold of them all to do something. There was some controversy about Dean. You don't want to talk about that. I have talked to John Gunther Dean, and he's obviously very, very bitter about this.

SMITH: Yes, he is.

Q: And I'm trying to do an oral history with him because it's -

SMITH: I would say that one thing was very clear that I can say very honestly - that he wasn't prepared for and hadn't accepted the idea of retirement. He's somebody who expected to and wanted to continue to be in the traces - something we all have to reflect on - but he obviously took it very hard when Jack Hubbard's appointment was announced. I remember one day in Washington, before I came out, I was talking to Jack Hubbard, and John Gunther Dean came into the office and looked at Jack Hubbard and said, when I introduced him, "I know who you are. You're the one who wants my job."

Q: Who was Jack Hubbard, or who is Jack Hubbard - at that time?

SMITH: Jack Hubbard had been in the AID mission in India in the 1960s, as I recall. He's an educator. He had, as I recall, helped set up the agricultural universities. He had come back. His most recent incarnation before coming to India as ambassador had been as president of USC [University of Southern California].

Q: So a major figure.

SMITH: A major figure - major figure in southern California, and obviously knew the republican leadership, the Reagan leadership from southern California. But he had been to India, back and forth to India, maintained ties there. He was involved with the Indo-U.S. Subcommittee on Education and Culture. He was a member of that, so he continued an association with India and was certainly very happy to come back, but didn't have much background in diplomacy.

Q: 1988, when you arrived in India - how would you state our relations were with India at that point?

SMITH: Well, as I said when we were doing the last segment, I have some trouble differentiating exactly what happened when, because I went from country director to DCM, and remembering exactly what the situation was. But this was a period when we were strengthening our relations with India. I think some people saw the whole period as trying to "wean India away from the Soviets," some people would say. I think a better way to describe it would be that India was beginning - and much more was done later - economic liberalization, which was sort of unleashing the Indian economic and entrepreneurial abilities so we were building a relationship in this period looking to the future, trying to have a relationship with India and have a relationship with Pakistan that was not determined by our relationship with the other. And in the case of India it had a lot to do with high-tech, the beginnings of some work with India on high-tech in the military area - not assistance, but sales - and a broadening and deepening of our relationship in general during this period. This was a time, when I arrived there in '88, of a Congress government, and it was Rajiv Gandhi.

Q: Who was the prime minister?

SMITH: Rajiv Gandhi at that time. Mrs. Gandhi was assassinated in '84. Rajiv was elected. He was prime minister when I arrived in '88. I think we still saw Rajiv Gandhi and Benazir in Pakistan as providing opportunity for these two countries to get on to a new generation, a new era. It turned out it didn't work that way. Both of them were probably better politicians than they were leaders, but that was our view at the time. We'd had the Aditi exhibit here in 1985, as I recall. He'd come for that. He came to the United States again in 1987, arrived on the day, "Black Monday," when the stock market fell so much? That was the day he arrived on one of his visits. So there was certainly a better relationship, but as always in India, there are people who are very suspicious of the United States, who remember the past, who are looking for any reason to get at us.

Q: When you got there, you were country director, so you were intimately involved -

SMITH: Not only that, I had been political counselor until '84. I had been political counselor, country director, and back as DCM.

Q: Were you beginning to think of yourself as an Indian hand, somehow?

SMITH: Yes, actually, for my own career it probably would have been better to go somewhere else, not to be so closely associated with India, and I think that some people in Delhi, in the embassy, felt that there was micro-management of the Political Section coming from the front office, which was sort of hard to get away from because I knew the issues pretty well.

Q: But when you arrived there, being on the ground, did you sense any difference in sort of the attitude of the embassy and how things were going that what you had when you were political counselor or working from the Desk?

SMITH: Well, of course, I'd been out there a couple of time when I was on the Desk. I think that I did sense a better relationship. I'm not sure I can say a better relationship than was there in '82-84, but certainly a different relationship from what was there in the '70s when I'd been there. And there had been a gradual improvement, and there was the beginning of this economic liberalization. I can remember fairly soon after I arrived I spoke at a conference sponsored probably by the Chamber of Commerce on economic issues, and one of the other speakers was Abid Hussein, who had been a member or chairman of the planning commission and was later Indian ambassador here in the United States, and quite a proponent of liberalization. And he told me afterwards... Well, first of all, he spoke, and I still remember what he said, talking about liberalization. He said, "We have to open the windows. A few flies will come in, but we need the fresh air." And afterwards he came up to me, and he said, "Well, what you said was very good, but you really aren't enthusiastic enough." So you had the beginnings of this liberalization, which of course really took off in the '90s, and as a result there had been quite a change in India's international economic situation. If you look at India's reserves right now, it's in the billions of dollars. They're very very comfortable, whereas in the '80s and certainly before that it was very close. It was a much dicier thing.

Q: Well, when you're talking about liberalization, we're really talking about opening up markets and people coming in -

SMITH: Well, you're talking both about that and about opening up the domestic economy, because India had had an economy that was built by Nehru and the other leaders who had been educated at the London School of Economics, Fabian socialist influenced, very statist, many state corporation, many controls. The basic philosophy was that the government would license factories to produce x -number of refrigerators, and that would be all. Therefore, the economic competition in the country was to get the license. And you can imagine a lot of pressure and money exchanged hands in trying to get the license, but once you got the license you were home free. You didn't have to provide service or quality or anything, because this was all controlled, with the government deciding how many refrigerators should be produced. And they were beginning to liberalize this. In the late '80s or early '90s you saw the beginning of this. Bajaj, which is the maker of motor scooters, maybe the largest in the world, but you find their motor scooters in Southeast Asia, many places. They suddenly had to set up a marketing department, for the first time. And this was going on in other industries. The industrialists had to begin to worry about quality and service for the first time. You had young entrepreneurs coming up. You began to have young entrepreneurs coming back from the United States, who'd been here as engineers, scientists, setting up companies in India. You began to have... I saw it in the times when I was there, this having been the third or fourth time that I was there. When I was in India, back in the '50s and the Indian era in the '60s, every college student's main ambition was to become a member of the Indian administrative service or the Indian Foreign Service. That was the best thing to do. By the time I was there, in the early '80s, the objective was probably to join a large Indian company. But by the last time I was there, this last time, it was to start up a company, and I actually saw this going on and talking to students.

Q: I've never served in India, but I have pictures of it because at one point I served in Dhahran and I used to go over to Bahrain and see sort of the Indian Civil Service type thing working there, and I'd think of huge offices full of overhead fans or something and piled high with papers stitched together -

SMITH: The term "red tape" was invented there.

Q: -I mean, paper, paper, paper, and this was mostly civil servants who were doing these things. You're talking about one very big rice bowl that's getting broken, as far as government control over these things. Were you seeing this as a sort of a major battle within the Indian-

SMITH: It was a major battle, and actually, the person who started undoing it was one of the people who put the controls in place. I think I may have mentioned that before - L. K. Jah. But yes, there was a major conflict, and you would see it in Indian bureaucrats trying to retain control. You'd also see it in the state corporations, and you would hear them arguing, "Well, we can do it as well as anybody else." And the area where I think liberalization has been most difficult in India has been getting rid of those state corporations, particularly the ones that are money-losing operations. And this is not just India; it's been true in Latin America and other places around the world, one of the most difficult things to do. But in India, you always did have a private sector; there was never just a state sector. For instance, in steel, there was government steel, but there was also private steel, and I think what's happened recently is that you've had increasing willingness of the government to allow the private part of that to expand, and in many areas - computers being an example - the private sector is dominant, not the government. There may be some government corporations in there - I'm not sure whether there still are - but the private sector is dominant. During the same period you had the first linkup between Texas Instruments - getting permission to put a satellite dish into Bangalore and to begin using Indian programmers in India, rather than having them- (end of tape)

So you had the beginnings of the Indian software in this period. And of course now they're a dominant factor or a very important factor in international software.

Q: Did the embassy crank up to be quite aggressive in promotion of American investment there but American sales there with this opportunity, or did we... How did we work this, or was this really something that we said, "Here it is, fellows, come on in," and to the private sector?

SMITH: In most case, the American companies which were coming in, were coming in with an Indian partner. We were aggressive in some areas, where there was a case of government contracts - not always successfully. We were very aggressive... One of the biggest issues there, which was only been resolved and not completely resolved up to now, was intellectual property rights, and this was an area where we were, I think, tough and aggressive. It basically involves pharmaceuticals and some chemicals.

Q: And how about computer type things? That hadn't come yet?

SMITH: The Indians, on copyright, are okay, because the Indians are the world's largest producer of films, and they make something over 700 a year - two a day - and they realized very early that copyright protection was very much in their interests. And as I recall they quickly extended it to computer things as well. So copyright was not particularly an issue. What was an issue was this pharmaceuticals.

Q: Was that a philosophical difference? I know in some places the feeling is if this medicine protects people, and you charge big money for it, you are cheating humanity, really.

SMITH: It is a philosophical difference, and the Indians would make several arguments. We may have discussed some of this on the last tape, but one of the arguments was the one you made - that the Indians saw it important to have basic medicines widely available at a reasonable price. Now this is something that I'm sort of sympathetic about because serving in Francophone Africa, a shot of penicillin there when I was there was one month's salary for a lot of people, whereas in India, basic pharmaceuticals actually are quite reasonable. Another India argument was basically the "infant industry" argument: that they need this to get going, and other countries, including the United States, had only introduced product-patent protection very late in the game. The issue is product-patent protection versus process-patent protection. The Indians provided process-patent protection but not product-patent protection on pharmaceuticals. However, we argued that it was in the Indians' interest to go into product-patent protection because India itself was getting into the realm - it was developing things - and if it really wanted to have a strong pharmaceutical industry, in addition to having those high-tech more recent pharmaceuticals available in India (which had not been available in India because foreign companies had been unwilling to sell them there because of the patent protection issue, so if you need something that is fairly new, you can't get it in India), but we argued that the Indians should start providing product patent, because then they could develop their own R&D and really develop their pharmaceutical industry, not as a derivative but as a real industry. Of course, this has been resolved through the WTO.

Q: World Trade Organization.

SMITH: Right. This resolution was not bilateral between the U.S. and India, but multilateral in the WTO sense. I don't think the Indians have quite worked out all the details yet, but this was a major issue during the period I was there. It wasn't just pharmaceuticals; there were a few agricultural chemicals that were also an issue. And some American companies, as a result, just refused to have any dealings with India. FMC was an example, felt very strongly about it. And I couldn't argue with them. So we'd push very hard on this area. We also pushed very hard in trying to get American companies into the high-tech area with the government, particularly with the Indian military. The Indians were trying to develop a new light combat aircraft. Northrop with memoranda of understanding, and Northrop was working with them, with their issues of releasability of particular kinds of technology, composite technology in particular, and how far were we willing to go. And this was an issue with Washington, but it was also an issue in India because, obviously, they were foreign competitors here. But the big American companies, like Enron was beginning its work then, and others, often didn't need any particular American help. They were well established. A number of American companies had very good joint ventures there - Cummings Diesel, for example, has a longstanding agreement with a very fine Indian company, as I recall. Some American companies have very good arrangements with Tata. So there are some longstanding joint ventures there that are quite successful.

Q: Well, did you find at least at the ministerial level and all there was a tendency to try to get the companies to deal more with the European Union or something, I mean just a natural reaction against the United States?

SMITH: To some extent. Again, I think we touched on a little bit of this last time. But the Indians don't want to put all their eggs in one basket, so when it comes to buying aircraft or having licensing agreements in sensitive areas, they're going to want to deal with the Europeans and with the U.S., not separately. In some areas, the Europeans had a definite advantage because of their more lax laws and regulations on bribery. Our law on this is quite unique.

Q: It's getting more universal, I think.

SMITH: In fact, there were some major scandals in India over alleged bribe payments, and one of my arguments with the Indian government used to be, "Gee, if you bought from the United States, you can be pretty sure that there haven't been any bribes because you know that an American company that bribes is going to get taken to court in the United States; whereas in France, French companies can deduct those - they're tax-deductible - not only they're legal, they're tax-deductible." But just as we had some longstanding arrangements, obviously some European companies had longstanding arrangements in certain areas, plus, some of the Indian leaders, coming from... By then it was many years after Independence, 40 years after Independence, but you still had some leaders who had been educated in the UK and had a more European background. It varied from individual minister to individual minister, and of course the government changed several times when I was there, so we were dealing with different ministers on different occasions.

Q: By this time, the whole political spectrum - we've mentioned it before - it really was a democracy, wasn't it? I mean, with all its warts and all that. There were genuine elections.

SMITH: In India there are genuine elections, and if you judge the success of a former colony in the field of democracy by its ability to change government twice - not just once, but twice - India actually passed that, has more than passed that test, and while we were there that time, it changed several times. In fact, in this period, you saw the first Congress Party defeat - the big defeat was in 1977 - and there had been a gradual erosion of Congress Party power, and beginning by 1989, you saw the beginning of coalition governments, which is what you've had continuously since then.

Q: Did you find that the Political Section was able, had good contacts?

SMITH: Well, you'd always like them to have better contacts, but yes, I think that they had good contacts.

Q: It's a hard country to cover, isn't it, because of both the geography, and some of the parties are so ethnically or religiously oriented, or whatever you want to call it? Does that make a difference? That makes it more difficult to sort of understand.

SMITH: Perhaps. People are generally fairly accessible. There isn't a problem... The problem is more of manpower to do all of this than accessibility. We had, of course, if you went back to the '60s, we had had a larger political section. We had had political officers in all of our consulates. By this time I don't think we had political officers in any of our consulates left. Our consulate in Bombay was a consul general, and there was one political-economic officer, as I recall, and then basically consular. And Madras was similar. So we had very little political work being done in the consulates, except by the consuls general themselves.

Q: How did you find relations with the Foreign Ministry? Was it the Ministry of Foreign Affairs?

SMITH: Ministry of External Affairs.

Q: Ministry of External Affairs. Did you find that this was sort of the last bastion of the old India that you'd known and loved?

SMITH: Well, certainly, there were people of that kind there, and I had personal relationships with a lot of people in the Foreign Ministry going back for by then more than 15 years, which gave me an ability to call people up and do business on the phone, which I always consider the indicator of efficiency in dealing with the Foreign Ministry, the ability to be able to call up and do your business on the phone. And yes, I was to that point with a lot of people - again, personal relationships going back a long time with some of them. But yes, there were people like that who were in the Foreign Ministry and are still active there.

Q: I'm talking really about a visceral dislike of the United States and its policy, not of Americans. This '88-91 period is very interesting because the death-knell of the Soviet Union came about in this time. It didn't cease until '92, but the Wall came down in '89 and all this happened. How did this affect the Indians? How were they watching, because the Soviet Union had been their partner?

SMITH: I think that you really ought to ask the person who was there next, because I think the impact became much more evident after '91 or late in '91. Clearly the relationship with the Soviet Union had been important for India. It had been important, I would say, in three different areas. One was the Soviets' political support in the Security Council; secondly was the military supply relationship to the Soviet Union; and third was economic. Well, the economic relationship was not important by then. The military supply relationship continued, but the Indians had always wanted to manufacture themselves whenever they could, and of course, that was an opportunity for us to have a relationship that would be different from the traditional relationship we've had with developing countries where we've sold them end-items. In the case of India, this was an opportunity to have... And when I talked about "weaning them away" from the Soviets, you could do that by developing a relationship with them, helping them make their own military equipment so they wouldn't buy from the Soviets. And actually, that was much preferred on their part, so this was something they were already doing, and I think that as a result, the military part of the relationship with the Soviets had already become less important. But I think psychologically the breakup of the Soviet Union was important for them, and I think they can still count on Russia in the Security Council, probably, for the veto on Kashmir issues if necessary.

Q: What about the Indian Communist Party? Was that important? Where did that stand during this time?

SMITH: Well, the Indian Communist Party, of course, had split, and there were two Communist Party, or more, depending on how you counted, but two main Communist Party - the Communist Party of India and the Communist Party of India Marxist. That split had occurred in the early 1960s and was a well-established split. The Communists participated in governments or, in one case, ran the government in various parts of India. It was very interesting to watch the Marxists, the CPIM, which was not allied with the Soviet Union, became the government in West Bengal. I don't remember exactly what year it was the government, but it was the government during this period. And they were obviously being corrupted by being in government, because suddenly they were getting interested in foreign investment and efficiency of government and various other things that we would say would be good. And of course, the CPIM and politicians in West Bengal in general, you often find if you look at the politicians that they are London-trained barristers; and that was true in the case of some of the CPIM also, I believe. The CPI, the pro-Moscow Communists, could always be relied on to be very critical of the United States.

Q: Did we have much contact with them?

SMITH: Oh, we used to go see them, talk to them. I can remember one time - and again, I don't remember whether this was in '84 or '88-89, I went around and called on the head of the CPIM. In fact, he was a historic figure. He'd been blowing up trains in India in the 1940s - you know, a real historic figure - and we sort of heard indirectly from their intelligence people that a few weeks later he said, "What was Grant Smith going over to CPIM headquarters for?" I'd done it very openly, intentionally, because he was a fascinating person to talk to. And when they had the government in West Bengal, our consul general in West Bengal talked to them. In fact, we had quite an interest in maintaining a dialogue with them. The CPI was a little bit more difficult, but yes, we talked to them.

Q: We've talked before about it, but during this time, the Tamil business, in dealing with sort of the ethnic groups in India in this period?

SMITH: Well, you had had by now the Congress Party was weak in all of the south, and you had state parties in leadership positions or coalition leadership positions in all of the states of the south. And in some of the states you'd have two state parties vying, Tamil Nadu being an example. But this was true in all of the states of the south, that the state-based, linguistically-based parties had become very significant. And that's part of the change in India that's taken place - the decline of the Congress Party, the increasing strength of these state-based parties in the south, the increase of the strength of really caste-based parties in the north. So it's quite different from the post-Independence period, when Congress was totally dominant. And there has been a steady erosion of Congress power.

Q: Sort of an overall question - we were helping militarily, and of course there's always the Pakistan-Indian issue, but was there any concern on our part about a movement for a greater India? I mean, India was always talking about exerting its influence in the Indian Ocean and all. Were we concerned, looking down the pike, India might become a real problem to us in Southeast Asia or South Asia?

SMITH: I don't think the U.S. government as a whole was, but when you asked questions like that, you often had to ask, well, who is we and who is they? I think the U.S. Navy may have been somewhat concerned, and certainly perhaps groups in India were more active in these areas than others. However, in the last interview, we talked about India and Sri Lanka, and I don't remember all the details or the dates, but India had brokered this agreement in 1987, which we thought could lead to an end of the Sri Lanka problem. In fact, it led to an Indian intervention in Sri Lanka, and Indian military force in Sri Lanka.

Q: When did they go in?

SMITH: I don't remember the exact dates.

Q: But I mean, which watch were you on? Were you on the Desk or were you-

SMITH: I don't remember whether it was late '87 or in '88. I don't remember the exact time, but what happened was that they got very badly burned. Sri Lanka was India's Vietnam, many people say. And you could talk to Indian officers coming back from Sri Lanka who were really in a state of shock - as we might have found some coming back from Vietnam - over going up to little old ladies who would blow up and blow them up, suicide bombers. So they went into Sri Lanka, they brokered the agreement thinking that... Rajiv was very full of himself, thinking that he could persuade the militants to abide by this agreement. That didn't work, and they went in with their military force to deal with the militants, and that didn't work either. And then they ultimately withdrew. That was, in a sense, they were probably less likely to try this kind of adventure in the future, even if they were building up their naval forces and their ability. And they do talk about force projection ability. But after Sri Lanka, the incentive for this kind of thing was somewhat less in India, I think.

Q: Was there any particular concern at this time about events in Burma, Indonesia, or any of those places?

SMITH: Not particularly.

Q: I mean the Indian concern. Were they talking about meddling?

SMITH: No, no, no. Their focus is Pakistan, China, the immediate area - Afghanistan - because this was the period where you had the Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan, the fighting between the factions, the fall of Najib, and the fighting between the factions. Actually, there were differences of opinion within the Indian government about what was going to happen in Afghanistan, one group saying Najib would survive, another group saying he wouldn't survive.

Of course they saw Afghanistan through the Pakistan prism, not through the Russian prism, as we did. The events that involved us with India that you may have heard - if you've interviewed Bill Clark, you've probably heard about this-

Q: Tom Stern interviewed him.

SMITH: - the Iran-Iraq War and the Indian position on the Iran-Iraq War, because for one thing, governments changed in India during this period so it made it very complicated, but India had a relationship with Iraq, as part of the nonaligned relationship. It had an economic and possibly some military relationship with Iraq - I forget the details. It had a large Indian community in the Gulf, so it had a concern there, an involvement. I remember that shortly after the invasion of Kuwait and before Desert Storm, the Indian foreign minister went off to Iraq and made some statements that were pretty bad as far as we were concerned. But in fact, when we went to them to try and move some supplies thorough India, some flights thorough India, we did get permission, and we were able to move a fair amount through India. So their position was - and it varied depending on which government was in power, as I said, governments change - but we were able to get their cooperation to a fair extent on transiting supplies, landing in India and going on.

Q: When did you leave in '91?

SMITH: The summer of '91, July probably.

LAWRENCE COHEN
Political/Economic Consul
Madras (1989-1991)

Mr. Cohen was born and raised in Pennsylvania and was educated at Dickinson College, and the Universities of Pennsylvania, Tel Aviv, Chicago and Northwestern. Entering the Foreign Service in 1980, he served variously as Economic, Political and Political/Military Officer at posts in Mexico, Honduras, India, Hungary, Nigeria and Brazil. In his assignments at the State Department in Washington Mr. Cohen dealt with Foreign Assistance and Environmental and Scientific matters. His last post was in Afghanistan, where he had two assignments with Provincial Reconstruction Teams. Mr. Cohen was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

Q: Where did you go?

COHEN: I received an assignment as the political/economic consul in Madras, India.

India was far afield from Latin America. We departed in mid-January 1989. Our daughter Rebecca was fourteen months old. Lulu was four months pregnant. We arrived in India on January 19, a couple days before the inauguration of George H.W. Bush.

Q: Madras. Where does Madras fit into the Indian complex?

COHEN: Today, Madras is called Chennai. To those of us who served there, it will always remain Madras.

Madras was one of four U.S. posts in India; Calcutta, Bombay and the capital New Delhi were the other three. Consulate General Madras had a staff of about sixteen Americans and plenty of local staff. More than four million people resided in Madras, a typical teeming South Asian city. Four South Indian states made up our consular district: Tamil Nadu, Kerala, Karnataka, and Andhra Pradesh. Over 200 million people, perhaps 250 million, lived in southern India. Each of the four states had its own language, its own script. Madras was located in Tamil Nadu. It was notorious as India's "anti-Hindi language" state. The place possessed a colorful political history and outlandish politicians. Characters from Madras' cinema industry including script writers, actors, and actresses, rose to the highest level of state politics.

In Madras, we immediately moved into permanent quarters. The property was called "Marine House." Years earlier, the USG actually had Marines assigned to the consulate. Our house was just two blocks from the consulate. I walked every morning, half a block on Kodambakkam High Road, then turned right on Nungambakkam High Road. I passed underneath Gemini Flyover, one of Madras' most noteworthy highway features. The consulate was next to the flyover. My daily walk was two blocks, but I described it as seven centuries!

Our house was remarkable. It was huge. I estimated it was at least 5,000 square feet. After we had been living in the house for two weeks, I discovered another bathroom!

As I said, we had one small child and another on the way. We had to decide early on whether to have the delivery in India or in the States. Until perhaps 1987, the medical unit at the embassy in New Delhi was quite capable of delivering babies. It had a delivery room. But the practice ended due, we were told, to neo-natal care issues. I assume liability concerns were paramount. We investigated the possibility of having the child delivered in a local Madras clinic. Visits to the local health care facilities dissuaded us. About six weeks before the due date, Lulu and Rebecca returned to the U.S. They took up residence in the State Plaza Hotel, across the street from the State Department. Andrew was born in Fairfax Hospital, the same location as Rebecca. I got back from India about five hours too late on June 16. Andrew was born when I was somewhere over Labrador. We stayed in the hotel for three weeks then returned to Madras via Pan Am. Andrew was pretty young to have flown halfway across the world!

Our Madras lifestyle was very laidback. We enjoyed numerous friendships, both among ex-pats and Indians. We associated with the other consulate Americans less frequently. With a few exceptions, most of our close friends were outside the American community.

Madras is on the southeast coast of India on the Bay of Bengal. An hour drive south of the city, a nice resort called Fisherman's Cove was a popular weekend destination. A resort hotel located on the beach was the perfect atmosphere for an afternoon gathering. The Madras Club was straight out of the British Raj. Although Lulu and I were not formal members, we spent many evenings there. Other consulate Americans lived in U.S.-owned property next to the club.

When we lived in Washington, I had been introduced to soccer. On Monday afternoons at 5:15, about eight or ten ex-pats got together for games on a dirt field. Each Monday, I tried to rush out of the consulate to get to the game. I literally changed my clothes as I am drove to the pitch. The players included a couple of Brits from the Deputy High Commission, Germans, and a Dane or two. We usually played against local Tamil kids about half our size but twice as quick. They ran circles around us at midfield. But our size dominated the corners and we usually won the headers. We probably lost more games than we won, but it was tremendous fun.

We played occasional soccer games against the Russians. The Soviet Union had a large, insular consulate in Madras. It fielded a team with uniforms. On those occasions when we played them, the Russians came out to the pitch en mass by consulate bus. Families usually accompanied. It was all quite regimented and very organized. I do not remember that our wives ever attended, but theirs certainly did. Nor can I recollect when we competed against the Russians any game ending in a score other than a tie. Either we were fairly balanced, or some mysterious political equilibrium had been imposed on us by the Hindu gods!

Q: When I think of Madras, I think of eating an awful lot of vegetarian food, very hot and rich.

COHEN: Quite. Southern India is overwhelmingly vegetarian. Our Lilliputian consulate commissary obtained frozen ground beef from a butcher in Bangalore. We could not buy meat locally. I'm certain the butcher in Bangalore was Muslim. I never developed a taste for Madras cuisine.

On the other hand, I loved Indian food from elsewhere. India's hottest food is served in Andhra Pradesh. Even Indians agree, and they agree on little else, that if you want hot food, go to Hyderabad. I love hot, spicy food. I went to Hyderabad. I ate the Andhra food and concede it was hot, incredibly hot! Absolutely the hottest food I have eaten anywhere on the planet.

Q: I think during the Cold War, particularly early in the Cold War, Kerala was on the front pages all the time of being the red core of India.

COHEN: Kerala was on the southwest coast of India, the Malabar Coast. In 1957 Kerala became the first state in the world to freely elect a communist government. The Communist Party of India (CPI) victory was the first time an opposition party won an Indian state. Later the CPI split and a Marxist party, the CPI(M), was formed.

Kerala is a unique Indian state. The population is almost 100 percent literate. Its rate of population growth is significantly lower, by far, than for any other Indian state. This demonstrates the connection between education and a lower birthrate. Kerala implemented a population policy that was beyond what other Indian states ever attempted. It reduced population growth towards sustainable levels. Compare Kerala to Uttar Pradesh or Bihar where the population growth rates continue to be unsustainable. Kerala is densely populated and tropical. Many, perhaps most, Indians who work in the Persian Gulf come from Kerala. When the first Gulf War hit in the summer of 1990, thousands of Keralans were stranded in the Gulf.

The ancient and exotic town of Cochin, in Kerala was my favorite Indian location. It held special meaning for me. Cochin's tiny Jewish community claimed its roots went back to King Solomon, approximately 3000 years ago. The community described itself as either white – descendants perhaps of the original Jews from the biblical period and later immigrants from the Middle East – or black – those natives who had become Jews over the centuries. Most lived in an ancient neighborhood in Old Cochin called Jew Town. In 1947 there were over two thousand Jews in Cochin. When we visited in 1989, there were under one hundred. Most had already immigrated to Israel. The Paradesi (literally, “foreigners”) synagogue built in 1568 was a true jewel. On the roof was a clock tower with Hebrew letters. The floor consisted of beautiful eighteenth century Chinese tiles. Everyone had to walk barefoot in the synagogue. A tablet on the outside wall dated from an earlier synagogue from the fourteenth century. In 1990 Lulu and I were invited by Mr. Koder, the community patriarch, for Simhat Torah, the most joyous holiday for the Cochin Jews. A year earlier, I was there for Yom Kippur. Sadly, the Jewish community of Cochin now essentially belongs to history.

Across the lagoon from Cochin is the more modern town of Ernakulam. Small islands dotted the lagoon. Fishermen dried their nets on the beach. We took a small boat around the inland waters.

I also will describe Bangalore, another fascinating place.

Q: Bangalore had not yet turned into the information technology capital of the world.

COHEN: To call Bangalore the IT capital of the world is a slight exaggeration, but it is not far-fetched. In the late 1980s, the information technology revolution was in its nascent stages. Bangalore's IT industry grew from internal and external factors. The Indian Institute of Technology, situated in Bangalore, is India's MIT (Massachusetts Institute of Technology) and Cal Tech (California Institute of Technology) rolled into one. Other local Indian schools produced high quality engineers and technicians. The workforce was fluent in English and labored at Indian wage scales. For the subcontinent, Bangalore enjoyed a moderate climate. Its elevation was perhaps 3,000, 3,500 feet. Bangalore displayed traits from its British Raj tradition: libraries, restaurants, cultural centers, etc. These factors inspired foreign companies to extend operations to India. At the time, India did not possess a welcoming environment for foreign investment. Commercial investment in India took some guts.

Texas Instruments (TI) was one of the first companies to open a facility in Bangalore. The operation was designed to take advantage of the time difference between India and the U.S. At the end of the workday in Austin, Texas, TI transmitted data telephonically by satellite to Bangalore for processing. The Indian operation downloaded the information, processed it, and retransmitted it back to Texas in time for opening of business there the next day. TI technicians left the office with unprocessed computer program code, came to work with the finished data waiting on their desks. This was the Texas Instruments concept. I cannot say for certain if TI was first. As telecommunications improved, the work became a twenty-four/seven operation. Today, India has multitudes of twenty-four hour call centers. Try getting computer assistance today without speaking with India! Even in 1990, it was clear that these companies were on to something.

Q: Did you feel, particularly with your economic background, that India really had to do something about its protectionist policies?

COHEN: Indian economic and trade policies repressed capitalism and discouraged investment. Government policies inhibited the flow of FDI (foreign direct investment.) For example, the transportation sector had not modernized. Indian streets continued to be clogged with “Ambassador” automobiles. The Ambassador was a British-designed Morris Minor, circa 1957, made by Hindustan Motors. The Ambassador car was shaped like a box, with a large chrome grill and deep fender wells, round headlights, and the old fashion door handles straight out of the early 1950s. The interior dome light switch was a house switch. In 1990, it had not been updated.

Q: An upside down bathtub.

COHEN: Exactly, but not as handsome. In the 1950s the manufacturing factory had been relocated from England when the car was no longer in production to India. No updates had been made to the chassis, the body, or the engine. For four decades Hindustan Motors mass produced these vehicles unchanged. A ride in an Ambassador was time travel. A close analogy in my travel experience was flying in a Honduran DC-3 from La Ceiba to the Caribbean island of Roatan.

At the time, another automobile was just coming on stream in India. The Maruti was a Japanese vehicle made by the Suzuki Corporation, similar to a small Toyota Celica. When you observed Marutis and Ambassadors together, the dichotomy was dramatic. Today, I believe over half of India’s passenger vehicle fleet is made up of Maruti-Suzuki autos.

Then there was India’s banking system. The banking system had changed minimally from, say, the time of David Copperfield. This was before the era of electronic banking. Modernity had little place in an Indian bureaucrat’s or a banker’s office. On every desk it seemed ubiquitous piles of documents tied with red ribbons or pinned to keep the pages together gathered dust.

Q: You always think of folders tied up in knots piled high on desks, with coolies running back and forth carrying tea.

COHEN: That’s right. That was the bureaucracy – managed by the Indian Civil Service (ICS). I met with members of the Indian Civil Service, a talented and savvy lot. The Indian civil servants with whom I dealt were highly educated and competent. Competition to enter India’s civil service was severe. Only the best, and I assume well connected, made it into the ICS. I sensed, however, that most of my interlocutors failed to appreciate the preposterousness of the bureaucracy for which they labored, these gross systemic inefficiencies. These were the days before desktop computers. But when it came to information management, the United States was light years ahead of India. India’s bureaucratic system kept the nation looking backwards.

India’s power sector exemplified gross inefficiency. State electricity boards delivered electricity almost free to farmers. The nominal charge was, if I remember, under a penny per kilowatt hour. Of course, there were no meters. For pumping water to the fields, electricity was critical for Indian agriculture. While there was a political rationale and logic to assist poor villagers, there was no incentive to conserve power usage. Farmers pumped away to their hearts' content. Throughout the country, millions of pumps in half a million villages consumed enormous power, an enormous drain on India's fragile electricity grid. And the grid constantly went down.

If farmers were not paying for electricity, then who was? India's power generation was heavily subsidized. India desperately needed investment in the power sector. But who would invest in a sector where so much production was given away? Without a stable power supply, how could India attract investment into other economic sectors? Without industrialization, where were the new jobs for the children of the farmers? It was a snowball effect. Many Indians recognized a problem existed. India had a tough time getting over that hurdle.

A few months after we departed post, Rajiv Gandhi was assassinated on May 21, 1991. After his death, India's fundamental economic policies changed radically.

Q: Speaking of the assassination, it was tied to the Tamil situation there. During your time what was the Tamil situation?

COHEN: India served as haven for thousands of Tamil refugees. The Tamils in Tamil Nadu state shared a common ethnicity and bond with their kin across the Palk Straits. There was local sympathy and support for Tamil refugees who were living in camps throughout the state. I occasionally met local Tamil leaders who spoke on behalf of Tamils in Sri Lanka. I do not recollect specifically meeting representatives of Prabhakaran's Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE or Tamil Tigers). Not a few people in Madras were affiliated with the Tamil Tigers. However, there was no overwhelming local support for Prabhakaran's brutal methods.

During the late 1980s the Indian military had a presence in Sri Lanka. The IPKF, the Indian Peace Keeping Force, introduced in 1987 under the terms of a peace accord between the LTTE and the Sri Lankan Government, had a challenging assignment. Some equated the IPKF's supposed debacle in Sri Lanka to Vietnam. That was a tremendous exaggeration. The Indian Government was smart enough not to let the situation slip completely out of its hands. The Indian military remained careful about its role in Sri Lanka. With the election of the V.P. Singh government in 1989, the troops were gradually pulled out. The last soldiers left in March 1990.

The Indian navy was quite active in the Bay of Bengal. The Indian Government held high aspirations for its navy which it hoped would truly become a blue water extension of India's regional power. I was reminded on occasion that the body of water was referred to as the "Indian Ocean."

Tamil Nadu faced enough problems on its own and most civilians were not compulsive about events in Sri Lanka. The refugees living in the camps were not in great shape. However, refugee camps elsewhere on the planet were in worse condition.

Q: What were you doing at the consulate general? What was our main concern other than reporting?

COHEN: I was consul for political and economic affairs. Indians take democracy seriously. I met constantly with provincial politicians. Elections, it seemed, were occurring every month somewhere in our consular district! The election process never ended. The country's electoral politics were uniquely colorful -- somewhat raw but absolutely vibrant.

With the invaluable efforts of the consulate's foreign service nationals (FSNs): K. Prabhakaram Nair, C.S. Madhava Rao, R. Natarajan, and Lalitha Natraj, I covered south Indian political economic and social issues. Earlier I mentioned Kerala's population policy. The nuclear sector drew my attention. India's counterpart to Cape Canaveral, Sriharikota, is located in Andhra Pradesh just north of Madras. I reported on the nuclear power generating plant at Kalpakkam, south of Madras, and not far from the temples at Mahaballapuram. I reported on India's industrialization and its manufacturing sector, for example, the Vizag Steel mill in Visakhapatnam, Andhra Pradesh. In coordination with the Foreign Commercial Service staff, I addressed commercial issues in Bangalore and other cities. For about six months, I headed the commercial section.

The Tamil situation, the refugees, the Indian navy's quest to establish a blue water presence in the Indian Ocean, the occasional visitors who came to Madras -- I had plenty to do.

I sensed our performance in Madras was somewhat underappreciated. On one trip to the embassy in New Delhi, I noticed a new group meritorious honor award for the political section. The citation cited the outstanding embassy reporting during a recent national election. I was taken aback. Embassy policy required the consulates to feed all their election reporting to the embassy. The political section essentially regurgitated the consulate insight to the Department. We could not send our election reporting directly to Washington. Reading the award on the wall of the political section, I resented that the section recognized itself with such an award but neglected the three consulates which fed it much of the information. Madras' four FSNs had worked diligently on election reporting. "How can you award yourselves a meritorious honor award and not recognize the work of the consulates?" I asked. Soon, we got the same award for the consulate staff.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

COHEN: John R. Hubbard, a political appointee. Ambassador Hubbard was a Texan who had been President of the University of Southern California. The political counselor was George Sherman.

Q: Who was the consul general?

COHEN: Early in my tour it was Tom Timmerman. He was succeeded by Ernestine (Ernie) Heck, wife of former Ambassador Doug Heck. At the time Ambassador Heck was an invalid with Parkinson's. He lived at the consul general's residence with constant medical care. We never saw him, he never emerged from the residence, and I am certain it was very tough on Ernie. At least she was a competent consul general. Timmerman was not as effective.

India was a combination of all the best things you would want in a Foreign Service career.

Q: Did you feel any reflection of the fall of the Berlin Wall in November 1989? The Soviets had been the big ally of India and all of a sudden, it was gone. Were you there at the beginning of the Gulf War?

COHEN: Yes and yes. We were distant from events going on in Europe and the fall of communism. On the other hand, we enjoyed a front row seat for how those events affected India. I will mention our relations with the Russians in Madras. As I mentioned, the Russians had a large consulate, much larger than ours. We had some, albeit limited, social intercourse with them. After the fall of the Wall, one Russian diplomat in particular who was part of their intelligence service, played up the “friendship” part. He said he had served in the United States; that was believable since he spoke impeccably unaccented American English. He became our so-called “friend,” “There were no real winners or losers in the Cold War,” he argued. Both sides were winners, etcetera. Perhaps that was the perception that the Russians wanted to foster.

Among the Indians, the collapse of communism did not play dramatically. True, India had been a long time Soviet ally. But there was never an ideological bond, except for the communist parties. However, communism in India, the active Marxist parties in our consular district, did not seem dramatically affected by the fall of the Wall.

Q: Okay. The Gulf War started in August of 1990.

COHEN: Yes. The Persian Gulf was much closer to our playing field than Berlin. The weekend before Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait, the last Saturday night in July, we attended a big social event at the Madras Club. At least a hundred fifty people were there. The ubiquitous raffle took place in the large hall. Lulu and I were sitting outside with friends on the lawn, not paying attention to what was going on inside. We heard this commotion. Someone came out and told me I won the grand prize. “What are you talking about?” “Your name was pulled from the raffle, you won the raffle prize.” I went inside to collect it. At this point I still did not know what the raffle prize was.

Q: Probably a trip to Kuwait or something.

COHEN: Good guess. I went inside. Everyone is staring at me. I collected a club class roundtrip ticket on British Airways from Madras to London via Kuwait. Less than 48 hours later Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait. One of the first acts of his invasion, of course, was to detain a British Airways jetliner which was transiting Kuwait. It was the London-Madras-Kuala Lumpur flight, the flight on which I had just won a seat!

The Iraqis held the hostages for months. I do not remember the duration. We were monitoring events in the Middle East from the consulate. We watched CNN in the consulate auditorium. CNN was still a new medium for news. The network showed video clips of the passengers who were on that flight. They had been moved to Baghdad to serve, allegedly, as human shields. Many faces of Madras residents were familiar to people watching in the audience. Someone would call out, “Oh, there is so-and-so, oh, there is so-and-so.”

After some time, it was obvious the situation was not going to be resolved quickly. I visited the British Airways office with my raffle prize letter. I asked if I could exchange the ticket. No problem. I turned in my one club class ticket to London for two club class tickets Madras-Kuala Lumpur. Lulu and I traveled to Malaysia for vacation.

From a substantive point of view, Southern Indians focused on the thousands of Indian workers who were stranded in Kuwait and throughout the Gulf.

Q: Everything that happens in India is sort of regional. Were the workers essentially from your part of India?

COHEN: The majority came from the state of Kerala, on India's southwest, Malabar Coast. I explained earlier that Keralans tend to be more highly educated and sophisticated than other Indians. Many thousands migrated to the Persian Gulf and became laborers. I am sure many stranded workers were from Bombay, Maharashtra, etc. But Kerala was overwhelmingly the home for most. The Indian Government mounted a massive relief effort to bring back the stranded workers.

I was responsible for reporting the situation in Kerala. Initially, the Gulf War perspective focused on the repatriation of these people. Most were successfully repatriated back to India. In Kerala, a potential human catastrophe was averted. However, the economic consequences from the lost Gulf worker remittances were severe.

Q: Did you have much of an Islamic presence in your area?

COHEN: We did. Obviously, Saddam Hussein and Iraq is a part of the Arab world. One Muslim country attacked another Muslim country. There was no love lost, among Indians, for Saddam Hussein. Initially, there was a slight Islamic tilt to the news. Andhra Pradesh contains a large Muslim minority population. Its capital, Hyderabad, is largely Muslim. The other states, including Karnataka and Kerala, had significant Muslim minorities. To my recollection, there were no major domestic problems with regards to those populations. South India was relatively tolerant towards Muslims

Q: How about the media? Did they take any particular fix on this war?

COHEN: The Indian media is very buoyant, often outrageous and consistently outspoken. The media pushed the GOI for repatriation of the stranded workers in the Persian Gulf. During the crisis their criticism of the United States was relatively muted. This occurred after the fall of the Berlin Wall. The Cold War had almost ceased to exist by this point. U.S. support for Pakistan dissipated with the Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan in February 1989. Anti-Americanism in India was pretty much at low ebb.

Q: Did you find that the Indian people got involved as so many did in the United States and elsewhere with CNN, watching the war.

COHEN: Southern India in 1990 did not have an extensive information network beyond state run television and the written press. CNN was not easily accessible, except perhaps in the fancier hotels. Satellite dishes were non-existent. There was no cable system at the time. The consulate had a fax machine but the faxes generally were poor quality. Sending or receiving a fax was an ordeal and the copy often unreadable. The consulate did have access to the USIS international television service, called WorldNet. CNN was a new medium. At our residences, forget it. Each residence had a phone, a heavy black box with an earpiece the size of a tennis ball. To call the states or anywhere beyond Madras, the caller reserved a call hours in advance. To book a call, I contacted the operator and provided the number in the United States. Even the operator sounded like she was on the moon. The operator informed us when the call back could be expected, usually a few hours. For this wonderful service, long distance phone charges were incredibly steep, something like $6 a minute to the U.S. This was in 1990! India did not have telecom deregulation.

India's print media was a different story. India's vibrant press, both in the vernacular and English, covered the war widely. Thus, much of our international news came from Indian newspapers. The International Herald Tribune arrived almost a week late; Newsweek magazine came irregularly. We were near the end of the information chain, or so it seemed.

Q: Was there anything particularly threatening to the consulate during the Gulf War?

COHEN: There were two parts to the Gulf War: Desert Shield and then Desert Storm.

Q: Desert Shield being the buildup to Desert Storm.

COHEN: Correct. On January 17, 1991, Operation Desert Storm was launched, the actual attack then invasion of Iraq and liberation of Kuwait. We departed India in February. During Desert Shield, security was beefed up slightly at the consulate. From a physical security standpoint, the consulate is not very defensible. Although the consulate sits within a large compound with a wall around it, there is no setback from Gemini flyover, one of Madras's busiest traffic areas. There was little protection from serious demonstrations. Only very small, minor demonstrations took place.

Q: Were you all given instructions to go out and explain what we were doing and why we were doing it?

COHEN: That was part of my job. I spoke with Indian audiences, generally on topics not necessarily related to the Gulf War. But the situation in the Persian Gulf always came up. I delivered talks to Rotary clubs, often on trade issues. I answered questions about U.S. policy in the Persian Gulf. With Indian audiences, I kept the dialogue low key. Just below the surface, many Indians possessed resentment against us. Perhaps it was the residual of so many years of India's anti-U.S. foreign policy following perceived U.S. favoritism for Pakistan. A preaching American diplomat was not how I wanted to be portrayed.

Q: As I recall the Indians played a more positive role than would appear on the surface.

COHEN: Absolutely. The GOI allowed military over-flights, provided clearance to U.S. support missions. India also has a significant navy -

Q: Quite a significant navy.

COHEN: For the region yes. As I said, India aspired to create a real blue water navy, one that would extend India's reach from Africa to Australia, and perhaps beyond. They have had mixed success. But Indians liked to remind people that the body of water nearby was called the "Indian Ocean." Our operating base out of Diego Garcia, south of the Indian sub-continent, and our nearby fleets including additional aircraft carriers in the Arabian Sea and the Persian Gulf rubbed Indian sensitivities the wrong way. I was not involved in this, but I recollect that the Indian and U.S. navies collaborated fairly well during the Gulf War.

Q: Regarding trade, I am not sure if we covered this before but one of the problems that existed with India for a very long was India's protected trade environment.

COHEN: I was stationed in India just before the liberalization of the economy. At that time, a keen observer may have sensed that the impetus for liberalizing the economy had reached a crossroads. The country was moving slowly, but undeniable momentum was starting to build. Think of a roller coaster as it reaches the crest moments before the rapid ride down. Three months after we left, Rajiv Gandhi was assassinated. Under Gandhi, India had almost reached the crest of the roller coaster. Under his successors, that roller coaster accelerated down swiftly.

Q: We are talking the roller coaster being -

COHEN: Economic reform, trade liberalization, the opening of the country to foreign direct investment. India exhibited many contradictions that could not really be easily rectified. As I mentioned banking was stuck in the 19th century. Auto manufacturing could not get past the 1950s. The antipathy to foreign investment hurt no one more than the Indian people. These self-inflicted wounds could not last forever. Primitive technologies were being utilized next to cutting edge technologies. A huge uneducated mass of humanity co-existed with a few of the world's best institutes of technology and science. Parts of the economy were ready to take off; other parts were hardly removed from antiquity. It could not last; something had to give.

Q: One thinks of Indian villages and the sacred cows wandering around. What was your feeling how was this going to come out?

COHEN: As a diplomat, one usually does not have opportunities to speak to a very broad population. A diplomat generally communicates with the elites, contacts, journalists, politicians, businessmen. The folks with whom I spoke were already on that roller coaster. Many were cognizant that India needed to get on the roller coaster glide path or suffer. China at this time was already perking forward in impressive fashion. Foreign investment was starting to flow to China but not to India. I talked about trade and about the GATT -

Q: General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

COHEN: I spoke about trade liberalization and opening India's economy. The country had great potential to utilize foreign direct investment. India did not have to depend solely on self-generated capital and resources. Massive foreign investment would come to India if the building blocks were in place. The first sector to address was telecommunications. This was before the cell phone era, but potential existed in satellite telecommunications. Eventually, other sectors such as banking and finance attracted investment. Suzuki began to manufacture Maruti automobiles which were increasingly common. A few years later, everything had changed in India. The country had reached takeoff.

Q: You left about four months before Rajiv Gandhi's assassination. This was by a Tamil who blew himself up. It happened in your consulate district.

COHEN: It happened thirty kilometers from Madras. It was a suicide bomber from the LTTE. Given India's role in Sri Lankan peacekeeping, the threat of Tamil extremism directed against the government had been obvious. Perhaps, it was not taken seriously enough, because the problems in Sri Lanka had already been going on a long time.

Q: Sri Lanka.

COHEN: The Indian Government was extensively engaged there, but not in a heavy-handed manner. Moreover, Tamils from Sri Lanka, outside refugee camps, tended to enjoy free reign in Tamil Nadu. Despite the attacks on Indian soldiers in the IPKF, the Tamil Tigers and their sympathizers were not hunted down or persecuted in India. They operated quite freely in southern India for a long time. A Tamil Tiger attack on the Indian Government of such magnitude is an example of biting the hand that feeds you. But there was nothing logical about the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) which later denied involvement in the killing.

When I first heard about the assassination, I was already at my next post. Initially, I did not believe it was a Tamil Tiger attack. It was so obvious as to be counterintuitive. Although the LTTE had enjoyed the largesse of the Indian government, it was perfectly capable of such an attack.

Q: Did you from accounts and personal contact get any feel that this was a renegade outfit?

COHEN: I do not know. These guys were thugs. I sensed the LTTE was a very cohesive group. Prabhakaran, the Tamil Tiger chief, seemed to have a fairly tight hold on operations. On the other hand, there were disparate groups. Communications were not easy amongst these groups; there were no cell phones. I doubt they used radios that the Indians could monitor. It was possible that groups out there had their own agendas. I was surprised by the assassination. In hindsight, I should not have been.

Tamil Nadu, on the southeast corner of India, has always been a very self-centered region. Tamil, I understand, is the oldest language on the Indian subcontinent. It is one of the world's oldest continually spoken languages. South Indian civilization, Dravidian India, is quite different from that in the Mogul north. Southern India was never conquered by the Moguls, had never come under Muslim domination. It was old Hindu, a traditionally religious part of the country with many ornate temples. The Tamils were viscerally anti-Hindi. Tamil Nadu was arguably the most “anti-center” of all Indian states. The anti-Hindi movement contributed to great usage of English among Tamils who insisted on learning English rather than Hindi. There was broader literacy in English than in Hindi. New Delhi promoted Hindi as the national unifying language. Yet, I do not remember much Hindi programming in Madras. It was never written on signs. If not Tamil, signs were exclusively in English. Politicians in Tamil Nadu used Tamil ethnic identity to promote their own ends.

Q: Did you find in your consular district an important role for religion?

COHEN: The Muslim population was relatively small, although in Indian standards, relatively small means only tens of millions versus hundreds of millions. There were significant Muslim pockets throughout the consular district, especially Hyderabad. Hinduism and Hindu culture was more than just a religion; it was the fabric of society woven together and impossible to differentiate. I cannot identify where religion began and other parts of society ended.

Parts of the district possessed especially heightened Hindu identity. We witnessed the growth of very nationalistic Hindu political parties, such as the BJP (Bharatiya Janata Party) or the most radical of the groupings, the RSS (Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh). The RSS was somewhat like the John Birch Society, the LaRouches of the Hindi identify movement.

Q: Sort of an extreme right wing party.

COHEN: Very extreme. The BJP was more main stream than the RSS party but still quite intolerant towards Muslims. For years, they fed off the crumbs from the Congress Party’s table. Eventually, in 1989, the BJP won a national election. The RSS was the extreme right.

Another Hindu-Muslim event was playing out, the controversy over a mosque in northern India at Ayodhya. Although not in our consular district, Ayodhya nonetheless had become a huge issue throughout India. Ayodhya was considered the birthplace of the Hindu God Shri Ram. Four centuries earlier, the Hindu temple at the site had been converted into the Babri mosque by the Emperor Babar. It was not a significant mosque. However, the Hindu zealots played it up. The Hindu population was riled up. The government faced a dilemma. In 1992, the dam broke. A Hindu mob stormed the mosque and destroyed it. That could have catalyzed the beginning of a very bitter, almost 1947-like catastrophe. Fortunately, India dodged the bullet. The Muslim population was not looking for trouble. But that was a close call.

Q: Were you in India at the time?

COHEN: We had left India the year before.

Q: Were you looking at mosque attacks or mobs? Could mobs be generated rather easily?

COHEN: In southern India, Muslim-Hindu tension was less severe. On the contrary, the people with whom I dealt emphasized that south India was relatively tolerant. Much more tolerant, it was obvious, than the Hindi belt where Ayodhya is located. The Hindi belt consists of the northern states, particularly highly populous UP (Uttar Pradesh). Northern India contains the most impoverished regions of the country. True, ethnic and other tensions existed throughout southern India. In many cases, the divisions had to do with land and water. India enjoys few rivers and is a very crowded country. Land and water disputes, between states, tribes and ethnic groups, produced a constant cauldron of strife.

Q: Just to get a feel for consular operations there; were you keeping book on the religious map, the water map, the land map, the disputes and all?

COHEN: I was responsible for observing, analyzing and reporting on events such as I described. The breadth of the issues consisted of traditional political, economic, and social issues. What, for example, were the implications for instituting actual cost pricing for electricity in rural areas? What would this mean for Indian farmers? As with water, electricity was a very sensitive issue in India. I looked at the region's pollution problems. We observed the early emergence of a perception of India's environmental challenges. I looked at population issues, especially, as I said, in Kerala. These social issues were an important component of my portfolio.

Q: Were there any characters or elections, colorful Indian types, who particularly stand out?

COHEN: There were many. Madras is very much a movie city, the counterpart to Bombay's "Bollywood." It was quite amazing how leading movie actors took over local politics. Of course, this was just after the Reagan Administration. What could we say when it came to movie actors becoming politicians? Yet, the incestuous relationship between movie magnates and actors and control of Tamil political mechanisms was quite amazing. The movie actors who moved into politics made my job truly entertaining.

One major movie figure in Tamil Nadu was an idolized film star named M.G. Ramachandran (MGR). Everyone referred to him as MGR. He headed the AIADMK party, an offshoot of the Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam (DMK) party founded by Tamil Nadu patriarch C.K. Annadurai. As Chief Minister, MGR became almost a god in Tamil Nadu. That was fitting since in his Madras movie career he played god parts. At MGR's death in December 1987, a year before we arrived, dozens of people reportedly flung themselves on his funeral pyre. His principal rival was Muthuvel Karunanidhi, head of the DMK party since Annadurai's 1969 death and multiple times chief minister of the state. MGR and Karunanidhi had parted company in 1974. Although I never met MGR, I perceived similarities with his rival. In addition to being capable Tamil politicians, the two wore dark sunglasses all the time, no matter how dark the room. Both always wore distinctive hats. The sunglasses and hats lent each a mysterious air and contributed, I am sure, to their popularity among the masses.

After MGR's death in 1989 there was a four-way battle for the governorship of Tamil Nadu. Four candidates sought to fill MGR's throne, so to speak. One candidate was MGR's widow but she was a non-entity. MGR's mercurial mistress, Jayaram Jayalalitha, was more politically savvy, colorful in her own right. She had been an actress and played parts opposite the god character of MGR. She was popular, but at that time she did not yet possess the necessary political machinery behind her. The Congress Party ran a candidate but it was a hopelessly uphill effort for Congress in Tamil Nadu at the time. Congress could not take Tamil Nadu in those years. Karunanidhi who had been chief minister twice before in the 1970s, was formidable. In the four candidate horse race, Karunanidhi was easily elected chief minister.

Throughout southern India, huge billboards, perhaps 30 feet tall, portrayed profiles of the leading political figures, figuratively larger than life. Wooden billboards were used to advertise movies. Since actors and the politicians were often one and the same, Indians likely saw no incongruity in viewing their movie heroes as politicians. It was no wonder actors became leading political figures. I will add a footnote. Months after the inauguration of President George H.W. Bush in 1989, Consul General Tom Timmerman decided the Consulate would honor the president with his own movie board! It was commissioned and placed on the consulate grounds overlooking Gemini Flyover which, as I mentioned, was one of Madras' busiest thoroughfares. Imagine a pallid, five times larger than life, George Bush (senior) looking over the city's minions. I thought the entire episode overly pretentious. The board was moved to the CG's residence, in time for July 4th.

I believe that before politics, Karunanidhi had been a movie scriptwriter. Karunanidhi was, and still is a fascinating character. He again won the chief ministership in May 2006, at age eighty-two! His own personal history remains inexorably linked with Tamil identity. While all powerful in Tamil Nadu for two generations, Karunanidhi, in my view, was never a major influence on the national scene. During my period in Madras, he was grooming his youngest son, M.K. Stalin, to be his political heir. Who names a child Stalin? I guess M.K.'s birth, coinciding almost to the day that the Soviet dictator died in 1953, was seen as portentous. Although Stalin was elected to the legislative assembly and served a term as Madras mayor, I doubt he possesses a fraction of the old man's political capability. So it goes. However, he was, and I assume still is very cunning, Mafioso-type figure. I disliked him.

Later, Jayalalitha, MGR's heir to the AIADMK mantle, succeeded in building her political base. She was manipulative and exploitative. I met her privately in her home where she turned on her political charms. After we departed post in 1991 she defeated Karunanidhi and became Tamil Nadu chief minister. For the next decade and a half, she and Karunanidhi vied back and forth, one defeating the other, as chief minister. The pattern was identical. Each charged the other with corruption. The charges never stuck longer than an election cycle. When Karunanidhi won back the chief minister job in 2006, Jayalalitha was the loser.

In neighboring Andhra Pradesh, there was another colorful figure from the silver screen. N.T. Rama Rao also had played god figures. I suspect he still thought he was a Hindu deity. He wore saffron robes all the time, make-up, and exploited his god-like movie demeanor incessantly. The people of Andhra Pradesh ate it up. But N.T. Rama Rao was not very competent and never gained much traction politically outside his state.

WILLIAM CLARK, JR.
Ambassador
India (1989-1992)

Ambassador William Clark, Jr. was born in California in 1930. He received a bachelor's degree from San Jose State College in 1955. He served in the U.S. Navy intermittently from 1949 to 1953. In 1957, he joined the Foreign Service. His career included positions in Sierra Leone, Japan, Korea, and Egypt, and an ambassadorship to India. This interview was conducted by Thomas Stern in 1994.

Q: In 1989, you were appointed as US Ambassador to India. How did that come about?

CLARK: It was one of those interesting events in one's career. When the Bush administration came to power, it had some difficulty finding a suitable candidate for the Assistant Secretary for EA position. For a variety of reasons, Gaston Sigur had decided that he wanted to leave before Bush's February trip to Japan. So he resigned, leaving me as acting Assistant Secretary -- a situation that lasted until June 1989. In that first half of that year, we faced the Tiananmen Square episode and we went through a successful fight with Congress on the FSX program with Japan.

We handled Tiananmen about as well as it could be given all the circumstances. It occurred on June 3, 1989 which was a Friday night here and spilled over into Saturday. When we got the news, we put a task force together and wrote some talking points for the President. In a rare occasion, Bush used the talking points almost verbatim. He struck the right tone. Bob Kimmitt, the Under Secretary for Political Affairs, was the titular head of the task force, but the day-to-day management was left to me.

On the FSX issue, I already mentioned my frequent Congressional appearances. I believe I appeared before 18 committees and subcommittees and held innumerable meetings with members of Congress and their staffs. In the final analysis, our proposal was approved by one vote in the Senate. The FSX program called for a transfer of American technology to Japan to help the Japanese to build their own fighter aircraft. This program was started when the Japanese came to us and told us that they were planning to develop their own next generation of fighter aircraft. Washington didn't take much time before it told us in the Embassy -- this happened while I was the DCM -- to inform the Japanese that their idea was not a very good one, but if they were interested in developing their own plane, they should base it on an FS-16 frame. That would permit us to stay involved. A big debate ensued because there were many American firms that were ready to sell their equipment to the Japanese which could have been hung on the frame. I am referring to such items as avionics. The whole discussion didn't get very far while I was in Tokyo. I picked up the issue when I became the senior DAS in EA. Then I had to tell firms that most their offers would be rejected. Finally, we and the Japanese signed all the necessary agreements which called for the transfer of some US technology particularly on materials, in exchange for primarily production technology from Japan. For example, in exchange for composite carbon material from the US, Japan would show us how to manufacture a solid form airplane wing and fuel tanks without rivets from that carbon. Also we were building state-of-art radar, but the Japanese were confident that they could bring down significantly the cost of production. Each unit in a phased array display was costing us something like $2,000. The Japanese thought they could help us manufacture it at a cost of approximately $200. So the concept called for an exchange of technology which would improve our manufacturing capability while at the same time protecting the high end of our technology -- e.g. we would not provide the codes for the flight boxes. When the Bush administration came in, it decided to review the whole program. It was not satisfied with what it saw. That required some reworking of the draft arrangements to provide even greater protection for our very sophisticated technology. I think even our earlier draft arrangements protected us well; I don't think we ever contemplated or would ever have transferred our most sophisticated technology. The Japanese have been working since 1945 to maintain a "warm base" for aircraft production, whether it was the US-1 -- the "flying boat" -- or the F-1 -- their fighter aircraft. It has cost them a lot of money to maintain an aviation industry, allowing them to manufacture, for example, about 40% of Boeing 737. Some of the F-16s are built in Japan -- in fact, after having bought the first air wing from us, they replaced the planes' wings because they did not feel that they were up to their standards. That was expensive, but the Japanese were willing to spend the money. They were going to build an aviation industry, regardless of costs or what contribution an American manufacturer might or might not make. This FSX program is still underway, although at a pace slower than anticipated; I am told that it is coming along well and close to completion, even though there seem to be some disagreements between the American and Japanese manufacturers about some of the technology exchange. A prototype may take to the air very soon. The rivetless wing technology has been acquired by US manufacturers; under the agreement, American manufacturers were to build a certain number of these wings for the Japanese plane so that we could learn the process. The phase-array radar's costs have not decreased as much as anticipated; we didn't give the Japanese any codes to be used in the black boxes. I believe that it probably turned out to be fair deal for both sides. Neither side will have gained any great advantage over the other, although the Japanese will, if they wish, be able to build a front line fighter plane. The F-16 is now twenty years old and the next generation of US fighters will be build based on Stealth technology; that will leave a gap in other countries' arsenals. I believe that the FSX program is a good model for future cooperative programs. It enables the Japanese to build their own fighter aircraft, but at the same time still makes them dependent on certain US technology, which is vital to insure that the US-Japan security agreement will be maintained. In 25,000 years of Japanese history -- which is their claim to the trace of their ancestry -- have only have had two treaty agreements similar to the security treaty. One was with the British back in the early 1900s and the other was with us, which is only 42 years old. So treaties are not a normal pattern in Japanese history.

The process for obtaining Congressional approval of this FSX program was interesting. We finally assigned the task to a three man team: one was from State (me), one from Commerce (Joan McEntee, an Under Secretary) and one from DoD, which was at time represented by Glenn Rudd from DSAA and at other by a three-star Air Force General. The latter was superb; he awed the Committees. As I mentioned earlier, the three of us did all of the testifying except for the final session before the Foreign Affairs Committee when Secretaries Mosbacher, Cheney and Deputy Secretary Eagleburger testified.

In any case, through the FSX program and the China problems, I became better acquainted with Secretary Baker and his close entourage. I had met Baker first when he was the Secretary of the Treasury and part of the US delegation to Roh Toe Woo's inauguration. I also had known Eagleburger for a long time; I had also known Ross and Zoellick earlier. I got to know Margaret Tutwiler through my work on the FSX program. So by mid-89, I had many contacts with the "closed" Baker circle; in fact, I think I more contacts with Baker and his staff than I had later on with the "open" administration of Warren Christopher. I guess it must have been in June of 1989, during one of my late evenings with Baker, when he turned to me and asked me what I would like to do on my next assignment. I told him that I would certainly enjoy being an Ambassador. He told me to look at the vacancies -- by this time, the new administration had already made many appointments -- and to pick one. I knew which I would chose, but I told Baker that I would look at the list and then give him an answer. I went home to discuss the decision with my wife and the next day I let the Secretary know that I would like to go to India.

I picked India because it had fascinated me for a long time. I has passed through on a number of occasions, often just at the Delhi airport. But early in my career, I had come to the conclusion that people who were assigned to India soon became part of a South Asia corps, who would serve much of their career on the subcontinent. That did not interest me, but by 1989, the relationships between the US and India had developed sufficiently that I thought that I might be able to push them closer. So I was interested in India both because of the country and the contribution that I might be able to make to relationships between the two countries.

I had some competition for the job, although I don't know who it was -- I was told later that Abe Sofaer, the Department's Legal Advisor, may have an interest. He had been born in Bombay in an Indian-Jewish family. Chuck Percy has told on a number of occasions that he could have had it, which suggested to me that he tried, but failed to win approval. John Hubbard, who had been the Ambassador for less than a year, wanted to remain. He was a recess appointment made after Senate told Reagan that it didn't want anymore nominations. The sole exception that the Senate made to that rule was when Arnie Raphel was killed in an airplane crash in Pakistan and Bob Oakley was nominated to replace him. I was told that Hubbard's nomination was sent at the same time. When the Committee met, it heard Oakley's and Hubbard's statements, questioned Oakley rather vigorously for a couple of hours. Then they thanked both Oakley and Hubbard and told the latter that if he had time, the Senators would get back to him. They never did, so that Jack went to Delhi with a recess appointment. I understand that when the Bush administration began to review its ambassadorial nominations, there was a lack of interest in sending Hubbard's name to the Senate again. But it did take the White House a long time to reach a decision. Fortunately, I had a good number of people who supported my nomination.

I had never seen the Chancery or the Residence, but I did remember a comment that I read in the State magazine when these two buildings were opened. One of my colleagues noted at the time that these buildings, with all their glass and open spaces, would be a security nightmare. Since the opening many fences have been built around the property. By the time I arrived in Delhi in December, I had been thoroughly briefed on those buildings. My first impression was that they looked a little like the Kennedy Center. There were too many ducks in the pond that was in the middle of the Chancery and the fountains didn't work. The Residence was like many of the ambassadorial homes that we have built: for show -- great entertainment areas, but with very inadequate living areas.

Since I had to remain in Washington for much of 1989, I did have an opportunity to become familiar with Indian issues. As I mentioned earlier, the administration had difficulties finding a suitable Assistant Secretary. Jim Lilley at one point thought that he might get the nomination and then there were others. Dick Solomon was finally chosen, but it took time to get him through the appointment process. But despite FSX and Tiananmen, I did have an opportunity to learn about India. At that time, the Department was very nervous about letting any nominated candidate act as if he or she had already been confirmed. But the Indian Ambassador was leaving and I decided I should see him even though I had not been blessed by the Senate. I called Senator Moynihan's office and asked for an appointment. I was told that I could be squeezed in on a "courtesy" call. I told the staffer that I didn't want to take up the Senator's time unnecessarily; I wanted to talk to Moynihan about India, since he had been our Ambassador there in the mid-1970s. The staffer said he thought that the Senator would be very pleased to do that. When I got to his office, Moynihan had left for a vote; another staffer was very apologetic, but suggested that I wait for a short "courtesy" call. So I went through the same drill again, with that second staffer admitting again that the Senator would be very pleased to have an extended conversation about India. So a meeting was finally arranged; I spent about 45 minutes with Moynihan, listening to his experiences and his views of the current situation. As chairman of the South Asia subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, he had managed to stay up to date on Indian matters. He had always held very strong negative views of the Indians' "non-alignment" policy. It was one of his pet peeves. When my formal hearing was held, which Moynihan chaired, it lasted 45 minutes and was essentially a replay of our conversation in his office. He asked me the same questions he had asked me before; he knew what the answers would be. Frank Murkowski, the ranking Republican, walked in the middle of the hearings and asked me a couple of easy ones -- he was an old friend. He wished me good luck and left. That was the essence of my confirmation hearing.

I knew something about many of the Embassy's staff. I knew the DCM, Grant Smith, from reputation; he was at the time one of the two leading Southeast Asia specialists. I knew the Economic Counselor. The Political Counselor, George Sherman, had worked for me in Cairo. I knew I had a good INR man there -- Walter Anderson; he was there on a temporary assignment and was one of the Department's leading experts on India. I was very lucky: the PAO was first class and he was replaced an equally good man. There were about 280 Americans and 1500 Indians on the Embassy's staff.

As usual, I ran into the "we have always done it that way" syndrome. For example, I mentioned earlier that the fountains in the pool were not operating. I asked why only to be told that the medical staff thought they were causing damage to the ducks. The ducks had a large fan club in the Embassy; they had been residents in the courtyard since the opening of the building. Fortunately, one day the pool sprung a leak. It had to be drained; that meant that another home had to be found for the ducks. It took about six months to fix the pool. I asked that while the leak was fixed, the fountains also be put back in operating condition. When told that the pump had been taken out, I suggested that it be replaced. When that was done, I was then told that the new pump was very fragile and that it could only be put into operation on special days. I told the staff that that was not satisfactory; I wanted the fountains on all the time and if the pump broke, then we would fix it. The pump never broke; the fountains are still running and were doing so when I visited the Embassy a few months ago. The ducks never returned, as I hoped they never would. My answer to those who kept asking about the ducks, I always said that I would be glad to make one available if the inquirer would keep it at his or her house. One employee came to my office and demanded to see me to talk about the ducks. My secretary suggested that he go away because she knew that I did not want to discuss the ducks. After about fifteen minutes, he did leave. I heard all of the dialogue from the next room. After he left, my secretary told me who it was. I called the guy's boss -- the Station Chief -- and suggested that he had a staff member who obviously didn't have enough work to do. I told the Station Chief that perhaps a review of his staffing might be appropriate; I never heard another word about ducks from that organization.

The final part of the duck saga concerns a plaque that had been placed on the side of the pool which read: "On this spot, Ambassador Keating fed his water fowl thereby demonstrating his humanity to us all." I was assured that it had been given to him with tongue-in-cheek; he was known to have kicked a couple of ducks that had gotten in his way. I asked that that plaque be removed. Along the same lines, and this has been confirmed to me by Moynihan himself, I heard a story that one day soon after his arrival, Ambassador Moynihan found one of our Marine Guards standing by the pool with a brown bag in hand. Upon seeking clarification, the Ambassador was told by the Marine that it contained his (the Ambassador's) duck food. Moynihan told the Marine that he didn't have time to feed the ducks. Upon his departure from New Delhi, Moynihan was presented a plaque which said: "On this spot, Ambassador Moynihan said he didn't have time to feed the Goddamn ducks." That plaque apparently was never mounted on the pool. Such is the life of an ambassador!

The size of the Embassy did not concern me greatly. There were many agencies represented in India; each seemed to be about appropriately staffed. The total was large, but I did not think that the components were overstaffed. The usual large groups -- AID, the Station -- were relatively modestly staffed. We had an FAA component, a DSAA group, an Agriculture Attaché, a Commercial Section and the Defense Attachés. Soon after my arrival, the Defense Attaché came to see me with a request that I approve a new position of Deputy Defense Attaché. He needed a deputy, he told me, because the Army and the Air Attachés had deputies. I told the officer that the solution did not lie in adding a new deputy position, but in abolishing the deputy position already in existence. That ended that conversation and any further request for staff increases from the military. In the end, I did manage to abolish one deputy position, based on some decrease in work-load. We had a large communications unit. But Delhi was essentially the size of the Tokyo embassy and I didn't find the staffing in India egregious or out of line with other embassies in which I has served.

On the other hand, I did think that some of the constituent posts could be reduced. Bombay was about right; it is the financial center of India and we had to have representation there. It was not a large post; we had a Consul General, a commercial officer, one junior reporting officer, a large consular staff -- the third largest visa issuance post in the world -- and an administrative support group. The Delhi consular operations were almost as large. Most of the work was non-immigrant, but there was also a considerable immigrant visa workload. During my time, we discovered a visa fraud operation, as happens perhaps too often when the demand is so great.

Madras was about right in terms of staffing. On the other hand Calcutta had 18 Americans, six of whom were Marine Guards. Since we didn't do much business in Calcutta -- consular or economic -- I had serious reservations about having a Marine Guard contingent there. We didn't have that in Bombay or Madras, both of which had a much heavier substantive work-load. After lengthy discussions with our regional security officer, our Marine Sergeant, the Guard's Company Commander from Singapore and the Washington Marine Headquarters, I finally got agreement to withdraw the Calcutta contingent. That made some difference to that Consulate General's operations -- e.g., they had to store their classified material in a different way -- but that was not a major problem. In any case, this joint recommendation went to the Department's Assistant Secretary for Diplomatic security, Sheldon Krys, who turned it down. He and I argued about this with Krys maintaining that Calcutta was different because the state in which it was located had a communist government. I didn't understand that at all because it made absolutely no difference to our security interests. It is true that during the Gulf War, our USIA Library in Calcutta was shut down for three days -- the only post in the world where that happened. The Communist Youth League just blocked the entrance to the library and the state authorities did not intervene. I threatened to close all of our establishments in Calcutta; that finally got the authorities' attention and they removed the demonstrators. A long time before, the street that our building was on was renamed to "Ho Chi Minh Serani". That was about the extent of the threat that a Indian state communist government presented; it was perfectly harmless. I would have reduced the staff even more, but USIA had built a large marble mausoleum on the city's main street which was so designed that it could not be used to house the Consulate General's staff as well. The office space in this large edifice was marginal; useless space was everywhere. In any case, our recommendation with Krys' dissent was sent to the Under Secretary for Management, Ivan Selin who sided with Sheldon. Two weeks later, we got a circular telegram which said that the Marine Corps Security Company was having staffing problems and it would welcome any suggestions for reductions. That is all I needed; I sent the shortest telegram in history to Selin and Krys which said: "You just got Calcutta". And that is all said. Two weeks thereafter, the Department approved the termination of the Calcutta Marine Guard contingent. Eventually, I managed to reduce the size of Calcutta from 18 Americans to six. If I could have, I probably would have moved it to Bangalore. Calcutta was a big city, but it was of little interest to us. It was there because our first Consul to India, Benjamin Joy, was sent to Calcutta in 1896. Unfortunately, his credentials were not accepted; the Governor General, who had left a few weeks earlier, had left instructions to his successor that under no circumstances was an American representative to be recognized. The name of the departed Governor General was Lord Cornwallis, a direct descendent of the British General who left the US shores in late 1700s with somewhat less than honor. After that, it took us sixty years to have a Consul recognized in Calcutta.

Some of the Calcutta reductions went to opening a commercial section in Bangalore, which is India's "Silicon Valley". There were a number of American firms working there and our representation in that city was absolutely necessary.

I probably spent more time than most ambassadors on management issues because it is a subject that interests me. I would guess that I probably spent about 20% of my time on those matters. When I say "management" that includes everything from establishing "Housing Boards" -- to make sure that the allocation of government owned or leased housing was equitable -- to adjudicating personnel matters, such as the case of sexual harassment. That took considerable time because by the time it was closed, many other issues became involved such as substance abuse, family problems, etc. I finally had to ask the Department to evacuate the individual for medical assistance. Of course, staffing levels were always a concern. I also got involved in a construction problem, stemming from US ownership of two duplex residences that it had constructed in Delhi before my arrival. We had taken possession of one of the buildings and then found that the ground floor on the other had sunk because the Indian construction company had used cement too heavy for the ground. Also cabinets had fallen off the wall in the other building. Those events raised a question of whether the contractor was building to the agreed upon specifications. That generated a law suit which by the time I had arrived had been in court for eight years. We were paying a Bombay lawyer US-level fees to pursue the matter, but he never seemed to be able to bring the case to settlement. The two buildings just sat there deteriorating from lack of use, guarded by one person. I was anxious to bring this matter to a close, but all I got from FBO in Washington were warnings to be careful. I finally went to the Under Secretary for Management, pointing the stupidity of the situation. We were spending approximately $100,000 per annum for renting quarters for the officers that might have occupied the two buildings under dispute and probably about $50,000 for the lawyer and the value of the buildings was decreasing sharply. I threatened to occupy the buildings and challenge the builder to toss us out. John Rogers, the Under Secretary, finally took an interest and closed our dispute with the contractor and now they are occupied by two families. I was sent pictures of the buildings after they were rehabilitated and as people were moving in. So I spent a lot of time on management/administrative matters.

In some respects, I did become involved in matters which normally might be left to the DCM. My first one, unfortunately, was not comfortable making difficult personnel decisions. He was very South Asian in his approach to personnel matters! Of course, there were matters on which the DCM and some other agency disagreed; that left the final decision to me, as it should be. My first DCM was one of the best South-Asia experts in the Foreign Service and I regarded his substantive views highly. But as I have suggested before, the whole Embassy had taken on a very Asian attitude: "This is the way things have always been done". The outside wall needed repainting, but I was told that it had always looked that way. I thought the Bombay Consulate General looked terrible; I wanted it spruced up, even if it had been like that for many, many years. People just did not notice deterioration or if they did, they accepted it as a natural phenomenon. Habits develop and they become very hard to break unless some eyes are brought to bear. Women for example cut and raked the lawns; when I suggested using lawnmowers, I was told that that was too expensive; using women was the "traditional" way. I suggested once that some protection against the sun be provided for people standing in the visa line only to be told that they had always stood that way. It is true that there were rotations among the American staff, but I noticed that both in Cairo and in India, that since these posts were not among the highly desired, the vacancies tended to be filled by specialists in the area who tended to accept local culture and customs without challenge. The culture did not regard change highly; it had its own tempo and its own pace. In addition, Delhi was a very comfortable post for our staff; the school was very good, the housing was more than adequate, food was plentiful and many families had servants. It didn't require much effort to live well and I don't think when American supervisors felt comfortable with the status quo, the local staff wouldn't upset time honored practices. I don't think the American staff had as much drive as might have been the case in other posts. I think I need to note that the Administrative Counselor whom I inherited was selected out, and he did not perform at all satisfactorily the year that he was with me. He was followed by a good man; he and I developed a list of actions that needed to be taken and we got a lot of things done. So I believe that the management of an Embassy depends on having good persons -- preferably people that the ambassador has known favorably -- and an ambassador who cares about management/administrative matters and who expects improvements to be made all the time. If the ambassador doesn't care, very few on his or her staff will.

The second one, Ken Brill, was superb and he, by the time I left, functioned as a normal DCM should.

I should mention that not only the Embassy was finding it difficult to change. I had a similar criticism of the Department, particularly in the computer field. I was not satisfied that it was taking advantage of the new information technologies; I hadn't been when I was in Tokyo or Cairo or Washington. I thought the Department's use of computers was antediluvian. I finally managed to get two terminals in my office in Delhi because the Department had two systems: a classified one and unclassified one. That takes two terminals. I used the unclassified terminal to retrieve and use the management base and the classified one for most messages to Washington. It was a very unsatisfactory process. The Department's system is basically designed by and for the technicians. When the Housing Board was setup, I wanted a data base that would permit to see what assignments were being made. I told the technician that I did not want to manipulate the data base, but just be able to retrieve the information. That was done, but when I asked how I could look for a particular piece of information, I was given a thick stack of papers which was a print out of the data base. I asked why I couldn't retrieve the information on the terminal. I was told the system would not permit to seek just one piece of information; I would have to go through the data base until I found what I wanted. That is what I mean by a system established for the technician's use and not for the users. It was very difficult to get an overview of the housing situation which is what a supervisor needs. This was a State wide program which we installed while I was in Delhi; we also installed an inventory program also developed by the Department. Fortunately, we had Burt English as our General Services Officer and he had been involved in a pilot project and therefore was familiar with the programs and knew how to use them. The new inventory program was a major step forward because until its installation, every inventory was taken by human beings, with some unexplained losses.

Before leaving for Delhi, I got the standard briefing. I was told that we were not doing much in military cooperation, that Gandhi had managed to take a small step towards economic liberalization in 1984 which had not progressed very far and that Indians were not easy to deal with. By 1989, Gandhi had reversed himself and had run a campaign against further liberalization; he lost that election. Nothing was said to me about Kashmir; I heard a lot about the Punjab and the rebellion that was taking place there. Commerce didn't show much interest in India, but I did talk to a lot of corporations -- all of whom told me that they were watching, which, translated into plain English, meant that they had no intention of looking for business in India. The American private sector was interested, but only over the long run. One of the best briefings I received was from representatives of the academic community, funded by INR. That took place at the Meridian House and I found it extremely useful. In general, I think that India did not rank very high on anyone's agenda in Washington.

At that point in time, even the responsible regional bureau looked on India as a step-child. The Middle East always consumed so much time of the NEA leadership that no other issue ranked very important on a day-to-day basis. Basically, the NEA Assistant Secretary was then, and had been for decades, essentially the Assistant Secretary for Middle East Affairs. During Murphy's tour as Assistant Secretary (1983-89) he appeared once at a Congressional hearing on Southeast Asia. He will tell you that he wasn't prepared and took a real beating from Solarz. There were a few Members of Congress that were concerned about Southeast Asia -- Solarz and Moynihan. Much concern about the subcontinent stemmed from the danger of a nuclear armament. Furthermore, since both India and Pakistan came under the jurisdiction of one deputy assistant secretary, any policy initiative towards one of the countries immediately triggered concern about the other's reaction. I used to argue about this constant "coupling". Under those circumstances, it was impossible to develop the best US position towards India -- or Pakistan -- and then worry about the impact on the neighbor. The concern of not upsetting either country was uppermost in the policymaker's mind right at the beginning; that warped our policy towards both countries and in fact blocked making much progress even on bilateral issues.

It was Washington's view in 1989 that India was on the side of the Soviet Union in the Cold War, although people did admit that it did not support the Soviets on all issues. Nevertheless, India was linked to the Soviets since it was using Soviet weapons and equipment, traded heavily with Moscow and could be counted to support the Soviets in the UN. I should note however that this view, that had prevailed for so long, was beginning to be amended in 1989, primarily due to changes taking place in Moscow under Gorbachev's guidance. The Indian Chief of Staff had paid a visit to his American counterpart and vice-versa.

I found that when I reached Delhi and had a chance to acclimate myself that the Washington views as expressed to me during the briefings were somewhat outdated, particularly concerning stated Indian government attitudes as perceived in Washington. I was extremely fortunate because when I arrived, a new government under V.P. Singh had just been formed. The Prime Minister had employed in his immediate office one of the best Indian foreign service officers, Ronen Sen, who is now the Ambassador to Moscow. He was very bright and an agile and adept operator. The Director General for American Affairs in the Foreign Ministry was P.K. Singh who is now the Indian Ambassador to Israel. He was also an unusually competent operator. Both Sen and Singh were a real pleasure to work with; I used to chat very privately with them about issues that had not yet even risen and about improving US-India relationships. I found those contacts very rewarding. Both had worked for the Gandhi government, one in the Foreign Ministry and the other in the Prime Minister's office. The fact that Singh kept someone in his own office who had worked for his predecessor was not highly unusual, but it tells you something about Sen's reputation. I found that in the Foreign and Defense Ministries, with some rare exceptions, the officials were favorably disposed towards the US. The Finance Ministry was mixed -- many of the anti-privatization ideologues still resided there; the domestic ministries could be downright rude. Of course, the Finance Ministry had a bunker mentality because they were sure that when the sorry state of the Indian economy would become public, they were sure that they would be blamed. In fact, when the current Finance Minister took the job in 1991, he admitted that as a former member of the Finance Ministry bureaucracy, he was sorry what they had wrought and that, as he was coming to the end of his career, he would like to redress the damage done by his former colleagues. And he proceeded rapidly to do just that!

The tensions between the US and India were caused in part by the Indian bureaucracy with the support and sometimes with the leadership of the politicians. While I was Ambassador, Indian bureaucrats, during the GATT talks in Geneva, were not well received by other representatives.

The head of the Indian delegation was a) bound to talk too long and b) would lecture the West in general and the US in particular. The Indian bureaucracy shared with some politicians some anti-US sentiments. I must say that the Indian "administrative service" -- as the top 3500 bureaucrats are called -- and the Indian Foreign service were staffed with some very bright people. You might not have agreed with their analyses, but it was usually very intelligent. I came to have a lot of respect for them, even if I didn't always like them and even, as I often did, disagree with them. They are in general extremely competent and well educated.

I arrived in Delhi during a period of change. There was a new government headed by P.C. Sen. He promised economic liberalization, but never seemed to get around to it. I had been in Delhi for a couple of months when I found out that the Air Attaché had a plane in Islamabad -- a C-12 twin engine, propeller driven. I asked my DCM to raise the question of my using this plane with the Foreign Ministry so that I could take some trips within India. He told me that the Indians would certainly not approve the use of the plane. I accepted that advice at that time, but I kept going back to the issue with the DCM. Finally, I told him that I expected him to take the matter up with the Indians; at worst, they could only say "No." He finally, and very reluctantly, raised the question with P.K. Singh. Much to the DCM's surprise, Singh said, "Fine. No problem." No one had ever asked before; it was the first time that such a request had been made since 1971 when the Indians asked that the plane be withdrawn from their country after it had by mistake flown over some Indian troop concentration just before the Bangladesh war. But the Embassy had always prejudged the answer. My predecessors had used the plane, now stationed in Pakistan, for trips to Nepal or Sri Lanka. But the issue of using the plane internally in India had never been raised in twenty years and assumptions -- wrong ones, as it turned out -- had been made by our staff. In fact, by the time I left India, I am sure the Indians would have permitted our own Air Attaché to have his own plane stationed at the Delhi airport. This is another illustration of the ingrained practices that I encountered when I became Ambassador.

I believe that in this period of transition in the world away from the Cold War the Indians were reviewing their relationships with us. They were also giving serious consideration to the restructuring of their economic policies, but unfortunately they were also reviewing their domestic political policies. That latter review doomed economic liberalization under Singh. He got caught up trying to gain the support of the "other backward" castes. These were not the "untouchables," but were people still at the bottom of the economic and social ladder. Singh resuscitated a report that had been submitted over a decade earlier which had recommended that a larger share of government jobs be set aside for these "other backward" castes. The government had already set aside 27% of its jobs for "scheduled" castes -- i.e. what had been known as "untouchables" -- and tribes. Singh wanted to add another set aside of 27% for other lower caste members. This meant that almost half of all government jobs were reserved for people of little education and social skills. That left little for everyone else; as could be expected, there was a major backlash. University students, who were likely to be the biggest losers in this new policy, burned themselves in the streets. There were a lot of tensions generated by Singh's "set aside" policy.

In addition, Singh had to face the beginning of the dispute over the mosque at Iodia, which gave the Hindu National Party an opportunity to demagogue. So Singh had a lot of domestic problems on his hands. Then the Kashmir issue raised its head again in late 1989. So Singh had his hands full with domestic issues. There was turbulence inside India, although it was not as virulent as it has been at other times. In early 1990, Washington became quite concerned that India and Pakistan might once again be involved in hostilities. That concern stimulated a trip by Bob Gates in May to both Pakistan and India. Seymour Hersch wrote an article about that trip, which makes for fascinating reading, although erroneous. The international tensions between Pakistan and India affected the Indian internal politics. By this time, our relationships with India were good enough to permit to talk to the head of the Parliamentary BJP group, L.K. Advani. I told him that he was inflaming the population -- he had just made a strong anti-Pakistan speech in Calcutta -- which I thought was unfortunate. Advani, who had participated for many years in the militant organized wing of the party, denied that he had done any such thing. He was a very precise man and pinpointed all that he had said and what had been said in a communiqué that he had issued after his speech. I admitted that he had not inflamed the passions, but that the speaker who had followed him had called for war on Pakistan. Since Advani had been on the same platform, it was reasonable to assume that he agreed with that sentiment. He accepted that perception and the rhetoric did cool after that. The key element of this story is that an American Ambassador could counsel Indian politicians and be heard; that had not happened very often before. So the relationship was changing. I had good access to all sides of the political spectrum.

The Indians do use the Pakistan issue to rally political support, but I do not believe it is used as widely or as often as it is in Pakistan. There the calls for "freeing Kashmir" are frequent. Benazir Bhutto does it all the time. In India, it is an issue that the opposition will raise in the hopes, never publicly pronounced, to curry favor with the Indian Muslims. I don't believe that it has been a very successful tactic; the Kashmir situation is not one that seems to be uppermost in the minds of Indian Muslims. The tensions with Pakistan were always present; they reached fever level in 1990. When I first arrived in India in 1989, I was assured by all to whom I spoke that Kashmir was a "manageable" issue and that the real problem was the Punjab. By the time I left in 1992, everyone said that Punjab was no problem, but that Kashmir certainly was. The Indians were surprised by the Kashmir developments. Bob Gates' visit was helpful in containing the tensions, although I should note that neither Bob Oakley, our Ambassador in Pakistan, or I thought that war between the two countries was imminent. It was true that slowly, but surely, the tensions were being heightened; if a mistake had been made by either side, major combat could have resulted. During this tense period, I went to see General Sharma, the commander of all Indian forces, with my Defense Attaché. He was a nice man from the Punjab. He asked his operations officer and his intelligence officer to join us; they showed me on maps where the Indian forces were deployed along the border. The General emphasized that his troops were not in a war-like position. They were training in the Mouthy, which was not the an appropriate attack-launch area. He added that that his troops didn't have any heavy equipment with them and therefore certainly could not be expected to go to war. I asked whether our military attachés could make a reconnaissance of the border areas to verify the situation; he readily agreed and allowed the inspection to proceed. It is interesting to note that Bob Oakley was receiving similar reassurances in Islamabad from the Pakistani. It is true, I believe, that his Air Attaché in Pakistan was more pessimistic about likely events, but most of the military in my Embassy agreed with the assessment that neither side was really preparing for a military engagement. The Indians had a very good commander of their troops on the border, General Rodriguez, who later succeeded Sharma. His troops were on alert to respond to any Pakistani attack, but certainly did not seem to have deployed his forces in an aggressive mode. I think that was also true of the Pakistani forces.

The politicians, however, kept shouting at each other, which always has some risks. Much of the debate was over the Kashmir. The Gates' mission went to Islamabad and suggested that the Pakistani stop training Kashmiri rebels. He was told that 31 training camps were being closed. He reported that to the Indians, who welcomed that news. Pakistanis subsequently denied that they had passed that information to Gates; whatever happened, the fact that the Indians heard the report eased the tensions. I believed that the importance of the Gates mission was in the symbolism that an American official was welcomed in both Delhi and Islamabad on the same trip who was perceived by both sides as an honest broker and not a partisan for one country or the other. Neither Pakistan nor India saw Gates as a proponent of its point of view. The Gates mission gave both sides an excuse to disengage gracefully from an escalating situation and both were thankful for that.

There have of course been other US efforts to mediate or at least reduce the tensions on the subcontinent. We can play a constructive role if the process is well and carefully managed. Also it is important to have the right American. Bob Gates was good and should get full credit for his efforts. Sey Hersch only saw the dangers of a nuclear exchange; that was not really in the cards. Bob Gates did come at a key juncture and performed a valuable service; he set the stage for further US efforts on improving India-Pakistan relations which came subsequently. Sending a high level US emissary is a good process if the timing is propitious and if the person is skilled. I did not resent the intervention of a Washington representative; if done correctly, it can be helpful to an Embassy.

I like now to return to my observations about the Indian economic scene. In my three years, I think that the changes were more psychological than real. The GDP growth rate was 3%, as it is today. That is better than the 2.4% that it used to be which matched the birth rate, but it is not adequate. In order to have an impact on the lives of an ordinary Indian, that growth rate has to be in the 10-12% range. As it is, the 3% rate can be attributed in large measure to the good fortune that the Indians enjoyed from their weather; they have had good monsoons for four years in a row, which is unprecedented. That allowed a major increase in agricultural production. There was a shift in attitude among the economic experts. The pre-1989 concern about the risks of multinationals investing in India and thereby "taking over" was replaced by a confidence that the country could manage foreign investment without losing its sovereignty. For example, when Pepsi Cola showed interest in developing a bottling capacity in India, there ensued a long drawn out negotiation. Finally, that company went into partnership with the government of the Punjab. As part of the deal, Pepsi had to establish an agricultural research station which explored ways to improve tomato production. Those tomatoes then were turned into paste which was canned and made available, for example, to pizza producers who used it for a topping. In exchange, Pepsi was allowed to make soft drinks and snacks. The major problem was that a Pepsi manufacturing facility in the Punjab was quite acceptable, but that was not really an appropriate area for tomato growing. But that is what the government wanted and Pepsi had to go along. I visited the area and was given a briefing by a Punjab government official. He told us about the research facility and about the additional crop that the farmers could grow. Not a word about the bottling plant. When I asked why that had not been mentioned, he said that he had nothing to do with that. He, like many of his colleagues, found it very difficult to link American investments in consumer goods with programs that they considered worthwhile. To add to Pepsi's burden, the Indian government refused to let Pepsi use its own bottles; the labels had to have an Indian name on them. So all the bottles had to be repainted, which cost several million; they now read "Lar Pepsi" -- "Lar" being the Hindi word for "wave."

I saw this same attitude one day during a party given on Holi -- an Indian holiday, which I sometimes thought was sponsored by Indian tailors, because the custom is that on that day you pour some colored water on people who are theoretically wearing new suits, thereby ruining them. I don't think that anybody wore new suits, but the custom continues. We were in the garden of a rather modest house under a tent. The table had on it all sorts of imported whiskeys and scotches and food. One Indian gentleman came and sat down next to me and started the conversation by saying that he was not sure that he even wanted to talk to me. I told him the decision was up to him. I found out that he was an economic advisor to Rajiv Gandhi. He told me that Pepsi Cola wanted to sell potato chips for 60 paise; he was incensed because one could buy the same nutritional value for 10 paise worth of ground-nuts, which were plentiful and available to all. Of course, at the gates of the house there were lots of people begging which was also one of the Holi customs. I noted that he was sitting under a tent, enjoying lots of food and imported spirits, saying that every Indian had all the nourishment he or she needed. I suggested we go to the gate and ask the beggars whether they had all they wanted or whether they wanted to come in to share in the spread under the tent. That of course ended the conversation, but enabled me to make the point that people should have a choice on how they might spend their money. He stormed away, but I saw him again on several occasions and we got along well. There is an attitude of "big brother" knowing best which inhibits a true performance of an open market. The view was that the upper class could tell others how to behave even if it itself did not conform with its own dictates. It was a very paternalistic view, but I think that is changing, albeit slowly.

At another party, I ran into another gentleman who was raving about how the Indian constitution should be enforced. One of his Indian friends asked whether that was really what he wanted, noting that the first man had an alcoholic drink in his hands, which was contrary to the constitution. So we often noted contradictions in the Indian attitudes. But as I said, changes are occurring. Coca Cola when it first considered investing in India was to be part of a joint venture with a cookie-maker; that didn't work. So it finally bought up the largest Indian soft drink producer which had been campaigning against allowing Coca Cola to open production facilities in India. That avoided the necessity of investing in social "good" deeds, as Pepsi had done and Coca Cola is now prospering in India. Coca Cola did not have to repaint its bottles; those sold in India look the same as the ones in the US. India now has Pizza Hut, Kentucky Fried Chicken and other American food chains which is a recent development indicating considerable shifts in Indian attitudes on economic development.

The Bhopal accident had occurred five years earlier. It was not a major issue any longer by 1989. The Indians had requested that the plant be built where it was built and no Americans were involved in the actual operations of the plant. But no American had been there since 1984 and I decided that I would visit the site. When I got there, I was told that I was only the second American Ambassador who had ever visited Bhopal -- the first having been Galbraith and that was in the late 1950s. Periodically, the Bhopal explosion is raised partly because the settlement of $740 million dollars still just sits in a bank account. Some stipends have been paid from it, but the bulk of the payment remains untouched. The Indian government has refused to run any tests to see what the extent of the injuries and personal permanent damages really are. Anyone who says that he or she was in Bhopal at the time of the accident -- even if unverified -- has a claim on the settlement. The government seems to be unable to reach a decision on how to distribute the proceeds. The settlement was made on the basis that the monetary compensation of $740 million would cover all civil and criminal penalties. That was an excessive amount in Indian terms, in light of what the fines are if an Indian is killed in a motor accident. By US standards, it was a pittance. The Indian Supreme Court found, as a result of a suit started by one of the many lawyers in India, that while the government could settle civil damages, it could not agree on a settlement on criminal damages. So a warrant has been issued for Mr. Henderson, the former head of Union Carbide, by the Bhopal court which can only be served should he ever return to India. Recently Union Carbide sold the rest of its property in India, but the settlement remains frozen. Unfortunately, the whole Bhopal process dampened enthusiasm for American investors to a degree. It affected even some Indian investments because it became clear to all that Indian law did not limit corporate liability; it permitted suits to be petitioned to parties in a foreign country that had no longer any involvement in the management of a facility. Of course, the Bhopal accident and subsequent settlement was caught in the political upheaval that caused Rajiv Gandhi's fall; he, after agreeing to the settlement and having the courts approve it retroactively, had a plan to sell it to the country, but was never able to do so because he was defeated. So potential investors became wary in light of the Union Carbide experience; they saw the possibility of similar fates for them. Indian corporations have talked about finding some ways to limit liabilities, but haven't been successful as yet. There are still legal impediments to foreign investments, but at least India has a body of law and a functioning legal system and more lawyers than we have. The barriers are primarily caused by the fact that the laws don't spell out every detail of every investment process, leaving open questions that can only be resolved in court. But then India is not the only country that suffers from that defect.

I should mention briefly how I spent a normal day as Ambassador. For the first six months, I spent part of almost every day calling on people. I called on all the Cabinet Ministers, of which there were many -- 32, if I remember correctly. I also decided that I would call on all of my ambassadorial colleagues, a practice that many American ambassadors do not follow. I was advised to call only on those that represented major powers, but I wanted to cover all of them. I called on them in precedent order, starting with the Dean of the Diplomatic Corps and finished with the Yugoslav Ambassador who had presented his credentials just three days before me. He is now the Slovene Ambassador in Washington. I called on 77 ambassadors; there were more countries accredited, but some were represented by charges or by ambassadors who had arrived after I had. When I got to the Yugoslav, I took a bottle of champagne with me so that I could celebrate my last call. I think it was time well invested; my contacts stood me in good stead for the rest of my tour. I had become acquainted with many and I could take to all of them. Those ambassadors had appreciated that I had called on them and it made a difference -- far more than I had thought. I made it clear that no return visit was required and only a few did so. One who came to see me was the new Papal Nuncio; when he drove to the gate of the Embassy, he was asked to open the trunk of his car, as we did with all visitors. He felt insulted and turned around and left, but he never mentioned the incident to me. I used to see many ambassadors frequently. The Dean of the Corps, who is now the Mauritius Ambassador in Washington, lived nearby and I used to attend his "welcome and farewell" functions. In general, the ambassadors were very good.

One of the first social events I attended was at the Soviet Embassy, which was also just down the street. The Ambassador was Victor Isakoff, who had spent eleven years in Washington as the Congressional Liaison officer for the Soviet Embassy. After Washington, he went to Brazil, which he thought he would hate, but actually became fascinated by the culture. After 18 months or so, the Soviets sent him to India which he hated. The end of that story was that Isakoff was pulled out of Delhi a year before retirement and assigned to the Foreign Ministry in Moscow which, as I understood it, made considerable difference to his pensions and other benefits. I think Victor was not well treated by his government. He was not a bad ambassador; we got along well, but I don't think that he was among the best of the Soviet foreign affairs officials. His successor was abler -- he had been the director of the Soviet Union's foreign service personnel and was the one who maneuvered Victor's early reassignment out of India so that he could succeed him in Delhi. The assignment of an ambassador such as Isakoff did not indicate a lack of interest on the part of the Soviet Union in India. As a matter of fact, while I was serving in Delhi, the Soviets constructed a four story apartment building for their personnel which was right behind the Swedish ambassador's residence. So the Soviets could look right into the Swede's gardens, which was a violation of the rules of the diplomatic enclave which barred the construction of structures that would interfere with the privacy of other neighbors.

When I arrived in Delhi, the Indians had a retired foreign service officer, Eric Gonzalves, who was running their international house. His brother was the Indian ambassador to Moscow. I remember that one day in 1990, Eric was hosting a seminar to which he invited me. He told me that the Soviet Ambassador and the Japanese Ambassador were expected. He asked me to be provocative -- the subject was "Europe over the next twelve months." I accepted and I thought that the Japanese would be speaking after Victor and before me. I arrived just as Isakoff was finishing, which was unfortunate because I didn't get a chance to hear his full remarks. Eric, when he saw me, asked me to make my presentation next so that the audience could contrast the Soviet and American points of view. I could have killed him! In any case, I proceeded and suggested, that based on current events, I thought that Germany would be reunified within the year. It was a lucky guess, but I was just trying to be provocative. Victor in response said that he basically agreed with my analysis, but he thought that Germany would not be reunified within a year. When the discussion was opened to the audience, Victor was severely criticized, particularly from some Indian professors, for not defending socialism. He argued that the world was changing and so was the Soviet Union. All of the defects of the old system would be thrown out and the good aspects would be kept. He admitted that the way socialism had been run in Eastern Europe had some major problems which would have to be corrected. I was accused of "imperialism" which I said was really no longer -- if it ever was -- the direction of US foreign policy. I found the whole exchange very educational because it was clear evidence how far the Soviets had come in their thinking and how little progress some Indian professors had made in their understanding of the new realities of the world. Not too long after that, the Downtown Rotary Club invited Victor and myself to make a joint presentation. We were introduced by the Indian Foreign Minister who was the past President of the Rotary Club. Victor and I got to the Club a little early and had an opportunity to chat. All of a sudden, we heard a stirring behind us. Victor thought that the guests were commenting on the fact that the Soviet and American Ambassadors were talking to each other. We gave our presentations; they were so similar that it would been hard to tell which one of us had made them. The Indians were nonplused by the whole event; they had a difficult time adjusting to the new world. I commented that the joint Soviet-American appearance was evidence that the Cold War was over and that the Indians had better adjust their sights if they were to be world players. When the coup against Gorbachev took place, Albert Gonzalves, the Indian Ambassador to Moscow, is said to have commented back to his Foreign Office that finally the Soviet people had taken control of their own affairs. That brought a comment from the Prime Minister to the effect that people should be careful about commenting on situations because things might not be all they seem. He may have been right because of course, the coup didn't succeed and Gorbachev returned to power -- some saying that he had fostered the coup in the first place. After that the joke in Delhi was that the only way that the Indian Ambassador in Moscow could get close to the Soviet government was if he were assigned to Mongolia! The point I wanted to make was that the Indians had a difficult time accommodating to the changes in the world and particularly the end of the Cold War.

I traveled a lot through the country. I had decided from the outset that India, being as large as it was, needed to be seen as completely as possible. Furthermore, if I wanted to understand the country, I needed to see it. Delhi was not India, just as Washington is not the U.S. I decided that one week of every month would be devoted to traveling. I got to almost all of the Indian states; I did not visit the Kashmir out of concern for stirring up potential violence; I did not get to Eastern India -- Assam and that area. Otherwise, I think I saw a considerable amount of the country. Almost always, these visits gave me an opportunity to make some public remarks; in fact, I found that I could give the same speech in three different locations and have it published in Delhi as a new news item every time. The Delhi papers picked up the story from the local papers, so I would get considerable mileage from the same speech. The coverage by the local papers was usually objective and I was satisfied with their coverage. When I first arrived in India, I would receive every morning a stack of news clips coming from the English language press all over India. One day soon after my arrival, I asked the Public Affairs Officer why I was not seeing any items out of the vernacular press; I was only getting summaries of those stories. He said that it would obviously have to be translated; I suggested that that might be a worthwhile effort and the PAO hired a couple of translators. Then I had a much broader picture of the press coverage of all the items of interest to us. I also insisted thereafter that whenever the Indian press was invited to my residence or the PAO's house or to other functions, it would include representatives of the vernacular press. That paid big dividends. That part of the press that had been virulently against the U.S. started to include our point of view; it didn't necessarily change their point of view but at least the readers had an opportunity to be exposed to a wider spectrum of opinion.

My availability to the press and for public appearances soon became known and I had more invitations that I could possibly accept. I was asked to dedications and openings and many other events. I tried to do as many as I could, but I just didn't have time for all. Because of my personal view that the business community was the key to many other doors, I paid special attention to it. I saw all the leading politicians in Delhi and the states because I always paid a call on the Chief Ministers of the states that I visited. One day, I went to Delhi University to make a presentation. I had visited the campus before and never had any problem. But when it was announced that I would appear, some students -- about forty out of 25,000 -- staged a demonstration. The administration called me in a panic and asked that I postpone my appearance. The students were members of the "Muslim Student League." It was the only time that I was barred from making a public appearance. I talked to University groups during periods on internal tensions -- the quotas for the other "Backward Caste", which I described earlier. I went to St. Stephen's -- a small Catholic College -- and ate with the students who were quite upset by the new policy. The school had actually closed because of the student sit-ins and other demonstrations. I talked to them about foreign policy and then I asked whether I could ask them some questions. There ensued a fascinating hour during which they explained to me why they opposed the new policy. I found that the students' explanation was different from what others were saying; they were very articulate and were trying to be fair and objective. They didn't object to the policy, but to the process which gave preference to members of a certain group, whether qualified or not. The government was not trying to educate the high school members of that group to rise to University levels; rather the University levels were being brought down to fit the qualifications of the members of that particular caste. Later, those caste members were given preference for government jobs, but even after having been given employment, the caste member's children were still given preference when it came time for them to enter university and later government employment. The St. Stephen students were willing -- even if reluctantly -- to have preference given to one generation of caste members, but saw no rationale for giving that same preference to succeeding generations. They saw it as reverse discrimination against them. One preference per family was all that they saw as justified -- a point of view which I thought had some validity. In fact, a lot of preferential treatment was given to caste members who had graduated from their low social and economic status and were in fact part of the Indian middle class. That session with those students was one of the events that made the ambassadorial job so interesting, even if the event was not of any interest to Washington. It was however an illustration of the difficulties the government was encountering in the pursuit of its domestic agenda. In fact, it was this caste preference issue that barred V.P. Singh from doing much about privatization and eventually caused his government's downfall.

I should say that Washington's interest in India waned and heightened during my three years in Delhi. There was of course the 1990 Pakistan/India tension which caused the Gates trip that I have already mentioned. Then came the Iraq invasion and "Desert Storm." That period started rather badly. The Indian Foreign Minister, I.K. Gujral, was the only senior official of any government that visited Baghdad; not only that, but while there, he gave Saddam a big hug and flew to occupied Kuwait. When he returned to Delhi, I asked him what he thought he was doing; after all, a coalition of countries friendly to India had been assembled to oppose Iraq and they certainly could not be happy about his actions. He said that he had to go to Kuwait because there were some Indian citizens there; in fact he mentioned that he had brought some back on the plane with him. I suggested that was a lame excuse that the Philippines and Kuwait would hardly appreciate, not to mention the U.S. I knew that he had not brought back many Indians who worked at menial tasks in Kuwait, but rather some well paid professionals. So Gujral did not endear himself to us. But we did manage to get V.P. Singh's approval to move some aircraft -- C 130s -- through Agra at the start of our military build-up in the Gulf. After Singh's fall, we continued this practice under the brief regime of Chandra Shekhar, who was an old line socialist and a thug -- I liked him and he was good to deal with, whom I had known for sometime. The Indian Air Force cooperation in fueling our planes could not have been better. We had our people at the airport assisting with the landing, fueling and take-offs. As we approached the war, I was called by the Prime Minister. He told me that the refueling operation was becoming a domestic political issue. Rajiv Gandhi had just spoken out against it; he had been briefed at my request from the beginning. So I went to see Rajiv to find out why he was all of a sudden taking this new line. He told me that Washington shouldn't be concerned; he was speaking out for domestic purposes. I told him that that wouldn't wash; I would be glad to report that he had "lost his marbles." Washington would not accept such a flimsy excuse from a world leader. People usually did not talk to Gandhi that way, but I had found out that one could be frank with him. In any case, Shaker told me that we would have to end the operation, which by this time was down to one flight each way a day. I asked him not to make that request then. I said that I would be back to him in two days. I cabled Washington and pointed out that the Indians had been very cooperative and that I had hoped that the operation would not need to be brought to a close at the Indians' request. Since there were so few flights using Agra by then, I suggested that it be rerouted so that the refueling would not become an issue. Within 24 hours, Washington told me that the flights would no longer land in India. So I was able to tell the Indian government that we had stopped an operation on our own; it was the first time that our two governments had done something cooperatively. Shaker appreciated our action. As soon as the ground war was over, the refueling operation began again without any difficulties.

Let me spend a few minutes talking about the non-State Department contingents that were stationed in Delhi. Let me start with AID. By the time I arrived in India, all plans had been set for the AID staff to move out of the Chancery to a new building of their own. That mission was responsible for an annual program of $22 million in direct grant programs and about $80-85 million in PL 480 food grants, two-thirds of which was administered by CARE and one-third by Catholic Relief. The PL 480 program did nevertheless require some AID supervision. In any case, the AID mission moved out to a huge complex which now belongs to the Ministry of Science; that was about half an hour away by car. I was not too happy about the arrangement but since all the contracts and necessities had been done, I couldn't stop it, but I did require that the Mission Director maintain an office in the Chancery and that he spend eight hours each week there so that I could talk to him if I needed to. Both of the AID Directors who worked for me were very good and I did work closely with them. I worked with them in getting a new population control program reestablished. I urged that the $22 million be spent more on such activities as feasibility studies and other planning operations which might in the end result in greater American/Indian private sector cooperation. I became involved in both program planning and project approvals. I enjoyed my collaboration with AID.

I was also blessed by having two very good USIA directors during my tour. I kept them quite busy and I saw them every day, even though they were also in a separate building ten-fifteen minutes away by car. The USIA operation was very good; we did have some problems with their branch offices, but managed to correct them over time. I used USIA in conducting our public diplomacy; I asked the PAO to make speeches -- the second one was so good on economics that I would let him address that issue in public fora. As I mentioned before, I made an effort to be available to the press myself and always on the record. My experience was that if I said anything "off the record" it would sooner or later find its way into public print and often garbled. I didn't have any secrets and I wasn't afraid of being quoted by name. I have never understood how "senior officials" of the U.S. government could make pronouncements on U.S. policy and then demand that they remain anonymous. That doesn't make any sense to me at all! If you're willing to talk to the press, then you should be willing to let the world know to whom it was talking. I learned that Mansfield, who was always "on the record." When I first arrived in Delhi, the press was not accustomed to meeting with the American ambassador; it took some coaxing and I asked the PAO to host some social occasions so that I could meet the local press. When I returned to Washington, as I did on many occasions, I always made sure that I got an opportunity to meet at the Foreign Press Club. I met the Indian press there. I would brief the press upon my return from Washington consultations, usually in a press conference. In 1990, I had just returned from the States after some minor surgery, just at the time that the Gulf War was at its height. I wanted to have a reception to show people that I was alright; the DCM thought that was not necessary, but I insisted. In any case, the reception was held on the evening when we stopped hostilities in Iraq; everyone thought I had been very prescient. The press was there. When I traveled in India, I always talked to the local reporters no matter how small their newspaper might be. I let it be widely known that I was always available to the press. I felt that it was important that even the smallest local newspaper heard and carried our message and as I said earlier, I knew that my comments would also be replayed in the Delhi papers. Repetition is always useful. My staff was very supportive of my public relations efforts; I used to discuss my appearances with them. My first Political Counselor, George Sherman, was an old journalist and he of course thought that my approach was great. His successor, Robin Raphel, now the Assistant Secretary for South Asia, was also very much in favor of my openness. I should say that I would not recommend that every ambassador follow my pattern under all circumstances, but in India, during the period I was there, I think an open approach to the press was the right strategy. There were times during my predecessors' periods when, even if they wanted to, they would not have attracted any interest from the Indian press.

The Station was fairly small and relatively inactive. I am sure that I knew all that it was doing. Commerce was represented in Delhi and that worked well. When I first got to Delhi, the Commercial Counselor was someone I had known previously, Mel Searal, who is now in China. He had a small three-man staff. He was replaced by one of my choices, Jim Morehouse, who had been at the War College in my class. I think the commercial work being done in the late 1980s was different than that I had done twenty years earlier. There was considerably more high-level attention paid to it and that meant that there were more people involved beyond the reporting officer and his or her backstopping office in Washington. In fact, I used the whole Delhi Embassy to push American commercial interests; whoever I thought could be effective in pursuing our interests. It was a field that always had been of interest; furthermore, by this time, the Department of State had come to the conclusion that commercial work was a worthwhile effort and urged every ambassador to be, in fact, the chief commercial officer in a country. It was not clear in the late 1980s and early 1990s that India was yet ready to be a fruitful market for American investment and sales, but we felt that it was worth pursuing. We knew that others were selling goods that we produced and felt that we should be in competition. Most of the private American efforts were in the sales business, although some companies like Caterpillar and Timken had made investments. Dupont was trying to do something and finally did manage to get an investment off the ground after I had left. We, including me personally, worked with the American companies and the Indian government. Before I arrived, Air India had signed a contract for six 747's with some additional follow-ons later. It had signed a letter of intent to GE for the engines. For no reasons that we were able to divine, that letter was withdrawn and the contract awarded to Rolls Royce. I found that unacceptable and spent eighteen months first slowing down the procurement and then having the whole bid reopened. By that time, unfortunately, the GE representative in Delhi had made some nasty comments about the head of Air India which effectively knocked GE out of the running. But fortunately Pratt Whitney won the new competition; I was pleased by that development. That is just an illustration of my personal and the Embassy staff's involvement in commercial matters. I think it is was then and is now an appropriate role for an American ambassador. At the time I was in India, it was especially appropriate because India was in an economic liberalization process and the visibility of the American ambassador in this issue I think was helpful particularly for American enterprises that wanted to take advantage of the new Indian economic policy. On one occasion, I flew for one day to Janshedpur in Bihar to cut the tape when Timken Bearing opened a plant there. I also went to the Punjab to see the Pepsi-Cola plant despite some political opposition. I believed that at that juncture in Indian economic development, the visible support of the American Ambassador might be helpful. I also became involved in the sales of American products and would periodically personally take up the cudgels with the relevant Indian Minister on one product or another. This was not a day-to-day activity because I tended to get involved only in major sales, such as aircraft or engines for their military tanks. On the latter, the Indians wanted to get a few samples for free "for testing purposes;" that didn't get them very far.

My Military Attaché staff was very useful. We had representatives of the Army, Navy and Air Force. The Indians had a large military establishment and our Defense Attaché Office maintained good contacts with it. That staff was invaluable in 1990 as I have described earlier. Although their function was essentially intelligence, our military attachés had such good relations with the Indian military high command that when I decided early in my tour that US contacts with the Indian military should be increased, it was easy to do because the attachés just opened the doors for me. Some of the friendly relationships I had in India were with the three Indian Service Chiefs. Surprisingly, the military gave no indication of any anti-American feeling. It was probably that part of the Indian society which was most separated from the rest of the world. Every once in a while, they might be permitted to go to the Soviet Union, but no other military in the world made any efforts to establish contacts with them. The US government has some programs that never get much attention, but can be very useful to foreign policy. One such program was the International Military Exchange Training program, which allowed us to invite senior Indian military officers to attend the senior American training institutions like the War Colleges. It had been going on for twenty years. This went on even during US/India tensions; then we didn't stop the IMET program or cut off economic assistance entirely. Reciprocally, we had American officers at the Indian Defense University and their Command Staff College at Wellington. I found that exchange program extremely useful. Two of the Indian Navy's Chiefs of Staff had been at the Naval War College in Newport, R.I. which raised some eyebrows in Delhi which often imagined the darkest motives. The Indians liked the IMET program; they were anxious to participate and enjoyed their experiences and always sent their best personnel for such training.

I always passed on each agency's annual budget request. There were some debates about the size of some budgets or personnel levels. As I think I have indicated, I tend to believe in as small a mission as possible; I'd rather have fewer people who are actively engaged all the time. That view, of course, was not always accepted by other agencies. I did manage to reduce the size of some staffs, like the Station, AID and the Defense Attachés. I reallocated within the State complement. I don't think my management improvement opportunities would have been enhanced if I had been given full control of all U.S. resources and been able to allocate them as I wished to the different programs. I was satisfied with the arrangements then in place although I must say I might have been able to reduce the State complement somewhat if I could for example reduce the communications or consular staffs. But they were really untouchable. For example, I never felt that every applicant for a non-immigrant visa had necessarily to obtain it immediately. I would not have resisted having some applicants wait for a day or two or even three. That might have resulted in some personnel reductions, but that approach is just not acceptable to the Department. So when you look at the State staffing at a post, there are parts that are untouchable leaving any reductions to come out of administrative, political or economic sections and that is a very small component of any large embassy.

We had central administrative staff to service all US components in India, although each agency also had some administrative personnel on their rosters. For example, the central staff was responsible for building maintenance, but we never had a unified motor pool. That was just unacceptable to the other agencies primarily because a number of them were in separate buildings at some distance from the Chancery. We were never able to find a way to avail ourselves of the efficiencies of a centralized motor pool without reducing the effectiveness of the operations of the US government units that were located away from the Chancery. The disparity of perquisites was no longer an issue in India as it had been some years earlier. The internecine warfare that disparity of treatment created among US personnel was essentially over by 1989. There may have been some occasional skirmishes, but in general the fundamental problems had been resolved. I insisted on the establishment of a Housing Board consisting of representatives of all agencies, just to minimize frictions and to allocate resources -- housing -- in an even handed fashion. That eliminated the periodic fights between the Administrative Counselor and some US personnel in Delhi. There were still some problems when I got to India with the furnishings that each agency wanted for its staff. All of it came out of central pool, but naturally some staff members felt they deserved to be treated like some other staff member, even if the latter was of higher rank. It was never a major issue and we always tried to settle it using fair treatment as the fundamental tenet. One of the assets that the Embassy in Delhi had was its very good school; that helped unify the community and provided a first class education.

On country team management, I would make one final comment. Not only is it important for an Ambassador to visit the constituent posts periodically, but also other senior officers, some of whom may be reluctant to travel and need to be forced. For example, Administrative Counselors should not believe all is well because the post has some administrative staff. The Consul General must visit, the political staff must visit, not as supervisors, but so that we all knew that we were one team in India, all talking from the same script and approaching similar problems in similar fashion. It is interesting how over a period of time some particularities slip into the operations of a constituent post and then you run into "This is the way we have always done it" syndrome. So a close relationship between Embassy staff and the constituent posts is very important and I always made sure that our budget request included sufficient travel funds. I held the PAO responsible for the USIS operations throughout India, the AID director for his programs, etc. The DCM was the overall supervisor, although I expected him to leave the day-to-day supervision of the operations of the Embassy's sections or other agencies whether in Delhi or at the constituent posts in the hands of the agency's senior official in India. This system can run into some "turf" battles. For example, the officer in charge of the consular operations in Delhi was a Consul General, the same rank as the person in charge of a constituent post. It was hard sometimes for the constituent post to take direction from an equivalent in Delhi. Whenever such a problem arose, my position was that I really didn't care about who was senior to whom; I was interested in standardization of treatment to any Indian whether he sought a visa in Madras or Calcutta or Delhi. To do otherwise might have encouraged "visa shopping" and that was not acceptable. I encouraged constituent posts, if they had a question on a consular matter, to call the Embassy first before seeking guidance from the Department. There had been situations where the same question had been asked of Washington by different constituent posts; that seemed to me to be entirely unnecessary. One answer should serve the needs of all US government establishments in India. My whole goal was to have a more structured operation throughout India, whether it was the administrative or consular. I wanted the economic and political officers to travel to: a) see for themselves what was going on in the various Indian states and b) to provide guidance to the Consul General and the younger officers who were still learning their craft. The Consul Generals had the right to communicate directly with Washington on all matters; I only insisted that the Embassy be provided a copy of the message. There is no point, in my view, of assigning a seasoned officer to a constituent post if you are not going to have confidence in him or her. They have to be given responsibilities; if they can't carry them, then you take action, but you should not assume anything but confidence and that includes direct communications with the Department in Washington. I know of embassies who have taken the opposite view, but that was my philosophy. I, of course, expected the CGs to use common sense and judgement; if the Embassy was engaged in an analysis and if the CGs knew about it, I expected them to contribute their views to us rather than sending them to Washington. We made sure that if a CG had an input into a major study or analysis, he or she received due credit. It is important that the CGs be told from time to time that they were doing a good job; they must feel appreciated, as any human being does. I leaned to doing that more than less. My system worked well for me; I never had any problem with my CGs even if they saw an issue differently from me or members of my Embassy staff. I might have challenged the CG's view, but I certainly would not have resented him or her having a different point of view from mine. I would make a general criticism of the Department's system: it tries to accommodate so many different points of view that a final position is so watered down that it is sometimes meaningless. If there are sharp differences, let them be known publicly.

Now let me get to policy issues. When I was sent to India, I understood that my first priority was to see whether relations with India could not be improved. That was a general direction; I was not given orders on specific issues nor was I instructed on how to implement the general guidance. Occasionally, I would be requested to discuss UN issues with the government, although most of the time our delegation at the UN preferred to conduct the US/India dialogue in New York. We did raise specific UN issues with the Indian government and on a couple of occasions even convinced the Indians to abstain on some votes that they had made against us for many, many years -- e.g. Afghanistan. But the late 1980s and early 1990s was a curious time in India/US relations. There were some Indians who even apologized to me because they only abstained; they wished they could have voted with us. That was a new approach. The UN issues were among the most difficult ones in US/India relations. Under this category I include the NPT and the IAEA, which is a UN agency; there the Indians were still adhering religiously to Gandhi's view that India would only sign the NPT after the two superpowers had surrendered their nuclear weapons; it would cease its nuclear development efforts once other nuclear powers had surrendered or destroyed all their weapons. That was a different view of the world from us, but I think at least in the late 1980s, a more rational dialogue on nuclear issues was initiated.

I think it is fair to say that India/US relations were improving even before the break up of the Soviet Union. Certainly the fall of the Berlin Wall spurred the growth of those relationships. I think the Indians were a little surprised by the international developments. For example, I think they did not expect the US to be so sympathetic about the internal collapse of the Soviet Union and the difficulties that Gorbachev was encountering. I think they were surprised that the American and Soviet Ambassadors in Delhi seemed to be along well. Of course, not many knew that Victor was an old "Washington hand" and therefore was not inhibited by talking to Americans, as some of his predecessors undoubtedly were. So I think US/India relations were beginning to improve even before I arrived, but international developments during the late 1980s and early 1990s certainly accelerated the process. I can't say that the end of the Cold War brought any greater interest in Washington in India. I think that interest really didn't become a priority until around 1991 when India changed its economic policies. I thought the establishment of a new South Asia Bureau was a mistake, even though I knew that getting the attention to India by the Assistant Secretary for the Near East was very difficult. Tezi Schaffer, the Deputy Assistant Secretary for South Asia, gave us enough support, but our issues didn't usually go up beyond that level. Her husband had been our Ambassador in Bangladesh and she is now our Ambassador in Sri Lanka. She had been the Egyptian desk officer and when Howie retired, she succeeded him as the DAS. I have no doubt that the economic opportunities that a large nation like India presented when it changed its economic policies greatly accelerated the US government's interest in India. I refer here to a continuing interest; there had always been a sporadic interest as arose in the May, 1990 during the Pakistan/India tensions. I remember well that when Washington would annually ask us for our priorities for the next year, my staff would invariably list stability on the subcontinent as the first priority objective. I would return the paper with a notation that I strongly disagreed with that assessment because by saying so they were also stating that US interests in India per se were of secondary importance. I believed that we had other major interests besides preventing a Pakistani/Indian war. I asked my staff to rethink the issue and consider that the US might be interested in India as a fruitful area to develop our economic interests. I thought that other foreign policy goals would lead to stability, but I was not prepared to accept that was our first and over-riding concern. The Embassy's list of priorities therefore might have changed during my tour, but I am sorry to say that even today, the South Asia experts will still maintain that stability is the over-riding US concern in the region. That is wrong; it is not. That is a negative interest. We have many positive interests in India which, as I said, hopefully will lead to stability. We need to pursue a balanced policy which has many interests, all linked perhaps, but separate and distinct from "stability."

I can understand why in 1989, our experts were thinking primarily in negative terms. They had "suffered" through 45 years of Indian independence with both sides shouting at each other during most of that period, after an initial "honeymoon" period. From 1965 on, there were frequent tensions between the US and India. Most people saw India as a surrogate for the Soviet Union -- not a vassal state, but certainly one that through its non-aligned prism would see issues more from the Soviet point of view than ours. Many of my predecessors, I think, would have described the US/India relations in those terms. I think Dennis Kux, in his book India and the United States: Estranged Democracies -- a damn fine book -- describes the situation that way. I agree with him that both India and the United States until fairly recently were caught in a time warp: we saw India as the embodiment of Krishna Menon and the Indians saw the US as the embodiment of John Foster Dulles. That has changed by now. In fact, Dulles and Menon were psychological and culturally incompatible, but they had passed from the scene many decades earlier. This time warp existed to a much lesser extent when I arrived in India and certainly the mutual perceptions changed considerably while I was there, partly because India's changed economic policies had a great impact in Washington and the United States as a whole. India had always paid considerable attention to the U.S., sometimes positive, often negative. The Indians could never understand why, as long as they were paying so much attention to us, we were showing so little interest in them. They are of course not unique in that complaint; a lot of countries feel neglected by the U.S. The tensions were not personal; a lot of Indians sent their children to the U.S. for education -- Oxford was nice, but MIT was better. There are now 40,000 students in the U.S. There have always been many, many of them. Even our severest Indian critics have some personal attachment to the U.S., either through relatives or educational facilities.

There is a story in India which goes something like the following: there were a million Indians in the US; each had 880 relatives with no overlap which covered the whole Indian population of 880 million. I think that story had some truth in it because every Indian I ever met in my three years had a relative in the United States. It was obviously an exaggeration, but among the Indians that were the leaders of the society, it was absolutely true. They all had relations or connections living in the U.S. So Indian interest in the U.S. was always acute, even when reactions were negative. I could always attract a crowd for any public appearance I might have made, unlike my counterpart in Washington who was mostly ignored by the American public. The question, "Why is the U.S. not more interested in India?" was asked all the time. It was usually phrased, "Why are you more interested in China than you are in us?" The answer was that China had been a concern and interest of the U.S. for many, many years whereas India had become only a recent actor on the world stage. The size of the two countries was not that much different, but our first Consul was sent to Calcutta in 1896. As I mentioned earlier, he was refused entry at the time. India was perceived until after WW II as part of the English sphere of influence and therefore did not loom very large on our interest list. China, on the other hand, had always excited the American imagination and our connections with that country went back to the first half of the 19th Century. When I was growing up, I was aware of missionaries who had just returned from China because they would address our congregation and raise money for their next foray. That never happened with India; some Americans were of course aware of Indian religion and its ancient origins, but it was not a topic for popular consumption. What the Americans knew of India came from Kipling. It was only in the last half of the 20th Century that India came into popular American focus through contacts with Indian students and emigrants and through the opening of the economic markets. The challenge of raising American awareness of India was still with us in 1989-92, although slow progress was being made. Today, I find greater interest in India and more media coverage about more things than the Maharajahs and the poverty. I think the U.S. perception of Indian acceptance of U.S. business has played a large role in this wider and more favorable media coverage.

Also, I believe that the tilt toward Pakistan has waned in the last few years bringing India into a more favorable light, particularly in the Department, where, as I mentioned before, India and Pakistan were viewed as one package rather than as separate identities in which the US had different and distinct interests. Even the organizational change in the Department hasn't resolved that problem entirely although I think progress is being made.

The economic relationships between the U.S. and India was not always smooth sailing. About the time I arrived in India, the administration announced that it would start an investigation under the "super 301" law. We never really pursued it, but I was repeatedly accused by Indians for having ruined their economy through the application of the "301" rules. I had a hard time convincing them that the U.S. had done nothing; the common perception was that we had landed on them like a ton of bricks. The accusation of having applied the law to India was always followed by a plaintive question, "Why poor us?" The investigation was completed and then the decision was made not to take any action. You have to remember that the "301" target was really Japan and that Brazil and India was thrown into the mix just to make it look more "balanced." But it was hard to convince the Indians that we had not interfered with their exports to the U.S. or their domestic economic development, although we were unhappy with Indian production of pharmaceuticals. The American companies would have liked to sell their pills in India, but it was not a big market. What concerned them was that as their patents were expiring, the Indians would manufacture generics which then became competitors with American products. I suggested, and Washington did, that we remove the GSP protection from ibuprofen in India, which in effect took it out of the US market, since it didn't enjoy duty free status any longer. The word about what we had done got around in India and I think reduced the Indian spurt into the pharmaceutical exports arena. But the US action was taken very quietly and only those immediately concerned ever really knew about it. It was a lesson for the Indians who then understood that we took intellectual property rights seriously.

As long as we are talking about India and Pakistan, I should mention that the relationships between the two American embassies in Islamabad and Delhi were first rate in the 1989-92 period. It had not always been such, I have been told, especially when Deane Hinton and John Gunther Dean were our ambassadors. I was fortunate because Bob Oakley was our Ambassador to Pakistan since 1988. He was an old friend whom I had known for twenty years. Very soon after my arrival in Delhi, I flew to Islamabad and met with the President of Pakistan. Bob later came to Delhi. We agreed from the outset that our two embassies would work in a collegial manner and that we would be in constant communications. If an issue arose on which we might disagree, we decided we would consult and try to be accommodating to both of our views. This agreement between the two ambassadors brought a new atmosphere to our respective embassies, to which they had some problem adjusting. There was competition between officers of both embassies for attention from Washington, which is a natural phenomenon given the circumstances. That competition was probably the result of "localities," i.e. the tendency of defending your host country when it was in dispute with another. This is an unstated undercurrent which is not publicly discussed but which does exist. The single event which showed me the folly of this partisanship was May 1990, which I will talk about in greater detail later. I encouraged my substantive staff to visit Pakistan; people from our Embassy in Islamabad came to India, not to the extent that I would have liked, but more than before. My personal contacts, mostly by phone with Bob and then Nick Platt, another old friend who succeeded Bob, were frequent and good. Nick came to Delhi within two months after his arrival in Pakistan; that was a good move. Usually, the two American embassies were working together to move the Washington policymakers in a direction that made sense to us in the field. Most often, Washington did not give us much guidance and therefore we had to fill that gap by pushing Washington in one direction or another.

Of course, the perceptions of the United States differed in each capital. Pakistan saw us as a counter-balance to India, but I don't think either capital saw us as actual or potential mediators in their disputes until May 1990. Then both Pakistan and India looked to us to resolve the tensions. Before 1990, I believe that the Indians had for decades seen us as always favoring Pakistan, but Pakistan wasn't sure that was the case or at least that we didn't show enough bias towards it, particularly on Kashmir. It is certainly true that in a Cold War context, given Afghanistan and the good offices that Pakistan provided for the US/China dialogue during the Nixon administration, Pakistan probably was of greater importance to the U.S. than India. India had had a close relationship with the Soviet Union; by 1989, it was a major exporter to the Soviets of civilian goods which were in part paid for with Soviet military equipment. The Soviets bought 60% of the Indian tea crop and the Indians were the world's largest tea producers.

The subcontinent consisted of Pakistan, India, Nepal, Bhutan, Maldives and Sri Lanka (the SARC Association). India has always had a mixed attitude of the SARC. It wants to have a regional grouping of which it wants to be the leader. The other countries agree to a regional grouping because they see it a dispute-resolution mechanism. India doesn't want to submit any major issues to the multilateral context preferring to resolve disputes bilaterally. India faces somewhat the same problem that the U.S. has with Mexico and Canada; it just overwhelms the neighborhood. I don't think Indians would agree with this characterization because when it comes to Pakistan, they feel that country is so large that it can't be treated as an equal. So the Indians are torn, but there is no denying that India is the largest country in the region and its neighbors are wary. China was only important to the subcontinent in the areas that she borders. Today, the Sino/India relationships are better than they were in 1989 when they were not talking about border issues. There was some movement in their relationship, but it was the Rao government that put emphasis on improving ties to China. During my tour, the Indians viewed China as a security threat, stemming from the 1962 Chinese invasion which acutely embarrassed the Indian Army and bureaucracy which literally came unglued as the Chinese moved south from the foothill of the Himalayas. The Chinese voluntarily withdrew back to their own lines having proven that if necessary they could take territory at will. The Indians have never really overcome that blow. The Indians also recognize that China had nuclear weapons and missiles, which gives the Indians one additional reason to refuse to sign the NPT. Some of the Indian position is tactical, but some is deeply felt. I had good contacts with our Ambassador in Beijing, but we didn't have too many issues on which we could work together.

I mentioned India's mixed views on the SARC. I should perhaps talk a little about India's view in 1989 of its role in the Third World. Although the Non-Aligned Movement had long ceased to be a major factor, India still saw itself as the spokescountry for the Third World. This is one of the rationales that then Indians use when addressing the need to reorganize the UN Security Council. It wants the permanent membership enlarged to include Germany and Japan -- for their economic power -- and India, Brazil and Nigeria for the size of their populations. The only problem is that Pakistan would probably not agree to India becoming the spokescountry for South Asia, Argentina might take the same position vis-a-vis Brazil and many countries might well raise a question about Nigeria's stability. India's self perception as the leader of the Third World is ingrained; even today, as India edges toward a market economy, it still holds on to its memories as leader of the Non-Aligned Movement; unfortunately, times have changed and the Third World does not need a leader as much as it might have. Since the Second World -- the Soviet empire -- has dissolved, is there really a Third World still?

I used to discuss these issues with the Indians regularly. I found that I had good access to all levels of the Indian government. Also the Indians liked to talk about substantive issues of concern to them and they liked the intellectual challenge of debating an issue. Sometimes they lapsed into the teaching/preaching mode which is not always well received; it is a fault of both American and Indian cultures. A lot of these conversations took place as I tried to understand the Indian point of view; most often, I did so without instructions from Washington. We did not get too many instructions from home, which surprised me a little. The nuclear issue was frequently a subject of my discussions. There had been a stalemate in our talks on this matter. The Indian maintained that their nuclear program was only for civilian purposes; no one believed them, but they stuck to their line. We came down hard on Pakistan when we suspected them of engaging in military applications of nuclear energy; we cut off our assistance to them. Under the aegis of the National Defense University and an Indian think-tank -- funded by the Indian government -- we held a seminar series in Pune, a town near Bombay. The first conference was attended by our Pacific CINC, the Assistant Secretary for ISA in Defense, the Deputy Assistant Secretary from State, Steve Cohen -- a Harvard professor -- and myself. The Indian side was well represented and included their most prominent spokesman on non-proliferation, K. Subramaniam. When we had discussions like this, the Indians always fell back on their line that a nuclear freeze on the subcontinent was just not feasible, because they had to worry not only about Pakistan, but China as well. I have always been convinced that the Indians had and have a military program, but are also embarrassed to open their nuclear reactors to IAEA inspection because they just do not have modern or perhaps even adequate and safe technology nor the resources to upgrade these facilities to modern standards. Some of the technology is home developed and some came from the Soviet Union. They have some of their own plants which have had problems and two Russian plants under construction. In any case at this seminar and at other occasions such as lunches, Subramaniam and I used to shout at each other across the table. We each thought that was the only way to catch the other's attention. People would raise their eyebrows at this behavior, but I always said that we were friends and got along well. Over the three-year period I was in India, I think that Subramaniam shifted his position which brought us to the conclusion that there might be ways to reduce the risks of nuclear exchanges. A freeze was not in the cards, but Oakley and I developed the idea of a five nation conference -- India, Pakistan, China, Soviet Union and the US -- to talk about nuclear non-proliferation. The Indians wouldn't buy it. The three powers -- China, USSR and US -- could bring a non-first use pledge to the table, which would have avoided any necessity for India to admit to ownership of any weapon, but merely to pledge that they wouldn't use it first. We never got very far with that idea, but I think it helped making progress on a process that would insure that there would not be a nuclear accident as result of a conventional war -- an issue in which both Pakistan and India were greatly interested. This prevented either side from dropping conventional bombs on the nuclear facilities of the other. That meant identifying nuclear facilities -- power plants and research labs -- in both countries, which was finally done, even though then Indians suspect that the Pakistanis did not divulge their full capacities. That much was done and the dialogue between Pakistan and India on nuclear issues continues. I think the lists exchanged were pretty complete. We still are urging a non-proliferation treaty for the subcontinent. We needed more "carrots". Near the end of my tour, Ivan Selin, then the Under Secretary for Management and now the Chairman of Nuclear Energy Commission, visited India. I wanted him to discuss the possibility of US assistance on nuclear safety issues. After my tour was over, I talked to Selin again about that "carrot". The US has never dangled it, but I believe it could be an important inducement towards some progress on nuclear issues on the subcontinent.

I believe we now have reached the stage when I should discuss the May 1990 events in greater detail. As I mentioned, I arrived in Delhi in December, 1989. I found that the Kashmir dispute was heating up on an exponential curve. The Indians were surprised by this development; they had not expected Kashmir to loom so high on the "problems" list. I was told upon arrival that Kashmir was not the principal potential flash point, but the Punjab was. It is fact turned out to be 180% degrees different, as it is still today. I also found that Mrs. Bhutto was making inflammatory speeches; the Pakistani were training insurgents; the Indians were mishandling their side of the border. It was a real mess. This all must be viewed against a background of 1987 events when the Indians decided to run a humongous military exercise named "Brass Tacks," which the Pakistanis read as a prelude to an invasion.

When it came in the winter of 1989-90 for the Indians to run their annual military exercises in the Majahan training range, the Pakistanis responded by publicly denouncing these exercises as a disguised effort to prepare the Indian Army for an invasion. The Pakistanis brought some of their forces near the border. It should be noted that both India and Pakistan have strike forces whose location is well known to the other side. No rational war plan would leave those forces unused; they were highly mechanized and well equipped. Neither the Pakistani or the Indian strike forces were moved from their normal locations. But the Indians did move some lightly armed contingents into Kashmir, which has been the breeding ground for all of the wars that those two countries have fought. That Indian move seemed to cause a reaction from the Kashmiris who started to move some of their men into more aggressive positions. Bhutto went to Musafarahabad to hold a large rally; thousands showed up and reminded one of the larger Nazi demonstrations. She called for a violent liberalization of Kashmir, which was taped and broadcast throughout India. Not only was it broadcast, but it was done over and over again continuously. That wasn't well received in Delhi and the Indians of course responded in kind. It was obvious that tensions were building up.

Oakley and I set up a hot line between the two embassies. This enabled us to check out rumors that were springing up in both Islamabad and Delhi, which we would check out and report back to the other what the actual facts were. This enabled us to keep the governments to which were accredited informed with real facts, rather than street gossip. I think both India and Pakistan began to rely on our reports and I believe our efforts laid the ground work for the Gates visit. By the spring of 1990, I had already made many contacts in the military. General Sharma, the commanding officer of the Indian Army, whom I mentioned earlier, had gone to school with his Pakistani counterpart before partition. I told you before that he opened up his maps to us and let us see where his forces were and later allowed my Defense Attaché to verify the information. Bob was doing the same thing with the Pakistanis so that the two of us had a pretty good idea of the state of readiness of both sides and through that, I believe, also understood motivations. We concluded that neither military was preparing for war, but we were much more concerned with the emotional fervor that the politicians had raised on both sides of the border which might eventually force the military to take actions it wasn't prepared for or, as far we could see, was really anxious for. Washington, from its long distance, was much more alarmed and decided to send Bob Gates to try to calm the ardor. It was a funny situation; if Washington had had the same picture that Bob and I had, it probably would not have sent Gates. That would have been unfortunate because Gates did calm tensions that might otherwise have escalated, resulting in perhaps armed conflict. Before Gates left, both Bob and I sent cables explaining the positions of our respective host countries and suggesting some approaches that he might take. Neither Bob nor I saw him face-to-face before he landed in Islamabad. When he arrived in Delhi, I had a chance for a brief private conversation; he did not stay in Delhi overnight. Gates was well informed and had absorbed all the information that we had sent in. I knew what Bob was going to tell him and before Gates even landed in Delhi, Bob and I had a conversation over the secure phone so that I knew what had happened in Islamabad. So Gates was well prepared for his Indian visit and was able in the few hours that he was in Delhi to see the Prime Minister, the Foreign Minister, who had a lunch for him, and the Defense Minister with General Sharma. Gates went first to Islamabad then came to Delhi. In Pakistan he told the government that it had to stop fomenting unrest in Kashmir. In Delhi, he said that he had obtained agreement in Pakistan to close 31 training camps -- the Pakistanis later denied ever having made such a commitment. The Indians appreciated that and soon the tensions were diffused. The hot air went out of the balloon! In Delhi, Gates dealt with a curious man, V.P. Singh, the Prime Minister, who was a minor Rajah. I made a mistake once telling Karan Singh, who would have been the Maharajah of Jammu in Kashmir, that I thought the Prime Minister was one of "his group." I was quickly reminded that Maharajahs and Rajahs were different and separate and that V.P. was only a "small landlord." In any case, V.P. was a very introspective man and interested in bringing some reform to the age-old Indian caste system. Gates had a good meeting with him as he did with the Foreign Minister. The Defense Minister was a little more difficult, but fortunately Sharma was there and he did most of the talking. The meetings were very small, which also made them more effective; our side was represented by Gates, Schaffer and myself. Schaffer knew all the players on both sides having served in both countries and therefore undoubtedly did a lot of briefing of Gates herself. She is very good; I think she and her husband, Howard, are the Department's leading South Asia experts. Both the Indians and the Pakistanis took the Gates visit as the rationale to calm tensions; it enabled them to back down without "losing face."

The Indians had imposed Presidential rule on Kashmir before I arrived. I don't remember raising the issue with them until some of their actions -- atrocities, I would say -- became public. Then we discussed this with them often. The Indian of course maintained that they didn't understand why we were raising a human rights issue with them when they were just reacting to Pakistani misbehavior. Gates made it quite clear that we were not supporting Indian actions in Kashmir nor were we supporting Pakistani support for the insurgents in Kashmir. Human rights violations wherever they took place in India were a subject in our dialogue with the Indians, both in Kashmir and in the Punjab. There are some American groups that are very active on both of these issues. A Dr. Alec is the President of "Khalistan Committee" -- Khalistan being the name of an independent Punjab. There is a similar committee for an independent Kashmir, which is balanced somewhat by a group of Hindus who were forced to leave the Kashmir and who therefore take a different view of the future of that territory. Both the American Kashmiris and the Sikhs were pressuring certain Congressmen, who in turn made their views known to the Department. We in Delhi were also concerned because some of the Indian suppression was egregious. We always were told that it was all Pakistan's fault -- there was some truth of course in that allegation both for Kashmir and the Punjab. The Pakistan under-cover operatives were quite active in supplying arms to the insurgents in both territories. The Indian counterpart operatives were doing the same thing in the Sindh, Karachi and other Pakistani places. It was a tit-for-tat situation. But I don't think all of the unrest in the Punjab and in the Kashmir can be laid at the feet of the Pakistanis; there were certainly local leaders who were acting independently, but the Indians maintained that they could come to some agreements with these local leaders if the Pakistanis would stop their interference. The total human rights area was the subject of some of my more contentious discussions in Delhi. It was a serious matter for us and we pursued it.

I should say before we leave the India part of my career a few words about the Gandhi family. I had many contacts with Rajiv, who was a charming man. He had lost his Prime Ministership in November, 1989, just before I arrived. I called on him at his official residence not too much after my arrival as I did with all opposition leaders throughout my tour. I would see Rajiv fairly regularly. If he couldn't see me and if he had something on his mind that was important, he would send P.V. Narasimha Rao who is now the Prime Minister. If the matter was not important, Rajiv would send one of his entourage; that process always gave me a clue on whether the matter was important or not. Rajiv had two kinds of advisors: those that always hung around his house, which was also his office and those, like Rao, that he would call on when needed. The "home entourage" was the source of the pressure on Sonia Gandhi to run after Rajiv was assassinated. That would have really shook India: an Italian lady as Prime Minister. The real politician in the Gandhi family is now Priyanka, the daughter. I don't think we have seen the end of the Gandhi dynasty.

Rajiv usually drove his own car; he wore a traditional Indian dress -- Nehru jacket -- when in public. At home, I used to see him in loafers, slacks and an Italian sweater; he was very comfortable with Western ways, probably more than he was in Hindi tradition -- his Hindi was not very good, for example. He had attended the Doon School, one of India's elite schools and his English was very good. He was not very much like his mother, whom I didn't know, but from all I have heard must have been a formidable woman. Rajiv had a mild temper and I always felt that he was genuinely nice. He was in politics although I don't know that he initially really enjoyed it. He had tried to liberalize the Indian economy in 1984; it had responded well even though the effort was rather marginal. But then his advisors urged him to stop which he did. That created the curious situation in 1989, when in fact he ran against himself urging greater liberalization even though he had not pursued it while in office. Had he been reelected, I am sure he would have taken up the liberalization cudgels once again. In fact, Rao used for his program a study that Gandhi had started when he was in power. By 1989, Rajiv was a politician. I have already illustrated that in my comments of our activities in India during "Desert Storm." Rajiv used that for his own domestic political purposes and as I said, I had to call him on it. He was not happy about that and may have had pangs of conscience about his actions because there was no question that he knew that Washington would resent his remarks, but felt that his domestic political purposes had first priority.

My relationships with Singh were a little more distant; he was not the affable guy that Rajiv was. He was a mystic and could never be quite sure of what he might say. He was more open at the beginning of his administration. One of my first conversations with him dealt with liberalization; he was very positive that he would take all the necessary steps. By the time he left office, he was not doing anything on liberalization; he had become completely bogged down on his efforts for the neglected castes -- "set asides" -- at Universities and in the Civil Service for those who had not had previous equal opportunities. He became more and more withdrawn towards the end of his term and increasingly difficult to engage in a dialogue. His successor, who was in office very briefly, was a socialist and somewhat of a thug, as I mentioned. On my last call on him, he said that whoever was to be Prime Minister would have to pursue economic liberalization, although I don't think he had a clue about what the phrase meant. It was interesting to me that a hard-line Socialist had come to the conclusion that India had to strive for a free and open market system. During his term, he had to authorize the shipment of some gold reserves to Tokyo and London as collateral; that I think brought to him the realization that the Nehru economic model was just not viable. Rao, who was the last Prime Minister with whom I worked, was a known quantity since I had had conversations with him starting soon after my arrival. He then had just returned from Houston where he had some back surgery. That was a successful operation; he looks better today than he did in early 1990. I think that operation rejuvenated him and allowed him to do things that just weren't possible before the operation. I might say that he looks better since he has become Prime Minister; he has learned to pace himself. I don't think he was ever a convert to liberalization; he understood that something had to be done, but I think he probably had some doubts and fears about liberalization. So for a while, he kept jumping from one view to another, but I noticed that when he came to Washington earlier this year (1990) he was very comfortable talking to the business community about his "program" and about the changes he intends to make. He has become a real salesman for India; he now can communicate well with Western industrialists. I have mentioned liberalization on several occasions. I should make it clear that when I arrived in India in 1989, the economy was an issue, but liberalization as such was never the focus of any election. It was discussed, but the only election that I witnessed actually took place before the liberalization program was formally announced. Now it is part of the Indian political debate. While I was in India, the major issues were Hindu nationalism, as illustrated by the incident at the mosque in Ayodhya and L.K. Advani's writings on a truck decorated like a chariot. A lot of people were killed because that mosque was supposed to have been built over some sacred Hindu land; that issue is still alive today. The other issues were Pakistan and the "reservation" system for the lower castes.

Foreign policy was discussed, but it was never a major issue in Indian politics. there was interest in the U.S. and, as I mentioned before, in the public comments that the U.S. Ambassador made. Everyone knew about the "Super 301" law and the Gulf War. I can thank CNN for helping me out on the Gulf War. Without it, I would have had a much harder time explaining the Gulf War, but the TV pictures were so self-evident that the opinion leaders did not need to rely on Indian news and obtained our views on the situation directly from their TV sets. It made us look good and that is always helpful. I should note that TV in general had a major impact on Indian views. Rajiv commented to me once that he had underestimated the impact that TV would have on Indian culture. One day, he was campaigning in the Bihar, which is the poorest of the Indian states. He came to a town on a dusty road which didn't even have a tea shop -- that is about as poor as you can get. But as he entered the town, he noticed a video library. This new technology had broken the monopoly of Doordarshan; news tapes were made -- they were like a news magazine, called "Eye Witness" and that is what the Indians used for their information. Soon, other producers got in the game and then all Indians including those in the poorest villages had access to tapes, both for news and entertainment. Those tapes spread very quickly. Then, in many homes in Delhi, one could see dishes going up and soon world wide TV was available to many. It took the Embassy a little longer to get into the modern world; I finally had to get USIS to reposition its antenna so that we could access to the same air waves as Indians had. The new technology opened Indian eyes to new sights and insights. The Iraq war was a problem for some Indians because they had a close and warm relationship with Iraq for many years. They were disappointed by Iraq's invasion of Kuwait; if they had not witnessed it through their own eyes, they might not have believed me if I had told them. So CNN was a great help. Furthermore, CNN and other Western news services were bringing the news in real time. The Indians no longer had to rely on Third World television which consisted essentially of talk shows or news reports without visual evidence. CNN showed events as they were taking place; it was an entirely different experience which the Indians eagerly accepted. CNN was followed by Star TV, originally a Hong Kong based program, started by Richard Lee, a young scion of a very rich family. Murdoch bought it later and made it into a British news service. Because it originated in Hong Kong, the reception in India was much better. The Indians used to say that none of their companies would ever advertise on Star TV because a local TV network was already in operation. They didn't initially, but as soon as Indian businesses noted that their up-scale customers were watching, they jumped on the band wagon and advertised on Star TV, which also carried the Asian version of MTV that attracted the attention of the younger generation. Star TV, in turn, has started broadcasts in Hindi. The whole TV technology has opened India as nothing else has ever done since independence -- down to the village level. Radio was influential, but it was government run; only short wave was uncensored and that was too expensive for most Indians.

I should finish this discussion on India by mentioning the high tech aspects of Indian economic development. The Indians are whizzes at developing software. Some one told me once that if a computer language had not been developed, the next best thing would have been Sanskrit. I found it fascinating just to watch the growth of the software industry. Indians are very good at tailoring programs to the specific needs of an individual client. This ability created a problem for our consular operation because the Indians, once having developed a program for an American client, wanted to come to the US to install it and would then, too frequently, just stay in the US. For the American companies, the outsourcing to India was cost effective because the programmers there received far lower compensation than an American one.

The largest software company in the world is Tata in Bombay. When I was in India, City Corp had a software operation which used in part their internal capacity and in part they contracted some of their development work. This was intended to insure that it was keeping up to date with what was going on in India in the software business. By now, that one company has split into four: two in Bombay and two in Bangalore. The pace of the software development work in India is just mind boggling. The Indians could also manufacture the hardware but their talents really lie in software development. It is a growing market internally and for export and the Indians are now using the new applications more and more. They were and are acquiring computers more and more all the time.

They had some difficulties in installing a computerized reservation system for their railroad; it is now installed and is probably the only modern part of the railroad system. The argument was one often heard: computers will take away jobs. As it turned out, of course, no jobs were lost; there had to be as many ticket vendors as there used to be. It is just that now you can be assured of a ticket and a seat. That was and will always be a continuing argument in India as more and more operations are computerized. One of the consequences of this drive to use computers is that foreign software developers have difficulties in protecting their intellectual property rights. Indians won't always use programs that are just copied from one made elsewhere, but they will tailor that program and then sell it. For example, computer games might well be pirated, but if AT&T had a program, it would be fine-tuned in India because it is a program that no one could use and could not be sold "as was." This protection of intellectual property was a source of dialogue between us and the Indians. They did not do as good a job as we wanted on enforcing their copyright laws for films and computer software. I could get a film locally in Delhi before it was shown in American theaters. It was very easy to buy pirated programs and films. You can see some of the same problem here in Washington now from the carts on K Street. The Indian answer to our complaints was always that they didn't have the resources to police and enforce their own laws. I knew that they would have troubles with enforcement, but I was also convinced that it was in the Indians' own self-interest to crack down on pirating because they were so good at software development that eventually their own industry would be severely damaged if they couldn't enforce intellectual property protection and certainly would have had difficulties in complaining to other countries about their practices if the situation in India was not brought under control. That argument I think finally won them over and they improved their enforcement activities, although they still have a long way to go. I admit that enforcement in a country in India is difficult because they are so adept at development that there always is a question of whether the program was just plainly copied or whether it was improved locally or whether in fact it was developed entirely by local sources.

Once, I wanted to install a couple of programs that a colleague had on my computer, but we didn't have the operating manual. So I went down to one of the local stores and bought the manuals; they weren't always as complete as the originals, but they sufficed. There was never any problem buying standard American programs and games on the local market; they had all been pirated and readily available.

The other problem of copyright protection was in the pharmaceutical industry to which I have already referred. That was a problem of patent registration which the Indians tended to neglect because they felt that the drugs were manufactured for the good of the people and therefore somehow exempt from the normal patent protection laws.

ERNESTINE S. HECK
Consul General
Madras (1990-1993)

Ernestine S. Heck was born in Oregon in 1940. She received her bachelor's degree from Oregon State in 1962. Her career has included positions in Bombay, Saigon, Teheran, Niamey, Katmandu, New Delhi, Colombo, and Madras. Mrs. Heck was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in December 1997.

Q: All right, well, then we'll pick this up the next time. 1990 you went where?

HECK: To Madras.

Q: And you were in Madras when to when?

HECK: From July of 1990 to July of 1993.

Q: All right, we'll pick that up the next time then.

Today is August 26th, 1998. Ernie, '90 to '93, Madras seemed like a logical assignment. Was there any problem with it, or it just went?

HECK: You mean a problem in getting the assignment?

Q: Getting the assignment.

HECK: No, it sort of just happened, it just was there. I had, at that point, had a lot of years in the subcontinent, seven of which had been in India. The issues which were big in Sri Lanka, in some instances at least - and I mean by that the Tamil Tigers and the general question of the Tamil insurgency in Sri Lanka - this was also a big issue in Madras, so it made sense. I went off in the summer of 1990. I was the consul general. We had 15 Americans and about 100 Indians and another 135 contractors. We had several different agencies including two intelligence agencies and USIA and the Commerce Department as well as the State Department. The consular district was about 205,000,000 people. It covered four states, the four southern states. These are generally referred to as the Dravidian area as opposed to the Aryan area in the north. The languages are all different. The alphabets on all four are different one from the other as well as from the northern alphabet. But the people are generally related. It was a fascinating area and one about which I didn't really have a lot of background. It's funny but the so-called India experts in many cases, this phrase, means north Indian experts, and a lot about the history and the forces that form these states in the south really is not very well known by a lot of Americans. It's also true that it's not very well known by a lot of Indians who are in positions to do something about it. I was always interested how different political events looked in the north from in the south and how we were just in sort of a different world down there. The capital of the state of Tamil Nadu is where we have the consulate. This is a historical thing, because, of course, it's on the ocean and it was the place that the British set up their regional headquarters early on and where the Americans, of course, landed when they came into south India in the late 18th century. One of the buildings in the area, still there, now a college dorm, is a roundish sort of a building called the Ice House, and it's where American ice used to land in the late 1700s in large blocks and be carried in. That was what kept the British gin and tonics cold, I guess, if they had ice in their drinks, I'm not sure that they did. But we were the main suppliers of ice going back to the 19th century. This is only the second oldest consulate in India, I believe. I think Calcutta was a few years older than us but not by very much, and we've had a consulate there in some form or another going back to the early 19th century, and I think that there was representation from the United States in the late 18th century as well. So it's an old post. It probably would not be the consulate general if we were able to set up a consulate for the south today; we would probably put it in Bangalore, which is the Silicon Valley of the nation, the big high-tech place for India, and it is home to perhaps the most number of American businesses in the south. But history and the fact that we own property in Madras keeps us down there and probably will keep us down there for the foreseeable future. During my time, however, we did open a Commerce Department office in Bangalore. Bangalore is about a 7-hour drive from Madras or a little bit over an hour's flight if you go by plane.

Q: Who was the ambassador up in India in '90 when you arrived?

I think you're telling me something. We're have a very long pause.

HECK: The ambassador when I arrived was Bill Clark. I am trying to remember whether he was actually in country when I arrived. Yes, I think he was. He was there for about a year after I arrived, a little bit more, then there was a break, and he was followed by Tom Pickering, who was there from August of '92 to March of '93, so his tenure was very, very short. There was a considerable period in between where there was a chargé, and, of course, following Tom Pickering's departure, a chargé was in place for I think over a year or about a year anyway, certainly for the rest of my tenure. But I should say that the embassy is 1,000 kilometers from Madras. In the early '90s telephones were not all that great. We did not have e-mail. Madras at least had only unclassified Wangs and we were not connected to the outer world until after I left the post in mid-'93.

Q: A Wang being a computer?

HECK: Well, no, a word processor, not even a computer. Now, of course, I think almost all of our posts are on a worldwide e-mail net, so there can be communications. But I can remember one period of almost a month while I was in Madras when what is called the PTT, the post and telegraph people in India, telephones, telegraph on post, went on strike in the four southern states. Nobody in New Delhi seemed to notice this. Now I'm not talking about the embassy, but the government of India didn't seem to notice it either. And it meant that for almost a month the only way the embassy could really communicate with us was by sending a cable. We couldn't telephone them even. That's assuming that the telephones work, but they didn't work at all. They were always getting cut anyway. I would get cut off from calls to Delhi all the time. So we really were without connection with the embassy. During this period it got so bad in the area that businesspeople were flying in from Japan and flying in from the United States to do business, to make contracts, or to talk to their businesses out there, their suppliers perhaps or whatever, because there was just no way that we could get in touch with the outer world. Even the parliament in New Delhi didn't really seem to care very much. It finally worked itself out, and we got back on line, but it was very interesting to be in a place where everything just stopped. Money transactions stopped, and there were no cables, and there were no telephone calls, and there was no mail. We did have fax, but it didn't work, of course, because the telephone lines were down. Even when the faxes did work, they didn't, because there was one period, as I think I told you, Stu- (end of tape)

He would pack them up at the end of the day and deliver them over with his driver, and that was how we were getting our mail. No one in Washington would believe us, because faxes don't work that way, do they? But yes, they do in certain places in the world. So that's the way it was.

Q: Just to get a feel for India at that time, here was a lot of very sophisticated Silicon- Valley-type investment. India was really opening up, wasn't it, in your area?

HECK: Well, during my tenure it opened up considerably. There had been tentative moves by Mrs. Gandhi, and after her death by Rajiv Gandhi, her successor, to do just that, but it hadn't really taken. Then there were problems in the Indian body politic, and there was a period of some uncertainty, and a series of people held the prime ministership for short periods of time and none of them were very strong, I mean personally strong, but they didn't have the power base to really do too much about it. The real beginning of the opening up, although most of those American firms were there in some measure when I arrived, or at least many of them were, the real opening up came when P.V. Narasimha Rao, who was a member of the Congress Party, the party of Jawaharlal Nehru, when he became prime minister and leader of the pack. The economic situation of the country was very bad in that there was almost no foreign reserve left. There were just weeks left of foreign reserves, and it kind of finally shook the party into doing things that, of course, it should have done many, many years previously. It then made some real efforts to open the economy. What they did was courageous in light of the way things worked in India. The talk of self reliance and keeping other businesses out had been so much a part of the Indian body politic going back to before the British left and when the Congress Party in its effort to get independence for the nation made a big part of its campaign one of what they called swadeshi, of only buying things that were locally made, that were from India. This, of course manifested itself in all the burning of British cloth and that sort of thing in the '30s. But the very idea of letting other people get into the Indian economy in terms of doing business was one that was very unpopular with a very vocal part of the Indian politicians. So to change that made a big difference. There were several things that were done to open up, and one of them was to get rid of a lot of the paperwork or at least to try to get rid of a lot of the paperwork that was involved in doing business in India. They used to say that India had a license raj, the raj, of course, being the government. You had to have a license to breathe down there if you were a businessman. Businessmen used to spend most of their time on airplanes going to and from New Delhi to bend the knee in front of somebody or another and try to get another piece of paper to do whatever it was. What came out of all that was that there might be two firms in the whole country that made a certain product, whether it was zippers or thread or anything, and the idea of opening that to market forces and the sort of modern global economy was very scary to a lot of people including to a lot of bureaucrats. A lot of the businesses liked this at first, and then only as they began to have competition from products which were better made and came from somewhere else, whether it was Japan or Sweden or Canada or the U.S., then they began to think maybe it wasn't such a grand idea either. So the whole process has moved in fits and starts, and right now it's in a period, I would say, of some steps backward instead of forward, because it's a very conservative government that's in power at the moment. But it was opened up in the early '90s to some extent, and that did make a difference. A lot of American businesses came in to look around, if not in my consular district, in one of the other three, particularly in fields like power generation, big things like that, as well as the high-tech industries. The power generation has moved more slowly, I would say. Part of the problem has been that each state controls its own. It's very much a system of federalism like ours in that sense. But it has, I think, been better in terms of the high tech, one of the reasons being that India is full of very good, young computer engineers trained at some very good schools, and there is a ten-and-a-half-hour time difference, so they can be working for us during their daytime and it's our nighttime, and it makes our businesses move very much more rapidly.

Q: But you need telephone connections to make that make any difference.

HECK: Oh, yes, and we need things like electricity, of which there's a shortage. For many of the other businesses one of the big problems is the infrastructure of the country. The road system is just abominable. Cars have multiplied like rabbits, and the roads are these 1930s two-lane highways which one shares with a variety of other wheeled vehicles including ox carts and so on, so it's very hard to move products. But India is working on all those things. In any case, my job in Madras, aside from just the administration of this presence, became really mainly commercial and business related on one side and consular related on another. There are over a million Indians in the United States, citizens, permanent residents, students, growing rapidly. The Indian community in the United States in the mid-'80s, and probably still, had the best education of any immigrant group in the United States and the highest per-capita income of any first-generation group in the United States, at least of the major ones that we have coming in from overseas. This is probably changing as more family members of citizens come in and are perhaps less educated, but the United States is full of Indian doctors and nurses and scientists and university professors and computer specialists of all types, I mean technically very well qualified people. And they all have relatives, a quarter of whom are in my consular district, and they all want to come or they want to go for a visit or they want to send servants so that the young doctor in Potomac, Maryland, can be taken care of the way he's supposed to. So the consular lines were just tremendous. I, of course, had never had any consular work at all. I had had a three-week consular course in 1968, and the law has changed hundreds of times since then. What I had heard in 1968 didn't make much difference on the way things were in 1990. Our consular office was terribly overworked. I found myself doing an awful lot of letters for them to VIPs around India. I got phone calls from chief ministers, I got phone calls from cabinet ministers in New Delhi, you name it. I could be awakened at any hour of the day or night. In fact, the first thing I had to do, the first major task I had to do when I arrived in the summer, I got a phone call from my deputy chief of mission, or chargé - I'm not sure which he was at that point - but my ambassador in New Delhi, Bill Clark, had been called by a prominent member of parliament from the state of Andhra Pradesh, which is where Hyderabad is. He called the ambassador at some ungodly hour, like two in the morning, to give him the rundown on why he needed a tourist visa for the daughter of a chief minister of the state of Andhra Pradesh, who had just finished college and was going to go visit one of her brothers who lived in California. So the ambassadors apparently, before I got there, sent the word down that Miss Such-and-Such was to have this visa. She was given the visa. This chief minister had been a very famous movie star in Andhra, had millions of dollars. There was no question about support, and there were legal residents in the United States who were her brothers and perhaps they were even citizens. But, in any case, she got the tourist visa and then, of course, three days later there was in the newspaper the story about this huge wedding that she had just had to some man who lived in the United States. At that point our brides, because of the visa restrictions for wives of green card holders, or at least as they were then, our brides from my states were having to wait over a year to join their husbands. That's an untenable position to be in in India, because you then move in with these perfect strangers who are your in-laws and you sit there without the support of your own family and wait for this man you hardly know to get to the point where you can go and join him. So this was obviously a scam, and I was told to go up there and to tell the then Chief Minister to get his daughter back, she had gone to the United States, and so I did. I went to Hyderabad on my first calls, and I went among other things to see the Chief Minister, and I had breakfast with him, and it was all very warm and fuzzy, and then I pulled this thing on him about what a great embarrassment it would be to him personally to see this in the newspaper and wouldn't it be nice if he would bring his daughter back and let us process her as she should be processed. And he did, but I did not like that. I knew right then I was not cut out to be a consular officer. I was used to worming material out of people. I was not used to telling them what to do. It turned out that the man she married was a citizen of the United States, so all she had to wait was, like, three weeks. We got her processed very rapidly. The father had all the money in the world, so bringing her home was no problem. But that always stuck with me that I had had to pull this on a very famous personage in India, and I didn't find it easy to do. But, as I said, I would get phone calls every day. I would get them from my Rotary Club. I became a Rotarian. I was the first woman Rotarian in Madras at that point. I would be called up all hours of the day or night by these people, and I would also, because the consular section was so far behind in letter writing, I found myself more and more, not at the beginning but as the consul in charge changed and the new one was perhaps not as rapid in getting his work done as the first one, writing letters constantly to keep them up, because they would be weeks late in the letter writing. The poor vice consuls - we had three first-term officers - were working themselves just silly, absolutely silly. The consular section had four people, and it should have had six or eight. It was a great pity. But those were our two biggest problems, or biggest responsibilities, in the south.

Q: What about promoting business there? In a way, it would be counterproductive for the United States to encourage businessmen to invest in India.

HECK: Well, no, we were trying very hard to get more American investment in or at least to facilitate. India is such a big potential market, and the middle class in India, by American standards, is like 150,000,000 people. It's something worth going after. Business was interested although in many cases, when they saw all the hoops they had to jump through, it became just easier for them to take their money and put it in southeast Asia or put it in China or send it somewhere else. But we had a lot of people asking, and there was also a big Indian-American business community here in the United States which, all things being equal, wanted to help their original country and were very interested in setting up businesses in India. So, no, we had a constant stream of people coming for all sorts of things, cell phones, just all sorts of interesting things. Tobacco, the big American tobacco companies were trying to break into the big tobacco market in India. There is a lot of smoking in India and an indigenous tobacco crop. Anyway, we had more than our share, and we had a Commerce office in Delhi, an FCS office with several officers. Each of the other three consulates general had an FCS officer from the Department of Commerce whose main job was to push American business in India. We had various fairs and shows, lots of catalog shows, lots of actual more hands-on type shows. It seemed to me I was cutting ribbons or giving opening speeches to things all of the time. American hospitals were interested. There was a whole series of Indian physicians and doctors who were trying to set up American-style hospital facilities in various towns and cities in the south and, I suspect, all over India. No, there were all sorts of things which were happening.

Q: Did you find a different attitude towards the United States down there than you did up there?

HECK: Yes, I think so. Well, I think anytime you're out of a capital in a big country like that, you see a different facet of it. The south Indians in general were, of course, every bit as patriotic as Indians in any other part of the country, but they were a long way from what is the major interest certainly in New Delhi and probably in Bombay, and that's Pakistan. That means all of the permutations of the relationship with Pakistan, whether it's the nuclear issue or whether it's shooting at each other on the Koon glacier up in Kashmir or whether they're lobbying things across the border somewhere or whether they're training insurgents in each other's country to send into the other. Those were issues up in Delhi, and the United States got involved in that in that we were very often seen as pro-Pakistani, and, therefore, there would be demonstrations against us on that and the other and so on. Down in the south it didn't come up much. Now I'm sure if there had been a real war with Pakistan while we were there, we would have seen the patriotism coming out, but it just didn't matter. Business was what was mattering in the towns and the cities that I dealt with, the major cities of Hyderabad, Bangalore and Madras, and in smaller cities throughout the region it was much more business related than anything else, and the great desire to send whichever relatives needed to the States. So we didn't get involved a lot in the sort of political issues that took place in New Delhi. Politics in the south is a different ball game. I'm just trying to remember. I think when I arrived none of the four states in my district - I had the four states of Karnataka, Kerala, Andhra Pradesh and Tamil Nadu plus the remains of the French presence in Pondicherry, which means also three little enclaves on the eastern and western coasts of the south - in none of those places was there a government of the ruling Congress Party at that point. Later on one of the four states - in fact two of the four states - became Congress at various points, and then lost it again. But basically regional parties are what run the politics in the south, and they are very chauvinistic about their own state, about their own ethnic heritage, about their own language, and their issues are different. So as far as they're concerned, dealing with the center, with whoever rules in New Delhi, is one of which party do we back and we will back them in parliament and they will leave us alone and let us do what we want in our own state. That's how things were down there, interesting, very different from New Delhi.

Q: I assume you were reporting on the politics. Were there any developments that really were of particular concern to the United States?

HECK: The issues changed over time, of course, but we had lots and lots of Sri Lankan refugees in camps in Tamil Nadu. We had Dravidian parties ruling in Tamil Nadu for the whole time. There are two major Dravidian parties, and they have gone back and forth, so both of the two major parties were ruling. In Kerala we had for part of the time I was there a Communist government.

Q: That used to be a great concern to us.

HECK: It isn't a great concern to us anymore, partially because the Soviet Union fell apart, had fallen apart by then. The Soviet Union was not bankrolling anything. While we were there, the Russians had to close their library in Kerala, and they were flogging on the streets busts of Lenin and so on. Nobody wanted to buy them. They had the complete works of Stalin, and nobody cared. But the Communist Party in Kerala has become a very Kerala party. It's just another Kerala national party. The Communist Party in India has shrunk. There have been two major ones, one pro-Beijing, one pro-Moscow, but the whole number of members of these parties has shrunk and in many cases the parties have become almost irrelevant. There are a couple of places left where the parties have become regional. One of them is Kerala in the south, and one of them is Tripura up on the northeast along the Burma border areas. But they're not what they used to be. They really are regional parties just as the Tamil Nadu Dravidian parties were regional and the Andhra Pradesh regional party was regional. It's just regional politics now. And, no, they're not antagonistic particularly nor dangerous to the United States or to the welfare of the country of India, in fact quite the opposite.

Q: Did you find yourself sort of working on the Indian bureaucracy to make it easier for American business to exist?

HECK: Well, we certainly tried. It was of mixed blessing. Everybody in the south, the four governments in the south, all spoke a good story, claimed to be eager for investment, would flog projects, whatever they might be. I'm thinking now of the big hydroelectric things that they wanted to do, the big power projects, generation of power being a major need to modernize the country. But talking a good story and doing something about it are two different things. Corruption is still a major part of the political ballgame in that part of the world. There are lots of palms to be greased. Many of the palms to be greased belonged to relatives or caste members or otherwise connected to leaders of various state governments. These were all major problems for us. As I may have said before, one of the impediments along the way to modernization, capitalization of the economy, privatization, all of the things that the United States would have wanted to see in India in order to open the markets and make it a level playing field - one of the major impediments was the bureaucracy, the civil servant of India. As you know, a determined, high-ranking civil servant in charge of a specifically big office can put a great deal of brakes on for this sort of thing. So there was that to be faced also. It was not, perhaps, the easiest thing in the world, but it was definitely worth doing and we were certainly trying.

Q: Were there any particular development while you were there, for example, Rajiv Gandhi's?

HECK: Rajiv Gandhi was assassinated just beyond the outskirts of Madras one night. It was May of '91. He was running. He wanted to be back in as prime minister, and I think he would have made it. He was the legitimate leader of the party. At that point Congress did not rule in New Delhi. One of the short-lived coalitions from the left side of the spectrum was in charge, but Rajiv was the party leader of the Congress Party, and he was campaigning in a place called Sri Perambur, which was a few miles outside of Madras on the road to Bangalore. He was in a big field. It was 10:30 at night. In India the campaigning starts at dawn and goes until midnight or two a.m., and it gets later and later, falls further and further behind, so this was probably scheduled for before that. Anyway, he was to address this gathering of people in this field, and a Tamil woman, young woman, came up to him with flowers. It's the custom in India to drape flowers around people's necks as a sign of honor, very much like what we have in Hawaii with the leis. In any case, this lady had a garland in her hands, and she knelt or bent over to touch his feet, which is another very common gesture in India of respect, and she triggered something in her waist and blew herself and him up. He was in pieces. It was a very, very awful thing, great carnage. Other people were killed. It turned out later that she was a Sri Lankan Tamil, she was a member of the Lady Tigers, and she was doing this on direction from Prabakaran in Sri Lanka. This is how far he had come from being the hero of the Sri Lankan Tigers to being their sworn enemy. The thing that interested me the most about this indicated the way things work in India, both in how governments in India react to tragedies like this - this was not the first one, of course; his mother had been assassinated before him - and also about the communications. The evening news was on at ten o'clock. I had watched it, and I had gone to bed about 10:15 or 10:30. It had happened at more or less 10:30, as I understand it. I had a kind of a private area upstairs. It was a bedroom and a sort of an office outside that you could close both rooms off, and I had closed them off. There were telephones on the desks in my office room as well as by my bed. About 12:00 or 12:15 the phone rang, and I got up to answer it and I got as far as understanding it was the embassy, and then the lines were cut. This happened a couple of times. The second time I don't think I even knew it was the embassy, but I figured it must have been, and I couldn't get through to them. Well, I just went back to bed. I figured they'd reach me. About an hour and a half later I got a phone call that came in clear as a bell, and it was from the op center in Washington DC, and that's how I learned that Rajiv Gandhi had been killed. It was not publicized. At that point nobody officially knew this in Madras. The Indian government had not announced it. The body had not been brought in. They had clamped on an absolute hold. So I got up, and I got out of bed the member of my political section who was our Tamil person. Because of the difference in languages, both written and spoken, as well as because of the vastness of the area, we had a separate Indian person for each of the four states. I got my Tamil person out of bed, and he and I went to the consulate general. When I drove down, the streets were absolutely calm and quiet and empty, and it just looked like any other night at about two in the morning, a few drunks rolling home and that was about it. But he and I got on the phones, and we started calling people. Of course, the newspapers knew about it by then. We talked to politicians and we talked to newsmen, and we wrote a cable. We got the communicator in, and we sent this message out. In fact, I think we sent several that night. But anyway, by the time we started home again, it was close to five in the morning and the town was beginning to wake up. People obviously knew then, because there were crowds gathering on the streets, and there was obvious tension in the air. They brought the remains of Rajiv into town that morning. There wasn't much to send to New Delhi, but they brought what they could and sent him out. His family was not with him. His wife and his two children had not accompanied him on this trip, so it was just what remained of him and some of the people who had come with him. There was then a tremendous outpouring of sorrow all over the country, a very big state funeral for the man. It was in May. It was very, very hot. I'm sure the people who had to sit in the sun in New Delhi waiting for that funeral pyre to be lit must have really roasted. Our monsoon in the south was at a different time of the year than the rest of the country, or at least in Tamil Nadu it was at a different time, so we were not suffering quite the way they were. But at the same time in my state - and when I say that, I mean Tamil Nadu since that was where I was physically present - the backlash against Sri Lankan Tamils was immediate. Here again, it was a case of things having changed 180 degrees, because the first reaction of people in Tamil Nadu and, in fact, all over India when the troubles began in Sri Lanka in 1983 had been one of great support, tremendous support for the Sri Lankan Tamils. The various groups had been given asylum in Tamil Nadu. The Indian government had trained these groups in many cases. There was a great back and forth. There was all sorts of support going from India for them, and this began, of course, to change when the Tamil Tigers in Sri Lanka started attacking the Indian army. But it really changed in Tamil Nadu when this happened, and all of a sudden people were being chased out. People in refugee camps tended to be poorer, the farmers, the small people - they were not hurt at all. But all over the big cities there were Tamils living in towns and cities, and in many cases protected by the Indian government. I'm thinking now of representatives of the Tamil Tigers. They were hunted, and a number of them, particularly in the Bangalore area, were surrounded and there would be shootouts, and a number of them would be killed. They were basically chased away from the major cities. They were not welcome in India at that point, nor have they been since. In fact, the ones who were captured have recently been tried and, I believe, have been given life terms. In fact, some of them, I think, were given a death sentence, but I don't think anything has happened from that. The one exception to this was on the southeastern coast of Tamil Nadu at the area closest to the Jaffna Peninsula, where there were a lot of cross-straight marriages, family ties, and so on. That particular area way down there, which was pretty primitive and cut off from most of the country by lack of decent roads, people down there still had the ties and they would give protection. Basically Tamils in Tamil Nadu who just wanted these people out didn't want trouble, didn't like people shooting on their main streets, didn't like blowing up prime ministers or ex-prime ministers, once and future prime ministers. The mood really changed, and that was a major political event in the period that I was there. In terms of American relations with south India, I think one that went on until after she left the chief ministership of Tamil Nadu was the unlawful taking over of a large part of the campus of what had been an American missionary school in the hills bordering Tamil Nadu and Kerala. This is at a place called Kody Canal, and the school there had been there since the 19th century. It had been a Lutheran school, and title to it had been given to an Indian branch of the Lutheran Church after independence. It was still a Lutheran school. It still had plenty of foreign professors and teachers, and it was a boarding school going through high school and down into the lower grades. Jayalalitha, who was then the chief minister, a woman, the chief minister of the state of Tamil Nadu, another movie star who had made it into politics, had some personal reasons for wanting to turn it over to some personal supporters of hers. Some of what they call in India gundas or thugs went into this building in the middle of the night during the summer vacation when the teachers were gone and just stole it. Then for the next two years the U.S., certainly the Lutheran synod in Missouri and the school - it's an incorporated school in India and it has a board of directors who are international in scope but lots of Indians - tried desperately to get it back. Basically the chief minister would just look at us and smile, and nothing ever happened. When she lost power, I gather that the fortunes of the missionaries changed, and I am not really sure what the status of that is now, but we spent an inordinate amount of time on that and got absolutely nowhere except holding hands with a lot of very nice missionary folk trying to encourage them but being unable to handle it. She is no longer the chief minister of the state. She is under all sorts of threats of lawsuits. She may, in fact, go to jail, but right now she has attached her party's star to the ruling party in New Delhi, and she is the king maker, or I guess you would say the queen maker in this case, of the BJP government ruling in Delhi now, because she holds a certain number of parliament seats there. She's really wielding the whip at the moment, and I don't know how this will all come out, whether she will go to jail, whether any of her friends will ever get back the building that they had wanted. It was choice lakeside property in a hill station, which means it would be worth a lot for apartment buildings and tourist hotels and that sort of thing.

Q: They weren't trying to use it as a university?

HECK: Oh, no, no, no, no, no. This was strictly for money. This had nothing to do with improving the lot of the local people or anything else. I remember her telling me once before she became a chief minister that one of the reasons that she would not ever be tempted by corruption or by bribes was the fact that she was so very wealthy. She had been a very successful ingenue teamed both in real life and on the screen with M. G. Ramachundrin, who had been a previous chief minister, was chief minister until the day he died, who was a tremendously popular movie star. It was like having Ronald Reagan a hundred times over. People saw this man as a god. He left her money, and she had earned her own money, and her mother had been a film star. There was lots of money. She didn't need money. Well, it turned out she was an extraordinarily corrupt chief minister even by Indian standards. So I guess just having a lot of money does not necessarily keep you on the straight and narrow in conditions like this. There were some caste reasons for this. She had a girlfriend at that point, and there were some reasons that her friend, Shasha Kala, had connections with the people who got the property. It was all terribly intertwined, and who knows what the real reason was that this was allowed, but it was certainly protected, let's say.

Q: When you arrived, the Gulf War just over.

HECK: No, the Gulf War had just begun, had not begun actually. It's interesting because the Gulf War impacted - I do not like that word - made a big impact in Tamil Nadu and in Madras particularly. This was because the night that the Iraqis went into Kuwait in August of 1990, the British Airways flight that went from London to Kuwait to Madras was on the ground in Kuwait and the people who were on that plane were basically from Madras. A lot of Madrasis, a lot of people from Madras, then were captured, were prisoners, because that plane, the British Airways plane, was not allowed to take off. They included one of the biggest industrialists in the city who had a lot of business ties with the United States, collaborations with the United States. They included a man who was a Mennan, Mennans being a group from Kerala, a Mennan who lived in the United States and was either an American citizen or a green card holder and was very important in the film industry. I think at that point he was one of the heads of MGM. He was on that plane. I mean, all sorts of people were on the plane. So people in Madras paid a great deal of attention to this, but, we were a long way away from the Gulf War. In the period following that, the Indians were basically treated well and ultimately released by the Iraqis, but it was all these people who looked like Indians but maybe had American passports that one really worried about, because they were fair game, and all sorts of things happened to various people. Some escaped. Some never did escape and only got out afterwards. Some went underground in Kuwait and were alright but couldn't come home. So it was something that people followed. Then in about October Madras and Bombay both began to be used as bases for planes to come through on their way to the Gulf, Bombay more. But I remember going out to the airport once when the commandant of the Marine Corps and his entire planeload of generals and colonels came through on their way to Kuwait, where they were going to help plan strategy for the war, and we moved a certain amount of cargo through Madras which was destined for Saudi Arabia or Kuwait, not until later to Kuwait. So in that sense there was some impact. This was handled in a very low key manner. We did not get a lot of publicity in Madras as they did in Bombay, where pictures of these planes would be taken from the sides of the airport and would get into newspapers. This sort of thing did not happen in Madras. We, like the rest of South Asia, were under "voluntary departure." I'm not quite sure why they thought anybody in Madras consular district would be hurt. None of my staff went home. They didn't send any children home or anything like that, but it was offered. We were not allowed to bring families in. My new political economic officer arrived in February of '91, and her husband, who had knocked about all over the world and was in his 50s, couldn't come, because he was a dependent. He could only come months later even though the war was basically over by then. This sort of thing disrupted our life for the newcomers who came to post in that off season, the winter of '90-'91. But basically the war did not have a tremendous effect on us.

Q: There were no political buttons that were being pushed, demonstrations against America on generic terms?

HECK: Only very small ones and nothing that made a whit of difference, nothing that was at all of concern. There were a few who for political reasons wanted to demonstrate their solidarity with the Iraqis, but it wasn't big. It made almost no difference. There was much more of that in New Delhi and in Bombay, where there was a much larger Iraqi community. We just didn't have any. There were very few Iraqis in the district, and I'm sure you could count them on your hands and toes. It was not important to us other than it disrupted our lives in other ways.

Q: Did you travel to all the states and make calls all the time?

HECK: Oh, yes, of course. There was a great deal of that, usually by airplane. As I said, the closest capital of the other states was in Bangalore, and that was a seven-hour drive. I've done it often enough, but it was not a nice, easy drive, so usually by plane. I was on the road it seemed like all the time. The second part of my tour, when Tom Pickering came, then I was on the road all the time with Tom Pickering, because, as you may have heard, the Pickerings are inveterate travelers by land. They believe in driving, and they have driven across Africa and Russia and India and every country that they have ever served in. It was great fun having him because of all the traveling that we did. But I remember it drove the security people in New Delhi just bananas. I'm not quite sure whether they thought the robbers were going to attack us on the road or whatever, but we drove once from Hyderabad down to Madras, which was a very long two-day drive, and we drove from Madras to Bangalore over to Kerala and up and down the coast of Kerala. That was another two-day drive, coming back to get the car home. This sort of thing, we did a lot of that, and it was great fun.

Q: Are there any other sort of elements that we should cover?

HECK: Well, one thing that I would want to mention, I suppose, because in the north and the west and even a bit in the east in my last year there was a tremendous political brouhaha which caused religious riots and great destruction. In Bombay, for instance, there was a lot of burning of Muslim properties. This all started because there is a mosque in UP, in Uttar Pradesh, in north India which was called the Baberamoched after Baber, the first of the Mogul emperors. Some Indians believed that it was built on the site of the birthplace of Lord Shiva, who is a mythological god, at a place called Iodja in UP. The party now in power, the BJP, the Bharatiya Janata Party, is a very conservative party and very, very Hindu. It's trying hard now to become more multireligious but it has a strong basis in what you might call fundamental Hinduism, if there is such a thing. So a number of the strict fundamentalists in the BJP were demanding that India tear down this 16th century mosque and build a temple to Lord Shiva on the property. This argument had started when Jawaharlal Nehru was prime minister, and he died in 1963, so this has gone on a long, long time. But for years and years it had been locked. The government just solved the whole problem by closing it to everybody. That was being changed, and pressure was building up, and there were demonstrations in the north. Well, ultimately some of the hot-blooded types in the BJP overwhelmed the policemen and they started tearing the building down, and the next thing you knew the whole building was torn down, and then the riots started. A lot of Islamic sites got attacked, and there were huge demonstrations. People were killed. Buildings were burned. It was very messy in north India and in Bombay and in other places in the north and center part of the country. People in New Delhi, including the government of India, just couldn't understand why none of this made any difference in the south. It really didn't. This never affected us, and there are some really fundamental reasons for it. One of them is that Lord Ram - I had said Shiva before, it's Lord Ram, but it doesn't matter - the point was that Lord Ram is an incarnation of Vishnu, and Vishnu is the major one of the triumvirate of three Hindu deities in north India. Lord Vishnu has 10 incarnations, one of whom is the Buddha and one of whom is Krishna and one of whom is Ram, and Ram, of course, is a very big hero in Indian mythology who saved the country from the Dravidians, because he got his- (end of tape)

In any case, Ram is Vishnu, and Vishnu is the most important deity in the north, but in the south it's Lord Shiva, who is one of the others of the three of the triumvirate of three, Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva. It would be sort of like having a big Catholic-Protestant argument in the north and in the south having a completely different religion, Taoism. It just didn't connect, and so people didn't demonstrate. Nobody was hurting Muslims, nobody was rioting in the streets, nobody was doing anything. Neither our embassy could understand this nor could the government of India seem to understand the differences that existed between north and south on this thing.

Q: Did you get any high-level visits at all or Congressional visits or anything?

HECK: We got a certain number of them. I had Larry Pressler once for five or six days.

Q: A Congressman?

HECK: He was a Senator from South Dakota. We had Steve Solarz, of course, who was still the chair of the committee, the Foreign Affairs Subcommittee for South Asia, or for all of Asia for that matter, in the House. We had a high-level delegation led by Senator Boren of Oklahoma, who was at that point the chair of the Intelligence Committee of the Senate, and he brought a group of his Senators from the Intelligence Committee, Carl Levin and Claiborne Pell - I'm trying to remember, there were about six of them. But basically, we had visits from government officials, American government officials. We had businesspeople. The members of Congress tended to go to Bombay if they left Delhi. In the consular district, the place they wanted to go most was Bangalore and that area, and sometimes they would fly into Bangalore and I would meet them up there, but basically we did not have a tremendous number of Legislative Branch visitors. We had more military, we had quite a bit of military at various times. We had the Coast Guard. We had ships visits in the region. But, no, we did not have a tremendous amount. Larry Pressler's was particularly interesting to me, because we were able to get into a base which is used on the southeastern coast of India just where Tamil Nadu and Andhra Pradesh come together, very near that, and it's a place where they tested Indian rockets. Just to be able to get into that was a tremendous coup. Nobody had been in that place, I mean from the U.S. government, for years. Now I don't think that Larry Pressler and I knew what we were looking at particularly. It was not like having the head of one of our atomic energy organizations looking at it, but it was an interesting opportunity to see a part of India that I did not see very often.

Q: How did you feel about the diplomatic process there?

HECK: I enjoyed my tour there, but I must say that I much prefer embassies. I missed the political input on things. Over the course of the years that I have been in India, we have changed, the United States government has changed, tremendously. Its interest has dropped in things political. We, as the State Department, as the Foreign Service, are no longer covering Indian politics the way we did 30-some years before. It really doesn't matter very much about Indian politics. The government is a democracy. It is run out of New Delhi, and the permutations and the convoluted processes of various state governments are not important as the way it seemed to be to us in the 1960s when the Cold War was on.

Q: Everything was important. Kerala - I've never been to India, but I certainly know of that place.

HECK: Because of the Communist Party, that's right. But it doesn't matter anymore. To us now Kerala is the place that a lot of American nurses come from. We get a tremendous amount of nurses out of Kerala.

Q: Where did the patels of the motels come from?

HECK: The patels of the motels come from Gujarat. That's western India. There are lots of patels in Bombay, and, of course, Bombay until a few years - well, relatively speaking in Indian terms - until 30 years ago or so was basically a Gujarati city and not a Maharastran city. So the politics didn't matter, and, of course, I had somebody to cover the politics. I found that the ceremonial side of it kind of bored me. All of the ribbons that I cut and all of the speeches that I read and all of the interminable openings that I went to were particularly awful under my first chief minister in Madras and Tamil Nadu, because he was a strong believer in auspicious times and non-auspicious times. He would be invited to an opening of something that would be at eleven o'clock, and this man would whip in at 12:30 or 1:00 and we would have been sitting under a shamiana, which is a tent, in the hot sun for an hour and a half waiting for it to be auspicious again so that he could join us. This sort of thing used to just drive me nuts, because this always seemed to be on weekends that I was seated in the sun waiting for this man. I must say that Jayalalitha was a little bit better on that. When she said she would be there at a certain hour, she was there at a certain hour, but even so. I did an awful lot of escorting of various embassy visitors and Washington visitors and so on to meet various governors and chief ministers and chief secretaries. I got very adept at getting around for state and one territorial governmental sets of offices, but it always seemed as if we were having the same conversation for the eighteenth time and nobody really cared in New Delhi what was said on this and certainly not in Washington. The reporting that was done from the field was also... The longer I was there, the more Delhi wanted it all routed through them first rather than our being able to send things directly to Washington. I felt constricted by that to some extent. So I enjoyed my time there, but three years was certainly adequate. I was glad that I left when I did. But it was a beautiful place. The area is fascinating. People were terribly friendly. I have nothing but good memories of my time there really.

Q: Was the food good?

HECK: If you like Indian food, it's completely different than north Indian food. It's strongly vegetarian in at least parts of it. I can eat chilis till the cows come home, but there's one part of Andhra Pradesh where I can't quite get through some of the food because it is so hot, truly hot, to the point that a course called curd rice is always the last thing served. They give you sort of a half and half of boiled white rice and yogurt, the idea being that it takes the last of the heat out of your mouth. But, yes, I like south Indian food.

Q: Well, in '93 you went where?

HECK: In '93 I returned to Washington until my retirement in 1997. So I was here for four years, two years in Personnel and two years as the office director in East Asia Pacific for regional security affairs.

CHARLES A. MAST
Consul General
Bombay (1990-1994)

Charles A. Mast was born in South Dakota in 1939. After receiving his bachelor's degree from Calvin College in 1963, he received his master's degree from the University of Maryland in 1967. His career has included positions in Kastamanu, Curacao, Teheran, Tabriz, Ankara, Jakarta, Kuala Lumpur, Dhaka, and Bombay. Mr. Mast was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in February 2001.

MAST: Then I became consul general in Bombay, in India.

Q: And you were there from -

MAST: 1990 to 1994. We extended a year we liked Bombay so well.

Q: What was the situation vis-à-vis the United States in India when you got there in 1990?

MAST: Well, I'm trying to think. Gandhi was no longer prime minister. There had been a recent election, and V. P. Singh was the prime minister. It wasn't a Congress Party government, nor was it a BHP or Hindu Nationalist Party coalition. It was a coalition of a lot of smaller parties, including Marxist parties. Our relationship was pretty good. Singh was seen as a very competent bureaucrat and a very honest politician, probably a little bit arrogant who found it difficult to compromise. That was one of the problems that he had, and his coalition fell apart within a matter of months. Of course, the invasion of Kuwait happened within a few weeks of my arrival and this had a fairly major impact on our relationship with India.

Q: How did that play there?

MAST: Well, it played two or three ways. India has maybe 125 million Muslims, and the Iraqis and the Kuwaitis and the Saudis would fight - intellectually at least - for the support of the Muslim community, and so you had factions within the Muslim community, whether it was in the bazaar or whether it was the more educated or the more religious or obscurantist groups. The Iraqis had a lot of support, but the Saudis had a lot of money to spend, so they had their strong supporters as well. Any demonstrations we had during that time, and there were some demonstrations against US policy in Iraq, would obviously be put together by this Iraqi faction. Later, during the war itself, particularly January and February, we had voluntary departure status, so some of the wives and children left India, mostly from Bombay, not so much from Delhi. Bombay, because it was a major port and a huge airport, had a lot of activity there by Iraqi agents. Iraq had a large consulate in Bombay. Our intelligence sources said that probably our people in Bombay were at more risk - not huge risk, but at more risk - than American diplomats and their families in Delhi.

Q: There was concern that Iraqis would announce they were going to wage war against -

MAST: Well, there were a couple of incidences - remember in the airport in Manila and the airport in Bangkok - where I think they arrested some Iraqis or some associated terrorists who were working for the Iraqis, who were trying to put bombs on planes. We had an apartment building where, I think, 12 or maybe 14 members of our staff lived, primarily single people, and the Iraqis, with diplomatic cars, granted, but they would park in front, and they would drive slowly by at night. We know that we were under constant surveillance. Now, of course, I always said, since we would discuss this at our staff meetings, that I would prefer to be under surveillance by an Iraqi car that has a diplomatic license plate than by a Indian car, when you don't know who they are. At least we know that the police, obviously, are keeping a very close eye on this diplomatic car that's teasing our staff. I wasn't trying to minimize it, because it was scary, and we had some people, a couple of female staff, that went back. It was very hard on them, and they took advantage of the voluntary departure status to relocate elsewhere.

Q: Let's talk about the consulate general in Bombay. What was the size and what were its activities?

MAST: We had pretty much everything there that you'd have in any embassy. We had 26 American officers and staff. There was a large USIS facility downtown, where there was a very large library. Indians were fantastic readers, and we had great programs. And in the same building there was a Foreign Commercial Service officer, with an office and library and a staff of local employees as well. In the consulate building itself, which was a few miles away, we had a large consular section with eight officers. At that time, we issued many more visas than they did either in New Delhi or in Calcutta or in Madras because Gujarat, which is a province in western India, sent the largest amount of Indian migrants to the United States. These were obviously coming through the consulate in Bombay. Plus the fact that Bombay as a large business and banking and commercial center generated a lot of non-immigrant visas, especially business visas. We had two DEA (Drug Enforcement Agency) officers.

Q: Why in Bombay?

MAST: It primarily had to do with smuggling into and out of the port of Bombay. They would work in liaison with the Indian authorities, and with their people in Karachi, and working together with the Pakistanis and the Indians they would be able to come up with some fairly major intelligence finds that would cause large quantities of drugs to be seized, either in India or in Karachi, before they got to the United States. So they were relatively active. And then we had the typical communications sections as well as a political officer and a couple of economic-commercial officers.

Q: I know up in Delhi - I've talked to people who have served there - and they say that at the upper level of bureaucracy the Americans and Indians don't meet very well because they tend to preach to each other and all that. At a different - I won't say level - at a different plane of some kind down in Bombay, it was more commercial, wasn't it?

MAST: Yes, I would tend to agree with that. I don't know that I would have enjoyed an assignment in Delhi, when I loved India, and we loved Bombay, and we liked to travel to Delhi when we would have conferences or Embassy business. We'd go shopping or go to restaurants and that sort of thing. And I thought the living conditions were quite nice in Delhi - in many cases nicer. Bombay was extremely urban. It was like living on Manhattan. But in Delhi, especially in New Delhi, where the embassy was, it was more like living in a large American suburb - you know, big houses and yards. Pollution was terrible in the winter time, however, much worse than in Bombay, so I wouldn't have liked that.

But I think you're right that the Foreign Ministry kept a fairly tight hold over our relationships with the government - or at least tried to. So the Political Section had quite a bit of difficulty dealing with other agencies and other ministries other than through the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Now in turn, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs had quite a lot of clout in the Indian Government, so I don't say it wasn't worth working with them. In the Economic Section, of course, they would deal more with the Ministry of Trade and Finance and other more specialized economic agencies. But I had a feeling it was difficult. We didn't have that much difficulty in Bombay. The Central Bank was in Bombay and we had a lot of dealings with them. Some of our dealings there were representations on policy issues and commercial problems but most had to do with economic analysis and statistics.

Q: It was all more -

MAST: Day-to-day, yes. We didn't have to make many representations on US policy.

Q: One has the feeling that the Indians had absorbed an awful lot of the British, sort of, London School of Economics type of thing, but particularly the Foreign Ministry is always more susceptible because this is where the people who get their Oxford firsts or something go. And it doesn't work very well, I mean, as far as easy relations.

MAST: The Indians claimed that the Indian Civil Service created a certain breed of Indians and to a certain extent this was true. But while one doesn't want to make too big a thing of this, who is an Indian, what is an Indian? There are Punjabis, there are Gujaratis, there are Maharashtrians, you have Tamils, and Sindhis, not to mention Bengalis, to start and there enormous differences among these people. Then there are Hindus, Muslims, Christians, Buddhists, Jains, Parsis, Jews, etc. Delhi tends to be perhaps one-half Punjabi, and they have the reputation of being hard, aggressive pushers, generally, and very loud, boisterous, jewelry everywhere on the women - that sort of thing. In Bombay, we had the Gujaratis, who tend to be a little less sophisticated, perhaps, than the Punjabis, but I really quite liked them. They are very, very good in business - better than the Punjabis usually - and they really are people who take a longer term view on business and investment, for example. There is a great deal of difference among the peoples of India.

Q: Jokes have been made in the last couple of decades about the "Patel Motels" because it seems like every time you go into a motel it's run by somebody named Patel. Where do they come from?

MAST: The Patels are Gujaratis, and approximately one-third of Gujarat, which has about 40 million people, has the surname Patel. They aren't all related, obviously (although they probably are going way back when). But that's where the "Patel Motel" joke came from, because if one-third of all the Gujaratis that come to the United States are Patels and a number of them go into the motel industry, one-third of those are going to be Patels.

I would give a lot of speeches. I really enjoyed US immigration policy, US ethnic history, how different groups came in at different times, how the foreign-born coped and so forth. That's always been sort of an interest of mine. And there was a long article in Commentary magazine, somewhere around 1990, 1991, that had a lot of data on this Patel phenomenon in the hotel industry. Using some of that - and building from other information we had in the consulate or my graduate background in US history and from periodicals I would give speeches about US immigration history that was at the same time a defense of US immigration policy in the present. I would weave in little hints about why we had to turn away people for visas and so forth. But it was mostly a "big picture" thing about what had happened and what was happening, and a fair amount of what I would say would focus on the kind of opportunities that Patels were exploiting in the entrepreneurial area and also, obviously, the benefits that the US was obtaining from this kind of entrepreneurship.

Q: Were you beginning to feel an Indian lobby in the United States reflecting back? In other words, were the Indians getting themselves organized?

MAST: I think that was happening then. It's happened more since then, although the Indians sometimes have a tendency to shoot themselves in the foot. Sometimes the more sophisticated Indians in the United States would be working on something in India, and the Indians would torpedo whatever they were working on. So there tended to be difficulty in coordinating all of this properly. During the last few years, however, the Indian Embassy has become much more sophisticated in working with Indian-American groups. President Clinton, who was the first President in 22 years to visit India, had an incredible trip there. The Indian-American community would probably vote for him hands down. There are a couple of major fundraisers that Bush has, too, so there is Republican support as well. Clinton's in India again, or was in India again a couple months ago, in Gujarat working on earthquake rehabilitation. I've seen considerable publicity on that in the Indian press; though not much in the US press. And of course, many Indians are very, very successful here, particularly in software and Silicon Valley. We could easily come up with a half a dozen Indian billionaires, at least we could have prior to the dot.com meltdown.

Q: Were you seeing this transformation of India into a technological country, a high-tech country?

MAST: Oh, yes. That had started certainly by 1990, and by 1994 it was booming pretty well. It started out with some pretty non-sophisticated software writing. At the time, this was called a body shop. Indians would come to the United States and work on simple code, or people in India would work on relatively simple time consuming projects. But they're gradually getting more and more sophisticated. By the time we left in 1994, we were starting to see, for example, Honeywell having a regional center in Bangalore, which is in south India. They would have skilled Indian troubleshooters there, and customers would call in, for expert advice on how to repair software or how to go about repairing a particular problem with technical machinery.

Q: I read an article, I think in The Economist, recently, how they have centers - I think in Bangalore or something-

MAST: Bangalore mostly, yes.

Q: -where you have young Indian experts who would take on American-sounding names and fix up a sort of little fictitious history, so people are calling with no idea they're talking to somebody in Bangalore. They think they're calling somebody in Spokane or somewhere.

MAST: I can believe that. And of course that's starting to happen now. We talk regularly to Jamaica or the Bahamas. But you're right, it's happening in India, too.

Q: What about the industry around there? Were we trying to open up India? Was this mainly done through the embassy, or were you contributing to open up India to American goods and all that?

MAST: It was mainly done in the embassy, of course, but they would work very closely with us, and we would be sending problems that the American business community had up to them. There was what we called an American Business Council in Delhi, and we had a similar group in Bombay, and the Indo-American Chamber of Commerce was much larger in Bombay than it was in Delhi because Bombay was a much larger commercial and industrial center. So we were quite a large part of that, but obviously we didn't have a Ministry of Trade or Foreign Affairs to whom we could make representations.

Q: How did American business people that you were dealing with feel about their work in India?

MAST: Terribly frustrated, but the potential was so huge - still is so huge, although they've opened up a lot - that it was the kind of place they had to be. I remember Guardian Glass, for example, was building a large glass factory in Gujarat, in our part of India, and I had lunch with a Guardian executive just before I came, and I, of course, had been in Indonesia recently, and I had been in Malaysia and thought I knew something about China, and I said, "Well, what are you doing here? What are you doing there?" And he said, "Well, we've got two or three areas where we've just got to be." Indonesia was one, and they had a factory there. China was one, and India was one. That if Guardians didn't get in, get the factory set up, learn how to make glass competitively in India, there was a danger of being shut out of the market.

So ironically - or not so ironically, perhaps - some of the Indian protectionism sort of forced people to try to set up factories in India, where they might have lost money for a number of years, but though that they had to be there because of the potential. But also even in terms of trade, exports and so forth, people would say: "We've just got to be there."

Q: How about American in trouble and all that? You're the chief consular officer in a major area.

MAST: I had a deputy, of course, who was an FS-1 consular officer, and he and his staff would deal with most of that, although I occasionally had to get involved personally as well. One of the more interesting problems we had involved ashrams and this is true all over India - but we had them in Gujarat and we had them in Maharashtra.

Q: These are Buddhist retreats.

MAST: Hindu retreats.

Q: I mean Hindu retreats.

MAST: They could be Buddhist, too, but they're primarily Hindu, obviously, in India. And there was one that we called the "Yuppie Ashram," and the devotees there tended to be wealthy Americans - I think Richard Gere was even there, you know, people like that - and their guru was wealthier or more sophisticated than others. There were other ashrams which included basically a common guru and a number of Indian disciples and somehow some American would get involved with that, and then there would be odd accidents, sometimes very tragic ones that would take place, and the consular officer had to go up and investigate. We had several of those in our area.

We had some people in prison, but not that many. I've probably had more people in prison in other places where I've been than we had in India. A lot of times they would just deport people, unless they got into serious problems.

Q: Did you get involved with "Bollywood" or whatever it is?

MAST: Actually, it's very interesting. I've talked to other consuls general who have been there, and my immediate predecessor said, "Stay away from Bollywood." His predecessor had been deeply involved with Bollywood, and one of my successors has also been involved with Bollywood. We generally stayed away. Initially we had some peripheral contact with some of these folks who are big entertainers. Time means absolutely nothing to these people, so you'd be invited for a nine o'clock dinner, and you'd think, Oh, I don't want to be too early, I'll go at nine-thirty." We would get used to doing that. We would eat at one. At nine-thirty we would probably be the first people. In fact, often the host and hostess would still be getting ready. Indians ate late anyway. We never ate at dinner parties until 10:30 or 11 or 11:30. If one had to go to work - we went to work earlier than Indians did, although as consul general I could adjust a little bit, but if one worked all night and half the morning one should be able to sleep in till eight o'clock, but I usually couldn't. So I decided I did not need this aggravation. We were so sought after in the commercial community and in the university and in the intellectual-cultural community that we did not pursue Bollywood folks. We got to know some of them, and we got to know writers, and they would sometimes have some of the Bollywood people at their parties. But Bollywood, per se, we'd kind of try to stay away from. Although at the end, I must admit, one of the last nights there, we had a wonderful evening with three or four friends that were having a little farewell for us, and which included some movie stars. One was Amitabh Bachchan, who is sort of Mr. Everybody in Indian movies, and he's a wonderful person. I had a great conversation with him for the evening. And then I thought how wonderful it would have been to have gotten to know each other a little better. But we just didn't have time for everything there. There were times during the social season, which would be the cool weather - December - March - when it wasn't unusual at all to have three functions a night for night after night after night. I used to joke somewhat arrogantly that there was little in an important social sense happening in Bombay to which the American CG was not invited.

Q: What about the universities?

MAST: I was not as involved, again in retrospect, as I should have been. Our USIS BPAD was a senior officer, and he was very active, of course, and he would periodically get me involved or come with me. I would do that some, to defend US policy or attend university functions. But generally he did that himself. I got very involved in US policy during the Iraq war. I had to be a little bit careful there, because the Kuwaitis obviously made a big thing out of the occasion. They spent a fortune on major banquets and public fora, and of course I was always included on the dais, and I always had to say something. I had some set talking points, but usually I would have to do more than that. They usually managed to get the Russian consul general on the dais also, so he had to also make some comments about Russian policy. So for the first six months or a year that I was there, there was a great deal of that, and that was something new to me. I hadn't gotten that deeply involved in public diplomacy before.

Q: What about the consular corps there? Were they pretty active?

MAST: Yes, it was a large consular corps. I think we had something like 40 or so career, consul generals. Virtually all the Arabs were there, most of the Europeans, the Canadians, one or two Latin Americans, and a few Asians, including the Indonesians, the Japanese, the Chinese, the Malaysians, Thais, and the Filipinos. So there was as pretty good-sized consular corps. The governor of the state and the chief minister would each do me a major representational event annually for the corp and, of course, we were invited en bloc to all Indian national functions.

Q: What about trade disputes? Were the Indians exporting much to the United States?

MAST: I got deeply involved in one part of US policy, which was, I guess, fairly secret at the time, although it's not particularly now, and that had to do with our concern with dual-use chemicals.

Q: Yes.

MAST: I had some pretty good friends, good contacts, who were manufacturers of chemicals. When I first got there, there wasn't so much emphasis on dual use, or maybe I just didn't know that much about it, but certainly after the Gulf War got more deeply into that sort of thing. Of course, there's always a certain bureaucracy in Washington that believes that no Indian, and certainly no Iraqi or no Syrian, should ever buy any kind of precursor raw material for insecticides because they don't need insecticides. We need insecticides, but they don't need insecticides. There's usually a great debate going on as to what is proper use for these precursors, and what is improper use. Well, I knew this Indian quite well, and now and then I'd see some intelligence on so-and-so. I'd think, I know this guy. I got pretty deeply involved with analysis and lots of memoranda of conversation. Washington would be quite interested: check this out and check that out, and so forth. This guy was just a manufacturer and exporter, and he was selling certain kinds of chemicals. He argued that if the Iraqis wanted to buy it, well, they were legitimate consumers, why not sell it to them, or the Syrians. His government had no export embargo on these products. There were a lot of honest misunderstandings about many of these things.

Q: Talking about chemicals and all, this was way before your time, but Bhopal, where there had been a major poisoning.

MAST: It was in 1984, I think, where they had turned a valve on improperly and several thousand were killed. Well, we used to go to Bhopal periodically because it was in our consular district, but it was rather quiet at the time, although there were still lawsuits going on. The Indian Government won a major lawsuit against Union Carbide, I think $450 million or so. And then, of course, what happened was it basically went into the Central Bank, and the government was supposed to use that for the people in Bhopal. Of course, the Indian Government said that for eight years we've been taking care of all of these people and we've spent x hundred millions on this. There were many debates in the press and among NGOs and other groups who argued that the government was exploiting these poor Indian people who had been injured and died in the accident. They were exploiting them almost as badly as Union Carbide had, so it was quite a story. For a little while, there was a danger that - I've forgotten his name - the chairman of Union Carbide might be extradited or arrested, but we were not directly involved in that, as of course the consulate general had been earlier in the 1980s.

Q: You set up a factory in India and very quickly, as happened in Bhopal, you have squatters and all getting all around the fence, which creates a problem. Did this happen?

MAST: I remember it happened with a number of Indian factories. I knew people in the chemical industry who would have this problem. Indian chemical effluent wasn't nearly as clean as it should have been. But the problem intensified when squatters moved so close that the kids were actually playing right in the effluent or people were washing their clothes in it or whatever. So you're right. The press of population and the poverty really does make it very difficult. Again, this guy I knew in the chemical industry was very successful and had a very large plant in Gujarat. He told me, "You know, I used to go to this plant, and I'd see this effluent coming out, and it would be blue and it would be red and it would be yellow. We have started to really clean it up. Now it's just sort of a dirty gray." He added, "I'm not doing that for humanitarian reasons. That was money flowing down there, so we've just got to recover the chemicals that we were flushing away and reuse them or resell them or re-exploit them." There is economic sense in cleaning up, maybe not when you get to where you've got to take 99 percent out, as we find out with our own smokestacks. But if it's going to be the difference between 50 and 90, there is a great economic incentive in cleaning up.

Q: The Soviet Union while you were there ceased to exist, and for a long time, India had looked to the Soviet Union as being its strategic ally. Did that make any difference for you all?

MAST: On a personal level, I had a good relationship with the Soviet consul general. There were two or three of them during that period, and obviously the Indians, some of the more idealistic ones, would always be trying to get us together on the dais in a public venue. The theme would be how there was going to be world peace now that the Cold War was over. You can imagine this kind of thing going on. There was a large naval base in Bombay, and the end of the Cold War and subsequent US naval visits made it much easier for us to get to know Indian naval officers.

Q: Was there anything else we should cover on Bombay, do you think?

MAST: Well, of course, there were failures.

Q: Yes.

MAST: We had the BARC, which was the nuclear power facility and research facility, the center in Bombay and Tarapur, which was a major facility we had sold to them originally in the 1960s. There was intense interest in the USG in getting to know as many of these people and what was happening as possible. I mean it was a major interest for open-sourcing, but our covert people were also very interested in what was going on there. You know I think I understood why we didn't know that the Indians were going to blow off the atomic bomb, whenever it was, two or three years ago, because it was just virtually impossible to get to know any of those people. If I was at a party and I would just accidentally meet a BARC scientist and he might tell me his name, or I might be able to find out and he might even talk to me a little bit, but then it would totally close. I mean there was no way ever. I'd come home from a party and think that so-and-so is the technical director of such-and-such. Maybe we can have him over to our next party. Or I'd tell someone in the consulate that he might want to get to know that fellow, and so on. Never. They were just very secretive. I understood why we didn't know very much about what was going on in the nuclear area.

Q: What was your sounding of -

MAST: Excuse me. For an open society and economy like India, where everybody was willing to tell you anything at any time, for certain sectors of that society to be able to keep that kind of secret was extremely unusual. Americans tend to be very open, too, but we manage to keep some secrets also.

Q: What about the attitude towards Pakistan? What were you getting. Bombay was somewhat removed from it and all. I was wondering what you were getting.

MAST: There were different attitudes among different groups of Indians. There were many Sindhis in Bombay who had originally come from Pakistan. Many of them were among our best friends. They had incredible interest yet in Pakistan, and surprisingly, for people who had been driven out of Pakistan, some sympathy for Pakistan. Other people - there was a nationalist almost nativist group who were born and raised in Maharashtra, the state that Bombay was in, who tended to be fanatics when it came to Pakistan. They were fanatic anti-Muslims, and that of course also made them anti-Pakistan. So there were these different groups with different points of view having to do with Pakistan. There was a Pakistani consul general in Bombay for a couple of years. I got to know him very well, and it was very interesting to see India through his eyes. He felt that he had made a lot of good relationships there, but it was always very difficult because any time anything adverse would happen there would be all kinds of demonstrations. They never opened a consulate. He lived in a hotel for a long time before the Paks closed the office. Different groups made it too difficult for them to open a consulate.

Q: So you left there in 1994. Incidentally, what was your impression? We had probably a couple of ambassadors while you were there, didn't we?

MAST: I served for only 8 months with the best US ambassador I ever served with, Tom Pickering, who was ambassador there just for that short period of time. The ambassador when I came had been Bill Clark, who was an East Asia hand, and I thought did a good job, although I wasn't as impressed with him as I was with Pickering. And then Ken Brill, who was a young DCM at the time (he's since been ambassador to Cyprus and was executive secretary in the Department), and was chargé a couple of different times for several months. I was very impressed with him. It was interesting to work for someone who was younger than I was. I think that's probably the first time I'd ever done that. Frank Wisner came about three months before I left, so I just barely got to know him.

Q: Well, then, you left in 1994. Whither?

MAST: Well, back to Washington.

STEPHEN F. DACHI
Public Affairs Officer, USIS
New Delhi (1991-1994)

Stephen F. Dachi was born in 1933 in Hungary. He attended the University of Oregon Dental School and then joined the Peace Corps. While in the Peace Corps he served in Colombia, Venezuela, and Brazil. During his career in USIA he served positions in Hungary, Panama City, Brazil, and India. Mr. Dachi was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in May 1997.

What about India? You were in India from when to when?

DACHI: I was in India from 1991 to 1994. That was very nice. When I went to India, I said, "I will not get into trouble with anybody ever again." I went out there and was a different person. I tried to be a team player. I didn't get into fights with anybody. It turned out to be a very interesting assignment.

I think implicit in what we've been talking about... I was consul general in Sao Paulo. The scope of that job was light years ahead of anything else I had done in every respect. It was a large mission doing important issues. When I finished in Sao Paulo, George Landau who had been a great ambassador, tried to recruit me to be his deputy at the Americas Society in New York, where he had gone to be Director after his retirement from the Foreign Service. He said, "You have just hit the peak of your career. The smartest thing you can do now is retire and come to work for us." Well, there were a number of reasons why my wife and I thought about it and decided not to do it. When I said "No" to him, he said, "I can see why you're doing this. You don't want to do it because you think that you are going to become an ambassador and you don't want to cut your chances off from doing that. I can tell you you're not going to become an ambassador, it is not in the cards for somebody from USIA. But, I understand you doing this. I wouldn't want you to come here if you're going to sit here in this office next to mine and the first time you get mad at me, you're going to say, "Dammit, I could have been ambassador to Peru and instead I came to work for this bastard, George Landau and you'll never forgive me. Go right ahead and see if you'll ever become an ambassador. I wouldn't want to deprive you of the opportunity to get frustrated in your own way."

Be that as it may, leaving any emotional and personal factors aside, no one can argue that the scope of the job I had in Sao Paulo was beyond anything else that I could aspire to get in the future. Certainly the job in New Delhi was nice and most interesting, I'm glad I did it, I got a lot out of it and I think I did some useful things there. But it was no Sao Paulo. At the same time, after what happened in Washington and my travails there, it was a positive experience for which I was grateful.

As it turned out, we went for 18 months in New Delhi without an ambassador during my time there. For half my tour, I was de facto acting DCM with a chargé d'affaires, Kenneth Brill, now Ambassador to Cyprus, who was an absolutely outstanding individual of whom I was very fond and whom I admired greatly. My professional relationship with him I enjoyed personally more than I've ever enjoyed working with anyone else. So, it was just wonderful. That 18 months, when he and I were there working together in the front office was just great. That made a big difference. The other thing about being in India was that it's such an interesting place. The history, the culture, the religion, the civilization is so different from anything I had ever encountered anywhere else. It was a great learning experience. From a working standpoint on the other hand, India is very frustrating and exasperating. It is very difficult to get anything done in India. India and the U.S. have had a very rocky, frustrating, up and down relationship ever since their independence.

Q: They are two basically arrogant countries which each believe has the unique wisdom of how the world should be run.

DACHI: That's right. And each genuinely believes that of the other. It was difficult. On the other hand, India was just entering this period of change and economic reform that now has acquired a certain life of its own. So, it was a good time to be there. It was a good tour, all things considered.

Q: I have a couple of questions about India at this time. We're talking about 1991-1994. You were the PAO. What was your impression of the Indian press?

DACHI: You have to divide it into three. The English language press, which is the national press and is widely read by the elites, was quite free. It was fairly good. But the majority of the people read the vernacular press, which is much more nationalistic and has been slower to shed its virulent anti-U.S. tone, a legacy from all those years when a very close relationship with the Soviet Union dominated the atmosphere. Radio and television during my time were still under absolute, total state control. There was only one radio station in India, All India Radio. News there consisted of texts prepared and released by the Ministry of Information. Television was the same. When a fanatical right wing Hindu mob tore down the mosque in Ayodhya, an event that made headlines and set off alarm bells all over the world, coverage on Indian radio and television was drastically censored. People could learn about it only by listening to foreign broadcasts, which not many were in the habit of doing. Now, satellite and cable have come in and things have changed very significantly. But the free press at that time was mainly the English-language written press. The latter was even able to write about the Ayodhya incident, but since no more than three or four percent of Indians read English, the government did not regard that as a threat.

The overwhelming factors at that time (and they're still important) are the following. Number one, there is a greater suspicion of foreigners in India than in any other place that I know of. The British period, the East India Company, etched the deepest, most lasting impressions imaginable into Indian hearts and minds. The suspicion of foreigners is pervasive and often poisonous. It makes it very difficult to work there. In Latin America where it is also widespread, it was at its highest in Mexico. But I always thought it was limited to a relatively small circle of people. Throughout Latin America, no matter how anti-American government policies may have been, and even though the population at large always had a sort of love-hate relationship with the U.S., there was always respect, admiration and often envy for a lot of things we have achieved. In India, although there is a segment of people who have relatives here and so on, suspicion of foreigners and the condemnation of American "cultural imperialism" and its consumer society was far wider and deeply held. Many Indians liked to refer to the U.S. as a “society in decline,” and sincerely believed it.

Aside from the communist countries, India was the only one that never allowed the Embassy to invite anyone from the public sector, and that meant virtually everyone of any importance in policy making, to participate in the International Visitor Program or accept Leader Grants as they were called, to visit the U.S. in a professional capacity. They insisted that any such grantees had to be chosen and designated exclusively by the Indian government, a provision which has always been unacceptable to us. They were so afraid of being brainwashed or “subverted by the CIA,” they couldn’t contemplate such a program even in the first few years after the collapse of the Soviet Union when I served there. As a result, we wasted countless grants on people of little importance, by that I mean without prospects of becoming leaders or occupying prominent positions (the purpose of the IV program) simply because they held no public position and were available to travel.

Number two, admittedly I was there at the very beginning of economic reforms, privatization, liberalization of trade and so on, but the opposition to these changes was wider, broader, and deeper than anywhere else. Even now that I’m teaching a course on the global economy at Georgetown and I do comparative studies with other countries including China, I still believe that to be true. Today I saw a story in “The Washington Post” in connection with President Clinton’s visit to Brazil. It wasn’t about Clinton. It just said that Brazil is very hesitant and afraid of this free trade that Bill Clinton is advocating, because it would mean going much faster toward opening up markets. Domestic companies were reportedly afraid that they would go under if this opening is too fast. Therefore, there was resistance. Nowhere is that more true than in India. There is resistance to that kind of economic liberalization and opening of trade almost everywhere where the formally protected industries are trying to slow things down because they’re justifiably afraid they’ll go under. But in India, the legacy of Mahatma Gandhi and his advocacy of self-reliance and swadeshi, the word they use to describe it, is still deeply ingrained. It has now been revived by the BJP, the Hindu nationalist party and the opposition to economic reforms and globalization is as widespread as ever.

Specifically, there is an enormous ideological opposition to bringing in foreign consumer goods and also to attracting foreign investment to certain key sectors. They feel that this will bring in Western values and undermine their culture. At the same time, the bureaucracy fears the loss of control this implies over a socialist economy it has ruled and regulated almost to death over the past fifty years. Obviously I am referring to official circles. I don’t know of any place in the world where the consumers are opposed to having access to western goods. Ideological and cultural resistance to economic reforms at this level of intensity is not what drives resistance to change in most countries globalizing today. In the latter, it comes from the vested interests of old-line businesses fighting for survival and the bureaucrats who regulate and control the system of protectionism and a closed economy. Not in India. In India, the business considerations may be present but ideology continues to play the dominant role.

Another thing that is unique to India is the Hindu philosophy of life, which to the western mind is very hard to understand, almost unfathomable. It is extremely conservative and resistant to change, particularly to new and modernizing ideas from the outside. The faster the outside world moves, the faster change, innovation, and technology, all these things that are anathema to Asian religions and cultural values insinuate themselves from the outside, the more apprehension and fear it generates. If you add up these factors, you're talking about a place where extraordinary challenges face us in trying to reconcile our contrasting views on foreign policy and economic questions, before you even get to the intractable issues like Kashmir and nuclear policy.

Q: This time you were there saw the absolute disintegration of the Soviet Union into an empire that is gone. India has always used the Soviet Union as being its friend, as a counterweight to the United States. Did you sense in the people you dealt with there any disquiet on the fact that their friend to the north had disappeared?

DACHI: Oh, enormous disquiet. It was a big factor. I have a theory on that. When I first got there, it was just as the Soviet Union was disappearing. In my previous assignments overseas, when you had contact with Soviet diplomats, you had to report every meeting, every conversation to the Embassy security officer. The Soviets were always suspected (with good reason) of trying to recruit or subvert you. They were usually people who were very ill at ease if they unexpectedly met an American diplomat, were hard to reach, often uncommunicative, and so on. I showed up in India just as the Soviet Union was disappearing and, all of a sudden, these very same diplomats, now known as Russians rather than Soviets, morphed into the most friendly, "democratically oriented," capitalism espousing people, talking to us like we had been friends forever. It took them about 24 hours to change their spots. Yet they were the very same guys who a year before, and even two weeks before, were the heavy gumshoes.

I had served in Hungary for four years in the '70s and had extensive exposure to this kind of world. I always thought that most of the people over there claiming to be communists were in reality just opportunists and careerists. I always maintained that the number of convinced Marxist- Leninists in the communist world was very, very small. Not so in India. The people claiming to be Marxists or communists really believe in it. Most of the "true believers" weren't in Moscow or Beijing all along. They were in New Delhi, in government, in Indian universities and in the labor movement, and still are. The academics still believe in this stuff. There are still two sizable, fully functioning communist parties in India.

Why? My theory is not implausible. How did communism come to China? Mao Tse Tung imposed it ruthlessly by killing off everybody, mainly land owners, who was against it. How did communism come to Russia? Lenin and Stalin killed everybody that stood in their way. How did communism come to Eastern Europe? With the Red Army imposing it at the end of World War II, with puppets who spent the inter-war period being trained in Moscow and foisted on each country. So, communism in those countries was imposed by brute force on all these people.

The kind of socialism that came to India, on the other hand, was not imposed by anybody. It was brought in by unquestioned intellectual leaders who were revered as the fathers of independent India, first and foremost, Jawaharlal Nehru and, to a great degree, Mahatma Gandhi. A similar phenomenon took place elsewhere in South Asia, like Bangladesh and Sri Lanka. Gandhi and Nehru were the fathers of an independent and democratic India, people who learned their Marxism in London, who were much more pure of heart than the likes of Mao, Lenin and Stalin. They actually convinced people by their moral stature and their character. As a result, they made millions of genuine converts because they were credible people who never resorted to the kind of totalitarian steps that these others did. You can see the consequences today. India is virtually the only place in the world where there are still thousands and thousands of Marxist and communist true believers.

I remember visiting a university campus in Calcutta once. I couldn't believe my eyes. The walls were plastered with huge posters of Marx, Engels, Lenin and Stalin. Marx and Lenin, okay. But Engels and Stalin? It took me back to my days as a school boy in Romania in 1947 and 1948 when we had to go out marching in parades as "little red pioneers" carrying placards of those four. I haven't seen displays of Stalin posters anywhere in the world since the late 1950s.

To a certain extent all that is beginning to slowly erode now. In the last few years, the revisionist historians on Jawaharlal Nehru have multiplied rapidly. Jawaharlal Nehru is being viewed in much less favorable terms than he was at one time, and many of his philosophies on which independent India was founded in 1947 are now seen as having been misguided. Many of the old ideological premises which went unchallenged for nearly fifty years are no longer taboo. But the transformation in people's minds is not as fast as it had been in China and Russia.

Q: I have my own personal theory that the Fabian socialists, the brother and sister in England, had a much more pernicious impact on the Third World (Africa, India, and other places) than did Marx and Engels.

DACHI: There you have it. I agree with you completely. I left Romania in 1948 to emigrate to the West. I went to Canada and the United States and forgot all about Marx, Engels, Lenin and Stalin. It was not until I went to Calcutta in 1992 that I saw them again. I asked somebody, "How do you explain the Soviet Union's disappearance?" The answer I got was that there is nothing wrong with communism, it is still the best system. The reason the Soviet Union collapsed was that Gorbachev screwed it up and mismanaged it.

Q: Particularly as a public affairs officer, you're sort of the point man in dealing with the intellectuals. In some countries, intellectuals are important; in other places, they aren't. What about the intellectual class and your contact with them in India?

DACHI: I did have some contact with the intellectual class. I lay the emphasis on "some" because the maximum contact I've had with the intellectual class was in Hungary. In those days in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, intellectuals were really important. The intellectual class in Hungary, which was basically western-oriented, just reached out to me. They craved any contact with and access to western culture that they could get near. Again, there was an article either today or yesterday in "The Washington Post" about how former Soviet dissidents are at sea because they've lost their status. Indian intellectuals on the other hand, almost without exception looked down their noses at western culture and felt no need for contacts with a lowly U.S. Embassy officer to discuss it. After Hungary I went to Panama. There was no intellectual class there at all. There is damn little of it in Brazil. In India, there is an intellectual class, but most of their thinking is on a different planet and, as I was saying, most of them were not particularly interested in mingling with an American public affairs officer.

In Hungary, I used to have lunch with editors of journals who used to hang on my every word. I was one of the few sources who in their own language could talk to them about U.S. culture, life, politics and so on. They were dying to hear another version, even if they couldn't write about it. I don't know how many lunches I had with Indian editors. They didn't care what I said. They were there to tell me where I was wrong, where the U.S. was wrong, explaining to me things that they were sure I didn't understand about India. It was ships passing in the night. Most of them were nice, very civilized people. Several of them liked me because I had become a "likable chap" in my old age and I didn't seek confrontation in dialogue with them. On non-controversial issues, we could have a nice conversation. But in our position on these intractable issues like nuclear non-proliferation, Kashmir and above all "Western cultural imperialism," forget it. That's another pernicious thing about U.S.-India relations. They are so heavily dominated by these hopelessly intractable issues. That is why everybody on our side is so desperately looking for rapid growth in U.S. trade and investment, praying that it will go faster and better all the time, so as to finally give us something by way of a constructive, positive element in talking to the Indians.

In Hungary, I used to have wonderful conversations with journalists about all kinds of things. It didn't matter whether we agreed or not. They were very eager to hear what I had to say and I was eager to hear what they had to say. But in India, everything was so predictable. You could have just said, "Alright, these two people will have lunch. I'll tell you before they ever start exactly what each side is going to say, so you might as well not speak with your mouth full because there is no need to rush. No minds are ever going to be changed."

Q: By this time, had the first love worn off? We had had ambassador after ambassador going out there who sort of fell in love with India. We would always tout up India, particularly by some of our political ambassadors, yet when you get right down to it, nothing ever really came of this. The Indians seemed to be, oddly enough, as comfortable or more comfortable with the Soviets than with us.

DACHI: They were much more comfortable with the Soviets because they were ideologically much closer. And yes, the people who had love affairs with India had faded into the background by the time I got there. There were three ambassadors: Bill Clark, Tom Pickering, and Frank Wisner. They were all vigorous promoters of better relations and labored mightily on the intractable issues, but they had no illusions about India.

Q: All three professionals.

DACHI: Right. For my money, Bill Clark was the best of the three. That may not be what you would expect most people to say given the legendary reputations of Wisner and Pickering. But Bill Clark was very well liked by the Indians and he liked the Indians. Yet he never lost sight of U.S. interests or what he was there for. Although on a personal level he was very, very into the Indian thing in every respect, on the policy side, he was a good, hard-nosed, effective ambassador. I don't mean to say that the others weren't, but Bill Clark had it all in balance. Tom Pickering, I would say, as far as intellectual prowess is concerned, is light years ahead of everybody else. That, in a sense was a disadvantage in India.

We as Americans collectively have this problem that we believe that if you really understand a problem thoroughly, we must be able to find a solution to it. If I can bring you around to understanding my point of view, which is based on an objective, dispassionate analysis of the facts, you cannot possibly escape reaching the same conclusions I do. That is an American characteristic (I would say it is virtually embedded in our genetic code) that is particularly disliked in India, I suppose because they believe the same thing themselves. Because Tom Pickering is so brilliant, he was even more a victim of this. He believed that even though all the cogent analyses of the American point of view over the last 50 years didn't carry the day, he could argue them just a little bit more clearly and persuasively and, as a consequence, carry the day. He was there for a very short period of time, but he was relentless in the fundamental belief that if you were just rational and articulate enough in arguing your point of view, people could not escape coming to the same logical conclusion that you did. I don't know how long it would have taken him to get frustrated and disappointed, but he got a chance to leave before that moment arrived.

Frank Wisner, on the other hand, is a guy who believes that no one can resist his charms and that he would inevitably carry the day, not necessarily on the power of irresistible logic, but on his impeccable diplomatic finesse. I think he began to get frustrated after a while. I don't think he left India with the same idealistic vision that he arrived with. So, no one has an old-style love affair with India any more. The last two officers at the Embassy who had love affairs with India had left just before I got there.

Q: In a way, with the great democracy in the world, it was a pretty sterile time there.

DACHI: Absolutely. We have always said that we are the world's two "greatest democracies." We were grasping for straws to find a way to give that some practical meaning, to say that we have something in common, some common interests, but the fact is that, if you look at the history of Indo-U.S. relations, it rarely worked out. The fundamental cornerstone of Jawaharlal Nehru's belief that India had to retain its option of an independent foreign policy and not automatically follow the U.S. lead resulted in his policy of non-alignment. That was dealt a crushing blow with the incredibly painful Indian experience of being invaded by China in 1962 and having to ask for help from the United States. That was very painful. After that, things were a little bit better for a brief period, but that too ended in 1971 when the U.S. sided with Pakistan in the Indo-Pak war that led to the independence of Bangladesh.

Then there was the period in which they had to get wheat from us under PL 480 because they were not self-sufficient in wheat. That was just as painful. Most other countries would have been delighted that we gave them such vital aid. To Indians, it was a humiliating experience too painful to ever recall. After Nehru died, Indira Gandhi came in and we had the war in Bangladesh. Even though the Green Revolution took place in about the same period and it was through our research that we were able to provide them this miracle wheat and miracle rice, the key factor in having made India self-sufficient in food, forget it. That didn't count. We tilted toward Pakistan in the case of Bangladesh and she could never forgive us. She signed the Treaty of Friendship with the Soviet Union that same year and started to introduce additional, rather radical socialist measures into the economy. So, things went down again on multiple fronts. Then we increased our cooperation again with Pakistan because of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the resulting war. That bothered the Indians tremendously. So, there just haven't been many positives there. Rajiv Gandhi had a brief romance with Ronald Reagan, but that didn't last long either. Our relations were not so hot for a long time, really until the Soviet Union collapsed. Then Kashmir and non-proliferation have been this ongoing crisis, forever poisoning the well.

Now, we're laying our eggs in the trade and investment basket. Certainly much has happened in that field, although it has been much slower and more tortuous than what had been predicted. Without a doubt, it has been an important, positive factor. In the last few years they have also opened up their media. That became inevitable with the advent of satellites and email, making it impossible to control the electronic media. As a result, there is much more media freedom. The consumer society is giving rise to a growing middle class. So, things are moving now more so than I would have predicted when I left there. Things are on a much more positive note today.

Q: But as a practical matter, for a very long time, India was really not very important to us when the chips were down. It wasn't actively fighting us. It was preaching on the side and we would preach back at it. But it really wasn't very important.

DACHI: Absolutely true. We were on opposite sides on most foreign affairs issues, they were against us most of the time at the U.N., and we were always perceived as favoring Pakistan over India. (In Pakistan it was the other way around, hence the origin of the term "zero-sum game" perpetually applied to our relations in South Asia.) They condemned us for any aid we gave to Pakistan, especially on the military side and they never acknowledged any aid we gave them, not even the billions of dollars worth of PL-480 food aid we delivered before India became self-sufficient. And, they kept us at arms length on economic relations, trade and investment until their key ally, the Soviet Union collapsed, thus we never derived a strong mutual benefit from any sort of common undertaking. So, rather than being important to us more often than not they were a thorn in our side.

Again, if a one liner can symbolize that, my son, who at that time was the national security legislative assistant to Senator John Chaffee of Rhode Island, came to visit me while I was in India. He was invited as a speaker at several think tanks and other places because as a Senate aide, he was in great demand. He is very articulate and very bright. He gave some great talks and gave very much the congressional point of view, which goes to the point you made. They would ask him about Kashmir. He would get up in front of these high-powered think tanks and say, "Let's face it. To the population of the United States, Kashmir is a sweater." That got the point across more effectively than anything else. Congressional people can say anything they want. We can't.

By the way, the Indians love that kind of talk, or, at least it is the only kind that gets them to sit up and listen. I gave dozens of talks about economic reforms, U.S. policy, and so on. At first, I went in there in the usual way and tried to be helpful and explain. But there would always be people in the audience who had just been waiting for months or years to get a crack at a live U.S. diplomat. As soon as I was through, they would get up, take out their notes, and give speeches instead of questions. They never listened to a word I said. They would come back with all of these anti-American chestnuts they had been roasting over the fire for years. Most of these sessions quickly turned into a dialogue of the deaf. If you try and be too accommodating they just come in and eat you alive.

The way to get these Indian tormentors to sit down and listen is to be as aggressive as they are and come right back at them. Then all of a sudden, they say, "Oh, okay" and you may actually be able to have a conversation with them. I have had this happen after I learned the hard way. I went once and spoke at a Rotary club, which is generally made up of "friendlies." So, I decided to give my friendly speech, not the hard one about economic reforms. I got through the first question and a guy got up. I thought this was going to be a love fest, but the guy said, "Look, we all know that the U.S. interest is to maintain the military industrial complex. That is in the U.S. interest to do. So, how do you explain the contradiction between the outward devotion of the U.S. to reduction in arms, disarmament and peace when, in fact, you know that the U.S. interest is to keep the military industrial complex going?"

It occurred to me that most people would have tried to answer that question in a sort of apologetic way: "Look, that's not the way it is. Our defense budget has been significantly reduced. President Bush has called for reduction in arms. Even President Reagan has. We have had SALT treaties and so on. It's not so." I knew that none of that would work, so I didn't say it. I heard him out. When he got through, I said, "I'm glad to have your question because I came here for a dialogue, but don't you come and tell me what U.S. interests are. I am here to tell you what U.S. interests are. I am going to tell you that first. You can ask me questions about anything, but don't tell me what the U.S. interests are. You don't know what U.S. interests are. I am the one who is here to tell you that." He sat right down. Everybody said, "Wow!" After that, we had a wonderful conversation. But you have to come back at them the same way they come at you.

You said something earlier about both Indians and Americans thinking they have all the answers. I used that point on one occasion also. When somebody started preaching to me, I said, "You know, Indian and American people have one thing in common that is very, very important to keep in mind. We both think that we have all the answers to the world's problems and we're two of the most generous people on Earth in sharing our advice about it with everybody else around the world." I think the audience got the message.

Q: You left there in 1994. Did you retire at that point?

FRANK G. WISNER
Ambassador
India (1994-1997)

Ambassador Frank G. Wisner was born in New York in 1938. He graduated from Princeton University in 1961. He was stationed in Saigon, Dinh Tuong Province, Tuyen Duc Province, Tunis, Algiers, and Dacca. He later served as Ambassador to Zambia, Egypt, the Philippines, and India. Ambassador Wisner was interviewed by Richard L. Jackson on March 22, 1998.

Q: So the India years were '94 to '97.

WISNER: '94 to the summer of '97.

Q: And in some ways that was the culmination of your focus on American business, opening up markets on a very big stage -- India.

WISNER: Big stage, a lot of latitude. India has not been at the center of American foreign policy, although we've wanted to treat it well and not find ourselves in an antagonistic position. But India was at a real turning point in her society. Her economics had not worked out. Her balance of payments situation had deteriorated terribly at the beginning of the 1990s. She had begun liberalization. It looked like she was going to surge ahead with that liberalization. Unfortunately, the then-government in Delhi lost control of a lot of state governments in 1994, and the political situation India became much more chaotic. They just had an election in the last couple of weeks in India, right now, and still there are coalitions in India's future and for some time to come. All of this, however, is to say that India has begun to achieve much higher levels of growth throughout this decade. American investment has been expanding, but not at the rate it could have expanded. The reform in India has continued, but not at the depth it should have proceeded. I found myself in a very high-profile embassy, arguing a new, post-war relationship with India, arguing that the future of the globe depended on the interactions of the great powers: Russia, China, India, the United States, Europe, and Japan to maintain a core of stability through our interactions and then our ability to influence the broader international scene. I argued, as well, for concentration on the new agendas: refugees, drugs but also the environment. India's environment was cruelly degraded. We were trying to see ways to engage the United States economically with India in a wholly new way, one that would provide us with a major platform for economic expansion in a globalized economy through a deep relationship with this huge, nine-hundred-million-strong Indian market and, from India, via her human resource potential, out beyond India's shores. A big, big canvas to write on.

During my years in India, I was served with a very able embassy. I never had a better DCM than Matt Daley or a more able executive assistant than Penny O'Brien. We worked hard. We took the message of the United States and a new vision of the future all over the country. Our three consulates general were active points of diplomacy, as well as the normal conduct of consular relations. We issued thousands of visas. I think, in this time, we began to set a certain style of the United States, demarcated our previous approaches, and began to come to terms with some of the harder edges of the nuclear issue, moving away from pretending that we could roll back India's nuclear capability to learning to live with it, if the Indians could keep that capability recessed, if Indians would recess their missile capabilities. We were trying to create a sense of a greater partnership between India and the United States, which was hard to do. Things don't turn around quickly, anywhere. Big democracies are distracted, and that was India's case, heavily domestic in their orientation and inward looking -- a great nation between three seas and the mountains. But I think we began to write on some of the slates of the Indian political leadership and to make India a reality, certainly in the American business community, and beyond the normal debates over just non-proliferation as the only aspect of the policy. We stimulated both Pakistanis and Indians to intensify their discussions with each other, recognizing the chances of them going to war were not the highest in the world. I suspect we must continue to nudge them, discreetly, toward negotiated solutions. They had, for 25 years, kept tabs themselves on each other's habits. We helped to make some important statements for the United States. It was the 50th Anniversary of Indian Independence. I was able, with my embassy, to raise about a million dollars and put one of the best dance troops in America in ten Indian cities and a lot of other activities showing respect and recognition for Indian society and culture and to encourage and see a couple of Indian prime ministers come to the United States. We encouraged a dialogue taking place at many different levels, intensifying strategic exchanges between the Pentagon, the State Department, policy planners and Under Secretaries.

I took my leave of India in the summer of 1997 with great sadness. It was a fascinating country which is really a continent at a time of great transition, great change in its national life and style.

Q: There was clearly growth, in the years you were there, of Hindu nationalism, reflected in the recent elections.

WISNER: No, I think I wouldn't quite see it that way. I would say that it was more the decline of the great Congress Party and growth of regional political expression. The Nationalist Party -- the BJP (Bharatiya Janata Party) -- has not, of itself, grown very much. It's got about ten more seats in this Parliament than it had in the last Parliament, but it's proved itself more skillful in building its coalition base.

Q: The future India is governable?

WISNER: India will stick together. India will retain sovereignty, keep her borders secure. But the degree to which India will enter the world stage as a major actor -- mix it up, commit herself to taking risks internationally, be a player, a negotiator and leader -- that is still to be seen.

Q: India as a major market and trade partner of the future for the U.S.?

WISNER: Very, very possible. I think that, without stretching the point too much but to give a conceptual focus, India could be the fourth or fifth largest economy in the world in 20 years.

Q: You had a number of high profile economic visits. I think that Treasury Secretary Rubin, others were there?

WISNER: Sure, Mrs. Clinton was there. Secretary Perry visited. The Secretary of Commerce, two Secretaries of Commerce came. The Secretary of Energy came twice. The Secretary of Agriculture visited. Quite a piece of the American Cabinet came out to India.

Q: What were your greatest frustrations in a country that vast?

WISNER: I think in our policy. It was hardest to get us to turn our attention to shifting our policy on the nuclear issue. I just don't think we have been very flexible or very smart. We've hoped that we could talk the Indians out of being a nuclear power. We can't do it. They won't accept it. They consider it essential to their national security and even more essential to their national pride.

Q: Well, Frank, as you were getting towards the end of your tour, there was the daily lottery in the Washington papers about whether you were going to Paris or whether Felix Rohatyn was going there. What was that all about, can you say?

WISNER: Well, I was encouraged to put my hat in the ring for Paris, to be ready to serve in Paris, by Secretary Christopher just after the election. And I agreed to do it. Pamela Harriman made it very clear she hoped I would be her successor. A number of other people wished I would do the same thing. The Administration did not move immediately to name new ambassadors, but I was eventually offered Paris, just about the same time I was offered a new life outside government, a second career with American International Group. But before I went to India, I had made a decision that, after 36 years at the end of my time in India, I would go on and follow a new path. It would be my last chance to really have a crack at a second career. I was interested in trying my hand at a second career, and I enjoyed the prospect of doing one in business. All of this weighed heavily in my decision to go to New York and to give up Paris. My wife had had a bout of ill health too, and I think some of the financial concerns about Paris weighed in my decision. None of these were decisive. My main course was I had decided that the time was right, and I had a terrific offer, and I decided to pick that offer up and go with it.

E. ASHLEY WILLS
Public Affairs Officer, USIS
New Delhi (1995-1997)

Deputy Chief of Mission
New Delhi (1997-2000)

Ambassador Wills was born in Tennessee and raised in Tennessee and Georgia. He was educated at the University of Virginia and John Hopkins University. Entering the Foreign Service (USIA) in 1972, Ambassador Wills served abroad in the field of public affairs in Romania, South Africa, Barbados, Yugoslavia and Belgium and in India as Deputy Chief of Mission. He also served in Washington as Deputy Director for Southern Africa Affairs for USIA and as Political Advisor to the US Military Commander in the invasion of Grenada. From 2000 to 2003 he was US Ambassador to Sri Lanka. His final posting was as Assistant US Trade Representative. Ambassador Wills was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2008.

Q: Okay, let's go to India.

WILLS: Yeah, let's go to India.

Q: You were in India from when to when?

WILLS: I got there in June or July 1995.

Q: Yeah.

WILLS: And we stayed five years. For the first two years I was PAO, the first year and a half or so. The next three to three and a half I was DCM. As I said, I think it was the biggest USIS program in the world at the time. Also at the time USIA was declining as an agency; its budget was being whacked and the first thing I had to do there was cut something like $2 million out of the budget. We had, believe it or not, in USIS India at the time we had about 38 Americans and I want to say 750 Indians; it was a huge empire. I had to cut, actually it was more than $2 million it was something like three or four million. Anyway, I ended up cutting maybe half the Americans down to 20 and about half the Indians down to 400, all in the space of about six months; that was traumatic. We had all kinds of negotiations with the employees associations, with the American officers concerned; I obviously didn't want to have their assignments curtailed. Then we had to eliminate all kinds of activities. We had libraries all over the country that were deeply part of the local communities, American centers they were called. We had magazines being published, television shows we produced; it was a very big operation. Frank Wisner, as I said, was the ambassador and Frank is nothing if not opinionated and he informed me at the first meeting we had when I got there that he wanted me to close down those American center libraries and the magazines, quit publishing the magazines. I said, "Frank, I just got here, you've got to let me look at the situation and determine which are the activities that we can cease and which ones we should continue." I decided almost immediately that those magazines and those libraries were way too valuable. Everyday you would walk in and there were 300 Indians in the library reading everything that we had. The magazine in a country that is as... India has a big problem with illiteracy even now but it also has some of the most literate people in the world and they loved our libraries. So I had a much tougher time negotiating this with Frank Wisner than I think our negotiators had doing the SALT talks with the Russians back in the Cold War. But eventually he let me do what I wanted to do and I cut other things and kept the libraries open and the magazine going. I'm happy to say here we are thirteen years later and they are still going; they are still valuable.

Q: What sort of things were you cutting?

WILLS: We closed a couple of small posts, we eliminated some of the television and radio programs that we were doing. We published fewer newsletters than we had been doing, although we maintained one or two of them. That was it; mainly it was a question of reducing staff. We got people to work harder, longer hours to produce as much as they could. It was very stressful cutting all those people but very pleasing that it ended up being a fairly happy post even with all those cuts. We were, I think, especially effective in the Indian media. Have you lived in India?

Q: Nope.

WILLS: My God I've never seen anything like it. To go from Belgium where everything in moderation is venerated to India where there is nothing moderate in the country, it was the biggest culture shock I had ever experienced as an American diplomat moving around the world. I mean there are the shocking aspects as far as poverty is concerned, seeing beggars everywhere; you have to remember 1995 India had just begun its economic reform program after forty years of socialism. Over half the world's poor at that point as defined by the United Nations lived in India. But in the middle of all that poverty one would find absolutely astonishing wealth. There were so many rich Indians and no one had told me about that. It was a country of extremes, a country where you would go out in the deserts of Rajasthan and come across the ruins of a castle that had belonged to a maharaja and that dated from the 4th century, it was just amazing, amazing things that you could find and that weren't restored; they were just out there. It was such a remarkable place and such a deep culture. They would take a kind of condescending view toward us and say, "Oh you Americans you are only 200 or so years old, our culture is 3,000 years old." There was some truth to it but I got tired of being patronized.

Q: People always equate it that our culture started in 1776 but it goes back as far as any...basically it comes out of Europe so it's not as though it just sprang up all of a sudden.

WILLS: But I have never lived in a place that was as culturally dense as India. We like to think that our society is diverse, we are minor leaguers compared to the Indians. They have 20 something official languages; English is spoken only by a small percentage of the people but still a large number in absolute terms. They have the caste system, which complicates things; it's the second most populated Muslim country in the world, there are 140 million Muslims in India. It's the birthplace of Hinduism and Buddhism, there is Jainism and there are Zoroastrians, there is a Jewish community. I sometimes felt that you needed a degree in higher math to figure it all out it was so complex and so awesome. There was not one day that I lived in India in five years when I wasn't reminded in some way this is a very different place than I am used to; this is a very strange country.

So I found it professionally and personally too to be enriching, deeply aggravating, the Indians would piss me off, piss us all off, especially Brahmin's, higher caste Indians with their preening and their belief that they were superior to everybody. Living there was so difficult, the climatic conditions were tough. Getting things done in our house, we had nine people who worked in our house full time. In the back of our house we had a row of dwellings, it was like a little village. Those nine people had spouses and children; there were 45 people who lived on our property apart from our four-person family. So you needed all those people to get things done, to have your water boiled because people were getting sick including me all the time from eating food that hadn't been properly cleaned or stored. People were getting sick from other things, air borne illnesses of various sorts. We had, I think, the largest medical unit the State Department has in any mission overseas. It was such a difficult...getting around, the traffic. In those days there were only two airlines in the country. I learned a new word in India. After we had been there about six weeks and I had gone through this stressful period of cutting the hell out of the USIS operation I said to my family, "Let's go down to Rajasthan to Jaipur for a weekend vacation, just to get out and see a little bit of India." So we flew down there and we had two lovely days exploring the castle, palaces, and Jaipur is a gorgeous high desert city. Our flight was due to go back to Delhi at like one in the afternoon on Sunday afternoon. We showed up at eleven in the morning two hours ahead of time and I noticed that there was nobody in the airport so I walked up to the ticket counter and said, "We are here for our flight." The guy said, "Oh your flight sir has been preponed." I said, "What?" Well, postponed means it's going later, preponed meant the pilot decided to take the God damn plane off at about 9:30 in the morning and just left and flew back to Delhi. We were sitting there and after I got over my shock I said, "Well when can we get to Delhi?" He said, "Oh, the next flight's tomorrow." So we went back to our hotel and I learned a new word, to be preponed. Your flight is preponed sir, your flight is preponed.

Q: Tell me when you got there in '95 how stood relations with India? Of course, by this time the Soviet Union had ceased to exist which had been their great supporter and all. How stood things at the time and how did things develop while you were there?

WILLS: Well I mention that India's economic reform was, when I got there, four years old. It began in 1994 when the country almost went bankrupt, it couldn't pay its bills. That was because of years and years and years of socialist policies; that's why we have so many Americans of Indian decent in our country, because they had no opportunity in their country. They were well educated and they came to our country as doctors and scientists; it was a very poor place and they had all those years of non-alignment. India was one of the leaders of the non-align movement and successive Indian leaders but particularly Jawaharlal Nehru, the first prime minister and his daughter Indira Gandhi, were hostile to us, they didn't like us. There was a kind of a leftist ethos in India even when I got there in '95 even though they had moved toward the free market in '91; it was a very slow movement, India was still a very heavily regulated economy. I think it must be the broadest engagement with any country on the planet earth; there wasn't a single issue in American diplomacy that wasn't in play in India. We would talk to them about nuclear weapons, terrorism, democracy, human rights, international economic issues, trade issues, population issues, health issues, regional security issues, and aids. India has, I think, even with all the aids in southern Africa I think there are more HIV positive people in India than in any other country. So we were engaged on every possible issue with India, whereas in Belgium we really only had an issue or two and they weren't all that serious.

We had forty issues to deal with the Indians about and they were all very serious. The mission was working at a very high level of activity and with a very high level of professionalism. It was one of the largest embassies in the world; I think second largest after Egypt because we had all those AID and military advisers in Egypt. We had, I think, about 400 Americans and 3,000 Indians working in the mission. So it was a huge operation. We had a vehicle fleet in the embassy that must have been a couple hundred vehicles that we ran. So the administrative section of the embassy was a big operation.

Q: Things were obviously changing but how did we find say dealing with the foreign ministry?

WILLS: It was tough. The first forty years of India's independence, as I said, it was a socialist economy and a socialist leftist sort of politics so although there was a public sector and some people got quite rich in the private sector the most prestigious occupation was being an Indian administrative service officer, the IAS. The elite from the best universities in the country wanted to be civil servants. In our country the word civil servant is not a cuss word but it's not a revered occupation in many parts of the United States. In India being an IAS officer or an IFS, Indian Foreign Service Officer, these were the coolest things people could do. With the leftist political ethos in the country even in '95 you would go to the foreign ministry and you would be lectured to about the evils of American diplomacy in this part of the world or that part of the world; so it was difficult. But I kept reminding my staff that I didn't join the Foreign Service to go to a place where everybody agreed with me, I liked having to figure out ways to get the Indians to work with us or at least to tolerate and listen to us. So meanwhile India was reforming economically and more and more people were choosing not to go into the IAS or the IFS. Instead, and it was visible when I was there, the best graduates wanted to join the private sector rather than the government and that trend has accelerated and now it's by far in favor of the private sector but that was not the case when I got there just thirteen years ago. So dealing with the Indian government was difficult. I could talk about my five years in India, Stu, for a week. It was an amazing experience.

I was one of the three embassy officers who were authorized to go to Kashmir where there was then and still is an insurrection. The Pakistani's are supporting the insurrection; it's mainly an Islamic insurrection. The Indians have forces up there trying to maintain public order; Kashmir is gorgeous. It's a Himalayan paradise but in the middle of it all there is this tension and armed check points everywhere, bombings periodically, assassinations so you have this high mountain jewel that is a very unhappy place. The northeast of India is these little states that look like they are really part of Southeast Asia and culturally they are. But, they are part of India and very different from everywhere else. I mean I was so stimulated there and by that point in my career I'd learned five foreign languages. I just didn't have the wherewithal to study Hindi or any of the other languages so I did my best to learn what I could as an English speaker and I managed to read and learn a lot about the country and came away deeply impressed and deeply depressed. You see problems there that would stagger us in the United States. They have to deal with so many issues on a massive scale because there are so many people. When I was there there were one billion, now it's a billion one hundred million. Anything is off the charts. Two percent of the population is HIV positive, that's 25 million people, 25 million people. So even a little bitty percentage of a very big number is a lot of people. So everything there is outsized and, as I said, extreme.

After about a year and a half Frank was getting ready to leave and there were a whole series of negotiations and coincidences and it worked out that I was named DCM and I served with him just a short time in that capacity. Then he left and I was chargé for almost a year while we waited for a new ambassador to come, seven months I guess a little over a half a year. We had all kinds of exciting events there. Mother Teresa died and the head of the U.S. delegation to pay her respect at her funeral was Hillary Clinton; I spent three days with her.

Q: How was she how did you find her?

WILLS: She's a very smart woman and a very serious person. She wasn't very warm, she and her aides, I thought, were a little too devoted to their own agendas rather than...but I mean she was there as a head of a delegation to a funeral, it wasn't like she was negotiating an agreement with the Indians.

We had all kinds of Congressional delegations. I took Richard Shelby the senator from Alabama...he wanted to go to Kashmir, he was then on the intelligence committee, so we took him up to Kashmir. It was a dicey trip with a U.S. senator in tow. Secretary Albright came out maybe four or five times while I was there as DCM and chargé so it was a deeply enriching experience as I said earlier professionally.

Q: How did you find the media?

WILLS: The media? Well when I lived in India the illiteracy rate was something like 42 percent, 42 percent that's 500 million people who can't read or write but that leaves 500 million people who can. The number of newspapers was astonishing, in all these languages. The Indian journalists were very well informed; many of them, there were so many newspapers that you had newspapers that were aligned with the 47 different political parties including the Communist. Some of them were just hacks but the free independent media were very, very good and I would say at a world standard; now things are even better. When I got to India in 1995 there was one television station, Doordarshan, the public station, now there are probably fifty television stations. There were like two radio stations in the country and no FM at all; this is thirteen years ago. Now there are hundreds and hundreds of privately owned radio stations and FM stations.

I remember very well shortly after I got there I went to see an old Brahmin leader of the Congress Party and he was giving me yet again a lecture about how we were just wiper-snappers culturally and the Indians were old and wise. He said, "We will not change quickly, Mr. Wills." Well what's happened? India has changed as dramatically as any country on the planet earth in the last thirteen years. It's gone from being unnoticed to being a major force, to say nothing of the horror of the terrorist attacks in Mumbai just last week. But I mean who had ever heard of outsourcing thirteen years ago and now India has been outsourcing capital of the world for lo these many years. It's just growing in unpredictable and astonishing ways.

Q: What was your impression of how the major media reported on the United States in relations with us?

WILLS: Mainly as I said then, not so much now, then there was still a sort of leftist slant. Whereas if you take as a base the United States as kind of a centrist country the center of political discourse in India is what we would call the left wing of the democratic party, that's the center over there. So you would be dealt with critically, suspiciously, they would need to be persuaded that you had any merit in your point of view; that's changed. Now India is moving rightward in a way and the old third world non-aligned nonsense is receding from public discourse. India is not becoming an ally of the United States but it's actually becoming a friend and that began when I was there and we take great pride in that. In 1998 we had an ambassador come out early that year, Dick Celeste, he had been governor of Ohio twice as a Democrat and he had lived in India for two or three years after he completed his Rhodes Scholarship in the UK; he came out to work as a political appointment in the embassy as an aide to the then Ambassador Chester Bowles. Then he went back to the United States and became a prominent politician himself. But he had been governor of Ohio and he was looking for other things to do and he asked Bill Clinton, his old friend, to send him to India as ambassador and Bill Clinton obliged him. He was a terrific ambassador, very, very enthusiastic, smart, very, very able man in a lot of ways. He looked at the world as a professional politician and taught me a lot. I was very glad to have had that association with him.

Anyway, he had come out I think in December of '97 and in May of '98 he was called back to Washington I think it was a chiefs of mission conference. He was there about a week and we woke up one morning and the Indians had exploded three nuclear devices. Our intelligence agencies had completely missed it and, in fact, I learned about it from a call from Washington. So that caused a tremendous amount of excitement, as I'm sure you can imagine, and we ended up imposing sanctions on our relations with the Indians, which were just beginning to improve, suddenly plummeted. A lot of tensions and they thought we were punishing them for the wrong reasons but almost immediately we began to repair the relationship and we did so well that less than two years later Bill Clinton came out on a historic and very positive eight day long visit. Can you imagine having an American president in your country for eight days? It was the most complicated logistical undertaking I'd ever been part of and I was in charge of the visit.

Q: How did it work for you?

WILLS: President Clinton was fascinated by India even then. I don't think he had ever been before as a governor of Arkansas or as a private citizen. He really wanted to come to India and he wanted to see India so we took him...that's why it was so complicated. I think we ended up going to six or seven different cities. You know what it's like when a U.S. president comes; getting him to the capital city is a huge ordeal. This guy wanted to go to several places. Thank goodness we had a large embassy and then we brought in a lot of people from around the world to help us. We probably had 600 journalists who were there for this visit. We had secret service agents probably 200 of them, FBI special agents, God it was an amazing undertaking. Every single moment of his visit had to be negotiated with the Indians; this is where they could be aggravating as hell. I'd been part of four or five presidential visits to other countries where I lived and they were always difficult but when you say to a foreign government the president is coming and here is what he would like to do, most foreign governments will say okay, they won't give you any backchat. The Indians gave us backchat about everything, every little detail, but in the end it was a spectacular success. I even took him to a tiger park down in central India called Ranthambhore and we had a motorcade of twelve vehicles. We were driving through this park and we actually saw three tigers, two adults and a baby. Of course, the international media accused me of creating a Potemkin tiger park saying I'd drugged the tigers so that they would be out there where we could see them. That was not true but I couldn't persuade them. But that was exciting and that came right at the end of my assignment. He came in March of 2000 and I left in June of 2000. So we recovered from that horrible period when we were imposing sanctions and castigating them for exploding those nuclear weapons. I haven't even talked about the numerous times we almost had war with Pakistan and the numerous times we had a hostage situation and we had an American killed in Kashmir. Everyday there was some crisis.

Q: Well how did you deal with the minor manner of Monica Lewinsky?

WILLS: You mean how did we portray that to the Indian media?

Q: That caused quite a...

WILLS: We didn't even make an attempt, that was just out there.

Q: That was just out there and just say well that...

WILLS: We knew he had a wondering eye and we were ready because India is full of everything but it's also full of beautiful women. We thought surely he would notice that and he surely did. But Monica Lewinsky, I mean what can you do about that.

Q: Yeah, well I mean was it all over the papers?

WILLS: Yeah because people liked Clinton even before he came to India, it was known that he had imposed these sanctions with regret. We were obligated under the acts of Congress regarding the nuclear proliferation to do what we did and we didn't have any choice. But Clinton had made some speeches and made it very clear that he thought India was a coming power. People like to think now, so short are our historic memories, that the rapprochement with India began with George Bush, that's complete nonsense; it began under Bill Clinton. Bush continued it and has done a lot of great things but he didn't start it, it started with Bill Clinton who for all his shortcomings was far sighted.

Q: Did you get any feel for the Indian perspective and relationship with China during this time because China was obviously an economic power who was on its way up?

WILLS: You know what was remarkable then, Stu, was they knew hardly anything about each other and had hardly any contact. You may remember, or perhaps you don't, that when the Indians exploded those nuclear bombs we asked them why, why did they do that? They said because of the threat from China, not Pakistan, which everybody thought, was really the reason. So I sent out a bunch of political officers all over the country to find out exactly what India knew about China, think tanks, universities, and the foreign ministry. We could hardly find a soul who knew anything about China. I mean in the foreign ministry there were a few people who had served there at the Indian embassy. There were a couple people who spoke Chinese because they were professors of the language at Jawaharlal Nehru University of Delhi. But what was remarkable was that these two countries that fought a war in 1962, a border war, and were the two biggest countries in Asia and the two biggest put together they make up a fourth of humanity or more than a fourth of humanity together over two billion, how many of us are there? Seven billion or something like that. So 25 percent of humanity didn't really have much to do with one another. I remember we checked and in 1997 they had had like maybe $40 million in trade, $40 million? Today the figure is $40 billion. Now they are beginning to deal with one another but in 1998 they had hardly any contact since the war in '62.

Q: How did you find American business dealing with India during this time?

WILLS: American business?

Q: Yeah.

WILLS: Well, there was a lot of excitement in the business community because the market was so huge, which had been closed to us for those many years since independence or essentially closed. We had very little U.S. investment and very little business interest until they began to open up in '91; then companies came in. India needed power so there were all kinds of power contracts that were signed. You might remember the ENRON deal. One of their first big international investments was at a power plant in Maharashtra State in western India. There were others too all over the country; power projects, GE (General Electric) came in. When I got to India in 1995 GE had I think it was under 100 employees and today I think it has 50,000. But the remarkable thing about American business activity in the five years I lived there was they all had this hope that it would work out brilliantly and the market would be a rich one; but they all suffered. The India bureaucracy, as I said, was still strong and it got in the way. All these power projects very few of them actually were ever built although agreements were signed and everything because if the Indian national level bureaucracy didn't get in the way a state level bureaucracy would. So it was really hard to do business in India. I felt a tremendous sympathy for the business executives who came out there to give it a go again because it was tough living. We had an embassy administrative section that we could rely on for services. If you were there as a business executive and had to rely on Indian power, Indian telephones, Indian this and Indian that it would drive you crazy. So it was really tough. Now again, things have improved tremendously in the last several years.

WAYNE LEININGER
Consul General
New Delhi (1996-1999)

Born in New York State, Mr. Leiniger was raised in New York and Florida. After graduating from Florida State University he joined the Foreign Service. His foreign assignments, primarily in the Consular field, include Moscow, Tel Aviv, Hong Kong and New Delhi, where he was Regional Supervisory Consul General. After attending the State Department's Senior Seminar, Mr. Leiniger had several assignments in Washington concerning Personnel Management.

Q: Right, exactly, having finished with Hong Kong.

LEININGER: I have to leave Hong Kong. I have been in Moscow already. Philippines, again, was not coming open. They weren't going to teach me Italian to go to Rome. What a terrible thing! So it was Delhi. Again, I had DCM prospects on and off through most of the assignment cycle, but Mary Ryan just kept me on the back burner. She said, "Wayne when you are ready just let me know. We will make it happen." Yes, Mary, right. Now of all places I have been I think that Delhi was simply the hardest to live, on a daily basis. Even harder than Moscow. You couldn't drink the water without boiling it and filtering it. You couldn't breathe the air. You couldn't eat the food without soaking it in Clorox water first. It was the filthiest place you have ever seen. Virulent diseases – dengue fever, tuberculosis, the plague...we had the plague!

Q: All these things you could do in Hong Kong, drink the water and eat and so forth?

LEININGER: Absolutely. Right. Even in the streets, from the vendors, not a problem.

Q: You have extensive pollution in Delhi.

LEININGER: Heavy particulates; soft coal and cow dung ash. And the weather is abominable.

Q: Meaning?

LEININGER: Meaning that four months a year was livable. Eight months a year is either hot and dry or hot and wet. Now by hot I mean like 115 degrees, 117 degrees, 120. From about halfway through March until halfway through October it is always above 90 degrees. I remember one news report on CNN covering a heat wave in the U.S., mentioning that Dallas had had seven days of over 100 degree temperatures. We all chuckled, because at that point we were well into our third month of 100 degree temperatures! The heat was unrelenting, day and night. It is hot and dry from March almost until the end of June, and then the monsoon season starts in. Now that doesn't mean it rains every day but it rains very frequently, and then is very humid. The temperature goes down from 120 all the way to 97!

Q: ...In Delhi in the summer of 1996. You were explaining that the conditions of living were very demanding. What was the nature of the consular business there?

LEININGER: Well India is one of those happening places of the third world. It is emerging from a period of relative economic stagnation. The Government was attempting to do things to make the investment climate more favorable to international businesses. Its own indigenous intellectual wealth has never been doubted. There is a very high premium placed on education. The export of Indian physicians, Indian-trained computer technology people, is famous worldwide. It is only lately, however, that conditions of doing business in India are getting to the point where they can support an internal software industry, and hardware industry, for that matter. Now, the population is just over a billion; there were 920 million when I was there. It is forecast that the population will exceed that of China by the middle of the 21st century. There are very few breakthroughs going on in terms of birth control anyplace in that country. Even if you posit it, then, that the middle class of India is only 10% of its population, or 15% of its population, you are still looking then at a middle class, visa-seeking, qualified population of 100 million to 150 million people. Nonimmigrant visa workload was growing at a rate between 25 and 40% per year when I was there, so that in the course of my three-year tour of duty, workload doubled. Completely doubled. It was already the third largest immigrant visa producer to the United States when I got there. You can't increase those numbers very much because they are largely in categories strictly limited by law, and they are right up against the ceiling. But the visa sections in India were in danger of going under.

Q: You had a supervisory role.

LEININGER: I had a supervisory, coordinating role for all the consular sections in India, including the ones in Calcutta, and Chennai, formerly Madras, and Mumbai, formerly Bombay. Mumbai is actually the largest of the consular sections in India. It had nine or ten officers as I recall. Calcutta is just a one-officer post. Chennai fell in the middle, but as time has gone on, and since it is located in the heart of India's version of Silicon Valley, it has become the focus of this booming growth in the H-1B visas, the special professional category visas issued to the highly trained computer folks who come to the U.S. And the H-1B issuance in turn drove an upsurge in the regular B-1, B-2 issuances. My Chennai colleagues did a little in house study in which they demonstrated that every time they issued an H-1B visa, it generated an additional 2.2 regular visitor visa applications. Well who were they? Well, Junior would get his H-1B and go over to the United States, having gotten out of the India Institute of Technology with a BA in computer science. He would get himself set up in a $45,000 a year job in some suburb of Palo Alto, and get himself into a little condo. Within the next year Mom and Dad would want to go over and see how Junior was doing. It was lovely. By his third year Junior would be back in India, advertising for a wife, arranged marriages still being the order of the day. Very educated and very civilized populations. There would be pages after pages of personal ads in the Times of India. "Computer professional H-1B (or green card holder, that is really to be desired) in the United States seeks homely Indian wife." "Homely" in this case does not mean Cinderella's ugly sisters. Homely means a homemaker, a stay at home person who will keep the hearth fires burning. That is a traditional family structure, still is, in many respects.

Q: So the workload is jumping.

LEININGER: Workload is going over the top.

Q: How big was the actual section in Delhi?

LEININGER: In Delhi we only had five officers and a consular assistant. The section was adjudicating, at the time I left, about 120,000 NIV's a year, and 12,000 immigrant visas.

Q: How do they do that?

LEININGER: We were damn good, he said modestly. The consular sections of India – I went out of my way to get the workload statistics of some of the other major visa factories of the world – the consular sections of India were the most efficient we had anywhere, in terms of staff hours per case. Now efficient, I don't know if that means we were perfectly correct in everything we did or not, but in terms of churning them out, we were the most efficient in the world.

Q: What kind of refusal rate would you have in a place like Delhi?

LEININGER: Well that was one of the easy parts of consular work in India: it very largely still is a country of haves and have-nots. The haves easily qualified for visas. The have-nots are the easy refusals. There is very little gray area where you have to agonize over, "is this guy barely across the line or under the line?" So, of our Punjabi agricultural workers, we'd refuse 60 percent, but of our Delhi metropolitan area business professionals, we'd issue 90 percent.

Q: You don't find a lot of Indians tending to disappear in the United States, because they go on legitimate H visas and then they are able to adjust. It is perfectly legal, rather than people getting visitors visas and disappearing.

LEININGER: Right. And as I said, the haves are really so qualified that there are legitimate channels to get here.

Q: Can you verify that the computer applicants were genuine...were you worried about fraud?

LEININGER: Addressing that was one of our signature achievements during my tour, the means by which we were able to verify some of these credentials from the software services industry. Interestingly, the impetus for getting this resolved was derived from the H-1B issuance cap, 65,000 a year. We were all facing this. We, meaning the industry, we as administrators of the program, the Indian Government, and the Indian software services industry as a whole, were facing this cap. We all had a reason to make sure that we issued those precious visas only to people who deserved them, and who in fact were going to be able to go to the United States and do the services for which they had been contracted. Intended to, and had the qualifications to, and followed through and did it. Well, as sure as God made little green apples, whenever an avenue to get into the United States opens up, there will be people who will duly manufacture credentials to get on it. So a certain percentage of these H-1B visa credentials, when I arrived, were fraudulent. And, as would be expected, those applicants never reported for duty in the United States. Well, this concerned the India software services industry as much as it concerned us. They didn't want the reputation of their computer workforce to be sullied in this way. It was they who prevailed upon Indian state university systems, the India Institutes of Technology, and the major universities with a computer science majors, to open up to us, on an online, passworded basis, access to their graduation and education records. If somebody came to us with a diploma from the Indian Institute of Technology in Chennai, we could type in the name, give our passworded access code, get to the central academic records, and verify that this diploma was genuine. They made similar arrangements with every member company in the software services industry association, with respect to job histories. We could have online access to visa applicants' job histories. We'd never find this stuff otherwise. Can you imagine the state university system of Virginia opening up its graduation records, academic records to the Indian Embassy in Washington?

Q: The advantage of being number one!

LEININGER: It just would not have happened.

Q: The people who came in for visitors visas and so forth, could you label or generally verify their documentation?

LEININGER: For most applicants we couldn't and we didn't depend on documentation. I mean, unlike Hong Kong where almost any piece of paper brought to you was reliable, in India we couldn't depend on paper. For instance, in Delhi 60% of our workload was from Punjab. They were all Sikhs, and most of them would be farmers. They'd all come in with tractor registrations, land ownership documents, proof of having sold last years crop for X amount of rupees, and so forth. We didn't care. I mean they either looked and sounded and behaved as prosperous farmers who knew what the hell they were doing, or they were obviously dirt poor, and could not possibly have afforded these parcels of land and a tractor. As a matter of fact, we very often would have seen that same tractor registration in the previous week, because there were document vendors out on the street in front of the Embassy, who sold those documents to the applicants as they lined up every morning. And they re-sold them the next day to the next batch of applicants, and the next, and the next. So documents in India didn't mean a damn thing. We did sort of gestalt types of interviews, in which everything they said on the application had to match their physical appearance, and had to match how they presented themselves orally and conducted themselves in the interview. All that had to fit in with the purpose for which they said they wanted to go to the U.S., and, in the end, it all had to fit – to make sense.

Q: So did you find then that in general practice that you didn't have much problem with visitor visa issuance?

LEININGER: There were not that many problems, aside from volume. Our refusal rate was about 32%, and as I said, they were very easy refusals.

Q: So you were able to churn out a lot of applications.

LEININGER: Not just able to, we had to. Now, there was an organized fraud ring that sort of sprung up under our noses as we watched. That had to do with P-3 visas. These were performing artists of a non-professional nature, almost always Sikh bhangra dancers. Bhangra dancing is the traditional folk dance in Punjab, sort of like square dancing in the United States, where you get together and have a hoe down. In Punjab they get together at Sikh festivals and they have bhangra dancing. People play instruments, and people dance, and people sing at these festivals. There is a large Sikh population in the United States, and for years there had been a tradition of two or three dozen groups a year going from Punjab to New York City, Chicago, certain other areas of Sikh concentrations in the United States, to perform during these holidays. Well, all of a sudden instead of issuing one or two hundred of these visas a year in groups 25 to 30, the demand, the number of petitions filed, and the number of people attempting to get the visas, shot up to 1200 to 1300 a year. In other words, a hundred a month. No way, we said. There aren't that many venues in the United States. There aren't that many groups of Sikhs in the United States to receive these people. It was clear that there were ringers being smuggled in, intermingled with the bona fide folks, many of whom had already had two or three visas previously. We did some surveys of groups of 30, and found only 12 of 30 came back. Eighteen of them were ringers. So we resorted to the traditional first line of defense: "Perform for me. Dance. Sing. Play your instruments." Of course, two thirds of them couldn't, and two thirds of them were refused, and most times that meant that the entire tour was canceled. Well, the organizers of these scams, being no dummies, shifted tactics. Instead of charging these people $3,000 for just being included in their group, they charged them $5,000. The $2,000 extra was devoted to a period of 30 days or so training, singing, dancing, or playing instruments. They were giving a package deal! The applicants learned a skill, and they got a visa to the United States! So, after awhile, everybody could in fact play and sing, at least rudimentarily. We couldn't just rule them out that way. Well the other weakness in this whole scheme is they didn't really have any venues booked in the United States. They didn't have any sources of income from impresarios, really. So we demanded, up front, that the organizers show us prepayment of hotel rooms, prepayment of auditoriums, prepayment for air fares, round trip, for everybody. And for a group of 30, who purported to stay in the United States for a period of four to six weeks to perform, this was usually up to $100,000 or more. They didn't have that money. They didn't have it. The groups themselves, the smugglers wouldn't pay the organizers the balance owed until they got to the United States. So as soon – this was about the time the movie Jerry McGuire came out – as soon as we went, "Show me the money," the demand went right away. We went right back down within a matter of three months down to our traditional levels of the numbers of petitions. But we had major feedback with the INS offices in New York and Philadelphia, especially, on how they should be screening petitions in the first place. They took our screening criteria and started to apply it to petition adjudications. So that choked things off at the source. Then along with that, we did get one lawyer in New York disbarred for her involvement in smuggling people. And there were criminal charges filed against her as well.

Q: I want to ask you this question about visas and politics. I seem to remember one story from the '70s when Jimmy Carter went to India and Brzezinski was with him. The first question the Indians brought up was about visas. Somehow I have in my mind the anecdote when President Clinton went to India for some prime minister or premier, again it was something about visas that was on the very top of the list that the Indians brought up. They wanted more?

LEININGER: The old days, right, exactly, stood on its head. In the old days it was "brain drain. You are taking away our best and our brightest." By the time the H-1B ceilings were getting bumped up against every year, the Indians had gone over the other way. They wanted to export that brainpower for the remittances it brought.

Q: They weren't complaining about the refusals. That wasn't the hassle.

LEININGER: There certainly weren't enough visas being made available. And that led of course the American computer industry lobbying very hard, and that led to the revision of the law, which, at least temporarily, raised that H-1B cap to a 100,000 and then 120,000. Now we have brought it back down to 65,000.

Q: So in other words these things do have political implications. Now do you have an opinion on this argument as to whether the American companies are using this just to get cheap workers or do they really need these people, because there was simply a deficit in the United States?

LEININGER: I think it's yes, and yes, both. They are needed, and are available. They are willing workers, and because they are entry-level employees with no previous experience, even if they are paid on a U.S. pay scale, they are paid on the bottom end of that U.S. pay scale. Whereas most of the U.S. workers who would be out there job shopping from one company to the next would have been in the business five, seven, ten years, and would expect and demand a higher wage than the entry-level employees. So I don't think the American employers are being exploitative in the sense that they are underpaying the Indian workers with respect to their overall levels of expertise and experience. They are not. They are paying them appropriately. But compared to either retraining an American worker, which is expensive, or hiring an American experienced worker at a mid-level pay scale level, they are saving money. Whether they should or should not do that, that is an argument for the economist and the politicians to watch.

Q: So was there a lot of pressure in effect from American companies to move these things along in a hurry?

LEININGER: Oh, yes. But we weren't the backlog. It was getting petitions approved through INS. I mean, it would take three to six months to get a petition approved. Once the cleared people walked into us with a notice of approval, we took an afternoon. They had their visa by that same afternoon.

Q: Did you get much pressure from the Indian government about various types of visas, especially if you turned people down. Did you find...

LEININGER: India being one of those places where networking among who you know, and who knows whom down the line, is a way of life, we often heard about it when a visa was refused to anybody of even marginal consequence. Three removes from somebody of stature, a Member of Parliament or what not, you would still get a call. But we just stuck to the mantra that, "Everyone must qualify for a visa in his or own right. We definitely appreciate your interest, but this gentleman simply did not meet the requirements."

Q: Did they go to the Embassy front office much, or the political section?

LEININGER: They usually went to the front office. They'd claim that they'd met the Ambassador or the DCM at some reception somewhere. Of course Ambassadors and DCMs being what they are would sometimes feel obliged at least to inquire of us, "What's going on with so-and-so?" But generally they were not pushy at all. Especially to Richard Celeste's credit – he was a political appointee Ambassador my last two years there; former Governor of Ohio, Director of the Peace Corps, and Democratic Party strategizer, who was involved in some of the early efforts to address the health care situation, before the Clinton effort there fell apart – he was extremely understanding of what our obligations were under the law, and how far we could go, and how far we could not go. He just took the simple position, "I'm sorry, I don't know anything about visas. You'll have to ask my Consul General." Moreover, we came up with two or three dozen instances in which Members of the Indian Parliament had sponsored personal servants to travel with them to the United States, given hand written letters. "This is my body servant, please do the needful and issue him a visa." Of course you would ask the body servant, "Well, how many bathrooms are in sahib's home?" "I don't know." "What kind of car does he have?" "I don't know." These guys would know nothing about their reputed employers. We made all those members of Parliament ineligible for visas as alien smugglers. 212-6E, permanently ineligible.

Q: So that caused a little ruckus?

LEININGER: It did early on, but it was, again, at the stage of India's coming out that they wanted to try and put on a better face to the world, trying not to appear to be a totally corrupt society. First of all we would go to the Foreign Ministry, to the Consular and to the Americas divisions. We said, "Look, your people in the Parliament are not doing your parties any credit, they are not doing the Parliament any credit, by coming forward with these palpably false statements on behalf of these unqualified visa applicants. You really better do something." So the Ministry would contact the Speaker of the Parliament, and he would send out these little blurbs. "Everybody clean up your act." So, when we eventually just cut off people, they were perfectly understanding about it. We didn't have a problem. But Celeste, was actually pleased with us, because he paid attention to these things, and he honestly felt that India had to address its corruption issue if it ever was to emerge, just like Hong Kong did twenty years before. Ashley Wills was the DCM at the time; he'd been our USIS chief when Ambassador Frank Wisner and his DCM, Matt Dailey, left. Wills and Celeste are neck and neck with Zimmerman and Hartman as the best front office tandem I ever worked for. We were inspected while they were in charge, and they got the highest rating on the OIG questionnaire that employees filled out rating the front office that the OIG team had ever seen. Human understanding, able to make decisions when necessary, moving things along under hard times. The last year there was hard for everybody, because it took place under the cloud, literally, of nuclear testing. India and Pakistan got into this whole business of who has got the biggest, and who can throw it the farthest, nuclear weapon. We had been on the verge of signing major technology change agreements with India, scientific exchanges, military contracts. All of that went straight in the toilet. So our colleagues in the Defense Attaché's Office, in the political/econ section, in the commercial sections, were all in the dumps our last year there. And the situation had fallout – to make another bad pun – into the consular section too, because the technology alert list program was being revamped. This is a special program, in which, you recall, visas used to be refused to people suspected of illegal technology transfer to the Eastern bloc. Upon the end of the Cold War, it shifted focus to those who might be misusing certain areas of knowledge gained in the United States, bringing it home to their home countries to assist in the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. Okay, so you had Indian physicists, Indian mechanical engineers, and Indian chemists, who had been for years going to the United States to attend international symposia of various kinds, who now fell under this new regime. Suspicion. And until we had cleared their names by running them personally, and the purpose of their going to the United States, past the appropriate officials in the Washington intelligence/scientific community, they couldn't go. A lot of the problem back here was there was no real system set up, at that early stage, of organized wise people who could really say, "Yes, well this has a military application, and no, that really doesn't." Some things were so theoretical that no one knew what it was all about. Where that dividing line could and should be drawn between what was permissible and what was not was still up in the air. So we would send applications back for review. We often just wouldn't get an answer until after the deadline for their attendance had passed. Now that raised hackles. Because these were respectable people. They had gotten many visas to the United States before, but we were refusing them outright in some cases, and in other cases we just couldn't get them an answer in time for them to attend these meetings and symposia. And of course that had repercussions, reverberations within the American academic community, because this whole issue of openness, academic freedom, free exchange of ideas, came into question. "We are America; we are supposed to be welcoming this kind of thing. We were not supposed to be secretive and closed..." Well, welcome to the latter part of the 20th and now the early part of the 21st century, folks. We are not going to be that open anymore. So the technology alert program goes on as we speak, even more so in the post-9/11 era, but it took awhile before people understood what the ground rules were. We had people refused to come to attend one of these scientific presentations, and then two weeks later, they would want to go and come in and apply to go to their niece's wedding. Okay, they could go for that. The refusal was not to the individual, it was to the purpose of travel. "Now how," people said, "how do you know when he went in for his niece's wedding that he didn't go and talk to some scientist?" Obviously you can't control that. But, at least, whatever major event or exchange that had been scheduled previously was by the boards by that time.

Q: Did you find Americans who would run afoul of this notoriously complex Indian bureaucracy one hears about, and find themselves in terrible complications.

LEININGER: Not so much with the regular bureaucracy. I think most Americans in that part of the world just sort of shrugged their shoulders and didn't expect anything particular of the Indian bureaucracy. If they were trying to get a driver's license or a residence permit or anything else, they knew it would take weeks. They knew they would have to pay off somebody. This horribly disturbing cable out of Bombay – it was still Bombay at the time – about three months after I arrived there that sort of set the scene for me. The reporting officer took a slice of life of middle Indian man, not middle American, middle Indian man, going about his or her daily life. In attempting to get a telephone line installed, in attempting to get electricity turned on, in attempting to get medical attention for an injured child, in attempting to get that child into school of choice, in attempting to apply for retirement benefits. At every stage of the way, Mr. Middle Indian had to pay somebody off. For every single one of those routine services. Nothing could be done without somebody expecting and taking a bribe on the side, and what's almost worse, the service-seeker expected to have to pay it. Top to bottom. India was rated in the top – or bottom, depending on how you look at these ratings on international corrupt societies – they are in the top three or bottom three every year. In is endemic. I mean it is just the way of life. Again, Americans, most Americans in India in my day were rather worldly-wise travelers; the real Amciti services problems, having to do with naïfs traveling, were back in the flower- power, hippie days, when people would go to India to seek enlightenment, and study with the Maharishi in the upper reaches of the Ganges. Those are the folks who had no clue about how to survive outside of the United States at all. And there they'd be in a place like India, where nothing is as it was. "We are not in Kansas anymore Toto!" Those folks got themselves in trouble. But most of the Americans there when I was there knew the lay of the land. There were organized tour groups, who paid attention to our tips to travelers on where to go, or where not to go. We didn't have a lot of people going around Kashmir, getting themselves taken hostage. That had taken place about six years before I got there. We still had missing people, whom we presumed to be dead bodies by that time. Once in awhile the American relatives would come over and implore the Indian and Kashmiri officials to please keep looking, but nothing ever came of it.

Q: But you didn't have, there weren't many cases of Americans who either disappeared or who got into terrible trouble.

LEININGER: Well, there were the annual numbers of mountain climbers who fell off on of the Himalayas. We just hoped against hope that they would have signed up for their medevac insurance, so that the helicopters could fly into the base of the mountain and get them out. There was usually one or two of those a year. There was one horrible, terribly sad death case I handled myself. A 22 year-old American came to India prior to his scheduled marriage to the 21 year-old daughter of an American Congressman, for a ritual spiritual cleansing. The historic Ganges is sort of like the River Jordan. If you bathe in it, your sins are forgiven, which was a lot of fun when you went white water rafting, because every time you fell off the boat you could say, "Well I can go and sin again. I am clean, I can start all over." But this kid went up into the Ganges at the wrong time of year. He went up there in late February, early March, which is the beginning of the snow-melt season. At that time of year the Ganges runs at a sort of pace as the worst of the Colorado River does. You have seen those scenes where you see nothing but whirls and whirls of muddy roiling churning water, beset with eddies and whirlpools. Well that is the way the Ganges gets at that time of year. He went down to river's edge one evening to have an evening ablution, and slipped on the rocks and got sucked under in there, and his body was never found. Never ever found. That, according to the police and the army. We had a company of Indian soldiers mustered out to do the search for us. The Defense Attaché was able to prevail upon a contact to have them do a search, but the general rule was, if somebody goes in there, you don't find them.

I was on the phone personally with the Dad on this one. He wouldn't believe his son was dead. He wanted to come and see for himself. I mean you can't argue with somebody in those circumstances. We tried explaining, "Mr. Smith, there really isn't much to see." By this time his son's body was likely to be 12, 15, 20 miles downstream. I didn't want to tell him that actually what otherwise happened was the body got lodged under some rocks on the bottom of the river, and was being eaten by catfish. But he flew over. The plane got in at 11:30 at night. We had the duty driver meet him at the airport, take him to the railway station. He took a 1:30 in the morning train to the upper reaches of the Ganges, was met there by the Indian colonel of the army in charge of the search, taken to the banks of the Ganges. He spent two minutes looking at it, said "Thank you very much, Colonel," turned on his heels, caught the train back, caught the plane back. I never even saw the man, but he had to see for himself. That is just the way folks are.

Apart from that, most Amcitra services matters were minor. We had only three to five Americans in jail at a given time, usually for dope. But three to five, that is nothing. You would expect far more. We had a couple of suicides.

Q: Was there a lot of American tourism to India?

LEININGER: Not individuals. They would come in tour groups, which is the preferred way of doing it. Each one of these groups would generally have somebody who knew the lay of the land, kept the people out of the most nefarious of the tourist traps, put them in reputable hotels, took them to reputable shops. They didn't get ripped off. You didn't want everybody running around loose, God forbid.

Q: Because?

LEININGER: Well the individuals say an 18 or 19 year old American again going back to the old days, was considered to be fair game by the various cults. "Come with me. I will take you to the best place to get you some..." and they would get mugged and rolled and all sorts of things would happen. But we didn't have very many of those.

Q: Was there any hangover from the famous Bhopal case in those days, that Union Carbide thing?

LEININGER: No. I mean the Union Carbide executives didn't dare set foot in India. There were outstanding warrants of arrest for them. There was no way any extradition could proceed. As matter of fact a concluded extradition treaty in Hong Kong was my duties that was brought up until 1997. And then they had been negotiating one in India for nine years. I finally helped get that one brought to conclusion too.

Q: So it didn't apply.

LEININGER: It didn't apply to this particular instance because of the number of years since the incident.

Q: So you did find the living there very demanding as you said because of the...

LEININGER: Just the day to day burdens. Now there were compensations. I mean you didn't have to boil your own water. You had your servants do it. You didn't have to soak your own veggies and fruits; you have your servants do it. Going to the markets and dealing with the dirt. You didn't want to see the stuff at the butchers. You didn't want to see it in the food stalls at the market. You only saw it after your servants brought it home and cleaned it up. Then, too, we had a very small commissary for American goods at the Embassy.

Driving in India, my God. I didn't get behind the wheel once in three years. I had a driver all the time. It wasn't so much they drove on the "wrong" side; we drove on the "wrong" side in Hong Kong and it was just fine. But the prevailing philosophy seemed to be that the double yellow line down the middle of the road was meant to be the place where you aimed your hood ornament. You aimed the car down the middle of the road, and leaned full-time on your horn. People passed on the left; people passed on the right; people passed in the opposite lane going the opposite direction. The numbers of head on collisions you saw every day was appalling. There was every form of transportation since the Stone Age on the road at the same time in India. From ox carts with hand-hewn wheels, to Mercedes Benzes, and everything in between, camels, elephants and horses. Bicycles, motorcycles, three-wheeled motorized cabs, everything. Diesel trucks that spewed out more pollution per minute than the entire Virginia Electric Power Company does producing electricity for the whole state of Virginia. Just breathing the air there was the equivalent of smoking a pack and a half of cigarettes a day. After every run I'd take I'd purposely hawk and spit up phlegm until it wasn't gray anymore, just to try to be sure I got all the gunk out of me...I guess that falls into the category of "too much information..."

Q: Now say something about your general impression of Indian-American relations. India was for a long time my impression a kind of a neutralist maybe leader of the third world movement and so forth. Was that changing by the time you were there, or how would you characterize it in your observations and discussions with political people?

LEININGER: Well, the Indians are pretty proud folks, custodians of 4,000 years of civilization, of which they constantly remind you. You almost want to stop them and say, "Hey, look around you. What happened? Where's that civilization?" Ashley Wills, our DCM, used to refer to Indians at some of the private CODELs and staff meetings, as "the French of South Asia." Overly, particularly proud, and self important, with no apparent justification, at least in recent times. But I had a continuing sense, and I know that Celeste did, and I think the people who have been there since have had it, that they are coming out of that. There is, in fact, an underlying shared value of democracy. I mean, it is a cliché, but it's true. The world's largest democracy in terms of population da, da, da. And we are the world's largest democracy in terms of area and da, da, da. They are really trying. But they operate under all kinds of traditionalist and hereditary and religious encumbrances that so circumscribe their ability to live in the 21st century. There are still areas of India where wives are burned on funeral pyres when the husband dies. The dowry system for buying wives in some of the backward states is just out of all control. Sectarian tensions between Hindus and Muslims are out of control in some areas, but not just between Hindus and Muslims. There are about 17 different ethnicities within India, most with their own, official language. There are certain areas in the south which are largely Christian, which are relatively enlightened in terms of women's rights, infant mortality, education of women, job opportunities for women and so forth, that almost sound like Iowa, as opposed to these other places where women are getting burned on funeral pyres.

Q: But is their attitude towards the United States, has it...

LEININGER: Well this is my point. There is no single attitude. There are many attitudes towards the United States, as many attitudes as towards what it is to be Indian. I sort of had the idea about India as I did when I was in Israel. Had it been not for the fact that it felt itself under attack and practically at war with its neighbors, it would spin apart from centrifugal force, because there are so many internal rifts in that society. The rift between the haves and have-nots is incredible. The have states are getting really tired of supporting the have-not states, the ones that are willfully backwards, the ones that are irredeemably corrupt in their government structures. The more progressive states – you can tell it by the way their politicians are declaiming themselves – were getting tired of shouldering that burden. So if peace ever comes between Pakistan and India, and Kashmir is settled, I want to sit back and watch what happens to India.

Q: That is interesting. So that's their problem. They may be doing well economically but they still have in effect you would say terrible poverty and things they are going to have to work out in a way just like the Chinese have.

LEININGER: Well Italy was not really a country until 1900 or so. So many internal principalities and so on, but at least they spoke the same language.

Q: Well, yes, we can come back to that another time.

LEININGER: Yes, but India isn't even in that mode.

Q: So you did three years there. Anything else you want to hit from your time in particular?

LEININGER: Oh, yes. One thing that we tried to do in India is take to heart this whole gospel of what used to be called "best practices," as preached by CA. As a matter of fact one of the things that CA PDAS Donna Hamilton, before I went, said to me, was, "Look, you have got to do something to try and modernize consular operations out there in preparation for what appears to be this huge surge in workload." Well, of course, by the time I got there, it was already up to our necks and rising. We did get, while I was there, four more American positions, and about 14 more FSN positions, countrywide. But workload doubled. So how did we cope? Well, we started finally to introduce things like drop boxes for the previously-visaed people. They never had drop boxes in India before. Like a travel agent's referral system for previously-traveled people, who otherwise could have personal appearance waived, with the standards in effect of the day. We looked into offsite information services, to a local company, but we were hampered by the fact that India does not have a nationwide 800 number or a 900 number telephone system in place. You couldn't just call up toll free, or even charge a fee to the calling party, yet. It was coming. They kept telling us it was coming, so we started negotiations. First it was going to happen in Bombay. We looked into offsite fee collections, but our financial management officer could not dream of having any U.S. money pass through the Indian banking system if he could possibly help it. He would die first. Yet the banks he would trust, the few branches of international multinational banks, Barclay's Bank and so on, were established only in so few cities in India it would almost be impossible to do offsite fee collection. So that one was dropped for awhile. But we started all those movements in all those directions, and we did in effect streamline a lot of the processing of our operations, so we did survive without any need to move into new buildings. Now, with cutbacks in the waiver of personal appearance program we have seen since 9/11, coupled with the imposition of the fingerprint requirement, I understand they are having to do something in the waiting sections both in Mumbai and Delhi, because there is just no more room for human bodies.

Q: They don't want people dropping visas off any more without some kind of personal appearance I think. We have to talk about that separately. So after three years there, you are thinking about time in class and wanted to come back to the United States...

LEININGER: For my remaining two years, and I knew there wasn't going to be any Assistant Secretary position fall out of the sky. What had happened in the meantime while I was overseas on the HR front was interesting. It started while I was arriving in Hong Kong...

Q: HR being...

LEININGER: Well now it is called Human Resources. The Bureau of Personnel renamed itself Human Resources. It reorganized itself. The Office of Career Development and Assignments, you might recall, was vastly downsized. They combined the functions of career development officer and assignment officer. Now, when this proposal was broached, it was about '93 or '94. My first year in Hong Kong. I went on record in sending cables both to AFSA saying, "fight this," and to management saying, "it is stupid to do this. I know it might seem inefficient, but it isn't." I was arguing that not only is there an inherent conflict of interest for someone acting both as assignment officer and CDO, but there aren't enough hours in the day to do it all, if you do it right.

Q: I thought those were full time jobs when I was in.

LEININGER: They were completely full time jobs. People used to come in on weekends to catch up.

Q: I did that often, yes.

LEININGER: Yes. You had to keep everything current. All the modernization and computer applications they installed did nothing to speed things up, just as on the consular front. It didn't speed anything up; it might have made record keeping after the fact easier, but it didn't make anything any quicker. To do both of these jobs properly, people would have had to have the wisdom of Solomon, and the strength of Hercules, and be purer than Caesar's wife. They would have had to resist bureau blandishments, on the one hand and clients' blandishments on the other. I just couldn't see how that was going to work out. So after about three or four years of fooling around with that, they declared it a failure – surprise, surprise.

Q: They had put the positions together, right?

LEININGER: Together.

Q: With the hope of eliminating some positions, downsizing...

LEININGER: Right. They tried to make it work, but its failure was obvious in the complaints from both employees, who weren't getting any response from people who were supposedly to act as their career development officers, and from bureaus, who weren't even having e-mails or phone messages returned from assignment officers about getting people on agenda and getting assignments done. It was just an impossible task. So HR management spun around on their heels, eventually, and decided, just about the time now I am leaving India, that they were going to go back to the old way of doing things – re-establish an assignments division, and re-establish a counseling division. I became the candidate to be the head of the mid-level counseling and assignments division, which. I would, in effect be the CDO to the CDOs who would be in charge of counseling political, economic, administrative, consular, information management officers, office managers, and security people; everybody, all specialists and generalists at the mid-levels. I had 21 CDOs working for me. I would be working for, irony of ironies, Vincent Battle, who had been my deputy back in the old CDA/CON 10 years prior. He was to be the new director of CDA.

Q: So instead of the old system where you had a career advisor in your office but in effect they all reported to the director in essence. They put a level. So you went in below the director, but above all the CDOs.

LEININGER: There was a similar division chief at senior level and another division chief at entry level. Mid-level was the largest division, since most FS employees are in those grades.

Q: Ok, I got you.

LEININGER: And we also had a CDO who was in charge of care and feeding of Civil Service employees who were with us on excursion tours. We had 120 doing that at that time. No kidding. The whole downturn in junior officer intake during the lean years of the nineties left us at the end of the decade with a huge mid-level staffing gap. We just didn't have enough people to fill our existing positions. This is why CA had to push the consular associates program, and get family members commissioned to do adjudication of visas and passports. It was why we were taking on excursion tours from specialists, and why we were taking on excursion tours from Civil Service personnel. So we had 120 Civil Service people in the field, in the middle of tours of duty. Every year we assigned an additional 35 to 45. Now, these were jobs that had been left over, still vacant, as the end of the assignment cycle approached. We wouldn't start doing those assignments until February, so usually they were the hardest jobs in the worst places that we have. And they weren't just consular positions. They were in every area, political, office management jobs, economic reporting. We would hold annual Civil Service recruitment drives each year in the Department, and the central system worked out special re-employment rights agreements, to be sure these folks would have jobs waiting for them when they returned from their overseas tours.

Q: We are still talking with Wayne Leininger. We are going to fill in a couple of things here that we skipped over. One of them is something that Wayne wants to bring up about his time in New Delhi, so go ahead.

LEININGER: I just wanted to mention in passing the way we reacted, and the way many of the other immigrant visa issuing posts around the world reacted, to the imposition of a new, legally binding affidavit of support requirement for immigrants who were sponsored by relatives in the United States. Now to put it in perspective, for years and years, family members who sponsor other family members for immigration to the United States have always been required in some way, shape, or form or another, to put up evidence that the alien to whom we are going to be giving this visa will not become a public charge. They have an old affidavit of support, called the I-134, which the courts sort of looked at and chuckled a little bit and said, "Yes, that is a nice expression of intent, but it is by no means a basis for confiscating someone's assets or attaching their salaries or anything else." Well in 1996, Congress stiffened the requirement.

They were clamping down, as you might recall, on the entitlement of immigrants, especially illegal immigrants, to any kind of social welfare benefits. Along these lines, they said anybody who is going to legally come to this country and is going to be sponsored by a relative, is going to have that relative held legally responsible for this person not becoming a public charge a) until that alien accumulates 40 quarters of social security work; b) until that alien becomes a citizen him or herself; c) until that alien dies, or d) until the sponsor dies. At least the sponsor's obligation did not go down to the next generation! To that end, anyway, the Department of State, and the then-INS, got together and they drew up about an eight page document called, an I-864. It is – the way they did it, and it passed all the lawyers tests – sufficient basis to take somebody to court if their sponsored immigrant ends up on public assistance. Sponsors had that to show income and/or assets in the United States sufficient to support the incoming applicant and his entire family, and their own family, at a level of 125% of the poverty level in the area in which they are living. Now for our purposes, "the area in which they are living," means just one of three. There is Hawaii, Alaska, and the continental United States. Now you know and I know that the cost of living in New York City is a hell of a lot more than in Omaha, but nevertheless, we have one standard for the whole of the continental United States.

This all sounds wonderful when you are sitting back in Washington drawing up these rules, and we say people are going to meet these tests, or they are not going to get their visas. This is the way we are going to stop people from ever going on public assistance, and if they go on public assistance, we are going to get the money back out of the individuals who sponsored them in the first place dammit! Yes! Well, in practice, there were several problems in administration that cropped up within the first two weeks of implementation. First of all, the I-864 it is the most complicated government document I have ever seen. It beats the hell out of any IRS form I have ever encountered. I have had immigration lawyers, whose business it was to handle these things, curl up in despair, not being able to make heads or tails out of that form or its instructions. Now, those are the professionals, the lawyers. Can you imagine some person who is not literate in any known language, having to send this to a relative in the United States saying, "Please to fill this out for me." Hello! The form has to have copies of the sponsor's income tax returns for the previous three years. It has got to be notarized. It has got to be signed in about three different places. If you have got a spouse's income that has got to be included, the spouse has to fill out a portion. If your combined income is still insufficient and you have another joint sponsor, there is another form added to it. Long story short, when this thing was actually put into play in 1997, the refusal rate of first time applicants coming in and presenting it to us at the time of their interview for the supposed issuance of their visa, the refusal rates around the world were between 75% and 85%. People just couldn't get it right. It wasn't usually that the income levels necessarily were lacking. In some cases they were, which was a valid grounds for refusal under the public charge provisions of the law. But, mostly, they simply hadn't dotted the i's and crossed the t's appropriately. They didn't have the number of copies, didn't have it notarized, didn't have the number of signatures, didn't have, didn't have. So there we were in India and other colleagues were in the Philippines, and the Dominican Republic, and in Haiti, trying to explain to these poor semi-educated people what it was wrong with this most complicated form the U.S. government has ever issued.

Temporary Duty, Nuclear Disarmament Conference
New Delhi (1999)

Ms Cole was born and raised in Brooklyn, New York and was educated at Hartwick College, the University of Hawaii and Virginia Polytechnic Institute. After working in New York City several years, she joined the United States Information Agency in 1980. During her career, Ms. Cole served in Dacca, Caracas, Katmandu, Calcutta, and in Islamabad, where she was District Public Affairs Officer. In Washington, she served in the East bureau of USIA and was a Congressional Fellow on Capitol Hill. Ms Cole was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2004.

COLE: Calcutta opened up and it had always been my dream to go to Calcutta.

Q: Why was that?

COLE: When I had served in my first post in Dacca, Calcutta had been this promise land where you could go and buy food, go to the movies, and walk on the street and it was just wonderful. Also, I had studied Bengali and I had liked it very much; it was a language of my heart, and the idea of going back to where it was spoken was just enormously attractive to me.

Q: So you went to Calcutta from when to when?

COLE: From '96 to '99.

Q: What was Calcutta like when you got there in 1996?

COLE: It was a city that had greatly improved since I had seen it in the early 1980s. The supply of electricity was much, much better. The telephones worked a whole lot better. It seemed to me that almost everything had improved. I think it reflected the fact that India was emerging from the Fourth World into the Third and their economy was growing, the country was becoming more confident and competent.

Q: You know, when I hear people talk about Calcutta I always think about the beggars in the street. How was that?

COLE: Not bad. I mean, even in 1981 the popular image of beggars in the streets was not quite accurate. At the birth of Bangladesh in '71 enormous numbers of refugees, thousands, maybe millions had come across the border to Calcutta. These were Hindus who had been driven out by the Pakistani army and were afraid to go back. They were refugees in dire need who overwhelmed the infrastructure in Calcutta, then essentially a 19th century city. It had Dickensonian industries and being there was like being in the middle of a novel by Dickens in many respects. But by the time I got back a lot of those refugees had been absorbed into the fabric of Calcutta.

Q: What was your job?

COLE: I was what we used to call the branch public affairs officer. But our PAOs in New Delhi were more or less freeing us from the constraints of working through the center. So we were able to negotiate our own programs, do our own reporting and be the PAO for a district that included all of Eastern India, millions and millions of people.

Q: Who was the PAO in New Delhi?

COLE: Well, first it was Ashley Wills and then he moved on to be DCM and eventually became our ambassador in Sri Lanka. And then it was Frank Ward, who had been his deputy and then moved up.

Q: Who was the consul general in Calcutta?

COLE: At that time we didn't as of yet report to the consul general. When I arrived it was Bob Boggs. He went on to become, I think, political counselor in Delhi and then DCM in Kathmandu. After him it was Cheryl Simm who is still in the midst of her career.

Q: What were your objectives there?

COLE: A long-term objective for USIA and public diplomacy today, is to make the world safe for capitalism, particularly American capitalism. We did an enormous amount of economic programming attempting to explain, particularly to the Marxist-oriented Bengalis, what capitalism was, what a joint venture was, why it wasn't a big scary thing to have American or foreign partners in a joint venture. For a lot of the other people living in Eastern India you didn't have to do this because they themselves were entrepreneurial. But the Bengalis dominate politically and intellectually so you have to talk with them.

Q: Who were the entrepreneurial-minded people?

COLE: A lot of people who at partition were driven out of Pakistan into Calcutta. There were a lot of Sindhis, Hindus from the Sind in what is today Pakistan who fled for their lives. They tended to be small and medium range traders. Then of course there were the Marwaris; these are people from Rajasthan who back in the British period immigrated into Calcutta and established themselves as the great trading class or clan and they are traders by caste, traders by inclination, by training. Some extremely respected and some extremely disliked.

Q: How did you work with these various groups? Did you find opportunities in the university? Was Marxism influential there?

COLE: I loved working with the university. One of the things that I had learned in Venezuela is that the young always want to exercise their prerogative to make their parents crazy. And if you want to drive your dear old Marxist Leninist professor father bananas, what do you become? A Reaganite economist. So it was wonderful fun to go out and talk directly to students. You'd ask them, why should you have second class things? Why should your only choice for a car be one that was based on a 1940s British model? Because that's what the masters in Delhi have decided should be manufactured. And why should they improve it when there's no competition? And I asked, why are your mothers, continuing to wash stuff by hand when you could have a clothes washer and make it really hygienic. And this appealed to people.

We were also very lucky in that a Bengali intellectual, long settled in the West, named Amartya Sen who won the Nobel Prize. And a lot of his work was in social capital.

Q: This was the Nobel Prize for economics?

COLE: For economics, yes. Like most good Bengali boys, he came back every winter to see his parents. They lived in Santiniketan, the community established by Rabindranath Tagore, right in the bosom of Bengali culture. And he was a great proponent of the argument that while the state should be interested in generating the infrastructure of economic success, it shouldn't be busy managing the economy.

Q: How did USIS translate this into action?

COLE: We took policy and turned it into programs or actions to explain it and to change people's behavior. One of the things I remember doing was sponsoring an address by Amartya Sen, and then having it transcribed and printed up in the magazine that was published in New Delhi and circulated to some of our contacts. We also staged conferences where we would bring in a variety of experts both from India and from the United States to talk about joint partnerships, what they were, how they worked, the intellectual framework for capitalism. We had professors come through and they sat with the academics at the university and talked about the issues related to being entrepreneurial.

Q: Well, I would think that you would have run into strong opposition from the entrenched faculty of the universities.

COLE: That was not necessarily the case. Bengalis all have ironclad beautiful manners; they're a real credit to their families. And they are interested in ideas, truly, deeply, profoundly, bred in the bone; they want to know. Moreover, even ideologues, could look around and see that things were changing, that it was no longer the Congress Party in Delhi giving out licenses to their pets to manufacture whatever product they wanted; it was changing. Their view had been that whatever Bengalis think today the rest of India thinks tomorrow. But they found it was the opposite, and they were interested in catching up intellectually, no matter what they had thought or felt, they wanted to address the issues.

Q: By the time you'd reached there had India made adjustments? Gotten away from protectionism and the idea that everything had to be done by the Indians themselves?

COLE: What they called Nehruvian socialism very much reflected Gandhi's principles, and was very much a post-colonial fixation. But, I got to India 50 years after that and members of the generation coming up just weren't interested, they didn't have to fight that battle anymore.

Q: But had the political powers in New Delhi changed the rules?

COLE: Yes, they had. Back when I was serving in Nepal they had had a terrible gold crisis and they had had to change the rules right then and there. And slowly but surely they were opening up. The symbolic way of talking about this is Coca-Cola. At one point Coca-Cola was well-established in India. It's a ready market when you think about people buying affordable luxuries like a cold Coke. But then they were kicked out because they refused to give the government of India their formula; at least that was the ostensible reason. When I was in Calcutta they were back in and it was very nice to be able to cite the example because everyone said, our local Colas are going to be run off the market. But that didn't happen. Coca-Cola was smart and they bought up some of these and kept on producing them. So the camel's nose was under the tent and the Indian economy was beginning to open up.

Q: Could you use American entrepreneurs, the Coca-Cola executives and others, as part of your program?

COLE: Yes. There were some people introducing a good American mattress, making it someplace down in the south of India and I got one of their executives to come on down and talk about how if you get an American company in your neighborhood, it will make a contribution to the local dancing school and the music academy and hire people. But there wasn't much of that. American businesspeople are interested in business, not in going about giving talks. So occasionally we could get somebody, but it wasn't so easy.

Q: How about the Department of Commerce? Were they a partner of yours or not?

COLE: We had a little Department of Commerce office run by FSNs in Calcutta and that was about it. But we did work closely with them and we did consult back and forth with them and they would often send people to us. The Department of Commerce's business is to sell U.S. products; it's not to help host country nationals market their products in the U.S. So whenever somebody wandered into their little library and said, I make industrial gloves and I want to know how I can find a distributor in the U.S., they would say, go to USIS, see Ms. Cole. And we'd get on the Internet and find a distributor in the U.S. for industrial gloves. This distributor mainly didn't sell them in the U.S. but to other countries where they were a very viable product.

Q: You mentioned the Internet. Had the Internet become a real tool by the time you arrived there or while you were there?

COLE: Yes, there were some wonderful entrepreneurial people in Calcutta working on the Internet, including one Bengali. We had access in our library and it was one of the reasons why we got large contributions from Indian firms doing business in Calcutta. They found our access to the Internet and our researchers useful. They also liked to present themselves as patrons of culture, and we put up plaques behind the library check-out desk with the names of these great business firms on them. The fact that they made significant donations helped us save the library when others were being closed.

Q: With Bengalis taking their culture very seriously, were you able to provide them with examples of American culture?

COLE: This was the last gasp of cultural programs for a long, long time. We had pretty much stopped doing them. The last big exhibit we had was of the works of an African America artist, Lawrence Jacob. The West Bengal government's minister of culture came, the first time he had ever been in a USIS or U.S. government facility. He happened to take an interest in African American art and he had an uncle who had been a translated Langston Hughes. Our most successful program was Ambassador Wisner's idea to bring the Paul Taylor Dance Company to India during the celebration of its 50th anniversary. He raised almost all the money from, or had us raise almost all the money, from private sector U.S. companies. Since there weren't any in Calcutta, I raised our share from Indian companies.

Q: Did you find Indians had much rapport with African Americans?

COLE: Yes, there was a great deal of romanticization of the African American experience. We sent a lot of Fulbright students to Howard University to study African American literature and we did this in Bangladesh also. But, one of my deputies, Terry White, had pointed out that this interest was declining among the younger generation. They were less interested in the literature of victimization and struggle and they wanted something different. So we started to work with Asian American literature.

One of the most interesting cultural events I did there was a seminar on American literature and we also did a WorldNet conversation about African American literature. And as I said, my district, in addition to heavily Bengali also included Bihar, Orissa and what was called the Seven Sisters of the Northeast, which were largely tribal areas. We had somebody talking about, Toni Morrison and Maya Angelou and all my good Hindu participants were shocked at the fact that women were having babies without having fathers. But this lovely tribal woman with a Fulbright PhD got up and said, that exactly describes how my tribe works. And there was this stunned silence. She was standing there, very pretty in her little sari, explaining her tribe's matriarchal, matrilineal institutions. It was great.

Our other important policy emphasis was on disarmament issues. This, of course, was the period of Indian nuclear testing. The Bengalis had always been pacifists and were always against any country being nuclear including us and themselves. So there were a lot of demonstrations against Indian policy. I was always writing cables and calling up New Delhi and saying, you have to include a little paragraph pointing out that not all Indians were out in the streets clapping their hands and celebrating the nuclear program. That in Bengal there was a huge demonstration against the nuclear policy. At one point I was invited to speak at a conference and the person on the other side was a retired Indian brigadier general and I thought, what can I say? So I said, I can't discuss strategic issues the way my friend the general can and I'm also constrained by the fact that, as a foreign diplomat, I can't be critical of Indian policy; that's not my business, that's your business. But I can tell you about growing up under the shadow of the mushroom-shaped cloud. In New York City in the 1950s, we had dog tags with our blood types on them and at school we had take cover drills, where you would get under your desk or we'd go down to the basement and stand with our hands on the wall. And, of course, we were smart children; we knew that if somebody dropped an atomic bomb on us it would generate a gigantic tsunami that would totally cover Brooklyn. Later on we had speakers come to our student assembly to explain that we didn't have to be afraid, that we had Minuteman rockets that would shoot these evil things down because it was felt that our fears were causing us great psychological damage. And so everyone was really quite taken by this tale. And I said, now that India is nuclear, my question to you is, are you having your children take cover drills? Do your children know their blood types? And then I went into some statistics provided by an academic, Steven Cohen who had done research on this, to point out that if there is a nuclear exchange it will probably be in the north of India where the bases are. And everyone went, whew. That would mean total nuclear contamination of the Punjab. Where would the food come from? Millions and millions of people, many of them very sick with radiation poisoning, will flood into the city. Where are your hospitals where people are trained to treat radiation poisoning? This was treated by the press as a very effective counter to the brigadier's presentation, and indeed provided talking points that activists used against this policy.

Q: You mentioned the decline of cultural diplomacy. When did this start happening, why, and what were the effects?

COLE: The principal proponent of the decline was Jesse Helms during the Clinton administration. The main factors were economic. Our budgets were being cut and cut and cultural programs are very expensive. There was also the argument, I think a legitimate one, that in many countries as in Europe and Japan, cultural activities were adequately available on a commercial basis. However, in large parts of the world this was not the case. So we had to become very entrepreneurial spending our own money to hire artists. We discovered there was a whole culture of elite and upper middle class children studying piano in Calcutta. In the tribal areas also were a lot of children in missionary supported schools who were studying piano. So, if we could get a good pianist who was also a good teacher we could do master classes in some remarkable places and talk to people, some of whom were very hard for us to reach otherwise, about something they cared about, which was their children's education. And it was great at opening doors and keeping channels of communication open.

Q: Did you find that the growing spread of international television, CNN but other programs, make things easier or harder for you all?

COLE: There was less of that penetration in Calcutta in my day. There were lots and lots of little TV stations that serviced neighborhoods or districts. We were working with them and you could really make friends forever if you did such things as inviting them to come in with their cameras for a press conference with the ambassador. Ambassador Celeste was great at this and had the politician's genius for remembering people's names. So you could get the U.S. ambassador on a channel that reached a couple of million people who would turn it on because they were flattered by the attention. So, in that respect the spread of TV was good for us.

Q: Did you feel there was particular tough competition from outside? I mean, it always used to be the Soviets but that was way passed by this point.

COLE: Most of the western powers who had had a diplomatic presence in Calcutta had withdrawn. So we were left with the British Council, the Alliance Française, a small Italian presence, and the Goethe Institute, which was very impressive. The Japanese and the Thais had only a diplomatic presence there. We were more inclined to work with these folks than against them. The Russians still had a large presence there and had apartments in their compound they rented to Indians. We had quite a nice relationship with them and we tried to complement one another in our activities.

Q: How was the Monica Lewinsky scandal received there?

COLE: Indians know very well that their political leaders have their scandals too but it would be unthinkable to dredge those up or dwell on them; it would simply be bad manners. They were both amused and horrified by the fact that we were giving all this attention to this relatively trifling affair. And mainly I was lucky. It was unlike my case in Venezuela where, you know, we had to deal with the fact that the president of the republic had a mistress. I was kind of protected in this but I can remember any number of private conversations in gatherings with Indian women, and they'd want to know what exactly had Clinton done? I found ways to tip toe around this and I remember saying, most of you went to convent schools and were educated by nuns. Weren't you required to read the bible? And they said, oh yes. And I said, well, you know, our president says that it wasn't sex; think about the bible; it was an abomination, not sex. That indeed was our president's defense.

Q: Well, to my mind, you know, I mean, this whole thing, the way I was brought up sex meant one thing. It was heavy petting or- didn't have the abomination but I could have very easily sworn I didn't have sex. It was a very peculiar time in American politics. It was blown way out of proportion.

COLE: Well, so I had to learn to tip toe, as I say, around this. And the ladies, often at the end of the gathering, somebody would suddenly say, an abomination. I know what he did. I said yes, and some of it involved a cigar. And they'd say, "Wait until I tell my husband." Later on at the club I would run into their suited, booted, and felt-hatted, very correct husbands and they'd look at me and chuckle and say, yes, my wife has explained it all to me.

Then India Today, I believe it was, came out with a very frank article which explained exactly what it is that these two people had been doing and that was helpful. And if men ever asked me about it I said, oh, have your wife ask me. I'm just too embarrassed to talk to you about it.

Q: You've talked mostly about Calcutta and the Bengalis, were you able to do much in the tribal areas?

COLE: I managed to get to two tribal areas, Nagaland and Assam, both in northeastern India which, next to Kashmir is the bloodiest place in India. Many of the people there were in unadministered territories in the British era and felt they should not have been incorporated into independent India in 1947. The Nagas particularly with their warrior history had gone into immediate rebellion. However, when I was in Calcutta, a truce was in effect. So I became the first USIS officer since 1968 to go to Nagaland to do programs although my predecessor had visited there with a group of British veterans of the Imphal campaign and our Consul General had gone in under army escort – not exactly the most appropriate way to visit the university.

Getting into Nagaland required my FSN to get permission from the state capital. We also had to negotiate with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to get the stamped permission which we had to show at innumerable military road blocks. In the five days we were permitted to stay, I was able to visit the university (which we had not known existed) and revive some much earlier USIS contacts that had been long forgotten.

In Assam, the fighting was not against the Indian government but against the state government or tribe against tribe. Because of the violence we had stopped programming there in 1980. But I was able to get the cooperation of the local tea planters and we were able to put on our first cultural program in many years. It included a cowboy singer who was a great hit.

Q: Well then, in '99, what did you do?

COLE: I had been assigned to go to Islamabad, Pakistan, as the Cultural Affairs Officer. I had already had all my farewell parties in Calcutta. My apartment was scheduled for major renovation. They were redoing each apartment as it emptied out because it had sort of 1950s, '60s wiring and we all knew very well the walls were going to start to smoke from the stuff we were plugging in. I also had one entire wall in my bedroom that was weeping. I was ready to move to Islamabad with my mother, who had Alzheimers, and my cat. The packers had arrived.

And low and behold the Clinton administration lobbed a bunch of Tomahawk missiles at Osama Bin Laden's camp in Afghanistan. Our embassy in Pakistan was drawn down; and the rest of us were frozen in place. After about two months I ended up in New Delhi for another three months where I worked on nuclear disarmament issues. We put on a big conference between New Delhi and Islamabad.

Eventually they started letting people back into Islamabad and permission came for me to go. We couldn't bring our families with us and I said, no, I can't go, my mother has Alzheimer's, what am I going to do with her? They also started cutting CAO positions. Fortunately, the PAO did protect that position and I was able to go to Pakistan.

Q: Well, one last thing on this sort of Calcutta-New Delhi thing. I noticed you kind of rolled your eyes at one point about Ambassador Wisner. Why?

COLE: When he came down to Calcutta he was wonderful. He was like a highly charged naked wire. He had wonderful energy, wonderful creativity. I was very glad that I was somewhat removed from daily contact with him because I think he would have burned. He was a real professional; he had a million ideas. One of these was a big conference in Calcutta on developing the economy in the eastern side of the subcontinent. It was attended by representatives from industry, from Bangladesh, eastern India, Nepal, as well as by U.S. speakers. This was his idea. He's a real extrovert and he was great fun. He was wonderful with the press and he loved a press feeding frenzy. And my FSN press chief was great at setting these up. So as he was walking out of Ryder's Building, the state capital where he'd been meeting with the top politicians in West Bengal we would get all the press snapping photos and standing on desks and screaming and carrying on and he just thought that was enormously amusing.

ALICE A. DRESS
Economic Counselor
New Delhi (1997-2000)

An Economic and Financial specialist, Ms. Dress was born in Indiana and educated at a number of colleges and universities, including George Washington, Tufts and Boston Universities. Initially working with the Department of the Treasury in Washington, DC and in Rome Italy as Treasury attaché, Ms. Dress joined the State Department Foreign Service in 1985, and served, primarily as Economic Counselor, in Kinshasa, Zaire, Dakar, Senegal, New Delhi, India and Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. At the State Department in Washington, DC she held senior positions in the European and African Bureaus. Ms. Dress was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2009.

Q: How was the state of relations between the United States and India at the time?

DRESS: Under Prime Minister Indira Gandhi and during the Cold War, bilateral relations with India were very bad, very strained. Prime Minister Gandhi was also a leading force in the non-aligned movement and India opposed us in the UN system. The Indians were much closer to the Soviets than to the United States. The Indian economy was an autarky and stagnated under Gandhi socialism and from being deliberately cut off from relations with the global economy. In 1991 then Finance Minister Manmohan Singh pushed through financial liberalization measures. So by the time I got there the economy had started to open. It was a very long, fitful process of opening up to foreign investment, reducing restrictions on imports and privatizing vast unproductive government-owned enterprises. U.S. policy aimed at encouraging the liberalization and the privatization and making sure that American business had access to the Indian market.

Q: India had such a huge civil service of people who basically, my impression is they sat at a desk with a mound of papers in front of them and did very little except not approve...

DRESS: Not approve things. In the embassy, we all had horror stories about how difficult it was to deal with the Indian babu or bureaucrat. It was difficult to get in to see government officials and painfully difficult to get them to do anything helpful. I was always awestruck when I walked into an official's office and saw the enormous piles of files on every surface.

Q: They were literally 18 inches high.

DRESS: When you raised an issue with an Indian official, he invariably wanted to "consult the file." That was always said in a portentous manner. A minion would bring in an enormous file, visual proof that the bureaucracy moved glacially, that issues were not resolved but just accreted paper. It wasn't just mythology about how the babus ran the country, it was the truth.

My three years in New Delhi were very active, very challenging. Dick Celeste, a Clinton political appointee, was the ambassador. When he was governor of Illinois, he visited India a number of times on trade missions, so he knew people and had a strong interest in the country. He was very energetic and a surprisingly good manager. I've been lucky that the political ambassadors I have worked for, apart from Governor Volpe in Rome, have all been competent, knowledgeable and energetic.

Ambassador Celeste believed in teamwork and team building. One of the first things he did when he arrived at post was to assemble the country team at his residence to draft a mission statement. (The country team by the way is composed of heads of sections and agencies who regularly attend the ambassador's staff meetings.) Until he introduced the concept to us, I didn't even know what a mission statement was. He had it printed up and laminated and we carried it around in our wallets. I bet if I looked carefully enough at home now I would find a copy. He also took the country team out of town for mission performance planning exercises each year. As a team, we would define what U.S. interests were in India and how we planned to achieve them during the coming year.

He made a campaign-like promise that he would visit every state in India during his ambassadorship. Once a politician, always a politician, I suppose. He fulfilled that pledge even though the Indian government restricted travel to some of the states in the northeast because of the separatist terrorist activity. I was fortunate enough to accompany him on his visit to Meghalaya, Assam, Manipur and Nagaland in the northeast. That is a region distinct from the rest of India, ethnically, religiously and linguistically. They are closer in all respects to South East Asia than to South Asia and the predominant religion is Christian. It was in Nagaland the British stopped the Japanese advance into India in 1944. Another distinction for Nagaland was its Presbyterian terrorist groups.

Ambassador Celeste was especially interested in improving bilateral scientific cooperation with India. I negotiated, under his direction, a cooperative agreement with the Indians to set up a bilateral science council to promote cooperation, an agreement Secretary of State Madeleine Albright signed during President Clinton's visit in 2000.

Q: On the scientific side one is always impressed you go to any of our schools or universities that particularly deal in scientific things and the Indian names are always at the top of the list. Obviously they're a people who really have a propensity towards science but was this being translated in India at the time?

DRESS: The government had an active space program, the Indian Space Research Organization (ISRO). I visited the ISRO headquarters in Bangalore and saw some of the communications satellites they were working on. Bangalore was also the center of the information technology boom created by Indian IT entrepreneurs. Indian companies did a lot of back office business for American companies -- processing insurance claims and manning call centers. India has excellent technical schools and turns out a lot of engineers and computer specialists, all of whom speak English. That makes India an attractive place for U.S. firms to invest and do business.

Q: Had the Indians worked out their problems with the bureaucracy and attitude in dealing with this?

DRESS: No. Actually, the private sector was growing in spite of the dead hand of bureaucracy, which is a legacy of the British Raj and dates back to colonial times.

Q: Of course too in a country the size of India and all the bureaucracy represents a tremendous number of jobs and the more you dig in and make it...

DRESS: In spite of the 1991 reforms, the government continued to be a drag on the economy. For example, the quotas or preferences extended to the disadvantaged groups - the scheduled tribes and scheduled classes -- for government jobs and university admission have a perverse brain-drain effect. A lot of middle class kids can't get into Indian universities so they study overseas and stay overseas to work.

Q: Sort of looking down the pike did you see India as becoming a major scientific and production power?

DRESS: In 1997 it was clear that India was an emerging technological powerhouse, which was why Ambassador Celeste was so keen to get that cooperative science agreement in place. There was no looking into the future about that; the future had arrived.

Q: What about the agreement what did this mean? What were we after then?

DRESS: It was a bilateral framework agreement to facilitate scientific exchange and cooperation and studies.

Returning to the Indian economy, one of the major problems on the macroeconomic front was that India was liberalizing too slowly. The annual rate of population increase outpaced the annual increase in GDP and there was no improvement in per capita income. India had a large and growing middle class that made it a very attractive market for U.S. business but India also had 300 million desperately poor people. Economists calculated that GDP growth needed to exceed 6% per year for people's daily lives to improve and for more of the poor to climb into the middle class. Another important economic factor was the monsoon rains. A good monsoon meant good economic growth. It wasn't until almost ten years after I left that India was able to achieve a growth rate in excess of population growth. For the last couple years they've gotten up to nine percent, which is impressive, given that there are still significant barriers to trade and investment. Unfortunately, now the monsoon rains are less favorable and reforms are stalled. Thirty years ago the world feared that India couldn't feed itself. With the 1960s green revolution and years of good monsoon rains famine is not a concern.

Q: Were you as economic counselor sort of monitoring what was going on in China and comparing and contrasting China with India because they seem to be the two stars?

DRESS: The Indians were preoccupied with China from a security standpoint, having engaged in armed skirmishes with the Chinese over the years. From an economic standpoint they felt that they were always unfairly compared to the China. Potential American investors would say to them, "Well the Chinese are doing this and that and the Chinese economy is growing at a fantastic rate. Here you are a democracy and it's much harder to do business in India and you are growing much more slowly." The Indians were aware that they were competing with China. This was underscored when the Indian population hit the one billion mark, catching up with China.

The biggest political event during my three years in India was their nuclear test in 1998.

Q: Were we prepared for this?

DRESS: As far as I know, we were caught by surprise. After the test, the Indians told us that they had given us a head up and pointed to language in a speech by the prime minister. But frankly, only with hindsight could we have interpreted the remarks as advance notice that they planned to test a nuclear device.

Q: How did you find did the various major political parties, there is the Congress Party and then there is the...

DRESS: When I arrived in India, the BJP, a Hindu nationalist party, was in power. It was a BJP-led government that conducted the 1998 nuclear test.

Q: Did you find that the BJP and the Congress Party were both as interested in particularly economic relations with the United States or was the BJP, for example, more nationalistic?

DRESS: The BJP was definitely more nationalistic and many of the BJP ministers that we called on were polite but distant. Just a minor example of the BJP's anti-Western, anti-American attitude -- one of the BJP ministers refused to allow Coca Cola to be served in his ministry. But then again the Congress Party under Indira Gandhi hadn't been all that friendly to the United States either so I'm not sure there was that much to choose from between the two parties in that regard.

Embassy New Delhi was huge with many USG agencies represented, even the Library of Congress. The defense attaché did not have an easy job because the Indians were reluctant to engage in military-to-military relations. We didn't have an APO (military post office) because the Indian government wouldn't allow it and we had to rely on the much slower diplomatic pouch for our mail. The Indian government also required their officials to report contacts with American official. We were still viewed with distrust, an attitude carried over from the Cold War days.

Q: I would think that dealing with the Indians and the little I've had to do with it, not much, but I would think to do this on a daily basis would be just plain exhausting or was it so challenging that it was fun?

DRESS: The work was challenging, but I enjoyed it. Living in India was a colorful adventure, but sometimes overwhelming. The sheer press of humanity was wearing. New Delhi wasn't as densely populated as Mumbai (Bombay) or Kolkata (Calcutta) but it was still wall-to-wall people.

Q: Did you find yourself in a role of American businesses who were established having their phone centers and all that coming to you continually trying to work out tangles and problems or not?

DRESS: Most of the big U.S. companies operating in India were sophisticated enough and well connected enough that they didn't need our help, but they would stop in and chat with the ambassador or DCM to get the our take on the political situation. India had an energy shortage; it lacked sufficient power production capacity. In 1993 Enron, the Houston-based energy company, signed a multimillion-dollar contract to build a power plant in the state of Maharashtra. At that time, Enron was very big, very powerful and - -

Q: Cutting edge.

DRESS: Yes, cutting edge. They may have been the "smartest guys in the room," but they ran into trouble with their Dabhol power project in India. The local power board decided the power the plant produced cost too much. In 1996 a newly elected Indian government decided the whole project was too expensive and stopped payments to Enron. High-level Enron officials visited India frequently trying to get their money; they came to the embassy to ask for the ambassador's help with the central government.

Q: One is dealing with these really big economic developments in India but did you find yourself every once in a while being able to go out into the countryside and get a real dose of reality of...

DRESS: Well, there was an awful lot of "reality," of the real India to be seen in New Delhi every day. The drive to and from work was always colorful thanks to smoke-spewing three wheelers, beggars on every corner, cows in the median strips, and the occasional horse from a wedding procession or elephant walking down the street. And a trip to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was not without it's excitement because of the monkeys that invaded the offices and hallways. Of course given the size of India and its regional differences, it was necessary to travel outside of the capital. I visited the U.S. consulates in Mumbai, Calcutta (renamed Kolkata) and Chennai. I also took business trips to Bangalore in Karnataka, Hyderabad in Andhra Pradesh and Jaipur in Rajasthan. As a tourist my first trip was to Agra in Uttar Pradesh to see the Taj Mahal. That was an eye opener. The poverty and squalor of Agra contrasted with the serene beauty of Mumtaz Mahal's marble tomb. With other members of the embassy community, I visited the Ranthambore National Park in Rajasthan to see tigers. The Indian conservationists were pessimistic about the survival of the Indian tiger due to poaching and human encroachment on tiger habitat. Tigers are incredibly beautiful and majestic. Their loss would be tragic. I had the great pleasure of touring the state of Gujarat around Ahmedabad and the Gulf of Kutch to view Indian textile handicrafts -- batiks, wood block prints, silk saris, and embroidery-embellished hand-loomed cottons. All beautiful, artistic work. Oh and let's not forget the Pushkar camel fair in Rajasthan.

In contrast to the African posts I served at, India was very important to U.S. interests. The size of the embassy and the number of high-level visits we hosted were proof of that. Just to name a few VIP visitors during the 1997-2000 whose visits the economic section helped support - Department of Energy Secretary Bill Richardson, Treasury Secretary Larry Summers, Congressman Dick Gephardt and delegation, Senator John Kerry, Enron VP Rebecca Mark, GE CEO Jack Welch, and Citibank President Sandy Weill.

I was fortunate to work with wonderful folks in the combined economic and science operation - Necia Quast, Mary Townsend, Brian Aggeler, Aruna Amirthanayagam, Tanya Bodde and Marti Doggett.

In March 2000, President Clinton came for a state visit. As anyone who has worked on a presidential visit knows it was a huge production. All of the personnel at embassy and three consulates were involved in the visit.

Q: How did it go?

DRESS: It went well. There were the usual stresses and strains and toes stepped on, embassy people being driven insane by the presidential support staff. The President had a good visit and all the events went off as planned, so it was successful.

Q: When you left there how did you feel about India?

DRESS: After living and working there for three years, I came to appreciate how talented and hard working the Indian people are and what an incredible variety of cultures, religions and art India has. And the shopping was outstanding.

Q: Well then where did you go? You left there when?

DRESS: I left New Delhi in the summer of 2000 for Saudi Arabia. You know the advice that you get from day one when you join the Foreign Service -- don't bid on a job unless you are willing to take it?

G. EUGENE MARTIN
Deputy Chief of Mission
Beijing, China (1999-2000)

A Specialist in Chinese Affairs and a speaker of Chinese, Mr. Martin spent the major part of his career dealing with matters relating to China, both in Washington and abroad. His overseas assignments included Hong Kong, Taipei, Huangzhou (formerly Canton), Beijing, Manila and Rangoon. His Washington assignments also concerned China and the Far East. Mr. Martin was born in Indiana of Missionary parents and was raised in the US. and India. He is a graduate of Kalamazoo College and Syracuse University.

Q: While you were there, did India come up? It's going to surpass China in population soon, and it's had a completely different experience. With all its problems, it is a democracy, and things are moving there. Was China looking over its shoulder at India?

MARTIN: I think the Chinese are paying more attention to India now. They've always had their alliance relationship with Pakistan because Pakistan was the only one that supported China's policies around the world. They saw India as a potential and a growing rival, both in geopolitical terms as well as a potential threat to their control over Tibet and the Himalayan regions. They also see democratic India as an alternative model for the third world, which China always sees itself as. They keep saying that they don't want to be a leader of the third world. They're just one of the gang. But they do see their system and their ways of doing things as an example for other underdeveloped countries. And China's successful economic development is quite a selling point.

Q: India's restrictive trade practices, which are finally being removed, are in a way has almost an advantage over the Chinese, because they have many aspects of the Western world.

MARTIN: Right. They have an underlying foundation of the British common law system, which the British left them. They have more of a rule of law than China has. But I think the countries are very different in many ways. The chaotic nature of Indian politics and society makes Chinese blanch. And Indians looking at China see it potentially as a hostile power. In reality, if you look at geopolitical relationships, the Himalayans are a wonderful barrier! Not much gets through there! There are a few passes, but it's not a broad boulevard in which you're going to send lots of goods, people, or troops back and forth. There are certain areas in which they rub up against each other, and there's friction, but it's not the north German plain.

The WTO angle is interesting. India, of course, was quite concerned about China joining WTO, mainly from a competitive point of view. The end of textile quotas in 2005 made other textile producers, Pakistan, Bangladesh, India, concerned that there's going to be a great sucking sound as China took all the textile markets around the world by being the low cost producer. While it has not reached that extent, China and India are essentially economic competitors.

DEAN RUST
Director, Nuclear Proliferation Bureau
Washington, DC (1999-2005)

Mr. Rust was born and raised in Ohio, and was educated at Bowling Green University and Ohio State University. In 1970 he joined the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency in Washington, D.C. and worked with that Agency until his retirement in 2005. An expert in nuclear and conventional disarmament issues, Mr. Rust was a major participant in the US government's international treaty negotiations during five Presidential Administrations.

Q: Anything else before we move to Bush II?

RUST: Yes, checking my notes I almost forgot to mention the May 1998 nuclear tests by India and Pakistan because that was a huge event in the second Clinton term. I still remember being called by a friend, "Did you hear that Delhi has announced that they conducted a nuclear test this morning?" I didn't believe it at first. But in retrospect, we should not have been that surprised. A hard line nationalist political party took over the Indian government in 1997.....

Q: Hindu Nationalists they were called.

RUST: Yes, the BJP. They kept talking about the importance of India becoming a major player on the international scene. Clearly, they decided that one way to do that was to conduct a series of nuclear tests and become a declared nuclear weapons state. So for the next two years, 75% of my work was focused on trying to deal with this. One person dealt with the political aspects of the issue, and I dealt with the nuts and bolts of the sanctions that U.S. law mandated in the aftermath of such nuclear tests. Remember that in 1996, a comprehensive test ban treaty had been signed, so these Indian and Pakistani tests were a severe blow to that treaty, to nonproliferation in general, and of course to the prospects of stability in South Asia not to mention increasing the risk of regional nuclear war. Of course, the Indians used the "threat" from China as the primary reason for going nuclear, but most analysts with ample knowledge of India realized this was all about prestige -- getting a seat at the table with the big boys.

ACDA was constantly pushing State to take a more condemnatory stand against these tests and to set a precedent that would help to discourage others from following suit. Strobe Talbot was the lead man for Madeleine Albright, and our senior people were meeting with Strobe about twice a week. The State regional officials were always trying to minimize the sanctions. And of course the Commerce Department didn't want this event to have a substantial impact on U.S.-Indian trade. They argued: "Yes, we would have preferred they not acquire nuclear weapons, but both countries are friends. The horse is out of the barn; they're not going back. So what good is it to impose comprehensive sanctions, particularly since we will just lose trade opportunities to other countries." So it was a constant fight, particularly with Commerce and inside the State Department. After the dust settled, we got very strong support globally for political condemnation of these tests. The P-5 Foreign Ministers met in Geneva in June 1998 to issue a strongly worded statement; the UN Security Council passed a unanimous resolution of condemnation and that established benchmarks for India and Pakistan to remedy the serious damage done to international security by these tests. And the EU, Japan and Australia also adopted a wide range of political and economic sanctions; and the support of these countries also led to a delay and/or denial of non-humanitarian loans to India and Pakistan from international financial institutions.

Even the president was pretty strong there for awhile because he said, "India has done the wrong thing. They are on the wrong side of history." I remember that quote very well. The U.S. and Russia were substantially reducing their nuclear weapons in the aftermath of the Cold War, and yet the Indians moved to become a nuclear weapons state. Of course the Pakistanis, despite considerable international pressure, followed a few weeks later.

This solid wall of disapproval and punitive actions did not last very long, unfortunately. The Clinton Administration itself had already begun, before May 1998, an effort to overcome the decades long estrangement in our bilateral relations with India. And after six months or so the furor over the tests died down, and there was considerable pressure from the Congressional Indian caucus, State regional officials, and South Asian NGO's to relax the sanctions. Some of this occurred before Clinton left office, but they all disappeared after 9-11-2001 for obvious reasons.

RUST: One other thing -- sorry for belaboring this period of time, but in 2000 there was another NPT review conference, and I was at the right hand of the senior Ambassador in charge of U.S. preparations. It was an enormously satisfying diplomatic experience for me; he told me later that he relied very heavily on my advice. I did a lot of drafting. I did a lot of negotiating with other governments at my level at the review conference. Much to the surprise of pundits and diplomats from many NPT parties, the conference arrived at a substantive consensus outcome. .

Q: What were we trying to come out with?

RUST: Well, as I mentioned earlier, the NPT had been indefinitely extended in '95. And many non-nuclear NPT parties felt that with this decision out of the way, it would be more difficult to obtain progress on nuclear disarmament. Unfortunately, events between 1995 and 2000 tended to reinforce that perception. While the comprehensive test ban had been signed in 1996, the U.S. Senate had disapproved ratification in the fall of 1999 and the U.S.-Russian START process had atrophied during Clinton's presidency. This created an unfavorable political climate going into the 2000 review conference, not to mention the Indian and Pakistani nuclear tests of 1998 and continued concerns over compliance with the NPT by North Korea, Iran and Iraq. So by the opening of the 2000 conference, there was a lot of public speculation about whether NPT parties could rally behind the Treaty, or whether it was on the verge of collapsing. I should note that these conferences are held every five years and are viewed as a way to "take the temperature" of the Treaty. Do the parties spend all their time in pointed or even bitter public recrimination, or are they willing to sit down in private to search for compromise formulations that both review the operation of the Treaty as well chart the way forward? We actually did the latter. We despaired in advance about the prospects for consensus among the 150+ parties that attend such conferences, and would have been happy with an outcome where the U.S. was seen as a constructive actor and where no nations threatened to leave the Treaty. In five previous review conferences, consensus had been achieved only twice on a comprehensive substantive final document.

It came down to some high level Washington decisions, and Arab states placed a great deal of pressure on Iraq to accept an outcome that singled out their continued defiance of Security Council resolutions dealing with WMD. The Conference did not adjourn until after an all-night session that went until 5:00 AM, and then reconvened to seal the compromise at 11:00 AM. We were able to achieve it contrary to everybody's expectations. So that was a pretty high point in my career. Everybody came out of the 2000 conference feeling pretty good about the treaty. Nobody was about to run away from it. Nobody was thinking we had achieved Nirvana but they were encouraged. We accomplished this because the Clinton Administration's arms control and nonproliferation policies were more favorable toward treaties in general, and thus it was willing to show flexibility to gain an outcome that strengthened the NPT. Yes, the CTBT had been voted down by the Republican Senate, but the Democratic administration had not wavered in its support of the treaty. So that was an immensely satisfying experience. We spent four weeks in New York at that conference. They were all 20 hour days. I was at the computer drafting constantly. So that ended the Clinton years on a very up note for me. Even though ACDA had gone away, one of my best friends was ambassador at large in charge of the delegation . he and I worked out a lot of stuff together.

Q: Who was that?

RUST: His name is Norman Wulf. He was a career civil servant, who retired in 2002. He is a lawyer, worked law of sea issues in the early 80s and then started working nuclear non proliferation. A retired navy officer, he knows international legal stuff. Very astute multilateralist. Knows when to take a hard line, when to show flexibility. Knows where our red lines are. It is possible to achieve outcomes that are positive for your country's interest. But you also have to know when to say no. He was personable. He listened to people. He showed respect for their opinions. All that contributed to a positive outcome.

Q. OK, so now we go on to 2001.

RUST: We all knew based on some of the speeches that candidate George W. Bush made during the campaign, that things were going to change. He had come out against ratification of the comprehensive test ban treaty. And he thought that negotiating agreements with Russia to limit nuclear forces was a waste of time, which meant that the strategic nuclear negotiating process dating from 1968 was gone. Bush thought that we should just set our nuclear force levels wherever it made sense; why bother with a treaty? It took too long to negotiate one in any event, and besides we needed the flexibility to build back up if necessary. And of course, he was a strong supporter of missile defenses and it was clear the ABM Treaty could be history as well. Of course, none of this necessarily directly impacts nuclear nonproliferation. Nothing he said led any of us to believe that he would forsake the NPT or the IAEA or any other of the traditional multilateral nonproliferation tools. Yet, his position on strategic nuclear issues tracked with prominent neo-conservative thinking in the Republican party and so we braced ourselves for topsy turvy policy changes that would probably down grade multilateral approaches, even in nonproliferation. John Bolton was confirmed as the Under Secretary of State in charge of arms control and nonproliferation, and soon he had a team of Assistant Secretaries to carry out his preferences.

The first couple years things went along without much change in my area of the world, i.e. NPT and IAEA. U/S Bolton focused his early energies on the Biological Weapons Convention, North Korea, Iraq and making sure the U.S. reversed position on the International Criminal Courts. There was an interagency nonproliferation policy review, but little changed for my office initially as the President reaffirmed the importance of the NPT and IAEA, and the need to strengthen their activities. The new Administration placed a much stronger emphasis on the need for compliance and enforcement of the nonproliferation obligations under the NPT and IAEA, but that didn't create much difficulty for my office as we were more than ready to develop and implement stronger steps in these areas. So we set in motion some policies that were aimed at strengthening those aspects of our policy.

My other focus was on preparations for the 2005 NPT Review Conference, which began in 2002.

I also got involved in Nuclear Weapon Free Zone Treaty issues both in Southeast Asia and Central Asia. The Southeast Asia Treaty had opened for signature in 1995, and the Central Asian treaty was still in draft in 2001. Most of this diplomacy was simply managing the status quo, as the Administration was not prepared to become actively engaged unless and until it had conducted a policy review in this area.

By way of background, I mentioned NWFZ in one of the earlier interviews. I can't remember what I said before, but these are regional treaties that ban the acquisition of nuclear weapons by regional states and prohibit the deployment of nuclear weapons in territories in the region by any state. Each of these treaties has at least one protocol for the nuclear weapon states. The Southeast Asian nations had messed up the protocol they had drafted. None of the nuclear weapons states supported it initially. So consultations had begun around '97-'98, twice a year up until about the year 2001 on ways to try to resolve these differences. The Southeast Asian states insisted that their undertakings in the treaty extended out into the South China sea 200 miles rather than the standard 12 mile territorial limit. Whenever a security treaty is concluded, in which states claim authority for security issues out to 200 miles, it is not going to go anywhere with a major naval power. They are just not going to recognize sovereign security claims out that far. So we, along with the UK, France, Russia and China, had been busy during the latter part of the Clinton Administration figuring out a way to find compromise approaches that would deal with this. There was very little activity on this Treaty between 2001-2005. The pace is set by the regional states, and ASEAN clearly had other priorities. The Central Asian states, however, were being pushed strongly by the UN, a sponsor of the negotiations, to conclude a NWFZ treaty. We coordinated with the other nuclear weapon states on these negotiations, although the Central Asian states pretty much ignored what we, the UK and France had to say. It appeared to us that those who still retained security ties to Russia were slanting the Treaty in a fashion that favored Moscow. To make a long story short, the final text was not acceptable to the U.S., UK and France - we urged it be changed before it was opened for signature. They took another look at it, and that's where I left it when I retired. The last overseas mission I undertook was a P-5 meeting in Geneva to discuss our respective positions on the draft Treaty. Since I left, the Treaty has been signed with the same objectionable language. Personally, I don't see how the U.S. could support the Treaty and sign the Protocol as it now stands.

Q: Well how did you find working with the new people. I mean some of them like Bolton had been around for a long time. But with others, I mean did they come in looking upon you as being a bunch of wild eyed liberals or were they willing to draw on your knowledge and experience to learn the job? How did you find these people?

RUST: Bolton claimed to have an open mind, initially, but I think he quickly discovered the advice he would get from career people was simply not compatible with his "take no prisoners" approach. I swear that the notion of "compromise" is simply not in the man's vocabulary; or if he does concede something to the views of another country, it's only at the 11th hour and probably because someone at a higher political level told him to do so. His philosophy seemed to be that you don't deal with bad actors; you can't trust them, so even if you're trying to devise multilateral approaches to deal with these bad actors, it's the U.S. way or the highway. With Bolton, our approach was to draw a line in the sand and if compromise could not be reached on our side of the line, then the U.S. would opt out. We sat on the sidelines from 2003-05 in regard to Iran, because Bolton could not stomach the approach the EU was taking with Iran. It's almost a given that Bolton took this approach with the blessing of the Vice President's office. And of course, the ultimate solution to John Bolton in some cases is probably regime change. Well, it's a little off the charts from my experience to have regime change as a policy option when it comes to nonproliferation. My approach is that if it's a bad regime, you use nonproliferation tools to contain any WMD threat as much as possible, hoping ultimately for a combination of sticks and carrots that will change the regime's policies. Maybe that won't happen until there are dramatic political changes, including possibly a regime change, but until then there needs to be consistent international pressure on the state not to acquire nuclear weapons. And the U.S. must play a leadership role in that effort.

Sure Bolton used some career staff; aspects of the Administration's policy were consonant with past approaches and in those circumstances he drew on government experts. But, even then, there was no room for thinking that went beyond the strict policy guidelines prescribed by Bolton. John was pretty much a one man policy apparatus. He surrounded himself with loyal political aides, who would follow his instructions to the letter. There was no room for questioning; if you asked a staffer "why" Under Secretary Bolton wanted to take a particular approach, you seldom got an answer. It didn't matter; all you needed to know was that My Bolton wanted it this way. I doubt if any important policy of any kind John ever pushed was vetted with anybody but himself, and maybe the Vice President's Office and DOD and probably Bob Joseph at the NSC. He knew this business very well from his previous work at IO and from work outside the government during the Clinton years. He was an extraordinarily bright guy in international law. I mean he knew this stuff. He also picked people that he felt he could trust as assistant secretaries in the non proliferation, arms control, and verification bureaus. Although, he made a mistake in the non proliferation bureau when he brought in a career foreign service officer, who had once worked for Bolton in IO during Bush I, but who over the past decade had developed into a senior officer who could not be bullied.

Q: Who was that?

RUST: John Wolf. During the Clinton years Wolf had become an ambassador to Malaysia and taken on other senior positions. By 2002, he was in his early 50s I think, had been in the foreign service for 25 years; and couldn't be pushed around or be told how to think. Certainly, Wolf was loyal to the Administration, to Secretary of State Powell, and followed John Bolton's wishes much of the time. It didn't take long, however, for John Wolf to get crossways with Bolton. If Wolf disagreed, he said so. Well, you don't do that very many times to John Bolton before you get into his "dog house" big time. I wasn't privy to their relationship, but it was my impression that Wolf occasionally had different ideas about how best to pursue our nonproliferation diplomacy whether in regard to Iran, North Korea, NPT, or IAEA.

So to return briefly to your question about whether the career staff could work the new people; certainly, in the case of John Wolf, the answer is yes. He was pragmatic and trusted career staff to pursue approaches consistent with the President's policies. Wolf chose a highly respected career civil servant as his PDAS, and a former Dick Lugar staffer as the political DAS. It was a pretty collegial place; tense and frantic, but the career staff felt they were being utilized. Wolf left in July 2004, after many serious run-ins with Bolton, and the PDAS led the bureau for 10 months. A new political leader for NP was never confirmed, as by early 2005 the reorganization issue began to surface with Bolton making clear that he wanted to merge NP with the Arms Control Bureau. And the AC Assistant Secretary, loyal to Bolton to a fault, was actually placed in charged of NP in the final months before its merger with AC.

Q: Well it's not unusual to go through a period of posturing before you settle down to get something done.

RUST: Well no, Bolton wasn't posturing. My impression was that Bolton wanted the outcome to be "tough" according to his criteria; and if he can't get that kind of outcome, then it's not worth doing. Solidarity among countries on a weak solution is worse than nothing at all, according to this type of thinking. He isn't alone in his frustration with the slow pace of the international community in responding to dire proliferation threats. It was clear from the git-go in 2003 that Iran had violated the NPT and that the Security Council should take up the case. But it took many years of further IAEA investigation and of continuing Iran's non-cooperation before the IAEA Board referred the matter to the Security Council. Unfortunately, that's the way the system works. But John Bolton has no patience with institutions that can't respond to what he views as such obvious dangers.

Q: This is tape four, side one with Dean Rust.

RUST: Of course, it was largely the Russians and the Chinese who were reluctant to push the Iran and North Korean cases at a faster pace, particularly an approach that included sanctions. The UK and France were also not happy with the Russians and the Chinese, but in the last analysis they felt it was better to keep the P-5 together than to try to force an outcome that would require the Chinese and the Russians either to vote against or veto a resolution. It is true that the longer the IAEA worked in Iran, the more we all knew about what had really gone on there. But the delays have still not solved the problem and meanwhile Iran is several years farther along with its enrichment program. Multilateral institutions may be the only effective peaceful way to deal with these issues, but if they don't become more responsive to proliferation the U.S. and others will take steps on their own.

The irony of the current situation is that Bolton's 2005-06 tenure at the UN involved U.S. acceptance of nonproliferation outcomes that we would never have gone along with while Bolton was Under Secretary of State. He and his allies in the Vice President's office, OSD and NSC would have seen to that. That group of folks is now dispersed and Rice is pretty much able to call the tune. She takes a tough line, but she is putting P-5 solidarity ahead of substance. I remember reading recently, upon Bolton's resignation from the UN job, quoting anonymous sources in the French and British government that whenever they ran into a problem with Bolton in New York, they would just go over his head. They would contact Rice or Nick Burns, who were willing to sit down and work something out." Bolton was just never that way.

My principal difficulty with Bolton in my last two years came in connection with preparations for the 2005 NPT Review Conference. This process, which has occurred every five years since 1970, has little direct impact on operational issues, but it does define the general political setting in which NPT implementation takes place. In 2005, debate ranged from the key questions of Iran and DPRK violations, IAEA safeguards, nuclear export controls, to the pace of nuclear disarmament by existing nuclear weapon states including the U.S. Given the NAM preoccupation with nuclear disarmament, these NPT fora generally include a lot of U.S. bashing and pressure for getting rid of our nuclear weapons. Israel also comes in for more than its share of criticism from Muslim states. Bolton loathes this type of fora and debate. He has little patience for those who are more concerned about U.S. nukes than about Iran's violations. The result is he doesn't really care what happens; he is not prepared to support an activist U.S. approach designed to forge common ground. He just wants to get out of the NPT review process with our skin, and hopefully without much blame for any negative outcome, which unfortunately was virtually preordained in 2005.

He is disdainful of any real diplomacy re the NPT review conference because he knows the U.S. will be asked to "pay a price" if the U.S. is to obtain consensus support for U.S. policies, for example, in regard to NPT violations by Iran and DPRK. He felt the Clinton Adm. paid too high a price in 2000 for the consensus outcome that was achieved. And so his approach is to essentially dismiss the concerns of states that talk about what they perceive as the failure of the United States and Russia and others to reduce nuclear forces. He clearly resents the efforts of some states to use the NPT to imply some constraints on U.S. freedom of action with regard to its nuclear forces. But, on the other hand, Bolton did want the U.S. out there with a concerted campaign on issues of importance to us, e.g. Iranian violations. Of course, that's fine; but when you fail to address the concerns of others you don't get much receptivity to your own priorities. The main point as I perceived is that Bolton et. al see no value in trying to do smart diplomacy, i.e. find ways to listen and take even symbolic steps on nuclear disarmament issues with the view that treating others' concerns with respect will gain you a more sympathetic ear for U.S. policies toward Iranian violations.

This is counterintuitive diplomacy from my traditional perspective. All my efforts in regard to 2005 to pursue smart diplomacy, as I called it earlier, were met with a blank stare. When this situation was combined with deep distrust by Bolton of the NP bureau and of my office, the working situation for about 18 months was barely tolerable. Bolton loaded up the U.S. preparatory process with his own bureaucratic allies with instructions to keep a close watch over NP. They made our life a living hell.

Q: When did you retire?

RUST: September 30, 2005.

ALBERT A. THIBAUT, JR.
Deputy Chief of Mission
New Delhi (2000-2003)

Albert A. Thibault, Jr. was born in Massachusetts on August 5, 1941. He received his BA from the University of Windsor in Canada in 1962, his MA from the University of Toronto in 1963, and another MA from the University of Pennsylvania in 1964. He entered the Foreign Service in 1969. His career has included positions in Guinea, Sri Lanka, Pakistan, India, Nepal, and Saudi Arabia.

THIBAUT: I left in July, 2000.

Q: And what happened?

THIBAUT: Well, after a short leave I proceeded directly to New Delhi, India as DCM there as well. I had been DCM in Riyadh. I mentioned that my tour had just been extended to a third year as DCM, for a total of six. I had to seek special approval of a sixth year in country, because of the Department's policy of a maximum of five years. That had come through and then was in place and I was to spend that additional year and in fact I was told informally then that I'd probably become chief of mission in a neighboring Gulf country. I talked with the Department on that. Then when the assignment of the person who was to go as DCM to Delhi fell through, a complicated process, my name popped up because I had earlier bid on the job, a year or two before and of course I had extensive experience in the region. The ambassador there, Governor

Dick Celeste, was keen to have someone who was knowledgeable about the country and had previous management experience. So he was keen to have me. Ambassador Fowler in Delhi knew how much an assignment to India meant to me. So the Department in Washington and others made it happen. I had said I was prepared to go but I've made a commitment to spend an additional year in Riyadh. If this is what the Department wants me to do, I will do it but I will not lobby to do it, to go there, because it did place the bureau, the NEA bureau, in a difficult position in May and June to find a DCM for Riyadh, which is an important post. I said, "If you want to make it happen, fine but I will not become actively engaged. I'm quite happy to remain where I am."

But in fact I did go to Delhi. I was there for three years. The first year as DCM for Ambassador Dick Celeste and then the last two years for Ambassador Bob Blackwill, so for a total of three years.

Q: Well, you got there in 2000. How would you describe the state of relations between India and the United States?

THIBAUT: Well, they were on an upturn and Ambassador Celeste deserves a great deal of credit for this because as recently as 1998 the Indians had exploded a nuclear device which caught the U.S. government with its proverbial pants down. The intelligence community was completely buffaloeed by this development. They had not expected it. The Indians had played the positioning of our satellites that observed their test site and did a lot of preparation at night. In other words, operated in a way that concealed those preparations from our surveillance. I say this is nothing classified. This is well known. So it came as a great shock and of course was seen by the administration, the Clinton Administration, as a real slap in the face, particularly as they thought they had been assured by the new government led by Prime Minister Vajpayee that the government of India had no intention of exploding a device but yet it happened. So this was in 1998. Within two years President Clinton had made a state visit to India, a five day state visit, which was extremely successful. And a presidential visit, especially to a developing country, does not happen often or overnight.

As I said, the credit for the visit and for really doggedly influencing attitudes both in Delhi and in Washington, goes to Ambassador Celeste, who's a remarkable man, a three time governor of Ohio and former director of the Peace Corps. After college, he had spent three years as special assistant to Ambassador Chester Bowles, who's one of the icons of the U.S.-Indian historical relationship, in the late Sixties. He developed a love of India which has lasted to this day. I might note, just to round out his biographical picture, that he's presently the president of Colorado College in Colorado Springs. He obviously worked hard to persuade the Administration, or maybe he didn't work so hard, I don't know, to be appointed as ambassador to India but he was a wonderful choice, a man who has a great sense of policy and is an enormously likeable, outgoing person, a great manager for the embassy and an Ambassador who made it his mission to overcome the tremendous trough in the bilateral relationship. As I say, it was capped by a presidential visit, which occurred in March and I arrived in August.

So relations were on an upswing and as a result of that visit there was, of course, follow-up action and I was caught in that immediately because, within a day of my arrival in August, the ambassador went on leave and so I was caught up in preparations for the prime minister's visit to Washington, which occurred in the fall of 2000. We had a number of senior level visitors, coming and going in both directions, an enormous amount of preparation that the U.S. government, including the mission in India, was engaged in. So it was a good thing that I had some familiarity and awareness of India and had a background in it because it would have been much more difficult. So I got off on a very active and positive note and the prime minister's visit went extremely well. Very important to this process was the continuity that developed.

I say this because while we in New Delhi were in the throes of getting ready for the PM's visit and basking in the after-effects of the Clinton visit, at home we were in the final throes of the presidential campaign and of course President Bush was elected to his first term in the fall of 2000 and took office in January of 2001. The statements that candidate Bush had made on foreign policy, for the first time ever in a presidential campaign, included very positive references to India. Historically, most presidential candidates had simply ignored India or would make a passing mention of it with a number of other countries but in several statements Governor Bush particularly emphasized the commitment he was making and the importance he would place on building a new relationship with India. This caught a lot of people's attention in India and, as I say, it was very unusual. It meant that there was confidence as we proceeded with the transition into the first few months of the administration that the relationship would continue on a high note and that is, in fact, exactly what happened.

The credit for this, once again, comes down to personalities as much of the reason for this very positive approach by the new administration belonged to my second ambassador in Delhi, who was Ambassador Bob Blackwill. He had been a foreign policy advisor to Governor Bush as a candidate and would come down from Harvard, where he was a professor at the Kennedy School, to spend several days a week with Governor Bush traveling around the country. He drafted several of Bush's campaign speeches on foreign affairs or had an important hand in them and persuaded him that the time was ripe to make India a centerpiece of his approach to foreign policy. And, after the election, he was nominated to be ambassador to India. As I say, it made for very smooth continuity of policy and immediate engagement on the part of Indians, a predisposition on their part, the Vajpayee government, to further develop the good relationship with the United States. In other words, they worked hard to avoid poking their finger in our eye and to consider seriously new policy initiatives from the Bush Administration. And that is what happened.

Ambassador Celeste remained in Delhi through April of 2001 and I was chargé thereafter for several months 'til Ambassador Blackwill was confirmed and able to come out to New Delhi. But in that period of time, the administration, and again we're talking about the pre-9/11 period, May 2001, the administration unveiled new ideas about missile defense to which the Indians were among the very few countries to respond positively. This came as a great surprise to Washington, a very pleasant surprise for an important country like India to make positive statements like this at a time when there was so much criticism at home and abroad, especially from a country whose stereotype was that it would distance itself consciously from the U.S. While awaiting confirmation, the ambassador-designate, Bob Blackwill, spoke about the desire of the administration for a "transformation" of the bilateral relationship. This became a phrase, a mantra, that was his hallmark for the entire period during which I worked with him and in which he was ambassador. So it was a good experience to have that policy continuity.

Q: When was the last time you had been in India, now?

THIBAULT: I had been, I had left India in 1983. I passed through several times when in Nepal but had not spent any period of time.

Q: Did you sense, was there a new generation of Indian bureaucrats or maybe Indian thinking in universities? Was this really a new India in thought or THIBAULT: It was a new India and I was astounded. It had been 17 years since I'd been there. Recall that I first went to India in 1968, so I've had 30 years of exposure to the country. It was an astounding, unbelievably different country. New Delhi alone, as a city, was far more vibrant and prosperous and interesting than I had recalled it. Attitudes, as you rightly suggest, were the key change. Attitude towards the U.S., I won't say Americans because Americans never had any problem in interacting with Indians, but with the U.S. as a sort of a concept. It was like night and day. You recall that when I was there in the early Eighties, our political counselor designate was blackballed by the Indian government because of the communist influence. The fall of the Soviet Union, the disappearance of the communist media which they were subsidizing were two factors. Much more important was the turnaround in their economy when they abandoned their socialist model of economic growth. And the emergence of a new generation across the board.

Q: It was mostly socialist and internalized.

THIBAULT: Yeah, it was a self-sufficient model, yeah. I mean, not entirely. We say socialist. The state was to be the guiding hand, so to speak but there was a very substantial private sector, don't get me wrong, but that was the Nehru philosophy. It had been sanctified by being associated with Nehru and his daughter, Mrs. Gandhi, continued with it. It began to change under Rajiv Gandhi, Mrs. Gandhi's son who himself was of the new generation. He was only forty when he became prime minister and then was tragically assassinated. Then a near economic collapse in 1991 and 1992 forced them to revise their policy and their overall thinking. The innate entrepreneurial talents and spirit of the Indian business community and of Indians generally immediately manifested themselves. They began to achieve a growth rate of six, seven, eight, nine per cent per year for many years, which continues to this day.

A younger generation - we could see this particularly in the bureaucracy. I had previously functioned as a domestic political officer. I dealt mostly with politicians and not so much with the bureaucracy in the early Eighties when I'd been there. But I certainly heard plenty about their attitude, the difficulty of working with them. They were proverbial, not just for those who had to deal with them but even globally. This time I was working with them on a day to day basis, across many ministries at pretty senior levels but working levels. They got the message, so to speak, that the government leadership wanted a positive relationship with the United States and they understood that they had to make it happen. And I developed some very good and close friendships with Indian officials in the foreign ministry and in other ministries as well.

Throughout the three years I was there, I would be in their offices daily and we would also see them on a social basis as well.

So it was a totally different environment. Finally India had found its place in the global economy, particularly with its high tech capability. This was very important because, first of all, it meant a close relationship with the United States, which was the fountainhead of their technology, which was built on very close ties with many American companies, on the many Indians educated and working in the United States, some of whom came back and interacted in India. But secondly as a source of pride to the nation, overcoming this image of Calcutta and Mother Teresa and poverty-stricken India which was so prevalent in the Sixties and Seventies. The Indians had had a chip on their shoulder which represented a defensive attitude, almost an inferiority complex. The younger generation had none of that. Not that they were overbearing or moved to the other side of the spectrum. You could just deal with them on their own terms and on a positive and productive basis in which they were not counting their fingers after shaking your hand or second guessing what your real motives were. And then thirdly, that sector had grown up free of government control because it fell between the cracks. It was so new, the technology was so new it didn't fit within the usual footprints of government ministries. People drew a powerful lesson from this. It had grown because the government ignored it, and then it grew so rapidly and to such a size that if government tried to intervene there would be a tremendous pushback.

The attitude of the private sector, which had been very obsequious and very deferential to government, had completely reversed. They functioned as a modern interest group does here in the United States, attempting to inform the legislative process to their benefit, both at the individual corporate level and in associations as well. That was very important.

The fact that tens of thousands and maybe millions, today, of young, well educated English-speaking Indians can find good job opportunities in their own country, without having to emigrate, itself was a source of strength and pride as well and of self-satisfaction. So, yes, everything had changed, everything had changed.

Q: How about relations, in a way our military to military relations were good even during the bad times, weren't they?

THIBAULT: Well, you know that had always been a source of misgiving and complaint on the part of the Indians, that we always tilted towards Pakistan and that the U.S military instinctively felt more comfortable working with the Pakistanis. Indeed, the Pakistanis had been members of CENTO, which was the Central Treaty Organization, which existed in the Fifties and Sixties. They had allowed U.S. bases in Peshawar. The U-2 was based there. Then of course during the Afghan war we provided ... there was a turnaround in our attitude towards providing military equipment, F-16's, to Pakistan. The Indians, on the other hand, had a privileged relationship, including arms supply relationship, with the Soviet Union. All of that was part of the background, and the result was that the Pentagon, in particular, had no particular fondness for India. The mil-mil relationship was a very thin one. That began to change. This really began taking off under the Bush Administration and was particularly propelled by the intellectual and bureaucratic energy that was provided by Ambassador Blackwill.

Q: Talk a bit about Blackwill. I never interviewed anyone who served with him but the papers seem to allude to his managerial style and not in particularly glowing terms but I know nothing about it. Could you comment on working with him?

THIBAUT: He is without doubt the smartest and most brilliant, that's the word I would use, person I've ever worked with or for. Bob has a penetrating intellect which is applied to public policy issues. He is a student of diplomacy in the old fashioned sense of the word. On the coffee table in his office in Delhi he had various books by Kissinger which he almost knew by heart and would often quote verbatim, books full of pithy insight on the diplomatic-cum-bureaucratic and policy-making process. He is an acolyte of Henry Kissinger, was a key aide to him in the 70's, and has remained on very, very close terms with him. He sees himself as a Kissingerian, as do others as well. He was intimately involved with the evolution of U.S. policy towards the collapse of the Soviet Union, towards the reunification of Germany, was decorated by the German government for his role as a key aide to Secretary Baker. He often described himself as a Harvard don in his speeches in India, recognizing that there academic eminence trumped diplomatic background (a la Galbraith whom he also knew), but, in fact, for almost 25 years he was an FSO, rose to the rank of ambassador to the MBFR in Vienna. And during that time he was also political counselor in Tel Aviv at the time of the Camp David negotiations.

He has a phenomenal range of personal friendships and contacts both in Washington and throughout the Western Alliance. I say phenomenal and I mean that. He is policy oriented to his fingertips and I say that in the most positive way possible because for him it is not enough to have an analytical or intellectual understanding of an issue and of a possible course of action. The question he will instantly pose is very specifically, operationally, how do you affect and influence and change policy to achieve your desired objective. His understanding of how bureaucracy, our bureaucracy, works in Washington, the relationship of the National Security Council to the Defense Department, to the State Department, to the intelligence agencies and to other players is second to none, second to none. He enlisted his forceful personality and boundless energy to challenge, overcome, and shape ingrained positions about India generally, the accumulation of 40 years of dealing with a difficult country, and in particular, the orthodoxies of the non-proliferation theologians, but in other areas as well. He relished that. Quite simply, he is a remarkable man.

His association with President Bush as a campaign advisor, the fact that he had been Condi Rice's boss in the NSC in the late Eighties when Scowcroft was national security advisor, where he worked with Colin Powell, with all kinds of people whose names today are front and center in our own policy environment means that he knows everyone in the current administration. He knows how their minds work. He knows how they can be moved. He knows where they can't be moved. He knows how to get others to move them. He is a brilliant, brilliant person.

Beyond that, he has an energy level that I have never encountered before in anyone. He is a person who sleeps maybe three or four hours a day and has for many years. He gets up at about four o'clock in the morning and then immediately logs on and then just goes through a bunch of papers, both U.S. and foreign, overseas. By six he's ready to go. He's a Force of Nature, no question about it, no question about it.

Now you asked about his managerial style. He's extremely demanding; he just is. His standards are extremely high. He's always thinking ahead. He's a great communicator. Nothing is secretive with Bob Blackwill. You know what he's looking for, what his approach is, what his analysis is, what his objectives are, and it's constant, that way. He expects people to understand what the goal is and to support him in achieving that. Now, this goes down well with some and not so well with others. He can be very, he works 24/7. His expectation is that those who work with him will not necessarily share the same intensity of purpose, he understands that he's unique in his ability to get by with as little sleep, and that people have other things in their lives as well. That said, he demands a very high level of commitment and engagement. So conventional hours are not the norm, if you want to work with Bob; don't expect to do that. There's no question that there were some who didn't cotton to this approach.

Q: Did you find yourself, as some DCM's are, standing between this Force of Nature, as you put it and ordinary human beings who work within the embassy, to keep them productive and not getting bruised?

THIBAULT: Inevitably that's the case. That described my role, in effect. Absolutely, yes. I was managing the mission. Bob's focus was on the policy and the policy goals and the transformations that I mentioned before. This is not a lightly used word in his lexicon. Transformation means moving ahead and moving real change, not at the margins but substantive change, on difficult issues, on a wide range of fronts. That was all-consuming for him, so the day to day mission, if you will, was something that he expected me to take care of, while at the same time providing him needed support. He was looking for his DCM to achieve those goals. So it meant for me a very tough schedule, a grueling schedule, throughout those two years that I worked with him.

Q: During this time, because of 9/11, I'm thinking about Bangalore and others, these tech centers, was there concern on the embassy's and the ambassador's part about that we were giving up too much to the Indians?

THIBAULT: No, quite the contrary. We saw this as a win-win situation for both countries, as I continue to regard it as that. It added value to both sides, keeping in mind that the U.S. government had very little to do with any of it. These were corporate relationships that were established. The companies that operated in India and who came to operate in India did not consult us except on problems they might face and that was rare, didn't inform us. They were always cordial if we went down there but these were relationships that they had built and developed on their own. So whether we liked it or not was neither here nor there. I am sure that is very much the case now. Now you might have your own views as to where it might lead but at that time it was viewed as a very positive step. I should add here that I think that, I've noticed in the last two years, since I've come back and particularly in the last year that China and India are often mentioned in the same breath as formidable players in the evolving 21st century global economy and as you implied, over time, could pose some kind of, if not threat, at least challenge to us. I can't comment about China but I certainly think that's overblown with regard to India, at least for a long time to come. I think I'm second to none in my admiration for and affection for India but I also have, I believe, a clear understanding of their limitations and there are very, very, very considerable limitations. Their political process is complex and not conducive to clear-cut decisions. There are very severe limitations on infrastructure and in areas other than this high tech one that so much attention has focused on, which embraces really a very minute percentage of the population. They have a long way to go to overcome them and this is not easy to achieve, given their free wheeling and democratic political process because a lot of difficult choices have to be made.

Q: Because of the sheer size of the population. Well, how about, during the time you were there, how stood things between India and Pakistan in Kashmir and did we get involved in this?

THIBAULT: Let me just talk about, I'll come back to Pakistan but let me just make a comment, for the record here, on this transformation that we were talking about. We spent an enormous amount of time trying to develop a relationship on civil nuclear cooperation, on civil space cooperation, and on improving our mil-mil ties. We achieved a lot of success in the latter, that is the mil-mil relationship, and were less immediately successful in the first two, civil nuclear and civil space, because of entrenched opposition here in Washington, in the PM bureau in particular. Whether that's John Bolton or not, as some would allege, I have no idea but we had great difficulty in that regard. And it was not an issue that's easy to explain or where there are large constituencies involved, where you could find allies to do that. So when I emphasized Ambassador Blackwill's bureaucratic savvy, that doesn't mean he was successful in all regards. Yet a great deal of effort was expended in those areas. However, seen over the longer term, what Bob did achieve was to persuade most of official Washington of the benefit to the U.S. of a relationship with India in the emerging Asia of the 21st century, highlighting that trust could be established on the basis of shared values and with a rock-solid democratic partner. I believe we will yet see those agreements reached, especially on civil nuclear cooperation. .

The Pakistan relationship of course starts with Kashmir and that's been the case now for fifty or more years. There was a lot of ferment in Kashmir itself. There had been an insurgency that had continued for many years, beginning in the late Eighties and starting in the early Nineties, that led to tens of thousands of people being killed. The evidence was very clear that the source of this was in Pakistan itself, in which militants would have refuge on the Pakistani side of the Line of Control as it's called, on the Pakistani side in Kashmir and elsewhere in Pakistan, and with direct encouragement by the government of Pakistan, who would arm and equip them and then send them across the border to conduct mayhem. The Indians found that very difficult to counter. Part of it was because of some sympathy with the militants on the part of the Kashmiri population but also because of the nature of the terrain, which is very rugged, and then also because of the nature of the tactics that would be used to deal with them.

9/11 cast all of this in an entirely different light. Instead of talking about militants and insurgents, we talked about terrorists. 9/11 did several things. With the collapse of the Taliban and the attack on them and on al-Qaeda, of course the Pakistani bases of support for al-Qaeda became a major concern for the U.S. government. That in turn led to serious questions in Washington, which continue to this day, about what is going on in Pakistani society, in which fundamentalism has taken strong root and in which you have groups responsible for the murder of Daniel Pearl of the Wall Street Journal, for several attacks on President Musharraf attempting to assassinate him, an attack on an international church in which a number of Americans were killed in Islamabad, attacks on the U.S. consulate in Karachi, car bomb attacks, attacks on a group of French engineers, ten of whom were killed in Karachi also, frequent and deadly sectarian bombings. In other words, terrorism as a continuing phenomenon around the country. Then you have these groups operating in Kashmir and it became clear to us, at least viewed from the information we had in India, that they were part of the sub-culture of terrorism entrenched in Pakistan which made the use of terrorism an acceptable political tool. What was hard to accept was that the intelligence agencies in Pakistan that were targeting domestic terror groups and al-Qaeda, in response to U.S. pressure and in self-defense it has to be admitted, were at the same time supporting the terrorist groups operating in Kashmir, whom they typically equipped and trained. And the latter often had close ties to the groups that the GOP claimed to be trying to suppress in Pakistan itself that were such a danger to their internal order. The Islamic justification against infidels which motivated a lot of these young men was directed against India as much as against the U.S. and Saudi Arabia and other countries. So, as I say, 9/11 really gave us a different kind of insights into what was going on there.

And it became a subject of increasing importance in the U.S.-India relationship. If we're going to be talking about terrorists worldwide, the ambassador argued, we should be pointing to the terrorists, Islamic terrorists, operating against India. In December 2001 there was a suicide attack on the Indian parliament in New Delhi. They came this close an inch apart an inch apart, my fingers, of penetrating the door of the inner sanctum of the Indian parliament, the lower house of parliament, and they intended to murder, to assassinate as many parliamentarians as possible. There was a gun battle in which they were all killed and a number of security, Indian security folks, were killed as well. Instantly, in India and on the part of the government, the conviction sprang up that these were Pakistani recruited, trained and supported terrorists. The investigation, including examination of their mobile phone calls and whatever documentation they found on them added to that conviction. The belief was that the Pakistanis were determined to attack the very foundations of the Indian state. The way the Indians would put it to us, was just imagine you had a similar group trying to break into the U.S. Congress. Of course this did happen in 1947, with a group of Puerto Rican nationalists. And therefore the reaction was extremely strong.

This came in the wake, too, of an earlier meeting between Prime Minister Vajpayee and President Musharraf in Agra, prior to this attack, which had buoyed hopes of a breakthrough in relations but which if anything led to a downturn. The meeting was a total failure. So now you had the belief that the Pakistanis were really out to get the Indian state, if you will. Events began moving very quickly after that, after December 2001, through 2002, when there was a major buildup in Kashmir of Indian military personnel, all kinds of movements along the Indian-Pakistani border and growing signs the Indians might be prepared to attack Pakistan. This generated enormous concern in Washington and in our mission as well because, of course, you have both countries armed, having nuclear weapons and a delivery capability. The Pakistanis have been testing their missile delivery systems and the Indians have those capabilities too. It was believed and feared that a nuclear exchange was a very, very real possibility in that kind of climate.

The Indians began making increasingly insistent demands that the Pakistanis cease their support of the terrorist groups in Kashmir. This support and the climate of violence in Kashmir is very cyclical, very seasonal. During the winter, given the mountain terrain, there are heavy snows which cut off the passes that are used by infiltrators and so there's a sharp falloff in terrorist incidents. But then as the snows melt, beginning in May-June, the number begins to increase. So you have what are relatively objective measures of terrorist activity and a basis on which you can conclude that they are receiving support. The Indians, of course, claimed and would share with us information that included radio intercepts, the questioning of prisoners when they were traced and so forth to indicate that the evidence against Pakistani backing was clear and incontrovertible. So we watched, the whole U.S. government watched, this situation developing with growing alarm. The ambassador was exceptionally active. He's always active but if anything he was even more so.

Let me emphasize that his relationships with the leadership of the Vajpayee government were probably the closest that any ambassador has ever had, including those of Galbraith with Nehru in the early 60's. Part of his strategic focus is to identify and get to know well the people who count in government, meaning who can have some influence on the policy you're trying to work on or work with. And that others who fall outside that scope are not of much interest to you. Now, some might say well, an ambassador should devote a lot of attention to promoting commercial relationships, to cultural relationships, you name it. But that ambassador was focused on transformation and in this particular instance of crisis management the emphasis he had placed on cultivating key officials paid big dividends. We would meet with the national security advisor of the prime minister and senior officials involved in that policy almost on request, often daily or near daily, it was that close. So they had a very clear eyed understanding of Washington's views, of Washington's alarm, of our assessments, and of our insistence that they restrain themselves and that they make sure that there be no miscommunication or missignaling of their intentions. So this was a major focus.

I should add as well that we worked extremely closely with the British on this. In fact, Ambassador Blackwill's tenure was marked by the closest possible relationship between the U.S. and the British missions. Washington and London were like this and I link my fingers together here, in lockstep. So Powell and Straw, Colin Powell and Jack Straw, were in direct communication on a frequent basis. Of course the ambassador, who knew the national security advisor, Condoleezza Rice, she had worked for him before, so they were in very frequent contact as well.

President Musharraf issued a statement that Pakistan was not supporting terrorists and would not support terrorists. Of course we tried to make the most of that statement with the Indians but they remained very suspicious and the way in which they measured this was by what they saw on the ground in Kashmir. They did not see these public statements translated into action on the ground. As the military preparations gathered steam and particularly as weather conditions in the late spring and early summer permitted military deployments more easily, people were very much focused on the fact that three previous Indo-Pak wars had been fought at that time of year. So things were coming to a head.

The ambassador, and again for all the criticism that some people make about his managerial style, was totally and absolutely and fundamentally focused on the security of our people, not just members of the official community and the mission but of American citizens in India. I want to emphasize that because we, meaning he, devoted an enormous amount of thought and time and dialogue with Washington on this issue and in ensuring that should war break out as few of our people would be in harm's way as possible, and therefore there was a need to make public statements alerting Americans to the grave danger that was building. These events culminated in a recommendation to the Department that the embassy be evacuated of all but essential personnel. This was the first time ever in the U.S.-India relationship and it was accepted by Washington. It was implemented within a few days, at the very end of May, coinciding, fortunately, with the end of the school year so it was minimally disruptive in real terms and with the normal transfer cycle as well. Within a few days all but a small number of people had left. I had been allowed to go on leave for a few days and was in South Carolina at the time and was called back by the ambassador, and I immediately returned. So we oversaw that evacuation and the British and many other embassies followed suit as well.

Q: Must have scared the hell out of everybody.

THIBAULT: I think it was viewed cynically by some the Indian media but I think it brought home to the government of India and to the Indian public just how seriously we viewed this crisis. So we observed this through June and well into July and we did begin seeing a tailing off of infiltration and finally the Indians began calling units back. You can only maintain this level of forward deployment and high alert for a limited period of time. So by August the situation had become a little bit more relaxed. The Indians announced elections in Kashmir which was something that Musharraf could use with his own people and the crisis eased. We were able to lift the evacuation and our people were able to come back within a relatively short period of time.

Q: Well, was the view from Delhi and our people that the Pakistani intelligence service was a loose cannon? In other words, was that under control of the president? To some extent, Pakistan was showing signs of being a failed state.

THIBAULT: Well, I don't accept the notion of Pakistan as a failed state, as someone who has spent some time there. I think our view was in fact the intelligence agencies were not rogue agencies but were reflecting the policy and the choices of the government of Pakistan, not necessarily in all of the operational details but in terms of the basic posture and in terms of the basic policy. The Pakistani Army is a very well-disciplined organization and always has been, which is one of the reasons why it's intervened as frequently as it has in domestic politics. So I don't think we accepted that notion.

Q: Was there, this attack, was it December of...

THIBAULT: December of 2001.

Q: Looking back to another thing, we were focused on al-Qaeda and the terrorists. Our president keeps reiterating, everything is terrorism and it stems from one source. According to somebody I was just interviewing, there was an attack in the Nineties on our airmen who were lodged in the Khobar Towers and the operation was an Iranian operation.

THIBAULT: Right, I was there at the time.

Q: We talked about this but there seemed to be a, I think you mentioned, there was an attempt to almost not overplay. This was taking our focus away, this was another source of terrorism and we had another policy. Was this coming up at all, because having Pakistani terrorists could dilute that focus?

THIBAULT: There was a conundrum for the administration, no question about it. On the one hand, we depended on the Pakistanis for their cooperation in going after al-Qaeda and there were a number of spectacular arrests that were made of al-Qaeda operatives, Khalid Sheik Mohammed, among others. Not to mention that in building up the Karzai government and creating a more friendly state in Afghanistan we needed Pakistani understanding and support for that as well, given their ability to really make that goal much more difficult to achieve if they weren't inclined to work with us. So our reporting and our very strongly expressed views, as expressed by Ambassador Blackwill, were not always welcome in Washington. He was extremely tough in his public remarks and he understood very, very clearly that an essential dimension of what we were trying to achieve in this transformation of the relationship was that it had to be publicly explained. So he was constantly working with the media and always accessible for interviews, for statements on television, seeking them out, giving public speeches, writing op-ed pieces. This was a major element of his diplomatic approach and style and he was pursued by the media wherever he traveled in the country for his comments and he never shrank from that. So he would make very, very forceful statements. As I said, one that comes to mind is, referring to these people operating across the border from Pakistan, that these were not "militants," they were not "insurgents," they were not "misguided youths," he would say, "Let us call them what they are. They are terrorists and they should be treated like terrorists and the United States government is committed to fighting terrorism and we apply that policy towards terrorism in Kashmir and wherever it happens."

Well this was a line that was not always welcomed in Islamabad. The Pakistanis viewed the people coming across the line of control as indigenous and the insurgency in Kashmir as having an indigenous character. They would dress it up in terms of people fighting for their freedom and "we support them, we sympathize with them, we provide moral support but nothing more than that." Of course, that was baloney. So it would create problems for our embassy, for our ambassador in Pakistan, because sometimes Blackwill's statements would be made at a time of delicacy in our U.S.-Pak relationship and his remarks would be highly publicized in Pakistan. As I say, it would create problems for us there. But this was not something on which Bob would back down, nor was he ever told by the Department or the White House to take a different line.

Q: What about our, after 9/11, our response, one, Afghanistan, two, Iraq? How did that play?

THIBAULT: Let me just mention, in terms of 9/11, the day of 9/11, I very well remember watching on CNN the attack going on, the plane crashing into the building, the towers and so forth. This was in the late afternoon, our time. As that was occurring, the ambassador received a phone call from the foreign minister, Jaswant Singh, in which he expressed the firmest and most positive support for the United States, to any degree and at whatever level and whatever way they could be helpful, they would be with us. And again, this was a very uncompromising, very swift, very instinctive response on their part and highly welcomed in Washington. There were no nuances to it, unlike some of the weasel words we might have gotten a few years beforehand. It testified to this strong relationship and this transformational process that was underway. This was all put to the test on the issue of Iraq. When it became clear that the administration was prepared to consider military action if Saddam Hussein did not implement UN Security Council resolutions, the question then arose as to where would the Indians be.

This was not only a theoretical or hypothetical question but a real one after the fighting war concluded followed by the occupation beginning in the spring of 2003. The administration was very keen on lining up as many other countries as possible to join us, particularly with, as they say, boots on the ground. In that regard we came very close to getting a large Indian contingent in Iraq. We were in very intense dialogue with them. Secretary Rumsfeld himself came out to Delhi, as did Gen. Shinseki, the Army Chief of Staff. The Indian defense minister also traveled to Washington for talks on this issue. The Indian army was institutionally disposed to dispatching up to a division, as I was well aware, dealing personally with several of the senior generals. During the war, at Blackwill's initiative, a mark of the new relationship as he put it, but with full endorsement from Washington, I undertook a formal briefing of the Indians, on a day by day basis, on military developments in Iraq, an unprecedented step on our part, drawing from all sources, including classified ones, to give them a sense of what was going on and to promote a serious dialogue between us. The Defense Department was extremely keen to get that presence in Iraq because the Indians, unlike some other nations, represent a serious fighting force. They've had plenty of experience, they're well regarded, and they have large numbers.

The Indian army was quite ready to go, quite prepared. They had identified the units that would be deployed and it seemed that it would happen. But as word of the dialogue between the two governments began leaking to the media, there was a counter reaction, particularly among the opposition parties and therefore in Parliament, expressing reservations about this. Not about the bilateral relationship but about this particular action and ultimately Prime Minister Vajpayee decided that he could not manage it. This would have been a departure from their previous fifty years of policy. He felt he could not break this kind of new ground unless he had a consensus, a national consensus, behind him and he finally opted out of it. It was a disappointment to us but we understood - this was a political decision that he alone could make.

Q: Did some aspects of the Bush Administration, while you were there, have repercussion with our relations with India? I'm thinking, we've tended to repudiate treaties and go it alone. These are oversimplifications but it was much more of a confrontational, almost nationalistic type of policy than what we had under previous presidents, and how did that translate because the Indians have always been great ones for multilateral things and all that.

THIBAULT: I've been talking about transformation of bilateral relations but you and I had earlier discussed the transformation of the India I had last encountered almost twenty years earlier. Very little of the Bush Administration's policies aroused a strong negative reaction on the part of the Indians, very little. I think that an important reason was the fact that, to some degree or another, they shared some of the views of the administration. But I believe the most important factor was that they were not going to allow themselves to be distracted from sharing in and pursuing the bilateral transformation that I was talking about. India sees itself as a different kind of country in the world. Unspoken in either our approach to India or in the Indian approach to the United States is the China factor. We all are looking at and wondering how China is going to evolve. What role will it play in the 21st Century? As a strategist, and one who knew China well from his years of teaching Chinese military officers under a special program at the Kennedy School and from regular trips to China, Bob Blackwill was keenly aware of China. Although he never spoke on this publicly, nor does the Administration, it was in this important context, as he saw it, that a strong U.S.-India relationship is vital for both countries, and I know this is how the Indians saw it as well.

India shares a very long border with China, fought a war with China back in 1963 which it lost. It sees itself now as having new technological prowess and strength as potentially a major player in the world economy. It wants to be taken seriously, especially by the United States. The Soviet Union is long gone. As you said earlier, a new generation has come to the fore. So they're committed to building the relationship with us. They may have had views about particular aspects of U.S. policy but they rarely allowed themselves to get wrapped up in that. Nor did the media, again part of this very surprising change in attitude. The leftist parties, which were very prominent when I was in Delhi in the early 80's, are fairly marginal in Indian politics today. There's a whole new generation in charge now which has gone beyond the thinking of earlier times. So, no, that's a long way of saying there was very little in U.S. policy that really prompted a negative reaction and certainly nothing similar to what we saw in Europe, for example, among our traditional allies. For example, arising over Iraq.

Q: It's interesting, for one might say that the Indians already had gotten over their anti-Americanism where the Europeans had been sitting around and for years under the thumb of the United States and getting tired of it. Here's a great chance to get out and venture annoyance without any particular repercussions.

THIBAULT: Right, and I think so much of dealing with the Indians, as is the case in Asia more broadly and the Middle East, is reflecting a respect for them. We have worked very, very hard to do that and deal with them as a major, serious country, which is how they view themselves. And to work hard to get our bureaucracy to buy into developing ways in which we can work together with India for mutual benefit. That is not easy. These all sound like pious platitudes but they really are not, they really are not.

Q: One of the things that I've had people talk about who have dealt with India in the past, India and Pakistan, was that whereas the Pakistani embassy seemed to know how to get out and glad hand its way around Congress and do the right thing, the Indian embassy, from the ambassador on down, seemed to be very concerned about their dignity and would only deal with people of a certain rank and all this, which essentially hindered them very badly in playing the Washington game. Has this changed?

THIBAULT: Well, of course, I was not in that great a position to observe their Washington operations but I certainly suspect it has changed. If anything, there's a complete reversal of views in official Washington, certainly on the Hill, towards Pakistan and India, particularly since 9/11. If there's one thing that we now devote a great deal of attention to is having shared values. Remember I said that for Saudi Arabia we had plenty of shared interests but no shared values, whereas with India we had relatively few shared interests but lots of shared values. Today we have lots of shared interests and shared values with India. We had a constant flow of members of Congress to India and it was very positive. You have the Indian-American community. I haven't talked about that but the Indian-American community is very large now, very influential, these are very successful people. You have a stake now at the political level, at the district level, for many members of Congress. You also have a business relationship which is very important, is growing very rapidly. So the threads that link us together are far more significant today and have far greater weight today than they did 15 or 20 years ago when the period you were mentioning existed, far more than with Pakistan, far more than with Pakistan. We're talking now of the president visiting India, he's made a commitment to do that. The Indian prime minister is expected here shortly, this summer. I'm not sure the embassies, here at least, play that key a role but they don't get in the way, either.

Q: You left there in ...

THIBAUT: I left there in July 2003 and I decided that I would retire at that point. I could have stayed on in the Foreign Service for another two or three years.
