That was the atmosphere at the time the negotiations opened in mid-October in Blair House in Washington between the Egyptians and the Israelis. They were supposed to draft the peace treaty whose outlines had been agreed to at Camp David. The first week went very well and then the mutual suspicions began to arise. The Israeli Cabinet played a very damaging role by slowing down the negotiations. Ezer Weizman and Moshe Dayan were the two chief negotiators for the Israelis; Begin did not come to Washington. Both Dayan and Weizman were eager to conclude the negotiations quickly and were moving along very nicely. After ten days, Weizman went back to Jerusalem to attend a "brit" for his first grandchild and took with him an offer which he wanted to introduce into the negotiations. Essentially, Weizman wanted to propose that Israel would accelerate its withdrawal from El-Arish and some other areas as a token of good intentions -- this was a move in which the Egyptians would have been quite interested. The Cabinet turned Weizman down. Sadat then felt betrayed because he thought he had been promised such acceleration informally, but Weizman couldn't deliver. Sadat further felt betrayed because Carter had persuaded Sadat to exchange Ambassadors before the negotiating process had been completed. This was a move which the Israelis had urged on an expedited basis and Sadat had agreed on the explicit understanding that the quid pro quo would be this partial withdrawal from the El-Arish area. When Weizman was not able to get Cabinet approval, Sadat withdrew the offer for an early exchange of Ambassadors making Begin feel double-crossed. Each side began to feel that the other was welshing on deals made. Dayan during this period made some moves that didn't help. Begin had gone to Canada on a visit while Dayan and Weizman were in Washington. So while Begin was out of town, Dayan returned to Jerusalem to get Cabinet approval for certain key negotiating points. This was not a smart move on Dayan's part. The Cabinet took the opportunity to berate both Weizman and Dayan for giving away too much and repudiated the ad referendum agreements that they had reached with the Egyptian delegations. I should note that we were involved in these negotiations as sort of honest brokers. Dayan and Vance had worked until about two o'clock in the morning drafting a side letter between the Egyptians and Israelis intended to set a very vague target date for the completion of the autonomy negotiations. For some reason, there was a communication break-down and the draft letter didn't get to Begin immediately as it should have, but only as he was entering a meeting with Vance at Kennedy airport in New York as he was heading back to Israel. Begin became furious with Dayan for proceeding on this letter without checking with him and then confronting him with it at the last moment and he therefore repudiated the letter in front of Vance and then engineered his Cabinet's disavowal of the letter upon his return to Jerusalem. Dayan became so angry that he threatened to resign, but was persuaded not to. These unfortunate mishaps in the Israeli delegation, to which I was closer than those that occurred in the Egyptian delegation as well, went on for weeks. Finally, the U.S. got dragged further and further into the middle of the negotiations -- drafting formulations -- which should have been a rather simple task of translating agreed principles into detailed implementation steps; they became much more complicated. On November 11, 1978, a full treaty was finally completed. It was a good draft. Vance tried to get both sides to say that this was the best they could do and that the text should not be reopened lest the delicate compromises reached be all jeopardized. First, the Israeli Cabinet would not go along, but finally on November 17, at Dayan's urgings, it withdrew its reservations to the preamble and accepted the treaty text and the annexes. But it didn't accept the "side letter" which included the target date for the completion of the autonomy negotiations. Part of the problem was that from the beginning there had been a long argument about the linkage between the peace treaty and autonomy negotiations. The Israelis were eager for the peace treaty and the Egyptians were eager to get the autonomy negotiations on behalf of the Palestinians. So the Egyptians wanted linkage, the Israelis didn't. Ultimately there was kind of linkage build into a side letter but the two were not made totally dependent on each other.

When the Egyptian delegation, which was led by Boutros Ghali, the Minister of State then and now and Hassan Ali, then Minister of Defense, returned to Cairo, they found a very unhappy Sadat who was not entirely satisfied with the work that they had done. He balked at Article VI. He felt that the U.S. side letter was much too vague for his purposes. He had become more cautious because since Camp David, when he was very confident that all of the Arab states would follow his lead and that once Egypt had spoken all would see the wisdom of Egyptian diplomacy, he then began to perceive opposition from the Arab states. They had all met in Baghdad in late October and had unanimously agreed to reject the Camp David accords. Even Morocco, Jordan and Saudi Arabia joined the condemnation of Egypt. The Iraqis, incidentally, had applied maximum pressure on the Saudis through personal intimidation on the Saudi leaders in Baghdad. So Sadat was more concerned at this time than he was at the end of Camp David that there be a treaty package agreed upon that he could defend in the Arab world. He had to have a document that would prove that he had not given away any Palestinian interests and did not look like a separate peace. That made the side letter, which linked the two negotiations, an essential part of the peace treaty negotiations. In the meantime, in Jerusalem, Begin's colleagues were becoming more suspicious of Sadat and worried about whether the Egyptians intended to conclude a peace treaty.

These issues created a sort of a stalemate between mid-November until early December. The atmospheres in Cairo and Jerusalem were very unpleasant. I had conversation during this time with Dayan and Begin, trying to get them to refocus on the "big picture", but I was not very successful. Carter was getting increasingly frustrated and also became diverted by other issues, such as the increase of difficulties in Iran. At Camp David, it had been agreed that the peace treaty would be signed within three months, during which the Israelis would cease new settlement buildings in the West Bank and Gaza. That three months period would have expired on December 17. As that day came closer, everybody got increasingly nervous and upset. Roy Atherton, who was at this time the special Middle East negotiator, came to the area to try to break the impasse and failed. Secretary Vance then persuaded the Egyptian Prime Minister and Israeli Foreign Minister Dayan to meet him in Brussels. The three had dinner and made some progress on the side letter. Then in desperation, Vance went to Cairo. He spent three days during which he had some very tough talks with Sadat. He finally got Sadat to accept the treaty text that we felt was the best that could be done with the understanding that we would add certain interpretive notes to some of the articles and if the side letter were strengthened on the linkage between the peace treaty and the autonomy talks and if the letter included linkage between exchange of Ambassadors and the inauguration of the governing authority which was to be established by the autonomy agreement.

During the November-December deadlock, Golda Meir, the ex-Prime Minister of Israel, died on December 8 at the age of 80. As in other moments like this, there was a high level U.S. delegation sent to the funeral. It was co-headed by President Carter's mother, Miss Lillian, and by Cy Vance; the delegation included a lot of dignitaries who had known and worked with Meir, like Henry Kissinger, Justice Goldberg, and Pat Moynihan. There were so many people in the delegation that when the special plane landed at Ben Gurion airport, we had the insolvable problem of sorting out the protocol. There were just too many high level people to figure who would ride in which car. We decided to solve the problem by putting Miss Lillian, who was formally the head of the delegation since Vance had not yet arrived, in the car with the Israeli personage who had been sent to meet her, namely the wife of the President -- Mrs. Navon -- and my wife and I. So the four of us left in a limousine to head up the hill to Jerusalem. Everybody else -- all the dignitaries -- were put on a bus. That way we avoided an argument on who would precede whom. In any case there were so many. The question was: Who would tell Henry Kissinger that he was riding on the bus? That task was given to my wife Sallie. She went up to Henry as he got off the plane and said: "Henry, I want to tell you that we have so many VIPs that protocol has become so complicated that you have to get on a bus to Jerusalem". Kissinger looked at Sallie in his inimitable fashion and in his best Kissingerian tones said: "Sallie, you must be kidding?". My wife, nevertheless, escorted him to the bus listening all the while to his grumbling and wit. She got him on the bus and Henry behaved pretty well. For weeks thereafter, he kept telling the tale of how Sallie Lewis had shoved him on a bus -- the first time in his life he had ever been treated like that. Vance arrived later and met the delegation in Jerusalem. The funeral was held in a downpour the likes of which I had never seen in Jerusalem before. This just added to the Israeli depression which had already taken a beating from Meir's death. She represented something very important. Also the peace treaty was on hold and it appeared that the great achievements of Camp David were coming apart.

Vance arrived in time for the funeral; he had come from Cairo where he had held discussions about the deadlock. In Jerusalem, we had one meeting -- rather frosty -- with Begin. Then Vance returned to Egypt for a day. He met with Sadat and then returned to Israel. He then had another session with Begin. At that point, Carter made a few public statements back in Washington based on Vance's reporting. Those statements did not help Vance's efforts because they referred to Sadat as "very generous" in accepting a certain formulation. Begin didn't regard Sadat's acceptances as a matter of generosity at all and therefore more than ever didn't appreciate Carter's public praise of Sadat's flexibility. He saw it essentially as a pressure on Israel to compromise.

Vance once again returned to Egypt -- this was his third trip of the "shuttle" -- and Sadat finally agreed to the text with the interpretive notes. Vance came back to Jerusalem on December 15th. - two days before the deadline -- and was almost completely rejected by Begin and the Israeli Cabinet. They just wouldn't approve the package that Vance had finally got Sadat to approve. They were not persuaded by Vance's argument that it was very important that the deadline not be breached. Begin always had an antipathy to negotiating within a certain time frame. He believed that if you allowed yourself to be effected by a deadline, then you would surrender considerable negotiating leverage -- I suspect that he may have been correct in that attitude. So every time we would mention a deadline, he would get his back up and would drag out the negotiations. The tactic of time pressures did not work with Begin. In addition to running into Begin's resistance to time limitations, we also ran into a problem created by the state of global communications. Vance and his party -- Atherton, Saunders and others -- who had worked long and hard hours over a period of weeks, trying to bring the peace treaty to a successful conclusion, had to accept in mid-December the fact that there just wasn't going to be a peace treaty at that time. Begin had been quite proper with Vance and had complimented him on his hard work; he certainly was cordial. Their relationship had become rather strained as a consequence of the "shuttle". Vance and his party, after their last visit to Jerusalem, boarded their Air Force plane to return to Washington. During the flight, while still over the Mediterranean Sea, Vance talked to Carter by phone from the plane. The technology at the time had not sufficiently progressed for that conversation to be in a secure mode. It was an open phone call that the Israelis were able to monitor through their quite sophisticated technical capability. They had a private contractor, who had acquired the most modern equipment available in the world, who had monitored all the radio broadcasts in the Middle East for the last twenty-five years from his own home. He worked for the Israeli national radio and television company. This capability permitted Israeli intelligence to get advance notice on many events through this one man SIGINT (signal intelligence). They often got advance warning through this method of events faster than Washington or anyone else in Israel. By spinning his radio dial, this man picked up the Carter-Vance telephone conversation and overheard comments that Vance made which were less than complimentary about Begin's intransigence during the negotiations. Immediately after the phone conversation there was a press story filed from the plane quoting a "senior U.S. official" -- a euphemism always used for the Secretary of State when he is giving off the record or background interviews -- to the effect that the Israelis had been very stubborn and that their position had really blocked the completion of the peace treaty. The story in short blamed the Israelis for the failure of the negotiations. That hit the Israeli press the next morning, in combination with the intercepted phone call. That really hardened attitudes in the Israeli Cabinet and soured Begin's view of the role the U.S. was playing. He became increasingly convinced that we were supporting the Egyptians and were essentially for Sadat and that we were trying to push Israel into a corner.

Christmas of 1978 was a very unpleasant period. The peace negotiations were frozen. The deadline came and passed and nothing happened. Carter first apparently decided that it would be best to let matters cool for an extended period and not to push anybody. Then he decided that this was too dangerous because at the same time, the Shah's position in Iran was beginning to seriously erode. He may in fact have already left the country by this time. It was also becoming obvious that Egypt and Israel were beginning to harden their positions and although the treaty was 95% finished, it appeared that it would not be concluded and Carter's achievement would evaporate. So at the end of January, 1989, he sent Atherton and the Department's legal advisor, Herb Hansell, to the Middle East to see whether a new Article VI of the Treaty could be formulated. Article VI concerned a very esoteric legal issue dealing with the question of what took precedence: Egypt's responsibilities in case of a conflict under its treaties with other Arab countries, or the Israel-Egypt peace treaty. Begin, who was perfectly capable of making legalisms into major issues, began to say that Article VI was the vital heart of the whole Treaty. No one else ever thought it was, but he now made it the most important matter in the whole Treaty. Hansell, Atherton and I and Meir Rosanne, who was then the Foreign Ministry's legal advisor, and the Israeli Attorney General and Ben Elizar, who was Begin's chief of staff, and Ruth Lapidot who was then a law professor and now is a Peace Fellow at the Institute for Peace negotiated until three o'clock in the morning on Article VI, Paragraph V. This discussion was supposed to produce some kind of side agreement to counterbalance a legal opinion that Hansell had given to the Egyptians in December. He had spent seven days then negotiating over something that disturbed them. The whole treaty negotiations had deteriorated to a very detailed discussion of legal minutiae. That state of affairs had resulted from the almost total break-down of trust among the three principals who participated in the Camp David process. The desire to reach agreement had frayed so badly that one could find million of reasons why a Treaty should not be concluded. We had almost reached agreement with the Egyptians, but when they heard that we were about to give the Israelis a side letter, they were horrified and wouldn't accept it. So the whole negotiating process came to a stop. It was clear by then that the technical negotiators couldn't resolve the remaining issues. The impasse was political and could only be resolved at that level. Dayan argued that Begin had to be put back directly together with Carter and Sadat. He felt that this was the only way the deadlock could be broken. The other possibility would have Dayan be the main negotiator but then the discussions would have to be close to Jerusalem because he needed to be close to Begin who had gotten so suspicious of Dayan's negotiating ability as consequence of the Washington-Blair House round that he would not have trusted Dayan if he were far away. Carter on the other hand felt that he couldn't spare Vance and couldn't let him leave Washington for another extended round of negotiations. There were too many problems around the world.

So with great misgivings, Dayan and I set out for Camp David again for what I call "Camp David II". Unfortunately, the second round was not as successful as the first. By this time, we believed that this might be the last chance to conclude a treaty. Begin was hinting to me that he was really concerned that he might lose the Treaty. Dayan was concerned about the instability of the region. Sadat was anxious to conclude a treaty, particularly as the Shah had just fallen from power. However, we all had our fingers crossed and prospects were not great. We got to Camp David and Carter wasn't too anxious to become personally involved again, but realized that he must. Carter was the host at Camp David; Dayan and Prime Minister Khalil and Vance were present.

We went to Camp David February 20, 1979. The day before, Washington had been paralyzed by a snow-storm. I was staying with some friends in Cleveland Park. We were supposed to go up to Camp David on Tuesday. The snow storm came on Monday -- George Washington's Birthday. I was called on Monday morning from the Secretary's office telling me that Vance wanted to meet downtown that day to discuss the up-coming negotiations. I looked out of the window and told the office that there was no way I could get to the Department. We had something like 25 inches of snow the previous night. The voice at the other end told me that the Secretary was on his way in and that he would pick me up at Wisconsin Avenue if I could get there. So I trudged through the snow for four blocks. I stood out on a deserted street and after a little while, there appeared a big snow plow moving down Wisconsin. I peered and sure enough, there was the Secretary of State sitting on the passenger side of the plow. He gestured to me to get in with him and that is how we got to the Department that Monday morning.

The Camp David II conference was a real mess. We spent five days and nights there in the snow. I got into an awkward situation at one point. We had thought that Khalil, Sadat's Prime Minister, was the right person to meet with Dayan at this time. It turned out that neither Khalil or Dayan had much flexibility. So Carter was banging his head against two stone walls for a couple of days.

He was not able to move them. Then Carter decided that the only solution was to get Begin to Washington. He asked Dayan to call Begin to invite him to come to see whether he could help in breaking the deadlock. Begin was highly offended by this invitation because he thought that he was being summoned to Washington to meet Egypt's Number 2 official -- not the Number 1 man-Sadat. He let us know his views in no uncertain terms. Dayan was aghast by Begin's reaction. He argued with Begin to no effect. Carter was furious and told me and others that if Begin did not come, he would wash his hands of the whole negotiation and would tell the world who was to blame. The President was fed up. I think he was serious; I think he was considering making a speech, blaming the collapse of negotiations on Begin, which was the last thing that Begin wanted. He had tried throughout this period to keep the onus on the Egyptians. Dayan then said to me: "Look, I have tried my best with Begin. You talk to him. see if you can persuade him! Convey to him Carter's feelings".

I tried to reach Begin, but he wasn't available. So I talked to Eli Ben Elizar who was Begin's chief of staff. I asked him to give Begin a private, personal message from me. The substance of the message was that I was personally deeply concerned about the state of affairs and that the Prime Minister would be blamed for the collapse of the negotiations. To be blamed in such a manner would be bad for Israel and for Begin. I told him also that I thought he should come to Washington to make one more try. Ben Elizar relayed, as I learned later, my message to Begin in a very tendentious way -- in a incorrect, distorted and trouble-making fashion. It was put to Begin in such a way that the Prime Minister felt that he was being given an ultimatum. It complicated my subsequent relationships with Begin considerably. Worst of all, my message did not have the intended effect; Begin still refused to come. He sent a message back, rather haughtily, that he would not consider meeting with anybody but Sadat and Carter. But he did pass a hint that if Carter would invite him to Washington -- just him -- he would certainly never turn down an invitation from the American President. By this time, Carter had his back up and it took several anguishing hours to persuade him. Vance and all of us worked to try to get Carter to swallow his pride and to try Begin's way. None of us wanted to lose the treaty. Ultimately, that is the way the issue of Begin's coming to the U.S. was resolved. Carter invited Begin for a visit to the White House. Of course, while in Washington at the President's invitation, he could have some discussions on the side with Khalil. But the main reason for the visit was to meet with Carter at the latter's invitation.

Begin came and had some meetings in the White House and some side meetings with Khalil. Unfortunately, the visit didn't solve anything, although some hints were dropped. In any case, Begin's ego was assuaged. Carter handled him quite well so that Begin began to see that it was not the U.S. and Egypt vs Israel. That had been the real problem throughout these weeks and that perception had stood in the way of progress. But even by the end of the visit, we didn't have an agreement. The atmosphere had improved, but the problems were not completely solved. We were now in early March, 1979. The region was in terrible shape. Carter was trying to decide what to do after Begin's departure. Sadat had just sent a message that he would like to come to Washington to mirror Begin's visit. He didn't want to meet with Begin, but wished to take his case about Begin's intransigence to the U.S. Congress, the media and the American public, preferably while Begin was still in New York. He wanted to fight the public relations battle with Begin on American soil while the U.S. President sat on the sidelines, watching the debate. The vision that Sadat and Begin would be firing high explosives on each other over Carter's head in the U.S. was just too much to swallow. This prospect drove Carter to decide that he had to bite the bullet and go to the Middle East personally to obtain approval of the treaty once and for all. All of Carter's advisors, except for Hamilton Jordan, were against this trip. Everybody else thought that the President was risking too much political and personal prestige. They were afraid that he would be perceived as traipsing around the Middle East, hat in hand, when the two major leaders in the area could not reach agreement. The possibility of failure was very high and most of the advisors saw it as a bad idea. Jordan saw it the other way. Carter had invested so much prestige on the Camp David agreements that if the implementation steps were not taken, it would be seen by the American public as an empty victory. The President's standing could only be maintained if he made a major personal effort so that he could not be accused of not having tried everything possible. No possible avenue should be spared. Carter followed Jordan's advice.

After his return from the United States, Begin had convinced his Cabinet to make a few concessions on some of the articles that Carter had discussed with him. There were also further discussions about the target date. Then came Carter's announcement about his trip to Egypt and Israel. All the professionals in the State Department and other places were astounded because the trip appeared as an act of desperation. There were no pre-arrangements; Carter's reputation was tottering somewhat at that stage for other reasons beyond the peace treaty. But everybody turned out to be wrong. Carter's gamble succeeded. In any case, Carter, Vance, Secretary of Defense Brown, Brzezinski and many more came out. The whole foreign and defense policy leadership of the Administration was on that Presidential plane. Carter first went to Egypt, where Carter and Sadat had another of their "love feasts". Although Khalil and his colleagues were tough in their bargaining, Sadat essentially gave Carter a blank check. He told Carter to do the best he could; he would trust the American President not give away Egypt's interests. That was a technique that Sadat repeatedly used with Carter and used very successfully.

So after getting pretty much of a blank check from Sadat, Carter arrived at 8 o'clock on Saturday night, March 10, 1979, at Ben Gurion airport. The American delegation was still very moved by the fact that millions of Egyptians, undoubtedly spurred on by Sadat, had come out to cheer Carter's train as it moved from Cairo to Alexandria. At Ben Gurion, there was an arrival ceremony, which looked very much like the Sadat arrival of November 1977, although there were far fewer people to greet Carter than there were for Sadat. Fortunately, my sons' school, the American International School, were there in great numbers, cheering widely which was of considerable help. The arrival was a moving moment. It was the only time an American President had visited Israel, except for Nixon's visit in 1974 in the last days of his Administration. We had had a discussion with Teddy Kollek, the Mayor of Jerusalem, about a ceremony that he wanted when the party would reach the entrance of Jerusalem. He wanted to hold a full arrival ceremony with the traditional wine and salt. I got Teddy to promise that there wouldn't be any speeches (at White House insistence) and there weren't. Everything went smoothly though our people from Washington were sure that Kollek would double cross them. There were all sorts of frenzies with the Secret Service people. The head of the detail saw a mike standing near Kollek and all during the "Star Spangled Banner" kept yelling at me about it. The motorcade came off without hitches. Everybody was pretty much up-beat through the buffet that evening that Weizman hosted at the King David hotel for the whole delegation. There was a kind of electric mood in the room. In the meantime, Carter was having a private dinner upstairs in the hotel with the Begins. He came down to where we were at about 1:30 and the bubble just evaporated because he told us that the trip to Israel was a complete waste of time. Begin had just said no to everything; Carter was tired and frustrated. He quoted Begin as saying that he could not even initial a treaty publicly with his two counterparts -- Carter and Sadat -- which was the scenario that Carter had desired, until after the Knesset debate and ratification. Begin had told us after Camp David that he had made a pledge that he wouldn't sign a treaty until the Knesset had worked its will, even though under Israeli Constitutional practices, it was the Cabinet that could ratify treaties. The fact that Begin wanted Knesset approval was an indication of the importance of the peace treaty. But we never dreamed that Begin wouldn't at least initial it prior to Knesset approval. So the whole scenario of a major public event with the three principals initialing the treaty had been shot down, much to the dismay of the public relations people in the White House. So Carter was at least quite grumpy at this stage.

On Sunday morning, we went to President Navon's, we went to Yad Vashem, went to the Unknown Soldiers Tomb at the Knesset -- all the kinds of things that State visitors do. There was a church service at the Scottish Presbyterian church in Jerusalem. All that went well. The first formal working meeting was at 11:00 o'clock and lasted two and half hours. It was a disaster. Begin was at his most hyper-defiant, oratorical, preachy, dramatic -- repeating all the "nos" that he had given Carter the night before. He insisted that we stand by our "agreements" that we were supposed to have concluded during his last visit to Washington on joint U.S.-Israeli language on Article VI and the accompanying side notes to which he had gotten Cabinet approval. Another issue that had become important related to oil supplies which had become important during the treaty negotiations because the Israelis began to worry about guarantees for future oil supplies. They were surrendering their oil wells in the Gulf of Suez which they had exploited since their 1967 occupation. The Israelis wanted some guarantee that they would be able to buy their oil from Egypt or some other producer -- those were the days when the Arab states would not sell oil to Israel, except Iran which by now had become very unstable and unreliable. So the Israelis were looking to the U.S. for the guaranteed supply if they couldn't buy it on the open market. So the working out of this arrangement became another sticking point. Begin was insisting at this time that Egypt guarantee in writing that it would sell Israel two and half million tons of oil per annum for five years, but the Egyptians were not willing to do so. There was no agreement on the language about Gaza and a lot of other issues.

Carter barely kept his cool at the meetings. Then there was a big working lunch downstairs that helped to thaw the atmosphere a little bit. That was followed by another working session and Carter stepped up the pressure. Begin sensed by this point that he had to respond somehow to Carter's insistence for faster action. We adjourned at three o'clock for an hour and a half during which each delegation held separate meetings. We stayed in the Prime Minister's Cabinet Room, which was probably bugged. Carter stretched out despondently over two chairs making some unguarded wise-cracks about Begin. We met again with the Israelis until 5:30. Begin was really worn out at this point. He suggested a halt. Carter had just completed a very tough summation of his position. One of the issues that was being discussed concerned Egypt's need for access to the people of Gaza through the establishment of a consulate or an open border or some means. Sadat was very interested in this. Carter told Begin that this contact was a matter of his own personal honor and of direct interest to the U.S. He obviously had promised it to Sadat. So we provided some appropriate language to be included in the treaty. Begin then agreed to call his full Cabinet into session after dinner to discuss this new proposal. Up to this time, we had been dealing with only seven Ministers -- the so-called Security-Defense Committee -- out of approximately twenty. As he was about to leave, Dayan agreed to remain behind to talk informally with Vance on further language refinements before the draft was to be submitted to the Cabinet. That helped a little to make the language a little more acceptable to the Cabinet.

After that, we changed clothes quickly at the hotel and went off to the Knesset for a beautiful, fancy State dinner in the big hall decorated by the magnificent Chagall tapestries hanging behind the rostrum. After dinner, Isaac Stern and Pinina Salzman played some duets. The toasts by Navon, Begin and Carter were very gracious. I got drowsy during dinner and napped during one of the toasts. It was about ten o'clock and I was tired. After the toasts, came the Inbal dance group to entertain, but fortunately their performance lasted only about seven minutes. Dinner ended about eleven o'clock. The whole Israeli Cabinet went back to the Prime Minister's office for a meeting. I slipped to Dayan as he was leaving some new improved text -- our latest draft -- which Vance had worked on in an office while dessert was being served at dinner. He then asked me to pass it to the Israelis, which I did.

The U.S. delegation sat around the hotel after dinner rather gloomily until about 2 a.m. Monday morning. Later, we found out that the Cabinet meeting had gone on until 5:30 a.m. We met for a working breakfast and learned of the Cabinet decision from Rosanne and Evron. There had been some progress, but not enough. Begin was expecting praise from Carter for what he had been able to accomplish, but he didn't give much. Carter kept pressing for new flexibility on the Gaza access issue and on oil supplies. Begin was tired and offended, but polite. He agreed to meet with us after lunch for another attempt. Carter then said that he would leave for home that Monday afternoon; he couldn't stay any longer. He had talked to us about leaving even sooner; he was worn out with the negotiations about matters that he regarded essentially as very trivial. For weeks, he had thought that all the key issues had been solved and that Begin was really quibbling over small details that didn't make a bit of difference. That perception made Carter increasingly angry.

After breakfast, Carter went to a Knesset session which had been previously scheduled. Before delivering his speech, there was a singular incident. Geula Cohen, a formidable renegade member of Begin's own fighting family who had taken issue with the Prime Minister over Camp

David and opposed the treaty, heckled Begin -- as was done all the time in the Knesset -- as he was introducing Carter. Carter of course wasn't sure who was being heckled and had to be reassured that it wasn't him. She was warned three times by the Speaker, but she kept yelling and screaming about how Begin was selling out Israel. She was finally expelled from the Knesset floor. Carter watched all this and then finally was allowed to deliver his speech -- passionate and very eloquent -- which had been drafted in part by our Political Counselor, Bob Blackwill. He had convinced Carter's speech writers to use a good deal of his text. Unfortunately, Carter had penned in one line that didn't help. As he looked directly at Begin, he said that the leaders of our nations had not lived up to the aspirations of their peoples. That didn't go over very well. But the speech overall was a fine speech, in part because the Embassy, and in particular Robert Blackwill, our Political Counselor and I, had such major involvement in its drafting. It was about the most eloquent statement about U.S.-Israel relationships that I have heard or that was ever delivered by an American President. It was well received except for that one line I mentioned earlier. Begin made a very poor impression; he was being heckled by a lot of people in addition to Cohen. The extreme left and the extreme right were very unhappy. Peres gave a very eloquent statement on behalf of the opposition with considerable emphasis on Palestinian rights which of course was not well received by Begin, but delighted Carter. During both Begin's and Peres' speeches, Carter got a good sense from the heckling, the rowdiness and the raucousness of how tough Begin's problems were in the Knesset. Afterwards, Carter asked whether the Knesset behavior wasn't deliberately staged for his benefit as evidence of Begin's political problems. I don't think it was staged at all and said so.

After the Knesset session, we had lunch with the Foreign Affairs and Defense Committees. In the meantime, the Cabinet was meeting to reconsider our latest draft. The lunch with the Knesset Committees was very good. Carter was excellent in rebutting the suspicions and arguments from the Israelis about Egyptian reliability. He had a strong impact on the Knesset members with respect to Sadat's problems on the oil issue, the U.S. commitment to Israel and the risks to all participants of failure of the peace process. Carter then went to take a nap; he was very tired. The departure plans were put on hold pending the completion of the Cabinet's deliberations. We met with Begin and eight other Cabinet members after the completion of their session to hear the results. From the first sentence of Begin's report, it was clear that we had pushed the Cabinet into a kind of negative psychology -- they were tired, having been up all night and having had three meetings within 24 hours. Begin announced essentially that they had stuck to all the positions they had developed the previous night; they gave no ground. They were sick of being whittled away by Sadat's continuing demands that were made every time they had laboriously agreed to new American proposals. We tried to probe Israeli stand on other issues; Begin was not willing to go any further on any. So finally, around 7:00 p.m., we left the meeting with the Cabinet, very discouraged.

I learned later from some Cabinet members that the sentence that Carter had penned himself into his speech about "leaders not living up to the expectations of their people" had become one of the major reasons why the Cabinet had been so negative. Begin had taken such offense at that that he had used it to work up a lot of animosity. This is a good illustration of how very tired people can act and react.

In the meantime, while we were in session with Begin, Carter had completed his nap and decided to postpone his departure until noon the following day. He called Begin to thank him for all the efforts he had made and invited him and his wife to breakfast the following morning -- Tuesday. That pleased Begin a great deal. On Monday evening, some of us went out to dinner trying to forget how things were going. When we returned, I felt that the mood had changed. A group of seven Cabinet members led by Dayan and Weizman and including Sharon had gotten together after the Cabinet meeting and agreed that Carter shouldn't be allowed to leave under existing circumstances. I don't know whether Begin was aware of this informal meeting; I think the seven probably got together without Begin's knowledge. After the seven had met, there was a lot of scurrying around. Dayan talked to Begin by phone about a different approach on the oil guarantee issue which had festered continuously. Then Dayan and Evron went to see Vance, who felt immediately that the Israelis didn't want Carter to return home empty-handed. Vance told us that he began to smell that the pieces were beginning to fall into place. The U.S. delegation then went to work until the early hours of Tuesday morning on a new set of proposals to be used by Carter at his breakfast with Begin. These proposals were based on the Dayan-Vance conversations.

To everyone's pleasure, the Israeli position became more flexible at the breakfast. After a while, Carter and Begin asked Vance and Dayan to join them. Initially, Dayan was not very optimistic because he found out that Begin had changed his mind once again on the oil issue. The irascible Israeli Energy Minister, Moday, was pushing very hard and was very difficult to deal with. After they had been with their leaders for a while, Vance and Dayan met with Weizman and Harold Brown. We found out later that Weizman had threatened during the night to resign unless a treaty was concluded. He was very upset with Begin's tactics; they were just too risky for him. At 11:30, as we were entering the motorcade cars to go to the airport, I still wasn't sure what had happened in the previous hours. I had not gotten a full debriefing from the four persons meeting. I learned from Vance in the car that Begin had given Carter a little more on the formulations -- not a lot, but little -- but it was something. Carter had agreed to take it to Sadat to see if he could sell it. Begin showed again that he was a very tenacious bargainer. At the airport ceremony, everyone looked very strained and concerned. Roy Atherton thought Sadat would accept the new formulations. Everyone else was very dubious. I told Dayan that the odds were three out of four that the new package would sell, but I wasn't sure that I really believed that. Begin's strategy was clear; he wanted to force Sadat to reveal his bottom line on all the outstanding issues and then, and only then, to ask the Cabinet to decide on those issues. Had this strategy failed, Carter would have been the big loser.

Carter knew that he could sell the new package to Sadat because he knew how much of a blank check he had received from Sadat. We, the rest of the U.S. delegation, didn't know it at the time so it appeared to be a risky strategy. In retrospect, it really wasn't. Furthermore, I have also found out subsequently from my Israeli friends that Begin clearly never had any intention of allowing Carter to return to Washington empty-handed. Once he had invited Carter to come to Jerusalem, he wasn't going to destroy him and the treaty. Begin was simply and purely bargaining; he was going through his usual, very tough, emotional, tenacious, legalistic, annoying bargaining tactics. Begin was a very tough and effective negotiator. He drove everybody crazy, but usually got 90% of his objectives. And that, after all, is the test.

Q: How about Begin's health at this particular time?

LEWIS: At this time, it was good. His health went through several phases. He had a couple of falls, he had a heart infection, he had spells of depression at two or three different points, but they were relatively short, until his deep depression following his wife's death from which he never fully recovered.

To finish off the story of the Carter Middle East trip, I saw the party off at the airport and we were all making bets on what it would cost Carter if he failed in Cairo. At about 5:30 that afternoon, my assistant, Josiah Rosenblatt, rushed to me at the Embassy with his transistor radio. He was listening to Carter speaking on VOA from Cairo, announcing that Sadat had accepted all the peace treaty formulations just agreed to with the Israelis. Carter had already phoned Begin with the news and the Israeli Cabinet met the next day to reaffirm the decisions. Carter had won. I called Begin, who was by now walking on air. So were Dayan and Weizman when I spoke to them. I had a call from Vance from Air Force I as he was returning to the United States during which he made a lot of nice comments about the Embassy's performance. We made mutual congratulations on the outcome. Dayan told me later that Begin had said, almost ruefully, with respect to our last offer on oil that "I guess we will just have to accept it!". Dayan had to laugh because we had given the Israelis an absolute fifteen year guarantee of oil supplies, from the United States, if necessary.

I was told that I would receive Carter's letter to Begin later that night containing the written agreement which had been orally approved. Begin told me to call him at any time, day or night, when the letter arrived. I got it to him immediately upon receipt. The peace treaty was essentially wrapped up; there were a couple of last minute cliff-hangers in Washington at the signing ceremony. Even there, the oil supply issue reared its head again, twenty-four hours before the signing. A new formulation and new letter of assurance was negotiated, but in Washington, for the first time since Camp David, Sadat and Begin met alone without Americans which we very much encouraged. It happened at the Egyptian Embassy. They had a very good meeting the night before the signing ceremony. That helped to kick off the autonomy negotiations the next day and to start the withdrawal of the forces from the Sinai.

The period from Camp David to the end of March was very intensive. What should have taken three months took six. What could have been done clearly in one month took a lot longer because of the negotiating styles and because personal trust evaporated between Carter and Begin in the days immediately following Camp David. To me that was the principal reason why all the unnecessary negotiating trauma had to go on.

Q: The last interview ended with the signing of the Peace Treaty between Egypt and Israel in March 1979, which was the culmination of an intensive 18 months of negotiations which started with the advent of the Carter administration. What happened next?

LEWIS: There was obviously a great deal of joy and enthusiasm at the ceremonies. As we all sat on the White House lawn watching Carter, Sadat and Begin signing the Peace Treaty on a beautiful, cool afternoon, I was struck at the time as highly significant -- and indeed it became more significant as years passed -- that during the ceremony there was a small group of protestors across Pennsylvania Avenue in Lafayette Park which held up signs and chanted: "PLO, PLO, PLO". Indeed many of the following years of my involvement with Israel increasingly focused on the problem of the PLO and Israel's refusal to have any contact with it, either directly or with any Palestinian who had any connection with the organization.

After the Treaty was signed, the next step in the process was to be the formal ratification, which under differing Constitutional systems, would be handled differently by each signatory. Since the U.S. was only a witness to the Treaty, we did not have to send it to the Senate, but in Israel, ratification is formally provided by the Cabinet, rather than by the Knesset. Nevertheless, because of the importance of the Treaty, Begin did send it to the Knesset for approval. The debate was spirited but approval was a foregone conclusion since the Labor Party joined most of the Likud in supporting it. Then the Cabinet ratified it. There was a good deal of euphoria in Israel, although it was somewhat reduced by the difficult preceding months which followed Camp David and which were devoted to negotiations of the detail chapters of the Treaty. That took some of the bloom off the rose, but still there existed in Israel a great hope for the future. There was also an expectation that once Egypt had made peace with Israel, then other Arab states would surely follow one by one.

Q: Was this a governmental or popular euphoria?

LEWIS: I am referring to a popular euphoria. The government was happy to have the Treaty concluded, but had many doubts about whether the Egyptians would live up to its terms, particularly the many provisions involving the normalization of relations, which the Israelis viewed as very important. The Israelis were looking for real peace and not just a formal document. After Israeli and Egyptian ratifications -- I believe that the Egyptian Parliament ratified the Treaty -- the instruments of ratification must be exchanged according to diplomatic practice before a treaty goes into effect. That exchange ceremony raised some discussions; there was some talk about Secretary Vance coming to the region to witness the process first in Cairo and then in Jerusalem, but ultimately it was decided that the exchange would take place in the Sinai at the American "field mission" which consisted of a small U.S. civilian unit which had been established when the forces had been separated under agreements negotiated by Henry Kissinger in 1974-75. The U.S. had accepted at the time responsibility for monitoring observance of the agreement in the crucial areas of the Mitla and Gidi passes in mid-Sinai -- by stationing American civilians right on the demarcation line.

Q: To what agency did these Americans belong?

LEWIS: It was a fascinating operation, not well known or recorded by history. The lead agency was the Department of State which contracted with a private American business organization -- E Systems Corporation of Dallas, Texas. It established a small camp in the middle of the desert on a promontory overlooking the passes. The State Department staffed that mission with its own employees and E Systems furnished the logistical support. We had some rudimentary technological devices in the camp to watch potential infiltration routes; such violations were to be reported to both parties. That camp had been in existence for five years by the time the instruments of ratification were to be exchanged. It was right on the line which at that time separated Israeli and Egyptian forces. So it was decided to have the exchange take place at this camp. It was scheduled for a month after the signing of the Peace Treaty at five p.m. Rather than having any dignitaries come from Washington, Ambassador Hermann Eilts, the U.S. Ambassador in Cairo, and I were designated jointly as the U.S. representatives at this ceremony. Eli Ben Elizar, the chef de Cabinet for Begin, represented the Israelis -- or it might have been Moshe Dayan -- I don't recall who was the head of the Israeli delegation. Their counterparts represented Egypt -- I believe it was Boutros Ghali, the Egyptian Minister of State. We drove to the camp by car and arrived around noon where the U.S. delegation was met by the Israeli and Egyptian groups. Of course, as seems to happen in most negotiations, there was a last minute snag. There were a great many invited journalists present; pictures were being taken. When the delegations first met, it was announced that Prime Minister Begin would not accept a footnote in the wording of the Egyptian document of ratification. Precisely, Begin's legal advisors who were there -- Eli Rubenstein and Meir Rosanne -- found the footnote to be inconsistent with Israel's interpretation of the form of the document. The Israelis consulted Begin on the phone and the Prime Minister instructed them not to proceed. That was followed by about three hours of anguishing negotiations between the Egyptians and the Israelis over this footnote with us Americans playing the customary role of intermediators in the effort to get around the roadblock. Eventually we reformulated two or three words; I was then pressed into service, as often happened, to convince Begin over the phone that he could accept the new wording, which he finally did after hearing me and his people. They wanted to proceed and not hold up the ceremony any longer. With some reluctance, Begin finally agreed to this very minor reformulation.

Q: Was this classic nit-picking?

LEWIS: It was classic and of course it was nit-picking, but the footnote effected a phrase that contained a great deal of substance to Begin. Our legal advisor, Herb Hansell, who had been instrumental in the formulation of the final documents, in working with the other two legal advisors, recognized that there was a problem. I believe that it was related to something that had happened at the signing of the Treaty itself, when for about two hours just before the signing ceremony the delegations discussed a footnote. It was finally only resolved by Carter shortly before the signing of the Treaty took place. It was a question of how one identified such words as "Palestinians" in English or in Hebrew or in Arabic or whether the Gulf of Aqaba was called the "Gulf of Elat" or the "Gulf of Aqaba" -- these were the sorts of issues that caused last minute flurries. There were not many footnotes; the one I discussed might have been the only one that was relevant in the instruments of ratification.

When we finally got Begin's agreement, the ceremony proceeded about three hours late. But by that time the sun was setting and it sets pretty fast in the Sinai. We were on a rocky promontory with a strong wind blowing. It was a beautiful, barren and rugged country side, but it was getting chilly. The flags of the three countries were flying over a rostrum; the press was arrayed below with the TV and still cameras ready. You of course can't have a ceremony without speeches. There was an Israeli speech; there was an Egyptian speech; and then there were two American speeches, since there were two of us. The U.S. delegation consisted of two or three of my staff, two or three from Hermann's staff and several people from Washington, but we were fewer in numbers than the Israelis or Egyptians -- there must have been fifty or sixty officials in addition to a couple of hundred media representatives. I wear contact lenses; when I rose to give my remarks which I intended to read off some cards on which I had written quite carefully -- this being a very historical occasion -- I was looking right into the sun and facing a rather stiff wind. Just as I stood up, a grain of sand lodged behind one of my contact lenses, which as all contact lens wearers know, can be one of the most excruciating experiences that one can suffer. My eyes began to tear and I could hardly stand the pain. I couldn't see the cards because of the tearing. Somehow I stumbled through it, but I will always remember that experience as being one of my most excruciating ones of my life. It had of course to happen on such a memorable day. It was very ironic.

As I mentioned earlier, the hang-up of the previous six months was in great part caused by something called the "joint letter". This was a letter to President Carter that ultimately Begin and Sadat jointly signed -- it had been carefully negotiated -- in which they described their intention to enter into the negotiations on the autonomy arrangements for the West Bank and Gaza immediately after the signing of the Peace Treaty. That was a part of the Camp David agreement that dealt with the Palestinian issue -- it was of great, great significance to Sadat. This letter had been fought over endlessly. The Egyptians wanted very much to have a strong linkage between the Peace Treaty and their withdrawal from the Sinai on the one hand and the autonomy arrangements for the Palestinians on the other. This would have permitted the Egyptians to argue that they had not sacrificed the Palestinian cause for return of the Sinai and that they had been able to achieve a temporary autonomy on the way to a final negotiation on the status of the West bank and Gaza. The Israelis had resisted such linkage for a long time. The final letter provided for a kind of provisional linkage. The Egyptians wanted a date certain for the conclusion of the negotiations so that the Israelis couldn't string them out indefinitely and never get around to providing autonomy for the Palestinians. The Israelis didn't want a deadline; they preferred an open ended negotiation. Eventually we ended up with a one year "target" date, which was not a deadline but a target. This was something, incidentally, that Cy Vance had very much advised the Israelis and the Egyptians against, having had some bad experiences with such "targets:" in other negotiations. Nevertheless, they agreed to this "target" date and to a commitment to start the negotiations within a month after the exchange of the instruments of ratification. So the autonomy talks were due to begin in late May, 1979.

Vance, who by this time had spent the first sixteen or seventeen months of the Carter administration in the Middle East negotiations -- sometimes fully engaged for weeks on end in his role as mediator -- had concluded that it was just impossible for him to continue to be the chief U.S. mediator in the autonomy negotiations. Too many other foreign policy issues in other regions were not being properly attended. By mid-1979, the Shah had been forced out of office and our whole position in the Persian Gulf was being substantially eroded; then there was China, USSR -- which was beginning to be difficult again -- and many others. It was becoming clear to Carter and Vance that the Secretary just had to step back and let someone else carry the ball. That was the origin of the idea of appointing a special Presidential representative as the U.S. intermediary for the autonomy talks. It was clear to everyone, based on our experiences in the Peace Treaty negotiations, that the U.S. would have to be an active player. We would have to have a delegation on site; we would have to keep prodding, pushing and brokering. A number of names were considered including Robert Strauss, who had just concluded successfully a very important trade agreement during one of the multilateral trade negotiations which had been quite a tour de force, particularly since he managed to get the package approved by Congress with almost no dissent. He had won the President's admiration as a skillful negotiator; he was also an important political figure in the Democratic Party. So Strauss was chosen as the U.S. representative. In private, Vance was very much opposed to Strauss' appointment; he didn't think that Strauss had the right temperament or background on the issues. Strauss had never really had any involvement in the Middle East, although he was known as a very skillful Texan style horse-trading negotiator with very sophisticated political skills. Despite Vance's skepticism, Strauss was appointed as a representative of the President, not of the Secretary, or of the Department of State. This caused some difficulties in the Department because Strauss was quite independent, formed his own staff and viewed himself as reporting to the President directly and in a collegial way, consulting with the Secretary. The staff was very small, consisting primarily of a couple of young lawyers from his law firm in Washington. Vance insisted on -- he and I discussed this at considerable length -- giving Strauss some professional, experienced staff to support him. We agreed on and Vance was successful in recruiting Ambassador James Leonard, who was then the President of the United Nations Association, after his retirement from the government. Vance had been active in the association and knew Leonard well. In his earlier incarnations, Jim Leonard had been a senior official in the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency and had been involved in several international negotiations, particularly on arms control. He had had some Middle East experience, not of recent vintage however. He was a very able professional. He was persuaded to return to government and serve as Strauss' deputy with the rank of Ambassador. During the remainder of the Carter administration, Leonard played an important role. He and his wife essentially resided in the region -- in Israel most of the time, but sometime in Cairo as well. He worked out of our Embassies, while Strauss remained in Washington, as did Sol Linowitz, who succeeded Strauss later. Both of them played their roles as Presidential envoys from Washington; they had offices in the State Department; their staffs were there. They would travel to the Middle East for the negotiating rounds and then return to Washington. In between, Leonard would shuttle between Cairo and Jerusalem and tried to push the process along. It became a pretty good team operation. There were two or three other State Department employees attached to the delegation; they were stationed in the region. One officer from the Political Section of our Embassy in Cairo and one officer from the Political Section in Tel Aviv were part of the Strauss-Leonard team. That allowed the two Embassies to play a significant role as well. Both Eilts and I were deeply involved particularly when meetings were taking place in our countries. The meeting place for the negotiations alternated between Egypt and Israel; if they were in Egypt, a member of my Tel Aviv staff would attend and vice-versa. This insured that the perspective of our Embassy and Israel would be available to and understood by Strauss and Leonard.

Q: Was there any Egyptian skepticism since both Strauss and Leonard are Jewish?

LEWIS: I am not sure about that. There probably was some skepticism and ultimately, interestingly enough, they had rather different impacts on the two countries they were dealing with. Strauss stayed in the job for only a few months -- for about two rounds of negotiations. I think he concluded quickly that this kind of effort was not his cup of tea and he began to seek a graceful way to withdraw. He did that in the late summer. A few weeks later, Sol Linowitz was recruited. By that time, several months of negotiations had already passed. Linowitz joined the U.S. delegation in the Fall of 1979, right after he had concluded the Panama Canal Treaty negotiations during which he had earned admiration from the Carter administration for that diplomatic success. In the beginning, Strauss was feeling his way through a series of mine fields. Initially, he decided that his tried and true negotiation techniques could work in the Middle East as they had everywhere else. He started by trying to establish an informal personal relationship with Begin and Sadat -- "bonhomie" -- which he had used very successfully in the United States and perhaps elsewhere. My perception gained from sitting in all the Begin-Strauss meetings is that that technique didn't work very well. Begin was never quite sure what he was dealing with and the two men never did find temperamental affinity, but since Strauss was Carter's representative, he was treated politely. I never felt that in the short time that Strauss was engaged in the process, he was taken as seriously as he should have been. He didn't know the region, which was a clear drawback. He was Jewish, although essentially secular, and he had not had any connection with Israel before this time, as far as I know. All in all, it was a funny situation for Strauss to walk into.

Q: You implied that Cy Vance might have foreseen the difficulties.

LEWIS: I do think that Cy understood that in advance and that is one of the reasons why he opposed the appointment initially. Every one had a lot of respect for Strauss' accomplishments and political savvy, but he just didn't fit this situation well.

Q: Bonhomie was not a good basis for relationship with Begin ever, was it?

LEWIS: No. The Texan approach to creating rapport didn't work very well with Begin. I did think that Strauss would also have problems in Cairo, but I have been told long after the fact by Ambassador Eilts and others who were in a position to observe that Strauss got along quite well with Sadat. He was probably more effective with the Egyptians than he was with the Israelis. The round of negotiations began one month after the exchange of the articles of ratification when a meeting was held in Beersheba. We had agreed that the autonomy negotiations would start in Beersheba in the presence of Secretary Vance, Begin and Sadat. This was the occasion of the first Begin visit to Egyptian occupied Sinai and the first occasion for Sadat to visit Israel after the famous trip to Jerusalem. It was quite an event and the two sides arranged it well, operating through their liaison people in both capitals and the hot line between the two Defense Ministers which had been established sometime earlier between Weizman and Gamasy. It was agreed that the initial meeting between Begin and Sadat would take place at El'Arish in the Sinai and that from there the opening session of the autonomy talks would take place at Beersheba. Vance and Strauss, Dayan from Israel and Boutros Ghali from Egypt would head up the negotiating delegations. I flew with the Israelis to El'Arish in a very uncomfortable Israeli Air Force transport -- it had long wooden planks running along the sides of the plane with small windows - - nothing fancy for the Prime Minister and most of his Cabinet. We landed in El'Arish and met the Egyptian party. Vance was also there.

A special event had been arranged ahead of time which was truly moving. It had been Begin's idea. He had suggested it to Sadat, who agreed. First there was a reception in the morning during which Egyptian officials, both civilian and military, mingled with Israeli officials and members of the American delegation. Then Begin and Sadat, accompanied by a few senior officials, and a few members of the American delegation -- I think Vance was there, although he may have gone directly to Beersheba -- went to another building on this military base. There, we found some food buffet style. It was not very fancy. We were met by approximately 150 disabled war veterans, both Egyptian and Israelis, who had been victimized by the various wars between the two countries. There were people in wheel chairs; there were people without arms or legs; there were the blind. They had been brought together for a reconciliation meeting to mark the beginning of an era of new relationships between the two countries. Begin and Sadat circulated among the group and asked about where they had fought and been maimed. It was very, very moving and made a deep impression on everybody there. It was the kind of event that was very important to Begin, particularly. It showed the human tragedy of the a war. Sadat was also very moved.

After that ceremony, we all were taken to two planes to be flown to Beersheba and that was fascinating. The senior Egyptians and the senior Israelis and I were in one plane. There could have been one or two other Americans on the same plane, but I am not clear on that. The more junior Egyptians and Israelis were in the second plane. The plane I was in, which also had Sadat and Begin on board, was the same uncomfortable military transport which had brought us to El'Arish. Begin and Sadat were sitting next to each other in the forward area. Dayan was sitting with Boutros Ghali somewhere in the middle; Weizman and General Gamasy were sitting next to each other. There was a lot of joshing going on. At one point, Begin, who was very fastidious about his appearance, looked at his black shoes, which were always very formal, which had gotten sandy and dust covered. He took out his handkerchief, put one foot on top of the other and polished his shoes. He then turned to Sadat and asked him whether he would like to use the handkerchief to polish his shoes. Sadat very graciously declined. Then Dayan went to Begin and took the handkerchief and cleaned his own shoes. He then took that handkerchief and went down the plane and cleaned two or three other people's shoes. It was a most unusual gesture for Moshe. It was all done in a kind of jocular fashion to symbolize, I guess, the new era. It made quite a picture.

We landed in Beersheba about thirty minutes later and went to the University, where the formal meetings were to be held. Before the formal session started, an event was staged outside the building. The Egyptian and Israeli flags flew together and lot of speeches were made. There were a number of Sadat's associates who had never been to Israel. I remember especially one who had sat next to me -- Mr. Osman Osman, an Egyptian contractor, who had built half of the buildings in Cairo and was a great pal of Sadat's. He commented about the very modest nature of Beersheba, which is a nice, but not fancy city. There was a lot of talk about how the experiences and talents of the two people could be combined; lots of ideas were being kicked around such as bringing the waters of the Nile to the Negev and the joint construction of nuclear power plants in the Sinai which would serve both countries and the development of a chemical industry based on the natural gas in the fields of the Gulf of Suez which would serve the needs of both Israeli and Egyptian industries. None of these ideas have ever come to fruition, but in those days there was a lot of hope that there would be cooperation between the two countries which would produce such joint economic projects.

The negotiations started ceremoniously with various people making speeches. They agreed on the date for the next meeting and then everybody went home. The Egyptians flew back to Cairo and we returned to Israel. Vance came back to Jerusalem for some additional discussions. During the period prior to the beginning of the autonomy talks, the die had been cast in many ways. Events took place which led to the ultimate failure. On the Israeli side, the problems were Begin and Dayan. Dayan, who was indispensable to Begin, was a proud man who chafed under the short leash that Begin had him on, but in the prolonged period leading up to the peace treaty had lost Begin's confidence. Begin was convinced that Dayan was prepared to accommodate the Egyptians to a much greater extent on a number of issues that he, Begin, was willing to do. Therefore, the Prime Minister was no longer willing to let Dayan act as chief negotiator without constraints from other ministers. Dayan of course assumed that he would continue in that role since he was still the Foreign Minister. But he discovered, shortly after the Peace Treaty was signed, that Begin did not intend to allow him much freedom as chief negotiator, but preferred to have a Cabinet committee of six Ministers including Ariel Sharon as the negotiating team. Dayan then recognized that his chances of succeeding in the autonomy negotiations, under constraints of a Cabinet committee consisting primarily of conservative Ministers, would be pretty slim. He didn't want any part of such a process. He initially told Begin to appoint another chief negotiator. Begin named Dr. Yosef Burg, who was then the Minister of Interior and who had for many years represented the national religious party in the Cabinet. Burg had not had any real foreign policy experience, though he had traveled widely all over the world among Jewish circles. He was a very distinguished Orthodox Jewish scholar -- he was funny, erudite and a conciliator by instinct -- not a leader. But the idea that Dayan, the Foreign Minister, would sit on a Committee headed by Yosef Burg which would steer the Israeli position on the autonomy talks, boggled the mind. It could never have worked. Formally, as long as he remained Foreign Minister, Dayan had to be part of the Committee and after a good deal of foot-dragging, he allowed his staff to participate in the Committee's staff work. In fact, however, I am convinced now in retrospect that Dayan had already decided to leave the Cabinet. He believed that Begin was already regretting some of the concessions he made in the Peace Treaty, particularly on the definition of "autonomy" in the Camp David Accords. Begin was determined to retreat from the agreed phraseology in some manner during the course of the actual autonomy negotiations. He wanted to maintain a tighter Israeli control over the territories than might have been understood in the Accords. Dayan did not believe that this was an appropriate course and didn't want anything to do with it. In the Fall of 1979, Dayan resigned from the Cabinet and broke formally with Begin at that point. He went into political exile for a while, became quite ill; then he tried to form his own political party and ran in 1981 as the leader of a small splinter party for the first time in his life. He only got two seats in the Cabinet and died soon thereafter.

The fact that Dayan took himself out of the game after seeing the hand-writing on the wall meant that Begin was going to keep personally very tight control over the negotiations. He would work through Dr. Burg and his Committee, but he would be in control. All the Committee members would sit on the negotiating sessions -- six Israeli Ministers appeared at these meetings, which on the face of it was not a very efficient method of operation. On the Egyptian side, the die had been cast by the fact that after Camp David, despite the efforts that I described earlier, we had been unable to get the Jordanians or Palestinians from the territories to agree to take part in the post-Camp David process -- i.e. the autonomy negotiations. The Egyptians therefore were left in the position of having to represent the Palestinian interests in these negotiations. Sadat had once said grandly that there was no problem if the Palestinians were not involved; he would represent the Palestinian cause and defend their interest most adequately. The formula was unworkable. The Egyptian delegation knew very little about what really was happening in the occupied territories; they had had no representation in Gaza since 1967; they had very limited knowledge of how those territories had changed from that time. They knew little about the inter-mingling of the economies of Israel and the occupied territories; they knew little about the water problems; they knew little about security problems. They did not have an adequate grasp of the situation. Moreover, even after they began to visit the territories during the negotiating missions -- they tried to familiarize themselves about what the land and people they were negotiating about -- they felt totally constrained since there were no Palestinians with them. They were deathly afraid of being attacked by the PLO or by other Arab States for selling out Palestinian interests. The Egyptians therefore were in not in a position to bargain or to make any compromises. They could only take rhetorical positions on issues -- positions of principle which could be defended to the Arab audiences. In the period after Camp David and particularly after the signing of the Peace Treaty, it must be remembered that Egypt was being ostracized by the Arab world. In fact, after Camp David, they were partially ostracized, but no one broke diplomatic relations with them. The Saudis and others hoped against hope that the Egyptians would not proceed with the Peace Treaty, but when that was signed, there was a summit convened in Baghdad. The Iraqis put on a great deal of pressure. In fact, throughout the period the Syrians, the Iraqis and the PLO...

Q: The question that came to mind is, Arafat and other PLO factions, were they sideswiping Sadat or were they....?

LEWIS: Yes. Throughout this period, particularly after the treaty was signed, there was a full-court press by Syria, the PLO and Iraqis, in particular the Iraqis, to attack Sadat. The Iraqis hosted this Baghdad meeting at which Arab League's decision to ostracize Egypt was agreed. It was a summit that was very tumultuous; the Saudis were still hanging back about severing all ties with Egypt, and we learned later that Iraq's Saddam Hussein, in particular, put some very brutal threats and pressures on the Saudis to force them to go along, including crude personal threats to Prince Fahd himself.

Q: Sam, I believe you wanted now to add some inserts into previous discussions. Where would you like to start?

LEWIS: I would like to start with interview 8, dated April 30, 1991. During that interview, I dealt with the period right after the signing of the peace treaty between Egypt and Israel in 1979. I want now to complete that period through the end of the Carter administration -- end of 1980.

This was a period that began with a lot of hope in light of the signing of the peace treaty. There was hope that in a very few months we could complete the negotiations on the second part of Camp David -- the autonomy agreement. That would have completed the whole Camp David framework. That aspiration ultimately came to naught. I mentioned earlier the role that Bob Strauss played as the first U.S. Special Representative. He in fact took over from Secretary Vance. I suggested that Strauss was not very well suited for the role. He came to the same conclusion himself soon after taking the job -- after one or two rounds of negotiations. So he spent most of the summer of 1979 maneuvering to get himself out of the job. By early Fall, he had succeeded and was replaced by Sol Linowitz. Sol carried the negotiations through the rest of 1979 and 1980. Sol was a much better choice for the job. We all believed that although the odds were very much against reaching agreement, had Linowitz been appointed first and had he been able to carry the negotiations from the beginning, there might have been a chance that we might have achieved success in the autonomy talks. As I said, we recognized that the odds of success were slim because the Egyptians were hamstrung because they had no support from the Palestinians or the Jordanians; they could not afford the risk of making any concessions on matters of primary interest to another party. They would have been severely criticized in the Arab world if they had been perceived as giving away any Palestinian rights. It is quite likely that Linowitz would not have achieved success, but he had a better crack at it than Strauss.

Early on, Sol established a highly professional negotiating style with both Sadat and Begin. He managed to win their confidence. He worked hard; he used his staff extremely well. He was determined to achieve success and as I said, he might have done so had he been in on the process from the beginning. One of the problems he faced was that we had agreed, albeit reluctantly, to place a deadline in the famous joint letter that Sadat and Begin ultimately sent to Carter. The target for negotiations was one year. I should note that the Egyptians had initially been the party that had insisted on a deadline and that it be tied closely to the peace treaty. The Israelis also wanted a deadline, but for different reasons. Cy Vance tried to talk them out of it. His experiences as a negotiator had led him to the conclusion that deadlines were usually counter-productive. The Israelis wouldn't agree to a tight deadline, but did agree to a "target" date; they wanted to be sure that the completion of the peace treaty was not dependent on reaching agreement on the Palestinian issue. There was a connection, but it was very loose -- much less than the Egyptians wanted.

It became apparent soon after the beginning of the negotiations that such a deadline was self-defeating. In the first place, both sides became quite wary about moving too rapidly. They both felt that they had lots of time. We had very little luck in encouraging them to move faster. We were always worried that unforeseen events -- like eruptions in Lebanon which had occurred often -- could derail the whole process. So we were anxious for an early agreement. But we were unable to convince the Israelis and the Egyptians. Maybe we didn't try hard enough although we discussed the issue of pace often enough.

The first few months of the negotiations went very slowly. As we approached the "target" date, we ran into another effect which also slowed any potential progress. Particularly the Israelis, but also the Egyptians, became very nervous about making decisions under the pressure of an impending deadline. They feared of course making the wrong decisions under time pressures. So in the Spring, 1980, there came to be a tacit understanding between the two parties to essentially ignore the "target" date. During the Summer, 1979, as the negotiations struggled to begin, Dayan bowed out of the process. He had a cancer operation, which put him out of action, although never relinquishing his position as Foreign Minister. He resigned in early fall. Dr. Burg headed the Israeli team, with great caution, deference and care. Begin was actually pulling the strings. He had become convinced that he had given away more at Camp David concerning the Palestinians, the West Bank and Gaza, than he had intended. So he was determined to enforce the strictest and narrowest interpretation of the autonomy concept. That made it even more unlikely that an agreement could be reached.

In the meantime, on an intermittent basis, the administration had been conducting very quiet, surreptitious probings of the PLO views through unofficial and clandestine representatives. CIA was involved in some of them. There were also some American private citizens who were carrying messages back and forth. These contacts were often probes intended to clarify the limits of PLO acceptance of certain formulations. Hal Saunders, who was then the Assistant Secretary for NEA, was an important player. He did not have any personal contacts with the PLO, but knew what was going on; he was the principal expert in the U.S. government about PLO attitudes.

One of these contacts became known early August, 1979. That was the one that involved Andy Young, then our Ambassador to the UN. He had attended a social gathering in July, which was also "unexpectedly" attended by a PLO official. The two of them held a conversation, much to the displeasure of Vance and Carter. There was in existence at the time a prohibition against any U.S. government official having contact with any PLO representative, even though there had been some clandestine contacts. This meeting finally forced Young to resign, primarily because Vance was so angry. When the meeting became public -- after the Israelis heard about it and publicized it -- Young was asked about it. He gave an inaccurate version of events; he essentially denied that such a meeting had taken place and later had to explain the meeting and his first version of events. Vance became furious and made an issue, not so much about the meeting, but of Young's not leveling with him initially. I think Vance insisted to the President that Young be relieved of his duties. Young was very close to Carter, who was very happy that Young had taken the Ambassador's job. Vance's insistence must have created considerable friction between himself and the President. In any case, Young resigned in the middle of August. It was clear that the contact he had made with the PLO was on his own initiative. It was the subsequent attempt at "cover-up" that made Vance angry.

The questions of contacts with the PLO kept being repeated throughout the Carter administration. There was some indirect relationship involving Vance, the Saudis and the PLO in 1977. Whenever the Israelis -- and Begin in particular -- suspected any U.S. relationships with the PLO, they would generate a flurry of press leaks and attacks. That put Carter always on the defensive, having to deny any such occurrences. He was very unhappy about this situation, as many of us were. It forced us back to a strict interpretation of "PLO contacts" commitment that Carter had promulgated early in his administration. The original commitment on this subject had been made by Kissinger to the Israelis in writing in connection with the second Israel-Egypt disengagement agreement of 1975. That agreement included a provision that the U.S. would have no negotiations with the PLO. At the time, that was not interpreted as preventing the U.S. from talking to the PLO, but Carter, upon taking office, had publicly interpreted the limitation to be much more severe. That, in the minds of many U.S. officials, became self-defeating; it would have been helpful to have at least the possibility of having conversations with the PLO.

But the PLO issue kept raising its head. It came up again later that year -- November, I think -- when Brzezinski, while in Algiers, accidentally met Arafat at a large diplomatic reception. They shook hands and a photograph was taken. It was barely a contact, but it set off a huge flurry of Israeli news reports and speculation that put Carter on the defensive again. Losing Andy Young over this issue embittered Carter. It was one of the issues that beginning in 1979 and spilling over into 1980 soured Carter's views of the Israelis and Begin particularly.

Our main contacts with the PLO were taking place in Beirut, through the CIA station there. There were also people in New York, working for non-profit organizations, who had very good contacts with the Palestinians. They also played a diplomatic role which was useful, but would have been disavowed had they become public.

By early Fall of 1979, the autonomy negotiations were essentially stalled. Jewish settlements were continuing to be developed on the West Bank and Gaza, giving rise to our continuing concern which had started almost immediately after Camp David, where the issue had never been resolved. There were also troubles in Lebanon and along the Israel-Lebanon border. That forced Strauss, in his trips to the area, to discuss Lebanon as well as the autonomy negotiations. An interesting dinner was held at the Israeli Embassy on September 18 in honor of Ezer Weizman, the Israeli Defense Minister, who was in Washington at the time. He was there to discuss co-production issues, especially opportunities to co-produce fighter aircraft in Israel. He also was in Washington to discuss other weapon acquisitions. Hal Saunders attended the dinner and was attacked by Weizman publicly in front of a number of journalists -- that was his modus operandi -- on the issue of Israel's bombing of Lebanon and the U.S.'s reaction. That was only one example of the increasing number of arguments that we were having with Israel about its conduct in the post-treaty period. We had anticipated a much smoother relationship after Camp David.

In October, Strauss stated that he was not at all certain that the autonomy negotiations could be completed by the following May, as had been planned. Shortly thereafter, Dayan resigned. Linowitz became the chief U.S. negotiator in November-December, 1979. That meant that for about six months the negotiations had really stalled. So when Linowitz started his work, he only had about five months left before the target date was to be reached. That is why I say that he really had his hands tied behind him when he took the assignment. Linowitz became very active in December; he held meetings all around the region. In Israel, he saw Begin and other Cabinet officials. He brought a lot of fresh ideas and energy with him. So there was a brief period of a couple of months when there was a spurt of hope that the negotiations might be successful. Linowitz was assisted primarily by two people: Ned Walker -- a very able young career officer, now our Ambassador in Cairo -- and a young lawyer, Andy Marks, from his law firm. Both were extremely able. In addition, he relied heavily on Jim Leonard, who was his deputy, on the staff left over from the Strauss days and on our two Ambassadors to Egypt and Israel and their staffs. He also worked closely with NEA. He fit very well into the bureaucratic framework. Having negotiated the Panama Canal treaty, Linowitz was very familiar with the Washington scene and how to navigate successfully between the White House and the State Department. He used his close connections with Carter very effectively, but he worked closely and well with Vance. The Secretary never felt threatened by Linowitz as he had by Strauss.

Despite Linowitz' infusion of new ideas and energy, time passed rapidly without any discernable movement. Many other events were taking place in other parts of the world -- the USSR was becoming a threat in Afghanistan, Iran was tottering and the Iranian "student" take-over of our Embassy triggered the hostage crisis which ran on throughout the rest of Carter's term. So Carter was preoccupied with many other issues. The urgency had in fact gone out of the autonomy negotiations, as far as the U.S. administration was concerned. Periodically, the Israelis would take some actions which would upset Carter -- new settlements, some Begin dyspeptic comments. Linowitz was working very hard trying to make progress, but he did not have the energetic support that Carter had given prior peace accord efforts. By Spring of 1980, the Iran hostage crisis became the critical issue and caused Vance's resignation.

We were rapidly approaching the May 26 target date. In early 1980, we were beginning to acknowledge that there was no chance of an agreement. Carter had finally agreed, after considerable discussion, that there was no alternative except to slog ahead, trying to get around the target date as best we could. An effort was being made in the Security Council, led by the Europeans, to amend UN Resolution 242. The question for us was whether we would veto that effort. That issue generated considerable argument within the administration. The President finally decided that we would veto any effort to amend 242 at Begin's insistence, although by this time, Carter had become very disenchanted with Begin. The latter had gone to Washington in mid-April; I went with him, as I normally did. That visit turned out to be a stand-off. Begin tabled four principles that had to be met if the autonomy talks were to proceed. Carter tried, against my advice, to finesse the whole issue; he wanted Linowitz to discuss these matters with Begin, although the principles were not to be confronted, but rather skirted. That enabled Begin to return to Jerusalem thinking that Carter had accepted his preconditions to further negotiations. Carter did get Begin's commitment to "continuous intensive negotiations over the next forty days" to try to narrow the existing differences on the autonomy agreement by May 26. That commitment fell by the wayside as soon as the Israeli party returned. There were about four or five days of negotiations, but when Begin's four preconditions became known to the Egyptians, they were furious. The talks began to disintegrate. Begin then withdrew them as preconditions, but they remained as principles. This was another illustration of Begin's very annoying, but brilliant negotiating tactics. He would make a major issue of a procedural point -- e.g., a "precondition" -- ; he would grudgingly retreat from the procedural point, but essentially not change the substantive nature of his approach. He would therefore, while taking credit for making a concession, not change his substantive position one iota. He used this ploy repeatedly and we were never able to cope with it diplomatically. Finally, the Israelis became serious during the discussions in Herzliyya at the end of April about one issue that had been Begin's fourth principle. That question concerned how Israeli security would be treated in the autonomy regime. Begin insisted that Israel had to have full responsibility for both external and internal security. Agreement was finally reached that there would be two ministerial level discussions, which turned out to be very explosive, largely as result of a massacre of a group of Yeshiva students that had just taken place in Hebron. There was a major uproar, as you can well imagine, in Israel. General Hassan Ali, who was leading the Egyptian delegation, chose the day of the funeral for the massacre victims to table the Egyptian plan. Weizman, Abrasha Tamir, Burg, Sharon and the rest of the Israeli delegation were amazed and dismayed by this poor timing. Weizman, as Minister of Defense, the chairman of the Israeli team, was statesmanlike and careful, but the Egyptians had presented their security formulation at the worst possible time. That episode was another illustration of how some discussions that might have looked even slightly promising immediately atrophied because of outside factors, the "devil in in the details", and lack of cultural empathy between Israelis and Egyptians.

The negotiating parties were preparing for another meeting when Sadat canceled it. That, among other things, led Sol Linowitz to send some very discouraging reports to Washington. Carter and Muskie, now the Secretary of State after Vance's resignation, decided to have a full review of the Arab-Israeli negotiations. I got a call on May 9 requesting me to return to Washington as soon as possible. Roy Atherton in Cairo received a similar call. On Sunday afternoon, I met with Hal Saunders, Mike Sterner -- his deputy for the negotiations -- David Korn -- the Director of the Office for Israel Affairs -- Roy Atherton, Linowitz and others. We reviewed a paper that had been drafted in NEA which was going to be discussed with the President on the following morning. The paper postulated essentially two options: a) try to overlook the target date and find some means to keep the negotiations going or; b) try to bring the negotiations to a head, forcing an agreement in the very near future. All of us believed that the second option was a non-starter. We all preferred option (a), but we believed that Carter really preferred option (b). That forced us to consider various formulations for implementing option (b).

On the Monday morning, we met for breakfast at 7:00 a.m. with Muskie and others. We then went to the White House and met in the Cabinet Room with the President, Mondale, Brzezinski, Jordan and Bob Hunter of the NSC staff. Muskie asked Roy and me to state our views on the options, in light of the potential reactions in Egypt and Israel. I made a flat prediction that we would be dealing with the Begin government for at least the rest of 1980, though Peres and Weizman had been trying to bring the government down and to force new elections. I said that any efforts that we might make to force an immediate agreement had absolutely no chance for success because Begin was not about to make the necessary concessions. U.S. pressure would probably strengthen Begin's political support. Atherton reported that Sadat was not interested in a show-down at the time; he wanted to continue the process in a deliberate way, awaiting a possible change of government in Israel. Muskie endorsed our analyses and took the position that option (a) was the only feasible approach. Carter was very unhappy; he wanted to try to force an agreement. Carter was concerned by a comment that Brzezinski had made, which was that we had to find some way to explain to the American public and the Europeans. Some one -- either Mondale or Muskie -- would have to give a speech explaining our position. It was clear that Muskie intended to give the speech. Muskie was very much in charge and I was very impressed with the command that the Secretary had of the situation, even though he had been in office only a month. He was quietly, but firmly, asserting his authority. He put Brzezinski back in his place on a couple of occasions when the National Security Advisor seemed to get off the track. I liked the way Muskie listened and asked the right questions; he came to sensible judgements. He was very self-confident in a very quiet and effective way with the President, which also was impressive.

This entire period was sheer torture for Carter. The hostage crisis worsened right after the deplorable Begin visit to Washington. Then came Vance's resignation over the hostage rescue mission. Muskie's selection was a brilliant choice which reestablished some confidence in the country in our foreign policy. I think that had Carter been re-elected, Muskie would have continued as Secretary and would have shaken up the Department. He was an excellent Secretary for the brief period he was in office and had he been given a chance, I think he would have been a very successful one over a longer period. I don't think he has received much historical credit for his stewardship, but he steadied the President and the administration in a very rough period.

I and my State Department colleagues had been very troubled that in the wake of Vance's resignation, Carter had made a few gratuitous remarks about Vance in public which were not called for. That was very petty, which reflected a negative side of Carter that was not pleasant. Those of us who knew Vance to be an extraordinarily able, hard-working, loyal, dedicated Secretary were upset by Carter's comments. Cy characteristically did not respond, but I think they really hurt him.

Eventually, the President made the right choice on the U.S. position on the autonomy talks. He endorsed a tactic that I had urged, which was to make clear to the Europeans that we would oppose any efforts to modify UN Resolution 242 as long as negotiations were still on-going. Any veto of an amended 242 at this time would have had grave consequences in the Arab world. Any change in the UN status quo would have derailed all of our efforts, both in the Arab world and in Israel. So keeping 242 as it was was very important if any progress was to be made in the negotiations. Carter finally agreed with that position, although by this time he was completely skeptical of any progress being made on autonomy talks. He was convinced that Begin was hopeless and no agreement acceptable to us or the Egyptians would ever be developed as long as Begin was in power. On the other hand, Carter's domestic political situation, which he understood well, prevented him from confronting Begin. So grudgingly, he agreed with us to just keep matters afloat; he left the Cabinet Room after the meeting very unhappy.

I made some notes during this meeting about Carter. He looked terribly old and tired. That was of course understandable in light of the events of the previous two weeks. At one point, we discussed the oft postponed visit of King Hussein to Washington. The King had been invited several times; he had accepted and then at the last minute, he regretted. So by this time Carter was pretty well fed up with the King. The darker side of Carter's personality came to the fore during a "stream of consciousness" diatribe during which he characterized Hussein as a three time back-stabber, a prostitute who took money from everybody, a worthless individual, etc. Everyone else around the table tried to make the point that Hussein remained very influential with the Palestinians; regardless of whether one liked the King, he had to be dealt with. Hussein was obviously distancing himself from the Camp David Accords, as the Jordanian and Arab politics dictated. Finally, Carter, after much muttering, agreed to allow Phil Habib, who happened to be in Amman at that moment, to probe whether His Majesty would entertain another invitation to Washington. Carter was reluctant to invite him again, fearing another last minute embarrassment if Hussein again did not show. Carter could not see the world through Hussein's eyes; he did not understand why it would be awkward for Hussein to come to Washington immediately following Begin and Sadat, under circumstances then existing. Hussein saw such a visit as just too politically dangerous. That meeting did not show Carter's best side.

Just before I left Washington to return to Tel Aviv, I had lunch with Sol Linowitz, who unburdened himself about Warren Christopher's ambivalence about remaining as Deputy Secretary -- after Carter had publicly chastised Vance. Muskie wanted Christopher to remain, but Carter's comments had shaken Christopher. So he was undecided, but ultimately stayed on. At that lunch, we also discussed what Muskie might do as the Department's senior manager. We agreed that he would probably make a lot of changes if he were still Secretary after the Presidential elections. We discussed some of the personnel changes that Muskie might make.

I had barely returned after the Washington review and the Presidential decisions to move along when Sadat pulled one of his classic double maneuvers. Carter had telephoned him after our policy review and was able to convince Sadat to say publicly that he was willing to continue negotiations, even after the target date of May 26. The day after making that statement, Sadat announced that he was so shocked by an action taken by the Israeli Knesset concerning Jerusalem that he had decided to suspend negotiations. In fact, Sadat overreacted to an erroneous press report from Israel which suggested that the Begin government had just passed a new law affirming that Jerusalem was Israel's capital. The ultimate outcome of this story became very destructive to the negotiations and other factors in the U.S.-Israel relationships.

The story went something like this. Ms. Geula Cohen, an old Begin side-kick now opposing his government, was very much opposed to the peace treaty and had voted against it in the Knesset when Begin submitted it for ratification, thereby breaking with her friend. She was always thereafter trying to find some way to sabotage the autonomy negotiations. She submitted a "private member" bill which asserted that Jerusalem, in its post 1967 boundaries, was Israel's sole and sovereign capital. That bill was totally unnecessary because in fact that claim had already been staked out in 1950. But she took this route to provoke her enemies. Both the Likud and the Labor leaders in Knesset tried to get her to withdraw her bill. She resisted. A "private member" bill has to be sent to a committee of the Knesset to be reviewed and judged. When the question of referring her bill to a committee arose, everyone had to vote in favor because no member of the Knesset, even Labor parliamentarians, could vote against considering a bill that dealt with Jerusalem without wishing to commit political suicide. Of course, everyone expected that "the fix" was on and that the bill would languish in committee. The bill was referred to the Law Committee, chaired by David Glass who belonged to the National Religious Party. He was a major "dove" and opposed the bill. He was opposed to anything that might interfere with the negotiations. So the vote to send the Cohen bill to his Committee was understood to be the way to kill it. No one expected the bill to come out of that Committee for years, if ever. Glass had in fact assured many people that this would happen. However, a distorted version of events was reported in the press, generating that strong Sadat reaction to suspend the negotiations. I suspect of course that Sadat used the Cohen bill fiasco as an excuse. At the time of this uproar, a conference of the Islamic League was being held in Islamabad. Egypt was certainly going to be denounced there in strong terms for its participation in the Camp David process and for making peace with Israel. I therefore felt that Sadat may well have seized the Cohen bill as an excuse to suspend the negotiations, distancing himself thereby from Israel and perhaps putting Egypt in a better light at the Islamabad conference. In any case, the whole affair became a big mess.

There was considerable diplomatic activity in an effort to get the autonomy agreement negotiations re-started. There was a shake-up in the Egyptian government. Mustafa Khalil resigned as Prime Minister; Hassan Ali was appointed as Foreign Minister. The new Foreign Minister told Roy Atherton that the Egyptians would continue the negotiations if they had assurances from the Israelis that the infamous Cohen bill would not be supported by the Begin government if it ever were reported out of Committee. Sadat sent Begin a long letter covering this and other issues (e.g., Sharon's drive to build more settlements on the West Bank, actions of a repressive nature that the Israelis were taking on the West Bank in the wake of the Hebron massacre, etc.), in very polite terms -- the matters that were making it difficult for the Egyptians to continue the negotiations. Sadat left it up to Begin to do what he could to improve the negotiating atmosphere.

Begin's response was essentially to point out that it was the Egyptians who had broken off the negotiations and therefore it was up to them to propose a way to re-start them. Begin took the same position in a letter to Carter. I talked to many people in and out of the Israeli government. I discussed the status of the negotiations with Shamir and Burg, but there wasn't much movement. Muskie, while in Europe, tried to get agreement from the French, the British and the Germans that they wouldn't pursue amending Resolution 242 in the Security Council, so that we would have maximum flexibility in pushing the negotiations. He did not get much satisfaction, particularly from the French, but all of the Europeans agreed to a temporary cessation of their UN initiative.

At about this time, Weizman resigned as Defense Minister. That was very sad because he had been the last strong voice in the Israeli autonomy talks team and in the Cabinet against Begin's hard line position. But Weizman had finally become disaffected and abandoned his hope to become Begin's chosen successor one day. Begin was fed up with him for all the arguments he was putting up and Weizman was fed up with Begin. The ostensible rationale for his resignation was that the defense budget was being cut -- the Israeli government was going through an economy drive. Weizman insisted that the defense budget be approved at the level he had requested; when it wasn't, he resigned. Begin didn't try to persuade him otherwise. The gap between the two had by this time become so sharp -- on such issues as the settlements, the West Bank policy in general, the autonomy talks -- that Weizman was not much of a factor in Cabinet discussions. I had a very nostalgic farewell meeting with him on a Friday afternoon, as he was packing his personal belongings in the office and writing his letter of resignation, an emotional attack on Begin which, of course, soon became public. The appointment of a replacement became a major issue. Sharon desperately wanted the job, but the Likud Liberals and the Democrat Party, which was a member of the coalition, were unalterably opposed to Sharon. Moshe Arens was a possibility, but Sharon was strongly opposed to that. Eventually, the issue was resolved by Begin keeping the defense portfolio for himself, following the precedent that Ben Gurion had started many years earlier. Begin stayed as Defense Minister for the remainder of that government's term, which was well over a year until the election of 1981. He would not have given Sharon the post even then if he could have avoided it because he was worried about having Sharon in that job; he didn't trust Sharon even then. However, after the 1981 election which Begin won by a whisker, Sharon threatened to pull the two or three Likud Knesset members that he controlled out of the coalition if he was not appointed as Defense Minister. That election had been almost a dead heat, forcing Begin to form a government with only a majority of one or two members in the Knesset. That made the Sharon people swing votes that Begin could not afford to lose and therefore he had to appoint him as Defense Minister.

But from May 1980 to July 1981, Begin served both as Prime Minister and Defense Minister. He spent about one day each week in Tel Aviv at the Defense Ministry. He was supported by a very able military assistant, General Poran, who had been in that position for several years starting when Peres was Defense Minister in Rabin's cabinet. He was a moderate, serious, thoughtful individual. He kept Begin fairly well advised about on-going matters in the Defense Ministry. But it was not a very satisfactory arrangement. Begin's lack of familiarity with defense issues made it very awkward. Begin loved to play the role of Defense Minister; he enjoyed presiding at meetings of the generals; that gave him a big kick. He did make a number of mistakes as Defense Minister because the job required full time attention that Begin could not give it, even if he had the necessary background. Nevertheless, it was better to have Begin as Defense Minister than Sharon as we all learned later before and during the Lebanon war. Weizman just decided to go into "exile" at home, hoping to be recalled at some stage, like de Gaulle.

Time passed; we did not manage to get the negotiations back on track for several weeks. In the meantime, the Cohen bill did not turn out to be as simple a matter as we had hoped, as I had been assured. As often happens in Israeli politics, the unexpected tends to dominate the headlines. The best plans of mice and men go astray. After Sadat had first suspended the negotiations, citing the Jerusalem problem, the issue became a major one in the Arab world and in the world press. That forced a lot of the world's public attention on Cohen's bill. It was discussed in the Security Council. That triggered a chain of events which ultimately produced a result 180% opposite of that desired by Sadat. In fact, the Committee had to discharge the bill and bring it to the floor, where it was passed, despite the sotto voce opposition of all of the Knesset members. I had been urging by phone, by cables -- that both Washington and Cairo not get embroiled publicly in the Jerusalem issue. I had hoped that Sadat would avoid it because public debate about the issue would not serve the cause of peace and certainly would derail the negotiations. Both the White House and the Department of State understood the problem, but Sadat had dramatized it, making it into a sort of Greek tragedy. No one could stop the furor. The Israeli government had no strategy for handling the debate. It had anticipated that putting it into Glass' Committee would be the end of Cohen's bill. The Labor Party dithered; it obviously opposed the bill, but didn't want to be perceived to be on the wrong side of the issue if a vote were to be taken. It couldn't afford to be against the law while the Likud supported it. Because the bill had been introduced and because Sadat had highlighted it, the Arab block then insisted on a full debate over the Jerusalem issue in the Security Council. The Arab countries also wanted a separate and full debate on the whole Middle East-Palestinian issue. After much debate, the U.S. delegation finally decided to veto any Security Council resolution that might call for the establishment of a Palestinian state. Our international legal position on Jerusalem, which we had held historically since 1948 and had postulated more often than any can remember, was that the Jerusalem issue was a matter for the parties in the dispute, who had to resolve the question themselves. Our position had always angered the Israelis even though we had stated it many, many times. Once the Jerusalem issue was raised in the Security Council, the U.S. government had to restate its historic position. By the end of July, a Jerusalem resolution had been introduced in the Security Council and a vote had been scheduled. The Arabs had drafted the resolution carefully to reflect the traditional U.S. position. That made it very difficult for us to veto it. I sent in several messages urging that we veto the resolution in order to defend the Camp David process; I thought that nothing should pass which would undermine that process.

My position was reinforced by the White House political operatives who saw Carter's re-election campaign already in deep trouble with Jewish voters. They also argued in favor of a veto; the State Department was torn, to put it mildly. As so often happens, the suicidal instincts of Israeli domestic politics surfaced and won the day. I learned later that Carter was in the Cabinet Room on Monday morning, July 28, 1980 agonizing with Muskie and other advisors on how the U.S. would vote in the Security Council. The practical choices were a) veto or b) abstain. At that very time, David Glass folded after very effective demagoguery by Ms. Cohen. He allowed his Committee to vote whether to bring the bill to the floor of the Knesset for a first reading. He later explained to me that he thought he had enough votes (8 against vs 6) in the Committee to favor his plan which was to hold extensive hearings and thereby delay any action for several months. But he miscounted the votes and lost a procedural vote in the Committee by 8-7. The Labor Party members, having lost on that vote, then switched sides and voted to bring the bill to the floor. Two members that Glass had counted on -- a Liberal, and a very dovish member now a leader of the Meretz Party -- were not present for inexplicable reasons. They would have voted with Glass, but Glass obviously was a very inept chairman. He couldn't control his own Committee's agenda. He was under considerable pressure from the religious parties not to be perceived as "soft" on Jerusalem; that was an important factor politically for him. So on that Monday morning, a UPI ticker story was handed to Carter while he was deliberating the U.S. position; that report stated that the bill had just been sent by the Committee to the floor of Knesset. One of the participants in the Cabinet meeting told me that the ticker story hit the table with a loud thud and the debate stopped. Carter immediately saw that there was no way that the bill would not be approved by the Knesset; my arguments thereafter fell on deaf ears because its assumption was that the bill could be kept in Committee if the U.S. would veto the resolution. So Carter approved a U.S. abstention in the Security Council.

Our abstention in the Security Council gave rise to another series of events which increased the difficulties in restarting autonomy negotiations. A little later in September, Sol Linowitz achieved an extraordinary success. He persuaded Sadat to agree to a vague joint statement to the effect that negotiations would resume, that a summit would be held between them at a time and place to be agreed upon later. That statement was well received in the White House. Carter heard about it by phone from Linowitz a couple of hours before Reagan was to appear before the B'nai B'rith conference. He had the news put out publicly, slightly upstaging Reagan. That raised Linowitz' stock with the political operatives in the White House. The three days that Linowitz had spent in Jerusalem and Cairo were a tour de force. I later wrote that he had been both sympathetic, tough, and long suffering. He took the worst that Begin could dish out and then in return shook Begin up. He used background sessions with Israeli editors and American correspondents very skillfully. He gave the Israeli negotiation team a real earful about what they were risking. Linowitz' performance in Israel was very skilled and he was ably supported by Ned Walker and Andy Marks.

I thought the matter would rock along relatively smoothly until after the U.S. elections, after which I hoped that negotiations would be restarted. But during August, U.S.-Israeli relations had sagged badly. The UN resolution, in which we abstained, not only condemned Israel for its actions in Jerusalem, but called on all countries to remove their Embassies from that city. Beyond that, it generally expressed the historical U.S. position. The fact that the U.S. allowed that resolution to be adopted was not well received in Israel to put it mildly. Across the political spectrum, the Israelis resented our position. Within a few weeks of the passage of the resolution, eleven Embassies, out of thirteen, had moved from Jerusalem to Tel Aviv. That included the Dutch who had been the first to open an Embassy in Jerusalem. The net effect of the Jerusalem controversy, which Begin had tried to use to bolster his own domestic political support, resulted in isolating Israel internationally. That was a totally unnecessary outcome. The deputies that had voted in favor of the Cohen bill then began to comment that they really had been against it all along. I noted at the time that there was never any greater accuracy to the old Kissinger adage that "Israel had no foreign policy; it only has domestic politics".

The White House and the State Department were furious with Begin, but they could not express their frustrations publicly because of the Presidential campaign which was going badly for Carter. The Jewish vote in New York was absolutely crucial if he had any hopes of re-election. In August-September, Reagan and Carter were running neck-in-neck. The whole series of events surrounding the Jerusalem tempest convinced me that if Carter were re-elected and as long as Begin remained as Prime Minister, it would be very difficult to have a useful U.S.-Israel relationship. A summit meeting was being planned for November; if Carter had won re-election, it would have been a very difficult meeting for the Israelis because I was sure that Carter would have read the riot act to them. I also thought that if this scenario were to develop, Begin would relish standing up to American pressures because that would have helped boost his domestic political support which he needed for the 1981 Israeli elections. In early September, I was predicting that the following ten months would be a very rough period for Israeli-U.S. relations. Of course, Carter lost to Reagan.

I wrote some notes on November 16, 1980 right after the final Carter-Begin meeting. I reflected on the beauty of Washington as a city, the mood of the city now that a transition in the White House had been ordained by the American public, the significance of the departure of such Senate stalwarts as Church, McGovern, Bayh, Stone, Javits, Ribicoff, Talmadge, Magnuson and others. I also speculated about who might be included in a Reagan administration. Shultz and Haig were the front runners for the position of Secretary of State. As it turned out, it was Haig first to be followed by Shultz eighteen months later.

My ostensible purpose for returning to Washington in mid-November was to accompany Begin for his last meeting with Carter -- the tenth. First I went to New York to meet Begin upon his arrival. I sat on the dais at a black tie dinner celebrating Jabotinski's 100th birthday. He was the political leader who competed with Weizman for the leadership of the world Zionist movement. We are now talking about the '20s and 30's when he led the "Revisionist" wing movement of the movement. It was a great event for Begin, who always described himself as an apostle of Jabotinski and also had tried to model himself after him. Begin had written a very long speech for the occasion. He told me that it was only one of three speeches that he had ever written personally. I had only heard him previously speaking from notes. But this occasion was so important to him that he wrote out the speech in full text. It turned out to be deadly dull -- no punch; it put a lot of people to sleep during the hour that it took to deliver. It was the worst speech I ever heard Begin give and I attribute that to the fact that he had written it out. There were 3,000 people at the dinner in the huge Waldorf Astoria Hotel ballroom, each paying $500 for a seat. All of us had to sit from 6:30 p.m. until 10:00 p.m.(!) listening to various speeches from Jewish leaders and Begin. Then, and only then, was dinner served. Begin -- wisely as it turned out -- wanted to speak before dinner. That meant that all the other speakers had to precede him. There were dozens of people on the dais, all of whom had to be recognized and many of whom had to say something. I was sitting right next to Begin, facing the huge audience. Cameras and lights were whirring away. The only food on the table were some olives and a little bit of cantaloupe which I devoured quickly. Sometime during Begin's speech, I dropped off to sleep. The long trip, jet lag, no food finally caught up to me. I am sure that I appear in some photographs napping away right next to the principal speaker, who had characterized his remarks as the most important in his life. I don't know whether Begin noticed; at least he never mentioned it, but a lot of other people did.

After this difficult evening, we flew to Washington, where I attended the last of the Begin arrival ceremonies. I had persuaded Muskie that he should come personally to the airport to greet Begin; he normally would not have done that. I was concerned that unless the Secretary was there, the Israeli press would be writing stories about the Carter administration being so angry at the minimal support it had received in the election from the American Jewish community that it had snubbed Begin. Muskie weighed my arguments and did go to the airport; I think it was the appropriate gesture. That night, I attended a reception at Ambassador Evron's house -- I think there were more press and Secret Service agents than guests -- a sad affair. The next morning, we met at the White House. I went in the motorcade with the Israeli delegation because often the American Ambassador plays the role of "meeter and greeter" for such official occasions. As was the practice, I went to the hotel to meet Begin and to escort him to the White House. The other members of the American delegation went to the White House directly. As we walked past the Rose Garden through the South Lawn into the President's residential quarters, there we saw Carter grinning ear to ear, all teeth. He put on a fantastic show of good humor and friendship. He very graciously took Begin into the Oval Office for a one-on-one meeting for about forty minutes. The other members of the American and Israeli delegations sat in the Cabinet Room talking with each other. Brzezinski was very subdued; Jody Powell was very quiet, looking very sad. Linowitz and Muskie were very quiet. The Israelis seemed nervous. Ambassador Evron was worrying about his own press problems; he was in some difficulties with some Cabinet officers over some alleged slights he was supposed to have made toward some Republicans during the campaign. He also had been unable to arrange for a meeting between Reagan and Begin on this trip. Fortunately, both Begin and Foreign Minister Shamir soon confirmed that Evron would remain as Israeli Ambassador.

Carter and Begin came to the Cabinet Room for a further meeting that lasted about twenty minutes. There were some ceremonial exchanges around the table, with reference to some of their achievements like Camp David. Muskie made some gracious comments about both Carter and Begin. The only substantive comments were actually made by Linowitz. Both Carter and Begin had mentioned that they hoped that the autonomy talks would begin again soon and be completed. Muskie suggested that a joint summary document be drafted. Both Carter and Begin reluctantly agreed, but it was actually intended to provide the remaining members of the peace team -- Ned Walker et al -- something to work on during the transition. In fact, we could not reach agreement on such a document. Instead, Linowitz and his staff drafted their own summary which the U.S. made public. Linowitz concluded that in fact 80% of the issues had been resolved in the autonomy negotiations; he detailed the matters that had been agreed upon. He somewhat exaggerated the degree of achievement. The percentage may have been technically correct, but all the really difficult issues remained unresolved so that the toughest work remained. He urged that the new administration make a concerted effort to conclude them.

After the White House meeting, Carter and Begin met the press on the driveway. Both made warm valedictory statements. Begin was very eloquent in expressing his admiration for the way Carter was accepting the will of the American people and what that said for the strength of democracy. Then they shook hands for the last time. Carter stood with what I thought were a couple of tears in his eyes, waving goodbye to the Israeli delegation. The Camp David hopes remained unfulfilled. The Americans went back into the West Wing and I talked to the President for about five minutes. I again noticed how visibly worn out he was. His mask had dropped off. He had handled himself with great dignity which was even more impressive because we all knew how bitter he was. He really blamed Begin for his defeat. To this day, Carter is convinced that Begin was responsible for his loss of Jewish support, starting with the primary defeat in New York by Ted Kennedy and then the election. During our conversation he was both bitter and calm. He regretted that all of his peace making efforts -- Camp David and its aftermath, non-proliferation, Panama Canal -- had brought him nothing but political grief. He was convinced that he had been beaten because he had done the right thing. He was very kind in his comments about my work and contributions. I was pleased that I had been able to make some contribution to the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty, which was an enormous achievement.

He also told me that during the private meeting he had been very blunt with Begin. He hadn't seen any reason to hold back. He described for Begin clearly the disastrous consequences if the Knesset were to adopt any legislation annexing the Golan Heights, because it would destroy Resolution 242 and the peace process (NOTE: that is exactly what Begin did a year later in 1981.) Carter said that Begin had listened carefully, but didn't respond. Carter said that he had also gotten Begin's agreement not to send any military equipment to Iran until our hostages had been safely returned; and even then, he wanted the Israelis to consult with us before any shipment occurred. (NOTE: that issue was key to the Iran-gate crisis three years later.) As usual, Lebanon did not arise during the meeting between the two principals. Carter never liked to take on more issues than he had to. Even though Lebanon should have been discussed, Carter decided that it would not have served any useful purpose. At the end of my session with the President, I was impressed with his show of dignity throughout what must have been a very trying experience.

Linowitz agreed with my assessment that Carter blamed Begin for not having quietly passed the word to the American Jewish community that Carter was a true friend of Israel, which he indeed was. I noted at the time that I thought that Begin was genuinely sympathetic towards Carter during the campaign. I believed that the poor perception that the American Jewish community had of Carter came at the instigation of others in Israel -- not Begin. Later, however, I learned from conversation with some of Begin's close advisors that he had indeed concluded -- long before the election -- that Carter had outlived his usefulness. He secretly hoped for a Reagan victory because he viewed him as being more understanding and sympathetic of Israel. Begin undoubtedly felt that he and Carter had had too many disagreements by 1980. Whether Begin's personal views were communicated to the American Jewish community and therefore influenced the outcome, I don't know. But it was clear that that community in 1980 had come to the conclusion that although Carter had accomplished much at Camp David, he had expressed some very negative views about Israel subsequently and therefore was probably not worth their trust. There is no doubt that the Jewish vote swung heavily toward the Republicans, which was certainly a factor in a moderately close election.

I should note one other interesting aspect of that last Begin-Carter meeting. Up to the day before they met, Carter was toying with the idea of a summit meeting with Sadat and Begin. He had hoped thereby to conclude the autonomy negotiations and cap his foreign policy stewardship with a singular achievement. He tried to ignore that as a "lame duck" he had no leverage over the other two to persuade them to make any concessions. Muskie had somewhere gotten the notion that Begin wanted a summit and in order to achieve that, might be willing to make some major concessions to make a successful meeting.

Before returning to Tel Aviv, I spent considerable time discussing Lebanon with Roy Atherton, our Ambassador to Egypt, Nick Veliotis, our Ambassador to Jordan, Talcott Seelye, our Ambassador to Syria and John Gunther Dean, our Ambassador to Lebanon. It was a sort of small Chiefs of Mission conference at the end of the Carter administration. We were trying to develop recommendations for the new administration. We, as usual, disagreed sharply about Lebanon, especially Dean and me. Warren Christopher had attended one of the meetings that Muskie had held with the six of us. Dean and Seelye argued that the PLO was the essential interlocutor for the administration. They felt that an American administration had to deal with that group if it were to prevent a disaster. Christopher noted sarcastically that if he had just come from Mars, he would have assumed that Carter had been firmly opposed to negotiations involving the Palestinians and that Reagan had been saying that the negotiations with the PLO should be started! That was another indicator of Carter's frustrations of not being able to deal with the PLO; he felt that his hands were tied by domestic political considerations and by precedent and prior commitments. We all agreed that nothing further could be done about negotiations until after the Israeli elections which were to be held in June, 1981. We believed that if Peres won, the chances of bringing the negotiations to a successful conclusion would be more promising. But in the meantime, there was nothing to do, but hope that no new major barrier would arise and try to educate the new administration.

We did not agree with Linowitz' argument that negotiations could be resumed immediately in January and could be brought to a successful conclusion soon thereafter. We saw that Begin was too firmly planted and could not or would not move during a pre-election period. John Dean was concerned that a hiatus of a year might bring greater instability in Lebanon that he thought might only be prevented by contacts with the PLO. Seelye tended to support that thesis, although he had to admit that the Syrians were not in any position to cause much mischief for the next year. Furthermore, he also thought that the PLO was in such disarray that perhaps the U.S. position might not be too damaging to overall stability in the region. We five Ambassadors had many disagreements about strategy and tactics. Seelye particularly pushed relentlessly the thesis that until the U.S. brought the PLO into the negotiations, there would be no way to achieve a comprehensive settlement. He voiced concern that the Saudis, under PLO blackmail, might return to an oil embargo. John West, our Ambassador to Saudi Arabia, argued that the Saudis were at that moment at the point of using the oil weapon because they were so frustrated about U.S. reluctance to sell them advanced fighter aircraft and other issues. He also argued in favor of a U.S. dialogue with the PLO partly to keep the Saudis from doing anything rash. I disagreed with that position as well as Dean's views of Lebanon. He and I argued frequently and vehemently about the state of that country, all during our tenures as Ambassadors. Dean detested Bashir Gemayel and he tried to ignore the Phalange as much as possible. He always tried to find ways to force the Israelis to withdraw their support from Gemayel and to clamp down on Major Haddad in the south on the assumption that would have some undefinable positive impact in Beirut. We never managed to agree about very much.

At this point in my career, I didn't have any idea about my future. I assumed that I would be replaced in Israel, as customarily happens with a change in administrations. A number of people asked me about my wishes and I told all of them that I would like to stay on in Israel for at least a couple of years more. I thought that the Camp David process was only half completed and I wanted to see what further progress we could make before leaving. There was no other position that I was really interested in. I had decided that I would retire if my appointment as Ambassador to Israel were terminated. In fact, I did retire from the Foreign Service in January, 1981 when, just having turned fifty with more than twenty-five years of service, I became eligible. But I remained Ambassador as a Presidential appointee for the rest of my tenure in Israel to 1985.

In fact, Haig decided -- very wisely, I thought -- to keep on all the professional Ambassadors to Middle East countries. That enabled the new administration to maintain some continuity in policy in that region. As it turned out, I stayed the longest, all the way through the first term of the Reagan administration. That Haig decision was unusual, but he was a professional himself and understood the benefits of maintaining continuity. I think he has been somewhat maligned as Secretary of State; he was a better Secretary than he has been credited.

Q: We have now reached the end of the Carter Administration. Ambassadors Strauss and Linowitz had worked on the autonomy negotiations, which had been agreed to at Camp David. What happened next?

LEWIS: At that stage of the game, it was Ambassador Linowitz' view that we had managed to get resolved about eighty percent of the outstanding issues between the Egyptians and the Israelis. He strongly urged the new administration -- President Reagan and Secretary Haig -- to become immediately involved in the negotiations and to appoint a new U.S. negotiator so that the momentum leading to an agreement would not be lost. He thought that the arrangements could be completed in a relatively short time. As a matter of fact, Linowitz wrote a long report for Carter to pass to Reagan in which he went into great detail on the state of the key issues, what we had done to mediate them and the road-blocks still facing the negotiators. That report was passed to the Reagan team, but for a variety of reasons it was not placed high on the agenda by the new team. More than six months had expired before the new administration turned to the Camp David follow-on process; they tried to resuscitate it, but by that time too much water had gone over the dam and the process lay fallow for many months. (Though what follows gets ahead of the chronology, it's relevant to the fate of the autonomy negotiations.)

In 1984, not too many months before I left Israel, I was asked by the "Dayan Center for Near East and African Studies" at Tel Aviv University to participate in a day-long symposium on the aftermath of the peace treaty with Egypt. I was asked to give a lecture on why the autonomy negotiations had failed. I did that, resulting in some unintended political flack. Right after my lecture, I was due to race from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem to participate in a diplomatic ceremony -- by this time, I had become the Dean of the Diplomatic Corps. The Tel Aviv University conference took place on Columbus Day -- the "Day of the Americas" as it is called in Latin America. Israel's President Chaim Herzog was holding his traditional reception at Beit Hanassi, his official residence in Jerusalem, for all Western Hemisphere Ambassadors, including the Canadian and myself. Since I was the Dean, it was particularly important that I be present. So I rushed through the last part of my speech so that I could leave for Jerusalem as quickly as possible. I unfortunately arrived at the Herzog residence about one-half hour late, to be met by a very steely gaze from the President as I tried to creep into my rostrum seat. He didn't of course know why I was late and although I tried to explain afterwards, he did not take it at all well. We were good friends and he finally got over my faux pas, but he always had been someone who stressed form and formality. It was an unfortunate result of my lecture. But not the most unfortunate.

As I was rushing through the last part of my lecture on why the autonomy negotiations had failed, I was trying to make a dramatic point, as many speakers will do, particularly if they are speaking extemporaneously, by trying to find a catchy phrase. I was trying to end my discussion with some comments about the Reagan initiative of September 1, 1982 which was the last gasp in the process. I said: "The Reagan initiative was a genuine effort to re-create momentum, to re-launch the Camp David Agreement with some embellishments, but fundamentally on the same terms. Unfortunately, the timing was, in my judgement, abysmal; the tactics of its presentation, worse; and the outcome, so far, nil". Then I finished the rest of the speech. There was an AP journalist in the audience who filed a story that night which was headlined: "American Ambassador Attacks Reagan". This came out one week before the November, 1984 election. I had never even thought about that possible political connection! Also, as I was planning to retire the next spring after 8 years, I had become more casual about my public statements -- though I always made clear on such occasions that my remarks were purely personal, non-official, "analytical" views. The NEW YORK TIMES correspondent -- Tom Friedman -- who was a friend of mine and is now widely known to the public and in journalistic circles, had not covered my speech. His editor telephoned him at 2 a.m. from New York and asked him what the story of my attacking Reagan was all about. The editor wanted to know where Friedman's story on this issue was. Tom, of course, didn't know anything about it. So the editor explained that I had been giving a lecture and AP had carried a story about it. So Friedman dashed around and filed a story, based on his interviews with a couple of people who had been there. The next day, I received a phone call from the White House which was, to say the least, chilly. I quickly sent in a cable with the full text of the transcript, which we made from a recording that had been made of my lecture. When the phrase was seen in its full context, it clearly was not quite what it sounded like on the AP ticker. Nevertheless, I got word from Secretary Shultz' office that my words had created a stir and that there was some thought in the White House that my tour of duty might be shortened from the June, 1985 target date which I had planned on. In addition to cabling in the transcript, I explained the circumstances and I also wrote a letter to President Reagan, which I sent to Shultz, with a request to the Secretary that if he thought it was necessary or useful that my letter be passed to the President with an explanation of the circumstances. Shultz did pass the letter to the President. Later, I got a gracious letter in reply from the President telling me not to worry about the episode. But there were several days after my lecture that could have been devoted to packing! That is another side of the diplomatic business. You should never forget that anything you say can end up on the front pages somewhere!

I mentioned earlier that, after his re-election defeat, Carter received Begin one last time in the White House. I should add one foot-note to the history of the 1980 campaign. The Israeli Minister of Defense, Ezer Weizman, who was a great admirer of Jimmy Carter because of the latter's role in Camp David and because he liked Carter whom he felt had been a good advocate for Israel and peace, happened to have been in the United States in October, 1980, the last month of the presidential election campaign. Weizman went to see Carter and was asked by the President to join him on one of his election trips. This got a lot of publicity in Israel. Begin was quite upset by this alleged Weizman intervention in the American democratic process, as he put it. The Israeli view in general of Carter at this point was very ambiguous; he had been an extraordinary achiever at Camp David, but the last two years of his administration had been filled with enough elements of irritation between Carter and Begin, particularly on the settlements issue, that a sour taste had been left in the mouths of some Israelis. And we now know from good Israeli sources that Begin himself strongly hoped for a Reagan victory. In the Spring of 1980, during the primary campaign, just as New Yorkers were about to vote and sew up for Carter the nomination, a resolution on Israeli settlements, which intra alia called for the removal of all Jewish "settlements" in East Jerusalem, was tabled in the UN Security Council. Unfortunately, the State Department and our UN Representative voted in a fashion which allowed it to pass -- though Carter had given instructions to get all references to Jerusalem removed, or else cast our veto. There had been a communications breakdown between Carter and Vance and the UN Mission. The next day Carter tried to have the vote changed when he realized what had happened, but that cannot be done a day after a vote. The issue is one that is very sensitive in Israel, and for American Jews. Vance took the blame for the mistake, but then supported the U.S. vote when he testified later in Congress. Carter's day-late efforts to change our vote gave a public perception of vacillation; all these events gave Carter's Jewish supporters in New York considerable pause. Senator Kennedy, who was running against Carter, exploited the mix-up, won the New York primary, and thereby forced the President to battle through several more primaries in order to win the nomination. Had he won New York, the later primaries would not have been significant. Kennedy had used the UN vote to point out Carter's allegedly negative view towards Israel effectively and was able to beat Carter in New York. Carter never forgot that episode; in fact, his advisers ultimately blamed the New York Jews and Israel for his defeat, because both the President and his staff felt that had he won New York, then he would have had more time to prepare for and use his financial resources for the campaign against Reagan instead of having attention focused on more primaries. It also gave him the image of being a divisive figure in his own party.

Q: Who was the U.S. representative at the U.N. who cast the vote?

LEWIS: It was Don McHenry, but he was not really responsible. The failure was one of communications between the New York Mission and Vance and the White House. The resolution had been under negotiation for several days. It referred to Jerusalem as "occupied Arab territory". Carter had apparently given instructions that we would veto the resolution unless all references to Jerusalem were deleted. Somehow that instruction did not get relayed accurately to the Mission and in the final language negotiations, we accepted a phrase that did contain a Jerusalem formulation. That of course raised the hackles of the Israelis. Vance had authorized the vote. When Carter found out about it and with the Israeli eruption, he felt that his instructions had not been followed properly and he instructed the State Department to change the U.S. vote. Vance was called to testify the following week before a Congressional Committee and, although a loyal soldier, he essentially left the impression that he still thought that the language of the resolution was correct. Incidentally, this was one of the last events of Secretary Vance's tenure before the failed Iran rescue operation took place which led to his resignation. The U.N. incident undoubtedly helped to put Vance in a frame of mind that led to his resignation over the Iran rescue mission.

Begin and Carter met in Washington on November 13, 1980 -- right after the elections. It was a very bitter-sweet meeting -- polite and friendly on the surface, but Carter was seething on the inside. He still believed that Begin had gone back on his word on the settlements issue after Camp David and that he had been intransigent on many other issues as well. That was in addition to Carter's view that the U.N. resolution affair and Israel had somehow led to his defeat. So there were tension, but it was an extraordinarily graceful meeting because Carter put on a good front and behaved impeccably despite his private bitter views.

The new administration would have been expected to change Ambassadors in Tel Aviv, even though I was a career officer. I had always assumed that if Carter were defeated, I would be replaced. So after the election, I began to make plans to leave. It would have been a very sad time to leave because I felt that although there was still a lot of work ahead, there was a reasonable possibility of finishing the Camp David process and carry out the West Bank autonomy arrangements. I was so caught up and was so committed to the peace process that I hated to think about leaving at that moment. At some stage of the game, I wrote the customary letter of resignation which is submitted by every Ambassador to a new President. Those letters are usually written after a general request is sent from the State Department to all chiefs of mission. The President then has a free hand to accept or reject the letters. I tried to convey in my letter the feeling that if the new administration wished to have me continue, I would be delighted to do so. I also tried to explain why I felt that way. Only in late January did it became clear that would happen. So the period between November and January was suspenseful; I continued to conduct business, but I was far removed from Washington where the new administration was putting its team together. I knew some of the important figures in the new administration. Ambassador Robert Neumann, now with the Center for Strategic International Studies, was close to Dick Allen, who was to become the National Security Advisor, and to others in the new team, was asked to head the State Department's Transition Team. He had been our Ambassador in Afghanistan and I had been his deputy there for three years. I thought that might be helpful. As it turned out, he did not head the Transition Team very long because Haig, when he was named Secretary of State, had a clash with Neumann and disbanded the Transition Team. So Neumann's influence was not very great.

Q: Did you know or hear of any people who were anxious to become U.S. Ambassador to Israel?

LEWIS: As a matter of fact, I did hear of some. Whenever the Tel Aviv job becomes vacant, there are quite a few candidates, mostly self-anointed. I don't remember who the candidates to replace me were, but I remember that a couple of Jewish Congressmen were interested in the job. But as soon as Haig was well ensconced in the Department, and that could have been even in December, 1980, but certainly before the middle of January, 1981, I got the word informally that Haig had concluded that he would keep in place several career ambassadors in the Middle East including me. It so happened that a pretty good team of professionals was then in place in the area and the Secretary decided to keep it all intact. He nominated Nick Veliotis as the Assistant Secretary for the Near East. Nick and I had started out in Italy together in 1954 and he was one of my oldest friends in the Foreign Service. So I felt very comfortable with Haig's decisions and I thought that a good Middle East team had been put together.

Henry Kissinger was one of the visitors to Israel during this period between the President's election and assumption of office. He arrived in Israel with his wife Nancy on January 3, 1981. The Israelis assumed that this was a sort of reconnaissance visit for Reagan. I doubt whether the President-elect viewed it in that light, since Kissinger was hardly ever consulted by him. But Kissinger was close to Al Haig who had been his deputy at the NSC a few years earlier. He may well have visited to take the Israelis' temperature on behalf of Haig and Reagan. I took him around to some interesting meetings. I had worked for Kissinger when he was the Secretary and I was the Deputy Director of the Policy Planning staff. He had mellowed slightly since that time, but not enormously.

I thought that Haig's decision to keep the Middle East team in place was a very good one. It made a lot of sense. Unfortunately though, the new administration decided not to take up Camp David as one of its major foreign policy threads. That is understandable; very few administrations are enthusiastic about the achievements of their predecessors. Even the phrase "Camp David" was rarely used by the new administration. There were other concerns that were much more important which explain why Reagan and Haig shied away from getting back into the negotiating process at an early date. In the first place, the Begin government was at that time in a sort of low ebb. Begin himself did not appear to be very energetic. Relations between the Israelis and the Egyptians had gotten quite frosty; there had been a prolonged period without further negotiating meetings on the autonomy issues. Carter had left the White House and the Israelis' priority turned to getting on good terms with the new administration and to solidifying their position in Washington before re-entering the negotiations with Egypt. The Israelis therefore were not too interested in moving very fast. Shamir, who was then the Foreign Minister -- he succeeded Dayan in 1979 -- went to Washington and met with both Reagan and Haig. This was during the week of February 20, 1981. Later on, Haig visited the area to become better re-acquainted with the region. During Shamir's visit, he evidently gave a pretty clear message that the Israelis were not in any hurry to resume the autonomy negotiations. In April, Haig came to the Middle East, starting in Cairo and then he came to Jerusalem. While in Cairo, I understood that he sounded out Sadat about re-starting the autonomy negotiations. Sadat apparently gave the idea a very cool reception.

By the time of Haig's visit, it was only one year before final Israeli withdrawal from Sinai was scheduled, according to the peace treaty. That was Sadat's preoccupation. He wanted to make sure that nothing interfered with that withdrawal. When Haig subsequently met with Begin, he sensed the same lack of priority for the autonomy talks. Moreover, tensions were building up on the northern border with Palestinian forays from Lebanon into Israel. On March 7, there was a very dramatic incursion; two Palestinians using motorized hang-gliders crossed over the Lebanon-Israel border in an effort to attack Jewish communities. Both were captured, but it was a dramatic illustration of Palestinian efforts to penetrate the border. The atmosphere in the North was getting increasingly tense, given the mixture of Lebanese Christians, Israelis and Palestinians occupying a small geographical area, along with the UN peacekeepers of UNIFIL. There were a lot of discussions, as we later learned, between the Maronite Christians militia leaders and the Israelis behind the scenes. These ultimately led to a de facto alliance that led to a war the following year. During the first half of 1981, the Lebanese Christians were provoking both the Syrians and their Muslim countrymen; they were expanding their territorial jurisdiction right under the noses of the Syrians who even then were deployed in eastern Lebanon. This situation was of far greater concern to Israel than the peace process, which had sunk to a pretty low ebb. By the time Haig left Jerusalem that April, it was clear to him that there wasn't going to be any early opportunity to re-start the negotiations and that neither the Israelis nor the Egyptians were eager for the prospect. The Israeli lack of interest was only reinforced by the rising tensions on the Lebanon border, which preoccupied them and us for several months.

During Haig's visit, on April 5 he met for the first time with the whole Israeli Cabinet. First Haig and I met with Begin in his small private office, which was standard practice. In the meantime, the Cabinet was assembling in a conference room next door. This room is identical to the Cabinet room which is right above it. That meeting was fascinating; Haig gave the whole Israeli Cabinet the philosophy of the new Reagan administration. The Secretary was very sympathetic to Israel; he had greatly admired its military forces and had many Israeli friends from his previous government services. So he was regarded very sympathetically in Israel. Moreover, the new administration had begun with a view of the Middle East quite different from Carter. It saw the region almost exclusively through Cold War lenses. So while concerned about the Israeli-Arab problem, it viewed that situation as essentially a side show; Israel was our ally while many Arab countries were allied with the Soviets. Carter had addressed the conflict as a sui generis problem which was only in small part influenced by the USSR-US competition. Certainly, in the early part of the Reagan administration, the President and the Secretary and others viewed the Middle East through an entirely different set of prisms. Syria was clearly seen as a Soviet ally or satellite. That influenced U.S. views on Lebanon and the Syrian role in that country and led Haig to view the Lebanese situation in the same way that Begin did. They both saw bad Syria beating up on the poor downtrodden Maronite Christians, with the Soviet Union in the background trying to humiliate Israel, a U.S. ally. Haig, during his visit, said publicly in a press conference that a strong Israel could play a strong role against the threat of the Soviet Union and its many surrogates. That was music to Begin's ears; he saw the Reagan administration as the kind of U.S. administration that Israel had been seeking for a long time. It did not regard Israel just as a bother or a ward or a client, but it viewed Israel as a genuine ally against the Soviet threat. Begin saw the Soviet threat in the same way.

Haig also said publicly on that visit something about Lebanon which clearly put the U.S. and Israel in the same corner along with the Maronite Christians. Only a few days before his comment was made, some Christian militia forces were trying to build a road from Zahlah in central Lebanon to other Maronite areas, which would have encircled some Syrian forces. Syria reacted rather strongly against this plan; that was the beginning of escalating encounters between the Maronite Christians and the Syrians which took place over the next several months. These conflicts increasingly sucked in the U.S. administration as a mediator; it also deeply engaged the U.S. with the Israelis and the Lebanese Christians. Haig said, while in Jerusalem, that the U.S. viewed as unacceptable by any international standards the brutality used by the Syrians on the Maronite enclaves. In his private meetings, Haig was even stronger in agreeing with the Israelis about the Syrian threat. Haig had visited the region to obtain first hand information on the status of the autonomy negotiations and to establish relationships with the governments of the area. At the same time, the administration had decided and so announced a few days later, on April 21, to submit to Congress for approval an arms sales package to Saudi Arabia, which included five AWACs and some auxiliary fuel tanks for F-15s which had been sold a few years earlier -- in contradiction to the assurances provided to Israel at the time of the original sale that fuel tanks would not be sold. The fuel tanks gave the F-15s a much greater range. The decision to proceed with this large sale to the Saudis had been made during the Carter administration; after the election, members of the Carter administration mentioned to their successors that the arms sales package would be difficult to get through Congress because of Israel's opposition and volunteered to send it then to Congress and take the onus, allowing the new administration to start with a clean slate. It was a rather gracious thing to do under the circumstances. But the Reagan team declined the offer and said they would look at it after it had taken office. When the new administration did take office, it found that a commitment to submit the sales package to Congress had been made to Saudis. The new team felt that its relationships to Israel were good enough that the Saudi package would be approved without too much opposition and therefore decided to proceed with the Congressional process. So Haig spent part of his time in Jerusalem briefing Begin on the administration's plans, pointing out its importance, the reasons why the new administration wished to proceed and why Israel should not object too strongly. The Israelis were not convinced, and the fight over that sales package went on for months in Congress, taking away a lot of the credit that the new administration thought it had picked up with Israel and its American supporters. It also cost the administration a lot of political chips to obtain approval of the sale. It was the first dark cloud on the Reagan administration-Israel relationships.

Q: Was the AWAC that much of a threat to Israel if they were in the hands of the Saudis?

LEWIS: You don't have to assume that the Saudis can use the weapon system themselves against Israel to stir up their fears. I should note that throughout my tour of duty in Israel, the issue of arms sales to Saudi Arabia arose periodically. Many were significant-F-15s, AWACs, and others. The arguments would always evolve in an almost set pattern; we would try to convince the Israelis that the Saudis could not conceivably be a threat; the Israelis would acknowledge that they didn't fear the Saudi government, but that once this highly effective modern technology was in the hands of any country like Saudi Arabia, there was no certainty that the equipment would not be operated by somebody like the Syrians. The Israelis would always produce "evidence" that would prove that if an Arab state-Israeli war were to break out, a benign Arab country might well be found in the anti-Israeli coalition or one might even transfer forces to the Arab combatant. We could never convince the Israeli that the arms bought by Saudi were totally non-threatening; they were debates within the Israeli military establishment about the issue and they didn't take the threat as seriously as they made it out to be when debating the matter with the Embassy or Congressmen or the President. But the military did have a concern, particularly about the most advanced U.S. military equipment falling in the hands of any Arab government. They would have preferred, interestingly enough, to see the best Soviet equipment in Arab hands because they always took the view that they had American equipment and therefore did not want potential Arab adversaries to have the same equipment, because that permitted the Arabs to train on it and to learn its capabilities as well as its limitations. The Israeli military felt that its equipment would be better countered by other American equipment than by Soviet arms which they felt was inferior. So the Israelis fought the AWACs deal, but were ultimately beaten on it with a major effort by the administration, unnecessary in some ways.

Let's return to Lebanon, where matters were heating up, especially in the center of the country between the Christian and the Syrians. On April 28, 1981, the Israelis shot down two Syrian helicopters in the Bekaa Valley; the helicopters were thought to be attacking the Christian militia in the area. This decision was a very important event in the modern history of the area. It was a violation of a tacit "red line" agreement between Syria and Israel. In 1975, during the Ford administration, when Syrian forces first moved into Lebanon -- ironically, initially at the request of the Christians then in bitter conflict with the PLO -- the Israelis became very concerned about that development. Henry Kissinger mediated a secret understanding, that was never in writing, called "the red line" agreement. It essentially drew an imaginary line in southern Lebanon which would never be crossed by Syrian forces, thereby leaving a buffer zone abutting the Israeli border free of Syrian forces. As long as the Syrians did not cross the line, the understanding was that Israel would not confront Syrian forces in Lebanon. There were some other provisions in the understanding; one was that Israeli over-flights for observation purposes would not be interfered with by the Syrians. That permitted the Israelis to make aerial observations of events taking place in Lebanon. The agreement also included an understanding that the Syrians would not move surface-to-surface missiles into Lebanon because they threatened Israeli over-flights. Finally, the Israelis agreed not to attack any Syrian planes over Lebanon.

The shooting down of the two helicopters was certainly interpreted in Damascus and in knowledgeable circles in Israel as having been a violation of the "red line" agreement. Begin justified the action by saying that Israel had never agreed to let the Syrians take over Lebanon and annihilate the Christians. He had always viewed the Lebanon from a very acutely Christian angle; he identified the Maronite Christians as another small minority in the Middle East which was surrounded by Arabs with their existence at risk. He saw a natural affinity between the Christians and the Israel; both were in isolated positions. He was also very impressed with Camille Chamoun, whom he met secretly. He had also met Camille's sons and the Gemayel brothers -- Bashir and Amin -- all secretly when they were brought to Israel for meetings with Israeli leaders. Camille Chamoun had made a great impression on Begin as a great patriarch, a man of great strength and dedication to his people; they were of the same generation. Begin also became very fond of Camille's son, Bashir. When Begin authorized the shooting down of the helicopters he must have known about the "red line" agreement. He had been both Prime Minister and Defense Minister in the last half of 1980 and the first half of 1981. Someone must have briefed him on the agreement, but he did not give it the importance that the Labor Party certainly would have, since it had been in power when the agreement was negotiated. Begin's action resulted in the Syrian reacting by also breaking the agreement; they moved surface-to-air missiles into the Bekaa Valley. That was the beginning of the crisis escalation. Over the period May-June 1981, we spent an enormous amount of diplomatic energy trying to avoid a Syrian-Israeli war.

Once the missiles were in place, Begin started to call me in periodically to give me stern warning that unless the missiles were removed, the Israelis would destroy them. He hoped of course that we would persuade Assad through diplomatic means to pull them back. They did threaten Israel's ability to monitor what was going on in Lebanon and therefore were viewed very seriously in Jerusalem. Begin was also making public statements, giving threatening signals through the media. On May 4, I delivered a letter from Reagan to Begin in which the President asked Israel to hold off any military action against the missiles, in order to give the U.S. time to make an effort to reduce tensions through diplomatic efforts.

The following day, Reagan made a very shrewd move by announcing the appointment of Philip Habib as his special emissary for the region. Habib was to find a way to mediate the Israel-Syria dispute in order to avoid a war. Begin agreed in a reply to the President to let some time pass to allow diplomacy to have a chance. (He was not anxious to get into war with Syria.) Habib began to shuttle in the area, traveling back and forth between Damascus and Jerusalem. Begin first met Habib on May 11, when the latter came to Israel after having visited Syria where apparently he delivered a Reagan letter to Assad. Before that meeting, Begin had said to the Knesset that twelve days earlier, on April 30, the Israeli air Force had been ready to attack the battery of SAM-6 missiles that were poised on the Beirut-Damascus highway, but that bad weather had aborted the mission. That sent a strong signal to the Syrians.

Begin was a very interesting figure in this period. Not long after the beginning of the year, the Cabinet began to fall apart. There were some scandals; there was a lot of internal back-biting among his coalition; and Begin's popularity was sagging. He became so frustrated, especially by the internecine warfare within the Likud Party ranks which generated petty squabbles that everyone wanted Begin to referee, that he went into one of his periodic states of depression. He had been subject to a manic depressive syndrome for many years. During the down phases he became almost passive. He would come to the office and go through the motions, but there was no energy, he didn't pay attention to details as he usually did and became almost another person. We are now in late February and he was entering into one of these episodes. At the same time, the Cabinet was coming unraveled to such an extent that an election was called for the end of June. In late February, 1981, there was a poll that had the Labor alignment 20 percent ahead of the Likud, which was an unprecedented margin. Labor therefore was riding high, after having been out of government since 1977. It was very confident, while the Likud was disorganized and depressed about their election prospects. Begin ignored the situation; gave no leadership; showed no interest in the forthcoming election. The campaign was developed without his participation. He was depressed and distant. One got the impression that having almost finished his first term and having achieved peace with Egypt, he didn't really care about anything else. He came back to life temporarily to worry about the Lebanese Christians, but essentially Begin was often rather detached from events in this period of time.

Begin met Habib at the Defense Ministry in Tel Aviv. Their relationships developed in a fascinating way. Phil Habib was quite an extraordinary diplomat -- very ebullient, street-smart, tough, having acquired many traits from a Lebanese-Jewish community in New York where he grew up. He handled Begin with consummate skill, deferring to him properly, while at the same time engaging him intellectually in a very effective way. He also exhibited the necessary warmth and empathy towards Israel that is required if you are going to be successful with the Israelis. For several weeks, Habib played the role of providing an excuse for Begin not to bomb the missile sites. It is clear in retrospect that, while he was initially very aggressive on the issue of the missiles, Begin was under strong restraints from his military and others in the Cabinet and perhaps even from his "second thoughts". It appears that a conclusion may have been reached that this was not a war that Israel need to be engaged in, but after having made such a public commitment to remove the missiles, it was very tough not to bomb them. Begin clutched Habib like a life-line since he provided the excuse not to proceed with the threats. We came to understand this very quickly and Habib played his role very well. He went back and forth between Damascus and Jerusalem; he wasn't moving the subject forward very much, but he kept up the dialogue.

In May, 1981, the Histadrut, the large Israeli labor federation, had its election. Traditionally, Histadrut membership had been about two-thirds of the population and therefore its elections were sort of a preview of the general elections. All the predictions, based on the polls, were that the Labor Party which controlled the Histadrut, would just destroy the minority Likud representation. But it didn't happen; the Likud held its own -- didn't make any gains, but didn't weaken either. Somehow, when Begin saw those election returns, he was revived as if a spark of electricity had gone through his political body. Within a day or two, he had snapped out of the depression and he came out fighting. From then on until the end of June, he campaigned with extraordinary effectiveness both in the streets and later on TV. He had almost superhuman energy and was in a mood to brawl; he went after Peres hammer and tongs. The 1981 election turned out to be the dirtiest in Israel's history. It was the first election in which the Sephardic vote became a major, if not predominant, factor. The Moroccans and the other Sephardic voters, who had been members of the Likud for a long time, started going after Peres, the Labor candidate, at public rallies with tomatoes, insults and other disruptions -- very nasty. It became so violent that the Labor Party, which was by then essentially a middle and upper class Party despite its name, was so taken aback that it didn't know how to react to these tactics. Begin was not ostensibly encouraging these tactics, but his inflammatory oratory -- he was a great speaker -- egged his partisans on. By the end of May and early June, the polls had changed and the Likud was closing the gap rapidly. Just at that point, on June 6, the Israeli Air Force attacked and destroyed the nuclear reactor just outside of Baghdad. When that raid became public, it was another shot in the arm to Begin's campaign. He pulled ahead of Peres; during the last couple of weeks of the campaign, they were neck-and-neck right down to the wire. By the beginning of the last week, a sympathy backlash had developed for Peres resulting from the nasty campaigning and Labor pulled ahead again in the polls. The election was held on a Monday; Saturday night, Labor held its final rally in Tel Aviv in front of City Hall at the Kings of Israel square and at that time, the polls were showing Labor ahead by a couple of percentage points.

Then an odd event took place. There are indeed events that change the course of history and this was one of them. As of that Saturday night, the polls were indicating a Labor Party victory two days later. The final rally was huge; as is customary, there is a "warm-up" period of approximately an hour before the main speakers show up with singers and other entertainers keeping the crowd in a good mood. The Labor Party campaign managers had hired a well-known night-club entertainer by the name of Dudu Topaz to tell some jokes. During his act, he made a crack, which, although hard to translate, used the Hebrew word "chacherim", which in a rough translation refers to low-life, "neer do wells", "bums". Topaz said something like: "Well I am glad that there aren't any of those "chacherims" here tonight. We all know where they are". He was of course referring to the Sephardic mobs that had been attacking Peres. Begin was driving from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem that night, after the end of the Sabbath, to be present at the normal Sunday morning Cabinet meeting. He heard the Topaz remark on the radio; since he was such a brilliant political tactician, he immediately saw an opening. As soon as he arrived in Jerusalem, he gave a radio interview which was repeated several times over the next twenty-four hours. The essence of his remarks was to remind his Sephardic followers how the Labor Party regarded them; it had called them "bums" openly. This one remark, according to the polls, resulted in a change of four seats in the Knesset -- predicted to be Labor seats, but became Likud -- between Saturday night and Monday morning. By the time all the votes were counted, Likud had one more seat in the Knesset than Labor, which gave Begin the opportunity to form the coalition.

That is how Arik Sharon became Defense Minister. Begin had kept him out of the Defense Ministry after Weizman's resignation by keeping that portfolio for himself because he did not trust Sharon's political judgement -- for good reasons. Arik was pressing all the time to become Defense Minister in light of his distinguished military career. The Likud had won by only one vote; Arik controlled three Likud votes -- his own and two others. He threatened Begin that if he did not become Defense Minister, he and his two friends would "take a walk" and make the Likud a minority party. That forced Begin to give Sharon the Defense Ministry. Had Topaz not made that crack, Sharon would not have become Defense Minister; Begin would not have been Prime Minister; there would not have been a Lebanon War; there would have been no Sabra and Shatila massacre; and the whole course of the next five or ten years would have been different. Without these events, more peace after Camp David could have been a real prospect; the autonomy negotiations would have been renewed -- had the Lebanon war not eliminated all possibility -- and so many other hopes might have been achieved.

Some have argued that the air strike on the Iraqi nuclear reactor guaranteed Begin's re-election, but when I carefully reviewed the polling data for this period, it becomes eminently clear that the reactor strike only temporarily reinforced the change of direction indicated by the polls, and because of the backlash for Labor at the end, the strike was not the determining factor. The reactor strike did however have an enduring effect on the peace process, which at this time was in very low gear. For several months we had tried to persuade Sadat that it was time for another Begin-Sadat meeting in order to give the peace process a boost and bring the Camp David accords to complete fruition. Finally, Sadat had agreed, and he and Begin did meet at Ophira--now known as Sharm el Sheikh -- at the bottom of the Sinai Peninsula. Israel was still in control of that part of the Sinai; the withdrawal had not been completed. So Sadat came to Israeli occupied Sinai. The meetings were very pleasant; the two principals reached some agreements about restarting negotiations. They got along very well. Two days later, the Israelis hit the Iraqi reactor. The Egyptians felt totally betrayed. All over the Arab world, people added two and two and got five. All of Egypt's Arab enemies, which were quite numerous in these days, accused Sadat not only of groveling before the Israelis, but also of plotting with them just two days earlier to strike an Arab state. Many Arabs were already furious with Egypt for having broken the solidarity of the Arab world by making peace with Israel and many Arab countries were already boycotting Egypt. You could never dissuade the Egyptians or any Arabs from their conviction that either Begin had told Sadat in advance of the strike, or that he had deliberately ensnared him in the appearance of collusion by insisting on the date of the meeting and soon thereafter launching a strike. That suspicion of the Israeli leadership fed the old stereotypes of the "tricky, wily Jews" and had a very negative effect on Israeli-Egyptian relations for a long time. In fact, one might say that the relationship still suffers from that series of events; Mubarak has refused to meet with Shamir since Sadat's funeral in 1981. One reason, as we understand it, has been Mubarak's suspicion that Shamir would use the meeting to set the Egyptians up in some way; in other words, the Israelis would use the meeting to humiliate Mubarak as Sadat had been humiliated by Begin.

Q: Were there any warnings about Israeli thoughts on the reactor and the need to take it out?

LEWIS: There were a lot of clues at the time. I learned about the strike in one of the most dramatic episodes of my time in Israel. On a Saturday evening, my wife Sallie and I had been at a party in Kfar Shmaryahu and we were then due to go to the Hilton hotel in Tel Aviv for dinner for the visiting head of City Bank, Bill Butcher. He had been in town meeting a lot of the financial leaders of Israel. The dinner was being given by the Minister of Finance. Before the dinner, I had promised to give Butcher a briefing on the Israeli political and economic scene. We agreed to meet at his hotel for that before dinner. As Sallie and I arrived at Butcher's hotel, we learned that Congressman Jack Kemp, now the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, was with Butcher. So in effect, I ended up briefing both, although I had already talked to Kemp. Butcher had a junior suite which had a sitting area separated by a low partition from the bedroom. We were discussing Israel's economy when a phone call came for me; the Embassy duty officer and my office had my schedule and knew where I would be. It was the Prime Minister on the other end, who said: " Sam, I would like you to convey urgently a message from me to President Reagan. About one hour ago, our Air Force destroyed the nuclear reactor near Baghdad. all the planes have returned safely. Please transmit that news as quickly as possible". I was sitting on the edge of the bed and I paused briefly. Then I said: "All right, Mr. Prime Minister, I'll get in touch with Washington right away. Is there anything else you would like to tell me about the event". He said: "We will give a full briefing to your military people right away". So I hung up the phone and called the Embassy and asked my aide who was in his office, to come to the hotel immediately. I would meet him outside the door. I returned to the sitting area and I calmly continued the briefing on the intricacies and troubles -- which were great then - of the Israeli economy. Sallie looked at me and she knew something was going on. I didn't mention the Prime Minister's message. Then there was a knock on the door; I went and opened it. Our military attaché and his assistant were there. We went out in the hall; shortly thereafter my aide appeared. The military officers were on their way to the Ministry of Defense for a special briefing. I wrote out a "Flash" cable to the White House with Begin's message. My aide took it back to the Embassy and sent it. The officers went to MOD and got the details which they reported to Washington through their channels. Then I went back into the hotel room, completed the briefing and went to dinner. It was supposed to be attended by five ministers, but only two showed up -- Modai, the Minister of Energy, and Sharon. Some others drifted in later. I told Sallie on the way to the dinner what had happened. She was sitting next to Sharon at dinner. As soon as they got to the table, Sharon grabbed Sallie by the arm and asked whether I had told her anything. She said: "Told me what?". He looked at her quizzically and said: "He did tell you, didn't he?". We learned later that Begin had summoned all the Cabinet members on Saturday afternoon to his house in Jerusalem without telling them what the purpose of the meeting would be. Once there, he briefed about the air raid, which had already begun, but he wouldn't let anyone leave the house until the planes had returned safely to their bases. He wanted to avoid leaks and to keep the Cabinet together while the mission was going on. That is why the invited Ministers trickled in so slowly to the dinner in Tel Aviv. At this point, the information was still secret and in fact there was a big internal debate within the Israeli high command as to whether it was better to keep it secret. If the Iraqis wanted to go public, that was one matter; there was a strong feeling that Israel should keep quiet otherwise. Also the Iran-Iraq war was going on and the Iranians had already tried to attack that reactor previously, but had been unsuccessful. So there could have been some ambiguity about the attacker, at least publicly. As it turned out, Begin and his colleagues were too full of pride about the extraordinary professionalism of the attack to keep quiet very long and the story leaked out rather quickly -- in about 24 hours -- and eventually it was officially announced by the Israeli government.

When I heard the news from the Prime Minister, it came as quite a shock. We had of course heard discussions of the possibility and therefore were not totally surprised. Almost a year earlier, I had been called in by Begin and the Defense people several times; the Israelis were deeply concerned about Iraq's developing nuclear capabilities. The American and Israeli intelligence communities were exchanging intelligence on the status of that reactor. There was a big disagreement between the American and Israeli experts about when the reactor might go into operation and might start producing what might be potentially nuclear weapons-grade fuel. Through the fall and winter, we exchanged intelligence and assessments, with U.S. experts feeling that completion was several years away while the Israelis were saying that it was one or two years away. We all agreed that the Iraqis were seeking to develop the capability for a nuclear weapon through the use of the production of enriched uranium from the reactor. The debate was about how far the Iraqis had come and how close they were to achieving that production. We tried through diplomatic channels to encourage the French and Italians to stop their companies from assisting the Iraqi effort. They were supplying the low enriched uranium which would fuel the reactor initially. We were not having much success. Throughout early 1981, there were some unexplained events -- a laboratory in France would blow up or a reactor core would be mysteriously damaged before shipment or a couple of scientists were kidnapped and disappeared. The assumption was that Israel was not just relying on our diplomatic effort to slow down the project, but were using their own clandestine means to try to stop it. But it kept going forward and as the winter progressed, I began to hear and relayed to Washington a rising Israeli refrain: "Either the US does something to stop this reactor or we will have to!". Tom Pickering, who was then the Department's Assistant Secretary for Science and Technology, came for a special visit in late autumn to share with the Israeli our best understanding of the status of construction of that reactor. We exchanged views on the progress of the project. It was an effort on our part to impart the seriousness with which we viewed the construction of the reactor and to forestall what eventually took place anyway. There were continual leaks in the Israeli press about the seriousness with which Israel viewed the Iraqi efforts. The Israelis were using a lot of different ways to signal us that we had better find ways to stop the project or else they would have to do it themselves.

All the messages on the reactor were of course "Top Secret" with very limited distribution. After Carter's defeat, as is customary, the government agencies prepare elaborate briefing papers for the transition teams to bring the new administration up to date on the outstanding issues. In the foreign affairs field, the key issues that will confront the administration in the first three months of its tenure are supposed to be identified. I had sent a whole stream of messages about our conversations with the Israelis, Begin's warnings and our sharing of intelligence information. I was concerned that this issue might be over-looked in the transition. So I contacted Washington informally to make sure that a full paper on this subject was being prepared for the transition team. The paper was prepared, but under very restrictive terms -- very few copies, very limited distribution. I assumed that the paper would go to Haig and that it would receive appropriate attention. However, there seems to have been a real bureaucratic "glitch" and the top people in the new administration were never made aware of this situation, even though both State and the intelligence community had full documentation. The transition paper wasn't considered in the White House at all. Moreover, about the turn of the year, the subject seemed to have disappeared from any conversations. The Israelis stopped complaining; they stopped calling me in; they stopped press leaks. The subject just disappeared. In retrospect, that should have been a clear tip off. But we were busy with other matters that I discussed earlier, especially the Syrian missiles in Lebanon. We now know that Begin decided around the first of the year that the Israelis would have to attack the nuclear reactor; they couldn't wait for it to go "critical". His experts were telling him, as he explained to me later, that if the reactor were bombed after it had gone "critical" there was a real risk of nuclear material fall-out over Baghdad which would have killed a lot of innocent civilians. The reactor had to be destroyed before it went "critical". I think Begin was genuinely concerned about the prospect of civilian casualties. As the spring moved on, the Israeli experts were predicting that the plant could go "critical" as early as the end of the summer. Our people, on the other hand, were still predicting that this stage would not be reached for another two years at least.

The Israelis must have begun preparations for the strike around the first of the year 1981. They practiced the bombing runs on the Negev desert in secrecy. The whole episode has been written up subsequently in various memoirs, but the U.S. government somehow just lost sight of the whole issue in the first part of 1981, and I'm afraid I "went to sleep" about it also. There have been subsequent allegations that Al Haig was aware of the situation because the Israeli Chief of Intelligence, General Seguy, who was in Washington in February, had allegedly warned Haig. I recently asked Haig about this story and he insists that he had no knowledge of the situation and had never been briefed by any of the Israelis. So, when on June 6, my flash message reached the White House, Reagan and Dick Allen, then the NSC Advisor, were thunder-struck. The President had been a great friend and admirer of Israel during his life -- he had given speeches on behalf of the United Jewish Appeal and had a lot of Jewish friends -- and he liked Begin, although he had only met him once when he was Governor of California. He admired Begin's anti-communism and tough stance and there was a good deal of mutual admiration. Reagan couldn't understand how the Israelis could have taken this action without checking with the United States or talking or consulting with us. He was quite angry. After the attack, there was an uproar in the Arab world and at the U.N. and in the media world-wide. There was an immediate effort to condemn Israel in the Security Council. Haig was also surprised, but his professional admiration for the attack and his understanding of the security implications of the reactor were such that secretly he felt that it had been a good idea, although he couldn't say so publicly. He did his best to minimize the U.S. reaction to the air raid, but there was a considerable amount of political pressure developing in the United States and the President himself was quite angry. I learned all of this through a telephone call from a friend of mine on the NSC. I then realized that maybe the new administration did not know about the history; otherwise it would not have been so totally surprised. I sent a long cable to the White House, summarizing the history that led up to the air attack, including the diplomatic exchanges, the Israeli warnings and other events. I was told later that my cable was one of the few cables that was ever shown the President. He read it and said that it did put a different light on the situation and his anger was somewhat assuaged. Then there was a lot of scurrying trying to find out what happened to the paper written for the transition team and there were some scapegoats fingered. It was not a good time for certain people. As far as Reagan was concerned, this was his first indication that the Israelis were pretty independent and while they admired the U.S. and they liked him, they did have their own agenda, which meant that we would not always agree.

LEWIS: I would now like to expand on some themes that I discussed earlier. A number of people have asked over the years why the Reagan administration did not accept President Carter's and Ambassador Linowitz' advice and immediately appoint a new negotiator for the autonomy talks. This might have kept up the momentum of those talks, which by January 1981 had made considerable headway, although they had not yet come to the hardest issues. One of the reasons was politics; it had been Carter's Camp David, not Reagan's. Furthermore, as I mentioned earlier, the two administrations had a different perspective on the Middle East. In addition, the new Reagan administration was diverted from the Middle East in the early days of its tenure; when the new administration took office, it wanted to make sure that the peace treaty and the withdrawal of Israeli forces from Sinai, which was scheduled to be completed by April, 1982, would proceed on schedule without any "explosions" intervening. Under the Treaty, the U.N. was required to field a peace-keeping force to separate the Israelis and the Egyptians after Israel's withdrawal from the Sinai was completed.

At the time of Camp David, we understood that there was considerable opposition to Camp David in the Arab world. The Russians were not all sympathetic to our bilateral efforts, as they correctly saw the Camp David process. During the Camp David negotiations, we added language to the agreement which would protect it if the U.N. did not do what it was supposed to; i.e., provide the peace-keeping forces. There was actually an exchange of letters to reinforce the accord language, by which the United States assured the two other parties that if the U.N. didn't provide the "peace keepers", we would assure the provision of the necessary troops and station them wherever necessary. As we had feared might happen, the UN Security Council did not approve the Camp David accords or the Peace Treaty, yielding to the threat of a Soviet veto. I believe that we didn't push the issue hard enough in the Security Council in order to force that veto; it would have been an interesting illustration of the Russians' alleged commitment to peace. But since all the Arab states, except Egypt, were also opposed to the agreements, the Carter administration waffled and didn't push the issue as hard as it should have, thereby relieving the U.N. from having to take any formal notice of this piece of history. The U.N. didn't even register the Accord or the Peace Treaty!

1981 arrived and only one year was left to the final phase of Sinai withdrawal and there was no UN peace-keeping force in sight. The administration therefore had to face the alternative as stipulated at Camp David. Ultimately, the United States put together what became known as the Multilateral Force and Observers (MFO) which was deployed to the Sinai where it still exists today. During 1981 and into 1982, a lot of diplomatic energy was expended to put the MFO together. Michael Sterner, who had been our Ambassador in Bahrain after having been a deputy assistant secretary in the NEA Bureau, was named the special negotiator to bring the MFO into being. The U.S. devised a tripartite agreement -- Egypt, Israel and the U.S. -- which brought into being a unique peace-keeping force, modeled on the U.N. forces in Lebanon and elsewhere, but substituting for the U.N. Secretary General an American Director General who was to be based in Rome, a military commander drawn from Norway and so on. Throughout the Spring of 1982, Secretary Haig, with Ambassador Sterner doing the actual negotiating, was pushing Israel and Egypt very hard to agree on the ground rules for this peace-keeping force. Incidentally, we achieved a major breakthrough on the financial arrangements which should be a precedent for U.N. peace-keeping efforts; since the forces were being inserted into the Sinai to the advantage of Egypt and Israel who wanted them to safeguard the Peace Treaty, both countries agreed to pay one-third of the costs each, with the United States also paying one-third. So the costs of MFO has always been shared equally by the three parties.

In a sense, we were doing the U.N.'s work for it. I and some others were annoyed by this, but the problem was of course that the Security Council was ham-strung by the Russians and their veto. Also, as I said earlier, I don't think that the U.S. government pushed the issue hard enough. By the time the Reagan administration took office, it was too late to do anything in the U.N., even if the Reagan administration had wanted to, which was highly unlikely in view of its generally negative view of the U.N.

In June 1981, Sterner was able to announce that agreement on the MFO had been reached. The balance of the year was devoted to U.S. diplomatic efforts to find countries willing to send some military detachments to the Sinai. Initially, a lot of countries, including those that had often contributed to U.N. peace-keeping efforts like the Scandinavians, were very reluctant because this was not to be an U.N. operation. They didn't see the MFO as an appropriate vehicle for them. We had to send emissaries all around the world; we had to cash in a lot of "political chips" in order to get countries to contribute small forces. It was important that we have a true multi-lateral force and ultimately approximately fifteen nations did take part and are still part of the force today. By the latter part of 1981, we had pledges from Colombia, Fiji and one or two other countries, but the Europeans were being very reluctant. We wanted some European involvement and ultimately we managed to get force contributions from France, Great Britain and Italy, but only after much high level pressure from the Reagan administration. After we had exerted the pressure and had obtained reluctant participation by these European countries, the Israelis then gave us a lot of grief about these countries -- they didn't trust the French, in particular, and weren't enthusiastic about the British or the Italians either as neutral peace-keepers. As late as January 1982, Begin was still complaining about European participation and wondering whether he could really accept them. That of course insulted the Europeans a great deal when they learned about Israeli objections.

The whole MFO story -- its design, its implementation -- is a little known bit of history. It took a lot of energy in 1981 and it was a tremendous success; it was one of the great successes of American diplomacy, which is scarcely noted today because it has been so successful. The force is about 2,500 men. The Israelis insisted on a large American component because we were the only ones they trusted to stay in the Sinai if there were trouble. They always remembered the 1967 situation when the U.N. suddenly pulled its forces out of Sinai at the Egyptians' request, which opened the door to the 1967 war. In the MFO agreement, there is a specific reference to the fact that the force must stay in the Sinai unless requested by both parties to withdraw. That barred a repetition of the 1967 experience; nevertheless, the Israelis wanted a large American contingent. It was difficult enough to get the U.S. to commit to a contingent at all but finally the U.S. agreed to commit one airborne battalion -- roughly 1,000 men, which alternatively is drawn every six months from the 101st and 82nd Airborne Divisions. Over the years, these troops have gotten good desert training out of this assignment because the American battalion is deployed in the lower part of the Sinai toward Sharm el Sheikh, covering about the lower one third of the coast. Initially there was also a Fijian battalion and a third battalion made up of a number of other forces and there were some headquarters units. The Italians supplied three mine sweepers, which is the major component of the MFO Navy, headquartered at Sharm el Sheikh to patrol the Strait of Tiran. It is a very interesting operation which has been going since 1982 with no incidents. There have been some diplomatic problems, but it is the most successful example of multilateral peace-keeping in a difficult part of the world. One reason that it works is that both Egypt and Israel want it to, but that would not have been enough by itself.

That issue was one of several that were being dealt with during this period. I was involved very directly with the design of the force and joined Sterner in many of his negotiating sessions. I was very much involved in the whole process up to launch date.

One other issue was the Syrian missile crisis which I mentioned earlier. Around June, 1981 Habib and his mission were diverted from the Syrian missile problem to trying to avoid a war between the PLO in Lebanon and the Israelis. He began to expend more and more of his energies on this problem. In early July, the border area heated up considerably. There were PLO rocket attacks on July 15, for example, on the cities of Nahariyya and Qiryat Shemona. There were three civilians killed and 17 wounded. That was a beginning of an escalation which went on for several days, during which the Israelis were retaliating with air strikes, with increasing force, in an effort to take out the PLO's Katusha rockets and long range artillery in South Lebanon. The PLO increased its bombardment of the cities and particularly Qiryat Shemona. On July 17, there was a heavy Israeli raid on PLO headquarters in West Beirut during which an estimated 150 people were killed. That raid triggered a Washington reaction because we were in the process of delivering some F-16s to the Israelis which they had earlier procured and paid for. The Reagan Administration decided to suspend deliveries as long as the air raids continued, which it considered a "disproportionate reaction". That, of course, infuriated Begin. Habib had been sent to the area to try to reduce tensions and to essentially mediate between the PLO and the Israelis in order to achieve a cease fire, at least. The U.S. could not officially speak to the PLO, so that Habib had to communicate with the PLO through the Lebanese and Saudi Arabian governments. That meant that he had to shuttle from Jerusalem to Beirut and back again to try to calm the passions without ever being in direct communications with the PLO. Although Habib was formally a Presidential envoy, he was reporting to Haig and to the Department. He did stay in touch with the White House and vice-versa, but as a disciplined Foreign Service officer, he knew that his main contact was the Department and the Secretary.

Early in June, as I have mentioned, the Israelis had struck the Iraqi nuclear reactor. That caused a big uproar in the world and in the U.N. which finally forced the U.S. -- very reluctantly -- to join in a resolution of condemnation of Israel, which was passed by the Security Council unanimously. The Israeli attack infuriated the White House and it ordered a suspension of aircraft delivery to Israel because these aircraft had been procured under the Arms Export Act which allowed sales only for the purposes of self-defense. Deliveries were suspended while the U.S. lawyers were studying the question of whether the attack was for self-defense. If they had found that Israel had been in violation of the law, the Act would have required the U.S. to suspend deliveries of all military material to Israel. The suspension of F-16 deliveries lasted through the second half of June and all of July. It became a tremendous issue between Begin and Washington. The Israelis were highly offended and angered by Washington's actions, particularly when at the same time, the administration was pushing a large sale of AWACs aircraft to Saudi Arabia which was pending Congressional approval. By early July, Washington was under severe pressure from American supporters of Israel and by Israel itself which resented the way it was being treated. Finally Reagan decided that it was time to try to calm the rough waters and he sent Bud McFarlane, then the Counselor in the State Department and a close collaborator of Haig's, to Israel.

Bud arrived in Israel on July 11, 1981. His aim was to reach some kind of joint US-Israel statement which would paper over the dispute between our two countries over the air raid on Iraq and would permit the resumption of the arms deliveries. McFarlane had not had much experience in the Middle East and was very nervous about his mission, which was a tough one to be sure. I spent a lot of time with him when he first arrived; he stayed at the residence with us. We talked most of the night prior to his meetings with Begin the next day. Simultaneously, Habib and Morris Draper, his deputy, were flying in and out of town. So on Sunday, July 12, we had Habib meeting with Begin on one issue and McFarlane and I meeting with Begin on another issue! The subjects were different, but obviously complementary. Habib was trying to stop a war from breaking out in Lebanon and McFarlane was trying to stop a war from breaking out between Washington and Jerusalem. It was very interesting to be involved simultaneously with both emissaries' efforts throughout that weekend.

The initial McFarlane meetings with Begin were held on Monday morning, July 13. Habib had spent time with Begin the previous day. Monday afternoon, we met with Dave Kimche and other Foreign Ministry staff and Ambassador Evron and then returned to Begin's office that evening. It was a full day for Bud McFarlane. The end result of these meetings was very good because Begin and McFarlane agreed on some language for a public statement. Essentially, the two parties agreed that the misunderstandings that had arisen as a result of the air attack on the Iraqi nuclear reactor had now been resolved to the satisfaction of both sides. The Israelis understood that statement to open the way for a resumption of the deliveries of the F-16s. Begin was masterful in these meetings and McFarlane was completely taken in -- that may be a slight overstatement. But the general impression among the Israelis was that Begin had taken McFarlane to the cleaners during the discussion; I must say that I did not totally disagree with that characterization. To be fair, however, Bud's charter was to smooth Begin's ruffled feathers and to move on with outstanding business; he did achieve those objectives.

Of course, three days later, the Israelis undertook a major air attack on the PLO headquarters in West Beirut, as I mentioned earlier. That raised the same legal issues again, just after McFarlane's departure, and the perception that relationships had gone back to calmer days. The Beirut raid triggered another announcement from Washington that arms deliveries would be postponed further. That infuriated Begin. Haig publicly stated that the resumption of deliveries would be affected by Israel's cooperation in our efforts to reduce the level of violence in Lebanon. That effort was being spearheaded by Habib, as I have said, who worked very hard. A major war in Lebanon might have drawn the Syrians in with unpredictable consequences. Meanwhile, Israelis had by this time reached the conclusion that they did not have an effective defense against the Katusha rocket. Initially, in late June, when the shelling began, the Air Force was very confident it could knock out the rockets quickly. And indeed, the rockets were being hit, but many were still being fired. Day after day, Katushas would land in Israel, particularly in the northern tier around Qiryat Shemona. Pressures from the population began to mount on Begin; the country was appalled by what appeared to be a total absence of defense against the rockets. It became obvious to Habib that Begin really did want a graceful way out of the confrontation. He did not want to bomb the Syrian missiles because that might result in a war with Syria; there was no easy military counter-measure to the Katushas -- the Israelis could inflict heavy casualties on the PLO in Lebanon, but were not able to find either the long-range artillery pieces because they were being hidden very effectively or the rocket launchers which were very mobile. Katushas, manufactured by the USSR, are rather small and have a range of about 13-14 kilometers, up to 50 in the larger models. They could not be easily located. They would kill a person here and there, but they were primarily a psychological weapon because they forced the people around Qiryat Shemona and in the northern areas to spend a lot of time in the air raid shelters. Every night they would be in the shelters. The psychological strain was creating a huge political problem for Begin and the government. So Begin was encouraging Habib to continue his "shuttle diplomacy" while at the same time threatening to take dreadful actions. He was really hoping that Habib would be able to resolve the issue and ultimately Habib did work out a cease-fire between the PLO and Israel, a very unique achievement. Begin would of course never admit publicly that he had negotiated anything with the hated PLO and Habib was not meeting with them directly, but he had developed a formula by which parallel announcements would be made by both sides. On July 24, Habib was able to publicly announce, after a meeting with Begin, that he had reported to President Reagan that all hostile military actions on Lebanese and Israeli territories in either direction would cease. Begin said that the Israeli cabinet endorsed that Habib statement. There never was a written and signed document nor was there ever an agreed interpretation of that language. Therefore, during the ensuing year, there was a lot of wrangling during which the PLO asserted that the language was limited to prohibiting actions that might have taken place across the Lebanon-Israel border but that the Habib statement did not restrict them from attacking anywhere else. Israel, on the other hand, interpreted the language to bar all attacks on Israel proper or on Israeli interests anywhere in the world and on all Jews in the world. The American interpretation -- i.e., Habib's -- was that attacks across any of Israel's borders -- land and sea, from Jordan and from Lebanon -- would cease, but that actions outside that area were not covered. There was an attack by the PLO on a French synagogue in Paris later in the year which threatened the cease fire because of the Israeli interpretation. It was in any case a major achievement for Habib which got him a lot of credit with the White House.

I left Israel on July 14, 1981 for home leave. I had been in the country for four years and this was my second home leave. I did not return until late August and I left Bill Brown in charge of the Embassy. Bill Brown was my third DCM of the four that I had over 8 years. He came to Tel Aviv in 1979 and stayed until 1982. He had been the head of our special office in Taiwan, although he was a Russian scholar; he had also become a Chinese expert and linguist as well as one of the Foreign Service's small handful of Mongolian speakers. He was and is a terrific person -- a rock of Gibraltar in the difficult times that he was in Israel with me. He is now our Ambassador to Israel, following Tom Pickering, who went as our Ambassador to the U.N. at the beginning of the Bush administration. So he got his "trial by fire" during the 1979-82 period.

Q: Is the fact that Pickering is at the U.N. a great help to global understanding?

LEWIS: I think so. Tom has remarkable qualifications for the New York job, where he has performed superbly. He was our ambassador in Jordan when I was in Israel. Later, of course, he succeeded me in Tel Aviv. He therefore has a unique perspective on the issues that confront him. In any case, he is a very brilliant person. He has been a big help and may be even more help in the period ahead since it looks like we are entering a period of negotiations between Arabs and Israelis.

After my return, I spent a couple of days in Washington, debriefing and participating in the usual kinds of meetings that one has when he is on home leave. Then I spent several weeks after that out of the action. I would return every once in a while because I would be called back. Initially, I had gone diving which was one of my favorite avocations -- I did that whenever I could sneak away to the Sinai. I had made arrangements to spend ten days of my home leave on a Cousteau society diving expedition in the British Virgin Islands. I did that almost immediately after returning to the U.S. But as soon as I returned from that, about August 5, I was told to hurry to Washington, where I was brought up to date on all that had happened since I had left. One of the things that I learned was that there was a new Israeli government following the elections at the end of June, which Peres and the Labor Party barely had lost, as I described earlier. Throughout July -- the cease fire negotiations, the flap over the suspension of F-16 deliveries, etc -- there had been a caretaker government. Begin was spending a lot of time trying to put together a coalition government that could get the support of the Knesset. He finally succeeded and his new government was announced on August 4, just as I was coming back from the depths in the Virgin Islands. In the meantime, the MFO agreement had been signed and had named Ray Hunt as its first Director General. He was a terrific officer; he had been the Executive Director of NEA and was a superb choice for the MFO job. Unfortunately, a couple of years later he was assassinated in Rome by some terrorists in front of his apartment. He had no bodyguards and was identified as a high ranking American official. One of the radical PLO groups killed him to symbolize their opposition to the peace between Egypt and Israel. A major loss! Ray was succeeded by Peter Constable; now the Director General is Wat Cluverius who, as Consul General in Jerusalem, had been an active player in the negotiations in the time we are now discussing.

When I returned to Washington, I discovered that my future nemesis and not-very-close friend, Ariel Sharon, had been named Defense Minister in the new Begin government. I described earlier how he managed to get that job. His appointment was bad news. Also the religious parties got a lot of favors from the Likud, as they always do. They got more financial aid, they received a commitment that El Al would not fly on Saturday anymore, and a lot of other pledges like that. While in Washington, I went through a whole series of meetings with Haig, Walt Stoessel and other senior officials. I was brought up to date and gave some advice how the U.S. might react to the new government. I spent a lot of time with Nick Veliotis, the Assistant Secretary for NEA. The key personnel change was the Sharon move from Agriculture to Defense. Shamir remained as Foreign Minister.

On August 8, 1981 the Saudis announced in Riyadh the so called "Fahd Plan" which was a new Middle East peace plan. It was the first time that the Saudis had taken any peace initiatives. The plan is still interesting; although it was immediately rejected by the Israelis and never endorsed by the U.S., it was modified later at an Arab summit in Fez, Morocco, and it sounds very much like the position that most of the Arab states are taking today, ten years later, as they consider the round of peace negotiations which Secretary Baker is pushing and which might take place in October. The "Fahd Plan" contained eight points: 1) Israeli withdrawal from all Arab territories including Jerusalem; 2) all settlements that were founded on the West bank after 1967 were to be removed; 3) guarantee of worship and rights for all religions in the Holy Places; 4) the inalienable rights of the Palestinians; 5) compensation for the Palestinians who do not wish to return to their homelands; 6) guarantees of the right of the Palestinian people to their own state, with Jerusalem as its capital; 7) a U.N. mandate for several months over the West Bank and Gaza for a transition period while the Israelis withdraw and the Palestinians set up their own government and; 8) as the only gesture towards Israel, the right of the states in the region to live in peace. These points have been cited continually since 1981 and are used by many Arab spokesmen as evidence of the Arab acceptance of Israel as a sovereign state in the region. It could be interpreted in that fashion, but we should note that the name "Israel" never appeared in the "Fahd" plan. It is not surprising that the Israelis did not find the plan as a positive contribution to peace efforts, nor did the Reagan administration, although some of the professionals in the State Department were quite intrigued by it. They saw it as the beginning of a new and more realistic phase of Arab attitudes toward the area.

On August 17, 1981 Reagan finally approved the release of the F-16 aircraft to Israel. Secretary Haig, in a press conference, explained that the legal review had been completed and that an intensive government review failed to determine whether Israel's bombing of the Iraqi reactor was either defensive or offensive -- if the latter there may have been a possible violation of the 1952 arms agreement. That is how the deliveries were resumed. It reflected in essence the Reagan administration's decision to reestablish better relationships with Israel and the new Begin government. The administration had concluded that Begin would be in office for an extensive period and therefore we had to find a way to reestablish a sense of trust and understanding that had been quite frayed during June and July.

I might mention that there is still another current event that has a relationship to the 1981 period. Recently, the Democratic leadership in Congress announced that it would have a formal investigation of the "October surprise" -- i.e., the charge being that members of the Reagan election campaign staff may have requested the Iranians to hold the release of the Embassy hostages until after Reagan's swearing in. The charge included some allegations that Israel had been involved with the Reagan team in the supplying of weapons to Iran which had allegedly been promised. A newspaper story dated August 21, 1981, quoted senior State Department and White House officials who had worked in the Carter administration as saying that Israel had secretly sold to Iran American spare parts for their F-4 fighter bombers in October, 1980. That sale, which indeed did take place -- tires for the planes -- is one of the pieces of evidence being currently considered to support the Reagan team conspiracy theory because Begin had assured Carter in early 1980 and reassured him later that year that Israel would not ship any military equipment to Iran while U.S. hostages were being held in Tehran.

The last days of my home leave were spent in Washington talking about the big event of the fall, namely the first meeting between Reagan and Begin. Begin had been invited to come to Washington in early September. Nick Veliotis and I and others met on August 10 to plan for the visit. There were some in the White House and in the State Department who thought that Reagan should be quite tough on Begin in this first meeting to show him who was "the boss". The summer events had proven to Reagan's team that Begin would not be an easy person to deal with. On the other hand, there was great sympathy in the administration for Israel's security problems. We had lengthy discussions on how to treat Begin -- a subject to which I had devoted considerable time in 1977 at the time of the first Begin-Carter meeting. Ultimately, we laid out a program intended to play up to Begin's love of ceremony, honors and sense of equality as the head of an allied government. I found that Haig especially, who knew Begin and rather liked him, was very much in agreement with me on what the visit should emphasize. Haig and I saw the Israeli problem from the same point of view; some people in NEA did not always share this outlook because they had less sympathy towards Israel and less understanding of what made the Israelis tick.

In addition to the Begin visit, we had to wrestle with the AWACs sale. For reasons that were never clear to me, the administration was following through on a commitment that Carter had made to the Saudis to sell them these very sophisticated planes. As I mentioned earlier, Carter had indicated to his successor his willingness to submit the sales proposal to Congress in the final days of his administration, but the Reagan team did not pick up the offer. So in the spring, 1981, despite its understanding of the delicate nature of the subject for Israel and its American supporters, the Reagan administration decided to proceed with the sale. It invested a huge amount of energy and political capital over the summer and early fall in obtaining Congressional approval of the sale. The Israeli government, despite its desire to establish good relations with the Reagan White House, decided to oppose the sale for valid defense reasons, as Israelis saw them. I never found their arguments very persuasive nor did a lot of people in Washington. The central Israeli argument was that an AWAC plane flying above north-west Saudi Arabia could monitor all activities on all Israeli airfields. The Israelis saw also the possibility of an Arab coalition in the future which could use AWACs to great advantage. The Israelis did not really fear the Saudis; they were much more concerned that American arms sold to Saudi might eventually fall into the hands of an Arab coalition; that was their main concern. They pointed to the historical fact that in every war it had ever fought, military equipment of one Arab country had been used in a war by other Arab armies against them. For example, the Iraqis and the Saudis had sent expeditionary forces in 1967. It is true that they didn't fight very well, but they participated. The Israelis assumed that if they were forced into a war with Syria, the Saudis might join again; for that reason, the Israelis didn't want them to have the best U.S. equipment.

The administration made an effort throughout the summer and into the fall to dissuade the Israelis from opposing the sale. We made all sorts of arguments; the administration consulted extensively with Congressional Israeli supporters, with AIPAC and with leaders of American Jewish organizations. Our theme was that the U.S. could have parallel relationships with Israel and Saudi Arabia and that Israel didn't have a better friend than Reagan who would never do anything to hurt Israel's security. The suggestion was of course that Israel stop its opposition. But the advice was not accepted and a tremendous amount of lobbying and political effort had to be mounted in order to obtain Congressional approval. That was finally obtained, but only at considerable political cost to the administration.

At the same time, efforts were being made to rekindle the peace process -- i.e., the autonomy negotiations. As I mentioned earlier, the Egyptians felt double-crossed because Sadat had met at Sharm el Sheikh with Begin only a few days before the Iraqi raid. During the summer of 1981, there was very little warmth between Cairo and Jerusalem. The U.S. was not pushing the autonomy negotiations, although we were anxious for the relationships between the two countries to warm up. We were looking forward to the completion of the withdrawal in 1982. The MFO negotiations had gone reasonably well. On August 25, Sadat and Begin finally met again, this time in Alexandria for two days. The principal objective of the meeting was to reestablish reasonable relationships. We were not present, but learned about the meeting by being briefed by the participants -- Roy Atherton, our Ambassador in Egypt, by the Egyptians and me by the Israelis. It became quite clear to us that this was probably the best meeting that the two leaders ever had. They had finally managed to deal with each other, not as close friends, but with a degree of understanding, friendliness and genuineness which had not been in existence since the days immediately following Sadat's visit to Jerusalem. At the meeting, they agreed to resume the autonomy negotiations at the ministerial level in Cairo. Moreover, Sharon, the Israeli Defense Minister and Boutros Ghali, the Egyptian Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, announced that they would sponsor four different joint committees to work out all the necessary arrangements for the withdrawal from the Sinai. All of these were good omens and suggested that relationships might be back on track, which also helped the new Reagan administration to have renewed confidence in Begin, who was about to come to the United States. The Reagan administration had been in office long enough by this time to comprehend that the Camp David process was worth preserving. This certainly had been Haig's conclusion. So there was about a month of hope in the early fall of 1981 about prospects for further advancement of the peace process. I was asked to come back from my home leave again -- I was then in Houston -- and to fly out to Israel to talk to Begin about the AWACs issue before his trip to Washington. I was to try to obtain agreement that the Israelis would stop their objections to the sale and I was also instructed to discuss his impending visit. So on August 22, I returned to Israel and met with Begin shortly before his meeting with Sadat. I met with him a couple of times in lengthy sessions. He was very gracious and friendly, but gave me again all the reasons why the AWACs were a danger for Israel. He didn't give the assurances that Haig wanted. I stayed in Israel until September 2 for a few days catching up on events and then I returned to Washington. The day before I left, I had a three hour meeting with Sharon who was as usual very testy, exuberant and full of himself. He had lots of plans for the pacification of Lebanon; he expressed the hope that the cease fire would hold, but if it didn't, he knew what to do about it. He also repeated his version of the settlements policy and expressed hope for closer cooperation with the U.S.!

I arrived in Washington just in time to spend several hours with Haig before Begin's arrival. I helped redraft the talking points and assisted with the planning of the Reagan-Begin meeting. If we had been paying closer attention to events, we would have been very apprehensive that Labor Day weekend. On September 3, while I was in the air, Sadat had become much testier and impatient with the growing domestic opposition. On that day, more than a thousand critics were arrested -- religious extremists, intellectuals, etc. All sorts of publications were banned; a number of religious organizations were disbanded. For the first time, Sadat had cracked down hard on his opposition. He only lived for a little more than a month after that day. It has been the consensus that his actions of September 3 triggered his assassination on October 6; that, of course, can't be proved, but the evidence is pretty compelling. The September events did receive attention in Washington, but perhaps not as much as they should have. I did talk to Veliotis about them and we were quite worried, but no one foresaw Sadat's demise.

When Begin arrived on September 8, I was at the airport to welcome him. We went through the usual official visit ceremonies. There were a number of meetings with Haig, three meetings with the President, meetings at the Pentagon. The ceremonial aspects were first class. The Reagan White House had decided -- correctly as far as I am concerned -- that his predecessor's White House had been too casual and perhaps even too corny. So the new administration went all the way in the other direction and reinstituted all sorts of pomp and circumstance. Official visits were especially elegant. Begin was very impressed by this kind of reception; in any case, he had a lot of admiration for Reagan -- a tough anti-communist. He may not have had the highest regard for the subtlety of Reagan's mind, but he certainly admired and shared his convictions and general purposes. Begin always felt that if matters were ever to become very difficult between our two governments, he could always sit down with President Reagan and convince him. The White House of course did not permit this one-on-one very often, so Begin didn't get many opportunities like that. He did get some on this first visit and there was a tete-a-tete meeting at the beginning.

I should say that just before Begin arrived, I had participated in a series of briefings with a variety of people. One of these meetings was a lunch session at the White House with the President, along with Haig and Veliotis. We were asked to give the President our views on how Begin might be handled. The President was very gracious and warm and seemed to be listening. He knew the basic issues and our positions. Begin was eagerly awaiting the tete-a-tete meeting which took place the day after our lunch with the President -- September 9. He saw the meeting as an opportunity to go into some detail about his feelings of the events of the last nine months. The President and the Prime Minister had been unable to meet earlier because the White House decided -- correctly, in my view -- that Begin should not be invited during an Israeli election campaign which might have given him some advantage over Peres. (I had informally recommended that position to Haig and the White House.) Then the summer came with all of its problems. So nine months had passed since the beginning of the Reagan administration during which there had been two or three major confrontations with Israel. So Begin saw the meeting as the opportunity to return Israel-US relationships back on track.

Begin and Reagan sat down in the Oval office with only their respective Ambassadors as note takers. Initially there was a lot of small talk, which was Reagan's forte. He was very funny and relaxed. Then Begin launched into a lengthy discussion on the relationships between the two countries, on Israel's hopes for peace, its frustrations about Egypt and the stalled autonomy negotiations and a lot of other issues. Reagan had been carefully programmed by his staff and only fifteen minutes had been allowed for the meeting. The White House staff didn't want him to be out of their control for any longer than that. Reagan took out of his pocket the famous 3x5 cards which had his talking points on them. He politely interrupted Begin and read his talking points which were simple and straight-forward and intended to reassure Begin about the relationship. The talking points did include a couple of items which might have brought a response from Begin. This interruption gave Begin the idea that a conversation between himself and the President had in fact been initiated. But the clock kept running and Reagan began to apologize very profusely, saying that the group that was in the Cabinet room could not be kept waiting. He then got up and led Begin into the Cabinet room where the rest of the delegations were indeed waiting for the principals. End of the tete-a-tete. For me that was a rather embarrassing moment. I had been used to the way Carter ran his meetings with Begin; he knew the material and didn't need any talking points and could carry on endlessly without coaching. Reagan on the other hand was tied totally to his talking points, which were written to insure that they could be delivered quickly. The schedule was also set up to prevent the President from having to speak extemporaneously for very long, if at all. When Reagan got up, Begin look bemused but acted very graciously, although I am sure he was very disappointed because he had considered that meeting to be a major part of his program. Later, he made a couple of very guarded comments to me which indicated that he had not left this first meeting with any feeling that Reagan was a very strong interlocutor.

In the Cabinet room, the delegations were congregated. The Israeli group included Shamir and Sharon. There were a lot of staffers and the table was full -- one side for the Israelis and one side for the Americans. The big event of the visit was about to take place. This meeting set the tone for our relationships for the next two years and perhaps even until today. Begin had decided that since the two sides had finally met and since they held similar views of the bipolar world, of the PLO and of some Middle East issues, it was time to acknowledge publicly that the countries were allies. Begin had always regarded this alliance as an important goal. He was always disturbed by Carter's refusal to use the word "alliance" or allow it to be used by any official when characterizing the US-Israel relationship. Begin honestly felt that Israel had done a lot for the United States in the military and intelligence fields; he recognized that Israel might have been the junior partner, but it was a partnership nevertheless. He wanted the relationship to be seen as an alliance. That made easier for him to accept American assistance without feeling that it was charity; that was the psychological background. After Reagan graciously welcomed Begin in the Cabinet room, he asked him whether he would like to make any comments. Begin did and he launched in a tour d' horizon, describing the world as he saw it and the role the two countries had in it. He also explained what Israel's contribution was to the relationship of the two countries. Reagan was nodding, apparently agreeing with what the Prime Minister was saying. He was giving Begin positive feed-back without words. After Begin's comments, there was some discussion back and forth. Then Begin suggested that since the two sides seemed to be in agreement on the fundamental perceptions and issues, Israel thought it would be a good idea to conclude a written and formal agreement on the strategic relationships. Reagan looked around to his right and his left -- Weinberger was looking very grim by now, but Haig didn't appear concerned. So the President said that he thought this might be a good idea which was all Begin needed. Reagan's comment enabled Begin to pursue the issue further by suggesting that Defense Minister Sharon be permitted to brief the American side with some ideas that might give form to the relationship. Reagan agreed; so Sharon stood up with a set of maps of the Middle East and proceeded to give an absolute hair-raising description of the ways the Israeli Defense forces could be of assistance to the U.S. in contingency situations. It would have taken Israel as far East as Iran and as far north as Turkey. As Sharon made his elaborate presentation, which emphasized particularly Israeli capabilities as quick reaction forces that were highly mobile and agile, I could see Weinberger blanch visibly. His aides were equally upset. Everyone on the American side was shocked by the grandiose scope of the Sharon concept for strategic cooperation. It even included use of Israeli forces to assist the U.S. in case of uprisings in the Gulf emirates. When Sharon finished, not much was said; there were probably a few questions. Begin then suggested that if President Reagan agreed with the general outline of the Sharon presentation, the two Defense Ministers should be requested to work out the details. Reagan seemed agreeable and asked Weinberger to get together with Sharon to work out something. That made Weinberger the fall guy to get the United States out of this embarrassing situation; of course, Weinberger had no sympathy for the scheme whatsoever. He had always been very conscious of our relationships with the key Arab states, particularly the Arabian Peninsula ones. He was very concerned that any overt cooperation with Israel would jeopardize those relationships. He felt that way in 1981 and throughout his tenure as Secretary of Defense. He showed his positions in many ways, before and during and after the Lebanon war. But now he was stuck with a presidential request to do something about the Israeli proposal, which Reagan seemed to have accepted in principle. I should note that Haig quietly sympathized with the Israeli proposal.

After the meeting, Weinberger and Sharon negotiated and their staffs negotiated for a long period of time before the first strategic cooperation agreement was finally concluded. This was a memorandum of understanding on strategic cooperation. The Pentagon's objective in the negotiations was to say as little as possible -- nothing would have been the best outcome for them. They aimed for a written agreement that was so general and so empty of content that it could be defended. Furthermore, the Pentagon was intent on giving the agreement no publicity whatsoever. The Israelis, of course were just the opposite; they wanted a lot of detail and a lot of publicity. They wanted a real and binding document. Weinberger controlled the process and ultimately won out. Most of the negotiations took place in Washington; whatever was agreed to was finally signed on November 30, during a Shamir-Sharon visit to Washington in which I participated. To add insult to injury, not only was the agreement empty of practically all content, but Weinberger managed to have it signed in the basement of the Pentagon without any press present, so that it didn't get any attention. The Israeli press was fully briefed and made a big thing out of it, but there were no photographs of Weinberger signing this document with Sharon - they might have been used in the Arab world to undermine his position.

Q: Was Sharon aware of Weinberger's position from the beginning?

LEWIS: He became aware of it as events developed. It didn't take him long to understand. The result was that he became very disenchanted with the whole process. When Sharon realized during the sessions held following the White House meeting that Weinberger was very unenthusiastic about the Israeli initiative and after pushing for some resolution week after week, he would have washed his hands of the whole approach, but Begin was determined to have the U.S.-Israel agreement because to him that signed piece of paper was much more important than the content. He wanted a symbol of the alliance; so he forced Sharon to keep plugging away. The Labor Party -- the opposition -- was very much opposed to the idea of the alliance; they thought it unwise to limit, in a sense, the degree of cooperation in the military area by signing a meaningless agreement. It would have preferred an unwritten understanding which would have deepened the relationship in the following years. Moreover, of course, the Labor Party didn't want to see Begin get credit with the Israeli public for something that had no significance. The Labor Party introduced a no-confidence motion in the Knesset when the agreement was signed; there was a debate in early December. Sharon, while holding his nose, had signed the agreement against his better judgement only because the Prime Minister had insisted and then was stuck with the job of defending it against Peres and the opposition speakers. He explained how the agreement was all the things which he knew it wasn't; it was one of the few moments when Sharon showed discipline and carried out orders, which has not always been his style.

The Washington visit, from Begin's point of view, was a great success. He held some very positive meetings with Congress; Israel's friends asked him some very easy questions; there was considerable admiration expressed by Congressmen and others about the daring raid on the Iraqi reactor, which was much more popular in the Congress than with the administration. Begin returned to Jerusalem feeling that he had established a solid relationship with Reagan. He felt that the "Arabists" in the State Department would no longer be in a position to undermine the new alliance which was evolving. Begin was somewhat premature in his views, unfortunately.

During September, 1981 there were some events that ensued from the Begin-Sadat meeting in Alexandria. They had agreed to renew autonomy negotiations at ministerial levels; they were scheduled for September 23 in Cairo. Dr. Burg, the Minister of Interior, was to head the Israeli delegation and Hassan Ali, the Foreign Minister, headed the Egyptian team. The U.S. didn't have a chief representative because Sol Linowitz had never been replaced by the new administration. Haig decided to ask the U.S. ambassadors in Egypt and Israel -- Roy Atherton and myself -- to serve as joint heads of the U.S. delegation. I went to Cairo for the meetings. We, collectively, achieved some very positive steps in those meetings. We concluded with a joint declaration which was really quite encouraging and seemed to get the autonomy negotiations back on the right track. We scheduled another meeting for a few weeks later. Roy and I succeeded in conducting some very useful mediation by penning some language that was acceptable to the other two delegations. The atmosphere was quite creative and serious. Sharon participated but didn't cause as much trouble as usual; he was still in the warm glow of the Washington visit; at the time, he still believed that he could work out a meaningful agreement with the United States. Therefore in September, it appeared that we had overcome the summer difficulties, that the peace process was going to move forward and that the U.S.-Israel relationships had strengthened. So September seemed the high point of the Reagan administration in its Israel policy.

Bud McFarlane came to Israel on September 20 right after Begin and Sharon had returned after their Washington visit. He was representing Haig to continue discussions with Sharon on strategic cooperation. I took Bud down to Sharon's farm in the Negev where we were guests at a stag dinner during which Sharon told his war stories. He buttered us up unmercifully -- he had tried to co-opt me for four years and had by this time understood that he was not convincing me. But he was nice to me and really worked McFarlane over. Bud was quite responsive. McFarlane also had meetings with people in the Foreign Ministry which were useful in giving a renewed push to the autonomy talks right before the Cairo meetings.

But on Tuesday, October 6, Sadat was assassinated. I remember that day very well. Sallie and I had gone to an Israel national tennis tournament at the Ramat Hasharon center. We had watched several matches and were doing so when I got a telephone call. It was the Embassy duty officer who had just received a "Flash" message reporting that Sadat had just been assassinated. Within a few minutes the word had spread through the crowd, which went into an extraordinary kind of a shock. It was as if the Israelis had lost a close relative. There was a tangible sense of loss and desperation everywhere. There was an Egyptian player in the tournament -- the first Egyptian professional who had come to Israel after the peace treaty. He was playing when the news came; he broke down and wept on the court and withdrew from the tournament; the tournament actually stopped then. The assassination was psychologically devastating. I knew that things were going to go off track very rapidly, but hoped that I would be wrong. The next day was Yom Kippur eve. There was a major funeral that day for one of Begin's oldest friends, Haim Landau who had been one of the original members of the Irgun. He had also been a Minister in one of Begin's first Cabinets. I had known him fairly well and went to the funeral. That night was the beginning of Yom Kippur when, in Israel, no one can travel by car; everyone walks. But I had to get to Cairo to meet Haig and to participate not only in the funeral, but in a unique American political experience. The easiest way to get there was with the Israelis; they were sending a high level delegation. There was one embarrassing issue because Begin said immediately that he wanted to go to his friend's funeral. The Egyptians were very unhappy with that suggestion; they were already not overjoyed that there would be an Israeli delegation, but the presence of the Israeli Prime Minister was more than they could face. They toyed with the idea of telling Begin not to come because of all the Arab and Muslim delegations that would be there, even though they were at the beginning of being essentially ostracized by the Arab world -- there would be more later after their Sinai withdrawal; the beginnings were already being manifested in the fall of 1981. We did weigh in with the Egyptians by pointing out that their rejection of Begin would be at least awkward and might at worst have some very unhappy consequences. They backed down and Begin, Shamir and Burg flew to Cairo in a small Israeli aircraft. They invited me to go with them and I accepted. There were then essentially four of us on this small plane with the aircrew.

The American delegation was really extraordinary. It was headed formally by Al Haig, but President Reagan had also invited all the former American Presidents -- Nixon, Ford and Carter - to go as part of the delegation. That was a unique event. Carter initially indicated that he might not accept; he would go to the funeral of his friend, but didn't like the idea of being in a delegation with Nixon and Ford. He was persuaded that if he went just as a private American citizen that that would be inappropriate and so he finally agreed to go as part of the official delegation. Kissinger was part of the delegation. This group of eminent personalities flew from Washington with Nick Veliotis, as Assistant Secretary, the chief ring-master. Roy Atherton was the host. Nick has told me a lot about the flights to and from Cairo and I have heard stories from others as well. For example, Carter and Ford had not spoken to each other before then. Nixon had not been in the public eye since leaving the White House as result of "Watergate"; he had gone through all the years of ostracism and had just started his fight back to respectability and public acceptance. This was the first time that he had been accepted in an official foreign affairs role; he was therefore going to make the most of it. On the way out, Carter and Ford were sitting across the aisle from each other in the Presidential aircraft VIP section, which was between the Presidential suite and the press and staff section. Veliotis told me that Rosalynn Carter was sitting by the window. She kept trying to divert Jimmy from Ford so that he wouldn't become involved with him because she still resented the way Jimmy had been treated during the campaign. But ultimately, Ford and Carter struck up a conversation and the tensions eased somewhat. Nixon was walking up and down the aisle telling jokes, being the life of the party. Kissinger was furious because he was sitting in the back, essentially with the press corps and the staff and not the center of the action. Al Haig occupied the Presidential quarters which holds a bed. There had been a lot of discussion about who would use the Presidential quarters; there were three former Presidents and only one bed and Haig decided that as head of the delegation it would best for him to take it; that would minimize the protocol problems. Henry was not amused by the whole situation and was very grumpy throughout the whole visit -- he did not cherish the "second fiddle" role. Jeane Kirkpatrick was also a member of the delegation along with several other dignitaries.

I had very interesting insight into Sadat's funeral. It was in any case one the most bizarre events of my life. I was asked to attend the funeral, not because there was any reason for me to attend, but because Haig was heading the U.S. delegation and he wanted to consult with me about current problems, since he was not going to come to Israel on this particular trip. The night of September 9 -- the day before the funeral -- Haig, as head of the delegation, decided very nicely to host a dinner at the hotel just for the American delegation and for all the people in the Embassy who were working in support of the delegation, which included a lot of people. It was a lovely idea and a very nice evening, but it also very amusing. One person in the delegation was a nine year old boy who had written a letter many months before to President Sadat that somehow the Egyptian press had found. It had said some nice things about Sadat and peace. Therefore the Egyptian Foreign Ministry had indicated that they would like to invite the young man to the funeral. So he became part of the delegation and therefore attended the dinner.

The hotel room where the dinner was being given had in it a long table -- sort of a dais -- and several roundtables. Roy Atherton, the host, and Nick Veliotis, as ring-master, had done their best to seat the guests at the dais. When the guests went to find their places, Henry discovered that he was sitting next to Jeane Kirkpatrick, whom apparently he detested. So he stomped over to Veliotis and demanded that his place be changed. Nick and Roy huddled together and shuffled things around. Henry then goes to his new seat and finds that he is sitting next to the nine year old boy. Now he is really unamused by this new turn of events. He didn't think that he had flown 8,000 miles to have dinner with a nine year old. So Henry was quite disgruntled throughout the whole affair. After dinner, each of the three former Presidents wanted to say a few words. Haig spoke first, then Carter, Ford and Nixon -- after some discussion, it had been decided that they would speak in reverse order of tenure -- that is, the most recent President first. Carter spoke of his appreciation for Sadat and of his relationship with Sadat -- a very Carteresque, emotional and genuine speech -- a little syrupy, but nice. Ford gave a typical Ford speech -- absolutely appropriate and absolutely forgettable. No one could remember, after he sat down, one thing that he said, but it had all sounded fine at the time. Then came Nixon. He gave what I consider to be the most extraordinary after dinner speech I had ever heard. He started out by expressing his gratitude for the opportunity to be there and for President Reagan's invitation, mentioning the special nature of the occasion and talked briefly about Sadat. Before getting to Sadat, he very deftly established his seniority over the other two Presidents by talking about his many visits to many foreign countries, first as Senator, then as Vice-President and then as President -- covering a twenty year period. He was subtly reminding everybody how more experienced he was. Then he launched into a discussion of what he had always been most grateful for during those many visits; namely the support he had received from the Embassy staffs. He said that without Embassy people, he and others could not have done anything. He just went on and on about how wonderful the Embassies and the Foreign Service had been; how much of his success in life he owed to these wonderful Foreign Service people and especially the local employees without whom we could not run our operations overseas -- he even mentioned the chauffeurs who drove him around overseas. He gushed like that for about ten minutes. And then he said: "In all of these visits, there are the big state dinners and functions -- just one big event after another. How could the United States be appropriately represented overseas without the waiters that make the functions such huge successes?". The waiters who were there were of course all smiling. I thought Nixon was making a speech at a waiters' convention or before a waiters trade union audience! Eventually he got to Sadat and said a few things about him. But all the Foreign Service people who heard Nixon that night, remembered all the things he had said about them when he was President; there was considerable skepticism about his comments in the audience. But he put on a real show which is hard to describe. Everyone was giggling and snickering. The speeches were followed by pictures -- lots and lots of photographs. The three former Presidents, the three former Presidents with Al Haig, the three former presidents with Henry Kissinger, etc. Then Nixon called all the waiters and has his picture taken with them; that was his codicil to his waiters' speech. It was an evening to remember!

That funeral delegation had some far reaching consequences because it was on that trip that Carter and Ford established their first connection. On the return trip, I am told, they began to discuss the possibility of doing some joint projects for good causes. From that, sprang an association which has sponsored a number of joint enterprises and appearances. And Nixon began his rehabilitation process. The funeral itself was accompanied by dozens and dozens of bilateral meetings between delegations. Begin and his ministerial colleagues walked along with the other hundreds along the streets. The Israeli attendance was a little sticky, but the Egyptians pulled it off very nicely. There was a tremendous tension about security; everyone was scared of the obvious possibilities, but fortunately nothing happened.

Haig met with Begin to discuss what could be done without Sadat to maintain momentum in the autonomy talks and on Israel-Egypt relationships in general. The most interesting aspects of the ceremonies, besides the dinner I described earlier, was the feed-back I got from the Israelis on the return flight to Israel. Begin, Shamir and Burg had had a separate session with Vice President, now President Mubarak, who had not been a very prominent player in the Camp David process. He had not been at Camp David and had not gone to Jerusalem with Sadat. The Israeli delegation had met him on visits they had made to Cairo, but they didn't know him very well. Therefore the initial measuring of Mubarak which had taken place during the ceremonies by the three Israeli Ministers was an important point in future developments. I was very curious to find out how they had reacted to Mubarak and what assurances, if any, they had been given about the peace treaty, the peace process, the autonomy negotiations and all the outstanding issues. On the plane that night, Begin was rather taciturn and went off to sleep soon after take-off. I was sitting opposite Shamir and Burg and had a chance to talk to them all the way back. They told me that Mubarak had said all the right things, had made all the right assurances -- the Egyptians would stick to everything to which they been committed, there would not be any change in policies towards Israel. Mubarak had said that he was loyal follower of Sadat's and that he would assume responsibility of carrying out his dreams for peace. But both Israelis made the same judgement about him: they did not think that he was up to the task of ruling Egypt. They did not question his sincerity; they wondered about his abilities. He was a military officer -- simple, direct. They thought that Egypt needed to have a "pharaonic" type of leader like Sadat to hold it together because it had tremendous internal and external pressures. Shamir and Burge turned out to be very wrong; Mubarak has proved to be a very solid and successful leader. He is cautious and careful; he is different from Sadat, but perhaps Egypt was ready for a different style from Sadat's. The night of our return, the Israelis were very worried about the change in Egyptian leadership. They were not surprised when, within a relatively short period of time, it became clear that Mubarak didn't want to invest any political capital in trying to move the Camp David process further. He was completely absorbed in assuring that the Israelis would withdraw from Sinai completely by the following Spring; everything else was secondary. He was even more worried about normalization of relations between Egypt and Israel than Sadat had been and about the attitudes of other Arab states toward Egypt.

There was another sad death in October, 1981 although it didn't have the same consequences as Sadat's assassination. On October 16, Moshe Dayan died of a heart attack. He had, for all practical purposes, been out of politics for a while. He had resigned from the Cabinet in the Fall, 1979 when he concluded that Begin would not fulfill the autonomy concept to the same dedication that he, Dayan, had committed himself and that he would not be permitted to exercise the leadership of these negotiations as he had hoped. He tried to run for the Knesset and had formed his own political party. He thought that he would do well; in fact, he only won two seats. So he became a figure of the past and was in his 70s when he passed away. He had been ill for almost two years; he had a cancer operation and had recovered quite well, although not completely. Although his health was poor, he was still active until his death. For Sallie and me, it was a very sad and poignant day when he died; we were very close personally to Dayan and his wife and had spent a lot of time with them, both privately and officially. I always believed that Dayan's restless, creative and unusual mind had been the key to the peace process, although we can't overlook Begin's determination and political judgements. But without Dayan's continual drive to find solutions to impasses, we probably would not have completed a peace treaty. When we went to his funeral in Nahalal in his old moshav in Galilee it was a very sad ending to an era. To have both Sadat and Dayan pass away in the same month -- Carter already having left office and Ezer Weizman having resigned from his office -- meant that the Camp David group had pretty much disappeared from power except for Begin. He was the only one left of the original triumvirate, but he had lost his two principal lieutenants. That was another reason why we never succeeded in the Reagan administration in moving forward on the negotiating track. Mubarak was not a Sadat; Begin was no longer the same Begin -- he had Arik Sharon instead of Weizman in the Defense Ministry, and Shamir instead of Dayan in the Foreign Ministry; and Reagan didn't have the same sense of commitment to Middle East peace as Carter had. Those personnel changes made for a very different environment. The month of October, 1981 was the end of the peace process for a long time, although we did not want to acknowledge it so at the time.

Q: After Dayan's death on October 16, 1981, what happened next?

LEWIS: Two days later, on Sunday, Sallie and I drove to Nahalal, the Moshav where Dayan was raised and where his oldest son, Udi, still ran the family farm. There we attended Dayan's funeral. There was an official American delegation led by Attorney General French Smith, but Dayan's death was a very personal sad occasion for the Lewises because both Sallie and I were very close to Moshe and his wife, Rahel. Dayan's first wife, Ruth, the mother of his three children also attended the funeral. The relationship between the two of them was quite strained. The Dayan family has been subjected to a great deal of written scrutiny. Both "yellow" and regular journalism covered it fully; in some sense the Dayans are a star-crossed family. Sallie managed to be good friends with both Ruth and Rahel, which was quite a tribute to her ability to get along with various people. Moshe's death brought all the players together, including two other children -- son Ossi, a Bohemian, rebellious actor -- and daughter Yael -- author, ex-journalist and now an active left-wing Labor politician in Israel. The cemetery was on a hill among a grove of trees overlooking the Galilee Valley, in which Nahalal lies.

The funeral was attended by the greats of Israel -- Prime Minister Begin, Ezer Weizman, who was married to Ruth's sister, Rauma. Dayan and Weizman were brothers-in-law through Moshe's first wife; it was not a comfortable relationship between the two men. I had a number of opportunities to watch that relationship when one was the Foreign Minister and the other the Defense Minister. It was always very puzzling and sad that Dayan, who was considerably older and had been a hero long before Weizman was prominent, never took his brother-in-law very seriously; he considered Weizman as a "fly boy" -- a pilot, neer-do-well playboy. Weizman, on the other hand, almost hero-worshiped Dayan; he tried very hard when both were in the Cabinet to work closely with Dayan, only to be tolerated at best; Dayan never concealed his disdain for Weizman -- unfairly in my view. The end result was that the Foreign and Defense Ministries didn't work together very well at the staff level primarily because of Dayan's disdain.

In a Jewish funeral, the eldest son reads the Kaddish, the prayer for the dead. Udi, who was very estranged from his father, refused to perform. That was just one of the under-currents present at the funeral that afternoon. Nevertheless, I had a sense sitting on that hill-side that part of Israel's history was being buried. I also felt that a lot of the dynamism of the peace process had also passed away. It was a very sad afternoon.

A few days later, Egyptian General Hassan Ali arrived to continue the autonomy negotiations. There had been staff level negotiations before his arrival. Soon thereafter, ministerial level negotiations were convened again. Two ministerial sessions were held during the following month. As I mentioned before, Roy Atherton, our Ambassador to Egypt and I acted as co-chairmen of the U.S. delegation. Later Ambassador Wat Cluverius, who was the head of the U.S. working level team, joined us (he later became Consul General in Jerusalem and now is the head of the MOF (Multi-lateral Observer Force in the Sinai) in Rome). Only a little progress was made in these sessions and it was clear that all momentum had dissipated after Sadat's death.

At the end of October, the AWACs package, which had been the subject of the bitter political Congressional debate during the summer, was approved. In order to sweeten the blow for the Israelis, the Administration decided to extend some additional assurances that Israel's technological edge would be maintained. I delivered a letter to Begin in late October which reiterated U.S. support for Israel and recommitted the U.S. to maintain the military technological edge over the Arab adversaries. Nevertheless, the Israel Cabinet expressed regrets over the AWAC sale, but ultimately the controversy died out, even though the new Administration took a lot of lumps for having forced the package through Congress over Israel's objection. This was a period of "fawning" over Saudi Arabia. Earlier the Saudis had proposed their eight point peace plan -- the Fahd Plan; we had expressed the view that it included some positive signs. Reagan noted that it did include the fact that the Arabs recognized Israel as a sovereign nation to be negotiated with. Of course, that statement did not appear in the Fahd Plan at all; Reagan was merely expressing his impression of the briefings that he had received! That statement gave the Israelis some heart-burn. In the meantime, Israeli Ambassador Evron was warning Secretary Haig in Washington that our support of the Fahd Plan would completely sabotage the autonomy negotiations.

During my tour in Israel, as I mentioned earlier, I found that the only way to escape the constant pressure and to find some relaxation was to go scuba diving. I did that in early November when I flew to Sharm el Sheikh for four or five days of terrific diving at the tip of the Sinai. We drove back to Elat. On the way back, we stopped at a famous diving spot called the "Blue Hole" near Dahab. It is huge hole in the reef in the shape of a cookie-cutter, about 100 yards in diameter; from the air it looks like a giant circular hole in the center of the broad, light colored reef along the shore. I am very proud of the dive I took at the "Blue Hole" that day and that is why I am going at some length to describe the environment. With me, was the Embassy's Naval Attaché, Pete Peterson, who was my frequent diving buddy. He had been a Navy Seal, although as a Seal, he had never done any deep diving; he had mostly dived close to the surface. I had dived to depths considerably deeper than he. Thirty meters (110 feet) is supposed to be the limit for sport divers; in fact, I have gone as deep as 75 meters -- well over 200 feet -- which is very deep -- as a matter of fact, much too deep. Pete had dived primarily between the surface and 20 meters down. With us also was a friend who is an underwater photographer, Jeff Rodman, now well known internationally for his work. He had never dived in the "Blue Hole" but he was an accomplished diver. I had dived there twice before and therefore I led the dive on this occasion. It is a fairly tricky dive and a very exciting one. This was the first time in my life that I had led two more experienced divers. We went down 40 meters into the blue cavern with the hole getting darker and darker. As you approach the bottom, you see the faint outlines of a huge golden arch. As you approach the arch, you see sunlight coming through it. You swim down to 48-50 meters and then you see the opening of the arch; you swim through the arch, through the outside part of the reef and then out into the open sea. The arch is a tunnel that connects the hole and the open sea. It is a very exciting dive. I wouldn't do it now, but it was great fun then. It is a dive that is done frequently, but there have been a number of casualties. About six weeks ago, three Israeli diving instructors were killed diving in the "Blue Hole"; their bodies were found three days later and I don't know the cause of their deaths. It is of course not unknown that experienced divers do crazy things before they dive like drinking beer or diving in the middle of the night by the light of the moon just to show their machismo. If you dive below 35 meters, you can have narcosis which is like being drunk. You lose your sense of self-control, you lose your orientation, your vision blurs (that has happened to me), you feel totally impervious to any danger and you will take crazy chances as the result of the nitrogen's effect on the brain -- it dulls your judgement. That is how people get into trouble; they dive too deep, ignoring rules they know well, then they may have a narcosis attack and lose their sense of judgement -- e.g., they will dive down instead of coming up. Equipment failure is a very rare phenomenon. The problems arise usually from very good divers behaving as they know they shouldn't or from beginners or from divers in very bad physical condition -- they get exhausted and are not able to perform as they should.

I have dived off Papua New Guinea and in the Caribbean; there are many interesting places in the world, but the tip of the Sinai is very special -- it is one of the top two or three diving areas in the world. It has more varieties of fish and corals and clearer water than in most other parts of the world. There are bigger fish elsewhere -- the Pacific, for example, but the Red Sea has the variety.

Diving is what permitted me to live through eight years in Israel; I would not have been able to last that long without it. The opportunity to slip away every two or three months to enjoy a few days of diving made the rest of time bearable; when you dive, you forget everything else. Divers don't discuss politics; they barely know who is the Prime Minister and know little about his views. They discuss diving and fish and it is a great change for anyone in a pressure cooker such as Israel.

I was in Cairo in early November for the last round for a long time of the autonomy talks. The discussions did not make any progress. During the whole month of November, there was a steady drumbeat of concern about Lebanon. The cease fire between the PLO and the Israelis was holding, as far we could see; there had not been any incursions across the northern border, but there had been an increasing number of attacks on Jews elsewhere. People were slipping across the Jordan border and the Israelis reported them to us as violations of the cease fire. The difference of opinion on the definition of the cease-fire was becoming increasingly dangerous. We were still trying to put together a multinational force to police the Sinai. The Israelis continued to balk at the idea of European participation in the force because they felt that Camp David had not been supported by Europe as vigorously as it should have. I kept repeatedly arguing with Begin and Shamir, the Foreign Minister, to little avail. November was a complicated period. Yet it seemed to be in, its own way, a deceptive time because matters were progressing normally -- there were no great crises, which in itself, was unusual.

At the end of November, the Fez Conference was held in Morocco -- an Arab League meeting which expanded further the Fahd Plan, but in fact, weakened it and made it even less interesting to the Israelis. On November 26 -- Thanksgiving Day -- Begin broke his hip in his bathtub, or getting out of his bathtub. He was in considerable pain and had to stay at home for several weeks, bed ridden. He brooded and worried; he became angry. I saw him on a number of occasions in his bedroom. We transacted some business, but he really was not in adequate physical shape particularly in the first couple of weeks to be able to focus very long on any subject. This accident had a significant impact on U.S.-Israeli relationships. I left the day after Begin's mishap to escort Foreign Minister Shamir on a visit to Washington. Sharon was there as well, trying to finish that ill fated "Memorandum of Understanding" on strategic cooperation that he and Weinberger had been drafting for months. It was finally signed on November 30. Shamir went to Washington to meet with Haig, Habib and others to discuss the Fez Plan, the Lebanese issue and the tension created between the two countries by Israel's overflights of Saudi Arabia. The Saudis had deployed tanks and some F-5s at a base near Tabuk in North-west Saudi Arabia, not too distant from Israel. The Israelis were always concerned by what types of planes were stationed at Tabuk because of the very short warning time for Israel that the proximity of the base would provide. Therefore, periodically, without any announcements, the Israeli Air Force would reconnoiter the base and photograph the planes on the base. The Saudis with their AWAC planes were now in a position to detect the Israeli flights, increasing the danger of air encounters because the Saudis might decide to challenge the Israeli flights. We therefore began to intercede with the Israelis to cease these reconnaissance overflights; they felt that they were not harming anybody, but were necessary for their defense. So this issue was on the Washington discussion agenda. Begin angrily rejected the right of the U.S. to raise the issue, although we always made our arguments quite vigorously. Another item for discussion was our continued urging of Israel to permit European countries to participate in the multi-lateral peace-keeping force; ultimately, Haig did obtain Israeli agreement after considerable discussion. The Israeli Cabinet insisted that all European countries that participated would have to formally endorse the Camp David accords and the peace treaty -- that was not an unreasonable demand.

While in the United States, I visited Boston to give a speech to the Union of American Hebrew Congregations' annual convention. This group represented the liberal wing of American Judaism. Sallie was with me. My speech was a summary of the history of the peace process to date. I remember the occasion well because while we were in Boston, it was hit with an incredibly large snow storm which snowed us in for the next day and a half in our hotel. We did manage to stomp out and use the subway a couple of times, but that was the extent of our ventures. I have never seen Boston or any other city as paralyzed as it was on those days; the only similarity in my experience was a snow storm in Washington which had similar effects.

Habib left the U.S. and went to Damascus to try once again to calm the choppy Lebanese waters. He also tried to soften Syrian violent opposition to the peace process between Egypt and Israel. After Syria, he went to Jerusalem, arriving in early December. In the following week, two extraordinary events took place. I was still in the U.S., having finally gotten out of Boston and having gone to New York and seeing some theater -- along with giving a speech to the Council on Foreign Relations on the Israeli situation. We flew out of New York, arriving back in Israel on December 13. I faced a big mess immediately. An extraordinary event had taken place on December 6, 1981 which was connected with the build-up prior to the Lebanon War. This episode was also directly related to events that took place upon my departure five years later, which I will describe in detail later in a special section dealing with the long-running confrontation between General Ariel Sharon and me.

When Habib got to Jerusalem, he brought many complaints from Assad concerning Israeli provocations in Lebanon. We were getting increasing evidence of rising tensions between the Palestinians and the Israelis. The cease fire was still in effect. During early December, my DCM, Bill Brown was in charge of the Embassy. On December 6, there was a meeting at the Foreign Ministry involving Habib, Morris Draper (Habib's Deputy), Bill Brown, Paul Hare (the Embassy's Political Counselor) as note taker, and Fred Raines, our Military Attaché on one side; and Sharon, the Defense Minister, Abrasha Tamir, the Defense Ministry's chief planner and almost alter-ego, a couple of Israeli military officers, Eytan Ben Tsur, the chief of the North American section of the Foreign Ministry, and Hanon Bar-on, the Deputy Director General of the Foreign Ministry on the Israeli side (Bar-on was the Foreign Ministry official we worked with most closely). There may have been some additional participants, but I have mentioned the key ones. The meeting was held at the Foreign Ministry for convenience because Habib was in Jerusalem and Sharon also was there for some other meeting. Shamir was not involved because he was in Washington and had not yet returned. There have been some suggestions made later that Shamir attended, but I do not believe that to be correct. I was briefed fully upon my return about the meeting by Brown, Hare and Raines of my staff as well as by Habib and Draper. I also read the detailed reporting cables they had sent to Washington.

At the meeting, Sharon launched into a diatribe on events in Lebanon, repeating over and over again that the cease fire wasn't working and that there had been innumerable violations. Habib argued about the interpretation of the cease fire; i.e. which activities it covered and which it didn't. At one point, Sharon reared back and said that he wanted to make some things eminently clear. He noted that the U.S. had complained vigorously when the Iraqi nuclear reactor was bombed by the Israelis, even though the U.S. had been clearly warned prior to the event. He then went on to say that he did not wish that there be any more surprises. He said that he was convinced, although the Cabinet might not be, that the solution to the Lebanon problem was to solve it once and for all by driving the PLO out of Lebanon, allowing the government to rule once again over its total country. He continued his presentation, always noting that the ideas were his own and did not have Israeli government approval. His view was that Israel should conduct a major military operation in Lebanon, unless the "violations" ceased. He described in considerable detail what in fact became subsequently the Israeli invasion of Lebanon. It was not an operational plan; he never mentioned going as far as Beirut, but all the other key elements were presented. It was certainly clear that Sharon had a very large military operation in mind which would have driven the PLO out of Lebanon. It would have gone quite far north, driving the Syrians north of the highway between Beirut and Damascus and out of South Lebanon. All of these goals were clearly part of Sharon's plan.

Habib and everybody else was thunder-struck by Sharon's plan, although I think our Embassy staff were not quite as surprised, except for the fact that Sharon was being so open about his views. Maury Draper was absolutely stunned. Habib has been quoted as saying, "You flabbergast me", although that doesn't sound like Habib. What he probably did was to ask some questions such as what the Israelis expected to do with the thousands of Palestinians. Sharon is alleged to have responded, "We'll hand them over to the Lebanese. In any case, we expect to be in Lebanon only for a few days. The Lebanese Christians will take care of them". Habib reacted to the presentation in very strong terms. He said that the Sharon plan was absolutely out of the question. He said that it should not even be contemplated, particularly at that stage of history. He predicted that the whole region would react, probably starting another war. He was very upset and had angry exchanges with Sharon.

The Foreign Ministry officials who attended the meeting were also astounded. They couldn't imagine that the Minister of Defense would discuss with American representatives a military operation of such scope which had never even been whispered to the Cabinet. They wrote up their summary of the meeting very carefully and rushed back to the Foreign Ministry. They immediately called Yehuda Ben Meir, who was the Deputy Foreign Minister, who was a good friend of the U.S. and mine. He had been an American citizen; he was a sociologist; he was a member of the Knesset from the National Religious Party. Yehuda was thunder-struck as could be easily imagined. He reported what he had been told to Shamir -- that is why I am sure that Shamir did not participate in the Habib-Sharon meeting. Yehuda Ben Meir also briefed his two Religious Party colleagues immediately -- Education Minister Hammer and Minister of Interior Burg. Shamir did not react after being briefed. I feel confident that some one briefed Begin, although there is no documentation which speaks to the issue when and how Begin found out about the meeting. He may have read the Foreign Ministry's summary. Bill Brown, who was the acting ambassador, despatched an agitated message to the State Department; it had been drafted by Paul Hare. Habib sent a private message to Haig expressing extreme concern about the scope of Sharon's enterprise, even though Sharon had clearly said that the plan was only hypothetical, it was his personal plan and would probably not receive Cabinet approval. In retrospect, it was clear that Sharon had used the meeting with Habib to prepare the Reagan administration for a large Israeli operation in Lebanon which was likely to occur; he was trying to condition us to accept it when it went into effect.

Sharon's subsequent comments on the Lebanon war makes it clear -- he made his view clear in the meeting with Habib -- that he intended to get the PLO out of Lebanon, thereby safeguarding the northern border, enabling the Lebanese Christians to pacify the country and moving the Syrians out of south Lebanon, sufficiently removed so that they couldn't influence all events in Beirut. In their book on the Lebanon war, Ze'Ev Schiff and Ehud Ya'Ari discuss the Habib-Sharon meeting quite accurately. Schiff is the leading military commentator in Israel. He wrote in 1985 that he had learned about the meeting a few weeks after it had taken place or about the same time that he had gotten his first inkling of the fact that planning for a war in Lebanon was well under way. It is important to note that at the time of the Sharon-Habib meeting, no one in the Cabinet, as far as I know, had any idea of the concept or even that Sharon was about to discuss it.

Q: Was the concept Sharon's own or might it have come from some options presented by Defense Ministry staff?

LEWIS: The concept was Sharon's. There was staff work to support it, but the idea was Sharon's. That is my belief.

In any case, the Habib-Sharon meeting of early December 1981 was an omen of a long diplomatic shadow that would be cast in the future. But there was another event about that time that was more immediately related to U.S.-Israeli relations. Begin, while laying in bed in pain from the broken hip, was listening to the radio and heard President Assad of Syria give a speech in which he rejected the notion of making peace with Zionists, not in a 100 years. Begin brooded about that comment and began to consider that if Syria were never to make peace, Israel should just annex the Golan Heights. The argument went that there would never be any negotiations about the area in any case, and if Assad were going to be so intransigent, why shouldn't Israel proceed with its legal incorporation? I returned to Israel on December 13. The Embassy staff had begun to pick up rumors on Friday, December 11 about something being considered for the Golan. Bill Brown filed a report alerting Washington to these rumors and suggesting the language of a very tough message that he could deliver quickly to the Israeli government before any action could be taken to annex the Heights. In fact, the annexation was announced at a Cabinet meeting on the morning of December 13. Begin actually left his house and this was his first Cabinet meeting after having broken his hip. He surprised everyone in the Cabinet by proposing that Israeli law be extended to the Heights. Technically, that was not the same as annexation but the extension of Israeli law to the area; it was the same formula that was used in 1948 on the status of Jerusalem; that was repeated in 1980 when the Jerusalem law was approved. This legal device has the same effect as annexation, but it is not so named. It theoretically, leaves the door slightly open to subsequent negotiations. The Cabinet was taken aback; Begin was at his most fiery; he denounced Assad. He said that it would be ridiculous not to proceed; it would show the Arabs once and for all that Israel could not be trifled with. At the time, the Golan Heights was occupied territory under military control. There were only 10-12,000 Druze inhabitants from Syrian days in addition to the more recent few thousand Israeli settlers. The Cabinet adopted Begin's proposal. I reached Begin by phone after the Cabinet meeting to attempt (without any formal instructions from Washington) to try to slow him down. It was useless. He was impervious to my arguments. The next day, very quickly before any national debate could develop, or perhaps more importantly, before the U.S. could respond -- which was clearly part of Begin's game plan -- Begin's proposal was put before the Knesset. There was a debate and then the Knesset approved the implementing legislation -- the law passed all three readings in the same day, which was almost unprecedented. It was approved by 63-21 count. The Labor Party boycotted the vote -- they abstained. That was not a very courageous act, but it must be remembered that Labor had been responsible for the Israeli kibbutzim on the Golan. The kibbutz members on the Golan were nearly all Labor supporters. Furthermore, there was a compelling security argument because the Golan was a threat to Israel as shown in the 1950s and 1960s. The Labor Party leaders had always been as tough on the Golan as had the Likud, even though the two parties differed on the West Bank and Gaza. In any case, Labor abstained and did not oppose the Begin proposal because presumably to do so might have left them politically exposed.

The Cabinet and Knesset actions created a fire-storm in Washington, as I had warned Begin they would. There was real anger in the White House. Haig felt double-crossed. Meetings were held to decide on a U.S. response. One of the arguments that had been made by Secretary Haig in support of the Israeli "strategic cooperation" concept, which impelled Reagan to ask Weinberger to take on the task of negotiating with the Israelis, was that once such a formal strategic relationship was in being, events such as the bombing of the Iraqi nuclear reactor would not take place; the assumption was that the Israelis would consult fully with us before taking any aggressive actions. The Haig thought had been implied by Begin and Sharon, if not actually expressed. The Israelis had never made any commitment of that kind, at least not in so many words. They never had promised to consult with us before taking any actions, but we had good reasons to infer that the new relationship would be a closer working one and that as strategic allies, we could reasonably expect the Israelis not to surprise us with an action as far reaching as they proposed for the Golan Heights. That was the White House view and the staff there felt completely double-crossed. The Administration tried to think of an appropriate response which would not weaken Israel's defense capabilities but would get Begin's attention. Finally, Washington decided to suspend implementation of the new "strategic cooperation" agreement, signed only two weeks earlier. The agreement would stay in suspension while a full review of Israeli actions was undertaken with the Israeli government. My friends in Washington said that the ground rules had to be straightened out with Begin so that in the future we would know how to deal with each other. I received a message from Haig which I was to deliver to Begin in which the suspension was announced. It also raised serious questions about the application of Israeli law on the Golan Heights. The message was polite, but we knew that it would not be well received by Begin. But Washington honestly felt that this kind of message was in order to try to convince Begin that he couldn't take actions of this kind unilaterally and with impunity. The alternative courses of action, such as suspension of military aid, would undermine Israel's security. The policy option chosen was the softest, but clearest message that Begin might understand. Begin had put personal great store in this strategic cooperation agreement.

I called the Prime Minister's office for an appointment. I went to see him, although he was still convalescing after his release from the hospital. He was still in bed and not mobile, although greatly improved from the time of his operation. He still had some pain. I took Paul Hare with me as the note-taker. On December 20, we went to Begin's residence in Jerusalem at 9:30 a.m. When we reached the upstairs bedroom, we were met not only by Begin and his assistant, but also by Sharon, Shamir and a couple of others. They were all glowering. Begin was sitting in a chair with his foot up. He was sitting next to a table covered with papers. By this time, Begin already knew about the suspension because it had been announced in Washington two days earlier. He had plenty of time to consider his reaction. The Haig letter had been sent to Begin earlier. I wanted to make sure that Begin understood that we were not canceling the agreement, but only suspending it pending further discussions. My talking points started with that issue.

When I entered the bedroom, it was clear that Begin was in a lot of pain; his face was drawn. He greeted me very cordially; as always he called me "Sam". He told me about his physical condition in answer to my question about his health. He discussed his wife, who was not well. It was an obvious effort on his part to separate his comments on the U.S. action from his relationship with me. His outrage would be with Reagan and Washington. After about five minutes of small talk and pleasantries, he stiffened, he sat up straighter, his face became steely. He reached for the stack of papers on the table and put them on his lap -- he never looked at them. Then he began his lecture. He first said, very somberly, "I have, Mr. Ambassador (when he was angry, he always called me "Mr. Ambassador" so that I always knew when I could expect a blast), a very serious, personal private message to President Reagan which I want you to transmit immediately". So Paul Hare takes out his notebook to record Begin's message. Begin launches into a lecture that lasted about one hour and ten minutes non-stop. His comments were completely extemporaneous. He never looked at a note. He gave a tour de force of Israel's relations with Syria, including all the perfidies that Syria had perpetrated, including the attacks on Israeli territory, the Yom Kippur war and how Israel occupied the Golan Heights in the first place during the 1967 war. He talked about the Israeli casualties, the Holocaust. It was a typical Begin performance when he was in good form; he was at his most scathing. He reviewed the history of "the alliance" with the United States, emphasizing how he and Reagan had reached a most important agreement which would make the U.S. and Israel allies in the future. He then noted that suddenly, without justification, the U.S. had "canceled" the agreement -- he insisted on using the word "canceled". I tried to interrupt to clarify the U.S. action and was just brushed aside. The highlight of the Begin performance was the colorful language used; that became well known subsequently. He said something along these lines' "Do you think that we are teenagers to be punished, slapped on the wrist? Do you think Israel is a vassal state of the United States? Are we just another "banana republic"? Let me tell you, Mr. Ambassador, that this is not Israel!". He went on this vein for 70 minutes and although I tried, I was unsuccessful in interrupting. At the end, I managed to talk about five-ten minutes, trying to clarify the U.S. action which was a "suspension" pending discussions between the two countries to clarify what each could expect from the other. I pointed out that the Israeli action was a strange surprise to spring on an ally, but Begin wasn't having any of it. So we parted. Paul went with me downstairs so that we could return as quickly as possible to Tel Aviv to send a reporting cable -- Tel Aviv being about an hour's drive from Jerusalem. As we walked down the stairs, I looked into the living room of the residence. The whole Cabinet had assembled there along with the Chief of Staff, the Chief of Intelligence -- the high command of the Israeli armed forces. I decided to enter the room and chatted with a couple of them. They did not seem to know why they were there, but they were waiting for Begin to hold a Cabinet meeting. I took my leave, somewhat uneasily. As I left the residence, I ran into a herd of journalists, who had been summoned, as they often were in swarms whenever I came out of the Prime Ministry; there was always a battery of journalists waiting for me. They asked me what had happened and I told them that the Prime Minister had given me a message for President Reagan and that I was on the way to Tel Aviv to send it. Then I left and got into the car with Paul. We started down the hill and had gotten down about half way down when we turned on the news. We heard the Prime Minister's press spokesman giving in English for the foreign media a summary of what Begin had told me, including all the colorful phrases. The briefing was rather lengthy, about fifteen minutes, and very accurate, practically word for word.

The White House was furious at this broad-side attack, not only because of its treatment of the U.S. Ambassador, but more importantly for the tone of the attack on the United States. The temperature of the U.S.-Israel relationships plummeted to sub-Arctic levels immediately. I found out later what the Cabinet meeting that I had stumbled into was all about. That is an interesting story in itself. Years after the fact, it became clear that Begin's anger about the suspension of the Memorandum of Agreement resulted first in his lecture to me, but also in the first proposal to the cabinet for a Lebanon invasion. Sharon had asked all the military leaders to attend because he had been asked by Begin to brief the Cabinet on the whole operation called "Big Pines" -- the full version that eventually took place. Although in very much greater detail, it was essentially the plan that Sharon had presented to Habib as his "personal" idea two and half weeks earlier. It was however, the first time the Cabinet had ever heard of it at all, except Shamir who had been briefed by Foreign Ministry staff after the Habib-Sharon meeting.

At the Cabinet meeting, Begin was still angry and livid; he was all fired up. They carried him downstairs to the living room where he chaired the Cabinet meeting. I am told that he asked for Cabinet approval of the Lebanon operation to be initiated at whatever moment seemed to be appropriate in light of PLO actions. The Cabinet was thunder-struck and a number of them asked Sharon a lot of questions. Simcha Erlich, who was the Liberal Deputy Prime Minister and Finance Minister and a well known "dove", and others, raised serious questions about the whole concept. During the discussions, it was Sharon who defended the operation; Begin apparently just listened to both sides. After a while, it became clear to Begin that he didn't have a majority ready to vote on the proposal. So with a lot of anger, he closed the debate, adjourned the meeting and was taken back upstairs. That was the first of several Israeli Cabinet meetings on the "Big Pines" proposal. Each time, it was deferred or not approved; there was enough opposition to forestall Begin and Sharon from bringing the proposal to a vote lest they seriously splinter the Cabinet. There were at least two or three other occasions between January and June during which inconclusive Cabinet discussions were held. After a while, Begin and Sharon concluded that their Cabinet colleagues were "weak-kneed, lily-livered faint hearts" who could not be persuaded to accept the total proposal. At that stage, Sharon recast the nature of the operation and convinced Begin that the Israelis needed only to project their force 50 kilometers into Lebanon to clean out the PLO artillery and Katusha rockets; thereafter, the Cabinet discussion until the war started was about a much smaller and less frightening operation than had been originally presented. It became, for discussion purposes, only an incursion, slightly larger than the one that took place in 1978.

Not only was the U.S. angry about the substance of his lecture, but I was personally furious at Begin for the manner in which he handled the "private" message to Reagan including a serious breach of diplomatic protocol by giving me a message that had been transmitted "immediately" when in fact the press was to be briefed before I could even return to Tel Aviv. I should add parenthetically that the mechanics used by Begin tells us something about the Prime Minister's extraordinary memory. I understood later that before the "Big Pines" briefing, Begin started the Cabinet meeting by recounting, from memory and without notes, precisely what he had said to me upstairs. His lecture to me was in English; his description of events to the Cabinet was in Hebrew. His press secretary made notes of his comments to the Cabinet, went outside to brief the press in English, and despite the double-translation, the press got almost a verbatim version of what I had heard. It was a technically extraordinary feat. In any case, I was thoroughly angry with Begin about the way he had toyed with me and the United States.

Senator Percy happened to visit Israel right after Christmas. Percy had been briefed on recent events, had met with Foreign Ministry staff and was greatly concerned with the drift of the situation, particularly about the cooling of U.S.-Israel relations. At the same time, he was also angry with Begin and the Israelis as we all were. Moshe Arens who was to be the Israeli Ambassador in Washington hosted a dinner for Percy on the night of December 29. Before that dinner, I took Percy to see Begin at the latter's residence. They met for more than an hour with me essentially taking notes. Toward the end, Percy, while trying to stay cordial, was attempting to convince Begin that he needed to take into greater account, U.S. -- both administration and Congressional -- feelings in matters such as the recent events. When Percy finished, I said, "Mr. Prime Minister, there is something that I wanted to talk to you about before we leave. It concerns me personally". I then really laid him out for the handling of the "urgent and private" message to the President. I described in unmistakable terms what normal diplomatic practices were and how he had violated them. I told him that I felt that I had been treated like an idiot by his performance. For the only time in my recollection of my relationship with Begin, he apologized; he really was quite contrite. He said he had never considered events in that light; it had never crossed his mind that he was violating diplomatic protocol. He was so intent on getting his point across publicly in the most dramatic manner that he just didn't consider the potential negatives. He was so contrite, which was so unlike Begin, that I will never forget it. Percy was the only witness.

1981 ended with U.S.-Israel relationships in a deep freeze.

Q: That brings us to January 1, 1982. What happened next?

LEWIS: As the New Year dawned, I received a message requesting that I return to Washington for consultations. Our Ambassador to Egypt, Roy Atherton, received a similar request. We were to return to the U.S. to discuss what could be done about the autonomy negotiations and the peace process. I was also to discuss the perilous state of U.S.-Israel relations. I returned on Sunday, January 3. I spent all day Monday in a series of meetings with the NEA Assistant Secretary, Nick Veliotis, and his staff. We discussed various ways to re-start the autonomy negotiations which had been postponed since the November round at the Israeli request. By this time, it was clear that both Israel and Egypt were far more preoccupied with the completion of the peace treaty. Egypt was especially concerned with the final withdrawal of Israeli forces from the Sinai by the end of April as provided by the treaty. The autonomy talks were of second priority. The U.S. administration, and Secretary Haig specifically, had not yet completely abandoned the notion that the Camp David process should be pushed. He was of the opinion, however, that the focus would have to be on the peace treaty and the withdrawal of Israeli forces, although he also would have liked to keep the autonomy talks moving. He said that he would visit Mubarak and Begin to see whether he couldn't get the two parties to continue their negotiations, particularly the Israelis. I had discussions with Haig, the White House staff, the Pentagon, CIA and other places in Washington. I was principally interested in getting a sense of the inter-agency view of Israel at that stage. Everybody was mad at the Israelis because of the Golan affair and Begin's comments about the United States. At the same time, there was rising concern about Israeli plans for Lebanon. Habib's reports on his conversation with Sharon had been taken very seriously in Washington. No one, however, had any idea about slowing Israel's momentum; the Palestinians were restive. The situation was very tense.

In response to a question on January 9, the Department's press spokes-person said that we were unwilling to reestablish strategic cooperation with Israel because of the Golan Heights matter. We wanted clarification of the situation before we would end the suspension of the agreement. Haig left for the region the following day. He first visited Cairo, where he said publicly that Mubarak had given him a clear and firm commitment to intensify efforts to reach agreement on the autonomy talks. I later was given to understand from Haig, via Harvey Sickerman, his special assistant who was with the Secretary, that in fact when Haig left Cairo, he knew from Mubarak that the Egyptians wanted to put the autonomy talks on ice; they wanted to concentrate on getting the Israelis out of the Sinai. Haig's comments were actually a smokescreen.

When Haig reached Israel on January 14, he met with Begin, Sharon, Shamir and others. In his meeting with Begin, there was some discussion of the autonomy talks. The Israelis were much more anxious to keep them going than the Egyptians; they pressed Haig to urge Mubarak to join in. They wanted us to intervene on their behalf with Mubarak so that the Egyptians would make a high level commitment to the autonomy talks. But Mubarak was elusive; he had other more important issues to attend.

The main subject of the Haig visit was Israel's intentions toward Lebanon and associated with that, what was to be done about the Golan Heights. The meetings were not entirely satisfactory on either subject, but Begin did give some assurances that Israel would not attack anyone in Lebanon without clear provocation. He urged the U.S. to do everything possible to make the cease fire effective and to warn the Syrians not to complicate matters. When Haig returned to Washington at the end of January, he did tell the press that he didn't believe that any autonomy agreement would be concluded in the near future. He did not give any indication of a diminished U.S. interest in the issue. This period was a busy time for the Embassy. There were a lot of visitors -- Congressional and others.

Toward the end of January, Haig decided that he would make one more trip to the region. He asked Atherton, Cluverius and me to meet him in Geneva, prior to his arrival in the region. So on January 26, I flew to Switzerland and met that evening with the assembled group. The next morning, I flew back to Israel with the Secretary and his party which included Richard Fairbanks, the to-be appointed U.S. representative to the autonomy negotiations. Fairbanks had been the Assistant Secretary for Congressional Affairs and was well connected politically with the Reagan team. I thought at the time that he was a strange choice to replace Phil Habib; he had little experience; he was a lawyer; he was active, smart, self-confident, but no Middle East experience and little diplomatic experience. I learned much, much later that Fairbanks' appointment, although somewhat cynical, was very sensible. Haig knew nothing was going to happen on the autonomy talks for many months, but he didn't want to admit that the process was dead because that might create tensions between Israel and Egypt. He knew Mubarak didn't want any action and that Begin was increasingly preoccupied by other issues such as Lebanon and Syria. Fairbanks was appointed essentially as a holding action, keeping the position as negotiator filled, and to tour around the region periodically to give the appearance of diplomatic action. It was never intended to be a serious appointment. Nevertheless, Fairbanks was with the Secretary on his January, 1982 trip; it was an opportunity for the Secretary to introduce him to the Israeli and the Egyptians. That would give him some status. Fairbanks was insecure and knew that he was not equipped for the job, but he played the role adequately, particularly since little was expected of him.

Towards the end of January, troubles erupted in Syria. Assad's forces were attacked by Muslim fundamentalists in a number of cities. These were serious terrorist-guerrilla operations against the Syrian regime. The end result was that in a matter of a few weeks, Assad sent the Army into Homs, Hama and Aleppo. The Army shelled these towns and in Hama especially it leveled the town. In the process, according to the information we received, 20-25,000 people were killed by the Syrian Army -- mostly, if not all, women and children -- the families of the Muslims. The Muslim Brotherhood was effectively squashed and their rebellion was over. The cities became ghost towns; they have never been rebuilt in the same way. It was an excellent illustration on how to extinguish a rebellion with cold blooded brutality. Assad was in very bad health at the time and his regime was quite shaky, but he held on tenaciously. The Israelis took very careful note of Assad's action and later made prominent mention of the lack of international reaction to this brutality in contrast to the international comments on Israeli behavior in the West Bank and Gaza.

Fairbanks was not formally appointed as the U.S. representative until the Haig party returned to Washington. Mubarak went to Washington in early February for reassurance that we would insist that the peace treaty would be fully implemented. There was an increasing amount of nervousness in Egypt that Israel, in the final analysis, would refuse to withdraw completely from the Sinai. Indeed, Sharon had been making suggestions along these lines, which made the Egyptians very nervous. In mid-February, Fairbanks made his first official visit to Israel. It was very formal and little was accomplished. He did test the waters.

Q: Who supported Fairbanks?

LEWIS: He had the same team that Habib had been working with. In the absence of any active negotiations, Fairbanks went around and consulted, trying to find any means to get the autonomy negotiation started again. Everybody was polite, but no one really cared. There were still at this time a lot of exchanges between Cairo and Jerusalem; Shamir and Sharon both went back and forth. There were a lot of efforts being made to agree on the final withdrawal details.

In early February, Sallie and I visited Jordan at the invitation of Dick Viets, our Ambassador in Amman. He had been my first DCM in Tel Aviv (1977-79). It gave me an opportunity to become better acquainted with the Jordanians; I had been there once before when Tom Pickering was Ambassador. I again found King Hussein and his people very eager to talk to me about the Israelis; the Jordanians were always anxious to know what the Israeli leadership was like and what it thought. I had a long lunch with the King and General [Sharif Zaid] bin Shakar and later I met with the Crown Prince and other Jordanian leaders. They were very nervous about events in Israel and particularly about Israeli intentions in Lebanon. The King was convinced that a plot was being hatched which would include an attack on the Palestinians which would once again complicate his life by driving some of them back into Jordan; in light of the Jordan-PLO history, that was a troublesome prospect. He wanted to know to what extent the Sinai withdrawal was likely to take place, although he did indicate some skepticism. All Jordanians were suspicious of Israeli intentions, particularly on withdrawal.

Sometime in February, Shamir had visited Cairo with the express intent on making arrangements for a Mubarak visit to Israel. He had never been there and the Israelis were anxious to expose him to their country. Unfortunately -- I believe at Begin's initiative -- the Israelis assumed that if the President of Egypt would come to Israel, he would come on an official visit and would visit Jerusalem. Sadat had set that precedent, but Mubarak was too faint-hearted and was greatly concerned by Arab reactions. Therefore, he postponed the trip making his reasons eminently clear -- he did not use some vague diplomatic formulations, which would have been much wiser. Instead, he made it clear that he would not come to Jerusalem. Once the issue had been raised, the anti-Egyptians and those who were sensitive to Jerusalem's status, immediately advised Begin that no one should be welcomed in Israel on an official visit unless they visit Jerusalem. Begin fully agreed. In effect, they shot themselves in the foot by insisting on a Jerusalem visit, thereby eliminating any possibility of a Mubarak visit, which still hasn't taken place although we are now in 1991. This issue remains a very sore subject between Israel and Egypt.

The spring of 1982 was filled with disagreements on the cease-fire in Lebanon -- its extent and application. We continued to try to smooth matters over and to stave off trouble. There were an increasing number of incidents outside of Israel between Palestinian elements and Jews, with each one being considered by Israel as a major violation. The Israeli press increasingly beat the war drums, using each one of these "major violations" as an excuse for the policy of cleaning out the threats from South Lebanon. On April 3, an Israeli diplomat, Jacob Bar-Simenthal was assassinated in Paris; the PLO was blamed. That Spring, there was also an attack on a Jewish synagogue in Paris during which a number of people were killed. These incidents did inflame Israeli views toward the PLO. Cap Weinberger had planned a trip to Israel during this time, but on April 5, Shamir gave a very fiery speech at Bar-Simenthal's funeral, saying that Israel would strike at the PLO without reservations if these acts of terrorism did not cease; the next day, Weinberger canceled his trip, although I don't know how closely the two events were connected. State had recommended the cancellation because it was felt that Weinberger's presence in Israel could only complicate matters. Throughout April, we were increasingly focusing on the final Sinai withdrawal arrangements which had become more difficult with every passing day. Sharon was becoming more and more obstreperous; he was accusing the Egyptians of not fulfilling all of their treaty obligations. Both Begin and he were discussing publicly the need for Egypt to meet all of its commitments before Israel met all of its. A "chicken" game was developing and we were extremely concerned that the whole treaty would fall apart at the last minute because the Israelis would not complete their withdrawal. In retrospect, we were probably overly concerned; I am convinced that Begin never had the slightest doubt about fulfilling Israel's treaty commitments, but he was determined to squeeze as much out of the Egyptians as he could; it was clear that they were not meeting all of their obligations. Begin was a tough bargainer and may have bluffed us into being more concerned than we needed to be. He certainly did worry us; we were also concerned about developments in Lebanon which appeared to be increasingly likely to lead to a major clash; so we had two major concerns on our hands simultaneously -- the situation in the area could have been greatly upset by either, not to mention both. We had a scare in mid-

April when we spotted Israeli troop movements near the Lebanon border; we had intelligence warnings all the time. I went to see Begin to show our concerns and he assured me that no decision had been made to attack Palestinian targets; that did not mean that such a decision might not be made. The atmosphere was tense; I had repeated meetings with Begin and Sharon -- sometimes together. Since December, Sharon had become increasingly difficult to deal with; he was abusive; he didn't listen; he made no effort to try to resolve real or perceived problems; he was defiant; essentially, he was sticking his thumb in our eyes every time he got a chance. He kept repeating, "Don't think we will surprise you; if these Palestinian acts continue, we will clean them out". He was in fact making his view clear that we would have to swallow what ever Israel decided to do. Both Washington and I continued to send warnings, argued and rebutted, although I must say that the Embassy was not getting a lot stern messages from Washington to support our position. I believe that Haig had concluded as early as January/February that at some point, the Israelis would be sufficiently provoked that they would invade Lebanon and clobber the Palestinians. Haig didn't really like the PLO and therefore may have considered the Israelis' idea not so bad.

In the middle of April, another unanticipated event occurred which raised tensions a great deal. An American-Israeli, Aaron Harry Goodman, went crazy and shot his way up unto the Dome of the Rock. He was an Israeli soldier. He killed two Arab guards, wounded a number of worshipers. There were protests during which rocks were thrown. It was a terrible mess. Goodman was indeed out of his mind. The Arab world seized the event as an opportunity to show how unreliable Israel was in safeguarding the Temple Mount. Tensions rose drastically. We made some tough public statements in Washington, but we soon understood that the act was that of a madman. No one else seemed or wanted to understand that. There was a major debate in the Security Council. Israel was condemned by all sides which put us in the position of both defending and denouncing Israel. On April 12, Nick Veliotes, who was in Israel on a brief visit, returned to Washington and on his recommendation, the Administration decided to appoint Deputy Secretary Walter Stoessel as a kind of trouble shooter. He was to go to Israel and Egypt to try to ease some of the tensions that were generated by the Israeli retreat from the Sinai. His appointment was intended to get us over this rough period because he was a high level official.

The problem was that Cairo was dragging its feet on the treaty violations that Israel alleged; some in Israel were talking about not completing the Sinai withdrawal. Stoessel's job was to mediate and to make sure that the complete withdrawal would take place. He had never been involved in Middle East affairs, but was an old pro, a fine person and an experienced diplomat. He was very gracious, proper and formal, while warm at the same time. When he came to the region, he essentially put himself in Roy Atherton's and my hands. We worked very closely with him during the following couple of weeks. He met with Begin, who took a liking to him. Stoessel essentially shuttled between Cairo and Jerusalem. During his visit, we worked out some language for an informal memorandum of understanding, covering the points at issue. That documented was negotiated with both sides and became a cover for the political leadership. It in effect made the United States the guarantor of all that was to happen. Begin over-ruled Sharon, who was arguing that complete withdrawal be delayed. Begin, as I said, had complete withdrawal in mind all along, but needed a senior American mediator to help him in his internal arguments. Sharon had raised so much fuss about these alleged treaty violations that Begin needed this help. Many of Sharon's allegations were insignificant in any case, but he seemed determined to thwart the treaty, although I do not know why. It may have gone back to the questions which stalled the Taba negotiations for so long. Sharon and others, including Begin, were always very unhappy about the fact that at Camp David the Israelis had to agree to total withdrawal from the Sinai. They gave up airfields and settlements near the border. They had to give up the last inch of territory. There was considerable criticism in Israel of Begin and Sharon and the administration after Camp David for accepting total withdrawal because that policy might set a precedent for the Syrians and the Golan Heights and for the Jordanians and the Palestinians and the West Bank. The argument went that once it was agreed to withdraw entirely from the Sinai, then there could be no compromises for any other occupied territories. Sharon apparently had bought that argument fully and was therefore determined not to evacuate the Sinai completely. Begin was also sympathetic to the argument, but was ultimately governed by a sense of honor which bound him to a treaty that he had signed. Both would have preferred to find a way not to return all of the Sinai, even if they were just small pieces that were under dispute; they thought that might be helpful later when other agreements had to be negotiated with other Arab countries. That is how the Taba affair began. Sharon staked out about 14 different points along the demarcation line where there was disagreement between Israel and Egypt on where the boundary should be. Sharon was determined not to give on any of these areas at issue. Ultimately, the negotiators put off the settlement of these border disputes; that allowed the withdrawal to be completed. That was Stoessel's achievement. It was hard work, late nights; we worked in the Consul General's offices in Jerusalem since we were working with the Israelis in Jerusalem and needed a secure phone to talk to Atherton in Cairo. At one point we had the Israeli negotiators, including Eli Rubenstein and David Kimche, come to the Consulate General which is something that they had never done. The Israeli government has never recognized the existence of that Consulate General and therefore is reluctant to deal with it at all. That attitude stemmed from the Corpus Separatum concept of 1948 which suggested that we didn't recognize Jerusalem as the capital of Israel; that is why our Embassy is in Tel Aviv. That concept created great "angst" for the Israelis; they were unhappy that our representation in Jerusalem was a Consulate General and not an Embassy; they have never quite recognized the existence of our representation. But in 1982, the Israelis were so anxious to get the withdrawal issue resolved by April 25 that their Civil Servants -- the professionals with whom we worked closely and well -- actually came to the Consulate General for the first time. Not only did they visit the CG's residence, but they actually went upstairs to the offices and were present as we spoke over secure lines to Cairo -- just as the Egyptians were with Roy at the other end of the line. At that point, Stoessel was in Cairo, hammering out the language on the informal memorandum that was to serve as the bridge for withdrawal. The Israelis were very curious about the Consulate General; what it was like, how it looked. They had never been inside. They admitted that it had never occurred to them that they would be there; sometimes diplomatic requirements must override political sensitivities.

The Stoessel shuttles were completed on the night before the final withdrawal as to take place, which was April 25. Stoessel had returned from Cairo at 1 a.m. on the morning of the 25th. He slept in Jerusalem for about four hours and had his first meeting of the day at 7:30 a.m. I met him there having driven up from Tel Aviv early that morning. We met with Begin at 8 a.m.; Stoessel had a tete-a-tete with Begin which was important to the Prime Minister because it gave an impression to his political colleagues that there had been a private message for him from the Egyptians -- which in fact there hadn't been. But it helped him to close the loop in the Cabinet.

The private meeting was followed by a Cabinet meeting with Sharon et al. There had to be a signing ceremony for the document that closed the Sinai withdrawal chapter which dealt with how the disputed areas were going to be handled. The Egyptian Ambassador to Israel, Saad Mortada, had been authorized to sign on behalf of his country so that the signing could take place in Israel. The ceremony which was to take place on the 25th kept being delayed; around 1 p.m. we sent the Israelis' final text to Atherton in Cairo. We then waited for Egyptian approval; withdrawal would not start until the document had been approved by all parties. The 25th passed and we still didn't have the Egyptians' reply. Technically, the peace treaty had been violated, which is something we all wanted to avoid -- except maybe Sharon. So we moved the clock back as is often done in international conferences. Eventually, the Egyptians replied positively and the Ambassador was authorized to sign the document. Shamir was spending that night at the Plaza Hotel; we, the Americans and Ambassador Mortada, took the document to the hotel from the American Consulate General where we had all been waiting. Shamir was asleep; so Mortada signed and left the paper with us to get Shamir's signature! The Egyptian Ambassador was a very cooperative diplomat. At 1 a.m., we did get Shamir's signature although it was dated April 25. We then turned the clocks back to their right times. Stoessel flew back to Washington and the Israelis began their withdrawal from the Sinai. But the whole episode was a cliff-hanger.

One of the most difficult parts of the withdrawal was the movement of the Israeli settlers from the Sinai. That was one of the more dramatic episodes of the whole affair. Israeli TV gave it full coverage. Sharon, as Defense Minister, had to send the Army to drag the settlers, one by one, away from their homes and back into Israeli territory. They fought like tigers, attacking their own soldiers who had to use foam; all of this appeared on TV. Many settlers from the West Bank went down to the Yammit -- a settlement in the Sinai -- to help the people there to defend themselves from the Israeli army. much of the fighting stemmed from the provocative actions of the West Bank fanatics. It reminded me very much of the worst scenes we had in this country during the anti-Vietnam demonstrations. It was terribly traumatic for an Israeli Army to be attacked and to attack some of the finest Israeli youths, who were all wearing their yarmulkes. The pictures had a great psychological effect on the Israeli population. It seared the Israelis' public soul; I believe it was calculated to do so. The leaders of the groups that defended Yammit were cynically determined to make the withdrawal of the settlers so painful to the government and the public that it could never be repeated on the West Bank or other areas if withdrawal would be required from those areas in the future. It did have that effect; the forced withdrawal and the subsequent demolition of Yammit by the Israeli Army were not soon forgotten and is still remembered today. Sharon insisted on the destruction of the settlement, despite the fact that the Egyptians had indicated a willingness to pay for the buildings. Sharon spuriously argued that it was too close to the border and that it would be much safer to have just a ruin there so that it could not become a terrorist base in the future. Sharon rejected the Egyptians' offer and Begin for some reason supported him. Yammit was an exception; the settlements further south along the Sinai coast were turned over to the Egyptians intact and due compensation was paid. Yammit was turned over in ruins, after the population had been dragged out screaming and kicking. But it had the effect that Sharon hoped to create. Today, Israeli public sentiment about forced evacuation is governed by its memory of Yammit. I doubt whether anything like it will ever be repeated. There may be voluntary evacuations, but no forced ones, especially if the Army is required.

Otherwise, the evacuation of the Sinai went very smoothly. The pull-back was executed on schedule; all the detailed agreements were followed to the letter. Parenthetically, at about this time, Begin took a couple of demonstrative steps which in fact said that Israel had withdrawn this time, but would never do it again. For example, he gave a speech in the Knesset on May 3 in which he said that after the interim period specified by the Camp David agreements, Israel would assert its claims for sovereignty to other territories as authorized by the agreements. He was putting all on notice that Sinai was not a precedent for other occupied territories. The Knesset voted 58-54 in favor of a Begin proposal which opposed any dismantling of settlements which might result from future peace negotiations. The Knesset also approved Begin's proposal that after the interim period Israeli sovereignty should be extended to the occupied territories. That just a demonstration of Begin's defiance and bitterness about the Sinai withdrawal; the action had an effect on the Egyptians and other Arabs. The Cabinet passed a resolution which rejected any efforts not to hold future autonomy talks in Jerusalem -- the Israeli position being that if they were to be held in Cairo, they should also be held in Jerusalem, not in Herzliyya or other cities. That just increased the difficulties of having autonomy talks in the future.

These actions were just part of a large Israeli campaign to minimize the Sinai withdrawal and harden the Israeli position on other matters. It was driven by the bitterness and frustration felt by the Israeli leaders. It certainly made it clear to Egypt that the chances of completing the Camp David accords were very slim, if at all. Egypt got the Sinai back, but the Israelis were making it clear that it was not a precedent for the West Bank or the Golan. That was the tacit statement being sent by these statements.

On May 21, Sharon went to Washington. This was the climactic moment before the Lebanon war. It was the last chance for us to block the invasion. We now know that during the preceding three months, as I have said, Begin and Sharon had brought the Lebanon plan before the Cabinet at least a couple of times, but did not obtain a consensus. Then Sharon laid before the cabinet the more modest plan, which called only for an incursion to a depth of fifty kilometers, to eliminate the Katusha rockets which were indeed a threat to the Israeli towns close to the northern border. The Cabinet was lulled into approving that "limited" operation as necessary. It left the timing of the operation to Begin and Sharon, presumably depending on further Palestinian incursions. But the gun was cocked when Sharon arrived in Washington. It had not been fired yet. Sharon's purpose for the visit was to sound out Haig and to make an assessment of possible U.S. reaction which he was to report to Begin upon his return. The question was, "Could Israel "get away" with it without any massive American reaction?". I went back to Washington on May 24 to participate in the Sharon meetings; I did not assume that the meetings would go smoothly. I had long before concluded that the Lebanon war was one that was just waiting to take place. The chances increased with every Palestinian attack.

But I had never fully understood how committed Sharon was to his original plan. All the press leaks, of which there were many, discussed only the more modest plan. Our intelligence had not picked up any indication that the press was not correct. We knew that the Cabinet was divided, with a number of Ministers opposing any Lebanon operation.

While in Washington, I met with Charlie Hill, Larry Eagleburger, Nick Veliotis, and Secretary Haig to discuss how Sharon might be handled. Sharon had a meeting with Weinberger in the morning which was a stand off -- very formal, but with little substance. In the afternoon of May 25, we met in the Secretary's conference room on the Seventh Floor. Sharon made a presentation of his bellicose views of the Lebanon situation -- the Palestinian threat, Israel's unwillingness to allow further violations of the cease fire, Israel's interpretation of the cease fire. Sharon made the same statements that had been made several times previously, "We are not going to surprise you. We are putting the U.S. on notice. We are not looking for trouble, but we can't accept current conditions much longer. So don't be surprised if we respond in a massive way to these dastardly attacks". Haig clearly followed the line that we had agreed upon. Sharon had taken the maps out so that he could show what might happen if the Palestinians didn't desist. The maps of course only showed the southern Lebanon area. Haig repeatedly said that we considered the situation very dangerous; that we did not consider the cease fire to have been violated; we believed that Israel had a legitimate right to self-defense, but that international sentiment had to be considered. Haig's view was, which I believe was supported by Reagan, that any country had the right to self-defense. The U.S. would therefore not tell Israel that it couldn't do so, preemptively if necessary, although he didn't use that phrase. But all actions and reactions had to be weighed against a framework of proportionality. Haig emphasized that if Israel were threatened or actually attacked, its response would have to have international understanding that it was proportionate. That was the central message to Sharon which was given several times during the meeting. Sharon was never told that Israel could not or must not strike at the PLO, but he certainly should have understood that anything like we now know he was planning was totally unacceptable. The conclusion that Ze'Ev Schiff -- a writer -- and others drew -- namely that Sharon had gotten a green light -- was incorrect. One might argue that he got an amber light, but certainly not a green light, at least not while I was present. Unfortunately after this meeting, Haig met privately with Sharon. I have to assume that the Secretary used the same line. Although it is conceivable that there might have been some other nuances, I find it hard to believe. Haig may have shown more sympathy for Israel's dilemma in private because he was in fact sympathetic to Israel's problems with the PLO and the Syrians.

After the meeting, Veliotis and I met with Hill and agreed that the Secretary had not delivered the message in sufficiently tough terms. For us, it raised a serious question on how Sharon would describe the meeting to Begin after his return to Israel. When we had a chance to meet with Haig, we suggested that he write a letter to Begin stating in clear terms what the U.S. position was, so that Sharon's report couldn't be distorted. Nick and I drafted such a letter which Haig signed and I carried back to Israel. The letter was very clear; it followed the policy that had been given to Sharon in good strong terms. Subsequently, from a number of sources, we found out that when Sharon got back he went to see Begin and reported that the Americans would not bother Israel and that Israel should proceed to do what it had to do. The U.S. would make some noise, but wouldn't take any adverse actions. We would swallow Israel's attack. When Begin read Haig's letter, he had Sharon's oral report and therefore leaned to Sharon's interpretation. Objectively, one would have to conclude that at this stage, the only way Begin and Sharon could have been dissuaded from their venture would have been for Reagan to write a very tough letter which would not have left any doubt in any one's mind that the U.S. would react forcefully and strenuously if Israel invaded Lebanon. Such a letter would have had to convey clearly that if such event would occur, the U.S. would suspend all assistance, etc.; in fact, it would have had to contain a real ultimatum of the kind we have never delivered to Israel, even during the Lebanon war. I did deliver one ultimatum to Begin at a later point after the war had begun to warn about making any further attacks on the Syrians. It was, however, written in very polite language and didn't include any specific threat beyond the general one that our relationships would be adversely effected, which carried some meaning, but lacked specificity. Even an ultimatum of that kind probably would not have been sufficient in May, 1982; there was too much momentum behind Sharon's operation. If we had been willing, we might have sent a real red light, but it was not realistic to expect that, given the U.S. politics, the history and the relationship. It was not the kind of message that any American President, at least since Eisenhower in 1956, had ever given Israel and may never do so. In any case, Sharon returned to Israel and matters unraveled quickly. I returned on May 29 and delivered the letter. Begin read it and said he understood, but reiterated the standard arguments about the PLO increasing threat which could not be tolerated much longer.

On June 4, Shlomo Argoff, the Israeli Chargé d'Affaires in London, was attacked by an assassin, shot in the head and almost killed. He is still alive, but in a vegetable state. It was a very sad event. The PLO denied all responsibility; the slim evidence that does exist suggests that the assassin probably belonged to another Palestinian group -- an extremist gang like Abu Nidal -- and not the main line PLO. But it was certainly a Palestinian attack. On the next day, the Israelis bombed Beirut and the PLO headquarters very heavily with quite a few deaths. Then PLO signed its own death warrant. Arafat, despite a considerable number of warnings not to provoke the Israelis, apparently felt he had no option because of his honor and the morale of his men. He ordered his men to fire on Kiryat Shimona and other northern settlements with Katusha rockets and artillery. That caused retaliatory Israeli air strikes; the PLO then increased their counter artillery fire. I must say that I have never understood what might have been going through Arafat's mind at this moment. It was clear by June 4 and 5 that Israel was just waiting for an excuse to invade Lebanon. Nevertheless, the PLO responded in such a way to make an invasion inevitable -- it may have been that anyway, but the PLO through its actions made it a certainty. The invasion began on June 6. That was the beginning of the Lebanon war, a war which didn't reflect well on anybody -- not on the Israelis, not on the PLO, not terribly well on the U.S.. We knew it was coming, we tried to stop it, but our efforts were not sufficiently threatening. They were not halfhearted, but they were inadequate for the challenge -- no major and very tough ultimatums. We couldn't put any breaks on the PLO. The Lebanon war was a tragedy for all concerned -- the Palestinians, the Lebanese and for Israel. It led to a national crisis which in many ways has never been resolved.

Q: How did Shultz become secretary of State?

LEWIS: At the time of Haig's resignation, Shultz was teaching at the University of Chicago. He had been a member of Nixon's Cabinet -- Secretary of Labor, Secretary of Treasury and Director of OMB. He had been considered for Secretary of State at the beginning of the Reagan administration. There was a story, which I consider fairly credible, that Shultz had been selected to be Secretary upon the recommendations of Reagan's "kitchen cabinet". Reagan had called Shultz and offered him a Cabinet position, but apparently was quite vague about which job it was. Shultz, based on press leaks and other rumors, assumed that Reagan was referring to Secretary of Treasury or some other position in the economic sphere. That didn't interest him, so he turned down the offer politely without being aware that it was the Secretary of State position that he was refusing. That is how Haig became Secretary of State. There are several people who give credence to this story although I don't have any first hand knowledge about it. In any case, Shultz was well known commodity in Washington. He was an excellent choice. He was one that I eventually became to regard very highly and to work with easily. I also had a good working relationship with Al Haig; in fact, I think that he was a better Secretary of State than history has credited him so far. His personal style just didn't fit in with the Reagan team; Haig was his own worst enemy in the way he tried to exert his own leadership. That did not fit with a management style which was not very clear about responsibilities; the White House staff could not accept some one who tried to assert his primacy over an area of responsibility as Haig was accustomed to doing.

In any case, by early July, 1982 I was back in Israel after two trips to Washington in June, one with Begin. Haig was trying to run Middle East policy from his house as Shultz hadn't yet been sworn in and Haig was still technically in the job. Shultz was finally appointed in mid July. We had problems in New York in the U.N. Security Council which was considering resolutions calling for PLO limited withdrawal from Beirut and for Israeli forces from Lebanon. The U.S. vetoed such resolutions because we were, at that stage, still supporting the Israeli contention that the PLO had to leave Lebanon before a modicum of order could be restored to the area. The news out of Beirut suggested a very nasty situation. The press was hammering the U.S. administration, accusing it of having approved the Israeli invasion. On June 30, at a press conference, Reagan denied that rumor, even while the Israelis launched an attack on West Beirut from a distance with artillery shells. The President added however that we agreed with the Israeli position that all PLO forces had to withdraw from Lebanon. The Israelis had told us repeatedly that they did not wish to enter West Beirut and wished that we would find some way to force the PLO to withdraw. There was an increasing level of discussion about the desirability of an international peace-keeping force to enforce the cease fire.

Q: Wouldn't that not have required a larger force than is usually despatched?

LEWIS: Of course. There wasn't much enthusiasm for the idea anywhere. There was already a U.N. force in south Lebanon -- UNIFIL. Some suggested re-deploying UNIFIL to the Beirut area to separate the combatants. The U.N. certainly didn't leap at that suggestion because it didn't feel it would get sufficient cooperation from either side. In Beirut, the fighting had come to a stalemate because the Israeli shelling was not achieving the objective of forcing the PLO out. The PLO was well dug in and it was increasingly apparent that something more had to be done to root the PLO out. The Israeli Army always had some reservations about entering West Beirut, as I noted earlier. It did not cherish the prospect of urban warfare even though it had handily defeated the PLO in the previous few weeks even though the PLO forces fought more tenaciously than expected.

Morris Draper, then the Deputy Assistant Secretary in the Bureau for Near East Affairs responsible for Israel-Lebanon-Syria geographic area, had been working for the past year as Phil Habib's alter ego. Draper was in Beirut in July trying to work with the Lebanese government to persuade the PLO to evacuate. Habib may have been there as well; the two worked together at times and separately at others. I believe that Habib may have been in Beirut and had asked Draper to go to Jerusalem to try to convince the Israelis to stop their shelling of the city. That sort of shuttle diplomacy set a pattern for activities which took place over much of the summer, 1982. Habib was trying to work out an arrangement which would have the PLO evacuate Beirut and would have brought the conflict to an end. Phil worked out of our Embassy in Beirut. As time wore on, he became less and less even-handed; he became increasingly an Israeli critic, influenced no doubt by the continual Israeli shelling of Beirut. Although the attacks were to be targeted on the PLO, undoubtedly the whole population suffered, including Habib. He must have been shaken at the continuing sight of smoke plumes from artillery shells and bombs from planes; his vantage point inside the American Embassy in Beirut gave him an entirely different perspective from ours; he could see the war through Lebanese and PLO perspective. Because of our diplomatic niceties, no U.S. official was permitted to enter Lebanon to observe the war from the Israeli side. We watched the war through newspapers and television; that was entirely different than seeing it as Habib did from our Embassy in Beirut.

Habib saw the continual break-downs of the cease fires; he noticed the creeping forward progress of the Israeli forces; he saw the effects of the bombings and the artillery fire on innocent civilians. The cumulative effect of these observations increased Habib's anguish about Israeli policy. Periodically, he or Draper would visit Jerusalem following a very dangerous escape route from Beirut. They usually took a helicopter to an American carrier which was just off the Lebanese coast; then they would fly to Cyprus to connect with a flight to Jerusalem. Either Habib or Draper would meet with Begin or Shamir or Sharon in an effort to convince them as tactfully as possible to cease their military activities so that diplomacy might be given a chance. Habib and Draper felt that if the Israelis would stop their incessant bombardments, then they could get in touch with the Palestinian leadership. They thought that if given a breathing moment and an opportunity for a dialogue with the PLO, they could convince the PLO to evacuate. But as long as military pressure was being applied, there was no way for the Americans to meet with the Palestinians -- it was just too dangerous to be on the streets. Furthermore, the Israeli shelling was causing so much agony that no diplomatic discussions could possibly be contemplated. In effect, Habib and Draper were saying that the current Israeli policy was counter-productive. It was usually Draper who carried the message; if he didn't, then there would be indirect messages relayed through telephone conversations over secure lines that lasted for an hour or two at a stretch between Habib or Draper and the Operations Center in the Department of State. Usually, Habib would talk to Charlie Hill, then the acting Deputy Assistant Secretary and the designated liaison between Habib and the Secretary's Office. Hill would listen to Habib, both the factual reports and the anguish about Israeli actions; in general, Habib's message was that some one had to get the Israelis to stop their military activities. These phone calls would result in periodic instructions to me to call on Israeli officials and try to get them to cease and desist. Sometimes Washington would call Ambassador Arens in and give him the same strong message that we wanted a halt in the shelling of Beirut. The pattern of an anguished Habib reporting at great length to Washington followed by some kind of demarche delivered either in Washington or in Jerusalem began at the end of June and continued through the summer until the PLO finally withdrew.

There were several times during July when it appeared as if the PLO was prepared to withdraw. They were asking for all sorts of guarantees and assurances, primarily from us; they wanted to leave some forces to protect the refugee camps. One of the problems was that there were no countries that were particularly interested in becoming PLO hosts, especially the military forces. That brought the U.S. into the unusual role, stemming from Habib's mediation efforts, of trying to find a haven for the PLO. American embassies in the region were making discreet inquiries of their host government whether they would be willing to accept these PLO fighters. There were no takers because these "immigrants" would prove to be nothing but trouble either domestically or internationally. Egypt, for example, whom we considered to be a logical safe-haven, didn't want any part of the PLO. Mubarak was crystal clear that although he had great sympathy for Arafat and the PLO, he was not about to get the PLO out of the mess they had made and was not about to jeopardize his peace treaty with Israel. I think we were talking about 4-5,000 men; it was not a gigantic number, but it was substantial. Ultimately, the U.S. was instrumental in finding other homes for these troops -- they were actually dispersed throughout the region, some to South Yemen, some to Tunisia, some to Syria on the Beirut-Damascus highway in convoys. We were instrumental in assuring safe passage and preventing the Israelis from firing on the trucks which they watched drive by. Much later, Arafat himself with his senior staff ended up in Tunis. Some moved north in Lebanon to Tripoli so that not all PLO forces evacuated Lebanon. That is what triggered later fighting between the Syrians and their surrogates and the PLO which eventually resulted in the PLO being completely ejected from Lebanon. We in fact arranged for Arafat's safe conduct out of Tripoli and he probably owes his life to the U.S. diplomats who were responsible. I presume he has remembered that fact although gratitude is not always a common virtue in the Middle East.

I have described in general a lot of the daily activities during this period of the Summer of 1982. I was very busy, trying to stay synchronized with policy developments in Washington. After Shultz took office, the atmospherics changed substantially. Many people in Washington were getting fed up with the Israeli maneuvering and continuing Beirut bombardments; increasingly Washington was doubting Israeli good faith and the bonds of trust between the two countries was weakening. I shuttled frequently back and forth between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem; when I didn't call on the Israeli leadership in person, I was on the phone to it.

Q: What was Arens doing in Washington during this period?

LEWIS: He was being fairly starchy, but handled himself well in a rather difficult situation. One of the sad aspects of this period was the tensions that mounted because of the issue of a peace-keeping force. When it became clear that there was insufficient support for the idea of moving UNIFIL north, we finally agreed to join with the French, the Italians and the British in sending forces to the area, which would act in a coordinated fashion although each under its own flag. These troops were to serve as a temporary shield for Beirut, screening it off from the Israeli forces. These forces were to establish a free zone which could eventually be used as a withdrawal route for the PLO. We and the Israelis were during this time at considerable odds about the facts. What we were told about the situation around Beirut was seldom in agreement with our own observations were as reported by our Embassy in Beirut and the Habib group. Of course, they were being provided information by the Lebanese and by the Palestinians neither of whom were neutral observers of the fighting. To this day, I do not know how much deliberate misinformation we were fed, how much was correct and how much was just information which had been filtered through the fog of war. I do know that there was a lot of factual disagreement between the combatants about what was actually happening on the ground. There was also a lot of finger pointing.

The sympathy of the administration, which up to early July, had been strongly pro-Israel, increasingly shifted towards the Palestinians. That was not a formal policy shift, but the tenor of the instructions emanating from Washington changed as did the Washington reaction to events in Lebanon. There was a growing sympathy for the Lebanese and the PLO, who turned out to be considerably more tenacious than any one anticipated. We reacted as we normally do when there is an under-dog; we sympathize with it. That was true even among those who were well disposed towards Israel. My own reactions changed as well; you could not be involved in those very trying days without feeling frustration and anger. The Israeli mood was also changing; they were showing frustration with the United States particularly once the multi-national peace-keeping forces were deployed. They gagged at the sight of an American force, an alleged close friend and ally, stationed in Lebanon for purposes which were somewhat inimicable to their own perceived interests, although some Israelis saw our intervention of potential benefit. It did not help that our military refused to have any contact of any kind with the Israeli Defense Force even though they were in close proximity. There was considerable discussion of the danger of uncoordinated overflights as well as potential for other accidents. So there was a lot of tension on the military side in light of this close proximity of forces especially since we for policy reasons refused to have any contacts with the Israeli military.

Habib during this period traveled around the area to Egypt, Syria, Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Israel trying to develop a coordinated plan to convince the PLO to leave Beirut and to get the Israelis to join a real cease fire during which the PLO might depart. He would come to Jerusalem with all sorts of proposals and formulas. In the meantime, Arafat was meeting with the press in Beirut putting on a very defiant air; he seemed to believe that he would not have to evacuate Beirut and that his position was salvageable. There has been a lot of discussion about how he developed this perception. There are some credible reports that at the beginning of his troops' retreat from south Lebanon, the PLO had become completely disorganized under the Israeli pummeling. There are some indications that by late June the PLO was ready to leave Lebanon through Beirut port. But at a critical moment while this issue was being debated, Arafat received a message from Saudi Arabia which reassured him and led him to believe that the U.S. would intervene and prevent Israel from over-running the PLO in Beirut. This message was received while the first cease fires were being declared. The Israelis have often alleged -- and there is some evidence to support their contention -- that Cap Weinberger, who was never sympathetic in the slightest with the Israeli invasion and therefore at odds with Haig and later with Shultz about our Israeli relations, while paying a visit to Saudi Arabia at about this time, had said to the Saudis that President Reagan would never permit Israel to enter and occupy West Beirut. This may have been transmitted to the PLO giving them the sense that it could count on the United States to stop the Israelis at the last second. It is clear that from the panic stage that followed in the immediate aftermath of the Israeli invasion in late June, the PLO recovered and in fact took a very pugnacious and unrelenting stance. It took six-eight weeks of fighting before they eventually left Beirut. During this period, the Israelis slowly applied increasing military pressure and eventually damaged much of West Beirut in the effort to root the PLO out. In retrospect, if we in fact conveyed the wrong signal, either intentionally or inadvertently, that may have been one of the major causes for Beirut's great damage and suffering. Had the PLO not thought that we would come to their rescue at the last second, they might well have fled Beirut shortly after the Israeli invasion, thereby sparing Beirut and its inhabitants from a few weeks of hell.

As I said, during June and into July, Habib was pleading with the Israelis to cease their bombardments so that the PLO might withdraw. Sharon became the focus of our frustration and anger because we held him accountable for all the cease fire break-downs, for the shelling of Beirut, the misinformation, the alleged double-dealings, etc. As I mentioned, Habib's argument was always that if the Israelis would only cease and desist for a few days, he could put a deal together which would end up with a PLO withdrawal from Beirut. Israeli intelligence, which was quite extensive and which was based to a considerable extent on Phalangist sources as well at its own, was portraying an entirely different mood in the PLO leadership. It described that group as defiant and almost euphoric because it was attracting so much world-wide attention. Furthermore, Israeli intelligence described the PLO as convinced that it could outlast the Israelis or that in the final analysis, the world would save them. This perspective led the Israeli army to disagree with Habib's assessment; it was convinced that the PLO would retreat only if Israel would maintain and indeed even increase its military pressure so that the PLO would understand that it had no option except evacuation. This disagreement about PLO intentions and perspectives gave rise to U.S.-Israel tensions about the validity of Israeli military policy in Lebanon during July and August. Our dialogue with Israel became very bitter and spoiled American-Israeli relationships at senior levels.

Q: Do you have any hypothesis about whether the Weinberger's comments in Saudi were made on purpose? Or were they the expressions of an unsophisticated, inexperienced man?

LEWIS: My guess is that the remarks were not made intentionally, but rather a reflection of the policy disputes that were then raging in Washington. Furthermore, this was a period when the foreign policy tiller was not in very firm hands. Haig was on his way out, Shultz was not yet in the job, Reagan was a laissez faire President and every Cabinet member was marching to his or her own drum beat. The NSC was weak, failing to coordinate foreign policy effectively. I suppose that if Weinberger had actually expressed the thoughts that are now being impugned to him, may well have believed that Ronald Reagan would not have permitted in the final analysis that the PLO to be expelled. But the Weinberger comments, if indeed they were made, were mischievous in their effect; there is no doubt about that.

Habib was in Jerusalem once again towards the end of July. In the days preceding his arrival, there had been considerable dialogue about the Syrians. Israeli jets had attacked and destroyed three Syrian SAM sites in the Bekaa Valley as well as Palestinian targets in and around Beirut. While that bombardment was going on, Arafat was meeting that same day with a group of U.S. congresspersons: Mary Louise Oaker (D-Ohio), Peter McCloskey (D-CA) -- he left Congress soon after that. After the meeting with Arafat, the American delegation came out and proudly waved a statement which they had gotten Arafat to agree to withdraw if Israel accepted certain U.N. resolutions about Palestine. McCloskey insisted that this agreement signified PLO recognition of Israel which the Americans considered a great triumph. McCloskey came to Israel after his meeting with Arafat and tried to sell this interpretation to Begin and the Israelis, but he was not very successful. In the first place, they didn't agree with McCloskey and secondly, the Congressman was not very popular in Israel to start with. The Israelis felt that the American delegation had been duped by the PLO.

We looked at the statement that Arafat had agreed to and we agreed with the Israelis that it did not represent any change in PLO position. But McCloskey and his colleagues were, or wished to be, convinced that their meeting with Arafat was a significant progress towards peace.

On July 27, while Habib was meeting with the Israeli leadership, Senator Paul Tsongas was in Tel Aviv. I was moving from one set of meetings to another. That day was also notable because the Israeli jets bombed a residential area in Beirut. The Lebanese authorities declared that 120 people were killed and 100 more wounded in the raid, most of them being civilians. The U.S. responded to this raid by suspending indefinitely shipments of cluster bombs to Israel; there had been considerable pressure to take this step for some time and that particular bombing finally forced Reagan to take the step. We said that we had done so on policy grounds and not as a matter of law, i.e. a finding of violation of the military assistance laws.

As July passed, Habib was trying to get PLO agreement to withdraw. Another cease fire had been declared. On July 29, the U.N. Security Council voted 14-0 on a resolution demanding that Israel cease its blockade of West Beirut, which had been in effect for several weeks. This was the Israeli way of avoiding entering West Beirut; they had hoped that a cut off of supplies might force the Lebanese to insist that the PLO leave. That was viewed as a very callous policy by much of the world, including many Americans. So when the resolution came up in the Security Council, we abstained, thereby permitting the resolution to be passed. That U.S. action came as a blow to the Israelis. By this time, Reagan's comments about the Lebanese situation took on a much harder edge. He decried the bloodshed in Lebanon and called for an end to it. He was particularly critical after an August 1 Israeli raid that was particularly destructive.

At about this time, a suitcase filled with explosives went off in the Munich airport injuring seven innocent bystanders. So the tensions were rising on all sides.

At the beginning of August, I returned to Washington to participate in meetings that Foreign Minister Shamir was holding there. He had been despatched to Washington to try to improve the coordination and understanding that had seriously deteriorated during July. I had meetings with Shultz and Eagleburger; I attended a meeting that Arens had with Eagleburger. I had a session with Judge Clark, the NSC advisor. It was not a pleasant consultation because by this time, the Washington mood was generally very anti-Israeli. I met Shamir at the airport on August 1. The next morning, I had an early session with Shultz prior to his meeting with Shamir.

After the Shultz briefing ended, Nick Veliotis and I shared a car to the White House where we took part in a 15 minute "pre-brief" for the President, then sat in on the 1 ½ hour Reagan-Shamir meeting. It also included numerous other White House aides, Shultz, Weinberger, etc. Though polite, the meeting was pretty tense - and essentially a stand-off. Reagan's skepticism about Israeli intentions was clearly growing apace.

We then returned to the State Department for another hour-long Shultz-Shamir session, followed by a working lunch on the Eighth Floor. Shultz was for the first time getting to understand how immovable Shamir (and the Israelis) could be. Both men were on their diplomatic best behavior, but neither was at all persuaded by the other's arguments - which centered on how best to get the PLO to evacuate Beirut - by constant military pressure, or by Phil Habib's negotiating tactics.

I then accompanied Shamir to the Pentagon where Cap Weinberger worked him over much more combatively - with little effect. Shamir parried Weinberger's bitter complaints about Sharon's military moves with his own counter criticism of the "insulting" way the U.S. forces in the MFO were behaving toward the IDF - as if the U.S. and Israel were enemies!

Returning to State, I met with Shultz to fill him in on the Pentagon meeting and to share impressions of the day's sessions. Neither of us were at all encouraged. Fred Iklé then picked me up to give me a lift to Ambassador Moshe Arens' residence for the dinner Arens was hosting in Shamir's honor. The usual cast of political supporters of Israel and some friendly journalists; the usual rather forced toasts to eternal U.S.-Israeli amity. A rather subdued mood.

Tuesday, August 3 and Wednesday, August 4 were eventful indeed. By the time I caught the plane for Tel Aviv at 7:40 p.m. Wednesday evening I was running on empty!

Accompanied Shamir to meetings on the Hill with Senate Foreign Relations Committee and House Foreign Affairs Committee on Tuesday morning; then I left Shamir to his customary round of private meetings with Jewish supporters from the Congress and various Jewish organizations, his press briefings for the Israeli and American press corps (separately, of course), etc. (All these events being absolutely SOP for high-level Israeli visits.) I went by to see Bud McFarlane at the NSC, then talked with Jeane Kirkpatrick and subsequently joined her for her meeting with Shamir. Finally returned to State for other meetings and what turned out to be an all night vigil in the Operations Center!

The news from Beirut was getting increasingly ominous. Israeli air strikes and artillery fire seemed to be growing in scope and intensity. Phil Habib weighed in by phone with increasingly angry demands that we contact Begin. George Shultz had joined Veliotis and me in the Op Center at a console to speak directly with Phil. At his direction I tried to reach Begin, to no avail. Shultz then had me rouse Shamir from bed at his hotel (by phone) and he laid it on the line sternly to Shamir - making clear that these Israeli actions were completely contrary to the soothing reassurances which Shamir had given the President and Shultz earlier in the day. He demanded an immediate explanation from Begin. Shamir protested that he had no information about any new military assaults - but promised to get ahold of Begin immediately. (It was by then after midnight in Washington but early morning in Israel and Lebanon.) We sat impatiently in the OP CENTER waiting for him to call back. When he finally did so around 1:30 or 2:00 a.m., he told Shultz (with me on the line) that he had reached Begin, who had immediately consulted Sharon, and that Begin insisted that our information must be incorrect since Sharon had checked and found "nothing unusual" going on in Beirut! At almost that moment, Phil Habib called in an angry eye witness account of seeing the Israeli planes bombing West Beirut targets at that very moment! Shultz's U.S. Marine Corps background kicked in at that point; his face turned almost purple as he told Shamir just what Habib was personally watching; he also told him to set the Prime Minister straight and see to it that the bombardment ceased forthwith... We stayed in the Op Center the rest of the night and eventually the reports from Beirut began to show some positive effect of these three way exchanges. Shultz's personal initiation into the frustrations of dealing with Begin/Shamir/Sharon in the heat of crises (long-since all too familiar to me) was a very unhappy one. His view of Begin's credibility was strained to the limit, only slightly attenuated by my urging him to recognize that Sharon's propensity to mislead Begin should not be underestimated.

Veliotes and I had a skull session with Shultz at 5:00 a.m. - then at 7:15 a.m. we all assembled in the White House basement in the Situation Room with Reagan, Bush, Weinberger, Clark, McFarlane, Kirkpatrick, assorted Generals, and numerous other White House and Pentagon representatives for an impromptu NSC meeting on the Beirut Crisis. It lasted until 11:40 a.m., intermittently (though most of that time without Reagan); I met privately with Bill Casey during one of the breaks to discuss some planned CIA activity in Israel. The mood was pretty grim all around. Bush and Weinberger led the charge in favor of cracking down hard on the Israelis; Jeane Kirkpatrick made an eloquent defense of the Israeli rationale for keeping up military pressure to persuade Arafat that he had no option but to abandon Beirut - the objective we all were seeking. Reagan seemed prone to accept Jeane's arguments; she obviously was a favorite of his. McFarlane made delphic, somewhat ambiguous interventions. Shultz said relatively little in the large meetings, though I gathered that he had expressed his views separately to the President and I doubt they were very complimentary to Israel.

After a few more meetings at State, I headed for the airport. It was abundantly clear that the Begin government's standing with the Reagan Administration had taken some heavy hits. There were more to come.

I got home Thursday afternoon and the next few days were more or less normal - i.e. late nights on the secure phone to Washington, back and forth to Jerusalem, press backgrounders to try to checkmate tendentious leaks from the GOI about alleged mistakes and miscalculations by Habib in his indirect mediation between the PLO and the Israeli Government (carried on via intermediaries in the Lebanese Government), briefings for a visiting group of retired U.S. generals, meetings with other Ambassadors, attending the Alvin Ailey Dance Company's performance at Caesarea's ancient Roman theater, etc, etc, etc. The usual merry-go-round.

On August 10 I had a private meeting with Begin at his residence in Jerusalem. It was testy. The PLO still hadn't agreed to depart and Sharon was pressing for more IDF action. Phil Habib flew in from Beirut that evening and we stayed up much of the night thrashing out how he should approach Begin to try to get across just how damaging to Phil's efforts were Sharon's military moves. We spent 2 ½ wearying hours with Begin the next morning (Wednesday). Phil then returned to Beirut and I to Tel Aviv/Herzliyya, believing that the Israelis would now keep things relatively quiet while Phil finished negotiating with Arafat.

A massive air attack on Beirut on August 11(?) resulted in an angry telephone call from President Reagan to Prime Minister Begin. It followed a call that I made to Begin earlier during which I had read him the riot act without waiting for any instructions. My call had angered Begin, but had already triggered a command to the Israeli Air Force to cease the bombardment, well before Reagan's call with his "ultimatum" to stop the bombing, or else! (Since I had already reported by secure phone the results of my early call to Begin, I've always been suspicious that Reagan's subsequent call and the publicity given to its tough tone by the White House was all something of a piece of theater!) In a cabinet meeting that morning, an angry Begin had taken away Sharon's unilateral authority to order any major military operations; thereafter they required the Prime Minister's approval. That would suggest that Begin did not know of the Beirut air strike until after the fact.

Habib was reporting from Beirut in very angry tones that he was just about to complete the negotiations for the PLO withdrawal when the air attack came; it had completely disrupted the delicate status of the negotiations. On August 13, the PLO finally provided Habib a list of 7100 troops who would be withdrawn from Lebanon; it also proposed a time table for the withdrawal. On August 14, Habib flew to Tel Aviv, where I met him and drove to Jerusalem with him. The following day, early in the morning, before the regular Israeli Cabinet meeting, Habib and I met with Begin, Sharon and others. Habib presented the withdrawal plan, which drew a lot of carping reservations from Sharon. Begin agreed to submit it to the Cabinet; it was discussed there later in the morning. With Begin's blessings, the Cabinet accepted the plan in principal, subject to some further refinements in the details. At the same time, the Cabinet withdrew Sharon's demand that Israel had to have a name-by-name list of every member of the PLO to be evacuated from Lebanon. Habib had also relayed a proposal that a multi-national force be deployed into Lebanon to supervise the evacuation. That generated a lot of discussion, but was finally accepted by the Israel government. A couple of days later, the PLO and the Lebanon government approved the same evacuation plan; the Israeli Cabinet met again on August 19 and gave its final approval.

Interestingly enough, during this period of high tensions and drama culminating in the withdrawal agreement, our Embassy was going through the periodic change in key personnel. As is often the case, there is no relationship between the personnel assignment process and the political situation on the ground. Bill Brown, my outstanding deputy for three years, was transferred back to Washington and was being replaced by Bob Flaten. So during this very tense weekend, we were giving a farewell dinner for the Browns and a welcome dinner for the Flatens and going through the usual change of personnel ceremonies as if nothing else were happening. In reality, I was shuttling back and forth to Jerusalem with Habib trying to wrap up the PLO withdrawal negotiations. I hated to give Bill up at that stage because there was still a lot of work to be done before the PLO would finally evacuate. He had been an extraordinarily reliable and strong right hand. I had known Bob Flaten for a long time and had a lot of confidence in him, but he was not thoroughly knowledgeable on current Israeli affairs, having just completed a tour as coordinator of Afghan programs. He was a real expert in Afghan affairs; we had first met when I was DCM in Kabul in 1971 and he was the Afghan desk officer in Washington. I worked with him then very closely and had a very high regard for him, but the timing of the change in DCMs in Tel Aviv could not have been much worse. Bob had served in Tel Aviv a few years earlier and therefore knew something about Israel-Palestinian affairs, but it was not current knowledge. Nevertheless, we managed to survive the change in the middle of all of the excitement. I even managed to play some tennis that weekend and had lunch with the President Navon at Caesarea, where he was vacationing. He was quite disturbed by the manner in which Begin was handling the PLO issue; he talked very frankly to me about Begin's stubbornness, Sharon's disruptive tactics and other concerns that he had.

To add to all the turmoil, this was the weekend before our son was leaving to go off to college. He had just had spent four years at and just graduated from the American International School and was departing for James Madison University in Virginia. This was just another example of the continuing juggling act that a Foreign Service officer has to perform to be faithful to his or her public duties and private responsibilities.

The deployment of the first contingent of the multi-national (French, Italian and American) peace-keeping force that had been established took place during this week. The cease fire, although tenuous, was holding and the last details of the evacuation were being settled. On August 20, 800 Marines were ordered to land in Lebanon from their off-shore carriers. On the 21st, the PLO began its evacuation; 400 of its troops boarded a ship for Cyprus. The French forces landed at about the same time. The process moved forward relatively smoothly, except for a couple of near catastrophes. None were reported by the media, but they did give rise to considerable anxiety for us in the area.

One of the crises occurred on Sunday evening, August 22. Contrary to the arrangements negotiated, the PLO had decided to take some heavy weapons and vehicles with them. Side arms were all that were supposed to be taken by the PLO. In any case, the first PLO contingent showed up, flags flying, at the Beirut harbor under the watchful eyes of the multi-national forces and further away, of the Israeli army. This PLO group had thirteen jeeps, armed with mounted machine guns, with it which it wished to take to Cyprus. Sharon and the Israeli army objected strenuously. We thought that the whole arrangement might come apart over these jeeps. There was a lot of telephoning between Beirut (Habib), Jerusalem (the Defense Ministry), Tel Aviv (me) and eventually the PLO agreed not to ship them out. We undertook to take custody of the jeeps and agreed to ship them to another country where they would eventually be returned to the PLO. As I recall, those jeeps wandered around the Mediterranean on an American war-ship for weeks thereafter before we finally managed to dispose of them. This was just an illustration of the lack of statesmanship on both sides which caused us as intermediaries to burn a lot of midnight oil unnecessarily.

But there was a much larger crisis on the 22nd which almost caused an exchange of fire between the Israeli Navy and the American Navy. That was an occasion which is usually seen by history in a footnote as it should be, but it could have been taken up several pages if events had proceeded differently. The Israeli Navy, which was hovering just off the Lebanese shore observing the PLO withdrawal, seemed to be menacing the evacuation although it had not taken any offensive action. The American Naval Force which was navigating in the same seas found the Israeli presence unacceptable and a potential barrier to the smooth implementation of the evacuation agreement. There was concern that the Israelis might sink some of the transport vessels once the PLO troops were on board and the ships were on their way to Cyprus. I received word that I was to request that the Israeli withdraw their Navy. I called the Prime Minister; he was outraged by my request. He insisted that it was essential that the Israeli forces be permitted to observe the process so that they could assured that it met all the conditions of the agreement. Our Navy then threatened to sink the Israeli ships; I was entrusted to relay that policy to the Israelis. You can well imagine the ensuing flurry of phone calls that this statement of intent generated. Begin, Washington and I were on the phone almost continuously. I could not be in direct contact with the American fleet commander; I had to communicate with the Navy through Washington. A stalemate developed; Begin was furious and offended and not about to order his Naval units to withdraw. Our Navy appeared almost anxious to demonstrate its fighting capabilities. The tensions between our respective armed forces were already high; this demand by our Navy did nothing to lower them. Eventually, I constructed some language which was to serve as an understanding between Israel and the U.S. and submitted it to Begin for his approval.

The language was artfully drafted to save his face and that of our Navy. Begin finally agreed to it and issued a brief statement of confidence in the multi-national force. Soon thereafter, the Israeli ships moved slightly and our Navy withdrew its threats. So by Sunday night, the crisis had passed, but it had been a very tense afternoon during which some outbreak of fire might well have taken place. Everybody took a very macho position which made the outcome unpredictable. I have often reflected what history might have said had the American and the Israeli navies exchanged fire particularly since both were present in the area to observe the evacuation of the PLO forces and to insure compliance with an agreement. Because most of the negotiations on this event was done telephonically -- much over the secure phone to Washington -- the written record is very small; my instructions were provided by Washington over the phone. The whole episode is also another illustration of the fact that despite all the modern communications available to diplomats, that despite the ability of a Secretary of State to be in another country in hours, that despite the predilection of heads of state to communicate directly with each other, there are still times when an Ambassador is needed and needed urgently.

Q: Did it turn out that there had been some independent action by the U.S. Fleet commander?

LEWIS: I think there was probably a little muscle flexing going on, but I am not sure to this day how many of the commander's demands were determined on the spot and how many were authorized by the Pentagon. The whole episode received little notice, mostly in the Israeli press. Everyone played it down; it served no one's interest to highlight it.

The evacuation was completed on August 22. The ships used were Greek chartered ships, hired by the PLO and escorted by the navies of the three multi-national forces. The ships had to navigate through the Israeli screen which had been set up just outside the harbor. The PLO was certain that the Israelis would try to sink the ships and therefore were pressuring the Americans and the French to provide close protection. I don't believe that the Israelis ever intended to harm the PLO ships, but I can certainly understand the PLO's concern. The PLO left with heads high, flags flying while marching down to the harbor, trying to make the evacuation look like a great victory. The Israelis were very busy taking pictures from the hillsides with telescopic lenses trying to capture the image of each PLO fighter for future intelligence purposes.

On Monday, the 23rd, the Lebanese Parliament elected Bashir Gemayel as President of the country. The vote was 57-5 which was clear evidence that Gemayel's allies, the Israelis, had made it very difficult for the Muslim delegates to reach the Parliament building where the vote was taken. That vote was also an indication that the joint Israeli-Phalangist strategy had succeeded. The PLO had been expelled and Gemayel was now President. Both Sharon and Begin were counting on the new President to bring Lebanon into some sort of alliance relationship with Israel while at the same time cleaning up the remnants of PLO presence which might still have been left behind.

The U.S. Marines took up their positions in the port area on August 25. The French and the Italians had been the main multi-national forces during the evacuation. The total multi-national force was about three-four thousand strong, scattered throughout Beirut in strategic areas. They were there essentially to protect the PLO who had insisted on such a force to ward off any Israeli attack. It was part of the agreement that Habib had worked out with the PLO and the involved governments. Throughout the summer, the Israel were insisting that Egypt should rejoin the autonomy negotiations which had been essentially suspended when Israel invaded Lebanon. Mubarak had said on several occasions that he could not resume those negotiations as long as Israeli forces continue to be deployed in Lebanon. He had even raised the stakes by suggesting that autonomy negotiations could not really resume until the United States itself accepted the principal of self-determination for the Palestinians. Israel was determined, as soon as the PLO had been expelled from Lebanon, to put pressure on us to pressure the Egyptians to resume negotiations. Begin made his positions clear to a Congressional delegation that was visiting Jerusalem during this week.

Habib visited Israel on a couple of occasions during this period. This coincided with the 66th annual convention of Hadassah which met in Jerusalem. That brought thousands of American women and I was asked to address them one evening. On the 26th, Sharon left for New York, with the political situation in the area presumably on track. His main purpose was to put his political relationships with the American Jewish community back on track in the United States. That community had become alienated from Israel in light of the invasion; they were not happy with the pictures of the Beirut shelling which were widely seen in the U.S. The number of casualties that the media reported had been caused by Israeli actions did not sit well at all. Sharon also went to Washington and met with Weinberger and Shultz. Those meetings were followed by a White House announcement that Weinberger would visit the region: Lebanon, Egypt and Israel. Sharon, in his American TV interviews, was saying that since the PLO had been expelled from Lebanon, it was now possible to bring some stability to the area with the cooperation of the moderate Palestinians on the West Bank, who would no longer be burdened by the heavy hand of the PLO. That had always been one of Sharon's strategic goals. Egypt continued to refuse resumption of negotiations as long as Israeli troops were in Lebanon.

In the meantime, during the whole month of August, Washington was undertaking highly secret planning for a major peace initiative. Right after Shultz had become Secretary in mid-July, he and the President had concluded that once the PLO had been evacuated from Lebanon, it would be important to refocus everyone's attention on the peace process by restarting negotiations which had been suspended. Shultz instructed some of his staff to quietly and secretly develop an American initiative. I knew that this process was going on because while in Washington In July, I had the opportunity to discuss it briefly at least; I was given the chance to review and comment on some early drafts, but the whole exercise was on a very close hold. There was no time table for the beginning of the initiative, but plans were being drawn up. I was relatively comfortable with what I had seen and heard. As I said, the initiative was being worked on secretly during August while the struggles continued in Lebanon. I was receiving some very cryptic briefings over the secure phone from Charlie Hill, but the conversations were not comprehensive enough for me to have a clear picture of the staff's proposals nor did I have any sense of the timing. I was unaware and not informed that Nick Veliotes, who, as Assistant Secretary, was in charge of developing the initiative proposal, had consulted King Hussein of Jordan. In fact, I believe that Veliotes secretly visited Amman unbeknownst to me. Veliotes had been our Ambassador to Jordan and therefore knew the King quite well. He apparently got the King's agreement to enter the peace negotiations based on the draft initiative that Nick discussed with him. But nothing was said to the Israelis, contrary to long standing written commitments that we would not undertake any major initiatives on the peace process without consulting Israel. Washington was greatly concerned that if the Israelis had known about the initiative, they would leak it prematurely and would thereby sabotage the whole effort. Furthermore, it was Washington's view that unless King Hussein became seriously interested it would not have been worth launching the initiative; he was viewed at that time as the key.

So while the Israelis were focusing on the restart of the autonomy negotiations, even though the Egyptians were not a willing player, we were concentrating secretly on a new peace initiative. I was almost totally in the dark about that effort as were the Israelis. When I later found out about what was going on, I was very upset. I discussed my unhappiness with Shultz and Veliotis. I understood their concern about the possibility of leaks and the possibility of an preemptive sabotage effort by the Israelis. Nevertheless, the Washington tactics left me out of the loop and deprived it of some advice that I could have provided about how to handle the initiative in Israel when they wanted to launch it. I was not convinced that the idea of an initiative was a good one at that time, but I am convinced that after it was launched, it had been presented in the worst light and at the worst possible moment. I think had I been consulted earlier, we might have avoided some of detrimental consequences that the initiative produced.

In the meantime, in Israel, Begin was delighted with the PLO troops' expulsion. He decided that after a very stressful summer, he could take a short vacation. He had never taken a vacation since becoming Prime Minister four years earlier. That he was ready for a vacation then was a clear indication of how worn out he was by the end of the summer. So he and Mrs. Begin went to Nahariyya on the coast south of the Lebanon border. They rested in a small house. They had intended to spend about a week there during the last part of August. That seemed to be a propitious time for vacation especially since Bashir Gemayel had been installed as President of Lebanon, the fighting had ceased and the PLO had been expelled.

On August 31, a Tuesday, I received an "Eyes Only, Top Secret" message from President Reagan which I was to deliver to Begin. The message contained what became known as the "Reagan initiative", which was the product of the six weeks of planning I described earlier. I was instructed to deliver the letter immediately to Begin. I was also given some talking points which I was to deliver orally. I was told that the initiative would be unveiled to the public in the near future and that therefore it was extremely important that I see Begin immediately and get his reaction and hopefully his acquiescence. What the U.S. government was obviously doing was going through the motions of consulting with Israel. I later learned that similar messages had been sent to our Embassies in Cairo, Amman and Riyadh. All the Ambassadors were requested to deliver the letters and the comments immediately and to report reactions immediately. We were told that the President intended to make his new plan public in a speech to be delivered within 72 hours. We were not to give any impression that the plan could be modified, although of course we would listen and report reactions. I called Begin and apologized for interrupting his vacation, but that I had to see him about a most urgent matter. He said that he was very tired and wondered whether the matter could not wait for two or three days. I told him that I had personal instructions from the President to see him immediately and he finally agreed to see me. So I got in a car and drove to Nahariyya which was about two hours north of Tel Aviv. I left about 3:15 in the afternoon and got to Nahariyya at about 5 p.m. Begin ushered me into his sitting room, very politely. He wore a sport shirt, which for Begin was extraordinary since he almost always wore coat and tie. Alisa brought us a cup of tea and we talked a little about the success of the Lebanon operation. Begin was in a good, relaxed although tired mood; he was obviously very satisfied with recent events. Then I gave him the President's letter which he read. I then mentioned that I had some oral points which I was supposed to deliver. He asked me to proceed which I did. While I was talking, he kept looking at me, with an expression that was getting sadder by the moment. When I finished, he just looked at me for a couple of minutes and then said: "Sam (sigh), could you not have let us enjoy our victory just for a day or two?". Then he pulled himself together and more formally said: "Mr. Ambassador, I have listened carefully and I am extremely upset by your message. It is entirely contrary to all of our understandings with your country. This initiative is not in accordance with the Camp David agreements; in fact, it is a violation of those agreements. Of course, I will consult with my Cabinet and then I will give you a response. I do need a little time for that process". He went on for several minutes in this vein and became increasingly angry as he talked. He was not happy with the content and the implications of the President's letter. He was obviously upset by the lack of any indication that the initiative was being developed and by the absence of any prior consultations. In my talking points, Washington had included the point that we were consulting simultaneously with Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia. The mention of this last country really set Begin off. He was especially furious that on an issue that involved first and foremost Israel and perhaps also Jordan, that Saudi Arabia, which was not a central player, was being treated in the same manner as Israel. He was also upset that we had apparently already consulted the Jordanians -- my talking points included something along the lines that "we have reason to believe from our contacts that the King of Jordan will be favorably disposed" to this initiative. That certainly tipped what we had done and Begin did not take it very well at all. But the part of the process that really set him off was our approach to the Saudis simultaneously to my conversations with him. He took that as a diminution of Israel's role. He then recounted many of the summer's events; it was a long and very unpleasant conversation. Begin vacillated between anger and weary resignation about American policy. He took on an aggrieved mood of bitterness and of being treated unfairly. The timing of my visit could not of course have been worse; I interrupted his first vacation in four years. So the Begin's response was negative both for official and personal reasons. By the time I left him, it was quite clear that Begin would recommend to the Cabinet that the American initiative be rejected forcefully, but he said that he would take the matter up with the Cabinet. He did request, as I mentioned, that the President give him enough time to convene the Cabinet. That would be time consuming since he would have to return to Jerusalem and convene the Cabinet and have a thorough response. Begin asked me to pass to the President his plea that the speech be deferred at least until the beginning of the following week or five or six days hence. I told Begin that I would report his request, but that I had no way of knowing whether the President could wait that long. I was aware of the Washington concerns about premature leaks. He pointed out that he thought that we owed him at least that much time to consider Israel's response. So I dashed back to Tel Aviv and spent the evening writing my report. I strongly urged that the speech be delayed long enough to allow Begin to consult with the Cabinet. I also called Washington on the secure phone and elaborated on my written message.

The initiative was handled in a manner which was bound to produce a disaster. It was almost so ordained. Israel may well have rejected the substance of the initiative in any case, but a more sensitive process of consultation may have avoided the vituperation and bad feeling that in fact occurred. Those side effects could have been avoided. The basic problem was that the Israelis had been concentrating on Lebanon all summer; that issue had not been yet finally resolved.

There were still Israeli troops in Lebanon and there were some messy residual problems yet to be resolved with the new Lebanese government. It was not very likely that the Israeli government, psychologically, would be prepared at that stage to deal with a major American peace initiative which concerned the West Bank and Gaza. There were of course central and difficult problems in those areas, but the time was certainly not propitious to raise them since the focus of the government was still on Lebanon. So the rejection of the initiative was most likely, but it didn't have to happen with such rancor.

The first person in the NSC who read the cable was probably Geoffrey Kemp, the Middle East expert who worked for Judge Clark, the NSC advisor at the time. I am not clear that Reagan ever saw my cable or anyone else's for that matter. I assume that the President was briefed. But as far as I could tell the tactics for the initiative were being orchestrated by Shultz and Veliotis in the State Department.

The next day, Wednesday, Begin called a meeting of the Cabinet to be held the next day in Jerusalem. In the meantime, Weinberger had landed in Beirut the previous day and was to travel to Israel as his next stop. On Wednesday afternoon, I met with Shimon Peres in Tel Aviv at the Dan Hotel; it was the day before the Cabinet was considering the President's proposal. I briefed Peres privately on the initiative which was based on the Camp David agreements and included important policy objectives that we continue to espouse to this day. For example, we said that we did not support an independent Palestinian state, but we would also not support the annexation by Israel of the West Bank and Gaza. The proposal used phraseology drawn from the Camp David accords, but in certain areas, went beyond those understandings; those were the statements to which the Israelis took great exceptions. There is no question that the initiative was a genuine effort to jump start the negotiations and it obviously had been drafted with a lot of care. The details of the plan were less an issue than the matter, the timing of its presentation and the diplomatic activity that surrounded it. Although a well crafted statement of U.S. policy and a good vehicle for restarting negotiations, it was tactically ill-conceived; it might have had the intended effect had it been floated at the right moment and with better preparation.

On the other hand, the talking points were not well thought out. They became a major part of the tactical problem, at least in Israel. The talking points were basically drafted to convince the Jordanians to enter the negotiations. They were couched in language intended to appeal to King Hussein. Shultz, a careful man of great integrity, did not wish to employ a very normal diplomatic practice; that is when talking to different governments on the same subject, a government will argue for the same substance, but the language to be used is different depending on in which capital the discussions are taking place, in order to tailor the approach to maximize the appeal to each interlocutor. In the case of the Reagan initiative, however, Shultz insisted that same identical talking points be used by all American Ambassadors when presenting the proposal to all Middle East governments. He obviously wanted to avoid being accused of double-dealing. But some of the phrasing of these talking points set Begin on edge. That was another reason that our presentation was tactically deficient and stirred a negative reaction far greater than the substance should have.

The next evening (Wednesday), while I was awaiting the Israeli response, Weinberger arrived at about 5 p.m. Sharon, as Weinberger's counterpart as Defense Minister, was to host a large reception, as was normal, at the Tel Aviv Hilton. I took Weinberger there. We were sitting down having some food and drinks -- this was about an hour after our arrival -- when one of my staff members brought me cable that he had just picked up at the embassy. It was a message that I was to deliver immediately to Begin, before the Israelis could formulate their formal response. Washington, in this message, was telling Begin that not only could it not delay its unveiling of the initiative, but that the President would make his speech that evening in Washington (the evening of September 1, which would have been early Thursday a.m. in Israel). So the message that I was to deliver was about six hours away from the moment the President would unveil his initiative. I was told that I should tell Begin that the speech could not be postponed because some of its substance had already leaked out and therefore the President would have to speak at the planned time.

At that moment, I decided that I would not drive to Nahariyya, which would have taken two hours, to deliver the message. Instead, I called Begin and gave him the essence of the message and had the full text delivered by messenger. Of course, Begin was outraged. His Cabinet was not to meet until the next day in Jerusalem, so that he was still on vacation in Nahariyya. When I described Washington's message he became very angry, bitter and cold. He made the point that this was no way for friends to treat each other; he did not feel the Israelis did not deserve this kind of treatment. Begin asked me to report to the President that he was very upset, but that nevertheless, he intended to convene the Cabinet the next day and provide an official Israeli response. Of course, I think the die had been cast by that time and I had no doubts about what the response would be.

Soon after my call to Begin, the Israeli information system went to work. There had been some small leaks in the press about the initiative, but no major effort and some of those leaks may well have originated outside of Israel. But the next morning, the press was filled with extensive and tendentious coverage of the initiative. These were obviously authorized and stimulated by the government. By this time, the Embassy had received the full text of the President's speech as delivered in the early hours -- Tel Aviv time. The speech was essentially an elaboration of the letter; there was no reference to the talking points. But the press stories covered the talking points extensively; it had obviously been fully briefed. The tendentious nature of the process -- i.e. that Jordan had been consulted earlier than Israel and that Saudi Arabia had been consulted simultaneously (all of the aspects that galled the Israelis) -- were made public and were available to the Cabinet while it was considering the initiative. The Cabinet was meeting in Jerusalem; I was with Weinberger meeting with Sharon before the Cabinet meeting; then I attended Nahun Goldmann's funeral on Mt. Herzog in Jerusalem. Then I accompanied Weinberger on a number of visits to such facilities as tank factories and then on a helicopter trip to the west Bank and the Golan Heights. Weinberger and I ended up in Nahariyya late that afternoon after the completion of the Cabinet deliberations, a Begin press statement and the preparation of an angry rebuttal to Reagan. After he did all that, Begin had returned to Nahariyya to finish his vacation. So late on that Thursday, September 2, Weinberger and I spent a couple of hours until 7 p.m. with Begin. Weinberger caught the full brunt of Begin's displeasure; he got it in spades and I was delighted to be essentially a bystander. Begin listed at great lengths all of his aggravations with the United States and how it had behaved. The list included American treatment of the IDF in Lebanon which would have been characteristic of enemies rather than allies, how we had colluded with the PLO, how we had been plotting a betrayal of Camp David behind Israel's back, how we had consulted with Jordan first and then with Saudi Arabia. It was a great two hours!

Then Weinberger and I flew back to my house by helicopter where I was to host a stag dinner for the Secretary of Defense. I had invited many of the leading Israeli military and politico-military personalities, including Sharon. It was quite an evening; not very pleasant. There was another aspect of this series of events that must be recorded. Unbeknownst to me at the time and only learned later, Begin had, after my first meeting with him Tuesday night, when I gave him Reagan letter and briefed him, met in Nahariyya with Bashir Gemayel, the Lebanese President. Gemayel was one of Begin's protégés and an ally; a relationship that had developed secretly over the previous few years. Gemayel had brought a few close advisors and Begin had invited some Israelis including Sharon. The meeting was secret and attended by very few on both sides. Begin reportedly greeted Gemayel quite brusquely which was very uncharacteristic. He essentially told Gemayel that Israel had now won him the Presidency and had ridden his country of the PLO fighters; it was therefore time to sign a peace treaty. Begin had every reason to believe, based on the years of relationships with Gemayel and the Phalangists, that the Lebanese would now be prepared to sign a peace treaty once Gemayel had taken office. But by now the restrictions of being President had become clearer to Gemayel. He had to find ways to reconcile the Muslims who had assisted him in the expulsion of the PLO. So Gemayel, although quite polite, tried to tell Begin in unmistakable terms that such a treaty would need time. His message became quite clear soon to his Israeli audience. He gave all the reasons why he had to proceed cautiously, he told them he was not in a position to set a date, he mentioned all the political fence-mending that he had to undertake first. This Lebanese position soon got under Begin's skin; he became furious. He then addressed Gemayel in very demeaning and authoritarian terms; he was obviously very upset that his Lebanese allies were not being compliant. He obviously felt betrayed because the Israelis had done so much for the Phalangists and the Christians. That session in Nahariyya changed Gemayel's views of the Israelis; he viewed them as much more sinister than he had before. All the Lebanese were shocked by Begin's behavior to their new President. In fact, I understand that even the Israeli delegation was quite shocked. Dave Kimche was one of the Israelis present at this meeting and he told me sometime later that he was really embarrassed as were others by Begin's tone and demeanor towards Gemayel. Those who participated in the meeting and who later learned of my meeting with Begin just beforehand are convinced that Begin's mishandling of his meeting with the Lebanese -- particularly his nasty attitude towards Gemayel -- may have been in large part been caused by his anger at Reagan in reaction to my presentation a few hours earlier. The interaction between these two events is an interesting historical sidelight. I think that even if Bashir Gemayel had not been assassinated soon thereafter by a bomb at his headquarters, those who know the Phalangists well are convinced that the Begin-Gemayel relationships would never have been smooth after their meeting in Nahariyya that night. A lot of bad feelings were developed that night by the Phalangists which would be shown later.

On Friday, September 3, I accompanied Weinberger to a meeting with Foreign Minister Shamir. Afterwards, Weinberger made the obligatory stop at Yad Vashem and then toured Jerusalem with our Consul General. I went back to my office at the Embassy to catch up on the work that had piled up during that harried week. Weinberger then held a conference with editorial writers at the Cultural Center. We then flew down to Sharon's farm south of Ashdod for lunch. Sharon was very proud of his farm and often tried to get dignitaries to visit it so that he could be seen in his country squire mode; he used to butter people up that way and exercise his quite formidable wiles which he could do well when he chose to be ingratiating and attractive. He could be very engaging and that is the persona he displayed to Weinberger that day. He hoped to convince our SecDef that Israel was now in control of the situation and that together with the United States it was now possible to push the Syrians out of Lebanon and to bring the West Bank and Gaza inhabitants to negotiate on an autonomy regime because the PLO was not in the neighborhood any longer. The lunch went on for a long time -- all afternoon as a matter of fact. There were a lot of war stories with Sharon relating all his military exploits. Weinberger handled himself with great style; he was extremely well controlled even during Begin's outburst and the meetings with Sharon, though I am sure, from my knowledge of the man's views, he was hardly taken in by the Israelis; he was not, I am sure, very sympathetic towards either leader.

We returned by helicopter early that evening at about 7 p.m. I went to the office to draft my reporting cables and got home about 10 p.m. that night for a very late dinner. As I mentioned earlier, the Israeli Cabinet had rejected the Reagan plan as a deviation of the Camp David accords. Begin had insisted on drafting the Cabinet statement himself to make sure that it was sufficiently nasty and tough. He made sure that the words would be offensive to us and he succeeded. The cabinet went out of its way to highlight its determination to continue settlement activities on the West Bank; the Reagan plan had called for some kind of cessation. It was the same argument then as it has been up to today. Since 1977, whenever the Israelis get mad at the United States, they proceed with the establishment of a few more settlements just to make the point that they can not be commanded -- they are the masters of their own ship and not a U.S. vassal. While the Cabinet was taking its hard-line stance, Peres issued a statement saying that the Reagan plan could be the basis for a dialogue; Arafat, from Tunis, said that the PLO had neither accepted or rejected the plan. Both statements made Begin even angrier. The State Department issued its own press release rejecting Begin's allegation that the U.S. had violated any commitments about consultations. The press in general and the leadership in Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and Europe reacted relatively positively to the proposal.

But the pivotal event was about to take place in Fez, Morocco. I learned later that the main stimulus for the timing of the release of the plan by Washington was an Arab League summit meeting that was about to convene in Fez. In the wake of the PLO expulsion from Lebanon, State Department was convinced that the U.S. had to take an important initiative which would show some sensitivity of the Arab point of view. The Department was concerned that unless some preemptive action was taken, the Arab League meeting would reject any further cooperation with the U.S. in seeking a Middle East settlement, as it had done in Khartoum in 1967. That was the main reason for the urgency to reveal the plan publicly. It had the hoped for effect. There was a lot of discussion and criticism of the U.S. at Fez for its alleged bias and perhaps even collusion towards Israel and its Lebanese invasion. Nevertheless, the Reagan plan was sufficiently intriguing to enough members of the League, including Jordan and the PLO, that we, after some vigorous lobbying, were able to head off any formal rejection by the League. Instead the League approved its own eight point peace plan that had been proposed by the Saudis -- the so-called Fahd plan. We found some solace in that plan since it included some features that were close to our position; indeed, even some Israelis saw some merits in the Fahd plan. Unfortunately, the Saudi plan was modified by the League; although the Fez declaration was silent about the Reagan plan, it did not reject it; it merely supported its own approach which was totally unacceptable to Israel. But we achieved our objective by forestalling any Arab League rejection of the U.S. as a peace maker.

Maury Draper, who had been with Habib during the negotiations with the PLO, now became in effect the main negotiator. Habib had worn himself to a frazzle and had returned to Washington. There Reagan received him with the honors he so well deserved, for it was indeed Phil who was the key player in the PLO's departure from Lebanon. Phil was not only tired, but also ill. He left the area shortly after the PLO's withdrawal and then stayed in the U.S. for the next couple of months. Draper carried on the work of the American delegation and he and I met Shamir on September 5, a Sunday. We also met with Sharon. We discussed what had to be done to begin the Israeli withdrawal; Sharon reviewed his game plan with us. Shamir told us as well as the press, that there would be no more autonomy talks until the Lebanese situation had been settled to Israel's satisfaction. Both Shamir and Sharon were very tough in the aftermath of the Reagan plan process, although at least Shamir, as always, was polite.

Congressman Steve Solarz was also a visitor over the Labor Day weekend. We hosted him for dinner and Bob Flaten, Paul Hare and perhaps a couple of other staff members and I talked with him until about 1 a.m. briefing him on the recent events and discussing his program. Whenever Steve visited Israel, which was frequent, he worked an 18 hour day and his control officer always needed some leave after Steve's departure to recuperate from the visit. That was also true of some of the rest of us because Solarz insisted on having 18-20 appointments per day; he was always fully up to date, interesting and useful, but he obviously had an extra set of glands that would leave us worn out by the end of his stays. On this particular Labor Day, we had enough work already; we didn't need Steve, but there he was.

On the same day that we were meeting with Solarz, September 6, Washington issued a statement under Shultz' name which was an effort to try to pacify the Israelis. The statement included a provision that any Israeli-Arab agreement would have to include a totally demilitarized West Bank; that was intended to reassure the Israelis that when they withdrew from the West Bank, the vacuum would not be filled by foreign forces. But in the atmosphere then existing, this U.S. position did not win many friends in Israel.

On September 7, the Israelis issued their own public statement calling for Lebanon to sign a peace treaty in order to guarantee the security of its borders; Israel would not fully withdraw until such treaty was signed. Lebanon's rejection of such treaty would force Israel to institute a special security zone in Southern Lebanon; that is of course what happened and that situation still holds today.

On September 8, while conditions in Beirut remained very unsettled, Reagan announced that the American contingent which was part of the multi-lateral force would be withdrawn beginning in two days' time. On the same day, the Arab League announced its peace plan in Fez, which required Israel to withdraw from all of the territories, including Jerusalem; all the settlements were to be dismantled; and there were a number of other provisions all unacceptable to Israel. The Fez declaration also acknowledged the PLO's absolute right to represent the Palestinians and to govern the West Bank once a Palestinian state had been established on the West Bank with Jerusalem as its capital. It is obvious that the Fez plan was not well received by Begin and his Cabinet. The next day, in response to Sharon's ultimatum to Lebanon about the peace treaty, Shultz said in Washington that the U.S. would support an Israel-Lebanon peace treaty only if Lebanon accepted it voluntarily and not under Israeli pressure. That was just another volley fired in the public arena between the US and Israel; it was just one more indicator of the deteriorating relationship between the two countries. Begin, in the meantime, was accusing American officials and journalists of interfering with Israel's internal affairs by writing articles critical of him and his policies.

At the same time, Israel destroyed some SAM missiles sites in Lebanon which just heated up the atmosphere some more. The U.S.-Israel relationships were just getting tenser. On September 10, the U.S. Marines began their withdrawal. Begin again accused us publicly of interfering with Lebanese-Israeli relations. Characteristically, he gratuitously added that we should remember that Israel was not Chile and that he was not Allende. During this period, Mubarak announced, and this was an interesting comment, that he preferred the Reagan plan to the Fez plan; that was well received in Washington. So for a couple of days, public statements were volleyed back and forth, none of them intended to dampen ardors on any side. The Jordanian reaction to the Reagan plan had been guarded; it was not as positive as I am sure Washington had hoped, but at least the King didn't close the door. We kept urging the Jordanians to support our plan by pointing out the advantages of our approach.

This period was filled for me by a lot of activities related to visitors, including a couple of Congressional delegations, and diplomatic requirements. I saw many Israelis and talked to them about the state of affairs. I was on my last legs; I had not a moment of respite during the whole summer, which had been more hectic than usual. I was worn out; so I decided to take a few days off as soon as I could. I wanted to take off Thursday afternoon, September 16, and take a long weekend in Crete with my wife. I was just going to forget about Israel and concentrate on something else. By his time, Bob Flaten had been in Israel long enough to be handle day-to-day activities of the Embassy.

On Tuesday, September 14, Jordan issued a very encouraging statement in which King Hussein praised the Reagan plan as positive and constructive. The King did say that he couldn't negotiate with Israel unless he had the approval of the other Arab states, which gave the statement an equivocal tone. In the evening of the same day, a bomb exploded in the Phalangist headquarters in East Beirut; I learned about that the following day, early in the morning at around 5 a.m. from a phone call. I was told that Bashir Gemayel and six others had been assassinated by the bombing. Immediately thereafter, as I learned somewhat later, Sharon, upon hearing of the event, ordered his forces stationed outside of Beirut to move into West Beirut to try to maintain order. The troops were also to complete the rooting out of any PLO fighting remnants which Israeli intelligence had reported had been left behind after withdrawal. This was a clean up operation that Gemayel had promised the Israelis that his Phalangists would undertake on their own. But after Gemayel's assassination, Sharon assumed that the Phalangist would not follow through and therefore ordered his own forces into Beirut to prevent the 2,000 PLO fighters he insisted were still remaining and hiding in civilian clothes from exploiting the assassination and from further destabilizing the political situation. It has never been fully proved, but the Lebanese investigations pointed clearly to the Syrians as the perpetrators of the bombing. That seems a logical conclusion since Gemayel was clearly anti-Syrian and was determined to cooperate with Israel in pushing Syria out of Lebanon. So it was in Syria's interests to eliminate Gemayel. The actual planting of the bomb was done by a Lebanese adherent of the Syrian Socialist movement - a left-wing, pro-Syrian political party. He had been working with Syrian agents for a long time. The Lebanese were never able to put together all the evidence necessary to make the Syrian connection crystal clear, but all the indications certainly tended to confirm Syrian complicity.

We were very concerned with the Israeli forward movement into the city, in part because our rationale for withdrawing the multi-lateral forces only a week earlier had been the assumption that Israel was going to withdraw from Lebanon in the near future; we certainly did not anticipate a further occupation of Beirut. Moreover, Habib had made some commitments to Arafat and the Syrians during his negotiations for the PLO withdrawal that if the PLO fighters were withdrawn, no harm would be done to the PLO civilians who remained in Lebanon. Habib insisted to the end he had acted on the basis of Begin's statements to him about Israel's intentions, and that these commitments had been exaggerated by the PLO. I am sure that was the case. There was probably some implied U.S. commitment, however, which probably led to President Reagan's and Shultz' feelings of guilt after the Sabra and Shatila massacres.

Draper, who had arrived in Jerusalem on the afternoon of September 14, received notification of the bombing soon after I did. He and I met with Shamir and later with Begin to discuss what might happen next in Beirut in light of the devastating blow to Israel's expectations, not to mention those of the Lebanese. The latter had put great faith in Gemayel because he had begun a healing process to bring all the various factions together and had by this time managed to gather considerable popular support from both the Muslims and the Christians.

Draper and I were not told by Shamir or Begin or Sharon that the Israeli forces were moving into West Beirut, although during the day, our intelligence began to pick up the tell-tale signs. Draper helicoptered back to Beirut that afternoon; he returned to Jerusalem unexpectedly the following afternoon - Thursday -- the day when I was packing to go off on vacation. For a period after the Israeli forward movement we were receiving angry messages from the White House to be relayed to the Israelis demanding explanations for their military actions which we felt were a violation of prior commitments. The Israeli Cabinet issued a statement Thursday afternoon saying that their troops would be withdrawn from Beirut only when the Lebanese army was in a position to guarantee the security of the city. Arafat, who was in Rome at the time, demanded that the multi-lateral force be immediately returned to Lebanon to protect the Palestinians who had been left behind. Begin claimed that the IDF had moved into Beirut only after it had been fired upon by Muslim militia, I don't believe that there was sufficient evidence to warrant that excuse.

At 5 p.m. Thursday afternoon, September 16, I joined Maury Draper in a very tough meeting with Sharon; we were trying to persuade him -- always a rather feckless proposition -- to withdraw the IDF troops then in West Beirut. We argued that the Lebanese army was perfectly competent to maintain order and that the Phalangists certainly also had some muscle still. It was a very nasty meeting; Sharon was disdainful. He was bitter and furious about Gemayel's assassination since with that event his hopes of a having an ally in Beirut had died. He treated Draper in a very condescending fashion. There were some very mean exchanges; it was a most unsatisfactory meeting from our point of view. We did agree that Draper would meet the next day with Shamir and Sharon and if necessary also with Begin. I talked to Begin by phone a couple of times after the Sharon meeting, making the same points. I didn't get much of a response.

I went home to pack for my vacation. The next morning, Sallie and I flew to Athens and then on to Crete. I was absolutely worn out. We had no idea of what would happen next. But I must say that in retrospect, I should have stayed in Israel. As it was, I was gone during the climactic events of the Sabra and Shatila massacres. We were in Crete driving around in a rented car, out of communication.

Word of events trickled back to Tel Aviv on Friday, September 17. The rumor was that Phalangist troops had entered the PLO camps the previous evening, about 5 p.m. or exactly when our meeting with Sharon began. He must have known at the time that the Phalangists were about to enter the camps; he didn't say a word about it. The Americans did not learn about it until mid-day the next day by which time I had already landed in Crete. Draper was seeing Shamir in Jerusalem when the word filtered back. When the first reports reached Shamir, he apparently called Sharon on the phone; Draper was with Shamir at the time. Sharon apparently gave Shamir some double-talk. Shamir's report had come from an Israeli journalist; he had been told that something dreadful was occurring in the camps. The journalist had called Shamir for further information; Sharon denied to Shamir any knowledge, or at least put him off with a misleading comment. Shamir never followed up after his conversation with Sharon. We knew about these events when the Kahan Commission later investigated the massacres. Shamir did not look very good in that report because he had not pressed for further information although he had received additional reports later in the day. Sharon knew well what was going on. What Begin knew and when he knew it is still subject to some debate; his awareness of events was never fully resolved by the Commission.

Sabra and Shatila were populated mostly by the families of the PLO fighters that had been evacuated. There may well have also been some PLO fighters who had stayed behind; there certainly were some who had burrowed themselves into the city. Sabra and Shatila were the two large refugee camps on the outskirts of Beirut and the centers of the Palestinian population of long standing.

Our Embassy tried to get a hold of me in Crete through the Greek police, using our Embassy in Athens. The staff started its efforts the minute the first rumors of the massacre reached them. It took the Greek police two days to find us on Crete, which says something about the Greek police. Frankly, I was not too unhappy because I did get two days' vacation that way. When we were finally found, we took the first plane out to Athens and back to Tel Aviv. I got back to Israel the following Thursday night, so that I actually had seven days' respite. That week was consumed for others by the Sabra/Shatila massacre and the beginning of the ensuing complications in relations with Israel, Lebanon and the PLO. In fact, the massacres started an incredible chain of events that would last for weeks and weeks.

I don't want to recall the Sabra/Shatila events in any details because history has well covered what transpired. The Phalangists just decided to "clean up the PLO problem" as agreed upon with Sharon. Allegations have been made that they were encouraged by Sharon, although he has steadfastly denied them, particularly during his libel law suit against TIME Magazine. The Phalangists moved into the camps Thursday evening and essentially went through them mowing Palestinian people down, including women and children. There never had been much love between the Phalangists, who were Christians, and the Palestinians, most of whom were Muslim, of whom several hundreds were killed. It was a horrible sequence of events.

The IDF were not in the camps; they were near by in positions which over-looked the camps. It is still not clear how much the IDF troops knew or understood what was going on until the next morning; the evidence is contradictory. It is clear that Sharon was well aware of the Phalangist plans; his troops outside the camps could possibly have been unaware. The IDF was certainly not doing the shooting, but were close enough to stop the slaughter if ordered to do so. In fact, the IDF did not interfere until the following afternoon, after we found out about and brought great pressure on the Israelis to stop the massacres. This issue was the key to subsequent arguments about Israel culpability and Sharon's personal responsibility.

The end result of the refugee camps' events was that the Reagan White House was horrified once informed. The staff began to make it clear that it felt that Israel had at least indirect responsibility for the massacres by in the first place permitting the Phalangists to enter the camps and then not taking any action for at least a day. On September 20, Begin's office acknowledged publicly that the Cabinet had approved the Phalangist invasion of the refugee camps. I am not clear when that approval was actually given. President Navon, horrified by the events, called for an independent inquiry, which was an unusual action of a President who was supposed to be non-political. Begin seemed to be a state of shock; he denied any prior knowledge and said that he had only learned about the massacres on Saturday, which seemed to be somewhat less than credible to many people.

In Washington, the massacre led to a decision to return the peace-keepers. The White House felt very guilty about the withdrawal of the multi-lateral force; it appeared that that had been very premature. The absence of these troops had barred the U.S. or any other outside force from taking any preventive actions. We told the Israelis that we would return the troops, which they accepted, after some discussion, but did not set any time table for the withdrawal of the IDF. The Lebanese had in the meantime elected Amin Gemayel, Bashir's brother, as President of Lebanon. The vote had been 77-3.

Begin resisted the idea of an independent investigation, although he agreed to an internal investigation. But there was a huge public outcry. Hundred of thousands Israelis demonstrated in the streets against the government, against the massacres. The Israeli public demanded the investigation. The Knesset defeated the proposal for an independent commission at Begin's insistence even though Sharon admitted during the debate that the IDF had permitted the Phalangist invasion of the camps. He also admitted that the Israelis had supplied flares which lit up the camps so that the Phalangists could do their work during the night. But Sharon insisted that his understanding had been the Phalangists were only searching for PLO fighters who had been left behind in contravention to all agreements reached. He insisted that the Israelis never dreamed that the Phalangists would kill women and children. In light of the revulsion about Sharon's actions, there were some resignations by senior officials.

The French were the first to return to Lebanon on September 24, which was the same day that I returned to Israel. On the 25th, approximately 350,000 Israelis demonstrated in a Tel Aviv square, in an anti-government display both for the massacre and for its refusal to have an independent inquiry.

Habib returned to the area, reluctantly, at the President's orders. So when I returned to Tel Aviv, both Habib and Draper were there and we met with Begin and Shamir on the 24th. Our troops did not land back in Lebanon for another few days, but we kept pressuring the Israelis to withdraw their troops from the airport so that our Marines could land there. The Israelis insisted that they had to remain there, but we refused to let our soldiers intermingle with the IDF which in itself increased tensions. Eventually, in light of the domestic pressure as well as the international ones, the Israelis accepted our ultimatums to withdraw from the airport area. The public pressure also forced Begin to permit the establishment of an independent commission, which was headed by Mr. Kahan, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

I was concerned that our relationship with Israel was going into a final nose-dive. Our meetings with the Israelis were interesting in a way; they were not particularly confrontational. Begin, Shamir and Sharon were so much on the defensive in the public opinion arena that they were trying to be a little more conciliatory towards U.S., which was an unusual reaction. On Saturday, September 25, Habib, Draper, Flaten and our military attaché, Colonel Raines, and I went to Sharon's ranch where we spent the day. We ate lunch and talked about getting the IDF out of Beirut. Sharon went out of his way to try to smooth things over with Habib; they had had a very difficult and nasty relationship over the summer, but by the end of September, Sharon was trying to make amends in an effort to dampen down some of the anger and bitterness. The meetings were somewhat stiff, but they were useful. Yom Kippur was on the 27th which seemed an appropriate time for a day of atonement. Begin started a personal slide down at about this time; he went into a deep depression.

Q: You have alluded to the severe depression that Begin experienced. Tell us more about that.

LEWIS: As I think about the period we are discussing (end of September 1982-Summer 1983), there are about four major areas of my professional life in Tel Aviv that took up almost all of my energies. the first was dealing with Menachem Begin as he entered his state of depression which ultimately led to his resignation. The second was trying to get the Israelis to withdraw their forces from Lebanon -- an effort that Ambassador Habib, Maury Draper and I were very deeply involved in. The third was what happened to the Reagan initiative and the effort to start peace negotiations, which began in early September. The fourth was an upheaval in my official life due to a very bitter personal feud with Ariel Sharon.

Let me start with the Begin story. I didn't really know until later that throughout his life, he had been subject to periodic bouts of depression, followed by a sort of manic phase subsequently. These periods lasted from a few days to a few weeks. By this time, I had already observed him in two or three of these periods. They were very striking phases. Each time, he would become listless; he would lose interest in the kind of detail that he normally found fascinating. He would become very morose. I don't know what his doctors believed about the causes or the origins. He was under medical treatment for other ailments. I was never told that he had ever consulted a psychiatrist, but he may have done so secretly. I never heard any reliable stories if in fact he was under psychiatric care. That Fall, the pressure of public opinion -- thousands and thousands of protesters in the streets -- forced him and the Cabinet to set up a National Commission of Inquiry, under the chairmanship of Supreme Justice Kahan, to investigate the massacres in Sabra and Shatila and pin-point responsibility if possible. The Commission was set up much against Begin's will. Almost immediately after the Commission was established, Begin went into one of his depression periods. It lasted for several weeks. At the same time, Mrs. Begin, to whom he was extremely close -- closer than any other person -- was suffering from emphysema and other serious ailments, from which she had suffered from time to time. She was in and out of the hospital during this period and the Prime Minister was very concerned. He was also very anxious to be invited to Washington to meet with President Reagan to try to rebuild the friendship and the bilateral relationship that the Lebanon war had so seriously tarnished. But he didn't feel that he could leave the country while his wife was in the hospital. At the same time, he was angling for a meeting with Reagan. Eventually, after a couple of months, a meeting was arranged. Yet, Begin was torn about whether he should leave Israel. Mrs. Begin's doctors assured him that her condition had stabilized, that she was not in danger and that he could proceed on his trip. More importantly, Mrs. Begin urged him to take the trip, assuring him that she was fine. I remember that he was still in doubt about the trip even up to the night before he left. He was a tormented man both because of the personal dilemma and his state of depression which had dragged on, leaving him somewhat disengaged from politics. He was always somber when he met anybody officially. But, as I said, he was so anxious for the meeting with Reagan because he was convinced that if he could only sit down with the President, he could convince him that the Lebanon war had been a wise and justifiable action which had forced the evacuation of the PLO from the area and that the Sabra-Shatila massacres were not Israel's responsibility. He firmly believed that he could get the US-Israel relationship back on the high plane it used to occupy.

So he decided to go to Washington in early December 1982. The trip required him to go first to Los Angeles, where he was supposed to give a speech before a huge gathering of the area's Jewish organizations. I had already returned to Washington, preparing for his visit to the Capital which was to follow immediately after the L.A. stop. I met with people in the Department and the White House to prepare for Begin's meeting with the President. One evening -- Saturday, I believe -- I got a call from someone in Begin's entourage to tell me that Begin had just received a telephone call from Jerusalem transmitting the news that Mrs. Begin had just died. He had received the call about an hour before he was to make his L.A. speech. With his characteristic discipline, he proceeded to give the speech. But then he returned immediately thereafter to Israel, canceling his Washington visit. I tried very hard to find a way to rendezvous with his plane in New York and accompany him back to Israel, so that I could attend the funeral. But somehow, we were not able to make the connection and I went back separately. I arrived unfortunately after the funeral. The death of his wife was a shattering blow to Begin as you can well imagine. It greatly increased his depression. Mrs. Begin was only in her early 60s at this time; she was not an old woman, but she had been a very heavy smoker and had had emphysema for a long time. I don't remember the actual cause of death, but it was unexpected. The doctors were startled; Begin was devastated. Thereafter he carried a load of guilt because he had been out of the country when she died; he was never able to rid himself of that burden. As is the Jewish custom, he grew a beard for thirty days as sign of mourning. He went into complete seclusion; he saw no one except his immediate family -- his son and daughters.

He came back to work in January 1983 with a beard and still in a deep state of depression. He was also very thin. Over the next several months, he tried very rigorously to do his job. He came to the office early in the mornings, he stayed at his desk during the day and went through his papers. He rarely initiated any conversations. He listened a great deal and assented. This state lasted from January to May during which very complicated negotiations between Israel and Lebanon over Israeli withdrawal took place, mediated by Habib first and then George Shultz. Members of the Israeli delegation would visit Begin periodically and brief him; Habib and Shultz did the same thing. He would chair Cabinet meetings and other high level meetings, but he was always very passive. Instead of cross-examining people about the details of the negotiations and getting involved personally as had been his style in drafting Israeli positions, he was almost an observer. Shamir, who was the Foreign Minister, Arens, who became Defense Minister in February and the chief negotiator, David Kimche and other team members carried the ball. They kept Begin informed, but he gave very little guidance. He made no public appearances for months. He didn't speak to the press. He kept the Cabinet meetings going, but they were very short; he did not really participate. He was functioning, but only at 20-30% of normal activity. He apparently wasn't eating well during this period; he got thinner and thinner until his clothes hung on him, pathetically. His daughter had moved in with him and was looking after him, but he just wouldn't eat.

People became very worried about Begin. He was still in his state of depression. They tried to get him to see other doctors, but he resisted that. His medical records were reviewed by some foreign doctors and he may have been examined by other than his family doctor. He was on some kind of medication for a while, but nothing to make much difference. He didn't snap out of his depression. He was functioning well enough to run the government, but he was well aware of how far below his usual capacity he was. He lost completely his zest for political life. Begin had always enjoyed being Prime Minister. I think I mentioned earlier how pleased he was to become Prime Minister after his many years in the political wilderness. He got a kick out of attending public events, out of chairing Cabinet meetings, out of being "in charge". But after his wife's death, he lost all interest, and just went essentially through the motions.

Begin's condition made the responsibilities of other government officials somewhat easier, particularly Shamir and Kimche, because he didn't argue with them so much. On the other hand, he didn't provide the kind of leadership that at times they undoubtedly would have liked to have. His state may have made it easier to reach an agreement with Lebanon than had he been in full action.

He seemed somewhat better and stronger towards the end of May and the beginning of June 1983 after the agreement with Lebanon had been reached. His office sounded us out about scheduling another visit to Washington. The White House agreed for around mid-July. But oddly enough, we could never quite pin-down the exact dates. We would propose a time; they would counter-propose, but no time was ever agreed upon; there was some uncertainty in Jerusalem that became more and more apparent. A couple of Israelis told me at the time that they didn't believe that Begin would ever go to Washington. I didn't accept that evaluation. I knew how much importance he had attached to a Washington visit and a meeting with Reagan and I believed that he would come out of his depression.

During this leaderless period, the Cabinet was divided continually over what Begin viewed as very petty political domestic issues. There was a lot of in-fighting within the Likud. The Cabinet would come to Begin to resolve and arbitrate these minor squabbles. He was totally uninterested; he thought it was ridiculous that they kept bothering him with this stuff. He was upset by the apparent lack of understanding that he was still in mourning and couldn't understand why they couldn't resolve these issues among themselves. He felt very put upon by his own party particularly since he was presented with issues that he wasn't really interested in dealing with. Eventually, a date for a Washington visit was established. Reagan had issued a formal letter of invitation, but Begin had never answered the letter. This was another signal that he was uncertain. About 10-14 days before the meeting, he told the Cabinet that he wasn't going to go to Washington. He told me that he was unable to go. That was the only way he ever explained his change of plans in a message to Reagan; that for "personal" reasons he would be unable to meet in Washington. He left it open for a possible later meeting, but was very vague. It was an obvious tip-off that he had decided to resign, although it was unclear to his colleagues that that had been a decision. Shortly after, on his 70th birthday, which was towards the end of July, he announced his resignation, also for "personal" reasons, to the Cabinet. He didn't make any speech to the country; he just expressed his regrets to the Cabinet that he couldn't continue. They were all up in arms; they were desperate because they felt that without Begin the party would fall apart. It had been his creation; he had been its only Prime Minister; there was no obvious heir-apparent; there was a lot of in-fighting; Likud was already rendered asunder by the Lebanon war with Sharon having been forced out as Defense Minister as a result of the Kahan Commission's report. The events of the previous two years had left the Likud in bad shape. So the Cabinet pleaded with Begin to stay on, but he was adamant. He gave no reason other than he just couldn't continue, although it was quite clear that physically he could have handled the Prime Minister's job. He was in reasonable physical shape and his mind, even after his wife's death, was as clear as ever. But he had lost his will to continue. He had no inner drive left. Begin had a great sense of responsibility so that he felt that really for many months that he wasn't doing the job he should have been doing. So he had reached the conclusion that it would be better if he resigned.

The party was desperate. They finally persuaded him to defer his resignation while the succession issue was sorted out. August was filled with a lot of scurrying around among the Likud leaders looking for another candidate for the Prime Ministership. Every week, at the Cabinet meeting, Begin would be asked to extend his tenure a little further; he finally realized that the party would not make a decision until he actually left office. He then insisted in submitting his resignation to the President and indicated, although I don't remember how widely, that Shamir would be a logical successor, even if only temporarily while the party leaders fought out their battles. Shamir was not viewed as a heavy-weight. He had been brought into the party by Begin in the 70s. He had never been particularly active in party affairs. He had been Foreign Minister for some time and not involved greatly in domestic political matters.

So Shamir was viewed as a stop gap. He was the one person that the other aspirants -- Arens, Levy, Sharon, etc. -- did not view as a serious rival. So they agreed readily to his succession to the Prime Ministership until a permanent successor could be elected, which they all expected to be within a few months. Of course, Shamir out-foxed them all because eventually he served longer as Prime Minister than any other Israeli except Ben Gurion. He became a much more formidable politician than anyone expected. Begin left very sadly; went into his house and total seclusion. He did not appear for a year. He refused all phone calls; he rejected all press inquiries. An extraordinary event happened on the first anniversary of Mrs. Begin's death when he didn't go to the cemetery. That was an extraordinary omission and showed how deeply immersed he was in an unalterable state of depression.

I spent a lot of time with Begin in official meetings during the 1982/83 period. There were a few times when he would talk to me privately, on a one-on-one basis, on how much he missed his wife and how inadequate he felt, but he didn't "let his hair down" with me; he had never done that. He was a very private man. In fact, his wife was the only person with whom he was totally candid and open. There may have also been one or two of his old cronies. A lot of people have wondered -- and have asked me -- in retrospect, what had happened. It is my belief that the crucial reason why he never left his state of depression was related to his wife's death, but in a very complicated fashion. In the first place, there was the issue of guilt of not having been at her bedside when she died. In addition, he felt guilty about the Sabra/Shatila massacre, although he refused to admit it. But above all, I think his problem was physiological. During his previous bouts of depression, Mrs. Begin was available to get him out of it. She made sure that he ate properly; she would rebuild his self confidence. But in 1983, she was not available and there wasn't anybody else to do it. I have also learned from some doctors that when someone is in a deep depression, diet is quite important in determining the length and depth of the disease. The fact that he didn't eat properly and that his daughter couldn't force him to do so, undoubtedly contributed to the extent of that last bout, making it much more difficult to ending or easing it. So it all comes back fundamentally to Mrs. Begin's availability; had she been around, she would have made him eat and she would have convinced him that the country needed him and that he had no alternative except to pull himself together. It was a very, very poignant end to a long political career; in many ways, it was a tragic end coming, as it did, after the momentary triumph of driving the PLO out of Lebanon.

The second major theme for that year was the issue of Lebanon. That is a very complicated story which is not worth retelling in all of its details. It involved several factors: a) after Sabra/Shatila, the U.S. administration had rushed into Lebanon a second wave of an international military force, together with the British, Italians and the French. There was a great American wave of anger against Israel for allowing the massacres to take place. That anger was felt particularly strong by Phil Habib, who, during negotiations about PLO withdrawal, had made certain oral statements to the Lebanese to be passed on to the PLO to the effect that if the PLO fighters were withdrawn from Beirut, the Israelis had assured him that the Palestinians left behind would not be mistreated. Habib had received those assurances from the Israelis. The Palestinians interpreted Habib's statements to be commitments on behalf of the United States and not only messages from the Israelis. So when the Phalangist troops massacred many women and children as well as some remaining fighters in the Sabra/Shatila camps, the Palestinians blamed the U.S. in addition to the Israelis for allowing the Phalangists to have free rein. Habib felt anger especially since he had passed on the Israeli commitments which he felt had been broken. Thereafter, his ability to function as an intermediary in the Lebanon negotiations was somewhat affected by his new view of Israel and the unreliability of its government. I mentioned earlier that Habib had returned to the U.S. completely exhausted, after the PLO withdrawal and therefore was not in the area when the massacres took place. Morris Draper, who had been in and out of Israel during the last part of September 1982, returned for another series of meetings with Begin and Sharon on October 5. He wanted to discuss the Kahan Commission and the disposition of Israeli troops still in Lebanon. Those meetings in Jerusalem on that day were the beginning of U.S. efforts to negotiate Israel out of Lebanon. Those efforts went on until the final withdrawal in 1984.

As I have said, the initial American effort, led by Draper with whom I worked closely, started in early October 1982. Shamir had made a statement at the U.N. Assembly meeting that year that Israel expected that all foreign forces would have left Lebanon by the end of 1982. Habib had a meeting with Syrian Foreign Ministry officials in early October, while Draper was in Israel, in which he was told that Syria would take its troops out of Lebanon if and when Israel withdrew its forces from the country. At this point, Syria was feeling very battered. The Syrian Air Force had been overwhelmed by the Israeli Air Force. The Soviets had not come to their aid; no one had. Israel was sitting astride the Damascus-Beirut highway. So in the early weeks after the PLO withdrawals, the balance of power in the area was very heavily weighed on Israel's side -- psychologically, politically and militarily. The Syrians had lost considerable amount of equipment that had not been replaced by the Soviets who did not want to get involved. There were a number of us Americans who saw that Syria at that time was not in a good position to block peace agreement negotiations between Lebanon and Israel. Such an agreement would have permitted Israeli troops to withdraw. So Draper was pressing to get negotiations started while the Syrians were in such a weakened position. He felt even more strongly about starting the process after the Syrian statement to Habib about their willingness to withdraw; that position added a sense of urgency to our interest in starting negotiations.

Sharon was still the Defense Minister at this time. He was determined not to have the negotiation, or at least to have it move on a very slow track. He wanted to find a way to keep us out of it. He always preferred to deal directly with the Lebanese leaders and especially with the new President, the brother of the assassinated Bashir Gemayel. It was really Sharon and his allies who put Amin Gemayel in office; they had been also responsible for Bashir's election in August 1982. Sharon always believed that the Phalangists, who controlled the Lebanese government with the support of the Lebanese troops, were in a position to conclude a peace treaty. He thought he could negotiate that treaty with Gemayel and then present to Begin as the spoils of victory. He knew that Habib and the U.S. were much more concerned with Israeli troop withdrawal and with the protection of the Muslims in Lebanon. The U.S. was interested in a more balanced outcome in Lebanon than Sharon's plan would have brought about. On October 7, there was a radio report that Sharon had announced that Israel would not relinquish control over a twenty-seven mile zone in southern Lebanon, unless security arrangements were negotiated directly with the Lebanese government. Lebanon was insisting that it would not negotiate directly with Israel, even though the Phalangists were Israel's allies. The Lebanese government was still too nervous about Arab opinion to be seen to be negotiating openly and directly with Israel. The U.S. was trying to put together a negotiating process in which we would play the broker's role. Draper spent the first part of October in Israel. We had a series of meetings discussing all these issues.

On the side, the U.S. was trying to follow-up on the Reagan initiative trying to bring together the Palestinians, the Jordanians and the Israelis to try to resolve the future of the West Bank and Gaza. This was another version of the autonomy negotiations. The Begin Cabinet had rejected the Reagan initiative completely, but the Arabs had not. During this period, Hussein and Arafat were having discussions in Amman in which the PLO was trying to get Jordanian backing for a negotiating position, which included the right of Palestinian self-determination, but would not insist on a Palestinian independent state and would agree to recognize Israel within its pre-1967 borders in exchange for a federation of the territories with Jordan. This dialogue between Arafat and Hussein went on for several months. Eventually they reached an agreement, although the Syrians insisted that Arafat could not negotiate an agreement without approval of the PLO Executive Committee. At the same time, Syria said it would recognize Israel if it withdrew all its forces from occupied territories, including the Golan Heights, and if it recognized Palestinian rights to self-determination. The Arafat-Hussein agreement was then repudiated by the PLO Executive Committee meeting in Kuwait. In January 1983, I believe, Hussein gave a formal "No" to the Reagan initiative. Arafat had, on October 12, rejected the Reagan plan, although he did say that it had some "positive elements" in it. Before that, the representatives of the U.S. government were working assiduously in the Arab and Israel capitals to get concurrence to the Reagan plan, while at the same time trying to get Lebanon-Israel negotiations started.

On October 11, Columbus Day, Sallie and I went up to Nahalal in the Galilee to attend a memorial service for Dayan. That was one year after his death -- the first anniversary. I remember thinking as we stood by the tomb how much we and Israel had missed him, particularly at this juncture of its history. There was also a memorial service for him in Tel Aviv that we attended on the evening of October 13. Throughout this period, we were engaged in a variety of activities which had nothing to do with the major issues. We took a little diving trip on Sunday, October 17 to the caves of Rosh Hanikra on the Lebanese border. I went with my friend Howard Rosenstein, the Red Sea diver, who had taught me to dive. The waters in the caves were relatively shallow because they were just under cliffs. They are suffused with light which makes them seem almost like snow climbing; they are a lovely spot, something like the Blue Grotto off Capri, Italy; the water has a very similar light composition.

Shamir was in the United States for the General Assembly meeting in the Fall 1982. I was in Israel. Normally, I did not go to the United States for visits of the Foreign Minister; I saved those trips for Prime Ministerial visits. There was a time honored Israeli tradition that the Prime Minister and the Foreign Minister did not travel together anywhere; that had to do with the internal competition for the spot light. Shamir met with Shultz on October 13. They agreed that the U.S. and Israel would convene a working group to discuss the withdrawal of foreign forces from Lebanon so that the two countries could have a coordinated approach to this issue and so that both Syria and Israel would withdraw their forces from Lebanon. It was during this period that efforts were being made in the U.N. to force Israel out of Lebanon as a response to the Sabra/Shatila massacre. Shultz threatened to withhold U.S. contributions to the U.N. and some of its agencies if the General Assembly were to take any actions against Israel, including depriving that country of its membership in the U.N. agencies. On the surface, the chances for negotiations seemed pretty good. There were meetings between Arabs and Reagan and others in Washington. In late October, the Israelis permitted the Lebanese forces to take over certain positions in the Shuf Mountains from them in order to maintain the truce between the Druze and the Christians. At the end of October, Draper returned to Israel to start the negotiations. The plan was for him to shuttle between the parties.

Draper met with Begin and me on October 29, after a session with Dave Kimche and Shamir at the Foreign Ministry. Draper made an announcement that Israel and Lebanon had agreed to assemble negotiating teams to start working out arrangements for the withdrawal of Israeli forces along with appropriate security arrangements in southern Lebanon. On the same day, Assad made a public statement in Damascus, restating that Syria would not withdraw from Lebanon until Israel had done so completely. In Beirut, the American Marines were stationed as part of a multilateral force and were beginning to make some limited patrols and expanding their coverage of East Beirut. Also, on the same day, as a harbinger of the future, a car bomb exploded near Marine positions in southern Beirut, killing one Marine and wounding two Lebanese. That was a sign that the Marines were no longer being viewed as peace-keepers, but as partisans on one side and as enemies by the Muslim side. I had left right after the Draper meetings on October 29 and had gone to the Sinai for my first diving trip there since Israel had returned that territory to Egypt. I went with my old friend David Friedman and a couple of other divers. We crossed the border at Taba and drove to the water. The waters seemed unchanged; the land was different. The multinational force that we had deployed after the peace treaty was in control of the area along the coast. It was a fascinating trip and the diving was superb. It was a good break for me.

I returned to Tel Aviv on Monday. Tuesday I met with Draper in Jerusalem and had a long session with Shamir about moving the negotiations with Lebanon forward. There was a lot of activity during this period behind the scene. For one thing, Israel was developing plans for additional settlements on the West Bank. The U.S. administration in Washington was increasingly dismayed by that prospect and issued a couple of sharp public criticisms. That scenario was replayed in 1992. On November 6, 1982, administration officials put out public statements that President Reagan planned to step up pressure on Israel to freeze West Bank settlements and to withdraw from Lebanon during the meetings that Begin and Reagan were to hold in the near future. From the American point of view, the main justification for the Begin trip was to "talk turkey" to him about these two issues. The meeting, as we now know, never took place. On November 11, a car bomb exploded at the Israeli military headquarters in Tyre in south Lebanon. Dozens of Israeli soldiers and security personnel were killed and lots of civilians wounded. That was a precursor of the attack on the American Marine barracks in 1983. The November incident stirred enormous outrage and concern in Israel. Begin had left for the U.S. the previous day, but Mrs. Begin died three days later and he returned without going to Washington, as I have noted earlier.

I need to clarify why the Lebanon/Israel negotiations were so slow in developing. Draper was very busy flying back and forth between Beirut and Jerusalem. We pressed both parties to get down to business, appoint negotiators, decide on a time and place, etc. We couldn't figure out why it was so hard to get the process started. We got a lot of technical excuses. Draper and I got the distinct impression that he was being "given the run around" especially by Sharon. The big argument was about the location for the negotiations. The Israelis wanted to meet both in Israel and in Lebanon. Then there was a Cabinet meeting about mid-November, just as agreement was about to be reached about the two sites. Sharon suggested during the Cabinet meeting that it would be necessary for the negotiators to meet in Jerusalem when it was Israel's turn to be the host. Jerusalem as a negotiating site was a red flag for the Arabs because of its disputed status. The Egyptians, for example, had been very reluctant to come to Jerusalem for the autonomy negotiations and in the final analysis, did not. When Sharon threw this diplomatic bomb shell in the Cabinet meeting, he must have realized that Begin, with his special devotion to Jerusalem as a symbol, would have to agree with him. He must also have recognized that the Lebanese would have found it very difficult to agree to that site and that is in fact what happened. So for the next six weeks, there was a continuing argument about where to hold the triparty negotiations. The Jerusalem was a very divisive issue, so I suspect Sharon had raised it deliberately to block progress. We only found out in December what had occurred. Then it became apparent that while on the surface Israel seemed to be cooperating on starting the negotiations, in fact Sharon was conducting a private, secret dialogue himself with an emissary of Amin Gemayel. We knew nothing about it. He was trying to make a direct deal with the Phalangists which would present us with a fait accompli which we would have to accept. It was not in his interest for the formal negotiations to start, while he was working behind the scenes unfettered by our involvement. That is why he introduced the Jerusalem issue out of the clear blue sky.

I had planned to be in Washington with Prime Minister Begin for his meeting with President Reagan in Early November -- a meeting which never took place because of Alisa Begin's death. I had left for Washington on November 12. As it turned out, I tried to return with Begin on his flights when he returned to Israel for the funeral, but we could not make connections. I could not get a commercial flight in time to get back for the funeral. So I decided to remain in Washington for an extensive period of consultation, which I had planned to do in any case after the Begin-Reagan meeting. So I was in Washington November 13-28, 1982 while Maury Draper was continuing to negotiate off and on in Beirut and Jerusalem in an effort to jump start the Lebanon-Israel Negotiations. He had been blocked by inexorable road blocks.

While in Washington, I had a chance to see every person in the State Department even remotely involved in US-Israeli affairs. I met with Secretary Shultz, Habib, Veliotis and others. I spent time at the Pentagon and the CIA; I met with various Members of Congress and their staffs. I was in New York to attend a couple of events sponsored by Jewish organizations. All of these contacts gave me a good opportunity to measure the American political climate in relationship to Israel, from the White House down. Since Thanksgiving came during this period, I also had an opportunity to be with one of my children, who was then living in the U.S.

I returned to Israel on November 28. I had reached some clear conclusions, based in part on some informal guidance I had received from my bosses and colleagues. They gave me a sense of a deteriorating mood in Washington resulting from Israeli obstruction to the beginning of Israel-Lebanon negotiations and from the growing anger generated by the renewed Israeli drive for expanding settlements on the West bank and Gaza, spearheaded by Begin and Sharon. This settlement policy was Israel's way to signal its unhappiness with the Reagan September initiative and furthered also Israeli views that the more settlements, the better. It had been my standing practice to brief the press, on background, within a few days after any of my trips to the U.S. I would first brief the Israeli journalists and then, a couple of days later, the American and some British correspondents -- particularly the BBC which had a wide and important audience in Israel. I briefed the press every six weeks or so under any circumstances, but trips to the U.S. gave me an opportunity to provide a more authoritative sense of the mood in Washington. In part, this was an effort to counter some of the more tendentious reporting that was a normal part of Israeli media content. American purposes and motives were often misstated, usually maliciously, for the Israeli readers.

I held this briefing on December 8 in the afternoon. It was a long briefing; I have had an opportunity to review the transcript. It generated considerable press reaction, including some angry, although veiled, rebuttals from government sources. As usual, I gave the briefing on "deep background", so that the attribution had to be to "informed sources". But it would not have been a great mystery for any Israeli who followed politics to figure out who the source might have been -- namely me. But by using that briefing technique, I could avoid a possible diplomatic confrontation that might have been difficult to deal with, once the government had reacted. I did not brief on instructions from Washington. My colleagues in the Department knew that I followed a pattern of briefings and never tried to discourage me from that course.

The main subject of the briefing centered on a number of allegations that were almost omnipresent in public discourse in Israel at the time. Allegations were being made that the U.S. was trying to steal the fruits of Israel's victory in Lebanon by opposing a peace treaty which would have essentially upheld the status quo. That was a line promulgated by Sharon and his supporters. Another allegation was that the U.S. was blocking the beginning of negotiations between Israel and Lebanon because we wanted to have the Reagan plan accepted by King Hussein first. There was also a good deal of concern about a Congressional proposal to add $1 billion to the Israeli assistance package for FY 84, despite the fact that the administration had requested just a modest increase. Understandably, the administration had opposed the Congressional initiative because it would have required offset cuts in other assistance programs and because such a huge increase might be interpreted as rewarding Israel which at the time was not in a mood to cooperate on the negotiating process; we were also concerned that the new aid package would discourage the Arabs from pursuing the Reagan initiative. All of these concerns had essentially been acknowledged in various statements made in Washington, both on the record or on "background". The charge that the U.S. was trying to pressure Israel into accepting the U.S. strategy through the foreign assistance package was made often in Israeli circles. I tried, in the backgrounder, to deal with all these issues; I went in each of them at considerable depth. One of the most ridiculous arguments that I tried to lay to rest was that the U.S. was trying to slow down the Lebanon negotiations. I told the press some of the things I heard in Washington, trying to convey the impressions I had come away with after talking to many people in our government. I did not try to reach my own conclusions, but the press of course reported that the views expressed in the briefings were all mine. Of course, I did in fact pretty much reach the same conclusions, but never said so. I did say that when the U.S. expressed unhappiness about the negotiations it was primarily concerned with some of the procedural obstructions that were being built. I had in mind such things as, for example, Israeli Cabinet insistence that the negotiations had to take place in Jerusalem and Beirut -- the two capitals. That requirement was an invitation to blocking any further discussions because it was very clear to the Israelis that the Lebanese would not be able to risk politically conducting negotiations in Jerusalem when no other Arab state had ever done so. I made the point that it was rather difficult for Washington not to be suspicious. We had very belatedly come to understand that in mid-October -- at the very beginning of the discussions between Draper and the Israelis on starting the negotiations -- the Israelis had at that point adopted secretly that demand that Jerusalem be one of the negotiating sites. We were not informed of that decision; we did not learn of it until late November when it appeared suddenly just as Habib and Draper had completed a package of proposals which they thought would start the negotiations. I emphasized in the backgrounder that this development that caught everybody by surprise did not engender an atmosphere of great confidence in Washington that Israel was very interested in the Lebanon negotiations.

We now know, as I mentioned earlier, that the reason the Israelis were stalling was because Sharon was conducting a private, secret bilateral negotiation with Amin Gemayel through a Lebanese emissary; he wanted to wrap up the negotiations all by himself in order to keep us entirely out of it until a deal had been made. I think our intelligence was woefully inadequate in this matter; we had no clue what Sharon and Gemayel were up to. We did know of course that the Israelis were stalling; Washington was increasingly upset as the days and weeks passed. I had learned, and I mentioned this to the press which used it in its stories, that there were a good number of officials in Washington who were by this time convinced that, despite everything that Begin had been saying about Israel's interest in leaving Lebanon as soon as possible, the Israelis were planning to stay in Lebanon for a very long time; these Washington officials saw the procedural roadblocks as just another delaying tactic in discussions of Israeli troop withdrawals. Washington also suspected that, by stalling the Lebanese negotiations, Israel was making it impossible for us to pursue the Reagan initiative because it had been clear between September and December that King Hussein, while not having rejected the plan, was trying, eventually unsuccessfully, to obtain Arafat's agreement to incorporate PLO participation in the Jordanian negotiating team. The King had told us directly that it was very difficult for him to enter broader negotiations under the Reagan plan until there was some good faith sign that Israel would withdraw from Lebanon. He needed that sign for his own political survival. The Israelis knew this which heightened the Washington suspicions. So Washington felt that the Israelis were stalling both to continue their occupation of Lebanon and as a way of forestalling the Reagan initiative. I highlighted all of these factors in the backgrounder.

The backgrounder produced some very accurate reports in The Jerusalem Post and several Hebrew language papers. Of course, there were also tendentious reactions. There were some tortuous and angry rebuttal stories. Once again, I was brushed with my old nickname "The High Commissioner", who was telling Israel how to run its affairs. On the whole, I believe the stories had a very salutary effect. A number of Israelis, particularly in the center and on the left, who picked up the same themes and began to argue publicly that it wasn't really necessary for the negotiations to take place in Jerusalem; they could proceed elsewhere.

This is the background that Habib found when he returned to the area. He arrived mid-December and brought with him another package of procedural proposals to try to break the impasse. He was strongly supported by President Reagan and Secretary Shultz who were anxious to see some progress. First, Habib, Draper and I held meetings with a number of senior Israeli officials just to cover the ground. Then we met with Dave Kimche and some of his Foreign Ministry colleagues. On the afternoon of December 16, a Thursday, we met at the Prime Ministry for two and a half hours starting at 5 p.m. Habib, Bob Flaten, Paul Hare and I sat in the Prime Minister's conference room, adjoining his private office. Across the table from the American delegation sat Begin, Sharon, Shamir and their staffers. This meeting was set up to permit Habib to lay out formally the proposals that he had developed to break the stalemate. While he was doing so, I looked at Sharon and noticed that he looked like the cat that had swallowed a canary. He looked uncharacteristically benign; in fact I would say that he was smirking. Begin did not respond to the Habib presentation. He asked Sharon to speak. Sharon opened by dropping a bomb shell. He described with some glee that negotiations he had been conducting for months with Gemayel's emissary. He described the outline of an agreement he had reached and which had been signed by both the Lebanese and Israeli governments. Sharon concluded by essentially saying that the U.S. was not needed; the deal was done. As far as he was concerned, it only needed to be publicly formalized; he thought that that could be done in the following week. In the course of his discourse, Sharon inserted some gratuitous insults. He was obviously intent on totally humiliating Habib and the American team. It was obvious that Begin knew all about this, but he left it up to Sharon to make the presentation for the Israeli side. Begin, throughout this whole period, was in a state of depression and quite passive in general. He had just finished the month of mourning for his wife's death. He was unshaven and drawn. He was lucid, but not really involved. Shamir characteristically sat and said nothing. The conversation was essentially between Sharon and Habib.

Phil Habib exercised enormous self-control; he showed great professionalism. He essentially said that he would leave for Beirut immediately to verify with Gemayel that an agreement had been reached. If he had confirmation, the U.S. would then support the agreement and provide whatever help might be necessary to put it into effect. On first hearing the outline, we did believe that it sounded something that would be easily sustainable from the Lebanese side. During the meeting, Sharon was called out of the conference room for a phone call. When he returned, he spoke with Begin; the Prime Minister summarized it for us. What Begin said was that there had been a leak about the agreement and that Mariv would run a story the next morning. That bit of news made it even more important that Habib reach Beirut as soon as possible to at least warn the Lebanese that the story was about to break.

What actually happened was an extraordinary sequence of events. Sharon was so triumphant about his diplomatic coup that he had briefed a Mariv reporter, giving him the whole story earlier. The Israeli military censor, when he saw the story, immediately understood that it should not be published; however the source was the Minister of Defense, who was the censor's boss. So he didn't feel he could stop the story. Begin, apparently belatedly, realized, when informed of the leak, that something had gone awry. I don't believe that Begin had any idea of the source of the story. He was savvy enough to know that a premature disclosure might abrogate any agreement reached. For reasons that I don't remember now, it was apparently too late for Begin to stop the story.

The story was indeed published. Amin Gemayel, confronted with the story and its subsequent repetition in the Lebanese press, came under enormous political pressure. He had not prepared his Cabinet or any of his entourage; all that had been done had been done in secret and no one else knew, except perhaps one advisor and the intermediary. So no political ground-work had been done at all, but it was in every Lebanese and Israeli newspaper. This uproar forced Sharon to fly to Beirut on Christmas as a last ditch effort to save the agreement. Within a few days, it became eminently clear that Gemayel could not obtain approval of the agreement. The more the agreement was scrutinized, the more vulnerable it seemed. The Syrians weighed in as well in opposition to the agreement. When Sharon returned, he reluctantly admitted that he would have to follow the American track and start the negotiations as we had been urging. These negotiations started at Zachle on December 28. Washington was both astounded and furious at this turn of events because it viewed it as a deliberate insult to Habib and the United States in general. The White House was angry; the State Department was angry. The Sharon ploy became one more element in the rapidly deteriorating relationship between the U.S. and Israel. That relationship had improved a little bit in the Fall when Shamir had gone to Washington and had a good meeting with Shultz. As long as it appeared that both governments were moving in the same direction on the Lebanese negotiations, the U.S. was giving Israel the benefit of the doubt.

This story was one of the most illustrative examples of Sharon's hubris, which led him to "shoot himself in the foot". I doubt that the agreement would ever have been approved publicly. The political pressures would have been too great in any case. But, it is conceivable of course had the major players been more careful and adroit they might have reached a better agreement and an earlier one than the one that was finally reached with the assistance of Secretary Shultz in April.

In any case, with the settlement issue unresolved, Begin's passivity and Sharon's conduct did not help US-Israeli relationships. The Washington attitude was skeptical about Israeli intentions.

I said earlier, that throughout the Fall of 1982, I was working on four major subjects. I have not discussed at any great length the Reagan initiative.

Ever since Begin had angrily and rapidly rejected the Reagan initiative in September, the American administration had doggedly pursued it, trying to have become the center of negotiations. In retrospect, I realize now that there was never any expectation in Washington that the Israelis would accept it, at least initially. It did reject the idea of a Palestinian state, but it also rejected the annexation of the West Bank territories. There were other elements that were bound to be unacceptable to Begin. But Shultz and his colleagues had convinced themselves that if Hussein were willing to come to the negotiating table under a sort of "Camp David" rubric, as interpreted and expanded by the Reagan initiative -- we had always asserted, correctly so, that the initiative was consistent with "Camp David", although the Israeli disagreed vigorously -- then the Israelis would inevitably be forced to look at the initiative once again. That would provide the needed opportunity to start serious discussion about the Initiative. Hussein was the key. Throughout the Fall, Hussein and Arafat carried on a minuet, trying to find a way in which the Jordanians could represent the PLO's interests in any negotiations. They had to find a way mutually satisfactory, which would also be at least acceptable to Israel and the U.S. The Egyptians were anxious for this to happen. Hussein thought, on at least two occasions that he had Arafat's agreement to a formula. Each time, when Arafat tried to get approval from his Executive Committee or the Palestine Council, he was rebuffed and the formulas were rejected. The Syrians put on a lot of pressure on the PLO, where they had considerable influence, against any efforts to start negotiations. It was only in late December that Arafat and Hussein apparently reached some kind of understanding that if a Palestinian state were to be created on the West Bank, it would be a part of a federated Jordan. That at least was an indication that something was beginning to develop on that side, but nonetheless, Hussein, who visited Washington on December 20, while meeting with Shultz, gave a rather pessimistic view of his hopes. During a meeting with Reagan, on the following day, Hussein said quite clearly that he was not prepared to enter the negotiations as long as Jewish settlements were being established on the West Bank and Gaza.

During this whole period, the settlement issue was very much on the front burners. Sometime around December 1, Sharon reinvigorated the settlement drive; the Cabinet announced that it had authorized an additional 31 settlements on the West Bank. That was an irritant in our relationship with Israel, but it also convinced Hussein not to get involved in the peace negotiations. There was a lot of pernicious stuff going on in Israel during this period, most if not all centered around Sharon and his supporters. The Syrians also strongly opposed Hussein and Arafat getting together on a formula and they managed to torpedo all efforts, although that might have happened under any circumstances. The fact that the two concluded any formula was a small miracle in itself; they distrusted each other enormously. Whenever one of the Hussein-Arafat negotiating sessions was finished, we would immediately receive indications from Hussein that Arafat was one of the most frustrating, difficult, annoying and infuriating men to deal with. We heard a lot about the difficulties the two men had with each other, although we heard more from Hussein because we were of course not in touch with Arafat at the time.

When Hussein came to Washington in December, he suggested to Reagan and Shultz that he was still open to the Reagan initiative; he had not come to any final conclusions. But as long as Israel was not showing any interest in retreating from Lebanon, it was impossible for the King to deal with the initiative. The settlement process, accelerating as it was, was also a stumbling block. We of course also knew that in addition to the two reasons he gave, he was also having difficulties reaching an acceptable agreement with Arafat. Nevertheless, the King kept the door open; it was not closed until April 1983 when he announced that he could not participate in negotiations based on the Reagan initiative. That almost coincided with the time when George Shultz had achieved success in negotiating an agreement between Lebanon and Israel. The American government's attitude towards Israel shifted rather substantially during the February-April period, particularly once the agreement was signed and when it became clear that Hussein would not enter the negotiations. By this time, Sharon was not Minister of Defense any longer; he had been replaced after the Kahan Commission report, by Moshe Arens. That brought a different tone to the relationship.

From April on, the US-Israel relationship was much calmer. Shultz especially had come to the conclusion that the U.S. had to work closely with Israel, especially if the Syrians were to be blocked who were already showing signs of interfering in the Israel-Lebanon agreement. The US-Israeli relationships grew closer as it became clearer that Hussein would not join the Reagan initiative and that Damascus, contrary to Shultz' expectations, was determined to block the implementation of the Israel-Lebanon agreement.

Now I will return to the Lebanon drama. When President Reagan reintroduced the Marines for a second time after Sabra and Shatila, the Administration had told Congress that it expected the forces to be in Lebanon only briefly. By December, they had been there for four months and nothing seemed to be happening to permit a plausible withdrawal. That situation increased the pressure on the administration to convince Israel to withdraw from Lebanon and to complete the peace negotiations. During December, Sharon returned secretly to Beirut the day before Christmas and Christmas Day, during which he met with Gemayel and other Lebanese leaders in order to push the Israel-Lebanon bilateral negotiations back on track. This effort was way too late and the whole situation collapsed soon thereafter.

After the end of the bilateral debacle, the Israelis realized that they had to find some way to join our negotiating track. We talked to them about procedural matters that had been a stumbling block. We received a number of messages from Washington urging that some movement be evident. When Sharon returned from Lebanon and reported to Begin his failure to make any progress with Gemayel, the Israeli Cabinet decided to accept the terms that essentially Habib had suggested earlier.

On December 26, Israel made a formal statement to the press announcing that negotiations would begin the following day. That was somewhat overly optimistic, but in fact the negotiations did start on December 28 in a suburb of Beirut. The site was a partially shot-up old hotel. David Kimche headed the Israeli delegation with Abrasha Tamir representing the Defense Ministry -- i.e. Sharon. He was essentially the co-chairman. The Lebanese delegation was a very complicated one filled with representatives of each major ethnic and religious group -- Shia, Sunni, Christians, Druze. The Lebanese were either officials of the Foreign Ministry or the military, but had practically no authority. Morris Draper represented us, supported by a couple of other U.S. officials. He served as an observer and mediator and catalyst to keep the discussions moving. He may have served as chairman of the opening session. That meant that it took from the end of September to the end of December for any formal dialogue to be launched.

In the background stood the Kahan Commission which was investigating the Sabra/Shatila massacres. It was expected that it would report its findings by the end of January. That undoubtedly made Sharon nervous since he was bound to bear the burden of any negative comments.

On December 29, I called Simca Ehrlich who was then the Vice Premier and Minister of Finance. He was the leader of the Liberal Party; he was a moderate and not especially vigorous, but very interested in maintaining a working relationship with the United States. I told him that I would appreciate a few private moments with him. I was greatly concerned at the time by the status of our relationship with Israel, which had been very much attrited by the Fall's events. I was especially concerned by Sharon's nefarious influence on the relationship. I knew that Ehrlich was not a great admirer of Sharon's; he had been unhappy for sometime with Sharon personally and with his influence on Begin and the Cabinet. So I met with Ehrlich. I made it immediately clear to him that I had no instructions from Washington, but that I had taken it upon myself to make this call because of my deep concern about the relationships between our two countries. I told him that I had been in Washington in late November and that my consultations there had indicated that my concerns were shared by many others. But I told him that I found it very difficult to repair the situation because so much of the damage had resulted from the various personalities involved and their interactions. We had a frank and personal exchange about the situation and events and about steps that might be considered to improve the relationship. Ehrlich was the first to raise Sharon's name in the conversation. He of course had gone immediately to the heart of the problem without prompting from me. I told Ehrlich that unless that relationship did improve, I was deeply concerned that we would soon run into some very stormy weather. He concluded our talk by saying that he would try his best to convince Begin to reduce Sharon's influence and actions as one step toward better Israel-US relationships. I mention this meeting here at this point because a year later it figured centrally in my most bitter encounter with Sharon.

I have mentioned earlier that Ambassadors do a lot of unusual things. For example, on December 31 -- New Year's Eve -- soon after my very significant conversation with Ehrlich, I attended a benefit party for the International Variety Club at the Tel Aviv Hilton. American Ambassadors were expected to attend these benefits. This was a particularly interesting one because Variety had managed to obtain the presence of a special guest: Liz Taylor. Sallie and I had the duty to go to the Presidential suite in the hotel to meet the guest of honor and to escort her down to the ball. This one of the periods when she was not married, but she was accompanied by a Mexican businessman, to whom, I believe, she was engaged although I don't think she ever married him. We had met Liz Taylor once many years before but it was just a brief handshake; we had never really conversed with her. But that New Year's Eve we spent a lot of time with her; she turned out to be very different from what I expected. Actually, she seemed to me to be a very sad lady, although she looked very good -- she was in one of her thin phases. Sallie and I escorted her down, accompanied by several bodyguards, and arrived in the lobby only to face a throng of screaming people, mostly quite mature looking people. Most seemed to be over 40. There must of been several hundreds of fans just waiting there hoping to touch her or at least get near enough for a close look. It was a rare illustration of the old "movie star" syndrome. Sallie was walking a little behind Liz and me. The bodyguards were all around us keeping the crowd away from Taylor and me. But Sallie, who was not inside the "envelope", was almost trampled to death by the throng of fans. It was just fortunate that a friend, who happened to be in the lobby, grabbed her and pulled her up on a sofa; that is the only reason she survived. We of course were ushered into the ballroom and escorted to the table; we sat down -- the ten who were invited to that table. Everyone else in the room just surrounded the table forcing the bodyguards to form a ring around the table to keep two or three feet of distance between the crowd and the seated guests. Sallie was not with us; she had not been able to get through the crowd. In the melee, I didn't realize for a while that she had not made it; when I did, there wasn't much I could do in light of the frenzy surrounding us. Eventually, Sallie worked her way through the crowd, only to be met by the bodyguards who wouldn't let her through. It took her about twenty minutes to finally get a seat. I don't think she really enjoyed herself that evening. It was sheer bedlam.

There was another celebrity at the ball that night and that was Brook Shield, the actress, who was quite young at the time. She was in Israel making a film. She and her mother, who went with her everywhere, were at another table about four or five tables away. She received a certain amount of attention, but nothing of course compared to the fan adulation that Elizabeth Taylor drew even though the latter was much older and the former much prettier at that time. During the course of the evening, Shields and her mother came to our table and sort of paid obeisance to the "Queen". It was quite an evening!

Taylor's Mexican escort was very nice. He was very protective of her and jumped at her every bidding. She was clearly one of those women who from the age of four had never done anything for herself. She always had someone around who waited on her hand and foot; she accepted that as a normal pattern of life. She was really helpless without a coterie to look after her every aspect of daily living.

For the next couple of days, while negotiations were starting in Kiryat Shimona, I was off on other business. Maury Draper was our representative. On the afternoon of January 2, I briefed then senator Paul Tsongas at the residence and a couple of people who were traveling with him.

We always had Congressional visitors. In my first year as Ambassador to Israel, two-thirds of the U.S. Congress visited the country, either individually or in groups. In subsequent years, the traffic was not quite as heavy, but I think that practically every Congressman or Senator has been through Israel at one time or other. I always tried to brief them personally, either in Jerusalem or in Tel Aviv, usually at the residence. I got to know a lot of Members of Congress that way. It was useful for me because I got a good feel for the Middle East political temperature in the Congress.

Solarz must have been in Israel once every six months. He was the most demanding because he was such a fantastic worker. When he would come to Israel, he would want see everybody starting with early breakfast meetings at 7 a.m. and then he would go until midnight every day. He would practically kill his control officer. I would spend a lot of time with him because he was "good value"; I would learn a lot from him during the meetings; he was also very anxious to have our views on current events. So I would spend a lot of time with him. But I can tell you that after a Solarz visit -- two or three days -- everyone was completely exhausted. He has incredible energy.

On Monday, January 3, 1983, Sallie and I left for Washington to accompany President and Mrs. Navon on the first formal visit ever arranged for an Israeli President. They had insisted that we escort them. Navon had been very anxious for such an occasion and had been angling for it ever since he had become President. Until early 1983, Washington had not been impressed that it had been necessary. We always had close contacts with Prime Ministers and other Israeli officials, but the White House had always been reluctant to host a State visit with a personage who was essentially a figure-head. Navon was an influential player within the Labor Party and a very fine person. Mrs. Navon was a former Miss Israel. The Navons put a lot of stock in getting the State visit invitation before the end of his term which was going to take place the next year. I tried to help with the White House to get the invitation. In the final analysis, Navon got an invitation, but it was not full State visit honors. It was, protocol-wise, the next lower set of arrangements, which for example did not require a Blair House stay nor a State dinner.

So we came with the Navons to help with the East Coast portion of their American tour. We flew on an Israeli Air Force plane, which is the transportation used by Israeli VIPs -- not very fancy, to say at least. President Reagan hosted a luncheon for the Navons; there was a big reception, a formal dinner at the Israeli Embassy (hosted by then Ambassador Moshe Arens), not to mention several meetings, some of which I participated in. The fact that he had an official lunch was very important to Navon. It took a lot my persuasion to get the White House to host the lunch; it finally did, but it was a battle all the way. In fact, the visit went very smoothly and Navon was very happy although undoubtedly he would have preferred a full State visit.

I did arrange for John Hopkins University, which I attended as a graduate student, to grant Navon an honorary degree which helped the visit greatly. I did that by conspiring with Steve Muller, the President of the University, who was Jewish himself and also someone very sensitive to international nuances. So John Hopkins hosted a big dinner and a ceremony in Baltimore which was greatly appreciated. The Baltimore ceremonies were huge, but lovely and well done. Navon gave a fine speech, followed by a large kosher dinner for several hundreds of guests.

After that, we went to Boston and stayed with the Navons through that visit. Governor and Mrs. Michael Dukakis hosted a very nice reception for the Navons at the State House. That was my first opportunity to meet Dukakis. He was terrific -- very engaging, politically savvy. The whole reception was a great success. I was surprised that he did not turn out to be a more effective Presidential candidate because on the occasion of the Navon visit, he and Kitty both seemed to be terrific politicians.

In the meantime, back in Israel, the Kahan Commission had finished its report, although their findings remained unknown, even to the well known Israeli informal information system. On January 2, there was a story in the press referring to Steve Solarz, who apparently had been in Baghdad in August shortly after the PLO withdrawal from Beirut. The Iraqis released the transcript of Solarz' meeting with Saddam Hussein. Hussein was quoted as saying that "no Arab official includes in his current policy the so-called destruction of Israel, but there is not one Arab who believes it is possible to co-live with such an aggressive and expansionist state". Those were the words of the man who eight years later would launch an invasion of Kuwait! The Solarz meeting was one of many conducted by American Congressmen to try to wean Hussein away from the camp of Arab leaders who totally rejected Israel.

Habib was back in Washington while I was in New York with Navon. The President met there with American Jewish leaders and intellectuals. We held a session in Elie Weisel's apartment. We were still in a period during which Israel's image in the U.S. in the aftermath of the Lebanon invasion was very badly frayed. Navon's visit was important not only for the contacts he made with American leaders, but also for his portrayal of an Israeli leader so different from Begin and Sharon. He was a left-wing Liberal Party member, known for his strong support of Israel-Arab co-existence. He spoke fluent Arabic -- he taught Arabic at one point in his career. So his meeting with American leadership and the press did have a useful effect in that it brought a different image of Israeli leadership. That was one of the reasons why I was happy to assist in the arrangements for Navon's visit.

In New York, Navon gave a speech to the Council of Foreign Relations. Then he left for a tour of the United States and I returned to Washington. As I said, Habib had been there and had been instructed by Reagan to return to the Middle East in the hopes of accelerating the negotiating process. I met with George Shultz and Cap Weinberger and Fred Iklé and then returned to Tel Aviv on January 11.

Upon my arrival the next day, I went directly to Jerusalem and had a working dinner with Habib that night at the Consulate General. Habib was to see the Israeli leaders the next day. We met with Begin on January 13 at 11 a.m. Habib conveyed Reagan's concerns and delivered a fairly stiff message, although couched in polite terms. We were pushing for an early resolution of the current situation before any further damage might ensue. Begin said all the right things; he also wanted to expedite the negotiations, but he was still withdrawn and depressed and did not engage much in the dialogue.

Habib then went to Beirut. I had dinner that night with Shimon Peres, during which I briefed him on my Washington consultations and Habib's current efforts. I saw that kind of briefing for the major opposition party leader as one of my roles. Although I was assigned to work with the Begin government, it was important that the Labor opposition party be kept current of the negotiations and especially what we were doing and what our views were. Sometimes Habib would also meet with Peres, but more often those briefings were left to me. Begin knew what I was doing, although he was not enthusiastic about the process. As I said, we felt it was important to be even-handed with both major Israeli parties. Labor was much opposed to Begin's Lebanon policy so that our views had a much more sympathetic audience there than with the Likud. But Labor did not have any influence on government policies. So I used to meet with Peres during this long period at least once a week just to keep him apprised.

Moshe Arens was the Israeli Ambassador in Washington. Although he was hard-liner, he was well acquainted with American practices and views and managed to always put the best face on Israeli policies and actions, even though sometimes that was a very tough assignment. He was highly regarded and fully trusted by Begin. He was a very useful communications channel.

The negotiations dragged on through January. Habib shuttled in and out of Beirut, but did not participate directly in the formal negotiations. That was left to Morris Draper. The level of the negotiators was below Habib's, made up essentially of technical people; no Ministers were involved. Habib would coordinate with Draper; he would talk to Amin Gemayel in Beirut and with Begin and Sharon in Jerusalem. He would push both sides to show greater flexibility; he would try to sell them on some compromises. The formal talks took place on a home-to-home basis -- once in Beirut and then in Kiryat Shimona in Israel.

On January 20, the Lebanese rejected a series of Israeli demands for a security sector in south Lebanon and for some early warning stations to be manned by the Israelis even after withdrawal. This negotiation became very complicated; I was not directly involved although I discussed the issues with Habib and Draper in great detail and for many hours before they were discussed again at the conference table. By about January 20, it became apparent that the negotiations were not getting very far. The conference became stuck on many issues. Ultimately, the bottom line was that the Israelis were, in exchange for withdrawal, demanding an adequate presence to provide an early warning of pending attacks and to influence their southern Lebanese allies to provide some defense against cross border attacks. The Lebanese were resisting these demands. The Israelis were also trying to achieve a political arrangement between the two countries which would have been tantamount to a peace accord without that name. All parties understood that a formal peace agreement would have been too provocative to the Syrians.

Gemayel, if left to his own devices, would have been prepared to accede to Israeli demands. But he was under increasing pressure from Syrian allies in Lebanon and from Syria itself. He did keep the Syrians informed about the status of the negotiations, but did not necessarily seek their approval. This set of circumstances became the subject of debate long after the end of the negotiations which continued for months and months. Eventually, Shultz came to the area at the end of April and took over for Habib. In about ten days, Shultz put a deal together which was called the "May 17" agreement. It included many of the Israeli positions as well as some of Lebanon's. It was actually a pretty good agreement from Lebanon's point of view and certainly a very good agreement for Israel. Unfortunately, it never took effect. Gemayel did sign it, but could not get it ratified by the Lebanese Parliament. Gemayel had been overly confident that Syria would acquiesce and not oppose it. When Assad was briefed on all the details, he made his opposition clear and told Gemayel that he would not permit its approval. He began to apply pressure to his surrogates in Lebanon and intimidated the Lebanese Parliament so that ratification was impossible. The agreement was therefore still-born.

Then came the second guessing. Were we foolish to think that such an accord would be ratified without Syria's prior agreement? When, in the prior Fall, we first began to discuss the problem of achieving an agreement both in Washington and in Israel, Syria was in relatively bad shape having been battered both by the war and their own losses on the battle fields. The Russians had not yet resupplied the Syrian forces; the Syrians felt uncertain and vulnerable. Habib had been told by Syrian officials in Damascus on October 2 that Syria would agree to withdraw its troops from Lebanon if Israeli forces were also withdrawn. Moreover, at some time in the Fall, Shultz had been assured by the Saudis that if an agreement were reached between Lebanon and Israel, Syria would not be a problem. The Saudis assured Shultz that Assad would not interfere. Shultz accepted that assurance at face value and based his approaches on that assumption, even though it was clear that the Syrians might well object to some versions of an agreement. He believed that when it came crunch time, the Syrian would back off and accept whatever arrangements might be concluded. We knew that the Israelis, who were demanding a peace agreement, were taking positions that were probably not acceptable to the Syrians. It was clear that the Israeli were pushing so hard for a full peace accord that if we had tried to bring the Syrians into the process as participants, it would have resulted in a stalemate. On the other hand, we thought that if an agreement could be hammered out quickly while Syria was weak and vulnerable, there was a possibility that the Syrians would reluctantly acquiesce and not try to block the arrangements. That was our calculation and I think, even in retrospect, it was a reasonable gamble. That approach certainly had a better chance of success than trying to get the Syrians to agree explicitly during the negotiations themselves to anything that was acceptable to the Israelis. We had very little effective leverage on the Israelis and therefore a very limited opportunity to reduce Israeli demands.

What was probably wrong was the timing. During the long period of stalemate in the Fall, for which Sharon was responsible, whatever opportunity for success we had was lost. The agreement that was finally reached could have been achieved in the Fall, and would have had a far better chance of approval then because Syria was far weaker and less confident than it was six months later. Assad may have felt that he had no choice except to acquiesce, or at least Syria might have been less able to intimidate the Lebanese and thereby prevent the achievement of an agreement. By the time we had reached May, Syria had regained its self-confidence; it had been resupplied by the Soviets permitting Assad to flex his muscle again in Lebanon, thereby reestablishing Syria's prestige and influence in Lebanon. By May, the chances of Assad acquiescing in something that he clearly opposed, had become minimal if at all existent. The Saudis again demonstrated their inability or unwillingness to influence Syria. Therefore, although agreement was not reached, I do not believe that it was mistake to try to achieve it. I still believe that if Sharon had not been permitted to play his own game during the Fall and had we moved ahead quickly with our efforts as we had wished, the outcome would have been different. Begin's health failure was a large factor because it enabled Sharon to have greater latitude than might otherwise have been possible.

In addition, there was another series of events which effected the eventual outcome of the Israel-

Lebanon negotiations. I refer principally to the Kahan Commission report, which took about five months to complete. On February 2, while Israeli and multi-national forces were in Beirut, three Israeli tanks moved from one sector of the city to another on a road that was patrolled by the multi-national force. An American captain, waiving his pistol, tried to stop the tanks. Someone took a photograph of that moment which appeared in The New York Times and some other papers. That episode was viewed in Israel as ludicrous because the Israelis always liked to believe that our two countries had parallel interests in Lebanon. The possibility that one ally was trying to stop another ally was viewed as ridiculous in Israel. In the U.S., that picture had an entirely different meaning; namely that it was evidence of Israeli lack of consideration for the different roles that the two countries had assumed in Lebanon. Cap Weinberger became very exercised about the picture; it fed his anti-Israeli views which were quite substantial by this time.

The Pentagon, based on this event and other similar ones, put out some very nasty stories about Sharon. They probably were based on some truth. He was accused of discrediting our forces by encouraging these episodes. Sharon had always opposed the idea of the multi-lateral forces because he knew that they would limit Israel's freedom of action. That suggests that the Pentagon's allegation may have had basis in fact.

The Kahan Commission presented its findings on February 7, 1983. It placed indirect responsibility on Sharon for the Sabra and Shatila massacres. It recommended that the Chief of Staff, the Chief of Military Intelligence and another senior general be relieved of their commands. Begin and Shamir were both criticized by the report, but were not held ultimately responsible. On February 10, the Cabinet voted 16-1 to approve the recommendations of the Kahan Commission, including the recommendation that Sharon be removed as defense minister. By this time, Sharon had become completely isolated in the Cabinet. He took all the heat for the Lebanese events, although he tried to wrap himself in a martyr's mantle. He therefore was forced to leave his post, although Begin refused to fire him from the Cabinet and allowed him to stay on as Minister without Portfolio. Nevertheless, Sharon's influence on the negotiations was vastly diminished since he was no longer defense minister. Moshe Arens was brought back from Washington (replaced by Meir Rosenne as Ambassador) and made Defense Minister. That one single action signaled the revitalization of U.S.-Israel relations although the improvements came slowly. Also Israel's position in the Lebanon negotiations became more flexible. I am convinced that had Sharon remained defense minister, there never would have been a May 17 agreement. He would have tried to extract the last ounce of flesh out of the Lebanese; he was very angry with them for their abandonment of his bilateral deal. Arens was determined to achieve some settlement. He was on good terms with Shultz and worked much more cooperatively with us in trying to bring the negotiations to a successful conclusion. The fact that Shultz, Begin and Arens got along quite well and with Sharon no longer a looming figure was the key to bringing Israeli-US relationship on track. I have always thought that one important aspect of the "May 17" agreement was that George Shultz, while achieving an agreement which ultimately did not get ratified and therefore did not solve the Israel-Lebanon tensions, did manage as a by-product of his direct role in the negotiations, start to bring the U.S.-Israel relationship back to its pre-invasion levels. It had been badly ruptured by the invasion; and then had become increasingly difficult through a long series of incidents. Arens return to the Defense Ministry also helped to bring the two governments back together so that they could work on achieving common goals. Israeli approval of the Shultz agreement became the base necessary for the rebuilding of U.S.-

Israel governmental ties. This rapprochement accelerated in the latter part of 1983 and in 1984 and 1985.

I was not in Israel on the day the Kahan Commission made its formal submission. I was on one my infrequent, but highly publicized diving expeditions. This time, I had gone to the Sinai on Monday, February 7. I visited our U.S. battalion which was acting as part of the observers' force on the southern part of the Sinai coast. I stayed overnight and then went to Sharm el Sheikh for a dive. I returned the night of February 8. On the ninth, I met with Habib and Kimche on the status of negotiations. Habib and Kimche got along well; as a matter of fact, David Kimche got along well with all of us. He was the Director General of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. He and his deputy, Habon Bar-on, were two reasonable professional diplomats with whom we dealt with easily and effectively. Kimche was as I mentioned the formal leader of the Israeli delegation to the Lebanese peace talks, but that didn't reduce the influence of the Defense Ministry which was of course very powerful. The Foreign ministry, throughout this period, was a positive influence from our point of view, even though Shamir took a back seat to Sharon. He didn't play much of a role and depended largely on the work of his staff. He was a silent partner throughout this crisis.

We also saw Begin that day and exchanged views on progress. He was still withdrawn and not really engaged.

There were a lot of minor events during the February-April period. I won't recount all of them, but I will mention one that was of particular interest to American diplomats. On April 18, a car bomb blew up our Embassy in Beirut, killing our CIA Station Chief and many others. That was the first clear piece of evidence that our military presence in Lebanon, which was part of a peace-keeping operation, was beginning to be counter-productive. We had become identified as a target for the radical anti-regime forces. That was a major blow to U.S. interests in the region, particularly the destruction of the CIA complex. It destroyed our intelligence gathering capability on Lebanon, leaving us with too little intelligence for a long time thereafter. It made us very dependent on Israeli intelligence who worked very closely with the Christian Phalangists. Shultz returned to the area shortly thereafter to put the finishing touches on the agreement which was by then close to completion. Habib had by this time lost the confidence of the Israeli government so that he could not bring it to closure. He worked night and day, but he couldn't bring Begin, Arens and Shamir over the last hurdles; they would not trust him sufficiently. That forced Shultz' return; he shuttled for about ten days and brought the negotiations to a successful end. Shultz stopped in Cairo on his way to Beirut and held a conference for those regional Ambassadors who were involved in the process. Among us was Ambassador Paganelli who was assigned to Damascus. He was an outspoken, able and volatile individual, who had been unhappy with our policies toward the area. He believed that we should have been coordinating with Syria all along; he was unhappy that we were talking to Israel and Lebanon but were waiting for Syria until later. He had peppered Washington with his views for some time, but was not getting any positive response. When we met with Shultz, Paganelli, backed up by some other Ambassadors, launched a rather intemperate attack on Shultz' strategy.

He said that even if an agreement were to be reached, it couldn't succeed because the Syrians would block it. He urged that we drop the whole negotiations in part because the chances of success were so small and in part because it was souring U.S.-Syria relations. Paganelli was a serious professional, who talked to the Syrians in tough terms on occasions. He was a diamond in the rough. He had a different perspective because he viewed the situation from Damascus; I don't think he was defending the Syrians just because he was accredited to them. He just the picture from a different angle. Our Ambassadors to other Arab States, like Saudi Arabia, supported Paganelli. Roy Atherton, then our Ambassador in Cairo, and I were the only ones that supported the path that the U.S. had undertaken. Our argument was that we had invested heavily in the negotiation and that we should therefore not now back off and break off the talks, thereby giving Syria and other Arab states a cheap victory, which they would exploit for their own benefit. We further argued that it would be better for the U.S. if an agreement could be concluded, even if Syria then blocked it; the burden would then be on Assad. Shultz was obviously not in a mood to retreat and became very angry with Paganelli. He later told Nick Veliotis, then the Assistant Secretary for the region, that he thought that Paganelli had been in Damascus too long (he had been at post for a little more than a couple of years) and that he wanted a list of potential successors. Shultz was very angry by this ill timed intervention. Nick had a very hard time persuading the Secretary over the period of the next few weeks not to replace Paganelli immediately, although he was transferred in June, 1983. The issue was a perfectly legitimate one, but the presentation was ill advised and too stark, particularly in light of Shultz' personal stake in the outcome of the negotiations. This was Shultz' first trip to the Middle East since taking on the job of Secretary; he had come not only to wrap up the agreement, but with public instructions from Reagan to get the peace process moving once again.

The agreement was signed on May 17. That was not the only issue on our plates. We had arguments about the sale of F-15s to Israel which we had embargoed the previous summer. Shultz promised that once the agreement was signed and approved by the Cabinet, that we would lift the embargo. The Cabinet approved the agreement by 17-2 vote with Sharon and another minister in opposition. Syria, as I have mentioned, immediately raised objections. The Saudis made some noises, but their position was not entirely clear. We kept hoping that the agreement would come into force and were counting on Lebanese reliance on us as well as some hopes that the Soviets would play a positive role with their Middle East allies. We also thought that the Saudis might apply some pressure on Syria, even though the Saudi Defense Minister had publicly said on May 11 that his country would not apply any pressure on Syria -- but what is said publicly in the Middle East does not necessarily reflect what is actually done. On May 13, even before the agreement was signed, Syria formally rejected the accords. But the Lebanese Cabinet proceeded to approve it anyway, after considerable pressure from Gemayel, Habib and Shultz. Arafat returned to Lebanon for the first time since the PLO evacuation.

Gemayel was interested in getting the Syrian forces withdrawn as well as the Israeli troops. It soon became apparent that Syria was not very likely to be very accommodating.

We are now in late May, 1983, following the signing of the May 17 agreement between Lebanon and Israel. As I mentioned earlier, one of the immediate consequences of that signing was the lifting of our embargo on the shipment of F-16, which had been produced, but never delivered. The Congress was also busy at the same time trying to increase the Israel assistance levels, which had been blocked by the Administration since the summer of 1982. After the signing of the agreement, the Administration decided it would go along with any increase as long as that did not result in levels available for other aid recipients. That was symbolic of the fact that with the signing of the agreement, the long slide in U.S.-Israeli relations, which had begun 18 months earlier with the annexation of the Golan Heights, had been halted and was going to be reversed. Over the following 18 months, there was a steady improvement in rapport between the Reagan Administration and Israel.

George Shultz, who had spent a lot of time in Jerusalem on the agreement, had developed good personal relations with key Israeli leaders. That certainly was an asset. The antipathy of some of the Washington bureaucracy, especially in the Pentagon, to Israel was somewhat dissipated by the agreement. On the whole, relationships began their upward trend to the customary level.

Q: Did the antipathy in the Pentagon stem from the Services or from the Office of the Secretary?

LEWIS: Some existed in the Services, but the over-all tenor was a reflection of Weinberger's view. Once he became less vociferous, the Services also became more forthcoming.

On May 21, Phil Habib flew in from Cairo to have some meetings with Shamir and others. Then he went on to Beirut. He was in this period still trying to tie up any loose ends and urge the Israelis to move forward with their force withdrawals.

I arrived in Washington on June 8 and attended a large ADL dinner that night. I was sitting on the dais and made a few remarks, although I was half-asleep at the time. The next morning, I started on a round of meetings. Habib and Draper were also in Washington at the time, along with our Ambassadors to Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Lebanon and myself. Nick Veliotis, as Assistant Secretary, chaired the sessions. We did have some meetings with Shultz.

It happened that Eli Salem, the Lebanese Foreign Minister, was also in Washington at the same time. He was meeting separately with State Department officials; I met with him once along with Nick. Interestingly enough, I had known him when we both attended the John Hopkins School for Advanced International Studies (SAIS), but we had not seen each other since, which would have been nearly thirty years. But we had been friendly at SAIS and it was an interesting reunion. Eli is a very able person, anxious to rebuild the Israeli-Lebanese Christian relationship in a durable way, but he was very sensitive to the Syrian pressure and concerned that such pressure might block the implementation of the agreement just reached. He thought that key would be the U.S. ability to persuade Assad to accept the agreement and to withdraw his own forces from Lebanon on the agreed upon time schedule.

A few days later I went to New York to spend the weekend with some friends. Upon return, there were another round of meetings with Shultz and Eagleburger and then I flew back to Israel. That was on June 14. While I was in Washington, Cap Weinberger said publicly that the U.S.-Israel memorandum of understanding on defense cooperation could then be revived. That was not a great inducement to the Israelis at the time, but it was another signal that the U.S.-Israel relationships were changing. Also, just before my departure, the White House announced that Begin would be invited to the U.S. on a working visit in late July (which, of course, never took place; Begin resigned late in the summer). It was also announced that Habib and Draper would return to the area to continue to work on the troop withdrawal agreements.

On June 16, I had a long private talk with Begin in which I relayed President Reagan's desire to bring the relationship back to the pre-war days. I asked him what dates he might prefer for his Washington visit; he told me he would examine his schedule and let me know. He still seemed curiously unengaged, even when discussing his trip, which he had been anxious to undertake. Throughout the Spring and the Summer, he appeared almost frail; he was obviously eating very little. His clothes hung on him; he did look terrible. He was unquestionably depressed, but he did show up at his office every day, in a shirt that looked three sizes too big for him. He had enough energy to go through his schedule. He didn't seem physically weaker, but just plain listless -- no spark, just going through the motions. I have to assume that Begin's problems were largely psychological, but that his reduced food intake from lack of appetite was taking a physical toll. Without his wife looking after him, he was just declining. His daughter was living with him, but she didn't have the same influence that his wife had had.

Just after I had returned, on June 21, Sallie and I had gone to Safad in north Israel to spend a weekend; we were celebrating our 30th wedding anniversary. While there, we received word that Simcha Ehrlich, the Minister of Finance and the leader of the Liberal Party -- the Likud's junior partner -- had passed away. I went to the funeral on the following Tuesday. This was another watershed event because Ehrlich had been one of the most moderate members of the Cabinet; he had opposed the war; he had been a great admirer of the United States. But he was a weak political figure, unable to stand up to Begin and unable to assert himself very effectively. Nonetheless, he had been a useful and friendly interlocutor, particularly about internal Israeli political matters.

Soon after my return, I briefed the Israeli and American press on my trip with special emphasize on the changing mood in Washington. I tried to stimulate some positive stories about U.S.-Israel relationships. On June 26, Habib met with Begin. The feud between Arafat and Assad had heated up again, resulting in a Syrian announcement that Arafat was persona non grata because of his public statements that had not set well in Damascus. He was ordered out of Syria and left for Tunis. He was not to return to Syria for a long time.

During this period, we had lengthy discussions with the Israelis about the timetable for their troop withdrawals from Lebanon. There were some significant disagreements; we hoped for an early start of withdrawals, particularly from the Beirut area. The Israeli view was that they needed to stay in Lebanon until the Syrian began their withdrawals. They felt that the presence of their troops was important assurance for the Lebanese government that it would not be abandoned to the Syrian troops and the pressure that that would create. We sympathized with that view-point, but it was Washington's position that the Syrian wouldn't leave until the Israelis left. It was the old "chicken and egg" argument, which began to seep into the press and we were accused of trying to put the agreement in jeopardy by pressing Israel to move too fast and too far. This was the normal part of U.S. Israel relations; whenever we had a disagreement we would soon find it ventilated in the press in a rather distorted form. That put us in the position of having to get our version out to the press; sometimes we succeeded, sometimes we did not.

Throughout my tenure, The New York Times and the Washington Post and several other American papers had very good correspondents in Israel. Some of the British writers were good; in general we had a high caliber press corps in Israel. David Shipler wrote for The New York Times -- he was outstanding. He was followed by Tom Friedman who had been moved from Beirut; he was also an outstanding correspondent. David Greenlee of the Washington Post and others were very, very good -- almost as good as the Times' people. Mike Kubic of Newsweek had been there for about fifteen years and was highly regarded. The American press was very well informed. It got a lot of information from their Israeli journalists friends, but they were quite responsible -- much more than the Israeli press. The Americans would check their stories with at least two sources which is something that the Israeli seldomly do. The Americans, if given some accusation about the U.S., would have the decency to call the Embassy to get a reaction before they ran the story; that was not characteristic of the Israeli press. I dealt with the two groups separately most of the time. I learned a good deal from correspondents, particularly the Israeli ones. I didn't deal much with the British press; I concentrated on the American and Israeli press. I took the view that it was not my job to feed the foreign press, so I didn't give them any interviews and rarely talked to them except on social occasions.

At the end of June, the growing split between the PLO and Syria was graphically demonstrated when the Mufti in Jerusalem issued a "Fatwa" calling for the early demise of President Assad which probably was not well received by the Palestinians still in Damascus at the time. At about the same time, Habib, Draper, Dick Fairbanks and Dennis Ross -- then either in Defense or at the White House -- visited Israel. Ross became a prominent member of the U.S. negotiating team during 1983. He was very tough on the Syrians, especially, and abetted the already pretty strong anti-Syrian views of many of the American officials.

Coincidentally, another old "Middle East hand" -- Henry Kissinger -- arrived. He was in private capacity to renew old acquaintances and of course he saw everybody. We briefed him; I attended a dinner that President Herzog hosted for him and Nancy. He delivered the Yigal Allon lecture at Tel Aviv University. I remember it as being pretty boring, not up to Henry's abilities. Abba Eban introduced him. I was sitting in the front row of the auditorium. Henry was talking to someone before the event started when Abba Eban came in and sat down next to me. He started to talk to me and then said: "I have to make a note or two about my introduction". He pulled out an envelope and on the back of it, in less than one minute, he scribbled down his notes. We continued our discussion. Eban had been very critical of Begin and his policies. He then went on stage and delivered on those absolute short speech gems, which should have been recorded. It was an absolute model of 5-7 minute speech. It was perfectly timed; every phrase delicately structured, witty, insightful. It contrasted sharply with Kissinger's which he read; it was formal, heavy. It was good, but it demonstrated what a great orator can do extemporaneously as compared to other speakers. I of course had seen the Ebans relatively frequently. We saw them socially; they used to come to the residence and we went to their home. I liked Susie (Mrs. Eban) very much. We liked Abba as well, but he was not really involved by that time in the politics of Israel. So our relationship was primarily social; our conversations covered history often. He still an active member of the Labor Party, but no longer really important. But his views were always lucid and wise; unfortunately he did not fight for his views very strongly and he really didn't have a political base to support him. He was still hoping to return into a Cabinet position, so that he was very careful about what he said in public. He didn't reveal that he had long since concluded that the Palestinians needed to have their own state; many years went by before he could afford to articulate those views publicly. It was something of a death knell for one's career to hold those views in 1983.

Let me just finish this section with a vignette to describe what life was like in mid-1983 as U.S.-Israel relationships were on the mend. Shultz had reported to Reagan that problems were developing in implementing the troop withdrawal agreement. He also mentioned that Syria was being very uncooperative, to put it diplomatically. Reagan then asked Shultz to return to the area, which he did in early July, visiting Saudi Arabia, Syria, Lebanon and Israel. After meeting with Assad in Damascus, Shultz stated publicly that he didn't see any prospect of imminent Syrian withdrawal. In the meantime, the Lebanese had told us privately that if Israel withdrew, even partially, without comparable Syrian withdrawal, the pressure on them might become so great that the whole agreement might be voided. So while we were publicly declaiming that the Israelis had to start withdrawal, Shultz was being told in Damascus that the Syrians would not and the Lebanese were saying privately that the Israelis should not leave too quickly. The contradictions in all of these statements were beginning to make our policies subject to considerable strain, both in trying to explain them and then in having them implemented. Every year, of course, we celebrate the Fourth of July. In Israel, as we do in many countries in the world, we had a large reception on that date. We had become accustomed by this time to having a fairly elaborate celebration. We found that limiting invitations was counter-productive because all who didn't get an invitation were insulted and that we were therefore creating considerable ill-will when our purpose was just the opposite. The American community on Tel Aviv had a separate picnic at the American School, attended by families. The diplomatic reception was largely for Israelis and other diplomats. There were so many Israelis who felt they were due an invitation because of their American connections or their relationships to the Embassy. The longer the Lewis family stayed in Tel Aviv, the greater the invitation list became. By 1983, this was our sixth Fourth of July reception. What started as an affair for 400-500 people, by now the invitation list was at 2,500 with about 2,000 showing up. We managed to fund the costs out of our available representation allowance; the party was certainly not fancy; we just had a lot of hot-dogs and hamburgers, etc. But I had decided that we would make the reception as spectacular as possible; the Marine Guard contingent would go through a full dress drill on the roof of the residence, above the garden where the reception was actually held. We rigged up a search light which shone on them as they presented the Flag. A separate spotlight shown on another gigantic flag, 50 feet by 30 feet. I don't know where it had come from, but we used to hang it on an abandoned water tower which was right next to the residence on the edge of a cliff. Raising it was quite a feat and our Major Domo almost was killed at least three times getting it up until he learned how it had to be done. When darkness came, with the spot light shining on the Flag, I would make a short speech of welcome. I also got in the habit of trying to make some political points, with some subtlety, I hope. I would pick a theme and with the help of my assistant find appropriate quotations to illustrate the theme. I used this technique to try to imply more than my actual words said. That year I spoke about democracy and elections -- the Israelis were holding theirs that year. In 1983, the Lebanon war had just been concluded; Israeli domestic politics were very tumultuous. The Labor Party had been accused of being unpatriotic, traitorous for not supporting the war more vigorously. The domestic climate was still disagreeable and unpleasant -- one might say nasty. So I delivered a few words about democracy and the right to dissent. I then strung together several quotations about dissent and the lives of people in a democracy. I managed to imply criticism of the government for its disdain for dissent without actually saying so, and our friends in Labor were of course delighted. We had all the leading political actors there: Begin, Peres, Likud and Labor people. That kind of Israeli audience would always react to comments, especially to any references to Jews historically. So I quoted from Heinrich Heine, who said that since the Exodus, freedom had always spoken with a Jewish accent; that went over very well indeed. Begin had not been out socially since his wife died, except perhaps once or twice. His decision to come to our reception was quite an event. He had of course always attended before and had enjoyed himself staying for an hour or so. But for him to attend in 1983 was a notable occurrence marking the end of his mourning period.

Begin was still the center of attention at the Fourth of July party. He looked better than he had for a long while. He stayed for over an hour, enjoying the fireworks that we always fired off to finish the celebration in the evening. The fireworks were shot out over the sea from our residence's grounds. Everybody was in an upbeat mood in the wake of the Lebanon agreement; they assumed that the Israeli troops would be coming home soon. (Actually it took two years and many more casualties before the withdrawal was finished.) The US-Israel relations were on upward movement again. There was an area of general optimism about the future for the first time in a long time. I remember that everyone that night really felt that the nadir of US-Israel relations had passed and that the future was going to be better. Many of the guests were looking forward to Begin's trip to Washington. As it turned out, as I mentioned, Begin never reached Washington.

I kept asking the government every few days about Begin's travel plans. We had suggested some possible dates, but had not received any reactions. We just couldn't seem to get the dates pinned down. That did seem strange to us, but in retrospect, of course, it was an indication that Begin had already decided to resign. In fact, I think his decision to come to our Fourth of July party was part of his "farewell" strategy; it was going to be his last one. I don't remember exactly when Begin finally told me of his decision not to go to Washington for "personal reasons", but it was shortly after July 4. Even when he told me that he would not travel, he did not explain why and didn't give any rationale to send to Washington. He apologized; he was very gracious; asked me to tell President Reagan that he was very sorry, but that for "personal reasons" he just didn't feel he could make the trip at that time. That was also a tip-off that he was not ready to face the kind of public exposure that a visit to Washington would demand, particularly when made in the wake of the Lebanon war. As usual, he would have had to meet with Congress and with the Jewish groups; he would have had to defend Israel's conduct of the past year; he would have had to discuss Sabra/Shatila. He would have to face a number of skeptical audiences. It would have been a tough act, but if he had been totally himself that would not have fazed him. Now, however, while still in a state of depression and lacking enthusiasm for his job, a Washington visit was more than he could face. He never went to Washington again, then or thereafter.

The second half of 1984 saw the end of Likud monopoly on Israeli political power for the remainder of my tenure in Tel Aviv. In July 1984, there was an election; it was stalemate. After that election, neither major party could form a government without the other. So for the first time and with great difficulty, the two parties agreed to form a coalition of "national unity", as it was called. Shimon Peres became Prime Minister. That arrangement resulted from an extremely unusual political deal. The Labor Party, I believe, had one or two seats more than the Likud, but could not muster a majority of votes in the Knesset, even with its allies. Peres was given first crack at forming a government, as leader of the largest party. When it became obvious that he could not put together a coalition without the Likud, he worked out a complicated agreement with Shamir, under which Peres would serve as Prime Minister for the first two years, then Shamir would take over. In the meantime, Shamir would serve as Foreign Minister; then they would exchange jobs. So Peres was the Prime Minister for the last ten months of my tour in Israel.

So 1983-84 was the last year of the Likud political monopoly. It was a terrible year in many respects. It was the year that saw the Lebanon agreement, achieved only after much hard work, unravel together with the complete collapse of U.S. policy toward Lebanon. It was also the year during which I had more nasty encounters with Sharon that I will describe later. There were other disappointments as well, but the year was certainly an eventful and interesting one for American diplomacy! It was probably the most unpleasant year, along with part of 1982, that I suffered through while in Israel. The most dramatic event in the summer of 1983 was Begin's resignation. I have earlier described his appearance at my Fourth of July party, which was the last major public event in which Begin participated. Begin clung to office for another few weeks, but it was more and more apparent that he was considering resignation.

At the same time, changes were occurring in Washington. Phil Habib and Maury Draper resigned on July 21. Phil was completely worn out and could no longer effectively discharge his duties as Middle East mediator, in part because President Assad had let it be known that he believed Habib had misled him during the Lebanon war about Israeli intentions. Assad in effect refused to deal further with Habib. When George Shultz visited Damascus in early July 1983, he did not take Habib with him. On July 21, Habib was formally replaced by Bud McFarlane, who at the time was the Deputy National Security Advisor to Bill Clark. McFarlane had earlier moved to the White House from State Department where he had been the Counselor to Al Haig.

Around this time, Arens and Shamir went to Washington together on a trip which launched a new era in US-Israel relations. They had been very cool during much of the Lebanon crisis; they began to open somewhat after the signing of the May 17 Lebanon agreement. Both Ministers had good meetings in Washington. I went back for those talks. There was a lot of discussion about Lebanon and particularly about Israeli withdrawal. Since the agreement had been signed, there had not been much progress on its implementation. It was becoming clear before and certainly after Shultz' visit to Damascus, that the Syrians were not going to allow the agreement to come into effect. They would do everything within their power to undermine it, at least, even if it were not abrogated outright, as they ultimately succeeded in doing. The Israeli public was getting increasingly anxious to have their troops return. The government also was anxious to start withdrawal, but was insisting that it would do so only simultaneously with the Syrians. That was a non-starter. This withdrawal issue dominated our dialogue for the following ten months. The question was how Israel could extricate itself from Lebanon, leaving behind something better than existed before the invasion -- no PLO certainly and a friendlier government hopefully -- and do so unilaterally since the Syrians were obviously not in a mood to cooperate. Essentially, the Israel government never found a good answer. The Syrians still have a major military presence in Lebanon to this day.

Bud McFarlane, when he took the Middle East job, viewed the situation from his perspective that was based on his work with Haig and others as well as his close involvement with the Lebanon negotiations while on the NSC staff. He felt strongly that the U.S. needed to be tougher on Syria

-- a view that George Shultz shared, particularly after his trip to Damascus in July. Up to then, I think Shultz had hoped that Assad could be brought around to permit the implementation of the agreement; he was skeptical, but thought it could happen because he was hoping that the Saudis and others would bring some pressure to bear on Assad. But after the July visit, Shultz became disillusioned with Syria. As an ex-Marine, the Secretary became increasingly disenchanted with Assad during that Fall and Winter and joined the McFarlane camp calling for a stronger U.S. position vis-a-vis Syria. He was even considering bringing military pressure on the Syrians in order to make it difficult for them to stay in Lebanon and perhaps force them to become more accommodating. Shultz and McFarlane tended to have somewhat different views on the handling of Israel. McFarlane was warier in this period of close cooperation with Israel. He preferred to have the U.S. bolster the Lebanese government with overt military support. He did not want to be too closely associated with the Israelis. As time passed, Reagan and Shultz became more persuaded to work more closely with Israel. Both governments were trying to support a very weak government in Beirut, but were coming at the issue from different approaches and sometimes adopting conflicting policy measures. McFarlane made his first visit to the Middle East after having been appointed as special emissary at the end of July, 1983. He went to Lebanon, Israel, Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Syria. He also found Assad unyielding on the Lebanon-Israel agreement. He didn't get much encouragement in Saudi Arabia; they did not feel that they had much influence in Damascus. As I mentioned before, it was during this period that I was back in Washington for the Arens-Shamir talks which laid a good foundation for reconstruction of closer relationships between the two countries -- so badly damaged by the Lebanon war. Arens had begun that process when he was in Washington as Ambassador some six months earlier, particularly with Weinberger and the Defense establishment where the fraying had been the worst. Weinberger couldn't stand Sharon, but he liked Arens. Arens was tough, but straight and polite and he and Weinberger had gotten along well. He was succeeded as Ambassador by Meir Rosenne; he had been the Foreign Ministry's Legal Advisor. Shamir was ideologically tough on the question of the territories, but low key and someone with whom you could have a rationale discussion. So he and Arens made a good team in this reconstruction phase of our relations. They returned to Washington in November-December, 1983; those meetings were really extraordinarily satisfactory and valuable. The focus of both sets of meetings was of course Lebanon, and the efforts to be made by both governments to shore up the weak government in Beirut and the completion of the agreement; both efforts failed in the final analysis.

I returned in time to meet McFarlane when he reached Israel. We met with Begin, Shamir, Kimche and other Israeli officials. The meetings with Begin were interesting, but not very productive because he, although listening carefully, was rather disengaged. McFarlane returned in mid-August with Richard Fairbanks, who had been appointed as his deputy. The only useful meetings were essentially with Arens and Shamir; Begin was clearly not involved in any serious way any longer. On August 28, Begin announced his decision to resign; he told the Cabinet that he was just not able to function as his job demanded. The Cabinet had been hoping for a different outcome. The Likud members almost panicked at the thought of a Cabinet without Begin; he had been such a towering figure for so many years. He had created the Herut movement and had been in complete charge of it for thirty years. The thought that he could be replaced was just unthinkable. Furthermore, there was no heir apparent. Shamir was the senior Cabinet official, but he was not a senior member of the Herut movement, having been brought in by Begin. (In fact, Shamir had led the rival Lehi (Stern) underground group during the pre-1948 struggle when Begin, a bitter rival, had headed the Irgun.) Shamir had been in the Knesset only since the beginning of the Begin government in 1977. However, he was acceptable to all factions as Sharon was not. The other contenders did not have adequate stature to be considered for the Prime Ministership. The Likud people tried for two weeks to have Begin change his mind; they would not let him retire; they begged him to stay until at least they could sort out over a period of months the question of succession. Begin became increasingly frustrated with his cohorts; they didn't seem to understand how desperate he was to leave. Finally, on September 15, he submitted his formal letter of resignation to President Herzog. A few days later, the President asked Shamir to form a new government. At the time, Shamir recommended a government of national unity, but Likud and Labor were not able to work out all the necessary details and compromises; that had to wait until after the national election a year later.

In Lebanon, events were not favorable for a resolution of the conflict. There were an increasing number of military incidents. There was some heavy shelling on August 29. The Syrian manipulations were becoming increasingly obvious. Opposition to the agreement was being stirred up. Our Marines, who were in Lebanon as peace-keepers, were supplemented by additional forces in September. Two Marines were killed and fourteen were wounded. There were almost daily clashes which our Marines found difficult to manage. Washington was becoming increasingly skeptical about the deployment of the Marines, but the U.S. was committed to supporting the Lebanese government. On September 23, the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives voted to authorize the Marine presence for another eighteen months. That resolution was ultimately passed by the whole Congress, after long negotiations on how the Marine presence might conform with the War Powers Resolution.

The whole period between July and September, 1983 was filled with concerns in Lebanon. The Israelis were ambivalent; they wanted to withdraw from Beirut and its immediate surroundings, back to the Awwali River line. That had been the line that the Israelis had promised not to cross when the invasion was launched. That was about 45 kilometers north of the border. During this period, a quixotic difference now arose between us and the Israelis. We had been calling for Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon almost from the day the invasion began. We had pressed hard for an agreement because that would permit Israel to withdraw in an orderly fashion. But by Summer, 1983 it appeared that the agreement would be sabotaged by the Syrians. We had begun to recognize the Syrians as the trouble makers in Lebanon; they were clearly checkmating all of our initiatives. There were now many in Washington who viewed the Israeli interest in a quick withdrawal -- even before the agreement had been formally ratified -- as undermining U.S. leverage on the Syrians! These differing objectives generated a strange dialogue between the two governments. McFarlane was involved; I was involved. We found ourselves in the Summer of 1983 in the position of asking the Israelis to move slowly on withdrawal in order to assure that the Lebanese government was fully coordinated so that its troops could follow closely right behind the withdrawing Israeli forces. We were urging the Israelis not to be in such great hurry to pull out, in order to forestall what would be perceived as a great Syrian victory. It was not an easy sales pitch to make after having urged the Israelis for so long to withdraw as rapidly as possible! The Israelis press ran many stories about our efforts to slow down troop withdrawal from the Lebanon morass.

During this period, I was receiving frequent reports over secure telephone about discussions in the White House and in State Department. Charlie Hill, who was Shultz' executive assistant after having been the Embassy Political Counselor, then Israel Office Director and later a deputy assistant secretary, had been authorized by the Secretary to keep me fully informed by telephone about what was happening in Washington on Middle East policy issues.

One of the continuing problems in the Department of State has always been the transmission of information to ambassadors. No one wants to send sensitive accounts, particularly about internecine bureaucratic warfare, by telegram which will undoubtedly be distributed to more people in Washington than it should be and will be seen by friends and foes alike. So, an ambassador who wants to keep up to date on Washington doings has to be on the telephone with someone in the Department who is knowledgeable. The advent of secure telephones assisted enormously. I used it continually for the eight years I was in Israel. It was particularly valuable at times such as occurred in 1983 when a huge policy chasm opened up in Washington. That chasm went on throughout the Fall and Winter. The disagreement was essentially over the question of how tough the U.S. should be towards Syria. As part of that debate was the question of the amount of military resources that we should devote to the propping up of the weak Lebanese government. Furthermore, there were sharp differences of opinion on the question of the extent of U.S. cooperation with Israel to neutralize Syria. There were many NSC meetings on these subjects along with Congressional consultations. The debate raged for weeks and months. Shultz, McFarlane and often Reagan were the proponents of the "be tough on Syria" school of thought. Weinberger was always on the side of a more cautious approach, he was often supported by Vice President George Bush. They were very reluctant to coordinate any policies with Israel and certainly were very wary of involving any U.S. armed forces in the area. There were many others who also took strong positions on one side or another, but the ones I mentioned were the key players.

This Washington debate would generate long phone calls. I was briefed on the debates taking place. The end of every conversation was always the same; no decision. Increasingly, I felt that Washington was coming to the conclusion that Syria was in the driver's seat, that the Lebanese government was growing weaker and that its armed forces would not withstand the shelling from the Shia militia. To redress this changing balance would have meant a commitment of U.S. armed resources; that choice made decisions very difficult. I was supposed to brief the Israelis on the Washington debates in an effort to coordinate their activities with ours. I was put in a position of essentially depicting a U.S. policy which gradually would lead Arens and Shamir to conclude that Israel would have to reach its own conclusions and take whatever actions it thought appropriate to extract itself from Beirut, to provide some security on the border by building up its surrogate force in southern Lebanon, and to try to convince the U.S. to coordinate its actions with Israeli ones. But I am sure that it became increasingly clear to Arens and Shamir that the U.S. could not be counted on for much action. McFarlane and Shultz both tried very hard in the Fall of 1983 to bolster the coordination between the two countries. Their views were often well received by the Israelis, but neither in the final analysis represented the U.S. government. Furthermore, the Congress was very lukewarm on supporting any further commitment of U.S. forces in Lebanon.

The continuing U.S. indecision really came to a head on October 23, when the Marine headquarters at the Beirut airport was blown up by a truck bomb filled with explosives, killing 256 Marines. On the same day, another truck loaded with explosives hit the French headquarters, destroying an eight story building and killing 56 French soldiers. On November 4, the headquarters of the Israeli Shin Beth and Army was also car-bombed near Tyre; 39 were killed in that action and 32 wounded. These attacks on the French, the U.S. Marines and the Israelis were conducted by Shiite terrorists under direction and with the support of the Syrians. In retrospect, that day was the end of any possibility of further U.S. military involvement in Lebanon to shore up the Lebanese government. We did stay until the end of February, 1984. We did, between October and February, become involved in the Lebanese war; we took sides; we were no longer just peace-keepers, but viewed our presence as a bulwark against Syrian aggression. The battleship New Jersey was shelling military positions in the country; bombing missions were authorized; we lost two airplanes; two pilots were downed and taken hostage. Unfortunately, the Lebanese army was not strong enough to assist. The Syrians were not sufficiently impressed by a limited U.S. show of power. We took just enough action to demonstrate a sort of incompetence. Our military actions fell far short of intimidating the Syrians. They just waited us out; by mid-February, after Reagan had just declared that Lebanon was a "vital U.S. interest", the administration caved in to Congressional pressure. The President one day just blithely announced that we were moving our Marines off-shore onto ships, but that we would continue to be very aggressive and active from the ships! Two or three weeks later, we withdrew entirely. We promised a sort of phased withdrawal plan, allegedly calibrated with more active diplomacy and additional military assistance to the Lebanese government, but in fact, little was done. We essentially left the battle field. Reagan cut his political losses in preparation for the election to take place in November, 1984. There just wasn't much political support for our involvement in Lebanon, particularly since our policy was failing which, in my mind, was due to the inability of Washington to reach firm, concise and clear decisions. I have never seen a time in American diplomacy when such bitter arguments raged within the government, incapacitating the U.S. government and barring any decisions.

During this period, I talked over the telephone often to Larry Eagleburger, then the Under Secretary for Political Affairs. He was also a supporter of the "tough on Syria" policy; he wanted to use U.S. military force effectively in the area. By mid-August, McFarlane had moved to become National Security Advisor; by this time, he agreed with the necessity of coordinating closely with Israel. In November, Donald Rumsfeld was named special emissary for the Middle East. He toured the region. He also was for being tough and by and large agreed that we had to be much more consistent and coherent in our politico-military actions and policies to support the Lebanese government. But Weinberger was set on getting the Marines out of the area as quickly as possible and he had full Congressional support for that policy. Larry told me on February 11 that "in the last seventy-two hours, we have lost our Congressional base. We made some rather unwise decisions and we couldn't even stand with those." Even at that late date, he was arguing that some U.S. advantage might be rescued through the off-shore presence, although no one else I think shared that view. The military situation in Lebanon was going from bad to worse for the Lebanese government.

There was a key White House meeting with the President on February 15, 1984. The intelligence estimate was that President Amin Gemayel might last only another two or three days. A series of options were laid out for the President, ranging from major commitment of U.S. forces to Option

3a, which was essentially to let Gemayel do the best he could with the Syrians while we stood by as observers. That option was based on the conclusion that our original goals in Lebanon were no longer achievable. Charlie Hill told me that the meeting produced a decision, more or less, to approve Option 3a. I noted that day that "the Lebanon game is over". That very day, Raymond Hunt, a distinguished retired Foreign Service Officer, who was the Director General of the multinational observer force in the Sinai, was assassinated in Rome, where he was headquartered. He was killed by three gunmen in a drive-by assassination. He was a good friend; he was, I think, the sixth ambassador or equivalent -- all friends -- who were assassinated in the Middle East or because of the Middle East during the 1970s and 1980s. We lost too many lives in or for that region.

Gemayel went ahead to annul the agreement with Israel and made the best deal that he could with the Syrians. At that stage, that was probably the most sensible outcome. We tried to sugarcoat the failed policy by saying that we would withdraw in a gradual fashion, etc, but in fact, after February 15, we were no longer active in Lebanon. We abandoned any efforts to force the Syrians to accept the Lebanese-Israeli agreement, which had been negotiated under our auspices.

The whole September-February period -- the end of U.S. involvement in Lebanon -- is one of the sorriest records of U.S. foreign involvement. First we did not have a coherent policy; second we had too many different judgements of what might be effective and what might not work; third, we were so spooked by the Lebanon war that we did not work smoothly with the Israelis to maximize the assets that we did have in place -- which were primarily Israeli assets; and fourth, because Assad is a very tough man, who saw that his stakes in the game were higher than ours and therefore was able to ultimately force us out. It was a sorry period in American foreign policy. I think we all have understood for a long time how tough Assad can be; we may have misjudged our ability to persuade him. We have often vastly exaggerated the influence that the Saudis had on him, despite the fact that they were some of his principal financial supporters. Time and time again, we have tried to get the Saudis to push Assad in the direction we deemed correct, but I am not sure that they really have tried; furthermore I think Assad is much better at intimidating the Saudis than the reverse. He is very nice to deal with personally, but he is tough and ruthless and nasty.

I should note that during this period I did manage to find some time for scuba diving. I went down to Sinai at the end of July for a dive after returning from Washington.

By the time Peres took office on September 14, 1984, I had been in Israel for more than seven years. I had been convinced for some time that the time had come for me to leave Israel. I tried to stay on as long as possible as long as there was any hope for progress on the peace process. But it became clear that the process had become stalemated. I had told Shultz, probably in the Spring of 1984 that I would like to be relieved of my duties by the end of that calendar year. I would have left sooner if a replacement were available. He said that he would like me to stay in Tel Aviv as long as possible, but I was becoming very fatigued. When Peres finally became Prime Minister in September, in the middle of an economic crisis, my batteries recharged because we had been close personal friends for many years. I decided that it might be quite interesting to stay in Israel at least for a little while longer just to watch my good friend in action. My plans were still to leave right after the American elections in November.

Peres made his first visit to Washington as Prime Minister early in October. That turned out to be a very good visit. I was in a lot of meetings that he had with Reagan, Shultz and others. At the end of the visit, before Peres and I were scheduled to go to New York, he, the Secretary and I had breakfast together -- just the three of us -- at the State Department. It was a wrap-up session during which the two principals took stock of the agreements reached and decided on how to proceed. I was there to take notes, so that the necessary follow-up actions would be taken. During the breakfast, Shultz told Peres that I was planning to leave shortly after November. He said that he had asked me to remain because he thought that it would be helpful to both countries, but that he understood that I was tired. Peres jumped right in; they both urged me, in very strong terms, to stay beyond November until a time to be decided later. It was a suggestion that was difficult to refuse; I said that there was no major imperative to my November departure, but I would prefer not to leave the matter open ended. I suggested that we agree to June 1985 as my departure date. I thought that would provide sufficient time to find another ambassador and would provide enough continuity as Peres took control of the government. That is what ultimately happened and why I stayed for a full eight years.

But in that remaining year, something happened that the press at least thought would disrupt my departure plans. It did not do so in the final analysis, but it is worth describing as another illustration of how an ambassador can become entangled in considerable unexpected difficulties by statements made in public fora. In the late Spring, 1984, I had agreed to give an informal lecture at the Dayan Center at Tel Aviv University. This was to be part of a seminar on the peace process "Six Years After Camp David". I had understood that the seminar would be a closed forum attended only by experts. I was supposed to discuss "Why the Stalemate Occurred After Camp David". About a week before my scheduled appearance on October 30, I noticed that the press was carrying stories about the seminar, including an announcement of my appearance. I called Itamar Rabinowich, the director of the Dayan Center, to find out what the ground rules were. He told me that originally, it had been his intention to limit attendance at the seminar, but when the press had heard about it, he felt that it had become necessary to open the session to the public. I considered not attending because the issue was a difficult one to discuss under any circumstances and certainly in public. But since I knew that I would be leaving my post relatively soon -- although my plans had been delayed at the urging of both governments -- I was feeling ready to take on the world. I probably did not consider all the consequences as carefully as I might have. So I agreed to participate. I didn't prepare a text of my remarks; I spoke extemporaneously from notes, as I normally did. I had about five pages of a scribbled outline which would take about an hour to deliver. As I may have already said, the lecture was to take place on October 30, which was also the "Day of the Americas", the equivalent of our Columbus Day. Every year, on that day the President of Israel hosts a reception at Beit Hanassi in Jerusalem for all ambassadors from Latin, Central and North America. By this time, I was the Dean of the Diplomatic Corps; that made my presence mandatory for two reasons. The reception was scheduled for 5 p.m. The lecture was to start at 3 p.m. in Tel Aviv. If everything had worked out on schedule, that would have given me just enough time to attend both events; so I proceeded. I delivered the lecture which was extremely well received by the audience. But it produced a mild earthquake in Washington. It was not the text that created the uproar, at least not once we had cabled it in the following day. (I should confess that what I sent in was a slightly edited version of the remarks I had made.) The key sentence in the speech, which caused the uproar, had been reported widely and had reached Washington before my fuller text was sent. I had made a number of very frank comments about President Carter, Bob Strauss and some of the other players in the Middle East peace process. I was probably too frank in some respects. I toned down my comments when the text was cabled to Washington. My text was essentially a commentary on the mistakes made by the Egyptians, the Israelis and the U.S. after Camp David which had led to a complete lack of progress on the implementation of certain aspects of the Camp David framework. Toward the end of my lecture, I realized that I was running late; the session had started late and I was speaking longer than planned. I could visualize President Herzog becoming very upset if I showed up late; he was a real stickler for protocol. So I hurried the tail end of my remarks, trying to bring the analysis into the present; that is to say, two years after the presentation of the Reagan Plan. That Plan by then was certainly moribund if not completely dead although it was U.S. official policy and there were no plans to change it. By this time, the Reagan initiative had been rejected by both the Jordanians and the Israelis. We just left it on the table. In an effort to get through my lecture quickly, I spoke some hyperbole; that is sometimes the temptation for speakers if you haven't carefully drafted the text in advance. So towards the end, I said: "Once Israeli withdrawal from Sinai was completed, there was a brief final flowering between the end of April and the beginning of June, 1982. There were many normalization agreements which had been signed back in 1980 which finally began to come to life. There were exchanges of delegations planned and the beginnings of new trade agreements. All of this withered and died in the bright, pitiless sun of the Israeli movement into Lebanon in early June, 1982. The Reagan initiative on September 1 was a genuine effort to recreate momentum, to relaunch the Camp David agreement with some embellishments, but fundamentally on the same terms. The timing unfortunately, in my judgment, was abysmal, the tactics of its presentation worse and the outcome, so far, nil." In conclusion, I would go on to say, "there were a lot of mistakes implicit in this record for all three countries..." Then I summarized the major mistakes made by the three governments.

Earlier in the speech, I had also made a reference to Reagan when he became President and the situation existing at the time, which was not well received by the Reagan White House. I said: "One of the big problems that occurred in 1981 was that President Carter was defeated and then President Sadat was shot. That meant that two of the three men who had invested so much in making Camp David succeed were no longer players. Moreover, in our case, President Reagan came in with no personal stake in the success of his predecessor's administration and with a rather different view of the world, which I understand was described this morning by Professor Spiegel (Steve Spiegel had given a talk to the same group in the morning describing the differences between the Carter and Reagan's policies in the Middle East). I think it is quite relevant that the Reagan administration looked at the Middle East differently than the Carter administration. It looked at it in more "East-West" terms, needing more strategic alliances against the Soviets. They never repudiated Camp David. While the new administration had less than a fervent emotional commitment to complete the process, they certainly adopted it and increasingly, as time passed, they saw the virtues of not allowing it to die". That reference to Reagan's "less emotional commitment" to Camp David was picked up and condensed in a couple of the wire stories to read "U.S. Ambassador says that Reagan had less interest in the peace process", which isn't what I said. However, the real problem with the speech was the one sentence: "The timing was abysmal, the tactics were worse and the outcome, so far, nil." That was a wonderful piece of rhetoric that came out of my mouth spontaneously. I had not thought of it before, but it suddenly came forth as I was desperately trying to finish my remarks to head off to Jerusalem.

The Israeli journalists in attendance, and there were quite a few, didn't find anything very startling in my comments. For them it was all ancient history. Some had heard me say similar things before. Tom Friedman of The New York Times had not attended, but an AP stringer was there. He filed a story highlighting the one sentence. Friedman told me later that he got a call from his editor in New York asking him about "Sam Lewis attacking the Reagan administration"? He said that he didn't know anything about it; he was then told that I had given a speech, parts of which had been reported by the wire services. So Friedman began to call people who had attended and quickly put together a story in a hurry. That appeared in The New York Times the next day, along with other wire stories. They all focused on this apparent attempt by a U.S. ambassador to attack his President's foreign policy -- a rare occasion, to say the least. Moreover, I had not considered the timing. I totally ignored that factor, which shows you how far away you can get from the United States when you are in another continent. The lecture was being delivered one week before our Presidential elections, but that fact just did not occur to me. Reagan was way ahead in the polls; no one had any doubt that he would be reelected. Nevertheless, it was a week before elections and the press immediately leaped on my alleged remarks as criticisms of Reagan's Middle East policies. Needless to say, this episode did not improve my standing in Washington. As soon as the wire press reports became available, I immediately started getting phone calls asking me what the stories were all about. I explained the situation and was requested to send the text of my remarks back as quickly as possible. The NEA Bureau, Assistant Secretary Dick Murphy and others, drafted some press guidance for the Department's press spokesman to use. It was very low key, saying that the "offending" sentence had been taken out of context; if all my remarks were read, it could be clearly seen that I had not attacked Reagan and that I supported the administration's policies. Before the guidance could be used to any extent, several provocative stories landed on Shultz's desk and in the White House. So I also got a frantic call from my friend Charlie Hill. I explained the whole situation and he of course went to bat for me, but he did say that he thought I would be getting some flak out of the White House. Indeed a couple of stories appeared in the following days citing White House sources clearly indicating considerable irritation there with me. There were also stories quoting State Department sources which in essence said that I would probably not remain in Tel Aviv past the elections. There were references to the fact that I had been in Israel for over seven years and it was well known that I was planning to leave my post in the near future. The implication was that since my tour was coming to the end anyway, I had decided not to worry about diplomatic discipline. The totally impromptu and unconscious nature of the event was not totally credible to the Israeli press which by now had built up a mystique about me. The press and the politicians had come to believe that I calculated very carefully every move I made; they could not believe that I would say anything without having given very careful thought and calculation. In this case, that view was not even close to the truth.

Once Shultz read the transcript -- the tailored version that I sent in -- he became more relaxed about the episode. I think he would have even if he had the full version. Bob Strauss is the one who would have been even more furious than he in fact was, because, while praising him for having been a great negotiator on Panama and the trade treaties, I suggested that he had run into a cultural barrier. He just did not fit the image of a Middle East negotiator that the politicians in the area were accustomed to dealing with. The Texas informal style did not hit a responsive chord in the Middle East with either Sadat or Begin. I said that I thought Strauss would agree with me that he was miscast and in fact, had resigned from the position as mediator as soon as he could do so gracefully. In any case, my comments did not sit well with him; he wrote me a sardonic letter. I tried to pacify him by sending him a fuller version of my remarks that he had not seen; had I sent him the complete text, he would have been even unhappier.

As I said, Shultz, after reading what I had sent in, concluded that my comments had been quite thoughtful and appropriate and that I had been a victim of poor reporting. I later found out that Larry Speakes, then the President's spokesman, said that Reagan had asked for a text of the speech; I assume that he read it. After having read the text, the Department prepared some additional guidance for Alan Romberg, the Department's deputy press spokesman. That made very clear that Secretary Shultz retained full confidence in me and had high admiration for my diplomatic efforts. That really ended the episode in the U.S. It died down in Israel soon after that. But I felt embarrassed about having slipped up. I wrote a hand-written letter to President Reagan, which I sent to Shultz via Charlie Hill. In my note to the Secretary, I said that unless he had some objections, I would appreciate it if he could hand my letter to the President in the next few days. I tried to reassure in dignified terms the President that I fully supported his policies, which was the truth at that time. I then proceeded being the U.S. ambassador to Israel. A month later, I received a very nice letter from President Reagan which said: "Dear Sam, Thanks very much for your good letter and don't give the problem you mentioned a second thought. I have long since learned that several thousand miles distance plus the press selectivity in reporting excerpts is insurance against getting exercised over anything I read under those circumstances. You know, the truth is, we thought we were off to a pretty good start on the September 1 plan. Then Arafat had his second meeting with the King who did what seemed to be an about-face and everything went on hold. I appreciate all you have been doing. Thanks again for your congratulations and good wishes. Sincerely, Ronald Reagan." That was a very graceful note and one that I appreciated. That ended that episode.

Despite the prediction of a few of my State Department cohorts, I did not leave Israel right after the elections. I stayed on until the following June, as I had agreed to do with Shultz and Peres. This story shows how useful it is in having the confidence of and good relations with the Secretary of State or the President or the executive assistant. When you make a mistake, and clearly I should have shown greater discretion in the language used in a particular phrase, if people in key positions have confidence in you, you can survive without great difficulties. If on the other hand, these people had been unhappy with my performance, I would have given them a very good excuse for replacing me quickly. That is also true for the press; if it is "out to get you" it can do so quickly and easily. Fortunately, my relations with American journalists were always quite good; they were generous in their comments about my work to the extent that they wrote about it. The American press in Israel knew me personally; I had always been a good source for them; they certainly were not interested in piling on. That is not always the case.

When Peres took office, he essentially confronted four gnawing problems. In the first place, he faced an economic crisis -- raging inflation which in September, 1984 reached almost 1200% annually on a monthly basis. The government was running a budget deficit of over 15%, which was the basic cause of the hyper-inflation. The foreign exchange in the Bank of Israel was dwindling rapidly; the reserves at the time were less than $1 billion -- which was very low. Shamir had wrestled with this crisis, but obviously had not made much progress; in fact, the economic situation was deteriorating daily. The second issue was Lebanon. Israel seemed mired in that country; could not leave it, but was almost desperate to leave particularly as casualties to its own troops were rising. Rabin, who became Defense Minister in this government of national unity, devoted himself for the first few months to trying to find politically and military acceptable ways to extricate Israel forces from Lebanon. The third issue was the peace process which was frozen. Peres was very anxious to start it again, particularly with Jordan. The fourth issue was Egyptian-Israeli relations which were very tense and strained. The main sub-issue was the future of Taba, but there were others as well. Finally, there was the general problem of Israel's poor condition in the world after the Lebanon war. Its reputation in the world was very low; it was not improving with the passage of time. Syria was a difficult neighbor that looked increasingly dangerous; there seemed not to be any apparent way to ease that relationship. The Israeli public was in a very sour and nasty mood. The last few years had been tremendously divisive; Israeli governments were being seen as part of the problem and not the solution. There was a real public yearning not only for a government of national unity, but for a leadership that would heal the divisions and bring the country together again. So Peres took office at a particularly difficult period in Israeli history.

What is not sufficiently remembered is that the government formed in 1984 was not Peres' government. It was a genuine coalition, with Shamir as Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister, and the Cabinet was split 50/50 between Labor and Likud. There was an "inner" Cabinet of ten members -- 5 Labor and 5 Likud. All major decisions had to have "inner" Cabinet approval. If a Minister was not satisfied with the decision of this leadership group, he could appeal to the full Cabinet, but any issue that was likely to split proponents and opponents along party lines was doomed for failure. The coalition government scheme required that at least some members of one party support the initiatives from the other. It was a formula for deadlock, but interestingly enough, the years 1984-1986 saw Peres and his Cabinet essentially find solutions to all the major problems. He was particularly successful at changing the mood of the Israeli people who once again became hopeful and uplifted and who in turn lowered the temperature of the public political debate which had been extremely vicious in the 1982-1984 period.

One of the main reasons Peres was successful with his economic initiatives was that he was able to play a "good cop, bad cop" role with Izhak Modai, the Likud Minister of Finance. No previous Prime Minister had ever involved himself very deeply in economic policy issues; they had primarily concentrated on political and national security issues. Certainly Shamir never touched economic issues; he left all of those burdens to the Finance Minister. Peres, who had an interest in economic development although not a professional economist, understood that if Modai's stabilization -- austerity -- program which the Cabinet was slowly tending to adopt was to succeed, he personally would have to do much of the "heavy lifting". Modai, who had a very quixotic personality, was an anathema to the labor union federation, the Histadrut. He was effective with the business community, but a total economic program to be successful needed to have the support of labor. It needed to surrender for a time its historical periodic wage increases. The government would have to reduce some of its tax collections and the business community would participate with a number of actions which would help stabilization. Peres and Modai worked remarkably well together; they worked hand in hand for a long period until they had a parting of the ways.

One of the key challenges to make the austerity program successful was to find increased American financial support. That was crucial to stemming the hemorrhage of the foreign exchange reserves. I had just returned from Washington when Peres took office. I met him soon thereafter for a couple of long meetings and made it very clear that he would be welcomed in Washington, even during an American election campaign when normally foreign visitors are not received. But Israel was special and Reagan and Shultz were prepared to receive him; they were prepared to find ways to help Israel in the stabilization program, if Israel showed any willingness to take some tough actions. I told Peres that he should not visit Washington if he were not prepared to commit himself and his government to the austerity measures that were required. He did go in early October, after having received a tentative approval from the Cabinet for a package of measures. Peres had good meetings in Washington. Shultz, as an economic expert, spent considerable time discussing stabilization. He had to be concerned not only with the economic rationale, but with legal and political realities in the U.S. He, with the help of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Department Assistant Secretary for Economic Affairs, worked out the details of how the package might be sold to the Congress, despite Israel's less than shining image in the U.S. and certain legal restrictions. Also the assistance of people like Herb Stein, former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisors and a close friend of Israel, was instrumental. He had great credibility with Congress as a conservative economist. A Harvard professor, Stanley Fisher, was also very helpful; both he and Stein provided very useful advice to the administration on processes that might be used to achieve stabilization. Since they were also individually trusted by the Israelis, their advice was well received by all. We could, through them, criticize the Israeli plans when we felt they were not going to meet their targets unless stronger and more courageous political actions were taken. Using such an informal, non-governmental channel, made it easier for the Israelis to accept the U.S. advice.

Essentially, the U.S. committed itself to providing a safety net of additional assistance, which would not be drawn upon unless absolutely essential, but that would be made public in order to bolster confidence in Israel and in the world community -- the money markets in New York and the IMF particularly. I think, this had been a Modai proposal of long standing; he had been the Finance Minister in the latter stages of the Shamir government. But the safety net proposal became the centerpiece of my discussions with Peres from the beginning of his regime. It was the key ingredient to sustaining Israel's credit rating, which was in danger of plunging. The fact that the U.S. was prepared to come to the financial assistance of Israel -- I believe it was approximately $1.5 billion in loans -- was of crucial importance to the money markets. This loan guarantee was worked out in some difficult negotiations with Treasury and Congress. The safety net was never used, but it was a vital psychological ingredient in reestablishing confidence in the Israeli business community and the New York money markets. I think that this arrangement was made possible by Peres' personal credit with Reagan, Shultz and other American leaders. Shamir was part of the Israeli delegation as a sign of the bipartisan nature of the Israeli program. Peres was very persuasive during the many lengthy discussions of how Israel would extricate itself from its economic crisis. There were also discussions on the peace process and how that could be revitalized, which was of great interest to Reagan and Shultz.

This period of heightened activity culminated in the Spring. The "package deal" of stabilization measures was approved by all elements of Israeli society in November, 1984. The U.S. safety net assurances went into effect at that time. By January and February, 1985, the package began to unravel. It continued that downward spiral in the Spring. It was very difficult to keep Israeli officials from returning to their more dissipate ways; the budget cuts were deep; the austerity program in general was difficult for the Israeli public and the Knesset to accept; it contained a lot of pain. So in the Summer, 1985, just after my departure, another crisis erupted. That in a way was even more worrisome because this was the second effort in a process that had already gone awry once. Another series of difficult negotiations ensued in both Washington and Jerusalem. Another package was hammered out and this time it stuck. Within a few months, Israeli inflation dropped sharply. This stabilization program was the great achievement of the Peres era -- the 1984-86 period. The safety net was never used; it was only part of the package. The more important ingredient, I think, was the close consultation, advice and concern that flowed between the two governments on how to tame the economic monster. Personalities played a large role; I don't think if Shamir and Carter had been the two leaders or later, Shamir and Bush, such close collaboration would have been possible.

We went off to a particularly nice scuba diving trip towards the end of September. A friend of mine, Howard Rosenstein, who had taught me diving, had bought a live aboard diving boat -- 90 foot vessel -- which he had acquired in Cyprus or Rhodes, had brought to Tel Aviv where it was refitted. He then sailed it through the Suez Canal around the Sinai to Elat -- where he was going to berth it, taking diving parties down the Red Sea. He asked Sallie and me to accompany him on his inaugural voyage through the Red Sea, which we did between September 22 and October 1. We did a lot of diving along the way. The boat held 14-16 guests and had several decks. It was a great break from a lot of unpleasantries.

The dismal Fall also saw a change of ambassadors in Beirut. That was a welcomed change. Ever since my arrival in Tel Aviv, I had a lot of problems with some of our ambassadors in Beirut. We had very different perspectives on Lebanese-Israeli relations, as you can well imagine. Bob Dillon, who had been the ambassador in 1981-83 was a solid professional officer -- an Arab specialist. He was totally opposed to US-Israeli cooperation in Lebanon. He was in Beirut when our Embassy had been blown up and was in terrible psychological shape as a result. He handled himself with great professionalism, but was certainly scarred by that experience. He was replaced by Reg Bartholomew, with whom I had worked closely during the Ford administration when we were both deputies on the Policy Planning staff. Reg was a very gung-ho, able officer with a politico-military background. He had considerable appreciation and admiration for Israel. When he arrived in Beirut in October, 1983 he brought a different attitude towards our then existing policy of working with the Israelis in trying to solve the Lebanese mess. I make a point of this change because on November 7, Reg and I went to Rome together to meet with Ken Dam (the Deputy Secretary), Richard Fairbanks, Rick Burt (Director of the Bureau of Politico-Military Affairs) and others. We discussed the Lebanese problem. I had an opportunity to spend many hours with Reg which we spent exchanging information about the views in the respective countries. He accepted my invitation to come to visit Israel as soon as possible to meet some Israeli leaders. I had extended similar offers to other ambassadors in the region, but none ever accepted because of concerns about the reactions from their host countries. Dillon had refused even to consider the idea. We agreed that closer cooperation was needed between Lebanon, Israel and the U.S. on Syrian policy. He also saw the need for US-Israel strategic cooperation in the region which was then reemerging as an important topic in Washington. When Shamir and Arens had visited the U.S. in July, they had begun to touch on this point very lightly in their conversation with President Reagan. They had suggested the need for a more formal strategic cooperation which had been permitted to languish after the earlier abortive effort made in 1981 by Begin and Sharon.

When Shamir and Arens returned to Washington on November 27 for three days, the subject was broached once again, initially in their meeting with the President and then thoroughly with Defense and State officials. It came up again in their later meeting with Reagan. In the course of those three days, a whole new network of cooperation was weaved. For example, they agreed to establish a "Joint Politico-Military Group" which was formally inaugurated in January, 1985. Under the aegis of that group, the military and civilians of both governments would meet periodically to arrange for serious and practical ways to cooperate in case of threats and contingencies in the region. That was a much more elaborate scheme than we had ever considered in the past. Subsequently, this effort turned out to be extraordinarily successful and the mechanisms are still in place today. In 1981, a formal "memorandum of understanding" with little content had been negotiated; that was soon "suspended" after Israeli annexation of the Golan Heights. This time, Hanan Bar-on, the Deputy Director of the Foreign Ministry and Mendi Meron, the Director General of the Ministry of Defense -- who had both been involved in the difficult effort in 1981 -- were the key representatives who worked out with us the details of the Reagan-Arens-Shamir agreement. The 1984 arrangements were successful because these two men were wise enough not to insist on a charter for the group. The minute an effort is made to record in writing precisely what subjects are to be covered, which are not to be dealt with, what the detailed ground rules are, the broad objectives get lost. In this instance particularly, the broader ambitions of the Israeli military would have been in such conflict with Weinberger's reservations that another failure would have ensued. In the final analysis, only an agreement to establish a group was reached. It was left to the group itself to decide what subjects would be usefully addressed. That formulation was accepted by Shamir, Arens, Shultz and Weinberger. I believe that the avoidance of legalisms and formality enabled this mechanism to succeed; it has become increasingly professional and useful. I credit Hanan Bar-on for having the wisdom to taking this approach and for selling the concept to his government. It had been the Israeli tradition, and Begin would certainly have insisted upon it, to establish such a group under a great rubric of a grand, ambitious document that would have spelled out every last detail. Shamir was less concerned with such legalisms; he was willing to settle for a much more amorphous approach. That group not only became an avenue for cooperation on Lebanese affairs, but was also a forum for discussion of the Soviet role in the area, long-range strategic considerations towards Syria, events and trends in other parts of the world. They even got involved in a discussion of Israeli economic matters. Shultz took the lead in giving good advice and counsel on how to get Israel's inflation under control; he was a recognized expert in economic affairs and therefore had a greater impact than other Secretaries of State might have had. The meetings of that group became important bench-marks.

The peace process had been stalled for a long time, although we were by now trying to rejuvenate it. The Reagan Initiative was tabled in 1982. We were then focusing on involving Jordan in the negotiations. We did differ with the Israelis on a number of key issues; e.g. further settlements on the West Bank. But late 1983 saw a real change in the relations. In the final wrap-up sessions of the Arens-Shamir meetings, first with Reagan and then with Shultz, the two governments came to substantial meeting of the minds on some of the key questions and how to address our differences. Rumsfeld was also very much involved in these meetings. On the first day of the visit, a working group on Lebanon was established. That was the first time in the tortuous history of the "Lebanon affair" that American and Israeli officials, representing both defense and foreign affairs agencies, sat down together in a working group trying to address, as professionals, the dilemmas that each country faced. Unfortunately, by the end of November 1983, it was far too late for such a dialogue; most of the damage had already been done and there was little to be salvaged. But at least the interaction between the two governments were greatly smoothed.

There was one interesting sidelight that should be mentioned. Rumsfeld was appointed as Middle East emissary -- the third in one year -- at the beginning of November. He had very little contact with the Middle East. He had been Secretary of Defense, White House Chief of Staff, a distinguished leader of the Republican Party -- a very able guy. He headed for the area soon after his appointment. I got a call one day, saying that he would like to meet with Reg and myself in Cyprus, before he formally arrived in the Middle East. It was essentially to be a tutorial session. The Air Force flew Reg out of Beirut, which was still a tricky business because of the military situation. Reg had to fly by helicopter to one of the aircraft carriers anchored off-shore; that was a risky venture because the landing areas were not entirely secure -- they were not safe from any missiles that unfriendly hands might want to fire. Thankfully, Reg made the trip safely; the Air Force also picked me up at Ben Gurion airport. We met at the Ambassador's residence in Nicosia for several hours. That was an extraordinarily interesting meeting. Reg presented his views of the situation, I gave an overlook of Israel as I saw it. We discussed what we considered the mistakes of the last few months and the prospects for the future. I made some suggestions on how Rumsfeld should deal with Shamir when he got to Jerusalem. Rumsfeld was a very good listener. I told him that I had watched Shamir operate for several years with Americans. He was a very slow speaker; most Americans are uncomfortable speaking with someone who is slow in responding. We characteristically are uncomfortable with "dead air" during conversations. So when an American tried to elicit some response from Shamir, he was distressed when he did not get an immediate response; he wouldn't wait, but rather continue, never getting a response from Shamir. So I suggested that when meeting with Shamir, he let some "dead air" occur; if he waited long enough, particularly in a small group, he would find that eventually Shamir would open up and he would get a better sense of his thought process. Rumsfeld accepted that and when he came to Israel, he followed my advice; my impression is that of all the visiting Americans who dealt with Shamir over the many years, Rumsfeld was more successful than all others in engaging Shamir in a real dialogue because he accepted the process that required periods of silence.

There was an interesting result from that Cyprus meeting. In all the years I had been in Israel, I had never gone to Syria, primarily because none of my colleagues in Damascus ever thought it would be a good idea for me to come there. But the Air Force plane in Nicosia was to take Reg back to Damascus -- which I think was probably a first for him as well -- from whence he would return to Beirut overland. I think that Rumsfeld was going to go with Reg and then return to Damascus later. The plane was stationed at Ben Gurion; so after its stop in Damascus, it was to go on to its home base, with me on board. So I found myself in a U.S. Air Force plane landing in Damascus. An honor guard for Rumsfeld had been mustered by the Syrians, so there was a lot of activity at the airport. Our representatives in Damascus were not anxious that the Syrians know that the U.S. Ambassador to Israel was on board. So while Rumsfeld and Reg and party were disembarking, I peeked through a porthole, trying to see what was going on without being spotted. I watched with some degree of amazement at this mystic place called Damascus which had always been "forbidden fruit" to me. I had a funny feeling of being in Damascus, but hidden from view -- something like a stowaway. In any case, all went smoothly and we took off and I got back to Israel safe and sound. So my first visit to Syria was surreptitious!

I had gone back to the U.S. to accompany President Herzog. I stayed to attend the Shamir-Arens meetings. After that, I went on home leave. So I was absent from the latter part of November until the latter part of January, 1984.

Q: In an earlier part of this series of interviews, you referred to Shultz' unhappiness with our Ambassador to Syria, Bob Paganelli. When did that happen?

LEWIS: That occurred just before the signing of the Lebanon-Israel agreement -- early April, 1983. Shultz was on his way to the area, trying to complete the negotiations. Habib had carried them to almost the final stages, but couldn't quite get over the last hurdles. Shultz stopped in Cairo and held a regional ambassadorial conference. It was at that meeting that Paganelli sharply criticized our Lebanese policies and Shultz' approach to the resolution of the conflict. Others joined Paganelli, so that only Roy Atherton, then our Ambassador in Cairo, and I were supporting the plan to complete the agreements, having reached the stage that it had. Paganelli almost got fired after that conference having upset Shultz to considerable degree.

I would like to continue our discussion of the end of 1984. I have described how the Lebanese affair came to a close. The rest of 1984 was devoted to a variety of issues. One of the key threads in that period was political. The Lebanese affair had turned out very badly, with Israel slowly but surely withdrawing its troops without having achieved any of its objectives. On the contrary, the Shiites in Lebanon were becoming increasingly antagonistic to the Israelis. They had been friendly towards Israel when the invasion began; thirty months later the Shiites that had taken over the PLO role of resistance. The problem of terrorism in southern Lebanon had not improved; in fact, it may have deteriorated. Israeli casualties were rising, day after day. If I remember correctly, by the time the war formally ended in August, 1982, there had been roughly two hundred Israeli soldiers killed. In the following 2 ½ years, several hundreds more were killed, so the total casualties exceeded the war losses by a good deal. All these human losses, when added to the rapidly deteriorating economic conditions in Israel -- inflation accompanied by stagnation -- and to the fact that Shamir had failed to establish himself as a strong Prime Minister -- paling in comparison with Begin and being undermined by Sharon -- made it clear that a national election would have to be held, which was finally scheduled for June 23, 1984.

The late Spring, 1984 was devoted to electioneering. Elections always raise problems for American ambassadors in Israel. It is very difficult to escape the Israeli political cross-fires. He is always in the media's crosshairs in Israel; he speaks publicly frequently; he is the subject of press reporting and commentary; he just can't disappear during any period, particularly an election one. As a government, we of course had a preference in the election, which we did not express, even though it was deeply felt and most Israelis perceived it. In any case, we all had to be very careful during this election campaign to be seen as behaving in a completely impartial fashion between Peres and Shamir. I hoped that Labor would win because I thought that the Likud had failed miserably in its Lebanon policy and that it would not be very helpful in restarting the negotiations, as called for by Camp David and the Reagan Initiative. Nonetheless I was very cautious and impressed upon my staff the need to act accordingly.

In late May, Rumsfeld resigned as Middle East negotiator; he had reached the correct conclusion that the possibilities for further negotiations on Lebanon were not in the cards, at least for the foreseeable future. The broader peace process was at a complete standstill. Arafat had once again approached Hussein very gingerly; he had visited Jordan in the spring. He and Hussein had discussed how the two might join forces in the negotiations. Hussein had visited Washington, but no progress was in sight. We were not putting forth any new initiatives; we were standing firmly on the Reagan Initiative of 1982. The Israelis under Shamir were not prepared to discuss broad negotiations under that rubric or any other one. More importantly, the U.S. had finally come to understand -- belatedly -- that until the Lebanon problem was under some reasonable control and until the Israelis were withdrawing, there would be no receptivity in Jerusalem for broader discussions of peace in the area. The Jordanians, who were the key to the restarting of negotiations, had perceived our weakness in Lebanon -- our inability to counter Syria -- which raised for them the need for great caution. The King knew full well that if he showed the slightest hint of interest in negotiations, Assad would crack down on him very hard. Since the U.S. could not counter that pressure, there was no chance that the King would take any interest in negotiations. So the peace process was at a dead end, both in Jerusalem and in Amman. The U.S. government's credit in the region was very low, although, paradoxically, our relationship with Israel was again reaching a high point, in light of the December, 1983 meetings, our joint efforts on strategic cooperation, and Reagan's clear and strong support of Israel in the UN.

Once it became clear that Syria was the "bad guy" on the block, Reagan was much more comfortable in showing his pro-Israeli sentiments and in supporting his ally in the Middle East. Certain nations would propose UN resolutions of condemnation of Israel for continuing settlements in the West Bank, or for the many alleged Israeli transgressions that the anti-Israeli bloc members would conjure up. Then Jeane Kirkpatrick, our Ambassador to the UN, and Reagan and Shultz in Washington would make it quite clear that we would veto any anti-Israel resolution. So the 1984 period was one of a rather close official US-Israel relationship, both in the political and the military spheres; the election merely slowed down the tempo of that cooperation. We spent much of the time before elections on routine business. I was certainly busy, but nothing of great significance occurred in this time frame. It gave my family and me and another family from Washington a chance to charter a yacht in June out of Cyprus and tour the Turkish coast and the Greek Islands for about two weeks.

As we approached the elections, the tensions mounted. The polls were showing that it would be closely contested. A number of Israel-Egypt issues arose just before the election, which took a certain amount of our time and effort. The Taba problem continued unresolved and as long as that situation prevailed, the Egyptians were using it as an excuse for keeping the Israelis at a distance. Taba is a tiny piece of coast near Elat on which stands a hotel built by Israel, just across the Egyptian border. Its sovereignty was contested by Israel after the Peace Treaty. Ultimately, after years of frustrating U.S. mediation, the issue went to international arbitration and eventually the whole area was ceded to Egypt. The hotel became Egyptian-managed, but it still has a lot of Israeli clientele. In 1984-85, this was still unresolved and the chill in Israeli-Egyptian relations was an issue that continued to require a lot of our attention. We were continually trying to convince the Egyptians that progress on Taba could only come if they met with Israeli leaders; keeping them at a distance was counter-productive. We urged that Shamir be invited to visit Egypt, which Mubarak finally did. The last time that had happened was for Sadat's funeral in 1981. Shamir was viewed by the Egyptians as a "hard liner" with whom they could not deal. While boycotting Shamir, they did invite other Israelis, which just made Shamir even more rigid on the various issues at dispute with Egypt. Roy Atherton and I spent considerable time trying to push, cajole and prod the two parties in an effort to warm up the relationship which was crucial in the long run to Middle East peace. But in the Israeli pre-election period, it was a non-starter.

Arafat and Hussein met in early August, 1984, just after the election while Peres and Shamir were negotiating about forming the national unity government. After that meeting, Arafat announced that Hussein had agreed in principle to link his country to the future Palestinian state. It was another occasion when it appeared that Hussein and Arafat finally were singing from the same page. But as usual, that sense was quickly dissipated. The coalition deal between Peres and Shamir was struck about mid-August. (That is the arrangement I described earlier, in which each would take a two year term as Prime Minister and Foreign Minister.) A Cabinet was hammered out, as well as a laborious coalition agreement. After Knesset approved, Peres was sworn in as Prime Minister on September 14, 1984. That was the beginning of the brief Peres era.

In the latter part of August, it was clear that the major issue confronting the new Israeli government was the economic crisis. The inflation in Israel was going through the roof. In fact, when Peres took office, the current monthly rate of inflation was equivalent to nearly 1200% annually. Hyperinflation was king. That forced Peres to give highest priority to economic stabilization. That required U.S. advice and emergency financial assistance to support the Israeli treasury. He and I agreed to discuss this issue even before he took office because I was leaving for Washington on consultations at the end of August. We met at the Tel Aviv Hilton around the swimming pool on a Saturday afternoon. We sat there in the sun in full view of all the photographers; it felt that the whole country was watching. We discussed the future of his government and what U.S. assistance he foresaw. There were a lot of pictures taken that day, all of which appeared in the newspapers, accompanied by all sorts of convoluted speculation about the themes of our discussion. It was reported that I was giving Peres his instructions on who he should appoint to his Cabinet as well as other similar nonsense. It was sort of fun. That session with Peres enabled me to return to Washington to brief Shultz in some detail about Peres' problems, opportunities and requirements before he was even sworn in as Prime Minister. While in Washington, I was able to get a pretty good sense of what the U.S. could or could not do for the new Israeli government.

As I said, I met Shultz on a couple of occasions during the first week of September. In one session, which was just between the two of us, I was able to discuss very frankly with him what had transpired during the previous year or two. He expressed considerable frustration with his inability to restart the peace negotiations. He told me that he had now concluded that the Reagan Initiative had been a mistake and that it would not result in the desired outcome even if it succeeded. He had given considerable thought to it and asked me to keep his view strictly to myself because the Initiative was still official U.S. policy. The Secretary had come to the conclusion that the most practical and desirable outcome would be an autonomous regime for the West Bank and Gaza within a shared sovereignty between Israel and Jordan. It was a modified Benelux formula. [In retrospect, that may very likely be close to the final outcome. So Shultz in 1984 had come to the correct conclusion, although there is still quite a road to travel.]

One of the extraordinary matters that has been little noted is how the U.S. managed during the Peres period to extend a lot of conditioned assistance to Israel. Our aid came with a lot of tough economic conditions, but packaged so that there was no nationalist backlash, as had occurred in other countries when similar approaches were attempted. One of the principal reasons for this success was that Shultz was viewed as a strong Israeli supporter as well as being a wise and highly respected economist. His advice and that of Herb Stein and Stan Fisher, Shultz's unofficial expert advisor team, roughly paralleled what both Modai and Peres and their economic team knew had to be done. Of course, Peres and Modai faced formidable political barriers both in the Knesset and with other Ministers. The U.S. was insisting on some changes -- privately, but persistently -- and at the same time dangling the carrot of increased aid. That pressure along with the "safety net" that had been established, worked together to make the stabilization program a success. That was a story of highly skilled economic and political diplomacy between the two countries.

Peres still had the problem of Lebanon. Related to that was the question of whether Peres could persuade Hussein to join the peace process. One of the King's stated many reasons for evading Peres was that until Israel had evacuated Lebanon, he could not engage in any kind of dialogue. Peres and Hussein had of course met secretly a number of times over many years. Hussein had communicated with Peres and other Labor Party leaders frequently in secret before 1977 when Likud took over the Israeli government. There had even been a few -- very few -- contacts in the Likud period. The two principals knew each other and respected each other, but Hussein could not be enticed -- prematurely from his point of view -- into the peace process. He still had to contend with the Syrian menace and was not going to move until Israel had disentangled itself from Lebanon. He still had a major PLO problem, which he shared with the Israelis.

Yitzhak Rabin, as Defense Minister, was essentially in charge of Lebanon policy. I remember vividly my first meeting with him after becoming Minister. I had known him quite well since I used to play tennis with him every Saturday. I met him in his office in September privately just after the Cabinet was sworn in -- and he came as usual right to the point. He asked me to arrange for a secret and serious probe in Damascus with Assad. He wanted to test whether Assad was at all ready to start peace negotiations. Rabin had always viewed Syria as the strategic key to achieving a broad peace agreement. Syria was also key to the solution of the Lebanon problem. I reported immediately to Shultz and we did in fact carry out some delicate probes, but I had to soon report to Rabin that we had not found any room for optimism. Assad was not interested in any negotiations -- direct or indirect -- with Israel at that time. Then Rabin began to examine his options for how to withdraw at minimal costs, without any deals with the Syrians. Laying his political and diplomatic groundwork took him about four months before he could demonstrate to the Likud Cabinet members, or at least a majority of them, there were no good alternatives to partial unilateral withdrawal. There was no possibility of negotiating with the Lebanese, based on the by-now moribund agreement. He also had to show that the cost to Israel of maintaining a forward political position in Lebanon was far too great. He had to win over enough Likud Cabinet colleagues because the character of the Cabinet of national unity required some bipartisan support of any initiative. Sharon, who was a member of the 10 member Inner Cabinet, was certain to be opposed to any sign of withdrawal. That meant that Rabin had to convince at least two of the other four Likud members to support him. He did that very skillfully by going through all the diplomatic motions of first trying to negotiate some agreement with the Lebanese government, while having us conduct the probe of Syrian intentions. He also tried to work out something with the Druze sect in Lebanon. He tried a variety of approaches, all unsuccessfully. In the meantime, Israeli casualties continued to mount as well as the domestic political pressures for some kind of resolution. By January, 1985, Rabin was able to report to the Cabinet he had always thought that would have to be the outcome: a withdrawal to the border area sparing Israel any further losses. His presentation convinced a couple of the Likud members -- David Levy and perhaps Moshe Arens -- to support his plan. Shamir may also have supported Rabin, ultimately. In any case, Rabin played a very skillful political game to achieve what he had long perceived as necessary. He could not have reached that stage without having tried all other avenues first.

The withdrawal was begun on January 14, 1985. Rabin presented a three stage plan for unilateral withdrawal. By the Spring of that year, the withdrawals were well along; it took about five months for the process to be completed with several thousand Israeli forces leap-frogging over each other while the Shiites sniped away at them. Of course, the broader Lebanon problem was still unresolved. The Israelis had succeeded in putting the issue aside as a domestic political matter because both parties, or at least majorities thereof, were in support of withdrawal. That took the issue out of the domestic political arena and helped keep it under control as a divisive factor in Israeli politics. The withdrawal was completed by early June just as my term in Israel came finally to an end, with only minor military units remaining in the area just north of the Lebanon-Israel border with General Lahad militia. The last Israeli troops came home three years after the start of the invasion in 1982. At the beginning, Begin and Sharon had promised a campaign of a week's duration with minimal casualties. In fact, during the three years, 650 Israeli soldiers died and over three thousand were wounded. It was a war with some of the highest Israeli casualty counts ever encountered. More than half of the deaths occurred after the war was over in the summer; they were victims of sniper fire, primarily from the Shiites and other Syrian surrogates.

By the Spring, 1985, Peres, Modai and Rabin had turned Israel's economic condition in the right direction, with considerable U.S. assistance, and had found a manageable solution to the Israeli presence in Lebanon, which was far short of Israel's original goals. The peace with Egypt remained very tenuous; it was working well, but it was hardly a warm relationship. No Egyptian tourists were coming to Israel; the culture agreements remained frozen. The dispute over Taba was the excuse for keeping a proper, but cold, relationship. Peres felt throughout the Fall that although his highest priority in the long run had to be the peace process, that he was not in a political position, facing a divided Cabinet, to make any major moves until after economic stabilization had been successfully launched, after the Lebanon situation was under control and after the relationship with Egypt had improved. He understood that the key to the last goal was Taba, or at least it was until that issue could be politically neutralized and removed as a central point in the dialogue between Egypt and Israel. Then Peres thought he could undertake a major effort to restart the peace process. He discussed his priorities and views several times, at length privately with me and then with Shultz when he was in Washington. It was for that reason that Shultz determinedly rejected all suggestions that were repeatedly made from a number of sources -- journalists, Middle East experts, the Israeli left and its American supporters -- that a new Middle East negotiator be appointed. Such an appointment would probably have had to be accompanied by a new initiative to succeed the stalled Reagan Initiative, but Shultz understood that the situation was not yet ripe for such an approach. He and we couldn't tell our critics that we were following Peres strategy. Shultz was calibrating his approach to the peace process to be in synchronization with Peres' plans. Unfortunately, it took Peres too long to improve relations with Egypt.

That was an unhappy story. Peres tried very hard, starting in the Fall, 1984, to put together a package deal with Egypt which would have taken Taba off the agenda. Negotiations proceeded throughout 1985, long after my departure; finally, in January 1986, Peres actually had put a package together that he knew authoritatively would satisfy Mubarak that he tried to get his Cabinet to swallow. The crux of the plan was to invoke arbitration. The Cabinet met all night; Peres had won over enough Likud votes to achieve a majority -- but then he became fatefully conciliatory and agreed to propose some Likud amendments for the package to Mubarak -- who rejected them. The deal collapsed in mutual acrimony and it then took until August, 1986 for the two governments to agree to submit the Taba issue to arbitration. That was just one month before the end of Peres' Prime Ministership. So two years had passed during which the peace process was on hold pending approval to remove Taba from the Egyptian-Israeli relationships. In the meantime, Peres kept talking to Hussein in private messages, trying to get the King involved in the peace process. But Hussein was not ready for a formal diplomatic initiative. By the time the circumstances were ripe, Peres was no longer Prime Minister but only Foreign Minister -- and Prime Minister Shamir was very skeptical of Peres' initiatives. In the Spring, 1987, Peres, now Foreign Minister, met secretly with Hussein in London. Tom Pickering was by then our Ambassador in Israel and became a key player in this diplomatic process. Hussein and Peres reached an agreement on how to launch a new peace initiative that Peres brought back to Jerusalem very proudly. Shamir refused to accept it, in part because he was highly offended that Peres had carried out these negotiations in part behind his back, and had informed the Americans of the results before he had told his own Prime Minister! We were not very deft in our participation in this process since we were trying to help Peres and at the same time maintain honest relations with Shamir. The Peres agreement died. (Peres blamed Shultz for not coming down strong with him to persuade Shamir.) I believe to this day that had Peres been able to resolve the Taba issue within three months of taking office, as he should have been able to do, then a Jordan-Israel agreement could have been signed while he was still Prime Minister. That might have changed the course of history. The Taba issue took the whole two years of Peres' stewardship. In the final analysis, we had to send the Department's Legal Advisor, Abe Sofaer, to shuttle between Cairo and Jerusalem to put a deal together. It was a terrible diversion in the Peres era which hampered the Prime Minister and blocked his ability to really focus on negotiations with Jordan.

There were other diversions in 1984-1985. Cap Weinberger visited us in October, 1984. By this time, his views toward Israel had mellowed considerably now that the Lebanon war was over. He got along well with Peres and Rabin. His visit was much more pleasant than those he had made a couple of years earlier. During this period, I spent time on a lot of different issues. I was seeing Peres and Rabin very often. I was immersed in the economic issues which brought me into contact with Modai often. I was the conduit to this Israeli government for Washington advice on the stabilization program. At the same time, I was moving into a phase-out psychology. Everyone knew I was leaving in June.

In February, we started participating in the long farewell process that didn't end until June. Every organization in Israel wanted to have a formal function to say goodbye to Sallie and me. We were fodder for five months for the gossip columnists. We attended parties, dedications, including the naming of a forest near Jerusalem for us. Peres was extraordinarily gracious throughout the period. He made a point of personally participating in many events; he spoke at the dedication of the forest. The naming of forests was a custom in Israel for large donors, which we were not, but many of our Israeli friends had paid for planting a lot of trees in the Jerusalem national forest. The small Lewis arboretum is in the same general area as the Hubert Humphrey Parkway, a project I helped dedicate sometime earlier, together with Muriel Humphrey and their three sons. The Lewis Forest was a lovely gesture which we greatly appreciated. There were many other very nice gestures, but the "farewell season" stretched out much too long. It was an exhausting few months. The combination of social and organizational events together with the discharge of my regular duties, including an increasing media workload which included farewell interviews with all the major journalists was almost too much for us. We were pretty well played out by May 1985.

I would now like to start with a series of events that took place in December 1983, which became major cause celebre in Israel, although they were almost overlooked by the U.S. press and by my colleagues in Washington. I have previously referred to my private meeting that took place at the end of 1982 with Simcha Erlich, then Vice Premier and Minister of Finance in Begin's Cabinet and leader of the Liberal Party. He was a strong supporter of the United States and a good personal friend. That meeting figured a year later in my bitter encounter with Sharon.

I had left Israel for what turned out to be an unanticipated two months' absence. I left on November 19, 1983 to return to Washington to participate first in a visit to the U.S. by President Herzog, and then in important meetings with Prime Minister Shamir--Begin's successor--and Defense Minister Arens--Sharon's successor after the publication of the Kahan Commission review of the Sabra-Shatila affair. Both were in Washington together, in part as result of a warming trend in the U.S. relationship that had been underway for a few months. After attending both sets of meetings, I was planning to take home leave. As it turned out, I didn't return to Israel until January 26, 1984. I had not been in the United States very long when this affair exploded in Israel; I had to deal with it at long distance, which is probably why I didn't react to it as quickly as I should have. Had I been in Israel, the whole business might have been put to rest sooner.

On December 4, I went to a Redskin football game. I am an avid Redskin fan and the Redskins were Super Bowl-bound that season. It was at that moment a dramatic news story was developing in Israel. I learned subsequently that on that morning's TV news show in Israel, the correspondent, Shimon Schiffer, who was then and still is a very important political commentator, reported a very garbled version of the meeting I had with Erlich a year earlier. To this day, I don't know the full story, although I discussed it later with Schiffer, who swears that he was provided the information in a credible fashion, but it was clear to me that he was given a very garbled story. It was alleged that there was documentary evidence to support the story; it has never been produced and I am sure it does not exist because what Sharon and his henchmen put out was quite different from the facts. Schiffer reported that there was a "protocol" (the Israeli term for transcript) of a conversation, the details of which had come to his attention; those details were allegedly supported by a witness to the conversation. This conversation was supposed to have taken place shortly before the Kahan Commission had completed its report. The "protocol" allegedly had me saying to Erlich, in reference to Sharon, that "that man must go. You must understand that Begin is not going to be invited to the United States, as he wished to be, because of him. Furthermore, US-Israeli relationships had suffered because of him". Erlich allegedly replied: "Sam, we are aware of the problem. I promise he will leave the government. The Kahan Commission will pass its verdict. The Prime Minister (Begin) is already aware of the mistake he made when he made him Defense Minister. After the Commission's report is published, Begin will assure that he is put aside in a position of no importance". Schiffer's report claimed that there were three people present at the meeting: Erlich, myself and Naftali Yaniv, who was the spokesman for the Agriculture Ministry. (I think that Erlich was at that time temporarily in charge of Agriculture because of some changes in the Cabinet.) He was said to have been there as a translator, had taken notes and made the transcript. Schiffer also said that the conversation was recorded on tape cassette. He went on to say that after Erlich's death--he had died in mid-1983--his secretary had passed this document together with other documents and the cassette to Erlich's widow, Zila. Just before his report was to be televised, Schiffer had called our Embassy press spokesman and asked for a comment. The spokesman, certainly under the DCM's guidance, said that I had met with Erlich from time to time, sometimes at the Minister's request, but that he couldn't confirm any of the details of any conversation.

As I said, I was completely unaware of this series of events. But the TV report started a major uproar which reverberated for weeks thereafter. It led to a sharp confrontation between Sharon and me. Sharon urged that I be declared persona non grata. I have a file about an inch and a half thick of press and public comments which were made over the following three weeks in Israel. The initial press stories, in the Jerusalem Post and other papers, accepted the fact that a meeting had taken place. Schiffer was viewed as a credible correspondent and the press therefore assumed the veracity of the story. This view was reinforced by the fact that the Embassy's spokesman had not denied the essence of the story; he refused to comment. That position was viewed as tantamount to confirmation. It is an attitude that prevailed in Israel; I had long ago learned that unless you immediately jump on a distorted version of a story, it was assumed to be correct and will be accepted as fact in all sorts of subsequent discussions. Had I been there, I would have immediately issued a flat and vigorous denial. But I wasn't and in fact, the Embassy did not contact me immediately, which was another mistake.

The next morning in Washington, I attended a briefing for Israeli correspondents on the Shamir-Arens talks and on other aspects of the US-Israeli relations. During this briefing, one of the Israeli correspondents asked me about the Schiffer report; that was the first I had heard about it. As you can well imagine, I was upset, to put it mildly. I didn't have the text of the Schiffer report, so I couldn't really respond in any depth. I did dismiss the accuracy of the report, as described to me by the Israeli correspondent. After the briefing, I called the DCM--Robert Flaten--and was briefed. He told me what the Embassy had said. Flaten's view, supported by the Embassy's press spokesman, was not to take the Schiffer report too seriously; their advice was not to dignify it further by any comment from me. They expected the story to blow over quickly. That unfortunately was not good advice; I knew it was not good advice, but for some reason I accepted it. So we took no immediate action to set the record straight. The problem was that there were elements of the story which were true. For example, there had been a meeting; it had been about the sorry state of US-Israel relations; Sharon's name had been mentioned by Erlich. So I could not flatly deny the whole story; we would have had to confirm part of the story. That was undoubtedly one of the reasons why the Embassy thought it wiser not to deal with the story at the time; if it were to grow, then it would have to be dealt with.

Over the succeeding days, the story spun out of control. I was in Washington trying to prepare myself for a major address that I was to give on Tuesday January 7 in Baltimore. I was to be honored by the presentation of the Louis Brandeis award from the Zionist Organization of America. It was that organization's annual convention. I was going to talk about the peace process and US-Israel relations. I had not yet written it and so I was very preoccupied with this task. That also diverted my attention from the uproar in Israel, which I should have paid more attention to. In the meantime, back in Israel, all the major press were running the story. Interestingly enough, the most accurate report appeared in Ha'olam Ha'ze, a part of the popular press which did not have much credibility, but which often carried some very interesting political stories. The editor was a veteran left-wing politician, Uri Avenery. Ha'olam Ha'ze talked to Schiffer and to Yaniv, the Agriculture Ministry spokesman who attended the meeting. So that paper printed a fairly accurate story, which indicated that no transcript existed. It stated that whenever I met with Erlich, whose English was rudimentary--that is he could understand quite well if you spoke slowly, but could not express himself very well--he preferred to speak in Hebrew. So we needed an interpreter to translate his comments into English and to assist with my comments if Erlich was unsure about my meaning. Yaniv was a young civil servant in the Agriculture Ministry, whose head had earlier been Sharon. He was very loyal to Erlich and a fine person. Yaniv apparently reported the meeting as it had taken place; he apparently said that my meeting with Erlich was not unique. Whenever he translated, Yaniv said that he took notes of Erlich's comments because they needed to be translated. He also said that he may have written down a few of my comments, but that he did not attend the meeting to draft a transcript subsequently; that was not part of his assignment. After my meeting with Erlich, Yaniv was in a hurry to leave; he had with him some sheets of paper with the notes he had taken at the meeting and as he left, he dropped those notes on Erlich's secretary's desk. He could have thrown them out, but he left them behind. She took the notes and stuck them in a safe, where they stayed until after Erlich's death. After his death, the secretary, for reasons yet unknown, pulled out the documents in the safe and sent them to Mrs. Erlich. She was interviewed a week after the Schiffer report by a journalist and denied that there had been any transcript. Mrs. Erlich was somewhat more sympathetic to Sharon than her husband had been. But in any case, she did not support the Schiffer story which, as I said, alleged that there was a "protocol" of my meeting with Erlich. It is interesting to note that neither Schiffer nor any of the major press talked to her before the report was issued or immediately thereafter. There was a lot of speculation on whether there had ever been a meeting although I had never denied that such a meeting had taken place.

There were more questions raised about the existence of the transcript; I am convinced that there never was such a document. There could not have been given the way the meeting proceeded.

Sharon immediately picked up on the Schiffer report. Schiffer and Sharon had been close friends for many years in the past, although they had a falling out over the Lebanon invasion. Since that event, they had not been close. Schiffer had opposed the Lebanon war and became disenchanted with Sharon. Before that, he had been one of Sharon's favorite channels for leaks which supported Sharon's views. Despite their falling out, many Israelis and I suspected that the story had been manufactured by Sharon and Schiffer as a way of getting Sharon back into the headlines. I mentioned earlier the damning findings of the Kahan Commission. That Commission had demanded that Sharon resign as Defense Minister, which he did and then was given the job of Minister without Portfolio--he had no job. Sharon remained in the Begin Cabinet as a pariah. He was bitter at the way he had been treated and very unhappy with having been shuffled off to the side. He wanted to get back into the arena. As the US-Syrian confrontation in Lebanon began in the Fall of 1983, Sharon was saying that the U.S. was finally beginning to understand what he had tried to do in June, 1982. That was only one method of many that Sharon was using to try to get back into political power. He disdained Shamir and never took him seriously; he never accepted Shamir as Begin's successor. Shamir detested Sharon, but he was very careful how he dealt with him. In fact, Shamir just ignored Sharon. That made it hard for Sharon to find a way back, particularly since his reputation was still in low repute as result of the Kahan Commission report. Many journalists, other Israelis and I began to suspect that the whole Schiffer report and subsequent uproar may have been manufactured by Sharon, although none of us could ever find any evidence of such a plot and of course Sharon denied the allegation vigorously.

While the uproar in Israel continued, the Embassy kept its silence. Each day I would call from Washington and I would always receive the advice to not respond to allegations on the assumption that the flurry would die down soon. But I was increasingly concerned about the advice. On Wednesday, December 9, Sharon was interviewed by a TV correspondent; it was a medium that was tailor made for his demagogue style. During this session, Sharon gave out the text of the letter he had sent to Shamir two days earlier. In that letter, he demanded that Shamir initiate a full investigation of the charges that the American Ambassador had tried to influence domestic Israeli matters by trying to have an Israeli Minister fired. He said that that was unacceptable behavior and demanded a full inquiry. Shamir had ignored previous Sharon demands for that investigation; that led Sharon to write the letter and distribute it to the press.

The letter, addressed to Shamir, read:

"In its news broadcast last Sunday, December 4, Kol Israel broadcast a detailed report according to which the US Ambassador to Israel, Mr. Samuel Lewis, was active in a meeting with Deputy Prime Minister, the late Simcha Erlich, to have me removed from my post as Defense Minister as a condition for improving relations between the US and Israel. According to the newscast, minutes of the conversation, held before the publication of the findings of the Commission of Inquiry (the Kahan Commission) are in possession of Mr. Erlich's widow and that the notes were taken down by a civil servant who was present at the meeting. I do not doubt the authenticity of the report which again proves the intolerable and uninterrupted intervention by a number of ranking American officials in Israel's internal affairs. Although this may be a case of foreign subversion against me, I feel that there is a vital question of principal concern to the government. It is inconceivable that a foreign Ambassador, even one of the most powerful and most friendly towards Israel, should engage in replacement of Ministers in the government of Israel and consequently in their nomination, just as it would be inconceivable that the Israeli Ambassador in Washington should seek to have figures replaced in the American administration. (I might parenthetically note that Sharon, throughout the Fall, was leading a public campaign along with a number of other Israelis to having Cap Weinberger fired because of his alleged anti-Israeli attitude.) I am absolutely convinced, Mr. Prime Minister, that you, who in the 40s, put up a valiant fight for the independence of Israel as the head of the bold Lehi organization against the mighty British Empire, are particularly incensed by gross foreign intervention in our internal affairs."

The rest of the letter was a diatribe which eventually led to Sharon's further discredit. He went on to say:

"I am furthermore aware of your long standing sensitivity to the subject of Jewish collaborators with foreign bodies and the handing over of Jews by Jews to win favors with foreigners. You will therefore probably understand and respond to my demand as follows: a) investigate the grave and subversive intervention by Ambassador Lewis in the internal affairs of Israel by an appropriate Commission of Inquiry; b) to submit forthwith to the state's legal authorities the minutes of the meeting between Mr. Lewis and Mr. Erlich and the minutes of every other conversation between them so that these notes can be submitted to a body which will investigate the intolerable activities of the American Ambassador, seek (?) and hear full evidence from the civil servant who assisted in the talk or talks. Indeed to bring the entire material as well as all of the direct and indirect material in the hands of Israeli authorities on the subject of American intervention in our internal affairs before the Commission of Inquiry. The inquiry I demand should be conducted in the widest possible scale. It is essential not in order to expose the direct responsibility of a number of American figures and circles to the grave mistakes committed in Lebanon, but in order to promptly take up a matter which concerns our independence and to put a timely stop to the serious process of intolerable intervention by some American circles in Israel's internal affairs, particularly at this moment when it is necessary to establish genuine foundations for strategic cooperation between Israel and its great friend, the United States. In the words of former Prime Minister Menachem Begin to that same Ambassador Lewis. 'Israel will not allow anyone to treat it as a banana republic and a vassal state'. Mr. Prime Minister, I have outlined to you the seriousness of the Lewis-Erich affair in a telephone conversation that very Sunday this week when it was broadcast on Kol Israel asking you to take action. I await your early reply to my request."

Sharon was a shrewd person who could write, although he may have had some assistance in this letter from members of his staff. As I mentioned he held a TV interview on December 9, during which he elaborated on the themes in the letter with considerable additional embellishment. He said that the instance he cited was not an isolated one; there had been many other such occasions "just when we were tightening US-Israel relations. We have to define what is acceptable and what isn't. I claim that there were many other actions by several US officials with Israeli collaborators to dismiss me from the post, within the framework of a deal which can be more or less stated as follows: You'll dismiss Sharon as a condition for improving US-Israeli ties. I didn't speak about this, but I was well aware of it. But I was taken aback by the report of the secret meeting between Lewis and Erlich. I am talking about the issue of subversion by several Americans and I have asked for a Commission of Inquiry". Then he talked about the illegality of such foreign activities. Then he went on to say: "Let me reminisce a little bit. Can you imagine the Soviet Ambassador in Israel thirty years ago trying to change the Israeli Foreign Minister as a condition for improving relations between the two countries? I am convinced that Ben Gurion would have demanded that he be declared persona non grata and would have ordered an investigation of the Israelis that might have collaborated with him. It should be borne in mind that for less than that, far less than what Erlich did, Aharon Cohen (a MAPAM leader who was accused of holding contacts with a foreign agent--a Soviet scientific institute representative in Israel in the late 1950s) was tried. No foreign Ambassador or government should be allowed to fire an Israeli Minister".

Sharon went on in that vein. He was pressed very hard about any proof that might be available to support his charges. He never offered any saying that he did not have any documents. He said that Erlich may not have liked him, but he thought that carrying his bias so far as to conspire with foreign elements to force his withdrawal from the Cabinet was beyond the pale. Then Sharon began to stress that a Commission of Inquiry was required to look into all of these charges; he was confident that it would find the corroborative evidence. Finally, he was asked straight out whether he had any evidence himself. He said that he would not divulge that information despite the fact that the TV interviewer was "his friend". He felt that the task of finding evidence was up to the Commission. In addition, he argued that since Erlich had promised me that Sharon would be discharged that this was evidence of conspiracy between the American and Israeli governments. He went as far as charging that the Kahan Commission was really part of that plot and that Erlich knew what the outcome would be, which enabled him to assure me that Sharon would be removed from his post once the Commission report was issued. That outlandish accusation also back-fired on Sharon eventually because the well established objectivity and thoroughness of the Kahan Commission was viewed as making the allegation totally ridiculous. When Sharon used the phrase "Israeli collaborators" and his reference to the 1950s spy case as a proper analogy with Erlich, who had been highly respected while alive and now dead and therefore unable to defend himself, that further added to diminish the credibility of Sharon's charges.

But at least for the time being his TV interview was very powerful. He speculated that the plot against him had been engendered by the Americans who wanted to get rid of him because they knew that he was opposing their nefarious policies in Lebanon. He, Sharon, was standing up for Israeli interests and that as long as he could wield some influence, he was blocking the U.S. from forcing a Lebanese deal with Israel which would have been very adverse to Israeli interests. He tried to paint himself as the guardian of Israeli interest against American misguided policies. I think that Sharon by this time was a very bitter, frustrated, wildly ambitious, undoubtedly patriotic--at least in his eyes--man who felt that he had almost reached the pinnacle of power, but had been unceremoniously blocked from reaching his ambition and had in fact been discharged from the Defense Ministry--as a result of the Lebanon crisis for which he had never been willing to accept responsibility. He manipulated the Defense Ministry and the media as best he could in order to blame others for the failures in Lebanon until the Kahan Commission came along and put an end to that effort to revise history.

After the issuance of the Kahan Commission report, as I said, Sharon was removed from the Defense Ministry and in effect marginalized. His personal situation was aggravated by Shamir's assumption of the Prime Ministership because he thought so little of Shamir. That made Sharon very frustrated and angry at everybody. He always insisted that he was a great friend of the United States. In the TV interview that I mentioned and subsequently, Sharon developed a new line which in essence maintained the whole Lebanese problem was due to the fact that President Reagan had been misled and poorly advised by a cabal in the State Department. That cabal consisted of Phil Habib, Cap Weinberger, Sam Lewis, Nick Veliotis, Morris Draper and a couple of others. He maintained that he bore no ill against the U.S. government or President Reagan, but he did resent the poor advice that the cabal had developed which had led the President into great error in Lebanon and who had persuaded him that Sharon was a bad guy. (I might say that only Weinberger might have qualified to make that list.) The general conclusion on Sharon is that he was a brilliant field commander--tremendous initiative, creativity--although there would be some that would deny him even that. There were two officers who served under Sharon in the Sinai campaign, Motta Gur and Motke Zipori--who later had to work with Sharon on political issues--who believed that he had recklessly lost the lives of a number of his soldiers by insisting on a very quick quixotic operation which was not sound strategy. There were also critics of Sharon's earlier handling of Commando Unit 101 which he led in raids into Jordan leading to some political complications because of the number of civilians who were killed in the attacks. Nevertheless, Sharon's credentials as a field commander have been very high. More argument can be had about whether he was a wise military strategist. On that issue, there is far less agreement. Some of the same dichotomy appears in Sharon's political life. He was a very able tactician, but as a strategist, he was frequently found wanting.

By December 9, I had become very concerned with developments in Israel. By this time, I was sure that the furor would not die down and that Sharon would surely make a campaign of it. I now felt that some counter measures had to be taken, even though it was clear that Shamir was not reacting at all in the hope that the matter would blow over soon. That raised in my mind the concern that if I were to issue a statement, that might undermine Shamir's Fabian tactics. So I asked Bob Flaten--I believe on December 10--after having heard about Sharon's TV interview, to talk to Hanan Bar-on who was our closest contact point in the Foreign Ministry and a good personal friend. He was a very able professional who at the time was the Deputy Director of the Foreign Ministry. I wanted Bar-on, who was responsible for US-Israeli relationships, to talk to Shamir to explain to the Prime Minister what my views were. I wanted Shamir, through Bar-on, to know that nothing improper had taken place during my meeting with Erlich and that I was prepared to say so publicly. But I wanted to be guided by the Prime Minister's advice on what, if anything, I should say for the public record, I wanted Shamir to know that I was refraining from making any public statement until I had heard his advice. The first response came to me on December 11, via Bar-on and Flaten; it was essentially advice to do nothing. I was told that the Prime Minister didn't take it seriously and that he was not concerned about it and would prefer that I not make any public statement.

Twenty hours later, I received another call from Flaten. He just had heard from Bar-on. This time, I was told that the situation was heating up to the point where a clear public denial from me might be in order. By this time, eight days had already passed from the initial Schiffer report. On the next day, December 13, we issued in Tel Aviv the following statement:

"The Embassy has received a number of questions concerning a recent story about a meeting of a year ago between Deputy Prime Minister Erlich and Ambassador Lewis. We have consulted with Ambassador Lewis, who is presently on home leave in the United States, and are authorized to categorically deny that Ambassador Lewis at any time either recommended or advised Deputy Prime Minister Erlich or any other Israeli Minister or official that the then Minister of Defense should be relieved of his responsibilities.

That flat denial turned out to be quite useful, but it had come too late to stop the various stories, which continued to spin out of control. Some were, by this time, becoming favorable to me. Dan Margolit, in Haaetz, on December 9--the same day of Sharon's interview--wrote a wonderful column "in praise of the High Commissioner"--a nickname that had been earlier given to me. Margolit made a strong argument against taking any of Sharon's allegations seriously and furthermore said some nice things about my efforts. He, like many other journalists, included some negative comments about Israelis, who, while eager to talk to me and to come to my receptions and dinners, had not risen to my defense. He said: "The special position occupied by Lewis in high Israeli circles for a long time has been an established fact. At a Hanukah party six years ago (that was about six months after I had arrived) I saw Ministers, officers in uniforms and senior officials standing in line to talk for a few minutes privately with the Ambassador. Ministers told him what they did not dare leak to us journalists. Frustrated opposition members wanted to seek his assistance to weaken the Likud government, as it emerged recently from a statement made in a well attended meeting with him by members of the business community only a few months ago" (that was another event, but had some relevance to the Sharon attack). The article went on to ask how I had managed to become so well acquainted with Israeli affairs. He maintained that in a democratic society that was perfectly acceptable and that in fact there was no way that an Israeli citizen could be barred from talking to the American Ambassador or other diplomats.

One of the lead articles went on to say that there "was nothing wrong with this. No free democratic society wants or can restrict the freedom of speech of its citizens conversing with the American ambassador or other diplomats. The problem is to know where the limits are. Lewis is not the address for obtaining the answer to these questions. The limits have to be set by every Israeli. When this limit is exceeded by Erlichs, it is not excessive candor, but the underlying symptom that arouses concern. In the inept government of Menachem Begin, all values and norms for self-restraint were destroyed and eroded. Lewis didn't appoint himself High Commissioner of Israeli society. It was the society that bestowed on him this title at its own initiative".

That was an illustration of one approach to the issue. Some journalists essentially followed that line. But there were others who were writing, on a continuous basis, less favorable articles, some of which were on the nasty side. They still pretended to accept the basic argument that something improper had happened. On December 10, I had a telephone call from a journalist--Mira Avrech-

-a close friend, from Israel. She holds a unique place in Israeli journalism. She is essentially a gossip columnist; but she writes the most widely read column in Israel in the biggest paper Yidiot, and she is also very politically oriented. She is a very close friend of Shimon Peres and many other Israeli leaders in all factions, although perhaps her contacts are strongest with the Labor Party. At one point, she was a member of Irgun and therefore has long standing connections with people like Begin. In any case, she was a good friend; I had from time to time given her interviews. She was becoming concerned about the development of the Lewis-Sharon affair. She knew I was in Washington and away from the scene and she was very sensitive to press moods. When she called, she told me that she had agreed to appear on a major TV panel talk show that Dan Raviv was hosting. This was, at the time, probably the TV show with the second highest viewer audience in Israel. She was going to appear together with the almost legendary former chief of the Mossad, Isser Harel. The subject of the panel show was going to be the "Lewis-Sharon affair". Mira said that it would be helpful if I could give her a statement that she could use publicly; she thought that would reinforce what the Embassy had already said. And that is what I did; I gave her a further statement. She handled herself extremely well on the panel. She said, in response to a question from Raviv concerning Sharon's accusation of subversions and interference: "First, Lewis denies it. I talked to him today on the telephone when I knew I was going to be on your show. He emphatically denies that he demanded Sharon's ouster. In addition there is no proof that anything like that was ever said. I also called Mrs. Erlich. She told me that there are no minutes--'I received no minutes'. She also said that Yaniv had told her that no such minutes exist. Mrs. Erlich added: 'Sam Lewis can certainly sue someone for libel'".

Raviv then said: "But Schiffer insists that his report is correct". To which Mira replied:

"I have many reasons to believe that he was misled. First, I believe Lewis. He never misled me. Moreover, no secrets were likely to be discussed in the presence of Yaniv. Lewis is no political appointee. He knows the ropes. They have been keeping him in Tel Aviv for six years because they are afraid that if they send him to another post, he will quit. They don't want him to go. Everything said in that meeting was not really taken down".

Harel then said: "It doesn't even look serious to me for the reasons Mira mentioned. Even if those things were said, they were said by two people on a very personal basis, informally. The whole thing is trivial." Mira then said: "As an ambassador, you have to speak up if you feel that bilateral relationships would suffer if you don't." So her participation in this panel show was very effective and helpful. I never publicly commented on the affair again and neither did the Embassy. My denial, made through Mira, was carried widely by the press. The editorials, like the one that appeared in the Jerusalem Post the following day just blasted Sharon. The Jerusalem Post's editorial was entitled "Traitors All". It said: "The Cabinet yesterday did not discuss Ariel Sharon's demand for the appointment of a judicial committee...It is preposterous. Mr. Lewis can not be interviewed by any Israeli judicial panel and Mr. Erlich is dead." It went from there to totally destroy all of Sharon's arguments.

The Jerusalem Post at the time was anti-Likud and liberal. Mira Avrech followed up her TV appearance with an article in Yidiot on December 13, in which she covered the same ground. She also reminded her readers that Yitzhak Rabin, when he was Israeli Ambassador in Washington, had openly backed Richard Nixon's reelection, much to the dismay of traditional diplomats. She also mentioned that Ezer Weizmann had jumped on Jimmy Carter's campaign plane, right after having left the post of Defense Minister, and had appeared with him in public. She also reminded people that this meeting with Erlich had taken place just a couple of days after Sharon had tried to humiliate Phil Habib by flaunting his secret agreement with Lebanon in a formal meeting with the Prime Minister. He was obviously intent on angering the U.S., raising the already cold temperature in Washington to near freeze levels. Her adding a commentary about the atmosphere that prevailed when I met with Erlich was a good idea. Avrech was also helpful in describing my conversation with her. She added to what had been said on TV by saying that I had categorically denied ever saying to Erlich that Sharon should be ousted. I told her and she quoted me correctly as saying that: "We discussed the deteriorating situation between Israel and the U.S. and the possibilities of restoring it. Never at any moment or under any circumstances did I recommend or advise Erlich on dismissal of Sharon from his job." She then asked: "What about the Kahan Commission? Did Erlich say two weeks after the publication of the report that Sharon would be ousted?" I answered: "We never even mentioned the Commission". Then I added: "So simple a document could not exist because such things were never said. But if someone does allegedly have such a document quoting me as saying things of this kind, the document is clearly forged." Avrech, in her article, went on to say: "There is no recording and as for notes, Simcha Erlich's widow denies ever receiving any. If they exist, there is no proof of their authenticity". So Mira was an important player in this saga.

Marriv on December 16 carried a very thoughtful, accurate article about my relationship with Sharon and Begin and my role in Israel. He reminded the readers that Sharon himself, before the Lebanon war and a year before my meeting with Erlich, had "leaked" the outlines of all of his plans for the Lebanon invasion to me, to Phil Habib and to other Americans. So when Sharon talked about "collaboration", he was vulnerable to the charge himself. The article also mentioned that Sharon had been a frequent visitor to the Lewis' residence and had tried very hard to co-opt me to his point of view on settlements during an earlier period of my Israeli tour.

By December 23, after three weeks, the brouhaha was beginning to wind down. There was still enough interest in it to generate a Knesset debate(!) about Sharon and me; it lasted for about an hour. There had been two private member bills submitted on December 21: one from Moshe Shahal of the Labor Party urging the government to establish the Commission of Inquiry demanded by Sharon, because he wanted a full investigation of all information that Sharon had shared with us about the Lebanon invasion and of other matters, thereby trying to turn the tables on Sharon by having a Commission which would look into other Sharon activities not covered by the Kahan Commission. The other private member bill was submitted by Ronnie Milo, a Likud member, now the Mayor of Tel Aviv and a sidekick of Shamir. (One could say that Milo was a stalking horse for Shamir.) His bill would have turned the tables in a different way. It would have investigated the contacts between foreign representatives and the opposition parties-- basically Labor. The Knesset debate was tepid; there were only about twenty members (out of 120) on the floor. Sharon did not show up for the debate. By this time, he was clearly in retreat. Yehuda Ben-Meir, then the Deputy Foreign Minister (also a good friend of mine), articulated the government's positions on the motions. He essentially said that the whole affair was a tempest in a tea cup. He read the Embassy's denial and gave a lot of kudos to Erlich, describing him as a true patriot; he was "shocked" that anybody would challenge his integrity. All of Sharon's allegations about "traitors" and "collaborationists" had really back-fired. Sharon had managed by this time to make Erlich a saint, which was perhaps something more than he deserved. Nevertheless, since he was dead, his character did not deserve to be assassinated. The debate, according to the Embassy's report, aroused very little emotion. Shahal's motion was defeated by a tie vote; Milo's motion was withdrawn at the suggestion of Ben-Meir. The Embassy, in its cabled report, stated:

"Most observers were saying afterwards that the episode as ended has been a defeat for Sharon, who didn't even attend the session. The outcome is another example of the recent decline of Sharon's political fortune. He has placed himself clearly outside the Likud leadership and is openly criticized by many of his Cabinet colleagues. While he is still regarded by many, both inside and outside of Herut as responsible for Israel's problem in Lebanon and Begin's political downfall, the former Defense Minister is a stubborn persistent political figure whose outspoken criticism deeply disturbs Shamir. Our contacts are quick to warn that it would be premature and unwise to write Sharon off politically."

That was of course true because Sharon is still around even after many years of being a real problem.

When I returned to Israel a few weeks later, I said to Shamir privately at one point: 'I hope that my conversation with Erlich didn't cause you too much angst.' He replied that I shouldn't worry about it. There was nothing to be concerned about.

Around December 23, a cartoon appeared in Harretz; it had been drawn by the leading cartoonist in Israel, Zeev. It is a fascinating cartoon, a copy of which I still possess and which is hanging on our walls. It's entitled "At the Piano: Sam Lewis with the Zadikov Choir" (a well known choir). It shows me sitting at a piano, dressed in tails with an open shirt-which is what I always wore in Israel--playing a tune entitled "US-Israeli Relations". The music is very sweet; the bars are floating up from the piano to a window through which you can see a White House-like building in the distance. There in front of the building are Reagan and Shultz listening happily to the sound of my music. There is a choir of people who are singing with me. The choir consists of all of Israel's political leaders--Begin, Shamir, Meir Amit, Ben Elizar, Weizmann, etc. The choir is using documents--Cabinet decisions, protocols, reports--all secret documents--as their music sheets. The choir is singing its secrets to the United States to the accompaniment of my piano. Down in the right hand corner, there is an open safe--Erlich's safe. Sharon is shown as a lumbering elephant--as he was often in Israeli cartoons--coming out of the safe, carrying a sign in his trunk, lettered "Commission of Inquiry". As this elephant comes out of the safe, he is kicking over and breaking a lot of crockery filled with flowers. The vases are labeled "The Commission of Inquiry on the Sabra-Shatila Massacre", "the agreement Habib made with Lebanon", "the Israeli reactor on the Golan law". These are filed in a waste paper basket next to the piano. The cartoon was an extraordinary effort to depict the High Commissioner as the conductor of the Israeli choir. It sort of sums up the way the Israeli press liked to depict my role in their country after six and a half years as ambassador.

Unfortunately, this episode did not end my problems with Sharon. Up to this time, my relations with Sharon had been very correct. When we first arrived in Israel in 1977, Sharon was the Minister of Agriculture and responsible for settlement policy. He tried his best then to convince me and through me, the U.S. government, that Israeli settlements in the occupied territories were beneficial. He tried very hard to cultivate me. We entertained the Sharons very often. We had private dinners with him. They invited us to their ranch. They came to some of our larger affairs. I went to his office; I took groups of American visitors to his office. He showed me around some of the West Bank settlements. Eventually it became clear to him that I was not buying his argument, but we maintained a sort of jocular stand-offishness. He would make cracks about our policy and I would return with comments in similar vein. All the exchanges were quite acceptable. From the period before the Lebanon war, through that war and afterwards, Sharon was Defense Minister. He became increasingly difficult and eventually impossible about the U.S. role in the area. He was very rude to Habib, Draper and sometimes to me, although I would be rude right back, as did Habib. We didn't let him get away unchallenged when he made nasty cracks. Maury Draper tended to be more passive which just encouraged Sharon to be even more outrageous. He behaved as all bullies do. After the Kahan Commission, he was fired as Defense Minister. He was convinced then that his demise was the result of a U.S. conspiracy with the Israeli government. It was of course true that the U.S. government, from the top down, was very hostile toward him and publicly so. He continued to dig, in the Israeli press, at American presidents, Weinberger and others. Washington had become very cold about Sharon, which was a complete turn around from the beginning of the Reagan administration; then it was very positive about him. It didn't take the administration long to turn around. Shultz was very bitter and angry with Sharon, during the Lebanon war and afterwards. Sharon became pretty much persona non grata in Washington.

I continued to have proper relations; when we had business to transact with him, we conducted it, politely. Of course, by 1983, he didn't have a Ministry, so that we didn't have much business to discuss. The American Jewish leaders who wanted to talk to Sharon--and there were always some even when he was in disgrace--would see him without any Embassy escort and we would not be involved. But up to the end of 1983, I tried to be perfectly professional with Sharon. If I saw him at a function, I would greet him properly; his response was usually quite cold. But we were speaking to each other. After the December 1983 episode, which was clearly an effort to have me removed from my post while I was out of Israel, I was furious. So I made a resolution that I would continue an official relationship with Sharon if my duties required it, but I would not have anything to do with him socially. I did not feel that I had any obligation to do so. So from January 1984 to when we left in June 1985, we never invited the Sharons to the residence. We did not even invite him to the July 4th, 1984 reception, although all the other Cabinet members were. I was very amused by the fact that within a few days thereafter, Sharon was circulating stories around town about what an insult it had been to Israel that he should not have been invited to our American Embassy for the July 4th festivities. He loved to talk about the "boycott" that had been imposed on him by Ambassador Lewis and the U.S. government; he kept this line going for the rest of my tour, as if we had an obligation to maintain social relationships after all of the events in December, 1983.

Eventually, the Sharon-Lewis-Erlich story wound down in Israel at the end of December. I was still in the United States, on home leave, attending meetings in Washington, doing some diving and so forth. I returned to Israel at the end of the third week of January, 1984. From then for the next several months, Sharon continued his public attacks at every possible opportunity. Clearly, he was staking out his claim to replace Shamir as the Likud leader and therefore Prime Minister.

He was using his attacks on U.S. policy and me personally as a way to marshal the support of the Likud party members. He had no job in the Cabinet, although he had not lost his Ministerial title. He used his time to meet with Likud local branches; he sought and obtained platforms for his speeches, which were essentially allegations that U.S. policy, by now clearly failing in Lebanon--as was Israeli policy--was "due to the poor advice and almost criminal negligence of U.S. policy makers--Habib, Lewis, Weinberger, Draper and Veliotis". We were the five targets that Sharon lumped together as the architects of the failed U.S. policy. We were the cause of the catastrophic consequences for Israel of the Lebanon "failure", because, Sharon alleged, we had misled President Reagan, thereby leading the President to oppose the Israeli invasion; indeed, this faulty policy was responsible for the U.S. putting so much pressure on Begin that the invasion had to be halted prematurely, before complete Israeli success could be captured. It was therefore obviously, in Sharon's eyes, all the fault of the U.S. that had led to Israel having failed in Lebanon and it was clear that the same gang of five were causing U.S. policy in Lebanon to fail as well.

Weinberger was the only Washington-based official mentioned by Sharon. Cap was indeed a very central figure in U.S. policy making in Lebanon. He had been very skeptical about Israeli policy and was considered by many Israelis to be anti-Israel. He was the most vocal, prominent opponent of Israeli policy in the administration. He didn't miss any opportunities to publicly challenge that policy. He also argued most vigorously against sending U.S. Marines to Lebanon and was the strong proponent of removing them from there as soon as possible. For all these reasons, he was one of Sharon's targets.

This has to be understood within the environment then existing. During February and March, the final failure of U.S. policy in Lebanon became crystal clear. Therefore Sharon's speeches were made against the backdrop of the ignominious withdrawal of American Marines and other forces. The resistance of Amin Gemayel's government to Syrian efforts to extend its role in Lebanon was also collapsing. Furthermore, during the first week in March, the Lebanese government cancelled its ratification of the Lebanese-Israeli agreements reached in the preceding May. So both Israeli and American policies on Lebanon were turning out to be abject failures. That gave Sharon the opportunity not only to attack these policies, but to use their failures as a vindication of his actions. He attributed the failure of these policies to the fact that his path had not been followed; the Americans had forced Begin to "waffle" instead of giving him full support for strong actions in Lebanon. As I said, these Sharon diatribes were political ploys in his game to replace Shamir as party leader. It was clear in early 1984 that the Shamir government, which he had inherited from Begin during the preceding September, would have to face the electorate sometime during that year. Shamir's majority was too frail to last any length of time. In fact, on March 28, the Knesset set the date for elections. On April 13, the Likud Party held a meeting of its Central Committee to select its leader. Shamir had been viewed as an interim leader when Begin stepped down. Sharon launched his campaign for the leadership and pressed it vigorously in the weeks prior to the Committee meeting.

In fact, Sharon lost. Shamir was confirmed as the Likud candidate for the Prime Ministership by vote of 407-306. That was the closest that Ariel Sharon ever came to winning the Party leadership. It came only a year after he had been forced out of the Defense Ministry. So he was still unpopular with the general public, but he had retained and regained a lot of strength within the Party. The vote was close enough to force Shamir to offer Sharon a Cabinet office. Sharon's campaign strategy, which involved savaging me and other American officials, made for a very unpleasant Spring in Israel. On at least one occasion in March, I raised with Shamir what I refer to as the "Sharon problem." I discussed with the Prime Minister Sharon's continuing attacks and insults on the United States. I felt that he was publicly poisoning the relationships between the two countries, which had not been that great to start with. Privately, Shamir was very unhappy with Sharon's campaign, but politically, he was not in a position to block him publicly. No one has ever succeeded in stopping Sharon's mouth in any case--not even Begin.

The difficulties between Sharon and me dragged out through 1984 and 1985, although not as acute as in the Spring of 1984 when Sharon was making a run for party leadership. Then, a year later, as I was preparing to leave Israel after eight years, I gave my first TV interview and the final chapter of my relationship with Sharon opened the week before we left. This was the only major TV interview during my tour in Israel. I had, (erroneously in retrospect) reached the conclusion at the beginning of my tour, that TV was not a good medium for me, because I did not speak Hebrew well enough to be interviewed. When you speak English in a Hebrew speaking country, the TV production uses sub-titles, which you can't control and may, therefore, not reflect the true essence of your comments. Moreover, the translation would never be a full one. So I decided that I would be better off not being interviewed on TV, except for some short comments or appearances. But no formal or serious interviews. I held to that position until just shortly before my departure when I was persuaded by the Kol Israel television correspondent, Ehud Ya'Ari--a friend--to do one farewell interview on MOKED, the major Israeli interview program, on May 22, 1985. There were actually two interviewers, Ya'Ari and Yoran Ronen, both of whom were very good. The interview in general received good reviews, particularly from journalists. During that interview, I was asked whether Sharon had ever given us in 1981 the detailed plans for the Lebanon invasion, I gave a brief and accurate response. That led to another explosion from Sharon, which lasted for the whole final ten day period before my departure from the country.

The first question asked of me was: "Mr. Ambassador, to what extent were you aware of the fact that Israel was going to open a war in Lebanon" I answered: "It was pretty clear to us by January or February, 1982 that the war was just waiting to happen and that there was a determination here not to let the PLO infrastructure in Lebanon continue much longer." Then I continued by discussing the kinds of provocations that we thought might trigger a war. Then Ehud Ya'Ari asked me: "Was there any specific American warning to the Israeli government before the war against going all the way to Beirut?" I answered: "The subject of going all the way to Beirut really only came up before the war to my knowledge in two conversations. One was I think in the December 1981 when Phil Habib was down at General Sharon's ranch. I think the meeting was at the ranch, as I recall. (Note: I was incorrect; the meeting was at the Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem-I was not present.) And Minister Sharon described in some hypothetical detail, the concept of what ultimately became known as "Big Pines". (That was the Israeli code phrase for the Lebanon operation). Habib was, as I was and others of us were, dumbfounded by the audacity of the political concept that seemed to involve. Habib reacted at that point very vehemently. I don't remember his precise words and I perhaps wouldn't want to quote them anyway. Ehud Ya'Ari quoted them: (he had already written a book together with Zeev Schiff on the Lebanon war, part of which described very accurately this whole meeting, based on Israeli sources.) Ya'Ari said: "Habib said something like 'We are living in the 20th Century. Aren't we?'" I added: "He made it extraordinarily clear to Sharon that this was an unthinkable proposition as far as the U.S. government was concerned." Then I proceeded to describe the second occasion which occurred during Sharon's meeting with Al Haig in late May, 1982 in Washington. During that meeting, Haig acknowledged Israeli's right to self-defense, but said that if Israel responded to attacks, it had to do so in a way proportionate to those attacks. That would enable the international community to understand the appropriateness of Israeli reaction. I then added: "The words 'going to Beirut' didn't occur in that conversation with Haig to my recollection, but the point was unmistakable."

The interview set off a firestorm, partly because the press wrote about it as if I had revealed a great state secret! This added to already existing political pressures to reexamine the origins of the Lebanon War.

The debate heated up rapidly; every paper highlighted the story, often focusing on the alleged "shock" that an Israeli Defense Minister would have divulged to a foreign diplomat details of a military plan to invade Lebanon, even before discussing it with his own Cabinet or obtaining Cabinet approval. The incident provided fresh material for the many anti-Sharon journalists and politicians to use in calling for his impeachment or for another Commission of Inquiry to review the responsibility for the failure of the Lebanon War.

The next day, May 23, the Deputy Foreign Minister Yehuda Ben-Meir was interviewed on TV. He was asked about the allegation made against Sharon. He confirmed what I had said on TV, because there had been two Foreign Ministry officials--Hanan Bar-on and Eytan Ben Tsur--in attendance at the meeting, which had taken place at the Foreign Ministry. They had been shocked by what they had heard and had reported to Ben Meir what they had heard. He in turn had reported it to Shamir, the Foreign Minister. So while Ben Meir tried to avoid becoming entangled in the Sharon-Lewis debate, he did say that he had seen reliable reports about the meeting which confirmed the accuracy of my comments. The Minister for Communications, Moshe Zipori, who had been the Deputy Minister of Defense at the time of the meeting, also confirmed my report. Neither of them had been at the meeting, but there had been 16-18 people there, half American and half Israeli. Habib, Draper, Brown (DCM), Paul Hare (the Embassy Political Counselor) and Colonel Raines (the Defense Attaché) had attended. So there were a lot of witnesses at the meeting; furthermore there was a protocol made by the Israelis and the Embassy had submitted full reports to Washington. I had not been there because I was in the U.S. at the time but of course I had later read the reports and heard oral accounts from our officials. In light of all the witnesses and the existence of written reports, it didn't seem wise for Sharon to object to my factual statements.

But he went ahead and called a press conference in May 23. He said inter alia: "Not only did no meeting take place at the ranch six months prior to the war, but I have never detailed any operational plans (he began to use the phrase "operational plans" to clear his role)." He said also that he had warned senior Egyptian officials that Israel might invade Lebanon. That statement did not sit well with the Egyptians. He went on to justify himself as best he could. He denied that Phil Habib had ever been at the ranch. He did admit that there had been a meeting at the Foreign Ministry, but he tried to explain away his initial assertion, which had been to call my statements "blatant lies. Lewis is a liar." He used the Hebrew word "gass", which I was told meant "gross, piggish, course".

He repeated the accusation that I was lying several times in the course of the next few days in a series of interviews that he gave. He continually lumped Habib, Draper, Veliotis, Weinberger and Lewis as the cause of the war. He tried to justify himself by asserting that he had tried repeatedly to warn the United States that unless it quickly resolved the PLO problem in Lebanon, Israel would have to take on the task in its own way. He denied that he had ever mentioned the code phrase; I had never said that he had--I had said that "it later became known as 'Big Pine'." So, in as many ways as he could, Sharon tried to depict me as a liar by picking up some inaccuracies or vagueness in the answers to the two TV questions. Since I had answered the questions extemporaneously, I probably wasn't precise on all details.

The whole controversy sparked a very interesting debate, once again reviving the question of whether the Lebanon war was justified. Eventually, some of the commentators asked the question that if Sharon were trying to warn the Americans even by going too far in telling them the concept of an operation, how could six months later Ronald Reagan saying that the U.S. had no idea of Israeli intentions? The President seemed to have been totally surprised and affronted by the Israeli invasion. That question did raise a problem for the U.S. because I had publicly confirmed that we had indeed been given the broad concept of what turned out to become "Big Pine". It is true that we didn't have the operational details, but we were certainly informed about many of the strategic details. Habib had reacted negatively, as he should have. That made Presidential surprise somewhat hard to sell.

That explains how Washington handled the uproar in Israel. When Sharon called me a "gass" liar, the Israeli correspondents in Washington asked the Department's press spokesman, Bernard Kalb, for his comments. The Embassy had immediately reported my TV interview and the subsequent furor giving the NEA Bureau the opportunity to draft press guidance, which totally supported my version of events. We had been told that this guidance would be issued as a press release. At the very last moment, someone--and I don't know who, but I suspect that it was Shultz--decided that it would be better not to become involved in the debate because of concern that the next question might well have been about why the U.S. had not taken stronger steps to prevent the Israeli invasion. So Kalb said that he could not answer the questions because they would involve discussions of diplomatic exchanges which are never discussed publicly. The position taken by the Department infuriated me, particularly after having been assured that the Department would strongly support me. I put out a "clarifying" statement, describing more fully what I knew and what I had said. Then I called Dick Murphy, the NEA Assistant Secretary and Charlie Hill, Shultz's Executive Assistant (and my former Political Counselor) to express in colorful language my reaction of anger and disappointment to the Department's response to Sharon's attacks on me. That brought a change in the Department's position. On May 24, the next day, Ed Djerejian, then the deputy press spokesman, in answer to another question about the dispute, said: "As we said yesterday, without going into the details of diplomatic exchanges, we can confirm that Ambassador Lewis has described the United States' position on this matter with complete accuracy. We strongly object to any suggestions to the contrary. I will repeat that. We strongly object to any suggestions to the contrary." Then he meandered a little, but didn't go beyond that, although he tried to square this admission with U.S. comments made months later that the Israeli invasion had caught us completely off-guard.

After making his public statement, Djerejian went on "background", which was also fully covered by the press. He said: "We want to emphasize that beyond what was generally and publicly known, the United States government had no prior knowledge of the invasion of Lebanon." Apparently, what the Bureau meant to say when it drafted that language--which Djerejian was instructed to stick to and not abandon for one inch--was that we obviously didn't know specifically about when the invasion would take place or how it would proceed. The press, of course, interpreted that comment as being contradictory to what I had revealed and others had known. We had had all sorts of warnings that something was coming.

I should note, parenthetically, that the opposition had seized on my comments to score points against the Likud and Sharon. The Likud had then to defend Sharon for political reasons. So my comments had become the subject of a fierce internal Israeli political dogfight. The statement that I put out was made at the beginning of a final meeting I held on May 24 with the American press at the chancery in Tel Aviv. That was the last time I met with the correspondents as a group. I started out, in light of all of what had been said in the previous few days, by providing a clarification. I said: "I had no intention of intervening in internal Israeli affairs or encouraging any escalation of the public debate, which has erupted in the wake of my interview. I make this statement now merely to pay my debt as I conceive of it to the need for historical accuracy. The statement that I made on television, which produced such controversy, was in response to a question on an unrehearsed interview program. Since that interview and the reactions to it, I have reviewed the files and I discovered that I was indeed, as I thought I might be at the time, mistaken about the location of the meeting. But my recollections of the basic facts was accurate. The meeting did take place, the content was as described on television." I said: "I was careful to characterize Minister Sharon's presentation as hypothetical." I reviewed again who was present at the meeting and where it had taken place. I finished by saying: "The thrust of my answer was crystal clear and that was that such a meeting took place, that Phil Habib and other Americans were present and reported on it. At that meeting, Minister Sharon did present a hypothetical concept for a military operation in Lebanon. It was not a detail plan of operations, but in light of hindsight and what I read subsequently in the Israeli press and books by Israeli journalists, I can see it clearly resembled what came to be known as "Big Pines, although of course that name was not used during the meetings. Phil Habib reacted in vehement fashion. I do remember that he told Minister Sharon that the concept was unthinkable as far as the U.S. government was concerned and that is really all I want to say on the subject." I did get some questions on the issue, but I pretty much stuck to the line I had taken in the opening statement.

Of course, that did not end the dispute. Several more days ensued with the story being headline material. Sharon gave another interview in which he vehemently attacked me again. Every political correspondent commented on the affair. The Washington Post carried three or four stories on the debate. Tom Friedman of the New York Times wrote one or two stories more, more or less factually describing the exchanges that were occurring. I too was holding further interviews because these were my final days in Israel I met probably with eight or ten of the leading journalists or groups of journalists in the country, summing up my eight years as Ambassador, answering questions about past and current U.S. policies. I had a very long--two or three hours-session with the Jerusalem Post editorial staff, together with my wife Sallie. The Sharon-Lewis debate of course arose during these interviews and I basically answered them the same way as I had done for the American journalists. There was some elaboration necessary which became fodder for some additional stories. So, without intent, I was keeping the story alive as well as Sharon. One of the things I told the American correspondents, as example, in answer to a question, was that I thought the invasion of Lebanon had been a tragedy for both Israel and Lebanon and very harmful to the United States, not only because we had been diverted from the Middle East Peace process and because of the damage that the invasion had inflicted on the two societies most closely involved.

At one point, there was a question about Begin. The question was whether Begin had been true to the Camp David agreement in permitting new settlements against the wishes of Carter and others. I answered that I did not think that the Prime Minister had lived up to the spirit of Camp David, although I did admit that it was obvious to me that Begin believed that he had not violated his commitments to Carter--which was the opposite of Carter's views. I am convinced that Begin felt that his commitment for restraint on new settlements was for only a three month period after Camp David. My comment even brought Begin out of his retirement; he had not been heard from in months. But in light of my comments, he actually gave a couple of statements to the press. Some journalist called him at home and read him my comments about the settlements issue. Begin said: "The outgoing Ambassador, Sam Lewis, never told me that the settlement policy in the territories was in contradiction to the spirit of Camp David, though we used to meet frequently." Begin then pointed out that my comments were new to him, but that I was entitled to think as I did and to express my opinions. He went on to note that his government's policy on the territories were well known to the American administration and that Carter clearly realized that after the three months' settlement freeze following Camp David, further settlements would be established. He also commented on the Sharon affair by saying that according to the Department's statement, it was clear that the Defense Minister had not divulged any operational plans. He finished his statement by saying some kind words about my work and about the good relations that he and I had enjoyed.

After the passage of a few more days, John Goshko of The Washington Post, under a headline that read "Ambassador was accurate on his report of Sharon's plans, State Department says." In the meantime Phil Habib was interviewed in California by Israeli correspondents; he refused to talk about the details of the meeting, but he did vouch strongly for my credibility on the subject. The fact that I had given a rare "on the record" interview made the whole episode seem much more dramatic to the Israelis. Everybody in Israel, of course, always looks "under the rocks" for possible motives. The press was full of speculation about my motives; questions were raised and answered about why I, all of a sudden, decided to attack Sharon--that was the way my interview was incorrectly always characterized. The answer according to the journalists and pundits was that I had suffered in silence, more or less, for three years despite Sharon's continuous attacks and that I had finally decided to get even. Some journalists, who had been very unhappy about U.S. policy because we had not tried hard enough to stop the invasion, described me as the architect of that policy, which also included sympathy for Israeli actions in Lebanon. David Landau, the foreign affairs correspondent for the Jerusalem Post--a brilliant journalist, left-wing, anti-war--had always been very critical of me because I was too close to Begin and other Likud leaders. He always had voiced the opinion that I had not been tough enough on Likud and that my reporting to Washington must have influenced Haig in his sympathetic view of the Israeli invasion. He wrote an article entitled "Speaking for Sharon". In it he said: "I wish Ariel Sharon had commissioned me to defend him from the attack from out-going Ambassador Samuel Lewis. I could have done a much better job than he did with this pathetic misrepresentation of the facts in his television appearance." Then he went on to make me essentially the villain who had "played ball" with Begin and Sharon and who had led the American government in being far too tolerant of the Israeli government's excesses. So I received mixed reviews in the press, although on the whole, I think the press was much more in my corner than in Sharon's, although he also received some sympathy from a number of commentators. There were also those who were critical of me for having raised this issue in the way I did.

About May 27, I attended a meeting with Foreign Minister Shamir in his office. I said to him, as I was leaving, that I had hoped that my interview and the subsequent furor that it raised had not caused him any unnecessary angst. I apologized for any political difficulties that I may have raised; it had not been my intention to do so. He told me, very graciously, not to worry about it. Of course, this episode appeared in the press the next day characterizing my conversation with Shamir as an "apology". That was just another illustration of how few things in Israel remain out of the public domain for very long, particularly if they have political connotations.

A week later, the leading commentator for Haaretz wrote an article quoting Proverbs: "He that rolleth the stone, it will turn upon him", essentially suggesting that my statement on TV, which he was certain had been well planned before hand--since I was too smart to speak without having calculated the consequences--had come back to point out once again that the U.S. government knew a lot about what would happen and did far too little to head it off. The controversy continued to play in the press for another ten days, in almost every paper. Finally, in my last days in Tel Aviv, as Bob Flaten was beginning to act as chargé, I had an interview with NBC Today Show; the same issue arose. That night, Peres, then the Prime Minister, who had remained completely silent throughout this period, but who was a good friend, gave Sallie and me a farewell dinner. It was an extraordinary event which took place at the Peres official home in Jerusalem. Every member of the Cabinet and his wife was invited. This was a Cabinet of national unity, which meant that both Likud and Labor participated in it. One of the more interesting questions was whether Ariel Sharon would attend. He did not--fortunately. Shamir wasn't there either because he had to be in London that night. He and the Foreign Ministry had already hosted a formal dinner for us a few days earlier. The Peres dinner was an absolutely wonderful evening. An excessive number of accolades were spoken; Peres presented me a very large book about one meter high and 3/4 of a meter wide covered with felt. It was a tribute to Ben Gurion that Peres had written along with Abba Eban. A limited special edition had been printed in Paris in both French and English. The Israeli painter Agam had been commissioned to do a series of plates to illustrate the book. So the book contains about 15 original Agam plates depicting various aspects of Ben Gurion's life. Only 70 copies of this book were ever printed and we were fortunate enough to receive one copy, which was a beautiful memento of our years in Israel.

I should add, that on the night of May 23--the day after my TV interview--I had sat next to Peres at a banquet at the Knesset which was honoring the retiring chief of the Israeli equivalent of our Government Accounting Office. During the ceremonies, Peres passed me a note which said: "Sam, unfortunately I did not see Moked, but everybody is praising you immensely. I heard over the radio what Sharon and what Ben-Meir said: that Sam Lewis never lies. I shall refer to this matter openly and clearly. You surely are free to take any steps you feel proper. SP". That last statement alludes to something that I had said to Peres privately earlier at the dinner. As I have said before, I was really upset at being called a liar by Sharon. I recalled immediately what Mrs. Erlich had said two years earlier about the previous Sharon attack--namely that I should have sued him for libel. I was thinking seriously about doing so in May, 1985. Sharon was embroiled at the time in a libel case against TIME magazine. It was a quixotic thought, but I did consider the possibility very seriously. I mentioned this possible course to Peres at the dinner and probably asked his advice; that I believe is the reference in his note.

In the next few days, I thought about that libel suit possibility a lot. I talked to two of the most distinguished Israeli lawyers on a very confidential basis. I asked whether they thought that bringing a suit was a practical idea. Both thought that it would not be, because Sharon, as a Knesset member, has parliamentary immunity. It was true that immunity was not all encompassing, but both lawyers had serious reservations that my suit would be allowed to be pursued. Moreover, they really didn't think it was worth pursuing, although both were willing to take the case if I insisted. I took their advice and dropped the matter.

On June 2, the same day of the Peres farewell dinner, Akiva Eldar, the political correspondent of the Haaretz--now here in Washington as that newspaper's correspondent--wrote the following short story:

"US Ambassador to Israel, Samuel Lewis, considered filing a libel suit against Minister Sharon and had consulted a number of lawyers on the issue. Lewis was mainly offended by Sharon's remark calling him a liar as well as Sharon's accusations that Lewis' reports to Washington had damaged US interests and had not been reliable. Lewis thought of filing the suit after he leaves his post, but apparently decided against it when told that Sharon has parliamentary immunity. Lewis leaves his post this week. He returns to Washington and will come back to Israel at year's end to do some research at the Dayan Center. Last night Lewis declined to comment on the libel suit issue."

That was the last installment, almost. On June 9, an article appeared in the New York Times written by Anthony Lewis under the headline "What Lebanon Meant--Force Can Be a Delusion" in which he said, inter alia:

"The story of how General Sharon bullied and deceived his Cabinet colleagues so that he could have his large scale political war has been told before. But a fascinating new account has just come from Samuel W. Lewis, who is retiring after years of distinguished service as American Ambassador to Israel. Mr. Lewis said that in December, 1981, six months before the invasion, General Sharon described his ambitious war plans to US diplomats who were dumb-founded by the political concept and considered it unthinkable. When General Sharon denied the Ambassador's account, the State Department took the pointed step (?), stating that 'Mr. Lewis had spoken with complete accuracy'. This history is highly relevant today because Ariel Sharon is. One might have expected the man with the futile deaths of 654 Israeli soldiers on his conscience to fade from the political scene, but Sharon is not faded. And the philosophy he expounds, force as a political solution, is very much alive..." The rest of the story is in the same vein.

That, I believe, is enough about Sharon and Lewis--perhaps already too much. But my relationships with the General do provide an interesting footnote to history.

Q: I believe it would be useful if you could describe the peculiar and unique situation of the Consulate General in Jerusalem, which operates independently of the Embassy in Tel Aviv. That situation has I believe on occasions caused some difficulties.

LEWIS: The Consulate General in Jerusalem is a unique story in American diplomatic history. It had been established before the State of Israel came into being; it was founded in the 1840s and had been maintained through the Turkish and British dominion over Palestine. It became a well established center of American activity in the region. The Principal Officer was usually an Arab specialist. When Israel was founded in 1948, an American embassy was established in Tel Aviv. For the following thirty years, there was considerable tension between the Embassy and the Consulate General. The C.G. was never under the formal jurisdiction of the Embassy for diplomatic reasons. The US has never recognized, and does not do so today, the de jure Israeli sovereignty over Jerusalem. Our position has always been that we will not do so until the parties in the dispute agree on the final status of the city. The State Department always believed that the Consulate General had to be maintained as a separate consular and reporting entity. The CG is responsible for providing consular services in the city of Jerusalem and its environs; it is also responsible for reporting on and maintaining contacts with the Palestinians living in the West Bank. The Embassy in Tel Aviv, at least until now, maintained responsibilities for activities in the Gaza Strip, which became an occupied territory in 1967. So the US government has divided the responsibility for dealing with Palestinians with the Gazians relating to the Embassy while the West Bank and Jerusalem inhabitants have been the responsibility of the CG in Jerusalem.

When I arrived in Israel in 1977, the tradition for many years had been one of great hostility and arms-length relationship between the two American establishments. That attitude was particularly acute as it impacted on the personal relationship between the Ambassador and the Consul General. I am told that in the 1950s and 1960s, the Consul General would not permit the Ambassador to visit Jerusalem without his permission. The CG also prohibited the Ambassador to fly the American flag in the limousine once the car had crossed the city limits. It was the CG's position that once the Ambassador had crossed that line he was "no longer in Israel". This position was maintained in the face of the fact that much of the Israeli government was headquartered in Jerusalem which of course required frequent visits by Embassy officials to the city. By the 1970s and 1980s, the whole Israeli government, except the Defense Ministry was located in Jerusalem. Over the years, the tensions between the principals and their staffs did not diminish. There are a lot of stories about the animosities between the two American establishments. I must say that when I arrived in Israel, the relationship was not nearly as bad as I had been led to believe. But there were still "territorial" disputes and some tensions. We had a very good Consul General, Mike Newlin, in 1977. Mike was an Arabist who had a great affinity for the Palestinian cause. He was also a very disciplined and able officer, which brought some objectivity to the situation. The Israelis had always deeply resented that the Consul General did not report to the Ambassador in Tel Aviv and worst of all, had no official relationship with the National Israeli government. The sole exception to that rule was on consular matters where the CG and the Consular Section of the Israeli Foreign Ministry had continuing contacts. That was a function essentially of Israeli policy. Since we didn't recognize the de jure status of the Israeli government in Jerusalem, it did not recognize the official existence of our Consulate General, although, as I said, there were contacts on certain matters. And, of course, the Consul General and his staff dealt regularly with the Mayor of Jerusalem and other municipal officials. Other Israeli officials never set foot in the Consulate General building or the private home of the Consul General. They never attended his Fourth of July reception; in fact, I am not sure that after a while the CG even invited them. So there were continuing tensions between the Israeli government and the CG. The Foreign Ministry was quite suspicious of the activities of the CG; they viewed our representation in Jerusalem as a nest of PLO supporters who were conspiring with the Palestinians against the welfare of the Jewish state. The fact that the CG didn't report to the Embassy heightened that suspicion.

I worked very hard throughout my whole tour to get this problem under control. I believe I had considerable success and I am very proud of what we accomplished. Essentially, I took the view that both establishments were representing the US government; we took the same orders from Washington from the same policy makers. I firmly believed that we needed to work together; we needed to exchange information. In some cases, I thought that joint Embassy-CG messages to Washington were appropriate. Above all, I felt strongly that the two staffs and their leaders had to collaborate as professionals and could not let the bureaucratic rivalries that had existed in the past interfere with the achievement of US goals. I understood that we might hear different versions of the same story: we in Tel Aviv would hear then Israeli point of view whereas the Consulate General would hear the Palestinian version. That fact of life should not inhibit us from pursuing US government policy. I think this approach worked quite well. From the beginning, I thought that the key to close team work was a respect that the Ambassador and the Consul General had for each other. If in addition they liked each other and might even be friends that would have added another dimension. So the CG and I talked frequently over the phone and in fact saw each other personally quite often. That brought the staffs closer together and they were able to work with each other reasonably well. I cultivated the relationship and Mike Newlin welcomed it. He was very gracious. I began the practice of trying to stop at the Consulate General as often as I could while I was in Jerusalem. I would then spend some time discussing issues with Mike and later on with his successors, Brandon Grove, Wat Cluverius and Maury Draper. I am not sure that my efforts were ground breaking, but I do believe that I had more contacts with the CG than had my predecessors. I invited the Consul General -- I urged him -- to come to our weekly staff meeting in Tel Aviv which he frequently did. That was helpful because it enabled some of my staff to hear the CG's views first hand. He found the visits helpful both for substantive and administrative reasons; we provided considerable administrative support for the CG. For example, we handled the CG's budgetary matters since it didn't have a full time B&F officer. The regional security officer, stationed in Tel Aviv, provided services to the CG.

As time passed, certain issues would arise which would engender concerns in one establishment or another. Typically, those tensions rose either between political or the administrative sections, but I found that we were able to minimize the frictions as long as the principals could maintain frequent communications. I urged all of my staff to be remember that in the Embassy-CG relationship, we were the giant in size and much closer to the Israeli government so that we could deal with issues that often frustrated the CG. So when the CG had a problem with the Israeli government as it frequently did, its only recourse was to get the Embassy involved on its side.

The issues most often dealt with travel in the occupied territories or consular matters or picture taking. We were the only American establishment that could represent the CG in its relationships with the Israeli government. Eventually the CG got the Israeli military government to at least talk to it about consular cases. There were a lot of American citizens living in the West Bank; some invariably would become involved with the military government often about anti-Israel activities. These citizens had the right to US representation. So over a period of time, the working relationships between the Embassy and the CG became closer, even though it increased our workload as the sole recognized representatives to the Israeli government.

I also decided upon my arrival in Tel Aviv that it was extremely important that I have an important role in the selection of the Consul General. That had to be done on an informal basis by means of my network in Washington. I can honestly say that I had a major role in the selection of Grove and all his successors. I wanted to make sure that the Consul General would be someone who would carry on and perhaps even enhance the cooperation that Mike Newlin and I had engendered. It just happened, therefore, that all of the CGs that followed Newlin were old friends of mine. So I was pleased with the evolving cooperation between the Embassy and the Consulate General. The basic problem still exists and will always exist until there is some resolution of the Jerusalem problem. It is a crazy organizational relationship, but it is manageable. It is unheard of elsewhere that an Embassy is not located in the same city that is viewed as the capital by the host country.

Another ingredient that improved the teamwork between the Embassy and the Consulate General during my tour was the long series of visits by Secretaries of State, starting with Vance in the pre-Camp David period. There were also frequent visits by the special emissaries. Habib particularly, while the principal Middle East peace negotiator, was coming to and leaving Israel almost every other day. He shuttled between Beirut and Jerusalem. It became very inconvenient for me to drive to Jerusalem so often. Part of my staff was essentially relocated to Jerusalem to support the peace process. The Embassy, historically, had leased a suite in the King David Hotel for the use of the Ambassador and senior Embassy officials who had to spend nights in Jerusalem; it was also used as an office when necessary. But the Habib shuttle was so intense that a suite was just not adequate. We were forced to use the Consulate General's facilities, particularly his communications channels. Mike, Brandon, Wat, and Maury cooperated fully and we began to use the Consulate General as a second set of offices whenever we had official visitors who needed government support. We would hold meetings in the CG, often in its secure area. We would use its secure telephone to communicate with Washington so that we wouldn't have to drive back to Tel Aviv every time we wanted to talk to Washington. We sent cables from the CG, although the top of the message made it clear that the text came from the Embassy or from Habib. In this way, the Consul General became involved, and sometimes members of his staff, in the peace process. That made them a part of the team which under previous situations they would not have been allowed. The CGs made substantive contributions and brought another dimension to bear on our deliberations. This practice became well established and as far as I know, still prevails today. In any case, during my period in Israel, the new involvement of the CG made considerable difference to the collaboration between the American establishments in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. So today, even though the Consulate General is an independent operation not under the control of the US Ambassador to Israel -- as would be true in all other countries -- there developed a de facto team operation much of the time I was in Israel.

Q: I wanted to also ask you about your impressions of Aaron Yariv and Teddy Kollek.

LEWIS: They were both close friends. General Yariv died a few months ago. I knew him well, although I knew Teddy Kollek better. I regard Teddy and his wife Tamar as very close friends of Sallie's and mine to this day. Both Yariv and Kollek are examples of the best of Israeli society and leadership of an earlier generation. Yariv, who had been the Director of Military Intelligence for a number of years going back to before the Six Day War, was the most successful of all Directors. He survived in that job without ever becoming involved in a lot of difficulties, which was no easy task. After he retired from the Army, he became an informal advisor to the government. He was a very balanced, moderate, serious and sensible gentleman. He impressed every one who knew him with his sound judgement; his advice was always dependable. His military record was very distinguished, but I will always remember him as being a very fine human being. Sometime after his retirement, he came to the conclusion that Israel needed some kind of strategic policy think tank, separate from the government. Such did not exist in Israel at the time. There were a couple of research institutes -- one at Tel Aviv University and one at Hebrew University -- but they did not deal with strategic policy issues. They were essentially academic research institutes. So Yariv decided to build an institution somewhat analogous to the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. That became the model. He raised the necessary funds by himself in the United States and managed to collect a fairly substantial endowment. Then he went to Tel Aviv University and asked them whether they wanted to be the host institution for his new center. He made it quite clear that the new center would have to remain independent because he didn't want it to become another academic institution. He wanted his center to be perceived by the government and other segments of Israeli society as a solid base for policy research whose output had relevance to current problems and the Israeli decision making process. After very difficult negotiations, he managed to convince Tel Aviv University to give the new center its independence. I believe that that center has become one of the ornaments of Israeli society. Yariv, after having launched the center successfully and having headed it for a number of years, was on the verge of retiring when he had an automobile accident and a stroke at the same time. He never recovered from these two afflictions and died a few months later. I always will regard him as a good friend and, as I said, an outstanding example of an Israeli military generation which created the IDF and brought it to a very high state of professionalism. I met him first in 1977 when he came to see me as a member of a group which was forming a new party, the Democratic Movement for Change, led by General Yigal Yadin, Israel's most famous archeologist, as well as the IDF's first Chief of Staff. He had retired from the Army many years earlier, but he now launched the first major "third" party. Yariv became active in that party and that is how we met; we remained good friends for the rest of his life.

Kollek was the mayor of Jerusalem for my whole tour. He was MR. JERUSALEM. We became very fond of the Kolleks, Teddy and Tamar. They are very fond of my wife Sallie. We took every opportunity to be together with them, even though Jerusalem was officially not under my jurisdiction. I had admired Teddy from afar for a long time. I felt fortunate that I could work with him, closely on several occasions, on some of the trickier aspects of the our Jerusalem policy, which he very much resented. He did not like that we would not recognize all of Jerusalem as Israel's capital. He made his displeasure eminently clear by never going to the Consulate General's Fourth of July parties. Historically, the CG had two parties: one in east Jerusalem, where we had a branch office, and one for west Jerusalem. During Wat Cluverius' tenure, Kollek succeeded in having the CG host only one Fourth of July event, for both the east and west Jerusalemers. When that happened, Kollek attended as a symbolic act of his approval for the CG's new approach. I think Teddy is one of the great heroes of his generation. He made Jerusalem a different city. He raised funds for it abroad. He did everything a mayor could do to foster an atmosphere of peaceful coexistence between the Jewish and the Palestinian communities. He of course could not solve the basic political issue, but Jerusalem, as it is today, is a memorial to Teddy Kollek. The city's budget would never have been adequate to fund any of the modernization projects that Kollek built. He developed new parks, new schools, new clinics, all funded by the Jerusalem Foundation which was the recipient of all the funds that Teddy raised privately abroad. He was crusty and some people often found him difficult to get along with because he was always outspoken. He called as he saw them without reference to diplomatic niceties, which he might have learned during his early career during and after the War of Independence as an intelligence agent and diplomat. He had been the right hand man to Ben Gurion for many years. I am sure that, if he had chosen national politics, he could have become a serious candidate for the Prime Ministership. I am not sure how a Kollek regime would have fared. He didn't enjoy party politics. In the 1970s, he decided that he would devote himself to Jerusalem, although he never abandoned his allegiance to the Labor Party. He was a close friend and ally of Shimon Peres throughout his career. That fact may also have dissuaded him from pursuing a national stage which might have been put in competition with Peres. I remember that sometime in 1988, after I had left US government service, I had returned to Israel for a visit. We had dinner with Kollek during that trip; he was then in his late 70s. This was a period during which the Labor Party was in great difficulties. The peace process had stalled; Peres' fortunes were declining. He and Rabin were at sword points; Shamir and the Likud were very much in ascendancy. Teddy told me that evening that he thought that he might have made a mistake in not becoming a candidate for Prime Minister because the Labor leadership then did not seem up to the challenge. He worried about the future of the country if the Palestinian issue was not resolved and if a peace were not established. But he admitted that by then, he was too old to start in national politics. I am not sure in any case whether he would have succeeded, but we will never know because he had waited too long to consider a run for Prime Minister. We have to remember that he became Mayor first in 1964; twenty-eight years later he ran once too often and was beaten. He knew well before that last election that the time to retire had come. He in fact had announced that he would retire in view of his advanced age, even though he was still maintaining a schedule that a man half his age would find daunting. But he was getting very cranky and his health was beginning to fail him. He felt frustrated and limited by his advancing years. The trouble was that his own "Independent Jerusalem" party had no readily available successor; like so many other great men; Teddy could never bring himself to groom a successor. He tried a couple and then dumped them. The same thing happen to de Gaulle, Churchill, Roosevelt and many others. They don't want to consider that age will catch with them and that the world will have to go on without them. That thought was too threatening. Kollek didn't either, so there was not anyone from his party that had a chance to win the election. The Likud had fielded a younger, very attractive candidate, Ehud Olmert. Peres particularly and Rabin also pleaded with Teddy repeatedly to run for office because he was the only who could hold the city against the right wing at a very delicate moment in the peace process. They were concerned that if a right wing candidate won, he would bring the religious conservatives with him and that the hard won comity that existed in Jerusalem would be lost. Kollek weakened under the flattery and the pressure; he ran and was beaten badly. It was a terrible way for his career to end. Many of his friends abandoned him; many didn't vote at all because they agreed with him that he was too old. So they just abstained. Peres and Rabin bear some of the responsibility, but Kollek was their only hope to keep hold of Jerusalem. Teddy left office very dejected and somewhat irked, having devoted nearly thirty years to Jerusalem as mayor. He is still very active today trying to find ways to help the city, although his successor is not being very gracious and receptive. He is slowly, but surely, pushing Kollek out of the picture in a way that he certainly does not deserve.

Q: Kollek was one of the first people to warn Washington about Philby, the British spy. He had known Philby in Vienna. He knew that the first Mrs. Philby was a member of the Communist Party. He warned people in Washington to be careful about Philby. His advice was not heeded sufficiently.

LEWIS: I guess I had heard that story. Kollek, of course, had very close contacts with the CIA and the State Department because, as I mentioned, his early career was in intelligence work. He was the Mossad's (or its predecessor) representative in Washington.

I have never seen any one as good in inspiring groups to support certain causes as Teddy was. His cause was of course Jerusalem. He had lots and lots of friends, particularly in the United States. I benefitted to a certain extent from his wide network because we are both cigar smokers. I used to smoke mine very publicly when I was in Israel. That was well known as one of my traits. Teddy was also known as a cigar lover and received gift boxes of Havana cigars from all over the world as token of admiration. He could never had smoked them all. So he shared his surplus with some of his friends. He always gave me at least once a year and sometimes twice a year a box of Havanas. He continues to remember my addiction and whenever we see each other, he gives me some cigars, although of course his supply has greatly diminished. That love for cigars was a bond between us in addition to a lot of other attachments.

Jerusalem is littered with monuments to Teddy Kollek's success for raising money. He was very particular about the designs of the buildings that were put up during his tenure. He monitored very closely the investment of the funds that he had collected world-wide. He has left a legacy in Jerusalem that few others leave anywhere. He left his collection of artifacts, which was quite extensive, to the Israel Museum.

Q: I would like to turn for a moment to the group of observers that were stationed in the Sinai passes. You mentioned earlier the unfortunate demise of the head of that unit, Ray Hunt. I would like to know a little more about that program, how it got started and how it operated.

LEWIS: That operation was called the "Multi-National Force and Observers" (MFO). The idea rose from the stalemate that had occurred in the Security Council after the signing of the Egypt-Israel peace treaty. As we drafted that treaty, it was understood that the Israeli would insist that an international force be placed in the buffer zone once they had withdrawn from the Sinai Peninsula. They also insisted that, unlike the UN Peace-keeping Force that existed in Sinai between 1956 and 1967 (UNEF II) and which was withdrawn suddenly at Nasser's insistence, this new force had to be in the Sinai with a firm guarantee that it could not be withdrawn unless both Israel and Egypt agreed. As we drafted the peace treaty, we included a provision providing for a multi-national force of UN peace-keepers. But we were very much aware that the Soviets opposed the Camp David initiative and did not play any role whatsoever in that effort. We thought it very likely that they would veto in the Security Council any proposal to establish such a force. Nevertheless, the treaty calls for a UN peace-keeping force. Because we thought it highly unlikely that the Security Council would approve this provision, we drafted side letters for Carter to provide to Begin and Sadat, assuring them that the U.S. would see to the provision of a multi-national force outside the UN framework, if the Security Council could or would not approve it. As we suspected, the treaty, although widely approved by many countries, never received approval by the UN. That was one of the UN derelictions that have annoyed me since Camp David. The Soviets made it eminently clear that if any resolution relating to the peace treaty were brought before the Security Council, they would veto it. The US, for reasons that I then and now believe were quite erroneous, didn't challenge the Soviets. I always thought it would have been much better to table a resolution of support for the peace treaty, including a mandate for a peace-keeping force, and leave it up to the Soviets to exercise their veto against a very popular agreement. They would have had to accept an international onus for their veto, but the US government decided not to force the issue. So the peace treaty never had a UN blessing until many years later.

Upon signing of the treaty, we started to form a peace-keeping force, outside the UN framework, as we had promised to do. We decided to use a UN force as a model, but to use a somewhat different structure. Michael Sterner, then Deputy Assistant Secretary in NEA, was assigned to lead the negotiations between the three major countries involved: Israel, Egypt and the US. He was supposed to come up with a formula for a multinational force which would satisfy the requirements spelled out in the peace treaty and which would satisfy the Israelis who were the ones that were insisting on a force. Egypt really didn't want a force in Sinai, but Israel would not have signed the treaty without it.

Sterner did an outstanding job of negotiations. I was personally very much involved when the negotiations took place in Israel. I thought he handled himself extremely well. In the final analysis, we established a unique structure, headed by a Director General of the MFO, who was to be headquartered in Rome. That DG was to be an American civilian. He was in many respects the analogue to the UN Secretary General. The international force that was to be present in the Sinai would consist of approximately 3000 people, drawn from a dozen or more nations under the command of a non-American general. It was understood that we would seek for that position someone who had had some experience in leading a multinational force from the NATO command structure. In fact, we chose a Norwegian as the first commander. Each of his successors have been Scandinavians, although none of their troops were involved. The first commander was a brilliant soldier/diplomat. He had been on the NATO staff for a long time and was very skilled in the diplomatic side of his tasks. The major challenge was to get contributions of troops. One of the most important aspects of the negotiations was the agreement we managed to get approved that unlike UN peace-keeping forces which are totally funded by the UN budget, in this case Egypt, Israel and the US would each pay one-third of the costs of the operation. That provided major incentive in keeping costs down. It also was concrete demonstration that the force was being established for the benefit of the two signatories to the peace treaty. It was a formula that I have often argued should be adopted by the UN for all of its peace-keeping operations wherever the benefitting countries can afford it. These forces are established for the benefit of the countries involved and should therefore be supported financially by them, instead of the international community at large. Recently, the UN has taken that approach in one or two cases.

Vance, Hal Saunders, the Assistant Secretary for NEA and Sterner with many other State officials were involved in seeking participants in the force. Initially, we were met with a lot of skepticism even from our best allies, like the British and French. They were very concerned about their participation because the Arab world, except Egypt, had rejected the peace treaty. That raised in their minds the effect of their participation on their relations with Arab countries. They depended to a considerable extent on the oil from the Persian Gulf states as well as their exports to Saudi Arabia; that gave them considerable pause, because they viewed their participation in the multinational force as potentially damaging to their political and economic interests. Carter and Vance had to lean very hard on some of the European governments to contribute their troops.

Christopher was enigmatic. He was highly disciplined, kept to his impossible daily schedule, read his briefing books, listened impatiently to arguments among the senior staff, then adjourned meetings with a few cryptic words intended to have someone else hammer out a consensus on the issue and bring it to him for approval. For a few weeks he seemed to appreciate having my historical perspective on many of the organizational and bureaucratic challenges the new team faced. He obviously valued my advice on Arab-Israeli issues, and I played a key role for 6-8 months in the senior Middle East policy team (with Martin Indyk at the NSC, Ed Djerejian in NEA, and Dennis Ross -- (held over from the Baker era). Chris always treated me with utmost courtesy and personal consideration -- but somehow, as a Policy Planner, I didn't click with him.

By my 63rd birthday (Oct. 1), I was fed up with working 16 hour days with so little positive impact on the Clinton Administration's manifold foreign policy problems. Our Arab-Israel policy was about the only bright spot. I now felt comfortable leaving that in Dennis Ross's hands.

Ambassador Samuel W. Lewis'
Speech at the Dayan Center,
Tel Aviv University
October 30, 1984

Thank you very much Itamar, it is a pleasure indeed to be at the Dayan Center. Moshe Dayan was not only a great statesman and a great hero of this country but also a close friend of mine and that fact has been one of the many things that has enriched the seven and a half years that my wife and I have been privileged to be in Israel.

I want to start with a disclaimer. This is not a speech and not a lecture. It is a series of personal musings about the subject. And it is most emphatically not a statement on behalf of the United States Government. I wouldn't want my government, my president, my friends in Washington to catch any flack from any other government or from ex-administrations for anything that I say this afternoon. I'm here as a seeker after the truth in an effort to give you a personal impression of some of the factors that went into the stalemate that occurred after Camp David in the peace process and unfortunately persists to this present time.

I unfortunately couldn't make the morning session. I've been trying to find out from Elie Rubenstein and others what was said. And you'll have to forgive me if I say something that they've already said. I don't want to rehearse the history and I'm not going to talk much about Camp David itself, though being there was a central experience in my life. I'd like rather to concentrate on what's happened since Camp David and why the promise of the second part of the Camp David agreement dealing with the settlement over the West Bank and Gaza has not prospered.

There really are three separate periods you have to look at though and inevitably we have to mention from time to time a few events in those periods which hinged on the stalemate and ultimately overcame the best efforts of a lot of very dedicated people from all three countries. The first period from 1979 to the end of 1980 was the period of great opportunity, unfortunately, missed opportunity. The period from 1981, the Reagan administration, until the beginning of the Lebanon war was a period in which there were some possibilities of renewing a process which had come close to stalling already and some false dawn. The period since the beginning of the Lebanon war has been a period of really total stalemate with certain events, particularly the launching of President Reagan's initiative of September 1, 1982, adding a certain amount of excitement and turmoil to the diplomatic landscape but not producing movement. Most of the period that is really of interest to me in this afternoon session is the first period.

Beginning with the end of the negotiations for the peace treaty and the signing of that peace treaty in March of 1979 up until the end of the Carter administration, that moment of signing that peace treaty was a period of high hopes and expectations. Certainly the atmosphere that surrounded the treaty signing in Washington was extraordinary. And even here, although it was a bit outweighed, as I recall by the importance of Maccabee's winning the European cup, it still produced quite a bit of excitement. For the period beginning in May of '79 until the end of '80, delegations from the three countries met, adjourned, remet, readjourned, exchanged thousands and thousands and thousands of words of documents of ideas, drafted position papers, ate enormous quantities of food (much to the ill benefit of most of the participants), traveled back and forth between Egypt and Israel and sometimes Europe; and at the end of the Carter administration, Sol Linowitz, who was then our chief negotiator, submitted a very scholarly, lengthy report to President Carter just before he left office on why it had not yet succeeded and what should be done to enable it to succeed in the future. Some of the points that Sol made, I think, in retrospect will stand up rather well historically. But I'm not going to quote him, I'm going to give you my impressions.

There were a whole lot of elements that conspired against success. When the autonomy talks, as they were called, began in May of 1979 at Beersheba with Secretary Vance present during the visit of Anwar Sadat to Beersheba, there was a moment when it seemed that all three delegations believed that these negotiations could be carried out in rather short order. One of the most difficult negotiations around the period of the signing of the peace treaty had to do with the famous joint letter which established the framework for the autonomy talks. That joint negotiated letter from Prime Minister Begin and President Sadat to President Carter dated the 26th of March, the same date as the peace treaty said, inter alia, that the two governments agree to negotiate continuously and in good faith to conclude these negotiations at the earliest possible date and they agreed that the objective is establishment of the self-governing authority in West Bank and Gaza to provide full autonomy to the inhabitants. Egypt and Israel set for themselves the goal of completing the negotiations within one year, and so forth.

That letter as I say, was a tortuous negotiating exercise and ended up basically just restating language from the Camp David agreement. But two of the points became very controversial as time went on because rather than continuous negotiations which were visualized, negotiations were quite episodic. And each government for its own reasons found it necessary after two or three days of convening of delegations to go back home, report to the political bosses, take stock, leak their own versions of what had happened to the press, build political barriers against attacks from local oppositions and lick their wounds.

And then the United States role for the ensuing month or two would generally be to try to find a place to have the next discussion and if possible assist in reaching an agreement on the agenda. It was a totally different negotiating environment, therefore, from the Camp David environment which was described I'm sure this morning: an environment in which about thirty people were locked up literally for thirteen days and nights until they came to agreement and in which there was no contact permitted with the media except through one official spokesman for the conference. That difference in the physical circumstances was I think a factor which led ultimately to the failure to these negotiations. But surely it was only one of many.

At the heart of the problem of this period and indeed perhaps a problem which continues up to the present time was the fact that there was a mutual misperception in the Israeli government and in the Egyptian government. Once again I have to say that this is my personal perception. No one else should be blamed for it. A mutual misperception of the true priority goals of the other side. And this is something which has commented on from time to time here in Israel and in the various memoirs of those who have written already about the period. And it came of course to a head shortly after Camp David.

The Camp David accord itself was the high water mark of bridging between these different priorities. The agreement if you look at it is a mixture. Part of it is a framework for a treaty with Egypt pure and simple. Part of it is a framework of what is close to being a comprehensive approach toward a long term settlement of the Palestinian problem. Though that work comprehensive doesn't appear in the document.

Now my Israeli friends at Camp David and certainly more in the months thereafter, and well into 1980 or '81; I believe that it's fair to say that most of the Israeli statement involved in this exercise were convinced that the portion of the Camp David agreement which dealt with the Palestinian problem was of much less importance to Egypt than the treaty. And then, in fact, many would have said and did say it was merely a cosmetic icing put on the cake of the peace treaty to permit a certain amount of diplomatic rationalization to be made to the Arab world by President Sadat. And one could cite lots of evidence as to why Sadat was not enormously worried personally about the Palestinians.

President Carter, as a matter of fact, in a session in which I was present, made a remark to some of us that after a particularly frustrating discussion of the Palestinian part of the Camp David agreement, said I really don't think that anybody worries at all about the Palestinians except me. And that remark replied both to Sadat and to Begin. And I'm sure it was an exaggeration, but it was the way Carter felt at that moment. Through the period of negotiations before Camp David, during and after, this question of whether Egypt really just wanted its territory back and peace, and the rest of it was what it had to do as a minimum to avoid being attacked too much by other Arab countries bedeviled, I think, the negotiations.

And then on to the other side, there was undoubtedly in Cairo in that period a perception of some confusion about the Israeli priorities. It was clear to the Egyptians that Israel wanted peace - no question about that - and was willing to concede a lot of territory for peace and eventually ceded all of the Sinai for it. There were many Israelis saying that there was a genuine desire to find a new formula for the West Bank and Gaza which could ultimately lead to a permanent settlement. There were others in Egypt who perceived the talk about the West Bank and Gaza and what Israel was prepared to concede on those territories as window dressing - the necessary window dressing to get the Egyptians to agree to the peace treaty. So there was, I think, a mutual misperception on both sides, not wholly resolved to this day.

The second factor which certainly influenced the stalemate was domestic politics. Here, I think the problem was more in Israel than in Egypt, though Egyptian politics is always a bit murkier to penetrate for an outsider. And I have no doubt that Sadat had his own domestic constituency problems. Certainly one of them ultimately led to his assassination. But it was very clear with respect to Israel where a coalition government with a variety of options about the future of the territories was led by a prime minister who had a deep ideological commitment to permanent Israeli control of those territories but who had been led by a difficult negotiating situation for a great objective at Camp David to sign a document which certainly implied and went more than just implication in admitting the possibility that in a final status negotiation, five years hence, it was at least possible that those territories would be transferred to someone else. And it's clear that Prime Minister Begin stretched very hard at Camp David to deal with this contradiction in his own mind and found language which satisfied him with a lot of encouragement from Moshe Dayan and Justice Barach and others to convince him that he could sign a document which left this issue sufficiently ambiguous to satisfy his own conscience.

But once he returned to Israel, he was, I think, truly shocked to discover the strength of opposition in his own party to what he had just signed. All of you remember, I'm sure, the marathon Knesset debate that occurred here just after Camp David. And I saw in Begin often in those days a sense of incredulity that his own loyal supporters in Herut, in particular, would think of rejecting his great work for peace and would not accept on face value his assurances that he would not really compromise any of his ideological principles or theirs. And the final vote, if you recall, while overwhelmingly for the agreement or for the package of agreements, still had a very large number of Begin's own party against him. That fact made, I believe, tremendous impression on him which stuck with him throughout the rest of his peace diplomacy and made him extremely wary in the autonomy negotiations of agreeing to any form for this new concept of autonomy which his own domestic constituents would see as meaning inevitable transfer of territory to Jordan or someone else. And I think it lent an element of rigidity to the Israeli positions during the negotiations which was very difficult for even the most skillful negotiators to overcome.

Equally complicating from the domestic political side was the coalition nature of the negotiating team. And here I will touch on the next factor which is one that I would call the choice of negotiators. In a strange way all three governments made, in retrospect, questionable decisions about their negotiators and their negotiating style. And I wouldn't spare my own government from this by any means. In the Israeli case, it was clear that the dominant personality in the Israeli delegation at Camp David, intellectually, and the one with the greatest influence over the outcome was Moshe Dayan. Certainly Barach and Weizman played important roles, but I think all those there would agree that it was Dayan's own ideas and restless intellect which pushed the process forward time and time again at Camp David and before it and afterward in the peace treaty negotiations at Camp Madison, as the hotel was then called in Washington by the Israeli delegates. Suddenly, however, just as the great triumph of the peace treaty has been signed and one is gearing up to launch these pivotal autonomy negotiations, the foreign minister who was indeed in many respects a key architect of the treaty, learned that he would not be directing the negotiations for the autonomy talks, but that instead, for reasons ostensibly of coalition political requirements, there would be a six-man ministerial negotiating team headed by Dr. Burg. Of course, Dayan would be a member. Well, anybody who knew Dayan probably could have anticipated the outcome. And he himself told me before he died that he took that as a sign that there would be no autonomy agreement. And he had no desire to be a part of that kind of negotiating structure feeling it was unworkable. And indeed it proved to be almost unworkable, though not quite. And that's not to say anything critical of the individuals who were on the ministerial team, who were hardworking and loyal and often creative. But that kind of structure meant that when the Israeli delegation went to a conference, three or four or five ministers all had to be there to speak for the delegation and watch each other. And when they came back from the conference, that group had to struggle with inter-coalition politics about, not the principles of the negotiation, which were well laid out by the cabinet in advance, but all of the details. And I think this fact really hampered the Israeli negotiators in taking advantage of openings and moments when some Egyptian flexibility would fleetingly appear.

On the Egyptian side and the Israeli side as well, and here I really do demonstrate one of my biases, and to some extent on the American side, though less so, there were too many lawyers. Now you got to have lawyers at international negotiations. The American delegation at Camp David did not have a lawyer, except Cyrus Vance, who is an international lawyer of some repute, but we didn't have anybody else. The Israelis had several, the Egyptians were almost all lawyers. But President Sadat was not and neither was President Carter. And I would submit that with this kind of negotiation it's all too easy to allow the lawyers to dominate the policies, unless you're very careful on the roles they're assigned. And I think this seemed to be the case in the autonomy talks from both Egyptian and Israeli sides.

The negotiations moved from a beginning of concentrating on broad principle and became immersed within a matter of weeks in infinite detail - legal detail about how this autonomous entity would be administered, down to great levels of precision, the kind of precision that a city council might have to consider in lining up its own duties. The lawyers contributed, I think, to that trend, though they didn't create it. Perhaps what created it was a difference in style between the Egyptians and Israelis and a difference in purpose about the negotiation itself.

If one can go back for a moment to the Isma'iliya conference, a bilateral conference in which we were not involved, just after Sadat's visit here, it was clear at that conference that Sadat gave a lot of evidence to the Israelis for this thesis that all he really wanted was a general statement of principles to deal with the West Bank and Gaza that would permit him to go ahead and negotiate his own peace treaty and let the Palestinians and the Jordanians come in and do the detail work on the autonomy program. He didn't want to get too deeply involved in that. Unfortunately, at Isma'iliya and at subsequent conferences before Camp David, that concept of a broad framework of principles gradually changed to an increasing insistence on great specificity in detail as to how precisely autonomy would function once inaugurated. And the further we got into those details, the further we were away from reaching any agreement.

Why was that? I think for two reasons: The primary one was another factor which was one of the great flaws and perhaps the fundamental flaw in the design of these negotiations. And that is that Egypt, in the absence of Jordan, and in the absence of any Palestinian representatives, took upon itself to speak for the Palestinians in these negotiations. And yet it became very clear early in the negotiations that the Egyptians at that time at least had very little direct knowledge of or understanding of the factors on the ground in the territories, what the territories were really like, after a dozen years of Israeli occupation. And they were very wary, the Egyptians, of getting into detail because they felt uncomfortable; they might agree to something which would jeopardize Palestinian rights without realizing it and put themselves open to tremendous attack subsequently from the other Arabs.

On the other hand, the Israeli delegation understandably, the more they thought about what autonomy might mean and the more Begin's rather generalized concept which he presented first to President Carter and then to President Sadat in December of '79, the more the staffs in the Ministry of Defense and the Foreign Ministry in particular, began to look into the fine print of how the territories operate today, in economic terms and security terms, development terms, legal terms, they began to find more and more and more problems with autonomy as a concept. And, inevitably, they tried to pin down as specifically as possible all of the possible alternative pitfalls that one could imagine for Israel's security coming out of this negotiation. So as the Israelis got more and more interested in detail, the Egyptians, hemmed in by their lack of any other Arab participant and nervous about representing those Palestinians in absentia, became more and more rigid about dealing with those precise details.

I mentioned another factor a moment ago, the personalities of negotiators. I've mentioned the political problem that the style of ministerial team negotiation adopted by the Israelis presented. I think from the American point of view we had a different problem. Our first chief negotiator, Bob Strauss, had just completed an extraordinary tour de force, negotiating an international trade agreement and getting it through the Congress unanimously, one of the best pieces of diplomacy and politics that anybody has done in the United States for a long time, and President Carter turned to Bob Strauss as a highly successful negotiator with a lot of political smarts and close to him personally as his representative. Bob Strauss had never been near the Middle East before and admitted it and he didn't want the job, but he accepted it as a loyal servant of the Administration. But I think it did not take him, and it certainly didn't take me, more than about fifteen minutes of exposure to him in his environment to realize that he was really ill-suited for the particular kind of subtle third party mediation that this required from the United States. He tried a lot of his negotiating devices which had been honed on dealing with the Japanese and the Germans on trade matters and in Texas politics and they just didn't work in this environment. There was a real cultural problem between Bob and the Middle East and I think he would admit it if he were here today. Almost from the minute he took the job he was conspiring to get out of it and it took him about six months to manage that.

He was replaced by Sol Linowitz, a very distinguished lawyer and a man of great subtlety and formality and dignity. And, incidentally, Bob Strauss' informality, which was very effective in domestic U.S. politics, proved to be something of a drawback in dealing with the more formal Egyptians and certainly rather formal Israelis. Sol Linowitz had I think, and has, the personal qualifications and the personal style that could have made him a very effective and successful mediator for the United States in this tri-partite strange kind of negotiations.

Here the problem was not style but timing, and this comes to the question of timing, which I believe was crucial in the ultimate stalemate. There was a sense that this was do-able after the peace treaty. There was a lot of political momentum, there was a real commitment from Begin, Sadat and Carter. Unfortunately, the negotiations began in a rather leisurely mode and went on in a rather leisurely mode for six or eight months, and I remember getting instructions during that period to try to go in and convince our friend here that time was a wasting asset and that we should step up the pace and have more meetings and get past the formalities and do away with the opening statements and get down to work. And I got very polite stalls, the same kind of reaction in Cairo.

We the Americans did have a sense of worry about the timing, but in retrospect we didn't have nearly enough of a worry. And it was precisely this period of the first three or four months when the international environment was accepting of this kind of negotiation, when the momentum from Camp David was running, when you had a smell of victory around this process, that in retrospect we had the opportunity. I believe today that if we had to do it over again, and knew what we know now, which unfortunately history never gives you that opportunity, we could reach agreement on that autonomy package in four months, starting from where we were starting in May of 1979. By the time Sol Linowitz took the job, the time factor had turned very much against us. In the first place, what seemed like a sensible period of one year for this negotiation, now suddenly seemed very short, only a few months left. I remember Cy Vance tried to convince both the Egyptians and the Israelis not to put a time limit in this letter. He said, "I've had experience with this kind of thing and a time limit comes back to haunt you." And indeed it did come back to haunt us because as Linowitz got pretty much involved in high gear in early 1980, already enough troubling events had occurred to change the psychology surrounding the negotiation and the suspicions surrounding that target date began to rise almost geometrically, suspicions that we, either we Egyptians or we Israelis, are going to be pressured by you Americans to make some unwise and dangerous concessions in order to get done within a year, and those suspicions began to make the positions of the parties more rigid rather than less.

It's true also that time had begun to divert the attention of the American Administration. President Carter had been devoting for two years at this point an extraordinary amount of personal energy to the Middle East Peace Process, something more than any other president has ever done or, I suspect, ever will do. But beginning with the invasion of Afghanistan and, more importantly of course, the hostage crisis in Iran, his Administration in 1980 began to be more and more and more sucked into a preoccupation with these other issues, particularly the hostage crisis which ultimately, as we all know, probably was the deciding factor in his defeat in the November elections. So while we kept up a lot of diplomatic energy throughout 1980, I have to say that our President's weight in the equation was diminished, and given the crucial factor he played at Camp David itself, that certainly was an element in the ultimate stalemate.

I have also touched on the problem of the press, and I'd like to come back to it now, and it's not only the press I want to mention as factors in this stalemate, certainly I don't want to give it more importance than it deserves. One should put it this way I think, that the nature of the structure of this negotiation, very public, moving from one country to another, episodic, with a lot of time between meetings to debate endlessly in the press every aspect of the negotiation itself, removed substantially what flexibility there was for the diplomats to use in the closed doors of the diplomacy behind the scenes. And, moreover, a series of external events certainly impinged on the politics of both countries and further complicated, I think, the efforts of the diplomatic actors. For example, one only has to recall that as one got passed this one year deadline in April, early May really of 1980, without reaching agreement, and the last meetings before that deadline were very acrimonious, there were such unfortunate, extraneous factors which impinged on the attitudes of the Israeli Government toward the United States and the Egyptian Government toward Israel, and the U.S. Government toward Israel. Events such as President Carter's now quite famous change of the vote in the U.N. Security Council in mid-spring of 1980, a mistake about the wording which led to great embarrassment for him and great distrust, I might say, here. The introduction by one of the members of the Knesset in May 14, 1980, of the quite superfluous Jerusalem bill which set the Egyptians' teeth on edge and produced a period of several weeks of angry debate about Jerusalem which was really quite irrelevant to the current negotiating climate but succeeded in poisoning that climate very substantially just at the moment when the autonomy talks were at a stage of considerable delicacy.

You will recall that in May of 1980 there were the tragic events in Hebron of the shooting of the Yeshiva students followed by the expulsion of the mayors and subsequently of the bombing of the mayors. All of that period certainly contributed from the outside to the feelings of distrust and drawing back on the part of the Egyptians from risking going to an agreement with Israel under these circumstances, risking in its own sense its position with other Arab nations. And there were a lot of other external events later which are perhaps best forgotten. But the historians, I think, will read this interaction between the external world and the room of the negotiators as being one of the major issues which cause negotiations to fail. Surely any negotiations which drags on for eighteen months without success is going to be plagued by external factors in this region. It's too volatile an area. That's why in retrospect we should have made far greater efforts to do it three months before the external world could come to bear in all of its hoary detail.

There are a couple of other factors that I think I will mention just in passing, which I do think affected the stalemate: one was the fact that, while it was true that both governments put a lot of emphasis on these negotiations, it was also true that all three governments, and I certainly associate my own, were determined that nothing would throw that treaty off course, and that the provisions for withdrawal under the treaty and exchange of ambassadors and the panoply of peace between Egypt and Israel, the concrete achievement that had been gained, would not be lost. There were moments along the way when, in order not to ruffle the Egyptian feathers or the Israeli feathers in a way which could interfere with the delicate progress up to the final moment of the treaty implementation, I think we drew back from pressing a compromise formula which had good chances of achievement and I think the Egyptians and the Israelis also treated their interlocutors with excessive tenderness, both of them preoccupied with the implementation of the treaty.

Another factor which it seems to me ran all through this period is the problem of cultural gap between the two Israeli and Egyptian societies. Many of you are much greater experts on this than I am. I can only tell you from personal experience, I spent an enormous amount of time, over three years, explaining, or trying to explain Egyptian behavior to Israeli negotiators and my colleagues in Cairo did the reverse, never very successfully, and it didn't matter really, seemingly, whether they were in direct contact with each other or not, they were still misunderstanding each other just as consistently face to face as they had been at long distance. And much of the U.S. role was pacification and interpretation of cultural sensitivities to one party or the other. I'm convinced, as I've said this in other forums here, that there is something intrinsic to Arab society which makes it very difficult, and I'm told it comes out of ancient Beduin traditions. Very difficult to negotiate give and take, face to face, on an issue of national honor or personal honor. You must use intermediaries to deal with these issues in Arab society and then once an agreement is reached, you have a very fancy reunion and you slaughter a sheep and you accept the result that has already been reached. But you don't really negotiate about a matter of honor directly with your adversary because to make a concession to him directly is a great loss of face to you as an individual and you can afford to make concessions only to someone else who will convey it to your adversary.

Now I can give you many different examples how this played out in these negotiations but I'll just cite one. I remember very vividly in Herzliyya at the Sharon Hotel, we were having one round of the autonomy negotiations, everybody was eating together, talking together, Ministers from both sides were there and by this time they had become quite good friends, they had been seeing one another for the better part of two years off and on and they really liked each other as individuals. We sat down to formal sessions, each would make their formal statements, there would be no sign of give and take, give and take amounted to restatement of positions with a little more bellicosity from both sides, then you would adjourn and each would go back to his own rooms and Sol Linowitz would scurry back and forth from one room to the other, talking first to one then the other. So in what was ostensibly a direct negotiation, progress was made in what we now call proximity talks model. And this is the kind of microcosm, it seems to me, of a cultural problem which we had seen also in the Lebanese negotiations, a very parallel circumstance back in 1983, and I suspect will continue to dog Israeli problems of negotiations with Arabs so long as those negotiations continue.

I think that there are undoubtedly a lot of other factors that bogged us down in those years but certainly after 1981 there were some important new ones. And the biggest new one was President Carter was defeated and then later in 1981 President Sadat was shot. And I think no one can underestimate this point. These three men went through hell to reach the Camp David Agreement and each of them made great sacrifices and took great risks in his own mind to sign that document. And Carter also took great risks and won temporary political gain for it. They had a personal stake in it, they had convinced themselves it could be done and then they began to leave the stage. Moreover, in our case, President Reagan came in with no stake in that success of his predecessor's administration and with a rather different view of the world, that I gather was well described this morning by Professor Spiegel, so I won't touch on that, but I think it's quite relevant that the Reagan Administration looked at the Middle East very differently than the Carter Administration; looked at it much more in east/west terms and strategic alliances against Soviet alliances terms. They never repudiated Camp David, in fact Secretary Shultz when he took office in the summer of '82 knew very little about Camp David and was very skeptical about it. A few months ago he said to me and he's said to a number of people since: "You know, I have read and re-read the Camp David Agreement, and now each time I read it I realize what a document, what a work of genius it really was." But they didn't come into office thinking that way, certainly Al Haig didn't and Shultz didn't either when he took over. So our Administration had less fervent, emotional commitment to complete the Camp David process, though they certainly adopted it and saw in general the virtues of not allowing it to die.

But there were a lot of other things that happened in 1981 that really put the "kibosh" on this whole game, and I think probably the most significant of all was the so-called "Ofira, Osiraq, double-cross." You all will remember that with great difficulty Prime Minister Begin succeeded in getting Sadat to come to a summit meeting in Ofira on June 5, 1981 and their purpose was to renew the momentum and the spirit of the negotiations. Two days later the Iraqi reactor was bombed and I gather from my Egyptian contacts and from those of you who know lots of Egyptians, that there is no one in Egypt, and perhaps nowhere in the Arab world, who will ever believe that this wasn't a deliberate attempt to set Sadat up for involvement in and psychological tying to the Israeli action. I don't believe that but I'll just tell you that there are too many Arabs that do and it left a sensitivity in Egypt to a wariness about summits, which incidentally still exists.

There were other advances of that summer and certainly as the summer wore on there was a brief flowering for a moment of hope when there was yet another summit at Alexandria. And Sadat and Begin went back to the idea of a broad principles document which they had abandoned in the course of these negotiations long since. As a result of that summit we held one more ministerial level autonomy conference and it was interesting to me particularly because Roy Atherton, then our Ambassador in Cairo and I were the two co-delegates for the United States, we having at that time no special U.S. negotiator. And at that ministerial meeting in Cairo we came some distance toward agreeing on a document of general principles. Whether it would have amounted to anything ultimately I can't say, but there was a renewal of some hope and progress though a great scepticism remained on both sides, and then of course, just a few days later on October 6, Sadat was assassinated.

By the end of the year, though the formalities went on, the game was really over. And it's certainly true that throughout the rest of '81 and the first half of '82 Egyptian-Israeli relations were dominated by carrying out the final withdrawal, the tragedy of Yammit which we all had to witness on television or in person, soured the atmosphere here toward Egypt and toward the peace, and soured the Egyptian attitude toward the Israeli government in very significant ways. Yet, once withdrawal was completed in 1982 there was a brief final flowering between the end of April and the beginning of June, and those many normalization agreements which had been signed back in 1980 began to come to life again and there were exchanges of delegations planned and the beginnings of new trade agreements, all of which withered and died in the bright pitiless sun of the Israeli move into Lebanon in early June.

The Reagan initiative on September 1 was a genuine effort to recreate momentum, to relaunch the Camp David agreement, with some embellishments, but fundamentally on the same terms. The timing was, in my judgment, abysmal, the tactics of its presentation worse, and the outcome so far, nil.

In conclusion, I would say that there are a lot of mistakes implicit in this record for all three countries. And I won't try to recapitulate all of them. I think you can infer from my remarks what I think some of the mistakes were. But I would say for each of us there was one over-riding misjudgment. For the Egyptians, I think there was a very great overriding misjudgment when Sadat said, "Well, Hussein, you won't come and join," parenthetically it's not surprising he wouldn't come and join because Sadat had persuaded him and President Carter, I guess, in different ways that it was best that Jordan not be present -- it would be too difficult to reach agreement if they were there. It probably would have been too. But the fact that he wasn't there and had no signature on that document made it difficult to persuade him later to accept Camp David as his framework though we tried very hard. In any case, when it didn't happen, Sadat said, "I will take on responsibility for the Arab side of this negotiation." That was a terrible fundamental error if you wanted to succeed. In retrospect it's very clear. The Egyptians were hamstrung when they took that role without having any Palestinians or Jordanians at their sides, and the Reagan initiative is certainly intended to remedy that mistake.

I think Israel's overriding misjudgment was the one I've already suggested. I believe that most Israeli actors for a long time believed that what to Egypt was a choice of peace, and a peace which would make Egypt able to bridge between Israel and the Arab world and would enable Egypt to take the lead in resolving the Palestinian problem -- too many Israelis thought that that choice of peace was a choice of Israel as a strategic ally against the Arab world. That's an overstatement, but I would submit not too exaggerated a view of many Israelis after Camp David and during these years we've been discussing. I think that's an illusion which is now dispelled, but a lot of water has gone over the dam.

On our side, we had at least three major mistakes and probably a lot of others. I've suggested we mismanaged and misunderstood the importance of time and urgency, though we understood it better than the other two partners. We made some weak, or incorrect decisions in negotiating style, personalities, hesitance in pushing some of our ideas which both parties, we believe in retrospect, wanted us to push. And finally I think, we perhaps tried to play this role of honest broker, mediator, catalyst, participant, partner, whatever you'd want to describe it -- we wanted to play it only with carrots.

JAMES H. BAHTI
Sinai Field Mission
Sinai (1978-1979)

James H. Bahti was born in Michigan in 1923. He graduated from Michigan Tech with a B.S. degree in engineering in 1948. Subsequently, he received a M.A. and a Ph.D. from the University of Michigan. Mr. Bahti entered the Foreign Service in 1955, serving in Germany, Egypt, India, and Saudi Arabia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990

Q: You then had sort of a different assignment, the Sinai Field Mission, from 1978 to 1979.

BAHTI: I was supposed to go out there for a two year tour and my wife was supposed to live in Jerusalem, which she did. She was finishing up her work as a nurse in the Department of State. I knew Ray Hunt, I was interviewed for the job. He said that if I could come out right away I could be his deputy. Well, I really had not planned to leave right then, but that was the condition and so I left my wife at home with the house, the packing, the whole schmeer. It was kind of a dirty trick, but it was an interesting job working between the Israelis and Egyptians. In some respects it was a non-job since the director's job and my job in total was perhaps a job and a half. There was a lot of make work stuff, a lot of reporting which even then seemed kind of silly. Camel reports and Bedouin sightings.

Q: Camel reports meant?

BAHTI: You saw so many camels. And camels usually meant people. Boredom was the biggest problem and some people who get bored tend to drink. We had a bar there and cheap liquor, we had some drinking problems, some people sent home, there were fights. But we had a lot of contact with the Egyptians and Israelis. That was gratifying to me since it was my field, so to speak, and there was this glorious day when all three flags were flown above our compound. Up to that time we did not fly any flags, although it was clearly an American mission. It was mostly contract people, E-Systems from Texas did the bulk of the work. The State Department and USIA people were the communicators and liaison officers with the Israelis and Egyptians. It was there that for the first time the Israelis and Egyptians met under peaceful conditions in the Sinai to work out the terms of the agreement as it would apply on the ground. It was a pleasure to see these young Israeli and young Egyptian officers fraternizing and being genuinely friendly. They are the ones who are going to get killed if there is another war.

My tour was cut short because peace broke out and it was pretty hard to justify a mission of that size so I left after thirteen months. My wife in the meantime had been living in an old town house in Jerusalem. I would get there every three or four weeks for a long weekend so I saw a lot of Israel and especially Jerusalem in that time. I also got to Cairo a couple of times. So I call that tour my second Egyptian tour. For my wife, that meant two moves in less than a year.

Q: Did you have much contact with our embassies in Tel Aviv and Cairo? How did that operation mesh?

BAHTI: There were personal problems -- my wife did not fit in any staffing pattern -- she was supposed to be supported by the embassy in Tel Aviv but lived in Jerusalem. The Consulate General in Jerusalem was not as supportive as I thought they might have been. The liaison officers would visit there occasionally and make deliveries or whatever was needed.

When there was a violation of the armistice agreement, when there was an overflight by an Israeli plane or helicopter, or an Egyptian would stray across the line, we would send off immediate flashes to each embassy, Tel Aviv and Cairo and to the UN delegation in New York and to the Department in Washington. When those things happened that relieved the boredom. We spent a lot of time keeping the people busy, games and the like. We were surrounded by Ghanaian troops who were our protectors as they were in charge of the territory where we were located. We had a lot of contact with the embassy and we would invariably call upon them when we went into town. My boss, Ray Hunt, tended to go to Cairo more often than to Israel- -his wife lived in Cairo. When, for instance, we were preparing for this exchange of documents ceremony the Israelis came in and supplied certain of the equipment, flagpoles and stanchions and all to keep the crowds back -- and they painted them all Israeli blue. I sent out a message to Cairo saying that this may create a little problem for the Egyptians. Ambassador Eilts said in effect, "You are damned right this will cause a problem -- can't they be painted white or something?" We explained to the Israelis that Israeli blue would not do -- so they came in and painted it all silver. We consulted with both embassies because both ambassadors were present at the ceremony.

Q: The ceremony was doing what?

BAHTI: Exchanging instruments of ratification of the Camp David accords. This put the Camp David agreement into effect. It was a big day, the press was out there in force. The Department was thinking of sending out a lot of people. I said, "Hey, there is no place here to stay." We were talking about doubling up, but it did not work out that way. They came out in the morning and left in the evening. We would occasionally give dinners for the UN people or the Israeli defense or Egyptian defense people. It never happened that the Israelis and Egyptians were there at the same time until the last few months we were there. It was quite an experience. I am glad I had it. From a career point of view it was in no sense a traditional job, but I was getting a bit long in the tooth anyway. It was a lot of fun. I met a lot of people with whom I still keep in touch.

KENTON W. KEITH
Special Assistant to Deputy Director, USIA
Washington, DC (1978-1980)

Ambassador Keith was born and raised in Kansas City, Missouri. After graduating from the University of Kansas he served with the US Navy before entering the Foreign Service in 1965. An Arabic speaking Officer, Ambassador Keith served as Public Affairs Officer and/ or Cultural Affairs in Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Morocco, Syria, France and Brazil before his appointment as US Ambassador to Qatar. His Washington service included several tours in senior positions with USIA. Ambassador Keith was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: When you arrived in '77, this was early on in the Carter administration. Each administration carries some people who are red hot on something. They hover around the White House. The Carter administration was somewhat ideological, as later the Reagan one was, two opposite ends of the spectrum. Did you find that the NSC or the people from the administration were trying to fish in troubled waters?

KEITH: Certainly not at first. I think that there were, as time went on, when President Carter's views about America's role in the Third World began to play out, then those issues had an impact on all of us and particularly within the advocacy function. The president's views on AID and how AID money should be spent, his views on human rights and the role human rights should play in our overall foreign policy, all of those views as time went on began to have a heavy impact on the way we did our work overseas. Some longstanding relationships had to be changed and modified. This was particularly true in Latin America, but it was true elsewhere as well. I think that there are people today who will look back on the Carter administration as one of ineptitude in certain areas, particularly in domestic policy, but I think that if you look at the perspectives that many others have from overseas, there was a lot of affection for Carter and there was certainly a lot of respect for his stand on human rights.

Q: How did that play in the Arab world?

KEITH: Certainly his image of fair-mindedness, of evenhandedness, was a major factor in the role he was able to play in the Camp David talks. For the first time, the major Arab protagonists came into these talks with a sense that the American president was going to play fair, with a sense that the American administration for once was not going to be a pawn in the Israeli camp. I think that if you look back through the books of people who were present in the negotiating process, that was borne out. Carter was just as tough on the Israelis as he was on the Egyptians. Some very important progress was made, building on the opportunities presented by Anwar Sadat's dramatic visit to Israel.

Q: Speaking of the Sadat visit to Israel, were you doing Arab affairs at that time?

KEITH: As it happened, I had left Washington and was working in Brazil. But of course it had a major impact on me, having worked on those issues for so long. I can't think of a more dramatic moment than that.

Q: While you were doing your thing in Arab affairs, did this include Israel?

KEITH: Yes. Israel was in my bailiwick.

Q: Did you find that there were different rules dealing with Israel from the Washington perspective?

KEITH: Different rules, no. I would say that there was a different interpretation of U.S. interests on the part of different American administrations. Every administration for which I worked pursued what they took to be American interests. Most have felt that American interests were best served by maintaining a special relationship with Israel. So, the question is, did that amount to different rules. It's hard to say. It certainly amounted to a different kind of relationship with Israel than we had with the rest of the region.

Q: I've never served in Israel, but I would think that Israel would at least in its multiplicity of communication outlets – newspapers, broadcasts, etc. – it would not be too difficult to get where America stood. Maybe they wouldn't agree with it. In the Arab world, there would be a problem of getting the American position out.

KEITH: With exception perhaps of Lebanon, the communication outlets in Israel were more like those in the West. Of course in Israel there has always been a very active marketplace of ideas and differences of opinion that always had voice – newspapers, TV, other media. And as I say, there were variations in the communications environment within the Arab world. We're not talking about opposite ends of a spectrum. In Lebanon, Jordan, and North Africa there moderate voices. And when we say "moderate" we are generally referring to people who are more or less supporting our aims. Still, the question of whether or not the Arab world could get our message is a good one. Often, it didn't. Our tools were not really very effective on a day-to-day basis. Take the VOA, for example. We had an excellent Arabic service over those years to the Arab world, but most people didn't listen to the VOA. The only time really that we had the kind of listenership we wanted was when bullets were flying. In the midst of crisis, people would turn to the VOA.

Q: What would they listen to otherwise?

KEITH: The BBC Arabic Service, the Sawt al-Arab (Voice of the Arabs) from Cairo, and along in the '80s came a station in Monte Carlo broadcasting in Arabic that was very influential.

Q: The VOA was basically separate from what you were doing.

KEITH: It's important to understand the relationship between the VOA and the rest of USIA. VOA has a charter which basically says that they are obliged to report fair and accurate news. VOA was not supposed to be reporting the views of the U.S. government except when they are clearly identified as such – as in "The following is an editorial representing the official views of the United States government." Now, that chunk of time when they're giving the editorial views of the U.S. government, how do they get those editorial views and how is that vetted, how can a person sitting across town from the State Department writing an editorial be certain that the views expressed really are the views of the U.S. government? That is a process that is sometimes troublesome and quite a tricky. In principle, there is a process that links the editorial offices of the Voice, the appropriate desks at State, and the appropriate policy and desk officer positions at USIA. Very frequently, there isn't perfect harmony. By that I mean a particularly harsh editorial might be flagged to attention of the USIA desk. We might object to that editorial on grounds of timing or tone, or even errors of fact. But Voice is resistant to "uptown" control, and there can be struggles that always take too much time to negotiate. There is a clear separation between the policy apparatus and the VOA news function that was always respected. Where the news office sometimes upset U.S. ambassadors in the field was in their choice of people to interview for news stories. Sometimes they would find people who were not really representative of anything but their own eccentric views. We were separated from the VOA, yes. We are separated from the main function, which is the reporting of the news and presenting images of the United States through features on American life, the music programs and so on. Where we were joined at the hip was on the presentation of U.S. government policy through editorials.

Q: What about the pro-Israeli lobby? Did you find that would take exception or was that a problem?

KEITH: I wasn't ever in a position to hear direct complaints from Israel, but there was vigilance on the part of people who were concerned about the well-being of Israel with regard to programs, activity with Arab states, particularly anything that touched on Israel or direct Israeli interests. For example, there was congressional interest over the establishment of a USIA post in East Jerusalem that would be connected to the consulate general in Jerusalem rather than the embassy in Tel Aviv. An ongoing issue was our choice of certain Palestinian Arabs for exchange programs when and those particular individuals were not well thought of by the Israelis.

Q: How were they resolved? Was there pretty much a veto?

KEITH: It could never be said it was a veto. There were complications and the Israelis had ways of complicating programs and our lives, but they certainly didn't have a veto. Israel could say that you may leave on this program but you may not be allowed to return. You go back to the whole issue of the USIS program in Jerusalem. It continues to exist but under scrutiny. We have two cultural operations in the city of Jerusalem, one on the west side and one on the east side. The west side basically is for the Israeli population and the staff is basically Israeli, although they make an effort to reach out to Israeli. On the eastern side our staff is basically Palestinian and the programs are directed to the Palestinian population in the West Bank, Jerusalem and Gaza.

Q: How did you coordinate the USIA message with the Department of State?

KEITH: The actual implementation of public diplomacy programs in the field is an integrated process. The ambassador or the consul general in the case of Jerusalem and senior officers in the mission are all part of the country team and that country team has its public diplomacy goals and activities with the PAO as principal implementer. That is an arrangement that has been in place for generations. On the question of coordinating programs between agencies on the Washington end, there are sometimes complications, differences. USIA has its own set of requirements. There are things that the Agency is supposed to be doing that are unique. Part of that uniqueness is legislated by the Smith-Mundt Act that set up USIA and prohibits USIA products from being disseminated in the U.S. State doesn't operate with the same restrictions. Thus, State's "public affairs" program, which seeks to develop understanding and support for our policies, is aimed at American citizens is an activity USIA officers can't be a part of. This is going to be a challenge when USIA is rolled up into State because Congress has always made clear that it did not want to see money that was appropriated for advocacy programs abroad used to influence American public opinion. Every time that the issue has been raised in Congress, the result has been an even tighter control, not relaxation. Congress watchers – and there are those at State who watch very closely – do not want that to happen. At the same time, the State Department has a role of making foreign policy more relevant to the guy in the street. We, USIA, have the tools to do that.

State has not. The public affairs function at the State Department has always been a under-funded.

But even if it weren't under-funded, its primary focus would remain the famous noon briefing. That is what everybody is focused on, not only in PA but in much of the Department. Then somebody comes in like Madeleine Albright who really does understand these public opinion issues and public diplomacy issues more than her predecessors have and she doesn't understand why it is that you can't make the housewife in Peoria understand that this is important to her. That is why there is a temptation to use as much of these facilities and these monies as possible to conduct a public affairs campaign. In the beginning of the process of negotiating the amalgamation of State and USIA there was a real lack of understanding on the difference between Public Affairs (that function designed to inform and communicate with Americans) and Public Diplomacy (that function designed for foreign audiences).

But getting back to the early years and the question of how USIA and State coordinated policies and programs over years, it was really pretty straightforward when it came creating media products whose aim was advocacy. Policy officers USIA went to meetings at State, the same meetings that were leading up the noon briefing, and then used this background idea was to help shape the media products such as VOA editorials, the Wireless File (a daily transmission to the field used for policy background and press placement), magazine articles and the like.

Q: How did John Reinhardt and Charles Bray work? Were they interested in the Arab side?

KEITH: I don't think that you could say that either would have been considered a specialist. Their concerns were not at that time focused on specific foreign policy goals, whether it was the Middle East, Europe, or Africa. They were fixed on creating a new agency, USICA, and both were broadly supportive of what the Carter administration wanted to do.

Q: What were those early days of "USICA" like?

KEITH: There was a period when everybody was staking out territory and looking for new ways of operating in this new environment. The absorption of CU posed the policy issues I've spoken of earlier, and it also required a new kind of constituency building and fence mending both in the Washington area and throughout a skeptical university world. That was a real challenge. I think it was extremely fortunate for the Agency that they were able to attract – because of the idealism of the Carter years – really top notch people who brought with them a kind of prestige in the academic world that was absolutely crucial at that time. Alice Ilchman was absolutely first-rate -- sensible and approachable. She was able to attract some of the best people in USIA to her staff as well.

Q: Did you get involved when you were wearing your Arab/Israeli hat in the choice of people for educational exchanges? I would think this could get very political.

KEITH: Yes, it certainly can get very political. In every city and every capital and every location, it was very political. On the Arab side, the people who were from the elite whose parents were Western educated tended to be moderate politically and pro-American. These represented an important bastion of support, but they were a kind of elite. Should we have focused our attention on those people as they generally expected, or should we have focused our attention on people who weren't in that group?

Q: Of course, the elite that you're talking about is the easy group in which we've been doing it for years.

KEITH: That's right. So, you have a young assistant cultural affairs officer who has been out at the university and he speaks good Arabic and is out there practicing his Arabic and he meets students who are not well disposed to the U.S. They like him, but they're not well disposed to the U.S. or its policies. He comes back and argues very strongly that there are a couple of them that ought to be selected for programs in the United States. You get pressures sometimes from the country itself, from authorities in the country. Why are you picking this person? You have the same questions from ambassadors and the same questions from political officers and DCMs.

On the other hand, there are cases in which our exchange programs have been seen as valuable political patronage. One case in particular sticks in my mind: the supremely unqualified nephew of an Arab foreign minister who ended up with graduate scholarship in the U.S. So, yes, these programs can have important political coloration.

The same thing applies in Israel. We have had for years programs that have targeted Israeli Arabs. That has not always pleased certain people in the right wing of the Israeli government and the right wing is in power. It can make life complicated. They don't take people out and stand them against the wall, but they can make life quite complicated.

SALLY GROOMS COWAL
Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
Tel Aviv (1978-1982)

Ambassador Sally Grooms Cowal was born in Oak Park, Illinois in 1944. After graduating from DePauw University she joined the United States Information Service as Foreign Service Officer. Her service included assignments as Cultural and Public Affairs Officer at US Embassies in India, Colombia, Mexico and Israel. She subsequently held a number of senior positions in the Department of State, including Assistant Secretary for Latin American Affairs and Deputy Political Counselor to The American Ambassador to the United Nations. In 1991 she was appointed Ambassador to Trinidad and Tobago. Ambassador Cowal was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy August 9, 2001.

Q: How would you describe the state of American-Israeli relations when you got there in '78?

COWAL: Well, I think the state of our relations has always been extremely close and has always been extremely difficult, both. I think when I got there, or certainly in the ensuing weeks and months, as we went through Camp David together, those were pretty high points in the relationship. As it became clear – Lebanon was a leitmotif throughout the whole thing. There was always Lebanon. Something was always blowing up in Lebanon, and that was certainly a difficult issue. It was a difficult issue for Israel and it was a difficult issue for the United States, and it was a complicating issue, certainly, in the relationship between the United States and Israel. But I would say that relations as a whole were extremely good, if extremely difficult.

Q: When you got there, first place, did you have a feeling for the other side of the equation, particularly the Arab world, the Arab claims, complaints against Israel and all. Did you have any feel for that?

COWAL: I certainly had never served in the Middle East. I had never traveled in the Middle East. I didn't really know anything about the Middle East. I knew there was something called Israel. I don't know if I knew there was anything called Palestine. I think it was only as I began to meet, and I never met many Palestinians. I mean, after all, I was in the embassy in Tel Aviv, and Tel Aviv didn't cover East Jerusalem or the West Bank, which was covered out of a consulate in Jerusalem, which was, by the way, an often-contentious relationship between officers at the embassy in Tel Aviv and the consulate in Jerusalem.

We all get a certain amount of clientitis, and I think we each fall into those roles a little bit. But I learned mostly about the conflict and the Palestinians from my Israeli friends, who covered a wide spectrum, I must say, of ideological views. But, again, being the cultural attaché, I suppose there's somewhat in most societies a natural gravitation of the intellectual and academic elite toward the rather more liberal or open or whatever you want to call it part of the political spectrum. Certainly, in Israel, that was no exception, so that there are seven universities in Israel, and I think I – well, I know I knew a great number of people at each of those universities, and I knew the writers and I knew the artists.

They educated me to the fact that this was the twice promised land: really the whole history of Zionism and Herzl and essentially the coming back of the Israelis to what they considered to be their historic lands, and the whole Balfour Declaration and the working of this out with the British and the whole post-colonialism. Not unlike the Pakistan thing, which I had dealt with in my first assignment and which continues to be an issue today, sort of twice-promised land of whose house is that in Jaffa? The person whose ancestors might go back to biblical times or the person whose ancestors might go back to the Ottoman Empire who left it in 1947 and has not seen it since, but who still feel it's really his house there on that nice little street looking at the Mediterranean in Jaffa.

I think that during my time there that I regret that I didn't have more to do with Palestinians, but that was fairly difficult. What I did have something to do with were Israeli Arabs who compose a fairly significant minority in Israel and I can't remember any longer the figures, exactly.

Q: It's 10 to 20 ...

COWAL: Something like 10, 15 percent. The Druze community, which lives in Israel, which is kind of an offshoot of Islam and they live up in some mountains and villages near Haifa, which I visited. We also were responsible from the embassy in Tel Aviv for Gaza, which was then and still is an occupied territory by Israel. And the Sinai stuff before the pullout in Sinai. So I had a little bit of a chance to see people on the other side, and I did as much of that as I could, but I really became educated in these issues by Israeli friends.

Q: To me, and I'm an outsider to this. I had a tour in Saudi Arabia early on, but that was it, and I'm not an Arabist or anything else like that, but a certain disquiet about the development of Israeli policy, which was one of maintaining itself. By the time you got there, it was beginning to be expansionist under Begin. We're talking about a colonial power, really, and there was at least at one time, and I don't know, I'd like to check on this, seemed to be an attitude that reminded me very much of the white South Africans, the Palestinians or ...

COWAL: Stu, you're right and you're not right.

Q: The four years there taught you?

COWAL: How complicated the situation is. All the factors are complicated. Geographically, first of all, it's a very tight space, as you know. South Africa, of course, has nothing to compare with it, although South Africa was an isolated little white majority down there at the tip of Africa, their territories were vast, and nobody was really threatening them. Whereas before the '67 war in Israel, the way the green line was drawn, and still is drawn, is just north of Tel Aviv. If you're on the highway between Tel Aviv and Haifa, which is a major city about 50 miles to the north of Tel Aviv, the whole country is less than nine miles wide. If you're in the Golan Heights, including the Israeli parts of the Golan Heights, the Syrians have all of the top of the Golan Heights, and therefore the embankments from which they can and have for years and years and years shelled the villages below them, which are part of Israel, as negotiated in the 1947 Accords.

So, geographically, it's very small. I think the size of the state of New Jersey, and it's certainly one state of New Jersey surrounded by a country which they haven't done very well at making friends out of, so that's one complicating factor. I certainly think the second complicating factor has to do with the history of Israel: how it came to be a state, and of course for that you have to go back to the Nazis in World War II and the persecution of the Jews and the fact that there are still, to this day, many Holocaust survivors in Israel, and certainly many children of the survivors of the Holocaust in Israel. For these people, they kind of wake up sometimes, I guess I would say from a collective nightmare, in a collective sweat. I don't think anybody who hasn't had that kind of experience can ever quite understand the psychological scars that it leaves on a people.

Although I believe, and I would say most of my Israeli friends, and probably 50 percent of Israelis today, would say that their security would actually be enhanced by giving up these territories – ironically, the less they have, the more secure they are – that's hard to get across to somebody who can look out of his window and see what he perceives to be hostility virtually in sight of him. The other thing that's so very difficult about it is that the extremists on both sides have frustrated the will of the majority on both sides for a number of years, and they hold the cards. There can always be the one guy who throws the bomb and the one guy who kills the soldier, and that makes it almost impossible for the politicians in Israel who would like to see a settlement to move forward, because then everybody says, "Well, an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth. If we're hit upon, we've got to hit back. It's the only survival we have."

Of course, what does Israel depend on? It depends on superior military power, support of the United States. That's what it depends on, and so it's armed, in many ways, to the teeth. It also depends on very preemptive moves to ensure that there are no threats on their borders. One of the important events that happened while I was in Israel, having nothing to do with cultural relations, was the bombing by the Israelis of the Iraqi nuclear facility, the Osirak facility. Which in some ways you could say was a total provocation. The Israelis created a total provocation. They recognized that this nuclear site was being outfitted. It was clearly within a missile launch, and there was clearly, as we saw later in the war, the Gulf War, we saw SCUDs coming into Israel from Iraq.

Clearly, if the Israelis had not preemptively taken out that nuclear facility in, I think it was 1980, they would have faced the threat of a nuclear attack from as close by as Iraq. So you live in Israel with a clear and present danger. It was interesting, to me personally. I mean, coming from a place like Colombia, where there was certainly also – and we talked about this a little bit in our previous conversations. Although it was a much more peaceful time then than it has been in the last 15 or 20 years, there was already some drug violence, there was a lot of kidnappings, mostly for money, sometimes for political reasons. And so you always thought as a member of the American embassy staff, you could be targeted, you could be somebody that the guerillas would go after.

In Israel, you felt perfectly safe from things like that, but no safer than anybody else from the possibility of a terrorist attack if you crossed the street at the wrong time or you got on the wrong bus or you went to the Carmel market on the wrong Friday morning. There was a terrific sort of perceived vulnerability, and Israelis live with that, so it's historically complicated, geographically complicated.

I remember something once that I heard Golda Meir say, and it struck me then and it's always stuck with me. She died when I was there, but she said, "You know, we can forgive the Palestinians," or the Arabs. I don't think she said the Palestinians. "We can certainly forgive the Arabs for killing our children, but we may never be able to forgive them for making us kill their children." Because this state of warfare imposed on Israelis, who after all went to Israel, most of them, either as refugees from the Holocaust or those who got there in the early '20s and in the 1930s, they went basically as incredible idealists. They were socialists, if not communists, they believed in a different way of society being organized. They actually thought that some of the plight of the Jewish people over the centuries had been because they were special and apart and separate and too well educated and too wealthy and too egotistical, and so they set about to try to create this perfect little world in their little mini-state, in which there would be total equality. Obviously, this never happens anywhere, but there would be ...

Q: Sort of the Walden ...

COWAL: Yes, exactly. There would be great equality between men and women and all children would be raised in loving homes, and everybody would participate equally and work, and everybody would divide up the spoils equally. So the whole forming of the kibbutz movement, for instance, which was never more than 3 percent of the Israeli populace actually lived in kibbutzim, but they thought of themselves not any longer as the merchant and the furrier and the jeweler and the doctor, but as the noble farmers, the Walden Pond, the Grant Wood, with the pitchforks, sort of thing.

So I think it was a terrible shock to many of them to discover that they were once again reviled and hated by many around the world. I don't think that was their idea in forming this state, so it was a very interesting place to be and to learn.

Q: We'll move on, but within the embassy, you're the new girl on the block.

COWAL: I must say, the only girl on the country team.

Q: It's interesting, we'll talk about that, too, but when you arrive at a new country and many of the people are wrestling with the problems and all, how did you find it? Did you find the embassy at all divided, because we present a rather solid front politically about Israel of firm support, but certainly within the Foreign Service there is disquiet on a broader front. It seems to be – every time we do something for Israel, it ends up as a negative in the broader context of the Middle East.

COWAL: Right. Do remember that if we're talking about particularly the beginning of my tour there, by having achieved Camp David, which I must say I'm sure your talks with Sam Lewis talked about that a lot, but I think he played a very key role in Camp David as well. I think there was great unity of purpose, both in the embassy in Tel Aviv, and to a great extent, certainly between the embassy in Tel Aviv and the embassy in Cairo, if not always so much the other countries. But there were certainly in the State Department Arabists. By and large, the Arabists never served in Israel, and there was no such thing as Israelists, because there was really one country, and despite the fact that it was a big embassy, there were at any given time only 100 American positions there or something. So, although some people went back to serve in Israel more than once because they liked it, or because they learned Hebrew, or for all these reasons, you couldn't make a career out of it the way you could make a career out of serving in Arab countries.

But certainly through 1978, 1979, probably into 1980, there were some annoyances with the Israelis, and those could be felt by all of us. Although they were our best friends, they didn't always act as our best friends, and they certainly often did some things politically unilaterally that I think drove everybody nuts. They were very, very anxious to show all visitors their side of the story to the exclusion of other sides of the story.

There was also this incredible interest in Israel by American domestic interests. That's not unlike Cuba, that I'm working on now, of course, but it made it very difficult to achieve a policy. Whenever the American embassy would take kind of a strong stand against something the Israelis were doing or planning to do, of course, the Israelis could always run around your back and go directly to the Congress. One year that I was in Israel, if I'm not mistaken, one-third of all the members of the U.S. Congress visited Israel, in a 12-month period of time. So imagine a country where you have 200 individual members of the Congress or the House of Representatives or the Senate visiting in one year.

You had all the politicians who always had to make the Ireland, Italy, Israel swing, because they had to appeal to the Italian, the Irish and the Jewish voters in their constituencies. So you had governors, you had senators, you had congressman and you had wannabes from all of these political constituencies in the United States. Certainly, there were sometimes annoyances that what would have been the prerogative normally of an American ambassador or an American embassy, particularly in a country that was as dependent upon us for foreign aid as the Israelis were – by the way, that foreign aid comes in the form of I think it's a quarterly check written to the Israeli government. I mean, there is no such thing here as an aid mission, because God forbid that we would try to tell them what to do about development issues. It's pure ESF, pure economic support funds. There's no development assistance in that equation at all, and as we all know, it's about a quarter of our whole foreign affairs budget. And it used to be more than that, proportionately, until Camp David, and then we felt obliged to try to match Egypt, which is of course a country with much more population than Israel. But at least we tried to match the dollars going to Egypt, which I assume was part of the settlement, with the dollars going to Israel.

Certainly, there were people annoyed at Israelis at given times. They were not easy people to work with. They made things very difficult, and I think for a lot of American embassy folks who had served in countries that we could say were a little bit more pleasant or compliant or less defiant, especially when we saw that, from our point of view, they couldn't survive five minutes without our assistance, I think there were those natural tensions. But there was also a lot of admiration for the people who had sort of put themselves on a world stage, and not only in political terms, who had put themselves on a world stage for the really remarkable achievements in agriculture and in medicine and in science. I think my job, particularly, gave me an exposure to the beautiful side of Israel.

Q: There's something I'd like to ask. As a cultural affairs officer, one of the things that has struck me in looking, say, at what happened in Germany, after the Holocaust, basically the elimination of the Jew in German cultural life, Germany is no longer a world player. The movies, the arts and all of this, Germany is – it's sort of like taking the salt out of the thing. There's nothing there, yet the United States in all these deals has prospered so much, to a large extent because of the exodus from, particularly Germany, of German Jews to the United States. Yet I don't see, except in, say, maybe music and all, and please correct me if I'm wrong, much Israeli cultural impact on the world – Israeli literature or Israeli movies. Perhaps, the few of the painters one thinks about are really holdovers from another era. Could you comment on that?

COWAL: Yes, well, I mean, I think that's an interesting point of view. Some of it I agree with, some of it I don't. Obviously, the music is world class and world renowned, not so much in composition, but in execution, and a whole lot of the people who we consider to be Americans now were Israelis, I mean, were born in Israel. That would be Itzhak Perlman and Pinky Zukerman and Daniel Barenboim and Emmanuel Ax and Gil Shaham. I could name 100 who are really now just – they live on a world stage and that takes them from here to here to here.

Q: They're international.

COWAL: They're international performers of the highest caliber, but they happen to have been born in Israel, and actually many of them got their start as child prodigies through a foundation called the Israel-America Cultural Foundation, which was not an American embassy thing, but to which I was always invited when they would do concerts and judgments and recitals and so on. They'd be brilliant kids. I mean, they are kids, five year olds, seven year olds, violin virtuosos. Their money mostly comes from wealthy Jews in the United States. Isaac Stern gave them enormous amounts of money and would come out and do these trials, judging which kids were really the musical geniuses. So certainly it's in music.

The Weizmann Institute of Science is a world-class institution. I can't name you their Nobel Prize winners in medicine in science, but there are a number of them, so there are achievements in that field. The plastic arts are alive and well, if maybe not world class. The architecture stinks, for reasons I don't quite understand, because again, if you think about the Bauhaus and all of that, it was largely Jewish, or certainly heavily influenced by Jews. I think people who needed to build things requiring a lot of money went somewhere else, and that was usually to Western Europe or the United States. So that's one of the reasons. After all, it's a tiny country.

In terms of literature, there are several absolutely wonderful writers, who of course write in Hebrew. The most famous of them I suppose is Amos Oz, who I wouldn't be surprised if one day he gets a Nobel Prize. It's a really marvelous body of mostly novels, but some short stories and some plays as well. This year, I was very pleased that Naipaul got the Nobel Prize, who comes from Trinidad, where I later served. I think there's essentially the fact that we don't know more about Israeli literature is because it doesn't all get translated. I think there are some absolutely wonderful writers, and there's some wonderful theater there. There are three, or at least there were when I was there, really outstanding dance companies.

I would say, compared to – here's a country of a few million people. I don't know of any country that size which has as vibrant a scene in the plastic arts and the performing arts and literature as Israel. So, in that sense, I think to compare it to much larger places, Germany, with a population of 80 million people, and the United States, with 260 million people, I think you could say on sort of a per capita basis, Israel is really right out there. But it's a tiny country.

Q: Well, now, you're the cultural affairs officer. When you got there '78, what did you see your job was? Who did you replace, by the way?

COWAL: Well, I replaced a guy named Tony Cassanov.

Q: I think it was Louise Taylor, I think, had the job later.

COWAL: Yes, who was later in the job. The embassy in Israel had a lot of power, but even at that time, headquarters didn't want USIS posts, or, God forbid, ambassadors and embassy, to muck around in personnel policy. After all, the personnel decisions were supposed to be made by the Bureau of Personnel Management. There would be five candidates for a job, and in some kind of a bidding process the most qualified would of course always be selected, and then appropriately trained, and then sent out to the post. The embassy would simply receive this person and say, “This is our new cultural affairs officer. This is our new political officer.”

Because Sam Lewis thought that culture was such an important part of this whole equation, and he’d gotten along very well with my predecessor as well, he made it a requirement that I come out and be interviewed by him for the job, unknown to the Foreign Service. So, on some pretext or another, he got USIS Tel Aviv to pay for me to fly from Colombia to Israel, and to meet the country team. It was some pretext, because obviously you couldn’t be flying people around the world to be interviewed for jobs, that just wasn’t the way the process worked. So it was something my urgent consultations were needed for, and I think it was, I don’t know, April or something of 1978, and I went out to Israel to be interviewed.

What did I see as I looked around? I saw an ambassador who unusually cared about cultural affairs. I saw the ambassador’s wife, Sally Lewis, who was and is a fantastic individual, and the two of them, in part because we were who we were and they were who they were, and they had an incredible entrée to this society. If the rest of us had it, they had it in spades. But they understood that country extremely well. They were very sympathetic, but they were not without factors of critical judgment, particularly Sam. Sally was, I think, even more taken with it in some ways than Sam was, and her job wasn’t to be critical. Her job was to make friends, and she made them, and she made them from every single segment of that society.

Insofar as I became a favorite of theirs, which I would like to think that I was, it was having entrée yourself, way beyond what an official position on the embassy staff would have done for you. But I was lucky enough to be given this access to many dinners at their house and many events that they sponsored. One of their outreaches to the community and to do things that they thought would put U.S. presence into some kind of balance was to do a series of cultural events at their house. Sometimes we invented these from sort of local talent, but usually we were lucky enough that virtually all – not virtually all – a huge amount of talent from the United States found its way to Israel on its own steam, because they came to perform with the orchestra, for instance.

We would try to work with their managers and ask, whether it was Marvin Hamlisch or whoever, would so and so be able to give us a night, a free night, at the residence, playing for the ambassador’s guests. So, once a month they would have a little buffet supper – these were organized by me – a little buffet supper for 65 of their closest friends and a Daniel Barenboim or a Marvin Hamlisch who would put on a wonderful performance, a little 45-minute, hour, presentation, a little chamber music group, a little piano, a singer or a poet. These were really wonderful and magical evenings, and I think I understood then and I think I probably used it forever onward, that understanding that you could get people to come to things like this.

Of course, Sam, in addition to having the 65 Israelis he wanted there would have 15 members of his country team there, and this was a chance for informal interaction with members of the Knesset, with ministers of government, with presidents of universities. Sam and Sally’s house was a beacon of light, it was a place that people wanted to go. It was a place where there were often interesting political discussions, and these sometimes took place around these soirees, these cultural evenings. So, again, I felt like I was a very important member, I was helping them accomplish their mission in Israel.

One thing that we would every year do an orientation for the Fulbright professors who were coming to live in Israel. I think each year we brought maybe 10. We had an America-Israel Cultural Foundation which was the Fulbright Foundation in Israel and America, Fulbright Program, in which the Israelis also contributed stuff like housing for the professors and so on. I was on the Fulbright Commission. I think I was treasurer of it, by virtue of my role as the cultural attaché. So each year we would sponsor a whole day-long orientation for the new people who were coming, and we would always ask Ambassador Lewis to sort of lead this off with just an off-the-cuff sort of thing about how he saw the state of relations between the two countries and what was the reality of Israel.

I can remember one of them where he spoke probably without notes probably for an hour, and it was absolutely fascinating. One of the people who was there was a member of the Fulbright board and he was at that time the head of cultural relations for the Israeli Foreign Ministry, an ambassador who later became ambassador to Washington, Moshe Arad, a very, very good diplomat and career foreign service officer of Israel. I remember very well the day he came to Tel Aviv for that little talk, and we didn't talk after it. He got right back in his car and had to go back up to Jerusalem, and he called me that day and he said, "You know, I had tears in my eyes when he was talking, because I've never heard anybody explain our reality so well, not even an Israeli. The degree to which this person understands, doesn't necessarily condone, but understands this complex reality in which Israel exists is remarkable."

I think I was just extremely fortunate to serve with these people. Basically, the whole country team were sort of superstars. The DCM was first Dick Viets who became ambassador in Jordan and ambassador to other places, and he was succeeded by Bill Brown, who became ambassador in Thailand.

Q: And came back.

COWAL: Right, and then came back more than once to Israel. The political officer was Bob Blackwill, who has now left the Foreign Service and has been appointed as the political appointee ambassador to India. A smarter person I have never known – not an easy person, but a super-smart person. The head of the economic section was Sam Hart, who became the ambassador in Ecuador.

Q: Incidentally, Sam Hart, when I interviewed him, was quite unhappy about his time in Israel, because he said, "We would do the normal thing that any good economic counselor does, analyze the Israeli requests and all, and submit it." He said the Israelis would sort of laugh and say, "Go ahead, it makes no difference." And they'd go to Congress and get exactly what they wanted.

COWAL: Didn't I tell you the same thing? I mean, whenever they got an answer they didn't want from us, they had 435 ways of getting what they wanted, and they usually got it. So, yes, it could be extremely frustrating. But here you sat in country team, it was for me like really playing in the big time. When I went to India, we were tilting toward Pakistan, so we had an outstanding embassy, too. It was Galen Stone and it was Louis Stahl and they were also very good people.

India wasn't quite the same because you weren't with Henry Kissinger going to make your career by being out there in India, because he didn't care about India, but everybody cared about Israel. In some ways, it was like playing in the major leagues, and then I went to Colombia, which in those days, nobody cared about, and then suddenly I went to Israel and it was really like moving up from the farm leagues to the major leagues. You knew even at the time that these were major league ballplayers. I think that made it fun, and I was describing the USIA staff, which had a public affairs officer, an information officer, an assistant information officer, a cultural officer, an assistant cultural officer and a center director head in Jerusalem, and I think that was it.

It was a tiny post by USIA standards in those days. Now it would be a large post by USIA standards because USIA doesn't exist anymore. But in those days, it was probably half of the size of the staff in Colombia, let's say, the USIS staff in Colombia, but enormously well selected with kind of an enormous staff. I think most of the staffs in the embassy were like that. There was a very good station there, I must say.

Q: Was that Philip Jessup? Was he there at that time?

COWAL: I can't even remember.

Q: Philip Jessup was the one who did a very long interview, which we have, I think with Sam Lewis, I mean, a very compelling interview.

COWAL: It may have been and I can't remember. I just remember it was a good station and a good military attaché's office, headed by a general whose name I also don't remember. But across the board, and as you see if Sam Lewis on interviewing me before I came, and I was not a section head, he hand picked that staff, or at least what he considered to be the 20 or 30 key individuals on that staff were hand picked by him. He just knew that he had a big job and he needed everybody on that staff to be capable of carrying out a role.

I can't speak highly enough of the job that he did there, or the job that the Lewises did, because they were very much a team. He could shout, he could be completely out of control. He was a person with strong opinions and strong emotions, and I've been on the carpet. Others I know have been on the carpet, but you came away with this enormous respect for this figure who was sort of larger than life. That's what it took not to be totally boxed into a corner by these Israelis who were larger than life.

My transition from a cultural career to a political career, which I came to have, was because I was control officer for Joe Califano, who was at that time the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare. For the same reason that all politicians came to Israel, he came to Israel, and he had already been to Italy and he had already been to Ireland, and he was signing education agreements with these countries. Now, we later learned that the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare had no power to sign an agreement with a foreign country, so we had to redo this whole thing with the ambassador signing it. But he came out to sign an educational agreement for scientific exchanges and academic exchanges between the two countries, and he had also done these in Ireland and in Italy, because obviously that would be very popular with the U.S. Congress.

He was a larger-than-life figure, too. He was very prominent politically. So he came to Israel, and because I was the education officer, the culture and education officer, rather than a member of the political section being his control officer, I was his control officer. So his visit to Israel called for him to call on the prime minister, who was Begin. So Sam and Califano and I went to see the prime minister. Califano came with two or three members of his staff. So we went to see Begin, and I don't think I had ever met Begin. Maybe I had met him socially, but I had certainly never been in a meeting with him, and I had never been the note-taker in a meeting. I find lost ballet shoes for the dance company, I don't do political reporting.

So, this meeting, which was meant to be a 20-minute courtesy call, stretched into an hour-long substantive discussion, I think mostly about Lebanon, but all of the issues. Begin decided that Califano was close to the president and a political figure and he wasn't going to miss the opportunity. He wasn't just going to talk about this little education agreement they had signed. He was going to launch into a full deal.

I was very interested to be in the prime minister's office. I had never been in the prime minister's office. So, as they were chatting, I was sort of paying attention to what they were saying, but I was also looking at the curtains and wondering about this, that and the other thing. We came out after this meeting, and Sam Lewis looked at me and he said, "Well, you'll have the reporting cable on my desk by 4:00 today." Reporting cable? What's a reporting cable?

So I wrote my first political cable, which I must say he went through, I'm sure making more corrections than he left things in place, but it was a damn good education. Of course, I learned that whether or not you've got a piece of paper in hand, you're in there in a meeting with a foreign head of government, you're always doing a reporting cable. You're doing it in your head if you're not doing it on paper. I had so many learning experiences of that kind in Israel, but mostly because Sam Lewis believed that I could do that kind of a job. I think those things are very important to people being able to see themselves as doing something other than what their current role at the time might be.

It was my exposure in Israel that really paved the way for Jeane Kirkpatrick asking me to be the political counselor to the U.S. mission to the UN (United Nations) in New York. When I said, "Why do you want a cultural officer to be the political counselor up here?" She said, "Well, it's because the UN is all about political theater anyway," which to a certain extent she was playing on. What you need in the UN is somebody who can present this case.

Nonetheless, I got my first exposure to things political while serving as the cultural attaché to the American embassy.

Q: I mean, I'll put down a couple of things that I'd like to ask you about for the next time. How did you find – I mean, this is relatively early on when women were beginning to rise to the executive ranks, the places where you could do things? How did you find being a woman there, and also being a woman vis-à-vis the Israelis? Two, what about the Likud? You mention all these cultural things, and somehow I think of so many of the people that one thinks about in the Likud party were rather dour?

COWAL: I'll comment on this before we quit. You should know that Ariel Sharon had symphony season tickets which happened to be right in front of my symphony season tickets, so the days when he didn't show up, I began to wonder who was being bombed. But, nonetheless, again, this incredible – in Israel, everybody loves music and everybody loves sort of cultural things. The other responsibility I had as cultural officer that brought me very much into the political mainstream was that we ran a very large, for the size of the country, International Visitor Program, what we used to call Leader Grant program. I think we sent about 20 Israelis to the United States every year on grants.

Of course, because the Likud was in power and the political grantees were picked not by me, but by the country team or by the political section of people they thought were up and coming in both parties, and indeed they turned out to be – we didn't ever send Barak, because he was a military officer in those days. But we sent Yossi Beilin, who was a very important adviser to the Labor government, minister in the Labor government. We sent Ehud Olmert, who is currently the mayor of Jerusalem, who is a Likudnik. We sent him on a grant.

So I got to meet all of these people, because although they might have been, and were, selected by the country team and the ambassador, when it came time to planning their program in the United States or figuring out what they wanted to do, I was the one who took care of it. So I got to know everybody who went on that program to the United States quite well, and that was another insight for me into Likud politics or into national politics.

The Likud is very hard line on a whole lot of things, and I must say, if I were an Israeli, I probably would not be in favor of the Likud. I'm almost certain I would not be in favor of the Likud. I think it would be wrong to say that they were not equally as cultured and interested in the arts, because they are.

Q: I imagine that they had their religious right which was sort of beyond the pale as far as your reach was concerned?

COWAL: Yes and no. I mean, there is one university called Bar-Ilan University, and it's the religious university. I guess it would be the equivalent of Catholic University in Washington. I mean, it's quite definitely a religious university, where virtually every professor wears a yarmulke, and I think most of the students who choose to go there are religious. We certainly had good contacts at Bar-Ilan, but if you remember, you couldn't – the chief rabbi would come to the 4th of July party, for instance, and there's a chief Ashkenazi rabbi and a chief Sephardic rabbi, and they would both come. But you had to learn, for instance, as a woman that you couldn't shake hands with them.

Most of my Israeli friends, including my friends in the Likud, who are on the right side of the political spectrum – I would say there's a great religious and non-religious divide. People will joke in Jerusalem about leaving a neighborhood because it's gone black, by which they mean that the people with the black hats and the black coats have moved in, not with black skin. They are way less than 10 percent of the population, and yet because of the historic roots of the state of Israel, they are able to control – and because of the political coalitions, which have been needed in order for anybody to govern in a really fractured political system – they have held incredible sway over lots of things in life that may not be very important, but nonetheless symbolically are. So that El Al doesn't fly on Saturday, and food on El Al is kosher food, and all hotels in Israel have kosher kitchens, which 90 percent of the population doesn't care about at all.

Q: I'm told the cuisine there is not something you would seek after.

COWAL: Insofar as it's adapted to the Arab world around it, it's pretty good. But insofar as it tries to transfer sort of not very good Eastern European food to a Mediterranean setting, not so great.

Q: Yes, this is tape five, side one, with Sally Cowal. We're going to pick this up, you were in Israel '78 to '82. We've talked quite a bit about your relations and how as cultural officer you worked with Sam Lewis and his cultural team. I did want to ask how you found being a woman, both in the Foreign Service and serving in Israel, how this played there. We'll want to talk, obviously, about the reaction to events in Lebanon and the invasion of Lebanon, and prior to that, how things were building up. Dealing with Gaza, how did this play out? You mentioned you have other stories, and I like stories, so do you have any ones that come immediately to mind that you can just sort of give a keyword or something like that.

COWAL: Well, I'll tell you about John Glenn's visit.

Q: John Glenn's visit, and also how the arrival of Ronald Reagan on the scene hit within Israel, when he took office in 1980.

COWAL: Right, and, of course, the other thing that was an important part of all of that was the hostages in Iran, which weren't so far away from us, and the fall of the shah and the militarization of Iran, of course, also led to a huge influx of refugees and Jewish immigrants from Iran to Israel. So those are all interesting and important things.

Q: Today is the 26th of February 2002. Sally, I almost shudder, because things are changing so rapidly that it no longer really makes a hell of a lot of difference about whether one's a male or a female, except in the personal relationships. I'm still trying to go back to the time. How did you find, by this time, serving both in Israel and the Foreign Service, being a woman? Did this make any difference, or did you see nuances or anything like that?

COWAL: Well, I think there was a time when there were so few women in the Foreign Service that it was in many ways easier to be a woman than it was to be a man. On the one hand men could get away with – and using a good Israeli word here – could get away with being real schmucks and sort of get lost in the anonymity of the grayness of, certainly, part of the Foreign Service, or anything else, I suspect. Business or anything else, any bell-shaped curve, 60 percent of the people are sort of in the middle and you might notice the outstandingly good 5 percent or the outstandingly bad 5 percent for other reasons, but the rest of the 90 percent are probably just sort of indistinguishable.

Women couldn't get away as easily with being foolish, but on the other hand, if they didn't seem to be foolish, they became noticed much more quickly. There were just so few of us. And the time I spent in Israel, the expanded country team – I obviously wasn't the head of the section, so I wouldn't have been a normal member of a country team. But I think once a week there was a meeting of what they called the expanded country team, which involves about 20 officers in the embassy, and I was the only woman. After all, I was on the expanded country team. So there was not a woman head of section, not the head of the political section, the consular section, the economic section, whatever all the other sections were, not one of them was headed by a woman.

I think in many ways it made you the object of a lot of attention, and if you did that well, if you did whatever you were supposed to do in a way that people saw as noteworthy, it was easier for them to see that. I guess it probably had some downsides. There were speculations many times, I know, about my career and would I stay with it, or "She's just going to go and get married and go off and do something," lots of unfair things. But also, I think, a tremendous advantage, and also I guess that was true in the countries I worked in, too – well, India and Israel, not so much in Colombia, but certainly in India and Israel. Although large categories of women were still second-class citizens in some ways, there were more women professionally, in percentage terms, I think, doing important things such as being members of the parliament, or doctors, or lawyers, than there were in the 1970s of women in the United States doing similar things.

So I guess all of us who were women in the Foreign Service at that time, whatever our role in the embassy was, we also became the sort of women's affairs officers, because there was this thought that, "Well, maybe she can meet Indira Gandhi or Golda Meir and we can say something about women in our society through spotlighting some of the women who we do have who are making some strides, inroads." So I think we were also used a little bit as poster children, and therefore had some experiences that our male counterparts of a similar age and rank probably didn't have quite as often.

Q: Looking back, I think that's very true. All right, let's turn to Lebanon. You got to Israel when?

COWAL: I got to Israel in 1978.

Q: How, as you saw it, because things really kept moving up and up and up, but how were events in Lebanon in '78 when you got there, as reflected in Israel, and how concerned were you?

COWAL: Well, I think as I recall, I was not the political officer, I was the cultural officer, as you know, so I was much more concentrating on Israel proper than on anything else going on around Israel. But certainly, my deep sense of it was that Lebanon was certainly always the leitmotif, that whatever else was going on, there was always Lebanon. Even though we were USIA officers, and in my case cultural officers, therefore not even all that involved in the press, which tends to be more political, we all served as embassy duty officers and so on. I remember being the duty officer for the first time and not knowing what to expect, getting called, and this must have been '78 or maybe early '79, but during one night, getting called into the embassy three or four separate times.

I'd have to get in my car, drive to the embassy, read the message, and those were always Lebanon. Later on, I seem to recall duty officers actually just spending the night in the embassy because the pace of the cable traffic was so rapid. There were certainly other momentous events, many of them on the good side. The bookends for me were arriving there and immediately having Camp David, and leaving at the time of the invasion of Lebanon. Although Camp David seemed to be pointing in a different direction, there was always this undercurrent of the constant attacks on the northern part of Israel coming out of Lebanon. There was Israeli unhappiness with that and with the guerilla groups, which had their bases in Lebanon and then Syria. They felt they would never be secure until they did something about, and constant U.S. pressure that we would regard any Israeli invasion of Lebanon to be a very grave and serious act.

Some of that, of course, is good prelude for trying to work on Cuba and so on, because we have somewhat of the same situation of having very strong domestic interests, which are really trying to drive our foreign policy. Then you have the United States having a foreign policy which it wishes to be something else. We attempted to rein in Israel, because we didn't consider Israeli aggression to be useful to our overall foreign policy in the Middle East and what we were trying to achieve in the Middle East: whether that was secure oil or whatever else, was constantly at tension with people in the United States and the Israelis who could work those people very well in the United States to essentially be putting the bonds on the U.S. diplomatic establishment every bit as we tried to put the reins on the Israelis. I think there was a constant tug of war in that situation.

Q: Was there a feeling when you were there that the Israelis were getting ready to do something? Concerns that the Israelis, their frustration level to reach a certain point where they would go, and we were considering that this would be a bad thing?

COWAL: Right, we did consider that that would be a bad thing, and we did see that tension level rising. I think what made it so difficult is that the State Department, or the Foreign Service, wasn't the only deliverer of messages to Israel. The messages that the Israelis got were clearly mixed, as they saw their friends in Congress and their supporters. I guess that's the context in which I was going to mention the John Glenn visit.

Glenn came out shortly before I left. It was probably the spring of '82. Again, because Sam Lewis was a pioneer and didn't think that all assignments for carrying forward on important embassy projects should always be in the hands of State Department officers, as well as making USIA and other people duty officers, we were also control officers. I was asked if I would be the control officer for John Glenn, or I was assigned to be the control officer for John Glenn, although he was coming not for a cultural visit. He was coming to observe, as a senator ...

Q: He was a senator.

COWAL: He was a senator at the time. The Israelis would do a wonderful job at briefing members of the U.S. Senate. They, of course, had a story to tell and they were good about telling it. You could easily come and understand what remarkable things they had achieved, which indeed they had, whether it was in agriculture or it was in science or it was in cultural things. There were a lot of achievements, and they would keep every visitor busy from day until night running around and seeing all the marvelous things that they had done, and they had a very good public diplomacy program, and they particularly worked on people who were key political officials in the United States.

We also wanted Glenn, during that visit, to deliver the message that the State Department was trying to deliver, reinforce that a popular and well-known senator who happened to be a Democrat with a Republican administration, nonetheless also carried this message that unbound Israeli expansionism or playing around with Lebanon was not something which we perceived ...

Q: Lebanon and the settlements are sort of tied together at that point, or not?

COWAL: No, I think they're somewhat separate issues.

Q: I mean, we were treating them as separate issues?

COWAL: We were certainly treating them as separate issues. At any rate, we were put into the hands of the Israelis who wanted Glenn, among other things, to understand how difficult it was for Israel to protect its own citizens and its own property, surrounded as they were – and in a way, the issues touched – surrounded as they were by what they regarded as hostile forces. And in the case of the settlements, had they not had the settlements, the 1948 boundaries of Israel meant that in one part of the country, there was exactly nine miles between Jordan and the sea. So, of course, the Israelis saw the settlements and the whole West Bank, Judea and Samaria, as being a way of pushing that enemy back to a position where that enemy couldn't so easily perpetrate terrorist actions or anything else on the Israeli population.

I happen to think that all of that in fact made them less secure, rather than more secure. But at any rate, there was a popular perception, at least in the Likud party, and shared by many Israelis, that after all you just had to look at the map, and what you had to do was push this line back and provide greater security. So the settlements played a huge role in that, because, first of all, you had this influx of population coming out of Lebanon and later out of Ethiopia, and of course later out of Russia and so a real strain on the population base in Israel, and a wanting to expand your territory into these other issues, playing into the political issue of "this will make us safer" also. The expansion of Israel to what they would call greater Israel, biblical Israel, played into a very practical terms as well as political and religious, so it became very important.

The other place from which Israel was extremely vulnerable was being shelled from Lebanon and from the Golan Heights, which was controlled – the top of the heights had been controlled by Syria until the Israelis in the 1967 war took, as well as taking the West Bank, they took the Golan Heights – or the top of the Golan Heights. They pushed the Syrians back. Some of those same Syrian factions then went into Lebanon and shelled the settlements – we'd call them settlements – but kibbutzes and stuff in the north of Israel from their base in Lebanon. So the Israelis wanted John Glenn to understand that not controlling the Golan Heights was extremely dangerous to the Israeli towns and cities and farms beneath the Golan Heights.

The problem was that the United States never accepted Israeli sovereignty over the Golan Heights. They always considered that to be occupied territory which would be part of an eventual peace agreement. In order to indicate our unwillingness to accept their sovereignty over the Golan Heights, it was forbidden for any member of the diplomatic community to go there. The ambassador wouldn't go. You would never go there in the company of Israelis, because that would be indicating that you respected their sovereignty, and they were always trying to do this creep. They were always trying to make facts on the ground, essentially. The settlements became facts, and people visiting under their auspices became facts.

We were on a helicopter and supposedly going to visit some of the Israeli towns, and the helicopter landed and we realized we were on the Golan Heights, which of course was where I wasn't supposed to be. Of course, as we got out of the helicopter, they had all the press there, and all the TV crews. Essentially, we had been duped. So Glenn said to me, "Just stand behind me, nobody will ever see you," because he was much bigger than I was, of course. And so that's what we did. I stood behind him and the press never caught the fact that there was a U.S. embassy official on the Golan Heights, which they would have exploited.

It was a situation of – it was very interesting because it also showed that even governments that are supposedly the best of friends, when they're trying to achieve a political objective, will not necessarily hesitate to embarrass their friends. Personally I did have many good Israeli friends and certainly our countries had the best of relationships, but there were nonetheless always tensions in that relationship, because they were never very happy with U.S. policy. It was always "what did you do for me today?" sort of thing. Whatever we had done, it wasn't quite enough. We could never quite prove our unconditional love, and I think that was an issue and a problem.

Q: Which brings up a question. I haven't served in Israeli, but I've felt they've done a number on so many Foreign Service officers who are, quote, "Arabists," unquote. "These are just prejudiced people and against us," mainly because they were speaking about Arab concerns, about disinformation coming out of the Israelis. Did you feel that, particularly coming out of the military, but other things, that they spoke with a forked tongue often? Does one take everything with a grain of salt, or did you feel what you were getting was pretty straightforward stuff?

COWAL: Well, about what?

Q: Well, I'm thinking about incidents particularly dealing with what the Palestinians or other people were doing.

COWAL: Oh, I think none of it was casual. They had a particular story and they had a particular line, and that's certainly what you were going to hear.

Q: Well, I mean, would there be – the Israelis would announce something, and you, say, on the country team kind of look at each other and say, "Well, that's just the Israelis." Or say, "Well, gee, I didn't realize that," or something like that.

COWAL: It was a very interesting embassy setup, because we had a consulate in Jerusalem that didn't report to the embassy. Brandon Grove was the consul general in those days, and Sam Lewis was the ambassador. I don't think there was a great deal of love lost between them, to tell you the truth, but I think they tried very hard to make sure that there was one U.S. policy in the region and not two U.S. policies in the region. I think that the great emotionalism attached to this issue, maybe by the Arabists, or by the people who liked and supported Israel, but people did have horses in this race. I think there had been a tendency, which continued, but which I think they tried in a very professional way to lessen those tensions. Brandon would come to this expanded country team meeting every Friday morning, which I think had not happened in the past. It was like we were on two entirely separate tracks, and at least it was a reality check for us, also, from what we were getting from the Israelis, which was what the Israelis wanted you to hear.

They, I think, had no hesitation, particularly about lying. They had a job to accomplish, and they weren't going to be able to accomplish that unless they had the unconditioned backing of the United States. I want to hear Sam Lewis's interviews someday.

Q: It's there, and Brandon's too.

COWAL: Okay, a much better position to understand it than I was.

Q: But it's interesting. A very strong team, because I know both Brandon Grove and Sam Lewis. These are two very strong people, but very serious professionals.

COWAL: Right, and highly principled. I think it was difficult for them and for all of us, because we lived in separate realities, and we saw things from separate realities. I mean, you don't have that situation probably anywhere else in the world, really, and haven't we seen all of that also since September 11th? I mean, we've seen an awful lot, and a whole of these tensions and so on that I saw then have become very, very blatant now. But we lived in separate realities. None of us was duped. We didn't 100 percent believe what the Israelis told us, and they didn't 100 percent believe what the Palestinians told them, or the Jordanians told them. Nonetheless, your whole vision of something was organized in a different way. Now, the embassy in Tel Aviv did take care of the Gaza consular district, rather than the consulate in Jerusalem.

After the signing of the peace agreement between Israel and Egypt in 1979, after the Camp David agreements leading to the peace treaty, we began to offer cultural programs to Gaza such as International Visitor grants and a very limited – not really a Fulbright program, because we had a Fulbright Commission, but that didn't work outside of Israel, but grants for some university studies. We would occasionally want to bring a speaker who was coming to talk to the Israelis about – it might be about something very cultural or U.S. universities or the U.S. economy, but we would bring speakers on a variety of fields, experts from American universities, typically, to give a series of lectures and talks and speak to the press and so on.

We increasingly began to expand that program to include outreach to Gaza. I guess I got my own window on that other part of the equation by going to Gaza from time to time to accompany speakers or to interview potential grantees. So I got I guess a broader view than somebody whose total job was simply within Israel. Oh my, it was shocking, of course. It was totally shocking. Even compared to Jordan or – I never went to Syria, but to Jordan or Lebanon, the conditions in these refugee camps in Gaza, the conditions in these towns, were simply appalling, simply appalling. You had to question yourself about why was that, and I think it was a real eye opener for me, it was a real education.

When you lived in Israel, you could almost pretend like you were living in Western Europe or the United States, with a few exceptions, I guess, but there was some poverty. There was certainly no misery, and everybody had an opportunity to go to school, and everybody had good health care, and to a certain extent there was a democratic political system which included everybody. You went to Gaza and the conditions were certainly as bad as anything that I had seen in India 20 years earlier, people living in dilapidated hovels or tents or corrugated cardboard boxes, who had been there at that point for 30 years.

Q: What was the feeling, your feeling, or maybe others, about this? Blame is passed around. One part of the blame is, why don't the Israelis or why don't we do something about this? And the other is that it's been sort of Arab – I'm quoting the broader Arab policy – to keep these people as refugees in order that someday they may return. Were we looking at this to say, "Get out of this and let's get on with ..."

COWAL: Well, Stu, I think you're very accurate and I would say it was some of each, but probably the base of a lot of it was both the leadership in the Arab world and the Arab community was such that they never wanted people to feel that they were settled there. They wanted these to be temporary houses. There would be these examples of trees being pulled up. Nobody wanted you to plant trees. This was never supposed to be more than your temporary place until you would go back to your home in Jaffa or your home in Ramallah or wherever your home was. That was certainly a part of it.

Q: Did you find in running programs in Gaza that you felt that Israelis or were concerned about what we were doing there?

COWAL: Yes. We had permission to go, but I think there was close scrutiny, also, of what we did.

Q: Any sort of veto, or did you ever get somebody who said to you aside and said, "Let's not do that." Did you feel any pressure one way or the other?

COWAL: Well, I think you felt a lot of subtle pressure. I don't remember anyone ever saying anything so directly as "Let's not do that," but they would have ways of making things somewhat difficult. I mean, they had roadblocks all over the place. So unless you were very determined to do things, did you really go ahead and do it? If you only had your speaker out there for three days, and you knew that he could get a terrific audience at Haifa University and a terrific audience at Bir Sheva and a terrific audience here, and you would say, "Well, of these three days we should take him to Gaza for one day." But you would know that that day could well be spent standing at roadblocks or sitting in roadblocks, and then you would get there and maybe somehow the word that you were coming would have never gotten out. So you'd sit four hours in roadblocks and five people would show up. Now, was that because they didn't want to come or they never heard about it? It was occupied territory.

So the next time somebody was going to come and you had a real hotshot and you'd say, "Gee, where do I put my priorities here? Do I have five lectures with 500 people each and this guy's going to reach 2,500 people who also want to hear what he or she has to say, or am I going to reduce that by half in order to sit in a roadblock for half a day and see five people?" So they made it difficult for you, and the logistics also made it difficult – I mean, the fact that there were no good facilities. The Israelis didn't really want large numbers of people gathered anywhere. But we saw that as an important political objective and we tried to resist.

Q: Was there a Gaza Palestinian organization you could deal with, or was it sort of ad hoc each time?

COWAL: I honestly can't remember. I'm sure we built a little base of people that we could go back to, but they were ultimately not the final arbiters. So the Israelis would just close the borders because there had been an incident across the borders, so there was nothing that these people at the little community center or wherever we planned to carry out a program could do about that. Again, I think I said that earlier, being the cultural attaché put me in Israel within a milieu which was in general not in much agreement with the Likud government, with the Begin government. So most of my Israeli friends, and I would say friends and contacts, I think with the exception of the people that I came to know in government and politics who we sent on International Visitor grants, and a lot of those of course were Likud Party politicians – because they were the party in power, and obviously we wanted and needed to work with them. But I would say my work with the cultural institutions, the Israeli Philharmonic and the dance companies and the seven universities within Israel, the people that I knew in those contexts were overwhelmingly opposed to government policy and shocked by it in many cases, and frustrated by it.

You had an awful lot of people who basically agreed with me, and it would take the form of sort of wry humor and wry jokes, and one of them that I remember was the grandfather was walking along with his little grandson, and he says, "Oh, when I was a young man, I planted those trees." The grandson sort of acknowledges this. "When I was a young man, I put these sidewalks in, and when I was a young man, we built that school." And, finally, the little boy says, "Grandpa, when you were a young man, were you a Palestinian?" Because these days, nobody does that work.

There was this feeling that the effect of this whole two-class society and all this kind of stuff was that the ideals of the state of Israel itself, which after all was this Zionist thought of Jews shouldn't just be bankers and intellectuals, they should be farmers and builders and workers and policemen and criminals, and ordinary things in an ordinary place, particularly after 1967, and the large influx of Arab labor began to undermine that, and that was seen by a lot of people.

Q: What you're saying sort of parallels what happened in Saudi Arabia in the Emirates and all of that, in that with the oil money, the native population didn't work. They sat at the top and brought in – it's a different problem – they brought in Koreans and Indonesians and ...

COWAL: Oh, and Indians.

Q: And all that, but at the same time, it saps the work ethic.

COWAL: And that happened, but the difference was also that – I never served in Saudi Arabia or the Gulf – but they didn't have this, I don't think, this whole philosophy and thought and idealism about what they were as people, and what they should be as people was this honest, humble, working person, who worked with his hands. Which is not traditionally a Jewish thing, but was one of the goals of the founding of the Jewish state in Palestine. The Zionist ideal is that somehow we will be all right with the world if we just have a number of bricklayers. Then, the fact that 30, 40 years later, that was no longer the case, because of the overwhelming nature of cheap labor on your doorstep. So even in the kibbutzim, which were the idealist of all the idealists, less so, but in order to produce enough, a lot of them, their work became not just agricultural but manufacturing. Things would be produced on a kibbutz, but in order to produce at a scale, whether it was an agricultural commodity or a part for an automobile, in order to produce at a scale which was economically viable, most of them got into hiring outside labor, and most of that labor was Arab. It affected lots of things.

Q: I was just curious as you were saying this, what about teenagers and young college students? In the United States, most of us had time going out and being waitresses or waiters, or working in a factory, or doing sort of manual labor, but picking up pretty good money for your college education, and it's part of the American growing up. Did you ...

COWAL: In Israel, it's quite different, I think. It's maybe closer to the United States than Latin America is, where if you're from a wealthy family and you're going to go to college, you're probably not going to work in the summer as a waitress, the way we might. In the Israeli context, all that skewed because of army service and all this stuff, so that makes it very different. And there are some good things about that and some bad things about that.

First of all, it makes the universities much more serious places, because nobody goes to the university, male or female, until they've had two or three years in the army. So a lot of people who would in our system go right from high school to college without really having a purpose or knowing why they wanted to be there, what they wanted to do, or whether or not they wanted a university education at all, they have two or three years to sort of sort that out. Then they almost all take a year after army service to bum around the world. It's a very Israeli thing to do, to go to Australia or India or whatever.

Q: Australians do this, too.

COWAL: Australians do this, too, but Israelis do it in huge numbers. It's kind of a different thing, and Israeli children are very spoiled. In part, I think it's because their parents are so worried about them, in many ways. The fact that they know at age 18 they're going to go off to the army means that they want them to enjoy age 16 on a surfboard and not carrying glasses. Again, then you have here's all this cheap labor, so it probably keeps the cost of labor down, and your university education is probably not a huge cost factor, either. So I would say that by and large, kids work, maybe at home they mow the grass, they do various kinds of things, but I don't think there's the same "we all work in a fast-food restaurant," the way American teenagers tend to do.

Q: What about, getting towards the end of this Israeli time, what about Iran? You were there, I must say, during very momentous times in that part. I mean, you had Camp David, you had Iran and you had the Israeli problem and the hostages and all that.

COWAL: And we had Iraq, too. That was when the Iraqis were, at least according to Israeli intelligence, and I think this has been corroborated by other sources over time, were building a nuclear weapons capability under the guise of building a nuclear power capacity. But they had fissionable material, and one day, and it must have been in, I suppose, about '81 – I can't remember exactly the date. But the Israelis just went and took it out, using F-16s, of course which they had bought from us, which were never supposed to be used and things like that, and largely getting away with it, I must say. In some ways, if you think about the Gulf War, 10 years after that, if they had been sitting there not simply with SCUD missiles coming in, but with nuclear weapons being directed at them, it would have been a very different place. So it was a preemptive strike, apparently based on very correct intelligence, and I think the world sort of blinked and said, "Fine, you did it."

Q: Absolutely. There are times and places when one just goes ahead.

COWAL: There is an "Axis of Evil," after all.

Q: Well, first place, before we go to Iran, in Lebanon, were the hostages there – this is the time of the Lebanese civil war, or when Americans were being taken hostage. Did that have any reflections on life in your business?

COWAL: I left right before Sabra and Shatila happened. I left in June, and that was in September of 1982. I think the reflection was that between the huge hostage taking in Iran, when the Iranians took over the American embassy, and the fact that journalists and others were getting kidnapped on a more individual basis in Lebanon, made the whole world seem less secure to us.

Q: What was the Israeli reaction to the events in Iran?

COWAL: Well, first of all, the events in Iran generated a new influx of Jewish refugees, many of whom settled permanently in Israel. It was a time when I can remember the luxury hotels in Israel looking like refugee camps, because the Iranian Jews who had stayed until 1979 I think were basically fairly well off. I think the very poor Jews had left in 1948 and so on, but the people who had stayed were those who were bankers and lawyers and people who were well off.

Q: And the shah had solid relations with Israel.

COWAL: The shah had solid relations with Israel, as being the two non-Arab countries in the Middle East, and they had very close relationships, military, economic. So, as I said, those Jews who were living in Iran were in pretty good shape, economically. Then the shah fell and the revolution came and they had to get out very quickly, and, of course, one of the things that Israel offers is it's the home for any Jew who wants to make it his home. So there's no question there of whether there would be – as there would be in the United States about whether you would be accepted as a refugee and so on. You are accepted, if you can prove your mother is a Jew. It's all about your mother, you know. If your mother is a Jew, you're a Jew.

So you would go along the beachfront in Tel Aviv from the Sheraton Hotel to the Dan Hotel to the Hilton to the other fancy hotels, and in every lobby – I can remember this going on for months – it would look like a refugee camp, because people were renting these very expensive hotel rooms, but the place where they had – and this was winter time. You do get a winter in Israel. The Mediterranean whips up and the rain comes. And so the playground for the children and so on was the lobby of the Hilton Hotel, so you would come in and you would realize there was a vast array of people who were essentially camped out there. They were camped out in $100 a day hotel rooms, but their play space was the downstairs lobby in the Hilton Hotel.

That was a dynamic that was going on, and then I suppose the loss of the relationship of the state to state or government to government made the world even less secure for Israelis and caused their paranoia to go up even higher, I suppose.

Q: Well, did you find that the cultural program, the stuff that you were doing, changed, or were you sort of preaching to the choir as far as our concerns about our hostages and all?

COWAL: Well, I think we were preaching to the choir, basically, the same way I suspect if we're talking about our concerns of terrorism post 9/11. It must be a very different lecture in Israel than it is in Saudi Arabia.

Q: We're going through a very difficult period, certainly, the Israelis and the Palestinians are right now. I mean, there's practically an all-out war, with suicide bombers and all that. But life, I take it, within what we would call present-day Israel, was secure, wasn't it?

COWAL: No, it wasn't secure. It was, I suppose, statistically rather secure, but certainly during the time I was there there were some high-profile incidents which involved very normal people. Not at the scale we see now, but I remember one incident in which an intercity bus was captured by a terrorist, or terrorists, and one of the places it went was on the highway right in front of my apartment. I don't remember actually seeing this, and I think the Israelis were successful at finally halting the bus, storming it, killing the hijackers, but during which time several of the people who were on the bus also got killed. It wasn't before the bomb days. Again, the pace of it, the level of the violence, was much less than what we have today, but I don't think it felt like a secure place.

I'd come from Colombia, and there you either had a feeling that you were targeted or you weren't, as an individual. That might be that you were a foreign oil company executive or whatever and, again, these are conflicts that go on and on when you hear about the FARC (Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia) getting Ingrid Betancourt the other day. But it was that kind of thing. They were after Ingrid Betancourt or Nicolas Escobar, who was the Texaco president when I was there. But they weren't after Sally Grooms. So you lived in a fairly secure world. You got to Israel and it was much more terrorism, as we've now come to define terrorism, and that was to make the whole civilian population feel unsafe. That could take the form of extreme security consciousness on the streets and in the airports and in the supermarkets. You were always being asked to look around for any suspicious packages, and if you saw a suspicious package. We didn't come to that in the United States until maybe this year. I'm talking about

The first night I was in Israel, I was given a ticket for Joan Baez concert at a Roman amphitheater called Caesarea, outside of Tel Aviv, 30, 40 miles outside of Tel Aviv. Somebody had this ticket, and I guess as the new cultural attaché I guess I was supposed to go hear Joan Baez, so out I went. A driver took me or something, I wasn't with any Israeli or something. I just walked in and was seated in this amphitheater along with everybody else, and they had metal folding chairs arranged around the Roman amphitheater kind of thing, and before Joan Baez came on stage, some guy walked out on the stage and he said something in Hebrew and everybody stood up and they went like this. I thought, well, it's a prayer or something. It's a theocracy.

Q: You were standing – to get this on tape – you were standing up, bowed over, looking down.

COWAL: So we stood up, everybody bowed over and they looked down and I thought, "This is my first day in Israel, I'm not Jewish. I guess this is what they do." I later came to find out that there was a bomb scare and he was asking everybody to look under their seats and see whether there were any packages. So that was my first introduction to the fact that there might be something under your seat that you should worry about, and I think we became, all of us – you didn't know whether you would be in the Carmel Market on Friday morning and pick up the wrong orange and it would be a bomb.

I say, much smaller scale than these terrible things that have happened in the last couple of years, but certainly you were not without that sense that acts of violence, acts of terrorism, would be random and it could just as well be you as anybody else who was caught up in them. I don't think we felt very secure, and I suppose the greater the tensions in the Middle East, the less secure we felt. Now, we didn't feel that our embassy was going to be taken over and we were all going to become hostages the way our neighbors in Tehran were.

Q: As always, it was a difficult time. I mean, the Middle East is always – and you had things going on. I mean, Lebanon and Iran. Was there any ...

COWAL: I also had another interesting experience while I was there, and then we should probably end this. But I was single in those days, and I had divorced from my first husband and was in Israel as a single person. It was the time when the first Egyptian ambassador arrived and he was also single. Much older than I, he had been a diplomat for King Farouk. He had begun his diplomatic career, he was probably 20 or 25 years older than I. We never had what I would call a romantic relationship, but I was sort of a convenient person for him to take along when he wanted or needed somebody to go with him to a dinner party or a concert or whatever to which he had been invited.

It was another sort of whole slice of life, seeing this in a way through the eyes of the first Arab representative in Israel, and that was also fascinating. The way that he was welcomed by Israelis was fascinating. He was like a rock star. People would recognize his car and start waving. There was, on the part of the Israeli public – every place you would go, after Camp David, there were doves up in all these little statues, little banners and stuff. All the signs at roundabouts and stuff in town, they would say, “Peace, Shalom, Salaam,” and it would be in the three languages, and there was this great feeling. In some ways, Saad Murtada, who was the ambassador, was the recipient of many of these warm feelings, so here you’ve got this Arab nationalist. He’s gone through King Farouk, and then Nasser, and then Sadat, but a very cultured, educated person, nonetheless an Arab nationalist or whatever, and he’s sent to this position – very interesting.

Q: Did you get any feeling from him about how he was looking at Israel at that time?

COWAL: Well, I think skeptically, but he was also I think very moved by this warmth that poured out toward him. I must say, I knew the Israeli ambassador to Egypt, also, because he had been an academic, a guy named Shimon Shamir, and he was at Tel Aviv University. He was the head of, I think, an institute for the study of Arab cultures or something, at Tel Aviv, so the Israelis had named him as their first ambassador to Egypt. Of course, they’re not comparable. Here, he goes to Egypt, which is a country at that time of 40 or 50 million people, most of whom are uneducated and illiterate, so they don’t even have the foggiest clue that some person from a strange planet has come to their midst. Whereas in Israel you have at that time maybe 3 or 4 million people, all of whom are highly political, highly literate, and every single one of them knows there’s a new Egyptian ambassador, and most of them are excited and enthusiastic about it.

But Shimon Shamir, it was a very cold reaction on that side, where it was a very warm reaction on the Israeli side. So he had his official contacts. I think people were correct with him, diplomatic. Sadat received him, and later Mubarak and so on, but there was not in any way the same kind of thing.

Q: Before we finish this, I wonder if we could just do one last thing, and that is to talk – you left, the Israelis had already invaded.

COWAL: Yes.

Q: What was the reaction from the embassy and from your contacts, because it looked like Sharon was running away with it? He was defense minister.

COWAL: I was at the meeting when Glenn went to see Begin. Of course, so was Lewis, and we were constantly briefing, Sam was, high-level visitors like that that they had to deliver the message that there was no green light there, that whatever they might think the American people thought or the American Congress thought, that the American government would take a very negative view of an Israeli invasion of Lebanon. I heard Glenn deliver that message. Anybody who says that, “Gee, they didn’t know, they never heard from the American government that this would be something we would regard very adversely,” doesn’t understand the whole story. They might have gotten winks or nods from their particular friends in Congress, but they got a drumbeat from Sam and from every person who came to visit. I saw that part of it.

I would say that most of my Israeli friends, and I’ve already described them – and the tension began to build. You began to know that it might well happen as Sharon ran amok. I would get calls every day from people, either at the office or at home, and they would say, “You,” meaning the American government, not me, Sally, “You have to stop these people. You are the only thing they will listen to. You have to stop them, because they are heading for disaster.” I can remember that extremely clearly.

I was originally supposed to leave in August and go to the Senior Seminar, and suddenly I had to take over, and we’ll get onto that next time, but I had to take over this job, the way it always is in the Foreign Service. It simply had to be done and could only be done by me, and must be done tomorrow and not in August or any other time. Therefore, I would leave in two weeks and get on a plane and go to work the next day and have deferred home leave and all that sort of stuff. So suddenly I was on a fast track to doing something else. I think I got my orders the day of the Israeli invasion of Lebanon, which was in June sometime, and I had 10 days. I was going to leave 10 days later, after I got my orders, and really I had been there four years, and really I had an enormous number of friends and contacts, and despite the fact that all this was going on, everybody wanted to have a farewell party for me.

So I would have, sort of always gone through, the kind of breakfast, lunch and dinner when it’s all sort of a blur and you think you’re never going to get done having these parties, but you do want to see everybody. It was so surreal, because every night I would be at a group of friends, a party sort of for me, and many of the men who would come would have earlier in the day been in Lebanon. In other words, they were soldiers who were sort of mobilized for day trips, and then they would come back at night and go home and sleep in their own beds. It was a very strange situation. Or somebody would have been there the week before or whatever. Because of this whole reserve thing, everybody got called up.

I mean, obviously, the regular troops were doing what the regular troops were doing. The reservists were usually on logistical missions or they were doctors or they were something or another, whereas they weren’t actually mobilized but they were required to do certain things. So it was very surreal, were we in a war? Then, of course, my own emotions, my own at leaving, but I think one thing really sticks out in my mind, and that was going to the largest hospital in Tel Aviv, and it’s called Tel Hashomer Hospital. The director of the hospital was a friend of mine, a medical doctor, who was also the chairman of the Fulbright Commission, and I had obviously worked very closely with them.

I can’t remember his medical degrees, but whatever they were, he was at that point running this 1,000-bed hospital or whatever, with six operating rooms. I went to pay a farewell call on him as the chairman of the Fulbright Commission, and he was maybe 15 or 20 minutes late to the meeting, which was uncharacteristic for him, and he walked in the room and he apologized for keeping me waiting. He said he had just been in a meeting of the whole board of directors of the hospital, because they had been called together to make a decision about whether they would tie up one of the operating theaters for an eight-hour operation on a small Lebanese girl who was a blue baby, and who had been brought back in an Israeli military hospital by Israeli soldiers who had seen her on the street and realized that she needed an operation.

Q: I might add that in present-day terms, a blue baby was a child who was suffering from heart deficiency.

COWAL: Right, and it looked that way. So this was a baby whose heart – apparently, probably one of these medics who was up there saw this child on the street, recognized immediately, without doing a CAT scan or something, what the diagnosis was. They had somehow brought this child and the mother on the helicopter to Tel Hashomer Hospital, along with some wounded Israeli soldiers who had been evacuated. So the hospital board had had a long meeting to decide whether or not the operating theater and doctors should be occupied to do this operation, and they had decided that it should happen. That, to me, said so many things about Israel, and my own sort of conflicted notions of what it was all about. Was it this power country invading a small neighbor, or was it this humanitarian “we have something to offer the world and maybe we can express that in the form of an operation on a child who won’t live another year if she doesn’t have.” I guess we’ll leave it there.

LEON WEINTRAUB
Hebrew Language Training, Foreign Service Institute
Washington, DC (1979-1980)

Consular Officer
Tel Aviv (1980-1982)

Mr. Weintraub was born and raised in New York City, educated at Hunter College, Brooklyn College and the Universities of Pittsburgh and Wisconsin. After service in Liberia with the Peace Corps he entered government service, first with the Navy Department and then with the State Department Foreign Service. His service in Washington and abroad involved him with a variety of countries and issues including African Affairs, International Organizations, Narcotics and Peace-Keeping operations in Africa. His foreign posts were Bogotá, Tel Aviv, Lagos, Quito and Geneva. Mr. Weintraub was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: Hebrew.

WEINTRAUB: Yes.

Q: And had you- I can’t remember, had you gone to Hebrew school?

WEINTRAUB: Oh yes, I’d gone to Hebrew school, and like a lot of children of my generation we learned to read the Hebrew in the prayer books, learned to sound out the vowels and the consonants, but we had minimal instruction in Hebrew as a language; a little bit, but very minimal. The main job of going to Hebrew school was the ability to participate in services. This was obviously shortly after the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948 so Hebrew was just reemerging as a living language again, so it was not considered of major import when I was in Hebrew school to learn Hebrew as a language. It was mainly to be able to participate, to conduct service, to participate in services. So as our Hebrew instructor said when discussing the types of backgrounds people brought to the class, he kind of jokingly -

Q: This is at FSI?

WEINTRAUB: At FSI. He jocularly said, oh, so you know how to ask God for something, but when he answers you you're unable to understand Him. So I had very limited knowledge of conversational Hebrew but I guess I had a little bit of a leg up on other students in that at least I could recognize all the letters, I could recognize the vowels that were placed underneath the letters and at least I could sound out the words. But obviously I didn't have any particular advantage when it came to learning the structure of the language and how the language worked.

Q: Well, you took that for eight months, is that right?

Q: And then off- how did you come out?

WEINTRAUB: Well, I managed to get a 3/3. We had one primary instructor for the full period of instruction, with one other instructor to assist - unlike the Spanish, where each month for the four months you had a different Spanish instructor with different accents from different parts of South America.

We had a student in class, a U.S. military officer who was going to be assigned to the Office of the Defense Attaché at the U.S. Embassy in Israel. He had previously been assigned to an Arabic-speaking country, I think it was Oman. He was probably the best student in the class, in that he had such a good understanding of the pattern of Arabic and Hebrew that he really did very well. FSI also had the feature to give you a break during this extended period of eight months of all-day language training. Wednesday afternoons, I think it was, rather than language training we had area studies, so we learned about the politics, the culture, the background of the Middle Eastern area. We had a - one of our Hebrew teachers, in fact, was the spouse of an officer who I would later serve with overseas.

Q: Who was that?

WEINTRAUB: The officer was Michael Einik, who later became ambassador to Macedonia. His wife is Israeli. He had served earlier in the Sinai, in the Sinai mission as part of the disengagement.

Q: How do you spell his name?

WEINTRAUB: E-I-N-I-K. He's now living overseas, I believe. Anyway, he had served in the Sinai field mission, which was established I believe after the '73 war, and he was assigned there. He met and eventually married this Israeli woman, and she was his dependent. While he was in the United States she was employed as a Hebrew language instructor at FSI.

So then in, I guess in the summer of 1980, by then, I think, June or July of 1980, we were off to our second assignment, to Tel Aviv, Israel.

Q: You were there from when to when?

WEINTRAUB: It was a two-year assignment, as our assignment in Colombia was, so we were there from the summer, or June/July of 1980 until around June or July of 1982.

Q: When you arrived in 1980, what would you say was the situation in Israel?

WEINTRAUB: In Israel, there's always a crisis of one kind or another in this country, either with its neighbors -- obviously with the history of warfare and conflict with the neighbors -- or internally. It is such a hothouse atmosphere - of new immigrants, of the older societies. Actually, shortly before we arrived there had just been a tidal wave of change in government. From Israel's independence until the time we arrived, there'd been a monopoly of rule by the Labor party, by the Labor party itself or an alliance with other central left or further leftist governments. This was all the Israelis had ever known. But the other party, the Likud party, led by Menachem Begin, was gradually winning inroads and I think, when I was in language training, in the fall of '79, there was a change in government. So this was something that Israelis had to adjust to, the Labor party being on the outs, being the minority.

Also there was the proverbial debate in Israel, and this was heating up, it heats up in cyclical periods, the, so to speak, "Who is a Jew" debate. And this was, at least in part, an issue of the new society or the old societies of people who claimed Jewish heritage, whether in Ethiopia, in Sudan, or other places. Were these or were these not the lost tribes of Israel? They were groups of people who had obviously some rituals in common with old Jewish practice, but had no familiarity with the Hebrew language - but certain foods, certain prayers, certain rituals seemed to have an affinity, have a common root in ancient Hebrew practices. So are these people Jewish or not? Did they have the right of return to settle in Israel? Were they citizens when they arrived? Did they have to go through a conversion? Who would do it? This was a turmoil, this threw the country into turmoil, it entered into internal politics.

The orthodox branch of Judaism, the orthodox rabbinate had a monopoly, if you will, on things religious in the country for the most part, but particularly in the Labor party and other left wing elements of Israel and also in a lot of moderate Israeli settlements. And this is in a society with a fairly secular attitude toward religion, so there was more than a little bit of resentment against this kind of a monopoly of the orthodox rabbinate. So this was always part of the political situation in Israel, adapting to rule by a right wing party rather than a left wing party and this periodic issue of who has the right to settle in Israel; whether El Al Airlines has to be grounded on Saturday; whether the airport should be open on Saturday for flights that were not El Al. I mean, these things are going on all the time in the country and there are strikes, due to a very strong labor movement; it's just a hothouse atmosphere.

Q: This is, of course, before the Lebanese war, you might say.

WEINTRAUB: This is before the Lebanese war.

Q: Yes, so I imagine that's sort of a turning point or something.

WEINTRAUB: Well, there were always things happening when we were there. When we were there, from 1980 to 1982, we had the Israeli bombing of the Iraqi reactor; we had the assassination of Anwar Sadat in Egypt; and we had the, after constant shelling from southern Lebanon, we had the Israeli invasion of Lebanon, all the way up to Beirut when the Palestine Liberation Organization, the PLO and Yasser Arafat, were exiled all the way to Tunisia. You know, the civil war in Lebanon had gone through the '70s, hostages were taken in Lebanon and of course the whole southern strip of Lebanon was in the hands either of the PLO or other terrorists groups; there was very little effective rule of the Lebanese government in southern Lebanon. There were a lot of refugee camps, other settlements and there were cross border incursions all the time, there were incidents with settlements in Israel; one incident in the settlement of Ma'a lot in 1974, where the school was taken over, a lot of children were killed. And the border between Israel and Lebanon was always a hot spot, and eventually with rockets being shot into Israel, Israel decided they had to take action and then they invaded - that was in the summer of '82, shortly before we left.

Q: What was your job? You had several jobs?

WEINTRAUB: Well, I started in the visa section, continuing, so for the first year I was in the visa section. At this point the embassy was going under a lot of reconstruction, rehabilitation. It was in a situation where the Congress never gave the State Department enough funds to do a good job on fixing up and modernizing the embassy in Tel Aviv. This was because, as it had been expressed in numerous resolutions, the Congress wanted the embassy to be in Jerusalem to respond to a political wish, and it was the position of the administration, although every president in every campaign always said we would do our best -

Q: When they get to New York.

WEINTRAUB: Right. We will do our best to move the embassy to Jerusalem. Of course, when they got into power it was always "The status of Jerusalem remains to be settled, it's an object of dispute, we don't want to upset the issue." So Congress would give a bare minimum of funds to refurbish the embassy in Israel and it looked it; it was a pretty shabby building. Inside it was like a rabbit warren of little offices and stairways, probably a fire hazard, I suspect. And in fact the visa section was physically separate several blocks away for most of the time I did consular work in Israel. Near the end of that year, however, an improved visa-processing section was reopened in the main embassy building. So I believe, if I'm not mistaken, that I was six months in the NIV line, in the non-immigrant visa line, then three months on immigrant visas, followed by three months with American citizens services issuing new passports, issuing birth certificates, doing notarials, a lot of other issues of concern with American citizens living in Israel, or with visiting Americans who may have been arrested and put into prison, had emergencies, people who needed a passport and had to travel. And then the immigrant visa work was with people who had to go through the more elaborate procedure who wanted to emigrate legally to the United States.

Q: Who was the ambassador at the time?

WEINTRAUB: The ambassador was Samuel Lewis, who ended up serving, I think, as ambassador either seven or eight years, I forget how many.

Q: Oh yes, yes.

WEINTRAUB: I think he had been there since maybe '77 or '78 so he was there for several years before and after I was there. Actually I see Ambassador Lewis occasionally in Washington these days.

Q: Well, let's take non-immigrant first. Who was- I mean, was this a standard thing or was there a problem of, you know, people particularly from that time, Soviet Union, would come into Israel, and then were they trying to peel off and go to the United States?

WEINTRAUB: Well, one thing I remember on the NIV line is that I formed kind of model of what your potential illegal immigrant would be and I found it to be quite different in my own mind with what it was in Colombia. I had the impression that in Colombia I was watching out particularly for people in the bottom on the socio-economic scale, people who didn't see a way out, people that didn't see a good future for themselves in Colombia, either through lack of education or maybe they came from a depressed class. These were the people who presumably would be the busboys, the dishwashers, the hairdressers, the manicurists, who would fill these kind of low-skilled entry service jobs in New York and other urban centers in the United States. So these were the people you had to watch out for being illegal immigrants. People who had reasonable jobs, who had high school education, college education, could probably do well in Colombia and with any degree of success they would be able to hire a maid, if not a live-in at least a part-time maid, maybe a cook as well, and they could live fairly well.

It was my impression, in Israel, however, that it was not people on the bottom of the scale you had to watch out for illegal immigration; it was people in the middle. And by this I mean that for people in the bottom of the scale, first of all, geographically you were much further away. It wasn't like a flight and an hour-and-a-half you were in Miami where there was a welcoming community already for you. It was halfway around the world. And Israel, of course, had a much more developed social welfare network than in Colombia. Colombia, like most developing countries didn't have much in the way of a social welfare network; social security, you know, like the school system, didn't serve those of the lower classes very well. Israel was a much more egalitarian society, and it had a pretty good social welfare network, so people at the bottom didn't feel they had to escape. There were minimum wages and there was definitely more of a socio-economically integrated society, one that tended to look after its less fortunate; something of an attitude of "we're in this all together," you know, we are the refugees; the flotsam and jetsam gathered from around the world, we help our people who need help. So people at the bottom didn't feel they had to escape or that there was no future in front of them.

It was my impression that for people starting out in the entrepreneurial sector, people who were businessmen, hustlers who wanted to succeed, and other very ambitious people – for these people, Israel just offered too small a landscape for them. This was a country of four, five million people. If you're an entrepreneur this was just too small and constraining an environment for you.

There was nowhere to go. So these people could have connections in Europe, in the U.S. and it was my impression that these were the people who would be more likely to use a visitor's visa with intentions of becoming a U.S. resident. Now, they wouldn't fill the low level jobs, chances are they would find a way to adjust legally if that was possible; they wouldn't stay submerged in an underground economy because they would be obviously fairly visible as entrepreneurs in the United States. Nevertheless, however, we were not there to encourage people to use the NIV route in order to later become a legal immigrant. There were ways to do that, obviously. So this was kind of the insight I developed into how you interviewed people in the non-immigrant visa line.

Q: Well, as an old consular officer myself, when you're dealing with a hustler in any country, they don't take no for an answer, particularly when you're coming to Israel where I understand controversy and debate is, you know, the pastime of everybody.

WEINTRAUB: It certainly is a very argumentative society, a society where people don't take no for an answer. And it never took place with real animus, debate was never- it was heated occasionally, but never with venom or vindictive. People knew you had the right and they respected you for that, and as long as you were honest and upfront, you know, that's the way things were. But the Israeli society, as I said, is like a hothouse, there's a lot of pressure, people become very argumentative by nature, and people don't like to be thwarted if they have an ambition like that.

Also in the NIV situation, some Soviet Jews had started to come there, the U.S. Jackson-Vanik legislation had helped emigration. Also when I was there, after the revolution in Iran, a lot of Iranian Jews had begun to arrive in Israel. There was a sizeable Jewish community in Iran, a lot of them quite wealthy, they had done very well under the shah, who had apparently encouraged people to be entrepreneurial, and they did quite well. But after the revolution in the fall of '79, large numbers, either before the revolution or shortly after when they were able to get out, did come out. Perhaps they had bank accounts overseas already, maybe they were able to get funds out anyway, but they were now living in Israel, Israel obviously accepted these people no questions asked, on the principle that they were emigrating to Israel. But then these people also, my impression is, felt a little bit in a straightjacket by the size of Israel and the scope it offered for business people and entrepreneurs.

Q: Yes, and it was basically a socialist society.

WEINTRAUB: It is very much. Israel was definitely – it had characteristics of a socialist society, with very high income taxes and other things of that nature. And I guess there was a pretty sizeable Iranian Jewish community in Los Angeles and other parts of Southern California as well, so a lot of these people, they came with - I mean, they had bank accounts that I could never hope to amass and they could buy their way into the United States. If there was just a legal way to do it, they could do it and there were so-called, I don't know if they still have these, but the U.S. had a category of Investors Visas. And a lot of these people could do that at the drop of a hat. You bought into an American company or you were going to start an American company with the provision that you would offer employment to so many Americans, and you could get an Investors Visa that way. So it was quite a challenging environment - whether the former Soviet refuseniks, the émigré Iranians, or the general mix of Israeli society, visa work was endlessly fascinating.

I remember one fellow - we also had to be aware of the pattern of Israeli society, with young people just getting out of the military service. You know, they might have four years of very tough military service and there's a pattern in Israeli society that after military service they go hitchhiking around the world. It's called a "tramp," and it's quite a tradition. So they go for a "tramp." And these people are usually very well grounded in Israeli society, and there's usually not much anxiety about them not returning, particularly if they had good service in the military, essential for- very helpful for a career in Israeli society. So young, single people, without a great deal of assets in a country like Bogotá - in Colombia, you might be very suspicious about such people for visa purposes. In Israel, probably not as much. But you always had to talk to people.

So I remember one fellow who had just finished his service in the military, and he brings a new passport in for a U.S. visa, and I said well, "Where are you going? And, typically, these people would crash in youth hostels, with friends, or with other Israelis scattered all over the United States. I said, being a bit of a tease, "You know, you've never been to the United States, it's very expensive. Where are you going to go?" He offered me some story, like, "We have ways, there are Israelis all over, I can find out." And I said, "Have you ever had a passport before this one?" He said, "No I haven't." I said, "You've never even been outside of Israel. How do you know, how do I know you're going to be able to get along; you won't have a problem in the United States?" So he looks at me with a conspiratorial look and he says, "I've been outside this country; where I went I didn't need a visa to go to." Obviously he'd been in Lebanon. So, there were always interesting stories.

Even in Colombia, though somewhat of less variety than in Israel, we had a lot of Foreign Service nationals working in the visa section. It was very interesting to me that the local employees we had - what a variety of conditions or countries they'd come from. In Israel, for example, some were second or third generation Israelis - they came from Russia, from Iraq, from Iran, and many other countries. I mean, it was a fantastic experience to see these people working all together. So it was quite an enjoyable experience.

Q: Well, Leon, Israel is an interesting society and it has a relatively small, really orthodox community and you get at the airport you see guys in the typical whatever the outfit is, the hat and the-

WEINTRAUB: The long black coat.

Q: Long black coat and all that. And apparently these are two different societies that don't quite even really almost live in the same- I mean, the same mental thing. How did you find dealing with, or did you deal with the orthodox, I'm talking about the really orthodox community?

WEINTRAUB: Well, obviously the really orthodox community doesn't mix very much outside of its own community so there were certain areas, sectors or neighborhoods of Jerusalem or Tel Aviv where they tend to live. They obviously like to be within, or they have to be within walking distance of a synagogue since they don't drive on the Sabbath. And obviously they don't take an active part in public service, in the government so-

Q: Or military service either, do they?

WEINTRAUB: Some “modern” orthodox do but the “ultra” orthodox typically don’t, they’re exempt from military service, which creates a certain amount of resentment, of course, within Israeli society. But there are other elements within the total orthodox community where, in fact, the youth do serve in the military. So in most embassy work one would not meet typically these ultra orthodox people. They have their businesses, their shops and they like to keep to themselves. There is a religious party in Israel and in my second year as political officer I met with people from the religious party, and those people who were the party officers were somewhat on the secular side of the spectrum. They held secular office and they met with diplomats as well; they did not wear the black hats and that typical outfit, so to speak. But it was a very different society and even the Israelis talked about them as “the black hats.” Often, when there were certain occasions, whether there was a marriage between two families in this society or some other occasion, a funeral, perhaps, the streets would be full of a sea of these people, it looked like a march of the penguins, all you saw was the black and white, the white shirts and the black jackets and black hats. But a significant number of Israelis thought these people received undue deference from the government of the day, whether it was subsidizing of the religious schools - even “secular” schools had to obey certain constraints about which holidays to observe - or whether the airport could be open on Saturday for servicing non-El Al flights. The fact that El Al could not fly on Saturday, that was a given, but whether the airport should be open to receive flights from Air France or anyone else, was, it seemed, always a point of contention. In short, there was a constant state of tension in society.

Q: Well, visa-wise, was there sort of an automatic giving an orthodox a visa or not or how did that work? I’m talking about non-immigrant.

WEINTRAUB: Well, not necessarily. I guess one could be more likely to view them with a more positive outlook as a visa applicant. Generally they were fairly established. One didn’t see these people as engaging in entrepreneurial activity; they seemed to be fairly settled, have large families at a fairly young age. But often if they were involved in import-exports, some of them may have been involved in the diamond trade. Israel had a diamond cutting or diamond polishing sector.

Q: Up in Amsterdam too.

WEINTRAUB: Amsterdam as well, and of course there is the diamond center in New York where you see a lot of the black hat guys working on 5th Avenue. So there was a trade and you had to recognize that. But, you know, you couldn’t give them a pass, they had to meet the requirements.

Q: Well, how did you find being Jewish in the business of handing out something that people wanted, as is true of all visa officers? At one point I know, and I don’t know when they had stopped it, but I go back quite a ways, it was policy not to assign Jewish officers to Israel because the feeling that there would be undue pressure put on them.

WEINTRAUB: Yes, I think -

Q: This is true of some other nationalities too.

WEINTRAUB: Right, I think that - I don't know when that policy ended, but it was obviously not in effect when I was there. In fact, there were other Jewish officers at the embassy when I was there.

Q: So it was no longer even an issue, you weren't breaking ground or anything.

WEINTRAUB: No, no, no, not at all, not at all. And some of the visa applicants, you know, would see my name on the plaque next to the window and they would say, "Oh, you're Jewish?" And they might try to use that as an "in" to try to curry favor, perhaps - but for most people it was immaterial, you were just another American; they just saw you as a representative - as a vice consul of the United States. I can't say that many people tried to use that as a point to use favors in the visa process.

Q: I know I was in the consul general in Athens at one time and we had some Greek Americans, you know, officers and all that would try to pull some- but you know, an American is an American is an American.

WEINTRAUB: Yes, I think so, I think so. We have to do our job and in the immigrant visa section we still, you know, have to go through things quite completely. I remember, there was a case where one fellow, he was going to be getting a visa as an immigrant to be an auto mechanic and I wasn't aware that there were shortages of auto mechanics. But some potential employer had filled out all the work and gotten approval through the Department of Labor that in fact there was a shortage in this category and yes, it was legal, but of course I didn't have any way of assessing, in fact, the man's skills as an auto mechanic. In other words, the paperwork in the U.S. was done, but we had to be convinced that the applicant could fill the job position. So I got the head of the motor pool to have a chat with this guy and it turned out I ended up refusing the fellow. The head mechanic of the motor pool said, well, maybe I'd trust him to change the oil in my car but not much more than that. So again, with the local employees who might be subject to bribes or pressure, whatever, to help out a fellow compatriot, a fellow Jew, Israel obviously has its problems of corruption like any society. But it's a fairly open society, and it's a fairly honest and hardworking society, I think.

Q: How about, particularly when you moved over to American services, how did you find the American Jewish community? I mean, there were two elements, one were the ones that came over to settle and the other one was the normal tourist.

WEINTRAUB: Well, as far as the tourists, I really had little to do with them. They rarely need to come to the embassy for anything, for any service. But the settlers were a mixed bag. Sometimes you had the very orthodox who had to come in to renew a passport, perhaps, or get a birth certificate for one of their children stating that he or she was an American citizen born overseas. One of them, I remember, came in the morning and said - after he looked at my name - he said, “Oh are you Jewish?” And I said “Yes.” And he looked at me and said, “Did you say the morning prayers this morning?” I said, “No, as a matter of fact, I skipped it this morning.” He then says, “Well, I have the prayer shawl with me and I have the book, we could do it now if you’d like.” I said I didn’t think this was the time and the place to do it and I would try to take care of it another time. There were other people who just, while they’re waiting for me -- maybe their passport had expired and they’re waiting for me to go through procedures to issue them a new passport, -- they start a conversation and might say, “Oh, you’re Jewish, did you ever think of settling here?” And it was just friendly conversation. There was some concern at the time, a fair amount of concern, actually, from Americans who settled in Israel for whatever indeterminate time that was, and received a notice to serve in the Israel army, in the military. There was a degree of anxiety about whether this would make them lose their American citizenship. And I guess there was a time when service in another military-

Q: It had, I think it was the Schneider Decision came out.

WEINTRAUB: I don’t know when that was.

Q: But that was in the, I think in the ‘70s.

WEINTRAUB: Well, this was in the early ‘80s. But it takes a time for that to filter through. And apparently the way the Israeli legislation was written, these people didn’t volunteer for the military, they were drafted.

Q: Yes, and that made a difference.

WEINTRAUB: That made a difference, and also with receiving Israeli citizenship. This was at the time when I think the U.S. only in certain limited circumstances allowed dual nationalities. It’s not as easy as it is now with dual nationalities. And people were concerned that if they had an Israeli passport they would they lose their American citizenship. You know, there was quite a bit of anxiety about this as well. And also the Israeli citizenship law apparently was written with this at least partly in mind in that if you were a settler, a Jewish settler, you did not have to apply for citizenship, you did not have to take such an affirmative act. Rather, such citizenship was awarded to you based on the fact that you had lived there for a certain time. You had to “opt out” of it if you did not want it, rather than make an application to receive it. So that way people could preserve their dual nationality. So there were a lot of these issues that I came to deal with.

One interesting case was some fellow who came to me from the orthodox community when I was in American services. It was in the spring I guess of 1982. No, no, of ’81, at the end of my first year, I was in American services. It was probably maybe a few weeks before the Passover holiday. And he saw my name, asked if I was Jewish, and then said, “Oh, are you observing Passover?” And I said, “Yes, of course.” And he asked me was I going to use a certain type of matzo, the unleavened bread required for observance of the holiday. Now, there is the typical unleavened bread kosher for Passover that one can buy in the supermarket. It’s packaged and it’s manufactured and it’s fully kosher, fully accepted for Passover. However, the ultra-orthodox may not really like that so they have a certain type of matzo [“matzah ‘shmurah,” or “Watched Matzah”] that they really like and it’s all handmade and it’s watched over to ensure that the water and the flour don't mix for over a certain amount of time before it's baked -- so to ensure that the mixture does not rise more than a certain amount, and can still be considered unleavened. So it really meets the code. So he asked me would I like some of this "matzah shmurah" for my Passover celebration. Oh, I said, sure, it would be an honor for me. What am I going to say, no I don't want? Sure, it would be an honor for me. He said okay, I'll come back tomorrow. So he brings me a box and it's, it's somewhat on the tasteless side, actually.

Q: Yes, I think library paste is a pretty good description.

WEINTRAUB: It's a circular matzo versus a square matzo that one buys in the stores and it's not meant to have a taste but it's meant for ritual purity to be out there. So of course next year he came to the embassy again and I got it, and I'll be darned if several assignments afterward he didn't follow me through the mail and "Watched Matzah" would arrive at other posts, unbidden. Somehow he was able to get my address. But he saw this as doing a good deed.

So I had some interesting discussions with people.

Q: Now, did you, particularly when you were doing sort of the consular business, did you get anything from either Gaza or the West Bank?

WEINTRAUB: No, those were all handled through the consulate in Jerusalem. The consulate in Jerusalem tended to be viewed, if you will, kind of as a sub rosa "embassy" for the U.S. to relate to the Palestinians. So it's a consulate in Jerusalem with a unique status. Officially, I think the consulate reports back to Washington directly, rather than through the embassy in Tel Aviv, and the consul general in Jerusalem -- I'm not sure jurisdictionally if the consul general is under the authority of the American ambassador in Israel.

Q: I don't think they think they are.

WEINTRAUB: Now, obviously there's a lot of coordination, and every week when the embassy held the country team meeting the consul general was there. Obviously, they worked together, but unlike, for example in my last post in Colombia, where we had a consul general in Medellin or in Barranquilla. These two officials obviously reported to the ambassador in Bogotá, in that this is one country. But the status of the West Bank obviously was different, since we did not recognize and still don't Israeli jurisdiction over the complete West Bank. Therefore, the consulate was not a constituent sub-post of the American embassy in Tel Aviv. So we in Tel Aviv did not do visa work for Palestinians who wanted to travel; they went to the consulate in Jerusalem. As far as Arab Americans who may have settled in Israel proper, such as in Haifa, we did have a consular agent in Haifa and they probably did go there. We probably got a small number who needed to come to the embassy for services. There were a small number of Arab Americans who came and we serviced them as any other American citizen.

Q: While you were- did you get involved in any prison problems or anything like that?

WEINTRAUB: Interesting, prison issues. There was a syndrome of behavior, I think, probably from some middle- to upper-income Jewish families in the United States, we discovered, where the kid wasn't turning out right, typically a male, a teenager, 18 or 19. The kid wasn't doing well in school, maybe got a little bit into drugs in the United States, so the thing was, well, we'll ship the kid off to Israel, they'll straighten him out, they're a tough bunch over there. You know, he'll live on a kibbutz; he'll do something, whatever.

Q Dry him out, the whole thing.

WEINTRAUB: Dry him, out, yes; there were a few instances of these kind of situations. And we had a few cases where those kids did not get dried out. Obviously they did not have to serve in the military, of course, they weren't there long enough to become citizens but the idea was somehow they would absorb through osmosis this Israeli kind of straight and tough upbringing. So there were a few of those that were hung out and were arrested for trying to deal in drugs or smuggle in drugs, and we had to visit them and see that they got whatever services the embassy could offer - we had to get in touch with their families; there were a few instances of those.

Q: But police problems weren't much of a problem for you?

WEINTRAUB: No, no, not particularly. I mean, Israel has a respected police force that I think respects the public and typically our security people always had very good relations with the police. Not a particular problem of any kind.

Q: Well then you moved over after a year, you moved to what, a political assignment?

WEINTRAUB: I moved into the political section and, since this was only my second assignment overseas and this was my first real assignment as a political officer, I was kind of the low man on the totem pole in the political section. I had a portfolio which was Israeli external relations and also the beginning of the so-called "normalization process" with Egypt. This was after - I remember it from when I was back in Bogotá - after the Camp David agreement. It was signed with the strong encouragement of President Jimmy Carter.

Q: Yes.

WEINTRAUB: ...the Camp David agreement, and also in '77, I believe it was, the visit of President of Egypt Anwar Sadat to Jerusalem. So this was unheard of, this opened up a whole new era and eventually, of course, led to the peace treaty between Israel and Egypt and the process for the withdrawal of Israel from the Sinai. When we arrived, Israel still had all the Sinai, and Israeli tour groups were operating tour groups to Sharm El Sheik all the way through the Sinai Peninsula just as if it would have been Israel, you know. It was very traumatic for Israel, the withdrawal from the Sinai -- some of the same process they're going through now with withdrawal from Gaza.

Q: Yes, I remember seeing fighting around-

WEINTRAUB: Around the settlement of Yamit. It was the settlement of Yamit, and Ariel Sharon, the current prime minister, was the military commander in charge of that withdrawal from that settlement in the Sinai. (end of side two, tape three)

Q: This is tape four, side one with Leon Weintraub. Yes.

WEINTRAUB: So now this was probably the fall of '81 and Israel was gingerly in steps withdrawing from the Sinai and there were Egyptian diplomats stationed in Israel and this was quite a novelty. Israel had a diplomatic mission in Cairo; this was also a novelty. Also, Israel was making some progress in reestablishing relations with a lot of sub-Saharan African countries. In the '60s and early '70s Israel had very large diplomatic representation in sub-Saharan Africa. They were doing a lot of aid projects, irrigation, agriculture, that was very helpful to a lot of sub-Saharan African countries. Well, after the Six Day War and then after the '73 war, the Yom Kippur War, the Arabs really got their act together. They had the oil embargo, of course, and they really put the screws to a lot of sub-Saharan African countries, saying if you want help from us -- and they were flush with oil money at the time -- they had to sever relations with Israel. So most of sub-Saharan African countries in the early '70s to the mid '70s severed relations with Israel. And this was somewhat of a blow for Israel.

By this time, in the late '70s and early '80s, Israel was saying to these countries, "Look, if Egypt can establish relations with us, Egypt, the fountainhead for much of the Arab world, the leading Arab country, the one we were at war with, if they can establish relations with us, why can't you and this country or that country?" It was an exciting time in that regard. I wouldn't say there were major earthshaking events, but for Israel this was important that some of the sub-Saharan countries were reestablishing relations with Israel again. So this was an interesting part of the portfolio. And of course the normalization with Egypt as well. And while I was not, so to speak, a legislative watcher, a watcher of the Knesset in internal Israeli politics as others were, nevertheless I did get to speak to members of the Knesset, members of the parliament who were watching international affairs. So I got to mix with different levels of Israeli society that I didn't meet during the visa year.

Q: I don't know if it would have applied to someone of Jewish extraction, in fact other people who were not of Jewish extraction said they always had the feeling that someone- that people were keeping book on American embassy officers, are they with us or against us and you know, it was-

WEINTRAUB: You mean the Israelis were keeping book?

Q: Yes, yes. Did you get this feeling?

WEINTRAUB: Oh, no doubt about it. Israel is very, you know -- I think it was Henry Kissinger who said, just because you're paranoid doesn't mean people aren't out to get you. And Israel has had very paranoid kind of tendencies. A beleaguered society can't be sure who's with them or who's not. The French were with them up to a point, and then they let them go. In the '73 war Nixon hung them out for a long time before eventually we supplied Israel with military equipment.

Let me give you an example of one incident. I remember, we were driving, my family and I, from Tel Aviv to Eilat. On the way down, we kind of took the main route, from Tel Aviv through Jerusalem down to the Red Sea and then straight down in a beeline from the Red Sea down to Eilat, a very nice area on the Red Sea and it's kind of a big resort area. Well, on the way back we decided to be a bit more adventurous and take more of a direct route, kind of the hypotenuse of the triangle, and we went through the Negev Desert, through the city of Be'er Sheva. It's a paved road but it's not a busy road at all, and we wanted to see a different part of the country.

Well apparently, at one point, you know, it's pretty hot driving through the desert, I have two young kids in there and one of the kids was a bit carsick and we needed to stop. So we stopped on some undistinguishable hill, a piece of ground, and let the kids walk around a little bit. Not within three minutes later an Israeli military jeep comes out from nowhere, I don't know where they come from, and a soldier gets out and he says, "Are you okay? What's your problem?" So I explained the situation, we're traveling with the kids, who I am, I have diplomatic license plates on my car. And he says "Oh, okay, I just wanted to check." And he gets back in the jeep and goes somewhere, he disappears behind some hills somewhere. So there's no doubt they are watching. And even though by this time Israel and the U.S. were very strong, had very strong alliances and very strong links, that by no means did not- no one received a pass.

Q: Yes.

WEINTRAUB: And obviously just by a diplomatic license plate they didn't know if you were Jewish or not, that made no difference. But even if you were American or not, that made no difference. And certainly if Europeans -- you know, they had their suspicions of French and others. So, and also if you were an American Jew you were, as far as they were concerned you were an American, you were an American and you represented the United States. And it really didn't make that much of a difference to them.

Q: Had the Jonathan Pollard case come up while you were there?

WEINTRAUB: No, that was later.

Q: Later.

WEINTRAUB: That was later. As a matter of fact, when - we'll get to it later when I was the INR analyst for Israel at the time, some time later.

Q: I do want to talk, that's a fascinating case.

WEINTRAUB: But you know, I occasionally went to religious services, we had our third child in Israel, a daughter in Israel. Probably though, interesting from a perspective of an American Jew in the Foreign Service, I didn't get as close to the Jewish society of Israel as I did in Colombia to the Jewish community in Colombia. Of course, the Jewish community in Colombia, they were a minority, a distinct minority. They had their own social events, they had a country club - I'm sure started like a lot of Jewish country clubs in the United States because they couldn't get into American-

Q: They were excluded.

WEINTRAUB: Right, they were excluded from American country clubs. So I fit in in that circle in Colombia very well as a welcome member. But in Israel everybody's Jewish so it's no big deal. We lived in a residential area, in a neighborhood. I mean, we were welcome as any young family with young children would be, but I didn't get the feeling that people went out of their way to invite us to holidays or anything else because we were Jewish because everybody was Jewish in the area.

Q: While you were there, was there any angst or whatever you want to call it, concern, expressed by the embassy officers and all about the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza?

WEINTRAUB: Well, it's something you're always aware of. The really large scale bombings, suicide bombings hadn't occurred yet. Mainly the acts were acts of terrorism coming over the Jordan River, coming from Lebanon, incursions from Gaza into Israel; it hadn't reached the level where there was great angst - you could travel, for the most part, even through the West Bank. I'm trying to remember - I mean, we went to the Dead Sea, we went to Nazareth, we went to other places; but I guess I don't recall specifically traveling to the West Bank. I think maybe you had to advise people at the embassy you were going to do it, the embassy wanted to know who was on the West Bank.

Q: Actually what I'm thinking about was there concern on the part of embassy officers about, I don't know if you want to call it the plight of the, I mean it was an occupation and the hand of the Israelis was pretty heavy on the Palestinians at the time. And later it became, you know, a matter and remains one of great world concern. But at that time was there much thought about this?

WEINTRAUB: Well, there was, I think it was there as part of - on everyone's mind, it was the backdrop for almost everything we did. Obviously the conflict in Jerusalem occupied much of the time of everyone at the embassy. Probably at senior levels I expect there was regular discussion between the ambassador and the prime minister, leading members of parliament, the defense ministry; I think at this period the occupation forces in the West Bank were still somewhat light. I think, you know, you didn't have the first Intifada, which took place in '86, '87.

Q: That really kicked, I mean, that was the first time-

WEINTRAUB: So at this point, I think, there was a kind of a coexistence of sorts, people were getting along together, Palestinians could work fairly easily in Israel, Israelis were setting up businesses in the West Bank, people were working together, there were some joint businesses, joint ventures. One knew it couldn't go on forever like this, but the border between the West Bank and Israel proper was nothing like it is now.

Q: Well, as a political officer, were there any issues that you particular engaged or crises or problems?

WEINTRAUB: Well as I said, my focus was African countries for the most part. I remember one amusing issue: Zaire was going to reopen an embassy in Israel. And I think the Israelis at the time had convinced Zaire diplomats to open their embassy in Jerusalem rather than Tel Aviv because, after all, "Jerusalem is our capital." I don't recall at the time if the government of Zaire was even aware that most embassies in Israel were in Tel Aviv because of the "indeterminate" status of Jerusalem. So this was seen as quite a coup, that another embassy would be opening in Jerusalem rather than in Tel Aviv, where most of the Western Europeans were. I think the ones in Jerusalem were mainly Central American and South American embassies that never bothered to move. I remember talking to someone in the Israeli ministry of foreign affairs, the director of African affairs, and he was so concerned that during a press conference that some of the Israeli press shouldn't raise embassy location as an issue with the ambassador from Zaire - hoping they would not ask "Why are you going into Jerusalem and not in Tel Aviv?" I'm not sure whatever happened, but I remember the official was kind of nervous about the press conference and hoped the ambassador from Zaire wasn't aware that there was an alternative to opening the embassy in Jerusalem.

Q: Well this is probably a good place to stop. And if anything occurs to you before we meet again on this Israel time we'll pick it, otherwise-

WEINTRAUB: I'd like to do that, say a few more things about Israel.

Q: Alright. Do you want to mention here what you'd like?

WEINTRAUB: Oh, there was a trip I made to Taba that was kind of interesting at the time of the turnover. And also something interesting I found out about the advisories, the kind of notes about the local population, which I thought interesting, about how American embassy officials should behave on certain holidays, for example. I found that kind of amusing.

Q: Okay. Good. Did you get involved in the human rights report or anything like that?

WEINTRAUB: No, I didn't.

Q: Okay, today is the 2nd of August, 2005. Leon, we're still in Israel. You were in Israel from when to when now?

WEINTRAUB: Summer of '80 until the summer of '82.

Q: Alright. You mentioned a trip to Taba.

WEINTRAUB: Well, this was after the Israeli withdrawal from the Sinai Peninsula. And of course there was much angst in Israel and much reporting by the embassy on the withdrawal from the settlements in the Sinai, just as there is right now in August 2005 about the withdrawal from the Gaza, a very similar situation. Anyway, the withdrawal was taking place from the Sinai, it happened in stages, and now this was about the final withdrawal. As the political officer covering "normalization" with Egypt, I made a trip, obviously under official embassy auspices, down to Taba in the Sinai, which is not too far from the Israeli port city of Eilat on the Red Sea. As a matter of fact, as I recall I was able to use a car from the embassy motor pool and drive it down there myself. And Taba has since become the site of several meetings, international meetings between Egypt and Israel. Anyway, there was a lot of attention focused on the area, and there were a lot of observers of one kind or another, monitoring the turnover.

Somehow - I'm not quite sure how it happened - word had not gotten through to all the appropriate channels that in fact I was making this trip - although as I mentioned I had an embassy vehicle, and my supervisor had obviously approved it. But somehow word got back to the American embassy and then eventually it got back to me that there was some concern, I don't know if it was by the United Nations or the Egyptian authorities, that someone there claiming to represent the American embassy was out snooping around and holding a series of conversations. This person was meeting with people, with Egyptians and Israelis, finding out what was happening about the withdrawal, and there was a certain amount of concern about who this person might be and what he might represent. And my supervisor, in a telephone chat as I recall, raised this issue with me and I said. "Gee, that sure sounds like me, doesn't it?"

So I thought it was interesting in that no matter how carefully one makes preparations to do something - anything - sometime something happens that is unexpected. There might be unusual circumstances or tense circumstances, but one can never overdo the job of preparing the groundwork just to make that everyone is onboard. And this never became a diplomatic incident of any kind, it certainly didn't reach that level, but nevertheless, it involved me personally - because of the fact that some people who perhaps should have known about my being there did not know. I don't know where there was a gap in someone informing someone else, but I thought that was kind of interesting. I thought, as I had the conversation with my boss, "Gee, that sure sounds like what I was doing, doesn't it?"

Q: And then you mentioned the-

WEINTRAUB: About the behavior of the locals and how to make sure you don't ruffle any feathers in the host country. As you're aware, embassies typically send out notes, you know, like in a weekly embassy newsletter, whenever there could be anticipated demonstrations. In some of the countries where we lived, demonstrations could and often did turn violent, especially whenever there was a particular national holiday. So anytime there was anything of significant import that could affect movement in public areas, such as any public demonstration, the embassy typically puts this information out in the weekly embassy newsletter. Well, of course in Israel on Yom Kippur, on the Day of Atonement, which is the holiest day of the year in the Jewish calendar, there is no - I mean the only thing people are supposed to do is get up and go to synagogue, maybe visit with your neighbors, strolling, but of course, there is no work of any kind, and that includes no use of motor vehicles. Obviously it is a national holiday, all work is supposed to cease - and does in Israel - and this is how the day is observed. Of course, Jewish people also observe the holiday that way in the United States, do their best to do it as they wish and of course, the world continues on around them. But of course in Israel this is a national holiday, a national event.

So the embassy sent out in their weekly newsletter before Yom Kippur a note describing the holiday and advising people, in fact, probably warning would not be too strong a word, not to use your car, do not go in your car on the street. The only vehicles allowed on the street are ambulances and if you're in certain religious areas your vehicle might get stoned. And this happened all the time in certain sections of Jerusalem even on regular Saturdays, on the Sabbath day, when you were warned to avoid certain ultra Orthodox neighborhoods. Driving through them from sundown Friday until sundown Saturday you risk getting a rock through your windshield, whereas on Yom Kippur this could happen anywhere all over the country and one had to be aware of this.

So there was this kind of note explaining the importance of the holiday and why people had to be aware of this. And I just thought, you know, when we see something like this describing a culture different from our own, you know, one sees it kind of as an anthropological note. For example, in certain African societies there might be certain rituals or functions, so you have to behave in a certain way - this is what the natives do and you have to beware, don't go into this section of the neighborhood. And you kind of accept that. But this was describing things I did, you know, this was describing me. So I kind of got a kick out of that. And you know it shows how what you sometimes think of as exotic when describing the rituals or customs of another society in almost anthropological-type terms, like "this is what the natives do" and they believe this and you have to observe it, in that type of a tone. I'm sure it wasn't meant to be in a patronizing tone, but the way it was describing it came across as almost like a clinical and anthropological study or description and I just -- it kind of affected me because, I thought, "Hey, that's me they're talking about." I thought that was kind of interesting.

Q: Well, did you have any anthropologists come and talk to you about your customs, speaking slowly in English?

WEINTRAUB: No, it was fine, and certainly it was written in a way, I'm sure, to be respectful of the local society and make sure that people didn't get in trouble and perhaps put the embassy in a bad light for failing to observe -

Q: Did you- what, into anything that I've noticed over the years that there often- maybe this happened more later than when you were later, incidents between particularly the military and the police where they seemed to have used undue force or something and the immediate response is, well, we were attacked or, in other words, they get very defensive and usually in later accounts you find out well, that's not the real story. And I've learned to sort of treat things that came out of Israel the same way I treat things that came out of almost any Middle Eastern country—don't believe what the official announcement is, wait until, you know, it was pretty defensive reaction.

WEINTRAUB: Well, obviously the Israelis were very suspicious of most diplomats. There were incidents on record where certain diplomatic vehicles were used to smuggle weapons and dangerous supplies into the Palestinians. Some cases may in fact may have been real diplomatic vehicles and in other cases maybe the Palestinians had forged diplomatic license plates. The Israelis were quite wary and I wouldn't be surprised if occasionally the soldiers were more brusque than diplomats would have liked. I think I mentioned earlier when we were driving through a certain section of the Negev and we had stopped because one of my kids wasn't feeling well. Within five minutes there were two jeeps - one jeep or two jeeps around us - asking us if everything was alright. Obviously, it seemed to me, there was a listening post somewhere around there. And of course there are a lot of stories about Palestinians having to wait hours and hours at a checkpoint, being subject to harassment or humiliation, but, you know, as you've said, there's often another side of the story that has to be heard.

You know, when you're in a society that is subject to suicide bombings of innocent civilians, whether on the bus or in restaurants or in hotels, a society has to take measures necessary to defend itself. In the meanwhile, if the debate is political, Israel is a very contentious society, it is not a particularly gracious society, even amongst the Israelis. It's the language, as a matter of fact this was- it even goes back to the Hebrew language training of a few years ago. I mentioned that one of our best students in the language class was a U.S. military officer who had previously served, I think, in Yemen and he knew Arabic. And he contrasted the two languages where Arabic is a language that is not in a hurry to do anything. I don't know Arabic myself but it's flowery, it tends to be poetic, there are a lot of introductions and phrases of courtesy involved in the language. Hebrew is not like that. It's sharp, direct, straight to the point. And that kind of describes the society as well. There's a good fit between the language, the way people speak and the way they behave. So I think some of that, what you describe may be over-sensitivity, and certain segments of the society, perhaps in the military in Israel, do walk around with a chip on their shoulder. I think they feel they have to just make sure no one gets a message either first-hand, second-hand, directly or indirectly that this is a country that's going to be a pushover.

Q: Okay. You left Israel when?

WEINTRAUB: As I said it would be in the summer of '82, shortly after the Israelis went into Lebanon in response to rockets being fired from southern Lebanon into settlements in northern Israel.

Q: I thought it was in response to the attempted assassination of the Israeli ambassador in London.

WEINTRAUB: That happened as well. My chronology on all these events is not too clear. That maybe was the last straw.

Q: They got tied together.

WEINTRAUB: Right. I think most of it was increasing numbers of rocket attacks from southern Lebanon.

Q: Was there, while you were there, was there, I'm not sure, again, the timing, but you know, this was supposedly in response to rockets being fired into settlements and yet- and they kept- the Israeli army kept going, I mean, it turned out that Sharon was maybe, basically running a rogue operation all the way to Beirut. Were you there when they got close to Beirut?

WEINTRAUB: I think I had already left, but I remember there was - but I remember I was still there when the troops were continuing to move up north. I remember there was considerable debate and discussion within the embassy and also in the media, in the popular press in Israel, a very active and free press in Israel, there was considerable discussion whether the government knew this all along, whether this was an approved plan or whether General Sharon, who had pretty much a well-deserved reputation for doing things his way, whether in fact this was something he took advantage of and he exploited without getting full cabinet approval. I mean, he was a commander on the ground and was given a certain amount of leeway. So I remember this was a subject for endless debate.

WILLIAM JEFFRAS DIETRICH
Press Attaché, USIS
Tel Aviv (1979-1982)

William Jeffras Dietrich was born in Boston in 1936. He received his bachelor's degree from Connecticut Wesleyan University in 1958 and then served in the US Navy. His career included positions in Bolivia, Argentina, Brazil, Israel, Italy, Ecuador, El Salvador, and Mexico. Mr. Dieterich was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: Today is the 14th of December, 1999. You had never served in the Middle East, had you? What baggage did you take with you when you went to Israel?

DIETERICH: Sure, I took with me the baggage that most middle class Americans, and especially those with a Protestant upbringing, all took to the question of Israel. You go back to the foundation of the State of Israel in 1948, I can remember it, and I think I mentioned once before how peculiar I thought it was when one of my close friends at that time was telling me how he wanted to go fight for Israel. That had made an impression on me. Although it is popular now to talk now about how Evangelical Protestants feel a certain attraction to Israel, the fact is probably all American Protestants feel that attraction or carry some basically positive psychological imprints in their mind toward Israel. Especially those who went to church. Protestant pastors, including my father, tend to preach as much or more out of the Old Testament as they do out of the New. I think the stories are better. I probably went to Israel with a positive balance toward the State of Israel but not much of a tendency to question the legitimacy of the State of Israel, nor much of a tendency to dwell much on the plight of the Palestinians. I think that was where I stood when I got there.

Q: In 1979, when you arrived there, what were your impressions of Israel?

DIETERICH: Pretty positive. I saw Tel Aviv as a nice, Mediterranean-style city and saw right away it was a place where I was going to enjoy living. I was certainly looking forward to the job. It was a great job for a someone who had spent quite a bit of time involved with day-to-day press operations. That is an important distinction within a USIA context, because a lot of what USIA does is long-term stuff.

Q: Will you explain the difference?

DIETERICH: USIA did a lot of stuff that had to do with the future of U.S. foreign policy, and I hope that continues under the present circumstances. USIA was very interested in long-term information about the United States, explaining U.S. culture, explaining the U.S. political system. All that goes back to educational exchange programs and other things. I consider it as almost the preventive maintenance of foreign policy. You've got to do that well to keep the machinery that runs day-to-day diplomacy working. I feel that as strongly now as I did then. But that did mean that a lot of USIA officers did not have experience in dealing with day-to-day press operations - answering those questions that come up from journalists every day. I was fortunate enough to have had a big dose of that in my State Department assignment and because of that assignment, I was suggested for the job in Tel Aviv. I know that Sam Lewis had done some investigation and looked around for somebody that was serving in one of the press positions in State. He was probably wise to do so. That was good, because the Ambassador was positively disposed towards me before I got there, because he had made the choice.

Q: How did the press officer fit in the embassy?

DIETERICH: Well, that's a good question. In some big embassies press or information officers sometimes had a problematic relationship in that if a PAO, the senior officer, the person in charge of all of USIS, wanted to maintain an exclusive personal relationship with the ambassador, if he wanted you to go through him to the ambassador, it probably wasn't going to work very well. I was fortunate when I got there because David Hitchcock, the PAO, was wise enough to see right away that the advisability of a direct, day-to-day relationship between the press attach_ and the Ambassador. Although he kept his hand in, in terms of giving advice and long-term goals, he was quite content to see direct relationship between the ambassador and me. One of the first meetings we had, where David Hitchcock and I went to see Sam Lewis, he asked me what I needed to make it work well. He indicated he hadn't been entirely happy with past press relations. I said I needed a daily meeting. We discussed it and finally agreed on the middle of the morning. This gave me time to get into the office and figure out what questions we ought to deal with. That became institutionalized, and the PAO usually joined me in those meetings, but if he couldn't, I went by myself.

Q: Why the daily meeting?

DIETERICH: Because in Israel there were questions that would involve the press every day. It was really hard there because I didn't have any Hebrew, although the original plan was for me to leave State and take Hebrew for a year, then go to Israel. My predecessor's wife got very ill and he had to be pulled, so I got called and told I had to be ready to go in a few weeks rather than a year.

To know what was going on in the Israeli press, we had to wait for a national employee to prepare the media reaction cable for Washington. We had a person who was very good and could get it done by midmorning before the meeting. Hitchcock and I could then go through that cable and figure out what the likely questions were. And decide what we wanted to say, both in terms of any press encounter Sam Lewis might have during the day, and to offer whatever advice we could to Washington as they were preparing guidance for the spokesmen. We did both those things.

Whenever the ambassador would have a meeting any place on a senior level in Jerusalem (and that was often) he would be seen by the press, and the press would try to ask him questions. The easy way would have been to suggest that he say, "I don't answer questions." But that is also the dumb answer. If you are good, you can do yourself some good by how you answer those questions. Sam Lewis often did, he was good with the press, had good memory, and kept things in line. He also was very open to the press. We usually accepted requests for appointments from journalists. I would usually sit in, and he made good use of those, both in terms of getting the U.S. governments point of view across to the journalist and getting the journalist to share information and opinions with him. About three quarters of the way through the interview he would say "All right, you've had your turn, now I get my turn" and talking to them for their perceptions as to what was going on. There was a lesson to be learned from that. Done properly, our relationship with the press in diplomacy is a two-way street. In many ways they share some aspects of our business. They are often good at it. While they have their professional imperatives that can impede objectivity, so do we.

Q: We will go through the major events during this time, but first let's talk about overall impressions. What was your impression of the Israeli media?

DIETERICH: They are real good. Before I do that, I have to lay out more of what the situation was, because in a way it is a very peculiar place, and especially in traditional USIS terms. I hadn't been there two days before somebody said "We all have to get in the car and go up to Jerusalem because Bob Strauss is coming in for the first of a series of talks." These were of course part of the follow-up to the Camp David agreements. You asked before about the baggage I took with me to Israel. Part of it was my impression of the Camp David agreements. While I was still at State but knew I was going to Israel, I watched the White House signing ceremony on television. I remember thinking "Wow, this is big, big stuff."

I had also been interested in Anwar Sadat and his impact on the relationship between Israel and the U.S. He was the first Arab who was intelligible to us and seemed like a major player. King Hussein had been intelligible, but never seemed a major player. To most Americans, all other Arabs had seemed exotic beings on the fringe of our ethnocentric view of world history. Israel had produced a series of leaders who were perfectly intelligible to us - Ben Gurion, Meier, Aba Eban, Rabin, Perez and so on. Even Menachem Begin, while different in style from those Labor party stalwarts, was a recognizable figure to most Americans. They spoke English well and looked like big-timers. So, except for a few lonely voices among academic and State Department Arabists, the Israelis had a virtual monopoly on interpreting the Israel Arab dispute to Americans. Then along came Sadat and the all-important interview he did with, I think, Barbara Walters. His English was good and he was charming. He had the wise habit of slowing down when he had to search for English words which often made him sound more profound than foreign. From that time on the Israeli monopoly was broken. They still had a substantial lead, but they were going to have to share U.S. fora with Arab voices.

So there I was checking into the King David Hotel. I went to the embassy control room to find out what the hell is going on and looked out the window. There was the city of Jerusalem laid out in a panorama with lights on the walls. It is a stunning sight. It sort of bangs you right between the eyes in terms of what kind of history you are looking at. I didn't learn as much as I should have, because there was an emergency message that my mother had gone in for emergency surgery and wasn't expected to survive. So before that visit was over, I was on a plane back to the United States.

My mother did not survive. It was a sad time in Florida where my parents had moved after my father's retirement. I was there through the memorial service and few more days to spend time with my Dad. I then went through Washington for a couple more days of consultation. So it was ten days or so before I got back. I remember being very impressed at how solicitous David Hitchcock and the rest of the post were in helping my wife. After all, we had just arrived and Keiko was pregnant with our second child, our son as it turned out. We had moved into a modest, but pleasant furnished U.S. government-owned house. Due to a large amount of counterpart funds, and true to Israel's socialist tradition, the State Department had built lots of identical houses throughout Tel Aviv's pleasant northern suburbs. There were two types of houses, larger ones for embassy department heads and smaller ones for the rest of us. The larger ones were what the department calls "representational housing" - large enough to accommodate a reception for a couple hundred tightly-packed people and fancy enough so we are not out shown by the Europeans. If there were extra bigger houses they went to lower-ranking officers with big families.

When I got back and began to settle into the job, I realized was different from any other information officer job I had ever seen. I began to figure out that a great deal of my time was going to be taken up with VIP visits. I think probably the American in Israel developed the best VIP team in the foreign service. We got very good at it because we did it all the time. Since almost every VIP visit generated questions from the press - before, during and after - and because almost all visits brought along a press contingent, the press section was an important part of the team. It sometimes seemed I spent half my tour living in the King David Hotel in Jerusalem. That's an exaggeration, but during a couple round of the talks on Palestinian autonomy the talks were extended and we ended up sending cars down to our homes in Tel Aviv to pick up clean clothes.

We also had a large resident U.S. press corps in Israel, mostly in Tel Aviv, which meant almost daily questions from them and from Israeli and European journalists which had to be taken very seriously. USIS officers by trade, training and temperament are inclined toward serving the local press first, but in countries like Israel, and a few other big players, you quickly learn that what the U.S. press says plays first in Washington and can get you in hot water very quickly. You also learn that the big American dailies, the networks and the international wire services have a great influence over the local press in the country where you serve. Getting it right with AP, or Reuters, or the New York Times may also be the best way to get to local dailies and broadcasters.

Anyway, the U.S. and international press was there in impressive numbers and for the most part they were very good. Has great influence over the press in your country. It seemed to me we had as many as any embassy in the world. Maybe there are more U.S. journalists in London or Paris, but they don't have as many questions to ask the American embassy.

Q: Well, there, they are concerned with American policy. And in London they go all over the place.

DIETERICH: In a way, our policy toward Israel is absolutely a given. It has been remarkably consistent. But the Israelis don't think so, therefore many Americans didn't think so either. The Israelis are constantly taking the temperature of the relationship. The major Israeli papers had good reporters who were almost as active in asking us questions as the American press was. And pretty much the same questions. If you are serving in Ecuador, you will get journalists asking questions about what we think about the Peru-Ecuador border. Or if you are in Bolivia, they would ask about access to the sea, or GSA (General Services Administration) sales of tin. Those are questions that no American reporter would ask. That doesn't happen in Israel. The questions you get asked in Israel are the questions that any American journalist would ask, and almost all of them have to do with the constant probing for the current state of the relationship.

That, plus the frequent VIP visits left little time for the traditional, long-range information activities that would be done at other posts. I didn't have time to try to hunt up a copyrighted article and take it out to get some newspaper to publish it because I thought it was a good enlightening article. And I suppose there was less need for that in Israel. The Israeli press also maintained correspondents in the United State. Wolf Blitzer at that time represented the Jerusalem Post in Washington. Maariv, Ha'aretz and Yediot Aharanoth also had full-time correspondents in the United States. One of the sure signs that we were not like other USIS posts was that we never dealt in Hebrew. When we had a press release to put out, it was in English. Later in my tour, I thought I would put out a press release in Hebrew just to prove we could do it. The first thing I found out was my best people weren't all that good in Hebrew. They were Israelis who really spoke English and other European languages or Arabic somewhat better than they did Hebrew. I probably only had two people who could write Hebrew well. Next, I found we didn't have a Hebrew typewriter until somebody went down to the basement and found one.

We dusted it off and gave it to a brave volunteer typist. It must have taken her three hours to prepare the press release. She kept almost falling out of her chair every time the carriage would zoom off in the wrong direction.

Anyway, the Israeli press was very good, and free, although subject to influence like all newspapers are, even when they don't admit it.

Q: What about the political orientation? One hears about all these different parties - was this a concern. Would the correspondent from such and such a paper ask you some question that had very strong religious overtones?

DIETERICH: We didn't get a lot of those kinds of questions. This goes back to history too. Begin had come to office when Sam Lewis was on the plane on his way to Israel, about a year before I got there. Begin won the election, and that was a big surprise to a lot of people; Washington did not anticipate that it was going to happen. Sam Lewis got there, and to USIS' credit, the one person that knew Begin and could arrange a meeting was the PAO who had had some contact with Begin. Begin represented a different kind of political power in Israel, and a different kind of person. It is a dynamic that still works in Israel. The Likud Party proceeded from East European political origins, but had as political campaigners a natural affinity for the Middle Eastern Jews who felt they were on the downside of Israeli society and were not getting a fair deal. I think a lot of the Likud leadership was especially sensitive to that, because they had come out of societies where they felt that way. The Labor Party had had its origins among the Zionists of Western Europe. It was one thing to be a Jew in Vienna, no bed of roses, but it was better than being a Jew in Poland. So the Western European founding fathers of Israel were people who knew what anti-Semitism was about and knew less violent levels of persecution, but didn't know pogroms first hand. Those in Eastern Europe did. Begin often liked to tell people how he had imprisoned by both the Nazis and the Russians. He came to power with a coalition of conservative, European Jews, and a lot of support from the Sephardic, or to be more accurate, Jews of Middle East origin, as their major supporters. That was a new political game for Israel. At the same time, the Jews of Middle Eastern origin were beginning to wield real political power in Israel and beginning to become the majority of the citizens of the State of Israel.

But to go back to your question, we did not get a lot of questions with a strong political slant to them. In Latin America, for example, you often get questions trying to ferret out whether the U.S. government is favoring one political party or another. Israelis do not ask exactly those questions. I think there was a general assumption that the U.S. had grown fairly comfortable with the Labor Party over the years, but was now doing its best to get used to Begin and a new style of leadership. Israel is too confident a country to waste time worrying about whether the U.S. is going to land the marines or throw the next elections.

Actually, I think we did have to learn a new style. I remember once sitting in on a meeting of embassy officials with senior Israeli government officials and noticing the Americans were all wearing Ben Gurion-style open-collared sport shirts under their suit jackets, while the Israeli government people were all wearing ties. Those were power-ties worn by people who felt little need to identify with trade unionists or kibbutzniks. We learned to put our ties back on.

I also don't remember questions coming to us at the embassy with a particular religious slant to them. Israel is always concerned - one might even say obsessed - with such questions. This was the period of the "Who is a Jew" debate. I guess most people probably did not consider the American Embassy particular relevant to such issues. The National Religious Party was in the hands of Yosef Burg, who was a very sophisticated orthodox Jew, certainly not a fundamentalist zealot in any way. He was very well educated, very sophisticated, and a very wise gentleman. There was nobody trying to trip the embassy up on some theological issue. On political issues relating to the peace process maybe, but not on religion.

Unlike some other countries I know, there were no journalists in Israel relying on the U.S. Embassy or USIS for the answers to generalized questions about the U.S., its culture, etc. They came to us with questions about the U.S. government and its policies. It was a very day to day operation in the press section. Of course there were scholars and others using the USIS library for research on broader issues, but that stuff was not coming to the press section.

Q: How did you find the press as far as its ability to deal with you in a legitimate way? If you would say something was off the record, would it stay off the record? Would quotes be checked out? In other words, they wouldn't abuse relationships.

DIETERICH: In the first place, I never used the term “off the record” because off the record is a bad deal for everybody. You are saying to the journalist “You can’t say this.” What if he gets it from another source? Then you are putting him in an unfair position. Also, it implies a level of protection that you should never count on because you are not going to have it. “Deep background” would be as far as I would go. “Deep background” means you can say this, just don’t attribute it. “Background” means you can say it, but attribute it to a formula that we will agree upon. I don’t ever remember being screwed in any way, but I always tried to deal as much on the record as I could. A press attach_ is in a difficult position at times. Remember, he is always the first person that is suspected when there is a leak. In reality he is probably the last person to leak, because he knows he is the first person to be suspected. I did not do that with very many journalists, and when I did do it, it was with journalists, mainly Americans, who I trusted. Frankly, we trusted certain members of the American press more than we did certain members of the Israeli press.

Q: Who were some of the American correspondents who you particularly liked?

DIETERICH: Oh, gosh, it’s hard to remember names now. Jay Bushinsky, but I can’t remember who he worked for now. Bob Simon was there with CBS.

Q: Did you draw a difference between the television and print journalists? Was there a difference in dealing with them?

DIETERICH: Oh yes, there is a lot of difference. You have a whole different level when dealing with television, which is often on a very technical level. Where can I get my cameras, and what can I film? My memory of it is that we tended to do more background type stuff with print journalists. Television copy is pretty truncated. There is not much room for a lot of speculation, and I think one of the things you have to remember with all press is they are not scholars trying to gain a global understanding of the issues. They are persons who have a story in their mind and they have places in the story that need to be filled with something. They have questions that need to be answered. There is another reason to be careful of the ground rules - if this person has a real good story going, and he really needs that piece, he probably won’t totally screw you, he will just open the F-stop a little bit. He’ll change “deep background” to “background” or do something like that. I don’t remember getting stung with anything too badly, nor do I remember Sam Lewis getting stung too badly. U.S. policy in Israel is complicated. As many people have observed, it is not exactly what the State Department says it is. It is a very complicated, shifting baseline that has to do with what the Department thinks and what the White House thinks and what congress thinks and what some lobby groups of people think.

Q: With all these visitors, did you find yourself dealing with people who were running for office in the United States, and came to Israel in order to have their picture taken there to show support for Israel in order to gain Jewish votes or money? Did you find yourself running a campaign facilitation program?

DIETERICH: No. I wasn’t dealing with congressional delegations as much as I was dealing with official negotiating groups. This was the period of the autonomy talks. So you had personalities like Bob Strauss who was there as a negotiator. Walt Stoessel came out, and most notably, Phil

Habib. And of course Kissinger had been there before my time, So a lot of those things were the kinds of visits I was talking about. And Secretary Haig came.

I do not share, nor do I like, the foreign services' prejudices against congressional delegations. Maybe I've not served in the right places, but I haven't seen much of the electioneering and tourism that some people talk about. I've seen some delegations where some people don't work but other people do, and I guess I was always in the position of not getting stuck with taking care of the people that didn't want to work. I felt that in Israel, and also in El Salvador. If I were a congressman on a committee with foreign affairs responsibilities I would travel, and I would do it holidays and weekends. I doubt that I would care much about some FSO whining about the extra work.

Q: I would think that in Israel, there would be a constant flow of congressmen who wanted to get his or her picture taken.

DIETERICH: But that's okay if they are willing to do some work in the meantime. What I mean by work is: showing up, paying attention, being patient with briefings, being courteous.

Q: We have a long account of Sam Lewis, and I just finished a long interview with his DCM, Bill Brown, a part of that time, and it sounds like the ambassador and the DCM spent most of their time driving back and forth to Jerusalem. Or being called in the middle of the night, sitting in on cabinet meetings or the immediate aftermath. It sounds very hectic, very personalized, and the sort of thing you don't want the press to know every move because it interferes with the process.

DIETERICH: It does, but it doesn't. In the first place, you have to assume the press knew of every move. Usually when Sam Lewis would go up for a meeting with the prime minister, or the foreign minister, I would usually go with him because the press stakes out the prime minister's office in Jerusalem so you can't get in and out without them seeing you, especially when you go in with the kind of security package that American ambassadors have. Secondly, because we never knew when the Israelis were going to have their spokesman in the meeting, it was my job was to go up there, and as we stood around waiting for the prime minister to be ready, I would see if the spokesman was going to the meeting. If he went in, I went in.

Q: Was this understood or were you sort of using your elbows?

DIETERICH: No, it was understood. Certainly those were the ambassador's instructions. We got friendly enough so I could go ask him if he was going in or not. Even then, you didn't know whether he was going to brief anybody. Usually, if I asked a question he would say, "Oh no, I'm not going to talk about this." But then maybe he would or maybe he wouldn't. Then it would be important that I had also been there to do any repair work that might be necessary. It didn't happen often that we got caught by surprise, but more often than not I would end up in some important meetings that press attachés in most countries never got to see. The first meeting I went to, I didn't go in, so I was hanging around all by myself out in the foyer of the prime minister's offices. Some nice lady came and offered me a cup of tea and some cookies, and it was Mrs. Begin. This was heady stuff for a younger officer. I met the prime minister within a week of coming to the country.

Q: How would you describe the relationship between Sam Lewis and Menachem Begin?

DIETERICH: Most of these meetings were big with around 20 people in the room, and that doesn't give you a very good feel for what the relationship was really like. I never saw any indication of any kind of rancor or annoyance. There seemed to be a relationship of mutual respect. Begin was not a person who trusted people easily, but I think he trusted Sam Lewis. He trusted his honesty and truthfulness, and he trusted him as a pretty accurate representative of what U.S. policy was. Ambassador Lewis certainly had unimpeded access to the prime minister.

Q: What were your impressions of some of the other players? Let's see, Moshe Arens.

DIETERICH: Moshe Arens was in the cabinet at that time. I think he had agriculture. I had this impression of a person who spoke English like an American. I remember when he became foreign minister, we had to figure out a way to say discreetly, "Pick up the passports" for his children. He had to quietly give up his American citizenship in order to serve in that post. That was toward the end of my tour. I'm trying to think of the other impressions I had. Sharon - volatile, extremely funny, a lot of fun to talk to at a cocktail party. Once there were three or four of us around, and at that time we were in the first blush of people from Israel being able to visit Egypt. So a lot of people were taking trips right away. The means of transportation were not very well established, and there were a lot of stories about how to find the best way to get there. Sharon had recently visited Cairo, so I asked him how he got there. He said, "Do you mean the first time or this time."

Q: Of course, the first time he had gone there he was the commander of the army that crossed over the Suez Canal and reached the outskirts of Cairo.

DIETERICH: But he was volatile, and certainly seen by us as dangerous. He was a hawkish right-winger, who was convinced in his mind that he was going to have to fight everybody. Most likely he thought he would have to fight the Egyptians again. Most certainly he was convinced he was going to have to fight the Syrians. His was the policy line that says that Israel should never give up an ounce of territory for anything, that settlements ought to be built, that Israel's security is bound up in the idea of yielding nothing and taking every opportunity possible to expand Israel's security perimeter. He was not a man of compromise when it came to the defense of Israel. Shamir - Shamir had been named shortly before I got there. My memory is that he was not Begin's first foreign minister, but now I can't remember who preceded him. I remember going to one of the first meetings, probably with Strauss, and it was pretty painful because he couldn't speak English very well. It was difficult for him to communicate. Eventually he got better at it, which was a remarkable accomplishment. With Shamir, you had the feeling that Begin was running the foreign policy that he wasn't a great creative, independent voice.

Q: Did you get involved when you sat in on these meetings, particularly American delegations; did you notice the first 45 minutes would be a lecture on Judaism and the claims to Sumaria?

DIETERICH: It depended on what the meeting was about. If there were visiting VIPs that Begin felt needed the lecture, you better believe they got it. The one I remember most vividly is Habib's first meeting. Begin did what he often did with American newcomers to the game and that was to lay a mild guilt-trip on them. He talked about his own personal history, the holocaust museum, and all the things he had suffered and the things the Jews had gone through. Habib was a tougher, smarter customer than most, so he countered with stories about when he was a little kid growing up as a Lebanese immigrant kid in New York and being the gentile who lit candles in the synagogue.

Most of the time, Begin was an extraordinary performer. He was masterful at using his own emotions and his emotions were genuine. He did feel genuine rage at the holocaust. He did feel genuinely that it is very hard to trust a non-Jew when it comes to Jewish issues. He was very good at being convincing because he rode on his own emotions, he let them go, and he showed them. He could also turn them off when it was time.

Q: Did you have the feeling that you were being tested to find out whether you were friendly to Israel or not?

DIETERICH: Yes, from time to time in conversation that would happen. A lot of Jews, especially European Jews, do think that most non-Jews are anti-Semitic. Sometimes it is hard for Americans, because even when their minds are tinged by anti-Semitism, they certainly don't think they are anti-Semitic. And they certainly don't think they are anti-Israel. If you look at it, the people I think are anti-Semites in this country, many of them are very pro-Israel, but I think they are often pro-Israel about the way some racists in the 19th Century were pro-Liberia too. They thought if those folks had a place to go they would be more likely to leave. A lot of far-right evangelical types in the U.S. are very pro-Israel because they think some kind of goofy Book of Revelations prophecies are being worked out, but many of their other attitudes are shot through with anti-Semitism.

Q: Did you have the feeling that you were on the cusp of a generational change? This is a new group that would not have the same ancestral memories.

DIETERICH: Absolutely, and in the first place we had already seen a certain generational change, not so much in absolute chronological terms, but rather in terms of the role played in the foundation of the state of Israel. That was the change from the leaders of the Labor Party, the founders of Israel, to the leaders of the Likud who represented people who fought the British mandate tooth and nail as well as many of those who had been rescued by Israel. The people of the Likud may have owed a debt to the founding Zionists, but that did not mean they shared their political values. I'm dealing in very broad generalizations here, but I like broad generalizations. A privilege of retirement.

The Likud victory also brought oriental Jews more solidly into Israeli politics. Begin won partly because he got lots of votes from oriental Jews. I am using the term oriental instead of Sephardic, because I think Sephardic more properly refers to Jews whose diaspora took them first to the Iberian peninsula and other Mediterranean locales. To me, the term oriental Jews refers to those who in a sense were not part of the Diaspora, those who had remained in the Middle East and who immigrated to Israel after 1948, often because they were the victims of heightened anti-Semitism. They were certainly not attracted to Begin on purely ethnic grounds; culturally and politically he was very much a product of his East European upbringing and political fortunes. He often pointed out that he had been imprisoned by both the Germans and the Soviets. I think the Israelis of Middle Eastern origin, who were close to a majority in Israel, were attracted by his outsider status. Since they had never felt really accepted by the westernized leadership of the Labor Party, or by the rank and file trade unionists and kibbutzniks for that matter, they somehow identified with Begin. Perhaps they saw him as a fighter who had contributed to the foundation of Israel, but who, like them, had always been rejected by the establishment.

The election of Begin and the rise of the Likud to power had two effects on Israeli policy: It toughened attitudes regarding Israel's security and the Palestinians and it created new difficulties for their lobbying efforts in the United States.

The new Israeli government didn't have that English-accented (either American or British) parliamentary patina that we were accustomed to. The generation who had learned their politics in the reasonably polite Zionist circles of London, Paris, Vienna or New York and had successfully lobbied international opinion for the partition of Palestine were replaced by a government of people who had learned their politics in the ghettos and death camps of Eastern Europe, or in Cairo or Damascus or Amman or even Teheran. The common experience that brought them together was their service in the Israeli army, where as lower ranking people they had done at least their share of the bloody work of war. Begin and a lot of his inner circle had even got a head start as anti-British terrorists during the mandate - the bombing of the King David Hotel and all that.

We Americans sometimes like to think that somehow those who have suffered repression or prejudice will know better than to ever inflict it on others. I wish that were true, but I think it rather goes the other way. Victims become desensitized and find it distressingly easy to mistreat others, especially if they perceive them as enemies. It's like the victims of child abuse becoming abusers. It happens all the time. What this meant for Begin is that his core supporters were even tougher than he was on issues relating to the Palestinians and Israeli security. Especially after Camp David, he found himself in the anomalous position of having to prove that he hadn't given away the store.

The second effect was on the American public. All of a sudden here, is Menachem Begin who doesn't really fit the American image of an Israeli leader. You have to remember how attractive people like Rabin, Dana, Ever Weizmann, Golda Meir, or Aba Eban were on the American circuit. They fit our image of distinguished foreigners and were easy to relate to. I'm getting into some unpleasant areas of our own prejudices now, but the fact is to many Americans those leaders seemed much more Israeli than they did Jewish. Then here comes Begin. He is small and unprepossessing looking and his accent is central European. He doesn't seem like this European sophisticate so much as he seems like the person who ran a candy store on the corner of an American city. He seems more American than say Weizmann or Eban; he doesn't quite have that distinguished foreigner gloss. And, given the latent anti-Semitism of many Americans, he seems more Jewish than Israeli.

It's an important image-shift. On the one hand you have the Ben Gurion, Meir, Dayan image of the heroic little democracy, that just happens to be Jewish, defending itself against evil Arab armies. On the other hand, you have the Begin, Shamir, Arens image of a militantly Jewish ghetto plunked down in the Middle East and refusing to yield anything to the at least somewhat reasonable concerns of its neighbors.

Then you factor in the Camp David agreements and Anwar Sadat. He becomes the distinguished foreigner. Sadat's English was not all that good, but he had mastered the trick of speaking very slowly, which made him sound like he was wise and pondering every word. He came across as the good Middle Easterner we could all relate to. The unreasonable and mysterious Arabs had been replaced by Anwar Sadat. The Arab side of the equation now had an effective spokesman.

At that point opinion in the United States began to evolve in the direction of the Palestinians. It could have gone much worse for the Israelis had it not been for Arafat. He was not handsome or suave and came across worse than he deserved to in the American media. Every time Begin would say something outrageous to appease his most militant supporters, Arafat would counter with something equally outrageous to his Palestinian public. They couldn't have been more coordinated and mutually supportive had they been on the phone every morning.

So, Israel's support in the U.S., while still strong, was showing signs of erosion. That was also happening in the embassy. There was increasing sympathy for the Palestinian cause, or at least increasing sympathy for the Palestinian people. And eroding sympathy for the government of Israel. Begin knew that and it really annoyed him.

Q: In a way it was bound to happen, having the characters who were portrayed. These people are appealing to a broad audience, particularly in the United States. Many of the actions could no longer be portrayed the way it used to be. It was Golda Meir who would say "There is no such thing as a Palestinian, they are desert Arabs." That didn't play anymore.

DIETERICH: That's right, and somehow the Begin people made themselves look much more intransigent than the early generation of leaders had looked. Part of it was Camp David. There was a perception on the American side that Begin was not living up to the Camp David agreement. The issue of West Bank settlements came to the fore very quickly.

Q: What was the feeling there in the early stage of Camp David?

DIETERICH: The feeling was that Camp David was U.S. policy and it had to be implemented. I don't remember people in the American embassy spending a lot of time in breast-beating over whether it was a good idea or whether we were paying too much for it.

Q: Was there an active watching to see how Camp David was being implemented?

DIETERICH: Oh, absolutely, sure. Remember we had these negotiating missions coming in all the time. It started with the autonomy talks. One of our big issues was keeping autonomy talks going.

Q: Autonomy being what?

DIETERICH: Autonomy for the regions of Israel where Palestinians lived, the West Bank and Gaza. Some kind of self-government for those places. The other issue was the staged withdrawal from the Sinai. Those were things we were concentrating on all the time.

Q: Various groups, like Phil Habib and others like Strauss, would come in - what was your role? Would they come in with their own spokesperson or did Sam Lewis or you have to sell yourself each time? Would you explain what I'm talking about?

DIETERICH: Well, Bob Strauss, Sol Linowitz, Phil Habib and Walt Stoessel came in. I may not have the order exactly right. They would not come with their own press apparatus. It is not like a big VIP or Secretarial visit. Sam Lewis would introduce me to whoever came and tell them I would be going around with them, and sometimes going into meetings, and, at other times, not going into meetings, depending on what the Israelis did. That was pretty much it. I would either go into a meeting or I wouldn't, and if I didn't go into the meeting I'd stand by with the press and shoot the breeze with them. It often was time well-spent in terms of getting to know what was on their minds without having to cope with a lot of office and deadline pressures, and a lot cheaper than paying for lunches.

When it was time for the principal to come out, I would try to intercept him while he was still inside the building to find out if he wanted to talk to the press or not. If he did want to talk to them, I'd rush out and say let's go to the press. The visitor would usually do the pretty standard "yes, we had a good meeting with the prime minister, the foreign minister, and I am confident we can achieve progress." The extraordinary thing about the American press in Israel, was that they never gave up trying.

Now, with Phil Habib the mission was different. Remember there were a lot of problems with the security zone the Israelis were maintaining in southern Lebanon. If we are going to get into the Lebanon issues, I have to tell you an anecdote beforehand.

Because Habib was in and out for a number of missions, and because his negotiations concerning Lebanon were even more delicate, he made it clear to me that he was happy to have me around, but there could be no leaking to the press. He said to us one time, "This job is hard enough to do without being able to control my own agenda. I have to be able to go to the Syrians and Lebanese and say 'Here is what the Israelis said, and here is the message I am bringing to you, and here is what I need your reactions to.' I need to be able to stick with my agenda and raise issues in the order I want them. It really hurts if I have to deal with leaked versions that got there before I did." I absolutely sympathized with that and we ran a very tight ship up until the point when he wanted to talk to the press.

Q: We talked a bit about Camp David. What about in November 1979, the taking over of our embassy in Teheran? Did that have much of an impact in Israel?

DIETERICH: It certainly was a major story, but it didn't have much of an impact on the embassy or my office because the story was elsewhere. Had I been in Brazil, for example, when that happened, somebody might have come to me to get a reaction. The Israeli press was sophisticated enough and had enough correspondents to rely on Washington for U.S. Government reaction to events happening elsewhere. It was not a major concern during office hours, although it was a hot topic of conversation at cocktail parties.

Q: When you were there, the Iran-Iraq war erupted. Did that change anything?

DIETERICH: Yes, it did, because we were pretty concerned early about Israeli support of the Iranians. But it was nothing we talked about. And it was nothing the press came and asked us a lot of questions about. They probably figured out that we weren't going to talk about it. I don't remember ever taking any questions on that subject.

Q: Was there a subliminal problem of the military relationship between the United States and the Israelis? I'm particularly thinking that the Israelis were a drain on our professional fighting force. Did this come up?

DIETERICH: I don't remember that as a matter of much concern, or as a sentiment expressed by U.S. military reps in Israel. What I do remember is going to a ceremony when the first F-16s were delivered to the Israelis. They flew all the way across, nonstop, with aerial refueling, because none of the countries en route wanted them to land.

Q: Can you imagine sitting in the cockpit of an F-16?

DIETERICH: Sitting in the cockpit of an F-16 for that long, yes. It was one of these big occasions in Israel when everybody was invited. They sent up an Israeli Air Force F-4 Phantom to escort them in to the field. The announcer pointed out how long after you had seen the Phantom it would be before you could see the F-16s. They were that much smaller.

Q: Lets talk about the invasion of Lebanon.

DIETERICH: Now I have to tell you what led up to it.

Q: Before we actually get to that, you have the Carter administration who brought about the Camp David agreement. How was Carter perceived after Camp David?

DIETERICH: Since Sadat was much more beloved in the United States than Begin was, I think Carter was much more beloved in Egypt than he was in Israel. The Likud government was a conservative government and I think that, despite the fact that they had signed at Camp David, there was a feeling that he wasn't really sympathetic to Israeli security interests. There was a slight feeling of mistrust; his instincts couldn't be counted on to protect Israel the way the instincts of some other presidents had protected Israel. There is something to be said for that, too.

Q: What about the advent of Ronald Reagan?

DIETERICH: They liked him, a friend of Israel. He was not going to ask them to make sacrifices of their own security. One of the things about peace making is that it is based on compromise, and compromise is made by giving something up. There are lots of people who say they are peacemakers but basically they just want to win. Jimmy Carter's message to Israel was they had to give things up and had to take risks for peace.

Now that is a tough message. It may be tougher for Jews than other folks, especially for the very orthodox. The origins of kosher cooking, for example, come out of a biblical injunction to not cook a kid in the milk of its mother. The need to avoid this fairly simple scenario evolved into a complex set of rules and customs designed to eliminate even the slightest risk of a violation. So, you have a people whose whole cultural background is not big on risk-taking to start with, and then you put that together with a horrifying history of people who took the risk of staying in Nazi Europe and died in the process. Or of people in other places taking risks to get along with gentile society, and then finding their windows broken or worse. In many ways, many Israelis are liberal in their politics, but not liberal when it comes to taking risks. Carter was asking them to take risks, to take a chance on peace.

Q: Did the Soviet Union play any role at this time?

DIETERICH: Not much on the issues I was dealing with. Begin was uninterested in relations with the Soviet Union, beyond badgering them over treatment of Russian Jews, and the release of Russian Jews, and increased immigration of Russian Jews.

Q: From your perspective, were there problems with our consulate general in Jerusalem? Did they have a different press to deal with, and how did that work?

DIETERICH: Sure, they had a whole different press to deal with and a whole different job. From and embassy point of view, I suppose it kind of annoying to have a consulate general in the country that does not report to you but reports directly back to Washington. But is that a daily annoyance? No, it is a fact of life. We knew the East Jerusalem Consulate has as its primary job getting along with Arabs.

Q: Did press relations come up with that?

DIETERICH: I can't remember any of the Arabic language Palestinian papers or stations ever directing a question of any kind to the embassy in Tel Aviv, or to me during my long stays in Jerusalem. It was simply understood that their diplomatic contact was the U.S. Consulate in East Jerusalem. But I think beyond that their journalists hadn't really developed the knack of running down stories by buttonholing people. They just waited for press releases. For instance, if they had been asking questions about Linowitz' or Habib's activities, I think the Consulate would have relayed those questions to me. I don't remember that ever happening.

Q: How about the Egyptian press?

DIETERICH: . I actually can't remember any Arab journalist ever asking me a question, not even the Egyptian journalists who covered some of the autonomy talks. But that may have simply meant that I wasn't doing my job very well. Actually what I have said is not quite true. I did have some conversations with Israeli Arab and Druse journalists. As you know there are Arabs who remained in Israel and have Israeli citizenship - about half a million of them when I was there.

I do remember well the Egyptian Ambassador, who cut quite a figure when he first arrived. We all knew him on the diplomatic circuit. I may have forgotten, but I cannot recall a single instance of any substantive conversations with Egyptian journalists in Israel.

Q: Well, now let's go to Lebanon. You wanted to say something.

DIETERICH: Before we go to Lebanon, I have one more story to tell. About half way through my time in Israel, my old friend from Argentina, Jacobo Timerman, showed up. During most of my time in Brazil and as the ARA press officer he had been either in actual prison or under house arrest. His book, Cell without a Number, Prisoner without a Name, of course came out of that horrible experience. During my time in Washington I had written a number of press guidances for Hodding Carter urging the Argentine government to release him.

The Argentine government was having none of it. They couldn't stand the Carter government, and had particular dislike for Hodding Carter's wife-to-be, Pat Derian, who was of course the Assistant Secretary for human rights. One of the dumber stories on the streets of Buenos Aires, a city that has more than its share of urban legends, had it that Pat Derian was interested in Timerman because she was his cousin or niece or something like that. I think they simply could not fathom the idea that a government - any government - actually cared about human rights.

Timerman's decision to come to Israel after his release from house arrest attracted a lot of attention. We had lunch shortly after his arrival and his reaction to Israel was fascinating. There were too many military uniforms around for his taste and too many military people with influence in the government. Eventually he ended up at odds with the Israeli right and returned to Argentina, despite having told a lot of people he never would. His son attracted some notoriety by refusing Israeli military service. I guess even very bright people see what they are conditioned to see. We learn from our nightmares. For Timerman the greatest internal danger to Israel was a military coup; for me it was too many years of Likud government.

Now for Lebanon. I was thinking of my early days in Israel and my introduction to the delicacy of Lebanon issues. Somebody on my staff suggested I needed to get out and see some of the country. We had a visiting group of journalists coming in on a program for publishers and editors of small newspapers. My staff thought I should travel with them. I agreed. The visiting journalists were being hosted by the Israeli government, so I went up to Jerusalem to pick them up, and joined the party and their Israeli military guard. We were going to northern Israel, the town of Metula on the Lebanese border. I noticed our guide, an Israeli army officer, was insistent on rushing us through some things we were looking at, because he wanted to get to lunch at a restaurant in Metula. I wasn't particularly suspicious, it just seemed to me he was worried about his schedule.

We got to Metula and were having lunch when all of a sudden our guide said "Well, aren't we lucky. Look who has just arrived. What a coincidence. There is Major Haddad." Some coincidence.

Major Saad Haddad was the head of the Israeli-sponsored Southern Lebanon Christian Militia, and a person with whom the U.S. government would have no dealings. All I knew at that point was that I was not supposed to have any contact with him. So, Haddad came over and the Israeli introduced everybody to him. I hung back so I wouldn't be caught near him. Then they got to talking and the Israeli said "Gee, Major, couldn't you take these people over to visit area? Major Haddad said he would be delighted and most of the journalists said they would like to go. I thought, "Oh, Lord, these people are going to leave Israel and go into Lebanon. Now what do I do."

I got the journalists off to one side and said, "Look, you are not supposed to do this and I certainly cannot go with you, and if you go there you are outside any protection the American Embassy can offer you. What you are doing is contrary to U.S. policy." That had no effect whatsoever on anyone but one very nice older lady who was the publisher of the Baltimore Afro American. I would like to think that my pompous little speech convinced her that it was unpatriotic to cross into Lebanon, but I suspect she just needed a little rest.

So they all took off with Major Haddad, and the lady from Baltimore and I sat and had a very pleasant visit, drinking Coke in the Metula restaurant. Finally, they all came back and we finished the rest of the tour. I reported the whole thing to the Embassy the next morning and was told I had done the right thing. The point of the story was that we had an understanding from the Israelis they would not do that, before this group toured. They broke that agreement.

Q: One of the things I get from people talking is that the Israelis are pushing things to the ultimate, did you get that feeling when you were there?

DIETERICH: Yes, it's history and culture again. I think there is a mindset that says you are being irresponsible if you don't do the most you can to benefit your own people. It's a hard thing to explain, but it is the real thing and it is not confined to Israelis either.

Q: Listen, I served in Korea and this is the Koreans, too.

DIETERICH: It's the reaction of people who have been pushed around. If you had the luxury of being raised a nice secure, mainstream American WASP, you are kind of embarrassed to push too hard for your own advantage and the advantage of your family. But I think people who grow up in disadvantaged circumstances, and their children, develop a different kind of morality. People who have had to fight to survive learn to take care of those closest to them first. We feel bad when we have engaged in some act of nepotism, which we do anyway every now and then, but a lot of Latin Americans and Israelis may feel bad when they don't take care of their own first.

Q: I mentioned the Koreans. The Japanese tried to wipe out the Korean language and the Korean culture. When you deal with the Koreans, they are plain pushy. Did the subject of the Arabs in Israel or on the West Bank come up much in the embassy?

DIETERICH: Yes, and it came up very early. You find when you go to Israel, Israelis keep telling you how many Arabs live in Israel - the Israeli Arabs, the good Arabs and the Druse, who enlist in the army and live here with full rights like everybody else. There are about a half a million Arabs and Druse who live in Israel. It is all true, but it doesn't mean what some Israelis think it means. What it means to most Likud-supporting Israelis is roughly this: those people on the West Bank, those people in the camps, those people who left when they didn't have to, should have stayed because it is perfectly feasible for an Arab to be a loyal citizen of Israel and to receive all the benefits of being in this country. And the people who didn't take that offer from the State of Israel should stop complaining, get out of the camps and go live in some Arab country.

Q: Was it pointed out that Captain Sharon was blowing up Jewish homes at that time?

DIETERICH: That doesn't usually doesn't come up in the same conversation, unless you bring it up. It depends on who you talk to. Sure, there are Israelis that will tell you, "Yes, we have five hundred thousand Arabs, but they don't have the same rights, it doesn't mean anything, and we have behaved badly with this problem."

There are a bunch of Israelis that we sort of think of as the left, but really aren't, who believe Israel should trade some territory for security. They also believe that Israel has not treated Arabs well, that injustice was done. There are many Israelis, maybe even a majority, who believe that Arabs live comfortably in Israel with full rights of citizenship, and that means to them that the problem isn't exactly as most of the world sees it. It is true they live there in peace, but if you talk to a lot of them they don't think they have the same rights in practice.

Q: I thought we might leave the Lebanese thing for another session. What about the nuclear business, was that something that we pussyfooted around?

DIETERICH: I don't remember ever dealing with that subject as press attach_. There were just some things you didn't talk about because there was nothing of certainty that my world, or the press, could deal with in any effective way. Everybody knows what the truth is, it's like dealing with the old incident of the USS Liberty. There wasn't anything left to say about it that could be said. There are certain topics in the U.S.-Israeli relationship that you just don't want to talk about, and we've not talked about them for so long, nobody bothers to push very hard either.

Q: At that particular time, did you get involved in the briefing on the care and feeding of the American Jews who came to Israel in groups? You must have had them once a week.

DIETERICH: I didn't do much of that, those were not considered to be press issues. The ambassador and some others in the embassy would meet with prominent groups that came in. I just didn't have time for anything but the press stuff. It often depended on what kind of group it was, and if they came with academic credentials or academic interests, the cultural attach_ would brief them. Sally Grooms was a very distinguished counterpart in the cultural section (and someone you folks should interview - Sally Grooms Cowal).

Q: Grooms?

DIETERICH: Yes, the last name is Cowal. You really ought to get her.

Q: Is she retired?

DIETERICH: Yes, she is here in town. She was head of Youth for Understanding, and she was in Geneva on a United Nations assignment. Before that, she had been a DAS and was also the ambassador to Barbados. She will soon be the president of the Cuba Policy Foundation.

Q: Oh, good, we'll go after her.

DIETERICH: She is really something.

Q: I'm keeping the Lebanese off to one side, but can you think of any issues that came up where the embassy was portrayed as being off-base or unfriendly? In other words, you had to do some damage control. Were there any problems you can think of?

DIETERICH: I don't remember any major situations where we were accused of being out of sync with policy. They probably occurred, but never to the extent that they engaged my office in a big way. But that raises another interesting technical issue.

We had no way of reading the U.S. press. I got up early and listened to the Voice of America, which was quite helpful. Since most embassy people listened to BBC which is available in Israel on medium wave, I often I knew more about what was happening in the U.S. than others did. There was no way for us to get advance copies of U.S. newspapers. There was no way for me to find out what the hell the State Department spokesman had said, except to sort of sense that something had gone wrong and to call George Sherman, who was the press person in the Mideast bureau, and find out what the hell the spokesman had said. That was not something you could do every day.

Q: When you serve there, you certainly feel the intensity of life. The work was hard but the Israelis were a lot of fun. It was not like being at an Arab post.

DIETERICH: It was great fun. I had a wonderful time. I worked like hell, and sort of neglected my family. When my son Robby was born in the Assuta Hospital in Tel Aviv, my wife's obstetrician said, "The Assuta Hospital is a great hospital but it is a bad hotel."

Q: What was that?

DIETERICH: It had very primitive rooms and services. I remember being surprised when the nurse, who was examining my wife during labor, was wearing flip flops and smoking a cigarette. That was kind of cute. I was supposed to stay and be there at his birth but, as usual, I went out to make a phone call. We had just realized we had left the house without leaving a note for our daughter. I had to stand in line to get to the pay phone. By the time I made the call and contacted our daughter, our son had already been born.

Q: Well, Jeff, why don't we stop at this point. We will pick this up - what did you call it there, the invasion of Lebanon?

DIETERICH: It finally became an invasion of Lebanon. This was mainly in '81.

Q: We will pick that up. You mentioned that, when you were avoiding Major Haddad with a group. Anyway, we will pick that up next time.

DIETERICH: Great.

Q: This is the 6th of January 2000. Jeff - Lebanon.

DIETERICH: Right. The roots of the Lebanon issue go back well into '81, when the Israelis did some strikes beyond what was known at that time as the "red line", which was the line that defined the zone that Israel was controlling through Major Haddad and his Christian militia. Then that led to the Syrians putting in some antiaircraft missiles in the same area. In the meantime, the PLO saw its chance to get both sides to escalate. The United States began to see a great danger in this and brought Philip Habib in on a series of missions to deal with that particular issue. His technique was to shuttle back and forth, in sort of on a tripod type shuttle - Jerusalem, Beirut, and Damascus.

Q: Did you get involved in this?

DIETERICH: Yes, I did. Again, it was one of these things where we never knew for sure what the Israelis were going to do in terms of publicizing the events at meetings. They were very situational on this. If they felt there was something to be gained by making public the contents of the meeting, and making public their position, they would do so. Ambassador Lewis and Phil Habib felt it was important that I be along to counter, if they should do that. We would be unlikely to be the first to go public with something, but we had to be there to defend ourselves if they did. Again, it was sort of the rules we had established between Ambassador Lewis and Prime Minister Begin. I would show up with the delegation, and if the Israelis ran in one of their press people into the meeting, I would go in, too.

Habib made it very clear to me at the beginning that he would have nothing to say to the press. He said, "It is difficult enough to do this mission when I have to shuttle between here and Damascus, or here and Beirut, and to take Israeli positions to the other parties. In order to do that effectively, I have to be able to control the agenda. What really drives me crazy is, if I go, and before I can say what I want to say, I have to contend with versions that have been leaked to the press." I think that was absolutely correct; I think it was absolutely sound technique. I did my best to ensure there were never any leaks. He would occasionally ask me what the press was thinking, what their concerns were, and eventually use the press. It was mainly a lot of standing around. There would be a meeting and Habib would come out and the press, in a good humored way, would try to get him to say something. At one point he came out and said, "You know me - old silent Phil." The press misheard what he said and thought he had said "silent film," which shows how they were thinking, since they were mainly television journalists. The phrase "silent film and silent movies" had a lot of currency among the press at that time. Of course, I never told them anything. I would stand around outside meetings and talk about other things and do pretty good contact work with people and made a lot of good friends. That's the way it had to be - always with Habib, but never talking to the press.

The meetings at times were a lot of fun. Often we would gather at the Jerusalem Consulate, which Brandon Grove was in charge of at that time, as Consul General, and had some wonderful evenings. Brandon was an excellent host, and Habib held forth at the dinner table, more often than not about what was wrong with the foreign service. "This modern age of sissy diplomats who are overpaid and under worked." That was happening during 1981.

Q: Was this when the Israelis went into Lebanon?

DIETERICH: No, this was before. The Israelis didn't go into to Lebanon until June of '82.

Q: Did you have a feeling that Sharon and company were cocking the rifle, ready to do something?

DIETERICH: Eventually, yes. But we are not quite there yet. As I remember, it was in the fall of '82 that Habib finally achieved a minor miracle diplomatically, in that he got a de facto cease-fire between the Israelis and the PLO, as far as southern Lebanon was concerned. This was done by Habib making a statement which neither side denied, which is the way you dealt with the fact there wasn't going to be any kind of a joint document between the PLO and the Israelis, nor any kind of joint statement. When that was finally achieved, Charley Hill and I were hanging around the consulate, and Habib was off some place, but I don't remember where. Not with the prime minister, probably at the foreign ministry, and for some reason I hadn't gone along. I got a call from Habib's party saying he wanted to talk to the press right away. I'm sitting there at the consulate thinking, "How in the hell am I going to get in touch with the press and put them with Habib?" Charley and I talked for about 15 seconds, and it finally occurred to us that we had to figure out a way to get to the prime minister's office because that is where the press was. We decided to call up Begin and say Phil Habib wants to come by and say good-bye to him, because he was leaving. That is exactly what happened. Otherwise, I think I would have been screwed. So we all went to the prime minister's office. I'm proud of the fact that I was standing there with Phil Habib as he announced the cease-fire and took some questions.

Q: What did the statement say?

DIETERICH: The statement basically said both sides had agreed to stop shooting. There were some questions about what geographic area this actually entailed. It was a good moment for U.S. diplomacy. The cease-fire lasted for awhile, it bought some time, and it established an important principle that de facto arrangements between the PLO and Israel were in fact possible.

Q: How was Habib dealing with the PLO?

DIETERICH: I don't know. He was dealing with them through the Lebanese government and the Syrian government. The trick was to read a statement and let it stand with no denials. It worked, it worked.

Q: How was the Israeli press coming around? Were most of them hoping for a peaceful solution or was the press so politicized that you could almost write the news or editorials of each paper?

DIETERICH: Your question sort of contains the answer. It is a pretty politicized press. I don't mean it is a dumb politicized press. It is a smart politicized press. Most journalists are probably more inclined towards the peace side than the war side in Israeli politics. We often misunderstand the Israeli attitude toward war. Let me explain that. I remember once I talked about going on that trip where I almost met Major Haddad. One of the standard stops on that tour was to go up to the Golan Heights. We were among a huge number of tourist groups and others who had been taken to the Golan Heights to look down on Tiberias and see how vulnerable Israel is, and how narrow Israel is, at that point. While I was up there one of the Americans said to me, "But why are the Israelis so worried all the time? They always win." The more I thought about that question, the dumber I realized it really is. After all, at the end of a war when you win, the people that died aren't resurrected. Besides, it was a pretty near thing in '73. Israel could have lost that one, had it not been for massive shipments of arms from the United States.

Going back to your question, Israeli journalists are pretty professional. They don't wear their ideology on their sleeve. You have to worm it out of a lot of them. That is especially true of those journalists that were covering the American Embassy, covering foreign affairs. They were sophisticated types who spoke English well, were educated, and really understood both the questions and the answers. I found them a pleasure to deal with, and equally the U.S. and European press. They were all pretty good. It's kind of like what Sam Lewis said to me about being press attach_ in Israel, "It's center court Wimbledon." Israel is a hell of a good assignment for an American journalist who wants to make his career as a foreign correspondent. Israel has been a surefire front-page story for the last half-century.

Q: A number of the press representatives (I'm talking about media, not just press), had Jewish backgrounds. Did that make much of a difference?

DIETERICH: That is a hard thing to assess, because it depends on the individual. There are American Jews in Israel - I'm not talking about only the press corps, but sometimes among American diplomats too, who buy into the Israeli story excessively, in my opinion. There are American non-Jews that do the same thing. In a sense, they lose some of the objectivity they should have. There are also American Jews who go the other way. They almost overcompensate and sort of become remarkably suspicious of what the Israeli government says. At times they gloomily pessimistic about the future of Israel and the nature of its society. You also have to remember there are a lot of Israelis who are pretty pessimistic about the nature of Israeli society, and are absolutely opposed to the government. Elections in Israel are close-run affairs. If you were on the side of peace, you didn't feel you were isolated in Israel, there were a whole lot of Israelis who were with you.

Q: During this period, while Habib was working on a cease-fire and up through the time the Israelis went into Lebanon, were we monitoring the Begin Cabinet to see where they were going?

DIETERICH: In early 1981 there were elections, and Likud barely squeaked through. Out of that they lost some support in the coalition they had prior to the elections, that is they lost some moderate support. The second Begin cabinet was a lot tougher than the first, mainly because Moshe Dyan had resigned before the end of the first cabinet. He felt he was getting nowhere with Begin and did not have enough influence over Israeli policy. He was eventually replaced by General Ariel Sharon, who was a hard-liner, very tough, and absolutely convinced that Israel was going to have to fight another war at some point. Personally, I think he relished the prospect.

In the meantime, relationships with the United States weren't going very well. There were a number of irritants, among those were the sale of American Naval AWACS Aircraft to the Saudis. That drove the Israelis crazy. They envisioned these planes up there capable of monitoring everything that happens on Israeli air bases. They felt that maybe the Saudis weren't very anxious to be in another war with Israel but, if there ever was another war, the Saudi resources would be used somehow or other. The other factor was the end of the Carter administration. The Israelis were never really fond of Jimmy Carter. I think there was a feeling that they had been pressured at Camp David. There were some genuine misunderstandings about what had been agreed to at Camp David, especially on the issue of settlements.

I think Carter believed that Begin had undertaken not to build any more settlements during the time that negotiations were ongoing. Begin's contention, I think, was "that was during the Camp David negotiations, and I didn't do that." Carter's interpretation was that it meant during the period of the negotiations of all the things that were implicit and written into the Camp David agreement, such as Palestinian autonomy, and the final withdrawal of Israel from Sinai.

At any rate, Israel immediately began building settlements again on the West Bank. Carter felt betrayed by Begin, and Begin felt he was being held to something by Carter that he had never agreed to. With the beginning of the Reagan government, the Israelis felt they had a person who was basically sympathetic to them, and an administration in the United States that was not going to push them on things like the autonomy talks. They believed that Reagan was not going to expect Israel to make sacrifices, because this would be an administration that would recognize the great contribution Israel had made to the U.S. Crusade against communism. The Israeli contention was that they had been a real asset to the United States and it was about time the United States recognized they were a strategic ally. The hope of the Begin government was to get some kind of recognition of the Israeli contribution out of the Reagan administration.

Initially, the Reagan administration was not very interested in the autonomy talks, but after awhile they began to come around. Haig began to realize this was a good idea so he began to lean on the Israelis to get going. The Israelis didn't like that very much. Then there were other irritants, little scandals would come up. Somebody would say the wrong thing in a meeting someplace, and the Israelis would pick it up.

Bring me back to where I'm supposed to be - how did I get on this?

Q: We were talking about the Reagan administration coming in. It is not just foreign diplomats who are trying to figure out what the Americans are up to, the American diplomats were probably wondering where they stood.

DIETERICH: The most immediate concern in the embassy was - will the ambassador be re-appointed? Fortunately, he was re-appointed, as were the other ambassadors in the region, which was a very sound decision considering what was in play. I tend to remember in terms of specifics - what was going to happen with the autonomy talks.

As I said before, being a press attaché in Israel was very peculiar, we were very event-driven, so I might try to meditate on the broader implications of policy, but what really was in play was who was going to replace Saul Linowitz, and how was he going to be to deal with. The sooner we would get some information on these people, the sooner we could get it out to the press and start preparing the way, because everything gets harder when you have to do it cold. What are new traveling delegations going to be like out of this administration? What is the new secretary of state going to be like? What is the administration of USIA going to do in terms of our resources? Will we get better communications than we had before, or are we going to sit and fight with antiquated systems as usual?

The autonomy talks were interesting and frustrating. You would end up with these big meetings with big delegations from Israel, Egypt and the U.S. Although I might accompany the principal U.S. Negotiator to preliminary courtesy meeting with senior government officials, I don't believe I ever sat in on an actual negotiating session. There was a sound understanding that press people were not to be included. It worked.

There was a fair amount of backgrounding of the press after the sessions. People would come out of the meetings and say, "Well, it's 80% done." That got to sound pretty hollow after a while because that 80% depended on how you counted things. The 20% that was left was the stuff that wasn't going to get done. It was like you have a building all built but no roof, and you have no idea how to build a roof.

We went to a meeting at the defense ministry and I guess the defense spokesman was in because I ended up in the meeting. This was the meeting where Sharon came on with maps and outlined what he characterized as his plan for the invasion of Lebanon.

Q: You are looking like "shock".

DIETERICH: A kind of "What on earth are you talking about?" reaction. Well, it caused a lot of excitement. There were a lot of cables that went flashing out after that, and Habib and everybody were stunned. Our military attachés were with us, it was a fairly large group of people that was there. It was an amazing briefing. I don't remember that the ambassador was there, I guess he was off someplace.

Q: I think Bill Brown mentioned this. These things aren't done in a vacuum. What was the reading of why he was doing this? Was he setting up his own policy, or trying to force an issue? What was the feeling?

DIETERICH: I think the evidence was that this plan had not been vetted through many other places in the Israeli government. I'm not even sure he had gone through the prime minister. If he had gone over this with the prime minister it probably had been in the most theoretical terms. I'm pretty sure a lot of folks in the government didn't know about it. If the foreign minister knew, he probably had no idea of the extent of Sharon's planning. I think Sharon was trying to do two things. I think he was trying to get us used to the idea and gauge our reaction. And maybe he used this as leverage to get it through his own government. He could say, "I've already told the Americans about this." Sharon had this alarming capacity of not listening to arguments that went against what he wanted to believe. The trouble with dealing with people like that is it is very hard to warn them, because if you tell them they have a terrible idea and we are not going to support you, and his reaction will be, "Oh, yes, I hear you, but that is just rhetoric, what are you really going to do?" Unless what you said was accompanied by some kind of catastrophic threat, he would kind of toss it aside.

Q: Like what led up to Saddam Hussein, he didn't realize we really meant what we were going to do.

DIETERICH: I think that is right. I don't think he really believed we wouldn't stop them, and he was probably right too. But on the other hand, you don't make catastrophic threats when dealing with Israel because the press will pick it up and you will face all kind of hell in both the U.S. And Israel.

Q: After this did you say, "Boy, if this person is defense minister we really have problems?"

DIETERICH: After that briefing, even before, we knew this person was going to be hard for us to deal with.

Q: When Sharon went and talked to Haig and came back and claimed he was given a wink, or a green light to do this - was this before that?

DIETERICH: No, I believe it was after. Sharon went to Washington, and has some sort of conversation with the Secretary. Maybe Haig was overly diplomatic because lots of people believe Sharon took it as a wink and a nod.

Anyway, that is the problem with Sharon. We were caught in a terrible dilemma because whatever happened was going to become public. If Sharon didn't make things public, Begin did. They both really believed in using the press and using foreign opinion to their advantage. Sometimes that tactic would backfire and work to their disadvantage but they had a hard time recognizing when that happened. Here is your dilemma - if you make a statement mean enough and tough enough to get Sharon's attention, it would be absolutely offensive to friends of Israel all over the place. To put it bluntly, a statement tough enough to move Sharon is going to offend the hell out of the Jewish community in the United States. That's the problem. The tone with Israel always has to be, "We are trying to be helpful to you, and we can help you better if you don't go ahead and do this." The language of diplomacy doesn't deal much in ultimatums and nasty language, but anything short of an ultimatum would not have been understood by Sharon.

Q: It must have been difficult for you all, particularly on the press side, if the Begin government was using aimed press releases all the time which always involved the United States one way or another, this meant you were having to react all the time. You couldn't be giving out press statements to preempt this.

DIETERICH: It was not so much a matter of formal press releases as it was backgrounding to individual journalists and thinly disguised leaks. We were not helpless. We could and would and respond at least in terms of backgrounding. There were a number of techniques we would use. Occasionally we would make a statement through Washington, and occasionally we would get part of what we wanted to say out through the department spokesman.

Sam Lewis did a lot of backgrounders with the press, both one-on-one meetings with the press, plus in meetings open to almost all the U.S. Press, or meetings with selected members of the Israeli press. We rarely mixed the Israeli and U.S. press in one meeting, because we felt there was a different understanding of the traditional guidelines regarding attribution. I would arrange meetings in the USIS Library, where Sam Lewis would take questions and do very well.

But you are partly right, we never could respond with the kind of punchy quality that the Israelis used. Part of it because it is not in our nature and partly because it wouldn't be accepted in terms of our own domestic politics. Also because the whole time I was there we were in a kind of mediator role which meant you shouldn't be punching back at the person or you would destroy your effectiveness. Sometimes we had to swallow it and couldn't respond very well. I once described my tour in Israel as like a permanent Roadrunner cartoon where you get to be the coyote.

Q: Did you notice any difference between what was coming out of The New York Times, which was owned by a Jewish family, and The Washington Post, which did not have the same constituency?

DIETERICH: No. I really didn't. It was an interesting time to serve in Israel, in the sense that it was a period of increasing skepticism. The bloom was off the Israeli rose, it was no longer a matter of "poor little Israel." Golda Meir, Aba Eban, Moshe Dyan, and the almost larger-than-life figures were very good in communicating with Americans. It was a different kind of Israel, a period of increasing sympathy for the Palestinians and a certain amount of impatience with Israel. The old answers wouldn't work anymore. That old dialog the Israelis had going, when you would say, "Well, don't you think you're being kind of mean to the Palestinians?" And they would say, "Look what happened to us in the Holocaust" didn't work anymore. You had a new generation of Americans who would say "so what, the Arabs didn't do that." You were getting toward an era of more pragmatic politics dominated by the horror of the Second World War. Israel, from the outside, was beginning to look more and more like a bully. I must say when you live in Israel you become more conscious of the vulnerability of Israel in military terms, and at times the fragility of the Israeli political system. It's a very difficult, very personality-driven system, run by a small group of people who know each other altogether too well.

Q: What about the orthodox parties? I would think it would be very hard for an American to have any understanding or feeling about them. They have the word of God; they don't participate in the military side of things. A real problem for the development of modern Israel.

How did you all feel about that?

DIETERICH: There are sort of two ways of looking at it. There are the ultra, ultra orthodox, the Mea Shearim crowd, folks who think history stopped someplace in the 18th Century, and dress accordingly. Some may occasionally throw stones at passing cars on the Sabbath, but most of them are very withdrawn from every day political life. They in themselves are not terribly important in Israeli politics. I remember one very secular Israeli friend of mine who said, "You have Indian reservations and we have Mea Shearim, and neither society is willing to do anything about them, because we sentimentalize them - they are part of our past."

The national religious party, however, is a party of very sophisticated orthodox Jews. These are people who do not shun politics. They are very good at politics, and they have been the swing party in most elections, the coalition maker. They have exacted their price almost every time in terms of making sure reformed Judaism is not really recognized in Israel; making sure that Israel shuts down for the Sabbath on Friday nights; doing things like trying to get all flights grounded out of the airports during the Sabbath. No buses running on the Sabbath. All sorts of things which are the result of coalition politics which drive most Israelis absolutely crazy. Probably a majority of Israelis are really quite secular people who see their roots in Judaism as cultural and terribly important, but are not very observant Jews. On the other hand, you can't form a government without taking into account the sentiments, feelings, and political goals of orthodox Jews.

Q: Let's move up to when things were heating up along the border. The Lebanese invasion was when?

DIETERICH: In May of '82. By that time I was nearing the end of my tour.

Q: You were out before it happened?

DIETERICH: No, I was out at about the middle of it.

Q: Well, what was the feeling at the embassy? Were we at all concerned about what Sharon had done when he went to the United States and got the so called green light?

DIETERICH: I don't think we ever believed that he really had. He just thought he had. The question is one, I'm afraid, that divided counsels within the U.S. administration, too. I think there were certain people who thought we couldn't blame the Israelis because they were subject to constant artillery attacks. They retaliate, but who wouldn't? After all, those people they are protecting in Lebanon are Christians and we ought to be sympathetic with them. I suppose it is true that the Reagan administration came to power owing something to evangelical groups in the United States. Haddad and his people knew how to appeal to right-wing evangelicals and had contact with them. So did Begin and his people.

We in the embassy knew, in fact, that an invasion of Lebanon was terribly destabilizing in terms of long-term U.S. policy in the region. But there were a lot of people in the Reagan administration who weren't really willing to come out absolutely against the Israelis in this thing.

There were also Reagan insiders who shared the Israeli notion that Israel deserved U.S. support because of its contribution to our cold war concerns.

Q: During this time when rockets would land in Israel, then there would be air strikes, was anybody toting up how many Israeli civilians were killed as opposed to how many Palestinian civilians were killed?

DIETERICH: Very few Israelis were killed in those raids. Anybody in a war is pretty much trying to make sure that he doesn't take many casualties. The Israelis got very good at building shelters, the Katusha rocket was just a piece of artillery. It had no real guidance system. They could figure it might hit a particular town, but that was the best they could do. The Israelis got used to spending nights in shelters. I'm sure Israeli retaliation took many more lives than they lost, but I can't imagine anybody's national policy being based on "as long as they don't kill more of our people than we kill of theirs, that will be okay."

Q: No, no, but I was wondering if this was of concern.

DIETERICH: It was a concern, but the Israeli answer was always, "Look, we are trying to limit civilian casualties. We are doing the best we can" I don't think the Israelis ever deliberately targeted some civilian area that didn't have some sort of strategic interest. The Israelis were, after all, interested in killing PLO, not in killing Lebanese.

Q: It seemed like the event that precipitated this whole thing was the sad attack on the Israeli ambassador in London.

DIETERICH: There was the attack on the Israeli ambassador in London, followed by an Israeli air strike on the PLO headquarters in Lebanon, followed immediately by a major barrage of artillery of Katushas from PLO sites into northern Israel. That is what did it. There really was an outbreak of real shooting going on. It was funny how I found out about the actual move into Lebanon. At the end of May, our daughter had a date with an Israeli student at her school to go to her senior prom. On the day of the prom, late in the afternoon, she got a call from the kid saying, "I'm calling from Lebanon and I'm sorry I can't make it back for the prom." I got on the phone right away. It was one of the first confirmations we had that they were really that far up into Lebanon. I think young man was calling from Tyre or Sidon. Mari, now a foreign service officer herself, has been lunching on that senior prom story ever since. It's the kind of foreign service childhood story that makes it all worth while.

Q: Sometime ago I interviewed Bob Dillon, who was still livid years later about how he and the attachés would be reporting what was happening, and they would get something back saying they were off because the embassy in Tel Aviv told them they really weren't doing this. Were you active during the early part of this?

DIETERICH: I'm trying to remember when I left. The invasion happened in late May and I left very shortly after that. As press attach_, I might not have been seeing some of that stuff, although I saw a fair amount of the outgoing traffic.

Q: I was just wondering whether you were trapped into using Israeli reports of what was happening.

DIETERICH: My reporting responsibilities had to do with the media. In some ways that means it would have been our job to report what the Israelis were saying about what was happening. You are doing your job as long as you identify the source.

Q: Early on, were you skeptical about what the Begin government claimed was happening?

DIETERICH: In terms of the progress of the war? I just can't comment on that. I was almost gone, probably by mid-June. There were a couple of other things I wanted to cover.

Q: Let's talk about Sinai.

DIETERICH: As you know, the Camp David agreement called for further negotiations to bring about a staged withdrawal from the Sinai. In terms of background, we already had the Sinai field mission out there, which had come in after '73 as an early-warning peacekeeping operation. This basically put seismic sensors and television cameras into the Giddi and Mitla passes to make sure that neither Israel or Egypt would be subject to a surprise armored attack by the other. I visited that operation once. It is a really bleak and strange operation, run by foreign service officers and some military people, plus a contractor, E-Systems, who provides most of the logistics. E-Systems was also eventually involved in the Sinai Multinational Force also.

I have a story I love to tell out of that visit. I went out with one of the people from the mission to a remote site in one of the passes where there was a remotely controlled television camera. He was showing me how this television camera could move, could be directed from their central operation. He said, "There is this Bedouin that comes by every now and then and we've got him believing that he controls the camera, because when he stares at the camera and moves his hand to the right, we move the camera that way. Then when he moves his hand the other way, we move the camera accordingly. He loves it and thinks he controls the camera." I think there is a lesson in Middle East politics in the story, because in a sense he really was controlling the camera.

The Israelis and the Egyptians both, as we came down to the deadline for withdrawal from the Sinai began to get cold feet. Sadat was having second thoughts because he was getting beaten up by the Arabs all over the place and he was tired of it, and because he feared the limitations he had accepted on Egyptian military activities in the Sinai would only buy him more grief. The Israelis were deathly afraid, in retrospect, of establishing a precedent which would then be applied by somebody to the Golan and the West Bank. After the death of Sadat, and Sharon coming to power, it came down to "I know we have to give up most of it, but we can't give up everything, we have to keep something. We have to renegotiate this somehow. We just can't give up the whole Sinai."

This led to a whole bunch of really dumb disputes. The most egregious being Taaba, which was down on the Red Sea, just around the corner from Eilat. And there were other kinds of trial balloons - "Can't we hold onto the air bases? Why should we give up all this oil?" The department sent Walt Stoessel out, who was the undersecretary for political affairs, I think, to negotiate and to work with the Egyptians and Israelis on this. He did a fine job, and again it was one of those missions where I spent a lot of time cooling my heels in offices, waiting to see if anybody needed the press. It was finally worked out. An agreement was signed under somewhat strange circumstances due to considerations of who was to sign and where. On the Egyptian side I think it was signed by the Egyptian ambassador in Tel Aviv, which is where he lived at least.

The withdrawal came to pass with a number of results. I think, in some ways, what Israel gave up has not been fully appreciated in the rest of the world. The Sharon tactic of trying to hold on to little enclaves was just silly. All it did was take away from Israel some of the international credit it should have gotten for a remarkable sacrifice. Who has ever given up a lot of territory without being beaten?

Q: I talked to some of the people who had been on the early peace missions who said there was a lot of Israeli testing, trying to take more in than they were supposed to. When you look at it, it was almost kid stuff - just testing - and it got everybody mad.

DIETERICH: So much of this was Sharon-driven, in my estimation. A little bit Begin-driven too. What history should remember is that Israel gave up oil resources and air bases. Now they have a couple of new air bases in the Negev built for them by us. Those aren't as good as having the whole Sinai. The Sinai was a great training area for the Israeli air force, and they don't have the space they had. There aren't very many examples in history of people giving up that kind of territory.

Q: Did you have any experience with the Egyptian press?

DIETERICH: A little bit, yes. I made one trip to Egypt after Camp David when travel to Egypt became possible. I worked out a deal with the PAO in Cairo to send a car down to meet me at the border. I rode in the car all the way through the Sinai seeing the hulks of burned out tanks along that road into Cairo. It was a marvelous trip and I did talk to some Egyptians while I was there, sort of the guest of USIS in Cairo. I don't remember running into Egyptian journalists on a regular basis. They would come when you would have the autonomy talks delegation, when an Egyptian delegation would show up. One of the jobs to be done during the period of negotiating withdrawals from the Sinai was setting up the Multinational Force and Observers, which is a fascinating story in itself. Again, these were negotiations the press was interested in, and I had to follow and got to know the people that were involved in that operation too. I don't know whether this is the time to tell how it works or not.

Q: Oh sure.

DIETERICH: Part of the deal from the very beginning was that the United States would try to get the UN to put a peacekeeping mission into the Sinai. To get the agreement signed, we basically had to say "and if the United Nations won't do it, we will do it." Well, guess what! Of course the United Nations wouldn't do it. There was no way we were going to get the Security Council to approve a United Nations peacekeeping operation in the Sinai. Remember, the Russians had been cut out of the Mideast peacekeeping, peacemaking process - the Camp David process - early on, and they were always unhappy about that. Not nearly as unhappy as the Israelis would have been had they been brought in.

Anyway, as it turned out, we had to do it by ourselves. Basically, we had to go out and find countries willing to contribute. Early on we got the Colombians and the Fijians in because they are perennial peace keepers. They had been doing this for quite a while. Then we had a flurry with the Israelis when we wanted to get some Europeans in. The Israelis were doubtful about having the Europeans in. Doubtful about the British, because of the Mandate history. Doubtful about the French, because they felt the French were too close to the Saudis, and the French history in Lebanon had complicated things a lot and for the region also. They were also somewhat suspicious of the Italians and I could never quite figure out why, since everybody likes the Italians. But maybe one of the clues is that those Israeli oil fields that were given up in the Sinai were run by ENI, the Italian governmental hydrocarbons conglomerate. Finally, the Israelis consented, and the French, Italians, and the British agreed to come in, as well as Australia and New Zealand. We got a Norwegian General, Frederick Bull-Hansen, who agreed to be the commander of the outfit. The director general was an American, a retired State Department Senior Administrative officer named Leamon R. Hunt, known as Ray Hunt, who was later killed in Rome. Ray Hunt and Vic Dikeos, who was his deputy, asked me if I would consider going to Rome as the public affairs officer for the Multinational Force and Observers (MFO.) Rome was a big temptation, since I had studied in Italy as a graduate student and I liked Rome a lot - loved Italy. I talked to some people about it, including Sam Lewis, and we all came to the conclusion that it would be a great press job, because this thing would never work. It was going to be hell - they were going to be screwed up all over the place, and the Israelis and Egyptians were going to be all over each other. It was going to be a very exciting time. So I thought maybe I would go.

In the meantime, I wasn't getting much I was interested in from Washington anyway. I was a little bit out of touch with Latin America by then, and not well enough known in the Middle East, nor was I an Arabic speaker, so of nothing was coming up that really turned me on. Nor did I relish the idea of studying Arabic or trying to be a PAO in a country where I didn't speak the language.

So I decided Rome might be fun, plus it was a great deal financially because it was an international organization and you didn't have to pay any U.S. taxes, while you still collected your full foreign service salary. So I agreed to go to Rome, and that is when I left Israel and came back to the United States for about two months, since the MFO had not yet made its official move to Rome. I worked out of the MFO headquarters in the Washington suburb of Landmark, Virginia. It was really quite interesting helping to invent a brand new organization.

In the first place - why Rome? The agreement itself stipulated there had to be a headquarters and it had to be outside the treaty area, so we had to find a place to go. Washington seemed unsuitable because it was too far away. It came down to western Europe, and hopefully a place with good communications and good air connections. We talked to the British, French, and the Italians and the best deal came from the Italians. It was particularly attractive to us because the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) of the UN was already in Rome, and that provided a model for us to use with the Italians in order to establish what our status would be as a foreign organization. We basically said to the Italians, "Just give us the same deal and perks you gave to the FAO and we will be fine.” They agreed.

WILLIAM ANDREAS BROWN
Deputy Chief of Mission
Tel Aviv, Israel (1979-1982)

Ambassador William Andreas Brown was born in Winchester, Massachusetts in 1930. He joined the “Holloway Program” which was part of the Naval Reserve Officers Training Program and went to Harvard University, graduating with a Magna cum Laude degree. In 1950 he went to Marine Corps basic training in Virginia and later served in Korea. His Foreign Service career took him to a multitude of places including Honk Kong, Taiwan, Singapore, Malaysia, USSR, India, the UK, and Israel. His career includes an ambassadorship to Israel as well as several positions in the State Department, Environmental Protection Agency. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in November of 1998.

Q: Today is May 5, 1999. Bill, we're going to discuss your time in Israel, and we discussed this off microphone. You're going to be referring to a very complete, oral history which was done by Sam Lewis, who was our Ambassador to Israel when you served there. So, for someone who is looking at this account, for this particular period of time, they should also take into account Ambassador Sam Lewis' oral history.

BROWN: Yes. That is an outstanding interview, in its entirety. In my view he made an brilliant presentation. I subscribe to his description of events in Israel and the background to them. I will attempt to fill in some niches, give some personal recollections on certain incidents in which I was involved or on which I had special observations, and make some comments on management and other matters. Stu, please feel free to ask me what you want.

Q: I would like to put in here that you were the Deputy Chief of Mission [DCM] of the American embassy in Tel Aviv from 1979 to 1982.

BROWN: I believe that my time there ran from the end of September or early October, 1979, till the end of August, 1982. That covers the following main developments: the follow-up to the conclusion of the Camp David agreements and the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty, the end of the Carter administration, the effect of the mujahideen takeover of our Embassy in Tehran, the Israeli bombing of the Iraqi nuclear reactor, the Israeli elections of 1981, the worsening situation between Israel and Syria in Lebanon, the massive Israeli invasion of Lebanon in June, 1982, and its sequel.

Q: By any chance, while you're going through that laundry list, did the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan [in December, 1979] have any effect?

BROWN: I would say, “Yes,” in overall terms. Remember that not long before this I had previously been serving as Political Counselor in the American embassy in Moscow. I was in that situation during the period of 1977-1978. I was very concerned about Soviet behavior, attitude, and so forth at that stage of the Cold War.

Q: I hope that you will discuss it during your description of this period.

BROWN: Yes. I would like to make some basic observations here. By the way, I commend the reader of this account to the views of other contributors to the Foreign Affairs Oral History regarding the Israeli-Palestinian or the Israeli-Arab relationship, going all the way back to how it appeared in Jerusalem in 1945. Those contributions should be considered as well.

In this connection one of the features to be considered is "What was this all about," particularly in terms of the attitudes of succeeding American administrations, and particularly as we come into the period of the Reagan administration, which began in 1981. As Ambassador Sam Lewis and others have pointed out, there is a school of analysis that the Cold War heavily dominated our approach to the Middle East. That is, the view that the Soviets were out to do us in in every way and that there was a number of bad Arab players in this equation. In this view, the Soviets were not willing to help us. In fact, they sought to do us in as best they could. One of the bad Arab characters was President Assad of Syria, who was willing to play the Soviet game. That interpretation of events has a sub-set that the Arab-Israeli conflict at the time was essentially, if not a side-show, a smaller, sub-set of the larger picture of the Cold War. That is the point at which Secretary of State Al Haig and the early Reagan administration came into the picture.

Q: When you arrived in Israel in 1979, the Carter administration was still in office.

BROWN: It was still high Carter administration in a way, although this period was the beginning of the weakening of the Carter administration domestically. This was a reflection of domestic politics, the economy, the attitude toward President Carter, and the rapid wearing away of the great achievement of the Camp David Agreement in domestic political terms. There also was a growing stable of Republican opponents of President Carter, one of whom was Ronald Reagan. There was a feeling that such events as developments in Afghanistan and the Mujahideen takeover of our embassy in Iran [in December, 1979] were wearing away the influence of the Carter administration and President Carter himself.

Now, you must remember that as we speak it is now May, 1999. It is nearly 20 years since I first came into the Middle East. As I think I pointed out before, you could say that I really came into it cold. I had never served in the Middle East, had never lived there, didn't speak any of the languages in use there, and never had any academic background on it. I was recruited into the Middle East, if you will, cold and over the telephone and then in a personal meeting with Ambassador Sam Lewis. I then became totally immersed in the Middle East, and that's how I learned this particular part of the diplomatic trade.

Q: A question while you're on that subject. Did you find yourself having to work out of trying to equate your experience, particularly in the Soviet Union and in Far Eastern countries? I've seen people come to posts with a pre-set idea of how things are done. It sometimes takes a while almost to unlearn those instincts and develop new ones.

BROWN: The situation in the Middle East, as various of your contributors have pointed out, has always been very intense. During this time it was at a peak of that intensity and was to remain so during my period of service in Israel. You really didn't have time to consider the baggage that you might be carrying. You just worked at the situation, day and night.

Let's go back to my Soviet experience. You could argue that my Soviet experience had some relevance to my service in the Middle East. However, I was fascinated by Ambassador Sam Lewis' account of the argument over the issue of the Geneva Peace Conference proposal, which was a Carter initiative which surfaced in 1977. This led to a U.S.-Soviet bilateral declaration in September, 1977. As Ambassador Sam Lewis points out, Secretary of State Vance had negotiated with the Soviets very secretly to produce that bilateral declaration. I must add that this was done so secretly that, despite my being Political Counselor in Moscow, I had no idea that this effort was going on, until it was announced. I don't recall any role of mine whatsoever in any aspect of those negotiations.

The Israelis, of course, were outraged because, they felt that this negotiation was conducted behind their backs. Ambassador Sam Lewis notes that, to this day, I guess, there remains a real disagreement as to what Egyptian President Anwar Sadat's true feelings were on this issue. Ambassador Lewis says that Hermann Eilts, at that time our Ambassador to Egypt, thought that, initially, Sadat liked the idea of the U.S.-Soviet joint statement, with its clear implication that an international conference on the Middle East would be held. However, the Egyptians reportedly then became upset when they became aware of the U.S.-Israeli working paper, which put a gloss on it and which aroused Egyptian fears that Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin would somehow be able to manipulate President Carter at the expense of Egyptian President Sadat.

In any event, by the end of September, 1977, the very month when that bilateral declaration was made, the chances of a Middle East conference had just about evaporated, although President Carter continued to push the idea until President Sadat suddenly went off to Jerusalem in November, 1977. This trip by President Sadat came as a bombshell for the Carter administration. You may recall my previous account of the trip by Deputy Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Phil Habib to Moscow to try to persuade Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko and other Soviet leaders that this was a surprise for us. Gromyko, in his usual biting, sarcastic manner, said to Phil Habib: "Mr. Habib, I can barely restrain myself from laughing in your face."

I mention this to make the point that, although I had some exposure to the Middle East from my Moscow experience, I was basically coming into the Middle Eastern area really cold. And in the wake of an intensive, unprecedented experience in Taiwan. That is, the break in relations with the Republic of China in Taiwan, the closure of the embassy in Taipei, the establishment of the American Institute on Taiwan, and all that went with it.

Another point that I should make is that Ambassador Sam Lewis and I were the same age. He was, I would say, then at the peak of his form, he and his wife, Sally. I would stress here the role of Sally Lewis as well. The two of them did an outstanding job. They were physically up to the stress involved. Ambassador Lewis' position was then, and it was to remain so, a very demanding one.

You may recall that the Israeli Government, over the years, had progressively been moving up to Jerusalem from Tel Aviv. It takes about an hour and a quarter or an hour and a half, depending on the traffic, to drive to Jerusalem from Tel Aviv. It's a hard drive up from Tel Aviv. And I mean "up" as Jerusalem is about 3,000 feet above sea level. If you're not in good shape, you feel the change in altitude. Sam Lewis was a dedicated, highly and intensely involved outreach kind of Ambassador. There was a lot going on in Tel Aviv. The Ministry of Defense was in Tel Aviv. Many Israeli politicians had homes in Tel Aviv. Some of the ministries still operated out of Tel Aviv on alternate days or a couple of days each week. However, the main action was up in Jerusalem. So Ambassador Lewis had to tear up and down between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. I think that, on more than one occasion, he made two round trips a day. This was really a wearing experience for him.

At the Ambassador's lovely residence in Herzeliya Petuach the Lewis' entertained constantly. They backed all kinds of noble causes, including charities. They hosted countless functions for visiting Americans, for Israelis, and for all kinds of visitors, including many congressional delegations who poured in and through Tel Aviv. He would meet Congressional delegations at Ben Gurion Airport [formerly Lydda Airport] and accompany them up to Jerusalem. Often the only chance that you had to brief them was during the trip between the airport and Jerusalem. It was a hectic and sustained pace. There was just no letup. That's the way it was during my three years, working under Sam Lewis. That's the way it had been for two years before that, as well as at least three years after I left Israel, during all of which he was Ambassador.

Ambassador and Mrs. Lewis were, and remained, a tremendous team, taken together and individually. They rapidly became role models for my wife Helen and myself, although I had no idea that I would ever come back to Israel. They impressed us as an outstanding Ambassador and his wife.

We have had and still have a Consulate General in Jerusalem, which had historically been in place for 100 years, first as a tiny office and then as a larger post. One must remember that even before Tel Aviv was established, leaving aside the ensuing growth of the city and the location of an American embassy there, Jerusalem was THE post for the official American representative in Palestine.

Q: We even had a false American presence. Some nut came out of Philadelphia around 1848 or so and set himself up as the American Consul. It took the Ottoman Turks, for Palestine was then part of the Turkish Empire, a couple of years to find out who this guy was. [Laughter]

BROWN: Anyway, there was a well established distance between the American Consulate General in Jerusalem and the American embassy in Tel Aviv. There was understandable resentment on the part of some Israelis at the very existence of an independent American Consulate General in Jerusalem. It was not accredited to Israel because, as part of the overall picture, the United States Government had a host of legal positions which had been articulated and adopted at the United Nations. In this connection one key position was that the fate of Jerusalem remained to be determined. We did not recognize Jerusalem as the capital of Israel. Therefore, the American Consulate General in Jerusalem was not accredited to the Government of Israel. The Government of Israel resented the presence of an independent American Consulate General in Jerusalem and looked on its staff, for many years, as, in essence, pro-Palestinian, and pro-Arab. In the worst case, some Israelis regarded the Consulate General as anti-Israeli.

So the work of interfacing with the Israeli Government was almost entirely handled by the American embassy, from a distance down in Tel Aviv. We had some fine people successively assigned to Jerusalem as Consuls General. The Consulate General had a smaller staff than the embassy in Tel Aviv. The Consulate General's offices were split, with one office on the Jewish side of Jerusalem and the other office, which was the Consular Section of the Consulate General, across the line on the Arab side. The consular district of the Consulate General was all of Jerusalem and the West Bank of the Jordan, as well as reporting thereon. However, as a matter of policy, personnel of the Consulate General in Jerusalem didn't go into Israeli Government offices or ministries. They reported Palestinian and Arab Jerusalem views. This didn't gain any popularity for the Consulate General, let us say, among our Israeli interlocutors.

So there was a built-in, if you will, tension between Embassy Tel Aviv and the Consulate General in Jerusalem, which both the Ambassador and his DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] in Tel Aviv and the Consul General in Jerusalem and his deputy had to deal with. They had to deal with occasional eruptions, let us say.

Another factor here, of course, is that Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin was in power. Begin's Israeli background had been conspiratorial, if you will, during the struggle with the British which preceded Israeli independence. For years Begin and his immediate following had been politically in the wilderness. He had been a member of the Knesset [Israeli Parliament]. However, the embassy's reach into the Begin camp was pretty limited until about 1976 or 1977. True, Ambassador Toon had met with Menachem Begin when Begin was still in the Opposition. (I remember Ambassador Toon saying in Moscow, at the time of the signature of the Camp David Agreements and the peace treaty between Egypt and Israel, that, "Begin will never, ever, give up the West Bank of the Jordan River.") However, we didn't know Menachem Begin that well at the time.

Now, as I arrived in Israel, some momentous developments had taken place, including the famous Camp David Agreements, and President Anwar Sadat of Egypt was on the front pages of the world press with Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin and President Carter. Still, Ambassador Sam Lewis was THE man as far as getting into contact with Prime Minister Begin was concerned. We had some very good officers in the embassy in Tel Aviv, some of whom spoke pretty fluent Hebrew, who would work the scenes elsewhere including the Knesset. We also had extensive contact with Labour.

Q: By "Labour," you mean members of the Labour Party, the opposition to Prime Minister Begin.

BROWN: The Labour Party. In a calmer atmosphere it was a challenge to keep in contact with all of these various political parties in the Knesset and in the ruling, coalition government of Israel. As I said, the distance problem and the communications problem, as well as the time difference between Israel and Washington, were very challenging. By the time I got to Tel Aviv, the embassy staff was really stretched out.

I don't know if I ever told Ambassador Sam Lewis this, but as I transited Washington en route to Tel Aviv, the Country Director of Israeli Affairs, David Korn, pulled me aside one day and said to me, in essence: "Look, Sam Lewis has recruited you for his own needs, on his own principles. We've gone along with this, but we have a special agenda with you. That is, the embassy in Tel Aviv has been working full blast for years now. It is heavily stretched. The people assigned there are fatigued. There is a morale problem to work on. You have to be careful because Sam is so determined to get the most outstanding people that there is a bit of aggravation back here in Washington as to all of this."

Well, that's the kind of thing that I brought quietly with me to Tel Aviv. As I said, Sam was at the top of his form, but the embassy, which was not a large embassy, was stretched out. So I had that problem to be concerned with, in managerial terms.

Now, if I may jump around a bit, Ambassador Sam Lewis emphasized the role of communications, and particularly the secure telephone. He found this indispensable. I swore by it as well. In those days we had an apparatus called a "K-Something," which was a pretty cranky and complicated piece of machinery, by modern standards. A communicator had to crank it up with a special tape. You had to call a communicator into the embassy or have them set it up the night before. It had to be set up in the right time sequence or it wouldn't work with the State Department in Washington. Very often it sounded as if you were talking with somebody on the other side of the Moon. The apparatus would break down. It took a great deal of manipulation. Pretty soon you had to learn how to run this thing yourself.

The secure telephone had a great advantage, but I was later to see that it had a down side as well. First, we tended to become dependent on the secure phone, particularly in the Israeli context, where the atmosphere was often so clouded as to what our real policy was on a given point. We also had problems due to divisions within the Washington agencies, particularly in rapidly developing situations. We often relied on the secure telephone for the most sensitive matters, and our discussions on it therefore didn't get into the record. So historians should be particularly careful about communications via secure telephone. If I were an historian, I would already be very distraught at this time. As I look past your shoulder, Stu, I can see volumes of the "Foreign Relations of the United States," neatly set out on your shelves. By the time the Department of State reaches this period in the Middle East, there will be a large amount of material that is not properly recorded and will never be so recorded, because it was done orally, on the most interesting and delicate matters.

The use of the secure telephone occasionally led to conflicting interpretations. Sam or I would take notes at our end of the conversation. We assumed that someone at the other end was taking his or her own notes. However, then, as you reported up the line and laterally, as to what had been said on the secure telephone and so forth, we often found that there were conflicting interpretations of what was discussed. That, or people tended to read into a conversation or add to it material that the other party to the conversation didn't remember. This also led to compartmentalization, which I used to run into later on, particularly when I was an Ambassador, in view of the way Secretary of State Baker handled Ambassadors and issues. This way of doing business on the secure telephone allowed others outside of the Department of State, as the use of the secure phone improved in quality and frequency of use, to butt in. That is, people outside of the Department of State began to operate their own, secure communications system with Ambassadors or other elements of an embassy. This was often unbeknownst to the Department of State and sometimes in rivalry or competition with it. Like so many other technological developments, the secure telephone is a many-edged instrument.

I'd like now to go into some specific incidents. However, before I do, I'd like to say how much I appreciated the fact, at the time and since then, that Ambassador Sam Lewis took me so deeply into his confidence. At times he was now getting to be a pretty tired man who tried to pace himself. He was in tremendous, physical shape, but the wear and tear on his system was enormous. Every so often he would go off on a well-deserved period of local leave. He liked to dive. He'd go down to the waters off the Sinai Peninsula and dive, leaving me in charge of the embassy. Or he'd go on consultations in the Department of State or on home leave. The intensity of developments affecting Israel was such that, even as a newly arrived DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission], I often got involved at the highest level, with the Israeli Prime Minister or the Defense Minister on very sensitive matters. It was a real immersion and quite a baptism of fire for someone like myself who had come to the area essentially cold.

I mentioned the continuing flow of visitors. One also has to remember that there were, on any given day or night, important visitors in Israel whose presence we might not even be aware of. Within the American Jewish community there were many different strands and strains. Politically, they were often in contention. That is, they were Democrats or Republicans, along with sub-sets thereof. They had their own connections in Israel and their own pathways. Often these pathways led into very high places in Israel. Those who were particularly well-heeled and could contribute or could demonstrate that they had political influence. They had appropriate access to Israeli political figures. It was quite a challenge for us to try and keep track of these people as well, many of whom didn't even notify us that they were in Tel Aviv or were up in Jerusalem and operating on their own. This was really a remarkable phenomenon, and it remains so. As we entered a period of American elections, all of that activity intensified enormously. The Israelis would "play it" for their own benefit.

Q: This raises a question in my mind. After you had been in Israel for a while, this was the world in which you lived. However, I think that one of the things that people who have not served in Israel or even have not served in the Arab world may resent is that Israel is a little country which seems, no matter what the American interest is or what the American embassy would do, Israelis can always bypass you and go to the American Congress and get whatever they want. Was that something you had to deal with, particularly early in your tour of duty in Israel?

BROWN: Well, you rapidly became aware of the fact that the Israelis had a tremendous embassy in Washington and, I would add, good, high quality Consulates around the United States and a very good Mission to the United Nations. The Israeli Consulate General in New York was often headed by a former Israeli Ambassador. Israel had a purchasing mission in New York. They were working this structure for all that it was worth. They were in touch with both Houses of Congress and the Executive Branch of the American Government, the various elements of the Jewish communities, the arms industries, and various aspects of American intellectual and cultural life.

For instance, it didn't take me long to figure out that Prime Minister Menachem Begin and his associates were working with the American Christian right wing. This was appalling to some Israelis, particularly those associated with or sympathetic to the Israeli Labor Party, who had been used to, and thought it entirely appropriate to work with the American liberal community, as well as with certain elements of industry. There were some people on both sides of the ocean who were appalled to see this. Well, the answer was quite obvious. Here were assets which could be developed and which had very significant amounts of influence. One could name Senators and Congressmen to this day of that background or nearly of that background who developed very strong opinions on our relationship with Israel and who backed the Israelis on many issues.

I have been in situations in far off places in this little country of Israel where one would come upon a school, cultural center, or hospital, only to find that Senator or Congressman So-and-so had obtained very significant sums of money to support them. Or, if these institutions were known to us, we hadn't really had much of a role in the process of their financing. For instance, one might receive a communication from AID [Agency for International Development] Washington informing us that such and such a project has been proposed by "So-and-so." AID Washington would ask us to take a look at it and let them know what we thought about it.

Well, we would look into it. We wanted to assure ourselves and Washington that this project was not fraudulent but was on the up and up, that it was a bona fide hospital or educational institution and so forth. However, very often we rapidly came to the conclusion that back in Washington the fix was in, and our views were of no particular significance. One had to keep all of that in mind.

Another phenomenon was noteworthy. Among all of the places where I had served, both before and after serving in Israel, and I had been in some pretty active situations, never did I see such a flood of Congressional Delegations, both official and unofficial. Remember that Members of Congress can go to Israel either officially or unofficially. If they are determined to go to Israel, they're going to go. Those who come as part of official Congressional Delegations are assigned an official airplane, either from the Department of Defense or from another source. They fly over to Israel and are billed as an official delegation.

However, that's just the tip of the iceberg. You get many Congressmen who come to Israel as members of an unofficial delegation. Ambassador Lewis' rule of the thumb, as well as mine thereafter, was that, by golly, whoever was paying for the tab, all congressional delegations, unofficial as well as official, were important and had to be tended, cared for, briefed, and provided the best perspective that we could give them. We certainly didn't favor the prospect of Congressmen slipping in and out of the country without meeting the Ambassador and/or the DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission].

Our procedure was to meet members of these unofficial Congressional delegations at Ben Gurion Airport, take them up to Jerusalem, and brief them. We appreciated that, in many cases, they were on their way up to meet with the Prime Minister or Defense Minister to get Israel's version of some event or development. We wanted to make sure that these Congressmen had the right perspective to the extent that we could provide it, bearing in mind that they were often exhausted as they got off the plane from the United States. However, we did what we could. By handling them in this way we could get some idea of what was being said to them and by them. If necessary, we would try to, shall we say, upgrade and enhance either the conversation itself or their understanding of what it all meant.

Among them I remember, during my first tour in Israel, several cases of Members of Congress coming in and saying to us: "This Menachem Begin needs to be informed about how strongly I or we feel about whatever the issue was, whether Israeli settlements or another matter. One would say to oneself: "That's nice to hear. Perhaps they'll give this version straight to the Prime Minister." Then you would find out very often, and even most often, that they would lead off by saying: "You know, Mr. Prime Minister, my record speaks for itself. You look into my voting record and the statements I have made regarding the State of Israel, and you will find that I am one of the most stalwart supporters of the State of Israel and what you stand for in the whole Congress of the United States. Now, we have some minor problems. One of my constituents has told me that he doesn't quite understand this or that issue." Whereupon Prime Minister Menachem Begin would say, "You're right. What we should do is to increase our 'Hazbarah.'" In Hebrew this means, "Israel's official information or propaganda program." And often these Members of Congress would come out of the meeting, "Shorn like lambs," after having assured us that they were going to go into the meeting with Begin and "lay it all down on the line."

Menachem Begin was a real personality. Here was a man whom Ambassador Sam Lewis has eloquently described as someone who could speak several languages fluently. Begin prided himself on his command of English, Latin, and so forth. Lewis described him as a man who could get under your skin, a man who could put his finger on a raw or sensitive nerve, really put you on the defensive, and make his point.

I'll give you an example. The situation between the Syrians and the Israelis regarding Lebanon was heating up. In 1981 in Zakleh, in northern Lebanon, the pro-Syrian side started to build a road. The Israelis regarded this as a violation of the oral, Kissinger-negotiated red lines agreement, which Ambassador Sam Lewis has alluded to in his interview in this Oral History series. The net result was that the Israelis shot down two Syrian helicopters around Zakleh. The Syrians responded to this by deploying Soviet surface to air missile units into Zakleh.

Thereupon, Prime Minister Begin called in Ambassador Sam Lewis. I went along with Sam, as notetaker, because we knew that this was a really serious matter. As we waited outside the Prime Minister's office, his secretary notified the Prime Minister that we had arrived and we were ushered into Begin's office, which was filled with rabbis with long beards. We started to back out, saying that we were sorry to have interrupted. Begin said, "No, no. I want you to meet these gentlemen." We were introduced all around. The rabbis finished what they had to say in Hebrew and left through a side door.

Then Begin sat us down and pointed to a large book on his coffee table. He said, "I want you to look at this book with me." He opened it up, and it turned out to be an extensive collection of photographs, of men and women, young and old, children, students, and so forth. They were mostly small photographs, some with writing on the margins. He said, "These rabbis who have just left have finally, after years of effort, obtained this through their channels from Poland. These are photos of the inhabitants of a Jewish town in Poland. The people were completely exterminated by the Nazis. Look at these photos. Look at this girl, 13 years old. Look at this rabbi. Look at this man, just an ordinary man,” and so forth. He said, “Read the inscriptions. Well, I’ll read them for you,” because Begin was a Polish Jew by background.

As Prime Minister Begin read the inscriptions, you could see him visibly building up anger. He went on to say, “Assad [President Assad of Syria] is the Hitler of this region. I swear to you, as to everybody, that we will never, ever allow this sort of thing to happen to us, either abroad or here, in any way.” From that point Begin then launched into his version of what had happened over Zakleh, in northern Lebanon. By this time he had reached his crescendo. It was a great, dramatic performance, if you will. He didn’t have to rehearse this. This man was a real, dramatic orator who could get his political message across in his own particular way.

Ambassador Sam Lewis and I left Begin’s office and dashed down on the one hour ride to Tel Aviv. We said to each other: “He’s going to attack Syria, unless we do something drastic.” So we sent off one of those FLASH precedence messages. We first summarized it orally via secure phone and then sent a telegram, to dramatize what we had heard and to urge the Department to do something. The result was that Phil Habib, [then Deputy Undersecretary for Political Affairs] was sent to Israel as a special envoy. There began his outstanding role in shuttle diplomacy between Prime Minister Begin of Israel and President Assad of Syria. This often meant going from Tel Aviv to Lebanon, up to Damascus, and back.

Later on, we learned that Prime Minister Begin had actually given the command to the Israeli Air Force to attack these Syrian surface to air missiles in Lebanon. However, the weather intervened and prevented the airstrike, temporarily, and now we had Phil Habib in Tel Aviv to strengthen our point. We managed, if you will, to stabilize that situation for the time being. That required a whole, separate set of backup facilities. Phil Habib was a tremendous diplomat for shuttle diplomacy. He had been raised in Brooklyn and so had been exposed to the Yiddish/Jewish experience.

Q: He’d been a “Shabas Goy” [Sabbath Gentile].

BROWN: He’d been a “Shabas Goy” and knew how to play it with the Israelis. He was a very dramatic guy. Phil Habib had his Lebanese Christian background. He had gravitas, he had experience, and he was an excellent man for the job. He had also suffered several heart attacks and was not in good health. Just the trip up and down from Jerusalem, then a flight to Lebanon and/or Damascus was physically very taxing for him. However, he was a driven man. I mean, Phil Habib was just “go, go, go” all the time. This required real attention from those of us who worked with and for him. Fortunately, he had Ambassador Morris Draper with him as his mentor. Morrie had the guts to say, “Phil, calm down,” or to tell him when he thought that Phil was wrong. He would draft cables for Phil and make administrative arrangements. They often would come tearing down to Ben Gurion Airport from Jerusalem, jump into their special aircraft, fly nominally to Cyprus, but actually to Beirut, because you weren’t supposed to fly directly from Tel Aviv to Beirut. Or they might go just barely into Cypriot airspace and then into Beirut. There was always the danger of getting unwittingly into conflict in the air. From Beirut they would go to Damascus, and then back. They went through this day and night.

It was a remarkable performance, but what it meant was that from our Ambassador, right on down to our dispatcher, Benny Banin, Habib required full-time, 24 hour a day support, and rightly so. I was very heavily involved in this, and it was a great education for me on how things could be done.

Once, when Ambassador Sam Lewis was away, a crisis broke and Habib and Draper came into the area on one of these day and night loops. I got word, belatedly, out of Cairo that he was already on his way to Ben Gurion. This was during the traffic rush in the morning. In fact, he was in the air and due to land in about half an hour at Ben Gurion International Airport. In the middle of the traffic rush, my driver turned on the siren, the emergency, flashing lights and drove off the road onto the shoulder. We just made it. I ran them up to see Menachem Begin with whom Habib had an intensive conversation. Meanwhile, I notified Beirut that Phil Habib was in the area and was coming to Lebanon.

Remember, communications then weren't as good as they are now. All of these arrangements had to be handled very personally and very carefully. Otherwise, we could have had a disaster. I ran Phil down the hill to Ben Gurion airport, onto his plane, and saw him off to Lebanon. I made a patched through phone call via the State Department Ops Center to the embassy in Beirut to make sure that they got the cable and that Washington was aware of what was going on. Phil flew to Beirut, met the Lebanese, flew to Damascus, and met with President Assad. Then he flew to Saudi Arabia. He and Morrie Draper met the King of Saudi Arabia at 2:00 AM in the middle of the desert. All of this with no sleep. They went to the wrong palace in the desert and then had to find the right one. On the one hand, they were trying to extract from President Assad [of Syria] what they could and play the Saudi card. For their part the Saudis were funding Assad and the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] out of fear. Phil was trying to get the Saudis to play our game behind the scenes. Then Phil Habib flew to Cairo to refuel and was back in Tel Aviv the next morning at the same time, having had no sleep. Phil was totally gray in his appearance. He went up to Prime Minister Begin's office in Jerusalem. Begin treated Phil Habib with respect but said that Phil was asking Israel to make a tremendous decision on a cease-fire. He said that he had to consult his cabinet.

We went over to the Consulate General in Jerusalem to wait. Habib was like a tiger. He was pacing back and forth in the Consul General's residence. A phone call came from Prime Minister Begin. Begin wanted something else from Habib, who by now was almost beside himself. They negotiated over the phone. Then Phil got into his limousine and we went over to Prime Minister Begin's office. There were further intense negotiations. Then we went out to meet the press Phil announced to the world a cease-fire. That's the way Habib worked.

Now, implementing that cease-fire and getting the word out to all of these parties all over the place, and then trying to shore it up and back it up required a tremendous, follow-on effort. Ambassador Morris Draper was superb in all of this. It was very taxing for Morrie Draper. I don't think that he ever got the kind of recognition that he should have had for this effort. However, that's another story.

Now let me go to a couple of other issues and incidents. The first one almost caused my abrupt departure from the Foreign Service. It happened in late February of 1980. Remember that I arrived in Israel late in 1979. A situation emerged, which Ambassador Sam Lewis has dealt with in his oral interview. A resolution was proposed in the UN Security Council blasting the Israelis, among other things, for the establishment of Jewish settlements in the West Bank, Gaza and Jerusalem. The PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] and the Arabs were putting up this resolution in an effort to put Begin in an embarrassing situation, as well as to move the American administration. At that time we were in a key period just before the Presidential primaries. Jimmy Carter was seeking to be re-elected President of the United States. Another Democrat, Senator Ted Kennedy, was out to capture the primaries from President Carter. New York was a critical state at this period.

Into the middle of this situation came this bombshell. Ambassador Sam Lewis was on consultations in Paris, meeting with Sol Linowitz. At that time Sol Linowitz had succeeded Bob Strauss as the special negotiator for the follow-on negotiations on Palestinian autonomy. Prime Minister Begin and President Carter had a fundamental misunderstanding to begin with, and we were now trying to persuade the Begin government to ensure a favorable outcome in the negotiations on Palestinian autonomy. They were polite but stiff arming us by various means. Bob Strauss saw that this was a losing game and got out of it. Sol Linowitz picked up that job. At that time Linowitz was in Paris. Sam Lewis went to Paris. At 6:00 AM I got a phone call from Hal Saunders.

Q: He was Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs.

BROWN: Yes. This discussion with Saunders was conducted over an "pen telephone line. Hal said to me: "Bill, I've been on the phone trying to reach Sam." I said, "Sam got on the plane half an hour ago. He's on his way to Paris. What's the issue?" Hal said, "It's this UN resolution." I said, "Well, I can tell you right away, from the point of view of Embassy Tel Aviv, that we should vote against this resolution. At a minimum, abstain." There was a bit of a pause, and Hal Saunders said, "Well, actually, Bill, I wanted to ask what the embassy's view would be on voting for it." I said, "Hal, this is too sensitive. Let me rush into the embassy and send you a cable, which I'll send off right away."

I raced down to the embassy. I forget who drafted the cable, but I think that, at the time, my Political Counselor was Charley Hill. Probably, the gent who drafted it was an outstanding Political Officer, Gil Kulic, who has already contributed to your Oral History. Anyway, as I recollect it, and remember that I have no notes to refer to, I fired off a cable which went out via FLASH precedence because of the urgency of the situation. You know, you use FLASH precedence only for real emergencies. My telegram said, in effect: "Don't vote for this resolution. It would be really counterproductive. It would enrage the Begin administration, particularly the reference to 'Jewish settlements in Jerusalem,' because the attitude of the Begin administration is that this is Israeli territory and that Israel doesn't have any settlements on its own territory." Israel had captured Jerusalem in the 1967 War and had unilaterally and contrary to various UN resolutions proceeded to enlarge the municipality of Jerusalem, integrate it into Israel and to declare it Israel's own eternally indivisible capital. Israelis then moved into sectors which had hitherto been outside the old municipal boundaries of Jerusalem, and these sectors were called 'Jewish settlements' by the Arabs. The Israel Government certainly didn't see it that way, and still does not. Moreover on the overall issue of settlements, be they in Jerusalem or elsewhere, we had made statements to the Israelis that we were not asking for the dismantling of existing settlements.

So that telegram went off. Since the issue was dynamite, I said to Hal Saunders: "Try to get in touch with Sam Lewis, if you can, in Paris." Well, on that weekend Yigal Allon, a great Israeli figure, a former general and former Foreign Minister and the author of the Allon Plan for yielding some of the territory on the West Bank to Jordan, died of a heart attack. The weather was terrible. A windstorm something like a hurricane hit the area. Ambassador Sam Lewis flew back from Paris, by which time our UN Representative had already voted, not against this resolution, not in abstention, but for the resolution! At this point all hell began to break loose, as I predicted.

Seeing domestic political advantage, Senator Ted Kennedy seized upon this to attack President Carter's stance. Cy Vance, as a good, loyal Secretary of State, took the rap for a communications gap. We didn't know it at the time, but Ambassador Sam Lewis has since brought out the view that President Carter had already authorized the vote for this resolution, provided that the reference to "Jewish settlements" in the Jerusalem area was deleted. If not, we would vote against the resolution. Somehow, through a mixup in communications between the State Department and our Permanent Representative in New York, Ambassador Don McHenry, we voted for the resolution! The Israeli Government was furious, and I was beside myself.

When Sam Lewis, his wife Sally, and I went to Allon's funeral, I was still deeply upset. I think that this was on a Sunday. On the following day, Monday morning, I drafted a letter of resignation from the Foreign Service by cable. This said something like: "Whereas I was Chargé d'Affaires at the time, and whereas I had sent FLASH Cable No. Such-and-Such recommending that we vote against this resolution, with its call for the 'dismantling of existing settlements' or at least abstain, and whereas we voted for it, I therefore request immediate transfer and early retirement for the Foreign Service." I prepared this cable in final form and sent it in to Ambassador Lewis. After a little while, Sam called me in and said, "You can't do this." However, I felt so strongly at the time that I said, "No, I want to send this cable of resignation." He really had to work on me, saying: "Look, you don't want to do this. You don't want to end your career. You did your best. Moreover, I'd be on the spot myself as Ambassador if you sent this cable in to the Department." So I withdrew the cable.

However, it shows you how deeply involved you can get in fast breaking situations like that and the twists and turns in Washington policy pronouncements. There are those who felt that this vote for the UN resolution materially contributed to Carter's defeat in the elections of 1980, because the Reagan supporters seized on this issue, and there was quite an after effect. Or was it that issue, plus the seizure of the American embassy in Iran? There were so many things to consider.

Q: But during this particular period it seems that every four years, when the New York State Presidential Primary comes up, you have presidential candidates promising that they will move the American embassy to Jerusalem. This has been going on for 30 or 40 years. But nothing happens. Did this come up during your time in Israel?

BROWN: It came up during my time as Ambassador to Israel.

Q: Let's not go into it now.

BROWN: Right. I'd like now to jump to...

Q: Would it be possible to stay in the same time period? We've been talking about the situation in 1979.

BROWN: Well, that particular incident happened in about March, 1980.

Q: Yes, but I'm just wondering whether we could keep this interview somewhat in chronological order. What about our efforts to get support from the Israelis and others regarding the takeover of our embassy in Iran?

BROWN: Remember that the Israelis had had a very unique relationship with the Shah of Iran. They had the equivalent of an embassy in Iran. It was not called an embassy, but they had outstanding diplomats and military people there. For years, Iran had been shipping oil from the Persian Gulf around to the Gulf of Aqaba and into Eilat, the Israeli port on the Gulf of Aqaba. A pipeline had been constructed from Eilat, across the Negev desert, and up to the Israeli coast along the Mediterranean. The Israelis had been involved in all sorts of arms deals with the Shah. They had a very close, military, defense, and commercial relationship with Iran during the days of the Shah. However, they had to be very careful.

I'll give you an example of the cultural gulf, or however it should be called, between the Israelis and the Shiite Iranians. At this time, when the American embassy in Tehran had been seized, Galen Stone, who had been DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] when I was in New Delhi, came to Tel Aviv for a quick, private visit. He wanted to talk with someone about the Iranian situation. So I invited over an outstanding individual, Uri Lubrani, who is "Mr. Arab, Mr. Muslim, Mr. Oriental Affairs" in the Israeli establishment and still is very, very active, although he's older than I am.

Lubrani had been the Israeli representative in Iran. Someone told me that he often had to sit outside the Shah's office while some major Israeli figure went inside for a one on one visit with the Shah. I invited Lubrani over for a reception so that he could talk with Galen Stone and give him, and myself as well, a little of the atmosphere. If I recall correctly, Lubrani recalled how, when they bought food or Coca Cola in bottles, anything that could be returnable, the Israelis could buy it, but no Iranian would take the bottles back. The fact that a Jew had handled a bottle or a plate or an eating utensil meant the end of the possibility of reusing or recycling it. I don't want to exaggerate that, but I'll never forget that account from a man who knew Iranian culture, spoke the Farsi language, and Arabic in later incarnations. He was a real, top notch expert on the area.

The Israelis were intensely interested in helping us at the time of the embassy takeover in Iran. Of course, they could point to the fact that they had had this unique relationship with the Shah and a wide variety of Iranian military and middle class figures. At this time there were an estimated 50,000 Jews still living in Iran. They were potential sources of information. The Israelis were also in contact with the new, Reagan administration, and there was hope that we could use the Israelis, because they had contacts with moderates in the Iranian military. All of this occurred in the midst of this frenzied situation in Iran, the Iranian attack on Iraq, and the Iran-Iraq War that had gone on for years.

Q: It was actually Iraq that attacked Iran. At least that is my impression. I am not quite sure about it.

BROWN: Well, you can argue about who initiated the Iran-Iraq War. Anyway, this came at a time of the frenzied mujahideen takeover of Iran. Iran's outlook and propaganda was shrill. So much of their operation was called "Operation Al-Quz" or "Operation Jerusalem." The Iranian attack, or counter-attack, against Saddam Hussein of Iraq was described as only the beginning. The implication was that after Saddam Hussein was knocked off, Iran would proceed to implement "Operation Al-Quz," or the "liberation" of Jerusalem.

Notwithstanding that, the Israelis were telling us: "Work with us, and we can put you in touch with agents of influence in the Iranian establishment. It's a very delicate matter, but they're not all raving mujahideen. There are professional soldiers and they can be approached. To do this, what we'll need is the ability discreetly to supply them with certain items of military hardware which they need."

Now, the new Israeli Minister of Defense, as of 1981, was none other than Ariel Sharon. He was, as you know, a driving, and, indeed, driven personality. We had an agreement with the Israelis that they would not supply Iran anything of a military nature, unless and until we got our embassy hostages out of Iran. Even then, they would only supply material items to Iran after consultation with the United States.

Well, as you remember, the embassy hostages came out just as President Carter handed over to President Reagan in January, 1981. It wasn't long before the Israelis were pressing us to let them ship military equipment to the Iranian military. We were saying "No," but Al Haig, the newly installed Secretary of State, was saying to the Israelis: "What did you have in mind?" I was present when Secretary Haig said to Ariel Sharon: "Could you be more specific?" It therefore fell upon me to go to Israeli Minister of Defense Sharon to get lists of what the Israelis had in mind. Well, Sharon gave me a long, long list of military items which the Israelis would like quietly to ship to Iran.

Of course, this appalled some people on the U.S. side. We kept a hold on this, but you could feel the Israelis straining at the bit. Indeed, the Chief of Station [senior CIA officer] in Tel Aviv informed us one day that an Israeli aircraft had taken off with a load of spare military aircraft tires for Iran. Consultations with the U.S. took place, if you will, after the aircraft had already taken off from Israel and was in the air, bound for Iran. We were very upset by this. As I say, the Israelis were straining to do something like that.

Meanwhile, on our side we were looking this from the point of view of the Cold War. That was one big overlay, the Cold War. The second overlay was getting at the Iranians and dealing with our relationship with Saddam Hussein. So I was present when there was non-definitive, shall we say, discussion of the possibility that to get certain military items, better intelligence, and a better grip on the situation, maybe the United States could allow, by one means or another, certain military items to go to Saddam Hussein. That would be in exchange for the right kind of Soviet tank, or other newly-built Soviet equipment items.

Q: We could pick up items that we could use for research purposes.

BROWN: For research and various other purposes, bearing in mind the tremendous Cold War overlay on all of this and the fact that the Israelis had a proven and very commendable track record with us on getting Soviet hardware, which they captured in the wars with Egypt or other Arab countries. They would run this through us for joint examination, strengthening our ability to gauge the effectiveness of this material, and so forth. We need not go into details here, but there was a long-established relationship between Israel and the U.S. on that account, in terms of Soviet tanks, aircraft, anti-aircraft weapons, and various other, sensitive pieces of equipment.

So that kind of thing was going on. It was fascinating to see Israeli Minister of Defense Sharon and Secretary of State Al Haig, if you will, dance around these issues, bearing in mind the sensitivities on both sides. This was in 1981.

Q: This was prior to the Israeli invasion of Lebanon. However, this gives us a little feel for that relationship, which became critical later on.

BROWN: I think that this happened in April, 1981. Already Secretary of State Al Haig was in the thick of such discussions. Nothing yet had been decided, but both Israelis and Americans were feeling each other out on this relationship with Iran, on the one hand, and Iraq, on the other.

Q: Had the bombing of the Iraqi nuclear facility taken place as yet?

BROWN: Not yet, Stu. That's what I'm leading up to.

Q: Okay.

BROWN: There was the Reagan administration's overview of the whole area in Cold War terms. They had negative impressions of certain Arab bad actors, including President Assad of Syria. This view was very early in the show. Israel was considered something of a side show, now that we had the Camp David Agreements and a Peace Treaty with Egypt. Israel's survival was no longer in question and was not threatened, in strategic terms.

Things began to heat up, as the prospect of an Israeli election approached. There was trouble in Lebanon. I mentioned the Zakleh incident and the violation of those old, "Red Line" agreements which Secretary of State Kissinger had negotiated. The Israelis and the Syrians were jockeying with each other in Lebanon. There were occasional, PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] Katusha (Soviet made surface to surface rocket) attacks on northern Israel. The Israelis already had a presence in what they termed their security zone in southern Lebanon. There were periodic tensions in connection with the relevant UN resolutions to get the Israelis to withdraw from their security enclave in southern Lebanon. There was a heating up of Israeli probes and attacks against the PLO facilities in the wake of these Katusha attacks against Israel. Now, Ariel Sharon had come into office as Israeli Minister of Defense.

Q: So Ariel Sharon became Minister of Defense while you were in the embassy in Tel Aviv. What impression did you have of him when he came into office? What did the embassy people think of him?

BROWN: Well, he already had quite a record and quite a history. He was an Israeli hero who cracked through across the Suez Canal and encircled what was left of the Egyptian Army [in 1973]. He had retired from the Army and had been brought back to active duty for that operation. He was now very politically motivated. Politically, he wandered through quite a bit of terrain. There was a time, if you will, when he was associated with elements of the Labour Party of Israel. He was a man who already held distinct and very strong views on how to proceed.

I had first met him when he was Minister of Agriculture in the Menachem Begin Government. This was during the period of the Carter administration. I met him in the office of the Minister of Defense, Eizer Weizman, who was later President of Israel. Sharon had been hawkish and had led, if you will, the earlier Israeli invasion of Lebanon in 1978, in the wake of a horrible, bus terrorist incident along the highway North of Tel Aviv. When I met him, Sharon, then Minister of Agriculture, was concurrently Chairman of the Settlements Committee. He was passing through Weizman's office, carrying an enormous roll of maps under his arm. These were the maps of the Jewish settlements which were going to be built, and which have been built during the following years.

Phil Habib had initially come over to Israel in his capacity as a troubleshooter dealing with water. He was following up on the old Eric Johnston plan of the 1950s. He was asking whether we couldn't have a coordinated, regional plan for the damming of the Yarkon River, which flows down into the Jordan River. The Yarkon River divides Syria and Jordan. It flows into the Jordan River. It had been the subject of armed conflict. In that capacity I took Phil Habib to meet Israeli Minister of Agriculture Sharon because water questions in Israel come under the Minister of Agriculture. I got a good dose, as did Habib, of Sharon.

First, Habib met the then outgoing Minister of Foreign Affairs, Moshe Dayan, who, as always, was flexible and creative, bearing in mind all of the difficulties facing him. Then we went over to see Minister of Agriculture Sharon and his hard line Commissioner of Water, who had been Sharon's Platoon Commander when Sharon had been a young member of the fledgling Israeli Army many years before. And boy, were they tough! So I had already had an introduction to Ariel Sharon as a tough Minister of Agriculture, a tough figure on the question of water, and a tough and very dynamic figure in the grandiose schemes of the Begin administration to build and expand Jewish settlements in the Occupied Territories.

There was an interval before Sharon became Defense Minister. Weizman, in a fit of annoyance, had resigned from the cabinet as Minister of Defense and had gone out into the wilderness. For a while, Menachem Begin was Minister of Defense, in addition to being Prime Minister. Begin enjoyed being Minister of Defense, but the man who handled the job of Minister of Defense on a daily basis was the Deputy Defense Minister, Mordechai Zippori, a former Army general of the tough, Likud persuasion. I had to deal with Zippori, essentially on a day to day basis, as we went through the escalation of troubles in Lebanon.

Just to give you a flavor of what it was like to deal with a character like this, I'll give you one or two examples. As things heated up [in 1978], the Israelis would respond to perceived or real PLO provocations by strafing and bombing PLO facilities. Our Ambassador to Lebanon at the time, John Gunther Dean, would understandably get very upset at these news broadcasts over Radio Beirut that the Israelis had killed a number of Lebanese. (End of tape)

Q: You were saying that Ambassador John Gunther Dean was...

BROWN: John Gunther Dean would fire off a cable, often in very colorful language, saying, in essence: "When are we going to face down the Israelis? When are we going to stop this carnage? Why doesn't Embassy Tel Aviv do something about it?" This kind of reporting didn't endear him to Ambassador Sam Lewis. After all, we were trying to do what we could. Remember that Sam had had extensive exposure to all of this, in addition to everything else. So it often fell upon me to go to Minister of Defense Eizer Weizman and then, when Weizman resigned, to Zippori to cope with this kind of situation.

I'll never forget one, particularly egregious episode where the Israelis bombed a target. One bomb went astray, hit a cafe, and killed lots of civilians. Ambassador Dean fired off the usual, anguished cable. I went in to see Zippori one on one. He sat me down, gave me a cup of Turkish coffee, and said, "What can I do for you?" I made a vigorous presentation. I said that I didn't have all of the facts, but it would appear, on the basis of press reports, that a lot of innocent, Lebanese civilians had lost their lives. Always in the background was the fact of the use by Israel of American supplied airplanes. It was F-15s and F-16s which were dropping these bombs. Sometimes, they dropped cluster bombs.

Q: American munitions, too.

BROWN: American munitions, too. So there was very distinct tension. Washington would get into the act, and it was a very delicate and contentious business. To my surprise, on this particular occasion, Zippori said to me: "You know, Bill, I've argued against this in cabinet." I almost fell off my chair! I said to myself: "What a cable this is going to make!" Here is this Israeli hard liner who admits this to me in private, if you will. But, after all, I was the DCM or the Chargé d'Affaires, or whatever, on this occasion. Zippori said, "Yes, I have argued against this. You see, the problem that arises here, over the long run, is that the Arabs have this image that the Israelis," and here he imitated the Arab pronunciation, "rely exclusively on high tech American weapons. You know, your planes, your munitions, your gunsights, your radar, and so forth. And the odds are stacked against them. The Arabs say that the Zionists and the Imperialist Americans have ganged up against them. They think that it isn't a fair war."

He said, "My argument is that the way we ought to handle this is with cold steel. That is, good, Israeli boys going up there, taking that bayonet and sticking it in the Arabs' guts. Then they come to respect you for what you are." Thus disappeared the idea of a hot cable. Imagine, cold steel! It really isn't very funny, but I relate this story to give the reader a flavor of the mindset of a tough, old Israeli soldier on this. Remember, the Chief of Staff of the Israeli Army at the time was General Raphael Eytan. He was another, tough, old veteran. He still carries steel fragments in his skull from the battles for Jerusalem...

Q: In 1948.

BROWN: He had been heavily criticized for pardoning an Israeli Lieutenant who had choked a Palestinian prisoner to death in the 1978 invasion of Lebanon. He had a very simplistic view of how to handle the Arabs. In other words: "They are our enemy. Go kill our enemy," and that's that. So it was quite an atmosphere.

I'll give you another example. Ambassador Sam Lewis was away, and I was Chargé d'Affaires. On the new Israeli television service there appeared a scene of Beir Zeit University, an Arab university on the West Bank. It depicted a demonstration which resulted in Israeli Army troops moving in and shooting against Arabs who were throwing stones against them. The coverage of this incident on Israeli TV was particularly chilling that evening, and I protested it on my own, without instructions. I didn't need instructions. I met with Zippori at the airport, where he was waiting to receive Prime Minister Begin on his return from the United States. I said, "Modcha, did you see that scene on television last night? It was outrageous, horrible. There was a scene of a young Arab girl who was hopping down the sidewalk with one leg waving like a rag. She had been shot in the leg. She was the daughter of the President of Beir Zeit University. It was just shocking!"

Zippori's first comment was: "The goddamned media! You see, our own, Israeli media pounced on this without the background. Think of all the rocks thrown at our soldiers! We're trying to restore law and order. And the enemy is our own media!" I said, "Look, haven't you heard of the use of better police tactics all around the world? I mean, with shields and helmets, special police riot units which handle matters of this kind. Why are you using the Israeli Army for this kind of incident? Even tear gas is would be more useful." He said, "Bill, we used tear gas a couple of years ago. It caused a tremendous scandal. Some lieutenant, in the heat of the moment, threw a tear gas grenade into an Arab school. And the spectacle was on TV of the Arab students choking and gasping, coming out of school, having been exposed to tear gas. With our background of Hitler and the gas used in Europe, we just can't do that kind of thing." I said, "Okay, I'm no expert in this, but why use the Army?" And we went back and forth on this line. He was highlighting his dilemma in the face of my protests.

So that was part of my introduction to that kind of scene. It was to be repeated when I became Ambassador to Israel, when none other than Yitzhak Rabin or Moshe Arens was Minister of Defense. So I just give you this example. It had been going on for a long, long time. This kind of incident was to bedevil us and to bedevil our relationship for many, many years to come and is a factor, even now.

Okay, that takes us up through the end of the Carter administration [in 1981] and the installation of the Reagan administration. There was the resignation of the Defense Weizman and later the emergence of Ariel Sharon as the new Israeli Minister of Defense.

Q: A quick question, Bill. What was the feeling in the embassy, if you had time to sit down with Ambassador Sam Lewis or anyone else, before the Reagan administration came into office [in 1981]? Did you have a feel for what the new administration might do? The Carter administration had had one type of approach. Here was the new Reagan administration coming in. Was there concern or...

BROWN: Ambassador Sam Lewis was a career officer who had been appointed by the Carter administration. Sam Lewis lays out this experience in his interview in the Oral History. He was in a delicate position as Ambassador to Israel. Would he be kept in that office by the Reagan administration?

Earlier, my home leave had been deferred, and I decided to take it at this time. Ambassador Sam Lewis charged me with going into the Department of State and getting a feel for what the new, Reagan administration was like, as seen in and by the State Department. I got back to Washington, and the new Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern Affairs was Nick Veliotis who, earlier on, had been DCM and Chargé d'Affaires in Tel Aviv. I went over quietly to the Office of Policy Planning, headed by a new appointee, Paul Wolfowitz.

Seated in Wolfowitz's outer office was Jim Roche. Roche had been on a delegation with Senator Bill Bradley [Democrat, NJ] in 1979, which visited Israel. I had been Chargé d'Affaires at the time. I took Jim up to see various Israelis. Roche apparently had remembered me, so that, at the time of this encounter, he said, "Wait a minute," and went in to see Paul Wolfowitz. Then, in my presence, Roche opened the door of Wolfowitz's office and said, "Paul, you can talk with Brown. He's a good guy."

They let me look at some of their draft memos to the new Secretary of State, Al Haig. These drafts, shall we say, were quite pro-Israel in terms of approaching the overall problem of the Cold War and utilizing our relationship with the Israelis for the purposes of overall, American policy. Well, I learned that Nick Veliotis was appalled by their approach, so a split had already developed within the State Department as to who would gain favor and the upper hand with the new Secretary of State, Al Haig. The question was beyond me. This would all play out with the White House.

Meanwhile, there was a whole crowd, of new people, relatively unknown to me, who were Jewish and who had involved themselves in the victorious, Reagan campaign. There was a whole, new set of people who were coming into office. They were preparing to come out to Israel or had already been there, with or without our knowledge. So this presented quite a challenge.

Now, I've spoken of the early arrival of Al Haig. This is before Ariel Sharon became Israeli Minister of Defense.

Q: This would be about April, 1981.

BROWN: That's right. At this time Menachem Begin himself was the Minister of Defense. So Al

Haig called on Begin, and everything was rosy. They had talks when Ambassador Sam Lewis and I were present, and they had talks which were even more intimate when we were not present. They even had meetings one on one. This reflected that well known propensity among senior American figures to talk with the Israeli Prime Minister alone and really let their hair down in the hope that this will be reciprocated. This often is very dangerous. However, they developed a very good, initial relationship. In those initial talks there was consideration given somehow to codify this relationship. That is, describing on paper, this new, strategic relationship between Israel and the United States, given the Cold War overlay which the Reagan administration brought to it.

In June, 1981, the Israeli elections campaign was heating up. Sam Lewis' account of the situation in June, 1981, is set out eloquently in his Oral History interview. One weekend evening, Ambassador Sam Lewis had a speaking engagement and was meeting with a prominent visiting American. There was a senior Congressional figure who was also present. I received a radio call from Sam Lewis. I should add that we had mobile radio as well as telephonic communications. I was in my Chevrolet some place. Sam said, "Get on down to the Hilton Hotel right away. I've got to tell you something." So I raced over to the Hilton Hotel, met Sam outside, and he said, "The Prime Minister has just informed me that the Israelis have bombed the Iraqi nuclear reactor. I've had a quick telephone conversation with Washington. Go to the embassy and write a cable on this, because I'm committed to this speaking engagement."

So I went to the embassy and did the best I could. Fortunately for me, as I tried to put this whole thing into perspective, Bob Ames was at the embassy that evening. He was a very senior, almost legendary figure in the CIA who was making a trip through the area. I told him what had happened in Iraq. He chatted with me to give me his view of the situation. I finally got off a cable. We were in hot water! This newly installed Reagan administration, which thought that it had a wonderful relationship with the Israeli Government under Prime Minister Menachem Begin, now woke up to the fact that the Israelis had used F-16s and, I think, F-15s to provide defensive cover for the F-16s, which had bombed the Iraqi nuclear reactor with stunning success.

On the following day I went in with our Defense Attaché, Air Force Colonel Pete Hoag to get a briefing from the Chief of Israeli Military Intelligence. He laid out how they had accomplished this mission. They used a "High, Low" mission profile, flying over Jordan en route to Iraq. He kept stressing the fact that they had used conventional bombs. They hadn't used the so-called smart bombs which we had provided them with. Colonel Pete Hoag kept zeroing in on whether they had refueled the strike aircraft en route, because Headquarters of the U.S. Air Force in Washington wanted to know, among other things, how in the world the Israelis had refueled these F-16s. Were they refueled over Jordan, over Iraq, or over both? The Chief of Israeli Military Intelligence kept saying: "We didn't refuel." That was a fascinating, side issue. For several weeks Headquarters USAF refused to believe that the Israelis could accomplish this mission without refueling.

Well, it turned out that the strike mission against the Iraqi nuclear reactor had been flown from one of the two air bases in the Negev Desert in Israel, constructed by us at a cost of $1.1 billion in U.S. taxpayers' money. These bases were built at our expense in compensation for the fields which the Israelis had lost when they evacuated their fields in the Sinai Desert, as part of the settlement with Egypt. One of these fields was close to Eilat. From these airfields they had practically topped off the F-16s on the runway to provide the last drop of aviation gasoline, so that the aircraft could carry out the mission, drop the bombs, and make it back without refueling.

The Reagan administration went into quite a frenzy over this and made stern pronouncements to the Israelis. The administration was very disturbed that the Israelis had done this without consulting us and had carried out the attack with American-provided aircraft, and Lord knows what other American-provided equipment. We went through a very difficult and delicate period in this connection.

I was with Ambassador Sam Lewis when Israeli Prime Minister Begin, in response to the furor in Washington, reminded Sam of the fact that the Israelis had had very detailed and delicate talks with us about the alarming progress the Iraqis were making on this nuclear reactor over the previous six months or longer. The American and Israeli intelligence communities had reported on the movement of equipment from France and Italy to Baghdad for installation at this site. This equipment had an obvious dual use capability for producing nuclear weapons.

The American response to Israeli concerns over reports of the movement of French and Italian equipment to Baghdad had been: "Give us more time. We'll work on this with the French and the Italians." The situation had gone on and on, as Begin described it, and then there was a gap in the American handling of this issue. That gap occurred when the Reagan administration came into office. Begin reminded us that he had heard nothing further from us. Meanwhile, in his description, this Iraqi facility was so far advanced that the reactor would shortly become hot. As Defense Minister and Prime Minister, Begin said that he would be faced with the decision whether to bomb a hot nuclear reactor. He then conjured up the image of a great cloud of radioactive material descending over the poor children of Baghdad, should Israel wait until after the reactor had become hot before destroying it. So, he said that he had to order the strike then, before the Iraqi facility became hot.

Begin's analysis of this situation was very theatrically expressed, but it was a reminder to me of the following. When you're dealing with such complicated relationships of such a delicate nature, in a hot area, be very, very careful when there is a change in the U.S. administration. As a professional, take it upon yourself to remind and keep reminding the incoming administration that this matter is on the agenda, whether or not they know it or not. This was something which later on, when I was an Ambassador, I reminded all and sundry to bear in mind, as the Bush administration entered office. Now this was a transition from one Republican administration to another, from Reagan to Bush. However, I just wanted to remind them at that time of particularly explosive issues that might somehow have fallen through the cracks. My awareness of this matter came from this experience back then which I have just described.

Q: What was the feeling in the American Government at the time? Was it that this Israeli attack on the Iraqi nuclear reactor was a bad thing?

BROWN: Yes. The Israeli air strike on the Iraqi nuclear reactor was a total surprise, American equipment was used, and such equipment had been provided for defensive purposes. Prime Minister Begin looked us in the eye and said, "Of course it was provided for defensive purposes.

What else would you call it?" The Reagan administration fumbled around and put a hold on the subsequent shipment of such equipment to the Israelis. This infuriated Begin and the Israeli Government. They said, "How could you possibly do such a thing?"

All of that took place just before the Israeli elections. So Begin reacted furiously to the suggestion that the Israeli strike against the Iraqi nuclear facility might have been politically motivated. He said, "How could anybody dream that I ordered the strike for anything other than the most humanitarian and defensive reasons?" The result was that Begin was reelected by the skin of his teeth, as it were. A very dejected Shimon Peres [leader of the Labour Party opposition to Begin] once again had to suffer defeat. Beyond that, this air strike resulted in immediate pressures exerted by Ariel Sharon, who had been waiting for several years. He finally made it into office as Minister of Defense.

At the time Sharon became Minister of Defense Ambassador Sam Lewis took a well-deserved period of home leave. He had gone through this business with Prime Minister Begin in the wake of the Israeli strike on the Iraqi nuclear reactor. In the furor which resulted from the Israeli attack on the nuclear reactor Secretary of State Haig sent Bud McFarland [National Security Adviser to President Reagan] out to Israel to try to put to rest the controversy over the bombing of the Iraqi nuclear reactor. McFarland met with Prime Minister Begin and the reported that he had been successful. No sooner had he left Israel than the Israelis bombed PLO installations in Lebanon. This was at a time when we were supporting Phil Habib and Morrie Draper in connection with their cease-fire efforts with the Syrians in Lebanon.

Concurrently, we were negotiating to set up the multinational force in the Sinai Desert. I was heavily involved in that, but that is a Mike Sterner story, and you have interviewed him. All of these things were going on at the same time, while the Palestinian autonomy negotiations remained stalemated. Then there was the departure from office of Sol Linowitz at the end of the Carter administration and the arrival of Fairbanks to replace him.

I pause to illustrate the enormous strains on the embassy in Tel Aviv, with all of these things happening at the same time. I'm proud that Ambassador Sam Lewis brought me into his full trust. In turn we had a tremendous asset in the person of Charley Hill, who was Political Counselor. Charley now prepared to return to Washington to become eventually the Acting Deputy Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern Affairs. When Secretary of State Al Haig was bumped from office, George Shultz came in to replace him, and Charley became the Executive Secretary of the Department of State, as well as the speechwriter and the key policy advisor for Shultz. That was a relief, but all of these changes made for a tremendous, kaleidoscopic scene.

Now, you asked me about Ariel Sharon. Ambassador Sam Lewis has a whole section on him, which you have on reserve. Let me speak a little bit about Sharon from my own, personal experience.

Q: Let's finish your comments on Sharon and, perhaps, stop at that point. What do you think?

BROWN: We'll go into my comments on Sharon. We can't finish it, but let's see what we can do.

Q: Okay.

BROWN: Let's start it this way. As I said earlier, I had already met Ariel Sharon as Minister of Agriculture and also Chairman of the Settlements Committee. He was a driving personality who moved quickly to bulldoze the sites subsequently used for the construction of West Bank settlements that we are now aware of.

Indeed, I drove up to the West Bank and surveyed the bulldozing that was going on at a site which came to be known as "Ariel." It is now the residence of tens of thousands of settlers. I visited that site and saw what Sharon's bulldozers had done. I said to myself: "Wow! We are entering a new stage." Smaller settlements had already built under the earlier, Labour Party government of Prime Minister Rabin. However, they were nothing compared to the potential of what I saw being bulldozed and prepared, as well as the road infrastructure that went with them. A "whole new ball game was evolving."

As Ambassador Sam Lewis left on a well-deserved, home leave, which covered the period from July 14 to late August, 1981, a new cabinet came into office with Ariel Sharon as Minister of Defense. I don't think that Sharon had been in this new office a day or two when he telephoned me. He said, "Bill, it's Shabat [Saturday]. Why don't you and Helen come down to the farm." I said, "Sure." I knew that he wanted something. We drove down to Sharon's farm in the Negev.

Now Sharon was a man who was a distinguished farmer, in addition to his many other attributes. He had what he described as the largest farm in Israel. It certainly was the largest, privately-owned farm in Israel.

I was treated to what I would say was the Israeli equivalent to a visit to the King Ranch in Texas. He showed us around his extensive farm. We saw his tame Arab shepherd and a thousand head or so of sheep, goats, and so forth. He drove us down into groves of the finest melons and fields of grapes, cotton, and so forth. He really knew his stuff. He was exporting his produce primarily to Europe. He was a very, very accomplished farmer. He treated us to a magnificent meal of roast lamb on a spit, took us through his hacienda-like house there, up into the bedroom where beautiful grapes were growing in through the window. He showed us his Mexican saddles, magnificent tapestries, art, and so forth. He wine and dined us.

I kept thinking to myself: "What is it that he wants from us?" Well, toward the end of this visit, it came out that he wanted to visit the United States right away as the new Israeli Minister of Defense. He wanted to meet at least with Casper Weinberger, then the U.S. Secretary of Defense. I said to him: "Have you cleared this visit with Prime Minister Begin?" He said, "Don't worry about it." I knew right away that we had a problem.

Indeed, I separately and quietly approached Prime Minister Begin and told him of Sharon's plans. I said that I assumed that Begin was aware of this. At this point Begin was rather taciturn. This told me that Begin didn't yet know of Sharon's desire to visit the United States. So a whole, new tone was now to emerge in our relationship with the Israeli Ministry of Defense.

When Ambassador Sam Lewis returned to Israel from home leave...

Q: This would be in late August, 1981.

BROWN: Yes. When Ambassador Sam Lewis came back and met with Minister of Defense Sharon, Sharon made it very clear that we would have no more easy access of the kind that Sam and I had had to the Ministry of Defense.

Previously, we used to be able to make a quick phone call to former Minister of Defense Ezer Weizman or Mordechai Zippori and nip over there. The word had been passed to the guards at the gate of the Ministry of Defense, and we would be shown up to the Minister of Defense's office. We had serious business, and they knew it. The subjects we used to raise were often acrimonious, but at least we were dealing with gentlemen who were handling us as best they could. They often confided in us their rationale for this or that course of action.

By contrast, Ariel Sharon had his own agenda, and we were to find out, in short order, what this meant. However, part of this had to do with Prime Minister Begin's keen desire to put the U.S.-Israeli relationship on a new basis. That is, a kind of alliance, however this was to be done. Somehow, he wanted to get this on paper and formalize it so that he, Prime Minister Begin, could use it. For his part, Sharon was keen to get something like this on his own terms to enhance his own image.

Well, it was one thing to deal with Secretary of State Al Haig, the former NATO commander and a general officer who was very sympathetic with his Cold War overlay, which could be used to highlight Israel's utility as an alliance partner. It was quite another thing to deal with Casper Weinberger, who had radically different ideas on the Israeli-U.S. relationship. As Secretary of Defense, Weinberger had his own, particular view of the importance of Saudi Arabia, Middle Eastern oil, Egypt, the Suez Canal, and so forth.

So we had a situation where there were some new players involved. The Israelis rapidly came to see that Casper Weinberger was no Al Haig, in terms of both his personality and his attitude. Therefore, it was understandable that the Israelis tended to favor Al Haig and extract as much as they could from him. Weinberger was a different customer.

Meanwhile, things were heating up in Lebanon, but Phil Habib had managed to negotiate a cease-fire.

Q: This cease-fire was basically with the Syrians, wasn't it?

BROWN: Yes, de facto it was with the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization], although we did not deal with them directly, and with the Syrians leaning on them. Full compliments to Phil Habib in this respect. Therefore, it was a challenge to ensure that this new understanding was implemented. There was this fear that it might break down, and we would have a crisis in Lebanon.

There was also the aftermath of the Israeli bombing of the Iraqi nuclear reactor. There was the ongoing question of a deadline for the Israeli pullout from the Sinai Desert, which was a critical matter for Egyptian President Anwar Sadat. It was absolutely critical that the Israelis pull out on time. There was the complicating factor of the Palestinian autonomy issue, because the Palestinians wouldn't play, and wouldn't have anything to do with it. The Egyptians were very sensitive to the fact that they were negotiating on behalf of the Palestinians, who didn't want to play. So the Egyptians felt the need to put on the best face they could for the Palestinians. However, they could see that the Israelis were not really going to give them what they wanted. That is, something that would be an Egyptian version of full autonomy, probably leading to self-determination and independence. There was no way that the Egyptians could get this, and they were frustrated on that score.

On the Sinai withdrawal we were working full blast to complete the airfields we had promised to build for the Egyptians to compensate them for the loss of their airfields in the Sinai area. This construction job was a very expensive proposition. We had a very large U.S. Army Corps of Engineers presence, with some of the contractors employing 2,000 Portuguese and 2,000 Thai workers and operating under demanding, desert-like conditions. They were working all out, 10 hours a day, in the Negev to build these airfields to Israeli specifications. These construction jobs were unparalleled as far as U.S. air base construction was concerned. The air bases had to be built to be virtually bombproof. We don't build U.S. air bases that way in the continental United States. We build U.S. air bases in the continental United States to operate from in flying to forward bases overseas. These bases in the Sinai Desert were built to withstand the heaviest kind of bombing attack. They were very expensive, and the completion deadline was sacrosanct.

We had the problem in that the Israeli Minister of Defense Ezer Weizman, said to us: "Do it and get it done. Don't get our unions involved." However, there was an understandable Israeli undercurrent of wanting to get the construction contracts. So there was this whole air base construction problem that I was involved in.

Then there was the question of setting up a respectable force in the Sinai Desert that would meet Prime Minister Menachem Begin's specifications. At the time the Soviets had made it clear that they would veto such a move and that they would not allow a United Nations force to perform this function.

Onto the scene came Michael Sterner, with whom I had entered the Foreign Service. He was an Arabist in the best sense of the word. He had walked the Saudi Arabian pipeline for Aramco before he came into the State Department. He spoke Arabic and had had a series of increasingly senior and responsible positions. He tells his story in another one of the interviews in your Oral History. I often went with him on calls on Begin and other senior officials and then followed up.

I will tell you one incident to highlight the sensitivity of this matter. What Prime Minister Begin wanted were American forces in the Sinai Desert. We couldn't agree to that, for a variety of reasons. It would have to be multinational if it couldn't be a United Nations force. We therefore had to set up something respectable and convincing as a substitute for a U.S. force.

In one conversation, one on one, with me, Prime Minister Begin said, "Bill, I'm not worried about the Sinai at present. We can handle the Sinai. I'm not worried about a year or two, or five years into the future. I'm worried about what happens 10 or 20 years from now. After I'm gone from the scene and, who knows, after Sadat is gone from the scene, are we going to see another Nasser come to power in Egypt and do what he did in 1967: kick out the UN and threaten us? That's why I would like to have this a really stable, convincing, military presence." I said, "Well, Mr. Prime Minister, it can't be a solely American force." He said, "All right, but I don't want it run by a bunch of 'Banana Republics.'" That was a term that often came into his mind. He didn't want to be treated like a "Banana Republic," as he put it to Ambassador Sam Lewis. He said, "I'd like to see really respectable components for this force." I said, "What did you have in mind?" He said, "Well, people like the Australians, the New Zealanders, the Canadians. You know, people like that." I said to him: "How about the British?" He said, "Well," and he slipped away from that alternative.

We therefore had to go out and persuade the right kind of governments to put up the right kind of forces. Mike Sterner, Peter Constable, and others were engaged in setting this force up. It was fascinating to see what finally emerged. I ended up negotiating the follow up and at great length with Eli Rubinstein, who was the Secretary of the Israeli Cabinet, a lawyer who also had a Ministry of Defense background. [Addendum: He is now Attorney General.] Whenever I see Eli, we still joke about this. I'll never forget where he once had me pick up the phone in his office and negotiate on his behalf with Ray Hunt. In other words, he maneuvered me into a situation where I was in his office and sitting over there, feeding me what he wanted. I wanted to say, "Why the hell don't you do it yourself?" However, he had someone else on another phone. It was fascinating. Ray Hunt, by the way, bless him, was subsequently assassinated...

Q: In Rome.

BROWN: In Rome, by terrorists. I'll never forget going to his funeral. Anyhow, we set up, on time, a convincing multinational force for the Sinai. Even now most Americans and, indeed, most American Members of Congress, are totally unaware of the fact that we maintained a battalion of troops in the Sinai playing a crucial role and providing a quiet presence that has worked because the parties concerned want it to work. We negotiated an essential, as far as sharing the expenses were concerned. Basically, it violated the Egyptian amour propre to have a foreign force on their sacred, Sinai soil. So, over the years the Egyptians would chip away, incrementally, at the size and the composition of the force. However, it still remained a very, very important adjunct to a key treaty requirement of the time. Lessons were learned. We could set up, if necessary, a non-UN force. This arrangement created a precedent for such ticklish situations as might evolve. Look at the present situation in Kosovo, where we are using a NATO approach as opposed to a UN approach.

Q: There is a general feeling, and it really stems from Nasser getting U Thant, [the UN Secretary General], to pull out the UN force in the Sinai. A UN force is subject to so many political considerations on a worldwide basis that it is essentially unreliable.

BROWN: There is that factor. Now, the first military commander of this Sinai force was Bull Hanson, a Norwegian general and a very sophisticated gentleman. We always kept an American as the civilian head of this Sinai Force. This position was portrayed as an essentially administrative function for keeping the Force together. Fortunately, we chose excellent people, such as former Foreign Service Officers, to do this. They deserve full credit, to this day. (End of tape)

Q: A question that you raised about the construction of these air bases in the Negev. I have no idea about this but I would have thought that we would have been concerned about Israeli construction because that gets into local politics, and all of that.

BROWN: Yes. In essence, Ezer Weizman, as Israeli Minister of Defense, having extracted the commitment that we would pay for the construction of these air bases, said to us quietly: "Now you do it, because I can't rely on Israeli labor to meet the deadline." It was crucial to him, politically, as well as from the security viewpoint, that these bases should be in place and functioning by the time of the withdrawal of the Israelis from Sinai.

Q: For the construction of these air bases we had essentially "controlled" labor, including non unionized Portuguese and Thai workers. They would not be liable to go on strike, as Israeli workers might be.

BROWN: Yes. It was a very sophisticated operation. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers rented a seven to 10-story hotel, next to what was the Tel Aviv Hilton Hotel. They used satellite communications and employed American contractors, who then used Thai and Portuguese subcontractors. We kept a really hard, constantly updated program going here and we met the deadline. Through it all we wondered what would be the eventual use of these air bases and in what situations.

Well, strange are the ways of the world. One use was to provide a base for the Israeli bombing of the Iraqi nuclear reactor. Later on, another matter was, of course, the whole question of U.S. use of these bases. As Ambassador to Israel later on, I went up with the Apache helicopters which were secretly flown from Germany to one of these airfields, where they trained in the spring of 1990. It wasn't too many months after that that these bases were used in Desert Storm. We had no direct knowledge that the war would come, but it was awfully nice that our guys were able to train on one of these very air bases.

Q: Just to go back to the bombing of the Iraqi nuclear reactor. If you look at it from a strategic point of view, we had this policy of non-proliferation. Saddam Hussein, the President of Iraq, even in those days, was not considered a tame person. He certainly was complicit in the whole attack on Iran. He was regarded as a dangerous character. There were suppliers from Germany, Italy, and other places, and maybe even the Soviet Union, bringing in equipment to Iraq to give him the ability to produce nuclear weapons.

BROWN: All under a UN regime, all under the relevant UN facility. It was all done in accordance with the regulations. Technically, this was done with UN inspectors. This Iraqi nuclear reactor was UN inspected and certified.

Q: So this was considered by us to be a relatively clean operation. What I'm getting at is this: was there any feeling in the U.S.: "Gee, I wish the Israelis hadn't attacked this Iraqi nuclear reactor, but thank God they did!"

BROWN: Yes. How shall I put it? Look at Al Haig's writings, the body language, his reported remarks, and so forth. He was in effect saying to the Israelis something like: "Hey, guys, you have to understand the sensitivities back here, but you did a good job!" Others on the Washington scene were railing against this Israeli attack on the Iraqi nuclear reactor at the time. Years later, another Secretary of Defense [later Vice President], Dick Cheney, openly thanked the Israelis for having done this. You can argue various sides of the case.

In my presentation of this matter I used as an example all of the under currents which involved certain, very sensitive elements of the U.S.-Israeli relationship. There is no status quo. Things keep moving, and surprises, usually bad surprises, keep happening in the Middle East. You can take the Israelis only so far with assurances that you're looking at the problem and that you're seeking a solution of it. However, when it gets into something of this potential horror, you'd better come up with something convincing and stick with it, or you risk a real surprise. That has certainly been my experience.

Now, we are now talking about the summer of 1981. I've gone through these various exercises, many of them concurrent. I'd now like to take you into the fall and winter of 1981. By this time Israeli Minister of Defense Sharon had been to Washington, and he and Prime Minister Begin had run up against Casper Weinberger. I would like to highlight that and give you a little story just to show the delicacy of this portion of the U.S.-Israeli relationship.

Begin and Sharon presented a memorandum covering a strategic relationship between the U.S. and Israel. During one of his visits to Washington, Sharon went through a melodramatic presentation of what the Israelis could do, if the Cold War turned hot, possibly involving the Iranian, the Turkish, or the Persian Gulf situation. In other words, the Israelis had the capability, if they were supported, of moving armored forces great distances, leapfrogging them, and so forth. This, of course, chilled somebody like Weinberger.

Weinberger's response to this presentation was, shall we say, pretty weak tea. He spoke of something like emergency hospitals to deal with local disasters and so forth. This happened at one of those times when I was Chargé d'Affaires in Tel Aviv. I had to bring this matter up to Prime Minister Menachem Begin and make an oral presentation on it.

I started reading from a Weinberger draft, which I had privately recognized as awfully weak tea" vis-a-vis what the Israelis wanted to hear. Prime Minister Begin finally said, "Mr. Chargé," and whenever he used the term of address "Mr.," you knew that he was being particularly curt and official. Otherwise, he would say, "Sam" or "Bill." He said, "Mr. Chargé, let me read that piece of paper," and he reached over to me, and I passed it over to him. He read it and perused it for a while. Then he said to me: "Have you heard the story of the 'Unter den Linden?'" I said, "No." He said, "The story goes something like this. A rich, Prussian 'Junker' [a title of German nobility] fell in love with a poor, Jewish girl in a Berlin environment. He had several, passionate meetings with her. As the relationship became increasingly passionate, she said, 'When and where do we meet next?' He said, 'Well, as soon as possible, but, please, not along the Unter den Linden.'" This, I guess, was one of the main thoroughfares in Berlin.

Q: It was a main street with trees. In other words, it was under the Linden trees.

BROWN: In other words, the Junker was saying: "Honey, I'll meet you over the fence and down the alley. You're a poor, Jewish girl, and I don't want to meet you in public." Begin continued: "As I read this text, I am reminded of this story of Unter den Linden." In other words, he was asking, "What is this?" It was a pretty embarrassing moment for me. I decided that in my reporting of this meeting I would handle it that way. I prepared a cable which told the Unter den Linden story.

Well, the Israelis eventually got a bit more out of it. Not all what they wanted, but that's the way it went.

Q: Basically, our position was that we were not going to have an essentially official, strategic relationship with Israel...

BROWN: We weren't going to have an official, strategic alliance relationship, which would create problems for our relationship with the Arabs, our oil interests, and so forth.

Q: By the way, did Sharon or Begin ever try to play the line with Casper Weinberger: "You're Jewish and we're Jewish?"

BROWN: On the contrary. I believe that Mr. Weinberger, whether it's true or not, was considered half-Jewish in the Israeli book. He had been raised as a Presbyterian, or at least was brought up as a Protestant. They learned long ago, with the likes of Barry Goldwater and several other cases to be very, very careful in handling gentlemen of such backgrounds.

Now, things went along. Sharon took firmer and firmer charge of the Israeli Ministry of Defense. His role on the political scene grew, and we got to the point where the Lebanese situation was heating up. It is now late 1981. Phil Habib was employed again in an effort to prevent a breakdown in the cease-fire arrangements which he had so brilliantly engineered. Habib came on another visit to Jerusalem. At about this time Prime Minister Begin had slipped in his bathroom and broken his hip. Therefore, Habib didn't get to see Begin, who was in pain and recuperating. Instead, Habib got to see Sharon.

The meeting with Sharon was set up at the Israeli Foreign Ministry up in Jerusalem. The Foreign Minister was Shamir but he was not present. In November, 1981, Ambassador Sam Lewis escorted Shamir to Washington. I was Chargé d'Affaires. Habib visited Damascus, [Syria], and then came to Israel. With Prime Minister Begin injured, the meeting took place with Sharon. That meeting is reported in Ambassador Sam Lewis' oral interview and also in a book jointly authored by Zeev Shiff and Ehud Yaari. The title of the book is something like, Israel's Lebanon War.

Obviously, Zeev and Ehud had gotten hold of the American cable reporting this meeting, which I strongly suspect Phil Habib leaked. The presentation is set forth in straightforward form, but there's a little portion of it that didn't get into the cable, which I'd like to dwell on. In the jockeying back and forth between Sharon and Habib, sort of wise guy talk, Sharon was somewhat critical of Phil Habib's efforts in Lebanon. On the one hand Sharon nominally praised Phil's efforts but, on the other hand, he criticized them. In response to this Habib said something like, "Well, what do you propose?"

Sharon then laid out what later became the Israeli invasion of Lebanon. This meeting was held between December 4 and 6, 1981. My Political Counselor and notetaker at that stage was Paul Hare, a top officer who later became an Ambassador. He was the son of a former American Ambassador to Lebanon. Habib and the Israeli Foreign Ministry types participating in the meeting were stunned by Sharon's remarks. He presented them with the caveat that he was just speaking as an individual. He said, "What I've been saying to you hasn't been cleared by the Israeli cabinet. I've just been speaking to you as an individual." Well, hell, he was the Israeli Defense Minister. He laid out a campaign for pushing up the coast of Lebanon, taking out the Palestinian establishment, military and otherwise.

What was not in the cable, as I recall it, was that someone, and I think that it was I, said, "What about Beirut?" The version of this conversation by others is that Beirut was never discussed at this meeting. However, my recollection is that Beirut was handled this way. Sharon made a sweeping, enveloping motion with his arm, which could mean that he would just go around Beirut, or it could mean: "I'll surround it and then we'll see what happens." By this sweeping motion of his arm Sharon could have meant that the Israelis could bypass Beirut or he could have meant that they would encircle it and then reduce it in a way that Sharon liked to do.

The other thing that Sharon said quite bluntly was that such a plan would put the Syrians in a strategic dilemma. It would cut the road that goes from Beirut to Damascus, passing through Zakleh. The Syrians would either have to withdraw their forces from southern Lebanon or face being cut in half and decimated. Well, that formulation had Habib, me, and, I would say, the Israeli Foreign Ministry types present at the meeting on edge or right out of our seats. Phil Habib then said, "This is not 1967." In other words, you just can't get away very easily with doing something like that.

So that was it. We dashed off a cable, which was subsequently the basis for the passage incorporating this view of Sharon's in Zed Shiff and Ehud Yaari's book. Sharon had been careful to say, "This is just a personal view, etc." However, what we saw over the following six months was a whole series of call-up's of Israeli reserves and mock mobilizations so that what eventually happened was certainly no surprise. The only surprise was what day it would be done. There was no question in my mind that the Israelis were gearing up to do this, unless, by some means, we or somebody else could do away with the Palestinian threat to Northern Israel.

I dwell on this just a moment because it's often said that Begin's son, Benny Begin, was furious at the way his father had been allegedly manipulated by Sharon. However, I think that, with all due respect, Prime Minister Begin was much more aware of the situation, as Ambassador Sam Lewis has pointed out. There were Israeli cabinet meetings on this subject before the final attack on Lebanon was made. In dealing with that subject at cabinet meetings, Sharon had to tone it down to make it appear that the Israelis would be going 45 or 50 kilometers deep into southern Lebanon. That is, the approximate range of a PLO Katusha rocket which could hit northern Israel. Allegedly, the Israelis would take out that chunk of Lebanon and thereby limit their objective, rather than plunging on and doing what they ultimately tried to do: set up a whole, new Lebanese Government, knock the Syrians out of Lebanon, and establish the Israelis as the alternative to the Syrians.

Now in early December, 1981, Habib returned to Washington. I was still Chargé d'Affaires and I got an indication that something was being developed on the whole Golan Heights business. In Sam Lewis' interview in this series, and I had forgotten this, he says that I alerted Washington to rumors suggesting that we use some very strong language to head off the possibility that the Israeli Knesset [Parliament] might pass legislation formally annexing the Golan Heights area.

Remember that in 1967 the Knesset passed legislation in the wake of the Israeli victory in the war of that year which, you could say, in effect annexed the Golan Heights area, as well as Jerusalem. These are two, different matters. However, the way the language of the legislation was worded in both cases, the Israelis could look us in the eye and say, "No, that's not annexation." In the case of the Golan Heights in particular, they could say, "It falls under our administrative jurisdiction." This could be represented to be something which was legally a little less than annexation. Then, under the Labour Government of Israel, they proceeded to settle the area. That is, they put Labour settlements of farmers, light industry, and so forth up on the Golan Heights. I had forgotten that I had sent in such a cable, and my thanks to Sam Lewis for putting that on the record in your Oral History.

In any event, Ambassador Sam Lewis returned to Israel, I believe, on Monday, December 13, 1981. Rumors were increasingly heard at this time that there was a bill before the Knesset annexing the Golan Heights area. It was presented by Knesset Member Glass, who was an independent. The bill was routed to a committee, and we were told by Israeli Government officials not to worry about it. We were told that this was one of those private member bills which had been routed to a committee and that it would die there. It would allegedly be pigeonholed.

Nevertheless, we were concerned about this bill. I had sent in a cable, suggesting that we use very strong language to block it. However, before any such language came back to us from the Department of State, Prime Minister Menachem Begin roused himself from his sickbed, was carried into a car, taken to the Knesset, put in a chair and wheeled into the Knesset, in a lightning series of moves. He put the Labour Opposition on the spot and engineered the rapid passage of a Knesset resolution annexing the Golan Heights. Of course, this very much upset Washington and the Department of State.

Against his whole background of seize the opportunity and seize the day, which was not peculiar to Begin, he faced everybody with a fait accompli. This action had a souring effect in those circumstances. I'm willing to continue...

Q: I think that this is a pretty good time to stop. We're now moving up to...

BROWN: We've moving up to the Sharon trip to Washington in May, 1982, and, shortly thereafter, the Israeli invasion of Lebanon.

Q: This would be a good place to stop. So we'll pick it up at that point the next time we meet.

Today is May 6, 1999. Bill, let's pick up the story in May, 1982.

BROWN: Things were really heating up. Let me take you through the buildup to the Israeli invasion of Lebanon and its immediate aftermath. This was in 1982.

Just a bit of background here. The PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] had unsuccessfully tried to overthrow King Hussein of Jordan in September, 1970. This effort failed, and the PLO was then driven out of Jordan and escaped into southern Lebanon.

Meanwhile, the Lebanese internal situation had deteriorated to the point that the Christian Phalangists invited President Assad of Syria into Lebanon to cope with their problem with the Palestinians. So, in effect, Assad was the man who came to dinner but never left. His forces are still there in Lebanon. Assad moved his forces into Lebanon with an invitation from the Christian Phalangists. I don't claim to be either a Syrian or a Lebanese expert. However, my impression is that this was the fulfillment of a widely-held Syrian ambition. That is, whatever the Sykes-Picot arrangement reached during World War I between the British and the French regarding the establishment of a Lebanese Republic under French tutelage, from a Syrian viewpoint, this was all one piece of a larger Syrian entity.

It was the case then and, I believe, it is still the case that there was and is no Lebanese embassy in Damascus, [Syria]. Lebanese political figures either asked to go to Damascus to see President Assad or were summoned there to see him. With the introduction of the Syrian Army into Lebanon, Assad so strengthened his hold on Lebanon that, at the risk of only slight simplification one could say that it became virtually a Syrian protectorate or appendage. That is, rivalries continued, but thousands of Syrian troops were the power on the scene, and Assad could and did play one faction against the other. In a larger sense Assad could play on the Lebanese scene, vis-a-vis the Israelis as he sought to recover the Golan Heights lost to Israel in 1967. That was and remains the situation.

In this connection, the instrumentalities Assad used changed from time to time. During my time in Israel the instrumentality Assad used was the PLO. I would say that the PLO presence in southern Lebanon was approved of by Assad to a degree. Not only countenanced but encouraged as well, within certain limits. The PLO had to understand that the Syrians called the shots. Within those limits the PLO could build up their paramilitary organizations. They could, and did, attempt provocations against Israel, using mortars, rockets, demonstrations, infiltrators, hang gliders, and so forth. The Israelis responded to these cycles of provocations by the PLO with increasing vehemence.

Q: A question here. From the point of view of the American embassy in Israel, and looking at the situation at the time you were there, I would have thought that the Syrians would do everything they could to keep the PLO from staging such provocations. These provocations amounted to sticks used to annoy the tiger. As sure as anything, this would lead to the use of Syrian troops at some point.

BROWN: I would respond to that in this way. We saw this kind of behavior as a risky game, particularly with, shall we say, a hawkish Israeli Government dominated by the Likud Party. Ezer Weizman is a former President of Israel. He is now depicted in Israel as a paragon of peace, flexibility, and diplomacy. However, when he was Israeli Minister of Defense he led the Israeli invasion of Lebanon in 1978. This invasion went deeply into Lebanon and caused a flap in the UN, leading to the passage of UN Resolution 425.

However, if you try to look at this situation from the point of view of President Assad of Syria, he lost the Golan Heights to Israel in 1967. This area of traditional Syrian territory had already been settled by the then Labour Party Government of Israel. Those settlements weren't expanding enormously, but they were turning the Golan Heights into a fertile, agricultural and light industrial complex. Assad probably calculated that he would keep the pressure on Israel by these means. It was a tricky, risky business, but with Assad's hands on the reins, from time to time he had to tighten them and pull them back. So when Phil Habib did his shuttle diplomacy act, prior to the situation which I am now describing, remember that he always went to Damascus as well. The Syrians have good diplomats and wily foreign ministers. There was also President Assad himself, who is one of the wiliest negotiators on the face of the earth. There was never an admission that the Syrians called the shots. The Syrians had their own "Palestinians," if you will, who were potential rivals to Yasser Arafat, living in Damascus, both then and now.

So this was a dangerous game for the Syrians to play. The tempo varied, and it had the Israelis constantly on edge. At times, I can tell you, this situation became a very serious domestic problem in Israel. To a large extent, Israelis living on Israel's northern border with Lebanon were adherents and supporters of the Labour Party of Israel. There were kibbutzim [Israeli collective settlements] and so on dotted across that area.

However, on the subject of handling foreign policy vis-a-vis Assad of Syria and the PLO, I would say that along the northern border of Israel there was a nearly universal demand: "Do something! We cannot let this situation continue," with women and children in bomb shelters, an atmosphere of terror, and so on.

So by 1978 the Israelis had already created a kind of security zone in southern Lebanon. They had already allied themselves with southern Lebanese dissidents, such as Major Hadad and his entourage, a dissident, Christian faction, which was also allied with a Shiite element in southern Lebanon as well. I think that it is worth pausing just to take note of the fact that public opinion in the United States presently considers that these southern Lebanese dissidents are mostly Christians. In those days, this wasn't true. There were Shiite Muslim units, allied with Major Hadad and under his command, paid for and supplied by the Israelis, facing what we now call the Hezbollah, a rival radical group that rose among the Shiite community in Beirut and extended into southern Lebanon. So there was an intra-Shiite struggle going on over the years. In more recent times the pro-Iranian Hezbollah won out.

In any case, the scene heated up. It reached the point where the Israelis were increasingly strafing and bombing deeper and deeper into Lebanon. Phil Habib, in an exercise of brilliant diplomacy, had brought about a cease-fire. Now the situation was beginning to fray again after nearly a year or so of a cease-fire. I think that it may have been slightly less than a year, in fact. The situation got worse and worse. Remember that, as of July, 1981, a reshuffled Begin Government was now in office, which had in it a very strong Minister of Defense, Ariel Sharon, with his own agenda. On December 4 or 5, 1981, he stunned Habib and myself, as well as his own Foreign Ministry officials by laying out a plan for the invasion of southern Lebanon.

Simultaneously, there were some other developments which I would like to touch on, at least briefly, because it is so easy to focus on only one. What I would like to leave our readers with is the terrific responsibilities carried by Ambassador Sam Lewis and the American embassy in Tel Aviv in coping simultaneously with the Israelis on a variety of hot subjects.

President Anwar Sadat of Egypt was assassinated in the autumn of 1981, which left the Israelis very, very nervous as to what would ensue under Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak as Sadat's successor. Mubarak, for his part, was committed to reaping the full fruits of the peace treaty with Israel. That is, getting the Israelis out of the Sinai. The peace treaty with Israel called for a staged demilitarization of the Sinai border between Egypt and Israel. Nominally, the withdrawals were equal, as both sides had to pull back a little bit. However, it was really designed as a thin strip with no Egyptian troops and then another, and wider, strip behind that which each side would have no armor or artillery. Then there would be a further strip behind that, which was the subject of intensive negotiations, involving very painful decisions for Israel. The Israelis had to demolish a very expensive series of bases, installations, and military infrastructure which they had installed in the Sinai area since 1967. It was very painful for the Israelis to do this.

The Israelis also had to remove Israeli settlers from this area of the Sinai. It was particularly painful for Prime Minister Menachem Begin to preside over the withdrawal of every last Israeli from the Sinai. One of the functions of Ariel Sharon, as the new Minister of Defense, was to go in and root out those settlers from such beautiful settlements as Yamit, which was like a gem in a sea of sand. The settlers initially resisted this removal but were finally ejected. We saw this process night after night on television in Tel Aviv.

But that wasn't the end of that story. As the deadlines approached, Prime Minister Begin summoned Ambassador Sam Lewis and made it very clear that he was aware, through his intelligence sources, and he knew that we were aware, that the Egyptians were defaulting on certain key provisions concerning the Sinai, such as trenches that were supposed to have been destroyed but hadn't been. Egyptian tank positions were still in place, and there were still Egyptian military personnel in positions where they shouldn't have been. Begin worked himself up to the point that he finally said, "Maybe we'd better consider delaying an Israeli withdrawal from the Sinai, unless and until this situation can be cleaned up."

Well, Washington, of course, was very distraught at this. Begin went on to say, "Perhaps the new Secretary of State, General Haig, could come over to Israel, and we can settle this." Well, the Falkland Islands War broke out, so Haig sent his trusted deputy, Walter Stoessel, a distinguished, career diplomat and former Ambassador to the Soviet Union and Poland, to review the situation with the Israelis. Stoessel came to Israel, and Prime Minister Begin ran him through the wringer. He laid down all kinds of provisions that had to be met and assurances that had to be provided. He urged Stoessel to fly to Cairo and get these things done, and the process went on and on.

Meanwhile, in the midst of all of this, the Israelis were bombing southern Lebanon. I remember once, while Ambassador Stoessel was in Jerusalem, he was invited down to Tel Aviv to the Foreign Ministry by Minister of Defense Sharon. When he got there, we learned that Israeli F-16s had just conducted another, very dramatic raid. Defense Minister Sharon looked at us and said, "Why the long faces? These are your airplanes, F-16s. Look at the brilliant job that they've done! They're the finest available. You ought to be proud." In other words, he was rubbing it in.

I'll never forget what happened toward the end of this process, with the deadlines upon us. We had negotiated a multinational force, to be headed by an American civilian director, assisted by General Bull Hanson, a Norwegian general and an outstanding man.

In typical style Prime Minister Begin extracted the maximum that he could from Ambassador Stoessel. We ended up in the Prime Minister's residence at about 11:00 PM or midnight. An exhausted Stoessel gave his latest readout and assurances from Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak that things had been cleaned up and so forth. Begin said, "I want to thank you very much. You've worked very hard, and I deeply appreciate that. However, in view of what has happened, and given the reluctance of my cabinet, I'll have to take all of this to my cabinet for approval. I would like to go over some very important issues with you." There, on the couch, he had Defense Minister Sharon and other top people.

Begin said, "I think that in view of these circumstances it would be useful for the President of the United States to write me a letter. As a matter of fact," and he reached in his pocket and brought out a draft of such a letter. He said, "This is the kind of letter that I would appreciate receiving from the President of the United States." You can imagine the contents. The letter included a statement that, "All assurances given by the United States Government to the Government of Israel remain valid and will be fulfilled, especially those since 1973." Of course, that meant reams and reams of all kinds of assurances. Begin said to Deputy Undersecretary Stoessel: "Surely, you wouldn't have any difficulty in reaffirming all of the commitments that you've made to us." What could Stoessel say but: "Well, of course."

At that point I had an image of some little old lady in one of the Israeli ministries pulling out file cabinets of commitments, including both written and oral commitments, implied and official and unofficial commitments, etc. But that was Begin's style. Therefore, having finally extracted these oral assurances from Deputy Undersecretary Stoessel, Begin let us go, I guess, at about 1:00 AM.

Well, Ambassador Sam Lewis and I, as well as the other members of the American team, then dashed over to the American Consulate General in Jerusalem, where we had to notify Washington immediately of the apparent resolution of this crisis. General Bull Hanson was in town or due to be in town soon. He had to be briefed and brought up to speed on the commitments that had been made concerning the Multinational Force. There were a few surprises for him as well.

I think that the Egyptian Defense Minister was in Jerusalem and had to be taken care of. In the middle of all of this, at about 2:00 AM, while we were working furiously, having worked all day and all night, I got a phone call from the Director General of the Israeli Foreign Ministry, David Kimche and his cohort, Hanon Baron. These were two outstanding individuals. They said that there was a little more that Prime Minister Begin wanted to bring up. They asked if they could come and see us.

I said, "David, as you know, we're here in the American Consulate General." I was alluding to the fact that no Israeli official had EVER entered the American Consulate General in Jerusalem. Symbolically, this would have been impossible for an Israeli in ordinary circumstances. However, David said, "That's all right. We'll come over and see you." So they came over.

Q: You were saying that the list of the other matters that Prime Minister Begin wanted to bring up really sent you up the wall.

BROWN: It was an addendum to what Begin had already negotiated with Stoessel up to 1:00 AM that morning.

Q: Was this typical of Begin?

BROWN: I would say, yes. Look, Israel is a small country which has a survival syndrome and a style of its own. It is deeply suspicious of its Arab neighbors, no matter what. At this point Israel was about to give up the Jewel, this vast territory, the Sinai. This was some 90 percent of all of the territory that the Israelis had seized in 1967. This was a territory from which they had pumped oil, which had beautiful eco-tourist potential, and which gave Israel strategic depth against a renewed, Egyptian attack. It's occupation had put the Israelis on the Suez Canal. Giving this up, before the Camp David Agreement was reached, had been unthinkable for many Israelis.

Anyway, Prime Minister Begin was determined to extract what he could in exchange for giving up the Sinai. He would never again have this kind of a chance with the Egyptians and he knew it. Once the Sinai was returned to the Egyptians, Israeli leverage with the Egyptians would be very much diluted, to put it mildly. So Begin was making the best of it. We were grinding our teeth, but that was about all that we could do. As I said, all of this was going on simultaneously.

Q: While we're at it and while this was going on, what reading were you getting, both within the embassy in Tel Aviv and from our embassy in Cairo, about why the Egyptians were not fulfilling all of their obligations?

BROWN: Stuart, this is the Middle East. Pardon my cynical comment, but you really have to keep your eye on everything. Egypt has its own internal problems and its own bureaucracies. Some of those bureaucracies are military bureaucracies. Sometimes they are at odds with each other. Words, interpretations, and instructions get mixed up, and so forth. We checked the situation regularly but were not in a position to deny what the Israelis were telling us, if I may put it that way. However, at the eleventh hour, the situation was cleaned up.

At the same time Begin's, and particularly Sharon's remarks, were laced with such observations as Sharon put it: "I've told them, and you can tell them that I told you that I've told them. If they violate their commitments again, we'll be back in there in 24 hours." There was no ambiguity about that. This was the situation after the nice play on words. Ezer Weizman was long gone as Defense Minister. He had had a very good relationship with Anwar Sadat, but Sharon was the tough guy. After all, Sharon had emerged as a great hero in the breakthrough at Suez and the encirclement and defeat of the Egyptian Army during the Yom Kippur War of 1973. The Egyptians knew that they were dealing with a tough individual in the person of Ariel Sharon. So, as I said, the Israelis were extracting every particle of advantage that they could, while they could do so.

Now, let's go back to the Lebanese front which, as I've said, was heating up. Following Sharon's accession to power as Minister of Defense and his revealing his plans for the invasion of Lebanon to Habib and myself in December, 1981, there were further intimations of Israeli preparations to do this, if necessary. The same point came up during Sharon's visits to Washington. In his meetings there, Sharon tended to be melodramatic, depending on his interlocutor, his mood, and so forth. Of course, we were in the position of trying to dampen down all of this. So the services of Phil Habib were again in dire need. Nevertheless, the situation continued to spin out of control. In negotiating the cease-fire agreement Habib could not be in direct touch with the PLO, for that was verboten for American diplomats. We found out later, and you'll see this in George Shultz's book, that without Shultz's knowledge, William Casey, Director of Central Intelligence, had authorized Bob Ames and others to open their own channels with the PLO, unbeknownst to the State Department. However, the policy was that Phil Habib could not negotiate directly with the PLO. They were cheek by jowl, and there were Lebanese, French, and other interlocutors used to contact them. The cease-fire agreement included a prohibition on PLO attacks on Israel. The Israelis interpreted that to mean across the board. The Arafat interpretation of the agreement was that this commitment referred only to the Lebanese border. The PLO, in this view, was free to engage in the struggle against Zionist imperialism around the world. The PLO considered that, as long as the Israelis didn't attack them, they would not attack the Israelis on this particular Lebanese front.

This was a particular bone of contention between the two parties. This situation came to a real crunch and was used, either as a pretext or the reason, however you want to characterize it, for the invasion of Lebanon itself. On June 3, 1982, I believe, the Israeli Ambassador in London, Shlomo Argon, was shot and seriously wounded by a Palestinian terrorist while coming out of a function at a hotel. He was not killed, but he became virtually a vegetable. This was an unfortunate, tragic case. That was, if you will, the proximate provocation which led to the Israeli invasion of Lebanon. Prior to this, as I said, apart from Sharon's remarks to us in December, 1981, numerous Israeli reservists were mobilized and deployed toward the North.

Israeli reservists would be mobilized at a moment's notice, and the Israeli military and reserves would come out, crank up, and head toward the North. They were perceived as leaning forward in their foxholes and were just ready to go across the border. We would go to the Israelis and say, "What are you doing?" They would say, "It's just an exercise," and there would be a pullback. However, there was no surprise, as far as Israeli preparations for an attack on Lebanon were concerned.

So the Israelis went into Lebanon. Remember that in the discussions of this action the initial description of the campaign was most frequently portrayed as limited out of consideration of the concerns expressed by the more nervous Nellies in the Israeli cabinet. The invasion was portrayed as a cleanup of the Palestinian Katusha rocket capability in Lebanon. A Katusha rocket in those days could go about 40 or 45 kilometers and was frankly a terror weapon. The Palestinians were not aiming them at military targets.

Q: They mounted them on the back of trucks.

BROWN: Or even on the ground. You could also put them on the back of a truck. The Palestinians had a couple of pieces of artillery on hand. I think that these were 130 mm guns, which could reach targets in the Israeli northern border area. So the Israeli attack on Lebanon was initially portrayed as a limited operation.

Well, it was not limited or the limits soon went far beyond those described both to us, to the Israeli cabinet, to the Israeli Opposition, and to the Israeli public. One thing rapidly led to another. The Israeli Defense Forces went into Lebanon, and it wasn't just to a depth of 40 or 50 kilometers. The objective wasn't just the Zakharani or Letani Rivers. The operation went on and on.

We protested to the Israeli Government and so forth. However, by our own policy, we were not allowed to send in our own embassy military attachés, so we did not have someone up there, moving with the Israeli Army. We had to rely on what the Israelis would tell us. They would say, "Resistance was encountered, another PLO 'provocation occurred and it was necessary to move farther into Lebanon." Pretty soon the Israeli Army was at the door of Beirut.

Q: I've been interviewing people like Bob Dillon, who was our Ambassador in Beirut at the time. He was not happy with the reporting he was getting because, as he said, "The Israeli Army is doing this," and would report it to Washington. Washington would say, "Well, our embassy in Tel Aviv tells us this or that."

BROWN: And what our embassy in Tel Aviv was telling the Department was what the Israeli Army was telling us.

Q: Ambassador Dillon was getting reports from the front.

BROWN: From his viewpoint, he was getting reports from the front, but what was the front? These reports were from elements of the Lebanese armed forces at or near the front, or whatever civilian and other sources he had available. When we would pass this on to the Israelis and ask for their comments, they would dismiss these reports as rubbish. They would call these reports tainted, one-sided, and so forth.

Q: This situation raises the whole issue of reporting. First, you obviously could report to the Department what the Israelis were telling Embassy Tel Aviv. However, did you attach qualifiers to these reports and say, for example: "These guys are lying like hell a lot of the time?" Or did you just say, "This is what we have been told." In the normal course of events in Washington, if an Arab source says that the front is here, and the Israelis say that it is there, the tendency will always be to say that the Israelis are much more truthful than the Arabs.

BROWN: Yes, but remember that there are different channels of reporting. First of all, as the Israeli Army crashed across the Lebanese border, Minister of Defense Sharon was totally unavailable to us. He was up at the front, so we didn't see him for days. In that kind of situation, shall we say, he was one of the most active Israeli Defense Ministers that you could imagine. Even though he was no longer a general on active duty, he was right up there with the troops. Clearly, Sharon was trying to maximize whatever he could do.

Professionally speaking, our military attachés were getting their military read-outs from the Israeli military. The same thing applied to what our intelligence people were getting. We were left to deal with the Foreign Ministry under with Shamir, who was now the Foreign Minister, and with the Prime Minister's office.

Remember also that in the very early days of the Israeli invasion of Lebanon there was almost a sense of euphoria in Israel. Now I'll have to be careful how I describe this. Israelis were saying: "At last, we're going to clean up this mess, these constant provocations against Israeli border settlements by the PLO." So there was an initial cheerful period. The invasion of Lebanon was not regarded as a lark, but, let's face it, the PLO didn't have a regular army, whereas the Israelis had armored forces and knew what they were about. The Israelis had their plans and they implemented them. Here and there the Israelis bumped against this or that Syrian Army outfit which didn't quite withdraw as quickly as they should have. This developed into an escalating series of problems. We're talking about conventional, Israeli armor striking North in a characteristic, heavy push, leaving pockets of resistance in certain areas of encircled or bypassed Syrian Army units.

The Israelis were initially telling the world that they weren't attacking the Syrians but were just trying to clean up a PLO, terrorist phenomenon. Well, one thing led to another, and the fighting got worse and worse. A situation emerged where, as it developed, the Israeli Army surrounded Beirut and ringed it with tanks and artillery. Beirut, of course, was divided into Christian and Muslim sectors. The Israelis took the Christian sector and were now right on the edge of the Muslim sector, in which the PLO and a large, swollen Muslim population were located. The Israelis began hitting this area with air attacks, tanks, and direct artillery fire.

A day or two before the Israeli invasion of Lebanon began, which was on June 6, 1982, I believe, Phil Habib was in Europe. He was immediately rushed to Jerusalem. We took him up to see Prime Minister Begin, who solemnly assured him of the limited objectives of the Israeli attack. When Habib told Begin that he'd be going on to see President Assad of Syria, Begin said, "You can tell Assad that we're not attacking Syria. We're trying to clean this situation up. See what you can do."

During that very early period of the Israeli attack on Lebanon, remember that the Syrians had moved many anti-aircraft missile batteries into Lebanon, and the Zakleh area of Lebanon immediately leaps to mind. As the war broke out, up went the Israeli Air Force, the Syrian Air Force went up to meet it, and was immediately shot down. There was an enormous disparity between the two air forces. The Israelis lost nothing and shot down, I forget, something like 50 or more Syrian aircraft in major air battles.

The Israeli Air Force virtually wiped out the Soviet-supplied, Syrian Air Force. In the process, the Israelis used their latest techniques in which our Air Force people were very interested. At the risk of dramatizing the situation, you had a kind of prototype of Desert Storm, the war against Iraq in 1990-91. That is, the Israelis carried on a really integrated, air-ground struggle. The Israelis knocked out the Syrian Air Force and knocked out the Syrian radar and missiles, all at the same time. They also knocked out something like 225 Syrian tanks including the vaunted Soviet made T-72 tanks, and anything else that got in their way. This was all done in the name of "cleaning up the Palestinian mess."

Habib flew to Syria, met President Assad, and at 3:00 AM sent us a FLASH cable to report his meeting with Assad. Ambassador Sam Lewis and I had moved during the night up to Jerusalem to get a readout of the situation from Phil Habib. We wanted to be able to contact Prime Minister Begin, which we did at about 4:00 AM. Habib reported that President Assad sat there, absolutely calm, as if he hadn't lost his tanks, his air force, and his missiles. Assad put on a great act. Prime Minister Begin subsequently reported this to the Israeli cabinet. The net effect of it was that Assad was not about to come to Begin's terms or do anything to help Menachem Begin in this mess." From Begin's viewpoint, that reaction by Assad freed his hands to continue with the invasion of Lebanon, and continue they did. Habib...

Q: At this particular juncture, what was your reading, that is, yours and Ambassador Sam Lewis' reading, of where Prime Minister Begin stood on all of this? He had had this accident...

BROWN: Remember that a major aspect of the situation was the dominant figure of Minister of Defense Sharon. The picture that emerged was that Begin was being carried along by Sharon. However, Begin was no fool. He was the Israeli Prime Minister. Perhaps Begin's son, to this day, harbors deep resentment at the way his father was misled, but I doubted then, as I do now, that Menachem Begin was ever really in the dark.

Q: As far as you were concerned, you were dealing with an active Prime Minister Begin, who was carrying on a war.

BROWN: We were dealing with a hyperactive Defense Minister, [that is, Sharon], and a Prime Minister who was uncomfortable but who had among his top objectives the destruction of the PLO [in Lebanon]. Furthermore, if you read Ze'ev Shiff and Ehud Ya'ari's book, Israel's Lebanon War, Begin had already been in touch with the Phalangist leadership in Lebanon and had funded them to the tune of $100 million or so. In other words, Begin was looking forward to another part of the Israeli agenda. Begin's agenda involved not only the cleanup of the Palestinian mess but the destruction of the PLO as a paramilitary, terrorist structure in South Lebanon. Beyond that, Begin was looking toward the emergence of an independent, Christian-dominated Lebanese Government which could hopefully stand up to President Assad of Syria and be more, shall we say, susceptible to Israeli persuasion, to put it mildly.

So all of that play was going on at the same time. The Israelis were dealing with the Gemayels, the Bashirs, etc. [all Lebanese Phalangist leaders], hoping to install them in power and get rid of the Syrian presence in Lebanon. Now, in this situation Phil Habib, moving desperately to bring the fighting to a halt and negotiate another cease-fire, moved to the American Ambassador's residence at Yahrzeh, in the mountains above Beirut. Here we have the phenomenon of a street smart, outstanding American negotiator, Phil Habib, with all of his experience worldwide in negotiating hot situations, deeply involved in what became, more and more, an emotional involvement for him. He was watching this panorama unfold in Beirut, below him.

The Israelis were insisting that they were not doing certain things which Phil Habib damned well either saw or heard, or at least thought he saw or heard...

Q: Apparently, the Israelis, with their artillery, were very close to our Ambassador's residence.

BROWN: There were situations where Habib reported that Israeli artillery was firing from positions a couple of hundred yards away from him. The Israelis were denying it. Habib was saying: "For God's sake, they're right next door to me."

Q: He was holding out the telephone to pick up the sound of the firing of Israeli artillery.

BROWN: He certainly was, and I'll come to that. I'll read you a very short passage which relates to all of this. It appears in George Shultz's book.

Remember also that we were now in a new era in communications. Phil Habib had the use of a TACSAT, which transmitted through a small military satellite. Washington had instant communications with him, via this satellite. We didn't have this facility in Tel Aviv, but we had phone connection with the State Ops Center. So Phil Habib was now turning into an observer and not just a negotiator. He became a passionate observer or player in the whole thing. It became a very emotional experience for Habib.

At this juncture Ambassador Sam Lewis was in Washington, coping as best he could. Al Haig's tenure as Secretary of State was suddenly ending. George Shultz, in his wonderful book, Turmoil and Triumph, eloquently describes the scene where he had been tapped to leave the Bechtel Company and become the Secretary of State. However, pending his hearing and confirmation by the Senate, he couldn't make decisions. At President Reagan's request, Shultz phoned Haig and said, "The President thinks that it's time for you to leave your position as Secretary of State." This was okay, but Al Haig then lingered on in office, pending the swearing in of George Shultz.

At this time things were very messy back here in Washington. As you can see from the Shultz book, in the highest circles in Washington, there was a furor going on regarding how to handle this situation. Ed Meese [Attorney General], Jim Baker [Director of the Office of Management and Budget], and Casper Weinberger [Secretary of Defense] were livid at what the Israelis were doing. Among them, Weinberger was calling for a cutoff in supplies to the Israelis, sanctions, and so forth. President Reagan, however, didn't want to do this. Meanwhile, the situation got worse and worse.

Phil Habib's reporting from the hills above Beirut became more and more shrill, and so did his recommendations. His recommendations were not coming to us in the embassy in Tel Aviv. They were going by TACSAT right to the Operations Center in the Department of State and, of course, to the NSC [National Security Council]. For example, he recommended cutting off supplies to the Israelis. He said that they would never stop what they were doing, despite their assurances to the contrary.

In this context, just to give you a little flavor, during this relevant period, somehow I have it in mind that I negotiated nine out of 10 cease-fires. Most of them were done by phone. Some of them were, perhaps, 10 minutes long. Some of them lasted for perhaps two weeks. I've forgotten many of the details, but I was constantly in touch with David Kimche and Hanon Baron in the Israeli Foreign Ministry, who were reporting directly to Prime Minister Begin and other players on the Israeli side.

Q: Did you feel that the Israeli Foreign Ministry at that time was really one of the “players?”

BROWN: No. Or, perhaps, only in the sense of giving their judgments to Prime Minister Begin. David Kimche, who had been a top Mossad [Israeli intelligence organization] man and who had been installed in the Foreign Ministry as the new Director General, had good access to the Prime Minister. Someone had once used the expression that Kimche was the “Prince of Lebanon.” He had been a case officer for the top Christian families of Lebanon, the Gemayels, the Chamouns, and so forth. He was considered “Mr. Lebanon” in the Israeli Government, so he had that extra cachet and aura about him.

In any case the Lebanese situation worsened. The Israelis had surrounded Beirut and were bombarding it with artillery, tank fire, and air strikes. They had cut off the water and the food supply to the civilian population. Washington was just going up the wall at this situation.

The second thing, in communications terms, that I would mention to you is that this was a TV War. TV, including Israeli TV, showed the world, including Israeli audiences, pictures of Arab women coming out with dead babies and children with their limbs blown off as a result of Israeli attacks. They were coming into the streets, wailing and so forth. From a humanitarian point of view, it was just dreadful. It was terrifically poignant. This impacted directly on Israel's image, ruining it around the world. These TV images stirred up various Arab populations, including the people in our Consul General's consular district on the West Bank of the Jordan, as well as ours in the Gaza Strip, as well as the Arabs in all of the neighboring countries. All of the Arabs and Muslims were just frantic over these scenes on TV. These images were now beginning to have an impact on Israeli public opinion, the more so as the bodies of Israeli soldiers started coming home for burial. The Israelis rolled over their Opposition, but snipers, mines, explosive charges and so forth began to take their toll.

The Israeli people began to realize that they received not only fresh fruit and vegetables from Lebanon, but body bags as well were starting to come back to Israel. This really began to have an impact on them.

I'll read you a short passage from George Shultz's book, Turmoil and Triumph, covering one of the peaks of this situation in Lebanon. This is taken from pages 58 and 59 of the book. Shultz writes that one day: “I came into the Department at 5:00 AM. Habib was screaming in rage on the TACSAT. He said that the Israeli shelling of Beirut was the worst that he had seen in eight weeks of war. We had to get the Israelis to stop. Charley Hill was talking to Habib in Beirut on a telephone, on the one hand, and Deputy Chief of Mission Bill Brown, in Jerusalem, was talking on a telephone in his other hand. Brown was also holding two receivers, talking to Hill, on one hand, and Prime Minister Begin on the other. Begin was calmly denying that any shelling was taking place. This had just been confirmed by Defense Minister Ariel Sharon.

[Begin...] “said, 'There is no intent to occupy West Beirut. If there had been such an intent, I would write to Ronald Reagan,' Begin said. [He added]: 'The United States was being fed hysterical, inflated reporting,' Begin said. Hill relayed this to Habib. 'Oh, yeah,' Habib said, and he held his TACSAT earpiece out the window so that we could hear the Israeli artillery firing. Hill counted eight shells within 30 seconds from IDF [Israeli Defense Forces] artillery batteries located just below Habib's position. When Bill Brown reported Begin's assurances, we told him to tell Begin that at that very moment he was reassuring us, we could hear the noise of Israeli guns. Begin telephoned Bill Brown again. It was now 5:10 AM in Washington. The Israeli Chief of Staff reported that the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] had been using a great variety of weapons. The IDF had fired back, but only at the [point of] origin of the firing against them. The Israelis were not advancing at all. Begin said, 'Do you think that the Chief of Staff of the Israeli Defense Forces is misleading me?’”

Well, I'll stop right there, just to highlight the kind of situation that we were dealing with. This is not in Shultz's book, but I'll just continue with it. Here I was, as the Chargé d'Affaires, talking to the Prime Minister of Israel, under tremendous pressure himself. He was getting all of this on various channels from Washington, and not just from me. Israeli Foreign Minister Shamir was in Washington, and all kinds of people were reporting in on the Israeli side. Begin said, “Do you suggest that my Chief of Staff and my Defense Minister are misleading me?” I said, “I suggest that Phil Habib is reporting this enormous barrage which is going on.” I said, “Perhaps it would be useful, Mr. Prime Minister, if I met with your Defense Minister.” Begin said, “It shall be done.” Shortly thereafter I got a phone call from Defense Minister Sharon. He asked me to come over to his office, and indeed I did, later that morning.

I took with me Paul Hare, our Political Counselor; and our Military Attaché, Pete Hoag. When I arrived at Sharon's office, his ministerial office in Tel Aviv was really filled. In fact, there was standing room only. He had generals, colonels, note-takers, maps, and so forth. He proceeded in a very sarcastic, cynical manner to attack our reporting. He said, “If you had a qualified Defense Attaché there [in Beirut],” which was a dig at us, “or if you let your Defense Attachés go up [to Beirut] with us, you would see that a lot of this reporting is exaggerated. Not even on D-Day [June 6, 1944 in Normandy] was there such a barrage as Mr. Habib reports, sticking his telephone out the window.”

I said, “Mr. Minister,” and there was no more 'Ariel' and 'Bill' as this point, “I want to stress at the beginning that I intend to report this conversation in its entirety and in as much detail as I can, accurately and objectively. I just want to go through this with you, step by step. The Prime Minister has told me that nothing happened [in Beirut] last night. He said that you had told him that nothing happened last night, that there was no bombardment of West Beirut. Is that true?” Sharon answered: “Well, in response to 'provocations' and so forth, we had to respond.” I said, “Are you claiming that no Israeli tanks moved forward?” He said, “Well, there may have been a little movement on the fringes, here and there, repositioning themselves and so on. But we are not invading West Beirut,” and so forth, giving his usual spiel. I asked my note-taker to take it all down and closed by saying to Sharon: “Rest assured that I will report every word of yours that I can remember, as accurately and faithfully as I can, as you've given it to me.” Then I left Sharon's office.

I got back to my office at the embassy. As we were sending out the reporting cable on this conversation with Sharon, the phone rang again. It was David Kimche, the Director General of the Foreign Ministry. He said, “Bill, I understand that you had a conversation with the Prime Minister early this morning.” I said to myself: “Aha, and I'll bet you were listening in on an extension.” I said, “Yes, I did, David.” He said, “You reported that the Prime Minister said that nothing happened during last night.” I said, “Yes, that's what he told me he had heard from his Defense Minister and his Chief of Staff.” David Kimche said, “What he meant was that at the time you were talking, at 7:00 or 8:00 AM today, Bill, there was nothing going on.” I said, “Thank you very much, David. I'll report that as well.” In other words, the Israelis saw themselves now in a real “fix,” and so they were.

Of course, that conversation, which is in Shultz's book and which I've just skimmed over, was preceded by another. I'd called David Kimche at 4:00 AM to tell him what Charley Hill was telling me. In other words, I called Kimche to get him to wake up Prime Minister Begin. Well, the situation worsened. There were assurances and very temporary lulls, but the Israelis kept the water cut off. Food shipments into West Beirut were kept to an absolute minimum. This was extremely upsetting. I would pause here and say that, looking back on it, what we were dealing with was not just Begin or Sharon. We were dealing with an Israeli approach to crisis management of a conflict with Arabs. That is, if it comes to a showdown, you go for the jugular vein, you get your hand on the Arab's throat, whether it's surrounding his army on the other side of the Suez Canal or taking the Golan Heights, or whatever it is, you keep your hand on your opponent's throat until you get what you want. This is in contrast with their perception of an American approach, which is more humane. You go in and do what's necessary and then you negotiate. For the Israelis, allowing a paramilitary structure led by Arafat, whom they hated, to remain able to oppose them in any way was anathema. The Israelis were out to destroy this Arab paramilitary structure and, if necessary, to destroy Arafat. Indeed, we were concerned at the time that the Israelis were out to assassinate him if they could get to him.

Now, in all of this, as the situation worsened dramatically from Arafat's viewpoint, he began, through interlocutors, to approach Phil Habib with something that would allow the final resolution of this situation. That is, a cease-fire and a pullout of Arafat and his forces. This happened in August, 1982. There were all kinds of dramatic breakdowns and so forth, in which I was involved. However, I think that, rather than go on in great detail, I'll pause there. Ambassador Sam Lewis returned from home leave and engaged directly with the Prime Minister. I assisted in all of this. It went on, day and night. It was agonizing and it was horrible. Among other things, we were dealing with a very emotional Phil Habib. I think that I left Tel Aviv when the basic deal had been negotiated. That is, Arafat would be allowed to leave Lebanon, with his PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] troops. The Israelis gave us assurances that nothing would happen to the Palestinians in the refugee camps.

The Syrian forces were called the Arab Deterrent Force, or the ADF. They were allowed to get out via the route from Beirut, leading to Damascus, which had been cut by the Israelis. Under this arrangement, the Israelis would avert their gazes so as to lessen the humiliation of the departing Syrians and some of their Palestinian adherents. Some Palestinians went with the Syrians to Damascus. This is all described eloquently in Shultz's book.

I left an exhausted American Ambassador. I turned over my office to Bob Flatten, who was my successor as DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission]. I said, "Go to it, friend." Reflecting back on that, I have to say that I was an exhausted DCM after three years of this. I was in good shape, physically, but I was exhausted. I said to myself: "How much the more so Ambassador Sam Lewis must be." His fun was only just beginning, because, shortly thereafter, there came such things as the massacres at the Palestinian refugee camps of Sabra and Shatila and the surprise Reagan peace plan announced, I think, on September 1, [1982], without prior consultation with the Israelis. Ambassador Sam Lewis had to go up there and deliver this proposal to Prime Minister Menachem Begin at his residence in Nahariya, as it was released worldwide. Begin reacted very, very strongly, saying that Israel would not be treated as a banana republic.

After a fantastic tour in Tel Aviv, my wife Helen and I left Israel and went on to the University of New Hampshire. However, before leaving the subject of Israel, there are a couple of other things that I'd like to cover.

Q: And then I will have some questions.

BROWN: I alluded earlier on to the question of the tremendous strain on an embassy which was not all of that large, handling so many crises at the same time. We had a brilliant, forceful, energetic Ambassador. He had recruited a wonderful collection of Foreign Service Officers for service in the embassy in Tel Aviv. They traveled widely in Israel. Some of them spoke very good Hebrew, so through the contacts they made Ambassador Sam Lewis was better able to keep his fingers on the pulse of the various strings in the Israeli political spectrum.

In those days you might remember, notwithstanding our best efforts, we were unsuccessful in our effort to implement that portion of the Camp David discussions which was incomplete. That is, a regime to accommodate Palestinian autonomy. The Israelis stiffarmed us on this issue. The Egyptians were not willing to go beyond their position. The Palestinians would have absolutely nothing to do with it. Of course, President Assad of Syria and others were shrilly condemning the Egyptians as a bunch of sellouts to the Zionist enemy and so forth.

So our contacts with Palestinians were essentially those of Brandon Grove, then Consul General in Jerusalem, with people in Jerusalem and Muslim Arabs living on the West Bank of the Jordan River. We had another, embassy responsibility, the Gaza Strip. Well, the Gazans weren't interested, any more than the West Bankers, in getting into autonomy talks. In other words, our engagement with these people was very limited. However, we arranged for Arabic training for an officer who already spoke Hebrew. I think that his name was David Greenlee. We sent him to an intensive, Arabic language immersion course at ULPAN. As a result, he could talk with "Israeli Arabs," or, these days, you might say "Israeli Palestinians" or Palestinians with Israeli citizenship, however you want to describe it. He was therefore also able to go to Gaza, should that area show any signs of progress.

The strain on these officers, their wives, and their family lives was enormous, over a protracted period. Ambassador Sam Lewis would do everything that he could in terms of embassy functions and inviting them in to chat with him. He had an open door policy. They could debate with him. Sam and Sally held functions at home, including these officers in their manifold social and representational activities. Sam was also very demanding. He was a real professional diplomat. He was a stickler for the right procedure, as well as ensuring that their jobs were done in terms of substance. That embassy really hummed. (End of tape)

Dealing with the Israeli military establishment requires very good and well rounded people who can take it, because the Israelis are very difficult interlocutors at times. On the one hand, they love to shmooze [talk]. On the other hand, they can be quite sharp and shrill. They have a propensity to try and extract what they can from you and maneuver you. The Israeli press is sensationalist par excellence. It will do virtually anything to get an exciting story. If necessary, it will engage in misquotes, gross overinterpretation, and distortions.

In this sense I'm speaking as far as certain individuals are concerned. There are also other kinds of problems. An American diplomat working in Israel receives a large number of visitors, many of whom have their own agendas, and often are at odds with each other. At times they are at odds with elements of U.S. policy. Some of them parade themselves as having the inner ear of the highest ranking policy makers in Washington, including the White House. In other words, they suggest that you forget what the American embassy is telling you. They more or less state: "I'm giving you the real story." They speak for constituencies which are often at odds with each other.

Much has been made of the various Israeli lobbies in the United States.

Q: AIPAC [American Israeli Public Affairs Council], of course, is the big one.

BROWN: AIPAC is the big one, but there are others. Some of them are liberal in terms of political orientation. They extend across quite a broad, political spectrum. Previously, I alluded to the late Prime Minister Menachem Begin's cultivation of the Christian Fundamentalist communities in the United States, to the dismay of both my Israeli and American liberal friends. However, "There was gold in them there hills," as far as the Likud Party was concerned, and they cultivated the American fundamentalists.

There were other Christians interested in Israel, including those who were deeply concerned with access to Christian shrines in the Holy Land and the state of Christian communities there.

There was a growing Arab-American community in the United States. The number of these Arab-Americans living in the United States was increasing, as the situation in Lebanon deteriorated. Muslim Arabs living in the West Bank of the Jordan River area, and particularly in Jerusalem, Nazareth, and Bethlehem, were growing in number. Bethlehem, which we used to think of as a Christian town, where Jesus Christ is traditionally believed to have been born, was rapidly becoming a Muslim town. The Christian element in Bethlehem, ably represented by Mayor Freij, was steadily becoming more of a minority. That trend has continued over the years.

Many Christian Arabs in the Holy Land migrated to the United States. Some of them felt impelled to go into politics and, to a lesser but increasingly significant degree, they were making their views known through certain members of Congress.

There were other American elements who were disturbed at the way the Israelis handled certain matters. I'll give you an example. During my time in Israel I found that we had to deal with a problem which I had never known of previously. That is, a group known as the "Black Hebrews." [Addendum: they now refer to themselves as the "African Israelite" community.]

An American gentleman who changed his name to read "Ben Ammi Carter" and who came from either Chicago or Detroit, reportedly had a rather apocalyptic vision of the world. According to him, there would be a great disaster or series of disasters, involving fire and water. In his view his group, whom he considered the "forgotten Hebrews" or the "Black Hebrews," should reestablish themselves in the Holy Land and prepare for this apocalyptic event. Then they would reemerge and live in the post-apocalyptic era. They began moving as individuals to Israel, entering the country on visitor visas and then illegally staying on. They would go down to towns like Dimona in the Negev area, where they would pick up odd jobs. As their presence increased, the Israeli Ministry of the Interior began to ferret out these Black Hebrews and crack down on them. The ministry did this because, after Ben Ammi Carter had established himself in Israel, he set up what some people would call a cult or sect.

The Black Hebrews became a consular problem for the embassy in Tel Aviv. They were American citizens but were a very different group of American citizens. They developed means of support from their followers in the United States. One result of this was that African-Americans visiting Israel for whatever purpose were often stopped at Ben Gurion International Airport and very thoroughly interrogated. They were often subjected to body searches and so forth. Many of them deeply resented this treatment and protested to their Congressional representatives in the United States.

Ben Ammi Carter had some advisers around him who were styled as princes. Members of the group lived apart from other people and had their own, rigorous approach to life. I think that they were strict vegetarians, although I am not sure of this. They lived on a very sparse diet, dictated by the leadership. Women members of the group were supposed to thin down so that the whole membership would be able to survive a protracted apocalypse. They believed that a mountain would unfold, fire would envelop them, and they would go inside.

Bear in mind that I can't speak of this group from any first hand experience. My information was based on accounts which were reported to me by other people. Reportedly, the leaders applied very severe discipline to their followers. Members were supposed to give the leaders their passports. All of their Social Security checks and anything else of value were to be handed over. The circumstances of birth and familial relationships were dominated by the leadership. Pretty soon some members began to defect out of fear.

This situation created real, consular problems. I was involved, along with Ambassador Sam Lewis, in trying to negotiate some sort of resolution of this set of problems with the Israeli Government and, more particularly, with the Israeli Ministry of the Interior which, at that time, was headed by Dr. Yosef Burg. He was a sophisticated, Germanic Jew who spoke many languages and could pun in all of them. He was a real gentleman, but we found that we got nowhere with him in discussing this issue. So this was a problem which continued to fester during my first tour of duty in Israel. When I came back to Israel as ambassador many years later, I found that I was faced with something which I had to deal with. We'll talk about that later.

Q: I think that off mic you mentioned that it was during this time that you sensed a certain hostility on the part of African-Americans in leadership positions who visited Israel. Could you talk about your sense of this?

BROWN: Yes. I think that you are talking about a phenomenon which was a reflection of American domestic developments. Bear in mind that Martin Luther King and his followers enjoyed the support of many, very dedicated, liberal Jews, some of whom paid with their lives for this support during the time of the civil rights movement.

Q: Some of them lost their lives in Mississippi.

BROWN: Yes. Many African-American leaders had worked on overlapping, political agendas with leaders of the American Jewish community, at both the local and regional levels. I could cite many of them, including Congressman Charles Rangel [Democrat, NY] and others, who had a warm, working, political relationship with liberal Americans. These included some who happened to be American Jews as well.

I leave it to analysts of the American political scene to describe this situation, but my impression is that tensions grew in certain sectors of the African-American community vis-a-vis the American Jewish leadership. Leaders of these sectors apparently felt that the cake wasn't being sliced properly. They seemed to feel that certain African-American communities were very much getting the short end of the stick. In some cases more radical African-Americans felt that they had been discriminated against by local pawn brokers and business people, some of whom were Jews. Words and rhetoric aside, these African-Americans felt that the deck was stacked against them and that American Jewish leaders had not exercised the right kind of leadership in addressing these particular African-American problems.

Already during my first tour in Israel that feeling was occasionally apparent during the visits of certain African-Americans to Israel. I won't say that this view was held by all African-American leaders. By no means all, but by the leaders of certain groups, including those who had younger members, say those who were 40 or younger. One would notice this tendency in the entourage of these leaders, including such evidence as the body language displayed and the questions asked. This made me feel very unhappy, and I'm sure that this attitude affected the Israelis whom these African-Americans met, as well.

Well, in that atmosphere concern was expressed about the plight, if you will, of the Black Hebrews down there in the heat of the Negev Desert area. They were living in an unregulated status and were liable to deportation. Occasionally, officials from the Israeli Ministry of the Interior mentioned possible deportation of the Black Hebrews as a matter under consideration. So sometimes there was some conflict in that respect. I was involved in that as well.

Rarely did I see Arab-American visitors to Israel in those days, but there were American Christians who might not have been Arabs but who felt deep, deep pain over the plight of Christian Arabs within Israel. This tendency was noticeable across the denominational front. You would find this attitude among both Catholics and Protestants, to say nothing of Orthodox Christians. A large majority of the Christian Arabs in the Holy Land were followers of the Greek Orthodox Church. We didn't get into their problems too much, but I was keenly aware of the difficulties faced by Greek diplomatic counterparts in that respect.

Q: Bill, I have a number of questions that I would like to ask before we leave this subject. First, what was the feeling, at the time, of the Israeli invasion of Lebanon? Much has been made of the fact that Secretary of State Haig basically winked when Ariel Sharon talked about invading Lebanon. What were you getting at that time, about this particular matter?

BROWN: I was getting an earful. You have accounts, including Haig's own book, Caveat, in which he defends what he said and did. He denies having given Sharon the green light or permissive wink, or whatever you want to call it, for Israel to invade Lebanon. There are other accounts available in published form to which I would call your attention, including the book, Israel's Lebanon War, by Ze'ev Shiff and Ehud Ya'ari. The same subject has been treated elsewhere.

At this particular time and on this particular issue I had a very good contact in none other than Mordecai Zippori, a hard line Israeli a member of Likud and a member of the Herut before that. He was a former career military officer who had risen within the Likud Party and the political structure to become deputy defense minister when Weizman quit, and Prime Minister Begin took over the portfolio himself. Begin made Zippori his deputy defense minister. Zippori ran the day to day affairs of the Ministry of Defense. He was the gentleman with whom I dealt on Lebanon and other, military matters as well. Subsequently, in the new cabinet, when Ariel Sharon came in as Minister of Defense, Zippori and Sharon were at odds, so Zippori was moved out of that job. They made him Minister of Communications.

Now, there was no love lost between Sharon and many other ex-military types, including Zippori. For his part Zippori said to me: "What is the real message on Lebanon?" I gave him chapter and verse on U.S. policy on Lebanon. Zippori would shake his head and say, "Bill, that's not what I'm hearing." It got to the point, during the preparations for the Sharon visit to the United States in May, 1982, and other matters where we were delivering the line as set forth in State Department cables of instruction to us, only to find that the Israelis were getting other versions of U.S. policy. As instructed, we faithfully presented the official line to the Israeli Government, chapter and verse. So the official message was being delivered, but Zippori was not alone in questioning what the U.S. message really was regarding Lebanon. For purposes of this discussion I have chosen to highlight what Zippori said.

We finally got to the point where in the absence of Sam Lewis I invited Zippori to my residence and showed him the green copy of an action cable from Washington. I said, "Here it is, chapter and verse. You'll notice that the name on the bottom of this cable is the name of the Secretary of State, Al Haig. Here it is!" He read the cable, digested it, and said, "Thank you very much, Bill, but I have to tell you that that's not what's being reported in the Israeli cabinet meetings. I sit there and listen to another view of the matter."

What he meant was that Minister of Defense Ariel Sharon was conveying, by his own means and in his own way, his version of what he thought was American policy. He had visited Washington and talked with Secretary Haig and others. Don't forget that the Israeli ambassador to the United States at this time was Moshe Arens who, for all of his American accent and American upbringing, was a hawkish, Likud representative. I consider him to this day to be a good friend, but he was then as always a Likud member. If you look at the memoirs of former Secretary of State George Shultz and others, you'll see that Ambassador Arens was delivering the "Begin line." He saw Secretary of State Haig, when he had access to him.

In this particular case, I called someone in Washington on a secure phone. I said, "You have given me an appreciation of what Al Haig said, in a meeting with Israeli Defense Minister Sharon, or with Ambassador Arens. There were note-takers, both Israeli and U.S. present. I'm not disputing that report of what was said. However, was there a subsequent meeting?" My interlocutor said, "Well, after that meeting there was a private meeting with Secretary." I said, "Well, can you tell me what happened at that meeting?" My interlocutor said, "No, that was an 'Eyes Only' conversation."

I was left with this lingering concern that something may have been said at the subsequent meeting which was then elaborated, distorted, or spun by an Israeli, unbeknownst to me. Those things happen. And they happen, not only in U.S.-Israeli relations but they happen in many other cases.

Q: The Israeli embassy in the United States, probably as much as the American embassy in Tel Aviv, was also in bed with our cabinet officials, members of Congress, and other figures. Were you concerned that, because Ambassador Arens was there in Washington, there was a spin that was coming out to Tel Aviv that the Israelis were not playing a straightforward game, or was it a political tactic? Was that a concern of yours at the time?

BROWN: You said rightly that the Israeli embassy in Washington had been, is, and will be heavily involved with American figures, across a very broad spectrum. This doesn't just involve the Israeli embassy in Washington. There are Israeli consulates and the UN Mission in New York, friends, and so forth. The Israelis in the U.S. work energetically, day and night, across a very wide spectrum of issues. Ambassadors are supposed to echo and present the views of their government. Ambassador Arens was no ordinary diplomat. He is and was a Likud Party member or, if you will, before the Likud Party was established, a member of the Herut Party, born, bred, and raised in that way, long before he even emigrated to Israel. So Arens, as an ambassador, would see things first as Israeli ambassador, in a very prestigious and important post, but also as a prominent member of the Likud. Remember that as a prominent member of the Labour Party Yitzhak Rabin had been Israeli ambassador to the United States.

In any case, Arens went back to Tel Aviv after being ambassador to the United States and became Israeli Minister of Defense. And he is once again Israeli Minister of Defense, as we speak, in 1999. As is the case in the United States Foreign Service, an Israeli ambassador to the U.S. in certain situations may be a career diplomat. In my time I dealt with an Israeli Ambassador, Moshe Arad, an excellent career diplomat who happened to have been appointed through the influence of Shimon Peres, who is a member of the Labour Party. However, whatever his personal feelings, he echoed and presented the views of the Shamir Government later on, as faithfully as he could. He did his job. So it varies greatly, Stuart. However, one must never forget the possibility that, with all of this confusion which can exist, particularly in times of crisis, even within the American body politic at its highest levels, an Israeli Mission can get a variety of conflicting signals from the U.S. Government.

That subject is dealt with in George Shultz's memoirs where he discusses having a frank discussion with Arens. He knew Arens, had dealt with him before, and was acquainted with Arens' hawkish reputation, if you will. Shultz said to Arens: "Look, I want to be straight with you. We have a crisis here which is very severely impacting Israel's image and which now has reached the stage where it gravely affects our relations with you. You had better do this or that. Otherwise, this will have very deep implications for us."

In the situation which I have highlighted here, that is, when Yasser Arafat [the PLO leader] was on the edge, the Arafat structure almost broke up. It felt itself surrounded and beleaguered. The Israelis had to decide whether to allow the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] to ease off, to let them slip out of their encirclement, or to let them go someplace else and regroup. Should the Israelis let this Arafat, who was dedicated to their destruction, regroup elsewhere with his military and paramilitary forces and start all over again? Or should the Israelis attack him? What should they do?

An understandable, American or European approach might be: "For goodness sake, you've humiliated Yasser Arafat and you've broken up his presence and structure in Lebanon. Let him go to a place like Tunis. He won't be a problem there." Well, some Israelis would go along with this kind of attitude. Other Israelis would have a very different view. In fact, Arafat's fortunes went way down as he was shipped or transported to Tunis. However, he made his comeback in a very different atmosphere.

Q: When you were in Israel, one of your advantages was that you were coming from "outside." This hadn't been your area of experience. Did you see a strong element of what I can't describe any better than racism as far as the Israelis' attitude toward the Arabs was concerned. Did they feel that the Arabs were a lesser breed? Did they feel that if they fired artillery at the Arabs, after all, this wasn't quite the same thing as having artillery fired into an Israeli kibbutz, or something like that? Were you able to see anything like that?

BROWN: Look, there are Israelis with a superb cultural and academic background. We used to use the expression, "Orientalists." These were men and women in the upper strata of the intelligentsia who spoke fluent Arabic, Farsi, Kurdish, or other languages of the Middle East. They were tremendously educated and deeply steeped in the Middle East. However, that didn't make them automatically pro-Arab or pro-Muslim. Some of those individuals were, in the modern term "peaceniks." Others were tough. They had gone through Oxford and other great, European universities, or the finest Israeli universities. They had had classical educations. However, their outlook, training and experience contributed to an existing hard line mentality.

Over time there is nothing like around the clock confrontation to harden prejudices on both sides. This phenomenon was also noticeable in this case. The Israelis had a significantly expanding Israeli Arab community. The demographics of all of this situation continued to work. During my first tour of duty in Israel, and this trend continued during my second time in Israel, the proportion of Israeli citizens of Arab origin was increasing. This was without reference to what the Israelis call “aliyah,” immigration of Jews from Europe into Israel. The Israelis worried about the true loyalties of their own, Arab citizens.

There were other entities involved in Israel. I would mention the Bedouin, a lesser minority on whom ordinary Arabs looked down. The Israelis used the Bedouin as trackers in the Israeli Army in operations against Arab terrorists. They spoke a form of Arabic and fiercely resented what they felt was Arab discrimination against them. They were the lesser beings of the Sinai Desert.

Another important element here was the Druze, who straddle the Lebanese-Israeli border and also live up in the Golan Heights area. The Druze of Lebanese-Israeli border region threw their lot in with the Israelis. They not only received but “demanded” full Israeli citizenship and the right to serve, even the right to be conscripted in the Israeli Defense Forces, where they served loyally and became some of the toughest soldiers. You may talk about tough Israeli tactics in handling Arab riots and demonstrations. The Israeli Border Police, and particularly the Druze elements thereof are the toughest. They can swear in Arabic, using the lowest form of Arab obscenities. Their own formula for handling a riot by an Arab crowd is awesome, to put it mildly.

So there are these overlays that have an impact here. On any given day I could show you a peacenik with outstanding Orientalist credentials. I could show you a professor who might be concurrently a colonel in Israeli Military Intelligence and who was a governor of some region on the West Bank. The Israeli government often used these gentlemen with their Arab, Muslim academic backgrounds. Some of them may have started out gentle and then turned tough. At the same time, rising within the Israeli system were Sephardic Israelis who were the sons and daughters of people who had been driven out of Algeria, Tunisia, Morocco, Iran, Iraq, Syria, and so forth. They would bring to the table very strong attitudes on how to handle Arabs.

There were Jews of Ashkenazi [i.e., European] origin who were liberal, on the one hand, and supporters of the Labour Party in relative terms. However, having handled successive conflicts as members of the Israeli Defense Forces, they had hardened over time. There were others who, like Menachem Begin, were seized with the Holocaust kind of mentality and who tended to exaggerate and equate President Assad of Syria with Hitler and, along with him, other bad characters in the Arab world.

In all of this there were excellent Israeli radio and communications specialists who carefully monitored the sermons being given on Friday mornings in the various mosques located nearby and throughout the Middle East. They listened to the words of Anwar Sadat of Egypt before, if you will, he became enlightened on the prospects of peace with Israel. I saw a collection of Sadat's earlier remarks which were chilling in echoing certain, negative comments about the Jews.

Then, behind all of this, there was propaganda being ground out by the Arab state propaganda machines. As we dealt then, so we were dealing later, even at the height of Israeli-Egyptian peace negotiations, with an Egyptian press which was turning out, and I saw these, stereotyped cartoons of Menachem Begin as a cobra. The cobra was reared up and had its hood out, facing you, with its venom spitting at you, marked with the Star of David. The Egyptian press contained the crudest forms of incendiary cartoons and propaganda being ground out, even at the peak, if you will, of Israeli-Egyptian peace negotiations. These would be called to our attention. We would be urged to bring these to the attention of the Egyptian authorities, who would dismiss these as examples of a free press and evidence that people have their feelings.

Q: It's an example of the Middle East.

BROWN: To say nothing of Soviet propaganda. During my time in Moscow and on a daily basis I had had a stomach full of articles and illustrations in Pravda and Izvestia of hook-nosed Jews, with their hands and feet drenched in Arab blood. There would be illustrations of Israelis in Storm Trooper boots stomping on innocent Arabs. All of this horrendous propaganda from various sources went on. This is something that you cannot just dismiss. It had its effect. These stereotypes from all sides, and I stress this, emerged on different sides of the equation.

Q: In a way this is something which would be somewhat removed, but still within the same context, or perhaps the consular context or even beyond that, but what about extremely Orthodox Jews? Who was it, was it Ludovicker and other sects...

BROWN: Already during the first of my three assignments in Israel, and this was a much longer period of time than I expected to spend in that country, Israeli coalition politics had worked to the benefit of these emergent, political parties. First of all, there were the Orthodox Jews, and their organization was and is called the National Religious Party. They were hard line, they recorded a significant vote, and members of this group held important positions in the Israeli cabinet.

Then there was the group called Ultra Orthodox Jews, who were even more conservative than the others. These people belonged to a number of smaller parties. Israeli elections to Parliament are conducted on the basis of proportional representation. You don't vote for individuals but rather for a party list. If a given party or even one person posing as a party could get 1% of the total vote in a given electoral district, he or she would get a seat in the Knesset. So this arrangement drives various constituencies to coalesce to get that 1% or whatever additional number of votes they could get. The elections themselves are just the first stage. Then, in the later negotiations, they could bargain on that basis for the formation of coalitions. The Labour Party and Likud, the two major parties, approach, and are approached by, these lesser parties, which ask: "What will you give me?" So finally there may be a Knesset member who is a liberal, Labour Party sympathizer. However, the arithmetic drives him to negotiate, say, with an ultra Orthodox group which is being wooed by the Likud Party.

In that process of bargaining, what are they asking for? They're asking for more money in exchange for the support of so many seats. They may also want cabinet or sub-cabinet positions. As an extreme example, I've known of cases involving an ultra-orthodox party, which was anti-Zionist. Their position is that they do not believe in a Zionist government. They believe that a true government will be formed only after the Messiah arrives. Only then, they say, you can have a Zionist government. Until then, they say that they will not accept full ministerial positions in a government which is allegedly Zionist. However, they can be something else. They might accept sub-ministerial positions or the position of Director General of a government ministry or service. Meanwhile, they want their own schools and don't want to do military service, because that runs against their religious principles. However, they want the equivalent of what veterans get after performing Israeli military service. For example, this might include so many years of guaranteed educational benefits. They want their young men to go into special schools, or "Yeshiva," where they study the Torah as they teach it. They also ask for hospitals, community centers, and other goodies. In short, they want a guarantee that they will continue to share in the power structure. They want so many seats and committee assignments in the Knesset and so many positions as cabinet ministers, sub-ministers, and positions as senior civil servants. However, they do not want to serve in the military and they do not support the Zionist program.

Then there are splits and divisions among these smaller parties and groups. There are also rivalries of very peculiar origin, based on the Lithuanian, Polish, and Baltic groups from which they come. For example, a man may be designated as the unquestioned leader of a sect. Very often this position is inherited or comes down from a brother, nephew, or other, family member. These people are so revered that it may be difficult for an outsider fully to understand. Often there are rival sects with their own, particular views on how questions involving diet, marriage, family life, and education should be resolved.

Until now I've been speaking of a significantly European-based form of ultra-orthodoxy. A relatively new form of ultra-orthodoxy has emerged...

Q: This was during your first tour in Israel.

BROWN: Yes. It emerged, but it wasn't nearly as strong as when I came back to Israel as ambassador. However, it's worth noting. A Sephardic, ultra-orthodox group emerged, some of whose leaders had sat at the feet, as it were, of European, Ashkenazi, and ultra-orthodox leaders. These Sephardic leaders have adopted Ashkenazi views and added to them their own spin, if you will. Now they appeal to Sephardic, ultra-orthodox communities who originated in Morocco or elsewhere in Africa. These divisions and splits go on and on. They played a much more significant role years later, when I returned to Israel as ambassador. However, these divisions were already distinguishable.

Q: In the work of the embassy, particularly at the consular level, did you find that the leadership of these ultra-orthodox groups was in Brooklyn or somewhere else in the world? I assume that these groups could be very demanding.

BROWN: You are speaking of those of them who have an American base. It's true of those communities that, having suffered near liquidation under the Nazis, that is, their fathers and grandfathers were liquidated, many of them re-established themselves in the United States. Then they went forth to multiply. Their families are something to behold. Some of them have 10, 12, and more children. I've been in places where USAID [United States Agency for International Development] funded a wing of their hospital. I was proudly shown a woman who had given birth to even more than the 10 or 12 children.

As you know, with your consular background, the birth of additional children brings a whole bevy of consular problems. People get married and have children. In some cases those kids have American citizenship if their parents had it. They travel back and forth between Israel and the United States. They are educated both in the Israel and in the United States. Funds are raised, political parties emerge, alliances are formed, and rivalries develop. It's a remarkable phenomenon.

Q: Two last questions on this subject. What about human rights reports? We're now well past the period of the Carter administration, which made much of the issue of human rights. However, Congress during the Ford administration required the State Department to prepare annual, human rights reports on virtually all countries of the world. These annual reports are now well ingrained in our system. The section on human rights in Israel were always a bone of contention.

BROWN: You mentioned the Carter administration, in which Pat Derian was Assistant Secretary of State for Humanitarian Affairs. She picked up the humanitarian torch and went at it with a will. In many cases she ran straight into the resistance or hostility of foreign cultures, governments, and officials in various Foreign Ministries who were terribly concerned that a distorted picture was conveyed to Washington or came out of Washington. That included Israeli officials. (End of tape)

Meanwhile, there was a situation developing in the Israel occupied territories which we call the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. During my first tour in Israel there was also the Sinai Desert area, although, at that time, this wasn't much of a problem because the Sinai is so sparsely populated with Bedouin, who are lapping up Israeli largesse. They were being educated, vaccinated, and provided with various jobs by the Israeli Government. It can be argued that they were enjoying life as they never enjoyed it previously, under Egyptian administration. So the Sinai was not a problem in that context.

However, in human rights and reporting terms there was a problem both in the West Bank and Gaza. These are areas which have been under Israeli occupation since at least 1957. The Israeli legal establishment and the Foreign Ministry immediately present the argument that these areas cannot be dealt with in ordinary, human rights reporting circumstances under the various Geneva conventions. The Israelis, as an occupying power, felt that they had certain responsibilities to fulfill. They argued that they were doing their best to give the people in these areas the best possible standard of living, including health and economic services. They pointed out that there are terrorists within these areas who are working steadily to terrorize the population, as well as to terrorize Israelis, including Israelis who were now moving to, building, and occupying settlements in these areas. Remember, it's not just the West Bank. The Gaza Strip is also involved in this situation. There were not so many people involved in Gaza, but the situation was equally explosive. Clashes were taking place as Palestinian nationalism took hold in the occupied territories through the years and as the Israelis cracked down against this or that demonstration.

Now came the TV age. I mentioned in a previous session of this interview the particularly dramatic and poignant scene of a young Arab girl, who happened to be the daughter of the President of a Palestinian university, shot in the leg by the Israelis during a demonstration there. That sort of image sent our human rights people in the State Department up the wall. It also sent the Israelis up the wall in response to our presentation of this case.

This is not just a problem of a Likud administration under the Menachem Begin Government. This was a problem involving the Israeli occupation of these territories, which were administered by the Israeli Ministry of Defense. So we were not just talking about Menachem Begin and his Likud allies. We were talking about the Israeli military administration, using civilian experts, many of whom were well versed in Arabic and Muslim customs. They were coping with a situation which started during the Labour Party Government, involving small, highly-charged settlements, some of them in highly explosive areas, such as Hebron itself and outside other hot spots.

There were in your face incidents involving highly ideologically and, in some cases, religiously motivated Israelis, some of them speaking English with American-like accents.

Q: That's right. These people, speaking with American accents, seem to be among the most militant of the Israelis.

BROWN: They were very militant. However, be careful, because those apparently American accents tend to be overdramatized in the presentation of these incidents in the media. These people are a minority but an articulate minority. Beware of what later became such an easy way of characterizing them as American-based nuts. No, we're talking about something much broader than that, in which some people with apparently American accents loomed large.

Q: It's easier for journalists to interview them, for one thing.

BROWN: That's right. And some of these settlers are American citizens or claim American citizenship. They may be dual citizens of the United States and of Israel.

By the way, you as a consular officer, with a consular background, can bear witness to our evolving attitudes during our respective careers regarding matters such as dual citizenship. During my time at the consulate general in Hong Kong I remember and may have told you of my having confiscated the passport of a Chinese who may have gone to Taiwan, using Taiwan documents, and voted there.

U.S. Supreme Court rulings over the years have been such that, by the time I arrived in Israel as DCM [deputy chief of mission] during the American election campaign of 1980, the rules on voting in foreign elections and the implications of serving in foreign armed forces have changed substantially. One day I was coming into the embassy and found myself walking toward the Marine Security Guard behind an Israeli soldier in uniform, who had an automatic weapon slung over his shoulder and a Yarmulke on his head.

He approached the Marine Guard at the entrance gate. I said to him: "Excuse me. Can I help you? Whom are you looking for?" He said, "I'm looking for the consul. I've got to cast my absentee ballot in the American elections." Of course, in those earlier days Americans living in Israel had been tipped off not to take an oath of allegiance to the Israeli Government and not to do this or that. When they were conscripted into the Israeli Defense Forces they were often put under the handkerchief. They were not required to take an oath of allegiance to Israel, so they could look at somebody in the eye and say, "I was drafted. It wasn't my fault. I didn't take an oath of allegiance to the Israeli Government." They would try and maintain their citizenship in that way. Some were able to do this, and some were unsuccessful with this explanation.

Over the years this line of policy evolved to a remarkable degree. Many Israelis served in the Israeli Army, held dual citizenship, and voted by absentee ballots in American elections.

Q: We're getting away from the annual human rights report issued by the State Department.

BROWN: Okay. On the human rights front already, back in my time in the Department of State, this report was beginning to be prepared on an annual basis. In the preparation of these reports the Department seeks first drafts from its constituent posts. For example, the American embassy in Tel Aviv prepares the first draft of the report on Israel. The Embassy also has jurisdiction over American interests in the Gaza Strip. The American consulate general in Jerusalem has in its consular jurisdiction Jerusalem and what we call the West Bank. Many Israelis call the West Bank "Judea and Samaria." So there is a built-in tension here between various reporting elements.

The staff of the consulate general in Jerusalem is bombarded, day and night, with stories of Israeli atrocities and violations of human rights and Arab dignity. These reports relate not only to Jerusalem but more especially to areas of the West Bank. In the preparation of these reports our people visit Israeli prisons and observe the Israeli military justice system and Israeli detention and interrogation practices.

As the Israelis watch this process, they say, "But you've got to distinguish between 'normal' court practices and a situation of 'occupation.' That is a special situation and should be treated separately. We've got the most liberal democracy in the world, with its independent Supreme Court and the High Court. Come and see our judicial system. Come and see how it functions."

Melding the Israeli normal court practices and those in the occupied areas is a challenge in the best of circumstances. Then you get into critical situations, including the Lebanese overlay, such as I've described here, including Israeli bombardment of Lebanese areas. The atmosphere then becomes supercharged, as it were, across the whole front. Relatives of Palestinians living in the West Bank and Jerusalem are being killed in southern Lebanon. Terrible things happen, and they're being portrayed on television.

Israeli peaceniks in those days were a small but growing group of people. They were incensed at what was happening to their international image and their domestic, civilian life. What is happening to our country, they ask, particularly as this is portrayed on TV. Protest movements have emerged in Israel itself. As the body bags come home to Israel, the protest movements grow in size, and these people are bending our ears with what they see as wrong with Israeli society and, in particular, the Likud government. So already, back then, the atmosphere was getting pretty charged up. By the time I returned to Israel as ambassador, all of this had further developed.

Q: When you left Israel toward the end of 1982, Bill, and we'll stop at this point, did you feel that a very significant thing had happened during your time in the country? That developed almost at the end of the honeymoon feeling toward Israel in the United States. Originally, there had been a feeling in the U.S. that the Israelis could almost do no wrong and that the situation there was almost like paradise. That had been the attitude. Then, all of a sudden, with TV images of the Israeli invasion of Lebanon, there was very little left of the previous feeling of little Israel fighting off the Arab hordes. Did you feel that this was happening?

BROWN: Israel suffered terribly from what was happening in the West Bank and Gaza and in southern Lebanon. This had a very significant and negative impact on the Israeli image.

At the same time, other things were happening elsewhere among Israel's neighbors. You have to remember, Stu, that in the midst of all that I've been describing, there was a conservative or fundamentalist uprising in Syria. President Assad responded to this by surrounding the people in several Syrian cities and slaughtering something like 20,000 to 30,000 of his own people, in the most brutal way, using tanks, artillery, and aerial bombardment.

Q: Thomas Friedman covered that very thoroughly in his book, From Beirut to Jerusalem.

BROWN: Yes. Other things were happening elsewhere. There was the situation in Iran, which impacted on the American and Western European views of that country. Even though the Iranians are not Arabs, they are Muslims, and that particular brand of Islamic fundamentalism at that time, and what they were doing to each other, their minority groups, and their neighbors is another aspect of the same situation. Then there was Saddam Hussein, and all of that. There was the assassination of Anwar Sadat in Egypt and riots in Egypt carried out by fundamentalists there. There was the growing plight of the Coptic Christians in Egypt. So other things were also impinging on the overall Israeli image.

It is true that Israel was suffering badly in terms of its image, at this particular juncture. However, it is also true that other things were happening which played into the negative stereotypes concerning Israel in the U.S. and elsewhere.

Q: That is, of the Arabs and Muslims.

BROWN: Yes, of Arabs and Muslims. Unfortunately, those two words are often equated. It's unfair, but there we are.

Q: Well, we'll pick this up from this rather benign spot in Tel Aviv to a really tense situation in New Hampshire. [Laughter]

BROWN: Okay. I spent an academic year teaching a course on Arab and Israeli relations. It turned out that the course dealt at length with the situation in Lebanon. However, the course was ostensibly on Arab/Israeli relations. I taught another course on China at the same time, at the University of New Hampshire.

Q: We'll pick this up, then.

Today is May 19, 1999. Bill, we now have you leaving Tel Aviv, and you're off to the University of New Hampshire. When was this?

BROWN: I left Israel in the latter half of August, 1982. I'm a little fuzzy about the exact date. This is relevant because all hell was breaking loose on the Lebanon War front. I might just say a brief word about this because, two days ago [May 17, 1999], the long-awaited Israeli elections took place. One of the features of that election was that the incumbent Prime Minister, Bibi Netanyahu, used security as a theme piece, implying that his opponents would be weak toward the Palestinians, Israel's opponents, and so forth. This makes me laugh in this peculiar sense.

Netanyahu's main opponents in the race for Prime Minister were Ehud Barak, former Chief of Staff of the Israeli Defense Forces, who has personally killed more Palestinians than, I think, many people would believe. Barak is a man, and I'll talk about him later when I get to my ambassadorship in Israel, who came up on the route of Special Operations. Barak was a key planner in the raid on Entebbe, Uganda. He wasn't on the plane which landed there, but he was in another aircraft farther back, circling, or something like that. He was a key planner in that extremely delicate and ultimately highly successful rescue operation. Barak was the man who led the hit teams in connection with the hijacking of the SABENA [Belgian airline] airliner. He was dressed up in a mechanic's white uniform. The plane had been boarded and hijacked by Palestinians. He led the Israeli rescue team, dressed as a mechanic. During this operation the whole Palestinian hit team was eliminated.

Barak appeared one night on the streets of Beirut with a colleague who, I think, was Sha'hak. Sha'hak was also a key player, though somewhat in the background, in the Mordecai camp in this recent political campaign. Both Barak and Mordecai were dressed as women who appeared before the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] headquarters in Beirut after a PLO raid. They asked the guard for a light and then, after killing him, went into the PLO headquarters. The two of them then knocked off the top PLO leadership in a very daring raid and were whisked out.

So for Bibi Netanyahu to picture himself as the protector of Israeli security and trying to portray Barak as weak was a bit far-fetched, I thought, as far as the average Israeli's image of Barak was concerned.

The second individual was General Mordecai. He was of Kurdish, Jewish ancestry. He came to Israel at the bottom of the Sephardic scale, was conscripted into the Army, and then worked his way up. Mordecai had a tremendous record as a combat soldier. He was in the Chinese Farm operation, as it was called, on the Egyptian front, which involved an assault on a key Egyptian fortress in which his unit took very heavy losses.

Q: This was in the Yom Kippur War of 1973.

BROWN: Yes. Mordecai was a Brigade Commander in OPERATION LETANI in 1978, before I arrived in Israel. He went deep into Lebanon in response to a terrorist attack. In the Lebanon War of my time [1982], Mordecai was the commander who led the direct assault against PLO regular forces, if you will. That was really no contest. Mordecai had a whole string of tough, military assignments, and I'll come back to that subject when I describe the period when I was ambassador to Israel. He was later the commander of the Northern Front in Israel. I don't think that you could find an individual who was more of a soldier's soldier.

I thought that it was a bit much for Netanyahu to attack Barak and Mordecai as soft. Well, a day or two before the election, Mordecai suddenly withdrew and asked his followers among the voters to support Barak. Two days later, after a strenuous campaign, Barak emerged as the new Prime Minister of Israel.

In my discussion of the Lebanon War I spoke not only of the book Turmoil and Triumph by former Secretary of State George Shultz, which gives you the Washington perspective in some detail, as former Secretary of State Al Haig left the Department at the beginning of the Lebanon War [in 1982]. Haig was followed as Secretary of State by George Shultz. I also called attention to a book by two Israeli authors, Ze'ev Schiff and Ehud Ya'ari, called, Israel's Lebanon War. They describe this war in great detail, the buildup to it, the secret Israeli negotiations with the leadership of the Christian Phalangists, the Israeli funding of the Phalangists, and then the whole campaign in Lebanon, which was led by Ariel Sharon.

I have already noted how, among other things, very early in Israel's Lebanon War, Sharon expanded it from something that had been billed as a "40 kilometer effort" to rid southern Lebanon of PLO artillery, including Katusha rockets and 130 mm. artillery which could hit the northern borders of Israel. He expanded the initial effort to a much larger campaign.

Beginning on June 8, 1982, the Israelis, in a well-planned operation, executed something of great, political significance, the attack on Syrian facilities in Lebanon. This was done, contrary to the impression of many members of the Israeli cabinet. The Israelis attacked Syrian ground, air, and missile defenses around Zakleh. When the Syrians responded by sending in their Soviet-made MiG fighters and using a Soviet air defense system. I suspect that the Syrians even had Soviet advisers present, down to the battalion level, including some in Syria. On the first day the Syrians lost 29 fighters, their entire missile defense system, and something like 200 Soviet-made tanks.

Those events caused a great commotion in Washington, out of fear that this campaign, however it had been described to us, would now lead to an Israeli-Syrian war. Phil Habib [then Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs] was dispatched to the scene. He went to Damascus, Syria, and came back from a futile effort to broker a cease-fire.

Apart from all of that, there was a very interesting, technical aspect here. I would say that in operational terms you could describe this fighting as a “mini-Persian Gulf War.” That is, the use of the latest, if you will, techniques to detect and eliminate Soviet-made missile batteries by using their radar emissions. The Syrian jets suddenly heard Beethoven in their ears, just before being shot out of the sky! The Israelis controlled the whole battlefield.

I might add that this was of very great interest to professional U.S. military people from the Pentagon and elsewhere as to how this was done. The Israelis described all of this to us. After all, they were using American-built equipment: F-16s, F-15s, and all kinds of other, sophisticated material which we made and which they improved and supplemented. In technical, professional planning terms, it was quite an operation which was of great interest back in Washington. The lessons of this engagement were applied in subsequent years.

I left Israel with my wife Helen. We took a little side trip to Greece, Turkey, Crete, and Spain. We arrived at the University of New Hampshire on about September 1, 1982, where I was a Diplomat in Residence. The arrangement was that I could really do what I wanted to do, but I was signed up to teach two courses: one on China and one on Arab-Israeli relations. As we arrived at the campus of the University of New Hampshire, to Helen's chagrin she found that I had signed up for a tiny graduate student's or faculty member's apartment. It was really small, but I was close to the campus and could walk to work.

When we arrived on campus, there was a worldwide announcement of the Reagan Peace Plan, which is described in George Shultz's book. Ambassador Sam Lewis has discussed it in his interview with you. It was a very well-intentioned plan which caught not only the Arabs by surprise but was also a surprise to Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin as well. Begin berated Ambassador Sam Lewis and Washington for springing this on him without prior consultation.

This peace plan went nowhere, although a great effort was put into it. It involved a Jordanian option. I would say that in typical fashion King Hussein of Jordan went along with this plan to a certain point. However, as always, he had an escape hatch open.

Q: Did you have the feeling that this plan was one of those things that was put together in Washington after a great deal of difficulty? However, the field wasn't consulted, as so often happens. This happened with President Carter and his disarmament plan, which was opposed by the embassy in Moscow.

BROWN: That's right. Well, here you have an example of the great problem in dealing with the Middle East in terms of a new initiative. The dilemma, from the Washington policy planning viewpoint, is that, if you consult with other countries, there is a considerable risk of “leaks.” If you really consult, since it involves the Israelis and the occupied territories, you have to consult the Prime Minister of Israel in the middle of a war. That's a very difficult thing to do. That remains a dilemma in terms of major policy initiatives involving the Middle East. If you consult other countries, how much time do you really give them? How much real consultation do you go through?

Remember now that President Anwar Sadat of Egypt was dead. President Mubarak, his replacement, was very cautious. He faced great difficulties in view of the Israeli-Lebanon war and how to handle that. Other Arab countries were very concerned about what was described as a slaughter in Lebanon. They were at cross purposes with each other, which made things very difficult. In these circumstances Washington decided to handle this peace initiative in that way.

A great deal of thought and effort had been put into this initiative. We had some really skilled people back in Washington. Nick Veliotis was the Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern Affairs. Charley Hill was a key adviser to Secretary Shultz and one of his speechwriters. He was also Executive Secretary of the State Department but he was really much more than that. Also contributing to this peace initiative was Hal Saunders in INR [Bureau of Intelligence Research]. There was a wealth of really experienced talent in Washington.

In 1985 after his retirement from the Department of State and harking back to this initiative, Ambassador Sam Lewis said in his interview in this Oral History program, something like: "This was a noble effort with very worthy aims. However, the timing was wrong and, if anything, set back our relationship with the Israelis." So, there we were.

However, in any case I was arriving at the University of New Hampshire at about this time. Here was a brand new peace initiative for the Middle East, the Lebanon War, and the whole bit, just as I was about to start teaching a course on Arab-Israeli relationships.

By the time I began teaching my course, a second event hit like a bombshell. That is, the massacre or slaughter, however you want to describe or characterize it, at the Palestinian refugee camps at Sabra and Shatila just South of Beirut. I don't know whether the exact facts concerning this event will ever be known. However, the Israelis had overall responsibility. They had launched a campaign in Lebanon and had taken this area. Yasser Arafat had departed Lebanon under a deal brokered by Phil Habib [Deputy Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs]. One of the key elements of the undertakings given to Arafat in this deal was that Palestinian refugee camps, containing those Palestinians that Arafat was leaving behind, would be protected.

Ariel Sharon was the Israeli Minister of Defense. The Israeli General on the spot was approached by the Lebanese Phalangists, who discussed the general situation with him. Shall we say, under his nose, the Phalangists went in with knife and gun and proceeded to slaughter Palestinians in those camps, men, women, and children. This harks back to the unfavorable comments made by certain Israelis about the nature of the Phalangists in the Lebanon cauldron. In this situation nobody's hands were clean. When one side got the leverage or felt that it had the upper hand, the result was mighty dirty business, to put it mildly.

The slaughter at these refugee camps caused a worldwide sense of horror. Certainly, given the Israeli free press and television, this had a terrible impact in Israel. Ariel Sharon was forced to resign his post as Minister of Defense. A formal inquiry was opened into these events. The Chief of Staff of the Israeli Defense Forces, General Rafel Eytan, was implicated in it, but it was noted that he was about to retire anyway. I guess that his application for retirement had already been submitted. He was allowed to retire with a cloud over his head but he retired in any case. Sharon remained in the cabinet as a Minister Without Portfolio. Overall, the world felt a sense of revulsion, and Israel's image was badly tarnished.

ROBERT W. DUEMLING
Sinai Field Mission
Sinai (1980-1982)

Ambassador Robert W. Duemling was born in Fort Wayne, Indiana in 1929. He received a bachelor's degree and a master's degree from Yale University. Prior to becoming a Foreign Service officer, Ambassador Duemling served in U.S. Navy intelligence and was stationed in Japan. His career in the Foreign Service included positions in Rome, Kuala Lumpur, Tokyo, Ottawa, Washington, DC, and an ambassadorship to Suriname. Ambassador Duemling was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1989.

Q: You were assigned to the Sinai which was territory between the Israeli and the Egyptians.

DUEMLING: That is right. After four years as DCM in Ottawa, I rather belatedly went to the Senior Seminar which was a terrific experience that I enjoyed greatly. The year I graduated was a bad time in the Department's history as far as its personnel situation was concerned. Not a single one of my State Department colleagues in the Senior Seminar -- not one -- had an onward assignment when we graduated from the Seminar. We were told that we were on our own and that we could roam the corridors to see whether we could find a job. It was an appalling situation. I went looking around and happened upon the fact that there was a new organization being started called the "Multinational Force and Observers". It was the successor organization to the observer teams we had in the Sinai earlier. But this new organization had to be created to implement the Camp David Accords. There had to be a combination of civilian and military observer force. The State Department took the responsibility for getting in touch with other governments to see whether they would participate in this endeavor. Initially we had hoped for a U.N. peace-keeping force, but the Russians were going to veto that in the Security Council. So the U.S. had to sponsor the effort. This was the first and perhaps the only multinational force organized outside of UN auspices, except Vietnam. The Department went around and signed up about eleven different countries, who agreed in principle. Then the U.S. as the lead country had to design this force -- there was not really any prototype for it. It was decided that what was needed were somewhere between 4,000 and 6,000 troops which included a helicopter component. Under the Camp David accords, the Sinai was divided into three zones. The Israeli were going to withdraw and the Egyptians would move in behind them incrementally, eventually taking over the entire Sinai, which is the situation at the present. There were various levels of armaments permitted and other agreements that required daily verification by both military and civilians to maintain the integrity of the Camp David accords.

We had to set up this observer force. The commitments were made by about eleven countries; then we had to go to these countries and fill in the blanks on the table of organization. At the time, the countries had only committed in principle, not to any specific mode or type of contribution. When I joined this organization, it was still in the process of trying to design itself. It was deciding what the table of organization would be, what units would be involved, the nature and size of these units, and what the civilian role would be. The U.S. was going to provide all the civilians and a full battalion of troops and a lot of logistic support, but we were looking to the other participants for two more battalions, trucks and drivers and mechanics to support the transportation fleet, helicopters and pilots and mechanics, a headquarters company, a signal company, etc. There had been no agreements that anybody would do anything specific. I was assigned to this organization to be a negotiator to go to governments as we determined which we thought could fill the various responsibilities. I would go as part of a team to persuade governments to give us what we needed as opposed to what they might have in surplus and would be willing to give us. In that capacity, I worked initially with Frank Maestroni and a couple of others, but eventually I ended up leading the teams myself. In addition, even if a country had agreed to give us what we needed, we had then to negotiate the terms and conditions and the remuneration, the timing, the logistics, etc. I worked with the Colombians in Bogota to work out their commitments for a battalion of troops. I visited Montevideo to work out the terms and conditions of the trucking unit from the Uruguayans. I visited London and The Hague to discuss with the Dutch the assignment of a signals company and with the British, the headquarters company. That was tricky, because we initially had intended that the signals company be British because that is a hard requirement to fill. This company needed highly skilled radio technicians, who are in short supply in any country's military forces. You need radio technicians who are communicators trained to the NATO standards, using English and the NATO signal-books. That narrows the field. The British refused to provide such a company because they didn't have the man-power. The only country left was Holland.

I was despatched as a "one man Mission Impossible" to go to The Hague to try to persuade the Dutch military that they should provide this company. I met with the commanding general of the Dutch army, who was very nice, very polite. I laid out our problem and the reasons for having the Dutch -- namely, that they were virtually the only force that could do it. He listened to me and then said that I was asking for the impossible. He said that the Dutch had barely enough of those skills in their own army as it was. He pointed out that the Dutch had a draft Army, which had very short periods of service -- only six months. Communicators had to spend another six months or more. By the time the Dutch finished the training, they only had three months left in their service. He pointed out that I had asked for six months assignments. He concluded that the request was just impossible because the soldiers would have to re-enlist for another three months to fulfill my request. He thought that was hopeless and no one would do that. I asked him to do me a favor and to publicize the opportunity to serve in the Sinai. If anybody wanted to volunteer, they would have to re-enlist for another three months to complete a six months' tour in the Sinai. He agreed to that for us, but didn't give it much of a chance. When he did announce the program, there were 1,000 volunteers. These young people wanted a little adventure. All we needed was sixty, so the Dutch were able to fill our request.

I take my hat off to the negotiators of the Camp David accords. They made that whole thing work. You never hear about peace-keeping problems in the Sinai because that whole operation is in place, very effectively administered and we never had any problems with it. It continues to this day and you never read about it.

As it worked out, the borders between Jordan and Israel would be adjusted by a unique method. Israel would cede certain, disputed areas back to Jordan, but Israel would hold them for a long period under a rental arrangement. There would be the possibility of a joint, Israeli-Jordanian airport near Eilat and Aqaba, at the head of the Gulf of Aqaba. Water issues would be dealt with. It was a great breakthrough. There would be a possibility for Israeli investment in Jordan because, of course, Jordan had a very weak economy, which had been further weakened by the embargoes which the Saudis and others had proclaimed against Jordan because of its stance during the Gulf War. There was hope that something could be done in this respect. So that's how that particular breakthrough worked out.

DAVID N. GREENLEE
Political Officer
Tel Aviv (1980-1982)

Ambassador Greenlee was born and raised in New York and educated at Yale University. After service in the Peace Corps in Bolivia and the US Army in Vietnam, he joined the Foreign Service in 1974. In the course of his career the ambassador served in Peru, Bolivia (three tours), Israel, Spain and Chile, as well as in the Department of State, where he was involved in Haitian and Egyptian affairs, and at the Pentagon, where he was Political Advisor. Three of his foreign tours were as Deputy Chief of Mission. He served as United States Ambassador to Paraguay and Bolivia. Ambassador Greenlee was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

GREENLEE: I left in December of 1979, and I went to Tel Aviv. It's interesting how I got that assignment. I was a very active political officer in Bolivia. I was quite inexperienced, but I was getting a lot of exposure, and it was a heady time for me. I didn't know what I wanted to do next, but I wanted a good follow-on assignment. I wasn't finding anything I really wanted, though, so I sought a six month extension, which would have put me into the summer cycle the following year. But around that time the Department sent out a worldwide cable soliciting bids for an assignment to Israel. It said the candidate should be and an FSO4. An FSO4 is today's FO2, since the system has been restructured.

Q: That was a lieutenant-colonel level assignment?

GREENLEE: Yes. The other requirement was that the candidates speak Arabic and Hebrew. The job would be representing the ambassador at the working-level sessions of the Camp David autonomy talks with Egypt and Israel. I saw this cable and thought, "This can't have anything to do with somebody like me." But my section head, Bob Fouche, said, "You ought to apply for this." I said, "There's no way I can get something like this. Why would I waste my time?" He said, "Put your name in. You never can tell." So I did.

About two weeks later, Ambassador Boeker asked in a staff meeting whether anybody needed any personnel work done, because he was going up to Washington. I told him afterward that I had put my name in for the Tel Aviv job, but there was nothing in my background that would qualify me for it. Boeker must have been gone three weeks, a month, and I didn't hear anything. Then I got a call from M. Charles Hill -- Charlie Hill. At that time he was the deputy director of IAI (Israel and Arab- Israel Affairs) in NEA (Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs). Charlie said, "Are you interested in this job?" I said, "Yes, but I don't have the background." He said, "Don't worry about it. Are you interested in the job?" I said, "Yes." He said, "Paul Boeker was up here talking about you, and we'd like you to take it."

I was flabbergasted. I heard later that they had had 14 bids on the job, and there were Arabists, and there were Hebrew speakers. What I later learned about NEA was that people tended to walk on different sides of the aisle. The Arabists cancelled out the Hebraists and vice-versa. I was the only one left standing, and got the job. They wanted me right away. They wanted me to go up there and learn Hebrew, but Ambassador Boeker wouldn't let go of me that fast. I stayed in Bolivia another four months, finally leaving in December. During that time our fourth child, Nicole, was born. We left Bolivia in December of 1979, and arrived in Tel Aviv three weeks later.

Q: You were there from when to when?

GREENLEE: I was in Tel Aviv from January of 1980 until July of 1982. Two and a half years.

Q: What was the situation in Israel at that time?

GREENLEE: The Camp David Accords had been concluded, and there was peace with Egypt, but no peace with the other Arab states and no way to resolve the problem of the Palestinians in what the Israelis called the "administered" territories and the world called the "occupied territories"—the West Bank and Gaza. The Palestinians didn't want to be involved in the Camp David framework. Part of the deal with Egypt was that there should be a way to address the Palestinian issue. The Palestinians wanted a Palestinian state, but Camp David only provided for Palestinian autonomy. To achieve that there had to be talks that logically would involve the Palestinians. The Egyptians negotiated on their behalf. The U.S. was a party to the talks. We were the facilitators, suggesting ways around obstacles that arose. There was a team from Washington, and representatives from Embassy Tel Aviv and Embassy Cairo.

I went out to do that job, to be involved in those talks-- not as a negotiator but as an observer for the embassy. In fact, when I arrived in Israel, that wasn't my role, not immediately, because there was already somebody doing it. I folded into the political section and became the guy who went down to Gaza and reported on Palestinian thinking there, and also on the policies and actions of the military government on the West Bank. I didn't do things directly with the Palestinians on the West Bank, as opposed to Gaza, because the West Bank, with the exception of the military government, was the responsibility of the Consulate General in Jerusalem.

I don't know if you want me to get into the Israeli stuff now, but I can. It is fascinating.

Q: I do.

GREENLEE: It was a jolt coming from Bolivia to Israel, which was of hyper interest to Washington and the media. It was quite a change. Embassy Tel Aviv was a high-pressure place. The demands were heavy. The ambassador was not just a Type A, but a Type A Plus. So were most of the officers there.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

GREENLEE: A very competent man: Samuel Lewis. He was ambassador for many years in Bolivia, probably six-plus years. He drove people hard. Before I arrived, the embassy had a reputation for door-slamming. When I got there, though, the atmosphere was calmer. There was a new DCM, Bill Brown, who was very low key, and Charlie Hill had migrated out to be the political counselor. Hill was extraordinarily competent, and a pleasure to work with. He hired me for the job, and Sam Lewis let me know that he had personally vetted me. It was a way of saying if you don't perform to expectation, you will be letting us down.

Ambassador Lewis was an incredibly quick and literate drafter. He dictated his cables and they were sent out without any editing much of the time. He might do three or four cables a day, some of them with "no distribution" or "eyes only" caveats. He was like an entire political section by himself. Charlie Hill often wrote first-person cables for the ambassador, and he was like another whole political section. He would be the note-taker for the ambassador's meetings with Menahem Begin, for example. Charlie wrote with a meticulous hand, very clear print, and it was wonderful stuff. This would be the high-level input that would go to Washington every day. The rest of us ground out cables, of course, but our output paled next to Lewis' and Hill's'.

There were also high-level sensitive phone calls. The secure phone in the front office was in frequent use. The calls wouldn't usually go to the officer director. They would go to the under secretary for political affairs, or the deputy secretary or secretary. They would go to the NSC (National Security Council). That was what happened at the top, but there were things going on at my level, too. I became the reporter for the autonomy talks and I also took frequent turns at internal political reporting, which was not my primary responsibility.

I had an office without windows, and I would go in and shut the door and type. Word processors, "Wangs," didn't come in until I was leaving post. I never had one. I was working with an old typewriter—an IBM Selectric—in this office with no windows. I would grind away. I was a good reporter, but I was slow. What happened in that embassy was that the people who could write without the need of much editing got more and more of the burden of the section. I ended up being one of those people. I wrote slowly, but I didn't need much editing. So I was given as much as I could handle. It was exhausting. My chronological file was about six inches thick at the end of a year.

Q: What were you writing?

GREENLEE: I was writing color pieces on the political scene, developments affecting the peace process. I wrote about border issues, water issues, the Israeli Arabs, the Arabs who were citizens of Israel. I wasn't the internal reporting officer, but I would cover the Knesset debates sometimes, depending on what was needed. I would collect and report, as in Bolivia, but much more up-tempo.

To give you an example, I went one time to the foreign ministry, shortly after arriving in country.

The Israelis were delighted that I was not an Arabist. They saw me as a clean slate. I talked to a guy who was explaining how Israel was handling the situation on the border with Lebanon. The problem in those days was not Hezbollah, but the PLO. The Israelis in fact were working with the Shia against the Palestinians. This guy told me that although the Shia of south Lebanon were sworn enemies of Israel, they could work together against the PLO. He said, "You know the patterns of political relationships in the Middle East are kaleidoscopic in nature. They change with every turn of the wheel." That was an interesting way to put it. A year later, after I understood things better, I went back and talked to this guy again. I told him that I was grateful for this kaleidoscope metaphor. There was somebody else in the room, another Israeli foreign ministry guy. He said, "What was the metaphor?" So I told him. Both these guys looked puzzled. They looked at each other and said, "Something's missing." Then one of them said, I know: "The pattern changes with every turn of the wheel, but the colors always remain the same." [laughter]

I wrote on all that stuff. I wrote on the problems in the Bekaa Valley, the problems with Syria and Syrian influence on Lebanon, as the Israelis saw it. I learned about how to write for Washington, and I learned it much better after I left Israel and went to work on the Israel desk and when I was deputy director for Egyptian affairs. What I learned was that it was not what you wrote that was important, but what was read. The trick was to be read. I think we understood that better in Tel Aviv, and in NEA/IAI, than the reporters at the Arab posts and Arab-affairs offices in Washington. But I am sure people who worked in those places would disagree.

There were cables that many times—and this also happened with the consulate general—seemed to be about feelings, about injustice, about how the Israelis were trampling on the rights of the Palestinians. But they were not cables that were going to change policy in Washington. They were probably not going to be read. One thing I got from Charlie Hill was that if you want to change policy in Washington, it's possible to do so, but you don't do it by slapping Washington in the face. You do it by slowly turning inside the gyre. Write your cables in such a way-- write your summaries in such a way-- that they will be read. That was a valuable lesson.

Q: Could you talk about the consul general in Jerusalem? Who was consul general there, and how were relations?

GREENLEE: Relations were always good when I was at the embassy, but previously I think they were somewhat strained. Brandon Grove was the consul general and Jock Covey was his deputy. The word was that they were sent to Jerusalem in part to strengthen the relationship with the embassy. One of them would come each week to Sam Lewis' country team meeting.

Q: Were there divisions in the embassy on how people viewed Israel?

GREENLEE: The ambassador was so dominant, and the senior part of the embassy was so powerful, Charlie Hill and Bill Brown, that what might be called divisions elsewhere were not evident. There were different points of view sometimes, but not divisions. There was almost a total absence of people who had served at Arab posts. U.S. policy was to support Israel and that's what the embassy did. There could be heated exchanges with the Israelis over aspects of the bilateral relationship, and the Israelis could be testy and difficult. But we were committed to Israel's security and well-being. I didn't see people saying, "Should we really be so hard over with the Israelis? Shouldn't we be more balanced?" I didn't see it in Tel Aviv, but I did see it back in Washington. And of course the views of people at the consulate general in Jerusalem tended to be quite different from ours at the embassy.

The Arabs would talk about the importance of the U.S. being even-handed, but the Israelis considered that a code phrase for stacking the deck against Israel. We were supposed to support Israel, not take a neutral position. The Arabs would talk about the need for Palestinian self-determination. The Israelis saw that as a code word for an independent Palestinian state. In those days the Israelis wouldn't consider anything beyond "autonomy," which was the word they insisted on including in the Camp David Accords. There were these little keys that you always had to be aware of. Words counted. If there were a slip, particularly at a high-level, the Israelis would catch it and worry about a shift in U.S. policy.

You had to know the theology of the peace process, and it took a while to get it down. You had to know UN Security Council Resolution 242, and you had to know Resolution 338, and you had to know what was emphasized by the different sides. I got to be quite a theologian of the process. Camp David is a framework, but 242 is a basis for negotiation. It was the foundation of Camp David. The Palestinians accepted 242, but not Camp David, which they saw as limiting 242. Resolution 242 calls for Israel to withdraw from "territories occupied." The Arabs interpreted this to mean "all" the territories occupied in the 1967 war, including East Jerusalem. The Israelis, on the other hand, underscored the absence of the article "the" before territories and insisted that this meant Israel would have to withdraw from only part of the occupied territories, and only in exchange for peace and security. These nuances were crucial.

Q: Did you have the feeling when you got there that you would be scrutinized by the Israelis, that they would be wary of a pro-Arab bias?

GREENLEE: Yes, I did. But I was sympathetic to their situation. I didn't ever think, "Should Israel exist as a country?" I saw Israel, as a Jewish state, being essential in the aftermath of the Holocaust. I felt that and I still feel that. I think some of the Israelis assumed I was Jewish.

Q: The name Greenlee might give that impression.

GREENLEE: It could possibly. The one conversational exchange I had with Ehud Olmert, who became Prime Minister, touched on that. He was then a member of the Knesset. I had met him sort of randomly and at one point I said, because he was considering my last name, that I wasn't Jewish. He said, "I know that. If you were Green, maybe, but Greenlee, never." But the truth is a lot of Israelis assumed I was Jewish. Also a lot of people in the Department.

There were some odd experiences. I knew pretty well an Israeli who was originally from South Africa. He's a very good contact. He looked to me like an Old Testament prophet. He had a beard and very Semitic features. We went to a restaurant in Tel Aviv where they served a lot of dishes based on eggplant. It was a wonderful restaurant. We sat down and I was given the menu in Hebrew. He got the one in English. Israel is such an interesting place! It really is a cosmopolitan place. My wife, who is copper-skinned and has jet black hair, looked very much like an Israeli from Yemen. With reddish hair I looked like an Israeli from Poland. We fit in there better than in any place we had ever been in terms of how we looked as a couple.

Q: Did you ever think, given Israel's occupation policies and the growth of population and arms proliferation on the Arab side, that Israel's future could be problematic?

GREENLEE: This was constantly on the minds of the Israelis. They wanted to make sure they retained a technological edge in military equipment so that they could counter the Arab advantage in population. And their enemies are very close. Damascus is just over the horizon from the Golan Heights, which the Israelis have held since the '67 war.

It doesn't take long to reach Tel Aviv from neighboring Arab states by air. The Israelis were constantly thinking about that, and we were constantly thinking about it. We were always committed to making sure that Israel had the level of sophistication in their equipment that they needed to defend themselves. They would then tell us that we, the Israelis, are a great asset to you, the U.S., because we've developed certain systems that you can employ in defense of your own interests--conformal fuel tanks to extend the range of tactical aircraft, for example, or upgraded electronics. There was a very active political military dialogue.

Q: How did you see Israel's attitude toward a negotiated peace?

GREENLEE: The problem in the Arab-Israeli negotiations was that they were seen as "zero-sum," and neither side ever wanted to yield. Some thought that if the Israelis gave way on settlements, then you could have a break-through on the other side. So pressure would build on the Israelis. But if anything the Israelis would become less flexible. They don't respond well to pressure. The Israelis, I'm sure, want peace, but they don't want to risk being flexible in ways that they think they won't be able to recover from.

I've had a lot of conversations with Israelis about settlements. The position of the U.S. government was always that settlements were "unhelpful" and obstacles to peace. We would sometimes say to the Israelis, "Just when things look like they could have gotten better, you guys start establishing new settlements." The Israelis would say, "You are wrong to think the settlements are a lynchpin for everything. We could get rid of all the settlements, and would still have the same problem. The settlements aren't the issue."

Q: Talk about Israeli democracy. How did it impress you?

Israel is a really active democracy. It's the kind of debating-school type of democracy. There are actors within Israel who have considerable leverage and weight even though they are not numerically significant. Sometimes the settlers are in a position to be the "balance wheel" of a coalition government. That is also the case with the comparatively small religious party. Their price of support for an otherwise wobbly coalition government would be, for example, the requirement for all hotels to maintain kosher kitchens. The settlers, who often came from places like Brooklyn, would also have substantial political input. Narrow interests had a way of becoming national interests.

Q: The settlers from Brooklyn were extremists...

GREENLEE: That was certainly the perception, at least in regard to many of them. Meir Kahane, of the Jewish Defense League, for example, was from Brooklyn. You would talk to Israelis, and they would say, "Yeah, these guys are nuts." But then, as you got into it a little, there would be this sense that they weren't entirely nuts. I remember there was this general who was on the Israeli delegation for the autonomy talks, who would say that the essential point was that the West Bank should never be what the Nazis called "Judenrein"—that is, denied to Jews. A lot of the Israelis saw the settlers as ensuring that interest. And there was a strong religious component to that interest. Unlike in Gaza, there were highly significant Jewish religious sites on the West Bank. The Israelis wanted to make sure they would always have access to them.

If you were insistent on the need for Israeli to freeze settlement activity, you would begin to touch nerves. You would find that as an American you could only go so far. The Israelis would say, "We know these Arabs; you don't. We know what they're up to." There were exceptions to that, of course, like the "Peace Now" group, which was opposed to settlements. There are so many dimensions to the settlement issue, and many different kinds of settlements. Some are vast apartment or housing complexes. Some are tents on a hillside occupied by just handful of families. There are settlements along the Jordan River put down by the Labor Party after the 1967 war, strategic settlements. There is a large settlement dating from before the Israeli State. It's too facile to lump them all into a single issue, to say, simply, that they are "unhelpful" or "illegal" or even "obstacles to peace." Like everyone involved with the Middle East, we can get caught in our own rhetoric.

Q: I never dealt with Israel, but I would think that they have the ability to push buttons in congress....

GREENLEE: The Israelis have a remarkable ability to push buttons in congress, as well as in the executive branch, at the most senior levels of the State Department and the White House. We understood that at the embassy in Tel Aviv. It was part of the terrain on which we operated. I remember once Prime Minister Menahem Begin didn't like a position that we were taking. He might have picked up on a talking point to "press" the Israelis on some issue. He said publicly that if we wanted to "press," he would know how to "press back." That was a credible comment. That was what we had to deal with. But Israel isn't the only country whose interests figure in our internal politics. There's a domestic component to our policy with respect to many countries, for example, Greece.

Q: Ireland.

GREENLEE: Yes, Ireland is another example. Our citizens have roots in many places and they frequently make their interests in support of those places known to their congressional representatives.

This is a major factor in the U.S.-Israeli relationship. There are people with a lot of economic and political power who are committed to Israel--Republicans and Democrats. It's almost to the point where when you talk about the U.S. national interest as it relates to Israel, you're also talking about a U.S. national interest as it relates to internal considerations in the United States. I used to tell people who would ask why we support Israel so strongly that—and this sounds a little over the top, I know—it is almost like dealing with an interest that might pertain to the state of New Jersey. It was that hard to disentangle from our domestic politics.

There are other examples of this. Look at our Cuba policy. Try to separate that from the internal politics of south Florida and arithmetic of our national elections. The Cuban exile community is passionately interested in the way we relate to Cuba. So whether it's Israel or it's Cuba or it's Greece or Ireland, there are domestic components to our foreign policy.

Q: Did you find that the Israelis were quick to accuse people critical of their policies as being anti-Semitic?

GREENLEE: The Israelis don't want to undermine their own historical arguments, but they are quick to pounce on what they perceive as anti-Semitism. They sense it sometime in people who are simply putting forward positions, who don't consider themselves in any way anti-Semitic.

I often saw this in the way Israeli officials sized up people at the embassy or official visitors from the U.S. They would make up their minds quickly about whether people were sympathetic to their situation or not. I could almost see it registering in their eyes when they met people. It was important for them to know where people stood, whether they understood certain fundamental issues—security issues, especially—as Israelis understood them.

If the Israelis didn't trust you to be committed to Israel's security and well-being, which was U.S. policy, then they would wonder whether you were really representing U.S. policy or whether there was a weakening of U.S. policy. It was important in talking to Israelis to make sure that they understood that, if you had a disagreeable message, it was not rooted in a fundamental shift in policy or in something deeper, like anti-Semitism. That was often difficult.

It also was difficult sometimes in Washington when people didn't buy into policy. I can give you an example. There was a very powerful person in the Reagan administration who came in from the outside and was at the National Security Council. This was when I was in the office of Israel and Arab-Israel Affairs at the State Department. It was interesting that the nomenclature for the office was Israel-Arab-Israel affairs, not Arab-Israeli affairs. They changed that now, but at that time the distinction seemed important. Political theology was very important.

In any case, the Israelis, probably the prime minister, wrote a letter of complaint about something that required a response. We drafted the response, which included the assurance that the United States remained committed to Israel's "security and well-being"—standard language. The senior official at the NSC, however, struck this sentence from the letter as being inconsistent with the tone we wanted to convey. We had to say, "Wait a second. If you don't have that phrase in there, you're going to open up a whole different issue. You don't want to go there." He reluctantly backed down, and the phrase was restored. It shows you the kind of level of detail you had to use when dealing with the Israelis. Also, the basic commitment that, "We're here behind you. We don't want you to disappear. We want you to keep your military edge. We may disagree on this or that, but we don't disagree that you ought to exist as a country."

Q: Were the Israelis comfortable getting so much assistance from us? I would have thought that, as a proud people, there would be a certain resentment about being so dependent..

GREENLEE: They never quite expressed it the way that you have expressed it. They liked their big friend being there, and they needed their big friend. At the same time, they went about things their own way. They made it very clear to us that they would never ask a U.S. soldier to shed blood on their behalf. They'd do their own fighting.

I remember very well that one guy I dealt with—in fact, he became a very important person in the Israeli context, both as a diplomatic representative, as a representative in their legal system—told me, “You know, we have lots of issues with the United States, but the United States is honest. These other countries—meaning the Europeans—are not honest.” I think that what he really meant was that, “We know at the end of the day that you're not going to abandon us, and these other countries are going to go their own way.”

Israel is a very small country but it punches over its weight. Its human resources are extraordinary. Absolutely extraordinary. For years it had a significant military edge over its Arab neighbors. When it struck, it prevailed. But its situation began to change in the early 1980s. As I left Israel, they were getting mired in Lebanon. Before that, they would do these very precise strikes, whether it rescuing hostages from Entebbe (Uganda) or winning militarily in the '67 war and '73 wars.

There was a lot of élan in the country, a sense that, “We need help internationally, politically, and we need resources, and we need access to technology, but we can do it ourselves.” In fact, there was much more of that than certain other countries that I've been involved with where they really can't do things by themselves.

Q: You talked about American not shedding blood for Israelis. What immediately comes to mind is the USS Liberty. I don't understand why the Israelis attacked that American naval vessel. It is clear that it wasn't a mistake. There was obviously no mistake.

GREENLEE: It was not something that was discussed much when I was in Israel. I was at the embassy from January 1980 until July or so of 1982. The attack on the Liberty happened during the '67 war, but there was a book published when I was out there, by somebody who was on the Liberty. I didn't read the book, but there was a buzz about it. The author said the U.S. flag was clearly visible, but the Israelis attacked again and again.

The theory behind the attack was that the Israelis were trying to knock out the U.S. listening capabilities so they could do certain things without our knowledge. There was the suggestion that they were trying to lure Jordan into the conflict so that they could seize East Jerusalem and the West Bank. Maybe that was so. I don't know. The Jordanians did come in when they should have stayed out.

I think that none of us who served in Israel had any illusions about what the Israelis would do when it came to pursuing their state interests—even if it meant inflicting U.S. casualties. I can imagine circumstances where we might do things to the Israelis. I know there were some very difficult moments in Lebanon in 1982 at the field command level, for example, that could have erupted, but fortunately did not.

Q: How did we talk with the Israelis about defense issues?

GREENLEE: There were significant political-military talks with Israel. When I was on the desk, after leaving Tel Aviv, they really got underway in a formal sense. I was not involved in the information exchanges about technologies or weapons, but I was aware they were taking place. There was a lot of interest in the way Israelis were employing U.S. technology, and how they were modifying it for their specific needs. The Israelis maintained that their modifications and upgrades gave us reciprocal benefits that we did not always fully appreciate. That was a political position, certainly, but I think it was more than a talking point for, say, the U.S. Congress. My sense—it is only that—is that we learned from the Israelis just as they learned from us.

Q: You were there from '79 to '82?

GREENLEE: I was there from January of 1980 until early July of 1982.

Q: How was the Iranian hostage business playing then?

GREENLEE: I was not involved in talks with Israelis about the hostage crisis, but I felt, as I think we all felt at the embassy, that we should be able to do more to get our people back. The operation that Carter mounted to try to rescue the hostages happened when I was in Tel Aviv. Its disastrous failure, the collision of the aircraft in the desert, was depressing. It was admirably ambitious but seemed militarily inept. The Israelis were sympathetic but critical, at least in the press. One officer who had been involved in the planning of the Entebbe operation was quoted as saying that it was inexplicable that the U.S. had no back-up plan. Later, a team came out from the Pentagon and gave a thorough briefing to the Israelis. I was not there, but I heard later that it was professionally done and that the Israelis were impressed by what we had attempted, and the planning that went into it, even though it ended in failure.

The hostage crisis was something that certainly angered all of us, and we were waiting to see how it played out. Then there was the election of 1980 and Carter lost. The Iranians gave up the hostages as Reagan prepared to take over.

Another thing that happened when I was posted to Tel Aviv was the Israeli air action to take out the construction of the Iraqi nuclear reactor. This was the summer of 1981. I was on R&R (rest and recuperation) in Greece, and I read about it in the International Herald Tribune. There was a big outcry internationally and in the U.S. media. How could the Israelis have done such a thing? I wondered how we would handle it at the embassy. I expected a firestorm. But that was not the case.

When I got back to Tel Aviv, I got the sense that the U.S. administration was basically content with the Israeli action, at least at the top levels, although we formally condemned it. This was a time when the Israelis never seemed to fail at these high-drama military strikes. I recall that they used Kfirs and F-16s or F-15s with conformal fuel tanks to be able to go the distance. They dropped the extra fuel tanks over Jordan. The first planes bombed the reactor roof and the others put bombs through the holes. It was technically quite impressive.

Q: The nuclear issues remain problematic. I'm not quite sure where Iran is in the development of a nuclear capability, but I suspect there will be trouble if things continue as they are.

GREENLEE: Maybe so. The Israeli nuclear capability has always been a sensitive matter as well. There were open secrets--I shouldn't say secrets--but assumptions about what the Israelis had. People would speculate about their facility in Dimona, in the Negev desert. In Dimona, they would say—that's where they turn out the warheads. There was a lot of speculation in the press, especially the international press. Israelis officials would not admit to a nuclear capability but at times were provocatively Delphic. I'll give you an example. The official Israeli position was that Israel would not be the first country to introduce nuclear weapons to the region. But I remember one time a cabinet minister, at a particularly tense time, added, "And Israel will not be the second."

Q: Were you there during the invasion of Lebanon?

GREENLEE: Yes. I was, but I was there for only about a month after it started. It was an invasion foretold in many ways. I remember that I took notes at a briefing many weeks before the invasion by Ariel Sharon. I think he had the defense portfolio at the time. This must have been in about February or March, as the invasion was in June. Sharon had a map of Lebanon with a series of plastic or acetate overlays. He would show the current situation, with the Syrian troop deployments and other factors—PLO enclaves, where the Christians had influence or the Druze. Then he would flip back to a chart showing how the areas of influence of the different groups looked years earlier, then back and back—trying to make the point that things were better before.

The implication of the briefing was, "Why can't we go back to how things were, when the Christians were really in charge? Why do you need these other influences? They don't have to be there." As I looked back on it after the Israeli invasion Sharon was signaling, "This is what could happen. This is what we and the Christians might do." It was all there. It wasn't an announcement, but it was a clear articulation of the Israeli rationale to act. So when the Israelis went in, it wasn't surprising. It wasn't a shock.

It was interesting to see Israel mobilize for the invasion. I was not in Israel during other conflicts, but I had read a lot about how the nation came together in 1967 and 1973. I remember an American tourist telling me how Israeli Kfirs flew over Tel Aviv in a star of David formation when the Israelis pre-empted in the '67 War, and the emotion it brought. In the '73 War the Egyptians attacked on the Jewish day of atonement, on Yom Kipur. The Israelis were caught off guard but were able to rally quickly since all the reservists were at home and easy to locate. In 1982, I saw the mobilization. Israel is a small country. The Lebanese border is only a couple of hours from Tel Aviv by road. In the afternoon before the invasion there was a line of long-bed trucks carrying tanks covered by netting. At intersections as they headed north, school girls handed flowers to the drivers. At that point there was no secret about what was going to happen.

The Israelis rolled in with little opposition and were in Beirut, sitting in cafes drinking coffee with the Christian Phalange within a week. It began as a walk-over. I think the Israelis shot down about 90 Syrian planes, with the loss of only one. But later it got very complicated.

Q: What was going on with Egypt?

GREENLEE: The great achievement of the Camp David Accords was peace with Egypt. The saying was that the Arabs couldn't make war without Egypt, or peace without Syria. Syria wasn't caught in the net, and there wasn't a broad peace—but at least there was a peace treaty with Egypt. This took Egypt out of the mix of belligerents.

I was in Israel during the final phase of the Sinai withdrawal. It was a three- phase thing. Egypt had diplomatic relations with Israel. Some Israelis visited Egypt. You could drive through Gaza and across the Sinai, or you could go through Elat and Sharm el Sheikh and there was also a commercial air link. There was an El Al flight and an Egyptian charter flight. This was consistent with the peace accord.

The Israelis loved to go to Egypt. In the beginning there was a lot of Israeli tourism there, but none the other way. The Egyptians didn't visit Israel. What the Israelis wanted above all was to be accepted in the region, as a country among other countries. They made a step toward that with the peace treaty, but they wanted more. They wanted what they called a warm peace. What they got was a cold peace—and they complained about that a lot. They still have a cold peace with Egypt, but at least it is peace.

Q: How was Sharon viewed at the embassy by the time you left?

GREENLEE: Sharon was a real tough guy, and there were several Israelis in leadership positions like that. When I was in Israel Menahem Begin was the prime minister. Begin was involved in blowing up the King David Hotel during the British occupation—what today we would call a terrorist act. I took notes in some of the meetings with Begin. He was a very aggressive, sharp, interesting guy. He had the credentials to make peace with Egypt. It was like Nixon with China. When I was still on the Israel account, Begin fell in his bathroom and broke his hip. He seemed quite frail after that. He also became despondent after his wife died. One day Begin declared in a cabinet meeting that he couldn't continue and disappeared from public life. Yitzhak Shamir became prime minister—another real tough guy. He had been in the Stern Gang.

Q: He was an assassin, wasn't he?

GREENLEE: Right. That was said to be his background, a "shooter." Then there were others from that generation of founders, like Moshe Dayan, who had more the image of what foreigners wanted Israeli leaders to be like. Dayan died when I was out there, and I attended his funeral along with a few people from the embassy. He was buried at the moshav where he grew up. It was a very simple ceremony. His coffin was a plain pine box covered by the Israeli flag. It was a funeral with a kind of Israeli mystique.

But back to Sharon. He was probably the best known warrior of the '73 war. What happened then was that the Israelis were caught off guard. The Egyptians stormed over the Suez Canal and overran the Israeli positions in front of the Canal. They pressed through the Sinai, and some say could have penetrated as far as Beersheva in the Negev. Sharon led an Israeli counter attack back across the Canal. His tanks surrounded the largest part of the Egyptian army and could have annihilated it. That became Israel's bargaining chip in the armistice talks that followed.

I always heard that Begin looked at Sharon with particular respect. It was one tough guy deferring to another. Sharon held different ministerial portfolios, always pushing his interests, like settlements, aggressively. There was a swagger about him, a tank-like, forward pitch to his walk. He was formidable.

I remember a reception at Ambassador Lewis' residence. Herman Wouk, author of War and Remembrance, was there with his wife and son. I admired Wouk's writing, and was talking with him. It was a kind of thrilling moment in my early diplomatic life. All of a sudden Wouk, looking over my shoulder, saw Sharon. "There's Arik!" he said, and bolted away. He left me in mid-sentence.

Q: When you left Israel, where did you go?

GREENLEE: You know, I found work in Israel very, very hard. I wasn't burned out, but I kept thinking that my real career would be in Latin America, not the Middle East. I started angling for a good onward assignment in Latin America. But I had lost my leverage with the Bureau of American Republics Affairs. They had forgotten about me. The Near East and Southeast Asia Bureau, on the other hand, wanted to keep me on board. In personnel terms, it seemed to track people better.

Charlie Hill had returned to Washington as the Director of the Office of Israel and Arab-Israel Affairs. He and his deputy, Bill Kirby, put the arm on me to work for them in Washington. Hill went on to a front office position almost immediately and then to be executive secretary of the Department and later Secretary Shultz' executive assistant. But I worked closely with Kirby and to some degree, in a direct arrangement, with Hill after that.

At IAI I became one of a team of people who worked on what was called the Reagan initiative. This was an attempt to drive the Camp David process forward by giving more clarity to our views on how the final status arrangements should look. The Reagan initiative was presented when I was on home leave after Israel and before reporting for duty in IAI. I called Charlie Hill right after the Reagan Initiative was made public, and I said, "This new initiative sounds interesting. Do you need me to come in now?" He said, "No, just take your leave. You'll have plenty to do later." That was the case. I worked really hard.

THOMAS MACKLIN, JR.
Personnel Officer
Tel Aviv (1980-1982)

Thomas Macklin Jr. was born in Fort Worth, Texas in October of 1935. He attended San Diego State University and majored in political science, later receiving a masters degree in history. He entered the Foreign Service in 1965 and took his first post as a Consular Officer in Amsterdam. His career took him to The Hague, Vietnam, Barbados, Israel, Russia, and Italy as well as several posts within the State Department. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in September 2000.

Q: Today is November 17, 2000. Tom, you were in Tel Aviv from 1980 to when?

MACKLIN: 1982.

Q: Your position was as personnel officer. Could you describe Israel in 1980 when you got there, the state of things?

MACKLIN: It seems to me that Camp David was sometime [before my arrival]. So, everybody thought Camp David solved a lot of the problems. In fact, the Begin government continued to establish settlements in the West Bank. During that period, the West Bank and Gaza were surprisingly quiet. Security was extremely good. There were no bombings. The only danger was being shot at by Israelis, which happened from time to time to embassy people. If you were driving around the West Bank they were pretty free with their bullets. But Palestinians were surprisingly docile at that time. There was a little friction but not a lot of friction between the consulate in Jerusalem, which really represented the Arab constituency, and the embassy in Tel Aviv. The Begin government was really dominated by the Shamir/Sharon group, very right wing. They felt that the Palestinians had a state. There was a Palestinian state. It was called Jordan. Indeed, there were a lot of people in the embassy that felt, "Look, we're in sort of a transitional period, but what really has to happen is, all the Palestinians need to be pushed into Jordan. Let's just get it over with because this all belongs to Israel." I was in Israel at the time the Israelis withdrew from the Sinai. There was one settlement that was down very close to Gaza but inside Sinai. I remember the agony that they went through in finally evacuating that. There were a lot of people in Israel that felt that any Jewish settlement was holy. There was no historic association with that site. But it was a pretty intransigent thing. The Taba issue was a major thing in the Gulf of Aqaba. Taba was a little sliver of land about 12 miles long and about two miles wide. It went up in the armpit of the Gulf of Aqaba. It was part of a land that was supposed to be given back to Egypt and in fact ultimately was given back to Egypt. But the Israelis hung on to it and the Egyptians had to take them to an international court to get it back, but the Israelis, who were better at legal maneuvering, managed to fight the thing off for years. It was one of the big issues at the time.

It was a pleasant time to be there. I remember talking with Palestinian cab drivers. I went to Jordan a couple of times and went up to Jerusalem a lot. I can remember in particular one of the cab drivers said to me, "I can't fight the Israelis. I can't fight Begin. We don't have any guns. But the one thing I can do is go home and have more kids. I'm going to have the biggest family I can. That's how we're going to get the Israelis." Considering the population of the Palestinians... The PLO operated out of Lebanon in those days. Our ambassador was Sam Lewis. We had very competent staff. Sam Lewis was ultimately there eight or nine years. He was a very good ambassador. I had a lot of respect for him. He was superb at explaining to congressman how to walk the tightrope of visits to Israel and not saying things that commit us to one thing or another. The Israelis had a habit in negotiations of saying, "Yes, but back in 1953, you said blah blah blah." So, Sam Lewis, having been there through a long transition period, was very effective at countering that kind of stuff, those debating tactics. Sam Lewis' deputy was a guy named Bill Brown, who was later ambassador. The political counselor was Charlie Hill and then later Paul Hare. Rich Kauzlarich was the economic counselor. Dennis Jett was the science guy. They all became ambassadors. Jett was a good guy.

Q: You were a guy thrown in there without any particular commitment to the Arab or Israeli world. Was there an atmosphere on the political issue in Tel Aviv with our embassy that was hostile to the Begin group or pro-Begin?

MACKLIN: Sam Lewis had gone off as ambassador at about the same time that Begin had been elected over Rabin. There was a scandal involving Rabin's wife and the Labor government for the first time in the history of Israel was out of office. Begin, who had been a rock throwing terrorist, became prime minister. Sam Lewis got off the plane and said, "This is the best thing that could happen to Israel. Begin is a great man and that's the kind of leadership they need." So, they started off on the right foot. By 1980, by the time I got there, the relationship was a little bit frayed. Begin was extremely arrogant, didn't give a damn for anybody who wasn't Jewish. One of the big issues while I was there was when the Israelis would invade Lebanon to "clean out" the Palestinian problem. There were Palestinians in the Bekaa Valley and all over southern Lebanon in force. That is where Arafat spent a lot of his time. There were occasionally rockets lobbed in, not nearly as much hostility as there is now, but at the time, the Israelis felt that what they needed to do was go up there, clean that out, turn the country back to the Lebanese, and everybody would thank them. Of course, we all know how that turned out. But during the massacre of the two refugee camps, Sabra and Shatila, I remember afterwards, it was semi-orchestrated by Sharon, who cleared a path for a Lebanese group to go in and do their dirty work. They were very much involved in the process. But the Begin government was astounded that anybody blamed the Israelis for this. Begin's statement to the press was, "Goyim kill Goyim and they come and blame the Jews." So, Sam Lewis' effort in my last year in Israel, '81-'82, was trying to talk Begin out of invading Lebanon. There were several times when they had a timetable and they were ready to roll and Sam Lewis and Charlie Hill managed to talk them out of it. But eventually, they decided to go ahead and do it. There were also various provocations along the way. I remember one episode where the Israelis had done something that was really embarrassing to us and Sam Lewis talked to Begin about it and Begin threw a temper tantrum and said, "We're not a banana republic. You can't push us around." So, it was a difficult, but positive, creative relationship.

Q: How did you feel about being there? There has been this idea that the Arabists are all anti-Semitic which I think is more a creation of the Israeli Information Service than anything. Was there a feeling of frustration about a small country which essentially could dictate to the U.S.?

MACKLIN: There wasn't within the embassy. There were an incredible number of American Jews at the embassy who were very pro-Israel, no question of loyalties – FSOs. They all did their job well and some of them spoke Hebrew fluently and had good access and were good officers. They didn't do anything they shouldn't. They didn't spy for Israel. They didn't leak information. They were very good officers. Sam Lewis was nobody to cross, but their loyalties were very clear. They were very pro-Israel. These were some of the guys who would say to me, "This is a transition time. The sooner we get all these Palestinians out of Israel and into Jordan, the better off we're going to be."

Q: When you say "Israel," you mean basically the West Bank.

MACKLIN: Yes. I went to Israel as a disciplinary assignment. I had switched from political to admin because my wife was a political cone officer and I thought I had to. I was never accepted very well by the admin people. It was a very cliquish outfit and they really very much wanted me to go off to Africa. I couldn't go to Africa because of my hepatitis. So, there were bad feelings. I went there replacing an FSO-6 who had done just a wretched job. I was not terribly pleased about the assignment, although I liked the Middle East. I had some friends there. I knew the admin counselor, who was a guy named Pete Mollat. He was a nice guy who was very tightly strung, kind of a piano wire kind of guy. But he was a decent guy as long as you didn't mind having him shout at you three times a day; he was okay to work for. After you were ripped, he'd come back later and apologize. Then he left after the first year and Tom Lindville took his place. He was the very opposite. He was so laid back you didn't know he was awake. He was a great delegator and delegated. I did the Personnel job for two years. It had a lot to do with classification, salary and wage surveys. But I tried to dabble in other stuff. The second year I was there, Sam Lewis became the dean of the diplomatic corps. There had been an Austrian who was dean of the diplomatic corps. He left. Sam was the senior ambassador, so he became dean of the corps and like everything, he wanted to be an activist. So, he wanted to organize monthly luncheons and all kinds of stuff and work with certain embassies on certain issues. He didn't like his special assistant, so he brought me in to handle all of his diplomatic relationship issues and help him be dean of the corps. It was fun. I got to go up to Jerusalem a lot and deal with the foreign office and other embassies. It was a good time. I enjoyed that.

Q: How did you find the diplomatic corps? Did they have some of the same political pressures that we had?

MACKLIN: Not that I ever saw.

Q: I'm really talking about the Jewish and maybe Christian fundamentalists support of Israel, which meant that diplomatically our hands were really pretty well tied.

MACKLIN: No, I didn't see that. I didn't know very many Brits. But I knew a lot of Australians. Their ambassador was a tough little guy and he seemed to have a completely free hand. No problems at all doing what he thought was right. The Europeans generally had just a handful of people there. But they took a very EU approach to all this, that we needed to be more evenhanded. For the most part, they had no influence. They just had a mission there to report on things.

Q: How about Jerusalem? Did you get involved with our consulate general there at all?

MACKLIN: We went up there a lot. At the time, there were a lot of peace talks going on. We had a lot of SecState visits. Every time there was a visit, we would wind up setting up CODEL offices or SecState offices at the King David. So, I went up there a lot. It's a wonderful city. The number two in the Consular Section in Tel Aviv, Susan Jacobs, her husband, Barry Jacobs, was the branch PAO in Jerusalem. The number two was Jock Covey, whom I had known from Washington. I knew the admin. guy pretty well, Steve Noland. There was a guy named Tom Wookish, who was there as political officer. Wookish is one of these strange kind of 19th century archeologist types who is a walking encyclopedia. He was wonderful to talk to and I went on a couple of CODEL trips with him. He could find old roman aqueducts and biblical locations that I never dreamed existed. He was a very bright guy, very pro-Arab. There was not so much friction between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. Sam Lewis was pretty firm on that. But there were differences of opinion.

Q: As a personnel officer, how were the local personnel? How did we view the Israelis who we hired?

MACKLIN: There was a senior FSN in Personnel who was really kind of a nitwit who had been there for a long time. I kind of worked around her. I hired in some new people. My experience in Israel was that it was the best FSN labor pool I've ever seen in my life. There were a lot of people there from Britain, from British colonies. I had three secretaries, all of them bilingual, trilingual. They could all take dictation. So, I could dictate to one and then they'd bring me a draft, I'd rewrite it. I turned out more correspondence in two years in Israel than I did in the rest of my career. In GSO, in Budget, almost everywhere we went, we had really skilled FSNs, a very good labor pool. I thought they were very impressive. There were two guys in GSO who were extremely good at visits, who were kind of famous in the whole Middle Eastern community. One of them later died of throat cancer. After he died, it turned out that he had been involved in a small ring in GSO raking off money from various contracts, which was most sad because he had been a captain in the RAF in World War II and was really a good guy. The Israeli FSN salary scale was a greater secret than any we had in the Political Section. We did not report the salary scale to the government of Israel. We paid the FSNs in cash every other week. They would line up and receive cash. So, they could report whatever they wanted to the government and of course, they underreported. So, there was a lot of sensitivity there. When I'd go and out and do wage surveys, I took the head of the Budget Section with me, who was a kind of spokesman for all the FSNs. He was an Iraqi-Israeli and was very good.

Q: When I was in Naples just about this time, we were under great pressure to report to the Italian government how much we were paying our people. This was an extremely sensitive issue because many of our people had not paid any taxes. Finally, a couple of years after I left, we agreed to tell the Italians how much we were paying. A considerable number of our staff retired very quickly so that it wouldn't be reported. What you were doing was probably illegal, wasn't it? According to Israeli law, an employer is supposed to tell the government how much they're paying somebody.

MACKLIN: Because we were a foreign government, we didn't fall under Israeli law. So, what we did we did as diplomats who were immune from prosecution. What Israeli employees did with their own government was their concern, although frankly they had their own fraternal order of FSNs and they worked out a mock salary schedule that would make their reporting internally consistent.

Q: 70% of the Israeli population is Sephardic.

MACKLIN: It wasn't then. There were a lot of them. In the election of '81, that was a really important election in terms of the Middle East. People were upset with Begin. He was seen as too hard-line. Peres was the leader of the Labor Party and he was favored by something like 20 points. Begin outmaneuvered him. Had Peres come in, he had said, "I will curtail settlements. I'll try to work out a peace deal." What Begin did was, he worked an agreement where he said, "Fine, we'll have elections," but because of all the things that are going on, they provided for more campaigning time than they normally do. They wound up giving the Begin government something like four months, an unusual amount of time. In that time, he adopted a lot of measures that were generally popular and kind of eroded away Peres' lead. Then a couple of weeks before the elections, there was an Israeli comic who had a big public meeting in Tel Aviv. He made a crack about the Sephardic. There is a racial name that Israelis call a Sephardic Israeli who is too dark skinned. So, this comic who wasn't particularly bigoted, made this comment at this big meeting on TV about, "Well, all the really great people are here, none of that riffraff." Well, Begin picked up on the riffraff and used that as a banner. They had posters out within a day or two about "The leader of the people." So, he got the Sephardic vote and won the election by not much of a margin, but enough to stay in power. That was a really pivotal thing. Sam Lewis knows all the details on that election.

Q: I was thinking more as a personnel officer, were you under any constraints? Were you having Arab (we're not talking about Sephardic or Ashkenazi)-Israelis, many of them coming in as regular FSNs?

MACKLIN: I don't remember if we had any. I don't think we had any in Tel Aviv. The staff in Jerusalem was mostly Arab.

Q: I interviewed Mike Metrisko, who around '91 was consul general in Tel Aviv and was saying that he found when he needed to go up to Jerusalem to see Palestinian-Americans who were arrested, there was nobody that he could call in the Consular Section who spoke Arabic and that there had been a policy of not hiring Arab-Israelis. I think the inspectors came out about that time and said, "Cut it out." This sounded like a system where you don't hire blacks or something like that.

MACKLIN: I had no guidance on hiring. I was allowed to hire... I didn't make decisions on my own. When there was a vacancy, we'd go through certain procedures, but then you'd go to the section chief and interview people together and say to the head of GSO and the head of budget or the Political Section or whomever, "Who do you think is best and why?" But I can't remember ever having an Arab-Israeli apply for a job. In Jerusalem, we had several very sharp FSNs at the consulate. If they needed an Arab speaker, there were tons of them up there. But Mike's a smart cookie. That was not a problem I ever saw.

Q: How did you work it out with your wife? She's in Paris and you're in Tel Aviv.

MACKLIN: We just had great vacations. We wouldn't take them together as a rule. She would come to Tel Aviv and I would kind of keep working for the most part. We didn't have a lot of annual leave. So, we'd maximize it. Then I'd go to Paris for a couple of weeks. So, we'd try to get together about every three months. It was a bit tedious, but great vacations.

BRANDON H. GROVE Jr.
Consul General
Jerusalem (1980-1983)

Ambassador Brandon Grove Jr. was born in Chicago in 1929 and lived in Hamburg, Germany at the time of Hitler's rise to power. Before Germany invaded Poland, his father was transferred to Holland and later to Madrid in 1940. He attended Fordham University and later Bard College and Princeton University. His Foreign Service career took him to such places as the Ivory Coast, India, West Berlin, and Jerusalem as well as an ambassadorship to Zaire.

GROVE: The first memories that come to me about Jerusalem are its sunsets and sunrises. I have never seen light of such soft and rosy hue as it reflects off the Jerusalem stone of buildings in the old part of the city. It has a golden glow at times, in Jerusalem's uncontaminated air three thousand feet above the sea. Yet the city has a feeling of solemnity. Christ, as he reached the summit of the Mount of Olives, is said to have gazed on Jerusalem and wept. Today, he would surely do the same.

Jerusalem is the home of friends to me and my family. Father Godfrey, a Franciscan friar, was such a person. He was best known for his knowledge as an archeologist and tour guide in Jerusalem and Bethlehem, and for his sense of humor. In his brown frock, he reminded us of Friar Tuck--round, warm, jovial, and quite a gourmet. He was a native of Washington, DC although he lived for many years in Jerusalem.

Freddy Weisgal was an American Jew living in Jerusalem. He and his wife Jean opened their home to other Americans. Freddy was a fine jazz pianist and a raucously funny man, a great friend of American journalists, well known for his parties. He invited us to Yom Kippur and other Jewish holidays, a wonderful entry, through American eyes, into Jewish life in Jerusalem. On my last night in Jerusalem, Freddy gave a party at the old American Colony Hotel. As we gathered around the piano in the bar after dinner, Freddy played his incomparable rendition of Ellington's "Black and Blue," my favorite, and an apt description of how I felt after three years among Palestinians and Likudniks.

And then there were the Harman and Eitan families, scholars and diplomats, the most delightful and generous of friends. Amos and Beth Elon, perceptive and sensitive people, were so painfully troubled by the actions of their government in Lebanon and on the West Bank that it was sometimes hard to be in their company.

Jerusalem is a city of hats: Armenian priests with triangular hats, Greek Orthodox with cylindrical hats, skull caps--kipahs--Israeli men wear, Palestinians with their scarves and headbands, and Russian Orthodox priests whose hats resemble flower pots more than anything else. Never have I been in a place where head dress plays such a defining role. Jerusalem is also a city of distinct neighborhoods, with its heart inside the old walls. Mea Shearim is home to ultra-orthodox Jews, where men wear Polish medieval clothes, and women are covered from head to foot. A Jewish friend wearing a light Parisian summer dress told me she had been spat upon in Mea Shearim.

The century old American Colony Hotel, with its beautiful inner court and a muezzin in a mosque nearby who wakes people early each morning with his call to prayers, is situated in the Arab quarter of East Jerusalem. Founded by the Spafford and Vester families generations earlier, it was a refuge in an Ottoman style for journalists and others who chose not to stay at the King David Hotel in West Jerusalem, despite its spectacular views. The esteemed Philadelphia Restaurant where its owner Walid so generously presided, was nearby.

Easter brings vivid memories. My sons, some friends, and I would rise in chilly darkness, and go to one of the hilltops around Jerusalem from which we could look toward Jericho. As the sun appeared, we heard donkeys bray and roosters crow. Groups of Christians sang hymns and assured each other that Christ had risen. Then we had an Easter champagne breakfast spread upon the ground. Ramadan, a Muslim holiday of fasting to celebrate the poor, touched us in its self-denial.

Jews say that if you leave Jerusalem on a journey, you have not returned until you revisit the Wall. I came to understand, and felt this way myself. During my assignment I left Israel often, and never believed I had truly returned until I touched the Wall again. I fondly recall the run-down Anglican School in the former Hadassah Hospital, which two of my children attended. Paul graduated from there, and my youngest son, Mark, was heartbroken and cried when we had to leave.

My favorite place was half-way down into the old city where the Jewish Quarter abuts the Arab. There, at a certain high point, you find yourself in a small and empty square, one side of which is open to an astonishing view beyond the cramped Arab homes with their red-tiled roofs and cats below. Straight ahead and also below, is the Western Wall with the Dome of the Rock above it, sacred to Jews and Muslims. Beyond the old city a Christian church spire rises on the Mount of Olives. All of this in one frame. I came here often, because this sight was such an extraordinary physical representation of the confluence of three great faiths in Jerusalem. One could stand in that quiet and empty square, and see evidence in stone of the great cross-currents that shaped, with so much bloodshed, the city's course through history.

Jerusalem is a place of religious observances, none more solemn than Yom Kippur. During this time of soul-searching, the city comes to a silent standstill, except for emergency services. I recall walking down King George Street, a major thoroughfare, with my son Mark. It was deserted. Mark stretched out in the middle of the street, celebrating the absence of people and traffic. During Yom Kippur, Jerusalem is miraculously filled with the sounds of its birds.

Jerusalem has no international airport. This city on hilltops is approached from the ground, either from the sea or desert. One climbs up to reach Jerusalem. In the early 1980s, there was still a feeling of having arrived at a small and quiet place, a rather sparse and somber enclave where the mood was set by scholarship and gods.

In jarring contrast are the Jewish settlements that now ring the city like the wall against Arabs they are partly intended to be. Politically motivated, hastily built and often unneeded apartment complexes, the settlements are strategically placed to defend the city from its hilltops and expand Jerusalem's perimeters. In nearly every case, they are built on expropriated land Palestinians believe to be their own. The settlements bring more cars, pollution, population and ugliness to the environs of Jerusalem. They form a harsh skyline. Settlements crowd this former city of open places and small stone houses and squeeze it toward its ancient core. The old city becomes increasingly quaint, an attraction to tourists, archeologists and pilgrims. It no longer seems the heart and raison d'être of Jerusalem, around which the rest of the city emerged over centuries to provide support.

People in the Foreign Service are asked what their favorite post was. It is a difficult question to answer, because all assignments have their good and bad aspects for professional and personal reasons. When you are young and at the bottom of the ladder there is the challenge of getting it right and the satisfaction of being promoted. Parents and children are young too, and that is a special pleasure as well as responsibility. Years later, with hard work and luck, you may be near the top of your profession and enjoying the responsibilities and perquisites of its senior members, as in being an ambassador. But the children have grown and are gone and family life has changed. These two lines can intersect, like the curves of supply and demand. In my case, and I believe for my children also, this occurred in Jerusalem, where the struggles of Arabs and Jews were our daily life, and the city, when you know its neighborhoods and Anglican School, and become close to people living there, takes you over. I answer this question by saying Jerusalem, because of its intrusive mood and beauty when we were there, and its capacity to humble.

Jerusalem and its Consulates

My assignment to Jerusalem took me by surprise. As I finished my work in the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs in the winter of 1979, I expected to become ambassador to Haiti, and started preparing for that appointment when I received a call from Personnel. Secretary of State Vance, who normally took no interest in assignments below the ambassadorial level, had decided to select the new consul general to Jerusalem himself, because of the importance of implementing the Camp David Accords between Egypt and Israel concluded on September 17, 1978. Would I be interested in going? Jerusalem of course was not an embassy, while Haiti was, but it had many of the attributes of a chief of mission posting and would be engrossing work.

Jerusalem was the farthest place from my mind. When I asked Personnel why they had thought of me, their answer was that I had the right credentials: no association with Jerusalem, and neither the Israelis nor Palestinians knew of me. Initially, at least, I would not be a problem for either side.

I went to Philip Habib for advice. He was under secretary of State for political affairs at the time. Phil knew the Middle East as few did and took an interest in his younger colleagues. I told him I was intrigued by Jerusalem. Jerusalem, he replied was "the big time," and I would be foolish to turn down such an opportunity. Samuel Lewis was then our ambassador to Israel. He and I had known each other since my early days in the Foreign Service, when we both worked for under secretary Chester Bowles. Personnel had consulted him, and when the assignment was made it had Sam's blessing.

I had a general knowledge of the Middle East, thanks to Bayard Dodge's graduate seminar at Princeton conducted in his living room on Mercer Street. My parents had lived in Egypt from 1950-53, when my father was president of Mobil's company there, and I visited them one summer while a graduate student. But I knew little about Jerusalem, and would have to start from scratch. Most of my briefings were arranged by a bright, precise, and exceptionally competent young officer named James (Jock) Covey, who was then on the Arab-Israeli desk. He would later become my deputy in Jerusalem.

The few consulates general in Jerusalem are unique in status. They are neither embassies, nor traditional constituent posts. They function independently of embassy supervision and report directly to their capitals at home. My efficiency ratings would be written by the assistant secretary for the Middle East, not our ambassador in Tel Aviv, guaranteeing independence in reporting on such topics as Palestinian attitudes and Israeli settlements.

The US view of Jerusalem is that it is a single, undivided city whose final status can be determined only when the parties involved reach a mutually satisfactory agreement. Until that happens, Jerusalem exists in a kind of limbo. Its circumstances are different, however, from the limbo of Berlin, whose final status was also undetermined during the Cold War, but defined by the outcome of World War II and extensive quadripartite agreements reached by the occupying powers. Jerusalem, fully occupied by Israel after the 1967 War, lacks any formal legal definition of its status.

Today, Israel has jurisdiction over all of Jerusalem. We and most other countries officially regard a portion of the city, the former Jordanian-occupied East Jerusalem, as "occupied territory." We and most other countries have not located our embassy in Jerusalem in recognition of other legitimate interests in its ultimate status, and to encourage peaceful agreement in reaching accord on that status. Settling the Jerusalem issue will probably be the last hurdle in arriving at a comprehensive structure for peace in the region.

When I arrived at Lod Airport in Tel Aviv in the winter of 1980, I was met by two members of the consulate's staff, in whose company I drove for the first time up the hills to Jerusalem. When we reached my future home and the garden gates opened to let us in, I saw why this Ottoman residence was one of the most striking properties our government owns abroad. Stately yet welcoming, its three stories covered with vines climbing beyond high windows, it spoke of history. I opened the front door and, like Alice through her looking glass, drew breath and stepped into a new life. Once my suitcases were placed in an enormous bedroom with a vaulted ceiling, I climbed the separate stairs to my office on the third floor, with its lingering whiff of prewar times, and signed a telegram to the State Department reporting I had arrived and taken charge.

This was the extent of my official installation. I was not accredited to the government of Israel and therefore did not have an exequatur, a formal document normally issued to a consular officer by the host government acknowledging the right of that officer to discharge consular responsibilities. I was able, as my predecessors had been, to make calls on the foreign ministry in Jerusalem, where I was acknowledged as an American official with consular authority in the city. My calls were on the chief of protocol and head of the consular division. Both were seasoned pros who received me graciously. We had the normal consular workload: Americans getting arrested, being born, dying, losing their passports. We did not issue immigrant visas, which was done in Tel Aviv. We were concerned not only with Americans in Jerusalem, but also those on the West Bank, many of dual nationality.

Our consular district covered the city of Jerusalem and the West Bank, but not Gaza. Gaza came under the purview of the embassy, a legacy from its occupation by Egypt. I went to Gaza often and met socially with officials there, including Mayor Shawwa. I liked Gaza which I had first visited in 1952, during a summer with my parents in Egypt. Even then there were 200,000 displaced Arabs living in UN refugee camps.

My Berlin experience, with its emphasis on symbols and precedents, helped me in Jerusalem. One such question was whether, and if so when, I should fly the American flag on our official vehicle. While this may sound like a trivial matter, flying a flag is a statement about the status of the occupant of the vehicle. I was not the American ambassador to Israel, and Israelis regard Jerusalem as their capital. I discussed the matter with Sam Lewis, and we agreed I would fly the flag during official calls at the foreign ministry and on the mayor, when attending national day celebrations of other consulates, and on formal visits to patriarchs.

All of the Israeli ministries, except defense, were located in Jerusalem. Defense, for security reasons, remained in Tel Aviv. This required ambassadors and several of their staff members stationed in Tel Aviv to drive back and forth to Jerusalem, which took about an hour each way. Sometimes Lewis was obliged to make the trip as many as three times in one day. Our consulate provided him and his staff office space, communication facilities, food, drink, and a place to rest. It was complicated and time consuming for everybody. We had a public affairs officer, and commercial and trade promotion programs for Jerusalem and the West Bank. We provided support to a half dozen American private voluntary organizations working with great success and dedication on the West Bank. Ours was the largest official foreign presence in Jerusalem, as it is nearly everywhere, dwarfing the other consulates some of which were one-person operations. We were responsible, too, for maintaining informal contacts with the various religious denominations represented in Jerusalem.

The Vatican's representative was primus inter pares. France, Belgium, Holland, Italy, Spain, Great Britain, Greece and Turkey also had their consulates general in the city, as powers represented in Jerusalem during the Ottoman Empire. We formed a small and close-knit consular corps, whose members bore responsibilities similar to mine, except that the US was the only country that did not include Gaza in its consular district, and I had no formal religious responsibilities as most other consuls did.

We had different degrees of access to the Palestinians, based upon traditional ties and the politics of the moment. The US inevitably was cast in the role of the "heavy" after the Camp David Accords, and the more radicalized Palestinians refused to see American officials. Monthly meetings of the consular corps, chaired on a rotating basis, amounted to discussions of how each of us viewed the situation on the West Bank and in Gaza, and more broadly the Israeli-Palestinian relationship. They gave me an opportunity to brief my colleagues on the lack of progress in the peace process envisioned in the Camp David Accords, and on US involvement in Lebanon through Phil Habib's negotiations.

As a consular corps, we had formal and long-standing relationships with the Greek, Armenian, and Russian Orthodox Patriarchs and the Vatican's representative. For the US, these were matters of observing protocol and showing good will. For the Greek, Italian, and Turkish consuls, however, religious ties were their most important responsibilities. Dinners hosted by the Orthodox patriarchs took place in a medieval court-like atmosphere. We were literally "thumped" into the Patriarch's presence by a kawas, a uniformed Arab attendant with a long and heavy metal-tipped staff which he banged loudly on stone floors to clear an imaginary path through empty halls and announce our coming. It is a particularly odd feeling to be calling alone and be preceded by a kawas. Except for the austere quarters of the Vatican representative, the patriarchs in their splendor left one wondering which century this was.

Life and Work at the American Consulate

Before I left Washington I was briefed on the ties between our embassy in Tel Aviv and the consulate general in Jerusalem. Harold H. Saunders, then assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern Affairs, a wise and gentle man, went over that relationship with some care because historically it has been troubled. Maintaining the independence of Jerusalem was important, and just as important was that I be perceived as maintaining it, he said. There had been periods during which ambassadors and consuls general were not speaking to each other. Hal pointed out that Sam Lewis was a strong individual; he hoped I would resist efforts by the embassy to encroach on my responsibilities. I said I had known Sam for a long time, and had no reason to anticipate difficulties.

As it turned out, Sam and I had an excellent relationship. We never had differences concerning our respective roles or "turf." There was a minimum amount of friction between our staffs, because Sam and his DCM, and my deputy and I, monitored the relationship carefully. Once, Sam asked whether he could use my residence for a social occasion. He would be the host. I replied it could cloud the US view of Jerusalem's status in other people's eyes. He pondered this for a few moments and agreed.

I attended the weekly country team meetings at the embassy in Tel Aviv, reporting on West Bank developments and listening to discussions of US-Israeli relations. When it was relevant, I provided a Palestinian perspective or urged the embassy to take a particular initiative vis-a-vis the Israeli government with respect to our concerns about Palestinians. I was included in various social events hosted by the embassy staff, as were other members of the consulate, and we sometimes added embassy staff to our guest lists in Jerusalem. Sam and I stressed that the US had only one set of policies concerning Jerusalem and the West Bank. Government officials and journalists heard the same line from me as they did from Sam.

Social occasions in Tel Aviv gave me an opportunity to provide Israelis the flavor and mood of the West Bank. They were interested in the way someone outside the always turbulent political situation in the capital saw it. Our military attachés in Tel Aviv reported regularly on the West Bank. One day, driving to Tel Aviv shortly before Israel's invasion of Lebanon, I encountered a long column of flatbed trucks carrying tanks from the south northward toward Lebanon. I counted the tanks, and was able to provide timely information to our military attaché for his reporting. Our cooperation was productive.

The Jerusalem consulate general is the only foreign service post where Israelis and Arabs work side by side. When there were disputes, these had to do with conditions of work, and were not politically motivated. I was struck by how ready both sides were to live and work together. When a Palestinian employee had a baby, Israeli staff members went to the hospital to see the mother and child. The reverse was also true. Weddings were attended by both groups. We were, in fact, a family at the consulate general. Most of the local staff had been working there for many years. We had good jobs for Palestinians, and Israelis also found satisfaction in working for the US government. The residence staff, especially the gardeners, had been there for decades; most were Jordanians living on the West Bank who stayed after the 1967 War.

The major-domo in the residence, an all-seeing man in his sixties of unbounded tact named Mohammed Latif, had been the major-domo in Amman when William B. Macomber was ambassador there. Bill once visited me in Jerusalem, and these two men fell into each others' arms. When I told Mohammed that Macomber would be coming to dinner, he said Macomber had been easy to work for; all he ever wanted for lunch was a hamburger.

The American staff at the consulate general was small and its quality uniformly good. Jock Covey, who soon became my deputy, was active in training our junior officers of whom we had three at all times. When Phil Habib's Lebanese negotiations intensified, we served as an executive secretariat to him. Our staff worked hard and long hours. Backstopping Habib was rewarding for junior officers learning how negotiations are conducted. They had responsibility and tight deadlines thrust upon them and responded superbly.

Even after 1967, when Jerusalem ceased to be a divided city, we kept our office building in East Jerusalem and performed consular, information and cultural functions in that building. The compound on Agron Road in West Jerusalem was used by the consul general, and the political, economic/commercial, and administrative staffs. The third floor of the residence was the consul general's office. It could be reached directly; a visitor would not go through the living quarters on the first two floors to get to the office on the third. Our 19th century buildings in Jerusalem dated to Turkish times; we had owned them for many years and been able to invest sufficient money to maintain them reasonably well. The office floor housed communications equipment that weighed tons, and we worried about the load, which, indeed, eventually became a serious structural problem.

The consul general's residence is known for its Ottoman character and unselfconscious dignity. It speaks of other times in a pastoral Jerusalem of wide roads and quiet, tree-filled gardens. The property is walled in. An oval driveway encloses a lawn richly bordered by rose bushes and other plants. Tall old trees provide shade. Built of large stone blocks, the front of the residence is covered by flowering vines whose scent in spring seeps inside, and whose green leaves in summer nestle it.

One enters a stone floored hall: the rectangular, polished Jerusalem stone of rose and yellow hue. A vaulted dining room is to the right and winding stone steps lead to the floor above. The ceilings everywhere are high, and freely moving air cools the house in summer. Plants on the steps bring in the garden. The stairs emerge into the center of a large foyer on the second floor, the main floor of the residence. To provide accent and orientation to this space, I painted one of its walls a flat red ochre found in the public rooms of Jerusalem's American Colony Hotel. To the right of the steps is the long living room with its large oriental rugs, fireplace at one end, and vaulted white ceilings above.

Alone in that room overlooking the garden through the vines, I had feelings of both possession and intrusion, an instinctive respect for the events that had taken place there, and the people involved in them for over a century of Jerusalem's life. The residence was permeated by echoes of its past. They made a pleasant sound, and I thought myself the custodian of this old house and a definer, for a brief time, of its future.

If I speak in the first person singular, it is because my wife and I separated before I went to Jerusalem for reasons of incompatibility. We had become distant people with different interests. Our younger sons, Paul and Mark, lived with me thereafter, and attended the Anglican School. Jack and Cathy, already in Washington schools, visited during the summer while Paul and Mark were with their mother. It was not easy, especially and sadly for the children, but we managed well in the end.

In the early 1980s, security in Jerusalem was not the problem it has become today. I walked freely without a bodyguard, avoided crowds, and told my children to do the same. My tour ended before the intifada, before fighting broke out on the West Bank, and before Palestinians armed themselves with more than rocks and stones.

I began a typical day with an informal staff meeting in my office, after reading the cables from Washington and our other posts and confirming that our reporting was on track. I might next meet with Palestinians who wanted to talk with me, and then have lunch with an American visitor, a journalist, or Sam Lewis if he was in town. There were daily phone calls to our embassy in Tel Aviv, sometimes on our secure phone which never seemed to work properly. Afternoons were often devoted to calls on mayors and prominent figures on the West Bank, and observations of settlements to note their relentless expansion. I would return and have dinner with my sons and Israeli friends, or with Father Godfrey, a close friend of our family, archeologist, and renowned tour guide to the holy places of all religions. Those of us at the consulate general became his personal flock, year after year. Throughout, I was assisted by one of the best secretaries in the foreign service, Martha Hayward, with whom I had served in West and East Berlin, and as country director for Panama.

I did a considerable amount in media relations, although not publicly, meeting with American journalists in my office or over a meal. I also saw locally based reporters, whose families and mine became friends, and columnists and commentators who traveled through the area, people like Rowland Evans and Tom Brokaw of NBC. I have always liked journalists. They are wonderful sources of gossip, humor, and insights. The good ones live in a world of realpolitik and are not easily taken in. Only once was a confidence of mine betrayed, and that accidentally.

Rarely would an Israeli reporter ask to talk with me. I was friendly with people on the Jerusalem Post, but wanted to keep a low public profile. In general, the Israeli press and radio enjoyed criticizing the actions of our consulate. The Israeli press is always lively, sometimes vicious. Few escape its barbs. There was never any full-blown reporting on the consulate general, but we received occasional digs about our visits to Palestinians. We were denigrated as "Arabists" by the hardliners. I had even fewer contacts with the Arabic press; most Arab journalists tended to be leftist, shrill, and vehemently opposed to US policy, especially the Camp David Accords.

The ways the words "Arabists," as applied to Foreign Service officers, and "balanced," to characterize reporting or statements, are used by some Israelis and their American friends bothers me. Today, an Arabist is someone who has learned Arabic, studied the culture, and made the Middle East an area of professional specialization. This is a necessary component in our diplomatic skills, exemplified in the career of Ambassador Parker T. Hart. The word "balanced" is made pejorative, connoting a prejudiced favoring of the Arab side. Sometimes this happens, as does the reverse in Israel's direction, but we should all be able to agree that balance is an intellectual accomplishment worth striving for, especially in a diplomat.

That said, there has historically been a bias toward Arabs among many of the State Department's Middle East experts and vestiges of it remain. Some of this is romantically based, as in the views of generations of British travelers and explorers in the Arab/Muslim world, people like Charles Doughty and T.E. Lawrence. Some reflects opposition to Israel's post-1967 settlement policies, anger over its treatment of Palestinians, and resentment over the political influence of Israeli lobbying in the US. "Who are the Palestinians?" Prime Minister Golda Meir asked sarcastically at a press conference in the US in 1969. Some of the concern, also, is based on economic realities and the international politics of oil. It took Clark Clifford and President Truman's business partner Eddie Jacobson to overcome State Department resistance in 1948, from Secretary Marshall on down, to recognizing Israel. Until recently, few real Arabists jeopardized their State Department careers by learning Hebrew and serving in Israel. The personnel system took care that this did not happen.

In my own family, my Polish-born mother, a product of middle-class Warsaw in the early decades of this century, sometimes made anti-Semitic remarks. My father, who became a leading expert in the corporate world on Middle East oil, did not, but criticized Israel's frequent and evident disdain for Arabs. My summer paper in graduate studies at Princeton, written after I visited my family in Cairo, was entitled Dimensions of the Arab Case, because I thought, in 1951, that too little was understood about the concerns of moderate Arabs about Israel. In it I concluded that Arabs should accept the fact of Israel's existence and begin to work out a way of life with her. I am not, however, an Arabist by anyone's definition. In 1983, my prospective assignment as ambassador to Kuwait foundered when the Kuwaitis turned me down as sympathetic to Israel on the basis of my service in Jerusalem.

Washington was greatly interested in Jewish settlements and their expansion, and it was up to us to decide how to observe and quantify the frantic housing construction around Jerusalem and throughout the West Bank. Palestinians saw the consulate as the eyes, and especially ears, of the US government. To many Israelis, however, we were diplomats whose activities were vaguely sinister. Likud partisans occasionally raised a fuss about the activities of the consulate general on the West Bank, usually in the media, where we were portrayed as PLO sympathizers. I was never made to feel uncomfortable by ordinary Israelis, however, who seemed to accept our presence and what we were doing as a matter of course.

With brutally repressive measures against Palestinians in force on the West Bank and an expanding war in Lebanon, these were wrenching times for most Israelis. A few of them refused invitations to our residence, seeing the consulate as a symbol of imagined support for the PLO by the US government and an impediment to Jerusalem's becoming the site for an American embassy. In fact, our firm policy toward the PLO was to avoid all contact with that organization and its representatives, and our views on the status of Jerusalem were equally public and clear. The PLO was banned on the West Bank and we never knowingly met with anyone from that organization, although its sympathizers were everywhere and growing in number.

There were also a few Americans, including visitors from our country, who would not come to the residence for the same reasons. Most of them expressed their opinions civilly; others felt less constrained. One of the most frustrating situations for a diplomat abroad is an emotional attack on his government's policies by fellow citizens who are biased or poorly informed, and want to stay that way. To complicate matters further, the consulate general was in good favor with elements of ultra-orthodox Jewry who believed Jerusalem should be an entirely spiritual place, and not a capital for the state of Israel. Our presence was viewed by them as desirable, and a constraint on the secular ambitions of the Israeli government. They regularly attended our Fourth of July celebrations.

The Camp David Accords

I arrived in Jerusalem 18 months after the Camp David Accords, which brought peace between Egypt and Israel, were signed in mid-1978. One of my responsibilities was to elicit support from Palestinians for those agreements and the "autonomy" process for the West Bank and Gaza they envisioned. It did not take me long to recognize we would not succeed. My colleagues at other consulates accurately viewed Camp David as a dead issue. Washington nevertheless remained committed to the Camp David "process." While I had general guidance from Washington, it was up to the consulate to be an advocate, devise a strategy to meet US objectives, and keep Washington informed of the prospects. Rarely, did we get specific instructions from Washington to do anything. In my three years, I was instructed only once to go to the foreign ministry, and that was on a consular matter.

Consulate personnel were closely monitored by the Israeli security apparatus. I was once introduced by Ambassador Lewis to Ariel Sharon, then defense minister, at a social function honoring the arts at Lewis' residence in Tel Aviv. Sam, in a burst of good will, hoped that by meeting me Sharon might become less hostile to the consulate. Instead, Sharon said gruffly that he already knew who I was and what I was doing. He was scathingly critical of me and my staff, whom he accused of coddling the PLO. In some heat, I replied that because Mr. Sharon was well informed he would know that no one at the consulate had any contacts with the PLO. He turned his back to me and we left it at that.

Sharon had difficult relationships with Americans who were not ardent supporters of his views on settlements, Arabs, and the war in Lebanon. I found him an extraordinarily complicated man, an amoral ideologue with a nasty agenda. To him, every Palestinian is a terrorist and something less than fully human. His unrelenting policy of paving the West Bank and Jerusalem's suburbs with settlements is intended to make serious land-for-peace compromises impossible. Over many years Sharon, in my view, has been inflicting great damage on the prospects for peace in the Middle East, and therefore on Israel's, and everyone else's, best interests.

In April 1981 during Secretary of State Al Haig's first visit to the Middle East, I briefed him over breakfast. I told him it was common knowledge among my Israeli friends that Sharon was looking for any excuse to invade Lebanon to settle the Palestinian issue once and for all by force. The invasion occurred on June 6 as "Operation Peace for Galilee," and its stated purpose was to remove PLO forces from a 40-kilometer area north of Israel's border with Lebanon, putting Israel out of range of PLO artillery. In fact, however, Sharon sought to destroy the PLO leadership and remove it from Lebanon entirely, arrange for the election of Bashir Gemayel as president of Lebanon, and then conclude a peace treaty with Lebanon. The goal of expelling the PLO was accomplished; the other objectives were not. Sharon was at this time still playing the dominant Israeli role in the Camp David autonomy talks, thus demonstrating that the Israelis had no intention of engaging in good-faith negotiations with Egypt and the US.

Sam Lewis had long been skeptical about Sharon, and became increasingly distressed as he saw what Sharon was up to in the invasion of Lebanon. I suspect Foreign Minister Shamir and Sharon knew more about plans for an Israeli push all the way to Beirut than Begin. Begin's subsequent depression, his withdrawal and isolation, in part, I believe, reflected his recognition of Israel's self-inflicted wound in Lebanon. He came to understand, as the coffins of young Israelis kept returning, and after the massacres at Sabra and Shatila refugee camps, what his cabinet had wrought and how much blood was on their hands.

Sharon was a problem for everyone: for Sam, for Phil Habib, but especially for peace-minded Israelis. As the Lebanese negotiations unfolded, Sam and Phil would return to the consulate after having met with Sharon, often incredulous at his outrageousness. Habib was always wary of Sharon, who seemed to all of us to have an agenda of his own, no matter what his government's stated policy might be.

Israeli officials resented the consulate's reporting on their rapidly expanding settlements, and on Palestinian views critical of Israeli activities. We disciplined ourselves about what we said and wrote, and separated fact from analysis. We made it clear to Palestinians that the US government had no sympathy for the expansion of settlements, collective punishment of Palestinian families, or acts of brutality by soldiers and settlers occurring with increasing frequency on the West Bank. We also deplored Palestinian terrorism and Arafat's role in it.

Most Palestinians I met were well educated mayors and "notables," university professors, journalists, students, businessmen, lawyers and doctors. Few were professional women. Most spoke English and had family or personal connections to Jordan, where Amman was the source of financial support, passports, and other amenities for the West Bank's Palestinians. The men drank coffee, smoked, and talked politics endlessly, it seemed. A tedious part of my responsibilities was to listen to the litany of complaints from Palestinians about US policy. Most were not interested in hearing our views, and endlessly repeated set speeches accusing us of being responsible for the West Bank's miseries because of our financial and political support of Israel. They held us accountable for the construction of settlements, claiming these were paid for by diversions of US financial aid to Israel and financial support from American Jewish organizations. After a while, these Palestinians would end their monologues and get to more open discussions, although one could usually feel their bitterness toward the US and resentment of the Camp David Accords, which were viewed as legitimizing the Israeli status quo.

Arabs of each village and city varied in temperament; at best, one did not sense more than a loose coordination of views among the mayors in the early 1980s. The more radical Palestinians, however, marched in lockstep. Elected officials, like the mayors, talked to us without reservation and in the easy-going manner of people whose lives are in politics. This was not always true for private Palestinians, who tended to be more cautious if their ties to Jordan were strong, or they were concerned about seeming too close to US officials promoting the Camp David Accords. There were only a few occasions when it was not "convenient" for a mayor to see me, and a suggestion was made that we meet the following week. In general, access to Palestinians was not a problem.

Palestinians were also bitter toward Egypt's President Sadat, co-signer of the Accords. I was in Jerusalem when he was assassinated by his military officers, and it wasn't long before Palestinians repeated the PLO line that his fate was deserved because he was a traitor. The moderates who made such comments surprised me. After Israel, Egypt was the strongest military power in the region. The Camp David Accords neutralized that power, which radical Palestinians saw as the only hope of one day regaining their territory and, in the case of the fanatics among them, pushing Israel into the sea. Palestinians resented President Carter as well, and were pleased when he lost his bid for re-election. They had higher hopes for the Reagan administration, believing it might repudiate Camp David. They particularly hoped the "autonomy" process would be abandoned, and that the US would become less supportive of Israel. Of course, none of this occurred.

This was still a period when Palestinians were unarmed, and violent confrontations with Israelis on the West Bank were not a daily occurrence. Demonstrations did break out in violence, but Palestinians used stones then, not guns. They burned tires, created black smoke, and blocked a few roads; they rioted in refugee camps, but this was pre-intifada and weapons were used only by Jewish settlers and military occupation authorities.

Acts of terrorism within Israel, organized abroad by the PLO, Hamas and other groups, were increasing in number and severity. Palestinians in general felt themselves impotent victims of an occupation that became increasingly callous toward their human rights and contemptuous of international standards defined in the Geneva Conventions. Their fellow Arabs in the Gulf States and elsewhere sent money but did not, in the eyes of Palestinians, appear seriously interested in what was happening to them.

A Palestinian I saw often was Mayor Elias Freij, of Bethlehem. He was an orthodox Christian, a moderate, even-tempered, intelligent and moral man, someone who did not whine, and who described the Palestinian dilemma in a larger perspective. As a Christian, he did not have much influence on Muslim Palestinians. I often brought visitors to him because he was eloquent, measured and credible in his soft and patient voice, and because he lived in Bethlehem, which many Americans wanted to visit in any case. Freij was effective in talking calmly and rationally about Palestinian concerns, one of a small number of Arabs who could do so. Yet he, too, strongly criticized the Camp David Accords as a sell-out to Israel. Freij was critical of Arafat in his private conversations with me, but never disavowed him as the legitimate leader of all Palestinians.

Most other Palestinians with whom I spoke would not have dreamed of criticizing Arafat. Freij had deeper insights and recognized that Arafat was not then acceptable to the West because of his endorsement of terrorism and ambition to destroy Israel, and his militant leadership of the PLO. Freij, always a sensitive man of purpose and conviction, read the mood on the West Bank well. He paid for his individuality by being something of a pariah on the Jordanian political scene, and on one occasion having his home occupied by Israeli soldiers for a number of days, for his "protection."

To get a different perspective, I saw, among many others, Karim Khalaf, the former mayor of Ramallah, who was one of two mayors to lose their legs in car bomb attacks perpetrated by a right-wing Israeli underground group. Khalaf lived in Jericho thereafter, but I knew him earlier in Ramallah. Khalaf was a radical, one of the most outspoken mayors on the West Bank, and a vocal critic of Camp David. Even after his amputations, he never lost his fire. When I talked with him in the shade of his garden of orange trees in Jericho, he was full of sparks and anger about the Israelis and ourselves. He, too, was not interested in hearing other views. But he was always, in the Arab way, a warm and welcoming host, unhappy if you did not share coffee and food, and take some oranges home.

Shortly after my arrival in Jerusalem, Israeli occupation authorities deported two West Bank mayors accused of being PLO-sympathizers across the river to Jordan. They were widely respected leaders among the Palestinians, thoughtful men of principle who were anything but demagogues. The world-wide publicity generated by their deportations was more than the Israelis had bargained for. Deportation left the families, who chose to stay on their land, in dire straits. Western governments, including our own, protested these measures taken at a time when we were clinging to the hope of implementing the Camp David Accords as part of a peace process. To do this, we would need the support of West Bank mayors, particularly those of stature.

I decided to visit the wives and children of these mayors to ask how they were faring, and repeated my calls when I returned to their cities. In Jerusalem, I was pleased when the women stopped by my office. From comments made to me since then, including those of one of the mayors visiting the United States some fifteen years later, I now recognize that this gesture, which became well known, probably was the most effective step I was able to take in three years to reach out to Palestinians as a credible American official.

A Visit to Batir

Mohammed Latif, our major-domo at the residence, lived in the village of Batir near Jerusalem. One day, he invited my sons and me to his home for dinner. We stopped to visit a friend of his in a village nearby, whose daughter had accidentally been killed two or three days earlier by gunfire from the Israeli military. Mohammed wanted us to meet her family. The girl's parents did not lash out at me. They spoke of their grief quietly and with dignity. They said they were unable to understand how the US could do nothing as violence increased on the West Bank and innocent people were killed. They could not believe--few Palestinians could--that we did not have the power to curb the Israelis if we chose to.

Sitting on their terrace in Batir at dusk, looking over the vineyards in the valley and hearing the father speak of this experience pulled my thoughts and feelings together. The mother had given me a photograph of her daughter, a smiling girl in her late teens with dark, braided hair. The immediacy of their loss was poignant, as were the composure and resignation with which it was accepted and conveyed to me. No angry mob could have had anything like this effect on my understanding of the human toll of the occupation. There was also, I realized, a price paid by the occupiers, young soldiers who, for the most part, found the brutal side of their orders repugnant. Violence during 1980-83 was spiraling. During one dreadful week, West Bank violence was the cover story in Time, Newsweek, and The Economist.

In Jerusalem that night, I wrote a cable, "The Dark Side of Israeli Occupation," drawing on the evening's conversation and its mood, trying to make a real person of this young victim of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Rarely had our reporting aroused so much comment. It struck a chord among colleagues in the Middle East and Washington.

The "Village Leagues" Proposal

There were problems beyond violence on the West Bank, among them Sharon's plan calling for the creation of "Village Leagues." These were to be made up of Palestinians imposed as unelected mayors and functionaries in cities that had lost their mayors through deportation. Later on, they were to become a cadre of Palestinians the Israelis intended to put in place under the "self-governing" provisions of the Camp David Accords. These Palestinians had been selected by military authorities because they were willing to cooperate. They were quislings, as people on the ground including foreign journalists called them, after the Norwegian collaborator with German occupation authorities in World War II. Some, if not all, were in the pay of the Israelis. They were a mediocre lot, whose experience had little to do with skills in governing, and whose backgrounds were often shady. One of them, a notorious Israeli agent, had for many months required open protection by Israeli soldiers at his home near Hebron.

Sad to say, there were people in Washington who insisted these quislings be taken seriously and that the proposed "Village Leagues" be given US support as part of the Camp David effort to achieve autonomy. They were officials outside the State Department whose Likud sympathies were apparent. Our reporting for a while focused on exposing the dubious credentials of these Palestinians, and the Israeli government's cynicism in this effort. On the West Bank, it was essential for us to distance ourselves from the "Village Leagues" proposal, which had touched a raw nerve, if we were to maintain credibility and access to the rest of the Palestinians. I became so disturbed about pressure from USIA, in particular, that I sent a short, personal cable to Secretary of State Shultz recommending that we avoid endorsing the "Leagues," and discourage their Israeli sponsors, if we wanted to retain what influence we had with the real Palestinian leadership. Had it been implemented, the "Village Leagues" proposal would have been the final coffin nail for the Camp David Accords. Eventually, this unworthy enterprise collapsed, although for a long time our willingness even to consider it left a bad taste.

Congressional Delegations

Israel is an important port of call for any member of congress--like going to Ireland or the Berlin wall--so we had many visitors either singly or as members of congressional delegations. These CODELS arrived in Tel Aviv and then left as soon as they could because the prime minister, religious sites, and photo-ops were in Jerusalem. Each one had an embassy and consulate "control officer" to organize their visits. Their arrivals and sojourns placed heavy demands on our time and resources. I escorted them to the West Bank whenever they showed interest in going there, and many did.

I am a great believer in the value of congressional visits. We welcomed them even in the overwhelming numbers that came to Jerusalem. Each visit provided an opportunity to present the situation as we saw it, and enter into a dialogue, sometimes profitable and always intense, with members of congress and their staffs. Our visitors were a captive audience and were interested in Palestinians, even those members of the House and Senate who favored Likud's policies. By and large CODELS are serious trips undertaken for the primary purpose of learning.

The CODELS I briefed rather endlessly came in the wake of the Camp David Accords. I often invited Palestinians to the residence to meet with American legislators directly, and tried to get Palestinians themselves to present their views to the CODELS. Occasionally, Palestinians refused to come in protest against the congress, which they considered the instrument of their misfortunes through its aid appropriations to Israel. I tried to expose visitors to a broad spectrum of Palestinian views, but because some of the most articulate among them would not come to my home, they threw away valuable opportunities to put their case to American legislators.

For example, Palestinians would not talk to Senator Howard Baker, then majority leader and a very sensible man, because he was seen by them as opposed to their cause. At the last minute, they balked at attending my reception for him and even persuaded the politically astute Mayor Freij to stay away in a show of solidarity. I usually had little idea whether Palestinians would show up at a reception before the event. Some I could invite for a small dinner, others would only attend a larger function. When Palestinians did not appear at our reception for Senator

Baker, I explained why the boycott had occurred, and how misplaced it was. Baker was disappointed, but understood. Palestinians were the losers every time in these childish games.

Two CODELS came often and stood out for their thoughtful approaches to the region's problems. Congressman Steve Solarz, Democrat of New York, was one of the hardest working members I have met. He ran us ragged on the West Bank every time he came to Jerusalem. He became well acquainted with key Palestinians. It was apparent to me, and to them, that he cared about their future. Steve told me that as a congressman from Brooklyn, these visits with Palestinians were not easy politically. I admired him for his intellectual curiosity and fairness, and for the political risks he was taking at home in talking with Palestinians.

The other exceptionally hard working visitor was Senator Paul Tsongas, a Democrat of Massachusetts, who was of Greek origin. We always arranged for him and his wife to meet the Greek Patriarch in Jerusalem and he, too, was intensely interested in the West Bank and its Palestinians. While Solarz and Tsongas remained exceptionally well informed on the West Bank, many other members and their staffs made serious efforts to understand the complexity of the issues symbolized by "unified" but divided Jerusalem.

Visit of Former President and Mrs. Carter

In March of 1983, former President Carter and his wife Rosalynn visited Jerusalem, and for most of two days traveled on the West Bank. The three of us sat in the back of his armored limousine, where Carter and Rosalynn usually held hands and she kicked off her shoes. An Israeli security officer rode in front, and a security car followed us. Carter, as the architect of the Camp David Accords, was intensely interested in Palestinians and their views. This was his first opportunity to see the West Bank. He called on some of the leaders, but not all would receive him, as we had determined beforehand. In Jerusalem, I gave a luncheon and a dinner attended by Palestinians, all moderates, who were eager to talk with him. Meron Benvenisti, a former deputy mayor of Jerusalem, had developed a statistical data base for the West Bank, including settlements and Israel's economic ties there. I arranged for him to give the Carters a briefing which had evident impact on the former president who was beginning to understand Palestinian life at first-hand.

I invited the Carters and our by then exhausted staff on the evening before they left to dinner at the Philadelphia Restaurant, our favorite place for Arab food in the heart of East Jerusalem. My sons Paul and Mark, and Martha Hayward, were there. To my surprise, Carter's security people were not unduly concerned. In that noisy and informal ambience, we were served a banquet at which plates of cold dishes covered the table before the arrival of lamb, and arak was followed by beer. Walid, the owner, buried any resentments about Camp David he may have harbored. We had a lively, almost rowdy, time.

In retirement, Carter seemed more relaxed and at peace with himself: not the man of inner torments which often broke through his usual reserve when he was president. His interest in the Palestinian-Israeli relationship was genuine, and he felt sympathy for the Palestinians. By the end of his hard-working visit to Jerusalem, Carter seemed to have no doubt that the benefits of Camp David were limited to the rapprochement between Israel and Egypt he had done so much to bring about. He could see for himself that formulas for Palestinian autonomy on the West Bank and Gaza were unacceptable to the Palestinians. They were opposed by the Arab states. King Hussein of Jordan had not been invited to Camp David, and did not find himself in a position to provide the indispensable support their implementation would have required--even had he wished to do so.

Carter's lined face, with its muscles often tense, told much about his ability to concentrate. His questions reflected the pragmatic, fact-gathering and analytical bent of the engineer he had been. But he was also a man of emotions who quite easily sorted data into moral categories of right and wrong. At the Philadelphia Restaurant, his warmth, joviality and teasing nature came through when he joshed with my sons and our staff and enjoyed his glass of arak.

Carter's wife had great influence over him, and their devotion to each other was touching in its directness. As Carter prepared for a press conference at the King David Hotel on his last day, Mrs. Carter told me he would probably not ask me what to emphasize, but I should offer my thoughts to him anyway. I did so, even though his visit was a private one, and when he drew on my suggestions in his remarks, she turned to me and said, "See, he's taking your advice!"

Carter asked me to come to his hotel alone on the morning of his departure from Jerusalem to find out whether I thought our ambassador, Sam Lewis, too readily accepted the Israeli viewpoint on matters between us. At Camp David, he said, Sam seemed to be repeating what Begin had just told him. I replied that Sam recognized the complexities and nuances on all sides, but felt it was his particular responsibility as ambassador to interpret to our government what Israeli leaders were thinking, and why.

In briefing visitors, Sam's enthusiasm and admiration for Israel sometimes carried him away, as in his characterization of "tiny Israel" in the big Middle East. But I rarely heard criticism from him of our reporting on the West Bank, much of which, in its mere recounting, reflected discredit on Israel in ways Sam understood and, albeit reluctantly sometimes, accepted. Our two posts functioned independently of each other, an exceptional arrangement which through the years has proven itself to be sound, even when relations between them were as harmonious as Sam and I made them.

Other American Visitors

I briefed leaders of the American Jewish Community when they came to Jerusalem, and had good relationships with all of them. Sam Lewis gave me helpful advice before I left Washington. He suggested I call on the Jewish leaders whose headquarters were in New York. They should have an opportunity to meet me before I left for Jerusalem, and express their views before I took up my duties. From Tel Aviv, he helped make the appointments. I must have seen at least six heads of various Jewish organizations, asking their advice and inviting them to visit me.

They took me up on this invitation, which helped develop some rewarding relationships. When they visited Jerusalem, they listened to our briefings with concern. A few traveled on the West Bank, often using me as their guide. Sometimes I invited Palestinians to join us at the residence, if our visitors wished me to, which most did. I had no problem getting Palestinians to come to these functions. They were more tolerant of Jewish leaders than US government officials. Their hostility was directed against US policy, not Americans or Jews as such.

Secretary of State Alexander Haig visited Jerusalem while I was there, as did George Shultz, frequently. American official VIPs stayed at the King David Hotel, near the consulate. They arrived at Lod Airport in Tel Aviv and headed quickly to Jerusalem in a roaring motorcade. If it was the secretary, I would meet him and his entourage at the hotel, along with the manager and additional Israeli security agents. We would then wend our way through the crowded lobby toward two small elevators.

The question of who would ride with the secretary in such intimacy arose early in my tour. Sam and I discussed the matter and Sam said I should do the honors. The procedure was always the same. The secretary, a security guard, and I got into the elevator and rode to the appropriate floor, usually in silence. Photographers snapped pictures of us entering and exiting this small conveyance, and that was the point. I always tried to look as if I had just learned something important. We called this ritual "elevator diplomacy." If only these vertical boxes could talk, what tales they would tell! Before my time, Secretary Kissinger and his little group once spent forty-five minutes together when the elevator got stuck while they were on their way to dinner.

For me, the most memorable elevator ride at the King David was on the way down from former President Carter's top floor suite to the lobby, one evening near the end of his visit in 1983. Mrs. Carter had felt slightly ill during the day with symptoms of flu, and a doctor had been sent for. She was able to go out, and the Carters, the doctor, a security agent and I filled the elevator as we started off. Carter asked the doctor what was troubling his wife. "Mrs. Carter," came the answer, "has herpes." The silence was awkward as we reflected on this, eyes respectfully lowered. I wished I were at the Dead Sea rather than a few inches from President Carter as he received this unsettling news. Herpes, the doctor explained, takes many forms, including minor aggravations in the mouth, and with the pills he prescribed all would be well in a day or two. Whew! Ground Floor. Everybody out to face the tourists and cameras!

The King David's VIP suites overlooked the old city, and the view was breath-taking, particularly at sunset. Early in a visit, Sam and I briefed the visitor or CODEL, often at the hotel, where we were mindful that we might have a larger audience than just those of us in the room. We of course did the same for Henry Kissinger when he came on a private visit. When the delegation was to pay a call on the prime minister or foreign minister, Sam would be the escort; it would have been inappropriate for me to go along, as my relations with the Israeli government were circumscribed.

Jerusalem's Mayor Kollek

Jerusalem's renowned mayor, Teddy Kollek, was in office during my tour, as he had been for many years before and was to be afterwards. When I arrived, I called on him. It was a cordial but tough meeting. He told me he was trying to make Jerusalem a united city, and the American consulate general was trying to divide it. He pointed to the fact that we had two 4th of July receptions--one in West Jerusalem, and the other in East Jerusalem for Palestinians. When June rolled around, I sent out invitations to two 4th of July parties, as had been the custom since 1948.

Teddy Kollek went through the roof. He wrote an unkind letter of protest to Sam Lewis, which Sam unhelpfully forwarded to me for reply.

We did not want to hold two 4th of July receptions, of course, and were not interested in exacerbating Israeli-Palestinian divisions. I believed, however, that there was no other choice, and that the problem had not been created by the US. If we had attempted to hold just one event, no Palestinians, in those days of resentment about the Camp David Accords and the worst of West Bank violence, would have come, creating a breach in our relations that would have been difficult to repair. All of the other consuls felt obliged to hold two events on their national days, something that seemed to trouble Kollek far less. I saw no way to satisfy Kollek and at the same time continue our open, if not fruitful, dialogue with Palestinians. I was able to bring Israelis and some Palestinians together socially at my home, but during 1980-83 that would not have worked at a public function.

So, we had the Israeli community in the shaded summer garden of the residence, along with many Americans living in Jerusalem and on the West Bank, journalists, a protocol person from Kollek's office (the mayor himself would not come), distinguished Israeli friends like the former chief justice and chancellor Harman of Hebrew University, and the religious leaders. Our consular colleagues also attended this pleasant, even elegant, garden party which, with women in hats, many men in blazers, had a 1930s feeling to it.

The second celebration was held the next evening in East Jerusalem, on the roof of the American Colony Hotel. This was a smoky feast of grilled foods and Arab dishes lit by strings of colored lights and noisily animated by sounds of Arab music. I invited as many Israelis as I could to both celebrations. Palestinians attended the party in East Jerusalem in great numbers, bringing their families and uninvited friends. Journalists and some Israelis came to both events, including Israeli reporters and columnists who enjoyed friendships with Palestinians. Our consular colleagues came, and we partied into the night with the Vester family who had so long been associated with the American colony.

These 4th of July celebrations bedeviled us for the three years I was in Jerusalem. I gritted my teeth and gave them anyway, and was finally able to pacify Teddy Kollek in the matter. At stake, I told him, were our contacts with even moderate Palestinians as conditions on the West Bank deteriorated, a situation he also deplored. The US was second to none, I told him, in its belief that Jerusalem was, and should remain, an undivided city. But we also had to face realities of the times.

Kollek and I became friends. He came to the residence often, where his preference was to sit on the floor with his legs crossed. Guests would talk with him about Jerusalem and his plans for its future. I took congressional delegations to see him or, if their stay was short, hosted a reception and invited Teddy. I also spent time with him planning visits of American officials, which brings up the Weinberger precedent.

During my time, when cabinet-level American officials visited Arab East Jerusalem they would be escorted by myself or a member of my staff, but not Kollek or one of his staff, although Teddy quite rightly considered himself mayor of the whole city. In 1983, when Cap Weinberger, then secretary of defense, was scheduled to visit Jerusalem, I cabled the State Department arguing that the practice of having the consul general escort an American official within East Jerusalem, while Kollek did the honors in West Jerusalem, was an anachronism. Kollek justifiably resented this distinction, and Palestinians didn't care. I informed the Department that unless instructed otherwise, I would ask Mayor Kollek to escort Weinberger through East and West Jerusalem. Splitting the city in this way was unseemly, and ran counter to our own interests. We had maintained for years that Jerusalem was one city and yet, when it came to realities, we sometimes treated it as two.

I had called our desk officer in Washington, after having discussed my proposal with Sam Lewis first, to alert the Department to this message. Go ahead, they said, and see what happens. I called on Teddy to share the news. Before I could open my mouth, he said to me in his gravelly voice that he knew why I was there, and was sick and tired of the usual pitch about visitors. I told him to calm down and listen. I was there to discuss the Weinberger visit. He said he didn't want to hear about it. I then told him we were proposing that he escort the secretary of defense through East and West Jerusalem. Teddy looked at me, dumbfounded. He finally said: "God bless you!" Weinberger, Kollek, and I traveled around all of Jerusalem in a mini-van. When we alighted inside the old walls, Teddy turned to Weinberger and said: "You know, you are making history!" Of course, I had briefed Weinberger and he understood the reference. This is progress in the Middle East.

I had a heartwarming relationship with Teddy Kollek, and admired him greatly. He was held in esteem by most Palestinians who lived in Jerusalem, and did a lot for them. They trusted him. I don't remember ever hearing a Palestinian say something nasty about Kollek. He was what we would call a ward politician with street smarts, a big heart, and a great personal touch, a man of the people. He took enormous pride in the acres of flowers he planted in Jerusalem. There were many parks, and the boulevards were divided by flower beds. Driving around the city in his battered Volkswagen Beetle, Teddy occasionally spotted someone picking a flower. He would slam on the brakes and pounce on the unlucky individual. "What would happen to this city if everybody picked its flowers?" he bellowed. The subject of this tirade from the mayor would be mortified, but what can you do with a flower once you have picked it?

Teddy made a political error: he stayed in office too long. I think he could have become prime minister if the Labor Party had chosen him. No one had better ties to Americans. But he was not willing to abandon his first love, Jerusalem. It was already too late for Kollek on the national scene when I was there. He stayed as mayor until voted out. Time passed him by, and from his small, second-floor apartment he has lived to see his Likud successor restore the walls between people he did so much to break down.

Places on the West Bank and Gaza

Some Palestinian villages and cities remain sharply etched in memory. Bethlehem is not at all the "little town" of Christmas carols, but rather a sprawling, undistinguished even ugly place teeming with hawkers of religious souvenirs. Mark Twain caught its flavor in Innocents Abroad.

Hebron is a city that disturbs me in a visceral way. There is something dark and menacing about it. A great unholiness resides there. By 1980, a settlement flourished in the heart of Hebron, established by a small group of radical Jewish settlers, some of them from Brooklyn, in an old building next to a mosque. On the roof of this building, one could see a guard post manned by settlers conspicuously brandishing their Uzis, which gave it the look of a military fortress, a jarring in-your-face message to the Arab population. One sensed catastrophes waiting to happen. When a settler shot dozens of Arab worshipers in the Hebron mosque several years ago, I was not surprised.

Nablus is a distinctive city perched on its hills with a certain grandeur. In my time, it also was the most hostile and volatile place on the West Bank. It is geographically removed from the central cluster of West Bank communities, and Palestinians seem a bit different there. Violent demonstrations were frequent in Nablus; it was in Nablus that stones were thrown at my car by teenagers. The city was radicalized in a palpable way.

The Al-Masri family in Nablus were friends. One of the brightest young men in the family, Zafer, was exceptionally courageous in his political moderation as the city's mayor. He knew the US well; members of his family had been educated there. I became acquainted with him, his lovely and politically attuned wife, and their children, who visited me in Jerusalem. Zafer paid for his courage. He was assassinated by radical Palestinians after I left Jerusalem. It was in Nablus that one found Palestinians punishing their kin for the sin of political moderation. Zafer's death was a great and painful loss to the Palestinian cause.

Then there was Gaza with its refugee camps, a powder keg in search of a match. I had good friends in Gaza, and came to understand the dynamics of the area: its poverty and restlessness, feelings of confinement, its aura of being overwhelmed by history. Arafat, today, is having difficulty exerting his authority over the Gaza strip. He is not a good administrator to start with, but Gaza is an ungovernable entity. Gaza's refugee camps were densely crowded shacks lined up along the sea shore, littered with refuse, filthy. They were made of corrugated metal or anything else that would stand, one next to the other for miles. Children were everywhere and population growth was high. There was enough food to keep people alive at modest levels, but the area was seething with pent-up anger exacerbated by the lack of jobs--and hope. Some fished, for themselves and as a business; many of the men worked in Israel as day laborers or pickers in the orange groves. It was sobering to observe such squalor and misery and wonder what Gaza's future might be. I never walked through the camps, but passed through them with my Arab driver. I saw other camps on the West Bank, such as the large one outside Bethlehem, but none as spiritless as Gaza.

My Palestinian contacts had little to do with the refugee camps, although they mentioned these camps and their problems to me often. Mayor Freij of Bethlehem and other Palestinians were concerned about the camps, but did not consider themselves spokesmen for the refugees beyond deploring camp conditions and the reasons for there being refugees in the first place. They accepted the presence of refugees as facts of life under occupation.

The mayors were more concerned about the potential for violence stemming from conditions in the camps, and the presence of so many young men with nothing to do. In fact, the refugees were not represented by anyone; they did not have a voice in the early 1980s. We would hear about them when problems arose, but they were successfully marginalized. We supported the valuable work of private voluntary agencies and UNRWA, efforts backed by many of the world's governments. But the refugees were not themselves a coherent political force; they simply existed in the West Bank and Gaza in large multiplying, unemployed numbers.

The Habib Negotiations

Israel's invasion of Lebanon on June 6, 1982 was the dominating event of my tour. As we watched the crisis mount, Israeli forces moved into Lebanon in an operation cynically called "Peace for Galilee." We thought, initially, that their forces would stop forty kilometers north of the border. But they kept moving, and it slowly became clear that Defense Minister Sharon intended to go all the way to Beirut to expel the PLO and arrange for the election of Bashir Gemayel as president of Lebanon. The Israelis suffered heavy casualties. As these mounted, and the purposes of the invasion became clear, the mood in Jerusalem changed.

The incursion polarized Israeli society as never before. Many Israeli friends asked: "What have we come to? What is this country about in Lebanon and on the West Bank?" Peace Now adherents were the most vocal in their opposition, followed by the Labor Party. A whole country was having an identity crisis. Many Israelis were morally outraged at Begin's government and its purported rationale for the invasion. There were demonstrations and vigils in front of the prime minister's residence, a few blocks from the consulate. When the Sabra and Shatila massacres occurred at Palestinian refugee camps in September, 1982 people viewed Sharon as responsible. Israelis and Palestinians alike were horrified.

Israeli anxiety was reinforced by the flow of soldiers returning from the front in coffins. Jerusalem's atmosphere is often tense and somber, but during the Lebanon crisis it was funereal. National schizophrenia took hold. As bad news from Lebanon flowed in day after day, the depression deepened. Jerusalem's universities, its scholars and religious leaders, provide the city moral authority and make it a repository for national values. Jerusalem cherishes its memories of the founding of the State of Israel and the collective conscience of its founders, and now the very meaning of Zionism was challenged.

Into this atmosphere came Philip C. Habib, assisted by Morris Draper, as leader of a US negotiating team seeking to dislodge Arafat and his fighters from Lebanon. Subsequently, Habib would broker a peace among Lebanese factions and attempt to end the war itself. I had no idea, nor did Phil at the outset, of what was in store for all of us.

I encountered Phil at my first post, Abidjan, in 1960, when he came through the region gathering material for his National War College paper on Africa. Ever buoyant, he and the consulate's American secretary, Marion Markle, had a memorable picnic trip by Volkswagen Beetle into the rain forest, where in village after village Phil sought out Lebanese shopkeepers to practice his Arabic. Marion reported that he received a hero's welcome. Phil had visited me in Jerusalem earlier, when he was trying to rekindle negotiations between Jordan and Israel on riparian issues involving the Jordan River. He had barely begun this work when President Reagan named him as his personal envoy for the larger issues of Lebanon.

Phil became a frequent guest at the residence. I insisted he stay with us rather than at a nearby hotel, because we had more comfortable quarters and he was better protected there. He could hold meetings at any time under secure conditions. Our offices and communications facilities were a floor above the living quarters and provided immediate support.

Phil loved staying at the residence for its spacious and cool comfort and the quality of the household staff, particularly the talents of Atta, our Arab cook. In typical Habib fashion, he complained that his shirts were ironed better at the ambassador's residence in Beirut. He gorged on the Lebanese pistachio nuts we put before him. He loved the rose garden. At my urging, after his death, a plaque was placed in the garden honoring him and his love of roses. Phil spent time with me, just musing and chatting. He found the residence a calming shelter from the world beyond its walls. There were days when he arrived worn out. Phil, at 63, had experienced two heart attacks, and the negotiating process was grueling. From time to time, I arranged for an Israeli cardiologist to show up at the residence. Phil grumbled a bit, but was pleased to have a check-up. His concern was that these calls would leak to the press, but they never did.

When his motorcade arrived, I met Phil at the front door and took him to the guest room, where he unpacked his bag and hung up his suits, which were always in plastic dry cleaning wrappers. An excellent way to keep the wrinkles out, he reminded me. He stripped to his boxer shorts and tee-shirt, stretched out on the bed, and started talking. Phil invariably asked about my children, and how the household staff was faring. We discussed the garden and agreed it needed his scrutiny, an issue of priority on his personal agenda. He shared his concerns about the work at hand. Then he dozed off.

For Phil, the negotiations were arduous, frustrating, and often disappointing. Phil instinctively understood the Lebanese and their Syrian masters lurking in the background. Washington had given him a near carte blanche to resolve the issues in PLO withdrawal and the larger peace effort. On the phone, he dealt with Near East assistant secretary Veliotis on day to day matters, and occasionally with Secretary Shultz, an old California friend. He also spoke frequently with NSC adviser Bud McFarlane. There were occasional bursts of shouting from Phil, but he generally found the Washington bureaucracy supportive. Ambassador Lewis shared fully in these matters. He and his committed staff, including Charlie Hill, Bill Brown, and Paul Hare, became nearly as worn down as Phil as they produced reams of reporting cables.

It was the Israeli government that troubled Phil most. He had direct access anytime to Prime Minister Begin, but sometimes found him removed from Phil's immediate concerns. While Phil encountered warmth and support in many government quarters, particularly the foreign ministry, he found these qualities lacking in Defense Minister Sharon, whom he distrusted and disliked. The massacres at the refugee camps in Lebanon upset Phil greatly. He was frustrated by infighting in Lebanon among the various factions and their inability to act together. His Lebanese origins seemed to have no influence on his views or emotions, but helped him understand the mindset and negotiating styles of his counterparts in Beirut. During each visit Phil asked me to brief him about the situation on the West Bank, which was always grim. He was careful to keep these matters separate from the concerns of his negotiations, but on a couple of occasions agreed to pass along comments and advice about the West Bank where it was most likely to do some good in Begin's government.

One afternoon, Phil was in a good mood and looking for something to do. I suggested we visit the collection of Roman glass at the Israel Museum, one of the best collections, if not the foremost, in the world. The museum was close and he agreed to go. When we entered the rooms where the glass is exhibited, Phil lost himself. He became engrossed in shapes and colors, and for a long time walked from one beautifully lit display case to another, totally absorbed. It was one of the few times I lured him out of the residence. Arab feasts with family and staff at Walid's Philadelphia Restaurant constituted the others. Phil cherished the quiet solitude provided by the residence and its garden.

Phil was fond of my children, two of whom lived with me, and two others, Cathy and Jack, who visited from college in the summer. He would greet my youngest son Mark at the breakfast table with a hearty, "Good morning, smartass!" He was a warm and funny person, despite his often stern demeanor. Phil's daughter Phyllis spent some time with us, and we tried to make her feel part of the family. Occasionally, I would host small dinners for him to which I invited UNIFIL officers, journalists, and other interesting people in Jerusalem. Phil was a great dinner companion and raconteur. He liked good wine. "Dining is the soul of diplomacy," Lord Palmerston observed. Whenever Brian Urquhart of the UN was in Jerusalem, I asked him to dinner with Phil. It was fascinating to hear their assessments and reminiscences. Brian, as well, had a deep and intuitive understanding of Lebanon and the Middle East.

We were stretched thin in the consulate when Phil was in town. Martha Hayward, ever a tireless secretary, saved us time and again. These visits were a workload for which we were not prepared. My undaunted deputy, Jock Covey, took on this chore, having had invaluable staffing experience in the State Department's executive secretariat. We trained our junior officers to put together briefing books, sort cables, and staff the needs of a busy negotiator. They took to this work like bees to honey, and enjoyed their easy access to Phil. Phil in turn, took an interest in them. He asked about their careers, past and prospective, and why they had joined the Foreign Service, amplifying everything with his usual wisecracks. The junior officers loved it, and vied for the demanding responsibility of taking care of him. Many of them received quick promotions and were recognized by the State Department for their outstanding work in Jerusalem. The lesson in this is that foreign service professionals like to work with strong leaders engaged in important issues. They will give their all in response to wise leadership from someone whose understanding and management of matters at hand commands respect.

On one of his visits to Jerusalem, Phil was unhappy about his support from our embassy in Lebanon. He was about to return to Washington for a meeting with the president, and told me he intended to ask Reagan to appoint me ambassador to Lebanon forthwith. I thanked him for his confidence and said I needed to sleep on it, although I knew what my answer would have to be. At breakfast the next morning, I told Phil it would not be possible for me to go. I had a commitment to my sons living with me that I could not abandon when they were at an age at which a father's guidance is badly needed. The divorce had been hard on them. Phil made his disappointment clear--he was a great believer in "the Foreign Service first"--but accepted my decision, frowning at me from time to time later on, grumbling that I should have gone to Beirut.

Had I done as he wished, I would have been at our embassy when it was blown up in a terrorist attack.

Habib's temper was legendary, and his blow-ups were memorable though brief. Nick Veliotis, then assistant secretary for the Middle East, tells the story of one of Phil's quick visits to Washington during the Lebanese crisis. Phil asked Nick to draft a telegram on some complicated matter, which Veliotis and his associates promptly did. The draft was handed to Phil, who retreated into Nick's office and closed the door, while the others waited outside in trepidation. Sure enough, the outburst came: "GOD DAMN IT!" Phil yelled to their dismay. "Why can't the rest of the Department do work like this!"

Habib had a wise press policy. When he went to the foreign ministry at the outset of his negotiations, he was confronted after the initial discussions by a huge jumble of TV cameras and journalists. Phil, undaunted, went to the microphones, looked straight into the cameras and said: "Ladies and gentlemen, this is going to be a silent movie!" He surveyed the startled faces for a few seconds, and left. He would not speak to the press during the negotiations, except for an occasional formal statement. He believed that one cannot negotiate in public. The Israeli press, moreover, was notorious for its flights of fancy and tenacity.

In the early days of his negotiations, Phil received kudos by the gross. One week, he was on the covers of Newsweek and Time. After Arafat's exit from Beirut, he was increasingly mentioned as a candidate for the Nobel Peace Prize. When Phil returned to Washington for consultation, President Reagan usually invited him to lunch. Habib was the star of US foreign policy. That reputation changed after a suicide truck bombing of the Marine barracks in Beirut killed 241 Americans in October of 1983, the worst of times for Americans committed to peace in the Middle East by their presence, actions and cautious hopes.

Writ of Ne Exiat

One of my reasons for returning to Washington for consultations in the spring of 1983 was to be present in court for divorce proceedings. Our marriage could no longer be held together. Mary, living in Washington, had changed lawyers, and a new one was starting to work with her. One afternoon, as I briefed members of the policy planning staff in the State Department on Jerusalem and the Palestinians, two federal marshals appeared in the outer office with a warrant for my arrest under a writ of ne exiat, which a judge issues when someone is believed to be intending to flee the country to avoid the law. They ordered me to leave the building with them, and frisked me in a men's room. We drove to the District of Columbia Jail where I spent the next two hours in a private cell. With time to think, once I had overcome my shock, I recognized this legal tactic, intended to embarrass me and hurt my reputation, which it briefly did to some extent, was so off the wall it would probably help me in divorce proceedings, which it also did. My lawyer delivered a thousand dollars in cash to bail me out and I breathed free air again.

The next morning, an irritated judge vacated his own order and rebuked Mary's lawyer for employing this strategy. In its Washington gossip column a few days later, however, The New York Times alluded to the incident without mentioning my name, lightheartedly characterizing me as a foreign service officer involved in a divorce frantically trying to elude federal marshals in the State Department's corridors. The writer seemed to find in this fantasy a characterization of the Foreign Service itself.

Middle East Peace

I left Jerusalem in early summer 1983, thoroughly discouraged about the future of the West Bank and Gaza. The Camp David process had run its brief course. I saw no prospect any time soon for the creation of a respectable entity Palestinians could call their own. They were at their most despairing, a mood that erupted four years later in the intifada uprising which introduced armed clashes, for the first time, into the occupied territories themselves. Moderates in Israel and among Palestinians hunkered down to wait for change.

And, finally, change did come at the Madrid Conference of October 30, 1991, an event that could not have happened during the Cold War. Presidents Bush and Gorbachev, the latter with only two months left in office, together brought to the table in Madrid representatives of Israel, Syria, Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon, and the Palestinians. Nothing comparable had occurred since the creation of Israel in 1948 at the Cold War's onset. Much of the credit belongs to Secretary of State James Baker.

The fact that the Soviet Union no longer existed, and Syria and the PLO had therefore lost its support, made the decisive difference. With Cold War competition over, Russia and the United States saw their interests beginning to converge and joined forces in the Middle East. The Madrid Conference broke the downward spiral in Arab-Israeli relations, although beyond its symbolism in post-Cold War realignments, it amounted to little more than a new format for old problems. In the Middle East, however, formats matter. The struggles between Israelis and Palestinians are not in the main religious, but secular. They are about land, water, security, dignity, and freedom in its many forms. Whose land, today, is the West Bank and Gaza, and whose city is Jerusalem? By what rights--biblical, historical, conquest, deed, use or occupation--do these lands belong to Arabs or Jews?

Progress toward peace was made under the 1993 Oslo Declaration of Principles, signed on the White House lawn one hot September day by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, soon to be assassinated as Sadat had been, and PLO President Yasser Arafat. The accords had been reached without US participation or knowledge. At the White House ceremony on the lawn, I watched these former adversaries hesitate--and then shake hands, and I joined in the emotional ovation. With President Clinton standing in the middle, as Carter had stood with Begin and Sadat, the scene rekindled a fragile flame of hope.

Nevertheless, in a dangerous and inexplicable strategy, Prime Minister Netanyahu, abetted by Sharon as Minister of National Infrastructures, is creating new settlements in Jerusalem and on the West Bank, more facts on the ground, as his critics say. He adheres minimally, if at all, to the spirit of the Oslo Declaration. Arafat, on his part, is showing himself, so far, to be the weak leader and poor administrator of a corrupt Palestinian Authority, failing to control terrorism and rioters, or discipline Palestinian police in cities such as Gaza and Hebron.

Regarding Jerusalem, I suspect that a generous formula for religious sovereignty and Palestinian rights will eventually prove acceptable, one that guarantees access and control of holy places to the concerned parties in an open city that serves, by common consent, as Israel's capital, and perhaps even Palestine's. When that happens, the United States will move its embassy. The US role as peace broker in the Middle East remains indispensable and, like Phil Habib, we must not give up. The Cold War's outcome augments the diplomatic options. The lesson of Oslo is that Americans, Israelis, and Palestinians are not alone in these efforts.

My years in Jerusalem were difficult and painful for everyone. And yet, Val Vester, still at the American Colony Hotel, wrote to me fifteen years afterwards: "I think you would hate Jerusalem if you saw how it is now, so built up and surrounded by high-rise fortresses...I look back on the period that you were here as a very happy one."

DENNIS C. JETT
Science Attaché
Tel Aviv (1980-1983)

Ambassador Jett was born in Massachusetts and raised in New Mexico. He received degrees from the University of New Mexico and the University of Witwatersrand (South Africa). After a year at the US Naval Academy, he joined the Foreign Service in 1972 and was posted to Buenos Aires. Several assignments at the State Department in Washington DC and Miami were followed by tours of duty at Tel Aviv, Lilongwe and Monrovia. In 1993 Mr. Jett was named United States Ambassador to Mozambique, where he served until 1996, after which he served as US Ambassador to Peru from 1996 to 1999. Following retirement, the ambassador has pursued an academic career, as professor, at the Universities of Florida and Penn State. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2011.

Q: '80, so then where?

JETT: Actually, I was supposed to stay on in the energy office for another year, but a friend of mine from the economic bureau, Richard Kauzlarich, came by one day and said, "I have a problem. I'm going out to be economic counselor in Tel Aviv and there was a guy who was supposed to be science attaché. At the last minute he decided he couldn't go overseas at this point so I've got this vacancy coming up in a matter of weeks. Who can I get to do it?" I thought about it for a couple of minutes and I said, "Maybe I'll do it." I then went out and I found another friend who was willing to replace me in the energy office so they would not object to my leaving on such short notice. So in a course of about four weeks I went from expecting to sit in the energy office for another year to being on my way to Tel Aviv. I was an O-5 at the time and it was a O-3 job so it was a two-grade stretch.

Q: Great. Well now you were there from 1980 until when?

JETT: It was about September 1980 until March '83.

Q: Oh that was an interesting time. What was happening in Israel when you went out?

JETT: Within my time there they bombed the reactor in Baghdad so that was a source of excitement. They also invaded Lebanon and pushed their way to Beirut; so you had the consequences of that. It's never is a dull time there. It's always of intense interest; there is always a steady stream of Congressional delegations and other prominent people. I got to be control officer for any number of Congressmen and Senators and other dignitaries; I was control office for Charlie Wilson a couple of times. He is just as much a character as Tom Hanks portrays him in the movie.

Q: Oh yes, there's a movie called "Charlie Wilson's War" in which he is shown to be a prime person in arming the Afghan Mujahedeen against the Soviets.

JETT: Exactly and Tom Hanks makes him seem more kind and benign than he really was. He had a mean streak in him and he was a big supporter of Israel so when he came to Israel they loved him and he loved them. I guess the only thing you could say about Charlie Wilson in his defense is that he was a scoundrel but freely admitted it. He had a drinking problem and a drug problem and a womanizing problem but he didn't attempt to hide it; he didn't say I'm a family values politician. He just said, "Yeah, I like to drink, I like women and I like..." and he kept getting elected; so apparently it didn't matter to his constituents. He was such an ardent anti-Communist that he saw arming the Mujahedeen as a crusade. Too bad we did that and then lost interest in Afghanistan as they morphed into Al Qaeda.

Q: Who was our ambassador when you arrived there?

JETT: Sam Lewis. He was ambassador for a total of eight years in Israel...

Q: Yeah.

JETT: ...my entire time there he was ambassador.

Q: How did you find the embassy? It must have been quite different from Buenos Aires?

JETT: It was a small embassy. It had this huge AID program but AID for Israel consisted of handing them a check every quarter so we didn't have this army of AID people to supervise projects and track the money. We had four people in the economic section; I was the science attaché. I would often encounter Israelis who would say, "If you have a couple degrees in economics why are you the science attaché? Aren't you really CIA?" I would just say, "Well believe what you want to believe" since trying to explain was probably a waste of time.

So there was the economic counselor, Rich Kauzlarich, and Harry Stein who was internal economics, then there was me and another guy who was the AID officer; he was a State Department officer and had other things to follow since, as I mentioned, the only AID work was handing over the quarterly check. Then they had four or five people in the political section, a pretty big consular section. I think it's still in the same building right there across the street from the beach. It was a pretty small embassy, but it had all these Congressional delegations. It probably had if not one a week or at least every other week. The other thing about it that was different was you had this consulate in Jerusalem but they didn't report to the embassy. So you had to keep reminding yourself to consider the consulate in Jerusalem as if it were an embassy in a different country in terms of how you coordinated with them.

Q: What were the Congressional delegations? Were they coming out to have pictures taken and live off the largesse of the Israelis or were there real issues at stake?

JETT: Well there are always real issues and the biggest issue was, of course, the effort to resolve the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, which has been going on for years. Most of the Congressmen, I think, were coming out just to have their ticket punched to show that they cared about Israel so they could score points with their Jewish constituents or their evangelical Christian constituents and to go shopping. But there were some who really cared about the Middle East peace process. When I was there Reagan came out with his peace plan. I remember I was with a couple staffers of Stephen Solarz and the announcement gets made that this new plan is on the table and the staffers were incensed at me because I didn't have a copy of the plan in my pocket to hand them instantaneously as soon as it hit the news. So there were some people who really cared about the issues and then sometimes there were economic issues and trade issues between Israel and the United States that drew a little bit of attention.

Of course, some cared about the military relationship so it was like anything. You had a mix of some Congressmen there for tourism and ticket punching and others because they really wanted to learn about the issues and have an understanding of where they ought to come down. And the Israelis were masterful when it came to hosting congressmen and making their pitch.

Q: I talked to somebody, Sam I can't remember his last name; he went as ambassador to a place in Latin America later.

JETT: Hart.

Q: Yeah, he was disenchanted because he would draw up plans about what Israel should get and the Israelis would laugh at him and just go to Congress and get what they wanted. I mean this was very frustrating. Did this affect you at all that sort of thing?

JETT: That is clearly part and parcel of the relationship. They a tremendous influence, one of the most powerful lobby's in Washington is AIPAC, the American-Israel Political Action Committee. They are very skillful at getting things out of Congress. People sitting in an embassy, whether it's in Israel or anywhere else in the Middle East, can say based on our interests and our resources and everything else this is what the policy ought to be. And the policy gets determined in Washington by people who are worried about whether their Jewish voters are going to vote for them or not. Three quarters of Jewish voters vote Democratic. It dropped to two-thirds for Mr. Obama, but typically it is three-quarters. But even in Republican districts there is a significant group there that no Congressman can afford to ignore -- Evangelical Christians. Of course, they love Israel because they read about it in the Bible and not because they understand anything about the Middle East. It's a very politicized relationship and I think anybody who sits down and makes a calculus of what they define as American interests is going to be disappointed in the sausage that come out of the Washington policy-making machine. I also think that AIPAC does not care about Israel or the United States as much as it cares about AIPAC's power. The worse thing that could happen to AIPAC would be for peace to break out in the Middle East. Then their empire and their influence would evaporate overnight.

Q: I mean this is a political and political-military issue but how did you view and maybe comment on how some of your fellow officers felt about the Israelis; it can only be described as a premeditated invasion of Lebanon. How did you view that?

JETT: Well I remember it was kind of triggered by there had been incidents along the border for a long time and then there was an assassination attempt on an Israeli diplomat.

Q: Yeah, on the ambassador to London.

JETT: Right.

Q: I'm told that everyone knew that Sharon had cocked the pistol...

JETT: Right.

Q: ...and waited for it to go off.

JETT: I think that's true. The assassination attempt happened on a Friday and then you had an exchange of artillery and rockets between both sides on Saturday. I had an Israeli-American friend who was in the army reserves and he got a call Saturday to mobilize. On Sunday morning, they were rushing past the UN peacekeepers and on into Lebanon. I guess you could say Sharon was looking for an excuse to invade and deal with the problem. It's in the same way that today they get rockets from Gaza; so they attempted to go in and deal with it in Gaza. Eventually they pull out after much loss of life and destruction and things calm down a little and now they are getting more rockets from Gaza. It's an unfortunate cycle that seems to be repeating itself.

Q: As this fighting progressed there were you developing a feel for this? I mean whether this a good thing, a bad thing or what?

JETT: Initially it was pretty easy as the Israelis had military successes and then, of course, when it got to the outskirts of Beirut where there were the two refugee camps Sabra and Shatila. Lebanese Christians went in and murdered hundreds of women and children while the Israelis did nothing to stop it. So that created a huge controversy. Then the whole operation bogged down and became a war of attrition and that's not a war that Israelis are willing and capable of fighting for very long. I remember talking to an Israeli, who was trying to explain to me the impact of the war on Israel. He said to me, "You know how many people died in Vietnam?" I said, "56-57 thousand" and he said, "How many did you know?" I said, "Well I knew a handful maybe a half a dozen." Then he said to me, "Well so far in this war in Lebanon we've lost 200 soldiers and I know the soldiers or the families of at least 180 of those."

Q: Good God.

JETT: One of the constant things you hear in Israel is “it’s a small country” and it’s very small in a lot of ways both geographically and in terms of the number of people. The number of people, of course, has grown fairly significantly with the influx of Russian Jews and others, but it is a very small country, which is one reason peace with the Palestinians is so difficult to achieve. They would have the names of the soldiers that died on television at night. There has been some controversy in this country when people like Nightline or some television program started putting the names of the dead on and conservatives were criticizing that because they never like to be reminded of the cost of the wars they are always pushing for. I remember back in the Vietnam War, I don’t know why I remember this, but I remember watching the nightly news on television. They were saying 343 American soldiers died in Vietnam this week. Then the next story was about a cheetah that had escaped from a zoo and they attempted to recapture it and shot it with a tranquilizing dart. It died and I remember hearing myself say, “Oh.” Then I thought instantaneously they just told me 343 Americans died and I had no reaction and yet this animal escaped from a zoo and I am sort of touched by it. I don’t know, but for some reason I’ve never forgotten that moment.

Q: No, no it is a sort of thing. It’s a very common reaction.

JETT: It’s like a Bulgarian student I was talking to a couple days ago. He quoted Stalin as saying, “One death is a tragedy, a million deaths is a statistic.” So I think you lose the sensitivity when it gets to big numbers.

Q: You really do. Sabra and Shatila, the two refugee camps of Palestinian refugees where there was a slaughter by the Christian militia, how did that play in Israel at the time?

JETT: I can’t remember specifically but I think initially there was some confusion as to who was responsible and what the Israeli role was. It was the usual fog of war and perhaps some self-censorship and manipulation of the media. It was pretty clear that the Israelis didn’t do it from the get go, but exactly who did and why was a little bit unclear. And the extent of Israel’s involvement was not clear until months later. I think probably people on the political right in Israel said, “Well this is just the Lebanese killing Lebanese and it’s unfortunately but it’s not our problem.” I think the people on the left said, “Well we don’t know to what extent we are involved, but certainly it happened as a result of our invasion so we have some responsibility and so on.” I think almost anything in Israel has a wide range of reactions because you have an amazing range of political views and religious views and nationalist Zionist views; anything provokes a very diverse range of reaction.

Q: How was Sharon viewed after you’d been there a while? Did you have a feel for him?

JETT: No, it was Begin and Shamir who was the head of the government or maybe Shamir was foreign minister still.

Q: I think Begin during that time was the...well maybe they switched back and forth.

JETT: I can't remember when Begin left. I remember being at the airport once and seeing Begin walk out just a few feet away. I was in a meeting once with Shamir when he was foreign minister. I took some Congressmen in and he was always described as a Sabra. A Sabra is the Israeli cactus and it is also a native born Israeli or an Israeli born in Israel. Begin was described like a cactus, prickly on the outside and soft on the inside; Shamir was described as soft on the outside but prickly on the inside. But Sharon was defense minister and he was viewed as a tough guy and given his military experience and his political leadings he was a hardliner.

Q: Could we stop here or just one section. As the science attaché I assume that you did not report on nuclear developments in Israel?

JETT: I did to the extent that there were nuclear developments that were known. There was a guy named Mordechai Vanunu, an Israeli who started talking about the nuclear program but that hadn't happened yet. There were people from the American nuclear power industry who were coming to Israel so I would talk to them and find out what they were trying to sell Israel and what they knew about the Israeli program. In terms of classified stuff I didn't engage in trying to collect that as it would have been unsuccessful and not well received. I remember Edward Teller, the so-called father of the H-bomb, came through for a visit and I met him and I said, "Oh let's have breakfast." He said, "Okay," so the next day he and I had breakfast and we talked a little bit about Israel and nuclear power and nuclear weapons. That kind of strange encounter was not unusual in Israel. The thing I remember most about it is he had about a third of a cup of coffee and took about five packets of sugar and stirred it into his coffee until it was almost like syrup; then he drank it. Anyhow, that is what I remembered more than I remember what he had to say about mutually assured destruction and nuclear weapons.

Q: What was personal life like in Israel? I've had people say you got much more involved there than anywhere else.

JETT: I think that depends on the individual obviously as in any country. Some people only shop at the commissary and they'll go home and a weekend for them is to get out their DVD or their video tape player and they'll watch five movies. If they can't get Diet Dr. Pepper in the commissary and watch five movie CDs in a weekend then they are depressed. Other people will get into the society in a really big way. One sport I took up in 1977 was running marathons. I continued doing that in Israel and found a small but friendly running community. I could go to a race, look around and tell you where I was going to finish. It was usually not in the first five, but usually in the next five. The first three years they ran the Tel Aviv marathon, I finished fifth twice and seventh once. I still have running friends from those days with whom I stay in touch. The degree to which people got involved also depended on things other than the sports. During the year I was in New York trading commodities I got divorced and so when I went to Israel I was single; that put me on the diplomatic dating circuit, which was new and different. That also gave me a different way to involve myself in the local culture.

Q: How did you find it? I assume that you were dating Israeli women; were they different compared to the American girls or not?

JETT: I would say so. Israelis in general have the same level of civility of New Yorkers during a transit strike. But once you got to know them, and getting to know them was basically getting introduced to them, then you became a member of the family virtually. I think the single women were also very brusque and abrupt. One reason that was offered for that attitude is that they lived for the moment because they lived in a county that could be invaded tomorrow and be overrun and destroyed. So they didn't mess around. They cut to the chase rather quickly; either they were interested or they weren't and they let you know pretty quickly which way it was.

I was not only dating Israelis, but women in other embassies as well. I had one interesting thing happen to me there in that regard. I was going out with a woman who was in the British embassy, a British Foreign Service officer. I just went out with her a couple times, and hadn't seen her in a while. Everybody listens to the radio news in Israel. They have the time signal on the hour, which also announces the beginning of the news. You could be almost anywhere in Israel and you can hear the beep, beep, beep of the time signal. You would see ten year old kids walking down the street listening to the news on the radio because people cared and it usually had the potential of affecting them directly and immediately for good or for ill. Anyhow, I'm listening to the news on my way home from the embassy and on the news it's reported that a British diplomat has been arrested as spy. She had gone on to date some guy from the Egyptian embassy and he had convinced her to share some documents that she should not have. So the Israelis arrested her, threw her out of the country and she was kicked out of the British Foreign Service; I don't think she was ever charged with anything, but there was quite a scandal. So it was kind of weird to hear her name on the radio and wonder if anyone was going to come question me.

Q: Oh God yes. I'm trying to think we had already gone through the Camp David process hadn't we?

JETT: Yes we had.

Q: Did you have much contact with the Egyptian embassy?

JETT: Not too much. I knew this guy she had gone out with. Another experience that I had was related to Camp David, which was signed the year before I arrived. There was an environmental conference on the Red Sea and it was the first time that the Israelis and Egyptian scientists were getting together to talk; the first contact of almost any kind. So I said, "Hey, maybe I should go to this conference." The embassy agreed even though it happened to be held at a Club Med in Egypt. It was an interesting experience. Both groups were scientists and had an interest in the ecology of the Red Sea so they had that in common. But they were from two countries that had this prolonged state of conflict, which had only just ended. The conference almost ended before it began because the packet of information handed out by the Egyptian organizers had a map of the Red Sea area and the map didn't include Israel; as maps often don't. You see Israeli maps that don't include Gaza and the West Bank and that upsets people. But this one had some sort of vague reference to Palestine where Israel was and so the Israelis basically said you hand out a new map or we'll leave. The Egyptians found a new map, but that was the sort of level of tension and concern. It was an interesting discussion nonetheless.

The other thing that happened while I was there is that Israel withdrew from the Sinai as part of the peace deal. I had gone to Sinai and started scuba diving when the peninsula was Israeli territory. I have an Israeli-American friend, whom I still maintain contact with, who ran a dive center in Sharm el Sheik. About a year after the Sinai was given back to Egypt, he and I took a trip to Sharm el Sheik to see what had changed. It was an amazing experience. We got hassled at the border and did not arrive there until well after dark. He wanted to immediately find a former employee who was a Bedouin, so we pulled off the highway and start driving into the desert in my Pontiac Firebird, a car that was about six inches off the ground because of all the diving gear we brought with us. We got stuck in the sand and I was beginning to wonder what they would say about me at my funeral assuming they ever found the body. Out of nowhere in the middle of the night in the middle of the desert six or eight Bedouin appear and pick up the car and put it on solid ground. They also gave us directions to find his friend's place. We got to his house, which consisted of some rugs for a floor, some plywood for walls and no roof. His friend greets us like family and we go in and sit down on the rugs and are served mint tea. As my friend and his former employee are talking over old times, I'm looking up at the stars and thinking this is why I joined the Foreign Service.

Q: You left there when?

JETT: It was March of '83. Again, I should have stayed a little bit longer, but I found out they wanted a desk officer for Argentina in the Department. There was a person in the job that had some difficulties shall we say and so they needed an emergency replacement quickly. Any desk is a good job and Argentina is a great job so again I found somebody who was willing to replace me on short notice so my boss couldn't object too much that I was leaving. I uprooted and went back to Washington in March of '83.

Q: What did you feel, as you left there in '83, about the future of Israel?

JETT: One of the people I talked to once while at a dinner was Moshe Arens who was a rightwing member of the Knesset.

Q: Wasn't he an ambassador to the U.S.?

JETT: Yes. He was pretty far right. But he was educated in America, had a PhD in aeronautical engineering and incredibly articulate. I just remember probing him on what's the sort of long-term plan here because the demographics are going against you in terms of population growth. His point of view was that's the long term, we need to worry about the short to medium term and we don't have a partner for peace and we can't trust them and therefore why negotiate. You see the same thing today, the same argument offered. I was reading a piece in the Weekly Standard by Elliot Abrams, a man charge with two felony counts for lying to Congress during the Iran-Contra scandal during the Reagan administration. For his crimes he got to be on the National Security Council for George W. Bush and in charge of Middle East Affairs and now he disgraces the Council on Foreign Relations thanks to the poor judgment of Richard Haass. Abrams was essentially writing this piece a couple days ago saying that the Palestinians should just go and be part of Jordan. So to this day you've got people like that and I think essentially that's where the rightwing Israelis, Likud, Netanyahu all are.

I don't see much prospect for peace because I don't think Netanyahu has the vision or the guts to be a Begin and sit down and do a deal and the only way he can stay in power is with a coalition of religious parties that are even more extreme than he is. They are continuing to build settlements on the West Bank and Gaza; this is something that both the Likud and Labor governments have done consistently throughout the decades, which allowed the settlements to continue to grow. Now you have 300 thousand settlers who think they have a Biblical right to cheap housing on somebody else's land. They are a powerful lobby and Israeli governments are always coalitions and generally pretty weak. In the same way the Tea Party today represent a minority of a minority and yet they are having this impact because they are fanatics and dictating policy for the Republicans. I think, in the same way the settlers essentially hijacked Israeli policy and have made serious negotiations impossible.

MAURICE E. LEE
Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Tel Aviv (1981-1988)

Maurice E. Lee was born in Erie, Pennsylvania in 1925. He served with the European Theater during World War II. He received a master's degree from George Washington University and went to Paris, France to learn French. Mr. Lee's career with USIS included positions in Germany, Japan, Vietnam, South Asia, Washington, DC, the Philippines, Korea, and Israel. He was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt on February 9, 1989.

LEE: Well, they say from the frying pan into the fire. I got a call one night from the Agency, in the middle of the night, to go to a place I never dreamed I would serve. I visited there once as a tourist. That was to Israel. And I thought, my God, at this point I need a quiet post after the Philippines and Korea. But duty calls. I didn't realize what I was getting into. It was one of those cases where the Ambassador wanted you there yesterday type of thing. And I only got 20 days stateside, no time for preparing for such an important and volatile part of the world.

Q: Was that Sam Lewis?

LEE: Yes, Sam Lewis. By the time he left he had served there about eight years. As I mentioned, I had no time to prepare myself. I don't consider myself a Middle East expert by any means. And as I came to learn later just to understand Lebanon, which was so intertwined with Israel's political and military goals, and all of its intricacies you could study for a lifetime.

When I got there I found a terrific program, a very tough and hard working staff. I was preceded by one of our best officers, David Hitchcock who had built a very good program. The local staff was a multi-national type of staff, mostly Jews who had immigrated from all over the world, even one from China. In some of the countries I served I knew if I went on vacation nothing would get done until I returned. In Israel if I went on vacation the Israeli staff would take over the program.

They were very professional. I'm fond of all of them. I don't know. There is never a dull moment in Israel. There was some crisis every hour on the hour. You had a constant stream of visitors from the United States. Practically every Congressman had to show his face in Israel because of the power of the Jewish community in the States. You had this constant search for peace with Phil Habib popping in and out. And then McFarlane followed him. Then Secretary of State George Shultz would drop in every once in a while and he'd have a little shuttle diplomacy. And, of course, the PAO was expected assist these principals whenever they were in town. Habib wanted me around to make sure no newspaperman got near him. His mysterious goings and comings made for lots of speculation and publicity which I think he secretly enjoyed. We were located in Tel Aviv, and were constantly going up the hill to Jerusalem. As you know the capital is in Jerusalem, which we don't officially recognize, particularly East Jerusalem in which we will not do official business with the Israeli government. They tried to play a little trick by moving one of their ministries over to East Jerusalem. But we didn't bite. We said if the Minister wants to see the Ambassador he can meet him at the King David Hotel in West Jerusalem.

Going back to our excellent USIS program, the Agency serviced us I think the best I've ever been serviced at any post. We had top notch speakers. And, of course, there's a lot of interest in Israel. And then the Lebanon war, of course, complicated matters tremendously. At one time we had nearly 2,000 members of the media in and out of Tel Aviv covering the war in Lebanon. And they all wanted to see and talk to the Ambassador. All the senior officers had to share the briefing load although the Ambassador, the press attaché and the political counselor carried the burden.

One of the interesting things about being there was that I met a lot of very important and interesting people. And you got involved in everything. I remember once that Elizabeth Taylor was visiting Tel Aviv. I won't get into what the problem was. But she had a problem. And her staff came to me for help and somehow we got it solved. So you never know who you're going to meet in this kind of a job. Sometimes it seemed like sheer "show biz."

Sam Lewis was a very tough guy to work for, but I respected him immensely because he had one of the toughest jobs I've ever seen in the Foreign Service. He had to keep the White House happy. He had to keep the State Department happy. He had to keep the Pentagon happy, and members of Congress. He had to keep the Jewish lobby happy. His American colleagues in the Arab world were taking pot shots at him all the time. Obviously they weren't always on the same track in the approach to resolving the Middle East problem. And I must say today that I just don't see any solution to the problem until both sides make greater concessions toward each other.

Q: What was the main thrust of your program in Israel?

LEE: Well, it was largely media oriented. We did have cultural events, too. I'd say we had a pretty balanced program under the circumstances. But the press in Israel is very powerful and very aggressive. The political science faculties at Israeli Universities are very good and were constantly demanding the top Americans as speakers. Israelis love to argue, not debate issues. If you get two Israelis together and get them to agree on anything that's a major accomplishment. I recall that one day after I'd been there about four or five weeks one of my Israeli employees came in and closed the door. He said, "Mr. Lee, I don't want to embarrass you. But you're going to have to be a lot tougher if you want to survive in this place." I took that message to heart. I remember my first victory. Several weeks later I was at a dinner party and the head of Israeli broadcasting was there.

Q: Head of Israeli what?

LEE: Broadcasting and television. And we were having a heated discussion with everyone else chiming in. I finally started pounding the table and screaming at him. All of a sudden everybody stopped talking. And one of the people said, congratulations Mauri, you've just passed the cultural barrier.

Q: From then on I knew I had to speak up loud and clear if I wanted to be heard.

LEE: Israel is a fabulous country to serve in. It is still a developing country. It's a crisis-ridden country. I've never seen so many travel agencies in one town as in Tel Aviv. When I mentioned this to an Israeli friend he said, "Well, my God, if you had to live here in this tension all the time you'd want to get out every chance you had." I also remember something my housekeeper told me. I used to take walks every once in a while in the evening when I just arrived. And I said to her, it's amazing that when the news comes on at nine o'clock on television, I could see that the television set was on in every house I went by and there wasn't a car moving on the street. And she replied, well, if you had two of your sons wounded in two wars, you'd listen to the news every night too.

Q: What was, for instance, the principal function of your press operation there?

LEE: Well, first of all we had the Wireless File which we had to get out to our key audience. We had that pretty well automated towards the end of my tour there. We had constant press inquiries night and day from both the Israeli and foreign press. Anything that happens in the United States of any significance, I don't care what it is, it's important, it has an effect in Israel. If somebody sneezes in the White House they catch cold in Israel. So we were constantly on the phone with the press and government types.

We also tried to place other types of stories that the Israelis were interested in. But the Israelis had one main concern. And that was the security of their country and its relationship to the United States. Next to the Prime Minister, the American Ambassador to Israel is considered the most powerful man in the country. I recall a funny thing that happened to illustrate this. The Lewises, who were very wonderful hosts, tried to have a cultural evening every two or three months. So a USIS Junior Officer Trainee got the bright idea of having a Mardi Gras evening. There were a lot of Israelis there and everybody came in costume. They elected a king and queen. Well, needless to say Sam and Sallie Lewis were selected king and queen, complete with robes and crowns. Lewis was considered so powerful that some people referred to him behind his back as the high commissioner because he represented the United States. He was very sensitive to that. You never called him that to his face. Pictures were taken. We had a rule about pictures involving the Lewises. But the JOT apparently wasn't aware of it. No pictures went out to the press of the Lewis' until they personally checked them out. Well, these pictures got out, unfortunately. The next day's headline in one of the leading papers was Lewis promoted from high commissioner to king. Needless to say the cultural attaché who was in charge of the event was summoned into the front office and got a real dressing down and the JOT took a long time getting over it. This anecdote should not detract from the fact that Sam and Sallie Lewis were extremely popular in Israel.

Q: Did you put out any publications there? Did you place much information with the press?

LEE: Yes, we had a very good rate of placement. And we also had a very targeted list of people to receive not only Agency publications, but subscriptions to key American journals. One thing about Israel it's very easy to deal right up to the top. The President of Israel and the Prime Minister, at least then, were accessible. When we had a VIP in town who was going to see the Prime Minister I often accompanied with the Ambassador. I sat in on many meetings with Prime Minister Begin. Very relaxed atmosphere, but always intense discussion.

Q: Yes, I'm sure. I don't suppose the -- well, there were so few instances really in which there was any kind of a real controversy between Israel and the United States I almost feel --

LEE: Well, I can recall one that really created a lot of tension and that was over the AWACs to Saudi Arabia. Anytime anything was sold to the Arabs in the area of military hardware, they really got on top of us about it.

Q: And this was pretty unanimous among the entire population?

LEE: Oh, yes. Yes. I'll give you a case of what it was like. Sometimes an American officer would be assigned from a country in the Arab world to an assignment in Israel. He had to do a lot of selling before the Israeli staff and Israeli contacts would believe that he was neutral and represented only official U.S. positions on issues. They just didn't trust anybody who had anything to do with Arabs. You had to be there to feel it. It's unbelievable this intensity.

Q: Do you have any other comment on that?

LEE: Well, I might just say that it went the other way. I understand that anybody that served in Israel and then went to an Arab country had a similar problem. When I went to my first PAO conference in the region the Ambassador said to me, "Mauri, I want to warn you take your armor with you."

I said, "What do you mean?"

He said, "You don't know what it's like to be a Jew amongst all those Arab." Meaning all the other PAOs would be from Arab countries, frustrated by what they considered pro-Israel bias in our foreign policy. When I got to the conference, my colleagues bitched constantly about Israel.

Q: When we came to the end of the last tape you were just referring to the fact that every time you went to a PAO conference in your area your fellow PAOs were bitching because of the highly pro-Israel policy on the part of the U.S. government and how difficult it made it for them to carry on any kind of a program in the Arab world. You want to pick up from there?

LEE: The only retort I could make to that was, hell. I only implement the policy. I don't make it. That was the best defense I could put up.

Q: Do you have anything else that you'd like to say about the Israeli program and what you thought the USIA program contributed to our standing in Israel?

LEE: Well, it was easy to program in Israel because of this intense connection and concern with everything the United States does. And again, I mention that there was easy accessibility to the top publishers, University presidents, I knew them all on a first name basis. It was not that I was so great; it's just that they were so interested in what we had to offer and could give them. We had a very good library servicing out of Washington. We had a documents element in our library. And if a scholar wanted certain basic documents that are only obtainable in Washington we would pay out of our program funds to have these sent to us. Sometimes by cable if they were that important. So they got serviced well.

So I think that in answer to the last part of your question that we served a very useful purpose. Generally, you didn't have to convince Israelis about the goodness of U.S. policy towards Israel. It's only when it diverted a little bit or did something favorable towards the Arabs that they'd get up and scream.

Q: I suppose the question I have is since Israeli technology is so far advanced and I'm sure that they subscribe to a lot of the major news services, what was it that you could give them in terms of information and coverage that they couldn't get from --

LEE: They wanted back up and documentation. Because they're great analysts. There's no such thing as a short newspaper column in Israeli. I mean, the words flow very freely both qualitatively and quantitatively. Of course, they were always looking for inside information.

Q: Well, what could USIA do or USIS do that was not available for the Ambassador and the political set up for the Embassy to do. Were you able to do things or get information that was not available to Israelis through their contacts with the rest of the Embassy?

LEE: To be certain that the correct word and a unified word got out, people who had access to the press were rather limited. Basically the press attaché, myself, the political counselor and the Ambassador, who had a few select people that he would deal with on a one-to-one basis.

Q: Do you think you got a faster and wider feed on important matters than they got through the Embassy itself?

LEE: Well, they didn't go to the Embassy.

Q: No, I mean, do you think -- what I'm saying is do you think that our mission out there that you as part of our mission, that you got a better feed and feel for media response and media output in the United States and in other things than the Embassy itself did?

LEE: Yes, but I was the Embassy outlet for information. Now, for instance, I'll give you a case in point.

Q: Well, how about incoming information?

LEE: You mean from Washington?

Q: Yes.

LEE: Well, that's what I'm talking about. For instance, the wireless file. The Ambassador wanted that on his breakfast table. And if it wasn't there I heard about it pronto. And he read that thing from beginning to end, as did senior members of the government and the media. The wireless file serves a useful purpose because it gives the documentation to the news of the day. You get an AP summary of a speech by the Secretary of Defense concerning Israel; the Israelis want the whole text. They don't rely on that news story. They want to see the substance, the whole story.

I remember one interesting thing. President Reagan gave a speech which had a portion of it devoted to the Middle East while Secretary Casper Weinberger was making his first official visit to Israel. I was traveling with him. The night of Reagan's speech night the Minister of Defense was giving a big party at the Hilton Hotel in honor of Weinberger at the same time the President's speech was coming through on the wireless file. I'd been instructed by Mr. Weinberger to get him a copy of that speech as soon as it came through. It had an embargo on it. In the meantime, we were comparing the advance text with the actual speech coming by VOA. It turns out that the President had made a last minute change in the text. I forget what the change was, but it was a very important one at the time. It affected the Israelis considerably. What if we had just handed out that wireless file without making sure every word was right -- ? I got on the phone to Washington right away and told them of their error. They didn't even know about it. They then sent out the correction immediately.

Abba Eban, who's a prolific writer, would call me up and say, you know, I need such and such a document. I can't get it here in Israel. Can you get it for me? And I got it for him. So much time was devoted to the dispensing of information. But we also had an active cultural program. I don't want to mislead you on that.

Q: No.

LEE: Now, the libraries were very popular because a lot of Israelis can read English. However, we do have an upcoming language problem, among younger Israelis. Young Israelis are not learning English to the extent one would expect. Their parents and forefathers, many of whom came from Europe, in many instances English was their second language. So I think the day is coming in Israel when we will have to start putting out all of our publications in Hebrew. We do put out press releases in Hebrew and English. But we'll have to start concerning ourselves with books, magazines and pamphlets in Hebrew.

Q: To what extent are there other languages used in Israel in view of the fact that you have such a conglomerate of Jewish populations coming from so many different areas.

LEE: Well, a lot of them learned to speak Hebrew. The problem with Hebrew is it is very difficult to read. A number of Israelis on my staff could not read Hebrew well enough to give me a digest of a newspaper article.

Q: And yet the newspapers to a large extent --

LEE: Yes, all major newspapers are in Hebrew with the exception of the Jerusalem Post, which is in English. But all of your top leaders -- I think there was only one man in the cabinet who didn't speak English. That was the Deputy Prime Minister. He didn't speak any English at all. He spoke French though. So if you spoke French you could communicate with him. Shamir's English was weak when I first got there and improved as he made a real effort to learn it. So Hebrew wasn't a problem for me while I was there. It will be a problem later, I think. We tried to bring speakers who spoke Hebrew. At least a couple on my U.S. staff spoke Hebrew -- my Assistant Cultural Attaché and the Press Attaché. But they are Jewish. This is a rather delicate matter. You don't want an Embassy full of American Jews because they speak Hebrew. The Israelis will be the first to tell you that.

I remember the rumors going around that Ambassador Lewis was going to be reassigned. Every once in a while I had a luncheon for the publishers of the newspapers and Lewis would attend. After lunch he'd hold a give and take. The first question asked on that day was who's going to be your successor? And he said, I don't know that I'm leaving. But he said let's be hypothetical. If I was leaving, who would you like to replace me? The spokesman for the group said, I'll tell you one thing. We don't want a Jew.

Q: Who is the present Ambassador of Israel?

LEE: You've got me on that. I can't think of his name, very prominent guy. Anyhow he's leaving to become Ambassador to the UN. And the new one will be Bill Brown who was formerly the DCM during the first part of my tour there. He went to Thailand as Ambassador.

Q: He went to Thailand?

LEE: Yes, he's coming from Thailand to Tel Aviv.

RICHARD M. FAIRBANKS, III
Special Negotiator for the Middle East
Washington, DC (1982-1983)

Ambassador Richard M. Fairbanks, III was born in Indianapolis, Indiana in 1941. He attended Yale on a Navy scholarship and graduated with a degree in history. After graduating, Ambassador Fairbanks served in the Navy for four years. In 1981, he was appointed by President Reagan as the Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations. In 1982, he was appointed Special Negotiator for the Middle East. He was interviewed on April 19, 1989 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: When in 1982 were you given a new position?

FAIRBANKS: In December 1981, Congress went into recess for the Christmas holidays. At that time, we had gotten foreign aid authorization and appropriations through both Houses of Congress for the first time in four years. We got a Republican majority to vote for foreign aid. We hadn't lost a vote all year long. So I walked into the Secretary of State's office and I told him that I had given him "blood, sweat and tears " for a year and that I would be returning to the practice of law. I wished him luck for the future. He said "Fine. Find a good replacement". So I found a good replacement, Powell Moore, who had been in charge of Senate relations on the White House staff. He was known to Haig. I went off with a House Congressional delegation to Brussels for discussions with the Europeans. Before leaving, General Haig said: "I am going to make you an offer you can't refuse. I am going to make you the negotiator for the Law of the Sea". I told him that was a job I could refuse. He responded : " I thought you would. That is not really what I meant. I would like you to be the special negotiator for the Middle East peace process". He was right; I could not refuse that opportunity.

I went off with the Congressional delegation and the word began to leak out while I was in Brussels that Powell Moore would be appointed as Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations and that I was being fired. That got my attention. I went to the leader of the Congressional delegation and told him that I thought I'd better get home to save my reputation. He wished me good luck, and I flew back to the U.S. Then the word leaked out as to what I was going to do. I said that I didn't pretend to have a considerable amount of background on the issues. Secretary Haig said that it was a lawyer's job, that my predecessors in the Carter Administration had been lawyers -- Bob Strauss and Sol Linowitz. He said that I was a lawyer, that he had confidence in me and that he wanted me to do the job. I said "Fine".

I left H in December 1981 and the announcement of my new duties was made in January 1982. Before the public announcement was made, I joined General Haig and Nick Veliotis, who was the Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs at that time and a couple of others on a trip to the Middle East. We went to Egypt, Israel and Jordan. We talked to the leaders about the peace process, where it stood -- autonomy under Camp David, what was needed, negotiations, etc. Basically, the purpose of that trip was both for the Secretary to take another look at the views of the leaders of the region and to introduce me to them as the negotiator. We arrived at the airport in Israel, just having come from Egypt and Haig held a press conference on the tarmac in Tel Aviv. The first question from an Israeli journalist was : "Mr. Secretary, we understand you have a new negotiator for the peace process and his name is Fairchild". Haig confirmed that we had a new negotiator, but his name was Fairbanks with an emphasis on the "Fair". We got back on the plane and Veliotis turned to the Secretary and said: "Mr. Secretary, you missed a great chance. You should have said that his name is Fairchild with the emphasis on the "Child". I was clearly known as someone who was very young and inexperienced in this job. I inherited the same staff that had been working on the peace process under the Carter Administration. So we didn't have to reinvent the wheel.

Q: Where did matters stand in January 1982?

FAIRBANKS: There hadn't been much progress on the Camp David peace process during 1981. Obviously, as the United States went into its presidential election, matters went into stasis on the Middle East negotiations while people waited to see what was going to happen. After the elections, there was going to be a change, and people felt that they had to wait for the new administration to get up to speed. The professional staff who had been working on the peace process stayed intact. They had a couple of meetings beginning in mid-fall 1981, resuscitating the conversations at the staff level on autonomy and about ideas to bridge differences among the parties, etc. But Middle East peace was just beginning to appear on our agenda. Haig had been out to the Middle East once or twice and talked about strategic consensus, pulling people together to look at the Soviet threat. But this was the first time we put the emphasis back on the peace process.

We did very clearly put the emphasis on it through the series of meetings he had in January. I immediately went out again after the Secretary's trip and started a negotiating train with the Foreign Ministers of the countries and of course I would also talk to the Chiefs of State as well in the negotiating sessions. We basically ran into a problem in the winter and early spring of 1982, which was that the meetings had been held alternatively in Israel, Egypt and the United States -- the three parties to the Camp David agreements. When it came to the Israeli's turn, they decided that the discussions would take place in Jerusalem. They had previously been held in Herzliyya. The Egyptians refused to go to Jerusalem because that city was part of the problem and symbolically the wrong place to go. The Israelis were insistent. Therefore we ran into a venue problem for the meeting. So, I had to go from one side to the other to gather ideas and put them together. Then we tried to bridge the venue problem, and I came up with some ideas on that. We went forward during the course of the spring of 1982 and made some progress in crystallizing the differences between the Egyptian and Israeli positions.

Q: Could you give us a little background for those who might not be familiar with the Camp David accords? What had been accomplished by the Carter Administration and where was the process to go?

FAIRBANKS: Of course, the Camp David meeting itself produced the accords which had basically two parts. One, was a peace treaty between Egypt and Israel which was basically being fulfilled by the time the Reagan Administration came in. That is, there was disengagement in the Sinai, there was an international peace-keeping force in the Sinai separating the two parties and Israel had agreed to return all of Sinai to Egypt. That was one-half of the Camp David accords. The other half, the forward looking part dealing with the occupied territories -- the West Bank and Gaza -- and providing a formula for the resolution of that part of the Middle East process and Israeli disengagement from their Arab neighbors and hopefully a long-lasting and formal peace regime between Israel and its Arab neighbors. We were working on the second half, although the first half was still being implemented. The final withdrawal from the Sinai occurred about the spring of 1982 when the Israelis pulled all the way back out of the Sinai and the Egyptians took it over as their jurisdiction.

The track I was really concerned with was the continuing peace process for the West Bank and Gaza. That was to be done in stages under the Camp David accords. The first stage of the process was to provide autonomy for the residents of the areas. There was to be elections in the territories for Palestinians to join an Egyptian delegation and hopefully also a Jordanian delegation, so that there would be a Jordanian-Palestinian-Egyptian-US-Israeli conference. So instead of the three parties then in the Camp David peace process, we were trying to draw in two additional parties -- the Palestinian residents and the Jordanians. Our attempt was to move the autonomy process forward and that is what we picked up. This was while the Sinai disengagement was going on.

Q: How did this relate to the continuing pressure from Israel to have the United States put its embassy in Jerusalem?

FAIRBANKS: From the Israeli point of view, they said that every country gets to choose its capital. They pointed out that the U.S. had its embassy in Tel Aviv while they claimed Jerusalem as its capital. They were not asking the Egyptians to recognize Jerusalem as the capital; the Egyptians had their embassy in Tel Aviv as well. All they were asking was for the Egyptians and the Americans to come to Jerusalem for a conversation and negotiations with a country with which they had diplomatic relations. They wanted to know what was wrong with that.

Q: That would appear to extend the agenda that you were working on.

FAIRBANKS: Jerusalem is probably the most difficult of all the difficult issues, which is why it is always put off to the end in all peace process conversations. It is a very emotional issue, both on the Israeli and the Arab sides. Certainly, there was no attempt to use this to diffuse the process, but once the question of the Jerusalem venue had been raised, it would have been a great loss of face for the Israeli body politic to back down. These things are always difficult. We did have ways of bridging that by bringing the foreign ministers to the United States. We were building up to convene a mini Camp David at the foreign minister level by having the Israeli and Egyptian foreign ministers join the Secretary of State on the Eastern shore of Maryland. We would bring them all together and present to them the American bridging ideas on the points of disagreement, get an autonomy agreement, have the elections and move forward. That was our game plan, which we were ready to put into effect in June 1982. My negotiating team in May 1982 was out in the area; they had just left Egypt and arrived in Jerusalem for conversations with the Israelis in preparation for the June meeting when the Israelis invaded Lebanon. So we pulled the negotiating team out of Jerusalem and told them to come home because we didn't want to have it appear that we were supporting the invasion. They came home and that really was the end of the autonomy process. The Egyptians withdrew their Ambassador and the whole peace process was put in stasis. At about the same time, in June 1982, Haig was relieved as Secretary of State by Reagan; George Shultz came in as Secretary of State in June 1982 and was told by the President to get a handle on the Middle East situation, have a thorough review and come up with some new policies. As many of the people who had been appointed by Haig, I submitted my resignation. Shultz decided he didn't want to accept and asked me to stay on. We spent the summer of 1982 relooking and revisiting the peace process, starting at ground zero. He spent over 50% of his time in the first three months as Secretary dealing with Middle East issues. As a result of that review and a series of conversations and meetings at Camp David, came a Reagan speech on the Middle East on September 1, 1982. We launched our program with that speech and then Phil Habib and I were sent out by the President and the Secretary to go around the region and talk about the plan.

We spent the entire fall of 1982 in the region to see Prime Minister Begin, President Mubarak, King Hussein, King Fahd, President Assad and other leaders in the region. At the same time, the Israeli advance into Lebanon came to a stop and we were negotiating the withdrawal of the PLO (Palestine Liberation Organization) from Beirut. So we really had two negotiations going on; Phil was doing that. He was also accompanying me on the peace process. When people asked what I did and what Habib did, I used to respond by saying that Habib was in charge of war and I was in charge of peace.

The peace process culminated in Washington with a meeting with King Hussein, who stayed for about a week. We had very long meetings with him and his staff. We were trying to draw in the missing partners -- the Jordanians and the Palestinians -- into the peace process. King Hussein returned to Jordan and had meetings with Arafat and tried to get what we then called the "green light" from the PLO to embark on the negotiations. It looked like he had obtained the "green light" from Arafat at one stage, but then Arafat met with the PLO Executive Committee in about February 1983 and instead of giving a "green light" or a "Yellow light", it gave a "red light". That ended that game.

Once again, at about the end of March, I went to the Secretary of State and said that I had done my best, that it had been a long fifteen months and that I was resigning. He said that I couldn't do that because he was about to go out to the Middle East, and he needed me as his lawyer because we had to complete a peace treaty. There was to be direct negotiations between the Lebanese and the Israelis to try to make an arrangement for Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon. I agreed, of course, to go with him on that trip. I became involved in drafting a number of the documents for what turned into the May 15, 1983 peace agreement between Israel and Lebanon. During that period, Habib, Maury Draper, who worked for Habib, Nick Veliotis and Shultz would go to Lebanon each day to negotiate with Gemayel and the Lebanese. I would stay in Israel and would have occasional conversations with the head of the peace process team, Yosef Burg, the Minister of Interior, but I spent most of my time writing documents and assisting in the Lebanon affair. We got the withdrawal/peace agreement and on the way back from the Middle East trip, I told Shultz that I could now resign in good conscience. He said "No; Habib had become persona-non-grata with the Syrians and would not talk to Assad anymore because Assad didn't like some of the things that happened in the negotiations to ending the fighting in Lebanon. He didn't want to deal with Habib anymore, he had said. So I got drawn into the Lebanon process and went there with Habib and Draper. They introduced me to all the Lebanese parties and so I then picked up that side of things. The Habib-Draper mission, as it was known, was replaced by the McFarlane-Fairbanks mission. Bud McFarlane, then the Deputy National Security Advisor, joined me, and we went out to Beirut to take over responsibility for the Lebanese process. We would travel from Israel to Syria and occasionally to Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia, trying to put together Israeli withdrawal and the stabilization of the Lebanese situation. We thought we would go out for a week or two and then return to consider the problems. We never did get back because matters became dicier and dicier, and closer and closer. Finally, it blew up again into war when the Israelis withdrew from the Shuf which is the area south of Beirut. In late August 1983, the shelling started and civil war broke out. The Syrians came in, the Druze came out, the Christians were fighting and it was the usual Lebanon morass. McFarlane and I would shuttle around on two different planes. We would go off in two different directions every day, trying to put the pieces together with the Saudis, the Syrians and the Israelis. Finally, we got a cease fire in Lebanon in about late September, 1983 and we came back and got a war-powers resolution through Congress, authorizing our continued presence in the international peace-keeping force in Lebanon, together with the British, the Italians and the French. It appeared that we might get the situation stabilized. McFarlane returned to Washington to become National Security Advisor, and I was left in the Middle East by myself again. Shortly after that, we had the bombing of the Marines at the airport in Beirut in October -- 242 killed. After that, we continued to try to get the Lebanese parties to talk to each other.

Finally, we succeeded in that. Again we had a venue problem because the Christians (the Maronites and the Greek Orthodox) and the Sunnis and the Shiites and the Druze couldn't even agree where to meet. They wouldn't meet in the Presidential Palace -- wouldn't meet here -- wouldn't meet there. Finally, we got them together, with the help of the Saudis, in Geneva in November, 1983. I went to Geneva and met with all the parties there -- the Syrians, the Saudis and all the Lebanese parties. I had accompanied Shultz in meetings with our European allies and briefed them on our game plan. We wanted the Europeans to support us. We finally got an agreement among the Lebanese parties in November, 1983 where upon I did really get myself extricated from the Middle East and turned it over to Don Rumsfeld, who then became the Middle East negotiator.

Q: Who were the Israelis and Egyptians you were dealing with? How would you characterize them?

FAIRBANKS: For the Israeli and Egyptians, nothing was more important than the peace process. We had therefore top level attention. On the Israeli side it was the Prime Minister, Menachem Begin, his nominal chief negotiator, Yosef Burg, who was the head of the National Religious Party and Minister of Interior, General Sharon, who was the Minister of Defense, and Moshe Arens, who had just left being the Ambassador to the United States and at that time was a cabinet advisor and later Minister of Defense. There were also other members of the Israeli cabinet -- they had an eight-nine man group of their cabinet which was their negotiating team. To support their team, the Israelis had a staff of lawyers and bright fellows from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, including David Kimche and Hanon Bar-On from the Foreign Ministry.

On the Egyptian side, certainly every time I went to Cairo I would meet with President Hosni Mubarak, the Foreign Minister, a retired General, and their negotiating team.

Q: You didn't feel that either side was just keeping up a pretense? You felt that both were committed?

FAIRBANKS: That was absolutely true for the top level people in both places. When I first met with Begin as head of the U.S. delegation in early February 1982, I was accompanied by Sam Lewis, our Ambassador to Israel, and the eight people on my team. Begin had eight or nine members of his cabinet on his team. At the end of the formal meeting, Sam Lewis and I were invited into Begin's private office, where we continued the discussions. About half way through that meeting, Begin turned to Lewis and said : "Sam, when you bring a Senator or Congressman to see me, I always ask if he is a freshman. With Fairbanks, I don't have to ask". At that time, we had "call signs" for the security people throughout the Middle East. Habib was called "Killer" or something like that. Mine of course became "Freshman" for the rest of my time in area.

Q: Did you or members of your delegation have any feelings about the Israeli invasion of Lebanon in the middle of a serious peace process? There had been some talk about Secretary Haig either giving the go-ahead to Israel or at least implying that we would be benevolent neutrals.

FAIRBANKS: I was in the meeting where that story originated. Sharon had come to the U.S. approximately ten days before the invasion and had meetings with Haig. I was in those meetings. Haig maintains to this day that he didn't give any private assurance to Sharon. I certainly never heard it. He had a couple of very brief private meetings with Sharon, but I don't believe that he intentionally gave anything like a green light or anything else. I think Sharon, for his own purposes, may have believed that Haig had done so or wanted to believe that he did. Haig rebutted this allegation in his book, but it continues to be bandied about. I do not believe that Haig either did or intended to give any assurance.

Q: What was our reaction when this happened? Did you see everything going down the tube?

FAIRBANKS: Sure. We were all prepared within a month to bring people to this country to sit down to resolve the issues once and for all and then move on to the next stage of autonomy. There are those of a cynical bent who believe that the Israelis knew that their actions would bring the process to a halt and used the excuse of the attack on their Ambassador in London to kick off the invasion, even though there had not been any rockets from Lebanon into Israel for the prior five or six months. History will be the judge.

Q: Were you privy to the resignation of Secretary Haig?

FAIRBANKS: No, it happened in Europe. The President and Haig were over there for the summit of the industrialized nations in -- I think in France that year -- but I was not on that trip.

Q: As far as the Middle East was concerned, did you find that there was a difference between the attitudes of Haig and Shultz?

FAIRBANKS: Both thought it was in the U.S. national interest to make progress on the peace process. Both had the goal of achieving a formal peace treaty between Israel and its Arab neighbors. As far as tactics were concerned, the September 1, 1982 peace initiative bore a striking resemblance to our previous policies. There was no break in policy. In the articulation of that policy, we said some things publicly that we had always believed privately. That was really the only difference.

Q: Then you didn't feel any real change in the leadership in what you were trying to accomplish?

FAIRBANKS: No. The personal styles of Haig and Shultz were certainly different, but as far as the substance is concerned, there was no radical difference.

Q: What about the decision to keep our Marines in Lebanon? First, they were put there to assist with the PLO departure; then they were brought back in as a small military force with no particular mission.

FAIRBANKS: That is again an allegation that was made. I was not in the negotiations that put them there. That was when Habib and Draper were in charge of that part of our efforts. What they were doing was trying to stabilize the situation in Lebanon. The President of Lebanon said that he needed a period of time to bring the various Lebanese factions together to get the situation stabilized. He felt that couldn't be done without international assistance. It wasn't just American assistance: there was also a French military force, an Italian force, and a British force. All the flags were flying. They were all running around. Then we had the UNIFIL in the South and the United States was part of that. So it wasn't a unilateral move by the United States. It was something the international community, particularly our Europeans allies, felt was worthwhile and would make a contribution.

Q: There were obviously very strict prohibitions on dealing with the PLO at this time. Yet it is a factor and today we are having conversations with them. Did you have any indirect way to communicate with it? Did you feel that at some point we had to bite the bullet and had to talk to the PLO?

FAIRBANKS: We maintained the position from the mid-1970's, when Kissinger first laid it down, that we wouldn't deal with PLO and certainly not recognize it until it had met certain minimal conditions. We maintained that policy all during this period and throughout the Reagan Administration until the PLO met the requirements. There wasn't ever a feeling of having to deal with them. The feeling was that they had to change their position in order to deal with us. Basically, they had to recognize the existence of Israel and renounce terrorism.

ARTHUR S. BERGER
Embassy Spokesman
Tel Aviv (1982-1986)

Mr. Berger was born and raised in Rhode Island and educated at Yeshiva and Howard Universities. He joined the Foreign Service (USIA) in 1970. Serving primarily in Cultural and Public Affairs, Mr. Berger served abroad in Kampala, Addis Ababa, Recife, Rio de Janeiro, Tel Aviv and the Hague, where he was Public Affairs Officer. In his Washington assignments Mr. Berger served at USIA Headquarters as Director of Publications and at the Department of State as Spokesman for the Near East South Asia Bureau. Following retirement Mr. Berger worked with the American Jewish Committee before becoming Director of Communications of the Holocaust Museum in Washington, DC. Mr. Berger was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

BERGER: I got a call from the director's office that said they wanted me to go out and meet the ambassador to Israel and meet the ambassador, a week's TDY out there. So I did, and it was the beginning of '82. Or December of '81. It was around that time-frame. So I went out there and spent about a week at the embassy meeting a lot of people, being briefed by the political officer, the DCM. And I spent several hours with the ambassador one-on-one. And he was tough. I mean, he grilled me. He had my bio and, you know, I had some background on the Middle East. I had done quite a bit of reading on it. I had taken a number of courses in college. I had done a sub-specialization in graduate school and in my Ph.D. courses I was really focusing on political leadership in Africa and the Middle East. So I had spent a lot of reading and spent a lot of time in graduate seminars on the Middle East, especially at George Washington and American universities.

Well, I guess I passed muster because word got back that I was acceptable, but the ambassador said, "I want him to work in the State Department for the next six months before he comes here. I want him to be in the desk office; I want him to work with the head of public affairs for NEA (Bureau of Near East Affairs). Because when he comes to Israel, we were bound to have a crisis. So, from day one, he has to know all the issues, how the State Department handles it, how the White House deals with things. He has to know the personalities and everything about the policies."

So, two weeks later I was working in NEA. I spent part of my time on the Israel desk with Charlie Hill, who was the head of it and who later became executive secretary of the department, and who had just out as political officer in Israel. And half the time with Chris Ross, who was the head of NEA public affairs. And that really made a difference. I have to say that Sam Lewis was right on target. I thought it was not the best idea to do that. But at the same time, when I arrived out there it was the sixth day of the Lebanon War. And there were hundreds of American journalists – I'm not exaggerating – hundreds. And every single one of them wanted to know what is the U.S. policy about this; and what are you saying about this; and what are you doing about this; and they wanted to talk to the Ambassador. And for my first fifteen months in Israel I think I may have had one or two days off and that was about it. It was crisis after crisis after crisis. And I loved it.

Q: Was there any concern on anybody's part about having a Jewish public affairs officer in Israel because of a perceived conflicts of interest?

BERGER: No, there wasn't any at all. I think that back when I first came into the Foreign Service there was this stereotype that if you sent a Jewish officer to Israel he or she may get into a situation where they have to make a tough decision and question where their loyalty lies. I think that by the time of the late 1970s, that had really been thrown out the window. I thought it was a ridiculous thing. An American Jew who was in the Foreign Service has loyalty only to the United States. And in going out there, I knew it. And I got to meet a lot of people and get to know some very, very well. From the editors of every newspaper, the major journalists on radio and television, the American journalists who were there, the European journalists who were there. I had a rolodex of literally hundreds of top journalists from all over the world. And never was there any question that I was not representing U.S. policy. It was U.S. policy that I was explaining. In fact, it was because of that that after I left Israel Dick Murphy asked me to be his spokesman for NEA.

Q: So we move to Israel. When you arrived, what was the situation?

BERGER: As I say, it was the tenth day of the Lebanon War. Life was seemed normal though. It was a very strange thing. The war was going on. You could see helicopters buzzing by the embassy, along the beachfront, going north from the Mediterranean to Lebanon. The news on radio and television was consumed by the war. It was all anybody was talking about, certainly at the embassy. That was the main preoccupation. And my job from day one – I came into the office and I remember immediately that the phone was ringing off the hook, from people like John Chancellor on down.

Q: John Chancellor being . . . ?

BERGER: He was a major NBC [National Broadcasting Company in USA] commentator. Marvin Kalb, writers from the New York Times, Tom Friedman became the correspondent in Israel. He replaced David Shipley, who was out there first. The top American journalists for radio, television, wires, daily newspapers, news magazines, they were all stationed there because this was the front page news story. It wasn't just the war but the whole U.S.-Israeli relationship. And the search for peace. This was a theme that ran through American policy since the founding of the state of Israel since 1948. Every American president thought that he could do something to bring about peace in the Middle East.

Q: Somebody once told me that there were over forty plans.

BERGER: Oh, that is probably an underestimation. There was the Rogers Plan, Weinberger came out with the Reagan Plan while I was there. This was on September 26, 1982. I remember it because I began to smoking again on that day. I had stopped smoking for some time. Weinberger was there, and he was defense secretary, and Sharon was defense minister of Israel. The two of them together. And on that day Reagan announced his plan to bring peace between Israel and its Arab neighbors. And I was up all night. We were transcribing things. We were meeting with journalists. It was one of those all-nighters that we frequently find in those kinds of an environment. And a lot of Israelis smoked. I think that they still do. I think that half of our staff in the embassy were smoking around me. And the Israeli journalists were smoking. And people from Sharon's office that we were meeting with, they were smoking. And it smelled good and I started smoking again. So that was my downfall for another seven years until 1989 when I stopped for good.

Q: Were you on the Israeli desk when the Israelis went into Lebanon?

BERGER: No. In fact, I was on vacation in Europe. En route to Israel, we stopped in Europe. We stopped in Paris and I remember buying a car and driving it to Rome.

Q: I've had interviews with Bob Dillon, who was our ambassador in Lebanon (June 1981-October 1983), who has a very – to put it mildly – jaundiced view of what was happening and felt that our embassy in Tel Aviv was not giving them an accurate account of what was happening. What was the Embassy's understanding of this event?

BERGER: I think there was thought that the initial attack was understandable. And that wasn't just the embassy, but the administration as well. There were cross-border incursions, rockets going into Israel, the shooting of the Israeli Ambassador in London, Ambassador (Shlomo) Argov, was kind of the straw that triggered – that was a bad mixed metaphor – that was the incident that more than anything else triggered the invasion. Remember, of course, that Sharon had his master plan of what he was going to do. But those first couple of weeks we had the same kind of information that just about everybody else did, that I think that probably Prime Minister Begin had. Began – as everybody else – believed that this was to go in there to clean out these PLO nests, to kill the cross-border Fedayeen, to disrupt their whole operation, and basically let the Lebanese be back in charge in Lebanon.

Most people, I think, felt that they would come back to the Litani River. Because they had gone in, in '78, up to the Litani. They would go up maybe a little bit beyond that and then come back in. When I got to Israel though – this was the tenth day of the war – they were basically in Beirut at that point. And nobody seemed to understand what the hell was going on. Very quickly though – Sam Lewis is not an easy person, I don't know if you have interviewed him yet – Sam was very tough. And when he was given instructions and also when he made up his own instructions to go in to find out what was going on - he wasn't the kind of shy person who would stand back and wait for somebody – the assistant secretary or the director of the desk - to send him instructions to go in and meet with the prime minister or the foreign minister. He would stimulate that to try and find out what was going on.

Tough, tough ambassador, but really good. He understood a lot of the nuances more than most people. I think that to be ambassador in Israel is probably one of the hardest jobs in the world. Not just the crises, but you are dealing with people who not only know your history but think they know your history better than you do to.

Q: When you got there, was there a concern that Alexander Haig had given Sharon a wink and nudge, basically to say that "if you go in, we won't be upset."

BERGER: I think some people have called that the blinking orange light. There have been so many rumors about that. In fact, there were a number of Israeli journalists who wrote about that as well and believed that he had. But there has never been any evidence that he actually did that. And I've never seen a memcon (memorandum of conversation) or any other document that said that. Or anybody who was present in any conversation between the two of them that leads me to believe that there was ever that wink. I think that he did not really know what Sharon was going to do. Sharon didn't tell anybody.

Q: I would have thought that because of this so-called wink on the part of Haig, even the rumor that it was, makes one feel that you are not quite on firm ground.

BERGER: A lot of people believe that Israel will never go into a war situation, especially a pre-emptive war like it did in Lebanon – it was not a defensive war. It wasn't like '73, when they were attacked, or '67, when they were encircled and about to be attacked. This was really very, very different. This was pre-emptive and the Israelis learned that hard way that sometimes a pre-emptive war doesn't work out to the grandest plans.

Q: Yes. As we speak, on October 1, 2004, the war in Iraq is not getting better. And there are certain overtones from this earlier Israeli experience.

BERGER: There are. I don't think there are any parallels to it because the situations are so different. But at the same time, the sense of being bogged down and not thinking through what happens after you win the war. Surely, the Israeli military is so powerful that it can beat any Arab country. Certainly, Lebanon is not a problem. And the Syrian Air Force was destroyed in the first or second day of the Lebanon War. I don't think anybody questions their capabilities whatsoever.

But, as we are learning in Iraq, what happens after you get in there and after you are an occupying power – then what are you going to do? I think that the Israelis were welcomed far more by the Lebanese, by the Shia in South Lebanon, than we were in Iraq. There literally were thousands and thousands of Lebanese that come out of their homes, gave flowers or brought food to Israeli soldiers, because they were really occupied by the PLO. They were fed up with it. They wanted their country back.

Now, had the Israelis gone in and then very quickly given it back to these Lebanese, I think the Israelis would not have had the kind of problems that they had for so many years in Lebanon. But, of course, it's easy in hindsight. But I know that there are many Israeli political and political-military thinkers who have said that same thing. But Sharon made an alliance with some of the Christian leaders in Lebanon. The Christian leaders were the Gamal family and others also saw this as an opportunity to preserve their community, the hegemony they had over a good part of the government and the economy. And they had had a relationship with Sharon and a lot of Israelis for years before that, and a good relationship. So they saw this as an opportunity to recapture what they saw as their rightful place on Mount Lebanon, back in the days when the French formed that little enclave over there in the early '20s.

That was, I think, part of the whole thing. But clearly the U.S. did not orchestrate this. And I don't think the U.S. even gave a wink and a nod. It's just that there are a lot of people in the world who cannot believe that the Israelis would go into a preemptive war – especially anything as brash and extensive as they did in Lebanon – without the United States knowing beforehand and, not saying “yes, go do it,” but turning their head away and saying “gee, we don't see anything going on.” The Israelis don't share a lot of things with the United States. And this was one of the things I found in my four years there.

Q: They talk about being close allies.

BERGER: Well, there is a close alliance on a lot of things. And that's very true. There is no question about that. But even in the closest alliance that the United States has with Britain, with Canada, with Australia – what other country has gone to war with the United States as much as Australia? – I don't think that we share everything in our decision making process with them, or they with us. Nor should they. Even though your values may be the same, your interests may the same, your goal may be the same, not everything is the same. You are different cultures and because you live in different parts of the world, your interests are going to be different in some way. And this is true with the United States and Israel. No question about that.

Q: You arrived right in the middle of this. What were you doing, sort of from the get-go?

BERGER: I don't even remember being home on the day that the movers came to deliver our stuff. It was intense. I would say the average day probably extended twelve to fourteen, sixteen hours sometimes. Six, sometimes seven, days a week. Surely every week was a six day week. That was without question. And sometimes seven day weeks. It wasn't just the war. It was the crisis. It was the visitors that came, the high level U.S. visitors that came. I was there when Rumsfeld was the special envoy, when (National Security Advisor Bud) McFarland came through, this one came through and that one. And half the U.S. Congress of course, who all had their own ideas on how to resolve things. And (Secretary of State) George Shultz. It was one right after the other of high level visitors, of special envoys on peace process issues, of staff delegations.

And I was the spokesman for the embassy so I was the first line when it came to journalists who wanted some information. Now, anybody who called the ambassador's office, the ambassador's secretary would transfer that call immediately to me. I would filter those calls. And make certain, number one, was this somebody that the ambassador really should talk to? And he did talk to a lot of journalists. Also, was this somebody that I could handle? Or somebody else in the embassy? Or, was this somebody we weren't going to work with.

One of the first things I learned was that the best way to have a credible relationship with journalists – and it didn't make a difference if it was American, Israeli or a third country – you had to be honest with them. You had to give them as much information as you could legitimately give them. But at the same time never mislead them. Once you mislead them you lose your credibility. If you are honest with them and open with them and when you know that there is something you cannot reveal, just tell them: "Sorry, I can't go there. You've got to understand that there is some information that I cannot discuss." They understand. And I think that's what I learned. Those four years in Israel – probably the most intense years of my life except for the three that I followed up in Washington as head of NEA/P – were a tremendous learning experience.

Q: You must have been hit square in the face by that 2x4, Shatila and Sabra and the questionable Israeli questionable collusion in the massacre of Palestinians?

BERGER: Oh yeah. That was an awful night. I can remember exactly where I was, in fact. I was at the DCM's house for a dinner. This was in September of 1982. I had arrived in mid-June. In the middle of this dinner the DCM - who was charge' because Sam Lewis was out of the country on vacation – took this phone call and I could see right away on his face that there was some crisis. And then he took several of us from the embassy staff – a political officer, myself and a few others – and we sat down in a private room and he briefed us what had happened. And from then it was almost non-stop.

There was some misinformation at first as to what was happening. And once we found out – which was within a couple of hours – they immediately demarched the Israeli government. I think he went to Began, the foreign minister, and said: “You’ve got a responsibility. You’ve got to stop what is going on there.” I will give the Israelis credit for one thing. Surely, they should not have allowed the Lebanese Christian militia to go into Sabra and Shatila because they could know what was going to happen. The hatreds were so awful. This was right after Amin Gamal was killed in the bombing. There was no question that the tempers, the seeking of revenge, were going to be.

The Israelis, who were working with the Christian militia, had to know that any Christian militia men who were going into Sabra and Shatila were going to go after them and would kill as many people as possible. They should have stopped them. And the Israeli commission of inquiry that took place was very clear about that. They said: “The Israelis certainly didn’t take the guns to these people, but Sharon, as minister of defense, had this personal responsibility of not stopping something like this from happening.” And they forced him to resign. And he was out of government for a long time because of that. I thought the commission of inquiry one of the high points of Israeli democracy.

Q: There had been this point where the Israelis had beaten off this series of wars – ‘48, ‘56, ‘67, ‘73 – and was seen as the tough Westernized country. But I think that after the invasion of Lebanon, there became a change in American perception. Until then, Israel could absolutely do no wrong, practically, within the public affairs context. Was that perceptible?

BERGER: Yes it was. It was very perceptible. A lot of Israelis felt it too. Until that war the Israelis felt very strongly that they were in a war for survival. That it was really important for them to be able to maintain that qualitative edge. Until ‘67 their military alliance was really with the French. The French were the main supplier of weaponry. And it was after the ‘67 war when the French put a boycott that the United States started selling weaponry to Israel.

‘48, clearly, I mean, that was clearly an existential war. Had they lost it there would not be a state of Israel. And this was probably true in ‘67 as well. ‘56 was different because that was another mix up and there were British and French interests. That was more, I think, British and French interests.

Q: Israel was sort of the third hanger-on.

BERGER: It was. I still haven’t read enough about some of the discussions between the British and the French in ‘56. I know they wanted to get to Suez Canal back. They wanted to denationalize. But I think the Israelis saw this as an opportunity to get back at Egypt. Because in the period ‘53 to ‘56 there were a lot of cross-border incursions from Gaza and from Sinai into Israeli settlements nearby.

But Lebanon was different. Lebanon changed the perception, as I said, for a lot of Israelis, but especially I think in the West, the United States and Europe. Here was a country that really did not have to go to war. That took upon itself to be the shaper of the future of the Middle East. Or at least they thought they were going to be the re-shaper of the Middle East. Start a new relationship, a peace treaty, with a new government in Lebanon. And I think that Sharon and a few others in the Israeli government thought that they were really going to change the Arab perception of Israel. That they were really going to have from that a series of peace treaties with all of the Arab countries.

Well, of course, we know that didn't happen and the whole thing backfired badly on the Israelis. And part of it was that the United States got so ticked off at the Israelis not only being in Lebanon up to Beirut, but also bombing the city. I remember some of the messages that went from the United States, from the president and the secretary of state to the prime minister and foreign minister of Israel, they were some tough messages. Let me tell you, the language in there was extraordinarily severe. There was that special bilateral relationship and sure there was a lot of tension over there, but once the bombing of Beirut started, and then Sabra and Shatila, the language got harsh. And in fact U.S.-Israeli relations went to a low point that really caused an incredible strain. I think that it was probably – except for the '56 war when Eisenhower forced the Israelis and the British and the French to back out of Egypt – I don't think there was any time in the history of U.S.-Israeli relations where the language was so tough and the pressure was so severe. Extraordinary pressure and threat.

I remember reading this year the diary of James Grover McDonald, who was the first U.S. ambassador to Israel [Editor's Note: McDonald served from March 1949 to December 1950]. His family presented them to the museum. His twelve-thousand pages of his typed personal diaries of his years in service to the United States. And there were some things in there, some of the language in some of the demarches that he had during the Israeli war of independence, where the language was just like that. But from that time until '56 and then to the bombing of Beirut, I don't think I've ever seen anything like that.

Q: Did you feel that the embassy, the officers and all, were changing their attitudes towards Israel? Looking at this as no longer our nice friendly country but another country whose interests are not necessarily America's?

BERGER: It was true that on every level, that the tension pervaded the relationship. In the military relationship, in the intelligence sharing, in the economic relationship and in the people-to-people relationship. The friendship among people didn't change, among individuals, that didn't change at all. That became strong and deeper, as would happen in any country where American FSOs were stationed. You make friends, I know a number of my local friends there were more critical of the Israelis than even the U.S. government was.

But then I think that there was a real change. The Israelis had several elections, first of all. They changed their leadership. There was a national unity government. And there was a realization by the top Israeli leadership that the United States-Israeli relationship had come to a period of great strain and it could harm the long term relationship and the future strength of Israel if the Israelis didn't change certain aspects of their policy. It wasn't that we were no longer allies. We were allies; but we were allies that were going through a really rough patch.

And at that point it was really up to the Israelis to change things. And they did. They recognized how serious that breach was and that the reason for it was their policies, not anything that the United States did. So at a certain point, they moved very quickly – I don't remember the exact time. During 1983 there was the bombing of the American embassy in Beirut, there was the bombing of the Marine barracks in Beirut. Those were two things that helped to bring the U.S. and Israel together because of a sense of there being a common enemy, the terrorists. The second part of it – I think even more important – was that if we work together, perhaps we can find a way to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict that would leave Israel more secure, that would give the Palestinians a sense of a real future, and that would ensure that the Arab neighbors of Israel would have a real rationalization for going to peace with Israel instead of going to war with Israel. So that I think helped turn around the whole thing. And the Israelis tended to have some good intelligence on terrorism as well and they tended to share more and more of it during that period of time.

Also, in the spring of 1983, the U.S. got the Israelis and the Lebanese together in the negotiations for a peace treaty. I was the spokesman for the U.S. delegation. Each week we would fly up and go to the negotiations. I got to know some of the Lebanese who were there. I remember, Shultz came right at the end of the negotiations of that and he felt very strongly that this was an important agreement. We made a very big mistake: We didn't bring Syria in on this. And Syria made sure that the agreement was going to go anywhere. And that's a lesson that we learned very quickly: You cannot bring about comprehensive peace between Israel and its neighbors without Syria.

Q: Well our ambassador to Damascus (November 1981-June 1984), Bob Paganelli, was saying that Assad would not be on board when this so-called Shultz Plan came out and Shultz got very mad at him.

BERGER: There were a number of people. Not just Bob, but others, both within NEA and other places that felt very strongly – I think there were a couple of our political officers in the embassy in Tel Aviv as well – that felt that we were making an error by not bringing the Syrians in right at the beginning. The more that you had them in, the more chance they would buy into it and you would be able to work something out. The Syrians were very weak at that point. Remember, their military had been crushed. They didn't see any real benefit from their relationship with the Soviet Union. That was a great relationship. All these great things, including Mid-23s at that point. And it didn't do a damn bit of good against the Israeli pilots.

Q: Yeah. They just kept getting shot down.

BERGER: So there was an opportunity over there that we missed by not bringing them in. Whether they would have said yes or no, we don't know. They may have turned down the opportunity and scuttled the whole thing anyway. But there was an opportunity that we missed by not trying.

Q: Now you came in sort of at the end of the Began government, didn't you?

BERGER: He came into power in '77 and was in power until 1984. So it was about the first year-and-a-half, two years. then they had an election and Shamir and Perez, the Likud and Labor . . . pretty much, they didn't tie things up, but at the same time neither one could form an absolute majority. They had a coalition government. Neither one wanted to go with a lot of small parties. And they recognized that Israel was in a very difficult situation both militarily – the occupation of Lebanon was beginning to bog down.

There were all kinds of roadside bombs, sort of like the IEDs we are getting in Iraq today. The Hezbollah and other groups in Lebanon were staging them against the Israelis. They were really beginning to get bad casualties. There is one similarity with Iraq. The war was one pretty quickly, but what do you do after that? And the longer you remain an occupier, the more you are hated. And that's exactly what happened.

So they realized they had to do something about Lebanon. They also realized the relationship with the United States had to be repaired and had to be repaired very quickly. And they both understood that very well. And so they formed this national unity government. And it was a weird unity government. One was prime minister the other foreign minister, then after a year they switched. It didn't work very well.

Q: Was there any warmth between the Began government and our mission in Tel Aviv?

BERGER: There was on a couple of levels. The first was that Began would never lie to you, unless of course he had been misinformed by his defense minister, which was the case with the Lebanon War. But he was a very truthful person, and a very ethical person. He didn't move into a grand mansion. He was very ethical on a personal level too. I remember when he died, the eulogies that we heard from political opposition – they had opposed him all his life, everything that he stood for – and they said “but I respected him. He was an ethical person.” And the more and more we learned about him we began to recognize that maybe he was not a great political leader, but when it came down to political leaders that were ethical, there were few that could equal him. Anywhere. He didn't believe in doing things for politics' sake.

Q: What about Sharon? I might say in Sam Lewis' oral history, there is thirty pages in which is put on reserve until Sharon really passes from the scene. And this was put in a couple years before Sharon returned as prime minister.

BERGER: I'm not surprised. Sam had some very difficult dealings with Sharon. Sharon was not an easy person. Not only that, but I think there was a sense by a lot of people that Sharon was really trying to undercut a lot of what the United States was trying to do. He had his own goals in mind and come hell or high water he was going to get them. That's why he was nicknamed by the Israelis as the Bulldozer. He could make your life very, very difficult.

Sharon was looked at by a lot of people both in and out of government as somebody who was a political opportunist. I think he has changed. When I take a look and I compare the 1980s to the last couple of years with him as prime minister, I see a very different person running the government. First, in the 1980s I never thought that he would come back and do government at all, let alone be prime minister. I never thought that he would get that large number of people to vote for him because I thought that vast majority of Israelis really hated him.

Today in Israel I think that the extreme right wing Israelis do hate him. And some of the language that they use against him is very similar to the language that they used against Rabin before he was assassinated. Sharon – I know you don't want to get into contemporary things right now and that's not my field – but I think there is a useful comparison, even though I haven't been in the foreign service for over ten years now, but I think that he has done really a lot to turn Israel around in two ways. One, deepening its relationship with the United States. I think part of it is that I think he really is committed to pulling Israel out of Gaza and I don't know how much of the West Bank, but certainly part of the West Bank. Not as much as Rabin or certainly Perez would have been willing to do. Second, he recognizes that there is a very strong Palestinian nationalism that must be given respect and must be allowed to develop its own state that it can govern by itself. He's not going to allow that to happen as long as he feels that the State of Israel is threatened.

So you see that he's ready to withdraw today, but at the same time, when he thinks it's necessary he'll have a major incursion into Gaza. The first rule of political leadership is you have got to protect your people. And you cannot allow kids in a small town to be killed by rockets coming over the border from Gaza. He would be booted out on his ass. And I think that if our president ever allowed that to happen in the United States, he would probably be impeached.

Q: What was your impression of the foreign press corps? All of a sudden you were exposed to the crème de la crème.

BERGER: I wouldn't say exposed to. I was badgered by them. But also some of them became good friends. In fact, even today, almost twenty years after I left Israel, I continue a relationship with a number of them. Because Israel was such an important assignment many of them came back to the State Department to be the chief diplomatic correspondent for their newspaper or wire service. So my three years there I also deepened that relationship. And a number of them and I keep in very close touch. I don't give them inside information because I don't have any inside information right now. I don't see any classified documents.

(Begin Tape 4, Side 1)

BERGER: Dealing with the press...the American press in Israel were incredible. There were a few exceptions, but of the most part the newspapers and magazines, TV and radio sent their best correspondents there. Not only because it was a front page news story, but because it was a most difficult story to understand. It wasn't just covering a bombing and incursion, or this or that event or political crises. It was trying to keep track of the nuances of it and who the players were and the games that they were playing. The leaks that took place in the Israeli government – a lot of leaking of information. You really had to be on top of things.

One of the things that I found very important for me to be able to do my job properly was that – and Sam did this, Tom Pickering, who was the ambassador after that, and Dick Murphy as well – they brought me into their inner councils on everything. There may have been some things that I still don't know about, but I really don't know of any major issue that they didn't make sure that their spokesman knew about. Now there were things that they would say: "We'll tell you about this, but you really cannot discuss this on any terms with any journalist. But you have to know that this is happening because it can help you put into a framework for journalists everything else that is going on."

I remember one time when Shimon Perez went to Morocco. We know about that in advance. And I couldn't reveal that to anybody. I do remember, though, that I got a phone call from an Israeli journalist – and there were a number of Israeli journalists that had been taken on his plane with him, and they were sworn to secrecy. I found that Israelis could keep secrets when they were really sworn to secrecy by a government official. They knew how to keep ground rules. They also knew how to leak better than any American journalist that I have come across. So, I got a phone call from somebody and he said that he had gotten wind of something that was going on in Morocco. He said: "Is there an Israeli minister, Perez or somebody else, that is having secret talks in Morocco right now?" I said: "Well, I'll have to get back to you." I didn't say I didn't know. I hung up and I called Sam, at that point. And he had just gotten word that Perez's plan had landed. And he said: "It's going to be public in a few minutes. You can confirm it now."

Otherwise you would get on the phone with somebody and they either ask me a question and I would say: "What? What are you talking about?" There was one time a little bit later in my career – in 1986 – when that happened. And that was in Wiesbaden, Germany and I was with Terry Waite. We were out in Wiesbaden for the release of hostages. He and I were watching the news at breakfast and found out about Iran Contra together. That was one thing that was kept from me and I'm glad it was.

Q: Iran-Contra was when we were trading arms for hostages and using the Israeli as a middle-man. There was an Israeli connection, right?

BERGER: There were several people. One was an Israeli arms merchant. There was an Iranian arms merchant, Ghorbanifar. There was Bud McFarland and there was, of course, our good friend Ollie North, who was orchestrating this whole thing. It was a stain on American diplomacy.

Q: As time went on, were you dealing with the West Bank matters? And what were the Israelis doing there? Or was this handled out of our USIA man in Jerusalem?

BERGER: Both. You could not divorce what was happening in the West Bank and Gaza from the embassy, even though the prime responsibility for dealing with the West Bank and East Jerusalem was with the consulate in Jerusalem. There was a lot of coordination and consultation between the embassy and the consulate. As much as you might hear that people did not speak to each other, there was a lot of talking together. But on a day-to-day basis, of course, each had different responsibilities. I spoke to my counterpart in the consulate in Jerusalem.

I was the prime spokesman for everybody, though. And part of it was that I think I had a stronger background. I understood a lot of the history on both sides. And I had developed this relationship with these journalists and, you know, say David Shipley or Tom Friedman from the New York Times is going to call you up and talk to you about a story that they are working on, and part of it deals with the West Bank. You are not going to say that you can't answer that question and he had better call your colleague in Jerusalem and he will fill you in on that part of the story. You can't do that. You would lose your credibility.

Q: What about the Israeli press? How did you interact with them?

BERGER: On a daily basis. Their diplomatic correspondents, who covered the prime minister's and foreign minister's offices and the U.S.-Israeli relationship, were the best of the Israeli correspondents as well. But they didn't always have the same kind of standards. And I was always a little more careful if I went on to background with them than I would with an American correspondent. But they were professional. They were really professional. And I would tend to learn a lot from them because Israeli government officials would be very open with Israeli journalists. Far more than, say, a desk officer at the State Department would be with somebody who is covering the State Department. So they were really knowledgeable. And I became good friends with some of them. Some I keep in contact with still today.

They were tough though. Every one of the Israeli journalists wanted to get a scoop. They really weren't that concerned with the nuances of things. They wanted a headline that could scream out sensationalism. And that's not what I was about. I wanted people to understand why we came to decision that we had. And so sometimes it took a lot of conversation. "Tell me, are you going to do this and that?" "Well, Shimon, I can't get to that right now, but let me just put it into perspective."

Q: What about the American Congress? What role did they play and how well did they play it?

BERGER: Members of Congress had an important role to play. The biggest problem in Israel, though, was that you had so many coming. It was almost on a weekly basis there was another member of Congress coming. Certainly during the recess periods you would get large groups, CODELs, coming through. Christmas, Easter, summer recess, before elections, you name it. It was almost, as you said, a pilgrimage that they had to make.

Some of them were extraordinarily helpful, though. Because whenever a member of Congress came, they wanted to meet with the prime minister, the foreign minister, the defense minister. Not together, but individually. And so this would be an opportunity to hear again how they were briefing them to see if there were any nuances we could get out of it. Of course, the ambassador, whether it was Lewis or Pickering, would go along. And I would go along because we had a rule in the embassy that any time there was a high level visitor and there was a meeting of any of those three people and their spokesperson was going to be sitting in the room in the meeting, I was there too. So I went to Jerusalem three or four times a week, frequently, because of these meetings.

Their spokespeople would brief immediately after. And it was very important for me to know what was happening. I couldn't wait for a memcon to be written five or six hours later or the next day. There wasn't time for something like that. Because frequently, riding back to Jerusalem, whether it be driving myself or riding in the car with the ambassador, we would listen to the radio. I understand Hebrew very well and we would listen to the next news broadcast. And frequently we would hear on the news broadcast a rundown of what had happened in that meeting. So you had to be very quick on your feet with something like that. This was before the cell phone days.

Q: What about AIPAC (American Israel Public Affairs Committee) and other American Jews, separately and organization-wise?

BERGER: Most of the Jewish organizations or leaders came out with their organization. In some cases there were a couple of leaders of different organizations together. They would come out on a regular basis. You have to figure that the leadership of AIPAC, the American-Jewish Committee, ADL (Anti-Defamation League), other organizations, the President's Conference, other American Jewish organizations would come out at least once a year, sometimes more often, depending on what was happening in the relationship. Of course, they would always get a briefing from the embassy before they would begin their meetings with the local government.

Frequently – and I found this out when I got back to Washington and worked for Dick Murphy – they would come over to the State Department before they would go out to the Middle East. And by that time, the '86 to '89 time-frame, more and more of them were going to Egypt and Jordan and other countries in the Arab world. So we would give them a broad NEA briefing before they went out. If the assistant secretary could do it, he would do it. Or the desk person. More often than not, I would do these Washington briefings.

Q: One last question before we end this discussion. It sounds like you didn't have much real life outside of your job, but how about your family and all of that?

BERGER: My family loved it. It was very comfortable, very pleasant. It's a very informal life in Israel. At that time, rarely did people wear ties and jackets. Certainly from April to November it was shirt sleeves, open neck, very informal, even when you went to meet the prime minister. That part was really nice. Even though life was really intense, we tried – even if I only had half a day off on a weekend – we tried as a family to get outside of Tel Aviv and see another part of Israel. The history of western civilization really began there. And there was so much – even though my training was more as a political scientists, I'm a history buff as well – it is just amazing to go walking in the footsteps of the people you read about who lived three or four thousand years ago, or go sit in an amphitheater somewhere where the Romans had come; go to Caesarea, the old port, now under water; go to an archeological dig; go to Capernaum; to Mount of Beatitudes; swim in Galilee. You name it. Walking in the old city of Jerusalem. That was always my favorite thing, to walk in the old city of Jerusalem any time of day, early morning, afternoon, late at night. It was just such an incredible city. I feel badly for my colleagues who are there now and just can't do that. Life in the Foreign Service has changed.

Q: Okay. Well Art, we'll take this opportunity to say farewell to Israel and we'll pick this up in 86 when you come back and you are what?

BERGER: I became the director of NEA/P at the State Department. It was the NEA public affairs office and I was the spokesman for Near East and South Asia.

Q: And you did that for. . . ?

BERGER: For three years. From 1986 to August of 1989.

Q: Today is October 22, 2004. Art, you were just starting a new position as the Public Affairs Officer for the Bureau of Near East Affairs (NEA/P).

BERGER: For the Near East and South Asia. At that time it covered everything from Mauritania eastward though India and Pakistan.

Q: Refresh my memory, had you served in the Department before that?

BERGER: Just before I went out to Israel I was there for about six months working with NEA/P, with Chris Ross and with Charlie Hill on the Israel desk. This was part of what Sam Lewis wanted me to do before I came out to my job as spokesman in Israel. He felt I needed to have a taste of fire because there would always be a crisis in Israel, and he was right.

Q: When you got there in '86, what was the atmosphere and what was the focus of the Near East bureau?

BERGER: Well the focus in NEA at that time, as it was before then and I think since then, was on peace-making. Trying to find some way to broker a resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict. That was always the highest priority. Dick Murphy was the assistant secretary and this was a particular interest of his as well.

Q: At this time, was the Iraq-Iran war still going on?

BERGER: The Iraq-Iran was still going on. That was also a major focus because...even though the United States had a – I wouldn't call it a "normal" relationship with Iraq, but it was a relationship with Iraq that sought to balance some of the extremism from Iran. I think today we read a lot more about what their relationship was during the 80s.

Q: Did you find yourself completely consumed by the Arab-Israeli issue?

BERGER: There were three things that really consumed my time when I think back to that time. Certainly in the first year, 1986, it was Arab-Israeli peace-making. We were trying to find some way to get Arabs and Israelis to talk to each other. There were a number of false starts during that period. The Iran-Iraq war. But I think that most importantly, and especially in the fall of '86, was Iran-Contra and the hostages.

Q: The hostages were in . . . ?

BERGER: In Lebanon. What happened was the because of my position as the spokesman for NEA, I was on what was called the “hostage release team.” And whenever a hostage was about to be released from Lebanon and then was being transported to the American military hospital in Wiesbaden, Germany, I would go along with a number of other people on that flight to Germany to receive the hostage, to help them understand some of the issues they were going to face, some of the public trauma. They had been kept in captivity, in many cases in the dark, shackled to walls, under really brutal conditions. And then suddenly they were going to come out before the TV cameras. And what were they going to face? What kind of questions? How they were able to deal with this, to help them draft their statements, things like that. So I went along on that to try and help them.

I think it was the second hostage release that I was involved in, in the fall of ‘86, when I was with Terry Waite, whom we all recognize. He was the representative of the Archbishop of Canterbury and he was the person who did some negotiations with the hostage takers in Lebanon to try and get the Americans free. Unknown to either of us and I think anybody else in the States, certainly, there was another channel going on. And this was the arms for hostages deal that was run out of Ollie North’s office. And in fact, I remember going on this trip to Wiesbaden. We had gotten some inkling that there might be a release over the weekend and just to be prepared because, if there was, I would get a phone call probably very early in the morning to get over to Andrews Air Force Base and get on a C-140 to Wiesbaden.

Sunday morning – I still remember this because it was five o’clock in the morning or so – I get this phone call. I am immediately told by somebody that they are from Ollie North’s office and this was about a hostage release that would probably take place very quickly and I needed to get over to Andrews Air Force Base. I would be told a little bit more about it when I got over to the airport. Well, I got over there. Here was Jacobson of the American University Hospital in Beirut or was it Sutherland, I’m not certain which, anyway, I do remember the trip because the hostage or hostages come back. We accompanied them through the various procedures. Go into the hospital. They spend the first day basically with the doctors to make sure they are physically okay. Go through a battery of tests, psychiatrists and others.

And I think it was the second morning that we were there in that trip and Terry Waite and I are having breakfast. And we are looking at armed forces TV and suddenly there is this thing about a German newspaper that had broken this news about arms for hostages. And he looked at the screen and you could see his jaw drop. And I said: “What are they talking about?” And he said: “I don’t know, but I cannot believe they would have done this.” It was such an incredible thing. Here was a man who thought he was negotiating in good faith and then suddenly he’s being undercut by this secret operation. Of course, we didn’t know if this was true or not. This was the first inkling of this.

I was the main person together with the spokesperson for the U.S. military at Wiesbaden. We worked out a statement. We tried to keep protect the former hostage, not so that they wouldn’t talk about their experiences, but to help them understand that whatever they say could also impact on those people who were still being held hostage. And they knew the kinds of conditions, so they were very careful with their words. And then they came back and they were told – in fact I think there was a radio report on the plane coming back to Washington – that they were going to be received at the White House by President Reagan. And we all went there to the White House. There was a reception in the Rose Garden. The press was all there. They gave their statement. Did not take any questions. But I remember hearing some journalists screaming out to the president: "What is this about arms for hostages?" And just a couple of days later the president, Ed Meese and who else, went out there and talked about this operation and that was not authorized.

Q: As you were the spokesperson on this, did somebody tell you what was going on before?

BERGER: Nobody at State, myself included, knew anything about this. At least nobody I talked to from State, which went from the assistant secretary on down. We were all blindsided by this whole thing. I remember going into meetings with Dick Murphy and he couldn't believe this thing. Nobody knew anything about this.

Q: During this interim period, between when it was first disclosed and when the President fessed up, how did you deal with it?

BERGER: It was with great difficulty because, first of all, I didn't know anything about it. I always prided myself on being honest with the press. And whenever they asked me a question that didn't require me to give out any national security information – I was privy to a lot of things because I had a fairly high security clearance including codeword, but nothing on this subject was in anything I read - I would try to accommodate. And it was clear that any of the people that I worked with in NEA didn't know anything about it as well. And I got a lot of phone calls. And I would say: "I'm sorry, I really don't know anything about it and I don't think I'm going to be able to get you anything about it. This is not something that I or anybody I know has been privy to, so I don't know the truth of it, the details of it. There's nothing I can say."

And then over the next couple of months the requests for speakers to go out around the country and talk about American policy in the Middle East multiplied tremendously. And of course nobody wanted to go out there. Nobody from the White House wanted to go out there certainly. Nobody from the top level in the State Department wanted to go. And Dick Murphy, Chuck Redman and I talked about all of these requests. Redman said: "Do you want to go out and speak on behalf of the department?" I said: "Yeah, I'd love to, but I'm not going to talk about this subject. I'll talk about what U.S. policy really is supposed to be. What our guidelines are. The kinds of things we are trying to accomplish. The broader areas. I'll talk about Arab-Israeli peace. I'll talk about the Iran-Iraq war. I'll talk about the hostage thing and I'll say that this is something that really goes against everything we are trying to do in the Middle East. I'll have to talk honestly about it, but without any knowledge, because I don't know anything. I think that all of us understand that this is not something that helped the United States in the Middle East or anywhere in the world."

Chuck agreed and I went out. In fact, I got that meritorious honor award about a year later for public affairs activities around the country. I went to twenty-four cities around the country in a very short period of time, within eight or nine months. Chuck got (Secretary) Schultz to give me the award. It was the special speaker of the year award, which I shared with somebody else from the Department. And it was really great.

I went out to all of these cities and one of the things that I found running through everywhere - And they appreciated my coming out there - they said: "We just appreciate that there was somebody from the Department who was willing to come out and just talk to us. Tell us what you are doing. Tell what the policy is going to be from here on in." And that's what I found. I went to world affairs councils, I went to universities, I went to Rotary clubs, the real rubber chicken circuit. And if I went into a city I would do six or seven things. It would be world affairs council, university, student groups, panel discussions, radio, television, editorial boards on newspapers. For me it was great. I had never done this before in the United States. I had done this overseas, but I had never done this in the United States. And to see people, whether it was Kansas City or Portland, Oregon - the need for people to be in touch with the foreign affairs establishment was so great, they just wanted to know that people in Washington wanted to hear their opinions.

Q: While you were on these public speaking tours, there must have been rumors. Ollie North had sort of made a name for himself in Lebanon as being a cowboy. He was not an unknown.

BERGER: No. He was not an unknown quantity. I had never met him. But I did hear people talking about him, basically that his mandate was to try to coordinate - and this is what I think a lot of people at State thought before the story broke - that he was being allowed to coordinate a lot of things that could get things done regarding hostages, that he had other channels. Nobody really knew what it was. But I don't think anybody knew that it was illegal, either. At least at that time before the story broke, I certainly didn't. Any people I talked with, you know, there was some chatter about these things but he gets the phone call. He coordinates everything about hostage release. So, you get the phone call from his office. And I may have gotten a phone call for one of the releases, either the first or the second, from him himself. I don't remember, but I know it was from his office, saying, "Get out to Andrews Air Force Base."

And Jerry Bremer was coordinator for counterterrorism at that time at State. And he was involved. And have a number of conversations that he had with the assistant secretary and others, meetings that I participated in. I remember talking with Jerry about a number of things because we had to coordinate our statements on a many things, including terrorism, counterterrorism, and hostage release. Certainly it did not appear to me that Jerry knew anything about what Ollie North was doing. I don't think Ollie trusted anybody from the State Department, to be frank.

Q: Well there had been the dispute over what George Schultz knew and didn't know. He was at meetings with Weinberger, how involved was he?

BERGER: Well, I don't know because that never came to me. Certainly I was in some meetings with Schultz when he came out to Israel, and a couple in Washington as well. You know, sitting in the back of the room like a fly on the wall. But never did I hear anything in any of those meetings that would lead me to believe that he knew anything.

There was one interesting thing that I would say. And this is something that refers to George H.W. Bush, the vice president. And this goes back to my last week in Israel, because it ended there with his trip there and the beginning of what we called strategic cooperation between the United States and Israel. He came there and there were several off the record meetings that he had with Israeli counter-terrorism experts, one of whom later died in an accident. And nobody ever knew what was going on in those meetings; they were not in the official schedule. But they related to counter-terrorism.

Q: When you were going around the country talking, were people focused on the arms for hostages or were they focused on the Arab-Israeli dispute? What was the interest?

BERGER: Arms for hostages was not the major focus, although people wanted to know something. What I tried to do was be a little bit on the offensive and say: "I know that you are all curious as to who knew what and when did they know it. I'm happy to tell you that I didn't know anything, but also that what happened really goes against American tradition and American law. People who were involved with this broke the law, and that is being reviewed by another part of the government. I would like to tell you about U.S. policy and what it is related to negotiating on hostages." And I laid out what the policy was. And after that they may be one or two questions, but most of them really dealt with the Arab-Israeli issue. There was a lot of interest in that.

Q: You had been in the hot house in Tel Aviv with American Jewish groups practically on a conveyer belt coming in to town. When you got away from that, did you find a different focus?

BERGER: It was really interesting. I think it's a good question to bring up. A lot of the requests were from world affairs councils and universities. But also, whenever I went into a community, the State Department public affairs office arranged meetings with major community Jewish groups. And if there were large Arab-American populations in those towns – Detroit; Ann Arbor; Uniontown, Pennsylvania, there were a number of other places – I would speak to Arab-American groups as well.

I would tell everybody the exact same thing. I don't try to change the story of the policy depending on who I'm speaking to. But I tried to be straight with them, to help them understand that the interests that they have as an interest group or ethnic group, the Department of State wants to hear their concerns. We want to know what they feel about our policies. And I think it's an important thing. I don't know if we do enough of that anymore, but it's something that we surely should do. It's important. They were taxpayers. I said: "You are taxpayers. You pay my salary. You pay the budget of the State Department," and I would try to get something in there that the budget for foreign affairs wasn't enough. And I would help them understand that point. I think it was less than one-percent of federal budget went to pay for the whole foreign affairs establishment, and that included all the aid that we give. I think most people didn't understand that. They didn't know that. It may make big headlines, but it doesn't make the biggest budget impact.

What we tried to help people understand why we do what we do and how their money is being spent on foreign policy. And to help people understand that we really have a number of considerations. First of all, that the United States does not support one side over the other. We try to be an honest broker. I think that was a theme that I gave for everybody.

There were lots of groups that came through the Department during the three years that I was spokesman for NEA – They wanted to talk to the Secretary of State, even if he had agreed, he wasn't always able to do it. There would be sudden meetings, foreign travel, so it would trickle down: the Deputy Secretary, the Under Secretary for Political Affairs, or the NEA Assistant Secretary. And there were hundreds of requests for the NEA assistant secretary, for Dick Murphy. Frequently he was unable to meet those requests and he would just pass them on to me. And I loved to do these things. And many of them were either Arab-American or Jewish-American groups that were coming to Washington to lobby members of congress, to go the circuit, and the State Department, of course, would be one of the stops. So it was a good opportunity to tell them what our policy was, what the United States has done in the past, how we look at ourselves as an honest broker, what our goals are and how we are trying to work them out. Such encounters helped me understand their concerns.

Also, on the other side, with the journalists that covered foreign policy. A lot of people in Washington know this, but I'm not sure that many people outside the beltway understand this. Every major newspaper, magazine, wire service, television, radio assigns their best foreign correspondents to cover the State Department. And there are a lot of journalists who cover the State Department who have been following foreign policy for many years longer than I have. They were smart. I would talk to them on a daily basis. They would go to the State Department noon briefing, which usually started at one o'clock. I was usually very busy in the morning getting approved press guidance through the bureau, NEA has a very small press office, maybe three or four of us at any one time. Frequently, especially if it was something on Arab-Israeli issues, which I knew very well from my time in Israel, and travel around the States, or participation in meetings with Dick Murphy, with Ed Djerejian, with Arne Raphel when he was senior Deputy Assistant Secretary covering the Israeli Desk, with Charley Hill – I knew what the policy was and would just draft it myself. This was something I learned from Chris Ross. He said: "If you know what the policy is, why would you farm it out to the desk? You have to get their clearance, but draft it yourself. It'll save you an hour or more." And it did. It was very good advice that he gave me.

Q: You say you went out and met these groups that wanted a chance to give their input. How did you act as an implementer of their input into the State Department?

BERGER: What I tried to do at that time – we didn't have email - when I came back from a trip – and every trip was two or three days, and two or three cities – I would try and give a little bit of a sense of the feedback that I was getting. If there were major threads of concern. I thought it was important to be able to get that back. I sent it to both the spokesman's office as well as to the NEA assistant secretary and the desks. People didn't always agree with our policy, but they really appreciated that they had an opportunity...for so long, no one had been out there to many of these cities. And, especially when Iran-Contra broke, there was a sense in the Department that public affairs and getting out was the lowest priority. And I really wanted to do it and I offered myself as the guinea pig to go out.

Q: Correct me if I'm wrong, but there may have been a folk memory of those who had gone out during the Vietnam War. We sent people all over the place and essentially they got verbally beaten up by students. It was a very unpleasant experience.

BERGER: I found in some places, you get radical students, especially at universities, and especially Palestinian students would come up to you and say "We disagree with your policy" and all of that. But I thought for the most part people were quite rational and willing to listen and willing to engage. One of the things that I found most important for somebody who is speaking on behalf of our establishment. Number one: never lose your cool. Once you lose your cool and get into an argument with someone. Somebody doesn't like your policy, doesn't like what you are doing, it not a personal sort of things; they may raise your voice, they may scream at you. I would very calmly try to explain what it was we were doing. I have this here now at the Holocaust Museum sometimes for the last couple of weeks we have been running a speaker's program. In fact the program we had last night, one of our speakers turned out to be a bit controversial. You don't lose your cool. You calmly try to get your point across.

Q: Did you run across this organization the Jewish Defense League? Can you explain what it was at that time?

BERGER: The Jewish Defense League was set up by a firebrand rabbi named Meir Kahane. I don't remember when he set it up, but it was originally to try to protect mainly elderly Jews in certain neighborhoods in New York who were getting beaten up by some of their neighbors who were not Jewish. He thought that this was a feeling of powerlessness, that these elderly people had, that they were being attacked because they were Jewish, that this was a form of anti-Semitism, and I think he was right. But then he expanded this thing...

(Start Tape 4, Side B)

He talked about Arab actions and policies and attacks on Israel and he said that this Jewish Defense League was the organization that was going to defend Jews everywhere and was going to help to protect the Jewish state. I remember that when I was in Israel, back in '82 to '86, he became quite active with what they call the Jewish underground, which provoked attacks against Arabs whether in the West Bank and Gaza or other parts. But especially West Bank and Gaza. And then in the United States also it took a very aggressive role. And as time went on, late '80s, became even more aggressive.

We had a policy in the State Department that we would not engage with them. They would always try to get us to get on a radio program with them, go on TV, join them for a panel discussion. We said: "We do not sit down with fringe groups that believe in violence as a method of operation. Period." We wanted to marginalize them. It is very much the same way as here in the museum we deal with Holocaust deniers. We don't engage them because it gives them a platform, gives them credibility, gives them news. Why should we do that? So we try to marginalize them.

They [the Jewish Defense League] were as bad as – in some cases – the terrorist groups. They attacked Arab-American installations, organizations, people. And we were not going to have anything to do with them. If any American cabinet-level department was going to have anything to do with them, it would be the Office of the Attorney General, the Justice Department.

Q: Well they were also attacking Soviet installations. The Embassy. And every time they did that, something would happen to us in Moscow.

BERGER: There were other Jewish organizations that demonstrated, had vigils, petitions against Soviet policy towards Jews. And this goes on and on and on. This is before the collapse of the Soviet Union, where Jewish immigration was highly restricted. And in many cases, if somebody tried to apply for emigration from the Soviet Union and they were Jewish, they would lose their job before anything else. If they were a student, they would be kicked out of school. So it was a very different kind of thing. But there were some very responsible organizations that were working on that. It was Senator Scoop Jackson who I think was one of the leaders of the responsible . . . offered the Jackson-Vanik Amendment

Q: What was your impression, on the public affairs side, of the Israeli Embassy in Washington?

BERGER: It depended on who was serving there. And I had a lot of dealings with their spokesman. And there was one in particular who really stood out as a first class professional. Years later we became close friends, but the name escapes me. He later became spokesman for the Israeli foreign ministry and then, after he became Israeli ambassador in the Netherlands. Now I think he is their MFA director general for Western Europe and business affairs. Quite a sharp, sharp person. When I was in Israel I also became friends with and also worked closely with Abi Pasnaya, who was the spokesman for the foreign ministry. I found them for the most part to be first class professionals. There were exceptions, of course. And there was a big difference, I think, between those who were spokesperson for the foreign minister or for the Israeli embassy. Generally foreign affairs professionals, just like ourselves. And those who were the spokesmen for the prime minister. Just as the spokesman for the president tends to be a political appointee. Very different kinds of roles that they play.

Q: What about AIPAC – America-Israel Public Affairs Committee?

BERGER: They are a well run operation, a first class lobbying organization. Probably have more impact than their size. They are nowhere near the size of, for example, the NRA (National Rifle Association) or AARP (American Association of Retired People). But very powerful, very influential. I would call them a streamlined operation. When they saw an issue that concerned the U.S.-Israeli relationship and it was of a priority nature to them, they would get out the troops. They would get out hundreds, if not thousands, sometimes, of letter writers, people who would come to members of congress' offices. First class operation.

They would frequently bring to the State Department groups of their supporters to get a briefing. And we gave them as good a briefing as we would give any other group. I found them really professional. One of the things that I found about them was that their goal appeared to me to be to do what they could to strengthen the U.S.-Israeli relationship. And they focused mainly on Congress, at that time. They have since expanded and focused more on executive branch. But their biggest focus has always been on Congress. For example, they would invite probably every new member to go on a trip to Israel. And they would get them meetings with every top leader in Israel. They were, as I said, a very well run operation.

Q: Did you ever find that they were going in one direction and you, representing the State Department, were going another?

BERGER: Oh yes. Very much so. And it concerned a couple of things. One was on U.S. aid beyond the green line. This was something that we would not tolerate.

Q: Can you explain what that means?

BERGER: The green line is the armistice line of 1949, which ended Arab-Israeli hostilities after the 1948-49 war which resulted in the independence of Israel. This goes back to the 1947 United Nations partition of the western part of the Palestinian mandate – because the original Palestinian mandate included both east of the Jordan and west of the Jordan river. East of the Jordan river through the various agreements, especially Sykes-Picot and a private agreement that the British Government had with Sharif Hussein of Mecca resulted in taking the eastern part out of the original Palestinian mandate of the League of Nations and creating the Kingdom of Trans-Jordan. Sharif Hussein was King Hussein's great-grandfather. Then the western side became the mandate of Palestine. The 1947 United Nations partition agreement said that that territory would be divided up into what would become a Jewish state and an Arab state and an internationalized city and surrounding area of Jerusalem. The British finally gave up in the spring of '48, said they were pulling out their forces, too many attacks. The Jewish were attacking them. The Arabs were attacking them. And they had to get out, and they did.

And the Jewish Agency for Palestine which became the precursor of the Israeli state declared independence May 14, 1948. The coordinated with the British withdrawal. And at the same time the Palestinians, together with Arab armies from a number of states surrounding, including as far as Iraq, invaded. The nascent Jewish state was divided, there were several different enclaves. At the end of fighting in 1949 an armistice agreement resulted in a State of Israel with undemarcated, or rather temporary boundaries, which was referred to as "the green line." Mainly, I think, somebody used a green magic marker. It had nothing to do with one side having more grass than the other, or better agricultural property. It had to do only with how they put the line on the map.

And that became the temporary boundary. But it wasn't referred to as a boundary. It was referred to as an armistice line. And there was still, according to the United States Government, a feeling that Jerusalem still could be an international city. So the U.S. Government put its embassy in the city of Tel Aviv, which is on the Mediterranean coast. Yet, whenever a U.S. ambassador presented his credentials to the president of Israel, he did it in the president's residence, which was in West Jerusalem.

This is one of the contradictions of American policy. We tried to deal with it in as logical a way as we could. On a de facto basis we recognize Israeli sovereignty over West Jerusalem. With the ambassador presenting credentials, with the ambassador and other members of the U.S. Government coming to Jerusalem for all kinds of government meetings, we did that. What we did not do, on two levels: One was – as I started to say - a dispute on the issue of aid. We forbade any U.S. assistant to Israel from being expended beyond that green line, which meant in East Jerusalem or in the territories that were occupied by Israel at the end of the 1967 war: the West Bank and Gaza, principally. So that's one of the areas we disagreed with AIPAC on.

Another area that we disagreed with AIPAC on was on American officials going to Jerusalem.

For example, Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of State, Agriculture, Energy, you name it, because we have a lot of them. Or even a member of Congress. We would not facilitate – and this was really very much of a fiction in real terms, but this was our policy principle – the visit of any American official to East Jerusalem or to any of the territories. And the way that we did this was, we handed over the visitor to our colleagues in the U.S. consulate general in Jerusalem, which had two offices yet under one consul general.

And this was another area where we got into disputes with groups like AIPAC and other Jewish groups. They would frequently talk about: “You’ve got two U.S. consulates, one in West Jerusalem to deal with Israelis, another in East Jerusalem to deal with the Palestinians.” And we would say: “No. You’ve got it wrong. There is only one consulate in Jerusalem and that consulate was opened in the 1860s in the building that we still have in West Jerusalem.” Beautiful old building, by the way. We have one consulate under the authority of the consulate general who predated the Palestinian mandate of the League of Nations. And the reason why we had two buildings really originated in 1948-49 because after the armistice agreement it was so difficult to get through the Mandelbaum Gate, not only for Jews or Arabs, but also for American diplomats. Although we had free passage, it wasn’t always so free. It was very difficult. Whether the Jordanians occupied east Jerusalem and the west bank or the Israelis in West Jerusalem, it wasn’t easy because there were hostilities between the two. Even though – as we know now – there were so many behind the scenes contacts between the Israelis and the Jordanians, more than anybody ever knew, there was this difficulty in getting back and forth while there was this division of Jerusalem. And so that was another area on which we disagreed with AIPAC.

Secondly, we believed that the fate of the city of Jerusalem remained to be determined by negotiations among the parties. And we kept to that line. And Jewish groups, especially AIPAC and others further to the right of AIPAC, disagreed with us. There were very few Jewish groups, in fact, that agreed with us.

Q: On the other side, what about the various Arab embassies and their ability to make their points?

BERGER: They were able to make their points. They had great access within the Department of State. I cannot speak for the whole administration, but certainly the Saudis, the Syrians, the Iraqis – when Tariq Aziz was ambassador to Washington he had frequent contact at the assistant secretary or higher level. And of course the Egyptians were our allies and still are, and had very close and frequent contact.

Q: Did they weigh-in on Arab-Israeli relations?

BERGER: All the time. There was some disagreement. Although I found that during those years that I was in NEA, ’86 to ’89, there was a pretty good agreement that the United States Government was taking the right track. The difficulty that we had frequently with the Arab governments – with the exception of Jordan and Egypt – is that they were not helpful in two ways. One, in bringing the Palestinians along and trying to convince the Palestinian leadership, and especially Arafat. If you remember how from ’86 to ’89, with the exception of after ’88 when Arafat said the magic words about recognizing Israel’s right to exist, we did not have any direct communication with the PLO. So we depended on the Egyptians and the Jordanians principally. And there were times when the Jordanians got fed up with the Palestinians and didn't want to have anything to do with passing messages or trying to bring them to any kind of negotiations, or negotiate on behalf of the Palestinians. I don't remember the exact time, but I remember that they were throwing their hands up in frustration.

The Saudis were never helpful. And other Arab governments were for the most part away from the center of the conflict. I went on a number of trips when I was in NEA to Arab countries, from Mauritania to Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, UAE and then to South Asia, India and Pakistan. And invariably in the Arab countries you would talk about bilateral relations. We talked about U.S. relations with the Arab world. We talked about terrorism issues and we also talked, inevitably, about the Arab-Israeli issues. And there were a couple of anecdotes that if you don't mind I'll just go into while we are here. One concerns a lunch that I had at the DCM's house in Riyadh. And the other a meeting I had with the head of Middle East affairs at the Kuwaiti foreign ministry. This is way before the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait.

In 1988 in Saudi Arabia. The DCM had a small group of Saudis who had studied in the United States. Several I think were with the foreign ministry and a couple of them were American affairs experts from one of the universities. First thing that they did when they came in – and this struck me because I had done a lot of studying about Saudi Arabia over the years and some of my colleagues at NEA said: “Don't bring any liquor with you. Be careful of any books you bring with you. However, recognize that as soon as you meet a Saudi in a private home, they will start drinking liquor.” I had forgotten about this. And the first thing that happened when they walked in the door was they said: “Where's the scotch?” It just took me aback. I really had forgotten about this. And we had a nice conversation. As I said, it was a very small group sitting around a table.

Inevitably the conversation gets to the Arab-Israeli dispute. Now, the embassy passed around my bio before I came. I was spokesman for NEA, but I had just spent the preceding four years as the spokesman for the U.S. embassy in Israel. And I never kept secret the fact that I was Jewish. But I was representing the State Department and the U.S. Government. So we got into a conversation. I asked them: “You all studied in the United States?” This was after a couple hours of eating and drinking. And I said: “When you were there, did you ever meet any Israelis?” And they looked at each other. And then one of them said: “Yes, I did.” And I asked him what was his reaction.

He said: “Well, let me tell you a story.” And this guy was at USC. This really stuck in my mind, because it was the first time I had ever asked a Saudi such a question. He said: “I was at USC and I was with a number of friends of mine. He said there were a couple of other Saudis and some Americans and they were sitting at an outdoor café. The weather was beautiful in Los Angeles. Some other graduate students in the university came by and they were friends with somebody else who was sitting in this group. And they sat down, got a drink, and were talking. And he said: “I asked this guy ‘Where are you from? Your accent is very familiar.’” And the guy says “Israel.” And the Saudi says: “Oh my God” and looked around him to see who was listening. He said his first reaction was to look and see who was watching him meeting with an Israeli. His first reaction is fear. “Oh my God, there goes my scholarship. The embassy is going to find out about this.” And then he looked around and said, okay, and they started talking about things. I said: “What was your reaction?” He said: “He was a nice guy. And we didn’t just talk about the Middle East. We talked about school, other issues, our friends.” “Eventually we got to discuss Arab-Israeli issues, but that wasn’t the first thing we talked about. We met several other times and had some nice conversations. And I came back to Saudi Arabia and I really couldn’t tell anybody about that.” I thought that was too bad. It was too bad that there couldn’t be this open conversation that you really began to have after 1993. But this was in the late ‘80s.

The second anecdote was in Kuwait. And we were talking and finally got to the subject of the Arab-Israeli issues. And this guy was head of Middle Eastern affairs at the Kuwaiti foreign ministry. And I said something like, “You know, there is something about Kuwait. A gorgeous country. The building that has been done and the prosperity was amazing.” I told him that I had heard about it but never realized how much they had built up in such a short period of time. I said: “You know, there is something about Kuwait that reminds me of Israel” and told him that I had lived in Israel for four years. The guy said: “What do you mean?” He was shocked by this whole thing. And I said: “I’ll give you a couple of examples. Number one, the tank traps coming into the foreign ministry. You are afraid of terrorists. Same thing in Israel. Also, a very small country. Your main resource is oil. Their main resource is agriculture and hi-tech. They don’t have any oil. But it’s also a concentrated amount of resource. People who really want to be left alone to develop on their own. And you are surrounded by enemies. To your north you have Iraq, to your east you’ve got Iran.” This was the time when the U.S. was beginning the reflagging of Kuwaiti tankers because the Iranians were targeting them. And I said: “There are these similarities. It’s not the same thing, of course. But there are these similarities.” And this guy said: “You may be right, but don’t ever tell that to anybody else.”

Q: When you were with NEA, did you ever get the feeling that while the Arab countries profess great support for Palestine, they don’t really do much for it?

BERGER: Oh, there’s no question about it. They had to make a ritualistic conversation about the Arab-Israeli dispute, about their strong support, undying support for the Palestinians. But you could tell that they couldn’t care less about the Palestinians. First of all, they didn’t want any more Palestinians in their country. Secondly, they were jealous of the Palestinians because generally the Palestinians were better educated, had greater technical skills. Especially in the oil countries, they had to depend on the Palestinians to run the oil industries. They became the second-level technocrats in the ministries. And they really disliked them. There was this jealousy. And they also used them. And the Palestinians knew this. I talked to a lot of Palestinians over the years and they distrusted the Arabs. This is a stereotype, of course. Because there were some Arabs in some countries who really believed in and really wanted to help the Palestinians. But for the most part, and especially at the governmental levels, they were just using the Palestinians for whatever end they had.

They could have resolved the dispute years and years before. I remember one time at a thing called Philadelphia Camp, in Gaza. This was a refugee camp that the United States, Israel and Egypt agreed on to build new housing for the Palestinians. And the Egyptians had some hesitation about it, but they could not get agreement from any other Arab country. They said “We can’t do it on our own.” There were a lot of Palestinians ready to move in. The U.S. was funding most of it, like the U.S. funds most of the UNRA (United Nations Relief Agency). What they could not get was any Arab country to agree to resettle – and this was resettling within the Gaza strip – into new housing. They said “No, we can’t do this because this will defuse the issue of the refugees.”

So many Palestinians on their own built their own housing. UNRA gave them bricks, cinderblocks, tin roofs, whatever. So if you go into a refugee camp, whether it is in Gaza or West Bank or in some of the other countries, people are not living in tents. A lot of people finally recognized that they could build something more permanent.

Q: Were there any major developments in Arab-Israeli relations while you were there from '86 to '89?

BERGER: There were a couple of things and it was principally on the Jordanian side. The Jordanians kept coming up very, very close to doing something. We had a lot of talks, especially with the Saudis. And it was generally kind of one-way talking. We would keep asking them for help and they would say “yes, yes, yes.” And of course they didn’t do anything. The Jordanians really did try to help. And there were a number of instances where they really tried to move things forward. The Jordanians were ready to sign a peace agreement with the Israelis for years and years, including the period '86 to '89. But they said they could not do anything unless there was progress on the Palestinian side.

And we went through a lot of conversations. I don’t remember how many meetings we had with the Israelis, with the Egyptians, with the Jordanians, with other Arabs, about how we can move things incrementally, one step at a time. And of course nothing really happened until the Israeli and the Palestinians on their own brokered the Oslo accord.

Q: Was there a feeling of frustration of our inability to talk directly to the PLO?

BERGER: Yes. There was a lot of frustration because, I think, everybody recognized – especially at that time, in the late '80s – that you were not going to get anything moving forward unless you got the Palestinians to come across on this stuff. And the only way to do that would be to get Arafat to be part of any kind of a conversation. But the United States was restricted by an agreement that we had made with Israel a long time before that, because of, this goes back to Khartoum, the “three no’s” that the Palestinian Liberation Organization enunciated years before that; that we made a commitment with Israel that we would not get into direct negotiations with the Palestinians. There were a couple of times on security issues where there were exceptions when it related to the safety and security of American diplomats, in Beirut especially, and other points in Lebanon. But on the whole the United States Government really kept to its promise to the Israelis. But we really wanted to get beyond that because we knew that nothing would move ahead. And it was in Israel’s interest to have things move ahead. So we kept trying through the Egyptians and the Jordanians to find ways of getting something going on with the Palestinians.

When Arafat was in Sweden in 1988 there was that whole movement forward on “Can we get him to say that Israel has a right to exist?” There were some private Jewish groups that were in Stockholm trying to work with him on that as well. The Swedish Government, of course. There were other Arab governments as well. Our embassy in Stockholm. We here at the State Department. And I remember a number of conversations that went back and forth with NEA, with the Front Office, trying to work on formulations.

We were really tough. I have to say that. We stood on the principal that we were not going to shortcut this. And Dick Murphy was one of those who led this and George Shultz as well. That if it really didn't mean something, in substance, then we were not going to go along with it. So it wasn't just: "Yeah, Israel has a right to exist, consistent with this resolution and that resolution." We wanted a clear statement. A statement from Arafat in English and in Arabic that said Israel had a right to exist behind secure and recognized boundaries. Otherwise we would not begin a dialogue.

And I remember the days leading up to the statement. There were things that went back and forth. "And this was not enough, this was not enough. No! This does not have any meaning." And I'm sure it stuck in Arafat's craw to say those words, finally. And because it was so tough for him, we felt that it really had meaning.

I remember working on the statement with Dan Kurtzer, who was working for the secretary as a speechwriter to do the statement that Schultz would issue on the news, live at six-thirty that evening. Chuck Redmond and I and one or two others made phone calls, very careful phone calls to producers to tell them that there would be a major statement that the Secretary of State would give exactly at six-thirty. They wanted it before because they didn't want to lead off their newscast live. They didn't know what this was about. All we could tell them was that it had to do with the Middle East. And of course it was earth shaking and was worthy of leading the news. And Schultz did do it live on television. And Bob Pelletreau, who was our ambassador in Tunis, it was announced was going to begin the dialog with Chairman Arafat.

Q: What about the Israelis? Had they been carrying on conversations with the PLO? I find it almost incredible that they wouldn't.

BERGER: No doubt. I do not know for a fact that they did. They certainly had conversations with Palestinians. Did they have with the PLO? I really don't know. I've never been able to find that out. Someday, I'm sure, we'll have something declassified or somebody will write a book where it'll come out. But I have no doubt that there were conversations.

Q: Did we ever talk to the Israelis and say, "Come on fellas, let's get this thing going. Let us talk to the Palestinians."

BERGER: Oh, there were lots of conversations like that. The Israelis were adamant that unless there was a clear recognition of Israel's right to exist in peace and security in the Middle East, behind recognized boundaries, that they couldn't accept it. They thought it would just be a formula for a continuation of the conflict.

Q: When you were back in the NEA bureau, what were you getting of evaluations of Arafat?

BERGER: Nobody trusted him. No one. They all thought he was sleazy. I don't mind saying that. And this is no state secret. They thought he was sleazy. They thought he was a crook. They thought he controlled all of the finances. They thought that he squirreled away money that probably found its way into not only Swiss bank accounts, but graft. I don't think people really questioned his honesty when it came to money. Although I think since that time more and more people have done that. But certainly, we felt, that everybody around him was corrupt. And they would do anything, not necessarily for the Palestinian people, but for their own bank accounts, for their own stature. There were a lot of corrupt people who didn't give a damn about the refugees. All they cared about was how they lived in Tunis and how they were going to travel.

Arafat himself looked at his own stature. When he was in exile, he could get everybody and his uncle to give him a private plane to take him as a head of state to this country and that country, all around the world. Once he became head of Gaza and the West Bank, who wanted to hear him? He had to worry about the garbage pick-up.

Q: What about the Arab-Israeli press? One always hears about the questions that Americans ask, but how did you find the press?

BERGER: I loved it. I loved dealing with them. I dealt with the American press on a daily basis. As I said, the top correspondents at the State Department, immediately after the noon briefing, sometimes early in the morning, we would an inkling from one them who would call and say there was a particular question that they are looking at for broadcast today or for a story they were writing for tomorrow. It wasn't like today with the internet when they are looking for stories for the next two hours. It was a little more relaxed. I would say that every day I got phone calls from at least some of the Israeli and some of the Arab journalists. They understood where the line was or sometimes I would tell them there were some things I could not get into. They may be sensitive; I may not know about them, or I didn't feel it was appropriate for me to get into this issue.

When I started as head of NEA/P, every month I would go over to the foreign press center, the national press club, and this was run by USIA at the time. Once a month they would organize for me an open press forum. It was principally for the Arab and Israeli press. Anybody could come, any kind of question, but it was almost totally dominated by Arabs and Israelis. And it was a great place to have a discussion. It was also a great place to get Arabs and Israelis together. They did. The journalists got together on their own and exchanged ideas. Many of them are still active today, fifteen or twenty years later.

DAVID M. EVANS

Political Advisor to Commander in Chief, U.S. Naval Forces in Europe
London, England (1982-1986)

Adviser Evans was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania and educated at Harvard University where he studied Russian and University of Fribourg. He was London advisor to the Commander in Chief from 1982-1986. He was interviewed in 1996 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: During this 1982 to 1986-period, the early-Reagan and mid-Reagan period. You had John Lehman as Secretary of the Navy. It was probably the most aggressive period we had with the Navy, wasn't it? Could you talk about what our posture was in those days, Navy wise, and the politics thereof that you dealt with?

EVANS: You're right. The Navy was without question, the most prominent of the four services, depending on how you consider the Marines. This was partly due to the Reagan force projection and partly due to John Lehman's particular emphasis on Naval expansion to contain the perceived Soviet threat. The Navy was, without question, the most interesting and active in long-range force projection of the three services. It was also the one in which there were the most political military questions that came to the attention of the Political Advisor or POLAD. I think we all know that many of these POLAD jobs are sleepy, quasi-academic jobs.

The job in London was extremely active, very hands-on, and very policy oriented. When I'm talking about policy, I'm talking about major policy initiatives throughout the whole area that the Naval Command in Europe encompassed, which was from the Northern area of Norway, right down through all of Europe, to the Mediterranean. It enhanced all of the Mediterranean, including the Sixth Fleet -- which was under my Admiral's command -- and the northern rim of Africa, namely Morocco, Tunisia, Algeria, for what that was worth, Egypt, Israel, the Middle-East, right up to the Persian Gulf, which was under the relatively new Central Command, headquartered in Tampa. We dealt with all the European issues, all of the East-West issues because the European Command encompassed the Soviet Union fully. Anything to do with the Soviet Union and the Soviet threat and Soviet force projections, other than the Soviet fleet in the Pacific area, but anything dealing with the Soviet Union in the Atlantic, the Mediterranean, the Soviet Union, on the ground, I would say, to the extent that the Navy had interest in that, came under our purview. It also included base-related problems, local problems and particularly the Arab-Israeli problems. Those were all within our purview. What was not within our purview was the Iran/Iraq situation, although our intelligence outfit located in London, which was probably one of the best military intelligence outfits in the world, actively followed all U.S. Naval force activities on a daily basis. Because of what I had been dealing with in my previous position as Director of International Security Operations and the State Department's Political-Military Affairs Bureau, many of these problems came to my attention as well, even though they were slightly outside our geographic confines. Technically, our purview went all the way down to South Africa, although during my tenure, we didn't go down there. I did travel extensively throughout Northern Africa. The major problem though, and the one that I dealt with immediately upon arrival and immediately before departure, was in the Middle-East. It was the Lebanon situation. As you may recall, the Israeli forces, in early 1982, had moved into Southern Lebanon and Palestinians had fled back either to Tunisia or to other places, and a war, initially a slow war, of political and military attrition began between Israel and Lebanon/the PLO (Palestinian Liberation Organization). That heated up considerably. But during the four and one-half years I was there, the underlying motif and the major activity, constant activity, was the Lebanon engagement, both in and out of Lebanon.

Q: Let's take the Lebanese crisis first. From your perspective, could you say how that developed, when you arrived? Also, how did the Navy get involved?

EVANS: The Navy got involved because, for one reason, to protect the American citizens that were in Lebanon, to protect those forces in Lebanon that were judged to be on our side, to provide military support and security for Ambassador Phil Habib, who was shuttling back and forth as the Middle East negotiator. I'm trying to work this thing out between the Israelis, the PLO, and the Lebanese. The situation gradually got much more dangerous on the ground which lead to an increase buildup of our offshore naval forces. Then, it involved other countries including Cyprus, where we used the port of Larnaca as our forward operation base. Also, the desire to use Turkish facilities led me to be in the missions flying out to Turkey to try to negotiate that which did not work out. It involved closer cooperation with the Israelis in naval activities that I had not realized before. We did not particularly acknowledge the fact that we had a very active and substantive cooperation program with the Israeli military and navy in anti-submarine warfare, in particular. Our forces were increased offshore and the Marines, as you recall, were placed in Lebanon. We worked with the Israelis in trying to make sure that the Libyans and others hostile to our interests did not come up and attack us under water.

Q: Were you there when the Sabra and Shatila massacres took place?

EVANS: Yes.

Q: And the bombardment of Beirut, prior to that?

EVANS: That's right.

Q: Could you give me a bit of feeling about the attitude of our military, particularly toward the Israeli armed forces and the Israeli policy during that particular time? What were you getting?

EVANS: Well, as far as I could see, our military had nothing but great respect for the Israeli military. Our military realized what the State Department did not realize: that there was a major threat looming from the other side, the Arab side. We had good intelligence sharing with the Israelis. I was very impressed with the amount of intelligence and good intelligence that their navy had about Iranian, Syrian, hostile Lebanese and PLO activities, that were very threatening to our forces and to our interests in the area. You had a dichotomy growing that lead to the split, just before the bombing of the Marine headquarters, which I guess was in March or April of 1984. The Defense Department had a better assessment than the State Department. The State Department was terribly naive about our presence. They were talking about having our military build basketball courts. They were trying to have it both ways. They were trying to go into a hostile environment from the anti-Israeli forces' point of view, and yet, act as though we were there merely as benevolent peacekeepers. Therefore, we should be opening dental clinics and building them basketball courts, and playing basketball. At the time that George Shultz was telling Casper Weinberger that we should be building basketball courts and opening dental clinics, Weinberger was being told by his people that the Syrians were building facilities in the Bekaa Valley with Iranian money, and planning to send trucks loaded with bombs to bomb our forces. This was days, if not weeks, before the horrendous bombing that took place. I happened to be back in Washington at that time for briefings in the Political-Military Affairs Bureau, so, I know whereof I speak on that issue. I at least feel I do.

Q: In the first place, it was a complicated business. First, we put our troops in to help get the Palestinians out after the Israelis colluded with some right wing Christian militia, and went in and slaughtered Palestinian families. We had already used our troops to help pull out the Palestinian armed forces. Almost by reflex, we let our Marines back in, along with the French and Italians, I think. At that time, was there questioning at your admiral's headquarters about . . . "fine, but what is this about?" Later, this became a major issue . . . "What are we up to?"

EVANS: Yes, I think it is fair to say as we have seen in the past, and we are seeing in the present day, that policy makers decided to use U.S. military forces to carry out activities that are not those directly related to what the military thinks it should be doing: some sort of peacekeeping or separation of forces, or presence, or whatever you want to call it. You are right, with that mission, there was no tangible enemy to kill or beat. There was a great deal of frustration about being in an increasingly hostile environment where we could only take limited measures to protect our own forces. The purpose seemed to be just to hang on, while this nebulous process dragged on. This began with your question about what the military thought of Israel. I think the military perception was, and it certainly was my perception, based on all the evidence that I saw, that the PLO started the darn thing. The amount of hostile terrorist activity that came directly from Iran and Syria, as far as I know, is still going on. The creation and support of the training camps in Bekaa Valley were clearly supported financially by this Syrian/Iranian connection. This happened in the last few days of this stupid assassination attempt the Israelis did in Jordan. They occasionally bungle things and occasionally on a big scale. I think the perception that we were working under militarily was that this was a situation that had been brought on, as it normally is, by the Arabs' failure to adhere to proper behavior. Then, when you try to do something about it as police forces do sometimes in an urban riot, excessive force gets used and then all hell breaks loose. People forget the reason for the use of excessive force in the first place. That is the point I am trying to make. The PLO started it and certain things happened. But the given was that we were on the Israeli side. Whether they acted correctly or not the whole time was almost beside the point from the military point of view because they were our allies. They were and still are our NATO anchors. They are not in NATO, but they might just as well be.

ROBERT B. PETERSEN
Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
Tel Aviv (1982-1986)

Mr. Petersen was born and raised in Ohio and educated at Oberlin College. He entered the USIA Foreign Service in 1965 and served as Public and Cultural Affairs Office in Embassies or Consulates in Vietnam, Malaysia, Japan, Mauritius, Israel, Morocco and Cote d'Ivoire. He also served in several senior USIA positions in Washington, DC. Mr. Peterson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001

Q: Today is January 18, 2003. We're back in business again. Israel. You were in Israel from when to when?

PETERSEN: I got to Israel in June of '82 and left in June or July of '86. It was a four year tour.

Q: Who was the ambassador when you got there?

PETERSEN: Sam Lewis. He had been appointed ambassador under President Carter and was currently serving as ambassador under President Reagan, a Democratic and then a Republican administration. He was there for seven years, quite a tenure for anyone.

Q: What was the state of American-Israeli relations in '82 and how would you describe Israel at the time?

PETERSEN: The key thing to remember is that this was the Israeli move into southern Lebanon.

I had left Mauritius in January of '82. The intent was that I was going to study Hebrew until late in '82 before being assigned as CAO (Cultural Affairs Officer) to Tel Aviv. I had begun my Hebrew language training in Washington. I think I was at about chapter 12 or 13 of the FSI book. I think there were 24 chapters. Suddenly, I got a call on a Wednesday morning in June telling me that I had to get to post that coming weekend. I really hadn't been planning to go for another five or six months. My wife and I were in the midst of house hunting to buy our first house. I politely said, "This is quite a change. I'm not prepared to go. This isn't what the plan was. No thank you." I got another call shortly thereafter, an hour or so later, from someone higher up the food chain who said, "You ought to get there this weekend." I again politely declined. By midday, I got another call from the deputy area director at USIA. He said, "Remember, you're in the Foreign Service. You either go where you're told when you're told or you resign and get out. That's your choice. We want you there this weekend." I got there that Sunday. From Wednesday to Sunday, I shifted gears. This was June of '82.

The reason for that was that the CAO in Tel Aviv, Sally Grooms, had been suddenly selected to do something for USIA, to take charge of a new youth exchange program.

Q: I was interviewing her yesterday. She is now Sally Grooms Cowl.

PETERSEN: I don't know if she described that part. I was just tangentially connected to it. As I was told before I got to Tel Aviv, the USIA director wanted her immediately for this position to start up a new project. This was Charlie Wick. The ambassador in Israel had said he wasn't going to release his CAO until the new CAO was there to replace her. Thus, they told me to get out there that weekend, and arrive by Sunday to go to work the following morning. To make a long story short, I arrived that following Sunday. There was about a week where we were both there. Then Sally left to rush back to Washington to head up this new youth exchange project for Mr. Wick. I was in the position that I had wanted and been tapped for from late the previous year but I had to forego the balance of the language training.

In June of '82, there I was, the new CAO in Israel. What was it like? What was our relationship like? The Likud had just recently come to power. Menachem Begin was the prime minister. This was a tectonic shift for the Israelis. The Labor government was out after so many years in power.

The new Likud and everything that it represented in political thinking and in sociological/cultural outlook was quite a shift for the Israelis and our government, which had an excellent, close relationship with the Labor government and politicians and was hard at work maintaining that type of relationship with the Likud government. At the time I arrived, the job of the embassy was to make sure that there was good understanding, that they understood us, that we interpreted properly and correctly what the Israeli government was doing. That to a large extent was exactly what was happening, although both Israelis and we Americans were perhaps concerned and at times baffled by the efforts in Lebanon.

Q: When did they go into Lebanon?

PETERSEN: I forget the exact date. It was that spring.

Q: The Israeli army was in Lebanon in force.

PETERSEN: Yes.

Q: Was the siege of Beirut going on?

PETERSEN: Yes. The duties I had were such that - every officer in the embassy was aware of and following events in Lebanon - but my focus was on the relationship with our counterparts, our contacts, in Israel proper both in the government and outside the government. We had a fantastic, well established, excellent cultural affairs program at the time I arrived. It was a joy to step into it. I use the old cliché that it was vibrant and exciting. We had a cultural center inside the embassy in Tel Aviv with an excellent library/research facility. There was a separate USIS officer in the consulate in Jerusalem, but the embassy in Tel Aviv maintained a cultural center in Jerusalem that was separate.

Q: This was the peculiar thing where our consulate general in Jerusalem reported straight to Washington.

PETERSEN: Yes.

Q: There was a certain rivalry.

PETERSEN: From what I observed under Ambassador Lewis and then later under Ambassador Pickering, I wouldn't use the word "rivalry." There was a certain recognition of the importance of maintaining a sense of independence, but rather close cooperation, not rivalry. But I know that is an issue and a lot of people might want to depict it as rivalry and have good explanations as to why, but from my point of view, it was really cooperation.

Q: It also depends on the personalities, particularly of the consul general and the ambassador.

PETERSEN: Yes. Wat Cluverius and Brandon Grove were the CGs (Consul Generals). They attended the weekly country team meeting in Tel Aviv. They would sit next to the ambassador. There was a sense of emphasizing both their independence and their importance and their relationship with the embassy. No effort was ever made to trample on that independence.

Anyway, in June, I got launched on that assignment.

Q: Tell me about the invasion of Lebanon. How was this viewed in the embassy as you arrived?

PETERSEN: The concern was how to resolve the situation. Very early on, we had shuttle diplomacy with Phil Habib. I had actually met him in Saigon. He was head of the political section there. He played a key role in trying to establish the negotiations for an Israeli withdrawal. Much of the embassy support went into that. My colleague, Arthur Berger, the press attaché, must have spent 95 percent of his time on that, speaking to the press every day at the sites of various talks and negotiations.

I, on the other hand, was spending 99 percent of my time, if not 100 percent, on other things. The cultural program that I was responsible for was not a part of the embassy resources being applied to helping resolve the Lebanon issue.

Q: When somebody arrives and is new on the block, often they can sense the mood clearer than somebody who has been there. There is a difference. Did you find any disquiet among the officers over what the Israelis were doing?

PETERSEN: Yes. In general, yes. A great deal. First of all, in the largest sense, there was concern about U.S. interests in the area and concern about stability in the Middle East. But also concern that the Israelis weren't doing something that was in their own interest. A great deal of disquiet.

Q: In your cultural activities, what were you getting from your contacts? I am told that in Israel, it's vibrant and if nothing else, everybody is articulate as all hell.

PETERSEN: The same sort of disquiet. Articulate, very vocal expressions of concern from some of the contacts. Others expressed general frustration and determination and a sense of being absolutely pushed to the limit, that something needed to be done, that they couldn't put up with the constant threats, that terrorist activity, the bombardments, the harassment in the form of shells landing in their kibbutz and so forth up in the north. A real anger, determination to accomplish something, but perhaps also a recognition of how hard it would be to target the right enemy. It was the entire gamut of feeling.

Q: What were we doing on the cultural program?

PETERSEN: The two libraries had excellent research facilities and were in great use at providing material for scholars and journalists and people in the arts and so forth. We were busy - the word "showcasing" comes to mind - providing insights into American thinking and developments, individual arts and the performing arts. When I arrived, one of the very first programs - I hadn't set it up, but Sally left and I got to manage it and take whatever managerial bows - there was a major dance company that came over. We were involved in bringing theater people. At the Tel Aviv Museum, we had a Gottlieb exhibit, a major effort to showcase an aspect of the American visual arts. We had the dance company I mentioned. We got involved in everything over the course of the four years in the realm of the arts. Opera. We brought over Sarah Caldwell. We had a variety of street theater companies. I used to work with a number of the Israeli dance troupes, theater groups, to facilitate their efforts to show the development of the arts in Israel to the American audiences in the U.S.

We had the IV program. The program we had was a major resource for the embassy. We had great involvement from the political section, the economic section, the DCM, Bill Brown, and then Bob Flatin, who later was ambassador in Rwanda. The DCM was involved in our IV selection committee. In some embassies, it becomes a stepchild of the CAO. USIS may jealously guard the IV program, and give lip service to making it nationwide. But in Tel Aviv, it was absolutely mission-wide and there was great participation not just in the selection of grantees but in the prepping of them for their visits to the U.S. and their debriefings and the follow-up activities with them. We had quite a number traveling.

We had a fantastically adept FSN, Helena Michelle, who administered the IV program and relieved me of a great deal of the administrative burden and allowed me to focus more on the substantive issues of searching out and evaluating good grantees.

We had a very important academic scholarly exchange program. We had the Fulbright effort, the USIEF, the U.S.-Israel Educational Foundation. The executive director was Dan Krauskopf, who had been there for decades. It was a marvelously administered program under Dan's leadership. We had a six-person board with three Americans and three Israelis. The DCM was one of the board members. There was a professor who had come from Columbia University who was in Jerusalem at Hebrew University. And I was the third American board member. We had three Israeli counterparts. We had a vast array of scholars who made a real difference in scholarly exchange between the two countries. I'll mention that the Fulbright program there really was a significant force in academic exchanges. Every year, we would go through the roster of applications for grants for Americans to come to Israel. I remember instances of American scholars explaining that it was essential for their careers, not because they were scholars of Israeli history, but people in scientific fields, and theoretical mathematics. They would say, "It's essential that I spend time at this or that institution in Israel for the development of my own career, my institution's development, and so forth." There were good and close ties.

I suppose I could sum up my life there as CAO. Kioko and I look back on that as one of the most hectic times of our lives, one of the most intellectually stimulating assignments I had in the Foreign Service. Every evening it seemed, I was out at some event or other mixing, meeting people, either at the theater, at a performing arts event, gallery openings, whatever, out mixing and hearing, talking to intellectual/cultural leaders of Israel. It was very exciting. We used to treasure our Friday evenings, the beginning of Shabbat would be the one quiet evening of the week. After dinner, sometimes we'd go and have dinner outside the house, but more often than not, after dinner, we would then go out and sit around over coffee and fruit with personal friends and have a relaxing evening. But it seemed as if the other six evenings of the week were all business, out working. But I loved it. When I left Israel after four years there and had to come back to Washington, it was such a downer. After the intense life that we lived there, returning to the routines of Washington was such a contrast and such a disappointment.

Q: Because of the Israeli invasion of Lebanon and the subsequent activities there, was it hard to get American cultural types to come to Israel?

PETERSEN: No. I suspect now it's much more difficult.

I think it's difficult now because of the security concerns, the danger. Yes, there were people who would express concern about the danger of visiting Israel under some sponsored program. That did happen occasionally, but it doesn't stand out as anything significant. I remember much more clearly a couple of cases of Mauritians in my previous assignment who had expressed misgivings about visiting the U.S. because of the danger in the U.S., the danger of violence in our society. I remember that more than I remember the Americans expressing concern about visiting Israel. Both Kioko and I noted when we first got to Israel that in the first few weeks, we were very conscious of security issues – having bags checked when we'd go into a supermarket or a mall or things like that, the sight of the reservists on weekends going home, traveling with their weapons. You'd see kindergarten groups always accompanied by an armed guard. But after a few weeks, that became so routine that you didn't pay attention to it. But at first, I was certainly aware and took notice of it.

Q: Was there any feeling that you were getting either from the embassy or Israeli contacts about the settlement policy?

PETERSEN: The wonderful thing about Israel is that, unlike some countries where people are somewhat reticent to talk about things, in Israel, I don't recall anybody ever saying, "Oh, I don't want to discuss this or that." Not only were people willing to discuss it, they were willing to proselytize you with their view and try to win you over. From Israelis, I heard expressions of deep anguish and despair about the settlement policy in the West Bank and how it would inhibit any eventual accommodation with Arab states or with Palestinian nationhood. Then I heard others who said, "It's our land and we certainly should be entitled to live anywhere in our land." In between those two extremes, every expression you could imagine. After all these years have passed, I don't recall one or the other of those two diametrically opposed viewpoints being more predominant than the other.

Q: It seems to me the society is quite divided.

PETERSEN: Quite. In the election results of certainly the last three decades have shown that even when there was a shift in power. When I was there, there were calls for power sharing, national unity governments, which are a recognition by any political system that you have gridlock or near gridlock and that there's not going to be one side or the other gaining sway.

Q: How about visitors? Were you deluged with them?

PETERSEN: Yes. You've heard the jokes that for an American politician to have the "three I" visits: Iowa, Italy, and Israel. Yes, we had CODELs constantly. It seemed that Israel was setting a world record for CODELs. This was one of the things that made working in our embassy there as a CAO so delightful, the fact that Washington paid attention, that it cared. I use the IV program as an example. There was great interest in who traveled on that IV program not just from within the embassy or within USIA but other parts of the U.S. government where they were very interested in who some of the IV grantees were and where they would travel in the U.S. and appearances they would make and so forth. I had the opportunity as CAO to be involved in some of the CODELS, taking groups around, traveling with them. It added a great deal of spice to the work. It was important. The situation there is so nuanced and difficult to understand and appreciate. I think it was really important for members of Congress to visit, to see for themselves, and for as many Americans as possible to visit. It's one thing to look at the maps and read about the issues. It's quite another to see for yourself what the West Bank consists of, the topography of Jerusalem. It helps your understanding to stand there on the hillside and look at it and begin to grasp what it is and certainly to visit places like Gaza and elsewhere.

One of the things that really was important while I was there... I worked for two different PAOs. For the first two years, it was Maurie Wee. The last two years was for Howard Lane. Particularly under Howie, we were able to use our program, make an effort to reach out to more of the Arabs living in Israel to get them more involved in our programming, going up to Nazareth, a city preponderantly Arab, and doing more of our programming up in Nazareth, trying to reach out to Arab-Israelis, and involve them, get them involved in our programs, get them into the IV program. In the Fulbright program we looked for opportunities, sought ways to support Arab scholars. I'm not referring now to the non-Israeli Palestinians. I'm referring to the around 17-18 percent of the population of Israel that was Arab. We tried to make sure that the program was inclusive and reached out so that the same things we were communicating to the Jewish people of Israel we were trying to communicate to the Arabs of Israel and to get them involved in traveling to the U.S. in the same way and participating in programs and learning about us.

Q: Did you have any problem with the Israeli government with this particular thrust?

PETERSEN: No.

I recall another thing that was significant the last year or two I was there. Based on some research that we were able to do and get access to, we determined that the generation growing up in Israel, the generation in school, was less open to democratic ideals than the previous generation. We consulted the ministry of education about this, talked about it among ourselves, got involved with some American think tanks and others, and developed a project in USIS to try to help revise the educational curriculum by including more material on multiculturalism, on the ideas of democracy and so forth.

I don't want to give the wrong impression that the work of the CAO was all going to the theater and dabbling in music and dance. We were trying to bring about changes that were in the interest of the United States and that were for the betterment or in the interest of Israel, trying to support efforts where we had the cooperation of the Israeli government in trying to bring about some changes using soft power.

Q: You mentioned that the next generation was not as attuned to democracy. Was it just that Israel was becoming more Middle Eastern?

PETERSEN: I would approach it a different way. A few minutes ago I described it as the young generation being less open to democratic ideals. I suppose I should just say "less tolerant" of differences. What we sensed from our focus groups, polling, and other research was that the coming-of-age generation was just not as open and as tolerant, rather, they showed an inclination to be less tolerant than the preceding generation. They were drifting away perhaps from the founding ideals of Israel. I don't want to over-dramatize that, but there was a sense, a concern, and we tried to address that.

Q: The great exodus from the Soviet Union, had that taken place?

PETERSEN: No, the great exodus hadn't yet begun. During my time there, we were still hard at work lobbying, cajoling, using whatever means we could with the Soviet Union to get the release of Soviet Jews, so that they would have the opportunity to emigrate if they so wished whether to Israel or to some other country. The floodgates hadn't opened, far from it.

Q: You left in '86.

PETERSEN: Yes.

WAT T. CLUVERIUS, IV
Consul General
Jerusalem (1983-1985)

Wat T. Cluverius, IV was born in Massachusetts on December 4, 1934. He obtained a B.A. from North-Western University. He obtained an M.A. from Indiana University. He entered the Foreign Service in 1967. He served in Jeddah, Tel Aviv, and Jerusalem. He also served in Washington, DC in the Near Eastern Bureau. He retired in 1988. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on May 31, 1990.

Q: What was the situation? Could you, for the record, explain what does the Consul General do in Jerusalem? It stands by itself, it's unique.

CLUVERIUS: Yeah it stands by itself because the original UN resolution of November '47 which partitioned Palestine into a Jewish and Arab state called for the "Internationalization of Jerusalem." Then of course that partition never took place according to the UN mandate because the Jew,.; of Palestine accepted it very reluctantly but accepted it. But the Arabs didn't. They went to war against the new Israeli state. Just hours after the British left in middle of May 1948. In fact the Western world maintained its position that Jerusalem should have a special status and therefore never recognized Israeli sovereignty in West Jerusalem or Jordanian sovereignty in East Jerusalem, as it was divided from '48 to '67. And therefore the Consuls General in Jerusalem were independent. I think there are 7 in the Consular corps and they do not report through the Embassies in Tel Aviv and prior to '67 they didn't report through Amman, Jordan either.

They were independent missions of their own. And there's the British, the French, the Americans, the Belgians, I believe there's a Swedish guy but he may be Honorary, the Vatican representative there and a Greek and maybe one other. As far as the Americans go, the mandate is basically the West Bank and Jerusalem. After '67 it became the West Bank and Jerusalem. Before '67 it was just Jerusalem, both sides of Jerusalem, East and West. There was an office on both sides.

Q: You've been a real Near Eastern hand by this point, so it wasn't somebody coming up and saying--Wat we want you to do such and so--you knew what you were supposed (to do). What were sort of your instructions to yourself. What did -you put as your goal or what did you want to do while going out to Jerusalem.

CLUVERIUS: The Peace Process in a wider meaningful sense was still largely on hold, and was going to stay that way. They were still wrestling around with this vain attempt to make it a Treaty with Lebanon. And of course things were getting, by the time I was going out to Jerusalem, we'd had the explosion of the Embassy, we'd had all this nasty business with the marines, all of that. We had this nonsense of putting the battleship, New Jersey, off the coast of Lebanon lobbing 16-inch shells....

Q: 16-inch shells.

CLUVERIUS: Unbelievable stuff. You know I use to be a naval officer I know what 16 guns can do, you know. In fact my grandfather commanded 2 different battleships, the West Virginia and the Texas. I thought my job really was to talk turkey to the Palestinians so that they'd understand. I mean they're full of illusions and missed opportunities. As Abba Eban used to say--The Palestinians never missed an opportunity to miss an opportunity. A lot of truth in that. I think that's really what I wanted to do for the Palestinians. To tell them, you know, they've got to exert themselves, no one is going to do this for them. And basically they're going to have to pay some prices. That was really what it was all about.

Q: Well, tell me now, the very, important thing is that you are a self-sustained unit, at the head of a major mission in Jerusalem which had its own clients, you might say, the Israelis. Very politically sensitive. You were also in a very politically sensitive position dealing with the Palestinians. If most American politicians had their way, they would just go away. They don't want to hear from them because there ain't no Palestinian vote and there certainly is a Jewish vote. What were your relations like with the Embassy, who was the Ambassador there?

CLUVERIUS: First it was Sam Lewis for my first year I guess. Then Sam retired and it was Tom Pickering. And of course I was also the first Consul General in Jerusalem that the Israelis knew from some other life--in the negotiations and I'd served in Israel years earlier. So I had pretty good credentials. I had a lot of Israeli friends and that kind of thing. So that made it different for the Israelis. They had a harder time being nasty to the Consul General because they knew him.

Q: Usually part of the modus operandi is to portray the Consul General as anti-Semitic, unfriendly to Israel, the whole thing.

CLUVERIUS: They couldn't really do that with me, they didn't try and of course the only Israeli officials of any kind that the Consuls General were accredited to is the Mayor of Jerusalem. Which is Teddy Kollek who is a wonderful man. And I had a lot of Israeli friends. I knew Israel well, I'd served there for 3 years prior. Sam, I got along with very well. There were times when Sam probably didn't like it that I had an independent input into things. But in fact we worked it out all very well and it was the same thing with Tom Pickering. He's one of the smoothest professionals, easy professional to work with that ever was. And I hope the rumors of his elevation are true, if there's a Clinton victory. But there's some very good rumors. So that worked out pretty well. We did use my house a lot in Jerusalem because the Israeli government is in Jerusalem, so Sam Lewis was up there all the time. And the guy was tired. I use to just tell him, anytime you come to the house, someone will get you a sandwich and you can flake out on the bed or the sofa which Sam would do. He was very tired of running up and down the hill all the time. I remember we had Bud McFarlane in the living room with Fairbanks, myself, Morris Draper, all these people. Phil Habib would be through. Lots of arguing about what they were doing in Lebanon. I just said, I told McFarlane, the dumbest thing I ever heard was to put the New Jersey out there. That would not impress Hafez Al-Assad, he doesn't care. And all we did of course was rearrange some hilltops out there and some villages. But Assad wouldn't care if your targeting was perfect and you destroyed all the division of his troops. He didn't give a damn. I said, but if you wanted to impress him that you know the rules of- the game you're in, you'd clean out all those markings on one of those attack helicopters and go in and strafe the hell out of the Franjeh palace up in the hills behind Beirut. Because Franjeh is Assad's agent in Lebanon, the former President of Lebanon.

Q: Was he the Druze? He was the Maronite.

CLUVERIUS: He was one of the Maronite leaders. But he had long been a client of Assad's really. I said that would make Assad take notice, you'd be going after something he cares about. You strafe that little castle compound up there in the hills and it didn't matter if you hit anybody or not. Assad would know that you're in the same game he's in. But all this other nonsense. But there were a lot of arguments like that. So in that sense the Consul General's living room was a very good place to get messages, to sit down and have a drink, to get a sandwich. So there was a lot going on there that had nothing to do with being Consul General in Jerusalem. But it's also a marvelous job if you can stand the schizophrenia. Because you might spend lunch with a bunch of Israeli journalists and politicians, and in the evening talking over the same issues with Palestinians around your own dinner table. And you'd think you'd been on 2 different planets all day long. So you could really go to bed feeling schizophrenic.

Q: The Palestinians, it must be very difficult to get across what we're after with them. One, in a way particularly in the West Bank, they have to rely on us being the sort of the major person to maybe do something. Yet at the same time, every time they looked around we were in bed with the Israelis.

CLUVERIUS: It's hard for them. It's also they were very much in the mode of the Lebanese, the Greeks, the Cypriots and some others that everything bad that happens to them, it's somebody else's fault. They're very given to that syndrome. And if anything good is going to happen to them it'll be by someone else's efforts, not their own. Because they're not responsible. There's a lot of that syndrome there. I think it's obviously changed in recent years a bit. But then again there were a few brave souls out there. Mayor Freij, Elias Freij of Bethlehem, very outspoken. The Israelis were always trying to shut him up. The Palestinians were always trying to shut him up. But basically he was saying, almost 10 years ago, what the Palestinians now take as conventional wisdom. But in those days he was under some threat for speaking out very very candidly and honestly about what it was going to take. In other words, what kind of sacrifices are going to be necessary. And he's still in the game and he's one of the delegates on the Palestinian side. There were some others. But of course you also had the bombing of the Palestinian mayors in '81 I think.

Q: 3 or 4 had their legs blown off.

CLUVERIUS: Karim Khalaf later died of a heart attack, but Karim was quite a guy and after he had his legs mangled, not blown off, there was another one up in Neblus who had his legs blown off, he wouldn't deal with anybody. But Karim had been badly hurt and had to use two canes, his legs were badly damaged. Most of the Consulates give 2 National Day parties, one for the Israeli side of town and one for the Arab side of town. And I didn't do that. I started to just give one. Hardly anybody came from the Arab side. But the next year I talked to Karim Khalaf who was basically under house arrest down in Jericho, whether he would come. He said, "No, no, I'm too embarrassed. " I said, don't be silly, it's some Israelis who blew your legs off. You know, who blew you up. You come to the party, if anybody is going to be embarrassed it'll be the Israelis. And he didn't quite understand my thinking on that but he came. And hobbled around my garden with his two canes. Some of the Israelis present were embarrassed. Because by that time, this is now 2 years later, they had pretty well broken it and they knew it was done by Israelis. In fact it was done by Israeli fanatics who had also let one of their own Druze sappers, who was killed or badly hurt, approach the bomb. They didn't tell the guy that he was about to get blown. So there was a lot of challenge in Jerusalem. It was a very interesting place. And it's one of the nicest houses in the Foreign Service.

Q: Did you feel bugged or under threat or anything like that?

CLUVERIUS: There were times when it was pretty nasty, I think. There were times when people felt there was a threat. And certainly that was the case just after I left that job. When the Intifada started in '87, I think there was a lot of security concern.

Q: I would have thought, I mean after all, you're talking about religious emotions and you have these, I don't come from the area, but you have these Israelis who were well into the settlement process. Many who came from a very right-wing and almost fanatical religious side and here the Consul General of Jerusalem is sort of the source of saying you're being nasty people and all. I would have thought this would have made you a target of religious fanaticism.

CLUVERIUS: I thought that you're probably in more danger from Jewish terrorists than an Arab one in that job. One, they're harder for the authorities to detect. And they are armed. The Israelis have had a hard time breaking into their own fanatical groups. They're very tight knit and all of that. So, yeah, I think it's probably a more serious danger.

Q: Today after a long pause this is the 25th of March 1994. Let's talk about, as we mentioned in this last tape, reporting. Obviously the human rights reports but there are other reports. Could you talk about what you were after, how you went about it and how these reports, your concerns, how they played at our Embassy in Tel Aviv, how they played back in Washington?

CLUVERIUS: Well you have to remember that Jerusalem is an independent post. So you didn't have to send things through the Embassy in Tel Aviv. But of course you were often reporting on the same trends or singular events that the Embassy in Tel Aviv might be reporting one perspective and you might be reporting as a different kind of event. Because the Embassy in Tel Aviv was going to have their own interpretation but also the Israeli interpretation. And the Consulate General in Jerusalem might have its own interpretation and of course a Palestinian interpretation. So it could be difficult I should think if you didn't work closely with the Embassy. And we tended to do that, And there really wasn't that much occasion for conflict and conflicting views. Because in fact the turf is reasonably, recognizably separate. There is an awkwardness in a sense that the Embassy, traditionally since the '67 war, covered the Gaza Strip. Which of course is Palestinian in its political life and it's Palestinian in most of its human life. Although there are some native Gazans, maybe 100-150,000 out of 850,000. That was a little awkwardness because one, the Gazans didn't really like that the US Embassy in Tel Aviv was their American contact so to speak. They preferred to deal with the Consulate in Jerusalem, for example, to get visas. They didn't want to show that they had visas issued in the US Embassy in Tel Aviv, they were much happier to show that they had visas issued in the American Consulate General in Jerusalem. When they went across the bridges to Jordan and elsewhere in the Arab world that was a less problematic point of issue for a visa than Tel Aviv. But in fact of course what we were trying to do in Jerusalem, we were trying to report on what was happening in the West Bank in Jerusalem itself. Because in fact, this has always been a problem, I think, that in fact you were suppose to have, Jerusalem is suppose to be your turf, Jerusalem and the West Bank. But in fact of course the seat of the Israeli government is in Jerusalem and that's the Embassy's turf. So there was a certain amount of schizophrenia in that situation. The Consulate General is not accredited to any government except perhaps to the Mayor of Jerusalem. Teddy Kollek was my principal Israeli point of reference, he was a pleasant man and a joy to work with. And I'm sorry he's not still the Mayor but of course it's a bit frustrating because you're dealing with the Palestinians who are intensely concerned with what the US is doing and thinking. Some of that syndrome that, well example Tom Friedman described in his book From Beirut to Jerusalem, about the Lebanese, that they really thought that some morning the Americans would wake up and make a new president of Lebanon. You know, this kind of omnipotence kind of feeling they had. So they were constantly taking our calls and we were constantly taking theirs. It's a bit incestuous but you had some very interesting characters to work with. Elias Freij the Mayor of Bethlehem is an extremely fine man. And of course was a prophet not honored in his own country because he had been preaching for 15 years what the Palestinians should be doing vis-à-vis the Israelis. And of course now they're doing it, which is talking directly. So Freij was very interesting. Natche the mayor of Hebron whom the Israelis deposed but in fact most of us considered him the legitimate political leader in Hebron. Natche is a very, very astute political animal. Then there's the crowds in Nablus--The Kanaan clan and the Musris. So there was a hierarchy, not a hierarchy, there's a political establishment which is now mostly gone. These people are much less influential now than they were then.

Q: We're talking about the mid-80's. You were going, I mean these were some of your principal points of contact for political reporting. Just a little how-to which I think is interesting. What would you do, go down and chat with them, sort of have an agenda? What would you do?

CLUVERIUS: Well there were 2 things you wanted to do. One of course was to keep your finger on the pulse of day-to-day events. And of course there were frequently day-to-day events. And I think it was the week that I arrived as Consul General in '83, which was after the 4th of July party.

Q: You mentioned that the last time.

CLUVERIUS: There was the shooting at the Islamic University in Hebron.

Q: What was that?

CLUVERIUS: Some Israeli settlers went out and shot up the student union or something like that and there were people killed. And it was some crazy guys from Kiryat Arba or wherever they were from, I'm trying to remember. But the interesting thing was my USIS guy, the Cultural Affairs kind of guy in the Consulate, was in the office of the President of the University when this shooting started. He grabbed the phone off the President's desk and called me. And you could hear the shooting in the background and he was lying on the floor. It went on for some time. So there were those kinds of dramatic events. But of course you were always trying to keep up with which Palestinian groups were influential where. There was always the disputes amongst the Palestinians of the West Bank themselves. Along what you might call the traditional fault lines in the society. The Hebronites didn't trust the people from Nablus, certain clans didn't trust other clans. There's also the town and the village disputes. At that time also the Israelis were pushing something called the village leagues. Which was trying to create basically a collaborative group of Palestinians. That didn't work. Its probably long forgotten but it did create a lot of tension among the Palestinians. There was a guy named Dhudin, whom I think was from the southern part of the West Bank. And they tried to set him up as the leader of the village leagues, which would be those Palestinians who were willing to cooperate with the Israelis. Not in the sense that Elias Freij of Bethlehem was talking about, which is the kind of thing that's going on now. It was basically collaboration for the village leagues. So you're trying to keep track of all these trends and all the fault lines. To what ultimate purpose other than to have the knowledge of what was going on and who was doing what to whom. At that time there wasn't a hell of a lot of ultimate purpose. But it was always felt that whatever was going on in the broader peace process, you really had to know what the Palestinians were thinking and what they were feeding to the Jordanians, what they were feeding to the PLO leadership in Tunis. Which of course at that time was only a year or two after having been thrown out of Lebanon. And Arafat was becoming increasingly irrelevant, to the joy of the Israelis, until he was rescued as a political animal really by the Intifada which broke out in '87. The uprising in the fall of '87. Which still goes on in some way. So you're always trying to know what these folk were up to. Now some of the means you used, one of the things you had to be careful of was that the Palestinians had the smarts of the survivors. And very carefully they tell the Israelis one thing, they tell the Americans another, they tell the British another, the Jordanians something else and the PLO in Tunis probably got a different story. And this wasn't malicious dissembling, this is what survivors do. Also try to find some advantage in the fault lines of the world around them. Just like we were trying to understand the fault lines in their political culture. But that was always kind of fun. And of course then an Israeli election came along. You would have the various Israeli parties dabbling in the Palestinian political scene. Trying to find people they could work with, trying to find people who could carry accurate messages to the Jordanians, to the PLO or whatever. Some of the means we used were pretty straightforward. Traditional political reporting means you go out and have coffee with the guy and we all knew each other quite well because it's not all that big a piece of turf. It wasn't hard to have a meeting at 10:00 and have coffee in Hebron and then be back in East Jerusalem for lunch and go to a dinner party in Nablus. We also had a political officer, Tom Dodling, who was a very clever fellow. He had very good Arabic and spent a lot of time in the old city. He met a guy who reads coffee grounds and there are certain events, kinds of groups that meet and they'll have somebody in to read the coffee grounds. Not that anybody believes it but it's kind of traditional. Kind of traditional stuff. But what was interesting was that very often the meetings amongst the notables of the West Bank in which they would have this traditional event take place were meetings in which we'd be very interested to know what was going on. We'd find out from the "coffee grounder." They often did this for example when they received some important Israeli official, particularly a Labor Party official or something like that.

Q: Did you ever, for example, and this could probably work both ways, in perspective, see a report that would come out of our Embassy in Tel Aviv and say--Gee, that's really presenting one point of view, in a way fair enough? In other words, frame some of your reporting to show the other side of the moon on this. In order to give a balanced view?

CLUVERIUS: Absolutely. But usually you would, if your relations were good, and I think ours were when I was in Jerusalem, they usually are between the Embassy and Jerusalem. You'd usually know in advance that someone was working on a matter that would kind of illuminate this subject from the Israeli perspective. And it would be useful if Jerusalem would do a counter-piece that would illuminate it. So that it'd often be done cooperatively. Now on fast breaking stories, you might have to do it by phone very quickly. You know the Embassy might call and say we're going to do this. Or I might call and say, Look this is what the papers are saying, it ain't right from what I'm getting. You know what the press are saying and all of that. There's something else back here that's going on. And here's how I'm going to play it. Occasionally you might be in conflict with what the Embassy is reporting but very rarely.

Q: I would think that on your reports, a report that would be eagerly awaited, or maybe not eagerly awaited, but expected would be on the human rights side. Essentially we have an Israeli at this time, an Israeli occupying force in a land that doesn't want it. And the Israelis are not sweet, kind, considerate and gentle people particularly when they feel that their national security is at stake. Can you talk about what you would do, how you went about it and the problems therein?

CLUVERIUS: You do pretty straight reporting jobs. The Israelis were saying as they did and even for a number of years they published an annual report published by what was called a Civil Administration which means the military occupation government, basically. To say how wonderful it all was and what a benign occupation it was and all the things we've done for the local folk in the past year. It was pretty kind of outrageous PR stuff. But we would take it and my staff would tear that thing apart in a report to Washington. And say this is BS, and back it up. The annual Human Rights Report is a big problem because human rights is not a black and white subject. One man's violation is another man's benign mistake. And the way we did it was to call a spade a spade and the politicking would take place in Washington between the bureau, NEA, and the Human Rights Bureau. And depending on who was running, which political animals, which political appointees were in the Human Rights bureau, you'd have a hard time or an easy time getting the facts published as we saw them in the field. There was a lot of negotiation over language, you know lots of negotiations over adjectives and stuff like that. You know, it's a painful process.

Q: Elliott Abrams was not the Human Rights person when you were there, was he?

CLUVERIUS: No, I think he was an IO person at the time. There were some other political appointees, frankly whose names I can't remember and don't want to remember. They could be pretty tough. There was a negotiation in Washington one year I recall, it was really trading off language. The people in the Human Rights thing were pretty protective of the Israelis, but they wanted to land with both feet on the Syrians. So you had some tradeoffs. I mean you can't use those terrible adjectives about the Syrians unless you let us use reasonably descriptive adjectives about the Israelis.

Q: Just to give an idea to move one layer down, what were some of the problems that you were reporting on with the Israelis in dealing with the people there in the West Bank?

CLUVERIUS: You mean on the ground problems. Well you had continued land expropriations. I remember we did lengthy reporting on the Israel claim that this is all state land. And therefore the state can exercise eminent domain etc., etc. And we did some very extensive historical reporting. Because in fact there had been, just before the '67 war, the Jordanian government was going through the West Bank, north to south, modernizing the records and things which traditionally are held by the Mukhtar of the village, some of it is almost verbal. Because everybody knows that Muhammad's land extends from this rock to that tree and over to this. And in fact the Jordanians had only designated about 17% of what they had covered as state land; they had not reached south of Jerusalem. Only about 17% of it was designated state land which meant roadways, rights of way, things like that. Whereas the Israelis were claiming huge percentages of state land. And made the argument that as an occupier you can't change the status. But of course there were some very complicated Ottoman rules of squatters rights and kind of thing--how many years has this land been tilled by this family before ownership passes. And all kinds of things. But we would tear into those subjects to illuminate the facts.

Q: Had the Israelis confiscated? I heard in stories that taking the records and putting them somewhere meant they had control over, they could call the shots because people didn't have the original records.

CLUVERIUS: Sure and very often they got some of it by bribery by Mukhtars who did hold the records of the whole village. And if he turned those records over to the Israeli authorities then they knew who owned what and they could make the records disappear or whatever. There were a lot of very sophisticated shenanigans going on about land. And of course the Palestinians were almost always the losers on that. So it was very difficult. And if Palestinians could prove a claim that land had been taken, at any time in the recent historical past, then they had to go through the Israeli legal system. Which occasionally gave some justice in that, but not often.

Q: What about, was Israeli settlements going on at that time?

CLUVERIUS: Oh sure.

Q: Could you talk about that and how you were viewing, reporting your impression?

CLUVERIUS: You were getting that and you getting this tide from the Likud government, you know they really put a lot of investment out there. Lots of people moved out there for purely economic reasons. Some land would be expropriated for a settlement by the government and the military would fence it, the Jewish National fund would pay for the bulldozers and the infrastructure, the housing was subsidized, the water and electricity rates were lower than Israel proper. So a guy could get 3 times as much house for the same money. But then again you also had the ideological characters and people forget, perhaps, but for the most part the settlers in North Sinai who as you recall had to be moved out as part of the treaty with Egypt, most of those real settlers took compensation from the Israeli government for about 300,000 some dollars per family and left. It was the hard line ideological settler,, who had then moved from the West Bank, particularly from Hebron's Kiryat Arba, moved into those settlements. Those are the ones you saw on TV in the Spring of '82. They had to bring them out, water cannons, they were threatening suicide. Those were not for the most part the settlers who had lived there the previous decade. They had already been bought out. These were the hard-line guys, the ideologues. Who moved down from the West Bank into the settlements, in the Yammit area. That was a full swing in the early 80's. It really got going after the Likud came to power in '77. So there were settlements going and there were increasing numbers of these very vocal folk. And you were getting these very vocal folk from Brooklyn who were bringing in a lot of money. And in traditional American social and political activism they were really rocking the local boats. They were always trying to get me into a settlement. Claiming that they were on the West Bank and the Consulate General had to provide services to Americans in the West Bank and why wouldn't I show up at the settlements. I would send my vice-consul out there and sure enough there they had a TV camera crew it was a setup to get recognition for the settlement. You know, it's a silly game but that's part of things.

Q: But then you had to watch it.

CLUVERIUS: At the same time it was a legitimate claim to the services. So I just sent the most junior vice-consul out there, renew passports or whatever needed doing.

Q: The settlers, were they, the ones from America? Were they keeping their American passports tucked in the back pants pocket or not?

CLUVERIUS: For the most part yes, you had Levinger, who was one of the founders of the settlements in Hebron. His wife had been an American but gave up her citizenship. While I was Consul General we served Meir Kahane with his loss of citizenship papers. Which I think ultimately was overturned at the court anyway. Because, the way the law is written, it's almost impossible to deny anyone citizenship anymore. You have to prove intent. And as any lawyer will tell you, intent is almost impossible to prove. But it was kind of fun to send the notification of loss of citizenship over to Kahane's house.

Q: He was the head of the Jewish Defense League. What was your impression of the settlers? Were there constant confrontations with the Palestinians?

CLUVERIUS: There were some. And it was growing because their numbers and their aggressiveness in the streets were growing- People were looking for a little bit of trouble I think. Of course Levinger had served 5 months for killing a guy in the streets of Hebron, a Palestinian. And you had more and more of that. And of course it was that summer, I think '83 or '84, but in '81 there were attempts on the lives of 3 or 4 prominent Palestinian mayors done by some underground Jewish group. And they finally broke into it and arrested these folk, I think it may have been '84 or '85 when they broke the case. But it took them maybe 3 or 4 years. In the Spring of '84, a group, thank God, was caught preparing to blow up the Dome of the Rock mosque on the temple mount. And they were caught fortuitously because the Muslim mosque guards are not armed, It was a rainy, cold spring night and they heard the noise and saw these guys coming up the ladders with satchels of grenades and explosives and all of this. But nearby was an Israeli unit that would not normally have been there. They were preparing to do a sweep of the temple mount the next morning because I think it was the German Chancellor who was visiting. So it was just fortuitous that these guys were caught. But so, yes, all of this was happening, you had the Gush Emunim which were shall we say ideologically motivated but not to the violent extremes of the Kahena movements. These guys were dangerous and the Israelis were very nervous about it. But they had a very hard time penetrating these groups and I think they still do. Because, one, they didn't take them seriously enough to begin with and, two, it's all done by face-to-face contact. It's hard to infiltrate small dedicated movements where everybody is known to everybody else.

Q: You were mentioning the shooting at the University. What happened there?

CLUVERIUS: That was the summer of '83.

Q: How did the Israelis respond to the shooting? What happened to the people who did the shooting?

CLUVERIUS: I'm trying to remember, I cannot. You'll have to look in the newspapers, I think. Whether they caught anybody for that, or not, I just don't recall on that particular event.

Q: It strikes me. You say that Levinger killed somebody in the street and he got 5 months?

CLUVERIUS: Something like that. A reduced sentence for manslaughter or something.

Q: I would think that at a certain point it would be very difficult for an American who is not ideologically in any camp, the Palestinian camp, the Israeli camp, the American-Jewish camp or something. To be sitting there watching a group of settlers, we're talking about these Israeli settlers who are coming in armed, who seem to be treated very leniently. Who are able to use armed force and all against the Palestinians. Because every time something happens, it's still going on even today, it always seems that if anything happens in Israel, it ends up a bunch of Palestinians including women and children getting killed. I would think that if the Jews are caught who have done this, I mean they get 5 months or something. I would think that this would buildup a feeling of outrage after a while. It would be very difficult.

CLUVERIUS: It was rather disgusting as these guys would get caught on the Israeli side, the Jewish side. And even if they got a pretty stiff sentence they would get a presidential pardon down the road somewhere. And of course some of them were American citizens who would go on trial. We would have a Vice-Consul go attend the trial. And of course it was like a circus and these guys showing open contempt for the court and taking their sentences as a badge of honor. And then being treated basically as good boys gone wrong and first they would get weekends off to spend with their family and then they'd get a presidential pardon. While for exactly the same offense a Palestinian might be doing 18 years. Now in the wake of this Hebron massacre thing, it comes out--Oh my God, there's been 2 laws. I mean that's just the funniest thing you've ever seen. Of course there's been 2 laws and 2 applications of the same law or whatever you want to call it. Obviously people were treated differently under different circumstances.

Q: Could you explain, we're talking in 1994, could you just explain for the record what the Hebron massacre was?

CLUVERIUS: The most recent one? Harold Goldstein one of the very ideologically motivated settlers probably part of the Kach movement, going into the mosque in Hebron which is a divided building, because it's the also the tomb of the patriarchs and it's very important, to the Jews and the Christians as well. And just during Ramadan on a Friday shooting up 7 clips of ammunition from a Galil assault rifle and killing dozens, 30 people or more, and 60 or 70 wounded. Before the crowd managed to kill him. And that has put a spotlight on both the militant settlers and the Israeli attitude and treatment of Palestinians vis-à-vis their attitudes and treatments towards the Jews.

Q: I assume that you were reporting it and others were reporting it, there have been 2 laws and 2 ways of looking at it. It took something like this in 1994 for it to at least reach the headline.

CLUVERIUS: I think some of it came out during those first months of the Intifada which broke out in about December '87. In the first 3 or 4 months you had enormous amount of TV time and headline time devoted to what was happening. Which was basically the young people of the streets in Gaza and the West Bank taking on the Israelis with stones. So there was a lot of dramatic stuff there. We're going to break their bones kinds of things from Rabin who was Defense Minister and there was some extremely damaging footage for Israel's image. You know, heavily armed soldiers beating the bejesus out of some 15 year old. So this isn't the first time, this most recent event. It tends to be cyclical. It comes and goes and its all over the papers and CNN and then nothing happens. It goes back to being a fact which is no longer a public fact. And there's lot of facts out there that aren't public facts.

Q: Did all of this have an effect not only on you but on 'your officers that you have to work, on it? It's a difficult thing to be in the country, of what is considered to be a very close friend of the United States where you feel that, you know, tremendous injustice is being done or being misreported. I mean how did this affect you?

CLUVERIUS: I think it affects you. It's saddening, and occasionally it's maddening that on some occasions it's very difficult to get the attention. And of course at that time between the Likud and the Reagan administration there was a close ideological match, so to speak, which I think was nonsense. But it was played up very simplistically in conservative circles here. Which was--Oh, the Israelis now have a conservative government so they must be ideologically closer to us than that Labor Party bunch they've had for years. Which was nonsense. But the Israelis were smart and they played it up to their advantage as they played up the relationship with the religious fundamentalists in this country. They got a lot of support there.

Q: We're talking about the religious fundamentalists, the religious right of the Christians, the Baptists and other groups of this nature.

CLUVERIUS: Yeah, there was certainly an alliance there of that kind. I think it was rather nonsense. Then of course you had the other propaganda line or whatever it was called, the strategic asset. That Israel was a strategic asset in the Middle East of the United States. And that was played up by a lot of Israeli politicians. And was welcomed in the Reagan administration, I think. That this was a strategic asset. That made a lot of Israelis very nervous because a lot of them were thoughtful Israelis, shall we say, who understood that the real relationship between the United States and Israel is founded on something more profound than "strategic assets", which can be a passing phenomenon.

Q: How did you deal with Junior Officers? By the time you reach the rank you had you take a more world weary point of view. You understand political realities and all of this but Junior Officers come in with piss in vinegar and they are learning it's a pretty awful world out there, no matter where you are. And they take causes much more to heart than we do. Maybe they're right. But anyway, you must have had a problem, not a problem, but it was a challenge to you with your Junior Officers.

CLUVERIUS: Not really so much a challenge. If there had been a great deal of, shall we say naive idealism, amongst young folk. I think it disappeared after a while. These Junior Officers I was dealing with anyway, had their own cynical experiences and views. You know, the Vietnam thing and all of that. They already knew about a world in which all of justice is not done. Even when many people are screaming out that the emperor has no clothes, the emperor may still continue on. So I didn't see that as a problem. As a general sense what you would occasionally get was a member of the staff would get totally outraged at something that was going on. Some specific kind of injustice or wrong being done. And really want to make a huge issue out of it. You might have to sit down and say--Look, this one, you're right, but I don't see the backing for it, politically, to fix it. And that might occasionally entail a serious discussion with the Embassy in Tel Aviv. Saying that you guys have more clout and this one really is a outrageous. Such as a denial of consular access to an American citizen or something like that. Cause we did have American-Palestinians out there as well as Jewish settlers from Brooklyn. Events of specific outrage, yeah. And yes, perhaps the younger people would feel that more keenly than those of us who had seen more of it.

Q: Let's say you get a case where a Palestinian-American, the Israeli won't let you have access. This is always the great cause in consular business. This is where you really get on your high horse and wave the flag. Did you have to get the Embassy support?

CLUVERIUS: Well, the Consulate couldn't deal directly with the government of Israel, we could deal with other kinds of authorities out there. But then you don't have a problem because the Ambassador would jump on them and the Embassy would jump on them and say, "Get off, this is unacceptable." And it usually got fixed pretty quickly.

Q: What was your impression of the Israeli army? I'm asking this because the image of the Israeli army in the United States, maybe it's diminished somewhat. But that this is a very well oiled-machine, very efficient, knows what it's doing and yet when you look at it closely you have the feeling that here are the soldiers who are quite willing to fire. Almost as though they're treating the Palestinians like a subspecies or something like that. Did you have any feel for this looking at it on the ground?

CLUVERIUS: I think there's been a trend in the Israeli military that immediately after they took these territories in the '67 war under Moshe Dayan's both practical and philosophical direction, they put very good people out there. Some of their best Lieutenant-Colonels and Brigadiers who would be in charge, who understood that they were going to have to rule these people for a while. They wanted to do so in a way that would not ultimately damage the possibilities of making peace with them. They were very careful about confiscations, the settlement issue didn't start in full swing at that time. There was pretty good quality out there. And there was also close direction from the top. There was in the Labor Party in the late '60's quite a dispute, a philosophical dispute. Whether they should increase the number of work permits in Israel for the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza. That this might be socially damaging to Israel. To have these people come and be the drawers of water and the hewers of wood. That argument was basically won by the pragmatists led by Dayan. He said, I don't care about your philosophical argument. I've got these people in Gaza, they have to work. Otherwise, we're going to have a hell of a mess. So the pragmatists won that one. And of course by the time of the Intifada in late '87, you had about 100,000 Arabs a day working in Israel. Gradually when the Likud government came into power, a decade after the '67 war, in '77, they had quite a different view since they had no intention of ever giving up that land. So you're going to deal with the people quite differently. And they increased the settlement budget. Even though ultimately as Abba Eban called it, it was a failed enterprise; the settlement effort, but nevertheless it was a different attitude. And there was also a different attitude within the military. Gradually there had been, you know people don't like to go places where the job isn't career enhancing. And after the first 6 or 7 years, I don't think West Bank, Gaza assignments were career enhancing at all. And they were at first. The military government in Gaza in the late '60's, right after '67, was Mota Gur, who is now the Deputy Defense Minister, and he was very good at it as I recall. Because I covered Gaza from the Embassy then. But gradually the quality went down. The attitude toward the folk hardened or became less-sensitive, however you want to call it. Plus, you had the ideological drive of a right-wing government that really had no intention of doing anything except arranging things so that it would be impossible to give up those territories. Which they didn't succeed in doing. But they made a hell of a lot of trouble in between. You began to get little snippets of things in the newspapers. That so-and-so had been arrested for his activities while he was the junior military governor in Jenin, or one of the smaller towns. You know, the occupation began to corrupt. On the basis of the old saying, when you have absolute power it's corrupting and they had absolute power. And there began to be more and more tales of bribery by the Palestinians and of course this was terribly cancer like for the Israeli military. When a Palestinian bribed some captain or major in order to get his zoning permission to add a room to his house, he got his house and also had committed a nationalist act of which he could be proud. But of course the Israeli was corrupted. And you also got some Israelis increasingly, with very little publicity, refusing to serve in the territories. Very often this was handled as just: Okay, next time you come on reserve duty, we'll send you to the Negev or something. But on some occasions people were punished for refusing to go, didn't want to serve in the West Bank, did not want to go out there and break heads. So all of this occupation really was corrupting and it certainly did affect the army. It affected their morale, it affected their attitude towards these people. Because, after all, these people out in the streets throwing stones at them were about the same age. They're teenagers. And for awhile of course the really nasty work wasn't done by the army anyway. It was done by the border guards. So the army is kind of there as the background as the ultimate source of power and authority but didn't have to do much. Until the Intifada started in '87, the border guards did most of the dirty work.

Q: Were the border guards a different breed at that?

CLUVERIUS: Yes, the border guards are often, they had a lot of Druze. You see, the Druze do serve in the Israeli army. The Israeli-Arabs do not, but the Druze do. There are Druze and they're tough and they don't like the Arabs very much. They're pretty tough and they are different units. They're not regular army units, they're border guards and they are the ones that chase the infiltrators in the Jordan Valley on those rare occasions when they come across and things like that. They're the trackers and they do indeed guard the border in a military sense but with a kind of police function. But they're the ones that they used if there were some trouble in the refugee camp. They were the ones who'd go charging in there, break a few heads and see what was going on. But once it became very wide-spread, this kind of uprising, then the army had to get into it, including reservists. Because the border guards were not that large an organization so the army had to get into it. Some of them didn't like it.

Q: Well is there anything else we should cover? On Jerusalem, you think?

CLUVERIUS: I don't think so.

Q: On this thing, by the way when you get the draft, you can add or expand anyway you want.

CLUVERIUS: Of course some of that has been used though.

Q: So let's move on. Back there in 1985, what did you do?

CLUVERIUS: In the summer of '85 there was of course, following the expulsion, you know, of the Israeli invasion of Lebanon in June '82, and of course the completion of the Egyptian-Israeli Treaty was the end of April '82. And then there was the commitment to the Egyptians, to the other Arabs, that we would then make a big push to implement the other half of Camp David. Which was the West Bank thing. And of course the Likud government had no intention of giving anymore. But it was felt then, of course the Israelis invaded Lebanon, and that delayed the whole thing, the Fall of '82. Alexander Haig was fired or quit, whatever. George Shultz took over feeling he had to make a real push on this Lebanon thing. I think there was a debate, a conflict so to speak, in the Fall of '82. Remember there was a Reagan Initiative that September 1st of '82 which Ned Walker, Bill Kirby and I wrote. Charlie Hill, who put the finishing touches on it as the wordsmith. And then we were going to push forward with the Middle East process. At that point there was a real policy disagreement, basically. On the one hand there were those who said: Fine, we'll push the Lebanon angle. and bring Lebanon to be the second country to have peace with Israel. But I was not in that group. I was in another group which were the losers, basically, that said: Forget Lebanon, push the main peace process elements of the Reagan Initiative and let Lebanon come along, wagging its tail behind it. Don't make Lebanon the center piece. One, they can't make the Treaty, there's no government there, they can't make the Treaty, Syria won't let them. But this line lost really. It was the Lebanon push: Get the PLO out, make a deal, And it's described best I think in Tom Friedman's book. But it was a policy difference. I think the late Phil Habib didn't so us a service there. Phil had such prestige in this town. If he said he could bring the Syrians and the Lebanese towards a Lebanon-Israel Treaty, people tended to believe him. Why not. I mean Phil had enormous prestige, a wonderful man. But he didn't really come to the Middle East until he had been Under Secretary of Political Affairs. And he really thought he could deliver. He was also personally angry at the Israelis and the Syrians because he had worked the deal in '81. So anyway, by the time '83 came around I had been back in Washington since '78.

Q: Well '85.

CLUVERIUS: Yeah. But that was the background to Shultz's push to try to get a Peace Process going. Dick Murphy was Assistant Secretary, Dick was spending an awful lot of time on this and it wasn't going very well. Because we couldn't talk to the PLO and you couldn't do all these other things. And of course George Shultz had much bigger fish to fry vis-à-vis the Soviets and other major issues. But he thought Murphy was spending too much time on this. So they asked me if I would leave the job in Jerusalem early, because it was a 3 year assignment and I'd been there just a little over 2, and stay in the area and become the roving Peace Process guy. And with some doubts about it, I said sure I'd do it, because when the boss says you do it, you're a pro, you do it. But I made a deal I had to stay in Israel as a base, I had to talk to the Jordanians and some other people because my daughter was in high school in Israel, in the American school in Tel Aviv. And I didn't want to leave there and I also didn't want to leave the house in Jerusalem until January of '86. But actually I started this roving business based in Israel in the Fall of '85, that Labor Day weekend. I was back here in Washington, King Hussein of Jordan was here, that was when we first tried to get something going. That was basically what I did until the summer of '88. You know the Intifada started and we had various initiatives some of which were secret at the time and now are not. It was basically trying to see if there was any way to get the Peace Process going. It was very difficult of course because you had a Likud government. Then Shamir became Prime Minister, Arens is Defense Minister, these are people who either voted against or abstained on the Treaty of Peace with Egypt. You know they had not a lot of interest in this. Shultz I think gave it his very conscientious good shot but he didn't like the Middle East issues. He thought people were extremely tricky to deal with. I thought a lot of them were dishonest and lied to him on one occasion or another. It didn't have all the nice cleanness of going to an ASEAN meeting in Singapore where the issues are economic and the people are knowledgeable and straight forward. Middle East was a mess. And at the same time he had to deal with the Conservatives back here, people who never thought he was on the "Reagan team" and there was all this sniping. And of course his big issue in life as the Secretary of State had to be relations with the Soviets. Where I think he did win. I found that part of his own book very interesting. So I knew I was working for a guy who's conscience was in trying to make something happen in the Middle East but his political judgment probably was that it wasn't really do-able but you've got to keep trying. And of course then I was the guy who had to run around and keep trying. And it was a little frustrating.

Q: Let's talk a bit about, I suppose maybe try this country by country, I mean maybe that might be the easiest way to do this. What would you do in Egypt? They were already in the Peace Process, did they have a role in a way?

CLUVERIUS: They had a role in a big way. They were trying to bring the PLO into the orbit of respectability, shall we say, by trying to push the PLO to meet the American conditions for dialogue. They were also trying to get the Americans to manipulate those conditions so they'd be easier to meet. And of course all of this finally did happen in the Fall of '88. And the Egyptians worked very hard in the Peace Process. Not only out of conscience, which I think is genuine, but also out of a desire not to be so goddamn isolated in the Arab world. Even though the Arab League headquarters had been taken out of Cairo and there was no money flowing through from the Gulf Banks and the Gulf fees and all of this. So they had a pragmatic, and political and diplomatic and moral reason to push the Peace Process. To work with the Jordanians and all of this. And of course we had that strange Israeli government that came along in the elections of '84. The rotational government that Peres would serve as Prime Minister for 2 years and then Shamir would be Prime Minister for 2 years. And meanwhile Rabin would remain as Defense Minister throughout. And that was very strange. And as that came to an end, Rabin and Peres worked very hard trying to get something going. The problem was that on the Arab side, my sense of it was, the Jordanians and the Palestinians didn't think that Peres could deliver. They were a little nervous about him, some Israelis, that he's a little flaky. I don't personally think that's true. I happen to be an admirer of Shimon's. It's just that the pieces weren't there. And Shultz would come out and we would run around and then he would go away and I would run around and try to make something work. As it came closer to Peres having to give up the Premiership of his government, which was really a national-unity government, which was a national paralysis government actually, but when he had to give up the Premier-ship of course he would lose a lot of the levers available to him that he was trying to pull to get something going in the Peace Process. I think the Americans, including me, I suppose, and George Shultz certainly, we thought we had to get something going so that Peres can put something in place that the other guy can't tear down. And we got a little frantic about it, trying to get something going and yet refusing to agree to what the Arab side said they had to have. And this is where I did have problems with George Shultz and his immediate staff. He said no international conference because the Israelis didn't want it. But in fact the only way you were going to get these folks under one roof was under the label of an international conference which had the UN flag, at least, standing in the corner. Because the Israelis didn't want it, Shultz wouldn't push for it and I kept writing messages that there is no way forward except through an international conference. And I would get phone calls saying what are you smoking out there'? The Secretary doesn't want one. And I would say, I don't care, I'm supposed to tell him what I think would work and what I think won't work. But Shultz was always very nice about that but in fact that was what was needed. Shultz would keep concentrating on what can we do to help Peres. A public meeting between Peres and the King of Jordan. The King wasn't having any part of it. He kept saying: Look I told you, I'll meet Peres or whoever under the UN flag in an international conference. Which of course is what eventually happened in Madrid in '91 but that could have happened in '86 or '87, but it didn't.

Q: What was the opposition about for the international meeting in Israel and why were we buying into this? I mean why were the Israelis opposed to having an international meeting and why did we?

CLUVERIUS: Because the Israelis always want direct discussions. They thought the international conference would dilute that, it would dilute the value to them of dealing directly with their neighbors and their enemies. On the other hand, it would provide a forum in which they could be ganged up on by the world community . In fact that was BS most of it. In fact they didn't want a conference, because they didn't want to talk about these issues. The Likud didn't want to talk about these issues. The status quo with them in control of the occupied territories was far more appealing to them then any possible alternative to the status quo.

Q: So the key player didn't want to play?

CLUVERIUS: And there were endless excuses why they didn't want to play this game or that game and you could reshuffle the deck but in fact he didn't want to play cards. So the constant effort to find a card that might appeal to him was doomed from the outset, basically. Because he'd always have a reason for saying: No, no I can't do that because; Oh I'm still interested in the Peace Process but I can't do this, I can't do this, I can't do anything. So it was frustrating. But it's also a useful part of diplomacy. With something as sensitive and important as that, you have to keep trying. And even though you may have a private judgment that it isn't going to go anywhere, you have to keep it alive.

Q: You keep it alive, I mean the basic thing that sort of sustained you, would it be I, obviously you're doing your job. But the other one did you have the feeling that, okay, the players that are in place right now, I mean the Likud and all, things change. I mean you never know what's going to happen. And you've got to keep the apparatus alive because who knows what's going to happen.

CLUVERIUS: That's right and also I think it was worth doing. It was worth doing for the United States, it was worth doing on, shall we say, humanitarian and ethical grounds to end that miserable conflict. And things do change. You had rising stars in the Likud who had quite a different view in some of these things. Like David Levy who once he became Foreign Minister did play a subtly different role. So people do change, Begin disappeared from the scene, along comes Shamir. People do change. And you also have to know it as a professional in diplomacy. Sometimes going through the motions is necessary even though you know that you're probably not going to get anywhere on this particular round of going through the motions. You might have to do it a year or two in order to refine the issues, keep things alive, clear a little underbrush but no breakthrough is to the cards. But you still have to keep the ground reasonably well tilled until something new can spring up.

Q: How would you till the ground? I mean what would you do personally?

CLUVERIUS: Well there were a couple of occasions when we were making a real effort through the Jordanians or the Egyptians to having the PLO meet our conditions. And so it was, under law, that I couldn't meet directly with the PLO. You'd have to work through various intermediaries such as the government of Jordan. And so you would try that for an intensive 2 or 3 week period until you realized that wasn't going to happen. Because also Arafat was in a very weak position following the expulsion of the PLO from Beirut in '82. He was searching for a role and while someone is searching for a role he's not in a position to make great concessions. Because he probably couldn't deliver on them anyway. But you nevertheless kept pushing along.

Q: Who would you meet with say in Jordan or in Egypt?

CLUVERIUS: In Jordan usually with the Prime Minister who was then Zaid Rifai, occasionally with the King. The King in conference with the Foreign Minister and these guys. In Egypt usually with the Foreign Minister, Ismat Abdul Majid was the Foreign Minister through that period. And occasionally we do a stop in Damascus to keep the Syrians at least informed of what we were doing. Not that they agreed with any of it. And I'd have to go down to the Gulf to see the Saudi Foreign Minister occasionally, just to make sure they understood where we were coming from, what we were trying to do. Again you keep the ground tilled because something of interest might spring up even though you're not really expecting it.

Q: Did you have any problems with Congress? Would they get into the act at all, the staff or the members of Congress, about what you were trying to do?

CLUVERIUS: No. The tendency is to get involved when things are very high visibility. This was a period of very low visibility, And I think as far as that Administration went, '86 would have been the end of it.

Q: That was the end of Peres.

CLUVERIUS: Yeah, and that might have been the end of it for the United States in any serious way except for the Intifada breaking out in the Fall of '87. In which George Shultz, I think he felt he really owed it, with all of this miserable stuff happening, he really owed it to himself, to everything and to the United States to make another effort at it. And he did but it was election year and it just wasn't going to go.

SALLY GROOMS COWAL
USUN, Deputy Political Counselor
New York City (1983-1985)

Ambassador Sally Grooms Cowal was born in Oak Park, Illinois in 1944. After graduating from DePauw University she joined the United States Information Service as Foreign Service Officer. Her service included assignments as Cultural and Public Affairs Officer at US Embassies in India, Colombia, Mexico and Israel. She subsequently held a number of senior positions in the Department of State, including Assistant Secretary for Latin American Affairs and Deputy Political Counselor to The American Ambassador to the United Nations. In 1991 she was appointed Ambassador to Trinidad and Tobago. Ambassador Cowal was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy August 9, 2001.

Q: So what were we doing in the UN vis-à-vis Israel?

COWAL: Well, defending Israel at every turn, of course.

Q: I mean, here is the thing within this policy. You can understand our political leaders, they're scared to death of the Jewish vote and Jewish money, and, not as much then probably as they are now, of the Christian right.

COWAL: That's a new factor.

Q: I mean, politically, issuing any opposition to whatever Israel was doing was not politically ...

COWAL: The most interesting thing I think I actually got involved in was after Jeane left. Jeane and the Israeli permanent representative, Bibi Netanyahu, were close friends, and of course he later became prime minister. They shared inclinations about things that weren't really my inclinations. Although I was a great supporter of Israel – was and am a great supporter of Israel – my Israeli friends and contacts are, generally speaking, not in the Likud. They're generally speaking people who believe it would have been smarter for Israel to withdraw from the West Bank early on, and that it was not smart to invade Lebanon, and would have been smarter to get out right away. Again, I guess I wasn't particularly in sync with that administration. I think after Jeane left, and I guess Netanyahu was still there, I was able to get Ambassador Walters to get Secretary Shultz to agree, for the first time, not to veto a resolution which condemned Israel. I think it was the first resolution that ever passed the Security Council in condemnation of Israel. The United States did not vote for it, but we didn't veto it. That was when the Israelis bombed the PLO (Palestinian Liberation Organization) camps in Tunis. An immediate human cry went up about this Israeli action, obviously inflicting grave suffering not only on the target, which was the PLO, but on a perfectly, if not neutral, at least perfectly innocent, third country, which had nothing to do with it at all except having agreed to allow the Palestinians to come there when the Israelis wanted the Palestinians out of Lebanon.

Q: It had taken quite a bit of arm-twisting on our part to get the Tunisians to allow them to come in. They didn't welcome them.

COWAL: No, nobody welcomed the Palestinians. They've been, like the Kurds I guess, a difficult force to be reckoned with in many Middle Eastern countries over very much time. But the argument that I used, and I'm convinced to this day that it was the right argument, in that it was true, because of what I'd picked up. As you point out, you start running around places like the delegates' lounge, you pick up an awful lot of what's going on, what people are thinking about and what people are talking about. This resolution, or this action of the Israelis, came in the fall of 1985. Every year, one of the big battles in the early months of the General Assembly was whether Israel's credentials would be accepted, because every year there was a challenge mounted to the seating of the Israeli delegation by the Arab countries. They would get themselves voting for it and whoever else they could manage to get to vote for it.

There's a part of the UN rules of order that says if something is vetoed in the Security Council, it can be taken to the General Assembly and voted on in the General Assembly. So the two are connected, although the Security Council generally stands alone and is the only part of the UN which has the force of law. There is a tie between these two bodies, and I was picking up the fact that if the United States vetoed this resolution, then it would go to the General Assembly. But more than that going to the General Assembly, that would sort of stimulate the troops in the General Assembly to really go out and get enough votes against Israel that the Israeli delegation would not be seated, and therefore Israel would not be a member of the United Nations. The United States had long had a policy saying if Israel is ever kicked out of the UN, we will leave. So I was very concerned that that was a logical path that we were on.

I was able to convince Walters of that, who convinced Shultz, and we got the instructions to abstain on this resolution, and inside this little conclave to the east of First Avenue which is the UN, its own little world, it was an amazing decision. Nobody thought we would ever do it, particularly not in a Reagan administration.

Q: Well, did you find you became the focal point?

COWAL: Well, no, because I don't think it was terribly well known that it was I who had manipulated this; but I must say, because I thought it was the right thing to do, I felt a personal sort of triumph. I was I think happier to leave the U.S. mission to the UN on that note of feeling as if I had had an influence on what I thought – of course, we'll never know. You can never prove the negative. But what I could see laid out in front of us as a dark prophecy that I have no way of knowing, but I think could well have come true. The world would be a very different place, I think. If as with the League of Nations, if the United States had pulled out of the United Nations, the United Nations could not have survived. A lot was riding on that, and we were able to defuse what could have been a pretty tricky situation. I'm pretty convinced that if Jeane had been there, we would not have been able to do it.

Walters was terribly gifted in many ways: a brilliant linguist, for instance, a raconteur bar none. He could charm the cats down from the trees. He was really adept in nine languages. The good part was he was not so ideologically motivated as Jeane. He didn't have quite the same ambition as she did.

Q: He wasn't a political figure. I mean, he was more a professional. People kept calling him from all administrations.

COWAL: Right, he was a soldier, and he was a professional figure. I mean, he had a huge ego, but he would sometimes be somewhat self deprecating. When people would comment on his languages, he would say, "Oh, only in America. If I had been born in Europe, I would be a concierge in a middle-size hotel." To a certain extent, that might be true, because his tremendous facility for foreign languages was not, I think, matched by every other phase of his intelligence. He was a curiosity. He was a magnificent linguist. He was not a university graduate. He got a field commission in the Army in the Second World War, and from that became general and so on, so he was not a terrifically well-educated man. So I could put this over on him, if you like.

I remember convincing him of this, and he was very heavy, as you know, so he kind of huffed and puffed when he did things. So he huffed and puffed his way into his office and said to his secretary, "Get me the secretary on the phone." As she picked up the phone to dial this, he said, "Now, what do I tell the secretary." I said, well, A, B, C, D, E. Shultz was also a pragmatist, and I think it was Shultz who was one of Kirkpatrick's biggest foes; not that he didn't think she was competent, but he thought she was simply too ideological and that she was pushing the president beyond where the president really wanted to be, or beyond what was good for American foreign policy. I think that was a choice that was made by Shultz, basically.

KENTON W. KEITH
USIA, Deputy Director for Near East and South Asia
Washington, DC (1983-1985)

Ambassador Keith was born and raised in Kansas City, Missouri. After graduating from the University of Kansas he served with the US Navy before entering the Foreign Service in 1965. An Arabic speaking Officer, Ambassador Keith served as Public Affairs Officer and/ or Cultural Affairs in Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Morocco, Syria, France and Brazil before his appointment as US Ambassador to Qatar. His Washington service included several tours in senior positions with USIA. Ambassador Keith was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: You didn't mention Israel. Was it part of the equation?

KEITH: Yes, the NEA area includes all of the Arab countries and Israel and all of the South Asian countries – Pakistan, India, Iran, Afghanistan, Sri Lanka, Bangladesh...

Q: The head of USIA at this point was Charles Wick, a controversial figure. He could get funds which other directors probably couldn't. He had political clout. How did you find him and his impact on what you all were doing?

KEITH: I think you touched on the important things. He brought with him something that too rarely have the directors of USIA had and that is political clout. Ed Murrow had it. Carl Rowan had it to a certain extent. We really didn't have anybody after that with that kind of political power or name recognition until Charles Wick came, bringing with him the personal relationship between the Wicks and the Reagans. That relationship certainly benefited USIA; there was a spike in the USIA budget at that time. He moved us into the television age. He was a man of great enthusiasm when he was with USIA. I thought his enthusiasm for his international television projects worked somewhat to the detriment of other areas of public diplomacy, but he definitely deserves credit for moving us into the television age.

Q: Did he have a point of view or was he reaching down as you were working on this very politically charged area of the world?

KEITH: I think he learned important lessons early in the game. He was not a policy man. He didn't have a deep understanding of international affairs. In the earliest point in his Poland v. Poland fiasco, when he sought to influence affairs in Poland with a kind of political variety show, the Agency was in danger of becoming a laughing stock. At that time he was surrounded by political advisers who were committed to an ideological agenda that I'm not sure even he was comfortable with. I'm fairly certain he was uncomfortable with some of the politically-appointed ideologues who came into USIA under the sponsorship of right wing figures on the Hill. I think he felt they were a distraction to his main goal, which was modernizing the Agency's delivery system. Eventually he began to get rid of them. But he really didn't focus on those things until they became an embarrassment. Les Lenkowsky was the deputy director of USIA for much of the time that I was in Washington. He was and remains a person with a very conservative political agenda. He made no secret of that fact while he was there.

The enemies list. You've probably heard many of my colleagues talk about the enemies list. Lenkowsky publicly denied the existence of an enemies list, i.e. a list of Americans whose intellectual output or service in our overseas programs was prohibited because of their liberal credentials. When that became public there was outrage, and the Agency took some real blows. Lenkowsky, as you've probably heard, denied any knowledge of such a list and put the blame on "mindless gnomes in the bowels of the Agency" acting without direction. Agency employees were furious, and within a day or two people were sporting "Mindless Gnome" buttons.

In fact, Lenkowsky was one of many with neoconservative beliefs who came to prominence during the Reagan years, were less prominent under George H. W. Bush, were completely out of power under Clinton, and re-emerged with George W. Bush. Under Reagan they brought with them a foreign policy agenda which was an aggressively American agenda with far less multi-nationalism than we had practiced since the end of WWII. The kind of cultural relativism or political relativism that marked a more liberal period in our history was gone. No remnants of that. There was a very strong feeling that our system - open markets, free markets, free enterprise, American democracy as a model - we should not be apologetic for these things and we should not be too eager to allow a relativist discussion. Other versions of popular governance or economic systems were irrelevant in their agenda. It was a tough period. Also, Lenkowsky and the people around him had a very enthusiastic pro-Israel agenda, to the extent that it sometimes became a problem for the Department of State, which also had quite a pro-Israeli agenda at that time. But the nuances and the steps forward that you took at the appropriate moment, the effort to try to get the sides together to fulfill a longer range agenda which was held at the State Department was sometimes threatened by the more tactical activities at USIA. They might have taken the form of a VOA editorial that was ill-timed, that was particularly aggressive toward one or another Arab government or leader at a time when the U.S. was involved in delicate negotiations with the very same government. We were in a very confrontational stance.

But on balance the experience with Wick was probably good for USIA. He brought us kicking and screaming into the television era; he made us think about the use of new technologies; he didn't listen to people like me who talked about communication on a human level and face to face, etc. It wasn't that he didn't believe in those things necessarily. It was that the important thing to him at that moment was the use of the new technology and the establishment of USIA as a modern purveyor of information. He could be extremely persuasive. I observed him in action with ministers in Brazil and Jordan, and King Fahd in Saudi Arabia, and they took him quite seriously

Q: Did you find yourself acting as one of the gnomes in USIA?

KEITH: Vis-à-vis Lenkowsky I certainly considered myself one of the gnomes. In fact, I sported a gnome button, that I still possess, for some days after this comment was made in public. As deputy director of NEA, I was responsible for interacting with the Department and with the media on issues of public diplomacy and of public policy. So, when the part of USIA that was responsible for putting out material – brochures, pamphlets, and so on – wanted to do a piece on terrorism in the Middle East, it had to come through my office. I wasn't the final arbiter, of course. It would be an issue that would be discussed also with the appropriate State desk, but there was a political support structure for people who had a more aggressive propaganda agenda in those days – political support structure on the Hill and in academia and think tanks – whether it was the Heritage Foundation or other foundations who supported a more aggressive and more conservative agenda. So, those of us who were in the mode of the chess player moving pieces as it seemed to make the most sense at that moment, trying to get to a certain level of exchange and engagement between Arabs and Israelis, were in a way the opposition to that other way of thinking. I don't want to give you the idea that we had battles every day, but there was a sense that we, the gnomes, were standing in the way of effective policy action on these items.

Q: At the time, the Israelis were somewhat their own worst enemies because of the settlement policies. The Lebanese invasion had not gone well. There was still the aftermath and the Begin government was not sitting very well in Washington. That helped as far as trying to have a balanced field.

KEITH: I think that if you look back on that period there were certainly ups and downs. There were times when we were very angry with the Israelis over settlement issues and other things as well. But there was no comparison between the level of our relationship that was even at its lowest point still well above that of the Arabs in general. That was in the early '80s. It was a time when the American public was only just getting used to thinking of people like Sadat and others in the Arab world as people you could deal with and who weren't all terrorists killing handicapped tourists on ships. We have come a long way since then. Still, although we can have our differences with Israel, there are still things that are givens in our relationship. One is that Israel must maintain a qualitative advantage in defense capability. That is always going to be a major foreign policy given for the U.S. We are never going to let Israel fall into a position of being unable to defend itself. But as we have moved on, our involvement with the Arab world has matured and their involvement with us has matured. Their understanding of the position of Israel in our foreign policy scenario is quite well understood. Often, you will have conversations that begin, "We understand about your relationship with Israel, but..." There was a maturity in the relationship that was just beginning in the 1980s. If you look back at Camp David with Carter and compare that with the Oslo and subsequent discussions, you will observe a more mature negotiating style, an understanding as of 1991 and the Madrid Peace Talks that we were all in the same riverbed. There were currents in that river that were moving faster than others. There were whirlpools in the river here and there. Don't forget that it was a very conservative Israeli government that went to Madrid in 1991, but even they, including Begin and Netanyahu, then sensed that a direction had been taken, a course had been set, and it was just a question of pace and conditions along the way. We're still a long way from peace, but the outlines of a settlement can be seen through the fog.

Q: How did we operate in Israel? The Israelis know more about us than they probably know about their next door neighbors. Was there anything we could do there in terms of USIA?

KEITH: We've always had a very strong program in Israel. If one of the main goals of the USIA program is to promote an engagement of institutions and people, we did that in Israel very well. We had one of the best Fulbright programs in the world. One of the most efficient, well-known and important institutions in the country was the U.S./Israel Fulbright Commission that operated in the same building as USIA.

We had lots of important cultural exchange with Israeli, much of it voluntarily by major American artists. There excellent exchanges with academics, with the people in government, and with journalists. Israel is a political society. If you're on the road in a bus going from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, the driver will have on a political talk show. It's the most political society, politically aware, that I've ever seen, particularly when there are elections approaching or when there is some kind of choice that has to be made, the Oslo Accords, etc.

DOUGLAS R. KEENE
Deputy Principal Officer
Jerusalem (1983-1986)

Mr. Keene was born and raised in Massachusetts and graduated from Colby

College. He joined the Foreign Service in 1967, serving first in Viet Nam and subsequently at Middle East posts including Jerusalem, Karachi, Cairo, as well as Amman and Muscat, where he was Deputy Chief of Mission. His Washington assignments also concerned primarily Middle Eastern matters, including the Arab-Israel problem. Mr. Keene was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

Q: All right. Now you were there in 1983. How would you describe the situation in Jerusalem in 1983, when you got there?

KEENE: A consulate that was very heavily focused on supporting the Habib mission, on trying to deal with the Israeli invasion of Lebanon. That was Habib-Draper.

Q: That was Morris Draper and Philip Habib. Morris Draper...

KEENE: Who visited frequently, going shuttling around the area, trying to work out a deal after Sabra and Shatila to get the Israelis out of Beirut. And because the UN also had their regional headquarters at Government House in Jerusalem, and the involvement of UNIFIL (UN Interim Force in Lebanon) and UNTSO (United Nations Truce Supervision Organization), and various other organizations, as well as the Israeli government—they came to Jerusalem very frequently.

Q: How would you describe sort of the attitude of the officers—American officers—you were dealing with about the Israeli invasion of Lebanon?

KEENE: Well, I remember one of them saying something to the effect that this was different from the Palestinians: the Lebanese shot back, and that sort of stunned the Israelis, because it really wasn't the Lebanese government—it was various factions, like Hezbollah....and the Palestinians. They were there too. I think by and large everybody saw it—and certainly after the Sabra and Shatila massacres—as orchestrated as much by Sharon as anybody else, and they certainly had no enthusiasm for the Israeli invasion.

Q: Well, what was happening in the Con Gen Jerusalem's area responsibility—was it eastern Jerusalem and the West Bank?

KEENE: It was actually all of Jerusalem, which gave us an opportunity to enjoy a bit of a window into Israeli thinking as well as Palestinian: and that was one of the really great things about being there. It was sort of two for the price of one. Many days you could have lunch with an Israeli official and dinner with a Palestinian—the only place, really, where you could get both sides, and it was endlessly complex and fascinating.

Q: You were there from '83 until when?

KEENE: '86.

Q: What were the Palestinians—You didn't have Gaza, or did you?

KEENE: No, we didn't have Gaza. That was covered out of Tel Aviv, although we went down there frequently, because there were just natural connections.

Q: What were the Palestinians doing during this period of time? I mean looking back—a rather quiet time?

KEENE: Yes, in retrospect, yes. After the deal was struck to get the PLO (Palestinian Liberation Organization) out of Lebanon, the focus shifted more to trying to restart the peace process. At that time, it sort of fell to the assistant secretary, Dick Murphy, to take the lead in that effort, so we did a lot of work on that, too. That actually became our focus—trying to understand what was going on in the West Bank and what it might take to promote some sort of progress in the peace process.

Q: This is the period of time when you couldn't talk to the PLO?

KEENE: That's right. And the Israelis—official Israel--wouldn't talk to us either. We were officially confined to the protocol and consular sections of the Foreign Ministry. But in practice, there were quite a few contacts, socially.

Q: Was the mayor—Teddy

KEENE: Teddy Kollek, yes. We had contacts with the municipality. Teddy had a foreign policy advisor, an Arab affairs adviser, and a religious adviser, all became good friends.

Q: Kollek. He was the mayor at the time. He just died, just a few weeks ago. How was he viewed?

KEENE: Very favorably. He understood the situation and was tolerant, tried to promote the Arab sector as well as the Israeli sector. He tried to promote peace and harmony. He had an advisor for foreign affairs from the foreign ministry who sort of was our liaison point within the mayor's office, and he also had an advisor on Arab affairs and we dealt with him too. Teddy was a good guy; he liked a good cigar and a glass of scotch, and he was accessible.

Q: Right now—looking at The Washington Post yesterday, they had a long article about how the Israelis are gobbling pieces of Arab Jerusalem. What was the situation, let's say first in Jerusalem; were the Israelis being aggressive to grab things, were there settlement groups?

KEENE: This is the same old story that's been going on since '67, really. In those days, they were focusing more on building pretty major settlements surrounding Jerusalem, including what we would have called the West Bank, so as to make it very difficult to re-divide the city. And they were controlling—putting major settlements on the major roads and lines of communication. Building new roads. The same group that you read about in the Post the other day, the Ateret Cohanim, were active then, and they'd started that then--buying a few properties in the Old City (of Jerusalem) and occupying them.

Q: Well, what happened? At that time, were we calling the settlements illegal settlements?

KEENE: At that time we were, yes.

Q: So essentially, these were settlements in the Arab territory, is that right?

KEENE: Yes.

Q: Therefore they fell under your jurisdiction?

KEENE: Yes.

Q: Could you do anything with them? Did you go there?

KEENE: Oh yes, we did. In fact, we started that; the consulate hadn't done that previously. We started visiting settlements and trying to get to know the leadership of the settlement movement.

Q: What was your impression of the settlements at that time?

KEENE: Well, there really were two types: there were those that were ideologically motivated, hard line, right wingers, many of them American citizens; and then there were those who were attracted by the subsidized housing that made it cheaper than settling in Israel proper, and those settlers just sort of used them as a convenient place to live--bedroom communities, if you will.

Q: How about the American hard-liners? I speak as an old consular officer. People who fly flags of convenience overseas—these are generally people whose allegiance is with the country where they are located—they may be immigrants or not immigrants, but are people...they enjoy all the rights of being citizens of the host country until things get tough, and all of a sudden, they're Americans. Did you find that flag of convenience type thing?

KEENE: Yes, there was a lot of that, and a lot of dual nationals, and whatever worked that particular day...Almost everybody would keep their American citizenship--I think as a safety net if things really went south, they'd have a place to go. It was a funny kind of place. We did have the great pleasure of carrying out the Department's decision to lift the citizenship of Meir Kahane while we were there.

Q: He was the head of the Jewish Defense League

KEENE: Yes, among other kinds of...

Q: A very aggressive American-Jewish activist attacking the soviets, and all that.

KEENE: And always attacking the Arabs, too. That was the day of the Jewish Underground, when there were secret violent groups...very right-wing Israelis who were doing things such as putting anti-tank rockets into the side of civilian buses and bombs in the cars of the Arab mayors. They were terrorist groups, really.

Q: They killed...they blew the legs off some of those Arab mayors.

KEENE: Yes, they did.

Q: It's so difficult to lose his citizenship. How did they take away his citizenship?

KEENE: He became a member of the Knesset. You're not supposed to hold foreign office. That's how they got him. I know the minister of defense was an American citizen also, but when he became minister, he voluntarily surrendered his passport. There was a lot of that.

Q: What was the attitude of the Arab leadership? Did they treat you as a last hope or did they treat you as just a bunch of stooges of the Israelis, or what?

KEENE: I think they were ambivalent. They resented the American role, but what they tried to do, I guess, was to convince us of the righteousness of their cause, so that they might turn American policy around a little bit. It was just a place on both the Israeli and Palestinian side where people lived and breathed politics. And they both loved to talk, so you had no real troubles making contacts, getting information. You really got around and knew a lot of people.

Q: Did you go all over the West Bank?

KEENE: Yes, all over. Everyday.

Q: How did the Israeli occupying force treat you?

KEENE: It wasn't too bad. We weren't supposed to have too much contact with them, but occasionally we could make a few contacts inside what they called the civil administration, which was mostly the military administration. We were allowed to talk to some contacts who dealt with refugee affairs, the head of UNRWA (UN Relief and Workers Administration) we could deal with; we had some secret meetings with the head of the civil administration, and tried to do what we could to help out with individual issues and just broader issues of the way the military occupation acted. There were a lot of arbitrary arrests, lots of stories about mistreatment of prisoners, many of whom were Arab-American citizens, so we had the consular function on that side of the issue, too. We went into the jails, visiting these people, doing what we could. We were also allowed contact with Israeli MFA (Ministry of Foreign Affairs) consular officials, religious ministry officials and informal contact with many others.

Q: What was your impression, and of the officers at the consulate general, of how Arab-Americans who were arrested were treated?

KEENE: By and large, they were not treated well. They were sometimes physically abused. There were actually quite a large number of them throughout the West Bank, and a lot of them ended up running afoul of the occupation, one way or another. There were actually whole villages which were almost all American citizens in it. We'd go visit them sometimes, and they'd be out there playing baseball. It was a surreal scene.

Q: You can understand Jewish-Americans who go to Israel for Zionist causes, but why would Arab-Americans go back to Palestine?

KEENE: Some because it was a lot easier to live on your social security check there than in the States, some for family reasons, but overall it was more emigration than there were people coming back. That was particularly true of the Christian Palestinians, whose numbers continue to this day to fall kind of dramatically. There aren't too many of them left.

Q: How did you find, let's say, Arab-Americans who ran afoul of Israelis? I assume you made representation to Israeli authorities. In general, how did this work?

KEENE: Well, we could do it several different ways. Officially, it should have been to the consular department of the Foreign Ministry. It also happened during visits to jails. Raising our concerns also occurred during our more informal contacts with higher level officials.

Q: Did you find them responsive?

KEENE: Not very. We also had a channel through the embassy, the ambassador sometimes....

Q: Who was the ambassador?

KEENE: At first, Sam Lewis, and then Tom Pickering.

Q: How were the relations with the embassy?

KEENE: When I got there, they were pretty lousy...a lot of mutual suspicion, and, you know, clashing cables and things like that, but they improved. We had set up a system where we went to their country team meeting every week, and we had a couple of people designated as liaison. It got pretty good. I mean we were never going to see things perfectly eye-to-eye, but it wasn't bad.

Q: Well, did you find that particular junior officers who were assigned to Jerusalem, would take up, you might say, the cause of--because they were the ones who had seen the mistreated Palestinians and others--taking up the cause of the Palestinians, and in doing so became critical of the Israelis. Was this a problem for you?

KEENE: It could be, and in some cases...we did strive for a balance, and certainly it was easy to not like what you saw going on. But we had some very good junior officers. We had an AID program too, and one of them usually was designated as the point of contact for that. That was run through grants to NGO's (non-governmental organizations)—grants to NGO's. One of them who worked with me on this was a young Nick Burns.

Q: Undersecretary for Political Affairs. Number three in the State Department.

KEENE: Right.

Q: Within the, you might say, Israeli organizations, was there any particular group within this that you had to deal with that was particularly hostile, or was it just plain a mixed bag?

KEENE: There were definitely very right-wing groups that were very hostile. Not so much in the government, although certainly that strain of thought was present in the Likud and some of the other far right Israeli parties. And that was the time when Begin and then Shamir, the Likud was in power. It was hard to get much out of them.

Q: How about the Israeli religious community—I think about the Orthodox. Were they sort of off to one side of everything, or were they...how did you find them?

KEENE: Well, you had the ultra-orthodox, the Hassidics, that's one group; and then you have just sort of the right-wing orthodox, and shades in between to pretty totally secular. That's a big thing in Israeli society and remains so today; there are real splits between the very right-wing religious and the more secular westernized segment of society. It was kind of a...a lot of the real right-wingers—you might get to talk to them, but they didn't want to have a lot to do with you. We knew a lot of Israelis; we'd go to their homes for social affairs. You could talk to a pretty broad spectrum of people. And they have a lot of organizations, too...you had this group or that group that you go call on and talk to. We got to know a lot of former officials who were in academia who really knew---well-connected people—former generals, this, that and the other thing. We'd be up at Hebrew University all the time, talking with them, too. We got around.

Q: How did you find Hebrew University? Were they trying to work as a bridge with the Arab population, or were they really representative of the sort of straight Jewish side?

KEENE: No, I think that they were... Well, there were people up there that ran the spectrum, too, but on balance, I thought it was a pretty impressive organization. They had a lot of very impressive people working there who did try to understand what was going on in the Arab sector and in the Arab world. Some of them knew a great deal and were pretty well connected.

Q: Well, right now when we've over time seen places that can really start clashes in the various holy sites, particularly Muslim holy sites. During your time were there any particular problems there?

KEENE: Oh, yes. We had a big issue over the so-called Hasmonean tunnel, Israeli archeological digs near the Western Wall that provoked protests.

Q: What was that?

KEENE: It was an ancient tunnel they were trying to excavate, but it was right next to the wall, to the Haram Es-Sharif, the Noble Sanctuary, and suspicions always run high when the Israelis do that that they're trying to make a territorial grab in what has been an area that Palestinians consider administered by the waqf, for the trust, the Islamic trust. So that went on for a long time, and we had stuff like that happen all the time—occasional riots after Friday prayers, occasional shutdowns of the Temple Mount. Always an issue, but that was typical of the whole area and wasn't just an Israeli-Arab thing; you also had all the Christian groups fighting among themselves over control of the various parts of the various holy places. It was a unique place, and you just really had to well...you got interested in it—not everybody would be, I guess, but you can get into the differences between the Greek Orthodox and the Russian Orthodox and the Ethiopian Orthodox and the Syrian Orthodox—all of those groups and their interaction. One that was very interesting was we had the white Russians and the red Russians, and Russia had no representation at that time, so they used the church members as their unofficial channel. So, it was interesting.

Q: First, let's talk about the American tourist, the strange sort of Christian tourist. Were they a problem or not?

KEENE: Generally not. I mean you're always going to have the stray citizen who gets in some kind of trouble, and you have to try to help them out--citizen services and things like that. But a lot of the Christian groups would come in fairly large, organized tour groups. They'd get on their bus and go around; we had a lot of Jewish-American groups came too, as tourists, or as part of their American-Jewish Congress sponsorship or something like that. They were generally not much trouble either. That wasn't a big issue. Well, you had the guy who thought he was the reincarnation of Jesus Christ; he'd get himself eventually in trouble. You know, the people who have psychiatric problems.

Q: Well, I went to the archives and did a--this was back in '84, so I was in the historian's office the year before I retired, and I did a paper on our consul in Jerusalem in the 1870s. The American Colony, for example, one of the cults at the time, where the leader of the Americans there...I can't think of his name--the family's still around, but he and the senior members--male members--absorbed the wives of some of the other members. I mean, there was a lot of that sort of hanky-panky going on, which often happens in cults. And then, again, we had one guy--he was earlier, who arrived, declared he was the consul, American consul, had never been approved, and then eventually converted to Judaism and disappeared into the woodwork. But the Turks accepted him as the American consul for awhile.

As a consular officer, how did you treat...I arrive in Jerusalem and decide I'm Jesus, and am wandering around declaring this and maybe putting out robes, or something

KEENE: We had a few.

Q: How did you deal with it?

KEENE: Well, it's pretty hard to deal with them until their actions become so bizarre that they trigger a reaction by the host government. Sometimes they'd go violent. I mean, they're just troubled people. If they got into some trouble, you tried to get them some help...either from their family or if they needed psychiatric help or repatriation...every situation on its own merits, I guess. We had a few.

Q: How about Congressional delegations; you must have been deluged with them.

KEENE: Absolutely. I think I had a count at one point. When I was there I think I met over 400 members one way or another.

Q: You know, this is such a political almost third rail, that I would think that ...I mean, every time that there is a presidential primary in New York state, all the candidates support moving our embassy to Jerusalem. Although we all know this is sort of a charade, I would think with politicians you couldn't talk about that.

KEENE: Well, some politicians know that, and some don't. It depends. It was usually a little different there, because we would usually split these CODELs with the embassy in Tel Aviv. They'd take them to go see the prime minister or whoever and then some of them wanted to come and talk to a few members of the Palestinian leadership and see how things were. And some of them did it but weren't too interested in spending a lot of time doing it. So we would maybe get them only for a day, and we'd host a lunch or a dinner or take them around the West Bank to call on some of the mayors or tailor a program to what they were interested in. There were a lot of them.

Q: How did you find life there?

KEENE: I loved it. It was fascinating. It was before the intifada (Palestinian uprising); I didn't feel a lot of danger. I never knew, but we used to say they hated each other so much they'd sort of ignore us. That turned out to be pretty much true until later on.

Q: What about immigration: were you running a fairly large visa program?

KEENE: Yes, pretty large. We had two different buildings in those days--one in the west side and one in the east, and the consular section was in the east. We had lovely buildings—old, beautiful, historic landmark-type buildings. A lot of the Israelis didn't like that because they had to go to east Jerusalem to get their consular services. But it really wasn't deep into East Jerusalem; it's not very far from the American Colony, which in those days, at least, was one of the very few sort of neutral meeting places where both sides didn't mind going at the same time. So we could have stuff there and get away with promoting dialogue a little bit.

Q: Was there a fairly active USIA (United States Information Agency) program there?

KEENE: Yes—modest, but yes. We only had a single American officer.

Q: Who was that?

KEENE: Well, Bill Cavness at first and then his successor, David Good. But that was curious, too, because the embassy also had an office in Jerusalem, staffed by another USIA officer Arthur Green. So, you had that coordination problem that you had to work out, too.

Q: Well, did you feel that you spent an awful lot of the time vetting anything that anybody...every piece of paper that you put out, or letters, or announcements, or anything else, to make sure that you weren't setting off vibrations that would come back and haunt you by showing that you were either too pro-Arab or too pro-Israeli?

KEENE: Oh, yes, for sure. It got to be second nature after a while to find out where all the land mines are. But that was part of the fun...and all the diversity and different views and trying. I mean we consciously set out to try to improve relations with the embassy and the Jewish community and the Jewish-American organizations, and the consulate was generally hated by them and mostly “biased” and “anti-Israeli.”

Q: Did you have problems of your officers being accused by newspapers in the halls of Congress as being pro-Arab and anti-Israeli?

KEENE: Yes, it happened. It wasn't too bad then. We got to work with the Arab-American groups, proactively helping them schedule appointments with our CODELs and things like that. Socializing with them, getting to know them. We got to know a lot of the Israeli press, too. That helped.

Q: How'd you find the press?

KEENE: Well, they have a right-wing press, but they have a lot of people who are pretty good.

Q: The Jerusalem Post. How is that?

KEENE: In those days it was liberal. Now it's right-wing. They had good, solid, English-speaking reporters—it was an English-language paper, and we got to know them well. That helped. They'd come to our receptions.

Q: How about the Hassidic community? They have big enclaves in New York...they used to have up in New Hampshire, too. They're a group apart.

KEENE: They're a group apart. There's a very big area in Jerusalem that's Hassidic, Mea Shearim. They are ultra-orthodox: no driving cars on Saturday, or anything like that, so if you tried to drive through that area, they'd throw stones at you. There were riots sometimes. There are some 90 separate Hassidic groups, and it's very hard to figure out all of them.

Q: Such as Lubavitcher. They consider that the messiah hasn't come yet and therefore the whole Zionist cause is a fraud.

KEENE: Yes. And there's another even more screwy group, Neturei Karta, who believe that the state of Israel is illegitimate, and they support the PLO. Really! When the PLO went to Madrid two or three Israelis of this sect went with them. And the leader of that group's an American, so he would bug us all the time. He was quite a character. He knew he was running a fraudulent operation, but...

Q: Did you feel under any particular threat, you or the consulate of bombing and other things like that?

KEENE: You know, not particularly. We had bomb threats and we had—that was the era when we were starting to tighten up on security and we had a major security upgrade program which caused us some little concern, because we were in an historic building and had to preserve that under Israeli law and we didn't want to put ugly concrete barriers on the sidewalk out front. Kollek didn't want them either, so we had to do some nice planters out there. But I didn't really—I mean we tried to be prudent, but it wasn't something that kept me up at night, no. We felt we had a pretty good network and knew a lot about what was going on. There was violence. I know one of my very good contacts was the mayor of Nablus, and he was assassinated by the PFLP (Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine) while I was there.

Q: What was that group?

KEENE: Palestinian Front for the Liberation of Palestine. It was one of the...they were splintered into five or six groups; that was one of the more radical ones. Anyway...and then we had the Jewish underground to worry about, and the mayors certainly did. There was violence, but it just didn't...we just didn't seem to be major targets.

Q: Well, you left there when?

KEENE: '86. I lived in east Jerusalem. Then we had people living in east Jerusalem; we had people living in Bethlehem.

Q: Where'd you live?

KEENE: In Lazaria, which in English is Bethany, Mount of Olives, near Lazarus' tomb.

Q: Who was the consul general after Cluverius?

KEENE: Well, we had...I started with Grove, then Cluverius, and then Draper.

JOSEPH G. SULLIVAN
Deputy Political Counselor
Tel Aviv (1984-1988)

Ambassador Sullivan was born and raised in Massachusetts and educated at Tufts, Georgetown and Yale Universities. Entering the Foreign Service in 1970, he served in the Department of State in Washington, D.C. as well as in posts abroad. His foreign posts include Mexico City, Lisbon, Tel Aviv and Havana. Mr. Sullivan served as US Ambassador to Angola from 1998 to 2001 and as Ambassador to Zimbabwe from 2001 to 2004. Ambassador Sullivan was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2009.

Q: I have to say that Israeli politics are a very complicated kettle of fish. You were there from when to when?

SULLIVAN: The summer of 1984 until the summer of 1988. Sam Lewis was the ambassador my first year there and then Tom Pickering my next three years. My political counselor the first year was Paul Hare who later went on to several ambassadorships and then later Roger Harrison for two years and then actually I moved up and became political counselor my fourth year there with Tom Pickering's support.

Q: When you went out there in 1984 how stood matters in Israel at that time?

SULLIVAN: Yeah well they were just having an election actually that summer and that was the point at which the previous system of Likud or Labor domination of politics was breaking down irreparably in a way that each party was subsequently only getting forty or so of the 120 seats in the Knesset and therefore were ever more dependent on small party alliances. Because in that 1984 election, Labor and Likud finished in a virtual dead-heat, neither one of them was able to form an alliance with the small parties. Instead they decided on a grand coalition and the two parties would alternate in power with Shimon Peres being prime minister the first two years and Yitzhak Shamir the Likud leader being foreign minister. Yitzhak Rabin would be defense minister the whole four years and then at the two year point Shamir and Peres changed positions. Now at the end of the day at least as far as broader issues the peace process, what the unity government amounted to was a formula for deadlock. Likud was always able to stymie Peres' ambitions to promote a peace process whether he was prime minister or foreign minister. Shamir probably didn't have much interest in advancing a peace process in any case and was certainly not going to participate in such a venture even when George Shultz came over and made a major push late in the Reagan Administration.. Shamir and Peres both distrusted each other so much on those fundamental issues that there was very little movement on peace process issues.

Q: What about the small parties like the religious parties with other parties? Were they able to throw their weight around?

SULLIVAN: Well less so than the more normal government in which either Labor or Likud used to be dependent on them because Labor and Likud had some eighty votes between them the weight of the smaller parties was less. That said, because both of the large parties were looking at the future, the coalition included, as I recall, that at least some of the religious and other small parties within the Grand Coalition continued to direct resources and benefits their way looking at the future and when they might need them again for future coalition building efforts.

Q: What was your impression of the party system? Well let's talk about the smaller parties first since you were dealing with them on a personal basis.

SULLIVAN: Well it was a system which essentially did work in a very advantageous position for small parties to get their benefits, particularly if their benefits were narrow benefits, money to fund Yeshivas, religious teaching programs, money to support their own party building in the guise of social institutions and so on. It was a situation which elsewhere in the world is rare, but small parties in Israel have great leverage. Even bearing in mind that I was in Israel at the relative low point of their leverage, the small parties still had the ability to get their way and the large parties saw it in their interest to throw substantial resources their way in the interest of having a good relationship.

Q: Well did you find that the small parties had much interest in trying to manipulate the United States or were they playing their own game and we were outside their orbit?

SULLIVAN: I think probably the less small parties I would say settler groups were in that period that I was there just beginning to cultivate in a major way U.S. political forces to try to take sides in this issue of whether or not Israel should be discouraged from or encouraged to settle in the West Bank in Gaza. Settler groups had some success in their efforts at that point. I remember Senator Jesse Helms actually came over and visited. I don't recall whether he even took a briefing from the ambassador; we certainly would have offered one. But his trip would have been paid for by a Christian interest group in the United States that had a special relationship with Jewish settler groups in Israel and the West Bank. And Helms's views were further encouraged to be very supportive on behalf of settlers; so this was a relatively new phenomenon. As far as other groups and other parties, Peace Now was beginning to emerge at that point and they had sort of some natural allies within both liberal forces in the U.S. as well as within liberal Jewish organizations but I don't think they were as active or as effective in cultivating U.S. allies.

Q: The Israeli Arab group was it at all effective or not?

SULLIVAN: Let's see, there was to some degree I recall at that point there were about seven Israeli-Arab members of the Knesset, seven or eight, somewhere in there. About four of them were Communist Party which effectively made them really ineffective. They were excluded from all security matters and, as a matter of fact, all Israeli-Arabs were excluded from knowledge of security matters and had virtually no real influence on foreign policy issues. The Labor party had several Israeli-Arabs, who had a little bit more influence. But overall at that point, you were dealing with a group that was so small that their ability to influence matters was quite small.

Q: You were there during the last year or so of Sam Lewis weren't you?

SULLIVAN: I was there his last year, yeah. My principal recollection of that period is that we were still I would say, clinging to the hope that an agreement that had been forged between Israel and Lebanon with US brokerage could somehow be maintained, even as it was breaking apart under our eyes. It had been brokered by the U.S. in about '83 in the aftermath of the '82 mess in Beirut. Israel agreed to mostly depart from Lebanon and yet be able to maintain security in south Lebanon. Sam's last year and my first year witnessed the collapse of any hope that that agreement would have any real importance in the longer run..

Q: During that period what was the status of Ariel Sharon and how did we view him?

SULLIVAN: Sharon was at least the first part of that period very much on the outs. His stature was much reduced because of the nightmare that the invasion of Lebanon had resulted in was and the internal Israeli investigations which had blamed him for the Sabra and Shatila massacre of Palestinians. He was much diminished in political stature, but in the course of my four years was rehabilitated and eventually incorporated into the collation government in a considered relatively minor role as minister of commerce. So from being somebody who had been a major figure, he became a minor figure. His ego didn't diminish and he still came into receptions with a large retinue of people and certainly whenever I would accompany visiting Congress people to meet with him, he certainly spoke as if he was a major figure. But I think that was probably his low point of political power and it took him some time thereafter to build his status back up.

Q: How did you find various groups, particularly Congressional groups and other ones, coming to Israel? I mean by this time this was a part of the ebb and flow of serving in Israel wasn't it?

SULLIVAN: Sure, I mean I'm not sure I can give a number but I would guess that it would probably have been maybe as many as 100 Congress people a year counting the numbers that came in groups. Others, like Congressman Steve Solarz and Senator Arlen Specter came every single year. Solarz used to ask for about 30 meetings in the course of three days and he wanted every meeting to last exactly 45 minutes, transport fifteen minutes to the next meeting and right on through his agenda. So it was a part of a very intense workload and it often involved our organizing some events for visiting members of congress in addition to me or another control officer being the embassy notetaker. It was more ambiguous if they came under private sponsorship as did Senator Helms for instance and we typically did not accompany those groups or might only have a briefing for them. Congressman Charlie Wilson also came often in that period and he also knew his way around Israel very well, had lots of very good Israeli connections, was chairman of armed services appropriations subcommittee and he basically did his own thing. Yes, we received him at the airport and asked him if there was anything he wanted. He always came on a military plane and was accompanied by a military assistant but he didn't ask much from the embassy and preferred all of this meetings private. But I or someone from the embassy did accompany if there was a ministerial level meeting and the Ambassador would accompany to a meeting with the Prime Minister.

So everybody would want to see Rabin as defense minister and then the prime minister and the foreign minister Shamir and Peres and those were interesting and good meetings. The American Congress people were there because it was important for them and their constituents and their supporters that they go. Probably only a few of them were critical of Israeli ever in meetings, there were a handful that were, such as David Bonior and Howard Wolpe, but most members tended to be unreservedly supportive, even in the midst of the first "Intifada". Many Israeli politicians sought to use those meetings in order to encourage more Congressional support. I always had great admiration for Rabin because he was very much a straight-shooter even though the first "Intifada" was starting at that time. He used to downplay the threat of that "Intifada" saying that it was a tactical problem that posed no threat to the existence of Israel. His assessment at that time was that the existential threat for Israel was in the East, Syria and Iraq. If they were to combine, this could be an existential threat and that was what Israel should concern itself with most. He would say this to some of the Congress people who were prepared to view every single threat as an existential threat to Israel, but Rabin was not playing to that audience, he was calling it straight.

Q: Great, okay well I've got to go now but I would like to pick this up really with the Pickering time.

SULLIVAN: Okay yeah there are some interesting things there. I was there in the Jonathan Pollard...

Q: So we are talking with Joe Sullivan and we are in 1980...

SULLIVAN: Well say 1985 in Tel Aviv, Israel.

Q: Yeah. So you had an Israeli government which was sort of in...

SULLIVAN: A unity government with both Labor and Likud 50 percent each and alternating the prime minister positions but, in fact, at least on peace process issues it became a formula for stalemate. The U.S. made a number of efforts, I would guess most notably in 1987 and 1988 when Secretary of State Shultz made a major visit out and tried to push the process forward. In fact, by that point, Shamir was the Likud Party's, Yitzhak Shamir was prime minister and he essentially wasn't interested; so things did not advance.

Q: Well Shultz came out full of, what I gather, full of drive and really going to do it. You had our ambassador in Syria, his name escapes me right now, Bob... I want to say Bob Paganelli but anyway saying Assad wasn't going to do anything, and from what I gather, with Shamir. What caused Shultz to come out into a no win situation?

SULLIVAN: Yeah, well I mean there is a sort of a continuing impulse on the part of the American administrations to do something; to press, to do whatever is possible, because they recognized that it was a corrosive situation to have no peace process underway. If I recall correctly the Palestinian first Intifada had begun in 1986 or '87 so that really was, I think, one of the factors providing some impulse. In addition, by then Labor Party leader Shimon Peres had become foreign minister and he was very anxious for the U.S. to move and so he was encouraging the U.S. to make an effort. Yet, of course, without Likud being in agreement there was no prospect that it would move. Likud and Shamir were usually, let's say, careful enough not to say no, they would just not say yes. So at the end of the day as I recall Shultz only came once. He had pre-missions come out with various members of peace party planning process that had come out and done pre-meetings, but at the end of the day Shamir was not going to agree so the U.S. peace process faded from the scene and I don't think Shultz ever made a second serious trip out, at least not on that subject.

Now Syria was not really involved in the Palestinian process at that stage because they really weren't a player. It would have been the Palestinians and some lingering efforts to involve Jordan in an agreement on the Palestinians. There had been some efforts to have them, in fact, be the spokesperson for the Palestinians but I think Palestinians were increasingly clear that they didn't want the Jordanians as their front person and, therefore, any effort needed to have a Palestinian lead. Shimon Peres, in particular, retained some hopes of having the Jordanians out front. Also, Likud in particular within the Israeli government was not going to take the encouraging facilitative actions that Shultz was presenting as necessary in order to move forward.

Q: Well at the embassy had we written off or were we just going through the motions?

SULLIVAN: Well you know Tom Pickering is a terrific person and certainly the best ambassador I've ever had. But he is a very enthusiastic and positive person who I think never would have discouraged anybody. I've seen him in conversations with Israelis who can be extremely tough and basically say a flat no and Tom would always say, "Well how about this and can't we work it this way, can't we do this." So I believe Tom was encouraging and at least making the effort. Yeah, probably the embassy was being at least positive, we should try and the secretary had a full peace process staff which had some of the usual actors, including Aaron Miller and Dan Kurtzer.

Another interesting time was when Vice President Bush made a major trip out to the region in '87, as I recall. It clearly was a pre-Presidential trip in order to position himself as a foreign policy expert, which he was to a substantial degree. Yet he had not had previously, I think, terrific relationships with the Israelis so that trip was among other things to burnish his credentials in all the countries of the region and most importantly in the U.S. I don't think he took major out front positions, it was a fact-finding trip, it was a make contact trip and from his point of view went well. I happened to be the control officer for that visit. It's always a bit of adventure dealing with the staff because by that point the White House had begun to use advance parties who had no international experience. In many cases, they were the people who had advanced previous U.S. campaign trips and were rewarded with advancing an international trip. That was, in this case, particularly confusing because one advance group came out and worked with the embassy over several days with the embassy always presenting ideas of things that can be done, how they can be done. This advance group had their own ideas but we tried to make things work in a practical fashion. After we worked through maybe a three or four day visit of advance party number one, lo and behold about a week later comes advance party number two that had clearly never consulted with advance party number one, had a totally different agenda and we had to do it all over again. So I think that's the practice that as far as I know has continued at least did continue for the next ten or dozen years through both political parties in the White House but made things that much more complicated for an embassy that's trying to work a visit.

I recall one meeting with the Vice President's advance party, Embassy representatives and the Israeli Protocol and Knesset officials over arrangements for Bush's principal speech at the Israeli Knesset. All seemed to be going well until the Vice President's advance party proposed removing the Knesset podium's national Menorah seal to be replaced by a Vice Presidential seal. So I told him, "No, I don't think you can do that." He still was very insistent so I said, "If you still want to talk about it, raise it, but you will get a very strong reaction here in the Knesset and they'll want to maintain their symbol of their state. Eventually it got worked out and the Knesset seal stayed on the podium, but it reflects the naivety of some of the people that do the advance work.

Let's see I guess the one other memorable feature was the Jonathan Pollard spy scandal in which he was, of course, arrested in the United States.

Q: Was this during your time he was arrested?

SULLIVAN: Yes, I can't remember in late 1985 and into 1986.

Q: Yeah.

SULLIVAN: He was arrested and the Israelis, of course, were intimately involved and at quite high levels. A senior Israeli intelligence figure had orchestrated the espionage and utilized as one of the people who made contacts with Pollard an Israeli air force hero of the bombing of the nuclear reactor in Baghdad. The Israelis clearly seduced Pollard with that and with money; he became an agent and delivered materials to the Israeli Government.

Now the period where the embassy got involved was after Pollard's arrest when the Embassy and the US pressed the Israeli's to cooperate in the investigation and prosecution. The Israelis cooperated to a certain degree in identifying individuals who might have been involved, I think out of embarrassment and fear of its effect on relations with the US. There was a team sent out that included State Department then Legal Adviser Abe Sofaer, Justice Department officials and Joseph diGenova from the U.S. attorney's office prosecuting the case. We had a half a dozen meetings typically starting at about 11:00 p.m. in Jerusalem. We would go through three or four hours in stages, they later brought out some of the individuals who had been involved and those individuals answered questions from our side. So there was some degree of cooperation.

Now in a situation like that about how it had happened, what degree of involvement there was, the prosecution always wants more information and I think at a certain point the Israelis decided they had provided enough and were not interested in cooperating any further. That may have already been after the first set of visits I don't recall precisely but it was a very tense period in the relationship. The Secretary of Defense, at the time I recall, Caspar Weinberger was particularly upset and it cost Israel a certain degree of collaboration from the U.S. for at least a period, until there was a decision made, notwithstanding this case, that it was in our interest to resume most levels of cooperation with Israel.

Q: I'm not overly familiar with this but my understanding on the Pollard case is that Pollard had been tasked by his Israeli masters to supply on an urgent basis naval intelligence concerning the location of our nuclear launching submarines? I read this in an article by Seymour Hirsch of the New York Times.

If that's true the only conclusion one can make is that this was being passed on to the Soviets because the Israelis couldn't give a damn where our launching submarines were but the Soviets did. The Israeli's were going through a lot of negotiations to get people out of the Soviet Union at the time. Was this at all a subject that was considered by or batted around the embassy at all?

SULLIVAN: I don't recall that specific information and I don't recall us getting into the specific details of the information provided and certainly not in the meetings with the Israelis that I was part of.

Q: I have to look on the Internet to see a little more because if the information he was supplying was, as I said, of our nuclear stuff that has horrific connotations.

SULLIVAN: I think the understanding at the time, unless there was other information I wasn't aware of or that became known later, was that most of the information he was seeking was information about capabilities of their potential enemies and potential threats to them. We always had a certain degree of sharing with Israel, but Israel always presumed that we didn't share everything so they were always anxious to get information in other ways to supplement whatever we did provide.

Q: It's an interesting case. I know the American military, particularly in the higher reaches, have been and continue to be absolutely adamant about not releasing Pollard. So there has to be something more than just a garden variety spy, I would think.

SULLIVAN: I don't know the answer to that.

Q: During the Pickering time what was your piece of the action?

SULLIVAN: Well, I continued to be the deputy political counselor for the first two years he was there; my second and third years there, and I was principally focused primarily on internal political issues, which in Israel always involved a lot of foreign policy and a fair bit on relations with the U.S. as well. So I continued to follow internal Israeli politics, trying to interpret it as well as I could, try to establish good relationships with a full range of Israeli actors and seeking to get a little bit of advance information on what was likely to happen in the local scene and how it might affect us. This applied to specific issues we were working on the peace process, what were the effects of the Intifada, as well as coalition politics. Then finally, my fourth year there, I became political counselor so I had a broader sense of responsibilities and less specifically internal as somebody else took over most of that portfolio.

Q: Well as you were looking at internal politics were you sensing a significant change in the demographics of Israeli population and of politics; in other words as more and more people came out of the Soviet Union the less sort of the old European Socialist side of things, the Labor people were losing power in the Likud which is more Orthodox group was gaining. Was that happening?

SULLIVAN: I would agree with most of that happening with the exception of the impact of the Russians immigration. While Russian immigration was just beginning to increase, it really increased much more after the collapse of the Soviet Union.. With that said, the old European Socialist traditions, which were most notable within the Labor Party from Ben-Gurion on, were fading. The Kibbutz movement was less and less relevant, the Histadrut the Labor organization was less relevant and increasingly large percentages of Israeli's were born in Israel, had parents born in Israel and a diminishing percentage traced their origins back to the Pale of Settlement in Eastern Europe. More Israelis had origins from the Middle East and North Africa; they were Sephardim rather than Ashkenazim and they had tougher impulses toward Arabs and Arab states. So some of the traditions that Labor had led that gave it predominance for Israel's first forty years were becoming increasingly less relevant.

Q: Did we see this as a plus or minus?

SULLIVAN: Well it was a minus to the degree that we were encouraging a peace process. The demographic changes made the environment more difficult for a peace process. Otherwise it was mostly Israel's own business and we had to adjust as well and deal with people who were not like those we knew before. If you think of somebody like the former foreign minister for many years Abba Eban, he was no longer a relevant figure. Even though he was in the Knesset, we had to focus on these people who were born in Morocco, born in Iraq or sons and daughters of people born there. We adjusted, we made contact and particularly the '80s, fewer of them spoke English so it was important to have Hebrew. Actually, Tom Pickering to his credit learned Hebrew in a year basically in an hour a day in the morning drawing upon some old Arabic that he had learned while he was in Jordan. I don't know anybody who in a year could learn enough Hebrew to function and he did and was giving speeches after a year there. That was his mark of incredible language aptitude.

Q: For the deputy political counselor and the counselor how important or how heavy was the hand of the American Jewish community, AIPAC, the Congressional lobby and all in your dealings or was this just part of the underbrush?

SULLIVAN: No, there are issues that it affects. One that it affected I would argue was the embassy itself, which was in a renovated old hotel right on a main street with a parking garage underneath us. We needed to improve security in that embassy and at the point I was there, we had an option on a property that was probably six or seven miles up the road in the direction of Herzliya that we could have gotten and secured quite a large perimeter without a parking garage underneath. It would have been our option to do with what we wished. Well at the same time the Congress, in the lead up to U.S. elections, was in its regular procedure of trying at least passing some resolution that the American Embassy must move itself to Jerusalem, notwithstanding any potential impact on US ability to promote a peace process. Even though the vast majority of Congress people, in private, would not have thought this was a great idea at that moment but they would pass the resolution to that effect. In any case, that year it was done in the form of an appropriation restriction and the appropriation legislation stated that the U.S. should not extend any funds to build an embassy in Tel Aviv, but should instead spend any embassy construction funds in Jerusalem.

Well, Pickering because he was such a good negotiator and he had contacts and he could be persuasive, wound up being instrumental in having the resolution watered down so that it instead said, "The U.S. government should both direct its efforts towards building an embassy in Jerusalem but could also improve a temporary facility in Tel Aviv." So in effect, we might have been able to go ahead but then the Israelis, of course, had their own interests and the mayor of Tel Aviv did not want us that far out of town and he intervened to block it. Those were realities and we had to deal with them.

It was true on a broader and more political front that Congress people visited all the time and sometimes they came on Congressional funds and sometimes they came sponsored by one of a number of usually American Jewish groups. As I mentioned in one of our previous conversations, even some fundamentalist Christian groups took an interest in settlement on the West Bank based on Jews' biblical links to West Bank land and began to sponsor some conservative Republican visits including those of Jesse Helms. With many of the, if I could call them mainstream American Jewish groups, we had good relations with their representatives in Israel and we would work together on congressional visits that they were sponsoring; the embassy would be involved in congressional meetings with official Israelis. These groups would take congressmen on other portions of the visit themselves but it was reasonably amicable. There were limitations on that; the embassy would not go into, for instance, the Golan Heights with a Congressional delegation and we wouldn't travel with the Israeli government into the West Bank and we would discourage Congress people from doing it. But Congress members would often follow their own counsel. If there were groups that were very interested in perpetuating Israeli control over the Golan Heights and the West Bank these groups would encourage such visits strongly and try to make sure it became a major feature of the visit. Some elements of the Israeli government would be similarly inclined and push strongly for congressional visitors to make the Golan and the West Bank major component of the visit.

Q: At that time, how did reporting come from Gaza and the West Bank?

SULLIVAN: Historically, as you know, from your earlier interviews, there were often fire fights between the consulate in Jerusalem and the embassy in Tel Aviv. That was not the case in most of my time there; I think Maury Draper was consul general for a while and then later Wat Cluverius. In both those cases, there was an amicable relationship with the embassy so there wasn't the sniping that there sometimes has been, at least not in public. We wouldn't send dueling cables in with diametrically opposed views but we would have natural differences because we had different interlocutors and different perspectives but we would try to talk to each other and at least understand the other perspective before what we put on paper. Fundamentally though in the 1980's reporting on the West Bank was done by ConGen Jerusalem and that on Gaza by Embassy Tel Aviv.

Q: Is there anything particular going on either in Gaza or the West Bank? I mean the Intifada started then, didn't it?

SULLIVAN: That's right.

Q: How did we view it at the time?

SULLIVAN: Well, it was I guess I would say that we viewed it with a lot of concern. We raised questions about whether the response was disproportionate because it was mostly stones against rubber bullets and eventually Washington did take public positions but it usually ended in that famous phrase lamenting the cycle of violence. We encouraged both sides to step back from actions which only inflamed the cycle of violence. So U.S. government positions were inconclusive at the end of the day.

Q: Did you find that in your reporting you had to be careful of circumspect or something? So often the story has been over the decades whatever is reported from the embassy usually ends up on a Congressman's desk before it hits the appropriate desk in the State Department.

SULLIVAN: Yes and I recall specifically with respect to the Intifada in one case, an embassy report referred to repressive Israeli actions. That caused something of a firestorm in certain circles of the Department of State where there was angst that this word was used. So we were, in effect, told to be very careful on how we dealt with the Intifada on paper.

Q: In a way as a political reporting officer was it kind of fun to be playing this somatic game in a so-called friendly state where your controlled interest was really very circumscribed by political forces?

SULLIVAN: I don't know if I would call it fun; you are being facetious; it was a bit frustrating. You see what you see and you know facts as you know them and it was Rabin as defense minister who had control of this Israeli reaction. As I said in my previous day's interview, I think he was basically an honorable man, somebody who was tough and tough minded. His whole life had been shaped by conflict but he wasn't someone who took pleasure in conflict or war. He felt that if people were provoking you you needed to be tough with them or else they would further provoke you. That said there were aspects of that reaction which were oppressive and which were cruel. They did go overboard sometimes and U.S. reaction to these excesses could help moderate the Israeli response. I think from the American point of view to the degree we had universal concerns with human rights and universal principals it was our role to make it clear to the Israelis that excessive response was something that we disapproved of. I don't think we were always clear at sending that message.

Q: Well you left there when?

SULLIVAN: In the summer of 1988.

Q: As you left in your mind whither Israel?

SULLIVAN: In order to be in our business and probably to be in the Middle East, one has to try to retain elements of optimism. There was at that point a fellow with whom Congressman Steve Solarz used to meet named Yehoshafat Harkabi, who had previously been chief of Israeli military intelligence and later an academic. Harkabi used to make an argument, which I think Rabin shared and Rabin probably followed when he signed on a few years later to the Oslo Accords. It was essentially that Israel and Palestinians had to come to an agreement, not because they loved one another, not because it was in keeping with either Israeli dreams or Palestinian dreams of what the future should be, but because the only way that Israel could preserve itself as both a democratic state and a Jewish state was by making an accommodation with the Palestinian inhabitants of the region that involved giving up territory. So I think Rabin essentially accepted that as well and I hoped it would be true as we've seen both before and after the Oslo accords, the devil is in the implementation and even when you have a broad-scale agreement I would say the implementation on both sides subsequently caused all kinds of turmoil and problems that have bedeviled the process subsequently.

So I remained hopeful in an eventual peace agreement, but without taking sufficient account of how difficult it would be; I certainly wasn't hopeful in the short term because I had no belief that Likud or Shamir would make serious compromises. Shamir later went on to become prime minister in his own right and was there at the end of the Gulf War to resist mightily the efforts of Bush and Baker to have an international peace conference. But basically they pushed him very hard, he went along but eventually was defeated and Rabin was more interested in a peace process when he became prime minister.

That said Israel is a tough place and a tough place to do business. I like the place, I like Israel, I like Israelis as tough as they are, but it's a difficult place and I wound up going there ten years later that we will come to later in a period where I was dealing with the Israel-Lebanon monitoring group.

I should add that Israel was a very intense place to live and to work. Israelis are very intense about almost everything and the pace of work was very intense with us working long days almost every day with many official dinners and receptions at night. So while it was a reasonably pleasant environment for my family, I was not at home as much as I would have liked.

JAMES E. TAYLOR
Political/Military Officer
Tel Aviv (1984-1988)

James E. Taylor was born in Oklahoma in 1938. He graduated from the University of Southern California in 1960. He served in the U.S. Air Force from 1961-1965 and entered the Foreign Service in 1965. His career included positions in Iran, Germany, the Soviet Union, Afghanistan, and Israel. Mr. Taylor was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on December 5, 1995.

Q: You left there when?

TAYLOR: In the summer of 1984.

Q: And went where?

TAYLOR: To Tel Aviv.

Q: Was this just a natural outflow assignment?

TAYLOR: Yes, I think it fit in pretty well with what I had been doing in PM and in State for three years and it was time to go overseas again. I knew the job was coming open, so I bid for it. Apparently it was a very popular job at the time, a very interesting kind of thing. It was one of the few times I ever asked anyone to put in a good word for me. I asked Arnie Raphael to call Sam Lewis, our ambassador in Tel Aviv, and put in a good word for me. So, it worked out and I was given the assignment.

Q: Did your wife have a tandem assignment?

TAYLOR: That was the first time she had to take leave without pay which she did for the first year. She had been to Israel before on a field trip from Afghanistan to visit the American Center and see how the operations there were going, and was so excited about it because she thought it was a place worth visiting. It was new to us, we hadn't been there before. But, there was no job until the following spring when something came open. That was the first time we had to take a break in service as a tandem couple. We had been treated pretty well by the personnel departments of both agencies.

So, I got there and didn't have any overlap with my predecessors, and found out that one of the major elements of my work was Lebanon. I had all of the political/military duties and liaising with the IDF. Fortunately the IDF headquarters is in Tel Aviv, whereas the Foreign Ministry is up in Jerusalem with all the other ministries. So, the other guys in the political section who dealt mostly with the Foreign Ministry had to make that drive back and forth to Jerusalem all the time. This had been done because of security concerns. The Israelis wanted to put the IDF as far from the borders as possible and put them in Tel Aviv rather than up in Jerusalem.

Q: You were in Tel Aviv from when to when?

TAYLOR: From 1984-88, four years in that job in Tel Aviv.

On the Lebanon front, which we discussed earlier from the Washington point of view, the policy and operation was being controlled by the IDF in Tel Aviv and not by the Foreign Ministry, so it became with my particular portfolio a natural to handle that, because the Israeli liaison office, vis-a-vis Lebanon, was housed in the IDF headquarters in Tel Aviv. The senior Israeli there was a fellow by the name of Uri Lubrani, who was in the Foreign Ministry most of his career but then went over to the MOD, Ministry of Defense, to handle the Lebanon policy questions. I have seen him on television a couple of times recently as sort of the main representative in negotiations with the other countries in terms of the peace process. At least he was for a couple of years back in the early nineties.

So, we would go over any time anything came up on Lebanon or we just wanted to hear the Israeli explanation of their policy and what was going on in Lebanon. Usually, the political counselor and I would go over to his office and have him talk for an hour or so and I would write up a reporting cable and send it off to the region and the Department.

You mentioned earlier the question of whether there was hostility from our colleagues around the region. At one point, I forget exactly when, I was back here or something, I heard guys in our embassy in Beirut were constantly incensed when they would get a reporting cable of our meetings with Lubrani and his explanations of why IDF was in Lebanon and IDF support for what they called the Army of South Lebanon, which was a force created by the Israelis of former Lebanese military or militia. It was an Israeli supported and supplied organization that was to control what they considered a security zone, about 20 kilometers north of the Lebanese/Israeli border. This particular army would be responsible for maintaining security and preventing rocket firings and infiltration and things like that. We would report this stating this is what the Israelis are doing and this is what they are saying their policy is. Our colleagues in Beirut were constantly incensed by these reporting cables on the grounds that we, the American embassy in Tel Aviv, should be pounding the table telling them to do this and to do that. I could never figure out why they would get emotionally angry at us because obviously we are not going to have any influence at all in Israeli's policy in Lebanon. We could make demarches at any particular level, but they knew what our policy was and for us to tell Lubrani that he should rein in the IDF would have been totally fruitless. He wouldn't have thrown us out of the office, he was too polite to do that.

Some of the more interesting reports were when Lubrani and his small entourage, there were only two guys in the office, would have come back from a trip up to Lebanon and South Lebanon and actually gone in and talked to people. If we happened to get lucky and time our request to visit him for a read out soon after his return from such a trip, that was when the visits were the most useful and the most interesting.

Q: I take it you were not allowed to go into Lebanon?

TAYLOR: No.

One particular funny story. When Ambassador Lewis left and Ambassador Pickering took over in 1986, he, of course, requested an IDF orientation tour of some of their bases in the south, in the Sinai and the West Bank and eventually up north. They agreed they would do all this, they were quite happy to fly him up in a helicopter and show him this and that. So, on one of these trips to the north, the Defense Attaché and I went along because we knew all of the guys on the Israeli side, and landed at a base here, had lunch there, got briefings, got to look in the helicopter at all the topography, flying over the Golan Heights and shown why they were such a strategic concern. At one point we landed very near a kibbutz which I knew was right on the border with Lebanon. We all piled into some jeeps and other kinds of trucks and started heading north. They wanted to show us a fire base that they had established up north to operate against the terrorists. It was a fire base as well as an electronic monitoring unit used to monitor the border fence against infiltrators. Well, we went through the border fence on the ground to get to this place and it was obvious that we were in Lebanon. I am paraphrasing it now, but it was very funny. Pickering said to his host at that particular point, "I won't even ask where we are." And, they all laughed because they knew we were not supposed to be in Lebanon. Pickering didn't seem to care very much, he was such a hard charging guy he wanted to see this damn post. He wanted to get educated, so we just went on up.

No, but officially we were not supposed to be there. That was the job of our guys in Beirut, but they, of course, would not come down to the area controlled by the Israelis or the puppet army of Lebanese created by the Israelis.

Q: Sam Lewis was there for the first two years?

TAYLOR: I think for only one year until 1985 and then I had three years under Pickering.

Q: How did you find Sam Lewis as far as how he dealt with things? He had been there a very long time.

TAYLOR: He was there eight years all together, an extremely long time.

Q: What was the feeling you had gathered? Had he gone native?

TAYLOR: First of all he was extremely knowledgeable about Israel, the affairs of Israel and what had happened in the peace process of Camp David, which was a long and detailed negotiation. He had an institutional memory that was extremely valuable and knew the society, knew people in every segment of society. When my wife eventually became a cultural attaché, he knew a lot of people in that field. He knew a lot of the generals in my field and especially the politicians. His real strength, I think, was his contacts and his knowledge of the political workings of the Knesset and all of the myriad political parties they have. One guy could become a political party. He had developed a whole network of contacts and was extremely good at it. I, by no means, had the impression that he had gone native. I found him willing to say that some of these people are just so loony that they have no concept of what it is to be a sophisticated political leader, that they, for example, were so obsessed with keeping every inch of conquered territory from the 1967 war that they wouldn't listen to reason, couldn't place anything above the interest of keeping that land, etc. I would not consider his being pro-Israel in any sense of being unbalanced in his view. In fact, as I said, I heard him make any number of presentations where he was critical of the Israeli policy because they were this, or that. He was not an easy guy to work for. He was a crusty guy who knew what he wanted and was determined to get it out of the staff and could be very demanding on many occasions. He had tremendous contacts with Members of Congress because the visits by CODELS (Congressional visits) added to the work load to an inordinate degree. They were constantly coming and in 95 percent of the cases political officers were made control officers for these CODELS. Once in a while a econ officer would get one because the interest might be finance or trade.

We would also have Executive Branch visits dealing with negotiations of various kinds. But, I think Sam Lewis had contacts that went back so far and so deep that he was really an asset to the US government.

Q: How about Tom Pickering?

TAYLOR: Well, he is obviously one of the most successful Foreign Service Officers in history. I think he went from being a JOT to being an ambassador because he has been ambassador six or eight times, or something like that, and the guy is not that old. So, he had to start a long time back. He is a brilliant guy and has a brilliant mind. He seems to be an absolute sponge on information and just soaks it up on whatever the issue is and has an energy level that really is remarkable. He was known to get up about 5:00 and start Hebrew lessons at 6:00, or something like that. He would be at the embassy by 7:30 or 8:00. Be up in Jerusalem for a meeting at 8:00, breakfast with so and so. That became a favorite tool for everybody in the embassy. If your schedule permitted you would have breakfast in one of the hotels and write up your report sometime during the day. But he would do that. It became obvious that he over scheduled himself. He would have a daily schedule down to a 15 minute meeting here and a 20 minute meeting up there and would be up and back throughout the day, with dinner at such and such a place and coffee and dessert, etc. This would go on day, after day, after day. He was what we would call a type A personality.

But, by and large, as far as I could tell, his operating technique was to reserve a few major issues for himself and delegate virtually everything else to the DCM and the counselors of the various sections. He did not need to sign off on a lot of reporting cables which I thought were policy oriented reporting cables or analyses of certain issues. Some of these reports we included in the so-called Post Reporting Plan, your annual plan for the embassy reporting, so these were think pieces. He didn't have to sign off on those. I think he is the first ambassador that I ever met who didn't insist that all of these analytical kinds of policy oriented reports had to go through him. He delegated a lot. According to the political counselor who I worked for for two years, Roger Harrison, who eventually became Ambassador to Jordan...one day we were going through some of this feedback from the front office and Pickering had written something on one of these think pieces like "Good show" or "Nice job." Harrison said, "God, that is the first time I have seen anything like that in months." So, I guess, the feedback from Pickering to his senior staff was limited. He would have his daily staff meetings, but in many cases wouldn't attend them. He would ask the DCM to take care of them.

Q: Who was the DCM?

TAYLOR: There were two in my four years. Bob Flatin was the first one, who became Ambassador to Burundi, I think. Art Hughes was the second one, and I think he is still active. He became Ambassador to Yemen.

So, that was Pickering's style. There wasn't a whole lot of interplay between Pickering and the members of the staff, unless you were dealing with him on a schedule for a CODEL or something like that. He used you for specific missions, if you will, but on a day-to-day basis I could go for a week or two without ever having an exchange with him on anything. I detected he spent a lot of time on those issues that he felt were important to him in his particular portfolio and left a lot of the other kind of reporting to the section chiefs. But, he is a remarkable person and I think obviously the Foreign Service has recognized that given his meteoric career.

Q: You mentioned that the political officers, which you were one, dealt the Congressional visit a lot. Could you tell me what your impression was of the average Congressional delegation?

TAYLOR: First of all, as I said, there were so many of them. It was a dreadfully difficult workload to add that responsibility to what we were doing normally at a busy embassy like that. They would either be one person or a CODEL of 20. Senators usually came two or three and Congressman in much larger groups. I think I must have met 30 to 40 senators alone in that four year period and even more House members. They would be coming and asking very much the same questions. In most cases I felt they were not there on any real fact finding mission. They were there basically for domestic political reasons. They had to be seen visiting Israel because their particular constituency had a large Jewish vote. There was nothing unusual in that, it just happened to be that there were so many of them that felt that need to come out there.

One of the most notorious is Representative Charlie Wilson from Texas who probably doesn't have very many Jewish votes in his district, but he was notorious in the sense that he had girlfriends in Israel that he wanted to see. Of course, when he came it made it an easy CODEL because all you did was meet him at the airport with a car and a driver and he would take off to his various girlfriends. There would be no program. Then he would contact us when he was scheduled to depart to make sure he had the VIP treatment on his departure. Charlie Wilson was a real character. He is retiring now.

My overall impression of our Congressional leadership in Washington is not a very high one. There were members who were very, very shallow in their intellect and character and not too terribly deep in what they were thinking about most of the time. There were just a few who, in my opinion, really could be called exceptional individuals or political leaders. That is just a few, not very many. The Senators seemed to be more self-absorbed than the House members. I suppose that is because they considered themselves a member of an exclusive club. The extent of the arrogance toward control officers like me and other members of the embassy staff varied, but by and large it was fairly high. They considered us nothing but bag carriers and in many cases were extremely rude to me, and in exchanging notes with my other colleagues, it was not directed to me exclusively, it was the way they treated everybody. And on a couple of occasions I saw that treatment given to Tom Pickering, which I thought was, you know, he was a fairly senior guy, and for a Senator, no matter how high he might be...I mean, this is our representative to this country and he shouldn't be treated like they do me and my colleagues. But, Pickering on these occasions didn't react the way I felt he could have reacted given his particular status.

But, I would say the responsibility for handling CODELs was probably the worst aspect of that assignment to Tel Aviv. If we could have gotten rid of that it would have made the four years a much more pleasant stay. But, that is a fact of life. In the press recently there was a story about Senator Arlen Specter going out there and insisting on this and insisting on that and the infamous story of getting a squash partner and a place to play up in Jerusalem while he was there. I had Specter and that is exactly what he asked me to do, and, of course, I did it. Nothing changes.

One Senator from the State of Washington probably made the most positive impression as a human being and who didn't know the region very well, he was a first term Senator, and he wanted to learn about the area. So he had a broad program of various ministers to meet to get briefed and with some of the politicians up in the Knesset. He was serious minded. A very nice guy. He was all by himself except for a couple of staffers, so he didn't have any Senatorial colleagues with him and would listen when I gave him a briefing on who he was going to meet and what the issues would be, and maybe you would like to ask a couple of questions on this, that kind of approach. He resigned after one term. He said the Senate and Capitol Hill was a snake pit and he didn't want anything to do with it. So, I guess he was too nice. That was too bad, I thought we lost a good politician.

Q: What was your impression of the Israeli military officer corps? You were dealing with generals, etc.

TAYLOR: Extremely motivated. They sacrifice a lot by choosing to make the military a career. The pay is dreadful, very, very limited pay. Housing facilities are not very good. Everybody has to do military service at the age of 18. It is a universal approach. They stay three years and then at the end of this time you can get out and then you are a reservist until the age of 45 and yearly have to do a month's active service. That is a tremendous strain on the society to have to uproot everybody for an entire month every year. It costs that economy and society a great deal. Then, if you decide early on that you want to stay and become an officer and make it a career, then you know what sacrifices you are going to have to make. But, they are very highly motivated and highly skilled.

The elite, the cream of the entire IDF and the society as a whole, are your fighter pilots. Those are the guys who are the best trained, the best skilled and the most highly sought after guys to become fighter pilots. If you can become a fighter pilot, in the Israeli society you are on a higher plane, just above everybody else. That is more or less true of the Air Force in general. The Air Force is a very small organization, very elite minded and very highly motivated. So, even if you can't become a fighter pilot, if you can become a pilot of any kind that puts you in a category of its own. Then, further down the prestige ranks are your electronic people and other kinds of highly trained technicians in the Air Force. So, becoming the commander of the Israeli Air Force is quite an accomplishment for anyone. The ones I met and dealt with were really quite impressive guys. They were pilots early in their career and now at 45 or so were the commanders.

The ground forces are much, much larger and they have a lot of armored units and probably in the Western sense, I have heard this from our attaché guys, they are top heavy in terms of armor, but they feel that is the one way they maximize their limited man power by trying to maximize the firing power of each individual. So the armored units within the ground units are elites and they pick the best people coming out of the draft and assign them to the armored units.

And then you get further down, the artillery, that is a little less skilled. The infantry is probably the least skilled, and then you have your support units, usually staffed by your draftees. The Air Force is totally career, you have to enlist in it. The conscripts all go to the army.

Third on the list is the Navy which is extremely small, just a coastal patrol responsibility, and that, again, is a volunteer force, an all career force. If you go into the Navy that means you want to be in the Navy and make it a career. But, it doesn't have much clout politically, and doesn't get much of the Israeli budget and is constantly scraping for money. Naval installations are pretty poor in places. They don't even have a red carpet to give red carpet treatment for visitors, etc. It is kind of the runt of the litter, I would say. The guys in it are quite happy moving up and down the coast in their small patrol boats. They would come along beaches around Tel Aviv once in a while and you could see the guys with the binoculars looking at the girls on the beaches.

Q: Were you getting any impression from the military and the civilian population about Sharon and his reputation at the time you were there?

TAYLOR: By the time I got there he had resigned from the Ministry of Defense under real pressure because he was the one who was considered the architect of the Lebanon adventure and that had gone sour in so many ways that he had been sort of forced out. Begin had resigned in 1982 and Yitzhak Shamir had taken over and there had been elections just before I got there in 1984. It wasn't a majority for either the conservatives or labor party, so they formed a joint government called the National Unity government. Sharon was not in it. He had won a seat in the Knesset but he was not a member of that particular first government. He did eventually become a minister when the prime ministership switched from Peres to Shamir.

I remember taking a CODEL to meet Sharon. I think he was one of the minor ministers, minister of health, or something like that, but was no longer involved in the security forces, other than the fact that he was a former minister of defense and therefore had influence in the private circles of the government. The general view of him was that he was extremely right wing and very hard nosed, bull headed, if you will, individual and was, in effect, a real menace to any thoughts of negotiating peace of any kind. He became one of the leaders of the very right wing anti-negotiation bloc within the Knesset. Most of the people I knew and who were willing...well all of the civilians were willing to talk politics all of the time constantly, the military wouldn't participate in political discussions unless you got to be a very good friend...therefore, the ones we tended to gravitate towards were members of the middle or leftist liberal kind of viewpoint, and they thought he was a very danger and had very little respect for him. They thought, obviously that he was a hero in 1967 and 1973, in those two wars, but they blamed him personally for a lot of the problems caused by the Lebanon thing and there were still casualties, every week more and more casualties from the Lebanese adventure. So, the people I knew best didn't have a lot of regard for him, but they knew that he had a lot of influence in the Knesset and that he might be able to exert that influence at some point. I guess he has been eclipsed by Benjamin Netanyahu, the current leader of the opposition. I don't know what happened to Sharon, maybe he is just too old and they want to move along to another generation of leadership.

Q: You talked before about the pressures of living in Israel, can you talk a little about the social side for you and your wife of being American representatives in this highly political, highly charged small town?

TAYLOR: Well, in the general sense social life was extremely busy. The Israelis loved to go to parties all the time...well, not just parties, but to go places and stop by and visit, go to theaters, etc. So, there was constant contact with Israelis willing to talk. A reticent Israeli is an oxymoron. They are certainly willing to offer their views, opinions and prejudices, if you will, at all times. So, we had invitations four or five times a week. A night out was the norm, except Friday night, of course, when all entertaining closed down. Although, some of our really liberal friends would be willing to come over on a Friday night without any problem.

Q: Did you find that you had to get out of the country, too?

TAYLOR: We would have liked to more than we did, but nobody in the embassy could get away as frequently as every three months. But, yes, by the time seven or eight months rolled around you were in such a frazzled state that you had to go somewhere to depressurize. TWA served Tel Aviv and we had an Israeli local employee who was sort of the liaison at the airport, the guy who met and greeted and made arrival plans for various people. He was so good at his job and had such good relations with the TWA people that whenever an embassy person would be traveling to Europe or to the United States, you would probably get first class all the way. The lowest you would go would be business class.

We made it to France a number of times and back to the States as much as we could to get out and enjoy what we could outside the region. But, yes, it would have been nice to do it more often, but we couldn't.

Q: Before we leave Israel, were there any major events during the time you were there that might be worth talking about?

TAYLOR: I also had the terrorism portfolio. You may recall there were a couple of hijackings, one in 1985, the hijacking of a TWA plane in Beirut and the Achille Lauro happened during my watch too. It was hijacked by Palestinians and they killed an American citizen, Leon Klinghoffer, executing him for just being Jewish. That was floating off the coast of Israel at the time and finally put into Egypt and that was the famous incident when they were being flown from Egypt to, I think, Libya and our guys intercepted them in the air and forced the plane to land in Sicily. That operation was a good one.

The Israelis, although they never did admit it, mounted one of their famous raids on Palestinian headquarters in Tunis during the time I was there by ship, by one of their fast patrol ships. They took a commando team all the way from Israel to the Tunisian coast after dark. The team made its way to the residence of the PLO leader who was suspected by the Israelis to be responsible for some terrorist incidents against Israelis. They got into his house and killed him and a couple of other household members and got back out and all the way home before anybody suspected what they were doing.

You asked my assessment of the Israeli IDF capability, I think they can do those kind of things very, very well. Sometimes they don't think through the potential political ramifications of some of their security operations, but they can do it. If they are given orders to do something like that, they can do it.

I mentioned Uri Lubrani earlier, he had a funny story. He must be 65 years old now. This had to do with the famous rescue in Entebbe, Uganda of hostages back in 1976. He said, even at that point he was too old to get into this commando business, but he had been stationed in Uganda for a number of years, not as an ambassador but as their head of the mission, they didn't have an embassy there. He knew the area and certainly knew the Entebbe airport and the surrounding area. So, he was sort of told by the guys organizing that rescue mission that he was coming along. He wasn't going to land with the commandos but he stayed in one of the C-130s flying above the airport sort of telling the guys on the ground what they would find...if you turn right in this corridor this is what you are going to see, etc. He was also the bankroller because they had to land in Nairobi to refuel these C-130s on the way back. He said it was funny because he had this huge wad of dollar bills to pay for the gas. So they landed early in the morning in Nairobi after getting out of Uganda, and there wasn't much going on. They just got off and started wandering around looking for somebody to pay for the gas. He said they found somebody and they pumped the fuel. I think there were three planes involved. He asked how much cash they wanted for this and the guy told him something and he paid him and they flew back to Israel. He said that was a funny operation. He said everyone was pretty tense at the time because they didn't know that it was going to be as successful as it was. There was only one fellow killed and he was the older brother of Netanyahu. So, again, they can do things like that very successfully.

Q: You left there when?

LOUISE TAYLOR
Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
Tel Aviv (1984-1988)

Ms. Taylor was born and raised in Illinois and educated at Wellesley College, George Washington University and Boston University. After joining the Foreign Service of USIA, Ms. Taylor served in Washington and abroad in the field of Cultural and Information. Her foreign posts include Moscow, Kabul, Tel Aviv and Rabat. She also served in Washington as USIA Desk Officer for Afghanistan/Pakistan and for South Asia and as Policy Officer for Eastern Europe and Newly Independent States. Ms. Taylor was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: Having dealt with that, in a way, did you thirst to get into the more active world?

TAYLOR: Yes, so going to Israel, where, first of all, Sam Lewis and then the incomparable Tom Pickering were my two ambassadors. I had never had an appointee ambassador before. In Moscow, of course, Walter Stoessel I guess was an appointee but nobody considered him to be. In Afghanistan, Ted Elliott and after him Spike Dubs, who was assassinated while we were there, were all career people. So, getting back to Israel, where the issues were truly serious ones, getting back to the Middle East by assignment to Israel, was very welcome to me. I wasn't at all sorry to leave. My sister-in-law just can't understand it. "You've worked in all these difficult places and then you spend 10 months on Western Europe and you don't even go serve there. We wanted to come visit you."

Q: They don't understand the adrenaline rush.

TAYLOR: No, they don't.

Q: I was in Personnel and people looked at me... You could always get your next assignment. So, in 1969, I appeared in Saigon as consul general right in the middle of the war. But I had to see the reality.

TAYLOR: Right. I understand what you're talking about.

Q: It becomes so much a part of American politics. Having served in other places, did you have any feeling about the Arab-Israeli issue before you got there?

TAYLOR: Oh, yes. For one thing, I've always been a student of politics and current events. For another thing, having lived in Afghanistan and served there and then worked on those issues when I came back to Washington since South Asia was part of the NEA family, I was part of the NEA family. You went to the NEA country team. Of course, the Arab-Israeli issue was pretty dominant there. Plus, my husband, who is a political officer, has always had as one of his most compelling interests the Arab-Israeli issue. So, yes, I didn't feel new to the issues when I got there. However, I'll never forget Sam Lewis saying... He was the ambassador when we first arrived. He was on his last year in Israel. That meant eight years for him as ambassador to Israel. I don't think anyone had ever served that long. Sam and Sally were known as the King and Queen of Israel at that point. I'll never forget Sam at one of his farewell parties saying that after the first year or so in Israel, he thought he pretty much understood what the issues were and how it was all going to work out and what was important and what he needed to think about. Then three or four years into it, he was beginning to have his doubts as to whether he understood what was going on and whether he really had it right or not. Then five or six or seven years into it, he really thought, "I don't have a clue as to what's going on here." As he left, he said, "I have no idea." But he and Sally, of course, are just devoted to Israel and still spend a lot of time there, although they still live here in McLean. They still go back to Israel a lot. Every time I see him, I remind him of that. I felt the same way. After four years there, I knew the country intimately. I had traveled everywhere. I had talked to everybody at all levels of society and dealt with so many different organizations and institutions. It became more and more complex and more and more wrapped up – like they say about the Soviet Union: a riddle inside an enigma inside a mystery. That's very much Israel. So, I certainly hit the ground there without a huge learning curve except that the learning curve goes on forever.

Q: For a long time, Israel was seen as "brave, plucky little Israel holding its own against these uncouth Arabs." But that was beginning to change, particularly after having invaded Lebanon. This was before you arrived. And Sabra and Shatila, the massacres there.

TAYLOR: And the election of Begin.

Q: And the election of Begin and with Sharon the bombardment of Beirut. The bloom was somewhat off the rose by that time. Had that affected you? Did you go there thinking you were melding in or bonding with the Israeli spirit?

TAYLOR: That had already happened in a way. When I went to Afghanistan after my two years in Moscow, the Agency recognized that I was still a junior officer with very little normal USIA experience because Moscow was so unique. So, they sent me to Iran and Israel for about a month TDY in both places. In the mid-'70s, those two posts were our model posts: Iran (This was before the fall of the Shah) and Israel. That was where the USIA was pouring in tons of money and we had first class programs, huge staffs. We were teaching English language to 20,000 students in Tehran in those days. The staff of American Foreign Service officers was 12-15. There were branch posts all over. So, the Agency said, "Well, give her a dose of these two places and then send her to Afghanistan and she can set up the same kind of thing there" and I did. So, I spent a wonderful, interesting month in Tehran, where my husband had served before we met. He was there in the late '60s. Then I went to Israel. This was right after Sadat visited Israel. The electricity was in the air. It was palpable. You would ride in a bus or a taxi, walk on the streets, go in the stores, and people were enthusiastic and excited and talking and jabbering – of course, Israelis jabber all the time – and it was all energetic and positive. I came back from Israel to Kabul, where we had only just started our tour, and I said to Jim, "We have to go to Israel. I don't care when we go. We have to go there. It is the most exciting place with the most fermenting ideas I have ever seen. I have never seen anything like this place." So, that was '77.

We got there in '84. As you just said, so many things had happened in the intervening seven years. The bloom was off the rose. The peace had not turned out for the Israelis or for the Arabs or the Palestinians the way anybody thought or hoped it would. Israelis were traveling to Egypt as tourists, but Egyptians weren't coming to Israel. The Israelis were, they thought, reaching out. The Egyptians were not responding. There had been skirmishes. What was going on in Lebanon was coloring and tainting all of this. Then there was the matter of the issue of Begin. Very much the bloom was off the rose by '84 when I got there. By 1988 when I left, I would characterize Israel as totally polarized as a society. It was 50/50: those who felt there should be all out warfare in the Middle East and "Let's finish the Arabs and the Palestinians once and for all" and those were on the "Peace now" side. There was nobody in the middle. I think it may very well be that way now, although I think the "peace now" side is eroding somewhat. But it was heartbreaking to see this. Although the Israeli energy was still there, it wasn't all positive energy anymore, whereas in 1977 when I first witnessed it, it was dynamic, positive energy. There is an energy among the Israelis which is phenomenal. I've never seen it anywhere else in the world. A little bit among the Russians the characteristic is similar, but not to the degree that the Israelis have it. But they were getting to the point – and not just the intellectual intelligencia, but almost every level of society that could afford it – they would leave Israel every three or four months. My Israeli friends would say to me, "Louise, how can you stand it? We have to get out of here." They'd go to Cyprus or Italy. They would take some trip for two or three or four weeks because the tension was just unbearable. The pressure of everyday life in Israel, some of it good, but not all of it good.

Q: You're not talking about terrorists or a military threat. You're talking about the internal...

TAYLOR: I'm talking about the way Israelis conduct their life and run their country and run their own personal lives. It's all mixed up together. The country is their life. The life is their country. Of course, there was a small amount of terrorism increasing. The Intifada started in '87 before we left. So, the specter of terrorism, the uncertainty of the future, those Israelis with children with obligatory military service for both boys and girls at the age of 18, all of that was weighing very heavily on their minds. So, it was all mixed up together. They live this extraordinarily energetic pace of life. They expend a lot of energy whether they're going to the grocery store to buy their vegetables or going to a political meeting. They recognize this in themselves. They will say to me, "We exhaust ourselves in the process of worry, in the process of discussion, in the process of argument." An Israeli who buys a cucumber has to have at least a 20 minute discussion, debate, argument, and then make up before the cucumber is exchanged. This ultimately is exhausting. My Israeli friends are probably my best friends in the world, but they exhaust me. I told them that. They said, "Yes, we know. We exhaust ourselves." So, there was a bit of an edge there. The theater was becoming very political. Some of it was very "peace now" oriented and some of it was very much in the opposite extreme. It permeated everything. You couldn't get up in the morning... In five minutes, the whole situation, political and social, that surrounded you would seep into your mind.

Q: Did you find that you were being tested or rated on your support of Israel, particularly when you first got there, by Israelis?

TAYLOR: I've never asked myself that question, but I would say that Israelis very much wanted you to admire their country and to support them. But a fair sector of Israeli society that at that time was thinking much broader than that and understanding that an accommodation with the Palestinians was in their own interest. To the extent that they wanted you to admire and support them, they also tolerated and understood when you would raise issues of Israeli actions in the West Bank – for example, the settlements. You could have long, drawn out, open discussion about that. A huge number of Israelis, more than 50% at that time, were adamantly opposed to the settlements expansions. They wouldn't base their friendship with you on whether or not you were an ardent Zionist. No diplomat ever goes around criticizing the country in which they're posted, so that wouldn't happen either. But I think it was clear to my friends and associates and the people with whom I worked that I admired a great deal of Israeli society. So, that also meant that I could be critical and honestly critical.

Q: You were there as cultural affairs officer [CAO]. What does that mean when being assigned to Israel?

TAYLOR: I think the Israelis looked at that position as one of the most important positions in the embassy. I always had to laugh at the fact that there were people far more important than I was in the embassy, but there are a couple of countries in the world – Morocco, where I also served, is another one – where the cultural attaché takes on a huge meaning. It opens doors. I was a dinner partner of Shimon Peres on several occasions. I brought Saul Bellow to the country as a program paid for by USIA. Because of that, I traveled around the highest literary, social, and political circles in Israel. So, the invitations that I would get and the entrée that I had because of the fact that the Israelis regarded this position and the title as important... I would say that the importance that many European countries - and Israel considers itself to be a European country – place on the cultural attaché position is far greater than the importance that we in the United States place on the cultural attaché position. This has been a source of pain to me. I've spent my life largely as a cultural affairs officer. Dick Arndt is sort of the leading proponents of the value of a cultural diplomacy policy. You'll be with him for the next 10 years listening to what he thinks about the U.S. government's lack of a cultural policy. But I was in a very good position in the embassy because of my role despite the fact that I was not a junior member of the embassy but I was not the most senior. I got around about as much as anybody did by virtue of the position that I occupied and the doors that it just naturally opened to me.

Q: I was thinking of the influence of Jews that came out of Europe during the '20s and '30s and even today on our culture here in the United States in movies, literature, music, painting, you name it. It's completely disproportionate to the numbers. I've been looking for Israeli movies and novels and so on and maybe they just don't get translated. Whatever there is, I haven't noticed much coming out of Israel that seems to translate itself.

TAYLOR: You have to look for five or six leading Israeli authors who are translated into English and translated very well. I read them mostly when I was there in Israel. But I've looked for their stuff here and it's not very prominently displayed. Some Israeli writers actually publish in the United States in English, but the better Israeli writers are writing in Hebrew and they make a point to write in Hebrew. Even though these particular people I'm thinking of are not nationalists – well, some of them are – it is a nationalist, almost patriotic thing to do even though they could write in English. I'm thinking of fiction. The translations that I've read have been excellent. But it's a small group. You're right. I'd like to think about that a little bit.

Q: I'm also thinking of movies. When I think of the dynamism that came out of the most deplorable conditions in Central Europe and these people came in and essentially created the American movie business. I can't think of how many novels I've read about being Jewish and growing up in New York and Brooklyn.

TAYLOR: Creativity and creation are certainly going on in Israel. Unfortunately, I didn't speak Hebrew well enough to go to the Hebrew-speaking theater. Of all the languages I've studied I found Hebrew a very difficult language. But my Israeli friends said there were some exiting things happening in the Hebrew-speaking theater politically. But what is certainly not absent from Israeli life is artistry. Whether they are creating in the sense of writing original music or movie scripts or fiction, I'd like to think about that and I'll comment another time. But in terms of developing as artists, there is no other country that on a per capita basis is as dynamic or as fertile as Israel. Music is, of course, the number one thing. They also have three or four major dance companies of major quality. My personal view is that they're lacking somewhat in the fine arts, painting and sculpture, but there is a lot of people working in it. As cultural affairs officer, I got so many invitations to exhibitions and opening nights that I could have done nothing but that. Of course, if I went to one, I had to go to them all because you had to show up and wave the flag. So, there is a lot of dynamic interaction there and a lot of creativity. I'm not sure they're the most successful in the fine arts realm as they are in other realms. Poetry. Again, I didn't speak good enough Hebrew to understand poetry, but there are a lot of people writing poetry. The arts are very much alive and well. Israeli movies? I don't think they have the resources to make them.

Q: Maybe not, but when you think about the Italians right after war and yet they turned out a whole set of works that is still resonating.

TAYLOR: Right. This is a question that's always intrigued me. Maybe some media are more suitable for some countries to deal in. The Germans are not really great painters, but they're wonderful musicians and writers.

Q: And they make lousy movies, particularly since the German Jews left. The German Jews, in my mind, their departure or their killing took the salt out of the German soul. It had been such a flourishing culture. Hitler's great contribution was to essentially destroy German culture. A lot of people would argue with that.

TAYLOR: A lot of people would argue with that, I think.

The two Israeli brothers who write with Ruth Kempala Jabar and do all the film scripts are working in the United States, not in Israel, to do these movies.

Q: What was your feeling as you were dealing with the cultural side of the religious community? I'm thinking of the solidly Orthodox.

TAYLOR: Well, I suppose, to be self-critical, I could have led my program more in the direction of trying to reach out to these people, but I don't think they would have been receptive in any way. Even had I been male rather than female, had I been Jewish rather than not, I really don't think there is an opening to that group. I think it's a very closed group. Most Israelis have the same view. They're a little nation unto themselves in a way. So, to the extent that it might be a criticism of the way I led my program, I didn't really develop any program to target that group. The embassy as a whole didn't really target that group much other than the political section, where we had one or two officers dealing with internal Israeli politics. My husband was not one of them. We had one Jewish officer, who is actually the ambassador to Israel right now, Dan Kurtzer. Dan spoke fluent Hebrew. I think he had pretty good contacts. He could go to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and talk to the few representatives from that group who were there. I think he had some entrée into their circles. But largely, they would not accept invitations from us. Maybe we should have cultivated them more.

Q: One always looks at this, but there are groups that really do stand aside and that you can't get to. Particularly very orthodox religions, including Islam, the Greek Orthodox Church at a certain level...

TAYLOR: I worked with Joe Sullivan, who was ambassador to Angola and has gone on to Zimbabwe, who was also in the political section as an internal political officer, to put together an IV [International Visitor] group of four parliamentarians, members of the Knesset – one from the Labor Party, one from Likud, one Arab-Israeli (also a member of the Knesset) and one member of a conservative religious party but not the Lubavitchs (This fellow was pretty conservative, but he wasn't totally radical). We thought this would be a good experiment. The Labor Party guy, Hayeem Ramon, whom you see in the paper all the time, and the Arab-Israeli were already good friends. They had known each other for years. The Likud person who became part of this delegation was a very moderate, easy to work with person. He was a member of the Likud, but he realized that the Likud and Labor had to work together or the whole thing would fall apart or become polarized. So, the three of them were pretty much able... They became very good friends on this 30 day trip. The idea was that the four would come back and this would have a ripple effect through the Knesset or through their parties saying, "Look, we went to the United States. We saw these wonderful things. We saw the way they work out partisan politics. But we also got to know each other in the process." That was the secondary rationale for putting this group together. But the person from the extreme right religious party – and I forget what party it was right now – stayed apart from the other three during the whole trip. He evoked certain Shabbat regulations in the view of the group unnecessarily in order to extract himself from other group activities. He created a disturbance in Boston when he went off on his own and got into serious trouble in the nighttime district of Boston – let me leave it at that. When the other three fellows went out and had dinner and maybe they went to a movie and went back to this hotel, this guy went off on his own... Because of his religious strictures, he had refused to accept travelers cheques the way most of our international visitors travel. He had insisted on having all of his per diem in cash. Because of this sort of rumble he got into in the shadier side of South Boston, he ended up without enough money. It was sort of a funny story that of the four guys who would get in trouble of this nature in the United States, the one who was the most openly religious and holier than thou was the one who did so. To the credit of the other three guys, that story never got back to Israel. This person would have been banished by his party had they known what his behavior was like while he was here. So, it was sort of an interesting story on human behavior.

Q: What were we trying to do? How did you see your job?

TAYLOR: Not vis a vis this particular...

Q: No.

TAYLOR: I was trying to consolidate the excellent relationships that the embassy already had with a variety of institutions around the country whether they were academic, press, think tank, or artistic institutions. I was trying to reach out to other institutions beyond that who did not know the United States. There is a surprising number of Israelis who don't. Particularly outside Haifa, Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, and the immediate suburban areas, there are other institutions. Secondary teacher training institutions, for example. I felt that there was a very narrow-minded perspective being developed in some of these teacher training institutions in towns with new immigrants, for example. It was hard for us to work with them. Again, I didn't speak fluent Hebrew. In some of these places, they spoke no English. That was a surprise to me. I was trying to develop relationships for the embassy through my programs with institutes on that level. These would be organizations which weren't entirely sure they thought the Arab-Israeli peace process was a good thing. They would be organizations which probably would support the Likud at that point. I was trying to reach out to them. Third, to the extent that I could, and I was probably more successful at this, I developed a list of – and it had to be a representative list; it couldn't be all-inclusive – organizations which were made up largely of what Israelis called "Second Israel." These would be the people from North Africa, the Yemeni Jews, sort of the second, third, and fourth wave of immigration.

Q: How about the Falasha from Ethiopia?

TAYLOR: They were just beginning to come to Israel. They were really at the stage of being trained in Hebrew by the opons, the language teaching institutions. They were just really learning how to live in a society like that. Their numbers were quite small. I met them because at the opons that I went to to learn Hebrew, I met some of them and saw their dignity. But I also saw that they were a little bit outside what we were trying to do at the embassy at that time. I don't know how they've developed at this point.

The great Russian migration had not yet started. That would be very interesting to be part of. They brought all their musicians, chemists, scientists, psychiatrists... There weren't enough professional level positions for these people. Subsequently, they became gardeners and laborers. It's been a terrible problem for Israel, which practically doubled its population within 15-20 years.

So, that was the third thing I was trying to do.

Fourthly, I was the first CAO to have specially congressionally committed funds for Arab-Israeli scholarships and for a Gazan program. I was the CAO who started both of those programs, not entirely successfully at first because it was hard to find qualified people. You interview Israeli graduate students for the Fulbright program and they're all going to Harvard, Yale, Stanford, the University of Chicago, the University of Virginia, the big 10, some great school. You interview an Israeli Arab and their educational levels are so vastly different because of the resources available to them that it's very hard in good conscience to select an applicant. When I started the program – things may have changed by now – it was hard to find an Israeli Arab who had the appropriate educational level. The schools available to them were substandard and inferior to the schools for Israeli Jews so it was hard to find candidates who could have prospered and thrived in an American university environment. Nevertheless, through the Fulbright Commission, we worked very hard to identify at least three or four a year from the Israeli Arab community. Similarly, we had a program of special money separate from the Fulbright Commission dedicated to Gazans. I had never even been to Gaza in my first two and a half years in Israel. All of a sudden, this money came our way. There were only three of us who worked on this program – another American, who is now consul general in Bombay, an American woman married to a Palestinian, and then we had a Palestinian in Gaza itself to help us set this up. The last year I was in Israel was the first year of this program. We interviewed 10 or 12 would-be candidates. They were all in agricultural sciences. We had money for more than we picked, but we felt we hadn't gotten the qualifications that we needed and we didn't want to send people off to fail. We felt that would be worse. So, we took some of the money and put them in intensive English language in Israel for a year or made it possible for them to get their English language skills up to a level where they could study in the United States at the undergraduate level. So, those were the four things I was trying to do.

Q: I think this is a good place to stop. We've covered living in Israel and the programs you were dealing with.

TAYLOR: One of the joys of living in Israel that should be at least touched on at least when we were there was to travel around the country and see what the history of this place really means to people, where some Americans take a look at it and say, "This is just a desolate rock. Why does anybody feel as passionate about this as three major religions in the world do?" Jim and I were both extraordinarily busy. When I left Israel, I was exhausted and I was only 37 or so years old. But we did make the time to travel around. We went to almost every major archeological site.

Q: Also, you might mention next time about any influence that the American Jewish community in the United States had that you saw on both the politics and your work and the embassy and how one dealt with this.

TAYLOR: I don't know that I'm the best one to comment on that.

Q: I've asked other people, too.

TAYLOR: It was huge.

Q: It was huge, so you don't want to let that go.

Today is November 5, 2001. Louise, you are cultural affairs officer in Tel Aviv from when to when?

TAYLOR: That was 1984-1988.

Q: While you weren't on the political side-

TAYLOR: In Israel, everything is political.

Q: What about the effect of American Jewish influence on what was being done as far as you saw it?

TAYLOR: Well, the embassy was a very integrated institution. We all worked together for the same goals. What is now called the mission performance plan at time for us in USIA was called the country plan. Everything that we planned out as a professional activity in our master planning document, the country plan, was designed to reinforce and support what the embassy as a whole was doing in its mission performance plan. So, despite the fact that I wore a hat called the cultural affairs officer, much, if not everything, that we did in the state of Israel was political coming at it from different angles. I would say that one of the major political activities that I undertook as the cultural affairs officer – and I touched on this the last time we spoke – was trying to reach out to both Israeli Arabs as well as to Gazans in the academic exchange program under the Fulbright rubric. There was money authorized by the Congress as a result of the Intifada, which was just beginning to gain momentum while I was in Israel, to be made available to Arab citizens of Israel as well as to a beginning, fledgling, program on the West Bank. This particular program, although it represented a diversion of resources from the Jewish community to the Arab-Israeli community and then beyond into the West Bank, was widely supported by American Jewish groups who were aware of it. Just as Israeli society was becoming polarized during those years of the '80s, the American Jewish community was becoming polarized from what I understood from reading the American press and talking to American Jewish friends who traveled to Israel. There were those who felt that the peace now groups or the groups that were organizing to bring Arabs and Israelis closer together, was the most important thing on their political agenda. There was the other side of the Jewish American spectrum which felt that the fight between the Jews and the Arabs was a fight to the death, that settlements should be expanded, that a literal if not a figurative wall or the other way around, should be built between Israel proper and the Palestinian state or the Arab state. If your question was, was there interference or undue influence in what I did, I would say nothing of the sort happened in any of the programs that I was involved in. In the broader sense, the embassy, was reacting to American foreign and domestic policy and taking its lead from Washington in carrying out the administration's foreign policy toward the Middle East. That obviously reflected whatever domestic political influence American Jewish thought and opinion had on the White House, as happens in any American administration. We have a situation now where American and Jewish public opinion is probably being quite reserved and restrained. Just as we are asking the Israelis and the Palestinians to be reserved and restrained right now to the degree that they can in their ever escalating back and forth and retaliation for an event. From what I read and hear in the press, there has been very little said by American Jewish public opinion right now. As the Intifada was arising in the '80s, you had in Israel a coalition government which represented the phenomenon that Israeli opinion was eventually becoming polarized. I would say it was a 50/50 split by the time I left in 1988 between those who felt that an accommodation should be made with the Palestinians and the Arabs and those who felt literally that it was a fight to the death and that Israeli security depended on being as strong and as tough and as unrelenting with the Arab population as possible. Ambassador Pickering was our ambassador for three of the four years that I was there. For the first year that I was there, it was Sam Lewis. Both of them being consummate diplomats. They were extremely careful to represent the foreign policy that the White House handed to them, but at the same time in their normal everyday course of carrying out their duties, responsibilities, and contacts, they had a tremendous amount of contact and relationship with American Jewish leaders who came to Israel all the time. Every day, there was someone of importance from the American Jewish community. The embassy always greeted and received these people cordially, wanting to hear their point of view. Attempts were frequently made to mix them up with members from all sides of the Israeli political spectrum so that American Jewish leaders themselves would hear what a wide variety of thought there was on Middle East politics from the players themselves. I would say that on the one hand, I know that people feel that American Jewish influence on U.S. foreign policy in the Middle East has been overly persuasive. I think that a lot went on during those years that the Intifada was growing that probably caused great anxiety among the American Jewish population, particularly our continuing outreach to various Arab populations. Yet I think they managed to say to themselves that, after all, this is a mature world. We must acknowledge that there are other demands and other sides to this story. I think the American Jewish public opinion was maturing during this whole process and continues to mature. There are the extremists on both ends and it's hard to really talk with them. But there is a huge body of opinion in the middle. Most who traveled to Israel with whom we had contact tend to be of what I would classify the more liberal persuasion, saying that we had to make accommodations. That not only the Israeli government and the American government but non-governmental movements and groups had to continue to expand contacts and bring people together. Much of the work that I did as cultural affairs officer was designed to bring Arabs and Israelis together whether it was through an International Visitors program, where the political section and the cultural section together would craft a group of Arab Israelis, Jewish Israelis, and if we could, put other Arabs from other parts of the world together in this group so that on neutral turf – the United States – they would meet, they would discuss, they would get to know each other. There were many programs. There are to this day programs of that type that are designed to bring Arabs and Israelis together. Some of them are funded by the U.S. government. Some of them are private spin-offs.

Q: Was there any attempt to do something to persuade Egyptians, for example, to come to Israel? Did we get involved with your counterpart in Cairo? It's been a cold peace.

TAYLOR: Yes, it has been, and Israelis were very resentful of that. After the burst of enthusiasm during the Sadat visit to Israel, Israelis did begin to flock to Egypt – at least relatively speaking. They went as tourists. They went as professionals, particularly archeologists and ethnographers and historians and social scientists would go for professional conferences and meetings. They had been barred from such meetings and conferences for years because they couldn't get visas to travel to the Arab world. So, I would say this initial enthusiastic outburst from the liberal spectrum of the Israeli Jewish population was met with what they felt, even the most liberal among them, was almost an insult since the Egyptians failed to respond. I recall being involved in several attempts with my counterparts in the embassy in Cairo to try to organize some professional conferences that would bring everybody together in one country or another. Those efforts eventually broke down at least during the years that I was there. You would have to talk to someone who was there after I left in 1988 to see whether or not there was eventually enough trust on both sides to hold these joint conferences under U.S. government auspices in one country or the other. We always found the best solution was to take people off campus. By “off campus,” I mean put them in a group and take them to the United States.

Q: Which wasn't really an overly aggressive problem.

TAYLOR: No, only on a very small scale. In a group project where you have Arabs and Israelis traveling together for a month, you would find people on both sides of the issue coming back enthusiastic about their new friendships and their new relationships and how they were going to keep these things going. On a very small, incrementally expanding basis, scholars did go back and forth, particularly in what I would call “non-threatening” fields. I had one year of leave without pay in Israel when we went there from '84-'85. My position had not yet opened and so I took the archeology course at Tel Aviv University, which was just one of the best courses I've ever taken anywhere. In those days, the Israeli archeologists were just feeling so oppressed that they couldn't get out into the Arab world where all these wonderful archeological sites were. They could go to Egypt, but in '84, that was about the only Arab country they could go to. Morocco, but that had less archeological interest for them. Where they really wanted to get their hands dirty was in Jordan and Syria. We, of course, could travel to those places. I took a trip to Jordan once. When I came back, my archeology professors wanted to see all my photographs and know what the Jordanian archeologists had to say. This kind of scholarship and curiosity kept Israelis going even though the Egyptians didn't return in large numbers and even though the Israelis were disappointed in the Egyptian ambassador to Israel, whose name was Basieri. They felt he wasn't doing enough when he went back to his government to say, “Look, we've got to have organized travel groups of Egyptians coming to Israel.” But the Israelis kept the momentum going for a while. I don't know what's happened in recent times along those lines.

One of the best trips that we took was with the first joint business setup between Israelis and Egyptians. It was a small travel company in which Israeli Jews and Egyptians had invested. It was a small company that had about 10 small Mercedes buses that could go into the desert. They had huge wheels. They were wider than most buses and sort of squat and ugly looking. They could go anywhere. We went with a group of only 12 people – this was one of the beauties of this travel company – and we had an Egyptian guide and a Jewish guide. Both of them were representatives of the company and they both knew the archeological sites. We went to the Sinai. We went to Santa Catarina. We camped out at the foot of Santa Catarina. We climbed up Jabli Massag at Mount Moses and Mount Sinai at dawn the way everybody does. We had not only our Egyptian guide and our Jewish Israeli guide, but we had a Bedouin tracker with us. He was invaluable when the Mercedes bus got stuck in the sand any number of times. He knew exactly where to find materials to get us out. But this was one of the first examples of a joint project and business investment of any kind and it happened to be tourism. At dinner, these guys would cook these wonderful meals out in the middle of the desert. They had known each other for a long time, the Egyptian and the Israeli, and they would joke about the fact that, well, if another war comes along, they'll be shooting at each other the next time around. So, that was a wonderful experience. That was an example of what could happen if people were open-minded and good spirited in years to come.

Q: Were there problems of mistreatment of Palestinians, particularly in the West Bank and Gaza, by the Israeli authorities? Did we turn the other cheek to these things or not?

TAYLOR: I have no idea what went on inside an Israeli police station. Lots of others have commented on this. The Palestinians have certainly said that Israeli police used unnecessary force. Israelis would say in unending tit for tat that they were dealing with terrorists who had just blown up a bus of schoolchildren. It's hard for us as Americans to comment on that in any moral sense. One thing that went on that was probably inexcusable – and the Israelis didn't have to do it for security reasons, but they did – was sort of a passive oppression rather than actively mistreating and abusing people. They would close the borders between Gaza and Israel proper after one of these attacks or incidents. It would mean that tens of thousands of Gazans could not go to work for sometimes weeks. Usually, it was days, but sometimes it was weeks. This meant a loss of critical income for these people. Again, you would have to ask someone else in another agency what the Israeli tactics in the police stations were; if there were demonstrations in the Arab side of Jerusalem, did the Israelis use excessive force in breaking those up? I think sometimes yes, just as sometimes happens with our own police forces. I think that they are a civilized people and I think that they do have a rule of law that they try to observe. When things got out of hand, it usually was as a result of some horrendous terrorist attack having happened in the days or weeks previously. I think Israeli is a very well ordered society. People are extremely emotional. But they're also very well educated. They are an extremely well educated society. One of the things I loved about the Israeli military – and my husband dealt with them a lot because he was the political-military officer and I'd find myself seated at dinner next to a general who would be one of the most decorated war heroes of Israel, but he would also have a Ph.D. in philosophy and would be a concert level pianist and then raise chickens on a kibbutz on top of that. There was one particular person who combined all of those qualities. I used to enjoy talking with him immensely. So, the Israeli military mind is a multifaceted mind. They certainly know a lot about humanity and suffering. All that said, I have to suppose that press reports of Israelis overextending their police forces in some of the Arab villages that they controlled or in Gaza are probably correct.

Q: What about the Intifada? How did that affect you and how did you observe it?

TAYLOR: De jure, it affected the embassy community because the regional security officer [RSO] would feel compelled to issue travel advisories and such. If one had houseguests, you would have to advise your houseguests not to go to the old city of Jerusalem. Of course, nobody paid any attention to that and we went to the old city in Jerusalem, to the architectural centers, to the souqs and the bazaars. You paid attention to what was going on around you. You certainly wouldn't go there the day after some cataclysmic event had happened. You had to use your head. Hebron was one city that was so volatile, particularly the last year we were there as the Intifada gained momentum and rock throwing escalated into more overt mob violence. I spent less time in Hebron than I would have liked. It was a place I never got to know. There were some really dreadful events back and forth between what I would have to call right-wing Israeli settlers who were just fanatical about their use of certain pieces of land within the city itself and extremely agitated Palestinians and Israeli Arabs on the other side. Hebron did become a very dangerous place.

I think that the whole level of violence there has escalated sharply since I left. My activities were never really curtailed in any way. There were kibbutzim in the north that I used to visit. They lived way in these wilderness places up on the Lebanese border. They did have rocket attacks from Lebanon from time to time. I was up there once when it was suspected that there would be an attack. So, we curtailed some of the business appointments that we had up there. But I always felt very safe in Israel. I felt much more unsafe on the roads. The driving is atrocious and you take your life in your hands on the Israeli highways. But as far as the actual violence was concerned, as long as you used your head and didn't deliberately go into a provocative area when you knew there was trouble. For example, Nazareth was wonderful to visit, but there were times when you knew it was just wiser to stay away. On the other hand, some of the security advisories just went way overboard, as they always do.

Q: They tend to because it's a matter of covering your ass.

TAYLOR: Yes.

Q: Did you find that having our embassy in Tel Aviv and the seat of government being up in Jerusalem was a bother to you? Did it make much difference in your business?

TAYLOR: Again, Israel is a very small country. In my business as a cultural affairs officer or a USIA person in general, our modus operandi is to get around. We traveled all the time. And there was the fact that the embassy was an extremely unpleasant place to work and is one of the worst embassy buildings in the world... It's just the pits. Everybody will tell you that.

Q: What's the problem?

TAYLOR: Physically, it's just the grungiest, grimmest, dankest place I have ever worked – and I worked in Moscow. In Moscow, there was a reason why that was a miserable, horrible place at the time. But there was no reason for this in Tel Aviv.

Q: Unless everybody was waiting for the shoe to drop.

TAYLOR: Everybody was supposedly waiting for the move to Jerusalem, so the Department never put any money into the embassy. To fix up one would be a big political statement. It would mean "We're staying here for a long time." So, the place just crumbled away. It really was just an awful, awful place to work. So, I didn't mind getting out. There were a few key ministries located in Tel Aviv. The Ministry of Defense, for example, where my husband spent a lot of time, was in Tel Aviv. So, he was not one of those who trekked up the hill to Jerusalem all the time. I remember someone asking Ambassador Pickering about this strange scenario where all the ministries are in Jerusalem and the American embassy and all the embassies except for two (I think Costa Rica and Ecuador were in Jerusalem) were in Tel Aviv. What this meant for him and did he have to go to Jerusalem all the time? Ambassador Pickering said, "Well, I try not to go there more than three times a day if I can help it." When we were there, it was roughly an hour. The last 20 minutes of that hour were just spectacularly beautiful. The first 2/3 of the drive out from Tel Aviv toward Jerusalem is sort of flat and uninteresting. But then you start climbing up to Jerusalem and it is spectacular. Everybody knows that Ambassador Pickering likes to drive fast. He likes to drive faster than his drivers like to drive. So, he would get there in record time. The rest of the drivers would sort of poke along a little bit more because it was a dangerous highway. One of the interesting things you saw along the way on this highway was the bombed out remains of military vehicles from the war of independence in the late '40s. Those are still left by the sides of the roads. They are very small military vehicles. They look more like small pickup trucks and strangely shaped, elongated pickup trucks. They were left there deliberately as a memorial, knowing that people would be traveling this road frequently. I looked at them every time I went up and every time I went back down. But it was wonderful to travel to Jerusalem. Jerusalem is such a beautiful city. Tel Aviv is such an exciting city. It's very much on the go, but I wouldn't call it a beautiful city by any means, even though it is on the Mediterranean. I always loved going to Jerusalem.

Q: Did you find there was much division within the embassy about our policy?

TAYLOR: Like in any embassy that's really well staffed – and Tel Aviv was one of the best embassies I've ever served in or had anything to do with – there is always good, healthy debate and fights and shouting. Oh, yes. There was a wide diversity of opinion. The embassy spoke publicly with one voice. Internally, there was healthy debate. Ambassador Lewis encouraged this. Ambassador Pickering especially encouraged this. In the end, as in any embassy, there was a unified position. But the informal commentary and conversation that went on in all the sections and among all the sections was very wide ranging. In the political section there was an internal political unit which dealt with internal Israeli politics. In that group, there is the Arab watcher. The Arab watcher brings to the table all of the things that from the Arab perspective are going wrong because of U.S. policy and support for Israel. So, I would say there was a fairly healthy free for all. The same with our relations with Washington. Ambassador Pickering had a pretty healthy dialogue with his interlocutors back in Washington. Assistant Secretary Murphy, who knew the area very well and had been ambassador in Jordan, selected Pickering.

Q: On the cultural side, dealing with the conservative religious community, I can see that almost anything you did would be anathema to them.

TAYLOR: We did touch on this briefly last time. You almost had to forego their participation in many of our activities. With the help of the political section, we were able to expand our programs to include some conservative Jewish members but not the most conservative because they would never come out of their community, they just would not have anything to do with anybody from the American embassy. But from those who were maybe 90% into that category and a couple of whom are represented in the Knesset, we selected members of those groups to be part of our International Visitor Programs. We mixed them up with some Labor Party people, mixed them up with some Likudniks, mixed them up with an Israeli Arab in one instance, and sent them off to the United States. In terms of our regular cultural programming, meaning outreach from the library, we put them on our mailing lists so that they would receive our material both in Hebrew and in English. This would be material on any subject of interest from environmental issues to political issues. So, they were getting it. I think that they were users of the library to a certain extent. Particularly they were call-in users and we would mail them information. I never saw too many people of an extreme religious nature in our library. The library was very heavily used by academics, by people in the social sciences, by journalists. But the people who lived in enclosed communities in Jerusalem who were strict, strict, strict observers of Jewish law, I would not expect to see them in our library or in our cultural center. Similarly, when we had public events such as a performing arts event, very few of them would have any interest. It's very hard to reach them.

Q: Did you ever get involved in cultural events or academic things of comparative religion and that sort of thing?

TAYLOR: We did some conferences on comparative religion. We brought American specialists in various aspects of comparative religion. It was usually a university sponsored conference. We would not take the lead on this, but if Hebrew University or Tel Aviv or Haifa University or Bar Ilan, which had a more religious basis than the other three, if they were doing a conference on comparative religion and wanted to have an international aspect to the panel, we always cooperated. We brought speakers recruited by our specialists here in Washington who were sent out to do that. Those were always very lively debates. Israeli academic life is pretty wide open and very free. Some of the best arguments and shouting matches I've ever heard have taken place at Israeli universities where we didn't run the conference but we contributed to the conference. It's better to let them take the lead. This is true in any country. If they're going to do a conference on conflict resolution or anything like that, we will respond that it's probably better to be a participant but not to run the thing.

Q: You mentioned conflict resolution. Obviously, it's been going on for millennia.

TAYLOR: The conflict but not the resolution.

Q: Yes. But in one way or another, people have been working on this. But it really wasn't even a phrase until about the time you were there.

TAYLOR: We certainly used it all the time.

Q: Did you find you were dealing with people coming from good intent who were going to solve the problems?

TAYLOR: No, I think everybody was pretty realistic that unless you solve the problem of Jerusalem and the settlements, unless you establish trust on both sides and somehow end this unending cycle of violence, you're not going to settle this ever. We had one or two speakers who were recruited by USIA who really didn't know the Middle East well enough and had no business being at these events, but mostly the people that USIA sent to contribute to these conferences, panel discussions, or seminars were really savvy. The core of American scholarship and journalists, the Thomas Friedmans of the world to the Norman Ornsteins, who spent their lives thinking about these things. They are really good and are so articulate. The Israelis are articulate. So, that makes for a good meeting of the minds and lots of disagreement, sometimes some pretty good practical advice on where to go next. But of course, all of it devolved back into the internal Israeli political situation, which I said was pretty much polarized and you can't move when you have a coalition government that's polarized.

Q: Did you run across any political turkeys? You were talking about some of the people who had not been sent out under the Wick administration of USIA. How about ones that were sent out that really were so ideologically fixed that they really weren't effective?

TAYLOR: I think I mentioned one last time – and I would prefer not to mention him by name because he still is a big name figure in the academic world – and his field was more Cold War/Soviet Union. This was still the 1980s. He really is somewhat superficial. Most of the Israelis knew it also. He was selected by our agency at the time because he, in the eyes of people like Charlie Wick, was a great one to fight the Cold War. His thinking really hadn't developed much over the years and he said the same thing all the time and just wasn't a terribly engaging, exciting person anyway. But I got stuck with him once, as did other posts in the world. It wasn't just to Israel that he was sent. I may have mentioned in our last session my friends at Tel Aviv University. Itamar Rabinowitz, who eventually became the Israeli ambassador to the United States, was at Tel Aviv University. He is a great Syrian expert and a wonderful intellect. Itamar knew this fellow. He said, "Look, Louise, I know you've got to do these things. We'll host him and have a nice lunch. I'll get 10-15 members of the faculty and some bright graduate students to come. We know that you wouldn't be doing this if you didn't have to." So, I took this guy to Tel Aviv University, where Itamar was running one of the major think tanks there. Then I also took him to some outlying places where we rarely did do programs. They were just so thankful to have anybody come talk to them about anything. So, that was the way I handled that sort of thing. It was ideologically inspired, but it wasn't so much ideologically inspired by the Arab-Israeli situation as it was the Cold War and fighting communists everywhere.

For the most part, my experience with the U.S.-run speakers program has been very good. We've usually gotten the people that we wanted. The worst speaker we got in Israel was not political at all. His field was education and he was just a total bomb. It had nothing to do with his politics or lack of politics. He just didn't know his own field. So, those things happen in our business.

Q: Particularly during this period, there were a lot of Harvard Marxists in the academic world in the United States. Many of them had skipped the Vietnam War, so they had to take a Marxist approach. Was Marxism much of a factor in Jewish intellectual life?

TAYLOR: In Jewish intellectual thought historically, yes, but in the great materialistic commercial society of Israel today, Marxism is the farthest thing from their minds. That's true of the Arabs as well. They're not interested... There is an Israeli-Arab Communist Party. The call themselves that to distinguish themselves from falling in line with the Israeli Labor Party. Who is a communist really today? A few people in Bengal and maybe a few people in China. But they're aren't any pure communists anymore. Probably at some level in some universities in Israel, there were people who thought that the historical Marxist movement was an interesting thing to dissect. Of course, the whole kibbutz movement in essence was a pure form of communism but on a very small scale. It wasn't a national government. It was a very small and regional. It was as big as this house and the garden around. So, there is that experiment that the Israelis went through early in their national life, but it was not part of their society now, which is very much a market oriented economy. Many of the kibbutzim have to be subsidized.

Q: Did you get involved with the kibbutzes?

TAYLOR: Yes.

Q: You say they are subsidized? Is it nostalgia?

TAYLOR: They are kind of an anachronism. They're not doing well economically. It was a great experiment. It certainly galvanized the society in the '20s and earlier. You have to admire what they did. These people went out to, in some instances, pretty miserable plots of land and they constructed an egalitarian society where people with Ph.D.s and people with no education whatsoever worked in the laundry together or fed the chickens or did any kind of mundane labor together and nobody knew what the background of their neighbor was. The children were all raised communally. This was the most difficult problem for the kibbutzim, that during the war period in the 1920s, the idea of putting the children in a central... Usually, as the kibbutz was built around a square or a circle or some kind of a shape, the children's dormitories would be in the center. That protected them when the sniping that started in the '20s and grew into the '30s and finally became a war in the late '40s with the war of Israeli independence. The children were protected by being in a more internal area of the kibbutz space, within the perimeter of the kibbutz. When peace finally came in the '50s the kibbutzim continued to operate the way they always had with the parents, the mother and father, of the family unit living in a small one or two room place, the children living in their dormitories and then everybody taking a communal meal in a kitchen and dining room down the road a bit but still within the kibbutz proper. This was – and my friends who lived on the kibbutzim said this was the major problem – that parents wanted to have their children at home. The families wanted to be a unit. It no longer made any sense for the children to have to go stay in the dormitory. The Arabs weren't firing on them every single night as happened in the '20s.

The other thing was, the economic viability of the place. Most people who live on kibbutzim now – 50% or more of the adults – are working outside the kibbutz. This was not the original philosophy of the kibbutz. Some of my friends who lived in the kibbutz in the south where the main industry was to make those plastic racks that you put bombs in. This is not a very high tech industry, but that's what the kibbutz did. They didn't make a whole lot of money from doing that. I had a friend who was a professor at Hebrew University but he lived in the kibbutz and would drive back and forth. When this began to happen, it created huge disturbances within the kibbutzim. There were some members who felt this should not be allowed. Everybody works here, lives here. Our livelihood is here. If you don't find intellectual satisfaction working in the laundry or ladling out soup for dinner, that's too bad; that's your job; you have to do it. Most people, like my friend the general, who lived on a kibbutz and raised chickens, but obviously he was a general and he was away in the army all the time, have come around to allowing people to work outside the kibbutz and still live there. There are some – and I haven't looked at this for over 10 years – who actually the community would sit down and vote to expel this family. If someone in the family was going to work in Tel Aviv or Jerusalem or someplace else, then they were no longer welcome. They were no longer full supporting members of the kibbutz. Then there are very liberal kibbutzim where people come and go all the time. One in the north where I did a lot of work was an English-speaking kibbutz. They also have little houses where everybody lived together. Instead of just having the one room or so, they had still small houses by our standards, but they would have three or four little rooms so the children could sleep at home.

They would build a kitchen so they didn't have to go eat in the main dining room. Three meals a day in the same cafeteria style dining room. The food is notoriously horrible in these kibbutzim. Everybody says it. I'm not making a pejorative comment about Israel. The food is just dreadful in these places. So, the kibbutz movement I wouldn't say is alive and well. I think it's nostalgic and symbolic that the kibbutzim exist. I don't think the state supports the kibbutzim, but I'm not sure about that. But if one is failing, the state will put money into it and try to keep it going.

Q: Were you seeing ardent American Jews who were coming back to go to settlements? You see on TV, all of a sudden, somebody who was very obviously an American, probably from New York or Brooklyn...

TAYLOR: Oh, yes, you see them all the time. They're very determined people. I don't know how to deal with this problem. My opinion is that no administration since the 1980s when I first started really thinking about this has been tough enough on the Israelis about the settlements. Other major problems are the status of Jerusalem and the separation of Gaza and the West Bank with no real transportation between those areas. I think the settlements are such a horrible thorn not only in the side of the Arabs and the Palestinians, but also in the side of the Israelis because they cost so much to keep them going. They put them out in these places where there is no water and then they irrigate them somehow. It's like "Let a Thousand Flowers Bloom." They're beautiful now, but they are a tremendous strain on water and security resources. Some of them are a total blot on the landscape. There is one in the middle of the country where you're winding through these Arab villages. It's just so pretty with little olive groves and dirt roads. All of a sudden, you come around the corner and there is this monstrous settlement that looks like something has landed from outer space. It doesn't fit the landscape. Apparently, it cut off some Arab crossroads. It was built in the middle of an Arab crossroad or something like that. It's those kinds of things which we've expressed our displeasure as a government on but we've never said to the Israelis, "You can't do this anymore."

Q: It may be the fatal flaw that may bring down Israel. I'm not very optimistic about it working.

TAYLOR: I don't know what you mean by "bringing down Israel."

Q: Well, in the very long run, rather than withdrawing to the '67 borders. The fact that they have taken what in my mind is a colonial policy and are fighting to protect it.

TAYLOR: It makes no sense. These areas add no economic viability to the country. They add no security to the country. In fact, they lessen the security of Israel. First of all, they've instigated many of the attacks on Israelis. But secondly, having to put Israeli soldiers out there to guard these places puts them in harm's way. The settlers themselves have to commute through Arab lands to get to any place to shop or work or whatever they do. There is nothing there for the most part. Of course, they've built rather elaborate housing out of concrete there. But there is nothing that says you can't blow up the concrete and start all over. You do have to think about the geography of Israel. At one point, it's only seven miles wide. That doesn't give you very much security. It also doesn't give you very much room to put people. When I went away from Israel, I said, "The next big war is not going to be over oil. It's going to be over water." Water is going to be a critical problem.

Q: I was talking to a man here at the Foreign Service Institute who is just retiring. He was a water expert and was pretty disillusioned. He was saying that five percent or so of the population in Gaza... The Jewish settlers are sitting on three of the best sources of water.

TAYLOR: I've heard that. You wonder why anybody would want to live in Gaza. It's the most wretched place on earth. It is just really the living end. There is no way to support that many people. It's so overgrown with settlements and Gazan settlements. The landscape has just been ruined. It just looks like a giant slum, all of it.

Q: In '88, you left.

TAYLOR: We did.

Q: Whither?

TAYLOR: We came back here. We were exhausted. Four years in Israel is just exhausting. It wipes you out. I had been on the go for four straight years without ever sitting down and catching my breath.

WAYNE LEININGER
Consul General
Tel Aviv (1984-1988)

Born in New York State, Mr. Leiniger was raised in New York and Florida. After graduating from Florida State University he joined the Foreign Service. His foreign assignments, primarily in the Consular field, include Moscow, Tel Aviv, Hong Kong and New Delhi, where he was Regional Supervisory Consul General. After attending the State Department's Senior Seminar, Mr. Leiniger had several assignments in Washington concerning Personnel Management.

Q: This must have been chief of consular section.

LEININGER: Consul general.

Q: Did it call for any language training?

LEININGER: No it was an English-speaking job. We had I think, two JO positions that were Hebrew designated, but for anybody I dealt with, any Israeli official of any importance, you could count on him speaking better English than you would ever learn to speak Hebrew.

Q: Now what was the size of the consular section?

LEININGER: We had eight officers, including me. Just a one person, one officer American Citizen Services unit, one officer doing immigrant visas, five in the NIV unit and me. What you do as a boss in addition to making sure things are running right, you float around and pitch in. As it happened I ended up taking hands-on responsibility for two issues, primarily, the Black Hebrew Community (BHC), and the harassment of Palestinian Americans.

Q: Now before you went to Israel – you went in the summer of 1984 – before you went there did you get briefings from the State Department and if so, what kind of sense did you get from those as to what to expect or, did you know what the general tenor was, the circumstances? Did anybody say much to you?

LEININGER: The first Intifada still hadn't cranked up. They were still operating under a Labor government that had been in place forever, so the political situation seemed rather stable...

Q: Who was the prime minister then?

LEININGER: Shimon Peres. Small steps toward peace were being taken. Small steps toward peace had been being taken since 1948, and are still being taken today, and we are virtually in the same spot we were. We are not going to go there, on that issue...

Q: Did they tell you no contact with the PLO?

LEININGER: No, they didn't have to. That was a given. Nobody who didn't have professional responsibilities, didn't have any official reason to be in contact with the PLO, was authorized to have even casual contact. But even when we had formal negotiating sessions, people had to be specifically authorized to have those conversations because the PLO was not recognized as a governmental authority. It was a simple terrorist organization. But you know, we in Tel Aviv, we dealt with Israel proper. The Consulate General in Jerusalem is totally free standing, and they had jurisdiction over the West Bank and so carried out most of our day-to-day contact with the Palestinians. They did not report directly to the Embassy. The CG there is a Chief of Mission in his own right, by statute.

Q: Without an ambassador on top. But CG Jerusalem reports directly back to Washington don't they?

LEININGER: Correct. They do not come under the authority of our Ambassador to Israel at all. So Jerusalem had complete responsibility for dealing with the West Bank and the Palestinians. Conversely, they were not authorized to have any direct contact with the Government of Israel. Any time they needed to have some kind of representation made to the central government, on any issue, we in Tel Aviv had to drive up the hill. Though they had a lot of central government offices in Tel Aviv, the Israelis maintained that Jerusalem was their capital – a claim that the U.S.'s executive branch, at least, has not been willing to acknowledge, pending the outcome of "final status" talks with the Palestinians. Most of their most important Ministries – Foreign Affairs, Interior, Justice – were all located in Jerusalem, so we had to go there for our government-to-government business.

Q: In your consular thing, you did not have any supervisory role over Jerusalem as Consul General in Tel Aviv.

LEININGER: They would call on me as a colleague, for technical advice, but they weren't obliged to take orders. The consular section chiefs there were more junior in rank than the CGs in Tel Aviv, so they'd usually be grateful for the input, but they stood on their own. The volume of work there was much lower, but the political complications – they dealt with both Israelis and Palestinians within their jurisdiction, and sometimes those respective clienteles resented the attention paid to the other – made life interesting.

Q: So you went off to Tel Aviv and what was your sense, I guess, first, of the consular challenges there?

LEININGER: This was actually, as a boss, my first section with any volume business. I mean in comparison to Moscow, the volume of business was amazing. In Tel Aviv we were processing about 80 to 90,000 NIVs a year.

Q: Where you had to manage a lot of numbers.

LEININGER: Numbers of cases, and simply getting people in and out of the building with security concerns such as long lines standing out on the sidewalk, providing inviting targets for who knows who coming by with a hand grenade. We needed to get folks into the building quick. We had in those days 40,000 or more resident Americans in Israel, the bulk of them being dual nationals. Because of the Israeli Law of Return, anybody who emigrates to Israel of the Jewish faith automatically acquires Israeli nationality. This was never was grounds for loss of American citizenship, because the naturalization part was automatic. The naturalization is not upon one's own application. That dual national population was large, active, vocal. They stood up for what they believed; they were also entitled to full consular protection. We had an awful lot of income tax responsibilities. We had a lot of – I was going to say extradition work, but it really wasn't extradition work because the Israelis would generally reserve the right to try Israeli citizens. They would use our evidence, in an attempt to try the suspects there. We were also laboring under an older version extradition treaty, one that enumerated every single crime that is covered. Modern extradition treaties usually say "any crime punishable by a year or more in jail is grounds for extradition," and that is that. That helps you avoid having to deal with revolutions in technology and newly invented crimes, like Internet crime, that no one envisioned when they drew up the treaty. "Crimes with more than a year jail time," covers all that. But, no, we had an old treaty, in which things were spelled out. Not only do you run the risk of new crimes not being covered, you also have the problem of differing interpretations of the elements of the crimes themselves. One of the god-awfullest case we got tripped up on there had to do with a Jewish-American religious teacher, who was accused on very good evidence of molesting three students in a yeshiva – religious school – in Brooklyn. He had fled to Israel, but as a tourist, so he was not an Israeli citizen. So we got the evidence from the U.S. District Attorney in New York, all bundled up pursuant to the extradition agreement article 77 and so forth. The guy was accused of raping these three students. We sent it to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, who sent it over to the Ministry of Justice. The Ministry of Justice says, "Hmmm. We don't think so." We were dumbfounded. "Say what?" "It is not covered here. This offense is not covered in the treaty." "Well, it says rape. See here, Article 13. Rape!" Well, it turns out under Israeli law rape is specifically defined as a crime committed by a man against a woman, and this religious teacher had molested little boys. In the Israeli interpretation of rape, his crime was not covered by the terms of the treaty. Now, they offered to try him in Israel on the basis of the evidence, but there was no way the U.S. Attorney was going to get these three kids on a plane and ship them to Israel to testify in an Israeli court. So the guy skated. That was just absolutely maddening. But it led us to eventually getting around to renegotiating the treaty.

Q: Which you did.

LEININGER: We did. We started the process when I was there. It wasn't completed on my watch. Negotiating extradition treaties usually is about a five to seven year process in my experience. Both countries are dealing with at least two different executive branch departments, justice and foreign affairs, and then they each have to get the treaty ratified by the legislative branch, and all kinds of procedural, jurisdictional, and, eventually, political problems have to be surmounted along the way.

Q: I suppose.

LEININGER: We ended up concluding one at the end of my tour in New Delhi. It had taken seven years to okay. Anyway, my primary task, as I said, was dealing with a subset of American citizen problems having to do with Black Hebrews; actually, the Hebrew Israelite Community of Israel. That is a redundancy, but that is what they called themselves, and, secondarily, we had to do something to control the GOI's harassment of Palestinian Americans. Now the Black Hebrews were led by a charismatic guy named Ben Ami Carter who, I don't know, I guess by his own inspiration, got it in his head that he and his followers, and any other like-minded people in the United States who cared to join up, self-identified, were in fact the lost tribe of Israel.

Q: So these were blacks in the United States of no otherwise discernable Jewish connection.

LEININGER: No lineal descent whatsoever. They came out of Newark and Atlanta, and Chicago, St. Louis. No prior connection. Once this community was founded, it became a magnet for people, some sincere, others who wanted to some extent masquerade under its umbrella and hide from check kiting, forgery, drug dealing, and other kinds of criminal charges. I have no reason to believe that Ben Ami was not sincere. I really believe he was. The conditions within their little community were pristine. Regular study of the Torah. Law and order without any discernable means of coercive exercise of force in any way. People behaved themselves. They were clean. The kids went to school, were polite, alert, well-nourished, well-dressed, industrious.

Q: The point is these people began to arrive in Israel.

LEININGER: Again, the Black Hebrews in Israel were originally Americans who decided they must be the lost tribe of Israel, and began to arrive in Israel in the late '70s. The original pilgrims made a stopover in Liberia for two years, as I recall, but didn't find any welcome there. You would have thought they would have. For whatever reason, they decided to come to Israel. As Americans, they didn't need Israeli tourist visas. The first group came in and comprised on the order of 35 or 40 people, but that number kept being added to. Hundreds more came over the next ten years. By 1984 when I got there, they numbered about 900 people. By the time I left it was nearly 1300 or 1400.

Q: Why didn't the Israelis just deport them?

LEININGER: Well it wasn't that simple. First of all they didn't want to appear to be arbitrary, capricious, or racist with respect to these folks. They did try and go through the routine means of...

Q: I mean were they prepared to recognize them as Jews?

LEININGER: Well, no. This is the point. The civil authorities at least in the early days were taking a rather measured approach, and trying to work something out. But the community itself wanted to be recognized as Jewish. Now the Israeli political authorities are not the ones in Israel who decides who is a Jew, or, as a consequence, who qualifies for citizenship under the Law of Return. You read the newspapers even today, and every once in awhile this issue still comes up. The Orthodox rabbinical authorities reserve unto themselves the decision as to who is Jewish and who is not. In this case, they decided unequivocally that these black folks were not the lost tribe. "We have already identified the lost tribe." Those were the Falashas from Ethiopia, who were equally black, so the GOI was covered, you see, politically, from charges of racism, after they rescued the Falashas from the ongoing civil war in Ethiopia by airlifting them all to Israel. In Falashas' case, there were clear genetic markers linking them to ancient Jews.

Q: So you can't just claim to be a Jewish convert and somehow that will happen. The civil authorities so to speak do not make these decisions...

LEININGER: They do not make decisions on who is a Jew. The rabbinical authorities do. Anyone who claims he is Jewish has to demonstrate that to the religious authorities. There are in fact means by which one can convert to Judaism, but that, too, is to the requirements of the rabbinate. The Black Hebrews refused any kind of conversion, maintaining that it was not necessary, redundant. The rabbinical authorities begged to differ, and it was their decision that counted.

Q: I see. So these people are there, and you say the community gets up to about 1300.

LEININGER: And the BHC leaders said, "Okay, we're here. Then they realized, being politically savvy, that the political winds were blowing against them. The rabbinical authorities had made a definitive ruling. That ruling hamstrung the civil authorities. They cannot be declared to be citizens of Israel. By this time, as well, the law enforcement aspect of the issue started to kick in because, as I said, more and more people came to hide within the community who were actual crooks. Well, anticipating that this might have been the outcome, the BHC leadership, not being stupid people, and realizing that being thrown out of the country was a real possibility, embarked on a campaign of formal renunciation of American citizenship. They wanted to make themselves stateless, so they could not be deported to the United States. They came to us in groups of about four to six a week, over the space of about five or six years. It got started before I got there, and continued for the four years I was there. They renounced citizenship. By the time

I was getting near the end of my tour of duty, of the 1300 or so people in the community, there were about 800 adults, and of those 800, 700 of them had renounced citizenship.

Q: The Israelis must have known they were doing this from the beginning. Why didn't they pick them up and get rid of them?

LEININGER: They did, on an individual basis, but initially they didn't want to have to cope with the scandal, the outrage, that would attend any attempt at mass deportation. Can you imagine the scene of Israeli policemen or immigration authorities marching into this commune and driving out the black Americans, with kids kicking and screaming, all on CNN?

Q: Were they living on basically Israeli public assistance?

LEININGER: No. They were not given formal work permits, but they were, as almost any developed country has, an under-population of folks who were willing and able to do the work that no one else wants to do. They swept the streets. They cleaned people's houses. They hauled garbage. They did those kinds of things. They were living in the town of Dimona, which was another burr under the Israeli saddle. Dimona is the site of the Israeli nuclear research program, so having these people camp out in an old kibbutz – that's what it was, it was an old abandoned kibbutz – just really got to them.

Q: So the Israelis were not willing to take the political heat for fear of going after them. Did these people have political support from the United States?

LEININGER: The Black Caucus would weigh in from time to time. That actually diminished as folks renounced American citizenship, but at least initially they had very strong support from the Black Caucus. Visiting delegations would make a point when they went to the Ministry of the Interior who had jurisdiction over the BHC, to ask the Government not to harm these people. Well, long story short. The Israelis had a change in administration. The Labor Government got voted out of office, and was followed by the more conservative Likud party; worse, the Likud formed its ruling coalition only by including what otherwise were the marginally small religious parties. Worst of all, the Ministry the religious parties insisted on having as their part of the coalition pie was the Ministry of Interior – exactly the Ministry that dealt with the BHC “problem.” The new Minister of the Interior was a member of a religious party, as was his right-hand man, Ariele Deri. They, unequivocally, were going to do something about “these people.” This is how they talked about the BHC, “these people.” Lacking a direct way of deporting them, because most of the adults by this time had renounced citizenship – we weren't going to take them back as aliens with respect to the United States – they sought other solutions.

Q: They couldn't be deported because they had no legitimate means of entry to the U.S.

LEININGER: Correct. The Israelis began to take indirect coercive action, shall we say, to induce these people to leave on their own. They cut off the water and the electricity, do you remember that? You were in charge of the Overseas Citizens Services office in CA at the time. Now, in the past, the Israelis might go after individual adults on the street. Occasionally they would arrest somebody on criminal grounds. These guys were not American citizens anymore; so we had nothing to do with that. They were crooks, so we had no problem with that, either. We didn't even visit them in jail because they weren't Americans any more. We didn't have a dog in that fight. But once they started to do things against the Community that impacted on the well being of those 500 kids, we had real reasons to be concerned.

Q: The children remained American.

LEININGER: They were Americans, and they were suffering. They were in Dimona, in the Negev Desert, with no fans, not just no air conditioning, but no fans, even in the desert in the summertime. No water. So we went marching up the hill and said, "You cannot do that to these people. That is inhumane." Well then they would relent for two or three weeks, and then there would be outages again. They would be sporadic, pure harassment. Well, eventually the people in the community themselves got fed up with having to put up with things like this, and they started to send out feelers to the Government, "Isn't there some grounds for compromise here. Okay, you say we can't be citizens, okay. Can we at least have residence permits and work permits and can you just let us be?"

Q: In Israel.

LEININGER: In Israel. The Israelis for their part said, "On one condition and one condition only. You become Americans again, so that we can selectively deport those of you who are criminals." Michael, you know the drill when someone renounces citizenship. They come before you and you have to counsel them, and you give them a statement of understanding of what is going to happen to them. "You are going to be regarded as an alien with respect to the United States. You and any future children you might have won't have any rights of return to the U.S. You have to qualify for a visa. We won't have any ability to intervene on your behalf or welfare," and so forth. We tell them to think about it. And you ask them explicitly, "Are you undertaking this action under no force or threat of coercion?" Every single person who came before us would duly read all these things, sign all these things, proclaim themselves to be acting on their own volition, without any compulsion, force or anything applied against them. Well, once the general terms of this deal were outlined to the Department, the issue got thrust back to the attorneys in CA/OCS/PRI – Policy, Regulations, and Interagency Liaison. Is that right?

Q: Yes, definitely.

LEININGER: They did some very creative lawyering and came up with what turned out to be a very helpful interpretation. They said, "Well, though there were individuals who came forward one at a time, or in groups of two or three or six, all of whom individually stated at the time that they were proceeding with renunciation voluntarily and were not acting under any duress or coercion, we believe the case can be made that the overriding political and social environment created a climate in which a reasonable person could not make a reasoned decision" – and they voided all the certificates of loss of nationality that were issued as a result of those renunciations! So all those people had the right again to U.S. passports.

Q: Right, so did the Israelis let the people...

LEININGER: The Israelis relented. The Israelis issued residence permits and work permits. The community now lives there in relative tranquility, as far as I know. I keep in touch with my former secretary, who is now the senior-most FSN in the Tel Aviv consular section, Ingrid Barzel. Ben Ami Carter is still the leader.

Q: Did the Israelis take the position...did they stop new ones from coming in at port of entry?

LEININGER: Yes, well, our reaction to their tightening entry policies is what got the Israeli government's attention. The measures they were taking at the airports to limit the growth of the community got to be unreasonable, to the point of being abusive to black Americans in general. They were strip-searching, and detaining overnight without consular access, groups like the Baptist Church Choir of Montgomery, Alabama. We just couldn't have that. It just went on and on. I'd go to the Foreign Ministry, and I would get received graciously, and, "Oh, yes," the people in the Consular Administration would say, "we understand completely. This is awful. It is a blot on Israel's reputation. We will do everything we can." Well, yes, but how much pull does any Foreign Ministry have against the power of an Interior Ministry in any society, let alone in one that since its inception has felt itself to be under attack? The security officials trump everything; always will. So I would get heard out very nicely at the Foreign Ministry, and the abuses would continue. Within another week or ten days there would be another group of people getting strip searched; the whole nine yards. Tom Pickering by this time was Ambassador there. I started out with Sam Lewis, who was completing his seventh year when I first arrived. Then Pickering came. I had pretty good ambassadors. Hartman, Lewis, and Pickering in a row. Tom had been in Jordan most previously; I think it was Jordan. He knew the issues; he knew the personae. His focus, as it was for all political types, was, "We have to make peace. Let's work with the Israeli government, and we can't antagonize Israeli government if we are going to keep it on track for peace." But I eventually said, "Tom, look. We have a whole identifiable group of Americans who are as American as you or I, who are being subjected to conditions and treatment at that airport that are unconscionable, and we can not allow it to go on. And that is my job, to put out a warning." Now; you have to put this in context. We had not sent out a travel advisory or warning to the American populace to avoid going to Israel even during the 1967 war. Such was the Israeli lobby, the mood in Congress, and the reluctance of people in the Department on the geographic desk to antagonize the Government of Israel. We didn't even question it at that time. But the point about this, again for context, is that the State Department in the '70s and '80s had begun through the Bureau of Consular Affairs being more aggressive in issuing travel advisories when there were problems in other geographical areas. Once an advisory was issued, it could have a dramatic effect on tourism, in addition to having general public relations consequences...

Q: Exactly.

LEININGER: ...and, in turn, on tourist income coming in to various countries. So the advisories became very politically sensitive issues. This particular advisory, given the nature of the subjects of the advisory, and the reluctance of the Israeli government to be seen as persecuting, or discriminating against black Americans, I knew would get their attention, if we could get it ginned up, it. So that is when I talked Tom into backing it, and we got the Department to approve it. We told the Israelis, "We will be issuing this statement next Monday."

Q: What year was this approximately, do you remember?

LEININGER: This would have been 1987ish.

Q: So it had been going on for some time.

LEININGER: Yes, and only at this point did we get their attention. Tom notified the Deputy Prime Minister, as I recall.

Q: Did this particular advisory refer only to the question of how they were dealing with black Americans?

LEININGER: Right. It was limited only to black Americans at ports of entry. So Pickering tells the Government that this is en route, and that it is going to be issued “next Monday.” They fell all over themselves. “Oh, you can’t do that. Give us 48 hours and we will fix the problem.” Within 48 hours they replaced the airport immigration authority leadership with new people. They gave us the home phone number of an Israeli senior Foreign Service officer, a former Ambassador. “24/7, any problem with the airport, call and this guy will show up there and resolve it.” We said, “Okay, we will give you a month. We will test this system”—and it worked. Within a month the number of incidents went down to virtually nothing. And any time there was an incident, I called up this guy at his house, even if it was 2:00 in the morning. Some of those planes got in at ungodly hours. He was out there like a shot, and got people cleared.

Q: Did they still get, though, people trying to filter in to the Black Hebrew Community?

LEININGER: Yes, but any country has the right to exclude an individual tourist, and we weren’t going to be second-guessing every single admission decision they made. Our concern was with their arbitrary, and seemingly discriminatory, abuse of sovereign authority.

Q: Were they still deporting individuals from that community?

LEININGER: Yes, once the people got themselves eligible again for U.S. documents. Of course, the real crooks often were not willing to apply for a passport, but once we deemed them Americans, then we would give them a travel letter and they would be extradited, or deported, back to the United States.

Q: Some of them were removed then.

LEININGER: Some of them were removed. As a matter of fact some of them had U.S. federal warrants against them. They were wanted by the FBI. So the U.S. had a reason to want to get these people back to face justice.

Q: So that system has now worked for all of these years. Isn’t that interesting. And then the other issue of the black Americans entering seemed to go away.

LEININGER: Almost completely away.

Q: Tell me about the Palestinian American issue. Well with the Palestinian American issue I suppose one could say almost in effect the Arab-American issue, or would you really say it was a Palestinian issue?

LEININGER: It was in those days more a Palestinian-American issue. We didn't have that many problems with Arab Americans in general to my recollection. Unlike the situation with Black Americans, the Israeli didn't take blanket action against an identifiable class of people. They would hold individuals for what they regarded to be very good reasons. Our difficulties ran along the lines of consular access, and of mistreatment. The Shin Bet would pick up somebody on suspicion of being a PLO sympathizer or operative of some kind, acting on the basis of whatever kind of information security forces operate on. From their standpoint caution was the better point of valor, so they were always going after people before they built a rock solid case. Then they would just question, and question, and question some more.

Q: And you had strip searches and all that stuff at the points of entry.

LEININGER: Ports of entry, but again these were individuals, and it always was men so you didn't have this business about matronly contraltos being disrobed in front of witnesses. And it was done very quietly. When people were taken away for these kinds of things, they were held in secret for a long time. The only reason we learned that people were being detained was because they didn't show up when they were supposed to, and because friends and relatives, a week later, would say, "We were expecting a visit from our cousin, and he left Detroit on time but he didn't show up here." And we would backtrack, find out what flight he came in on, and we would eventually find the guy. Now, only once to my personal knowledge did I actually see evidence of a Palestinian-American having been tortured. There were cigarette burns, and visible signs of large welts and bruises having been healing for about a week to ten days, after we saw him when he was eventually released from custody.

Q: Was there anything to be done about that?

LEININGER: The ambassador and DCM took my report; I had a Polaroid camera and documented it. They took it up to the Prime Minister's office. I didn't hear any more. It was handled on that level.

Q: Interesting, and the ambassador and DCM didn't tell you anything after that. Did the Israelis ever...

LEININGER: The individual himself didn't want a public incident made about it for fear of retribution to his family.

Q: Did the Israelis ever produce a case out of these detentions or strip searches, did they every actually get anybody that was ever tried or held in prison on a formal charge?

LEININGER: Never on my watch.

Q: So what did you do? I mean did you try to produce the idea of a travel advisory for this group of people? I am curious if you did, because it came up later when I worked on this problem in the department.

LEININGER: We toyed with it at times, but again it was not a discernable pattern. It was individuals here, and individuals there, and we weren't sure of our facts. We could never be certain that any particular guy wasn't a terrorist in some way. Only over a period might such evidence have appeared. Keep in mind, the Intifada as an Intifada didn't crop up until the early to middle part of '87, which was the last year or year and a half of my tour. So we didn't have a stack of cases, a pattern, or a consistent body of evidence we could point to and say, "You have, with some degree of predictability, arbitrarily singled out these people for special attention, invidious attention, at ports of entry, and we want it to stop, or at least see better justification," because none of them had been charged. So at the time we didn't have that kind of documented behavior built up yet in order to make a strong case for a travel advisory to be issued.

Q: So you just had to deal with it on a case-by-case basis when people were reported missing and so forth. How did you fare with the Israelis in those cases?

LEININGER: As long as we were dealing with local officials, local police, or local immigration authorities, we had no difficulty. If we got to the Ministry of the Interior it was a stone wall. Again, the Ministry was in the hands of rather conservative faction of the religious parties, along with the professionally paranoid security types, and neither was inclined to play ball with us at all. They were taking steps that they believed necessary for the safety of their people and the security of Israel in general. "We understand your concern; we will take it into account, but we are not going to change anything we do." That is basically the approach they took. It is still the approach they take today, in my view.

Q: Yes, so that issue went on all the time you were there I take it.

LEININGER: Well, it was building. It was growing because the Intifada...

Q: So what else did you have to confront when you were there. You had a large visa demand; what was the nature of the visa work you were doing? Was it, let me put it another way. Did a lot of people slip out on visas and not come back to Israel or was it fairly honest tourism?

LEININGER: I would say like 80-90% of it was fairly honest tourist business, straightforward stuff. People who immigrate to Israel do so because they are highly motivated to stay in, and be in, Israel and build it up as a nation. We always took that as a foundation. The exception to that rule was usually recently-arrived Soviet Jews. Because many only went there because it was the only place the Soviet authorities would allow them to go.

Q: If they hadn't gone there initially just out of saying we want to go there...

LEININGER: Right. They had the option en route of "dropping out," as it was called in the transit cities of Vienna and Geneva – the choice not to go on to Israel, but to accept resettlement in the United States or elsewhere in the West. But the private volunteer organizations and the major Jewish immigration organizations tried to convince them to follow through, and to go to Israel, lest the Soviets use a high drop-out rate as a pretext further to cut back on exit permissions. They'd say, "Give it a try, you will like it." Well, a lot of them did drop out and ended up in Brighton Beach. But those who 'd come to Israel and had a hard time adjusting, within six months, were at our doors, applying for visitor visas.

Q: Did you deny a lot of those?

LEININGER: We had a refusal rate among that group of about 80 or 90%.

Q: Did you have a lot of pressure about that?

LEININGER: Very little, surprisingly. Because people understood. In my experience, again, most of the congressional staffers who had any experience doing consular cases were reasonable people. It'd be only in their first six months or so that they'd be thinking that we, the consular officers, don't know what the hell we are talking about, or are arbitrary, rude, cruel and indifferent. The staffers pretty well learned on the job that there are two sides to every story, and our side, our explanation, is at least as compelling as the side they are getting from constituents in the United States. Any time we had such a case come up, we just simply wrote it up as "...recently arrived from the Soviet Union. He has got no full time job, he is living still on a government dole, and he is not learning any Hebrew." Duh! He's got no ties to Israel! We had no trouble defending those refusals.

Q: So you had high volume, but you felt that it was...

LEININGER: And it is interesting there because one particular subgroup of people who, ordinarily, all around the world would be automatic refusals, to whom we would routinely issue. We didn't start out that way. I mean we sort of grew into it, by growing out of our preconceived visa profiles. My predecessor clued me into it, and I found it to be the case, and it continues as far as I know. This was the profile: "unmarried, early 20 years old, young man or woman without a job."

Q: Probably just out of the army.

LEININGER: There you have put your finger on it. Those folks being discharged from the army, at loose ends, almost everywhere else in the world would be automatic refusals. But the tradition in Israel is that when the kids, and this is both young men and women because conscription is universal, get out of the army, mom and dad pay for a three to six month sabbatical trip around the world, or however much of the world the kid wants to go see. That is pressure relief. I mean, they had served their two to three years active duty, and they are going to be on reserve status until they are 50. All of them, without exception.

Q: I know. They have to do two weeks a year I suppose.

LEININGER: Two weeks a year active duty. And everybody returns. They didn't go in the army in the first place with the intent to abandon Israel down the line. Again, the families went to Israel voluntarily, and these young people are defending the country. They haven't committed their futures and pledged their allegiance without some degree of real commitment. So when people got out of the Army, and they were at loose ends at that stage of their lives, it was the only time they could ever take this little world excursion. It made sense. When they got back to Israel, they are going to get back into the serious business of making a life and a future. So we would actually go ahead and grant visas. Our return rate among those applicants – we did the surveys – was like 98%.

Q: Interesting. Yes, I saw a few of those people in Montreal. I remember being very suspicious of them, but some of them managed to convince me they were legitimate, and didn't think of getting the visa in Israel. I would say, you are right; the profile was exactly people that you wouldn't normally issue to. That is intriguing.

LEININGER: When I am over teaching at the ConGen at FSI, and we are talk about “profiling your application pool” at your post. But we always caution, “This is good up to a point, but don't get carried away with profiles, and least of all don't let a profile formed at one post get carried over to another post where a certain little detail in the socio-economic situation can make all the difference.”

Q: That is still a valid point. I remember from my experience in Rome, and I would think you would get this, that a lot of Americans appear in Rome and I would think in the holy land, and have kind of went religiously crazy.

LEININGER: Yes, that is up next, with regard to Israel, too. The nature of the place attracts people of that bent in the first instance.

Q: Right, I mean it is a small number of the overall, but you have got some really strange people out of their minds.

LEININGER: And this is across the board, almost all religious sects. I mean we had crazy Bahais, crazy Christians, and crazy Jews. The historical aura of the place, what happened there 2000 years ago or 6000 years ago just tends to draw people who have got strong faith- based convictions about things. Fill in the blank: right or wrong, war and peace, Armageddon. When it happens, they want to be in Israel. So people are just attracted to the place in the first instance who are a little bit “off.” Secondly, at least among the Jewish American community, sending little Johnny, with behavioral difficulties, to Israel to work on a kibbutz for a year was perceived as a way to “straighten him out.” “This will get his head screwed on straight.” And of course it didn't. Life in a kibbutz is not easy. It is a lot of hard work, and it means getting along with others and obeying authority, and people who couldn't do any of the above in the U.S. did not adapt well to living in a foreign country, with, definitely, foreign customs and traditions. Don't make any mistake about it. Conditions of life were hard on the kibbutzim, and very strange for a kid from Brooklyn. Then finally, once you get to Israel, there is something about the place that sets some people off. It is – at least in the bigger cities like Tel Aviv – it is hectic, loud, it is abusive, or at least it gives such an appearance. You take New York City and blow it up into a country, and that is the state of Israel. Everybody is in your face all the time, car horns are blaring, drivers are yelling and cursing at each other, and the gestures in the air, and the fingers. You have to learn, “don’t take it personally,” but a lot of people with genteel sensibilities when they arrived ended up getting really angry over time, and acting out. You would have bar fights and street confrontations. When people who went there were back home in Smallville, USA, they would be perfectly quiet green grocers or florists or something. But I think to an extent, obviously, there are pressures generated by living in a country surrounded by hostile neighbors, compounded by the history of the Jewish people, the history of the founding of the State of Israel, and, increasingly while we were there, the pressures of the Intifada, with even in those days, the beginnings of some random street bombings. Two people were caught in a rubber dinghy off the coast of Herzliya, which is an official American residential area, with RPG rounds in the boat. They caught two other guys with a stash of grenades in a hotel not a block and a half from the Embassy. So even we were feeling that to an extent, but for the people in the country, living in the country day in and day out, those pressures just build up and never go away.

Q: So you had a fair amount of these American services cases that were really the kind of people that went off the wall.

LEININGER: People went off the wall. We had Jesus Christ in the waiting room at least twice a week, and as the old Dire Straits song has it, “one of them must have been wrong.”

Q: Did the fact of people having been American citizens, having been in the Israeli army, have any impact on their citizenship?

LEININGER: No. First of all, they didn’t volunteer. It was compulsory military service. It was compulsory, not voluntary, and they sent you off to the Territories. And most of them didn’t serve as officers, and for us to be concerned about their U.S. citizenship they had to be either serving as officers or fighting in an army engaged in hostilities against the United States. None of those conditions applied to most people. And we’ve not even gotten to the question of their “intent” with regard to their American citizenship, which, almost universally, they had no intention of abandoning.

Q: Were there any cases of serious senior Israeli government officials that were also Americans? You don’t have to identify them, but that question ever came up you find the deputy prime minister of somewhere is also an American?

LEININGER: None to my knowledge. We will come to that similar circumstance when we come to Hong Kong down the road. But no, not in Israel, in my time. The Golda Meirs of the first wave of immigrants had long since exited the stage. I can’t recall a single highly placed government official who was originally born in, say, Shaker Heights. Of course even if they had, loss of U.S. citizenship would have still come down to it a question of intent and they’d be absolved on that, anyway.

Q: Did the Israeli government try to bring much pressure in visa cases did you find?

LEININGER: No. Not major government administrations. Local government officials would. The mayor of Herzliya happened to be my next-door neighbor. Yes, he would send his driver over for a visa, and I'd have to tell him to come to the office like anybody else. It didn't give me any joy in those cases. The Druze leader had a little country estate north of Haifa, and apparently had been cultivating consuls general for years, inviting them up for long weekends and things. I very quickly scoped that out, with the help of my trusty senior FSN and said, "Thanks, but no thanks. I am not going there." He was a visa pusher extraordinaire, so I dodged him for four years.

Q: Did you have any scandals in the NIV section when you were there? There were some later I recall.

LEININGER: Some years later, different group of people, different NIV chief and different FSNs, two new junior officers, none of them present on my watch. We had some characters as NIV chiefs, however. One of them was a womanizer of the first water, a wonderful, um, reputation. Another guy suffered a heart attack, I think, about every six months, because he had the worst temper of anybody I have ever worked with. He just couldn't put things in perspective, couldn't mellow out. He had a difficult home situation, a wife who found fault a lot with what he was doing or not doing for the family, including housing. Among the other penances I had to pay when I was there, I was the chairman of the housing board. Being chairman of the housing board in a place like Tel Aviv, where the range of housing was so great, from small apartments with no closet space to large villas, three stories with nearly a quarter of an acre of yard, just sets you up for complaints. That was the most contentious business I've ever been involved with. I mean, who gets the small places? Singles, staff personnel, folks with no representation responsibilities – and you end up with a sort of caste system, it seems to the outside observer, as to who gets what kind of residence. You say, okay, well, the section chief has got to have a place with representational space, for section get-togethers, official dinners, and so forth. Well, those are defensible, but then there is this vast, fluctuating real estate pool in the middle that happens to ebb and flow only under market conditions. Who is at post and without housing when this particular house becomes available determines who is going to be assigned to it. Well, this NIV chief happened to get to a post at a time when there were no such nice large places available. Although he got a freestanding villa, it was rather small. The bedrooms were about 8x10, and there wasn't a lot of storage space, and it was vertical, and people don't like climbing the stairs, and on and on. We moved him three times to find like a place that would satisfy his wife. He was very understanding, himself, "Give me a place. I don't care." But he would get home and he would catch it, and poor guy.

Q: Interesting. These are the kinds of back office issues that you have to deal with in an overseas environment. They are not always transparent, and they can be extremely intense.

LEININGER: Extremely. It affects morale. People take it out at the office, against their co-workers serving on the committee, or, against supervisors, in this case. It is really awful when it is one of your own people and you can't come through for him. They expect that when you are housing board chairman, you are going to make it right for them. In reality, you have to bend over backward to avoid the impression of favoritism, which if it existed would create even more problems among everyone else in the housing pool.

Q: Did the Embassy own all the property there?

LEININGER: We owned at that point about 60% and we rented 40%, as I recall, but we had to rent more and more as the Embassy grew.

Q: So the U.S. Government was able to buy property in Israel.

LEININGER: Yes, but purchase prices were getting out of reach. Most of what we owned had been bought fifteen or twenty years before. Even if you could make a case that we'd recoup an investment in newly purchased housing over, say, the next fifteen years, FBO – the old Foreign Buildings Office, that oversees our purchase of properties abroad – isn't budgeted that way. They can't spend a lot now to save even more later.

Now on the opposite side of the house, I want to mention a guy named Julian Barkley.

Q: Oh, yes, killed in the bombing of the Embassy in Nairobi in 2000 or 1998. Julian was in my class. I knew him.

LEININGER: Julian was in my class, Michael. I've got the class photo to prove it.

Q: Julian Barkley was?

LEININGER: Julian Barkley was in my entering class.

Q: What number?

LEININGER: 99th. That's under the old numbering system; they started all over again in about 1980, I think.

Q: Then I encountered him very shortly thereafter. Isn't that interesting. I was his career counselor.

LEININGER: Yes, you were that. And you know he wasn't doing particularly well at the early stages of his career. He was still an FS-3 when he got there. When I got to Israel, it was 1984. We had been in the service 13 years. I was already an OC. He was an FS-3. Julian, frankly, had a reputation of talking a good game but not delivering. In this way he off-put some of the senior FSNs, the ones he needed to depend on to do his job properly. I brought him in and said, "Julian, you are better than this. At least you aspire to be better than this. Here is what you have to do in order to rehab your reputation. You have got to actually do something, and we're going to work on developing work habits in you that will help." I have never seen anybody dig in like he did, Mike. It was great. We did a baseline EER the first year that was very frank. "Julian has got to meet time deadlines. He has got to organize his work better. He has got to make greater attention to detail. He has got to pay greater attention to supervising his FSNs, and make sure they are doing what they are supposed to be doing," boom, boom, boom. We laid it out, year after year, noting areas in which he had demonstrated real improvement. He got promoted before he left post, to two, and then eventually to one, and he made senior service before he died. We turned him around. I have never been prouder of any individual supervisory experience than the one I had with Julian. It was probably harder and than what the textbooks would tell you, because we were friends trying to deal with the boss-subordinate relationship. But it was also easier, because we were friends, because he knew me, and trusted that I had his best interests at heart.

Q: That is very interesting. By the time that I dealt with him in personnel, he had become much more impressive than when I had met him ten or fifteen years before. Anyway, one thing I was thinking about is what kind of relationship did you have with Israeli Arabs as far as business was concerned. Were many of them trying to get visas? Did you deal with them on other issues? Were they trying to emigrate out?

LEININGER: No, they weren't an issue. There was no particular issue in those days. Most of the Israeli population didn't regard Israeli Arabs as traitors. It hadn't come up as a point of concern at this stage.

Q: And they were not politicized against the Israeli state, at least in your impression.

LEININGER: No. Not at that state of affairs.

Q: Did they get the same benefits? I mean did they get as much money for their schools and that kind of stuff as the Jewish population?

LEININGER: My impression is their general economic status and station in life was generally on a par with the rest of the population. The low people on the totem pole were the recently arrived Soviet Jews. They were the least of the least. And then of course the Falashas came in, and they took the place underneath the Soviet Jews.

Q: From Ethiopia. But you didn't get the sense that the Israeli government was trying to in effect push the Israeli Arabs out and grab their land, causing them to be running to the Embassy to try and emigrate to America or someplace else.

LEININGER: No. Israeli Arabs were full citizens, unlike the Palestinians. Israeli Arabs served in the military like everybody else.

Q: Isn't that interesting. So did any of them come in for visas just to visit the U.S. Did you see many of them?

LEININGER: Just in proportion to the population. They mostly lived in north, the outskirts of Haifa, and toward the Golan Heights area. It was our consular district. When they got visas, they came back.

Q: Isn't that interesting? How did you get along? You talked a little bit about Pickering. Who was the DCM when you were there?

LEININGER: We started with Bob Flaten, and he became ambassador to some African country [Rwanda] along the way, and then Art Hughes, who became Ambassador to Yemen, I think, and eventually headed up the MFO (Multinational Force of Observers).

Q: How did your relationship with them go?

LEININGER: It was extremely good. Bob and I were golf buddies. Art never played golf, but he was relatively younger, and we talked music and things like that. Both had very pleasant wives who entertained and were very welcoming. There was no feeling of condescension in our relationship when I was there as consular section chief. In fact, I was often “Acting” – I was senior enough in rank that most of the time when the DCM was gone, I was his alter ego. So they were forced to trust me because they would be handing over certain portfolios to me for four weeks of home leave or whatever it was they were doing! Fortunately, again, mostly it was Pickering who was there when most of this happened, while he was ambassador. I was in good standing with him, so much so that when my four years were up, and we wanted to come back here and get my son into high school, and sit him down in one place in an American school before he went off to college, Tom asked me to stay on a fifth year as his political counselor. I said, “Tom, thanks, I am really flattered, but we owe it to our son.”

Q: So you stayed there four years. You must have extended I take it.

LEININGER: Actually we signed up for “two and two” – two years, home leave, two years – right at the outset. We knew we wanted to stay at least that long, before we ever got there.

Q: So you liked living in Israel?

LEININGER: We loved it. I mean it was paradise, and I mean that sincerely, after Moscow. The weather was wonderful, the people were welcoming. Fresh fruits and vegetables. The air was clean and fresh off the Mediterranean Sea. Our house was about five blocks from the Med. I used to run on the beach all of the time.

Q: You didn't have to go with bodyguards or anything like that?

LEININGER: Not in Israel proper. After the Intifada cropped up we couldn't go to Gaza or West Bank without an armed guard and an armored vehicle.

Q: Did you cover Gaza as a...

LEININGER: We covered Gaza as part of our district. But we had very little business there.

Q: Did many people come in from there trying to get visas or trying to get out of the country in your impression?

LEININGER: Nope. I think they didn't want to leave, for fear of not ever being allowed back.

Q: Yes because I guess they had very odd travel documents, the Palestinians. They didn't have passports from any...

LEININGER: Right, but sometimes carried the UN laissez-passer. So it was a really dicey situation. I mean, most wouldn't have qualified for NIV's in the first place. I think we had about a 80% refusal rate for folks in Gaza.

Q: So after the beginning of the Intifada, and even then though you didn't feel at risk in Israel proper.

LEININGER: As I said, it ratcheted up to the point where we did have a couple of EAC (Emergency Action Committee) meetings about the fact the guys had been discovered in the rubber boat with the RPG rounds, and others with the grenades. It was funny, in a way, because our security officer, Chuck Boles had lost, was it Diego Asencio – was he kidnapped in Paraguay?

Q: In Colombia.

LEININGER: In Colombia, okay. Chuck had been his RSO, and he had been Spike Dubbs' RSO in Afghanistan when he'd been killed. So Chuck was just concerned to the point of paranoia that something awful was going to happen again on his watch. So when these incidents, involving real threats to the Embassy, came to light, and we were informed only after the fact, he went crazy talking to the Mossad and Shin Bet, Israel's external and internal security agencies. They'd humor him. "Don't worry, American, we have it all under control. You had nothing to worry about at any time. Don't worry in the future." That was their attitude. "As long as we have it under control, there is nothing to worry about, and we are not going to reveal information sources and methods to you when you have nothing to worry about. We have it under control." I don't think they are so cocksure these days.

Q: How interesting. Did you travel all around the country?

LEININGER: I got up and down a fair amount, yes.

Q: But I mean as a tourist did you go to different places?

LEININGER: Yes, we went all around especially south to Eilat and around the Sea of Galilee, because they had an annual marathon up there. I ran there three years out of the four. I ran a half marathon at the Dead Sea. Oh, listen, I have got to recite this. I lay awake the other night thinking about this. Because, you know, I do a lot of running, and because my Foreign Service travels have gotten me to a lot of places, for fun I started to catalog the "Bodies of Water Along Which I Have Run." So I was on the Mediterranean Sea, the Dead Sea, the Red Sea, and the Sea of Galilee. I have done the North Sea. I have done the Moscow River. I have done the Black Sea and the Neva River in the old Soviet Union. I have done the Rhine, the Danube, the Seine...

Q: A real watery trip.

Q: Well, let me ask you again: do you have any observations or comments that you want to make about the Middle East political situation from your perspective of the time you were in Israel? I mean you must have. You went to country team meetings. You had a lot of neat talk. It had to be a frequent topic of discussion.

LEININGER: Then, as now, the Israelis took the approach that it is “us against the world, and no one stands up for us but us, and we have got to take a very hard and conservative line in making any type of concessions whatsoever, because we know what happens when you put yourself in a position of weakness.” They tend to take the approach, “we won’t talk to those people because they are our enemies.” They have always had to be brought around to the position, “You have to talk to your enemies to make peace. Those are the people with whom you have to make peace – your enemies. You have to talk to them. We had an administration – the second Reagan administration – that was willing to start to push the Israelis a little harder to get them to the negotiating table, to start to talk. But every time there was any progress the fear mongers would step up and scream that the sky was falling. It worked; the Labor government was booted out; Likud people came in. One step forward, two steps back. It has happened ever since, but worse. Rabin was so close they killed him. Sharon, this is the same Sharon you are dealing with today who made Sam Lewis and Tom Pickering crazy 20 years ago.

Q: Not to mention Habib when Habib was working on the Lebanese problem.

LEININGER: Lots of people on the American side. But Sharon has always been a hard case. Sharon was banned from Fourth of July parties at the residence in the aftermath of the Sabra and Shatila refugee camp massacres, where he reputedly decided to let the Lebanese militia in to have its way. With Lewis, the feeling was actually personal; he didn’t want to have anything more to do with Sharon. When Pickering came in, the freeze-out was just maintained as a matter of principle. He didn’t have any personal animus against Sharon. But from Sharon’s perspective it has always been personal. I don’t know that he has ever been friendly to any American diplomat ever since.

There’s an article of faith I picked up during my four years there in the region, and in speaking to people who have worked in the NEA bureau both before and since it seems little has changed: anybody who goes to Israel with a pro Israeli bias ends up leaving understanding the Arab point of view more. Anybody who goes to an Arab country with an Arab bias ends up leaving with a pro-Israel bent. You immerse yourselves in these individual societies, and you get to see how they are so totally consumed with their own point of view, and cannot appreciate the fact that there are other human beings with wishes and desires and legitimate aspirations, too, who have got to be accommodated in some way. They are all going to have to live together, but neither will concede that that is the case. It has got to be maddening for people like Dan Kurtzer, who was an O-3 political officer in Tel Aviv when I was there, and has since been ambassador in both Egypt and in Israel. He is still fighting the same issue today, pushing the same stone up the same hill as he was 20 years ago. Same issue, and the same personages. Arafat, Sharon. Maybe they are all going to have to die, wait another five years, clear off a whole new generation of political leadership.

I tell this to new junior officers at the ConGen, and I confess, “Boy I’m glad I’m a consular officer. My attention span isn’t that long.” I like getting into concrete, resolvable problems. I got involved with the Black Hebrew’s problems; I got involved with the divided spouses’ problems. I was prepared to work on those for as long as it takes. They took several years to resolve, but they were finite. They were resolvable. Most consular issues are; you fix them, or not, and move on to the next. But there aren't things that just hang over your head, amorphous, undefined, so that the parties involved don't even agree on what the problem is – like the “peace process.”

Q: So you felt the siege mentality is really a dominant feature, particularly if you were in Israel, and probably if you were in the Arab country, it would be from their point of view too.

LEININGER: Possibly, but I have difficulty sympathizing with some of the Arab governments who criticize the Israelis for the treatment of the Palestinians, and blame the United States for disregard of the Palestinians, given the fact that those surrounding Arab countries have dissed the Palestinian people consistently as well. Not many Palestinians have legal status in these countries, let alone political and civil rights. I mean those governments have not provided material support or meaningful political support; they limit themselves only to gratuitous and inflammatory rhetoric. In many ways the Palestinians are stepchildren within the Arab world. Individual Palestinians I met while I was there were delightful. They are smart; they are family-oriented people. They are individually sweet, cultured, and peaceful. You see them and the Israelis as opposite sides of the same coin. They just happen to worship God by a different name. And it drives you nuts when you see what goes on, when you'd like to see total peaceful arrangement arrived at so that these people could live together. It could be an incredibly dynamic team. There is a richness of culture and of intellect there that is just waiting to be mined in a productive way. But it's now 50-60 years now of going at each other. It is a tragic waste. And that reminds me – well, later on when I got to New Delhi, it seemed to be the same thing with the Indians and the Pakistanis. Exactly the same thing. Exactly, in so many ways.

Q: Well, what else would you like to say about your experience in Israel?

LEININGER: Just that we were very glad to have had it. It was a great place to work, but it was also a great place to live in, in general. There's a good school, an excellent school, the American International School there is one of the best we ever have been associated with. The total student enrollment was something like 350 from K to 12. So class size was 15 or 20 kids in every grade, every class. You walk through the country and it is like living history. There is a Roman coin, arches are over there, and there, marble columns. The golf course has fallen marble columns left around from the ancient city of Caesarea. Marble columns left around from temples that are in play. They are regarded as part of the natural terrain.

Q: Don't hit it off the temple.

LEININGER: You don't get a free drop! My wife used to find old coins like other people find pop top lids from beer cans or something; she finds these little coins. She read heavily into archeology, did volunteer work on about six digs, including the Jesus boat in the Sea of Galilee, you know that 18-to-20 foot long vessel that is just the kind of fishing vessel used then, and it dates from the age. Jesus' apostles are said to have been on it when he did his walking-on-water.

MORRIS DRAPER
Consul General

Jerusalem (1986-1988)

Morris Draper was born in California in 1928 and graduated from the University of Southern California in 1952. An Arabic language officer, Mr. Draper served in a number of Middle East posts including Beirut, Baghdad, Jeddah, Ankara, Jerusalem, and Washington, DC. Mr. Draper was interviewed in 1991 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: After your tour with the Board of Examiners, you were assigned to Jerusalem as Consul General from 1986 to 1988. Could you explain the uniqueness of our representation in Jerusalem and what your responsibilities were?

DRAPER: Jerusalem is unusual in many different ways. From the American diplomatic aspect, it is unique because the US has never recognized the status of Jerusalem as the capital of Israel. We have always maintained, going back to 1948, that its final status should be decided within the context of a peace treaty. Consequently, we have a mission in Jerusalem which is not subordinate to our Embassy in Tel Aviv and which is only nominally recognized by the Israeli. There is no real parallel except maybe for Hong Kong which reports directly back to Washington rather than London or Beijing. The Mission in Jerusalem reports directly to Washington, although in the real world, any Consul General would be stupid to ignore the American Ambassador in Tel Aviv. There has to be close coordination. This scheme of representation gives the United States considerable leeway in that the Consul General has relationships of sorts with the Israeli authorities--very tenuous with the Defense Ministry--but satisfactory with the Foreign Ministry and others. At the same time, the people in the occupied territories see the C.G. staff as officials they can talk to and who might be potential intermediaries, as protectors, as people who follow human rights policies. There are many American citizens in the West Bank and Gaza; they see the American passport as an entry into a better life. Our consular staff is overwhelmed all the time by the Palestinians seeking entry into the United States to work, to study--there are an enormous number of students who apply for study visas. Then there are a vast number of Israelis who want to visit the United States; there is a very sizeable group of ultra-religious, ultra-conservative Jews who came originally from Eastern United States--Brooklyn, New Jersey, etc.--who settled in Jerusalem, but maintain their American citizenship; some of them at least do not recognize the secular State of Israel and do not want to acknowledge its existence by becoming one of its citizens. There is a growing population in Israel and in Jerusalem so that you can see on any given day in the consular section a handful of American tourists in polyester and shorts and a vast number of Palestinians dressed in everything from business suits to tribal costumes and Israelis wearing their traditional costumes--fur hats, etc.--with full beards with lots of children. It is tough duty; we reject many Palestinian visa applications if we suspect that the visitors might become permanent residents in the US. It is also a painful process for Israelis who are accustomed, after having spent two or three years in the army, to travel around the world for a year before they return to their jobs or schools; we have to turn down some applicants who are suspected of seeking an excuse to go to the United States to get their "green card" or otherwise stay in the US beyond the visa time limitation. We have to observe our laws and consular regulations. This leads to considerable friction and a lot of pressure on the part of powerful people--politicians, educators, etc. It is a human problem.

While I was in Jerusalem, I spent vast energies in promoting more contacts between Israelis and Arabs, particularly those who were politically acute who had been unwilling to talk to each other over the years. I held a number of quasi-secret meetings--lunch or dinners at my house, where people could come inconspicuously to meet others. One of the big problems is that so many Israelis and Arabs have never had such things as a sensible conversation with each other. There was always a great divide. When Israel first occupied the territories in 1967, the Israelis walked and marched and were bussed through the territories, but gradually, as the hostilities of the Arab population increased, fewer and fewer Israelis visited the territories. In 1986, when I arrived, I found that in fact the "Green Line" had been reestablished. Of course a lot of people still went into Israel and the territories, but it was very common to find Israelis who had never talked to an Arab in their lives and vice-versa. So I was trying to introduce and encourage many of the Palestinian nationalists to meet with certain Israelis, and not just the peaceniks. I encouraged the Palestinian militant to talk to the Israeli militants at my house or in other places. My success was uneven, to put it mildly, but at least there was a process. I made it a habit that all my social functions at my house would have a mixed Arab-Israeli guest list as much as possible, trying to find a concept that might be unifying. I remember we had an American ballet company, we had guest conductors and sometimes we could get Israelis and Arabs together in that kind of setting which was non-political and non-threatening. We couldn't do it in other ways. The Fourth of July party always had a mixed group from all sectors. Some people refused to come because they didn't want to talk to other groups. Particularly in 1986, we had a lot of interesting episodes. I spent a lot of time on this "exchange" program and there were some fruitful outcomes. It didn't always work well; in one case, two strong Palestinian Liberation Organization supporters carried on talks with a junior member of the Beirut branch of the Likud coalition, which was in power at the time. They came out with a manifesto of sorts which was quite moderate and pragmatic. Likud conservatives spanked the young politician for having that conversation, not to mention co-authoring a manifesto with Arabs. Then there were other such events.

There were other problems. The Palestinians can be pretty exasperating. As Abba Eban, the former Israeli Foreign Minister said one time, the Palestinians never lose an opportunity to lose an opportunity. It was very much rolling half up the hill, only to roll all the way to the bottom. Even my most pragmatic friends with whom I discussed the problem as recently as this past February knew that the Palestinian support of the Iraqis after their invasion of Kuwait, but the Palestinian "main-stream" including the most conservative and the most pragmatic, tended to see Saddam Hussein in a light which differed from that of the rest of the world. They are so frustrated.

We did some things for them in the early '80s. We had a modest economic assistance program which was doing a lot of good work, including then establishment of an Arab owned bank in the territories, which was an essential ingredient. Few Americans, even including officials, recognize the economic death-grip around the territories, particularly in Gaza. These people are doubly frustrated because they can't sell what they produce and they can't farm what they want. These restriction exists sometimes for practical reasons, such as the shortage of water, but people who grow vegetables, fruits, melons, nuts on the West Bank could have found a market in Jordan and in Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, but were constrained not only by Israeli regulations, but also by Arab indifference and Arab road blocks or those set up by their competitors. A West Bank truck, loaded with fresh grapes, would cross, after paying an enormous fee to the Israelis, the River

Jordan to Amman only to find that the farmers and businessmen there would see to it that the truck stayed in customs for three or four days until the fruit had rotted. It was a continuous series of frustrations for the Palestinians in the territories. The Israelis would not let them compete and in fact gained considerable revenue from the taxes on the trade that the Palestinians conducted. But it was a "Catch 22" arrangement and some of our assistance programs were designed to overcome this. We introduced new animal husbandry techniques, better irrigation facilities, better sanitation, better medical facilities, etc. But the day to day life of people who were subjected to these constant economic and social frustrations and who had to deal with the Israeli bureaucracy which is unbelievable was just a major burden.

Q: What causes the Israeli bureaucratic problem?

DRAPER: I don't know why the bureaucracy is so complicated in Israel. It parallels the French bureaucracy, but the French at least have learned over centuries how to deal with it. But Israel, for example, it might take as long as six months to obtain a driver's license. The applicant has to pass a series of examinations; he has to take required courses by a fly-by-night outfit in some cases; and it is accompanied by implicit, if not explicit, bribery to facilitate the process. It is very painful. In many countries of the world it is difficult to get such things as telephones because of the shortage of equipment or technicians or other logistical problems. But in Israel, many of the obstacles are institutionalized. From a social point of view, one of the major problems is the extensive housing development, but the inability to complete a house in a reasonable period of time. Once all the licenses and approvals are obtained, it may take two and half years to build a house, which might take six months in the US. A house in the US can go up in two or three months with landscaping--and it has to be done that quickly if the builder is not to lose his financial shirt. In Israel I have seen homes that were unfinished after two years. Of course, there are different styles and materials, but that doesn't really explain the gap. It is a very serious problem. It means that, just as in the Soviet Union, young people who want to get married have to live with his or her parents in a small apartment, with all the complications that this arrangement generates. It is a serious social problem. When people don't get married when they are young, there are fewer children and that is a concern to the state.

There are a lot of problems of this kind. When the average Israeli needs six months to get a driver's license, imagine how long it takes a Palestinian who in addition to everything else has to undergo the scrutiny of the police and security authorities who could be very arbitrary if they suspect the applicant of being a secret member of the PLO or sympathizer or a person who could communicate with the PLO; they might just refuse to grant permission for a driver's license altogether. It is not the harsh part of the occupation--the night visits and some of the humiliation which are visited on the Palestinians (although those are very important to the Arab psyche)--but the day-to-day living experiences can be pretty bad for people unfamiliar with that kind of bureaucracy and its complications. The Arab businessman who needs capital has to go through a lot of complications and has to borrow money from Israeli institutions at very high rates of interest. It is very difficult.

Q: You mentioned humiliations visited on the Palestinians. What kind were they?

DRAPER: Just going through check-points all the time; seeing Israeli troops moving into villages; the attitudes of some of the Israeli soldiers towards the Arabs; the feeling of being a second-class person. These things don't apply to all; you have to give the Israelis credit. Many Israelis soldiers are reservists--every Israeli has to serve three weeks every year until they reach 55--who after having served in the territories, come home and write for their newspapers about the horrors of serving in the territories--about the things they didn't like. Many hate that duty; it is very difficult to be in a occupation army. We discovered that ourselves. While I was there, the Intifada began on a major scale. The Israelis still haven't learned how to deal with it effectively--I am not sure that anybody really could. It is a very difficult thing to do. The average Israeli soldier does not like to carry out a policy of repression, doesn't like to fire guns at kids throwing stones, but he doesn't have much choice. It is pretty exasperating.

Unfortunately, 1986 was a transitional period that might have led to something and didn't. Today, it has just gotten worst; it has degenerated greatly since 1988, partly because of the Iraqi policies and the ostensible support that the Palestinians in the occupied territories and in Jordan gave Saddam Hussein. It now will be much more difficult for the Israelis to compromise. The peaceniks in Israel--"The Peace Now" movement, for example--are in disarray and much weaker and less interested in making a deal with the Arabs. Israelis who a few years ago were willing to give up territory--parts of the west Bank and Gaza--no longer feel that way, in part because of their experience with the SCUD missiles from Iraq. They want territorial depth. They are also very unhappy with the Palestinians who were so eager to support Saddam Hussein.

Q: Have the changes in demographics in Israel played a role in this new attitude? Is not today's Israel different from the one we perceived decades ago when the European Jews were predominant?

DRAPER: I think that is true. The dominant forces in the creation of Israel, going back to the beginning of the century, were Ashkenazis--European Jews--from Russia, Poland, Germany. They dominated up to 1948 when Israel was established. Ashkenazi leaders--the Ben Gurions, etc--were in the Labor Party at the time; they had migrated to the kibbutz and had fostered pro-Zionist sentiment. During the founding of the new state, however, many of the so called oriental Jews were brought into Israel from Morocco, Egypt, Yemen, Iraq, India--all over. Their birthrate was higher and their attitudes were more Middle Eastern in many ways--their synagogue is different in appearance, for example and so is their ritual. They have gotten to the point where they are now the dominant element numerically in Israel and that has changed the culture. I first visited Israel in 1958 and the differences are considerable. The music you hear in the streets emanating from cafes and restaurants is very Arabic in nature. In fact, a lot of the so called oriental Jews grew up primarily in an Arabic-speaking culture--Morocco and Yemen especially. They never lost their affinity for that culture. The Jews from Morocco tended to know Arabic and French much better than Hebrew, which they only learned after arriving in Israel. Unfortunately, in Israel's early days, there were great biases directed against the "orientals" by the Europeans to the point that as late as 1970, there were no "oriental" Jews among the top fighter pilots in the Israeli Air Force. All this began to change in 1977, as the "oriental" Jews became increasingly important. Begin, an Ashkenazi, reached out to the "oriental" Jews to gain their support which made it possible for him and his party to win elections after having been out in the wilderness for a long time. In 1958, when I first visited Israel, I was a guest in an Ashkenazi home and they referred to "them"--the "oriental" Jews. There were considerable racial undertones in their comments as if the "orientals" were all second class people. In more recent years, inter-marriages have broken down the barriers and it is clear that the "oriental" Jews are now getting an education which is at least the equivalent of that received by the European Jews. Now the "orientals" are really the balance of force. The Labor Party, which was the home of the Ashkenazis and the Zionists, is no longer in a position to gain a numerical majority, even with its alliances, in the Knesset. The "oriental" Jews tend to be more anti-Arab, are much less willing to be accommodating with the Arab states. They tend to be more conservative religiously although that varies considerably in specific instances. That has effected all kinds of things in the Israeli body politic, including the explosive issue of religion--for example, the definition of what is a Jew. So Israeli life has really changed since its founding, but it has made it in some ways more lively. Israel, in 1991, is much more democratic culturally than it was in 1958 because of the inter-marriages and the co-mingling of various parts of society. An "oriental" Jew from Yemen can succeed in society just as well as his European colleague.

Q: The Palestinian at one time was considered the merchants of the Middle East--shrewd trader--who was interested in education and self-improvement. That drive seems to have atrophied.

DRAPER: I don't think so. The Palestinians at the turn of the century were not considered at the top of the heap by other Arabs. Through the years, starting even before the establishment of Israel, they tended to respond to the Jewish challenge and emulated certain attributes such as respect for education. Therefore, today Palestinians whether living in Kuwait or Jordan or the West Bank tend to have a very high degree of education. They want it. They also tend to be travelers--people who go abroad to seek success and have found it. They migrate the way the more aggressive Chinese did. Today, the Palestinians are considered pretty strong in the sense that they have responded very effectively to the Israeli challenge. It has in fact brought them up to the level where the Lebanese have been all along--excellent traders with a great respect for education. I remember years ago being in a typical Palestinian home in Amman, Jordan, visiting friends; their children were not allowed to watch television after five o'clock in the afternoon; they had to do their homework. They would sit down at the dining room table or where they could and go to work until 10 when they went to bed. It was very interesting.

Q: When you were in Jerusalem, who was the Ambassador and were there any particular problems?

DRAPER: None what so ever. Tom Pickering was the Ambassador. He and I had been good friends for many, many years. We did have problems with an American citizen of Palestinian origin who was a pacifist; he wanted to generate a genuine pacifist movement, a passive resistance to the occupation. It drove the Israelis up the wall. We tended to think that the Israelis tend to overreact to these kinds of activities. They were very upset by another Palestinian, who was not an American citizen, who published an Arab newspaper in Hebrew in an effort to show the Jewish community that there were moderate Palestinians. The Israelis did everything they could to stop distribution of this paper--harmless as it was. There were other incidents of this kind.

It is very difficult to be Consul General in Jerusalem because if you stop just beyond a certain line, the Israeli will consider you and tell you and publicize you as being anti-Israeli or worst, anti-Jewish. The Arabs do the same. You have to walk down a very narrow path. You can stay out of trouble by never saying anything or doing anything, but if you want to encourage interchanges and to know people and if you want to show the flag in different quarters, you have to take risks and can get into a lot of trouble. My wife was criticized the first week we were there by both Arabs and Israelis; so we knew she was doing something right. But you do antagonize people and that has its reverberations. I remember making a sarcastic remark about Meir Kahane, an American born rabbi who headed the Jewish Defense League which supported the expulsion of Palestinians from the territories. I found him repulsive and I told that to a Jewish American group that was visiting; I received scores of letters of complaint to me, to the Department, to the White House. I was always in that kind of trouble. I escaped some of it because Teddy Kollek, the Mayor of Jerusalem, defended me vigorously before the members of the Jewish American community. But it was a hard task. I was criticized by the Jordanian government for some of the positions I had taken, mainly because the Jordanians wanted more jurisdiction over our modest economic assistance program. The American employees of the Consulate General were also laboring under impressions left by previous generations of Foreign Service officers. Congressmen would come on visits and sort of automatically expected that the Consulate General's employees would tilt irreversibly toward the Arab side. That was very hard on junior officers. As I mentioned before during our discussion of UN forces, American officers tend to sympathize with the "under-dog". The Palestinians are the "under-dogs". Some of that creeps into your views, but you can't afford to let that bias your reporting.

Q: Did you have seminars with your officers?

DRAPER: Yes, of course. These biases work both ways. We couldn't fantasize the Israelis as people who turned the deserts into gardens. You have to be objective as possible, although it is very difficult. We tried to handle this in various ways, by making sure that we had bonding with both sides. The Chief of our Political section, who spoke beautiful Hebrew and beautiful Arabic, was one of the people who emulated my example and brought Arabs and Israelis together. So we had ways to bridge the gaps. Many Israeli organizations took the initiative and invited our staff to see their kibbutzim or their organizations. We were particularly interested in organizations on both sides that tried to hold out a hand to the other side.

There was another not-too-well understood factor of living in Jerusalem. There were certain people who sought to be stationed there for reasons that weren't so imperative, including religious reasons. So there were some Americans in the organization that were fine people who did excellent work, but had come to Jerusalem for cultural or religious reasons. That is a major factor; you could be an atheist in Jerusalem and yet you would have to be affected by being at the well-springs of major monotheistic religions--Islam, Judaism, Christianity. There are many parts of Jerusalem that look the same today as they did 2,500 years ago--absent the television aerials. You can easily see the marks the many invaders have left, going back to Chadians to the Mamelukes, the Turks, the Jews, the British, etc. It is one of the most fascinating and attractive cities of the world because of the interplay of history.

Q: How would an officer with strong religious views be affected by an assignment to Jerusalem?

DRAPER: We had Jewish officers there, including one who was very exposed because he was the chief of the Consular Section. It never hurt his performance or the attitude that the Arabs had towards him. They regarded him as a very tough individual, but they thought he was fair. They didn't think that he made decisions on the basis of his Jewish heritage. That didn't work with everybody. It worked with this officer because he made such an effort because he made a conscious attempt to have a mixed of national employees, both Jewish and Palestinians.

We were improving our language capacity all the time; our junior staff was very good. Often they had had Arabic training before they got to Jerusalem and then they studied Hebrew while they were there and used it. I didn't see on the staff any very militant Christian, but had there been one, it could have effected his performance. I am speaking theoretically because many of the fundamentalist Christian groups in the US are vigorous supporters of Israel, partly because they believe in a literal interpretation of the Bible, which includes designation of the Jews as the "Chosen People". I used to tease my Israeli friends by pointing out to them that they were getting such strong support from Southern Baptist groups; I said that the reason was that when Judgment Day came they expected the Jews and their supporters to be chosen. I can only speak to the question of the effect of personal religious convictions on a Foreign Service officer from a theoretical point of view. I do think that a person in the Jerusalem Consulate General has to watch out very carefully for the hidden agendas that some people have. In Jerusalem, there are inter-racial tensions, compounded by inter-religious differences. In the C.G., among our national employees, we had Israeli Jews, we had Israeli Arabs, we had Palestinians of various denominations. When one person died, who was an Armenian, the Armenian Patriarch called and said that he had a number of candidates that we should consider for what he called the "Armenian slot" in the American mission. So we had pressures of that kind.

Q: Did you feel that there was an Israeli intelligence officer among your staff?

DRAPER: We had to fire one person that we were pretty sure was a de facto Israeli agent; on the other hand, there were a couple of Arab employees that we were sure were passing along everything they could to their clandestine organization. But a lot of this doesn't matter. We used to speak on the phone in the hopes that the intelligence service would pick it up. We did that for our own purposes. There was only one case where we had a problem and that resulted in the discharge of the employee, as I mentioned earlier. It was complicated because not only was there an Israeli angle to it, but there was also a third country angle.

We had the usual other problems sometimes compounded by the need of people to get along with each other, but who were jealous about other's promotions. We had an inspection at the end of 1986 or the beginning of 1987 which was very useful. In the inspection group was a wise old consular officer who looked at our rather large consular establishment which was doing more business than Tel Aviv with only about half the staff. This inspector suggested that we should have a greater hierarchy--more leaders, sub-leaders, etc. We were concerned about doing this because it inevitably an Armenian might come out ahead of a Roman Catholic or Jew ahead of a Palestinian. But we wanted to make the section work better. The logical answer was a more hierarchal answer in rank, specialization and duties; we had one Chief and a lot of Indians. This inspector had served in Canada and Belgium where friction between religious and ethnic groups was very much a problem. He convinced us that we could restructure; we followed his advice and did so, with good results, even though the jealousy arose. We handled it in the public relations way by telling all that the rivalries were negated by the advancement opportunities that the new organizational structure provided.

There were other complications resulting from wars and invasions, including that our old-time employees--people who had been with us before 1967--claimed exemption from Israeli income taxes by the virtue of their Jordanian citizenship, which theoretically made them still subject to Jordanian law. Oddly enough, Israel applied Jordanian as well as British mandate law to the territories as well as some part of Israeli law. Even to this day, I expect that there are pressures on these employees to pay Israeli income taxes. On the other side, Israeli citizens who were clearly subject to income taxes insisted all along that they be paid in cash and not by check so that the income paper trail is not so clear. This is something that virtually every Israeli citizen wants done; otherwise he would be wiped out by income taxes were the rates are 70 percent or more. The inspectors looked at our financial system both in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. We used some common arrangements. They pointed out that up to one half of our manpower could be saved by switching from a cash to a check basis. The head of the Israeli national employees immediately made it clear that every Israeli would walk out of the C.G. and out the Embassy in Tel Aviv if we switched systems. So here was a situation where the US could have increased efficiency and saved money, but was limited by local customs. Finally we worked out a system by which the Israeli citizens hired a retired employee, who would keep the books. The checks were sent to him and he would then pay the employees in cash; it required this fellow to spend ten to fourteen days in the Embassy and the C.G. to make the system work.

Q: There is a point of view in Washington which believes that everything reported from American officials in Israel ends up sooner rather than later in the Israeli Foreign Ministry and on Capitol Hill. Is there any truth to this?

DRAPER: It was a factor that inhibited some people from declaring forthrightly what they wanted to say. I made it very clear to our reporting officers that we had to bend over backwards to appear objective. That meant use of "code" words and the tone of objectivity had to be clear. That however should not stop them from stating forthrightly what was happening. In some areas as human rights violations, we had to be accurate. We couldn't say that three houses had been demolished last night at 12 a.m. when in fact it had been four at 1 a.m. We had to describe our sources; we tried to follow as much as possible the newspaper rules that there be at least two sources to verify a story. It was kind of interesting, but we got very little flack and our reporting was held up as a model around the world. Actually the C.G. was chosen as one of the ten best missions inspected that year and our reporting was ranked as highly as possible. When you think about "code" words, it is very easy for things to creep in--all too easily. For example, we reported very assiduously about how people were arrested. In a series of reports, we showed that Israeli prosecutors had a 100 percent record of convictions in military courts. That is not possible statistically. These arrests included Palestinians and American citizens. One citizen was arrested because he happened to be on the fringes of a riot in Rammullah; he was brought before the Israeli authorities and even the violation citation contradicted the testimony in court. We had a full record of the proceedings. The prosecution didn't have any basis in law even to charge the defendant. The judge took secret testimony from an "intelligence" source which was customary in Israeli courts and then came out and handed down a sentence on the American citizen. It was a trumped up case, but the judge tried to mitigate by not giving a sentence even though he found the defended guilty. So the American citizen was not actually harmed except that a sentence appeared on his record. We had many cases like this which clearly showed that the Israeli establishment was not willing to admit that it could be occasionally wrong or that in some cases it did not have adequate evidence. Our reports were very strong and aroused considerable controversy in Washington--so much so that our then assistant secretary for Human Rights--Dick Schifter--came out and talked to me privately about the nature of our civil right complaints. I was able to show him that we were being extra careful in our conclusions and in reporting the facts so that others could draw their own conclusions. Finally, he agreed to some degree. It was a tricky issue because the mission in Jerusalem in the past had gone a little overboard without adequate facts. That had been remembered by many people, including me. But we didn't get too much flak about it; our human rights submission was so carefully done that the real battle occurred in Washington on the question of how much of our reporting to include in the final report. The Israelis were very upset when the report came out and blamed us quite a bit for it, but not as much as I thought they would. The Israeli press was tolerant. I had many interviews with the Israeli media and was very outspoken about such matters as the Jewish lobby in the United States, about the need for objective reporting by the Consulate General, about the need to portray a balanced picture--some of which helped us, some didn't--, but they got a straight story from us.

I had a situation in which one of the most distinguished, successful and revered attorneys in Israel, whose pro-Zionist sentiments could never be challenged in any way, told me once in great confidence about his disappointments with the Israeli judicial system. He described what he called its corrupt nature starting from 1947-48 and up to the present. He confessed that he had gotten to the point where he no longer went into a courtroom willingly because he was so disgusted by the corruption of the system. This was a conversation worth reporting to Washington, but I could not identify him by name because I had to anticipate that this would become known to quarters that might try to get even with him and that might even try to ruin his reputation unfairly. Besides, his story was given to me in confidence. There are cases like this where we had to report the substance, but not divulge the source. That does weaken the report to some extent, just like a newspaper column that quotes "unnamed sources" is sometime suspect. But by identifying the source too closely, it would have been harmful and perhaps dangerous. So there were cases where we didn't change the thrust of the report, but we did not divulge the sources. That was done for both Palestinians and Israelis.

Q: On the question of corruption, what kind was he referring to?

DRAPER: He was particularly unhappy with the appointment of judges, beginning in 1977 with Begin's assumption of power. He and his party had been out in the political wilderness since the formation of the state; therefore he had to find jobs for his followers. Many were put into the senior ranks of the Civil Service and the Labor Party incumbent was pushed out. My lawyer friend pointed out that many of the judges appointed by the Likud Party had no knowledge of the law; they were appointed for political reasons. It was getting worst. At the beginning at least these new judges tried to get help from lawyers and law students, but by the time I was there, not even that much was being done. He confirmed to us that the military courts were even worst; they had, as I mentioned, a 100 percent conviction record because of their willingness to use essentially illegal or unethical methods to make their point--"we have secret evidence that shows, etc". So the lawyer was very unhappy; he had great respect with what Israel had originally tried to do with the law--a system much of it based on British mandatory civil law, which incorporated the Judaic laws and customs. He was very proud of what had been done. he had been educated in England and had been a member of the bar--Queen's Council--he had very high standards and felt very strongly about the problems.

We often run into charges of corruption of this once clean and wonderful society. One friend of mine had been a young man in Palestine before the formation of Israel and lived in a Jewish community in Tel Aviv. He said that there, even with all the frictions, people left their doors open and that there was very little crime. After Israel became a state, a police force had to be set up which very few Jews had ever willingly joined under the British mandate. Suddenly, there were crime waves which had been unheard of before. Jews became crime lords for the first time in this little idyllic Zionist-inspired community. All of a sudden, all the vices of the world descended on them almost overnight. I saw this even in the '70s or '80s when Israel was essentially a non-consumer of narcotics, although hashish and other drugs were easily available. Very few Israelis ever used drugs and drank only very modestly. Much of that change although Israelis by and large do not drink very much alcohol; it is not a major problem, but the use of drugs has exploded in Israel in part because of the partial occupation of Lebanon starting in 1978. The drug smuggling trade has moved in part across Israel in route to Egypt and other places. The country has changed. The drug use is a problem, not to the extent we have in the US, but is it pretty significant for a society that never had this problem before.

Q: Did you feel that there was ever a disinformation campaign, not only against you, but also against our Consulate General in Jerusalem?

DRAPER: Yes, but I had some historic perspective on this because I had watched the efforts to discredit the mission going back to late '50s. I recall that in 1981 it was the first time that an Israeli Foreign Ministry official showed up at the C.G., wishing to see me when I was working on the withdrawal of the Israeli from the Sinai. As part of that effort, we had to talk to Israeli officials in our offices which were in the Consulate General. It was the first time that an Israeli official walked through those doors because of the prohibitions that had existed until then. When I became the Consul General, I knew the whole Israeli Cabinet and most of the top officials in the army from my previous incarnations and therefore was able to invite some Israeli officials to my house that had never been there before because they had been prohibited from visiting the American compound. There are still prohibition against Foreign Ministry people and certain others like Mossad intelligence people, but I broke a lot of those barriers when I was assigned to Jerusalem. I saw Israeli Cabinet officials and politicians regularly; so the situation has eased. It would not have happened with some of my predecessors; no Israeli official would have been seen in public with the American Consul General except perhaps at a party. We also reduced some of our foolishness. We used to be very strict about officials visiting Jerusalem and not being in the company of Israelis. This got to be ridiculous when it came to someone like Teddy Kollek, the mayor, who wanted to show hospitality. So we altered a lot of rules as well to be more pragmatic. When Vice-President George Bush came, he wanted a lot of photographs showing him in Jerusalem and he was in the company of Kollek who escorted him around. That would not have been possible fifteen years earlier because of our strict regulations of what could be done in Jerusalem. We did not recognize an Israeli Mayor of Jerusalem. There was clear prejudice against us; when I mentioned that I was the Consul General, it was quite clear that both the staff and I were viewed as automatically as anti-Israeli. That went with the position.

Q: Did you deal with Palestinian leaders? You were, I believe, not permitted to deal with the PLO.

DRAPER: We tried to deal with everybody across the board including the super militants. Many of the Palestinians would not talk to any of us. When the Intifada began, much of the leadership switched to the hands of young people--17, 18, 19, 20 year olds. Very, very few of them would come out of the woodwork to talk to us--very few. They were in the forefront of University students who were viciously anti-American. They were also very difficult to communicate with any young person in a refugee camp. Very few of the so-called refugees live in camps; most live in towns and villages. It was almost impossible to get to the people in the camps. It was very difficult to get to the real hot-heads in Gaza--which was both in and outside of the C.G.'s district. Ambassador Pickering and I had an arrangement; we often visited Gaza together to see particularly some of the old time politicians. I went to Gaza to talk to the people there, but most of the contact work there was done by the Embassy staff. That was an arbitrary arrangement which helped our consular problem. We had quite a few economic assistance projects in Gaza which were managed out of Jerusalem, so that we had to go there periodically. Some of the non-governmental organizations--the charitable organizations--operated in both areas so that we had to be contact for that reason. But we had a working arrangement with Tel Aviv and the coverage of Gaza was not a problem.

The other group that was almost impossible to deal with was the militant Muslim faction, with a few exceptions. That great Chief of the Political Section that I mentioned before had made real inroads with some of the relatively youthful mullahs--the non-traditional Moslem clerics--in various parts of the territories. I made a sort of a break-through with the Grand Mufti who for the first time ever paid a call on me in my residence in Israeli Jerusalem. It was the first time he had ever crossed the "green" line. But it was very hard to get into that Muslim faction. We had an insight in what was happening because people in contact with these groups would report to us what was going on. We used the newspapers, the media, the journalists who had a comradery with these groups. We didn't ask whether someone was a PLO or PLPF (The Palestinian Liberation Popular Front) agent.

We had one problem with the Mayor of Nablus who was assassinated the day after he had dinner with me. I was on lists of assassination targets, made by a couple of the extremist groups--one being George Habash's Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine--, which effected my security. The situation was comparable in some ways to countries where we have a very difficult time being in contact with the young rebellious elements to the extent we would like to. For example, it was somewhat comparable to Turkey in 1970 when I was there; we didn't have clue about what the young university students were thinking or doing. Otherwise, the average Palestinian is a real talker and finds it difficult not have an exchange even with the "evil Americans". So we were able to keep our fingers on the pulse, except for those two groups.

Faisal Husseni, who is now the leader of the Palestinian group who seems to be in dutch now with Secretary Baker and others, was a difficult man; he didn't want to ruin his militant credentials by seeing Americans, but we were able to be in touch with him, but we had to be careful about his own security and his own credibility. We had to be careful about being seen with persons who were in trouble with their own people. The Mayor of Bethlehem was a good example. He was considered as an "Uncle Tom" by a lot of the Palestinians and then when Americans would show up at his house regularly that added to his woes. Sometimes that increased the threats on his life.

Q: What about AIPAC (American-Israeli Political Action Committee)? Did they visit you and view you as an agent for the enemy?

DRAPER: I don't think so. I was friendly with most of the AIPAC leadership and many of their major contributors because of my previous position as Deputy Assistant Secretary. The President of AIPAC and others when they came to Jerusalem would get in touch with me and we would speak very frankly to each other about what was going on. AIPAC is pretty professional; I was more concerned about people who were not so and were much more amorphous and super sympathetic to Israel, but not so knowledgeable about the Israeli domestic scene. Or people who had a load of prejudices. The people who were really venomous were the followers of Rabbi Meir Kahane; some I refused to have anything to do with. One was the publisher of a newsletter which was poisonous, vicious and racist. He wanted an interview with me and I didn't want to give him even that much respectability. That caused me a certain amount of problems among certain Israeli loyalists, but not the main-stream Jewish community.

Q: Were you asked to present the Palestinian side to American Jewish groups that visited Jerusalem?

DRAPER: No, not for that purpose, but I did make presentations to these groups; they wanted to know what was going on--how the Arabs felt, about the human rights situation, etc. I would tell them. Many first time visitors to the United States, after seeing Disneyland, want to go find militant blacks. So we had many American Jews coming who wanted to talk face-to-face with one of the opponents of Israel; they wanted to see one of those "killers". I mentioned that I had briefed a Jewish group during which I had criticized Meir Kahane in very graphic terms; I thought most of the people there were pretty sophisticated and not particularly secular, but I did get some of the group very upset because of my criticism of the rabbi. I called him "irrelevant" and that really bothered some. The person who was particularly concerned was a very secular minded Jewish businessman from Philadelphia. So you never know. If you criticize a Jew, you are liable to be called anti-Semitic.

Q: While you were Consul General between 1986 and 1988, the Intifada began. How did it look to you at the time?

DRAPER: I recently have reviewed an interview I had given at the time. I pointed out at the time that we had been tracing a rise in tensions, measured statistically by number of incidents, violence, etc that had taken place in the previous two years. There was unquestionably a steady increase. We had been predicting for some time in our reporting that there would be an explosion. I also said in that interview that after the predicted explosion, the situation would stabilize but at a higher level of tensions than before. Frankly, we were a little surprised at the endurance of the Intifada. It was beginning to resemble what had happened between 1936 and 1939 when the Arabs rose en masse against the British and the Jews.

The uprising was well covered by the media. It took the form of demonstrations and rock throwing, fires, etc. by kids in grammar school and junior high school equivalent and high school. We watched fires and the closing of streets in part of Arab Jerusalem by young people 15, 16 and 17 years old. They got into big trucks and walked up alleys, etc. It was the young people who were taking charge at the beginning. Part of what was done at the beginning was the closing of shops by the merchants. There was a total boycott of business activity for certain hours, weeks and days which was only relaxed for the purchase of food stuffs and other necessities. There were boycotts against Israeli manufactured goods. Some of this was happening spontaneously in school yards where things like this always happen. The middle aged traditional leaders were dying to get a grip on the uprising. They didn't know what to do. The PLO was very slow to react; it didn't know what was going on. In fact, it is always slow; when something did happen in the occupied territories, it took it a week to make up its mind what to do. If a university were closed, there be no reaction from the PLO for four or five days; then it would come down on it. The PLO surrogates in the territories didn't have anything to say initially about the Intifada; I know because I was talking to them. Finally the PLO sort of embraced it and then the main stream PLO leadership in the territories also came along, after a week or two. The young people were quite clever; they were natural leaders--some better than their elders. These young people came from everywhere--private schools, camps, etc. the camps were more obvious because the troops would enter the camps more often for confrontations. The troops were told to tear down Palestinian flags; they would look at a refugee camp which was mostly a slum and they would see these flags and go after them. That is what created the major part of the confrontations. But there were just as many in private schools, religious schools--many were run by Christian organizations--and there was just as much uproar there as in the camps. The camps were simply more conspicuous because the troops were there and some are on main roads and intersections and the demonstrations could cause real problems for entryway. In Nablus, there are two main refugee camps which straddle the two main highways leading into the city from the East and North-South. The troops had to something just to keep the traffic flowing. Our mission cars were stoned regularly going through the gauntlet. These areas were point of confrontation, but the Intifada was very wide spread. It could be found in all sorts of places. The press told all kinds of great stories of what was going on because at times they would go into dead ends or little villages and find people who were shouting for the Intifada, particularly when they found out that the stranger was a newspaper man. There were a lot of narrow escapes. The resentment was very wide spread.

One very clever man that I knew--rich middle class who owned a business--, who might be called a PLO moderate said that he got very excited about what was going on. He thought the real stimulus came a few weeks before the Intifada broke out when a Palestinian guerrilla team from Southern Lebanon had entered Israel and had attacked an Israeli army camp with only indifferent success--they killed a few Israelis, but the guerrillas were also killed. This man said that as a Palestinian, he felt proud of these people because they were young, had never lived in Palestine and they had risked their lives and most importantly had attacked Israeli military targets instead of schools or other civilian targets. He always felt embarrassed when the Palestinians only seemed interested in terrorism--bombs in city markets, killing school children, etc. For the first time, they had attacked Israeli soldiers. This was a team that was airborne--kites or balloons or whatever. He was very proud of that incident and felt that had helped to spark the Intifada because it showed that Palestinians were willing to die fighting Israeli soldiers.

Anybody who was familiar with the territories knew that something would blow. We didn't know how high it would blow. We in the Consulate General in Jerusalem were far more concerned about some nuts who might set fires or try to destroy some of the Islamic monuments, like the Mosque on the Temple Mount. We knew what had happened in 1968-69 when riots broke out all over the Islamic world if they thought Americans had anything to do with what had happened. We were always concerned with that kind of reaction. The real Jewish "crazies" tend to be from the United States. There is still a group, mainly of American born Jews, who do not recognize Israel as a secular state who have a Yeshiva--a religious school--yards away from the Temple Mount, Sherif, what the Arabs call the "noble enclosure". We were more worried about that possibility than a massive Palestinian uprising.

I think the Israelis were taken by surprise; their standard techniques of intimidation and control did not work, so they resorted to actions which drew vast criticism and justly so. They ordered the troops to break arms and legs and to beat up people. The Israelis have found it very difficult to get a handle on the Intifada; it is very difficult to know what to do when 8 year olds throw stones at you; it is very difficult for anyone to make war on children. One Israeli police officer described to me once a situation in which the police had to control a riot by the super-ultra-conservative groups in Israel, which came mainly from Brooklyn. The policeman told me about coming up against one of these bearded men of 60--very venerable, scholarly--and a person with very little physical strength because he spent most of his life behind a desk, studying. The policeman had quashed the riot, but found it personally difficult to move against this gentleman, because he looked so much like his own grandfather. So it was very difficult for young Israeli soldiers, even if they despises Arabs, to make war on children. They didn't know what to do and they still don't.

Q: Was your staff covering these uprisings and were they effected by what they saw?

DRAPER: In the two years I was in Jerusalem, there were quite few riots and disturbances of various kinds and killings. Our officers would cover these events to try to see if they could get in contact with various leaders to get a feel for what was happening. We had some success with that. We always got copies of the handbills; we monitored the media to see what the two populations were being told and what effect that might have on their attitudes. We knew the major trends and could describe those. But we did not go to see a riot for a riot's sake. Some visitors were interested in seeing some of the action. We had one Congressman who wanted to see some stone throwing. That somewhat upset me. One of our officers took him to the outskirts of a refugee camp in the company of the UNRA officials. Sure enough, some of the school children started throwing stones at an Israeli patrol that went by. One thing led to another and the Israelis threw back tear gas. The Congressman got a good look at what was going on, but that I had to tell him later that we were not in the tourist business for this sort of thing; it wasn't worth it and took too many of our resources and that I didn't want our junior officers out looking for trouble. I am familiar with the process in the United States. If you want to get attention, you can manipulate a press attendance at an event; we did in Jerusalem get wind of a lot of upcoming incidents because the media was being notified by the perpetrators.

The Israelis, particularly Teddy Kollek, the Mayor of Jerusalem, did a lot of things to head off problems and to forestall events that might have gotten out of hand. He was trying to keep peace in Jerusalem; he instructed his municipal police on what they could and could not do and they were much better than the Israeli army at controlling disturbances. For a long time, Jerusalem was fairly quiet, besides the occasional stabbing. Many of the problems could be forestalled by not allowing or keeping control of religious demonstrations. For example, once a year, there were groups of Israelis who thought they had a right to visit Temple Mount; that can be done if you are very careful and you warn the Arabs that it would happen. Teddy would often let me know what was going on to see whether we could help in various ways. There are always people who want to exploit tense situations. Riots can easily get out of control, especially in the Temple Mount-Harash el Sherif area because there are loud speakers all over the area. It is has been a custom for the Mufti and others to shout over the speaker if there is any perceived danger. Before you know it, there are tens of thousands of people running to defended the Holy places as the Mufti has encouraged them to do; they drop whatever they are doing and are all running for one spot. It could have been a very innocent situation or a modest problem; when the police force armed with only a few shotguns watch thousands of people carrying knives rushing into their vicinity, it gets kind of nervous.

Q: What was your impression of Arafat's leadership in the 1986-88 period?

DRAPER: There were a few pictures of him around, but it wasn't much. Arafat had a lot influence; there is no question of that, but he was losing it with the younger people and the Muslim militants. His strength was in the refugee camps among people who didn't move out of the camps. There is a division in the Palestinian movement; there are some Palestinians who are in effect willing to forget going back to Haifa or any part of Israel proper and are willing to take the West Bank and Gaza and be satisfied with that. The other group who insist on returning to the same spots where they lived in 1947 and will never be happy until that happens. Too much time has passed for the latter group. Arafat, until about a year ago, always took the line that the Palestinians had to return to where they lived in 1947 and had to recover all the land they lived on then or at least he was ambivalent on the issue. A lot of the people who supported Arafat did so because at least he had not given up to returning to their former towns and settlements. On the other hand, the pragmatists, who wanted to make a deal with Israel would have been satisfied with East Jerusalem and the west Bank and Gaza. So there were always those tensions between the two groups. There were some of Arafat's deputies, including the ones that were assassinated in the last two years, let the word out that they wanted to destroy Israel. The pragmatists and those who finally got Arafat to move a little in his position were those who were willing to make a deal with Israel. But they did not have the charismatic quality that Arafat had. From an American point of view, that is of course mystifying because we don't see Arafat a charismatic; to me he looks like a druggist in Jerusalem. But he had a fatherly, avuncular quality; he has been a survivor--he has good luck; he has his tail dragging, but it is still wagging; he has gone through a lot of difficult situations. He is called the "old man" in an affectionate way by his cohorts and by the masses. The trouble with the Palestinians is that if they didn't have the PLO, they would have to invent it. They haven't been politically sufficiently aware to make a difference. There is no home-grown movement in the territories; it is easier for them to owe quasi-allegiance to Arafat and the PLO, now stationed in Tunis, then to organize themselves. And why is that? Because the Palestinians themselves are balkanized--Christian Palestinians against Moslem Palestinians, people from Hebron against those others. These tensions are endemic. Even in municipal elections, families counts; it is a very traditional, old fashioned society and very tribal. People in the South end like Hebron are very conservative--no liquor, no beer. It is like Saudi Arabia--super conservative. On the other hand, 75 miles to the North, it is just the opposite. The Palestinians are very fragmented and they do not have any sense of unity. When we used to get together Palestinian groups to meet with Secretary Shultz or others, it was very difficult to get a group of less than fifteen because otherwise you couldn't represent all the Palestinian factions. Many of the ordinary Palestinians looked down on the refugees, especially those who lived in camps. In fact, some Palestinians felt that anyone who came to live in one of the West Bank cities after 1949, he was just a refugee and was not one of them. There were those splits. These tensions explain why the people in the territories have never been able to organize anything for themselves; they could never agree on their own leadership.

A start was made some years ago, with our encouragement, when there were free elections for Mayors of towns and cities. Some of the winners were strong critics of Israel--in fact, they were all strong critics--, but most were pragmatists and not radicals. But the Israelis couldn't even tolerate the moderates; so they expelled many of them, including one who is now the main PLO representative in Amman, who is about as moderate as one can get, but the Israeli have no tolerance for that kind of opposition and did not allow home-grown development of Palestinian leadership. The Israelis are now paying the consequences of that misguided policy; there are no leaders in the territories. The Israelis would argue that if the leadership had existed, the Intifada would have been much worst; they may be right.

Q: What happened to you after your tour in Jerusalem?

DRAPER: After my return to Washington, I did some short term assignments, such as a study of security problems in rehabilitating Embassy buildings abroad. That was partly related to the question of what we should do about our Embassy in Moscow. And I did some other studies. Then I retired.

Q: From your long time perspective, what do you see as the future of Israel and Palestine?

DRAPER: First of all, I agree with an Israeli journalist, who is a friend, that despite the changes in Israel's culture and politics and despite the fact that a lot of the elan has gone out of the Israeli national esprit, Israel will somehow prevail and survive the threat. A few years ago, I wasn't quite so sure, but I feel more strongly about that prediction today. As far as the resolution of the Arab-Israeli problem, I am pessimistic, but I am not despairing. I am intrigued by some of the signals coming out of the Middle East now--the hints that Syria might possibly make a deal with Israel, the desire of many countries to get on the good side of the United States. I believe that we never had a better opportunity to make some progress since the 1973 War in part because of this magnificent coalition the US put together against Iraq and in part because of our spectacular military success and in part because the Russians are no longer a major negative feature and in fact are cooperating to a certain extent with the United States. They are not acting as a rival or as an opponent, for the time being. Finally, the opportunity exists because George Bush probably has another five years in office. It is a virtual certainty that he will be re-elected in 1992; so there won't be the same problem that arose in 1979-80 when President Carter was unwilling to put his prestige on the line for another major effort of the kind that had exhausted him earlier when the Egypt-Israeli treaty was negotiated and signed. We won't have the same problem we had at the end of the Reagan administration when Secretary of State Shultz was trying to do something, but the President was then a "lame duck" and wasn't putting any enthusiasm behind his Secretary's efforts. So there are a lot of features at the present which will be helpful assuming that we want to push. Also on the positive side, there are some Israelis who are embarrassed by the negative stance that Shamir and others have been taking for all these years; they would like to find a second best arrangement that would still protect Israeli security. On the other hand, there are more deep seeded negative feelings and features than we have seen for several years, including the wide spread support by the Palestinians throughout the world for Saddam Hussein. One of the consequences of the Iraqi SCUD missiles attacks on Israel was to heighten the Israeli feelings of vulnerability against future hostile attacks on their little, narrow country. This feeling is spread throughout the population; it can not be ignored. The Israelis took modest casualties, but there was a lot of damage, including the strengthening of the feeling of insecurity. After all, if the Iraqis had managed to put poison gas or atomic or germ warheads on the missiles, there would have far greater panic than there was with very serious consequences. That makes the Israelis want the depth; they don't want to be decompressed into a smaller country. That makes it very difficult for those Israelis who a few years ago were willing to trade "land for peace" with the Arabs; they no longer have the influence and their own enthusiasm has waned. It will be very difficult for any intermediary such as the United States, but we are stuck in the Middle East and it would be shameful if we did not press our advantage, such as it is. Even during this last week, we established refugee camps for the Kurds in North-west Iraq and that is a remarkable development. What are we getting into and how soon can we get out? We made a major morale commitment to doing something about the Middle East and that is not something that can be ignored. We should not forget that the emotions aroused by the Kurds' plight, as communicated to European and Americans, caused turns in our policy while similar disasters in the Sudan and Africa have not had the same results.

So I think it will be more difficult to deal with the substantive positions than it has been, but it will be easier to deal with the procedural situations. The Israelis are now willing to talk about the possibility of a regional conference, perhaps they are not that concerned about the Russians anymore. This would not have been possible a few years ago. The problem is permanent though for us in one sense; we always had the problem of how to arrange the substantive aspects of the Arab-Israeli problem--the procedural obstacles and problems we face getting there and combining these all with the American and Israeli domestic political problems. It is a very complicated approach. We have been talking about this during the last week at the Institute for Peace; one of things that we all agree on is that the Arabs by and large have regarded procedural matters as a means of protecting their substantive positions; Americans have often looked at procedural issues--where to hold the conference, how to organize it, etc--as a way through which substantive positions of one or more of the parties can be changed, which is a very ambitious concept. But let's face it; there will never be the kind of peace and stability that we need unless the substantive positions of all the parties change to some degree. Ambassador Hart, who is a pretty savvy guy, said to me once that, with reference to Yemen in the early '60s after the Egyptians had invaded the country, if we can leave things alone in Yemen, they will eventually come out with some kind of workable solution which will allow them to live with the Saudis and maybe shirk off the Egyptians, but it will be very untidy and messy solution which we Americans and other Westerns will never understand; but Arabs can sometime put something together like that, however illogical. I think ultimately something like that will have to be developed in the Middle East because it is a society in an area which we Americans do not really understand very well--we have a feel for it, but no real deep understanding. It is basically a bazaar and the parties will have to work out an arrangement in the same way they reach a selling and buying price by haggling. If we forget that it is a bazaar and try to approach the resolution as if it were a labor dispute in Detroit, it will not be worked out. We will have to encourage the process at least through the haggling.

PAUL H. TYSON
Sinai Multi-National Force & Observer Mission
El Gorah, Sinai (1985-1986)

Mr. Tyson was born in Virginia into a US military family and was raised in army posts in the United States and abroad. Educated at Dartmouth College and George Washington University he entered the Foreign Service in 1974. As a trained Economic Officer, Mr. Tyson served in a number of foreign posts, including Bonn, Dhahran, London and Kuwait City. His Washington Assignments were primarily in the petroleum and international economic fields. Mr. Tyson also served with the Sinai Multi-National Force & Observer Mission. Mr. Tyson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

TYSON: It was a grudging type of thing and I ran across another econ officer who had virtually an identical experience and had done the same thing – just pulled the plug, and I think the Asia Bureau and others were going, “This is not good.” So I ended up going on to a year in the MFO in the Sinai.

Q: MFO stood for what?

TYSON: Multi-national Force and Observers.

Q: Let's talk about that. You were doing that from when to when?

TYSON: I ended up going out in April of 1985 to El Gorah in the Sinai, and stayed there until basically April or May of '86.

Q: Why did we have something there, and what were you doing?

TYSON: This went back to the Camp David Accords and the Israeli staged withdrawal from the Sinai. It was finally completed in 1983. Initially there had been something called the Sinai Field Mission. Let me back up a bit. I think there had been an attempt to have a UN [United Nations] force out there, but the Russians were difficult about it. So we created the Sinai Field Mission, or maybe that came later, but the Sinai Field Mission was there to monitor...

Q: Also I don't think the Israelis would, having been burned by the UN before, they weren't going to take anything with a UN label.

TYSON: I think that's true, although they still had some vestigial UN observers present in the Sinai even when I was there. The Sinai Field Mission had been there and they had been running a lot of monitoring sites at Gidi and Mitla Passes. And then, I think at the actual time of the withdrawal, it reconfigured itself into the Multi-National Force and Observers. So we had the U.S., the Brits, the Dutch, the French, the Italians, the Anzacs, the Colombians, and the Uruguayans, and the Fijians out there all doing this. And the civilian observer group at that point was about twenty-six people. The process was that you resigned from the Foreign Service and you were employed by the MFO, but you had reemployment rights. The observers were commanded by a Foreign Service Officer, Bob Steven, while I was out there. His deputy was Lou Kachanic. About half of the people were retired or ex-military and the other half were Foreign Service Officers.

Basically what you did was monitoring and verification in the Sinai. You had a three kilometer long strip inside Israel along their border, and then the entire Sinai. There were different zones as to what the Egyptians were permitted to have where, and a number of other things. You'd look for violations like they had a tank here when they shouldn't or they had heavy artillery here when they shouldn't. That's what you did. You ran around in stunning orange uniforms - the orange jumpsuit was particularly fetching, which really made you stand out. It was interesting because the garbage sweepers in Saudi Arabia wore that. But you had your orange jumpsuits with your American flag on it and your MFO seal and stuff like this.

Actually it was one of the great adventures. You know, you were out there in sort of a paramilitary organization, you had a huge fascinating portion of the world, you had vehicles and aircraft at your disposal, and minefields and stuff. It wasn't all beer and Skittles. And a tough environment, but quite an adventure. Quite an introduction to the Middle East. You know you'd do the Israelis in the morning and the Egyptians in the afternoon, so you got a chance to see both sides. You had access through the border so you literally could drive into Tel Aviv or Jerusalem for the weekend. It was quite interesting. I think you had, I fit the profile coming off a divorce, but you had divorce-wounded or people paying for kids in college or this was a good way to get the hardship post requirement out of the way in the year.

Q: What was your impression of first, the Israelis, and then the Egyptians, and how they were reacting to the situation? I mean, was this really active or had we gone quiet?

TYSON: It was pretty much sort of quiet. Every now and then you'd get a hard-liner on the Egyptian or the Israeli side with a real hard-on about the other side and your presence there, and you'd sort of have to slap them down. But a lot of the Israelis, actually, were reservists. And also what happened is both sides tended to pick people with foreign language ability to deal with us. You know, Egypt had a draft and all of these poor French literature or English literature majors from Alexandria or Cairo ended up in their equivalent of East Coffee Cup, Mississippi. You know, serving beyond the beyond, dealing with these foreigners. Some really nice, sweet kids, but there they were butting up against Gaza and stuff. And you know, they're all twenty-two. They're all far from home. That was the Egyptians who we tended to have more contact with. If you went into Israel you'd often get someone who is a diamond dealer in Netanya and he's got a branch office in New York and he's got the BMW in Herzliya. It was no real problem dealing with them.

Some of the verification was done in vehicles, some in helicopters. A lot of our ex-military guys were special forces. There was a tendency to do the macho thing of "how quickly can I do it from lift-off to touchdown at the airfield?" and the operations director was Andy Biotus. He was a retired army colonel, I think. One day he called me in and he said, "I will see you six hours from now. You are going to do the 'tea tour'." One of the reasons that they had FSOs along on this, was for the cultural sensitivity. There were some of these remote little Egyptian army units in the center of the Sinai that God had long ago forgotten and they were so pathetically grateful to see you that, they would invite you to, "Come sit, come have tea. What do you want to see? We'll show you everything." And Andy's point was, get there, shut the copter down, sit and have tea, chatter about this or that, and then go on. There was a real importance in terms of that contact and the familiarity.

One of the funniest incidents that I had was with my teammate on the day who was John Mayhew and is now working over in the Department. We had our Egyptian escort officer along and we were at a bakery near the Suez Canal. So we go in, and I mean it's a bakery, fine, sometimes they give you fresh bread, we had food with us so that wasn't the problem, but the major ushers us in and we sit down. We've got our twenty-two-year-old Egyptian there and the guy is very, very pleasant and what he wants to talk about is contraceptives. He's married, wife has just had a child or something like that, and he wants to talk about contraceptives and he's making this absolutely young Egyptian lieutenant who is probably a virgin and absolutely dying and blushing, translate - and fairly graphic translations. We basically said, "Well actually, what you should probably do is have your wife get in touch with a female obstetrician at the American University in Cairo. They'll be able to take her through all of the options," and stuff like this. At that point, okay, he asked both of us whether we were married and I said, "Well actually I'm divorced, but John's a father," and all of that, and this poor lieutenant was just dying. And of course we'd gotten the cultural training here saying the Arabs never talk about sex. Well, that's all they talked about.

Q: Were there violations that were playing games? You know, sometimes with troops they've got to do something.

TYSON: It was more than playing games. There were some times where there were even more than overt violations. The Egyptians were pushing the envelope now and then. The Israelis had a tendency to over fly Egypt. It wasn't just bored troops in some cases, although there was a bit of that.

Q: What happens if you found a violation?

TYSON: We wrote it up.

Q: Wrote it up. Both sides would respond, I mean if there was...

TYSON: Yes, pretty much. I think ultimately the best description I had is that we were the lubricating oil between the gears. Both sides needed some dead Americans there if anything ever broke out. But you know, if the level of complaint about our unfairness was about the same on both sides, we were probably doing the job that was needed.

Q: How about within your own units? How did you all get along?

TYSON: At first, not well. There was a real division between the military types and the State types when I first got there. And I think Bob Steven and Lou Kachanic worked on this. A lot was personalities. My perception of some of the State officers when I first got there, and a number of them are my friends, was that even though we were the same chronological age, they were just younger. The military guys, I think, tended to be contemptuous of them for that. There wasn't necessarily a lot of understanding on both sides, and then what happened is we got some retired military officers in who had done embassy duty and then FSOs like me who'd grown up around the military, or people who had served. So there was more of a convergence in the middle as to, "Yes, I know what you do, you know what I do," and I think it was just more of a change in the personality mix that, you know, you sort of respected your colleagues.

Also, when I first got there, you were supposed to make up your map and there was a lot of these games of, "I'm not going to tell you," from the military guys. Well I had taken drafting in high school so I went into the operations center and I knew how to use tracing vellum to copy maps, so the first time I did it, I did it on vellum and punched through various checkpoints and sites. I got criticized by the military because one location was wrong and I pointed out to them, "If it's wrong on my map, it's wrong in the op center, too." But I kept the vellum and after that when an FSO came in they'd get the drill, "You've got to figure it out," and I'd say, "Come on over to my hooch. Here's the overlay on the map. Punch it through this way, mark it up this way." But it was a lot of the "boys stuff," the macho type of thing and sort of once you "made your bones" and showed that you could do the stuff, you could write the reports and you knew what you were looking at, you were okay.

Q: I take it the units were essentially American units, French units, British units, what-have-you. They didn't intermix?

TYSON: Well, they had different functions. Actually, in a sense, there was a bit of a mix in the headquarters. The Brits were the headquarters unit, the Dutch were the cops, the Uruguayans were the truck drivers and engineers, the Fijians and the Colombians were the ground-pounders - the infantry troops manning the various outposts, the American troops that we had at North Camp were more logistical support and technicians for our headquarters units. South Camp was where they had the airborne units which were more our straight-leg troops, or infantry troops; airborne is not straight-leg. There was sort of a division of labor. The French had the fixed-wing aircraft; the Otters and the Transalls, the Anzacs did the rotary-wing. So I mean it all sort of fit together because we knew all the helicopter pilots because they were always flying us. We were one of the reasons they were there.

The other unifying thing was the strip of bars on the base. The Dutch had a club, the Brits had a club, the Uruguayans had a club, the French had a club, and you'd go bar-hopping. The Anzacs had the Surf Club. So it was very interesting because Al Gorah which was an ex-Israeli airbase, and quite correctly the headquarters and the commander had very strict drunk driving rules and it was a small enough base you could walk. They never really said much about drunk bicycling, so everybody had bicycles. As a matter of fact, there was usually a rash of bicycle thefts just before the Anzacs went home. It was a small enclosed base with that and you tended to actually get to know people better through the bars.

Q: Were there problems with Bedouin going back and forth?

TYSON: The biggest problems we had with the Bedouin were them tapping into our water pipes periodically. The stuff about the Bedouin was very interesting because actually what we were hearing, and I don't know whether you've interviewed Chester Pavlovski, but you should on all of this - he's an ex-consular officer, but he was an observer and then sort of the resident archaeologist, the line was that actually the Bedouin, the real Bedouin, preferred the Israelis more. The Israelis basically stayed out of a lot of their internal family matters, but if you had a sick kid or something they'd take care of it. It used to be very interesting because the Bedouin actually knew a lot of Israeli products, food products, very well. We were trying to share the expenditures between Israel and Egypt. The only way the tally ever came close was when they bought a lot of gold in the market in Egypt. You know you could go to Israel and say, "I need ten cases of tomatoes six weeks from now, grade 2." "Fine." You know, you'd go to the Egyptians and, "I need tomatoes," "Well, if God gives us tomatoes, you'll have tomatoes." So a lot of the actual food on the camp was Israeli, including stuff like packaged yogurt - fruit-flavored stuff and all.

I remember you'd go out on the patrols where you had the vehicles and you'd get these big green Coleman coolers and the mess hall would make up meals for you. When you had the Egyptians along, they were very careful that it was "halal." But you'd have ice in there, you'd have bread, you'd have sandwiches, you'd have apples, you'd have oranges, and probably more than six people could eat. Sometimes the Egyptians officers who didn't like the Bedouin would throw the stuff away, because you'd be sitting there parked beside a road or on an overlook and a Bedouin would just sort of appear and be fifty meters, seventy-five meters away from you and just sit there. So you look at them and they look at you. That's fine. Very often what we would do was, having eaten what we wanted, we would then gather up the stuff, you know the extra bread, the this, the that, and the ice, and either leave it there or walk it over to them. The Egyptians always thought we were nuts for doing this. I remember in the middle of nowhere one of the Bedouins, because we had Israeli fruit-flavored yogurt, I think we had apricot and something else, through sign language made it clear that the next time he came he preferred the apple to the apricot. (laughs) Okay, fine. But we'd hand them the ice and stuff like that, and sometimes we'd also give the extra food to the Egyptian interpreters who lived right outside the gate.

Q: What was your impression of Israel? I take it that's sort of where you went for the weekends or R&R (Rest and Relaxation) and that sort of thing?

TYSON: Well, Israel was fine. That is where we went for the R&Rs. I tended to prefer Jerusalem to Tel Aviv. I'll fast-forward a bit by saying that my mother and sister came out in January and got to Tel Aviv a day or two before I did and then I came in and met them. There were three or four bars, one of them was like the MASH [Mobile Army Surgical Hospital] bar and the other was the Belle at the end of Dizengoff Street where the MFO and the UN guys and others all showed up. It's a typical military thing, you know, bars with girls and whores. My mother and sister were there, and you know my mother has been around army bases her entire life, so there we are in Israel and I said, "Okay, let's go out. I'll see some of my buddies at the bars," and you know, my mom and sister walked in and everybody is there including the working girls and I said, "This too is Israel. Tomorrow we'll do Jerusalem."

Israel was fascinating in many ways; the archaeology, the country, the people. It was a mix of things and I enjoyed it. Tel Aviv was fine, but I sort of found Jerusalem, as a city and a place, much more appealing. So there would be groups that would go into Tel Aviv and then groups that would go to Jerusalem. And then somebody was always going up to Tiberius or Yafo or something like that. So it was a chance to see the country.

ROGER G. HARRISON
Political Counselor
Tel Aviv (1985-1987)

Ambassador Harrison was born and raised in California. He was educated at San Jose State and Claremont Colleges, Oxford University and Freie University in Berlin. Entering the Foreign Service in 1967, Ambassador Harrison served in London, Manila, Warsaw, Manila and Tel Aviv before being named US Ambassador to the Kingdom of Jordan, where he served from 1990 to 1993. He also had postings in Washington, primarily dealing with Political/Military Affairs. Ambassador Harrison was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: But now we're coming back to your leaving.

HARRISON: Yes, '85 May off I went and left them in good shape. It wasn't my fault what happened later, but I had pretty much worn out my welcome, too. The things I had been sent there to do had been done. We had a new ambassador my last two years, and a new DCM my last year, Ray Seitz who later became ambassador. Whereas Ed Streater had been kind of rocking boat kind of guy. He liked to shake things up which was fun for me. Ray Seitz was not and therefore, much less fun for me so I was ready to go and did off to be political counselor in Tel Aviv working for a couple of weeks for Sam Lewis. I show up in Tel Aviv and we're in the middle of a transition government in '85 resulting from an indecisive election which had resulted in a coalition government between Labour and this peculiar arrangement where in the middle of the government five-year term, Peres agreed to step down and give his position to Shamir. The issue for the first year in Tel Aviv was really actually to do this, whether he'd adhere to this or whether he'd try to break the government before that happened, go to the elections and win a mandate on his own behalf and Shamir couldn't win it. He had that and the economy because the economy had been stagnant at that point for five or six years and the currency was in precipitous decline. The labor unions there were powerful, too. The old socialist tradition, the terrible bureaucratic weight of the old socialist bureaucracy which had been imported on the back of the Ashkenazi, largely socialist immigrants from Europe, who made a settlement to form the original Labour party and who had sort of transported much of the terrible bureaucratic morass that they had been escaping from, brought with them to transplant into Israel. The burden of defense spending. All these things that added up to a kind of crippled economy and a crippled political system. In '85 I think we were seeing the beginning of the divisions in Israeli political life which had progressed at a pace, aided by their proportional representational system, which gave representation in the Knesset to even rump parties. Marginal requirement for seats in terms of votes, a percentage of votes, so you've got a lot of splinter parties and the number of splinter parties is increasing at this point. Two major parties are slowly shrinking and the need to build coalitions of parties in the Knesset is at a pace which all these trends have continued in a kind of destructive way in that society since and this transition government was the first expression of this lack of any social consensus in Israel of what to do. This is prior to the Intifada.

Q: You were there from when to when?

HARRISON: '85 to '87 and Intifada was at the end of '87, I left in December of '87. Intifada and the interesting thing then was...

Q: This was the first input?

HARRISON: The first Intifada. When I was there the occupation of course was in existence, but it was cheap for the Israelis. They did not have to station any people in the occupied territories in order to occupy them. They had roadblocks here and there, but I would guess a couple of hundred reservists would be all you would find on the West Bank and in Gaza on any particular day partly a legacy of the economic prosperity which the occupation had brought to these areas in the '70s, after Egypt and Jordan, who had been in occupation before the Israelis took those territories, had been awful -- both of them, in their treatment of the Palestinians and economically and politically in every other way. When the Israelis came in there was actually an economic boom in fact in high single digit and double digit economic growth which had taken a lot of steam out of the protest movements and because Palestinian nationality was not really developing. It was still developing then. Arafat was of course, already around, but he had been forced out to Beirut and then out of Beirut to Tunis without really much resistance on the West Bank and off he was in Tunisia with his small coterie, more or less irrelevant to the process. Things were going along in a way which was stable to the point that I could take my bicycle from Netanya on the coastline up to Tulkarm on the West Bank, right across the border without realizing that I was and suddenly being in an Arab city and riding around there and riding back. People would go and buy oranges and stuff and they'd move freely around the West Bank. The settlement movement of course was already in existence and proselytizing energetically in the suburbs many of whom -- American Jews -- had come over. Meir Kahane, who was the head of, was already there, the Kahane movement was in place. The notion of expelling all the Arabs from Israel to Jordan, Jordan is the real Palestine, all these things were already in existence.

Q: You talk about expelling the Jews not just from the issue of the West Bank, too?

HARRISON: Oh, yes, from the West Bank in particular. The question of expelling them from Israel was always more ambiguous, but I think that if Kahane had had his way he would have done that, too. They were Israeli citizens so that's a little tougher, but certainly the West Bank -- just push them all across the river, and that solves your problem -- which is an idea which has never died and is still current in the Israeli political debate. All this is coexisting with stability in these areas, very few incidents and those incidents that broke out were mainly rock throwing and you know, then the Israelis would overreact. Sometimes a lot of ammunition and would kill some Palestinians, but that never had the knock on effect that it was to have later. I used to talk about the flying Palestinian because the Israelis would always be claiming the fire over their heads would always hit them. The Palestinians said well we must have levitated to intercept the bullets. All the irritations, all the implicit discrimination against the Palestinians, all the contempt for them which is also so much a feature of Israeli political life now, also very much in evidence then. No Palestinian national identity strongly enough established to create the kind of opposition movement that exists now. As in many things in life, although this jumps ahead a couple of years, I think that there's an old psychological theory, that you don't run away because you're afraid, you're afraid because you run away. I think the same thing is true in a sense of this Palestinian movement. It didn't necessarily precede the Intifada, but maybe the Intifada preceded the national consciousness. At any rate, in '85, '86, and '87, the dirty secret of the occupation is that it's cheap. It's easy and there's no real political impetus to do anything about it.

Q: The ambassador for a while was Sam Lewis and then who took over?

HARRISON: For a very short while. Tom Pickering. A very short while -- Sam Lewis was just leaving. He gave a press conference in which he revealed that Sharon had lied about the invasion of Lebanon which had taken place five years before. The Israelis had gotten involved with Sharon's instigation and it was very ill advised attempt to put a Christian Maronite prime minister in power in Beirut. Completely antic idea, which showed this profound ignorance of anything going on in the Lebanese political scene. Wasn't going to happen under any circumstances, but it was a rationale, which Sharon used. He lied to us, they were going to clean out people, you know, go up 50 kilometers they said, but they were going to go to Beirut from the beginning, did go to Beirut, set off the civil war which was so destructive in the years afterwards and gave rise to Hamas and all these things were created by this Sharon adventure north, which they're now having so much trouble with. It really is a Frankenstein problem, which they created out of their arrogance and profound ignorance and the two things go together because if you're arrogant enough, you don't realize how ignorant you are. Often a problem of ours as well. By '85 the security zone had been established in southern Lebanon and we have built the SLA (South Lebanon Army) with the Lebanese army in the south, under Israeli tutelage in the south of Lebanon, in their security zone. The attrition of Israelis up there has begun which would eventually lead to the removal of those people there. One of my early cables was debunking the idea that the Israelis were going to withdraw from there anytime soon because no Prime Minister could stand the consequences of withdrawing and having rocket attacks. It would be a "Who's to blame?" issue, would he be to blame for taking the troops out of there? At that point, the rate of casualties wasn't high enough. That created a political backlash if there's the presence, so there was no political push to leave and so they were going to stay and of course, they did stay for another 15 years to their great regret and I think to the great detriment of Lebanon as well. Sharon had mounted this thing, Sharon was out of favor in this period, Peres is prime minister, Rabin is minister of defense in the transition government and then stays on, which is one of the great things for me, when Peres leaves. The great political issue was, after the economy was stabilized by devaluation although it remained stagnant for another five years, until the peace process really got underway, whether this transition government was going to take place. The other issue was the activism of Tom Pickering in a number of areas but in particular on the peace plan in collaboration with Peres and a guy named Nimrod Novik who was one of Peres's advisors and to a degree Yossi Beilin -- although Beilin always played a more ambiguous role and who was another advisor to Peres to bring about a peace plan which could then be the subject of an election which would then prevent Shamir from coming to power. The idea being that Peres could not simply declare that he wasn't going to leave office, but he might by proposing a peace plan that was acceptable to the Arab side, the Palestinian side, he might then put that to referendum which would have the same effect. Peres was continuing promising Pickering he could deliver the Knesset for this which was the key issue of course, the prime minister can't do it on his own, he has to have the Knesset along with him. But the notion was that if you came to the Knesset with a fait accompli with the Palestinians' signature on it, and even though the Likud was opposed to it and hard over and ideological and so forth, the Knesset would accept it and therefore or if they turned it down you could take it to referendum in the country as a whole and win. Pickering was conspiring and he's also trying to because on one hand he's playing a quasi-partisan role in the political equation, dealing a lot with Peres's people, not very much with the Likud and especially not with Shamir, because you couldn't deal with Shamir. Shamir was impervious to being dealt with. Shamir had been the guy in the revolutionary period who had known all the secrets. He had been the guy who knew, he was the walking archive of Irgun. Because you needed somebody who knew, but you couldn't have more than one person who knew, because you were penetrated by the British and so they chose Shamir because of the confidence that he was not going to tell anybody. He was a man entirely bereft of personality. He had no affect. He was the perfect guy to tell your secrets to unless they were of a political advantage to him to tell them. So, you couldn't deal with him. I mean, he was not, Pickering was this huge dynamo of a man and would be activist wherever you put him down, whatever you told him to do and sees in that situation the possibility of writing Peres who is desperate to hold onto power to compromises with the Palestinians, which then could be incorporated into a movement in the peace process which in those days and we weren't talking about a Palestinian state at all. I mean it was a much milder form of Palestinian control over occupied territories, and withdrawal. It would have done something about settlements, which not yet you know, would have already been a huge problem, but not yet the problem that it was going to become. I thought it was all nonsense because I thought that Peres could not deliver. It was my view that he was over promising on what he could do. You could not ram this down Kahane's throat, because Kahane's represented a greater percentage of the population than Peres did and that there was no peace without Kahane. Whether you didn't like him or not, whether you could deal with Sharon or not, or Shamir or not, and Sharon of course is already around, but now he has been marginalized because of Sabra and Shatila. You just simply couldn't override their wishes as Peres hoped to do and ram it down his throat. So, I sent in a dissent message or tried to, but Pickering held it up for 24 hours because he realized that the 24 hours were the period in which this decision was going to be made in Washington. My dissent message, this was on the London agreement as so-called later, never got into the process before the London agreement had already been turned down in Washington because the Reagan administration decided not to go ahead with it. I think they took my interpretation of the facts without seeing my interpretation of the facts, although I was congratulated in some corners for the futility of my gesture afterwards. So, that was part of what was going on. We had very good contact. I saw a lot of Rabin, although not on my own. I was the political counselor, but it was not a good job because I had been working for Dan Kurtzer who is now ambassador there. He's a very smart guy and was already wired in and was kind of a peace process guy. I had an activist ambassador who was also retentive and an activist DCM and in that circumstance.

Q: Who was the DCM?

HARRISON: It was Bob Flatin the first year I was there. In those circumstances the political counselors were always ambiguous at best. From my point of view and because Pickering didn't ever feel in need of political counsel, least of all from me. I mean, he was not a man tortured by self-doubt, so he essentially didn't use the political section. He'd talk to Dan, and he had some input because he was dealing with people like Nimrod Novik and that was a conduit to Peres, but the rest of us kind of did our thing in isolation from the front office and indeed sometimes in contradiction to what Pickering was sending in, as I was discovering occasionally once when I was chargé and sometimes when I was acting DCM and I would poke around in files and I would find out what he had been saying to Washington -- because he never volunteered to me and I didn't know what he was trying to do most of the time. We went on doing our thing. He never asked us to do anything in my two and a half; I guess two years with him. He never asked the political section to do anything and as far as I know never read any of the stuff that we did do. A couple of times people would come in from Washington and comment on our reporting in his presence and he would not be aware that these reports had been sent. It was a little of like operating your kind of own little mission in orbit around the great planet, but out of radio contact with the home base. Difficult, from a lot of points, it was awful, of course, to have supposed responsibility, but no authority which was the situation I was in, but also because I'd show up for meetings with people and he'd be on his way out. I was literally in waiting rooms waiting to see somebody and Tom Pickering would come out and walk by me and say hello and go out the door. It became a kind of a standing joke in Jerusalem that this was the case with us, so a very uncomfortable position to be in.

Q: Then, of course, it being such an intense political place, everybody understood, I mean the people you were dealing with understood your position?

HARRISON: Yes, they understood it. I was the object of sympathy, but of no particular respect. It wasn't, I wasn't the man you had to see, I mean I would be somebody you could see just to be polite, but I wasn't the player and the political section really wasn't a player either except for Dan, who was. We were just kind of doing our thing, sending in our reports. Dealing with and meeting a lot of interesting people, I think the key thing for me was watching Rabin operate because I would go over as note taker when Pickering went over to see him, which he did a lot. I got to know him pretty well.

Q: Rabin, at that time, was what?

HARRISON: Minister of Defense. Then in his 60s he had been ambassador to Washington, he'd been Prime Minister, there had been a scandal about money that he and his wife had taken offshore in various stringent currency regulations they had enforced. He had been forced to resign, forced out and of course, was to come back in great glory later, but then was in relative eclipse at the ministry of defense. He had this great basso profundo voice with 40 years of cigarettes he of course, smoked three or four packs a day of cigarettes. The great thing about him was there was absolutely no bullshit to him at all. There was no pretense. Dealing with him you brought home how much pretense there is to most of us, you know, because he had a very straightforward view which I know a lot people claim to have in my life, but he was somebody who genuinely saw the world very clearly, saw people for what they were and knew his own mind, knew who he was and dealt in a very straightforward way. He would do what he said he was going to do. He thought what he said he thought. He had contempt for what he had contempt for and would not try to candy coat that for you. He had a sneaky, fast sense of humor and I had enormous respect for him then and later, more than anyone I ever dealt with in any of my jobs. For all those qualities, it was quite a spiritual journey that he made from being the most effective of the old Arab killers to being a man who finally reached out in a genuine... I mean we have all these guys like Netanyahu and all these slimy people who have in essence affected Israeli politics. We have people like Sharon who have never shifted gears from the '53 mode or the '48 mode where he'd grown up; he had actually been a little junior to Rabin and always been junior to him militarily, but they fought side by side. Then Rabin had begun to understand the need to bestow respect on the Palestinians, essentially it comes down to that, some human self-regard, some recognition of the legitimacy of the Palestinians as human beings.

Q: I take it that was something that was really lacking in the body politic of Israel at that time?

HARRISON: Lacking then and lacking now. I mean he unfortunately didn't start a movement in that direction, he was unique I think in that way. I mean, there are certainly Israelis who understand this, but not Israelis that had his credibility as founding father of the state who had also been in the front lines so often beginning as a very young man. He's given his life to the state, but then on that basis still made that transition, but not on -- I don't think from my experience in life, I don't think there are any unmixed motives. I think that looking for purity is feckless in life. I think Rabin also had political motives for what he did. I think he saw certain political requirements. It was genuine in the sense that was beyond the political. It was a genuine acceptance of the humanness of his antagonist. Now you see the handshake on the White House lawn. This is now skipping forward ten years, eight years, six years. The first time he shakes hands in public with Arafat. You see him leaning away. It's the most tortured position physically. It reminded me of Rosemary Woods in the Nixon administration trying to describe how she erased those tapes by stepping on her eraser button over here when she was typing over here. So, there's Rabin shaking hands, but trying physically as far away from this guy as he could. The journey, the spiritual journey he made, written in his posture in a way that was very graphic for me.

Q: I think it was Phil Brown who in an interview was saying that he was talking to Rabin I think shortly before the handshake where Rabin you know, put out his cigarette and says, "Well got to go now, showbiz."
