FRASER WILKINS Recognition of Israel

Ambassador Wilkins was born and raised in Nebraska and educated at Yale University. He entered the Foreign Service in 1940, where he became a specialist in Middle East Affairs. His overseas posts include Halifax, Baghdad, Tangier, New Delhi and Teheran, where he served as Minister/Counselor. In his several assignments in the Department of State in Washington, Mr. Wilkins dealt with Middle East matters. He also served on the Policy Planning Staff and as Inspector General of the Department. In 1960 he was appointed Ambassador to Cyprus, where he served until 1964. Ambassador Wilkins was interviewed by Peter Jessup in 1988.

Q: You were saying that – which raises a point which we might get to when we talk about Palestine – that a political appointee quite often has the ear of the President, or certainly the White House. That brings up the question of who spoke to the President last? And in your experience on the Palestine business, and the recognition of the independence of Israel, wouldn't you say that who spoke to the President last- - such as Clark Clifford, and so forth, with President Truman – that had a bigger impact than people who didn't have that access?

WILKINS: There's a simple answer to that, and it's yes! I will explain if you want me to. It's a rather long story.

Q: We're wandering around and I did have the opportunity to read some of your excellent work you did with the MacKenzie – of the Truman Library. After studying that it raised certain questions. One of which is: you were asked what could have been done that was different? And your answer was that we could have been more closely in touch with the British, in the days before independence of Israel.

WILKINS: Before they referred it to the U.N. in 1947?

Q: Yes. Could you amplify on that?

WILKINS: Well, I would amplify this way. After the Anglo-American Committee Report. I only returned to the Department in December 1946, when Secretary Burns was in charge, and he left shortly thereafter. As I recall, he had not been on good relations with Prime Minister Bevin, in London. Ibis was all during that very active period, you know, when there were troubles Iran in 1946 – in Azerbaijan – and the British were facing difficult political and military situations in Greece and Turkey.

I think what I had in mind when I made that remark earlier, was that we I have been working more closely with the British, and encouraging them to more moves toward compromise between the Jews in Palestine, the Arabs and the Arab States. Sort of taking steps leading up to a compromise solution between the parties.

Q: You implied we just considered it a British headache, to a certain extent.

WILKINS: Well, the British treated it that way. The British, in effect, left the baby at the doorstep of the U.N. They said that they were not going to go on trying to keep peace in Palestine merely because the Arabs and Jews couldn't reach agreement. And unless they reached agreement they intended to withdraw.

But meanwhile, they wished the United Nations would convene a special mission and decide what to do about the problem. In other words, the British just evaded their responsibilities under the Mandate, by turning it over to the United Nations, in frustration of the years of the internecine warfare within the Palestine Mandate itself.

Q: And on that business of 11 minutes after Israel became independent, Truman recognized the state of Israel. General Marshall's opinion, according to you-Secretary of State Marshall – was that you shouldn't recognize a state until it's been established, until you know whether it's going to continue to exist. Was he as surprised as the people in New York, that when Truman made the announcement, that it would come so rapidly?

WILKINS: I don't think so, because after the May 12th meeting, Mr. Lovett and the Secretary were in constant touch with Mr. Clifford and the White House. My comments now would be an extension of the May 12th meeting at the White House, in which Secretary Marshall, Mr. Lovett, Mr. Clifford, David Niles, Matthew Townley, Bob McClintock, and I were present. I think that's pretty well recorded in the foreign relations of the United States.

At the conclusion of that meeting, it was my clear impression that the President had postponed a recognition of the state of Israel, prior to May 14-15, as recommended by Clifford and company. They thought that we ought to beat the Russians to the punch. You see, the Russians had also supported the Partition Plan, as we had. They thought that this would be a coup against the United States. It would please the Israelis, and perhaps settle down the situation if a big country like the United States recognized Israel before its independence, on May 14th.

Anyway, we left the meeting – I did anyway – thinking that it had been put off for the time being. And when I went back to the Department I told Mr. Henderson – who had not attended the meeting – that this was what I thought. And we were quite surprised, frankly, within the Department. Maybe it was because I was fairly low on the totem pole.

The President did recognize Israel within 11 minutes. And what had happened, apparently, was that between May 12th and May 15th, at midnight when Ben Gurion stood up in Tel Aviv and declared the independence of the state, was all sorts of pressures had been brought to bear on the President. Dr. Weizmann was here, and Mr. Jacobson, his former partner in Missouri – they all spoke with him. And great pressure was brought in many other ways, I'm sure, on the White House. Even if he couldn't recognize Israel beforehand, at least to recognize it immediately on independence. That's what happened, according to the general information that was available at that time.

Q: General Hilidring's remark that the State Department had the pieces to pick up was quite prophetic, wasn't it?

WILKINS: It surely was. You can see what's happening today. You have the grandsons of Arab refugees throwing rocks at Israeli tanks. Because the hostility has existed since 1948, when most of the refugees fled from Palestine, when Israel became an independent state; after the massacre at Dir Yassin. These children in the camps are the descendants of the people who fled in '48, and here it is 40 years later. Those people, by in large, have not been assimilated into any of the Arab states: Lebanon, Syria, Jordan. Of course, Saudi Arabia is out of the picture, or Egypt, in the sense of the Gaza Strip. The refugees have probably increased from around 600,000 to between 2 or 3 million, and they are all in the camps.

Q: Would you say that it unfair, or pro-Israeli, to say that the Jews did the best they could to take care of their own refugees after the Holocaust, and to apportion them wherever they could, with all the H.L.A.S, and all their structure, to help? But that the Arabs did very little to absorb any of those? Was that a fair question?

WILKINS: That's quite correct. But I'd like to make three comments, amusing comments in a way. One is, there is a colony of so-called black Jews in Cochin, India. I know this because I was political counselor in India, from 1950 to 1953, and traveled widely in that area. These black Jews were really Indians, but they'd been taken on as servants by the Jews that came to India after the death of our Lord, under Saint Thomas. Saint Thomas was killed in Madras, you know, with his spear. He's buried there, actually.

But these Indian servants – of Jews from Palestine settled in India way back – were very cliquish. They had their own synagogue, with Dutch tiles. They would not allow their daughters to walk in the streets, unless they married Indians and could pass from roof to roof, by night and so forth.

Of course, when Israel became independent many of them decided to go back to the homeland. But after they were there a while, they didn't like it and returned to India.

The other thing is that the Oriental Jews – so called, say from the Morocco area – when they came to Israel they didn't like it. Or rather, putting it the other way around, the Israelis didn't like them, because they were so backward.

There was a third point I wanted to make. Prime Minister Ben Gurion was distressed that immigration, in those years, among American Jews was very small. Very few, in fact, wanted to go to the new state.

Q: Except as tourists.

WILKINS: That's right.

Q: But now, of course, the Sephardic Jews – the ones from the orbit of North Africa, and the other countries of the Middle East – they outnumber the Ashkenazi – the ones originally from Eastern Europe.

WILKINS: That's interesting. I really didn't realize that.

Q: That's why those are the people who were behind Begin and Shamir. And they are the ones who are more intensely opposed to the Arabs.

WILKINS: As a matter of fact, I know many Sephardic Jews, because I served in Tangier, Morocco from 1944 to 1946. My banker there was Moses Abensur, from Moses Barriente. The Jewish bankers in Morocco were very influential ever since the days they were forced out of Spain. I don't know what the situation is in North Africa now.

With respect to the Ashkenazi coming from Eastern Europe, you know the story, of course, or the two theories about the Jews of the immigration? I heard this from Fans El Khoury, the one-time Prime Minister of Syria, when he came to the United Nations in 1957. He said that in the 8th or 9th century A.D. there was a kingdom named Kiev in Western Russia, with a very enlightened monarch. He summoned all the wise men and philosophers of his day to court, and said, "What is the best religion?"

They considered the matter and declared for Judaism. And he converted his people, willy-filly, to Judaism – as kings could do in those days. Well, eventually the kingdom collapsed and many of what were Ashkenazi Jews fled westward, and settled in Eastern Europe. Later on, when Hitler rose to power and having taken over Eastern Germany and Austria and so on – most of the Jews that went to Palestine were originally descendants of people from the Kingdom of Kiev, and were not, according to the Arabs, really entitled to go back to Palestine.

The other theory is this: During the declining days of the Roman Empire, the Roman legions were running out of manpower. And so they were drafted from the mandate area into the Roman Army. Then after the Roman Army broke up, in 5 or 600 A.D., those troops of Semitic Jews remained behind, having intermarried locally. It was their descendants – according to the Arabs – who were immigrating. So you see the two opposite theories on the subject. You can take your money and take your choice. I'm inclined to think it was the latter, because it seems unlikely that there could have been a complete conversion of all the people of the Kingdom of Kiev.

Q: That sounds a bit legendary.

WILKINS: There's no doubt in my mind that they were, actually, the Jews of Eastern Europe. But their origin may have been genuine, you know. The Arab theory is that they are all descendants of the mixed blood – maybe it was a combination of both.

Q: Now, during the time when you were in Washington, and the creation of Israel, Truman actually did make the remark that the State Department was anti-Semitic, or there were anti-Semites in the State Department. You know what he meant. And McKenzie, I believe asked you about that, and you said that really wasn't true. Do you still feel that way?

WILKINS: Yes, of course, I do. I never saw any evidence of anti-Semitism in practice, for fact. I do know that several officers resigned about the time of partition and independence. For instance, Colonel Eddy, who had been American Minister in Saudi Arabia, and my boss at the Department Gordon Merrill – although, he retired for reasons of health, being very hard of hearing, Of course, Eddy was a very prominent man. He'd served in Saudi Arabia. He was present with President Roosevelt when he saw Ibn Saud, aboard the deck of USS Quincy – at Bitter Lakes – after the Yalta Conference. President Roosevelt made his famous, semi-commitment to that he would – in the form of a memorandum – take no action with respect to the Arabs and Jews, regarding the British Mandate in Palestine, without first consulting both parties.

Q: Well I think maybe some of the origin of this reverse prejudice – so stated by President Truman – is based on, possibly, there were quite a few Foreign Service officers who married, or were the sons, or connected closely with missionaries and missionary families in the Middle East. And they were naturally more closely attuned to Arab ways, and Arab culture. It was believed unfriendly to the insertion of Israel, and America's heavy leaning on Israel is that possible?

WILKINS: I must say that in my experience, having served in Iran, Iraq, in effect in Palestine, in Cyprus, and in Morocco, I never saw any evidence of this. I don't want to talk in clichés, but it seems to me the attitude of the average American Foreign Service officer is that he's an American first; he's pro-American in effect. He's neither pro-where he is, or for example, when I was in Cyprus, I never considered myself as either pro-Greek or pro-Turkey. I think the same thing is true of most people. Because you have to look at it from the point of view of the interests of the United States. As you know, in the Middle East we had tremendous interests out there: in oil, in communications, in transport, in religion, and so on. So it's wrong to take a biased point of view. In a situation like that you have to think of what is good for us.

As I said at the outset, I don't want to put it in terms of clichés, but I think that's the approach most American Foreign Service officers take.

Q: That's an interesting point. Shall we continue?

WILKINS: Yes, please.

Q: I might ask you about your experience of Americans serving in the U.N. For instance, at the time of the independence of Israel, Ralph Bunche was up there at the U.N. I think you quoted him as saying he had to do a lot of work for the Arabs, because they didn't do their own homework very well.

WILKINS: That's correct.

Q: Did the Department of State, or the administrations that you served with, have any role in assigning Americans to the United Nations, and seeing that better people got there? For instance, the Russians ignored the UN for quite a while, and then sometime in the '50s they decided this was a wonderful place to put key people, wield influence, maybe fill some KGB slots, and so forth like that. What was the attitude of the Department about Americans serving in the UN? Because McCarthy was very angry at some of the Americans who were working at the UN, figuring they were leftists, and so forth.

WILKINS: I think that's completely wrong. I think the United States government was interested in proper staffing at the United Nations from the outset, in 1945.

Q: But, could the State Department send people up there to apply? Or how did it work?

WILKINS: Of course, people would even leave the State Department and join the staff of the United Nations; or go up there on special assignments. I don't know the details of Bunche's early career, but he was a United States government officer – not only in State, but perhaps elsewhere. Anyway, he was well known here in Washington, and he was on the staff at the United Nations. I think he's a living example of the attitude of the Department of State, with regard to the quality of people we wanted at the United Nations.

Later on, as you know, he took the place of Count Bernadotte in his dual role as conciliator and mediator. That was when I had that conversation with him. I was, at that point, serving as his advisor to the American representative in the Palestine Conciliation Commission; and made a trip from Beirut to Rhodes to find out how he was progressing in his truce arrangements with the Arab states of Lebanon, Syria, Jordan, and Egypt. He considered himself in a very embarrassing position because the Arabs, in their usual matter, didn't really prepare themselves very well for meetings. To have a fair truce agreement, he would be forced to take their side. And of course, the Israelis complained about that.

One other thing about Bunche: you know, later on he was offered the job – showing another example of his quality – of Assistant Secretary State, for Near Eastern Affairs. But he declined. He felt that he could not afford to live in Washington and raise his family here, being black. And his salary would be taxable, whereas by serving at the United Nations his salary was non-taxable. So for two reasons it was more desirable for him to be in New York, in the high position that he was – not only after [inaudible], but later on at the U.N. itself. So I think all of this is testimony to the type of man the State Department wanted in the U.N.

Q: But I still don't understand – most of the staff positions in the U.N., that were held by Americans, were not Foreign Service officers; they were people of other origin.

WILKINS: Well, I'm not up on that.

Q: One thing – since we're skipping around – in a previous conversation we had, not recorded, you talked about the difference of style of Secretary Marshall, and Secretary Dulles – in dealing with assistants and staff people. Could you point out the differences? How Marshall would want you beside him, and I think you said Dulles [inaudible]

WILKINS: Well, they were certainly different types of secretaries. But, at the same time, they had many characteristics in common. I'll describe a couple of incidents with respect to each, if you like.

Q: I think that would be interesting to the people in the future.

WILKINS: This may take a little time. With respect to Secretary Marshall: shortly before Israel became independent on May 14-15, 1948, Marshall was having one of his weekly press conferences in the State Department. Carl Humelsine was Chief of Staff at that point, and he called me up. Marshall never called me. Marshall, they always said, when he wanted one of his aides and couldn't remember his name, he would say, "Send me that general with the pint eyes."

I said to Carl Humelsine, on the phone, "What does the boss want?" He said, "He just wants to talk to you about his upcoming press conference."

So I went up to the 7th floor and went into Carl's office, and he said, "Go right on in." I went in, and Secretary Marshall was sitting there in his red leather chair, at his desk. At the two opposite corners of the desk were Mike McDermott (the press secretary) and Chip Bohlen, who at that point was counselor to the Department. They were obviously preparing for the press conference. There were many subjects that could come up, and I suppose that's why Bohlen was there also.

Anyway, Marshall said to me, "Well, sit down in that chair in the corner and I'll be with you in a minute." I felt like a dunce in school. But I sat down in the chair, Marshall continued, and then he told them they could go in a very abrupt sort of way. I thought it was a funny way to treat Bohlen, who after all in '48 he'd been the confidant of President Roosevelt at Yalta. He was one of the ablest officers in the Department.

Anyway, when they left, Marshall said, "Now, tell me what I should say at my press conference," very abruptly, as though I were a school boy. So I took the chair beside his desk. He said, "There are 150 newspaper men waiting down there, and they want to know what the United States is going to do."

You see, at that point we had not recognized Israel; this was before that day. So I told him what the present military situation was in the Mandate, and around Jerusalem. And we had had no word, either from Israel or from the White House as to what they planned to do. Obviously, the decision by the President – to recognize Israel – had not yet been made. I said, "It seems to me [we should] tell the President, because of the fluidity of the situation, it's impossible to predict at this moment what will happen – whether the Arabs will continue fighting with the Israelis, and what the White House intends. Anyway, Israel has still not declared its independence."

So, he said, "Good, you can go." Now Dulles, on the other hand, he treated his staff like assistants in a big New York law office. He came originally, and used to be associated, with Sullivan and Cromwell. This was his method of operation. I wish I could think of the name of his one officer that was very close to him. He later went to Johns Hopkins.

Anyway, as far as I was concerned, he used to call me up practically every morning around 8:00, 8:30, so I'd have to get into the office around 7:00 or 7:30 and read the telegrams. You see, the action copies of telegrams would come to the desk officer – or me, being Director of Near Eastern Affairs – first, for action. The Secretary, of course, would have a copy. He would want to know, “What are you going to suggest we answer this one?”

WELLS STABLER
Vice Consul
Jerusalem (1944-1950)

Bureau of Near East Affairs
Washington, DC (1950-1953)

Washington, DC (1957-1960)

Ambassador Wells Stabler was born in Massachusetts on October 31, 1919. He received a bachelor's degree from Harvard University in 1941 and entered the Foreign Service in the same year. His career included positions in Israel, Jordan, Italy, France, and Washington, DC, and an ambassadorship to Spain. Ambassador Stabler was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1991.

Q: So you went to Jerusalem in late 1944. How did you get there?

STABLER: That is a long, long story. I was visiting the family of a close friend of mine, who is actually my brother-in-law, who had gone overseas with OSS. I had gone up to Coopertown to visit his family and while I was there I telephoned Personnel and was told that I was going to be vice consul in Jerusalem. Obviously one knew about Palestine and Jerusalem, but I really had to go look up a map because I hadn't had it in mind at all, except in the Biblical sense. Although I had, when we lived in Venezuela, I was down there one summer, met (my father and mother were great friends of the British Minister and his wife) Field Marshal Lord Allenby who had liberated Jerusalem from the Turks in the First World War and was visiting Caracas. A very nice man. Little did I think at that time that one day I would be walking the streets of Jerusalem.

I left in early November, 1944. I took a Portuguese freighter from Philadelphia. We spent two weeks crossing the Atlantic, flying the Portuguese flag with a big spotlight over it at night hoping that the German U-boats would see the flag of neutral Portugal and leave us alone. We crossed without incident stopping briefly at the Azores, but we were not allowed ashore. We finally got into Lisbon two weeks after leaving.

At that particular time, in order to go on...there was a flight once a week, I think, from Lisbon to Gibraltar. I could have gone on that plane the day after I arrived, but the Chargé d'Affaires in Lisbon was an old friend of mine from the days I worked in American Republic Affairs, Newby Walmsley [his wife Theresa and he are now both long dead] and he wanted me to stay for a visit. So I accepted their kind invitation and stayed for a week in Lisbon by which time there were no more planes for Gibraltar. So I had to go by Portuguese Airline via Tangier and Casablanca from which one went to Cairo.

When I got to Casablanca I stayed at the famous Anfa Hotel where the Casablanca Conference had taken place. It was under US military control. They informed me that there was no way I could possibly get out of Casablanca under a week. So I had a week in Casablanca and made a visit to Rabat. I flew up to Algiers in a US plane. Spent three days there. Then took a Royal South African Air Force plane which was a cargo plane full of Christmas packages and had no seats, so I sat on some of the packages. We finally got into Cairo shortly before Christmas of 1944. At that time the US Minister was Pinkney Tuck. His number two was an old friend as well from my days in Latin American affairs, Cecil Lyon. I telephoned the Consulate General in Jerusalem to inform them that I had at least gotten as far as Cairo because the last they had heard of me was sometime in early November. They said, "Oh, we are glad you have gotten this far, but don't you dare come near Jerusalem until after Christmas because no one can do anything about you."

Q: Even towards the end of the war there were still people coming in there...pilgrims and that sort...

STABLER: Absolutely. And of course there were enormous numbers of US troops that ploughed into Palestine, particularly for the Christmas period, Christmas services in Bethlehem. So, the YMCA, which was the one place one could stay was completely crowded and booked. So I was told to stay out of Jerusalem. I stayed in Cairo for another week and had a wonderful time. I had never been in the Near East and did some sightseeing. I think it was the 27th of December that I finally got a British Royal Air Force plane that took me to Jerusalem, to Lydda, the airport.

I thought I would not wire ahead but just arrive in Jerusalem and go up to the Consulate and present myself. I got to Lydda and the first person I saw was Field Marshal Lord Gort who at that point was the High Commissioner for Palestine and Transjordan. He was just on his way out for good. I wondered how I would get to Jerusalem. At that point a very nice British Army officer who saw me sort of stranded said he was going to Jerusalem and offered me a ride. I rode in his car through beautiful country. The orange blossoms were out. It was a beautiful day, cold, but beautiful. We drove on up into the hills and arrived at the Consulate where I presented myself.

They said they would have met me if I had let them know. Well, I didn't want to bother anybody. I reported to Lowell Pinkerton, who was then the Consul General and Christian Steeger, who was the number two. I set myself up in the YMCA and there began almost five years between Jerusalem and Amman.

Q: What was the situation in early 1945 in Jerusalem as you saw it?

STABLER: The war was still on. The US had camps in Palestine. Of course the British had substantial forces there, although the war had by that time passed on. The Middle East was no longer a theater of operations as such. There was a Middle East theater but no war operations. It had all shifted basically to Europe.

The Jews and the Arabs were in an uneasy truce during the war. Most of the terrorism and the civil disorder that existed prior to the war had come to an end. There were incidents. The Jews were bringing in illegal immigrants which was annoying the British and, of course, the Arabs. The Arabs had resented the British efforts even to let some of the Jews in legally and they felt the British were being unfair to the Arabs. The result of that was that there was a certain number of Palestinian Arabs who openly declared themselves for the Nazis.

[The grand mufti of Jerusalem] had indeed thrown his lot in publicly by going to Berlin. He was regarded by the British as a war criminal although he was never brought to trial.

In spite of these things the terrorist operations against the British that had been seen in Palestine in the years preceding the war had pretty much come to a halt. Jews and Arabs alike had participated in the war effort. As a matter of fact, just as a matter of interest, there was in Jerusalem a thing called the Middle East Center of Arab Studies which had been set up by the British Foreign Office for purposes of teaching Arabic to British officers who would either stay on in some civil administrative capacity or go in to the Foreign Service. It was run by Colonel Bertram Thomas who had quite a background in the Arabian desert. He was a bit of a four-flusher, but nonetheless he was there. One of the main assistants who spoke absolutely perfect Arabic was a gentleman who was a British Army major, Major Aubrey Eban, who later became Abba Eban.

So there was a truce. I traveled extensively in Palestine and it was basically perfectly safe for anybody to do that. Curious enough, it was on the 27th of December, 1945, exactly one year to the day I arrived in Jerusalem, that I almost got blown up. A bomb, Jewish, had been placed in a British police compound. That began again the whole cycle of violence that went on right up until the British got out in May, 1948. The truce had broken down. The Arabs and the Jews started again against each other. The Jews against the British particularly, to protest British efforts to stop Jewish immigration into Palestine from Europe. Of course they ran many ships in illegally. Beached them and the immigrants would get off and disappear into the Jewish areas of Palestine along the coast.

The Arabs were aware of this. They objected to it. The level of violence simply escalated. You remember, later on, maybe '46 the King David explosion...the Stern gang had brought in milk drums in the basement of the King David Hotel which also housed the British Secretariat for the Mandate and blew it up. It was a ghastly scene.

Q: When you first arrived there was this truce going on. What were you doing and what was the main interest of our Consulate General in Jerusalem?

STABLER: The main effort, really was, of course, observing what was happening. The Consulate General had the rather unique position of being one of the two Consulate Generals that reported directly to Washington.

Q: It and Hong Kong.

STABLER: Yes, it and Hong Kong. The exequaturs were issued by two foreign powers, Great Britain as it related to Palestine and then, even though Transjordan was not independent, we were commissioned vice consuls for Palestine and for Transjordan.

Q: So you covered Transjordan?

STABLER: We covered Transjordan as well.

Q: Which would be today on the other side of Jordan.

STABLER: At that point it was still an emirate. There was a British Resident there. Abdullah, King Hussein's grandfather, was the Emir at the time. But he also had certain authority and we had an exequatur from Transjordan as distinguished from the exequatur signed by King George for Palestine. In 1946, Transjordan became independent.

In any event, the role of the Consulate General at that time was one of really tracking what was happening there. The Consul General, Mr. Pinkerton, was someone who played his cards quite close to his chest when it came to the substantive side of things. I really never did know to what extent he was turned to for advice as to what we should be doing about Palestine.

My role at that time was simply as vice consul in charge of visas. In addition I handled cultural matters. I used to take films out to kibbutzim and Arab groups and give little talks about American history, etc. It was interesting going to some of the kibbutzim and showing films produced by OWI on a variety of things related to the United States. The visa work was tremendous. Not so much the first year because no one went anywhere due to strict regulations and lack of transport, but when the war ended there was an overwhelming number of passports, etc. that had to be dealt with in terms of getting people back to the States. There were ships that came in to do this sort of thing...to take people back who had been stranded.

Shortly after I got to Jerusalem, the early months of 1945, Mr. Pinkerton apparently had learned that the Emir of Transjordan was unhappy with him because although he was accredited to Transjordan he never went there. He decided that he better go down and see the Emir. Abdullah had winter quarters in Shuneh in the Jordan Valley, on the other side of the Jordan, not terribly far from Jericho. He was down there and Pinkerton decided he would go down but he seemed to think he needed an excuse to go down. The excuse was to present me as a new vice consul.

We went down and to one of 26 it was pretty heady stuff seeing an Emir. Abdullah was very nice and it was very pleasant visit. The following Sunday I decided that I would go back down and personally sign the book. I got down to Shuneh and was very much impressed by all these Arab Legion soldiers who would snap to attention and salute when they saw a consular license plate. When I got to the winter quarters I said to one of the guards who came out to ask what I wanted that I wanted to sign the book. He disappeared and came back a few minutes later and said, "I am terribly sorry the book is in Amman, but the Emir is here would you like to see him?" I said that that would be splendid. So I went in and had a nice chat with Abdullah and told him how impressed I had been by the Arab Legion that I had seen along the roads. He said, "Well, I am having a maneuver in about three weeks time and I would like you to come as my guest." I said, "That is very kind of you, Your Highness, of course I would like to come."

After three weeks I had still heard nothing at all. One morning I was in the file room of the consulate hunting for some document and came across a letter from Glubb Pasha, who was then the British Commander of the Arab Legion, addressed to Pinkerton saying that the Emir was holding a maneuver on such and such a day and commanded me to invite you, Pinkerton, to come to the maneuver. I was crestfallen that I had been forgotten by my new friend.

The appointed day for the maneuver came and I went to my office in what used to be affectionately called "the turnip shed" of the Consulate General -- a little horrible shed that was heated by a big potbelly stove. I had been in my office not more than 15 or 20 minutes when the phone rang. It was Mr. Pinkerton down at the winter quarters saying, "You get on down here as quickly as you can. The Emir said that the invitation was for you and he won't start until you get here." I thought to myself, "That's a lot of fun, but the end of my career."

I pulled myself together and drove down. As luck would have it I got a flat tire and got stuck in the sand somewhere. By the time I finally got to the maneuver it was over. The Emir was very nice and invited Mr. Pinkerton and me to lunch in his tent.

That was the beginning of a long relationship and friendship that I had with Abdullah and his son, Crown Prince Talal who reigned very briefly after Abdullah was assassinated, and his grandson, the present King Hussein.

Q: To get a feel of the atmosphere in the Consulate General. This must have been sort of annoying to Mr. Pinkerton wasn't it?

STABLER: Well, curiously enough you would have thought it would have, but it really didn't seem to. I think in a sense he was somewhat relieved that he didn't have to worry about Transjordan. He wasn't that interested in it. He didn't really enjoy going over there.

Q: What was his background?

STABLER: Pinkerton was a career man. He had been in Personnel, had been somewhat of an administrator. I can't now remember where he came from.

Q: But he was an Arabist.

STABLER: No, he spoke no Arabic. I don't think he spoke any foreign language at all. He got along well with the British, they liked him. But he had no real interest with the Transjordan thing. He left in '46 at some point. I can't remember quite when. I was invited personally by the Emir to come to his independence days celebrations and the Consul General was also invited but I don't remember whether that was Pinkerton or not...I think it was Pinkerton. But by that time I was fully known in Jordan and was regarded really sort of the US presence, if you will. I don't think Pinkerton really resented it, if he did, he never said anything.

I had lots of things that I did in Jerusalem. I became a good friend of the High Commissioner, General Sir Alan Cunningham, and his staff. I generally had a pretty good position in the Palestine government, although I didn't really deal with the political side of it. Although, for example, when the Anglo-American Committee of Enquiry came to Jerusalem in '46...the British were already discussing what it was that they should do with Palestine because it was becoming more and more a burden for them. Violence was continuing. There was the problem of Jews in Europe. They eventually said that something had to be done. They suggested a group go to Palestine, including Americans, to see what could be done about it. So the Anglo-American Committee of Enquiry was appointed and the senior US delegate to that was William Phillips, a former Under Secretary of State and Ambassador to Rome in the early part of the war before we went into it, and whose wife was my godmother. So Pinkerton assigned me to look after that delegation. I also was given the responsibility for acting as escort for quite a few Congressional delegations that came to Palestine. Jack Javits was one of them who came.

Q: He later became Senator and a major figure in the Jewish-American scene.

STABLER: Absolutely, a very fine person. There were a number of others. So I wasn't ostracized or cut out by Pinkerton, although I did not play any role in political substantive work. He did that entirely himself. He never showed us any of his messages that he sent back and forth on substantive questions. He played it all very close to his chest. I never quite understood why he didn't take some of us into his confidence, but he didn't.

Q: To get a little feeling for the atmospherics within the Consulate General at the time, this was before the King David business...

STABLER: Well, that was '46, the King David thing.

Q: Okay, at that time, were you under any constraints about talking either to the Jews or the Arabs?

STABLER: No, not at all. I traveled extensively and saw lots of both sides. I did a good deal of work on the Arab side too. But I never ever prepared, curiously enough, during the period Pinkerton was there, any sort of political report. I went around extensively and talked to people but my role was not that of a political reporter.

Q: That is odd. In other words, the younger officers who generally get around more were not being used.

STABLER: No. We had Pinkerton, a commercial man named Malcolm Hooper, an officer who handled American citizen passports, etc., an OSS representative, and two of us who did visa work. Pinkerton was the only one who did the political work.

Q: It is interesting because what you are saying is that Pinkerton was not a particularly experienced political reporting officer.

STABLER: I don't really recall what his background was. My recollection was that it was more administrative -- personnel. He was quite well regarded. He finally ended up as Minister in Beirut and as Ambassador to the Sudan. Loy Henderson, the top man in Middle East affairs, had regard for him. But I never really had any idea of what Pinkerton did politically because I never saw a report.

Q: You know, it is hard to recreate the time, but it really took a decade or so for the real enormity of what had happened to the Jews and others in Europe during the war to sink in. The Foreign Service came pretty much from the educated class in the United States and was not particularly responsive to the Jew in the United States. I can recall hearing, not so much in college, but in prep school, anti-Semitic jokes. At that time, particularly with turmoil obviously beginning to come with ships docking all the time, was there an annoyance with the Zionist movement?

STABLER: For one thing, for those of us who were serving in Palestine, it was clear that in a demographic sense that the majority of the residents of Palestine were Arabs. There were about a million and a half people in Palestine of which about a million were Arabs and roughly 500,000 were Jews. So in the demographic sense, the majority was clearly Arab. On the other hand, as you drove around Palestine, which I did extensively, at all hours of the day and night, you couldn't help but marvel at what the Jews had produced in their part of Palestine along the coast in particular. It was a miracle what they had done agriculturally and to some extent industrially. They worked terribly hard. They were aggressive, of course, in terms of what they hoped to ultimately achieve. One probably didn't know at the outside a great deal of what had been happening in terms of the genocide in Germany. I happened to live part of the time in Jerusalem in a small apartment in a Jewish house. The owner was a marvelous woman who was a Dutch Jew, and who, after I left, unhappily was killed in one of these horrible terrorist actions where the Arabs shot up the bus in which she was in. You couldn't help but have great admiration at what they had done, but also you recognized that there was this constant encroachment on what was a demographic majority in the area. You couldn't help but be rather disgusted by some of the terrorism they pulled off in Palestine. A lot of one's British friends were killed as a result of incidents like King David, etc.

Q: Which includes some of the people who later, like Menachem Begin and the present Prime Minister, Shamir.

STABLER: Yes. Menachem Begin at that time was someone who had a big price on his head. There was the Irgun Zvai Leumi and the Stern gang. One had someone by the name of Sartori, I think his name was, who was the Ford representative in Jerusalem and also represented I think the Palestine potash company, the Dead Sea. He was socially everywhere. Everybody knew him. The day the British left Jerusalem, May 15, 1948, he turned out to be all this time one of the important members of the Stern gang. I eventually dealt with Moshe Dayan. He was a very aggressive, abrasive individual, very difficult to deal with, but at that particular point he was fighting for his survival.

There was this constant sort of friction involving British, Jews and Arabs which got fairly tiring.

I have to admit it was very hard to be entirely neutral. You invariably felt more one way than another, although our official position was that of being entirely neutral between the two. I always cite what happened to me on the 15th of May, 1948 when the British left as evidence of my following instructions to the letter. When I was caught in the crossfire between the Jews on one side of the street and the Arabs on the other side I ended up with 37 bullet holes in my car, and still being alive at least I was neutral to the extent of saying, "Who shot at me?" It was very tense. You had the feeling that the British administration was more sympathetic to the Arab cause than the Jewish cause. And the Jews knew that.

We had difficult moments. The Consulate General was not very far from the building of the Jewish Agency. One morning there was an enormous explosion. It was quite clear that it had come from the Jewish Agency. One was sorry that this had occurred but we were even sorrier when we realized to our absolute horror that the Consulate car had disappeared. What had happened was that one of our Arab drivers had taken the Consulate car, had it loaded with explosives, drove into the Jewish Agency courtyard (allowed in because of the Consulate plates), got out, disappeared and the car blew up. So it was the Consulate car that was responsible for a lot of damage; fortunately nobody was killed. Our driver vanished and eventually we learned that he had ended up in Honduras. I went there some years later and discovered there was a large Palestine population there.

So there was this constant tension that existed which took its toll on people. It was hard on people, there were curfews, bombings and god knows what. After the Anglo-American Committee of Enquiry, of course, then those things went on; the British finally said enough is enough and turned it over to the UN.

Q: Did a new Consul General come out before the British left?

STABLER: Yes, he did.

Q: Was there a change in the atmospherics within the operation? You knew you were getting ready for a cataclysmic event.

STABLER: Yes, there was because Pinkerton went off as Minister to Beirut before we had embassies. Robert Macatee came out from the Department...I don't now remember what other jobs he had had. I knew him before when he was assistant chief of Personnel in 1941. We are talking about five or six years later. I think he came from Washington at the time. He was quite different. By that time I had been there for going on three years and was probably, with the exception of the OSS fellow...

Q: He was the equivalent to our CIA people later on.

STABLER: Yes. There was just one man who was dressed as an American major. He was known by the British, obviously, for what he was.

I had been there for quite a few years by then and had become more involved in the substantive side of things and would do occasional political reporting. I did do a great deal more, and became sort of the political advisor, along with the OSS fellow to Macatee on a great many things.

Yes, he was there before partition because I remember that shortly after partition Frances Bolton, who was then member of congress from Ohio came out on a visit to sort of test the waters. She was rather pro-Arab basically and was rather annoyed with this partition because again we were talking about a country which had a majority of Arabs and here they were dividing it up and giving part of it to the Jews. So Macatee was there at the time.

Partition came along because the British said, "We have enough of this. We are getting out in 1948 and you better do something before then because if you don't there will be total chaos and there won't be anybody here."

Q: Was this really saying, "Here you Americans have been talking about Jewish homeland, etc. and this is your problem."

STABLER: The Jewish homeland was what the British themselves had been talking about, the Balfour Declaration of 1917. But by 1947 there was clearly increased pressure in the United States because of what had happened in Germany which by then was fully known. There was real pressure of what do you do? We were not prepared to open up our immigration to let them all come into the States, so the next question was, "Where do they go?" By this time clearly the Zionist movement had decided that Palestine must become the national home for the Jews. Everything that they did was aimed at that time in terms of immigration to get them into Palestine. This was becoming a tremendously difficult thing for the British who had a large army, several divisions of troops, in Palestine. After all it is not a very large country, about 140 miles long and 70 miles wide. They had a tremendous concentration of first class British troops. And a fairly sizable police force which was composed of both Jews and Arabs, but the leadership was all British.

I think you are quite right that part of it certainly was directed to the United States. The British said, "We couldn't find anything through the Anglo-American Committee of Enquiry; no one can come up with any solution; we don't want to have anything to do with this; we can't cope with it; we are getting out; so do what you will, we aren't going to be here."

The UN came up with the Partition Resolution which, of course, was strongly resented by the Arabs. I was advised ...again I would make a good many trips across the Jordan to see what was happening there...by the British when I went over there to take my car and have two Arab Legion soldiers with submachine guns sitting in my back seat. I did this and got over to Amman and my Jordanian friends asked why I was doing this as I was well known and no one would do anything. They thought it was sort of an insult to come with two Arab Legion guards. So, I never had them again and nothing happened.

But there was very strong resentment. Temple bombs increased and we recognized, of course, that the day would come before very long, this was 1947, that the British would be out and where would we be. So we decided that in terms of safeguarding the Consulate we would have the British come and give us an expert estimate as to what it would need to guard the Consulate.

They came up with a figure of 285 marines, which would be 24 hours guard service plus road escorts. We sent a telegram to Washington saying that, in terms of the future, here is what has been recommended. Washington obviously went into a dead faint because they never answered it.

About a week before the British left, Washington suddenly threw on top of us something like 30 civilian guards...young men who after the war, not knowing what to do had answered some sort of ad and signed up as embassy guards. They came from all walks of life. One man had ended up as head of the commissary in Rome, but still was a guard and found himself in Jerusalem wondering what the hell he was doing there. None of them knew how to shoot a gun. I had to take them out personally to a range, although I had never shot a tommy gun, to teach them how to shoot tommy guns. They were totally undisciplined. In addition to that all of a sudden they sent us, which was very useful, a 10 or 12 man navy communication team which turned out to be the only way we could keep communications going. I think we had in the Consulate General 15 of these civilian guards who were very nice young man but who were basically undisciplined. They drank quite a lot; one of them got mad at me one evening and chased me with a machine gun. It was really chaotic.

We asked for an armored vehicle for the Consul General...they had set up a United Nations Truce Organization which was made up of Consul Generals from France, Belgian and the United States. The meetings were usually held at the French Consulate General, which was right under the walls of the old city. In order for our Consul to get back and forth he had to go in a car without armor or walk. So we requested an armored car. They said they couldn't send a car but could send an armored personnel carrier which doesn't have any armor on top; it just had armor on the side with a canvas top. We never got that either. The Consul General was killed by a sniper's bullet. The fact of the matter is that the Department of State was totally not prepared for anything of this sort.

Q: After Mr. Pinkerton left you were able to get a little better feel for the relations. Were instructions coming in from Washington?

STABLER: We were sort of left out of the loop on these things. There were a lot of conversations between London and Washington which we were not privy to. So a lot of these things were being done without our knowing what was going on.

Q: Just as an aside because people sometime forget how things are. There was no embassy in Tel Aviv, there was no embassy in Amman or anything like that. You were it.

STABLER: I jumped ahead a little bit because I talked about the Consul General being killed by sniper fire. It was not Macatee, it was Tom Wasson and he didn't come until just before the British left when all married men were removed. But no, Tel Aviv didn't exist as far as a US post is concerned. There wasn't a Jordan. I was the only contact with Transjordan. I was no longer accredited to Transjordan because Jordan gained independence. I traveled there as a friend.

Q: There was no mission in Jordan?

STABLER: There was nothing at all. The only thing that existed was the Consulate General in Jerusalem. I don't have any recollection that we were really consulted a great deal on these things or that we had much of an input on partition or were asked very much of what we thought about these things. I don't recall that we were kept up on the happenings in the UN. Things would happen and we would not have had advanced knowledge of what was going to happen. So we were really cut out of the loop. I suppose the High Commissioner was being queried because the British are better about these things than we are I think. Most of what we knew was gleaned from the British.

Q: During my last job I was seconded to the Historian's Office. Among other things I did a history of our Consulate General in Jerusalem. In the 1920s after the Balfour Declaration had come out, our officers there...the Jewish community was small and I think there was a certain antipathy towards the Zionist movement, a pro-Arab feeling ...were reporting again and again saying, "Zionism is all fine, but a homeland here means blood on the streets, and this is just not going to happen." Their predictions, of course, are true, there has been a tremendous amount of fighting which continues really to this day. Were you able to give reports saying that there was going to be a blood bath?

STABLER: Yes, one was giving Washington reporting of the views of various communities on this subject -- the Arabs and the Jews and some of the religious leaders who have an interest in all of this, and also the views of the British. We reported on what was actually happening there -- the various acts of terrorism, the strong feelings of the various Jewish and Arab communities. Keeping Washington not only abreast of what was happening, but what probably would happen if certain things were done.

Again, Pinkerton, I don't know what he said. I do know...because we did do a lot of reporting after Macatee got there in which I was involved...giving various points of view and letting them know actually the tensions that were existing between the communities and what might happen if certain things were done. And then, of course, after the Partition, we brought them up to date on that.

Q: Prior to Partition. In your reporting did you feel any concern about...okay, if you report this, this report might be looked with disfavor by both the Jewish community and those sympathetic, there was still a residue of the New Deal Administration which had had very strong Jewish support...did you feel any constraints?

STABLER: I think Pinkerton may have felt some constraints because he was a very cautious man and didn't want to upset anybody particularly. It may be that some of that could have come through in his reporting. After him there was a greater openness in expressing points of view. I mean not worrying about the political side. One tried to call the shots such as they were. The Arabs expressed very strong views about things, those views would be reported without regard to whether they would upset somebody or not. By the same token the views of the Jewish Agency, the official Jews, were also reported, plus the British who were more apt to favor the Arab cause than the Zionist cause. But I don't think political considerations entered into this reporting at all. Although one knew what the feelings were in Washington with the Department of State on one side and domestic political aspects on the other side. But when the time came for Truman to make his decision to recognize Israel de facto on the first day the British had left, I can assure you that we were neither consulted nor informed.

Q: I don't think anybody was informed.

STABLER: I don't think anybody was. Although the effort was made at that particular time to persuade the President that if he was going to recognize Israel de facto that he could temper it by recognizing Jordan de facto, even though Jordan had been independent since 1946 and we are talking about 1948. The President declined to do so.

Q: Was there a problem about not recognizing Jordan then? Was it budgetary or was there...?

STABLER: No, I think when Jordan became independent no one in Washington really bothered to think about recognizing it, regarding it pretty much as a British affair. In 1948 it was entirely a political thing. The President made the decision that this would have to be aimed at Israel and not be tempered in any way by also recognizing an Arab state. By that time the general outrage of the Arab world had already been felt with respect to what was happening with Partition and therefore it would be regarded by the Jews as probably insulting to try to balance it. So he declined to do that and it was only in January, 1949, when we recognized Israel de jure that the decision was made to recognize Jordan de jure at the same time.

Q: I want to stop at the Partition time where we will pick it up later. One last question. What was your feeling and those at the Consulate General about the British letting go? Were you thinking, "Oh my god, they have a responsibility, and shouldn't get out." or "Obviously they can't control the situation and lets see where the chips fall."?

STABLER: Obviously everybody recognized there would be utter chaos and almost anarchy once the British left. It was well known as a result of everything that had transpired before -- the Anglo-American Committee of Enquiry and then various UN studies, etc., and the British statement that they were getting out. One can sympathize with the British because this had become an enormous burden to bear, extremely expensive in terms of money and lives with no returns, which they had been carrying on for a great many years. There was no way that they were going to be persuaded to stay on. Pressure was brought to bear on them to stay on. They may have considered it for a while, but by that time the Labor Government had come in and I think that they finally just realized that there was no way they could do it or really wanted to do it.

We all knew that Partition wasn't going to be viable because everybody was against it. It was a big unknown that we were embarking on the day that the British pulled out. But the political situation had reached the point where there was no alternative. They wouldn't stay and the UN had no ability or capacity to put a force in there. It was just one of these machines that gathered speed and there was no stopping it. The United States had no power to stop it either because we were behind the Partitioning. We certainly weren't going to take over from the British. Domestically it was quite clear that this was what the Jews wanted because this was the creation by partition of the homeland. As it turned out they got the whole thing.

We knew in the Consulate General that there was the Hagganah.

Q: That was the Jewish army.

STABLER: Yes, that was the Jewish army. It was illegal, but the British didn't do much about it. They knew it was there and had some utility in the defense of kibbutzim and things of that sort. They got their arms helter-skelter by stealing from British ammunition depots and things of that sort. That was sort of the unofficial army. Then there was the Stern gang and the Irgun Zvai Leumi. The Irgun Zvai Leumi was the larger group and the Stern gang the smaller group. They also existed. One knew that the Jewish Agency ran a fairly efficient operation and the assumption was that the Hagganah would acquit itself pretty well in the struggle against the Arabs.

But as you added up the Arab manpower for the Arab armies, it was hard, frankly, to see how in the final analysis the Jews would be able to withstand this onslaught. Added to this, of course, was the view in all the Arab capitals -- American representatives in all the Arab capitals were reporting that this better not happen because the Jews would be pushed into the sea. At times the war between our representative, James McDonald, in Tel Aviv and our representatives in the Arab countries was worse than the fighting because those in Arab countries took one side and McDonald the other.

Q: What was in Tel Aviv?

STABLER: On the 15th of May when Truman recognized Israel de facto, we set up a diplomatic representative's office in Tel Aviv. James Grover McDonald came to Tel Aviv as the first American representative. Although he was not an ambassador in the strict sense of the word, he was the American Representative in this de facto situation. The office was set up in Tel Aviv as indeed if it were an embassy with communications. Messages would be repeated Tel Aviv and Arab capitals.

As I say, on paper it certainly looked as if there was no way the Israelis could withstand the Arab onslaught.

Q: Can we focus on what you were doing at the time of the Partition, on May 15..?

STABLER: No, May 15 was when the British left in 1948. Partition was the previous year in 1947.

Q: Well, then when the British left, because I...

STABLER: They are two distinct things. The Partition was the United Nations resolution to divide Palestine into Jewish and Arab states. Maybe we went over that last time. If we did, then lets take it up to May 15, 1948.

Q: Yes, that is what I had marked on the last tape.

STABLER: When the British pulled out of Jerusalem, they pulled out of Palestine a day or two later because they moved with the High Commissioner up to Haifa and had an enclave and then they shortly afterwards pulled out completely.

In any event, May 15, 1948 I was at the Consulate General. The staff there by that time had been reduced by many. Those of us who were there were all bachelors including the Consul General, Tom Wasson.

Q: I might mention at this time that it was the policy in those days that when trouble started you got rid of the families and also, if possible, you put bachelor officers into a place.

STABLER: Yes, it certainly was the policy as far as Jerusalem was concerned. We had a number of married officers there and they all transferred. Those of us who remained were bachelors and there were, I think, several officers who were brought from other posts for temporary duty who were bachelors. For example, Stu Rockwell, who also became an ambassador later on, was in the embassy in Ankara and was detailed as one of the officers to augment the staff. And then there were one or two others but I don't offhand remember who they were.

In any event, on the morning of May 15, Major Andronovich, Nick Andronovich, who was the CIA representative in Jerusalem, and I drove out in my personal car. The Consulate General by that time had no car because it had been blown up -- I think I mentioned it last time. We drove out to a little airstrip called Colombia and found there a small plane and British troops drawn up in battle array with a battery of field artillery with guns aiming in the direction of Jerusalem. In due course the High Commissioner arrived, Sir Alan Cunningham, who was a friend. He was received with full honors at the little airstrip. After saying goodbye to me and Andronovich and his staff, he took off in his little plane headed for Haifa. The guns were hitched up and bit by bit the British forces also departed.

In a very short period of time Andronovich and I were left standing on an extremely empty airfield feeling really quite lonely, because with the departure of the British forces all public security in Jerusalem came to an end. There was no neutral police force, no security provided by a third element, that is to say, Jews, Arabs or the British.

Andronovich and I drove back into Jerusalem and I came to the Consulate General and found sitting on the steps going up to the office a group of members of the staff including civilian guards who had recently come in and one other officer, Bob Houghton, by name, who is dead now. They were all rather irritated because they had wanted to go up to the hotel which was not too far from the Consulate General on the main streets near the YMCA. When they had walked in that direction they had been shot at. The British had gone, and public order had completely collapsed. They went back to the Consulate General and asked to borrow a car which was refused them. They didn't want to risk walking up there again and being shot at.

I said, "Look here, I have my car with a couple of flags on it. Hop in the car and I will drive you up there." This was around noon time on the 15th. In they got along with me and my little dachshund. We drove up the street around the corner from the Consulate General and almost in no time we started getting shot at. I drove the car right up on the sidewalk and let the people in the car get out. They almost fell into the hotel.

As soon as they had gotten out I started driving up the street towards the YMCA at which point I was taken under machine gun fire -- on one side by the Jews and the other side by the Arabs. I decided it was a no win situation and backed my car down the sidewalk and came really within a hairbreadth of having a bullet right through my head. It was scary. I was able to get out and fall into this hotel, literally.

There we were stuck for over 24 hours. That night...there was virtually no food in the hotel, there were no lights and we were concerned that during the night either a Jewish or Arab patrol might come in to this hotel and shoot first and ask questions later. Things were very tense at that time and the Jews and the Arabs were really after each other.

It was while we were all sitting in that hotel -- we did have a battery radio or some sort of communication -- that we learned that Mr. Truman had announced the de facto recognition of Israel, which made us all even more nervous because this was the area where there were quite a few Arabs around and we didn't think that decision would be very popular.

In any event while we were there one, possibly two, of the men who were with us there, part of the Consulate staff, got rather antsy about being cooped up and without my knowledge or permission, I was the senior officer there, went out onto the street and were promptly shot. Fortunately, neither of them were killed; they were picked up by Red Crescent ambulances (very brave ambulance people indeed) and taken off to hospitals. One of them was a civilian guard who was well into his 60s by this time.

Q: This was the type of person they sent out?

STABLER: This was the sort of harebrained scheme they thought up. Ages went all the way from the 60s down to the early 20s. This gentleman was in his 60s.

Anyway, he was taken away and, of course, we had no idea where. At that point we didn't know whether he was dead or alive. I think there may have been two, certainly there was one.

In any event, in due course the people at the Consulate General were able to arrange with the International Committee of the Red Cross, which had people in Jerusalem at that time trying to help in keeping some semblance of humanity in all of this that they come down to the hotel under the protection of a Red Cross flag -- I think these were mostly Swiss and extremely brave men because this was a wide open street absolutely visible from any sort of sniper's post. They came down by small groups and began removing the people in this hotel. Being senior officer I was the last to leave. Just before I left they started mowing the streets with bullets of one sort or another so we had to hold up awhile. We all got out and went back to the Consulate General. Those were the events of May 15.

There then began a period of one month in which really we were under siege -- the whole of Jerusalem really. The Arab Legion had occupied the Old City and were lobbing mortar shells into the New City. We lived there at the Consulate General with our own generator. We had a naval communications unit which was just across an alley way in a convent. We had the sort of guard force that would shoot street lights out and do all sorts of things.

During that period we had a number of casualties. One of the naval communicators at one point was walking behind the Consulate General, I don't know why he was there after dark. He ran across a patrol, we don't know whether it was Jews or Arabs, and was shot. He eventually died. Two of the guards, two young men, heard screams and went out behind the Consulate into this no man's land and brought Walker, I think that was his name, back into the Consulate. We had a US Public Health doctor assigned to the Consulate General at that time and he was able to give first aid and got him into a hospital. Eventually, I am sorry to say, he died.

The Consul General, Tom Wasson, was a member of the Security Council Truce Commission which was composed of the United States, France and Belgium, as I remember, and was supposed to keep in touch with the Jewish and Arab communities with the idea of somehow getting a truce from the fighting that was going on, which was widespread. The Egyptians had come into Gaza, the Iraqis had marched a division into Palestine, the Syrians had fiddled about a little bit up in the north, the Arab Legion had occupied the West Bank and the Old City. The Truce Commission met in the French Consulate which was just under the Walls of the Old City. Wasson was obliged to walk the distance, which was relatively far and fairly open between the Consulate General and the French Consulate. On his way back from one of these meetings he was crossing a street just behind the Consulate wearing a bulletproof vest, but a sniper, and to this day no one really knows whether it was Jewish or Arab, shot him in the arm which was the one area that was not protected by the vest. We got him to the hospital but he died very shortly thereafter.

At the time he was hit I was in the Consulate General, the only officer there at the moment. We had a number of communications at that point. We had the navy and a special CIA/OSS operator on the road, who was also wounded in a mortar attack in due course. I had to decide who was going to be the acting Consul General. We had Bill Burdett who was assigned there; we had Stuart Rockwell from Ankara who was on temporary duty but senior to Burdett. But I made the decision that an officer permanently assigned to Jerusalem should be the acting consul general. I sent the message informing the Department that Consul General Larson had been shot and seriously injured and I assumed charge, signing it Bill Burdett. So Bill Burdett indeed was acting consul general for a month or so until a replacement came.

During that period we were pretty much holed up. You could get around and some people lived outside the Consulate General. I lived in the Consulate General and slept with telephone and tommy gun by my bed. We ate ten-in-one rations that had been brought in before.

Q: Ten-in-one rations being a military combat type of ration.

STABLER: Yes. Enough food for one man for ten days or for ten men for one day, something of that sort.

Q: I might add, not the greatest food in the world.

STABLER: Not the greatest, but it was the only food we had because all the markets were closed.

Q: He hadn't been around a lot but seemed to have more of a world view than many. Did he use you as a sounding board to find out what this peculiar place, the United States was? Because America really had very little influence in that area, the Middle East, at that time.

STABLER: There wasn't a great deal. We began to have a good deal more. We had some degree of influence, but not in the north because obviously Iraq was in the British sphere, and Lebanon and Syria were more or less in the French sphere. Very shortly after I got to Jerusalem there was the uprising in Syria and the French were eventually pushed out.

He was interested, of course, in the political views of the United States. I don't think he ever quite understood why he wasn't regarded more favorably by the States. The fact there was no recognition obviously galled him. He assumed, in a way, that as he regarded the American President as an important figure the American President by like token regarded him, Abdullah, as an important figure, which of course obviously wasn't the case. He had that sort of a vision of the world where he saw himself in a larger role than he really had. This also was somewhat likened to what he regarded as his role vis-a-vis the British Queen. The British did look upon Jordan in their way as an important element and he looked at the Queen as a fellow monarch.

Q: Actually it would have been the King.

STABLER: Yes, you are right. I was flying across the Channel in 1950 when I got word that the King had died. So it was the King.

He had very little idea of what made this country tick. I think they were all aware of the rather strong domestic political influence of the American Jewish community which, of course, distressed him.

Q: Did he talk to you about this?

STABLER: He never really took me to task about the general Arab view that our policy in the Middle East was dictated by domestic considerations. I don't ever remember him talking a great deal about that. He was apt to talk about the larger picture of how he viewed and looked towards the future and some peaceful arrangement where Jordan would be a bigger state and Israel would be there, etc. He obviously very much wanted to have a formal relationship with the United States.

In January 30, 1949, I went down to the cable wireless where I had to go to pick up my messages -- by this time I was alone again, I didn't have any clerk -- and found a US info message in the clear put out by USIA which declared that the United States had recognized Jordan and Israel de jure. Then there was a coded message. I had to go back to the house and get my one time pad out and laboriously decode the message which said exactly what the message had said that was in the clear. I was to inform the King that Jordan was recognized de jure. Then I had to sit down and type the message out, sign it, get into my car and drive to the Palace, see the King and hand him the note. This was about 11:00 in the morning. He said, "Yes. Where have you been? I have been waiting for you since 8:00 this morning." It had been on the BBC. Yet, the Department had seen fit to give me no warning or opportunity to have at least the advantage of appearing to be on the inside. It had all been made public, yet I had to go through this business of decoding this stupid message which said all the same things as the public message.

The King was pleased but I think he would have been more pleased if I had been able to go in the night before and say, "Your Majesty, I just have come to inform you that we are announcing tomorrow morning that we are extending de jure recognition."

Q: When you went back to Washington afterwards, did you ever find out why this happened?

STABLER: I am afraid it is just our system which never really functions terribly well with these things. Part of it comes from the White House which sometimes doesn't tell the State Department when it is going to do something. The State Department is frightened to death of sending any message ahead of the White House. Nobody in the White House stops to think about the other side that maybe some foreign policy advantage could be gained by doing some of these things in a slightly different way.

Q: I might add that I have had some interviews with people who were in the middle of a civil war where we recognized one side or the other in Africa leaving our embassy extremely exposed because they were under the power of the group not accorded the recognition.

STABLER: I think, as a general rule, we have been extremely lacking in using our information sometimes to our best advantage. We don't tell our people in the field sometimes what they ought to know. We don't tell them in a timely enough fashion. We generally view the ambassador as someone who is there but not really considered as a primary matter. The British are much better than this. They consider the ambassador an important person and a priority member of the team. He is told what he has to know in plenty of time. I don't mean to make a capital case that our relations with Jordan were forever compromised by that. All I am saying is that it would have been a good gesture to have told the King in advance, but we didn't do it.

He was pleased and we set up the legation in Amman. The British Royal Air Force sent an honor guard to the Legation the morning I raised the flag, which was in February because I think it took them a month to get all the staff out and formally set up the Legation.

That year, the fourth of July, the first one where we had formal relations, the Arab Legion sent a brass band to play at the reception that I gave that afternoon. It was all done with good humor. The King was obviously pleased to have the United States finally a member of the diplomatic corps in Jordan. It didn't change a great deal because one had already worked as a mission.

Nothing really spectacular happened during that period. A lot of it was dealing with the question of the future and how to settle the problem with Israel. What to do, etc. Then, internally, the King spent some time trying to decide...I spend a certain amount of time with him. We discussed and debated what we should call Transjordan. It was called the Kingdom of Transjordan and he wanted to change it. The discussion was whether we call it the Hashemite Kingdom of the Jordan, or Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. Ultimately it was decided to call it Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. While I was traveling with him we would spend time trying to design a new decoration. Things of that sort. Just sort of amusing household details.

Q: You were there more because of your long term visiting and as a friend...although there was quite a difference not only obviously in rank but also in age. Do you think he was reaching out to you in some of these ways either as a counter to or difference with the British, because they had been there so long?

STABLER: I don't think as a counter. I think he obviously enjoyed the idea that he had a "special relationship," if you want to call it that although it really wasn't, with representatives of the great powers. To him the French were not very important and they had all been involved in the business of denying him the Kingdom of Syria; the Fourth Republic was a mess, not to be taken very seriously. Obviously he had nothing to do with the Russians; they weren't there and they were bad. He had had all these years of close relationship with the British, now suddenly the United States had become a friend too. I am sure that going back to what I mentioned very early on when I first went over to Amman in early 1945, with Pinkerton who had been criticized for not taking an interest in the Emir, and took an interest, and although I was only a vice consul that seemed to appeal to him too and for some reason we struck it off quite well personally. But certainly there was no question that I represented his contact with the other great power. It was never a counterbalance to the British because there was nothing we did. The British provided arms for him, they provided military officers, and trade, etc. And we provided nothing.

We did, however, recognize that he was a force for stability in that part of the world and that view is still held today. In spite of the fact that Hussein, for his own good reasons, did what he did, we are not prepared to get rid of him.

Q: To put this in context, we are talking about just after what was called the Gulf War between the United States and its Allies and Iraq in which Jordan and King Hussein were at least verbally giving a great deal of support to the Iraqi side which was not appreciated by the United States at all.

STABLER: One has to remember that King Hussein has a great many Palestinians in his Kingdom and at that time Saddam Hussein was trying to use the Palestine ploy to garner support; King Hussein is a survivor. The fact is that Jordan does represent an element of basic stability and we are not just about to abandon them, and certainly in the period I am talking about, 1948, Jordan was the only country that showed at least some degree of sensitivity and rationality when it came to Israel.

During that period I saw a lot of the King. He gave me a horse that I used to ride. He used to play polo in Amman with Arab Legion officers which was fun but dangerous. One had really an interesting time with not only the Jordanians and Palestinians but with the foreign community. It was a very small town. Everybody knew what everybody else was doing. There was a lot of intrigue and things of that sort. But it was a wonderful experience. I was amused at one point when Stanton Griffis, US Ambassador in Cairo, came over to Amman. I showed him around and took him down to the Winter Quarters in Shuneh to have dinner with the King. He was quite taken with all this performance and apparently wrote to Bob Lovett, who was then the Under Secretary of State, recommending that I be made the first US Minister to Jordan.

Well, I was only 28 or 29. That fell, as you can imagine, not only on deaf but scandalized ears in Washington...the idea that someone at the lowest grade in the Foreign Service should suddenly become a Minister. Of course some of my colleagues in the Middle East like Keeley, who was US Minister in Damascus, didn't think it was a very good idea either. Anyway, it didn't get very far. So I became the first Chargé d'Affaires in Amman and then in August, 1949 I was transferred. David Fritzlan came out as the Chargé d'Affaires.

Q: I have done an interview with him.

STABLER: You have done an interview with David?

Q: Yes.

STABLER: Then, as you know, the Minister was selected, a man by the name of Barnes, I think it was. He suddenly disappeared from sight and didn't go. The first US Minister was Gerald Drew who came out in early 1950.

I was told to return to Washington without delay, the fastest possible means. I rushed back, rushed to the Department to the greeting, "Oh, you are here? Why did you come back so fast?" No one then knew why I had been told to come back so fast. I worked on Palestine Affairs for a while. Then in January, 1950 I became Political Advisor to the US Representative to the UN Trusteeship Council which met in Geneva from January, 1950 through March, 1950, to draft the statute for the international city of Jerusalem -- the Corpus Separatum. This was an interesting three months of activity where the Trusteeship Council very seriously went through step by step, chapter by chapter setting up an international city of Jerusalem and for the holy places in what had been Palestine, so that Bethlehem, Nazareth, etc. would be under the control of the administrator of this international city with an international police force.

That was pursuant to the Partition Resolution in 1947. At the end of the session, the plan was given to the representative of Israel and the representative of Jordan, who then controlled the holy places in Jerusalem and the West Bank. Within a matter of a very few minutes those representatives turned the plan down. And that was the end of that.

WILLIAM C. BURDETT
Jerusalem (1948-1950)

Ambassador William C. Burdett was born in Tennessee in 1920. He entered the Foreign Service in 1941 and served in the U.S. Marine Corps during World War II. His career in the Foreign Service included posts in Iraq, Israel, Turkey, Great Britain, and Malawi. Ambassador Burdett was interviewed by Richard Nethercut in 1988.

Q: The Mid-East is very much on peoples' minds now in view of the possible breakthrough in Arab-U.S. dialogue. Could you tell me about your involvement in Mid-East policy and which assignments were the most significant?

BURDETT: My first significant involvement in U.S. policy towards the Middle East arose during an assignment to Jerusalem. I went there in May of 1948 as a Vice Consul 0-5, Foreign Service Officer-Class Five, arriving four days before British troop withdrew. Unhappily our Consul General, Thomas Wasson, was killed by a sniper several days later. As a consequence I became Acting Consul General and the U.S. member of the (UN) Security Council Truce Mission.

Q: That must have been quite an unusual experience for somebody at such a junior point in his career. Can you recall some of the feelings you had, and how this worked out?

BURDETT: The entire situation was unusual. Jerusalem was divided into Jewish and Arab sectors with feelings of apprehension all around. There was sporadic firing, mortar barrages, some of the shells falling in the Consulate General compound. Our movements were limited, but we maintained telephone contact with the British Consulate General in the Arab sector. The British proved most helpful throughout in keeping us abreast of developments in the rest of Palestine. I attended meetings of the Security Council Truce Commission in the French Consulate General. We were in regular communication with officers of the Jewish Agency, and the Jewish Defense Forces. Occasionally, we could also reach the commander of the Arab Legion in the old city of Jerusalem, and other Arab officials. Fortunately, we established early a close working relationship with Colonel Moshe Dayan, commander of Israeli forces in Jerusalem.

Q: What about communications with the State Department? Were they reliable and did you get rather detailed guidance, or were you forced to make a number of decisions on your own?

BURDETT: Shortly prior to the British withdrawal the State Department established a Naval Communications unit across an alley from the Consulate. We had our own generator and thus perhaps the best communications that existed in Jerusalem with the outside world. We could receive messages almost instantaneously from Washington. In the confusion then existing the Department allowed us to take the initiative in determining our activities and reporting to the extent we could. The Department realized the restrictions on our movements and did not press us for jobs that were not feasible. We made the facilities of our communications unit available to members of the American press.

Q: You mentioned that one of the people you negotiated with, or had contact with, was Colonel Moshe Dayan. Would you care to elaborate on this contact with him?

BURDETT: As a member of the Security Council Truce Commission we worked with Colonel Dayan and Lieutenant Colonel Abdullah el Tel of the Arab Legion and UNTSO in drawing up detailed cease-fire lines for the Jerusalem area and monitoring the truces. Dayan was a tough negotiator but as a sabra knew and had grown up with the Arabs. Fortunately the personal relations between Dayan and el Tel were good which facilitated the work of the Truce Commission.

Q: Looking back now in the context of subsequent American policy towards the area, what effect do you think your role at this time had on subsequent American policy in the area?

BURDETT: We encountered constant difficulties with the Jewish civilian authorities and had the impression that they would reach an agreement and when they thought it advantageous would ignore it. This was shown in the question of bringing supplies to Jerusalem after the Security Council imposed truce. We became involved in a public controversy with Bernard Joseph, the top civilian Jewish official. The truce agreement provided for a "standstill" so that neither side could take advantage of the truce to improve its position. Contrary to this provision Jewish trucks entered Jerusalem regularly, ignoring a check point the Security Council Truce Commission tried to establish. Most importantly the Jews took advantage of the truce period to construct what was known as the "Burma Road" beyond the range of Arab Legion guns linking Jerusalem to the main Jewish areas. Thus, by the end of the truce the Jewish authorities had successfully broken the siege of Jerusalem. Thereafter they enjoyed military superiority in the area, while before that this advantage had rested with the Arab Legion.

Q: I see. Now at what point did you then complete your assignment as Acting Consul General, and did you stay on in Jerusalem after a new Consul General had been appointed, or what happened?

BURDETT: During the summer of 1948 John MacDonald was assigned as Consul General. He was transferred shortly thereafter, and I resumed charge of our office just before the assassination of the UN mediator Bernadotte. I was then in charge of the office until early in 1950 when a new Consul General arrived, and I was transferred to Tabriz.

Q: Did this experience in Jerusalem stamp you as a Mid-East specialist and have an impact on your subsequent career development?

BURDETT: Unfortunately I am not an "Arabist", and have no scholastic or linguistic knowledge of the Middle East. I've maintained a professional interest in the area ever since and did receive assignments related to that area through a large part of my career.

Q: From Jerusalem I judge that you were subsequently involved in the Mid-East crisis involving the Suez Canal. Could you please explain your involvement there?

BURDETT: From Iran I was transferred to the Department and assigned to the Office of Near Eastern Affairs and then the Bureau of Near Eastern and African Affairs. President Nasser's decision to nationalize the Suez Canal in 1956 marked the failure of an ambitious program of Secretary Dulles intended to seal off the area from "international communism". To contain Soviet expansion, Mr. Dulles adopted a policy of impartiality in the Arab-Israel problem and set about creating a Middle East Defense arrangement. I participated in developing a detailed proposal for a comprehensive Middle East settlement. We thought Israel obtained word of our plans (Israeli intelligence on our planning was "remarkable" indicating inside leaks), found them distasteful, and deliberately adopted policies including aggressive border raids, to make it politically difficult for Nasser to move towards an accommodation. At the same time Israel's supporters in Congress blocked the provision of military aid. In 1955 Nasser reached the conclusion that he could not count upon the United States to restrain Israel politically. He also concluded that the U.S. would not meet his requests for military assistance sufficient to enable him to protect Egypt from Israeli aggression. Nasser decided to turn to the Soviet Union for military assistance. Increasingly he adopted a non-aligned anti-Western stance.

The deterioration in relations was rapid. In the summer of 1956 we replied negatively to the Egyptian demand for a "yes" or "no" answer on an outstanding offer to finance the Aswan Dam. Nasser used this in part as a pretext for nationalizing the Suez Canal. A mighty scramble then ensued to find ways to assure the continued international use of the canal and to provide the British and French a face saving alternative to the use of force to regain control of the canal. Two major conferences were held in London. Nasser in effect rejected the proposals coming from those conferences. In late summer of 1956 the British and French military preparations were well publicized. However, we thought these were in the nature of bargaining postures and contingency planning. The actual decision of Britain, France and Israel to attack the Suez Canal caught us by surprise. We made a last minute effort to forestall the attack unsuccessfully.

The Administration was then confronted with an "agonizing reappraisal". President Eisenhower decided that we had no alternative but to oppose the British, French and the Israelis.

Q: You were very much involved on the Washington end of things and I wonder if you could describe how the State Department related in this case to the formulation and the implementation of President Eisenhower's policy?

BURDETT: Once the decision was made to oppose the British, French and Israeli attack, Secretary Dulles became in effect the "Desk Officer". Our efforts were coordinated by his office. I was the bag carrier when Bob Murphy was sent to London to reconnoiter prior to the attack, and I served as "bookkeeper" in the sense of assembling briefing books and doing staff work.

BILHA BRYANT
Israeli Citizen
Haifa, Israel (1948-1954)

Bilha Bryant was born in 1934 in Bulgaria. Bryant served in the Israeli Army and worked in the private sector before joining the Israeli Foreign Service in 1959. Bryant resigned from the Israeli Foreign Service and married Edward (Ted) Bryant in 1963. With her husband, Bryant was assigned overseas to Mozambique, Ethiopia, Pakistan, Korea and India. Bryant then began to work for the State Department and served in the Soviet Bureau, Eastern European Affairs and Congressional Relations. Bryant was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: What was the Mixed Armistice Commission in those days. We're talking about 1950-ish, aren't we?

BRYANT: Well, '53 or '54. Representatives from the Israeli and Syrian or Lebanese military would meet once a week to discuss border incidents; it could be as minor as a donkey crossing the border, or something serious such as kidnaping across the border or shooting at working farmers. Of course, United Nations officers also participated. Eight to 10 people usually attended the meetings, not more than that, depending on the seriousness of the incident. Not much was happening on border with Lebanon, but there was always something going on with the Syrians.

Q: What sort of things were you doing?

BRYANT: At that point the Syrians were sitting high up on the Golan Heights and were shooting at Israeli farmers, or fishermen on the Kinneret (Lake Tiberias). Both my superiors were high-ranking officers conducted the discussions. I was only a second lieutenant and my job was to sit quietly and take notes of the proceedings and then follow up.

Q: How were these meeting at that time there with the Syrians?

BRYANT: The meetings were very civilized. There was no social chatter and exchange of jokes, but at the same time there was no hostility as such. I think the hatred came later on when the Arabs started losing part of their territories. The Syrians, as you know, lost the Golan Heights.

Q: So the '56 war would be the Suez War?

BRYANT: The Suez War. As soon as the war broke out, I, like thousands other Israelis, was mobilized. I was assigned to the Public Affairs Office of the Israeli Army, specifically, to escort foreign journalists who were reporting on the war. A very interesting thing happened then; if you remember, the Israeli army was moving very fast across the Negev. So there we were, riding across the desert in a convoy of buses following the conquering army. At one point we lost track of the army but were able to continue by following the hundreds of shoes and boots left behind in the desert by the retreating Arab forces. Actually, I found that to be a very sad sight. Finally we did get to Sharm el Sheikh.

Q: Had things changed at all after the '56 war?

BRYANT: No, they hadn't. Perhaps at first the glory of victory helped morale in the country, but it also brought a new and horrific factor to everyday life - terrorism. While I haven't lived there for over 35 years, I still remember well the horrors of terrorism for the ordinary Israeli. I still get upset at the thought that the Arabs lost the Suez war fair and square and that the only way they could stand up to Israel was by killing and maiming innocent people, including small children.

DANIEL OLIVER NEWBERRY

Daniel Oliver Newberry was born in Georgia in 1922. He received is bachelor's degree from Emory University in 194. He then served overseas in the US Army from 1943- 1946. His career included positions in Jerusalem, Turkey, New York, Laos, Iran, Turkey, and Morocco. Mr. Newberry was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in December 1997

Q: How did you get into Jerusalem?

NEWBERRY: With difficulty! [Laughter] It was really rather a gripping experience for somebody like me who really didn't know very much about how to conduct himself as a Foreign Service officer. The airstrip at "Columbia" was literally just a landing strip. The paved, asphalt road from Ramallah to Jerusalem ran across the landing strip. There was vehicular traffic going across the landing strip! It was that kind of situation.

It was getting rather late in the afternoon, and the pilot had to fly on to Beirut that same day. He had to get to Beirut before dark because in 1949 they didn't have any landing lights at Beirut airport. So the pilot and the crew of the airplane were eager to get out of "Columbia" airstrip. While they were getting all of the cargo unloaded, which was destined for delivery to the UN Mission up there at Government House in Jerusalem, I was talking to an obviously European soldier in the uniform of the Arab Legion. He turned out to be an ex "Afrika Korps" German who had somehow escaped becoming a prisoner of war. He had enlisted with the Arab Legion. So there I was, chatting away with him in German, never realizing that I was closing the "trap" around myself by being seen and heard speaking German.

The point I'm leading up to is that a woman Major in the Arab Legion, and remember that this was in 1949, was in charge of the arrivals and departures of all persons at this airstrip. She was the only officer in the Arab Legion who could speak four foreign languages. Her name was Major Asia Halaby. She held a commission in the Arab Legion. We eventually got on fairly cordial terms, but not that day! She took one look at my passport and said: "Mr. Newberry, you cannot land here!" I said: "Where can I land? I don't have an assignment to Beirut. At least, I'm assigned as a vice consul in Jerusalem. It says so in my passport." She repeated: "You can't land here!"

I realized that I was in trouble. So I talked to one of the American Sergeants who had been a passenger on my plane from Athens. I said: "When you get up to the UN Mission at Government House, pass the word back to the American consul over on the Israeli side that the new American vice consul is out at the 'Columbia' airstrip and is in trouble." This Major Halaby had said: "Okay, you can stay, but you're a prisoner of war!" That's when I said to this American sergeant: "For Heaven's sake, get the word to the American consul and tell him what my situation is."

Well, as it turned out, this Sergeant went to a cocktail party and forgot all about me. However, another one of the UN military people was staying at the same "Bed and Breakfast" place where I was under "house arrest." Three days later, he saw the American consul, Bill Burdett, on the street in Jerusalem and said: "What are you doing about Newberry?" Bill is now dead, God rest his soul. He said: "Newberry? He's still in Washington." I found out about this conversation later on. Anyway, once the consulate knew that I was out at "Columbia" airstrip, another vice consul came out and "bailed me out." That was my arrival at my first post. I had literally been declared to be a "prisoner of war."

Q: Dan, could you explain, both for me and for the historical record, what the situation was in Jerusalem in 1949 when you arrived there? How did it appear to you?

NEWBERRY: I'll be glad to do so. First, let me say what the "technical" situation was. What was referred to as the "Old City," that is, the entire walled city of Jerusalem, plus the eastern side of the city, including Mt. Scopus and all of the area adjoining it to the East, was controlled by Jordan. This was the situation left over from the first Arab-Israeli War of 1948. The Jordanian Army, made up principally of the Arab Legion, held what is now the West Bank of the Jordan River. That is, the "Old City" of Jerusalem, plus the West Bank of the Jordan River. Israel controlled what was called the "New City" of Jerusalem and everything West to the Mediterranean. So, in effect, we had to deal with two governments in Jerusalem.

We dealt with the Jordanian "Mutusyarif," as they called him, the Governor of the "Old City." On the Israeli side, the Israelis still had a "Military Governor" of Jerusalem. So that was technically the political division of authority.

As it turned out, we had a little difficulty in getting me started on my assigned duties. Bill Burdett, the American consul in Jerusalem, had already decided that I would have one of the most irksome jobs in the American consulate, because that's what they always do to the most junior officer. [Laughter] That was arranging "clearances" for American travelers to get through what was called the "Mandlebaum Gate." That is, from the Israeli to the Jordanian occupied sections of Jerusalem. Mandlebaum Gate was actually a square, or a "Platz," as they say in German.

Since the "cease-fire lines" happened to be laid in place, Mandlebaum Square was "no man's land" between the Jordanian held sector and the Israeli held sector. There weren't very many American travelers whom either side would allow to cross to the other side. In particular, the Jordanians didn't like people to come first to Israel and then to Jordan. It was my job to arrange for all of these "clearances," to go and meet these people, and to walk them through "no man's land" and help them with their baggage, since no vehicles could go through this area. That is, unless I happened to have a consulate jeep, which couldn't carry much luggage in any case.

The only kind of vehicle allowed to go through the Mandlebaum Gate was a foreign, consular vehicle. Everything else was stopped. It was like being on the bank of a river where there was no ferry boat. People literally walked across the demarcation line.

So this was one of my first, assigned duties. However, our old friend, Major Asia Halaby, of the Arab Legion, was also the person who handled the clearances for the Jordanians. During the first two or three weeks that I was doing this job, I had some other duties to handle on the Jordanian side, but my name was not on the Jordanian "clearance list." Finally, the American consul took the matter up with the Jordanians. Major Asia Halaby said: "We suggest that you assign somebody other than Mr. Newberg" [sic] to that duty.

Of course, Bill Burdett stood on principle. He got his friend, Wells Stabler, who was the American Chargé d'Affaires in Amman, Jordan, to go to the Jordanian Foreign Ministry. Major Halaby was then ordered to let me perform my duties in clearing people to go from the Israeli to the Jordanian side of the line.

Q: I think that she must have thought that you were Jewish, because she heard you speaking German.

NEWBERRY: That's why I mentioned the fact that I was heard speaking German. Eventually, she told me this. She said: "Your name is Daniel, and I heard you speaking German. What else was I to think but that the State Department had committed the great effrontery of assigning a Jewish vice consul here?" As I found out later, that was what was bothering her, although I didn't know it at the time. Actually, I think that the State Department would have had every right to assign a Jewish vice consul to this position. It might have been a little hard on the incumbent, but there was nothing wrong with the principle of assigning a Jewish consular officer to the American consulate in Jerusalem. We had Jewish FSOs and have had them assigned to Jerusalem, but not in 1949. When I thought about what might have happened if the Jordanians had had an American "prisoner of war" in those circumstances, it did not leave me with a very cozy feeling.

Q: What was the military situation there? Was there a cease-fire at that time?

NEWBERRY: There was a cease-fire. As I recall it, the truce talks at Rhodes were still going on, although I will have to check the dates. They already had in place the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization (UNTSO), or had it on hand very soon after that. There were multinational contingents monitoring the borders between Syria and Israel, Jordan and Israel, and Egypt and Israel. They had these UN "Truce Supervision Units" based around there. It was a pretty "hairly" [dangerous] business. Some of the personnel assigned to these units came close to great, personal peril in handling this job. It was a very tense time, indeed.

It was also particularly dangerous. I remember, from the time when I was still under "house arrest" at this "Bed and Breakfast" place which was called the "American Colony Hotel" [North of the walled city of Jerusalem]. Actually, it's more than a bed and breakfast place, but I was a newcomer and didn't know the difference.

I wanted to go to the Anglican Cathedral to attend religious services. They told me at the American Colony Hotel to stick to the main road because there were still land mines that had not been "defused." It was still a combat situation in May, 1949, even though there was a truce in effect.

Q: What was the American consulate general in Jerusalem doing in those days in its relationship with the Arabs and the Israelis?

NEWBERRY: It was more a case of what the consulate general was trying to do. It was really an anomalous situation in terms of our relations with our own colleagues. The American ambassador in Tel Aviv insisted that the consulate general in Jerusalem was a "constituent post" of the American mission in Israel. He tried to give orders to the consul general in Jerusalem, but the consul general would have none of it. In consular terms, the consulate general in Jerusalem reported directly to the State Department and not to the embassy in Tel Aviv and not to the Legation in Amman, Jordan. This was about the time when they stopped referring to the country as "Transjordan," calling it simply, "Jordan." That was sort of the bureaucratic situation that we had.

In traditional, Foreign Service practice we all got to know and to cultivate the Military Commander of the Jerusalem Garrison on the Israeli side. He was a colonel named Moshe Dayan [later Israeli Defense Minister and a major Israeli political figure]. He was very approachable. He and his wife were obviously very ambitious. They had what the Europeans used to term a "calling day," a certain day when new arrivals could go to Dayan's house and meet all sorts of interesting people.

That's what I did, even though I had no reason to meet higher ranking officials. So I got to know Moshe Dayan and his sister, who was being "courted" by one of our officers. I won't say which one. Moshe Dayan's sister-in-law married a young Israeli Air Force Lieutenant. I was lucky enough to be invited to the wedding. That young Lieutenant was named Ezer Weizman, who is now President of Israel. [Laughter]

It was an unusual situation where a young, low-ranking Foreign Service officer, in fact, the most junior FSO, had regular access to these Israeli "movers and shakers." Just as during a later part of my experience in Jerusalem, toward the end of my tour there, I just "happened" to be on the Arab side of Jerusalem one day in August, 1952, when something terribly dramatic happened inside the Old City. I found out that King Abdullah of Jordan had been assassinated in a mosque! I was the only officer in our consulate general who knew this. I was trying to alert the other side of the line, while still doing my job as a reporting officer.

So for the next several days all of us in the consulate general were trying to piece together what had happened. Obviously, the Jordanian Police moved in and arrested people right and left. However, it was just my luck that I happened to be in a place where nobody in the American consulate general would have known about what had happened for hours until the BBC [British Broadcasting Commission] reported what had happened. I was able to contribute to the reporting on this event.

Q: You mentioned that you had contacts, even as a young officer, among the "movers and shakers" on the Israeli side. What about on the Jordanian side?

NEWBERRY: I was just going to say that, in the context of this quick "round up" of people who were arrested by the Jordanians, was what I thought was one of my best contacts. He was explaining a lot of things to me. I guess that he was a nephew of the famous Mufti Hajamin al-Husseini, who was very prominent among Palestinians. My friend was arrested and eventually hanged for alleged involvement in the conspiracy to kill King Abdullah! I began to think that acquaintanceship with my friends, the people whom I was cultivating, was potentially dangerous.

Q: What was your impression of Jordan when you first arrived in that country, including how it was run, where it was going, and all of that?

NEWBERRY: Well, Stu, I can only give a very circumscribed response to that very good question. As a "new kid on the block," I was so concentrated on getting my work done, and it was a very busy job, that I didn't really have the leisure to go out and sort of "explore" things.

We didn't have "professional" diplomatic couriers. We took it in turn to drive our diplomatic pouches over to Amman, Jordan. I would chat with the people in our Legation there, which consisted of two rooms in the Philadelphia Hotel. So I picked up impressions regarding the situation. However, my recollection of those years is very limited. The British were still very much "running the show." That impression has lingered with me, especially after King Abdullah was assassinated. Abdullah's successor, King Khalal, was mentally so limited. Then, it was some further time before the "Brave, Young King," Hussein, really began to take control of the situation. But during all of this time, from 1950 to about 1960, it seemed to me that the British were still very much "calling the shots."

Q: What about Israel? What was your impression and the reaction of our people in Jerusalem toward the Israelis?

NEWBERRY: I have to say, quite candidly, that I was personally shocked, when I arrived at the consulate general in Jerusalem, to find that, to a man, our people were all very "anti-Israeli." I was shocked at this because, first of all, as I told you, some of my best friends and closest "buddies" in the U.S. Army during World War II had been Jewish refugees from Nazism. I was prepared to be "open minded" about Israel. However, as I learned more about some of the more terrible things that the "Hagganah," the most prominent of the Jewish organizations, did during the first Arab-Jewish War [in 1948], I began to appreciate that there really were two sides to the Arab-Jewish conflict.

Then, at a certain point, the line from "Romeo and Juliet," about "a plague on both your houses" appeared more reasonable to me. "A plague on both your houses" was pretty much my attitude during the rest of my time in Jerusalem, because such outrageous things were done on both sides. I think that I was honestly "neutral" by the time I finished my tour of duty in Jerusalem.

Q: Either then, or not too long afterwards, our consul general was killed, and nobody, even to this day, knows who killed him.

NEWBERRY: I heard many, almost eyewitness stories. I think that it is beyond debate that our consul general, Tom Watson, was killed by a sniper. They still had his "bulletproof vest" hanging up in the consulate general which was supposed to protect him. However, the bullet entered right under his armpit and went right past the "bulletproof vest." So, despite taking precautions, he was killed in that way. I haven't made a detailed study of this matter, but on the basis of circumstantial evidence I believe that the sniper could only have been on the Israeli side. Well, I don't really know. However, the point is that, when he was killed, Consul General Watson was either going to or coming back from a meeting of the Special Consular Commission which was trying to implement the truce. He was on an errand of peace, either coming or going, when he was shot by this sniper.

Q: Do you think that that contributed to the bitterness of the people in the consulate general toward the Israelis?

NEWBERRY: It may have, because the man that I replaced was also shot, presumably from the same direction. However, he survived. So that's part of it. I think that the natural, sort of "social" contacts of the Americans in the consulate general, especially those who couldn't speak any other language but English, was with the military and civilian people in Government House. I would have to say that they were pretty much anti-Israeli.

Q: What about the relations between the consulate general and I guess that by now it was our embassy in Tel Aviv?

NEWBERRY: We had an embassy in Tel Aviv. The ambassador was a "political" appointee.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

NEWBERRY: His name was James McDonald. He was a prominent and perhaps the leading, Gentile "Zionist" in the United States. He was "rushed out" to Tel Aviv shortly after the United States recognized Israel in 1948. He didn't know much about the State Department, but he thought that he had access to the White House, [then under President Truman]. He attempted, without success, to persuade the consulate general in Jerusalem to consider itself a "constituent post" of the embassy.

Ambassador McDonald's performance in Tel Aviv is interesting, in retrospect. I liked him personally but I thought that he was not a good choice to be ambassador in Israel at that time. He didn't serve in Tel Aviv until toward the end of the Truman administration. We had a career FSO as the second American ambassador to Israel, Lynette Davis.

I was assigned to temporary duty in the embassy in Tel Aviv for the last few months of my tour in Israel. This was during the interim period when we were waiting to know who the new ambassador to Israel would be. I remember hearing a youngish Israeli Foreign Ministry official telling me: "Well, we hope that the new American ambassador will be a career officer, because we know that in the State Department they discounted everything that Ambassador McDonald said. We want an American ambassador who will report accurately what we say to him." Of course, since Ambassador McDonald was such a partisan of Israel, he was interpreting what the Israelis said to him, and the Israelis didn't want that. The Israelis just wanted an accurate report of what they told him.

I had not been in Israel since that first tour, but the Israelis had obviously learned how to "operate" in Washington. However, at that time, which was just a year after Israel became independent, they were still "feeling their way" as to how best to influence the development of U.S.-Israeli relations. Having an all-out, pro-Zionist American ambassador in Tel Aviv was not their idea of the ideal situation.

Q: It still isn't. Just recently our ambassador to Israel was actually an Australian citizen who had also been a lobbyist for the Israeli government. Then he was naturalized as an American citizen and is now the Assistant Secretary in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs.

NEWBERRY: Well, you said it, Stu. I didn't, but I'm not disputing any of the irony in your remark.

Q: This is a very "dubious" situation, to say the least.

NEWBERRY: I think that, as an aside, that applies to sending, how should I say it, "hyphenated" Americans as ambassador to any country where they are closely associated with either the culture or the politics of the country in which they are supposed to represent the United States.

Q: I know that recently we had a Greek-American ambassador to Greece. I heard that his views on Greek-American relations were completely discounted in Washington, because his reporting was so "biased."

NEWBERRY: There's another side to such a situation, too. I am talking now, not so much of the ambassador, but of American Jews who may be assigned to the embassy in Tel Aviv. When I was in Jerusalem and then, briefly and for several months at the embassy in Tel Aviv, the labor attaché at the American embassy was a very sharp guy. His name was Milton Fried. He was the only identifiable, Jewish-American officer in the American embassy.

The reason he was chosen for the position of Labor Attaché, and he told me this himself, was that he was the son-in-law of Sidney Hillsman, a very prominent American labor leader. However, he said privately to me: "This is not a place for an American Jew to be assigned. All of the Israelis think that, because I'm a Jew, they can 'use me.' In fact, I'm an American, and I resent this attitude." Those were pretty much his words. It's awkward to be in such a situation.

Q: We've run across this in a number of countries. Well, during the time that you were in Jerusalem, were there any incidents or events which particularly come to your mind which you or the consulate general had to deal with?

NEWBERRY: I can tell you of some "colorful things" that I had to deal with.

Q: Let's hear them.

NEWBERRY: In the Table of Organization of the consulate general in Jerusalem, I was called the "citizenship officer." We did not issue visas, thank God. I think that most Foreign Service officers who haven't done visa work consider themselves very lucky not to have had that kind of assignment. I have great respect for visa officers, and some of my best friends are visa officers, and all of that. However, I consider that my assignment to the consulate general in Jerusalem was very interesting, and I learned a lot about consular work, but very little about visas.

Let me get on to citizenship matters. This had a particular angle because I was assigned to Jerusalem. In 1949 one of the things that the citizenship officer in Jerusalem had to do was to keep track of all of the American veterans in our consular district who were entitled to receive benefits under the "GI Bill" [legislation enacted in 1945 to help veterans attend college or other training courses]. There were lots of veterans in Jerusalem at the time, and they all wanted their checks delivered on time. I had to make sure, if they were attending Hebrew University, for example, that they received their money on time. This involved a big, administrative problem.

There were other aspects of this citizenship job. There were many naturalized American citizens in the Jerusalem consular district who were probably very close to the "point" of automatically expatriating themselves. Under the Nationality Act of 1949, a naturalized, American citizen could not remain overseas indefinitely. So I found myself having to prepare certificates of expatriation for American citizens. When I learned the job, I anticipated this situation and I would call them in and tell them that if they didn't go back to the U.S., they would lose their American nationality.

Most of these people didn't speak any English. They spoke Yiddish. So there I was with my college German. I spoke German to them, and they would answer in Yiddish. So that's the way we communicated.

I think that most people who are acquainted with that part of the world are aware of those extreme, Orthodox Jews who have been sort of caricatures. These Jews, many of them from Poland, wore big, black hats, had side curls in their hair, and big, black gabardine coats. There was a community of these Orthodox Jews in a certain quarter of Jerusalem who were American citizens. I had them as "customers," too.

Of course, I didn't have any political objection to them, but I had to keep on good terms with them. First of all, because they were American citizens and, secondly, because we had to pass through their community, even on the Sabbath, to get to the Mandlebaum Gate. Several times I had stones thrown at me in this area, the Mea Sharim quarter of Jerusalem, because they considered that I was "desecrating" the Sabbath. In fact, I was like a postman, doing my appointed rounds, but they didn't like it when I passed through their quarter on the Sabbath.

What I'm leading up to is that these people were a very important, colorful, and even "pungent" part of my recollection of Jerusalem. These people took their ritual baths before they came in to meet me, but they never washed their clothes! You can imagine, in a warm climate like that of Jerusalem, what they smelled like when they came into my office! I'm not kidding you. I reached the point where I would have to stand by the window and keep them all the way across the room, just to be able to talk to them. It was that bad! Sorry to go into this aspect in such detail, but if you want to talk about "color," that's one of the more "colorful" sides of doing citizenship work in Jerusalem!

Then, over on the Jordan side of the consular district, I had more "colorful" experiences. Of course, when I first got to Jerusalem, we didn't have any sort of office over on the Jordan, or Arab, side of the city, because, as it turned out, the office building of the consulate general was on Ramallah Road in the "New City" of Jerusalem.

As it turned out, we were eventually able to use a couple of rooms in the building housing the American School of Oriental Research in the Old City of Jerusalem. The citizenship officer (that is, me) held office hours there, one day a week. Anybody who had claims to Social Security checks or who needed to register the birth of one of their children who had claims to being American citizens (for many Arabs were American citizens), could meet with the citizenship officer at the American School of Oriental Research.

On another day in the week I went up to Ramallah, which was perhaps half an hour's drive from Jerusalem. I had office hours at the Quaker School in Ramallah one morning a week for Arab Americans who came in to discuss citizenship problems. I can give you an example. It is curious to note that some of these people were actually shepherds. Their parents, or some of the older members of this community, somehow had gotten jobs in war industries in the U.S. during World War II. They stayed on in the U.S. long enough to acquire rights to a Social Security pension. Then they came back to Palestine and were re-absorbed into their own culture. When their children were born, they may or may not have been eligible to be registered as American citizens. So I really had to know U.S. citizenship law, inside and out. Otherwise, I would have been "zapped" [disavowed] by the Passport Office back in Washington.

Q: Did you get into any difficulties with Jordanian or Israeli authorities as you went along your appointed rounds? I mean, after you got over the initial problems you had with the Jordanians.

NEWBERRY: Not really. I can't recall that either side treated me discourteously, once they understood what I was doing. My greatest fear was that, because of the sort of "front line" atmosphere, I might wind up taking the wrong road. I remember once on a beautiful, spring day some friends of mine and I went out with a picnic basket. We took the wrong road and wound up in the middle of "No Man's Land." We tried to sneak back as quietly as we could, because in that atmosphere any frontier guard might have just shot us, if he'd seen us out there. My main concern was inadvertently making the "wrong move." As far as courtesy or discourtesy, helpfulness or unhelpfulness, I never encountered any of that. Granted, I was doing things which were politically pretty much "neutral." If you asked my superiors for their views, such as the consul general, if he were still alive, you might get an entirely different answer.

Q: Who was the consul general?

NEWBERRY: The first one was Raleigh Gibson. He had not yet arrived, and Bill Burdett was acting consul general. Gibson had been consul general in Salonika, Greece. I remember his telling stories about the famous "Wood and Pulp Case." I think that he was consul general in Salonika at that time. He finished his tour of duty as consul general in Jerusalem. Younger officers who don't know their way around Washington and don't have a "network" of friends and supporters back in Washington may have trouble finding out what's going on. After Gibson left Jerusalem, we had another long period of time when there was no consul general assigned. Roger Tyler then became acting consul general and served in that capacity for quite a long time. He replaced Bill Burdett. We didn't have Raleigh Gibson's successor as consul general until I had left Jerusalem.

I was out in Jerusalem for two and one-half years. We had a fully accredited consul general there for a little less than a year during that period of time.

Q: You mentioned that the officers in the consulate general in Jerusalem were basically "anti-Israeli." What would you say was the root cause of this attitude?

NEWBERRY: I mentioned their association with the UN people, and there were still a lot of British officials around. The British in Jerusalem had particularly bitter memories of what the Haganah [Jewish Agency] and what the Irgun Zvai Leumi [IZL] did to the British troops in Jerusalem. My colleagues in the consulate general, who had been in Jerusalem longer than I, would talk about "horror stories" dating back to this period. Well, that's about the best answer that I can give.

I had so much on my mind about learning how to do my job that I can't say that I spent a lot of time analyzing the views of my own colleagues. That's just my recollection of the situation, and I can't help you much more than that.

Q: Did you have many visitors to the consulate general in Jerusalem?

NEWBERRY: Yes, in spite of everything. You asked for color. I'll give you some color. I was assigned to make all of the arrangements for official Americans crossing through the Mandlebaum Gate, both from Israel to Jordan and from Jordan to Israel. I think that this particular incident happened during the second Christmas time that I spent in Jerusalem.

A strange, shall I say, "coincidence," or whatever the word is, occurred. Former Governor of Minnesota Harold Stassen, a famous name in American politics of that era, came to visit Jerusalem. I've forgotten what his position was at that time, but he was a perennial [and unsuccessful] Republican candidate for President. I can't recall precisely when this happened. Maybe he was still Governor of Minnesota. Anyway, we learned that he was coming to Jerusalem by way of Tel Aviv. I was asked to arrange for him to go across into Jordan through the Mandlebaum Gate at night. He wanted to go to Bethlehem to attend a Christmas Eve ceremony of some kind.

Meanwhile, we got word that old Senator Theodore Green (Democrat, Rhode Island) was coming to Jerusalem for a visit. However, Senator Green was coming to Jerusalem by way of Jordan. Senator Green was just about as durable in his own way as Senator Strom Thurmond (Democrat and later Republican, South Carolina). They both wanted to go to the Christmas Eve celebration, including Midnight Mass, in Bethlehem. So the consul general arranged to get over there, at the Mandlebaum Gate, and meet the car that brought Senator Green from Amman, Jordan. They were waiting in the car on the eastern side of Mandlebaum Gate at about 11:00 PM on Christmas Eve. I was coming from Israel and making my way to Mandlebaum Gate with Governor Stassen. We got over in the car, a large car. So I got Governor Stassen, the consul general, and Senator Green into this large car. However, I had the impression that Senator Green wouldn't speak to me!

What I discovered as we moved along was that this was one of the "tricks" of old Senator Green.

He could fall asleep with his eyes open! In fact, he used to do that on the floor of the Senate in Washington. So that was why he apparently wouldn't speak to me. He was asleep!

Q: This is the second interview done with Daniel O. Newberry. This is in 1997. I guess that we are just about the end of your tour in Jerusalem. One thing you might discuss. Did you feel, in Jerusalem, the "heavy hand" of the pro-Israeli press and politics in the United States? Or did this really come later?

NEWBERRY: Stu, my impression was that the pro-Israeli press had already won, hands down. There was no contest, from our perspective. There wasn't any pro-Arab press in the U.S., from our perspective. All of the American news media, including radio and what there was of television [TV] at the time, were pro-Israel. At least, that is the impression that we had out there.

Q: Was there any concern on our part about the Arabs who, for one reason or another, had been forced out of their traditional homes in Greater Palestine, which is now part of Israel, as refugees? Were we reporting or thinking about that at all?

NEWBERRY: We were reporting on it, insofar as the small staff at the American consulate general had the leisure to report these things. The embassy in Tel Aviv was not particularly interested in that aspect of the subject. The legation in Amman did some reporting because they had huge camps of Palestinian refugees on the East bank of the Jordan River.

Yes, we were concerned about this. We were talking previously about the "well springs" of anti-Israel feeling. I could see this with my own eyes. This is a technique that the Israelis still use. You create refugees when you want to, quite simply by bulldozing their houses. That is still a standard technique.

When I first went to Jaffa, which is a suburb of Tel Aviv, it looked like one of these old European cities destroyed during World War II. Jaffa, as a city, goes back to the time of the Crusades and before that, even to Biblical times. Jaffa looked like one of these old, European cities which were absolutely devastated during World War II. I asked people: "Where was all of the fighting? Nobody said anything about pitched battles here." I was told: "Oh, no, the Israelis demolished the town after the fighting was over." The Israelis had just about flattened the entire, old city of Jaffa, just to make sure that the Arabs didn't have any place to come back to. That is just an example of their attitudes.

Q: When you came back to Jaffa, did this type of thing cause feelings of revulsion among your colleagues, and maybe you? At this point the American public was sort of cheering for the "plucky Jews" to beat back the Arabs and all of that.

NEWBERRY: People tended to speak of "brave, little Israel." However, Stu, I have to say that in the "culture" of the Foreign Service in those days nobody was particularly interested in "debriefing" junior officers freshly back from their posts.

Q: They still don't. They don't "debrief" the senior officers, either. The closest thing we have to debriefing is the process that's going on here, 50 years after the fact.

NEWBERRY: Anyway, inexperienced officers like me were wondering what was going to happen to them next. I have no memory or any impression of anybody wanting to "pick my brains."

However, when I got to Atlanta for home leave, somehow "the word" got around that a local, home town boy had returned from being a vice consul in Jerusalem. The Hadassah Business Women's Club [Jewish community group] invited me to be a speaker at one of their meetings. I wondered how many businesswomen there were in Atlanta, and Jewish businesswomen at that. Atlanta was still not a very big city in 1949. This program was held at a Jewish country club in Atlanta. I was graciously received and then taken into the room where I was going to make my little speech. There were about 800 women in the room! They all wanted to hear everything that they could possibly hear about Jerusalem.

I would have to contrast this reception with the attitude of officers in the State Department toward one of their professional colleagues in talking about his experiences in Jerusalem. They might even have learned something from my talk! These Jewish businesswomen in Atlanta wanted to get everything out of me that they could. They were a very good, sharp audience.

Q: You were there in Jerusalem from 1949 until when?

NEWBERRY: From the first part of May, 1949, until some time in October, 1951. As I said before, during the last few months of that period I was on temporary duty at the embassy in Tel Aviv, although still technically assigned to Jerusalem.

Q: Let's talk a little about your reaction to being in Tel Aviv. I am speaking now of the atmosphere in our embassy there, as opposed to the consulate general in Jerusalem. Was there a difference in how things were regarded and dealt with there?

NEWBERRY: There was a definite difference in the atmosphere, because the people in our embassy in Tel Aviv had no contact, to speak of, with Arabs at all. That led to a built-in difference in outlook. It was a "different window on the world."

Of course, I had never been in an embassy before. I didn't even know how to work in an embassy. I was assigned to temporary duty in the Economic Section of the embassy. I had a certain set of subjects that I worked on. Talk about "color"? I'll give you another bit of "color." In those days we had "despatches," as you may remember. This was the only time that I ever wrote a despatch. The State Department was very proud of spelling the word "despatch" with an "e," rather than with an "i."

One of the things that I got interested in, and this was one of the ironies of the Foreign Service, was the "vanity" of my superiors. They wanted their sections to be fully staffed and to show that they were "overworked." In fact, the embassy was not "overstaffed." Nevertheless, they insisted on getting this young officer, me, who had been assigned to Jerusalem, moved up to the embassy.

There really wasn't enough work for me to do. There wasn't enough office space, either. There were four officers in a room half as big as this room. You know the dimensions of it. It was like the "City Room" of an old newspaper. We almost literally had to "climb over" each other to get in and out of the office. However, there I was in the embassy, even though I wasn't really "needed."

I thought of subjects to write reports on. I decided to write a report on the Israeli fishing industry. It was very poorly developed in those days. I realized that one of the keys to the fishing industry was the dietary laws and the "Kosher" rules about what kind of fish could be eaten. That is, whether the fish were scaled or unscaled, skinned or unskinned, and so forth. I had a Biblical quotation at the beginning of my despatch. In my experience this was the only time that I dared start off a despatch to the Department of State, quoting the Bible. This may still be rare.

However, I had a lot of fun and learned a lot about why the Israelis, at that point, hadn't done anything with their fishing industry. This despatch had to do with that. In Turkey, in the olden times, it had been the Greeks who did all of the fishing. The Turks had to learn how to catch fish, and the Israelis also had to learn how to be fishermen.

HARRY FLEISCHMAN
Jewish Labor Committee

Mr. Fleishman was active in labor organization, Jewish and Socialist Party affairs in his earlier years, serving as Campaign Manager for Socialist Candidate Norman Thomas in his campaigns for President in 1944 and 1948. Joining the Voice of America in 1950, he reported on international Labor Affairs and current anti-communist topics for foreign audience consumption. Throughout his career, Mr. Fleishman served with US organizations furthering Labor and Anti-Communist objectives. Mr. Fleishman was interviewed by Morris Weisz in 1992

Q: Harry, please describe the Jewish Labor Committee and your relationship to trade unions?

FLEISCHMAN: Right. Well, the Jewish Labor Committee was an organization set up initially by the needle-trades unions and the Jewish led part of the American labor movement in the early 1930s to help in the fight against the Nazis and, when the war came, also against the Fascists in Italy and against Japan. It helped bring more and more workers to support these struggles and also to press for specifically Jewish issues, like the fight against discrimination against Jews in employment, in school quotas, and in all sorts of areas. It had the attitude, which is one that I have always had too, that to support the rights of the Jews in the United States, you had to support all minorities and to work for social justice on every front. So it was natural that I should be working with them, but they didn't have any [permanent] job available at that time. I also wrote a pamphlet of questions and answers about Communism for the Anti-Defamation League (ADL), which was another Jewish agency that worked on discrimination.

Then there were questions about getting a job with some government agency, and I remember that at that time one of the people that I contacted was you, Murray, who had certain ideas about jobs that might be possible including one, if I recall correctly, with the CIA, because you felt that there were some people in the CIA who were very soft on Communism, and that it might be useful for me to be there. Well, I did go to see. . .

EDWARD WARREN HOLMES
Consular/Political Officer
Tel Aviv (1950-1952)

Edward Warren Holmes was born in Beverly, Massachusetts in 1923. He received a bachelor's degree from Brown University in 1945 and a master's degree in international law from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy in 1946. Mr. Holmes joined the Foreign Service in 1946. He served in Nicaragua, Venezuela, Israel, South Africa, Ethiopia, Malawi, Ghana, and Washington, DC. Mr. Holmes was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1993.

Q: What was the situation when you arrived in Tel Aviv? Give a little feel for how you saw the situation in Israel. In the first place, we recognized Israel in 1948, didn't we?

HOLMES: Yes, we were the first country in the world to recognize the new state. When we went there in '50, the embassy had been there for about a year. We had to change ships, of course, in Milan, and got a small ship that sailed down to Tel Aviv. And the first thing we did was have to pass the baby, in a basket, over the side, lower it down into a boat, because Tel Aviv was not a real port; it was only used by lighters. So the baby went down, and then we went down the side on a rope ladder sort of thing, down into this lighter, with a few suitcases, and they took us into Tel Aviv. That was our introduction.

Q: Oh, boy.

HOLMES: Well, it was a very exciting situation. Israel was still at war with its neighbors. Of course, it still is, even today, technically. But it actively was, then. There were blackouts every night. There were sandbags around all the entrances to buildings, public buildings and apartment houses. And so, if you went to a party at night, you went in the pitch black, and you'd feel your way around the sandbags to find the door and then get in. It was total blackout until you'd get to someone's apartment, and then there would be lights there, the windows all sealed. So we lived in sort of blackout conditions, which was very exciting, in a way. Now there were no air raids, there was nothing of that sort. But the Israeli government, of course, was not at all certain there wouldn't be. With good reason, because it had been a very tough war of independence, and their independence was precarious. So the blackout was rigidly enforced. When we would drive at night, we had little slits in the headlights, just tiny, tiny little slits, the absolute minimum of light. So that was sort of exciting after South America, very, very different...

But it was a very exciting time. The people of Israel were extremely friendly. The people that we dealt with in the Foreign Office were extremely well-educated, highly intelligent, proficient people to deal with. I mean, these were refugees from Germany, Poland, Hungary, or wherever, who had come to the new state. They were the elite, obviously, the intellectual elite who were in the Foreign Office. That was under Ben-Gurion, who was the prime minister. Moshe Sharett was the foreign minister, who spoke seven languages and at a reception could flip from one language to another just effortlessly in the receiving line. I was always impressed that he would jump from German to Hungarian to, of course, Hebrew, to French to English. A brilliant, brilliant man. So the quality of the government was incredibly high, and I was struck by that, I must say. Not drawing any invidious comparisons, but it was a type of brilliance that you rarely see in a government, all the way down through the Foreign Office, even to the more junior people. So that was interesting, and the whole situation was interesting.

While we were there, we traveled all over the country, with the assistance of the government. We had to go in convoys to the outlying areas; it was not wise to go on your own. We went to the Hula swamps up north that they were draining in those days, Stu, for agricultural purposes. They were channeling it into the Jordan River, draining the swamps. That was a big project. Took us all the way down through the Negev to the south. We'd drive cheek by jowl with Arab troops with machine guns, right along the border. It's a very narrow border, and the road goes right along the border.

We could get to Jerusalem once a month, the old city of Jerusalem. Jerusalem was a divided city, with barbed wire right down through the city. We could get to the other side through arrangements with our consulate general in Jerusalem. That is, they had to get permission from the Jordan government, and they would give us a certain time to cross the border, like a Friday afternoon. That was the typical time; you could go for a weekend. Then we would drive up through no-man's-land in Jerusalem. There was a little opening in the barbed wire, through this no-man's-land, which we were warned was heavily mined on both sides. So we'd stick to just the track. We'd drive along there and as we approached, the Arab Legion, which was the Jordan army, would have machine guns trained on us all the time as we went along through no-man's-land. Then we'd get to their post, where they often spoke no English. They would have a list of border passings for that particular time frame, and it was all in Arabic. So the Arab officer would look at this list, and we would present our passports, and if he could find something in Arabic that sort of corresponded to Holmes, he'd let us through. If he couldn't, you couldn't get through. There was no way if your name was not on the list. That was the list that was arranged through, as I say, the Jordan Foreign Office, which would send it to the military people and so forth. So, once a month, we did try to get over, basically to buy food. We had the one baby, and food was extraordinarily scarce in Israel; there was very strict rationing. Sometimes a half a can of peas, for instance, would be a ration. You'd go and you'd bring a jar with you, and they'd pour half a can of peas and take your little ration ticket. So it was very rational, and they were spreading out the food they did have to feed the population. But it was hard, with a new child, to get the types of food that we particularly wanted. And so, once a month, we'd go over and load up with food. We could bring food back; neither side cared if we did that. They would inspect it. We would buy for lots of other people, always, lots of meat and vegetables and milk and just everything, and bring it back.

Q: What was your job in Tel Aviv?

HOLMES: I was supposed to be in the Political Section, but when I got there, though, there was a need for me to be in the consulate. So I was in charge of the consulate, which was very, very busy.

Q: I'm sure it was.

HOLMES: Those were the days of American citizens who had been over fighting for the new State of Israel during the independence war and now wanted to go home, and the question was, had they lost their citizenship? Our citizenship laws were quite strict: if you enrolled in a foreign army and took an oath of allegiance, you jeopardized your American citizenship. So we had lots of those cases that were handed to me, I remember, to deal with. There were all sorts of things, but the big problem there was American citizens of Jewish faith and the question of their citizenship. A lot had come over to help the new State of Israel, and a lot had voted in the first election. Now voting in those days was enough to make you lose citizenship. Well, not exactly, it was sort of a grey area.

Q: Well, it was very complicated.

HOLMES: It was complicated.

Q: But essentially voting, service in a foreign military, and an oath of allegiance all could jeopardize your citizenship. And we enforced it in those days.

HOLMES: We did enforce it. We tried to enforce it. But I used to have lawyers argue with me the fine points of American law and decisions, and already the law was beginning to change a little bit. It's changed a lot since then, I believe, but in those days, we were told by the State Department to enforce the law, basically. But then the question was: did a young man take the oath of allegiance? Because the State of Israel permitted people to be in the army without an oath of allegiance, knowing our immigration law. So the question was: did he or didn't he take an oath of allegiance? Well, that's rather hard to prove. There were certain lists available. So my time essentially was taken up with the whole question of American citizenship problems. I don't think I did much with visas at all; I think there was some other officer that handled visas. So it was sort of interesting.

Q: Well, I'm sure. Speaking as a veteran consular officer, I can imagine what you must have been up against. Later it became very powerful, but did you find there was what one could call a Jewish lobby in Congress that was giving you a great deal of trouble on taking away citizenship from these freedom fighters or whatever you want to call them?

HOLMES: Yes, indeed. Yes, indeed. There was a very powerful lobby in Washington, and it affected us in many, many ways.

Ambassador McDonald, you may know, was not very au courant with the State Department. His line of command was President Truman. And he would pick up the phone, frequently, and talk to President Truman whenever he wanted certain instructions. And within a few hours, we'd get the instructions that he wanted, which he had arranged with President Truman. He had that close in. In those days, the State Department was torn on the whole Israeli policy. There were many who said we shouldn't have recognized the new state; we did it prematurely, allegedly, by certain elements within the State Department. It was alleged that the Middle East Division was pro-Arab, anti-Jewish. So it was a very interesting political problem. As I say, Ambassador McDonald was a very able person, and he utilized his friendship with President Truman very much and, in a sense, would circumvent the State Department if he felt that it was important. He was very desirous to help the new State of Israel progress in as many ways as possible, with our AID program (it wasn't called AID in those days; Point Four, I think it was called) and different things to assist the new state get its feet on the ground and develop. He was very interested in Israel as a functioning entity, a new state, and did everything he could to help the new state develop.

Q: Well, now, give a little of the spirit of the officers. All right, you have this well-connected ambassador, McDonald.

HOLMES: A political appointee.

Q: A political appointee, who was extremely pro-Israel. You have the Department of State, which was very dubious.

HOLMES: It was mixed.

Q: Mixed, but essentially a very practical, pragmatic approach was, you've got a lot of Arab countries, and you've got one small country that's going to be a thorn in the side. And now, forty-odd years later, it's still a thorn in the side and causing all sorts of trouble.

HOLMES: And you had a president who was pro-Israel.

Q: A president who was way ahead of his Department of State on this. Now here you are, an officer coming in with no particular commitment one way or another -- you're not an Arabist, you're not of the Jewish faith, you've come out of Latin America. I think it's important to get a feel. How did you feel, as an officer there? Israel was a dynamic place. Did you get caught up in this? And not just you, but the others around you. And did you feel that maybe your colleagues in Egypt or in Jordan or in Syria were almost kind of the enemy? What was your feeling when you got into that situation?

HOLMES: I think you summarized it very well. First of all, the ambassador, McDonald, made it very clear that if people didn't agree with his mission, they might as well leave.

Q: It was really a mission in those days.

HOLMES: In his view, it was a mission, in that he was placed there by the president to carry out certain functions. In his view, it was to help Israel, okay? In those days, we had no military assistance or anything like that, but it was to assist the new state. That was his mission and his function, and he made it clear that's what he expected his staff to do. Once again, it was a small embassy, quite small. It was a new embassy, and there were very, very difficult living conditions. We lived in a beauty parlor, I remember that, amongst all the dryers and blowers and things. That's where we lived because we couldn't find anyplace else at first. We lived there six months, in a beauty parlor, with a new baby, in amongst all this machinery.

Q: What had happened to the owner?

HOLMES: The lady was a Hungarian, and she had gone back to Hungary for a while, for a long holiday. We were extremely fortunate, because up to then, we had to live with members of the staff in their homes until we found this thing. So that's where we lived; it was tough living. But I think the morale was high in the embassy. I think people absorbed this mission idea. It was an exciting place.

Q: Oh, of course it was.

HOLMES: The Israelis were doing all sorts of things. I mentioned the draining of the Hula swamps. Well, that was a tremendous project, but it was progressing. And they were doing all sorts of forestation work, and they were putting in irrigation, and they were having tremendous groves of trees; agricultural development was happening. You know, they didn't just talk about it, they did it.

Q: This was a natural affinity to the American can-do feeling.

HOLMES: Yes. They were dedicated people, and they were brilliant people, working hard. And, of course, they had all the kibbutzim movement, which we used to be invited to visit and see. The spirit was tremendous amongst the Israeli people, and I think the embassy absorbed that spirit. As I say, if somebody was anti, then I think he would not stay. I mean, I think the ambassador would suggest that perhaps he should move on.

In a sense, the ambassador was fighting about five other ambassadors in the surrounding countries. But he was an able fighter, and he wrote very well, and the backing of Mr. Truman in the White House sort of helped his hand. But it was a constant battle, in a sense, because some of the other nearby embassies didn't care much for Israel, and they would see it from their viewpoint.

There were frequent border incidents, the usual things, stealing sheep across the border, and incidents at night where there would be some firing on the border, and who fired the first shot? God, you know.

We were trying to assist Israel by bringing peace with Jordan, and we were dealing with Abdullah, the king of Jordan. We did manage to have negotiations take place, secretly, across the border in Israel and in Jordan, by emissaries of Ben-Gurion and the king. I don't think they ever met, themselves, but their emissaries did. We were knee-deep in this, and this was a major desire of U.S. foreign policy, to bring peace with one of the countries. The feeling was that if they could get it with one country, then maybe you would start the process with other Arab countries, to bring peace. This was building up to a very hopeful point, when Abdullah was assassinated, which ended that possibility for the time being.

But that is what Ambassador McDonald was involved in...I shouldn't say full time, but a large portion of his time was involved in it. He personally with Ben-Gurion, and our ambassador on the other side, trying to do this. So I don't think people would fight that sort of thing; both sides were agreeable. That is, our embassy in Amman. I think we were both trying to get this to happen. That is, we weren't dictating the terms, but we hoped that if they would negotiate, maybe they could draw a border and establish relationships.

It made enormous sense from all sides, if they could get over the war period and have a period of cooperation. Israel had, as I mentioned, brains and ability for development, and they could help the other side very much. And they needed food; they would buy the produce of Jordan. So, economically it made a lot of sense. And then the Jordan River could have been used both intelligently and in a very good way, by both sides, in irrigation schemes. Elaborate schemes were developed by us and consultants and so forth, with the idea of helping both sides. It didn't happen; Abdullah was assassinated. I think it was Abdullah.

Q: It was Abdullah. He was the grandfather of King Hussein. I think the crown prince was not right mentally or something like that.

HOLMES: Yes, they were gradually coming to the point where they might have achieved a peace agreement. The entire time I was there, that was our number-one objective.

Q: Were you in the Consular Section all the time there?

HOLMES: No, just at first. Once again there was that situation where there was a sudden need for me in the Consular Section. And so, when somebody else arrived, in x months, then I moved over to the Political Section. That's what I was slated to do originally.

Q: Because it was a small embassy, can you remember who the DCM and who the chief of the Political Section were?

HOLMES: [chuckle]

Q: Well, we can fill this in.

HOLMES: I remember Milton Freen was the labor attaché. He was very, very active in the Political Section. It was of course the Labor government there, his side was government, and he was a very able labor attaché. He was the son-in-law of a very prominent American labor leader. When I was in the Political Section, he and I worked very, very closely together; he was labor attaché, I was political officer. I was the only political officer.

Q: How did you deal with the Israeli government? What did you do in order to report?

HOLMES: Well, all the usual functions.

Q: But remember, I'm looking for somebody who is not familiar with how it works. What are the usual things that you do?

HOLMES: Well, a lot of dealings with the Foreign Office on whatever, all the minutiae, let's say, of relationships. Now there we had a lot of visitors. The ambassador told me he wanted visitors to be handled properly, and, as the political officer, my function was to be sort of in charge of visitors. And by visitors, I mean congressmen, prominent businessmen, journalists, a lot of political people. A lot of senators and congressmen come to Israel in great numbers, or they did in those days.

Q: They still do.

HOLMES: Still do, I'm sure. So I had to do a lot of the arranging of their schedules. And this took a lot of liaison with the Foreign Office, to be sure. And the Foreign Office was very good about it; they wanted these people to have a good view of Israel. And so this meant arranging for transportation, programs, visitations, where to go and when and so forth. These visitors wanted to see the kibbutzim; they wanted to see the countryside; they wanted to see this, that, and the other thing. And Israel was keen for them to do it. But we were operating under difficult conditions. They couldn't go some places because it was unsafe, so they would have to go with convoys. That meant liaison with the army to arrange protection for them. So that took a lot of time, as well as reporting.

Now we didn't have any threat of coups, as in Latin America, none of that sort of thing, but there were opposition parties. There was the Herut Party, which subsequently has become the government, but in those days was the opposition. It was headed by a well-known terrorist who had been involved in the King David situation, Menachem Begin. He was a member of parliament.

Q: How did you view him, as somebody sort of basically... You just put both of your thumbs down. He was sort of a scary figure, wasn't he?

HOLMES: Well, he was a well-known terrorist, there was just no doubt about it, and he was an extremist, whose speeches were...

Q: And Shamir had been involved with an assassination.

HOLMES: Shamir, oh yeah. But I don't remember Shamir, I remember Begin. Begin was the head of the Herut Party.

Q: Later became the Likud Party.

HOLMES: Yes, Likud is an umbrella organization, I believe, Herut and some others.

Q: But basically Begin was the...

HOLMES: He was the powerhouse. He was a brilliant guy. I did meet him, and he was very impressive, in a sense. I mean, mentally he was a very powerful guy. Of course, he was a young man in those days. One never thought he would ever become prime minister, I don't think, in those days. It didn't seem possible. The Labor government was well ensconced, well run, and it had all sorts of, of course, connections with the Histadrut, which is the federation of the labor organizations.

But we reported on all these things, the currents of the opposition party, debates in parliament, the politics of the country, which were very interesting and very intricate; they were not easy. You had the religious parties, which were allied with Ben-Gurion. Ben-Gurion was Labor, but if he got a certain number of votes, he was allied with the ultra-religious parties. And they had their own agenda. So we very much had to report on what their agenda was, their outlook. It was a very busy political time.

Q: I'm sure it was. Did you feel any constraints, which came later, maybe, that whatever you reported would immediately end up on the desks of either the Jewish lobby or the senators from New York or California who had large Jewish constituencies? This later became quite a problem. I was wondering if it was at that time?

HOLMES: I don't recall such constraints. A lot of it was setting the framework of a new government. It was a new country, so the State Department wanted information and information galore.

Q: You were just scooping up information.

HOLMES: Yes. What is the Teachers' Union, for instance, and how does it fit into the picture? Sometimes there were little strikes of different groups, so how does that fit? Why were they striking? The doctors went on strike at one point. Why? What is their political influence? Each group had influence, in a way. I never could do enough reporting; I always felt there was more I would like to do.

Q: It sounds like a young political officer's dream. Here you were, in a new nation which was obviously on the front burner as far as American foreign policy. You were in on the ground floor.

HOLMES: It was very exciting. It was an exciting time to be there. There was an enormous amount of enthusiasm in the country, and idealism. For the first time in hundreds and hundreds of years, the Israelis had their own state, and they were excited about it. A lot of the people we met were out of concentration camps, escapees from the horrors of the holocaust. They had lost their whole family, many of them, and they were the only surviving member. But they were there in Israel, and they were totally dedicated to helping develop this new state. Tremendous idealism and enthusiasm.

Q: When you went over to Jerusalem, did you talk to our officers at our consulate general?

HOLMES: Not really. No, I didn't go over in a political mission at all. It was a food mission, plus tourism. We saw all the holy places, which was wonderful to be able to visit and to walk through the streets of Jerusalem, with no automobiles, you just walk through, as well as buying a few rugs and being a tourist, basically. Well, I met some of our people over there; they would invite us sometimes. But it was a constant flow. They knew we came over to shop, basically, and to be a tourist.

Q: How did your wife find this? I can understand her traumatic arrival and having to live with the hair dryers and all that. How did this work out?

HOLMES: Well, it was tough. It was tough, particularly with a young child and the lack of food. I remember we had cases of baby food under the bed. We finally found a small apartment and managed, one way or another, frankly, by paying in U.S. dollars, the only way we could possibly get it, which was illegal under our regulations at the time. There was just no other way. There was no other way. We got an apartment, which was very hard to get; housing was just incredible. So we moved out of the beauty parlor into an apartment, and that was nice. Well, it was one bedroom, but we felt ourselves fortunate, because it was on the ground floor and had a nice terrace, so the baby, a boy, could be out on the terrace, which was fine. It was right on a busy street, but the terrace had grillwork, so the baby could be out there and sort of watch the passersby, who would speak to him. The Israelis love children. So we felt, you know, this was wonderful. But it was tough, the whole thing of buying food three months in advance.

And then, too, it was just an awfully embarrassing thing that we would have food for the children, and the other people in the apartment, whom my wife got to know, didn't have food. We were told we can't possibly share it. Well, we did share it a bit, because sometimes a woman would come down, weeping, and just say, "I have nothing to feed Yanni," who was the little boy who played with our little boy, you know, just little toddlers. And so, obviously... Under our bed were just cases of stuff, so we would share it to some extent, when we weren't supposed to. There were lots of things you weren't supposed to do, but frankly, I think the ambassador said, "You've got to live here."

Q: We've all gone through that.

HOLMES: We'd get paid in dollars, and through a New York bank account, we'd send a check or something. What the heck. I mean, I don't think it was too illegal. But we felt it because the ambassador would say, "These are the regulations." On the other hand, he tended to look a little bit the other way -- he didn't ask. In those days, the embassy didn't help get a place. You found your own place; you went out and knocked on doors to find someplace to live. The apartment we found was owned by a prominent actor in the Hadassah Theater there (I think it was called Hadassah). He was going to live in it himself, but he liked the idea of some dollars that would permit him, then, to visit the U.S. and so forth, which he wanted to do, so we got the apartment.

Q: Did you have any dealings with any of the people who were in the leadership, particularly of the Labor Party?

HOLMES: Oh, yes.

Q: What was your impression of them?

HOLMES: Just the same as the government: outstanding people, devoted, able. The whole labor system is extremely interesting. It was a labor government, after all, and the labor unions controlled an awful lot of companies; the construction companies and so forth were owned by the labor union. It was fascinating, just to learn this. Once again, there was this voracious appetite back in Washington for reporting on what things are; they wanted information on this brand new state.

Q: There weren't really real policy divisions from a...

HOLMES: Oh, there were, there were battles. There was a leftist Mapam Party, which was to the left of Mapai. Mapai was the government. They were both labor, but there was a split in the labor movement. They were more leftist than what we would call middle-of-the-road. Socialist, but the others were more left. They weren't Communist, but they were more left wing.

So it was reporting on all these things, on all these currents, and then the defections. One would defect from that group to this group. There were maneuvers. It was a fascinating political scene, more than I could ever report. I just felt I had to report some of the highlights, but there were so many things I'd have liked to report more.

Q: Did the American labor movement, the AFL/CIO, intrude much into what was going on, sort of getting involved on one side or the other?

HOLMES: They were very, very close to the Histadrut, the Mapai Party. Each of the parties had its own cohorts in the United States, its own supporting elements and groups. For instance, the extreme religious parties had strong religious groups back here, fundamentalists, I guess you might call them, Jewish groups. So each had its supporters.

Basically we reported; we were not involved in any way. We dealt with the government, which was Mapai, the centrist group, Socialist. We dealt with the government, that's all. And we were right up to our necks. Busy. Busy, busy. It was a busy, busy place.

And these visitors took an enormous amount of time. The ambassador had told me, "This is just as important as anything else. Be sure that the visitors get to see what they want to see and meet the people they want to meet." He's probably right -- it was politically very important, but when a senatorial delegation came, they...

One great visitor we had was Mrs. Roosevelt. I was assigned to be her liaison officer. Of course, they loved her in the country, they knew her. We had this wonderful two-week tour of the whole country, and I went along as her aide-de-camp, you might say.

Q: Well, how did you find her?

HOLMES: Absolutely fantastic. One of the most interesting, vibrant women I've ever met in my life. I've never seen such energy -- from morning till night, energy. This meant orphanages, hospitals, schools, politicians -- all day long, this was scheduled. The Israelis had one fault: they would tend to overschedule visitors, because they wanted them to see everything, and they'd put too much in. And she was not a young lady when she came. She was at the U.N. in those days. She came with a doctor, a young man who was her doctor, and he would be flaked out in the afternoon; he was exhausted. I was exhausted; everyone was. But she would go on. Incredible energy. And vibrancy. And wonderful warmth. I think it was her first visit there, and she wanted to see everything. She kept up with the schedule, even, which meant every half hour another group, with more flowers, more speeches, more little talks. And she just carried it off brilliantly. A fascinating woman. And then, in the evening, she would talk to us about her early days with Franklin, and the polio, just as though we were longtime friends. She had incredible warmth. Outstanding woman.

That's just one visitor. We had Senator This and Senator That. Congressman Powell, I remember, came.

Q: Adam Clayton Powell.

HOLMES: That was difficult.

Q: He was very controversial. In the first place, he was a black congressman at a time when there weren't many black congressmen. And he had a reputation as being a ladies' man, very much, but at the same time he was, I suppose today you might say, in your face, or more confrontational than was considered prudent in a still-segregated United States.

HOLMES: Well, there, he wasn't confrontational. He came simply to visit, the way so many did. But he was very demanding, let's say, demanding on embassy resources, which were limited. It was a small embassy. I'm sure now it's huge by comparison. But it was small, and we just didn't have a lot of things. But he was very demanding in transportation and arrangements and so forth. I remember it was a very difficult visit.

But not the only difficult one that we had; a lot of our senators and congressmen are rather demanding overseas. If you're at a big post, it can be handled. But at a small post, it's more difficult; we don't have the resources, we don't have Scotch whiskey, necessarily.

Q: This was the beginning of the coldest period of the Cold War. The Korean War had started; NATO was being formed. Did you feel any winds coming out of Siberia? Did Communism and the Cold War intrude much then?

HOLMES: I don't think, at all. As I remember, we were totally bound up in relations between the United States and Israel. The big push was to help Israel achieve peace with its neighbor across the Jordan River. That was our focus. I don't recall the other things at all; they just didn't enter into the picture. It was a question of Israel vis-à-vis its Arab neighbors, and Israel needing development assistance, which we were giving in different ways, and wanting to help Israel develop as a new country.

Q: In the discussions that you would have, sitting around a small embassy, how about arms for Israel? Because in those days, what the Israelis were getting was mainly coming from the French, I suppose, wasn't it?

HOLMES: I don't recall that being in the picture. The war was over, in a sense, though one didn't know. After all, looking back now, we can say, well, there was no real threat. But the Israelis thought there was a real threat of renewed warfare with its neighbors. And there were incidents on the border from time to time, trucks being blown up occasionally, you know. So it was scary. They had just gone through a very difficult war of independence, with a lot of people killed, and it was touch-and-go for a while. They were fortunate enough to carve out a certain area. But I don't recall their needing more arms, or asking us for arms.

Q: So that wasn't an issue.

HOLMES: No, I think that came later on.

WILBUR P. CHASE
Principal Officer
Haifa (1951-1955)

Wilbur P. Chase was born in Washington, DC in 1919. His career with the State Department included posts in Canada, Germany, Turkey, Iraq, Israel, Philippines, and Washington, DC. Mr. Chase was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 24, 1990.

CHASE: So then my next post after Hamburg was Haifa, Israel. I had been transferred to Port Said to be principal officer there. I wrote a letter to the fellow in Port Said and said that I was going to replace him. And apparently this guy took the position that he didn't want to leave Port Said, and he protested and screamed. So, since he refused to leave, the Department then decided to find me another place to go and they offered me Haifa, and I said yes.

I was principal officer there. It handled the immigrant visa work for all of Israel. It's a port city, again. I had a staff of about four or five officers and about eighteen trained locals.

Q: What was the political situation, from your point of view, during this period, '51 to '55?

CHASE: Israel became an independent country in '48, and it was in the throes of trying to find its way in the world when I arrived in '51. There were large numbers of immigrants coming from Eastern Europe and from Europe in general. The country had very little in the way of resources. They were still trying to find their way around in how to organize themselves.

The Mapai Party was then the party. It is now the Labor Party of Peres, but it was a little bit different mix. Mapai, and its main economic instrument, Histadrut, ruled all things happening in Israel. There was this emotional zeal of: We're building a Jewish State.

There was a good bit of feeling against the Arabs. The Arabs had been dealt with pretty miserably. Sometimes you could say security was a legitimate excuse, but lots of it was just mendacious.

I was back in Israel, in 1980, I think it was, the last time, and meeting my old friends, so many of them, who had all been supporters of Mapai in the old days, have now become right-wingers, supporting Likud, Begin, Shamir, and that crowd. And there is a much tighter animosity toward the Arabs. The Israelis in general, over this continuum, I think have done wonderful things in developing a country -- in every way other than learning how to get along with their Arab neighbors.

Q: Well now, at the time, did you do any reporting, or was this pretty much left to the embassy?

CHASE: No, we did a lot of reporting.

Q: How about on the Arab-Israeli relations?

CHASE: I was the main officer for reporting on Arab affairs in Israel. I would go up to the Arab communities and talk with them about their problems, trying to find out what was happening.

I recall, in the course of events, I wrote a report which in essence was criticizing the Greek Orthodox Church. Almost immediately, the Greek consul general from Jerusalem called me up and said, Oh, would I have lunch with him? He obviously had learned what I had said in my report, and he was down there to try and protect his flock, in showing me how much they all cooperated and worked together and were doing constructive things.

The Jewish Israelis were sometimes concerned about my seeing as many Arabs as I saw. They were distrustful of the Arabs and kind of wondering what was I doing.

Q: Things, of course, have changed so much, but at that time, as far as American relations with Israel were concerned, were you getting any sort of feedback from the embassy or from the desk or something, saying: Cool it, don't get too involved with reporting on the Arabs?

CHASE: No, I was being encouraged to do it. I mean, this was in my job description. This was one of the reasons I was down there. I was petroleum reporting officer for all of Israel, and I was to maintain contact with the Arab community and report on how they were feeling. I also reported on what was going on in Haifa. The desk officer at the time said that, as for learning what the atmosphere was on the streets of Israel, he found my letters more informative than the embassy's.

Q: Who was our ambassador at that time?

CHASE: Monnett B. Davis. He was a South American ambassador. He died in Israel December 26, 1953. After his death, Francis Russell was chargé for about a year or a year and half, and then the next ambassador was Lawson, who came out of Greece.

Q: You were sort of bounced around and had no particular designation. Did you have any feel for what was the embassy attitude and the Foreign Service attitude, within the desk, the embassy, and your post, towards Israel at that time?

CHASE: Oh, I went down to the embassy staff meetings. At least once a month I was down in Tel Aviv, meeting the ambassador, the chargé, the DCM, and the other people.

Q: Would you describe it as saying that we were looking upon developments in Israel enthusiastically, or objectively, or somewhat removed, or how, within that context?

CHASE: At that time, we were not nearly as committed to Israel as we are today. We were on the way to. Everyone knew that there would have been no Israel except for the United States' support in 1948, and that Israel was looking to us for financial and economic support.

Just as I was arriving, I think it was, our first real AID mission was established. I can't remember the name of the fellow, but he came in with something like $30 billion to be spent over three years. It was one of these first large grants of money to help the Israeli economic infrastructure.

I think there were a number of things that were going along in relation to Israel that I, as consul in Haifa, was not privy to. But I was very much privy to the thrust of our program that Israel shall succeed.

Q: Were you getting any reflections, either through communications or contacts with the Foreign Service establishment that was in the Arab posts around there, about developments there, saying what the hell, I mean, you know, this isn't going to be very good for us?

CHASE: Yes, I talked to Beirut frequently. I went over to Amman. I had met Roy Atherton in Stuttgart, and then he arrived in Damascus about that time and I saw him over there.

There was quite a lot of tension in the Foreign Service per se, as to whether the United States was being too deeply committed to the Israeli side. Were we conscious of what it was costing us among the Arabs?

I would respond to that sort of argument along the lines that whether Israel should or should not have been created was no longer the question. Israel was there, and the thing that we had to do was try to make Israel as successful as we could, to provide safety, a home for the Jewish population. But we also had to promote Israel's interests among the Arab States, to develop a modus vivendi. And so, in my reporting on the Arabs, it was: What are the things that Israel is doing vis-à-vis the Arabs that are unnecessarily causing animosities and disputes and problems, that in the long run, which I think until today, are hampering Israel's real security and safety.

Q: Well now, how about dealing with Israeli authorities? Did you find this quite different from, say, dealing with what was developing in Germany or in Iraq or something? I mean, how did you find the people you dealt with in Haifa?

CHASE: There are lots of differences in each one of these countries of how they view problems and what is their method of operation. But as for me, as an American Foreign Service officer, I constantly worked on the principle of trying to be sympathetic to their problems, and saying I want to be able to tell Washington as accurately as possible how they see things and what are they trying to do. You use different words, you use a little different manner when working one group or the other, but the Israelis were very cordial to me, very open.

I might go back to Basra, Iraq, one incident that I found very amusing, on final reflection. As economic officer, I was supposed to be reporting on these companies that were doing business, and filling out WTDs, World Trade Directory reports.

I was asked to get the report on one company, and so I went around and talked to a banker, and said, "What will you tell me about this company?" I got back a little, sterile sort of bank statement.

I asked around, and I drove up and saw where their offices were. I knew the fellow socially, and I met him. A week or so after I got the request, I finally got to the point where I thought, well, I'll just have to go and talk to this guy. I didn't really know what to say, and I talked to Lester Sutton to find out what I should do. I didn't get much guidance.

Finally, I got into the man's office, and he had to leave. So I was kind of looking around over his desk: Where are the letters from? And what are the stamps? I thought, "How is this going to happen?"

So I sat around the office, and the fellow came back, and we chatted about various things. I must have gotten some message over to him, because finally he suddenly discovered that I wanted to know what his company was doing. And I had not told him that at all.

Once he realized that I was interested in his company, my gosh, books came off the desk, off the shelves, everything. He was showing me this contract, that contract. And I then finally discovered that there's nothing that a businessman wants to do more than talk about his own business.

And this sort of thing, of how does one get information, I learned from this one incident that frequently you have to tell the person: Look, I'm in there to talk to you because I want to know what you're doing.

And so, when I was in Israel, going in to talk to people about the business, I asked them, "Where do you get your supplies? Where do you sell your things?"

I can tell you all some interesting tales about the fine oils and essence industry. At that time, one of the major companies in the world was located in Israel. And I said, "Well, why are you here?"

And he said, "Freight costs are nothing. It's all knowledge of how the things go together, and it's skill." And he said, "So an American company was making hickory smoked hams, and hickory wood was becoming expensive, so he was trying to find an essence that would give his hams the same flavor. So he sent me over a variety of his hams and said, 'Can you make an essence that will produce this?'" All of his competitors in the United States were running into the same problem, and he wanted to get a source that none of the other people would know about, so he thought: "Israel! They don't know about hams over there."

Well, they know about hams. And this friend of mine, who happened to be a Sephardic Jew from the Netherlands, a very erudite guy, figured out how to make this essence, so this was one of his customers. And he said, "I can compete with anybody, because the basic raw materials come from worldwide, the market is worldwide."

But then, going in and talking to, say, the military authorities who were ruling the Arab quarters of Israel, just go in and ask them: "Why did you seize somebody's land? Why don't you give him back his buses?" And they very rarely ever came and said, "Well, really, that's not an appropriate question to ask."

I did, though, find out an Israeli that I happened to meet and got to know. He was married to an American girl. And he asked me to take a drive with him one day. And in the course of the drive, he said, "Did you get a letter from Congressman Bolton?" (Frances Bolton from Cleveland.) "What is she writing you? Why did she write you?" And it turned out that he knew all about the letter. Then he said, "Israeli Intelligence have asked me to form a friendship with you and find out what you're doing."

I then had a local employee, a very smart Romanian Jew who was doing a certain amount of economic and political work for me. And when he left, he said, "Look, if my replacement doesn't tell you that he has been approached by Israeli Intelligence in a matter of a few months, be suspicious of him." This fellow came to the United States and graduated from some New York City school. He broke all records with complete A's.

Israeli Intelligence, I was aware, due to these various things, were interested not just in what I was doing, but I knew they were certainly indeed looking into what all of our U.S. government people were doing. And so Pollard was approached eventually.

Q: We're talking about a famous cause célèbre, a man named Pollard who was caught in the United States, having stolen and transmitted masses of top secret documents for the Israelis. This was in the late 1980s.

CHASE: I did not know that Eisenhower approved the sale to the Israelis of equipment that let them start on their atomic energy business. That was the type of secret that I was not aware of. And it happened while I was there.

Q: Were there problems for you dealing with expatriate Americans, particularly American Jews who went to Israel to settle there? If they had difficulties, did you get involved in this sort of thing?

CHASE: Very definitely. At that time, you know that an American citizen could lose his citizenship through a whole series of acts: leaving the United States to avoid the draft; voting in a foreign election; becoming naturalized in a foreign state. And I can't recall all the rest.

Q: Holding offices. It was up until the mid-Sixties, I think, when this was overturned by the Supreme Court.

CHASE: Certain ones of these things were stock. I remember the American community asked me to come to a meeting and discuss this issue of why did they lose their citizenship if they did certain things. I was using a variety of analogies to try and say that you can't serve two gods at the same time. If you are an American citizen, wonderful. If you give your allegiance over to Israel, that's wonderful. But don't try and do two at the same time. All our laws are to prevent people from being put in a position where they'll have a conflict of interest.

Then we ran into a situation of taking away citizenship from people who had voted in Israeli elections. The people had an identity card, and so when they came in to get their passport renewed, we said, "Well, where's your identity card?" So we'd look in the identity card to see if there was a voting stamp there. And that's how the Israelis controlled who voted, by putting a stamp in their identity card.

Well, a number of these people said, "I didn't vote! I didn't vote! I didn't vote!" Here it was in their card.

As this went along, we then discovered that, particularly in some of the people we'd seen, the kibbutz would hold everybody's identity card, and as the person would come in to vote, they'd give them the identity card so they could go to the next room and vote. However, as the end of the day was approaching, and they had a number of ID cards that hadn't been voted, they would take them over and vote them. And so some of these Americans were losing their citizenship improperly.

We had a woman by the name of Sylvia Bernstein, a very wonderful lady. Her father was a prominent federal judge up in Philadelphia. Sylvia lived in a kibbutz, and she did not vote, she said, but her ID card said she had. We took away her citizenship. She came to me and said, "Look, we are friends. I want to just tell you, you have done a terrible misdeed." (I hadn't done it, my predecessor did it. But I would have done it.) And she said, "I did not vote." And she began to tell me of how this thing was going on in the kibbutz. We then went through, oh, quite a number of months of talking to various people, and finally we presented a report to the Department of State that we believed Sylvia Bernstein was telling the truth when she said she had not voted. And so, on this occasion, the citizenship was restored.

Then I had another friend who was a draft evader.

Q: American draft evader or Israeli?

CHASE: American draft evader. I can remember the day he came into the office. I had called him in and said I wanted to see his passport. So he gave me his passport and I threw it on my desk and I said, "I have to tell you that you're no longer a U.S. citizen." He got his citizenship back later on, of course, through these court proceedings. He was one of these interesting guys, but on this question of dual nationality, like a number of these other Americans, he wanted to be a citizen of both countries.

Q: Did you have the feeling that the American citizenship was something (which I've run across in other countries) that they wanted to keep in their hip pocket in case things got bad, but their real commitment was to the state they were in? I found this true in Greece, for example.

CHASE: Some would be perfectly comfortable stating it that blatantly. The majority of them would say: "We are true Americans, and we believe that there is no possibility of a conflict of interest between Israel and the United States." They wanted to participate in the local activities. They would say, "Look, our children go to the schools. We are being affected in various ways, and we think we should be allowed to do this."

You see, it wasn't against the law. And I, at least, felt convinced that the law was correct. I can recall I was up in Canada when the whole thing was declared unconstitutional. I thought, "My God, those Supreme Court people are jerks." And then I got, as quickly as I could, a copy of the whole decision. I began reading through, and I came to the conclusion, "My gosh, they're absolutely right. The Constitution doesn't give the legislative power to take away citizenship."

RICHARD B. PARKER
Jerusalem (1951-1953)

Desk Officer for Jordan, Israel, and Iraq
Washington, DC (1957-1959)

Ambassador Richard B. Parker was born in Providence, Rhode Island in 1923. He received a bachelor's degree in engineering from Kansas State University. Prior to joining the Foreign Service in 1949, he served in the U.S. Army as an infantry officer. Ambassador Parker's career included positions in Australia, Israel, Jordan, Egypt, and ambassadorships to Algeria, Lebanon, and Morocco. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1989.

Q: Yes. Well, now, you went to Jerusalem in 1951. How did you see the situation at the time in Jerusalem and in the Arab world? How did it appear to you?

PARKER: I didn't have any idea of what it was. I had gone to see the Israeli consul in Sydney who recommended some books to me. I read several of these books. One of them was Arthur Koestler's Promise and Fulfillment. There was also a Lebanese consul there. But a man who for various reasons, principally his rather poor command of English, was not taken seriously by anybody. I did not go to see him. It never occurred to me.

I went to Jerusalem primarily with an Israeli-oriented background. I had no idea of the complications of the Palestine problem or anything else, or the history of our involvement in that area, or what our interests were. I was interested in my career and going to serve in a place that might be interesting and would have some prospect of maybe leading me to the exalted rank of class 3 or class 2 by the time I was ready to retire.

Q: Well, what was your job as the -- it was the consulate general now?

PARKER: Yes.

Q: How did it fit into the system because Jerusalem has always been a --

PARKER: Independent.

Q: Independent.

PARKER: Yes. Well, we reported directly to the Department, and we were very jealous of our independent status. We didn't take any nonsense from those bastards in Tel Aviv or Amman. We thought they didn't really understand the situation. The principal officer, the consul general, was in charge of political reporting, and we had primary responsibility for reporting on the activities of the mixed armistice commissions, which were the U.N.-supervised commissions which had both Israeli and Arab officers on them which were supervising the armistice agreements concluded in 1949. There were always incidents across the border to report on. A lot of activity, very interesting activity.

Q: Let's explain a little about the borders at this point in that area.

PARKER: Well, they were the borders where the fighting stopped in '48. Jerusalem was a divided city. We had an office on the Arab side, and an office on the Israeli side. The first six months of our tour there, we lived on the Israeli side. And the remaining eighteen months, we were on the Arab side. We had to go back and forth. We had a sort of permanent pass that would let us go back and forth through the Mandelbaum gate.

One of my principal functions was arranging temporary passes for people to go through the gates. To go from the Israel side to the Arab side and vice versa. These were tourists, officials, visitors, and so forth.

Q: Well, who was the consul general and how did he operate in this complicated situation?

PARKER: The consul general was a man named Tyler, Roger B. Tyler. No, sorry. S. Roger Tyler. He operated very well in this environment. He took things very much in his stride, moving back and forth, knowing people on both sides of the border. I think well-liked by people on both sides. He was a very poor administrator of the consulate general. I had a terrible time with him. But he was certainly, in terms of the political function, I think very good and quite well-liked, and everybody remembers him.

Q: Dick, you were saying you wanted to add something about dealing with -- we talked about the Mandelbaum gate -- but your assignment in Jerusalem in 1951 to 1953 about the West Bank?

PARKER: Yes. Thinking over the answer I gave you afterwards, I thought I should have pointed out that at this point in 1951, the West Bank, the region between the Jordan River and the 1948 boundaries of Israel, was controlled by Jordan.

The consulate general in Jerusalem had responsibility for reporting on the West Bank. People from Amman did not get over there very much. The Jordan River was always quite a division between us. Actually, the West Bank was our consular district. We didn't issue visas, but we did passport and citizenship and notarial services for the West Bank. We also in theory had responsibility for Gaza. In other words, we had responsibility for everything that was left over from 1948: Gaza, the West Bank, and the so-called corpus separatum, the separate body of Jerusalem. We didn't recognize the sovereignty of either Jordan or Israel over their respective halves to that city. Tel Aviv did not send people up to Jerusalem without our permission.

Back in 1951, the Foreign Ministry was still down at the place called the Village -- I think it was Hakirya.

Q: This is the Israeli Foreign Ministry.

PARKER: Israeli Foreign Ministry. We saw in the Foreign Service list that the Department was showing Gaza as in our district. Nobody from Cairo had been there since 1948, apparently. One day I decided to try to find out if we could actually go to Gaza. We had special passes that permitted us to go across the border in Jerusalem, up in Galilee on the Bridge of Jacob's Daughters between Syria and Israel, and across the Lebanese border at Ras Naqurah. So why not go to Gaza with a U.N. pass? So we applied for permission to go there, and it was refused by the Egyptians.

I don't know what the people in Gaza did, but certainly we were not providing any consular services to them, nor were we reporting on that area nor was anybody else.

Q: I must say, my two and a half year exposure in Dhahran, Saudi Arabia did not endear me to the machinations of that world. Why did we not develop the equivalent -- have you noticed -- of Arabists, of Israelists?

PARKER: We have trained some people in Hebrew. There are a number of officers who have spent two, or perhaps three, tours in Israel, but, you know, making a career out of Israel is pretty limiting in terms of your choice of jobs and places to go and so forth. Very little geographic scope. If you become an Israeli specialist, you are hardly persona grata across the line in the Arab countries. So it has not been something that has appealed a great deal to people.

Q: Now how did you, again, from the Amman point of view, our embassy, view Israel and how about, on a more personal side, how did you view the reporting that was coming out of Tel Aviv? Did you feel you were reporting on the same climate or was there a difference?

PARKER: Tel Aviv naturally tended to report things from an Israeli perspective. That was the perspective that they saw down there. Just as I think we tended to report things from a Jordanian perspective. We always thought they were terribly pro-Israeli, and they always thought we were terribly pro-Arab.

What was the first part of the question?

Q: How did we view Israel? One was the reporting and the other was the --

PARKER: Yes. I think we saw Israel as a considerable liability in the area. We realized that it was no escaping our identification with it given the political realities at that point. But we were concerned that this friend of ours was something that was really out of control in terms of its activities towards its neighbors. I arrived in Amman just after the Gaza raids in 1955 in which the Israelis went over in force in Gaza and killed a large number of people, attacking Egyptian police posts and so forth. A well-documented story and something that Israelis are still arguing about and something that led directly to the Egyptian press for arms from the Soviets. After the Gaza raid, they turned to us for arms, and we imposed conditions which they thought were unacceptable, and so they turned to the Soviets. And that became the Soviet entry into the area. Well, we saw this sort of action by the Israelis as the vector of Soviet penetration in the area.

Q: Okay. We can always add. You then came back to Washington to the Department in 1957 where you were the Jordanian, Israeli and Iraqi desk officer?

PARKER: Yes. I came back. As I said earlier, I was evacuated with hepatitis. My home leave was due. I had come home for home leave, and a vacancy opened up on the Israel- Jordan desk. They asked me if I would like to take it, and I said, "Yes." So we stayed in Washington, and I didn't go back to Amman.

Every one of my Foreign Service moves up to this one had been screwed up somehow. We had been separated from our effects and somebody else had had to pack them and so forth.

At that time the Office of Near Eastern Affairs was organized along the lines of an Iraq-Arabian Peninsula desk, which in those days was under Dave Newsom, an Egyptian-Sudan desk, a Lebanon-Syria desk, and an Israel-Jordan desk. I was on Israel-Jordan desk under Don Bergus. There were two of us on the desk, and we dealt with both sides of the line. I did that until somewhere in 1958.

After the formation of the United Arab Republic between Egypt and Syria and the Arab union between Iraq and Jordan, we reorganized to have a UAR desk -- the United Arab Republic desk, Egypt and Syria; an Iraq-Jordan desk -- the Arab Union desk; and -- let's see what did we do with, I forget what we did now with Lebanon. I guess we put Lebanon together with Israel. And we had an Arabian Peninsula desk.

Q: What were your prime concerns?

PARKER: Well, let me go back and finish this story. In 1959, I left after two years in NEA into the newly-formed Africa Bureau to be the Libyan desk officer in the Office of North African Affairs. I did that for two years. So that explains why I served on all three of those countries, actually four.

Q: Looking at it, did you find the perspective different in looking at, particularly you had been in Amman but all of a sudden you had responsibility or joint responsibility for Israel, too. In your eyes, did you see or have a different perspective?

PARKER: Well, obviously. I mean, instead of just having Arabs calling -- of course, the Arabs were not really represented very effectively in Washington at that time; you didn't hear much from them -- but you did hear a lot from American Jews and from Israelis. They were all over the place, and you had to respond to them, and you had to take into account their view of the universe. So, yes, I think it's obviously a balancing experience.

We had a division of labor where Bergus handled most of the Israeli side, and I handled the Jordanian side.

Q: This is, again, the relatively early years after the creation of Israel. Did anybody ever sit down with you in the higher reaches of the State Department to talk about what was our real interest in Israel, or in the Arab world, other than political considerations in the United States?

PARKER: Well, certainly nobody higher up did. This was something we talked about among ourselves in the Office of Near Eastern Affairs. We had pretty full and frank discussions about it, but it was always understood that in the upper reaches, this was a political issue. And whatever the area experts or specialists might think of it, that in the final analysis, the political reaction was going to be decisive. This was not to say that the government was not prepared, particularly under Eisenhower, to confront the Israelis because we did - over Suez and over the evacuation of Sinai.

I was there in this bureau at a very interesting time in terms of our relationships with the Israelis. They were very unhappy with the pressures we were talking about putting on them to get them to withdraw from Sinai in 1957. The Israeli invasion occurred just as I got to Washington in the fall of 1956, and I lived with the consequences of that pretty intensively for two years.

Q: How did this play out? What were you doing and what were your impressions of the situation?

PARKER: I was doing the sort of things that all desk officers do. It is just like being a political officer with all these things that suddenly turn up. Anything the Department of State does, actually does I mean, as opposed to talking about it, comes down to the desk officer. He is the only person in the Department of State as far as I'm concerned who really does any work. There are a lot of people who sit around and talk about what's got to be done, but the desk officer is just like the platoon or maybe the company commander. He is the man who has to go out and do the actual digging and writing and putting of things together. Somebody else clears it or changes it or disapproves his draft, but then it comes back to him to redo. Except on such occasions as when you've got somebody like Foster Dulles deciding that he is the desk officer, and he's doing the work, and he's writing it, it's the desk officer who does it. There isn't anybody in between. None of the assistant secretaries or office directors do any writing of their own if they can avoid it. And the work of the Department is largely writing. You've got to formulate things in a memorandum that people approve and that becomes the document that authorizes expenditure of money and so forth.

I think the most important thing I did there and one of the few positive accomplishments I can record in my career was that I was the action officer for something called the East Ghor project. To make a very long story short, the Eric Johnston effort to have a unified development of the Jordan Valley failed. The Arabs agreed technically, but they did not agree politically. And so as a substitute, in an effort to do something to help Jordan which was in desperate state -- after having kicked out Glubb and lost the British subsidy in exchange for a promised subsidy from the Egyptians, Syrians, and Saudis which they didn't pay, and after the activities of nationalists like this man Suleiman Nabulsi and others were obviously leading Jordan into a situation where the king was going to be sacrificed, the king called on us and asked for help. This was in the spring of 1957. We then began a program of aiding Jordan. And our present involvement in that country dates back to that point. A serious involvement.

We were searching desperately for something to do to help Jordan. Jordan had no resources except phosphates. There is a little water in the Jordan Valley, not a great deal. And water in the Yarmuk, one of the tributaries of the Jordan. And an idea that had been floated some ten years before but then been abandoned because of the Johnston plan was to dam the Yarmuk and use that water to irrigate upper terraces of the Jordan Valley, the so-called East Ghor.

I had responsibility for fighting this project through the bureaucracy which took me a long time. I can't remember how many signatures. The last signature I got was that of the then Under Secretary Douglas Dillon. I can't tell you what a feeling of accomplishment that was for me to have this paper with his initials on it in my hand, authorizing us to go ahead and give the Jordanians -- I think the initial sum was ten million dollars -- to start this project, this diversion project.

It has really transformed that area of Jordan which was a howling desert into a fertile, well-watered oasis. To see the water gushing down that central conduit and going out into the fields is really very rewarding. It's about the only material thing that I can point to.

Q: What is probably almost unique is that there aren't many of these.

PARKER: No.

Q: Back to the repercussions of the '56 Suez War, what sort of involvement did you have with our policy which was relatively hard-nosed as far as the Israelis?

PARKER: I didn't have any. It was in the hands of Mr. Dulles. My maximum involvement was one day I took the Israeli ambassador, Abba Eban, to see Dulles and took the notes of the conversation. Dulles was calling all the shots, and we just followed his orders.

Q: How did a relatively junior officer and your fellow junior officers at Near Eastern Affairs evaluate Dulles in your lunchroom conversations?

PARKER: Well, we thought Dulles was sort of an S.O.B. We were terribly unhappy about his Presbyterian conscience and his attitude that neutrality was immoral. We thought he was unnecessarily hard-line with the Arabs.

You know, we made a serious effort to bring down Nasser in those days. We were looking for people to support. If we could have found somebody to have a coup d'état, we would have. This was under the Eisenhower doctrine, which followed the Suez affair. It is ironic that first of all, we are on the side of the angels at Suez. We stopped the British and the French and the Israelis. We get the Israelis out of Sinai. But at the same time, we own something called the Eisenhower doctrine under which we appropriated two-hundred million dollars to support any governments in the area which were threatened by regimes dominated by international communism, for which read Egypt. We saw Nasser as a Soviet puppet. I mean, our government did. And we on the working level thought that was wrong.

Q: I was going to ask -- I mean, here is one of these assumptions. Was this a real assumption or was this just a justification to support the pressure from the Jewish lobby and the Israelis or was this really --

PARKER: No, I think the Israelis may have helped with this, and it was something that was popular with Jewish groups, but I think it was a conviction on the part of Dulles as well as Eisenhower that Nasser was no gentleman. That we could not do business with him, and we really ought to get rid of him.

I very much liken this attitude to that Reagan has and I guess Bush does as well towards Qadhafi. Qadhafi is an outlaw, therefore, you can do anything you want to him. It doesn't make any difference. The difference between Qadhafi and Nasser is, however, that Nasser had enormous support throughout the Arab world. He was the only Arab leader who has for many years had any support outside his own country.

Q: How did you view our embassy and our relations with Israel as from your observation point?

PARKER: Well, I had a very -- what shall I say -- difficult time. There was the usual problem that we and Tel Aviv didn't see things the same way. Sam Lewis and I had quite different views of the situation.

Q: He was our ambassador.

PARKER: He was our ambassador in Tel Aviv. And that's sort of normal. In this case, I was particularly disturbed that we were, in effect, acquiescing in Israeli hegemony over southern Lebanon. And part of our saying that we -- and we said this repeatedly -- that we support the territorial integrity of Lebanon, and we fully support the central government. We were not willing to say, "No," to the Israelis to get the hell out of south Lebanon. And they were supporting this renegade down there, Major Haddad, who had armed a little strip of Maronite villages along the border that he had organized against the Shia and against the Palestinians in a sort of a village defense effort. I can sympathize with that, but what it meant was that -- I mean, the way to deal with that problem was not to arm the villagers, but to get the Lebanese army down there and get in control of this area so it could police and defend it against the Palestinians which I think it would have done. But between the Israelis and the reluctance of the Lebanese to really take any strong measures in this respect, Lebanon lost control of southern Lebanon, and it's been a continuing source of problems.

Q: Would you say our policy at the time you were there maybe somewhat indirectly but as a moving force was our relations with Israel as regards to Lebanon -- I mean, was everything predicated in what does this mean to Israel?

PARKER: Well, not so much that as we simply weren't going to cross the Israelis. It wasn't worth it. The Israelis had too much support in our Congress. If the Lebanese had been more resolute and better organized, and we had some chance of showing some positive accomplishment if we could get the Israelis to withdraw, I think we would have acted differently. But the Lebanese were such wimps that we weren't going to take the risk of confronting Israel and a hostile Congress. I mean, this is in a period when the Israelis controlled seventy-six senators, and we weren't going to take them on.

HARRY I. ODELL
Haifa (1952-1954)

Harry Odell graduated from Brown University and later attended graduate school at the Fletcher School of International Affairs at Tufts University. Prior to attending Brown University, however, Mr. Odell had served in the US Army Air Corps during World War II. His Foreign Service career began in 1950 and it took him to places such as Germany, Israel, Sri Lanka, Greece, Jordan, and Switzerland. In addition, Mr. Odell has held several positions within the Department of State. He was interviewed by Peter Moffat in April 2000.

Q: Well, all good things come to an end. You had to go back to the Department?

ODELL: No. I went to Haifa, Israel as vice consul. In my wish list, I had said "the Middle East." I had no idea I would be sent as vice consul to Haifa. It turned out to be quite an interesting assignment. I got there in 1952. That was four years after the creation of Israel. It was an interesting period to see the changes taking place administratively in Israel. Manifestly, even in that short period of time in two years, administratively, things were working better than they had when I got there. Four years after the British gave up their mandate, they were just sort of beginning to get ordinary government service and facilities under control, in addition, of course, to coping with an enormous immigration problem, a military problem, and every other kind of problem. As a consulate, particularly in a port city, a provincial city, you didn't see the big picture as much as you saw the mechanics of the thing - the mail being delivered and the garbage being collected, conventional police work and so forth. It was interesting to see that movement take place in Israel.

Q: Who was the ambassador at that time?

ODELL: Our first ambassador to Tel Aviv, who I think I met once, died of a heart attack and then he was replaced by Francis Russell, whom I saw more because he preferred Haifa physically to Tel Aviv and used to come up more than we wanted him to. I did see more of him.

Q: And your consul general was who?

ODELL: When I got there, it was a fellow named Wilbur Chase, who had been in Hamburg. He was a consular type and stayed one. Wilbur was there and then he went on extended home leave. I was in charge of the consulate the last three months or so. It was a pretty good period. Things were fairly austere. It was difficult to get things and things didn't work very well. There were constant power failures and that sort of thing. But things got better. Of course, in those days, with a diplomatic passport, you could cross the Lebanese border or the Jordanian border with no trouble at all, so we made a routine of going up periodically to Beirut and coming back with a car just absolutely bogged down with everything you can think of. It was not an unpleasant experience in Haifa. My son was born there. We found it very agreeable, although I had no idea of that assignment coming up. It was particularly interesting because... Talcott Seelye at the time was over in Amman. He knew from the word "go" that he wanted to be an Arab specialist. He and his wife and children came over to Israel twice. This was very rare of an Arabist in those days. They tended to avoid Israel like the plague. Talcott didn't. He had his strong views, which he still holds, but he came over. We visited them in Amman. Of course, Jerusalem was there in between. It was an interesting place to be. I got to know people that I still know. We traveled quite a bit. We went up to Damascus; Amman two or three times; Beirut several times (We didn't get to Cairo.); up to Cyprus, which was still British... We were there the night they were celebrating the coronation of Queen Elizabeth. Some official Americans assigned to Israel, if they were going to have children, the wife would go over to Cyprus or someplace and have this child rather than have it born in Israel. My son was born in Haifa and my wife said, "I'm not going over to Cyprus. I've been going to this doctor here and I want to stay here." When his passport was issued, the place of birth said "Haifa, Israel." He carried this with him. His passport to this day says he was born in Haifa, Israel. After he grew up, he traveled all over the place, including all through the Arab world. There was a lot of mythology connected with this.

good. I can't say that they were good, but they were relatively good. I felt that, for the Israeli Arabs, of whom there were many, many thousands, people who hadn't run away during the 1948 war, it would give them a sense of belonging, and I felt that would be a positive thing for the Israeli Government to do. So, after some effort I got them to agree and they did it. They printed the schedules in Arabic that they were going to use in the Arab communities. Of course Israel had contacts with local Arabs, particularly through the Histadrut. I think the Histadrut was used in recruiting these Arab agents, but they did do that. My tour there ended before the publication of the survey, but that was the original survey, the first labor force survey that Israel had ever taken, and it is still going on today in a much improved, much extended, form.

I regard that as a real contribution, and it led me to an interest in what was going on in the Arab community. I carried that interest through until the time that I became Labor Attaché so when I went back 13 years later I had contacts in the Arab community.

MARGARET V. TAYLOR
Information Officer, USIS
Tel Aviv (1953)

Margaret V. Taylor was born in San Diego, California in 1925. She received a bachelor's degree from San Diego State College in 1946 and a master's degree from Stanford University 1966. Her career in the Foreign Service included positions in Indonesia, Japan, Finland, and Burma. Ms. Taylor was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt in 1990.

TAYLOR: Right. Then, in 1953, there was the separation between State and the Information Service, the latter becoming an independent agency. Because of my lack of tenure and inexperience, I was "RIFed." So my career appeared to be coming to an abrupt halt, and I made preparations to return to the United States.

I got as far as the airport in Athens, where I was greeted by a USIS officer with a telegram from Washington that said, in effect, "Dear Ms. Taylor, you're going to Tel Aviv. So I, more or less, turned on my heel and went off to Tel Aviv. While I had very little tenure and experience, apparently someone else had even less, so I went to Tel Aviv where I served just for six months, completing that original two-year assignment.

Q: What month was this in 1953?

TAYLOR: Well, let's see, I left Tel Aviv along about May, 1954, and I was there for six months, so it was in the fall of 1953 when I went down there. I was there for a very short time but long enough to get a feel for that country and to gain more work experience.

When I went to Tel Aviv, I was cast more into the role of a secretary, and therefore my activities, in that sense, were much more curtailed. But, there was a wonderful CAO, Tom McGrail, who had come to Tel Aviv about the same time I did, from Japan, where he had spent many years, first with the Army and then he joined the Information Service, and was assigned back to Japan.

His next assignment was in Tel Aviv. He encouraged my interest in cultural work. He was himself a very knowledgeable and enthusiastic representative of American culture.

He had, I think, made quite an impression on the Japanese when he was there, from the stories that I heard him tell, and because he was a bachelor, (a good bit older than I) we often went to concerts together and to art shows, et cetera, and so I was able to associate with that group of people in Israel and through my own natural interests. It was a haven for me.

This was a period in Israeli history when the Israelis were really trying to reach out, particularly to Americans, but also to all Westerners, because they had great enthusiasm about the formation of that country and really wanted to meet as many foreigners as they could and give them a good impression of Israel. It was a matter of give and take. We brought with us our knowledge and representation of the United States and, of course, Tom was working with cultural programs, and the Israelis, then, were eager to invite us into their homes. So we had that kind of natural entree into the country through the people. It was a most interesting and pleasant way of establishing contact.

Q: Your program then, in Israel, was in many respects, I gather, similar to that which you were carrying on in Greece? Since you were dealing with a largely pro- American audience, it was more or less information about the U.S. and cultivating the friendships of the Israelis?

TAYLOR: Yes. Very much so. And we did travel throughout the country, visited kibbutzim, and went to the other towns: to Haifa and the part of Jerusalem that one could visit then. It was just what you indicate.

Q: Did you have a motion picture program there that went out into the field, or did you not?

TAYLOR: I'm a little hazy about that. There was a small motion picture program but I was not as directly involved in it and, of course, the population was very much smaller so I'm not sure that -- the program certainly wasn't as big as it was in northern Greece. However, I really don't recall how much of a program it was.

Q: And who was head of the USIS program at that time?

TAYLOR: Wilfred Cramer. And then there was Tom McGrail, the Cultural Officer, and a radio/press officer.

Q: I suppose they were able to place a good deal of information both on the radio in Israel and also in the newspapers?

TAYLOR: Yes, because there was an easy acceptance of information so I don't think that there was any great problem about getting our materials placed. There were problems of moving around on Saturday because everything closed down in Israel on Saturdays, but that was not a terrible impediment.

Q: Was there any particular program emphasis that you could determine? Did you have an exchange program at that time with the U.S.?

TAYLOR: Yes, there was an exchange program but here again, having been there for this relatively short period of time, I don't remember the size of it. But we did have an exchange program and had all of the facilities of the Service and an ambassador who was kindly disposed toward USIS, so I think people were aware of what we were trying to do and there was support for the activity.

Q: Who was the ambassador then?

TAYLOR: Francis Russell, a fine career person. It was a most worthwhile, albeit very brief, experience.

MARGARET L. PLUNKETT
Labor Adviser, Technical Aid Mission
Tel Aviv (1953-1954)

Margaret L. Plunkett was born on April 15, 1906. She received a bachelor's degree, a master's degree, and a doctorate from Kernel University. Ms. Plunkett worked in the New York State Department of Labor; was a researcher at The Massachusetts Institute of Technology; was on the Wage Stabilization Board; War Production Board; BLS in the Labor Department and the Women's Bureau. She served in Tel Aviv, Israel as the Labor Adviser to the Technical Aid Mission and later in The Hague, Netherlands as the Labor Attaché. She was interviewed by Thomas D. Bowie on July 28, 1995.

PLUNKETT: While I was at the Wage Stabilization Board (WSB), the State Department asked me if I would be interested in going as Labor Adviser to the Technical Aid Mission in Israel. Well, I had changed jobs a lot in my life, and I was again ready to change. So I said, "Yes. I'd like to do that." So they appointed me. This was not a regular State Department appointment. I was on loan to the State Department from Labor for a two-year stint. So I took a leave from the BLS and went over to Israel.

Q: I see Golda Meir's picture here in your apartment.

PLUNKETT: That's right, and it says on it "Love, Golda." She was a wonderful woman and 1953 was when I first met Golda. She was Minister of Labor at that time. Well, the appointment as Labor Adviser to the Technical Aid Mission was an extremely interesting part of my life. We weren't part of the Embassy, but we were associated with it. The Embassy was superior in authority to the Mission, but it wasn't the governing board, so to speak. The Director of the Mission was a political appointee. This was during the Eisenhower administration. When the time came for me to leave for my post, I had to go to some office where there were people hiring people for the Eisenhower administration.

They probably took one sniff of me and said, "She's no Eisenhower supporter, and maybe we oughtn't to send her." And they said that to me-not that I wasn't an Eisenhower supporter, but that they had somebody else that they might want to send on that job. And I said, "You better not. I've given notice on my apartment and arranged for my furniture to be stored during this time. The Mission has assigned me an apartment there, and you can't undo that."

Q: Who were these people?

PLUNKETT: God only knows. They were young people who were Eisenhower appointees, and they were reviewing proposed appointments. So I hustled back to the Labor Department and said "I was told there was one more paper to be signed, and you better sign it this afternoon, because you've put me to all this bother of arranging to go there and I'm going." They signed the paper and circumvented those pipsqueaks who were trying to hire somebody else. It shows you what you can do if you open your mouth. When I was a kid my Mother used to say, "Don't be afraid to open your mouth." And I say, it hasn't been closed since!

Well, when I got to Israel, it was totally strange to me. I remember with embarrassment that when they said I would be stationed in Tel Aviv, I didn't know that Tel Aviv was the major city of the new state of Israel. I soon got to know it pretty well. Anyway, when you get to a new place like that, they make a formal appointment for you to meet the head of whatever agency you are assigned to. I went in to see him and he looked at me-He was a very nice man; we got to be good friends, but he wasn't very smart-and he said to me, "What are you doing here?" [laughter] I said, "Well, I was appointed to the position of Labor Adviser to the Mission. What is it that you want me to do?" Well, he fumbled and mumbled, and I was turned loose and actually I had to make the job.

Fortunately, his second in command was a much more sophisticated person and explained to me what we were supposed to do. We had different specialists on the staff there. The aim was to develop projects with the Government of Israel that would aid Israel in getting going. This was early 1953 when I went there, and they were still on their knees. It was a really remarkable time, and I was very glad to have been there at the very beginning.

As an example of the early difficulties, the local people had no access to the one first class butcher in Tel Aviv. The Embassy and the Mission people had to get permits from the Israeli Government to buy there. We were the only people, along with personnel of the other embassies of course, who could buy meat in that place. And it was not so elegant. You had to buy a hunk of beef, for example, wrapped up in brown paper. You didn't know what it was. It could have been the most tender steak, or it could have been the toughest hunk of beef, which I happened to buy once for local guests. After roasting, it was inedible. Instead, we wound up eating scrambled eggs.

Q: Was this kosher?

PLUNKETT: I don't know. It was an Israeli establishment, and whether it was kosher or not, I don't know.

Q: But it was a large supplier of the meat?

PLUNKETT: It was the supplier. I do not think they were importing Argentine meat then, as they did later. And our agricultural man at the Mission established their cattle industry. It was later a very productive operation in Israel. In many other countries, there was a lot of graft and not much solid work, but that wasn't true in Israel.

Q: Did you go to Embassy staff meetings or was the Mission considered a parallel body?

PLUNKETT: Yes, we had our own staff meetings, to which I went of course. It wasn't too long after I got there, maybe a matter of six months, that this second in command-he is dead now, and I don't remember his name-said to me, "You know, we were thinking of getting somebody to handle projects in public administration, but we think that you should do that." Well, that tickled me, because that broadened my scope very widely."

In this new area of responsibility, we had Israeli counterparts, people in the government with whom we worked very directly and from whom we got requests or suggestions and to whom we made suggestions for projects. I was assigned to somebody who was all right, but really I found I couldn't work with him! He was such a fuss budget, and this, and that, so I finally went to a man who [later] became a very famous man in Israel, Teddy Kollek. He was Director General of the Prime Minister's office then and I said to him, "Look, I can't work with this man. Nothing is ever going to get done." So he said. "Fine. You're going to work with me."

So that's how I got to know Teddy Kollek. And we have remained very close friends ever since. I just had a letter from him the other day. He eventually became Mayor of Jerusalem and was Mayor for 28 years. When he was 83, he ran for the last time. Unfortunately, I think, he was defeated, but after you have had the same mayor for 28 years, and he's gotten old and not very well, you ditch him for somebody else. He personally was almost destroyed by it.

I happened to make a visit to Israel at the time of the election in the fall of 1993. My nephew and his wife went with me, because I couldn't manage it alone with my bum locomotion abilities. While there, we had lunch with Teddy. This was a few days before the election, and he looked dreadful, but I've seen him on television more recently when he was on a trip across the States, and he looked very relaxed. He's running the Israel Museum now, which was one of his creations. He was one of the most creative people I have ever known, and a wonderful money raiser. He could pry a million dollars from a beggar just as easily as eating supper!

In any case, back to the technical AID mission. The Israeli Government wanted to make a labor force survey. In 1931 the British, who then controlled that area, did a labor force survey, but they did not include the Arab population. They just took a labor force survey of the Jewish population. This was long before [the establishment of] the state, of course, and nothing in that field had happened since. Well, then the government wanted, quite sensibly, I thought, to have a rounded labor force survey. That was a major project that I handled while I was there.

I did another thing that I think was very important. I said to the Israelis, "You're planning, of course, to include the Arab population in your survey." Oh, yes, they were. Well, then I said to them that they must print the schedule that they were going to use in the Arab villages in Arabic, and they should hire Arabs to do the interviewing. Well, that seemed like an astonishing thought to the Israeli Government and even to our Mission. There was no connection between the Mission and the Arab population. It never spoke with the Arabs.

Q: Tell me, Margaret, how did you come upon that idea? What made you see the logic of it?

PLUNKETT: Well, it just came out of my head. After all, they were going to take a labor force survey, which is, in a sense, a kind of census. So I said, "Of course, since the British had never scheduled the Arabs, you've got to do it, because they are an important part of the Israeli population." They agreed, with a little persuasion, that that was true. They intended to cover the Arabs, but they didn't intend to do it except with Israeli personnel, and I thought to myself, this isn't going to be good.

Relations with the Arabs, and this was, of course, five years after the 1948 war, were relatively

SLATOR CLAY BLACKISTON JR.
Political Officer
Jerusalem (1953-1956)

Desk Officer for Jordan and Israel
Washington, DC (1956-1957)

Slator Clay Blackiston, Jr. was born in 1918 in Richmond, Virginia. He graduated with an A.B. degree from the University of Virginia. During World War II, he was an aviator in the U.S. Navy. Mr. Blackiston joined the Foreign Service in 1947 and served in Amsterdam, Stuttgart, Port-au-Prince, Jerusalem, Tunis, Jeddah, Cairo, Amman, and Calcutta. He was a member of the United States delegation to the United Nations in 1971. Mr. Blackiston retired from the Foreign Service in 1975. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

Q: But you went to Jerusalem in 1953 and you served there until 1956. Was that just a regular assignment or did you ask for it?

BLACKISTON: I can't remember but I was very happy to go there and I found it fascinating, although we had a lot of problems there which maybe you know about.

Q: Could you explain what the situation was like at that time?

BLACKISTON: The situation was this: the foundation of the state of Israel in 1948 had left a situation in which there was no peace, just Armistice Agreements between Israel and the four surrounding countries, Lebanon, Syria, Jordan and Egypt. The Lebanese border was the same border it had been, but on the Syrian border there were three demilitarized zones (DZs), where, when the fighting ended, Arab villagers were still living. The terms of the Armistice Agreement were that life in the villages should go on as before; they shouldn't be interfered with. The Israelis, practically from the beginning, started encroaching the DZs and ultimately drove the Arab residents from the Hula area DZ and the two up at the headwaters of the Jordan. They also would fire on Syrian fishermen; there was a section of DZ that was only about 30 feet wide between the eastern edge of the Sea of Galilee and Syrian territory and the Golan Heights. The Syrian fishermen would drag their boats across this strip of land and fish as they had been doing for centuries and this would cause trouble.

On the Jordan border the Armistice Agreements were negotiated by the Arab Legion, as it was then called. It was officered by British officers; Glubb Pasha was head of it, and the brigades were headed by British officers. And when the Armistice Agreements were signed they were negotiated by British officers who really didn't know the terrain that well or the geography, so the Armistice border was drawn in such a way that villages were cut off from their land, instead of drawing the border so that it would encompass these communal lands. So many of the villagers would come over into what had been their lands to harvest crops, graze their sheep and so on. This would lead the Israeli border police to fire and sometimes kill them. Occasionally infiltrators from Jordan would cross into Israel and attack Israeli settlers. While I was there there was a famous attack on a town called Qibya led by Arik Sharon; it was a village at the end of a road projecting into Israel. In retaliation for some infiltration from Jordan, the Israelis made a massive night attack on this village of Qibya blowing up houses and killing some 60 people. The Israelis followed the same tactics -- there were a whole series of these things, Qibya is one of the best known -- they would encircle the town, mine the road (there would just be one road) on the Jordan side and then put these satchel dynamite charges against the buildings with the people inside. I think fifty-six people were killed. Then when the Arab Legion would come down the road, they had no other way to go as it was rocky terrain, the trucks would hit these mines. I was there the morning after with another FSO, Cleve Fuller; there is a picture in Life taken of us standing amid the bodies and describing us as UN observers. So this was the pattern of things and there were many of these places. My job included liaison with the UNTSO observers. Well, I lived on the Jordan side. Shall I describe all this?

Q: Yes, please do.

BLACKISTON: Is this getting too long?

Q: No, No. This is what I want, particularly this Jerusalem bit.

BLACKISTON: Let me describe the situation in Jerusalem. Jerusalem was also divided by the armistice line. There was the old city, which was the walled city, plus an eastern part of Jerusalem that was in Jordan; the new city was in Israel. The people of Jerusalem during the Arab-Israel war had defended the old city themselves, just the local inhabitants, but they were going to be overwhelmed so they called for help from Transjordan's King Abdullah. The Arab Legion came and did defend the old city so that it was not captured by Israel. We had one consulate general because the United States supported the UN partition plan which called for an Arab and Jewish state -- with a corpus separatum, which included Jerusalem and Bethlehem, an area that was to be internationally administered because of its significance for the Christian, Muslim and Jewish faiths. Of course this never came to pass but we still today support the legal fiction of it. At that time U.S. passports in Jerusalem said Jerusalem, Palestine; neither Jordan nor Israel. Now that has been changed, I believe. So we had the Consulate General; the main office of the Consul General was on the Israel side on Mammilah Road; across from us was a Muslim cemetery that the Israelis bulldozed. There was an office on the Jordan side and that is the one that I headed. We could cross back and forth during the daytime, and we did; the general public could not. Consular personnel could cross at night but you had to ask for special permission; sometimes we did go for a reception or something on the Israel side.

We had UN observers who were assigned to ensure that there were not violations of the armistice agreement, or if there were to investigate who was responsible. It was called the UN Truce Supervisory Organization, and they were on all four borders. We had what is known as Mixed Armistice Commissions for each of these borders; there was what they called the HKJIMAC which meant Hashemite Kingdom Jordan-Israel Mixed Armistice Commission -- there were similar MACs on all the other borders. The observers came from the United States, Belgium, Sweden, Denmark, Canada, and maybe Norway, I've forgotten. My job was to get to know these officers and to report on incidents, so I got to know them very, very well. The MAC met in a building that was in a no-man's land between one part of Jerusalem and the other. There was some cooperation between the Israelis and the Jordanians with regard to mosquito control, because water would sit there and if they didn't do something about it it would affect both sides so they did do that much.

There was a firing incident in Jerusalem while I was there and the Jordanians -- this is on Nablus Road which comes out of Damascus gate going towards Nablus and would have gone on toward Damascus if there had not been a division between the countries. The Jordanians erected a wall which was about eight feet high, I guess, maybe more, so that in any firing from the Israel side the passersby would be protected. They were not using artillery but mortar shells. I am rambling a little here, but I might cite one case. We would get these Americans there, I guess you would call them hippies today -- they were going to make peace. I remember one day some guy had been in to the consulate to see me, then he'd gone over -- you could with permission cross over to the Israel side. One morning, there were loopholes in this wall, this guy walked into no-man's land and an Arab Legion man shot him dead right out in front of the consulate. Of course he should not have been there but he was a harmless guy. I remember my son calling me, and I looked outside and there was the guy dead.

I may jump a little bit, there is so much that happened there. You remember the Eisenhower Doctrine?

Q: The Eisenhower Doctrine was essentially what?

BLACKISTON: The idea was you would sign up the countries of the Middle East; if they adhered to this doctrine of objection to communism then they would get support, military assistance, from the United States. Lebanon signed up for it but nobody else. Also there was an attempt to get Jordan; we even tried to get Egypt, into the Baghdad Pact -- which of course we never joined. We joined the political committee and the military committee, I have sort of forgotten about that. But there was an attempt to get Jordan into the Baghdad Pact in 1955 and this really blew their stack. There was a farm near Jericho run by Musa Alami & Project, it was quite famous; it used to get a lot of publicity in Reader's Digest. Musa Alami was a Jordanian who got money from Iraq for the farm which trained Palestinian youth in agriculture. It did a good job. That was at the time that Iraq was still more or less under British influence with King Faisal II on the throne.

Q: The King was assassinated.

BLACKISTON: That was later, when Abd al-Karim Qasim overthrew him in 1958. That was later, Nuri Said was the Prime Minister of Iraq who was pro-British. The Jordanians, the mass of the people, particularly the Palestinians, reacted very unfavorably to this attempt to get them into the Baghdad Pact. There was a big refugee camp down in Jericho which is in the Jordan Valley. The refugees came out of the camp and were attacking and tearing apart this Musa project, which was doing good work, actually. They trained students in agriculture, raising chickens and such, and they would sell their turkeys and so forth; but they were getting money from Iraq, Iraq being considered as opposed to Palestinian interests. So they tore the place apart. There were also some Mennonite Missionaries down in the refugee camp, and these missionaries -- well I think they accused them of trying to distribute Bibles. Whether they did or not I don't know but we got a call and I had to go down there in a jeep. These people were barricaded in their house and I brought them up to Jerusalem. Then one thing led to another and by the next year, early January, we heard rumors of an attack -- I've got a paper on all this part, I don't know whether you...

Q: When the time comes you might include that.

BLACKISTON: Well it's long, I just looked it up; I just realized I had it. So I am doing it off the top of my head here.

Q: That's all right.

BLACKISTON: In January 1956 there were rumors of an attack on the Consulate. So we brought over three marines from the Mammilah Road Consulate General and put up concertina barbed wire on top of the fence around it. We had several attacks on the Consulate, but the big one came one day, and I would have to look up the date, when there was maybe a thousand people milling around... this main attack was in January, I guess, with a large crowd outside and we had three marines inside. The crowd was calling to pull down the American flag and our gunnery sergeant, called back, saying, "It ain't time for colors yet." So this mob started breaking in; we had two doors, one a side door, the marine broke out the upper panels and was standing on a chair so he could fire his .38 revolver. My wife and two kids were up on the second floor hiding behind clothes' bags. There was a stairway up to the residence quarters from the side door and some guy had broken out a panel and was getting ready to step into the hallway leading upstairs. I had a shotgun, an automatic shotgun that my father had left me, and so I fired at this guy and he left or was pulled out or something. Anyway this went on for some time; it was pretty hairy! Finally the Arab Legion brigade sent troops down and drove these people away.

Q: Hadn't there been any protection before? Why hadn't they sent troops before?

BLACKISTON: I guess it was the political situation there. You see Glubb Pasha had not been dismissed yet and it was pretty dicey. I was telephoning the governor of Jerusalem asking for protection. There were a number of people killed in this incident. I have upstairs the statement of, I think it was, Brigadier Gallatly, who gave me a figure of how many were killed; I have forgotten what it was. So this situation was not very good, it is not a normal thing and shortly after I was transferred.

Q: Did you have any dealings at all with the Embassy in Tel Aviv?

BLACKISTON: Oh yes, I am glad you asked me this. I didn't have direct dealings with Tel Aviv, but we had a constant battle with the Embassy; with the Army attaché reporting Israeli versions of border incidents, which were not true. We were getting the facts from the UNTSO observers and the Chief of Staff of the United Nations Supervisory Organization, who first was a man named General Vagn Benecke, a Dane. He had played a substantial role in spiriting Danish Jews across the Kattegat to Sweden. and yet this man, because he reported the truth, was just castigated by the Israelis. Now his successor was a General Burns, a Canadian Major General who had been in command of a Canadian division during the second World War. We got to know him quite well too; as a matter of fact I visited him some years ago when I was up in Ottawa. I am sure he is dead now. The Embassy in Tel Aviv, we considered, as constantly presenting the Israeli viewpoint. You see the first American Ambassador to Israel was a guy named McDonald who was confessedly a Zionist; no attempt at balance or anything. The Consul General was constantly getting flak from the Embassy in Tel Aviv, not from the Embassy in Amman. That was the situation.

Q: What was your impression of the Israelis at that time?

BLACKISTON: Aggressive; talking peace but not really wishing it. Nothing much has changed.

Q: Did you feel that your or the Consul General's reporting was inhibited because of domestic political pressures?

BLACKISTON: No, I do not think so. Actually, I was thanked. I will give you one example. The Israelis were complaining bitterly, because on the Mount of Olives, which was on the Jordanian side at that time, there was a Jewish cemetery and many of the grave stones had been knocked down during the war, not officially but by individual Arabs who had broken these stones. That's where this guy Robert Maxwell who either fell or jumped off his yacht off the Canary Islands was buried in an almost official Israel funeral.

Q: A famous British financier of Jewish background; Maxwell, I think.

BLACKISTON: Maxwell, is buried there and there have been allegations that he was a Mossad agent. So these gravestones had been knocked down by Arabs and the Israelis were complaining bitterly to the U.S. government about this. But I had traveled all over Israel and just right across the street in the Mammilah cemetery, which was a Muslim cemetery, I watched and took pictures where they bulldozed the whole thing. So I wrote a dispatch and sent in pictures, making the point that yes, Arabs had knocked down these graves but this was not done by the Jordan government, whereas what had transpired on the Mammilah cemetery was an act by the Israeli government, and I drew a contrast there. Actually I have been all over Israel and they have destroyed graves and Muslim shrines all over the place.

Q: You left there in 1956. Was this before the Suez crisis and war in October of 1956?

BLACKISTON: Yes, they got me out of there because it probably wasn't good for me to stay there. So I went back and was on what was then called the Jordan-Israel desk, for a year. The experience in Jerusalem had interested me in the Arab world, so I applied for Arab language school.

Q: In your time on the Jordan-Israel desk who was the head of it?

BLACKISTON: Don Bergus.

Q: You were there during the Suez war weren't you? How were we treating that?

BLACKISTON: Yes, and I remember Bergus coming back from a meeting when the Egyptian Ambassador met with Dulles -- you remember the financing of the High Dam? You know what happened there was that we had initially offered to help finance it; Dulles initially tried to be evenhanded. Then he began to see Nasser as a real problem in the area, that he was playing footsie with the Communists. So he changed his tune and told the Egyptian Ambassador on that day that we were not going to finance the High Dam and of course that is what led them to go to the Soviets. I remember Bergus coming back and telling me, he had taken the notes, about this. May I make a comment of my own?

Q: Yes, please do.

BLACKISTON: I think it was a mistake to refuse, in one sense. On the other hand, two things: One is that there is an environmental problem with the High Dam and the second is that this would have required annual increments of aid and given the makeup of the U.S. Congress I don't think that a subsequent administration could have withstood the pressure. It probably would have been worse to say you are going to go ahead and start and then have to withdraw someplace along the line. That's the way it was.

Q: Did the Suez war get to the desk or were things on too high a level at that point?

BLACKISTON: No, I knew quite a bit about this because Dulles had this really crazy idea, you may remember. He concocted this idea when Nasser nationalized the Suez Canal Company. When I first heard about it everybody thought it was really wild. You remember the Suez Canal Users Association? Well he cranked up this Dane who was supposed to be the head of it and all these people, I didn't quite understand it, we're supposed to run the Suez Canal. Well the likelihood of Nasser accepting this was -- well, it died aborning. So there were a lot of things going on that were interesting at that time.

Q: At that time, obviously things have changed a great deal, on the Jordan-Israel desk did you feel an obviously heavy Jewish lobby pressure?

BLACKISTON: It was terrible. I remember...was that then or later? Well anyway it doesn't matter; I'll give you an example. Maybe when I was back in the State Department later. Bob Strong was the Director of Near East Affairs, he was later Ambassador to Baghdad. He was going to have a briefing for members of the American press on developments in the Near East, only Americans. Now there was a guy named Cy Kennan -- have you ever heard the name? -- who is the founder of IPAC.

Q: IPAC is the Israel Public Affairs Committee, which is the preeminent...

BLACKISTON: It is an agent of the Israel government. Strong denied Kennan, who is an American citizen, the right to attend this briefing, and as they say, "stuff really hit the fan." Poor Bob, I think he was right, but he had to back down. Yes, there was constant pressure.

Q: How were your reports from Tel Aviv and our reports from the Embassy in Amman treated? And from the consul general in Jerusalem? Did people like Don Bergus who were supervising, in any of these disputed matters view the Embassy in Tel Aviv as being...Did you find that there was an Israeli advocate in Tel Aviv?

BLACKISTON: Yes.

Q: And Arab advocates in the other places where the Arabists were?

BLACKISTON: Well this is the thing, that these are Arab advocates. We who are Arabists deny this. We are not Arab advocates, we are U.S. advocates. We see American interests other than just the complete subordination to the wishes of Israel and the Israel lobby. That's where these people get labeled anti-Semitic and so on; either you are one hundred percent for them or you are anti-Semitic. Well I guess I have answered your question.

Q: Did you get any feeling in Embassy country team meetings [in Saudi Arabia] about reports that would come out of Israel? Did you feel that our Embassy there was the tool of Israelis?

BLACKISTON: I think I discussed that in our last session. My impression when I was in Jerusalem was that that was definitely the case. This was related to me by a fairly prominent Ambassador who served in Lebanon. He said to me that he was getting ready to go to such and such a place, he had been told he would be named, and some political appointee in the State Department told him, "As soon as we get the Israeli clearance you are all set." And my impression was that Army attachés sent to Israel had to be cleared by the Israeli government before they were sent. That was my impression, I may be wrong.

EUGENE H. BIRD
Israel-Jordan Desk
Washington, DC (1955)

Vice Consul

Eugene H. Bird was born in Spokane, Washington in 1925. He was in the U.S. Navy from 1943 to 1948. He attended the University of Washington, receiving a B.S. degree in 1948 and a M.A. degree in 1952. Mr. Bird's overseas career included posts in Israel, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, and India. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1994.

Q: Before we get to that, let's go back to [your service] on the Jordan-Israeli desk. While you were there, how would you describe what later was called the Jewish or the Israeli Lobby?

BIRD: We certainly had a lot to do with it. I was viewed as being a fresh, new face on the scene when I went to work on the desk. I had no background in the Middle East. As a matter of fact my favorite story concerns Parker ["Pete"] Hart. I was told to go in and call on Pete, who had just been appointed the director of NE [the Office of Near Eastern Affairs]. So I walked in by myself. He said that he was happy to have me aboard but wanted to know about my background. Did I have any background in the Near East. I said, "No, I'm sorry, I'm a Swedish expert." He said, "Well, have you read anything on the Middle East?" I said, "I'm afraid I haven't." I said that I read the newspapers and other things, but nothing serious. I said that I had been in management training for the previous couple of years. He said, "Well, have you ever traveled there?" I said, "No, I haven't been close to the Mediterranean or the Middle East." He sighed and said, "Well, maybe that's what we need around here--fresh, new minds." [Laughter]

The people in the Israeli Embassy felt the same way. I had very good relations [with them]. Abba Eban was the Israeli Ambassador. Of course, there were a couple of junior Israeli Embassy officers who became great buddies of mine. Just before I was assigned to the Israeli desk, the Israelis had run what I presume was a "sod" [sodomy?] operation--I don't really know--against Don Bergus' predecessor. This had happened about 18 months previously.

Q: Who was that?

BIRD: I don't remember his name, though I remember his face very well. He was forced out of the Department completely. He was a regular Foreign Service Officer who had been on the desk and had been engaged in some negotiations. There was a party one evening at which he'd made a remark to the DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] at the Israeli Embassy concerning the status of those negotiations, which the Israelis then proceeded to use in the negotiations. He'd given them some insight. I don't know what this was all about. There was nothing in the files on the desk, but what made a deep impression on me was that only a month or two after I came onto the desk in 1955 this officer, who'd gone up to the Council on Foreign Relations in New York, had been brought back to the Department as a result of a case he had brought against the Department because he had been fired. The Department brought him back for one day. He came in to see us during that day. He didn't tell me anything but he had a long conversation with Don Bergus as to the circumstances. Don had been hurriedly brought to the desk as a result [of this situation]. So with the Israelis you always felt that you had to watch your back.

The Jordanians were always very charming. They had a wonderful Ambassador and a tiny staff. They couldn't compete [with the Israelis]. We had a lot to do, both with the anti-Zionists, such as Elmer Berger, who used to come in and talk to us and so on, and people like Don Peretz. And we had a lot to do with some of the Zionists, who would come in and have long conversations with [Assistant Secretary] Allen. Either Don Bergus or I would attend and take notes. Don would attend if the visitor was a very important person. Secretary Dulles saw many of them. Of course, Dulles was viewed within the Department--at least on the NEA side--as a person who had been defeated in his bid for election.

Q: Election as a Senator from New York [in 1950], wasn't it?

BIRD: From New York. He claimed to have been defeated by Jewish money and influence in New York. He supposedly never forgave them for that. I don't know directly. I have no idea. However, stories were told that Dulles would occasionally fulminate against them and refer to them as "those damned New Yorkers" and so on. Still, he had very close relations with Senator Javits...

Q: [Republican] Senator from New York.

BIRD: It was Javits' staff that "carried the water" for Israel more than any other group on the Hill. Of course, I was in touch with Senator Morse, although not necessarily with anyone else up there. But in the case of each of the issues that we had to deal with we would always consider it in terms of what impact it was going to have on domestic politics.

I remember having to answer some of the letters which Secretary Dulles was receiving from politically important people in Philadelphia and various other places. As the lowest man on the totem pole on the desk, this was my job. The [letter writers] would say, "If you don't change your policy on the Middle East, [the Republicans] are going to lose the next Congressional elections here." The Governor of Maryland at that time was also a person who weighed in strongly. I can't remember his name.

Q: I think it was Theodore McKelvin.

BIRD: He would weigh in strongly with Dulles. We would get the "flak" from that and would have to provide [a draft reply]. So it was similar to a situation of having Mme Sun Yat-sen and Mme. Chiang Kai-shek on the Hill on the same day when you're trying to open somewhat better relations with Beijing. It was very similar to that.

Q: You were new to the scene as you dealt with Israeli affairs but you had a fresher eye on this sort of thing. Were you keeping American domestic politics in mind? Normally, in the Foreign Service we are supposed to call things as we see them in American geopolitical or international terms and let the domestic politicians sort it out. But you couldn't do that in this case. Is that right?

BIRD: We would try, but it's like the old adage that "War is an extension of diplomacy." Or you can look at it in the opposite way, that "Diplomacy is an extension of war." It seems to me that in our foreign policy we'll always have a certain tension on this subject. How much influence should ethnic groups--and after all America is nothing but a collection of ethnic groups--have on our foreign policy? How much influence should Russians [in the United States] now have on our policy towards Yeltsin? How much influence should Swedes have on our policy toward Sweden? Obviously, it is very modest. At one point it was clearly very important in United States foreign policy. The Mexican community or the Japanese on the West Coast--how much influence should they have had on preventing the internment of [racial Japanese] in 1941-42 [just after Pearl Harbor]? Well, the answer is that, because of the open nature of American politics and the American debate on American domestic politics, the Poles should have their say on our relations with Poland. Polish Americans should have their say. Jewish-Americans should have their say on our relations with Israel. But the [political] tactics may get to the point where there is real fear in people's minds and voices and so on, as there has been in only two instances that I know of.

One such case is Taiwan and China policy. The second concerns Israel and [United States] policy toward the Arab world. In those two cases the line [which should exist between domestic politics and foreign policy] is being crossed and has been crossed.

Q: How did you find dealing with Israeli diplomats?

BIRD: I found them quite charming. I was always very welcome in Ambassador Abba Eban's embassy. Some years after I left Washington [in 1956], friends told me that I was viewed as being very pro-Israeli when I went to [the Consulate General in] Jerusalem. And I was "courted" there. I was assigned a young Israeli who would call me at [various] times from the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs. So I was viewed as potentially a very useful person to them in many ways, because I'd worked on so many different problems and projects affecting them, including the Johnston Plan [for the division of the waters of the Jordan River between Arabs and Israelis]. [On my way to] Jerusalem, I went via London. It was kind of unusual and, perhaps, kind of "bumptious" of me to do this. I arranged my travel so that I went to London, where I received a briefing. Dayton Mak took me to the [British] Foreign Ministry.

Then I flew to Beirut. I'd never seen these places before. Of course, I'd been briefing people on them. Fraser Wilkins once said to me, after a briefing I had given on Jerusalem, "How long has it been since you've been in Jerusalem?" [I had never been there and told him so.] It was very embarrassing. I could read and brief fairly easily. I went to Beirut and met the Ambassador and his staff and spent a day or two there.

Q: When did you go to Jerusalem?

BIRD: I arrived there on May 10, 1956.

Q: What was your job?

BIRD: I was just a vice-consul in East Jerusalem. I handled West Bank affairs...

Q: Can you explain how our Consulate [General] in Jerusalem was organized at this time?

BIRD: It was an independent office and still is. It did not report either to our Embassy in Amman, Jordan, or to our Embassy in Tel Aviv, Israel. The main building for the Consulate was in West Jerusalem in Israel. We had a very small staff of seven or eight people [in East Jerusalem]. We had no CIA personnel assigned there. One of the first things that happened [after my arrival] was that the CIA asked to put in a couple of people there, disguised as USIS librarians or something like that. My Consul General asked me if I thought I could live with that. I said, "Oh, sure. I dealt with CIA a lot in Washington." I got some money from CIA to rebuild the roof of the old Russian Church in East Jerusalem. I had good contacts with the Russian community as a result of that.

The fact is that we carried in our passports a statement that we were accredited to the United States Consulate General in Jerusalem, Palestine. We received letters of recognition from the governor, or "Muhafiz" of East Jerusalem and from the Mayor of West Jerusalem. We defended our independence very strongly, as a result of which the Consul General was always in trouble with both of our Ambassadors [to Jordan and to Israel].

Q: Who was the Consul General at that time [in Jerusalem]?

BIRD: William Hamilton. He'd previously served in Khartoum but was not an Arabist as such. He was near his last assignment abroad. He had, perhaps, one more tour after that. He was a very well-educated, very quiet person. He didn't make a lot of waves. He always had some small problem going, either with the desk back in Washington or with the Ambassador in Tel Aviv.

Q: What was the situation in Jerusalem in the summer of 1956?

BIRD: Well, [John Foster] Dulles was Secretary of State. He'd made a couple of visits to the Middle East by that time, trying to work on the problem of Arab-Israeli relations. A very socialist-oriented Egyptian regime had just made its first agreement with the Soviets to provide arms in the Middle East. As a result, there was a newly-developing relationship between the United States and Israel to "balance" those arms shipments to Egypt. Syria immediately became a client of the "Czechoslovak" arms industry also--which was really the Soviet arms industry. This development was generally viewed as a prelude to war. In fact, I told my wife before I left Washington in May, "I don't think that you're ever going to get to Jerusalem because I expect a war to start even before you can come in late June or early July."

It didn't happen quite that way, but all during the summer of 1956 we were "Cassandras" in a sense. We were all predicting war and were trying to report, I suppose, and do everything that we could do, at whatever level we were operating, somehow to prevent that war from happening. The reason for the war, of course, was the nationalization of the Suez Canal by the Egyptians. In fact, the Eden Government [in the U. K.] and the French Government [under Guy Mollet of the French Socialist Party] were working very closely with the Israelis. We knew this. There was a buildup [of troops and supplies] on Cyprus. By September the level of insults between the Egyptians, on the one hand, and Paris and London, on the other, was pretty high. However, the Egyptians really didn't want a war to happen. They were trying to use the United States to try to prevent that war from happening.

I think that Secretary Dulles, in effect, was "washing his hands" of the whole affair, quite frankly. We had a political reporting officer at the Embassy [in Tel Aviv]. I think that he was probably associated with the CIA. He was Hungarian Jewish in background. He had some very good friends in Israel. He managed to find out the exact date [of the beginning of the Israeli involvement] about a week ahead of time. He sent that date in to Washington. He had to send it on the "back channel" [through the CIA] because the Ambassador didn't believe him. Things like that were happening.

Q: We're talking about Ambassador Wally Barbour, aren't we?

BIRD: Yes. I presume that the warning got through to the Israeli desk and, therefore, to Secretary Dulles. I suppose that there were some efforts to work with London and Paris. What was a surprise was the closeness of the relationship between Tel Aviv and Paris and London on this matter. The Israelis were absolutely overjoyed with this opportunity to try to topple Nasser. We had very close relations with the British Consulate General [in Jerusalem]. A man named Wilson, the Deputy Consul General, was my contact at the British Consulate General. Later on, he became the head of the Foreign Office's Information Division and spokesman for the Foreign Office. He was a very elegant personality and well clued in to what was happening in the [Israeli] Foreign Ministry. They [the British] pulled all of their people, except a few officials like Wilson, out in August or early September, 1956. Then, after three or four weeks--or maybe a little longer--they brought them back [to Jerusalem]. Then everyone thought that the chances of war had diminished. We [in the American Consulate General] never believed that.

We had good reason [not to believe that], in the last 48 hours before the war started, when all the public transportation was disappearing off the streets. [Israel] was mobilizing its reserves. The first news we had of the invasion of the Sinai Desert by Israeli troops was Kol Israel [the official Israeli radio station] announcing on its 10:00 PM news program, "Our forces have reached the Mitla Pass, 70 km within the Sinai" [Desert] area. I was on the Israeli side [of Jerusalem] that night. The next day I went to the other [Jordanian] side. We had access to a [telephone] line through the British Consulate between the two sides. It was the only line across the Mandelbaum Gate. The British had negotiated that in 1948 before they withdrew from Palestine. We could "tap into" that line by calling the British Consulate. The British Consulate on the other side would call our Consulate. Of course, [the phone conversations] were "tapped" [by the Israelis], so there were things that we couldn't say.

The British, of course, were quite surprised at our reaction in 1956, as were the Israelis. It was a real shock to them. You have to wonder if Secretary Dulles simply didn't send the right message to [British Prime Minister] Eden. There have been lots of books and articles written about this, including Dick Parker's recent book ["The Politics of Miscalculation in the Middle East," by Richard Parker], but we don't really know whether Eden was being Machiavellian, though I suspect that that was it. He had decided, just as Don Bergus had a year before, "Well, I guess the only thing left is a nice little war." [In the State Department] they had no intention of doing the needful and preventing a war from happening. I think that that's one of the great failures in American foreign policy in the Middle East.

It is my personal opinion that we could have prevented the 1956 War and could [also] have prevented the 1967 War. I was in [the Embassy in] Cairo in 1967 and in [the Consulate General in] Jerusalem in 1956 and saw the buildup toward war. However, we were not doing all that we could to prevent the war from happening. Why [we didn't do enough to prevent war] will always remain a mystery to me, because our interests were obviously very heavily affected by the closure of the Suez Canal in 1956. In fact, our reaction proved that it was not something that we wanted to happen. Secretary Dulles was a very intelligent person in many ways--in spite of being a lawyer. He let the situation develop to the point of crisis.

Q: Bringing our discussion back from Secretary Dulles to Gene Bird, here you were, straddling Arab and Jewish nations. What did all of you do during the Suez Crisis [of 1956]?

BIRD: I suppose we survived. The first thing we did was to evacuate everyone. We were told to get everyone off the West Bank area that we could. I called in [the heads of] the Mennonite and other missionary groups. There weren't a lot of Americans on the West Bank, but there was a sufficient number for us to have a problem getting them out. I tried to arrange for an aerial evacuation, because we didn't seem to be able to get permission to drive in our cars all the way to Beirut. A lot of people didn't want to leave their cars in Amman, [Jordan]. We made a disastrous attempt to bring in a DC-3 [aircraft], which we managed to lease from Air Jordan. We got about 30 people and all of their luggage out at the airport. At the last moment the Jordanians said that their plane could not fly because there were too many risks involved for an Air Jordan plane in the air. There had been a "shoot down" in 1948 of a plane from Air Jordan, or, rather, the predecessor to Air Jordan. We knew one of the survivors of this crash, the head of the American School for Oriental Research. Here he was, being evacuated on an Air Jordan plane. He survived the 1948 shoot down by a "Yak" [Soviet built] fighter, an Israeli fighter from Russia, which always intrigued me. So evacuation was a major issue.

And then there were demonstrations, which went on for about six months, during which time we kept our people out [of Jordan]. My wife and our two little children, both pre-schoolers and very young, boarded an aircraft, perhaps the morning after the [Israeli] invasion [of Sinai] and got out. It was one of the last aircraft out.

We had a lot of [American] tourists, of course. The tourists didn't see anything happening. It was a very calm period in Jerusalem itself. There were some troops up close to the line, but there was a prohibition written into the armistice agreement on having tanks near the line. Both sides respected that in 1956, unlike in 1967. So we had no incidents. I remember our emergency radio. I was trying to go from the Consulate on one side to the other. I turned the radio on but all I could receive was people talking back and forth in Hebrew. They had the same kind of radios that we did. We had provided [the Israelis] with communications equipment. [When I was on the Israeli desk], I had helped to get that radio equipment [for them] in substitution for jet aircraft. They had very good U. S. Army communications gear, which had been integrated into the Israeli Army. They used it throughout the Suez Crisis.

So we were a kind of lonely group of [temporary] bachelors, sitting there in Jerusalem for almost six months. The rumor mill was always active, saying that it [the prohibition on having our families there] was going to be off next week and so on. But the official description of the policy was that, "We wanted to teach both sides a lesson." I remember the puzzlement of the Egyptian who invited me over, shortly after Secretary Dulles had made a very pro-Egyptian statement of sympathy. I said that we were taking the whole issue to the [UN] Security Council and were trying to get the British and French to pull out [of the Suez Canal area]. Really, Israel was a sideshow in this whole thing, even though she had gone almost all the way to the Suez Canal. Israel had been prevented from going all the way by the British, who told them, "Don't go any farther. You're not to take the Canal. We're going to take it." In fact, the Israeli Army probably could have taken the Canal all the way down [to Suez]. There probably weren't that many Egyptian troops left in the Sinai Desert area.

This didn't happen, so the situation became a matter of arranging for the evacuation of British and French troops [from the Suez Canal area]. We [in the Consulate General in Jerusalem] weren't directly involved with that, except that we were in contact with people like [British Consul General] Wilson and with the French [in Jerusalem] and so on. At the Consulate General we talked a lot [about the situation]. We tried to come up with ideas. One of the ideas we came up with was letting the Israelis keep the Gaza Strip at that point, because Gaza was not an area which the Egyptians had been remarkably good at governing. It would have given the Israelis a reason to return all of the 400,000 [Arab refugees] to within the 1956 borders. Our expression was, "This will break the back of the refugee problem if you bring all of these people back into Israel." Let them go back to Ashkelon and the villages and so forth. We knew the villages had been largely destroyed, but we thought that we could find a way to reintegrate them into Israeli society.

I remember raising this idea at a very low level, just to test it with my contact in the Israeli Foreign Ministry. He looked at me as if I were really mad. It was a new idea to him. He said, "You don't understand anything about Israel, do you?" He meant [to say], "We don't want those people back. We want the land but we don't want them back." He said, "Why don't you take them instead to Brazil?" Years later Assistant Secretary George Allen told me that he had suggested the same thing to Secretary Dulles at the White House during the same period. They had been briefing President Eisenhower. Allen told me that both Dulles brothers were there--Allan Dulles from the CIA and John Foster Dulles from the Department of State. Allan said that maybe it would be a good idea to leave Israel with Gaza. John Foster Dulles went absolutely ballistic and said, "No, that would be rewarding aggression. We can't reward aggression. Forget that idea completely." So this was unacceptable from both sides. It's interesting to look back and see what's happening now.

Q: How was life for you in the Consulate General in Jerusalem? How were your contacts with people on the West Bank of the Jordan and how did they respond to the events of 1956?

BIRD: They were in a state of shock, of course, and then the situation turned into a state of concern about whether Israel intended to take the West Bank. The actual crisis itself only lasted about four or five days before [hostilities stopped], and about three days after the Egyptians lost Port Said. During that period the Mahafiz of Jerusalem, an East Banker who was very close to King Hussein, though not a Palestinian, was in very close touch with the Consulate General and with me, because the Consul General wasn't always in East Jerusalem. So sometimes in the evening I would go over there and talk with the Mahafiz or some of his friends and attend some of his majelis [conversation] meetings. There was constant political talk about Israeli intentions. There was real fear that the Israelis intended to take the West Bank at that time. They feared that it could easily be done and that it would happen. We were watching any buildup of the Jordan Arab Army--the Arab Legion.

I remember sitting with the head of the American Colony Hotel [in East Jerusalem on the Damascus Road] and other people who were quite well known and long term residents of the area. I had also gone down to Jericho and had watched a very long line of [Jordanian] military vehicles which had come down the very road which Yasser Arafat is now trying to get control of. My friend, British Deputy Consul General Wilson, was also with me. We watched through binoculars to see whether they were going to turn up toward Jerusalem, which would be an indication of war, or turn and go across the [Allenby] Bridge and go back into Jordan. In fact, they turned and went across the bridge and into the main part of Jordan.

It was a strange time as far as our relations with the West Bank are concerned. Our Deputy Consul General had completed his tour [of duty in Jerusalem] and left. Andrew Killgore, the new Deputy Consul General, had not yet arrived, so I was more or less left alone. I roamed up and down the West Bank of the Jordan. There wasn't a lot of consular work to do. I ran the office. By then we had a couple of CIA types on the West Bank, working under the cover of the Consulate General. We were trying to report on what was happening in terms of the relationship between the West Bank and Jordan, because there wasn't much of a relationship between the West Bankers and Israel. The only place that they ever met was at the meetings of the Israel-Jordan Mixed Armistice Commission, or the IMAC, as they called it. That was just a few hundred feet from the Consulate office [in East Jerusalem]. I used to go over and talk with the Norwegian [UN officer] who was there at the time. We had very close relations with the UN. They had a very high level UN civil servant, a Frenchman. His efforts were to keep the two parties from militarizing the area close to the line of demarcation and keep the peace as well as he could. The effect that the UN had in terms of creating the conditions for peace were pretty minimal, in reality. This UN civil servant had a deputy, always a U. S. military officer, a colonel or lieutenant colonel, usually a Marine Corps officer. We became very close friends with him--his name was Barney. He was there during the Suez crisis in 1956.

Those military people in the UNTSO [UN Truce Supervision Office] really had more insight because they were operating on the Syrian front, and on the Egyptian front, too, through Gaza. And then, of course, there were the representatives of the UNRWA [UN Relief and Works Administration]. Henry Labouisse was ahead of UNRWA by that time.

Q: Henry Labouisse was former [U. S.] Ambassador to Greece, a professional Foreign Service Officer.

BIRD: A very fine person. I'd seen him just before I went out [to Jerusalem] at the annual pledge giving session at the UN Security Council in New York. What struck me then, of course, was that the Arabs, who had lots of money--Saudi Arabia and others--were still trying to push the problem of the Palestinian refugees back on the West as much as possible because they didn't want to take responsibility by giving substantial amounts of money to UNRWA. In reality, they never did [give much support to UNRWA]. At that point [1956] we were giving 28 cents per refugee per year, an incredibly small amount. The same thing is true now with the Palestine funds. They're trying to get together our contribution, which is going to be relatively minor in comparison to what we give to Israel every year.

Q: What was your impression of Jordanian officials and the Jordanian Government at this time? What did we think of their rule over the West Bank?

BIRD: We heard from Palestinians that they didn't like the "little King" [King Hussein]. I knew the widow of a Husseini who had been executed for participation in the plot to assassinate King Abdullah [King Hussein's grandfather]. He was known as "the East German spy." I don't think that he had any relationship with the Communists at all, but, of course, in those days anybody from East Germany was very suspect. He was originally from East Germany. I never knew him, of course. He had been executed three years or so before. She was still there, very much accepted in Arab society, which was surprising. She eventually married a United Nations official but, of course, she had been very much a part of the strained relations between the West Bankers and King Hussein.

When we were there, King Hussein made his first, official visit to the West Bank since his accession to the throne. I remember my little son standing, along with thousands of other kids, on the road from Kalandria Airport, waving a Jordanian flag. The Jordanians had pretty effective control, of course, but the attitudes expressed by the Palestinians were very derisive. Shortly after we got there, the first, free election in Jordan's history was held. It went pretty well but it went pretty much against the king on the West Bank. I remember Sari Nusseibeh, who is now involved in the peace process at the present time. His father, Anwar, was running for the Jordanian Parliament. He received 1,400 votes from the West Bank. But I think that that was partly because he was identified as an Anglican, as a very Anglicized person. He had gone to college in Britain, was a very elegant personality, and later became Minister of Defense under King Hussein. I must say that relationships between the King and West Bankers were not good. I stood for two hours on the pavement waiting for the King to fly his own plane in, which he did. I still have some pictures from that period. All of the correct things were done for the King, but there were lots and lots of comments in the crowd while we were waiting, which we could overhear. They were saying something like, "He isn't my king"--that sort of thing.

Q: What about your relationships with the Israelis in Jerusalem after the United States came down rather heavily and stopped the fighting in 1956? What happened to you?

BIRD: My contact in the Foreign Ministry of Israel and I met almost every other day during this period. We had breakfast or lunch and sometimes met later. We talked a lot. I think that at one point--it was probably one day after the war started--I speculated that the Russians might threaten something in the way of retaliation. After all, it was "their" army that was being defeated. I speculated that perhaps they would threaten to fire their missiles. And sure enough that night, the Russians did threaten to fire missiles. He called me the next morning and said, "You must have had information." Of course, I didn't have any such thing. It was pure speculation. I think that the Israelis were quite astonished at the extent of the political defeat that they had suffered from this. It took them a good many years to come back from it. It wasn't until 1967, in fact. I think that the "old man," [David] Ben Gurion, probably expected a severe reaction, but all the signals had been strangely absent that we would be terribly displeased.

Q: The British, of course, who were so much closer to us than anybody else, at least at Prime Minister Eden's level, were astounded at what happened.

BIRD: They had come up against a Puritan Secretary of State.

Q: Well, it wasn't so much a Puritan Secretary of State. There was also President Eisenhower, who obviously was calling the shots.

BIRD: That always intrigued me. Why did he do this? I've asked [Ambassador] Dick Parker about this and so on. But if the [U. S.] really intended to come down on the side of Nasser, why didn't we do something to prevent [the British action], because this was the way it was viewed--coming down on the side of Nasser? Of course, I realize that it wasn't viewed by President Eisenhower that way.

Q: It just may be that some people in Washington think in long range terms. Then, all of a sudden we get to the point where somebody [in the White House] essentially says, "No, this is wrong." [We often tend to be] fairly passive until a certain point where we say, "To hell with this!"

BIRD: I think that, in spite of everything, we were probably a little surprised at the Consulate General [in Jerusalem] at the extent of the cooperation between Israel and the Paris-London axis. However, I wonder if we could have prevented that war. This always intrigues me. It seems to me that we could have used our "clout" to have prevented it.

Q: At this time you were sort of a new boy on the block [in Jerusalem]. Did you get any feel of what the views of the Arabists were? I mean our Foreign Service Officers who were specialists in the area.

BIRD: I got to know some of the Arabists because they had come on their annual tour from [the language school] in Beirut. There must have been about 20 of them in training at that time. I was the "control officer" for their visit [to Jerusalem]. I set up their meeting with [Prime Minister] Ben Gurion on the Israeli side and with the Mahafiz on the Jordanian side of the city. We traveled around Israel with them. Really, it was the first opportunity I had had to see a lot of things in Israel, and I accompanied them down to the Embassy [in Tel Aviv], too. I remember only one, remarkable meeting. That was with Prime Minister [David] Ben Gurion. The "guru" or one of the "gurus" of the Arabists was Edwin Wright, who came along with them. It was the first time I had met him--well, maybe I met him back here in Washington. It's possible. He was not a person that I knew well, if I knew him at all in the period before 1956. A number of the really well known State Department Arabists were there. Dick Parker wasn't there--he was already in Amman in the Political Section. But Andrew Killgore was there, as were Bill Crawford and Lucien Kinsolving, among others. I met all of these people for the first time.

We went up to the Knesset [Parliament]--the old building--and we were ushered into a kind of amphitheater, probably the place where the Knesset met at that time. I don't recall that it was all of that large. We were seated in the bottom row of seats. The old man, Ben Gurion, came in, a remarkable looking person--someone that you wouldn't forget. And that's part of the story. He sat there and gave us a description of the 1956 War and where they were. This was perhaps six months after that war. He took questions. Ed Wright finally put up his hand. Ben Gurion recognized him. Ed started to ask a question, but Ben Gurion interrupted him. He said, "I know you. We've met before, haven't we?" Before we went in, Ed Wright said that this was his first opportunity to meet the Prime Minister. Ed was very flustered, but he said, "I don't believe so, Mr. Prime Minister." Ben Gurion replied, "Yes, in fact, it was in the fall of 1943, on the lower level of the old State Department building" (now the West Executive Building) "in one of the corridors there, on the second floor, as I recall." Ben Gurion was very exact. He had obviously been carefully briefed or had an excellent memory, one or the other. Ben Gurion continued: "I led a delegation of people interested in getting Jews out of the [concentration] camps and out of Germany and, perhaps, bombing the camps. I made the representations to you." Ed Wright looked at him for a moment and he said, "Yes, I remember the delegation." He had forgotten that Ben Gurion was a part of that delegation.

We all shook our heads afterwards. It was a simple thing. Any assistant could have looked at the [list of visitors] and seen the name of Ed Wright, known who Ed Wright was, and mentioned it to Ben Gurion. But I still don't know, to this day, whether Ben Gurion was told that Ed Wright was there or whether his memory was really that impressive. He was very impressive. We talked about his retirement--what he wanted to do, to retire to the Negev Desert, to Stabokur. I guess that this meeting with Ben Gurion was one of the most memorable things that happened during this period. I would go to the Knesset from time to time but, of course, I didn't speak Hebrew, so there wasn't a lot of point to sitting there and listening to the flavor of the discussions.

The flavor of the debates hasn't changed. I was there in May, 1993. They still shout at each other in a way I have not seen in any other parliament except in Lebanon. They absolutely are the most aggressive group of people that I have ever seen in a parliamentary situation--maybe a little like the early sessions of the U. S. Senate when they used to have fistfights on the floor of the Senate. [Laughter]

Q: Well, there you were, the new boy on the block, looking at both of these worlds. The Arab world on the West Bank was somewhat artificial, but it was a new nation. Israel [was] on the other side. What were your impressions of these two worlds, at that time?

BIRD: As you recall, I'd had a lot of briefing experience for 18 months before [going to Jerusalem] and I'd read everything I could get my hands on in the early and mid 1950's that had been sent in from all of the posts in Israel. We had a post in Haifa at that time, in addition to Tel Aviv [and Jerusalem]. So my impressions were probably skewed to some extent by the reports which I had read. There were reports like the story told by a friend of mine, who was DCM in Amman, who decided that he should visit Israel. He came down near Tulkarm on the Israeli side of the line. The [Israelis] took him to see an Israeli orchard, [an orange grove on], a Kibbutz [collective farm]. It was a very impressive, beautiful orchard. At one point he put all of this in a report. I went to visit that orange grove afterward, just because I wanted to see it, after reading this impressive report by Paul Garron. Paul said that the Israeli Foreign Ministry guide said to him, "Have you ever seen such a marvelous orange grove? Did you have any idea that we have things like this?" Garron, who had been in Amman for two or three years and had visited the West bank in his travels, replied--and this was the ultimate "put down"--"Yes, as a matter of fact, I viewed this [orange grove] from the other side of the line. I was shown it by the man who planted these trees."

I think that, in some respects, you get a reputation with each side, and you have to watch the kind of reputation you get with the Israelis, because they have a long memory about such things. Andy Killgore has told me that since he left Jerusalem, he has been reminded [by the Israelis] of things he had said or reports he had sent in and so on and so forth. You get very sensitive to the fact that anything you say may be used against you.

I went from this orange grove up across on the other side to Tulkarm and stayed in and around that city for a couple of nights. It had lost most of its land to the Israelis and was sitting there on a rocky hillside. I talked with some of the people there. Then, on that same trip, I went to Kibbya because there had been a series of reports while I was on the Israel desk back here in Washington on the "Kibbya Incident," which Sharik Aron had inspired.

Q: Yes, when he was a captain in the Israeli Army, I think.

BIRD: Yes. I think that it happened in 1953, but it may have been 1952. I don't know.

Q: Would you explain what it was?

BIRD: Yes. There had been an incident in those orange groves, in which a couple of Israeli workers, one of them a woman, had been killed. The retaliation policy was in force in Israel. I could tell you about the retaliation policy in great deal, in terms of [how it originated], but I won't. [After the incident] the Israelis sent in a platoon. They decided that the tracks led near to the village of Kibbya. So they went across the line at night and surrounded the entire village. Sharon later said that he had gone to sleep after they captured the village--he'd taken a nap. In fact, that probably isn't at all true. What the Israelis did was to have sappers [Army engineers] wire the houses--they knew that people were inside these old stone houses. You blow one wall down, and the whole thing comes down. They blew up a number of houses, killed 85 people there, and wounded a lot more. Almost all of them were civilians. It was a severe act of retaliation for those two Israelis who died. Things haven't changed very much. They did the same thing--are doing the same thing--in southern Lebanon today.

Q: Shatila and Sabra [Palestinian refugee camps just South of Beirut]?

BIRD: The [key factor] is that the policy of retaliation [is still in effect], and Sharon is still a major factor in Israeli politics. He was "out" for three years, until 1956. When the 1956 crisis came along, they "rejuvenated" him--brought him back. He'd been forced out of the Army after the investigation of the Kibbya affair. Somebody had to be blamed. But, in fact, it wasn't Sharon. It was the policy of retaliation.

Q: "An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth"?

BIRD: Well, yes, in many respects. So I used my background to go to places like Nablus and to talk with the Mayor there, Hikman Masri. He introduced me to a real Arab city, the first Arab city I had known, because Jerusalem--even in those days--was not really that Arab. It was a much more sophisticated place. I enjoyed the contact with village life.

I did this on the Israeli side, too. I would visit kibbutzim [plural of kibbutz, or collective farms]. I remember the Jerusalem Corridor [from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem]. A friend of mine has just written a book about that same area. I remember going into the Jerusalem Corridor and being shown by a young man from Hebrew University the real defense works that the kibbutzim had. They had 6" guns. These were big ones, I might say, speaking as a naval gunner, hidden in the orange groves, even back in caves. They were pointing directly at Abu Musa, which was one of the Arab villages across on the other side. They were really prepared as, probably, they should have been, for almost anything. The people were a little bit afraid that an American vice-consul really shouldn't be in such a situation, because it revealed too many Israeli military secrets.

One of the things that I did because of my relationship with some of our military people out there--and I was still a reserve officer in Navy intelligence at that time--was talk a lot with them about their contacts with the Israeli military. I remember reporting some of this--how difficult their relations were and how they couldn't find out anything from the Israeli military. While I was there, our military were still in shock from the fact that the American Ambassador's office had been "bugged" with the wooden eagle, a big, carved American eagle. They [the Embassy general services officer] had taken it down and sent it out for touching up. When it came back after five or six months, they discovered that all of the Ambassador's conversations could be heard on a certain frequency outside. The [Israelis] had installed a sound-powered transmitter inside the eagle. This became one of the famous stories back [in Washington] when new employees were briefed on how careful they should be and on the security needs of the Embassy in Course 101 [at the Foreign Service Institute].

I remember my Consul General at that time being very, very concerned about security on both sides of the line. Every couple of weeks we carried the diplomatic pouch from Amman to Tel Aviv, across the line. Somebody would bring it [to Jerusalem] from Amman and then we would carry it up to Tel Aviv. [I remember] how careful we had to be. We usually had two people accompany us just so that one side or the other, the Jordanians or the Israelis, wouldn't try to set up an "accident" and seize the pouch. Not that there was a lot in it, but I think that, in any case, you learn these security concerns as the result of being in a potentially "Berlin type" situation--a divided city where you'd say good night to someone on one side, perhaps an Israeli. And they would send "greetings" to Mohammed on the other side. The situation was very, very weird. It was something you don't forget very easily.

Q: Of these two worlds, were you making any professional judgment about what you wanted to do about them?

BIRD: I think that I went out there with the reputation of being very, very pro-Israeli, or at least "tilted" in that direction. As one of my Israeli friends said to me, after I'd lived on the Israeli side for a while and then moved to the other side, because that's where my office was, "You know, we cannot seem to keep people satisfied with Israeli society, once they see it." He said, "I don't know why it is. We've got to do a better job out there." I think that, overall, I ended up by the end of two years with a desire to stand back and try to remind both sides how necessary it was for them to make some sort of peace there and share that land.

We could see that the U. S. had suffered a good deal from the 1956 War. It had threatened our relations [with Britain, France, and Israel]. It had happened when the Hungarian Revolution was going on. Some people say that we didn't take the kind of action we could have taken because of [the 1956 War in the Middle East]. The Middle East is a conundrum for almost all of our policymakers. I can see the same pattern developing now. The alarm bells ring, and the Secretary is expected to rush out there. By the time I left Jerusalem I sometimes felt that the most important thing was, perhaps, to stand back and remind [both sides] of their responsibilities to themselves. I didn't become "pro-Arab." I just became a lot less "pro-Israeli."

Q: How did you find just accompanying this group of [Foreign Service Officers] studying Arabic? Particularly when they were going around Israel, what kind of comments did they make and what were their reactions?

BIRD: I came away from that experience of spending a week with those officers, who were not that much older than I but were more experienced and were specialists in Arabic, with the feeling that I had never heard so many derisive comments about the Arab society that they were supposed to report on. The officers were all male, of course [at that time]. Their remarks tended to be derisive of Arab society and not of Israeli society alone, by any means, though there was that, too. Certainly, they couldn't be viewed as so committed to promoting Arab policies, countries, and culture that they couldn't see the U. S. interests involved. I know that that isn't the common view [of U. S. Arabists], but they reflected an opinion contrary to the view that those who have become intrigued with Arab culture are its defenders. I go back to my [Israeli] friend's comment that all of the United Nations people, after first living in Israel, move across the line and feel more comfortable when they live in an Arab culture. Frankly, I think that it's partly that they had much better housing and living conditions. Also, it is somewhat overwhelming to try and live in a society of people that consider themselves somewhat exclusive and definitely "chosen" in the sense of religion [as do the Jews].

We enjoyed the contrast between the two societies. You know, over the years we've gone back many times to Jerusalem. The feeling I have is that the division is still there. It's just as if the Mandelbaum Gate had never been taken down. Socially, there is almost no real, relaxed contact between the two sides. I think that attempts by the Consulate General since 1967 to bring both parties together have largely failed. There have been "peace parties" on both sides. We managed to [establish contact] with Hanan Ashrawi and Naomi Chosan, one of the Israeli women members of the Knesset. They were once very close to each other. However, when I was talking with Naomi Chosan about this [relationship] not too long ago, she said, "You know, I haven't seen my friend Hanan for a long time now." So the relationship [between Arabs and Jews] is still very, very distant, even among people like that.

HARRIET CURRY
Secretary to the Ambassador
Tel Aviv (1956-1958)

Ms. Curry was born in Annapolis, Maryland, daughter of a Marine Corp family. She was raised at military posts throughout the United States. She was educated at The George Washington University, after which she worked with a number of non-governmental organizations. After joining the State Department she served as Secretary and Assistant to United States Ambassadors in Brazil, Senegal, Israel, Jamaica, Ireland, Hungary, Austria, Syria and Pakistan. She also had several assignments in Washington.

CURRY: I enjoyed the post, and it was one way to get overseas, which is what I wanted. My first post was Tel Aviv.

Q: Where?

CURRY: Tel Aviv, at a very interesting time.

Q: You were in Tel Aviv from when to when?

CURRY: 1956 to 1958. I was wrong about the dates that I got started looking for a job in the Foreign Service. I said 1952, but from 1951 to 1956, I worked for the World Bank. I worked for the World Bank for five years. I enjoyed Tel Aviv except during the fall, when the Israelis went into Egypt.

Q: This is the Suez crisis?

CURRY: The first one, yes. The first time the Israelis went into Egypt. When I later visited friends in Cairo, they referred to it as the "Israeli incursion". The Israelis were talking about it as the "Israeli campaign". During that time, for about seven months, everybody in the AID program except a few officers and me were evacuated. I thought of transferring directly from there, in Tel Aviv, to the embassy, to see if I could work for the State Department, but it wasn't possible. But, it put the bug in my ear. After I left, after two years in Tel Aviv, again I saw that same personnel officer. A transfer was arranged, eventually, after nine months in Washington, in the Department.

Q: Well, let's talk a little about Tel Aviv. While you were there, you must have gotten involved, through acquaintances and all, in the state, with the Israelis essentially under siege, and all that?

CURRY: Yes. It was a very interesting place to be. I had some Israeli friends, but mostly embassy friends, particularly during the seven months, when the AID operation was suspended. I went to fascinating places, historically, such as Nazareth. We couldn't get to Jerusalem often, but you could go there, with permission. I picked up old coins that were on the beach surface. I learned a little bit more about the Bible being real.

JOSEPH WALTER NEUBERT
Tel Aviv (1956-1958)

Mr. Neubert was born in Montana. He attended Yale University and served in the US Army in World War II. Entering the Foreign Service in 1947, Mr. Neubert served as Political and Economic Officer in Yugoslavia and Tunisia. Following Russian language studies at the Foreign Service Institute in Washington, Mr. Neubert was posted to Moscow, Soviet Union, where he served as Political and General Services Officer. From Moscow he was assigned to Tel Aviv as Political Officer, where he served during the 1957 Arab-Israeli War. This Oral History is a self interview, done in 2007.

NEUBERT: After departure from Moscow and some months of further Russian language training in Germany, I ended up in June 1956 in Tel Aviv as a member of the political section. Why the Russian language training seemed useful was never terribly clear. Everyone in Israel (or almost everyone) spoke English. Besides, the native language of the East European Israelis (like Ben-Gurion) was usually Polish. Oh, well.

It was clear that relations between Israel and its Arab neighbors were tense. There were constant alarms and border raids. I remember one night in early October, I awakened to shuddering windowpanes. I said to my wife, "That sounds exactly like outgoing 105 howitzer shells (I was in the armored artillery (105) during the war). And so it was. The Israelis had, that evening, taken out a Jordanian border point some eight kilometers (5 miles) east of us. Since we were on the seashore, one can see how constricted Israeli territory was.

From there on things got more tense. And on October 29, we heard on Kol Israel (the voice of Israel) an announcement that Israeli paratroopers had dropped into the Sinai desert to seize the passes leading to the Suez Canal.

There is no reason why I should repeat the history of the war. As far as the Americans at the Embassy were concerned, our life was directed by the Department of State--or perhaps just John Foster Dulles -- who immediately took charge.

Anyway, we were told to evacuate all "non-essential" Americans. I put myself first in line, but to no avail. The way it worked out, all dependents were ordered out, as well as all AID personnel. And many Embassy personnel -- but not me.

First of all, I was told to accompany the Embassy dependents (including my wife) to Haifa and see them off on a Greek ship to Piraeus. Then I was told to supervise the departure of all other American citizens from Haifa. Well. There were a lot of them. And we were supposed to load them on destroyers the U.S. Navy would bring in to Haifa.

So the next day we documented many American tourists and waited for the ships. We were, of course, down on the docks and, once in a while, the air raid alarms would go off, and we all awaited apprehensively the arrival of the vaunted Egyptian Air Force. Happily, it never arrived.

About four P.M. the first (and last) American destroyer showed up over the horizon, zigzagging at flank speed. He sped in and tied up. We quickly loaded him with hundreds of tourists bound for Cyprus, whether they knew it or not.

I was having coffee with the captain when an argument arose on the deck. It seemed that a dozen or so conservative Orthodox Jews had discovered there was no kosher kitchen on board. They insisted on remaining in Israel. So they did.

After this I asked the captain what his plans were (his anti-aircraft guns were fully manned and weaving about). He said he had no confidence in anyone's submarines and that when he left, it would be zigzag at flank speed.

And so it was. He must have been doing 25 knots when he left the breakwater -- at dusk -- and he rapidly vanished. I pitied his passengers.

No more American ships came. But that wasn't the end of the evening. Shortly thereafter, the word was spread that an Egyptian destroyer was approaching Haifa. Those of us sitting on hillside terraces leaned back to enjoy the fun and our drinks. Fun soon came. First a half dozen motor torpedo or motor gun boats (Israeli) cranked up and vanished in frothing wakes. Then, a half-dozen vintage British-made Meteor jets went out at Wave-top height. Then -- believe this -- a French destroyer anchored in the harbor, with lights on and flag flying, opened fire to seaward. He obviously outranged the Egyptian by miles -- whether he hit the Egyptian is another question. Anyway, the Egyptian (a former light British destroyer) gave up and was towed into harbor -- and presumably is still a (minor) part of the Israeli navy.

With the usual Israeli victory in such wars, the problem retreated to the political level. In this particular case (French and British involvement in the Canal bit aside) what was involved was trying to persuade the Israelis to get out of the Sinai and the Gaza Strip. So the Ambassador was told by John Foster Dulles to go up to Jerusalem to talk to Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion and Foreign Minister Golda Meir on this subject. As it turned out, I was his note-taker. So we traveled a good deal. In, incidentally, an antique Cadillac, that could barely make the trip. And, shades of modern terrorism, the chauffeur had a Tommy-gun on the seat beside him. Since the chauffeur was also responsible for maintaining the Cadillac, I had little confidence in the "shootability" of the Thompson gun.

Meetings with Ben-Gurion and Meir were a delight. They were both wonderful people. They never said anything that didn't make sense -- more sense, in my view, than Dulles had to offer. Basically, they took the position that they had to have Egyptian guarantees of the existence of Israel before they gave up the Sinai and (secondarily) the Gaza Strip. A view with which I (personally) fully agreed. Whether when Israel agreed to leave without overt guarantees there had been any private assurances from Dulles, I do not know. Certainly not through the Embassy in Tel Aviv.

As I have observed earlier, languages are not easy for me. Ben-Gurion used to kid me about this. He would ask me how much Hebrew I had learned since we last met. I would say “none” or, perhaps, “shalom.” He would then throw up his arms and say, “If I can learn Greek at age 70 to read the classics in the original, you can learn Hebrew at age 34.” I usually replied that, since all his 16 ministers spoke English, it wasn’t necessary to speak Hebrew. (Actually, all his ministers were born, as he was, in Eastern Europe.)

Once, when Ben-Gurion and I were alone in his office-incidentally, a fascinating place -- I asked him if he was “religious,” particularly since he had been contributing to a “national” press debate about the eternal question of “what is a Jew?”

I said I really didn’t understand the question or the answers. Nor his answer. Nothing loath, I asked him if he was “religious.” He meditated a moment or two and then said, “I cannot be. I am a Marxist. Not, you understand, a Communist. But a socialist, a Marxist. I cannot believe in God.” I said I could understand that since I too did not believe in God. But why, then, did he talk so much about the nature of the Jew and why did he accept the political support of the conservative Jewish parties. He grinned and said the latter was a domestic political question -- he needed them -- and the former was an international question -- he needed money from international -- and, particularly, American Jewry if Israel were to survive.

I then asked him when he had last been in a synagogue. He said, “Oh, a week or so ago.” I said, “For religious reasons?” He shook his head. “For political reasons, of course.” I pursued the question, “Have you in recent years been in a synagogue for religious reasons?” He again shook his head. “Never.”

Ben-Gurion’s views on religion were surprising to me only in that he expressed them so bluntly. The Israeli newspapermen I knew in Tel Aviv agreed on practically nothing except the lack of religious belief amongst the Israeli Jewish population. They commonly asserted that at least 85% of Jews in Israel were non-believers. This, of course, vastly complicated the eternally debated question of “What is a Jew?”

In the summer of 1957, Senator Hubert Humphrey visited Israel. I was his escort officer from the Embassy. We wandered all over this rather small country -- from Galilee to the Sinai. Finally, we flew, in an Israeli Air Force C-47 to Eilat, on the Gulf of Tiran (or Eilat), then the southern most point in Israel. We visited the mines of Solomon and generally disported ourselves like tourists. Then we headed back to Tel Aviv. We flew low over the desert while experts told us how the ancient inhabitants had lived on irrigated terraces (still visible). Then, abruptly, the weather changed and we encountered a sandstorm. The aircraft was thrown about violently. Dwayne Andreas, a friend of the Senator’s and I were sitting opposite him in aluminum bucket seats when a sudden jolt threw us up and down. Our seat became unhooked and Andreas and I were “stabbed” by the seat hooks. Andreas was more severely hurt -- in the back. I had just been hooked in the right buttock. But, whatever, there was a lot of blood all over and, of course, medical care when we got back to Lod airport. I still vividly remember that Humphrey gave us a party to remember when we collected, walking wounded and all, in his hotel room at the Dan. A wonderful man.

ALFRED H. MOSES
Lawyer, Covington & Burling
Washington, DC (1956-1980)

Ambassador Moses was born and raised in Baltimore, Maryland. He was educated at Dartmouth College, Princeton University and the Georgetown University Law School. After service in the US Navy, Mr. Moses joined the Washington, D.C. Law firm Covington and Burling, where he dealt with matters concerning Middle East and Romanian Affairs. Prior to being named Ambassador to Romania in 1994, Mr. Moses served as Special Counsel to President Carter. He subsequently became Special Presidential Envoy for the Cyprus Conflict. Ambassador Moses was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: I was wondering, going up to the 60's and 50's, what about Jewish issues, and this would move into Israel and all that?

MOSES: Well, the springboard for everything I have done in the international field was my organizational affiliation in the Jewish community. I was chair of the Washington chapter of the American Jewish Committee in the late 60's. I was in my 30's. The national president was Arthur Goldberg. I used that as a springboard to become increasingly involved in Middle East affairs, Israel-related issues, and refugee issues. That is what got me to Romania. That is how I became ambassador to Romania two decades later. I also chaired the committee on behalf of the organized Jewish community that negotiated with the Business Roundtable on the law passed by the Congress making it illegal for Americans to participate in the boycott of Israel. I testified in the House and Senate. As I said, I chaired the negotiating committee on behalf of the organized Jewish community. There were three of us: Max Kampelman who later was Counselor at the Department of State, and Paul Berger, a Washington lawyer. Max was our leader.

Q: Well during this time as you were involved with Jewish organizations, did you see a change or a split or something between, you know at one point I think almost everybody in the United States thought Israel was great and all this, and the Palestinians were sort of a peripheral group and all. It took quite awhile before all of a sudden the realization came that there was something else. They were also people with aspirations.

MOSES: It is more complicated than that if you will permit me. Early on, Israel was not held in high regard in this country. The government was thought to be socialist, and it was. The country was thought to be largely non-religious, and it was, and its mere existence was considered by the foreign policy establishment to be contrary to our interests. Truman's decision to recognize Israel, which historians can argue about, I would like to think was taken for humanitarian reasons, not political reasons. Goodness knows, at one time or another he stuck his thumb in the eyes of everybody in this country including organized labor. He went to the Hill to draft the railroad workers into the army. He took on John L. Lewis; he took on virtually everyone. He was a feisty guy. He made the decision largely because six million Jews had been killed in the Holocaust, and he believed Jews deserved a country of their own. As you know, once he made a decision there was no looking back. The relationship between Israel and the Truman Administration in the ensuing four years was not close. Truman recognized Israel's independence, de facto in '48; he was in office until January of '53. During that period the prime minister of Israel never visited the White House. This coolness continued under Eisenhower, particularly with the Suez War. The British and French, together with Israel, clobbered Egypt. Eisenhower ordered the Israelis to pull out of the Sinai in February of '56. The issue in those days was not the Palestinians; it was more the Arab world, our friendship with the Saudis and others. People in Washington had a real chip on their shoulder regarding Israel. The State Department crowd was very frosty towards Israel. I remember former Assistant Secretary of State Lucius Battle telling me in '82 when Israel invaded Lebanon, "Tell your soldiers to get out of there." "OK, Luke, what do I tell, the Marines, the U.S. Army, the U.S. Navy?" He said, "No, you tell your Israeli soldiers." I said, "Luke, you are confused. I am American." I think he was anti-Semitic.

Q: What about the Carter administration came in from the election of '76 but came in in '77. Did that engage you?

MOSES: Yes. I chaired the negotiations with the Business Roundtable on the anti-Arab Boycott legislation on behalf of a broad coalition of Jewish organizations and was at the White House frequently garnering support for the agreement we struck with the Business Roundtable. Commerce and State were opposed; they were still operating under the Ford Administration's script.

Q: This is on what issue now?

MOSES: The legislation countering the Arab Boycott of Israel, the secondary and tertiary boycotts that applied to any company that did business with Israel or that did business with a company that did business with Israel. An office of the Arab League sent questionnaires to companies doing business primarily in Saudi Arabia. The legislation made it illegal for an American company to respond to that questionnaire.

Q: Well this was done by the Arab league.

MOSES: Correct.

Q: I remember I was amused. This goes quite a ways back. I was in Dhahran as a vice counsel and found out that IBM had a, this is the days of card sorting, not computers, and had a card sorting outfit, a small one in Israel. So they were going to boycott IBM. The Egyptians said, "Wait a minute. Our entire military mobilization scheme is based on the IBM cards. We can't do this." Did it seem to be an effective boycott or not?

MOSES: It is hard to say. It certainly discouraged doing business with Israel and investing in Israel, even doing business with companies that did business in Israel, depending on the company's clout. They didn't want to take on an IBM, but smaller businesses, sure. I testified at the Congressional hearings in the House and Senate. So did a spokesman for Dresser Industries who said, "We don't comply with the boycott, but we think it is bad legislation because the Saudis will react negatively, and hurt U.S. businesses." "All business-related legislation," Senator Sarbanes replied, "has some impact on business, starting with the Social Security Act. Moreover, if you are not complying with the boycott, what difference does it make to Dresser?" Dresser's spokesman did not answer. Not all businesses were opposed. General Mills supported the legislation solely as a matter of principle; they thought the boycott was wrong. I immediately went out and bought General Mills stock.

Q: What was your impression of the whole Camp David negotiations?

MOSES: It was a bit surreal. For 13 days Sadat and Begin did not talk to each other except the first day and the last. Carter did the shuttling. Saunders did most of the drafting. He came out with a marvelous document. I later met with Sadat in 1980 in his home in Mit Abul Kom in the Nile delta. His only regret was that, in his words, Begin did not have the courage to go on with the Palestinian part of the Accords. The Camp David Accords had two parts. One, Egyptian-Israeli, the other Palestinian-Israeli, that called for Palestinian autonomy. Begin signed the document that recognized "the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people." He went quite far. It did not call for an independent Palestinian state as our policy is today, but it was the first recognition by Israel of the political right of the Palestinians to govern themselves. Sadat was the most impressive public figure I ever met. He was a true visionary and a strategic thinker. It was he, not Kissinger, who orchestrated the disengagement agreements in the Sinai preceding his visit to Jerusalem in November 1977. Two weeks after Sadat was assassinated, I visited Cairo to meet with Hosni Mubarak, Sadat's successor. Mubarak reaffirmed Egypt's commitment to carry out the terms of the Egyptian-Israeli Peace Treaty, which was important in itself, but in other respects he seemed wooden, lacking Sadat's forcefulness and charisma. From Cairo I went to Jerusalem to meet with Prime Minister Begin who talked at length about Sadat's funeral. The funeral was on a Saturday and, in order to observe the Sabbath, Begin arrived Friday afternoon. He stayed in what he termed "Egyptian army barracks." Lowering his eyes and wrinkling his nose, he said they were "filthy." He then proceeded to recount his walking in the funeral procession and having Sadat's son came up, kiss him on both cheeks and tell him, "I consider you my father." A week or two later I was talking with President Carter who also attended the funeral. He told me what moved him most was when Sadat's son came up to him, kissed him on both cheeks and told him, "I consider you my father." How many fathers can one person have?

Q: Of course at that time we still had sort of the Palestinians with Arafat. They were very difficult.

MOSES: Indeed they were. Arafat had been kicked out of Jordan. He went to Lebanon where he remained until '82, when the U.S. took him by ship to Tunisia. The issue then as now is whether the Israelis should have stayed in the territories occupied in the Six Day War. Following the war, there was a major debate within the Israeli government. Some wanted to withdraw immediately in return for an end to the conflict. But Arafat and the Arab World could not accept the humiliating defeat of the '67 War. A few months later, in Khartoum, they came up with the three “No’s” -- No negotiation, No peace, No recognition. That killed it until today. Had the Arabs been willing to negotiate and recognize Israel, the Israelis would have withdrawn in ’67.

Q: Unfortunately that whole very sad situation is full of lost opportunities.

MOSES: Lost opportunities, but the Israelis were responsible too, including Sharon. He pushed the settlements. He was the major architect of the settlement policy. The Labor government was much more circumspect. Initially, Labor called for settlements along the Jordan River and in the Jordan Valley, but not elsewhere. Sharon supported the illegal settlements that in time became legal. I think his disengagement plan today for Gaza is the wrong approach. What he should do is dismantle the illegal settlements on the West Bank. Forget about Gaza until there is formal agreement. Israel needs to be a country of law and order. The settlers in Gaza are there legally. The government put them there.

Q: Well, did you in again dealing with the Jewish community, with the Israelis particularly Begin and company help at all or had Camp David sort of been there, done that.

MOSES: No, again it was much more complex.

MOSES: The Israeli ambassador to the United States was Ephraim Evron. He was very clever. He had established a good relationship with Lyndon Johnson years before when he was serving in the Israeli embassy. Eppie worked well with the Carter administration, particularly with Vice President Mondale and Bob Strauss. Truth be known, he brought Shimon Peres, then leader of the opposition, to the White House to meet with Carter. Begin was upset. Eppie was close to the Labor Party, not officially, but in terms of his private preference. A few weeks later I flew with Begin and Eppie to New York. I understand Hebrew. Begin accused Eppie of bringing Peres to meet Carter. Eppie denied it, claiming he had nothing to do with the visit. It was all done on the initiative of the White House, he said. I got a lesson on how people deal with heads of government. He was very nimble politically. In the last two days of the campaign, Ezer Weisman who had been Minister of Defense in the first Begin Government and a hero of the Six Days War came to the United States and campaigned for Carter. It didn’t do Carter any good. The political right in Israel was strongly pro-Reagan. So, too, were some Jewish intellectuals in this country such as Norman Podhoretz, editor of Commentary, who had previously been a staunch Democrat. Others, Jewish and non-Jewish Commentary contributors, included Jeane Kirkpatrick, Richard Perle, Paul Wolfowitz, Irving Kristol and lots more. The Democrats in Congress were not very enthusiastic about Carter. They saw him as a political liability, not an asset. They were proven right.

Q: You know looking back on it, the real problem was Carter, not the other thing. He did not present a strong government. He was in the right thing in a lot of things but...

MOSES: As President, he was not as effective as he should have been. I tried to change things, to give him a sense of how to project himself politically, exuding confidence and power. He lost this after our embassy staff in Teheran was seized. I spoke with him about core Democratic Party issues, but at heart he was a populist. He attacked lawyers, accountants, professional people generally, exalting the mythical, primordial man, right out of Rousseau. The American public did not want to listen; he was too preachy, too glum. In fact, he was a much better president than George W. Bush, but Bush went around the country in 2004 walking and talking as though he were running the world and on top of everything. The American public re-elected him, even though he doesn't have half the candle power that Carter had. Jimmy Carter went around in a mental slouch. He had given his malaise speech in July of '79.

VICTOR SKILES
Deputy Mission Director, USAID
Tel Aviv (1958-1959)

Victor Skiles was born and raised in Idaho. He graduated from the University of Idaho in 1940. After graduation, his favorite professor helped him obtain a fellowship with the National Institute of Public Affairs. In 1942, he entered the Navy and was stationed in Berlin. His assignment to the military government operation was that of assistant to the head of the Food Distribution. He has also served in Germany, Israel, Afghanistan and Italy. He was interviewed by John Kean on December 4, 1998.

Q: Here we are again on Monday, the 11th of December, with Vic Skiles for his third session. So Vic, tell us where you went next after you finished your stint at GTI.

SKILES: I went to Israel, for a number of somewhat peculiar reasons, and it turned out to be a most interesting experience. First let me recount just a little bit the progression of our approaches to these various countries. Both Israel and the GTI configuration had, in a sense, forced us to take a much greater look at the total country situation than had been the case in some of the more strictly Point Four kind of operations. As we will see, this was a pattern which expanded and continued over the years, with considerable refinements, but in my view, not with tremendous changes in the way we approach the problems.

Q: So this was in 1957 that you went to Israel?

SKILES: Yes, that would have been 1957, mid to late '57, I guess. No, I'm sorry, it was early 1958. February.

Q: So the mission had been reopened after the Suez crisis for how long?

SKILES: Well, probably about six months. The real trouble spots were a bit earlier.

Q: But the Suez war in November '56 was what closed the mission down, and it reopened sometime in '57, did it? And you went in at the beginning of '58?

SKILES: That's about it, yes. The military situation in that whole area had changed dramatically during that period, if you recall, but by the time I got out to the mission, things seemed to be fairly well settled down, and in fact there was a space of several years after the dust settled from the '56-57 fracas until military activities really heated up again in the area. But they were never to be ignored, partly because during that period, considerably more help was coming in from the outside, primarily from the Soviets. The Egyptian political scene changed not once, but consistently. Jordan was regarded as being in a bit of a pickle, but it also had gotten somewhat into the arms buildup race, as had Syria, and Israel felt beleaguered. The U.S., because of the activities in '56 and '57, came to be regarded as much more closely affiliated with Israel than we had been prior to that time, although the immediate effect of the Suez experience was just the opposite.

John, I think you are right - for this discussion to make much sense I had better change my mind and get it into the context of the political-military situation. From the Israeli standpoint the Suez issue was part of a long-term problem in which they regarded Nasser (Egypt) as really bent on a larger campaign of a Greater Arab hegemony with one of the main rallying points being the destruction of Israel - pushing the Jews into the sea. Egypt was engaged in a fairly extensive military build-up with Soviet help and a growing Soviet presence. Nasser's biggest economic project probably was the building of the Aswan High Dam, for which there had been considerable hope of Western financing, but when the U.S. decided against going ahead with this project, Britain and France also withdrew and without those three, the IBRD (World Bank) was in no position to proceed. It was with this background that Nasser announced his intention to nationalize the Suez canal. Nasser's declaration in mid-56 was one of the milestones for Israel, but it also was accompanied by armed intervention in the form of raids from the Gaza strip, which was controlled by Egypt as a result of the armistice in 1949, and the blockade of the Straits of Tiran, and therefore the Gulf of Aqaba (Elat to Israel). This was Israel's water route to the East, through the Red Sea, including Iran from which they got most of their oil. Closure to them of the Gulf and the Suez meant no shipping access basically, except for the Port of Haifa on the Mediterranean. It eventually became public knowledge that there was a degree of collusion between Israel and France and the U.K. over Suez and despite cautionary advice from the U.S. and many others, Israel was the first to move with large-scale military operations at the end of October, let's say November 1956, and they quickly moved to the east bank of the Nile, took Gaza and large chunks of the Negev. The French and British went into Suez a few days later.

Settlement of the Suez crisis, or at least the withdrawal of Israeli troops, was largely on the basis of U.S. and French proposals and maneuvering at the United Nations which resulted in two features which Israel thought to be essential, though neither in their view went far enough in the sense of guarantees that they could be carried to full fruition. One was the end of the blockade, the right of free riparian passage, and recognition of Israel's right to defend such rights of passage. The other was in effect to deny Egypt the right to armed representation in the Gaza strip. U.N. forces were introduced to keep the peace and in effect internationalize both Gaza and the area next to the Straits. Israel had requested and the U.S. responded, symbolizing the first point by a ship of U.S. flag and a cargo of oil past Tiran, through the Gulf to the Israel port of Elat in late April of 1957. This then was the situation in 1957 and it turned out that there were no more raids from Gaza and no more blockades for ten years.

While the U.S. had been, in a sense, a great thorn in the Israel side at the time of the Suez crisis and war, the aftermath of the settlement brought about a considerable change in relationships including stepped up economic assistance and eventually a military relationship.

It is in this sense that I say the military situation in Israel seemed to be reasonably quiet. However, in 1957 things were stirring in Syria, our diplomats were expelled, the U.S. sent arms aid to Lebanon and Jordan and encouraged Turkey to station troops on its Southern border. In early 1958 the United Arab Republic was formed by a merger of Syria and Egypt, and in mid-58 the U.S. Marines landed in Lebanon and the U.K. airlifted a force to Jordan. The calming influence of the U.K. in Iraq was pretty well ended with the overthrow of the king and, in effect, military control of the country. So it would be misleading to say the area was quiet or that Israel had lost its feeling of being beleaguered.

I suppose all this is to say that while we were not so much directly involved in the military or semi-military activities at that time, those never could be ignored either. They had a considerable influence on Israel's needs, and on the economic programs. When a country starts putting more and more resources, whether in terms of local budget, foreign exchange, whatever, into military buildup and military maintenance, then that leaves considerably less for economic development activities. Another point to remember or to take into account in the case of Israel is that, while we had comparatively large money programs going, considerable amounts of aid compared with that going to most countries, the official assistance in fact was somewhat smaller than the private assistance and the informal aid flows into the country. At about the time I arrived the United Jewish Appeal was holding a meeting in Jerusalem, and one of the figures they used was that they had marshaled over $1 billion by that time in assistance to Israel. Dwarfed in more recent days, at that time a billion dollars was a lot of money. Granted UJA was a major player, but it was not the only one. On the official side, in addition to the AID programs, Israel had obtained an EX-IM bank loan, and was one of the earlier customers for the development loan fund. IMF and IBRD had an interest in the place. And so it goes.

I think this might be a good place to pick up on the "invitation" in the guidance on these sessions, to deal somewhat with the "people impressions" and government relations. It's partly because, in some respects, they were so good in Israel, at least in terms of the local personnel that we worked with. This doesn't mean that relationships were always good; they weren't. There were some points of contention. But as far as I personally was concerned, I certainly was impressed with the Israelis who worked jointly with us on planning and on program problems, and with the level of interest in the government, no doubt prompted in some measure by a strong desire not to let the flow of assistance be interfered with, as it had at the time of Suez, to emphasize its importance to the country, and the importance of this kind of an association with the United States. If you recall, they had had stronger direct ties with France during the earlier period, and to some extent on the financial side with Germany, because of Germany's desire to cooperate in some form of restitution arrangements with Israel, for the damage done to the Jewish people during the war.

But I think it's fair to say that Israel always had desired, sought and looked forward to closer relationships with the United States. Evidence of this attitude is that in our weekly meeting with the Israeli government officials, these often involved the presence, for example, of the Minister of Finance, Levy Eshkol, who later became prime minister. He liked to attend, let's say, on a biweekly basis almost, the consolidated meetings with the representatives of the AID group. And when he wasn't there, the deputy minister was normally the primary contact on planning and the economic side. The same close relationship existed with Pinhas Sapir who succeeded Eshkol as Minister of Finance - and he was a power in the political structure. Alternate meetings were held on these subjects and on technical assistance. Technical assistance coordination had been retained in the office of the Prime Minister, where our old friend Teddy Kollek was the Director General / Chef de Cabinet. He chose not to attend those meetings for reasons that I would like not to get into, but he had very able representatives who were on a constant coordination basis with us. Mr. Kollek and I had rather warm relations outside the context of those meetings. I called on him in his Jerusalem office fairly frequently and every once in a while these sessions would be interrupted by a burst through the door of the man who occupied the suite just next door - adjoining offices with a doorway between them - and the intruder was the Prime Minister, Ben Gurion. He lived up to his international reputation, in terms of his looks, his fiery demeanor, and his approach to problems, which usually had nothing to do with me or us, in the sense of the Mission, or with the purposes of my visit to Teddy Kollek. This didn't bother the Prime Minister at all. When he came in it was to talk about things he wanted to talk about, and he didn't seem to care that someone else was there, who shouldn't be privy to such conversations. It was all very informal - coatless, tie-less (open-throat shirts), nobody stood in deference to the office. (Actually, I did stand on the first occasion - and was quickly corrected).

Q: Tell us, if you would, about your position and role in the mission, and the things that primarily concerned you in your official capacity.

SKILES: I was the Deputy Director of the mission. The Director left on home leave shortly after I arrived, and I was in charge of the mission off and on during much of my stay. I'd meant to refer earlier to the rather unusual circumstances physically. The mission and the embassy were not in the same building, but they were fairly nearby, and they had the advantage of both being in Tel Aviv. The government, on the other hand, was spread between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, but concentrated in Jerusalem. In effect, the government was in Jerusalem, and they had offices in Tel Aviv to accommodate relationships with the representatives of other countries, nearly all of whom followed the United Nations recognition pattern, did not recognize that the government was entitled to have its capital in Jerusalem, and therefore kept most embassy and other foreign contact work in Tel Aviv, with a lot of informal exceptions. In the case of AID, we traded off. We'd go to Jerusalem, almost on the basis of alternate meetings there and in Tel Aviv.

Q: That's about a 30-40 minute drive?

SKILES: About an hour. Milewise it wasn't all that great, but the roads, though much improved compared to the earlier periods when I had been there, were still not avenues of rapid transit, or shouldn't be. Occasionally we drove fairly swiftly between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, but it was not a wise thing to do. The road at that time was narrow, with a great many twists and turns to it. Some of the earmarks of the 1948 war still existed, and this was really not by inattention, but by a recognition that people who drove between the two places would do well to abstain from forgetting the kinds of problems that existed during the war for independence.

Q: In the form of what?

SKILES: Demolished tanks, wrecked trucks and vehicles. While several years had passed, these were poignant reminders of the great, if limited, battles that took place during 1948 as the Israelis strove to keep supplies going into Jerusalem and to maintain a substantial foothold in Jerusalem.

I spent more of my time on the planning and negotiating side of things than on technical assistance, which was relatively small, pointed toward institution building, but not with the same kind of cooperative organization that we found essential in some other places. It was more a matter of the American technicians fitting into the Israeli framework, than it was trying to develop mutually supported institutions to provide that framework. Incidentally, Israel, I think largely under the influence of Mr. Kollek, but certainly not he alone, had started a technical assistance program of its own in some of the developing countries. Israel certainly felt isolated in the family of nations at that point, and wanted to use some of its people resources to establish contact, encourage mutual working relationships, be helpful, gain recognition and maintain relationships with many of the members of the developing world. They did have a lot of technical assistance work going on, stretching from Burma to West Africa. Their program was much more individualized than ours. The central office consisted of only a few people and if they wanted someone from the Ministry of Agriculture to go to Ghana, for example, they simply worked out with the Ministry of Agriculture a definition of the kind of people, then selected the individual and told the Ministry to send him. When he got to Ghana, he didn't find a mission backstopping structure. His job was to work for a local Ministry or a local private enterprise, or whatever the plan had developed in terms of the definition of the need for technical assistance.

That was a bit of a digression, but I think a significant one, not only in terms of our relationships with the local governments, but of what the Israelis were trying to do.

The other basic element of our program is what brought us in constant contact with the Ministry of Finance, the Ministry of Commerce and Industry, and the Bank Leumi, which served a central role, not only in finance, but in developing national economic plans and providing the national accounts.

Q: Were you in the mission directly involved in the problem of resettlement?

SKILES: Yes and no. Certainly yes in terms of financing, not much in terms of actually working on it. The political problem connected with settlement and housing arose somewhat later, and involved the question of settlement in areas which were not part of the original Israel.

Q: Not building housing or infrastructure?

SKILES: I was going to use this as an illustration. We put quite a bit of money into, for example, construction of prefabricated houses, and the attendant costs of settlement into them, but we didn't have American housing people working in that program.

Q: Was there a housing investment guarantee program?

SKILES: Not at that time, no. But we employed both some of the dollar import funds, and in particular, a considerable amount of the local currency equivalent of the import program and the PL 480 program in things like housing, transportation, irrigation and agricultural development, and roads. A lot of money went into roads. And railroads.

Q: So, in effect we were a major source, both of foreign exchange and local currency, to expand the infrastructure of the economy.

SKILES: That's a good way of putting it. And to a large extent, that's what the special program was about at that time. You recall earlier reference to the situation where the U.S. was heavily responsible for the creation of the fund, the United Nations Fund, to assist with the interim relief, and hopefully the settlement of Palestinian refugees outside of Israel; and the accompanying authorization, and I believe it's fair to say, not really at the Administration's initiative at that stage, of roughly equal funds for relief and resettlement of refugees in Israel. So the origin of that fund was directly related to financial problems which had arisen and which were continuing to arise because of the pressure of the increase in the population from outside. Much of the immigration came from Europe, but also from Iraq, Yemen, Egypt and other more remote areas. But again, I would say by the '58 period, large-scale immigration had pretty well come to a halt, and in terms of net immigration, basically there wasn't any. There was some limited emigration, which just about offset the new immigration, as I recall the figures. The cost to the economy of settlement and integration did continue, of course, and an expanding economy was the real long-term answer to the problem.

Q: Can you describe a bit the water resources area of activity, which is so critical in that region?

SKILES: Yes, but I don't quite know whether to do it simply in the physical terms, or in the AID impact terms, but let's try the former first. The Negev in the South was a large and very dry area, which in effect had no water, not even rainfall of any real consequence. In the North, the Galilee (and I'll be exercising a little license with accuracy here), on the other hand, is an area with, at least during certain periods of the year, a surplus of fresh water. Naturally the Israelis were interested in bringing these two together. Near the Sea of Galilee, there was a good deal of intensive agriculture, made possible by the presence of water, let's say either from the sea itself, which is really a large lake, or from the Jordan River, which was one of the main sources of the sea; or the outflow from the sea, which again was concentrated in the Jordan. Large parts of the rest of the country also were seized with the problem. They had a belt of citrus-growing which was confined primarily to the coastal area because this is where the beneficial rainfall permitted the production of oranges, the famous Jaffa oranges, grapefruit, peaches and that sort of thing. And right next door you might have some potentially fine agricultural area which wasn't used because of the absence of water. In program terms, I think of some interesting offshoots. For example, a range management program was started not all that far from the Galilee, but on higher terrain, started because it was range land -- dry farm country -- it was good for raising cattle if certain things were done in the utilization of land, but not good for much of anything as it stood. I'd mentioned one other feature which had come down to Israel from historic times, and that was water spreading. There were many signs that people centuries earlier had built or adopted devices to retain the water, largely from rain, by the use of water spreading devices and water retaining devices. In the South near Masada, now a reconstructed memorial to Jewish history, for example, there still exists large, and I mean large, underground cisterns, and traces of systems which had directed rainwater into those cisterns, down the faces of the rock, and into gathering cisterns. In the valleys around, there were evidences of water spreading devices, where small dikes had been built so that water could meander in a zig-zag pattern down the course of a ravine, spread out in such a fashion that it would sink into the earth sufficiently to maintain the production of crops rather than the fast runoff which otherwise obtains and which accounts for so many “wadis” all over the country.

Now in terms of the larger programs of what you are trying to do about it, the Israelis were building an infrastructure to take water to the south, at least as far as Tel Aviv, and eventually to Beersheba. These were essentially big pipelines to take advantage of the natural flow where possible to obviate the need to use power to move the water through the pipelines to areas where water was unavailable. In the words of some of our more poetic geniuses, to “make the desert bloom like the rose.” This literally was true, but it wasn’t roses so much as it was foodstuffs that they were interested in producing in those areas.

Q: In connection with that, the Israelis were using some pretty interesting devices for maximizing efficiency in the use of water.

SKILES: True, efficiency from the word go, in moving the water and conserving it, and utilizing it. And this naturally created some problems. The sources of the water in the northern part of the country are sources which are not entirely within Israel. So taking of the water, even after it flows into Israel, was always a very contentious problem. We developed a number of schemes along with the local interests, on both sides of the border. The so-called Johnston plan, for example, never got off the boards, but it was a strong effort in 1954 to utilize U.S. assistance and influence toward some kind of settlement agreement between the Israelis and the Palestinians and the Arabs which involved repatriation and compensation to, as well as resettlement of, some of the Palestinians, along with major efforts to develop water resources which would be available on both sides of the border. A lot of work was done in this regard, but as a political entity the Johnston plan was not picked up. It became more a source of controversy than of bringing people together. There are a number of things on the Jordan side -- the Yarmuk River schemes and Jordan Development Commission, for example, at the same time that we were helping the Israelis on their side of the border - to develop the infrastructure and bring the water to places where it was needed.

Q: Particularly the East Ghor Canal, drawing on Yarmuk River water.

SKILES: Yes. Further north, between Israel and Lebanon, there is a mountain range which is fairly extensive, and the water from the Litani, for instance, didn’t come over the mountain, but a good deal of it came under the mountain. Springs in Northern Israel, the Yaron and other sources were indeed the headwaters of Lake Tiberius and the River Jordan.

Q: You mean Lake Tiberius, the Sea of Galilee.

SKILES: Yes, different names for the same place.

To some extent in some places there was too much water. In the early days of the State, they had undertaken a fairly large project at the southern end of Tiberius, partly to reclaim land, but I think primarily to clear out the swamps and remove the growth so the water could run away more freely from that area and further to the south. I guess it's no secret anymore, but considerable funds were put into a power development project between Galilee and Haifa at that time, and this was largely for the same or related purposes. At that time some of the endeavors, including that one, were kept as well as could be from prying eyes. The Israelis were not interested in having other people, or even some of their own, know about some of the activities that they were conducting and sabotage or destruction from outside was always a danger. But for the sake of the future, these activities were regarded by them as most pressing and essential. You are right in suggesting that a good deal of the assistance went into areas of activity such as water development, transportation, power development, irrigation, dams, and transportation. I recall not being able to avoid transportation in what I would regard as my first major speech in Israel at the time. It was because the facilities for getting around the place while still limited, were so much better than they had been two or three years earlier, that you could not fail to use this as an example of visible progress that had been made with our binational approach. For example, the roads earlier had been narrow, and I think vividly of the rock lining at the side of the asphalt on almost any road that you could picture that had been asphalted. In U.S. terms, this certainly was an inducement to danger, with high speed travel over those narrow roads. By the time I was there with the mission, much of the need for those rock boundaries had been taken away with better engineering, better compacting of the road beds, better design of the roads, improved mixes to provide the hard surface, and in fact to get usable shoulders rather than rock barriers at the side of many of the roads. Railroads had been improved. We had financed some of the diesel locomotives that had been brought in, to put to work on the railroads. The railroad lines had been expanded. By that time you could go from Haifa to Tel Aviv to Jerusalem and somewhat later down to the middle of the Negev. I say you could go, but I have in mind not so much people movement, as the movement of goods. Railroads are great carriers for material, both coming in and going out.

You had asked, John, about the mission organization, how we were set up to handle these various kinds of activities. Actually, it wasn't so different from an ordinary mission in a country. The Controller's Office had a larger than normal function because of the supply program - not only accounting, but such things as end-use examinations and certifications. Of course we put a great deal more emphasis on the economic planning side than did many of the missions, and considerably more attention to the economy of the whole country in which we worked, rather than confining it to those sectors in which we had technicians working. Much of the best work on this side of things actually was done by visiting firemen. We had economic advisors and tried to keep an economic competence in the program office, and we had, for example, in the industry division, an industrial economist. People like these helped to bring about a mission attitude and helped to provide a certain competence which didn't normally exist. But it was a mixed thing. The real function of the industrial advisor, for example, was to work with the Israelis in the industrial field, but, in effect, his primary charge from our side was to encourage the Israelis to do more and more through private enterprise involving a free market economy, as against the tendency to nationalize or to handle activities in state enterprises.

Q: The Histadrut after all was essentially a socialist organization.

SKILES: I was going to say that much of this came up from what was known as a labor organization - the National Labor Federation - but which also was an industrial enterprise, the nation's biggest employer, and a center of politics. It also was the center of activity for most of the leaders who came early on the scene, many of them long before Israel became a state. Ben Gurion, for example, was an import in the sense that he had not been raised in Israel, and this was true of most of the senior government leaders in the early days. They had been involved in activities such as the Histadrut, which became very strong molders and semi-government operators in the early days of the country. Levy Eshkol was one of the few born in that area and raised as an "Israeli," and he, too, was a long time activist in Histadrut.

Q: A Sabra?

SKILES: Yes, and much of his earlier experience was in the Histadrut organization. The Mapai party was in effect a Histadrut party and Mapai was the leading political party in the country for a number of years after independence was obtained.

Q: Was there a thrust toward export orientation in industry, or was it still largely import substitution?

SKILES: I think that from the word go it was both, but it was easier to point at import substitution because exports at that time were only about $50 million a year, and this was almost entirely in citrus, diamonds, tourism, a few other limited fields -- but all of these were important. They all were in our sense good things to help support, the exception being diamonds which was a function of the international diamond industry - I'm tempted to say, cartel. Most of these were also at the cutting edge of one of the main things we were trying to do, which was encourage Israel along the line of free enterprise and market forces, rather than the state enterprise. To refer to some earlier comments with respect to exposure to Mr. Stassen in 1953, for example, this was the main issue in which he became interested, and I suppose, in effect, was the cause of my having been exposed to his personal interest and his involvement in the program. From his standpoint the main thing to do, as he put it, was to make it like a stream of water running over a rock, or drops of water dropping on a rock. Just keep at it, and eventually you will see some marks in the rock and eventually erosion, and eventually success in your approach. But you know this was a sensitive issue which had to be approached with some care. Influence without too much confrontation. I mentioned that the external influences always made a big contribution to our own deliberations on what our advice to the country should be. Not only did we get reputable economists to come over and work with the Israelis, as well as help us define our priorities, such as Dr. Patterson and Dr. Mikesell in the early days, but as the international institutions were developed, we tried to rely more and more on, for example, the IMF and the IBRD, to make their input. We took advantage of it as well as encouraging the Israelis to take advantage of it.

Q: Did you feel that the Israelis themselves were moving in that direction of a free market liberalized, open economy?

SKILES: It strikes me that we're talking about conflicting approaches, and indeed there were, and probably still are. One is, in a sense, the necessity for state planning in an area where resources are limited and you are trying to channel external assistance into areas which the state planning has defined as being the priority areas. And at the same time, talking about a system which to some extent denies that kind of approach. We were trying to carry water on both shoulders, and the Israelis were trying, but with much more emphasis on the state planning approach than on the market economy approach at that time. The confluence of the two, and our continuing efforts to encourage the policy of market economy, and encourage private undertakings at the expense of government undertakings did indeed lead to a number of frictions, not only amongst our own people but between us and the government. You mentioned the industrial sector -- yes, this is a good example of where the chickens come home to roost, I suppose, because the government was trying to encourage industry. It would do so primarily through government encouragement, and government institutions, because this is what they knew. But also they tried to encourage private activity. This was what their contributors knew best -- not only us but specifically the people who were instrumental in the United Jewish Appeal, Hadassah, and this sort of thing. Their influence was great, but alongside this, you had developments like the Weizman Institute, which was essentially a semi-government operation.

Q: Aimed at what?

SKILES: Well, it had a number of functions, aimed generally at bringing science to the forefront of future activities there, and eventually going so far as to help develop a nuclear complex. Here again, you had government influence, scientific input from Jerusalem University and from other scientific factors within the country, and certainly on an international level. When Abba Eban returned to Israel in 1958, I guess it was, that was his first job -- head of the Weizman Institute.

Q: Having been an ambassador in the U.S. up to that time, right?

SKILES: The previous ten years he had spent as Israel's representative to the UN, and during all but two years of that time, also as the Ambassador to the United States. You don't put a man of that background into the job of being the director of the scientific institution without also having in mind some of its other requirements and strong points.

Q: From a strategic point of view, what was your view of Israel's position at that point? Were they seeming to gain in strength in relation to their neighbors?

SKILES: Well John, as you've experienced, it's awfully hard to find anybody who can remain objective about Israel, or on the other side of the line, about Lebanon or about Jordan. But I try to maintain that objectivity and think I've done a fairly decent job of it. I think it's fair to say that after things settled down from about the 1956-57 period, there was remarkable progress, both actually and mentally. There was a growing sense of Israel, a growing confidence in their ability to take care of themselves; there was a growing confidence in their sense of belonging to international organizations, and of closer association with one of the two major powers in the world. Things were looking up. At the same time, they certainly recognized that while the problems had receded for the moment, they were not repressed forever. Israel was to some extent a sort of a pariah in United Nations circles, not only during that period, but during a much later period, when I was exposed to it from a different direction. Among other things, 1958 was the occasion for Israel's 10th birthday party; tenth anniversary of its founding as a state. This didn't produce a sense of euphoria, but it certainly helped consolidate an interest and a pride in the country, and a sense of confidence in what they had accomplished and what they could look forward to in the future. Of course their success in the Suez War contributed significantly. Now, whether they had really strengthened militarily compared with their neighbors, as they were to do a bit later on, I'm not so sure. Certainly the process had started. Economically they were becoming much stronger.

Q: Are there some other things about the Israel experience that you would like to give some time to? Why don't you go ahead and comment on some of the other aspects of your experience in Israel?

SKILES: Well, I suspect we've paid enough attention to Israel, but let me go back to one point I started to make earlier, and embellish on it a little bit. That is in terms of relationships with the host country nationals, such as Teddy Kollek. Among other things, he was responsible for putting me on to two or three of the committees or commissions that were working in Israel, which might only indirectly have had a relationship with the AID program. For example, the Rothschild family was financing a number of activities within the country. Teddy, in effect, had worn the cloak of the Minister of Tourism, and it was in this sense - as well as in trying to steer the Rothschilds in directions that would be most useful to Israel but would not interfere with activities of other donors - he was interested in some sort of coordination as well as possibly some personal input. Some of the places to visit were greatly improved with Rothschild interest and money.

Q: In particular, which area or sites?

SKILES: Caesaria, Ashkelon, Masada, the country's first and only golf course.

Q: Would Jerash also be?

SKILES: I don't recall Jerash with a personal exposure, but certainly other ancient sites that we were exposed to, some in the Negev. One of the Rothschild family members, for example, was in a small party that made a trip throughout the Negev to the old Solomon's mines and to Elat. This was not, let's face it, all in the sense of altruism. Kollek and his country wanted to make sure that various of us were educated to the needs of the country, to the appeal of certain things in the country, and, if I might say so, to the political problems which the country faced. In this connection, my own experience, and I know yours as well, meant that to some extent in certain circles, our way was paved in areas to which we went after our Israel experience. Later, when I got to Kenya, for example, a call from the Israeli Consul General was one of the first that I received. He explained to me that he had had a note from a mutual friend asking him to facilitate my entry into the scene in Nairobi to the extent that he could. This happened in other places, I'm sure, not only with thee and me but with a variety of people.

Q: Yes, I remember a call from Israelis, including the director general of the Ministry of Finance, who was traveling through Turkey while I was there, and he paid a call on me. So we've certainly shared this kind of experience, where once the Israelis made contact with you, they were apt to try to make the most of that, as well as to be helpful.

SKILES: Yes, and it leads to a point which I think characterizes many of our associations and many of our activities with respect to Israel. It was in a very difficult position internationally, and it was anxious to develop and maintain friendships and contacts. As I suggested earlier I have to assume they were interested in these kind of contacts almost throughout the developing world, and partly because of their concept that the developing countries were more and more coming front and center in world attention.

Q: And the U.N. votes were of significance to them, so they were constantly trying to build contacts and relationships that would help protect them in what they felt was apt to be an increasingly hostile environment in the U.N.

SKILES: Yes, a very important element in what we're just discussing. They wanted good and friendly contacts in a number of countries, and for a number of reasons.

Q: So, if perhaps that winds up most of the coverage of your experience in Israel, maybe we want to move onto your next experience, and how that came about.

MICHAEL H. NEWLIN
United Nations Affairs, IO
Washington, DC 1958-1963

Ambassador Michael Newlin was born in North Carolina in 1929. He received both his bachelor's degree and master's degree from Harvard University in 1949 and 1951, respectively. His career has included positions in Frankfurt, Oslo, Paris, Brussels, Leopoldville/Kinshasa, Jerusalem, Vienna, and an ambassadorship to Algeria. Ambassador Newlin was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2006.

Q: Well then we will move back. It became a United Nations affair. You were doing that from '58 until when?

NEWLIN: I did that from '58 until '63.

Q: You know maybe it was later but did you have any feeling about an anti UN feeling in Congress, sort of right wing or not?

NEWLIN: Not in those days because the UN still even with the influx of the 60 newly independent states we were the dominant power. In the General Assembly we could usually get through what we wanted. Dulles invented something that later I guess could have come back to haunt us. When the Soviets would of course keep vetoing anything to do with the cold war in the Security Council, even though we had the majority of votes. Dulles came up with the uniting for peace resolution whereby, if the Security Council could not act on something because of a veto you could take it to the General Assembly and get it voted on there. Of course it didn't have the binding character of something by the Security Council, but demonstrated a majority view. The UN was deeply involved in the Arab Israeli dispute, We had Ralph Bunche in the Secretariat in New York. We had to pay for all of the Palestinian refugee costs because the rest of the UN said this is your problem. You created Israel so therefore you have to pay for the upkeep of the refugees.

Q: I take it that being assigned to the UN at that time was really quite exciting for a young officer.

NEWLIN: Oh very. Very exciting. You were there, I remember I was up there when the time U Thant was running for Secretary General. That was an interesting thing too that we were involved in later. But I am getting ahead of myself whenever I was assigned to the UN. But I happened to be up there at the UN when U Thant called a news conference in one of the halls. He said, "I have the impression that my candidacy is acceptable to all members of the Security Council." So that was it.

Q: Were you there during the Kennedy assassination?

NEWLIN: No, I will come to that when I get to Paris.

Q: Then how did you find the United Nations it was called what International Organizations in those days?

NEWLIN: IO, The Bureau of International Organizations Affairs. We covered many of the international organizations, but not NATO or the economic ones.

Q: Again here is where somebody with the skill of Joe Sisco, I would think that there would, the United Nations covers all sorts of issues, but the various geographic bureaus feel they have it is their birthright.

NEWLIN: Here come the interlopers.

Q: Yes, so you must have been seeing a significant number of bureaucratic issues didn't you?

NEWLIN: Yes, there were frequent Bureaucratic clashes. I mentioned the problems caused for the European powers by the sudden independence of their former colonies. The founding of Israel created new tensions in an already volatile Middle East. The USSR's support for communist insurgents in Latin America were a major headache. In South Asia the U.S. supported Pakistan whereas Russia supported India. I fortunately was chosen by Sisco to be UNP's go between with EUR. The European Bureau was the one we had most of our problems with. Cleveland got the idea that we would take the Berlin situation up in the Security council. (I thought this was a bad idea indeed, but I was not consulted.) At the beginning of the Kennedy administration Dean Acheson was invited back to the State Department as an advisor to Dean Rusk. Cleveland had discussed the plan in a meeting with Acheson and Rusk. The EUR bureau had not been present so the draft telegram to New York needed the clearance of the assistant secretary of European affairs. I remember it was late in the afternoon. After I cleared it with Acheson, Sisco sent me over to EUR. When I handed it over the assistant secretary immediately called in his deputy and said, "Look at this." Finally he said, "I cannot clear this, these waters are dark and turgid." So I went back and I said, "No sale." Fortunately EUR managed to kill the idea.

MURAT WILLIAMS
Tel Aviv (1959-1961)

Ambassador Williams was born and raised in Virginia and was educated at the University of Virginia and Oxford University. After serving in the US Navy in World War II, he joined the State Department, serving in Washington, D.C., where he worked with the Refugee Relief Program, and abroad. His foreign posts include San Salvador, Bucharest, Salonika, Bern and Tel Aviv. Mr. Williams served as U.S. Ambassador to El Salvador from 1961 to 1964. Ambassador Williams was interviewed by Melvin Spector in 1990. He died in 1994.

WILLIAMS: No I was the number two in Israel. I was the DCM (Deputy Chief of Mission) in Israel. I went to Israel about the same time as Ogden Reid was appointed as ambassador.

Q: Was Mr. Reid a career Foreign Service officer?

WILLIAMS: He was not a career Foreign Service officer. He was a very young former publisher of the International Herald Tribune in Paris and the New York Herald Tribune. He was a member of the family that owned the Tribune. He had excellent connections within that family. I remember that when Mr. Reid was nominated to go to Israel he had four or five days of very strong questioning before Senator Fulbright's Foreign Relations Committee. Mr. Fulbright, in effect, was not pleased with the appointment because he didn't think that Mr. Reid had enough experience in diplomacy, or enough knowledge of the area to have such a delicate job. But Mr. Reid stood up well in his four days of inquisition. I would like to say on the record that during my service with him of about a year and a half he proved to be a very hard working, conscientious, and sincere officer who, I think, made no mistakes and carried on his job as ambassador very well. The Israelis had great respect for him.

Israel at that time was quite different from Israel of today. The dominate political, emotional, cultural feelings were those of European German Zionist. Their principle figure in the country was, of course, David Ben-Gurion – David Ben-Gurion and his Foreign Minister, Golda Meir. I came to admire both of them enormously. I did not know Ben-Gurion as well as I knew Mrs. Meir. But I do remember Ben-Gurion used to warn the Israelis of the cultural and political changes that were taking place in the country. The old European Jews were outnumbered by the Sephardic, the Spanish, North African, Middle Eastern Jews, largely from the Yemen and North Africa who increased their population enormously and who had a different attitude towards the Arabs than the German Jews.

The original Zionists, and I think this is an important point that people may have forgotten in our country, had no quarrel with the Arabs. They bought land from the Arabs, they cooperated with the Arabs, they worked with the Arabs, they were friendly with the Arabs, they spoke Arabic. Most of my friends did not foresee trouble with the Arabs because they thought they could get along with them because they had worked with them so much in the days before the establishment of the State of Israel.

On the other hand, the North African Jews, the Sephardic, and Middle Eastern Jews had been badly treated by the Arabs, or felt that they had been badly treated over the years. They were kind of eager, it seemed to me, to get back at the Arabs – to revenge themselves with the Arabs. As they did this and increased in numbers, trouble with the Arabs increased, relations became worse.

But when I was there there were no serious incidents. Ben-Gurion was convinced that they could get on well together. Mrs. Meir felt the same. So there was no feeling of the need for great expansion of territory. They were content with a Jewish homeland which had defensible borders. There was a particular foresighted and wisdom on Ben-Gurion's part and Mrs. Meir's that they could do a lot for their neighbors in the Arab Moslem countries. Perhaps not so much with the immediate ones as the ones more distant. They had conceived of what was very much like our later Peace Corps. They sent bright young men and women, able and technically trained, out to help other countries develop a particular industry or solve problems.

For example, they sent a number of young men out to Ghana where they helped develop forest products such as ply board. They sent agricultural experts to Iran where they showed how wood for construction could be produced in sometimes relatively barren country using good systems of irrigation. They developed friendships with these countries. I had one particular Israeli friend, Ezra Danin, who was terribly important to Iran because of the help he had been able to organize for them in technical matters.

When these young men went out they were usually received by Ben-Gurion. He patted them on the back and told them what a good job he expected them to do and wished them luck. They went out with much enthusiasm and the work usually resulted in increasing friendship for Israel. Somewhere, about 1959 or 60, I haven't got my hands on it, there was an excellent article in the Foreign Affairs Quarterly about the way the Israelis were winning friends in the Middle Eastern world by this technical assistance. The old Israelis felt that cooperation in economic and technical matters with neighbors would help to strengthen their position.

I might mention also something called Solel Boneh. It was a construction company organized in Israel which did public works in nearby countries – for example, in Turkey and other places – under contracts.

Q: This was a private company?

WILLIAMS: It was sponsored by the Israeli government. It was very important and improved relations. I am very disappointed not to have heard more of this sort of thing since I was in Israel

30 years ago. Unfortunately, Israel has been so preoccupied with its security that the program may have been completely abandoned. I haven't had an opportunity to ask any of my Israeli friends whether any of it is going on. Danin is no longer living. But he was an outstanding example of the kind of technical assistance Israel had to offer. He showed me once an orange grove which he had created in a desert by selecting spots to put trees, in rows, of course, and then digging the sand away from them and pouring in good soil, setting up a windbreak to prevent more sand from coming in and thus building orchards in the desert – making the desert bloom. And that was what Israel did.

I remember particularly how impressed I was with their development and when I said goodbye to Mrs. Meir, she asked me why I was leaving and I said that the President had asked me to go as ambassador somewhere else. And she said, "Where are you going?" I said, "El Salvador." She said, "El Salvador? That is a place where you can really do something." I said, "Yes, Mrs. Meir, I hope we can help do some of the things you have done in your neighboring country."

While I was in Israel there were occasional border incidents with neighboring countries and sometimes Israel had to take measures for its own protection. Occasionally we had to remonstrate with them about something that seemed to upset the peace of the area.

I remember once when I was Chargé d'Affaires going into Mrs. Meir and telling her quite carefully something that the Department had asked me to say – remonstrating with Israel for its action in one of these events, and she just looked at me and said, "Who is going to give Nasser a lecture this morning?" She was quite accustomed to understanding. She understood quite well why a person like myself would be asked to make such a protest. And she received it.

Q: What did the Department feel, that this was provocation by the Israelis?

WILLIAMS: Yes. Occasionally they felt that Israel's defense positions or movements along a border might be provocations to Arab neighbors and we were trying above all to prevent any conflict.

Q: What do you feel were your policy objectives vis-a-vis Israel when you were there?

WILLIAMS: I believed Israel must develop its own resources, become nearly self-sufficient; should have adequate defenses within the territories which had been provided under the Independence agreements; that she should respect the resolutions of the United Nations; and be content to live in the homeland with satisfactorily defended borders. We did not believe Israel should expand its territory. We sought to persuade Israel to be content within those territorial boundaries. In our day we would not have done what was later done – our government seemed to encourage Israel to move into Lebanon. We knew Israel had good armed forces, we had unlimited admiration for their technical, scientific, and military abilities. We thought the rest of the world could learn a lot from them, but we believed that the borders as they were then were sufficient. We maintained our embassy, as we still do, in Tel Aviv because of the interest of other countries in Jerusalem.

Q: You say you feel Israel should comply with UN resolutions. Doesn't that imply face-to-face talks with the other Arab countries?

WILLIAMS: I can't remember whether at that time it implied that, I believe it did.

Q: About the only Arab country that has done that is Egypt as I recall – Sadat.

WILLIAMS: Yes. One thing that was terribly important at that time was Israel's nuclear research and development. We respected Israel's right to secrecy as far as its own defense is concern, but Israel, I think, did not tell us all we might have known about its nuclear development. There was a reactor near Be'er Sheva and Dimona. One day the Ambassador and I were in that general neighborhood and we asked about those buildings and were told that they were new textile plants. Eventually when that got into the American press it led to a very amusing article by Art Buchwald about the smashing tailors of Be'er Sheva.

Q: For the whole time you were in Israel did you serve under the same ambassador?

WILLIAMS: Yes. I was only in Israel from July 1959 to January 1961. Ambassador Reid was there a few days ahead of me and left a few weeks after I left. We had a great admiration for the ability of the people with whom we dealt. I believe that we were on a very frank basis of relations with the Israelis. We felt we could trust them. I think that that was right. One of our functions was to help interpret Israel to visiting Americans, especially senators and congressmen. I think they found that they were dealing with very straight forward people when they were dealing with the Israelis. One thing that is significant to me is that when we were there, Ambassador Reid and I, we had very little to do with Begin and nothing, as far as I can remember, with Shamir. The people with whom we dealt were the old Zionists and Sabras. Mrs. Meir was our principal contact, I would say, but General Dayan was also someone on whom we depended a great deal. Walter Eytan one of their great diplomats was someone we dealt with. He had been a don in Oxford, I think, at one time. And, of course, Abba Eban, was very influential at that time. For anyone like myself to go to Israel then was an experience of great stimulation. The mental liveliness of the people, their ability to see what had to be done and to do it. Everybody had something to do in developing the country and in the preservation of the country. All of that came with outstanding cultural and literary achievements. The Israeli Orchestra and the Mann auditorium rate as great examples of their cultural achievement. One would expect it naturally. So I suppose of all the places where I have served, there was none where there had been such stimulation to think, to act and to do the right thing.

I regretted very much when things turned out as Ben-Gurion told us it would when the Sephardic Jews began to increase their influence. The Sephardic Jews wanted to get a bit of their own back with the neighboring Arabs. They were the ones who were interested in pushing out the borders. They would have liked to take over a great deal of land around Israel. They were responsible for the eventual occupation of the West Bank, which took place long after my departure.

There is another thing I should mention which was the wise effort to receive and assimilate Jews from wherever they might have come. They had a system of cultural interchange which meant that they would settle people from four or five different countries and cultures in one area. The schools, the businesses, and the offices of these people would be located in the center of the area where they would all come together to study, work and enjoy entertainment during the day. This is a very brief explanation of what I thought was a very wise way of letting people become Israelis, develop their Israeli national feeling and at the same time not being completely shut off from their old contacts of the old country.

Another thing that impressed me so much was kibbutz life. My wife and I were very interested in learning about kibbutz life when we first started studying Hebrew at the Foreign Service Institute before we went to Israel. We learned the phrases that would be necessary and useful in visiting a kibbutz. We loved the kibbutz feeling. The young men who dominated them were very often those who had been the leaders in the Independence War.

I was really disappointed that my time in Israel was cut short. In late December, 1960 the ambassador called me into his office and said he had a telegram saying that there had been a revolution in El Salvador and President Eisenhower wanted to send me there as ambassador. Would I accept? Of course I accepted. But it meant breaking off almost an education – being in Israel.

When I got to Washington after that, Senator Fulbright was mainly interested not in my going to El Salvador, but in my staying such a short time in Israel. He said, "If you had stayed longer in Israel, you would know about that atomic program they are carrying on. If you fellows would stay where you were for a while you would know what was going on." Some people thought he was insulting me, but I didn't mind it very much. I was, myself, sorry that I hadn't been longer in Israel. I don't know if there is anything else you would like me to comment on about Israel.

BILHA BRYANT
Israeli Cultural Attaché
The Hague, Netherlands (1960-1963)

Bilha Bryant was born in 1934 in Bulgaria. Bryant served in the Israeli Army and worked in the private sector before joining the Israeli Foreign Service in 1959. Bryant resigned from the Israeli Foreign Service and married Edward (Ted) Bryant in 1963. With her husband, Bryant was assigned overseas to Mozambique, Ethiopia, Pakistan, Korea and India. Bryant then began to work for the State Department and served in the Soviet Bureau, Eastern European Affairs and Congressional Relations. Bryant was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: Can you describe the Israeli Foreign Service in those days? We're talking about what, '57, no, 1960?

BRYANT: I joined in 1959 and arrived to The Hague in January of 1960. The Career Israeli Foreign Ministry had been established not too long before. It was a very small selective group of people mostly from academia and the military. They were well educated, many of them in England or the United States, they spoke languages, were involved and enthusiastic and very smart. The whole of the European division at that time had a staff of about 15, perhaps less. In The Hague embassy, there was the Ambassador, a distinguished Dutch Jew who had lived in Holland before the war. He spoke many languages, but his Hebrew left much to be desired. There was the DCM [deputy chief of mission], an economic counselor, political officer and myself, and that was it. That was the embassy in Holland. And there were so many official visits! When we were in Holland, Ben Gurion came for a visit. You can imagine an American embassy during a President's visit. Here we were, four people; and here he is, Ben Gurion with a large entourage and a lot of demands. The Dutch at that time loved Israel, which made my job so easy. It was not hard to convince the journalists to write good things about Israel. They were so fascinated by the country.

Q: Did you have a lot of Dutch young people going to Israel to the kibbutzim?

BRYANT: Many young Dutch Jews would go to Israel but only for about six months or so. We found the Jews of Holland, the ones that survived the Holocaust, very much like the rest of the Dutch people; honest, decent and always very helpful to the embassy, with money and any other way.

Q: You were there from 1960-

BRYANT: 1960 to 1963. And I remember so well how I met my future husband. My husband Ted Bryant had been a vice-consul in Haifa and lived about three blocks away from where I lived. But since I am younger, I never met him socially in Haifa. On hearing that was being posted to The Hague, a friend in Kaiser-Ilin who used to see him socially in Haifa, suggested that I look up Ted Bryant who was then at the American Embassy in Holland and say "Hi." He could introduce you to young people there. But when I got to Holland I was really overwhelmed. I was worried and scared and excited all at the same time. I was really alone for the first time in my life, and I was too nervous to call him, so I never did. And one day, my ambassador, whose wife was not very social, invited me to accompany him to the "Yakharche Day" celebration. (Flag Day in Dutch). The celebration took place on fishing boats going out for the first herring. Many diplomats are invited and, according to the Ambassador, it usually is great fun. I of course accepted. It was a cold, rough day, and the seas were high, and the wind was blowing hard and yet I found the outing very exciting. I met quite a few friendly and fascinating people. Among them was a lovely Mexican girl who was also a diplomat, and several good looking Australians. And then I met a beautiful Dutch baroness, who was very kind to introduce me to her "man," Ted Bryant. And so we started talking. And I asked, "Were you in Israel?" And he said, yes, he was and oh, how pleased he was to meet me and, of course, "we must get together." And that was the last I heard from Ted Bryant. Weeks later, my ambassador asked me again to go with him to the annual dance at the Club du Jeudi dance since his wife could not go. This invitation was much more difficult for me to accept since I was very poor and couldn't afford to buy an evening dress. I was making very little money, but I did buy a dress. I don't think I ate for about for two weeks. And when we got there, there was a Paul Jones dance.

Q: Oh, yes. This is where you hold hands and sort of snake through and then at a certain point-

BRYANT: Yes, and when you stop the man who stands across from you would be your partner until the music stops. The first man who was across from me was a small dark man, and, you know, I was young and quite attractive. And so he sort of put his arms around me and started dancing, and said, "From where are your beautiful eyes?" And I said, "From Haifa." And I could feel his hands loosening. Well, apparently, he was the Egyptian Ambassador. When the music stopped next, my partner was a gentleman with one arm, who was the German attaché. And you know the war was still fresh in my mind, so I wasn't happy. I thought to myself, "such a waste of a dress!" Here I was dancing with an Egyptian and a German. My third partner was a good looking clean cut man who promptly started speaking French to me, saying: "Oh, je suis Belge." And so we started talking, and he asked me where I was from. When I said Haifa his eyes lit up and he remembered me. And we re-met, and that was the beginning of our romance.

Q: So '60-'63 was the only time you were in the Israeli Foreign Service.

BRYANT: Yes, and I remember an Israeli assistant secretary of the Foreign Service saying to me when I announced my resignation: "We don't need women in the Foreign Service. If they're attractive, they get married in two or three years. And if they're not attractive, they stay there and become mean and frustrated." He was horrible.

Q: Well, now we're in a much more equal situation, but there really was a problem in foreign services all over. Up until very recently, when a woman officer got married, often to a foreigner, more or less, she was expected to do resign, so it meant that your investment was sort of down the tube. So I mean, it was not just a prejudicial thing; there was a practicality: do you hire somebody who was not going to hang around very long?

Well, these interviews are sort of focused on your time dealing with foreign affairs, but I think we might as well, because later on we're going to talk about your time in the Department of State, talk about your time as a Foreign Service wife. When did you get married?

BRYANT: That's another interesting part of my life. We got engaged in February of 1963, but Ted wrote to say that he could not marry me without prior approval from the State Department. He asked that I make an appointment with the Political Counselor at the American Embassy in Tel Aviv, who by the way was an old colleague of Ted's. I was quite nervous about the whole procedure; for one thing I had been in the Military Intelligence Service, as well as in the Israeli Foreign Service. Nobody believed I was actually a diplomat but thought I was in the Shin Beth (the Israeli FBI), which I really wasn't. After my very pleasant interview with the Political Counselor, I had to meet with the Consular Officer, who looked me over carefully and asked a lot of questions. I had the distinct feeling that he was judging my manners. And then, of course, the security clearance took a while. Finally in May '63 Ted got permission to marry me and in June of 1963 I arrived to the States. We were married in St. Thomas Church in Washington, DC on June 29.

Q: What happened then? Where was your and Ted's first assignment?

BRYANT: Ted was in African Affairs. Now bear in mind that this was 1963, Kennedy was President and Africa was very prominent in American politics. Soapy Williams was assistant secretary of state for African Affairs. FSOs and wives were asked to attend by-weekly get-together with African Embassies' staff where Soapy Williams called and we all danced square dances. We had wonderfully close relations with Ted's colleagues. In fact, people we met in African Affairs are still our very dear friends, like Tony Ross. I loved it, I really did. According to regulations, I had to remain in the U.S. for three years to qualify for an overseas posting as a diplomat's wife.

ANDREW I. KILLGORE
Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1961-1965)

Andrew I. Killgore was born on a farm in Alabama, and graduated from a small teacher's training college in Livingston, Alabama. He entered the Foreign Service as a Wristonee, initially working as a service staff officer. He has served in Jordan, Baghdad, Iran, and Qatar. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on June 15, 1988.

Q: I think this is important. We'll be moving on to later stages of your career shortly, but could you discuss how you and how you think some of the fellow officers who came in to Arabic training felt? We've already mentioned "cookie pushers" being a term for diplomat, but also Arabists in the State Department have, ever since I've known about this, been considered terribly pro-Arab, anti-Israeli. How did you and your contemporaries, as much as you can go back to that time, look at the Middle East? Did you call it the Middle East or the Near East?

KILLGORE: Well, it's up and down. Mostly it's called the Middle East, although the bureau is called the Bureau of Near East and South Asian Affairs.

Q: How did you and your contemporaries look at the Middle East at that time? Was there a mind set?

KILLGORE: No, I don't think so. I think we looked at the geography and history and resources of the area; we recognized that it had tremendous geopolitical importance, a great importance for the United States. Actually, Stuart, most Arabists felt like we were a very special bunch. We were overwhelmingly veterans of World War II. That was a camaraderie. It's difficult to learn Arabic. You have to work like hell at it. We were both amused and a bit put out by the term "Arabist," which is actually a euphemism employed by the Zionists to signal, "Watch out for this guy." It means the guy might be an anti-Semite, probably anti-Semitic. Certainly anti-Israel. No, we didn't look on ourselves as being -- in the first place, to describe a complex, brilliant officer in the Foreign Service, in terms of him being anti or pro a particular foreign country is terribly demeaning and degrading. People are enormously complex. We all felt that we had been in World War II, we had helped bring down the Axis, which was the worst of all evils I ever heard about in history. So then because you study Arabic, to be called an Arabist. Is a person called a Frenchist or a Germanist or Chinologist? I have never seen Chinologist.

Q: Somebody who studies Chinese, yes. It's a term that comes from the British, I think.

KILLGORE: I don't know where it comes from, but certainly the use of it all the time, I don't put that on the British; I put that on political forces in this country.

So we felt close to each other. The area wasn't well known, and we thought we were doing a job for our country of reporting back and trying to create knowledge about an important area of the world for us, for the United States. We didn't regard ourselves as patriots. To my mind, that's a stupid term to call someone a patriot, inasmuch as I regard about 99.99% of Americans as very fond of their country, and very strange if they're not. As I say, there was a closeness. Some people refer to it as a club. I think the fact that we were perhaps resented by some groups in this country, including powerful forces in the State Department, contributed in a peculiar way to the excellence of our work, the outstanding quality of much of our work.

I was riding in March of this year from Jerusalem down to the Gaza Strip. The driver was named Kiley, from Ireland, driving a United Nations vehicle. I asked him how could it be that so many great literary figures had come from Ireland, and I started spinning them off, headed by William Butler Yeats, whom I think is the greatest of all poets. He didn't respond to me, but after a mile or so, he said, "Maybe it's the repression." I thought about that, and I have decided that probably Kiley was right. Jesse Jackson has the passion and fire because he is a man who's come up from a great deep ocean of repression against black people in this country. No white politician could talk like Jesse Jackson. It would be impossible for one to be there.

But I don't want to press the point of any resentment we felt too far. We felt that we were doing a good job, a good professional job. We were determined not to be prejudiced, to show any overt prejudice in our official and other acts. We recognized, of course, that the United States is made up of various groups and that we don't claw at each other. Rather, we have to support and love each other. So we understood what motivated the Zionists. We understood the Holocaust. We understood the things that had happened to them.

Q: I would like to single out two posts. I note here you served in Beirut from 1956 to 1957, Jerusalem from 1957 to 1959, and in Amman, Jordan, from 1959 to 1961. Maybe to concentrate just briefly on your Jerusalem-Amman time, because these two tie together pretty much. Jerusalem was, in those days, part of Jordan.

KILLGORE: That's right. It was divided, you know, the new city and the walled city.

Q: What type of work were you doing?

KILLGORE: I was covering the West Bank politically. I did some consular work on the side. When the visa officer would be gone or something, or I would sign a passport if someone was away. But overwhelmingly, I did political reporting, political analysis for the West Bank and Arab Jerusalem for that two and a half years I was there. I hadn't had any experience as a political officer. And you know, the State Department can't quite tell you what to do; you have to figure out what to do yourself. So I decided that I would do a lot of biographic reports, and I started doing biographic reports on well known political figures.

Q: Could you explain what biographic reports are?

KILLGORE: You write a report giving the details of a person's life, how old he is, what kind of a family he's from, where he studied, just a biography. What's this person like? It's a short biography. It may be as little as four or five pages, something like that. How many children he has, how rich he is, what political parties does he belong to.

Q: How do you do this?

KILLGORE: You go talk to the people and you talk to other people about different people. One of the interesting things I discovered there after a while was that there is a Palestinian establishment in the West Bank. Everybody who's anybody is interrelated by blood, marriage, or certainly business. There's a very definite strong establishment made up of business people, lawyers, doctors, professors, journalists, and religious people. These reports were very highly valued. I got all sorts of kudos from the State Department. They loved them. Eventually, a lot of this stuff was stuck into a CIA file, because they had the machinery where you could record the biographic information about various politicians or business people on a computer, and you could punch a button, and it would come out in a second, because the State Department and the White House and the U.S. Government always are terribly afraid something will happen and a new guy will pop up that no one ever heard of. (Laughs)

Q: It is an obsession. Of course, it's important, and often information is rather sparse, but at least it makes you appear that you're on top of things.

I think this is important, because we're talking now in 1988, and there are rather serious resistance movement, both civil and more physical, in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. But you were there and dealing with this before it became under the control of Israel. What was the movement then? How did you see things going in the West Bank?

KILLGORE: There was one movement very heavily against King Hussein, against his central government in Amman. There was a resentment that these Bedouin-dominated regimes, lacking in culture, as seen by the better educated Palestinians, were ruling this very talented and highly educated people. It was sort of like Rome and Greece. Rome ruled Greece, but the Greeks looked down on the Romans for a long time. The same thing with the Arabs and the Iranians, when Islam swept over. To this day there's a real resentment in Iran, for example, that, as they see them, the sort of scruffy desert Arabs came to rule what had been the great empire of Cyrus and Darius and whatnot. "We have a superior culture. Also, we had a lovely religion, Zoroastrianism, and Islam had taken it over." As a matter of fact, the language almost became Arabic. That's one thing.

Another thing, there was a deep resentment against the United States, which was reckoned to be supporting Israel. This, of course, was before the Palestine Liberation Organization was begun, which, I believe, was 1964. The Palestinians were keenly interested in education. They would do anything and spend any resources they could borrow, beg, or steal to educate their children.

Q: Were many going to the United States?

KILLGORE: Many, many were going off to the United States.

Q: Was there any problem with this on our part?

KILLGORE: No. On the whole, there was also a conviction on the part of the Palestinians that the Israelis would seize the proper moment to grab the rest of Palestine, which was the West Bank and Gaza. I confess that I argued that they were wrong, that they just would be satisfied with what they had, roughly 78%, 79% of the whole British mandate of Palestine, but it turned out the Palestinians were right after all. It was heavily agricultural, olive growing, Palestinians were already leaving, of course, to seek opportunity in Persian Gulf. Oil was being produced by that time, and the economy, particularly of Kuwait, was growing fast, the economies of Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates.

Mostly I found -- as do most Americans who get to know the Palestinians -- them very attractive. They are a bit like the southerners, very much family oriented. They are absolutely enjoined to be generous. You're bound to be generous and hospitable, that's part of the culture, and you're bound to be polite -- all the things that I learned as a boy down on the farm in Alabama. I found them very, very attractive, on the whole. A tremendous emphasis on food. My God, you think we eat in this country? (Laughs) You should go out there!

Q: You had no particular problem getting out and around?

KILLGORE: No. I traveled to every single part of the West Bank. There's hardly a village I didn't go to.

Q: Going back to what you were reporting, you say you received all sorts of kudos. Was there any problem in reporting? Did you feel you were under any constraints from reporting on what was going on in the West Bank?

KILLGORE: No. The '67 War hadn't happened. Things changed fundamentally after the 1967 War, because in the '67 War, Israel lost most of its international friends; at least it aroused a great deal of resistance and resentment in the Western world after grabbing the West Bank, particularly as it became clear that they weren't going to relinquish it.

There was one occasion, particularly, which happened in probably the fall of 1958 or a bit later. It would have been mid-winter of 1958. I was still consul in Jerusalem, living right there by the Mandelbaum Gate. A fellow came through and talked to me, a journalist, a big guy. I can't remember his name. I don't know whether he was Jewish or whether he was Christian. But we talked at great length. I wish, in view of what happened subsequently, that I had been able to remember his name. But I said, of course, that no state or no country in between the great population centers of Egypt and the Tigris Euphrates, Iran centers, or if you go back to the Hittites, from the Turkish plateau, no country in between had been able to maintain independence for very long, and thus, unless Israel made some sort of a peace deal with the Palestinians, her days were numbered, some decades.

I moved up to Amman, the capital of Jordan, in September 1959. After I'd been up there just a few weeks, I got an official informal letter, as it's called, via the diplomatic pouch from Murat Williams, who was the deputy chief of mission at our U.S. Embassy at Tel Aviv, Israel, at that time. Murat said in that letter that, "I hate to send you this letter, but a man who talked to you several months ago apparently talked to the Israeli foreign ministry about a conversation you had in your office, in which you talked quite dispassionately about great historical trends and history of the area, and that you thought that Israel, unless it made a deal with the Arabs, would have a limited lifespan in the Middle East." This man, according to what the Israeli foreign ministry told Murat Williams, had said to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, "While you spoke with great dispassion, he sensed (that's the term he used) that the demise of Israel wouldn't upset you unduly," or something to that effect.

This was a shot across my bow, because it was based on the fact that I was an Arabist and I was getting pretty popular and I was well known and I was beginning to get promoted. I was coming in to be a figure of some consequence in the system. I wrote back and I told Murat Williams, "Tell the fellow in the foreign ministry who spoke to you about this that I said, 'Go to hell.'" That's the way I handled that. But I recognized it for what it was.

STEPHEN E. PALMER, JR.
Tel Aviv (1963-1966)

Stephen E. Palmer, Jr. was born in Superior, Wisconsin on July 31, 1923. He received a bachelor's degree from Princeton University and served in the U.S. Marine Corps. His Foreign Service career included positions in Nicosia, Belgrade, Sarajevo, Tel Aviv, London, Islamabad, Madras, Geneva, and Washington, DC. Mr. Palmer was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on June 31, 1995.

Q: So we'll move to Tel Aviv, and you were there from '63 to '66.

PALMER: Yes.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

PALMER: Had a very fine ambassador. I have been fortunate in my career generally with ambassadors. Walworth Barbour was the ambassador throughout the time I was there, and a great deal longer. And then after NEA and the system had picked me to be head of the political section in Tel Aviv, I was asked to go up to Gloucester, Mass. where Barbour was summering in his beach house nearby, in order to let him peruse and comment on this Johnston Plan about which I spoke earlier on the Arab refugee settlement proposals. And I hadn't realized until I got there that this was also an opportunity for Barbour to look me over. Apparently he did this with most officers being assigned, or being proposed for Tel Aviv. I remember the first question he asked me was whether I played golf, and I said I didn't. And he said, why not? And I said I hadn't grown up in a place where golf was accessible for people of modest means, and he said, do you play bridge? And I said, yes, I do play bridge. He said, are you good? I said my wife was very good, and I guessed I was okay. And he said, well that's good. Then he barbecued a meal for the two of us, I think his sister was there too, and retired to read this voluminous plan, a very complicated plan. He said he'd see me over breakfast. I was just amazed at his thorough comprehension of the ins and outs of this very intricate plan just from apparently one reading the night before. A very swift learner. In the meantime I guess he decided that I would be okay for that post, and he said, you get a set of golf clubs and I'll see you in Tel Aviv.

So immediately I arrived the actual negotiations regarding that plan were very much on center stage. Johnston had visited Tel Aviv and the pertinent Arab posts, and now our task was to persuade the Israelis to go along with it, bilaterally persuade them. It was tough sledding. Golda Meir was very questioning of it, and Eshkol who had become Prime Minister, was more open minded but not fully persuaded. They were intensive negotiations, and as you know we were in Tel Aviv and the Foreign Ministry was in Jerusalem so we'd go up there often, the appointments were late in the afternoon and we'd arrive back well into the evening and then I'd have to do the reporting cables. So it was an arduous time.

The long and short of it, without going into all the details, was that the Syrians sabotaged the plan as they had previous plans about sharing the Jordan waters. And that gave the Israelis an excuse, which I think they really wanted, if the Syrians can't buy it, they couldn't buy it. So that was a wash, and that was the last significant initiative of the Kennedy administration in regard to any Arab-Israel negotiation.

Q: What was the feeling in the embassy when you got there -- here was this plan, and you had people in the political section who were experienced in this type of negotiation, knew the Israelis, how did they feel about the plan?

PALMER: Well, as a matter of fact...I don't want this to sound overly proud, you've come upon one of the factors that made it somewhat difficult to deal aptly with the Israelis, and that is because of our policy of generally not staffing the embassy with persons who were steeped in the Near East and the Arab-Israel problem particularly. There had been indeed a kind of a pattern of people going there from wherever they were before, from Turkey, or western Europe, or wherever. And they were really impressed by the Israelis and became, not partisan, but in some cases overly sympathetic to the Israeli point of view. And it was simply because they didn't have experience on both sides. Whereas I, albeit being in Washington then a little bit in New York, had dealt with Arab-Israel issues for almost four years and that was the reason I was assigned there in the first place. So I had in my section two excellent officers, neither of whom had served in Israel before, nor in the Arab world: George Lambrakis and John Leonard. They were just terrific. They handled mostly the internal political situation which was a big thing to handle, and I dealt with the foreign ministry and the international stuff. So there wasn't any resistance in the Embassy. The then DCM who was a very nice man had never had any experience in the Arab world.

Q: Who was that?

PALMER: That was Spencer Barnes initially, and he was replaced by an economic officer named William Dale. I had mentioned earlier that while I was in Tel Aviv, we and my counterparts in the Arab posts, initiated the first ever exchanges of visits, and I went to the Arab capitals of the neighboring states to Israel. I never did get to Damascus. I well remember the first sessions that I went to, Cairo where my counterpart was Don Bergus, and by coincidence the National War College visit was on while I was there, so I was invited to the reception for them. It was very touching when the word got around among the Egyptian officials, most of whom were high ranking military officers, that this was a political officer from our Embassy in Tel Aviv. They all clustered around me and were just so eager to find out my thoughts on things; they were open minded I thought. So all of the counterparts, Don Bergus and Dick Parker from Beirut, I've forgotten who was in Amman, and Dick Murphy from Damascus, subsequently paid visits to me, and I instituted for them, and also used for other occasions, stag luncheons. I found by having a stag affair during the working day I could attract really the top Israelis, for instance, one regular was the head of military intelligence. They were just absolutely frank exchanges between my Arabist friends from the neighboring posts, and these very high ranking Israeli officials, Foreign Ministry as well as Defense. I think it was a constructive small step in the right direction.

Another factor in our tour in Tel Aviv was our oldest daughter attended the American Community School in Beirut. And at that time the Lebanese authorities, on being asked by our embassy there, said there was no problem at all for us to just drive up to the city, and they would arrange it at the crossing point, but please don't use your Israeli license plates. Fortunately I hadn't thrown away our expired Maryland plates so I used those for our crossings, and to take her to and from school. That also worked for our occasional visits to the Old City of Jerusalem and to Amman. We spent an annual leave in Amman, and we spent another one in Beirut. This was another instance of reaching out and trying to get a feel for the other side.

Q: What was your impression of the Israeli government apparatus at the time you were there? It was the Labor Party I gather.

PALMER: Yes, it was the Labor Party and no one gave the Herut party, later Likud, any chance of ever getting into power. I remember people sort of scoffed at me because I called on Menachem Begin once and had a fascinating historical review with him. But you know, why waste your time with someone like that. Yes, of course, they had locked up the whole Labor apparatus which also owns huge companies, which was a huge employer in itself. So you had the situation which still obtains where the religious parties, some very Orthodox, elements, have a swing power much greater than their numbers because they provide the government with its majority. But it was a formidable apparatus. I think the fascinating thing was that there was within each party a wide range of views from doves to hawks in the case of national security and also regarding social issues.

One of the phenomenon that John Leonard, one of my officers, kept an eye on was the growing political clout of the Sephardic immigrants, mostly from Arab countries, which was new. They were sort of preempted by the Labor Party, but they began to become more politically sensitive and sensible of their own numbers. That phenomenon of feeling left out by the Europe origin of Ashkenazim was really one of the factors that led to Begin's electoral victory.

Q: I'm told by people who served in Tel Aviv that it's both a political officers heaven and a nightmare because everybody talks, they're extremely articulate, but overload is the name of the game.

PALMER: That's true, and I think it was particularly challenging for the officers who were focused on the domestic political situation. For instance, George Lambrakis had a very fine relationship with Shimon Peres; I think they were about the same age and they got along very well together. I developed a good personal relationship with Abba Eban, whom I found very straightforward, and honest. So it was really fun.

One little sidelight, by this time I was into my fifth year of dealing with Arab-Israel affairs, and I applied for on-the-job Arabic language training with a tutor. There were plenty of Arabs who could have done it, it could have helped me. FSI turned me down. They said that Israel was not a proper place to study Arabic. My career would have been quite different had I been able at least to start Arabic training there.

Q: In the first place, Walworth Barbour, he was in Israel for a very long time as some of our ambassadors were. I mean, Sam Lewis is another one. I've heard that this is both good and bad, you have wonderful contacts, but the other one is that its very easy for clientitis to take over. Was this reflected in what you were doing, and what he was doing?

PALMER: Wally indeed was very warm-hearted to the centrality of Israeli experience, and they responded with great affection. For instance, on these refugee problem negotiations, my initiation with him and the Israeli establishment. He was very tenacious, he was a darn hard negotiator, and I'm sure nobody could have done any better than he. On the question of Israel's then incipient nuclear arms development, he was very tough. He realized the criticality of that. Nobody in the embassy, to my knowledge -- no other State person at least -- was in on some of the details of that, they were so highly classified.

As you may recall, we collectively in the Department and the embassy, felt that we could at least deter the Israelis from developing nuclear weapons capability if we provided them with conventional arms. It ended up that they had both, but it was a worthwhile ploy. And I know some of the Arab post colleagues thought that would be the end of the world if we provided conventional arms to Israel. Well, it turned out not to be such a bum idea.

Q: How did you view our other posts? I'm particularly thinking of our embassies in Beirut, Damascus, Amman, and Cairo, perhaps Riyadh, as far as how they were presenting the case, and did you find yourself almost having to carry on a defensive dialogue with them in your reporting?

PALMER: No, not really. I think the visits exchanges had helped. I do not recall any degree of clientitis on the part of my counterparts in their reporting. There had been a traditional institutional antagonism between our post in Jerusalem, which was an independent post as you know, independent the embassy in Tel Aviv. During my initial period in Tel Aviv I was struck by the occasional bitterness on the part of the consul general or the ambassador in open reporting; it became almost personal. Some of us worked on that, and we established to both to them that the other was a worthy colleague, and they began to get along okay.

Q: Who was the consul general?

PALMER: Evan Wilson. He was a very fine man, very well versed. He wrote two books on the Jerusalem issue. I found him very helpful. Of course, given the, if you will, the mutual interest, particularly Amman had with us, and Beirut also in connection with the Palestine refugees, on both sides of the border we embassies knew it was important, for instance, for the U.S. to fund adequately the Arab refugee agency. So we did some things in common.

Q: How did you view the way the Israelis dealt with their internal Arab problem?

PALMER: I think the most generous description of that would be Uncle Tomism. They were certainly second class citizens, and in some ways they still are. The Arabs who remain, and I don't want to characterize them as being very different from those who left and became refugees, but it's natural that those who remained were people who were not as activist and accepted their fate more easily. Anyway, they were essentially bought off.

Q: So they didn't represent any movement.

PALMER: No. There were some Arab party leaders, particularly from the Nazareth area, who were very active in a Martin Luther King sort of way in terms of language instruction and the equivalency and the quality of education. That was going on, and there were some riots in the Nazareth area over what we in the embassy regarded as very unfortunate. Israeli seizures of Arab property. This is an area which my associate John Leonard kept a close eye on, and interestingly, after his tour in Tel Aviv was completed he left the Foreign Service and went into training as a Syrian Catholic and has been ever since in a monastery in Nazareth.

Q: What was the view of Nasser and Nasser's threats and Nasserists in the Arab world to Israel at that time. We're talking, you were there from '63 to '66.

PALMER: Well, it was considered very real by the Israelis. By that I mean that they had sporadically pretty good intelligence about some of the more bizarre military threats that he was trying to mount in terms of the Germans working on missiles, etc. So it was serious, and I think we had without a doubt a better fix on the Israeli military thinking, and their foreign intelligence, than our colleagues had vis-a-vis the Egyptian establishment at that time. It was scary.

Q: Were you getting from your military attachés, your own contacts within the Israeli military, the idea that they were going to strike first if there was a problem.

PALMER: No. We got none of that. Certainly in terms of preparation we appreciated their capacity to do so. I was not aware of any planning in the back of their minds for preemptive strikes, unless they found, as they concluded they did in Iraq, the beginning of a nuclear weapons development.

Q: What about the Jewish lobby in the United States? Did you find yourself spending a good deal of time dealing with visitors who were coming over who were unofficial but represented Jewish interests in the United States?

PALMER: No. I mentioned earlier that during the time we were preparing for the Johnston refugee initiative, the White House, and Mike Feldman -- I mentioned him earlier -- was very helpful. He was the White House man specifically for the Jewish constituency of the Democratic party. In Tel Aviv it was rather striking that the Zionist leaders, and others who visited Israel from the United States, very rarely had anything to do with the embassy. They meshed right in with the Israeli preparations for them, the government and the Jewish Agency, and others. I remember attending a big session, I mean perhaps a thousand people in a theater that was near the embassy on the waterfront, and I attended because we routinely received invitations to these things from the Israeli organizers, and I noted that Foreign Minister Golda Meir was going to give the major speech, so I attended. And she really gave them a very partisan, a very Zionist pitch. It was quite unbalanced and very spirited and emotional, and then she was just winding down when she spotted me, I was seated down front, and she said, "Oh my, I didn't realize we had a goyim here."

Q: Did you find in your reporting that you were having to keep in mind that any reports that might be disparaging of anything in Israel, as we're always reporting around the world, but in this case that it might get leaked to the press? Did one have to take precautions to report by other means, or be a bit self-censor or not?

PALMER: We certainly didn't do any self-censoring or toning down. It never occurred to us, it really didn't. Historically, of course, there had been the case where the Israeli desk officer had his career ruined after having...well, not the Israeli desk, the Palestine desk officer. This was way back at the establishment, or right after the establishment of Israel, and the pro-Israel lobby had his career. But they knew better than to mess with us, and I think the fact that Barbour himself was held in such high regard gave us some immunity, if you will. Anyway, we reported things as we saw them, and certainly in my reports I never put on kid gloves. I did have a rather voluminous official-informal correspondence with my key NEA contact, Harry Symmes, but that practice was not unusual.

Q: So you left there in '66, before the big '67 war which changed the balance tremendously. What was your impression of whither Israel when you left in '66?

PALMER: Partly because of my professional involvement for so long in the refugee problem, I remained concerned that the people element of the Arab-Israeli problem be ameliorated. Things could become dangerous. In retrospect it was probably an over emphasis of the people element. But anyway, that's the way I felt then. I was concerned also about their attitude and actions with regard to the division, or their non-division more accurately, of the Jordan River waters. The Israeli non-sharing, or not sharing in a fair way. That underlay a lot of animosity on the part of the Syrians as well as the Jordanians. I left after three years there with a keen appreciation for the single-mindedness of the Israeli establishment to be tough, and not to be perceived as weak. And also, generally speaking, their unwillingness to foresee the possibilities of a negotiated settlement.

Q: One last question. Did golf help you? You know in some countries such as Thailand, Burma and Korea, it's almost essential to play golf but I've never heard it said that of Israel.

PALMER: Wally Barbour played golf almost every non-rainy day. So it was a personal thing with him. As a matter of fact, so overworked was I the first few months with these negotiations, etc., and in an exhausted state one weekend, I was trimming some high rose bushes around the place where we lived, and I really put my back out, a spinal disc, and I never lifted a golf club. I sold them when I left.

GEORGE LAMBRAKIS
Tel Aviv, Israel (1963-1966)

George Lambrakis was born in Illinois in 1931. After receiving his bachelor's degree from Princeton University in 1952, he went on to earn both his master's degree from Johns Hopkins University in 1953 and his law degree from Tufts University in 1969. His career has included positions in Saigon, Pakse, Conakry, Munich, Tel Aviv, and Teheran. Mr. Lambrakis was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in June 2002.

Q: You were in Tel Aviv from when?

LAMBRAKIS: I was in Tel Aviv from 1963 to 1966, about three or three and a half years. This was a very interesting time, before the '67 war. We had a political section of three people, four people counting the aide to the ambassador. The CIA there operated entirely as liaison. My personal job was both internal politics and handling the cross border incidents that were taking place regularly across the borders from Jordan, Syria, and to some degree, Lebanon. I got to meet all of the stars that you hear about. I knew Dayan personally, Peres personally, Begin personally, as well as many of the others, such as Ezer and Weizmann. All of these people became even better known later on.

Q: You got there in '63. What was the situation in Israel at the time?

LAMBRAKIS: Well the situation in Israel hasn't changed a hell of a lot except in some ways I can describe. The Arab-Israeli situation has become probably the largest part of my career one way or the other. At that time, '67 hadn't taken place. Brael was still organizing itself as a new state. While I was there Ben Gurion, Eshkol, and Golda Meier, were the three prime ministers. It was still run by the Labor Party. It was still the regional Israel, as it were. A major change in Israeli foreign policy took place with the election of the right wing, the Herut party and Begin only in 1977.

Q: So it was a labor government.

LAMBRAKIS: Labor government internally. While I was there the United States changed its policy in one major way, to begin selling arms to Israel which only the French, among Western powers, were doing before. It turns out I had a personal hand in it because I wrote a telegram describing how the Israelis were getting very impatient with the way the Syrians in particular were trying to close off their water sources. The headwaters of the Jordan was one of the big issues at the time. I had very good contacts in Israel, and I suggested they might just lash out in time. Interestingly enough, two or three days later, my boss Steve Palmer said, "There is a telegram in. It is LIMDIS, limited distribution, and you are not authorized to read it, but what I can tell you is that your last telegram seems to have tipped the balance, so now the United States is prepared to sell arms to Israel for its own defense." I, of course, didn't know anything about that kind of debate going on in Washington, because I was too removed from it. The amount of interchange has changed so much; the second person in a political section not being able to read a limited distribution cable is unheard of today. But that happened. What else happened then; a lot of different things. I could tell you some stories which have to do with how you operate as a diplomat.

Q: Yes.

LAMBRAKIS: One of these stories: I had a lot of good contacts there with Israeli journalists who, unlike other places, have very good contacts themselves. Israel is a country where you can learn a lot from the press but even more from the journalists themselves, who like to keep you as their contact as well. The issue had been on one occasion whether the Israelis would carry out a return attack for one of the cross border attacks they had suffered. We had sort of set up a record of asking them to restrain themselves every time we saw that coming. So it was not in their interest to let us know in advance what they were going to do. On this occasion, we didn't know whether they would or wouldn't. Just before the ambassador's staff meeting (the ambassador at that time was Wally Barbour who had been there for about eight or nine years. He stayed like ten or eleven, the longest serving ambassador to Israel, although my friend Sam Lewis who was a classmate of mine at SAIS, later became one of the longest serving ambassadors in Israel also. But Wally Barbour still holds the record.) Anyway, just before that staff meeting I had gone down to the commissary in the basement to buy something, and this reporter I knew actually tracked me down, and he told me that unlike what he had told me over the phone, the Israeli military were not going to carry out this reprisal attack. So I went in to the staff meeting, and the military attachés, the colonels, said they had their good contacts in the defense department who said they are going to carry out the reprisal attack. I said I just heard from this contact who says that they won't. Perhaps because my contacts were so good, the ambassador decided to go with me. And they carried out the reprisal attack. So that burned one of my contacts. I never believed him again.

Another such story: There was a very senior ambassador who was in charge of monitoring cross border raids, cross border activities in the Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem, which is an hour and a half away from Tel Aviv. I used to go see him. On one occasion, we got a telegram from Washington, unusually brief. The Israelis had just occupied a bridge over the Jordan River which in effect was going into Jordan. Washington said, "Tell the Israelis to get off the bridge." It was basically in that many words. So I was sent up there, and I, a very junior political officer, was sitting before this very senior ambassador. I said, "You must get off the bridge. Washington says you must get off the bridge." He was incandescent. He just blew up. I got back in the car on my way back to Tel Aviv. It took an hour and a half. By the time I got there, he had called my boss and said, "What is this guy Lambrakis doing?" Steve Palmer said, "Those are his instructions." But again you have to have your bosses back you up in these situations.

Q: Oh, yes. What about, at that time of course, Israel had not occupied the west bank. Was there much contact with, I guess it was part of Jordan at that time. Was there much contact there? I mean how were the Palestinians perceived in those days?

LAMBRAKIS: Well, the Palestinians were perceived as non-entities because, remember, before 1967 while a PLO was in existence, it was not very lively. It was run by a very passive character in Cairo before Arafat took over. And it was the '67 war that really made the PLO active. Mind you there were groups of revisionists, who would attack across the borders. Some of the major problems which historically occurred were due to them. This included the 1954 Gaza raid which Israel carried out as a major reprisal raid for the attacks over the borders from Egyptian controlled Gaza, which indirectly started a series of events that ended up with the Suez crisis of 1956. That was important enough. There was another heavy Israeli reprisal raid in Jordan whose name I forget now, which followed a series of pin pricks across the Jordan River; that again made an awful lot of trouble for the Jordanian King Hussein, the brave young king as he was known in the U.S. There was the Lavon affair hanging in the background. The Lavon affair was a complicated thing that had happened in the early 1950s when the foreign minister, Lavon, I guess at that time he might have been minister of defense.

Q: I think he was minister of defense for some reason.

LAMBRAKIS: That's right. He was blamed for messing up one of the secret Israeli operations that was intended to tear up U.S. relations with Egypt by pinning on the Egyptians some kind of attack on American installations in Cairo, which the Israelis carried out indirectly and were caught. Lavon was the one who was supposed to have given the order. Ben Gurion insisted that it was Lavon's problem, not his. That hung over the Labor Party at the later time when Dayan was minister of defense. Peres was below him in the ministry as secretary general. There was an awful lot of internal political action that we were following in Israel. I can go on now and talk to you about what I did when I came back to the Israel desk.

Q: We want to do that, but how was Ambassador Walworth Barbour seen? Was he seen as being by his junior officers as being in the pocket of the Israelis, or was he his own man?

LAMBRAKIS: Wally, I wouldn't say he was in the pocket of the Israelis, but I would say that he had made a decision that he was quite open about, saying that the Arabs were hopeless. You must remember at the time that the Arabs had tried to carry out a war, invading Israel in '48. Lost it. Their foreign policy under Nasser and others was one failure after another. Wally had been in the UK; he had been in the Soviet Union. He had been through the '56 crisis when he was DCM in the UK. There is no question that he was on the Israeli side. I don't think he would ever have been in line to become assistant secretary or anything of that kind because he wasn't balanced enough in that sense. On the other hand, he was a pro. He could write very good cables when he chose to, and he carried things on as a professional. I don't think he leaned towards the Israelis when leaning meant serious changes in policy, but there is no question that they liked him, and he lasted so long and in effect, longer than political appointees afterwards, some of them Jewish. At the time when he was there, there were no Jewish officers ever assigned to Israel. But then I don't think there weren't Greek-Americans assigned to Greece.

Q: Did you get any feel that in our embassy as a political officer you were obviously reading the cables that were coming from the other posts in the area. Was it a them versus us idea? I mean you know, the pro-Israelis can see these and the others, the Arabists. Would you consider that they were seeing a different world or something or they were too wedded to the Arabs or something like that?

LAMBRAKIS: Well, in justice I think that the Arabists of the world suspected that the Israelis were up to something, which in the long run turned out to be true, but which at the time we didn't think the Israelis were up to. In fact I remember we went through a whole production. I was part of drafting a cable in which we talked about the fact that Israel because its an industrial nation, would no longer be dependent on territory for its economic future, and had no ambitions to take more territory. Mind you this was under a Labor government, and this was in the early 1960s. There was an awful lot of pressure in the Arab world to throw the Jews into the sea. The Arab posts were reporting this and properly were suspicious of what the Israelis were up to. There was a right wing in Israel which talked about Judea and Samaria and how the Bible required this to be Jewish. We thought of them as kooks at the time. It was a small minority that were writing in a few newspapers, and we thought, you know, this is not who is running the country. Interestingly enough, Ezer Weizmann who was heading the air force at the time was considered the most right wing hawk. He is now president of Israel, and is considered a dove compared to where everybody else has moved. What happened primarily as of '67, but afterwards in '77 as well, is that the whole Israeli political establishment, and with it the majority of the people, moved steadily right, more hard line, after this period.

Q: What about relations with our consulate general in Jerusalem. I know later on they got very strained. At this time was there much of a difference?

LAMBRAKIS: I don't think there was because, again, sure there would be differences at times, and the consulate general always had to protect its independence from ambassadors on both sides, particularly from Israel. But then there wasn't any effort to take that over. I think our embassy didn't consider the consulate in Jerusalem as being terribly important in the way things were going, so you can't say that we worried much about them. As I obviously knew Consul General Wilson and other people in the consulate, they worried more about us than the other way around. Sometimes there was, I wouldn't say bad feeling, I would just say different views.

Q: Well of course, it was really after the '67 war when essentially they became the representatives of the occupied territories.

LAMBRAKIS: Right.

Q: At that time, Israel was a sort of a dead end. You couldn't serve in an Arab country if you had served in Israel.

LAMBRAKIS: I don't think that was entirely so. Of course I was not an Arabist, so that was a problem. Later on as you know, even though I had served in Israel, I went to Lebanon and Iran. I presumably could have gone anywhere else if I was an Arabist. In fact it was brought to my attention later on when I was in line for an ambassadorship somewhere in the area and Roy Atherton noted that I was not an Arabist, as ambassadors there were supposed to be. However, this was a particularly important moment in U.S. policy, because the six day war must have scared the American Jewish community as it scared the Israelis. And I have always wondered in my own mind why the American Jewish community became so strongly pro-Israel after a war which the Israelis won hands down so easily. Up to then there had been a strong anti-Zionist group in the U.S. which disappeared after '67. We on the Israeli desk noticed this because from one day to the next we were dealing differently.

The '67 war personally was important to me because, having served in Israel, I predicted that the Israelis would win the war on the first day when they destroyed the Egyptian and Syrian air forces on the ground. I wrote the first cable. For the first week I was writing the cables all around the world. I remember we got a cable later from Mac Godley, who was ambassador in Laos, saying this is the best coverage I have ever seen in the Foreign Service of any important event. But Roy Atherton asked me, "Do we really want to say the Israelis won this war?" So we tried to cover ourselves. But it was very clear to me from what I had seen of Israeli military abilities that if they destroyed the air force they were going to win. It was only a question of when.

I also did briefings that first week for the NATO embassies. I got a very good friend in the Belgian embassy as a result. Mike Sterner and I alternated after that. We kept this up for several weeks. I think the '67 war made the Israelis feel invincible. One of the interesting things to me was that Abba Eban and others, Abba Eban was then the foreign minister under Golda Meier, came out saying Israel do not want to hold on to any of these territories. It was prepared to return them all for peace. Then within a few weeks we were hearing, "well the exception is Jerusalem, well the exception is Sharm-el-Sheikh..." Then there was something called the Alon plan which was to set up a series of strong points all along the Jordan River, even though the rest of the territory would eventually be returned.

We do know the Arabs didn't help themselves at all by going to Khartoum in November, having already burned one British or American embassy, I don't remember. They attacked several embassies in the Arab world. They went down there, and there they came up with the three or four no's of Khartoum, no negotiations, no recognition, no this, no that which didn't help any with the Israeli public. So within about six months the Israelis were talking about returning some territories, but not many. As you know, eventually there was this compromise resolution, resolution 242, in the Security Council, which I always tell my students about, where ambiguity of language was purposeful and was the only way to get the resolution passed, in which peace and security on one side were to be exchanged for "territories conquered" by the Israelis in 1967, not "the territories conquered." Because ever since then it has always been accepted that the Israelis will hold on to some of that territory. The question has always been how much.

Q: Well did you get a feel on the desk about the Jewish community in the United States?

LAMBRAKIS: Oh, yes, sure. Maybe those were different days, but you know, we in the State Department did not feel that our job was to reflect American political realities. We left that to the Congress and the White House. We called the shots, we thought, the way we saw them. Yes, we did get pressures here and there, but not directly. As a matter of fact, a little side story, when my next assignment came up and I was going to be assigned to the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, I didn't mind going as Congressional Intern instead. Roy Atherton, as I recall, said to me, "Why do you want to go as a Congressional Intern anyway? What is there to be done there?" Those were days in which the Congress operated separately from us. While I was in Israel for example, I was control officer for a visit of Senator Tunney from California and Congressman Culver, both of whom were close to Kennedy. We visited various places in Israel, but I never felt political pressure. Nowadays I think there is great pressure on the State Department to make things easier for the White House in the sense that if you report something which doesn't fit political beliefs, it is going to be turned down or twisted, so you might as well do it the other way to begin with, which I think is too bad, but it is the way the world has developed.

Q: Was anybody saying let's watch out for the Israelis because now they have gotten this, I mean this does not look like, I mean this nation which is fighting for its life now, may turn into a monster to gobble up the rest of the...

LAMBRAKIS: I didn't feel that very much. There is a lot of talk about how the Arabists are running the State Department and all that, which as you know, has resulted actually in one case of a Jewish lobbyist becoming Assistant Secretary of NEA.

Q: He was not even an American citizen until, an Australian...

LAMBRAKIS: Right. I don't know his background, but he was ambassador in Israel, and he was Assistant Secretary which I thought was...

Q: He was the head of American-Israeli...

LAMBRAKIS: ...public affairs committee.

Q: And as an Australian citizen.

LAMBRAKIS: Right. Interesting. Well, others you know, Ned Walker, Nick Veliotis whom I served under eventually and others, had to take much more care about getting through the Congress. You know, they had to be acceptable as not Arabists. I never felt the Arabists had that much influence. Frankly, I always thought the Israeli desk carried its proper weight in there, and I still do. After 1967 I think we all thought that Israel would be very secure, just as the Israelis did. So the 1973 war came as a shock. That is another story. We will get to it if you want to later on. You have to remember, there has been a book written about 1967. The Liberty, the attack on this American ship by the Israelis who sank it with the loss of a large number of naval personnel.

Q: I think it was around 30 or something.

LAMBRAKIS: Really?

Q: Yes, but it was significant, and for many people in the Navy and others have never forgotten because you know it is impossible to think it was not a deliberate attack.

LAMBRAKIS: I agree. I remember at the time, and I was on the Israeli desk just before the war started, there was a lot of pressure being put on the Israelis as well as on the Egyptians and Syrians, particularly on the Egyptians, on Nasser, to keep the war from breaking out. I think the Israelis put a lot of weight into who would be blamed for starting the war. As you know, they kicked it off, because, and I can understand why, they had a reserve army. They could not keep their people in reserve mobilized. The Egyptians had a non-reserve army, a professional army. They were sitting on the frontier; they were carrying out maneuvers in the Sinai. There had been attacks there. Nasser had been talking about closing off the Straits of Tiran, which incidentally, he apparently hadn't done. We know that the Israelis had to do something and they did kick off. But because the Liberty had all these acoustic devices, they presumably didn't want the Liberty being able to prove that they struck first. I have to assume that was their reason. I can't think of any other reason apart from possibly the fact that the Liberty was sitting in that part of the Mediterranean over which their air force came to attack the Egyptians from an unexpected direction, and possibly they were afraid that the Liberty would pick this up and somehow pass it on to the Egyptians. It is conceivable. I have forgotten the exact timing because the Liberty was kind of a side show at the time. It was only afterwards that we began to understand what had happened.

One of the interesting things of course was that Nasser was talking over an open telephone line, and we could read what he was saying to King Hussein. He was saying, "We are victorious, victorious. Come join us." This was after his air force had been destroyed, and he was anything but victorious. Hussein bought it partly because he was under pressure from his own Palestinian people, and entered the war. As a result he lost the whole West Bank and Jerusalem.

Q: Was there concern, I mean at the time did we see the conquering of the West Bank and all as being really a temporary thing? Was this sort of...

LAMBRAKIS: I think that is so, especially as Israel was saying it was a temporary thing in the beginning. But of course, along came the Allen plan. I remember explaining it to others in the State Department. Holmes was one of the other people who was then in political military affairs before he later became its Director. He was interested in it. But, you know, because the Israelis were thinking of alternatives, we assumed that they were planning to return most of the territory at some point. On the other hand, you know this was the beginning of a very different approach by the PLO, Arafat, where they carried out really a political mission which could easily be interpreted, if you read the constitution of the PLO, as being "we want it all back. The Jews must be thrown into the sea."

Q: But while you were on the desk, the Palestinians were not seen as a particular factor.

LAMBRAKIS: No, not during that period. We talked about the other Arab countries of course. Nasser was the key at that point. He didn't die until 1970. He offered to resign, as you know, after 1967, but the people said no, no, Nasser stay with us.

Q: How did we view Nasser? I mean did we see him as a real menace or did we see him as somebody who really wasn't very effective?

LAMBRAKIS: Well, I think he was a menace in 1967 in the sense that he obviously called for the removal of the UN force and amazingly the UN secretary general removed them immediately.

Q: U Thant.

LAMBRAKIS: U Thant, yes. In that sense a bit of a menace. It all depends on whom you are speaking to. On the Israeli desk I don't think we felt he was a great menace because we knew how powerful the Israelis were. If you go back and read some of the CIA and other people who served in Egypt in the 1950s, you will see that they object to the American foreign policy under Eisenhower and Dulles going back that far, which made the devil out of Nasser rather than perhaps accepting him as a kind of Sekou Toure who wanted independence from everybody and therefore accepted Soviet assistance. However, he was sitting in a more volatile part of the world. I don't think I would say that he was a menace, but on the other hand I don't think of him as a tame little lap dog either.

THOMAS L. HUGHES
Washington, DC (1963-1969)

Mr. Hughes was born and raised in Minnesota and was educated at Carleton College, Oxford University and Yale University. After service with the US Air Force he worked on Capitol Hill and became active in Democratic Party politics. He later joined the Department of State, first as Assistant to Under Secretary Chester Bowles and subsequently as Deputy Director, then as Director of the Bureau of Intelligence and Research, where he served during the event filled period 1961 to 1969. His assignments brought him in close contact with the major political figures of that era. His final government assignment was to Embassy London as Deputy Chief of Mission. Mr. Hughes was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: You said there was a connection between the German thing and Israel.

HUGHES: I don't mean the obvious connection. German reparations for the Nazi period were already set in motion. Adenauer had worked out his own arrangements with Israel. Nahum Goldmann had already been instrumental in negotiating the initial commitments for financial compensation. The German and Israeli constituencies in the United States were, of course, quite different—troubled and defensive on the German side and antagonistic and suspicious on the Israeli side. Naturally enough, the Israelis could not be expected to be leaders in the effort to improve German-American relations. On the other hand, the Germans were wary about attitudes in the American-Jewish community and what effect they might have on US presidents and US policies toward Germany.

What I had in mind was something else. From the outset the Kennedy administration tormented itself with the issue of nuclear weapons, particularly as this issue pertained to Germany and Israel. A State Department group played the dominant role on the German nuclear issue. The group centered on Undersecretary George Ball, his close collaborator Robert Schaetzel, Policy Planning Staff member Henry Owen, and a distinguished carryover from the Dulles days, Robert Bowie. This group conjured up a hypothetical German nuclear menace. They assumed an eventual German determination to obtain nuclear weapons and set about heading off this calamity. Their answer was the famous MLF—a multi-lateral seaborne force composed of NATO mix-manned, multi-national crews. The idea was that this would embed the Germans inextricably in a NATO controlled nuclear project and avert the prospect of a unilateral German finger on the nuclear trigger.

After great American pressure, the MLF proposal was widely agreed to within NATO, the Germans themselves awkwardly being brought aboard. It became the official policy of the Kennedy Administration. Its practicality was ridiculed from the beginning, however, and some of the leading players in the Kennedy administration were only half-heartedly supportive. I remember being summoned to the White House one day by Mac Bundy who was one of Ball's competitors for influence in the Kennedy Administration and potentially a rival for future appointment as secretary of state. "George just insists on being the piano player on this one (the MLF), doesn't he?"

Mac Bundy's thinly-veiled skepticism about Ball's MLF proposal quickly asserted itself after Kennedy's assassination. Johnson turned out to be skeptical as well, and with Presidential support withdrawn, the MLF collapsed before takeoff. Incidentally, throughout the MLF controversy INR's coverage of European attitudes in general and of De Gaulle's role in particular was seen by the MLF proponents as unhelpful. Here was a cameo insight into the plusses and minuses—the ups and downs-- of bureaucratic coalitions. George Ball was already engaged in giving voice to his celebrated skepticism about Vietnam and he often used INR material. Ball therefore found INR simultaneously indispensable in the mornings on Vietnam and retrograde in the afternoons on the MLF, both enhancing and obstructing his own two driving interests.

But there was another counterpart to the MLF saga, one that also was predicated on the Kennedy administration's determination to avoid nuclear proliferation. Just as the MLF was contrived to obstruct a possible German nuclear weapon, so the entire Kennedy administration "set its face like flint toward Jerusalem" in trying to forestall an Israeli nuclear weapon.

I was reminded of this lately when I was reading a new book about Israel and the nuclear weapon by Avner Cohen, who has been working here at the U.S. Institute of Peace. It turns out that the Israelis started work on their Dimona nuclear reactor, excavating for it, in the late '50s. There were U-2 overflights of Dimona and subsequent briefings of President Eisenhower. Art Lundahl was already then the chief photo-interpreter at NPIC (National Photographic Interpretation Center), and he continued in that capacity under Kennedy.

According to Lundahl's account to Cohen, he briefed Eisenhower about Dimona in 1958 in the company of Admiral Strauss. The briefing elicited no reaction, leaving Lundahl with the impression that the White House accepted the development. After the photos were presented, Strauss had asked: "What conclusion do you draw from these pictures?" Lundahl had replied: "The only conclusion you can draw is that Israel is embarking on a nuclear weapons program. That is the only interpretation possible." To Lundahl's surprise, there was no Presidential response whatever to this statement. Eisenhower left the meeting without saying a word. Lundahl's conclusion at the time was clear: "I had the impression that he either knew about, or was acquiescent in, or wasn't particularly concerned about, what seemed to us to be a rather dramatic new development."

Hence the Israeli nuclear issue was another of the hot potatoes bequeathed by Eisenhower to Kennedy, in addition to the more familiar ones of Laos and Vietnam. In fact there was a national intelligence estimate the first week of December 1960, issued by then-DCI Allen Dulles, which concluded that Israel was building a nuclear weapon. Two days later on Meet the Press John McCone, still director of the Atomic Energy Commission, publicly leaked the conclusion of this classified NIE, by announcing on TV that Israel was building a nuclear weapon. Nasser reacted on the 23rd of December, 1960, stating that an Israeli nuclear weapon would inflame the Middle East and might well require Egypt to engage in a preventive war. That same month the possibility of the allegedly anti-Israeli Senator Fulbright becoming Kennedy's secretary of state was shot down by an organized lobbying effort.

In other words the subject of Israel and nuclear weapons was smack on the agenda during the Eisenhower-Kennedy transition December 1960 and January 1961. McCone's opposition to an Israeli nuclear weapon was public knowledge. Moreover, he was no particular friend of Israel to begin with. He was a prominent Catholic (indeed a Knight of Malta), an Eisenhower Republican, and still head of the Atomic Energy Commission. These attributes were well known to Kennedy four months later when he was casting around for a successor to Allen Dulles after the latter's firing. The Israeli nuclear issue itself had to be one of the factors in Kennedy's mind when he selected McCone as his Director of Central Intelligence. (McCone's unhappiness with Israeli nuclear developments also was a factor in his own resignation under LBJ in 1965.)

We then embarked on a tortuous saga in which Israel and the friends of Israel in two American administrations succeeded in outwitting and outlasting the combined forces of the president, secretary of state, secretary of defense, the National Security Advisor, the head of the arms control disarmament agency, and the CIA. For three years in the Kennedy administration all of these gentlemen were united on non-proliferation. They were determined to prevent an Israeli nuclear weapon. Kennedy told Rusk that his highest priority for US-Israeli relations was to curtail the nuclear program at Dimona. Rusk himself kept telling the Israelis that the chief threat to US-Israeli relations was the Dimona reactor. "You are not playing fair and square with us." McNamara was saying we are not going to allow the Israelis to get the bomb. "We are going down the road to a non-proliferation treaty, and we can't permit Israel, which the rest of the world regards as the 51st American state, to engage in this frolic on its own." And during their visits to Washington there were warning sessions at the White House with Ben Gurion and Eshkol about Israel's nuclear intentions.

Throughout the Kennedy administration, and later for years under Johnson, this sorry saga involved constant foot dragging on the Israeli side and repeated efforts in circles inside and outside the United States government to postpone and delay. Inside the Kennedy White House, Mac Bundy's assistant, Mike Feldman, handled relations with the Jewish community. Kennedy put Mike in charge of this issue. He ultimately convinced the Israelis that American inspections of Dimona had to be accepted. Then came the handicapping of the inspections—the arguments about appropriate dates and frequency, the severe time limits, the restrictions on numbers and equipment, and ultimately, at the end of each visit, the suspect results. The inspectors were hobbled and unhappy. McCone was equally unhappy with the inspectors. “Of course the Israelis are developing the bomb. Why do we keep putting out these tepid statements saying that we can't be sure?” INR's Granville Austin thought the benefit of the doubt should be on the US side. “We should assume that the Israelis are developing nuclear weapons, and it is up to them to disprove it, not on us to prove it.” But that formulation was never operative.

Q: Was there a feeling that this was domestic politically?

HUGHES: The domestic sensitivity was obvious. But in the Kennedy administration you had a total lineup including the President and all his top advisors firmly supportive of the anti-nuclear policy-- unlike Johnson who at the end, during the election year of 1968, pulled the rug out from under his subordinates on this issue and accepted the Israeli fait accompli. During the Kennedy years, when Presidential overtures to Nasser were also in the works, the whole question of reassuring the Egyptians became important. For a while the tepid inspection results from Dimona served the diplomatic purpose of allowing the State Department to reassure the Egyptians that “we have inspected and to the best of our knowledge” the Israelis do not have a nuclear weapon. But it was not very convincing.

Later on, for public use the Israelis developed the formula “we will not be the first to introduce nuclear weapons to the Middle East.” But, we all thought, they will not be the second either. It depends on what “introduce” means. If you have all the components of the weapons in adjoining rooms and it only takes you 20 minutes to put them together, have you introduced or haven't you introduced? This lawyerly argument persisted for years and Paul Warnke and Rabin were still arguing around these semantics in 1968.

The Kennedy administration persisted to the end, but ineffectively, in its serious non-proliferation argument with Israel. McCone became increasingly frustrated because he took the flim-flam of the Dimona inspections personally. With his background at the AEC he considered himself an expert on nuclear matters. He knew he was being hoodwinked by the Israelis. By April, 1965, when he resigned, McCone may also have felt that Johnson was not reliable on this policy. Although Johnson allowed Rusk and McNamara to continue to push the Israelis on Dimona, McCone decided that the inspections were not serious. I think this was one of the factors in his resignation.

It is even possible that the Israeli nuclear weapon was funded by tax-exempt donations from the US. A key figure in this connection in the late 1960's was Abe Feinberg, one of LBJ's major fund raisers and political friends in New York. He was a prominent Democratic lawyer and a big friend of Israel who helped fund Dimona via contributions to the Weizmann Institute Whether or not private American donations are ultimately going to be traceable to the Dimona project is still unknown. But the story certainly has all the earmarks of verisimilitude—a picture of private American tax-exempt donations subverting official American policy on the hottest issue in U.S.-Israeli relations in the 1960's.

There was another related episode where I was involved. In August 1966, ten months before the Six Day War, Rusk called me in one morning and said “The White House is going to announce your appointment as assistant secretary for Near East and South Asia. at the noon briefing.” I said, “Whoa, nobody has talked to me about this. I’m very happy where I am.” Rusk asked if I had some hidden past they didn’t know about, and I said “Well, come to think of it, I was a kibbutznik once in Israel, and that won’t go over very well with your Arab clients. I was also chief assistant to Chester Bowles, who is back in India as ambassador now, and that won’t go over very well in Pakistan. The Arabs and the Pakistanis are pretty important clients in NEA.” Somehow I also had the feeling that Rusk himself was not the driving force behind my nomination. In any event we agreed that I would stay in INR.

A few days later I happened to have lunch with Eppie Evron of the Israeli Embassy. who said, “You know, you should have taken that NEA job.” How he knew I had been offered it, I could only surmise. No one in the State Department knew about it ahead of time, but apparently the Israeli Embassy did. A year later in another conversation Eppie said “We wouldn’t have had the Six Day War if you had taken that job.” I replied, “Are you kidding?”

Q: Looking at this Dimona problem, did people including INR ever calculate “Yes we are against proliferation, but an Israeli nuclear weapon would be a trump card because none of the other countries around Israel were going to develop nuclear weapons in the foreseeable future. So if the Israelis have them, Israel won’t go down the drain.”

HUGHES: Of course this was the assumption that underlay the Israeli effort. While they themselves didn’t admit they were pursuing the nuclear option, in the discussions with them the US negotiators operated on that assumption. Israel was beleaguered and Israeli nukes would be a major deterrent. Whenever the issue came up in conversations inside the American-Jewish community, or in media speculation, this constituted the main Israeli case. But I remember Rusk as early as 1961 upbraiding the Israelis on this proposition. Theirs was a very short-sighted view. Israel would stimulate others to follow in the Arab and Muslim world generally. There was no way that Israel could remain permanently the only nuclear power in the Middle East. Rusk would say that one day a successor of his would have to explain why an Israeli nuclear weapon was acceptable, but not a Libyan, Iranian, Iraqi or Pakistani one. “I do not envy him.” For years we were trying to get Israel to sign the non- proliferation treaty as a quid pro quo for one thing or another. The story has not been fully exposed, to say the least. Why Senator Fulbright, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, didn’t hold effective executive hearings on this issue, about which he felt strongly and which would have put him on the same wave length as the Kennedy administration, has yet to be explained.

Q: To most people looking at this it seems to be one of those times when we have a definite double standard. Israel can get away with whatever it wants, mainly because of political, internal domestic clout. Other countries have to hew the line, but Israel can call its own tune and politicians are frightened to cross them.

HUGHES: Certainly the nuclear story has all of those earmarks. I think there is more to the story than we know now from Avner Cohen and others. I'd love to hear what Mike Feldman has to say. He is still around Washington. He was in the middle of this issue in the Kennedy White House.

Q: How can I find him?

HUGHES: He was a lawyer with the firm of Ginsberg, Feldman and Bress. That firm has disbanded, but David Ginsberg would know where to find him. (2007 note: he recently died.)

Later Bob Komer was the action man in the White House on Israeli nuclear issues. He is still with us (2000) but not in as good shape as he once was. He is as irascible as ever. (2007 note: he is since deceased.)

Q: Were you ever tasked with looking at this in INR?

HUGHES: Sporadically. This was another example of compartmentalization inside the intelligence community. The Dimona inspection project was highly classified. I knew about it, as did INR's office director for the Near East, Granville Austin. He was occasionally consulted and volunteered personal judgments. Others, although involved with the Middle East, remained officially ignorant about Dimona. Many analysts working on Arab-Israeli issues were not cleared for this information, at least not fully cleared. Occasionally they would write about the issue based on guesswork, press reports, or journalistic speculation. If they did write about it, they could be met with the riposte "Well, there is an inspection program, and you really don't know enough about it to write about it." Here again was an example of people with higher classifications telling lower level analysts that more was going on than they knew. The result was self-censorship to avoid embarrassment.

Q: I recall in my 30 years in the foreign service there would be a wink, a nod, a nudge, anything with Israel sort of saying "Well, the Israelis have us by the short hairs. They can do what they want." If you do write something it will be leaked to Senator Javits and the next thing you know you'll be crucified.

HUGHES: Still, that doesn't explain the Kennedy administration's complete unanimity on this issue at the top. They all agreed to brace the Israelis on the nuclear question, and dispatch inspection teams. The inspection teams had to be given some guidelines, of course, and apparently this is where the benefit of doubt went to the Israelis. Blandishments and restrictions on the ground at Dimona repeatedly made the inspections unsatisfactory.

Q: Did you feel in INR that anything that was written about Israel would probably be leaked? Did you face up to a question that is often there in American operations? Did you feel there was sort of a dual allegiance of Jewish analysts and Jewish officers?

HUGHES: In the Dimona case, it was the reverse of what you suggest. Nobody wanted leaks. The Israelis surely didn't want stories in the American press about Israel developing nuclear weapons. Israeli Embassy guidance was certainly to keep as quiet as possible on the issue and keep it out of the newspapers. In December, 1960, John McCone had himself been a major leaker. When the head of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission says on Meet the Press that Israel is developing nuclear weapons, this is fairly strong stuff. But as DCI he had no incentive to go public about the Dimona fiascos. They reflected on the adequacy of the US inspection system for which, presumably, he himself was formally responsible. When pressed, Israeli officials would occasionally say "Speculation about this may itself have a deterrent effect."

Q: I thought this might be a good time to stop. We have covered Germany and the Israeli nuclear issue, but let's continue with Israel and the '67 war and the role of INR in this. Then we will go on to do the whole Indo- China business. We've got Africa, India-Pakistan ,and Cuba. Then there was the National Intelligence Survey. Were there other tasks that were being done that were so encyclopedic or peripheral? How did you feel about those?

HUGHES: I can't say much about the National Intelligence Surveys. Soon after he became INR director in 1961, Roger Hilsman gave that responsibility back to the CIA, thereby also getting credit for reducing the number of INR personnel. Roger considered the Survey a waste of time for a serious, policy-oriented bureau, and he wanted to streamline INR to enhance the latter mission. The fact that we dispensed with the NIS shows that we considered it a comparatively unimportant and time-consuming proposition. For the marginal people who worked on it, it was considered almost a lifetime assignment.

Q: I was in INR for part of the time and I volunteered to go to Serbian training to make sure I didn't get involved in that.

Today is the 7th of September 1999. Again I want my time periods again. You were with INR from when to when?

HUGHES: I was Deputy Director from March '61 until April '63, and thereafter Director until September '69.

Q: Actually we had about reached the Six Day War in 1967. Where were we on that? Do you remember?

HUGHES: I think we had just about reached it. This was another intelligence problem-- predicting when the Israelis would move. LBJ had been warning them "Israel won't be alone unless you go alone". But once more the analysts were not privy to all the high level US conversations with the Israelis, nor, for that matter, were many members of the US Intelligence Board.

I remember that Walter Mondale, then a Senator from Minnesota, had asked me to substitute for him in a speech in northern Minnesota on that Monday in June when the Israeli preemptive strike on the Egyptian air force actually occurred and when the war broke out. On Friday morning four days before, I told Rusk that I was planning to go to Minnesota to make a speech. He wanted to know then whether the intelligence community thought that the Israelis would strike that weekend. I had to tell him that I had just checked around town, and that the considered wisdom of the intelligence community was that they would probably not act quite yet. Embarrassingly enough, the Six Day War started when I was on the platform at Bemidji, Minnesota, making the speech.

Q: Well, what had been the feeling? Was it because the United Nations, under U Thant at that point, was pulling troops out of the Sinai and that this meant war, or that the Israelis were cocked and ready to go, but we hoped that our caution might prevail?

HUGHES: Well, we hoped they wouldn't. US credibility was at a low point. We had been warning the Israelis that we were adamant in our anti-nuclear stand. By then it was obvious to the Israelis that we had not succeeded in deterring them. It was probably pretty obvious to Nasser as well. There was press speculation that Israel already had a bomb in the basement. Indeed Nasser was publicly using the rumored existence of Israeli nuclear weapons as a rationale for an Egyptian attack on Dimona. So there had been threats of preemption from both sides.

The Israelis were complaining that the United States was not supporting Israel the way Dulles had promised to do -- in writing, they said -- over the closure of the Straits of Tiran. There was a big question about what Dulles had promised and what he hadn't. No one on the US side could find the text embodying the Dulles commitment. The lawyers also felt there were legal issues involved, and Eugene Rostow, former dean of Yale Law School and now an Undersecretary of State, could always be counted on to be a special friend of Israel on the seventh floor of the State Department. He was busy bringing his legal talents to bear on the issue.

Later after the crisis had passed, Louis Heren, a British correspondent in Washington, wrote a book that included an account about an official emissary going up to Gettysburg to try to find the Dulles commitment in the Eisenhower archives. He wrote that Thomas Hughes, the director of INR, was the emissary. This was total nonsense, and I promptly wrote Heren a letter telling him so. I asked him where he got his misinformation. He wrote back saying: "We are all getting older, so I forgive you for your failure of memory. You yourself were the source of this information." I wrote back again saying "I'm sorry, but I never went to Gettysburg and I never told you that I did." Anyway, that's the way history is made sometimes. It's in print, and as my Aunt Margaret used to say, "If it's in print, it must be true."

Q: As I recall, the U Thant move of withdrawing troops was done without the usual U.N. debating which would have given you some time.

HUGHES: I'm a little vague at this point about how precipitate U. Thant's actions were. But I am not vague at all about the consequences of the Israeli victory with the capture of Jerusalem and the West Bank. That meant that the problems we had before the war with Israel and its neighbors were intensified. Those consequences are still with us in spades. After the Israeli victory, of course, we were in the running-up stages for the 1968 US Presidential election, and it was pretty clear that the domestic political situation would inhibit any further American moves of a constructive nature.

Q: It sounds like the Israeli establishment called in all their chips.

HUGHES: I think so. Naturally there were degrees of rhetorical toughness. The ambassador, Abba Eban, was a comparatively gentle figure, suave and intellectual. But (later Prime Minister) Rabin was the negotiator on the nuclear issue and his equally astute counterpart was Paul Warnke at the Pentagon. I mentioned earlier that LBJ pulled the rug out from under Warnke as we approached the 1968 election. Even this did not preserve the normal Democratic vote in the Jewish community that year.

Nixon hoped to make inroads in that community. He did in fact indicate, via Henry Kissinger to Rabin, that a Nixon administration would not be as concerned as the previous Democratic administration had been over the Israeli nuclear question. This was a definite signal from the Nixon camp to the Israeli government, that a future Nixon administration would relax US policy toward Dimona. This led Rabin in turn to indicate to important American friends of Israel, that on the whole a Nixon victory would probably be better for Israel than a Humphrey one. This kind of treachery was bound to be hard for Humphrey to accept considering his decades-long support for Jewish and Israeli causes.

Q: How about Nasser?

HUGHES: Nasser had experienced his own ups and downs with Washington. The Kennedy Administration, as part of its interest in the Third World generally and in non-alignment, made a real effort to test the possibilities of a rapprochement with Nasser. A talented and friendly ambassador, John Badeau, was sent to Cairo. JFK and Nasser even had a personal correspondence. This interest and attention lapsed under Johnson, although I think it is fair to say that Kennedy toward the end also became skeptical about improving relations with Cairo. On his part Nasser was certainly disappointed with the new level of arms supplies for Israel which Kennedy authorized. Nasser's press chief in Cairo, all through the '60s, fretted publicly about Israeli nuclear weapons and the American role in giving false assurances and then looking the other way. You can argue that Nasser's preemptive temptations reflected a genuine concern on his part that we were at the end of the road on the nuclear question. That, as much as anything else, accounts for the Egyptian move to take advantage of the UN withdrawal in 1967 and to introduce Egyptian troops in their place.

Q: Did you find, because of this action, within the establishment, at least within the State Department, a change in attitude-- a different feeling about the Arab world and Israel?

HUGHES: There was certainly widespread recognition that the capture of Jerusalem, its emotional grip on Jewish feelings, and the probable Israeli determination to keep exclusive control of the city, added a whole new factor to the explosive Mideast agenda. This exclusiveness was bound to create huge problems for the Arab world and even the Vatican. Of course it also guaranteed that every US political platform from now on would be under pressure to endorse Jerusalem as the Israeli capital. The probability of Israeli settlements in Gaza and the West Bank predictably was another hornet's nest. Israel's attack on the USS Liberty also left a sour taste even with longtime American champions of Israel like Clark Clifford.

MICHAEL E. STERNER
Washington, DC (1964-1966)

Ambassador Michael E. Sterner was born in New York in 1920. He received a bachelor's degree from Harvard University. He served in the U.S. Army prior to joining the Foreign Service in 1951. Ambassador Sterner served in Aden, Beirut, Cairo, Washington, DC, and was ambassador to the United Arab Emirates. He was interviewed in 1990 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Now, you were doing what when the 67 War started? I wonder if you could tell how the State Department operated at that time? And your view of this operation as far as it impacted on us.

STERNER: I was a Desk Officer on the Arab-Israel problem and so was one of the first people involved in setting up a Task Force on the seventh floor. Before war broke out on June 5, 1967, there was a three week period of diplomacy to try to head off this conflict. You remember the sequence of events..

Q: Could you go over this and how we were reacting, how we were seeing it at the time?

STERNER: Nasser ordered troops into the Sinai about May 15, as I remember it, and about three or four days later called on U Thant, then U.N. Secretary General, to withdraw the U.N. buffer force that had been in the Sinai and keeping the peace there. Then about the same time, or a few days later, Nasser announced closure of the Strait of Aqaba to Israeli shipping. At that point I think almost everybody felt that unless this thing could be defused very fast conflict was inevitable.

Q: The Strait of Aqaba was where they were getting their oil?

STERNER: Exactly. I can't tell you exactly what percentage but over the years about 60 to 70 percent of Israeli oil requirements came from Iran and certainly all that oil was coming into Elat. We were seized with trying to get the Egyptians to stand down and to think of various face-saving ways where it might be possible to prevent the conflict. We were, of course, worried about the implications of a conflict. No one at the time that this thing was brewing had any assurance that the Israelis could win this war in six days time. The Egyptians seemed very confident and for all we knew could give the Israelis some real trouble; we saw emerging out of that a very serious possibility of U.S.-Soviet confrontation, the Soviets being committed to Egypt at that time and ourselves to the Israelis. Even if we did not have such a confrontation, we saw the possibility of regional conflict unraveling our interests in much of the Arab world. So this was a really serious crisis for the United States. We of course had intensive diplomacy with the Egyptians but not to much avail. However, the Egyptians claimed that on the eve of the war, one of their top people, Zakaria Mohieddine was on his way here and had the Israelis not attacked might have defused the crisis. I tend to disbelieve this thesis because Nasser was too committed in the eyes of his own people and the eyes of the Arab world to the course of action he had taken.

I think he wanted a conflict.

Q: This is an important point. Sometimes it is claimed that this was some kind of bluff on the part of Nasser to posture, but at least in your impression and the people you were dealing with, you didn't feel that this was a bluff?

STERNER: No, I don't think it was a bluff. Of course if he had been lucky enough to get the Israelis to accept Egyptian control over their shipping and the right to determine who used the Strait of Aqaba and the disbandment of the UNEF Force in Sinai as a fait accompli and the reoccupation of Sinai with a large Egyptian Army...

Q: But this was never in the cards.

STERNER: But this was never in the cards. And I think he had to know it. The real error in judgment was what his military capability was in Sinai. And here I think Abdul Hakim Amer, the Defense Minister and Commander of the Egyptian Forces, probably oversold the Egyptian ability to stand up to the Israeli offensive. No one knows exactly how Amer died. The official version is that he committed suicide. Some people think he was poisoned by Nasser. My own feeling is that he had plenty to commit suicide about, so that we need not feel that explanation is totally implausible.

The other thing that we worked on during that period was to get the Israelis in Tel Aviv to hold off from taking unilateral military action. We were telling them that the international community could take effective action to protect Israeli interests.

We attempted during this period to form an international naval squadron that would in effect patrol the Strait of Tiran and the Gulf of Aqaba and insure freedom of shipping. Our own position of course was that the Gulf of Aqaba was High Seas and the Egyptians had no right whatsoever to exclude the Israelis or anyone else from transiting the Strait of Tiran. We didn't have many takers among our allies; at the time war broke out we had commitments from only the Netherlands and Costa Rica, if my memory serves, for contributions to the naval force. Our European allies were not rushing to join us.

Q: They didn't want to upset their interests because of oil particularly.

STERNER: That certainly, and also because they didn't like Washington's pro-Israel policies. In the end, of course, the Israelis decided, number one, that our diplomacy was not going to succeed and, number two, the longer he was allowed to hold these positions, the tougher it was going to be to dislodge him. And also, I think, they decided it would be much more beneficial to them to be the ones to assert Israel's rights rather than the international community. They had something to prove there and they certainly did prove it.

Q: Were you having contact with the Israeli Embassy and the Egyptian Embassy during this period of time? And how were they talking to you and were you sitting in own meetings?

STERNER: The Israelis were at first completely shocked that this had taken place. Secondly, very determined that we should take action and do something about it. The Egyptians on the other hand were full of bluster about the fact that they had the rights to do this. This was Egyptian territory, the Sinai was Egyptian territory, they waited eight years for the international community to do something about the Arab-Israel problem, and this force had been there all this time, and it was an unnatural phenomenon to have an international force. It was the expected argumentation to support their positions. We were not at all persuaded at any point of the legitimacy of what the Egyptians were doing and did not think they had a good case in international law. In my opinion, Nasser was the aggressor in this war.

Q: Were you getting any pressure or any great demands for information from Members of Congress?

STERNER: Yes.

Q: How did you reply on these matters?

STERNER: We were making almost daily trips to the Hill and I was often the sidekick of some senior official who did the testifying. I remember having my arms full with maps and documents. Congressional committees were very worried at this period, as was the Executive Branch, and very impatient to know what the Administration was doing to resolve this crisis.

Q: How did we see the Six Day War and its outcome?

STERNER: We were enormously surprised by Nasser's action, initially very worried. We were also disappointed with the Israelis, that they had not given us more time. We thought at the time, maybe unrealistically in retrospect, that we had something going in terms of this international flotilla and our diplomacy. Once Israel attacked we were intensely worried about the conflict itself, about the potential for confrontation with the Soviet Union, and we were relieved when it became apparent in the third and fourth day of the conflict that the Israelis were scoring victories all over the place. We realized we were off the hook in terms of prolonged conflict and its impact on American relations elsewhere in the Middle East. There were many people who thought we might have to send troops and certainly would have to send massive supplies of military equipment at the time. But it happened so fast, you could hardly keep the shaded areas on the map moving as fast as the Israelis were taking over these areas.

Q: Well, even at your place, was there a feeling of by this point, I'm speaking of personal feeling, that well, Nasser's got his comeuppance. I say this because I was sitting in Yugoslavia at this time and I felt -- Well, he asked for it. I mean this is just a personal view of a foreign service officer and I think this was reflected by people who were watching these events from some distance away, in an essentially hostile country, including I might add, the Yugoslavs. Not the Government, but the Yugoslav people were very impressed by this.

STERNER: Yes, until this time -- You asked earlier how I felt about Nasser, and as a young man in those days I dealt mainly with young Arabs, and they were all so imbued with the spirit of Arab nationalism at that period, and he embodied that. And then they would say things like, well, you, know, Nasser makes his mistakes; after all he's a human being but at bottom he's the great leader we need. And I remember feeling that Arab nationalism and the kind of reform Nasser represented might be a positive force, one that did not necessarily have to clash with U.S. interests. I was at odds in this with some of the senior people in my own Embassy who were not Arab specialists and who were justifiably more skeptical. My line of argument got harder and harder to sustain as Nasser took actions more and more inimical to American interests during the sixties. The '67 War was the final disillusionment. And it was a watershed in U.S. policy. If you look back before that time, our policy really was that whoever is victorious in any Arab-Israel conflict should not profit by territorial aggrandizement. In terms of basic principle, we had the same view in '67, but with a very important difference, which was that Israel was entitled to stay in the territories it occupied until the Arabs were prepared to come forward and make peace with it. In other words, Israel was entitled to use its forcible occupation of Arab territory as bargaining chips to achieve its objectives. We were all so disillusioned with Nasser, and so relieved by Israel's victory that I don't remember anybody feeling that this was an unjust policy. I was by this time fully supportive of the view that Nasser had seriously let the United States and the world and his own people down, and that he was going to have to pay the price. Unfortunately the Arabs are still paying the price politically for it.

Q: Well, how did the October '73 War play out from your perspective? How did we react to it and what were you doing at this time?

STERNER: Well, again, I happened to be back -- I mean, I was still back. It was six years later, or whatever, from the '67 war and I was still in the Department. This time I was a couple of notches up the line. But there I was setting up another Task Force. This was a much more interesting, difficult and of course less decisive war. To Kissinger's credit he saw about midway through the conflict that there were major diplomatic opportunities that could be seized, if you could bring this conflict to an end in a way that preserved those diplomatic opportunities. And he charged in. He had just moved over from the National Security position to the State Department as Secretary, so he was in a position to do that. He had all those loyal folks over at the White House still working for him in effect. Brent Scowcroft had been there as his Deputy, and saw eye-to-eye with him on most issues. And now he had all this machinery he could mobilize as he saw fit within the State Department. He negotiated the terms for a cease fire with the Soviets that set the stage for negotiations. He fought the Israelis down when they wanted to persist in the war so as to complete the encirclement of the Egyptian Third Army in the Sinai. He knew if that whole army was captured or destroyed the Egyptians would be so humiliated and so defeated that it would detract from post-war diplomatic opportunities. And in this case the Israelis backed down. In essence, the war ended on a no-victor, no-loser note which was important for what transpired. Kissinger got talks going at Kilometer 101 in Sinai, which led to a more stable cease fire. Then talks began under U.S.-Soviet auspices in Geneva. The Soviets were then firmly moved out of the picture and Kissinger took over the negotiations himself. He achieved three agreements: the first Sinai agreement, the agreement for disengagement on the Syrian front, and finally the Sinai II agreement for a further stage of withdrawal. So it was a notable achievement. But with the Sinai II agreement the potential for further progress along these lines was exhausted. You could not carry this slice-of-territory for slice-of-peace concept any further. The Sinai II agreement was a victory but it had its costs for American policy in the form of an ill-considered undertaking never to deal with the PLO which plagued our policy for the next ten years. Kissinger agreed to that. The Israelis got very tough -- said they were not going to agree to the Sinai agreement without this assurance and he ended up giving them that. And then I went off to the United Arab Emirates at about this point.

WILLIAM N. DALE
Tel Aviv (1964-1968)

Ambassador William N. Dale was born in Washington, DC in February 1919. He entered the Foreign Service in June 1946. His career included positions in Turkey, Israel, and Washington, DC, and an ambassadorship to The Central African Republic. Ambassador Dale was interviewed by Dr. Henry E. Mattox on September 19, 1988.

Q: You went directly to DCM.

DALE: Yes.

Q: Who decided that you were going to go to Tel Aviv?

DALE: I don't know. I'd been in Turkey for close to four years, and little feelers began to come out. It was time for Dale to leave. One was a job that I would have preferred to Tel Aviv, but I didn't get it, Director of Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs.

Q: So in the time-honored fashion, a cable came in?

DALE: It didn't order me. It said, "Would you appreciate a direct transfer of orders to Tel Aviv?"

Q: By this time, you were of such a rank that you didn't get peremptory orders.

DALE: No, it was very nicely done.

Q: So you decided to go.

DALE: Oh, yes, yes.

Q: You arrived there in September 1964.

DALE: Yes. I had home leave.

Q: Who was the ambassador at the time?

DALE: Walworth Barbour, who had been ambassador for some years before that, and was ambassador for some years after that.

Q: He spent a total of ten years, was it?

DALE: Ten or 11 years.

Q: Let me ask you one or two questions. How did you personally view Israel at that time? Had you ever been to Israel before you went there on assignment?

DALE: No.

Q: What was your personal impression? What was your personal outlook?

DALE: At the time that Israel had won her independence, I thought that it would be a good thing for the world if the Jews had a national state of their own. I thought it would give them something to be proud of, and that it would lead to a state where many of the Jewish ideals could be brought to fruition.

Q: So you supported the existence of Israel.

DALE: Yes.

Q: What was your attitude toward the Arab world at this time?

DALE: I really didn't have any. I didn't know anything about it. I was very confused about it. I expect I would have said that the Arab world was a very changeable, undifferentiated mass of new countries which still, being new, had not developed to the point that you could clearly distinguish what pattern they would form.

Q: A little chaotic.

DALE: Yes.

Q: We're going to come to the 1967 War in a moment, and I'm going to ask you some of your departing impressions of Israel and departing impressions of the Arab world later. Let me get on the record, for the interested person, perhaps, some of the relatively minor matters that came up during your first two or three years there -- relatively minor, I guess; I'm not too sure. The Premier was Levi Eshkol. He was forced to resign in December of '64 over something that was called the Lavon affair. Do you recall what that was?

DALE: Yes. He wasn't really forced to resign, but he was out of office for eight days.

Q: What was that all about?

DALE: Some years before that, I think about 1953 or '54, the Israeli intelligence, the Mossad, hatched a plan regarding Egypt. They would get some Egyptian Jews to burn some USIS offices in Egypt and some British offices in Egypt.

Q: Such as at Alexandria.

DALE: Yes. They would not presumably get caught. The Americans would think that it was those awful Egyptian Arabs who had done it, they would never associate it with Israel, and that would put a wedge between U.S. and Egyptian relations. The only trouble was that for some reason, very unlike the Mossad, it was a sloppy operation and the Egyptian Jews got caught. No one ever doubts that. The Israelis treated it very curiously when we were there. They never put it in the papers, because there is censorship in Israel, which you probably know. This was judged to be too militarily dangerous to be known and printed, so it never got much publicity. The object was to keep the publicity out of the American press, which was fairly successful. So people always called it the Lavon affair, but never explained what it meant. Now it's all in print and everybody knows what the deal was about. That, however, was never really Levi Eshkol's fault.

Q: Why was he ousted then?

DALE: That was because Ben-Gurion made trouble for him, but Eshkol did not leave because of that so far as his major career.

Q: The following year, the Ben-Gurion and Eshkol clashes continued, and eventually Ben-Gurion was ousted.

DALE: I think that's oversimplifying it.

Q: Tell me how I'm oversimplifying. That's why I bring it up.

DALE: Ben-Gurion had retired. He only came back in little forays now and then. He was really officially retired. He was down at Sidi Bakr. Eshkol was a successful prime minister. He was there for the Six-Day War, and it went very well from Israel's point of view, to say the least. He didn't clash very much with Ben-Gurion.

Q: Toward the end of 1965, there was something having to do with the U.S.-Jordanian arms deal which got the Israeli political figures up in arms.

DALE: Yes, that was terrible. Where did you find out about that?

Q: I get leads on what was happening from a publication called Facts on File.

DALE: That was a very difficult situation. The United States wanted to get some tanks to Jordan. By this time, the Israeli lobby was powerful. They also wanted to get planes to Jordan. So we planned to have the Germans send the tanks that were obsolescent, really, from Germany over to Jordan. But we had no chance of keeping anything secret from Israel, so the Israelis found out about it and began to raise the dickens.

President Johnson decided they should be punished for this. This isn't official. So he sent over to Israel, to "punish" the Israelis, Averell Harriman and some other people. The group was headed up by Harriman. They came over to Israel and talked, had very secret talks, during which they officially reprimanded the Israeli Government for questioning President Johnson's policy. As a result of those talks, Jordan got the tanks all right, but the Israelis got something they had never had from the United States: the first promise of war planes. That began the steady supply by the United States of aircraft to Israel, which goes on today. So you can see what the "punishment" was.

Q: When Harriman came, was Ambassador Barbour included in the talking groups?

DALE: It's very difficult to remember, Henry. I don't think he had a lot to do with it. I think he reached them beforehand.

Q: I was just wondering whether he was excluded in the fashion of the traveling circus occasionally of Kissinger.

DALE: I see what you mean. No, I think he had as much to do with it as he wanted. There was no strain on that. Bob Komer went with him, a working-level guy.

Q: Bob Komer from Washington.

DALE: He was in Washington.

Q: Komer was something fairly high in the agency then.

DALE: Yes, he was.

Q: This was Johnson's idea of punishing. The tactical aircraft were beginning to be delivered the following year, now into '66. In May the following year, also, the United States also began to provide tanks.

DALE: But I don't believe that was part of this deal. I think we had to do that because we were furnishing tanks to Jordan. The normal pattern is if you furnish arms to an Arab country, the American organization wouldn't get after you, provided you gave Israel more and better. That does not hold now. Now you must not supply the Arabs at all.

Q: Did you know personally Eshkol?

DALE: Yes.

Q: This was a very small country.

DALE: Yes. I went along with Barbour when he talked to him, or visiting congressmen or senators. I remember I went with Senator Kennedy to see Eshkol, and Eshkol thought it was a very interesting thing. So I knew him in terms of being escort officer.

Q: How would you describe him?

DALE: A very easy-going, low-key individual, a good conversationalist who said a great many things which I don't think his American interlocutors understood. But if they'd thought about it, they would have been quite shocked.

Q: He said them in English?

DALE: In English.

Q: Could you give me an example?

DALE: Yes. He told Senator Kennedy that American Jews operated pretty much as a group, and during much of the Thirties, "They were pro-Russian because we thought Russia was an ideal country for Jews to live in because it had no barriers on ethnic or racial grounds. We thought that right up into the war period, until shortly after that. That accounts for Rosenberg, Fuchs, and various Jewish spies, who brought atomic secrets from the United States and England to Russia. But then we discovered that Russia wasn't such a fine place for Jews, Stalin, what they did to the doctors, many of whom were Jewish, and things like that. The evidence mounted that Russia was going to support the Arabs at the expense of the Jews, so we have turned against Russia. Now we will do what we can in our worldwide Jewish community to make sure that relations with Russia are kept as difficult as possible."

Now, that's very important, but I don't think Kennedy understood what the man said. I thought it was fascinating. So that is perhaps the most revealing conversation I heard. That was with Kennedy.

I went to see Eshkol with visiting people like Kennedy many times, but that was the only really deep conversation that I recall.

Q: Ben-Gurion.

DALE: Ben-Gurion was retired most of the time I was there. He did not play much of a major role, except in the Lavon affair, and that's because he was a bit guilty. He came to the Fourth of July party, and you know how those Fourth of July parties were. In our case, the ambassador said, "I'm going to enjoy this. You manage it and what you do is you have all the officers lined up, and when somebody comes to the door, they come and say, 'Your name, please? Oh, yes, yes, of course.' And then they take you around and take you out to the garden, where your wife or somebody else's wife is standing around, and you leave them with the women. Then you go around this sort of endless chain. Then after a certain time, you say, 'Let's reverse the flow.' Then the chain works to take people out."

Q: Very tiring.

DALE: Very tiring. So I had to run that thing for four years. I rather enjoyed it, actually, because I didn't have to stand in the chain.

At any rate, when Ben-Gurion came, I realized that it was going to be fun, because my ambassador did not get along with Ben-Gurion. He disliked Ben-Gurion right to the roots of Ben-Gurion's sparse white hair, and vice versa.

Q: Do you know why?

DALE: No, I do not know why. He just said Ben-Gurion was a very rude, ruthless man, but that wasn't the only rude or ruthless man with whom one has to deal. At any rate, Ben-Gurion was very nice to me, and I thought, "In this case, I'll be sure he has a good time," because I wasn't sure that Barbour would talk to him, because I knew Barbour didn't expect him to come. So I talked to him quite a lot, and he said that he thought that we should begin to think about China, that he saw the future of this world as a Chinese future. He said, "You can't say that that population of over a billion people isn't going to amount to something. It's a drag on the living standards and that sort of thing, but there's going to be genius there, and we're going to find that the 21st century will belong to China." And he talked and talked of China. It was very interesting.

Q: At about this time there was something between the United States and Israel on the subject of the Dimona atomic power plant.

DALE: Yes.

Q: Can you describe our interest in the atomic situation in Israel at this time? This was about 1966.

DALE: Yes. Israel being a small country and having suffered through the Holocaust, was and is taking every single measure it can think of to protect itself and, if necessary, to wage war, offensive, as well as defensive. Some years before I got there, they decided they would have a nuclear weapon. [Shimon] Peres, the present foreign minister, was more or less in charge of that. You see, before the United States got involved with supplying Israel's military needs, the French did. The French supplied the planes, for instance, with which Israel fought the Six-Day War, the Mysteres, that sort of thing. So among the things that Peres did was to arrange for the French to help, to advise, to consult, I suppose to actually do the engineering on the Dimona nuclear plant. We had an AEC [Atomic Energy Commission] inspection there in the middle of 1966, several of them.

Q: What was it that we hoped to accomplish or to prevent or to do or whatever?

DALE: The Israelis told us this was a peaceful plant. We did not believe it. We did everything we could, by various means, to find out what it actually was. One of the tests would be whether there was a separation plant in conjunction with the nuclear fuel plant. So we forced, with great pressure -- at that time we were able to exert pressure on Israel -- on the Israelis to accept an American AEC team to come, as I recall, once every six months. I'm not certain of that, but I think that's what it was.

Well, they didn't get there once every six months. The excuses for postponing the visits were ingenious and multiple, but they had two or three visits during the time I was there. They would bring their equipment. The Israelis have a secure hotel where they put up people they don't want the public to know are visiting the country. They put them up in this hotel.

Q: In Tel Aviv or Jerusalem?

DALE: It's between Tel Aviv and Herzliyya. We also knew what it was, but we didn't ever get into it. So these people would finally get there, they would be shown as little as possible, where they couldn't make very definitive judgments. They never could say that Israel was not making nuclear weapons. I think that's the line they took: "We cannot affirm that there's not a separation plant." Although they couldn't find it. So it got to be a battle of wits.

At the same time, the Israelis did something rather curious. I could never go there, but they let American Jews whom they trusted go, and some of them reported to the United States Government, and they reported that Israel was making a nuclear weapon.

Q: Did they talk to you?

DALE: Some of them did, and some of them talked to other people. Some of them were even State Department people. Because they were Jews, they thought that you could count on their loyalty as Jews.

To go on from there, there was all kinds of evidence that the Israelis were making a nuclear weapon, coming in with some plant, I think it was in Pennsylvania, which Jews owned, which was shipping uranium. There was uranium coming from Australia. The ships got switched. Very clever arrangements, but somehow some people traced it. There was a lot of evidence that this was going on. We had a very active physicist as a science attaché, Dr. Webber, and Webber was convinced of it.

So while I was there, I think it was 1966, we wrote a dispatch to the State Department saying that Israel was making nuclear weapons.

Q: Did we view this with alarm, or we not really care too much?

DALE: We viewed it with alarm in the embassy. Barbour hesitated a short time about letting me send the dispatch out, but he did. The CIA man would not take part in the discussion about the dispatch. But with Dr. Webber and the military, I felt we were on safe ground. The military tried to find out, of course, what was going on in Dimona, and our attachés had more flat tires in that area than you ever saw. When you would ask an Israeli what this huge dome was, with this tremendous smokestack way in the middle of the desert, they'd say, "That's the biggest synagogue in the world," or, "This is a new type of textile plant." So you didn't get anywhere talking to them at all.

The British attaché, who was a very clever guy, developed a great interest in butterflies, and he went out and inadvertently, of course, went over the line he was not supposed to go over, and the Israelis caught him chasing butterflies almost up to the building itself. They doubted his interest in butterflies, and he had some difficulty from them.

So our attachés and later on Barbour stopped working with the British or the Canadians.

Q: Why?

DALE: Because he thought our relationship with Israel was so special and so important, that we should not any longer put it through combined with our Allies, the British and the Canadians; we should only act unilaterally with Israel.

Q: That's an interesting point. Is that an evidence of "localitis", or was Barbour, who had been there ten years, was that well-rounded?

DALE: It was prescience, because now that's exactly what's happened. The relationship he foresaw has now occurred. Our relationship with Israel is entirely an independent matter, and in many ways closer than our relationship with the British or Canadians. I think Barbour foresaw this and decided it was the way of the future and was one of which he personally approved.

Q: How did Barbour view Israel?

DALE: When I first came, he was a little bit suspicious. I had come, as I told you, very favorably inclined towards Israel. The first thing he told me when I got there was, "Don't send anything critical of Israel or anything about plans regarding Israel through the State Department's radio communications system. Only do it by personal letter, because Israel has friends in the State Department, and they will report it to the Israeli Embassy." I never thought of that before. It came as a bolt.

Q: Are you sure it's true?

DALE: By now, of course I'm sure it's true, yes, because I've had certain examples of things that have happened. At that time, I was completely confused by it, because it didn't fit the picture I had of Israel as a struggling country, setting up an ideal state. So he was at that time, then, a little bit concerned, but he said something to explain it. He said, "I was sent here by President Johnson, who told me as follows, and you're to follow these orders, as well. He said, 'I don't care what happens to Israel, but I care a lot about the American Jews. Whatever you do in Israel, keep one eye peeled for the American Jews and do nothing which would get them on my back.'" And that was Barbour's policy all the time he was there, and it had to be mine.

Q: The demise of Israel as a nation would get the American Jews on the President's back right away.

DALE: Oh, yes.

Q: So the one didn't go with the other, "I don't care what happens to Israel."

DALE: Oh, no, he just meant he was not interested in Israel. This is Johnson. He was not interested in Israel at all from an ideal point of view, as a place for the Jews and all that. He was only interested in the political ramifications domestically in the United States. Those two things were Barbour's guides, and I adopted them accordingly. From that time on, though I didn't look at Israel quite the same way -- with more circumspection.

Q: A less idealistic outlook?

DALE: Yes.

Q: You mentioned to me one time, way in the past, I think, that you knew [Moshe] Dayan.

DALE: Oh, yes.

Q: He became defense minister just before the war.

DALE: June 1, 1967.

Q: Give me a word description of Dayan.

DALE: He was one of the most complex people I've ever known, one of the few people who could speak good Arabic, Hebrew, and good English. His English wasn't grammatically perfect, but it was very effective. He was a charismatic man. He moved and spoke apparently slowly, but his mind worked so fast and his thoughts were so complex and so compelling, that I've seldom seen a man with the brilliance of expression and brilliance of mind that Dayan had.

I'll give you an example. At one point we had some free scholarships or travel money, I guess you'd call it, Fulbright in origin, to go to see Vietnam. So I asked Moshe if he'd like to go for two or three weeks. He went for four weeks. He said, "Gee, I can write some articles there. That would be fun. I'd love to see how that war's going." So Moshe went off to Vietnam, and when he came back, he said, "Look, why don't you get your friends together. I don't care if they're Americans or Jews or what, but I've got some thoughts. I want to unburden myself." So Moshe came and sat down with his black eye patch and his smile, his forehead always glistened, and began to talk about the Vietnam War. What he really said was, "The Americans are fighting all right there, but it's not their war. The people whose war it is, the Vietnamese, won't fight it. You can't win, no matter what you do without Vietnamese support. For some reason I can't really fathom, the Vietnamese won't fight."

Q: That's just what John Paul Vann was saying about the same time.

DALE: Yes. So he wrote a series of articles on this. We became very close friends. We did a lot of archeology together. He did a lot of things to tease me. One day he said, "Let's get some of your friends from the embassy, and we'll go and look for ancient pots," which he knew I was devoted to, the early Iron Age. So he organized it so that the pretty women went with him, and I got the others and we started out. (Laughs) He was very fond of the women.

We went down and came to a place where the traffic was bad, and then on the other side of this dual highway which was going the other direction, Moshe crossed over and went down the other side. There wasn't any traffic. He didn't care if it was wrong or not. So he went down. He turned and said, one of the women said later, "Bill won't dare do this." And he was right. I didn't. And off we went and had a very nice day looking for ancient pots.

After the Six-Day War, he called up two or three days after it was over and said, "Bill, I've never been to Qumran, where the Dead Sea scrolls were found. Let's go down there. I'll get some military vehicles and stuff in case there's anybody who wants to shoot us, and I want to go and see some of the Arabs there. We can see what we can find in the caves." We didn't find anything in the caves, but it was a fascinating trip.

We stopped at a very prominent Arab house, a great big farm, the Mussaalami farm. Mussaalami wasn't there, but his rather beautiful daughter was there. I didn't know what they were saying, because, as I told you, Moshe spoke excellent Arabic, but what he said he told them, was, "I want you to be able to do business, to start up and buy and sell your produce, and I'll do what I can to help you. But you must not harbor terrorists." A terrorist, by an Israeli definition, is anyone who takes action against Israel.

So those were two occasions. I saw him a great deal. I complained to him unofficially about some things, like the Israeli forces' destruction of Imwas, the place Christ was seen after He arose from the dead, according to the New Testament. The Israel Army destroyed it during or just after the Six-Day War, and I never knew why. So I complained to Moshe. He looked into it and said it was a mistake. He didn't go anywhere with that, but at least he showed that he cared. (Laughs)

Q: There was a buildup to the war that lasted for weeks, anyway, and then he was appointed defense minister just before. Was that done deliberately?

DALE: Yes. The United States had thought they had extracted a promise from the Israeli Government that they wouldn't go to war. The Israelis did not consider they had made that promise, and they had no intention of putting off going to war within that period, because they didn't think that our plan for what they called the Red Sea regatta, the international regatta, warships going up the Red Sea to test Nasser's claim that he had closed it, the Straits of Tehran, was correct or not. The Israelis didn't think that would work, and they intended to go to war. Once they made up their minds they were going to, they called Dayan back as Minister of Defense. But once they'd done that, that was the signal they were going to war. The only question left was when Dayan would order it to begin.

Q: The embassy didn't see it quite that way at the time.

DALE: At the time, no. We knew they were mobilizing. We would have events such as the British ambassador's daughter coming-out party at a hotel, and you'd give an order to a waiter to bring you a drink, and the drink didn't appear. Another waiter would appear and say, "Would you like something?" And he would disappear as they were mobilizing the forces.

Our consul general, Cliff English, had all kinds of people mobilizing in a vacant field beside his house, and we were able to put together everything everybody had, so we knew that the war would start. But we couldn't tell from the evidence that we had that it would start as soon as it did. We expected it to start any time. As to the reporting, the ambassador wanted to give the impression that we thought it wouldn't start, as long as he could possibly get away with it, because he knew we thought we had a promise from the Israelis.

Q: Who had arranged this promise, Barbour?

DALE: No, it was arranged in Washington, I think between the U.S. Government at a high level and Abba Eban, I believe. Or at least they thought that they had the promise with Abba Eban, and had arranged with Eshkol. So that it came as something of a surprise to us, and Barbour didn't want to undercut that, you see, until it was absolutely necessary by a war started. So it became very important when it started.

So we had our Israeli-speaking officer down at the embassy, John Leonard, listening. I'd set up a command post there. It was a lot of fun doing that. Leonard listened, but Leonard's Hebrew wasn't all that good. The morning of the sixth came, and planes were breaking the sound barrier, coming and going. They often did that in the past, it was just more intense, because they'd been practicing this thing for months. Finally, the ambassador called and said, "My cook says a war is on. What does the embassy say?"

I felt sort of embarrassed about that. I called John Leonard, and John said, "I don't hear anything on the radio." So I called back and said, "John Leonard (I didn't say we don't think) doesn't think a war has started."

"Well, my cook says that the Israeli Air Force has destroyed the Egyptian Air Force on the ground," which was entirely correct.

Q: Sometimes cooks and taxi drivers are good sources.

DALE: Well, it doesn't speak well for our language program. John Leonard retired and is now a Greek Catholic priest.

Q: He was the only officer we had who spoke Hebrew?

DALE: Someone might have spoken a little bit of Hebrew, but it was his task.

Q: He was the designated language officer.

DALE: He was the designated language officer to take it.

Q: I think in years since, we've had more able linguists.

DALE: He was supposed to be able. But anyway, he wasn't. When the test came, he failed it. It didn't matter very much. When I called up my sidekick in the foreign ministry, Shlomo Argoff, who was later shot as ambassador to London, and asked him if Israel had attacked, he said,

"Well, there was provocation."

I said, "What was it?"

He said, "I don't know yet. I'll try to find out." But that was a delaying action. There wasn't any. They attacked when they were ready.

Q: Is it true that by this time, embassy dependents had already been evacuated?

DALE: No. No, they were not evacuated. That was left up to me. I'll put it this way. We had evacuated one group of dependents, but I had not evacuated all the wives. That's because of what happened at the time of the Suez Crisis in Egypt. The evacuated wives stayed away too long, and a lot of marriage problems resulted, and everybody got together, involving a lot of secretaries. You probably heard about that.

Q: No, but I think I can imagine.

DALE: So I didn't want that to happen. I evacuated non-essential wives and personnel, then I kept the essential ones, the wives, very important ones, until the last minute. Then I put Tezi Currie, who is now Assistant Secretary, in charge of it. There she was in this American community schoolyard with her slip showing, getting all the Americans on buses. I had a terrible time finding a plane, but I found one eventually, which had had its wing repaired. The pilot said he thought it would hold as far as Cyprus. So on the first day of the war, we evacuated, but not until then. Actually, we couldn't have before because we did not know the war would occur that day, so we couldn't have. It takes a certain preparation. We were all ready. The evacuation plans had been updated. I think we probably evacuated about the right time, except, of course, it turned out that nobody needed to go.

Q: Did the ambassador feel betrayed in any way that the Israeli attack broke out, despite a supposed arrangement?

DALE: No, but he did later before the war ended. His main contact was the American desk officer, Moshe Bitan. Moshe Bitan had told Wally Barbour that Israel realized there was a United Nations resolution for a cease-fire, and Israel intended to obey it, but he said, "We had just a little matter we wanted to clear up on the Syrian front." I was there. Now, the Syrians had not attacked in the Six-Day War, as you probably know. I think they fired a few shots and that's all, not participating. But he said it would only take an hour or two and not to worry about it. So Barbour sent some kind of telegram to that effect.

Instead of that, Israel moved all its troops from the Egyptian front who weren't involved, and the central front, because they were beating the dickens out of Jordan by this time, up to the northern front. The Golani brigade went up to Golan Heights and led a major attack, which was not what Bitan had said. This was also the time of Liberty, which may very well have been attacked for the same reason, but they didn't want us to hear all the orders that were necessary to transfer thousands of men. I don't know that; that's speculation on my part. It's not speculation.

Later on, the ambassador got a hold of Bitan and said, "You deceived me." He was, for him, quite angry. He was always very careful, because he always had President Johnson looking over his shoulder, so he never got really angry. But he was as angry as he ever got.

Bitan said, "Yeah, I deceived you, but the Arabs deceive you more than we do."

Q: When did you find out about the Liberty?

DALE: The Israelis called us as soon as they had finished their attack on it, called the naval attaché, Ernie Castle, and told him that an American ship had been hit by mistake by Israeli forces, because they thought it was an Egyptian ship. It had a similar silhouette, a Liberty ship. They said, "Don't you want to go out and see if they need any help?"

So Ernie got his lunch, which he had brought to the office -- we were more or less living in the office -- which was a paper bag, an orange, a sandwich, took out the sandwich, left the orange, and put in a note, "Do you want any help?" And flew over the Liberty, which was sort of listing out there. I'm not sure it was listing; it was almost unguided in the water, smoking like everything. He dropped it on the deck from the helicopter. The personnel of the Liberty waved him away. So Ernie came back a little disconsolate, and said, "They need help like everything, but they won't take it from the Israelis." He didn't realize, nor did the Israelis tell us at the time, that there was a big American flag on that ship. So we didn't know that, and we thought it was a genuine error.

Q: Did Barbour ever become irate about that?

DALE: No. If he did, he didn't show it. He had to be very careful not to show emotion like that which might set the staff, you see, thinking things. So he was very, very quiet about what personal thoughts he might have had. From that time on, though, he was very much more pro-Israeli, from the time of the Six-Day War on.

Q: Why?

DALE: I don't know. He was deceived, they fooled him, the Liberty was not an accident, and he must have known it. Well, he put it this way to me once. He said, "You know, Bill, Israel's relations with the United States is the way of the future. I don't care if the Arabs have all the oil reserves in the world. Our relationship is going to be with Israel, and I'm going to promote it." This was shortly after the Six-Day War. That's all he ever said. I think he saw the strength of the bond between Israel and the United States, which became clear about that time. We did send an awful lot of war material towards the end of that war.

Q: What about your own attitude? You had been there several years by now.

DALE: Yes, I had been there four years. Well, I began, as you know, very pro-Israeli. Barbour told me those two messages that I went into earlier. Then an ambassador from a country which was considered to be very friendly to Israel, Switzerland, said he wanted to come over to see me one day. Barbour didn't see much of the other ambassadors, because he wanted it believed he was on a special status, which, in a way, he was. So they were left to me to entertain. The Swiss ambassador said, "You know, look at this." He had a newspaper in German, the Jewish newspaper. It was the main Jewish newspaper in Switzerland. He said, "I just finished this. It's all about Swiss Jews' relation to Israel. There's not a word in it about Switzerland. I don't think this is healthy. I think it's worse for the United States, and you should begin to think about it." Later on, he got a decoration from the Israeli Government for his friendly reception there in that situation. But you see, really he didn't.

Then the British and the Canadians began to tell me things. Our Army attaché had two Israeli intelligence girls as mistresses, one in the north and one in the south. When he went north, there was one girl. When he went south, it was another.

I began to see the relationship at two levels: one, the kind of level I believed in at first, of ideals, and then the second level, where the United States was being brought into a kind of Israeli net, in which the American Zionists played a very important role, an increasingly important role.

They came to the embassy from time to time. They didn't always, because they didn't need the embassy. They were a pretty self-confident group, the big givers. We used to go to their parties. One time I went to a party with my wife, with a group of these big givers, and they were saying what a wonderful country they found Israel to be, and how nice the Israelis were to them. They said, "You know, it really wasn't all that expensive because the Israeli Government arranges through the various funds that they had. Say we give $50,000 to Israel. They put down $100,000, and then we get a deduction of 100,000 on our American tax. In no other country can you take any deduction." So I saw this second level which, to me, was founded in part on plain deceit in order to make the most of their relationship with America. I became very ambivalent about it, and I still am.

Q: Had you, by this time, developed attitudes about the Arab world, in the middle of which you lived?

DALE: The Arab world still seemed to be very disorganized, very incapable of establishing and maintaining a unified stance in any foreign policy type of crisis or situation. I found I could not work up much enthusiasm for them, and I still can't. I've not changed views on that or on Israel.

Q: By the time you left in 1968, roughly that time, the war was over. There were problems of U.N. resolutions and questions of the West Bank and the refugees and so forth. What were the major bilateral issues that you were dealing with about the time that you left Israel?

DALE: The major one was that at the time of the Six-Day War, a great many more Arabs had been forced out one way or another from the West Bank and from the old refugee camps. We wanted some of those to come back to their homes. We thought that they should, especially family members. We had a great deal of controversy with the Israeli Government, trying for get them, on humanitarian grounds, to accept a large number of the Arabs back who had been forced out in the 1967 War. They did not do that, of course. They let a few back, a very few, enough so they could say they had done something. Because they wanted the land, the houses, just as they did in '48. They did not want embittered people coming back into Israel. That part is understandable.

Q: You were acting in this regard on instructions from Washington.

DALE: Yes.

Q: What was the rationale for taking the part of the Arab refugees?

DALE: We didn't look on it as taking the part of the Arab refugees; we looked on it as a humanitarian matter, that a good many people had been forced out of their homes, and across the border. They were victims of warfare, and they left homes and presumably going enterprises in what had been the West Bank. Many of them had also been refugees in refugee camps. We thought that by every humanitarian kind of desideratum, they should be allowed back. They were not necessarily going to make war on Israel; they had lived there before. The Israelis said no, but let a few close relatives back, enough so that we couldn't say they didn't do anything.

There was another issue, and that was the settlements. The Israelis began to put settlements in the Golan Heights and in the West Bank almost immediately. By that time, the United States Government was very firm in its stand that those were illegal under the Fourth Geneva Convention, and that they would make it very difficult to reach a peace. So I think I was the first officer to deliver the protest. However, it was very noteworthy that Barbour would not deliver that. He had me do it, which downgraded it.

Q: And preserved his position, as well.

DALE: Yes. He didn't say it; he just never mentioned it. I did it, reported back that I had done it. The Israelis said, "Yes, we understand your position." This was Shlomo Argoff, very polite. And that was that.

Q: I recall at the time, in another part of the world, that Israelis diplomats told me Israel would, of course, return the West Bank, given certain questions of Arab recognition, of course. Was that the position of the foreign ministry?

DALE: There was a brief period when Abba Eban was foreign minister, when I do believe the Israelis would have returned the West Bank almost in its entirety. The problem was that the King of Jordan, Hussein, at that point was in such a state of shock, that he couldn't seem to negotiate, couldn't seem to bring himself to enter into the kind of negotiation it would have taken. So for a period of maybe a couple of months, I think that would have been true. After that, the Israelis discovered they had something there, particularly Jews, and I don't think Jerusalem would have been returned anyway, but the West Bank. There were advantages to be gotten from it, so the position hardened and became consistently harder ever since.

Q: Your departing impression of Israel, then, was this ambivalence that you speak of?

DALE: That's correct. Oh, yes, there was one other element. It became clear before I left that the American Zionist organizations were playing a larger and larger political role in the United States. I was afraid it might not be confined just to Israel, but would affect our foreign policy with Russia and various other countries, because it was power which would be traded. I began to worry about that, and that concern remains with me, because they go to Israel and they plan more or less what they're going to do when they come back. We saw a good many of those "unofficial ambassadors." They're the ones who Israel can send to the President. The President is really afraid of them, and he would very likely do what they want, more so than if, say, the Israeli ambassador does something. So these people play a very important role, and they constantly go back and forth to Israel. Many of them are dual citizens.

Q: Can you name names, or can you cite a couple of organizations?

DALE: Zionists of America, of course; American Jewish Committee; American Jewish Conference; B'nai B'rith lobbyists were in Israel very often, and I saw them when I came back to Washington a good deal. We were on close terms with them, and they keep track of what goes on in this country, and they go back and forth to Israel. The names are a little difficult now; it's a long time ago. If I think of them, I'll tell you.

Q: Had this gone so far as to sour you on your assignment in Tel Aviv?

DALE: No. Oh, no. It was a very interesting assignment. The individual Israelis I knew, I liked. Most of them were in the Labor party. Many of the people I respected. I respected [David] Ben-Gurion. Barbour did not. I thought he was a great guy. I liked [Shimon] Peres. [Yitzhak] Rabin was a great friend of mine, a close friend, and still would be. I'm going to see some of them next week. I'm looking forward to it. So it did not sour me at all, but it causes concern, because I'm afraid that we may be following a policy which is not of our making, but of Israel's making which guides us in the Middle East.

Q: Still, to this day, 1988?

DALE: Yes, more so. I did a poll at one point, just before the Six-Day War, on this, after the Swiss ambassador came, asking whether they thought Zionism in their countries and Zionist as they saw it working in Israel was good for the countries they represented or not. With one exception, the answers were universally "no." Everyone, I think, felt the same as I did, practically everyone. The one exception was Costa Rica, I think.

Q: When you left in 1968, Barbour was still the ambassador?

DALE: Yes.

Q: And Johnson was still in the White House. He didn't leave until January of 1969. So you were there during this period of time when there was no change in administration.

DALE: That's right.

Q: No change in this policy that you mentioned that Barbour articulated to you, to "keep the Zionist lobby off my back."

DALE: That's right. That came true in all kinds of ways. We were very, very helpful to any American Zionist who came over. We saw hundreds of them, although they didn't all come to the embassy, but those who did. Many of them, I enjoyed them very much, but not this aspect.

Q: How, briefly, did you see the Zionists messing up American policy toward Israel back in those mid-Sixties?

DALE: They had a good deal to do under Goldberg in the United Nations, who was a Zionist, with watering down Resolution 242, so that instead of saying, as it does in the French version, "the territory on the West Bank should be returned," to saying, "territory," which has been watered down now to where it means "little of the territory," or perhaps not very much of it will be returned. That was apparently Goldberg's work in the United Nations, and that was a prime example, which all of us felt was a mistake for the United States, because it's never been clear since then. The French version is clear.

Q: Which one is the official one is a question, and that complicated things from then on.

DALE: It has complicated them from then on.

Q: Although, of course, Israel had not agreed to return anything, anyway.

DALE: Well, they returned Sinai.

Q: I take it back. Yes, sorry. I was in Egypt when that was going on. I should have remembered.

DALE: You remember they did return that.

Q: How did you organize the embassy or how was the embassy broken down to cope with the crisis situation such as the Six-Day War?

DALE: Crisis situations arise -- I wouldn't say gradually -- but they do not arise all at once. You have perhaps a week, perhaps two weeks in which the crisis gradually becomes worse. During that time you begin, I think, almost casually to change your organization to fit the requirements of the growing crisis.

In this case, one of the first things we had to do was limit our telegraphic traffic so that no routine or administrative type telegrams would be sent and the wires would be reserved for use in crisis type messages.

Q: Did you keep a telephone line open also?

DALE: We kept a telephone line, yes, but that was of uncertain usefulness, depending on the situation. We also used ham radios at one point. That's how I got in touch with my children.

Q: Who were concerned about your safety, I guess?

DALE: Well, I was concerned about where they were as it was vacation time. And I wanted them to know that we were all right and where to go. And then I had them go to Rome.

Q: Where were they?

DALE: They were in different places in the United States.

So we had first the messages to do, then we had the evacuation plan to put into operation. This became the responsibility, as we organized it, of the consular section. They kept in touch with all American citizens. I'm not now talking about dual citizens. And the consular people implemented the evacuation plan when it became advisable to do so. We gave advice to American citizens to leave well before the fighting started.

As far as embassy personnel were concerned, they went out, as I recall, in two batches. The first batch were wives and children for whom it was quite easy to leave. Then when the fighting actually started, we organized an airlift, with a plane which had just been repaired in Israel. The plane actually had trouble with one wing and they had just finished re-securing the wing to the body of the plane. The Air Force officer who offered the plane, knowing we needed one, said he hoped it was all right and he thought it would get as far as Cyprus. So I called our ambassador in Cyprus, Toby Belcher, and told him we were coming in on a wing and a prayer, and to prepare quarters and food and whatnot for the people who would be coming over. Toby did a splendid job of it, as always.

The person in charge of actually loading the personnel into the buses to go to the plane was Tezi Currie. Tezi, I think, is now Assistant Secretary in the Bureau of Economic Affairs. This was her first post and she was said to be the youngest Foreign Service officer. She spoke something like six languages. Her English was excellent on this occasion, but her slip showed. However, I did not mention it to her.

The organization itself began to develop about a week before the fighting started. We organized the conference room into an operations center and the senior staff was organized into a crisis management team. The officers who had no regular duties at this point, like economic officers, were converted into operations officers and it was their job to keep the operations room up to date, to keep all the telegrams that were pertinent, easily available, let us know when new information came in, keep the map up to date to show us where the fighting was and other such tasks. We had shifts so that the embassy was always manned with enough people so we could handle anything that came up, day or night. Some people slept at the embassy, to begin with, and during the entire crises there were at least a couple of people staying overnight. Bit by bit as the crisis began to resolve itself and the fighting grew less, people were allowed to go home at night. I went home at night after the first couple of nights and brought my driver with me, who spent the night at the house, very unwillingly, because he wanted to be with his wife.

Q: You told me earlier that the ambassador was almost never there.

DALE: The ambassador had been invited by the Israelis to go to their war room in the Department of Defense, which was still located in Tel Aviv, not in Jerusalem where the bulk of the government was located by that time. And Wally Barbour, therefore, spent almost all his time in the Israeli war room. He never explained to me exactly what he did there.

Q: Did he have a line of communication with Washington from the war room?

DALE: As far as I know, he did not. He might have been able to telephone, using Israeli-controlled circuits. But eventually it became difficult to use the phone. When I wanted to get in touch with my three sons and tell them what to do and what was happening to us, I did it by ham radio. And it worked splendidly.

Q: Private individuals who had ..

DALE: Yes, an Israeli friend of mine, who was a ham radio expert.

Q: You knew, or you expected, that the war would be short?

DALE: Yes.

Q: So you never really doubted either the outcome of the war?

DALE: No. There were two factors here. One was the attachés, who knew pretty much what the opposing forces consisted of, and had a high respect for the Israeli military, which was well deserved. They sent in a prediction, which, as I recall, was that if war should break out, the Israelis would have it won at the end of a week, more or less. I had, myself, been fortunate enough to be taken around the central front by the commander of the central front, General Narkiss, about three weeks before the fighting started.

This had nothing to do with, as far as I know, the fact that the war was imminent. We weren't even thinking about that. It was a long-standing invitation which finally came to fruition at that point. And I went up and down the whole central area and he explained what his troops would do, where they would give a little ground, where they would advance, where there reserves were. In fact, you could see them all along that central front area and he explained what they would do to retake Jerusalem, if the Jordanians were silly enough to attack the Israelis. He explained that they would go along the hilltops on either side of the city and pinch it off and that East Jerusalem, with its holy sites, the Wailing Wall and so on, would fall into Israeli hands. But he did not anticipate that King Hussein would actually attack Israel.

As you probably know, the Israelis did send a message by way of General Bull of the United Nations, to King Hussein, saying, in substance, "If you do not attack, we will not attack you," as the war started. And they also let it be known that they wouldn't consider a few stray shells being landed by the Jordanians for the sake of appearances to be an attack. But the Jordanians attacked at Government House. That was the U.N. headquarters at that point, the old British headquarters. There may not have been a tremendous attack, but it was significant enough so that it gave the Israelis the opportunity, quite justifiably, to repel the attack and take the West Bank.

Q: To your knowledge, when did the war break out? What was your first intimation?

DALE: The first intimation? Oh, that is a sorry subject. We had on watch that night, John Leonard, who was one of our Israeli-speaking officers. He had learned it at FSI.

Q: Yes, now I remember. We talked about that the last time. Give me a brief resume again.

Well, he didn't catch it, and the Ambassador's cook told the ambassador that the fighting had started. The ambassador called me, I called Leonard and he said, "Oh, I can't hear anything about that on the radio." He is now, as I think I told you, a Greek Catholic priest.

Q: Yes. About your time in Israel and your participation in one of the most significant, brief, sharp clashes that an American embassy was ever involved in. The only exceptions I can think of maybe were the outbreak of World War II in France or something of that sort. Looking back on it now, have you got any thoughts or any lessons perhaps that you've drawn from those days on crisis management? How to deal if a six-day war breaks out on your doorstep? Things that you would have done differently?

DALE: Yes, there is one thing I would have done differently. When I had heard that the fighting had started, I called my contact, Shlomo Argoff, in the foreign ministry and asked him whether it was really true that Israel had attacked. And he said, "Oh, the Arabs must have done something. I think I heard that they fired at us." I took that more seriously than I should have.

Q: Did you report it?

DALE: I reported it. When actually Shlomo, I think, was making it up.

Q: Making it up as he went along?

DALE: Yes, that's right. As a bit of justification. Later on there was no record of any provocation at all.

JAMES H. BAHTI
Washington, DC (1964-1970)

James H. Bahti was born in Michigan in 1923. He graduated from Michigan Tech with a B.S. degree in engineering in 1948. Subsequently, he received a M.A. and a Ph.D. from the University of Michigan. Mr. Bahti entered the Foreign Service in 1955, serving in Germany, Egypt, India, and Saudi Arabia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

BAHTI: Just a general desk officer, we did not have an economic section in ARN. The bureau had been reorganized slightly at that time. It was kind of holding pattern for me. I had been marked to replace Ted Wahl as Roy Atherton's number two in Arab-Israeli Affairs. So by the summer of 1967, shortly after the '67 war I moved from ARN to being deputy for Roy Atherton in Israeli-Arab Affairs. I continued with my boycott work which was a good part of my activity.

Q: Let's keep on with the boycott work to begin with. Was the misinformation just misinformation the way it normally comes or was this an effort on the part of those who were trying to break it, particularly the Jewish lobby, to make it seem much worse than it was in order to create antagonism, how did you see it?

BAHTI: Well, it was both but primarily the latter. The Arabs were very inept. There were indeed one or two letters asking whether you have Jews working for you. Very bad PR type inquiries. Those were exceptions, but it became a credo, commonly believed, that this was the way the boycott worked, but it wasn't. There was this effort to build this boycott up as a terrible, terrible thing affecting American business and having strong religious overtones, which was not the case. That was the purpose of my study, to show the way it really worked.

Q: Did you have problems or attacks on you by the Israeli lobby?

BAHTI: I was never personally involved to that extent. I remember briefing congressmen in a sort of adversarial sense, or groups of people sponsored by congressmen who would present these huge petitions asking us to do certain things. I was more involved in some of the classic cases, the Ford boycott, the Coca Cola boycott, the Xerox boycott, all of which were unbelievably stupid cases. I say stupid in the sense that the Arabs should not have boycotted these firms in the first place, but once the ball started rolling, they could not stop it rolling.

Q: I heard a story when I was in Saudi Arabia that there was a small factory producing punch cards for IBM in Israeli so that at one point the Arabs decided to boycott IBM until the Egyptians said, "Cut it out fellows, our whole mobilization plan is based on IBM punch cards!" Can you talk about how you dealt with one of these boycott cases?

BAHTI: Let's take the Ford case which was fairly simple; the Coke case is much more complex. Ford had agreed to permit semi-knocked-down kits, which is in effect an automobile minus its wheels, which reduces shipping costs, to be assembled in Israel. This was described by some Arab representative as a big assembly plant like the Ford plant at River Rouge, or Dearborn, in Israel. Ford did the same thing in Morocco, sending these knocked-down kits to a distributor where he would bolt the wheels onto the frame, and there was your car. That was the amount of the assembly, but somehow the Arabs got the notion that this was a big, big assembly plant. So they said that if you do that in Israel we will boycott you. Well, Ford said, "What do you mean? This is not an assembly plant."

We spent months and months, the embassy there, and I dealing with Arab embassy officials here, primarily Egyptian, trying to explain what this was all about. They said, "Yeah, yeah, we know, but there is no way we can stop it." Ford was boycotted. There had been a Ford plant in Alexandria, Egypt in which they had done the same thing for awhile, which Egypt closed down. I was in almost weekly contact with the Ford people on that matter.

The Xerox case: they had sponsored a TV film which was adjudged by the Arabs to be favorable to Israel and they boycotted Xerox. The Coca Cola case, briefly; an Israeli bottler had wanted to open up a bottling plant in Israel. Coca Cola said he did not have enough money, the means, he was not financially strong enough to do this, so they refused. The bottler in Israel planted the story that the U.S. had caved in to Arab pressures and therefore had refused to let him bottle in Israel. One thing led to another; Coca Cola did not concern itself about being boycotted by the Arab states; that was just a tiny part of its sales. They were concerned about the supermarkets in the United States -- about Coca Cola being boycotted there in response to their refusal to permit the bottling of Coca Cola in Israel. So they said, "O.K. we will let you bottle in Israel." They were boycotted by the Arabs. A few years later the bottler went belly up; the Coke people were right in the first place, but the damage had been done. It was said that Nasser had a few thousand cases of Coke stashed away in his basement because that was his favorite soft drink.

Q: Did you find that it was maybe the Arab dealers in Land Rovers or the like who were starting the rumors about the Ford cars? Was this getting involved in souk [Arab marketplace] politics?

BAHTI: Yes. This was probably inevitable. People would plant notions. You can recall the story about the local Coca Cola distributor planting the story about Pepsi Cola that it came from pepsin which came from the stomach of a pig. This caused Pepsi to lose a lot of business until they got that straightened out. The Arab dealers are not above such dirty tricks. I am not sure this was the case with Ford.

Q: How did the 1967 War, between Israel and some of its Arab neighbors hit your office and your operation?

BAHTI: It did not really put us out of business but it certainly had a real impact. One of my closest Arab friends in Washington was the economic officer of the Egyptian embassy. We had had social contact, professional contact. I remember the day of the war calling him and saying, "Abdul, this is about the saddest day of my life". I really like Egypt, Egyptians; I liked Abdul Rahman Hammoud and he said it was a very sad day for him too. We saw very little of each other after that although it became clear that the initial allegations of our participation were untrue.

Q: We had severed relations at that point.

BAHTI: Although they had an interests section here, I may have seen him after that. I can't recall specifically the impact on our work. Since I was dealing with Israel and Israeli affairs my focus was largely on the aftermath of the war, what we could and could not do, there was an almost daily demand for briefing papers on Arab-Israeli affairs.

Q: Did you have the impression that the 1967 war came about in a step by step manner -- Nasser asking that the UN troops withdraw etc. It was not a sudden crisis. Did you have the feeling that we saw where this thing was headed?

BAHTI: I did not and many of my colleagues did not. There were those who were privy to some intelligence not available to me who probably saw the inevitable sequence of events that was developing, and we did set up a task force about a week in advance of the June war to sort of generate control of the distribution of documents, keeping a round-the-clock watch on matters, what was the latest news, keeping the Secretary fully informed. He would drop in on the task force at unannounced times just to check on things. Once the war started we had a tremendous problem of keeping people out of the task force work area, these were people who were just personally or otherwise interested. We had to physically bar them from coming in and messing through the flood of papers that were coming in. Then there was the whole matter of the sinking of the U.S.S. Liberty, a Naval vessel sunk by Israeli aircraft which took a lot of attention.

But to get back to your question, I must blush when I say I told Roy Atherton that there was not going to be any war. I could not have been more wrong. I just did not have access to information that he had. I was convinced that Nasser would tell the UNEF (United Nations Emergency Forces) to take their time getting out or that the Secretary General of the UN himself would do something. You know he rolled over and played dead, I think he could have stopped this thing.

Q: Many people feel that way. It was U Nu at the time. They feel that there was far too much cooperation in getting the forces out which meant that there would be just the Arabs and Israelis facing each other.

BAHTI: I guess maybe after the Secretary General retired he wrote that he had no choice in the matter, but I thought he moved with undue haste.

Q: That was the feeling at that time, surprise that they were scurrying out of there.

BAHTI: That may have been the time of our setting up this task force. I don't know what extra intelligence was available. I certainly did not have access to all of it.

Q: You then became involved in Arab-Israeli affairs.

BAHTI: IAI - Israel and Arab-Israeli Affairs.

Q: What was the difference between this focus and other areas?

BAHTI: Dealing with Israel is quite a different kettle of fish than dealing with the Arab states. You had a very competent bureaucracy in Israel. You had statistics, you had data generally available with which you could work and be generally confident about because they had very, very good people. With the Egyptians you never could be sure what they told you was statistically correct. It very likely was exaggerated -- talking about trade union membership, percentage of a vote that went to so-and-so as compared to so-and- so. The Israelis have an open press, not too much censorship. You had more to work with, you could make, in my view, a better analysis, make certain statements with a higher degree of certainty that what you were saying was correct. For instance our economic assistant programs, we just gave them the money, they ran the programs. Whereas in Egypt we had what was then a large but nowhere near as large as today, economic assistance mission. There was a lot of currency available for an awful lot of projects. There were a lot of research projects going on in Israel. One of the things that I did was to review these proposed projects for political sensitivity. Not only the project itself, but where the project was to go. Was it right near the armistice lines, for instance.

Q: Were we very concerned at that time about the West Bank?

BAHTI: The question of settlements had not become very important at that time. It subsequently became much more important. Just keeping up, what are they doing in East Jerusalem? Where was the parade going to be held this year? What can we do to stop them from taunting the Arabs by going through the Arab sector of the occupied areas. We would get daily calls from parents of Jewish kids who were in Israel, maybe working on kibbutzim or wanting to go to kibbutzim or moshavim, which in many cases were in areas we considered dangerous. I felt quite free to tell the parent, "Look, if he is going to Israel don't let him go to that kibbutz, there have been terrorist incidents in the area with some frequency. Have him go somewhere else where it is safer. We don't want another death case to report."

Q: How did you see the effect of the Israeli lobby and how did it operate?

BAHTI: It is one of the most effective lobbies in Washington. They have a great deal of money and we had a fair amount of contact with the Arab-Israel Public Affairs Committee [AIPAC]; they put out a good, although quite biased, newsletter, the Near East Report. The head of it, Si Kenon, was a very fine gentleman. There was no question of where he stood, but you could tell him things in confidence and he would keep them in confidence; he would not blab them around. Or he could tell you things quite frankly and say, "look, this is what is going to happen if thus and so happens" and that is the way it would work out. He was well plugged into, not only his own organization AIPAC, but most of the other pro-Israel lobbies in Washington, and of course with Congress. One of our big jobs was responding to Congressional correspondence, which in turn generally reflected constituent correspondence. A constituent believes thus and so happened, please advise me, give me a report on the subject. We had Congressional correspondence you can't believe. The volume was such that it took much of our time. Although sometimes you could send out a fairly boiler-plate type letter, it more often had to be tailored to this special case. We would get letter writing campaigns, thousand of identical text letters, generally mimeographed. One such case I remember came from Philadelphia. I had to keep count of them, as though this were going to affect our decision. I told one group that if they were at a horse race and their horse is losing do they think that their yelling makes him go any faster? This was the time the Iraqi Jews were being executed and we were being exhorted to "do something" about this. Nobody ever said what. In this particular campaign from Philadelphia I noticed after awhile that all the letters were signed with about four different types of handwriting, in other words four people were signing all the letters, but with different names. They were using a phone book, a synagogue list or something. So you can imagine that had much less impact; when I pointed this out to the Assistant Secretary, he was much less impressed by the volume of such letters.

A member of Congress sponsored a visit of his constituents who came in with bales of letters and petitions. I briefed them on the particular issue; I don't remember what the issue was. Finally someone said, "What impact will these petitions have on what you are doing?" I said, "I told you I would be frank. The impact will be very little" and gave them the analogy of the horse race. The Congressman was furious. I said, "I am encouraged by your interest in this subject, but I would much rather see your efforts directed towards some other activity, such as promoting better relations between the Arab and Jewish communities, or study seminars; there are any number of things you can do." Well that did not go over too well. It is kind of fun to collect petitions and come to Washington with a bale of them and be briefed by a State Department officer.

I was very active in public speaking around the country. A lot of my colleagues did not like to do that, but I got a big kick out of it. After the first talk that I gave to a men's synagogue group in Brooklyn, which was trial by fire, I realized that "Hey, you know a hundred times more about this subject than almost anybody in your audience. And I felt perfectly at ease. First of all you knew what the questions, most of the questions, were going to be and you had a nice, neatly tailored answer for them. Second, you could cite facts and figures that they simply did not have. It was not always Jewish groups, it was high school groups, university groups. At that time the State Department was sending around teams for a while explaining about Vietnam, Arab-Israeli affairs, South African affairs, various touchy subjects.

Q: Did you have the feeling at that particular time, we are talking about 1967-69, we were trying to keep a fairly even hand in the whole Arab-Israeli thing, or for political reasons siding more with Israel?

BAHTI: I think in theory we were trying to keep an even-handed approach, and many of us tried to keep the approach from tilting too much. As a matter of fact it was my view that domestic pressures were such, pressures from Congress were such, that we had no real choice but to lean in favor of Israel, which was described as our only dependable ally in the Middle East, and things of that nature -- the only practicing democracy. We kind of retched at some of this stuff, but when I spoke to people I told it like it was. I got a lot of hostile questions, but I was able to defend myself. In answer to your question, yes, I think we bowed to Congressional pressure on much of this. There were all these resolutions and so on, and sometimes legislation - the anti-boycott legislation was one of the dumbest things we have ever done. We fought it tooth and nail because, a) we knew it would not work, and b) we were shooting ourselves in the foot, just surrendering the whole field to the Japanese and the Germans and the British and so on, who did not really care at all about the boycott regulations; they went along with them because it meant business. The Chamber of Commerce fought it, but the pressures from AIPAC and Congress were such that we got this anti-boycott legislation. That is the kind of example of slanting U.S. policy because of Congressional and domestic pressures.

MARK C. LISSFELT
Staff Aide/Commercial Officer
Tel Aviv, Jerusalem (1965-1967)

Mark C. Lissfelt was born in Pennsylvania in 1932. He received his BA from Haverford College and his MALD from Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy in 1959. He served overseas in the U.S. Army from 1954 to 1956. His foreign posts included London, Tel Aviv, Bamako, Brussels, Bonn, Berlin and Paris. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on May 22, 1998

LISSFELT: Well, we went to Tel Aviv, and it was very much engineered through the wizardry of Findley Burns, who knew how to get the personnel process to be a little flexible so that I could go in "temporarily" as a commercial officer. We were interested in Tel Aviv, frankly, because particularly my wife was interested in going there. She was just fascinated by the Israeli experience and she prompted me, if I had needed any prompting, to see if we could get an assignment there, which we ended up happily getting and, after some training back here at FSI, went out there in January '65.

Q: And you were there to '67.

LISSFELT: Yes, through the Six Day War. My family was evacuated ahead of me - we could see the war coming - seven days before it happened, when Nasser ejected UN troops from the Sinai, I stayed there with our Welsh Corgi dog.

Q: I'd like to go back. When you arrived you went what? As a-LISSFELT: This was my second overseas assignment. I was still quite a junior officer. I arrived as the acting commercial officer. I didn't know anything about commercial work, but I soon learned, and I did that for a period of time after which I was to go into the Political Section, a three-man Political Section, where I was to be the junior person. Well, what I didn't know was this wonderful ambassador, the late Walworth Barbour, took the junior officer from the Political Section to be his staff aide! So I ended up moving into another staff position, which was not something that I necessarily sought, but didn't have much choice. What I was doing for a while was doing the commercial officer job in the afternoon and being Staff Aide in the morning for Barbour a good part of my first year in Tel Aviv.

Q: What were our commercial interests in Israel at the time?

LISSFELT: Well, this was before we were shipping lots and lots of airplanes. Phantom (F-4) aircraft became the big thing. My successor claimed credit for increasing the exports of the United States to Israel a thousand-fold, but it was the shipping of Phantom aircraft that made his statistics surge. It was before we had really supplanted the French as a source of military equipment for Israel, so it was all sorts of things: finding agents for American firms who wanted a local person to sell their goods; organizing a trade fair, which we did, featuring, among other things, automotive repair equipment, which - believe me - Israel needed in the worst way (that was quite a success; in fact my successor saw that through to the end); dealing with visiting American businessmen with one request after another; running a commercial library, which was a standard thing done in most commercial sections of embassies perhaps even today. Dealing with the U.S. Commerce Department from afar and with some of the minions that they sent abroad also was one of the, frankly, less desirable parts of it. Although I didn't know much about commerce, I didn't find that they knew much more than I did, unfortunately - the ones that I had to deal with. I've since gained a lot more respect for them, from my experience--for example, later in Paris.

Q: I would have thought that at that time there were a lot of Americans of Jewish origin who were involved in Israel one way or another, but also you're dealing with people, who along with the Lebanese and others, are known as being some of the most disputatious traders - sharp, very good traders - there, coming from the Levant. And having sort of the New York-Tel Aviv circuit and being a commercial officer, I would have thought you'd be in the middle of all sorts of things.

LISSFELT: Well, the truth of it was, at least my experience of it was, that the really effective high-rollers, if I can call them that, didn't come near the embassy, had nothing to do with the commercial officer and didn't want to have anything to do with the U.S. government. And they didn't need any advice or counseling on how you find an agency in Tel Aviv. They had their contacts; they had their friends; and they didn't need us. I wasn't, therefore, terribly impressed by those - I don't want to call them "dregs;" that's not fair, but they were not very sharp people who wended their way into the embassy seeking help from me. And I helped them as much as I could, but I soon realized that even a few of them were so lazy they weren't doing their own research about any of the laws and things like that and we were able to help them do what they should have done on their own. It was a very mixed bag, but this was again another eye-opening experience about the U.S. government abroad, believe me, something I knew nothing about before and certainly was not qualified for.

Q: Let's talk prior to the Six Day War. How would you characterize the embassy - I mean, this was a country under siege, I mean, just by it's nature, which it remains basically today, I guess, but changed quite a bit at that time - the people in the embassy and how you looked at it when you first arrived, how they looked at the world around them?

LISSFELT: You knew you were going into a hot spot, if you will, but it wasn't one where one felt physical danger. We lived north of Tel Aviv, where the U.S. PL-480 (Public Law 480) funds, which were generated by assistance given over the years, were used to build very nice housing, which was a heck of a good investment, by the way. My wife and I were a young couple with two young children, a third born when we were in Tel Aviv - and our reception couldn't have been more cordial. The dealings day in and day out had to do often with frictions - for instance, up in Jerusalem access to Mt. Scopus, the UN convoys running supplies up there when that was an enclave, no longer an enclave. Palestinian refugees were also a problem, but that was mainly dealt with out of here and out of Beirut - Washington and Beirut. But it was a very lugubrious clime to land in in '95, and we felt ourselves, indeed, very lucky. I consider it still one of my most interesting assignments, to be there at that stage in our lives.

Q: Can you talk about - was it Ambassador Barbour?

LISSFELT: Walworth Barbour had been there three or four years at least before I arrived, stayed a total of 11 years as ambassador there, and was a wonderful, taciturn, extremely smart bachelor, who was joined often by his sister, who came out to be his companion in the summer months. She came from Gloucester, from her home. He was a career person who had come from being the minister in London and had a distinguished career behind him. I think he was respected immensely, even, by Golda Meir, who was foreign minister then prime minister while we were there; by Prime Minister Levi Eshkol; by the Foreign Ministry, because he was known, I believe, as an objective career person with no particular axe to grind, who replaced, if memory serves me, a young American politician who was sent out there because of his connection with the American Jewish sympathizers in New York State.

Q: Was this Reed?

LISSFELT: Yes, Ogden Reed. Herald Tribune newspaper connection, I believe. But Barbour was just a very nice but quiet, self-contained man who knew the meaning pas trop de zèle - "don't be too zealous" - in trying to manage our relations with foreign governments and how they deal with us - I think he was immensely respected and honored, for example, at the Weizmann Institute, where he did a lot to help them get money from this Public Law 480 pool of funds. He also knew how to talk turkey to the powers that be and to keep people like Assistant Secretary Joseph Sisco cognizant of some realities in Israel. Cool man, absolutely never saw him flap.

Q: Did you ever get any feel for the attitude of our embassies in the surrounding Arab countries, because-

LISSFELT: Oh, yes.

Q: --there was very much the feeling from people in those places that Barbour - and this was true of almost any ambassador to Israel - was following the Israeli line too much?

LISSFELT: Yes, all the time, and at least some of this was reflected in exchanges of telegrams. People were indiscreet. But for whatever reason, Walworth Barbour thought he was looking out for the American interests and realized the extreme American interest in things going on in Israel. Now he probably suffered from his share of "localitis," or addiction, if you will - or sympathy is a better word - for things in the host country. You can't escape it, particularly in a place as intense as the Tel Aviv-Jerusalem atmosphere. I think the Jerusalem consulate - which was not subordinate to the embassy, but was subordinate directly to the Department of State, and they were in the heart of things Israeli and Arab - thought that the embassy was hopelessly pro-Israeli, and they said as much, and it was a rather tense atmosphere between us and the consul general up there, whom we used to refer to as "Lord Mandlebaum," because the Mandlebaum Gate was the controlling point through which you had to go to get to the Arab side of the then divided Jerusalem. He lived on the Israeli side, but he was supposed to be looking out for the interests of both sides, but it was an impossible, still is, an impossible situation.

Q: We have a solid number of interviews with people who served in Jerusalem, and this feeling of opposition to the embassy in Tel Aviv is one of the classic cases.

LISSFELT: Well, it was painful because the consul general up there at the time wanted to be an ambassador, I strongly suspect - in fact, I know. After leaving he didn't become ambassador, but he had to figure out how to get an endorsement from Walworth Barbour, the ambassador in Tel Aviv. And I was witness to some of these rather painful conversations, and it was a rather eye-opening experience to see what matters. And I don't think he ever got an unvarnished endorsement. For whatever reason, he never got an embassy, poor man. He wrote a good book about Jerusalem since. I was just last night with a friend who served in Jerusalem on the Arab side, who was the second man in that consulate; the strength of feelings of that guy to this day against Israel are remarkable.

Q: Who was that?

LISSFELT: Donald Kruse. You may have interviewed Don. He's a good guy. He's resident right here and does work with Freedom of Information stuff. He'd be an interesting guy for you to talk to.

Q: I have. I've never served in Israel, but I'm told that one of the both delights and it wears you down is the intense debate of the political life that everybody gets into. I mean, it's a place where you'll sit around a dinner table and you'll find yourself having a very intense debate with Israelis, and this is a way of life there.

LISSFELT: Oh, it certainly is, and as I said earlier, it's an intense cavern that one lives in there. But, you know, we were young and extremely junior people in the embassy, and I had to be discreet as the ambassador's aide, because I was privy to certain stuff that I had better keep my mouth shut about. But I would never go out and tell anybody what I thought the ambassador thought about a given issue. I was discreet, to put it mildly. And we found our friendships there really centered on our neighbors and children because we had young children and they were going to the school there and living out in this Herzliya, a northern suburb of Tel Aviv, and our friendships really related to these wonderful people who were all around us there, just typical. Some of them were Americans, some Iranians. Their problems with their young kids were the same as ours, so it was all very friendly and seldom disputatious.

Q: I found there was a problem dealing with German-Americans who came back to Frankfurt - this was when you were there; this was '55 to '58 - who would know it all. They wanted everybody to listen to the words of wisdom because they'd been from the United States. I'd think this would have been even a worse problem with American Jews coming back to Israel.

LISSFELT: Well, I think you're right. There was certainly plenty of friction between them and the Israelis, who received the bulk of this whenever this occurred, but there was a very unfriendly attitude among these Americans toward the embassy, and particularly towards representatives of the Department of State, who were considered the enemy. I can remember going to visit the Weizmann Institute, which we used to do every year. They'd invite us down for a buffet dinner - the whole embassy staff was invited, and President Meyer Weisgal, who as a great friend of Barbour and the embassy and who knew the smart thing was for the Weizmann Institute, which was down in Rehoboth, in the south, to be close to the embassy. But I spent some of the most unpleasant evenings of my life down there on the receiving end, where these young Americans, who happened to be Jewish, were giving us you-know-what for what they considered an unsympathetic attitude toward the State of Israel. And I was just dumbfounded, because I knew, for example, the benefits that the Weizmann Institute was receiving in terms of U.S. public monies. It was enormous. I can remember some of these young women who were absolutely insulting to the embassy staff. It was very shocking, and very unpleasant.

The worst experience was at the time of the Six Day War, though, and the most embittering experience was the invasion - that's too strong a word - of these very same people who had come to live in Israel, and suddenly there was a crisis at hand, which might have endangered their lives and their future, and they poured into the embassy to get out of there, to get their documents in order so they could leave. And the people working in the Consular Section were the most bitter people I knew, the staff, processing these people through. There were lots of them; there were thousands of people who wanted to get the heck out of harm's way fast - not an endearing memory.

Q: What was prompting this, do you think?

LISSFELT: Fear for their lives.

Q: No, no, no, I'm talking about this feeling about the embassy.

LISSFELT: Well, I think it's traditional among Israeli supporters, and I know this from my later experience working on the Israeli Desk back in the Department, to have a hostile feeling toward these "Arabists" - with a quote around it - who populate the Department of State. Particularly the Middle East Bureau, particularly those who work on things Israeli are seen to be very unsympathetic - if not prejudiced against the cause of Israel - because of their Arab sympathies. But you know, it was such a joke because as you well know from your own career, to have served in an Arab country, for example, like serving in the United States, is to see the great side and to see the flaws, and you soon don't have blinders on about the weakness of any society.

Q: I spent two and a half years in Saudi Arabia, and I sure didn't come out as an Arab-lover. I mean, au contraire [French: to the contrary]. Did you find that with the Israelis you would meet, did you feel that you were being tested? I'm told people do this. I mean, "Is he anti-Semitic? Is he pro-Israeli?" This type of thing.

LISSFELT: Oh, yes. But the funny thing for me was my name, Lissfelt. It was not clear what my religion was. I could have been a Jewish-American. It happens I was born, and have been ever since, a rather bad Episcopalian. But I never wore a sign saying, "I'm not Jewish," or "I'm an Episcopalian." But it was even amusing to the point of dealing with people when they were trying to figure out where you belonged. Are you with us? Are you one of us? I mean, there were conversations that were hilarious in this regard. We used to live in Tel Aviv, and we used to go to church with our young kids down in Jaffa to a Catholic church - my wife's Catholic - and a not so amusing thing there was to come out afterward and find agents of Mossad, Israeli intelligence, writing down the license plates of all the cars that were attending Christian service in this harmless Catholic church. But we were aware of that, but that didn't... I think I stayed pretty objective in a situation where it's hard to be objective. I don't know if anybody can in the Middle East.

Q: I know. Did you run across problems with particularly the Americans of the extreme orthodox faith and, you know, all sorts of laws?

LISSFELT: No, on the contrary. The experience that we had with Americans that came over visiting and happened to be Jewish - this happened to the father of a roommate of mine, for example - was that they were very upset with Israel. The didn't like what they found at all. I admit this is anecdotal and not substantiated by statistics, but these people were upset by, you know, the taxi drivers. They'd come from New York and find Israeli taxi drivers rude! Well, I found that rather amusing. Certain rudeness in the shops. They're not a shop-keeping nation, as you will learn five seconds after you're in a shop, and people coming from America who've donated all their life to the United Jewish Appeal often expected deferential treatment. They had no right to it, but some of them thought they did. And that led to certain disillusionments and people leaving very unhappy with the experience. Anecdotal again, and I don't know what percentage that might have been.

Q: How about with the officers particularly in the Political Section? I mean, was there a certain feeling of treading on eggs as far as reporting on Israel?

LISSFELT: Oh, sure. One was very cautious. One assumed that everything one put down on paper somehow was going to be read by the host nation or their representatives.

Q: Or even worse, by a pro-Israeli senator in the United States.

LISSFELT: That too, but one was always very careful. But again, when Barbour wanted to weigh in on something, he just said what he thought. But there was that feeling, and you know, again, I worked on the Israel Desk, and I became subjected to some of the pressures, if you will, of the sympathizers, which wasn't always a pleasant experience either.

Q: How did you feel at the time about the Desk? I realize you weren't reporting, but it wasn't that huge an embassy-

LISSFELT: A small embassy.

Q: -so you're a young officer, and you're around other young officers, and so you're picking up probably more of the gossip and the feeling. What was the feeling about how things were going with Israel back in Washington, at the Department of State? Was it a feeling of support, frustration?

LISSFELT: Oh, I think that everybody was cognizant - and there's a certain amount of exchange, people having worked in Washington in the Bureau - and they knew this first-hand - that the pro-Israel lobby is very strong. And every nation on earth has a right to organize and lobby our legislators and everyone else. It's just that the Israelis did it more effectively than probably any other single nation and still do to this day, be it information, be it money, be it energy, be it involvement. And one knew, if one knew that the sun rose in the east, that this was something very special. They had much more influence in Washington than any individual Arab nation or the Arab nations as a whole. One interesting thing while we were there, by the way, is that this was an embassy where the staff never contained an American Jewish member. Just like women weren't sent to Saudi Arabia to certain positions, American officers of Jewish origin, Jewish religion, were not sent to Israel. This changed while I was there, by the way, and the first American Jewish official, who happened to be an assistant Army attaché, came to Israel. I always had the impression that for him personally it was an extremely unpleasant experience because people tried to - exploit is too strong a word, but that's maybe what they wanted to do - exploit his dual loyalties. And I never had the feeling that this guy was intellectually strong enough to cope with the stresses and strains. He lived - a living hell is far too strong a word, but it was uncomfortable. Since then, as you know, this is routine. People of Jewish faith are sent there routinely.

Q: Well, let's talk about the Six Day war. This was in the summer of-

LISSFELT: June.

Q: -June-

LISSFELT: June 6th.

Q: -of 1966.

LISSFELT: 1967.

Q: Can you tell about what was, sort of, the political and strategic atmosphere prior to that, and particularly from your perspective?

LISSFELT: Well, there was sort of a calm before a storm. I remember making a trip with a visiting official from Washington down to the Egyptian-Israeli border on the Sinai and writing a telegram when I came back, and I still remember the title of it, which was "All's Quiet on the Sinai Front." This was a matter of weeks before the outbreak of this war, but what really sent a warning rocket in the sky a week before the war started was Nasser's decision to instruct U Thant, Secretary General of the United Nations, to get the UN observers out of the Sinai, out of the way between Israel and Egypt, a request to which he promptly acceded.

Q: It was considered to be sort of a political bluff by many, and U Thant was a little too quick on the trigger.

LISSFELT: Well, there was that criticism, of course. Why did he accede so fast? Why didn't he try to delay? It was taken as a clear warning signal, and it was at that time that the embassy right away began to think about what might be coming. The Israelis were certainly thinking about it, and you know what happened. But we began right away to offer people who were going - for instance, we were going on home leave, and my family was given the chance to advance their departure, and I would stay behind, just rather than go in July. The invitation was: "Why don't you just go along a few weeks and take the kids and go? You're going anyway." That was the first trickle out, then voluntary departure of all dependents, you know we've been through this probably with the downsizing of an embassy and the question of essential personnel. We were really downsized before this thing started.

I'll never forget the first day. I was a control officer for the visiting mayor of Philadelphia, whose name I've long since forgotten, sitting in the Tel Aviv Hilton Hotel, probably the tallest building in the Middle East at the time, and certainly the biggest target, if there was going to be a war, on the Israeli side. On the Monday morning when this war started, the mayor and I were having breakfast, and suddenly everybody began to head for the underground bomb shelters in the Hilton basement.

Q: It started with an Israeli air attack on the Egyptian Air Force.

LISSFELT: Well the Israelis would say it started with Egyptian feints and the prospects of their attack. You could debate that, as to when it started, but as far as we were concerned, it started with the destruction of the Egyptian Air Force that Monday morning within a matter of three hours on the ground in the airfields across the face of Egypt. It was a just a brilliant preemptive strike. We knew this by the end of that first morning, by the way. By Monday at noon, we were sort of breathing a little easier. We had the feeling that one was in the middle of a war but there was no question that we, unlike our colleagues in Egypt and other places, were going to be on the winning side, i.e., in the victorious nation.

At breakfast, though, when the sirens began to sound and everybody was evacuating the Hilton and this mayor of Philadelphia insisted on finishing his breakfast. We were alone in this restaurant. I said, "I think we should get out of here. I think something's happening, you know. The staff are running and they came and warned us to go downstairs." Something happened to the mayor's mind. He became irrational. We went back to the embassy and went down in the underground garage and he wouldn't go. He was demanding his "civil rights." (sic!). He kept saying, "I demand my civil rights." We didn't know how that applied to the prospect of an imminent air attack, down in the basement with the embassy staff. In the event, we were never attacked. We then got that man out of town as quickly as we could. He was a senior public official who just went a little screwy. We heard horrendous stories from our friends in neighboring countries later. People in Egypt, I remember this, had to run a sort of gauntlet to get on trains to go up to Alexandria to be evacuated. It was horrendous for them. My family had gone ahead, fortunately, so I felt very free and confident and safe for myself, particularly after we saw what happened that first morning. On it went, and I left July 1st, when the war had long since ended and the Israelis were exultant and had hold of territories now which they have been ever since trying to figure what to do with.

Q: You mentioned that a lot of the Americans, who were some of the most ardent supporters of Israel, wanted to get the hell out as soon as the going got tough.

LISSFELT: It was distressing to watch that. I mean, it was something that left a very bad taste in one's mouth, and the people who worked in the Consular Section, who were on the receiving end of these insulting demands for prompt issuance of passports that had long since expired. They were on the receiving end. And this sudden exodus certainly didn't go unnoticed by the Israelis. I would have lunch with the staff afterwards, and they would come in shaking their heads. It was a very human reaction: the American Jews were frightened, they wanted to get out of there, and they thought they could; but the whole loyalty of many of these people to this state that we thought they had adopted - they thought they had adopted - suddenly evaporated in the face of this fear for their lives.

Q: Were you also having to deal with an influx of American Jews who wanted to come in to be in Israel at the time?

LISSFELT: Well, no we weren't, but I don't know anything about the statistics, but I am sure some came, but they would do it through the instrumentality of the Israeli officials, be it with the embassy in Washington or consulates elsewhere, to find out how to plug in. Probably some of them joined the armed forces and fought. Sure, there was that other element; that's important to balance with the story I've just told you about the people who wanted out. There were people who wanted in immediately and wanted to serve their friendly and maybe their adopted country. This was a time when you lost your citizenship, by the way, automatically for serving in the armed forces of a foreign country.

Q: What was Barbour doing during this?

LISSFELT: Well, Barbour was following his routine, which was to come to the embassy in the morning and stay late into the early afternoon and go home for lunch and not come back unless there was something pressing. I knew something was serious one day when he came back one afternoon. I asked myself, "What's Barbour doing back in this embassy?" I knew him very well, and this is not said with disrespect, because he was effective. But when he appeared at that embassy, something had to be up. But he was being taken to the Defense Ministry and getting briefings, seeing the Israeli military briefings. I never went along. He always went alone. They wanted to put him in the picture on this, that and the other thing, and were probably making requests for American help. We had our communications equipment flown in from the Sixth Fleet, so that we could communicate with them when they were over the horizon, out in the Mediterranean. We felt very reassured by that, in case of an evacuation.

Q: This wasn't when the Liberty was attacked then.

LISSFELT: Well, yes, the Liberty was attacked during the course of this Six Day War. I'm not sure which day. I've forgotten that, although I did have the dossier for the Liberty case when I went back on the Israel Desk. That was very confusing at the time we were there because it was still maintained that it was mistaken for an Egyptian tanker of some sort and there was confusion about to whom it belonged. I know that our naval attaché at the embassy was flown out in a helicopter over the ship after it had been hit. I remember him telling me the story that he dropped his card down in a little bag with his name, saying, "Can we help in any way?" And there he was, hovering over this hulk that had been shot to pieces. That was a terrible moment.

Q: I was wondering how this affected. The Liberty was an American naval communications vessel that was attacked and sunk with a very high loss of life by sustained attacks by the Israeli Air Force--

LISSFELT: --and, the ship maintained, in the face of a huge American flag flying on the stern.

Q: To this day there are many in the United States who will not forget the Liberty. I mean, this is not something that has gone away, and I'm curious about the embassy reaction at the time.

LISSFELT: Well, at the time we were preoccupied with other things, like destroying classified documents and getting ourselves ready to be evacuated if it came to that. Of course, by the time we were ready, it was already a foregone conclusion that we weren't going to have to go, by the way. But I don't remember a preoccupation out there with the Liberty event. The Liberty was an intelligence monitoring ship, which I think the Israelis, rightly or wrongly, assessed was trying to listen to the communications - which of course these ships do all the time out there, as do aircraft - and the analysis at the time was that the Israelis wanted to limit the U.S. government's ability to gather independently intelligence by shooting up that ship. Now they maintained that a horrible mistake was made and since paid millions of dollars. I think a lot of people were killed and many people wounded from that. It was a terrible event. War is a terrible thing, and if this was done with intent, which everybody seems to think, it just shows you the determination - or maybe desperation - of a state under siege.

Q: What about the acquisition of the West Bank and all of Jerusalem and all of that. How was that playing? I mean when you left there, not too long after the war-

LISSFELT: There was exhilaration on the part of the Israelis, particularly on the taking of the Golan Heights, which was done the last day, on Friday. I'll never forget that Friday sitting in my backyard in Herzliya north of Tel Aviv and seeing the Israeli Air Force flying back from their attacks on it. They were bound and determined not to let the Syrians escape scot-free from that war. It was clear. But particularly the taking of the Golan Heights - from which kibbutzim below were shelled periodically. You had to look up at the Heights to appreciate the military advantage. There was exhilaration on all Israeli hands. My neighbor was a young man of American origin but living in Israel, an insurance executive, who was fighting - he was just my age - fighting the third time in a war for his country as a bombardier on a plane. And these people were walking six feet off the ground. I recall our having the temerity to suggest: "Now is the time to be magnanimous. Be magnanimous in victory when you have whipped these nations. It's an opportunity which will come maybe once in a lifetime." But that certainly fell on deaf ears, and I don't recall how persistently the U.S. government pursued that. The idea was, now is the time to settle Jerusalem; now is the time to settle the West Bank, give it back, establish relationships. You're the victor. Be as magnanimous as you possibly can in victory, and it might settle the Middle East problem forever. But you suggested that and hardly got to the end of your sentence before sensing that the person listening to you, an Israeli, was so relieved by what they had accomplished in six days - I mean, with reason. He was intoxicated.

Q: Were you aware of anyone in the embassy saying, "Yes, this is great, but what are the Israelis going to do with the West Bank and all these Arabs?"

LISSFELT: Oh, sure. Everybody knew the population increase potential for the Arab populations they were swallowing. Could they swallow this meal, or would it choke them? Idle chitchat, but again, I left the 1st of July and never went back, so I don't know anything about the efforts to pursue this idea of magnanimity in victory as an opportunity to settle something with people who will be your neighbors for the rest of eternity.

Q: Did Menachem Begin cross your horizon?

LISSFELT: Not then at all. I think he was a member of Parliament, but he hadn't risen to become prime minister, and this was very much the days of the Labor régime, and it had been for years, and you had giants like Golda Meir and Moshe Dayan, Levi Eshkol, not to mention Ben Gurion, who was still alive and still a force out there. I remember visiting Ben Gurion. I told you of this visit to his apartment up in Carmel in Haifa with Senator Joseph Clark, a very simple, humble apartment. There was Ben Gurion in his elegant black suit, talking to Clark; and his wife--I think her name was Paula, wonderful woman--had a box of chocolates, and all the time they were talking - we were four people together--and she kept looking at me, and she tried to size me up and finally she hit me with an elbow and said, "You want a chocolate?" Then she decided to share these chocolates. It was really a moment. I had a chocolate with Ben Gurion. It was great, one of those moments in the career that you just cherish. Giant of a man.

Q: What was your impression of Golda Meir?

LISSFELT: Well, a tower of strength, just a person of reason. And I would see her later back in the Department when I worked there, and I mean, this woman was just incredible. She was so tough and so persistent and so smart, and she was head and shoulders above her cabinet colleagues. There were other people like Egal Alon, who was quite an impressive gentleman, as was Moshe Dayan; and Yitzhak Rabin, at the time, was the chief of staff of the Army, and he was already head-and-shoulders above the crowd, to put it mildly. But Golda Meir was something unique, I'm sure, in the history of Israel. They don't make them like that very often.

Q: What was your impression, when you arrived in Israel, of Nasser?

LISSFELT: Well, Nasser was the arch-enemy. He was the threat, the biggest Arab country and that's what they worried about most. Lebanon was quiet, you know; nobody worried about the Lebanese frontier. The Lebanese, everybody always said, will be the second to make peace with Israel. There will be somebody, they'll wait for somebody else to take the move, and then the Lebanese will move. Syria was a real worry, but not a military worry, because the Israelis thought they could handle them. A pinprick all the time - more than a pinprick: there was shooting from the Golan Heights, as I mentioned above. Israel was upset when the king came into the Six Day War. As you may remember, he entered the war in spite of Israel doing everything they could to keep him out, they say. Nasser was the threat, the problem, this giant state, the big army, and Russian support all over the place and Russian equipment. They were very worried about him.

JUSTICE ARTHUR J. GOLDBERG
Ambassador, United Nations
New York, NY (1965-1968)

Justice Goldberg was born and raised in Illinois and educated at La DePaul and Northwestern Universities. He served in the Office of Strategic Services during World War II, after which he pursued a career in Law. He subsequently became a major figure in the United States government, serving as Secretary of Labor, Associate Justice of the US Supreme Court and finally as US Ambassador to the United Nations. Justice Goldberg was closely involved in major issues at the United Nations, including the Vietnam War and the 1967 Arab-Israel War. He was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1978. He died in 1990. Justice Goldenberg was interviewed by Ted Gittinger in 1983.

Q: Let's talk about that 1967 war for a minute. From your vantage point at the UN, how did you interpret Nasser's moves?

GOLDBERG: I knew a war was inevitable when Nasser moved his troops into the Sinai and Sharm el Sheik, evicting the UN. It was impossible for Israel to mobilize its troops and keep them mobilized for an indefinite period. They have a civilian army. Indefinite mobilization would bankrupt the country. Therefore I anticipated, as the record proves, that Israel would have to launch a pre-emptive strike. They couldn't indefinitely continue with complete mobilization, giving Nasser the option to launch an assault when he chose. And the Israelis always said that blockading the Straits of Tiran would be a casus belli. I told this to [Abba] Eban when he called on me after seeing President Johnson on the Friday preceding the outbreak of the war on the following Monday. Johnson twisted his arm at the Friday meeting. Eban saw me after he saw Johnson, went back to his cabinet, and said, "Well, the President of the United States says he's with us provided we pursue our diplomatic endeavors." When he came to see me after seeing the President -- I knew him; I always called him Aubrey, he changed his name to Abba -- I said, "Aubrey, tell me" -- he was dead tired, he really wasn't functioning. It was the Friday before the war started on Monday morning. The Israeli cabinet always meets on Sunday. I said, "What did the President say to you?" He reported, "The President said to me, 'Subject to our constitutional proscriptions, we are with you.'" I said to Eban, "You owe it to your government, because lives are going to be lost and your security is involved, to tell your cabinet that the President's statement means a joint resolution of Congress before coming to your aid, and the President can't get such a resolution because of the Vietnam War."

I have always believed in candor. I reported my conversation with Eban to the State Department and to the White House. Well, the Israelis debated Eban's report and my comments in the cabinet meeting on Sunday. [Levi] Eshkol, Israel's Prime Minister, sent a flash telegram to Johnson on Sunday in which Eshkol said -- he didn't refer to me -- "Our foreign secretary says that you made a commitment to really stand by us. Please confirm." Johnson then called me. He said, "Do you understand I made a commitment to go to war with Egypt with the Israelis if Nasser doesn't get out of the Sinai?" I said, "No. Look at my telegram to you." He said, "I haven't seen it." I said, "Get it, Mr. President. It says that you used the words 'subject to our constitutional provisions,' and it further says in my opinion, I don't see that the House and Senate are going to agree. You were very careful." He said, "Thank you." He said, "What do I do about Eshkol's telegram?" and I said, "Don't answer it."

Q: The memo that I have seen has the President saying, "Israel will not be alone unless she decides to go alone."

GOLDBERG: Yes. That's the language. They interpreted that to mean that the United States would be at their side and straighten it out. Well, Rostow, Gene Rostow, is very well intentioned but, in this instance, was impractical. He tried to organize, as [John Foster] Dulles did during the Suez crisis, an international force to force passage through the Straits of Tiran.

Q: The Red Sea regatta, was that -- ?

GOLDBERG: Yes. I was against it. I said, "That's nonsense. We're not going to get any help." And sure enough, you know who we got? A Dutch admiral, that's all. All our allies faded away and it fell apart, as I knew it would.

Q: Do you have any insight into the stories circulating that at lower levels in Washington Mr. Eban and the chief of the Israeli intelligence service, who I think came with him, were told, perhaps in not so many words, "We wish you would go ahead and clean this mess up"?

GOLDBERG: No. No. I have no information on that. The only information I had was the presidential statement reported to me in the manner in which I indicated, and my response. I wanted to protect the President and our country and also be accurate. So the Israelis could determine what was required for their own security. I didn't want them fooled. When I heard those -- after all, I had been a former justice to the Supreme Court -- when I heard the words "subject to our constitutional requirements, we are with you -- "

Q: That's a code word, right?

GOLDBERG: Yes. Subject to our constitution. Are you aware that most of our treaties contain that provision? Except NATO.

Q: Really? Well, I wasn't aware.

GOLDBERG: Yes. NATO is a firm commitment. The Congress approved it, it's a treaty, so it doesn't contain that language. NATO action does not require approval by Congress. But most of our other treaties of alliance and so on contain that provision.

Q: I see. Were you in contact with the Egyptian Ambassador during the build-up of the crisis?

GOLDBERG: Oh, yes, continuous. And more important, the foreign minister of Egypt, [Mahmoud] Riad who was here, and King Hussein of Jordan.

Q: Were they cognizant of the fact that Israel could not sustain a mobilization over -- ?

GOLDBERG: Well, no -- Riad came later when we negotiated Resolution 242. El Kony was not conscious. He was a very smart man, but he was being fed a stream of telegrams, false telegrams, from Nasser that they're winning the war. It was only after a few days that they recognized that the war was determined the first day when the Israeli aircraft knocked out virtually all of the Egyptian airplanes.

Q: With reference to the couple of weeks or month before the war actually broke out, Nasser took a number of moves, made a number of statements, which were regarded as inflammatory. Did he act in the belief that the Israelis were not going to make war?

GOLDBERG: I don't know. Nasser's rhetoric always had to be taken with a grain of salt, as is customary with Arab rhetoric. It's pretty high-flown stuff. I did get most of the intelligence reports. I did not get the Mac Bundy reports, which evaluated the flow of intelligence, although Mac and I are great friends. There was no intimation in the fragmentary reports furnished to me that Nasser was planning what he did do. I recall the circumstances when I received real intelligence very well. I was taking all the UN ambassadors on a Circle Line tour of New York. My wife and I were tired of formal dinners, so we took the UN ambassadors on the Circle Tour. We had an old accordion to provide music and we served our guests hot dogs and the like. In the midst of the tour, which took place about the middle of May, a Coast Guard cutter hailed me and said I was urgently required to go to the U.S. mission, the President wants to talk to me. To the applause of the passengers, I had to climb down a ladder to get on, and it was then that I learned from the President that Nasser had moved into the Sinai, and that he had brushed the UN peacekeeping force aside.

I always faulted U Thant for not playing a waiting game, and also Ralph Bunche -- but Ralph was getting older and sick -- for acceding to Nasser's request. Instead of immediately acceding, they should have said, "We must first obtain the approval of the [General] Assembly or the Security Council." We had a letter which was given at the time of the 1956-57 war, from Hammarskjöld to Dulles saying that, at the insistence of the U.S., the UN peacekeeping force in the Sinai would only be withdrawn when their mission was completed, which translated means it would not be withdrawn absent a peace treaty. Interestingly enough, because Bunche's eyesight had failed and his memory somewhat, he didn't recall it. I had to bring him a copy of this letter. He didn't remember the letter.

Q: Did anybody ask the Israelis to accept the peacekeeping force on their side?

GOLDBERG: Oh, yes. Since Nasser was the aggressor, there was no discussion about this. Egypt withdrew from the Sinai by force of Israeli arms, and the terms of the deal were that the Sinai would be demilitarized. So that it was not logical to have a discussion about a peacekeeping force on the Israeli side. What was involved was the demilitarization of the Sinai, which had been agreed to with DA Hammarskjöld. After all, the Israelis in 1956-57 pulled out at our insistence, General Eisenhower's, and part of the deal was what I told you, a letter that the peacekeeping force -- which [David] Ben-Gurion was reluctant to accept; after all, he had to pull out. The quid pro quo was that the UN peacekeeping force in the Sinai would not be withdrawn until its mission was complete.

Q: Let me recount a couple of things that we both are perfectly aware of. One was that the Israelis could not maintain their armies in the field indefinitely. The other is that Nasser began to remilitarize the Sinai.

GOLDBERG: Yes. He breached the understanding.

Q: He closed the Gulf of Aqaba, at least declared a blockade.

GOLDBERG: Yes, notwithstanding that Israel had to have access to Africa and to the port of Eilat.

Q: Nasser apparently accepted spurious reports that the Israelis had mobilized on the Syrian frontier.

GOLDBERG: I don't know about that. SANITIZED

*Q: SANITIZED

GOLDBERG: SANITIZED

*Q: SANITIZED

GOLDBERG: It was a complete canard [that we were bombing on the first day of the war]. I answered it in the Security Council.

Q: No, I have seen reports that claim the Russians were feeding Nasser intelligence.

GOLDBERG: That is correct. But on the first part, I did what our navy went up in arms about, but I said I had no choice and the President, I must say, supported me. In order to put to rest this canard, I invited UN observers to go on board our carriers and see their logs to demonstrate our planes did not participate, you see. Now about Russians -- it's a most peculiar thing, never explored in depth. The Russians certainly knew that the Israelis were not going to launch a pre-emptive strike, certainly Against Egypt. They were always worried more about Syria. Syria was ideologically closer to them. Although, during the fighting, the Soviets seemed to get fed up with Syria. Would it interest you to know that for some reason of Russian policy, when the Israelis started to move to El Quneitra and were thirty miles from Damascus, the same Syrian ambassador who had insulted me, came to me and said, "We need a cease-fire." And I said, "Go to your friend, the Soviet Ambassador." The Syrian Ambassador said, "He won't listen to me." We thereupon proposed the cease-fire resolution at the behest of Syria. I said, "We don't want another war and we don't want Damascus invaded." So I was the one who offered at the request of Syria, a cease-fire.

I remember further instances of Soviet behavior during this crisis. Khrushchev sent a threatening telegram to the White House similar to the one Kissinger got all excited about during his tenure. Johnson called me and read it to me. I was in charge, as I have mentioned. The President asked, "How do we answer this?" you know, over the hot line. And I said, "Very simply. It's a phony. The Russians logistically are a long way away, and the Israelis have a pretty potent army." So I said, "Why don't you answer --" He said, "I'll put my secretary on." I dictated an answer and the President sent it. This, in essence, was the answer: "I suggest your Ambassador at the UN communicate with Ambassador Goldberg, who is in charge of this matter, and discuss it." This was the last I heard about it.

Q: It seems to me that Nasser either had very bad judgment or a very poor intelligence service.

GOLDBERG: There's no doubt the Russians told him of their suspicions, whether genuine or fabricated I cannot say. It is significant, however, that before Nasser mobilized and occupied the Sinai, the Russian Ambassador to Israel woke Eshkol up and said, "Our information is that you're going to strike Syria." And Eshkol, in his pajamas, three o'clock in the morning, according to all accounts I've read, said, "You come with me to the Syrian front and I'll show you it's not so." And the Russian Ambassador said, "We have our own means and I'm not going to accompany you."

Now, it's true there were some belligerent statements by Israel, but those were not enough for any country to base its policy on. Now why the Russians fed the Syrians and Egypt with suspicions and highly provocative intelligence and removed their personnel has always puzzled me. Did they want to stir things up, create instability? This may be the only explanation. Because they must have had better intelligence.

Q: That would be my point. Surely the Egyptians had sources of their own, didn't they?

GOLDBERG: Well, but you must remember the extent to which, at that point, Egypt relied upon the Russians, a great deal. There were thousands of Russian specialists in Egypt at the time, and thousands in Syria. So, whether the Soviets were the motivating factor for Nasser, I cannot say.

Q: Some people have made much of the fact that we had no ambassador in Cairo for about two months prior to this time.

GOLDBERG: The State Department, just before the outbreak of the war, sent an untutored fellow as our new ambassador to Egypt. I tried to brief the fellow, and along with the briefing I gave him a copy of the 1956-57 memoranda -- I've forgotten the exact date -- by Hammarskjöld. This fellow thought it was a contemporaneous memorandum of our desires. It referred to a lot of concepts which we no longer subscribed to. He gave that to Nasser as our present political wishes. Fortunately, his foreign minister and some others of course recognized the document as the old document. They knew he had made a mistake. And they told Nasser. It was a subject of great laughter. Their ambassador in the UN told me about it, and we had to pull our new Ambassador out.

Q: That's astonishing.

GOLDBERG: That is an astonishing faux pas.

Q: How difficult was it for you when the Israelis apparently took advantage of the cease-fire in order to -- ?

GOLDBERG: I had to ride herd on the Israelis all the time. I remember one time I wouldn't take Abba Eban's call. They played games about accepting [Resolution] 242. First they accepted it and then they started to back away. I remember one night my wife woke me up about three o'clock in the morning and said, "It's Mr. Eban." After I got acceptance. "Will you talk to him?" I said, "Don't take his call." They had internal political problems, and they were waffling, but I had a commitment and I acted on the assumption that they accepted it.

By the way, it was our resolution. The British had about as much to do with it as you. I must say for Johnson, he gave me great personal support. For example, we were having trouble with the Argentinean Ambassador about his voting for 242. I called Johnson and asked him to call the President of the Argentine and instruct his ambassador on the Security Council to go along. Johnson did. I also asked the British to have their ambassador weigh in. He never did. All you have to do is look at the documents. You will see that the resolution we offered, then withdrew, is basically 242, with a few additions. The British did offer a troublesome addition, which we had to accept, because they showed it to the Arabs. It is a preamble statement about recognizing the inadmissibility of force to settle international disputes. This is not international law. If so, we ought to give up Texas and New Orleans. The Russians ought to give up the Kuril Islands and part of Poland, and Poland ought to give up part of Germany. International law unfortunately recognizes that to the victor belongs the spoils. Look what we almost did to Germany. We were almost going to make them an agricultural country.

Q: Was that Mr. Morgenthau's suggestion?

GOLDBERG: Yes. We were the victors, and our troops are still there, after what, forty years. So you know, the whole theory of it's a violation of international law for a victor to occupy territory is unfounded. We didn't ask the Germans for permission to station our troops in Germany, nor did the British, the French nor the Russians. We all did it as victors. We defeated them. As far as I know that's still the rule of international law.

Q: Vae victis I guess is the term.

GOLDBERG: Yes.

ANTHONY J. PERNA
Air Attaché
Tel Aviv (1965-1969)

Anthony J. Perna was born in Jersey City, New Jersey in 1918. He attended Syracuse for two years and then decided to join the Air Force in 1940. He served in the Air Force for twenty years and was involved with the nuclear weapons tests on the Bikini Atoll. In 1960 he was sent to Paris and given the Strategic Air Command post with NATO. He also served with the National War College in Washington D.C. Mr. Perna was interviewed by Francine D. Haughey in 1992.

PERNA: I went [to Israel as Attaché] in 1965 and came back in 1969. I had about four and a half years. I retired in the first of the year 1970. Then I became a farmer in Browntown, Virginia. And here I am.

Q: Right. Let's talk more, if you don't mind about your stay in Israel. How were the relations between the Arabs and the Israelis when you arrived there?

PERNA: First, I want to fill you in on the background of what had happened previously; the war of 1948, and then the war of Suez were backgrounds to the time I arrived in 1965. The Fatah was the primary arm of the Palestine Liberation Organization. The PLO was established, and chartered, and headed by Arafat.

Q: Already at that time?

PERNA: He was in the hierarchy. Whether he was in control, I'm not sure; he was in control in '65. I think so. But the Fatah was running raids against the Israelis and the Israelis were retaliating and it was a series of events that went on until the beginning of the Six Day War. The relations between the Arabs and the Israelis were poor. The Palestinians were under the control of Jordan. They had large numbers of refugees in camps on the West bank. Two camps out in the Jordan Valley, a big camp between Hadera and Nablus and another camp near Nablus, another camp north of Jerusalem and large camps in the Gaza strip. These camps were populated by the people who ran away during the war of independence in 1948 and never got back. Thus from '48 until '67, almost 20 years, a whole generation of people lived there. However, the ones who had education, and the ones who had contacts, and the ones who had means got out and went to work in Kuwait, and Saudi Arabia, and in other Arab countries and a lot of them got integrated in Jordan and in Lebanon. These Palestinians were skilled and they were well educated by comparison to the other people, so they didn't have trouble finding jobs in these places. In modern times, in Desert Storm, they had large numbers of Palestinians still working in Kuwait. Anyway these refugee camps were being run by the United Nations who fed, housed, and educated them, and ran schools and health clinics. The people who were in there were the people who had no skills to sell, who were economically and socially down the ladder, and interested in going back to Haifa, and back to Jaffa, and back to the farms where they had been before. It was very sad with miserable conditions. Why they stayed was in part because of the hostage policy of the Arab governments to keep them there in order that international opinion would be on their side. The Arab governments believed that these people must be given the opportunity to go back where they came from.

The terrorists came from these refugee camps. It was a place where people had nothing, and the kids joined radical movements. It wasn't like someone who had a business and who had a lot to lose, he was not going to let his kid go out bombing an Israeli train or a bus because he'd have a great deal to lose. The ones in the refugee camps didn't have much to lose. Recruiters looking for terrorists got them from refugee camps. Anyway, it was not a good situation and the tensions were high and the Israelis were on guard all the time around this green line border. I want to say something about the question of how the Israelis managed to prevail when they were so small in numbers against these vastly superior numerical forces. At this time the Arabs had large inventories of Soviet munitions, aircraft, tanks, and artillery. The policy of the Soviet Union was to spread communism by using military sales. They were deep into Egypt with large numbers of Soviet advisors. They had equipped the Egyptian Air Force with MiGs and the Syrian Air Force with MiGs.

Q: And the Israelis as well?

PERNA: No, the Israelis had all French aircraft. De Gaulle had sold them trainers, he had sold them transports, he had sold them helicopters and fighters. They had numbers that were numerically inferior. In the case of airplanes, the Arabs outnumbered them like five to one. And in tanks, they were outnumbered four to one numerically. If the Egyptians had one thousand, the Israelis had several hundred. Well, how could the Israelis succeed with these kinds of numbers. They succeeded in my judgment because they had no alternatives. If they didn't succeed, they were finished. So they had to win. This motivated the people to be ingenious, to be brave, to do their homework, and to work like hell preparing for the worst eventuality. They got junk armaments left over from World War II and brought them to Israel with the help of Jewish friends in Europe and in America, and they refurbished them. And they used them in the Suez war.

Q: They were buying this in different countries?

PERNA: Buying them from junk dealers and there was no prohibition on this. And we didn't care. As a consequence, their determination made up for their inferiority in numbers. And they prevailed in these two wars, the War of Independence and the War of Suez. When we get to 1967, the Arabs were now heavily armed with Soviet equipment. The Egyptians and the Jordanians had large amounts of British equipment. Some American arms were in Jordan. The Syrians had almost 100% Soviet arms and the Lebanese did not have much of a significant force. There were the Saudis equipped with British and American arms. The Iraqis were equipped principally with Soviet arms. The events that led up to the Six Day War were the frictions of the Palestinian problems, the refugees wanting to get back and the fact that the military were getting stronger and stronger in each of these countries. Nasser caused the war by moving a number of divisions, armored divisions, into the Sinai. He came across the Canal and brought them down as far as the Gaza strip and the southern border of Israel and scared the Israelis. The Syrians who had been allied with the Egyptians in the United Arab Republic were now separate at the beginning of the Six Day War, but they were also mobilized.

Q: Weren't they talking about the Golan Heights at that time?

PERNA: Yes. The Golan Heights were the mountains overlooking the Jordan Valley where the Syrians had gun emplacements and tank emplacements and periodically fired onto the settlements down below. The settlements had air raid shelters where they all spent lots and lots of nights when they were being bombed. But the crowning blow was when the Egyptians closed the straits of Tiran. The straits of Tiran are at the bottom of the Gulf of Aqaba, where the Israelis have a port called Elat, and that's where their shipping went out that dealt with Africa and dealt with Southeast Asia. Next to Elat there's a Jordanian port of Aqaba, and the gulf is called the Gulf of Aqaba. The bottom end of it, the straits, are a narrow passage that control access into this gulf of Aqaba. The Egyptians told the UN, who had a contingent there, to leave. These were UN hangovers from Suez days, and also told the UN to get out of the Sinai. They scared the Israelis sufficiently that they mobilized. Everybody in Israel is in the army, women and men. The women go for two years and the men go for three years and then they are on reserve duty until they become 50 years old. And after 50, they become letter carriers and air raid wardens, and other quasi-official helpers. But they mobilized and they took all the buses and they took all the trucks and all the civilian equipment and they put together a force in the Negev, facing the Egyptians across the green line. The Egyptians called on the Jordanians to come in and the Jordanians came in. and the Israelis were frightened enough that they fired the first shots. They preempted the Arab forces that were mobilized. In the north, Syrians and Iraqis, Saudis, Jordanians, and the Egyptians in the South. In the series of air strikes on June 6th, they caught the air forces of the Arab neighbors on the ground and destroyed 95% of their air power on the ground. With control of the skies and air superiority, they then proceeded to beat up the Egyptian armor and the Egyptian tank battalions that were in the Sinai. Their forces crossed the border and they had a big engagement there, and with control of the air they had mastery of the battlefield.

Q: You were there at the time, and these were French aircraft they were using?

PERNA: The Israeli were using all French aircraft and they were using their trainers as well. They armed the trainers with rockets, used these "fougas" as tank busters ...

Q: I'm sorry, I don't know what trainers are?

PERNA: A trainer is a plane that you use for training pilots, not normally for combat, but they armed them with machine guns and with rockets and augmented the Mirages, Oregans, and Mysteres. They engaged the Arab armor because they had no enemy in the air. They shot up all the armored forces that were on the ground. And they made quick work of the Egyptians in about 3 days and then they went to the north and started up the Golan Heights and advanced to within about 35 miles of Damascus; they finally got a cease fire and stopped.

Q: Who called the cease fire then?

PERNA: The US was pressuring them to stop and world opinion was pressuring them to stop. They agreed once they had control of the Golan Heights. Once they had control of the Sinai and they had conquered the Egyptians, they did not want to go to Cairo, they did not want to cross the canal. They had driven the Jordanian forces back across the Jordan River and they had control of the West bank. Now they had gone all the way over the Judean hills and down into the Jordan Valley and they had everything. The Golan Heights, the whole Jordan Valley down to Elat, all of the Sinai...

Q: They felt protected? Their settlements were protected?

PERNA: There were settlements in the north, but the Golan Heights could no longer bother those because they had pushed the Syrians back, and this was a stunning military success. I was there all the time. They wouldn't let me fly. I had an aircraft that I leased most of the time. They made me take a baby sitter with me when I flew, and I flew a lot, but I always had to take an Israeli along with me, so that he could see what I was doing. They had areas where they wouldn't let me go. I was in a car most of the time and on the road, watching as close as I could get to the fighting. I was under fire a couple times when they were bombing, and I burned up the engine in the car one day running like hell at high speed.

Q: In the other direction?

PERNA: Yes, I was running away from some Syrian aircraft that were trying to bomb Nazareth. I was right at the edge of the city.

We had sent our families to Rome when we saw what was going to happen.

Q: Was that the whole Embassy?

PERNA: No. It was an optional evacuation. A few wives stayed who didn't have kids, but the ones who had children took them and went to Rome. The Embassy did not come under attack, Tel Aviv did not come under attack. A few shells landed in Tel Aviv when it started. The Jordanians shot some artillery to Tel Aviv, but it was not consequential.

Q: What were you doing then, aside from being shot at? You were reporting?

PERNA: Our job was observing and reporting. We had all of our Attachés watching what was going on. We were getting briefed by the Israelis and we had messages from our Embassies in Lebanon and in Amman and in Cairo, and we were comparing notes and we were reporting to Washington about what was going on. We had been asked when the mobilization started, what we predicted. We got together in our office, and with the Ambassador's approval, we said we did not think it would go more than 10 days or two weeks at the outside. This was our estimate. And we were very proud of the fact that we had said not more than two weeks. Actually it was over in 6 days. Our reports were going in daily. Everything that we could see and everything that we could hear. The Israelis were giving us briefings which were canned and what they wanted to tell us. We took that and repeated them and sent them in saying this had been given us by the Israeli Air Force or the Foreign Liaison office or whoever gave the briefing.

Q: And then you say that the Israelis were pressured to have a cease fire. Did that come through the Embassies?

PERNA: Yes. The mechanics of why they stopped can best be answered by the fact that they had achieved their objectives, that is to get rid of the threat of the forces that had mobilized on their borders, and once they got rid of the threat they had no reason to go on. They had no objectives of going to Damascus, or going to Cairo. So they had achieved their objectives. We were of course trying to stop them before it ever started. It was against our interest to have war anywhere, and we tried to inhibit them. It had little effect. But once they achieved their objectives, they stopped.

Q: Now, they were in the Sinai, and they had the Golan Heights, and they stayed there?

PERNA: Yes, and the West Bank up to the Jordan River. And unfortunately, large numbers of Palestinians fled during the Six Day War across into Jordan, and into Syria, and into Lebanon, and into Egypt and they further populated the refugee camps. A case can be made why these countries didn't move those people out of the camps and absorb them. However, they wanted them to go back to the land where they had come from. This has been the source of friction down through the years.

The period following the Six Day War was complicated because De Gaulle didn't want them to go to war, and De Gaulle had told them that if they began fighting, he was going to shut off all their supplies. Their tanks, their aircrafts, and their supplies were French. He said: "You will get no supplies if you go to war." And they went to war. He shut them off and set up an embargo on all supplies. Following the Six Day War, they could get no French supplies. This is when they came to us and begged us to sell them arms. We had given them some help with anti-aircraft missiles; these were Hawk missiles, to intercept aircraft, low flying aircraft. We had sold them some Hawks, and subsequently we sold them some A4s, which were fighter bombers.

Q: There were no nuclear weapons at that time in the area?

PERNA: We don't know the Israeli nuclear capability. Let me put it aside for a minute, and I'll get to it in a little while. But on the arms situation ... because they were dependent on French supplies, they had no way to get arms from anybody, once De Gaulle had shut them off, so they came to us, and we did not want to sell them arms. We did not want to sell them because we had friends in the moderate Arabs countries, and we didn't want to destroy the sources of our oil, and our other strategic interests in the area. We were reluctant to arm the Israelis with American equipment. However, the American policy had been that, from the time of Truman, in 1948, when we first recognized them, we supported the concept that the US believed in the integrity and supported the integrity of the state of Israel. This was from the time of their declaration of independence, when the country was partitioned between Arabs and Jews, and we said that we supported the territorial integrity of the state of Israel. Our concept, strategically, how we would support them, was to try to prevent wars, and if the war started, we would try to stop the war by interceding. This was a bankrupt policy. There's no way you can get in between the forces that had large amounts of Soviet armor and the Israelis with their armor, and try to say: "Stop boys." It won't work. The Ambassador discussed this at length with the Attachés and we convinced him that if the United States wanted to preserve the territorial integrity of the state of Israel, we needed to give them the opportunity to buy weapons in order to take care of themselves, so that we didn't have to try and come at the eleventh hour to try and help them. The policy changed after the Six Day War when De Gaulle put an embargo on things they needed. The Russians rapidly rearmed Syria and Egypt, with airplanes and tanks and artillery. The Ambassador recommended that the US supply arms and the State Department and the Defense Department vetoed it. However, the White House approved it.

Q: So this came from the Embassy in Israel?

PERNA: In Israel, yes. We recommended it, and the State Department and the Defense Department disapproved it, but the White House approved. And we began a program of selling them selected weapons. The first big sale was the F4 fighter. A lot of things happened at the end of the Six Day War. We were fighting in Vietnam and we wanted to know as much as we could about Soviet armament, and we were successful in getting access to a whole series of really important weapons that our Army and Air Force, and Navy wanted to know about. The SA2, a surface to air missile that had high altitude capability. The Soviet tanks, their modern tanks. In this period, they were equipping the Vietnamese, the Viet Cong, and the Chinese. The Israelis had radar, and artillery and a lot of stuff that we were interested in, that were captured during the Six Day War. We were successful in arranging for Americans to exploit this material and to know how it worked. Some of it was sent to America and some was examined and exploited in Israel by teams that came in. We were extremely busy in the hardware business. Not only in setting up a procurement program for American stuff to be sold to them, but by exploiting the Soviet equipment which the Israelis had captured during the Six Day War.

Q: Did some people come over from the States then?

PERNA: We had teams, Army and Navy and Air Force teams that came, and they examined the captured material. Some of the material, we shipped back to the States. They examined it, and studied it at centers that we had for this purpose. It was a bonanza for the army in particular to get access to these Soviet radars, and Soviet missiles, artillery and armor.

Q: And so the Israelis released this to the US?

PERNA: Under a great deal of pressure and bargaining, by very tough business deals. "Yes, we'll let you have it, but we want this, and this, and this in exchange." They would have a lot of trading that went on and a lot of it got to the point where I couldn't help, and sent them to Washington. They went over there, and thrashed it out. Because all I could do was to be a messenger boy and take the messages. "Would you give these guys a certain kind of radar, and they'll give us a MiG 15?" I couldn't make these decisions. We got the thing going and sat back and watched, and it worked well, exchanging vast amounts of materiel. The Israelis also took all of this captured equipment and refurbished it and put the Israeli Star of David on it and they now are still equipped with Soviet tanks which they captured.

Q: It was an exciting time.

PERNA: It was exciting. The sad part of it was that the refugees who were now, probably doubled in numbers because of the number of Palestinians who ran away during the Six Day War. These poor, unfortunate, poorly educated, low skilled people were the ones who got trapped, often with large families and they're now in the camps since 1967. The UN passed a number of resolutions, 242 was the big one. 242 said that the Israelis should give back captured land from the Six Day War, and that the Arabs should recognize secure borders for Israel. Well, the Arabs wouldn't even recognize the existence of the state. They had boycotted any business that did business with Israel. They would not recognize there was a state of Israel. There was a whole series of events going on at this time in the UN, passing resolutions about how you do this and you do that in terms of trying to clean up the aftermath of the war. The Israeli occupied the Golan Heights to about 18 miles. And the UN put a buffer zone between Syria and the Israelis, and set up observation posts ...

Q: UN observation posts?

PERNA: Yes, and they were staffed by people who were non-partisan, so to speak, a lot of Danes and other Scandinavians. They established a border with the Egyptians along the Red Sea, in the Sinai, and the UN was there observing. The Israelis held the Sinai and of course they held it until Sadat and Begin, many years later in 1978 agreed at Camp David to give back the Sinai for peace with the Egyptians. That's another chapter, but the immediate aftermath of the war was a great flurry of UN activities. There were hardliners who wanted to kick all refugees out, forever, and there were others who said, this is no good, you've got to live with them, you've got to let them come back; they fought the thing on a case by case basis. Sometimes families were reunited and came back...

Q: Palestinians?

PERNA: Yes.

Q: Was there terrorism at that time, had it started?

PERNA: After the Six Day War, there was a quiet period.

Q: It hadn't started yet?

PERNA: Yes, there was terrorism in '68 and '69, and there were a number of things connected with the war that should be mentioned. One was the fact, that we had a communications ship like the Pueblo, which was captured in Korea. We had a communications eavesdropper, a spy ship called the Liberty which was in the Eastern Mediterranean and which the Israelis bombed and strafed and killed several dozens Americans, I think 35 or 36 Americans on this ship. This was on the second day of hostilities.

Q: This was an American Navy ship?

PERNA: This was an American ship. Actually it was run by the American intelligence people, NSA. They had staffs of Navy people and they were from the agency that was involved in listening, not only to the Soviets, but to everybody. That was their business. The Israelis claimed that it was mistaken identity. In the heat of battle, the heat of war, they thought it was Egyptian. They did not think it was American. They thought it was Egyptian and they had some bad "snafus" in their control center, one team changing and another team coming on, failed to tell the team coming on that there was a plot of a target out there that had been recorded previously. And in the confusion, the next time it was sighted they said it was unidentified. And the Israeli Air Force attacked it and before they stopped, they had shot it up and killed some 35 people. The Israeli government apologized profusely, and said it was a mix up, it was not deliberate. It was an error, they were sorry, and they promised recompense, etc. This has been a bone of contention down through the years and journalists have tried very hard to make a case both on television and in the printed journalism that the Israelis did it deliberately. Our position at the Embassy after sending my Naval Attaché out there and flying over in an helicopter and doing everything that we could, and checking with the Ambassador, we reported to Washington that we had no grounds upon which to dispute the statements that the Israeli government made. It was an official government position that they had made a mistake and that it was an error in the heat of war, and that they were sorry. They admitted it and said that they would pay the damage, which they ultimately did. But the case has never ended. There are still a lot of people, including families of the wounded and of the fatalities who believe that it is legitimate to make a case that this was done deliberately. I accepted the Israeli position.

But in saying that I accept their explanation on the Liberty case, I would make this kind of a general qualifier. The Israelis could do anything, no matter how bad it embarrasses us, and no matter how bad it insults us, if they think it's in their own national interest. If they think it's a big enough issue, even though we get a black eye from it, they will do it. And so will we, and so will any country. This is not restricted to the Israelis. But it was a bad episode. The ship limped off west under its own power, and they got the casualties off, and the Navy came to rescue them, etc.

The period following the Six Day War was equally deeply involved with the UN resolutions: Would they give back this? and would they give back that?" etc. And a quick synopsis goes like this. The Arab countries would not recognize any boundaries other than the original green line that existed when the Six Day War began. The green line was decided on the island of Rhodes in 1948, and the Israelis said no way will we go back. They have an area in the middle of the country where there is only 11 miles from the green line to the ocean and this separates Haifa and the Galilee from the plains of Sharon and down to Tel Aviv. The plains of Sharon is the coastal area going down to Tel Aviv and then further south towards Beersheba and Jerusalem. But that 11 mile area they will never have again.

Jerusalem, they will never have divided again. Jerusalem, they have made their capital and they have built big apartment complexes all around in areas which had been Arab. We don't have our Embassy in Jerusalem. Our Embassy is in Tel Aviv. Most other countries have their Embassies in Jerusalem. But the Brits and the French are still in Tel Aviv and I think the Germans and some of the other NATO allies are there. The Soviets of course left at the beginning of the Six Day War and they're just now reestablishing diplomatic relations. They haven't had them since 67, but they're about to renew them.

But the city of Jerusalem is never going to be divided again. The Israelis will go to war over it. And although there are large numbers of Arabs living in Jerusalem, there's a whole Arab sector in the old city; Bethlehem is Arab completely. To my knowledge there are no Jews living in Bethlehem. But in the area of Jerusalem there are large populations in areas where they have apartment complexes, shopping centers, libraries, swimming pools, hospitals, schools, etc. There are about six of these areas around the city.

The West Bank has the Israeli settlements, as you know, for various reasons. Those zealots who wanted to force the Arabs out are trying to do it by building settlements and pushing them. Those who are militarily oriented want the settlements to be in positions to stop any attack that might come in the future, principally on the high ground, strategic positions, and along the Jordan River. Since Rabin came to power, (and I know him well, he was Chief of Staff during the Six Day War. I entertained him at home lots of times, traveled with him) he's more of a dove than Shamir who was a hawk. He's talking now, and there's a possibility that he will negotiate an interim government for five years, give the Palestinians some kind of a police force of their own and permit them to run their own infrastructure. Presently, the Israeli military takes care of the roads, and the communications, and the electricity and all that. They will give that over to the Palestinians and they will give them some measure of self rule. They won't let them have military defense, military self-defense, although they will let them have a police force. We're talking about a three thousand man police force. The Israelis will control foreign relation. They won't let the Palestinian run foreign relations. But everything else, they will let them do themselves. Run their own jurisprudence system, run their own tax system, run everything themselves. And they've stopped construction on some six thousand housing units. And it looks now like Rabin is going, hopefully, to push to get these talks going. Baker was just there a few days ago, and the prospects are that if the zealots on each side don't take too much control that there can be a period of relative quiet, and this will keep the factions from raising hell. There will be terrorist attacks, and there will be bombs, and there will be this kind of stuff going on, still, but an interim plan is possible.

Q: This is the future?

PERNA: Yes.

Q: Who was Prime Minister when you were there?

PERNA: When I first got there, Levi Eshkol had the Prime Minister's job as the head of the Labor government. Their politics are interesting. They have 21 parties and the only reason they don't have more is because there are only 21 letters in the Hebrew alphabet and each have a letter that designates their party. So if you get two Jews together, you have three opinions, and this is the way it is with their politics. There are extreme left idealistic communists, who have some kibbutzim who are communist. Really. I mean working communism you can see. Each person according to his needs, each person gives according to his abilities. Then you have extreme conservative capitalists on the other side, who own cement factories, and automobile factories, aircraft factories and munitions factories, who are extremely well off. And in between these two, you have a whole number of grades and shades. The big party had been historically under Levi Eshkol, the Labor party. He had Abba Eban as his Foreign Minister. Subsequently, when he died, Golda Meir came to power, and she was a Labor party candidate also. Dayan was the Minister of Defense at the time of the Six Day War. He had been their representative to the peace conference in Rhodes in '48. Then he had worked his way up to the Chief of Staff. He was a capable, personable, effective Minister of Defense. The Chief of Staff was Rabin. He was not as effective in my judgment, as a number of his Generals. Particularly Tal, and Ariel Sharon, and Eleazar who ran the northern operation against the Syrians. There were a number of very, very proficient and effective generals at the two star level who made Rabin look very good. But he was not that broad gauged, but he had some very good people. One of his abilities was to surround himself with good people. Ezer Weizman had been the head of the Air Force and built the Air Force. Rabin brought him in as an Air Force officer on the General Staff as Chief of Operations. A fellow named Motti Hod became Chief of Staff of the Air Force. He was a skilled tactician and very good leader. Rabin's forte was the fact that he picked really good guys, but he was, on a scale of one to ten, a 5 or 6. But he had generals who were 8, and 9, and 10, who were doing the real things. I wasn't in on it, but the scuttlebutt was that he had had a nervous breakdown in the first few days of the Six Day War.

Q: Rabin?

PERNA: Yes. He has recovered nicely and has become the Prime Minister. Previously, he became the Ambassador in Washington. And he got into some kind of disgrace when he was the Ambassador because of an honorarium being paid to him and to his wife for speeches and what they were doing with the money, and so on. But he's weathered all that and he's now the head of the Labor party again and they won the majority with their coalition, and believe me it's a coalition. It's a wall to wall coalition from the extreme right to the extreme left. All these different parties, including the extremely religious guys who have a few members and a few votes. And there's an ex Chief of Staff who has a party, with about 6 or 8 votes, and he's got his people with him. And there's a lot of problems in getting a majority, but although I haven't been there in a few years, the feeling in the country seems to be that they want to find some way to solve this problem of Jews and Arabs living together.

Q: Going back to an earlier question then. Did the Israelis have nuclear weapons? How did they get them?

PERNA: OK. We essentially have ended the talks on the Six Day War and the post Six Day War period. We didn't dwell very much on the Yom Kippur War. I wasn't there at the time, so it's second hand information that I have. We brought ourselves up to date. Now, to go back and talk about the Israelis' nuclear capability. To begin with the Israeli government developed a nuclear reactor at a place called Dimona in the Negev desert. This is about 80 miles south of Tel Aviv and about 30 miles southeast of Beersheba. It is out in the middle of the desert. They built a compound there to develop a nuclear reactor, ostensibly for the purpose of peaceful uses of nuclear energy. Throughout the world, many of the nations who have the capability have built nuclear reactors. OK. With this as a start, their problem was to get enriched uranium or heavy water or the ingredients to make weapon grades uranium. We had an inspection procedure worked out with the Israelis as well as with a number of other nations where on a reciprocal basis, they were allegedly opening nuclear facilities so the world could see that these were not to proliferate nuclear weapons. The Israelis participated in this program. Prior to my arrival in '65, there were American teams that went in to the Dimona reactor and from what they were permitted to see, they concluded that it was a peaceful use of nuclear energy. They don't have any power plants that are nuclear powered in Israel. They make their power with coal and oil. In the period from '65 to '69, I tried very hard to find out what the Israelis were doing.

Q: Did you get to visit the plant?

PERNA: I did not ever get inside the plant. I flew near the area. It was a prohibited area to fly over and I drove around it as close as you could get without being obvious. But there was an ambivalent attitude on the part of the US government which reflected itself in the policies of our Embassy. Rather than pursue an aggressive spying operation to try and develop some really good, hard knowledge about the Israeli capability, it was my feeling that Washington was just as happy that we didn't bring this subject to a head and cause incidents and cause bad feelings, etc. So I had my staff essentially lay off trying to penetrate the subject overtly. This doesn't mean that we didn't do a lot of collecting of ancillary and correlated information. We knew that they were building missiles and we knew of certain details connected with the development of the program on the Jericho. The Jericho was an intermediate range rocket capable of carrying a nuclear head.

Ok, having said that, it develops over the years that the Israelis obtained weapons grade materials from several unknown sources. Journalists have alleged that they got most of their help from France. The reactor was built with French technical help during the period when France was a principal supplier of all of Israel's armaments and supplies and equipment. The French technicians who lived in Beersheba and worked at the plant were numerous. There were some leaks by French civilian employees which were picked up by journalists and other sources suggesting that the peaceful uses of nuclear energy was not the primary mission of Dimona. It was also believed that they had gone deeply underground in order to build laboratories and facilities for production that were not evident when inspection teams came from the International Atomic Energy Commission to look and see what was going on. It was easy for them to hide. This has been speculated on by a number of journalists and other technicians. There were investigations conducted about possibilities that they got some weapons grade material out of the United States. A number of prominent American Jewish leaders' names surfaced during this investigation. I don't think it is useful for me to cite names because I don't have definitive backup to support presumptions in this area, so I will bypass that. The sum and substance of it is that they got the material either from America or from France or from some other source to give them the capability to develop weapons grade material. They have never admitted that they have nuclear weapons. The policy of the Israeli government has been from the very beginning and continues to be enunciated in a statement that goes like this: "The government of Israel will not be the first to introduce nuclear weapons into the Middle East." They have been consistent in that policy all the time. Well, so what? What do I think. I think that they ran a test program with the South Africans in the Indian ocean somewhere, probably in the mid to latter '60s...

Q: When you were there?

PERNA: Yes, when they detonated a device. This was never confirmed by either government. However, there are means of collecting the bad news about people blowing off big explosions in space, and the collectors got an indication that something went off down there. I surmise that it was a joint Israeli-South African test and I surmise that the Israelis and the South Africans have cooperated closely, possibly in the area of obtaining weapons grade uranium and other source material for making bombs and for making plutonium and the ingredients. I give them credit from a gut feeling of having worked and lived with them of being capable of delivering nuclear weapons by several means. I think they're capable of delivering them by air, I think they're capable of delivering them by rocket, and I think they're capable of delivering them by artillery. This knowhow is not the sole property of the Soviets, the Americans, the British, and the French. The scientific community knows how to do this and I think the Israelis have developed their own capability in these areas. If I had to guess I would say that they have an arsenal that probably numbers in the dozens of nuclear devices. I also think that they are very prudent about the consequences of employing them, and although we used the bomb on Hiroshima and on Nagasaki, it has become apparent to both the Soviets and the Americans during the cold war as well as the British and the French, and the Chinese, that it is a no win policy to start detonating nuclear devices. The consequences are so horrendous to the planet that this is not a good idea. We used nuclear weapons by the thousands to deter the Russians and they used them to deter us, and unfortunately now we are faced with the prospect of the Russian Republics having some thirty thousand plus of these things, under new independent republic governments, and we're trying to get treaties engineered with the Soviets to get these things under control. But the Israelis I think realize that it would be as impossible for them to use it as it was for us to use it.

Q: It is a...

PERNA: As a deterrent it is a good gadget. But it would be at the eleventh hour when all else had failed and the Arabs were at their throat that they would employ nuclear weapons, in my judgment.

DAVID A. KORN
Bureau of Near East Affairs
Washington, DC (1965-1967)

Political Officer
Tel Aviv (1967-1971)

Bureau of Near East Affairs
Washington, DC (1972-1975)

Bureau of Near East Affairs
Washington, DC (1978-1982)

Ambassador David A. Korn was born in Texas in 1930, and received degrees from University of Missouri and Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies. After service in the U.S. Army, he joined the Foreign Service in 1959. Ambassador Korn's career included positions in Beirut, Tangier, Nouakchott, Tel Aviv, Calcutta, and Washington, DC, and ambassadorships to Ethiopia and Togo. He was interviewed in 1990 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: I can't think of anyone who had both Arabic and Hebrew studies.

KORN: The way that came about was that, I think it was Ned Schaffer who was a personnel officer at that time and came around looking for somebody who had studied Arabic and served in the Arab world to go to Israel and study Hebrew and serve in the embassy there. This was a new program. There had been one or two officers in the embassy in Israel who had been trained in Arabic there, but nobody who had experience from the other side. So they were looking for that and nobody in NEA would touch this because it was considered sudden death for your career. If you went to Israel and served there you were contaminated as far as the Arabs were concerned. While I was in Beirut I went down to Israel on my own and spent a couple of weeks touring around and I found it a very interesting place. So when this came up I thought it was magnificent opportunity. So I put my name in. Nobody else put his name in. So I went to Israel. FSI did not have a program for Hebrew set up at that time. I simply went into a school for immigrants and studied Hebrew there on my own for three months before going to work in the embassy. It was a fantastic experience.

Q: How did you find Hebrew after Arabic? Was it difficult?

KORN: Hebrew was not very hard really. I didn't find it very hard because they are both Semitic languages. They are much more different than French from Italian, or English from German, but still the basic structure of the languages are the same and there are a number of words that are similar. Arabic was a fine preparation for Hebrew.

Q: Did you find going to the immigrant school also an experience you could draw on later on as a political officer?

KORN: Well, it gave me a much better appreciation, I think, for the place and the people than if I had studied Hebrew in Washington. This was the very best time as far as the Israelis were concerned. They had just had this war and unbelievable victory so there was launched a kind of momentum and a time of great optimism.

Q: I see. You were there from '67 to '71. First, what were you doing at the embassy after you completed the language?

KORN: I went into the political section first of all and at the end of '69 when Stackhouse, who was head of the political section left, I moved up into his job.

Q: The ambassador was Walworth Barbour. He had been there for a long time hadn't he? How would you describe his operating style?

KORN: Barbour had been there since 1962 and he was in ill health. He was a very intelligent man, but by the time I started working for the embassy in 1968 he was increasingly out of commission. He came in the office around 10:00 o'clock and left around 1:00. If I were to accompany him to the Foreign Ministry some times I would write the cable. But he left the running of the embassy to Owen Zurhellen who was a very active, energetic, and capable officer. Barbour did not take a great hand in things. He was known to be very pro-Israeli, very much inclined to make the Israeli case in Washington, but also, I think, the American case to the Israelis when that was required.

Q: Were you working with internal politics?

KORN: At first, yes. Afterwards, I became involved in the external affairs as well.

Q: Those were the days when the Labor Party was in power. How did we get along with it?

KORN: Oh, I think they were the days of closest collaboration between the United States and Israel. Before the Six Day War relations had not been bad but there had been a conscious effort for quite some time to keep a distance from Israel. After the '67 war, that largely disappeared. We didn't start giving Israel massive aid until during and after the 1973 war, but the program of supplying arms, selling arms, particularly aircraft, to Israel began after the 1967 war.

So relations were very close and there were various peace efforts going on at the time. Joe Sisco had negotiations with the Soviets. There were disagreements. The Israelis were very unhappy over our talking with the Soviets about a peace settlement. But basically collaboration was quite close.

Q: Did you find the Israelis easy to talk to re political subjects?

KORN: Yes, very. It was a very interesting place. You never went to a dull dinner party or after dinner party, or whatever. Unlike a great many diplomatic posts where there was nothing to learn or say, Israel was a place where you could find interesting and lively conversation.

Q: Did you find yourself in a position of trying to give the Arab view to people since you had served in Beirut, Mauritania and on the Saudi desk? Were you placed in the Arab expert field by both the Israelis and the embassy?

KORN: No, on the contrary. I had the feeling that the Israelis, at that time anyway, were very much interested in meeting and talking to somebody who had been on the Arab side and did not regard you with any particular suspicion for having been there, which, of course, is entirely the contrary if you were on the other side.

Q: This was a time too when the Israelis felt they could sit back, things were going their way and eventually the Arabs would come around, wasn't it?

KORN: Yes, they thought that for a while.

Q: At the embassy in Tel Aviv you get these reflections of each embassy thinking well if you are in opposing camps that all those people in the Cairo Interest Section there or in Syria and the like don't understand and are too biased or anti-Israeli or something like this. Was there any of this feeling?

KORN: In NEA I think the embassy at Tel Aviv was not in the mainstream. There wasn't anyone in Syria because we didn't have representation at that time, but from the embassy in Beirut we got a lot of cables that seemed to place the blame for everything on Israeli. There were different points of view reflected from reporting from Beirut and Cairo than from Tel Aviv. No question about it.

Q: At that time there was the feeling that Israel had proven itself in the Six Day War and was here to stay. It was not an iffy case of a country...

KORN: That was very definitely so.

Q: Did you have any contact with any of the Israeli leaders? Can you characterize any of the meetings?

KORN: I was not at the level where I could deal directly with Dayan or Eban, or Golda Meir, but I was in meetings with them frequently while accompanying somebody -- the ambassador, Sisco, George Ball, etc. I often took the notes of the meeting.

Q: Was there the feeling that the Israelis were doing a number on the many delegations that came through? Did the embassy feel it had to put things a little more in perspective? Sometimes this is not only true of Israel, there are a lot of countries where...

KORN: Well, certainly that was not the Barbour view of things. At that time things were different than now. I don't think the administration felt there was a conflict between our views and the Israelis.

Q: So there really wasn't a feeling that we thought we might be going in one direction, while the Jewish lobby as well as those who were interested in Israel and the United States, were pushing us in another direction.

KORN: Things were still under the shadow of the 1967 war. The feeling was that we had some moral commitment to the Israelis. We left them to go alone. We didn't fulfill on this commitment. We arranged the withdrawal from Sinai in 1967 and the UN forces and all that and gave some commitments there but they were not hard and fast. When Nasser sent his forces into the Sinai in 1967 and closed the Straits of Tiran, the Johnson Administration flailed around. It was too heavily committed in Vietnam to be able to mount a real effort in the Middle East. Then finally the Israelis took things into their own hands. This had a lasting impact -- at least for several years. It really meant that the United States was not pushing the Israelis very hard on anything.

Q: One last question on Israel. How about the Likud? Was this a factor or was it sort of peripheral?

KORN: At that time it wasn't the Likud, it was the Herut which was a liberal bloc and were a minority. They were viewed as a nuisance but not of great consequence. And this is another reason why Israel and the United States did not have any big clash because the prevailing views of the Labor Party were for the most part liberal and broad minded. Settlements in the occupied territories were not an issue at that time because the Labor Party was not advocating them. The greater Israel move was beginning to develop but it was not something that the government, itself, was encouraging. In fact it was doing its best to break it. Begin was viewed as a kind of nuisance, but not a serious threat to the Israeli government or a problem for the United States. And had it not been for the '73 war and the losses of the '73 war the situation might have continued.

Q: By the way, did you find your study of Hebrew paid off there?

KORN: Very much so, yes. You can get along perfectly well in Israel in English, but what goes on inside Israeli society is very important and, of course, all the newspapers were in Hebrew except for the Jerusalem Post which was in English and geared to the foreign community. The Israeli press reported on everything that went on in the country. The deepest darkest diplomatic secrets would appear in the Hebrew press. You could read them in telegrams and then see them in the Hebrew press. But often they were in the middle of something that was totally off base. But you could read along and see a lot of information about reports that were absolutely false and right in the middle would be a couple of sentences reflecting what was going on in the diplomatic discussions between the United States and Israel. In any case you could circulate much better in society with Hebrew.

Q: You moved in '78 to Director of Israeli Affairs. Was that sort of right in the middle of the process?

KORN: The summer of '77 to the summer of '78 I was in Policy Planning and, of course, this was the time when, first of all, we were trying to get the Geneva Conference reconvened. The idea was to reach an overall settlement there. This proved impossible. Sadat made his speech and went to Jerusalem and immediately thereafter there began an effort to parley this visit to Jerusalem into something broader -- basically into a peace agreement between Israel and Egypt. There was a conference in Cairo between the Israelis and Egyptians and all the other Arabs were invited but no one else came. Vance went out to Jerusalem and I went on this mission in January of 1978 for a meeting of what was called the Political Committee -- in other words, sit down and try to lay out the terms for an agreement between Egypt and Israel. So, although I was not playing a leading role, I was involved with what was going on -- working with Atherton, Saunders, etc. I went to a conference that was held at Leeds, England in July of 1978 -- again between Israel, Egypt and the United States. All these were efforts that didn't really go very far.

After Sadat went to Jerusalem our effort was to build on it and make it into something. As Begin refused to make any serious concessions, the Egyptians became more and more disenchanted. Sadat was under increasing pressure from home and from other Arabs. The Saudis were offering him a lot of money to pull out of it. Finally in the late summer of 1978, Carter decided the thing was going to collapse unless he did something. He decided to go for broke. He sent Vance out again to the area, I went on this trip, to talk to Begin and then Sadat and invite them to come to Camp David. This was not announced until afterwards. After the trip was announced, Vance dispatched Atherton to Saudi Arabia and Jordan to explain to the governments there what the purpose was -- what we hoped to accomplish at Camp David -- and to try to get their support. I accompanied Atherton on this trip.

Q: Do you have any feeling how Begin felt about this proposal of Carter's?

KORN: Begin couldn't refuse the President of the United States inviting him to come to Camp David to talk with the Egyptian leader. It was clear that the Sinai didn't mean a hell of a lot to Begin and that that was basically a security issue and if security could be worked out there the Israelis would not quibble over it. The real problem was the West Bank and Gaza on the Palestinian side. There Begin was pretty much unyielding. He was ready to go so far as to say that Israel did not have sovereignty over these areas but his position was whenever the question of sovereignty came to be settled, Israel would make its claim to sovereignty.

Q: How about the Egyptians? The Sinai was more interesting to them because of geography?

KORN: The remarkable thing on the Egyptian side was the extent that Sadat was dragging his advisers along with him. They were going kicking and screaming. They didn't want to go in that direction. The Foreign Minister, Mohammed Kamel, had several nervous breakdowns. Sadat sent him to Jerusalem in January of '78 for the Political Committee meeting and I remember the poor man remarking to me that he was in Jerusalem for two or three days and didn't sleep the whole time because it made him so nervous to be in an Israeli city. He broke into tears at the Leeds Conference in July of '78. Osama El-Baz was there and reminded me of Goebbels in his demeanor. All of them were just dead set against it but they had to go along. They did go along but at every stage they tried to torpedo the thing.

Q: Then you moved to Director of Israeli Affairs?

KORN: Yes, but things didn't change very much; I just moved into another office.

Q: How were we acting from our various embassies as things came in? Sam Lewis was our ambassador then. Was he a strong advocate of Israeli? Were we getting the same thing from Hermann Eilts in Cairo?

KORN: There wasn't much of that although obviously they were presenting various concerns. In my experiences this was one of the better groups...

Q: Was this sort of a feeling with, say, the professionals in the business of, "By gosh, although we didn't think it would happen with Sadat making this move, here it is and if there is ever going to be a chance this is it?"

KORN: Yes, I think so. The President was not only behind the effort but he was fully involved in it. So there was a feeling that you were participating in something important.

Q: Was there a unhappiness over the coincidence of having Sadat in Egypt but Begin in Israel? A feeling that had there been someone else there it might have moved a little bit better?

KORN: There were hopes, in some respects exaggerated and in some respects not so much, that Begin would turn out to be the person with whom you could make a deal. That he was strong enough. You know what one does in a situation like this when you are stuck with someone you don't particularly like, you do your best to make him into the kind of person you would like him to be. And that was basically how Begin was treated by the American side.

Q: How about the NSC in this? Did Brzezinski get involved in this at all or was this outside his purview?

KORN: Carter was the driving force in all of this and he would get up at 6:00 in the morning to read what the Egyptian Team had said that day. After Camp David he would bring the Egyptian and Israeli legal advisors together on some minor point that was still in disagreement. So, you get from that the picture of how much the President himself was personally involved. Vance was his emissary and did all the talking. Brzezinski, I'm sure played some role, but Quandt was always a member of the team working with the State Department. Although Vance and Brzezinski had a very well-known rivalry, on the Middle East there was not a great deal of jockeying. I think this was because Carter was playing such a dominant role.

Q: Were you feeling a new power or ambition, whatever you want to call it, on your work as director of Israeli Affairs because of the increased importance of the Israeli lobby in the United States? You had been in and out of this whole business for a long time. Did you see this as an increasing factor -- particularly in Congress? Or was it just a natural growth?

KORN: Well, there was no question that the Administration wanted to bring along with it the Israeli supporters and friends in this country. Carter was, of course, distrusted by what you call the Israeli lobby to some extent, but it was also the feeling that he was doing something that was very much in Israel's interest. So he was able to have their support in most cases. He had a good man in the White House as liaison with the Jewish community and he was very effective in bringing the Jewish community along.

Q: Outside the Camp David process, did you get any reflections from the situation in Israel from what happened in Iran with the Shah, etc. Were there any repercussions that particularly affected you?

KORN: The major thing after Camp David was the peace treaty; then we began working on the autonomy issues. There we ran into a stone wall. First of all, Carter had expended so much energy and time on the Middle East that when the peace treaty was finished he wanted to go on to do other things. He had many other things on his agenda and, at the very least, was fed up with all these difficult characters. The autonomy agreement was the other half of the Camp David framework. The peace treaty was one half, the autonomy agreement, the other half.

Q: Autonomy refers to the autonomy for the West Bank.

KORN: Yes, that there would be a autonomous, self-governing entity set up there. This was sketched out in the Camp David Accords, but there was a lot of filling in to be done. So first of all you had Carter out and you had the harder part of the Camp David Accords to put into effect. The peace treaty, although very difficult, came close not to be signed. It came very, very close to there not being a peace treaty. Still the peace treaty, by far, was the easier part because the Israelis saw the advantage of it -- peace with Egypt would put the main Arab enemy out of commission. Dayan was transfixed by the idea that Israel and Egypt could be at peace. He brought Begin along. But when it came to the West Bank and Gaza the Israelis didn't want this. They figured the West Bank and Gaza would become very quickly an independent Arab state. Carter wasn't involved in pressing them. There were several meetings -- Robert Strauss was there. He felt nobody resisted his charm. He spent two months on it and realized that he was way over his head. Then Linowitz was appointed and he was a much more savvy negotiator. But it dragged into the summer of '79 and then in 1980 which was an election year and the Israelis knew that in an election year there would be no serious pressure put on them. So the meetings just petered out. The one thing that was accomplished was the setting up of the Sinai Multinational Force. Mike Sterner was the one who did the negotiating, I worked with him on it. Atherton was in Cairo by then. Saunders by that time was taken up almost entirely by the Iran situation and hostages. So Sterner took over the Multinational Force and I worked with him on that. That did get set up.

Q: One last thing on this. How about the situation in Lebanon at that time?

KORN: Well, Lebanon was not much of a concern of mine. Lebanon was in various stages of crisis, but I was not concentrating on it.

ARNOLD SCHIFFERDECKER
Staff Aide
Tel Aviv (1966-1968)

Arnold Schifferdecker was born in 1934 and attended the University of Missouri. After service in the US Navy, Schifferdecker joined the Foreign Service in 1964. He served overseas in Turkey, Israel, Afghanistan, Pakistan and Morocco. Schifferdecker also served on the Board of Examiners for the Foreign Service. Schifferdecker was interviewed by C. Edward Dillery in 1996

Q: Did you go directly to Tel Aviv or have home leave in between?

SCHIFFERDECKER: I went directly to Tel Aviv from Istanbul taking home leave later.

Q: What was the situation in Israel at that time?

SCHIFFERDECKER: Very peaceful at the beginning of my tour, except for a few border incidents, incursions by Palestinians along the Jordanian/Israeli border and later along the Syrian/Israeli border. Those incidents were at the time we thought pin pricks. Of course, Nasser was in power in Cairo and there were constant fulminations and threats against Israel and the United States. Less than a year later the situation changed dramatically. Israel and Syria exchanged artillery fire in the Golan Heights in the spring of 1966 and there were air battles. This led to a closing of ranks among the Arabs and Nasser's crossing of the Suez, ostensibly to aid Egypt's Arab brethren. He forced the UN peacekeepers to evacuate the Sinai which had been virtually free of military forces. When the Egyptians began moving toward Israel's border in large numbers with heavy armor, the Israelis became very alarmed and, as you know, struck preemptively in what was called Six Day War.

Q: So, you were there throughout that tense period. How about some reflections on the job of aide to an ambassador and what you learned about the ambassador's jobs and aide's jobs?

SCHIFFERDECKER: Well, my job was mainly pushing the paper, making sure it was ready for the ambassador's review and sign off. It was the typical staff position which occurs in Washington as well as in the field. I was required by the ambassador to translate his handwriting, which was sometimes difficult to read, into cables when there was no secretary to take the dictation. Occasionally I was given special assignments by the ambassador to go to the Foreign Ministry. Basically it was delivering things which he had promised Abba Eban or the head of the Israeli MFA's American Section in Jerusalem. Of course, with the embassy in Tel Aviv and the Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem, it involved a trip of about 45 minutes to an hour each way.

One of the demarches I delivered was a demand for financial restitution after the Six Day War. You may recall that during that War there was a bombing of an American ship, the USS Liberty, a communications ship, manned by the National Security Agency. A number of Americans were killed and wounded in that attack. Israel claimed it had been a mistake, they said they had thought it was an Arab ship. Some people later said the Israelis knew exactly who they were bombing, i.e., they didn't want us monitoring what they were doing. But, in any case, we were called after the attack by Israeli Defense Minister Dayan to come to the aid of that ship, saying that the ship had been disabled and there were probably casualties on board. They flew our military attaché out by helicopter to communicate with the ship. This communication was by flashing light as it was night and because the bombing had knocked out all of the electronics. So, we found out that there were around several dozen Americans killed or wounded in that attack. Somewhat later I presented to the Foreign Ministry a bill for the damages suffered by the ship and indemnity for the families who had lost loved ones. The total, I believe, was around ten million dollars. That was presented to the American Section in the Foreign Ministry. The recipient, an Israeli named Shlomo Argov (later Ambassador to Mexico and the UK), said that he would refer the matter to the highest levels in government and eventually, I understand, compensation was paid.

Q: It was interesting being the person who was the messenger in that case, I am sure there was a lot of tension. I do remember that there was a lot of tension about that case. During that period were there any special meetings or events between the United States and Israel, prior, during or after the war?

SCHIFFERDECKER: There certainly were a lot of consultations. The Israelis did not tell us ahead of time they were going to attack. They claimed they were acting in self defense and a case could be made that an attack by the other side would have left them crippled and maybe unable to do what they did which was to destroy the Egyptian, Syrian and Jordanian air forces on the ground before they were able to attack Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. President Johnson was livid about not being consulted and demanded an explanation, which Ambassador Barbour obtained from Prime Minister Eshkol. Basically, the explanation was, Israel could not afford to wait to be attacked; by then it would be too late to defend themselves. Shortly after the onset of the Six Day War a White House emissary came from President Johnson. He spent some time in the embassy getting in touch with the Israelis and coordinating with the defense establishment on the resupply of ammunition and other armaments that Israel expended in the war. There were a lot of postmortems conducted and delegations came to us and Israelis traveled to the United States. The most immediate action came up in the Security Council. Abba Eban, the Foreign Minister, flew to New York and the famous UN Security Council Resolution 242 was negotiated with our help and 242 continues to be one of the basic documents undergirding today's peace process. One of its main provisions, the inadmissibility of territorial gain by conquest, has helped to constrain Israeli expansionists and to keep the Arabs at the negotiating table.

Q: What other manifestations of the special relationship between the United States and Israeli were apparent at that time?

SCHIFFERDECKER: Relations at that time were strong, and durable. We didn't have the extent of defense cooperation, perhaps, that we do today or intelligence sharing. Although that began to increase in the aftermath of the Six Day War, and more perhaps after the 1973 war. But one incident did come up which pitted Israel and the United States against one another. That was on nuclear proliferation. We did get word through open non-intelligence sources that Israel was producing weapons grade material. As a result of that we made a number of demarches to Israel warning them not to proceed on that track, much as we had done with other countries such as Pakistan, that had moved towards the capability of producing nuclear weapons. Of course, the Israelis did have a small reactor for research purposes and Israeli scientists are among the best in the world in many fields. But, this did create some tension in US/Israeli relations which continued long after I left and were never totally resolved because Israel still today is not a signatory of the Non Proliferation Treaty.

Q: Turning to internal politics. Was there any problem or perceived interference in Israeli internal affairs? I'm not thinking of official interference, but the large Jewish community and visits.

SCHIFFERDECKER: There were no major issues of such interference or accusations of such interference in Israeli internal affairs. There were a couple of amateur efforts by well meaning private Americans to come over and try to promote peace between Israel and the Arabs. One of them was a Rabbi from Massachusetts named Baruch Korff, who wanted the Israelis to take unilateral steps to open relations with Jordan, Egypt and other Arab states, which he had visited--again strictly on his own. It was an interesting effort but the Israelis were not yet ready, nor were the Arabs ready to talk to the Israelis about peace. The logjam was broken only after the 1973 war, when the Arab side recovered some sense of pride and Israel began to realize that periodic wars did not advance their goal of security.

Q: Moving to the unofficial side in Israel, was the fact that Israel did have difficult or no relations with its neighbors affect your own ability to move around? Did you feel isolated?

SCHIFFERDECKER: To some extent yes. Before the Six Day War when Jerusalem was a divided city and before Israel took it over entirely, we were able to go to Jordan through the Mandelbaum Gate which was torn down by the Israelis the day after the Six-Day War when they unified the city, literally opening roads that had been closed for almost 20 years.

The feeling of isolation increased somewhat after that because only persons on official business could travel between Israel and Jordan by land. Of course, one could go by aircraft to Cyprus and take Middle East Airlines to Beirut, Amman and Cairo.

Q: Did your Israeli accreditation cause problems in Arab countries?

SCHIFFERDECKER: The Arab countries would not accept for admission into the country a passport containing an Israeli visa, but at that time the State Department could issue a second passport to those on official travel which Arabs would accept. So, we were able to get around the problem although we did not have diplomatic relations while I was there with most of the Arab countries.

Q: What were living conditions like in Tel Aviv?

SCHIFFERDECKER: Living conditions were quite comfortable. Houses were small, but clean and well built. We were mostly living north of Tel Aviv in the so-called diplomatic ghetto, Herzliyya Petuach, which contained not only foreign diplomats but also Israeli civil servants and business people. It has become quite a large Mediterranean resort city and residential area north of Tel Aviv stretching further north today to the old Roman city of Caesarea.

Q: Any interesting aspects of how Ambassador Barbour ran an embassy or anecdotes about him?

SCHIFFERDECKER: Ambassador Barbour was a professional in every sense of the word. A seasoned diplomat who had served in Moscow, London and at least one Middle East post, when he came to Tel Aviv. He was ambassador in Israel close to 13 years. I think I was his eighth staff assistant. He had the habit of coming in in the morning at normal business hours, a little bit later than most of his staff. His papers were stacked up and waiting. He would look through his papers and pared down the sheaf of telegrams that I had filtered for him and taken out some of the stuff he had no interest in, although he had a wide interest in everything to do with managing the embassy as well as all the political and economic cables. Along about eleven or twelve he would finish his paperwork and confer individually with the section chiefs. If he had a demarche or some matter to take up, which was frequently with Jerusalem, he would get in his old Cadillac limo with his driver Shalom and head for the Jerusalem hills, and do his work with the Foreign Ministry, usually with the Foreign Minister, himself, or the Director General of the American Section, Moshe Bittan. Then he would return home for lunch and would not return to the office. I would run paper out to him if necessary. Once or twice a week he would try to play golf. As the Six Day War approached and in the aftermath of the war he was unable to find time to play golf and he frequently spent the entire day in the embassy. His work habits were somewhat laid back but he was a very efficient processor of the substantive material. He had a competent staff who kept him informed. It was a very smooth running office, a real model of an efficient embassy. Though it was not a very large embassy, like London and Paris...

Q: How large was it?

SCHIFFERDECKER: My recollection is that it was around 40-45 officer personnel and 20 or fewer American support personnel. If you count State and the other agencies you would have maybe 65 Americans and then a fairly large local staff.

Q: Well, Ambassador Barbour was a fairly colorful character which you have indicated. Were there any other anecdotes about him?

SCHIFFERDECKER: I would say he was a gentleman through and through. He treated everyone with respect. He never raised his voice and I never heard him say a word in anger. His sister, who was also a single person, as Ambassador Barbour was, used to come out during the Christmas holidays and be his hostess for the holidays and the ambassador would have staff in for Christmas parties and American occasions like the 4th of July. He entertained in a very certain special way. He had a table that seated 24 people and he liked to have the table full. He had a wide range of government and business contacts that he entertained regularly. Of course, there were many CODELS to Tel Aviv. The saying during my day back then was that any congressman who was running for reelection had to travel to one or more of the three I's--Israel, Italy and Ireland--in order to show the constituents that they cared about the old country. The ambassador kept a very set schedule for his dinners. A set amount of time for drinks, a certain amount of time for dinner, followed by cigars and cognac for the men in the library, then rejoining the ladies in the salon afterwards. Everybody was usually out the door by 11:15 or so. He was a man of very regular habits. He was a rather portly gentleman and had been a chain smoker. He had the beginning of emphysema while I was there. He would frequently alarm visitors when he would pull out his inhaler, lean way back in his chair and spray it to get his breathing back on track. He would say, "No, go ahead and speak," when they would stop as he used his inhaler. Remember, these devices were not very common back then as they are today with asthmatics and people with breathing problems.

Q: What was the DCM's job like under an ambassador who was so interested in everything?

SCHIFFERDECKER: The DCM did not have as much of a role in handling the substance of the embassy work as he did in overseeing the administrative part of the embassy because the ambassador handled the major issues himself or dealt directly with his section heads. I don't know that this was necessarily a personality issue between Ambassador Barbour and DCM, Bill Dale, but only when Barbour took his home leave did Dale have a little more scope to run the embassy and deal with the political issues which the ambassador liked to do when he was there.

Q: Back to the social life. Were you as staff aide involved in protocol duties as well as other things?

SCHIFFERDECKER: Oh, yes, I was required to make sure that the guest list was in order. I maintained the lists of official government personnel, business people and other movers and shakers. I advised other sections; on protocol and procedures. I conferred with the ambassador on who his guests were to be and with his secretary who handled the invitations. I placed the guests in protocol order and made sure the seating was according to protocol requirements. That turned out to be not such a difficult job. I always showed the seating plan to the ambassador ahead of time so that he could play around with it and occasionally he would change things around and not go by strict protocol if he noticed there might be some conflict with people sitting beside each other. Normally, he was a stickler for rank order. Remember, he had been DCM in London many years. I frequently was invited as a fill in and was out by the swinging doors normally. So, I got to participate in many of these formal dinners. He enjoyed having black tie dinners as well, so that was part of his entertaining. It probably no longer exists at that embassy, although I am not certain. The Israelis, of course, were very informal, usually not wearing a coat and a tie to the office, but they certainly did at his residence.

Q: Was your wife invited to those dinners?

SCHIFFERDECKER: At that time I was divorced and single. I remarried later.

EDWARD GIBSON LANPHER
Rotation Officer
Tel Aviv (1967-1969)

Ambassador Edward Gibson Lanpher was born in 1942 in Richmond Virginia. He earned his undergraduate degree in 1966 from Brown University and was sworn into the Foreign Service later that same year. His first post was as a Rotation Officer in Tel Aviv, Israel but later his Foreign Service career took him to such posts as Gabon, England, Zimbabwe, and Australia before he was appointed Ambassador to Zimbabwe. He was interviewed in June 2002 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: You went to Tel Aviv in '67. You were there until when?

LANPHER: Until July 1969.

Q: Interesting time.

LANPHER: Very interesting time.

Q: Before you went there, were you getting any scuttlebutt about what it would be like to serve in Israel?

LANPHER: I guess so. I took the area course. We were given a lot of reading, which I tried to do a lot of. It sounded pretty exciting. I had followed the Middle East war in 1956. This was an interesting part of the world and sounded like fun. I was 23 or 24 years old.

Q: When you got out there in January '67...

LANPHER: Yes. In those days, they were encouraging classes as a subsidy to the maritime industry to take a ship. So, about 40 of my junior officer colleagues and I got on the SS United States and had a stormy passage in the North Atlantic in January to France. Then I took a plane from France to Tel Aviv.

Q: Let's start when you arrived there. How was the embassy set up? Who was the ambassador?

LANPHER: The ambassador is somebody I'd like to talk about later. His name was Walworth Barbour, a real legend. A fellow named Bill Dale was the DCM. Heywood Stackhouse was the political counselor. I can't remember who the economic counselor was. I was assigned for the first part of my rotation to the consular section. The consul general was an old veteran named Cliff English. It was set up as a traditional embassy with a public affairs officer. I can't remember how many Americans there were, but we had six or eight Marines. It was a traditional embassy.

Q: When you arrived in '67, what was the situation there?

LANPHER: When I got there in January, there were reports about incursions and [whatnot and] firings across the line between Israel and Syria around the Sea of Galilee, but everything was sort of under control. The thing I remember most about the early days, January through March of 1967, was, Israel was in a deep recession. People were fairly blue. It was a pretty heavily socialist country in those days. It wasn't working economically. I saw this on a day to day basis because I was assigned when I got there to be the immigrant visa officer, my first job. I saw a steady stream of Israelis coming in to try to get visas to the United States. I interviewed them and they were leaving for economic reasons. The country was dispirited. It was a good education. It was a good way to start out in the Foreign Service.

Q: Had these immigrants come there for religious reasons?

LANPHER: It's hard to generalize. There were some Sabras and many, many Israelis have relatives in the United States. It was a question of petitions from brothers and sisters. But there was also in the '50s and early '60s a lot of immigration to Israel out of Eastern Europe. To a certain extent, these people showed up in Israel and with the tough economic times, they couldn't get jobs, they couldn't sustain themselves. So they looked to relatives in the United States to petition for them and showed up in my office.

Q: Coming out of Eastern Europe, this must have complicated your life because of connections to communist movements in all these countries they came out of?

LANPHER: Yes, but these weren't political types for the most part. I don't recall any great problem with that. I had a very good staff of Israelis that did most of the filling out of background check forms and fingerprinting. The day I showed up first thing in the morning after I arrived at night, I walked into the embassy and I guess I was told I was going to be the immigrant visa officer. The consul general took me down to the section and introduced me to my chief assistant, Mrs. Hoffman. Mrs. Hoffman's first question to me was, "What year were you born?" I said, "1942." She said, "I went to work for the U.S. government in 1938." She put me right in my place. It was quite a stunning thing when I realized what she was doing. She was very good.

Q: You said Cliff English was running the consular section. How did you find him? He was one of the old line consular officers.

LANPHER: He was a character. He let the consular section pretty much run itself. He was there. He was sort of a curmudgeon type. For some reason, he took a shine to me. That's probably because the chief of the visa section was a woman officer that he didn't get along with.

Q: Who was that?

LANPHER: A woman named Sarah Andren. But she and Cliff didn't get along very well. But he kind of liked me. He was in his late 50s. I guess he probably looked at me as sort of the son he always wished he had and never had. He had a daughter and not a terribly happy marriage. So, he'd disappear for the afternoon and go play golf at Israel's only golf course. I think it was after the Six Day War that he used to call me up – I was no longer in the consular section – and say, "What are you doing this afternoon?" Usually this was a weekend. I'd say, "Nothing." He'd say, "Well, let's go out and shoot some birds on the green line." So, we'd go partridge hunting out on the green line, the old demarcation line between Israel and Jordan that disappeared in the war. It was kind of a difficult area. The birds knew it was the safest place to be because of the minefields out there. Cliff thought he knew where most of the minefields were, so we'd go out and shoot birds. Cliff had an old friend, an Israeli... I think Cliff had been in Haifa in 1948 at our consulate. It was sort of a homecoming for him to be consul general in '67. The old friend was Moshe Dyan. They were very close friends. Cliff wasn't a political officer. This wasn't an intelligence relationship. They were just close friends. After Cliff and I'd shoot a bunch of partridges, we'd go over to Moshe's house. Moshe loved partridges, so we'd give him some of our partridges and sit down and have a cold beer with him. An interesting anecdote.

Q: Did you and your wife find yourselves pretty well absorbed into Israeli society?

LANPHER: Very much so. We had quite a social life. We lived in a rented house in a suburb just north of Tel Aviv. We had Israeli neighbors. We weren't in any sort of U.S. compound. We had friends in the embassy and we had friends in the Israeli community. So, that worked very well. We were very active socially. We were in our mid-20s, and had a heck of a good time. We traveled a lot around Israel. We didn't have any children at that time. Weekends, I remember going over to the old city of Jerusalem before the war and going through the Mandelbaum Gate and driving with a couple we knew from our consulate in Jerusalem down to Aqaba and Petra, spending the weekend in Petra, sleeping in a cave hotel down there. This was all before the Six Day War. We had a lot of fun. You could go to the Galilee for the day. You could go to Nazareth. There was plenty to see and do in Israel.

Q: I'm told that it was both fun and exhausting to be in Israel. The political discussions and the arguments were really exhausting but interesting.

LANPHER: I found that to be very, very true. It's one of those places where everybody talked about the problem all the time. You couldn't go out to a dinner or have a social event without the problem being on everybody's lips.

Q: And the problem being...

LANPHER: Arab-Israeli. If you were an American embassy official, which I was, junior as I was, but later on I was the ambassador's special assistant, so I was even more targeted, whether it was official or private Israelis, they wanted to be assured of at least 150% U.S. support. 100% wouldn't do. It was draining at times. You just couldn't ever relax. You were always on show.

Q: Was it possible or even thinkable at the time to talk about the Palestinians having rights? Those were the days of Golda Meir, weren't they?

LANPHER: The prime minister was Levi Eshkol. When he died in 1968, she replaced him.

Q: Were Palestinians considered a separate people or were they something over in Jordan?

LANPHER: There were a lot of Israeli Arabs, but they were strictly second class citizens within Israel. There was no talk about letting refugees back in. To be an Israeli Arab was not a treat. There wasn't much concern for them among the Israelis that I talked to. This was a Jewish state and that's the way it was going to be. The Embassy did maintain good contacts with the Arab community.

Q: We were going through a real civil rights revolution in the United States during this time. Part of this time, I was in Yugoslavia. I couldn't help beginning to relate the problem of what now is known as the Kosovars to the blacks in the United States. I was told, "These Kosovars don't work much and they like to eat watermelon and they like to dance." I said, "You know, we've had those too." You were beginning to look at our own country and see it in others. Was this something that we were looking at?

LANPHER: Not really. These were the days before human rights reports. Our preoccupation, rightly or wrongly, was with the security situation. The Israeli preoccupation was with their neighbors. They weren't introspective internally. At the same time, to put it bluntly, there was sort of a 51st state aspect of serving in Israel because Israel was so political in the U.S. At the same time, at home, we were preoccupied not only with civil rights but also the Vietnam War. It really wasn't a focus. Subconsciously, we all knew that Palestinians were treated badly by Israelis, but then you'd turn on Arab radio stations in the Middle East or your shortwave radio and you'd listen to some of the most horrific language you've ever heard spilling out of Cairo, out of Damascus, even Beirut and Amman. The preoccupation was external.

Q: Was Nasser considered the boogeyman?

LANPHER: I guess so. Going beyond where we are now, from about May 1967 onward, about Israeli independence day, the Arabs managed to whip themselves in a real frenzy and that led to war. They were certainly never trusted by the Israelis. I think the Israelis always felt they had a relationship – and in fact, they did – with Hussein over in Jordan. But with Nasser, I don't think so.

Q: You moved from the consular section when?

LANPHER: I was still in the consular section for the Six Day War, which was interesting.

Q: Why don't we talk about the Six Day War?

LANPHER: As things heated up and the rhetoric started flowing out of the Arabs and they blockaded the Straits of Tiran, there was definitely an increasing prospect of war. The last week of May the U.S. government put out a warning to American citizens to not travel to Israel and, if you're there, get out. Cliff English put me in charge of the evacuation of American citizens, including repatriation loans. I worked my butt off for 10 days and we got a lot of American citizens out of the country between then and the fifth of June.

Q: Were there a lot of Israelis getting out? After the Yom Kippur War, there was a lot of talk about all the religious getting the hell out.

LANPHER: I saw a lot of that. Of course, you have a lot of people in Israel that are dual citizens. So, I had people lined up outside my office and down the block outside the embassy. I had people with side curls and I had people that were clean shaven. These were only American citizens. They may have been Israeli citizens as well, but I was only doing American citizens.

Q: Was there a sense of panic?

LANPHER: I wouldn't call it panic. I would call it anxiety. People were being bombarded by propaganda out of the Arab radio stations and it was pretty bellicose. If you looked at the numbers in terms of the forces arrayed against Israel in 1967, manpower, airplanes, tanks, whatever, Israel was vastly outnumbered. There was always the question of whether Israel could fight a more than one front war. One has to remember that in 1967 Israel didn't have any equipment in its military inventory from the U.S. It was mainly French. The only thing U.S. was second hand reconditioned World War II era Sherman tanks and armored personnel carriers (half tracks) that Israel had bought surplus and reconditioned. The Israeli air force, aside from a couple of Cessna spotter planes and a couple of old DC-3 transports, was almost entirely French.

Q: Was the embassy saying something was going to happen?

LANPHER: Progressively we saw very clearly that this thing was getting worse and worse and worse. We also realized that consideration was being given to a preemptive strike. We, together with Washington, got all our dependents out about a week before the war. My wife was evacuated to Rome. All our other Middle East posts were evacuated to places like Athens and Rome. It was clear the war was coming. The intensity of the diplomacy - and I wasn't directly involved, but I was certainly well informed about it. I learned a lot more about it subsequently. You had the Israeli foreign minister, Abba Eban, traveling to Paris, London, and Washington. You had Lyndon Johnson deeply involved, as well as Dean Rusk, then Secretary of State. Despite Vietnam, this was a priority. There was also the Soviet angle, the Soviets with Egypt and Syria. So, it was a pretty fraught time diplomatically. But in the event, I was in the embassy on a Sunday night, the fourth of June, and the Israelis had lulled people into thinking things were cooling off a little bit by giving well-publicized leave to their soldiers at the weekend. But as I drove home from work about 10:00 on Sunday night, I saw troops by the side of the road getting picked up by cars, busses, everything. They were remobilizing in a hurry. I called the political officer when I got home and the defense attaché and said, "They're getting picked up. I think it's tomorrow morning." As I drove to work the next morning at about 7:00-7:30, down the coastal road from where I lived towards Tel Aviv, you could look out over the ocean and see the Israeli air force about 12 feet off the ocean headed for Egypt. They flew in under Egyptian radar, caught the Egyptians with their pants down about 7:45 Egypt time in the morning. They knocked out 18 Egyptian airfields in the first strike.

Q: What were you doing since you were at war?

LANPHER: I still was looking after American citizens. There was no transport in or out. Civil aviation was closed down for the war. So, it was largely handholding and doing whatever anybody else in the embassy wanted me to do. The first night of the Six Day War, a Monday night, I was the embassy duty officer. Of course, we were all in the embassy. The air raid sirens went off. The Ambassador and DCM and everybody went down to the third basement, the garage underneath our embassy. Although there wasn't an air raid, there was artillery shelling going on from the Latrun salient, about 12 miles away from Tel Aviv in Jordanian territory. So, everybody else in the embassy got to go down to the basement. I had to go up to the roof of the embassy and sit with a special communications team that we had brought in from Germany, a backup or high speed communications team, a U.S. Army unit. There were four or five of us on the roof listening to U.S. supplied artillery shells going over the roof of the embassy. Luckily, they missed the embassy. But the embassy was right on the beach, the waterfront, and they were going over the roof and into the sea.

Q: Did you find that all of you were seeing this as a just war?

LANPHER: I think we all thought it was probably a just war in the sense that Israel didn't really have much of an alternative. I don't think we spent a lot of time pondering that question. We were all too busy. Our ambassador, Ambassador Barbour, was probably the most plugged in American ambassador there ever was. When the first air strike went off on Monday morning, he was invited to the cabinet room and sat with the rest of the cabinet for a briefing on it. He was like the 21st member of the cabinet. That was the nature of the relationship. So, we were very well informed. With the Egyptian air force out of action, the war was essentially won in the first hour. The rest of it was on the ground as the Israelis blitzed with their tank force through Gaza and into the northern Sinai. I was one of the first Americans down into the northern Sinai after the war. The devastation of the "blitzkrieg" was quite incredible.

Q: What was the impression of the two armies that you were getting from the attachés, the Egyptian and the Israeli armies?

LANPHER: The Israeli army and the Israeli air force were exceedingly well trained and maintained their equipment well. They were much smaller, but man for man probably 10 times as effective. Our attachés thought they were damned good, but you never know until you're tested. Looking ahead, after the war... At that time, the biggest tank battle ever fought in the world was done in the central Sinai, over 1,000 tanks engaged. It was near the Mitla Pass.

As soon as the war was over, within days, everybody in the U.S. Army and Air Force wanted to come out to Tel Aviv and debrief and get the story on the war, which was seen by our people as just incredible. The tank tactics and the air tactics, our experts and intelligence people wanted to get in very early. Our people wanted to get into the Sinai and wanted the Israelis to give us Egyptian surface to air missiles, which were Russian, the same things that the Vietnamese were using against us in Vietnam. There were a lot of exchanges after the war. I'll never forget a U.S. Air Force team coming out – I guess I went with them – for debriefing the Israeli Air Force. By this time, I was in the political section doing a lot of handholding of visitors. I went out with this Air Force team to one of the big Israeli air force bases. The commander gave a briefing and our guys asked a lot of questions. One of our guys said, "You just said you were getting six or seven sorties a day out of your aircraft. That's impossible. We can't do that." The Israeli said, "Well, that's what we did. We've got excellent ground crews and we can turn a plane around in X minutes and get it fully armed, fueled, and everything." Our guys just were astounded and they challenged the Israelis, saying, "It can't be done." So, the Israeli commander trotted out a ground crew, a plane, and demonstrated just how they did it and how fast they could do it. Our Air Force people still didn't believe it. They said, "Look, we have a demonstration crew at our place and we do dog and pony shows. We have a prize crew that can do this." The Israeli commander called out all the ground crews and said, “You pick as many of these as you want. They can all do it.” Our guys finally believed him. But it was quite an incredible military performance in the eyes of our professionals. When you see the Golan Heights and how the Israelis went up the Golan Heights and took the Syrians on with their World War II Sherman tanks, it’s quite incredible.

Q: Was the entry of Jordan into the war and the occupation of the West Bank considered to be a temporary thing?

LANPHER: My recollection is not perfect. The Israelis did not expect Jordan would enter the war. I don’t think they wanted Jordan to enter the war at least in the military sense. One front with Egypt was enough. But they were prepared for the contingency of Jordan entering the war. I think they were disappointed in King Hussein, who got caught up in the momentum or whatever it was of the Arab rhetoric. At that point, the Israelis said, “Okay, he wants to play. We’ll take him out, too.” So, they took the Old City and the West Bank. But I don’t think it was part of their plan. I think they had a contingency. Certainly they had troops deployed on the green line and in Jerusalem, but their focus was Egypt.

Q: We’ll talk about Barbour in the next session. Let’s talk about the war right now. Did you feel pressure from American Jews from the United States who wanted to get where the action was?

LANPHER: In the weeks before the war, a number of American Jews did travel to Israel to volunteer. But once the war started, there was no way they could get there. There was no civil aviation for that six days and for weeks afterward. It was only gradually restored in the weeks following the war. But what the American Jewish community certainly did, and the world Jewish community, was to finance the war. The biggest percentage donors were from the South African Jewish community. They raised money and poured it into Israel. The war was a very expensive undertaking and was basically financed by gifts from the world Jewish community here in North America and South Africa.

Q: Prior to the Six Day War, did you get involved with American Jews coming to Israel on tours or this sort of thing?

LANPHER: Oh, yes, before and after the war. In fact, more after the war than before the war. There was a tremendous amount of Jewish tourism to Israel. Everybody that was ever a duty officer at the embassy said you’d have Jewish tourists dying, for instance, having a heart attack in the Hilton Hotel in Tel Aviv. So, you came into contact with American tourists all the time in our consular section. I did a stint in Citizens Services or filled in for somebody and I had an irate American Jewish tourist come in and complain to me that for all these years he had been donating money to buy trees for forests in Israel, part of Israel’s reforestation project. He said, “I came all the way out here to see my trees and nobody can show me where my trees are with my name on it. I want you, my government, to make them put my name on my trees.” I said, “We can’t help you.”

Q: Did you get involved with the religious side of the Israeli society? I’m thinking of the more orthodox.

LANPHER: Yes. Anecdotally, before the Six Day War, if you wanted to get to the Mandelbaum Gate and go across on Saturday, you had to drive through the religious quarter of Jerusalem and you had to drive very fast and very quietly or you'd get stoned by the religious kids trying to enforce the no driving on Saturday law. I went to seders, bar mitzvahs, and all the Jewish holidays with my neighbors. I went to weddings, funerals, circumcisions. I was exposed to all that. But most of my personal friends were not the ultra orthodox. The ultra orthodox, the fellows with the side curls and the black hats and the beards were there and had a political presence. A lot of them were American citizens from Brooklyn, ultra Hasidic. Believe it or not, I had friends in the Israeli internal security service, the Shinbet, who told me the biggest crooks in Israel were the religious guys. They'd tell me, "Just because the guy looks religious doesn't mean he's a decent human being. There are some real crooks there." I couldn't prove it.

Q: Was this a society where the ultra orthodox was set off to one side, one that was looked down upon?

LANPHER: I don't think they were looked down upon. Some people looked down on them and thought they were nuts, but they were definitely an influential minority. The people that ran Israel at least when I was there were primarily secular Jews of Eastern European origin who were much more into socialism and Zionism than they were into religion. They'd all celebrate seders. They didn't forsake their religion, but they were largely secular.

Q: Was there any feeling that this European socialism, which was part of the Labour Party's mandate, didn't work very well?

LANPHER: No. At that time, mid-'60s, the state of Israel was less than 20 years old as a state. It had grown up going back into the previous century with small Jewish settlements, agricultural settlements, kibbutzes. That was the image of Israel. Just as we talk about our pioneers in our Conestoga wagons and the trek West and our homesteaders, there was much of that spirit in Israel. That was the root of Israel. So, when I say in retrospect that the model didn't work, I can say - I haven't been back to Israel since 1969 when I left - but everybody tells me the kibbutzes are still there but they've moved off the socialist model. Israel is doing a lot better than a lot of other places. There was a romanticism about the kibbutz. It was probably the right thing at the time they were established.

Q: It caught the spirit and got people engaged.

LANPHER: Yes: remember, the kibbutzes were set up, a lot of them, back in the British mandate period, the Ottoman Empire era. The kibbutzes were small outposts of Jewish civilization, self-sufficient, agriculturally based. Interesting.

Today is July 1, 2002. You were in Israel from when to when?

LANPHER: From January 1967 until July 1969.

Q: You started on the Six Day War. Now why don't we talk about the Liberty and your take on that.

LANPHER: During the Six Day War, which went from Monday, June 5, to Saturday, June 11, it was very hectic in Israel and throughout the Middle East. There was a heck of a war on three fronts. As part of our monitoring of that war, and I was not aware of it at the time, the National Security Agency had sent an eavesdropping ship to the Mediterranean that was apparently positioned very close to the Israeli forces in the northern Sinai to eavesdrop presumably on the communications during the course of the war as part of our overall monitoring effort. On the Thursday of the Six Day War, that ship, which was close to the Israeli coast, within eyesight, came under attack by Israeli forces - air force and navy. Before I left the embassy that afternoon, I had heard about this attack on this ship. I don't think anybody in our embassy was aware that that ship was in the area. But we certainly heard about it as soon as the attack had taken place. The ship wasn't sunk and it managed to limp off but there were heavy casualties, something in the neighborhood of 16-20 dead. When I got home to my house in the Israeli suburb north of Tel Aviv that evening, and my wife wasn't there because she had been evacuated, my neighbor, Oded Vered, came over to my house and said, "I need to talk to you. Something terrible has happened." He proceeded to tell me that he, as an Israeli naval reservist, had commanded one of the motor torpedo boats that attacked this ship, the Liberty - he didn't even know the name of it and I didn't know the name of it at the time - along the coast that afternoon. He told me that as they approached the ship, the ship was not flying any flag and that there was no identification on it indicating that it was a U.S. ship or a U.S. naval ship and that he as commander of his motor torpedo boat had gotten on the signal lamps and flashed repeatedly the international signal asking "what ship where found." There is some sort of international code about all these things. They never got a response from the ship and they proceeded to attack it with, I guess, torpedoes and machine guns. He was very distraught about this because they subsequently discovered that it was an American ship. But the damage had been done. After he left, I immediately contacted our assistant naval attaché, Lieutenant Commander Allan Wile, who later worked for the State Department in INR, and Captain Ernie Castle, our naval attaché. They were very interested in the information that I had gotten from this fellow and gave me a lot of questions to go back and ask him further. By the time I was able to talk to him the next day, he had obviously been told by his commanders to say nothing. The lid had gone on. There was no more discussion. I had talked to him right after the incident, as soon as he got home, and he had been so upset by this whole thing that he had blurted this out to me. But then the lid went on and he would never talk to me again about it. We remained good friends, traveled around Israel together, but that was it.

Q: What was the attitude within the embassy?

LANPHER: People in the embassy had been unaware that the ship was in the area and were incredulous but I think the consensus as best I recall was that this was a tragic accident in the heat of the war. You had war going on on three fronts. Everybody was tired after three or four days of the war. The Israeli navy had not had an appreciable role in the war. Everybody wanted to be a part of it. There was overeagerness, trigger happiness, whatever. But accidents do happen in war. Witness, recently two of our planes managed to kill a bunch of Canadians in Afghanistan.

Q: On a global commander level, you've got problems.

LANPHER: Yes. So that's my take on it. Subsequently, I learned from our naval attaché that the ship had in fact been sent a message some days earlier by their headquarters, NSA, to get the heck out of the area, move away from the coast, get out of the war zone. According to him, the message was never received by the ship because it was missent in our archaic telecommunications system to the American embassy in Seoul, Korea. So, I think there was plenty of blame. It was certainly sad that so many people were killed, but I see no logical reason for the Israelis to go out in the midst of a war with three countries, Jordan, Syria, and Egypt, and shoot up a ship belonging to its prime backer.

Q: Was there a point when the Jordanians and the Syrians came in? Were there real concerns that things would go bad for Israel?

LANPHER: Not really. There was great apprehension before the war started that things would go bad for Israel. They were clearly outnumbered and outgunned by any order of battle information – number of tanks, planes, etc. The idea of a three front war was something that had everybody worried. We were worried ourselves because we had evacuated all our dependents. We told American citizens to get out of Israel a week or 10 days before the war started. But in many respects, the war was over in the first hour when the Israelis took out the Egyptian air force and sent their tank columns into Gaza and into the Sinai. That was a rout. That was an unbelievable rout. The Israelis were just very, very good. Tragically, the Jordanians and the Syrians got sucked into this, but by the time they got sucked into it through their own propaganda and beliefs, the Egyptians had been pretty thoroughly trashed and the Israelis were on the Canal in no time. There were some big battles in the central Sinai. But the Israelis were able to shift a lot of forces to the Jordanian and Syrian front in the latter days of the war, so it wasn't really a three front war 100% from day one.

Q: What were you doing during the war?

LANPHER: In the prewar period and also during the war, I was doing a lot of handholding of American citizens, acting as duty officer, backup political officer. I was a junior officer, a jack of all trades. As it turned out, as soon as the war was over, I was assigned liaison responsibilities for all the UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine, all the refugee camps in Gaza. Where the liaison had always been with our embassy in Cairo up to the Six Day War, we had to take it over in Tel Aviv, so I did a lot of that work. I was the first American into the newly occupied territories under those auspices.

Q: At the time, as the Israelis rolled into the West Bank and into Gaza, was it felt that they were going to stay? Was there any concern about their staying? What was the feeling in the embassy?

LANPHER: We simply didn't know. Of course, as the war went on, and it was only a six day war, but in its aftermath, the focus shifted to New York, Security Council resolutions, and Jarring missions. We were also involved in the year after the war in trying to broker secret peace negotiations between Israel and Jordan. We were involved in peacemaking efforts. I don't recall whether we thought the Israelis would stay on. The Israelis lost over 600 dead in the Six Day War. At that time the country had about 2.5 million people. That was a terrible amount of casualties for them to take in a small country. So, there were very strong feelings certainly on the Israeli side that they weren't going to give up anything that they had taken except in return for real peace. They were very adamant about that. On the eve of the Six Day War, at its narrowest point, the Jordanians were within 17 miles of Tel Aviv on the coast. That doesn't give people a lot of sense of security if you're in artillery range of somebody who says they want to kill you and take you over. From the Israeli perspective, I think they had a case. But I don't recall whether we had any absolute policy on the Israelis getting out of that territory.

Q: What about the Arabs within Israel? The Israelis were watching them. Were we watching them?

LANPHER: My recollection is that it was pretty quiescent. They weren't any sort of fifth column. They didn't do any sabotage during or after the war.

Q: Were you working with Barbour at that point?

LANPHER: I saw quite a lot of him during the war period because I was duty officer and running messages back and forth to his residence. I only went to work for Barbour as his staff aide about the end of 1967. I worked for him for about a year and a half.

Q: Let's talk about our relations with the consulate general in Jerusalem before, during, and after the war. Was there an antagonism there? What were you picking up?

LANPHER: I'm not sure "antagonism" is the right word, but there was forever a tension between the embassy in Tel Aviv and the Consulate General in Jerusalem, which did not report to Washington through the embassy in Tel Aviv. As far as the Israelis were concerned, Jerusalem was their capital and the Embassy should have been there. The Israelis perceived the Consulate in Jerusalem as an anomaly and one where the staff spent a lot of time with the Arabs, avoided the government of Israel, and had offices on both sides of the city which was divided before the war. Some of our staff assigned to Jerusalem at the time and historically had been very much pro-Arab, which really got under the Israeli skin. The Israelis were always after Walworth Barbour to move the embassy to Jerusalem. Of course, he didn't. But they even offered to build him a golf course near Jerusalem so that he could indulge his golf. He used to play at Caesaria on the coast, the only golf course in Israel at the time. There was always a tension.

Q: During the war, did that come up at all?

LANPHER: I think everybody was keeping their heads down because there was a lot of shooting around the city of Jerusalem and in the area where our consulate was located on the Arab side, the eastern side, which was very close to the Mandelbaum Gate, maybe 100 yards away. In fact, the consulate took some hits.

Q: We'll come back to that. Why don't we talk now about some of the immediate threats that you were perceiving both in Israel and also our embassy at the end of this war? Was it seen as a time of great triumph?

LANPHER: I think there was great relief that the war was over, that the shooting had stopped.

We had all been aware of our colleagues in the Arab world who had very hairy experiences of the evacuations of Alexandria, Cairo, Aleppo, Damascus, people going out the back of buildings on ropes getting rope burns on their hands, people as far away as Libya that barely survived. There was certainly a real sense of relief that it was over. I wouldn't have called the embassy in Tel Aviv pro-Israel in that sense. But there was a certain sense of relief that if you're going to be in a war, it's probably better to be on the winning side.

Q: Oh, yes. You can't help but, wherever you are, identify with the country, particularly in times of tension.

LANPHER: Yes. And we had all, obviously in the days and couple of weeks preceding the war, been tuning into the Arab broadcasting services, whether it was the Royal Hashemite Broadcasting Service or Radio Cairo or Radio Damascus, and listened to the vitriolic propaganda coming out, "We're going to shove Israel into the sea and all the Israelis will die." So, there was psychologically very much a sense of relief that that hadn't happened to us or to the Israelis.

Q: After the war was over in the immediate weeks and months, do you recall people within the embassy and maybe with your Israeli friends going through a feeling of "now what?"

LANPHER: I don't recall a lot. There was heavy focus on UN resolutions in New York and where do we go from here. But I don't think anybody had a plan at least in any immediate sense because nobody anticipated the war until a couple of weeks before the war and nobody had a plan for what you'd do if you occupied all this territory. The Israelis, if they had wanted to, could have gone to Cairo during the Six Day War. They could have crossed the Canal. The Egyptian army had evaporated. The Egyptian air force was finished. But what do you do when you occupy that much territory? There was that question. I think we raised it with the Israelis during the war itself, saying, "Hey, don't go to Cairo. Don't go to Damascus. What are you going to do? How do you administer it?" So they stopped at the Canal. They were stopped by President Johnson when they had taken the Golan Heights and they were poised to go down the road to Damascus. They could have been there like a knife through butter. Everybody had run off. So yes, they didn't have a plan for what was next. It sort of evolved. They were in place and nobody was talking to them. Nobody was going to make peace. We made great efforts, especially with the Jordanians in the year or so after the war, a special NODIS series of messages that I was privy to, trying to sort out something between the Jordanians and the Israelis. Golda Meir was heavily involved. She was foreign minister before she became prime minister. She'd travel incognito. Moshe Dayan and others were involved. We certainly encouraged these efforts and brokered and transmitted messages back and forth between the two countries. We were a post office.

Q: Did you sense a change in our relations with Israel?

LANPHER: That evolved. Before the Six Day War, we had no military supply relationship with Israel at all. In the immediate aftermath of the war, we were very eager to get our hands on a lot of the equipment that the Israelis had captured, Russian equipment that was of great interest to our intelligence community and our military because it was the same sort of equipment that the North Vietnamese were using against our forces in Vietnam. So, we were very eager to get a hold of this. The Israelis were willing to share it with us, but they extracted a price, things like sidewinder missiles. For weeks and months after the war, we were sending in transport aircraft to pick up SAM missiles that the Israeli's had captured. We flew them back to the U.S. and our intelligence people exploited this trove. Our army and air force in particular flocked to Israel to learn the lessons of the Six Day War, things like tank tactics. The biggest tank battle in the history of the world was fought in the central Sinai. The Israeli tactics were brilliant and our people wanted to talk to them about it. But we first got into a real military supply relationship the following year, 1968, when we negotiated the sale to Israel of combat aircraft. It was a subsonic A4 Skyhawk. The Skyhawk had originally been a carrier ground attack plane. The Israelis were very happy with this deal. We sent Israelis to the States to train. I can't recall exactly how long it took before the first A4s arrived. This relationship exists to this day.

Q: What about your contact with the Israelis, your neighbors? Did you sense a change in them?

LANPHER: Yes. Between January '67 and March or April, I found Israel quite a depressing place. There was an economic recession. People were leaving the country. People were despondent. They were questioning whether the country had a future. After the Six Day War, they were totally energized. They felt that they were more secure. The economy started to turn around. They had been on the winning side and it gave a great boost to national morale. It was a much more positive atmosphere. Also, tourism started to come back a couple of months after the Six Day War. The world Jewish community had poured a lot of money into Israel, and basically paid for the war.

Q: Particularly the American Jewish community, did you find many coming from the U.S. to bask in the spirit?

LANPHER: It wasn't so much basking, but there was a great spirit of solidarity. They had sent money. There was a handful of volunteers who had come out from the U.S. in the weeks before the war just as the American Field Service had gone to France in World War I in advance of the U.S. getting into the war. My father had been one of those. There was that sort of solidarity and "this was the right thing." But it wasn't to gloat.

Q: In this period, what were you doing until you took over the staff aide job?

LANPHER: I worked in the political section for the political counselor, Heywood Stackhouse, an excellent officer. I learned a lot about political reporting. I had a particular brief as a junior political officer together with my refugee hat. I did a lot of reporting on the occupied territories. I traveled to the Golan Heights, to Gaza, to the West Bank quite a lot and did a lot of political reporting in a way that our officers from the consulate in Jerusalem could not because of the way the Israelis felt about them. Being from the embassy in Tel Aviv, I had easier access.

Q: Did you sort of coordinate?

LANPHER: I coordinated informally with our consulate in Jerusalem. But our consulate in Jerusalem basically had a brief only for Jerusalem and the West Bank. They didn't have any historic brief for the Golan Heights or for Gaza for that matter.

One of the other things I did, and it was rather curious but it's an interesting sort of aside; one of the responsibilities of embassies everywhere is to ensure that delivery of veterans and Social Security checks. Several weeks after the war was over and I was in the political section and one of my beats was the Golan Heights, we got a message from some Druze villagers that they were missing their Social Security and veterans checks that they had always gotten from our embassy in Damascus. This message came to us via the Israeli defense forces; occupation forces up there. We looked into it and communicated with our embassy in Damascus and Washington. Sure enough, there were a handful of recipients, World War I veterans, up there in a village called Magdal Champs, on the slopes of Mount Hermon. So, after some back and forth with Washington and Damascus and the Veterans Administration and Social Security Administration, we actually got some checks to deliver to these veterans. I was anointed because it was my territory to go up and deliver them. So, I had to work it out with the Israeli defense forces. I went in on half track with a large security detail. I was greeted like royalty in this little village high up on the slopes of Mount Hermon. They killed a sheep and I was treated to the sheep's eye. Since I did the first one so well, they gave me a second. That was a very great honor for a 24 or 25 year old junior Foreign Service officer.

Q: As you were going around... Let's take Gaza first. What were you seeing there? Was Gaza crowded at that time?

LANPHER: It was very crowded and very depressing. When I first went there in the days immediately after the war, the carnage, the wrecked tanks and vehicles and bodies, and shell holes and everything, was pretty bad. There is no such thing as a good refugee camp and Gaza was just one big refugee camp. Certainly the images you see today on the television, how packed and shabby the place is, it wasn't quite as big because more people were born in the last 30-odd years. But it was a pretty depressing place. People without a future, no economy, living on the dole. Very sad.

Q: Was there any feeling in the political section and the embassy of, "Oh, my God. Why did the United States..." Did you see this as a place of interest or was this just a depressing adjunct to your work?

LANPHER: I don't think I ever thought about it that way. This is the hand we were dealt. If it hadn't been for the war and before the war, officers from Cairo would come over periodically and visit the Gaza Strip, part of their oversight... They'd visit Rafah and other places in the northern Sinai. It was kind of a romantic journey out of Cairo. But, no, I never thought about it that way.

Q: As a political officer, who were you contacting?

LANPHER: I was contacting officials, and trying to gauge the mood of people in the occupied territories, Palestinians. There weren't any Syrians to talk to on the Golan Heights because they had all fled towards Damascus. There was no population left up there except these Druze villagers. In the West Bank, basically the population didn't flee to Jordan but stayed in the West Bank. For the Gazans or the refugees in Gaza, there was no place to go. So, there were people to talk to. And talking to UN officials, cease-fire monitoring officials from the UN Truce

Supervisory organization for Palestine. There were a lot of people to talk to. Particularly with the Jordanians, we were trying to gauge the mood of the West Bank population, which had always had tensions with Amman. But we tried to keep our fingers on the pulse of opinion there because we were trying to promote this Israeli-Jordanian dialogue after the war.

Q: Was there any talk about Palestinians per se? I am told Golda Meir would say, "There is no such thing as Palestinians." Were you getting any feel for this?

LANPHER: I really don't recall. I never heard her say that and I saw her quite a few times. In the early years after the war, there was no Palestinian Authority. There was no Yasser Arafat. There was no PLO. That all happened after I left Israel.

Q: So as you were talking to people, these were basically an unconnected people there with no...

LANPHER: To a certain extent. You'd talk to shopkeepers, but you'd also talk to the "Arab elites," the mayors of towns in the West Bank, whoever the senior people were in the social and business hierarchy.

Q: Was the hand of the Israeli occupation heavy at that point?

LANPHER: I think it was rather benign. The Israelis were preoccupied with securing the cease-fire lines. There were forces along the Syrian line on the Golan Heights. There were forces along the Jordan River in the valley. There were forces in the Sinai, but there was nothing to worry about down there. In terms of internal security, I remember some checkpoints going through and roadblocks where people would check your identification, ask you why you were going someplace. But I didn't find it oppressive the way it apparently is now.

Q: Prior to this occupation, there had been no basic connection between the population of the West Bank and Israel.

LANPHER: That's right. But there had been the old green line. Nobody crossed it. In fact, after the war, labor started coming over from the West Bank into Israel. An economist could probably argue that this supply of cheap labor led to the industrialization of Israel in a way that it had not known before. And they were contributing also to the economy of the West Bank in terms of wages.

Q: Prior to that, it had been stagnant almost on both sides.

LANPHER: Yes, certainly on the West Bank. Israel had seen its ups and downs, but the West Bank was an olive grove and remittance economy. A lot of West Bankers worked down in the Gulf and sent money home and built summer houses in the West Bank, Hebron, Ramallah, that sort of thing.

Q: Were you picking up any feelings towards Jordanians? We're not too far from the Black September of 1970. It was a different crew, but still, relations between the Bedouin and others, King Hussein, and the Palestinians weren't great. When the Jordanians had run that whole area, were you picking up things? Were local people saying, "Thank God those Jordanians are gone?"

LANPHER: No, but there was clearly a tension between the Palestinians and the East Bankers (we called them the East Bankers, the Bedouin Hashemite Kingdom). It was an unnatural act, Jordan. But I never heard anybody say, "Thank God we've been occupied by the Israelis." They were in limbo. Nobody likes to be in limbo. But from the Israeli perspective... And the reason they worked so hard at it, albeit unsuccessfully, in that period after the war, at achieving some sort of an accommodation with Jordan, is that the Israelis always kind of liked Jordan, always kind of liked King Hussein. Maybe "liked" is too strong a word, but they always believed that they could do business with Jordan and that Jordan was dragged into that war against its real will and that it was always caught in a bind within the Arab world for being moderate. So, I think there was at the official level in Israel and also on the street more sympathy for Jordan than for the Syrians and the Egyptians. And Jordan never constituted a genuine threat to Israel, whereas Syria and Egypt did.

Q: Did you get any impression of the Israeli leadership? What were you picking up on Moshe Dyan and Meir?

LANPHER: Lebi Eshkel, who had died in 1968, about March, was replaced by Golda Meir. But yes, I saw a great deal of the Israeli leadership. They were very open, accessible. When I was in the political section, I'd go off with the political counselor and see people like Yigal Alon, Shimon Peres. I first met the current prime minister, Sharon, at a dinner at the ambassador's house when he was the leading crossborder retaliation for the Israeli army. I used to see Moshe Dyan when I'd go with Cliff English, the consul general, to deliver birds we had shot to him and drink beer. They were amazingly successful. Golda Meir was an incredible character. She was a real presence. If she walked into a room, she was certainly not the world's glamour girl by any means, but she had a voice and a presence that was astounding. She walked into a room and you could hear her talking in a quiet voice on the other side of the room and you knew she was there. She was one of about six people I've met in my life that really had a presence. She was an extraordinary woman. She was very close to Walworth Barbour. Before she became Prime Minister, she and Wally, as she called him, had a warm personal relationship. She'd come down from Jerusalem and go to his house, just the two of them, for dinner. When I went in and told Barbour that I just had a call from Jerusalem saying Prime Minister Eshkol had died, he was very moved. He liked Eshkol and was very saddened by it. Then he asked me, "Gib, who do you think's going to be the new prime minister?" There were a lot of people who would be logically under consideration, people like Shimon Peres and Dayan, and several others. I said, "I think it's going to be Golda." He said, "Oh, no." I said, "I thought you liked Golda." He said, "I do like Golda, but I have a hard time dealing with women." I said, "What do you mean?" He said, "Sometimes when I've seen Golda, when she was foreign minister and I had to deliver a tough message, she cried and I don't know how to deal with that." But he was very fond of Golda and they worked well together. But he was a bit uncomfortable. It wasn't part of his life experience to deal with a woman.

Q: That's wonderful. Did you see any of their workings together?

LANPHER: I saw the results. I never sat in on a formal meeting. When he went off to see the Prime Minister when she was Prime Minister, he didn't take a notetaker. But I saw the results of their meetings. He was on the phone to her all the time.

Q: Some of these people don't take notetakers and don't really leave much behind, so you don't know what happened. Was he pretty good about reporting back?

LANPHER: Oh, absolutely. He had two ways of reporting. One, if it was during working hours, he would dictate to his secretary as soon as he came back in the old fashioned way. He would dictate quite long cables full of flavor. If it was at home in the evening – and we had lots of evening work because of operational things – Israeli raids into neighboring countries, retaliation for this or that – one night I made six round trips of 20 miles each way between the embassy and his residence with cables back and forth. He'd be sitting on his couch with a yellow pad and he'd write out his cables long hand. I'd take them in and the communicator would send them out, just type them on the teletype machines right off his draft. He was a good writer.

Q: On the personal side, what did your wife think of all this?

LANPHER: She was amused as any young woman of 24 or 25 years old... She was very flattered by Barbour. She thought he was old fashioned. She was always amused when he'd get on the phone and say to her, "Can you get yourself gussied up?" She could get herself gussied up. She was flattered. And he was a very warm, if shy and reserved, man. I had great affection for him. You always knew when it was May 1. He'd show up in the embassy because that was the beginning of summer, as he saw it, in his panama suit, his white shoes, and his straw hat.

But when I referred on the last tape to having learned a lot from him, let me share with you a couple of things. During the Six Day War, when the Israelis got to the Suez Canal and the Gulf of Suez and stopped, they didn't stop altogether. There was an American offshore oil rig working in the Gulf of Suez pumping oil. I believe it was owned by Amoco. It was an Egyptian concession area, quite close to the coast of the Sinai south of the Canal. The Israelis occupied that oil rig and started to pump the oil because Israel needed oil. Well, it took a while, but Amoco came into the State Department eventually and protested this because they weren't getting the revenue anymore. The State Department sent Barbour a cable saying, "The Israelis are clearly in contradiction to international law and we're in the process of preparing a legal brief which we in due course will present to the Israelis." Barbour sent a cable back saying, "That's not the way to go with the Israelis. If we want them off that oil rig and it returned to Amoco, we do it politically. You give me instructions to go in and tell them to give it up. Don't file a legal brief." Well, I didn't question his judgment on this, but the State Department said, "No, we've got a solid legal case. We're going to do it." So, eventually they called the Israelis in Washington and gave them this legal brief. The Israelis accepted it and said, "We'll be back to you." Within a matter of days, they had a photograph of their soldiers on the rig, dated on the photograph, before the end of the war, before the cease-fire went into effect. We had no legal case against them. They sent a very chagrined cable out from Washington back to Barbour. I said, "What do you think of this?" He said, "It's what I always say. If you have an important issue in diplomacy, don't let the lawyers anywhere near it." I said, "Why not?" He said, "The other guy's lawyers are always better than ours. If you want results, you go in at a political level." I learned that lesson and it's one that stuck with me.

Another thing mightily irritated him. He was very much a bilateral diplomat, had great skepticism about the utility of the United Nations. He recognized that the United Nations was important and served our purposes sometimes. But he was very frustrated by the amount of time that was spent in New York on resolutions of this and that. His observation to me, which stuck with me, was, "You never want to go work up there in New York." He was sort of a father figure. I said, "Why not?" He said, "Well, you've been watching all this stuff going on. Those people that work up there in New York at the end of the day, all they care about is "resolving" something. They don't care what they resolute, but they want to resolute something, not solve something. Any important issue you keep out of their hands and do it bilateral." I learned those two lessons. There is a lot of wisdom in that.

Q: Oh, yes. Did you get a feel while you were working with him about his relations with the consulate general in Jerusalem?

LANPHER: To be perfectly frank, Jerusalem was a burr under his saddle. He generally ignored Jerusalem. He could be very imperious. He didn't let Jerusalem bother him. He basically thought they were inconsequential.

Q: Did he ever in your presence talk about the reporting about our ambassadors in the Arab world? Did he see himself as "us versus them?"

LANPHER: No. He had a very polite and very professional dialogue in cables. They'd make an argument. He'd argue back. He had no animosity. He regarded them as professionals. He didn't think they were right a whole lot of the time. But he was absolutely thoroughly professional. As you mentioned reporting, he knew Israel so well and he knew the U.S.-Israeli politics so well that he kind of drove his political section crazy in that he wouldn't let them report political gossip, who was doing what to whom in Israeli politics. He valued his relationships in Israel and he had his own personal relationships everywhere. He didn't want a lot of cables going back to Washington reporting political chit chat. "Those cables always leak back in Washington. My name is on the bottom of it. They get back to the Israelis one way or another." He would share with his political counselor after he had had a dinner party or something like that, if he had heard something interesting. He would sit down with his political counselor and give him chapter and verse, including all the gossip, but he wouldn't let the political counselor report it. He said, "What use is reporting it? It's only a liability out there." This was kind of astute.

Q: Knowing how the system works, it's the sort of thing that we end up as... Political reporters love to get this but it doesn't go anywhere and it can hurt your relations.

LANPHER: Exactly, and he saw this perfectly. He let the political section report all sorts of stuff out there on the occupied territories and moods in Israel and polls and press and everything like that. But when it came to the juicy political gossip, he would share it with them and he thought they needed it for background to put things in perspective, but don't put it back to Washington. He also had because of his techphobia a great concern about his telegrams, especially his NODIS telegrams somehow winding up "in the Bureau of Fisheries."

Q: Speaking of gossip, Moshe Dayan was a figure larger than life. Were you picking up much about him?

LANPHER: Oh, yes. There was always gossip about Moshe Dayan and Moshe Dayan being a womanizer. We kept that out of the reporting. But quite a few people, including the ambassador, had a good relationship with him. Moshe Dyan was a very interesting character. I think he was too loose a cannon for being anything more than Minister of Defense. But he did a good job.

Q: There was no concern about him becoming a man on horseback?

LANPHER: Not that I can recall. It was up to the Israeli political system to use his talents where they were best applied. But he wasn't out of the old hardcore labor movement, the Labor Party, and I don't think there was ever any serious consideration given to him as Prime Minister.

Q: From Barbour's perspective, did the Likud raise any blips on our radar? Did he do anything with them?

LANPHER: He would talk to everybody in Israel. He'd invite orthodox and religious types to receptions at his house. But you have to remember, going back to the '60s, the Labor Party was the Labor Party and they ran Israel and there had never been an opposition party that was the government party. The politics of Israel were the politics of the Labor Party for the most part. Sure, there were splits but always within the Labor Party as between the Ashkenazis and the Sephardic Jews, Jews from North Africa, Iraq, and Yemen. It was politics within the Labor Party.

Q: Speaking of the wide dispersal of the Jews in the world, particularly after the war, did you spend a lot of time arranging for American politicians, leaders, and others to come to Israel or was this not as much as it is today?

LANPHER: That's a very good question. The embassy did almost nothing in that regard. We sent Israelis to the United States, International Visitors Program, young political leaders as we do all over the world. But the Israeli government took the lead on the other side. In fact, they devoted enormous resources, time, energy, and access to inviting American politicians to visit Israel. In fact, in the two and a half years I was in Israel, I was control officer for over 60 CODELs. It was not as strenuous a job as that might imply because the Israeli government made all the arrangements, provided transportation, actually was the one who invited these men and women from our Congress to come, and other political leaders. In terms of American politics, they always say, "Israel, Ireland, and Italy" are the countries that count. We had an enormous number of visitors and the Israelis were very sophisticated in terms of handling them. They gave them a tour, took them to the Sinai, the Golan, the occupied territories, they made everybody in the government available to people up to and including the Prime Minister. This is where their bread was buttered and they worked very hard and very effectively at it.

Q: Did you at the embassy try to give a balanced account, not to give the right side as opposed to the wrong side, but to give the American side of how we looked at things?

LANPHER: Absolutely. And Barbour was very astute on this. We assigned a control officer to every CODEL that came in that we were aware of. Sometimes we were unaware of them. He would see any and all congressmen that came through. He'd have them out to his house for drinks or give a lunch for them and try to expose them as broadly as possible. To the extent that we could, we tried to give them a balanced view. But they didn't always want to hear it. A lot of American politicians, sadly, visited Israel to get their ticket punched to get votes back home and they weren't going to rock any boat. Most of them were there for U.S. domestic political reasons.

Q: Were there any issues at that time where we saw particularly our relations with the Arab states that we should be doing thus and so but the Israelis from their perspective didn't want us to do thus and so? I'm thinking about arming or supporting this or that group in the Arab world. Often it had to do with military equipment and there was great pressure brought from the politicians in the United States not to do something. Did these issues affect you?

LANPHER: No. Bear in mind that I left Israel two years after the Six Day War. The kind of issues you described came later. They weren't issues at that time. In the time I was in Israel, the only military deal we did with Israel was the A4 deal, which was kind of modest and that was sometime in 1968. We'd had a long-term military to military relationship with Jordan and had previously supplied modest amounts of military aid to Jordan. So, there was a precedent in the region for it. The issue was within the U.S. government about a military supply relationship with Israel. We had never had one before. So, this A4 deal in 1968 was precedent setting. We didn't even have a framework with Israel to put in place a military supply relationship. Before we can transfer military articles to a country, we have to go through lots of bureaucratic steps to certify that country as being capable of protecting our equipment, internal security surveys, at conference tables when we were negotiating some of these things trying to insure ourselves and go through the bureaucratic steps that Israel could protect what we were about to supply them.

Q: Is there anything else we should talk about?

LANPHER: Yes, one of the dumbest things I ever did. About two or three weeks before the Six Day War, there I was, 25 years old, and I developed a friendship with Walworth Barbour's Irish butler, John. It turned out that John was a fly fisherman, too. One day, he said to me, "I've fallen into Israel's biggest secret." We used to drink beer at the ambassador's pool. John said, "I found a river in Israel that's full of rainbow trout that haven't been fished for years and the river is full of them." I said, "Yeah? Let's go." So, one afternoon two or three weeks before the Six Day War started, but the war clouds were certainly gathering, we took off from Tel Aviv in my car with a cooler full of beer and our fly rods. We drove up to northern Israel, the upper Galilee, to the base of Mount Hermon, where the Dan River flowed out of the base of Mount Hermon and down towards the Sea of Galilee. For two or three, four, miles, despite the heat, the water was cold enough to sustain a trout population. It had been planted during the British mandate period, probably by some British officers. We got up there and only then did John tell me that this river, the Dan River, was the cease-fire line between Israel and Syria. He said, "We've got to be careful. There are machine gun nests on both sides." So we waded out into the river between machine gun nests with guys peering at us on both sides. We caught trout like hell. For a very good reason, nobody had fished it for years. The machinegunners on both sides didn't know how to deal with two fellows out there flicking fly rods at this water and catching trout. In retrospect, it was one of the dumbest things I ever did.

KENNETH A. STAMMERMAN
Rotation Aide
Tel Aviv (1967-1969)

Kenneth A. Stammerman was born in Kentucky in 1943. He graduated from Bellermino College in 1965 and entered the Foreign Service in 1966. He has served in post in Israel, the Philippines, France, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. Mr. Stammerman was interviewed in 2000 by Charles Stuart Kennedy

Q: June of '67, and you were in Tel Aviv from when to when?

STAMMERMAN: I was there twice. So this is the first time, from June of '67 until December of '69. Two and a half years; I extended.

Q: What was the situation when you arrived in Tel Aviv?

STAMMERMAN: When I arrived there were four first-tour junior officers, and a couple second-tour junior officers. Again, that was because people were being reassigned. People who were evacuated from NEA posts, rather than go all the way back, some of them went to Tel Aviv. And Tel Aviv could take junior officers because it wasn't on their bill in terms of budget, it was on Central Personnel's JOP account. They weren't busy at the Embassy in the way that Tel Aviv later was busy. It was a post with sort of a classic organization, with the ambassador and DCM, formal staff meetings. Junior officers were pretty much left to the section chiefs to manage. It was the old Foreign Service, so spouses were graded, so the spouse's performance would go on your efficiency report. Tel Aviv was an exciting place outside the embassy. Israel was very exciting... it was still a new country, vibrant culture. We got there and sort of kept contact with the Embassy almost only to go to work to, and got out into Israeli society, and it was exciting. Jerusalem had just opened up for Israelis, so we'd go up to Jerusalem and go to the Old City, drive around the West Bank, go to Bethlehem. I studied Hebrew immediately, got into a Hebrew class. The embassy was formal, Walworth Barbour was one of the greats, I think. We didn't all go to staff meetings. Junior officers would rotate to the staff meetings. Junior officers were mainly seen but not heard at a staff meeting. You could sit there and get this wonderful education from Ambassador Barbour who knew everybody and everything in Israel. He would go to the embassy late in the morning, stay for 2 or 3 hours, and go home and take a nap.

Q: Is that right?

STAMMERMAN: He was already somewhat ill, had trouble breathing. But he would come in and say, "I saw the foreign minister yesterday and this is what she had to say." And you'd learn all this stuff. Absolutely great analysis. Political Chief was Howard Stackhouse. Excellent man. They kept the reading file, which is to say all the reporting cables, which we all could read, in the commo section. You'd sign the cover and then you could read. It was a wonderful analysis, so you learned how Foreign Service reporting was done by reading this excellent analysis about what was happening. They also told us about the events leading up to the war, what they saw, from their perspective. I was thrown into the visa mill, first job, visa officer, lot of Foreign Service officers do visa work, non-immigrant visas. That amounts to interviewing people who want to go to the United States as visitors, and you examine their bona fides, are they really visitors? A lot of times we'd get Israeli kids just out of the Army and they were really going to the United States to get a job. So we'd turn them down and tell them to get immigrant visas. Of course if they got in the immigrant visa line, they would have to wait for years. So they would always try to lie to us and say they were going to a cousin's wedding or whatever, and after a while you would learn who was good and who was not. The FS lady who was the consul in charge of visas, Sarah Andren, was very tough. She was hard on junior officers. There were not that many women in those days in management positions. Usually they were consular or admin. But she was tough, and if you made a decision on a visa that she thought was questionable, she would give you a hard way to go. She'd shout about it, even though these were all judgement calls, you never know. But she'd take something out of a file and say, "Why did you give this visa? They're never going to come back. I'll show his adjustment slips six months from now. This is terrible." It was as if you'd misplaced top secret or something [laughter].

Q: [laughter]

STAMMERMAN: She would make it into high crimes or misdemeanor. She had quite a reputation. Even later in the Foreign Service, I heard of people who went through Tel Aviv in those days or elsewhere who suffered under her management. So, anyway, I did my visa work, non-immigrant visas, for six months in rotation. A funny thing that happened may be of some interest. That was when the Israelis starting putting security guards on their El Al planes. There had been some airplane hijackings, before then there were no hijackings. After the hijackings, the Israelis started putting security guards on their planes. These were all young men just out of the military, and they would need a visa because they were flying to the United States, and we'd refuse them. And we'd say, why are you going to the United States? And they'd say just to visit. No you aren't, you're an immigrant. So finally the Israeli foreign ministry came to the embassy and said you are turning down all our security guards. The consul said to us visa interviewers (two, usually), you guys are pretty good because you are figuring these guys are not really your typical visitors. So then they started giving us a list, and we would always give them without question their multiple entry visas. But that was when terrorism first surfaced.

Q: Visas aside, first... did you find you were trying to get to know the people, foreign post and all... did you find that the visa thing would come up and hit you in the face at a dinner party and that sort of thing?

STAMMERMAN: Actually, it was very seldom. I found out that if I spoke Hebrew, I could cut the visa interview time in half. And the questions were roughly all similar: where were you born, what do you do for a living, what ties do you have in Israel? Things like that. So that encouraged me to learn Hebrew. I studied Hebrew very hard. After a few months, I could do the interviews in Hebrew. In Tel Aviv, you got people from all over the world, so you still needed help with the non-Hebrew translations, but it helped that I knew Hebrew. People out in the real Israel world, people might ask, and I would say if somebody wants to go for a visit it's no problem at all. Tell them to come and see me. But if they are kids who go to work, they are not going to get a visa. I think the Israelis knew that. Word gets around, everybody knows everything in Israel. You were describing coffee gatherings... there was no television in Israel in those days. So, politics. It was like sitting around the table in Louisville and we'd talk politics. Fascinating people, fascinating histories. I learned a lot about Israel and Israeli society. It was great.

Q: Were you picking up and of the feeling, even before you went out and when you went there, particularly at this time, there was often a divide between what has often maligned on the Arabists, but people who have been looking at... American relations with the Arab world, and the American relations with the Jewish world... and so it was always felt that by the people dealing with the Arab world was that our people in Tel Aviv had been seconded into the Israeli Foreign Service. Did you run across any of that?

STAMMERMAN: Well, it was interesting. We had a couple of people on the staff who had served in Arab countries. Part of that is because '67 when because of the war people were reassigned and released, so we had a political officer. And remember, that by that time, Gaza became within Tel Aviv's consular district. And the big argument that kept coming up, even to the present but certainly during my second tour there, between Embassy Tel Aviv and Consulate General Jerusalem over areas of responsibility. Now the embassy Tel Aviv reporting was candid because the contacts were with the Israelis and this was a very exciting society. The Embassy reported what people felt, I didn't do any political reporting in those days, I was consular. But people reporting out of the Arab countries, it seemed to us that they completely misunderstood what Israelis were like, and part of what we were doing was explaining what Israelis were really like. So embassy management were encouraging the embassy officers to please meet Israelis, the more the better. So, you had a substantive divide in reporting from the Middle East Foreign Service. I remember one from Saudi Arabia when I was reading the reading file, or the ambassador was reading it, and we all kind of laughed at it. It was one of these, "American has so thrown its policy in line with the Jewish state that our position in the Arab world is ruined forever." These were so stereotypical of reporting out of the Arab countries that they didn't know what the Israelis were all about. Of course, the Israelis didn't know what the Arabs were all about either [laughter].

Q: [laughter]

STAMMERMAN: But we would read what the Arabs and American officers reporting from Arab countries were writing about Israel, and it was simply wrong. Because we could meet the Israelis every day and look at them and say, "These are not the people you are talking about. They are warm, cultured, and agreeable. Would you please make a telephone call and everything would be settled." That was sort of the message. Obviously you don't read everything as a junior officer, but the feeling in Israel at that the time was that if the Hashemites, King Hussein's people, would simply talk to the Israelis, that they could have the West Bank in a minute. Because most of the Israelis I knew didn't want anything to do with the West Bank. These were American Jewish immigrants who wanted it. But most Israelis simply didn't want the West Bank, so long as they did not get the Arab Legion on their doorstep. They wanted to be able to travel. End of story. Peace would be very easy. When you read the reporting out of Jordan, Embassy Amman reporting about Israel, you were seeing a different country. We would have visitors from Amman very seldom because Embassy Amman would not encourage anyone to go all the way to Tel Aviv, they could go to Jerusalem, but not to Tel Aviv. If you were telling the embassy in Jordan this, they'd say well, the Jordanians are worried about the Palestinians. The U.S. Embassy in Amman argued that if King Hussein talked to the Israelis there'll be a revolt and the Palestinians would overthrow the king. We'd say, and the Israelis would say, "The king can beat them." That was before Black September.

STAMMERMAN: By then it was too late. By then the settlements had started, different government. But we would watch... by then the Rogers Plan had come out, we'd see the commentary about the Rogers Plan and about the UN shuttles, and we could see that it was fairly useless, it wasn't going to happen. You had to have direct contact or you were never going to solve the conflict.

Q: At this time, were you all feeling the heavy hand of what later became known as the Jewish Lobby, AIPAC, and all that. This was before...

STAMMERMAN: Again, people were reporting what I thought were fairly reasonable analyses of Israel foreign policy, what they were about. But there was no compulsion, by any means. I eventually got into economic/commercial work, in addition to consulate work. In fact I spent over a year, of my two and a half years, doing commercial/econ, and I don't think anybody had any feeling at all about the Jewish lobby. We always thought it was a joke. People would talk about a Jewish Lobby...where? There was pressure only on performance, but reporting was mainly, can you write well and report accurately. I was doing commercial/econ so there wasn't any [pressure].

Q: What about commercial developments at that time with Israel? You had a sort of socialist country up against American free enterprise. How did that fit?

STAMMERMAN: Not terribly well. There were some American investments so we would have American businessmen coming and looking toward investing. But the market was protected. Tel Aviv never had an AID mission, so what little Agency for International Development work existed would go through the econ/commercial section and I would get involved with that. By then we had some small amount of food aid going, but not much. We'd do reports on local firms, WTDRs, and that was sort of the bread and butter. You'd go out and meet local companies. An American company wants to buy from you or sell to you and they want to know who you are... so we talked to them.

Q: I would think that you would have quite a bit of problem, because it's no revelation that the people from there and certainly the Israelis, but I mean people who would come to the United States were merchants par excellence, and so you would have Americans say from New York or in trade and wanting to do something sort of for their country of birth. But a hard businessman would go over and find themselves up against the controlled economy and come to the American embassy and pound on the thing and "You've got to sell because I'm trying to be a good guy and sell them sweaters and I can't get a sweater market."

STAMMERMAN: We would do things like...the Department of Commerce had trade missions and put on trade fairs. Actually trade fairs were a way to get through the tariffs, so we encouraged people to do things like that. But more often they were trying to sell something. So we'd tell them what you really want to sell it to is the Histadrut. Histadrut businesses, that was the trade union that controlled the big part of the economy. Not quite socialized... there was the Socialist part of the economy and there was trade union part of the economy. All the doctors worked for the trade unions, and so we'd make an appointment. If you want to sell sweaters you really want to sell to the Histadrut's Koor Marketing Group. But if it's something that's made in Israel, forget it. No way. But there wasn't that much trade. People would come through, but it wasn't that big a market. After all, three million people, it was a little bigger than the rest of the Levant, but not that much.

Q: I think the French were the main military suppliers at this point.

STAMMERMAN: Up to that point. In June '67, the French broke with Israel, because DeGaulle told them not to start the war and they did. So France then broke off relations. The big issue when I was there was supplying Phantom Aircrafts, which we did.

Q: F-4s.

STAMMERMAN: F-4s, that was our first major sale. One thing that helped, even then we were on the 3I circuit for congressmen, Ireland, Italy and Israel, we had a lot of CODELs, congressional delegations.

Q: These are people pinning the ethnic button back in their district.

STAMMERMAN: Absolutely. So it was not necessarily Jewish, it was also Irish, Italian... So we got to accompany congressmen around, take notes, we learned to write, and heard what the Israelis were up to and we got to meet people and travel around the country. I recall one time, probably '68, I was with a congressman from Los Angeles and we went down to Sde Boquer to interview David Ben Gurion, the foreign ministry had set it up, and we sat there for two hours listening to Ben Gurion talking about Zionism and the history of Zionism. He talked about his discussions with DeGaulle, then the French-Israeli relations and the French-American relations and the American-Israeli relations. The French were cutting off military supplies.

Q: Sitting in on staff meetings and so forth, what were you picking up about Israeli politics at that time, and the leadership?

STAMMERMAN: One of the persons talked about a lot at the time was Golda Meir, Golda was foreign minister. A lot of discussion was about the Eshkol government from just before the war started, because then - Prime Minister Eshkol had appeared on radio than a month before the war started, and gave a very rambling, talk, speech, sounding nervous, sounding unsure of himself. After that speech, he was forced to bring in Moshe Dayan as defense minister from RAFI, part of what had been the Labour Party, let by Moshe Dayan and Shimon Peres. And David Ben Gurion.

They broke with the Labour Party back in 1964, over the Lavon Affair, a famous affair. I have no idea what was the truth of it. Historically, it was Israeli spies were caught in Cairo dealing with Egyptians, planning to do some terrorism against an American installation. Lavon was then the defense minister, and the Labour Party split over this. David Ben Gurion, Moshe Dayan, Shimon Peres walked out on the basis that the truth wasn't told. Golda Meir stayed in, and Eshkol led Mapai, (Mifleget Poalei Yisrael) the main part of what became the Israel Labour Party. That was the name of the party before the war started, though Mapai was forced to accept Rafi, which had a much harder line from a security point of view. David Ben Gurion was after all the architect of Israeli involvement in the 1956 war, Dayan had come into the cabinet in May of '67. From what people at the embassy told me, that was the key that Israel was going to war, once Dayan was in the cabinet.

So at staff meetings, they would talk a lot about Golda Meir, the Rogers Plan, that was later in about '69, the Rogers Plan was a way to bring Israel and Egypt to discussing things indirectly. It was subverted, we later heard, by Henry Kissinger, [laughter]. That's when Rogers was Secretary of State. But a lot of the talk was about Golda Meir, the peace process, how the Israelis wanted to deal with Egyptians and Jordanians, and how could they do that. Moshe Dayan was then Defense Minister, and I knew very little of them personally. I knew a lot of Israeli military, everybody was in military, so we heard just by being in Israel about what's going on in the military, lot of gossiping and so on.

Q: Were you picking up the feeling that Nasser was sort of a spent force?

STAMMERMAN: No, in those days, the Egyptians sort of thought Nasser could have lost it in '67, but he didn't, so therefore he was in charge. The Israelis still feared that Nasser could block any peace moves by other Arab states with Israel, but were not in those years worried about the Egyptian army.

Q: Also the war of attrition was on, wasn't it?

STAMMERMAN: Just started. '68 is when it started. '67 was when you had the Barlev line that was being built. Actually the Barlev line, I take that back, started in '69, after the war of attrition was underway. We were sitting in Israel after all, and the Israelis, when the war of attrition started, the Israeli were doing some very imaginative things. My landlord, it turns out, it came out in the newspaper months later, I was renting from an Israeli Army colonel. Turns out he was on this raid that went behind the lines on the other bank of the Suez. He crossed from the Sinai, behind Egyptian lines and had blown up a bunch of installations. The Israeli also grabbed an entire Russian radar installation down on an island in the Gulf of Suez. So, very imaginative and exciting things. We thought it was fun, in a way, oh boy, people we knew were doing these things.

The Egyptians were more and more, from our point of view, in the pocket of the Soviets. I heard from my Israeli friends about an encounter between Israeli pilots and Russians over Suez, later written up in various places in the newspapers. One of my Israeli friends in the Air Force said, "Ken, did you hear about this? We took out the Russians." That there had been a flight of Israeli planes over Suez, ran into Russians, who were covering for the Egyptians, because Israelis were regularly shooting down every Egyptian plane that came up. So apparently the Russians sent a flight up and the Israelis took them out. The Israelis were monitoring and heard the Russians, Israelis speak Russian, a lot of them do, and heard the Russians say when the Israelis attacked, 'they are going to kill us all,' and the Israelis did it, and the Russians that didn't escape the first encounter, the Israelis shot down on the run back to the Egyptian base. So that was one of the things we'd hear. Whether it was reported, or whenever, but I read it later in the newspapers. So we would hear from the Israelis what was happening in the war of attrition.

Q: How was King Hussein regarded by this time?

STAMMERMAN: Well we had two levels here. One, the American embassy in Tel Aviv, point of view as I understood it was that the King is in a stronger position than he knows. The Israelis tell us that if he takes on the Palestinians, he will win. And if need be they (the Israelis) will help. They won't have to because the Israelis really respected the Arab Legion, they always did. Remember their hardest fighting in both 1948 and 1967 was against the Arab Legion. They said that if the King took the PLO on, he can't lose. The embassy in Amman, the feeling we all heard, the embassy in Amman thought he could not, that if he tried to take on the Palestinians, it would be the end of the Hashemites.

The feeling among the Israelis was "Why can't you guys [the Americans] tell him that? His future is with us, not with the Russians, who want his head, and the Nasserites want his head, the Syrians want him dead." So the Israelis were saying he should come with us be on their side. But he didn't.

Q: What were you getting at the point about the Likud and Begin and Sharon and those people?

STAMMERMAN: Well, Sharon wasn't visible yet, not until '73. He was a colonel in the Army then. I'll tell you about that later. Next assignment.

Q: But did...

STAMMERMAN: Likud (which was then Herut) was off limits. You didn't talk to them. Period.

Q: What was the rationale for that?

STAMMERMAN: They were terrorists. They blew up the King David Hotel.

Q: You are talking about the star...

STAMMERMAN: You simply do not. I was not doing political reporting so it didn't affect me. The word was around the embassy was, certainly among political officers, they are off limits, no, don't talk to them. Nor should it get back to the Labour Party that we are talking to them. That was another thing. From Labour's view, we are the government. We are legitimate. And among the Israelis, the feeling was, the people I knew, the old Mapai, European Jews, sort of the people, Likud, Herut was not nice people.

Q: I mean, looking back on it, and you went there later on, did you feel like you were dealing with sort of Ashkenazis and the European types...was this pretty much your world?

STAMMERMAN: It was all Ashkenazis. Almost all. There were the Sephardic Jews who worked at the embassy, the drivers. In our neighborhood, I lived in a suburb called Ramat Hasharon, pretty far from the rest of the American diplomatic community, because we were on the economy rather than housed in embassy-owned or managed housing. The newest junior officers like me were simply given rent money and told to find our own housing. I lived in an Israeli neighborhood; I was one of the few Americans who did. The American embassy had bought or built housing in Hertzlia Pitruach, which turned out later to become an exclusive suburb, next to Kfar Shmaryahu, another exclusive neighborhood. I lived in Ramat Hasharon, which was almost all Israeli. My neighbors were all Israeli, and I got to know a lot of them. But our neighborhood was Ashkenazis. There were some Yemenite Sephardic Jews who lived in a suburb next to it and they lived among themselves. The Ashkenazis areas spoke Hebrew, which I was learning more of. Yiddish was a language that was not spoken. Young Israelis thought Yiddish was European, a diaspora language. It was not done. You spoke either French or English or Hebrew. I'd studied enough French so I could get around using French. You could speak French to the cabbies, many from Algeria or Morocco.

Q: How about the religious community?

STAMMERMAN:..There was the NRP (National Religious Party) sort of equivalent to what would be the current Shas up there in Jerusalem, too. But when we were there, I had almost no contact with the parliamentary NRP. We did and we didn't see religiously observant Jews. I'd go to the village for the Habad movement, Kfar Habad, because I was really into learning about the culture. It was a fascinating place. So I would go to some of these religious groups and their festivals. But you'd go and talk and they'd dance and you'd see all sorts of cultural things. But politically, they were not that important. And in Tel Aviv, as opposed to Jerusalem, the religious were and still are for that matter relatively few in number. The NRP was in the government, Allied to the Labour party, always had been. You had the small parties like Aguda, but then you had the ultra orthodox which were out of the government. They got to where they thought the Jewish state was an obscenity, blasphemy. The Luboviches accepted Zionism. Some of them were and some were not, but they were not radically anti-Zionist. (End of tape)

So this would have been around 1968. As I was saying, our Israeli FSN women visa clerks would often walk in and kind of shake their heads and raise their eyebrows about ultra-religious visa applicants; and these guys would come in with the long side curls and the coats and the hats. Again, Tel Aviv had a religious suburb, but most of the people who were ultra religious, Jewish observant, lived in Jerusalem or else in separate communities like Moshav Levi, that were ultra religious.

So anyway, these guys came in one day and the head of the Lubovich community in Israel was with them. There were four or five orthodox Jews wearing the long side curls and coats and hats, 20s to 40s probably, and the clerk didn't even type up a form, she said she knew they'd need an interview. Our policy at the time was that anyone who had recently come out of the Soviet Union was ineligible for a visitor visa because they had no ties to the state of Israel. They were just using Israel as a stopping point. They'd go to the States and we'd never see them again. And the American law said: If they are not coming back to the place where they got their visa, don't give them a visa. Plus, we had to find out if they were Communist. A lot of Israelis who'd lived in Romania or Russia, or whatever, had been members of the Communist Party, simply because they needed to join before they could get a job as a university professor. So, we had to process them as so-called defectors. And they would laugh and say, "Of course we defect, but we were members of the Communist Party." That always took a while with the INS, so that they knew that I'd talked to these people.

So, this one day, this group piled in to my office. I had these four guys and a man who ran the Lubovich community in Israel, and we started this interview. It was a funny interview to begin with because they spoke Georgian and Russian; they were from Georgia, part of the former Soviet Union, so Georgian and Russian. We had an interpreter who spoke Russian and Yiddish. So they went from Georgian to the one among them who spoke the best Russian to our interpreter to me. So it was a roundabout interview. They all said they wanted to go to the United States because the Lubovich Rabbi wanted to see them. They'd just gotten out of the Soviet Union, really. Oh, okay, so I asked them about what had been going on...had the Communists been in their village. Oh, yes, they came, we threw rocks at them and they left us alone. So we had a little Jewish village out somewhere in Georgia. "What in the world were you doing out in Georgia?" These are Europeans, not native to the Caucasus.

What in the world were you doing in Georgia? They said, well what happened is that when... our group is from Poland, as most Lubovich Jews were, our group is from Poland and when the Red Army was collapsing against the German onslaught when the Germans broke out and the Germans betrayed the Russians and moved into eastern Poland... as the Red Army was falling back they put us on their trucks and said, "The Nazis will kill you. Come with us." So they thought the Red Army were great guys. The Red Army was taking them and their parents out of Poland all the way out to Georgia, as far away from Nazis as possible. I don't know who did, but somebody in the Red Army was moving people out. But they said, "but the local Communists tried to tear down their synagogue, and we threw rocks at them and they went away and that was that." So they were describing the Lubovich community in Georgia and eventually the kids grew up speaking Georgian and Russian. Eventually they all made it to Israel, though, and so I said, "First I have to ask you a question, are any of you members of the Communist party?" That was a laugh, they laughed and laughed. They thought that was the funniest thing they had ever heard. Of course they were not. They never went to university, they were simple, they'd only studied Torah. (In those days, there was a forest near Jerusalem which was called the Red Army forest. At Israel's founding, the Israelis were close to the Soviets on a number of issues, out of gratitude for defeating the Nazis in WWII and because they were instrumental in 1947 and 1948 in getting the UN to approve the formation of the Jewish State)

So, I said "Will you come back to Israel," and they said "we'll do whatever the Rabbi tells us to do." Honest answer. So I spoke to the guy in charge, I spoke to him in Hebrew. I said, "Rabbi, if I give visas to these people, will they come back? Will you make sure the Rabbi sends them back, at some point, because American law won't let me issue visas otherwise." And he said, "Yes, we'll get them back here." Meanwhile, while I was talking to one of them, the others would be praying, reading the Torah and rocking back and forth. So the whole thing was kind of funny, happening in an American visa office. And he said, "Yes, we'll get them back here." I said, "Fine, I'll write your visas." So I gave them all visas, and he was surprised because he was prepared for a really hard way to go. He said, "What you have done is a mitzvah." A mitzvah, which is what we would say would earn you an indulgence in Catholicism, probably. I said fine, "I may need that some day." So we let them go, and the local employees were shocked. They didn't like these guys to begin with. They didn't care for these people, but I let them go. My boss didn't like it either, but I said, "They are going to get to the United States no matter what we do. So I gave them the visa. They'll come back." So we had contacts like that.

Q: But we were not looking upon a divided society there where at that point where religion would be... really orthodox would become a major factor.

STAMMERMAN: At best, they would be a marginal player. The feeling when we would read reporting from other Middle East posts would suggest that Israel was some kind of religious state. But we'd say it's not. Yes, on Yom Kippur you don't drive a car anywhere in Israel because you get a rock thrown at you. Because that's the one day the kids are told they can throw rocks at cars, so they throw rocks at cars. [laughter]

Q: [laughter]

STAMMERMAN: But the State was just not religious. Very marginal things.

Q: What about the West Bank, in Gaza? Could you do anything there?

STAMMERMAN: You could visit the West Bank. We got to know people in Bethlehem. My son was born in Israel, in 1969. We would visit, we got to know people in Bethlehem very well. There's no border. The road just went on, that had been cut between 1948 and 1967. There was no 'green line' along the 1948 Armistice line anymore, you just drove wherever you wanted to drive. Occasionally, you'd see Israeli roadblocks, but there was no terrorism. The two places we didn't go... we didn't wander around Gaza, and you didn't wander around Jenin, which is a city in the northern West Bank. There was already trouble there. We'd avoid those areas. But we would drive down to Jericho and go to restaurants in Jericho and East Jerusalem and Bethlehem. We weren't supposed to report on anything, we might tell the ambassador or the DCM something, but Jerusalem felt that was their reporting prerogative. I didn't care, I went there on weekends. Tourism.

Q: Was there much contact, say, were there junior officers at consul general in Jerusalem and were you all in contact sort of chatting around, or did you find there was a social divide?

STAMMERMAN: There was a social divide. We seldom spoke to them. They would not come to Tel Aviv. That was a problem.

Q: Was that on purpose?

STAMMERMAN: We sort of understood they did not come to Tel Aviv because they saw themselves as the consulate to the Palestinian Arabs. They just wouldn't, there was a divide. The more they kept themselves away from coming to visit... We would drop... well you didn't go by the consulate because you were embassy. You might run into them occasionally. But I didn't know anybody up there. Occasionally one of us would remind them that they had a large Jewish presence in their consular district in West Jerusalem, but then and when I was posted there later, they seemed to ignore their Jewish residents and only report on Palestinians. They were never accredited to Israel, still aren't. They are accredited to the city of Jerusalem.

TERESITA C. SCHAFFER
Rotation Aide
Tel Aviv (1967-1969)

Ambassador Schaffer was born in New York and later educated in France. She received her undergraduate degree from Bryn Mawr College and joined the Foreign Service. Her Foreign Service career took her to Israel, Pakistan, India, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka, and the Maldives. Ambassador Schaffer was interviewed by Thomas Stern in September 1998.

Q: So in early 1967, you went to Tel Aviv.

SCHAFFER: That is right. I had never been in Israel before. Walworth Barbour was the ambassador. The DCM was Bill Dale, who was there for the eighteen months of my tour. He was replaced by Owen Zurhellen in the summer of 1968. At the time, the Embassy was much smaller than it is today. There were three or four officers in the Political Section; three in the Economic Section; four officers in USIS. I would guess that it was a medium sized Embassy.

I was assigned to the administrative section, as the first part of my rotational assignments. My boss was Jack Curry, the Counselor for Administration. After that I had four more assignments -- five -- including a few months in USIS -- during a two year tour. I did not really have a good mentor in Tel Aviv. There were a couple of people who were helpful, but no one took me under his wing and tried to teach me about the Foreign Service. If your immediate boss or the DCM don't do that, then the Junior Officer is pretty much left to his or her devices. I must say that there were more senior colleagues who from time to time tried to be of assistance. But it was not a consistent, sustained effort. I did pick up something of the Foreign Service lore through conversations with my colleagues.

There was one officer who made an impact on me. That was the Counselor for Economic Affairs -- Richard Breithut; he was married to a Swede. That gave me the opportunity to exercise my Swedish. I was invited to their house on a number of occasions -- usually dinner. In all of my years in the FS, the Breithut dinners were the only occasions where I was subjected to a separation of the sexes after dinner. It was Mrs. Breithut's practice to take the ladies off to her bedroom where we would sit on her bed and use the bathroom. She explained to me that she was just following the practices of her last post -- Karachi. So I learned that lore; I didn't like it one bit.

I was not the only junior officer in the embassy. At various times, there were five others in all, but no more than three at any one time. All except one -- John Will -- rotated. Gib Lanpher, John Peterson and the others did rotate. In that group, I was the only woman. There were two women consular officers.

When I returned from Tel Aviv, I was assigned to the political "cone."

As I said, administration was my first rotational assignment. I must say that the administrative staff did not know what to do with me. So I was assigned as a kind of supernumerary to the General Services Section to watch what GS was doing. That assignment could have been very boring, but the Six Day War started about four months after I reported to the GS Section. All of a sudden, all personnel were needed badly. I became involved in implementation of the Embassy's evacuation.

The second rotational assignment, which started soon after the War ended, was to the Economic Section. Although I eventually became a member of the economic "cone", at this point I had managed to escape, during my college years, without taking any economic courses. So my assignment was an interesting one. My job was essentially to take care of any loose ends. We had a bi-weekly report which I was asked to edit, as well as being a contributor. Then, for example, I did the report on minerals; for that, I visited the phosphate mines in the Negev and the copper mines in Elat. That was fun, and was made even more interesting because at the time of the visit, border hostilities broke out just south of the Dead Sea. Preparations were under way as I was driving back to Tel Aviv in my very small Fiat. I was able to monitor all of the heavy army equipment which was in the other lane, headed for the border. In fact, I think I was the only one in the Embassy who was aware of the border skirmishes. The Attaché had heard rumors that something might happen; after the fighting had begun he was told to call me, which he did -- although obviously reluctantly.

When I first got to Tel Aviv, the major subject was unemployment. Israel was in somewhat of a recession. There was great concern about emigration -- I think that persons leaving Israel outnumbered new immigrants. The national leadership viewed this trend with great concern particularly since they had been very active in trying to convince Jews living in the U.S. and the USSR to immigrate to Israel. After the 1967 War, I believe that the economy grew again and I don't remember the discussion of unemployment to be that high on the political agenda. The focus shifted to questions about the economic relationships between Israel and the Occupied Territories; there were few answers, if any. This was before Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza came to work in Israel. In the last few years, Israel had enjoyed a booming economy; it was not that while I was there.

Next came a few months in USIS. It was run by Jay Gildner, who was one of the most outstanding USIA officers. He was probably the most relentlessly organized boss I have ever had. He was very methodical; he took my rotation seriously, in part because he thought he could use another hand and in part because he wanted me to fully understand all facets of the USIS operation. I spent three months doing press work -- the Press Attaché was gone for much of that time, putting me in charge of the press operation. One of our main tasks was to place in the Israeli papers certain policy statements emanating from high officials in Washington. We also distributed the “Wireless File” which provided material on what other papers were saying. Most of what we distributed of course was related to the Middle East.

We were, of course, in the middle of the Vietnam War; that generated much interest among the war correspondents to whom we would send materials on the U.S. positions. I must say that Vietnam was not high on the Israeli agenda; they were so preoccupied with their own problems that they didn’t talk about other ones very much. I had been in Tel Aviv for perhaps a little more than a year when we had a visit from veterans of Embassy Saigon. The DCM, in what proved to be a major miscalculation, asked the two to talk to the Embassy staff to offset a rising tide of anti-Vietnam feelings -- incorrect views in his mind. There was a lot of skepticism about our policy and about our explanation of the situation -- e.g. body counts, strategic hamlets -- among the staff. He thought that if these veterans who had just left the trenches could talk to us, a lot of the staff’s sentiment could be reversed. It turned out that the last experience these diplomats had was the Tet offensive. They were very candid; they were devastating in their comments on the South Vietnamese. They agreed that the Tet offensive had caught us by surprise. Theirs was a point of view not often heard in Israel. So Bill Dale’s efforts to engender greater support for our Vietnam policy was seriously undermined by the eyewitnesses comments.

I then worked in the cultural affairs section. I enjoyed that stint in USIS both because I had an opportunity to do some interesting work and because Gildner saw to it that I knew all of the activities in which he was involved. He was a trainer and I learned a lot from him. I should note that a junior officer rotating through USIS was then not the norm, but Gildner was delighted to have a junior officer and devoted some of his time to my training.

I also rotated to the Political Section. There I did mostly press reporting as well as biographical work -- standard junior officer chores. But I was fortunate because my assignment lasted during the summer when at least one officer was on his or her way to the next assignment or on home leave. So I was able to expand my experience to almost all facets of political work. In general, I think this assignment was probably the most fun. Of course, it helped that by this time I had been in the Embassy for over a year which gave me a good feel for what I and everybody else was supposed to be doing. I had learned Hebrew quite well which was quite useful.

As I said, much of my time was devoted to reading and reporting on the Israel press. I thought that it was a good press -- independent, feisty, representing many different points of view. The articles were pretty well written. Each publication had a single “party line”, but since that was well known, you could distinguish fact from fiction. That was particularly true in the Hebrew language press; the main English language newspaper was The Jerusalem Post. It was unlikely that any Israeli newspaper would express a real radical point of view on Israel-Arab relations.

There were two people on the Israeli political scene who were different from all the others. One was Aie Nathan, who was regarded as a nut-case. He was the fellow who flew his private plane to Egypt to try to arrange a meeting between Nasser and Rabin, who at the time, was the chief of staff. The other was Shulamit Aloni, who was newspaper editor and a parliamentarian. She was viewed as a maverick.

My last assignment in Tel Aviv was to the Consular Section. I thought that I had made the appropriate arrangements which would have left me in the Political Section. I had convinced the Political Counselor -- Heywood Stackhouse -- to assign a small portfolio to me for my remaining four months in Tel Aviv. But one day, I was asked to see the DCM; he asked me what I wanted to do in the next four months and I told him that I would like to stay in the Political Section. He smiled and said that he had other plans. He thought that I should have some experience in the Consular Section. He was kind enough to ask whether I preferred visa work or American citizen services. I told him that I thought I might have a slight preference for the latter. He said that I had given him the right answer and then he assigned me to American citizens service section.

My assignment made it possible to get Kim Pendelton to take another assignment as part of his training program -- he had not been part of the rotational program. I enjoyed those four months in the Consular section. I viewed the time spent there as being quite worthwhile. First of all, this was the first section I had worked in Tel Aviv which gave me a consistent job that was mine -- and no one else's. American citizens services were my portfolio. The job had been there for ever and I was the next occupant -- no make work. I had to supervise some people; I had a workload that had to be completed. Secondly, I found that consular work can be rewarding because at the end of the day, an officer can tangibly measure his or hers accomplishments -- you have issued a passport, you have issued a visa, you have refused a visa, you have found a lawyer for an American in jail, you have counted the cash and on the other hand, you know what you have not done. The experience in a consular section, which is largely operational, is good experience; it requires the officer to make decisions which he or she then have to convey to people who might not be too happy to hear it.

I also learned something about supervision. That was training in a perverse kind of way. I was working for a boss -- the head of the American citizens service section -- who I found immensely personally very likeable, but who would occasionally lose his cool. I might note that the Consul General, Cliff English, did not like women officers even though (or because) he had two women officers on his permanent staff. He was always snippy about his female officers; his predilections were well known in the Embassy, and many advised me not to go to the Consular Section. So he was not pleased by my assignment, but my immediate boss protected me from the CG; I kept out of his way. But he was the exception in the Embassy. Otherwise, I was never discriminated against because of my gender.

Embassies in many places become protective of the country in which they serve. That is a little different from "localitis" which is usually policy oriented. I am referring here to the tendency to mirror some of the social habits and prejudices of the host country. It has been said, that people assigned to Bonn, find themselves in an Embassy that is intensely rank conscious reflecting the mores of German society. On the other hand, Israeli society is very casual; people drop by without formal invitations. It has a long tradition of women in many different occupations, including leadership positions. I found the same attitude prevalent among my colleagues, unlike that found by my embassies' colleagues who served in the Arab world -- especially when women officers were still few and far between. In those embassies, I was told that the American male officers were made very nervous by this new trend of women officers.

I did much traveling, both within Israel and in neighboring countries. Before the Six Day War, everyone was interested in visiting the old city of Jerusalem which was governed by Jordan.

Such a visit inevitably led to travels through the West Bank and often into Jordan as well. I toured Jerusalem on several occasions, usually by myself. To cross into the Jordanian-held side of Jerusalem in those days, you needed a piece of paper saying that you were Christian. The local clergy was pretty loose about this certification. In my case, there was no need to fudge because I am a Christian, but it was not as simple in other cases. The process was to get the certification from some clergyman, who might or might not care about the exact truth. Then you submitted the certification to the Consul General in Jerusalem, about two weeks before the start of the intended trip. Both the Israeli and Jordanian authorities had to approve; then you were issued a permit for what was called a “double crossing” which allowed you to cross the Mandelbaum Gate and return through it. I managed to see the old city twice before the War broke out -- once with other people and once by myself.

The trip through the Mandelbaum Gate was something surrealistic. The check point was staffed by many Israeli policemen who recorded the traveler’s information, and the same happened when you got to the other side with the Jordanian police. If you were assigned to the CG and had Jerusalem plates on your car, you could drive through the Gate; otherwise you had to walk a long stretch of a road that was walled off on both sides. When you reached the Jordanian side, you were in another world. I remember that this was one part of the world where I felt distinctly foreign. The atmosphere was very different from the one that existed in Israel. There, having acquired some language competence, I was able to communicate in Hebrew with the Israelis, even if perhaps at a fundamental level at the beginning. But I didn’t speak any Arabic; so almost all I heard in Jordan was a foreign language that I didn’t understand at all. Even written numbers were different.

As I said, I visited the West Bank, but never went into what is now Jordan. Once, while on leave, I visited Cyprus, Greece and Lebanon.

As I said, I had never been to Israel before I was assigned there. The first thing I noticed was its intensity. People immediately want to know how you feel about Israel -- they are kind of “in your face” when they ask that question. If you seemed unsympathetic or even ambivalent, the Israelis would try to convince the visitor to become more pro-Israel. I didn’t realize the depth of that feeling until I went to Greece on leave -- after about eighteen months in Israel. I was never approached by a Greek to inquire -- much less insist -- about I felt about Greece. The difference was most striking.

I met a lot of Israelis. It was very easy to do so. They accepted me immediately without reservations. My closest friends were Sephardic Jews with ties to Asmara, Yemen and Israel. Two people in that family worked in the Embassy. One had a daughter of grade school age that bound us together because my younger brother was about her age. In the other case, it was woman about my age with whom I still correspond. In that family, there was also a brother who at time was managing a five-star hotel in Tanzania. He would return to Israel periodically for R&R. He was a kind of “high roller” -- a great guy, very engaging and charming. I also became socially acquainted with an official of the Ministry of Commerce. He had been designated as the liaison officer from a trade show in which we participated when I was in the Economic Section. He had originally emigrated from Rumania. There were others as well.

The social life was quite active. The Embassy's leadership made sure that we were invited to some functions. Most of the Embassy functions did try to have an equal number of women and men, which I think was unnecessary in Israel. By the time I got to Pakistan in 1974, that pattern had long been given up, at least by Americans -- perhaps as the result of the many "no shows" which one experienced there at parties; many of those "no shows" were women. So in Pakistan, the balance between men and women was not an issue. Of course, the U.S. practice in Israel was likely to be an advantage for me, because a single woman was more likely to be needed "to balance the table." Israel was an easy place for the social life because the prevailing mode of entertainment, especially among the younger crowd, was coffee and dessert. That enabled us to invite people to our residences without having to cook a whole meal, and the Israelis would do the same thing. It was all very casual; seating arrangements were never considered. So all of the challenges that bedevil younger officers in the more protocol-minded countries were irrelevant in Israel.

I became quite close to my Hebrew teacher and her family. She was employed by the Embassy. I had been doing some work with the FSI tapes before leaving the U.S. -- to fill in for two weeks when they didn't know what to do with me. So they sent me to the language lab where I started to learn Hebrew. I was handed a tape and told to go to work. Then I signed up for a local class for new immigrants in Tel Aviv -- although I wasn't the first diplomat to do so -- because the Embassy's program was not yet ready to start a new class. I spent some time in that class. By the time the Embassy started a new course, I was well beyond Hebrew for beginners. I was able to talk the Embassy into letting me have a paper class -- i.e. the press attaché and I were allegedly in that class, although I don't think that he and I were ever in the same room at the same time. By the end of my two years, my rating in Hebrew was 4/4.

The country didn't seem particularly impoverished. People may have been less prosperous than they were in the U.S. There were relatively few washing machines; there were no dishwasher. Living quarters tended to be a lot smaller than they were in the U.S. Most people lived in the cities, usually in apartments as I did. I had a two bedroom apartment leased by the Embassy.

The Ashkenazi-Sephardic tension were already manifest in the mid-1960s. You were always aware that the population was split, although at the time the Ashkenazi were the majority-by small percentage with the Sephardics catching up quickly since their growth rate was much higher. The issue would be discussed -- with some embarrassment and usually only in private. In the Embassy, we had employees from both groups. I remember my Hebrew teacher telling me that the way people looked down on the Sephardics was a disgrace. She was a Sabra as was her husband -- that is people born in Israel. They had an easier time relating to both groups. But there were many fissions in Israel's society based on national origins -- very stereotyped. Comedians would mimic the Germans as "yekim" -- very picky and very literal minded. They would also make fun of the Yemenis by exaggerating their Hebrew accents. The Sabras were supposed to be brash, the Yemenis a little stupid, etc. Almost all nationalities were put down. The press didn't pursue that line; I guess it had decided that it was in bad taste.

At this time, there was a political party called MAPAI -- an acronym. This later became the nucleus for the Labor Party. This party had dominated every government that Israel ever had. The formation of the Labor Party, which required the merging of the MAPAI with some smaller groups, took place while I was in Israel. I think the consensus was that this new Party would run the government as far as the eye could see, although it might not necessarily have absolute majority in the Knesset. It was also the general view that the Labor Party would need the help of some religious parties -- especially with the National Religious Party -- the largest religious party, and the most center of all religious parties. Labor would play the broker role. The extra votes that Labor needed to get its programs enacted came from the National Religious Party. This situation resulted in the passage of a lot of religious legislation, which the Labor Party and the MAPAI before it, would probably have preferred not to be enacted. But that was the price of coalition and support. So I had an interesting lesson in coalition politics.

The National Unity government was in fact in power during most of my tour. It was an interesting experiment in government. It was not an entirely comfortable coalition; there were a lot of big egos, all of whom took certain positions which had to be accommodated in the passage of the legislation. For example, the party to which Dayan belonged -- which eventually merged with Labor although it had a different approach to some of the issues -- was from the beginning strongly opposed to the return of any of the conquered territories. Prime Minister Eshkol and then Golda Meir, who became PM two days after I left, succeeded in keeping the coalition together and in drafting statements that were mostly consistent with UN resolutions and were close to our positions. The coalition fell apart in 1970 when the government's position on withdrawal was too clear for the tastes of Begin, Dayan, Ben-Gurion etc. They walked out of the coalition. There were obviously some hard feelings between Eshkol and Meir and Dayan. The latter was a very creative politician, although he certainly was a hard liner. The general view was that of all of the Cabinet members, Dayan and Alon -- the Labor Minister -- who had personal experience with Arabs, saw them as people rather than abstractions or stereotypes. Dayan had the reputation of having relatively good relationships with those Arabs with whom he met. He also had a reputation of being a wild man when it came to military operations.

There were ferocious debates on some political issues -- which party was better, what social policies should be enacted, what is the most effective method of encouraging immigration. Surprisingly there was very little debate on what I considered the most important issues. No one questioned the government's need to use any means it chose to defend Israel's security. No one really questioned, at least not from the left, the government's characterization of its security requirements. There were occasional challenges from the right. So the debates within Israel and within the Knesset left out entirely a discussion of one of the most fundamental policies of all governments. That has changed; in the days preceding the agreement with Egypt of 1979 and then after that agreement was reached, there appeared to be a mood change as it appeared possible to have a peace agreement in exchange for some accommodation. But during my tour, these issues were not debated; there was a consensus, even though the discussion of the issues would mostly be framed as arguments because the Israelis enjoy lively debates. But the consensus on national security was broad and deep -- and very emotional.

As I mentioned I traveled as often as I could, trying to cover Israel as much as possible. I visited some Kibbutzim. At the time the Kibbutz movement was probably much stronger than it is today. But each Kibbutz was beginning to develop its own approach. For example, there were some which gave more time for the children to be with their parents and less time in the children's dorms. Some had communal eating facilities; others did not. I thought that the Kibbutz movement was an interesting experiment. I was fascinated by the social impact on children brought up in a Kibbutz -- Bettelheim was just starting to write about this subject. Some of my Israeli friends had some interesting reactions to the movement.

As I recall, about 7% of the population lived on Kibbutzim and 25% of the military officer corps came from there. One plausible theory for this imbalance was that the young men were so accustomed to collective living that the military did not require them to change their life styles as much as city folks had to. They were also imbued with the national ethic, as were most Israelis. The Kibbutzim people were used to less privacy than the city dwellers. This was a period before the shelling from Lebanon fell on some Kibbutzim. Syria however did send some missiles occasionally, especially on those settlements in the shadow of the Golan Heights -- which after the 1967 war were occupied by Israel. I did visit Kibbutz Dan, which was right at the corner of the Syrian-Lebanese-Israeli border. This was a settlement that took fire in recent years, but in my time it had been a safe place. After the War, I drove through a number of Kibbutzim on the Golan Heights.

Let me say a few words about 1967 War. When I went to Israel, all I had was the general knowledge that the Arabs and Israel were at odds and that the state of Israel had never been recognized by its neighbors. I had taken FSI's two week area course, which was a pretty good rudimentary introduction to the Arab-Israeli issues. That was supplemented by some reading, but in general, my knowledge of Israel and its neighbors was fairly basic. I had no thought of a war breaking out; neither did anyone else to whom I spoke.

Before any serious hostilities broke out, I remember talking to the Political Counselor at a social occasion. I asked him whether he thought that Israel had any territorial ambitions on any surrounding areas -- like the West Bank and the old city of Jerusalem. He said that he didn't think so; he felt that if the Israelis ever occupied those areas it would be by force of circumstances. I remember that analysis well, because it was so correct.

The first sign of the trouble that culminated in the 1967 war was an aerial dog-fight between Syrian and Israeli planes which occurred in early April, 1967. The Israelis shot down a number of Syrian MiGs. That was a serious incident in part because it was such a departure from the normal pattern of infrequent border skirmishes. The dog-fight increased tensions thereby leading to a flurry of diplomatic activities designed to block an escalation. I was generally familiar with those diplomatic efforts by reading the general file maintained in the Embassy's communication center that was available to all American officers; in fact, we were encouraged to read it. Since I was not terribly busy, I read it assiduously. Of course, the file did not include any sensitive traffic, but since I had become friends with a few members of the Political Section; they filled me on details that were not in the reading file. So I had a pretty good sense of what was going on and what the Ambassador and the Political Section were doing in that crisis atmosphere.

The Ambassador did hold a weekly staff meeting which was attended by all American officers. It was primarily an opportunity for the section chiefs to brief the Ambassador; he rarely told us what he was up to. So the utility of the weekly meeting was limited, even though all attendees could talk if they wished -- very few ever did. It was a very brief show-and-tell.

There followed a number of further incidents. I still remember a couple of fiery speeches by President Nasser of Egypt. He said that he was asking the UN observers, who had been monitoring the Israel-Egypt borders and in Gaza, to leave. He also said that he was closing the Straits of Tiran -- the entrance to the Gulf of Aqaba and therefore the Israeli port of Elat. The Israelis had for many years stated that the closing of the Strait would be a causus belli. So, more and more analysts came to the conclusion that war was very likely.

The UN observers did depart. The Straits were closed. The Israelis started a general mobilization. That became obvious to us because many of our Israeli employees were called up for army service. In early June, 1967, a government of national unity was formed with Moshe Dayan -- the leader of the opposition -- joining the government. This new government was a clear signal that war was possible -- if not imminent. I remember going to visit some Israeli friends and helping them put masking tape on their windows, to prevent them from shattering in case of air raids.

I believe that dependents were beginning to be evacuated at about this time. It was first a voluntary evacuation even though the dogma in those days was that there was no such thing as a "voluntary" evacuation. But throughout the Middle East, there were "voluntary" evacuations. The Department authorized any family that wished to leave for a safe area. A lot of families took advantage of the authorization; I spent a lot of time at the airport putting the families on planes. In fact, I was sometimes at the TWA counter doing flight documentation -- it was a much more casual era of airport security.

The national unity government was formed on June 2 -- three days before the war broke out. The second of June was a Friday. Over that week-end we were blessed by a visit by James Tate, Mayor of Philadelphia. We knew he was coming, but he apparently had not been reading the tea leaves very well. In any case, I was assigned to help the control officer -- Mark Lissfelt -- in the care and feeding of the Mayor. Before landing in Israel, Tate had requested that photographs be taken of him and the Prime Minister and of him and the Mayor of Tel Aviv. Of course, the PM was in cabinet meetings for much of the day and night; he had much more important matters to worry about than the visit of an American Mayor. The Mayor of Tel Aviv was in the hospital at the time with a very serious heart condition -- he was dying. So Tate didn't get his photo opportunities; on Monday, he came to the Embassy to seek assistance for some more impossible requests. He then heard the air raid sirens that signaled the start of the Six Day War. I had also heard the sirens earlier. I knew that the Israelis had been testing the siren system for sometime; I thought that this was just more testing. I went out to my balcony, after finishing my breakfast. Although the traffic on the street was quite light, I didn't see any other signs of an impending air raid. I noticed that a military jeep, driven by a person in uniform, stopped across the street from my apartment. Out of it jumped two kids who then quickly headed for their school. I interpreted that as a positive sign. So I drove to the Embassy just in time to hear the sirens starting again. Mayor Tate was wondering around the Embassy, obviously displeased and unhappy with our inability to get him his photo ops. I was told that it was my job to get him down to the Embassy basement because that was what we were supposed to do when the sirens went off. Tate was most unhappy about that development.

Later, Tate asked his control officer to see whether the U.S. Air Force might fly a plane to Israel to rescue him. Of course, the Air Force had better things to do. Tate then retreated to his hotel; apparently, he found that basement more inviting than ours. In a crisis of this sort, the Economic Section does not have a lot to do. So the Economic Counselor -- a big, dignified officer -- had been assigned as the super control officer to take care of Tate. He spent a lot of time trying to cool him off.

When actual shooting began, I was probably running on adrenaline; I was excited and curious -- much more than scared. As it happened, we had one more evacuation scheduled for the afternoon. There weren't many dependants left, but the airlines had stopped their flights to Lod International airport. (None of the staff was ever given an opportunity to leave; that would have been contrary to tradition.) An American Air Force plane was at an airport facility undergoing maintenance. The U.S. Air Force was eager to get the plane out of the war zone. So it made seats available to civilians if they could get to the airport by six p.m. There were twelve dependents left. As it happened, the ones that wanted to go were enough to fill the seats allotted to us by the Air Force., leaving one empty seat. In the meantime, we had received a cable from our UN Mission informing us that Arthur Goldberg's niece -- he was then our Ambassador to the UN -- was in Israel. He asked us to check to see how she was doing. We managed to find her and put her in the last seat available. The plane left without any problems that night.

Of course evacuations have changed considerably in the last fifteen years. At that time, we made no effort to include private American citizens. The evacuation was strictly for U.S. government employees and their dependents. In fact, the evacuation plan, which I helped revise just before war broke out, stipulated that official Americans would come first followed by AID contractors and then everyone else. Today, we would not be allowed to operate in that manner -- all American citizens must be treated the same. We did issue a record number of passports to Americans living in Israel -- people who had let their passports expire. We did take the names of people who wanted to leave on the next available flights so that we could notify them when commercial flights began again. Those flights did in fact start two or three days later, despite the war. But by this time, a large number of the Americans had changed their minds; it looked like that Israel would win the war handily and therefore they were no longer interested in leaving.

I was certainly caught up in the excitement that some wars generate. I was frightened only once and that was when I was at the airport watching the Air Force plane taking off. I didn't think that being at a military airport was exactly the safest place to be.

We returned to the Embassy, not knowing that the Egyptian Air Force had been essentially eliminated from combat. I spent the night in the Embassy, sleeping on a mattress along with many other staff members. This was in part for security reasons and in part because of the workload. Most of us had not blacked out the lights on our cars and therefore could not go home anyway. The distances were too great for walking. So, many of us slept on mattresses on the floor of the Embassy.

The Israelis were filled with great anxiety about the War. I was first struck by the starkness of the response. For example, when one walked the streets of Tel Aviv, there were no young men; only children and older people. There was practically no vehicular traffic because cars had been requisitioned. Eventually, a few did reappear, mud caked because they had been used in the desert and therefore had been camouflaged. I discussed the War with many of my Israeli friends. As I mentioned earlier the family I knew best was Sephardic. They were very anxious and bitter about the Arabs, who they thought didn't care how many people they would kill. For that family, Israel was the only place to be. So I think that the sense of being beleaguered was the most memorable one.

At the end of the War, there was an incredible euphoria. People drove through the street with tops down, honking, waiving, singing, shouting. I remember well the annual Festival of Song which was held in Tel Aviv. That year, one of the songs that was entered was called "Jerusalem the Golden." which had just been written. It was performed by Shuli Nathan, a singer with a gorgeous voice. It didn't win the competition, but came in a close second. But it was the song that everyone remembered from the festival.

After the Israelis had taken the old city of Jerusalem, which happened on Tuesday or Wednesday (June 6 or 7), the song writer wrote an additional stanza about the Israelis' return. It became even more popular. Young men, who were being discharged from the army were singing it -- actually shouting it. The song had captured the imagination and inner-most feelings of the Israeli people. The opportunity to return freely to the old city with all of its holy places resonated deeply; it was a huge emotional experience. Besides the euphoria of victory, which highlighted Israel's strength and fortitude in the face of considerably larger enemy forces, there was a sense that now Israel could show the world how humanely it would deal with this new situation. In the first few days, there was considerable skepticism that the map of the area had in fact been changed. Many thought that once a peace agreement was signed, much if not all of the conquered territory would be returned to the powers which controlled it before the War. By the end of the summer, this skepticism had disappeared as it became obvious that the new boundaries would be maintained, at least for the foreseeable future.

I had another interesting experience during the War. There were about 1300 American citizens living on the West Bank. The week after the end of hostilities, I was asked to go to Jerusalem to help the officers of the Consulate General respond to families in the U.S. who were anxious to know how their relatives were. I was supposed to man the office while the regular staff went out into the field to find these Americans. It was an exciting time because it was the beginning of Israel's occupation of Jerusalem. Our Consulate people knew a lot of Arabs who had lived in old Jerusalem; they were seriously distressed by the new turn of events. They had watched a major exodus of Arabs from old Jerusalem as the Israelis moved in; most of them moved to the east bank of the Jordan River.

The activities of the CG staff was very much in the old Foreign Service tradition. They looked up and down the West Bank, looking for any piece of information which would allow them to find these American citizens. The staff did know a lot of them; in other cases, they knew in what town they had been living. So they went from town to town looking for these Americans. We worked long hours during and after the War.

In Jerusalem, we were living dormitory style. The staff was ordered to leave their housing and congregate in the American School for Oriental Research, which was close to the office. This was done partly for security reasons and partly to minimize the problems of travel in the city -- there were check points and the documentation required to move around by car changed daily. So we stayed in the neighborhood. A Consulate General officer's wife organized the kitchen that fed us most meals. In fact, this practical need created an atmosphere of camaraderie. We sometimes made our facilities available to American journalists who were coming through.

As I am sure has been documented in other oral histories, the relationships between the Embassy and the Jerusalem Consulate General were tender -- as they always had been and remained so for many years. The CG in Jerusalem was an independent post; it did not and does not report to our Ambassador in Tel Aviv. Although the tensions were noticeable, it did not stop the CG from asking for help from the Embassy.

I stayed in Jerusalem for two weeks. I had acquired some knowledge of consular work from my TDY in Jerusalem. It was rather basic; I didn't issue any passports or visas. I did a lot of registrations. Much of my time in the CG was devoted to answering the phones and taking messages.

The War had some positive impact on my personal relationships, particularly with those people whose house I visited to help put tapes on the windows. That was a kind of bonding experience. As for the reaction to the U.S. in the streets, that was harder to judge. In the middle of the War, the Israelis fired on and sank one of our Liberty ships. After the War, the French, who had been Israel's most reliable arms supplier, turned against it. So we became the putative major supplier, which became a subject for extensive discussion for the U.S.-Israel relationship.

On the way back to Tel Aviv , I was asked to give a ride in my car to a young -- eighteen old-- Arab-American woman with two small children. Her husband was in the U.S.; he sent tickets for the family and I put them on the plane. She was terrified. She had a special pass which got her from the former Arab lands to the Tel Aviv airport. This was the first time she had been in Israel and she didn't know what to make of that.

I might just comment briefly on the tensions existing in Israeli society. The split between various religious communities was already apparent in the mid-1960s. There were some members of the religious right that would not accept the State of Israel. There was an ultra-orthodox neighborhood -- Mea Shearim -- right next to the Mandelbaum Gate. That became a problem for those who wanted to cross the Gate on Saturdays. These religious ultra-conservatives would stone cars driving through their neighborhood on the Sabbath, forcing people to take circuitous routes. This brought home to me the difficulties of maintaining a close-knit society, that included both ultra-orthodox and very liberal people. I also remember that there was a rabbi in Brooklyn who had gotten Congressional approval mandating certain grants to some of Israel's ultra orthodox schools in Jerusalem. At one point during my tour, I was asked to escort a Member of Congress, Silvio Conte (Democrat, Massachusetts), to Jerusalem; the Brooklyn rabbi was there as well. We visited the school supported by the American tax-payers. Before leaving for Jerusalem, the Ambassador called me into his office to tell me that he didn't want the Congressman or the rabbi to make any new commitments because the Israeli government objected strenuously to these schools. I was supposed to make sure that the delegation did not say more than normal pleasantries. I was half successful; I kept the Congressman away from some of the schools.

We had lots of CODELs. I was the control officer for one and a half visits. My first “client” was Joshua Eilberg from Philadelphia along with his wife. I arranged a few meetings for them and took them sightseeing to some of the standard tourist spots. That visit went quite smoothly. I learned from Eilberg that Mayor Tate was airing his experiences in Israel and was becoming a folk hero. That took me by surprise because I didn’t remember much heroism in Mayor Tate.

I also met Senator Javits (Republican, New York) who was my senator. But someone with the prestige that Javits had was essentially escorted by the Ambassador.

CODELs are and have been in recent years a major work-load for our Embassy in Israel. This was not the case when I was there. We had visits, but not as frequently and as large as today. The big challenge for the Embassy was trying to keep track of the Members of Congress who had come to Israel at the invitation of the Government of Israel. Sometimes, these people would not even inform the Embassy that they were coming. In general, my experiences with CODELs in Israel were positive. I also felt that it was an opportunity to observe American politics as it was played on foreign soil.

I regret that I didn’t get to know any Israeli Arabs terribly well. I had one young woman who worked for me in the Consular Section. She spoke about the War in very guarded terms -- she was pretty careful.

After two years, I was fascinated by Israel. I had rather conflicting feelings. I had a lot of affection for many of the Israelis that I met as well as the country. However, I also believed that the post-War policies were leading Israel down a path which would prevent any peace from coming to fruition. That was a tragic policy choice. There was no doubt in my mind that Israel would survive as an independent nation, but at some costs. I think that view was shared by others in the Embassy.

Before ending the discussion of this tour, I should mention one fascinating experience. There was in Tel Aviv a social/political club which was one of the left-of-center parties. I had been at the club on a couple of occasions as part of my USIS portfolio -- at the suggestion of one of the Israeli employees who suggested that this was an interesting and different group. After one of these meetings, I was asked to come and present the American view on some aspect of U.S. foreign policy. In addition, they said they would appreciate it if I could do in Hebrew. I swallowed hard and agreed. I got through it all right; I kept it relatively short. I remember agonizing whether I should write in proper Hebrew script or in Latin letters -- it would have been quite slow had I written it in an unfamiliar alphabet, so I used the Latinized version. But I got through that presentation and even enjoyed it.

The following week, this club called and told me that Abba Eban was coming to speak and invited me to join them on that occasion. Eban was the Foreign Minister at the time; of course I would go -- third secretaries don’t spend a lot of time with Foreign Ministers. He gave a talk as he usually did, in grammatically and literally elegant Hebrew with a British/South African accent which was very noticeable. Eban went through what people called his “Oxford Hebrew” routine and then asked for questions. Suddenly, he emerged as an entirely different person then -- relaxed, witty and charming. There was a degree of informality in his answers that was completely at odds with his reputation. By the end of the evening, he had a skeptical audience eating out of his hands. It was an interesting view of one of Israel's leading personalities as well as a lesson in Israeli politics. I met Eban after the end of the evening. We were introduced and someone mentioned that I had given a speech in Hebrew to the club a few days earlier. He beamed. Some one in the audience commented that Eban had left the meeting as a "human being." -- a person who had earned the respect of his audience.

In retrospect, I think that the idea of rotational assignments for junior officers is a good one. I learned a lot -- especially in view of the time and place. I was in Israel at a time when a lot of things were changing. I had a front row seat on a lot of action. But the program was not particularly well run. I did learn something about how a diplomat tries to interpret events on the ground to his or her own government.

I was very positive about the Foreign Service after my two years in Israel. I had had a fascinating tour. It was clear that I was interested in pursuing the Foreign Service as a career. I found the large majority of my colleagues to be stimulating and personable. I had received one promotion while in Tel Aviv and one as I arrived in Washington from my Israeli tour.

MARGARET L. PLUNKETT
Labor Attaché
Tel Aviv (1967-1972)

Margaret L. Plunkett was born on April 15, 1906. She received a bachelor's degree, a master's degree, and a doctorate from Kernel University. Ms. Plunkett worked in the New York State Department of Labor; was a researcher at The Massachusetts Institute of Technology; was on the Wage Stabilization Board; War Production Board; BLS in the Labor Department and the Women's Bureau. She served in Tel Aviv, Israel as the Labor Adviser to the Technical Aid Mission and later in The Hague, Netherlands as the Labor Attaché. She was interviewed by Thomas D. Bowie on July 28, 1995.

PLUNKETT: Now we come to the time when I was sent back to Israel as Labor Attaché. Although my first appointment as Labor Attaché was to Holland, I want to combine the Israel experiences, the two tours there, because they are so closely related, and then later I will come back to Holland, which is a very different type of experience from the point of view of the labor situation.

In 1967, I was transferred directly from Holland, where I had been Labor Attaché for five years, back to Israel. I resumed at once my connections with the people whom I had known before, including Golda Meir, who was then the Foreign Secretary. I had kept in touch with her over the years I was away from Israel. When she used to come to the United Nations for Israeli business, she always let me know and I went up to New York to see her. She was such a friendly, nice person to me. She wasn't always so nice. People complained about how she bit them on the nose when they didn't go along with her, but she never bit me. The one negative thing about Golda was that she didn't like cats.

Anyway, there were people in the Histadrut in 1967 who were still there since my earlier experience, and they had always been extremely friendly because many of the projects that I had suggested during my Mission days were things in which they were very much interested. In any case the job as Labor Attaché in Israel was very different from my job as adviser to the Mission in which there had been specific projects to work on. The Embassy job was more "office" work. You established relations and picked up what people thought about U.S. policy or Israeli policy. I became a member of the political staff in the Embassy; I was certainly not an integral part of it but I was attached to it.

I always thought, both in Israel and in Holland, that the Labor Attaché's job was the best in the Embassy. People with other specialties, like the Science Attaché, concentrated on the sciences, and the agriculture specialist concentrated on agricultural matters. Their contacts were mostly with officials. Mine were not. Oh, I had plenty of contacts with the Labor Ministry and the Social Affairs Ministry, but the great merit of the Labor Attaché's job was that you could reach out all over the country to the trade union or unions, as the case might be, or the Labor Ministry, the Social Affairs Ministry, the Education Ministry, if you chose as a Labor Attaché to do this.

I don't know whether other Labor Attachés did, but I did, and it expanded my contacts with the Israeli people. I also resumed my contacts with the Arabs whom I had known in my earlier incarnation. I had gotten to know, for example, in earlier times, the mayor of Nazareth, who was then of the Greek Orthodox religion. He was one of three brothers who were very well known in Nazareth and throughout Israel. Right after the 1948 war one of them became the official regional judge; another became the regional military supervisor for the Israeli government; and the third was the one I knew best. He was the youngest son, who had gotten a job in the newly established employment service in Nazareth. They had never had an employment service to help the Arabs before the [establishment of the] State and that was one of the things that the Labor Ministry did right away: It established employment service offices for Arabs throughout Israel.

I have always felt that Israel has never gotten the credit it deserves for all the extension of social services-Histadrut membership, employment service, medical services, etc.-to all those Arab communities. Israel never did a very good advertising job on that. I used to tell them that.

Anyway, where was I? I was back at the Embassy and how different it was from [my earlier work at] the Mission.

Q: How did your colleagues in the political section receive you?

PLUNKETT: Very well. I am surprised that there was so much emphasis in other [oral history] reports on how they were received as labor attachés. Of course, I expected that a woman would be downgraded and not paid much attention to. But it never happened, either at the Mission, or in Holland, or in the Embassy in Israel. Now, I don't know why that was the case, but I simply assumed that I was the same as everybody else on the staff, and nobody challenged me at all. Well, I wasn't shy about offering my views. I think that was an important part. My personality was such that I didn't hang back.

Anyway, we had a marvelous Ambassador in Israel at the time, Walworth Barbour. He was there for 12 years as Ambassador, and apparently he liked me right off. So he never set a tone of "this is just another secretary." I was always at the staff meetings. There was never any question about that. When I was retiring-I was beyond retirement age at the time-we had a very disagreeable Deputy Chief of Mission (DCM). The Ambassador was out of the country for a while when the processing of my retirement came up. I wrote a letter to the Ambassador saying that I would like an extension of six months. It would affect my pension. I had that all worked out. So since the Ambassador was away, my letter went to the DCM. And he said, "I'm not going to approve this. I'm going to have to retire much younger than what you're getting away with. I'm not going to approve it." I said "All right, give it back to me, and I'll wait until the Ambassador gets back, and I will submit it directly to him." So I did.

Q: It was a rather twisted way for him to judge the situation on the basis of his personal circumstances.

PLUNKETT: Yes, he was not a nice man. So anyway I sent the letter in to Ambassador Barbour and he took it and he rewrote parts of it. He said it was very important that I remain on the staff for another six months, that I was in the middle of certain things that he wanted to see finished. After that the poor old DCM treated me with kid gloves. He never once again said anything that was unfriendly. So, I thought that was good. After I retired and was living in Washington, he came back to the State Department in some capacity. Every year he used to have a reunion of people who had been on the staff in Israel and he always invited me. I thought that was very amusing.

Well, I did say that I kept in touch with the Arab community. This was very helpful because I also got to know some young men in the old city. I had done that when I was first there, and the Ambassador's secretary, who was a spunky little girl, had been in the habit of going over to the old city frequently, so she introduced me to the old city actually and to these young men she had come to know. She said, "They always used to say to me, 'We're going to push those Israelis into the sea,' and she would say to them, 'Yes, and in the meantime what are you going to do?' " They never succeeded in answering that.

In any case, it's a good time now to talk about the Histadrut. The Histadrut is, in the correct sense of the word, a unique institution in the world of labor unions. It began in 1920 when there was no state [of Israel], of course, and in a sense the Histadrut was a state. It not only was a trade union but the overall trade union. There were subdivisions as [there are] here, such as the plumbers as well as agricultural workers and the many other trades who were unionized there as well. Support of the unions came mostly from the agricultural settlements; they produced all the products at that time. So Histadrut developed the state. It really was a state. It developed the entire national health service, which was one of the outstanding aspects of Israel when it became a state. Israelis didn't have to worry, as we do, about how to set up a health service. It was there and covered every member of the Histadrut. Most of the people at that time were members, because of all the different advantages it offered. If they were a member of the trade union, they were entitled to a complete health service. Of course people complained about the service, just as we all do about our medical service, but it was a major part of the state's operations and the Histadrut was politically a very powerful organization.

Because, you see, after the 1948 war, the whole government had to be set up. Ben Gurion became the first Prime Minister and of course he had been very active in the building of the state. The Histadrut was such an important part of the society that it was of interest to us as well as just for its own functioning. It was a decisive organization in making state decisions and without the support of the Histadrut organization, the state would never have been able to develop.

So the first thing I had to do when I went to Israel the first time was to get in touch with the Histadrut personnel, the top dogs. The General Secretary of the Histadrut at that time was quite along in years at the time and he's long since dead. I found him a little stand-offish. His English was very inadequate and that may have been part of it. He married later a much younger woman who is now the Minister of Labor. I got to know her very well during my second incarnation there.

I was in very close touch with the Histadrut all through my five years as Labor Attaché. They were always forthcoming. They always discussed their internal problems, about which I could do nothing, but at least they kept me informed about what was going on.

Anyway, I'm anxious to convey an idea of the power of the trade union. It was an umbrella union. They had subdivisions by trade and so on, but I'm sure that the government never made a major move without consulting with the Histadrut. Unfortunately, to my way of thinking, the Histadrut has lost much of its power in the last ten years, because, as the state developed, it developed, for example, its own employment service. That was a function which the Histadrut had fulfilled before. It still has the health service, but there has been movement to "declassify" it, so to speak, and make it a national service rather than a trade union service.

The personalities involved in the Histadrut now have perhaps not been as good or as powerful as the earlier ones, and politics began to become an important part. Israel is very political. I've never seen or heard of a country that was so political. At one point there were 17 parties, but the Histadrut also had its own divisions; the Labor Party was the major party in Israel in my day. It was sort of a centrist party. Then it had a left wing. They didn't disagree; basically they all sort of worked together but they argued a good deal. Trust an Israeli to argue. As the saying goes, you put two Israelis together, and you have three arguments. But that to me was a pleasure, because I like to argue myself.

In any case the Histadrut is really unique in the world and I use that word advisedly. It commanded so much influence that the state really couldn't operate without it. Now in recent years this influence has been declining. Outside influences have been coming in; American, particularly. Well, of course, our government has given Israel billions over the years, and so we had influence there on what kind of economy they would be developing. I'm sorry myself that this is happening, but that is partly due to my own pro-labor prejudices.

Q: How much of this parallels the decline of unionism in other countries?

PLUNKETT: None. There is no parallel. Our AFL-CIO is not a parallel at all; of course, it does not have authority over its constituent unions. The Histadrut had authority over all of its constituent unions.

Q: Has its membership remained stable, or has it lost membership?

PLUNKETT: It has lost some. I don't know whether it's an actual loss or new people not joining it as they once did. There is a great movement for the State to take over the national health services. Well, you know how there are changes. We have them here of the same kind. Our AFL-CIO isn't nearly as powerful politically as it once was. And here I want to make a very strong point about the influence of the Histadrut on national development. I think that is the basic point and of course it was all set up in 1920, but it operated from 1920 to 1948 as kind of a state. It did everything. And it had even established a kind of pension system.

Oh that reminds me. After I retired, I wrote a pamphlet on the Histadrut. I was an ex- Cornellian and the people in the School of Industrial and Labor Relations at Cornell University asked me if I would prepare a document that would give them some information about the Histadrut. I did that. It was okayed by the State Department. The School of Industrial and Labor Relations printed it in its monthly bulletin, and this is one of my prides and joys: They duplicated it in 5000 copies to use in the Labor School. Of course, it is very much out of date now. What the Histadrut was when I wrote this is no longer what it is. So it is now an historical document! But that was one important thing, I thought, that came out of my whole service in Israel.

Q: Didn't you write the labor profile on Holland for the Labor Department?

PLUNKETT: Yes, oh yes, after I retired, I wrote the profiles on Holland, Israel, and Ireland, and I was in the middle of writing one on Belgium when the money was withdrawn. Oh, that was a dreadful thing. Actually, I had written half the project on Belgium when they called me from the office and said just drop your pen; we can't pay you for another minute. So that was all wasted, but I enjoyed my "post-graduate" service with the Labor Department.

Q: That's where we worked together.

PLUNKETT: That's right. Anyway, I want to make the point that possibly the most productive aspects of my work in Israel were the long-term contact with the Arab community and the publication of this really historical document about what the Histadrut used to be.

Q: Could you cite an example or two of your relations with the Arab community?

PLUNKETT: Well, yes. There was this young Nazareth Arab who was one of my early contacts. At that time we had what we called the Trainee Program. No Arab had ever been sent to the United States on a Trainee Program and I thought that would be a good idea. So I nominated him. He was in the Nazareth office of the employment service and it was kind of a casual, not a professional, service. I doubt whether the government paid an awful lot of attention to the offices in the Arab communities, because they were established after the state. But he was a very smart fellow, and the Mission resisted me greatly in trying to send an Arab to the states. I don't understand why.

There was no contact whatever with the Arab community before I came there. I'm speaking now of the early years when I was there with the Mission. My nominee came here and really made quite an impression. When he got back he made a speech somewhere and said "I am eternally grateful to my Government of Israel for giving me this opportunity." I was so pleased with that, because it showed some kind of a relationship with Israel. In those days it was hoped that what is happening now or what happened during the Intifada would never happen. I think it was never thought that it would. Anyway, he was the first and, as far as I know, the only Arab who was ever sent on a training program grant. It's kind of like "one woman" but no more.

Q: How about some more examples of your relations with the Arabs.

PLUNKETT: Oh yes, I became very friendly with the Muslim Mayor of Nazareth, and particularly with his wife who was a very intelligent woman and very outgoing. She was sent as a delegate to a number of conventions of women around the world. She was not one of those homebody Arab women at all. I used to see her fairly frequently. Frank Sinatra donated the funds to construct a building in Nazareth for the Histadrut. I went there fairly frequently and talked to groups of Arabs about this and that. Most of the people there in Nazareth spoke English. And of course George Kteily, the trainee, spoke English. The Histadrut had an Arab section with an Arab at the head of it. I became very friendly with him. He lived in Haifa but came down to Tel Aviv to work. Once he invited me for a weekend to his house, and I went. He was a very nice man and quite intelligent. He was responsible for a number of my visits to Haifa and contacts with Arabs there.

I also developed good relations with the Technion, Israel's leading technical university in Haifa. It had a labor division and while I was still there in Israel, the Technion invited my cousin, Harry Van Arsdale, to a conference. He had come out of the famous Local 3 in New York of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (IBEW). They named a wing of the Technion building for Harry and in Silver Spring, Maryland, where the AFL-CIO labor school, The George Meany Labor Studies Center, is now located, there is a large bust of Harry right in the entrance hall. So that little boy in my childhood got to be an international labor leader, you see.

Anyway, where was I?

Q: You were winding up your discussion of your experiences in Israel and then I think you wanted to talk about your work in Holland.

PLUNKETT: Yes. I could go on probably for hours talking about that Israel experience because it was such an important one in my whole life. I have kept in touch with a number of Israelis, although I left there 25 years ago.

MILES S. PENDLETON JR.
Consular Office, Staff Assistant

Tel Aviv (1968-1970)

Miles S. Pendleton, Jr. was born in New Jersey in 1939. He graduated from Yale University in 1961 and received his MPA from Harvard University in 1967. Upon entering the Foreign Service in 1967, his postings included Burundi, Tel Aviv, Brussels and Paris. Mr. Pendleton was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: Well, are you in Israel from, what, '68 to –

PENDLETON: Right.

Q: '68 about?

PENDLETON: Well, we actually arrived early in 1968. In preparation for Israel, of course, I was given the French part of the "French," which was that I was sent to FSI to study French and then assigned to Israel. So that's fairly normal in the Foreign Service, to be assigned to French instruction and then to a country where French isn't one of the most frequently used languages. Fortunately, English is. While waiting for a budgetary travel hold to be lifted, I was assigned to the Turkish Desk for ten days. My principal assignment was to hang pictures of former U.S. ambassadors to Turkey on the wall. We arrived in Israel in February of '68, so we missed the Six-Day War, and we departed before the Yom Kippur War in '73. We were there during a time (from the Israeli's point of view) of psychological and physical expansion, which was very exciting for Israelis, and in a sense, it was a very exciting and positive time to be in Israel if you were not totally preoccupied with the Arab side of the equation.

Q: You were there, then, from '68 to what?

PENDLETON: '70. The summer of '70.

Q: What was your impression of Israel when you first arrived?

PENDLETON: In a sense, you can't go to Israel without being almost immediately struck by the people, the kind of dynamism, the energy, the "Israeliness" of the people who live up to their reputation as go get 'em, stand up for themselves people. You have that. I was extremely struck by how small the country was. I think it's the size of New Jersey. From the deck outside our bedroom, we could see the hills that had been captured a few months previously from the Jordanians on the West Bank. We were living in Herzliya Pitu'a, which is in the narrowest sleeve of Israel proper. You quickly realized that you were living in a land of pent-up energy and that it really was pent up, that you had only 12 miles, say, from the sea to the former border right where we lived. I took an immediate liking to the Israelis I got to know, and I think that there's something about a first post that always lives with one. Certainly my married life really started in Israel. My professional life started in Israel. Our daughter, who is now 28 and an attorney, was born in Israel. So our family life started in Israel. And I was earning $8,200 a year, but we never lived better, in a funny way, and it was one of those times in our life that seemed to fit very well with the mood of the Israelis after the Six-Day War.

Q: Well, I'm told that there was a real sense of euphoria after the Six-Day War because they felt that, you know, they could do anything. I mean, for the first time, they really felt Israel was there to stay.

PENDLETON: Well, I sensed that, but six months had past from the war when we arrived, and yet there was this undercurrent and overcurrent which was very much one of being upbeat, being optimistic, and sometimes it's hard for Israelis to be optimistic because of (a) their Jewishness, if they're Jewish Israelis, and (b) the fact that the country has a kind of institutionalized fragility by its very geographic nature. But that was quite true.

Q: Can you describe a bit who was the Ambassador, the embassy, and what you were doing.

PENDLETON: The Ambassador, whom I never really met for a long time, was Walworth Barbour, who was an institution. He'd been there, I think, nine or ten years at that point. He remained a total of 13, 14 years. He refused other assignments. Barbour was offered Moscow at one point. I think he was afraid he couldn't pass the physical, because he was manifestly overweight. I did get to know him well in the end because I became his staff assistant, but initially I was assigned, of course, as a consular officer. And I was assigned to look after Americans in distress, welfare and whereabouts. I had a lot to learn about that. Certainly, learning about the embassy wasn't too easy from that particular perch. Almost immediately, I had a run in with Bill Dale, who was the Deputy Chief of Mission. The first weekend we were there, I was assigned to be the duty officer for the embassy, and I had never even walked around the embassy or been shown around it. And there was an event with Jordan which required a flash cable from Washington and our embassy to Amman. Suddenly, I was part of the process to get it out, but I had never in the A-100 course been shown how to write a cable or what was involved in sending one. We were never told that, and the nice person in the communications office said, "Don't worry, we'll take care of it." Well, the upshot was that the cable did not reach its destination, and that wasn't discovered until the following Monday, when I found myself sitting in the Deputy Chief of Mission's office being more or less berated. I just told him, that frankly, I was astonished that I had been assigned at the outset of my tenure to be the embassy's duty officer (which somebody mindlessly went through and made up the duty roster (and put in a position of some trust when I couldn't possibly know whether I was fulfilling it or not.

So we had a bit of a go around about that, and I went back to look after citizens in distress. I was feeling a bit like myself at that point. The first one on the first day taught me another lesson, which you would appreciate. A hotel called and said, "We have a woman here who's very ill. She's an American." I said to the head local, "host country nationals" were called in those days, "Well, let's go over to her hotel. It's just down the street, I gather." He said, "I wouldn't do that if I were you." Anyway, we went, and I went up to the room and knock on the door. The woman yells, "Come in." I go in. She gets up off of the bed and says, "I'm sick," and then proceeds to throw up all over me. So I could see that Jack, the head local, thought, "Well, this young man is going to learn fast, or not at all." And so we slunk back to where I could change my clothes. My first citizen in distress was inebriated, and life in consular office kind of went up and down hill from there.

How did we learn about the embassy as a young couple? The DCM invited my wife and me to dinner at their house. We didn't have a car at that point, so we had to walk quite a long way and were pretty tuckered out when we got there. And when we got to dinner we found his secretary there, who had just announced to him that she was not going to stay in Tel Aviv, where she'd just arrived, but was going back to the States. He said to my wife, "Well, you will come and be my secretary starting on Monday." And my wife said, "Now, wait, I was a secretary at Look Magazine, and I went to Harvard Law School to get away from being a secretary because I couldn't see where it was leading me. I want to think about this." Well, we discussed it, and I said, "Look, where I am, I'll never learn about an embassy. Why don't you say you'll take the job for six weeks. By then they've got to have somebody else from Washington, and you can brief me on how an embassy works." She did that, and it was helpful for both of us.

We had a lot of mental cases in the Welfare and Whereabouts section. Too many Americans were dispatched to the Holy Land by themselves and fell apart upon landing. One day I met Mr. Afroyim, of the Afroyim decision by the Supreme Court, that you can have dual nationality. Then I moved to the visa section, which I just hated, because no Israeli going to the States wants to say that he is going "down" from Jerusalem, "yeridah", as against going up to Jerusalem, "aliyah". And so they would do anything to convince a Foreign Service Officer that they were just going to Aunt Minnie's wedding and would be back within a week. And then, of course, you'd get the adjustment of status straightaway, and you'd know they were lying to you. I couldn't bear it, and I never could have been a career visa officer.

Q: I was a supervisory consular officer and I think one of the hardest things was for young officers in the visa process to be lied to. I mean someone would look them right in the eye and lie to them, and it's not the sort of thing that we normally run across, you know, in our education. Under the system you might run across some things but not people outright lying to you. I would think there would be a lot of problems, because of the close connections back in the United States, with refusing visas. Did you get screams and yells from Congress?

PENDLETON: All the time, and a funny thing happened. I never, as I say, really met the Ambassador. He only came to the office from 10:00 to 12:30 or so each day, which was a bit unusual. I've always described him as being like a guided missile (expensive to keep in place, but very much on target when launched). I thought he was a terrific ambassador as I got to know him better. However, one day I turned down a person to go to the States, because our chief local in the visa section, host country national, told me that the young lady had admitted that she was going to get married, which sadly you couldn't do in those days. And so I said, "Well, I believe you. If she said that, then I can't give her the visa, as much as I hate to..." It turned out she was the daughter of the president of one of the biggest Israeli-American corporations and that the father was very close to the Ambassador and the embassy leadership and everybody else, and so the word that came down was that I was to reverse myself and give the visa. And I said, "No, I won't," being petulant and not totally caught up in the system at that point, and I said, "If the Consul General or the Ambassador (if the Ambassador as an exequator that gives him the legal right to give a visa -- wants to give the visa, they may do so, but I simply can't, and I won't." And I was told that that would finish me with the Ambassador, but since I hadn't really met him it didn't matter. But he got me up to his office, and I told him I wouldn't, and I went away and thought I'd better start packing my bags. And about a week later, the Admin Counselor came and said, "The Ambassador wants you as his staff aide." And there was a lesson in that someplace. So I moved up to his office. Incidentally, a letter came from a Congressman about the famous visa saying all the young lady wanted to do was to get married. I was vindicated. And she did get married.

Q: Before we talk about the ambassador's Office, you mentioned a large number of mental problems. I have been told that Israel gets a lot of people who want to be close to Jesus or Mohammed or Yahweh or whatever it is, and they go there, so that you end up with a lot of really unstable people.

PENDLETON: Right, absolutely correct, at least in those days, and I assume that still happens. And many were American Christians, young usually, who thought that the answer to a very difficult life here in the United States usually involving mental problems would be to go to Jerusalem, to go to the Holy Land. There would be occasions when you would find that the pilot of the plane they were flying on would radio ahead and alert Yakov Hospital for the mentally unstable and the embassy and anybody else that somebody was arriving who was going to need special attention. We were involved in a sad number of those cases. My wife and I also went to visit prisoners in prisons on a couple of occasions together and once went to a psychiatric prison, where a great deal of torture had taken place in the past. My wife and I found ourselves seated at a table in an amphitheater with lights on us while we were trying to find out about the fate of an American prisoner, or mental patient(I can't remember at this point. But it was one of those memorable experiences.

Another memorable experience of a more positive nature was the chance we had to give people a year's worth of Social Security and Railway Retirement Benefit Checks all at once. That was when Washington finally decided what it was going to do about delivery to Druze in the Golan Heights, those whose benefits were cut off when their mountain villages in what had been Syria were captured during the Six Day War. Druze had worked in Detroit and Chicago before retiring to the Golan and were quite reliant on their Social Security benefits. These were often American citizens who, when you met them in their traditional villages, didn't give much impression that they'd ever lived in the United States. But they certainly had for a long time and had earned these benefits. So finally the high muckamucks in Washington decided that these checks, which had been held up for over a year, could be delivered if one wrote "via" Israel on the envelopes, and didn't make the switch to Israel totally. And so I was dispatched with my wife and her visiting cousin in our Volkswagen, to these Druze villages. Well, you can imagine when a person arrived with thousands and thousands of dollars worth of checks to give away there was much slaughtering of the goat and eating of the eyeball and other things which unnerved our stomachs but left very pleasant memories.

Q: Could you tell about being staff aide to Walworth Barbour, who was the "Mr. Israel" for the United States for so long. You saw him towards the end of his reign?

PENDLETON: Well, I saw him about three-quarters of the way through, but he'd settled into a pattern. One was to let the Embassy be run, by and large, by his Deputy Chief of Mission, and for most of the time I was working with Barbour, J. Owen Zurhellen, who had been an authority on Japan, a very dynamic, sometimes roughly dynamic individual, was the Deputy Chief of Mission. Owen could do almost anything with his eyes shut, and he was allowed very large measure of play, both in terms of substance and in terms of administration. He knew when to defer to the Ambassador and when to seek the Ambassador's judgment, and he had the Ambassador's confidence, totally, as far as I could see. And yet I found myself in a bit of an awkward situation because I was not working for Owen but for the Ambassador, and the Ambassador wasn't there very much. There were a few occasions when the messages were crossed and when Owen got cross. Barbour didn't get cross with me much because I think I served him well in term of what his traditional expectations were. Having been there already nine years or so, he knew every Israeli, and while he did not speak Hebrew, which was in a way a bit sad because he missed a lot of fun, he would over the years go to all-night sessions with key Israelis and play cards and be with them at moments of high crisis. And he brought a kind of stability to the embassy in both form and substance which was very, very useful. He was extremely well respected by the leaders of the American Jewish Community, which was a great supporter of Barbour staying on, because they believed that he understood Israel very well, understood the angst of Israelis, understood what the American role might usefully be in Israel, and they didn't want to get into trying to have somebody new who might be less predictable. The Administration respected him. His Arabist colleagues, I think, had (and you would know from interviews, I guess, better than I would) some degree of skepticism about him.

Q: Oh, absolutely. I mean this is part of the dynamic. We're talking about the ambassadors and others who served in Egypt, Jordan, Syria, Lebanon, or Saudi Arabia.

PENDLETON: On the other hand, I described him previously as being like a guided missile. If there was a message that had to get through, he could pick up the phone and call Golda Meir and just lay it to her absolutely straight, and it would be listened to. He didn't overdo it. If anything, he probably underdid it. But that allowed him to be such a voice of authority that today, I think, it's really equivalent to the President picking up the phone, because we did not have at that point the kind of involvement of the President and Secretary of State that you have at this point. At that point, it was the Jarring Mission, and Jarring was a Swedish diplomat reporting to the United Nations, and we were not involved in shuttle diplomacy and things which we have come to take for granted. We did not have Presidents or Secretaries of State fluttering around (very usefully, I would say) but we were feeling our way during that period. It was a time where we continued to support Israel very heavily financially, and the arrival of the first F-16s came during that period. It was also the period when some of the first terrorism events, the first hijackings, came in the region. I remember leaving the embassy one night and the Marine guard said, "There's a phone call you'd better take." It was Stuttgart saying, "We're following on radar a hijacked plane coming your way." We had not had that experience before and didn't really know how to handle it adequately. It was also the period of Black September.

Q: I was going to say, the Black September was towards the end of your time there. It occurred in Jordan, September 1970.

PENDLETON: I had left for home leave and reassignment to Burundi, a few months earlier. In the runup to Black September, I became aware of what everybody who reads newspapers now knows, that there were more communications between the Israelis and King Hussein than one supposed, than I as a newspaper reader had imagined, and that there was a singularly important role for the United States at a variety of levels that we needed to play. And it was a period during which I had a chance, even based on some of my contacts from my consular work, to find out what was going on down on the Suez Canal, where both sides had heavy fortifications. One informant was a U.S. citizen who renounced his citizenship in front of me and then went to serve in the Israeli Army down there.

There were ways that I could begin to learn to be a reporting officer, but most of what I was paid for was Friday night. In those days an "immediate cable" was used rather indiscriminately, with no indications as to whether action at night would be needed, and every Friday night as people were dumping their cables before the weekend into the code room back in Washington (and I've been guilty of the same thing (we'd start about eight o'clock getting a flood of incoming cables, and I often would have to move into the embassy and stay there overnight reading them and deciding whether the Deputy Chief of Mission had to be alerted or anybody else had to be alerted. That also was a useful sort of training, in a sense. If you make a mistake, you can make a bad mistake, and it's fairly evident quite quickly. In general, I didn't make mistakes, but just a week before leaving, after a near-flawless run of about a year, I made a booboo which I will recover from someday.

Q: What was that?

PENDLETON: I frankly don't remember what it was about, but I do remember a very angry Owen Zurhellen at six in the morning saying I should have brought it to him at midnight. I waited till first light, I think. He reached in his wallet and pulled out the number of the Operations Center at State and called them. I memorized that number on the spot and know it to this day.

Q: Was Ambassador Barbour concerned about unfolding events in the region?

PENDLETON: He was of course concerned, but he had served in the region during World War II and had seen it all over the years -- even the sinking of a ship bringing supplies of food and liquor to the diplomatic section in Cairo. The corps had gone up to Alexandria to see the ship arrive and it had been sunk right before their eyes. So Barbour came to have a remarkable way of suppressing concern. He was notably overweight and also sick and for many months was at home.

Only the deputy chief of mission, myself and his chauffeur saw him during this period. I would say that his concern became even more modulated than it normally was.

Let me just tell you a story which I heard but was not there for. During the Six-Day War, there was great fear about the embassy being destroyed.

Q: This was 1967.

PENDLETON: In '67. And at one point everybody went down to the sub-basement parking lot to use it as a bomb shelter, and people, I'm told, were understandably a bit tense. Barbour was down there, and he said to his secretary in a very loud voice, "Take dictation, please." So everybody hushed to listen to what the Ambassador was going to say. And he said, "Special for Sisco," who was the Assistant Secretary for North African and Near Eastern Affairs, "from Barbour: fail to understand why shipment of my new couch for the residence has not been expedited." Et cetera. Well, everybody calmed down, allegedly, after that because they knew he was counting on having his embassy and his residence and his team. This was the way he approached so many issues. When he picked up the phone, there was often nobody else in the room. And I've heard him a fair number of times, and I've heard him become angry, but an awful lot of communication from that Ambassador drifted unrecorded, I think. As mentioned previously, the deputy chief of mission, Owen Zurhellen, had a pleasant sort of temper, which added spice to each day. When Owen got angry it was more of an event.

But in terms of the substance, I realize in retrospect that I didn't untangle it as well as I would like to have, and I was especially aware of this some years later when I became head of the Office of Israel and Arab-Israeli Affairs in the Department, and I was so glad that I understood Israeli Angst and sorry that I didn't understand a bit more of the history, although I'd read widely, and even what had gone on when I was in the Ambassador's office.

TERRENCE CATHERMAN
Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Tel Aviv (1968-1970)

Terrence Catherman was born in Michigan and attended the University of Michigan in the early 1940s prior to joining the army. He completed his bachelors and master's degrees in political science. He joined the Foreign Service and received his first post in Tel Aviv, Israel. His Foreign Service career also took him to Germany and Yugoslavia. He was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt in January 1991.

CATHERMAN: Israeli society was, of course, very proud of what it had done. It felt that it was, I don't want to give Israeli society a broad brush treatment, but my impression as I look back on that era now is that it had pretty much established itself as impregnable, omnipotent in that part of the world. From my point of view they looked that way. They had won the war, of course there were many Israelis who were grieving at losses of their family members from the Six Day War and I always found that touching. But they felt pretty much that they were able to handle themselves very well in the Middle East. It was my job, and it was not an easy job, to go around and try to convince them in innumerable weekend visits around the country speaking in large and small groups that they would have to figure out a way of making their existence in that part of the country more palatable to the surrounding countries and societies. It was hard work. I loved my stay there and certainly it was one of the most stimulating experiences of my life dealing with the Israelis. I had some touching personal relationships with people with whom I was more at home speaking Russian than English. I learned pretty good Hebrew. I was able to do my business in Hebrew and read the newspapers before I left. There was some military tension, but not a great deal. I will say this, I made quite a contribution, I think, to the positive development of the Israeli-American Fulbright exchanges program. That was one of the high points of my contribution there.

Q: What was the thrust of your work essentially?

CATHERMAN: In Israel?

Q: Yes, in Israel.

CATHERMAN: Well, we had an enormous amount of press work to do because of the intense relationship between the two governments. Due to innumerable visits by congressmen, senators, State Department representatives, the Secretary of State was in and out quite a bit, we had an active relationship with the Israeli and the foreign press. I did a lot of that myself. The other aspect which was important to me was the academic exchanges program. I guess I had three things: the press to handle; the academic exchanges program; and then I had the explanation of American foreign policy as regards Israel, to try to explain it to the Israelis. That was in the period of the so-called Rogers plan, Secretary Rogers. I don't remember the details of it anymore but essentially it asked that the Israelis withdraw from the West Bank, the same things we are asking these days. I had a pretty rough go.

Q: The Likud government hadn't yet come in. It wasn't quite as bad as it would have been later on.

CATHERMAN: No, but the Israelis were always very suspicious of our attempts to get them to consider withdrawing, obviously.

Q: You never had any trouble selling the American story except as far as the policy was concerned when it impinged on its particular interest.

CATHERMAN: That is right. They were very friendly and I think from a quality point of view the academic exchanges program was the best one I ever saw. We had really good people going back and forth between the two countries.

Q: I gather that you found a very high degree of education and awareness of world events, a highly intellectual society.

CATHERMAN: Very sophisticated society. A society which seemed to me at any rate to know what it wanted to do and how to do it. Of course the development of the country itself, the infrastructure and everything, was staggering for me. I was very impressed.

MARGARET J. BARNHART
Consular Officer
Jerusalem (1968-1970)

Margaret J. Barnhart was born in 1928 in Greensburg, Pennsylvania. She graduated from Goucher College in 1950 with a major in international relations. She joined UNESCO and was employed there between 1951 and 1955. Following that she worked for the State Department in the Speakers Bureau. In 1961 she enlisted in the Foreign Service and held positions in Paris, Tokyo, Jerusalem, Bangkok, and Rio de Janeiro as well as several positions in the Department of State.

Q: You were in Jerusalem when to when?

BARNHART: '68 to '70. I arrived on the day that Sirhan Sirhan shot Bobby Kennedy. From the airport I went right to the consular section to look through the files for his family.

Q: He was a Palestinian?

BARNHART: Yes, he lived up on the West Bank. This was a good way to remember the date of my arrival. I had heard that he had been shot when we were Rome. By the time we got to Athens, the pilot had heard that he died. President Kennedy had died while I was in Paris. A big memorial service was held at Notre Dame. I joined my Embassy colleagues in attendance at the service.

Q: Back to Jerusalem.

BARNHART: Jerusalem was fun. I went there, as I say, in June of '68 to '70, and that was interesting. I was in charge of the consular section, and I had one assistant who was there along with about 8 foreign nationals. The Mandlebaum Gate had come down the year before.

Q: We're talking about '67 war when the West Bank in Jerusalem had come under Israeli rule.

BARNHART: When I got there one year later in '68, I said, "Where's Mandlebaum Gate? Well, right outside of my office, the old consulate that was on the west side, the Arab side, was there. The Deputy Consul General lived upstairs, and we had the consular section downstairs. And then over on the east side, the Israeli side, the Consul General lived upstairs in the building, and the rest of the consulate, admin, political who'd come, were all over there. There was a lot of back and forth. On my side I had the Iraqi Jew, I had a Sabra, being a native born Israeli, and I had a Moroccan. I had the Moroccan but then I had Muslims. I had a whole variety of Christian-Muslims, Muslim Muslims that would get down on a rug five times a day to pray. And he shared an office with this Sabra, but they got along. We just had this mixed bag. Shortly after I had gotten there, there was a big bang. Oh, what's happened? And I went out right away. One of my locals there said, "Oh, that was an explosion." And it had blown in the window in the office where my deputy was sitting, had blown in that window, and he had been just out in the garden. I went out right away and looked around. The detonator had gone off but the bomb hadn't, and I almost stepped on the thing. So that was a little excitement that day.

Q: What was the bomb for?

BARNHART: With the Palestinians these things were going on all the time. The Palestinians and the Israelis would put bombs in wastebaskets. One side would do it and bomb something in Tel Aviv. Then they would retaliate. They would go back to the West Bank, the Israelis, and blow down a building. They found one kid that was involved in this, or they thought was involved. They would go out and take the whole family, give them 24 hours or even eight hours to get out, and then blow it up. It was pretty dicey. I lived on the West Bank, and I had a choice where I wanted to live. Most of us did live on the West Bank. We could get better and larger housing than on the East Bank. We were separate from the Embassy. I mean, we were the Consulate General reporting directly to Washington. It was this corpus separatum, I guess, thing that we didn't recognize Jerusalem as the capital of Israel, or Jerusalem as being part of Israel.

Q: Who was the Consul General when you were there?

BARNHART: Steve Campbell, his wife was French. I never met her. She died before I got there. She had done lots of work in the Resistance and was decorated by the French Government, but unfortunately she died of cancer. I knew some people at the UN offices in Jerusalem. One of the girls had a house at Gaza. We used to go down there on the weekends. You were certainly limited in where you could go. You could go up to Galilee or Lake Tibberedge. You could roam around the West Bank. But we couldn't cross the Allenby Bridge.

Q: Oh, Allenby Bridge brought you into Jordan?

BARNHART: Into Jordan.

Q: Was everyone there monitoring the temper of the Palestinians in the West Bank and how this was working out?

BARNHART: Not everyone but political officers both in Jerusalem and from the Embassy in Tel Aviv monitored the situation. When I arrived from Tokyo, I knew far more about the Vietnamese War and what was going on. I remember seeing a headline that Nasser died, but I knew nothing. I hadn't been there more than two or three months, and I pretty much became pro-Arab, as did almost everyone there. They gave us a hard time, they set up roadblocks - the Israelis.

Q: Did you have any Palestinians coming to the Consulate and asking for help and that sort of thing, and particularly American Palestinians?

BARNHART: Some yes, but not too many. There were other Americans that lived there, religious group type people and so forth, but basically the Americans did not create much of a problem for us. Occasionally there were. There was one famous American, Joe someone, but he was mayor of some little West Bank town and his only problem was: when are you all coming to eat, Saturday, Sunday? And I would turn to my deputy, "You go." I just didn't care much. I'd go when I had to, to some of these. The Arabs wanted to entertain all the time. The Arabs were wonderful when they wanted visas. I did visa work for awhile. They would come in and say, "I have a wife and five to ten kids here, and here's a piece of paper that I own land here, etc., and I want to go just see my brother. I'm coming back, of course. I have all these reasons to come back." And then I found they were walking across to the local gasoline station and borrowing money to come in and show it to me in cash. "We can't show you bank accounts, because our bank is in Jordan." A lot of them would come in too and say, "I'm going to be a student." "Where are you going?" "I'm going to aviation school." And then I said, "And then you're going to work for El-Al?" Air Jordan I didn't think. I had checked on that through our embassy, and they got their pilots from their air force. All kinds of stories. I used to get free food here at the Calvert Inn, though, because of all those nice young Palestinians who couldn't handle US schools and who thus chose employment, i.e. Calvert Inn owned by a West Bank family. I tried to give a limited number to the Arabs. If you had 30 student applications in one day and none of them were any good, you'd have to give a few, because you're also giving visas to the Israelis. But they'd end up in a restaurant or someplace, and say, "You were right. I wasn't a very good student." Anyway they were fun.

Q: Did you ever have any dealings with the mayor of the Israeli part of Jerusalem, Teddy Kalleck?

BARNHART: Yes, I had met him several times on business or at receptions. There were seven countries that didn't recognize Jerusalem, namely the Dutch, the French, the Spanish, the Greeks, and the United States, but all had small consulates in Jerusalem. The diplomatic community was small as well. You could go to five receptions in the same week and see them every time. Teddy Kalleck handled official business. He was nice. I was reading about the one who's there now, who is not so nice.

Q: Not so nice, no. He's sort of a true believer, I guess.

BARNHART: You couldn't drive everywhere when you wanted. The Maesherein area of the Orthodox Jews was right outside of my office. You don't drive on a Saturday morning, because they'll stone your car. I used to play golf down in Caesarea on the Israeli coast, and at least once, I had to spend the weekend because I could not get on the highway because it was one of the high holy days. Orthodox Jews used to come in the office for visas. "We have to go to the United States for the high holy days," and I had thought all Jews came to Jerusalem for the high holy days. I learned that for many, their head rabbi was in the U.S. The Orthodox Jews, they'd sit there and they'd look down, and when I'd ask them a question, they continued to look down. They'd never look at you. So then when it came time, if the locals put the passport in, then I signed it. I'd sit there and just hold it to see if they would reach for it - because they won't touch a nonbeliever or have any contact. If they really wanted it and wanted to get out of the office, they'd finally grab it.

Q: Somebody who was dealing with them said that when you've got a whole roomful, it really smells, because they didn't bathe.

BARNHART: No, and they wore those heavy coats and fur hats. While I was there, the Israelis hired a pathologist to work at the Hebrew University. He lived in Jerusalem in the Orthodox area. Because the Orthodox don't believe in pathology, they went and dragged his mother and his wife out of the apartment and did considerable damage. They didn't kill them, but they tore apart the apartment. That was one of the first things I remember seeing. There wasn't anything we could do about it. They are violent, and they were even in those days. If I had been the man, I would have packed up and gone home, but I guess he was going to stay around. He was Jewish.

Q: Dealing with our Embassy in Tel Aviv, was it sort of us and them between Jerusalem and...?

BARNHART: Yes, pretty much so. Our Consulate Generals for the most part were pro-Arab, I would say. Consular people move around and like that, but still there was not too much support for the Israelis, whereas Tel Aviv was just the opposite. I don't know whether they had an Arabist there or not. I don't think so. They would read our reports. Anytime Jerusalem sent cables into Washington, we'd info Tel Aviv. But there wasn't any love lost, or very little.

Q: Were you doing any looking for...

BARNHART: Counting halftracks? Well, when I was living on the West Bank, we always - I think they were called halftracks, these big convoy things - and you always reported those. You counted them if you happened to be around to see one. Yes, we did report a lot of them, all of us were told to. It was a small consulate there, and so we all watched what went on.

WAT T. CLUVERIUS, IV
Econ-USAID Officer
Tel Aviv (1969-1971)

Wat T. Cluverius, IV was born in Massachusetts on December 4, 1934. He obtained a B.A. from North-Western University. He obtained an M.A. from Indiana University. He entered the Foreign Service in 1967. He served in Jeddah, Tel Aviv, and Jerusalem. He also served in Washington, DC in the Near Eastern Bureau. He retired in 1988. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on May 31, 1990.

Q: I was going to say that there was almost an unacceptability if you once served there you couldn't go somewhere else. At least that was the word of mouth.

CLUVERIUS: Yes, that was the image. Now there were already two Middle Eastern experts in the Embassy in Tel-Aviv. I was to go and do an economic-AID job and then move into the political section later. There were 2 guys there already. Maybe 3, let me think. Yes, Hayward Stackhouse was political counselor and he had a Middle Eastern background. Not a pure background, shall we say, he had served elsewhere and all of that. David Korn was there at the time. Also he had done western Arabic and I think he did one tour in Beirut. David, it soon became apparent, didn't give a damn whether he served in the Arab world again. He became very much an Israel partisan. Hayward Stackhouse just did it because it was an intellectual thing to do. The 3rd guy who had done Arabic and served in the Arab world was Jay Freres in the political section. And those were the first 3 so-called Arabists, a label I don't like, to serve in Embassy-Tel Aviv. And they were all still there, so no one knew what their onward careers would look like. But Eilts told me this tour in Tel Aviv would make my career. So I went to Tel-Aviv in the summer of 1969.

Q: Who was the Ambassador then?

CLUVERIUS: Oh, the Ambassador was Walworth Barbour. He eventually left a few years later after being ambassador there for 13 years. He was quite an interesting old character. Wally Barbour served in Baghdad in the late 30's and didn't like it; he was Minister in Cairo during World War II and didn't like that very much. But he pretty much ran the top policy and all the major policy of the Embassy with the government of Israel out of his hip pocket. He had tremendous clout in Washington and with the American Jewish community. In fact, I accidentally discovered in 71 that most initiatives that the US was considering in the region, ones that might be sensitive, were informally at least cleared with Wally Barbour, including instructions to our Embassy, or, rather, our interests section in Cairo. Things were cleared with Barbour to see if they would upset the Israelis or not. So I arrived in the summer of 69 and did this econ-AID job. Which turned out to be absolutely fascinating because it was only 2 years after the war. Our AID relationship that we had had with Egypt for the Palestinian refugees in Gaza had been transferred to the Embassy in Tel Aviv. Supervision of the voluntary agencies like CARE, Catholic Relief Services, Lutheran World Federation, that we had with Jordan in the West Bank, were now administered out of Embassy Tel-Aviv. And that was my portfolio. Gaza was then dangerous. There was an organized resistance down there at the time. Not like the Intifada, it was more based on cells and the PLFP, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, rather than on popular sentiment as was the intifada. So, I was the only Embassy officer allowed to go to Gaza. I covered Gaza both in the economic-aid sense, particularly working with CARE, which had huge programs down there--Food for Peace, Food for Work, and all of that kind of thing. I did both the politics and the economic aid supervision and reporting for Gaza. On the West Bank it was a little more complicated because that's the turf of the Consulate General in Jerusalem. But they couldn't administer these aid programs because to do so one had to deal with the Israeli military and civilian occupation authorities. The Israeli authorities in general and the Israeli occupation authorities would never deal with the consulate and vice-versa. So on the West Bank my responsibility was strictly supervision of the aid programs but obviously I went and saw things and saw people that the consulate people didn't. I would work with somebody in the consulate and we would jointly do the political reporting. I became early on something of a Palestinian expert.

Q: Well a little compare and contrast. Again at your level, how did you find coming to Israel and dealing with Israeli authorities. Was this quite a change?

CLUVERIUS: I think that was the only time in my life I really felt culture shock. I didn't feel it the first time I lived abroad in the Navy which was in Cyprus. I didn't feel it so much when I went to Saudi Arabia because I had the language. I went over a weekend, flew from Jeddah, had a new baby ... my wife took my son and the new baby home to the States for a couple of months. We had some health problems with the baby in Jeddah. So we all flew to Beirut where I put my wife and two kids on the plane to Chicago via Europe. I spent a few hours in the Beirut airport then flew to Cyprus, stayed a couple of days, saw some friends (I had lived there in 60-62) and then flew directly into Tel Aviv. So that was quite a culture shock. Here's a place that's a mixture of Europe and, perhaps, of Eastern Europe, totally different language, noisy, didn't know the language. Although I soon discovered that all the business of Israel is done in English. If you're dealing with, shall we say, the lower social-economic spectrum like cabdrivers and waiters and folks like that, they speak Arabic because they're Sephardi. So I found the Arabic kind of useful. And professionally the English was useful. As a result, although I studied Hebrew, I never became very good at it. But I also had a kind of access for a relatively junior guy which was that the Israelis were very interested in what we were doing for the occupied territories, obviously. They were interested that we do it right, they were interested in being cooperative, because the success of a Care program or Catholic Relief Services Program, is good for Israel's image and something that they don't have to spend money on. It helps keep the population quiet if social services are being delivered. So I had resources so to speak for certain Israeli officials in the Ministry of Social Welfare and the Ministry of Defense, which had overall responsibility for the occupation. So I had good access. I discovered that the Israelis, of course, have a kind of permanent chip on their shoulder. A tendency to automatically, so to speak, adopt the attitude--if you're not 100 percent, if you're only 99 percent with us then you're probably an enemy of some kind. There is a bit of that. But then again they were in the glow of their 67 victory ...

Q: I was going to ask, this must have been sort of the height of self-confidence. Because later on things weren't quite as...

CLUVERIUS: This was the height of self-confidence, the phrase "that they were still waiting for the phone call from Hussein," was very popular. They'd won a tremendous victory. They couldn't quite believe, I think, that the Arab world didn't have to come to them. They felt that they could make peace very much on their terms. They didn't understand that as a population, so to speak, even as a political culture, they didn't really understand that the Arabs had lost a war but, so what, the Arabs could just turn their backs on Israel and go about their other business in the world. They didn't have to come to Israel's terms. The Israelis didn't understand that. Obviously there were some intellectuals who did. But as a political culture they certainly did not. I was quite a unique bird really. The Israelis were fascinated by someone who had just come from the Arab world. Particularly Saudi Arabia which was a real enigma to the Israelis. The Jordanians they had known, the Egyptians they had intercourse with--usually violent but they had some contacts. So it was fascinating. The other 3 guys who had studied Arabic in the Embassy--Stackhouse, Korn and Freres, hadn't been to the Arab world just before they'd been there, as I recall. I found that the Israelis, if they thought you were biased against them, you'd never get through. If they felt you had an open mind, and would listen, after awhile then you could really argue. You could really make close friends. But you had to first prove that you weren't basically anti-Jewish or anti-Israeli. That you didn't believe all the Arab propaganda, that you believed some of what they said. Once you established your openness to them and heard them out, and after you became somewhat friendly, you could have the most wild arguments. You could really hammer and tongs it with them. And it wouldn't damage the relationship. I enjoyed it enormously for that reason and of course ultimately I ended up spending 8 years of my life living in Israel in 3 different assignments. I did the econ-aid job from summer of '69 to summer of '71, when I became number two in a three or four person political section.

Q: In that economic-aid job, what was your impression of how the Israeli authorities and maybe how the Israeli people were treating or looking upon the people of the Gaza strip in the West Bank?

CLUVERIUS: That's a good question and I think it's worth recording somewhere that at the beginning the attitude was as Abba Eban had told Washington, very carefully, right at the end of the war. That Israel had no territorial ambitions vis-a-vis Egypt or Jordan; that the Golan and Jerusalem were going to be special cases. But there were some special holy sites in addition to Jerusalem which would have to have special treatment, such as Hebron. They did sort of see themselves as holding this as a card for negotiations which they felt had to come and had to come on their terms. Because the other side had been so soundly beaten. They did keep this trust very carefully at first, unlike much later. They appointed really top officers to be the military government types, really top lawyers to sort out the legal complexities of occupation. They had Arabic speakers, they had officers who were on they way up. When I was in Gaza in '69 or '70, somewhere in there, Mordechai Gur was military governor and later rose to Attaché in Washington and Chief of Staff, now a member of the Knesset of the Labor Party; very bright articulate kinds of guys ran the occupation. They did see themselves as administrators of a civilian population. They were holding this in trust so to speak, a card to play for the future. They were quite open to local initiatives and didn't want to interfere in any more than they absolutely had to. There was a debate within the Labor Party at the time that they shouldn't let too many people from the territories work in Israel proper, because that would distort the nature of Jewish labor in the Jewish state. That was quite a dispute with Eban being against it and Dayan as Minister of Defense in favor of large-scale use of Arab labor in Israel because people needed work; if you were going to administer people you have to feed them yourself or let them have a job where they could feed themselves. Dayan won because the pressure of the community was such that they wanted this cheap labor. Particularly the Sephardi community which was at the bottom of the Israeli social-economic ladder.

Q: Sephardis being the ones mainly from the Arab world where as the founders of Israel, the elite, had come from East Europe.

CLUVERIUS: That's right. These were the people mostly from Morocco, Tunisia, Egypt, Iraq, Yemen. So as the Arabs came in from the occupied territories to become the street sweepers and the stoop laborers they moved the Sephardis up the ladder almost automatically. But all of this was done with great debate. I think a very principled debate within the party, within the society. Should we have 10,000 work permits or should we have 5,000. Of course later they became totally open. Should the Arabs be eligible for certain health services and other things like that. How do you pay them? The Histadrut insisted they be paid the same as a Jewish worker and that deductions be held back. And for a while they were, I think. The national health and all of that was taken out. But of course the fund I suspect has disappeared. But there was all of this going on. So it was a fascinating period. Of course the phone calls from Hussein never came. There was the War of Attrition between Egypt and Israel in '70-'71. I remember one of the rare occasions when anybody else would go into Gaza from the Embassy. The DCM, Owen Zurhellen, quite an activist fellow, really wanted to see it. So the Israelis took him down there with me and I think Gur was still military governor and OC Southern Command was Arik Sharon. He had the military control in the Sinai, all of the Sinai. And that was the day it looked like the US would arrange the cease-fire along the Canal. Which was, you will remember, artillery duels and occasional air battles. I was sitting at the bottom of the table with my contacts in Gaza, military government guys, at this lunch and these social welfare types and all of that. The DCM was sitting at the head of the table with Arik Sharon and the military governor. It wasn't that big a table but it was fascinating amongst my guys, my side of the table. They were all very pleased that this war of attrition was going to be over. It was taking a toll and some of these guys were just reservists. And it was great that the US was helping to broker the cease-fire. At the other end of the table Sharon was saying that this was a mistake, that we should use the War of Attrition to cross the canal and go to Cairo and force peace on these people on our terms. That kind of thing. Quite a belligerent chap.

Q: I'd like to get a little feel about the attitude because this is a very volatile and important time over there. Within the Embassy you had Barbour who'd been there a long time and was considered a friend of Israel. You had the political officers, one you mentioned was David Korn who became very pro Israeli. But others, were there debates that there's another side to this and after all there's a bloody big Arab world out there and here we are supporting a relatively small country without any real strategic advantage to us? In geopolitics it doesn't make a real amount of sense to get overly involved here. Was this just a matter of debate? Or was this just--assume this was the way it was going to be and -you didn't have to talk about it?

CLUVERIUS: No, I think it was talked about. It wasn't talked about in any acrimonious sense because there was an environment in which our client, Israel, had beat the bejesus out of the Soviet's clients. As you recall, some years later that was very much a motivation on Kissinger's part. That there's no way that we're going to let US arms lose to Soviet arms. There was that kind of strategic element in it, the East-West element.

Q: Going back because things are changing so rapidly now, you did think of, Syria and Egypt as being Soviet clients more than...

CLUVERIUS: Sure, there was one of those treaties of friendship, etc. between Egypt and the Soviet Union and between the Soviets and Syria. This was 2 to 3 years before Sadat threw the Soviets out. Nasser was still president in Egypt. He died while I was there in Israel. So there was this view that there was this strategic element to this relationship. There was no real reason to jump on the Israelis for occupation policies which were really quite enlightened at that time, though it did not last long. The Settlements issue had not taken off yet.

Q: We're talking about putting Israeli settlers into the occupied areas.

CLUVERIUS: That issue was not started yet. That was started a bit in '68. I think it was, in Hebron. But the official Israeli line was that these were paramilitary settlements, called Nahals, subject to the orders of the Government and therefore not in violation of the Geneva Convention, as was being claimed by the Arabs and others. The United States protested to the Israelis about some of these settlements when they were converted to clearly civilian use. Perhaps if the US had made a bigger fuss the settlements might not have become the obstacle they are today. I guess the United States did not respond forcefully then, I think they should have, obviously should have. Probably one of those hundreds of occasions in which somebody in Washington said, "Oh now we can't jump on the Israelis on this because the plate is already too full of what we're trying to do," something like that. A great mistake. Of course at that level in the Embassy I wasn't privy to the very close-hold circuit of peace making efforts. It may have been felt that maybe if the Arabs see that the Israelis are getting comfortable with this, maybe that will help bring them forward to cooperate in the peace process. It didn't of course, but that may have been an element.

Q: I want a little more of sort of the attitude that you had. One, was there any sort of frustration, going back to your previous subject, that no matter what happens, with every country we have disputes? Obviously with Israel we have policy problems, even at that time. That Israel would always prevail because it had influence back in Washington? That it almost wasn't worth trying to clash swords with Israelis from a diplomatic point of view? Because they could always bypass you through the Israeli lobby, and influence in the political process?

CLUVERIUS: That was certainly part of, shall we say, the diplomatic culture in the region. The views of the US Ambassador in Israel are going to carry more weight than the views of any other ambassador in the region. You had to keep your eye on the Lobby. But again some parts of that relationship were quite new. Until after '67, we had not been major arms suppliers for Israel. The relationship really was much more between Jewish communities, so to speak, and Israel. We weren't the major suppliers of arms. We were hardly even a minor one really before '67. It was the French and the British for their own reasons. Obviously the British-French cooperation with Israel in '56. That kind of thing. So we had some policy differences with the Israelis. But when you discuss the Arab-Israeli problem, then you had doubts about the US course in this thing. Then you weren't talking about '67. You were talking about '48 still. Shouldn't the Palestinians be allowed to go back to their homes in Haifa, Tel Aviv, and places like that. Wasn't it wrong for the Israelis to expel so many Arabs in '48. -The Israeli mythology was not believed that all those Arabs fled voluntarily in '48. That kind of discussion went on. A historical, intellectual exercise. But we didn't have a lot to be upset with the Israelis about post '67. At least by the time I was there. We did by the time I left in '72. I had some good bosses there. Jack Button, recently deceased, was the Economic Counselor. I did quite a bit of political reporting on the territories since I was always out there along with the Consulate General, of course. But their reporting tone was a bit shrill in those days and that is always a danger for the consulate general in Jerusalem. They're so much on the cutting edge. I was later Consul General myself there. It's a very difficult place to report from. You deal with the Israelis and the Palestinians. You go to bed feeling schizophrenic every night. But from the Embassy point of view, there was nothing to get really excited about with the Israelis. We were waiting for the Arabs to respond to the reality of their defeat and try to get a peace process going. There was a thing called the Jarring Mission from the UN which was US supported. There was a lot of high level diplomacy going on, trying to gin up something. Assistant Secretary Joe Sisco was very active.

Q: Sort of moving on, you then came back to NEA, the Near Eastern Bureau. And you were the Deputy Director with what was the peace process...

CLUVERIUS: There was an office created I think in . . .

Q: This was from '72 to '76?

CLUVERIUS: That's right, I left Israel in July of '72. And there was a little dispute at the end of my tour. Since I covered the territories so much I wanted to wrap up my views and this was in 6 months or so before I left. So this would have been late '71 or something like that, maybe '72. I wrote a series of messages. Basically, arguing against the belief in Washington that Israel was still holding these, now 4 to 5 years after the war, was still holding these territories solely as a card to play. I argued that that was no longer quite the case. That there were certain parts of these territories that the Israelis probably would never agree to give up. They were becoming too comfortable with it. And that was controversial. The Ambassador did not want to send the messages.

Q: Still Barbour?

CLUVERIUS: Yes, still Barbour. I had a chat with him. I think we did have what is called a "dissent channel" at that time. I felt very strongly that the Washington view was very simply that Israel was prepared to trade all the territories for peace; that the Arabs were being jerks and not coming forward and challenging the Israelis at the negotiating table. I said it isn't quite that clear. Jerusalem aside, there were areas of the territories that I didn't think the Israelis would ever agree to give up. There was the coastal strip from Elat down to Sharm el Sheikh to assure the freedom of passage down the Strait of Tiran, parts of the West Bank, particularly the Latrun salient, and probably other parts. I concluded that under the best of circumstances, I thought the Israelis would insist in negotiations, again not including Jerusalem, on taking 25 to 40 percent of all the occupied territories, the Golan completely. I laid this all out on maps for what used to be called an airgram, which was mailed, not sent telegraphically. Airgrams did not have wide readership. Still my boss didn't want to send it. I told the DCM that I really felt strongly about it and had spent all that time tramping around out there seeing more Israelis than most people in the Embassy did and seeing Palestinians, of whom the Embassy was otherwise ignorant. I saw settlers, I saw the military occupation people, all of that. So I really felt I hadn't acquired all of this insight not to have it recorded somehow. The DCM basically agreed with me, he said he would get it sent, and he did.

Q: So to get back to where you were, '72 to '76.

CLUVERIUS: I went back to be the Deputy Director of Israel and Arab-Israeli Affairs which had been created I think in '65 or '66.

Q: You sent this airgram which was a dissent but obviously based on personal experiences--did you find that this had any readership at all back in Washington?

CLUVERIUS: It did in NEA and INR but surely not on the seventh floor. At that time Hayward Stackhouse, known as Stack, who had been Political Counselor in Tel Aviv when I arrived there, was back as Director of the Office of Israel and Arab-Israel Affairs. And he offered me that job. But I didn't take it in '72. Actually, thinking back, I first went back and took a few months of academic sabbatical to try and finish my dissertation. I wasn't doing very well with that; I found that I wasn't really interested in it anymore. The Department said that if I really wanted to continue working on it after these few months off, if I don't finish it, we'll give you a job in INR, which was basically a 9 to 5 analyst job and I'd be able to finish this thing. Alternatively, they told me, if you finish in the time we're giving you or you don't want to finish it, there's a real hot job you can have which is Deputy Director of Israel and Arab-Israeli Affairs. I really had to decide, did I want a fast-track career. Obviously the Israeli Affairs office in NEA, that's all fast-track. Or did I want to finish the Ph.D. I decided I didn't give a damn anymore about the Ph.D. So I went to work in this office in the Spring of '73.

Q: What were you after? What does the office do?

CLUVERIUS: It runs like any desk, it's the bilateral desk of US-Israel relations. But in addition, the reason the name is so peculiar- Israel and Arab-Israeli Affairs- is that it was felt some years earlier, I think '65 or '66, that what was needed was one place to coordinate what we did in the Arab-Israeli context. We needed one desk to be the focal point. If we're going to do something on Egypt we should know how it is going to affect the Arab-Israeli relationship. If we're going to do something on Israel, we've got to know what the impact on Jordan might be. So Arab-Israeli things in that context were in that office as well. I joined it in spring of '73. Stack was a tremendous officer, but he had decided to retire. His wife was tired of life overseas. He really let me do my own thing, so to speak. To write think-pieces and send them up to the Front Office. The Deputy Assistant Secretary to which we reported was Roy Atherton and we also worked with the Middle East guy at the NSC who was one of the most decent people and the finest analytical minds I ever met, Hal Saunders. The Assistant Secretary was Joe Sisco, one of the most effective guys at that level in Washington. Of course the routine of a normal desk was soon to change and we would be literally living in the office for months. We were going to have a war, the '73 war.

Q: This is the October '73...

CLUVERIUS: The Ramadan War on one side and the Yom Kippur War on the other. I was in kind of an unusual spot; I was able to draft a piece that gave proper expression to both Israeli and Arab points of view, how each side would see or react to some move we were considering. No one else in the Bureau at that time had worked both sides in the field and, as a journalism major, I think I wrote well.

Q: Here you are working on a sort of coordination, was this, looking back on it, was this being telegraphed, that this war was coming? Or did it really hit us by surprise?

CLUVERIUS: It took us by surprise, at least as far as I was aware. September-October is the time of year when traditionally Egypt and Syria had military maneuvers.

There were the usual preparatory signs of this in August, as I recall. Everybody was checking, watching but nobody was urgent about it because it was routine for the time of year. You ran the usual checks of intelligence sources and nothing far out of the ordinary appeared. There was no human intelligence or communications intercepts or anything else to give a tip off. Most everybody believed that no one could really go to war anymore without something leaking out into the ether. Or some agent picking something up. It really was quite dead, quite. And of course, Israeli intelligence then had a much better, had almost a mythical reputation at the time. So if the Israelis didn't see anything urgent about these few little clues here and there, why the hell should we. Because they were believed to be damned near omniscient at that time. As it got very close to that very week, people did begin to get a bit jittery. Eban was in the United Nations in New York and so was Rodgers, I think, for the General Assembly. Kissinger was then

National Security Advisor. By Wednesday or so, I'd planned to go to the Annapolis boat show on the Saturday, Stackhouse said, "I think I'd like you to be in here on the weekend. I've got something, I've got to give a speech or something, I've got to be away. But I think the way things are, I don't like it, I'd like you to be here on Saturday, but why don't you take Friday off and go to your boat show. " So I did. And that Saturday, Stackhouse called me and said, "I'm not going and you'd better get in here, now" This is very early, 6:30 or 7:00 in the morning. "It looks like we're going to have a war." But meanwhile, of course, as you read later, and I didn't know until I got down to the Department, that there would be desperate back-and-forthing for the previous 48 hours on the highest levels, they'd been checking intelligence sources. Something was cooking, Israel still thought it was maneuvers but they were getting very, very nervous. All this was going back and forth on the highest levels and I didn't see those cables normally anyway. I saw them when I got to the office that Saturday morning, by then the War had basically begun, and we set-up an operation task force on the 7th floor. I don't think I went home for 3 days. My wife brought me changes of underwear and things into the Department. So I was very much involved right then and there in the Arab Israeli peace process. And from Then until I retired in '88, with the exception of the two years I was Ambassador to Bahrain, that was my major activity.

Q: What was the feeling when the October war broke out in the Department? What were you experts dealing with? What did you think at the beginning and as it developed?

CLUVERIUS: At the very beginning I think it was just the basic assumption of everybody that the Israelis would repeat '67. However, they didn't do very well at first. And of course the Egyptian crossing of the Canal was a brilliant military stroke. There was no doubt about that. But it was still felt that, as they went across and moved into the Sinai, it was still felt that the Israelis would repeat '67. But of course Israel takes 24 hours or so to mobilize, 36 to really get into action and perhaps 72 hours to hit full stride. So the first couple of days the Arab successes were rather discounted. The Syrians almost broke through on the Golan. An Israeli General friend of mine later told me that the Syrian breakthrough would not have happened if the Israelis hadn't had to divert some critical pieces of armor and APC's to protect and evacuate settlers. So much for the argument that the settlers contributed to security; they're a detriment. The conventional wisdom was that the Israelis would turn it around very quickly, even though they suffered initial reverses. I guess the 3rd day or 4th day it became apparent that that wasn't going to be the case, that the Israelis were having severe trouble. One thing that developed early on and changed some doctrine in this country, I think, or so I've been told, was the rate of fire in modern war had gone up. The rate of fire was enormous. Stockpiles had disappeared much more quickly than anybody had predicted on the Israeli general staff side or probably on the Egyptian and Syrian sides as well. Of course, in the middle of all this, is the hand-holding of Hussein to keep him out of it. Basically telling him, look what happened to you last time when Nasser sucked you in. The American and British basically holding him back, which was probably easier to do since he hadn't been informed anyway. He had been cut out of this one by Asad and Sadat. But as it became apparent that the Israelis weren't going to turn it around, that it wasn't going to be over in 4 or 5 days or 6 as in 67, it became apparent to us by day 4 or 5 really, that the situation might create leverage. Of course it was Kissinger's genius to sense this quickly. And we were writing papers about it. Maybe we'd have a chance here, we would have no chance if there's a real victor and a real vanquished in either direction. And we had a number of different levers. One, no one was getting decisive advantage quickly. There was time to gear up a real diplomatic effort, there was time to be a little subtle here and there. That was one piece of leverage, that the situation on the ground wasn't going to resolve itself so fast that we didn't have time to do something creative. The other piece of leverage was Israel's desperate need for supplies, particularly of ammunition. We were then working to set-up the re-supply flights through the Azores, all of our European friends not too happy with all of that. When the Israelis broke through across the Canal in the north, the Egyptian 3rd army then gradually became encircled in the south. Then we pressed very hard on the Israelis not to destroy the 3rd Army. By this time we were in probably the most collegial policy-making environments that I had ever seen or heard of in the Department. Because it was evolving so rapidly and unexpectedly, people were open to ideas. We would get together almost every morning during those early days.

Q: We didn't see this as--oh, I hope our guys win or their guys lose? We were seeing this as an opportunity?

CLUVERIUS: A possible opportunity, that's right. And we understood the Arab psychology much better than the Israelis ever did. We understood that if the Arabs took another drubbing as they did in '67, they'd close off as they did then. In other words, the loss of pride and face would be so severe that they couldn't face the process. But if they kept a little of their gains, pride wouldn't be so badly damaged, maybe there'll be enough room to maneuver. And so early on we were discussing this; every morning in those early days of the war, we'd have meetings with Joe Sisco. As Kissinger seized on all of this opportunity and began to formulate his own diplomatic strategy, then we didn't have such a collegial thing because he didn't need it anymore. We'd put up what ideas we had. I remember raising some hell one day because it was clear, from an intelligence report, that the Israelis were cutting off the water pipe to the 3rd army which was effectively encircled. It was already clear that if the 3rd army was to be encircled and destroyed, the leverage would be gone. So I raised hell to get somebody's attention to not let the Israelis salami slice this way. We had to keep them away from the 3rd army. We were writing memos that Sisco took seriously. Some of them translated into policy that Kissinger later pursued. Kissinger was extremely adept. The Israelis, usually their Ambassador, Simcha Dinitz, would yell at him for delayed supplies and he would blame Schlesinger. It was quite a game that was starting to be played. But it then quickly became...

Q: Schlesinger being the Secretary of Defense.

CLUVERIUS: He could point at the Pentagon and say they were incompetent, dragging their feet. When in fact I suspect it was Henry Kissinger manipulating things. So it was quite an intriguing time. And I think very quickly, before the cease-fire was in place, I think Kissinger had the elements of his diplomacy in hand. And of course the Soviets were part of it. He had to deal with the Soviets. You will recall he made his first trip after the war. He started in Moscow basically to see if he had anything to work with there. The Soviets had done some saber-rattling in support of the Arabs, even sending some "advisors" or what have you to Egypt. There was that great dispute about the October 22nd line, that the Israelis had violated the cease-fire lines. Everybody had to go back to the October 22nd lines. At that point I was writing papers for Roy Atherton and Hal Saunders; I was probably the only munchkin, so to speak, in the bureau at the time who had served in both in Israeli and the Arab world. I could write a paper that fairly reflected both interests and likely reactions on both sides to one or another possible move by the US.

Q: Trying to get somewhat the feel. If somebody had served only in Israel, within sort of departmental mentality or something, almost tainted that person. Or if somebody had only served in the Arab world...

CLUVERIUS: In that environment it wasn't a matter of being tainted; it was what your mind-set was as a result of being steeped in the views of one side but ignorant of what motivated the other side. It wasn't a matter of being tainted. It was also, I must say, a matter of drafting-skill. If you were steeped in the Israeli point of view or the Arab and wrote the paper, someone with expertise on the other side would have to go over it and put the balance in. And I'd done journalism school, and I was a pretty good writer. I could write it so that no one else would have to make an input for balance before it went to the front office and on to the seventh floor. It would save Roy a lot of time. But increasingly as the cease-fire took hold and diplomacy really began, the famous shuttle-period, the lower levels were increasingly closed off from access. Because you didn't need to know, fair enough. And obviously, Kissinger is a secretive guy and a firm believer that the fewer people that know what's going on the more likely you have a chance for success. And he's right. And we had plenty to do. So for a while there I was kind of out of it. Although I still did quite a bit for Roy. Kissinger being so secretive, I guess he really believed that all the papers which showed Roy or Hal Saunders as drafting, were really written by these guys. But obviously they had so much to do they couldn't do it all. They had other responsibilities. So I wrote a lot of things for those guys. But as it all went into higher gear, there was less and less of that kind of thing to do since it had been done. He had decided what he was going to do, how he was going to do it and at that point didn't need a lot more input from the munchkins, just needed to get on with it. But at some point, I can't remember exactly when, it may have been in early '74, after the shuttle period had started, one day by accident I saw a paper that I wasn't suppose to see. It had a lot in it about how to approach the substance of the issue like Israeli withdrawal and moves toward real peace. All the big issues. And I'd seen this paper and I told the boss, Stackhouse, that I'd seen it and I totally disagreed with it. But I said, so how am I supposed to have seen it? It's one of these, Eyes Only - Kissinger kind of things. So he said, "I'll talk to Roy." And he talked to Roy and said, "You know, Wat by mistake saw this paper and he thinks you guys are going at it wrong. " So Roy kind of laughed, according to Stack, and said he can read the paper and he can write what he doesn't like about it. What I didn't like about it, and this is from my Israeli experience, is that it was very mechanical. We'll go to DMZ'S, gradual withdrawals, troop and armament limitations here and a zone there. All in my own view very mechanical. I had a feeling that the Israelis were not going to give up territory gained for mechanical arrangements which were military almost completely military--demilitarize this, limited force zone that. So I wrote a paper back to Roy. I said, what you're missing here is the psychology of Israel. This is all mechanical, all military, and the Israelis aren't going to give you anything, give the Arabs anything except in exchange for what I think I called "elements of normalization, " They not only would not give up the territory, they would also have to know what is going to happen to it. They have to see some signs of being accepted as a people, as a country. If you don't get normalization in there, you aren't going to make this thing work. I wrote up quite a lot of stuff about kinds of things I thought would impress the Israelis over and above the purely mechanical military zones of this and that kind. Roy sent the paper over to Hal Saunders who was still at the NSC, who had not yet come over to the Department as he did later. So one Saturday morning, Hal came over with the briefing book on Egypt Israeli negotiations and he said, "Well, you know, if you don't like the way we're doing it then why don't you rewrite the book. " And I just sat down and started working. And that was really the beginning of my deep substantive involvement in the Arab-Israeli peace process. Which I continued. I never went on any of the shuttles with Kissinger but I worked and prepared every one of them. Hal and Roy always went, other people as well. But these were the main substantive guys, no doubt about that. And so I continued working in that sense through the Kissinger period, through the '75-'76 period. I was thrown out of Kissinger's office, by my count, I think it was 18 or 19 times, before I was allowed to stay. Because we had a new Director of the office who was going through a very difficult personal time, and was hardly ever there, I ran the office. So every time an Israeli leader came in, if you look back at the newspapers it was damn near weekly it seemed, like Dayan, I was the one who had the responsibility as the Desk guy to meet them at the door and, very often, in the basement actually, without publicity. I would take them up to the Secretary's office, take them into the meeting, and I would join the meeting and then Jerry Bremer, Peter Rodman or Larry Eagleburger would look at me, look at Kissinger, Kissinger would look at me, Jerry or Peter would come over and quietly ask me to leave.

Q: Kissinger by that time was Secretary of State.

CLUVERIUS: Yes, by this time he's Secretary. Interesting that all of this post-war period I think and remember only Kissinger as the mover and shaker, not the Secretary of State in office at the beginning of that period. And I would get thrown out and Roy would say you've got to keep going in to the meetings because it is proper that you be there. But I was getting thrown out frequently until finally one day Kissinger looked at me and said, "Hello Wat. " Or something like that; he finally recognized me. But it was just his own style, the fewer people the better. I don't disagree with that. But it was a little bit damaging for my relations with the Israeli embassy for quite a time. So, finally, I stayed in most of the larger meetings until I went abroad in the Fall of '76.

Q: In this time, could you talk about the Israeli lobby because this is such a creature you might say of American politics. And I'd like to get an impression of how this worry on your operations in the period you were doing this.

CLUVERIUS: The lobby didn't care much care at all about the Desk or any of the NEA worker bees. Their targets, their sights were always much higher: The Secretary of State, the White House, Capitol Hill. Of course it was, and is, a very powerful lobby. Certainly the most powerful foreign affairs lobby. It ranks with the National Rifle Association and the Dairy lobby, certainly in the top 5 or 10 issue lobbies. Everybody was well aware that you had this other constituency when dealing with the Arab-Israeli problem, dealing with Israel. You had an enormous domestic constituency looking over your shoulder, trying to push you this way and that. In the post-war period there was increasingly a knee-jerk approval situation on Capitol Hill. Almost anything that they would circulate would get signed by more than 70 senators and 300 or 400 hundred representatives. They were riding very high. And of course the Arabs were seeing us as bad guys, and vice versa in many quarters. Israel started the '67 war in a technical sense-- they preempted rather than wait for the expected attack-everybody understood that Nasser sort of bungled into that one. But in the '73 war Israel was attacked by surprise and that doesn't go well with Americans. We still had our memories of Pearl Harbor. So the support for Israel was very high, the lobby riding high, being listened to.

Q: As you saw it, did you find the lobby made much of a difference in how we were going about the peace process?

CLUVERIUS: Right then not a heck of a lot in my mind. Right then, '73 right after the war '74, no I don't think so. Because we quickly got to a process which held promise of actually moving beyond simple cease-fire toward settling the conflict. There were the Kilometer 101 talks under UN auspices and Kissinger-led diplomacy. A disengagement agreement between Israel and Egypt was in the works, even got something later on started with the Syrians. We might have gotten something started with Jordan. It was probably a mistake not to have tried with Jordan in the summer of '74 or later, in '75. But that had a lot to do with Sadat too. We'd done one with Egypt if you recall. Then there was the Golan agreement in mid-74. The famous 33 day shuttle for the Golan agreement. Then the logical thing would have been--even though Jordan didn't get into the '73 war-- to attack the results of the '67 war and bring Jordan in to set the precedent that withdrawal and arrangements have to be made on all 3 fronts. I think Sadat sabotaged that, the Israelis were definitely not interested and I don't think Kissinger was at all anxious to do it. The West Bank and Jerusalem set up a whole different set of issues than either the Sinai or the Golan in terms of emotions and history. Not to mention in terms of population. So I don't think Kissinger was anxious to tackle that can of worms. If Sadat didn't press it, why should he, I suppose that's how it came out. There were some of us who argued very hard and I worked very hard in creating possibilities, briefing papers, and options books. What it might look like on the ground. How you might structure a Jordan-Israeli negotiation. But basically Sadat wanted to go back and do something even bigger with the Israelis. It was done. Sinai II for which we paid an enormous financial price. By this time of course we have (Sinai II, yes '75, September '75) Henry as Secretary of State, Ford is President coming up to '76, elections. We paid a very high price for Sinai II particularly the language on not talking to the PLO. Which if you look back at the Congressional record, it was not meant. And of course in between we had those 2 Geneva summits and all that nonsense. We launched those negotiations obviously with the Soviets in Geneva and never reconvened the Geneva conference. But it's never been adjourned either, by the way. That's a technical and legal historical point. Anyway, the language on the PLO. It says we will not recognize or negotiate with any other party except in consultation with Israel or something like that. It didn't say "not deal with" and that was very carefully drafted. I think you probably have that on record, maybe from Roy Atherton because I think he drafted it with the Israelis. It was a negotiated statement with the Israelis. They knew what it meant and what it didn't mean. It did not mean "not talk to them." It said "not recognize or negotiate with." They were afraid we would negotiate issues of substance behind their back with a party they couldn't deal with--the Palestinians. But later it just got expanded into a "not talking to" by Congressional pressure and Carter's problems later on. But we didn't do it with Jordan, did the second one in '75 with Egypt after that very difficult period of getting the one with the Syrians. Including the arms embargo against the Israelis in the spring of '75 because they balked at the Sinai II agreement badly and it was aborted and had to be picked up again in the summer. But it was a fascinating period. You had a lot of differences on substance with the Israelis that didn't surface because we weren't getting at the tough substance. We were still in the disengagement kind of thing. We weren't addressing some of the tough issues like the West Bank, certainly not Jerusalem. So, Kissinger got outraged with the Israelis during the early efforts at the Sinai II G agreement. And held up arms shipments and things like that. Put some real pressure on. Nevertheless we were still going down a road with both sides, with this very fantastic Sadat-Kissinger relationship and the Israelis. Things were moving, there were stops, fits and starts. And our differences on substance with the Israelis, we didn't really get into it that much, We weren't getting to that kind of substance where things were going to be really nasty.

Q: Had Begin come in at that point?

CLUVERIUS: No. Begin came in the spring of '77.

Q: We'll come to him later. But you felt you had an Israeli government that was middle of the road, somewhat responsive. And also Sadat became sort of a surprise, didn't it. That he was considered at first sort of a minor, ineffectual character.

CLUVERIUS: That's because he had been Deputy Pharaoh. You never know how Pharaoh is going to be until he's actually Pharaoh. There's no doubt that Kissinger found on his first trip, after the war, his first swing to Moscow, Tel Aviv, Cairo (I forget how it went.) That here was a guy that was willing to negotiate with Israel without having an outcome guaranteed in advance. He didn't say: I'll talk to them but I have to be guaranteed now that I'll get all my territory back. Which had always been the Arab line. And here was a guy much more open to the subtleties of negotiation. And instantly, I think, Kissinger realized here's a guy he could really work with. Because the newspapers were full of the Israeli violations of the October 22 lines and the Soviets were rattling sabers--Israel must go back to the October 22 lines. And here's Sadat looking at Kissinger and saying to hell with the October 22 lines, I want something bigger with Israel. That's basically what happened. And so Kissinger came back knowing he had leverage, that here was an Arab willing to deal without guarantees in advance about the outcome. And a man with a very creative mind about these issues. And a government on the other side which however traumatized by their failure in '73, and this is the time, to recall now, when people were throwing tomatoes at Moshe Dayan, Minister of Defense, because he should have seen it coming. There was a lot of turmoil. This was the beginning of the downfall of the Labor Party, basically. But still a government willing to look at anything, willing to try to move forward, though it didn't want to deal with Jerusalem or the West Bank. But neither did Sadat, neither did Kissinger. So they could focus on Sinai and the Golan, which was very painful in any case. But something was done. So all of this sort of goes into a kind of limbo after September '75, as these things do when you approach an election year. And certainly in our traumatized society in '75-'76, a President resigning just ahead of impeachment, the pardon and all of that. By this time I was pretty exhausted; actually I think most of us were. Those were 7 day weeks and 14-15 hour days and they kept going. There wasn't a spurt that lasted a couple of months, it was years of this kind of thing. And so I went looking around for a job outside of NEA. I thought that would be a good idea. I went around to other bureaus and talked to people. NEA was prepared to take care of me, there was no doubt about that. By this time Roy Atherton was Assistant Secretary, Joe Sisco had moved up to Under Secretary, Hal Saunders was in the Department as Deputy Assistant. So I went looking around. My tour had been much longer than normal. In fact at one point, it was early '74, Hermann Eilts wanted me to come out as he'd reopened the Embassy in Cairo. And Roy said, you can go, but I really need you here. So I stayed. NEA was clearly willing to take care of me but I'd really thought I'd like to do something else and get away from these pressures. Also, it was clear that for a year or so it would get difficult to get the process started again, disengagement had gone as far as it was going to go. You were going to have to touch tough issues, and I felt I needed a break. In fact, I couldn't find that quality of job outside of NEA, that NEA would give me. I was looking for a DCM job in a medium size post in Africa or a small European post or something like that. We had what was called the "Global Outlook Program." You were suppose to go around and sprinkle your careers with experiences outside your main interest, your main career line. So I went in to Roy Atherton one day and said, "Roy, the kind of job you are giving to people from other bureaus coming to us,, their bureaus are not giving to us." And I laid it down for him. And he said, "You're right, it's not equitable, so what do you want to do in NEA?" And I looked around and I said, "Look, Joe Twinam is about due to come out to Bahrain, I'd like to be Ambassador to Bahrain." He looked at me and he said you're right. Kissinger had agreed that we could use these new posts, which were relatively recent, in Bahrain, Qatar and the UAE.

RICHARD McCOY
Consular Officer
Tel Aviv (1969-1971)

Richard McCoy was born in 1934 in New Jersey. He graduated from Cornell University in 1959. He served in the United States Marine Corps during the Korean War and in the Air Force from 1960 to 1966. He entered the Foreign Service in 1966. His posting include San Jose, Tel Aviv, Adana, Zagreb, Georgetown, and Washington D.C. He was interviewed by William Morgan on March 13, 1989.

Q: Going to a larger post like Tel Aviv, you brought those same lessons along, but could you translate them now into what particular lessons you learned at a large post, such as Tel Aviv, which has a very large consular function?

McCOY: In a major post like Tel Aviv, you are truly locked into more or less one area. Tel Aviv is somewhat unique because of its nature, from our perspective, the administrative capital of Israel. We had tremendous numbers of distinguished visitors, congressional delegations, and visits by the Secretary of State. So you had a chance to do things other than just a straight-line consular job. The advantage of a large post for a consular cone officer is that you learn how to supervise both American officers as well as a large number of Foreign Service nationals. The issue you have at a small post is there you're not so much supervising large numbers of people, but rather you're starting to learn how to manage a wide variety of programs.

Q: You have also, in a post like Tel Aviv, a high visibility work and consular function, or to put it differently, you were closely tied with economic realities of the country. Any particular messages there of that relationship and how you worked particularly, perhaps, in visas, but also in protection and welfare with the highly politicized society?

McCOY: Visas were fairly simple. We didn't have, in those days, a problem relating to whether people would return or not. In fact, that was a rather sensitive issue as to whether they would return, because in the war of 1967, you may recall the Israelis returned in great droves from wherever they were around the world. So that was not quite of an issue as, let's say, it would have been in Costa Rica or in later posts like Guyana.

Protection and welfare was extremely difficult. We had large numbers of American citizens, many of them elderly, and quite a few of them with mental problems. The result is that what you had was, from a citizenship, protection and welfare area, the problems were much more difficult and intense.

For example, one Christmas, I remember, we had a woman who was mentally deficient show up with three children under the age of five. And the Israelis, even though she was Jewish, did not want to accept her under the law of return. So, consequently, I had a very difficult Christmas holiday that year. But fortunately, through the help again of our distinguished Foreign Service nationals we were able to resolve the matter.

Q: It would seem to be also, particularly in protection and welfare, that you would get a lot of so-called intervention as we say in our trade congressionals. What kind of congressional intervention, pressures or from other parts of the government did you have?

McCOY: Well, obviously there was congressional interest, I suspect not as much as there is now, though, primarily except for the issue of the Soviet Jews coming out who immediately then would want to travel to the United States and would be sponsored by some very prominent American citizens. The protection and welfare issue was much more intense, but not as involved with Congress as you would think.

Q: In that relationship or others, how did you find support from the bosses, the ambassador or others in the post, in what you were trying to do, in some cases almost contradictory influences bearing on you?

McCOY: We had an interesting ambassador. He was one of the old-line Foreign Service ambassadors from the George Kennan and Llewellyn Thompson era who had come in in the early 30s, a man of independent means, a bachelor but a man who would give us the time if he thought we needed it. He pretty much allowed his DCM to run the embassy, and he concentrated primarily on the political and economic issues that went on between the two nations, a bilateral relationship which, as you know, is a very complex and important one.

I had two different consuls general when I was there. They both pretty much left me alone which in some cases was wrong because I could have used some help. But I must say, I learned a tremendous amount there, probably more on the protection and welfare and citizenship than I could have in any place because, as you know, at that time, we were dealing very heavily with cases involving people who were serving in the Israeli army and who had voted in Israeli elections and this had resulted in a Supreme Court decision.

Q: Put differently, you feel you did get support then from top management both practical as well as advisory?

McCOY: Yes and, of course, they were very, particularly the DCM was very, sensitive to the desires of the officers in the consular section particularly the more junior officers -- that was my second tour -- to get involved in other areas of the embassy. That was very important for us. I must say, I learned a lot from that gentleman in terms of how an embassy should be operated and run.

Q: What form did this take, this training of other junior officers, and what kinds of things were they encouraged to do and could you help them do in terms of their own responsibilities in the consular section?

McCOY: Well, basically what you try to do is to explain to the officers the function of their jobs, how they should perform them, the relationship in dealing with the Foreign Service nationals, the culture under which they were now operating in terms of dealing with Israelis and their relationships outside the embassy. To develop working relationship with the police, local attorneys, doctors, and other areas such as prison visits. Then, of course, within the embassy, if they are going to travel to make sure they touch base with the political and economic section and the DCM to see if there is any particular interest they might have.

Q: Did these junior officers, in turn, sense what they were doing in terms of total mission objectives? Did they feel it was important?

McCOY: I think so because in the case of Tel Aviv, in particular, we were all on a roster to perform control officer duties, as one example. So, therefore, we would find ourselves very much involved in the whole issue relating to that in addition to others. The DCM was very good about having periodic meetings with the junior officers within the mission to make sure that they reviewed the reading file frequently or went to staff meetings and other things of that nature. And that was very useful.

...and the issue relating to whether Jerusalem should be unified with Israel or remain an independent entity. In any event, I began collating this information, and I found out that the ambassador was particularly delighted, as was the head of the political section, because as it turned out, we had very little contact with Israeli students and their attitudes. Then I arranged to have several other officers work with me to begin, without abridging on their visa function, to discuss with them various attitudes within the course of their visa interview.

Q: Was it sort of "anything to get me off the visa line?"

McCOY: No, not really. I enjoyed visa work. It never particularly bothered me. I had spent a very tough year as a protection and welfare officer in Israel and, in fact, had asked after a year to move to visas, because I can assure you I had some very difficult -- nothing to compare with Jonestown -- but some other very, very difficult protection and welfare cases in Israel.

Q: For example?

McCOY: I had one gentleman who came in to see me and wanted to know if they buried people alive in Israel. He had been a Polish Jew who had been captured by the Nazis, and buried alive, shot and left for dead, and still suffered mental problems. We had an enormous number of mentally ill Americans in the country who had come back to find God. One woman, middle aged, continually wandered out into the Sinai and a couple of times was found in the middle of mine fields by Israeli Army patrols.

So over a period of a year, this was a fairly wearying experience, because it was not only just work days, it was nights and weekends. As you can imagine, a large number of people travel to Israel, regardless of their religious affiliation. We had a very heavy workload, and I was the only protection and welfare officer.

Q: Since today the world knows the battle between the Palestinian and the Israeli, it's on the front page in every paper, did that involve you? Did you find yourself protecting American Arabs, for example?

McCOY: In some cases, yes. Most of them were handled by the consulate in Jerusalem, but we did handle those who were from the Gaza Strip. This was a particular problem. The other problem we had was the forced induction of American Jewish people into the Israeli Army; once they were inducted, they were forbidden to visit the embassies. We had some interesting problems with the Israelis over this issue.

This was at the time when there were a number of hallmark citizenship cases relating to voting and to serving in the Army. It was particularly because the Israeli Government and the way they acted on the law of return and how they implemented the law of return for American Jews. Initially, when a person voted, they lost their citizenship. It was considered an act of allegiance to a foreign country. It was taken to the Supreme Court, and the plaintiff won.

So consequently, as a citizenship and protection and welfare officer, I had to go through literally hundreds of cases dealing with people in this area, as well as protection and welfare. So after a year, I was ready to go to the visa unit.

Q: These examples you are giving in protection and welfare, and I'm sure visas was the same, were coupled with those that I had in Beirut about that same time, which reminds me -- and I ask for your comment -- how closely tied the consular function is in an area like that with political realities and political function, if you will, of the entire mission.

McCOY: That's true. That report that I did was very well received except by my consul general. He got very irritated with it. He thought that I wasn't doing my job; I was "wasting my time" doing things which were not my job. I, of course, disagreed with him. He was an officer who believed that the consular function was the consular function and not a political function, and never the twain shall meet.

Q: How did you deal with this?

McCOY: I disagreed with him.

Q: Beyond disagreement.

McCOY: I basically dealt with it on the basis that I felt that many times we did get biographic and other information through the visa interview and our travels in our consular function, and therefore I felt that as a Foreign Service officer, I was obligated to work on this. He had been an old-line staff officer who had never done anything but consular, primarily visas.

Q: What does "old-line staff" mean, for those who might not have heard about this?

McCOY: Basically, there were a large number of people who had come into the Foreign Service as clerks, and when that function was abolished, they adjudicated passport and visa cases. Our workload in those days, from what I could see when I arrived in the sixties -- and you know better than I do about this, Bill -- was labor intensive. You had to have all these documents, and it was very much involved in citizenship. Of course, this was an outgrowth of the displaced persons that came out of the Second World War, and also the requirements of the McCarran Act for visas, in which you had to have everybody fingerprinted. We went through a very bureaucratic exercise. We had people who were required to adjudicate these cases, and who were very fine and very conscientious about it, but who believed that that was all they were supposed to do.

It was an attitudinal problem in the sense that they also resented the fact that in those days, many officers within the embassy looked down upon them as simply glorified clerks who were not really capable of doing substantive work. I remember one of my bosses in Costa Rica, the second boss I had in Costa Rica in the consular section, who was a man who was almost selected out as a political officer, and they told him he could stay on if he went into the consular cone.

Q: Sounds like consular work is second class.

McCOY: It was, very definitely. People told me that if I ever expected to have a successful career, I should leave the consular function and should have gone to the political cone, because at that time it had always been put in my efficiency report that I had reporting skills. But I felt that I really had the best of both worlds, because I really did enjoy the consular function, and I believed that if I did the job properly, I would be recognized for it. I think that's been borne out.

Q: Hopefully, just for history, hopefully today this is not a reality, but how did the large mission of Tel Aviv handle a technician as the consul general and some younger or at least more junior officers that didn't look at their work that way?

McCOY: It became rather embarrassing, because the consul general tended to get pushed aside. I found myself, and some of the other officers would find themselves, constantly pulled out of the section, being used as control officers for congressional delegations. When we had the Black September fight between the Jordanians and Palestinians in September 1970, we were literally working 24 hours a day. We'd work during the day in the visa unit, then we'd all pull shifts commanding the operations center that we had in order to maintain a voice link with our embassy in Amman, which was under direct attack by Palestinian forces, and also helping to provide communications and support to the military airlift that was going on at the time into Jordan. We also had the Sixth Fleet that came in, and our officers were involved in coordinating with the Israelis.

I literally, one time, thought the Third World War was starting. I mean, it was an interesting period and dramatic, but also very scary. One night, in 30 minutes of traffic, I had 24 immediates and six flash messages, three of which were directly from the President to the Chargé of the embassy, because we thought the Syrians were going to invade Jordan to assist the Palestinians, and the Israelis had said if they did that, they would invade Syria. And so on and so forth. So this got to be very tense.

As I say, the consular officers were the backbone of the support, because there were a number of junior officers in the embassy, but for example, the junior officer in the political section was off doing other things, the junior officer in the economic section, who was Wat Cluverius, who has had a marvelous career and is a marvelous officer, was responsible for providing relief assistance to Jordanian and Palestinian refugees by leading convoys from the Gaza Strip across into Jordan. So consequently, what you had was, I think there was one junior officer in the admin section plus the consular section, who provided the support for the embassy to run the operation's center during this crisis, which lasted about three weeks.

Q: So the Middle East is a good place to serve?

McCOY: Oh, yes, it's very interesting. Never dull.

MARK C. LISSFELT
Israeli Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1969-1971)

Mark C. Lissfelt was born in Pennsylvania in 1932. He received his BA from Haverford College and his MALD from Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy in 1959. He served overseas in the U.S. Army from 1954 to 1956. His foreign posts included London, Tel Aviv, Bamako, Brussels, Bonn, Berlin and Paris. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on May 22, 1998

Q: So you left Mali and Africa never to return for a posting in '69 to go back to Israeli affairs on the Desk.

LISSFELT: That's right. I went back to IAI, as it is called, Israel-Arab Affairs, to work for a very fine guy, Roy Atherton, and then for Heywood Stackhouse, who succeeded him, another fine man whom I'd known and worked for in Israel. This would have been in early '69, leaving Mali, of course being seen off at the airport by the whole embassy staff, with champagne toasts and tears of those left behind. I know it wasn't because we were leaving, but it was because they were staying. I spent the better part of two years in NEA-IAI, until April of '71. I was doing my share of speechifying, going around the country with "truth squads," we called them, before the Zionist organizations of America and other campus groups, where generally anybody from the State Department was raw meat thrown before the dogs, and we were eaten alive more often than not.

One time before the Zionist organization in Pittsburgh, a few blocks from my home, where my mother accompanied me and witnessed with horror on her face as her son on the stage was eaten alive by others on the stage and in the pro-Israel audience. It was horrendous. The main preoccupation then was what we called the Jarring mission. That was the name of a Scandinavian diplomat who was trying to get things going by way of peace talks. Joe Sisco was the extraordinarily active and able, although gritty and scratchy, not particularly friendly Assistant secretary who led us and who was considered by Henry Kissinger over in the White House at the time to be the only assistant secretary in the Department of State who knew how to do the job right.

Q: You were really there between Arab-Israeli wars, weren't you?

LISSFELT: That's right. Between the '67 and the '73 Wars. I had had my Israeli war. Anybody who's had any experience with Israel talks about "their" war; mine was the '67 War. And I must say, I left that assignment, when by the way we started for the first time plotting on a big map of Israel after the Six Day War, Israel and the West Bank (the famous long map with the green line on it that everybody had in their offices at the time) the various new settlements that were being established. As Moshe Dayan, the minister of defense of Israel, the leader of the extraordinary Six Day War effort, used to say, "We are creating facts." And they were creating facts that we are living with still today, but I can remember with a colleague, Mike Sterner, starting to put these pins in a map, and it was only a sprinkling of them across the West Bank of the Jordan, which have, of course, grown to their present dimensions. We were wondering why we never as a government did much to stop it, but we didn't. Anyway, those were the main preoccupations of the time. There are lots of records of conversations in Joe Sisco's office which had to be done up by us note-takers and sent out in NODIS (No Distribution) cables after visits by various ambassadors calling on him. Then Sisco often ushered in a lady journalist of The Washington Post, whose name has long since escaped me, and then briefed her thoroughly, and so the whole story of his advancement of the American cause in the Middle East was in The Washington Post the following morning. Often, many lines that were in our highly classified cables, which we were compelled to do up the day of the conversation and get to his office to be sent out in a rush that very day appeared in her stories.

Q: Being present there as these settlements were moving forward, facts on the ground - you've watched it since - it's now October '98 - what do you think about a settlement, what about this new Wye Agreement, with the background you have on Israel? Are you optimistic?

LISSFELT: Well, you now, you have to curb your optimism in any conversation about the Middle East and any relations between the Arabs and the Israelis, Palestinians and the current Netanyahu Israeli government. I think it's the only straw we have to hold onto. It may be a weak read to mix my metaphors, but I think recent events in the newspaper, in the aftermath of the killing of the Israeli soldier, the effort to bomb a bus just yesterday, the things that Arafat has done, give reasons to show that he means business this time, and I think probably Netanyahu, the prime minister of Israel himself, may be even impressed.

Q: Well, Mark, you talked about speechifying and outreach to various Zionist groups. One has the impression that your assignment, and that office generally, has a lot of preoccupation with domestic politics and outreach. Were the groups then as vociferous and articulated as they now are and did you find through ties to them difference of approach and view between the career and the political levels of the department?

LISSFELT: Well, I don't remember on the very last point much difference. At our level, my exposure to people up the line really ended with Joe Sisco. At this time, William Rogers was the Secretary and I use to see him regularly bringing in a group of American Jewish leaders. I think it's the American Presidents' Conference or Conference of Presidents of various major American Jewish organizations.

Henry Kissinger was over in the White House till Rogers left. And Rogers struck me as very reasonable and a very moderate man, extremely - I'll go back to the word reasonable in his conversations with these American Jewish leaders. They were a very distinguished group of people, as you can well imagine, very cordial, very high-level, and always prefixed their conversations with the Secretary by protestations of affiliation and loyalty as American citizens to their own government with a keen appreciation for what might be done to help the situation in Israel.

Q: Was there a feeling that much of the action was with Henry Kissinger in the White House, the NSC, and that Rogers was frequently struggling to catch up?

LISSFELT: ...With the boss of the building in which you worked, namely Mr. William Rogers, but the contacts were constant between him and Kissinger or Kissinger's office, and we didn't kid ourselves that the shots in this area, particularly because of the domestic political considerations, were very much directed from the White House, by whomever, and the domestic politics we mentioned a minute ago were constantly on our mind. We forgot them at our own peril.

THOMAS B. KILLEEN
Consular Officer
Tel Aviv (1970-1971)

Thomas B. Killeen was born in Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania in 1940. He joined the Peace Corps in 1964 and was posted in Chile. He entered into the Foreign Service in 1967 and his career included posts in Israel, Bolivia, Thailand, Ghana, Venezuela, and Somalia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

Q: Yes, there were these periods of time to encourage retirement.

KILLEEN: And he did that out of the blue and there is some poor guy back in Washington looking at Tel Aviv and saying, "Where in the hell am I going to find someone to go into a consular job in Tel Aviv a couple of months before the summer?" And probably the same guy saying, "What am I going to do with Killeen who now needs an assignment to an Arabic speaking post," only to discover that Arabic is co-equally with Hebrew an official language in Tel Aviv. Killeen, Tel Aviv, go. So I was then in Tel Aviv for eighteen or nineteen months, whatever it was. I liked it a lot.

Q: What were you doing, consular work?

KILLEEN: Consular work. I was the number two man in a two-man American citizen services unit in the Embassy in Tel Aviv. It was my very first job in the real foreign service part of the Embassy. And I liked it because I liked the work, I liked the content, I liked the place, I liked the way things worked in Israel. Things actually functioned. And I liked it because it was an Embassy job, a real mainline Embassy job. There were some adventures there too but... Though maybe this is an adventure of the foreign service of the kind that you are interested in. I was working the counter and there was another guy, another foreign service officer who was on a rotational program with us, who came up to the counter and said, "Tom, come on to the men's room with me." "There are a lot of people here; no, no I can't." He said, "No, you've got to come." "For Christ's sake, I can't." He says, "You've got to." So we into the men's room. There was a small room and then there was a doorway with the john. The door to the john was closed with a rope hanging down over the end of it and I knew what was happening and I kicked the door open, mad as a hatter at this guy who could have done the same thing and I said to myself "if the poor son of a bitch is dead.."; he should have been knocking down this door. I got the door down, heard and felt the fellow clump, couldn't get in, kept pushing on him and jamming him up alongside the toilet bowl until I could get in, got the rope from around his neck and saved his life. The rope that was hanging on the other side of the door had signs on it, "Let My People Go," "Free the Jews from Soviet Domination," things like that. Police came, the Israeli ambulance came and took the guy away, he was mentally disturbed, he was hospitalized, and a cloak of secrecy was dropped on the whole thing. My supervisor, a couple of days afterward, came to me and said that he personally wanted to thank me very much, the guy was going to survive and he was going to survive with all his marbles, although he didn't have many of them left; but he was not going to be a vegetable. But there would never be anything documented about this because of the fact that it had taken place in the Embassy; the Embassy did not want any kind of publicity about the fact that there had been an attempted suicide on the premises. The Israelis, for their own purposes, didn't want any kind of publicity or any possibility of publicity about that particular protest being made in the U.S. Embassy. The fellow said he would never be able to mention it in an efficiency report. I accepted that; I was a young officer and I accepted that. I don't know whether I should have had a pat on the back or an "Atta boy" or what, if anything. Maybe I shouldn't have, maybe I should have been formally reprimanded... But, nothing! And I accepted that. It didn't occur to me at the time to say to the guy, "Just put your thank you in writing for me and classify it if you want."

Q: Yes, that is sort of odd. Were Americans getting into trouble in Israel, and how was it dealing with the Israeli authorities over the problems of Americans?

KILLEEN: There were substantial numbers of tourists and there were young tourists. The Israelis in those days were, and I suspect still are, very worried about dope. They were most specifically worried, it sort of diminished them I always thought, that their success in battle, some of which they attributed to the fact that their Arab opponents were always stoned out of their mind, would be undermined if the drug habit found its way among their own troops. They were tough on dope. Some of the Americans that came to Israeli were interested in dope. There was some hashish available, even some heroin, not too much but there was some. The Israelis had tough laws. If I remember correctly, one of the laws was that any person within thirty feet, in any event it was space denominated in feet or meters, was deemed equally in possession of the dope. So that quite literally you could be standing on a street corner, or any place on the street, and if some guy ten paces away with whom you had no connection whatsoever was in possession of marijuana or hashish, you could be charged with possession. But there were some Americans that got in trouble. There was one kid who, at least he said and I suspect he showed me some evidence because I know I believed him at the time, had lost half his jaw. He said he had been in the Marines and had it shot off, just barely ticked with a .50 caliber bullet. When he went before an Israeli judge on a possession of hashish/marijuana charge, he had explained to the judge that that was the mitigating circumstance, that this whole Vietnam business had been so excruciating for him and that dope relieved him of his travails. And the judge, with tears, set him free.

The Israelis were very cooperative. Formally and officially they required themselves to notify foreign Embassies, which really meant us, if somebody were arrested, and to do so within twenty four hours. They prohibited their police from having any direct police initiated contact with foreign embassies on the same matter. To the best of my recollection, if somebody was arrested and wanted to call the Embassy they were free to use the phone. One of the guys on the staff, an Israeli guy on the staff who among other things had been -- do you know what a capo is, or was in the concentration camps?

Q: Sort of like a trusty or something, with certain powers.

KILLEEN: Yes. The guy had been a capo and he was on the Embassy staff, a peach of a guy. He was not proud of having been a capo, he did it to survive. He had, as far as I was able to figure out, established a personal relationship of trust and confidence with every police officer in the whole country, so that when any American was arrested, he got a phone call. Some of the phone calls came at the office, I guess most of the phone calls came at the office, but enough of them came at his house so as to create a patina for the police officers that it was just a phone call to a friend; he got a phone call whenever an American was arrested. It was nothing like what it became say in Mexico with Americans and dope, but there were substantial numbers. Others got in trouble, in trouble is not the right word, out of joint, because of the operations of Israeli law. The Israeli nationality law provided that any child born in Israel of a Jewish mother was automatically an Israeli citizen, period. And that every Israel citizen had a military obligation that required among other things, from age fifteen forward, that he get the permission of his local military commander to depart Israel. What would happen, especially in the summertime -- and it was tough -- some fifteen year old kid, generally of a more observant nature, (the Yeshiva students, those who wore the dark suits, the dark hats and who we in this country generally refer to as Orthodox Jews) would come to Israel for one reason or another, often having entirely to do with religious reasons or school reasons. When they were about ready to leave, usually on group flights, Israeli immigration people would say, "Let me see your permission from your local military commander to depart Israel." The kids didn't have a clue as to what was being talked about. They did, however, understand when the immigration officer said, "Well you have to go and get it and you can't leave now." And they would call Mom, who would then call the Embassy. Sometimes Mama would call the Congressman who would then call the Embassy. Sometimes the kid himself would call the Embassy. But it was always the same, the Israelis would not allow them to leave until they had this piece of paper and the getting of the piece of paper was not so difficult. It cut in, under Israeli law, when somebody was fifteen which is of sufficiently tender years so that it rattles a kid; and it rattles Mom and Pop and Congressmen and everybody along the line. And everybody justifiably so, except the Israelis, who knew, knew that the immigration officer would tell the kid to go get it and it would take a couple of days; maybe, with a lot of luck, a couple of hours. Now he was going to miss that flight unless he had been fortunate enough to get there at eight o'clock in the morning for an eight PM departure, which hardly ever happened.

Then there was one case where an American guy -- funny guy -- who had spent some time living in Germany; when he finished his assignment in Germany he got a repatriation loan and went back to the United States. When he was back in the United States, rather than repaying the repatriation loan, he stole a roommate's birth certificate and some other identification and got a new passport in that other persons' name which he then used to go, maybe to go back to Germany, but in any event he came to Israel on it. And he had his original passport in his luggage! During his incoming customs inspection the Israelis opened it up and discovered this healthy young man of military age, long time in Germany, coming to Israel with a brand new Land Rover, or something like that. The security bells started flashing, they didn't know what was going on, they didn't know who he was, they had no reason to believe anything that he was saying because he was in possession of credible evidence that contradicted itself. So they put him in jail; I think if I remember correctly that it was thirty days after they incarcerated him, incommunicado under their security laws, before they finally communicated to us that he was being held and asked us if we would help them sort out who he was. Some of that was my job because I was the passport officer as well. I saw him in jail; the eventual disposition of his case, I don't remember how long he spent in jail, was that he was tried and convicted by the Israelis of some offense such as entering Israel under false pretenses or with false documentation, something like that. He was fined, the fine was just about what the brand new Land Rover brought at auction, plus the cost of his airplane ticket back to the United States. I gave him a couple of bucks of walking around money for the day or two that he was half at liberty, after time served, of course.

Oh, there was another guy, it was a funny case. I don't remember whether he was an American or not, but he was being held by the Israelis on the complaint of his wife because he refused to grant her a divorce. Under Israeli law the civil status was determined by the religious community to which one belonged. That particular fellow's religious community provided for divorce but only if initiated by the husband. Civil law provided that a guy could be locked up if he declined to give his wife a divorce and this guy had been in jail for several years if I remember correctly. I am saying to myself, "Was he an American?" I had dealings with the guy but I don't remember whether, maybe he just used to hang around visitors to the jail when I was there visiting someone else.

WALTER B. SMITH II
Bureau of Near East Affairs
Washington, DC (1970)

Chief, Political Section
Tel Aviv (1971-1974)

Bureau of Near East Affairs
Washington, DC (1974-1978)

Walter B. Smith, II was born in Providence, Rhode Island in 1929. He graduated from Princeton University in 1951 and subsequently served in the U.S. Army as an officer. Mr. Smith joined the Foreign Service in 1958. His career included positions in Moscow, Frankfurt, Tel Aviv, Warsaw, Berlin, and Washington, DC. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1993.

Q: Well, then, what happened to you after you left Moscow?

SMITH: I was assigned for two years to the Soviet part of INR under Helmut Sonnenfeldt, who was running it then. He was an interesting character. I was given the Middle Eastern portfolio [in the Soviet part of INR].

As you may recall, the Soviets kept trying to engage us throughout 1968 in major power talks about the Arab-Israeli problem. This is what the Arabs wanted them to do, to spare them having to negotiate with Israel. They wanted the Soviets to work out a deal with the Americans and to bring in the British and French if necessary. We resisted this, but the Soviets kept inching closer to the Israeli position in these highly confidential discussions. I was called in on New Year's Eve 1968 by Sonnenfeldt and sent to Roy Atherton [then Director of Arab-Israeli Affairs in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs -- NEA]. Atherton was already Joe Sisco's right hand man. Joe Sisco was shifting from the position of Assistant Secretary of State for UN Affairs to the position of Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs. The Soviet Ambassador [to the U.S.] had come in once again on or about December 29, 1968, with still another position paper on the Arab-Israeli problem and had delivered it to the Under Secretary of State. I was sent by Sonnenfeldt to be of assistance to Atherton in analyzing what the Soviets were up to.

That fired my interest. Over the next three months I went furiously through every recorded conversation between senior U.S. and Soviet officials and also second hand reports from our people of Soviet discussions with Western officials. Generally, my objective was to tabulate the evolving Soviet position on the substance of the Arab-Israeli points of contention. I distinctly sensed a progression between 1967 and the beginning of 1969. I wrote this paper, listing all the Arab-Israeli points of contention and showing an evolution of Soviet classified posturing in our direction. I also did a tabulation of published Soviet positions on these issues to show how much daylight there was between their diplomatic stance and their public, propaganda stance.

Sisco suddenly was called in because the Soviet Ambassador -- Dobrynin -- came [to the Department of State]. Out of this flowed what were called the Sisco-Dobrynin talks on the Middle East. These began in March 1969. Sisco was given the "green light" from Secretary of State William Rogers to start, on a tentative basis, secret talks with Dobrynin on the Middle East. The Israelis did not know about them, and SOV [Office of Soviet Affairs in the Department of State] did not even know about them, at first. Sisco wanted an assessment, at the outset of these talks, of the Soviet position. And guess what? Intuitively, I had done just what he needed. Sisco yanked me out of INR, and I worked for Sisco intensively for the following eight months, together with Roy Atherton, as one of the three participants in the Sisco-Dobrynin talks on the Middle East. For a relatively junior officer -- I was, I guess, 39 years old -- this was a heady experience. We went to Moscow and met with Andrei Gromyko [Soviet Foreign Minister] for two weeks because the Soviets, for reasons of "amour propre" [self esteem] had to be able to say that the talks were also taking place in Moscow and not only in Washington. We stayed in Spaso House. Jacob Beam was our Ambassador to the Soviet Union -- this was in the summer of 1969, my last visit to Moscow, I am sorry to say. But staying in Spaso House was fun, too, per se. That was one of the most important moments in my Foreign Service career.

Q: Before we get to what you were seeing going on, may we go quickly back to INR? Sonnenfeldt was your immediate superior. He's a figure that keeps cropping up in foreign policy matters.

SMITH: He is a senior personage today.

Q: How did you read him at the time? How did he operate at that time?

SMITH: Sonnenfeldt was a very smooth operator. He is an astute, political animal. I do not think that he believed for an instant in my view that the Soviets were behaving relatively responsibly and that it behooved the United States to hear them out and see what kind of relationship we could work out with them. I think that he was instinctively very suspicious of the Soviets then and, until not too many years ago, continued to be rather a "hard liner." He saw that I had a commodity which was in demand, as far as the Secretary of State was concerned, and he pushed me to a fare-thee-well. That is how I got into the Sisco-Atherton operation. Sonnenfeldt pushed me in their direction. I think he must have felt that, from a political point of view, it was going to be very helpful to him. Actually, the minute I "belonged" to Sisco, I did not "belong" to Sonnenfeldt any more, although on paper I did for about six months. Then Sisco eventually had me assigned to NEA.

Q: From your point of view, what did you see in those secret Soviet-American talks on the Middle East? What were the major points and how did they develop?

SMITH: In light of the evolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict since then, the points at issue seem ludicrous, but, based on the history of the question up to that time, they were not so funny. The Soviets were twisting the arm of the Egyptians, in particular. The Soviets cleared their position with the Egyptians each step of the way. We gave the Israelis only a general idea of what we were up to. We did not clear our position with the Israelis. I guess we thought that that would create too big a row. We were going to have a showdown with the Israelis when and if we ever got to the point of what we considered a balanced or tentative arrangement with the Soviets. We knew, from intelligence that I cannot go into -- incontrovertible intelligence -- that the Soviets were twisting the Egyptians' arm. Since I still had an INR "portfolio," I was able to have access to certain rarified intelligence. It was just fascinating to me to see what the Soviets were doing. They were moving very slowly, playing "hard ball" with the Egyptians -- but they were moving. And so were we.

Then the "deep penetration raids" began after the first U.S. "Phantom" jets [F-4 fighters] arrived in Israel, in September 1969. To our dismay the Israelis began using these planes to do "dare-devil" things across the Suez Canal. By October 1969 they were bombing targets around Cairo, if you remember.

Q: The "war of attrition..."

SMITH: Yes, indeed, and the windows were rattling in the American School [in Cairo]. We complained to the Israelis, and they said, "Move your school." [Laughter] They were not about to stop bombing Cairo for our convenience. I guess, in retrospect, that I can understand that, but it sounded a little arrogant at the time.

After that the Soviets introduced Soviet pilots because the Egyptians were being humiliated. Gradually, Soviet planes began pushing the Israeli air campaign back. The United States was so upset by this, in late 1969, that we broke off the U.S.-Soviet talks. We knew that this was something that meant more to them than it did to us, at least potentially. So, I suppose, we figured that this was a way of showing them how angry we were at what they were doing in Egypt. You can hardly blame them for what they were doing in Egypt. If you reverse the situation -- if the Soviets had been the "sponsor" of Israel and we had been the "sponsor" of Egypt -- you know perfectly well that there would have been U.S. pilots in there. So it was really the pot calling the kettle black, I thought. It was foolish of us to break off the talks. The Soviets resisted doing anything to help the Egyptians until Nasser blew the whistle on them. Nasser died in September, 1970!

There was an interplay between the situation on the ground in the area, which the Israelis really provoked, and our ability to continue any kind of dialogue with the Soviets. So, of course, anything the Soviets had to say, starting in 1970, was suspect, and instead of making any further effort with the Soviets, we launched what became known as the "Jarring Initiative," which the Israelis made sure would fail, and which did by March or April 1970. At that point Joe Sisco, who had an extraordinarily fertile imagination, dreamt up the so-called "Proximity Talks." He tried to get an Israeli and Egyptian to sit on different floors in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York. He was going to run back and forth [between them]. The effort to organize the "Proximity Talks" continued through 1970 and 1971 and gradually sputtered out after the change of administrations in 1972, with Henry Kissinger's arrival on the scene [as Secretary of State].

Kissinger went through an interesting metamorphosis on the Arab-Israeli problem, which blew up in his face, as you know, in the fall of 1973. All of a sudden he realized that a) this problem was much more important than he had understood, and b) there were two sides to the story. In fairness to Kissinger he achieved what seemed impossible at the time because he concentrated on the problem. He saw what were legitimate Israeli concerns and what were wholly exaggerated Israeli concerns. He was able to deal with this in a balanced way. But there was nothing balanced in Kissinger's attitude toward the Arab-Israeli problem when he came on board as National Security Adviser. He was so totally preoccupied with trying to wind down the Vietnam War that he would not allow any initiatives to be taken on the Arab-Israeli problem.

Fortunately for me, in mid-1971 I was assigned as chief of the Political Section in the embassy in Tel Aviv [Israel], and so I was spared the agony of the slow death of Joe Sisco's initiative, the so-called "Proximity Talks."

Q: Tell us a little about Joe Sisco -- how he operated.

SMITH: Well, Joe Sisco and Hal Sonnenfeldt had something very important in common, and that was that they were both political animals. As you know, most career Foreign Service officers are not political animals. Neither of them was career Foreign Service. That may have something to do with it. They understood "the game," so to speak, between the agencies in Washington. They accurately sensed what was on the mind of the White House, and they sought out "targets of opportunity." I am not trying to suggest that either man was intellectually dishonest. I am simply saying that they played U.S. domestic politics, at least "Washington Insider" politics, to try to achieve what they wanted to do. Most of us career Foreign Service people are allergic to doing that kind of thing. That is why I draw a certain parallel between Sisco and Sonnenfeldt. They were "operators."

But Sisco was also an extraordinarily clever man who managed to keep all kinds of balls up in the air at once. That was one of his methods. He would meet with foreign ambassadors -- at least two or three a day -- and cultivate the ear off these guys for an hour. He was throwing sand in people's eyes -- deliberately, in many cases. He was getting messages back to the Soviets, in some cases; he was trying to manipulate the French and British, with some success, in other cases; and he was trying to influence the White House in still other cases. I was one of his regular note takers, and after a while I began to see the method in his madness. The guy worked about 18 hours a day. He was an indefatigable operator. He did not speak correct English. I could never get over the fact that such a bright person -- he had a Ph.D. from the University of Chicago -- would make egregious errors, like: "I'm glad that this has happened to you and I," and that kind of grammatical error. That is uniquely American. You would never find a British official at that level, with his brilliance, making that kind of hash out of the English language. Pardon the digression.

Q: No, it gives us a feel for the man.

SMITH: He was a rough diamond -- let us put it that way. He came out of the poorer part of Chicago. He was tough. He was hard on people who, he felt, had let him down. He was loyal to people who, he thought, were supporting him. So he was a controversial person within the Foreign Service, not to mention within the interagency bureaucracy. I never ceased to admire and like the man, even though we did not have much in common at the time except a burning interest in the same general set of problems.

There is a strong case to be made a) that we had a good chance, not so much to solve the Arab-Israeli problem after the 1967 War, but certainly to move the situation light-years ahead in terms of the security of Israel and the normalization of the problem. And we missed the boat. It can be demonstrated, in minute detail, that the first Israeli- Egyptian disengagement agreement, which was no mean achievement on the part of Henry Kissinger in January 1974, was almost identical to an arrangement which Sisco, the Israelis, and the Egyptians were moving toward in the spring of 1970. A lot of thought had gone into the preparation of U.S. positions and thinking through how such a partial disengagement could work in the Sinai area back in 1970-71. This material was just dusted off and handed to Henry Kissinger. He was the man, more than any other U.S. official, who made sure it did not happen in 1970-71. He had the benefit of some careful thought when he went into those disengagement...

Q: Well, now, this brings up a point which has cropped up other times, talking of Henry Kissinger. You say that he made sure that it didn't happen in 1970 or so. Was this because he wasn't involved?

SMITH: He says in his own memoirs that he deeply resented the fact that Nixon would not let him get involved in the Arab-Israeli problem for two reasons: 1) Kissinger is Jewish. Nixon is a life-long anti-Semite and was very distrustful of Kissinger's ability to be objective. Let us face it. Until he learned more about the problem, he was not objective. But that was not the only reason that Nixon kept Kissinger out of the Arab-Israeli problem, before he became Secretary of State. 2) The other reason is that, behind the scenes, he was giving Kissinger a free hand to run circles around Secretary of State [Rogers] in every other field. He [Nixon] felt he had to reserve something for the self-respect of William Rogers. The Sisco-Dobrynin talks became known as the Rogers-Dobrynin talks. Without much justification Secretary of State Rogers claimed credit for such progress as was initially achieved in those Two-Power Talks. At the same time we had the Four-Power Talks going on in New York, in which Bob Oakley was involved up to his ears. Have you interviewed him?

Q: Partly. I haven't gotten too far with the White House on that...

SMITH: I think you should. [Oakley] is a very bright guy who was very much involved in some terribly important developments, and so I hope you are able to pin him down.

Q: You were there viewing Israeli operations. We always had the feeling that the Israelis could play the domestic political card or something like that. Did you feel that they were looking for a compromise?

SMITH: No. They were not looking for a compromise. They had all this territory, and it enabled them to avoid any kind of difficult decisions. They had total distrust of the Arabs -- even beyond that which was justified. Obviously, a good measure of distrust of the Arabs was justified. But the Israelis were blind on the subject. They certainly did use the U.S. domestic political card to try to nip U.S. initiatives in the bud, frequently with success, although Sisco gave them a real run for their money.

I have a wonderful story to tell you -- let us save it for next time -- when Sisco outmaneuvered the Israelis and I heard Golda Meir calling him [by telephone] from Jerusalem and telling him that what he had done was absolutely outrageous. He had spoken for Israel to the Soviets. This was the cease-fire-standstill agreement of August 1970 -- the time he stopped Soviet and Israeli pilots from shooting each other down over the Suez Canal. Sisco really deserves a lot of credit for pulling that off. He had to "out-fox" the Israelis to do it. Mrs. Meir swore at him on the telephone and said, "There is no way in heaven that Israel is going to abide by this arrangement." Guess what? The Israelis did abide by the arrangement, and it gave them a nice, long, misleading period of tranquility which I soon got to see from the other end, because I was then assigned to Israel.

Q: Could you explain how that assignment came about?

SMITH: After about six months of being "parked" in various corners of NEA, while I was working with Assistant Secretary Sisco in connection with the U.S.-Soviet Middle East Talks, I finally was "parked" on the Israeli Desk for about six months, in early 1970. I then spent a year as Deputy Director of Egyptian Affairs but, because I had worked both sides of the equation, I was deemed a satisfactory person to send to Israel -- and I was sent there as chief of the Political Section. In light of the fact that major power peace efforts had stalled it made a certain amount of sense to have someone in the Embassy in Israel who was familiar with them, on the chance that [such talks] might get cranked up again.

What I was starting to address -- what I mentioned last time and may have started to address -- was the feeling, that you rightly asked me about, of being "beleaguered" in Washington, at a time when Israel became extremely nervous about U.S. intentions in the Middle East and was fearful that the United States might come up with a persuasive-seeming kind of equation -- and then insist that Israel struggle with it, in terms of an Arab-Israeli settlement. One does indeed feel beleaguered in Washington because of the power of the pro-Israeli lobby.

What I discovered very early on, when I arrived in Israel, was something that I had not expected. That is, the Israelis -- rational and logical people though they are -- in fact are quite emotional and irrational on the subject of the Arab-Israeli conflict. They were dead sincere -- not conniving and devious -- in their efforts to stop diplomatic activities which they honestly believed spelled only danger and [even] ruin for Israel. That is a lesson which anyone assigned to the Embassy in Israel ought to understand, because you realize that, rational as your discussions may be with Israeli colleagues and as soon happened with Israeli friends, there were certain areas, particularly during your first few months of assignment to Israel, where you "pulled your punches," lest the Israelis, who were also sizing you up, as a friend or a foe of Israel, get the wrong idea.

Now a little "black book," in effect, is made on newly arrived diplomats -- above all on American diplomats -- as to whether the individual is sympathetic or not sympathetic to Israel's plight.

Q: I've heard this again and again, but not in quite as strong terms as you are using. Well, since this is very important and since this is a thread running through the whole situation, were you told this before you went to Israel?

SMITH: I had been told this but I did not believe it, because in Washington you become convinced that the Israelis are cynical, after you have been hit on the head and shoulders by all kinds of clever political operations. It is only when you get there that you realize that it is not cynicism at all. It is mortal fear of the imminent destruction of Israel. There is no Israel citizen who goes to sleep at night without wondering whether his country will be at war the next day. If you look at the map -- the Israelis say this in a coy fashion: "Look at the map and you'll understand the problem." But it really is true. It is a tiny, tiny country. The minute you understand this, then you understand where the Israelis are coming from. You do not ever agree with them if you have studied the problem, but you certainly have to be sympathetic to them. Only by being sympathetic to them, without necessarily agreeing with them, will you ever get anywhere with them, if you have to nudge and cajole them in directions that they are fearful of.

I had a high success rate in Israel. When I came back [to Washington], I became Director of Israeli Affairs.

Q: First of all, let's talk about what your job was [in the Embassy in Tel Aviv].

SMITH: I was chief of the Political Section.

Q: How was the Embassy set up? Who were the Ambassador and the DCM?

SMITH: The Ambassador was Walworth Barbour, who, at that point, had been there for 10 years. He remained there for the first two of my three years. In my third year he was replaced by Kenneth Keating, a former U.S. Senator [Republican, from New York]. Ambassador Barbour was very ill. He only made it to the office for one or two hours a day. He was drinking heavily and smoking very heavily. He had serious lung problems. The man could barely breathe.

Q: Then why was he kept on in what is considered one of our "high tension" posts? Certainly...

SMITH: I have read some of Barbour's reporting during the early years of his assignment there, when he retained his objectivity. When he was convinced that the Israelis were wrong, he did not hesitate to say so, both to them and, especially, to Washington. But by the time I got there, Barbour had begun to lose a) his objectivity about Israel and b) his intellectual sharpness. I do not like to say things about such an esteemed character, but he was almost ineffective.

The DCM during the first two years I was there was Owen Zurhellen, a fantastic individual who recently died, I gather. He was a "crackerjack" officer -- very abrasive and disliked by the people [in the Embassy] because he was blunt and abrasive. But he was effective. He and I were very dissimilar in personality but we took to each other. Thank goodness. Because he really was very dubious about whether I was going to "cut the mustard" during the first couple of months I was there. I worked my tail off -- not because I wanted to have a good relationship with him but because the assignment was so challenging to me. At the end of three months he called me in and said: "I am surprised to find myself saying this to you, but I want you to know that you are doing a good job." And so it went.

These were the halcyon days when the Israelis lived in never-never land, thinking that the 1967 War had solved their problems and that war was not going to come at any time soon. Israel was enjoying unheard of prosperity.

Q: What was the period when you were there [in Israel]?

SMITH: I was there from 1971 to 1974. So I saw the unrealism of Israeli thinking that preceded the 1973 War and the devastating psychological effect of the 1973 War which, as you know, the Israelis won. And if we had let them go, as often happens with those wars, they would have won it on both Syrian and Egyptian fronts with a resounding bang. We pulled their punches for them. They won the wars, but the Egyptians and the Syrians were not convinced that they were defeated. Henry Kissinger had "seen the light." In a very short span of time he realized that if there was any hope of reaching some kind of accommodation after this war, the Israelis could not be allowed to occupy Damascus and Cairo. So Kissinger had something to do with the fact that we and the Soviets -- as had happened in 1967 -- imposed a cease-fire just as the Israelis were finally regaining their strength and getting ready to do something.

Q: Going back to when you arrived [in Israel]. Here you've arrived, you have to pull your punches, you can't overly engage Israelis without their feeling that you're not "with them."

SMITH: Which you can on lots of issues, but there are certain "gut" issues.

Q: But you have to watch it at the same time. You've got a DCM who's effectively running the Embassy, who's putting you on trial...

SMITH: Right.

Q: Everything you write is going to end up on the desk of a pro-Israeli Senator, probably.

SMITH: Well, I do not think that it was that bad, though it could be...

Q: It could. It could also wind up -- I mean, you've got all of these minefields.

SMITH: You just work extremely hard and do your best. I found living in Israel exhilarating. My garbage collector had a Ph.D. degree, spoke four languages, and was a very charming man, indeed. There are, of course, a great many poorly educated and not very refined Israelis -- mainly those of recent Arab extraction [the Sephardim]. But certainly the European Israelis [the Ashkenazi] at this time -- in 1971 -- ran the whole place and were the people one dealt with and ran into. There were certain slum areas in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem inhabited by a different kind of Israeli. But the Israelis I knew were bright, extroverted, energetic, creative, talented, and very, very entertaining and funny people. I adored being there, and this showed -- and thank goodness that it did. Because I think that that helped to persuade the Israelis that a) I was someone enjoyable to know and b) I was on their side. It was a fabulous experience.

Q: Let's talk a bit about the reporting. I've talked to other people who say that if you're reporting a telegram or a cable or a despatch -- whatever one is sending out -- a lot of it is not stating just plain fact. It's also trying to accomplish something at the other end. Here you were in this highly charged atmosphere. No matter what the State Department did, Congress or the White House could overturn it for political reasons. Things could leak. How did you and the officers working for you deal with this?

SMITH: Well, I think you are referring in particular to reporting on the Israeli internal political situation.

Q: Yes.

SMITH: In this case we handled it with absolute intellectual honesty. Israeli politics are vibrant, very fractious, and very open. There is, of course, some back room dealing, but, by and large, Israeli politics are open. It is quite a contest. Israelis are willing to talk to foreigners, particularly if they take the trouble to learn Hebrew and already know a good deal on the subject. They are delighted to talk about the political situation and give their views and their opponents' views. If an Israeli -- a senior Israeli figure, for that matter -- had seen what we were reporting a) he would not have had any major disagreement with its accuracy and b) he certainly would not have had any question about our motivation. We were simply trying to describe what was happening and analyze where things might go. I had four or five political officers. Most of them were working on different segments of the Israeli internal scene. At least initially, I concentrated on Israeli external affairs. The Israelis had lost their relationship with most African countries, thanks to the 1967 War, but they still had diplomatic relations with some African countries and a lot of Asian countries. They had an interesting relationship with West European countries and North America. It was interesting to get the Israeli perspective, not only on the Israeli bilateral relationship with those countries but the Israeli perception of where things were heading in the European Community -- remember, this was 20 years ago -- and to get the Israeli view of economic developments in North America and East Asia.

It was interesting. So I reported this stuff with considerable care. What else can I tell you? The one member of our Political Section who might have gotten the Israelis' dander up, who spoke both Hebrew and Arabic, Wat Cluverius, covered the occupied territories beat and also Israeli domestic Arab population developments. You realize that there are almost one million Arabs who were born in Israel and are Israeli citizens. They have become a real problem. At that time those people were not disaffected. They were quite loyal [to Israel]. We tried to stay in touch with them. We certainly wanted to know what was going on in that community. We never did anything that any Israeli had any right to be suspicious of. But if they were going to be suspicious of anything that the Political Section did, it would have been our relationships with Israeli Arabs and especially with those from the West Bank and Gaza. And we also took turns visiting the West Bank and Gaza. My wife and children and I would go down every three to six months and stay in the Gaza Strip which, at that time, it was possible to do.

Q: Well, how about the West Bank? We've talked about the relationship in reporting with our Consulate General in Jerusalem.

SMITH: The West Bank [of the Jordan River] was part of Jerusalem's consular district. You are quite right. The Embassy also tried to understand what was going on in the West Bank area, not for reporting purposes, since it was Jerusalem's prerogative, but more so that we would understand what the Israelis were talking about, when they referred to their problems on the West Bank. I am glad you reminded me of that. The Consulate General in Jerusalem then -- and,

I am sure, still today -- is responsible for reporting on internal developments on the West Bank. The Gaza Strip was the Embassy's responsibility. I do not know whether that division of labor continues.

Q: I'm not sure either.

SMITH: To the extent that the Palestinians in the Gaza Strip and the Palestinians in the West Bank can do anything in unison, which is somewhat doubtful, then it makes sense for one U.S. post to do the reporting. These were relatively calm times in Israel -- those last two years before the outbreak of the so-called "Yom Kippur War" in October 1973. As I said at the outset, this was an economically vibrant time. The Israeli economy just grew like Topsy during that period. It was a good time to be there. Naturally, it led astray those of us who had only been in Israel during those two years. We found that out, as the Israelis themselves did, when it all came a cropper in October 1973.

Q: How did we look upon the Likud Party, Menachem Begin, and his supporters at that point?

SMITH: We did not take them very seriously. We did maintain some contact with them. In fact, to my amusement, people whom I had for dinner in my home ended up by being members of the Israeli cabinet during the several years that the Likud Party was in power. The betting was that the Likud Party was not going to be able to come to power any time soon. As you recall, it was not until 1977 that Likud came to power for the first time in the history of Israel. So we certainly paid attention to the opposition and kept track of them. One of my political officers used to say, partly with tongue in cheek but not entirely so, that it might be a better thing for both the United States and Israel if Likud did come to power.

The Labor Party was, first of all, in its heart of hearts, ambivalent about the [efforts to achieve peace between Arabs and Israelis] that we were forever promoting. Labor was dubious that peace, in fact, could be made with the Arabs. However, the Labor Party was clever about sounding "reasonable" on these issues and sounding as if it were ready to compromise, if only given the chance. Because the Labor Party was so sophisticated, the United States would listen to its advice and would sometimes compromise efforts that we were trying to make to accommodate their views. In fact, to some extent we were emasculated. This [political] officer's thesis was that if Likud ever came to power, it would "come right out with it" and would articulate the fears that the Labor Party also had about peacemaking and the future. They would call a spade a spade. And then the United States would have "to get off the dime," if we ever did get to a situation where we had our hands on a balanced compromise with the Arabs as a possibility. If the Israelis tried to walk out of it, we would have to put some real body pressure to Israel. It would have been a hard thing for us to bring ourselves to do with Labor, this officer argued, whereas with a Likud [government], if that moment ever came, it would be so abrasive that it would not be so hard for the United States to do what it had to do.

In reality, to his everlasting credit, President Carter personally persuaded Menachem Begin that the Sinai deal and the interim arrangement for the West Bank and Gaza were in Israel's interest. I know that Begin had tremendous misgivings [about these arrangements], but, by dint of sheer personality, I think that Jimmy Carter turned the leader of the Likud movement into a supporter of the Camp David arrangements. So it never did come to a question of push and shove between the United States and Israel.

However, there was plenty of pushing and shoving between the United States and Israel during the period in office of Secretary of State Kissinger, just to get the Israelis to agree to those two disengagement agreements: one with Egypt and one with Syria, and then the second agreement with Egypt. There should have been an agreement with Jordan while there was a chance. Kissinger knew that, but that would have been very tough to carry out.

Q: You were sitting there, reading an awful lot of the telegrams coming out of Egypt, Jordan, and Damascus -- I mean, from our Embassies.

SMITH: We did not even have a U.S.-staffed Interests Section in Damascus from the 1967 war until after the 1973 war.

Q: We had an Interests Section in Cairo. What was your impression? Was it "us" versus "them?" I'm talking about two Foreign Service posts.

SMITH: You were getting two different perspectives. Even pro-Arab people who may have served in Tel Aviv -- and there have not been many because most people who have been assigned to Tel Aviv, no matter what their background -- have been, as I was, rather fascinated by the Israeli people and sympathetic to the perceived Israeli plight. Anyhow, you were getting two perspectives. We, naturally, even when we did not fully agree with the Israeli point of view, tried to report accurately and sympathetically, with the thought in mind that Washington could never do its job if it did not hear both sides of the argument. Obviously, our colleagues in the Arab countries were reporting with some degree of skepticism regarding current Arab points of view on the same issues. But we never got into "pissing" matches between Foreign Service personnel reporting on Arab politics and those reporting on Israeli politics.

We knew many of the individuals concerned. There were occasional regional get togethers of reporting officers in Cyprus, covering this area. I think that that only happened once in my time. That was enormously helpful. In the past it had happened that the American Embassy in Cairo and the American Embassy in Tel Aviv engaged in a "feud," if you will. There was a danger of friction between the reporting sections of the Embassy in Tel Aviv and the Consulate General in Jerusalem, which has always tended to be quite unfriendly to the Israelis and sympathetic to the Palestinians. That is the job of the Consulate General in Jerusalem. Our colleagues in Jerusalem sometimes seemed to feel that the deck was so heavily stacked against the Palestinians that they were fighting an uphill battle. That was not necessarily the case. We would sometimes call them up and say, "You have got to realize that your reporting [on some particular issue] is not entirely accurate. We do not want to point that out in a telegram to Washington, but we want you to reconsider what you are saying on this particular issue." That sometimes helped, but it sometimes did not. The greatest danger was to have a feud going on between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

Q: Which has happened.

SMITH: It has happened, rather often, in the past. It did not happen on my watch. I had a few bouts of knocking heads with the Consul General in Jerusalem.

Q: Who was Consul General then?

SMITH: It was Pete Day.

Q: Well, now, I didn't interview him. Someone else interviewed him.

SMITH: Where is he now -- do you know?

Q: He's here in Washington. You had this very open society in Israel, and maybe it's gotten worse or better. The Israeli intelligence service is well known for its disinformation. It can muddy the waters if there's a problem...

SMITH: Not inside Israel, it can not.

Q: Not inside Israel, but outside Israel. Did you find that the Israeli intelligence operation was a problem for you or not?

SMITH: No, I do not recall any such instance. I have no doubt that the Israeli military intelligence operation was running circles around Uncle Sam, but as far as political intelligence and political disinformation are concerned, I do not recall an instance where this affected what we were trying to do.

Q: Who was the [Israeli] Prime Minister at the time -- was it Golda Meir?

SMITH: It was Golda Meir, right up to shortly before my departure in 1974. She finally stepped down, and Rabin became Prime Minister -- in the spring of 1974.

Q: What was your reading of Golda Meir and also of Rabin?

SMITH: Golda Meir was a very impressive personality, a very strong willed person, tough as nails but tired, a fine brain -- not a very refined person but a very intricate, competent person. My Hebrew was not good enough to tell whether she had an atrocious American accent in her Hebrew, but she must have had, because her English had the strongest Milwaukee accent that you have ever heard. It must have made those who speak British-accented English wince to hear her talk. Just as, I gather, Abba Eban had a rather British accent in his Hebrew. As he was an intellectual, I gather that he spoke a rather purist, classical Hebrew, which made people chuckle when they heard him on the radio. Golda Meir was just as tough as nails.

The 1973 War threw her for a real loop because she had so completely failed to anticipate it. Just after that war Kissinger said -- how did he put it? It was clever. He said that the Israelis had "brain-washed themselves" [convinced themselves] that the Arabs were incapable of launching a surprise, coordinated attack on Israel. And then the Israelis turned around and "brain-washed us" into thinking the same thing. That is exactly what happened.

Q: We'll get to the 1973 War later. I assume that you shared information with our military attaché and our Agency [CIA] people.

SMITH: They read our output. We did not read their output.

Q: Well, let's just take the military side. Were they pretty well captives -- were they impressed by the Israeli military and sort of bought their whole story?

SMITH: I do not think so. Most of the people serving on the attaché staffs were very much impressed by the Israeli military. They were amazed by the ability of Israel, working with such comparatively limited resources, compared to our own, to pull off such extraordinary feats -- in all three branches, but especially in the air. They were impressed, but they were not captives of the Israeli point of view because, I think, all of them -- before coming to Israel -- had worked on the military dimensions of the Middle East problem. If anything, they tended to be very uncomfortable about the ability of Israel to get in the way of Pentagon planning for "the big show" -- namely, dealing with the Soviets. In terms of U.S.-Soviet rivalry, Israel has never been an asset. Israel has always been a liability. Nobody ever dared say this, but it is just a fact.

If you look at it very carefully, you will see why I say this. The Israelis had tremendous military capabilities, but they would not be of any major value in stopping the Soviets. They certainly were capable of getting into a tremendous ruckus with the Arabs which could provide a beautiful opening for the Soviets to come into the area. As we were saying in the last interview, that was beginning to happen along the Suez Canal in 1969 and 1970. Fortunately, Joe Sisco turned that off, just in time. The Israeli and Soviet pilots were shooting each other down. That created really serious problems for the Pentagon.

So the military attachés we had in Israel really worked. They were pressed professionally by their Israeli counterparts. Of course, they liked them as human beings, but they were also worried about Israel's ability inadvertently to cause huge defense problems for the United States.

The CIA people were not reporting on Israel during that time. I do not know whether that is still the case or not. They had an understanding with the Israelis that they would not report or conduct covert operations in Israel. They exchanged views with the Israelis on Arab problems and so they were not, really, part of the equation.

What else could I mention? The FBI briefly had a Legal Attaché in Tel Aviv who, at one point, under instructions, began to report back to Washington without running his reports by the DCM. The DCM, who was chargé d'affaires at the time, wrestled with [the Legal Attaché] and "forced" the State Department to wrestle with the Justice Department, and he won. The Legal Attaché was required, when requested, to show his reporting to the chargé. That was the time when my already high opinion of Owen Zurhellen went way up. Zurhellen had absolutely nothing to gain from this and possibly a great deal to lose, but to him it was a matter of principle. It is the kind of principle the State Department has always tried to sweep under the rug when, in fact, if it is going to carry out its charter and responsibility as the "umbrella organization overseas," it has got to fight for its rights. Pardon the digression.

Q: No, no, I think that it's important. Tell me, how did the war of October 1973 impact on you? How did you see it?

SMITH: I did not expect it any more than anyone else did. During the 10 days leading up to the outbreak the military attaché went in, under instructions, with a warning [that war might be imminent]. The Israelis laughed. Then the [CIA] Chief of Station went in to talk with his counterpart, under instructions, with a warning that we were afraid that [an Arab attack] might be coming. The Israelis laughed. The military attaché went back in again. Then, without instructions, I went in and talked with the head of the Arab Affairs Division of the Foreign Ministry and said, "I am afraid, not based on what my military colleagues are saying, but just from my reading of the tea leaves, that something very serious may be in the offing."

Q: Where were you getting this? In the first place, was it intelligence?

SMITH: A few smart people in Washington began reading things right. I should not say 10 days -- probably a week before the war broke out, because the Egyptian preparations for the war took longer than a week. In fact, [both Egyptians and Israelis] were engaged in major maneuvers near the demarcation line when -- bang! -- the war began. In retrospect it was a major intelligence failure, not only on the part of Israel -- but also on the part of the United States -- not to have been able to say, 72 hours ahead of time, that there was no question about what was going to happen.

Ambassador Keating and Nick Veliotis, the DCM, arrived on post just as I got back from home leave in August 1973. I remember accompanying Ambassador Keating down to the Suez Canal about three to four weeks after he arrived in September 1973, less than a month before war broke out. The Egyptians had, if I remember, 35,000 troops on their side. The Israelis had 900 troops on their side. The Israelis delighted in showing us how they could cover the whole Suez Canal line with 900 men. It turned out that they could not.

Q: The Bar Lev Line.

SMITH: That is right. The Bar Lev Line. It was a masterful piece of fortification, very carefully thought through, with all kinds of intricate electronic warning devices. But the Egyptians, to their credit, breached the line within the first 24 hours, I think. Then the Egyptians were so amazed at their success -- and the same thing happened to the Syrians on the Golan Heights -- that they stood there in disbelief, when they should have been moving fast.

Q: OK, now, the attack starts. Was the Embassy [in Tel Aviv] ready for it?

SMITH: No, nobody was.

Q: So what were you all doing? Tell me what you thought about it.

SMITH: I was sitting at home, working on an Arab-Israeli peace plan of my own, when Nick Veliotis came by at about 2:00 PM on Saturday and said, "Walter, come with me, the balloon has gone up." Off we went to the Embassy. We were there for about three days. We did not remember to bring any change of clothes, but we stayed for about three days, sleeping maybe two hours a night. Then he and I, and a couple of others, started taking turns, going home and getting a decent night's sleep. There was not anything we could do except report on what the Israelis were saying about the war. We did that quite methodically. Needless to say, the communications ear in Washington turned to the Middle East at that point. There were virtually no limits on our reporting in terms of quantity. We reported every single Israeli announcement and also reported on the mood in Israel, to the extent that we could plumb that. We were terribly worried for Israel's sake.

I remember the first night -- the night the war broke out -- Veliotis and I and some others were working almost all night long. We never thought of closing the blinds on our Embassy windows facing the Mediterranean Sea. That was the only night when Egyptian aircraft got close enough to Tel Aviv that they could actually see the city. They lobbed some missiles at Tel Aviv which missed. Had they struck Tel Aviv, it would have been so psychologically upsetting to the Israelis that I do not know what would have happened. Had they struck Tel Aviv, the fact that the American Embassy was lit up like a Christmas tree, without any blinds drawn, might have contributed to their accuracy. From the next night on we had a little sense and we pulled down our blinds.

Q: Did you have any feeling, at that particular time, that if it really reached a certain point, the Israelis would go for nuclear weapons or did we believe that they had nuclear weapons then?

SMITH: Somebody may have known -- but I did not know. I doubt that the Ambassador or the DCM knew whether the Israelis had nuclear weapons or not. There was no question that they could assemble a nuclear weapon on very short notice -- and maybe they started doing that during that war [the 1973 war]. I do not know. I was not concerned.

Q: It can come almost by word of mouth, whether it's true or not. But was it accepted at the time -- was it the accepted wisdom within the Embassy -- that the Israelis had a nuclear capability that could be used?

SMITH: The folk wisdom within the Embassy at that time was that the Israelis were within one to four weeks of assembling a nuclear weapon, if they decided to go that way. They had the know-how and the technology, but [it was believed within the Embassy that] they had not done it. They did not have them [nuclear weapons] stored. I do not know whether that was true. That war lasted over three weeks, as I remember. They [the Israelis] may very well have assembled a bomb in the course of the war. It was not something which, during the first two or three days of the war, we thought could be just around the corner.

Q: You say you were experiencing the mood of the place and you were at the Embassy all of that time...

SMITH: Toward the end of the war, we were not [always at the Embassy]. I had four or five political officers whom I could send out. Veliotis [the DCM] and I were at the Embassy all of the time, but the other reporting officers were fanned out, to the extent that they could locate their Israeli contacts -- usually the wives of the contacts, as the contacts [themselves] were at the front.

It really is an impressive thing to see mobilization in Israel. It is no laughing matter. The postal service stops and the garbage collection stops because everybody is at the front -- and I mean everybody. The street in front of our house in Herzliya Pituach, the suburb north of Tel Aviv where virtually all of the married Embassy officers had their houses, was a troop collection point. My wife and our then teenage daughters ran a soup kitchen during those days to help feed these reservists who had been called up and were waiting and living on trucks, waiting to be told to go south or north. It was a very nerve-wracking time for them [the reservists], of course. My wife talked with them fairly extensively.

As I recall, it was three days before they finally got orders and were sent to the Sinai front. They got two-thirds of the way down there and then were sent north to the Golan Heights. They passed by again -- that was how we knew this. They stopped for a couple of hours of rest and then proceeded north to the Golan Heights. So Israel was expecting a much bigger problem in the south than in the north. If you look at the map, the distance from the Golan Heights to Tel Aviv is [nearly] nothing. The distance to the Suez Canal is quite substantial. They had to forget about what they wanted to do in Sinai initially in order to plug the hole on the Golan Heights, because the Syrians really broke through. As we were saying a while ago, the Syrians simply stopped instead of pushing on. They could have pushed into Israel proper with no difficulty. This was at the end of the first day and a half or so. But they [the Syrians] did not do it.

Q: How about the Ambassador, Kenneth Keating? He was brand new. He had been an ambassador in India, but he was getting on in years.

SMITH: He was indeed getting on in years. He became very emotional, to the point where he was taking up a fair amount of Nick Veliotis' time, because he was getting downright irrational. He had been a colonel during World War II, and he was so moved by the situation that he said to Veliotis, I am sorry to say, in deathly earnest, that he was going to go and volunteer in the Israeli Army.

Q: [Laughter]. Can you imagine?

SMITH: Nick Veliotis practically had to put him under house arrest to keep him from doing or saying something irrational. He was a minus in this situation. May he rest in peace.

Q: It is interesting. Here is Israel, which is among the most important countries for the U.S. and also under threat of attack. Yet for a while Barbour was getting too old and was basically dying at the post, and then we sent an elderly New York politician...

SMITH: Pushing 80.

Q: Pushing 80.

SMITH: Not too smart.

Q: Not too smart. It was handy that we had somebody like Nick Veliotos, but, at the same time, people like [an unsuitable ambassador] can trip you up. Well, let's stop at this point and figure out what we want to talk about the next time. We'll put it on the tape right now. We want to end our discussion...

SMITH: We might have a few words about the disengagement agreements and Kissinger's style, because I was involved in all of that during the first six months of 1974. And then I came back and was involved in it in Washington.

Q: I'm thinking of sticking strictly to the time you were in Israel and also how the Embassy saw things at the very end of the 1973 war.

SMITH: That [involves] the disengagement agreements.

Q: Disengagement agreements. Okay. So we'll pick it up there.

Q: Today is June 25, 1993. Walter, can you figure out where you want to start now?

SMITH: You asked a good question, which I did not do justice to: what was the feeling of the Embassy at the end of the 1973 Arab-Israeli War [the Yom Kippur War]. I said that that is the same thing as discussing the disengagement agreements, which is what [Secretary of State] Kissinger was getting into. But, naturally, people who had spent, at that point, at least a year and, in several cases, two or three years in Israel, felt out of the big picture. I believe that those of us in the Embassy in Tel Aviv in late October 1973 had the same instincts that Middle East watchers had in 1967 -- for a different set of reasons, of course. That is, is there not some way to make this the Arab-Israeli War that ends all [such] wars?

We recognized the main theme of Kissinger's diplomacy toward the end of the war, which was to make sure that Israel, in effect, won the war and, at the same time, to leave a sense of honor with Israel's Arab adversaries, as the Arabs were forever putting it. So that they would not [appear to have] lost face and make sure, in other words, that Israel would not appear to have "trounced" them at the very end of the war as, indeed, Israel might have been able to do. The Arabs could thus summon the political courage finally to get into some serious negotiations with Israel. I must say, to Kissinger's full credit, he did end the war in a way which left the Israeli public dismayed and disgruntled, but not totally depressed. The depression which was palpable in Israel was not related so much to the way the war ended but to the fact that the war had broken out in the first place, despite all of the predictions on the part of every responsible Israeli that no such war was conceivable. That war really took Israel by surprise. That alone is an interesting subject which we can not take the time to go into now.

There was, indeed, an enormous feeling, not so much of desperation, but depression in Israel. It was primarily focused on the fact that Israel had not ended the war with a resounding defeat of the enemy, which was therefore unfavorable from the point of view of negotiations. So that was the big picture: how can that [the outcome] be crafted into some kind of lasting settlement? And we all felt rather elated that the war ended the way it did, and Kissinger, who had had a very limited attitude toward the Arab-Israeli problem, had become an instant expert and was going to be Secretary of State for at least a year or two longer.

Q: Were you, as an Embassy officer, and others in the Embassy as well, taking any heat from "important" Israelis because they felt that we had stopped them from going to Damascus and Cairo?

SMITH: Not from "important" Israelis. There were demonstrations outside the American Embassy -- rather nasty, potentially violent ones. There were a few windows broken. So there was anger at the United States. I do not think that it was focused on the alleged U.S. "responsibility" for stopping the Israeli forces before they could do a proper job. As I remember it, it had to do with a misunderstanding on the part of Israeli public opinion with respect to prisoners of war. Kissinger crafted an exchange of prisoners of war, knowing how important this was to Israeli public opinion. It was fair and reasonable. It was misrepresented, as I recall -- and this gets a little hazy in my memory -- in the Israeli press. Some Israeli young people believed a false story that the Americans had deliberately "delayed" the release of Israeli prisoners in order to gain some negotiating advantage. I think that was the only cause for violence against us in Tel Aviv at the end of the war.

Q: We're trying to keep this as much focused on the Embassy and you, particularly. The war ended. What were you all doing?

SMITH: Kissinger's first "shuttle" began before the war ended. It entailed zigzagging between Tel Aviv, Moscow, Damascus, and Cairo to pull off a cease-fire. This I remember well. He did not come to Tel Aviv. While in Cairo he sent Joe Sisco to Tel Aviv, which bothered some Israelis. It should not have, because, as Kissinger rightly put it in a confidential message to the Israelis, he knew that the Israelis knew him and could trust him, whereas the Arabs did not trust him at all. That was why he was "stroking" the Egyptians in particular, as well as the Syrians, and letting Joe Sisco talk to the Israelis. It was not an untenable proposition. You can not do everything simultaneously.

My admiration for Sisco, which was already high, went up still higher because the man a) understood what Kissinger wanted and got it done; and b) did not hesitate to "buck" Kissinger when he thought he was wrong. I just got a glimpse of this Sisco, who was with us only about 24 hours in Tel Aviv at that point.

Your question was, "What was the Embassy doing at that time?" It was supporting this kind of frenzied activity on the part of the Secretary of State or the Under Secretary of State, which was quite demanding. We did not have a big Political Section. We wound up by lassoing our colleagues from the Consular, Economic, and Administrative Sections to keep the place covered, because there had to be "round the clock" officer coverage by all possible means, on behalf of our visitors.

Let us see now. This was the end of October 1973. Kissinger was back by the end of November 1973 for a shuttle visit and for another shuttle visit in early December 1973. There was a lot of shuttling. I do not know how any other U.S. business got transacted in that period of time. In January 1974 he stayed almost a whole month in Egypt, if you will recall, to nail down the first disengagement agreement. The agreements between the end of the war at the end of October 1973 and the beginning of the negotiations leading to the first Egyptian-Israeli disengagement agreement, reached in early January were several. The agreements had to do with troop disengagement and prisoner of war exchange. Both of these agreements were extremely important, especially the troop disengagement agreement. You will recall that the map of the situation on the Egyptian front -- and also on the Syrian front -- was not to be believed. There were "pockets" of Egyptian and Israeli soldiers deep behind the other party's lines. How to straighten this out while assuring the two belligerents that they were not giving up anything of consequence and that a straightened line did not lose them any negotiating or military advantage -- that was not a simple matter. On the other hand they could not possibly feed the troop pockets, especially the Egyptians.

Q: There was the whole [Egyptian] Third Army sitting out there...

SMITH: The [Egyptian] Third Army was an obvious sore thumb, but there were little bits and pieces of Egyptian units elsewhere, too, in extended and unsupportable locations. And there were Israeli [troops] in unsupportable locations behind the Egyptian lines. So that kept us busy.

I was summoned back to Washington by [Under Secretary of State] Joe Sisco on December 30, 1973, as was Bob Oakley, who was my counterpart as chief of the Political Section in Beirut. That was done because [Secretary of State] Kissinger, as you may recall, at the peace or non-peace conference in December 1973 (which the Syrians, at the last moment, refused to attend), created the illusion of an ongoing peace conference after he and the other principal [figures] left. I do not know whether he appreciated its value at the time, though he did very quickly after that, but this was a device to keep the Soviets somewhat distracted by implying an important [degree of] collaboration with the United States. It gave [the Soviets] a place of seeming prominence, namely, in Geneva. It was a way of keeping them out of his hair as he dealt with the parties concerned. To do this, he had to have somebody, some ostensible interim or acting chief of the U.S. Delegation in Geneva. That was why Oakley and I were summoned back to Washington on December 31, 1973, given our marching orders, and sent initially, with Mike Sterner, to Geneva to be a "pretend" U.S. Delegation to the non-existent Middle East Peace Conference, at which the Soviets had their former ambassador to Egypt and Iran as our counterpart.

Sterner was by now a Deputy Assistant Secretary. So there was at least a smidgen of Soviet face-saving in having Sterner there. But Sterner only stayed for a week. I had a wonderful time with Sterner in Geneva. Sterner and I went to school together. Oakley had gone back to Beirut, and from that point, until the end of April 1974, Oakley and I took turns, leaving our posts in the Middle East to go and sit for two weeks [at a time in Geneva].

Q: Were you told that this is what you were doing or were you given something to do but not much?

SMITH: It was self-evident why we were doing what we were doing. And we were given absolutely nothing to do. We were told not to leave Geneva either. One weekend I did go down to Monaco to see an old friend who lives there. I did this with some apprehension, I might add, because even on the weekends we were supposed to be there, in Geneva, and visible to the Soviets and on call, for the Soviets or for Washington, whoever wanted to be in touch with us. The Israelis, at Kissinger's insistence, kept a delegation there, too. I happened to know the Israeli delegates. They were Foreign Ministry people who were as frustrated as I was at this fiction. That is what I was doing [during the period] from January to April 1974. In fact, my two sons were scheduled to be confirmed at St. George's Anglican Cathedral in Jerusalem in April 1974. Because, as often happened, I had no travel orders, I finally telephoned Roy Atherton from Geneva and said, "Please see if I can't go back to Israel for this coming weekend, to be present at my sons' confirmation." And Roy arranged it.

Q: How about the Soviet delegation that was there [in Geneva]? What were you doing [with them]?

SMITH: The Soviets were sore with their delegation head Vinogradov, who had botched things recently as Ambassador to Egypt. They were using [this occasion to "punish" him]. They were not stupid. They figured out what Kissinger was up to and were very frustrated. I think that Kissinger met with his Soviet counterpart at some point, somewhere in Western Europe, to "stroke him" and pick his brains, so that the Soviets could continue the masquerade of major power collaboration for their own people. I do not know how we figured out that the Soviets wanted to "punish" their ambassador, but there was no question that this was the case.

Q: Well, if you have to be "punished," Geneva was not the worst place in the world to go. It could have been Khartoum [Sudan] or some place like that.

SMITH: That is true. We would go and call on this Soviet ambassador every third day or so, just so that he would know [that we were there]. We had nothing to say. We had to "invent" things to say to him. In fact, he was a likable man.

That takes us up to the spring of 1974, and then, of course, Kissinger began his Syrian shuttle -- about the time we wound down this silly exercise. Actually, after I left Geneva, Bob Oakley had to continue to hang around there for several more weeks. As I remember it, this began in April or May, 1974.

Q: Now we're in the spring of 1974. Then you went back to...

SMITH: [President] Nixon, of course, was on his last legs. We had Nixon's grand visit...

Q: This was sort of Nixon's grand tour that he was undertaking to get away from the Watergate Affair.

SMITH: That is right. To emphasize his strong point of foreign affairs, [President Nixon] made a very high profile visit to several of the major Middle Eastern capitals. I think [he visited] Egypt, Israel, Syria, Jordan, and...

Q: Were you in Israel when he came through?

SMITH: Of course.

Q: How did [the visit] go? Because it was my understanding that everyone knew that this was a dying, a failing presidency. Did it come across that way where you were -- or how [did it look]?

SMITH: In fairness to Nixon, he comes off very well when overseas. I had seen him in action when I was his escort officer in the Soviet Union in 1967 for two or three weeks. He has a lot of dignity and wit about him in a foreign situation. He thrives on that, too. He held his head up high, at least when he was in Israel. I am sure it was much more of a dilemma for the Israelis than for the Arabs because, when push comes to shove, Israel depends very much on its "special relations" with the White House -- not with Congress and obviously not with the State Department. So the Israelis were hoping against hope that Nixon, who had proved himself, on the whole, to be a good friend to them would survive. They did not want to see an interim president. So the Israelis were nervous about the Watergate business. The [Nixon] visit came off very well in Israel. Nixon said the right things, he paid the proper courtesy calls, he did not have an impulse to do anything zany. We got him in and out of there. He got enormous, positive coverage in the Israeli media, as I am sure he did in the Arab media, too. It was the first time a president of the United States had visited any of those countries.

The ability of Israel to absorb the enormity of its miscalculation in the outbreak of the [1973] war in the first place really occupied us in terms of our reporting on the Israeli domestic scene. In addition to that, there was a crisis within the Israeli government. As you may recall, Golda Meir was interim prime minister for about five months. Finally, Rabin became prime minister when she stepped down. She had already resigned but she was required, under the Israeli constitution, to stay in office until a certain point. And then Rabin became Prime Minister in the spring of 1974.

This was a unique situation. It had never happened before that Israel had a caretaker Prime Minister who had the courage, bless her, to sign the agreements on the cease-fire, the prisoner of war [exchanges], the straightening out of the line [of contact between the Israeli and the Egyptian armies], and the disengagement with Egypt. I think she was still in office at the time the agreement on the disengagement with Syria was negotiated. I think she was already a caretaker Prime Minister at the end of the war. She signed these agreements. That was because of the tremendous moral authority that Golda Meir had in Israel. Since then, Israel has had caretaker prime ministers who have been scared of their shadows, because they really did not have the constitutional authority to do that kind of thing. So we got away with murder in terms of the Israeli domestic political situation at that time, thank goodness.

So back I came from Israel, at the end of July, 1974. I was sitting at my desk in Tel Aviv one day, and exactly one day later, I was sitting at my desk in the State Department as Director of Israeli and Arab-Israeli Affairs.

Q: You served from when to when...

SMITH: From July 1974, until July 1978, a very interesting period. Kissinger was there -- let me get this right -- for the first two of those years. Then [I served under] Secretary of State Cyrus Vance. Yes, Kissinger stayed on, did he not, as Secretary of State under President Gerald Ford?

Q: Yes.

SMITH: I cannot recall whether it was because Kissinger or Sisco asked for it, but those of us at the working level knew that it was the logical thing: I threw myself with a frenzy into writing a series of papers in July, August, and September 1974, explaining how he should try to pull off a so-called disengagement between Israel and Jordan, even though there had been no combat between Israel and Jordan. Kissinger instantly recognized the desirability, if we could manage it, of persuading the Israelis to pull back from a token portion of the West Bank. [If this were done] we would strengthen the hand of the Jordanians as possible spokesmen for the Palestinians. If we did not do this, in rapid fire order in the summer of 1974, then [Yasser] Arafat and the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] would be institutionalized [as the representatives of the Palestinians], which is precisely what did happen, I think it was in November 1974, at the Arab League Summit meeting. After this King Hussein [of Jordan] just washed his hands and said, [in effect], "I can no longer negotiate an Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank on behalf of the Palestinians. I have been rejected." This greatly complicated the political life of the United States in the area.

Through Joe Sisco, I did get a backhanded compliment from Henry Kissinger. I guess it was just before the Nixon resignation. [In effect Kissinger reportedly said that] all of this makes eminent sense, but the White House is so weak and is going to be so weak for such a protracted period of time that he [Kissinger] could not pull this off from a U.S. domestic political standpoint. He sent that word to me, which was the closest thing I ever got to a compliment from him. Kissinger also said, "For once the State Department people are writing a paper that takes all aspects of the problem into account." I had looked at Kissinger's own writing and now saw papers relating to the disengagement efforts up until then, the summer of 1974, and recognized that Kissinger did not want a simple analysis of what the smartest thing would be to say to the Israelis and, in this case, King Hussein and what the carrots and sticks for the parties should be. He wanted to know what would be happening in Algeria, what would be the ability of the Algerians to undercut King Hussein, what would be happening in Western Europe, what would the Soviets be up to -- you know, the global [perspective]. It was not that hard to do. It was not our style in the Department at the time [to do this kind of thing].

Q: Tell me, just to give me a feel [for the situation]. Here you are, as the Arab-Israeli desk officer, and you're thinking of what would the Soviets do, what would the French do, what would the Algerians do -- you're treading on all sorts of toes. How do you handle this? Do you call up and ask? This is sort of a nuts and bolts question. How would you go about it?

SMITH: I do not remember whether I ever cleared the various sections of my action memorandum to Kissinger with the desks concerned. If it had not been urgent, obviously, I would have done so, as I should have. I am not sure if I did. It was not a profound study. I simply put myself in -- who was it? -- Boumedienne's position [as President of Algeria]. I was vaguely aware of what the Algerians had been [accustomed to] saying about King Hussein and I had paid close attention to what they had done and said about the Arab-Israeli problem since the [1973] war had ended. We had been talking with the leaders of the entire region, and so I kept track of them in the telegrams. Simply on the basis of the existing short record, I extrapolated what they would probably do in this case and came up with suggestions which may have been faulty but looked obvious to me of things that we could do or at least say to the Algerians to keep them quiet -- little hints of future U.S. favors in other contexts. I am sure I did not clear this with the Algerian desk officer because he would have wanted to make a Ph.D. thesis out of it, and there was not time. Also, it was sketchy. It was not a prediction to Kissinger of what would happen. It was a scenario suggesting that this was what might happen, and this was a possible way to contain these actors on the margins who could disrupt what you wanted to do otherwise.

Q: What you're really talking about is the [widespread] complaint that the State Department can't produce [such studies] because, even if you wanted a thumb-nail sketch of what Algeria and the Soviet Union [would do], by the time you get it [cleared] you get a tome...

SMITH: Or if you do not get a tome, you get a wishy-washy [study]...

Q: This is how the NSC [National Security Council] operates. You make your best shot, which usually isn't too bad.

SMITH: It is better to have [such a paper] done in effective, real time than to belabor the points. But you can make major errors. The point of this paper was that it was not a rigid scenario, under which Kissinger was going to move, step by step. It was simply a picture. Kissinger would fill in the picture as he went along. He was going to "ad hoc" it from day to day, anyhow. But it [the memorandum] was to jog his memory on the fact that, if Kissinger made a public statement about this or that aspect of King Hussein's role in relation to Jerusalem or the West Bank, it would -- I am just making this up -- irritate the hell out of Boumedienne, who had a propaganda machine in the Arab world to make life horribly difficult for King Hussein. So [the idea was] that you do not go public with this or that viewpoint, if you want to avoid riling the waters. This is the kind of thing that we are talking about here.

Q: You know, the Arab-Israeli desk officer...

SMITH: Let me interrupt. That is a pre-1967 term. What it really meant was that [I was] the Israel and Palestinian desk officer. The "Arab" part dealt only with East Jerusalem, the West Bank, and the Gaza Strip.

Q: Now, were you doing the normal things that a desk officer does, such as taking care of visitors and all of that? Because I imagine...

SMITH: That was not the purpose of this desk at all. It was the desk for Palestinians. It sounds as if it was a regional office operation. But the Israeli desk -- the Israel and Arab-Israeli desk -- can not speak for any Arabs except for those then under Israeli occupation and inside Israel before 1967. [In fact], not under Israeli occupation but under Jordanian and Egyptian occupation, but still intimately associated with the Israel problem, let us say. Namely, the Palestinians.

Q: Well, you must have been inundated with visitors and all that, which must have taken an awful lot of your time. Could you turn them aside, particularly Congressional visitors and all that?

SMITH: Yes, but most prominent Americans considered themselves instant experts before they even left, so they were not screaming for State Department briefings. They knew it all, already. Furthermore, the Israeli Embassy [in Washington] was happily giving them all kinds of briefings, and we would like to have given [these visitors] what we considered the "straight" story, but, as you have sensed, we could not stretch ourselves in that many directions at once. A great deal of the Arab-Israeli stuff, regionally speaking, did, indeed, fall in our laps. Somebody had to do it. NEA [Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs] did not have regional offices any longer. Those had been scrapped when the country directorate system was created. There was a Deputy Assistant Secretary of State [DAS] for South Asia, another DAS for North Africa, and another DAS for the main part of the Middle East. So we at least had a person with authority to deal with these matters, and, starting a year later, it was Nick Veliotis who came back from Tel Aviv, where he had been DCM, and took over this work.

Even though there was a deputy assistant secretary for the pieces of the NEA region, because there was no office dealing with those pieces, some country directorate within the Middle East would have to function, in effect, as a [regional] office, as far as getting the papers together was concerned, making sure that people all wrote their bits and pieces, and it all got assembled. That fell to us. So we did have, in the 1974-76 period, quite a bit of regional paperwork to do, if you will. We were stretched, then. Thank goodness, prominent Americans wanting to go to Israel were not pounding at our door.

Q: What about the Israeli lobby? Are we talking about this time and its effect on you -- AIPAC [American-Israeli Public Affairs Committee] and you and the various issues?

SMITH: I knew it well from back in December 1970, when the Israeli lobby went berserk after [Secretary of State] Rogers' Peace Plan Section II, which dealt with the West Bank and Jerusalem, came out. [The lobby] flooded the Executive Branch [of the U.S. Government] with so much correspondence that normal operations came to a halt. So I was familiar with all of this. There was a fair amount of confusion in the [Israeli] lobby. There was no clear signal from Israel to the lobby in 1974-75, and many prominent American supporters of Israel recognized that Kissinger, even though he was having a lot of friction with Israel, was displaying a lot of good sense in maneuvering in the Middle East. No matter how little confidence the pro-Israeli lobby, like the Israeli Government, had in Kissinger at the beginning of 1974, within four months he had pulled off disengagement agreements with the two combatants, Egypt and Syria. The Syrian disengagement [agreement], if you look at it carefully, was really extremely difficult and a tour de force for which alone Kissinger deserved the Nobel Peace Prize.

Naturally, the American-Israeli lobby thought that we had a Secretary of State who was not pounding on Israel and was displaying a lot of wisdom in what he was doing -- and was a real activist. Kissinger barely had time for anything else in 1974-75. Things slowed down a little bit in 1975 after the second Egyptian-Israeli disengagement agreement, which was reached, if I remember correctly, in September, 1975. The purpose of this agreement was to nail the Israelis down. To do this, Kissinger made some very unfortunate commitments to the Israelis, which plagued us later on, about what the U.S. would or would not do in the future in pursuing Middle East peace efforts. He did not have to do that. I do not know what made him think that he did. But that is getting a little bit ahead of the story.

I do not know what else to say on this. The Israeli lobby was not a problem in 1974 or in 1975 -- at least not more than it always is for anybody in the State Department trying to carry out U.S. Middle East policy. They were checking on us. I spent a lot of time, as Director of Israeli Affairs, with major supporters of Israel. I went to a lot of receptions, almost to a point above and beyond the call of duty, to let them see me, talk to me, show them that this is the guy who, at the working level, is responsible for Israel in the State Department. Was this guy an Arab lover? Was he a Jew hater? They could see that I was not. I think this did some good. Now that I think about it, I spent an inordinate amount of time, not exactly stroking these people but just exposing myself to them. I honestly think that this did some good. I got my staff -- the FSOs [Foreign Service Officers] working with me on that desk -- to do the same thing. Then, as things calmed down, in 1976-77, the NEA Office of Public Affairs "discovered" me and put me into their speaking meat grinder. I spent about 25 percent of my time traveling around the United States, talking about United States Middle Eastern policy -- as often as not in front of American Jewish groups of all stripes. And, of course, academic and business groups and so forth. That was quite exhausting, as I look back on it.

Q: The various Jewish groups throughout the United States have been such a major factor in our Middle Eastern policy, because they are so politically powerful. Did you find yourself up against "true believers" or did the people asking you questions have what I would call a "rational approach" to the role of Israel at that particular time in the Middle East?

SMITH: On the whole, I was impressed with the degree of sophistication of Israel's supporters in the American hinterland. I should not have been surprised, because these people were: a) well educated, whether it was Des Moines [Iowa] or Little Rock [Arkansas] or wherever I was. They were always interested in international affairs, partly because of their attachment to Israel but, I suspect, not only because of Israel. They were quite knowledgeable about American foreign affairs. Also, they were very grateful to have somebody come from the State Department and try to explain to them what the State Department and the Secretary of State were seeking to do. The fact that we had a dynamo for a Secretary of State, who was, by now, a proven friend of Israel and also a very smart character in handling Israel and the Arabs -- and who happened to be Jewish -- this was not lost on these people that I was dealing with. I sometimes found myself dealing with blue collar, relatively ignorant, American Jewish groups, who tended to be extremists in their belief or their willingness to believe the cliches about how the State Department was the enemy of Israel. But that did not happen often. On the whole, I found the American Jewish community to be intelligent, perceptive, well informed, and willing to listen to somebody from the State Department.

It was a reassuring experience. The fact that I had just lived three years in Israel, spoke a little Hebrew, and was not a "buddy" of the Arabs by any stretch of the imagination did not hurt, naturally.

Q: How did you find the change when the Carter administration came in? Let's talk about the transition and that period. Here you were -- there was a new administration coming in, with Democrats coming in to replace Republicans. This was a major issue. How were you treated or perceived by the new people coming in and how did you deal with the transition period?

SMITH: Every new administration brings in a bunch of political figures who think that they know it all and push aside the career people. I know what you mean. As far as the Jewish community is concerned, though, it is worth mentioning that Nixon and Ford had been so weak that they were pleased to have a properly elected president. Until Nixon the Democrats had seemed to be friendlier to Israel than the Republicans. Nixon turned that idea on its head in the view of the American Jewish community.

This is an aside, but even though Nixon seems to be on record as having made some extraordinarily anti-Semitic remarks, he nevertheless will go down in the history of the American Jewish community as one of the most pro-Israeli presidents that we have ever had. That is really what is called "squaring the circle."

Q: Well, he was a politician.

SMITH: But back to President Carter. The American Jewish community and the State of Israel had no reason to think that Carter was not going to be a true friend of Israel. But what made them nervous was the fact that -- I do not know whether it was [Zbigniew] Brzezinski or [Secretary of State] Vance or [President] Carter himself who set something of a deadline to get back to a major effort toward a total settlement in the Middle East, as opposed to these "piecemeal" arrangements which Kissinger had concentrated on. I think that it was Vance who did this, and he lived to rue the day, because he could not meet his own schedule. So there was a great burst of Middle East consultations, travel by Vance to Moscow, Western Europe, and to the Middle East, because he set a deadline for reconvening the Middle East Peace Conference. I have got all of this written down at home, because I wrote a paper on U.S. Middle Eastern peace efforts from 1967 to 1982, which is about 250 pages long and which has never been published.

Vance made some gaffes early on which made him look much less sympathetic to Israel than the facts justified. He made some statements on the eve of visiting Arab capitals which made the Israelis nervous. But I do not think that the Israelis were really worried about the Carter administration at all until the Camp David negotiations.

Camp David was a bewildering event. The Camp David meetings took place just after I had left the position of Director of Israeli and Arab-Israeli Affairs -- in fact, two months later. To me it was spellbinding. Some very good books have been written about it.

Q: Did you have any problems with the transition? I'm talking about the teams that came in to look at things, or was that a fairly professional transition, at least in the NEA area where you were working?

SMITH: I do not recall any upheaval in NEA or with respect to the Middle East, resulting from the change of administration, other than the rhetoric of the incoming administration, spurning any further effort on partial arrangements and calling for a major effort to go right to the fundamentals of the Middle East peace problem. This looked very optimistic to us at the time, although Carter had the will power, and Camp David was the result. No, I do not remember a transition problem.

Q: Is there anything that you can add?

SMITH: Vance, in my view, was one of the best Secretaries of State that we ever had. He certainly went out of his way to consult the professionals [in the State Department]. He was not abrasive with the career staff of the Department of State. On the contrary, he relied heavily on career officers. So there was a good working atmosphere within the Department after Vance took over.

Q: Is there anything else that we should cover before we move on to your next assignment, because we want to stick to your experiences, rather than...

SMITH: My last year or year and a half -- 1977-78 -- in this position which we have been talking about entailed more and more time spent on the road in public speaking. This was partly because the Department needed me to do that and partly because my office was not directly involved in those preliminary stages of groping with the Middle East problem. Therefore, this was a good way to use me and my time. I did not have a problem with this, other than the fact that it was exhausting. To make a long story short, I do not think that there is anything else that I was directly involved in during the 1977-78 time period which we need to go into.

Q: Just another, quick question. What was your impression, during the 1974-78 period, of the reporting from the Middle East? Because now you were in a different position. You were looking at the reporting coming from Cairo, Jordan, Beirut, Jerusalem, and Tel Aviv. Did you have any feel, at that particular time, [about the quality of] the information that was coming from our posts in the Middle East?

SMITH: I recall that the reporting on the domestic political situation seemed to me to be very good, even from capitals such as Damascus, where we had very little access. I thought that it was impressive. On the Arab-Israeli problem, it was of limited value, as long as Kissinger was Secretary of State, because he was conducting it all "out of his hat." There was no way for a reporting officer in the field to have any true sense of what was likely to happen next in Washington. Because Washington was the major player, not the local folks. But on the domestic political scene, I thought that our reporting was darned good.

CLIFF FORSTER
Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Tel Aviv (1971-1973)

Cliff Forster was born in Manila, the Philippines in 1924. His father was the field director for the American Red Cross in the Middle East. After serving in the U.S.

Navy, Mr. Forster attended George Washington University and Stanford University. Mr. Forster served in the Foreign Service in the Philippines, Burma, and Israel. He was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt on May 29, 1990.

Q: What do you have to say about the program in Israel? Of course, that was the period before Israel became quite so belligerent worldwide.

FORSTER: Their settlements on the West Bank certainly had a negative impact on world public opinion.

Q: What was the thrust of your program for Israel in those years?

FORSTER: When we were there, Golda Meir was running the show and doing a very effective job of it with leaders like Moshe Dayan and Shimon Peres. Israel was not having the problems that it's having today. Cairo was under blackout then and Sadat was coming out with a strong anti-Israeli line at that time. You certainly had the feeling that Israel was surrounded by hostile regimes, and that they needed some kind of support.

I'd say at that time we were generally more sympathetic to their problems. We -- when I say "we," I am referring to those of us in USIS, who were on the cutting edge of this because we would continually be up against a very active and vocal Israeli media, who felt that the U.S. did not fully understand the position they were in. This is when we were pressing them very hard on the "Rogers Plan" to try and work out some kind of adjustment in the Sinai and to avoid retaliatory raids in depth into Egypt and Lebanon. We felt this would be counterproductive. Of course, they continued with those for a while. Lebanon was not the major problem then; it was Egypt.

Then along about 1972, we could feel the Arab-Israeli tension building up fast. We were very close to some of this, both in Jerusalem and in northern Israel. You had terrorist strikes across the border from Lebanon, a family killed after a Bar Mitzvah not too far from where we were traveling on the road, which caused great resentment in Israel. Then came the "Munich massacre" as they called it when several of their best team members were killed by PLO terrorists at the Olympics. That had a devastating effect on the Israelis and found them striking back in force. Then there was the capture of the Sabena plane with Israelis aboard by the Palestinians right on the Lod airport tarmac outside Tel Aviv. Dayan personally led the commandos who rescued the passengers. Now, they were really beginning to retaliate in force each time, and the policy made sense to them since these terrorist strikes were increasing.

Next came the Lod Airport massacre, which was a surprise attack by three Japanese "Red Army" or Sekigun terrorists who had been trained in Lebanon. They just opened fire indiscriminately on the passengers after the landing while waiting for baggage in the terminal. The airport was like a battlefield with dead and dying, women and children, everywhere. Those of us involved at the time will never forget the carnage. And many of those victims were Puerto Ricans coming on a pilgrimage to visit the Holy Land, American citizens, many of them. Those of us in the embassy went out as pallbearers the following day. The Japanese ambassador and his wife, who were visibly moved by this "massacre" involving Japanese went from one hospital to another to visit the victims. Being Japanese, they took personal responsibility and went on television to apologize to the Israeli people. Of course, many of the Israelis couldn't understand why they should take it so personally since they were in no way responsible. The Japanese sent a delegation immediately from Tokyo to take care of all the claims and this was also immensely impressive to the Israelis.

But you could see and feel the Israelis steeling up. At that point, they were mad and this is when they started striking back, as you recall, with their own agents in various parts of Europe, and they would throw it back at us in our sessions. "You see? You see this? How do you deal with this? You have to strike, strike, strike." It was clearly an "eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth."

Then came the raids into Lebanon. Nancy and I were skiing on Mt. Hermon, I remember, at the time of one of the first raids. Their jets just came screaming right across Mt. Hermon to attack the southern Lebanon area. The tension simply increased and it got worse with the passage of time.

Q: This was in '72, wasn't it?

FORSTER: The winter of 1972.

Q: Before the '73 War.

FORSTER: That's right. We left Israel just before the outbreak of that conflict. We were coming back for a second tour, and were on leave at the time of the "Yom Kippur" conflict as it became known. We went to their twenty-fifth anniversary celebrating the creation of the State of Israel. It was their big anniversary celebration in Jerusalem in the spring of 1973 and the Israelis were riding high. You could just see that they were feeling very good about things, in general, and were convinced that their forces were adequate to cope with any invasion threat. So it was a great shock to them when the Arabs struck on Yom Kippur Day and moved in so rapidly over the Sinai and across the Golan Heights.

I would just like to say one or two things about this period of service in Israel. Because of the kind of tensions building up between us, we were cautioning them to avoid over-kill pointing out that our retaliation raids in Vietnam were often counter-productive. We urged them to work out some kind of solution with the Palestinians, the Peace for Land thing. But the Israelis were not prepared to buy this.

I even arranged for a number of leading Israeli journalists to go as a team around the U.S. to get some idea of the feeling that was building up in the U.S. even then about some of the Israeli intransigence. I don't know whether it resulted in much, because they felt they were beleaguered and that we had no conception of the real problem -- survival. But at least they had a chance to have face-to-face talks with editors outside of Washington. So many of them were tied in with the Washington scene. They had not gone around the country to get a better idea of American public opinion and it was both educational and disturbing for them.

At that time also I felt that my USIA colleagues in the Arab countries and, indeed, myself, should have more of an opportunity to understand the points of view of our different constituencies.

For example, I had never been to Israel before this assignment and I couldn't quite figure out why they were assigning me there after all these years in Asia. Perhaps they thought this would make me more neutral. After five or six months of discussions in Israel, I felt I needed another perspective. The Israelis are great people, but you can go on all night arguing your points of view, and it gets very intense after a while. You find yourself sort of steaming up.

I was so exposed to their perceptions, I felt, "Boy, I've got to get out of here for a while and find out how the Jordanians, Egyptians and Lebanese feel about this situation and how the PAOs in these neighboring countries are reacting".

So I was able to work out an arrangement with Mike Pistor and Bill Payeff, who had the Middle East area, to go around to the other posts. I just asked my colleagues to please arrange for me to meet with -- in the case of Beirut, Palestinians, Christians, all the various elements who are at each other's throats now, and then the same in Egypt and in Jordan. I just wanted to know how they all viewed the Israelis and our policies there and in the Middle East in general. You read about their reactions but I wanted to know face to face. I felt this would be an opportunity also for me to try and give them some idea of our positions on Israel and the Arab world as viewed from Tel Aviv.

This exchange of views turned out rather well and I began to arrange for visits by my PAO colleagues to Israel to meet with Israelis in different fields. Dick Undeland, from Amman was one of the first to come over. Ed Penny from Cairo followed with others. I would arrange to get Israeli journalists, scholars, a good mix together with our PAOs, so they could get some idea of their perceptions at first hand.

This was a gamble. I certainly felt it was worth trying and it got off to a good start. Whether you're in Israel or in one of the Arab countries, you sometimes find yourself taking on the coloration if you are not careful. It's the old problem, rather like China when it went under, all the strong feeling over what happened there in '49.

We had a series of good meetings. The whole idea was ultimately to arrange very selectively for Israelis, Palestinians, Jordanians, and Egyptians to meet informally at USIS-arranged programs. This was about the time of 1973 just before the Yom Kippur conflict. Then, of course, everything ended with the war and the whole effort went under.

What has happened since then, I think has been a disaster. I was appalled by the changes in Israel with the settlements in the West Bank and the rigidity of Israel's new leadership after Golda. I felt it was going to boomerang on them, and I think it has.

Q: The whole Begin period started with that settlement policy.

FORSTER: And it was just so entirely different from the earlier Golda Meir period. I mean, sure, you did have some hostility, but they were very correct then, Lew, about the West Bank. You had a few incidents, yes, but I remember traveling into the West Bank quite often, and for a while Nancy and I lived in the old city of Jerusalem, the Arab quarter and relations were quite good then. We used to try and get residents, leaders of the Arab quarter, together with our American and Israeli friends, just to see if we couldn't break some of this down. Sometimes it worked; sometimes it didn't. One of the great guys -- you read about him now -- was Mayor Teddy Kollek's advisor, Meron Benvenisti.

Q: Kollek is the mayor of Jerusalem?

FORSTER: Right. He and Benvenisti have tried to follow a middle road and have a sympathetic understanding of Palestinian concerns in East Jerusalem and the West Bank. Another one is Amos Elon who wrote an interesting article on the Peace Now Movement in Israel which appeared in the New Yorker. I'm amazed how much has been happening there with moderate Israelis who oppose Shamir's policies and Begin before him. The feeling, I think, of so many of us is, "Wow! They're all going along with this tough Shamir line." That is not true. I've met a number of Israeli friends recently who I worked with earlier in Israel who say, "Look. We're not for this, for what's happening. We're very upset about this extreme policy that the government has in Israel now."

So I would say the experience there prior to being pulled into Washington as deputy for the Middle East area, was a traumatic one for me, certainly. There were successes, there were failures. It was, overall, the kind of experience that you never forget because it is so intense and because you do meet so many really outstanding people in that country on both sides of the issue whether you agree or disagree with what they're doing and saying. Most of them, including the media people and many of the scholars, feel the way we do about current Israeli policy. Certainly the opportunity to be there when Golda was running things was a special experience.

Q: You were back in the States either on home leave or perhaps going back or not, when the 1973 conflict erupted?

FORSTER: Right. We had just left that summer. We had the kids and were en route to Washington, to report in and then go on home leave. I had a call from Bill Payeff from Washington, my old buddy in East Asia, while we were in Paris. He said, "Cliff, we want you to come on in. I'm going to head up the Near East and North Africa Division and want you as my deputy."

I told Bill, "Look, I haven't figured this area out in two years. It's going to take me another two, at least." Regardless of all the problems, we were all enjoying our time there just from the standpoint of the history and archeology of the area. There's just so much, not to mention the tremendous psychological challenge for us from the policy standpoint, too. So I was eager to return to Israel but they wanted me in, and they assigned Stan Moss to replace me in Tel Aviv.

So I reported in, and it was just shortly after I arrived -- I had to cancel my leave, as I recall -- that all hell broke loose with the Yom Kippur war. The kids lost some of their Israeli teachers, who were killed in that conflict, so it had quite an impact on them. We lost some very good Israeli friends. It was clearly an Arab invasion in our view although there was a lot of conjecture about it at the time, but when Syria struck Israel on that day, it was reminiscent of Pearl Harbor. They were all observing Yom Kippur, and the Syrians just came across their borders as did the Egyptians with their tanks to the south.

We immediately set up this Middle East task force. VOA played a terribly important role during that time and we were working with VOA to make sure that U.S. reaction, official and unofficial, was getting through to both sides and particularly to the Arab states since we felt it was important for them to know just where we stood in case there were any major moves with Soviet support. VOA was also an important channel to let the Soviets know where we stood since the Soviets were actively supporting Syria, as you may recall. Kissinger, when he sent in those planes, the cargo flights, to Israel, couldn't get any support at first and they finally had to come through the Azores to refuel en-route. It was a dicey time and USIA's support in getting the message through to the different parties became very important.

So we went through that conflict with the task force, working with our State colleagues. It was a good group. Joe Sisco and Roy Atherton over in State, Bill Payeff, Bill Rugh and others with USIA. I think you had on that task force, as you did on the Vietnam task force later, a very special kind of professional cooperation between the State and USIA officers. There was a lot of respect for the expertise that we could provide, the importance of the Voice in getting the word through, and an acceptance and understanding of what information tools we could use during this crisis to support our policy actions.

Q: On the other hand, the Arabs never forgave us for that intensive supply effort to the Israelis. We probably saved the Israeli nation at that time.

FORSTER: You're absolutely right. The incrimination and the rest of it. But you couldn't just let Israel go under.

Q: And they would have.

FORSTER: Oh, no question. The Israelis say this themselves. The way the Egyptians moved in across the desert until Sharon, who was right of Attila politically (their General Patton), pushed their tanks back into Egypt. A number of those generals that they had were not as extreme as Sharon. Many of them were fine men and they sustained great losses. Dayan was still going strong then although it was not too long after that when he and Golda passed on. It's amazing how there was such a political change in Israel after their departure from the scene.

Q: Labor lost.

FORSTER: Labor lost, and then there was the era of Begin. We never saw Begin around during our time in Israel. He was simply out of sight. As a matter of fact, when Begin moved into power, it was only Stan Moss and some of the USIS people who knew him. The ambassador, in order to get together with Begin, worked this out through Stan, I understand. It was a case of where USIS officers had been in contact with all sides.

AUBREY HOOKS
Rotation Officer
Tel Aviv (1971-1973)

Ambassador Hooks was born and raised in South Carolina and educated at Brevard College and the University of South Carolina. He entered the Foreign Service in 1971 and served abroad in Tel Aviv, Warsaw, Ankara, Port au Prince, Tel Aviv, Rome, Helsinki and Harare. He also had several assignments at the State Department in Washington, DC. In 1995 he was named United States Ambassador to the Republic of Congo at Brazzaville and served there until 1999. He subsequently served as Ambassador to Democratic Republic of the Congo (2001-2004); and as Ambassador to Cote d'Ivoire from 2004 to 2007. Ambassador Hooks was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2009.

Q: So you were in Israel from '71 until?

HOOKS: 1973.

Q: Who was the ambassador and what was the situation? How did you find Israel when you got there?

HOOKS: I arrived there at the end of May, 1971. Walworth Barbour was the ambassador at the time. Barbour had been in Israel about ten years or so; he was appointed by President Kennedy. He had been there so long that he knew everyone, often before they became known on the political scene. He was Boston-born and had been in the Foreign Service for close to 40 years. He was a very courtly gentleman of the old school.

I started off working in the visa section. We had a fascinating DCM, Owen Zurhellen, who went on to become ambassador in Surinam. Zurhellen took a great interest in junior officers, and he really mentored us in a great way. He used to play volleyball with us once a week, for example. He managed a great rotation program in the embassy. I worked for three months in the consular section, and then Zurhellen asked me to become the staff aide to the ambassador. I think it was the one of the most fascinating jobs I had in the Foreign Service. I was Staff Aide for almost a year, followed by rotations through the commercial, economic, political, and citizenship sections of the embassy.

Q: Well, you said you were staff aide mainly working for Barbour? How did he operate? What was your impression of him as an ambassador?

HOOKS: He had the advantage of having been there for ten years already, so he knew every senior official in the government, he knew the history of the country better than most Israelis. The country at that time was less than 25 years old, so he had been there almost half the life of the country. He knew all the political actors, he knew all the issues inside and out. Because of health issues, he never came to the Embassy before 9 o'clock, and he always left shortly after 12 o'clock, although he often received people in his Residence in the evening. That's the way I thought all ambassadors operated but discovered later in my career that that wasn't the case.

Once he left the Embassy, I had to prepare his reading folder for the following day, and I learned quickly what he was interested in and what he was not. I went through all the cable traffic and selected the telegrams that he wanted to see. In the afternoon, if anything needed his signature urgently, I would take the document to his residence. Actually it was a wonderful time because I got to meet lots of interesting people and to follow key events very closely. Everything came through my hands and it gave me a great opportunity to see how an embassy works.

Barbour was a very bright man, a very courtly man, very reserved, perhaps even a bit shy, but he and I just seemed to click. He would often call me into his office and he would reminisce for a few minutes about various events. I had the impression he was pleased with what I was giving him. He would occasionally take me with him to special events and so it was a wonderful, wonderful experience.

Q: Was there a Mrs.?

HOOKS: There was not, which was unfortunate in many respects given his social obligations. He became dean of the diplomatic corps, which was quite unusual for an American ambassador, because he had been there so long. That honor brought more responsibilities for me. I met all the other ambassadors; I had to arrange farewell gifts and events for departing ambassadors. We had lots of visitors, CODELS and senators in those days, and so I ended up being control officer for a lot of those people. The Ambassador would receive members of Congress at his residence for drinks at 6 o'clock. That was his standard way of dealing with senators and congressmen.

And so this was my introduction to the Foreign Service. It was exciting. I can't imagine a better introduction to the Foreign Service and so I was thrilled with that first assignment.

Q: What was your impression -- obviously it was your first government but you couldn't have asked for a more active government -- of the Israeli government and how it operated.

HOOKS: Well, Israel was always a unique and special place, and even in those days, because of domestic interest in Israel, our relations with them were very unusual. As I mentioned earlier, we had a very large number of members of the Senate and Congress coming through Israel, and it was interesting to me to see how members of Congress became involved in our foreign policy, particularly in the case of Israel.

Israel was also a very pro-American place. It was very friendly. Golda Meir was prime minister; she herself was American at one time. We had such close relations while I was there. I recall one of the things the DCM did which I thought was really incredible: he would invite senior government officials to his house for dinner and he would invite all the junior officers to attend. I met Menachem Begin at his house for dinner. I recall he also invited the head of Israeli intelligence the very evening that an El Al airline was hijacked in Cyprus. Believe it or not, the guy actually came to dinner and was able to brief us on what was taking place while negotiations were underway, so we felt we were being involved in history in a very immediate sense, something that I had never experienced before. I found those events exhilarating and exciting, and I give the highest marks to the DCM for his mentoring of junior officers. It also created a feeling that being in the Foreign Service was not just a job. There is something unique about it. It is a mission, a call. You are involved not only in just closely observing history but actually involved in the making of history.

Q: In the embassy, especially among the junior officers, was there any questioning of the Israelis and their view towards the Palestinians and the West Bank and Gaza at that time?

HOOKS: No, there was not. This was before the intifada. I call this time the “golden age” of Israel in the sense it was after the euphoria of the Six Day War in 1967 but before the trauma of the Yom Kippur War (the intifada came later on in 1980s) and it was a time when the pioneering generation was still leading the country. Ben-Gurion was still alive; Golda Meir was prime minister, Abba Eban was Foreign Minister, Moshe Dayan was Minister of Defense. All those historical figures were there and I saw them. At Fourth of July receptions I shook hands with them. At the same time, Israel was a fairly poor country and hiking was the big thing. I came back there 15 years later in 1988 and of course it had really changed. It was Southern California located in the Middle East. I recall I was there for the 25th anniversary celebrations in 1972.

Q: Did you sense a divide between our consulate general in Jerusalem and our embassy in Tel Aviv in attitude or not? Or was that not during your time?

HOOKS: I do not recall a divide between the Embassy and the Consulate. I was staff aide to the ambassador at the time. I can't recall the consul general's name now but he came to Tel Aviv frequently to meet with the DCM and the ambassador and I would see him there. I was never aware, and I think I would have been aware as staff aide, of any sense of division.

The Arab issue I think was seen in a different light in those days. Again, this was before the intifada, before the Yom Kippur War, and so it did not figure as a divisive issue. I don't recall any sense of division between the consulate in Jerusalem and the embassy in Tel Aviv.

Q: Did you get any feel for the pro-Israeli groups in the United States? I don't think AIPAC was as powerful as it later became; maybe it was but there were other groups including the religious right wing. Did you get any feel for that?

HOOKS: Yes, in two respects. One was again members of the House of Representatives and the Senate who came through, such as Jacob Javits, a strong supporter of Israel, who would meet with the ambassador and they obviously played a role. They clearly followed very closely what was going on in Israel and the ambassador regarded them as very important interlocutors.

Secondly, there were visits on a regular basis by distinguished groups, mostly of American Jews, who met with the ambassador for briefings and who would express great interest in various issues in our relationship with Israel. I thus became aware of the fact that there was a much larger domestic constituency for Israel, which I discovered later on did not exist nearly to the same degree in other countries I have worked in.

Q: What about you and your wife on the social side? How did you find that?

HOOKS: Israel is a unique and special place. Israeli society is very open, a friendly and gregarious society, so it was not like we were dealing with a very conservative and closed society. We met friends that we kept in contact with over the years. We went to Israel on vacation to visit friends at one point. So we had friends, Israelis and others that were there. We found at the embassy people who were open and friendly. However, there were still -- my wife reminds me -- very traditional Foreign Service people who had grown up in the old school from the '50s. I recall the consul general's wife wanted a formal visit from my wife and so on.

So it was a very friendly embassy and a very friendly host country. It was so easy to travel around the country on weekends. It was exciting to go off to the many archeological sites, one of the things I found fascinating, or to spend time in Jerusalem. I recall we received our car the very first week after our arrival, if you can imagine. The first thing we did was to drive up to Jerusalem to celebrate our first wedding anniversary. We spent the day exploring the Old City in Jerusalem. Israel really was an exciting place. Every weekend you could go places and do the things that are hard to duplicate elsewhere.

Q: How did the October War impact on you?

HOOKS: The October War came after we left. The October War was in 1973. We left in July of '73.

Q: Was there a feeling of while you were there of imminent danger of something happening or was the feeling that things were pretty well settled?

HOOKS: No. There was a sense that there was still a very imminent threat to Israel. Not, however, in the sense that it is so imminent that it was about to happen, but a general sense that there was still insecurity. Israel of course was riding high from the overwhelming victory of the Six Day War in 1967. The Yom Kippur War was still a long way away in the sense that it was a surprise to everybody, especially the Israelis. I think that the experience of the Yom Kippur War brought home again the fact that security in Israel is never permanent and can never be taken for granted.

Q: Did you get to travel in the West Bank or in Gaza?

HOOKS: In those days you could travel all over Israel and the occupied territories without any difficulty. Only Gaza was a little problematic. I went all over the West Bank.

Q: Did you get any feel at that time for the hand of the Israelis on the West Bank?

HOOKS: At that time there was not a sense of restlessness among the Arab population. There was a very visible Israeli military presence in the West Bank, but not in an oppressive sense. Clearly the Israelis controlled those areas, but there was freedom of movement. The situation was very different when I returned to Israel in 1988 when the intifada was fully underway.

Q: It was before a real settlement policy had gotten going?

HOOKS: That's right. It was before a real settlement policy, although settlements had already begun around Jerusalem.

Q: How did you view the strict orthodox community there?

HOOKS: The strict orthodox community constitutes probably about 15 % of the population and there were certain neighborhoods that were very orthodox, Mea Shearim being one in Jerusalem. There was a representative of the Chabad community, Rabbi Posner who was an American, who came to the embassy and maintained good relations with everyone. He invited us to visit their community, but in general we had very little contact with the ultra-orthodox Jewish community. Our friends were more on the secular side.

Q: What sort of work were you doing besides being the ambassador's aide?

HOOKS: I started off working in the visa section, doing visa interviews at an open counter. I then worked for a year as staff aide. After that, I worked very briefly in the consular section in the citizenship side, followed by longer stints in the commercial, economic and political sections.

Q: On the consular side I would think that you would have been very busy with visas, citizenship and all that.

HOOKS: Everything is relative. In fact, it was not all that busy in the sense that we had one vice consul on the visa side who handled non-immigrant visas and the officer in charge of the visa section handled immigrant visas, so there were only two people in the visa section in those days. There were two officers on the citizenship side and the consul general managed the entire operation, so generally speaking it was not all that busy. Certainly a vice-consul could easily handle all of the non-immigrant visa work.

Q: When you were doing economic work, or what sort of work were you doing?

HOOKS: I did mostly spot reporting, dealing with the econ issues of the day: agriculture, industry, those sorts of things. I recall one of the interesting reports I wrote was about the flow of goods over land from the port in Eilat to the Haifa port as the Suez Canal was closed at the time.

Q: What was your impression of the economic possibilities of Israel?

HOOKS: Israel in those days was a relatively poor country but perhaps it was trying to overreach its grasp. It produced its own cars, for example. These cars reminded me of the old Trabant in East Germany, very cheap and not terribly efficient. But certainly tourism had tremendous potential. Computers had not entered the stage at that time so the whole business of software and information management was a thing of the future.

But certainly in terms of agriculture Israel was already a world powerhouse in terms of exporting fresh fruits and vegetables and flowers to Europe, but I think what particularly struck me about the Israelis is that they were so dynamic. They had developed drip irrigation which made much more efficient use of water. They were already involved in a number of projects in developing countries, sometimes financed by USAID, especially in the area of agriculture. They were very dynamic in that respect.

Israel has always been unique in having outside help, assistance from the outside that most countries don't have. What I found unique was the fact that they utilized so efficiently that assistance to invest in their future..

Q: Well, then you left there in 1970?

HOOKS: July of 1973.

JOHN H. ADAMS
Consular Officer
Tel Aviv (1971-1976)

John H. Adams was born in 1939 and entered the Foreign Service in 1966. His assignments included initial positions in France, Israel, Trinidad, and China (Hong Kong). Mr. Adams was interviewed by William D. Morgan in 1992.

ADAMS: The next overseas assignment was in Tel Aviv, Israel, a larger post but not an overwhelmingly large embassy. There I had, again, a wide range of responsibilities, having worked in all units of the consular section, which was very busy, in both visa and American services work. It was an interesting time to be there. We had the Lod Airport massacre in which over 20 American citizens were mowed down. I was very much involved in that particular incident. The Yom Kippur War [1973] broke out while I was there, so it was a devastating time for the State of Israel. In the latter part of the war, when the Israelis rolled back the attack, there were some dramatic moments for everybody who was there.

Q: Sounds as if these are examples of the intimate role you play as a consular officer in the total foreign affairs relationship. You don't escape it.

ADAMS: There was that, and even as a consular officer there, I was part of the cadre that supported Secretary Kissinger's "shuttle diplomacy," which went on for a good part of the remainder of my assignment in Israel. That's quite right. That's quintessential foreign policy, even if you're just on the fringes of what the Secretary was involved in trying to negotiate settlements with the Egyptians, the Syrians, and the Israelis. After Israel my next overseas assignment was as consul general in Trinidad, which was more of the typical Caribbean visa operation. There was a lot of Third World pressure to emigrate and get to the United States.

ARTHUR R. DAY
Consul General

Jerusalem (1972-1975)

Arthur R. Day was born and raised in New Jersey. He served in the U.S. Naval Air Corps during World War II. Upon completion of his military service, Mr. Day received a master's degree from Chicago University. His Foreign Service career included positions at the Palestine Desk, the National War College, United Nations Affairs, and in Japan. Mr. Day was interviewed by John A. McKesson in 1990.

Q: Let's go back to some of these various posts you were at, starting with the beginning of your career in NEA. Do you have any particular overall comments about how this launched you into your connection with the Middle East?

DAY: At that time, in the summer 1949, the Palestine problem, as it was called then, was still very much in the forefront of our concerns in our Middle East policy. So I became very well acquainted with the Arab-Israeli issue and that wove itself throughout my career and I ended my career being a deputy assistant secretary in that same bureau in which I began. There are a lot of constants in the Arab-Israeli problem in all those years and consequently every time I revisited it throughout my career I felt pretty much at home in dealing with it. The Arab manner in dealing with the problem and us did not change; much to the despair of those who wished the Arabs well, they often did so badly in handling their affairs. And the Israeli manner of dealing with the United States did not change much; they always practiced a very intensive, very aggressive and very effective policy, and the Congressional pressure that we felt in the department throughout was a very important factor, always, in dealing with the Israeli problem. That did not change, it just increased through the years. Aside from that there were many practical changes in the problem which we can come to as we go along, but those constants certainly remained.

Q: As a general thing, Israeli intelligence has always had a great reputation for its outstanding abilities. I assume that you would agree with that statement and did you get the feeling that the Israelis not only were always on top of knowing what was going on in the Middle East and the world but also what the U.S. position was?

DAY: That was their main concern, even at that time. Prior to 1967, of course, we had far less to do with the support of Israel than afterwards. We had not supplied them with any substantial weaponry up to that time. Nevertheless their diplomats tended to know on whose desk at a given time a certain paper was in which they were interested. I remember one of the third secretaries taking me out to lunch and wanting to know on whose desk a certain paper was. I was surprised to know it even existed, but he did. They seemed to have no trouble keeping track of American policy and certainly had little trouble influencing it.

Q: Let's move on to the whole issue of the Arab-Israeli problem. I know that you served in Jerusalem; before coming to your tour of duty there do you have any comments to make before we move to there?

DAY: I think we can just pick it up there. I had lost track of the Middle East problem to some extent in that I had been off on other details. I was in arms-control for a couple of years.

Q: That's right, you were in ACDA and arms control. Do you want to say something about that?

DAY: I don't think there was a great deal going on at the time that is worth recounting. Perhaps the most interesting thing was that the organization, the negotiating organization, that I happened to have the most to do with at that point, was called the CCD, the eighteen member, I believe, international negotiating organization that was situated in Geneva.

Q: What did CCD stand for?

DAY: Conference for ? No one ever remembered what CCD stood for. It was a subordinate UN body to negotiate arms control on a less than full UN membership basis. It began with fifteen, then moved up to eighteen, then became at some point twenty-one. The interesting thing about it was, I thought, it was under the chairmanship of the US and Soviets and it worked quite well, oddly enough, partially because on arms control, especially at that level (this was not strategic arms control, these were things like the nuclear proliferation treaty which had been negotiated just before I got into that business, the treaty to ban biological weapons, the treaty to ban mass destruction weapons on the seabed) on these somewhat subordinate issues we and the Soviets found ourselves often on the same side as opposed to the Third World non-nuclear powers. Consequently the joint management of that body worked quite well and we, on the American side, and our counterparts on the Russian side, became quite close associates, friends to some extent, people I have followed over the years and met in other places. It showed what we are now seeing on a much larger scale, where the interests are now common, how we and the Soviets could work together quite effectively. They had some first class diplomats, quite as good as we certainly, and they and we together ran a relatively tight ship.

Q: Moving on to Jerusalem, you were consul general there. I gather that was a period when the Israeli government considered Jerusalem its capital and that created a somewhat awkward situation for consuls general. Would you care to comment on that?

DAY: That is certainly true; the Israelis wanted us out of Jerusalem because we were there largely as a symbol of non- acceptance of the claim that this was their capital, even that it belonged to Israel officially and legally. Our embassies, a dozen or so countries in the same situation, were maintained in Tel Aviv and we had consuls general in Jerusalem. All of us had two offices in Jerusalem, in what had prior to 1967 been Israeli Jerusalem on the Jewish side of the city and the other in what had been Arab Jerusalem. That was another burr under the Israeli saddle; they felt we were doing this to emphasize the fact, as we saw it, that Jerusalem was not a single city, that there was an Arab side and an Israeli side. Of course, to a certain extent, that is why we were doing it. We got along fairly well with the Israeli authorities. Teddy Kollek [the mayor] was a savvy political person and understood the problem. He was a little sarcastic with us from time to time, but on the whole we did not have trouble with the city authorities, in fact we were somewhat grateful for Kollek in one sense. He stood between us and some Israeli national ministries that were located in Jerusalem, which had authorities who would have been much more difficult to deal with -- especially the Interior Ministry which was run largely by very conservative orthodox religious Jews and who were really not happy about having Christians in Jerusalem at all, especially consuls general. Kollek understood he had a polyglot city on his hands and if he was going to run it successfully everyone had his niche, and we had ours. In general we got along with Kollek fairly well.

I found some of my colleagues, the other consuls general, to be a little petty at times in their opposition to the Israelis. Some disliked the Israelis and I am afraid some disliked Jews in a more fundamental way. I do not say that in a broadcast way, but there were some who had the problem. Consequently I found myself, from time to time, isolated from them, not going along with what I felt were their more extreme expressions of opposition to the Israeli rule there. I was willing to do that and American policy would not have permitted anything else. We maintained quite firmly our right to be in Jerusalem and to claim that Jerusalem was not legally a part of Israel, but on the other hand the State Department was not going to make any bigger an issue of it than it had to because it certainly was not a thoroughly popular point of view in the Congress of this country where the Israelis had a lot of influence. We got along. It was one of those situations, a little like Berlin, where you arrived at a modus vivendi and you parted from it at your peril.

One example I might mention, when I first arrived in Jerusalem I went to pay my call on Teddy Kollek as the mayor of the city and he brought up a problem which had been bothering the Israelis quite a bit. The consuls general, obviously as diplomats do, had from time to time large receptions, national days or other occasions. All of them had two receptions; they invited Israelis to one and Arabs to the other, largely because the Arabs did not want to come where the Israelis were, they did not want to be in a position of accepting the de facto status quo; they were very unhappy and they did not want to be put in a position of mixing with the Israelis. When I called on Kollek, he mentioned this and said he would like very much to have receptions in which the two would mix. I told Kollek that I was not there as a missionary, to change peoples' views, I was there as a diplomat and was prepared to accept the way they felt, both the Arabs and the Israelis, about each other. If there were Arabs who were willing to come to receptions where there were Israelis, I had no problem with that and would invite them, but I certainly was not going to put myself in a position of pressuring the Arabs to do this. That was the policy I followed throughout my stay there. There were some Arabs who met Israelis in their own personal lives with no trouble and I had them to receptions and other gatherings where Israelis came, but on the whole I followed the general practice of having most Arabs to separate meetings because simply they would not have come and would have felt aggrieved if I had pressed them to come.

I remember one particular case which impressed me with the depths of feeling on the subject. I got to know quite well the head of the Russian Orthodox Church in Jerusalem -- the non-communist Orthodox Church, the one that fled Russia and had its headquarters in the United States, which is why I got to know them quite well. Father Graby -- which was the man's name who was the head of the church -- would have me quite often to receptions at his place in the old city of Jerusalem quite close to the Holy Sepulcher. I remember one occasion when he had both Israeli officials and Arabs, all of whom I knew, and he also had photographers, as people do at their parties to take pictures of the guests and give them out as souvenirs later. I remember one poor harassed woman, Dora Salah, who was the head of the YWCA....

Q: Arthur, you were telling us about your experiences in Jerusalem, would you continue.

DAY: I was describing this reception at the Russian Orthodox Church in which the Archimandrite had invited both Israelis and Arabs, some Arabs who did not at all care to be associated with Israelis. In this one case, the woman I mentioned, Dora Salah, head of the East Jerusalem YWCA, which was very active in the Palestinian resistance, I remember seeing her at this reception with the haunted, hunted look trying to avoid ever being caught talking to or near an Israeli at a time when the photographer was there so that she would not have her picture taken with an Israeli showing in the same picture because it would have really been awkward for her among her constituency. It was a very telling example for me why it was unfair to put them in that position. I never did; I tried very much to avoid doing that.

Q: Would you care to comment on the relations between the American consuls general in Jerusalem and our embassies and our ambassadors in Tel Aviv?

DAY: That was a very tense relationship, in some ways more than the relationship directly with the Israelis. Only with the ambassadors, the other officers in the embassy were professionals, some of whom were close friends of mine, but both the ambassadors who were there when I was there were very, very pro-Israeli, anti-Arab.

Q: Could you tell us who they were?

DAY: Wally Barbour had been there ten years when I arrived and was there another year or two more before he became too ill and retired. He had become an institution in Israel. They had named schools after him and he was very pro-Israel. As he told me one day, his solution for American foreign policy in the Middle East was to arm the Israelis and forget the Arabs. Let the Israelis take care of the Arabs. He on the other hand was not very active. He was not very well during that period. Consequently I disagreed with him but I had no real run-ins with him. His successor, on the other hand, was a politician from New York named Keating; he had been a senator, and very, very pro-Israeli, as I guess a senator from New York would get to be associating with pro-Israeli groups in his constituency. I did have trouble with him.

I remember one occasion, which was quite embarrassing actually. I had heard from his DCM (his deputy chief of mission) in the embassy that he, the ambassador, had an appointment to come up and see Kollek, the mayor of Jerusalem. [after first saying Berlin rather than Jerusalem] (I am going to make that mistake from time to time having served in two divided cities one after the other it is hard to keep them straight. Both have an east and a west. Interesting though, one city was a city that was psychologically thoroughly united but physically split, Berlin - and Jerusalem when I was there was physically united but psychologically deeply split.) Keating had an appointment with Kollek in Jerusalem and under the rules of the game this was not to be done. The embassy was to deal with the national government and I was to deal with the city government although the Israelis were always trying to water this down. I knew there was no point in my calling Keating about this since he regarded me as pro-Arab and consequently would not have paid any attention to what I would say. So I called Washington and told the desk officer what was going on, and asked him if he could just let Keating know what the rules were so there would not be a struggle here. To my utter dismay, in opening my telegrams the next morning I found a State Department telegram signed by the Secretary of State to Keating saying that they understood he had this meeting with Kollek, that he was not to do that, that was not the way business was conducted and he was to look to me, as the consul general in Jerusalem, for his guidance on how to deal with Jerusalem. I knew that would put Keating in a flaming fury and he would know on the face of it that I had been the one to put the Department up to it. I called Keating on the telephone, there was nothing else to do, and said I was very unhappy with the way things had worked out and the way it had been worded, that I agreed with what it said but I hoped it would not ruin what relationship we had. He was very unhappy, not nasty, about it on the phone. I don't think I ever spoke to him again after that. There was no occasion to; there certainly was no occasion found. I had him to our residence once in Jerusalem thinking he might find it useful to meet some Arab leaders from East Jerusalem and some church people, very substantial people like Pio Laghi, the head of the Roman Catholic church mission in Jerusalem who later went on to become the apostolic delegate in Washington. A very fine Italian. The Ambassador came up with his wife to have dinner with me, but I understand he never really forgave me for it -- to face him with actual Arabs was more than he could tolerate. So it was a difficult relationship, but fortunately it really did not affect anything. It just made life a little less pleasant.

There was a constant push in the embassy to become more active in Jerusalem and the West Bank, but Washington was very strong on that and kept them from going off the reservation. So I had no really serious trouble, it was just a friction.

Q: Who were the State Department senior people on the Arab- Israeli problem during that period?

DAY: Roy Atherton was the assistant secretary and Hal Saunders, who later became the assistant secretary, was the deputy who dealt with my area. I can't remember who the desk officer was. There were a series of fairly professional well-acquainted officers dealing directly with the problem. One of the complications was that jurisdictionally, Jerusalem came under the Israeli desk although my job there was really was entirely with Arabs. My role was to keep in touch with the West Bank leadership and West Bank population primarily and to report what was going on in the West Bank, which from time to time became important. That was of course primarily of interest to people on the Arab desks back in the Department, especially the Jordan desk. Jordan had at one time been in control of the West Bank and the West Bankers were still Jordanians by passport if not actually by loyalties. Actually they detested the Jordanians almost as much as they detested the Israelis.

My jurisdictional managers were not the ones who were most substantially interested in what I was doing, but it did not matter since people in NEA got along very well and there were no brouhahas between the desks.

Q: As you know, the State Department officials have been traditionally accused by the press as being too pro-Arab, at least a certain segment of the press in America. From your vantage point, which seems excellent, in Jerusalem and from your previous experience, would you care to comment on how you assessed the attitudes of the Department senior officers and the desk officers. You have already told us the two ambassadors you have served under in Israel were very, very pro-Israeli. How would you assess the evenhandedness or lack of it among our senior personnel in Washington at that time?

DAY: I think the proclivities which you referred to existed back in my previous incarnation in the Middle East; then there was no doubt that the officers in the State Department handling Arab-Israeli affairs, at least up through the office director level, were very pro-Arab. This would have been in 1949-50, in that early period. They were officers who had in their earlier careers been entirely in the Arab context and they knew the Arabs and felt that Israel was a dangerous intrusion into the area from an American political point of view. Although they carried out American policy as it was set out by the American presidents and secretaries, they still wished that we could be more favorable to the Arab side. By the time when I became more directly involved in it when I was in Jerusalem, which was quite a lot later, that was in 1972, well over twenty years had passed, a new generation of officers had come along, like Roy Atherton, and Roy himself was as evenhanded as a human could be about everything. I would say most of his officers were much more cold-bloodily American-policy-oriented and less sentimentally attached to the Arab mystique, which does exist. The orientalist had a kind of attachment towards the Arabs that went beyond policy. They were not so much in evidence as before.

I thought that NEA, that was the bureau that handled this issue in the Department, really was quite objective in its dealings with it, which is not to say, nevertheless, that it was well to the side of the Arabs from most of the American Congress, which was as unevenhanded as you can get. The American Congress was really totally, for the most part, committed to the cause of Israel. Some of the staff people on the Hill, I am convinced, spent most of their time promoting the cause of Israel, which as far as I am concerned is a foreign country. I, and many State Department people also, resented the fact that these Americans in official positions seemed much more concerned about the fortunes of a foreign country than the fortunes of their own country.

Q: You are talking about the staff on the Hill?

DAY: On the Hill. This led to what I thought was understandable resentment on the part of the State Department on having our policy so strongly effected by forces and people who weren't primarily interested in the success of the American policy but who were primarily interested in the success of Israeli policy. But they understood the name of the game, which was politics when Israel was involved, and they lived with that, as I lived with it, and ceased tilting with windmills.

Q: What would you say was the role of the consul general in terms of policy and practice during your stay there?

DAY: It was in the first instance a symbolic role, to symbolize our unwillingness to accept that Israel had acquired Jerusalem. Beyond that, as I mentioned earlier, we kept in touch with West Bank Arab trends. We were really the principal reporter on Palestinian attitudes, which became at times, and certainly after I left there, became very important to American policy. I think our contribution to American policy was as expert observers of the Palestinian side of the equation. There was no country, no embassy, that had a direct focus on Palestinians. The Jordanian embassy certainly didn't. The king and his government were almost as opposed to Palestinians in some respects as the Israelis were at times. So I was the Palestinian embassy in a certain sense. That is what I tried to be; while not becoming an advocate of the Palestinians, in fact I became rather discouraged in the way that they conducted their affairs and felt always that the best solution for the West Bank was the solution in which it became part of Jordan again, rather than become independent. I was convinced that it would become a very troublesome entity. Nevertheless my role was to deal with and to report on the Palestinians.

Q: When you say the Palestinian embassy you mean the American embassy to the Palestinians?

DAY: That's right.

Q: How would you assess your contacts with the Arabs and the Israelis? Would you have any comments to make on that?

DAY: The Arabs with whom I dealt with in Jerusalem were mostly non-political people; there was not a political hierarchy, of course, on the West Bank. I did deal with mayors of the towns, who were the most senior political people. The mayor of Bethlehem, Freij, best known in this country, I knew quite well. I knew the mayors of some of the other towns, but beyond that the people involved in politics, so to speak, were lawyers, pharmacists and whatever, teachers and principals of the schools run by the United Nations agency that dealt with Palestinians, so I had a wide and very varied list of contacts on the Arab side. It was not always easy to keep track of the movements there, because the people who became most influential were people whom we saw very little; they were much more obscure. This became much more true in later years after the uprising there. The people who seemed to become influential were a new generation that shoved aside the people I knew in my day and I think none of us, nobody on the American side, really knew them terribly well.

On the Israeli side, I talked about my relationship with Kollek, which was not bad, but wasn't too warm. I got to know his deputy very well, a man named Meron Benvenisti who was really in charge of Arab affairs for Kollek and later left the Israeli government and became an academic, then in later years ran the West Bank study project in Israel which provided much of the information on which we and the Israelis both assessed West Bank activities. I also happened to know some of the Israeli Foreign Office people whom I had met in my previous incarnations dealing with Israel. Although they were not supposed to be dealing with me officially, I nevertheless kept in touch with them to some extent, including Eppie Evron, who had been ambassador to the United States at one point and now was a senior officer in the Foreign Office. He came to lunch one time, which I am sure was the first time he ever did that. We got along on a personal level and I have no complaints. The military who ran the West Bank were inaccessible to me by their choice. They were not supposed to deal with anybody but the embassy and the embassy would not deal with them, so they were really out of touch with American officialdom, but there again I occasionally met one of their occupation colonels in some Arab mayor's house and got to know him slightly. I never had a contact so that I could call them up on the phone and ask what was going on.

I also knew the Israeli press people who dealt with the West Bank, some of whom were very pro-Palestinian. I knew a few press people who were on the Arab side and kept in touch with them as a diplomat would anywhere.

Q: This was of course the period that Kissinger was active with his shuttle diplomacy. We know that Secretary Kissinger remained very, very involved in this whole issue. What were your general feelings and assessment of this issue, how Kissinger operated and how effective his policies were?

DAY: Of course I got to know Kissinger much better when I became deputy assistant secretary, though I saw him somewhat in Jerusalem. I was in a rather odd position because he was coming to Jerusalem, "my town" so to speak, to meet with the Israelis. He was not coming to Jerusalem as the separate entity that I represented the Americans in, but he was coming there to meet the Israelis. My role was a minimal one, and should have been. The embassy people came up to Jerusalem when he came and took care of him, which was fortunate because it took the whole embassy to do it. I could not have begun to staff it. I used to go, each time he came, over to the King David Hotel where he would arrive and stay, and when he came in the front door, I would be there together with the manager of the King David Hotel. The two of us would rush out and shake his hand. I always thought after that whether he had thought of me as the deputy manager of the King David Hotel, which I must have looked like, although later on I got to know him. So I had very little substantively to do with him although I thought very highly of what he was trying to do. I thought he was on the right track and that he was being as tough with the Israelis as he was with the Arabs. He established good relations with Arabs that no other American had worked with, Hafez al Assad, the Syrian leader in particular. He put up with a lot from the Israelis. I remember one time -- he was not very popular in Israel -- on one visit he went through the streets -- he was trying to make the Israelis give up the Sinai in a deal with Egypt -- and there were signs up "Jew boy, go home!" They felt he was a traitor to the race. At one point, Golda Meir, who was prime minister, and a pretty tough cookie herself, felt she had to speak out to her own people. She said, "Look we have a tendency, we Israelis, to deal with a situation like this, by ad hominem means, by attacking the person of the policy, rather than the policy itself. We have to stop that with regard to Kissinger, in particular." It was getting out of hand. He was subjected to really personal abuse, but he persevered. Kissinger was a pretty tough nut and I don't think it got to him too much. He had some very difficult times there and I could tell from dealing with his staff and seeing him, that they were difficult. But I thought that he was on the right track and in general was very successful.

There are some comments that I think I would like to add concerning my service in Jerusalem. One of them concerns the Yom Kippur war of October 1973 in which the Egyptians and Syrians attacked the Israelis on both the Egyptian front along the Suez canal and the Syrian front along the border of the Golan heights. During the week before the attack there had been rumors of troop movements and activity, especially in the Syrian sector. U.S. military officers had inquired several times of Israeli military intelligence whether these movements did not presage some kind of hostile action by the Arab armies. The Israelis, having been burned by predicting Arab attacks early in the year that did not materialize, dismissed the reports as groundless. Toward the end of the first week of October, though, they were sufficiently concerned that they began to move troops of their own up towards the Golan front with Syria.

My involvement began on the night of October 5th, which was a Friday night and a night on which, at sundown, the very holy observance of Yom Kippur began in Israel. My wife and I were to go out to dinner that night to a staff member's in the Arab side of Jerusalem. In order to avoid driving through Jewish Jerusalem, in which we lived and where the driving of automobiles was virtually prohibited from sundown on that Friday night until sundown on the day following, we had parked the official consulate car on the border of the old city, that is the border of Jewish Jerusalem, which was only about three blocks from our residence. We walked to the car and drove on to the Arab side where the Yom Kippur observance did not apply. Sometime during the meal I was called on the phone and informed that an urgent telegram had arrived for me from Washington -- presumably, although I do not remember the details, an "immediate, night action" which would require my attention at once. I returned alone to the consular office which was in the same building as our residence, leaving my wife at the dinner. My recollection is that I drove back to the edge of Jewish Jerusalem and walked the few blocks on into the very still and quiet Jewish city where there was no traffic in the streets. The Department's message instructed me to go to the headquarters of the UN truce supervision organization, known as UNTSO, which was located on a hilltop just outside the city of Jerusalem in buildings that the British had once used for their headquarters during the mandate period. I was to tell the UNTSO commander that the US government was concerned that Arab governments might misinterpret Israeli troop movements on the Golan Heights as having hostile intent and might be lead thereby to some response that might precipitate hostilities.

It so happened the UNTSO commander himself, a Finnish general named Enio Silasvuo was away from headquarters that night and acting in his place was the senior American officer assigned to UNTSO headquarters. I got back in my car and headed off for the UNTSO headquarters which required at one point my going into a section of Jewish Jerusalem. I had to get out at one point and remove a barricade that was designed to keep traffic from entering the city and then replace it behind me, driving on through the quiet streets and hoping that none of the more aggressive orthodox Jews, who were inclined to throw rocks at automobiles, even on the ordinary Sabbath day of every week, would see me and react. They apparently did not and after having removed the barricade that let me out of the Jewish community, I proceeded on to UNTSO and delivered my message. The American colonel agreed to convey this through the UNTSO team stationed in Damascus and I returned to Jerusalem in the same manner as before. Ultimately my wife and I concluded the dinner and returned home to bed. We were awakened at an early hour the next morning by an aircraft, a fighter I presume, flying very low over the city. An extraordinary event at any time but especially so on such a holy day as this. When I made my way upstairs to the office and looked at the cable traffic I found that the Israeli government had finally become convinced that an Arab attack was imminent and had ordered military mobilization. Since Jewish Israelis did not have their radios on because of the holy day, the fighter plane pass was intended to alert them that something was afoot and they should turn on the radios to receive the mobilization instructions.

Later that day, it must have been very shortly after two o'clock in the afternoon, I received a phone call from UNTSO telling me that their observers along the Egyptian-Israeli line on the Suez canal had just that minute reported an attack by the Egyptian forces past their observers, their observation points, towards the Israeli lines. I was able to get a flash telegram back to Washington within minutes of this attack having occurred, which was the first time, but not the last by any means, UNTSO's presence along the borders and the good relations that existed between the consulate general and UNTSO headquarters enabled us to report quickly and accurately on the progress of the war. Throughout the next week or two as Syrian and Egyptian armies crossed the Israeli lines and then ultimately were driven back across the lines in the other directions, the UNTSO observers pinned down in their observation posts in the midst of the conflict kept up a stream of reports to the headquarters in Jerusalem about the progress of the war. The consulate forwarded these to Washington as they were received since the reports, especially in the early days of the war, reflected much more serious difficulties for the Israelis than the Israelis were publicly acknowledging. Our reporting was able to keep Washington more accurately informed of the true state of affairs, although I assume the Israeli government was informing our embassy in Tel Aviv a good deal more accurately than their press was informing the public.

The period of the Yom Kippur war in Jerusalem was a strange one. In the first week while no one really questioned whether the Israelis would really be able to defend themselves in the end, the fighting did strike quite close to the Israeli heartland in the north of Israel where the Syrians pressed down from the Golan heights. But there was an almost eerie atmosphere of business as usual at the same time, so swiftly had the war come. On one occasion an American religious tour group wanted to visit the Christian sites on the Sea of Galilee which were only a few miles from heavy fighting and which could conceivably have been overrun had the Syrians been more successful than they turned out to be. The group leader inquired of the consulate general about the situation and was told that this was just not the thing to do at that time. So far as I was aware at the time, he decided to proceed in any case, and disappeared in the direction of the front with his entire tour group. Within the city of Jerusalem there were several hundred American students, some of the them Jewish students at Hebrew University, as well a sizeable group of Christian students who were visiting the old city with its Christian sites for a period of study. I was kept busy the first week of the war briefing these students, as best I could, about the security situation and about how it affected them, especially in the case of the Jewish students, giving them assurance that they could pass along to their worried parents at home, that it seemed unlikely that the city of Jerusalem would come under attack. Living in the city was an odd experience in other ways, especially since it was blacked out at night with cars driving through the streets with their headlights dimmed by blue paint or laundry blueing. It so happened that it was a period of full moon and no doubt for the first time in a long, long time, it was possible to see the city from the hills around it with the moonlight shining on its domes and towers without the disturbance of any artificial light. It was a truly beautiful thing to see, although the circumstances were not so benign.

A second set of comments that might be worth making, although not as serious, concern a concert that the Israel philharmonic orchestra gave outdoors in a large square in Bethlehem, known as Manger Square. I do not recall the date, but I believe it was following the Yom Kippur war, and it must have been in the following spring or summer. Teddy Kollek, the mayor of Jerusalem, had apparently induced an American donor to provide a substantial sum of money to hold the concert, the purpose of which was to show the unity between Jerusalem and the Christian Arab town of Bethlehem, a short distance away to the south. As always in this complex occupation situation the effort cut both ways. My wife and I were sitting in the second row of the block of seats in Manger Square facing the Church of the Nativity in front of which the platform had been erected for the Israeli orchestra. The first item of the concert was a Brandenburg concerto, the violin part of which was to be played by a young man who had not too long before arrived as a Jewish immigrant from the Soviet Union. The orchestra had gotten well launched and the violinist was in full cry when suddenly the Arab minaret, in the Square, located just behind the audience, erupted with the recorded call to prayer that the mosques broadcast at regular intervals during the day. The volume had obviously been turned up quite high by the mosque authorities and the sound tore into the fabric of the Brandenburg concerto, somewhat like an iceberg tearing into the hull of the Titanic. The orchestra played gamely on for some seconds, but gradually one instrument after another gave up and before long Zubin Mehta, the conductor, brought it to a halt and all of us waited out the Moslem call to prayer. An Israeli authority told me that they had been well-aware of this possibility, but had thought they had induced the mosque authorities to tone down the sound so as not to create a disturbance, but obviously they had failed. Other cultural and political conflict was evident at the concert as well. We noticed that there was a certain amount of movement to and fro in the row ahead of us where Teddy Kollek sat with the Bethlehem mayor, Elias Freij, and on the following day at a lunch that Kollek gave for the consuls general we learned what had happened. Freij was scheduled to make a brief statement at the concert on the platform which had been erected for the purpose. Over the platform was the emblem of the Israeli orchestra, an unmistakable Jewish symbol, the menorah. It was quite clear to Freij that the TV broadcast of this event would catch him standing in front of the Jewish menorah, a situation which was not at all appealing to him. Kollek told us with some chortling that in order to get Freij's mind off the problem he had gone up along the row in which they had both sat and had brought Mrs. Mehta over to sit next to Freij. Mrs. Mehta was a very attractive woman and Kollek assumed that her beauty would cause Freij to forget about his political sensitivities. In the event, Freij did arise and make the statement, although there was no way of knowing whether Mrs. Mehta's presence had been responsible. As an aside, however, the consuls general were all a little soured by Kollek's obvious glee in how he had manipulated the Arab mayor and it revealed once again one of the less attractive aspects of the Israelis in their dealing with the Arabs -- an attitude of condescension and arrogance at times.

EDWARD G. ABINGTON
Political Officer
Tel Aviv (1972-1975)

Mr. Abington was born in Texas into a US military family and was raised in military posts in the US and abroad. An Arabic language officer and specialist in Near East Affairs, he describes his experience dealing with Israel-Arab hostilities and general regional problems while serving as Political Officer at Embassies Tel Aviv and Damascus. In his postings at the State Department in Washington, he also dealt with Near East matters. Mr. Abington was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q: By the time you left then, it would be '72. Where did you go?

ABINGTON: At that point, I was hooked on the Middle East. One cannot imagine a more exciting introduction. In addition, I got a chance as a junior officer to work very closely with Joe Sisco. I would sit in as his staff aide. I became one of his favorite notetakers. He would always say, "Write down what I should have said, not what I said." It became somewhat of a joke at the reporting tables. Joe Sisco's meetings were frequently edited to reflect what he should have said. I worked closely with Roy Atherton. I did an awful lot of note taking for him. Roy encouraged me to stay interested in the Middle East. He helped me get an assignment to Tel Aviv. I went from the Jordan desk via French language training so I could get off language probation and then I went out to the embassy in Tel Aviv as a junior political officer. My responsibilities were the Golan Heights, what the Israelis were doing, their settlement activity, Gaza, and Israeli Arabs.

Q: Great. We'll pick it up the next time from '72. How long were you there?

ABINGTON: Until '75.

Q: Today is November 2, 2000. Before you went out to Tel Aviv, what were the words of wisdom you were getting first about an assignment to Tel Aviv and then what were you given to expect before you went out?

ABINGTON: At that time, the prevailing opinion in the Bureau of Near East and South Asian Affairs in general was that serving in Tel Aviv was not something that would help your career if you wanted to study Arabic and go on and become an Arabist. But during that period you started seeing the development of more and more people who thought it important to serve in both Israel and the Arab world and instead of just an Arabist you had the development of an Arab-Israeli specialist. I replaced Wat Cluverius who was very involved in Arab-Israeli negotiations. I served there with Ned Walker, who is currently NEA Assistant Secretary and also was very involved in Arab-Israeli negotiations. Attitudes were starting to change concerning the old Arabist view of Israel and the problems it caused when I went to Tel Aviv in 1972.

Q: Who was the ambassador when you arrived there?

ABINGTON: For a relatively short period of time it was Walworth Barbour, who had been there for many years. His DCM was Owen Zurhellen. Barbour was an institution. He had been in Tel Aviv for 10-12 years, one of the longest-serving American ambassadors anywhere. Neither he nor Owen Zurhellen really had any background on the Arab side. The personnel policy of the State Department had been not to mix the two. You would have Arabists who had never served in Tel Aviv because of the fear that it would taint them and make them unacceptable for assignment to the Arab world, and you had people who would be assigned to Tel Aviv with no experience in the Middle East, which I always thought was a tremendous shortcoming. It seemed to me that for people in the European Bureau, their hardship tour was going to someplace like Tel Aviv. Quite frankly, in general, they brought a real lack of understanding of the issues to Tel Aviv. They tended to be relatively unbalanced in their appreciation. They tended to embrace the Israeli position on issues without taking into consideration the Arab position and the complexities of the two sides.

Q: You arrived there when?

ABINGTON: Late August/early September of 1972.

Q: What was the political situation in Israel at the time?

ABINGTON: It was a Labor government led by Golda Meir. Shimon Peres was in the cabinet, a young cabinet minister. Yitzhak Rabin was the Israeli ambassador in Washington. I arrived in Tel Aviv right about the time of the Munich massacre, the seizure by PLO elements of Israeli Olympic athletes at the Munich Olympics and a rescue attempt that went disastrously wrong and led to the death of 12 or so Israeli athletes. Any such terrorist incident really grips Israel. In a way, Israel has been through such trauma because of terrorist incidents that it seemed to me like the nation was many times verging on the edge of hysterical breakdown. It just shows the impact that terrorist incidents have within Israel. I recall taking a tour of the Israel-Lebanon border and listening to the radio of the events in Munich and the death of the Israeli athletes there. It was a very traumatic event for Israelis, as one would expect. To have young athletes going to an event such as the Olympics and being caught up in this kind of violence and then to die a very violent death was something that really affected the Israeli psyche tremendously. I think one thing that gets me about Israeli policy – and as I look at this today the fighting between Israelis and Palestinians around Jerusalem, Gaza, and the West Bank – is that the Israelis always adopt a policy of retaliation, of trying to make the Arabs pay a terrible price in loss of life and destruction of property. It seems to me that the Israelis have been doing this for 50 years and it has never worked but they can't seem to come up with a better policy whenever there are these kinds of difficulties. What happened after the Munich killings was that the Israelis went into Beirut and assassinated Palestinian leaders. I can't remember the precise timing but they may have destroyed Lebanese aircraft on the ground. This kind of retaliation that the Israelis have traditionally carried out ever since the founding of the state only fuels the cycle of violence between the Israelis and the Arabs.

Q: When you arrived there, you were in the political section?

ABINGTON: Yes.

Q: How would you characterize the outlook of the political section towards the situation?

ABINGTON: The Munich event certainly cast a pall over things, but one has to recall that when I arrived it was when the War of Attrition was going on between Egypt and Israel along the Suez Canal, the Israelis on their side of the canal behind what was the Bar Lev Line, there being clashes, artillery duels, occasional Israeli bombing raids into Egypt, the introduction of Soviet fighter pilots and so forth. So, there certainly was a degree of tension there, but in many respects for Israelis it seemed kind of far away because it was all taking place on the other side of the Sinai Peninsula. In that sense, the Sinai really did give a buffer to Israel. The casualties were overwhelmingly on the Egyptian side. The Israelis were shooting down aircraft whether they were Egyptian or Soviet piloted without any loss of aircraft on the Israeli side. The soldiers in the Bar Lev Line were pretty well fortified and took very few casualties. So, while there was a lot of tension, it was not as if there were casualties coming back to Israel. Also there was a tremendous feeling of complacency on the Israeli side and on the American side as well. The overwhelming ease of the Israeli victory in the 1967 war made Israelis and American analysts relatively complacent about Israel's military superiority vis-a-vis the Arab states. In a sense it was a little bit like business as usual in terms of dealing with the Arabs.

There was one event and as I started to get into my job going to Gaza that really struck me. The event was a Libyan airliner that strayed across into the Sinai. It was a Boeing 707 with 90-100 people on it piloted by French pilots. There were several American citizens on the aircraft. The aircraft strayed into the Sinai and Israeli fighters intercepted it. The Israelis had air bases in the Sinai. They tried to get the plane to land. For whatever reason, the pilot did not land. The Israelis strafed the wings, causing the aircraft to crash in the Sinai with the loss of almost all the people on board, including Americans. The thing that struck me about the reaction was that just about every Israeli that I talked to thought it was totally justified shooting down an unarmed civilian airliner. Some people said, "Well, the pilot may have been planning to carry out a suicide mission and ram the aircraft into a populated area in Israel," which I thought was pretty ridiculous.

The second thing was as I started going down to Gaza; As I talked to Israeli military government officials and Palestinians, I was really struck by the extraordinarily paternalistic attitude of the Israeli military in dealing with Palestinians. There were attitudes that 1) the Palestinians were a pretty wild and uncultured group of people, that Israel was sort of providing a civilizing mission by helping with schools and low cost housing and 2) that the only thing that the Palestinians really understood was force and if the Palestinians didn't behave themselves then Israel was totally justified in using very heavy force to bring them under control. It was shortly before I arrived in Gaza that there had been disturbances in refugee camps, and Ariel Sharon had been put in charge of dealing with this. His solution was to take bulldozers and just go through the middle of refugee camps destroying houses, telling Palestinians they had 30 minutes or an hour to pull all of their belongings out and to open up wide swaths of land within the refugee camps that Israeli jeeps could patrol in order to keep the Palestinians under control. This, needless to say, caused tremendous anger and resentment. The way the Israelis dealt with the Palestinians in Gaza and the general Israeli reaction to the shooting down of the Libyan aircraft seemed to me to show almost a racist attitude in dealing with Arabs.

Q: I've heard people who have served in both places say that South Africa during the high times of apartheid was not a bad comparison.

ABINGTON: It's an analogy that many people make. I'm a southerner and I experienced and saw racism in the South, in Louisiana and places like that. There seemed to be a real comparison between the racism I saw in the South, how some whites would treat blacks, and what seemed to be the general Israeli attitude toward Palestinians. I recall, I lived in an Israeli neighborhood, Ramat HaSharon. I was the only non-Israeli within in several blocks. It was a source of amusement to Israelis. Most diplomats lived in an area called Herzli-Tuch, where the diplomats and the wealthy American or Anglo-Israelis lived. My neighborhood was very much a middle class one. Wonderful people. I made a lot of friends. But I was struck how talking to neighbors, they would never consider hiring an Israeli Arab to even work in such things as food processing plants because they viewed that as a security threat. There was such a total divide between Israeli Arabs and Israeli Jews, much less Israeli Jews and Palestinians. It was really striking.

Q: Your job was really to look at the other side of the moon, wasn't it, to look at the Palestinian side?

ABINGTON: Yes, very much. I was dealing a lot with the foreign ministry. I was in Jerusalem a lot talking to people about general Arab-Israeli issues. It was not just Palestinians I was dealing with, but also reporting on broader Israeli-Arab issues as well. I certainly was not delving into Israeli society or Israeli domestic politics.

Q: What was the impression you got from your fellow political officers about how we viewed dealing with the Golda Meir government?

ABINGTON: In general, there was quite a close relationship. Golda was a very crusty, temperamental person. I go back to what I said earlier. In general, you had people serving in the embassy in Tel Aviv who had no experience at all of dealing with Palestinians or Arabs. At that time, there was a very good Israeli-U.S. bilateral relationship and people in the embassy in general seemed to be very supportive of that relationship. They tended to be quite pro-Israeli and I thought relatively uncritical in the way that they looked at Israeli policies.

Q: How did you go about your job?

ABINGTON: I would drive down to Gaza and stay in the UN beach club for a night or two. I would set up appointments and go around and meet Palestinian businessmen, some of the leading families in Gaza, ones that were politically active, although political activism at that point was not particularly high on the part of Palestinians. I would set up appointments with the Israeli military government in Gaza. I'd go in and talk to them. I would drive around Gaza, observe Israeli settlement activity, talk to Israeli settlers about what they were doing in terms of building settlements. I talked to UN personnel to try to get a general sense of what was going on. Gaza at that time was a wide open area. There were no fences or anything. The only way you knew you were in Gaza was that there were a couple of 50 gallon drums, the green line between Israeli and Gaza. When you went past the 50 gallon drums, you knew you were in Gaza. At that time, a lot of Israelis would take their cars down to Gaza to be repaired. They would go and shop there because produce and other things were a lot cheaper. You would see a fair number of Israelis down in Gaza. But it was very interesting. I remember staying once at the UN beach club. Palestinians were not allowed on the beach at night because the Israelis would run a truck or a jeep along the beach dragging something behind it that would obliterate all of the footprints. If a Palestinian were caught on the beach at night, the presumption was that this was a terrorist. They would be shot. Someone had walked out of the beach club at night down to the beach and walked back and an Israeli patrol saw the footprints. A detachment of Israeli soldiers surrounded the beach club and basically roused everyone out to make sure that Palestinians had not infiltrated and come into the beach club. So, it was a mixed atmosphere there.

Q: When you were talking to the Palestinian leaders and the businesspeople, what were you getting from them as far as how they saw the situation there and how they viewed the United States?

ABINGTON: In general, Palestinians were not that politically energized at that point. The PLO was an illegal organization. The PLO in '72 was under attack in Jordan and was on the point of being banished from Jordan. The Israelis were pretty ruthless in clamping down on any political activity that could be interpreted as being pro-PLO. It was illegal to post or show colors that were in the Palestinian flag. For example, if you displayed those colors in some fashion, you would be subject to arrest by Israeli security forces. What the Israelis would allow to operate were relatively quiescent Palestinians who didn't cause any problems. In particular, the Shawa family in Gaza had ties to the Jordanians. I can't remember if he was mayor of Gaza or looked upon as the de factor mayor; El Rachid Shawa, had great cache because he could hand out Jordanian passports to Palestinians that he determined would get them. For a Palestinian who had trouble traveling because he or she had no nationality and no passport, only a UN laissez-passer, having a Jordanian passport was a tremendous advantage. That was a way of currying political favor by the Shawa clan. The Israelis let that go on because in general they favored Jordanian and Palestinian links as opposed to the influence of the PLO.

Q: Here you had this situation where it's not a good idea to have a bunch of people with no particular hope or economic ability to get out and do their thing. When you're repressing people who are not stupid, who have real commercial or political abilities, to keep them barefoot and pregnant, it's a problem. Was this a concern of ours?

ABINGTON: Not particularly. Policymakers and senior people in the embassy were looking much more at the broader interstate relationships – Egypt-Israel, Syria-Israel, Jordan-Israel. There was relatively little concern about the Palestinians. To the extent that the Palestinians were really factored into things, it was as Jordanian subjects. The attitude of how you dealt with the solution of the Palestinian problem was as part of Jordan. So, at that point, Palestinian nationalism and the concept of a Palestinian state really wasn't on our radar screen and certainly wasn't on the Israeli's radar screen because Golda Meir scoffingly dismissed the notion that there even was a Palestinian people. She said there was no such thing.

Q: You mentioned Israeli settlements in Gaza. How was this developing?

ABINGTON: Generally what happened with settlements both in Gaza and in Golan and I assume to a degree in the West Bank was that the Israeli army would go in and set up an outpost. They had a unit called the Nocho unit, which was an extension of the Zionist movement. They would be young Israelis who would go in and basically build up the infrastructure of the settlement. It would be a military outpost but over time they would build it up and turn it over to one of the Zionist kibbutzim movements. This was taking place in Gaza where there would be an army unit confiscating land, putting up fences, putting up housing, putting up guard posts and so forth, and then developing the infrastructure. Then they would turn it over to some kind of a settlement movement. Civilians would move in and the army would move out. Needless to say, this caused very deep resentment by Palestinians. The Gaza Strip at the time and to this day is certainly one of the two or three most densely populated areas in the world. What the Palestinians saw then was Israelis coming in as soldiers or civilians, fencing off arable land, and dominating the use of water supplies, limiting the Palestinian ability to use the water, and taking away arable land in an area where agriculture was the only thing going.

Then there would be other Israeli measures that were in place as well. Palestinians could not build a house without an Israeli building permit even if they owned the land. Palestinians could not add an extra story onto their house unless the Israelis agreed to it. This wasn't always strictly enforced, but there certainly were occasions where if someone built an extra story, the Israelis would go in and knock it down. In general, the policy was one of suppression and real domination of the Palestinians. There was no doubt that it created a growing resentment on the part of the Palestinian population towards the Israelis.

Q: How about your reporting? Was there any market for reports on what was happening?

ABINGTON: Not too much. Frankly, at that point I don't think people really cared about the Palestinians or what was going on. But certainly in terms of the embassy, and this continued throughout the years when I was there, there was a general unwillingness to accept that the Israelis were less than perfect in terms of dealing with Palestinians. I can recall later on tremendous controversies between the American Consulate in Jerusalem and the Embassy in Tel Aviv over the question of whether the Israelis tortured Palestinians. The embassy just flat denied it. Of course, the Israelis denied they were torturing people even though the consulate in Tel Aviv did some fairly credible reporting. Once the U.S. in the '80s started doing human rights reports, it was very clear that there was pretty wide-scale torture and mistreatment of Palestinians by the Israelis to the extent that it was even enshrined in law. There were Israeli policies on how they would torture people, how they would torture Palestinians. But in general, the embassy in Tel Aviv was very closely identified with Israel and with Israeli policies and tended to be pretty uncritical in the way that they reported such policies.

Q: Did you find yourself doing the normal work but not getting too disturbed about what you were seeing or were you the odd man out?

ABINGTON: I was sort of odd man out in dealing with the Palestinians. Most of my colleagues were dealing just with Israelis and they tended to dismiss the mistreatment of Palestinians as either they didn't believe it or they accepted the Israeli line of why it was necessary to do this. In general, there was an uncritical embrace of Israeli positions and not much willingness to look at the other side. One has to keep in mind that Israel then and even now is an incredibly intense place. The Israelis have a circle the wagon mentality. You're either with us or against us. There was a lot of psychological pressure on people to stand with the Israelis. That certainly was the case with the staff and personnel of the American embassy.

Q: Did you get involved with the Israelis arresting American Palestinians?

ABINGTON: No, not at all. I can't recall that that was even a particular issue. I did work in the consular section for a short period of time. I knew people in the consular section. But I can't recall that in the '70s or at least as long as I was there until 1975 the issue of Palestinian-Americans being arrested was a particular issue as far as Embassy Tel Aviv was concerned.

Q: Were you seeing a difference or a change? How was the Likud element viewed at that time?

ABINGTON: Likud was looked upon as a pretty marginal party. I recall meeting Begin, the Likud leader in the Knesset. Prior to the '73 war, Likud was not looked upon as a serious contender to take over the Israeli government. That changed later in the '70s after the '73 war.

Up until that point, the Israeli government had been dominated since its founding as a state by the Labor Party in coalition governments with some of the religious parties like the National Religious Party. No one at that point really took very seriously the possibility that Likud might win an election and form a government running Israel.

Q: How about the religious parties? Did we have much contact with them?

ABINGTON: There was a person in the political section who spoke Hebrew who followed domestic politics. Israeli politicians were always quite accessible to people from the American embassy. I recall Ned Walker did the job for a while. He used to see people in the NRP. The focus was on parties in the government and not so much on the parties out of the government. I don't think that there was a lot of attention paid to Likud. There was not much attention paid to the Sephardic element of the Israeli population, which today is extremely important. Back then, the Sephardi were relatively poor. The society politics were totally dominated by Ashkenazis. Although this was a developing issue and problem, it had not assumed very much prominence. I don't think that the political section paid much attention to the Israeli Sephardi.

Q: Did you find yourself feeling the affects of the political realities in the U.S. of particularly the pro-Israeli elements? Or was this an undercurrent that everybody understood?

ABINGTON: It seemed to me that it was not so much an issue. The bigger issue was the Cold War and U.S.-Soviet rivalry. Kissinger was Secretary of State. We were allied with the Israelis while the Soviets were allied with Egypt and Syria. We tended to look at matters much more in a Cold War framework than in terms of a pro-Israeli U.S. policy. That was the intellectual framework that Henry Kissinger laid out while Secretary of State. Of course, this whole dynamic changed with the 1973 war.

Q: Our consulate general in Jerusalem took care of the West Bank and all that?

ABINGTON: Yes.

Q: So that wasn't in your purview?

ABINGTON: No. I would go and occasionally meet with people in the consulate and we would compare notes with each other on the Palestinian issues. But Gaza was a backwater at that point. Politically, socially and culturally the West Bank and East Jerusalem was much more important. But even so, the Palestinian issue was not a very high profile issue at the time.

Q: Were you at all looking at the Israeli Arabs?

ABINGTON: I was. The Israeli Arabs were... I would go into Nazareth from time to time and meet with community leaders and Israeli Arab Knesset members, all of whom supported the Labor Party. In general, the Palestinians looked upon Israeli-Arab politicians as people that were going along with the Israeli policies because they had been bought off. There was a lot of discrimination against Israeli-Arabs. They were subject to discriminatory economic policies, discriminatory social and security policies. But they were not politically active or strident and they didn't have that much importance because they were not a critical factor in terms of the Israeli Labor government's being in power. The Labor government through its alliance with religious parties could take or leave Israeli-Arab political support.

Q: Talk about your personal experiences and then what happened when the October War came.

ABINGTON: I enjoyed tremendously serving there. It was a fascinating and very dynamic society. There were issues that were very interesting and Israelis were quite accessible. They were much more politically active on the Palestinian side. Frankly, people in the embassy or in Washington were simply not concentrating on the Palestinians in the West Bank or Gaza at the time. They were politically disorganized and so much under Israeli domination that they weren't an issue. To the extent that Palestinian nationalism was looked at, it was in the context of Arafat, the PLO, what was taking place in Jordan...

Q: This was the Black September.

ABINGTON: Right. And then moving on to the Palestinians, moving on to Lebanon, and Arafat setting up his base of operations there. Of course, during that period Palestinian terrorism was starting to develop. I recall having been out at Ben Gurion Airport three or four times when aircraft had been high-jacked there by PLO members. I recall a raft of Palestinian terrorists landed a block from the embassy in Tel Aviv. I had been at the embassy watching a movie and I was driving back towards Jaffa and ran into gunfire between the Fedayeen and Israeli police. These Fedayeen seized a hotel, which as it turned out was a brothel, just a block and a half from the embassy. But Palestinian terrorism was becoming very much a fact of life in Israel during that period.

Q: Were you in Israel during the '73 war?

ABINGTON: I was.

Q: What was your experience when it broke out?

ABINGTON: In the week before the war, the Israelis were very concerned by military moves that they were seeing on the ground in Egypt and in Syria, particularly in Egypt, and they didn't know what to make of these moves. They asked us for our assessment whether these were just routine fall military exercises that happen when it's much cooler and before the rains start, or whether this really signaled that the Arabs were up to something. On both the Israeli side and the American side both on the political level, the State Department level, the CIA level, we had become complacent about how we looked at the Arabs. We felt that they had been so decisively defeated in 1967 that they would be very foolish to contemplate military action against Israel because Israel could defeat them just as quickly with as few casualties as in '67. And that certainly- (end of tape)

The day before the war started, it was the day before Yom Kippur. On Yom Kippur the embassy closed down and everyone stayed at home. No one drove or anything. We did one last round of checking. The assessment continued to be that there were some questionable military moves going on but it really didn't signal a move towards hostilities. But there was a lot of uncertainty on the part of our military attaches, on the part of the CIA station at the embassy, on the part of the ambassador and the DCM. The ambassador was Kenneth Keating, the former senator from NY who had been ambassador in India and who had been defeated by Bobby Kennedy in NY. Nick Veliotis was the DCM. So, we all went home on Yom Kippur Eve. Everybody was pretty much housebound for the next 24 hours. Very early in the morning on Yom Kippur, October 6, at about 6:30 or 7:00, this jet flew over my neighborhood at a very low level. It sent shockwaves it was flying so low and slow. I just felt that there was going to be a war starting that day because I knew that the Israelis would not have done that if there had not been something very serious. As I got dressed and went outside, I could see that the reservists were being called up and neighbors whom I knew were coming out of their houses in their uniforms, getting ready to go. I called up the DCM and told him this and he said the same thing was happening in his neighborhood.

Q: We'll pick it up next time.

Today is December 14, 2000. What do you do when you see the reservists coming up?

ABINGTON: The first thing was that the word went out to all of the people in the embassy that it appeared that hostilities were eminent between Israel and its neighbors. I know that late in the morning Veliotis and Ambassador Keating were called to see Golda Meir at the defense ministry in Tel Aviv. This was during Yom Kippur in which there is no traffic on the roads and cars that were on the roads during that day would be stoned. But this was a very different Yom Kippur for Israelis. Veliotis and Keating went to the defense ministry. Golda Meir informed Keating that Israel had information that it considered to be irrefutable that Egypt and Syria were about to launch military attacks against Israeli forces. Israel had decided that it would not preempt but that it would see what Egypt and Syria would do. Part of the decision not to preempt was that Israel simply wasn't prepared to do so because it had been so confused by deceptive Egyptian and Syrian military moves that it was not in a position militarily to preempt. What was happening on that day was a massive call-up of Israeli reservists. Veliotis called people into the embassy and we went through the process of organizing how we would handle this in terms of reporting. The office of the defense attaché was extremely important in terms of liaising with the Israeli military. But then the political and economic sections were also doing their reporting. The administrative and consular sections had responsibilities for getting the word out to people within the embassy community that hostilities were expected and more broadly to Americans in Israel, for which the consular section was responsible.

Hostilities started at about 2:00 PM on Yom Kippur.

Q: Was the feeling that the Israelis would take care of this as they always had?

ABINGTON: I think that opinions were mixed on this. The Israelis were very overconfident. Defense Minister Moshe Dyan that day or shortly thereafter made a very threatening statement that Israel would break the bones of the Egyptians and the Syrians and would really teach them a lesson. There was a great deal of overconfidence on the part of the Israelis in general but also the defense establishment and the intelligence establishment because they did not fully appreciate how the shipment of Soviet arms, particularly surface to air missiles that had much greater capabilities than in 1967 and especially the use of tow missiles by Egyptian soldiers, would change the battlefield. It's an optically guided missile with a shake charge on it that was used against Israeli armor. Israel depended very much for its victory in 1967 first on this air force and then secondly on its armor. The Egyptian and Syrian tactics were to deny Israel air superiority through the use of Soviet surface to air missiles, particularly the SA3 and the SA6, which were effective against low to medium flying aircraft, the Israelis did not lose a single aircraft in the '73 war to air to air combat. But they lost an awful lot of aircraft as a result of these surface to air missiles. They did not have the tactics that were developed later in terms of radar jamming and stuff like that. This was a real shock to them. Unable to have air superiority, it meant that the Egyptian and Syrian militaries were able to advance their armor and it lessened the effectiveness of Israeli armor. Without the combination of air superiority and superiority on the ground with armor, the Israeli advantage was much diluted. In the Sinai, what surprised the Israelis there was not only the use of surface to air missiles but the discipline of the Egyptian soldiers who did not break and run as they did in '67, although if you're being attacked from the air with absolutely no defense, any army would break and run. Their previous experience had set up an attitude on the part of the Israeli military that led them to grossly underestimate the military capabilities of the Egyptians and the Syrians.

Q: Had that attitude spilled over to the embassy?

ABINGTON: I think it did. In general, embassy people were without area experience or Israeli experience. Many of the people at the embassy generally tended to reflect Israeli perceptions. There was not enough critical questioning of attitudes and so forth. This was not entirely the case. Nick Veliotis was a brilliant person who was much more questioning in terms of Israel and Israeli assumptions. Ambassador Kenneth Keating was in relatively fragile health.

Q: He was elderly.

ABINGTON: Yes. He had been ambassador in India. His appointment to Israel had been delayed because he had suffered a heart attack. Then he recovered from the heart attack and was nominated and came out to Israel. But he wasn't in the office more than two to three hours a day. His intellectual abilities were much impaired. He was not really into the substance of the issues. He was very pro-Israeli to the point of lacking credibility. Frankly, there was a widespread assumption that he was exactly the kind of ambassador that Henry Kissinger wanted at that time. Kissinger had become Secretary of State. Kissinger really worked the U.S.-Israeli relationship from Washington. The ambassador was Yitzhak Rabin and he was the conduit for information, consultation, request for U.S. military assistance, etc. And the embassy to a large extent was out of it. Certainly Keating was not relied upon in Washington and was not taken seriously in Washington as an astute observer or representative of American interests. In fact, Veliotis told me the story of how Keating, who had been a brigadier general or a major general in World War II, got carried away with this and said he was going to resign as ambassador and offer his services to Golda Meir to fight for Israel. Veliotis had to calm him down. That's an indication of how Keating really was not a serious individual.

Q: Then what did you do? How did you operate?

ABINGTON: The first couple of days of the war were a tremendous shock for Israelis. Israel really went into a war footing. There was a blackout at night. You had to put blackout curtains or blankets on your windows and they had wardens who walked around and if there was any light visible, they would knock on your door and tell you either to seal that off or to turn your lights off. The headlights of cars were painted with blue paint which gave out just a very dim light at night. It led to numerous accidents and a lot of casualties. Israeli ammunition trucks were running into each other and blowing up. They turned out the traffic lights, for example. Anyone who drove in Israel during that time knew how hazardous Israeli drivers were. You can imagine what it was like with young soldiers driving at night with no vehicle lights and no traffic lights. There was a tremendous shock to the Israeli body politic within the first week of the war. The Israelis did not crush the Egyptians and Syrians as had been the case in '67. The Israelis were suffering high casualties. They were losing lots of armor. The Egyptians had crossed the Suez Canal. They had seized the Bar Lev Line. They had advanced in the Sinai. They had brought armor and artillery and surface to air missiles over. The Egyptian anti-tank units which would be two to three individuals armed with tow missiles, Sagger missiles, were knocking out lots of Israeli armor. The Israelis came to realize fairly quickly that they were facing a very different situation than in 1967 and a very grave one.

Q: What did you do?

ABINGTON: What we tried to do was through conversations and through the press and other things to give a daily sense of what Israeli leaders were saying publicly, what the mood was. There was reporting that was being done in various channels. In 1973 the communications revolution had not taken place. Embassy reporting was much more important in terms of giving a daily feel for what was taking place. You did not have CNN. You did not have instantaneous reporting on the battlefield as you have today. You did not have the kind of communications hookups so that either television or radio was picking up on an almost instantaneous basis what Israeli leaders were saying. So, the military attaches were working 20-24 hours a day around the clock in close contact with their Israeli counterparts. The CIA station which basically had a liaison relationship with the Israelis was in close touch with Mossad for their assessment. The political section was talking to the foreign ministry and reporting on what the politicians were saying, what the mood was, etc. The embassy pretty clearly charted how difficult the situation became for the Israelis within the first few days. The Israelis started running out of certain types of ammunition. They really started panicking because their whole force structure had not been developed to meet this new Egyptian-Syrian threat either to deal with the surface to air missiles, to deal with the Sagger anti-tank missiles, or to deal with the artillery barrages that particularly the Egyptians were putting down. The Israelis were deficient in artillery, particularly 155 millimeter artillery. They were deficient in certain kinds of armor piercing ammunition. Their stockpiles started running out because their planners had planned for a much shorter and less intensive battle. There is a saying that all armies prepare for the last war. That was the case with the Israelis. They prepared for the '67 war, not the '73 war, and the '73 war was of much different magnitude than was the case in '67. The Israelis really started panicking and turned to the United States. The request went both through our military attaches but primarily through Ambassador Rabin in Washington to the White House to Kissinger, to the Defense Department, that they needed help. It was at that point that the United States started planning an airlift of essential military supplies to the Israelis using the C5As which had just come on line.

Q: These are very large cargo planes.

ABINGTON: Yes, jet cargo planes, at that time with the largest lift capacity of any aircraft in the world. The airlift was both symbolic in terms of a sign of U.S. commitment and also important in bringing certain parts that the Israelis desperately needed. Even an aircraft that big could not bring the kind of assistance that you need to fight a war simply because there is too much heavy equipment that's needed that you can't airlift. The only way to get that kind of material is by sea. In fact, the United States started shipping stuff by sea, but the turnaround time from when you gathered up the material, sent it to the ports, put it on the ship, and sailed across was probably three weeks. At the rate the fighting was going on, there was no way that the United States could send tanks and other equipment – APCs, ammunition – from the U.S. to Israel and arrive in time to affect the outcome of the battle. What the United State did symbolically – and I can remember sitting at the embassy in Tel Aviv – when the first C5As started arriving, it was in the afternoon. These aircraft approached Israel flying into Ben Gurion Airport over Tel Aviv, these huge aircraft. It was a tremendous morale booster for Israelis. They were really demoralized at the time. For them, it was a very solid sign of American support. To see the aircraft come in on a daily basis really lifted the morale of the State of Israel in a way that can't be calculated. What the planes brought in were specialized parts for aircraft. Israel had many American aircraft – F4s and Skyhawk aircraft which were A7s.

Q: Those are attack planes.

ABINGTON: Yes, although the Phantom jet was used both for air superiority and ground support. The Israelis desperately needed certain spare parts that could be flown in with these aircraft. They needed certain kinds of ammunition, particularly armor piercing tank ammunition which came in. The U.S. flew in a few APCs and tanks but that was more of a symbolic gesture. It received a lot of publicity both in Israel and internationally. Of course, there was the international dimension to the support of the United States. Kissinger and Nixon framed this issue in a Cold War-U.S.-Soviet framework. They felt that it was essential that the U.S. stand behind its ally in the region, Israel, while the Soviet Union was supporting Syria and Egypt. So, the symbolism of the U.S. sending APCs and tanks to Israel by air was important as a sign of U.S. commitment, but the impact upon the Israeli military was non-existent. It was during this period... I have to emphasize that the show was really run out of Washington by Kissinger, who worked hard during this period to bring about a cease-fire, a very delicate task because the Egyptians and the Syrians initially resisted a cease-fire because they were advancing. The Israelis wanted one. The tide started to turn first in the Sinai. General Ariel Sharon played a key role in the tank battles that took place down in the Sinai. There was one particular tank battle at a place called the Chinese Farm, so called because there is a Chinese agricultural project there, which was one of the largest tank battles in history. It was a decisive battle from the Israeli point of view. They blunted the Egyptian attack in the Sinai. They moved to secure a foothold on the other side of the Suez Canal. They gradually expanded that foothold and surrounded and put at risk the Egyptian Third Army, a very sizeable force. Having gained control of the battlefield in the Sinai, the Israelis turned their attention to the Golan. In the Golan, the fiercest tank battles took place. It was over a very small territorial unit, which made it even fiercer. The Syrians came very, very close to breaking the Israeli lines and to bringing their tanks down from the Golan Heights into northern Israel and very close to seizing a key bridge across a river down in the Hula Valley, which would have been very devastating for the Israelis if that had taken place. But the ability to control the battlefield in the Sinai allowed the Israelis to shift armor up to the Golan. Israelis also gradually gained air superiority in both the Sinai and the Golan. It allowed the Israelis to hold on to the Golan Heights. But it was a close call for the Israelis in the Golan.

Q: An embassy's priority is protection of American interests, which in this case would mean Americans. There were a lot of Israelis who also had American passports. Getting them out of harm's way... What was happening?

ABINGTON: Because it was a war, commercial airliners stopped flying into Israel. All the American carriers stopped and so did most of the others. Maybe the only airliner flying in and out of Israel was El-al. A lot of Israelis who had been abroad came back to Israel to fight, to join reserve units. There were volunteers that came to Israel at the time. Dennis Ross, the current Middle East envoy, came to Israel and was there during the '73 war. So was Martin Indyk, our current ambassador to Israel, although at the time he was an Australian, not an American citizen. They were there during the '73 war. Indyk worked in some kind of a food processing plant in '73 because the Israeli males had been called into the reserves. You did not have that many people leaving. Because of the war, we couldn't evacuate any American dependents. So there was no real evacuation of people from Israel. There was just no way to get them out and there was no time to get them out either. I can recall that one Sunday the air raid sirens started sounding in Tel Aviv and we were all instructed to go down to the basement of the building. The Egyptians had been flying some TU16 bombers off the coast of Israel in the Mediterranean and they had launched missiles at Tel Aviv and these missiles were really in essence unmanned MIG15 aircraft which carried a big explosive charge. The Israelis shot them down but the fact of air attacks on Tel Aviv shook people up a lot. From the point of view of protecting American citizens, there was not a lot to do other than try to reassure people, to tell them to obey Israeli blackout instructions and so forth, and to be prepared to leave quickly, to have their possessions, their papers in order, if it was possible to get people out. But there basically was no evacuation during this war.

I want to point out that the role of the defense attaché office at that time was really critical. In terms of giving assessments, daily briefings, hourly briefings by the Israeli military to our defense attaches, who in turn did their cables and reports... You didn't have the kind of real time satellite intelligence that you have today. Satellite reconnaissance at that time was pretty bulky and was much more difficult to download the stuff. It was through parachuted film canisters.

Q: They would orbit over and then parachute down.

ABINGTON: So you didn't have real time digital intelligence the way we have today. The defense attaches played a critical role. Fortunately, we had a staff of highly professional officers who did an absolutely superb job during this period.

Q: Were they reflecting at all the disquiet that was coming from our military, from the Pentagon, that we were giving supplies that should be used in case the Soviets attacked across the Fulda Gap and all that?

ABINGTON: No, not at all. They were looking at it from the other perspective. What you mention is a broader perspective that they simply didn't have. They were looking at it very much from the perspective of what the Israelis were telling them and the desperation that the Israelis were feeling. They didn't have a broader picture.

Q: Was Nick Veliotis very much in charge?

ABINGTON: Nick was really in charge. Keating was the nominal ambassador, but it was Veliotis who was running the whole show. He was working tremendously hard. He was in touch with the foreign minister, the prime minister, the defense minister. He was forwarding proposals and suggestions to Washington, giving assessments. He was pulling it all together and coordinating the whole thing. He was doing this while trying to keep Keating happy and not have Keating go off the deep end either.

Q: Were you able to go out and meet your various contacts during this time?

ABINGTON: There was massive mobilization. You'd just see it walking down the street: the absence of men. The people on the street by and large were either elderly men or schoolboys or women. You did not see men. It was difficult in the sense of contacts were gone – if they were journalists, they were at the front. Your normal contacts just weren't there.

Q: Coming back to the Americans, as an old consular hand myself, I would have thought that you would have had a bunch of people saying, "You've got to do something" no matter how unrealistic it was to get them out. If they're frightened or annoyed, there is no place better than the embassy to go and shout at officials.

ABINGTON: Of course, I wasn't in the consular section. I was in the political section. But my recollection is that there really was not during the conflict a lot of public pressure from people to try to get out. People were listening to radio on an hourly basis. They generally understood what the situation was. They knew that airplanes were not flying in, that getting out was almost impossible. I don't think you had the kind of pressure in 1973 that you had during the 1990-1991 Gulf War.

Q: There you had a not very impressive reaction on the part of many people who were Jewish-Americans.

ABINGTON: The difference in '90-'91 was that you had SCUD missiles hitting Tel Aviv and civilian casualties. In the '73 war, I don't think that there were any civilian casualties as a result of Syrian or Egyptian military strikes. You also had the threat of chemical warheads in '90-'91 and that created a tremendous amount of panic and concern on the part of the population.

Q: After a cease-fire came into existence, what were we seeing in Israel?

ABINGTON: One has to recall that the cease-fire came about as a result of Kissinger's negotiations with the Soviets. Kissinger went to Moscow and worked out the details of a cease-fire acceptable to both sides and a Security Council resolution, 338, which called for a cease-fire and for a political settlement. The Israelis' feeling was mixed. On the one hand, they had really been bloodied very badly with very serious casualties, the worst since 1948 when Israel became independent, the worst casualties of any conflict, and they had been badly damaged by the Egyptians and the Syrians both in terms of people killed and wounded as well as equipment destroyed. On the other hand, I think that the Israelis at this point had really put the Egyptians under tremendous pressure. Some elements of the IDF and the political establishment thought that Israel should continue fighting against Egypt to destroy the Egyptian Third Army and to push the Egyptians out of the Bar Lev Line and out of the Sinai. But then this became wrapped up in power politics and in Cold War politics. The Soviet Union made it clear that an Israeli military move against Egyptian forces along the lines I just described would meet some unspecified Soviet response. This led to a tremendous amount of international tension. It caused President Nixon to increase the overall readiness of U.S. military forces around the world to a much higher stage. And it raised concern that the conflict, particularly the Egyptian-Israeli conflict, could lead to U.S.-Soviet military involvement. As a result, the stakes increased tremendously. Because of that, Kissinger and Nixon made it quite clear to the Israeli leadership that there had to be a cease-fire. There were assurances from Kissinger that the U.S. would be very mindful of Israeli security requirements and concerns. I think that that had been clearly demonstrated by the support both political and military that the U.S. had given Israel with the outbreak of the conflict. There was a clear commitment that there would be additional U.S. military assistance to Israel and there would be an expedited resupply of military equipment to make up for the losses that the Israelis had suffered. So, Israel accepted the cease-fire somewhat but not too reluctantly. Kissinger flew from Moscow to Tel Aviv and it was a six to eight-hour stop to brief the Israelis. Then he went on to Cairo to meet with President Sadat and to brief him as well. That was the 22nd or 23rd of October. The fighting stopped, although there were sporadic outbreaks, particularly in the Sinai or in Egypt proper across the canal, where there continued to be periodic low level fighting. The Egyptian Third Army, which at that point had been totally surrounded... The Israelis kept up their military pressure and this continued to be a real flashpoint. The United States had to work out resupply arrangements and put some serious pressure on the Israelis to allow food and fuel and so forth to go to the Egyptian Third Army. Sadat was absolutely concerned that the Israelis would try to destroy the Third Army. He was appealing for Soviet and American help to keep that from happening. Kissinger and others realized the seriousness of that situation and pressed Israel very hard not to take further action against the Third Army.

Q: During the war, were you monitoring the Arabs within Israel and those in the West Bank? Was there concern on the part of the Israelis that they would rise up to support their fellow Arabs?

ABINGTON: Not really. We didn't spend any time at all... Of course, the consulate in Jerusalem had responsibility for reporting on what Palestinians in the West Bank were doing. But we essentially did nothing with regard to the Israeli Arabs or for that matter Palestinians in Gaza. I think that the main reason was that unlike in the Gulf War and unlike today, Palestinians were not politically mobilized and were not politically active in 1973. They were quiescent and the Israelis had the situation under control militarily with regard to the West Bank and Gaza. I don't recall that there were any particular incidents caused by Palestinians nor were there Israeli measures like 24-hour curfews as they did during the Gulf War. The Palestinians were not a factor in the '73 war.

Q: The war was over. What were you getting from your contacts? Was there a change in the American-Israeli equation?

ABINGTON: Yes. There was a feeling on the part of Israelis that the United States had played a critical role in standing by Israel during its most difficult hour since independence. There was a sense of real gratitude on a popular level and among the political leadership. On the other hand, Golda Meir was still the prime minister. You had people in the cabinet who were determined that they were going to do it their way. Kissinger was finding the Israelis difficult to deal with, as they usually are because they are very fierce in terms of protecting their own interests. There was a cease-fire but then there was a very intensive period of negotiation to stabilize the situation. Those were the negotiations in November and December which led to the two agreements. The first was the Kilometer 101 Agreement. Then there was the First Disengagement Agreement. Kissinger started and the phrase was coined "shuttle diplomacy" between Israel and Egypt in November and December to try to stabilize the situation to remove this flashpoint of the Israeli siege of the Egyptian Third Army. That led to the Kilometer 101 Agreement.

Q: What were you doing in November and December?

ABINGTON: Fairly intensive discussions were going on between Kissinger and Rabin here in Washington. The embassy was receiving instructions from Washington to talk to the foreign ministry or to the prime minister. Keating and Veliotis would do that. For example, there were warnings about military action against the Third Army. There was consultation primarily led by Veliotis to talk to senior Israeli leaders to get their sense of their mood, of their plans, etc. In that sense, it was still a crisis atmosphere. The embassy was doing its best to assess Israeli plans and intentions regarding the aftermath of the war and how to deal with it. There was also a congressional visit, a large one led by Congressman Mel Pryce and 40-45 members of Congress who came out shortly after the cease-fire. Congressman Pryce was chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. There were also representatives from the House Foreign Affairs Committee. The Israelis then as now realized the importance of congressional support for Israel. They worked really hard to take care of this delegation. I was the control officer along with one of the military attaches. It was quite dramatic because this probably would have been early November and the Israelis flew us by helicopter out to the Sinai along the Suez Canal. We saw the area of the Chinese Farm where this huge battle had taken place and you literally could see hundreds of destroyed and damaged tanks and APCs in this area. We flew over the Suez Canal and went to Egypt to the Israeli forward positions where they had surrounded the Egyptian Third Army. We received a briefing from the IDF on the Egyptian side of the canal. I'll never forget, there were Egyptian soldiers' bodies still unburied. It was very much a war zone. It made a tremendous impact on the members of the congressional delegation and on me. We were the first visitors of a non-military nature to that area. The Israelis really played up what had happened, the threat, etc. It had the desired impact. The delegation went back to Washington and were very strongly behind a significant U.S. military assistance package to Israel. That was a very important event. It cemented congressional support for the Israelis. The Israelis received them at the highest level. They had briefings by the prime minister, the foreign minister, the IDF chief of staff and general command, and they saw for themselves the battlefield which made a very deep impression on these congressmen.

Q: During this early cease-fire period, were you picking up a certain disquiet on the part of elements within Israel of the leadership of Golda Meir?

ABINGTON: Very much so, yes. The Israeli press traditionally has been vociferous in its criticism. There was a feeling that the Israeli political and military leadership had failed the country by not anticipating the attacks and by misreading the intelligence and by a mis-assessment of Egyptian and Syrian political and military intentions. There was a committee formed, the Argonaut Committee, headed by the chief justice of Israel, which did a very thorough review of the situation and essentially blamed the leadership for its failure. That led in early 1974 to Golda Meir's resignation. Yitzhak Rabin then became the prime minister. During that period-- November, December, January--ongoing negotiations continued, which had to be done by Kissinger and his Middle East team that included Joe Sisco, who at the time had become US for Political Affairs, Roy Atherton, who was the Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs, Hal Saunders, who was the deputy; he had moved over from the NSC to assist Roy Atherton with responsibility for the Arab-Israeli issue, and Bill Klunt had replaced him at the NSC. So, you had some real heavy hitters. Kissinger had a superb team of diplomats and negotiators with him, although he really ran the show. But it was personal hands-on diplomacy by Kissinger negotiating between the Egyptians and the Israelis to bring about the Kilometer 101 Agreement, which stabilized the situation and led to the Israeli evacuation of positions across the canal, and then later the First Disengagement Agreement which led to a zone of separation between Israel and Egypt. During that period, the embassy was totally involved in supporting Kissinger. Essentially the embassy moved up to Jerusalem to the King David Hotel and we were there in a staff and administrative support capacity, although Veliotes was involved, Keating was really no more than the symbolic presence. It was really a negotiation totally run by Henry Kissinger and by his staff in Washington. The embassy played very little substantive role in this process. It essentially was there to support Kissinger's efforts.

Q: When did you leave Israel?

ABINGTON: I left Israel in June of 1975. During that period, the negotiation by Kissinger was intensive. To my way of thinking, the '73 war and Kissinger's diplomacy afterwards laid the foundation for American diplomacy to try to resolve the Arab-Israeli dispute. I look upon the peace process and building blocks. Every agreement is based upon prior agreements. Kissinger really set that in motion. During the time that I was there in Tel Aviv, there was the Kilometer 101 Agreement, there was the First Disengagement Agreement, there was the 1974 Israeli-Syrian Disengagement Agreement, where Kissinger spent something like 33 days at the King David Hotel shuttling back and forth between Damascus and Jerusalem to negotiate that agreement. Then there was the attempt to reach a second disengagement agreement which failed in March of 1975. I remember being at the airport and Kissinger saying that he was going back for a reassessment of American policy which was widely perceived in Israel and in Washington as a threat to bring pressure against Israel, feeling that Israel was being recalcitrant in terms of a further pullback in the Sinai. Of course, the Israelis mounted a very effective congressional campaign which culminated in a letter to the President by something like 90-92 of the 100 senators saying that the United States should not put pressure on Israel. That whole reassessment threat pretty much went out the window. But it was a period of very creative diplomacy by Kissinger and deep personal involvement on the Arab-Israeli issue and really laid the groundwork for future U.S. efforts to mediate the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Q: One of the attributes of Israeli action that I've picked up is that they would sign an agreement and then keep challenging it. In other words, an agreement is sort of a preliminary thing and they keep pushing ahead a little. Were we noticing that, trying to get everything they could out of it?

ABINGTON: I've always felt that a style of Israeli negotiators is to stake out an absolutely unreasonable and maximalist position and to negotiate back from there. In general, Israelis are reasonably successful in that because they end up getting more than might otherwise be the case. This tends to be a tactic whether it's negotiating with Arab neighbors or with the Palestinians or whether it's negotiating with the United States issues in the bilateral relationship like strategic cooperation, etc. It's a characteristic of negotiations, to overreach, to put really maximalist positions on the table, and they end up getting instead of 70% maybe 90-95%. I helped do the staff work for Kissinger when he was negotiating these agreements, working with the Executive Secretariat. I saw the negotiating papers and so forth. I saw the agreements as they went through drafts. Then when I came back to Washington in the summer of '75, I was a staff aide to Roy Atherton. I did a lot of the staff work in preparation for negotiations that Kissinger carried out. He kept it to a very small circle of people and someone needed to do the staff work and it fell to me as Roy's staff aide. To go back to your question, once an agreement was reached between Israel and Syria, between Israel and Egypt, and once the military movements took place, Israel was pretty good about living up to the agreements. Once the Israelis pulled back to new lines in Sinai, they basically respected those. In the Golan Heights, when Israel withdrew from Kuneitra, quite clearly the Israelis destroyed Kuneitra before they withdrew. It was widely seen as an act of bad faith. Then the Israelis charged that the Syrians were not interested in peace because otherwise they would have rebuilt Kuneitra even though it was surrounded by the Israelis. It's still surrounded by the Israelis 26 years after the disengagement agreement. It angered the Syrians very much. The Israelis charged that the buildings had been damaged or destroyed during fighting. In fact, we went up and examined the area, and it was clear that the Israelis had put charges in the buildings and collapsed them, blown out the walls so that the roofs caved in. That was not caused by fighting during the war but caused by an act of Israeli retaliation.

Q: You can tell. I was in Bosnia after the civil war and you can tell when houses are destroyed by military action.

ABINGTON: Yes. It was quite clear that Israel had destroyed much of the city of Kuneitra. This has been a hallmark of the way Israel negotiates agreements with its neighbors. They are niggardly in the negotiations. There is no good grace on the part of the Israelis when they carry out these agreements. That was the case with the disengagement agreement. There was no good grace in terms of Kuneitra. They destroyed the city and poisoned the atmosphere, which was bad to begin with. It certainly didn't set a proper framework for a future developing relationship.

It was the same thing when they carried out the peace agreement with Egypt. Rather than just withdraw from Israeli settlements in the Sinai, which clearly were illegal, the Israelis evacuated the settlements with difficulty, but then they flattened and destroyed the settlements. It was widely seen in the Arab world as a general attitude of Israel towards Arabs. Of course, they held on to the Taba area for years when clearly there was no legal basis for their having it. It's these kind of gestures on the part of Israel that goes a long way to poisoning the atmosphere between Israel and its neighbors. It's always an irony that when Israel talks about a cold peace, it always fails to acknowledge actions that it has taken that have contributed to the cold peace.

Q: Did you sense any change in the attitude towards Syria or Egypt or towards Arabs in general?

ABINGTON: Certainly not up to the point that I left in 1975. There was a visceral hatred or dislike of, particularly, the Syrians. There was a feeling that the Syrians were the most brutal of all the Arabs. I suppose that one reason was that the Syrians and the Israelis geographically were cheek by jowl unlike the Egyptians and the Israelis where you had the Sinai as a buffer. In that sense, having that kind of buffer meant that the hatred or the mistrust on the part of Israelis was much less. I think that in general among Israelis that I talked to, average Israelis, there was a general contempt and mistrust with regard to Arabs in general, a visceral dislike of the Syrians, almost bordering on hatred, a deep distrust of Palestinians. This was reinforced by terrorist incidents, for example, the Ma'alot incident in '74.

Q: What was that?

ABINGTON: Some Palestinians came across the Israeli-Lebanese border. They seized a school in the town of Ma'alot in northern Israel. Israelis stormed the school and in the resulting fighting something like 20 Israeli schoolchildren were killed. Of course, that made a tremendous impact on Israelis. It happened when Kissinger was in Jerusalem and it totally disrupted the negotiations. There was an intense Israeli focus on this from the political leadership on down.

Q: Did you sense a change in our embassy towards the leadership of Sadat? Was he a different person than had been felt before? We were thinking of Sadat as being not a very impressive replacement for Nasser.

ABINGTON: It changed as a result of the '73 war. It started to gradually change as Kissinger became convinced that Sadat was a genuinely different kind of Arab leader and that Sadat genuinely wanted to make peace. I can recall that Israelis were traumatized by the '73 war. To a degree they had blinders on because of their stereotypical attitudes towards Arabs that exist today. Of course, one fallout from the '73 war and the Israeli intelligence failure, military failure, and political failure was that it changed the psychology of the way that the military, the intelligence communities assessed Arab attitudes. They went very much from an arrogant feeling of Israel being so much stronger than the Arabs to really worst case assessments of Arab intentions. This worst case assessment led them to question and discount signs of a different Arab attitude towards peace with Israel. Certainly that was the case with Syria and Egypt. They listened to what Kissinger was saying, that this was a new ballgame and new opportunities were there. They had been burned so badly by the '73 war that they were very skeptical about what they were told by the Americans and they had a real difficulty in coming up with honest and accurate intelligence assessments of particularly Egyptian intentions. There was no Israeli interests section or embassy in Cairo. They had a very hard time gathering information. I've always felt that Israel suffers and continues to suffer in terms of its understanding of Arabs and its assessment of Arab intentions. That's been the case in the 30 years that I dealt with Israel and Arabs.

Q: You keep using the term "Arab." Was there the feeling that the Egyptians aren't really Arabs?

ABINGTON: Oh, yes. I'm using "Arab" in a broad sense without distinguishing between Jordanians, Syrians, Iraqis, Egyptians. There was certainly the growing perception in the embassy that the Egyptians were quite different. We could see signs of falling out between the Egyptians and the Syrians over how Sadat was pursuing his policy. The Syrians were angry that the unity of the war after the conflict ended, that the Egyptians began pursuing their own interests in terms of negotiations with Israel using the United States. You could see developing Syrian-Egyptian strains. King Hussein at the time had stayed out of the '73 war. There were continuing secret Israeli-Jordanian contacts and dialogue going on with Hussein and the Israeli prime minister at the intelligence level. In '73 and '74, the PLO had been kicked out of Jordan.

Q: That was Black September.

ABINGTON: Yes. They had relocated in Lebanon, which was becoming increasingly unstable in the mid-'70s. In late '75/'76, Lebanon became a real hotspot. I think that there was a perception in the embassy that Egypt was playing a different role and the U.S. leadership - Kissinger, Nixon, and then Ford - were looking at Egypt in a much different light.

Q: Here is the embassy. You've been through a very dramatic war. Did you find that all of you coming out of that were much more pro-Israeli? I'm talking about real localitis coming out.

ABINGTON: No. I think there were different opinions. To be perfectly honest, I felt from the time I arrived in Israel in 1972 that Israel was essentially racist in the way that it treated Palestinians. I was new to the Foreign Service, but just from the point of view of seeing how Israel dealt with its Arab neighbors, I felt that Israeli policies were misguided, not very well thought out, that the Israeli prejudices against the Arabs were so deep and so strong that Israeli actions were fueling the crisis. Certainly one can fault what the Palestinians were doing, can fault what the Syrians were doing, a lack of recognition or understanding of what the Egyptians were up to, but Israeli actions created a lot of the difficulties in the Arab-Israeli conflict, which is a conflict between two parties. When you're part of that and when you're emotionally bound up in it, it's very difficult to distance yourself and take an honest look. I think that it's the role of outside mediators like the U.S. to rise above the positions of one side or the other and try to bring them together. We've done not so good and fairly good jobs of that at different times. We can talk about when we didn't do a very good job.

BETTY JANE JONES
Deputy Consul General
Jerusalem (1973-1976)

Betty Jane Jones was born and raised in Wisconsin. She majored in government at Beloit College and entered the Foreign Service in 1954. Her career included positions in Italy, Germany, India, Israel, the United Kingdom (England), and assignments related to the United Nations in Washington, DC and New York. This interview was conducted on March 8, 1993.

Q: You left Calcutta, and that war just in time to go to Jerusalem. People must have been thinking of you as Typhoid Mary?

JONES: Even funnier than that was the Ambassador in India was Ambassador Keating and he moved from there to Israel. In fact, he said to me one day, "Everywhere we go, they seem to have a war." Yes, I went on a direct transfer to Jerusalem.

Q: When did you arrive?

JONES: In July? I think it was July '73.

Q: And stayed there until '76?

JONES: That's right.

Q: How did you see the situation in the summer of '73?

JONES: As I alluded to earlier, things were very stalemated. Nothing was happening in terms of resolving the problem, the Arab-Israeli problem. There didn't seem to be any chance of movement. Then the war came and that all changed, and again as in '67 there was hope that this would lead to something that could help resolve the problem.

Q: How did the war hit Jerusalem where you were?

JONES: Well the war itself didn't really affect us very much except that, you know, they call up so many people. A couple of our local employees got called up. One was let go fairly soon after. He was in his fifties. Both of these were drivers and the younger man did stay in for the course of the war. It's a very funny situation where people there go into the army. They go off to war. They come home. They can one day be off somewhere fighting, and the next day be home on a pass, and then two days later be back fighting again. It's a very odd feeling. It's so different from what we're used to where people go miles away and it's a totally separate situation. There was a lot of tension of course, concern. But Jerusalem itself, I don't think ever felt, the city per se, was in danger. Similarly in Calcutta, we never felt any danger during the war, even though we had a blackout for two days but it was pointless, because there was nothing happening in that area.

Following the war, we got terribly busy because of the shuttle diplomacy, and because they came to Jerusalem, and were at the King David Hotel, which is not very far from the Consulate, and used our facilities, our communications. So that we had to have a twenty-four hour operation, and we ran messages back and forth between the Consulate and the King David Hotel.

Q: What were you doing in Jerusalem?

JONES: That's what I was saying earlier. I was the Deputy there, and I was Deputy in Calcutta too, but I was pretty much in the Economic Section, whereas in Jerusalem I was supervisor over the political and economic officers and the consular and administrative sections.

Q: Who was the Consul General?

JONES: It was Pete Day. Arthur R. Day, during the first two years, and Michael Newlin the third year that I was there.

Q: You know, there's always been the problem of Jerusalem which has been in a way the thorn in the side of the Israelis because of the reporting on Palestinian affairs, particularly on the West Bank. How did that work during your period and what were the pressures on you?

JONES: Well, the Israelis of course resent the fact that we have not recognized Jerusalem as the capital of Israel. Jerusalem is an independent post; it's not a constituent post of Tel Aviv, in order to maintain this policy. Its consular district includes the West Bank and the city of Jerusalem, both west and east. That gave us an opportunity to have contact with both sides which is an unusual situation in that area. We were able to report on events in the West Bank and to travel freely, and observe things. And also report on events in Jerusalem and have contacts with city officials. We didn't have any official contact with the Israeli government. That's the province of the Embassy. But we did cover the city and we did have contacts with the mayor and other officials there. It's a very sticky situation because little events would happen. When a congressman came to visit, the Israeli government wanted to, or the mayor's office wanted to, give him a tour of East Jerusalem, whereas we felt he should go with us not with West Jerusalem officials. Little things like that. Mostly our relations with them were good, but as I say, they were unhappy. There was a feeling on their part which I don't think is correct, that the consulate in Jerusalem was full of people who were anti-Israeli. That was not fair I think, and I think it was not a feeling that those who had contacts with the Consul General held, because they knew that he was not biased in that way, and in fact had many good Israeli friends, and was very sympathetic to their problems.

Q: Were you ever given any, if not instructions, heavy breathing from our Embassy in Tel Aviv, and even from the Department saying: "Cut out talking about Israeli procedures in the West Bank" or anything like that?

JONES: No, I don't think so. There were occasional problems of jurisdiction between the Embassy and us, but nothing that I can recall that was ever significant. We would talk to them on the phone frequently, and usually work things out.

Q: There weren't any incidents? In that time where a consul would go out and find that an Israeli had been beating up on some villagers. You'd report it and then it would get into the New York or the Washington Post and cause heartburn?

JONES: I don't recall anything of that nature. You know, you're required to do these annual human rights reports and the Embassy sent in a combined one covering Israel and the occupied territories because Gaza is under its jurisdiction. But we drafted the one on the West Bank and we sent it to them to include, and there might have been a few minor editing changes, but basically, they sent what we had prepared. I don't recall...There may be things I don't remember, but at the moment I don't recall any major difficulty we had.

NICHOLAS A. VELIOTES
Deputy Chief of Mission
Tel Aviv (1973-1975)

Bureau of Near East Affairs
Washington, DC (1977-1978)

Ambassador Nicholas A. Veliotis was born in California in 1928. He received a bachelor's degree from the University of California in 1952 and a master's degree in 1954. He joined the State Department in 1955. Ambassador Veliotis' career included positions in Italy, India, Laos, Israel, Washington, DC, and ambassadorships to Jordan, and Egypt. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

Q: You served as deputy chief of mission in Tel Aviv from '73 until '75. I wonder if you could talk a bit about how you got the job and what the situation was when you arrived there.

VELIOTES: Well, I guess I got the job because of, first, my ties into NEA, which were based on my service in India in the mid-sixties.

Q: I might say that NEA covered...

VELIOTES: South Asia as well as the Middle East and North Africa.

Q: And South Asia would include the...

VELIOTES: India-Pakistan area. When I was with the deputy secretary, we handled NEA issues that way. We handled all military and economic assistance for the Department. That was Jack Irwin, who was the top of that interagency pyramid that went heavily to the Middle East. Our office was responsible for coordinating the relief efforts into Jordan after the war with the Palestinians, Black September of 1970.

We were deeply involved in these issues. And I was considered a part of the NEA cadre. Joe Sisco was the assistant secretary. Roy Atherton was his deputy. When the time came for an assignment after I'd been in that particular job for three years, somewhere in NEA seemed natural. Actually, as it turned out, I was offered two different jobs: I was offered ambassador to Bangladesh or DCM in Israel. And my wife and I decided that Israel would be more interesting, and, for some reason, we thought it would be more restful.

Q: Good God! We're talking about early '73.

VELIOTES: Early '73. We were in the sixth year of the post-1967 euphoria in Israel, where there was a widespread belief the millennium had arrived, et cetera. And there was a tremendous amount of belief that Israel was a great vacation spot.

Q: You're talking about within the Foreign Service?

VELIOTES: Well, generally. And as far as I was concerned, it was attractive because I had two teenaged sons; they had a good school in Tel Aviv. It was essentially an English-language post; you could get by without knowing Arabic or Hebrew. And there was a challenge there. I was going to be the senior career officer, with an admirable elderly ambassador, a former senator, called Kenneth Keating, who had asked me to come.

Q: Barbour had left by this time?

VELIOTES: Barbour was gone. So I left in the summer of '73 and actually arrived as chargé for a month. Owen Zurhellen, who had been chargé for six months, was off to his next assignment, and I came in as chargé. And almost immediately, even at that time...

Q: This was...

VELIOTES: This was July of '73, I believe. I realized that, even though Israel was at peace, Israel was never at peace. The energy level in the society was extremely high. There was a feeling there of security, of having fought all the wars that had to be fought. There was a not-unattractive sense of optimism, and some arrogance. And there was a sun, sand, and surf philosophy, which, of course, my sons enjoyed immensely in those few months that it lasted.

But even at that time, I realized it was going to be a seven-day-a-week job, exacerbated by the difference in time change, which meant Washington awakened when we closed. And there was always a high interest in what was going on in the Middle East at this time, as the war of attrition had ended, and the Soviets had rebuilt the Syrian and Egyptian armed services, and Nasser had died, and Sadat had come in. And who is Sadat? He'd just thrown out the Russians. What were the Israelis doing? Where were the settlements going? Did it make sense to rely on the Bar-Lev line along the Canal, which was stationary? All these things. And, you know, there are times when you go into a situation fresh, where, because your mind is open, you can actually see some things.

In the month before the ambassador arrived, I went around on my introductory meetings, and it was fascinating. I went down to see the Bar-Lev line, along the Sinai, and it seemed rather strange to stand there and wave to the Egyptian soldiers on the other side, and to see these enormous, what looked like sand ramparts, enormous things up in the sky, and to get a briefing from the Israeli generals. They were impatient with any questions you would ask, like "What are those gigantic sand things?"

"Oh, forget about those. If the Egyptians attack, they may cross over at night, but in the morning they will die. In the morning they will die."

No conception that perhaps the Egyptians might have the capability to cross and stay, and that there might be a combination of factors that would make it impossible for the Israelis to do in the future what they did in the past with their tanks and their airplanes.

When I called on Moshe Dayan and asked his views, at that time he was minister of defense, he described the Arab armies as akin to rusting freighters at anchor, slowly sinking into the water. That was his description of the Arab army -- rusting and slowly sinking into the sand.

It was only a few months before the war.

We had continuing mini-crises. A Libyan plane was hijacked and brought in.

And to round this out, Israel closed down from Friday night to Saturday night.

Q: This was because of the holy day.

VELIOTES: Shabbat, the religious holy day. In Washington, of course, any busy State Department office works at least Saturday morning, which means they're in the office from five to ten p.m. Israel time. In any busy embassy, the senior officers go in in the morning on Saturdays. And the Israeli cabinet always met on Sunday, which meant you were getting ready for the cabinet meeting. And it wasn't unusual to meet people on Sunday mornings and try to influence the cabinet meeting, or to go up to Jerusalem on Sunday and get a read-out on the cabinet.

Q: You know, you're saying something that I find very interesting, because here are two sovereign nations, and you're saying that the cabinet meeting is going to take place. In other words, we sound like a participatory body in the cabinet meeting, not because of a particular crisis, but sort of as a standard way. Was it this sort of relationship?

VELIOTES: Well, there were always issues that had an impact, as we saw it, on us. There were always U.N. votes. Will there be new settlements? Always something. How about most-favored-nation treatment for Romania? Would they let the Jews out? Later on, that became the problem with the Russians. The American-Israeli relationship is unique, so that unless you participated in it on the ground in Israel, it's very difficult to comprehend. There is a very symbiotic relationship there. The Israeli society is so open that it's a miracle they were or are ever able to keep any military secrets. And they can, or at least they used to. There are so many pressure points in the political system. Two or three correspondents, writing in different newspapers, can actually focus public and political interest in such a way that you'll have a discussion in a cabinet meeting, or possibly a decision.

Q: Including correspondents from, say, the New York Times or the Washington Post?

VELIOTES: No. You have to understand that there are three things that interest the Israelis. One, Israel and their own security. Two, beyond that, the state of world Jewry -- in Russia and wherever. But anything outside of that, let's call it the Israeli-centric or Jewish-centric issues, the only other issue is the United States. What are they thinking in the United States? What are they saying in the United States? The Kol Israel, English-language morning program is full of the United States. So are their newspapers, front page stories from the columnists. The best assignment, the most important assignment you can get is as an Israeli journalist here. You've got to understand that. And then, of course, the interrelationships amongst American Jews and the Israeli Jewish population. The political relationships here. And the Israelis are always trying to influence our body politic. I mean, it's rather silly to talk about the fact that you don't intervene -- you always intervene. We try to do it there; they try to do it here.

As a matter of fact, Joyce Starr, who used to be in the White House and is currently an independent consultant, has written a book, that is supposed to be coming out in the next few months, on the American-Israeli relationship. And a number of us have talked to her about it.

So, against that backdrop, it's not unusual. Also, as deputy chief of mission, one of my jobs was briefing Americans who were in Israel, organized groups that wanted to come in -- thirty, forty -- we had a big conference room; they'd come in and we'd talk. Always meeting with American Jewish leaders, not to mention the congressional delegations who would go to Israel, as Mecca, before elections, to get support.

I've seen it from both sides, from the Washington side and the Israeli side, and you can't really appreciate it until you live it on the Israeli side. That's why it's good to get Sam Lewis and Peter Jessup talking about these things.

Q: So you arrived and you found you were completely immersed.

VELIOTES: Immediately.

Q: Let me ask one question before we move on to developments. I have heard, from others who have served in Israel, that the Israelis, particularly at the very beginning, are looking at you very closely: Are you a hundred percent with us? If you're not a hundred percent with us, therefore you're against us.

VELIOTES: Have you ever spoken to Walter Smith? You should. Walter was political counselor when I arrived, and Walter was convinced there was a big black book up in Jerusalem, an enormous ledger, and the Israelis made up their minds whether you were a good guy or a bad guy, and you were entered into that ledger. If you were a bad guy, you'd never get off. If you were a good guy, they gave you a lot of leeway. You could move, but even then, it was difficult. Yes, they look at you, they talk to you.

Q: Were you sort of ready for this, and did you feel you were being judged all the time? And was this an inhibition? After all, there are American interests and Israeli interests.

VELIOTES: Yes, of course there are. Sure, it's an inhibition. Well, the Jews have developed, over the centuries, ways of dealing with their security and the non-Jewish community. I don't want to generalize this, but clearly my conclusion in Israel was they looked at you and they were trying to judge, you know, could you be seduced? Not in a sexual sense, but could you be intimidated? Could you be bought? I understood that, when I got there, when I felt it, when I saw it. Some of the things, I thought, were a little crude, the kinds of pressure that were put on. But there's no doubt that the Israelis seek to take an American official and turn him or her into an advocate for Israel.

I'll give you an anecdote. I was chargé, and it was after the failure of the second Sinai agreement, which failed in March of 1975. My ambassador had died, I was chargé for six months or so. There was very bad blood between the American government and the Israelis at that time, because after this failure, President Ford announced his reassessment of American policy. The Israeli press was vying with itself on who could describe Kissinger as the greater villain. You heard and read things, openly stated, that he was the greatest traitor to the Jewish race since Josephus, which takes you back to the Zealots' revolt.

Q: Titus and all that sort of thing.

VELIOTES: Josephus was a great guerilla commander who finally gave in to the Romans, became a Roman citizen, went to Rome, and wrote the history of the Jewish wars. He's known as a great traitor, this kind of stuff. Well, one day I was called by the Foreign Ministry to come to Jerusalem -- a very serious problem. So I went up there, and met with my friend, Eppie Evron, who was then, I think, running the Foreign Ministry. He had the title of director, or deputy director, but in any event, he was the number-one guy for the Americans, working with Foreign Minister Allon. And he said the foreign minister had asked that he call me in to discuss this very important problem. It was all about criticism of Israel in high places in the United States, that somehow was stimulated by the reporting from the embassy, and how the secretary of state always calls the Israeli ambassador and complains. We were going around and around, and finally I said, "Wait a minute. You say this happens often."

He said, "Yes, sometimes daily."

And I said, "Well, we submit a daily press summary, and it's one of the basic reporting tools for the embassy and for Washington. We have a brilliant young girl who comes in, about five in the morning, she assembles it all, and we tell her the five or six subjects that we're interested in. And, of course, American-Israeli relations are very high on the list. So we send in that summary every day, by telegram, and I have no doubt that it goes right to the secretary of state."

And he said, "Well, I guess that's it." And he hemmed and hawed.

And I said, "Hey, you're not telling me I'm to censor the Israeli Times? I'm to censor your press so my secretary of state...?"

So he said, "Well, Nick, it's not that."

But then this man made very clear to me, he said, "But, you know, your job here is to explain us to Washington. You've got to explain why we do the things we do."

And what he was saying was: You've got to explain why we should not be held to the same standards as others.

And I said to him, "Look, I think I'm as sympathetic as anyone can be, but I really can't accept that my job here is to explain you to Washington. That's part of my job. The other part of my job is to try to convince you to support American policies. I'm sorry..."

But that's the kind of feeling that you get there.

Q: Well, examining this, because I think this is extremely important, particularly in Tel Aviv, as our embassy, more than anywhere else that I can think of...

VELIOTES: Doesn't exist anywhere else.

Q: When you arrived, you came out of NEA, but you had not been an Arab specialist.

VELIOTES: Yes, in those days, that was very important.

Q: How did you find the embassy? Did you find it broken down? Were you kind of on watch-out, to find whether you had zealots or anti-zealots?

VELIOTES: No, I could find out simply by talking to them. I had a terrific staff.

Walter Smith was political counselor, a man who could not have been more sympathetic to the Israelis. But he knew them well; he was an extremely shrewd judge and was always a step ahead of them. He really understood. But Walter, as political counselor, was a first class officer; he knew what his job was.

The top man in internal reporting was an American Jew called John Hirsch, who was a Hebrew speaker, probably the best political reporter, internal, I've run into. Now John was not unsympathetic to Israel, my God. But, again, he really understood. He knew what our objectives were, and we had no problems.

You did have a few problems on the periphery, but nothing that was what I would consider in the guts of the operation.

My military attachés were top-flight people. Sure, they were sympathetic to the Israeli army, but they knew what we were doing as a government.

Peter Jessup was the station chief. Who could have been better than he on these things?

So I never had that feeling.

Q: You came in and you felt here was a united embassy.

VELIOTES: Oh, yes, but the embassy was suffering from what always happens when an ambassador is gone for a long time. The chargé, no matter how good he is, simply is not the ambassador. And everyone knows that. And when I came, they realized that I wasn't the ambassador, but they also realized that I was going to be the top career guy.

Q: Had Keating been named when you...?

VELIOTES: Yes, sure.

Q: When did he arrive?

VELIOTES: Sometime in August, as I recall.

Q: Could you describe Kenneth Keating and his method of operation.

VELIOTES: Kenneth Keating should not be remembered as a practiced diplomatist, but as an American who spent over forty years in public life, at every level, including the judiciary, and never had a blemish on his name.

Q: Speaking in 1990, this is almost a unique eulogy.

VELIOTES: This man was a man that I really respected. Now he had his quirks; he was in his mid-seventies; he had a weak heart; he got married again. He suffered from what I call the congressional disease of sometimes confusing policy with the press release. But as a career officer in a position like that, I couldn't have asked for a better political ambassador.

Q: How well was he plugged-in to the Israelis? Was he used, or did he use them?

VELIOTES: They remembered him as an extremely sympathetic senator from New York who had been to Israel a half a dozen times, at least, before he got there. You've got to understand, he was a pretty shrewd guy. You don't live as long as Ken Keating did and spend all that time in public life without understanding that there are people who are going to try to use you. He understood that. I thought he had remarkable balance on this. I used to draft most of his telegrams, including his first-person telegrams. I tried to understand his style, and I did it.

Q: For the record, what's the difference between a regular telegram and a first-person telegram?

VELIOTES: Well, every telegram that comes from an embassy is signed with the ambassador's name. A first-person telegram is one in which the ambassador speaks in the first-person singular: "I believe this..." "When I said to the prime minister..."

He would always sign the cables, but he was a very cautious man, and even though he and I had a terrific relationship, the name on the bottom of that cable was "Keating," not "Veliotos." So I would go over them. I must admit, this was rather onerous after a while. After working all goddamn day, I'd go over at night and sit there as he went over the cables till midnight or whenever.

But, no, he knew what he was doing.

Q: Well, I wonder, then, if we could move to the developments, because this was an extremely important period. You arrived; a new ambassador was on the job; you had not been there too long, and you're now moving into the fall of 1973. Were you getting any intimations of disquiet from either Syria or Egypt, or from Washington?

VELIOTES: Yes, Washington. But you always had disquiet out there. Something was always happening, as I mentioned to you. And the Israelis, even though they were in euphoria, there was a certain nervousness -- terrorism going on. The Israelis were zapping suspected terrorists overseas. They made a horrible mistake and murdered an innocent man in Norway. These things were always happening there.

I should say this about the Israelis, too. They'd love to have you agree with them, but if you don't agree with them, they want you to speak up. The Israelis' national pastime is debating and arguing. And it's not a sign of disrespect to have a good, solid argument with them. As a matter of fact, they respect you for it if they know where you stand. But they want to make sure you're not anti-Semitic, that you're not uncomfortable around Jews. They pick this up. Blacks pick it up. People pick it up.

There was an election that was due later that year, so we were focusing-in on the party platforms and arguing why the Labor Party should not support settlement in their platform. You had the first signs of disaffected Oriental Jews, the creation of something called the Black Panther Party, and, for the first time, the Sephardics were going to be part of this political process.

Q: These are the ones mainly from the Arab world.

VELIOTES: The Arab countries. At that time, a book came out, Who Rules Israel?, and 99.9 percent of the people were of European origin.

Q: Ashkenazi.

VELIOTES: Seventy-three was the twenty-fifth anniversary of Israel. Life put out a special edition. On the front cover was an attractive, young Israeli tanker, later killed in the '73 War. But, you know, it was all reinforcement of: things aren't perfect, but things are a hell of a lot better than we ever thought. No hurry. Sadat offers a partial deal in the Sinai; Golda Meir turns it down. The Rogers Plan has come and gone, but how to get a comprehensive peace?

Well, people are wondering. They start to hear it from Washington. We're moving towards October. What's going on? We're picking up signs that the Egyptians, in particular, are engaging in warlike actions -- mobilizations and things. The Israeli answer is: "It's all routine. You Americans, don't tell us what's happening. We know. We live next to them. Don't worry about it. We've got it taped. Everything under control."

Well, the questions from Washington become more insistent, in the last two weeks of September, as I recall. And as we get near the end of September and into early October, there are virtually open lines between the attachés and Peter Jessup and his people. And the Israelis are going on.

A few days before October 6, the day the Egyptians and Syrians launched their attack, one of our guys went in to see military intelligence. And instead of getting the usual, the Israelis said, "What do you think of this?" All the alarm bells went off. Contrary to popular belief, our guys saw something coming, but we were so mesmerized by the myth of Israeli intelligence invincibility that we never...

Q: I think everyone, anywhere, who followed this, thought that the Israelis were into everything. Also, did you find, say, from our reporting from Cairo and from Damascus, too, they were kind of asking what does Israeli intelligence think about what's happening?

VELIOTES: Well, that's implied. After all, in '67, the Israeli intelligence was so terrific, it allowed the Israeli army to win a terrific victory over the Arabs.

But the Israelis got complacent. You know, it's your mindset, it's how you interpret the intelligence that you have that is important. Look at Pearl Harbor '41, the famous book on that subject. So I think that was a large part of it -- the Israeli overconfidence.

So much so, that even a few days before the outbreak of war, Moshe Dayan refused to mobilize the Israeli army. By the time they realized what was going to happen, you really couldn't launch preemptive strikes. It was too late to stop it.

Q: Can you describe how you and the embassy responded at the time of the attack, and what you were doing. Because what we're trying to do in this is to get a feel for not only what happened and the chronological record, but also how we react. How does an embassy under fire work?

VELIOTES: On the day of October 6, which was Yom Kippur, I received an early-morning phone call that the ambassador and I were requested to come see the prime minister, in Tel Aviv. Now even though it was Yom Kippur, we had our special car window plaques which would allow us to move.

Q: This is because, normally, on a religious holiday...

VELIOTES: On that holiday you're not supposed to be in a car. Tel Aviv was the tipoff, because that was the center of the Israeli armed services. And that's when we learned that the Israelis knew that the attack was coming. They asked us to get to the Russians, get to the Arabs and tell them the Israelis know, don't do it, it'll be a war that'll go badly.

There was a funny element as we were doing our telegram on this subject. I called the Israeli desk officer, Heywood Stackhouse, who was at home, and I said, "Hey, wake up, there's going to be war."

He said, "Don't talk any more, this is an open line!"

I said, "Hey, it doesn't make any difference. Wake up Sisco, wake up Atherton, someone better wake up the secretary. You'll have a telegram by the time you get back. Mrs. Meir says the Egyptians and Syrians are going to attack this afternoon. She wants us to stop them, work with the Russians."

As I'm telling him this, he's worrying about security, and I'm shouting over, "It doesn't make any goddamn difference."

Q: Anybody who knows, knows anyway.

VELIOTES: "They know. Get in. Hey, get in!"

I'm not quite sure what happened on the Washington side after that, but then the war started. For several days we were in the dark. It's all well documented. There was an aborted air raid. And people didn't really know how close it had come up in the north.

Q: This was an air raid on Jerusalem.

VELIOTES: No, no, on Tel Aviv. Apparently some Egyptian plane got within a hundred miles or something. But there was a very serious concern as to what was happening, and we didn't really know. The Israeli news coverage was distorted, to some extent deliberately so, by the military. There were three very hairy days.

On the morning of the 9th of October, the ambassador and I went to see the foreign minister, who was also deputy prime minister, again in Tel Aviv, early in the morning. And he said, "We stopped them in the north."

And that's when the Israelis gave us their shopping list for resupply. Then, of course, the Russians resupplied, and then we started our airlift. As often happens, the best laid plans, none of the equipment that the Air Force flew in worked. So Bill Foresman, our air attaché, was running that damned airlift with phones and walkie talkies for days.

Q: This is the usual thing, that the communications equipment doesn't...

VELIOTES: Things go wrong. And our attachés did a fantastic job. Then clearly the focus was on the south. We did not go down. It was killing the ambassador not to go down. You know, I mean, after all... [tape ended] ...attachés went down, took a look and then saw what the Israelis were up to. Then we were able to go down freely, you know. I didn't go, my job wasn't there, but our air attachés went, once the Israelis cracked across the Canal the other way. Then you worked continuously. You had people calling you from everywhere. In a fast-moving situation, the telegrams only tell part of the story.

Q: With telephone calls, the lines are open.

VELIOTES: And you can't record telephones; you can't keep it. That's why if people say, Well, what are you hiding?, well, you're not hiding anything, it's just that you frankly are more concerned about doing your job and doing it right than the historical record. If you know anything about Henry Kissinger's operating style, it was utterly maddening to be at an overseas' post in the middle of important issues at that time, and particularly in Israel, where you began to believe that he trusted the Israelis, but he didn't trust the Americans.

Q: I've gotten this thing where you could substitute the names of the Soviets, particularly Dobrynin, the ambassador, as dealing with the Russians, as compared to the American representatives.

VELIOTES: We knew we weren't getting information. And this was difficult, very difficult. It became more so as the time went on. I mean, in the middle of the war and everything, well, who cared? We were trying to get a little bit of sleep and to reassure a hell of a lot of Americans who were stuck. You know, the kinds of things you do which don't get headlines.

Q: One of the things I would like to ask, as a former consular officer (I was in Athens at the time), your embassy must have been absolutely deluged with inquiries about the welfare and whereabouts of Americans and also of Israelis with relatives in America.

VELIOTES: The system bogged down, and all we could say to them was, "Look, we don't have the time. We'll let you know if anyone's hurt. But, apart from that, we can't reassure you that those 300,000 Americans are safe."

There were some very funny stories. The embassy is right down in the red-light district. There were some restaurants around there and bars on Hayarkon Street that were owned by Greek Jews, and you'd always hear bouzouki music as you walked down in the sun at lunch. Well, at night, you had a blackout, and everything was pitch black. And, boy, really black; the Israelis, you know, this was serious stuff. If you had to move your car, you would have just a little circle of light with your car, and flashlights, but you had them painted dark blue or black, with little pinpoints of light. Well, in Israel at night, one of the ways that the prostitutes advertise is by flashing the flashlights on the side of the roads. Billy Foresman and I had to get out to the ambassador this one night. It was about the third day of the war. And we finally typed up this massive list of things the Israelis wanted. And I'd had the full reporting cable. You know, it takes you all day to do that stuff. You get the quick report in and say, "Details follow." And you do a lot on the phone. It was about midnight, and Billy and I went out. Here's this former fighter pilot and me. Well, I've got a form of night blindness; I don't see well at night. It's a problem when I drive on the highway; I really have to concentrate. And you can imagine how that was exacerbated, walking out into this pitch black place. Well, I learned at that moment that that was why Billy Foresman was no longer a fighter pilot. We walked out and we were both blind. And we had to get to one of our cars to drive out to the ambassador's house. Just as we were standing there, adjusting to the dark and stumbling around, a couple of little pinpoints of flashlights went off. It was the local prostitutes; this is the way they work. So we hailed them, and they escorted us over to our cars.

Q: So this was the first step in getting American aid to Israel.

VELIOTES: Getting to the car so we could go out. It was really funny.

Q: Let me ask a question about this American aid, because later on, talking to people, particularly in the American military, there was tremendous resentment, on purely professional grounds, that our NATO stocks were badly depleted in order to help Israel. And, professionally, this is a sore that still rankles with some people. How did you and our military attachés feel about these requests?

VELIOTES: Well, I think that, yes, they were onerous, but that showed you the parlous state of the reserves in NATO because of the drain of Vietnam. I mean, that really was the issue. They got mad at the Israelis; the real problem for the Central European front was Vietnam, where everything was. Our attachés, you're talking about colonels here, I'm not sure that they were focusing in on the great big picture. They may have. Anyway, their job was to accurately present the case.

As it turned out, although you had a lot of panic in the short run -- a lot of EL AL airplanes converting and bringing... -- I think the Israelis needed heavy equipment less than we initially thought, because of their own reserves. They lost a hell of a lot. More than the equipment itself, what they needed and what we wanted to convey was the commitment.

You have to understand this against the backdrop of what the Soviets were doing in Syria, in particular. The Soviets were resupplying the Syrians at an incredible rate. And that was when I learned how many new tanks the Soviets had sitting around the Soviet Union. It was remarkable! We scraped to get 50 or so; I think the Russians resupplied the 2,000 Syrian tanks in several months -- ships coming in and all of this.

And we had another reason for wanting to do it, because the Israelis were so concerned, that they were threatening to shoot-up the Russian planes as they came in.

Now the only one thing that I begrudged at that time frame, the lack of communication from Washington, was when my attachés came in to see me with one of these interminable military messages, 60 paragraphs, and it was down in paragraph 45 that we learned the 82nd Airborne had been put on war alert for the Middle East, and that there was a nuclear alert. Now I had to learn this...

Q: Sort of an ordinary procurement...

VELIOTES: That's right. Why the hell couldn't Kissinger have passed the word to us to go tell the Israelis? But for me to reassure our people, I picked up the phone and I called Roy Atherton and said, "What the hell's wrong with you guys in Washington?"

He said, "What do you mean?"

I said, "Well, goddamn it, I gather we're on a nuclear alert and you've got the 82nd Airborne on alert to come here. I assume you've told the Israelis. What about the Americans? We are responsible for the welfare of Americans in this place. What are we supposed to do?" I mean, you can't just duck it, because this is an important part of our responsibility.

Q: This, of course, is one of the problems that comes across when you try to deal at the very top. There are an awful lot of policy considerations that have to be carried out by the people on the ground.

VELIOTES: Well, if the Israeli foreign minister had called me and said, What's this about the 82nd Airborne?, I would have felt like an absolute fool. I'm not sure he ever would have talked to me again.

Q: Speaking about nuclear alert, what was our perception of the nuclear capabilities of the Israelis at that time? And was there a possibility, when things were really looking dark, that sort of an Armageddon complex or a Masada complex might have taken place?

VELIOTES: I think we felt that the Israelis had a nuclear device at that time, but it was a rather crude one; it would probably have to be dropped out of a C-130. That was possible to do. But, you know, the distances in the Middle East are such...how do you control fallout from a dirty bomb? I mean, would they kill themselves? And they were far from that.

They say, though, that Golda Meir...this is still in controversy, and when I was in Israel, I never heard it, but, later, people say that the military did get from her the beginning of a nuclear alert. But I've never really seen that confirmed. And while I was there, the only nuclear alert was the one we went through. And, of course, we claim we responded to the Soviets putting their airborne on alert.

So, from then on out, from October 6, 1973, literally until the time I left, which was in the fall of '75, we were working our way through, I'd say, three things.

One, the aftermath of the war, on the ground. And that meant several negotiating attempts by Henry Kissinger. Three of the four were successful. The last major successful negotiation was in November of '75, with the so-called Second Sinai Agreement, which set the stage for Carter and Camp David a couple of years later.

The second was working out this new relationship with Israel, bilaterally. At that time, starting with a 2.2-billion-dollar aid package right after the war, we became, literally, Israel's sole support -- military and economic aid. And people forget that when people like Ariel Sharon posture and rail against us as not caring about Israel's security, we did it. The Israeli army, we paid for, we equipped. And we're still paying for it, and we're still paying for the economic impact of the '73 War, and never have we ever suggested that the Israeli army should stack arms.

Well, this was new, this relationship of one-sided dependence upon us. And it was in that time frame that the Israelis began to get quite nervous with their perception in the United States of Israel as a country to be supported, first, because of Jewish pressure, but on moral grounds, what it represented. They began to worry about how will that, after all, keep this relationship going? And it was at that time that the Israelis started to talk about a strategic agreement, a NATO-type agreement between Israel and the United States, which led us up to the Reagan years.

The third factor, as an embassy, was coping with the enormously increased desire of Israelis to emigrate to the United States.

Q: Could we talk about this, because I think this is something that sort of gets swept under the rug or something. Emigration is something that's sort of out there, but it's...

VELIOTES: It was overwhelming. We had to redesign our consular section to accommodate it. We had to enhance the staff. And I think they're still doing this; they're still under great pressure.

It also was the first time I'm aware of, of a major demonstration against the Americans by Israelis, led by Rabbi Kahane. You began to get the real emergence of the right wing.

Q: This is the Jewish Defense League, isn't it?

VELIOTES: Yes, transported to Israel. We almost had a major disaster when these people came screaming and yelling up against our plate glass windows. The disaster would have been if the windows had broken, they would have lacerated dozens of young people. And you'll go to the embassy today and it looks like the same fortress that all other embassies in the Middle East look like, which is too bad.

Q: What were they demonstrating about?

VELIOTES: What they saw as American pressure to force them to give back some land to the Arabs and to make peace. These were the zealots; these were the people who wanted to keep every inch. These were the people who waited at the entry to Jerusalem and, when Kissinger came by, all stood and in unison gave him the finger. Many of them were Americans.

Those forces that were unleashed at that time led to the victory of Menachem Begin in 1977, which has given you thirteen years in Israel of right-wing or center-right-wing government.

Q: During the war, obviously you were up to your neck in just staying afloat, but were you getting any impression, at the level you were dealing with, that there was panic on the part of the Israelis? How professional were they?

VELIOTES: No, I'll tell you, there wasn't panic on the part of the general Israeli public, because, fortunately, the general Israeli public didn't know how bad things were in the north.

Q: Yes, the Syrians were very close to a breakthrough there.

VELIOTES: And there was real heroism up there, of an incredible kind, that stopped them. Now by the time the Israelis began to understand (we're only talking about 72 hours), that deadly threat had passed. And the focus went back to the Sinai.

Q: Where there was some room for maneuver, too.

VELIOTES: Room for maneuver. I remember, one day, Israel's leading gossip columnist (she'd die if I used that phrase) was in the embassy, and I was going down the elevator with her. And as she got off the elevator, she looked at me and said, "Look south." And she left. Three or four days later, the Israelis broke across the Canal. Which means a lot of people knew that was happening.

No, I think what happened in Israel was not in the first few days; what happened in Israel was in the weeks and months that followed.

One American Jewish friend of mine, who was a social psychologist, was on a sabbatical. And he came to see me, and as he was talking, he started to cry, because he had come to Israel with such high hopes. It was that period of euphoria that I described to you. And he said he couldn't take it, because the society had suffered a collective nervous breakdown, and he had to leave.

And it had. The casualty figures, for a little country, were just tremendous. I forget, 3,000 killed? At that time, Israel was three million people. Seventy times three, that would have been the equivalent of 210,000 Americans killed in two and a half weeks. The country went into mourning. There were no parties. There was no nothing. Every Israeli family was touched with tragedy.

Q: So, despite the fact that, militarily...

VELIOTES: It was a great victory. It was a great victory over incredible odds.

Q: But this...

VELIOTES: It destroyed Golda Meir, number one. It put Moshe Dayan's career into an eclipse. You had a reshuffle. You had a new government. The major military figures of the time went off to pasture. I think the head of military intelligence died of a heart attack shortly thereafter. And this was a new Israel that was bewildered, felt betrayed by its own people, had lost its sense of invulnerability. It was a vulnerable Israel again. And you had the rise of the right wing. And the only good thing that's happened since that time was Camp David and Jimmy Carter.

Q: Mr. Ambassador, I wonder if you could comment about how you at the embassy felt, and reflections from the Israelis, about the growing dependence of Israel on the United States. Was this of concern to those of you who were dealing with the problem right there? And how about with the Israelis?

VELIOTES: In the aftermath of the October War?

Q: Yes.

VELIOTES: Of course it was a major concern of the Israelis. Dependence doesn't happen in a vacuum, and when we think of dependence we often think of military security, but if you take a look at the Israel that emerged after the October War, the one thing that will strike you is the rapid escalation of the inflation rate. Israel's feet of clay, economically, were exposed by this war -- they really had no reserves -- and their dependence on foreign aid, primarily American. But in the period before the October War, this foreign aid was, I think, primarily through Israeli bonds and things like that, with some direct government-to-government aid. After the October War, the Israeli economy was in a shambles, emigration rates were zooming. We had to redesign our consulate at least twice in order to accommodate the pressures.

Q: People going to the United States.

VELIOTES: Trying to get out. Then, in that context, there was the total dependence of Israel for its well being, and, frankly, economic survival, on American aid grants. That's what happened, and this was of great concern to the Israelis, who are a very independent people. And I think there is a direct relationship between what happened in that time frame, during the seventies, and the increasing realization of the Israelis of their dependence upon the United States, and the Israeli policy of seeking to change the terms of the relationship from one of partners in peace, American moral commitment to Israel, things like this, to Israel's strategic importance to the United States. The Israelis believed that they had to have something much more tangible to offer the American Congress, and, through them, the American people, of Israel's importance to the United States, in exchange for these enormous military and economic aid programs each year. So all of these are linked.

Q: This is a personal note, but I've always felt our relationship to Israel has been one like the definition of a wife: "Someone who will stand by you in the time of trouble that you never would have experienced if you hadn't been married." Trying to go back to that time, how did the embassy and you yourself view the strategic importance of Israel?

VELIOTES: Well, at the time when we were in Israel, there was no question of Israel being America's major strategic partner in the Middle East for the purposes of fighting the Russians. The aim was to make sure that Israel was strong enough to protect itself, and so strong that the Arabs would realize the folly of seeking to deal with Israel militarily. And this, Israel's preponderant military strength, was a major component of American peace policy in the area. It was not only to make sure Israel could protect itself and have confidence in itself and have confidence in us, but the reverse of this was the Arabs would see the folly of refusing to negotiate peace with Israel. That was it. Well, that's very much, that's important.

Israel as a strategic asset, you began to hear more and more during the Carter administration. But, of course, those were the years of Camp David and the elimination of a major threat to Israeli security -- the peace with Egypt.

I was in Washington during the end of the Ford administration and the beginning of the Carter administration, in senior positions. I came back from Israel, and, after a stint in the Personnel Office, I became deputy director of the Policy Planning staff, with responsibility for the Middle East, and then I became deputy assistant secretary for Arab-Israeli Affairs.

Now you saw the progression here, but the Carter administration wasn't about to change the basic terms of our relationship with Israel -- we were partners in peace, and those things that I said earlier. But the Israelis kept seeking to get a recognized public strategic relationship, again for the reasons I said earlier. It wasn't until the Reagan administration that they succeeded in this.

Q: Are we talking about a perception or, you might say, a justification?

VELIOTES: A justification. You're asking for my personal view, and I would say this was the view, unanimously, of the professional civilian and uniformed military people who worked in this area. There were some political appointees who disagreed on this; nevertheless, this became the policy of the Reagan administration.

It had no relevance to the threats facing the United States. Indeed, the biggest problem we had was trying to figure out how to explain the policy. The Israelis wanted us to be their partner against Syria, perhaps against Iraq. We figured, well, hell, Syria and Iraq are not strategic threats, they're regional problems. The only one strategic problem we had was the Russians, so where could the Israelis be helpful with the Russians? And we spent a lot of time, a disproportionate amount of time, trying to come up with a justification where Israel could really be an American strategic ally.

The irony of that situation is that when we finally did have a major crisis in the Gulf area, Israel was irrelevant to it.

Q: We're now talking about November, 1990, with Iraq having taken over Kuwait.

VELIOTES: Right. It was a domestic policy in this country, and very important in Israel -- Begin used it to improve his political position. And, by the way, it was deliberately designed by the Israeli Likud and by those political appointees in our government, under Reagan, to subsume the Palestinian problem and Arab-Israel problem under this strategic alliance. It was very simple, that if Israel is such a strong, important strategic ally in the area, well, then, you're not going to waste your time with secondary and tertiary issues such as the problems of the occupied territories. However, even when you came up with justifications and everything, none of it really made any sense.

And you had to come up with exercises. I mean, you can't have policy and a strategic relationship without exercises, so they came up with some marginal things they could do. In order to sort of balance the exercises, we had been carrying out real live military exercises with the Jordanians and the Egyptians, looking to a move to the Gulf, and then, if you remember, the famous Saudi AWACs fight during 1981 -- these were looking at the real world.

Q: We were then thinking more in terms of Iran, but in many ways Iran, Iraq, Russia...

VELIOTES: Anyone who threatened the Gulf, which is a strategic interest of the United States. But, even then, we were thinking of that, and we were playing this charade with the Israelis over here, for domestic political purposes and for Israeli political purposes, as we were preparing, on the other hand, for such emergencies as were there in August of 1990.

Q: Well, in the seventies, when you were in Tel Aviv, as this moved, was there a feeling within the embassy that, well, this is all very nice, but this is in many ways peripheral to American interests? Or was it one of these things where it was best to keep your mouth shut?

VELIOTES: Well, in the seventies, in the embassy in Israel, our policy was very clear. It was the one I enunciated earlier: the basis of our relationship with Israel was partnership for peace in the area. And Israel was also a beacon of representative government and intellectual freedom. Our support for Israel, militarily, was designed to protect Israel and also to encourage the Arabs to go for peace. There were no contradictions. In '73, while I was there in the embassy, and like, I think, everyone else in the U.S. government, we wanted the Israelis not to be overrun. So there were no problems at that point. The problems came in the eighties.

Q: At that time, was there a concern about the religious fundamentalists in Israel and a possible change in the texture as more sort of native-born or area-born Israelis became more dominant?

VELIOTES: In the early seventies, the, until that time politically quiescent, Sephardic community (Jews of non-European origin, called Oriental Jews, Sephardim) first began to manifest itself politically. The elections of 1973 had to be postponed because of the war, and you had a radical Sephardic Party come up then. Sephardic nationalism, or Sephardic political awareness, later, in the coming years, turned into support for the Likud, which was the hardest line, particularly in the anti, post-73 area. Sure, you could see that coming.

Q: How about contacts with the Likud?

VELIOTES: Well, you had contacts with them, but not very many. Begin was sort of a joke in Israeli political life; he was considered rather a fringe type. There was a shock when he was elected in '77. Everyone assumed it was because of the self-destruction of the Labor Party, and that obviously had a role to play. But the success of the Likud in the last twelve years suggests a major realignment of forces, with the Oriental Jews being very supportive of the right wing. You've always had religious problems in Israel -- we're talking now about Jewish religious problems -- you've always had extremists, you've always had a split in the two communities. When we were in Israel, a major intermarriage event was an Ashkenazi and a Sephardic Jew. So that exists.

Q: How about the issue, as you all saw it in Tel Aviv, of you going to Jerusalem as a capital?

VELIOTES: It wasn't a problem in a policy sense, because we and the Israelis were very careful about American sensitivities, so we always had our meetings in West Jerusalem. There has never been an American position that the capital of Israel should not be West Jerusalem. Our reservations have always been on the claim of Jerusalem as an undivided city, with Israel representing all of it as its capital. So this did not give us any real problems.

Q: Kissinger was certainly at his height at that time. How did you all see Kissinger's operation, and also how did he, you might say, treat the embassy?

VELIOTES: Well, of course, you know, Henry Kissinger in those days was larger than life. And we were all supportive of what he was trying to do, which was to make a virtue out of necessity and make something good happen out of tragedy. And, indeed, he did set the groundwork for Jimmy Carter's later successes. And on the Syrian-Israeli border, up on the Golan, I don't believe there have been violations, or, if there have been, very damn few, since 1974. That's sixteen years now, so I'd say he did a pretty good job. And he started the process whereby Israel and Egypt made peace.

He was a very complicated person, obsessed with secrecy. Working in the Middle East, you learn to be obsessed with secrecy, because so much can leak. Looking at it, though, from the point of view of the embassy as a contributor, Henry did not use us. His obsession with secrecy with respect to Israel was to exclude the embassy. And while he was conducting active oral and other types of negotiations with the Israelis, through the ambassador here, Simcha Dinitz, he did not understand that he was losing a resource.

Let me give you an example. I was the senior career officer there, and the Israelis sort of looked to me as the guy who was running things in the embassy, although I had this marvelous ambassador, Ken Keating; still, realities of the situation there. During his frequent visits, Kissinger had this very unattractive habit of cutting you down in public in front of foreigners. And, frankly, in order to retain credibility with the Israelis, I had to react in some way to indicate I wasn't irrelevant and I wasn't being pushed around, or the Israelis would figure: Why deal with this guy? And he should have thought of things like this. As a matter of fact, I sometimes felt I was being smuggled into the meetings with the Israelis. Henry would have ten people in his entourage.

When everything's going fine, there are no problems. But when it breaks down is when things get tough. I'll give you an example. In 1974, in March, Henry Kissinger never once talked to us, never once asked for any suggestions. Had he asked for suggestions, we would have argued the next step would have been with Jordan, because we thought the Israeli government would have been prepared to make a gesture, and, even though the Jordanians were saying no, no, no, no, we had reason to believe the Jordanians would in the final analysis accept this gesture. But he'd already made his own agreements with the Egyptians, I learned later, to move ahead on a second Sinai Agreement. In March of '75, you'd had Kilometer 101, Sinai One, the Golan. He ignored this front, the Jordanian front, and went back to Egypt. It was March. He never once asked our view as to whether it was doable with the Israelis, what were the factors that were working on the Israelis. He cut us off every substantive telegram. All the exchanges took place in Washington, so the Israeli government knew things that the embassy did not; a small group of people in U.S. government knew things.

Q: Well, where was he getting his sensitivity to what the Israelis wanted?

VELIOTES: I don't know.

Q: Was this purely on his...

VELIOTES: You've got to understand the enormous arrogance and conceit of this man, and his paranoia, which I think clouded his judgment.

So we learned, almost by mistake, that Henry Kissinger was going to come back to the Middle East to make a try for a second Sinai Agreement. March of '75, Vietnam is collapsing; obviously, he wanted a success.

One day, I asked this remarkable chief of the political section, John Hirsch, to bring the translations of all the Friday Hebrew papers, which are like Sunday papers, and he and I sat down and analyzed them. We could see clear signs of the Israeli position hardening, so we said, okay, let's have a few discussions with people, then let's get together later today and write a telegram. We wrote a telegram (as I recall, I was chargé at the time), and I remember starting it out: "We have been told nothing. We don't know really whether the secretary is coming or, if he's coming, what he really hopes to accomplish. But if the aim is to come soon and accomplish a second agreement that would require the Israelis to make certain concessions, our analysis is the Israeli position has hardened in the past week or so, and unless you know something we don't know," (I think I used those words) "it's highly unlikely that there will be success in this mission." We sent this in.

Henry came out. He failed.

Larry Eagleburger, or someone, gave a backgrounder, I think it was Larry, in which he blamed the embassy for failing to keep the Department informed of significant developments in Israel. And by the time the press got back to the United States and filed, to follow up that initial story, Kissinger was spreading blame all over the embassy.

So much so that the head of the CIA sent the station chief a special message sort of saying, "Don't tell the chargé or the ambassador, but you start reporting politically on this."

My station chief, a remarkable guy called Peter Jessup, came to me and showed me his reply, in which he said, "There is no disconnect here. My views were fully reflected in the embassy. Here, we work in a coordinated manner. Let me refer you to such and such, and such and such, and such and such. Review these before you come to the conclusion the embassy wasn't doing its job." It was that kind of thing.

Q: Often, when somebody is playing this secrecy game, and I know it all, and all this, the system usually works around it. In other words, didn't you have moles, or something, in Kissinger's staff?

VELIOTES: It was very hard. Don't forget, you did not have secure phones that really worked. Even today, most secure phones overseas sound like Donald Duck with laryngitis. In those days, you had to place the call hours in advance. And you certainly couldn't do this on the open phone, with everyone listening to you -- the Russians. We didn't care if the Israelis heard it, because they already knew.

Q: They were better informed than you.

VELIOTES: (I think Jim Akins would be a good man to talk to.) I recall a telegram from Jim, who was ambassador in Saudi Arabia at the time, bitterly complaining about the wheel and spoke kind of relationship, that the Department would only tell embassies in the area a very small piece of even what involved their own countries, and yet somehow expected us to be able to do our jobs.

Q: Did you, often as chargé but other times as the chief professional person, have a problem with the rest of the staff, not only, obviously, with yourself, but keeping up, you might say, the professional edge and all when you were being undercut?

VELIOTES: Not at all. We had a remarkable group of people, and they all used their information. You know where we learned what was going on in Washington? From the newspapers, from the newsmen who represented, in those days, identifiable cabinet officers, and from Israeli officials. I'd go up to Jerusalem and say, okay, now what the hell, is this. And they'd tell me. They wanted to use me, of course.

Q: Did you more or less have to level? I mean, did they know that you were cut out?

VELIOTES: Hell, yes. I never played games. I said, "I don't know what the hell's going on, but we better talk. I can't get it from Henry."

About the only thing I used to get from Henry in this time was the continuing complaints from the Department that the Israeli press was mad at him.

Q: Why would he care?

VELIOTES: Well, you know.

Q: I mean, as a practical measure..

VELIOTES: And the poor Israelis would call me in and say, "What are you reporting?"

And I'd say, "Why do you care? What business is it of yours?" These were people that I knew quite well.

(This is the way you talk to the Israelis, by the way, and they talk that way to you.)

And they said, "Because Henry Kissinger is complaining every day to our ambassador."

And so I said, "Well, I thought that was it. Here, I brought you several copies. Here's our week's unclassified review of the Israeli press that we send in every day."

The upshot was, the guy said, "Could you send us one of these every day, too?"

It was a very trying time. A delegation of forty members of Congress, led by Tip O'Neill, came out to Israel. I was chargé at the time, and while I was riding in the car with Tip and Silvio Conte, a leading Republican, the first thing Tip said was, "Is it true what Henry says, that you guys really screwed up and let him down?"

And I said, "Of course not."

Tip said, "That's what I thought." And he turned to Silvio Conte, "See, I told you." And then he said to me, "Would you mind telling our whole delegation what the real story is?"

And I did, I was so goddamned mad.

Q: Of course, for every action there is a counter action. But this must have been, for you, a very difficult time.

VELIOTES: Oh, it was. This is the kind of problem you don't need. When you're in that kind of a war-peace situation -- high stakes, very fast-moving -- what you don't need is lack of contact, meaningfully, with the U.S. government, and, frankly, suspicion.

At the time this was all going on, when Henry was blaming the embassy, I was in Israel defending him against charges by Israelis wherever I went -- vacation in a kibbutz -- that, amongst other things, he was the greatest traitor to the Jewish race since Josephus, and things like this.

No, I didn't like it, but I did my job. Our morale was terrific. Our staffing was great. We did just a great job, particularly under the limitations that we had to suffer.

Q: It's remarkable really.

VELIOTES: Now I'm not the only one who had to go through this, if you talk to other people who were in positions of responsibility.

Q: Well, I talked to George Vest, for example, who found when he was negotiating this treaty, which was just signed yesterday, for the...

VELIOTES: Conventional arms reduction.

Q: Conventional arms reduction, but basically for European peace, that Kissinger was cutting him down with the Russians when he was working as one of the negotiators on this, because he was working on something else and it wasn't his treaty.

VELIOTES: He did this all the time. He did this all the time. The story of the Rogers Plan, when Henry was still in... I'm sure he has good reasons for what he did, but he did undercut you. I don't know if you know the story about George Vest.

Q: No, I don't.

VELIOTES: George Vest was the press spokesman for Henry -- a terrific press spokesman, because everyone respected him; he knew the substance. But Henry Kissinger, as I told you, used to have this habit of humiliating his staff in public. And George Vest went in to him and said, "Henry, if this ever happens again, you find a new press spokesman." I guess Henry didn't believe him -- it happened; George resigned. A man of great, great integrity.

Q: Before we leave Israel on this, how about the nuclear issue, when you were dealing with this?

VELIOTES: The nuclear issue, when I was in Israel, was subsumed. But the nuclear issue has been a part of our relationship with Israel since at least, I'd say, the mid-sixties. And I found a remarkable file in the embassy, detailing the history of American-Israeli relations on the nuclear issue, where the Israelis first claimed it was a textile plant or something else or something else or something else. Interestingly, Jack Kennedy got very, very interested in this and was starting to focus in on the Israeli nuclear issue about the time he got shot. He was beginning to worry about the Middle East and different facets of the Middle East, including Israel.

Q: At the time you were there (again, obviously, this is an unclassified interview), was it more or less accepted at that point that the Israelis had nuclear capability?

VELIOTES: Yes, in '73, '75, I don't remember the analyses now, but it was accepted that they had a nuclear capability. Whether at that time we thought they had a serviceable bomb that could be delivered, I don't know. People used to talk about a bomb on a great big primitive device that would roll out of the back of the C-130, or something like that. But there was no question that Dimona was a nuclear facility, and the purpose of that nuclear facility was to produce atomic weapons, and that they had everything in place to produce those weapons. And you could only assume that some of them had been produced.

Q: At any time, particularly in the very early days of the October War, were you thinking it might go nuclear?

VELIOTES: Not really, because we were being lied to, everyone was being lied to, by the Israelis. You had three very tense days, between the 7th of October and the 9th of October, when the tide shifted up in the Golan. The Israelis were saying, "We're winning," and all of a sudden you found they weren't winning, but they weren't losing. Now there is journalistic interest today, there is someone writing a book on whether or not the Israelis threatened a nuclear option in their negotiations with the United States over resupply, and whether or not Golda Meir ordered the planes to be fitted. I just don't remember. If this was a factor, it wasn't an important factor. And, anyway, this went by so fast. But there is a journalist who believes that this indeed was an option the Israelis were prepared to use. I have no...

Q: It was not something that came up at this time.

VELIOTES: Things were moving too fast. The attack started about sundown, as I recall, on October 6. By the morning of October 9, the Syrians had been stopped in the Golan. So whatever might have gone on, I just don't know. This person claims something did come up; I have no way of corroborating that, or denying it. It wasn't a factor. No one said to me, "If we don't get that early resupply, we're going to nuke 'em." Now whether there were private conversations of any kind, I don't know

Q: Backtracking just a little bit before we continue to discuss the invasion of Lebanon [1982], could you talk a little about the Israeli absorption or whatever you want to call it -- the protectorate which it established in Lebanon? From your experience, how did we react to that?

VELIOTES: Well, the first time I became aware of the Israeli intention to stay on the ground across the Israeli border in southern Lebanon was in 1977, when the Israeli Foreign Minister, Yigal Allon, came to Washington to talk about something called a "good fence." This was described as a sort of Israeli hospitality suite for "good" Lebanese. That presaged the creation -- I believe it had not been done before then -- of the South Lebanese Army, under a renegade Christian in the thinly populated parts of South Lebanon, in which there were Christian pockets. I think that his name was Major Haddad.

Before that time, as I recall, the Israelis would periodically cross the border. But clearly, at this point, they were going to stay there, for security purposes. We made clear that we were opposed to it and that we would not recognize any Israeli extraterritorial rights. But as is often the case with Israel, when it comes to the question of defense against countries still officially at war with Israel, you don't really follow this up. However, in 1978, when the Israelis invaded southern Lebanon, President Carter acted very quickly and was very tough in forcing them out.

Q: Were you at all involved in that period, in 1978?

VELIOTES: Yes, I was Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, with responsibility for Arab-Israeli affairs.

Q: Well, just to get a feel for the situation, when the word came of the Israeli incursion [in 1978], what were we getting from Israel and how quickly did this move up to the White House?

VELIOTES: I would say that it wasn't a major White House issue until the Israelis invaded southern Lebanon. Jimmy Carter wanted them out. At that point people were talking about the Israelis -- and this involved former Prime Minister Begin. [The incursion into southern Lebanon was] one of the first Likud initiatives which they took on the ground, after the elections in 1977. It seemed to be one of the never-ending "final sweeps" to protect the northern border of Israel. Richard Viets, I remember, was Chargé d'Affaires at that time in Tel Aviv. Ezer Weizman, at the time, was Israeli Defense Minister. Viets had some very strong words with him, in part because the Israelis had lied to us. That was when Jimmy Carter stepped in and threatened to cut off aid to Israel unless they left Lebanon. And they left, but only in part. They stayed in what later became the Israeli security zone in southern Lebanon.

Q: So this was the "good neighbor," the "good fence" zone?

VELIOTES: Yes.

Q: In our last interview we covered the beginning of the invasion of Lebanon -- was it in 1981?

VELIOTES: 1982 -- June, 1982.

Q: Haig was still Secretary of State. As I recall it, there was a series of statements from the Israelis like, "We're only going to go so far..." But they kept moving, and it was obvious that the whole idea was to go into Beirut and clean out the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization]. Were we aware of what they were doing or were we always a little bit behind the curve?

VELIOTES: Well, there was no secret as to what Arik Sharon [then Israeli Defense Minister] wanted to do. We had had information on that for a long time. However, that isn't what the Israelis said that they were going to do. Sharon planned to create a Southern Lebanon, from Mt. Lebanon to the South. That would be sort of a condominium between the Christians -- that is, the Maronites -- and the Israelis. This was a wildly impractical scheme because between the so-called "Southern Lebanese Army," which was basically Christian, and Mt. Lebanon, which was the home of the Maronite Christians, there were at least one million Muslims, at least half of whom were Shi'a. We knew that Sharon wanted to solve the Palestinian problem in Beirut. But it was a loony idea that you could kill Palestinian nationalism by force of arms in Beirut, with three million other Palestinians living around them in the Middle East. Even if you could eliminate the leadership, that would just have led to temporary openings in the structure, and the leadership would have been reconstituted elsewhere.

Although we may have had suspicions, the Israelis consistently told us that that wasn't what they wanted to do. They said that they were planning to have a security sweep, like the one that they had had in 1978. And, indeed, they did discover a tremendous amount of weapons in the area. It was to be a 40 kilometer sweep into Lebanon. That, I guess, was the range of the PLO weapon with the longest range, the 130 mm, Russian-made artillery. But that turned out to be a pretext. We saw that when Ambassador Phil Habib, on the President's instructions, brokered a cease-fire between the Syrians and the Israelis. As we saw it, this would be a first step toward a broader cease-fire. Then the Israelis claimed that the Syrians had shot at them, and so they then flanked the Syrians and inflicted a very heavy defeat on them. It turned out that it was true that the Syrians shot at them [the Israelis] because the Israelis continued to move. Later, we were told, with a straight face, by the Prime Minister of Israel, "Aha. We said we'd stop shooting but we didn't say that we'd stay in place."

Q: Oh, my God!

VELIOTES: And this passed for being a precise or even clever comment. It was sheer dishonesty. And they lied their way up to Beirut.

Q: Well, tell me, what was this all about? After all, this involved one of our strategic allies and all of that. What did this do? In diplomacy, we are told, and with reason, no matter what you do, don't lie. Because once you've lied, your usefulness is gone. When the [Israeli] Prime Minister lied to a number of people, what did this do to the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs and your...

VELIOTES: First, of course, we were terribly upset, but I can't tell you that I was surprised. In the past the Israelis had lied to us. They just expected us to understand that, well, the situation was different. And because their security was at stake, we were to understand this.

Q: While this was going on, was the Israeli lobby, in any of its manifestations, pressuring us not to do anything, to let them go ahead? Was it orchestrated or not?

VELIOTES: No. Don't forget that there was a shooting war going on, and no one had time, in the early days, really to establish positions for lobbying, apart from just being supportive of Israel. I don't recall that the Israeli lobby did much. When it became clear that the Israelis intended to destroy the PLO in Beirut physically and the television pictures started coming back, with all of their horror, then the Jewish community in this country, by and large, supported the position of President Ronald Reagan -- that that kind of activity must stop. After that, I think that the Jewish community in the U. S. was very supportive of our efforts to negotiate the so-called "May 17 Agreement." Then, in the aftermath of the Sabra and Shatila massacres [Palestinian refugee camps in southern Beirut], the failures in Lebanon, and the great controversy in Israel -- because when I said that the Israeli Government had lied to us, they also had lied to their own people. And there was a great controversy there, indeed. Prime Minister Begin was finished 18 months after the invasion of Lebanon began, both morally, politically, and internally in Israel. So I think that situation was reflected here in the U. S., as well.

But there was strong support for the aid program [for Israel] in Congress and the supplemental aid program of $500 million in December, 1992, as well. There was great unhappiness in the Jewish community in the United States that we continued to retain certain restrictions on our military supply relationship with the Israelis. For example, the Israeli Defense Forces had been using "cluster bombs" against civilian targets, and things like that.

Q: I have interviewed Ambassador Bob Dillon, who was our Ambassador to Lebanon at the time. He was reporting Israeli Army units right next to him but he was being told by Washington that this couldn't be true because we had been assured that they were not doing that sort of thing, and so forth.

VELIOTES: Well, we were also assured that the Israelis weren't bombing targets or using artillery. We had Prime Minister Begin on one telephone line one night and Ambassador Phil Habib on another line. We were listening to it. The Prime Minister was telling us that he had been assured that nothing [of the kind] was going on. Well, the Israelis lied their way up to Beirut.

Q: What was your view of Secretary of State Alexander Haig? He had been a strong supporter of Israel. He had just been appointed Secretary of State and was rather new to the game. Here was a situation which was really falling apart and getting out of control. This was about as bad as it could be. The Israelis were not on the defensive -- brave little Israel.

VELIOTES: He resolved every dilemma in favor of the Likud Government, whatever problems there were. At that time I think that his basic, psychological state was one of constant turmoil. Here was a man who, a year and a half before, or before the November, 1980 election, was considered a viable presidential candidate himself. Now, a year and a half later, he was on the verge of being fired by President [Reagan]. Indeed, he was fired, in effect, although they let him resign. He threatened his resignation one time too often. They encouraged it, and the President accepted it. I just think that the last several months with Alexander Haig as Secretary of State were not a happy time for me as Assistant Secretary of State for Near East Affairs, because he [Haig] was in such turmoil at the time.

Q: Well, it was the Near East that did him in, wasn't it?

VELIOTES: Well, in part. But basically he had virtually declared war on the White House. That's what did him in. And then he refused to seek allies. He got into big fights with Bill Clark, Jim Baker, Casper Weinberger, Bill Casey, and Jeane Kirkpatrick.

I'll tell you two anecdotes. In one case, he'd been having some trouble with policies [advocated by] Jeane Kirkpatrick.

Q: She was Ambassador to the United Nations.

VELIOTES: The policies had to do with the Middle East. So I called her up one day and said, "Jeane, look. I think that we ought to talk. I've told the Secretary that I ought to go up and see you. If it's all right with you, I'll tell the Secretary that I'm going to go up and see you." She said, "Fine. Come on up. That's great. I'll see you at such and such a time." So I said to Al Haig, "I'm going up to see Jeane Kirkpatrick." His reaction was, "What? What are you going to do up there?" I said, "Well, I'm going to talk to her. You've expressed some concerns. I want to air them with her." His immediate reaction was that, somehow, I was consorting with the enemy. I'll never forget his admonitions to me to beware of the Baker-Bush gang.

Q: James Baker and George Bush.

VELIOTES: The chief of staff to the President and the Vice President. And just before Haig was fired in July, 1982, Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin visited the U. S. The President spent a couple of hours, lecturing Begin on the bombing and killing in Beirut. He really wanted it stopped. The day Begin was leaving I was called up to Secretary Haig's office. Charles Hill, Jerry Bremer and Larry Eagleburger were already there. Larry was pacing with his...

Q: Asthma.

VELIOTES: Asthma. He was Under Secretary for Political Affairs. Charley Hill was sort of on detached duty but part of NEA [Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs], technically, working on Lebanon. Jerry was Executive Secretary [of the Department of State]. Haig was fulminating that the President wasn't treating Begin right. He went on and on and said, "By God, [I'm] going to tell Begin to go into Beirut and finish the job."

Q: You mean that Haig was saying that?

VELIOTES: Yes. And I said, "Wait a minute, the President has just spent two days telling him [Begin] not to [do that]." I said, "What are you saying?" And as we were walking to the door [of Haig's office], I remember him saying to me, "Don't be taken in by that Baker-Bush gang." Then came a lot of silly philosophy about the price of victory is blood and all that kind of thing. I figured that I was talking to a man who was disturbed at that time. I say this with regret, because I had a lot of respect for Al Haig. He's a friend. Although we had a lot of policy disagreements, I can't complain about [not] having had my say.

I remember that we had a preliminary meeting with a couple of Prime Minister Begin's people. We were sitting there, and Al Haig said, "Well, we have a problem with President Reagan." I wondered, "Who is 'we'?" He said, "Nick, tell them." Well, I had no problem at this point. I held a presidential commission. My problem was with Israeli policies. So, as I say, it wasn't a happy time, most particularly for Al Haig.

Q: You were in Egypt from when to when?

VELIOTES: From November, 1983, to April, 1986.

Q: What about the other side? Your point of view is somewhat different from when you were Assistant Secretary. You're sitting in Egypt, looking at Israel. We were doing all these things because, very obviously, they were defensive. We really were looking to Egypt, as you say, to be a real factor in Middle Eastern affairs, because of our concerns about Iran, Iraq, and the Soviets. This must have caused a lot of heartburn in Israel as they saw all this, suggesting essentially that they'd been supplanted.

VELIOTES: The Egyptians worked hard, not to supplant Israel in the affections of the United States, but to get to a level of equality. They wanted us to look at them in the same context of partnership as we did with the Israelis. And they succeeded. The Israelis, while I'm sure that they were not happy about everything that the Egyptians did, recognized that it was to their interest to maintain the treaty, whether or not it fulfilled all of Israel's expectations. It was a guarantee of no violence, no war, on the southern [Israeli] front. And there was an Israeli flag flying in a major Arab capital. So the Israelis, on the one hand, were delighted that Egypt was out of the strategic equation and that they could talk to them. On the other hand, they were a little nervous that the Egyptians might become too effective as advocates for other Arabs. But the other side of that was that the Israelis understood that, just by example, the Egyptians were also very important advocates for peace with Israel on behalf of other Arabs.

Q: Were there any other, serious problems between Egypt and Israel while you were there and did you get involved in any of them?

VELIOTES: There were two issues. One was a serious, "silly" problem. Like [the old saying that] "the situation is desperate but not serious." This was like the standard message from the Embassy in Vientiane, Laos. A manufactured dispute raised by Arik Sharon.

Q: Was he still [Israeli] Minister of Defense?

VELIOTES: Yes. This came up at the time of the [Israeli] withdrawal from the Sinai Peninsula and was designed to stick a pin in the Egyptians and to keep us occupied. Finally, after five or six years and truly enormous expenditure of money, effort, manpower, and ill will -- how could anything have earned Israel such ill will from the Egyptians as their insistence on keeping Taba.

Q: This is a little, coastal...

VELIOTES: A little, coastal place [adjoining Elat on the Gulf of Aqaba]. It had a hotel, the Sonesta Hotel. Israelis used to giggle and tell me that it was the last place where they could take their mistresses, now that the Sinai Peninsula was no longer so easy to get to. And the Israelis moved border markers. Well, the Israelis were at fault in connection with a lot of this stuff that had happened earlier during the Arab-Israel dispute -- moving markers and so forth. The Taba dispute was finally solved, but it really poisoned the atmosphere for the leadership groups of the two countries. And it was used by the opposition in Egypt to beat the government over the head. It was used by everyone to beat us over the head.

A more serious incident occurred during this terrible summer of 1985. It was very tragic. An Egyptian policeman in the Sinai Desert must have run amok. He machine gunned seven or eight Israelis, including women and children. Then, totally losing his head, he kept people away from those who had been shot until -- I don't know how many died. If the Israelis could have come in with hospital personnel... This was a very serious issue. The summer of 1985 -- I said it was "the terrible summer," because it was. There was this incident.

Q: Did you get involved in this incident?

VELIOTES: Well, I was talking to the Egyptians almost every day about it. They prosecuted the man, they did it in a military court, and they put him in jail, where he reportedly committed suicide. Atrocities like that happen in Israel, too. A young Jewish soldier went nuts on the Temple Mount [in Jerusalem] and cut down 20 or 30 people. The fact that the perpetrator is out of his mind doesn't make the incident any less tragic. These incidents raised all of those concerns again such as, "Can you trust the Arabs?" The Egyptians were terribly embarrassed by the incident involving the Egyptian policeman and by the fact that they couldn't help the wounded. As I recall, the Israelis wanted a more public trial, though I don't think that a public trial was needed. Neither did the Egyptians. What if someone started demonstrating in favor of these people? Which could happen.

Then there was the hijacking of that TWA airplane that shuttled between Algiers and Beirut. An American Seabee was killed and thrown off the plane. Then the people got out -- the terrorists escaped. The Israelis bought them off with about 100 or so people they let out of prison. Although no one alludes to that, it was definitely the Israelis buying the lives of American passengers with their prisoners. Then there was the killing in Cyprus of two or three Israelis on a yacht, including one woman, by Arab murderers. The Arabs claimed that they were a Mossad "hit team." Of course, we spoke out. We said that we condemn terrorism. We condemn that violence. Then there was an Israeli retaliation raid against PLO headquarters...

Q: In Tunisia.

VELIOTES: ...which killed over 120 people and wounded many others, many of whom had nothing to do with the PLO, beyond the circumstance of being clerks or coffee servers.

At this point President Reagan made a statement which was interpreted widely as endorsing the Israeli action. Tensions were starting to grow at this point. When the Israelis attacked PLO headquarters, just before the Egyptian schools and universities were reopening, there was a great deal of animosity, and much anti-American and anti-Israeli feeling. And President Reagan stepped right into that.

Q: Did this statement come out of the White House?

VELIOTES: Yes. It was really stupid. Whether it was approved in the State Department, I don't know. It was really stupid because of the way in which it was interpreted. Two or three Israelis were killed and the Americans were outraged. More than 120 Arabs were killed, and the Americans, in effect, said to the Israelis, "Go get 'em." In the ensuing riots -- and don't forget that the rioters were kids. No government likes to shoot its own kids -- people must understand that Egyptian college kids were involved in these riots. The Egyptian government told the students that they needed to have a permit to demonstrate and that they may only demonstrate on university grounds. They could not come out of university premises. The Israeli Embassy wasn't very far from the university. It's an urban university, like Columbia University [in New York] or George Washington University [in Washington, D. C.]. Before the schools actually reopened, the ACHILLE LAURO hijacking took place and the sequence of events that led to the American capture of the Egyptian aircraft...

Q: We'll come back to that.

VELIOTES: This was really an extremely long period of high tension.

Q: How did the demonstration...

VELIOTES: They didn't hold it. I'm trying to describe an atmosphere to you, because if you want to understand the ACHILLE LAURO incident and the decisions made by the Egyptian government at that time, you must understand the broader atmosphere. It was already very poisonous and had the whole damned Egyptian establishment on edge. Then the ACHILLE LAURO incident occurred.

Q: Well, as a matter of timing, had the bombing of Libya taken place?

VELIOTES: No. The bombing of Libya took place a few days after I retired.

Q: OK, so things were not very good at this time, politically. We have mentioned the fact that we had not been very tough on the Israelis...

VELIOTES: We were sharply criticized for applauding the loss of what they saw as "innocent" Arab lives, whereas we showed righteous outrage when Israelis were killed. On this we said, in effect, "Go get 'em." It wasn't a happy time.

DEAN RUST
Staff Assistant to Director Fred Ikle, ACDA
Washington, DC (1974-1976)

Mr. Rust was born and raised in Ohio, and was educated at Bowling Green University and Ohio State University. In 1970 he joined the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency in Washington, D.C. and worked with that Agency until his retirement in 2005. An expert in nuclear and conventional disarmament issues, Mr. Rust was a major participant in the US government's international treaty negotiations during five Presidential Administrations. Mr. Rust was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2006.

Q: So then in '74 what happened?

RUST: The Office of the Director, Fred Iklé at that time, had a vacancy in a staff assistant's job. A staff assistant job is an entry-level job in State Department front offices where they put junior foreign service officers and people like that.

Q: You learn the trade and carry brief cases.

RUST: That's right. Carry brief cases and shuffle papers. They needed somebody quickly because the person in that position suddenly got transferred with no warning. I had gotten to know one of the senior assistants to Iklé in the front office. He asked me if I would be interested in taking the job at least on an acting basis. I said, "Sure." I had been four years in this other job, so I became the acting staff assistant in the office of the director in sometime early '74.

Q: You did that for how long?

RUST: About 2 ½ years, until late '76.

Q: How did you deal, let's stick to this early period, Israel?

RUST: Well, a lot of countries didn't join the treaty at this early stage. The Israelis were not particularly unusual in that regard. There were a lot of states in the Middle East, Arab states included, that were not in the treaty.

Q: When did we realize the Israelis had a nuclear bomb?

RUST: The Israelis had acquired the Dimona reactor from the French in the 1950's, I believe. It was not under international safeguards and by some time in the 1970's it was pretty clear that it had operated long enough to produce sufficient plutonium for nuclear weapons. I don't recall the dates, but there was a leak out of the U.S. intelligence community in the late 1970's that Israel likely possessed X number of weapons, and of course the famous case of the Israeli nuclear technician Mordecai Vanunu who spilled his guts for the London Sunday Times in the 1980s. I don't know when the U.S. knew for sure. I didn't have the clearances to know that information and I couldn't reveal it even if I did. My own guess is it was sometime in the 70s they probably had some, but of course they have never admitted to having nuclear weapons and have said only that they won't be the first to introduce nuclear weapons into the Middle East.

Q: Well I was just wondering. We have been preaching and yet we have taken one significant country and put it to one side, which is not only awkward, but hypocritical.

RUST: Well again, in the 60s and 70s we didn't put them aside. The double standard criticism of setting the Israelis to one side is more pertinent to the 80s, 90s and today. But the bottom line is that since around 1980 we have essentially just "gone through the motions" in encouraging NPT adherence for not only Israel, but also for India and Pakistan. They have always been the three hardest cases; they said from the beginning that they weren't going to give up the right to acquire their own weapons, and thus they weren't going to join the treaty. In principle, we continue to maintain U.S. support for universal NPT adherence, i.e. all states joining the Treaty -- while recognizing there is little near-term prospect of action by Israel, India and Pakistan. They are the only three that have never joined the treaty. Today, there are 188 parties to the NPT. North Korea had joined it but has withdrawn. As far as hypocrisy is concerned, U.S. nonproliferation diplomacy has labored under that charge from the beginning since we are encouraging others to forego something we believe remains essential to our own security. There's also a little truth to the charge in regards to Israel, but it's a fact of life under the regime generally for the U.S. Thankfully, there are many non-nuclear weapon state NPT parties who agree generally with the U.S. on the importance of the NPT and whose diplomacy is not hypocritical on these matters.

Q: While you were doing this staff assistant work, I take it you found it from your perspective a harmonious relationship between George Vest at PM and Fred Iklé at ACDA.

RUST: Yeah, pretty much. While ACDA was an independent agency, it was small and not Cabinet level. ACDA Directors could be influential only if they worked collegially with senior levels at State and NSC. They would exercise their independence only when the stakes appeared to be worth it. So there were times when Fred took different positions than George on some key issues, but by and large, particularly at the assistant secretary and assistant director levels, good working relationships were the norm.

Iklé did take a pretty strong stand on the importance of preventing the spread of enrichment and reprocessing technology. The 1974 Indian test awakened people to this technology issue; enrichment and reprocessing are parts of the civil nuclear fuel cycle, but are also critical to producing fissile material for weapons. So there is that old dichotomy of nuclear energy. It can have peaceful applications but it can also have horrific military applications. Some of these far-reaching policies that Iklé was pushing occasionally ran into some problems with our European allies and with Japan. But PM hung in there with ACDA and Congress was also pushing for strong action. So the "clientitis" that generally pervades the regional bureaus of State was generally overcome. In general, the mid-1970s saw the beginning of the broadening of the nuclear nonproliferation regime beyond the NPT and IAEA. The latter was formed in 1957, but its responsibilities significantly expanded once the NPT entered into force as all non-nuclear parties were required by the NPT to negotiation safeguards agreements with the IAEA.

A couple other things happened during Iklé's tenure that were quite significant from a nonproliferation perspective. In July or August 1974, we negotiated agreements with Israel and Egypt to provide them nuclear power reactors. This happened just before Nixon resigned. These agreements contained strong nonproliferation controls, some of which are still discussed today, for example in the case of Russia's sale of a power reactor to Iran. That said, the sales never came to fruition, because the continued aftermath of the May 1974 Indian test caused U.S. policy to tighten beyond those conditions that were to apply to the sales to Egypt and Israel. The other major development was the creation of the Nuclear Suppliers Group, known at that time as the London Club. Initially, there were 7 states; today there are 45 and it continues serving as an effective nonproliferation tool. The first 18 months of meetings were held in general secrecy, due to concern about criticism from developing countries about a suppliers cartel. The purpose of the group was to establish common rules so that recipients couldn't play one supplier off another, which had the effect of commercial considerations trumping nonproliferation when it comes to selling nuclear material and equipment.

MALCOLM TOON
Ambassador
Israel (1975-1976)

Ambassador Malcolm Toon was born in New York in 1916. He received a bachelor's degree from Tufts College and a master's degree from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy. He served in the U.S. Navy from 1942-1946. His career in the Foreign Service included ambassadorships to Israel, Yugoslavia, and the Soviet Union. Ambassador Toon was interviewed by Dr. Henry E Mattox on June 9, 1989.

Q: Part of your fairly long career included a senior assignment as counselor for political affairs in Moscow in the '60s and then shortly thereafter, four ambassadorships to Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Israel, and the Soviet Union. It seems fairly obvious that the training for appointment as ambassador to the Soviet Union -- your training suited you and aimed you in that direction, it was only logical that you became, eventually, ambassador to the Soviet Union. How is it, however, that you became ambassador in Tel Aviv? How did that come about?

TOON: Well, that's an interesting story. Primarily because of Henry Kissinger, who was Secretary of State, of course, when I went to Israel as ambassador. Henry had become very upset with the Israelis, because he claimed that they had sabotaged and ruined his diplomatic shuttle exercise. So he wanted to send, as he put it, I think, rather crudely, "a tough-minded S.O.B." to Israel as ambassador in order to put the Israelis in their place.

I had gained a reputation, whether justified or not -- it depends on your own point of view -- of being rather blunt, outspoken, tough, in dealing, primarily, with eastern Europeans and the Soviets. So Henry decided it would be a good idea to send me there.

Let me finish the story, because it is very interesting. Shortly after I arrived in Israel, Henry wanted to resume his meetings with Rabin, who was then the prime minister. Rabin was going to Germany on a state visit. Henry was coming over for talks with the Germans. It was arranged that he would meet with Rabin in Germany to resume, he hoped, the shuttle diplomacy exercise. I was summoned to Germany, of course, as the new ambassador to Israel.

When I was there, Kissinger said, "Now, I want to have a private word with you." And so we did. We had a long conversation before a formal dinner with the Germans. He said, "Now, what I want you to do, as the American ambassador to Israel, is get yourself out on the streets, meet the people, hold press conferences, get yourself on television, meet all the members of the Knesset, if necessary go behind the backs of the government to get the message across that we have a new policy." That policy, he said, was "to establish a good relationship with the moderate Arab states, if necessary, by supplying them with arms."

I said, "You want me, as the American ambassador, to behave this way in Israel?" I pointed out, "No American ambassador has ever said, 'Boo,' has never uttered a statement of substance. He has always been, more or less, in the Israeli pocket."

He said, "Yes, that's what I want you to do."

I've known Dr. Kissinger for many years. I knew him at Harvard and later in the White House. We had always called each other Henry and Mac. But now he was Secretary of State, and I addressed him as Mr. Secretary. I said, "Mr. Secretary, I am going to ask you something that will probably make you really mad, but I've got to know the answer. Does the President approve of this?"

He got mad. He said, "Are you questioning my integrity? Are you questioning my authority?"

I said, "No. I just want to know if the President is behind this or not, because, you know, this is a very tricky business that you are mandating."

He said, "Yes, he's behind it."

I said, "Okay."

So I went to Israel, and Kissinger's prescription was basically the pattern of behavior that I had to assume as ambassador. And it produced, frankly, a rather abrasive relationship with the Israelis. They were not used to that sort of behavior by the American ambassador. But I think, ultimately, what they decided was that what I was telling them was for their own good. Because if, in fact, we had a differently nuanced policy toward the Middle East that had developed, we had to back our relations with the emerging moderate Arab states with heavy equipment.

Q: Were they convinced that the changed policy was going to remain changed?

TOON: I think they, ultimately, were convinced of that, not only on the basis of what I was saying publicly in Israel, but also on the basis of their own understanding as to what was going on inside Washington. And, ultimately, of course, we did resume the diplomatic shuttle exercise with the end result of winding up with the Sinai agreement -- Sinai II, as it was called.

Q: You were there in September '75, then, when Kissinger made his last shuttle run, and the Sinai withdrawal began.

TOON: That's right.

Q: You then, I guess, personified this new policy. You were hand-picked to go and be abrasive.

TOON: Well, that's the way it turned out. I think, initially, Dr. Kissinger simply wanted to punish the Israelis by having a relatively unfriendly ambassador in Tel Aviv.

Q: Was there no consideration, as far as you knew, about U.S. domestic voting questions and problems in this new, revised Israeli policy?

TOON: Well, yes, consideration was given to that. Of course, there was a good deal of consternation -- more than that, disagreement -- on the part of the American Jewish community with what we were doing. Of course, they expressed their point of view in no uncertain terms when they would come to see me in Israel. They didn't like what I was saying. They felt that I was being unduly abrasive. I tried to explain to them what I was telling the Israelis in my television appearances and my talks with members of the Knesset was something that they had to know.

And, secondly, I said, "They've got to understand that you will help me, you as members of the American Jewish community, in getting the message across that I am not talking off the top of my head. I'm talking under instructions. And they've got to understand that this change is going on back home. And I think, frankly, it is a change for the better." And I think, ultimately, the American Jewish community came around to that point of view. Initially, it was not easy.

Q: There was an imbroglio in April '76 over the aid program. It had to do, especially, with the transitional quarter, and how much was going to be appropriated for the Israeli aid program in that unique transitional quarter. You were heavily criticized at that time by the Israeli press. Do you recall what that was all about?

TOON: Well, let me give you the background. I recall it very well. I had for a long time after I arrived in Tel Aviv, resisted pressure, primarily by the foreign correspondents, to hold press conferences. They knew that I had done this sort of thing in my previous posts. They thought it would be a marvelous opportunity to tap the most productive source of information in Israel, the American ambassador. Well, finally, I agreed to meet with not only the foreign press, but also the Israeli press on a background basis.

Now the Israelis simply don't understand background rules. As you know, one is not supposed to name the source, and one is not supposed to quote directly. But one of the first questions that came up in this first backgrounder I had was what did I think of the Israeli insistence on dealing directly with the Congress on increasing the aid package, which the President had already reduced, because he was facing very stringent fiscal problems at home.

And I said, "Well, I think that is what I would call dirty pool. I think it is wrong for the Israeli Embassy to go behind the back of the administration in order to thwart the President's desire to give a reasonable, but a reduced, aid package to the Israelis." Well, that night on television, I was quoted directly, and I was named as accusing the Israeli Government of violating the law by going behind the back of the administration and seeking the agreement of the Congress to an increased aid package. This made the Israeli Government furious, and it made me furious, too. I never again had another background press conference in Israel.

Now, the Israelis who were there at the press conference claimed that they abided by the rules. But they had briefed some of their colleagues, particularly on television news programs, on the meeting with me, and it was they who had violated the rules. And that's when the fat really hit the fire. For a long time afterwards -- I'd say about two or three months at least -- my relations with the Israeli public were very seriously strained. Not with the government necessarily. The government was pressured, primarily by Begin, who was head of the opposition, to demand an apology from me. Allon, who was the foreign minister, said, "No, we are not going to do that."

But, in any case, the Israeli press reacted in a very angry way. Basically, their line was, "Who is this Gentile to be preaching to us? We have been preached to by Gentiles for centuries. We took care of them; we'll take care of him." That, basically, was the line carried by the press. So I had a very difficult time in Israel for the first six months.

Q: It's not a great deal of fun to be unpopular in a position like that where you live in a goldfish bowl. And this is triply so, of course, in Israel, which is such a small country. The Israelis ended up getting not much more than about 10% of what the original proposals were for that transitional quarter, so your word must have had some effect. Can you give me a word portrait of Rabin, Begin? Who was it that you dealt with primarily?

TOON: Well, I dealt primarily with Rabin, the prime minister; Allon, the foreign minister; and Peres, who was the defense minister. These were the three top officials in the Labor government. But I also had a good relationship with Menachem Begin, who was head of the opposition. And this came about through purely personal reasons. I played a lot of tennis when I was in Israel. And most of my tennis playing partners were members of Begin's party, the Likud. They brought me together with Begin for lunches and dinners and so forth. I got to know him very well. He didn't agree with anything I said, but he did admire my spirit -- and he said this publicly. He felt that I was honest. I felt basically the same way about him.

Now let me just wind up the story of my relationship with Begin, because it puts me in the position of really not being much of an expert on the Middle East. When I was appointed to Moscow in late 1976, and the Soviets finally accepted me, Begin -- still head of the opposition -- asked to have a private lunch with me down at the Knesset -- the Israeli Parliament. I accepted and we had a very pleasant lunch. In the course of the luncheon conversation, he said, "Now, I would like to have a private word with you. I know you are going back to Washington before you go on to Moscow. You will be seeing the Secretary of State, of course, and the President."

So he took me over to the window of the Knesset, which broadly overlooks the West Bank, and he said, "I want you to tell the President when you get back that those lands out there, which you call the West Bank -- I will never call them the West Bank, I call them Judea and Samaria -- those lands have always been Jewish. They are Jewish today. And they always will be Jewish."

I said, "Well, I'll carry this message back, but I'm sure it is not going to be embraced warmly by President Ford." But I said, "You know, we are being very frank with each other. Consistent with our relationship, which you very accurately described -- open and straight forward -- let me give you some advice. Why don't you get out of politics, because you don't really have a chance." Three months later, he became the prime minister.

Then I went off to Moscow. And regularly, at least once a month, there would be some emissary, usually a foreign diplomat, coming through Moscow with a message for Ambassador Toon from Prime Minister Begin. That message, in effect, was, "Tell the ambassador that I am the prime minister of Israel today, and I am going to be the prime minister for many years to come." That was my relationship with Begin.

Q: An unexpected sense of humor on the part of Begin.

TOON: Well, he was a rather complex and interesting guy. I think in his later years, he became a little bit too serious about events and a little bit too insistent that his point of view was absolutely right, and nobody else had anything to say.

Q: I have a friend in Jerusalem or Tel Aviv, I don't remember which, who called his house trying to get his wife before she died -- and this is an indication of what kind of country it is. It is really quite remarkable to me. He answered the phone. The friend had to get through him to get to the wife. There were no layers of bureaucracy.

TOON: Very informal.

Q: Peres? If something came in of a fair degree of importance, and you were instructed to go to the foreign ministry -- let's assume it was something that you would handle yourself -- who would you call up to go see?

TOON: I usually called up Eppie Evron, who was then a deputy foreign minister. He would immediately arrange an appointment. I could see these people any time I wanted to. They recognized that the American ambassador is a person of some authority. And they also knew that when I wanted to see them, it was not to have a chatty exchange of views, but to convey to them a message from Washington. So I had no problem at all in seeing any of these people.

Now they were three totally different guys. Rabin was deadly serious. He was a military man primarily. He headed up the armed forces during the wars of liberation. He had not much of a sense of humor. I got to know him very well, primarily because we were both tennis players. He and his wife and I and my wife used to play doubles on his court. I got to know him well, primarily because I dealt one-on-one with him. He never had anyone with him, no note-takers. Nor did I. But he was a serious guy and tough. Very tough, indeed. But I always felt that he was completely honest. If he told me something, then I could rely upon it.

Allon was a much gentler guy, in the sense that he was much more personable and friendly and outgoing and so forth. He was also a man of complete integrity, but much more emotional than Rabin was. For example, he would react in a much more emotional way to some of the things I would say than Rabin would.

Peres was much more outgoing than either Rabin or Allon. When I would meet with him, it would usually be late in the afternoon. He would always produce a bottle of Scotch. And we had a little drink or two; a completely informal discussion. But I always had the impression -- and this may not sit very well today -- that he was a little bit slippery. I wasn't entirely sure that the point of view he was conveying was going to be the point of view that he would convey to me tomorrow. I may be wrong in my judgment of the guy, but that was my gut reaction during the time.

But, in any case, my relationship with all three was very good and close.

Q: Allon. You said something about his reaction would be -- did you use the word, emotional?

TOON: Emotional, yes. Well, let me give you an example of that. I met with Allon, together with a group of Congressmen, the day after we had taken a vote in the United Nations which the Israelis didn't like. I think we had abstained on a resolution condemning the Israelis for, as I recall, their settlement policy in the West Bank. And when I met Allon the next day down in Jerusalem with the congressional group, I said, "Good morning, Mr. Minister."

He said: "It may be a good morning to you, but it's not to me after what happened yesterday in the United Nations."

I said, "Let's talk about that later." This was on television. The press were there and so forth. And that's what I mean by acting in an emotional way. He got over it before the day was out, but he and his colleagues were pretty mad about the stance we had taken in the United Nations the day before.

But, you know, Rabin would never show that sort of emotion. And Peres would just sort of laugh it off under similar conditions. But Allon would always act in an emotional way.

Q: As an example of how an ambassador copes with a problem in a country that he is assigned to, how did you cope with the remarks of Chief of Staff General Brown about Israel being a burden rather than a defensive asset? You were still in the country then, were you not?

TOON: You are talking about the head of the armed forces Brown? Which Brown are you talking about?

Q: General Brown, the chief of the --

TOON: You don't mean Harold Brown, who was later on Secretary of Defense. You are not talking about him. You are talking about General Brown?

Q: Yes. Mid-October 1976.

TOON: Yes, I remember that remark. I tend to agree that Brown's assessment is correct. We tend to overdo the idea that the Israelis are a great strategic bastion for us in the Middle East. I think, frankly, they are a very serious burden for us. Now don't misunderstand me. I believe in our policy vis à vis Israel. I think that we should be committed to Israel's survival. It is not only a moral commitment on our part, but it is one that seems to be totally understandable after what happened to the Jews in World War II. Therefore, I think that we should do everything in our power to make sure that Israel survives. But to call the Israelis, as members of the American Jewish community do frequently, a strong strategic asset in the Middle East, I think simply overstates the case.

Q: In my experience, much more limited than yours, of course, the Israelis react immediately to any hint of criticism. And they react very strongly. They must have reacted to this particular criticism. You had to go deal with it in some fashion.

TOON: Well, in the first place, they don't like to be told what to do. They don't like somebody looking over their shoulder on their internal policies and activities -- for example, the settlement policy in the West Bank. And they don't like to be told that they are not terribly important strategically. So this was a problem that I had to smooth over. But at the same time, I think I did it in such a way as not to negate what General Brown had said, because, as I said before, I agree with that sort of assessment.

Q: I can guess what you did to smooth it over, but let me ask you to make it explicit. What did you do? Did you go to see Rabin? Did Rabin call you in?

TOON: No, I think this was a question that I discussed with Peres, the minister of defense. And as I recall, I did not ask to see him specifically. I was down there in his office. His office was in Tel Aviv. It was much easier for me to see him than it was to see Allon or Rabin, whose offices were in Jerusalem, which was quite a long way off. And I think I was down there on some other issue, probably it was with regard to what was going on in Lebanon. That statement by General Brown came up, and I tried to put the proper gloss on it without, as I say, negating what he said.

Q: Did you ever discuss U.S.-Israeli affairs with President Ford?

TOON: Yes, a number of times, as a matter of fact. I came back on consultation, I would say, about five or six times while I was ambassador in Israel usually with other ambassadors from the Middle East, who were summoned back to meet with Kissinger. When we met with Kissinger, we would also meet with President Ford.

Now because of the relationship at that time between the Arab states and Israel, which was nonexistent, of course, I, at the insistence of some of the Middle East ambassadors, would meet separately with President Ford rather than together with them. This, I think, gave me a leg up on all the other ambassadors, because I got to know the President quite well. I think not only was he a very fine guy, but a guy that showed very good understanding of the problems in the Middle East.

Q: Ambassadors other than Ambassador Eilts insisted that you meet separately with the President?

TOON: It was primarily Eilts that took this position, but I think he was aided and abetted by other Arabists, and certainly nobody else took the opposite side.

Q: You had, then, an unusual role for an American ambassador. The stock question might be what were the policy questions facing you when you arrived at your post in Tel Aviv. In your case, it would be far different. It would not be run-of-the-mill policy questions at all. You were instructed specifically by the Secretary of State that 180-degree or 90-degree turn in American policy was about to take place or was taking place.

TOON: I wouldn't say it was a 180 degree shift. It was a slightly different emphasis in our policy in the Middle East. There was no attempt by anybody to diminish our commitment to Israel's survival. No question about that. What we were doing was trying to work out an arrangement so that Israel's survival could be assured, not militarily, but politically, by a different set of relationships in the Middle East.

Now that was a nuanced policy which was not easy to get across to the hard-headed Israelis who had participated in the struggle for survival. First of all, they felt they had become independent and had survived exclusively through military means. It was also not easy to convince them that supplying arms to the moderate Arab states would advance the Israeli interests. That was a very difficult point to get across. They could understand, and they admitted this to me several times, why we felt it was necessary to establish a good relationship with the moderate Arab states. What they could not understand was why we had to support this policy with a supply of arms. They did not believe me or Henry Kissinger when we said, "Look, under no conditions will this supply of arms be extensive. And, certainly, we will not supply them with any arms that you would regard as being offensive and dangerous to your survival." But they simply didn't believe that.

They said, "Once you start down this road -- in the first place, what is the difference between an offensive and a defensive weapon? But once you start down this road, their appetite will increase, and you will find yourselves supplying them with all kinds of arms, which in the long run will represent a threat to us." That was their position. Because it was strongly held, it was not easy for us to get the point across.

Q: Well, it was after you left, two or three or four years later, but one might be able to say they were right, because we developed a military relationship with Egypt that was, and is, quite extensive.

TOON: Well, there the problem, it seems to me, was that if in fact we wanted to completely wean Egypt away from Soviet influence, we had to agree to substitute for the Soviets in their arms supply role. Egyptians felt strongly that they could not be left naked. If they were to break relations with the Soviets, as happened, of course, and, therefore, cut off their arms supply, they had to protect themselves. They had to be able to defend themselves. Therefore, they insisted that we take the Soviets' place in this respect. But we did it not on the Soviet scale. We did it, I think, in a very restrained way.

But I think, frankly, the policy has worked out, not only to our advantage, but ultimately to the Israeli advantage. You now have a situation -- and this came about shortly after I left Israel -- in which really no substantial war is possible, because Egypt was pulled out of the picture completely. And I think that has been a great plus, not only from our position, but also from the standpoint of Israel. Now it is not easy for them to swallow.

Q: I saw some of that from the other end.

Your staff there, your political officers and your DCMs and your economic officers, were they all, in your opinion, then first-rate? Did you have really almost the pick of the Foreign Service?

TOON: I would say that certainly my DCM, whom I personally selected, was very good. Some of the other senior officers were not that good, in my opinion. I had one junior officer who was fluent in Hebrew, and he was very helpful to me. But the others were, I would say, no more than average.

Q: Well, an average FSO was an accomplished kind of person. How is it that they fell down? The lack of writing ability, or lack of ability to develop information out on the streets, or what?

TOON: Well, I think primarily because they had operated under entirely different leadership prior to my arrival. Their two previous bosses had been Ken Keating, a political appointee who spent most of his time attending socials and that sort of thing and did not really participate in the formulation of policy vis à vis Israel. And, of course, his predecessor was Wally Barbour, who had been there altogether too long. He had been there almost, I think it was, thirteen years as ambassador. No ambassador should remain in any country for more than three years, in my view, and certainly not something like thirteen in a country like Israel. It is difficult to avoid localitis in dealing with the Israelis.

The result was that these younger officers of the staff had felt that they were not participating in the process under my predecessors. They felt cut out completely, because the embassy was cut out. And Kissinger was wheeling and dealing on his own. In many cases, Keating wouldn't even be told what was going on. Now that changed completely when I came, primarily because Kissinger knew that I wouldn't tolerate that sort of treatment. I would resign rather than be handled the way my predecessors were. So they found themselves working in a totally different milieu -- and they weren't used to it.

Now, the other problem was that a good many of the things I did, I had to do alone, primarily because Dr. Kissinger was the sort of guy that wanted to keep things very close to his chest. I think he would have been pretty mad if I had briefed my staff completely on what was going on. I did tell the senior officers basically what we were doing, but not in complete detail about my conversations with the Israeli leadership. I think that came about primarily because I didn't have the sort of confidence in them that I had, for example, in my staff in Moscow later on. Now there you had really good professionals, most of whom were in the Soviet Union on a second tour of duty, most of whom knew the language thoroughly. This was not the case in Tel Aviv. Most of them were there for, you know, a first-and-only tour of duty. None of them, except for one officer that I mentioned, knew the language.

Q: Who was this first-rate DCM that you had?

TOON: Dunnigan. Tom Dunnigan.

Q: Thomas Dunnigan, yes. I've heard, somewhere along the line, of an officer or two who took language specialization in Hebrew and Arabic, trying to get themselves totally qualified for the area. That must be mind-boggling to try to deal with those two languages.

TOON: Nobody in my experience did that sort of thing.

THOMAS J. DUNNIGAN
Deputy Chief of Mission
Tel Aviv (1975-1977)

Thomas Dunnigan was born and raised in Ohio. He attended John Carroll University, and after graduation served in the U.S. Army during World War II. He joined the Foreign Service in 1946. Mr. Dunnigan served in London, Manila, the Executive Secretariat, the National War College, Bonn, the Hague, Copenhagen, Tel Aviv, and with the Organization of American States. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

Q: What did you do as DCM? Here you were, you had a professional well-skilled ambassador, and you were his DCM. What did you do?

DUNNIGAN: I had two ambassadors. I had [Mac] Toon for seventeen months, and then he got transferred to Moscow. I was alone for five months there, and then Sam Lewis came the last three or four months.

Oh, there was plenty to do. Of course, you're on the road to Jerusalem a good part of the time, which is where the Foreign Ministry sits. And that's fifty miles up and fifty miles back, up that mountain and down the mountain. So that takes a good deal of your time.

I had good relations there, we all did, with the Foreign Ministry. They were very eager to work well with us. Spent a good deal of time with the Defense Ministry, too, because we have a lot of defense problems with them. And I got to see and know the ministers of both as well.

There was no end of problems -- economic frequently. Because even then we were worried, and it seems such small potatoes today, with the amount of the Israeli debt, which was minuscule to what it is, but we were worried about it in those days and we'd keep reminding them of this.

I was there for the last of the Kissinger shuttle missions. And that was a big and exciting time because he was trying at that time to settle the disputes between Syria and Israel. He'd settled the Egyptian-Israeli one; now this was the tough nut. And the Golan Heights was involved, and everything else. And back and forth he would go. Back and forth. But he finally did it. He finally pulled it off. It didn't mean peace, but it meant no shooting. And the armistice lines were observed. And they've been observed to this day in that area. So that was quite a tour de force by Henry.

But I well remember the night he arrived; we were in his motorcade, driving up to the Knesset in Jerusalem and being pelted with rocks. He was very unpopular because the Israelis thought that he was going to give away the store. And they resented it even more because they said, "You're Jewish, you can't do this to us." But Henry said he was the American secretary of state and he had to do what our policy required.

But they had to sneak us in the back door. And, even then, there were people out there pelting our car with rocks. You could hear them; I was afraid one of them was going to break the window, but they never did, they kept bouncing off. That was exciting.

And then I was there first two Vance visits.

Q: This was with the Carter administration.

DUNNIGAN: With the Carter administration. The first visit Vance made overseas was in February of '77. So I was with the Secretary a good part of the time. He had the whole first team along: Hodding Carter, of course, and Phil Habib, and Hal Saunders, and many other well-known names including some of the new Carter team.

I think they left disappointed after the talks. Rabin was prime minister at the time. Allon was the foreign minister. They expected the Israelis to offer them something, on the feeling that we are now the new Democratic administration; we've always been friendly to Israel; what are you going to do for us in the way of peace? And the answer was: Nothing. Because we, of course, wanted them to give land, that land-for-peace slogan that had been talked about back in the fifties but didn't seem to mean much. And Rabin was not about to do it.

He was also facing a national election coming up in a couple of months and he had that very much in mind. Because Begin was watching him closely, and if he had been seen to weaken, or to knuckle-under to American pressure, he would have been defeated. As it was, he was defeated -- to everybody's amazement. I mean, the embassy hadn't predicted it. Not a commentator in Israel had predicted it. None of the embassies that we knew there had predicted it. Nobody saw it coming, but it happened.

Q: Looking at the Kissinger operation and this Vance operation, were they quite different in how they operated?

DUNNIGAN: Well, the Kissinger operation was much more Henry-centered, you know, everything went out from there. Joe Sisco and Roy Atherton were along for that one. Everything went out from there, and people trembled around him. That wasn't true with Vance. There was more of a collegial approach, although you always knew who was in charge. But they weren't afraid to speak up. I don't say they were afraid under Kissinger, but they were cautious, because they could get their heads bitten off. But that didn't happen under Vance. You had the feeling that the underlings had a little more leeway in what they did.

Q: Was the embassy in either of these playing much of a role other than expediter? I mean, as far as saying, well, we think this will fly and that won't fly?

DUNNIGAN: No, the only one who got close to Kissinger when he was there was Toon, and he stuck with him all the time. Toon has a way of talking to anybody like a Dutch uncle. And he even did it to Henry, although as a careful Dutch uncle. He did get a few points across, I think.

But Toon was not particularly well liked by the Israelis because he told them what he thought of them, and, he wasn't buttering them up all the time. His first speech there was a shocker, because he stood up before the Chamber of Commerce in Tel Aviv and said, "Now you Israelis have got to begin to pay your way. You've leaned on us too much, and we've got too many expenses. We can't be taking care of you all." Well, this had never been said before in public. But that set the tone for his time there.

Q: I've heard from others that any new boy who comes to the American Embassy in Israel, particularly at the upper level as the DCM, is being sized up by the Israelis to find out what his attitude is, whether he's anti-Semitic, and whether he's for them or against them. Was this apparent?

DUNNIGAN: Every day of your life you're there it's apparent. There, a cocktail party is a non-stop dialogue for an American official. He walks in and they'll thrust a glass in his hand, and, from then on, he's in a corner, with fingers poking at him, answering questions: "Why don't you do this? Why did you give this to the Egyptians and not to us? Why doesn't your president...? Why did the secretary say this yesterday?" Small talk does not exist; you get right down to the nitty gritty. And, you know, you hear jokes about "Are you anti-Semitic?" And then you say, "Yes, aren't you?" Well, that throws them back, you know. But, underneath it all, they're watching. You know, for some years, we never had Jewish people on our staff there. Now during my time we did. And in some cases it was difficult for them because I think they felt under great pressure.

Q: I was wondering, because this is true in other countries where you have people who are coming back because of relationships or religion or something like that. Much more is expected of them rather than being just an American representative.

DUNNIGAN: Exactly. The Israelis expected that these people would be sympathetic with everything they did. And they weren't. They weren't. Some of the finest officers we had were Jewish, who saw the Israeli problem as it was, you know.

Q: How, at that time, did you see the situation in Israel, and American interest in Israel?

DUNNIGAN: I felt we had, and we have today, an interest in helping the Israelis defend themselves. I think we have perhaps overloaded them with hardware at the moment. They are tremendously capable and they have a wonderful military machine. I think we also have been underwriting too much of their economic development that we should never be doing.

I well remember, back in the fall of '76, we reported to Washington that the Israelis were putting two new settlements in the West Bank, where we had told them we didn't want any more settlements, and where they had more or less let us indicate they weren't going to put any more. We said there must be a statement out of Washington that would stop these before they go beyond, because if we let them get away with this, there'll be more. Dead silence for about six weeks. We couldn't get an answer out of Washington. Finally, in mid-December, Bill Scranton, our representative to the U.N., made a statement saying that we do not approve of new settlements. But that was all. It wasn't given much publicity. It wasn't as though the president had said something in a news conference, or the secretary had said something, or there had been a wire, or a letter. Not at all. A rather bland statement to that effect. And, as a result, the Israelis said: "Green light." And you see what's happened today.

Q: Did you and maybe other professional Foreign Service officers feel that the Israeli lobby in the United States was jerking us around a lot? I mean, was there resentment of this feeling?

DUNNIGAN: Well, I think we had those symptoms plus an admiration for their skill and ability for doing it. I never met so many senators and congressmen in my life as I did in those years in Israel. They kept coming through week after week. And not only senators and congressmen, but labor delegations, governors, important mayors. The Israelis knew how to handle people and what to show them and so forth. And they got a lot of sympathy and a lot of support from it. There are no holds barred in taking care of influential visitors.

Q: Well, what about reporting of things like, say, what's happening on the West Bank and all? This was before it came really to the top of the agenda. But was there a problem, a feeling about what you could report and what you couldn't report because of what would happen back in Washington?

DUNNIGAN: We at the embassy, you see, didn't do that. That was done by our consul general in Jerusalem. Now the consul general in Jerusalem was never recognized by the Israeli government. In fact, I was called up once by the director general of political affairs, later ambassador here, who complained about our consulate general there, saying, "We don't like that, we think you shouldn't have it here."

So we agreed to disagree on that, but he made it quite plain to me that he didn't accept our view. I told the consul general. Later, he met this fellow. They are both decent people, but they, again, couldn't agree. We had to make sure that the consul general was uninhibited in making his contacts. And he was. In those days, he pretty much could get around, and people could come in to the consulate general to see him. And many did, from around the West Bank, with various stories -- none of them, of course, nearly as bad as they are now -- but stories of injustice and discrimination and things of that nature, and Americans of Palestinian descent who were ill treated.

Q: Would you get these reports from our consul general and then go make a complaint to the Foreign Ministry or something like that from time to time?

DUNNIGAN: Generally, in that case, we'd wait until Washington wanted us to do it. Because it wasn't good for us to say "Our consul general has told us..." Because, technically, you see, the ambassador wasn't to have any say over the consul general. Practically, he did, but in international law, he didn't. And the Israelis were well aware of that, because we kept insisting this was a separate entity that was credited through Jerusalem.

Q: And so you would receive a directive from Washington.

DUNNIGAN: Washington would say, "Now, look, this is going too far. Go in and tell the Foreign Ministry some of their thugs have beat up an American citizen." Then, of course, you could do it.

Q: Was there an inhibition on reporting on affairs in Israel because of the concern about leaks to Congress or to the newspapers once it got back to Washington?

DUNNIGAN: Not that I ever felt or noticed in the embassy. No, I think our people were pretty good that way. We were all aware of the situation, but I don't think that ever inhibited us from doing anything. I don't think of any circumstance where it would have.

Some of the congressional visits get a little dicey at times, you know.

Q: How would they get dicey?

DUNNIGAN: Some of them indicate to the Israelis that our policy is much more in their favor than it really is, you see. And then one had to gently correct the congressman, or get the impression to the Israelis. Then the Israelis would say, "Hah! You people at the embassy, we know what Congress really thinks now, because Senator So and So told us that." And Senator So and So may want this for his newsletter at home, for his purposes, but that isn't U.S. government policy, you know. And little things like that.

I had a very interesting case once. A distinguished American labor delegation came over, and came to the embassy for a briefing. I was chargé at the time, and we trotted out all our political, economic, public affairs counselors, our military attaché, and whoever, and briefed them. I sort of kicked it off and summed it up at the end. One of the labor leaders, a distinguished black gentleman who was well known in American labor circles, since dead, then got up and accused me of being anti-Israel. He said, "All of you, and you particularly, you sound like you're anti-Israel! You're not in favor of these people!"

And I said, "Well, Mr. So and So, we try to call the shots as we see them in the interests of the U.S. government. I don't think any of us are anti-Israel. In fact, I think we're quite friendly to this country. But that doesn't mean we have to agree with everything they do."

He said, "It's plain to me that none of you people like Israel. You don't understand what they've done and what they're doing."

There are some people you're not going to convince. Now he was not Jewish, he was black, but he had been co-opted and felt very strongly that all of us were opposed to the Israelis.

Q: Well, did you find that in a subtle way the Israeli government -- the Foreign Ministry but others -- would sort of foster this thing about co-opting people but also making them feel that the embassy was the problem, when obviously it was policy and it was not the embassy? Was this being used?

DUNNIGAN: I don't have any direct evidence of that, Stu. I'd be surprised if some of it didn't happen. I'd be surprised if some of it didn't, because the ties are so close between many people in this country and Israel, you know. And communications daily, telephonic, everything, back and forth, visits. I'd be surprised if it didn't.

Q: Often the messenger is the person who gets shot.

DUNNIGAN: Exactly.

Q: Tom, what about the difference that you saw of the operating style between Toon, which you've talked about, and Sam Lewis? Did you have much time with Sam Lewis?

DUNNIGAN: I had about three months with him. Sam had already picked his DCM.

Q: Who was that?

DUNNIGAN: Dick Viets. Sam was very much smoother than Toon. Sam was much more attuned to the desires of the Carter administration, how they saw policy. He had come from being assistant secretary for international organization, and so he was very well wired-in, and he knew what would play in Washington and what wouldn't. But he had a nicer way, a smoother way, of approaching the Israeli leaders, so they liked him instinctively. Whereas there's a certain rectitude and Scottish bristliness about Toon that often sets people off on the wrong tangent. But Sam was totally different, and, as a result, they welcomed him warmly, they opened up to him.

He got there, you see, just at the beginning of the Begin administration, so he was moving in, he wasn't with the old team. In fact, he'd wanted to come about a week before the election, but we asked him not to because, we said, "Our posture is so high here (the American) that if you come before, they'll say the U.S. government tried to favor Rabin. You know, they're bringing this man over at the last moment to help him out." And he saw the wisdom of that, and so he came the day after. But, as a result, he was not committed to anything the Rabin government ever did; he worked with Begin all the time.

Then, in the few days I was there with Sam, was the second Vance visit. And I don't think that went much better than the first, although I don't know.

But then Sam's greatest moments, I think, came in the following year during the Camp David bit, when he played quite a key role in getting them together. I had been gone by that time, but I looked back with great interest to what was going on, because that was a tremendous breakthrough.

Q: You were there when Begin was elected, and you say this was a surprise. What was the general judgment of our embassy when Begin came in? What did this mean?

DUNNIGAN: Well, I was the first senior American diplomat to ever have Begin in my house, and this happened months before the election. When we heard he was nominated, I said, "None of us seem to know him, I'm going to ask him out for dinner." He had not gone out to a diplomatic dinner in years, but he accepted. I was then the chargé. And, in fact, I had planned this dinner to say farewell to my German colleague, the DCM of the German Embassy, who was leaving. And when Begin said he'd come, I called him and said to his secretary, "Look, I want Mr. Begin to know that I'm having a German there, Mr. Helmut Brukweil. I want you to tell him that just in case it means anything." The answer came back: "Mr. Begin would be pleased to come." And I learned it was the first he had talked to a German since 1944.

Q: Good God!

DUNNIGAN: But he came and he was very much a gentleman, a courtly gentleman, kissing hands, very friendly. He and his wife are delightful people, and we liked them. It was a small group of about ten or twelve, and I had a thoroughly good time. And then I'd see him during the course of the election campaign. He stayed pretty close to home; he was already then a little old and infirm. Ezer Weizman was running his campaign, doing a magnificent job. He put him over. But Begin would receive me at the house, and I'd go down and talk to him about an hour and get his views, report them. So we had an in with him before, and then Sam, of course, just kept rolling right along.

I liked Begin personally. I didn't agree with many of his policies.

Q: But did we see trouble with Begin and his party coming in, the Likud?

DUNNIGAN: Not really at the beginning. We didn't see much because they'd never been in power, we didn't know what to expect. We knew that they were composed of very disparate groups, many right-wing, former terrorists. None Socialist, and that was welcome in some ways in the Washington side, you know. You remember that crew. No, we didn't know what to expect for quite a while.

EDWARD G. ABINGTON
Staff Aide to Assistant Secretary, Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs
Washington, DC (1975-1977)

Mr. Abington was born in Texas into a US military family and was raised in military posts in the US and abroad. An Arabic language officer and specialist in Near East Affairs, he describes his experience dealing with Israel-Arab hostilities and general regional problems while serving as Political Officer at Embassies Tel Aviv and Damascus. In his postings at the State Department in Washington, he also dealt with Near East matters. Mr. Abington was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q: For the record, many of these things staff assistants at the State Department at the upper levels would be taking notes of things to do so that the principal person talking...

ABINGTON: In all the years I spent at the State Department, I felt that the State Department performed at the highest peak when Kissinger was Secretary of State. He demanded a lot from the State Department staff. He didn't tolerate sloppy work and he would be brutal if you sent a memorandum to him that was not well thought out and succinct – he would come back with very acerbic comments. I was a task master for the NEA bureau. I would read memorandum and would rather rudely edit them myself and send them back to the drafters, which most staff aides didn't have that kind of authority, but Atherton wanted me to do it because he felt that Kissinger looked very carefully at things coming out of the NEA bureau and he wanted good work to go upstairs.

The way the Department worked during that period also was that Kissinger and Sisco wanted to bypass the system and the bureaucracy altogether. The number of memoranda going to Kissinger that were "out of the system" was very high. What that meant was that Kissinger, when he wanted something, he wanted it five minutes ago. Or he considered it to be very sensitive and he felt that he didn't want the line officers and the staff secretariat going over the memos or he didn't want to take the time to have them staffed. With the Near East Bureau, it was a very unique relationship with Kissinger's office and with US for Political Affairs Joe Sisco. Many of the memos that we did on the peace process would go directly to Sisco, who would walk them into Kissinger, or would go directly to Kissinger and they wouldn't even be put in the system. Eventually copies of the memoranda made their way into the archives of the State Department, but there was an awful lot of material that did not go through the formal system through the staff secretariat on the problems facing the Middle East Bureau, it looks like it was divided up into the peace process, which is essentially Egypt and Israel, and then the Lebanese thing with the Palestinians. The Palestinians were part of the Lebanese problem as opposed to the Israeli problem at that time. Am I wrong?

During the Kissinger negotiations, we tried to get at the Palestinian problem through negotiation with Jordan. We started talking about things like functional autonomy for the Palestinians. In other words, they would run civic affairs but the Israelis would still be occupying the area but with less of a direct control over the daily life of Palestinians. There were some attempts to try to get those negotiations off the ground between Jordan and Israel but the issues were complex, very difficult, and quickly fell to the wayside as Kissinger really concentrated on things like the Syrian-Israeli disengagement agreement or the Egyptian-Israeli negotiation or when the crisis in Lebanon became increasingly serious in '75/'76. We tried to deal with the Lebanon crisis in a way to keep Syria and Israel from being sucked into a war over Lebanon. The Palestinian issue was really secondary and to the extent that it was addressed, particularly in late '75/'76, it was a function of the increasingly serious fighting in Lebanon.

Q: Did the question of Israeli settlements in the West Bank come up then?

ABINGTON: Yes, it was an issue. Of course, it was a Labor government. The defense minister and later foreign minister, Yigal Allon, put forward a plan to establish Israeli settlements in areas that were considered important for Israel's security, the Jordan Valley and the West Bank ridge line that would be to the west of the Jordan Valley. He established a string of settlements and built north-south highways in that area. The Arabs protested this and would take it to the UN. At the time, the United States took a pretty firm line in the Security Council against Israeli settlements and generally voted for resolutions that condemned the settlements and called on Israel to cease seizing land and building settlements and transferring population into Palestinian areas. That included in East Jerusalem as well. But while the settlement issue was a subject of dialogue with Israel it never became the central issue.

One has to keep in mind that at the time we were talking not only about settlements in the West Bank, Gaza, and East Jerusalem, but also there was a very active building of settlements up in the Golan Heights. The Israelis basically razed the Syrian villages that were up there, bulldozed the villages, bulldozed the walls marking off Syrian fields and so forth, and created an uninterrupted area up in the Golan Heights that was open to Israeli settlements. But more importantly from the point of view of Kissinger at the time were Israeli settlement activity in the Sinai. Kissinger even before Camp David understood that an Egyptian-Israeli peace had to entail full Israeli withdrawal from Sinai and that meant that Israel would have to give up all of the settlements that it had been establishing since 1967 in the Sinai. So, the settlement issue was an important issue and it had a lot of different ramifications, but probably the focus in '75/'76 was thinking about how settlements affected the ongoing Israeli-Egyptian negotiating process, and it was less of a focus on the West Bank, Jerusalem, and Gaza, although that was important within an inter-Arab context.

Q: As you were watching this, did you get any feel about the difference in negotiating style or outlook between the Egyptians and the Israelis and then also with the Syrians?

ABINGTON: Negotiations with the Syrians in terms of Israeli-Syrian negotiations pretty much petered out after the 1974 disengagement agreement on the Golan Heights. Increasingly that process in terms of trying to consider or try to work towards an Israeli-Syrian peace agreement was overtaken by the mounting crisis in Lebanon. Syria was faced with a situation of enormous complexity which threatened to suck Syria and Israel into an all-out war. U.S. efforts at the time were focused on trying to reach a series of understandings, informal understandings, of red lines between Syria and Israel so that each understood what each party could or could not do in Lebanon. Those red lines were designed to keep Israel and Syria from going to war over Lebanon. In terms of negotiating style between Israel and Egypt, President Sadat had a very clear vision of where he wanted to go and he was less interested in the actual details of negotiation than getting to the end result. The Israelis on the other hand – and I've seen this throughout – they did it with the Lebanese in 1982, – they might concede certain broad principles but then the Israelis would win back whatever concessions they've made through nickeling and diming every single detail. The Israeli negotiating style with the Arabs is such that they focus on the details so much, they take away the good feeling that comes from an agreement by making their negotiating partner feel that there is no such thing as a goodwill gesture on the part of the Israelis. They insist on nailing down all of their concerns in writing and the Israeli style is very much to look at the details, to have lawyers draft the details, and the Arabs by comparison the way they negotiate, I think that they were at a disadvantage in drafting the text of agreements. The net effect of these agreements was that the Arabs felt that the Israelis got too much and instead of becoming a win-win situation people who negotiated with the Israelis have a pretty bitter taste in their mouth at the end of the process. Whatever goodwill was there tended to be dissipated as the difficulties of implementing the agreements became apparent.

Q: In the Near Eastern Bureau, you move over to the Tigris, Euphrates, Syria, Iraq, the Persian Gulf, Saudi Arabia, and then beyond, Afghanistan, Pakistan, India and all. Did that get pretty short shrift in those days?

ABINGTON: Very much so. Roy Atherton spent hardly any time at all on South Asian issues or for that matter even looking at the Gulf, at Iraq, Iran, Afghanistan. That was backwater of the Near East and South Asia Bureau. At the time, you had a Deputy Assistant Secretary for South Asia. That person had a tremendous amount of latitude in terms of dealing with those issues and would spend most of his time dealing with South Asia and Iran. At the time, Sid Sober was the PDAS in NEA. He had a South Asian background. Between him and the Deputy Assistant Secretary, Howie Schaffer, you had a pretty strong team who were dealing with South Asia. The people in the Near East Bureau were just going flat out all the time. There were all these task forces going on whether it was over terrorism, hijackings, or the civil war in Lebanon, or the crisis in South Asia which led to an Indo-Pakistani War, and Kissinger's preoccupation with Israeli-Arab negotiations on the peace process. It was a time when I wonder how the NEA bureau managed to stay on top of everything. There were so many crises going on all the time.

Q: One had the feeling that Iran, being the Shah, was taken care of – give him what he wants and we'll get some money back from him. And with India it was sort of back of the hand. The relationship with the Indian leader was very poor.

ABINGTON: That's true. In Pakistan, the Pakistanis acted as the facilitator for Kissinger's famous secret trip to China. He went to China from Pakistan. He ostensibly was on a visit there. But as I look back during that period, certainly the Israeli-Arab negotiations seemed to be the top priority, but then they would get pushed aside as crises arose like Lebanon or India-Pakistan.

Q: On the Lebanese thing, you had a tribal conflict within Lebanon itself. Was there much we could do about that?

ABINGTON: The actual fighting there was relatively little. Our embassy in West Beirut was in the middle of a free fire zone. We had drawn down to a relatively few number of people. The fighting was so intense that no one could get out and go talk, particularly to the Christian side. During that period in early '76, Frank Meloy, the ambassador, and the economic counselor had gone out to try to go into East Beirut to try to meet with the Christians. They disappeared and the embassy called in and said they were missing. There was a period of time... Everyone was deeply concerned. I informed Roy Atherton and he in turn informed the Secretary. Then I got a telephone call from the Operations Center that said that the bodies of Meloy and Waring and the Lebanese driver, Magrabi, had been found. I went in and informed Roy. Of course, Roy was just devastated by the news. It was a real crisis in terms of trying to deal with the parties in Lebanon. We had no one who could get out and talk to them. Particularly after Meloy's assassination, the embassy basically was in a bunker. People were living in the embassy. They were raiding the commissary for their food. There were artillery duels back and forth outside and it was just an incredibly dangerous situation. It was at that point that Kissinger decided that we needed to send someone into East Beirut to talk to the Christians and figure out what they were up to. Initially, he picked Ed Djerejian to do this, or rather Ed volunteered to do it. Ed spoke fluent Arabic, excellent French. He is an Armenian-American and spoke Armenian. At the time, Ed was the U.S. Consul General in Bordeaux or Marseilles. He joined up with Kissinger on one of Kissinger's trips to Europe and flew back. I believe Roy was on the flight or Joe Sisco. Djerejian talked with Kissinger and mapped out what they were going to do, what he was going to do. They came back to Washington. Djerejian held briefings, met with a number of people, had his instructions. I remember helping him be fitted for a bulletproof vest. I went and got something like $20-25,000 in hundred dollar bills for Ed for expenses. Ed took off with two or three security agents, flew back to Paris, went down to see his wife before he was supposed to go to Cyprus to catch a ferry from Cyprus to Beirut. All of a sudden, I got a phone call from the Operations Center which said that Djerejian had called in and his wife was ill or upset about his going and he had decided he couldn't go. The security agents were bringing back the $25,000. Kissinger just went ballistic. He was so furious at Djerejian. He was determined to punish him. Ed was kind of exiled for a while to a pretty unimportant job in the European Bureau. He had a promotion rescinded by Kissinger. He overcame this. But Kissinger was absolutely furious over this. Roy Atherton and Joe Sisco protected Djerejian and shielded him from Kissinger's wrath. Kissinger had a famous temper.

As an aside, Sid Sober, the principal Deputy Assistant Secretary at the time, just rubbed Kissinger the wrong way. Kissinger ordered Atherton or Sisco to get rid of Sid Sober. Sid continued to be the PDAS but we went through elaborate steps to hide the fact from Kissinger that Sid Sober was the PDAS. He would not attend meetings with Kissinger. We would find someone else to go. If Roy was traveling and we had a memo for Kissinger, we put someone else's name down on the memo so that he didn't know that Sid Sober was there. It was a case where Kissinger would be furious at people but then the FS would protect those people.

But after Djerejian pulled out, David Mack, the office director for the Jordan, Syria, Lebanon, and Iraq, volunteered to go to Beirut along with Bob Hope, who at had been a DCM in Beirut and knew all the actors and was working in Personnel. It took tremendous courage. They went to Nicosia. They got on a ferry boat with a bodyguard or two. If the Christians in East Beirut weren't going to protect them, two bodyguards wouldn't have made the slightest bit of difference. But in an act of tremendous courage, they went to East Beirut, spent a week or two there talking to people and then calling in reports and then writing up the reports. That really gave us a window on the thinking. But our ability to influence either the Muslim or the Christian participants in the civil war in Lebanon was very limited. At the time, Yasser Arafat and the Palestinians had established a tremendous presence in West Beirut. We worked out through the CIA an informal arrangement with the PLO in terms of the PLO giving some protection to the embassy in Beirut to keep it from being attacked by Lebanese Muslim organizations. The CIA acted as the middleman in doing this. That started the contacts between the PLO and Yasser Arafat. It was in the context of Lebanon and the civil war there in the mid-'70s that we started dealing with them over issues like the security of the embassy in Beirut.

Q: This was at a time when contact with the PLO was strictly forbidden.

ABINGTON: Yes, it was. As part of the 1975 Sinai II disengagement agreement, the side MOU that Prime Minister Rabin insisted on having and we negotiated with the Israelis, one clause in that MOU was that the United States would refrain from any contact with the PLO unless and until the PLO renounced terrorism and recognized Israel's right to exist. I was told that Kissinger thought this was kind of a throwaway and felt that it would not be any particular constraint on American foreign policy in terms of dealing with this issue. In fact, the security channel became a conduit for discussion with the PLO on political issues as well, but it was carried out through the CIA, not by State Department officials. But as of the time of that MOU, contact with the PLO, which had been allowed before then and people in Beirut and Syria used to talk to Palestinians, after '75 overt contact ended.

Q: There is still a reflection of this as we speak today. The head of the CIA is going out to talk to both the Palestinians and the Israelis.

ABINGTON: That's a different story. We'll get to that later. That role really took place in 1997 when Israeli-Palestinian security contacts broke down and the CIA was asked by the Israeli Shin Bet to facilitate the reestablishment of Israeli-Palestinian security coordination. It's in that context that the CIA and George Tenet got sucked into this.

Q: We'll pick that up later on.

You were there from '75- '77?

ABINGTON: Yes.

Q: How did the transition when the Carter administration came in... Every time there is an election of a president, promises are made to get the Jewish vote, particularly about the embassy moving to Jerusalem. How did the actual transition work?

ABINGTON: About the time of the election, particularly as the campaign was going on, and I've seen this during other pre-election periods and afterwards, foreign policy issues all of a sudden took a backseat to everything else. At that point the objective was not to let any crises arise which could become an election issue. As we got into August and September of 1976, the amount of work decreased tremendously because people were focused on the conventions, on the campaigns, on the debates. Kissinger himself was much less active. When the election took place and Jimmy Carter won, we went from being tremendously busy to being tremendously not busy simply because everybody was checking in on him. The senior leadership in the State Department was basically wrapping things up. They were not taking any new initiatives or trying to conclude agreements. Of course, any time you have a transition, everybody is tasked to write transition papers for the issue that they're working. There was a tremendous number of papers written by the Near East Bureau during that period because there were so many active problems going on. The very interesting thing about that transition was that once Carter was sworn in and Vance became Secretary of State, Carter focused almost immediately like a laser on the Arab-Israeli situation. Almost from the time of the inauguration and Vance becoming Secretary of State, Roy Atherton stayed on as Assistant Secretary. The focus was on Arab-Israeli issues. The first three or four months of 1977 were extremely busy in terms of thinking through our Middle East policy, what we were trying to achieve, drafting a tremendous number of papers... If you draft a paper for the President from the Secretary of State for a visit or an issue, those papers are fairly short, not more than three or four pages. But we used to do 15-20 page papers for Carter on the Middle East issue, on the Arab-Israeli issue. The Carter administration started off with a focus on the Middle East. The very first trip that Cyrus Vance took abroad was to the Middle East. I organized the trip and put it together, worked out the schedule with Vance's people, worked out with Roy the tasking of all the papers and the preparation of all the trip books. And he went to Egypt, Israel, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Syria, he may have had a brief stop in Lebanon. That trip then set the stage for visits to Washington of the leaders from Israel, Jordan, Egypt, and Saudi Arabia for meetings with President Carter. That in turn led to Carter's focus on the peace process and laid the groundwork for continuing Kissinger's efforts, particularly on the Egyptian-Israeli front, which culminated in 1978 in the Camp David agreement and the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty.

Q: Going back to the Kissinger time, did President Ford have his hand in there or was it pretty much left in Kissinger's?

ABINGTON: It was very much Kissinger running the show. My recollection on the peace process, I really didn't see President Ford's hand at all.

Q: You left this job when?

ABINGTON: I left in July of 1977 to go to FSI, where I studied Arabic for two year, one year in Rosslyn, and then the second year at the Arabic language school in Tunis.

Q: How did you feel about becoming an Arab specialist at that time?

ABINGTON: At that point, I was really taken with the Arab-Israeli situation. I had worked on it for seven years, an intensive period starting with the hijackings in 1970 and the Jordan civil war, the various terrorist incidents in Israel when I was there, the 1973 war, then Kissinger's shuttle diplomacy. So, as a new FS officer, I really felt that I had been thrown into the maelstrom. I found it tremendously exciting and stimulating and if you worked those issues you really have the feeling that the top levels of the State Department and the White House were following them. You felt like you were involved in something that was important and where you could make a difference. So, I saw Arabic language training as sort of a ticket into continuing on this process. I thought at the time based on discussions with Ed Walker, who was working on the peace process and with Roy Atherton and so forth, that I didn't want to be the traditional Arabist. I wanted to be someone who specialized in Arab-Israeli issues. Although I never learned Hebrew, I never saw myself as a dyed in the wool Arabist, but really someone who was working in the Levant on the nexus of the peace process and Israel's relations with its neighbors.

GEORGE E. LICHTBLAU
Labor Attaché
Tel Aviv (1975-1978)

George E. Lichtblau has had a long career in the field of Labor Economics. He has served in both the U.S. Department of Labor as well as in the U. S. Department of State. He joined the Foreign Service as a Reserve Officer beginning in 1963 and his career took him to the Ivory Coast, South Korea, and Israel. He was interviewed by James F. Shea in 1992.

Q: Did you have any kind of a layover in the United States before you went to Israel?

LICHTBLAU: No, I went directly from Korea to Israel.

Q: And how did you find the political climate there?

LICHTBLAU: This was an exciting period because it was just about the time of the Camp David Agreement and all the events leading up to that which made things rather interesting there. In some ways, of course, here too there were a lot of critical issues to which I was pressed both on the labor and the human rights situation.

The two major events during my service in Israel were first of all the replacement of the Labor government by a Likud government, which came somewhat unexpectedly, since everybody assumed that the Labor Party was deeply entrenched and that a changeover was very unlikely. Then of course came the peace negotiations with Egypt and the visit of President Sadat to Israel and to Jerusalem, and subsequently the negotiations that led up to Camp David.

Here again, I think my role was generally appreciated by the Embassy because of my extensive contacts and my ability to report not only on matters that were covered in the press and in public announcements, but also in dealing with the different segments of the community, both Jewish and Arab, as well as the various immigrant groups. Getting to know people such as the Russian immigrant community and also the Sephardic groups, the groups that had immigrated from North Africa and the Arab countries, some of whom felt a little bit frustrated because of a sense of neglect, and a tendency to give preferential treatment and the benefits of patronage to those [Jewish immigrants] who had come from Europe.

I was also able to establish a number of contacts with various elements of the non-Jewish Arab community in Israel and, from time to time, I was also sent to make contacts with Palestinian groups in the occupied territories, since human rights was one of the areas that were assigned to me. At times, this ran into a problem on the American side because of the unclarified areas of jurisdiction between the Embassy and the Consulate in Jerusalem, which was assigned primary responsibility for the occupied territories, Judea, Samaria, Gaza, and East Jerusalem.

In dealing with the Arab groups, I particularly remember my contacts with the Druze community and with the Bedouin community, where I established a number of friendly relations and was a number of times invited to meet with them and hear their particular problems and their particular views, which were sometimes different from those of the other Arab elements. They obviously were less inclined to be critical of the Israelis. Some of their members were permitted to serve in the military and the police force. They also had more ready access to the civil service, which sometimes also engendered certain jealousies and frictions among them.

Q: George, how did your fellow officers and colleagues in the Embassy view your activities, and were there any times when you were working at cross purposes?

LICHTBLAU: I think generally in Israel I seemed to have had a pretty good reputation because of my extensive contacts and my circulation outside of the Embassy which probably were more extensive than those of most other officers. Also the Ambassador seemed to have appreciated that, particularly Ambassador Lewis, who was a bit upset when I left. He wanted me to extend my service there, but considering how close I was at that time to mandatory retirement at 60, I did not want to extend, and so in the summer of 1978, I left for an assignment back in the Department of State as NEA Labor Advisor.

Q: How many ambassadors did you work for in Tel Aviv?

LICHTBLAU: Two ambassadors. The first ambassador was Malcolm Toon, and then Sam Lewis. I had good relations with both of them and for a while under Sam Lewis, I was Acting Head of the Political Section, since I was really the ranking officer in the Political Section.

EDMUND JAMES HULL
Political Officer
Jerusalem (1975-1979)

Ambassador Hull was born in Iowa and raised in Illinois. He was educated at Princeton and Oxford Universities. After service in the Peace Corps, Mr. Hull joined the Foreign Service in 1974 and had postings in Amman, Beirut, Jerusalem, Tunis and Cairo as well as serving as Ambassador to Yemen from 2001 to 2004. In Washington, the Ambassador served on the National Security Council and as Advisor to the Secretary of State on Counterterrorism. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005

Q: So you went to Jerusalem?

HULL: I packed everything I had from my apartment including my plants, drove down to the Allenby Bridge and had everything including the plants carried across into the West Bank and then up to Jerusalem.

Q: You were consul general in Jerusalem from when to when?

HULL: I was the sole political officer in the consulate from 1975 through 1979. Mike Newlin was consul general, and Don Kruse was his deputy.

Q: The perspective of Jerusalem is basically the West Bank?

HULL: Jerusalem is the capital of Israel and West Jerusalem is very, very Israeli. East Jerusalem was under the Hashemites before 1967 and was primarily Arab Palestinian. So what you had in Jerusalem was really a schizophrenic situation where on a daily basis you would be dealing with Israelis and Palestinians who had radically different views of the world.

Q: Had King Hussein renounced his rule over the West Bank at this point? Or was that later on?

HULL: At Rabat in 1974 at the Arab Summit, the Arab leaders agreed that the PLO (Palestinian Liberation Organization) was the sole, legitimate spokesman for the Palestinian people. King Hussein had to accept that decision. So formally the torch had passed, but informally, I think, the King maintained residual ambitions, not in a sense of wanting to impose himself but wanting to be available if others asked him to play a role. And certainly with regards to the Haram Sharif, the Islamic holy places, the Hashemite had had a long, profound association there and continued to pay the salaries of the Haram officials. I think he had a lingering ambition, but one which was rarely articulated. The Israelis for their part, also very much wanted to keep King Hussein and the Hashemites in the picture because one of their preferred options was some kind of a role for Jordan in the West Bank in a final solution.

Q: What was the balance that you all had to deal with? The Israelis were occupying significant parts of the West Bank.

HULL: They were occupying the entire West Bank.

Q: At the same time we did not recognize the legitimacy of this or how was this dealt with?

HULL: We considered it an occupied territory. We didn't recognize Israel's claims to it nor did we recognize, for example, the expansion of the Jerusalem city limit or the annexation of the Golan. We thought all of the territories should be subject to a negotiation in an agreed settlement. The consulate in Jerusalem was unique in the world. It was the only consulate that was independent of any embassies. The consulate reported directly back to the State Department, not through Embassy Tel Aviv. The Consul General had a very delicate position in this regard. Our mandate was to be the liaison and to report vis-à-vis, the Palestinians in East Jerusalem and the West Bank, not Gaza – Gaza was under the embassy – and secondly, to be the liaison and report on the municipal Israeli government, Mayor Teddy Kollek at the time. That was what we were meant to do. In doing it, of course, we were very much interacting with Embassy Tel Aviv and their responsibilities. It caused a certain amount of friction, a certain amount of tension and was a challenge.

Q: Who was the Consul General then?

HULL: Mike Newlin.

Q: How would you describe the relationship? The ambassador was Sam Lewis, wasn't it?

HULL: The ambassador was Sam Lewis.

Q: You were a little on the sidelines watching these two, but how did they deal with each other?

HULL: Of course, Sam Lewis was a force of nature, he was ambassador for a very, very long time, had an excellent reputation in Washington, an extrovert, very confident. Mike Newlin was quiet, but also extremely competent and very good at getting things done in a low-key way. And Mike Newlin, I think, successfully defended the independence of the consulate and did very delicate reporting with a great deal of integrity. You could admire both of them.

Q: The Israelis are not noted for shyness. And I would imagine there would be constant attempts to, I don't want to say compromise, that's the wrong term, but to do something which would give the Israelis more control than they might have if we didn't do something? Did you find yourself maneuvered or pushed or concerned about something like that?

HULL: Well, of course. The Israelis were always pushing and one of their major objectives was to get the embassy moved from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem and really displace the consulate. We were under constant pressure and receiving constant attention from the Israelis. We were operating in a fishbowl. With me it came to a head. I was responsible for reporting on settlement activity. This was a period of significant expansion of Israeli settlements in the West Bank and East Jerusalem. There was a great readership for this material. We didn't realize initially how much of a readership until we started getting feedback, and it turned out that President Carter was tracking the issue very closely and would be commenting upon reports we had submitted about settlement expansion. So we felt we had a pretty important mission in that regard. Of course, the Israeli actions were quite at odds what they were saying or giving us to believe and therefore reporting the facts on the ground was reporting something that was embarrassing to Tel Aviv. I would go out on these periodic field trips and record changes. On one field trip, after telling my immediate boss that I was going out, I was in the proximity of one of the settlements and encountered Israeli security people who detained me. I explained who I was, who I was working for, and what I was doing. They detained me, they made some calls, and then eventually after 45 minutes or so I was released. Only fair, I had been detained by the Palestinians in Beirut and now I was detained by the Israelis.

I got back to Jerusalem and reported up my chain of command to my bosses about the incident which was a very good thing to do because quickly Ambassador Lewis was notified by the Israeli government that I had been engaged in inappropriate activity. Lewis called my boss to find out what it was all about, and fortunately Mike Newlin was able to brief Ambassador Lewis that this was in the line of duty, reporting on a subject of great interest to Washington. So Ambassador Lewis to his credit pushed back and, I believe, defended my activity. That didn't stop the Israelis. The issue was leaked, it was on the radio and the following days an editorial appeared in Haaretz, one of the leading newspapers entitled “Shalom, Mr. Hull”, which was “Goodbye, Mr. Hull.” Haaretz was hoping that I would be given my walking papers, but in fact the Consulate, the Embassy, the Department stood in back of me, and I continued my reporting and finished out my tour quite normally.

Q: At some point you mentioned the settlements. Were you able to talk to the settlers? I assume they were within your area of responsibility?

HULL: With the settlers themselves. Yes, although we didn’t take a confrontational, we tried to avoid a confrontational approach, whereby we would be challenging personally what they were doing with their lives, but inevitably you would be running into these People, and they wouldn’t be shy at all about telling their story and why they believed they have a claim on one spot or another and what they intended to do.

Q: Were you finding that the settlers at this particular time were for the most part, people who were pushed by religious conviction or was this a pretty good deal? Low rent or what have you?

HULL: There were several factors. There were Labor settlements along the Jordan valley and there it was a security objective that the Labor government had promoted. But then you had a very strong religious element and the settlements, for example, in (???) on the way to Hebron, there you had true believers who were really fulfilling what they considered to be a Biblical imperative. Also though there’s no doubt the Israelis provided considerable material advantages to people who were willing to go and settle. You could get a much nicer villa in a settlement than you could ever afford in Israel proper, and you had a number of financial incentives if you were willing to live in the occupied territories.

Q: Was there a significant number of the Israeli settlers who were American citizens?

HULL: Yes. Sometimes the most fanatic were Americans.

Q: How about dealing with them? Did they go to you?

HULL: They would come to the consulate for consular services. Consular affairs were done in East Jerusalem across the Green Line which had been erased physically after the 1967 war but nevertheless, on the Arab side, which was always somewhat of a problem for Israelis because they didn’t feel all together comfortable. Other business was done in West Jerusalem. The political section where I worked, the economic section, the commercial section, all of these were in the West Jerusalem, and the Arabs if they wanted to avail themselves of those services had to come across and use those facilities. Mostly what we did with the Israeli public was consular services which were very important because they had many connections with the U.S. and then again as I said, we did deal with the municipal government and that we did out of the office in West Jerusalem.

Q: The Mayor of Jerusalem, Teddy Kollek, was quite a famous figure. How did you deal with him? How would you characterize him?

HULL: He was imaginative, he was active, he, I believe, really wanted to unite the city and not just physically, but also on a human level. I think he had a measure of sympathy for the Arab population that was unusual. He was a showman of the first degree, and I really think his public diplomacy was extraordinary in stamping Israel's "trademark" over most things in Jerusalem. Not all together an easy thing to do when you think of the television shot of Jerusalem with the Haram Sharif's Kubbah As Sakhra (the Noble Sanctuary's Dome of the Rock) in the background. Ironically, the classic visual of Jerusalem testifies to an Islamic character. But Teddy Kollek was quite able and quite effective. He had working with him Meron Benveniste, who knew the Palestinians very well, and who had written on the Palestinians and the Crusaders. It was a relatively enlightened municipal government.

Q: You could not talk with the PLO at this point, could you?

HULL: No, but we found this restriction easy to finesse. Technically any member of the PLO in the occupied territories was a member of an illegal organization and therefore should be in jail. We concluded that anyone who was not in jail was prima facie not a member of the PLO and therefore fair game for us, and we did talk with anyone.

Q: Would you talk a little bit about being a political officer? How did you go about your business?

HULL: I came on board in January, and I believe it was February or March when they had the first municipal elections since the occupation had begun in 1967. These elections were of great interest because there would be a relatively free vote and the true sympathies of the West Bank electorate would be gauged for the first time since Israel had occupied the territories and so the priority was covering that election. I know my bosses had some trepidation because they had a new political officer, green and unproven, and the elections would be his first challenge. It was a very interesting election. Often it was decided by "tazkiat" (consensus). In fact in all municipalities it was decided by consensus. In Bethlehem, the old families – particularly the Freij's – held sway. In most of the municipalities, however, the consensus process came up with a nationalist slate of young, intelligent, active Palestinians who were not formally associated with the PLO, but who made clear their affinity to the PLO and considered the PLO as the spokesman of the Palestinian people. So we dealt with people like Fuad Qasimi, Karim Khalaf, Bassam Shaka'a, Mohamed Milhem – really a new generation of Palestinian leaders, who were impressive for what they wanted to do in their cities and for their ability to articulate the Palestinian position.

Q: At this particular time, was there a concern that the Israeli security services were trying to undermine, discredit any potential Palestinian leader that was coming down the path?

HULL: No. The Israelis, I think, welcomed a homegrown Palestinian leadership and their hope was that this leadership would somehow develop and supplant the leadership that was then outside of Palestine in Lebanon. The Israelis gave these Palestinians leeway.

Q: How big a figure was Arafat at this point?

HULL: Arafat was the embodiment of the Palestinian national cause. He was really without a rival, and Palestinians in the West Bank supported him sincerely.

Q: This would be more of a consular matter, but were there concerns about Israeli security forces beating up or being nasty to Palestinians?

HULL: Oh, sure. This was the Carter period. There was a big emphasis on human rights, and the human rights report coming in from the Consulate General in Jerusalem was one of the most problematic reports to hit the desk in the Department, which is still the case today.

Q: OK, you're putting together this report which consists mainly of toting up incidences of who was doing what to whom and that sort of thing?

HULL: To a large extent.

Q: And I'm sure obviously Tel Aviv didn't like this?

HULL: They had to do their own report, and yes, I am sure they found a lot of what we were reporting created problems for them.

Q: You were a junior officer yourself. There's always the thing in any embassy or consulate where junior officers seek out sensation and are looking for extreme cases and all. The most senior officers tend to modify them. I mean this is the dynamic that goes on all the time. Did you find this going on?

HULL: No. There was a very interesting case which was not actually related to the human rights report. We had assigned to the consulate a woman who had been an INR (Intelligence and Research) analyst and wanted to do political reporting, but she was doing consular work. She was giving immigrant visas, I think. In the course of her visa interviews she had a significant number of Palestinians who had been prisoners of the Israelis. In the course of interviewing, she developed a significant number of accounts of mistreatment of prisoners, and being a trained INR analyst she, of course, was able in a sophisticated way to compare the accounts and come up with certain patterns, accounts from independent sources of significant mistreatment or torture of the Palestinian detainees. She collected all of this and she wrote it up in a very, very coherent fashion and she submitted it to Mike Newlin and Don Kruse, and it was sent in. The cable cite – Jerusalem 1500 – became famous. It exploded in Washington because it included a great deal of detail, very significant analysis, put very dispassionately, but which painted a very troubling picture of prisoner abuse and torture by the Israelis. As I said, the consulate management, Newlin and Kruse, as far as I know, didn't hesitate at all. They sent it right back in, and it had a tremendous impact when it hit Washington and was eventually leaked into the media. Of course, that didn't have to go through the embassy because we were an independent consulate. If it had had to go through the embassy management, I'm not quite sure what would have happened.

Q: The normal response to this, particularly looking at the Israeli pattern, is to try to discredit the messenger which is being done in spades in the United States today. What happened in this case?

HULL: The reporting officer was subject to a lot of attention and a lot of rumors were put out and her relationships were examined extremely closely.

Q: We're talking about male-female type relationships?

HULL: Right.

Q: If you've got a woman making a report you can always say, you know, some guy got to her or something.

HULL: There were suggestions along those lines but the fact that the material had come from so many different sources, who had just been there for a visa interview, really made it difficult to discredit the reporting. It was rather ad hominem or ad feminine.

Q: What happened? What happened to her?

HULL: She was eventually transferred back to Washington, I think not as any kind of a disciplinary measure. I don't recall if it was on schedule or premature, but she had a rather unusual personality, she was very introverted, I would say not your typical diplomat, more an analyst, and she went back to Washington and I'm not sure what happened to her career after that.

Q: Did you get out? Did you travel extensively through the West Bank?

HULL: We traveled freely throughout the West Bank. There were very few restrictions. Occasionally, when there was a security incident, there would be a curfew imposed and then we would have to talk our way through the curfew or else have to wait until it was lifted. We traveled very freely.

Q: How heavy at that particular time did you find the handling of the Israelis on the West Bank?

HULL: It was fairly heavy. Certainly they were watching the security situation very carefully, and they were also expropriating considerable amounts of lands for settlements. They had a choke hold on the economy so it was a rather heavy-handed occupation.

Q: You spoke of expropriating lands, I have heard stories either losing records or cooking up records or something. In other words, land deeds going back to Ottoman times weren't recognized. Was there a lot of, you might say legal hanky panky going on?

HULL: There were many categories of land. The Israelis almost automatically of course, claimed and disposed of any state land, land that had been controlled by the Jordanian government. There was also land where Palestinians had legal deeds to it which on occasion was expropriated. The vast majority of the land had been Palestinian hands for generations, but there was no legal title. The British had begun to register some of this land, I don't think they had gotten very far. So there was a great deal of traditional land ownership and that gave the Israelis a certain area in which to act in the fashion they wanted to act.

Q: Did you find checkpoints and as an ex-enlisted man myself, I know the guy who ends up on the checkpoint, particularly at night, is not the best soldier. And particularly you have a citizen military and I was wondering if there were problems with the troops who were doing the guarding?

HULL: It could get very sticky but, of course, our cars were labeled CC (consular corps) so we were advertising our status and our mission. But depending on the circumstance or the individual on duty, it could be a bigger or lesser problem. A good tactic was to take one of the Israelis who was driving for the consulate. I remember David Pinto in particular. He was an Israeli, he'd served in the military, he knew the mentality, he knew Hebrew, and he could talk his way through almost any checkpoint. That was often your strongest ally.

Q: Were you able to go to villages and talk to the various leaders there?

HULL: Yes, because I had Arabic it was quite easy for me. Our responsibility was to get out and report back to Washington on what was going on.

Q: You were there during the Camp David process? When Carter came in what was the feeling at first about Carter?

HULL: Well, early in his administration, Carter made a statement in favor of a Palestinian homeland which echoed in some ways the Balfour Declaration of 1917. That had a very positive echo in the West Bank. There was a feeling that this was a new administration that was serious about dealing with the problem. And then we watched the painful negotiations taking place to try to reconvene the Geneva Conference which were running afoul of such questions as Palestinian representation and how the Geneva Conference would be structured.

Soon after I arrived in Jerusalem, a sea change occurred. I mentioned the Palestinian elections, but you had Israeli elections and Begin became prime minister. This brought Likud to power for the first time, and of course, Likud's attitude toward the occupied territories, especially the West Bank, was radically different from the Labor position. That side of the equation became much more difficult to work. We could follow from Jerusalem the efforts being made by Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and people like Assistant Secretary Hal Saunders and Special Mideast Envoy Roy Atherton to get the Geneva Conference reconvened. There was interest in the new mayors, whether they would step up and agree to represent the Palestinians which they refused to do, referring back to the Rabat Summit decision that the PLO was the sole legitimate spokesman of the Palestinian people. The process ground on until President Sadat in Egypt alarmed the Americans by concluding that President Carter needed help and would not get there on his own, and announced that he was willing to go anywhere including Jerusalem in the cause of peace. We listened to this with disbelief; we couldn't imagine that Sadat really meant what he said.

Q: Sadat at that time was still considered somewhat of a lightweight, wasn't he?

HULL: Well, I think after the 1973 War, people were no longer under-estimating this fellow. Anyway, we had Sadat's offer and, of course, this had not come in a vacuum. Israeli Foreign Minister Dyan had been meeting with Sadat's National Security Advisor Tuhami in Morocco. These were secret contacts between the Israelis and the Egyptians about which we knew nothing at the time. With alacrity, Menachem Begin issued the invitation to President Sadat to come to Jerusalem. They were communicating through the consulate because the Egyptians had no embassy in Jerusalem or Tel Aviv and the Israelis had no embassy in Cairo so we were playing a mediatory role.

I still recall one evening I was called in because we had received a cable from our embassy in Cairo which contained President Sadat's acceptance of Begin's invitation to visit Jerusalem. Since I was the junior officer I was the logical person to be the postman and the message was given to me. Menachem Begin was speaking that evening at a large assembly hall in Jerusalem, and I was tasked to take the message to that convention hall and to wait for Prime Minister Begin to finish his speech and then to deliver to him President Sadat's acceptance of his invitation. I thought that was a pretty cool thing for a young officer.

We tracked the Sadat visit very carefully when he came to Jerusalem and, like others, watched on TV as he descended the steps of the airplane and shook hands with Begin and embraced former Prime Minister Golda Meir, listened to his speech in the Knesset, which struck us as very orthodox in terms of Arab politics. Perhaps the most important thing we were meant to do was to get Palestinian reaction to the whole thing. The reaction within the West Bank and East Jerusalem was relatively favorable. Sadat had said the right things, he was still esteemed for what he had accomplished in the 1973 War. It was really only after the PLO weighed in from Beirut excoriating Sadat that public opinion in the West Bank shifted against the visit and against Sadat.

Q: At the beginning of this process from the Consulate General's point of view was the PLO in Beirut considered an intransigent group? Not only did you have instructions we couldn't work with them, but did you feel that their policy or mind set was such that they were probably were undealable with?

HULL: I don't think we necessarily thought that. I think given our parochial perspective we thought that there were good minds, good people in the West Bank and East Jerusalem whose views should count. After all these were the people living under the occupation itself, they were still inside, they couldn't get around to conferences or attend U.N. sessions and some of the other prerogatives of the PLO leadership. I think we, at least I, felt their views deserved to be heard and appreciated.

Q: What were your relations with the embassy in Tel Aviv? Did you go down there? Was there a lot of consultation or not from your part?

HULL: At the top there were regular consultations between Mike Newlin and Sam Lewis, and I think they worked very hard at maintaining that relationship. I personally did not do as much as I should have to cultivate relations with the embassy. I think that I, as a young man, was jealous of the independence of the consulate and resented any possible infringements by the embassy. And

I think the relationships grew quite testy over time as we would be reporting things that made life uncomfortable for the embassy. So it was a strained relationship at my level.

Q: Part of it I think, would be just the normal thing. Here you are the political officer in Jerusalem and you go to Tel Aviv you are a very small fish in a much bigger pond, aren't you?

HULL: It wasn't so much personal prestige or status. It was that we were living in a schizophrenic world. There was very little common ground between the way the Palestinians saw things and the way Israelis saw things. I think, naturally, we took on some of the perceptions of the people we were dealing with primarily. That meant that naturally there would be a divide between the way the embassy would view events and the way the consulate would view events. I think I needed and others needed to make more effort to bridge that divide.

Q: How were relations with the embassy in Amman?

HULL: Cordial.

Q: How was King Hussein regarded on the West Bank?

HULL: With suspicion. The Hashemites after 1948 had moved in and annexed the West Bank and their rule over the West Bank had been heavy-handed in many ways. They'd been resented. Of course, the West Bankers, most of them were Jordanian citizens and they had to be careful about how they conducted themselves, but there was no love lost between West Bank Palestinians and the King.

Q: So the Camp David process started – we are talking about after Sadat's dramatic trip to Jerusalem. How did things work out?

HULL: Well, initially, the United States took a step back from the process, because Sadat had acted to a large extent unilaterally and this of course, had derailed our preferred course which was to Geneva. I think Washington decided we needed to step back and see what the Israelis and the Egyptians could accomplish on their own. Not much was the answer. When the summit occurred between Begin and Sadat at Ismailia, it became very apparent that the two sides left to themselves would get nowhere, and therefore Carter and his team re-engaged and finally got the parties to Camp David. I think from my perspective it seemed like very impressive diplomacy at Camp David. The Sinai was settled relatively easily, although the settlements were a significant issue. The real blood was spilled over what happened to the West Bank and Gaza, because that's what Begin did not want to give on and where Sadat needed something to maintain his position in the Arab world. Of course, what we did was we took Begin's suggestion of autonomy for the residents of the West Bank and Gaza, and we tried to push that as far as possible towards an interim arrangement of self-government which would then be followed by negotiations of the final status.

When I first read the Camp David Accords, I thought from a Palestinian point of view, it was thin gruel. After all the Egyptians had gotten virtually all of Sinai back, recovered the oil fields, the settlements would be uprooted. The Palestinians got what might look like a bowl of porridge, but the Department made a concerted effort to sell the Camp David Accords. Hal Saunders came out to Jerusalem, and we arranged a series of meetings between Hal and some of the best of the mayors, including Fahd Qawasmi and Mohammed Milhem. Hal made the rounds, or perhaps they came to Jerusalem, I'm not clear, and he made a very good pitch as Hal was always able to do. And again, as with Sadat's speech, the initial reaction from the Palestinians was interest. They didn't rule it out, but predictably in fairly short order the PLO came online from Beirut denouncing the agreements, denouncing the self-government proposal, and then we found our interlocutors scurrying behind the PLO's position, and we could never get self-government off the ground.

Q: What about visiting groups? Israel could almost convene the Congress there at one time or another. How much did they peel off over your place?

HULL: We saw a significant number of Congressmen who would want to hear both sides of the story, and we would arrange meetings for them. We benefited from that traffic.

Q: Every time there was a primary in the state of New York, every presidential candidate, practically, has to say they are going to move the embassy to Jerusalem, and it never happens but it is sort of the ritual. How much did you think of this as an issue?

HULL: It was constant. There was constant pressure from the Congress to do something. We would, of course, hope that the Department would hold the line, as they did largely.

Q: Did you find yourself being pushed in a corner by Congress people who, you know, at least at that time the Arab group was nothing compared to Jewish groups and particularly Jewish political contributions were extremely important to a significant number of Congress people, so were you sort of considered the anti-Semitic Arab lovers or something? Was this a problem with Congress?

HULL: I think Congress, the engaged members, were aware of what the consulate was doing and were uncomfortable with what the consulate was doing so there was a constant tension in that regard. We did get some sympathetic visitors. We were aware of Representative Paul Finley, who was sympathetic to the Palestinian perspective. We were visited by Senator Paul Simon from Illinois, who was very interested in hearing both sides of the story. There were exceptions, but generally we found Congressional attention more critical of us than otherwise.

Q: How well did you feel you were backed by the State Department?

HULL: I think we were backed very well. I think the NEA Bureau and the leadership of Hal Saunders, Roy Atherton by then I think had moved on and was the special envoy, and even in the White House Bill Quandt was the senior director. I think they were very serious, professional and fair-minded people. I never really doubted the Department's position.

Q: What about other countries? Did they have representation on the West Bank?

HULL: Yes. There are a significant number of European countries which have consulates similar to ours: the British, the French, the Spanish, the Turks have a consulate there and the Greeks have a consulate there, so we had our own little consular corps.

Q: Did they play much of a role from your perspective?

HULL: They were active, they were interested. It was a very high profile issue. The British, of course, had the legacy of the Mandate and a special position therefore. Most of the consulates were active and interested.

Q: In the area that you had responsibility for, were there many holy sites?

HULL: Oh, yes. The Haram Sharif or, as it is known to Jews, the Temple Mount is in East Jerusalem. There were sites in Hebron, notably the Mosque of Abraham where the prophet is buried as is Sarah and other patriarchs. There's Rachel's Tomb, which is on the outskirts of Bethlehem. There was Joseph's purported tomb up in Nablus. The West Bank had many sites of religious significance.

Q: Did these concern you all?

HULL: Oh, yes. They were flashpoints. In Hebron you'd have regular incidents at the Patriarchs' Tomb and the other sites as well.

Q: When you were there, were there any of these Israeli or Jewish fanatics trying to do things at the wrong place?

HULL: Yes. It happened not infrequently in Hebron, and also in the Haram Sharif area. There were significant challenges.

Q: Did that get you involved?

HULL: Well, if there was violence and casualties, it would be reportable. We would try to keep track and try to figure out how the incident occurred, who was responsible, and yes, that was part of our mandate.

Q: Did you have sort of well-meaning Christians coming to see Bethlehem and the holy spots and being in the wrong place at the wrong time?

HULL: A significant percentage of the Palestinians were Christians. Bethlehem is a Christian Palestinian town. The mayor was a Christian. And Ramallah was primarily a Christian town. First of all, you had Christians among the Palestinians. You had Americans, also pilgrims coming in, and we would be responsible for their safety and well-being. We would have to warn them if there were dangerous situations, but the situation was not as dangerous as is the case now when terrorism is widespread, there were real no "no-go" zones. At that stage you could still travel virtually anywhere in the West Bank in relative safety.

Q: I would imagine you would get the usual speeches – as a former consular officer – the people who believed they were Jesus coming back to his hometown and that sort of thing?

HULL: We did have those cases. Since I wasn't doing consular work, I really didn't interact very much with that element but it was certainly there.

Q: By the time you left in 1979 how stood things compared to where you were in 1975?

HULL: From our perspective, they had worsened. The settlement activity had expanded in a major way, and the political process had come to pretty much of a dead end after Camp David. The hope that had come with the election of the mayors in 1975 and the new blood, with the intense Carter negotiating efforts early in his administration, all of those promises had not really produced change. We left feeling that times would be tougher.

Q: Did a significant other develop during this period of time?

HULL: A very significant other developed. My wife, Amal, is a Palestinian. She was the director of the Islamic Museum in the Haram Sharif. She had been an International Visitor (IV) grantee, and therefore was on the consulate's list of contacts, and we had met at one of my welcome parties. I had with great relish recounted to her my experience in the Peace Corps living in Mahdia, the capital of the Fatimite Dynasty, an account which she found rather quaint. Over time our relationship became serious, and we married in 1978. It so happened that Vice President Mondale decided to visit Jerusalem on that day. My boss, Michael Newman, was always a great gentleman and gave me the day off.

Q: Did this cause any problems, having a Palestinian wife?

HULL: I think it raised many eyebrows. The Department handled it very well indeed. Michael Newlin had married a Czech national during the Cold War when Czechoslovakia was communist. He had had a similar personal experience, and that made him sympathetic to my experience. But the Israelis found it puzzling. When we went on our honeymoon, we arrived at the Ben Gurion Airport with one suitcase. They looked at my American diplomatic passport, and they looked at her Israeli-issued laissez passer identifying her as Palestinian, and they wanted to know to whom the suitcase belonged because if it was a diplomat's suitcase it would get cursory treatment, but if it was a Palestinian suitcase it would get very thorough treatment indeed. We told them that it was shared which produced a quandary. It was pretty clear that we made an impression. When we arrived back a week later and went through the processing, our passports were requested for processing and the official took one look and said, "Oh, yes, we've heard of this case." It was somewhat unusual and took some delicate handling.

Q: Since essentially you were reporting things that the Israelis rather not be reported, was the fact that you were married to a Palestinian used against you in the newspapers or anything like that? Did you ever feel any pressure of this nature?

HULL: No, this was 1978. No, actually, I think the pressure predated it and postdated it. Perhaps unusually, I don't think it was ever cited as a factor.

MICHAEL NEWLIN
Consul General
Jerusalem (1975-1980)

Ambassador Michael Newlin was born in North Carolina in 1929. He received both his bachelor's degree and master's degree from Harvard University in 1949 and 1951, respectively. His career has included positions in Frankfurt, Oslo, Paris, Brussels, Leopoldville/Kinshasa, Jerusalem, Vienna, and an ambassadorship to Algeria. Ambassador Newlin was interviewed by Thomas Dunnigan on October 10, 1997.

Q: So you went to Jerusalem in what is always an interesting, but controversial post, with the Israeli government fairly well entrenched in Jerusalem and yet surrounded by the masses of Arabs. It was a challenging assignment. Did you have a large staff?

NEWLIN: No. The staff was quite small. Certainly on the political side, we had just myself and the Deputy Consul General, and one Political Officer. We had a fairly large Consular operation, issuing visas and passports.

Q: You were divided into two offices?

NEWLIN: Yes, we were. The Consulate General is located in an Israeli neighborhood even though the building is an old Arab one. The Consular operation was over on Nablus Road, over on the other side of town, on what was then known as the Arab side. These terms, of course, were rejected by the Palestinians and the Israelis, but this reflected the composition of the neighborhoods.

Q: What were your relations with the Embassy?

NEWLIN: It depended with whom you talked. I managed to, I think, get along reasonably well with Mac Toon, a difficult and opinionated individual, who had his own problems I guess while he was Ambassador to Israel. In my first interview with him in Washington before I went out, he made it quite clear that he didn't agree that the Consulate General should be an independent post; it should be a constituent post. I pointed out that this policy went back to the founding of Israel. The status of Jerusalem should be determined at the ultimate peace negotiations. He tried his best to get Jerusalem under him, but it didn't work. But we got along very well. I will say for the record that thanks to DCM Tom Dunnigan, we had very, very good relations not only with Tom, but with Blackwill, the Political Counselor. I think we worked albeit independently but in a coordinated effort to achieve U.S. objectives in the area.

Q: Thank you very much for the commercial, but it's true, Mike. I know we had good relations there.

NEWLIN: That was thanks to people like you and Blackwill and the others. We always welcomed people to come up and meet with us at the Consulate General and whenever I was invited, I always went down to the Embassy. Historically, this was not always the case. There were times when the Ambassador and the Consulate General didn't even speak. I did not feel that that was the kind of relationship one should have at Foreign Service posts.

Q: No. And I will say one thing for Mac Toon, my Ambassador. He treated everyone the same. (Laughter)

NEWLIN: And, bless his heart, he is alleged to have taken an initiative without mentioning it to me, and for getting a Presidential letter from Carter telling the Israelis to stop settlements to help peace prospects. It was all secret. He handed it over to Rabin and Rabin said, "I can't accept this. The government would fall." (Laughter) So he took the letter back. This shows that his heart was in the right place.

Q: Yes. Absolutely. It always was. Now, what were your relations with the Israelis?

NEWLIN: Minimal. I had Israeli friends, of course, from my years in New York, where we worked very, very closely with the Israelis on anything to deal with the Middle East. Tekoah, Eppie Evron, Cahana and some of the others. My commission as Consul General to Jerusalem was signed by Kissinger. The Department noted there was no chief of state to present it to for an exequatur. If anyone, it would have been to Teddy Kolleck, the Mayor, who was a wonderful, wonderful person. I had very good relations with him and his staff. Always the inevitable problems would come up. We always managed to find a solution. I wound up being a guide for high ranking officials who naturally wanted to visit the sites in the Old City. Such visitors were supposed to go under my auspices rather than Israeli.

Q: Several of the Israeli officials mentioned to me that they would like to see the Consulate General closed.

NEWLIN: Sure. Sure.

Q: I tried to point out that we were going to keep it open. They never pushed very hard. Finally, what were your relations with the Palestinians?

NEWLIN: We were really on the political side, accredited to the Palestinians in Jerusalem and the Left Bank. Due to an historic anomaly, we were not accredited to Gaza. It would have made sense to have us accredited there as well, though I had a very good relationship with the Gaza leaders. Of course, during this time no American officials were permitted to have contacts with the PLO. While a majority of the Palestinians supported the PLO, none admitted to PLO membership since if they did, they would be deported or jailed.

I arrived in Jerusalem a year after there had been probably the only free and fair elections held in the Arab world in the Left Bank. The Israelis let this go forward and they respected the results. Therefore, I had an elected leadership in the Mayors of all the towns. They were all very, very capable, moderate people. They were trying to do their best under very difficult circumstances of Israeli military occupation and the inevitable problems of trying to rule a large population--a young population. I made regular visits to the West Bank mayors and other notables; sometimes I met at their offices and sometimes met in their homes. I did most of my political reporting that way.

Q: Could you intervene with the Arabs?

NEWLIN: Yes. Some of the Arabs in East Jerusalem would not come to the Consulate General, but I would have a chance to meet with them. This all changed, of course, after Camp David, when they would come. Not only the West Bank mayors but the Gaza leaders too.

Q: You were there, of course. You were in Jerusalem at the time of Camp David. And also during Sadat's visit.

NEWLIN: We were there for Sadat's visit. It was one of the great experiences of my Foreign Service career. Indisputably an historic event.

Q: Would you like to say a word or two about that?

NEWLIN: The Consulate General played a minor role. We provided secretarial and other assistance to the Egyptian delegation right around the corner at the King David Hotel. We typed the English version of Sadat's speech for the Knesset. I took my daughter, who was a teenager at that time, over to the King David Hotel. I said, "In a few minutes, through that door will walk the President of Egypt and the Prime Minister of Israel. (I went on and on.) You'll want to remember this."

Q: An historic first.

NEWLIN: An historic first.

Q: What was the effect on the Consulate General of the Camp David agreements?

NEWLIN: I was called up by Dick Viets, who was then the DCM in Tel Aviv. He said, "Go turn on your television set, Mike, early in the morning. You will see a broadcast from the East Wing." When I heard this, I thought it was too good to be true. When Jimmy Carter said, in effect, that during the negotiations for the final status, there will be a moratorium on settlements, I said, "This is really something. This is more than just a peace agreement between Israel and Egypt. It is laying the foundation for a permanent Arab-Israeli peace." Carter repeated his statement on settlements the next day in his statement to Congress. In New York, two days later Begin held a backgrounder for Israeli journalists, he was asked about this. Begin said, "Do you think that I, a member of the Likud, would ever agree to a freeze on settlements?"

I immediately called up Dick Viets in Tel Aviv. He had noted the contradictory statements and said he would ask Moshe Dyan, the Foreign Minister, about this when he met him at the airport on his return from New York. Dyan told Viets that there was some misunderstanding and that he would sort it out when Begin returned a few days later. Of course, that never happened and Camp David became a bilateral peace which resulted in Israeli withdrawal from Sinai.

At any rate, I didn't wait for instructions from Washington. I got in a car and I went off on my West Bank rounds, telling the Palestinian leaders and mayors and notables that, "This is your chance. If you want to bring about an end to occupation, you will accept it." They all got a little cagey and said you'd have to bring the PLO in, what would Arafat say, and were we consulting Arafat? We weren't. But I made a strong pitch for them seizing the opportunity for negotiations offered by the Camp David agreement.

Q: Those were exciting periods, weren't they? Were you inundated from visitors from State, Congressmen?

NEWLIN: Oh, yes. That was one of the byproducts. We had the sitting President, Jimmy Carter, was there once. We had former President Ford, we had Senators so, as I say, after Camp David we made a strong pitch. This was followed up by high-level people from the Department such as Hal Saunders coming out and meeting with the Palestinians, people from Gaza would come to the Consul General as well as people from the West Bank and we made a very hard sell, saying, "This is your chance to start getting rid of the occupation or ameliorating the situation now. Are you going to take this, or do we go back and tell the President that you're not?" They would take evasive action, basically because the PLO--Arafat--were not involved and they didn't feel they could do this on their own. It was asking really too much of them to take this on since they were under Israeli occupation. It was unfortunate. It was particularly unfortunate that the understanding that Carter tried to impose of a freeze in settlements did not succeed. Settlements remain a major hurdle. It was still a major achievement...firmed up peace between Egypt and Israel, and things of that nature.

Q: What do you feel about the question of moving our Embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem?

NEWLIN: I think that shouldn't be done until we have, in effect, an overall peace agreement. Congress, for political reasons, keeps opposing that. I hope the Administration...That's just one other erosion of our position.

Q: Finally, do you feel that your policy input had any effect in Washington?

NEWLIN: Yes. I remember sending off a telegram once concerning the West Bank and at the end where you could have a comment, I fudged in making the comment by also making a policy suggestion--a relatively minor one--but a policy suggestion. I remember about two days later I was called up, and David Korn said, "Your suggestion has been approved." I said, "What? What?" They said, "Yes, your telegram came out of the Oval Office. In the margin of the comment was, 'Okay. JC.'" I said, "You don't mean to tell me that the President reads telegrams from Jerusalem?" They said, "He reads most of the telegrams you send." (Laughter)

I am happy that the potential of the Consul General has now been realized. Ed Abington has played an active role in reviving the peace process and has shuttled between Jerusalem and Gaza conveying our views to Arafat.

MICHAEL G. ANDERSON
Israeli Arab Affairs
Washington, DC (1976-1978)

Michael Anderson was born and raised in Illinois and educated at the University of Illinois and the University of Chicago. Entering the Foreign Service in 1973, Mr. Anderson became a European specialist, serving at posts in Poland and Italy and on the Poland desk at the State Department in Washington. Mr. Anderson also had a tour as Political Officer in Islamabad, Pakistan. Other assignments concerned Arab-Israeli affairs, Population and Refugee matters and Peacekeeping and Humanitarian affairs. Mr. Anderson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

ANDERSON: Back to Washington and did two years in Israeli-Arab affairs, IAI.

Q: 1976 to 1978 you were in the Arab Israeli desk?

ANDERSON: That's right.

Q: Tell me, who was the assistant secretary for Near Eastern affairs at that time?

ANDERSON: Roy Atherton.

Q: What slice of the pie did you have on Arab Israeli affairs? Affair seems to be almost the wrong term; Arab Israeli fight or whatever.

ANDERSON: Well, actually I think it was called Israeli Arab. Israeli because we were covering both the State of Israel and the areas that were taken in the 1967 war and that would be West Bank and Gaza. My portfolio there, I was the junior officer of the group. There were probably six people on that desk including the director and deputy director and I did some programs that AID had for assistance to the Arab population in the West Bank and Gaza. We were trying to sponsor scholarships, assistance to Bethlehem University and Birzeit University. A few other things like that and so I worked a lot with AID. I worked with some people, nobody at the Israeli embassy and really nobody in the Palestinian community but this was AID. I think AID had more contacts with the Embassy. We were supposedly giving the policy directions to AID for these various programs.

Q: How would you characterize the status of Palestinian Israeli affairs at this time when you came in 1976?

ANDERSON: I don't recall that we had a terrorism problem or anything like that. The security situation from the Israeli point of view was good. I remember making a trip out there and went to Gaza, went to the West Bank and of course never had any problems with any kind of security. So that was certainly a more positive aspect of the relationship than we have today. The thing that I recall most from that two year period was that the Begin government which came to power in 1977 was the first time the Likud got power in Israel and I remember that it was quite a shock to us when that happened. It had followed on from the Rabin government, the Rabin government fell over Leah Rabin's bank account in Washington when Rabin was ambassador here. After he left there was a big expose about how she had kept an illegal bank account here with foreign currency in it for her shopping trips or whatever and his government resigned and there were elections and lo and behold the Likud with Begin at the head became the ruling party. They were the largest party and for the first time we had a government led by a man who, from many points of view, was viewed as a kind of extremist. This was our main concern. What to do about that.

Q: Did that have any impact on your type of work?

ANDERSON: I don't recall that it did, no. Other than the fact that we had a flurry of visits at that time and I was pulled away from doing that sort of administrative work on those programs to do more administrative work when Dayan came or Begin came. We had just a very lot of high level visits at that time.

Q: Did you feel that the Arab Israeli, particularly on the Israeli side, our desk was sort of trying to figure out who this guy Begin was? They knew who he was but what did this mean. Was this a matter of intense discussion?

ANDERSON: It was, yeah, you know I recall that people were shocked as I say. I know our ambassador out there, I believe it was Sam Lewis at the time, whether he was there or he went out subsequently. I believe he was already there. He was chagrined. He definitely was not happy with this at all. It was of course 1977, the Carter administration in Washington. We were somewhat looking for a peaceful kind of settlement with things and it looked like this was going to accentuate the settlements policy taking over the West Bank and so on. Eretz Israel or whatever it was called. I mean that was a concern. We did have Begin over for state visit and everybody, I remember going to Andrews Air Force Base with all of the other administration greeters. Cyrus Vance was out there to greet him when he got off the plane. So I mean we were looking to try and form a relationship with this guy and I don't think we had much in the way of contact with the Likud at a high level up to that point because we were hoping, I guess, that we wouldn't have to deal with it. But as it turned out of course, with Camp David of course following on after that meant that somehow or another the extremist people worked better than anything else.

Q: You were there until 1978 so Camp David hadn't started at that point?

ANDERSON: I'm trying to remember whether I was still on the desk when Sadat went to Israel. I can't remember the exact date. Right after that I was in the mid-level course. I was on to another assignment and I was following it on TV and so forth.

Q: Did you get a feeling because you were sort of in the AID side of what we were doing to help the Palestinian? Were people talking within the NEA about the lack of real assistance that was coming from the Arab countries? My impression is that there is a lot of using Israeli occupation as a political issue but there wasn't much attempt on the part of the Saudis or the Egyptians as something to really help the people in Gaza or Palestine to turn into them into viable countries.

ANDERSON: You're right and I don't believe there was much money flowing in. More likely it was the Palestinian population in the West Bank especially going to places like Jordan, Kuwait, elsewhere to work and then sending the money back home. There wasn't too much in the way of any assistance. I don't know whether the Israelis would have supported that but you knew there was money coming in because the level of housing construction on the West Bank was quite, to me, striking when I went through there. I just had that one trip. I was out in Israel itself, the West Bank and Gaza maybe for a week. I just recall as we drove through the West Bank that I was struck by the number of houses being built.

Q: These were Palestinian houses?

ANDERSON: Yeah, this was Palestinian housing and so I assumed that was money being earned by workers in Israel itself, that is to say Palestinians at that point were working in Israel and others were perhaps sending money back from work that they had done elsewhere in the Arab world. It looked pretty prosperous really. There was not any sense there of economic crisis by any means. Gaza on the other hand was a classic kind of post-colonial syndrome or something. Nothing had been done. What you saw there is what the British put up until 1948. You didn't get the impression that the Egyptians during their period of control had done anything. It basically looked the same as it had always been.

Q: Did you feel at all the impact of the Jewish lobby in the work you were doing or talking to other people or was this much of a factor? Jewish lobby in the United States, APAC in other words.

ANDERSON: Not too much. I mean they were looking over our shoulder because obviously AID assistance to the Palestinians was not a popular cause with the Jewish lobby. They allowed it to go forward. The government of Israel also had to consent to anything we were doing there. Birzeit University was looked upon especially as a kind of hot bed, a breeding ground of radicalism. So I don't recall having had too much direct contact with any of the lobbyist group, APAC included. I should say that I eventually met and married a girl from the Israeli Embassy so I became pretty cozy with a lot of Israelis socially afterwards but while I was on the job I don't have too much feel for that.

Q: When did you meet your wife? Was that during this period or not?

ANDERSON: Yes, right after I joined the desk. In the fall of 1976 I had contact with the embassy by phone all the time. I got to talking with the assistant economic consular there and that was Tami Goldblum and we had worked, not on the program for the West Bank at all, although she worked, the AID program was really kind of a big money transfer to the Israeli government to, still is I guess to the tune of over a billion dollars a year. It's called budget support. So their economic office in Washington was very close to AID since that was the conduit through which American aid to Israel, government aid, was being sent. We worked with some of the same people in the AID office so I got to know her in that way.

Q: What was her background? I think it's interesting you know.

ANDERSON: She was born in Israel, a Sabra. Her parents were Polish Jews who both survived the Holocaust and ended up in 1951 immigrating to Israel. Her father was an engineer, a well educated man, civil engineer and worked on the aqueducts from the Sea of Galilee into the southern part of Israel. She went to Tel Aviv University, majored in mathematics and then before she graduated, I guess she was a junior, she had an offer from a friend of hers, somebody she had met in the army, because right after high school she spent two years in the army and I believe she was in army intelligence; so one of the people she had known from the army who was back from his job in Washington at the embassy, mentioned to her at a get together that they were really looking for somebody, they needed a secretary, administrative aide and would you be interested and she said sure. You know Israelis love to travel and this was a chance to travel at government expense so she snapped it up even though she had only one more year to go before she got her degree. I think she came in about October 1974. When I met her she had been in the U.S. almost two years.

Q: Did you get married then or when?

ANDERSON: We got married in October 1977. She of course had to resign her job in the embassy.

OWEN W. ROBERTS
Sinai Field Mission
Sinai (1976-1979)

Ambassador Owen W. Roberts was born in Oklahoma in 1924. He received his A.B. from Princeton University and his M.I.A. and Ph.D. from Columbia University. During World War II, he served in the U.S. Army. Ambassador Roberts entered the Foreign Service in 1955, serving in Egypt, the Congo, Nigeria, Upper Volta, Ethiopia, Gambia, Seychelles, Chad, and Washington, DC. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1991.

ROBERTS: In June of '76 I went off to be deputy director of the Sinai Field Mission. Kissinger had managed to stop the Israelis before they completely crushed the Egyptians around the city of Isma'iliya on the Canal. With a great deal of difficulty, he also got United Nations troops inserted to make the Israelis respect the cease fire and initiated a very intelligent peace-monitoring system for the Sinai desert. It basically set up a north to south empty zone about five miles wide and 85 miles long, with five more miles of limited-force zones on either side of it. This grid, as peace developed, would then slowly be shifted eastward across the Sinai until it reached the 1967 frontier between Egypt and Israel. The first of those demarcations, in which the U.S. Sinai Field Mission (SFM) was located, divided the Sinai north-south about 30 miles east of the Canal. The SFM was set in the empty zone north east of Isma'iliya in a strategic, rocky, mesa-like area through which ran the two main cross Sinai routes.

The particular arrangements for the U.S. managed SFM were accepted by both sides, who insisted that the United Nations alone wasn't competent enough to provide good peacekeeping. They wanted the United States to be responsible within the U.N. zone for the most critical area. This was the Mitla and Gidi passes, through which all significant traffic passed, whether they were caravans as in the old days, or whether they were the tank columns from Israel and Egypt that variously attacked each other. The SFM was given the job of monitoring the peacekeeping program in a 15 by 20 mile area of mesas, wadis, and rolling sand dunes.

Given that the UN was to have about 6,000 men in the peacekeeping zone, I wondered at first how significant our role, with 150 people, would be. I didn't have to be in the field very long to find out that 6,000 U.N. troops, spread along 15 by 85 miles of desert, did not actually amount to very much surveillance of the actual territory. The UN was supposed to assure that absolutely no one was in the neutral zone and that in the limited-force zones on either side there were only the agreed, limited number of tanks, artillery pieces, and military personnel. The U.N. established widely scattered outposts of five to ten men, mostly out of sight of each other. A very loose network indeed, particularly as they seldom patrolled. During nighttime, about ten hours of every day, these outposts could not see and were wholly ineffective. Then, during the day, there were sand storms and heat that limited visibility. While parts of this Sinai area consisted of open flat stretches that you could see over clearly with binoculars, other parts included a lot of gullies, big mesas, semi-mountains, and rolling sand dunes, that made monitoring very difficult. The UN would have needed maybe ten times as many people to watch over their area even adequately with its traditional outpost system. The Egyptians and Israelis were right: the UN system as designed could not assure the two parties that arrangements were fully respected. Finally, UN execution, given its political-bureaucratic operations, has always been inherently very fallible.

So I've come to think that the U.N. is a marvelous institution to discuss international issues and to authorize peacekeeping activities. This mandate is the first essential step. But a UN mission, by its multi-national composition, is inept at the next stage, the operations of peacekeeping. For instance, in the Sinai, the UN mission consisted of five different national military units as monitors: Swedes, Indonesians, Ghanaians, Nepalese and Finns. There was also a Canadian administrative support group and a Polish road repair unit.

Q: Any Irish?

ROBERTS: No. The Irish occasionally send units, but mostly they send individuals, often for staff functions.

These five national military units varied tremendously in capability. In some, all the enlisted staff and officers were college or high school graduates. In others, the average educational level might have been fourth grade. Some had all necessary equipment, including vehicles and communications. Others had only sidearms, if that. Some units could communicate with their outposts by radio; others only visited them to bring a daily ration. None of these military units could communicate with each other. Often, most of them could not reach their local UN headquarters near Isma'iliya by phone line or radio. This abysmal level of competence was and is still common for UN operations. It does not represent serious operations but rather a costly farce. UN "peacekeeping" in the Sinai was reduced largely to being a "presence." That was and is totally unacceptable for serious situations. The UN's technical capability needs major overhaul.

The Sinai Field Mission (SFM) thus indeed had a serious assignment in supplementing the UN in monitoring effectively the terms of the demilitarized zone agreement. "Effectively" meant in fact to a level satisfying mutual Israeli-Egyptian suspicions. As such suspicions of outright flouting, cheating, or manipulation were very intense, the monitoring standard had to be extremely high. Even after two years of steadily improving our capability, and strong assertion of our role, I don't believe we earned their full trust, but we did establish ourselves as a serious element in the situation and helped move the system on to its final multi-national non-UN, monitoring stage at the 1967 frontier.

The Sinai agreement fortunately was conceptually very sound. It did not make the UN or the SFM responsible for such a sensitive role as providing the two antagonists warning of military threats or maneuvers. Rather, it set up an elaborate system whereby both Israel and Egypt could watch for themselves what the other was doing in the monitored zones and beyond. The UN and US roles were rather to monitor the two countries' activities to assure they were in compliance with the agreement. If not, a violation was reported to all parties. Warning of a military threat is much too vital a concern to entrust to any third party. Even our monitoring of the terms of the agreement was barely acceptable to both parties.

In order to watch each other, both were authorized to fly up and down the neutral and demilitarized zones on alternate days and take any pictures they wished. They could only come down to, we'll say, 5,000 feet altitude, and they could choose to fly or not, but they had to stick to their chosen schedules. To supplement the two sides' aerial monitoring, the US had the right to over-fly the same area. We did this about once a week with a Blackbird SR-71 from Cyprus. The US photographs were then promptly distributed to the U.N., and to both sides, so that they could check their results on emptiness of the neutral zone and the number of tents or pieces of equipment or what evidence there might be of activities in the two limited force zones.

Then, on the ground, both sides had combination observation/intercept stations overlooking the other's territory neighboring the zones.

Q: Intercept means a radio intercept.

ROBERTS: Yes, a radio intercept and passive radar station. The Israelis already had one on the Gidi Hills, overlooking the 30 miles of flat sand desert to the Suez Canal. They were allowed to keep it. But the Egyptians didn't have any such post, so the US helped them build one, overlooking the Israeli central Sinai positions. These arrangements gave both sides a fairly good ability to reassure themselves continually that nothing too dangerous was going on in the Sinai.

Our job was simply to see that the rules were followed: that airplanes maintained their height and scheduled days; that no airplanes other than the scheduled ones flew over the demilitarized zones; that the two intelligence stations contained only intercept and observation capabilities; and that no unauthorized persons or vehicles of any type were in our section of the empty neutral zone. The job essentially was that of a referee. We watched for violations and blew the whistle, when justified, by reporting any breach immediately to the Defense Departments of both parties, to the UN Sinai Headquarters in Jerusalem, and to Washington. We also watched for anything that might be preparations for a major violation, as a military buildup, but we would only report actual violations of the agreement.

What became increasingly obvious was that we had to be a good enough referee to convince two very dubious parties that we in fact could detect all types of infractions. That is something that cannot be mandated; it must be earned in the field.

Monitoring -- refereeing -- the over-flight arrangements of the agreement had not been considered in much detail by the drafters. It was technically difficult and there was little guidance. Capability and procedures had to be built up. This was particularly hard for the UN, given its operational weakness. The five UN military units never agreed on what had happened in the air. Quite often, the units weren't notified that an Israeli or an Egyptian flight was due, and they would report an infraction when in fact it was the scheduled flight. Then an airplane, or several, might come that should not have been in the area and represented violations. The Swedes would report that the plane was an Israeli-made copy of a French Mirage flying at such an altitude and time. The Indonesians would report that, no, it was actually a fixed-wing aircraft, but they agreed on the direction it was going. Then the Ghanaians would report, a day later after their ration run to their outposts, that they had been looking very carefully and nothing had crossed their area. The next unit would say, oh, yes, they'd seen planes but they had not been over the prohibited zones. The Finns might largely agree with the Swedes, but introduce significant variations.

The poor U.N. commander would get all these conflicting observations, received 24 hours or more after an event, and be hard pressed for what to report. He couldn't take the first data to arrive, despite the need for urgent reporting, without affronting the other national units; he couldn't accept one report as probably more accurate than another without exhibiting bias among nationalities; and he could hardly average them out. In practice, the U.N. commander had to wait until all his units reported in, so it might be two or three days before he would have the materials to comment on an airplane infraction. From the Egyptian and the Israeli point of view, this was wholly unacceptable. Plane infractions could be terribly serious, because military jets could get back from the Sinai to either capital in just a few minutes. They needed to know immediately whether or not something unauthorized was flying over the demilitarized zone and if it were dangerous.

Peacekeeping missions frequently require really efficient, high-tech kind of monitoring. Just as war is an extremely tense, technically executed process, so peacekeeping has to be equally fierce and efficient if it's going to handle relations between terribly suspicious people.

To implement the good basic mandate and operational arrangements in the Sinai agreement, the SFM brought in much technical equipment not previously used for peacekeeping. This included several hundred seismic ground sensors, each with a radio reporting unit, that were buried along likely travel routes; infrared sensors set up in wadis and stony areas where seismic sensors could not easily be used; and strain-sensitive cable sensors buried across roads or tracks. These sensors were much like a home security system that detects fiddling with doors or windows and movement within a house. The seismic sensors had been developed for use in Vietnam. They were adaptations of regular earthquake sensors and were highly reliable. They could detect a tank or heavy vehicle at a mile or more distance, a person within fifty meters, or a rabbit nearby. Their sensitivity could be increased, but then very slight tremors, as created by windblown desert plants tugging at their roots, would activate them.

The sensors were laid out somewhat like a minefield to cover strategic areas. Their layout was plotted on a large map in SFM's operation room with red lights that lit when a sensor was activated. The appearance and advance through the layout of an intruding entity could be immediately spotted and tracked. The sensor fields were also watched over by three SFM outposts, manned to both spot and identify violations 24 hours a day. This system worked as planned, largely because of effective adaptations and fine tuning by Washington and by the contractor personnel (from E-Systems of Dallas, Texas) who handled field administration and technical services. The State Department provided Mission management, international communications, and monitors at the Egyptian and Israeli observation/intercept stations.

Our first major capability problem was augmenting the sensor alarm system with means to identify the cause. The planners had assumed large-scale violations by easily identifiable tanks, attack aircraft, and lots of soldiers. The reality was intrusions by one or more light vehicles, a few persons on foot, or camels moving about with or without riders. We could not report a violation but fail to identify the cause without raising much more alarm than we settled. So we had to check out any alarm with our own staff. Considering what or who might be out there triggering our system, especially at night, was scary and actually dangerous.

To increase our identification capacity, we used the highest power binoculars and the most sensitive night vision scopes available. This helped but was still inadequate. So Washington approved a major technical improvement. We put up towers with remote controlled TV cameras that could scan most sensor layouts. The towers also had big searchlights. The TV cameras worked on both infrared and white light. This not only improved our identification ability but provided a graphic record that could be shown to doubters or to those denying involvement. This steady increase in SFM's monitoring capacity was one of the major reasons for its success.

In military terms, there were no major violations in our area. Both sides wanted the agreement to work. But there were lots of violations of varying seriousness. Even minor ones really counted because as the number of "gotchas" mounted they proved the effectiveness of our peacekeeping system. When I left after two plus years of SFM operations, there had been 71 Israeli violations and two Egyptian ones. The big spread is because the Egyptians and Israelis are such fundamentally different types of people. It shows up particularly at the individual level when ordinary people are in contact with a system. Israelis will hop in a jeep and poke about the desert, disregarding their own instructions, barriers, keep out signs, or even warnings tendered in person. They may be just picnicking or exploring, or deliberately testing the system. The Egyptians don't go walkabout, are not so assertive in the face of restrictions, and are system abiding. If caught out, the Israelis, like good lawyers, deny everything down the line. The Egyptians are more inclined to accept the violation but plead circumstances.

We almost never got the Israelis to admit to a violation. The individuals involved, military staff of various ranks, would report their version to senior local officers. These were loyal first to their own men and to an international agreement hardly at all. The senior officers' report would go up the Israeli chain of command and disappear into their Defense Ministry. We tried to end-run this process by also reporting through a liaison channel to the Prime Minister's office. While we seldom won an acknowledgment of our violations calls, I believe we built up some credibility within both parties' action offices.

This credibility was evidenced mainly by increasing cooperation among all those out in the desert living with the demilitarized system. First we got to know each other by repeated visits to each others' installations, and eyeballing the equipment on hand. Then we began cooperating a little.

For instance, after about a year of operations, an Israeli major phoned us about nine p.m. An aggressive type from a nearby military unit, he said, " Why haven't you reported, as you should have, the Egyptian intrusion in such and such a place? There are three helicopters right in the empty zone, where they have no right to be. I've already reported to Tel Aviv. We're going to shoot them down if you guys don't get them out of there."

We said, "What?!"

He yelled, "Yes, they are very clearly visible. We checked and they're at such and such a place."

We checked our sensor layout and not a sign was showing of any intrusion. This was particularly significant as a helicopter puts a tremendous pressure on the ground with the beating of its rotors. Much of our sensor board would have been lit. We cross-checked with our outposts. One of them reported, "Oh, yeah, there are some winking red lights way west about where the Suez Canal is, maybe 30 miles from here. The lights go on and off, and they're moving too slow to be fixed-wing. We think they're probably helicopters."

So we called back the major and told him that there were helicopters, all right, but they were 30 miles away, over the Suez Canal, way the hell out of even the Egyptian demilitarized zone. He said, "You're absolutely wrong, and I have asked for further instructions." Now, with further experience and contacts, we phoned J-1, the Israeli intelligence intercept station, which was looking out over the Egyptian demilitarized zone and the Canal. We asked, "Do you guys see some red lights out over the Suez Canal at such and such a place?" They replied, "Yes, we've been watching them for some time."

We then asked: "Would you kindly call Tel Aviv and tell them what you see, because your military camp has reported back that the helicopters are in fact right here in the Sinai demilitarized zone, and they're asking for orders as to what to do about them." J-1 agreed, and a matter that could have led to greater excitement was settled.

Incidentally, the Israeli major was not all that misguided. A light can be seen on a clear night in the desert a very long way. We once got stirred up by a light that appeared to be right at our perimeter fence. After careful triangulation over two days, we finally found it was a light bulb inside a tent at a Ghanaian outpost eight miles away. It "blinked" at us whenever the tent flap was opened.

Q: Was either side really trying to do anything, outside of individual officers or soldiers who were playing games, particularly on the Israeli side? Was there a "testing" problem really?

ROBERTS: There was no effort by either side to upset the overall system, but various situations that arose suggested they would try manipulate it. With many Israelis, if you drew a little line on the sand and said, "Now don't go over this," they'd shake your hand while pushing out a foot to see where exactly a call would be made. Done in a friendly way, but it was testing the system. Equally, there were accidental violations. And once we had deliberate cover-up. We reversed this by stringent enforcement of our violation call. It was perhaps our best handled peacekeeping incident.

We had one SFM State Department officer in a little monitor shack at the entrance for each of the two intelligence stations. An officer from each station was also assigned at each monitor shack to work with the American to coordinate with the intelligence command and its personnel. The two worked together screening everything going in and out to assure that no prohibited, offensive-type weapons went in and that the personnel level remained within the 150 allowed.

Our officers worked rotating shifts at these stations. After weeks and months of living with their counterparts, handling routine matters most of the time, everyone got well acquainted if not downright friendly. At the entrance to the Israeli station, J-1, there was also an Israeli guard post of eight soldiers. Their meals were brought out from the administrative buildings by pickup truck. One morning, our officer walked over to say hello to the driver and he noticed that in the back of the truck, along with some pots of hot food, was a bazooka. This was outlawed. So he said, "Hey, you got a bazooka in there!"

"No, I haven't," said the driver.

"Oh, yes," said our guy, "look at it right there."

"My God," said the Israeli, and he jumped in his truck and drove off.

So our officer phoned in the presence of a bazooka, a clear violation of the Agreement. But the evidence was gone. I was in charge then, as the SFM director, Nick Thorne, was in Jerusalem. I sent our operations director, Jim Shill, over to J-1 to review the matter with our officer and with Colonel Dani, the head of J-1. This was not a time sensitive issue and we could carefully verify the facts before issuing a significant violation. Colonel Dani met with Shill and said: "Yes, there was something in the truck, all right, but it wasn't a bazooka. It was a mock-up thing that we practice with, and it's rather realistic looking." He promised to produce it, which he did in about 20 more minutes. He showed Jim a piece of tubing as large as a bazooka with a plastic guard shield and a handle on it. He added: "Anyone could easily have mistaken it. You know we wouldn't have a bazooka on this place. We all understand that's not allowed."

Jim asked our officer, "Is this what you saw?"

He said, "No, I saw a bazooka. It was in the back of the pickup truck. I had my hand on the side of the truck; I wasn't four feet away. I know I saw it."

So Jim told the colonel, "I'm sorry. Where is it? You've got to send it back."

And Dani said, "No, this is it."

So we had a standoff. Jim and I reviewed the situation. On the Israeli side was that the mock-up was very realistic; also, had there been a bazooka they'd only had at most 30 minutes to make the mock-up, and we knew Colonel Dani to be a very dedicated, straight officer. On the other hand, Jim knew Dani well and felt Dani had been uncomfortable in presenting the mock-up story. Furthermore, which we had not mentioned to Dani, our man at the J-1 gate was an ex-Marine who had been in Vietnam. There was no way that he wasn't going to know, four feet away, what was a bazooka and what was a mock-up. This was more serious than just the infraction decision. We were also calling the senior Israeli officer a liar which would leave no room for compromise. But it was a violation, so we informed all parties of the bazooka finding (but not the of background discussions). Thorne was informed by phone. He approved and noted we now had to get J-1 to cough up the bazooka as its presence was an ongoing violation and we needed to enforce our call.

I went back to Dani and argued the matter. He said, "That's fine, but you're mistaken. Your guy, I'm very sad to say, is mistaken." When I reported this to Thorne, he said, "All right. One of the things we can do is to cut them off. You close down the station; don't let anyone in or out." This was daring. Under the Agreement, we had authority to assure that the flow of arrivals and departures never resulted in more than the permitted 150 personnel at the station. We had no written authority to stop arrivals and departures per se, but there was nothing saying we could not. Furthermore, there was a practical problem. It was by now noon on a Friday. The Israelis always sent out about 100 staff on eight or more trucks for their Shabbat at home; and an equal number were on their way across the desert to J-1.

But either we took the risk or we let the Israelis get away with flaunting the Agreement and undercutting the US monitoring role. So I phoned Dani and told him we were closing entry and departure at J-1 until he produced the bazooka. We told our officer at the gate to inform the Israeli guards and to stand in the road if necessary. We sent some extra officers as help and witnesses. Then I went to the UN checkpoint on the road entering the Israeli side of the neutral zone and persuaded them to stop the Israeli relief convoy. I pointed out that we had closed J-1 and that if the Israeli military vehicles and personnel stayed in the neutral zone, that would be a violation. They protested that they had no authority to do this. Ultimately, to avoid being responsible for a violation in their area, they agreed to hold up the Israeli convoy pending instructions from H.Q. Jerusalem. As that was likely to be some time coming, we were spared potential Israeli pressure immediately outside J-1.

This worked out in part because we had good relations with all the UN units and personnel. We visited them regularly and they had standing invitations to visit and eat at the SFM. We had excellent food and the most reliable air-conditioning and plumbing for hundreds of miles. We were a much visited oasis. One of the UN checkpoint officers later explained to me that they were sympathetic with our move, and were suspicious of the Israelis in this instance, but as UN officials they could only follow their own rules. As there was nothing clearly applicable, it had been possible to cooperate while seeking instructions.

The Israelis were hopping mad. The excitable major at the neighboring Israeli army base phoned to say we would open J-1 or he would send out armor and overrun our Mission Headquarters and our J-1 outpost. He did indeed send vehicles as far as the UN checkpoint. But he did not cross the line into the neutral zone. That would have been a blatant violation. We discounted his threat to overrun SFM, but he might well have broken down our flimsy barrier at J-1. It was a dicey moment. As the major was volatile and unpredictable, we took initial steps to execute a frequently practiced hasty evacuation.

Meanwhile we began getting excited calls from further and further up the Israeli military chain of command, up to the HQ of their Southern Command, and finally the Ministry of Defense. Nick Thorne, whom we fortunately could contact frequently, told us to stand fast and to pass any proposals to him to negotiate. He was enjoying it. Originally, he'd sounded a bit doubtful about our violations call. Jim Shill knew him well and suggested that he was generally doubtful about judgments other than his own. So we agreed early on that Jim should drive to Jerusalem and explain things we could not mention on the radio or phone, particularly our assessment of Colonel Dani and the identity of our J-1 watch officer (whose military experience Nick knew personally). Jim made the three plus hour trip to Jerusalem in barely over two.

The Israelis first proposed that we open J-1 and that they would send an inspection group from Southern Command next day to review the situation. Then Tel Aviv said a general from the Ministry would come directly by helicopter. We said, "No" to all proposals and referred them to Nick in Jerusalem. We continued to get a lot of protest from J-1 and from the major. We could see his heavy vehicles at the UN checkpoint barely two miles away.

We were also in regular phone contact with our senior Israeli liaison officer in Jerusalem. He was a regular army officer, a colonel, had been on Peres' staff, and had direct access to the Prime Minister's office. As the tension increased, it behooved us to convince someone outside the immediate military chain of command around us. So we explained to him that our watch officer was an ex-Marine from Vietnam who had used bazookas, had seen it from four feet away, and that there was no way that we're wrong on this. The standoff continued right up to dusk. Then we got a call from the Ministry of Defense in Tel Aviv. It was just a message: "The colonel in charge of J-1 will meet you now at his perimeter now and turn over the bazooka." He did that, we collected it, and turned it over to the UN checkpoint for removal from the Agreement zones.

Much relieved, I invited the Israeli military in the area, including Dani and the major, to have supper with us that night. After dinner was over, and temperatures were somewhat calm, one turned to me and said, "What was all this fuss about, for just a little old bazooka?"

Basically the fuss was about the integrity of the system. We had been able not only to identify an event correctly, but had enforced our finding and buttressed our referee role. Once players in a rough game can intimidate or disregard a referee, his role is much reduced. The same in peacekeeping. I would go further, considering the stakes and costs, and say that if peacekeepers are reduced to being just a presence, they should be withdrawn.

I also think Nick Thorne exercised a lot of courage and was correct in not asking Washington for instructions. He said: "This is our call. It's up to us to make it work. If we report to Washington, they will look at it politically and say, "Hey, you can't do this to the Israelis, we're negotiating something urgent with them. Also, the legal office will say there's nothing in your Agreement mandate that authorizes you to close off J-1 in order to break a deadlock. Furthermore, this should be negotiated; you are threatening disruption of a major international Agreement." All that is eminently reasonable. We were taking a real risk of disrupting the system. But if we let the Israelis get away with it, the system was also disrupted, but less visibly. At the heart of this was that as referee we in SFM were ready to walk off the field if ignored; I'm not sure the Department was willing to risk the operation in order to maintain it. I'm not aware there's ever been a decision on this point.

As for the other parties, we had reported to the United Nations and to the Egyptians that the violation had occurred. Then we followed up with general reports of on-going negotiations with the Israelis about resolving the problem. At the end of the day, we reported that the bazooka had been turned over and the matter was settled. So, for the outside world, there was just a small matter of a bazooka turning up where it shouldn't have been and it was turned over to the UN.

Later, I learned from a senior Israeli staff officer that the issue had gone up to the Prime Minister's office. The Israeli government, however, had negotiated the Agreement and they wanted to keep it alive. The senior political level also did not have quite the military's strong chain of command loyalty. Furthermore, all this was occurring pretty privately on phone and radio so there was less loss of face. Finally, I was chagrined to learn much later that the top Israelis knew the bazooka was there because some illegal weapons had been stockpiled at J-1 before we got there. Just in case the Agreement didn't work out. Security, for Israelis, is too vital to trust to anyone or anything except their own capability.

Q: I take it that the pressure from the Egyptian side was negligible. No problems?

ROBERTS: Very negligible. They were less concerned about territorial security than the Israelis. They had the confidence of thousands of years that they would always be around. They also had a single interest. They wanted the Sinai back. Right away of course; but the process could take time. Everything does. So they were more relaxed about operations out in the field. They did not act first and talk later; we discussed problems with them upon visiting their regional HQ near Isma'iliya and the Defense Ministry in Cairo.

There were some problems with the Egyptian supply of their intelligence station, E-1. Their trucks were in such terrible condition that it took them hours to negotiate the 40 plus miles from the Canal to the station. Then the trucks frequently broke down in the demilitarized zones. Once, several of them could not get up the last steep pitch to E-1 in time to meet the close-down dead line. We closed the E-1 gate, called a violation, and without saying anything over a radio or phone, sent over blankets and hot food for the soldiers who had to sleep overnight in their vehicles.

MICHAEL E. STERNER
Deputy Assistant Secretary, Bureau of Near East Affairs
Washington, DC (1976-1979)

Ambassador Michael E. Sterner was born in New York in 1920. He received a bachelor's degree from Harvard University. He served in the U.S. Army prior to joining the Foreign Service in 1951. Ambassador Sterner served in Aden, Beirut, Cairo, Washington, DC, and was ambassador to the United Arab Emirates. He was interviewed in 1990 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: How did Kissinger at this time use the Desk? Or the Country Directorate?

STERNER: It was frustrating. Kissinger really was his own show. It was frustrating for me but if you talked to Joe Sisco who had by this time become Political Under Secretary, and he reminisces accurately about this period, he would admit to at least equal frustration. Kissinger was an exciting guy to work for. I mean he was the man who was getting these agreements done, he knew how to use power, he was a supreme diplomat, he had these Middle Eastern leaders eating out of his hand. At the same time he was maddening because he wouldn't confide in you completely and wouldn't delegate authority on any systematic basis, which maybe a Country Director couldn't expect, but the Under Secretary had a right to expect every now and then. He dealt behind your back with other intermediaries. The end result was that you got used as a flunky of one kind or another. And if you got upset about it, he sent you off as an Ambassador somewhere. He didn't hold it against you, he just didn't find it very convenient to continue to operate with you around. In fact, he may have thought these are the people we ought to have as Ambassadors. He was frustrating. But there was a lot to do at the desk level. We were emerging from a situation of severed relations with Egypt. I had a very busy desk all of a sudden which meant without even messing with high policy up there on the Arab-Israeli problem, I had a lot to do. We had to reconstruct our entire embassy staff, get an aid mission out there to take care of aid matters, and deal with debt problems. I helped negotiate a debt-relief program and also spent a lot of time organizing the effort to clear and reopen the Suez Canal.

I actually got back [to work on more Arab-Israeli affairs] at the very tail end of the Nixon Administration. But Carter came in...

Q: You mean Ford.

STERNER: I mean Ford. Exactly. The job I was brought back for did not as it happened open up. It was to be the Middle East man on the NSC staff, but that didn't pan out. Then one of the Deputy jobs in NEA opened up. It was back to my old Arab-Israeli specialty, but the timing was very fortunate. I took the job only a few months before Sadat made his famous trip to Jerusalem, and what had been in doldrums the whole time I was in Abu Dhabi, suddenly became the liveliest thing in town. Originally the job was to cover geographic responsibilities, several desks that had Egypt, Israel, the Levant, as well as Arab-Israeli negotiations. But the Arab-Israel negotiations side of it proved to be so time consuming that they split the job off, and I took over that responsibility. I went along on all of Vance's shuttles.

Q: That's Cyrus Vance.

STERNER: Yes, the Secretary of State. Under Hal Saunderson's direction, who was the Assistant Secretary, I was responsible for preparing all of the staffing for the trips and the paperwork that had to be done. I was expected to come up with ideas on how to move this thing forward. Later, when it was decided to use a special emissary, first Roy Atherton, then Bob Strauss, and Sol Linowitz, I had a sort of double role. I was a Deputy to them and made trips with them while still holding the Bureau responsibility. I did an awful lot of traveling in those days.

Q: We have to stop this here.

STERNER: Working both for the Secretary of State and for the special emissaries was interesting and sometimes a bit difficult because there were frequent differences of view about how to proceed. It ended as we know with Jimmy Carter summoning everyone to Camp David in September of 1978. I then had the professionally rewarding experience of being on the American delegation which supported the peace treaty negotiations at Blair House and at the Madison Hotel, that finally resulted in the Peace Treaty between Israel and Egypt. We thought the Egypt-Israel negotiations would give us a good start on doing something about the Palestinian issue, but unfortunately we were wrong. Before the day was over, I must have spent thousands of man hours trying to get the so-called autonomy talks for the West Bank and Gaza off the ground. Bob Strauss and Sol Linowitz were our leaders in that effort. We ran into the insurmountable problem which was the Israelis wanted their bilateral peace treaty with Egypt, but did not want anything to happen on the West Bank or Gaza. They just stalled, and Washington was not prepared to have a major crisis in U.S.-Israeli relations to break the impasse. So, the autonomy talks gradually ran into the sand. In my final year in the Department, before I decided to retire, I had another assignment coming out of the Peace Treaty, which was to set up the peace-keeping force that is a buffer between the two sides in Sinai, between Israel and Egypt in Sinai. The U.N. Security Council, not favoring what increasingly became apparent as a bilateral peace treaty between Israel and Egypt, would not participate, would not agree that this force should be constituted under a United Nations mandate. So the three parties, Egypt, Israel with the United States help, determined to set up their own peace-keeping force, outside of the U.N. and I headed the negotiating team that helped the two sides fashion an agreement. I had a good time doing this and it was nice to leave the Department -- instead of on a note of disappointment which would have been the case with the autonomy talks, to leave on an upper, at the conclusion of a successful negotiation and a professionally rewarding experience. I don't know how much time you want to go spend on this, Stu.

Q: I'd like to go into it. But first I'd like to go back one and then come back to this. When you came back and you were dealing with the Arab-Israeli problem once again, what was your impression of the Israeli Government, particularly Menachem Begin and his Government? How did we view it and how did we deal with it?

STERNER: Anyone who knew anything about the background of the Arab-Israel problem had deep cause to be worried about the implications of Begin's coming to power because in 1970, if I remember correctly, Begin led his party out of the then National Coalition Government on the issue of whether Security Council Resolution 242 calling for Israeli withdrawal from territories in exchange for peace applied to the occupied territories of the West Bank and Gaza. His position was that the Security Council Resolution was all well and good for the Syrian front and the Egyptian front but it didn't have anything to do with the old mandated territories of Palestine. On this he parted company with Prime Minister Golda Meir, whose government had agreed to the proposition that Security Council Resolution 242 applied to all occupied territories. Now when he reappeared as Prime Minister, head of the largest coalition in the Knesset, six or seven years later, people who remembered his personality which was single-minded and stubborn, could have made the reasonable assumption that he was not going to change his views on that subject. On the other hand, Begin was a bold leader. He'd after all created a party out of nothing. Herut was his creation. And built it to a point that it had become the main challenge to the Labor Party. I think there was something of that in his background, a willingness to take chances which made it possible to get the peace treaty with Egypt. Unfortunately the present leader of Israel, Yitzhak Shamir, with whom we're wrestling now, voted against the Egypt-Israel Peace Treaty, even though he was a member of Begin's party. And I think one of the problems we're finding with Shamir is that he has all of Begin's stubbornness and none of his imagination and none of his boldness. Maybe imagination is too strong a term but at least none of his boldness. So, we were mainly frustrated, and God knows so was Anwar Sadat, but at least the leadership in Israel in those days was strong.

Q: And could deliver.

STERNER: And could deliver. Today you have a Government that's not strong and no one knows what it could deliver.

Q: What was your impression? I mean, as time goes on, Jimmy Carter seems to grow in my estimation; he's been involved in the tricky business in Nicaragua and he's comported himself extremely well. This is my own -- but what is your impression of how he operated and how much he was in control of this process, as you saw it?

STERNER: He was, the most effective President that we've had on Middle Eastern Affairs, because at some point he got interested personally in the Arab-Israel problem. And I think he genuinely felt, without any anti-Israeli feelings, that some kind of redress should be done for the Palestinians, that they had lost their homeland. He also felt a keen personal bond with Anwar Sadat, that Sadat was a great statesman of the period. Carter just got involved in a way which was unprecedented for an American President. A great deal of credit must be given to him for his boldness in summoning everyone to Camp David. A lot of these things are pre-cooked and you have these Presidential meetings, summit meetings, you know exactly what's going to happen ahead of time. Quite clearly this was not the case at Camp David. It was a high risk proposition. He could have looked very poorly if it had turned out badly, and it damned near did, if Sadat hadn't gone the extra mile and saved his bacon.

Q: How did he do that?

STERNER: Well, Sadat gave in, perhaps not wisely, on a number of key issues. Jerusalem was one of them, the question of settlements in the West Bank and Gaza being another, the whole question of linkage between the bilateral peace settlement between Egypt and Israel, and the Palestinian question.

Q: Well, this is whole other thing and I hope sometime we can work something to go into this, maybe with Dick Parker. I wonder if you could tell some of the problems you had with setting up this peace keeping operation.

STERNER: The first problem was to get the Israelis and Egyptians to agree on the terms under which the force would be set up. I had no idea how complicated this would be -- establishing a peacekeeping operation de novo, outside of the U.N. I got good advice from Brian Urquhart, the U.N. Assistant Secretary General who had set up so many peace keeping forces.

Q: Was he British or Irish?

STERNER: No, he's British, and a fine man. Incidentally, if you haven't read his memoirs they're quite interesting. He also did a good biography of Hammarskjold. He writes well. He had fascinating experiences in the Congo as well as the Middle East. Anyway, to get back to the Sinai force, there was the question of the size and composition of the force: the Egyptians wanted it as small as possible, and the Israelis had no confidence in it unless it was considerably larger than that. How should it be equipped? The Egyptians wanted very lightly armed forces, the Israelis wanted heavy military equipment.

Q: Why? I mean why would there be this difference between size and equipment?

STERNER: The Israelis basically saw it as a force that might well have to fight. The Egyptians saw such a large force as a derogation of their sovereignty because of course the force was entirely stationed in the Sinai, on their territory. And as they saw it the peacekeeping force had been imposed on them as a condition of the peace treaty. It was not something they liked. There were also problems about where these units should be stationed, about where the observation posts should be placed. The Israelis made a determined effort to try to get the Egyptians to agree that two large Air Force bases in Sinai that the Israelis had built should be used exclusively by the force. The Egyptians didn't want that because they saw that as a further detraction of their sovereign right to reoccupy Sinai as they saw fit. At the beginning the two sides disagreed about every provision and detail. There was the additional problem of creating the zones, of how you staffed the observer mission to carry out the peace treaty's provisions for the other zones in the Sinai. We also had a major problem about American involvement. The Israelis wanted American troops in the force. The new Reagan administration also liked the idea. You know, we must reverse the Vietnam syndrome. Let's show them that we can send American boys out there. But the Egyptians didn't want American forces there. They wanted contingents from non-aligned countries. We had difficulties over such matters as a status of forces agreement. What happens when one of these soldiers was arrested for drunkenness in Cairo or Jerusalem. So it was a prolonged negotiation, but I had the enormous advantage that both sides knew that unless they came to an agreement the Peace Treaty would not be implemented. I had a little delegation that consisted of a political officer, a military adviser -- a Colonel in the American Army -- a legal adviser from the State Department, a couple of other specialists brought in from time to time to help me out. And we had excellent support from the Embassies and the Consulate General in Jerusalem. We negotiated to have one session in Jerusalem, next session in Cairo and got to know those places pretty well. I must have made nine or ten trips to both places, occasionally shuttling between the two with the help of the Cairo Air Attaché's little Beechcraft aircraft. It was a professional challenge and also a lot of fun. As your career goes along in the State Department, no matter what position you reach, there's always somebody looking over your shoulder, so to have almost exclusive responsibility with nobody between you and the Secretary of State to just get something done, was very gratifying.

Q: Was this really the orders -- Get something! I mean, rather than we want it like this, I mean it was really let's get this thing going?

STERNER: No one cared what the details were, but they wanted this thing to be in place by the time the peace treaty was supposed to go into effect. So I had a deadline of about eight months to get it done. And we had a lot to do in this period. For example, funding turned out to be a major problem. Both the Egyptians and the Israelis started out saying we're not going to contribute a penny to this. I had to go back and say to them, Uncle Sam sure as hell isn't going to pay for the whole thing and you know, we had some tough sessions on this point. I finally got Sadat to agree to put up a third of the money and the Israelis -- I said, if he puts a third, you've got to put up a third -- and got them to agree to that. I committed the USG to the other third, and to a financial arrangement for the initial year, because there were some major start up costs, for the U.S. to pay 60% of the costs, the Egyptians and Israelis 40%. We made a hand-shake deal on this without even reporting it to the Department, let alone Congress. I knew I had to get something done, and that time was limited. I said this may be the end of my career but to hell with it. I then came home to face the music in Congress. I went down there and said this is the arrangement which I think will be real good if we can get it, if we can only sell it and Lee Hamilton and others down there said, Gee, it sounds all right to me. Compared to what Federal officials generally have to go through to get funding for projects, I still can't believe it happened so easily. People tell me now, who are involved in that part of the world, that the Sinai peace keeping force works well and that the agreement and all the details we negotiated provide a good foundation for its operations. Much of that was not my doing but the doing of Ray Hunt, who was appointed to be the first Director General of the Multi-national Force and Observers, and was tragically assassinated in Rome where he had his headquarters by Italian Red Guards.

Q: Was it connected with it, or just...

STERNER: I think he was just a convenient target of some kind. You know, next to the Ambassador who may have been better guarded, he was one of the prominent Americans in Italy.

Q: How did the other great power, the Pentagon, which was going to supply the troops, how did you find dealing with them?

STERNER: It was difficult getting countries, including our own country, to participate. At first the Pentagon really didn't want to have anything to do with this thing. They were with the Egyptians. It ought to be a non-aligned operation. But at a very high level the Israelis clamored for American participation. The answer is they didn't have any confidence that...

Q: Well, they'd already been through this other thing in '67.

STERNER: Exactly. And had a good reason to have some lack of confidence in peacekeeping forces. So the State Department made up its mind that it was in favor of American presence, and we after all had a Secretary of State at that time who had been a military officer, who had considerable clout with the Pentagon. And it was decided that the Pentagon should contribute an infantry battalion and some support elements. The only trouble was these packages came in much larger units than we wanted in the Sinai. For example, we got a Fijian battalion that was 600 man strong. Self supporting American battalions don't come at less than a thousand and we had already negotiated an overall manpower limit for the force which had been very difficult to get because the Egyptians had been so sticky about it, and then we had to go back to them and say, listen, I'm sorry, but if we have to have American forces and we do, we have to raise these limits. It was also very difficult to persuade any other countries to participate. We finally got a battalion from Fiji, that great power out there in the South Pacific somewhere, and Colombia, which was somewhat more respectable or at least a country which people had heard of. And that was the initial force along with the U.S. battalion. Then with that in place, our European and other allies began to say that it was something we can participate in in a quiet way and they contributed some support elements. The Italians gave us a couple of frigates, well not frigates, but small naval vessels that patrolled the Sharm el Sheik area. The French gave us helicopters. The Australians and New Zealanders gave us fixed wing aircraft. The British gave us an MP contingent. And gradually it became a real international force. Since then the Canadians have come in with something. So it's worked out well. I had several meetings with Anwar Sadat himself, shortly before he was assassinated, and with Menachem Begin, so it was a fascinating experience for me. And before I got involved with anything else, I decided to retire and do other things.

DONALD A. KRUSE
Deputy Principal Officer
Jerusalem (1976-1980)

Donald A. Kruse was born in Philadelphia in 1930. He later attended Wheaton College and majored in history. Following his graduation in 1952, he received a masters degree in political science at the University of Pennsylvania and then joined the army. Following his two year run in the army, Kruse joined the Foreign Service and served in posts in Canada, Luxembourg, France, Belgium, Jerusalem, Italy, and England. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in March 1997.

Q: You were there from '76 to when?

KRUSE: To 1980, which were the years of the Carter presidency, just by coincidence, as you know. We had arrived in Jerusalem in September 1976 with the Brookings report just being completed, which talked about the need for a comprehensive solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict, that is, that all Arab countries would somehow make peace with Israel. That Brookings report had great influence on Carter's thinking and on his administration's actions. We started with some of our own efforts to get this going. Then Anwar Sadat decided to, in fact, follow his own inclinations. As you know, after he talked about his willingness to go to Jerusalem, Prime Minister Begin invited him. And so there in November of 1977, he arrives at Tel Aviv Airport, the first Arab leader not only to recognize Israel, but to actually come and step on the soil of the state. So, that happened just a year after I got there. It was from there on in a roller coaster. We were busy.

Q: Let's take it when you arrived. You got to Jerusalem. The consul general was Mike Newlin. What was the role of the consulate general in Jerusalem at that time?

KRUSE: The district for the Jerusalem consulate general was all of the city of Jerusalem and all of the West Bank. It did not include Gaza. So, aside from handling the typical visas and passport needs and all that kind of business, we were charged with making contact with the Palestinian leadership on the West Bank and in essentially East Jerusalem. We also were dealing with the Jewish mayor of Jerusalem, Teddy Kolleck at that time. We were jokingly called "the outlaw consulate" because we did not recognize Israel's claims to territory in Jerusalem nor, obviously, in the West Bank. Therefore, we did not have exequaturs with the Israeli government. We were not recognized officially as our mission being responsible for dealing with the Israelis. All of that was done by our embassy which was in Tel Aviv. So, it was a kind of an anomalous situation, but it had existed since 1967 when the city was no longer divided. Although the Israelis, of course, wanted us to accept, their claims to all of Jerusalem, etc., we were not about to do that. So, we operated under Israeli benevolence, if you will. They allowed us to do our thing. But essentially, our thing was to deal with the Palestinian leaders on the West Bank in East Jerusalem. At that time, the political leadership consisted mostly of elected mayors. The Israelis had allowed municipal elections in '76, which had PLO supporters, but not identifiable PLO figures becoming mayors in all the cities of the West Bank.

Q: At that time, contact between the United States and the PLO was forbidden by Congress.

KRUSE: Not really Congress at that time, the prohibition stemmed from Kissinger's promise to the Israelis at the time of the '73 agreements not to deal with the PLO until it essentially accepted the fact of the state of Israeli and stopped the terrorism. So, it was first Henry who got this started. The Congress later on codified it. In 1976 there was absolutely no possibility of dealing with the PLO. As you may remember, Andrew Young dealt just quietly with a PLO representative in New York and that got him fired. Some other ambassadors got in a little trouble if they seemed to be talking to or were involved with the PLO. We would say in the consulate that, "If any of these mayors that we're dealing with are PLO, then it's the Israelis fault that they're still there. We're not in the business of deciding whether somebody is PLO or not. That's Israel's concern."

Q: Could you talk about the relationship between the consulate general and the embassy in Tel Aviv during this time?

KRUSE: As you can see, there would be certain different emphases in both places. We were emphasizing the desire to have the Palestinians become involved, particularly after the Sadat visit and the Camp David process, when finally the Palestinians were indeed given a part of the Camp David agreement. That is, we were to get the local Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza to become a Palestinian negotiating partner for future dealings with Israel. This was the first time that we had really given- We said as we tried to sell this, "You're now given a ticket to get into the conference room." It's the first time Palestinians in any way had gotten such an invitation to join in the discussion of their future. So, that was our prime interest at the Consulate General.

The embassy's interest, of course, as a typical embassy, is to continue a good relationship between the host country and the United States, to, in effect, help accomplish our goals with Israel, which always is to make it secure and prosperous and all that. So, we dealt with different people, different constituencies. Although we both were reading from the same policy script, we emphasized different things. We were trying to tell the Palestinians that this was a great opportunity for them. I don't know that the Israelis were that concerned that Palestinians joined in the negotiations. There was this built-in difference of emphasis. I think you could say that, personally, some of the officers at the embassy and officers at the consulate had different views. The officers at the embassy would tend to feel that the Palestinians would always resent the existence of the state of Israel and that it's almost impossible to see a peaceful resolution of the conflict. I think those of us at the consulate who had known the Palestinians better felt that there was a possibility. Of course, you can say that in retrospect 20 years later, we were maybe more right than they. But the game is not over yet. We still have to see. There are many Israelis who would certainly agree that it isn't possible to have peace with the Palestinians.

I'll give you an incident which occurred when we had a Congressional delegation out in which the members typically, if they were a serious delegation, wanted to hear both sides. They wanted the consulate to brief them and they wanted the embassy to brief them. We would usually emphasize the Israeli settlement building activity that was going on indicating that this was something that doesn't help the peace process. The embassy would agree with that because our policy was opposed to settlements. But I think the embassy would be able to put this in a context of why the Israelis were doing it because these were the ancient Biblical lands that were near and dear like Hebron, Jerusalem, Bethel, and other places would be where, naturally, Jews would want to live. So, sometimes CODELS would detect almost a policy difference. You can imagine that they would be more inclined to be favorable to the Israelis and would raise some questions back in Washington as to "Are these two posts really in line out there? It seems like we hear a little different thing from both sides." Of course, the Department would say, "They've all got the same policy, no change." There were times when there were complaints about the consulate being not pro-Israeli enough. I don't think anybody ever complained that the embassy was not pro-Palestinian enough. So, we had to live with that. I think you can easily draw the reasons why we were different and often times, depending on the zeal of people at the consulate or people at the embassy, you could have some pretty lively discussions.

Q: I would have imagined this was the time when, even before the Carter administration came in, Congress had mandated human rights reports shortly before. Then you had the advent of Pat Derian and the increased power of the Bureau of Human Rights. I would have thought this would have been both an opportunity for you and a track for the consulate general. The Israelis are not a benevolent occupying force. They have a difficult job to do, but they also are as rough-handed as probably any occupying power can be.

KRUSE: They seemed to have learned their lessons well.

Q: So, how did this play out for what you were doing?

KRUSE: The human rights thing was a very big part of our reporting. Reporting on settlement activity and reporting on human rights, as well as representation for the Palestinians were the three major political issues that we dealt with. Human rights, we tried to report as objectively as we could, mostly based on hearing stories from Palestinians who had been affected by Israel's occupation policies. We had opportunities often when we interviewed Palestinians wanting to get visas to hear why they have a police record. Usually, it was because it was some political accusations by Israeli authorities. In the course of the interview, often, the visa officer had occasion to ask, "What was the charge? Why were you convicted? Why did you admit your guilt?" In many, many cases, if any infraction at all, it was some nationalist manifestation of some kind, but hardly a bloody, terrorist effort. You got the convictions either because the client had no way of understanding what was going on because the whole thing was conducted in Hebrew or our recognizing that he'd get a little better treatment if he just admitted to something. So, you had that kind of perversion of justice. It was such a consistent pattern. You heard it time and time again. You heard about how they were initially questioned and they were kept incommunicado and had hoods over their faces and made to stand for long periods of time, sometimes doused with water and put out in the cold. I guess you could say that not much of this was really life threatening, but some of it was pretty painful or uncomfortable. So, we would report these things. Then, Washington, of course, wanted to be sure that all of this could be proven. In some cases, it wouldn't have been easy to prove it. Every human rights report was a negotiating process. Of course, it was always the consulate that came in with these reports. Although the embassy was responsible in Gaza, they didn't get the same level of stories that we did. So, it was really the consulate that always was reporting the Israeli bad things.

Q: I would think that you would have, I won't say a problem, but you're up against really not a policy power with which, close on, a young Foreign Service officer would not be comfortable with. This type of activity and all. It would naturally stir up the underdog juices of a reporting officer and yet you kind of know that the reporting can be accurate as all hell, but it would immediately get leaked to the Congress, which would immediately leak it to the Israelis. It's not completely the Jewish lobby, but it's damn close. I mean, there are other allied groups to it, but essentially, the most politically powerful lobby in the United States during this whole time. Yet you've got these young officer whom it would be very difficult to control. They've got a story and they want to get it out.

KRUSE: Yes, it's clear to them as the truth and they feel it should be reported. In many cases, that's what we tried to do.

I was going to say that I had been in the Service 20 years in the late '70s and I never had expected that what we reported from Jerusalem was so liable to become public so quickly. Maybe it was the issues I had dealt with before weren't as volatile or the subject was not of as much deep interest as reporting on Israeli violations of human rights and Israeli settlement activities. The one great criticism in retrospect that, I think, one can levy at American policy was its refusal to talk to the Palestinian Liberation Organization. We inhibited ourselves from going down the road to a solution with the Israelis and the Palestinians because we basically said, "We don't believe that the PLO is a legitimate party." Our reporting from the Consulate General made it clear that Palestinians on the West Bank would never substitute themselves for the PLO. Our contacts always said, "You must talk to the PLO-only it can represent us." So, we delayed almost 20 years before we began a dialogue with the PLO. I have to think that, if this was a policy that could somehow have been set free from domestic pressures and Congressional pressures, we would not have waited so long. We would not have had the painful burdens of so many people lost on both sides.

Q: Did you have to work to, one, to a certain amount, restrain your young reporting officers and, two, to protect them?

KRUSE: We were aware of the need to make sure that individual officers didn't get singled out. Of course, when we sent in the human rights reports, it was the post leadership that took the responsibility. There was an occasion of one of the junior officers named Alexander Johnson, who prepared reports on her interviews with Palestinian visa applicants, which showed the pattern of human rights violations. We allowed those reports to go forward with a covering memorandum that this represented the effort of one officer and that we accepted this as a valid effort on her part. That report apparently became public. We had to go through a season of phone and other inquiries from press people about, "What's this Alexander Johnson doing?" To make it clear, unfortunately, Alexander had a lot of problems personally and in her work otherwise and we felt was not really the best candidate for advancement in the Service. Eventually, in fact, she did not get her tenure. I believe that she quit the Service a few years later went public completely with her book called "Jerusalem 1500," as I remember because that was the number of the airgram that we had sent in with her reporting. That got a little publicity. It was the same time that "The Sunday Times" in London had done a very thorough report of Israeli practices with prisoners in the West Bank. So, a lot of this stuff was hitting the West Bank at the same time and the Israelis were getting very sensitive to all this. Getting back to the point of what we did with the officers who felt they had to report this, we tried to do it as matter of factly as possible and tried to protect the names of individual officers. I think, to a great extent, we were successful, not that it changed Israeli practices, unfortunately.

Q: Were you concerned about the Israeli secret service doing disinformation on your officers to discredit them and all?

KRUSE: Yes, it was an issue. It is true that, from time to time, Israeli officials (high ranking) would say something to the ambassador in Tel Aviv.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

KRUSE: Sam Lewis, as you know, a career officer. He was there a long time, although at a certain point, he did resign as a career officer and then was reappointed as a political appointee. There would be times that Israeli--I heard once or twice about Israeli officials complaining to the Embassy about Consulate officers being anti-Israeli. I think the embassy had quickly rebuffed those kinds of accusations. But I will say that I never felt in any way that the Israelis would do anything to us in any physical way because that wouldn't be in their interest to go that far. But they did think of the whole consulate as being anti-Israeli, I'm afraid. Many Israeli politicians would say that.

Q: What about your contacts with Teddy Kalleck, who was the mayor for many, many years in Jerusalem, who seemed to try to bridge the gap between the Arabs and the Jews?

KRUSE: We tried to have a correct relationship. He was the Israeli mayor of Jerusalem. However, we get immediately to this question of where Israeli authority should go, where the Israelis thought it went. They had annexed all of Jerusalem, including the part they took in '67. Without going through all the details, suffice to say that we never accepted that nor did any government in the world. Certainly, the people who lived in Arab East Jerusalem, never thought of him as their mayor. But Teddy Kalleck tried to present himself as the mayor of all Jerusalem. He was a humane person in terms of not wanting to unnecessarily offend Arabs. His vision was to have Arabs in Jerusalem living happily under a Jewish mayor who would be willing to dialogue with them and attempt to treat them, if not equally, because there has never been an attempt by Israel to treat its Arabs equally, at least as humanely as possible. This was a very difficult and, I would say, impossible job that Teddy may have thought he should try. We had some difficulties with him from time to time. We had two separate receptions on July 4th, one for the east side (the Arab side) and invited only the Arabs, and one on the west side for the Israelis and essentially only invited them. This was a great offense to Teddy, who thought that we were attempting to continue the division of Jerusalem. We said that, in fact, we're just trying to fulfill what our policy is. So, we did not ever, in my time, combine the receptions. But this made him very unhappy. To finish off on Teddy, he would constantly tell the United States Consulate General and the other five or six consulates that existed in Jerusalem with our same non-status (the Brits, French, Italians etc), "You consulate people don't get the picture at all. You are helping contribute to the division of this city into Arab and Jew. What we're trying to do is make us all live together." The implication was that if only we would get on board the program of a single Jewish administration, the Arabs would eventually be happy, would accept it, would be quiet, and that would be the end of it. At the time I was there (I left in 1980), the Arabs had still not risen up in the way that we thought, eventually, they would. But with the Intifada, which started in '87, it was clear to me that Teddy has his answer, that he was the one who was wrong and we were the ones who were right, that there were two cultures in Jerusalem, and that they weren't going to mix unless there was a basis of equality.

Q: What about reporting on the settlements during this time? As we talk today, a settlement is causing civil disturbance and deaths in Jerusalem. The Israelis are putting one up in Arab Jerusalem. It's on the front pages. During this '76 to '80 period, what was going on in the Jewish settlements on the West Bank in Jerusalem?

KRUSE: Well, a lot was going on, but I think the most important thing was going on here in Washington, where we had a President who effectively said that settlements are illegal. It was very clear cut and very simple. They were not obstacles to peace only, but they were absolutely illegal. Now, that did disturb the Israelis. When the new administration came in in '80 under Reagan, they changed that formula to just being obstacles to peace, not illegal. So during my time in Jerusalem we had a lot of backing here in Washington for reporting fully on the settlements. We did that. We interviewed settlers. We talked to those who were organizing the settlements. This was one issue where we actually talked to some Israeli officials--if not talking to them, we were quoting them because the settlement issue was, of course, a West Bank and Gaza issue, but mostly the West Bank and Jerusalem. Washington welcomed this. It was a big effort going on in the intelligence community to keep completely up to date on this. I suspect and hope that it is continuing. It looks like it is because I see maps from time to time that show the growth of these settlements. It goes back to what Hodding Carter said in these days. When we objected to the Israeli settlements, Hodding Carter said, "It's like two men negotiating over a glass of water and one picks it up and starts drinking from it. This is what Israel is doing with its settlements. It's simply trying to prejudge the outcome." That's true to this very day.

Q: Were you getting a fix on who was going into these settlements?

KRUSE: Yes, we would interview settlers. In fact, at one point, one of our officers actually got stopped inside one of the settlements and was challenged as to how he got in. He said, "I just drove in." But he was detained briefly and questioned because he had been asking questions of the people that were there. This was, of course, before the big settlement push in the early 1980s when Shamir simply advertised cheap living on the West Bank. These were mostly zealots, pioneers, putting up settlements, in some cases wildcat settlements with no authorization and defying the Israeli authorities to get them out. On the other hand, there were some completely approved settlements by Israel that were going ahead. They had a master plan. You knew what they were hoping to accomplish--implant as many Israeli settlers as possible. Particularly around Jerusalem, they had pretty well accomplished that. They have encircled Arab East Jerusalem with these high rise settlements, basically suburban high rises, that now have about the same number of Jews living there as Arabs living in the core of East Jerusalem. When I was there, this was just a gleam in their eye. But they've accomplished it.

Q: I would have thought you would have had problems because you're the American consulate general. When you talk about zealots, from what I assume, a disproportionate number of zealots are actually American Jews who come to Israel are reinforcing their faith and, like a convert to Catholicism, are more Catholic than the Pope - that they would come, get involved, and then if things got bad, scream and yell for American help.

KRUSE: You're right. Of course, many of them continue to carry their American passport and therefore had a parachute if they wished to get out. They were usually unhappy with the American consulate and particularly when we expressed our policy. But, in retrospect, they probably thought that it didn't matter what we said or did, they were just going to go ahead and build settlements. Sometimes they did defy their own government. But eventually, most of those wildcat settlements were authorized. It's called "creating facts on the ground." It's like so many of the Israeli soldiers or settlers who have shot Palestinians. We go through the whole business of the Israelis bringing them to justice and meting out some kind of punishment. Unfortunately, usually, that is followed in a few years by a pardon granted to those offenders by the President of Israel. So, it's very clear that Arabs are treated much differently from the Jewish population. House demolition is standard treatment for a Palestinian charged with a security offense-- no Jewish Israeli has ever had this treatment, not even the assassin of Prime Minister Rabin.

Q: What was the impact of Sadat's visit to Tel Aviv and the Camp David process?

KRUSE: When the Camp David Accords came out with the idea of autonomy for the West Bank and Gaza, we finally had a program to present to the Palestinians as something that they should look at and hopefully find it greatly more attractive than their current situation under occupation. We essentially tried to sell it as being the end of Israeli occupation. The question of what it would lead to was open. We never could promise them a state, but we did say that, "You can participate in your own future." So, our sale was, "This is better than you've ever been offered. It's better than you have now. Join in." We had a very active program. Washington expected us to sell this to the mayors of Nablus, Bethlehem and Hebron etc. We tried that. But the essential answer, which, I have to say, is very understandable, was that, "You've come to the wrong party. We are not representing the Palestinian people. The PLO represents that Palestinian people. We are like prisoners in a cage. We can't talk for the rest of the Palestinians and we don't have any strength. So, we choose not to be involved." I think there were some Palestinian leaders who would have joined in if we had made more clearly what the end result would be. They just said, "We're not going to take a leap off into the dark. We don't know where you're going to lead us. The idea of a ticket to the conference table is not enough for us. We want to know what the end is going to be." You see, we were not prepared to tell them what we wanted the end to be. Frankly, to this very day, we're not prepared to tell the Palestinians what we think they should have at the end. This continues to be one of the great failings of our policy.

Q: As you looked at this policy, did you see any solution?

KRUSE: Frankly, I didn't. Back then, I had the fear that the Palestinians would just be ground into the dirt, unless we changed our policy toward dealing with the PLO. So, I'm half way encouraged that it does seem that whatever happens now in the future, the Palestinian cause is not a completely lost cause. There were many who thought that it would become a lost cause. How the Palestinian cause can be fulfilled properly and happily is still not sketched out by our policy. I could say that the outcome is uncertain. When Golda Meir was around, she said, "Who are the Palestinians? Where are they? What are they?" Nobody says that now. The whole world now knows who they are. Whether they're treated justly or not depends largely on Israel and the United States.

Q: You had not grown up in this particular atmosphere. Coming into it, reflections from your memory of how we treated the blacks in the South?

KRUSE: I think there was very much that feeling although I thought more of the South African experience, where there was a very definite racial difference that was policy. In Israel, that's a little more nuanced than outright apartheid. I remember from my time in the South before the civil rights movement got moving that... The thing that strikes you is that a lot of people, even when the blacks were treated so poorly in the South, there were a lot of people who thought this was wrong. It was just a question of how you're going to change (inaudible). In the case of Israel and its treatment of the Arabs, what I can never answer a Palestinian is why we give Israel four or five billion dollars a year. It's one thing to let human rights abuses go and not blow a whistle or stop it somehow, but it's another thing to wound the party who is doing all these unjust things continual unquestioned support no matter what it does.

Q: As a Foreign Service officer, to see the power of domestic politics on something that may not, in your opinion, be in American world interest, not only you, but the young officers, was this something you sort of had to work on to keep people from getting too discouraged and too cynical?

KRUSE: It is a problem. I guess all of the young officers had come to realize that, in many ways, our relationship with Israel is not a foreign policy issue; it's a domestic issue. Certainly, our French and British and other colleagues in Jerusalem would say, "We just can't understand why you do these things. What is the reason for your support of Israel, your vetoing resolutions, etc." Then in the second breath, they'd say, "But then we know about your lobby." It is unique. There is no other country that finds itself so under the control of such a powerful lobby. Recently, there has been reporting about the President's reaction to Netanyahu, which is generally a mild one, even though clearly there is disagreement with him. The newspapers are quoting unnamed administration officials, suggesting that how else is the Democratic party going to pay off its debt? But this whole issue of Jewish and Israeli supporters and their contribution to the campaign seems to stay outside the whole ongoing debate on campaign funding. In my view, Israel's influence on our political process and our foreign policy is the most egregious and dangerous example of the influence of a foreign country on our government.

Q: In 1980, where did you go?

KRUSE: I went to the Sinai Desert for a year. I was the deputy director of the Sinai Field Mission. That was kind of a follow-on to my years in Jerusalem. The Sinai Agreement came and the reason they had this American team out there, the Sinai Field Mission, was because of the peace agreement that Henry Kissinger brokered in '73 and '74 between Egypt and Israel, which called for the U.S. to monitor the forces in the Sinai. So, we were out there monitoring, we with our helicopters and Cheney Blazers out among the Bedouins and the camels. So, we were right in the middle of the Sinai Desert.

Q: What was the status during '80 to '81 during this period you were in the Sinai?

KRUSE: It was half way into the terms of the peace agreement between Israel and Egypt; their peace treaty in '78, which called for a complete withdrawal of all Israeli forces from the Sinai within a certain period of time. The period of time was, I think, eventually to end in '82. So, while I was there, we were still half way there. We still had some Israeli forces in part of the Sinai. It was a confidence-building measure for the Egyptians and the Israelis to have us there, particularly for the Israelis. They insisted on us. They wouldn't take the UN. So, we paid the price to do that. It was a fascinating experience. It was unusual because it was the only time in my career when my family could not be with me. In that sense, I would wake up in the morning and look at myself in the mirror and say, "What in the world are you doing out here?"

Q: Tell about how it progressed while you were there first.

KRUSE: This was the first time I had dealt directly with the Israelis in an official sense, and Egyptians; dealing with each of them. When you would go into Cairo, you'd have an agenda for the meeting. You had a lot of tschai (tea), coffee, soft drinks, lots of jokes, lots of laughs, get through the agenda, come back in a month or two and not a thing had been done. But we had had no arguments. When we would go in with the Israelis, there were a certain amount of refreshments and that type of thing, but every item on the agenda, every jot and tittle, would be argued over. You would set deadlines for this or that. You'd have courses of action for every one of the items. When you came back in a couple of months, it was all done. Everybody had done their work. So, it was a difference between the way the Israelis acted and the way the Arabs, in this case, the Egyptians, acted. The Israelis were such sticklers for every phrase of that agreement they signed with Egypt. That's why I was so appalled when it comes to the agreement that Israel signed with the Palestinians, they don't care at all about keeping any parts of it, no deadlines, no nothing. No apologies. Just forget it. If we had tried that with the Egyptians, we would have been frayed by the Israelis.

Q: You mean the Israelis.

KRUSE: Well, if we had let the Egyptians get away with violations. If the Egyptians hadn't met a deadline, boy, we would have never heard the end of it. So, it all depends on who's in a superior position.

Q: I've talked to some other people who have been involved in this and they say that, as you said, things were a little bit haphazard and sloppy and all. But the Israelis were always testing. They would try to get things they weren't supposed to have--overflights or get arms in or something. It was almost a game of doing this. People I've talked to say it was basic, almost hostility there. Did you feel that or not? Was that unfair?

KRUSE: I think what you've got is this dual strain in the Israeli psyche or makeup. You've got the one that identifies with the Labor party, where indeed, they strive and believe that a Jew can make it in the world on his own, that he doesn't need to worry that everybody is after him. The Likud is the mentality that it doesn't matter what the Jews ever do, they would never accept them as normal people. Therefore, according to Likud, if Israel wants something, it's going to have to fight for it and don't worry if the world objects. I think that kind of paranoia is, to a certain extent, in every Israeli. Given the history of the Jewish people, it is understandable. Of course, the history of the Middle East has not been one where their arrival and setting up their state has been wildly welcomed. So, I understand that they may not feel that they are completely a normal state in the region. But I think the Labor people felt that normalcy was a possibility. I'm afraid Likud doesn't think it ever is going to be a possibility.

Q: Were there any incidents or any particular problems that you might want to recount?

KRUSE: No, just the fact that we almost had the helicopter crash one time with our director and a whole gaggle of Egyptian officers. I wasn't on it. It had taken off with a full load of fuel. They had forgotten that they were at an altitude of about 4,000 feet. It was somewhere near Mt. Sinai. That makes a little difference in your lift. So, the thing got up and bounced a whole lot, turned over, but did not catch fire. It was a scary thing. If a tragedy had happened, I must say, it would have marked the Sinai Field Mission in people's minds forever.

C. WILLIAM KONTOS
Director, Sinai Support Mission
Washington, DC (1976-1980)

Ambassador C. William Kontos was born in Illinois in 1922. He received a bachelor's degree and a master's degree from the University of Chicago. He served in the U.S. Army from 1943-1946. Ambassador Kontos had served in the USAID program throughout most of his Foreign Service career. His career included positions in Greece, Sri Lanka, Nigeria, Pakistan, Lebanon, Israel, and an ambassadorship to Sudan. Ambassador Kontos was interviewed in 1992 by Thomas Stern.

Q: Then in 1976, you became the Special Representative of the President and Director of the United States Sinai Support Mission. How did that come about?

KONTOS: I guess it was the result of my directorship of the two Task Forces that I have earlier described. Since those groups worked well, I guess I became known to the Department's leadership. The Sinai job was not one that I sought; in fact I don't think I ever went out to seek any job, beyond my first one.

At that time, the headquarters of the Sinai Mission was on the Seventh Floor of the Department of State. That is where it was established initially; much, much later it moved to Rome as headquarters of the successor organization -- the Multilateral Force and Observers organization (MFO).

Essentially, the Mission was one result of Kissinger's shuttle which took place after the war of 1973. At that time, the Secretary was able to persuade the Egyptians and Israelis to agree to a transition period before the Sinai was turned over to Egypt. The transition period was intended as a time when both sides could build confidence in the peaceful intent of the other. It enabled Kissinger to lower tensions between the two foes and reduce the prospects of further clashes between them.

The Sinai Mission was established in the Sinai astride the traditional invasion routes -- the Mitla and Gidi Passes. Under the terms of the agreement signed by the U.S., Egypt and Israel, the U.S. was committed to deploy a civilian peace-keeping force in the Sinai that would protect the approaches to these passes from either side. This was to be done by setting up observation posts, electronic sensors and listening devices that would monitor any activity in the passes or nearby. Moreover, as part of the agreement, both Egypt and Israel were permitted a major observation point, which was to be manned by themselves. The Israelis already had one; the Egyptians were permitted to build one of their own. That allowed each side also to verify with its own people that no invasion force was approaching the passes. The Secretary and the NSC decided that the State Department would become responsible for the management of this observation effort. The Department decided to employ a civilian contractor who would work under the direction of the Department.

In the Fall of 1975, Joe Sisco, then Under Secretary for Political Affairs, Frank Wisner of the Secretariat and Bob Oakley of the NSC were assigned the responsibility for drafting the first mission statement. In December, 1975, I was asked by Winston Lord, on behalf of the Secretary, to take charge of the project. The man who had been working on the project had already brought in some people -- one from the Pentagon, a naval contractor, a couple from the research arm of the Army, a Marine Corps Colonel. When I was sworn in as Special Representative of the President, a partial staff was already in place and a request for proposals (RFP) had been publicized in a Commerce announcement. The proposals were for the establishment of a field mission, including housing for up to 200 people, observation posts at both ends of the passes, deployment of electronic gear, placement of the sensors, procurement of observation gear (telescopes, binoculars, night vision devices), and finally to construct a facility in the Sinai. The contractor also had to man this observation operation 24 hours each day. The responses were coming in as I took over the job. There was some urgency in making decisions because we were working on a deadline, which was sometime in the following Spring. A special appropriation had been made so that funds were not a problem.

My first task was to review each of the proposals that were already coming in. That was done meticulously and with great care. We set up a special board which included people with contracting expertise from various agencies to review the proposals. We established a dozen criteria that had to be met. Weights were given to those proposals that best met the criteria. In the end, the successful bidder was a Texas organization, headquartered outside of Dallas, called "E Systems". It, in turn, negotiated a subcontract with a Texas construction firm to build the facilities -- housing, offices, observation posts. The subcontractor, H.B. Zachary, was headquartered in El Paso and accustomed to building with pre-fabricated concrete units. They had used that process in the construction of motels. These concrete units were ideal for the Sinai requirements; each had living accommodations, kitchens, bedrooms. They were designed to be placed one on top of the other, so that a building of almost any dimension could be put up. The contractor obtained these units from an existing job and put them on a ship leaving Corpus Christi, Texas to be delivered in the Sinai.

Meanwhile, a group, including two or three men from my office and some we borrowed from the Defense Department, went out to the Sinai to survey the situation. They went to both Cairo and Jerusalem and established links with liaison officials of both sides. They identified a site appropriate for the Sinai Field Mission. The Sinai was then still Israeli occupied up to the passes. Beyond those passes, towards the Suez Canal, the land was in Egyptian hands, although Egypt had no military presence there. Only nomads wandered around in the area between the Suez and the passes. The only Egyptian military presence in the Sinai permitted by the agreement was the personnel to man the observation post. We chose the site, the perimeter of which was to be patrolled by armed U.N. guards. Our personnel would be unarmed.

We are now in January 1976. "E Systems" and the construction contractor used a number of airplanes -- converted 747s -- to ship the construction material in order to build a temporary facility on the site we had selected. This temporary base was to be used by the construction workers and also to serve as the beginning of our operations. We established communications between Washington, Jerusalem and Cairo. There was a lot of work that had to be done in a short period of time. E systems was expert in loading the planes so that the material was unloaded in a proper sequence. We did have a crisis when the issue arose as to how the heavy concrete units would be brought into the Sinai; this required flat bed trucks. The passes were obviously much closer to Egypt and we thought we would use that route -- from Cairo to the Canal, across the Canal and to the site. But the roads on the Egyptian part of the Sinai were meager and primitive; also there were no facilities in any Egyptian port for unloading these heavy units. Even if there had been adequate cranes, the trucks might have had problems crossing the Suez and might have blocked the Canal. So we scrapped the idea of landing them in Egypt and took them to Haifa instead. The route was obviously much longer, but roads were paved all the way to the Sinai site.

As the ships were en route to Haifa, I got a call from my deputy in Washington. I was in Cairo on one of my frequent trips during this period. He told me that the construction contractor's shipping agent had said that if the ship docks in Haifa, he would be in violation of the Arab embargo. That would mean that no other ships of that shipping line would henceforth be permitted to dock in an Arab port. So we had to get involved in finessing the Arab embargo rules. We had our Ambassador approach the headquarters of the embargo enforcement agency, which was in Damascus, to see whether the Haifa docking would be a violation. We were able in the end to persuade the shipping line to dock in Haifa without penalty. I have a vague recollection that in order to avoid the embargo, the ship had to stop in a neutral port first (Nicosia, I believe) and then it could proceed to Haifa. I am not clear on the details, but some kind of legal subterfuge was worked out. That was one of the many, many difficulties that we overcame.

I must say that I had terrific cooperation from both the Egyptians and the Israelis. The Egyptians appointed a Major General to be the liaison officer and the Israelis appointed an Army Intelligence Corps Colonel. They both were skilled at cutting corners and through red tape. I shuttled between Cairo and Jerusalem and Washington.

The temporary camps were constructed. The first message was sent reporting to me and to the Secretary that the Mission was in business. The living conditions were far from ideal; winter in the Sinai in prefabs was not exactly a picnic.

We also had to establish a continual support system for the Mission. Most of the fresh fruit and vegetables came from Egypt and the rest of the food stuffs from Israel. E Systems was responsible for supplying all the provisions.

After the Mission was working, its main functions were to observe events around the passes and to maintain liaison with both sides to resolve any disputes that arose from observations -- ours as well as theirs. We had to report any trespasses into the neutral zone. We had a very elaborate reporting system to both sides and to Washington, so that if there were a violation of either the airspace or the neutral zone by any unauthorized vehicle or person -- we had occasional mistaken penetrations by people who did not know where the boundaries were or who may not have had appropriate authorizations -- there would be an immediate report made. There were a number of unauthorized penetrations, mostly by uninformed people. The more difficult aspect was air violations, which we did not handle as well as ground ones. We had a U.S. airplane monitor the Sinai periodically, that provided air cover for events in the Sinai and provided pictures to both sides from those flights. These planes had very good military photographic equipment on board; we used U-2s with the agreement of both parties.

Our main objective was to build confidence that the U.S. was serving both sides even-handedly and effectively.

We had a number of sticky moments. None of the Egyptian or Israeli observers were to have arms of any kind -- personal weapons or otherwise. There were some attempts made to bring arms into each side's observer posts. The Israelis had a very sophisticated observation point filled with the latest in listening and detecting equipment. The Egyptians were building a much more primitive post on their side of the passes. Both sides tried from time to time to pass our posts with guns, which they always said were with them inadvertently. We always checked the Israeli and Egyptian observers as they went to and from their observation posts. The Americans who did this checking were Foreign Service officers from State and AID. We had 12-15 young FSOs who were liaison officers to the two sides. The E Systems people manned the sensors and other observation equipment, but dealing with each side was left to the FSOs who were stationed at each observation post. The FSOs lived first in temporary and then in permanent barracks along with the E Systems people. They would go to their posts every eight hours where they observed what was going on in the observation posts of each side.

Q: Why was it decided that these observation post duties would be performed by Foreign Service officers?

KONTOS: Because it was a ticklish matter. We needed some people who had a feel for the sensitivities of the situation. The FSOs had other responsibilities. From time to time, they would be assigned to our offices in both Egypt and Israel. Two or three would man those offices on a rotational basis. They served as our day to day liaison to both countries. We therefore needed people with some good sense; in some cases, we required an officer with language skills. The assignment of an FSO or an AID officer to the Sinai Mission was for one year, but I think for them it was a very interesting, rewarding assignment despite some of the long and tedious hours at the observation posts. They got a lot out of their assignments.

Q: How does one evaluate the success of an enterprise like the Sinai Support Mission?

KONTOS: You judge it by the fact that it had a beginning, a middle and an end. It fulfilled all the agreements signed by all three parties after the Egyptians withdrew from the Sinai: the US, the Israelis and the Egyptians. The deal was sweetened for the Israelis -- who in giving up the Sinai also had to give up two airbases -- by two substitute bases financed by us on their territory. That cost the US several hundreds of million dollars. The Israelis withdrew from the whole of Sinai by the end of 1981, except for a very small area called Taba, which had been in dispute ever since the negotiations had started. It took further international mediation before Taba -- with its large Israeli tourist hotel -- was returned to the Egyptians.

The whole arrangement worked out very well, thanks in major part to our presence and our role as intermediary plus our financial generosity -- that made it worthwhile for the Israelis to give up their two airbases -- including large amounts of foreign assistance for the following years up to and including today.

Q: What was your role in obtaining Congressional support for the Sinai arrangement?

KONTOS: The enabling legislation which authorized the funds also included a requirement for semi-annual reports. So now there is a complete record of what occurred throughout the life of the Sinai Mission. There were also Congressional hearings. On the House side, it was Lee Hamilton's Europe-Middle East subcommittee that held the hearings; on the Senate side, it varied. For a long time the hearings were chaired by Senator Kassebaum of Kansas. I used to brief her privately as well. Hamilton had regular hearings. I was very pleased that I was able to report to him regularly that we had not spent all the funds appropriated because of our efficient operation. The Congressmen were very pleased to hear that.

I was the Director of the Sinai Support Mission for four years. After I left, the construction work was all done, the observation routine had been well established. While still Director and after things had settled down, I made it a practice to visit the area periodically, making sure that I would alternate my starting points between Cairo and Jerusalem. I used to talk to both sides and brief them on what was going on. The trips were often just an opportunity to maintain cordial relationships with both sides, but there were always problems cropping up -- transportation, clearances. At the height of our construction program, there were probably 185 people on site; we never reached the 200 mark. E Systems brought in people largely from Greenville, Texas which is where their plant was located. Many of them had never been outside of Greenville when then, all of a sudden, they found themselves in the Sinai with access to both Egypt and Israel. To deal with culture shock, we mounted an orientation program for the E Systems people, with specific emphasis on the principal executives of the contractor. Initially, we put on a two day program for them. They were briefed by Gordon Beyer who was on the Egypt desk, Larry Eagleburger, and others.

Of course, E Systems had to recruit their own staff for the tasks in the Sinai. I was amazed at how few problems their personnel created. Only a few got a little tipsy, but there were no real drinking problems. One or two were sent back home because they were found with some pot but, in general, there were no drug problems. In the latter stages of my tour, we permitted women to work in the Sinai; we had no problems with that. It was remarkable how little trouble we did have. In part, that was due to the E Systems' careful selection process; they picked people who were courteous, flexible and tolerant and who turned out to be good representatives of America abroad, even though most had never left Texas before. The supervisory staff served for two years and the others worked for 12-18 months.

I had two deputies on my staff: one was living in the field and one was in Washington. The deputy in the field was in charge of the whole operation; the E Systems people reported to him. He controlled the operations; he in fact was the Mayor of a small town in the Sinai. They had a fire brigade, a security force, a cafeteria, etc. My deputy established the ground rules for leaves, etc. He was also the principal liaison with the UN which as I mentioned guarded the perimeters of our observation operations. They consisted of two rotating battalions: one Ghanaian and one Fijian. My deputy was also the principal liaison with the Egyptians and the Israelis and in charge of our two offices in Cairo and Jerusalem. My first deputy was Nick Thorne, whose wife resided in Cairo; his deputy was Owen Roberts, whose wife lived in Jerusalem. The officers themselves lived in the Sinai station. They may have seen their wives briefly every two weeks or so.

There was a story I might mention at this point. One of the drivers of the Sinai Field Mission director was made available to me when I would visit the area. He was a 19-20 year old Texan who had never left Greenville until this assignment. He may have had one year at the local community college and then had joined the E Systems. He was a splendid driver. But the most fascinating part of this young man's experience was how rapidly he mastered basic Arabic so that he could drive around Cairo. He knew all the labyrinths in Cairo of which there are many. He mastered the topography of Cairo so well that he could find almost any location in the fastest way possible; he knew where the traffic jams were forming and how to bypass them. He acquired the same skills for Jerusalem and Tel Aviv -- he learned enough Hebrew to get by in Israel as well. Everybody knew him; everybody greeted him warmly. Sometimes, when he needed to get directions, he would ask for them in the local tongue with a Texas accent. It was an eye opener for us and a wonderful experience for him.

Before we leave my Sinai experience, I would like to make one more point. The Sinai Support Mission was, in my view, one of the most successful cooperative ventures between the government and the private sector that I know about. It was run by the Department of State; it handled a major contractual negotiation; it oversaw the work of two splendid large Texan firms; it was a model in many ways of how the U.S. government and the private sector can collaborate effectively. We issued guidelines on the dos and don'ts. The relationship was very amicable and constructive and in the final analysis, very productive. When people say that the State Department doesn't know "how to run things", they should look back on the Sinai operations which were exceptionally well orchestrated and an illustration of good efficient and effective management.

Q: Before we end this discussion, I would like to ask how much interest did the Secretary and other senior principals show in the work of the Sinai Mission?

KONTOS: A great deal. Initially, the whole operation was run out of Eagleburger's office, when he was the Under Secretary for Management. He was personally involved until the Carter administration came in and then it was to the NSC that I reported regularly. The Congress, when it authorized the Sinai operation, made it technically an independent agency. We had our own line item in the budget. My official title was Special Representative of the President and Director of the Sinai Support Mission. I reported to the Secretary of State and to the President, although in the real world, it was to the President's Special Assistant for National Security Affairs, first Scowcroft and then Brzezinski, who followed our activities on behalf of the President. So I worked closely with the NSC as well as Larry Eagleburger. Secretary Vance showed considerable interest in the operation when he became Secretary of State; he was very much engaged during his early days when Congress mandated a restriction on the number of Americans who could be posted in the Sinai. (They were concerned for their security.) I remember that one day, right after lunch, I got a call from the Secretary's Office that I needed to come up with a master plan which would determine the number of Americans needed to be in the Sinai at any one time so that he could convey this information to a Congressional committee which was in the process of establishing this limit. So the two of us decided rather arbitrarily what the personnel limits would be.

Ben Read, who succeeded Eagleburger as Under Secretary for Management, also continued to show much interest in our activities.

GILBERT D. KULICK
Israeli Desk, Office of Israel and Arab-Israel Affairs
Washington, DC (1976-1978)

Deputy Political Counselor
Tel Aviv (1978-1981)

Sinai Planning Group
Washington, DC (1981-1982)

Gilbert D. Kulick was born in Connecticut in 1942. He attended the University of Texas and graduated from there in 1963. He earned his M.A. from UCLA in 1965. In 1966 he joined the Foreign Service. His posting included Mogadishu, Addis Ababa, Tel Aviv, and Washington D.C. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy on January 29, 1993.

KULICK: [In 1975 and 1976] what followed was the real turning point in my career, at least. In the course of a year [in INR] I got to know people all over the State Department and became much more aware of how the system worked and who was doing what. I don't remember exactly how this came about, but I met a fellow working on the Israel desk, named Mike Sternberg. I remembered very clearly being struck that Sternberg was working on the Israel desk, because it had been almost taken as a "given," from the time that I entered the Foreign Service, that Jews were not assigned to work on Middle Eastern affairs, and certainly not on Israeli affairs. I remember saying to him that an assignment like his wasn't supposed to happen. He said that he had been told the same thing but he just decided to test the system and found that, in fact, there was no resistance to such an assignment. No one ever spelled this out, but it would seem to me to have something to do with the fact that you had a Secretary of State named Henry Kissinger who, while hardly a card-carrying Zionist or a synagogue-going Jew, certainly would have fit the category of people who hitherto had been supposedly excluded from Middle East policy affairs.

Q: As a matter of fact Kissinger had been excluded from Israeli affairs for a while during the Nixon administration, when he was National Security Adviser. At least it's been said that he left it to Secretary of State William Rogers to "play" with the Middle East while he did everything else.

KULICK: Yes. That's interesting. That may have been his own decision. I confess that I have not read Kissinger's memoirs. He may have addressed this question, although, knowing his ego, he probably didn't. In any case, by 1975 any taboo that may have existed previously was about to disappear, and Mike Sternberg was more or less the first, entering wedge. There also was a Jewish political officer serving in Tel Aviv at that time.

Q: He was John L. Hirsch.

KULICK: So I thought, if he can do it, I can do it. I went over and said that I understood that there would be an opening on the desk. I speak Hebrew, I know the region, I had been a student in Israel, and so forth. Again, this was before the process of "open assignments" began. [At that time] if you worked out a deal with the office director, that was it. The Bureau said that it wanted me, and I was assigned.

That really was kind of a turning point in my career because all of this sort of "pent up" desire to get involved in "Listrud" issues was released. I had what I found to be a very exciting assignment in the Office of Israel and Arab-Israel Affairs (IAI). I dealt with human rights and settlements issues, as well as United Nations affairs, all of which were really meaty questions. I did a great deal of "outreach" work, you might say. I went out and did a lot of public speaking. I spoke to a lot of Jewish groups, often quite hostile because the State Department then -- and I suppose even now -- enjoys a very bad reputation in the Jewish community, much of which, I think, is long outdated. However, it probably goes back to the 1930's. The performance of the State Department in dealing with the question of Jewish refugees, Hitler, and the subsequent prosecution of the war is very well known and well documented. The allegations of anti-Semitism in the State Department...

Q: Coming from a class that was basically anti-Semitic?

KULICK: That's right. I think that subsequent writings and the release of records and so forth have authenticated that. I was not aware of that when I first got onto this [speaking] circuit. I was puzzled by a continuing atmosphere of suspicion and hostility that I found when I would go into a synagogue or a B'nai B'rith meeting. Almost the first question someone would ask would be, "Are you Jewish?" If I said, "Yes," they'd say, "How can you work for an organization like that?" I always thought that this view stemmed from a kind of knee-jerk objection to anybody who would criticize Israel or take issue with Israel's policies or in any way try to demonstrate a "balanced" approach to the Middle East. I mean, [the view of these Jewish community group's was], "If you're not 100% for Israel, you must be anti-Semitic." There was an element of that, but it was much more complicated than that. It really had much more to do with the historical [background]. It was at that point that I went back and started to do some reading on the holocaust. I read a book called, "While Six Million Died," by Arthur Morse, which documents quite fully and persuasively the U. S. response to the holocaust. There is quite a bit of material in there on that subject. There are quotations from various memoranda prepared by people like Sumner Welles [World War II Deputy Secretary of State] and Loy Henderson [later Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs]. I think that both of these individuals [were concerned], but I don't want to libel anyone. I recall that those were the two people who were mentioned. Also there was someone called Summerfield, I think. I don't recall precisely.

Q: There is almost a mental exercise I find myself going through as a non-Jew, every time I come up against Israeli policy. I keep going through a mental exercise, examining myself, asking whether I am falling into anti-Semitism because I have real problems with the State of Israel. I'm partly of German descent, but it doesn't mean a thing to me. I don't have to go through an examination on how I look at Germany but with Israel I go through this process. I believe that a lot of Foreign Service Officers go through the same process. However, as a Jew, dealing with Israel, did you have to go through some mental adjustments or were you examining yourself to say, "Am I being too hard or too easy?" Was this a part of your thought process?

KULICK: No, surprisingly not, because I had always been, not exactly on the fringe -- these terms are not terribly precise -- but "on the Left" of the Zionist [political] spectrum, let us say, with respect to Israel. That is, particularly after 1967. Before 1967 there really wasn't much debate. But after 1967, when the Occupied Territories became a very central and emotional kind of issue, I had always been in that group which believed that it was not in Israel's interest to occupy these territories on a permanent basis. I thought that Israel, for its own sake, should go as far as possible, consistent with its essential security requirements, to make accommodations and to seek a peace agreement with the Arabs and the Palestinians. This was pretty much, I think, the policy of the U. S. Government and of the State Department. Only very rarely -- in fact, almost never -- do I recall the State Department taking a position that I thought was truly threatening to or disadvantageous to Israel, in my perception. That didn't mean that it didn't put us at odds with the Government of Israel, even before the Likud Government came into office. However, it was a policy that I felt comfortable with. I did not feel that it was jeopardizing Israel's security and I surely did not feel [that U. S. policy] was the result of any animus or bias against Israel. If anything, particularly during the Reagan administration, I was critical of U. S. policy as being too lenient, too accommodating, and too willing to take the Israeli point of view on subjects like the settlements [in the Occupied Territories], the invasion of Lebanon, and a variety of questions. Of course, in a highly political, highly effervescent environment like that of Israel, no matter what your point of view, you can find a significant body of people within Israeli society who share that view.

To anyone who says that this represents an anti-Israeli point of view, you can say, "Well, what about those 20 people in the Knesset whose views are precisely like this? Are they anti-Israeli, too?" [They may answer], "Well, it's different there. They live there." The point is that for me, personally, there was never any problem like that.

Q: I think this point is very important. How did you find the "outreach" program [conducted by the Israeli desk in the U. S.], particularly to the Jewish community, because they have a disproportionate impact on our political process -- which means on our policy process. How did you find dealing with them? Were you able to break through or...

KULICK: Let me stop and just comment on your use of the word "disproportionate." I am assuming that you are not using that in any nefarious sense.

Q: No! I'm just saying that there are ethnic groups -- I'm thinking [now] about the Greek community. I've dealt with Greek, Korean, and Croatian groups. They have more influence on our political process, say, than Turkish, Arab, or other groups.

KULICK: I think that the point is that the influence is commensurate with the degree of interest and concern on the part of the groups involved, rather than any nefarious...

Q: No, but statistically, you know...

KULICK: Well, that's true. This is an issue of very great importance. More so, probably, than any other ethnic group, the Jewish community has more of a commitment on this particular foreign policy issue with the possible exception of the Serbs and the Croats -- and perhaps the Irish. I'm sorry. What was your question?

Q: It's very important for the State Department to be able to explain its position to an influential political group, as it would be to newspaper publishers or any other. You said you encountered a certain amount of initial hostility [among some Jewish community groups] to the State Department. How did you find the response [from these groups] over a period of time?

KULICK: I felt satisfied after talking to such groups if I could leave them believing that, whatever differences may exist between their particular views and those of the State Department and, therefore, of the U. S. Government, these were based, not on any animus against Israel and not any latent anti-Semitism, but on an honest disagreement stemming from different perspectives as to the broader interests of the United States in the world. In other words, this was an honest debate, discussion, or disagreement, if you will, stemming from the same set of values but from a different perspective, rather than a question of anti-Semites in the U. S. Government who were out to "get" Israel. Or, to put it the other way round, from people subject to Arab influence who are only concerned about currying favor with the Arabs because of their control of oil, money, and other kinds of resources.

If I could come away from a session like that and [have them] say, "Well, we still disagree, and you're being too hard on Israel, but we concede and we recognize that there is a basic commitment there to Israel's welfare and that the United States will not pursue any policies" which, certainly by their reckoning and any reasonably objective reckoning, are injurious or threatening to Israel. The fact that I was Jewish, that I spoke Hebrew, that I had lived in Israel, and that I came from the background that I did -- undoubtedly contributed to my credibility. Although, in [the view of] some audiences that kind of thing triggers the "traitor" kind of [epithet].

Q: "Uncle Tom" or something like that. What were some of the major issues [you faced during your time on the desk]? You were there from when to when?

KULICK: This was from mid-1976 to mid-1978. The issue of [Jewish] settlements [in the Occupied Territories] was very "hot" then, even though the number of settlements and the number of settlers was one-tenth of what [they are] now. The U. S. still had not, if you will, reconciled itself to the inevitability of this process as, I think, the Reagan administration, to its discredit, did -- to its great discredit it did. Every new settlement occasioned an announcement by the State Department spokesman, articles in the newspapers, and a whole debate on whether they were "legal" or not. The position of the State Department at that point was still that the settlements were not only an obstacle to peace, which was the point which was settled on by the Reagan administration, but that they were "illegal" under international law. Of course, you can imagine that [that position] gave many Jewish lawyers a field day. Although most don't [practice] international law, there were several who prepared very trenchant and scholarly legal defenses. This was an issue that was debated endlessly. As I say, ultimately the Reagan administration withdrew from that position, either because they felt it wasn't worth fighting for or because they had a Legal Adviser [in the State Department] who had a different or more sympathetic view. That was one issue.

Q: How did you get involved?

KULICK: Human rights questions were also very controversial. It was during that period, under the Carter administration, that the State Department began issuing annual human rights reports. I wrote the first report [on Israel].

Q: This must have been the "touchiest" one. Surely, everybody must have been looking over your shoulder to see how this would be done, because all the other [reports] were difficult, but this one...

KULICK: Every word was parsed and every comma was examined. Long after all the other reports were in, that one was still outstanding.

Q: The first human rights report was a seminal document. The first one really had to be just right. What happened? This was at the beginning of the Carter administration [1977]. [The report on] Israel was the most controversial. Everybody would be looking at this one. Would we be fair?

KULICK: That's right.

Q: People would say, "Is this a real report?" Because it was well known that Israel had problems. So the question asked was, "Is this real or is this another one of these..."

KULICK: The process evolved with every [issue of the Human Rights Report]. At the outset the real debate was over whether there were such things as "extenuating circumstances" and to what degree should the report try to be subjective in addressing such extenuating circumstances. The bias in the human rights community, if you will, was very much against the use of extenuating circumstances. They wanted, as much as humanly possible, all of these reports to be based on essentially the same criteria and to reflect a uniform set of analyses that would each stand on its own merits as a statement of the truth in that particular country. [In their view] it was unacceptable to say, "They've been bad, but the guys next door are even worse," or, "Well, they may have been bad, but when you consider that the previous regime was incomparably worse, these guys look pretty good."

It was inevitable that those kinds of comparisons would influence the drafter. However, the point was to try to keep the reports as "clean, uniform, and objective" as possible. That can be done with relative dispassion if you're talking about Lesotho or Burma or Australia. Nobody really cares very much [about them]. But when you got to Israel, it mattered enormously, because, first, Israel was by far the largest recipient of United States aid and military assistance and political support out of all proportion to its strategic value or any of the other criteria normally applied to these kinds of positions. Secondly, most of that [aid and support] was based on the proposition that Israel was a democracy, Israel was "like us" in an area very alien and very hostile to our values. Therefore, Israel "deserved" all of this support, not because American Jews had an emotional attachment [to Israel] but because, objectively speaking, this was a country with which we had a great deal in common and whose support and security were a vital security interest of the United States.

Any report like this which undermined that proposition was clearly very threatening. A report which said that the Israelis torture people, blow up people's houses, and expel people without due process and so forth would be very damaging. All of those things happened [in Israel], to one degree or another. The question was how do you treat them? Do you minimize them, do you ignore them, do you describe them with extenuating circumstances? Particularly at the very beginning of this process it [required] an enormously delicate and painstaking effort.

The first drafts [of such reports] were generally produced [by the U. S. Embassy in the country concerned]. But they were nothing more than a first draft. They were not intended to be the final report, which was produced in the State Department. The draft that came in from [the Embassy] went to the country desk, I think, and perhaps also to the Bureau of Human Rights Affairs. Basically, it was the desk and the Human Rights Bureau that produced the draft which everyone else looked at. There was a big struggle between the Human Rights Bureau and the various desks.

Q: Who controlled that process?

KULICK: Obviously, the Human Rights Bureau would say, "Oh, the desks suffer from clientitis. They're going to make these things come out 'right.' Only we have the [necessary], lofty kind of objectivity." The desks said, "Oh, the hell with that. These are not just academic documents." That was the nexus of the struggle.

Q: We're talking about the Human Rights Bureau, a new organization under a "true believer," Pat Derian. Whom did you deal with and how did it work?

KULICK: You know, it's funny. I don't remember [the names of] the individuals involved.

Q: They allowed you to "play" with the draft first, before it [went any farther]? Perhaps the word "play" is the wrong one.

KULICK: Yes, sure, we wrote a lot of it. They were right. The draft that came from the Embassy did tend to tread too lightly on some of the less attractive aspects of the subject. But the version prepared by the desk was still looked upon by the Human Rights Bureau as far too indulgent, far too protective of the "client." This wasn't true just of Israel. This was true across the board, but without question the draft [prepared by the desk] was the version most closely looked at. When the report came out, the newspaper stories on the Human Rights Report led with a comment like, "Israel's human rights practices criticized," or, "Torture alleged," or something like that. That was the lead, even though there were 140-odd reports in the document. Anyhow, it was a real education in the interaction of domestic politics and foreign policy.

Q: Did you feel "heat" from the Assistant Secretaries of the Near Eastern and Human Rights Bureaus? Were they sort of fighting above you on this report?

KULICK: Yes. The real, "heavy" combat did not take place at the desk level.

Q: But you could see the tracer bullets. [Laughter]

KULICK: Yes. That's a good metaphor. They would come back to us. We would be told, "Rewrite this, rewrite that, or touch this up a little bit." I think that, ultimately, what came out was pretty good. It was truly a product of the clash of ideas and perspectives.

Q: And it really set the pattern for later on, not only for yours...

KULICK: One thing that I was responsible for was that the report that came back from the Embassy treated Israel and the Occupied Territories as a unit. I said, "The first thing you have to do is to split those apart, because there are two, radically different sets of premises here. Within Israel proper [the authorities] must be judged like any other country. Israel is a democracy, and clearly there can be no distinctions as to how it treats its citizens. On the other hand, the Occupied Territories are under military occupation, which, by its very nature, is not democratic." I said, "This inevitably involves human rights practices which would not pass muster in a democratic society."

We were successful in introducing that distinction, which, I think, holds even until now. The lead paragraph [of the Report] says that these are two different situations. I haven't read the report for several years. It has waxed and waned in its harshness, depending on the political climate between the U. S. and Israel.

Q: As you were sitting on this very touchy issue, did you find, at that time, a difference between the reporting from our Consulate General in Jerusalem and that of the Embassy?

KULICK: Oh, very much so. [It took some doing to manage] that because, as you know, the Consul General in Jerusalem does not report to the Ambassador [in Tel Aviv]. That and, I guess, Hong Kong, are the only consulates general that report directly to the Secretary of State. They are, to all intents and purposes, embassies by another name, in terms of their relationships with Washington. Of course, there was a constant struggle between the Consul General and the Ambassador in Tel Aviv over that. The Embassy always tries to assert more control or authority over the Consulate General. The Consulate General always insists that it is an independent post, not hostile to the Embassy, obviously, and desirous of a good, working relationship, but a post with a different constituency, perspective, and chain of command.

There were some zealots in the Consulate General. I would say they were unabashedly pro-Palestinian. "Pro-Palestinian" doesn't necessarily mean "anti-Israel," but in the case of these two individuals I'm thinking of they were both. Their reporting, of course, was a major factor in preparing the [human rights] report on the Occupied Territories. Of course, the Embassy weighed in very heavily on that, saying that you couldn't base the report on the [situation in] the Occupied Territories just on the basis of the reporting from the Consulate General in Jerusalem. The Embassy expressed -- I think correctly -- a major voice in that process.

There was one famous case of a young woman, a consular officer, Alexandra Johnson...

Q: She wound up on the front pages of the newspapers.

KULICK: Yes. Someone "leaked" a cable, which had the very euphonic number of "Jerusalem 1500" [Cable No. 1500 from the Consulate General in Jerusalem]. It was a cable about torture in the Occupied Territories. It became a major piece of "samizdat" in Palestinian circles. Everybody knew about it. In fact, she even wound up writing a book called, "Jerusalem 1500." She [later] left the Foreign Service. I don't know whether she leaked [the telegram] herself or whether somebody else leaked it. It became a very big stick which the "Israel bashers" [used] to try to discredit...

Q: Were you getting any outside pressure -- one, from the "Israel bashers," and, two, from AIPAC [America-Israel Public Affairs Committee]? While the process was going on, particularly since this was the first issue [of the Human Rights Report] and would be setting the mold, all of the power groups on all sides must have been trying to weigh in to set the pattern.

KULICK: Yes, but not at my level. This was going on well above my pay grade. This would have been going on at the level of the Secretary of State or, certainly, the Assistant Secretary [of the Near Eastern Bureau]. It would filter down, but in general I very rarely got a note from anybody which I could attribute to "muscle" [being exercised] by one side or the other.

Q: What was your feeling about Israel's rule in the Occupied Territories? This was during the period of the Likud Government.

KULICK: Well, [I had mixed feelings.] Prime Minister Begin came into office midway through my tour on the Israel desk.

Q: Even so. Was there a change? How did you see this, looking at this very controversial situation as a Foreign Service Officer? How did you feel that the Israelis were dealing with Palestinian problems?

KULICK: I was devastated by Begin's victory. Going back to what I was saying before about my own, personal orientation on these issues, I regarded that as a disaster. Some 15 years later I haven't changed my mind at all. I think it was a disaster for Israel. I don't accept the notion, for example, that only Begin could have returned the Sinai [Desert area to Egypt]. I think that that's baloney, although that is the argument that people often make.

Clearly, there was a change in policy. Rabin and the Labor Government did try to "hold the line" on the settlements, although they allowed themselves to be manipulated, intimidated, and kind of worn down by the Right wing in the Occupied Territories in setting up these "guerrilla" settlements which were subsequently "legitimized." When Likud came into power, they blatantly reversed the policy of the Labor Government, which was to have established settlements in those portions of the Occupied Territories over which they felt, for security reasons, Israel had to maintain long term control. Labor had avoided establishing settlements in those areas which were thickly populated with Arabs. Under the Labor plan these areas would be returned to Arab sovereignty. Labor never accepted the idea that there would be a Palestinian state, but I think that all along the notion was that the Jordanians would come back and take over most of the land on the West Bank.

The policy of the Likud Government was antithetical to that. It sought to ensure that no segment of the Occupied Territories would [be without] Jewish settlements. [This would] make it impossible to partition the area in any way which would leave Jewish settlements out [of the consideration]. In other words, they wanted to put Jewish settlements all over the Occupied Territories, so that you would have a Bosnian type of situation. You couldn't partition the area without having to move people and thereby stirring up so much emotion that it would practically prevent it.

Q: Well, we're ready to start again.

KULICK: Let me start this phase by saying that [Prime Minister] Begin came to power just about halfway through my [period of service] on the [Israeli] desk. One of my duties during my assignment there was to help to prepare the new Ambassador, Sam Lewis, for his assignment to Tel Aviv. I made many of his arrangements. We got to be quite friendly, and just before he went out, he said that he'd like to have me come out to serve in the Embassy [in Tel Aviv] as a political officer. He was interested in building up the Hebrew-speaking component of the Embassy. Up until that point it had consisted of only one or two officers. I was thrilled at the idea, although I had a major struggle with my wife over it. I eventually accepted the Ambassador's offer and spent my last year [on the Israeli desk] getting ready to go out [to the Embassy in Tel Aviv].

Q: This was...

KULICK: The fall of 1977, which also happened to be the time of [Egyptian President Anwar] Sadat's visit to Jerusalem. This visit completely galvanized and captivated the imagination of everybody involved in the peace process and the Arab-Israeli issue. I said "peace process," but this term had not yet been invented. The Sadat visit really started the peace process.

Q: What impression did you have of Sadat at that time? What was the word in the corridors [at the State Department] about Sadat and Israel?

KULICK: Well, this man was a great visionary. Personally and single-handedly he shattered a stalemate that had lasted almost 30 years. There was nothing but the greatest of admiration for him. He was certainly an unorthodox kind of character. I mean, it goes without saying that the president of the largest Arab country who announces -- and then promptly follows through on -- a pledge to go to Jerusalem is extremely unorthodox. I recall at least one Foreign Service Officer grumbling about how he [Sadat] had "betrayed" the Arab cause. But there were very few people in the Foreign Service who had that unbalanced a sympathy for the Arab cause and saw [this development] in that way.

Q: I was in [South] Korea at the time. It was thrilling to feel that there might be some movement.

KULICK: I remember the day that he [Sadat] made his statement. At first everyone was convinced that it was some kind of trick, that he was engaged in some sort of rhetorical flourish. However, the Israelis, to their credit, [accepted it at face value]. Of course, later on it turned out that this was a kind of "put up job." It didn't come out of the blue. The Israelis had been talking with the Egyptians behind the scenes for six months or so. The Egyptians had already gotten certain commitments from the Israelis before Sadat made his announcement. But nobody else in the world knew that, and it seemed like a "bolt out of the blue." However, the Israelis said, "Yes, sure. Come ahead." At that time many people expected Sadat to find some excuse or put up some condition, such as, "Yes, I'll come, but..." or something like, "You'll have to commit yourselves to withdrawing from the Occupied Territories." But Sadat didn't do that. It was just an incredibly thrilling four or five days. From that point on the whole atmosphere changed completely, although it took nine months after that for the Camp David Agreement to be reached, because it turned out that "one visit to Jerusalem does not a peace agreement make." All of the intervening meetings, including the one at Leeds Castle [in England in 1978] simply could not [resolve the outstanding issues]. Imagine what's going on now. They talk and they talk and they talk.

Q: You're talking about Palestinian-Israeli...

KULICK: No, it was Egyptian.

Q: Yes, but I'm talking about what's going on today.

KULICK: Right, the post-Madrid Conference talks. The Palestinians were not involved in the [discussions that led up to the Camp David Agreement]. Just the Egyptians and the Israelis. But President Carter decided that these conversations were not going to [lead anywhere] unless he personally took responsibility for them, put the prestige of the American Presidency on the line, and took the enormous gamble of inviting Sadat and Begin to Camp David. Carter basically decided that he would not let them leave until an agreement was signed. I contended then and I continue to contend that Jimmy Carter is probably the most under-appreciated President of this century. Hopefully, history will rectify that view.

Q: Usually, it does.

KULICK: Yes, the "shade" of Harry Truman can attest to that. Without [such a commitment from President Carter] the [Camp David Agreement] would not have been reached. People forget that. After [the Agreement was signed], he still had to make a trip to the Middle East himself and personally shuttle between Tel Aviv and Cairo to [ensure] that the last few unresolved issues were settled. Anyhow, the whole tenor of the office and the policy process shifted after that and became much more focused on the Sadat visit to Jerusalem to bring about a breakthrough in the peace process.

Then, of course, in March or April, 1978, the Israelis invaded Lebanon, and everybody was terrified...

Q: This was the first incursion...

KULICK: Operation "Litani."

Q: This wasn't the one which [took the Israeli Army] all the way to Beirut.

KULICK: No, no. I can't recall what was the immediate, precipitating cause [of the 1978 incursion]. Probably, some terrorist incident. At the time it was Israel's biggest incursion into Lebanon, but it only went up as far as the Litani River.

Q: Operation "Peace for Galilee" was in 1981 or...

KULICK: 1982. I think, to the credit of the United States, that we came down very hard on the Israelis [in 1978] and told them that this [kind of behavior] just wasn't "on" and that they had to get out. We could see that the whole peace process with Egypt was at stake. If we hadn't [taken the action that we did], [this whole process] could well have fallen apart. It was against that backdrop that I went off to Israel in the summer of 1978.

Q: The last question, before we move to [your assignment to] Israel, is what was the opinion of people who were dealing with [this issue], like King Hussein of Jordan? For a long time it was considered, as you mentioned before, that when push comes to shove, Jordan eventually might take over the West Bank and be a controlling factor in the peace process. How did we feel about him at that time?

KULICK: I think we pretty much felt about him the way we feel about him today. He is, first and foremost, a "survivor." Sometimes, I think, the man has more luck than brains, when you consider all of the "bad" decisions that he's made over the years. It's quite astonishing...

Q: That he's still around.

KULICK: But he just celebrated his 40th anniversary on the throne [of Jordan]. We looked on him as very useful, obviously, and extremely important to us. I think that there were doubts about his statesmanship and about his popularity in his own country.

"Black September," you may recall, took place in 1970, I think it was.

Q: I can't remember right now. I think that it was in the early 1970's. We can add this later.

KULICK: In any case he was always [considered to be] very shaky on the throne. There was always the fear that the Palestinians were somehow going to "get" to him. We were very much committed to keeping him around. I think that at that point we probably agreed with the Israeli view -- in fact, I know that we agreed with the Israeli view -- that the ultimate solution to the West Bank problem was for Jordan to take control of [that area] again. Of course, at that point [Jordan] had never renounced its claim to the West Bank. It was not until the late 1980's that King Hussein finally washed his hands of the West Bank -- at least, legally speaking. So we saw him as the key to any Palestinian-Israeli settlement, because we were completely opposed to any idea of an independent Palestinian state. Yet, we were also opposed to the idea of perpetual, Israeli rule [of the Occupied Territories]. The only alternative to those [possibilities] was Jordanian control of the West Bank.

Q: We'll stop now and resume this interview at the point where you went out to Israel as a political officer.

KULICK: Yes.

Q: When did you go out?

KULICK: In August, 1978.

Q: This is [date inaudible], 1993. Gil, we left you when you were [assigned] to the Political Section [in the Embassy in Tel Aviv], where you served from 1978 to 1981.

KULICK: That's right.

Q: What was the political situation [in Israel] at that time?

KULICK: I went at a very dramatic time. I believe that I went [to Tel Aviv] in August, 1978, which was a time of intense activity on the Arab-Israeli peace front. You will recall that President Sadat [of Egypt] had gone to Jerusalem in November, 1977, and made his famous and dramatic appeal to the Israeli people for peace. I was then on the Israel-American desk. I guess that we talked about that in an earlier part of this interview. I was on the desk when Sadat made his visit. That, of course, redrew the whole political map in the Middle East with a stroke, or certainly as far as the solid front against Israel which the Arabs had maintained up to that point. From November, 1977, and for the next few months there was a series of negotiations to try to convert President Sadat's visit to Jerusalem into a permanent peace agreement between Egypt and Israel. They had been "floundering," I would say, trying to find a formula which could bridge the gap.

There had been meetings in England, the most intensive and extensive of which was the meeting at Leeds Castle, I think, in April, May, or June, 1978. The "breakthrough" still eluded them. It was in August, 1978, that President Carter decided that it was going to require his personal intervention to break the logjam. The elements were there. Sadat had made his trip, and the Israelis had responded openly and warmly, but they were still too far apart to [reach agreement]. So President Carter invited Prime Minister Begin and President Sadat to Washington -- to Camp David. I don't mean to go into all of the details of the Camp David [negotiations]. I wasn't there, but everybody knows that it was the real "watershed" in the history of the relations between Israel and its neighbors.

I was [serving in the Embassy] in Tel Aviv in September, 1978. I had just been there about a month when the [Camp David] Agreement was signed. Of course, it electrified [everyone in Israel]. The whole Camp David process had riveted the attention of everyone in Israel. When the announcement was finally made that an agreement had been reached, it was probably the most dramatic moment of my career, in terms of the political environment in which I was working.

Q: I think that one's senses are sharpest when you first get to a place. As you had come from the Israel Desk [in Washington], you were already sensitized. What was your impression of the reaction [in Israel], across the political spectrum, as far as the Camp David Agreement was concerned? Were people pretty favorable [to it]?

KULICK: You will recall that the negotiation was entered into and was conducted by a Right Wing government [in Israel] -- by far the most conservative government that Israel had ever had. If this same negotiation had been carried out by the Labor Party, one could have expected massive opposition to it and, perhaps, "blood in the streets" and so forth. The fact that the [negotiations] were conducted by [Prime Minister] Begin and the Likud Party gave [the agreement] far more legitimacy with the [political] Right [in Israel] than would have been possible otherwise. You often hear the "Nixon to China" analogy used very loosely. I don't "buy" that, but it was that sort of motif, which explains why the Israeli Government was able to bring most of the people along. Certainly, there was a very Far Right faction which was much opposed to the Agreement. However, by and large, [the Agreement] was welcomed with open arms by the Israelis, because, I think, Egypt and the occupied Egyptian territory in the Sinai [Desert] played a very different role in the Israeli psyche than the territory of Palestine proper, that is, the West Bank and Gaza. Prime Minister Begin was able to reach an agreement which, in principle, and ultimately in practice, provided for the complete return of [the Sinai Desert] without evoking the kind of emotional response that we're now seeing in the negotiations with the Palestinians.

Q: And also the Golan Heights weren't looking down on [Israel].

KULICK: The Golan Heights weren't involved.

Q: Yes, so this was something that was, in a way, "out of sight."

KULICK: There was no emotional attachment to the Sinai. It was purely a security issue in the minds of all but a tiny handful of people in Israel.

Q: What areas did you cover as a political officer, at least to start with, and how did they develop? Then, how did you go about doing your work?

KULICK: I had several "portfolios." One of them was the whole question of the Occupied Territories, Israeli settlements and settlers, and human rights practices in the West Bank and Gaza. I was the person in the Embassy who wrote [the first draft of] the Human Rights Report. I visited the settlements and reported on Israeli settlement activity and so forth. I also handled the whole "international organization" account. So it was my responsibility to handle [all of our contacts] with the Israelis regarding UN resolutions and the UN system [as a whole]. As you know -- at least it seemed to me at the time -- most of the political work we did in the UN, in one way or the other, always ended up with Israel's position.

Q: It always seemed to end up that way.

KULICK: So it occupied an inordinately disproportionate amount of time, relative to the real significance of it. But we had to give it the time it demanded.

Finally, because I spoke fluent Hebrew and had lived in Israel before, I backed up the officer in the Political Section who dealt with Israeli domestic affairs. This meant primarily covering the Knesset and so forth. I was clearly being groomed to take over that position when he left, which I did, a year later, when my "portfolio" changed. I still followed the settlements, but someone else covered the UN, and I focused almost exclusively on the domestic, political scene. I probably drafted two or three telegrams a day. The debate on the peace process occupied a fairly large part of my work, as well as Israeli reactions to various bilateral issues, and so forth.

When I went out to Tel Aviv, I don't think that my rank in the [Political Section] was specified, beyond the fact that I was an O-1. Most of the people in the Political Section were O-1's and O-2's. But about two months after I got there, the Political Counselor called me in and said that he was very dissatisfied with the person who had been designated as [his] deputy. He felt that [this person] wasn't competent to do the job. He didn't draft well at all and didn't have the contacts that I had. He said that he was going to designate me as his deputy. That made me a little uncomfortable because this other guy had come out [to Tel Aviv] with that assignment. He was, in fact, the Labor Attaché, as well, and was an FSO [Foreign Service Officer]. But I said that I was perfectly prepared to take on the job and I said that I hoped that [the Political Counselor] could do this in a way that wouldn't "poison" my relations with [the Labor Attaché]. The Political Counselor had no problem with that. He was a very tough...

Q: Who was the Political Counselor?

KULICK: Bob Blackwill, a man reputed for his heavy hand in dealing with colleagues. However, perhaps precisely because he was so tough-minded, I found that I learned a great deal from him.

Anyhow, the change was effected. The other guy, in effect, was demoted back down to his regular position as a political officer, and I was named Deputy Political Counselor. That was the role which I filled during [the rest] of the time I was there [in the Embassy in Tel Aviv].

Q: Let's talk a bit about the human rights issue. We've already talked about [how this issue was handled] in the Department. For Israel, more than anything else, [this issue] is extremely important politically. It's important domestically as well as in foreign [policy terms].

KULICK: It was as sensitive as it was important.

Q: All right, sensitive. Did you find that there was a difference in reporting on [this issue] in Israel than when you were back in Washington, putting together [the Israeli section of the annual Human Rights Report]? You had the West Bank [issues], you had allegations of mistreatment -- maybe more than allegations...

KULICK: Of torture.

Q: Torture, and the whole business. The Israeli Defense Forces are not exactly a benevolent organization.

KULICK: But bear in mind that this was long before the "Intifada" [Palestinian uprising]. For the first, I would say, 15 years of the occupation, the Israeli occupation was, on the whole, a benign or a benevolent occupation. I accept the view of those who say that that is [somewhat of a contradiction in terms], because there is no such thing as a benign or benevolent occupation. Nevertheless, one can make relative comparisons to other kinds of military occupations. By those standards one would have to say that the Israeli occupation was a "relatively" benign [occupation]. That is to say, it was carried out with a minimum of brutality and a minimum of bloodshed. But having said that, I found that there were a lot of distasteful aspects to Israeli behavior [in the Occupied Territories].

However, the first thing that we did, when I wrote the [Israeli section of the] first Human Rights Report in 1976, was to divide the report into Israel itself and the Occupied Territories, making it quite clear that different circumstances obtained [in each area] and [that there was very] different behavior. Within Israel proper the behavior [of the police and security forces] could stand up pretty well against that of most Western democracies, although, given the kind of "siege" circumstances under which they lived. Even within the "Green Line" [Israel proper] there were practices to which we would not give a 100% bill of health. There was [the practice of] detention without trial and that sort of thing. They used coercive methods of interrogation, and so forth. But by and large [their practices] would stand up against the records of most Western political democracies.

In the Occupied Territories there was obviously a different situation. Again, the clear caveat at the beginning of all this is that a military occupation is not a democratic situation. The responsibility of the military there is to maintain their security. Within those [parameters] practices are -- I don't wish to say "sanctioned" or "approved" -- but "recognized" as necessary which would not be acceptable in a democratic kind of situation. The point that I always made was that these practices -- and, again, I'm choosing my words carefully -- can be "tolerated," though I wouldn't say "sanctioned" -- only if the occupation is a temporary and transitional arrangement toward an evolution, at the end of which the people there are accorded some form of self-determination. If the military occupation, in fact, turns out to be a "permanent" state of affairs, then one cannot make those kinds of rationalizations. It then becomes a dictatorship or a tyrannical situation, rather than a less than perfect situation necessitated by the need to bring about a transition to democracy.

But the issue was controversial -- within the Embassy and between the Embassy and the Consulate General in Jerusalem. There was always a running battle...

Q: Can you talk [a little more] about this? Part of what we're trying to do is to show the dynamics of the foreign policy apparatus. And this is one of the classic cases.

KULICK: Yes, it is. At its most fundamental level there was always a question of "Who's in charge?" in Jerusalem. Under our legal definition of "jurisdiction" applicable in the area, Jerusalem was not, formally speaking, part of Israel. It was a contested area, whose status had not yet been finally determined. Our Consul General in Jerusalem was not accredited to the Government of Israel, in any formal sense.

Q: Who was the Consul General then?

KULICK: When I was there [in Tel Aviv], there were two: Mike Newlin, who was later replaced by Brandon Grove. In the "Foreign Service List" [the post is not called] "Jerusalem, Israel." It is simply "Jerusalem." The consular stamp which we placed on people's visas and passports says, "Jerusalem." This is a matter of great sensitivity with the Israelis. The more sophisticated Israelis recognize this as a fact of life. Journalists were always bringing it up, and indignant American Jews and indignant Israelis would, from time to time, make an issue of this. But it was even controversial within the Department, in the sense that no one challenged the formal distinction between Jerusalem and Israel. However, there was naturally a [certain] level of tension between the Ambassador and the Consul General. It was all handled in Foreign Service terms. No one formally challenged the jurisdiction [of the Consulate General], but the Consulate General regarded itself -- and no one would have ever acknowledged this -- as a sort of "proto-Embassy" or "crypto-Embassy" to Palestine. Or at least certain individuals within the Consulate General [so regarded it]. I wouldn't say that that necessarily applied to the Consul General.

The Consul General had a very difficult job because he had to be on good terms with both [Israeli and Palestinian] communities. Everything he might do to ingratiate himself with one community -- automatically and in a Newtonian kind of balance -- would alienate the other guys. If he didn't get along with the Israelis, his life was going to be unpleasant. So we had two [office] buildings -- one in East and one in West Jerusalem. We had two Christmas parties -- one in East and one in West Jerusalem. The Consul General's residence and the main office building, if you will, were in West Jerusalem. But the Israelis consistently and always talked about the American Consulate in East Jerusalem as a way of driving home [their view] that we "tilted" toward the Palestinians.

You asked about human rights. This dichotomy was very clear in the way that human rights developments were reported. [One officer in] the Consulate General who was there when I was [in the Embassy in Tel Aviv] ended up by resigning from the Foreign Service and publishing a book about Israeli human rights practices.

Q: Who was that?

KULICK: Her name was Alexandra Johnson.

Q: I remember. She was on the front page of the newspapers at one point.

KULICK: Yes. She wrote a book called, "Jerusalem 1500," which happened to be the number of a telegram which she had drafted, a [cable which denounced] torture in Israeli prisons in the Occupied Territories. The cable was "leaked," and there was a huge "to do" about it. [In my personal view] she wasn't suited to the Foreign Service. She had clearly become very partisan and emotional on this issue.

However, when the Embassy reported on this issue, [it tended to be] from the perspective of the Embassy's "client," the Government of Israel. Well, any Foreign Service Officer will understand the situation automatically. [The Consulate General in] Jerusalem was reporting from the point of view of its "clients," the Palestinians. So this kind of thing went on all the time -- on settlement activity, and so on. Whenever there was any question, the Consulate General would always [tend to] "tilt" on the side of exaggerating or highlighting the more damning version of the story as to what was going on at any particular time or place.

This [situation] also affected relationships between individual [Foreign Service Officers]. My counterpart in Jerusalem and I used to have a lot of arguments about it.

Q: I was wondering whether there was ever any effort made to "get together" and have lunch, because of what was almost built-in antagonism. [This kind of situation] sometimes happens between our Embassies in India [and] Pakistan. But here you were so close together.

KULICK: Well, [we saw] each other practically every day. It might be interesting [to discuss this further] for the purposes of this interview. The Embassy, of course, was in Tel Aviv. But as [the Israelis] didn't recognize it [Tel Aviv] as the capital [of Israel], [virtually] all of our [Embassy] business was carried out in Jerusalem. Sometimes, the Ambassador would literally make 10 trips a week [to Jerusalem]. He once said that he made three trips up and back between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv in one day. The Ambassador's chauffeur [could drive along the road] almost in his sleep. He could make the trip in about 50 minutes. An average driver might take one hour and 10 minutes. But the Ambassador did a lot of his business in the car. He would dictate cables on his way back from Jerusalem. I was probably up in Jerusalem three or four times a week, for example], going to the Knesset or Parliament, which was my principal "beat."

It was a funny kind of "split" existence that we lived. [The Embassy] had a suite of rooms at the King David Hotel [in West Jerusalem to accommodate Embassy people] who were up there [in Jerusalem] late at night and didn't want to go back [to Tel Aviv]. We saw our colleagues [in the Consulate General] a fair amount. I would say that the relations on a personal level were really quite good. I mean that none of us took [this problem] so personally that it really interfered [with our duties]. However, on a professional level [it was different].

Q: When a cable would go out from [the Consulate General in] Jerusalem, presenting, you might say, "the dark side of the moon" regarding action on settlements or something like that, would you feel constrained [to comment in another cable] or would the Ambassador say, "Here, we've got to get [our view on record]?"

KULICK: It happened. Again, [you are putting it in] very stark terms. [We] didn't have sharp confrontations. One point on which [the Consulate General in] Jerusalem always stood very firmly was that they were not required to "clear" their reporting with the Embassy. On the other hand, a certain amount of discretion was required. When the [Consulate General in Jerusalem was] preparing a report to which they thought the Embassy might take exception, we'd get a "back channel" copy for comment. There was a pretty high degree of cooperation on these things. Obviously, the Consulate General would like to avoid a situation where they would send something in, and the Embassy would come back with a rocket which would say, "No, this is nonsense." Occasionally, the differences couldn't be negotiated out, and you'd have these two different versions. But, on the whole, it was all solved in a diplomatic kind of way.

Q: But you were both working with the thought that this could end up in the press very quickly, through leaks and so forth.

KULICK: Well, not usually, but it occasionally happened, as in the case of [the telegram known as] "Jerusalem 1500." In this case the officer in question had become so emotionally embroiled in all of this that, I think, she arranged to [get its text] into the press. But I think that most people were pretty professional about it.

I remember that on one occasion there was a visit by a Congressional Delegation. The Ambassador went up to Jerusalem to brief them. It was sort of a joint Consulate General-Embassy briefing. This may have happened more than once -- I don't know. There was a younger officer at the Consulate General -- not the woman in question, but another person -- who challenged the Ambassador. The Ambassador said something to these Congressmen about something that was going on in the Occupied Territories on the West Bank. This [Consulate General] officer stood up and said, "No, that's not right, Mr. Ambassador." This guy was almost on the next plane out of town, but he managed to [resolve this] problem. I don't know whether this was just personal indiscretion or a surfeit of zeal or what. That was unusual. Usually, these things were kept within the family.

Q: How about on the Israeli side? Here you were, reporting on sensitive issues. Did you find that the Israelis were making an effort to "get to you" and make sure that "their" side [was heard]? If something happened on the West Bank which was brought to the attention of our Consulate General there, would some [Israeli] come and "work" on you and say, "Hey, this isn't really what happened" or something like that?

KULICK: We were rarely dealing with specific episodes or incidents. It was not a situation where there was a massacre or a big "shoot out" or something like that, and [the Israelis] would come and say, "Those guys shot first." It was much more a collective kind of reporting -- on the general situation, rather than a specific incident. However, the Israelis in the Foreign Ministry, the Prime Minister's Office, and other places monitored very closely at least what came out in public in the U. S. They would go out of their way to correct the record, as they saw it, if necessary. I don't want to distort the picture. This was not the sole or even the primary focus of our [contacts] with the Israeli Government. What we've been talking about was my "beat." But we had eight political officers in an Embassy to a country of three million people. We had the same size Political Section that we had in Moscow or Tokyo. So you can imagine that there were very, very few aspects of Israeli political life that were not the subject of American Embassy interest.

Q: When I was in Italy, I used to think that at times we got too involved in political life there [and] that American interests, in reality, [were not fully considered]. You can step back, as it were, and wonder where, for example, the Israeli ship of state is going.

KULICK: We had no problem in maintaining perspective between the particular and the general. Sam Lewis was an outstanding Ambassador. He is a genius and a first-rate diplomat, in my opinion. He never lost sight, for a second, of where things were going. He certainly was the most effective Ambassador that I ever dealt with. I would guess that there were very few members of our profession as effective as he was in doing what he was sent out to do -- though not always in a manner that pleased everybody. There were a lot of people who thought that he was much too close to [Prime Minister] Begin and too close to the Israelis. I thought that myself, sometimes, but the proof of the pudding is in the eating. I think that, whatever slightly excessive intimacy or excessive sympathy there may have been, it gave him an influence and an access that was absolutely unparalleled. That is, assuming that you use this access judiciously and when you really need it. Access counts for nothing if all it does is ingratiate you [with the government] and make you reluctant to come down hard when you have to.

[Ambassador Lewis] was a major player on the Israeli political scene. He used to be called the "Pro-Consul." He had a number of nicknames like that. He was a major figure on the social scene in Israel, too. A social event was not complete without Sam and Sally Lewis. He was preceded [in Tel Aviv] by Ambassador Malcolm Toon, for example, who was a disaster. I don't know if you know Toon. He was a very confrontational, very pugnacious sort. He thought that his job out there was to tell the Israelis how to suck eggs. They were having none of this at all. As a result, he may have gone to bed at night, thinking that he had stood up for America and told [the Israelis] where to get off, but as an Ambassador, he was useless. Lewis didn't pound his chest or pound the table, but neither did he simply roll over and act like a lap dog.

Q: I'm told by people who served in Tel Aviv that it is sort of a unique experience because you almost get "consumed." The political and social life is so active. Everything is an argument, but of a fascinating nature. You are intellectually engaged.

KULICK: No question about that. People would ask me, "What's it like to be [in Israel]?" I'd say, "Never a dull moment." They'd say, "Great," and I'd say, "No. I'd like a dull moment once in a while. I was there three years and I never had a dull moment." You need a dull moment. The pace is absolutely relentless. Again, I was there during the period between the Camp David Agreement, on the one end, and the evacuation of the Sinai on the other. This [period] was probably the most intense three years in Israeli political history. I suspect that during the "deep freeze" period, say, between about 1983, when the treaty was negotiated and the autonomy negotiations fizzled out, and about a year ago, when Rabin came in [as Prime Minister], the pace was probably somewhat more moderate. However, I doubt that it ever calmed down to what it would be like in a typical, European capital. You know, it's not for everybody, but I thrived on it. I must say that I had a particular, personal vocation for all of this. I'd lived in Israel as a student, I'd studied at the Hebrew University, I speak Hebrew, and I've had an intense involvement with Israel and with the whole Zionist enterprise since I was a kid. But at no point did it ever, I think, obscure my judgment about where U. S. interests lay, because my view of what needed to be done in Israel was virtually indistinguishable from the view of the U. S. Government. Therefore, I felt that I was doing the Lord's work by pushing the Israelis in the direction that they needed to go. Of course, a very large percentage of the Israeli people felt exactly the same way.

I used to be asked all the time, "What's it like, being a Jew in the [American] Embassy in Israel? Isn't it hard? Don't you find yourself torn by a conflict of interest, an emotional [tension]?" No, absolutely not, not for a minute. The only difficult part of it was watching the Israelis trying to figure out who I was and where I was coming from. But that was more amusing than troublesome, because I speak fluent Hebrew and I was intimately familiar with the situation and the players. I clearly was not dispassionate on the subject but I always had my eye on my mission as a Foreign Service Officer.

Q: Was any effort ever made to... "Compromise" is the wrong way to say it. Perhaps "co-opt" is the right word?

KULICK: Never. I was quite astonished, in fact. I picked up comments from various people, way over on the [Israeli] Right, who would refer to "house Jews" and that kind of stuff. You know, when Secretary of State Kissinger went out [to Israel], he got a lot of abuse from the [Israeli] Far Right. Someone held up a sign at the airport which said, "Jew Boy, Go Home." This was really vicious, defamatory kind of stuff. No, I think that people [in Israel] understood, however much they might disagree with my position on the issues. They knew where I was coming from. I think that, all in all, [being a Jew] was a tremendous asset for me.

I'm pretty sure that I referred to this in the previous segment of this interview, when I described how I happened to be assigned to the Israel desk [in the State Department]. But I described that several months ago and I don't recall exactly how I put it. At that time, when I went to talk about the job [on the Israel desk], it was against the tradition of 30 years. There was [a certain] "understanding" that [American] Jews were not assigned to Israel or even to work on Israeli affairs. I mentioned that that [tradition] was broken, as in the case of Kissinger's service as Secretary of State. In fact, Ambassador Sam Lewis viewed the presence of people who knew the language and were familiar with the country as a tremendous asset. In the eight-person Political Section in which I served at one time seven of the eight were Jews -- or, at least, six persons plus one other whose wife was Jewish. Only the Political Counselor [was not Jewish]. In the case of Charles Hill he might as well [have been Jewish] in terms of his sentiments.

I found that, notwithstanding the puzzlement which my role there elicited, on the whole I was able to "break the ice" and establish relationships with Israelis that would have been hard for anyone else to do. I think that I had far more personal connections than anybody else in the Embassy, except for the Ambassador, who almost literally knew everybody in the country well. They were all his close, personal friends. I think that, in many ways, he thought of them that way. He was an extraordinary person.

In any case, in response to your question, there were absolutely no efforts made to "co-opt" me. I don't think that anybody [in Israel] really felt that that would be necessary. They didn't see me as an enemy, even though, as I say, I had a lot of very acrimonious arguments with Israelis, particularly [those] on the Right.

Q: I think that this [situation happens] quite often in other places. For example, there are the Greek-Americans. For the professionals in the [Foreign Service] it's not a big issue. They're serving in a [given] country where they have [close family connections or ties of sympathy].

They know where their allegiance and interests lie. What often happens is that you have people who come out as "politicians" or people who are "super Greek" or "super Jewish" or something like that back in the United States. They come either for a very short time as political appointees or just as visitors and have a harder time seeing this. There are other countries like this. We are all "hyphenated" Americans.

KULICK: We have had Greek-American Ambassadors to Greece. We've never had a Jewish Ambassador to Israel.

Q: I'm not sure that this has worked very well.

KULICK: I know that we had Ambassador Sotirhos who, according to people who worked for him, was very, very effective, though they couldn't stand him. He was a real son of a bitch in dealing with his staff but apparently he got along famously with the Greeks.

Q: How about visiting delegations? The normal visiting delegation will come with a certain amount of history and "baggage," particularly in the case of a country like Israel -- sort of with "stars in their eyes." They might resent somebody at the Embassy saying, "Yes, but it's not quite that way" or something like that.

KULICK: I didn't have much personal experience with things like that. Mercifully, I was spared dealing with visiting delegations. In fact, the best thing about my job was that I dealt exclusively with Israelis. I didn't deal with the Diplomatic Corps, I didn't deal with CODEL's and I had relatively few dealings with other [U. S. Government] agencies there. I spent my time with Israelis. During a typical work day I didn't get out of the Embassy as much as I would have liked to, because the work load was so heavy. I used to spend most of my time in the Embassy -- about 12 hours a day. We would routinely work 65 hour weeks. But nobody could find time [to do all that he wanted] because it was so absorbing and so exhilarating.

Q: How about spending time with your wife and your family?

KULICK: Well, to their credit, they loved being there [in Israel] so much, too, that they didn't mind my not being around. If [the Embassy in Tel Aviv] had been a place where having Dad at home was the only break from a day full of drudgery, boredom, or conflict with the surroundings, it would have been different. But I'd routinely leave home at 7:30 AM and get home at 7:30-8:00 PM, and work on Saturdays until 3:00-4:00 PM. Rarely did I get any flack. I could never have gotten away with that in Washington.

Q: Going now to your focus on the Knesset and [Israeli] personalities, how did we look at the Likud Party and particularly Begin, Sharon, and other figures -- at least during your time there? What was your view of them?

KULICK: It was clear that these people weren't our "friends." It was clear to me. Ambassador Lewis always maintained a very statesmanlike neutrality. He never revealed his [feelings] on anything having to do with the Israeli Government. To this day I don't know what he thought of Menachem Begin. I'm sure he didn't like Arik Sharon -- nobody could deal with that guy, without feeling [at least some] distaste for [him]. However, I would say that in my reporting I let [my feelings] "hang out" a bit more than most people did. However, I was not assigned there to indulge my tastes or ideology. I was there to report on what's going on, to analyze it, and to tell Washington what we ought to be doing about it. I would love to have served [in Israel] when there was a Labor Party Government in power, because, by contrast with the Likud Party, it must have felt like "hog heaven." On the other hand, no doubt, when you got down to specifics, before 1977 I'm sure that the Embassy found itself in a situation involving some [conflict]. Dealing with Israelis will always be that way because they will always push you as far as they can. Even your friends will try to push you beyond where you want to go. In a sense it's a little easier dealing with less friendly guys because you feel fewer conflicts about drawing the line.

I spent a lot of time at the Knesset. I had a pass to the Members' Dining room. I was one of only about 10 non-Israelis who had a standing pass. I could go in any time. I'd spend hours there, just gossiping and talking with guys -- picking their brains. A lot of them saw me as a conduit to the Ambassador -- at least the ones who didn't talk directly to him. If they had a direct tie to the Ambassador, they weren't interested in talking to me. But that involved [only] a few people at the top. I dealt primarily with "echelon one and a half," I guess.

Q: How did this work out? You had this contact with a very active Parliament. However, in a practical sense, what did this mean as far as your reporting went? Were you just informing [the Department] or did it mean that you were trying to get something done?

KULICK: I spent a lot of time just arguing with these guys, trying to tell them what our policy was and what it wasn't, and why we took the positions that we did. This did not involve a conflict between Israel and the United States. With some people that's an exercise in utter futility. You can't convince someone who thinks that the United States is out to "do Israel in" -- to destroy [the country] by stages -- that you have anything in common. But for people who are a little more dispassionate, who can recognize that there may be tactical disagreements here within a general, strategic convergence of view, a conversation like that can be a lot of fun. You make some points. At the end of the day you may feel that you have enlightened people, perhaps opened their minds a bit, gotten them to think a little further about their positions. I wouldn't exaggerate this. It was not my principal role or that of anybody else in the Embassy. We were not there to "convert" Israelis. We were there, I think, in large measure, to make sure that they at least understand what our position was.

That's a big job. Views get distorted in the press and by people who don't like us and who exaggerate [these matters] to make them even more unpalatable. But it was a lot of fun, because these are great people.

Q: I would like to serve there because this sounds like fun.

KULICK: It was a political officer's dream. I know that when you serve in places like the former communist world, you spend all of your time, grasping for the most meager crumbs of information. You read "Pravda" and try to figure out why the comma is here [instead of there]. In Israel you were just inundated with information. You cannot possibly absorb all of it. There are six daily newspapers which you have to go through. If you don't speak Hebrew, you rely on the translation. I'm afraid that my reading knowledge of Hebrew was not so good that I could sit down and read all the newspapers. We had a three-person translation staff in the Political Section which did nothing but translate articles. I supervised them, [in addition to] my other duties.

There are three million [Israelis] whom you can talk to. And they'll all talk to you. They're all more than eager to get their views across [to you]. So there's no problem whatever about getting information. The problem is sorting it out and making sense out of it.

Q: Were there any major issues that you were trying to get across during this three-year period that you were there [in Israel]?

KULICK: The peace process was obviously the focal point of our whole relationship. Equally obviously, we were in it up to our necks. As I was the "point" person for domestic political [activities], I spent a great deal of time explaining why we advocated what we did and trying to get through some of the nuances of [this issue]. For example, explaining why we took the position we did on settlements and why we considered them an obstacle to peace. I wouldn't think that that would require a lot of explanation, but if your definition of "peace" is getting the Palestinians simply to roll over and accept permanent [Israeli] occupation, obviously, [our position] doesn't fit in with that conception.

We also tried to interpret what was going on in the Arab world. I didn't deal with that so much. That wasn't really my "beat," but I'd pick up a lot [of information] in the sense of the real intentions of the Syrians and Egyptians and why [the situation] is not as bad as [our contacts] seemed to think. Without sharing intelligence with them from Embassy reporting and elsewhere, you can pass on an awful lot of information that will fill in gaps in their understanding of what's going on in the Arab world.

Q: Did you find the Israeli media and the politicians well-informed about what really was happening? Did they have -- I won't say "objective," because that's the wrong term. But did they have a relatively realistic idea of the dynamics of, say, Syria, Egypt, [and other Arab states]?

KULICK: There was a significant body of Israelis who were quite expert on the Arab world. They included scholars and journalists who read Arabic, who can listen to broadcasts in Arabic, and who can easily read [these statements with or without] translation. They have a relatively sophisticated understanding. But there were very few Israelis who knew this [situation] from the [point of view] of "understanding the enemy." And if that's your point of view, you have a built-in distortion. It's kind of like the Hubbell [satellite] telescope. If you shave the mirror too thin, it's going to throw the focus off. Obviously, [these Arab countries] were their enemies, but not genetically programmed to be so, not implacably so, and ultimately people that they were going to have to deal with. So you had to "break through" that preconception [that the Arabs were] people implacably opposed to their existence. You can understand the dynamic, but you may believe that their current plan is to destroy you, rather than that they need to reach some kind of reconciliation with you. I'm no expert on the Arab world and that wasn't one of my principal concerns. But, inevitably, I wound up spending a lot of time talking about things like that.

We haven't really talked about internal [Israeli politics], which is what I really concentrated on. I wasn't there to argue with them or tell them [what to do]. I was there to understand what was going on within the Israeli political structure, which was as fascinating as any internal political process that I can imagine. [Israel] had a full spectrum in its representative parliament that ran from communists to [people who were] practically neo-fascists. Perhaps "fascist" isn't really the right word, but they were an extremely hard-line, conservative faction that advocated, for example, the expulsion of all of the Arabs from the Occupied Territories. They were a fringe, just as the communists were a fringe. In the middle you had divisions along religious versus secular lines and, obviously, Arab versus Jew. And you also had splits within Israeli Jewry, not only between religious and non-religious but between Sephardis, people of North African and Middle Eastern origins, and Ashkenazis, people of European origins.

There was a very significant split, not so much on the major political issues but on domestic, social [matters] concerning the division of the "pie" and so forth. The Likud Party played that very effectively and really came to power, not so much because of its advocacy of a "hard line" toward the Arabs, but because it was able to convince a significant portion of the Sephardic, lower working class that they were being "screwed" by the European, Ashkenazi, oligarchic, upper class [Jews]. There were many efforts to manipulate class consciousness and ethnic [awareness]. It was a significant element in Israeli political life. It had nothing to do with attitudes toward the peace process. The tendency among diplomats and foreigners is to see everything from that point of view, because that was so important to us. Among other things, what I tried to do was to point out that there were a lot of other things going on which had nothing to do with the peace process. They had to do with how economic benefits are distributed, how the economy was organized, and the resentment of secular against religious [Jews] who played a disproportionately powerful role in political life because of the way the system is structured.

The [Israeli] Parliament was [elected under a process of] proportional representation. You needed only one percent [of the votes] to obtain representation in Parliament, so there were 15 [political] parties there at any given time. [As a result, there were] razor thin coalitions which were always dependent on the votes of these small, usually religious parties. They were essentially "for sale," usually to the highest bidder -- the [coalition] that gave the religious [parties] the most influence over domestic life and the most money to run their institutions. They were very corrupt. It was a very corrupt system -- not so much personally corrupt but institutionally corrupt. These were all things that were important for Washington to understand -- how decisions are made there [in Israel]

Q: Did you make any headway in making contacts within the religious parties, or were they a little more difficult [to approach]?

KULICK: They were more difficult because they weren't interested in a lot of the issues that we were interested in. The issues [in which they were concerned] were far more parochial. They had a few, fairly sophisticated spokesmen. Well, they all played the "Knesset game" very well, but not in terms that related particularly to what was on our agenda regarding Israel. They didn't, by and large, care that much about the peace process. They'd go along with whichever party made them the best offer. Until 1977 that was "the Left," the Labor Party. After 1977, when the Likud emerged as the largest single party, the "line" of the religious parties moved sharply to the Right.

That is not to say that that was the only reason. There has been a steady, Rightward drift in Israeli national life since the beginning [of the independence of Israel] in 1948. The parties that today are considered "centrist" were considered "Far Right" 50 years ago. The parties that are now on the "Left" were considered "centrist" parties way back then, when the "Left"...

Q: At the time [they sought] sort of a socialist utopia. How did you find that the Israeli Government worked?

KULICK: A would-be socialist utopia.

Q: Looking at it as an American, how did the [Israeli] Government work? How did they "deliver the goods" when you were there as far as social programs -- food and all the things...

KULICK: You start off with the fact that Israel had a parliamentary, rather than a presidential system, so that the whole process by which decisions are made and goods are distributed is quite different from our system. I think that much more of [this process] went on in Parliament than would be the case here in the United States. The government, in any parliamentary system, is an extension of the majority party or coalition in the Parliament. And politics are much more personal than they are here, in dealing with a country of 3.5 million people. So you need to know the personal histories of a lot of these people to understand their relationships with other members of the government. Menachem Begin's aunt was [Arik] Sharon's "wet nurse," or something like that. There's not a whole lot of intermarriage in the sense you have in a dynastic monarchy. However, it was important to know the personal histories of these people. It took a lot of time to get to know them.

Q: Then you left [Israel] and just moved over a little to the South? You left [Tel Aviv] in 1981?

KULICK: No. I came back to Washington. [Tel Aviv] was my last overseas post [in the Foreign Service].

Q: I thought that you went out to the Sinai.

KULICK: No. I went to the unit [in the State Department] here in Washington that was setting up the multinational observer force, established [under the] Israel-Egypt peace treaty. This was a multinational [operation] outside the UN system because the UN, of course, completely rejected the Camp David Agreement and would not or could not provide a peacekeeping force. However, one of the conditions that the Israelis insisted on was that there be a kind of multinational force out there in the Sinai to monitor Egyptian activities and serve as a "trip wire." So the U. S. took it on itself to organize such a force, which we did. I volunteered to serve in the group that was putting this force together, frankly because I hoped to stay in Israel -- an option which I had failed to exercise at the time that I should have and which I could have done, at the end of my second year [in Tel Aviv].

But at that point my wife was very eager to get back to the United States. We weren't too happy with our son's schooling. However, by the end of the third year [in Tel Aviv] we had changed our minds. But it was really too late to stay on in my Embassy position. I saw this Sinai possibility as a way of staying there. Anyhow, I did get involved in that group, but all of the work was done back here in Washington.

Q: I know that time is moving on. This is almost a parenthesis to [your assignment to] the Italian desk.

KULICK: I was [on the Sinai planning group] for close to a year. I should say, just to put the cap on the Israeli segment of my career, that in the summer of 1982 I went back out to the Embassy [in Tel Aviv] for about four weeks on TDY [temporary duty]. Again, this was my wife's idea. [She said], why not offer myself to the Embassy as a utility person?. The war in Lebanon had broken out. I knew that the Embassy [in Tel Aviv] would be "stretched," with transitions between assignments and so forth. So I prevailed on Ambassador Sam Lewis to bring me out there. The Embassy gave me an [airline] ticket. I found my own housing. I "house sat" for somebody who was on R&R [Rest and Recreation]. I spent a month at the Embassy, reporting on Lebanon, etc.

Q: What impact did [your period of TDY at the Embassy in Tel Aviv] have?

KULICK: You mean, [because I came back]?

Q: No, not that. I'm talking about dealing with [the war in Lebanon] during the time you were there [on TDY]. What was the feeling in our Embassy [in Tel Aviv] regarding this movement into Lebanon?

KULICK: Very negative. That was one of the points that came out. However, ironically, a lot of people believed -- myself included -- that the only reason that the Israelis invaded Lebanon in 1982 was because they got "a wink and a nod" from [then Secretary of State] Al Haig. He has consistently denied this, and it's not written down anywhere. However, I have no doubt that they [the Israelis] looked at Haig and considered what he had to say and concluded that they could do this.

Q: I had an interview with [Ambassador] Nick Veliotis, who said that they weren't sure -- I mean, that NEA [the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs] -- wasn't sure [about Haig's role]. They [got in touch with then Israeli Defense Minister] Sharon and said, "Well, now, listen here." [Veliotis] wasn't sure what Haig had said to him [Sharon] and tried to persuade Sharon that we were not receptive to that type of action [the Israeli move into Lebanon]. Of course, if you're somebody like Sharon, you hear what you want to hear.

KULICK: Absolutely.

Q: I think that Haig had probably, as one military man to another, sort of said, "Well, I can understand..."

KULICK: Yes. I'm not saying that I'm certain that Haig did this with the full cognizance [of President Reagan], but I have no doubt that Sharon, at least, interpreted Haig -- and I personally think that he interpreted him correctly -- as saying, "Boy, you've got a real mess there."

Somebody's got to clean it up."

Q: Yes. Well, anyway, this was not a glorious time for the Embassy [in Tel Aviv].

KULICK: No, it was a period of great tension between Israel and the United States. Well, you know, they [the Israeli Defense Forces] were at the gates of Beirut. I guess that we probably came down on them as hard, at that point, as we had at any time since 1976, when we forced them out of Sinai. However, Ambassador Sam Lewis had the standing and the access and the trust to be able to handle that without any great [damage] to [Israeli-American] relations.

ARTHUR A. HOUGHTON III
Deputy Director, Office of Arab-Israel Affairs
Washington, DC (1977-1978)

Mr. Houghton was born and raised in New York City and educated at Harvard University and the American University of Beirut, Lebanon. After Arabic language study in Lebanon, Mr. Houghton joined the Foreign Service and in 1966 was posted to Amman, Jordan. Specializing in Middle East Affairs, Mr. Houghton served in Cairo, Egypt, as well as in the Department of State and in the National Security Council in Washington. He was a Pearson Fellow on Capitol Hill and served as Special Assistant to Secretary of State Cyrus Vance. Mr. Houghton was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: Then you went over in '77 to the Arab-Israeli desk?

HOUGHTON: As deputy director in the Office of Israel and Arab-Israel Affairs.

Q: And you were there from '77 to...?

HOUGHTON: To '78.

Q: Well, this was a pretty exciting time, wasn't it?

HOUGHTON: Yes, it was. There was a lot going on. As number two I really – well, I don't know what number one and number two does in an office. They work it out between themselves. I had an office director who was preoccupied with lots of things including some things in his personal life, but for the most part left me running the office and managing some of the things that I really did feel were up to him, but it was an interesting time. For example, he came up to me and said, "Do you know of the Baltimore Democratic Rabbinical Congress?" or a name very close to that, and I said, "Well, yes. In fact, they're supposed to be here meeting with you in about 10 minutes. In fact, they're probably assembling down the hall in the conference room." He said, "No, wrong. I have an appointment with my psychoanalyst, so you're going to have to take the meeting." Well, I said, "What's the subject of the meeting, Walter?" He said, "They're really pissed off at the Department of State" – my language – "and they think that we're part of the foreign policy establishment in Washington that is somehow filled with Arabists, and they want to know what the United States is doing for Israel that will ease their concerns and fears, and that's what I was going to talk to them about." I said, "Thank you for letting me know what I'm supposed to say." We had a very good meeting for an hour and a half. It was perfectly fine. But in the end I found myself dealing with weapons transfers and nuclear issues of one kind or the other, the visits of Begin when Begin was elected Prime Minister, and the whole array of things that went on. Walter was there but in the end less there than I was. I felt myself fortunate in this great job. In any case, it was a wonderful job with lots of stuff to do and very, very busy offices, busy as any of the other offices.

Q: Was Begin elected while you were there?

HOUGHTON: Yes.

Q: That must have come as sort of a shock...

HOUGHTON: It did.

Q: ...as far as the whole outlook, because essentially the Likud Party was considered sort of way off in right field.

HOUGHTON: And all of a sudden there they were. Now they were in the center of the Israeli stage and Begin was now Prime Minister and he had a very different outlook from Peres or any of the others on the labor side. There was still an awful lot of business to do with respect to how you got work done both on the ground and in terms of the politics of the Arab-Israeli problem. It was a state-to-state issue. The Palestinians were nowhere in center stage at that point. It was Egypt and Syria principally. During that period I was – let me think about this – I went with a team to Israel to set up some aspect of the US-Israeli military relationship, if I recall correctly. There were Defense people who were there too. I remember being asked by an Israeli colonel if I really thought that Anwar Sadat was going to come to Israel – they had picked up a story – and I said, "I don't think so; it seems very unlikely to me," and of course he arrived the next day.

Q: You know, they keep talking about it in Japanese affairs the Nixon shokku. Well, you were right in the place where you were getting the Begin shokku and then the Sadat shokku. What was the initial reading you were getting on Begin as a new man? Were we seeing, well, there goes all our work; he's a hard-line guy and we're not going to get anywhere?

HOUGHTON: No, I don't think so. I think there was just sort of a sense that it was going to be much more difficult to find in Begin the willingness to make concessions and to reach an agreement with either Sadat or Assad or indeed any Arab than it had been with Peres, who had long experience dealing directly with Arabs. His personal association with Hussein had gone back years, decades, whereas Begin came out of a totally different matrix. He was willfully ignorant of the nature of what Arabs hoped for or expected in a discussion with Israel that might lead to a resolution of the outstanding issues that flowed out of the '67 war, a totally different background. Begin, we all felt, was going to be much more difficult, much more intractable.

Q: Did you feel our embassy in Tel Aviv was having problems switching gears, making contact, talking, because we'd had such an intimate relationship before? Was there a perceptible...?

HOUGHTON: No, not really. Let me see. My recollection is that very shortly after Begin came in – I'm a little blurred as to when this occurred, but I believe it occurred after Begin came in – Sam Lewis came in, and Sam appeared to have the view that his most important job was to accommodate himself to the needs of communication with Begin and anybody else at the highest level of authority in Israel. He wanted to learn about them, his ears were open, and he appeared to everyone to be sympathetic to what they wanted to say in a manner that allowed him to report intimately and continuously from his own contacts there. He became sort of in a sense the most important source of high-level views from the Israelis and was in their viewpoint a highly effective ambassador as well as from us.

Q: Were you getting at that time the feeling – and I've talked to other people; I had a very long interview with Sam Lewis, by the way – from sort of our embassies in Egypt, Syria, Jordan, maybe Lebanon and all that we were paying too much attention to the Israeli point of view and not enough to...?

HOUGHTON: I'm sorry. Is there a difference in what we had been perceived to be doing...?

Q: No, no, but under Sam Lewis I sense, since he was there for so long, and of course there were early days, but a feeling that the Arab side wasn't getting fair representation, or was it still the same game?

HOUGHTON: Some people felt that Sam, in time, maybe a very short period of time, adopted too quickly a position of advocacy for the views of the Israelis that he saw, but that isn't something that the Arabs knew about. This is not one of those things where it gets into the circuit, diplomatic circuit, that somehow the American ambassador to Israel has developed a bad case of localitis and everybody else is going to suffer as a result of it. That's not what happened. What happened is what normally happens: In a situation where the intimacy and depth of the relationship between the United States and Israel is such that, no matter what Israeli government is in place, somehow the relationship gets dragged along with it. That is, if it's somebody whom the United States feels comfortable with, such as Peres or later Rabin, then everything seems to be working together; and if it's somebody the United States feels uncomfortable with, like Begin or Netanyahu or Sharon, I think, today, the relationship follows, still goes along with it, and in a manner where the degree to which the hardness of negotiating position on the Israelis then spills over into the view that the United States has also adopted that position. That is not untrue. We tend to take our lead from the Israelis.

Q: How about AIPAC, American Israeli...?

HOUGHTON: Public Affairs Committee. Omnipresent, visible, active, highly effective.

Q: Were they sort of monitoring you or working with you all the time?

HOUGHTON: Well, they weren't working with me all the time. They may have been monitoring me, but my visibility was not that high. I didn't go out and give a lot of talks. My job was not to go up and talk to people in Congress, although I think I was invited up there by Steve Solarz at one point to give a talk. In the end I was not what you would call an important figure within their constellation of targets or friends within the Department of State or the American government.

Q: The visit of Anwar Sadat to Tel Aviv was one of these real major events. How did that come about from your perspective? How did you hear about it?

HOUGHTON: Well, I was in Israel at the time that it was about to occur and on my way out. I think I was leaving on the day immediately before he arrived or the day – I forget which – and so I heard it when I was there in Israel. The Israelis themselves were astounded at the idea that Sadat should come and visit them, and I think it astounded a lot of Egyptians. It certainly astounded a lot of other Arabs. Never did quite understand it. You had to take sort of a long look at it and figure out that here's Anwar Sadat doing the unexpected again and doing it in a manner that he gave very little warning, very little sort of build-up to this particular point. Sadat was a person who tended to take dramatic moves after some period of intense frustration and anxiety about whatever position he happened to be in at the time. That was surely the case with the war, and it was also the case with the political situation, where he felt there was no movement going on, nothing was going to take place, and he had to create new circumstances, which he then did.

HOUGHTON: No. Well, let me think about this.

Q: Oh, excuse me. You were there in the Carter period.

HOUGHTON: I was there during the Carter period. Just a second now – that's not true. At the NSC I arrived virtually as Nixon was leaving office in 1974 and stayed at the NSC until 1976. That was the Ford presidency. Then Ford was elected out of office later that year in 1976, but I'd already left the NSC at that time.

Q: So, when you were doing Arab-Israeli Affairs in '77-'78...

HOUGHTON: '77, '77 to early 1978, if I recall correctly.

Q: ...were you aware, was it apparent, that President Carter was taking considerable interest in the Arab-Israeli problem.

HOUGHTON: He did.

Q: I mean right from the beginning.

HOUGHTON: Yes, personally, more so than, I think, Ford had, and I think Nixon had many, many other things on his mind. But, yes, I think Carter definitely saw a role for himself in the Middle East. He wanted to create a new event, and in the end it was he who invited to the two parties, Begin and Sadat, to come up to Camp David, which they did.

Q: But even, say, while you were there, did you find yourself feeding the NSC and [inaudible] to the President information and all?

HOUGHTON: No, I was a mid-level government official within a bureau, and everything got funneled through the head of the bureau. If the White House was interested, if the NSC was interested, they would not come to the desk; they would go to the front office, and the front office would figure out how to service that particular thing. I had no special interface with the NSC or any of my successors even though I knew them and met them from time to time, but there was no particular relationship. I had left that job and gone back to State.

Q: With this job how did you deal with, say, the Syrian or Egyptian or Jordan desk, or were those your desks too?

HOUGHTON: Well, there were other desks within the bureau, and these were colleagues, these friends, some of whom I'd served with. There was no separation between desks. Sure, we were dealing with Israel and the other desks were dealing with the Arab countries, but if we had an issue or problem that involved more than one desk, we would be able to sit down and talk together. We were all professional colleagues. Many of us had come from the same background. It may have helped, for example, that I had gone through Arabic training and so forth and had circuited through the Arab world, so people knew that I was at least exposed to some of the issues that they were involved in. But there was no big deal here. We all worked as part of a team that was sort of harnessed in place by the NEA front office deputies as well as Assistant Secretary.

Q: I think this is probably a good place to stop. We'll pick this up next time in 1978. You were off to Israel?

HOUGHTON: No, in 1978 I went to the Office of the Secretary of State.

Q: Okay, so we'll pick it up at that point.

SAMUEL F. HART
Economic and Commercial Counselor
Tel Aviv (1977-1980)

Ambassador Samuel Hart was born in Mississippi in 1933. He graduated from the University of Mississippi in 1955 and then spent two years in the United States Army. After attending the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, he joined the Foreign Service in 1958. He subsequently served in Uruguay, Indonesia, Malaysia, Costa Rica, Chile, Israel, and was ambassador to Ecuador. Ambassador Hart was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

Q: After having gone from one fire to another, you went to a nice, quiet, comfortable post, Tel Aviv. How did this come about, and what were you doing?

HART: I had two objectives. I wanted to get out of Washington, because I didn't like working in Washington. I certainly didn't like the INR job, which had become irrelevant because of the lack of interest of anybody in Kissinger's State Department about economic matters.

And also, I'm an overseas person. You know, people expect, particularly at the senior level, Foreign Service officers to have two different sets of skills, which in some cases are really mutually exclusive.

On the one hand, when you're overseas, you're expected to behave toward the host government, the host country, the host people, as a diplomat, in which you are an interpreter, you are a compromise seeker, you are an honest broker, you are a message carrier. You're a lot of things that involve essentially being warm and fuzzy, keeping your intellectual ethics and integrity and your interpretive and analytical skills going all the time, but being of a personality type that you might call "B."

In Washington, the successful bureaucratic infighter, the successful person who gets things done around Washington, is an entirely different type. You're expected to be an infighter, a nut cutter, a fast maneuverer, a sleight-of-hand artist, and all this stuff, particularly if you're in the State Department, because we frequently come to the battle poorly armed in terms of domestic constituencies and resources, et cetera, if it's a policy battle over, say, trade policy, or something like this. So, in order to get things done in Washington, you're really expected to have, if you're a successful bureaucratic operator, a totally different set of skills.

I was more of an overseas person. I wanted a DCM job. And the Department said to me, "Well, maybe, if there's somebody out there who wants a DCM. But we're not encouraging on this. We would like you to take another job as economic/commercial counselor." By this time, I was an FSO Two, and I thought that I'd done that, really, twice, and I really didn't need to do it again. I wanted a DCM's job! Everybody wants a DCM job. I said, "Look, I'll just stay right here until one comes along. But I'm sure that that ought to be within a reasonable time."

Well, unbeknownst to me, things were happening. Sam Lewis had been appointed to Israel, and he had picked as his DCM Dick Viets, out of Romania, I believe. And they were looking for an economic/commercial counselor. This was in the spring of 1977. They'd both decided that, of the choices available to them in the Personnel system, I was the person they wanted. And Carol Laise had told them they could have anybody they wanted.

Q: She was the director general.

HART: And so one day I get a phone call, and they said, "Good news, guess what, you're going to Tel Aviv."

I said, "In what job?"

"Econ/commercial counselor."

I said, "I don't want to go to Tel Aviv. First of all, I've got no interest in going to Israel. Second, I don't want to be economic/commercial counselor again."

And they said, "Sorry, buddy, but that's what you're going to do. We're not asking you at all."

And I said, "I ain't going to Israel."

So a tug of war started.

I found somebody who wanted me to be his DCM. Somebody I had known for a long time offered me the job as DCM. And I went to Personnel, and I said, "Here, I've got this on my own."

And they said, "You're going nowhere but to Tel Aviv."

That tug of war lasted for about two months. I finally became convinced that they were serious about this, and that if I didn't go to Tel Aviv, I had to stay in Washington. I finally said, "Well, screw it," and I gave up, and I didn't get to be a DCM.

I went to Tel Aviv, where, in rank terms, I was the number-three person in the embassy. I went there under protest. I made it very clear to Sam and Dick that I'd come there under protest, which Dick kind of laughed at. But Sam I don't think ever appreciated the humor of it. One-third of the time I was there, I was supercontrol officer for presidential, vice presidential, and VIP visits. A third of the time, I was economic/commercial counselor and head of the AID operation. And a third of the time, I was acting DCM. That's the way it worked out.

Q: You were there from '77 to '80. What was the situation while you were in Israel?

HART: It was a tumultuous time. You had the whole Camp David thing. You had the first invasion of Lebanon by Israel. And you had the breakdown in the talks with the Palestinians. Those were the three biggest events while I was there.

The lead-up to the Camp David thing? Really, I was always of mixed emotions and of a mixed mind about that. With the full commitment of Jimmy Carter, we were able to persuade the Egyptians that if they would make peace with the Israelis, and thereby remove the major military threat to Israel, they would (a) get back the territory that the Israelis had been occupying since 1973, in the Sinai, and (b) start a process whereby Israel would negotiate, in the West Bank and Gaza, some kind of arrangement which would give the Palestinians at least a measure of self-government, and would perhaps, over time, lead to the removal of the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza. That was the deal which Carter was able to sell to Sadat. There were lots of negotiations leading up to Camp David, but that was the deal that Sadat bought, with a lot of arm-twisting by Jimmy Carter.

Menachem Begin at Camp David wanted very badly to get the Egyptians out of the military equation, for Israeli security, but in essence balked at the idea that Israel, over time, would in any way be committed to withdrawing from the West Bank and Gaza. He had some problems giving up the Sinai. There was the hard right-wing faction of his party, led by Yitzhak Shamir and Ariel Sharon, who opposed that. So Begin had to spend some political capital even to give back the Sinai. He in essence said, "That's as much as I can pay." And I think, probably, within party councils, he said, "I will never agree to any meaningful negotiations with the Palestinians about self-rule."

So when the Egyptians made peace with the Israelis and got back the Sinai, and the negotiations with the Egyptians about how the negotiations with the Palestinians were going to take place began, they quickly broke down. Sadat felt betrayed. Begin had no intentions, ever, of seriously negotiating with the Palestinians.

And so the Israelis, I think, got the better part of that bargain. Those of us who were in the embassy watching this, who thought about what was going to happen, feared that this might happen. And we thought that Carter needed to drive a better bargain with Begin about what was going to happen on the Palestinian issue. But he didn't, and so the Israelis got a hell of a good deal out of it.

Now, in retrospect, you can say the Egyptians did, too, because it took them out of a totally awful political and economic situation where they poured most of their national wealth into an armed forces that couldn't fight very well. It got them out of the Palestinian/Arab box, and let them pursue a foreign policy and a domestic policy which made more sense. So it did free-up Egypt to some degree.

But did Egypt accomplish what they really set out to accomplish? No. They got about half of it. And the Palestinian issue was left there for a later date.

Would the world have been better off had Jimmy Carter not done it? I don't know. Idle speculation. We'll never know.

The fact that the Palestinian issue is still as difficult today as it was then says something about how difficult the problem is. But at least there hasn't been another war.

Q: Well, tell me, how did you feel about going to Israel? I'm speaking as a Foreign Service officer who never served there. I served in Saudi Arabia -- had no great love for the Arab world, and got the hell out of it. But at the same time, I've always felt that Israel has been a little bit of a burr in the saddle in our foreign policy. Here is a small country with no particular interest to us in any real strategic terms, yet it sort of jerks us around because it has not only a very vocal Jewish population, but also supporters of Israel from non-Jewish groups.

HART: Well, it is the foreign policy area where there is the largest domestic political constituency. No doubt about it. I guess, probably around the turn of the century, around 1900, you could say that the Irish group was similar. You know, where you could get elected mayor of Chicago forever by keeping the British fleet off of Lake Michigan. Don't you remember the...

Q: Yeah, he said if King George came to Chicago, he'd punch him in the nose.

HART: Well, anyway, it was that kind of issue. And it's a very difficult issue for professional Foreign Service officers, because we don't like to be so constrained by domestic political considerations. And I must say, I probably didn't handle it very well, either, because I was an economist, and what I tried to look out for were the interests of the United States, as I saw it, in the economic field. Practically always, in my Foreign Service experience, economic interests were quickly and readily sacrificed by the State Department leadership and the U.S. government leadership for what they considered to be political interests. Whether it be a trade matter or an aid matter or whatever, political interests dominated economic or commercial interests.

You hear a lot of talk today about how a new day has dawned; things are different now. Well, I'd say, show me. I think that the State Department's culture favoring political interests will still be a while disappearing. It will be quite a long time before that proclivity has been changed, the culture has been changed.

I was looking, in Israel, for some way to change U.S. policy and to make it more rational. And I failed. I don't think I moved U.S. policy a millionth of an inch. I don't think I had any impact on U.S. policy during three years in Israel.

Q: You're talking about economic policy.

HART: Any kind of policy. Any kind of policy. Ever. And for that reason, I considered my tour in Israel a waste of time.

It was an interesting waste of time. I never worked as hard in my life, ever, as I worked in Israel - 60 to 80 hours a week for three years, away from home, in Jerusalem, an enormous amount of time. The strain on family, the strain on health, for everybody, was enormous. Even when nothing was happening, the embassy operated as if we were in a crisis.

One of the roles I chose for myself was to try to convince Sam Lewis to lighten up, because that was the kind of atmosphere that prevailed there. Sometimes he'd listen to me, and he would lighten up for a little while, but Sam, constitutionally, wasn't able to lighten up for very long at a time.

Israel was a crisis country, and the embassy was a crisis embassy, even when nothing was happening, and even when the influence that the embassy had on what was going on back in Washington was not very much. I can't speak for Sam, because I don't know what went on in Sam's world, but when I was acting DCM and once when I was the chargé, I never saw anything happen from Embassy Tel Aviv that in the long run made any difference.

Now in certain short-term cases, you might argue that that wasn't true.

I had enormous respect for Dick Viets. And part of that respect occurred when Sam was out of the country, Dick was chargé, and I was acting DCM, and we had an incident called the Haifa Road Massacre. A group of Palestinians came ashore along a beach in Israel, captured a bus on the highway between Haifa and Tel Aviv, took the people hostages, ended up in Tel Aviv, surrounded by the Israeli security forces, and there was a shootout in which all the terrorists except for one or two were killed, and a fair number of hostages.

The Israelis used this as a pretext to invade South Lebanon, supposedly to punish the people who had been responsible for this raid. But it ended up with the Israelis establishing a South Lebanon so-called security zone, which was really nothing more than Israeli-occupied territory. You can put any kind of parsley you want to around it, but that's what it is: it's Israeli-occupied territory in Lebanon. You can say, ah, well, there are justifications for this, blah, blah, blah, but that's what it is.

When the Israelis first moved into Lebanon, the sounds out of Washington (this was the Carter White House) were, "We fully understand why you'd want to do this."

Dick Viets, who understood what was going on, fired off "Eyes-only" cables back to Washington, to the White House and the secretary of state, saying, "This is an abomination. The Israelis have used this Haifa Road massacre as a pretext to do something they had been planning to do all along. And in the process, many, many innocent people in South Lebanon are being killed by the Israeli defense force." And that was the God's truth. And he said to Washington, "To the extent that the U.S. makes sympathetic noises toward the Israelis on this issue, we are accessories after the fact in what's going on there, which is an abomination."

This took a lot of guts. And it was effective in at least getting Washington to stop making these very sympathetic noises to the Israelis. It didn't get them out of South Lebanon, where they still are today, but at least it was a courageous stand on the part of an officer who knew that he was taking a lot of personal risk.

That's the kind of behavior that I like to encourage, so, unbeknownst to Dick, I nominated him for AFSA's Christian Herter Award, which was for a senior officer showing unusual professional competence and intellectual courage. And he won it that year.

But when he was back in Washington and he found out that I had nominated him, he never forgave me. He always held it against me; I think he felt like I compromised him in the process.

The embassy in Tel Aviv had multiple faces. I personally had my phone tapped. I was followed, et cetera. Sometimes I'd go from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem to deliver a message or ask a question of an Israeli official, and when I walked in the office, he already knew what I was going to ask or what I was going to say to him. We were the primary allies and bankroller of a society that spit in our faces. I kept looking for a way to change that, and, of course, I didn't find it. And I left Israel feeling like I'd wasted three years of my time.

Q: What was your impression of Sam Lewis? In my interviews, I've gotten mixed reviews. Obviously, a very strong person. He was in Israel for many years. How would you rate him?

HART: Well, Sam and I were then and still are today (Sam was over at my house for dinner not long ago) like two porcupines circling each other, because Sam has his agenda, and I have mine, and very seldom do they overlap. I admire Sam's skills. Do I think U.S. foreign-policy interests were particularly advanced by his stewardship? In my view, no, because I think Sam is too apologetic for the Israelis. And I think that while his being more critical of the Israelis, more frank with the Israelis, would probably have shortened his stay in Israel, I don't think that would have been a tragedy, either. I don't know what goes on in Sam's heart of hearts, but it's something different than what goes on in mine.

Q: Well, one of the things that one gets (again, I'm speaking as someone who's never dealt with the country, except sort of through the folklore) is that anything you send back to Washington, or that comes from Washington, ends up on the Israeli Embassy desk, or that there is tremendous leakage of everything. So it's sort of a fishbowl.

HART: Absolutely right. The Israeli Foreign Ministry and the intelligence service keep a dossier on every substantive officer in the embassy. Pretty soon you're put in one of the categories that they classify in; friend of Israel, or not friend of Israel. And not friend of Israel means that you're not actively supporting them on everything that they consider to be important. I was asked many times when I was in Israel, "Well, whose side are you on?" (as being the chief economic officer out there).

I said, "I'm on the side of the United States of America. That's where my allegiances are. I'm neither pro-Israeli, nor anti-Israeli. I'm pro-American."

That is interpreted as being anti-Israeli.

Everything you send back to Washington, no matter how classified, has a very strong chance of finding its way into the Israeli's hands. If you write it, you'll be identified to the Israelis as the author of the piece. And if they don't like it, they go after you, and frequently are successful in having you out of there.

Q: Was this a pervasive atmosphere when you were there?

HART: No, they're really usually only interested in the top two or three people. They don't care that much about junior or middle-grade political or economic officers, but they are concerned about the ambassador and the DCM and maybe one additional.

I had very good relations with the Israeli government and what have you, but they knew where I was coming from. Each year, the Israelis made an aid request. The embassy analyzed their aid request, all the numbers and everything, and sent the analysis back to Washington. Every year, I recommended a reduction in aid to Israel. And every year, it was increased, if not in the White House, in the Congress.

Q: So there was no impact whatsoever.

HART: That's right.

Q: Obviously frustrating.

HART: You ask yourself, "What am I doing this for? Why don't I just forget the exercise?"

In the process, I got to know Israel very well. The Israelis, as individuals, are some of the most stimulating and challenging and interesting people in the world. The Israelis, as groups, are terrible, because the Israeli society is set up in such a way that the most radical element always wins. The most radical element in any Israeli group ends up blackmailing the organization toward their viewpoint. Every Israeli government since the founding of the State of Israel has been a coalition government. And the people who are at the fringes of the coalition and who are brought into it usually are single-issue constituencies, and they can focus single-mindedly on what their single interest is. It might be aid to religious schools, or it might be whether or not you can do certain things on the Sabbath. And these people dominate Israeli society by their leverage in coalition government. You get a group of Israelis together to discuss anything, and you'll get a wide spectrum of opinion, but the ones who are on the right, who are for Israeli security or for orthodoxy or what have you, are the ones, in the end, that force the group toward their way, by various means -- sometimes it's guilt feelings; sometimes it's parliamentary maneuvering. They are very adept.

My three years in Israel were an experience. I can't say that I'm sorry that I did it, but I can say that I couldn't wait to get out. The day my three years were up, I was on a plane out of there.

DAVID I. HITCHCOCK, JR.
Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Tel Aviv (1977-1981)

David I. Hitchcock, Jr. was born in Massachusetts in 1928. He graduated from Dartmouth and Colombia and served in the U.S. Army. He joined USIA in 1957, serving in Vietnam, Japan several times, Israel, and Washington, DC. He was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt in 1992.

HITCHCOCK: I would like to jump quickly to coming back...well I didn't talk very much about being PAO in Israel, and I ought to talk a little bit more about that, perhaps. It was a critical time -- 1977-81. I arrived there in August 1977. Secretary Cyrus Vance made his first of seven trips in two years about two weeks after I got there. Sadat arrived in November for the great visit to Jerusalem. I was not only PAO, but as PAOs often are, I was the embassy spokesperson with the press attaché working quite closely with me throughout this tumultuous period. Ambassador Sam Lewis had arrived the same year. We became very good friends.

There were things that had to be done for all these visits, but not only that, trying to serve in those first few months as a kind of a bridge between Israeli and Egyptian journalists. When Sadat came to Jerusalem he brought with him a whole plane load of newspaper editors, journalists, who, of course, had never been there before. They met some of their counterparts and struck up some nice relationships. I went in December or maybe January to Cairo and took with me all kinds of messages from these Israeli editors to their counterparts and met with all the Egyptian editors. We were using our USIS office as a message sender to keep and begin to build some connections between...

Q: Where was your office?

HITCHCOCK: Our office in Tel Aviv. ...as a means of keeping the media in Israel and Egypt in touch with each other those first few months. This was still well before any treaty which came much later. The treaty between Israel and Egypt was signed in 1979 after the Camp David talks. But in those first two years -- 1977-79 -- I don't think I had a day off. I had a beeper on my belt and a CB radio in my PAO car if I was going out somewhere on Sunday, because the media in Israel will eat you up. They are fun, dynamic, aggressive, emotional and sometimes their emotions get the better of them.

The Israeli embassy in Washington plays the American press very skillfully. So we had the problem of leaks in all of this negotiation period coming out of Washington with a time frame of seven hours putting us behind the eightball to make a correction before the afternoon papers, which were the two biggest, Yediot Aharanot and Maariv, came out -- first editions were on the news stands at 10:00 in the morning. If I could get a correction to those two by 6:30 in the morning there could be a box with a statement saying "such and such wasn't so, etc." So I had a deal with those two papers that they could call me anytime after 6:00 AM, and that happened. I had to be awfully careful. I did all this on background or deep background. Rarely did I want to be quoted in the papers.

Sam Lewis and I developed a whole series of backgrounders with the Israeli press and with the American press. Sam became very adept at playing the game of negotiating through the media. A dangerous game. We got burnt a couple of times in those first two years, but on the whole we survived and learned how to do it. I focused a lot of my attention in those years, I had to, on the media and one on one luncheons. I had luncheons three times a week with journalists. I would spend Wednesday, every week, in Jerusalem without fail. I would plan the week so that there would be a whole schedule in Jerusalem on Wednesdays. At that point it was about an hour's ride back and forth. After each of these luncheons with journalists, I would tape a memcon. I often would not know what particular piece of information I was given would be particularly important in fitting the puzzle of other information the embassy was trying to come up with in terms of Israeli intentions.

That the PAO was doing that kind of work at that particular time was probably as important as the Political Counselor at the political end of these negotiations, simply because the network of some of these Israeli journalists was so good within the Israeli government. If the Political Counselor had had these luncheons they would not have been so open, but when the PAO goes, and he is talking about everything from American studies to book translations to the political talks that were going on, they were willing to open up. I have always found that USIA had better contacts across society, except with the Foreign Ministry, than the State Department did, for that reason. It was really critical at that time.

Public diplomacy has come into great play nowadays, but those days in Israel saw public diplomacy in the raw, trying to deal with the press in a volatile situation involving national security of both countries, Israel and the U.S.

I started one thing which I think was also terribly important. Israelis, even to this day, have a deep, almost pathological interest in what is going on in the United States. It comes out in their sense of dependence on us, not necessarily affection. I felt we were missing a bet in not providing the influential Israeli leaders with a good cross-section of American media opinion. The Wireless file always put in the staff-use-only side key articles in columns, editorials, but they would be from the Times, the Post, the LA Times, and possibly the Chicago Tribune, and the Christian Science Monitor, and that was about it. I wanted more than that, I wanted a cross section. I wanted the Cleveland Plain Dealer. I wanted the Detroit News. I wanted the Houston Post. I wanted the Atlanta Constitution. I wanted a cross-section of editorials on US-Israeli or Middle Eastern relations every two weeks. Well, everybody said I couldn't do that, it would be too expensive and there wasn't time. We leaned hard. I used an old friendship with Director John Reinhardt to demonstrate how important this was. We got it.

We put it out saying the following are excerpts from a cross section of American newspapers during the last two weeks commenting on US-Israeli relations and the Middle East peace process. Now to make it credible, I asked Washington to give me -- to use Ed Murrow's phrase -- the warts and all. I wanted the criticism of our side as well as their side. I made sure that there was a balance in these, because I knew there would come a day when some Israeli journalist would attack our bulletin because it was so effective. It was immediately an important thing that leaders, media people, the Foreign Ministry and Defense Ministry wanted. This is where the Israelis are so good. They have their hands out there trying to find out what American public opinion is, because they have to try to deal with it. It was one thing for the U.S. Government to criticize the Israelis in public. We didn't want to do that very often because it would play into Arab hands. We were reassuring the Israelis constantly that the United States support was there, would always be there when needed. At the same time, we were trying to press the Israelis to show more flexibility. Menachem Begin was the Prime Minister, a very stubborn man, indeed. We let the American press make the critical points for us and that was much better than having me say it or Sam Lewis say it all the time.

So there is another aspect of public diplomacy where I think USIS played a critical role. One never can measure the results, however.

We also watched the polls. We were doing, with the help of USIA's research office, which USIA paid for, a public opinion rider poll in Israel every six weeks. There wasn't any country in the world that USIA polled that often. And you better believe that the results of those polls were well read in Washington ...they were a hot item. They went in classified form with my comments, cleared by the political section of the embassy. Occasionally we might change the wording now and then to fit the local psychology of the Israelis, but we left the structure of the poll essentially to the professionals in Washington. These polls were enormously helpful in seeing where the Israeli public was going, what their anxieties were.

The organization in Israel doing the polling for us had a contract with Haaretz, which was sort of the New York Times of Israel, and therefore the results of the polls, without naming us, would get into the Israeli press. Usually the polls were showing that the Israeli public favored a more flexible stance in these peace talks. That was obviously another way of getting leverage in the negotiations.

I don't know how USIS could have been more effective in trying to use its resources, both in the polling sense and personal contact sense, in getting American media opinion to the right people in Israel at that time.

Q: Did you have a separate press officer?

HITCHCOCK: I did. It was a small post -- PAO, IO, CAO and ACAO in Tel Aviv and a branch PAO running a center in West Jerusalem. In East Jerusalem under the Consulate General there was another USIS officer dealing with the West Bank. So, it was pretty small. We had seven visits from Cy Vance in less than two years. Phil Habib, Robert Strauss and Al Atherton as well. All required USIS support. We would move the whole press section up to the King David Hotel for the Vance visits. The media reaction cable that we sent twice a day was so important that the Ambassador, himself, cleared off on it whenever he could, or else relied on me to have enough sense when something might not...it wasn't a question of shielding Washington from what the Israeli press was saying, but if they were saying certain things about U.S. policy, then we would put a paragraph, "septel follows" or comment saying "The embassy has already denied this charge, see septel" or something like that. We wanted to coordinate because the sensitivities in Washington towards what was going on Israel were enormous, and if this media cable came in naively reporting something that was going on in the Israeli press, all kinds of hell could break loose if the way hadn't been paved for it.

So when we went up to the King David Hotel, the very talented local staffer who did this press summary would get up really early and start working on it. He would put a raw version of it under the doors of Vance, Hodding Carter, Hal Saunders, etc. before they had breakfast. So, again, the enormously valuable role that USIS played in all this...

Again, transcribing, that has become a big thing now with Secretary Baker, but we would transcribe everything...we had a photographer/media guy who had all the badges and passes, a very aggressive Israeli, but charming, with tape recorder. I had a tape recorder with me all the time. We would whip out the tape recorder and get everything that anybody said and immediately get it transcribed and into a cable. For example, when Kamal, the Foreign Minister of Egypt, came to Israel -- this was after the Sadat visit and they had set up this political committee, US, Israel and Egypt. At the first banquet at the King David Hotel, Begin insulted Kamal and made references to the Sudetenland, one of Begin's favorite parallels he tried to draw with Egypt similarly eating up Israeli land. I guess he was also referring to the fact that Egypt remained sort of neutral during the war, and if anything, was pro-German to some extent.

The next day Kamal left. Whether it was simply because of the insults at the banquet dinner or whether it was other things, I don't know. We were the only ones who had gotten a few comments as he rushed out of the lobby of the Hilton Hotel in Jerusalem, because we had somebody with a tape recorder watching his door.

You may listen to me talk about American Studies and think that I gave all my time to the long term cultural side of USIA, but we were hot on the public affairs side in those years in Israel. And later on, certainly, with Alan Carter, when I was in Tokyo, we were hot on the public affairs side as well.

RICHARD N. VIETS
Deputy Chief of Mission
Tel Aviv (1977-1979)

Ambassador
Jordan (1981-1984)

Ambassador Richard N. Viets was born in 1930 in Vermont, served in the U.S. Army and went to Georgetown University. He joined USIA in 1955 and served in Afghanistan, Tunisia and after a break reentered the Foreign Service in 1962 serving in Japan, India, Romania, Israel and was ambassador to Tanzania and Jordan. He was interviewed by C.S. Kennedy 1990-1992

Q: You left Bucharest in 1977 and went from there to another hot spot, Tel Aviv, again as Deputy Chief of Mission. How did this assignment come about?

VIETS: That is an interesting story. I was back in Washington for a consultation three or four months before I was scheduled to finish my three year assignment and Carol Laise, who was then Director General, called me in for a meeting. She announced to me that she was very unhappy with the situation in our Embassy in India at that particular time and thought it needed a very different hand. I was her handpicked person to go out as political counselor. Happy as I would have been to return to India, I was not happy with the thought of returning as political counselor having been for three years a DCM in Romania. I thought it was a step backwards. Carol didn't see it that way. Her interest in India was supreme and anyone who had an opportunity to serve in India, regardless of the level, was obviously...

I was a good soldier and said, "Okay. I would rather have another DCMship, but if this is what you think must be done, I will do it." I returned to the India desk and there was a phone message for me from a man named Sam Lewis, who I had met once or twice before socially, but had never worked with him. Sam had just been nominated as our Ambassador to Tel Aviv. The phone message asked me if I would have lunch with him that very day. I agreed and we had a terrible cafeteria lunch.

It became clear to me in the first 30 seconds of the conversation that Sam was taking a look at me as a potential DCM. At the end of it I was pretty certain that I was going to get the job, although he was shrewd enough not to say so. Indeed, a couple of days later he called me and formally offered it. So we had to go to Carol and untangle the India web.

Sam was very anxious to have me there immediately after his arrival. He was being held back in Washington until the day after the Israeli elections when Prime Minister Begin was elected. He flew out the next day and two weeks later I stepped on an airplane in Bucharest bound for Israel. Half an hour later I was sitting at my desk hard at work and never stopped.

Q: Let's compare and contrast how Harry Barnes used you as his DCM and Sam Lewis used you as DCM?

VIETS: Well, again, the same traditional ambassadorial words of, "I don't want anything to go on here that you are not aware of, etc." Sam was true to his word. Especially in Israel you had to be because it was such a hot spot. This was the period that led up to the Camp David negotiations and then the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty. The US was right in the middle of all of that from day one, setting up everything and acting as intermediary for months and months between the Egyptians and Israelis who wouldn't speak directly to each other. We set up all kinds of secret contacts, etc. There were periods when more than half the time Sam was in Washington. So one really became almost a permanent Chargé and it was necessary that we worked very closely, and we did.

The only area that Sam reserved for himself, and he insisted that it was for protection purposes for me, was relationships with the American-Jewish organization leadership. He felt that that was the exclusive responsibility of the Ambassador to manage that and very rarely did I get involved in it. It would only be when I was Chargé and a group came in and I would have to meet with them.

Q: In the period you were there...you were there from 1977-1979...how did you and the Embassy view the Israeli political situation? Here was a real change in the political orientation domestically in Israel.

VIETS: There was very deep concern over the political changes that took place under Begin. We spent an enormous amount of energy and time trying to modify some of Begin's views and policies. A great deal of time during my first year was spent in trying to effectively contain Israeli attacks into the Lebanon. You had on the one hand, very, very active intelligence, Mossad, and Israeli Army and Air Force operations in Lebanon, and at the same time you were carrying on these very sensitive negotiations between the Israelis and the Egyptians, in which we were the exclusive conveyor belt. All messages went through us...to Cairo and came back from Cairo to us. We were the principal interlocutors for a very long time.

I remember after months of this finally one day getting a call from Prime Minister Begin's Chef de Cabinet, asking me immediately to get on the line to Cairo to pass along a message which he dictated to me over the phone. I said, "For Christ's sake, Eli, why don't you pick up the phone and do it yourself." A week before a direct line had been established. He said, "Do you think they would answer the phone?" I said, "Why don't you try." He did and it worked. That is how we began to get out of the business.

Q: What was your impression of how the Begin government worked?

VIETS: Well, that is about a week of conversation. Begin was a most remarkable figure. An old world Polish Jew who had lost all of his family in the holocaust under dreadful, dreadful circumstances. Truly a great patriot in his own right. He was a lawyer to the tips of his toes, very legalistic in everything. A man with enormous innate politeness. Even in the most dreadful moments of antagonism, and disagreement, conversations would always have to start out with, "How is your wife and your daughters?" etc. All the niceties of civilized conduct were carried on and then once you got beyond that he was one tough cookie to deal with.

But there were other tough cookies who worked with him. Moshe Dayan was a brilliant man. The most fertile, creative mind of any of Begin's advisers. Ezer Weizman, who in those years was an unbridled hawk and has now become a great dove. He was quite a remarkable figure. There were some very tough chiefs of staff in the army that one had to deal with regularly. It is difficult to characterize and describe the nature and quality of our Embassy relationship in Israel during those days. Again, I think, it has changed substantially since then. We were simply in all their pockets as they were here.

Q: I have been interviewing Nicholas Veliotis who mentioned, this was in the early seventies, that they always had to work on Friday because the cabinet met. I asked why they had to schedule the Embassy meeting because of a foreign government's cabinet? Well, apparently the relationship is so close that one is moving in accordance with their political life.

VIETS: And you had this enormous community in Washington interested in everything that was going on. You had a huge press corps there that was spewing tens of thousands of words of reporting back here seven days a week. So you were in competition all the time with even the wire services in getting stuff back. We were just constantly, 24 hours a day running that relationship. It was, and remains, deeply complicated by the fact that our Chancery is in Tel Aviv and everything except the Ministry of Defense and Mossad Headquarters were in Jerusalem. So you were everyday winding up and down those Judean hills to Jerusalem to do your business and then dictating all the way back into a little portable recorder your cables and memcons.

As time went on and the negotiations leading up to Camp David became so critical, we often would move over from meetings with the Prime Minister or other cabinet ministers and dictate our reports at our consulate general in Jerusalem and send them from there, simply because of time purposes, or we would get on the secure phone in Jerusalem. There were days that one would make three round-trip trips to Jerusalem. The last one perhaps getting home at 3 o'clock in the morning.

Q: You were sort of an outsider to this. You had served in India and Romania. Did you sometimes stand back and say, "Why the hell are we getting so involved in this country and what really is our real interest here?"

VIETS: Well, I think that one of the reasons Sam took me as his DCM was that conversation over lunch in the State Department cafeteria in which I expressed considerable skepticism about the nature of the US-Israeli relationship, one that I did not know a great deal about but what I did know I was skeptical about it. I think that Sam may have felt that perhaps it was not a bad idea to have somebody at his side with this quality. Indeed, to his great credit a few weeks after I arrived, we brought out an extraordinarily talented older officer named Bill Brubeck, who had served as DCM in Amman some years earlier. He had become really a great authority on the Middle East and was an iconoclast of the first order. We brought him out because we wanted somebody sitting off, out of the line of daily operational fire, to nitpick, to push us, to examine and re-examine from every perspective what we were up to.

All of this in the light of what subsequently happened in the relationship may sound like pretty thin gruel, but I, at least, to the day I left, liked to think that I maintained my integrity in handling that relationship when things...I would call a spade a spade. I still have some marvelous notes from Jimmy Carter and Brzezinski and Cy Vance on things I did, especially when I was Chargé and brought the Israelis up short.

Q: There has been this accusation that you get in the Near Eastern Bureau that I am sure everyone is aware of, that somehow our Embassy in Israel becomes completely co-opted by the Jewish movement politically in the United States. Here is a small country of several million people putting us at odds with this huge Arab world out there and it is not in America's interest. Somehow the feeling gets focused on the Embassy. When I mention Sam Lewis to hands who have dealt in the Arab world steam begins to come out of their ears. I wonder, is this endemic or is there a problem of co-option?

VIETS: I believe in general terms there are problems of co-option in almost any society you can name for a diplomat operating in that environment if he gets deeply involved in it. But I think there is nothing that approaches the danger of co-option in Israel because here is a society that never lets up. It has enormous influence and impact in Washington and has no qualms about using it. For them the game is their security, their livelihood, their lives. That is their argument. It is very tough to buck it. I think that it is a major mistake to leave anybody in Israel for an extended period of time. And I include, needless to say, ambassadors in that.

Q: In dealing with upper level Israelis...let's say a directive comes out from Washington to press them hard on a point...they look at you and say, "Okay fellows, this is nice and you have made your point, but if you press it too hard we are going back to the Israeli lobby in the United States and they are going to wipe you out."

VIETS: I don't remember anybody being quite that blunt. They didn't have to be. There is language within language in this arena. But I can assure you that we all had our hours at bat when we were brutal in our directness. I certainly include Sam in this. Whatever Sam's reputation is, and remember I was only there for a little over two years with him, and he stayed on for seven or eight years, and clearly as time went on his views were modified and shaped by the pressures that were on him so I won't speak to that. But during the period I was there the United States was very lucky to have a guy as smart and tough as he was. When the chips were down there was never any question in my mind as to what he was representing in those days. It perhaps changed.

Q: Well, you were there at a time when there was really a very crucial shift going on, when Israel was becoming more and more dependent on the United States. Was there disquiet on the side of the Israelis who were looking on this thing and knowing the underside of American politics, etc.?

VIETS: I think there were very few thoughtful Israelis who worried a great deal about the liabilities of becoming so dependent on the United States. In part because I think no one in those years understood how dependent Israel ultimately was going to become. And secondly, because I think there is an inbred, perhaps arrogance is too strong a term, but I will use it, that at the end of the day they knew what they were doing and could manage the relationship in a fashion that would always keep their interests protected.

On the American side there certainly were many people who were concerned about the changing nature of the relationship, but the domestic politics of the relationship became so paramount in policy decisions with the Congress pressing the administration unmercifully to give more and more aid, military assistance, economic assistance, trade advantages, intelligence exchanges, etc. You had people like Jimmy Carter who suddenly found himself running for his life. In his re-election campaign he turned 180 degrees concerning his views on how to handle the Israelis.

Q: But initially you were there when Carter was first coming in. So the period you were there you felt that there was really a certain amount of firm control?

VIETS: No, I wouldn't say that. I think the moment of major change, the fault line, took place during the Johnson administration. Up to that time, I think the relationship had been one that was best characterized by the figure of speech...the Israelis were kept on a quite short leash. Johnson, for purely domestic political reasons, changed that policy. He suddenly opened up a cornucopia of arms to Israel. We became the principal military suppliers and remain so to this day. Economic assistance began markedly to increase under Johnson. By the time Carter arrived in office it was already in the billions. I can remember arguing until blue in the face on maintaining lower levels and ultimately we found ourselves faced with a relationship that had gone out of control in many important respects.

But let's be fair, I am sitting here running on about a relationship that is so complicated and so nuanced that one risks doing a great injustice to it with the kinds of superficial responses that time constraints dictate in responding to your questions.

Q: The idea is to at least pick up some of the feeling here. What were your impression of our congressman coming to Israel? Was this sort of a political situation that they would come to? Were they completely the creatures of the Jewish lobby in the United States?

VIETS: I think with rare exception one would have to characterize them as being craven in their deportment and behavior, each trying to out do the other in their public utterances, in their fealty and loyalty to the State of Israel and its people. They had very little time for any conversation that contained criticism or analysis of what was going on. These were PR visits for use in fund-raising and election winning. One very often was physically disgusted by it.

Let me add out of fairness to the Israelis, I think in the dark of the night they were equally disgusted.

Q: Well, it is almost impossible not to be by this peculiar relationship that has developed. What about our consul general in Jerusalem? This has always been a fascinating post. I have written a history of the consular service and at one point the consul general in Jerusalem, in the 1970s up through World War I, served as a protectorate of the Jews. This was unofficially, but interceded often with the Ottomans, etc. But then the role almost switch. It was the same role but the Ottoman Empire no longer posed a threat, the Israelis were the occupying power. How did you view their operation, what were they doing there?

VIETS: I think Sam and I agreed that we would not fall into the trap that some of our predecessors had in viewing the consulate general as the enemy. As you know I think it remains the only consulate anywhere in the world whose reporting goes directly to Washington.

Q: I think Hong Kong is another one.

VIETS: Oh, yes. So both of us worked very hard in insuring that our personal relationships with the Consul General and staff...

Q: Who was the Consul General?

VIETS: Well, Mike Newlin was there for all of the period that I was there. Mike felt the same way. I, in particular, spent a lot of time insuring that Mike was kept fully apprized of all but a tiny fraction of sensitive elements of our negotiations leading up to the Camp David and the peace treaty, etc. Although a lot of the traffic was so highly compartmentalized we couldn't send it to Jerusalem, he would come down one day a week and lock himself in my office and I would show it to him. So he knew what was happening.

For his part, he insured that all of his reporting was repeated to Tel Aviv. Our staffs would meet regularly and compare notes. Occasionally there would be an eruption of differences, but on the whole it was very well managed and productively managed on both sides. The one major problem area I recall was at the staff level. A vice consul became very, very incensed over her perception of some human rights abuses on the part of the Israelis.

Q: I think that she was really one of the first eruptions of this. It got on the front pages...

VIETS: She documented a number of cases of maltreatment and abuse of Arab prisoners in jails, etc. She was very concerned that the Embassy was undercutting her and went public at one point on this. In the end, I think she was relatively satisfied. She had her day in court and her information in no way shape or form was censored.

Q: This is an area on both sides of the track. Some of the same people ended up in the Executive Secretariat where the action is. You can turn a young officer loose and they are going out doing some reporting. This is Jimmy Carter and human rights time. There is a very controversial relationship, at least in the Foreign Service, with Israel. Were there things coming out of the West Bank where Israeli occupation authorities were that were embarrassing to the Israelis and which they didn't want reported?

VIETS: Absolutely.

Q: How did you deal with these?

VIETS: They were reported. I am sad to observe that the censorship of these reports took place in Washington, not in the field.

Q: Let's talk a little about Washington. My only time in the Middle East was a short time as a vice consul in Saudi Arabia. I had nothing to do with any of this and am not a Middle East hand, but I have watched this with a certain amount of fascinated disinterest. It has always seemed that in Washington our relationship with Israel is so political that you really can't report as you would from another post. It would immediately leak into the press, one's career could be jeopardized, etc. How did you feel about this? You were new to it too.

VIETS: My career, I guess, is marked by a reputation of being excessively outspoken and I never really worried about it. It seemed to me that one calls a spade a spade as accurately as one can. That is on reporting. When it comes to policy formulation, obviously one has to be careful to insure that you are embracing the spectrum of agreement and disagreement. So it is two quite different issues that one is talking about.

I felt, as Sam did, that careers could be badly bruised, if not destroyed, out there, so one made very sure that one took responsibility for those messages that we knew would cause heartburn in Washington. But one encouraged the younger officers on the staff to dig and dig hard and there was no...I think it would be an interesting case study to go around to officers in that mission who have left and ask them if they felt any kind of constraints being put on them. I doubt very much during that period you would find...My concern today, if we can move this interview to 1990...by virtue of one of the things I am doing in retirement is political advisor to King Hussein, so I stayed very actively engaged in US-Israeli relationships and US-Arab relationships, such as they are. I am deeply concerned that almost all of the Foreign Service officers that I now see and deal with, I feel have become politicized by this issue and all too often are pulling their punches in their reporting, their analysis, their recommendations to their superiors. It is something that I could quite easily document. It is very sad to see what is happening. They are scared of their careers on this particular issue.

Q: Probably Central America was another one.

VIETS: I think it probably was. I think this is much less true in our...

Q: Were you getting instructions from Washington saying to knock off this talk about what the police are doing within Israel, itself?

VIETS: No.

Q: Were there times when you would give a candid report and the next thing you knew it was in Evans and Novak?

VIETS: Yes.

Q: Where was this coming from? You must have thought about who was leaking this material? Was it political opportunists; were they Jewish-Americans who felt so strongly for the cause of Israel that they would do this; or was it somebody who was wanting to make a name for themselves?

VIETS: All of the above.

Q: Would you sometimes lash out and say, "Who the hell leaked that?" Or would you just sort of shrug and get on with your business?

VIETS: There would be a lot of discussion over telephones, I don't recall cables discussing it. We had a very active secure line between Tel Aviv and Washington.

Q: If somebody was to look at the official record today... just by the fact that there were leaks if you put something down on paper you always had to look at that and ask how it would look in the editorial op-ed section of the Washington Post.

VIETS: Point well taken. More than in any post I had served in you were aware of the fact that what you were sending back in one form or another, bits and pieces of it could appear in the public domain. We had some very special category arrangements on distribution for that stuff so few people saw that and I don't recall any difficulties there. But once you got below that, it was fair game to the Xerox machine.

Q: So the telephone was often...

VIETS: Alas, the historians are going to be up the creek because so much of this was done by secure line, even though I think both Sam and I were perhaps more aware than many that it was important to keep a historical record. Files were full of memcons, telephone memcons, etc. But in the pace of events you just never got them all down.

I am going to have to break off.

Q: What was your view and the Embassy's view of the Arabs within Israel itself at that time?

VIETS: I must say in retrospect I am not at all certain that this Embassy nor I as the Deputy Chief of Mission put as much focus on the issues of the Arabs within the so-called green line, Israel proper, as we should have. I believe in an earlier interview, we may have got into the tensions that existed between the Embassy and our Consul General in Jerusalem, which, of course, is responsible directly to Washington for reporting what was going on in the occupied territories. The Arabs within the green line were by definition the responsibility of the Embassy.

During that period, as a community, my recollection is that they were a quiescent lot. I don't recall, frankly, with enough vivid detail, what at the time I felt was the reason for this quiescence. Whether it was that they simply had been beaten down by the general weight of the Israeli state, or whether they had simply made their peace with themselves and with the Israelis and were going about their lives. There was very little, as I recall, formal contact between the two Arab Palestinian communities...those within the green line with those in the occupied territories. This wasn't terribly easy to accomplish because of the security apparatus and the military apparatus which was omnipresent. I think any green line Arab seen spending a lot of time on the West Bank would immediately have come to the attention of the Israeli authorities and probably would have to shortly respond to somebody to what he was doing there. So it was not a period when a great deal of contact was taking place.

We had in the Embassy a political officer who, along with a number of other things, added it to his portfolio and did sporadic reporting on it. We certainly kept in touch with the Arab delegation in the Knesset and members of the parliament. But I don't know in retrospect whether perhaps we should have put more emphasis on that community than we did.

Q: It sounds like at the time they knew their place and the Israeli apparatus was keeping them knowing their place.

VIETS: That is certainly my recollection.

Q: Coming to the events...you were there probably at the most dramatic time one can imagine, other than just a war going on which is dramatic, but not necessarily moving ahead. What was our view of Sadat before he came? Were you getting from Egypt a feeling that something was happening?

VIETS: Yes, quite a lot. To begin with, we knew, although it took us some weeks to extract the full facts out of the Israelis, we knew that there had been contact between Dayan, the then Foreign Minister, and an Egyptian in the President's office. I recall vividly Dayan's anecdote about this gentleman, who he had met on one or more occasions secretly in Morocco. I recall Dayan telling the story that at one of their meetings this man suddenly went very silent and wouldn't respond or anything. When his silence was finally broken he announced that he was very fond of clocks, he collected clocks and he apparently at that moment heard a lot of clocks ringing in his brain and he had to listen to them and he couldn't talk to anybody. There was some very strong feeling on Dayan's part and I think on others who knew this gentleman, that he was slightly tetchy.

In any case, Dayan eventually succumbed to Sam Lewis' beguiling efforts and gave us the details of those meetings of which we had had bits and pieces of through various intelligence means, but we didn't know everything.

From that point onward our Embassy in Tel Aviv became the conduit for all of the messages going back and forth between Cairo and Jerusalem. The bulk of that became my responsibility. Clearly this was a very sensitive, highly classified operation. I can recall spending a great deal of my time in the weeks leading up to the Sadat announcement of his impending visit handling these contacts. There were, I think a few direct Israeli-Egyptian contacts outside the area, but basically the two sides used the Americans to pass messages and views back and forth.

I do recall a very secret visit that we arranged shortly before the Sadat visit for Ezer Weizman, who at that time was the Minister of Defense in Israel. We flew into Tel Aviv in the dark of the night a US Air Force aircraft from Germany and I can remember picking up Ezer before dawn in an Embassy car and hiding him under blankets and driving out to the far end of the Tel Aviv airport runway and Ezer appearing from beneath these blankets and being hustled on board before any of his own people could see him. I remember even the pilot and crew on the plane had no idea who the passenger was or where they were going until he was on board and they were in the air. He went to Cairo and met with Sadat and his counterpart. Ezer, I am sure, is still dining out on that story and elaborating on it. And it was rather amusing...

Q: While this was going on, were you concerned that there were elements within the Jewish political system who would love to torpedo this sort of thing?

VIETS: No. I think that is a fair question, but I think the Israelis at that point were desperate to get talks going with any Arab state. After all, remember no offers had been laid out by anybody on what the price of a peace agreement with the Israelis was going to be. That all came later.

The Israelis could read the handwriting on the wall, I suppose, but remember that the Israeli public didn't know that this was going on. That, in it self, is a remarkable moment in the history of the State of Israel. If we think of Washington as a big piece of Swiss cheese where no secrets can be kept, I must say Tel Aviv puts Washington in most respects to shame. There are a few core secrets in Israel, for example, issues relating to their nuclear capability, on which indeed their lips are sealed, but almost everything else within minutes, hours or days of the event or conversation taking place gets into the most active media world I have ever served in.

Q: Well you and obviously our Embassy in Egypt, Hermann Eilts was Ambassador, knew what was going on since you were acting as communicators. Were you also acting as advisers in suggesting the next move?

VIETS: Yes, we did both. I think both Embassies were very, very conscious of the need to insure that neither party was getting a skewed view of what the other side was trying to say. We didn't shade messages, but we might interpret them. We might say, "If you responded in this fashion this is probably the response you will get." That kind of role.

Q: That is quite a different thing.

VIETS: We passed the stuff back and forth without putting any input...

Q: What about the role of Washington? Here is something that is going on and the policy makers in Washington must have been itching to get heavily involved in this type of thing. Did you have a feeling that this was being tightly controlled?

VIETS: Obviously Washington by its very nature wants to be the mother hen on everything that is both unimportant and important. We, I think, were punctilious and professional in keeping Washington informed about what was going on. We were repeating, where there was cable traffic, all of the cable traffic. I would several times a day have conversations over secure voice telephone with people in Washington about what was going on. And certainly Sam would have very lengthy conversations, sometimes daily.

No, I feel confident that they were kept apprized of everything that was important. There were, by definition, all kinds of telephone calls back and forth between our Embassy in Tel Aviv and our Embassy in Cairo, that Washington wasn't monitoring. It was up to both Embassies to insure in the cause of the day that they reported to their respective Desk what had gone on.

I should add that the point was reached in which I felt that the moment had arrived for the Egyptians and the Israelis to begin to deal with some of these issues directly. I vividly recall one day getting a telephone call from Prime Minister Begin's office, a man named Ben Eliezar who at that time was his principal chief of staff. He asked me to pass what was a very anodyne administrative type message to the Egyptians through our Embassy. I think I must have been up all night the night before or something was wrong because I was quite testy with him. I remember saying, "For God sake Eli, I think it is time that you guys just pick up the phone and contact the guy who is going to be receiving this on the other end and say this to them directly. This is ridiculous for us to be acting in this role. We will be happy to continue doing whatever we can to facilitate things, but this is getting silly." I remember him saying, "I agree. Do you think the Egyptians will answer the phone?" I said, "Well, here is the phone number, try it." And he did. From that point onward, the Israelis and the Egyptians both started their direct bilateral contacts. I am sure that somebody in American intelligence has never forgiven me, but there were other ways of keeping track of this.

Q: Did you find as you were watching these messages going back and forth that there was a difference in approach between the Egyptians and Israelis?

VIETS: Absolutely. I should preface this by saying that this was a period of intense high pressure on all of us at the Embassy. Looking back on it it has just become a jet speed kaleidoscope of events and I wish that my memory were better so that I could answer these questions with greater acuity. But we were all totally exhausted. I was probably getting on average about 3-4 hours of sleep a night for weeks on end. In those circumstances, that part of your brain that stores things sometimes doesn't do very well. But my general response to your question is yes. I think you could see always in at least the more important substantive messages the omnipresent Israeli toughness. The Israeli view on negotiations, understandably, and perhaps quite rightly, is to reach way beyond the possible, assuming that by the end of the negotiation you may be back about where you want to be. On the other hand, I think the Egyptians generally took the attitude that you should start out with a fairly sensible proposition and take it from there. It took them quite a while to realize the Israelis would always whittle away at it, shape and form it to their requirements.

That is not to suggest that the Egyptians were always sensible. They weren't. They can be excruciatingly exasperating when they want to be. And they can be as bureaucratic as the best of them and certainly they can be as fuzzy if not more fuzzy than anybody I ever worked with when they wanted to be.

But as time went on both sides, I think, pretty much got the measure of each other and began to calibrate their messages, responses and reactions.

Q: We are talking about this heavy load of work. I take it for a good part of the time...this was before Sadat made the announcement...that the heavy load was going on in that period too. Is that correct?

VIETS: That is correct.

Q: Obviously your wife was noticing, but everybody else must have been noticing the Ambassador, the DCM and a few other people...I mean, here it is a bright sunny day outside and they are walking around looking harassed and there is nothing on the horizon that looks particularly menacing or something like that.

VIETS: Well, by definition Tel Aviv is a screwy Embassy to work in and I don't think it took long for anybody who was there to figure out that there was a good bit that went on in the US-Israeli relationship that was handled by the Ambassador exclusively or by the Ambassador and the DCM. Occasionally bits and pieces of this floated down to other senior officers. But it wasn't one of those wide open missions where everybody knows exactly what the Ambassador and the DCM have done all day long because they would tell everybody about it in the next day's staff meeting.

People were accustomed to seeing a lot of closed doors and a lot of cars coming back in the dark of the night. The poor communicators were accustomed to knowing that at 2 or 3 in the morning they were going to be asked to send a NIACT IMMEDIATE or FLASH message on what was going on. It was just the nature of that installation at that particular period. It may still be the same, but I doubt it.

Q: This whole thing was opened up when Sadat made the announcement. Was this agreed upon, because certainly it would make it much stronger if Sadat made the statement rather than a joint declaration?

VIETS: No, my recollection is that this was a unilateral decision on his part and "bang" there it was. We may have had a little bit of advance notice, but I don't think very much.

Q: Did it hit the Israelis the same way?

VIETS: Oh, yes. It blew that country right off the map.

Q: What was the Embassy's and Washington's reaction? How did we see the Israeli's response and how did we play with that?

VIETS: Well, it would have been better to tape this at the moment because you surely would have received a more accurate answer to that question. I don't think that either Sam or I were at all surprised. You could see this symphony being created, if that is the right metaphor, and one knew ultimately that either there was going to be bilateral talks or the thing would blow up, one or the other. It came very close to blowing up any number of times. Here's where I think Hermann Eilts and Sam Lewis and perhaps one or two of the rest of us made the difference. We kept it going in those moments when it started veering off.

Q: This is where we are talking about not shading the answers but working on the formulation of the answers.

VIETS: That is correct. Or simply sitting down with people and saying, "God damn it, don't pay any attention to that, this is what you ought to have your eye on, and this is what ought to be your goal. Here are some ideas of how to go after it." Sam, for example, spent many, many hours almost every day with people like Moshe Dayan, either during the day or late at night. Dayan lived outside of Tel Aviv, not in Jerusalem, so it was easy to spend evenings with him. And Sam certainly spent hours and hours with Begin. And when he wasn't in Tel Aviv I was doing the same routine.

So, as I said, I don't think either one of us was at all surprised, but because this had been so carefully controlled by Begin and Sadat, it did come as a bomb shell in Israel. My recollection is that there was literally dancing in the streets and all the rest. It was a nation that suddenly after all those years of having been a pariah, somebody recognized that you existed and spoke to you. In the ensuing emotional outburst it unleashed a great deal of unrealistic hope on the part of the Israelis that this meant perhaps the beginning of the end of Israel's isolation throughout the Arab world. After all, the Egyptians were the center of the Arab world and if the Egyptians did this it would be so much easier for everybody else, etc.

I think in a sense those unrealistic views have for some Israelis perhaps existed to this day. I haven't ever quite understood how the Egyptians could do this and why it didn't open the way for others.

I recall after the visit itself there was a great rash of naming children, twins, Begin and Sadat. One little personal anecdote, I remember a dinner that Moshe Dayan and Ezer Weizman gave at the Jerusalem Hilton for Secretary of State Vance, who was there for a visit trying to keep the game alive. Students of this era will remember that after the initial euphoria of Sadat's visit, both the Egyptians and Israelis began to tighten their positions and things slowed down in a hurry for a while. Again, that is where, I think the Americans won their equivalent of the diplomatic Nobel Peace Prize by really being basically responsible for keeping it going.

In any case, I recall at this dinner, half way through, Vance, who was sitting with Mr. Begin, crooked a finger at me. I left my table and went over. He wanted me to deliver a message to somebody in Washington. While I was standing behind his chair talking to him, Begin reached over and in his usual punctilious fashion, greeted me warmly and asked, as he always did, after my wife and children. I always tried to have a semi-jocular relationship with Begin and I said, "Mr. Prime Minister, I have something to report to you in this post-Sadat era of naming children after you and Mr. Sadat. My middle daughter Kasha, has bought two fish. One is named Begin and one is named Sadat." He smiled and laughed and said, "This is going on all over, isn't it." I said, "Well, I am reluctant to tell you, but one of them the night before last killed the other one." He immediately in his quick witted fashion said, "Did Begin kill Sadat or Sadat Begin?"

In a sense that little story is a metaphor of what was going on at that very moment. Tensions were rising. Begin was beginning his very hard line approach in reaction to Sadat's demands for a total pull out in Sinai, resolution of Palestinian issue, etc., and he was beginning very carefully to lay out his markers about what Israel would and would not accept. Sadat, I think, was perhaps somewhat confused and frustrated over the fact that he had made, in his eyes, and I think most Israelis would agree, a great personal gamble and taken a very courageous step, and it wasn't being accepted in the same fashion and manner in which he had made it. It had immediately become kind of a bizarre negotiation. And that caused some bitterness, to put it mildly, within the Egyptian policy community and Sadat's entourage. This is where Hermann Eilts earned his keep and Sam Lewis earned his.

Q: Were we trying to let the Israelis know that Sadat had done something that was really very dangerous politically and physically for him? People in the Arab world would be out gunning for him and not to waste this moment because he might not be around.

VIETS: Certainly we were taking a line similar to that. But the Israelis in their own fashion had their own reactions. I think that, again I don't want to turn into a psychiatrist, but it does seem to me that when you have a society that has been a pariah, and that really is the right word for many, many years...a whole generation of Israelis had grown up in an environment in which essentially nobody in the region in which they lived had recognized them, spoken to them, indeed at various times tried to do them in...it is perhaps too much to expect that society overnight to trust what the first person to come down the pipe offers is a peace initiative. This is asking a great deal of any society.

Again, this is 1992 and we are still seeing those delayed reactions. Remember, this is a society that has been shaped and formed by an adversarial relationship and has not known any relationship in which one is treated as an equal or one is treated as something other than an enemy.

Q: Just to get a little personal thing on this, how did you see anything you did that might be worth mentioning during the Sadat visit in 1977?

VIETS: I am probably the last person to ask that question of because literally on the day of the visit we had essentially all of our Embassy out on the street in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, and God knows where else, in order to pull together the appropriate reporting messages. Dick Viets played the role of DCM by staying home and minding the fires. So I watched it on a television set in my office. But I had no role, whatsoever, that day. I only heard all the wonderful stories from my wife and my colleagues who were there. I wasn't present.

Q: After the Sadat visit it moved into a period of joint negotiations. Were our Embassies in Cairo and Tel Aviv still playing somewhat the same role, or had the play moved more to being directed from Washington?

VIETS: I think at that point Washington certainly became the senior partner in all of this and we were subsidiary, because at that point you were talking about policies that required very top echelons in this government to make decisions on. I think one of the professional thrills of that period was knowing that whatever you were drafting was being read by the President personally, by the National Security Adviser and the Secretary of State. I still have somewhere in my personal archives in the Department a variety of copies of telegrams that I had done as Chargé with writings on the margin from the President, Brzezinski and Secretary Vance, etc. There aren't too many times in any Foreign Service officer's career when you know you are talking directly to the boss. That in itself is a sufficient inducement to survive on four hours less sleep a night than normal.

Q: At that point was your main purpose to interpret how the Israelis were reacting?

VIETS: Again, I have trouble remembering the details of that period precisely. It really is a blur to me. The fact that Camp David was held, I think in itself is part of an answer to your question. A few weeks later things really were not going very well and the I think the feeling on the part of the President and his senior advisers was that the moment had arrived for the United States simply to lock people up in a room and hammer out an agreement; that it was drifting and it was always a risk that one or the other would simply say, "Enough of this."

As I am talking I am constantly comparing in my mind the environment then with the environment today in peace talks that are starting up again this very morning that we are talking. I remember the frustrations that began to develop in the region when nothing seemed to be happening as a result of this wonderful Sadat visit when emotions and hopes ran so high. It just seemed to tail off into endless volleys of diplomatic exchanges and sharp off-the-record comments, leaks, etc., by both sides. The constituency always needed in any prolonged negotiation of this nature, began to erode. There was no tangible evidence, either for the Israelis or the Egyptians, that the game was necessarily worth the price. The same thing is true today, I think. But fortunately wisdom prevailed. There was a political and policy leadership in this city who saw this as a moment in history that should be grasped irrespective of the dangers that it would blow up in your face. And they grasped it and forced it through.

Q: Were you getting from your Israeli contacts as the negotiations seemed to be drifting that the United States should come in get the thing back on track?

VIETS: There were people like Ezer Weizman who were saying precisely that, who were growing frustrated over the actions of their own government. Ezer was one who was extremely critical of elements of his own government's policies. I can't speak for what was going on in Cairo. The Israelis had then, and still have, thank God, a very free press which meant that the media was full of analysis and as always advice to the government over what to do. So it wasn't a depressed public debate at all, it was a very lively one. But frustration was there.

Q: Was it a sense of relief from your point of view when President Carter called the Camp David meeting?

VIETS: Oh yes, very much. You may remember during Camp David, itself, the press was miles away and it was a very tightly controlled negotiation. I really didn't know many of the details of what was going on because there were no daily reporting cables coming out of Thurmont, Maryland. I didn't learn many of the details until Sam flew back to Tel Aviv. I can remember the morning after he arrived going to his residence, sitting down by the swimming pool in the hot Mediterranean sun, while he went through several hours of notes that he had taken. He knew what he was doing during Camp David and took very extensive notes, which unfortunately have never seen a book, but someday may.

Q: I will tell you in a way what is happening to those notes, he has been doing a series of Oral Histories with us which has been going on for a few years. Peter Jessup is doing the interviewing. I think he was Station Chief or something like that. Anyway, Peter is a professional oral historian and Sam has been basically dictating his memoirs.

VIETS: Just to continue this parenthesis, when he retired he started work on a book which was really to be a political memoir of that period couched in the greater context of the US-Israeli relationship. He worked on it for several months, maybe a little longer, and I think got half way through or so and decided there were other ways he wanted to spend his time.

Q: You left shortly after the Camp David thing?

VIETS: I left there in August, 1979. There is one anecdote that has come to mind. Again I can't place precisely when it took place, but you will recall that the negotiations on a peace treaty between Egypt and Israel began to flounder very badly. President Carter who was in the midst of gearing up for his re-election campaign clearly saw not only the historical importance of getting a peace treaty between Israel and Egypt accomplished, but also that this would be a major accomplishment of his administration. He also realized that things had probably reached the point where he, the President, would have to reinsert himself between Begin and Sadat. So he flew to the area.

I remember clearly the first meeting that took place after his arrival in the cabinet room of the Israeli Prime Minister's office. The room was full of people around this very long cabinet table, as well as in the row of chairs along the wall...both Israelis and Americans. Obviously everybody wanted to be there. The Israelis are exactly like the Americans, the second and third echelon people wanted to be seen as part of this. Carter took a look around the table and said, "Prime Minister Begin, I really feel that we aren't going to be able to conduct the kind of conversations I want with all these people here. So I am asking everybody in my delegation to politely depart this room. The only people I want to stay behind are Secretary Vance, Sam Lewis, Ham Jordan, Jody Powell and Brzezinski [I think that was it.]" So we all started to get up. Begin quickly said, "Well, I agree." And he asked his people to depart. As I walked by Begin's chair, he turned to me and said, "Dick, you are not leaving, you can't leave." To have a Prime Minister of a country to which you are accredited say something like that obviously raises certain questions as to where you come from. He turned to the President and said words to the effect, "Mr. Viets has played a very important role in all of this and really deserves to stay and I would like to have him stay." So the President said, "Well, Dick, you are staying."

So I had the pleasure of sitting in that meeting which went on and on and on. It reached just a dreadful deadlock. The President finally said, "Prime Minister, I suggest that we take a break and consult with our colleagues because we are going nowhere and we really need to break this off for a bit and take a rest." So Begin and his team got up and left the cabinet room. I will always remember this moment. The President of the United States took his shoes off and put his stocking feet on the cabinet table and put his head in his hands and began to rock back and forth, almost like a child in pain. And then a very strange thing happened. Hamilton Jordan and Jody Powell walked up and sat down on either side of the President and began to speak to him in some of the crudest language I have ever heard any man address to a superior. The essence of their words was, "For God's sake, Mr. President, put something up your derriere and get on with it. Stop whimpering and feeling sorry for yourself. You can crack this nut, you can win this, etc., etc. You can win this but you have to get with it." The language was very earthy, Southern lingo.

Q: They were both Georgia loyalists who had been with the President right from the beginning.

VIETS: That is right and you could see they were probably the only people in the world who could talk to the President of the United States in this fashion. I found it most fascinating and terribly embarrassing to be present at a moment when the President of the United States was being addressed in this fashion by two, albeit old, friends, but who were nevertheless subordinates. And in front of a group of people who shouldn't have been there!

In any case, the President responded positively to this dressing down by his two old friends and took charge of things. We very quickly decided what we were going to do when the Israelis came back. The President made it very clear he would leave if the renewed session again devolved into endless bickering. He asked me to go outside and telephone somebody on the staff and tell them to get the aircrew of Air Force One ready, that the session might bust up at any moment and he would want to get out of Israel in a big hurry.

So Begin and company came back into the room. Against all rules of the game I wrote a note to Ezer Weizman, who was one of the few Israelis that Begin trusted...

Q: He was Minister of Defense?

VIETS: He was still Minister of Defense at that time.

I said in the note, "Ezer, you should know that the President has ordered Air Force One ready to take off. This thing is just going over the cliff unless you guys get your act together." I passed it across the table to Weizman. He read it; looked at me; got up and showed the note to the Foreign Minister, Moshe Dayan. Dayan read it and looked across the table at me and I nodded. Dayan, who was sitting next to Begin, showed the note to him and there was a kind of silence among the Israelis. Dayan then said, "You know I have perhaps an idea that might work us out of this box we are in," and proceeded to develop his idea. Carter chimed in that he thought the proposal was great and he could work with it. Within 15 minutes things were on the way to being resolved and it was agreed that the President and Begin would meet again that evening and settle it.

So again one never knows in life what the results of even the smallest actions are. That meeting may well have ended in great success in any case, but this certainly gave some impetus to resolution of the immediate crisis.

Q: Sort of nailing down the obvious, sometimes there is the idea that everything can be done from Washington and a foreign capital and you don't need people on the ground, but there are times that it is absolutely essential that you have built up trust. In the first place somebody from Washington couldn't have passed that note because they wouldn't have known that person or cared. If nothing else, this is one of those instances that shows what embassies do. They build up trust, confidence so that in times of crisis they know somebody is talking straight.

VIETS: Well, it is also I think that you know every day of this life people serving Presidents and Prime Ministers and others are constantly doing this sort of thing and very little of this ever gets into anybody's memoirs. But that is what history is made of. It has always intrigued me, these little tiny episodes that take on such historical significance.

Q: Well, this is, of course, as we develop this oral history what we are trying to do. It is not to highlight but to show that there are a bunch of people running around carrying spears, etc. who keep the machinery going. Before we leave Israeli, what was your view of Sharon at the time you left in 1977, because he before and particularly later led Israel down a disastrous road into invading Lebanon in which he pretty much controlled things and did it without any real direction?

VIETS: Sharon during that period was under a much tighter leash than he subsequently was. He was Minister of Agriculture and while there was no doubt in anybody's mind what his political views were...he never tried to mask it. On the contrary I can remember going any number of times to see him at his office in Jerusalem and he would lay out on a big table his maps of the West Bank and show me the roads he was planning to build or were already being constructed. For every Congressional delegation that came he would have military helicopters and fly them up to some of the higher points in the West Bank and show them the famous narrow salient. So he was very open and aggressive in a more controlled fashion than he subsequently became over espousing his views.

My recollection is that he became Minister of Defense about the time I was leaving because I do remember a ship visit where the visiting admiral gave a dinner on board the fantail of his cruiser and I recall going up with Sharon for that dinner with our wives. But the bulk of my time he was Minister of Agriculture and was, therefore, essentially cut out of all the diplomatic toing and froing that took place between Israel and Egypt and Washington. He really wasn't that much of a factor. Begin was supreme during that period. Nobody could take him on politically and survive. Even Moshe Dayan was very careful in the way in which he handled Mr. Begin.

Q: Therefore an American President could go in and deal with an Israeli Prime Minister at that point, when other times that an American President might go, a Prime Minister of almost any country might have to have almost the whole cabinet there because of shared power.

VIETS: That's right. It was a combination of factors. Begin had a very powerful personality. He was a very shrewd, tough politician who knew how to run a cabinet. While I don't think he will ever go down in the history of Israel as one of the great prime ministers in terms of the type of government he gave Israel, he is certainly firmly ensconced in the history books for what he did on the Egyptian peace treaty. And that was clearly his major goal. He had a great sense of history and he damn well wanted to insure that he had a place in history, and he did.

Q: One last question on the Israeli thing, looking at our Embassy, how did you view Israeli specialists? It is always very difficult to recruit people because it is somewhat limited to one country and makes them a little bit suspect in the Arab countries. How useful were they and how did you feel about them?

VIETS: This is unfortunately a very sensitive subject and I am going to address it frontally because it is a subject that is generally avoided. People prefer to sidestep it. During the period I served in Israel, 1977-79, we were blessed with a group of a half dozen or so FSOs of Jewish origin who were bilingual in Hebrew, who were exceedingly talented young officers whose contribution to the United States Government's understanding, and most particularly to Sam Lewis' and Dick Viets' understanding of what was going on in Israel, is hard to overstate.

That said, everyone serving in Embassy Tel Aviv was on the receiving end of unremitting pressure by Israelis in and out of government [or an intensity I never experienced anywhere else in the world] to be sympathetic to Israeli policies and points of view. All of us at one time or another found it very tough to handle these pressures. Our Jewish colleagues were special targets, of course. Without going into any personal details, there were moments when some of them did not handle these pressures very well. The emotional weight layed on them simply was too great.

I have always felt, and nothing has happened in my life since then to moderate my views one iota, that there are times and situations when special heed must be given to ethnic and religious roots in making personnel assignments. Not to do so risks potentially difficult problems for both the individual and the Foreign Service. However imprudent this view may be in our outrageously (at times) politically correct society, I feel it must be said.

Q: We have this including Irish-American, Serbian-Americans, Chinese-Americans, the whole thing.

VIETS: I know some people reading this transcript will immediately feel that what they are reading is a closely disguised anti-Semitic smite by Dick Viets. Quite the contrary. I think anyone who knows my record in Israel would not find that to be true. But I am now speaking as someone who has had some responsibility in the Foreign Service for managing people in such situations. I am appalled when I read, for example, that we are sending to country X an officer I worked with for several years, who was born and raised in that country and is now going back as ambassador. I think he is being put in a most difficult personal and professional position. No matter how hard he works to maintain his balance, the moment will surely come when his emotions will overcome his professional self-discipline. In this instance because he will be the Chief of Mission there will be no one above him to save him from himself. I truly feel sorry for my friend. The Republic has done neither him nor itself a favor in making this assignment.

Q: It has been sort of traditional that we do it to the immigrant who makes significant political contributions. But now a lot of new countries are opening up and sort of reaching out for one thing or another. Particularly what was part of the Soviet Union. We have been sending some people who come from those areas.

VIETS: This is the area of the world that I was just referring to.

Q: I think this is something we are all aware of.

VIETS: Well, not, apparently, some of the people who make these personnel decisions. The defense offered always is that these are fine Americans. And they are fine Americans. But I had been seduced over the years in any number of societies I have worked in and I have no roots in those societies whatsoever. I can only imagine how much faster I would have been seduced if I were Irish and in Ireland, or Jewish and in Israel or Chinese and in China. This is human nature and has nothing to do with one's Americanism or patriotism, or professionalism. It is human nature.

Q: Speaking of Israeli. Did the Israeli lobby get in touch with you before you went out? Jordan seems to be the one maneuvering ground.

VIETS: My recollection is that it worked both ways. A lot of these people I had known for a number of years and worked with and I called on them. Others contacted me. I think there was a strong sense that because I had recently spent two years plus in Israel, separated only by what I call my sabbatical of a year and a half, I was still fairly fresh off the griddle and knew a good many Israelis and knew a great many members of the leadership of the "American-Jewish Community." So it was a natural thing to do.

Q: As you go out to Jordan, you are looking at it with an experienced but fresh eye. What did you see as American interests in Jordan and what did you see as your check list of things you would like to do?

VIETS: There was only one overwhelming objective that I had. That was to do whatever I could to relieve some of the pressures of the Arab-Israeli confrontation and ultimately, of course, to help move the parties into negotiations. I do recall getting ready for this assignment. We had a new Secretary of State, General Haig, and I remember that Al Haig did not have time to meet his new ambassador to Jordan. This is perhaps understandable, although I took it as not a particularly good omen.

Haig already brought to his new role a pronounced bias favoring the state of Israel. I remember within NEA there was growing apprehension as the weeks went by and he was seen to be staffing his office with a number of people who were very pro-Israeli. He would see every key Israeli who would flow into town, but he did not make the same effort with the Arabs. So I remember worrying at the time that this was going to be a problem of getting through to the Secretary. I had been rather spoiled when I was in Israel because, of course, almost everything you sent got on the Secretary's desk and the National Security Advisor's desk and ultimately to the President's desk. And there were lots of phone calls and visits. So you got to know these people personally very well. Suddenly one found himself back to addressing the same issues, but from "across the river" and yet unable to get to see the gentleman in charge. This didn't bode well.

Q: Was there a feeling in NEA at that time that we had just come from Secretary Vance and Secretary Muskie and moving to Secretary Haig, that there was a difference in the way these Secretaries did this? Was the perception that Haig was more inclined to listen to the Israeli side more than either Vance or Muskie?

VIETS: That was the perception. How fair it was I am in no position to say. Nick Veliotis would be in a much better position than I am to make that judgment because he had to deal with Haig day in and day out.

I finally did get to see Haig because I had gone up to some eighth floor reception with Nick and there was Haig talking to a group of people. Nick, in his best tradition, just grabbed me by the shoulder and propelled me forward and pushed right through the crowd around Haig and said, "Mr. Secretary, we have been trying to get to see you for days and here is Dick Viets who will be leaving in three days for Amman and you damn well ought to talk to him." Haig, who I knew, but not well, said, "Oh, Dick, nobody told me." We walked over to a corner and talked for about five or six minutes. So I did have my brief moment with the great man.

I recall the night the news was flashed to Amman, and I guess I was listening to the BBC 11 o'clock newscast and was all alone in my residence, my family were away on a trip, and I heard that Secretary Haig had resigned or been fired. I distinctly recall going out to the kitchen, pulling out a bottle of champagne and uncorking it and consuming the entire bottle. I was greatly relieved.

Q: I heard from someone else that when the news came out in the State Department that Veliotis ran down the hall saying, "Don't anyone dare cheer. Keep at work." It sounds like tremendous disloyalty, but it is not. Attitude and the perception of attitude is important. It is very disheartening to be in a post where you feel you are not going to get a fair hearing.

Now, what was the situation in Jordan when you arrived?

VIETS: My timing couldn't have been worse because I arrived there two or three days, I can't remember precisely, after the Israelis had bombed the famous Iraqi nuclear reactor. The Middle East, as usual, was full of conspiracy theories, all of which sooner or later connected the United States to the Israelis attack. I arrived to find the Embassy in a state of siege, psychological siege. Nobody was moving out to see anybody, talk to anybody. People were just hovering in their offices feeling sorry for themselves. I remember realizing my first task was to get this Embassy to get on it's bicycle and get on down to the bazaar and to ministries, etc., and to begin to do its job. I think all of this was exacerbated by the fact there had been a Chargé for about ten months. A long, long haul for a Chargé. He had taken the view that the Chargé's job is essentially to maintain the status quo so far as the internal operation in the Embassy is concerned. And that is a perfectly defensible thing to do. Perhaps he would have taken a different view had he realized he was going to be running things for ten months. But he didn't know that. He felt that the new Ambassador ought to be able to change things as he wished. So I had the sense the first day or so that I was in Amman that I was in kind of a haunted house or a summer house that had been closed up all winter. But there was a group of very, very good people at the Embassy who responded with alacrity to a little leadership and we soon had the place humming with activity. I had great fun working with this wonderful staff.

Q: What was the reaction to this Israeli bombing? I find myself most of the time personally sort of annoyed or angry at what the Israelis do, but this one I can't fault because subsequent events certainly proved you had a real nasty person, Saddam Hussein, who might have used a nuclear bomb.

VIETS: You have just reflected, of course, 20/20 hindsight. I think at the time, not only in the Middle East but even here in Washington, even Al Haig, was very concerned about the precedent that had been set where a national air force crosses two sets of borders and bombs a strategic objective which it is concerned about and returns home and expects the rest of the world to applaud. The fact that it was a nuclear reactor didn't appreciably change the concern that this was setting one hell of a bad precedent that needed to be responded to in an appropriate fashion in the Security Council, which we did.

Of course, in hindsight, as you just said, the history of the Middle East was changed more than we realized at the time by that mission. The Arabs and I think the Jordanians in particular were deeply concerned because they all felt, "Oh my god, if they can do it to the Iraqis, they can do it to us."

Going back to my time in Israel, every three weeks or so the Israelis would fly reconnaissance missions deep into Jordan and Saudi Arabia and Lebanon. They were doing this essentially at will. Partly I think for psychological purposes and partly to monitor air defenses, tracking capabilities, etc. in order to draw a profile of the type of reaction you would get if you ever had to attack that country.

We would regularly go into the Ministry of Defense and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Israel and warning against this practice.

My first meeting with the King was the day after I arrived in Jordan when I presented my credentials. That was, I think, a sign of the importance the King placed on the Jordan-US relationship...within twenty-four hours of arrival you present your credentials to the chief of state. It was probably also a reflection of the tension of the moment. It was a good thing to get an American Ambassador in place because people were damn well heated up over this incursion.

In my first conversation with the King he confided that in fact he personally had spotted the Israeli aircraft on their way into Iraq. He had been up in an aircraft of his own in southern Jordan, down near the Gulf of Aqaba, and had spotted some miles away part of the squadron of Israeli F-16s on the way in. He had a copilot with him and had said to him, "My God, I think they are on a mission into Iraq." He may have even said "after a reactor" because there had been some concern this might happen.

In any event he radioed the ground control staff to advise the air control center in Amman that he had spotted X number of Israeli fighters at very low level, which was part of the signal that this wasn't a reconnaissance mission. And he instructed them to inform immediately the Iraqi Minister of Defense of the sighting. Somehow there was confusion and the message never got to Amman air control and thus was never passed to the Iraqis. So that is one of those little ironic footnotes of history.

Q: Did King Hussein ever imply to you or say to you that he thought the United States was implicated in this, or was he savvy enough to understand what this relationship between the United States and Israel was, which was not a client/patron relationship by any means?

VIETS: He was much too sophisticated to make that allegation. He knew very well Israeli concerns regarding Iraqi nuclear ambitions and he also knew Iraqi concerns about Israeli nuclear capacity. But the street, the bazaar, I think, saw it quite differently, and believed there had to have been collusion. And I think to this day there are many people who believe that the US knowingly provided the Israelis with satellite photos, etc, of this Iraqi target. My recollection is that Mr. Pollard, the famous Israeli spy, did indeed provide them with quite a bit of information relating to that Iraqi enterprise, but I don't know the details of that.

Q: Well, you said your arrival couldn't have been more inopportune for opening up a dialogue. This mess must have set you back some in attempts to sew a few seeds.

VIETS: In the Middle East one can almost use the metaphor for the sea...the tide comes in, the tide goes out. You simply know that every X number of weeks or months or days or hours there is going to be a crisis. You just move from one crisis to another. And you know these things heat up and become very passionate and tense and then subside to be replaced by something new. So I understood that this was today's crisis and one had to keep it in check...

Q: In your conversations with these people, I am sure they were asking your evaluation of Begin, and in particular, Sharon. How did you feel about them at this time? We had gone through this security zone business which the Israelis had grabbed...by the way I had an interview with Sam Hart who talks very highly about you being the one person around who was willing to raise his voice in saying that this was a land grab at the time that the Israelis moved into the security zone. What were you imparting to the Jordanians about this? It turned out to be a rather lethal combination of Sharon or a weakening Begin or something.

VIETS: Yes, there was a weakening of Begin's position at that time and Sharon was certainly on the ascendancy. I felt, even while I was in Israel, that Sharon was frankly a very dangerous figure. Dangerous for Israel and dangerous for his neighbors, and perhaps even dangerous for the world. I felt even stronger as time went on in Jordan and I watched Sharon's maneuvering as Defense Minister and as I received intelligence information of what he was up too, I became very, very concerned. I certainly imparted that sense of concern without imparting the gory details to the King and to his immediate colleagues.

Q: Sam Lewis was still in Tel Aviv. Did you feel you understood what the action was in Israel, or because Alexander Haig was in Washington and Sam Lewis had much more a direct line and you had this affinity towards Israeli...?

VIETS: Well, remember Haig was gone within the year.

Q: But the year was a very important year.

VIETS: Yeah. I am afraid my memory is a little dim on the specifics of what we were going through at that time. My memory becomes sharper at the time George Shultz picks up his role as Secretary and then ultimately launches the famous Reagan plan in September, 1982. I will go to my grave thinking it is one of the greater diplomatic triumphs of the post war era of American diplomacy. Unfortunately, it foundered, but it was a triumph because it got through a very biased bureaucracy and the President got behind it. We simply didn't follow through on it as well as we might have for reasons we can discuss as we go along. But it was a tremendously well-constructed diplomatic effort which had great promise.

Q: My dates are getting hazy here. The really major event, of course, was the Israeli invasion of Lebanon. That took place on Haig's watch. In fact allegedly there was a wink or a nod when Sharon...When did that happen?

VIETS: That was in the early summer of 1982 because the peace initiative came in September.

Q: Were you...?

VIETS: I was absolutely devastated by that invasion.

Q: We were having an Israel which was saying that if anybody does anything they will take threats. In other words it looked like this was something, in hindsight, that was obviously a trumped up event...an attempted assassination in London of the ambassador started this thing. There was no cause and effect.

VIETS: Sharon decided it was time.

Q: Had our Embassy in Tel Aviv, in your analysis and everybody else's who were looking at this thing, felt, "Oh my God, here is a gun that is loaded and cocked and is going to go off?"

VIETS: I think there was no great secret that Sharon had been promoting the idea, the concept, for quite some time. That sooner or later, preferably sooner from his point of view, the Israelis had to go into Lebanon and once and for all take care of the problem of the PLO operating inside Lebanon. And along the way to remind the Syrians that the Israelis remained the boss of that part of the world. I don't recall that there were any major intelligence indicators that the invasion was going to take place up until immediately after the assassination attempt, and then you began to see reports. The Israel military is as good or better than anybody else at having contingency plans filed away in the safes of their headquarters, and I am sure the Sharon plan in various incarnations had been developed over the years and was ready and waiting. Sharon decided and persuaded the Prime Minister and the cabinet that this was the excuse (the abortive assassination) they needed.

In fact, you may recall the principal argument for launching it was that Israel had to neutralize the border; that the PLO would continue to threaten Israeli border settlements with rocket attacks and the odd infiltration effort by guerrillas. Over the years this had resulted in the deaths of innocent people and children.

In fact, Phil Habib had negotiated a year earlier, in Lebanon, a cease-fire along that border and my recollection is that it had held to the letter. So Sharon's "excuse" for launching the invasion because it was necessary to purge that border of all these dangerous people who were throwing bombs over the wire fences is pure baloney. The record simply doesn't sustain it.

And secondly, as we now know, Sharon sold the Prime Minister and the cabinet on the fact that this would be a very limited operation. He insisted he had no intention of coming in contact with the Syrians and certainly had no intention of going all the way to Beirut. In fact, he did. They did precisely that.

I think for those of us who were out there it was a very, very bad moment of our lives. God knows it was much worse for the people in Lebanon who were the victims.

Q: Could you talk about how you felt when you got this news?

VIETS: The first recollection that I have is a midnight phone call from the Queen of Jordan, daughter of Najeeb Halaby, a distinguished American citizen. She just stripped my skin off..."How can I serve a government which is doing anything to stop this carnage and this terrible war?" I remember giving it right back to her. Firstly, I thought she had no right personally to castigate me in this form. And secondly, she was speaking from total ignorance about what I was doing in trying to stop it.

The King called me the next morning and asked that I come up to see him. He closed the door and started laughing. He said he had been listening in on an extension phone and had heard the whole conversation. I guess I should not go into what he said about it. But it was not an easy time. There were demonstrations against our Embassy and threats against our people.

Q: It was sort of salami tactics in that...I have just finished a long series of interviews with Bob Dillon where he notes that Sharon and the Israelis were saying they were going up to such and such a line and stop and actually we saw them 20 miles beyond that line. This went on and on. Did this unfold gradually or did you immediately realize they were going the whole way?

VIETS: My recollection is that it was happening so fast that one was stunned by the blatancy of the whole thing. It was as if there were no constraints, no restrictions whatsoever, placed on that army. I can still recall those terrible moments when the Israeli artillery units sat up on the hills overlooking Beirut and 24 hours a day just lobbed shells and rockets into that city of totally unprotected people.

I think from a personal perspective it was even worse for me because I realized what we were seeing at that point was in fact the first time that the most modern technology of war, those horrible weapons of war that were not available to the third world, were being used against defenseless populations. I was just horrified by what I saw on television. It seemed to me that as these terrible weapons became available to more and more armies and irresponsible governments the world would be witness to carnage and devastation of heretofore unknown dimension.

This is a slight aside, but at this time I got into terrible difficulties on Capitol Hill. I came home shortly after the end of the war. I was going back and forth between Amman and Washington with considerable frequency in those days, and whenever I did I always made a point, as many ambassadors do, of spending a certain amount of time on Capitol Hill going around seeing key senators and representatives and staffers, to brief them on what was going on, offer my own views, etc.

One of the people who I often went to see was Senator Rudy Boschwitz, now defeated Senator from Minnesota, a Jewish member of the Senate who had a very strong interest in the Middle East. While he was very pro-Israeli, he also understood there certain aspects of our interests in the Middle East that even transcended our/his affections of the state of Israel. I remember sitting in his office, this was right at the end of the war, and saying to him that I thought it was going to be a long, long time before those of us who had been witness to all of this could forget the inhumanity of the Israeli army's attack on the city of Beirut itself, which had absolutely no military significance whatsoever. I remember Rudy Boschwitz rising out of his seat and putting his finger under my nose saying, "You get out of this office. And you never cross the threshold of this office again. I will never tolerate hearing any American Ambassador or any representative of the United States government ever using the word "inhumane" in connection with the state of Israel. Get out of here."

Well, I sat there and gave him back exactly what he had given me with a little chapter and verse on the number of innocent casualties, men, women, children, grandparents, etc., who had been killed and maimed, and then got up and left. I have not seen him again to this day, but I know from others on the Hill that he went around really doing a job on me concerning my perceived lack of loyalty to Israel.

Q: The two camps of Palestinians, Shatila and Sabra, men and women were left and with the collusion of the Israelis, Christian militia were allowed to go in there and it turned into a massacre. How did that play in Jordan and what was our Embassy's reaction in Israel to this?

VIETS: The press reports led to a feeling of abhorrence that this could happen and led to all kinds of contrasts with Nazi atrocities during World War II, etc. I'm being a little hesitant as I am responding to your question because my recollection is that all we really had in the first days after this were press reports. We really didn't have any inside information on exactly what had happened. We knew something terrible had happened and while there might not have been any doubt in the minds of people "in the streets" in the Arab world that this was a direct result of Israeli collusion with Christian elements in Beirut, I think most of us were a little reluctant to jump to that conclusion without further evidence to support the fact. We simply didn't have it at that point.

My own view is that the total story of what went wrong has not yet been made public to this day. I was told shortly thereafter that we had intercepted some communications between Israeli units and the Phalange, which we deep sixed because we felt it would make the Israelis even more culpable than the Israelis' own investigation suggested. But I have never heard the tapes and have never seen them.

Q: Just to get a feel for the times, was this whole war on daily TV in Jordan?

VIETS: Yes. It was the first war to use modern weaponry and to be covered with such intense press interest. You remember, for its size the city of Jerusalem has more journalists from all over the world than any other city in the world. Wars attract journalists like flies. So there was tremendous coverage of that war and nothing has seen its equivalent since.

Q: Dick let's talk a little about the Shultz plan.

VIETS: I first became aware of what we call the Reagan Initiative in August of 1982. In fact, George Shultz was its principal architect, and I will always believe this effort was one of George Shultz' finest hours, if not his finest hour. Despite the fact that the plan never went anywhere, it had all the elements that seemed to me at the time, and still does, to provide a fair and durable end to the confrontation between the Arab world and the state of Israel.

I first heard of it when I was on holiday in England with my family. I had taken a house for a month in the Cotswolds. We no sooner got settled in and had taken our first amble through the Cotswold hills when I was informed by our governess Mary Luke that our Embassy in London was trying urgently to reach me. I called in and was told to come into London immediately because there was a secure line call I had to make to Assistant Secretary Veliotis. Well, I sensed immediately that that was the end of my holiday.

I drove to the train station and went into London and got Nick on the phone. He said, "I am going to make a very secret visit to Amman this weekend. I will be arriving in London Saturday morning and the King is sending a special airplane to pick me up and I want you to go with me. I will explain it all when I see you. No one is to know we are in Amman except the King and the Prime Minister. So do not advise your Embassy of this. We will not be staying at your residence, etc., etc."

Q: This was when?

VIETS: This would have been in August, 1983. I think the plan was announced in September.

At the appointed hour I showed up at Heathrow. I remember taking a taxi to Terminal 3 where we were to meet. I got out of the taxi and, my God, who was the first person I should bump into but the administrative counselor of our Embassy in Amman. He saw me with baggage and wanted to know right away whether I was going back to Amman. I said, "No, no, I am going on a hot weekend to the south of France." I could just see the look on his face..."This son of a gun Viets has some tootsie he is secretly meeting." And, sure enough, he went back to Amman with a big story that he had seen the Ambassador on his way to a weekend in the south of France. So, it took some time to live that down.

In any case, Nick and I joined forces at Heathrow and were flown out on a very plush private jet belonging to His Majesty, and over champagne and smoked salmon Nick first briefed me on the plan. That literally was the first I had heard of it. I knew something had been going on that required certain people in NEA to work very long hours, but I really did not know what was afoot.

Nick's job, as Assistant Secretary, and as ex-Ambassador to Jordan, led the Secretary to ask him to personally brief the King on the plan and to attempt to secure the King's support of the plan. We had several sessions with the King...we had a couple of days in Amman. On the whole the King subscribed to the plan with alacrity. There were one or two questions he had.

Q: In essence, what was the initial plan proposing?

VIETS: In essence it involved the US calling a conference of the confrontation states with Israel based on the famous UN Resolutions 242 and 338 requiring Israel to withdraw from the bulk of the occupied territories. It involved a series of telescoped time steps leading to Israeli withdrawal and to elections, etc. The final status of the territory that the Israelis withdrew from was to be decided in negotiations to be concluded within 5 years. In the interim the Palestinians were to establish and implement a self-governing authority.

We took the stand that while the United States was against an independent state, it would support whatever the parties themselves agreed to. In recent years we have backed away from that second part. Now we are solidly against an independent state -- period. We no longer say that we will support whatever others agree to. This is only one of many erosions of the Shultz policy that has taken place in the last two administrations.

In any case, Nick flew back to Washington and I flew back to England to pick up my family and take them back to Amman. Obviously I had to be in Amman to follow up those initial consultations with the King. The plan was announced and our Ambassador in Israel, Sam Lewis, forecast very accurately when he learned of it, that it would go nowhere with the Israelis because they had not been apprized beforehand of it. They were not informed until just before the announcement of the plan. They had no hand in developing the plan. For the Israelis this was the first time in some years that they had not received notice over everybody else of a U.S. policy initiative in the region. They had almost always managed, as a result of having advance notice, to shape, to form and modify whatever the policy the moment was to accommodate their own needs -- or perceived needs.

Begin immediately said no way to the Reagan initiative. He could see the handwriting on the wall. This would mean ultimately getting out of most of his beloved Judea and Samaria, and he wanted nothing to do with it. The Israelis put up a tremendous public relations campaign against the initiative. They pulled out all the stops in Israel and with their friends here in the halls of Congress and with the American Jewish community. I think it is fair to say they plain buffaloed the Reagan administration. The Administration got scared and in consequence walked away from its own plan -- a plan many of us considered to be by all odds the fairest and most comprehensive, most balanced, most creative diplomatic framework thus far conceived to resolve this long festering confrontation. Those of us out in the field were left pretending that we still backed it, but in fact there was no muscle put behind it. It just died almost stillborn. It lived for a very short period of time.

I believe in retrospect that this failure was a great shame. Look at what has happened in the interim in the region in terms of the costs to human life in Israel and amongst the Palestinians. The toll has been terrible, to say nothing of the instability that continues to exist in the region because of the absence of a settlement.

Before we go any further, Stuart, I want to get on the record one of those bizarre instances that rarely become a matter of public record, but in fact have a very important bearing on relationships. In this instance I want to talk a little about the personal relationship between Secretary of State Shultz and King Hussein.

About two or three months before Secretary Haig resigned and George Shultz was appointed Secretary of State, George Shultz came to Amman with his wife on a brief visit. He was at that time head of Bechtel. I remember he came with one of the senior Bechtel vice presidents. He had known King Hussein in the past, I think through Bechtel, which had done some work in Jordan over the years, perhaps he had also known him in one of his earlier government positions. He considered the King a friend.

As I mentioned in one of our earlier taping sessions, George Shultz was number one on my personal list of potential Secretaries of State. I recall he was allegedly very disappointed when he wasn't named in the first Reagan cabinet in place of General Haig. I had never met Mr. Shultz. When I heard he was in town I immediately called him at his hotel and arranged to go over and to pay my respects on him and to invite him to lunch. I spent quite a lot of time with him and his wife. Of course the first thing I did was to inquire if there was anything I could do to expedite his meeting with the King. He let me know politely but firmly that he didn't need any help from me or anybody else. The King knew he was in town and he was sure the phone was going to ring. His office had sent advance word to the Palace of his impending visit.

A couple of days went by and I was wining and dining the Shultzes and still no word. I think he stayed in town three days and the phone never rang. He left Amman in a major huff. He never heard from the King or from the royal palace. On two or three occasions I said, "I am certain the King doesn't know you are here because he is an enormously polite man and if he knew you were here I am sure you would hear from him. Let me just call and find out." Well, he didn't want me to make any calls.

As soon as he left I happened to see the King, who had been down during this entire period at his palace in Aqaba for a long weekend with his family. I said to him, "I think somebody has made a bad mistake. George Shultz was here and spent three or four days waiting for word from the palace to call on you and he never got any word. He left in a hell of a huff and his nose was really out of joint. What happened?" He said, "George Shultz was here? Why in the hell didn't anybody tell me?" Well, once again it was one of those dreadful instances when staffs decide that the lord and master shouldn't be bothered with some businessman.

I always felt that this perceived slight negatively affected George Shultz' future relationship with King Hussein. I honestly am trying to remember as I am talking whether I ever told Shultz later when he became Secretary of State that the King had never been told he was there. I must have, but I can't recall the conversation. I do know that the relationship never was very warm. Shultz is a man of great personal pride and dignity and ego and does not like to be slighted, even by a king.

I don't want to use this particular tape to cite chapter and verse as to why I feel as strongly as I do on this, but it affected their relationship, that I am convinced of. And that in turn affected some policy decisions with respect to Jordan. As I said at the outset, this is one of those rinky dink things that forms little pieces of history.

Q: It is an interesting thing, you said this about Shultz. I don't know the man and have never dealt with him and there hasn't been a great deal of psychoanalysis of Shultz ...Alexander Haig gets all the psychoanalysis of that period, but I have never heard this strong sense of self with Shultz.

VIETS: Very, very much so. In my view, and I am probably almost alone in this, George Shultz in the first years as his time as Secretary State harbored, I believe, ...and again I do not want to cite why, because it is and enormously personal insight which affects somebody else...I think he harbored the hope that somehow he might find himself as a presidential nominee at the end of the Reagan administration. I believe he strongly felt there was no one else in the government at that time who had the vast experience at cabinet level that he had. And, of course, he was absolutely right. Treasury, Labor, OMB, Chairman of a huge international contracting firm...he had done it all. A man of considerable gifts. But a very substantial ego would be required, I guess, to survive in the fast lane and do as well as he did. He also was a man of considerable temper. You wanted to be very careful when you saw the color begin to rise in his neck. He knew how to sound off.

Q: Back to the aftermath of the Israeli invasion of Lebanon. When would this be?

VIETS: The date would be summer of 1983.

Q: And it was essentially over in the fall of 1983?

VIETS: Yes, I think so. I should have brushed up on the chronology of this.

Q: Well, the exact chronology is not all that important. It had happened, the Israelis were withdrawing, the Palestinians were getting out...

VIETS: Well, you remember they didn't get out for a long time and this was part of the problem. As time went on the Israelis began to suffer increasing casualties from truck bombs, car bombs, assassinations, etc. and life became intolerable for the Israeli Defense Force (IDF) in Lebanon. They finally decided they had had enough and got out. Of course it was about that time George Shultz got on his horse and decided that he would negotiate the famous Israeli-Lebanese peace treaty.

I have one major recollection of that period. The Secretary flew out to Cairo immediately prior to launching his shuttle diplomacy between Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and Beirut to negotiate the treaty. Immediately prior to that he went to Cairo where he summoned seven or eight of his ambassadors in the region, and I was one of them. The reason for summons was he wanted our collective judgment on what was needed in the treaty -- and what was possible to attain. With the exception of Sam Lewis, who was still our ambassador in Israel, the rest of us to a greater or lesser extent told the Secretary -- either very bluntly or very diplomatically -- that he was embarking on a useless and dangerous venture. We all already knew essentially the dimensions of what he wanted in the treaty. His primary goal was to normalize relationships between Lebanon and Israel. Most of us believed it would be a big, big mistake to abandon what had been US policy for many, many years, of seeking a comprehensive agreement. To negotiate treaties piecemeal with Israel would surely guarantee an imbalance in the final result -- or so we thought. As we went around the table with these warnings, as I say, one ambassador in particular, our ambassador to Syria, spoke to the Secretary about as bluntly as anyone I have ever heard.

Q: This was Bob Paganelli.

VIETS: Yes, Bob Paganelli, who if he has not been interviewed, should be.

Q: Yes, I want to get a hold of him.

VIETS: Bob almost was fired on the spot, I think. But in any case I could see the color rising in the Secretary's neck and face as more of us spoke our pieces. He didn't like it at all. At the end he just stood up and slapped his papers together and abruptly observed that he guessed he had heard all he wanted from us and stalked out of the room. I was subsequently told by a very close friend who was working on the Secretary's staff that later that day Mr. Shultz had told him he should have fired us all on the spot. In his view, all of us had been bought out by the Arabs or we couldn't see the forest for the trees.

Alas, the treaty that he ultimately negotiated was an appalling invasion of Lebanese sovereignty. It included permitting the Israelis to build and maintain monitoring stations on Mt. Hermon and to conduct over flights of Lebanon -- and many other kinds of fundamental infringements of Lebanese sovereignty. The Lebanese ran for cover -- the Syrians provided a good deal of that cover -- and the treaty blew up in George Shultz' face. Although none of us ever had the effrontery to remind him, I think he got some pretty sound advise on that famous day in Cairo.

SAMUEL W. LEWIS
Ambassador
Israel (1977-1984)

Ambassador Samuel W. Lewis was born in Texas on October 1, 1930. He received a bachelor's degree from Yale University and a master's degree in international relations from the Johns Hopkins University. His career included positions in Naples, Florence, Rio de Janeiro, Kabul, and an ambassadorship to Israel. Ambassador Lewis was interviewed by Peter Jessup on August 9, 1988.

LEWIS: That period, as you will recall, was also the time of Kissinger's high profile shuttle diplomacy in the Middle East after the 1973 Yom Kippur War. So I was writing and supervising production of a number of policy papers on Middle East negotiations that we were working on with the Bureau of Near East and South Asian Affairs, where Hal [Harold] Saunders and Roy Atherton were key players. At an earlier time, Joe [Joseph John] Sisco was still there. I wasn't directly involved in any of Kissinger's shuttles. I didn't go out with him on any of those trips, but I was very much involved in the papers back in Washington, in preparation for the trips and the ideas.

For example, I remember one occasion in the spring of 1975. Kissinger had already succeeded in negotiating the first withdrawal agreement with Egypt, the disengagement agreement of 1974, and a disengagement agreement with Syria for some withdrawal on the Syrian front. Then he went back to the question of a second step with Egypt in the spring of '75, and he carried on a long shuttle which deadlocked, and deadlocked, in Henry's mind, largely because of Israeli intransigence over further concessions. He was furious at the end of that shuttle, coming back to Washington empty handed, after having spent a couple of weeks, at least, perhaps longer, in the Middle East on that shuttle.

He was furious with the Israelis, felt that they were missing a great opportunity to secure another step in the direction of peace and get their own security solidified, and that Sadat was ready for much more than they were prepared to do. They were hung up not only over the issues themselves, but also internal arguments within the Israeli Government, which is pretty characteristic of the way the Israeli negotiators are generally hung up in these matters. So Henry came back to Washington fuming, and he announced on the airplane to the traveling press, that there would have to be a comprehensive reassessment of the situation, which was immediately interpreted by the Israelis and by the press as meaning we were going to exert a lot of pressure and leverage on Israel to give in. In fact, we did conduct, when he got back, a thorough reassessment of all of the negotiating options within the government, and the policy planning staff played an important role in that review.

Basically, the key question was whether you continue to work for partial settlements or whether you, at this point, go ahead and try to work out a comprehensive settlement for all of the occupied territories and no more small steps. Kissinger had about come to the conclusion that it was so difficult to get the Israelis to give concessions in the small-step mode, that it would be better to make a major effort and use whatever leverage we could muster, to try to settle the whole range of outstanding issues.

There had been no decision reached as to whether to go for a comprehensive approach or go back and have another try at completing another staged withdrawal, but before he had really gotten to the decision point formally, word of this "reassessment" had spread widely around Washington through leaks from the press and elsewhere. That stimulated a lot of concern by the many friends of Israel in Congress and, of course, by the Israeli Government, then headed by Prime Minister Rabin of the Labor Party. So 76 senators wrote a letter to President Ford, essentially warning him not to try to use political, military, and economic aid leverage to force the Israelis to do something which they would see as jeopardizing their security. This was such a massive warning shot across Kissinger's bow that he never went ahead with the idea of trying for a comprehensive settlement. I think he might have tried it had it not been for that, though he really hadn't come to a final decision.

It's interesting, because later on in the Carter Administration, when Carter came in, he started out on that comprehensive approach which Kissinger had been about to conclude he needed to do himself five years earlier.

Q: You say Kissinger was warned off. He was rather contemptuous of Congress on occasion, wasn't he? But this was a strong number, the 76.

LEWIS: Seventy-six senators is an overwhelming number of senators and carries a lot of political weight. That letter which, of course, had been drafted and circulated by friends of Israel on the Hill was very effective in warning Ford and Kissinger that if it were necessary to threaten to reduce aid, to cut off aid in order to get Israeli agreement on very large withdrawals on various fronts to reach a comprehensive settlement, it was very likely that Congress would balk and you'd have a donnybrook within the U.S. Government, which would undercut totally the effectiveness of Kissinger's diplomacy. It's not the only time that such letters have been written, but that, I think, was the largest number of senators that had been gotten on such letters to that point. But down through the years, there have been several other occasions when the administration has been about to do something or thinking of doing something, and a number of senators or congressmen or both have gotten disturbed and written collective letters to the administration to warn them off pursuing that course.

That was, as I said, a fascinating period for me, because I was in on a lot of high policy stuff, not just about the Middle East, but really most areas of the world. Because of Lord's relationship with Kissinger, I was in a lot of sensitive meetings and materials that I might not have been in otherwise.

LEWIS: I'd never even thought about going as ambassador to Israel. I'd been there once. I'd stopped off there on the way back to Afghanistan when I came back in 1974 to be interviewed by Win Lord, spent three days and visited Nick and Patty Veliotis, who was then DCM, during one of the Kissinger shuttles. I saw Tel Aviv, never even got to Jerusalem. That was my exposure. Herzliya Pituach was my prior exposure, really, to Israel. But as I said, over the past 15 months in IO and earlier in the policy planning staff, I'd been working on Arab-Israeli issues a great deal of the time, and I'd gotten very much into the diplomatic side of the problem. Interestingly enough, I think I mentioned that in graduate school, I majored in Middle East studies, but never had been assigned there, except to Afghanistan. So I'd always had an interest in the Arab-Israeli problem, knew almost nothing about Israel as a country, and really knew less, I guess, about the history of Zionism and all of the intricacies and the background of the state. But the minute it was mentioned, a light bulb came on, and I really thought it was a tremendously exciting idea. Sallie had the same reaction.

So I said, "I'd be delighted to go to India, but I'd really much prefer Israel. It's a unique and extraordinary kind of challenge and has a political dimension that would intrigue me. I would like to avoid South Africa if possible." And that's how it came out.

Shortly thereafter, we got back from Yucatan, and Cy Vance asked me to go to Israel.

Q: Who was there, Malcolm Toon?

LEWIS: Toon had already left. Toon had been the ambassador for only about 18 months. Toward the end of the Ford Administration, Moscow had come open. Toon, of course, was a Soviet specialist who had served all his life in Europe until this one tour in Israel, and he wasn't all that wild about Israel, in fact, nor were the Israelis wild about him either. I suppose it was mutual. But he always wanted to be ambassador to Moscow, and though it was at the end of an administration and therefore, your chances of being appointed and staying on in a new administration were not great, Mac took the chance and accepted the post as ambassador to Moscow, and hoped that the new administration would keep him there. In fact, that had happened. He had left in December, so by the time I got there in May of '77, it had been empty for six months.

Q: Who was Chargé?

LEWIS: Tom Dunnigan was Chargé, a good, solid, low-key professional. Unofficially, it was announced in the usual newspaper stories early in March that I was going, and it took, as usual, a couple of months to get all the papers filled out and the congressional hearing, and get confirmed. So I was sworn in and ready to go in early May.

By that time, however, the Israelis were having an election, and the election was scheduled for the 17th of May of '77. The Labor Party was in a turmoil. Prime Minister Rabin had suddenly withdrawn from being the candidate for re-election because his wife's bank account had been discovered here in Washington. She had kept a small bank account when they left, after he was ambassador, and that was technically against the currency regulations. That came out in the middle of the campaign, and he took responsibility for it and withdrew from the race. [Shimon] Peres, who was then defense minister, had moved over to be the candidate for prime minister in the middle of the campaign. Labor was in great disarray anyway over a lot of other matters, scandals, corruption, tired blood, had been in office too long. Menachem Begin, who was the perennial challenger, happened to be in the hospital with a heart attack, and no one much thought that he would do any better than his previous five or six losses. But there was a good deal more ferment, and the polls showed the Likud very strong.

One of the issues in the campaign, which Labor was being berated about by the Likud, had to do with their loss of confidence of the American administration. Carter had already had a meeting with Rabin in Washington shortly after he took office, along with a series of other meetings with Middle East leaders. It had gone very badly, so Carter had gotten off with the Israeli prime minister on a very cold and formal kind of footing. This was being used by Likud against the Labor Party in the campaign to show that they had no particular ability to deal with this new American administration who seemed determined to make peace in the Middle East all in one fell swoop. There were lots of predictions of splits and confrontations with the U.S. in the air, and the election was a quite delicate balance in the polls.

So I figured that with all the spotlight of attention that the American ambassador apparently would have on him in Israel, from what I could already tell, it would be wiser for me not to be in the country in the days just prior to the election. I might inadvertently say something which could be used in the election campaign by one party or the other and get myself burned at the very beginning for interfering. I was dead tired anyway from the crash preparations of trying to learn about Israel, meet every Jewish leader in the United States before I went out, meet with the "Presidents Conference," the U.S. Senate, and the rest of it. So I was in need of a few days' rest.

Sallie needed to stay on here with the kids until school was out in any case, and I was going out by myself initially. I stopped in Taormina for five or six days, just reading and sleeping and brooding and thinking about the coming whirlwinds. Then I arrived in Israel on May 18, 1977, the day after the election, so as not to be accusable of having intervened.

Actually, I should go back on one point. During all my briefings in the State Department and the Agency and everywhere, though Labor was viewed as being in trouble, no one predicted that Begin could possibly win, and very little was said about Begin to me personally, because he obviously wasn't going to be prime minister. I had endless briefings about Peres and Rabin, and, in fact, I did a lot of digging around to find people who knew Peres, who could tell me about how to deal with him, Henry Kissinger being one. I asked INR to arrange a seminar for me, an all-day seminar of academic experts on Israel and the Middle East, but particularly Israel. They got a very good group together, some Israeli scholars who were here in the States, some Americans. There were about a dozen of them. Only one of those 12 predicted flatly that Begin would win the election, and gave a very good analysis as to why.

Q: Who was that?

LEWIS: It was Amos Perlmutter from American University.

Q: Who used to be in California.

LEWIS: He's kind of a funny stormy petrel in the business, but he was so correct in his analysis of the trends of Israeli politics, and so much more correct than all these other experts, that I've had a soft spot in my heart for him ever since, and I've found him over the years to be extremely wise about the way in which Israeli political currents are running.

In any case, I was resting up in Taormina, assuming that Labor was going to win. I couldn't get any news that morning, the morning after the election. Then en route to Tel Aviv I flew to Rome and met there an old friend who lived in Rome, who was a political analyst for American Field Services staff and who had covered Israel as well as Italy for many years, Ned Baine, who died about two years ago. Ned met me at the airport between planes, and brought me the election results from the radio. Lo and behold, Begin had won a crashing victory. So we sat in the airport a little while, trying to figure out what that meant. Then I got on the plane and flew off to Israel, and arrived in the afternoon after the election.

Q: Did the Israelis not know much about you? Had they hoped that X, Y, or Z would be ambassador?

LEWIS: What I understood later was that, as had been the practice most times our ambassadors to Israel changed, a very delicate probe had been launched by the Carter team to find out how the Israelis would react to certain kinds of ambassadors, quite unofficial, and through someone in Congress who was close to the Israelis as well as to the administration. In this case, I think it was done through Abe Ribicoff, who was then in the Senate. The question posed was, "Would you, all things being equal, rather see a career officer or someone from outside the career as ambassador?" There were a number of non-career candidates. Marvin Kalb, the TV personality, was one. There were a number of others who wanted the job, and I guess that's been true most times, though we'd had career officers continuously ever since 1961, except for the brief period of Ken Keating's ambassadorship, which was only about 18 months. He died in office.

Q: MacDonald and Ogden Reid.

LEWIS: In the early days, yes. But since 1961, you had Wally Barbour for 12 years, Keating for 18 months, and then Mac Toon for 18 months. Anyway, the word that had come back was that the Israelis would rather see a career officer. In later years, I've understood why, and I've verified that that is generally their view whenever they're asked. I think it's pretty smart. They believe that they have lots of political channels to the administration and the Congress, and that the State Department has always been the big problem for Israel; the so-called "Arabists" in the State Department have been their problem. So that if they have a career officer in Israel to deal with who is respected and has some credibility within the career system, and if they succeed in making their arguments to him with some effectiveness, that will add to their influence, rather than add nothing, which is the way they view the potential influence of a political appointee as ambassador. I think that that advice may have had something to do with my selection. I don't know.

Q: They would not have been very sympathetic to having an American Jew such as Marvin Kalb, regardless of whatever his name was, representing the United States, and the Department wouldn't have been so terribly comfortable, would they?

LEWIS: I have a feeling that the Israelis also think it's wiser for a non-Jew to be there. I think, frankly, it is better for everybody concerned that our ambassador not be Jewish. I'm sure there's some Jewish ambassadors who could do the job very well and would handle the pressures very well, but the Israelis are past masters at putting all sorts of psychological pressures on foreigners who they're trying to influence. It's hard enough to remain objective and not to be overly influenced by "localitis," let's say, if you're non-Jewish. I think if you're Jewish, it just adds one more dimension of potential conflict, emotional conflict.

We had some very good Jewish officers in our embassy, some of whom I deliberately recruited, and nearly all of them handled this problem very well. They leaned over backwards, really, to be objective and critical of Israeli actions when they deserved criticism. In fact, one of them, I think, leaned over too far backwards, probably because he was Jewish. He overcompensated. But the ambassador is in the toughest spot. The emotional spotlight of the public and the government is on you just continuously, and you are so much a public figure there, that I think the strain of being Jewish, especially if you were openly Jewish, practicing Jewish, Orthodox, or just "religious," subject to all of the emotional tensions that conflicts between Washington and Jerusalem inevitably produce, argue that the U.S. shouldn't put people into that situation if you can avoid it. I'm sure some could handle it very well, but I think on the balance, it's probably wiser not to. [Note: When editing this page in 1995, I realize that I strongly supported the sending of Martin Indyk, a practicing Jew, as Ambassador earlier this year. He is remarkably well qualified and is doing a fine job. But I had concluded he was the best person because: there was sadly no well qualified career officer available after Ambassador Djerejian abruptly and prematurely retired from the post, and the Clinton White House was ready to turn to a much less qualified Jewish politico.]

Q: For instance, if Marvin Kalb had been nominated, possibly Israel would have said, "We love him, but don't send him."

LEWIS: No, I don't think so. The Israelis would never say, "Don't send somebody." They're very careful about that. But if asked or when asked discreetly, that's been their answer historically. But if Kalb had been nominated, or any other Jewish ambassador, I'm sure they would have welcomed him. Probably a lot of Israelis would have been quite pleased and would have assumed that this gives us an extra friend we can work on, and they would certainly have tried to make him feel guilty whenever he said something critical about Israel. It would have been harder on him than anyone else, (him or her!).

Q: Good afternoon, again, Mr. Lewis. We're going to begin our third interview and it was on the eve of your arrival in Israel.

LEWIS: Those first weeks were extraordinarily exciting and demanding to say the least. In retrospect, two things happened the first three or four days that were to me highly significant. I think it was the night after I arrived, the Canadian ambassador, who turned out to be a very good friend, Ted Lee, invited me to come to a party. He called me up the first morning I was in the embassy. He said, "Look, I've planned a party, an election celebration party, for whomever won the election and a lot of Israelis are going to be there tonight. It'd be a good time for you to meet some of the political cast of characters. Why don't you come?"

So I went, and it was an extraordinary event. The whole country was in a state of shock about Begin's victory. After all, this was the first time in Israeli history that power was going to change democratically from one major party to another. And Begin had been the perennial loser over five or six or seven national elections by that time, and was regarded as an extremist and generally a war monger, by many Israelis and by most Americans.

Q: Were there any people in the American embassy or American friends that you had who knew Begin at all?

LEWIS: Yes, there were. I want to get to that in just a second. This party that evening was a very good insight into what I was going to be getting into because you had there most of the leading political figures from both Labor and Likud there. The Labor people like Peres, very down in the dumps. The Likud people, like Ezer Weizman, who was then in Likud and had been the campaign manager for Begin, in a state of high euphoria. And the banter and the political cross fire was a very good introduction into the unique kind of political social life that goes on in Israel, cutting across party lines, very uninhibited and pretty raucous but extraordinarily fascinating for a foreign ambassador. And I got to meet a number of cabinet ministers and future cabinet ministers on that occasion.

But the most important thing that happened in those days was that a day or two after I arrived, my public affairs officer, Stan Moss, came in to see me and said, "Mr. Ambassador, I've got an opportunity for you and I hope you will accept."

He said, "A long time ago, months ago, I'd invited Menachem Begin to lunch this coming Sunday and I'd like you to join us. It'd be a good chance for you to get to meet him informally before he gets into office."

It turned out that Stan Moss was perhaps the only one in the embassy staff who knew Begin at all well. He had seen him from time to time over the years and they got along very well. Begin, who was not a very prominent player until suddenly he became Prime Minister, was really rather ignored by the diplomatic corps in general and by the rest of the embassy by and large, though my predecessor, Mac Toon, told me later that he used to see Begin on occasion and had liked him.

I was very anxious to get this chance to meet this unknown quantity but I was a little bit wary because I hadn't yet presented my credentials. Under diplomatic practice, as you know, ambassadors are suppose to keep a very low profile and not do any business until they get formally received by the government. The credential ceremony was being scheduled for a few days hence with the President in Jerusalem.

I mulled this thing over and I finally decided to consult with Eppy Evron, who was then the deputy director general of the foreign ministry, (later Ambassador in Washington) who I had gotten to know already in Washington a little bit. I called and asked his advice, telling him frankly what my dilemma was and get his advice. He advised me strongly not to do it.

Q: Really?

LEWIS: He said he knew that given the very frayed nerves around the foreign ministry and the government, who were all very bitter about the loss and some of them tending to blame the United States for it, that I would really set Foreign Minister Allon's teeth on edge even before I met him formally and that I would get off on a very bad foot with the government. So I thought about his advice.

Q: I'm surprised that Eppy Evron would say that.

LEWIS: Well, that's what he said. I decided on the basis of that, maybe I better take his advice. I told Stan and he said, "I really wish you would think hard about this further. This is a unique kind of opportunity. This group is going to be leaving. A new group is coming. They may be angry but I think basically they wouldn't misunderstand. You ought to take the risk."

Q: Was this just to be Begin, Moss, and Lewis or...

LEWIS: No, it was just Begin, Moss and Lewis. It was just the three of us. Sallie didn't come out until about a month later. It was just a very informal lunch around the kitchen table at Stan's house there in Herzliyya. So I thought about it a little further and I decided, "Stan is right. I really shouldn't miss this chance." So I did it and I've never regretted it. In fact, I think it was the perhaps the most important decision I made in certainly the first year or two I was in Israel.

I went to Stan's house, and Begin showed up promptly on schedule and was very cordial, friendly, and obviously anxious to meet me. We spent about two and a half or three hours together, the three of us. And much of it was my trying to get to know him and understand him. I asked him a lot of questions about his life and his very complicated and dramatic life. In the course of that conversation, I got quite a different sense of him than I'd gotten through the rather sparse briefings and stuff I'd read about him up to that point. And I did come away with a conviction that he was determined to do two things at least. One, he was certainly a great admirer of the United States and he had every hope of being on good terms with us, and dispelling the impression that he was going to be hostile, which was the general sense in the press at the time. More importantly, that he was determined not to lead Israel into war, which is what his image would have suggested, but that he really wanted to go down in history, if he possibly could, as a peacemaker and that he thought there was a chance to achieve peace at least with Egypt, and he was going to work hard at it.

We found outside Stan's modest little house, when we came out, a couple of dozen journalists waiting, laying in wait, to interview us. Somebody, presumably Begin, had tipped them off that he was going to be meeting with me. And, we had a light exchange.

But I went back to the embassy and sent the first first-person cable since I'd been there to try to size up my initial impressions of Begin and where he would lead us and Israel. I remember the title of the cable was rather dramatic, I guess. I entitled it, "Menachem Begin: Moses or Samson?" I went back and read it recently, and it stands up fairly well in light of history. It was certainly not clear at that point which he would prove to be, and in a sense he proved to be both in different stages in his prime ministership.

That first month or two was filled with trying to understand the way the complicated Israeli political scene works, meeting as many politicians as I could possibly encounter. There were lots of occasions, presenting my credentials to the President Katzir, calling on Foreign Minister Allon formally. He was still in office at that time, and he was still in a very grungy mood about the elections. He was blaming Jimmy Carter for not having been more cooperative on some arms sales issues to Israel during the period of the campaign and undermining Labor's traditional argument that the Labor Party knew how to work with the United States and that Begin would destroy U.S.-Israeli relations. He was really quite upset. He lectured me for about an hour on the topic of the United States and all of the mistakes that Carter had made and how dreadful the outcome of the election would be for the U.S. and Israel both.

Some months later, after he had long since cooled down, in a reflective moment he admitted to me that Labor had beaten itself. It certainly wasn't the Americans that had done them in. But he still contended that the U.S. policies during that spring, the first months of the Carter Administration had cost Labor two or three or four seats maybe. But since they lost overwhelmingly by ten or fifteen seats, it was clear that Labor's downfall was the final act in a long, slow decline that they'd been going through ever since the end of the Yom Kippur war, corruption, the resignation of Rabin, and a general sense of tired blood that the party demonstrated by that time in dealing with Israel's problems.

Q: How do you explain the surge and enormous Sephardic Jewish support for the Ashkenazi Begin? Was it just along political lines? How did that magic occur that gave them such great support?

LEWIS: Begin's appeal for the Sephardic population is an interesting phenomenon. He was the epitome of the Ashkenazi, Polish, lower-middle class aspirant to gentility. And I've always explained it this way. Begin had been for decades almost a pariah in Israeli politics, an outsider, never part of the political establishment. He is a very proper, dignified person, polite, extremely polite and a man who, certainly after he became Prime Minister, was very careful about the symbols of Jewish concern, not that he was particularly orthodox himself, he was just mildly observant, but he never offended the religious sentiments of the Sephardic or the Ashkenazi population for that matter. The Sephardics, the Moroccans, the Tunisians, the Iraqis, and so on, while not particularly orthodox, are traditional in their view of religion. They were -- and are -- uncomfortable with the militant secularism and anti-religious slogans in the labor movement, and particularly the left wing of the labor movement. So Begin was very comfortable for and with them from the point of view of his Jewishness. He was also, I think someone maybe a lot of Sephardics identify with as not part of the establishment, but an outsider because their great sense of alienation has been rejection by the Ashkenazi establishment, the labor establishment. In a very paternalistic way Labor had tried to integrate them into the society, provide them with jobs and language training and the rest, but in a most paternal way and left them with the impression that the Labor Party always felt like it was too good for the Sephardics. Correct or not, that's the impression that many of them had and still have to this day.

So Begin, as an outsider, was able to identify with their sense of being outside the system. Then, I think, also, the Oriental population in Israel reflects some of the cultural attributes of the Arab cultures in which they lived for so many years, centuries, a great love for rhetoric, a great sense of symbols and emotional oratory are very effective in those cultures and Begin was a terrific orator, the best certainly in Israel at the time, and was able to touch in his speeches kinds of symbolic cords that really, really moved the masses.

So for all those reasons, they became extremely loyal to him. Likud had had a good deal of Sephardic support all along, but then it grew in the next couple of elections after Begin really hit his stride as Prime Minister to the point where they were, they were calling Begin "King of Israel" when he would appear in the squares and they really did respond to his oratorical flourishes and his great enthusiasm.

Q: From being a reticent, somewhat reclusive, man for many years, as you've said, somewhat of a pariah, when he became Prime Minister, did he expand enormously to his full talents or did he still remain a rather illusive figure?

LEWIS: Well, in public he expanded. Certainly he really loved the job of Prime Minister. I never saw anybody who was happier with a job than Begin was. All of his life he thought about it, worked for it, probably had long since given up any thought he would ever make it. And, I think, as a matter of fact, that the election returns came as a real surprise to him. And he was a bit overwhelmed initially. I remember visiting him the first time shortly after this lunch in his little apartment down in Tel Aviv where he lived for so many years with Ala, his wife, a two- or three-room apartment and down a few steps below the street, about as modest as anything could be, surrounded by all these hangers-on who suddenly were all over him and the international press and Jewish leaders from the United States descending. He handled it all with great dignity and considerable aplomb, but I think it was almost bewildering for him in the first weeks. But as he moved into the prime ministry late in June after about a month of putting his coalition together and beginning to demonstrate the sort of political skills that he had in such abundance, he did seem almost to swell. He loved the role of Prime Minister. He was very formal in his office procedures and yet friendly at the same time. He didn't go out a great deal to the public in that period. But he loved presiding over Cabinet meetings and did it with real style. He was a parliamentarian of great skill and a great admirer of parliamentary tradition, the British Parliament in particular. He fancied himself, correctly, as quite a good debater and really enjoyed the parliamentary give and take in the Knesset. He really showed that very much in the way he controlled the flow of events in the Knesset, particularly in those early months after he was elected and was riding very high.

I got very much mixed up inadvertently that first month in the process of coalition building. The big surprise of that election, in addition to Begin's win, was that the new large center party, the Democratic Movement for Change (DMC), headed by Retired General Yigal Yadin, Israel's foremost archeologist, was really the big winner in that election. They came away with 15 seats, most of which they got at the expense of Labor. And that party had been formed as a reformist, middle-class, middle-of-the-road alternative after this era of labor's discontent and corruption and tarnished reputation. But it was a party assembled from the Shinui or "change" party which had been in existence before, headed by Professor Amnon Rubenstein, plus defectors from both Labor and Likud of different kinds with a couple of generals and some professional politicians like Shmuel Tamir from the old Free Center group of Likud. It was a heterogeneous group, none of whom had really ever thought that they would be in a position to enter a government with Menachem Begin.

Their whole idea of forming that party was to acquire enough weight and then to join in a Labor-led coalition which they assumed was going to be constructed. They hoped to be strong enough as a coalition partner to force Labor to clean up its act, if you will, carry through an election reform which was one of their major planks in their platform and a lot of other things.

Well, lo and behold, because they ended up getting most of their seats at Labor's expense, the only chance of forming a sixty-one vote majority was if they joined with Likud! Labor plus the DMC would not have been able to mount a majority. So then they began trying to rethink what they should do and whether under the circumstances they should enter into a government with a party that had very different ideas on the future of the occupied territories and a lot of other things and with whom they had very little in common.

Begin was busy negotiating with the religious parties, meanwhile, which had been traditional Labor allies in previous governments. And he very skillfully lined up support from the religious parties first, enough so that he was in a position to form a government without the DMC. Then he turned to them and offered them the chance to enter his government. They were in a real dilemma. And because a number of them were very oriented toward the United States and toward the U.S.-Israeli connection, they wanted our advice. What should they do?

I was rather surprised one afternoon. I was anxious to meet everybody, so when someone told me that a group of the leaders of the DMC would like to meet with me, I said, "Fine, come on over and have a drink or some coffee at the residence." The seven leaders of the party all showed up in my sun porch one afternoon. What I thought was going to be a get-acquainted session to find out about their program and their plans, soon turned out to be a not-very-delicately-veiled probing from them as to whether the U.S. Government thought they should enter Begin's coalition or not. I parried that the best I could without stubbing my toe badly on the question of "improper intervention." I evaded giving any direct advice, though I did think they could be more effective if they joined Begin after bargaining hard for commitments on key issues in their platform.

Q: Did they have one spokesman or they all spoke?

LEWIS: They all spoke (naturally) and they all disagreed with each other and they all argued about the issues with me, wanted my reactions. This was not uncommon with that party in particular. Ultimately, they decided not to enter the government at that stage. The argument in favor of joining Begin was to moderate his believed to be very bellicose views on peace and war issues, and to make sure that he didn't lead Israel down into some apocalyptic outcome.

The argument against entering was that they wouldn't have the balance of power because their votes, although desirable, were not technically essential for Begin to form his coalition and they were shrewd enough to be wary as to how much they'd really be able to condition the Likud policies. That later argument won out initially. But Begin was very skillful. He left, I think it was, four portfolios vacant when he formed his Cabinet without them, had acting ministers, let it be understood that he would give them awhile to think it over and if they decided to join a little later on, their jobs in the Cabinet would be there.

Indeed, by the end of the summer they had debated and debated and debated and the longer they stalled, the less bargaining power they had to influence Begin's coalition policies. But eventually they did join his government. In fact, I think the fact that they joined was ultimately quite helpful to the cause of peace, at least. While they weren't essential to this coalition, they had some impressive people in their group and General Yadin did end up with a deputy prime ministership out of it, though not any great power. But he was a respected voice, especially in the early months and Begin listened to him somewhat. He and others in the Cabinet were moderating influences.

You also remember that Begin's great coup at that early period was persuading Moshe Dayan from the Labor Party, one of Labor's great heroes but who had been for the last two or three years somewhat in the wilderness as far as Labor was concerned -- he was not in the previous Rabin government -- persuaded Dayan to jump ship and leave the Labor Party, join his Cabinet as Foreign Minister. This was a great coup because it gave Begin enormous personal satisfaction and, indeed, a certain amount of heightened respectability vis-a-vis the Israeli public. Also, it gave his government a certain legitimacy and respectability overseas where Dayan was a very widely admired national hero. It, of course, drove the Labor Party nuts to have Dayan jump ship on them. But Dayan's influence was large in that first Begin Cabinet, along with Yadin and Ezer Weizman, who was Defense Minister, and moved rather rapidly over the first year from a very hawkish extremist position to a real advocate of peace with Egypt. Those, together with a few other ministers, made that first Begin Cabinet a more balanced group ideologically than his later second Cabinet. Basically, in his second Cabinet after the election in 1981, those moderate voices were all gone. But that's getting ahead of the story.

During late May and early June while Begin was putting his coalition and cabinet together, I was trying to get to know personally those who were clearly going to be key players. I hosted Ezer Weizman, for example, at a private Saturday lunch on our terrace. He was then a hawk among hawks, tough, outspoken, and overbearing -- but totally charming, direct, and attractive. At that lunch he told me he could promise me "95% of the full story" -- whenever I needed it. As probable Defense Minister, that sounded pretty good to me. I saw him in a less attractive mode the night after Sallie and the kids arrived. We were included in a small dinner in Moshe Dayan's garden of their home -- and met Rheuma Weizman (and Ezer) along with Yitzhak and Leah Rabin, Yael Dayan and her husband Dov, and a few others -- Joe Sisco, visiting, was the guest of honor. Ezer was insufferable -- taunting the Rabins about Labor's defeat loudly and often. Rabin took it with great dignity, Leah of course did not! We learned that some of the evening's tension came from the fact that this was the first visit by Rheuma to the Dayan house since Dayan had divorced her sister, Ruth, (Yael's mother). For Sallie and me, it was quite an introduction to the entwined nature of Israel's political elite -- Sallie later became close friends with both Ruth Dayan and Dayan's second wife, Rahel! (A real diplomatic achievement.)

I also hosted Leon Dulzin of the Liberal Party (Begin's alleged "Foreign Policy advisor"), later head of the Jewish Agency, for a Saturday swim-lunch. He became a good friend and an excellent source on Likud politics. And numerous others -- like Moshe Arens (later Ambassador to Washington and Shamir's Foreign and Defense Minister.)

The big thing I was doing in that first month, in addition to trying to get familiar with the players and meet as many of them and spend as much time with them as I could and psych out this strange and weird political culture that I was suddenly immersed in, was to prepare Washington for the first Begin visit to Washington as Prime Minister. In Washington, everyone assumed that Begin was just very difficult, a total extremist, based on his history. The files in the State Department and Archives of Time magazine and others were replete with old clippings about what a horror Begin was. Remember there was a famous article, I think a week after the election, in Time magazine about the election: the headline was "Begin (Rhymes with Fagin) Wins." This reference to Begin and Oliver Twist, Begin viewed as a good example of anti-Semitism which, indeed, I suppose in a sense it was, though the Time editors always insisted it was purely by change that they chose that heading.

Q: Instead of Shylock.

LEWIS: Instead of Shylock, yes. But Begin was so livid about this that he and his press secretary, Dan Pattir, who had been the press spokesman for Rabin and had stayed on as it turned out with Begin...

Q: The one with a hand disabled.

LEWIS: Yes. Very smooth and able guy. A bit of a snake but, nonetheless, very able. They ostracized Time for months, demanded apologies, would never give Time correspondent any interviews, they cut him out completely. And Time had to work awfully hard to get back to the starting gate of its coverage of the Begin era as a result.

In that period, I was trying to send back assessments on how the government was likely to look, and most important what Begin would be saying when he came to Washington. He was anxious to meet with Carter. Carter had been embarked on this Middle East diplomatic push to reconvene the Geneva Conference from almost the first day in his administration. And had already gotten crossways with Rabin during Rabin's visit back in February. They had gotten on very badly. Carter was very impatient. He didn't want to wait, or couldn't see why you had to wait, until the Israeli election was over to get his diplomacy going. He didn't understand that no one in Israel was going to make any change of policies or commitments about the occupied territories in the middle of an election campaign. But eventually, after Begin was elected, Carter and his team back here were trying to prepare to deal with this extremist when he came to Washington. Their instinct was, "We're going to lay down the law to him." This was Brzezinski's advice which Carter very much shared, I think, initially.

Q: Who was the sounding board in the Department?

LEWIS: The sounding board?

Q: I meant NSC, Brzezinski, and who at State?

LEWIS: Well, Cy Vance was Secretary at the time. Roy Atherton, I guess, was still Assistant Secretary for the Near East at that period. And Phil Habib was Under Secretary for Political Affairs. And you have Brzezinski and Bill Quandt as his chief Middle East guy in the White House staff. I guess Hal Saunders was at that point Director of Intelligence and Research at State working closely with Atherton.

I was, I'd become convinced from my dealings with Begin -- I saw him quite a lot in this period. In fact, I saw him quite a lot throughout the years. We hit it off at that first lunch and I found him somebody I could admire while disagreeing with about his music, the need to keep the territories permanently under Israeli control. But I admired a lot of his personal qualities. He was very anxious to establish a good relationship with the United States and saw me as a good vehicle to do that. But beyond that, we really got on very well on a personal basis. But I'd heard enough from him directly about the prickly nature of his character and the way in which he would flair up and resist anything that he characterized as pressure and his stubbornness at maintaining his positions when he adopted them.

I concluded early on that Begin was going to be very hard to handle for Carter, and very hard to get to go along with Carter's peace diplomacy in any case. He had a fundamentally different view of the permanent right of Israel to those territories and no intention of giving them up, though he was more flexible about the Sinai. But I sensed that Begin also had a great need to be accepted as Prime Minister of Israel and to be treated properly as Prime Minister of Israel, and that he was susceptible to some extent to flattery or to careful handling. I urged the Department and the White House to approach this meeting not with the intention of laying down the law to him, but trying to co-opt him, if you will, establish a real working relationship with him and try to persuade him over little by little to being someone we could work with in the peace diplomacy. And I said to everybody that with Begin, honey would get us a lot farther than vinegar. And I still believe to this day that was the right advice.

Q: Is this a fair question that Begin was aware of Brzezinski and Brzezinski was aware of Begin, would there be an innate hostility bridge there? Maybe they came from 400 miles apart, but . . .

LEWIS: No, I think at this period there wasn't any real personal connection. By the time of Camp David, a year and a half later, they had developed a very interesting relationship and Brzezinski was very critical of Begin: at the same time, as a fellow Pole, there was a certain cultural bond, and also Brzezinski had a respect for Begin's toughness and determination to stick up for his point of view.

I heard recently that Brzezinski had a private meeting with Begin at the time of one of Begin's visits to Washington, (it was several months later, not this first one in July, when our relations were very, very tense) prior to a scheduled meeting at the White House. Apparently Begin called Brzezinski and invited him to come for breakfast at the Blair House. Brzezinski assumed that he wanted to talk to him about the meeting to try to kind of soften up Carter via Brzezinski before the meeting, which was a typical maneuver usually used by both sides during these visits. But in fact, what Begin had was something he wanted to give Brzezinski which was some correspondence and some other things out of an Israeli archive about Brzezinski's father. This gesture apparently made a great impact on Brzezinski in a personal sense. It was also typical of Begin, though. I'm not sure that it was so politically calculated. Probably was to some extent. But Begin had a very personal dimension to him of sympathy and understanding for human problems of people, children, families and so on. And he also responded to people who would express solidarity at moments of grief or human tragedy in his own life. I came to realize that it was very important for me to be in touch with Begin on a personal basis at moments of tragedy, national tragedy, personal tragedy. It was important in your relationship to him that he felt you understood the depth of his connection with the tragedy of Jewish history and individual events in modern times that recall that history.

For example, we had a bad terrorist bombing incident. Begin really took that personally, not just politically. Some expression from me that I understood how he felt about that, helped to strengthen our own relationship. Anyway, I think Brzezinski and Begin are an interesting story and it's not exactly a one-way story. Their famous chess matches at Camp David and the rest of it. There's a grudging respect there on both sides, though their political views certainly diverged, and as time went on Begin got pretty upset with Brzezinski on a lot of grounds, and vice versa.

That first visit to Washington in early mid-July, 1977, really set the stage then for the next several months in the relationship. Because I was getting over the phone and by cable indications that we were preparing back here for the visit in a very confrontational way, I was afraid it was going to be a real disaster. I came back to Washington twice during June, the first time shortly after I'd been there just to give a quick briefing on the situation and on my initial impressions of Begin. Then I came back prior to the visit and also to bring my family out to Israel. Then I came back, as is customary, a few days prior to the visit itself and I worked very hard with the State Department colleagues and with the White House staff to try to convince people to reshape their preparations for this visit, to prepare for it in a different psychological context. I eventually convinced Carter and Brzezinski and Vance to handle Begin the way I thought he should be handled, though Brzezinski was always very skeptical.

Q: You were saying that Brzezinski was being very...

LEWIS: I was saying Brzezinski always thought that we should have been tougher with Begin at those first meetings. Carter decided to adopt my policy of trying to co-opt, and convince and bring along Begin. And he didn't really confront him sharply in any of those meetings about Begin's views. He tried to listen to Begin's views, and he made some mild argument, but he didn't really engage sharply. We were trying to get all of the parties to a Geneva conference at that point and Begin was being pressed by our side to tell Carter what he could accept, what were his conditions.

Begin always took the position that it was not proper to ask Israel to set out its negotiation position in advance, that when the time came when the bargaining started, when you had Arabs to talk to across the table, that was the time. But to make concessions on the Israeli position before you ever got to negotiation was unfair on our part to ask and unwise on Israel's part. He resisted that very much. So he would always answer in very formalistic terms and kind of give the outlines of the procedures that Israel thought should be followed, but never really engaging on the issue of what's the ultimate future of these territories that you can live with.

Begin, of course, had no intention ever of getting out of the West Bank or Gaza. He believed that they were not only historically important to Israel's legacy as the Jewish nation, but also the security risks were overwhelming.

Q: Who did he bring on his first visit?

LEWIS: In typical fashion, as I recall, he didn't bring Dayan, but I can't be quite sure about that. I may be wrong. Israeli prime ministers have a funny tradition of when they go to the United States or when they travel abroad they almost never travel with the foreign minister. He travels and they travel, at different times, and see the same people. I don't think Dayan was on that trip for that reason, but I'm not absolutely positive. Begin had with him a strange cast of characters. He had a couple of old former underground Irgun sidekicks who were not formally in the government, but he had made them kind of unofficial advisers. Shmuel Katz was one.

Shmuel Katz had, in fact, during the interregnum after the election but before Begin took office, had come as an emissary of Begin's to Washington and to the U.S. to scout out the landscape and let people know in the Jewish community, informally, and the government, what Begin's policies were going to be like. He had described them in such chilling form that the Katz mission had been one of the reasons why Brzezinski and others thought that they should lay the law down to Begin early on. But now Katz was there with Begin in the Cabinet Room, and at one point in one of the early meetings Carter gave the floor to Begin.

Begin responded on whatever the subject was and then he turned to Katz and said, "I'd like my friend and old comrade Dr. Katz to describe for you the way we see these territories." Shmuel then launched into about a half-an-hour fire-and-brimstone lecture on the centrality of Judea and Samaria to the Israeli soul. Carter was furious, but listened politely, and patiently.

He also had with him Dr. Reuben Hecht, another old Irgun supporter, a very wealthy businessman from Haifa who was a sidekick of Begin's politically and had been one of the chief financiers of the Herut party for years. There were foreign ministry people, a couple, along. Simcha Dinitz was the ambassador here, a holdover from the previous Labor era. He was there. Begin had one of his personal assistants, Yehuda Avnir, now the Israeli ambassador in London, who was in Begin's office, again as a holdover from Rabin's period. In fact there were a number of staff people, two or three of them at least, that were kept on by Begin. Rather unusual, if you stop to think about it. They served him very loyally and he did not penalize them for what would be presumed to be their Labor political affiliations.

Q: Did he have Dan Pattir along?

LEWIS: Dan Pattir was there, of course. There were others. It was a big crowd. Israelis always travel with large delegations.

One of the inevitable fights we had every time any Israeli dignitary came to Washington was the struggle over how many Israelis would be allowed into the meetings at the White House or at the State Department, and they always wanted to bring more than our side wanted to have brought and this was a rather tedious negotiation as to who would be admitted. Usually you would reach agreement on a number, and then they would show up with three or four additional at the last minute anyway. And somehow they would usually get in.

LEWIS: We were talking about Begin's first visit to Washington in July, 1977. I have already described the setting for the visit and described some of the people who attended and the style that Carter adopted. At the end of the meeting, there was an anodyne agreed statement about pursuing the peace process. Carter and his colleagues wanted Begin to commit himself formally to formulations about UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 and international conferences which Carter was busily trying to put together. But Begin eluded all of those efforts and therefore the final statement was quite general. It was amiable. Carter was unsuccessful in getting Begin to tell him either privately or publicly what his eventual negotiating position would be. Begin kept returning, as he often did, to the formulation of "everything is open for negotiation", but that it was not correct to negotiate until you reached the bargaining table. He wanted American assistance to get the negotiations put together, but he would not define his positions. Carter was somewhat more favorably impressed in the initial meetings with Begin than he had expected to be. He realized that he was meeting a tough negotiator. He was attracted and moved to some degree by some of Begin's history and eloquence about the age-old dilemmas of the Jewish people, which occupied a fair amount of attention during the discussions -- certainly during the informal parts.

Q: Was he as persuasive in personal conversation as was as a parliamentarian?

LEWIS: He was very eloquent in personal conversation, but whether he was persuasive or not, depended a lot to whom he was talking to. He was extremely persuasive with American Jewish personalities. One of the things that occurred on the visit -- which was subsequently repeated every time Begin came to Washington and he came ten or eleven times during his Prime Ministership -- was that after he finished the formal meetings at the White House and State Department, he would go to Capitol Hill and hold meetings with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and usually with the House Foreign Affairs Committee. They would invite any House or Senate members to join those sessions. Then he would meet with small groups with sympathetic Congressmen and Senators privately in the course of his stay in Washington. He would always have one large meeting at least and some smaller meetings often with the general public and the press. During his early visits, he was extremely effective with the Congress in dispelling the image that he was just a war-monger and a bomb-thrower. He convinced them that he was genuinely interested in seeking peace. He would always have a little triumph when he would meet with the assembled leaders of the Jewish community in a banquet room in one of the hotels here in Washington. He would receive standing ovations. His oratory on those occasions was very effective. As far as his persuasiveness with Vance or Brzezinski or Carter, that was mixed. He didn't give much ground in those conversations since he would repeat almost endlessly the familiar themes he had stated on previous visits. He kept his cards very close to his chest and he did not always make particularly effective impact on the officials he was dealing with. He tended to talk quite rhetorically in private conversations, not just in public. If Carter wanted to get down to brass tacks and to a franker and more informal level, he found it very difficult because Begin was very wary of being coopted.

After he returned to Israel, his reports to the Knesset and the Cabinet were very positive. He put a gloss on his reports which minimized differences with the United States and maximized the polite expressions of support that he heard from Carter and the more enthusiastic expressions he heard on Capitol Hill and from the Jewish community. Since a good many Israelis feared that this first encounter would turn out very badly for Israel, they were naturally relieved. The Labor Party people may have been secretly quite disappointed that Begin didn't have a big confrontation with Carter on that first trip. That set a pattern that continued throughout the whole eight years I was in Israel. Whenever Likud leaders -- Begin or later Shamir or their colleagues -- would come to Washington at moments of tension, there were many in the opposition who were either secretly or fairly openly hoping that a big crisis would ensue because they always believed that this would be an effective weapon in Israeli domestic politics. Any government has to be able to demonstrate to the electorate that it can get along with the United States even though at times it may have to be very confrontational. There is a political price to be paid by Prime Ministers who get into public fights with U.S. Presidents. Begin avoided that on almost all of his trips and certainly on the first one.

During the month of August, 1977 the U.S. was very actively involved in attempting to push the process towards an international conference. It is ironic how many of the things that happen that year were repeated in 1988 and early 1989, although with different participants.

Secretary Vance made another tour of the region and there was an effort made behind the scenes and very carefully kept from Israel in the formal sense -- although they probably had a good deal of intelligence about it -- through intermediaries to try to persuade the PLO to accept 242 and 338 and to say something about Israel's right to exist in a form which would make it easier for the PLO to be brought into an international conference. This was the scenario that was repeated in 1988 very actively. Finally, there was apparently a text which was worked on and passed to the PLO through the Saudis in this case. But there were some others involved -- e.g. John Maroz, who was a scholar in New York and subsequently the President of a private non-profit organization that deals with East-West security issues. John Maroz was an important intermediary to the PLO in that year and I think subsequently on other occasions. There were others as well. The Saudis were in the month of August, 1977 convinced that they had a formula which Arafat assured them he would accept. It was a formula that was acceptable to us. When Vance got to Riyadh on this trip, he found that much to his chagrin and to the Saudis chagrin, that Arafat was not willing to accept the formula. This really set back Carter's effort to pull together all the strands necessary to convene a conference.

The month of September and early October was a period of high drama because the Soviet Union was very much interested in participating in the international conference -- the Administration had concluded that it was important and necessary to include them as co-conveners as had been the case of the first Geneva Conference in 1973. Vance had negotiated very secretly with the Russians about a statement of principles upon which the conference would be convened. The statement was general enough so that all parties could accept as a basis for the conference. It had been Carter's original thought that he would be able to get Begin's and others' agreement to such a statement. It didn't happen during the Begin visit, but Vance went ahead and ultimately did achieve an agreement with the Soviets on a joint USSR-US declaration in September, 1977. Then suddenly it became known by the Israelis that this agreement had been reached. They were outraged and particularly Begin. There was a great deal of boiling up of emotions in Jerusalem. The statement became public in Washington through a leak. It was the season when various leaders go to New York for the UN General Assembly meeting -- that is when Secretaries of State spend long periods of time in New York meeting all the foreign visitors. Dayan was coming to the General Assembly to represent Israel in the general political debate. He was very concerned by the impact on Begin that the joint US-Soviet declaration made and the implications that the we and the Russians were conspiring behind Israel's back to sell them out. That is the way Begin and many Israelis interpreted our efforts. They had never been informed about our negotiations with the Russians though we were in daily contact with Israel both in Jerusalem and in Washington.

Q: Didn't you comment that they were aware of the events?

LEWIS: We now know in retrospect that they were pretty well informed about the PLO negotiations, which aborted. But as far as I know, they didn't have any warning about the US-USSR talks. Anyway, it certainly seemed to come as a shock to them. Dayan, who was highly regarded by Vance and Carter and who was viewed as a moderating influence on Begin and someone with whom we could work in a diplomatic fashion more easily than Begin (because of the latter's rhetorical and legalistic style) had some long meetings in New York with Vance and eventually got Vance to agree to something that was to become known as "the US-Israeli working paper". This was a sort of modification of the joint US-USSR statement -- it was an agreed interpretation by the US and Israel of the meaning of that statement. It was reassuring to the Israelis. Of course, this "working paper" immediately also became public.

Q: Not on purpose?

LEWIS: Not officially, anyway. But I think the leaks were certainly deliberate. Actually, I believe that when Dayan informed Begin of the agreement he had reached with Vance, Begin was quite upset with him. He felt that Dayan had not been tough enough and had not gone far enough. He wanted the US-USSR agreement canceled. But Dayan stood by his guns and ultimately Begin acquiesced, but this episode did cause a fair amount of bad blood between them. This was the first of a number of situations that developed in the next two years in which Dayan, determined to avoid collapse of the negotiation, would on his own go work out some arrangement or some formulation which he would then insist Begin accept. Begin didn't like that; he would have preferred to keep the strings in his own hands. Yet he needed Dayan very badly and perhaps in his heart-of-hearts, he wanted the results that Dayan was trying to achieve. But these situations created an increasing distrust of Dayan's free wheeling and independence. Ultimately, this was one of the issues that led to Dayan's resignation in 1979.

The public release of that "working paper" apparently had a very negative effect on a number of other Arab states, which had been pleased with the US-USSR statement, and particularly on Sadat. There is real disagreement on Sadat's view of this period. Hermann Eilts, then Ambassador to Egypt, gives one well informed view. Some of the Israelis have a very different view based on things Sadat said to them after he came to Jerusalem and they were in direct touch. A number of the Israeli participants in these events -- Dayan, Weizman, Begin -- became convinced, after they finally met Sadat months later and they had discussed what had occurred during this period and what led him to make his decision, that it was the signing of the US-USSR agreement that became the most important trigger to Sadat's decision to take a new direction towards dealing directly with the Israelis. Sadat felt that having kicked the Russians out of Egypt and having put a lot of confidence in Carter, he was suddenly confronted by having the Russians back in the middle of the diplomatic equation. He did not relish that. Hermann Eilts says that he does not think this version of history is correct. He thinks that, in fact, initially the Egyptians' reaction to the joint statement was quite favorable. They thought it would set a good framework for the international conference, but it was the issue of the "working paper" two or three days later which brought Sadat up short, for he interpreted that paper to signify that Israel's weight in Washington was so strong that they would be able to turn Carter around rather readily. This left the Egyptians believing that relying on the US and the Soviet Union to achieve Egypt's objectives was not such a wise move. In view of the demonstration of Israel's diplomatic strength in Washington, Sadat decided to deal directly with the Israelis and to get to the heart of the argument. I don't know which of these theories are right, but most experts and historians who have written about this period agree with Eilts on his view of events. But there is some evidence to support the Israeli theory. Sadat did not relish the idea of having the Russians play a central role for he knew that they were close to the Syrians and the PLO and they didn't care much for him after he had thrown them out of the country. To have them as a central player may have been disadvantageous to Egypt's interest as contrasted to the interests of other Arab states.

In any case, Carter continued during September and October, 1977 to try to put together an international conference which would be attended by all parties -- we and the Soviets would preside. It is clear that the chance of achieving that had pretty well evaporated by the end of September. This was not only due to the fact that Egypt was getting quite nervous about the idea of having all the other Arab states present -- enabling them to veto an agreement that Egypt might be able to reach about the Sinai -- but also because the Syrians and Jordanians in particular had very different views on how the Arab side should be represented at the conference. The issue was whether there would be one large Arab delegation -- this was the Syrian view and would have effectively tied Sadat's hands in negotiating his own interests -- or whether there would be separate delegations in which each Arab part would speak independently and negotiate separately under the conference's umbrella. That issue was never resolved. Hussein later said many times that we were on the point of having a conference if only Sadat had not gone to Jerusalem. Hussein was trying to play the broker on the Arab side. He has said that he had the issue of the delegation almost worked out and that the conference would have proceeded, but that Sadat undermined the whole process by going to Jerusalem. I don't think that view is factually accurate. Our judgement at the time based on all the contacts we were having with all parties concerned was that the Arabs weren't getting anywhere in sorting out their side of the negotiating table. There were lots of problems with the Israelis as well. The question of the PLO was still unresolved because Arafat had not been able to swallow a formulation which would have made him, putatively at least, a legitimated participant in the conference. In any case, by the end of October, Carter was getting very upset. He had invested many months of intense White House energy in this Middle East peace conference. A lot of his other priorities in this first year were not getting the attention they deserved; he was spread too thin diplomatically -- the Panama Canal negotiations process had used up a lot of political credit in the Spring of 1977. He was watching his game plan for Middle East peace stalled completely, partly because Begin was not more forthcoming, although there was blame for all sides. It was in the middle of October that it is reported that Carter wrote a hand-written letter to Sadat, appealing to him to help break the impasse. Seemingly, what Carter meant by that was not what Sadat interpreted it to mean. Carter wanted Sadat to be more flexible on some formulation that was then at issue, but Sadat interpreted it apparently as meaning that Carter was quite weak and could not pull the conference off without a good deal of help from other quarters. He began then to think very seriously to try to go directly to the Israelis. In the meanwhile, he had some conversations in Bucharest with Nicolae Ceausescu. Begin had visited Bucharest previously. Ceausescu told Sadat that Begin was a tough, strong man and someone who once he had made his mind up, could deliver. Sadat had also been given some similar advice by the Shah of Iran, which is an interesting dimension of the equation. Most important, we now know that there had been two secret meetings between Dayan and General Tuhami in Morocco. Tuhami was one of Sadat's oldest colleagues. He had been an original member of the Revolutionary Committee with Sadat and Nasser. He is a very strange man, a mystic. He headed Egyptian intelligence for a while -- a very shadowy, strange figure. But Sadat had great confidence in him. With the mediation of the King of Morocco, Begin and Dayan probed to see whether they could get to Sadat without going through the international conference route. A first meeting had been arranged and then a second -- both incognito -- with Tuhami in Rabat under the King's aegis. In those meetings, there are a lot of informal explorations of what might happen, what the results might be if there were to be negotiations about the Sinai. There is a dispute in Israel still today as to whether, as is alleged by the Labor Party, Dayan promised Sadat that if there were a peace or something like it, the whole Sinai would be returned. Dayan's personal records and those of an aide who was with him attest a much more elusive Israeli position, although there may have been suggestions of such possibility. I can't be sure which version is correct. I am inclined to think it was the latter. I knew Dayan well enough to know that he was extremely careful about committing himself to things that he was not certain he could deliver. He himself wasn't in favor of giving back all of the Sinai. He believed at that time that the bases at Sharm el Sheik should be kept even if the rest were of the area was returned. I am sure that Begin would not have authorized Dayan to make any such secret commitments. So Tuhami may well have reported back to Sadat a more categorical assumption about Egypt being able to have all the Sinai returned if it bit the bullet; that doesn't mean that was what was said by Dayan. The conversation was undoubtedly elusive in nature.

But these Dayan-Tuhami meetings were held. It was clear by October both to Begin and Sadat that there was a real possibility at least that if they could negotiate directly with each other, without the Syrians interfering for their own benefit and the Americans messing around too much -- without Carter may have been an unspoken assumption -- that there was a reasonable chance that they might come to some agreement over the Sinai. In any case, a combination of all the factors I have mentioned led Sadat to make the decision to make the very dramatic speech that he made in early November before the Parliament. He stuck in a couple of lines that shocked his own Foreign Minister -- how he would be willing even to go to Jerusalem in his search for peace. The journalists picked up on it and Walter Cronkite and Barbara Walters asked him on television whether he really meant it. He said "Of course, I really meant it". Begin then picked up very wisely and quickly and extended a formal invitation, which he handed to me to deliver to Cairo in a very public, flamboyant, dramatic ceremony in Begin's office at the Knesset. Matters evolved from there.

Those months of August, September and October and into the first week of November, 1977 cast a terribly long shadow because first of all, they put aside the US-USSR co-direction of the process, took the focus off the international conference and on Egypt and Israel and left Carter a little bit out in left field. All of this was going on in October while Carter and Vance and the rest of us were going through the diplomatic process of putting an international conference together. But the steam had gone out of the idea. After Begin extended a very gracious invitation to Sadat -- the tone of which in light of the history of five wars and the rest was important in these circumstances -- and after Sadat had flown to Damascus to try to convince Assad to go along with him and had failed in his efforts, and after Egyptian Foreign Minister Fahmi had resigned in opposition to Sadat's policy, the die was pretty well cast for a bilateral rather than the multi-lateral diplomacy that we had spent a whole year on under Carter's direction.

My own involvement was in and out of all of these events. I was in New York and took part in some of the Dayan-Vance negotiations on "the working paper". I had returned to the U.S. with Dayan. I had not been in Washington earlier at the time the US-USSR statement was being developed and negotiated. In fact, I didn't find out about it until I returned to the US after the public "angst" had already begun to develop. Washington had not kept me fully informed about events for fear of leaks from cables or whatever. By and large, that was an unusual situation. During the rest of my tour in Israel, there were very few cases when I was not involved or consulted and given a chance to comment on even the most secret, ticklish, high level negotiations. We made very extensive use throughout those years of the secure telephone which had fortunately been installed at my insistence early in 1977. When I got to Israel and realized how active the diplomacy was going to be and how tremendous -- but understandable -- the fear of leaks really was in Washington. Any cable that was sent, regardless of its classification, was likely to end in The New York Times or The Washington Post if it concerned a matter of interest. So we tended to make a great deal of use of the secure telephone for informal conversations to keep Washington informed on matters that I didn't want to commit to cable and to keep me informed on the thinking that was going on in Washington before it crystallized. That way I was able often to send a message pushing in a certain direction, based on what I had learned informally over the phone about the state of debate in the bureaucracy. That had some influence on the determination of the issue.

Q: Were the secure telephone conversations taped?

LEWIS: As far as I know, they were not and that was one very unfortunate aspect of this kind of communications. If they were taped, I don't know where they would be. We all took notes. I would take notes of important conversations and the parties at the other end -- the desk officer sometimes, sometimes the Assistant Secretary, sometimes a special assistant in Vance's office, sometime it was the White House and the NSC staff -- would take notes. As far as I know, there was no orderly record kept of any of the telephone conversations that took place during my eight years in Israel. I am sure the same process went on at lots of other posts. We used that secure telephone several times each day, six or seven days each week. I have always thought that future historians will be in bad shape because so much of the dialogue is not reflected in cables. The formal outcome is reflected in cables, but a lot of the background discussion and debate that led to the cable is not available. There was one period later during the Lebanon War when a systematic effort was made for a brief period. This was because we had a task force set up in the operations center throughout the Summer of 1982. Phil Habib, who was the chief American negotiator during this period was traveling back and forth between Beirut and Jerusalem, but he was spending a lot of time in Beirut and as he was trying to negotiate with the PLO to get them to leave Lebanon during that summer, he would hole up in our Embassy in Beirut -- with all the shelling not too far away -- he had to have a special communications kit -- an easier one to use than previous (furnished by the Agency) -- which required a regulated system. He pretty much always talked to the same one or two people -- Charlie Hill, then Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Near East and Asia Bureau for Arab-Israeli affairs -- being a key interlocutor. He was the point man for the task force. He held lengthy-one, two and three hour -- conversations with Habib. Those conversations were taped and formal records were kept. But that was the only period that I know of that any formal record keeping was maintained.

Q: Before the emphasis on the secure telephone, did the Department use multiple addressees for the highest classified cable traffic? Could you send a message "For Vance Only"?

LEWIS: The Department did have multiaddressed traffic and did distribute incoming material within the Department. You were never quite sure where the messages went. The highest restrictions -- NODIS cables designated by super sensitive marking -- could only be sent to the Department from the field post. The Department could send messages to several posts at the same time. It was up to the Executive Secretariat or the Department's hierarchy to repeat field messages to other key posts if it wished. During much of the peace diplomacy and the Lebanon War there was a fairly standard short re-distribution list. Anything I would send, for example, on Israel-Egyptian negotiations would automatically be sent by the Department to Cairo. There was also a period when we were given authorization to repeat directly to certain key posts on certain key subjects, peace process messages that we were sending to Washington. There were a great number of messages exchanged around the region that were designated below the NODIS level.

Q: Do you support the logic of that kind of information management?

LEWIS: I think it is very important. There were times when it would raise some anger in one post when it read what another post was reporting and commenting. We had some rather testy exchanges between John Dean, who was at the time in Beirut, and me in Tel Aviv. I was pretty unhappy about some of the things he was saying to the Lebanese and perhaps vice versa. But by and large, I think the system is indispensable. We had a pretty good team of professionals in place in all of the interested Embassies and knowing a great deal of which we were all sending made it possible for one to make a more useful contribution to the policy development process. There were many times through the years when one post would send in a thoughtful think piece about what to do next and two or three other posts would send their reactions to the proposal and then there would more exchanges back and forth. The end result was almost always as good as meeting face-to-face at a conference. We were all frustrated at not being able to meet very often. We had several places that were centrally involved in a lot of these issues. Certainly Cairo and Tel Aviv were involved in almost everything that had to do with the Arab-Israeli conflict. Often Damascus was involved and frequently Beirut. Saudi Arabia a great deal of the time. Those were the key posts for Arab-Israeli diplomacy. We never had any meetings or got together face-to-face, because through that period of 1977-83, there were so many crises in the region, diplomatic and military, that the Department was always very reluctant to have its Ambassadors away from their posts for any length of time and certainly not four or five or six of them at the same time. The practice of having Chiefs of Missions meeting even in the region much less back in Washington -- which was standard in other regional bureaus -- lapsed. We had at most one regular COM meeting during my eight years. That was in Washington during the Presidential transition period at the end of the Carter Administration. By that time we were in an interregnum and the meeting wasn't terribly useful since we couldn't tell what would come from the next Administration. But we did manage once or twice to get together quickly in Cairo in connection with visits to the area by Vance or later by Shultz. Cairo was the easiest place for all of us to meet. I couldn't get to some of the Arab countries easily. Our Ambassadors there felt they couldn't come to Israel easily. So Cairo was the best place. We met once in Cyprus. The exchange of messages had become such a custom that it helped to some extent to alleviate the absence of face-to-face meetings.

We never did manage something that I think would have been useful. Perhaps the technology would now permit it more easily. We would have been greatly helped if we could have had secure telephone conferences between several posts and Washington. But we didn't have that capability. The use of the secure phone in those days were pretty frustrating. It would go out a lot; often you couldn't use it when you wanted to.

Q: Tell us a little bit of the participation of King Hussan of Morocco in the meetings between Dayan and Tuhami. Did he make other efforts?

LEWIS: This was basically his only involvement at least for a long time. Later on, a couple of years ago, when Peres was still Prime Minister, the King invited Peres for a formal visit. Under that cover, he may have arranged to have Peres meet other leaders. But the Dayan-Tuhami meetings were pretty much one shot affairs. It is possible that the Moroccans were more involved than I am aware of. The King was always very anxious to try to promote some kind of peace process. He had, for reasons that are somewhat murky, a very good view of the Israeli Labor Party and its leaders. He had prided himself on being the protector of the Jewish population in Morocco. He had high level Jewish advisors in his court who were in close touch and frequently came to Israel. There was a lot of back-and-forth. Also there was a large Moroccan population in Israel. But I don't think Hassan was really central except for that one negotiation when he provided a location for the Dayan-Tuhami meetings.

Q: Did General Tuhami participate in later negotiations?

LEWIS: He was at the Camp David meeting. That is how I got to know him. I found him to be a very extraordinary man. Indeed, rather weird.

The Sadat visit to Jerusalem in mid-November, 1977 was truly an extraordinary event for me and for everybody else who was even remotely involved. I suppose that it was also for all people around the world who watched through television. All of the drama began to build up with the invitations being exchanged. Begin, usually very technically astute, could never quite figure out how I was arranging to get his invitation to Sadat delivered. In fact, of course, it was cabled and then we sent the original in a special pouch. Begin thought it was very mysterious that somehow I was getting this document to Cairo and to Sadat for him. He was very appreciative. He made a big thing out of the fact that he was using the Americans as the intermediaries because he wanted very much to have us sign on to the bilateral negotiating track. This was a different approach of course than the one that Carter had been pursuing. When it became apparent from Hermann Eilts' conversations with Sadat that he was serious, the Israelis assumed that the planning for the visit would take a few weeks at least, in light of the high drama and its unique character. The visit had to be planned carefully. When I delivered on a Tuesday a message to Begin from Sadat, relayed through Eilts, that he planned to come Saturday night, it created an enormous crisis. The security dimension alone was daunting. It was clear by then that the Syrians were very much opposed to it as were many Palestinian groups. The Israelis were very fearful that someone would try to kill Sadat while he was in Jerusalem; that would have been an enormous tragedy for all concerned. The Israelis wanted to organize the security carefully and to prepare a proper reception. They wanted to do it up brown. But Begin realized, and this is to his credit, that was not something you negotiated about. If Sadat was prepared to come quickly, the Israelis would just have to be ready quickly so that he could not change his mind. They quickly put together a variety of task forces and working groups. All communications were going through our Embassies in Tel Aviv and Cairo. We had a secure phone with Cairo, which didn't work too well. We sometimes communicated through the regular telephone, but not often. In any case, the amount of expense the US government incurred just for communications purposes in support of the Sadat-Begin exchanges must have run into the hundreds of thousands of dollars. Practically, all of our communication traffic was devoted to this meeting for a certain period.

The Israelis and Egyptians agreed that they wanted to get their protocol chiefs together as quickly as possible. A delegation flew from Egypt in an Egyptian Air Force craft and all had to make sure that the necessary precautions were taken to avoid shooting the plane down. The coordination of these precautions was done by our Air Force Attaché with the Israeli Defense Ministry and our Defense Attaché working through US Defense communication channels between Cairo and Tel Aviv to insure that the visit would go smoothly from a military point of view. The Egyptian team came; the head of the Israeli team was Eli Ben Elizar, then chef de cabinet for Begin. He is now in the Knesset as a leading Likud politician. I think he headed up the Israeli liaison team. The protocol people were involved, the security people were involved, some diplomatic people were involved as well. The Egyptian group stayed a couple of days -- or a day and a night -- and then returned to Egypt and then back to Israel. They began to hammer out the program, the security arrangements and the rest. I was not much involved in this because this was really a bilateral show. Our role was essentially limited to providing communications. At the very beginning, when Begin and Sadat asked Eilts and me to deliver messages, we consulted with Washington and recommended that we assist in every way possible. We were authorized to do so. After that, we basically served as postmen and facilitators. I remember the press asking me about my role in one of those impromptu press conferences that was held whenever I came out of the Prime Minister's office. They all would gather around and asked questions about what was discussed, whether the visit will take place, is it real. The line that I adopted was that I was just a "happy postman" in this affair. That gave rise to me being given the title of "Happy Postman" which was used for quite a while thereafter.

In any event, Sadat and Begin managed to get together. Israelis are frequently not very good about day-to-day administration and bureaucracy -- they can erect some of the worst bureaucratic obstacles in the world in getting things done routinely -- but they are probably the best people in the world in dealing with crises. When there is a crisis, they really turn to and that is what happened in this case. They regarded the visit as a crisis and the preparations were really extraordinary -- smoothly done in three days before Sadat's arrival.

The Sadat arrival at the Lod airport in Jerusalem on that November evening was certainly one of the two or three high points of my life, in terms of emotions in any case. The entire diplomatic corps was invited to the airport. It was a state visit. The red carpet was strung out on the tarmac in a T-shape out to where the plane would taxi. Not only was the whole diplomatic corps there, but also about two hundred of Israel's leaders, past and present, from politics, military, journalism and religion. The Druze and Bedouin communities were represented. There was a stand built right behind us for the press -- there were about 4000 journalists there, I believe, from all over the world packed into this grandstand. The arrival was scheduled for the end of the Sabbath on Saturday. Initially Sadat wanted to arrive Saturday morning, but was prevailed upon to do so at the end of Shabbat. So it was about seven or seven-thirty, just as it was getting dark. We were all lined up with the diplomatic corps in front and then two red carpets lined behind them on which stood all the previous Prime Ministers and Foreign Ministers, the current Cabinet and everyone who was or had been anybody. It was dark and no one was quite sure that it was going to happen. Still, it was like a dream that Sadat would come to Jerusalem. At the appointed hour, under a dark, black sky, all of sudden this great white plane appears. It was all white and was immediately picked up by ground search-lights. The plane circled, landed and taxied up to the end of the red carpet. It was a military plane with Republic of Egypt written on its side. The stairs were rolled up and the carpet rolled out. The Chief of Protocol went up the steps, went inside for a minute. President Katzir and Begin were standing at the bottom of the steps. The Chief of Protocol opened the door and Sadat stepped out on top of the steps. He stood there at attention with the spotlight on him, wearing a gleaming white uniform while the Egyptian and Israeli national anthems were played. All around us and behind us, among the Israeli dignitaries, you could hear some very uncharacteristic sounds of people weeping. It was just an incredibly emotional moment. Sadat came down the steps, greeted Katzir and Begin. He was then escorted down the three or four lines of red carpets and introduced to all waiting by the Chief of Protocol. First, came the Cabinet, then the Diplomatic Corps and then all the other dignitaries. Begin trailed along because Katzir, as Chief of State, was the formal host. The story has oft been told that when Sadat came to several of the people in line, he would banter with them and exchange comments. These were people he knew of -- for example, Golda Meir. He told her that the Egyptians called her "The Old Lady" or something like that and that he was delighted to meet her. When he got to Arik Sharon he said something like "You know, Arik, I thought that we were going to catch you the last time". This was a reference to the 1973 War when General Sharon led the Israeli forces across the Suez Canal to the West Bank where he stayed for an extended period. Arik replied along the lines that he would never be caught. Sadat had some exchange with Moshe Dayan whom he knew well by reputation, but had never met.

Q: Mrs. Sadat was not along?

LEWIS: I don't remember, but I don't think she was. The chief players in this drama got into their cars and headed to Jerusalem. I went back to the Residence in Tel Aviv. There was one interesting thing about the car used by Sadat. During the hectic three days prior to the visit, I had received a call from the Chief of Protocol who said that although he was very embarrassed to ask, he confessed that the Israelis did not have any armored limousines. He said he knew that our limousine was armored and asked whether the Israelis could borrow it. I agreed; it was a good cause. So my rather elderly, but armored black Cadillac limousine was loaned to the Foreign Ministry. The license plate was temporarily changed; they took out temporarily our radio equipment and put in their own. For the whole period of the visit, that was Sadat's vehicle with the flags of Egypt and Israel flying up front. The car was already elderly and I kept it for another two years long beyond its normal replacement cycle. In the meantime, Carter had become so economically minded -- he would not let American Ambassadors or any other government official travel first class any longer (had to travel steerage) -- that the Administration forbade the purchase of any limousines for any officials in Washington or overseas. So the Cadillac was replaced by a small armored Cadillac sedan with a powerful engine, but it was barely large enough for four people. It did not have jump seats as the old "big boat" had. That was a very convenient car particularly in Israel where you met American dignitaries at the airport and then drove them to Jerusalem for forty-five minutes. You could have conversations in a big car with three or four people in the back which you couldn't do in a regular car. I hated to give up the old Cadillac, even though it was aged and ready to be replaced, particularly because of its history. It really had been an important part of modern history during the Sadat visit. Ultimately, the car was retired and was to be sold on the market as had been State's practice for years. I bought that car for a few hundred dollars -- it had about two hundred thousand miles on it, at least. I used it for times when we needed a bigger car. I kept it at the Embassy and used it as a spare official car, but it was mine. Eventually, the transmission seized up and we had to sell it to someone else. But that car is still being driven around Israel by someone who knows the history and is very proud to say that was the car that Sadat used when he was in Israel.

The only other Sadat-visit event that I participated in personally was his speech to the Knesset. Everything else was bilateral and we had no role in it. I just watched as did the Israelis all the events on television. The television carried the visit night and day. We had massive newspaper reports and various politicians who were involved in the discussions would let me know in part at least how things were going. But I didn't have any official contact with Sadat or his party. We were among the guests for the formal session at the Knesset where Sadat, Begin and Shimon Peres, the leader of the opposition, all made their now-quite-famous speeches. Each spoke in his own language. For one of the rare times in the Knesset they managed to put together simultaneous interpretation for the Diplomatic Corps and the press. Sadat spoke in Arabic and Begin and Peres spoke in Hebrew. Sadat gave a very carefully prepared, quite strong nationalist pro-Palestinian speech. But the tone was very well done because it took into account Israeli sensitivities. It was a brilliantly written speech which protected his flank in the Arab world and at the same time, held out a hand to the Israelis in a very effective manner. Begin gave one of his poorer speeches. Begin was a wonderful extemporaneous speaker. He hated to read speeches. In the years that I knew him, I saw him read speeches only three times and they were all dull. This time, he didn't read but he had carefully prepared it and he chose to spend a lot of it on the tragic history of the Jewish people -- a theme which he liked to discuss often. The tone was not well received by the Israelis who thought it was very ungracious and didn't live up at all to Sadat's speech. Peres gave the third speech, which was a very open, gracious, warm and attractive speech which hit a lot of the right notes. Unfortunately, he was not the key actor, but his speech was very good. There was something else quite dramatic about the Knesset session. Ezer Weizman, Minister of Defense and Begin's campaign manager, who was a real hawk and an extraordinary fellow, just before the visit had to quell a very unfortunate incident in the Army. When it became known in the Army that Sadat was coming, General Motta Gur, then Chief of Staff, was very suspicious and thought it was all a trick -- something like the Yom Kippur war surprise. It was reasonable that he should be on guard, but he made the mistake of saying so publicly, warning the government publicly that this might all be a trick. That was seen by Begin - - correctly, I think -- as a very bad diplomatic insult. Weizman was furious and was ready to fire Gur as result of this incident, but while he was driving to Jerusalem to report to Begin on his intentions towards Gur, his driver hit or was hit by another car resulting in a very serious accident. This was just two or three days just before Sadat's arrival. Weizman was really banged up; he was on crutches; he was in a cast. Yet he was determined not to miss the visit. Somehow he got out of the hospital. I don't think he was at the airport for the arrival, but he managed to get out of the hospital and back in the game sufficiently by filling himself with pain killers to be at the hotel when the Sadat party got to Jerusalem. He met Sadat there and had some opportunity to talk to him informally, as did Dayan and others. At the Knesset session later, Ezer pulled himself on his crutches, staggered into the Knesset, got into his seat -- he was in real pain-but it was a very dramatic tribute to Sadat that he was trying to make. It was greatly appreciated by Sadat and his people.

The visit ended, the Egyptians went home and everybody spent days discussing what had happened. I got several read-outs from Begin, Dayan and Weizman on their conversations. In the meantime, Hermann Eilts was getting his read-outs in Cairo. We were cabling all this material in and little by little we were able to piece together what had happened. What had happened actually was that Sadat was disappointed in Begin's responses. He thought that his decision to come to Jerusalem was such an enormous gesture that he should have been met by greater expressions of flexibility on Begin's part. Still, they had agreed to begin the bilateral negotiating process. And that is what happened from mid-November, 1977 to January, 1978.

Meanwhile, back in Washington, Carter and his colleagues were quite put out by being left out of the whole procedure. They put a pretty good face on it; the press treatment in Washington and the Congressional reaction was so favorable that they were smart enough to realize that they couldn't be seen as opposing the meeting, but they were concerned on two grounds: one, they really felt that a bilateral deal was a mistake and would undermine the possibility of getting a comprehensive settlement, including the Palestinian issue which is what Carter had been shooting for. Second, they were very upset with Sadat, who had worked so closely with Carter, going off on his own and not really leveling with US on what he was up to until it was too late to change course. There was quite a debate apparently within our Administration concerning how we should handle ourselves in light of all these events. There were those that said we should really oppose the meeting because the total strategy had been developed by us and it would ruin any chances of reaching anything beyond the most minimal bilateral deals. But good sense prevailed and ultimately within about four or five days, which were needed so that they could write memoranda to each other and have meetings and sort of simmer down, Carter used good judgement in realizing that this wasn't what he had designed, it wasn't his plan, but it was an enormous step which he had to support and try to broaden it. We had to see it not as the end of the story. So in this period we were very much in the background with the Israelis and Egyptians perusing their dialogue directly. They set up a direct telephone line with links between Weizman's and Gamasy's offices in their respective Ministries of Defense. We were still passing a lot of messages between Jerusalem and Cairo, but now they also had a way to communicate directly. Whenever we talked to the two parties, we would remind them continuously of the need to pursue their diplomacy so that it would not dash all the hopes of the Palestinians and the Jordanians for a broader settlement. That didn't make much of an impression.

The next we knew is that they had scheduled the next round of meetings between Begin and Sadat to take place in Ismalia on Christmas Day.

Q: I would like to move to the period between Sadat's visit to Jerusalem and the Camp David talks. What are your recollections of this period?

LEWIS: The decision by Sadat to go to Jerusalem was a bombshell not only to the Israelis, but also to the Americans. We had no warning that Sadat intended to make this grand gesture. As the scenario began to unfold a week before his visit, I was transmitting messages along with Ambassador Eilts in Cairo, while Walter Cronkite and Barbara Walters were performing a kind of public version of what the messages between the field and Washington were doing privately. President Carter's colleagues were trying to figure out how not to discourage what was obviously a very important break-through, but to keep particularly Sadat focused on the problem of a comprehensive peace, not just bilateral peace. The US government was criticized rather harshly by the Israelis and by some friends of Israel in the United States for some hesitation about giving full-hearted support to this new development. That was a bit unfair, since the Sadat initiative was so contrary to the game plan that had been developed that would eventually lead to another Geneva conference. Inevitably, under these circumstances, it took four or five days of thrashing around in Washington before the conclusion was that, although this is not what Carter had in mind, it was a step that should be encouraged wholeheartedly and should be facilitated. Eventually, that is what the US government did.

Right after Sadat left to return to Cairo, the first order of business was to find out what had happened during the talks, to which we of course were not a party. Ambassador Eilts got a read-out; I saw Begin and Dayan and got reasonably full reports. It was clear that during the Sadat-Israeli talks, the Israelis particularly were not seeking more active US mediation, but greater encouragement for the bilateral Egyptian-Israeli negotiations. This was something which they had been seeking for many years and had finally achieved without any intermediaries. The period of late November and early December, 1977 was unique because it was the period during which briefly at least Israelis and Egyptians were attempting to deal directly with each other and to solve the problem without any active intervention. Unfortunately, it didn't come to a successful conclusion and by the middle of January, it had become clear that there was still too much suspicion and too many differences in the approaches that Sadat and Begin were taking to prevent them from reaching a bilateral understanding without the US.

Q: Did they realize that?

LEWIS: Sadat realized it and turned again to us in January, 1978 in order essentially to get Carter on his side. So we reentered as major players and continued to be in that role for the next year. The first thing that happened in December was that Sadat, had agreed, evidently either in Jerusalem or in subsequent contacts, to a Begin suggestion to organize a bilateral peace conference which would draft a treaty. But Sadat was very anxious not to be seen by the other Arab states as a seeker of a separate peace. The two agreed to set up what was to be called the "Cairo Conference", which Egypt would host. The Egyptians invited all Arab protagonists, including the PLO and the United Nations, to participate along with the Israelis. The Israelis didn't like that too much, but they went along probably on the assumption that with all the anger that had arisen in the Arab world about Sadat's trip, then other Arab parties were not likely to accept the invitation. And in fact, that was the case.

Before that Conference convened in early December in Cairo under the nominal chairmanship of General Silasvuo, who was the chief of the UN Forces in the Middle East and was representing Kurt Waldheim, then the Secretary General of the UN. His chairmanship was a formality. He was a Finnish General, highly respected by both sides. However, his chairmanship gave the Conference a coloration of being an extension of the Geneva Conference which also had a UN chairman. Before the Conference actually convened, there were considerable private, bilateral exchanges between the Egyptians and the Israelis with Sadat seeking to get from Begin commitments about total withdrawal from Sinai and the principles dealing with West Bank and Gaza that he could defend in the Arab world. Ezer Weizman made one trip to Cairo and in that period, Ezer was already being seen by Sadat, after having met him in Jerusalem, as a person with whom he could do business. So Weizman became a sort of emissary in this period. More importantly, the second secret meeting between Dayan and General Tuhami took place in Morocco. Tuhami was one of Sadat's oldest colleagues from the revolutionary officers' days. He had met secretly with Dayan earlier in the Fall in Morocco under the auspices of the King. That meeting had undoubtedly something to do with Sadat's decision to go to Jerusalem, when he heard Dayan's description of Begin's ultimate solution to the Sinai issue. I don't think Dayan made any commitments for total withdrawal; I am quite sure he didn't. Tuhami chose to pick some of what he heard as an implication that Sadat could get complete withdrawal if he would bite the bullet.

So Dayan and Tuhami met again in early December, but the meeting was apparently inconclusive with Begin's position as conveyed by Dayan not very satisfactory to Sadat, but still encouraging enough for Sadat to proceed. The Cairo Conference met about December 15. Ben Elizar, who was Begin's Chief of Staff, an old Herut loyalist, was designated to represent Israel along with General Abrasha Tamir, who represented the Defense Ministry. They spent several sessions sparring about protocol matters because Begin was by this time off on another track. He didn't want the Conference to start working on substance until he had a chance to get his autonomy plan drafted. He had developed an autonomy plan idea for the West Bank and Gaza, which later became the subject of very prolonged negotiations. He drafted the plan himself without any real staff input. He called me in one day in mid-December and said that he had completed this plan -- he didn't describe it in any detail -- but he saw it as a very far reaching way to deal with problems of the territories. He told me that he wanted me to advise President Carter very privately that before unveiling the plan for Sadat, he wanted to come to Washington to discuss it with the President in the hope of eliciting his support before a meeting that he would have subsequently with Sadat. He could then present the plan with Carter's approval. This was Begin's game plan. President Carter and Secretary Vance were not very enthusiastic about the idea of a trip to Washington, but certainly couldn't reject it.

So Begin charged off to Washington. I was with him. We had meetings in the White House. He unveiled for Carter, Vance and Brzezinski and other top people, his autonomy scheme. He asked President Carter's support for it. Carter was taken favorably with some aspects of it, though he didn't see it as adequate for dealing with the problem of Palestinian self-determination. But he saw the need for staged, transitional period of autonomy. He saw enough in Begin's plan to think that it was something that Sadat should certainly consider. At Begin's suggestion, while we were in the White House, Carter telephoned Sadat and described in general terms the approach Begin was taking. He apparently told Sadat that it seemed to him to be a serious effort and something that Sadat should seriously consider. He didn't, I think, endorse it wholeheartedly, though Begin tried to depict later Carter's reaction as wholehearted support. After the meetings were over, Begin went back to Jerusalem with some over-estimation of the degree of enthusiasm that Carter had displayed toward his plan. Then Begin arranged with Sadat to have a bilateral summit meeting. This was done between the two of them because by this time, Weizman had left in Cairo one of his Air Force people with communication facilities so that messages could be passed back and forth directly without going through US channels. The meeting was set for Ismalia on Christmas Day. That summit meeting proved the high-water mark of bilateralism and in retrospect one can see that it was a great missed opportunity. What Sadat was seeking at that point was agreement on a broad statement of principles which would encompass the future of the territories and would give enough of a framework for him to defend to the Arab world his negotiations for a detailed treaty on the Sinai. The principles obviously had to include phrases like "legitimate rights of the Palestinians", "self-determination" and phrases of that sort. I am convinced that Sadat was very anxious to move quickly to get agreement on that declaration of principles and get his treaty before Arab reaction became too negative to the whole plan. Begin was characteristically very legalistic in his approach to Sadat's proposal for a general framework; Begin instead wanted Sadat to accept his rather detailed autonomy scheme for the territories. Sadat was not interested in such details because he didn't want to be in the position of making decisions for the Palestinians about the territories for which he could be easily attacked by Syria, the PLO and other Arabs. He wanted a fig-leaf; Begin wanted a blueprint. They apparently came close. I was told afterwards by Ezer Weizman and by Dayan, both of whom attended the summit, that Begin and Sadat got along fairly well as they had gotten along well in Jerusalem. Sadat drove Begin around Ismalia in his car himself and showed him the Canal Zone. There was apparently a draft of these principles that Begin was prepared to endorse in rather limited scope. According to the Israelis, Sadat was on the point of agreeing to this draft, but Osama el Baz and other Sadat advisers intervened and warned Sadat of going too far and sacrificing the interests of the Palestinians. In the end there was no agreement. Sadat didn't accept the autonomy scheme; Begin didn't accept the declaration of principles. All they were able to agree on eventually was a procedure which was in a way built on the Cairo Conference, which to this point was only a facade or skeleton. Begin suggested and Sadat agreed that they set up two committees: a military one based in Cairo and a political committee which would meet initially in Jerusalem. These committees would negotiate the two dimensions of the problem: the military arrangements for Sinai -- disengagement and withdrawal -- and the nature of the treaty to be negotiated which would govern diplomatic and political relationships between the two countries.

When Begin returned, I was at the airport to meet the Israeli delegation. Begin put a very positive face on the meeting in his arrival statement. He didn't dwell at all on the failures, but stressed the achievement of setting up these two committees. Weizman and others were generally supportive of that stance. Dayan was the only one who was visibly down-cast, very depressed. He didn't stay for the airport press conference. He got in his car and returned to Zahala. He told me privately as he was getting into his car that a tremendous opportunity had been missed and that he was now very pessimistic. He said something like "It is now going to be up to you again".

Q: Would you say that Hermann Eilts had a particularly insightful relationship with Sadat? More than one would expect from a normal appointee?

LEWIS: He was very much in Sadat's confidence. He had great respect for Sadat and vice versa. He had been there since the re-opening of our diplomatic mission in Egypt during the Kissinger period after the 1973 war. Eilts had been a confidential intermediary between Kissinger and Sadat during that 1974-75 period of active diplomacy. His judgements about Sadat and his advice to the government were very sound. Sadat had a lot confidence in him. In many ways, Hermann and I were in quite interesting situations because he was very close to Sadat and I was very close to Begin, Dayan and Weizman. So both of us were well positioned to be useful intermediaries in this game.

The Jerusalem Committee -- the political committee -- was scheduled to meet on the fifteenth of January. They evidently had agreed at Ismalia to invite Secretary Vance to attend. This was a reflection again that they tacitly, at least, realized they weren't going to make peace without American mediation. In Israel, there were those who were very skeptical, particularly about giving up every inch of the Sinai, which was one of Sadat's conditions from the beginning. Not only did Labor Party people assert that Israel would have to keep certain strategic positions in the Sinai -- it had stimulated some settlements there such as Yammit and others down the Sinai coast -- but in Begin's own party, there were substantial numbers who were nervous especially about his autonomy scheme which they did not see necessarily see the way Begin saw it.

Parenthetically, one example of this was when Begin returned from Washington before going to Ismalia, he revealed to the Cabinet his autonomy proposal which he had not vetted with any of them before going to the U.S., with the exception of perhaps Dayan and Weizman and one or two others. There were those in the Cabinet who believed that the plan was dangerous and would open the way to an eventual Palestinian state. They persuaded Begin to make a few modifications before he presented it to Sadat, tightening up some of the loopholes and in fact making it somewhat less attractive than the version Carter had originally seen. Sharon, who was then Minister of Agriculture and was responsible for settlement policy, was very skeptical about a number of the aspects of Begin's diplomacy.

Sharon did something in secret in the last week of December, right after Ismalia, which cast a long shadow over the next year. Seeing that the tide was running in the direction of the eventual evacuation of all of the Sinai, he established several "Potemkin" settlements. He put rudiments of settlements at several spots in the Sinai where there had been nothing before. He erected quickly a water tower here, a stockade there in order to stake out some positions in the Rafah area which would then in his mind be either bargaining chips or impediments to territorial surrender when the time came. He had bull-dozer carve out a few roads and set up a few shacks here and there. This was all done covertly, somehow believing that it would not come to anyone's attention. But it of course, did. In fact, there were some enterprising Israeli television news coverage of these efforts, which was immediately picked up in Cairo. Sadat was absolutely furious and was convinced that this was an indication of Begin's really bad faith. Coming right after Ismalia, where he had not succeeded to do what seemed necessary, Sadat apparently interpreted this caper as an indication that there was no way to deal straight-forwardly with the Israeli government. This was another reason why he began to turn back to the United States. He was too far along, by this time, to back away from the peace effort and he made his grand gesture by going to Jerusalem, but he was really soured by the Sharon operation. When leaked into the Israeli press, it was first denied, then confirmed. Other members of the Cabinet attacked Sharon publicly for spoiling the peace process with his operation. He counter-attacked by asserting that all of his actions had been approved by the Cabinet and that he was not just operating on his own. In fact, I think that he did have approval from at least some key Cabinet members, including Begin, if not the whole Cabinet itself. But he took the heat. This had such an impact on Sadat that he was on the verge of calling off the conference in Jerusalem and refusing to send his Foreign Minister. We were engaged in an active effort both in Cairo and in Jerusalem to try to keep the process on track, to smooth over the controversy. Vance was very vigorous in sending messages through us and directly by phone in an effort to keep the process on track. There was a huge controversy about the conference agenda. It became a great frustration during the second week of January, 1978. I was cabling in Israeli agenda proposals; the Egyptians were rebutting them. Vance then got very annoyed with the whole process which he saw as quite unproductive. I was instructed to make clear to the Israelis that unless they accepted a neutral agenda formulation which did not prejudge the outcome, Vance would not come. That was sufficient to make the Israelis propose a more neutral agenda which was accepted.

Vance did come. The Conference opened at the Jerusalem Hilton, not in the best of moods, but nevertheless with hope that they would get things back on track. The focus was again on a declaration of principles as the first step. We had the opening formal meeting with everybody around a big table in the hotel ballroom. There were statements that were quite different from each other. Then as always happens at conferences of this kind, the real diplomatic activity started outside the conference room. The American delegation was on one floor, the Egyptians were two floors above us and the Israelis were on another floor. For about twenty-four hours, Cy Vance was scampering up and down the service stairs between the floors, going from Dayan's room -- he was the chief Israeli negotiator -- to Egyptian Foreign Minister Kamal's room -- this was Kamal's first venture into big time diplomacy and he was very nervous about it. After a few hours of very energetic work by Vance going back and forth and suggesting formulations, while we were drafting positions for him to use, the Conference was making a lot of progress. Then there was a formal banquet that evening. At that dinner, Begin came, although he was not in the formal negotiations, and made a speech in front of a lot of people -- it was a big affair -- including journalists. First, Kamal gave a speech which was careful and orthodox. Begin's speech was actually not intended to be anything but a good speech. It had the usual rhetoric about Israel's history which set the Egyptians' teeth on edge a little bit. What really blew the gasket was a quite inadvertent statement in Begin's speech that referred to Foreign Minister Kamal as a young man -- which was essentially correct since he was younger than Begin and certainly less experienced in diplomacy -- but the Egyptians interpreted that remark as very condescending. Moreover, the formulation of age was one that was particularly offensive to the Egyptians -- something that Begin was totally unaware of. It put a chill on the proceedings. Kamal made a rebuttal which was quite sharp. After the banquet, negotiations continued, but there was a lot of press attention on this event. There were some rather extreme headlines.

The next morning, Vance got word from the Egyptians that they were being recalled to Cairo. He worked very hard to try to persuade them not to return. Ultimately, he talked by phone in front of a group of us at lunch with Sadat and tried to persuade him not to insist, but eventually Sadat did insist and the delegation left and the Conference broke up in disarray. I remember Vance and I went to see Begin late that evening for a sort of post-mortem at his residence. Osama el Baz, Kamal and Boutros Ghali had just said goodbye to Begin before leaving. We found him in a mood very different from any that I had seen before. Begin was closer to being apologetic and quite embarrassed about what happened than I had ever seen at any other time. He realized belatedly that his speech had been a factor, although he was not ready to accept the proposition that Sadat would pull the delegation back on the basis of his speech. Incidentally, Kamal had told Vance that while he had taken offense at Begin's remarks, he had urged Sadat to let him stay. He did not think he should leave. But Sadat had felt that this was an insult and insisted that the delegation return. Later on, from memoirs and other information, it is not entirely clear that Kamal did urge that he be permitted to stay. More important, there are a lot of indications in retrospect that Sadat was so skeptical of Begin by the time the Conference opened as the result of the phony settlements in the Sinai and a couple of tough speeches that Begin had made to his Likud Party colleagues in the Knesset -- that had been publicized in Cairo -- that he probably had decided ahead of time that he would let the delegation go -- although he had hesitated about that and only agreed after Vance's pressure -- but that he would not leave it in Tel Aviv for very long. He may well just have been looking for a pretext to bring it back. He seemed to have already concluded by that time that the only way to get around Begin's "intransigence" was to bring the full power of the United States to bear on his side.

Q: Did Kamal continue as Foreign Minister and did he go to Camp David?

LEWIS: Yes. He stayed as Foreign Minister until Camp David. He resigned at Camp David because he was very much opposed to Sadat's decision to sign the Camp David agreement as was everyone else in Sadat's entourage. Kamal said later that he felt that Sadat was signing his own death warrant and he did not want to be part of it. Sadat asked him not to say anything publicly until they returned to Cairo, but he did resign at Camp David. He was in office throughout the Spring and Summer of 1978.

Q: Was Brzezinski aloof from all this? Did he let Vance handle it alone?

LEWIS: During the phase we are discussing, Brzezinski was in Washington with Carter. This was Vance's show. Roy Atherton, who was by this time had been designated by Vance as Special Middle East Negotiator, remained in the area after the Conference broke up and Vance had returned to Washington. Roy did a lot in the next few weeks to try to help Eilts and me to keep the process on the rails. The period between the break-up of the Conference and Camp David is a blur of Secretaries of State and other officials traveling around, Begin going back and forth to Washington, Dayan moving around, Weizman going to Washington and to Cairo to try to smooth Sadat's hackles. Vance made some statements in Washington that made the Israelis very angry by reaffirming earlier Carter statements concerning the need for a Palestinian homeland. During late January and early February, there was a lot of tension between the Israelis and us because it was clearly Carter's judgement that Begin had blown the whole affair after Sadat had come to Jerusalem risking everything in the Arab world. Carter saw Begin's response as very inadequate.

After about two or three weeks of this, Sadat suggested that he meet with Carter alone to figure out the next steps. Carter invited Sadat to Camp David where they met and I learned subsequently -- some of this is mentioned in Bill Quandt's book on Camp David -- reached some kind of understanding on how to deal with Begin's "intransigence" and how to get him to be more flexible on issues such as the declaration of principles, the future of settlements, the nature of the territories, etc. This understanding involved, as Quandt described it, a kind of game plan under which over the next weeks, Carter would make much clearer in public than ever before where he and Begin disagreed. In effect, they were trying to mobilize pressure on Begin through American Jewish leaders, through Congress and through public opinion to become more flexible. Sadat in urging this course said that he would stand very firm on his positions while we would publicly discuss our disagreement with the Israelis. At a certain point then, we would come forth with some kind of compromise which would not go all the way to Sadat's positions, but which Begin would have been softened up to accept. That was apparently Sadat's concept with which Carter agreed essentially.

In any case, in January-February there appeared much more open statements from Washington -- Carter, Vance, Brzezinski and others -- almost continually, stressing Resolutions 242 and 338, the need to withdraw from all fronts, the question of Palestinian homeland and other issues which made Begin very angry because he always wanted these matters left out of the public dialogue and to the direct negotiations. Begin came to Washington in early March to meet with Carter. The atmosphere before he came was quite tense. It was made even tenser by the fact that a few days before he came -- I was already in Washington with Ezer Weizman for pre-visit preparations -- a very bad terrorist event occurred. A group of PLO commandoes landed on the coast south of Haifa and murdered Gail Rubin, a young American woman photographer taking some nature pictures. They commandeered a bus and ordered the bus driver to go to Tel Aviv with his passengers. The bus came careening down the Haifa Highway with 10-12 commandoes in it and with frightened passengers. It was finally intercepted and stopped just about three or four miles south of Herzliyya -- where our residence was -- and just north of the outskirts of Tel Aviv. There was a shoot out with the Israeli Army during which all the commandoes were killed and a number of the passengers were killed. There was a great deal of carnage. This event was a tremendous shock in Israel. There had been nothing similar to this in some years and it was a demonstration to a lot of Israelis of the problematical nature of negotiating peace with Egypt while the PLO was still around to act in its terrorist fashion. There was an outcry and within three or four days, while I was in Washington, the Israeli Army -- even while Weizman was in Washington, but in communication with his Ministry -- was directed by Begin and the Chief of Staff to move into South Lebanon to attack PLO bases in what turned out to be a very large incursion, called "Operation Litani" which was intended to clear the whole area up to the Litani River -- 26 kilometers north of the border -- of the PLO. That caused a huge furor in the United Nations and in Washington and led ultimately to the establishment, over Israel's strong opposition, of the UN Force -- UNIFIL -- which is still in South Lebanon today. The resolution of the Security Council called on Israel to withdraw inside its borders and established UNIFIL to monitor their withdrawal. The Israelis did not withdraw for about three months during which we were trying on the one hand to push the peace process forward and on the other, trying to deal with this huge Lebanese complication. A lot of the people around Carter were convinced that the incursion was deliberately timed to take attention away from Begin's intransigence on the territories. That view soured the visit preparation mood.

Begin came and we had frank, sharp but polite talks with him and his advisors at the White House. True to the game plan, Carter, as we can see in retrospect was following the game plan, was rather precise on the actions that Begin was refusing to take. At one point in the conversation, he said, "Mr. Prime Minister, if I understand correctly, your position is that you will not do this and that you will not do that, you will not do this and will not do that." Begin, not in hostile, but in an unsympathetic mode, tried to turn it around by saying, "Mr. President, I would prefer to put our position positively. We will do this and we will do that, we will do this and this and I would hope that when you describe our position, you will describe it as I do, not as you do." But Carter persisted. One of the things that he was arguing about is whether Begin would accept the applicability of Resolution 242 to all fronts, not only to the Sinai, but also to the West Bank and Gaza. This is something Begin had never accepted formally. He accepted 242 but only according to his interpretation which was that it did not require Israel to withdraw from all territories -- that was also our interpretation -- but it did not require Israel to leave anything more than the Sinai which was the overwhelming portion of the territory. At the end of the meetings with Carter, Begin asked Carter very specifically that when he would speak to Congress and the press about these meetings, that he put a positive interpretation on Begin's position, not a negative one. Carter was noncommittal though Begin later interpreted Carter's response as signifying assent. Almost as soon as we had left the White House, there was a briefing of the press and a Carter briefing of key Members of Congress in which he characterized Begin's position of being very intransigent. Begin met with Members of Congress, as he always did when he came to Washington -- I was with him during those sessions -- who acting in response to what they had learned from Carter about Begin's position, questioned Begin in much sharper, assertive and aggressive manner than any Israeli Prime Minister had previously encountered. So when Begin left town to return to Israel, he was really mad, unhappy, angry and feeling very much abused. The press coverage was as Carter wanted it. It did depict Begin as quite intransigent.

That mood of disagreement, unhappiness and distrust between Jerusalem and Washington continued until the Summer. I spent a couple of months on Vance's instructions trying to extract from Dayan a formulation about 242 which would be closer to our view than to Begin's. I never succeeded; he was adamant. I had dozens of sessions with Dayan who was attempting to find a way of satisfying us about the matter, but at the same time keeping Begin happy because he knew where the power was. The timing problem dragged on; we had sharp disagreements with Israel about the non-withdrawal from South Lebanon. In fact, of course, when we finally pushed them to withdraw in May, they left behind in the territory -- now called the "Security Zone", just north of the border -- quite a bit of equipment to assist Major Haddad, the Lebanese Christian army renegade who had set up a little operation in South Lebanon to defend his area against the Moslems and the PLO north of him. They also left some sub rosa assistance for Major Haddad in the form of training and undercover people. So it was not a complete withdrawal. Furthermore the Israelis would not permit UNIFIL to patrol all the way to the border; they insisted that the UN had to stay outside of Major Haddad's area. That was not part of the U.N. resolution and it ultimately decreased the UN's ability to carry out a sensible UN peace-keeping operation because of this area of which it had no control. This area was governed by the South Lebanese Army, as it became to be known, and Israeli support.

That soured the mood that Spring. There were other matters like the PLO terrorist groups incursions into Israel, the lack of resolution on "Operation Litani" on our side. As the weeks dragged on, another major problem arose in Washington which further attrited the relationship. Carter decided to proceed with an F-16 arms sale to Saudi Arabia, much against the arguments of Israel, the American-Israeli Political Action Committee (AIPAC) and Israel' supporters in Congress. There was a huge fight in the Congress over the sale of these weapon systems. Carter won the battle, but he used up a tremendous amount of Congressional credit in the process. The partial success of his strategy of turning public opinion against Begin was undercut by this fight over the aircraft sale, because Begin and Israel had collected a good deal of sympathy for their position on the sale. The sale made a considerable difference to the aircraft balance in the Middle East. These were the best planes we had and the Israelis saw it in very apocalyptic terms.

During Spring, 1978 there was a letter from a large group of Senators which undermined Carter's position. It was a letter to the President which supported a lot of Begin's positions. Carter's political situation had, if anything, been damaged by this effort to put Begin in a box. It had not worked. The bilateral relationship with Israel had become very tense. Sadat was more and more frustrated. Nothing was happening on Egypt's peace front. In late June, Carter decided to send Fritz Mondale, the Vice-President, to Israel. Mondale was known as a good friend of Israel. This was an attempt to try to improve the image of U.S.-Israel cooperation and friendship. Fritz came out and had a very fine speech prepared. I was with him in his hotel in Jerusalem when we got a report that President Carter, at a press conference that day, had made one of his unexpected comments which was calculated to drive the Israelis up the wall, just as Mondale was in Jerusalem trying to stroke them to get them into a negotiating frame of mind. Fritz was furious but there wasn't much he could do about it. He gave his speech, he did a good job in dealing with Begin and others, but it was clear that the relationship remained very, very tense.

At this point, Carter decided that it was time to try to get all the parties together again. It must be remembered that the Egyptian leaders had not met with Israeli leaders since mid- January. All communications had passed through U.S. channels. Much of it was about details of the negotiating positions and the process was not moving forward. So a meeting was organized to be convened at Leeds Castle in England. It was a conference of Foreign Ministers -- Vance, Dayan, Kamal and members of their delegations -- which met in late July. The British Government had offered Leeds as a neutral site since the Egyptians didn't want to return to Jerusalem and the Israelis didn't want to go to Cairo unless the Egyptians would also come to Israel. Washington didn't seem like a good meeting place at the time. The first order of business when we got to Leeds, to this Henry VIII's castle, was to restart some communications between the two parties. The castle was marvelous; it had been restored with a huge great baronial dining room with a table about fifty feet long. There was a considerable amount of negotiations first to decide whether the Egyptians were going to eat separately on the first night or whether we would eat together. We finally prevailed on the Egyptians to eat together with the rest of us. We arranged the seating so that there was an American, an Egyptian, an Israeli, then an American, then an Egyptian, then an Israeli etc. The total group was about twenty-five or thirty. It started very stiffly, but after that first evening, the kind of human interaction which made things easy at the Jerusalem meeting had been restored. From then on, there was no question of eating separately. Even Kamal who was very leery of meeting with Dayan was prepared to eat with him and sit with him on occasions. But there were still a lot of tensions. The Egyptian delegation had come clearly under instructions to be stand-offish. The meetings were held around a small round table with only the principals at the table. Vance was playing the role of mediator throughout. He was very skillful. There were some very rough things said by Osama el Baz in particular which really grated on the Israelis. Some of Dayan's statements were not taken very well by Kamal. In fact, after the first meeting, everybody went back to their own wings -- each delegation had its own wing of the castle. Hermann Eilts, who had gone along with the Egyptians to sort of "schmooze" with them to test their mood, came around to tell Vance, me and the other Americans that Kamal was so upset by some of the things he had to listen to from Dayan that he was sobbing in his room. He wasn't planning to come to anymore meetings. He just couldn't bear to hear anymore of these dreadful things that the Israelis were saying, asserting their historic claims to Arab lands, etc. Vance pacified Kamal and the meetings went on, but concluded rather inconclusively. But there were very frank and, in a sense for the first time, direct exchanges of hard positions from both sides. That had not happened either at Ismalia or in Jerusalem. In some of the separate sessions, particularly the one Dayan and I had with Vance late one night, Dayan was very anxious to break the impasse. He saw the great opportunity for peace slipping away. He criticized Begin very much for his tactics and legalisms and his intransigent style, but had to be loyal to him as his Foreign Minister. Dayan was always looking throughout this year for some way around an obstacle, some formula that Begin could swallow that would get over a big bump in the road.

That evening, Dayan offered to Vance as a thought of his own, obviously not committing anything, a formulation that dealt with the question of Palestinian rights and he may also have dealt with 242 issue. I don't remember the precise formulation, but it was the germ of an idea which ultimately surfaced again at Camp David and is in the Camp David agreement. It was a way of getting over a major negotiating hurdle that Dayan had offered at Leeds. The whole meeting showed Dayan's crucial role in the process. He was conscious of having to be loyal to Begin's policies, but he had enough self-confidence, chutzpah and historic perspective to feel free to offer in private a lot of thoughts and ideas of his own and to explore avenues although he could not of course commit Begin at the time. This made it possible for him and Vance particularly to come up with some important breakthroughs. At the end of the meeting, it was agreed that they would meet again at the Foreign Ministers' level in approximately another three weeks, perhaps in the Sinai -- at the Sinai field station that we had been operating since the Sinai II disengagement agreement in 1975 to monitor military movements on behalf of both sides. When Kamal's delegation returned to Cairo and reported, Sadat told them there would be no more meetings; Leeds had been the last one. He told us the same thing; he would not agree to any more tripartite meetings. In retrospect, this proved to be clearly a tactic. He had concluded that Begin was too tough a nut to crack without Carter personally getting in the act. He in effect put it up to the United States by saying that we had said that we could deal with the Begin problem -- or you had led me to think so -- and it was time for us to put up or shut up. It was in that climate in late July that Washington decided that the peace process was clearly at an end, unless we did something very dramatic. Carter decided, against the advice of nearly all of his advisors, to invite both Begin and Sadat privately to come to Camp David so that the three of them could try to reach some agreements.

Q: Was Vance one of those in favor.

LEWIS: I don't remember what Vance's position was. The argument was that prospects were very dim by this time, the gap was too broad, the likelihood of failure was very great and for Carter to risk an investment of so much more of his prestige would be deadly for him politically, if he failed. By this time, he was a year and a half into his Administration, having devoted an enormous amount of effort in the Middle East, letting a lot of other things slide or not dealing with them adequately. His Administration was not in very good shape. Only Hamilton Jordan, his political advisor, argued with Carter that it was better to roll the dice and be seen as having tried everything possible. That would be more advantageous politically than just admitting failure and moving off to something else. The preponderance of the advice was caution and not taking the risk.

Q: Would you describe Vance as intuitively shrewd when dealing with people far afield from his Ivy League-New York background? Did he have a feeling for the Egyptians and the Israelis?

LEWIS: He came to have. Vance acquired a great deal of respect from the Israelis. I can't really say how the Egyptians viewed him, although I think they viewed him very well, but Begin and his colleagues really acquired an enormous regard and respect for Vance. They didn't like some of the things he said, they argued very hard with him, disagreed with him sharply, but they found him to be so honorable and straight and so dedicated that he really gained their respect. Moreover, they did become convinced over a period of months that he was genuinely sympathetic and empathetic to their problems. But he was a lawyer and could talk with Begin in a kind of legal language which was also useful, if somewhat less, with Sadat, but my impression is that Sadat rested very heavily on his personal relationship with Carter. He had faith in Carter. Begin was lerier of Carter. He had a lot of confidence in Vance's rectitude; he admired Carter and wanted Carter to admire him, but he realized that Carter did not like him as much as he admired Sadat and this hurt Begin who in a strange way was very thin skinned. Begin wanted to be approved by Carter. He wasn't going to change to get that approval, but he felt hurt when he did not receive it. He thought that Carter with his understanding of history, the Bible and his missionary impulse about the Middle East, should have been more in his court. Of course Begin and Carter were so totally different in personality that it was remarkable that they got along as well as they did. Carter was extraordinary in the way he handled both Begin and Sadat, particularly at Camp David, but at various other times as well. All in all, it was a very unique performance.

Carter then sent Vance with a hand-written invitation first to Jerusalem and then to Cairo, inviting Begin and Sadat to Camp David. Begin, who had been hoping for such an invitation, accepted immediately and so did Sadat. The stage was set by early August for the Camp David meeting in September, 1978.

Q: Let us pick up from the time that Secretary Vance delivered a hand written invitation from President Carter to Prime Minister Begin to join him and Sadat at Camp David, which Begin accepted immediately.

LEWIS: In retrospect, it is clear that Begin and Sadat had concluded by this time that the negotiating process between their two governments had come to an end and that a meeting between the two of them hosted by Carter might be the only hope for progress. So they both accepted the invitation with alacrity. There was about a month between the invitation having been delivered and the start of the Camp David conference, on September 5, 1978. That month was filled with the kind of events which continually intervened with the peace process -- terrorist attacks by one Palestinian group or another -- which raised Israeli's concerns and heightened the feeling of crisis. It also of course increased the sense of urgency for the peace process to come to some conclusion. There were several bombings in Israel; a huge one took place in Beirut at the PLO headquarters -- presumably an Israeli retaliatory attack. There were also a number of alarms and excursions about Jewish settlements -- a subject that was always highly provocative.

One of the terrorist incidents which had a major impact in Israel was an attack on an El Al airlines crew outside a London hotel on August 20. The Israelis mounted retaliatory strikes against Palestinian centers in Lebanon. There were rallies in Israel in early September by the so called "Peace Now" movement to encourage Begin to be flexible at Camp David. There were statements by Arik Sharon about Israeli intentions to establish new settlements on the West bank which angered both Sadat and Carter. Then, a week later, the Israeli cabinet announced that it was postponing any new settlements until after Camp David. This was both a policy of caution and a warning of what would happen if the Camp David negotiations failed.

I returned to Washington about ten days in advance of the Camp David meetings. I worked during this period on briefing papers for the President and the Secretary with our Washington negotiators -- Harold Saunders and Roy Atherton from State and Bill Quandt from the NSC staff -- and Ambassador Eilts, who was then our representative in Cairo. There were a number of preliminary meetings. Carter was mapping out with the White House staff a very careful game plan for the conference. He was calling all the shots and was trying to figure ahead of time how to handle this unique diplomatic venture. He decided to have only small delegations at Camp David from the three countries involved. He was going to "lock up" the three delegations for ten days or so until they had really reached agreement. He had trouble getting agreement from the Israelis and the Egyptians on this process, but they finally acquiesced and agreed that there wouldn't be any coming or going from Camp David and that no one would speak to the press except the American press spokesman who would clear ahead of time any statements that he might make with his Egyptian and Israeli counterparts. He would be the only channel to the press. In retrospect, this Carter decision, which he forced on the other parties, was instrumental in determining the outcome of the negotiations. The tensions in Israel and Egypt were so high, particularly in Israel's domestic turbulent political atmosphere, that had there been real-time information leaking out in the Israeli press -- this might have applied to the Arab world as well -- the pressures on Begin and Sadat would have been so great that one or the other would have had to leave before any agreements could be reached.

Q: Would you credit Carter for that strategy?

LEWIS: As far as I know, it was Carter's idea. I don't know for sure; someone else may have suggested it, but he certainly adopted it. It was a very shrewd move and quite central in the outcome.

With regard to the preliminaries, there were phones at Camp David, which the Israelis assumed, and the Egyptians perhaps as well, would be monitored. From what Carter and others said subsequently, I do not believe that to have been the case. It was suggested that the phone calls be monitored, but Carter decided that it would not be done. But the Israelis assumed that they would be monitored and thought that the Egyptians would make the same assumption. This also inhibited the "leaking" which might have occurred over the phones otherwise. There were a few bits that trickled out, but very little accurate information left Camp David during the conference.

On September 1 -- Friday -- Hermann Eilts and I were invited to have lunch with the President at the Roosevelt Room in the White House. Vance, Mondale, Harold Brown, Zbigniew Brzezinski and Hamilton Jordan also attended. Carter asked us to stay for the NSC meeting that would follow lunch. That NSC meeting consisted of the luncheon group plus Stan Turner (CIA) and General David Jones (JCS). At the lunch, after much jocularly and much good humor on the part of all, Carter then conducted a session in which he attempted to elicit from Eilts and me, alternatively, predictions on how Sadat and Begin might react to various proposals or situations that might arise during the conference. Carter was extremely well briefed; he was really on top of the material and was knowledgeable of all aspects -- having been immersed almost continuously with the problem for eighteen months. Therefore, he knew much about Sadat and Begin already; he had met them before and understood their political constraints. He was particularly interested in overcoming the psychological barrier that had been erected in the past six-eight months in the aftermath of Sadat's trip to Jerusalem -- things had gone off the track in that period and the Sadat-Begin relationships had become increasingly tense. They had not met since Christmas Day of 1977. The State officials were by and large rather pessimistic about what could be achieved at Camp David. Carter had asked State to prepare a set of goals for what might be achieved. I remember that during the lunch, Carter indicated that he thought the goals were far too modest and that he was setting his sights considerably higher. He was aiming for a full peace, not a partial or intermediary solution. I thought at the time that it was very wise for Carter to shoot high, although I also was not as optimistic as the President as what might be realistically expected. I notice from my notes for this period that I shared Carter's qualified optimism more than some of the other advisors. I felt that all parties had too much riding on the conference to let it fail, but it was still up to Carter to put a viable package together, which was terrifically difficult task. As we were leaving the Cabinet Room, Carter took Eilts and me aside and complimented us on how well we were representing him to our respective country's governments. That was a very nice touch.

On September 5, I met Begin at the airport. In the helicopter that took us from Andrews Air Force Base to Camp David, Begin was very keyed up. He was almost manic in the way he was approaching the conference. He was very excited. Ezer Weizman was very jumpy; he thought that Begin was too confident and he was very worried. He thought if the conference went badly, Begin would become very defiant, which would have been characteristic. Weizman worried about the potential problems ahead. Dayan, as always, was very contained and reserved. He like all the other Israelis was very tense.

What actually happened at Camp David has been well described in Bill Quandt's book, which is the best single treatment of the whole negotiating process. I am not going to repeat what is in the book. Quandt, in writing his book, had access not only to all of Brzezinski's notes as well as his own -- he was there as a key player -- but Carter later made most of his personal notes available as well. The President took detailed notes in long hand after every session, so that if you take Quandt's book and Carter's and Vance's and Brzezinski's memoirs, you have a very exhaustive description of how the conference progressed from the American point of view. There were no great contradictions among these four books. Unfortunately, there is no analogous record from the Egyptians -- there is nothing at all from there -- and from the Israeli side whose views are only included in Dayan's and Weizman's memoirs, both of which were censored by the Israelis themselves. At least in Dayan's case, the description of the negotiating process is not as frank or open as it might have been -- he was a very careful man about what he wrote. Begin has never written a word. The key problem in understanding Camp David from the Egyptian and Israeli points of view is the absence of any indication of Begin's thought process. We don't have a first hand view of that at all. We had to infer it from conversations. I doubt whether Begin will ever write his views.

In light of this wealth of information about Camp David, I am going to limit my comments to my own perspective, without trying to describe the conference in any detail. The U.S. delegation consisted of Carter, Jordan, Brzezinski, Quandt, Vance, Saunders, Atherton, Eilts and myself. Off and on, Harold Brown would join for a session and then return to Washington. Mondale stood in for Carter at meetings in Washington, but he also came up on several occasions, particularly when things were getting tense with the Israelis because he had a very good relationship with them. Carter thought that Mondale might be helpful with the Israelis. Dennis Clift, who was in Defense at the time, was there on occasions. Eilts and I were the designated liaison officials with the two other delegations, although we all intermingled. The Camp David cabins were quite confining. Initially, the main meeting was the Carter-Begin-Sadat session which was attended only by the three principals. There were only two or three such meetings during the first couple of days. Carter concluded after the initial round of meetings that the more they were together, the more difficult it would become. Sadat was expressing the extreme Egyptian position; Begin was presenting the extreme Israeli positions. They were talking past each other and angering each other. Carter was trying to keep the meetings constructive and soon concluded that it was essential to work through the delegations. He would shuttle back and forth between Sadat and Begin, but would not bring them together again until there were some constructive results foreseeable. That was a brilliant decision by Carter. The end result was that the Camp David conference developed into "proximity" talks which was a familiar pattern in Arab-Israeli negotiations. Although we were all together in Camp David and did eat together in the same dining room, the Egyptians would sit at one end of the room at their own table and the Israelis at the other end at their own table. Ezer Weizman and one or two other Israelis tried hard to engender some spirit of conviviality and moved around the room. He had some success, but not a great deal. Sadat remained in his cabin the whole time except for walks in the woods. He never came to the dining room; he never went to the pool hall; he never went to the movies; he didn't socialize at all. Begin did come to the dining room most of the time with his delegation, but he didn't get a chance to interact with Sadat. I assume that in part is why Sadat didn't come to the dining room; he didn't want to participate in any more unpleasant bilateral discussions. Carter would typically eat in his own cabin with his wife who was with him

Q: Would you say that Eilts was a highly professional career officer representing the United States and was not an advocate for the Egyptians? And same for you and the Israelis?

LEWIS: I think that was the case. Inevitably, our particular contribution was the intimate knowledge of the governments and countries to which we were assigned. We could explain to the American delegation the limits that both Sadat and Begin were working within. I am sure that on occasion I have been regarded by some as pro-Israeli, but I believe that I have been very professional. Hermann and I got along extremely well; the American delegation had worked together for eighteen months and by this time had become a close knit team. Carter was clearly the quarterback. He was setting the strategy working closely with Cy Vance. Brzezinski was also closely involved in the whole process, but at Camp David he was less prominent than Vance by a wide margin. Vance relied heavily on Saunders as the chief draftsman of the various proposals which we ultimately began to submit. Atherton, Quandt, Eilts and I made our contributions especially on the way to shape the proposals to become more acceptable to the other parties. The process operated in alternative meetings. Carter was very good about debriefings. When he met with Begin or Sadat, he often had Vance with him. If he didn't, he would immediately brief Vance and Brzezinski. Then Vance would debrief the rest of the American delegation. Since it had become apparent early that neither the Egyptian draft proposal nor the Israeli one had any chance of acceptance by the other side, Carter offered to have the U.S. delegation draft a proposal. From that point on, all negotiations were based on the "single draft" which essentially required the Americans to produce a draft of a set of principles. Then the American delegation would meet with one of the other delegations to discuss it and then would follow the procedure with the second delegation. Sometime, we would just present the draft and let the other delegations sit in their cabins to discuss it for hours on end. Then we would meet with one delegation to get its reaction and then with the other for the same assessment. Then we would modify the draft to take into account the reactions of both the Egyptian and Israeli delegations. The draft went through thirteen or perhaps even more revisions in this way before the final version was agreed.

There were some very interesting sessions in this thirteen days and nights. In between sessions we held tennis matches to relieve the tensions. On the second night, Carter joined the American delegation at about ten o'clock after having watched the movie. He spent about two and half hours with the whole American delegation, describing his impressions of the initial meeting between Sadat, Begin and himself. He outlined what he saw the strategy for the rest of the conference to be; he described the personalities and their positions and assessed the prospects. He also told us at that time about some very sensitive concessions that Sadat had made to him privately for Carter's use with Begin whenever Carter felt that they would be effective. It was an extraordinary meeting. Carter dealt with all of us as part of his team. That was flattering to me and to Eilts. He revealed a lot more about his views, his strategy and other people than he had done previously, except perhaps to his own immediate inner White House circle. I think Carter had become over the months since taking office, considerably more understanding of and sympathetic to Begin than he had been at the beginning and certainly since he had seen him in Washington in March in one of those dreadful meetings mentioned earlier. He had acquired a personal respect and admiration for Begin even though the latter often drove Carter up a wall with his legalisms and his rhetoric on Jewish history and his other preoccupations. It was clear that Carter was insisting that Sadat and Begin remain if at all possible at Camp David until the end of the road had been reached.

Sadat had adopted what I considered a brilliant strategy in dealing with Carter; that strategy culminated at Camp David. Sadat was uninterested in details; he was interested only in the broad principles. Begin was very interested in the details and every language change was significant to Begin. So Begin took a real interest in the drafting and re-drafting of every document; Sadat took less interest, but listened to his staff. His staff, which had unanimously objected to Sadat coming to Camp David at all, felt he was in a very tough position and didn't really want to agree to anything. Begin's staff was very eager for an agreement and their strategy throughout was designed to bring Begin around to something that was acceptable to others and viable from the Israeli point of view. Therefore, the strategy of the two delegations were almost mirror images. Camp David succeeded in part because Sadat over-ruled all of his advisors. Begin ultimately acquiesced in certain concessions that his delegation had urged on him and which Carter was pressing for. Sadat's technique was to express full confidence in Carter's understanding of Egypt's situation and full reliance on Carter's unwillingness to do anything that would hurt Egypt. He implicitly and explicitly put himself in Carter's hands which of course was very flattering to Carter. Begin on the other hand looked with a very gimlet eye on the crosses on the "t"s and the dots on the "i"s of anything that Carter would suggest, which did not create the same sympathetic attitude that Sadat's approach did. Apparently, in the course of the early meetings, Sadat given Carter a number of specific fall-back positions that he would agree to if Carter told him that they were necessary to achieve an agreement. He left the tactics entirely up to Carter.

Q: Were either the Egyptian or Israeli delegations hamstrung at all by the curse of lawyers or were they diplomats mostly?

LEWIS: That is an interesting question. Everybody in the Egyptian delegation except Sadat was a lawyer. There were several lawyers, including Begin, in the Israeli delegation and they were very legalistic. The American delegations had only one lawyer -- Cy Vance. He had decided not to take the Department's legal advisor. Of course Vance is a renowned international lawyer himself and he felt that he was enough for our delegation. In retrospect, I am not sure that was good decision. The American delegation should have had a lawyer who was not the chief negotiator who kept his trained eye on the texts, but that was Vance's decision. In fact, because Begin was so legalistic and the Israeli delegation contained one lawyer in particular by the name of Aharon Barak, who had just resigned as Attorney General and had just been appointed to the Israeli Supreme Court, but had been assigned to the delegation before taking on his new responsibilities, made the difference in the conference's success or failure. The reason is very interesting. As we got half-way through the conference and there were still some unresolved issues -- essentially we had reached a stalemate -- Carter developed a brilliant tactical idea. One day, he approached both Begin and Sadat separately and told each of them that the conference was not progressing and that time was running. He asked that each President designate one person from each delegation to become a member of a working group with him to see whether those three people could not develop a draft which would satisfy all parties. It is rare, if indeed it ever happened for a Chief of State to chair a working group consisting of subordinate members of other delegations. This must have been unique even in diplomatic history. Begin designated Barak, in whom he had enormous confidence because they both had legal minds -- Begin had great respect for legal language and lawyers. Having seen Barak work as Attorney General, Begin knew him to be a man of great integrity. He also knew that Barak was rather more dovish than he himself was and that he would be working to get an agreement, rather than accepting failure. It may have been that subliminally Begin chose Barak for the right reasons. In any case, it was a significant choice. Osama el Baz was selected by Sadat. Carter met on several occasions with the two of them; sometime he would also add Vance, but there were no other Israelis or Egyptians. What the this informal group was doing was to focus on the sticky issues in the drafts that the larger delegation meetings were unable to resolve.

Clearly, Barak and Osama el Baz were often in an awkward position. They acted "ad referendum" for their bosses, but the presence of the President of the United States weighted heavily on them to reconcile their differences. It had its effect. Some of the key problems that confronted Begin had to do with language -- for example, the question of the "legitimate rights of the Palestinians" which had to be in the final text from the Egyptian point of view in order to assure the Palestinians that they were not being double-crossed. The language however could not imply acceptance of an independent state for the Palestinians. Begin was not prepared to accept that. There were several phrases which had to meet Begin's legal views. Barak crafted language which met Carter's and Egyptian concerns and then he would explain the language to Begin in legal terms which would persuade Begin that he was not making any fundamental concessions to his basic principles. Begin could accept such language as long as it didn't imply more than he was prepared to imply. I think only Barak could have done that. So it was crucial that Barak was there -- at the right place and at the right time. I am not a great fan of lawyers who involve themselves in foreign policy, but in this case, having an Israeli lawyer was essential.

Carter was very rough on the subject of Israeli settlements; he always had been. He viewed them as illegal and unjustified, but he had become much more realistic about what could be gotten from Begin on this subject. That of course was one of the major issues in the conference. At the meeting of the American delegation on September 6, which I described earlier, he said that a freeze on settlements was the most that he could expect from Begin. There was no hope of obtaining Israeli agreement to withdrawal or dismantle them. He was convinced that Sadat would not give up on getting all of Sinai back. There was no chance that the Israeli settlements could be left there. Carter was also realistic about Israeli security and political problems. I felt after that meeting that Carter was over-optimistic about the chances of changing of Begin's mind based on his own persuasiveness. As it turned out, I was wrong. He had succeeded by the end of the conference to move Begin away from a number of his long held views.

Q: Were the settlements genuine at that time? That is to say were they settlements that Begin favored for solidification purposes and not just expressions of right wing views of history?

LEWIS: The history of settlements is a long and complicated one. By Camp David time, there were only perhaps ten thousand settlers on the West Bank. Sharon had pushed the settlement process during the Begin regime quite vigorously. We had been screaming and demanding that the process be halted, but had been ignored. There had been some periods of freeze, some periods of double-talk. Settlements had always been a sore subject between us. There weren't nearly as many then as there are today. The settlements then were sponsored by the Gush Emunim religious right wing groups and others. Nevertheless, in 1979, there were relatively few settlements for an area as large as the West Bank. It was apparent to us and to Sadat that if settlements continued to be developed it would be increasingly difficult to get agreement on the Palestinian issue. Begin was determined not to yield an inch on the right to settle; Jews could live anywhere -- New York, the West Bank, their ancient homeland. In his view, the right of Jews to live anywhere in Palestine was unrelated to the ultimate political decisions; that right could never be surrendered. It was a difficult argument that had gone on for months and years and at Camp David. It was clear that Begin was prepared to slow down and perhaps even stop for a while in order to get a peace treaty with Egypt, but he was never prepared to agree to a permanent freeze or cessation of settlements, which is what Carter tried to get from him. This was the issue, as we shall see, which most soured the Carter-Begin relationships after Camp David.

There were some amusing side-lights to the conference. For example, one member of the Egyptian delegation was a General Touhami -- the same gentleman who had met previously secretly with Dayan twice in Morocco. He had been an original member of Sadat's officers group. He showed up at dinner on the first night and sat at the American table. He was a fascinating character -- a real mystic -- who took great pleasure with relating his success as a young man in mastering his bodily functions. He described the time when he confronted a lion in a cave; by the sheer force of his will and his burning eyes, had cowed the lion into submission. He claimed that he had also trained himself to stop his heart at will for as much as two minutes at a time. He offered to demonstrate at the table, but the Americans were not too enthusiastic, although there was a doctor on the premises. All in all, the General was a very unusual participant in the conference. I never knew what role he played behind the scenes, but Sadat had a lot of confidence in his discretion and I am sure he played some role.

Interspersed in these days and night of meetings -- they often went late into the night because either Begin or Sadat would meet with Carter in the early evening after which we would get debriefed and then spend hours trying to redraft based on the latest assumptions as to where the Israeli and Egyptian leaders stood. Carter also organized entertainment in addition to the movies. One evening, we had a fabulous performance by the Marine Drum and Bugle Corps including the silent drill with fixed bayonets which they did on the near-by play ground. There was not a lot of joviality that evening because the negotiations were quite tense; so the Marines offered a welcomed change of pace. One evening, the Carters gave a beautiful reception at the Laurel Lodge with strings. Sadat and Begin even exchanged a few friendly words on that occasion. I had a good chat with Sadat that evening. I found him very dejected with Begin's preoccupation with what he called "old language and old concepts". I tried to point out to Sadat how much Begin had moved since June, 1977 when I first met him. I also told him that i thought that the Israelis were anxious to reach a settlement, but Sadat was quite pessimistic at that time. He was not persuaded.

The preliminaries took place between September 5 and 8. We produced our first draft on September 9. Then the American papers began to be shuttled back and forth between delegations. The weekend was spent at Gettysburg, where Carter had taken Sadat and Begin. That was the only time we left Camp David during the conference. That was a nice diversion and provided an opportunity for all to ponder the cost of war. It was a good psychological touch.

Q: Did they watch that electronic display?

LEWIS: They didn't watch that. They went around to a number of points on the battle-field and were briefed by the Park Rangers. Carter talked about the battle a little bit. Weizman gave some disputations on military history. There was a nice feeling of interaction going on. That was a good touch. Carter was seeking continually to break the tensions and not letting them break out.

Q: Would you say that Camp David or similar a site was an essential imperative?

LEWIS: Absolutely. The site had to be isolated. On Friday night -- the eighth -- things were going badly. The Israelis had a Shabbat dinner that night and had invited Vance, Brzezinski and me to join them. It was a very nice, relaxed, religiously-tinged evening which helped to improve their relationships with Brzezinski especially, who was somewhat ephemeral in his moods about the Israelis -- he was sometimes very critical, sometimes very understanding. Late that Friday evening, after dinner, at about one o'clock, I got into a long and probably too candid conversation with Simcha Dinitz who was at that time the Israeli Ambassador in Washington. He was part of the Israeli delegation. He was playing a somewhat parallel role to mine. We compared notes about the ominous situation that seemed to be developing and what might be done about it. I told him something that I had heard from Carter and that was that it had been Begin who had insisted on continuing the trilateral meetings among the three leaders, long after they were obviously counter-productive. Begin had not suggested that Weizman be brought into the discussions. Dinitz was thunder-struck and apparently on the next day he told Dayan what I had said. Dayan then told Begin, who called me Saturday evening in clear anger, categorically denying that he had ever insisted on continuing the trilateral meetings. That episode says something about the virtue of candor late at night during negotiations. I still think that my report was correct, but it exposed the problems within the Israeli delegation. Both Dayan and Weizman were anxious to reach an agreement; Begin was unhappy with a lot of their advice. They were pressing him a great deal in their own different ways, although Dayan was the much more important player at Camp David.

Weizman's main role was to keep some kind of relationship with the Egyptians particularly when tensions were high. He was the only Israeli, for example, who saw Sadat outside the receptions and the general meetings. He went more than once to Sadat's cabin and tried to explain some of the nuances of the Israeli concerns. He also asked Sadat to meet with Dayan. Sadat had, ever since his visit to Jerusalem, a kind of estrangement with Dayan. He liked Weizman; he never trusted Dayan which may be explained by Dayan's role in the wars and his reputation as a somewhat tricky fellow. In any case, Dayan, who was constructive and helpful in trying to reach an agreement, was alienated from Sadat while Weizman wasn't. Weizman wanted to change that and he finally persuaded Sadat to invite Dayan to his cabin for a conversation. That ultimately happened, but didn't produce much change in the views held by either. That complicated psychological relationships because Weizman had access to Sadat, but it was Dayan who was favored by us as the negotiator. Begin was standing on principle and resented somewhat the role that his lieutenants were playing. That may be one explanation for the outburst I received from Begin Saturday night.

Q: Were Sadat and Weizman communicating in English?

LEWIS: They were talking directly to each other without interpreters. Everyone was talking in English. The conference was conducted in English, which was another interesting dimension. Among themselves, the Israelis obviously spoke in Hebrew and the Egyptians in Arabic, but all the interactions were in English. All the Israelis had a good command of English; Begin's was excellent and Dayan's, although somewhat rough, was perfectly serviceable.

The conference went on for days and days as did the tennis games, the walks in the woods, the meals, the pool games, the drafts, the meetings. At a certain point, Carter decided that he would take in his own hand a part of the problem. There were two sets of issues. One concerned the final deal that could be reached in the peace process over the Sinai and the other concerned the nature of the framework of principles needed for the settlement of the broader conflict with Syria, Jordan, the Palestinians. It had to be a framework that Egypt could endorse and would encourage the others to ultimately enter into negotiations with Israel. This framework included the autonomy concept which made it very difficult to hammer out. Most of the negotiations were about the framework. The question of the Sinai after a few days became fairly clear. Carter himself produced a brief draft of a framework for peace between Egypt and Israel. He worked on that draft separately with Barak and El Baz. The delegations continued to struggle with the broader principles and related issues.

There was one event that occurred that I remember still vividly. We had met with Carter after dinner and he was very frustrated, particularly with Begin's obstinacy. As Carter left the cabin to return to his own, he asked me to walk with him. He said in a very frustrated and angry manner: "I don't think Begin wants peace. He really doesn't". I told him that he was wrong, that Begin and all Israelis wanted peace above all. They had been wanting nothing else for years. I told the President that the issue is not the objective, but the price that the Israelis were prepared to pay in addition to the political risks that Begin was prepared to run. Those were the problems, not whether they wanted peace. Carter mumbled and said: "I suppose you are right". He had almost reached the conclusion at that point that Begin was looking for a failure of the conference. That view was beginning to affect Carter's psychology. But I think he accepted that his emotional view may not have been correct and his reaction was a matter of a moment and had caused an outburst, but that intellectually he accepted my analysis.

On about Wednesday of the second week, September 13, lengthy meetings had been taking place and Carter had spent hours and hours with his drafting group of Barak and El Baz -- while others were just marking time -- we began to get hints from members of the Israeli delegation that Begin might indeed sign eventually. That was not the impression that he had given Carter on Tuesday night, which had been a very difficult meeting concentrating on the settlements issue and on a phrase in the preamble of the ultimate framework on the unacceptability of the acquisition of territories by force, which was very important to the Egyptians, but an anathema to Begin, because it suggested that however you obtained territory -- even in a legitimate war of defense -- you would have to surrender it. He had always argued that there had been a lot of other cases in the world in which wars had ended with transfer of territory. The question for Begin was how the territory was acquired -- what had led to the acquisition. But the Egyptians had picked up a phrase from the U.N. and insisted on having it in the agreement, implying that the Israelis would eventually have to surrender the whole of the West Bank and Gaza. Begin found that very hard to accept, although eventually the phrase was included in the preamble because Barak had convinced Begin that its inclusion there did not make it binding. That episode is an illustration of the point I had made earlier about Barak's role.

There was another interesting event that came to light that Wednesday evening. After lunch, I was sitting with Begin and several other Israelis. Begin said to me: "Sam, do you know what the President said to me last night? He told me that Sadat had told him that he would never sign an agreement as long as I was Prime Minister. He was asking Carter to have me removed". Begin showed great indignation and obviously had had his pride hurt severely. He then told me that he had told Carter to make it clear to Sadat that the Israeli Prime Minister is elected by the Israeli people and that would continue to be the case, whether that pleased the Egyptian President or not. Begin was furious when he heard Sadat's real views of himself from Carter. He categorized Sadat as a hypocrite because Sadat had been warm and friendly when they had been together. I wondered myself why Carter had repeated Sadat's comments to Begin because it was bound to be a very incendiary statement. It was bad enough that Begin had heard it, but it was made worse when the other Israelis heard about it. If the Camp David conference would have failed, Begin had a perfect vindication to use when he returned to Israel. If the Sadat comment had in fact been made, it would also have blackened his reputation in the U.S. I thought Carter may have made a major error. In the same conversation, Begin also recounted an exchange he had with Brzezinski the previous morning. He had asked Zbig who had developed the phrase "Palestinian aspirations". Zbig said that it had come out of the Vienna formula and that Peres seemed to have liked it. As background, you should know that only a few weeks before Camp David, but after the conference had all been arranged, Peres, as leader of the opposition had met with Sadat in Vienna, under the auspices of Chancellor Kreisky. Peres and Sadat had reached an understanding on a formulation of principles for peace which was much more forthcoming than anything that Begin was prepared to endorse. Peres immediately leaked this understanding as soon as he had returned to Jerusalem and had told his colleagues that if Begin could not make peace with Sadat, he just had proved that he and Sadat could reach a meeting of minds. In any democratic system, such a ploy would have been provocative, but it was very destructive in Israel, given the history of the tense relationship between Peres and Begin -- the latter having succeeded the former as Prime Minister and having insulted him in the Knesset. For Zbig to have quoted to Begin language that Peres approved and that we were pushing was clearly tactically very unwise. Begin was scathing; he wanted to know what the Socialist International was doing in these negotiations. He wondered how Zbig would feel if the Republican party was drafting the U.S. position for the negotiations. When the history of the phrase was checked later, it was found that it had not been included in the Vienna declaration at all. It had been a statement that had been dropped during the Sadat-Peres consultations, but Peres asserted that he believed that Sadat wanted to keep that language in as a fall back. In retrospect, I believe that the phrase was actually adopted by the Socialist International at a meeting in Vienna which had been the cover used by Sadat and Peres to have their consultations. Since it was in an international declaration, both Sadat and Peres could accept it as a basis for an agreement. It looked to me at the time as another tactical goof which could have had some deleterious consequences. I checked later with Vance on Begin's comments and he agreed that the President had made a bad error in repeating Sadat's words. He said he had talked to Carter about it, but I don't know that any damage repair efforts were ever undertaken. But these are illustrations of the kind of events that take place in lengthy negotiations; you have to always keep the nuances in mind. On the other hand, it is surprising that there were no more slips during the thirteen days.

During this whole period at Camp David, there was a major diversion -- the big blow up in Lebanon. That sort of thing often seems to happen during peace conferences. There was also a lot of trouble in Iran -- this was the beginning of the Shah's period of decline. Carter was therefore distracted some of the time, but didn't allow himself to be distracted for any length of time. The conference was marked by hills of optimism followed by valleys of pessimism. By September 13, the Israelis are in despair and the Egyptians are feeling better since the latest drafts had begun to move in their direction. I remember that I noted to myself that I was arguing the "Israeli problem" too consistently with my colleagues while discussing the drafts. I thought that my credibility was ebbing with my delegation. We had prepared a new draft to take care of Sadat's concerns that the final document refer to something close to self-determination. I had told everybody that I didn't think that Begin could swallow such thoughts and that he might explode. And indeed he did, during a conversation with Vance that evening. Vance pressured Begin very hard when he was invited by Begin to join him in the latter's cabin to get his reaction to the new draft. At one point Vance told Begin that it might be better to drop the whole thing and leave.

Begin backed off a little at that juncture. Begin was something of a bully; if he thought he had someone on the ropes, he was not adverse at pushing hard. That evening, everybody in the Israeli delegation was discouraged and were seriously discussing leaving. Meanwhile, in private, Sadat was continuing to give Weizman a very hard line. He also gave Dayan a very hard line. Sadat continued to stick with his strategy -- no concessions directly to the Israelis, but giving some to Carter which then could be used with the Israelis if he chose to do so. For example, Sadat had told Carter that the resolution of the future of the settlements in Sinai could be postponed -- the Israelis wanted to retain them after withdrawal. This issue could be discussed when the peace treaty itself would be discussed; it would be sufficient that the Israelis at Camp David would just agree to dismantle them at some time.

On Thursday, September 14, the leit motiv had been set during a Carter-Sadat morning walk. Sadat had drawn his bottom line. We tried during the day to draft a document that would meet Sadat's needs. When Begin saw that draft, he exploded as I mentioned earlier. We made no progress on that day, except to leave the Israelis very depressed. By the morning of Friday, the 14th, it looked like everything would slip away. There may have been parts of the draft that Begin would approve; he certainly would not sign the document as it then stood. It didn't look like a deal could be struck. Begin was very grim and defiant that day. Barak, Weizman and Dayan were working very hard to save something. Vance relayed to us Carter's instructions to prepare to wrap-up on Sunday. He wanted the chronology prepared, a speech prepared, a "Questions and Answers" paper for press interview, talking points for Congress, etc.

It should not be forgotten that it was clear to the Israelis at the beginning that if the conference were to fail, some one would be blamed. Carter had decided that failure would be blamed on the Israelis. Bill Quandt had been assigned to write a speech, on which he worked throughout the conference, in which Carter would explain what had happened and why the conference had failed. The burden of failure in that speech was put on the Israelis. The Israelis knew that or at least they sensed it. So on Friday, everyone was beginning to work on the end-game assuming a conference failure. In the meantime, Foreign Minister Kamal and the Egyptians were considerably more up-beat, probably because they hoped for failure. Carter had told everybody that the conference would end Sunday evening regardless. During Friday afternoon, he sent Mondale to see both Begin and Sadat, asking that their final suggestions be provided by that evening so that the U.S. could put together a final proposal on Saturday. That proposal would be a "take it or leave it" draft to be either signed or dismissed on Sunday. On Monday, Carter would deliver an address to the nation before a joint session of Congress. Begin was expecting to stay in the U.S. for a couple of days after the conference in Washington and New York and would therefore be in the country when Carter would make his speech.

By Friday midnight, there were a few glimmers of light, although I recall that none of us had been invited to Sabbath dinner that night. Barak had made a super-human effort with Begin on the language dealing with the Palestinian problem and had made some progress. The question of the Sinai settlements remained intractable. Everybody realized that Saturday was to be "crunch time". I had breakfast Saturday with Weizman and Barak who were very critical of our draft because of the effect it had had on Begin. They were very frustrated, especially Weizman. Dayan, typically, during the night had been trying to find a way to convince us and Sadat to postpone until later the resolution of the Sinai settlements. Dayan always looked for a way around an obstacle if it couldn't be removed. He went to see Carter along with Vance Saturday mid-morning. This was part of a long series of meetings -- Mondale-Weizman, Mondale-Sadat, Vance-Sadat, Mondale-Begin -- intended to deliver Carter's views. It was the President's intention to give the U.S. view of what happened at Camp David before Sadat and Begin had a chance to give theirs.

On Saturday afternoon, there was a meeting with Weizman and Dayan concerning the Sinai security issues. We had agreed tentatively to build a new military airfield in Israel if the Israelis would agree to give up their airfields in Sinai within three years and if the settlements issue were resolved. I spent the day, very frustrated, working on a number of relatively minor problems. In the evening, we got together with the President to review the situation. He outlined his strategy for winding up the conference still hoping that a deal could be salvaged, but he was obviously exasperated with Begin and didn't mind showing it. After dinner, Vance and I met with Barak and Dinitz to discuss some alternative language about the West Bank and Gaza issues that the Israelis had provided. Barak conveyed some significant movement on Begin's part which they said that they had extracted from him with great difficulty. Weizman burst into the meeting to give an emotional account of an half-hour meeting he had just held with Sadat during which he had pleaded that the Sinai settlements not be the stumbling block which would send everyone home empty handed to "prepare for war". He argued that all other issues could be resolved and that time was necessary to convince the Knesset to move the settlements -- at least that was what it sounded like. Weizman thought that he had made an impact on Sadat, although we found out later that Sadat was apparently confused by Weizman's presentation. Nevertheless, it produced a good reaction. Weizman thought that Sadat was at the point of leaving the conference before their discussion. We now know that Sadat was apparently prepared to leave Thursday night, but was dissuaded by Carter.

We worked through most of Friday night in redrafting and sat around most of Saturday waiting for the conclusion of a climactic Carter-Begin meeting that was also attended by Vance and Barak and Dayan. That meeting broke up at 12:30 a.m. Sunday morning after about five hours. It was this meeting that sealed the deal at Camp David. It also planted the seeds for the break-down of relationships between Carter and Begin not very much later. The two reached a kind of agreement on a draft, but as we were debriefed at one o'clock in the morning, it was not immediately apparent that a deal had in fact been struck. We understood that some polishing was necessary, but didn't realize that Carter had made the essential break-through. For the Sinai agreement, it was agreed to leaving the settlements question to be put to the Knesset. That was a formality since Begin had said all along that he would not agree to remove the settlements, but would be prepared to put the issue before the Knesset as a make-or-break issue on an otherwise sealed agreement. It was actually a way for Begin to save face because he knew perfectly well that if he had peace with Egypt in hand, the Knesset would not allow the Sinai settlements to stand in the way of final signature. But Begin would not take the responsibility of making the decision himself. The general framework that was agreed upon was pretty good. I think Begin would have come out ahead had he accepted the declaration of principles that Sadat had offered back in December at Ismalia. He would not have accepted at that time the phrases that he so much disliked, such as "the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people", and a procedure on autonomy which led more in the direction of independence that he was willing to accept.

It was clearly a great achievement. Carter, Vance, Barak and all the others were rubbing their eyes at the success. The next morning, Sunday, Sadat went for a walk with Carter. Carter apparently told him at that time what he had achieved with Begin the night before. He told Sadat that he had gotten Begin's agreement to freeze settlements during the negotiation period following Camp David. Carter understood Begin to agree that this freeze would last until the negotiations about autonomy were completed; i.e., until autonomy for the West Bank and Gaza was in place. That was a misunderstanding and that is what subsequently soured the relationship.

During Sunday, we were putting the final touches on the draft. Carter was preparing to launch his campaign with the other two leaders to get them to the signing point. Sunday, in fact, turned into a cliff-hanger, not a wind-down as it should have. That I gather is common to many conferences in which you think you have a deal, only to find out at the last minute that there are still issues to be resolved. That is what happened at Camp David on the final day. We thought everything had been pretty well resolved. Then the all of a sudden, the issue of Jerusalem exploded unexpectedly. Since no meeting of the minds was possible on the issue. it had been agreed by the three delegations that each would state its own view of the problem in a letter to be attached to the agreement. Actually, we had all agreed on some language at one point -- a simple statement that Jerusalem should remain undivided, the rights to the holy places should be respected and that Jerusalem's ultimate status should be left to further negotiations -- all very vague and general -- but Sadat was persuaded Saturday night by his advisors not to agree to that because it was giving away too much for Arab sensitivities. Sadat was convinced that it would have been better to be silent on the subject than to have a the minimal agreement that was achievable. On the basis of our understanding, we had drafted a letter on our position on Jerusalem, addressed to Sadat and Begin. We delivered that letter to the Israelis so that they could see it in advance before they delivered their letter to us. The difficulties arose because Carter and Vance thought that it had been clear to Begin that the U.S. would restate our view on Jerusalem -- that our views would be stated in addition to the Israeli and Egyptian views. The fact that we had to state our views is because that was the understanding we had reached with Sadat in exchange for his approval of dropping the whole issue out of the final Camp David agreement. He knew of course, that our view was somewhat closer to his than it was to that of Israel's and he wanted our view on the public record, even if were to be in a side letter. This was one of the two topics that was discussed in the marathon meeting Saturday night. It is there that the misunderstanding started which is not surprising in light of the weariness of the participants which may have made them miss the nuances. It is a lesson why negotiations should not be carried on too late at night.

So on Sunday morning, Vance read to Dayan the text of our draft letter on Jerusalem which was essentially a summary of statements that Arthur Goldberg and Charles Yost had made to the U.N. previously in 1967 and 1969. Dayan was very upset to hear our position restated so baldly - namely that the status of Jerusalem was subject to later negotiations, which along with other nuances, implied that we viewed Jerusalem as occupied territory and not an integral part of Israel. Dayan went off to explain it to Begin. He was particularly upset by a phrase which identified East Jerusalem as occupied territory. (We should note that the same issues have recently arisen again and this is now 1990.) Shortly after that meeting broke up at about 12:30 and the Israelis went off to lunch, I got an agitated call from Meir Rosenne, the legal advisor of the Foreign Affairs Ministry and a member of the Israeli delegation. He wanted a copy of our letter immediately, which I brought to him, after carefully marking it "First draft-uncleared".

When I arrived at the Israeli cabin, I found Begin fuming angrily to his colleagues, all of whom looked very worried. Dayan took me aside and described to me Begin's explosion at the idea that the U.S. would put forth its position at this last moment. He urged me to try to convince Vance that our draft had to be killed or that the conference might break down. Begin was furious when he spoke to his delegation. So I went back and reported to Vance, who insisted that Begin had been told of our intentions the night before and had not objected. Carter had given assurances just that Sunday morning that we would state our position in a side letter. The public restatement of our position on Jerusalem was sine qua non for Sadat's signature to the final agreement. It was Vance's view that Begin would just have to swallow it. I told Vance that I didn't think he would; he didn't seem to be bluffing. I also told Vance that none of the three Israelis who were present at the Saturday night meeting -- Begin, Dayan and Barak -- would admit that they had heard anything about our intention to restate our views on Jerusalem. I went back to Dayan; Begin was adamant. Finally we got Dayan and Barak to meet with Vance in the pool hall in Holly Cabin. Carter and Mondale suddenly joined in. Then Jordan and Dinitz and Weizman and Saunders and I also joined. It began to be a crowd. Carter was polite, but cool and tough. He said he could not go back on his word to Sadat. He had made known his intentions to make the letter public the night before. He tactfully pointed out that it was not the Israeli responsibility to tell the U.S. whether or where or how it should state its views and policies. The meeting broke up in a pessimistic view. Then Carter picked up a hint from Dayan. He asked Vance to look at the language of our draft letter again to see what could be done to ease Israeli concerns without breaking his commitment to Sadat. In fact, Vance had already realized by then that the original language could not stand and had already commissioned a new draft. It was practically ready when Carter asked for it. The new draft merely said that our new position was as had been stated by Goldberg and Yost, but didn't restate it. This version was eventually accepted by both Begin and Sadat. So the "Jerusalem crisis" was contained and didn't raise its head again at Camp David. This episode was a good illustration of the last minute unexpected events that can blow up towards the end of a conference, which can be resolved, but that at the moment looks like a sure tragedy. In retrospect, I think that the Jerusalem issue could have wrecked the conference because on Sunday morning, although the Israelis were so close to achieving peace with Egypt and would not have wished to have it slip away, Begin might have driven Sadat out of the game inadvertently if he had dragged the meeting out further.

There were more meetings to get the final wording on the Sinai and other issues. At approximately 5:30 p.m., that Sunday afternoon, after the deal had been sealed, we were deluged by a cloud burst which delayed our departure for about an hour. We then took all the documents and got on helicopters to the White House. The Israeli delegation, which I accompanied on their helicopter, was euphoric. Everybody was very happy. The Egyptians were putting up a good front, but they were essentially very unhappy and scared. Many members of the Egyptian delegation genuinely felt they were committing suicide by being party to this peace agreement. They felt that eventually they might lose their lives because of their participation. Kamal had told Sadat two days earlier that he would resign because he couldn't support Sadat's determination to reach agreement. Sadat prevailed on him to stay through the conference. It was clear that Begin's rather obnoxious and difficult negotiating strategy had paid off. I thought then and I still believe now that Israel got a somewhat better deal than Egypt did, but that both sides had made a good many concessions. It was obvious that neither side was totally satisfied which I consider a good negotiating outcome. Begin would have some political problems at home about what he had given away in Sinai -- the settlements -- and other issues, but I was sure that he could overcome the problems because Labor would certainly support him even if all of the Likud didn't. That is what ultimately happened in the Knesset.

Q: During all of these frenetic days, was anything said to the press? Were there any press available?

LEWIS: The press was not inside Camp David. There were a number staying at the nearest town, but they couldn't get a snip of anything. Approximately once or perhaps twice a day, Jody Powell, who was Carter's press spokesman, would make an agreed-upon statement to the press about progress. It was very anodyne, saying nothing about what was transpiring. There was a press center in that near-by town which he would visit, but essentially never told the press anything.

That Sunday evening, we landed at the Washington Monument helipad at about 9:45 p.m. and motorcaded to the White House. Most everyone went to the East Room for the formal announcement to the world. No one outside the delegations knew that success had been achieved. All the hints coming out of Camp David in the few previous days had been pessimistic. So the outcome of the conference came as a terrific bomb-shell for the press, the Congress, the various publics in Israel and Egypt. Interestingly, when we went up to the East Room, only a couple of members of the Egyptian delegation went. El Baz was one of them, being very faithful to Sadat and happy that the agreement had been reached. Two or three others drifted away so that they wouldn't be photographed. The Israelis were all there. Carter, Begin and Sadat sat on the rostrum. Begin stole the show; he made a warm and witty speech. Sadat gave a formal speech, praising Carter, but not mentioning Begin at all. Then the famous picture was taken; this is the one that got a lot of press play. Begin embraced Carter and then Sadat for a photo opportunity which he was anxious to have on the record. He mouse-trapped Sadat into that picture; Sadat couldn't avoid it. It was a very smooth performance.

It was a great triumph for Carter, but as it turned out it was not to be a happy start for a new Carter-Begin relationship.

Almost immediately after the joyous announcement, we got into an argument with Begin about the interpretation of the framework agreement. The elements became subject to controversy. One was whether any or all of the Israeli forces would withdraw during a five year period -- the language was not entirely clear on this subject. And then came the question of how long the freeze on new settlements on the West Bank would last. As I mentioned earlier, at the climactic Saturday night meeting, Carter had pressed Begin to freeze settlements for the duration of the negotiations. Carter's own notes and Vance's recollections make it clear that Carter, believing that Begin understood, used the term "negotiations" not to cover only the treaty negotiating period -- which were supposed to last only three months -- but the whole subsequent negotiations which include discussion of the autonomy of the West Bank and Gaza -- a negotiation that was never completed. Carter's notes said that Begin had agreed. Carter had asked, according to the notes, Begin to give him those assurances in writing. Begin's recollections, supported by Barak's notes and remembrances which I discussed with him at great length later, was that he had said that he would consider the matter overnight and that he would give Carter his answer in the morning. Dayan's recollection was somewhere between Carter's and Begin's accounts. But Carter and Vance are absolutely sure that they were right.

The next morning, Sunday morning, a letter from Begin's cabin was delivered to Carter which essentially said that in accordance with their prior night's discussion that he would agree to settlement freeze for the period of the peace treaty negotiations. Carter gave that note to Saunders and said: "That isn't what Begin agreed to last night. The settlements are to be frozen for the whole period of the autonomy negotiations. Take this back to the Israelis and get the right language!". Then Carter went off to his walk with Sadat and told Sadat that he had Begin's agreement to a freeze until the autonomy issue was resolved. In the meantime, Begin, either directly or through an intermediary, told Saunders that he had not agreed to a freeze during the autonomy negotiations, but only that he would consider Carter's proposal and that he would give his answer in the morning. And the letter that morning to Carter was his position. When Carter learned of this, he made what I consider an unfortunate tactical mistake. He was convinced of his own recollection and convinced that a deal had been struck which needed to be sealed right away. He didn't confront Begin directly; he didn't try to clarify the differences. He told Saunders to get the matter straightened out when they returned to Washington and to get the right language then. He left the disagreement unresolved.

When Carter returned to Washington, Carter and Vance continued to rely on Saunders to negotiate with Begin and the Israeli Embassy to resolve the dispute. They were unable to do so. In the meantime, Carter was telling everybody that he had Begin's assurance on the settlements' freeze. He reported so to Congressional leaders. That of course was immediately reported in the press. Begin, either leaked or gave out directly, a contrary version, reflecting his own view of events and agreements -- i.e., that the freeze would only cover the period of negotiations for the peace treaty. It therefore became clear to Carter, Brzezinski and everybody that Begin had not changed his mind. Yet Carter proceeded in a speech to the Congress to state his view of the "freeze" agreement. This only made the disagreement worse. At no point, did Carter try to engage Begin in a dialogue on this issue. He was convinced that he had made a commitment to Sadat that Begin had approved. For whatever reason, he decided not to confront the issue directly, but after I returned to Israel, I kept getting messages to see Begin to "straighten" him out on this issue. I had a number of conversations and talked to all the Camp David principals. I sent messages back trying to explain that I thought there was a genuine misunderstanding on what happened that Saturday night and that there had been a failure of communication in that late night, blurry meeting. I reported that Begin maintained that he had not said what Carter thought he had said; that it was not a matter of bad faith, but a genuine failure of communication in a tough moment in a tough negotiation. Carter became convinced that it was a matter of bad faith and that Begin had changed his mind by Sunday morning. Carter felt that Begin had made a commitment and then welshed on it. To this day, he has not changed his view. Carter's feeling of bad faith and Begin's feeling of injury which grew as time passed poisoned the U.S.-Israeli relationships for the remainder of the Begin administration, during Carter's presidency and even after. The issue is raised in Carter's books and therefore remains an unresolved and nasty element. Moreover, it gave Sadat reason to charge the Israelis with bad faith, which soured the peace treaty and autonomy negotiations which started the following year. It was this Begin "commitment" that governed the psychology of the negotiators.

And another thing happened after the Camp David agreement. Vance was very tired and suffered from back problems. He had to get on an airplane soon after that final Sunday to visit the Middle East to try to sell the agreement to the King of Jordan and the King of Saudi Arabia. Sadat had promised King Hussein that he would keep him informed during the Camp David meeting. He had not done so. He then made an arrangement to see Hussein in Morocco to brief him, but when Hussein saw what the agreement contained, he was so apprehensive and unhappy that he canceled the Morocco meeting. So Sadat didn't play any personal part in persuading the other Arabs to support Camp David. In fact, he made a number of disdainful public statements about how Egypt, the great Arab leader, had found the road to peace which the other Arab states would also have to follow. He was quoted around the Arab world making very disdainful comments about Hussein -- "that dwarf in Amman" as he used to call him. He considered the Saudis as kind of barbarians and not worth a lot of effort for their support. He felt that they should understand that they should follow his lead. So Vance and Roy Atherton, who accompanied him, did their very best to bring the Saudis and the Jordanians aboard immediately to see the opportunity that the Camp David accords provided the Palestinians if they would only accept the idea of autonomy and their future after five-years of self-rule. They were unsuccessful.

Hussein kept his powder dry for a while. While Vance was in Amman, Hussein asked him how the U.S. interpreted this clause or that clause. Vance made what I consider a grave tactical error. He should have said that each side may have somewhat different interpretations on a number of clauses, but that the text stands and speaks for itself. The accords were the beginning of a process during which the various interpretations would be melded. Instead, Vance told King Hussein that if he were to give us the questions, we would take them back and provide him with authoritative American interpretations. Those were drafted and approved by Carter. Hal Saunders was sent to the Middle East to deliver them to the King. Hussein found some reassuring, some not; in any case they were not reassuring enough to convince him to join the process, but at least the door was kept open. The agreement itself called for Jordanian participation in the next phase.

After Amman, Saunders came to Israel and met with Begin. I had already given Begin a copy of our position papers which were given to Hussein. Saunders had come to Jerusalem to try to discuss our positions with Begin. But Begin saw the whole exercise as a complete betrayal and an undermining of his position. He thought that the U.S. had no right what-so-ever to give authoritative interpretations of language that had been so carefully tailored to the concerns of two other parties. He was angry with us. So while Carter was angry with Begin over the settlements freeze issue, Begin was angry with us over our statements to Jordan. Within a month, the U.S.-Israel relationships went into a nose dive after a tremendous triumph.

Another reason why the relationship took such a bad turn is that after Camp David, Begin stayed in the States for several days. Weizman and Dayan, unfortunately, went back to Israel immediately. Begin met with many Jewish and Congressional groups to which he made statements tailored to his domestic audience. He tried to justify to his own party in Israel through the press that he really had made no concessions and that he had come out a victor. He took a public line in the U.S. which was tough, bellicose, defiant, trying to convince himself and his followers that he had not conceded anything to the Egyptians. Carter talked to him about this line just before his departure for Jerusalem, trying to convince Begin that it was very important to put the best image on the accords for the Arab audiences because it was crucial that the Arabs support Sadat, who was very vulnerable. Begin couldn't focus on Sadat's problems; he could only concern himself on his own political vulnerabilities at home. Carter's pitch had no effect on him. Begin put priority on dealing with his own perceived political problems before he got home. He also had a polemical style anyway; his reaction to debates was essentially confrontational. These factors produced further irritations on Carter's part and made Vance's job of selling the accords to the Arabs much more difficult. Vance was trying to emphasize what the accords meant for the Palestinian future; Begin's statements were designed to assure the Israeli right wing that nothing was going to change. The press of course was carrying all of the statements all over the region.

So within a month after the Camp David agreement was signed, a great many seeds of discord were planted before its implementation had even begun.

LEWIS: As I said earlier, right after Camp David, a serious disagreement between Carter and Begin erupted over what Begin may or may not have agreed to at Camp David on freezing the settlements in the occupied territories. In my view, that was a very unfortunate misunderstanding and I am convinced still today that it had indeed been a misunderstanding, although Carter has never changed his mind that the tensions arose due to Begin's bad faith. This misunderstanding soured their personal relationship to a significant degree for the rest of the Carter Administration. Begin insisted then and always thereafter that he had promised to suspend the settlements for the duration of the peace treaty negotiations which we all assumed would take only about three months after the signature of the framework agreement at Camp David. Carter insisted that Begin had agreed to freeze the settlements until negotiations on the autonomy of the West Bank and Gaza would be concluded, which obviously would have taken considerably longer. In fact, those negotiations were never completed. Carter believed that Begin just changed his mind overnight.

After our return from Camp David, Hal Saunders, who was then the Assistant Secretary for the Near East and South Asia Bureau in the Department of State, was supposed to get it all straightened out with Begin. He didn't succeed because Begin felt that he knew what he had committed himself to. Begin returned to Israel with the issue unresolved. I was then instructed to resolve matters by getting the letter from Begin with the right wording that Carter thought he had been promised, as a replacement for the one that had been delivered in Washington. I discussed the matter with Begin several times and with Dayan several times. I also went to Barak, who was the other key Israeli participant at the meeting on that last night at Camp David. He was by then a Justice on the Israeli Supreme Court, but had acted as notetaker at that Carter-Begin meeting. His version of events were somewhat closer to Begin's recollections than Carter's. I could never obtain any change in Begin's position so the issue remained unresolved. Begin announced to the Knesset that he had agreed to a settlements freeze for three months. And that is what happened. Carter felt double-crossed.

Immediately after the signing ceremony and Carter's address to a Joint Session of Congress, it became very important to the United States to get support for the Camp David accords from other Arab countries particularly, Jordan and Saudi Arabia. Unfortunately, Sadat had made matters considerably more difficult by snubbing King Hussein whom he had allegedly pledged before Camp David to keep fully informed during the Conference. That had not been done. Sadat had also arranged to meet Hussein in Morocco on the way back to Cairo, but when the agreement was announced, Hussein was so upset by what he understood the nature of that agreement to be about -- especially as it concerned the West Bank -- that he canceled the Morocco meeting. That made Sadat unhappy and disdainful of the King. So Secretary Vance, who was completely worn out by his work at Camp David, was immediately put on an airplane and sent off to the Middle East in an effort to sell the Camp David accords to the Saudis and the Jordanians. As Vance went about this business, Sadat made some public statements which made Arab acceptance even more difficult because they suggested that he had made the peace and then it was up to all the other Arab countries to fall into line to follow him.

Q: In retrospect, would you say it was a tactical mistake to show Begin what we were giving to Hussein? Or would the Israelis have found out anyway?

LEWIS: The tactical mistake was made when Vance agreed to provide Hussein in writing our interpretations of the agreement, especially in the detail we did. Although the written material must have been made available to all parties, the second mistake was made when we did not foresee that by being as specific as we were we would engender the debate all over again. We should have kept our answers, if in fact we needed to provide them in writing at all, as general as possible. It may have made it less persuasive to Hussein, but in any case, even our detailed answers did not persuade the King anyway. The end result of the process was to make Begin very suspicious about Carter's intentions on implementing the accords, and not succeeding in getting Hussein into the act. So we failed in our main objective while exacerbating tensions with Begin. Saunderson's trip was very sad because during it he also met with a group of West Bank and Gaza residents in an effort to get their support for the agreement and participation in the autonomy system. They were not persuaded either, partly because the PLO had already issued a blanket denunciation of the agreement and was putting on a lot of pressure on all West Bank and Gaza residents to reject Camp David.

From that point on, the Israelis and Begin in particular, for several months, as we were trying to negotiate the details of the peace treaty and subsequently the details of the autonomy agreement, which could only be done after the peace treaty was completed, became more paranoid about what they saw in the U.S. response to Hussein along with other perceived signals from Carter. He felt that our real intention was to make Palestine independent and that our acceptance of full autonomy for a specified period was just a smoke screen. At the same time, the Palestinians didn't see enough assurances in the Camp David agreement that Israel would ultimately withdraw and give Palestine its independence. They saw autonomy as the end of the process. The agreement was artfully drafted to leave that issue open; it could not have been solved at Camp David in any case. King Hussein hesitated and wouldn't join the process and the Palestinians were under severe pressure from the PLO and were being told all sorts of exaggerated interpretations of the agreement. Our ability to contact the key Palestinian leaders was very limited; Saunders, our Consul General in Jerusalem and I met with them here and there, but we were not really in any position to make much of an impact on Palestinian opinion in competition with the PLO's successful propaganda. Sadat was doing nothing to try to sell the agreement to either the Palestinians or the Jordanians. He was reveling in his own achievements and in the peace treaty which was his major goal.

There was a period therefore of six-eight weeks when things teetered in the balance in whether we were going to succeed in getting Palestinian and Jordanian participation in the process based on the Camp David framework. By January, it had become clear that Hussein had backed off and would not be persuaded and the PLO had succeeded in convincing Palestinians to have nothing to do with the accords -- despite the fact that in the beginning a number of Palestinians had seen some very positive elements in the autonomy parts of Camp David and if left alone might well have participated in the negotiations for autonomy. In the meantime, Begin had made a major effort with the Knesset and with his own party to convince them that Sadat had made all of the concessions at Camp David and he, Begin, had given away nothing -- that autonomy would mean very little change. Since Israel was a very open society, the speeches and press conferences received maximum exposure and therefore were widely known to the Jordanians and Palestinians, all which confirmed what the PLO was saying about the Camp David agreements. Moreover, Begin's efforts to obtain his party's support had raised Sadat's suspicions that Begin was trying to suck him into just a bilateral treaty and had no intention of pursuing the Palestinian part of the agreement.
