HARRISON: You know there's a great story in Rabin's biography about he comes to Washington for Carter and he's Prime Minister and Carter says after they're talking at the White House, he's staying there, "I'm going to go and kiss Amy good night. How about coming with me?" Rabin says, "No." The only world leader who would have said no and Rabin, I think the contempt he always had for these army drill teams and which he expresses in his biography, too, which is pure Rabin, you know, the chrome headed, aqua cravated, rifle throwing groups of performers which he...

Q: I always feel uncomfortable around those.

HARRISON: Yes. He said that you shouldn't make them circus performers like this. They're fighting men; they should be treated like fighting men. He thought it was demeaning and it's true, but nobody says it except Rabin. A great joy of my professional life was being able to see him up close and to know that he came to kind of like me. He came to one of my going away parties for example, which for me was, you know, I was political counselor, that's not something you normally see, but he did it which I thought was a great vindication of what had been a very difficult service for me there. You had this dichotomy. Peres was this slick name-dropping autodidact who thinks he's smarter than he is. He is kind of a pretentious guy who was the bureaucrat at the defense ministry when they were fighting all these wars and for whom Rabin has this healthy contempt. Coexisting, the two great fathers of the Labour Party, coexisting with Rabin who is a man of action, but really, not the bullshit thing that people claim to be without pretense, and Peres is all pretense. Pretense on this peace process thing, too which is the key to the political relationship the first year that I'm there because he's selling a line to Pickering who, because he's an activist ambassador he wants to make a difference, wants to bring about things that Sam Lewis couldn't do. Sam Lewis meanwhile was hanging around by the way, showing up every month or two and spending weeks in Israel and doing all kinds of things that he shouldn't be doing as an ex-ambassador there because he'd been there seven or eight years.

Q: Seven or eight years. It must have driven Tom Pickering wild.

HARRISON: Yes, although Pickering never would have admitted it, but I'm sure it did. It was just bad form for Lewis. Lewis never cared much about what people thought about his form, bad or good. At least he didn't by that stage of his career. So, I'd keep seeing him. He'd show up at something there and Lewis would be there. By the way, I was very -- I think it was two or three weeks after I got there, Lewis left -- so I never really suffered under the lash. I heard all the Lewis stories about chewing the scenery, but I never had that problem because I wasn't there long enough and he didn't care at that point, he was transitioning out. Good luck. Then Pickering came in and we began this very strange association which was no real association at all, kind of running my own little independent.

Q: Was there any, I'm not sure what the right word is, I won't say warmth, I mean, friendliness?

HARRISON: No, no, no warmth at all. He's doesn't have warmth. That's not one of his characteristics. He doesn't have a sense of humor. He's just this huge depository of information and energy. He is a phenomenon. I've never met anybody like him. He's kind of that he, when I would bring people in to brief him on whatever subject you care to name; people would come to the embassy and would want to brief you on this. It would never be more than three or four minutes before Pickering would be briefing them on whatever they were the experts on. He knew more than you. There was an old radio program, Doctor; no he was a comedian in the '40s and '50s who billed himself as the world's foremost authority. I always thought of Pickering that way. The world's foremost authority. He knows more about it than you. A lot of it he certainly did know more about it than me, but I had a lot of qualities, I was able, that's why I was there. I'd been promoted to the top of the list from 3 to 2 on the smallest list there had ever been and so you know, hey why don't you use me for something useful? He used me for nothing at all and I didn't even actually see him that much and he was off doing his own thing, which I didn't know about much of the time.

Q: Roger, I'm looking at the time. It's probably a good place to stop and I'll put at the end here as usual where we are. You're in Tel Aviv from '85 to '87?

HARRISON: Okay. Yes, '85 to '87 and I have talked about, I haven't talked about Lebanon yet, so we have to talk about Lebanon, what the Israelis were doing there because that was one thing that was in my portfolio. I don't think we've talked about the political situation very much as it unfolded, Shamir, the prime ministry, haven't talked about that; Ronnie Melow who was the deputy over there at the time and all of that stuff.

Q: I'd like to ask you about how you saw political influence from the Jewish lobby and other lobbies on our policy, our relations with our consular general in Jerusalem at that time and the nuclear developments there if that came up?

HARRISON: Yes, that was the period in which Vanunu was captured. If you knew of Vanunu that was, yes.

Q: And other things, but what you have talked about was how your relationship was with Tom Pickering; how you were essentially frozen out and all. I would like to talk about the embassy staff, how it fit in, was there an Israeli bias to it because in a way, now it's much more evident that you can be one side or the other, but in those days was there sympathy for the Palestinian cause.

HARRISON: I want to talk about Pollard, too because Pollard was on...

Q: Yes, the Jonathan Pollard spy case. Okay, so that's great. Talk a little bit about what happened in-between Rostow, the head of ACDA and Secretary of State Alexander Haig when he was in London.

Okay, this is the 10th of September, 2002. Roger going back a bit, do you want to talk a bit about Rostow and Haig?

HARRISON: Well, the incident there, we may have talked about it before in which the editors will have to do us both a favor of taking it out. The incident that I recall involved the editorial staff of the Economist magazine. Rostow was a frequent visitor to London. He was an Anglophile as many of the Republican Party stalwarts were in those days and probably are. Weinberger was another who was constantly thinking of excuses to come through London. I would be the control officer for Rostow who was head of ACDA at the time and ACDA the Arms Control Disarmament Agency, now disestablished was always a stepchild in the bureaucracy, had been established at the behest of Hubert Humphrey as an advocate for arms control within the administration, but as the case with many congressional initiatives to change the way the executive branch does business, it had miscarried. It turns out it is very difficult for legislation to control the way bureaucracy functions and there was no institutional interest in arms control other than the one the State Department always has to maintain good relations with allies and credibility internationally. ACDA ended up being simply another agency in government whose position on arms control and any other issues really depended on the ideological leanings of its director and conservative president acts to take an anti-arms control position. To maintain its independence, the legislation had left a very ambiguous relationship between the director of ACDA and the Secretary of State, to whom the director of ACDA was subordinate in some respects, and from whom he was independent in other respects. Secretaries of State always dislike that ambiguity and directors of ACDA usually made the most of it they could. If you had two strong personalities as Gene Rostow and Al Haig it was a formula for conflict, in fact they were constantly in conflict. Haig never quite being able to bring Rostow under control and Rostow never being able to make himself into the arbiter of arms control policy in the State Department that he would have liked to have been, since there were many other pretenders for that throne and because he really didn't have the bureaucratic position to do it. The incident that highlighted this for me was a visit by Rostow out of London in which we met, I as his control officer, at lunch with the editorial board of the Economist, very influential group of people since the Economist is probably the most influential news weekly in the world. During which Rostow did his best to convince the editorial board that Haig was insane and not just nuts in the normal bureaucratic sense as a lot of people are, but clinically insane. He did this by indirection. He didn't say that, but he talked about the medication that Haig had been taking since his bypass surgery which then had taken place a couple of years before and how unpredictable Haig had become because of it. The word that I remember -- the sentence that he used which I thought was at once a nice stiletto and good example of hypocrisy of his presentation -- was "his friends don't recognize Al." Then he gave a lot of examples of Haig ricocheting off the furniture, which I guess Haig in fact, was doing. They weren't necessarily untrue stories, but the fact that the director of ACDA would try to convince the editors of the Economist that the Secretary of State was not responsible for his own actions I thought was an incredible thing. As a young naive, Foreign Service Officer, not so young then, I guess I was 40, I went back to the embassy and talked about this with Ed Streater who was the DCM, with a canny old history here and he said we ought to report that in back channel to Haig, which we did. If there were any consequences I never heard of them and Haig at any rate was not long for his job because he was heartily detested by the White House staff and not a likeable guy in general. I think he'd been more effective in that rigid hierarchical military structure than he was in the looser bureaucratic structure that he came into. He had tried to form the bureaucracy so that in foreign policy terms it was responsible to him at the beginning of the Reagan administration.

Q: He used the term he was the "vicar of foreign policy."

HARRISON: He was and he tried to organize the national security system so that it funneled through him taking what had been Kissinger's role in the Nixon administration, but it turned out that it couldn't be done from outside the White House anymore. There were simply too many pretenders to power and too many agencies who felt they had equities in the foreign policy arena to allow State to play that role. In fact, I noticed that presidents have stopped even paying lip service to the notion that the State Department Secretary of State is the leading voice of foreign policy, it is certainly not true in this administration, but practically I don't think will ever be true again. In fact I think it's a relatively weak bureaucratic position now so that even someone like Powell who comes with a constituency and a great deal of savvy and knowledge I think is disadvantaged by being at State especially vis-à-vis national security advisor. If you were in that job it would be a much different world than it's going to be. But, we were on Israel and there was a list of things there.

Q: Well, you were mentioning Shamir.

HARRISON: Well, this was a period of a divided government. It was the transition government, the election result had been more or less an even split between Likud and Labour and so the coalition, grand coalition, had been formed a couple of years before, '83, I believe by the provisions of which the head of the Labour Party, Shimon Peres would be prime minister until midway in the five year term of government at which point he would cede that office to Shamir who was head of Likud, and so they would do a kind of peaceful switch with Peres moving to the foreign ministry as foreign minister in the Shamir government with Rabin at the defense ministry for both. So, it was an odd kind of situation. The politics of the process from Washington's point of view was that the peace process was more benefited when Peres was in office because he was more flexible on land for peace and in dealing with the Palestinians, whereas as Shamir was seen as having no flexibility at all on those issues which proved to be true. In the first two and a half years of this government, the focus was on intrigues to keep Peres in office, that is he would break the government before it's two and a half year transition point and go to elections which legally and constitutionally in Israel you could do. He was the Prime Minister so he could dissolve the government and then call for elections. His interest was in positioning himself so that that would be politically acceptable to the country since it would also be going back on his agreement with Shamir and not a step easily taken. Tom Pickering was interested in the peace process prospering. He also saw Peres as a much more flexible partner on these issues than Shamir was and, therefore, was interested in devising with Peres a peace proposal which would be attractive domestically, but unacceptable to the Likud, the notion being that that would be an acceptable basis to break the government to call elections on grounds which would be beneficial to Peres and by that means to pave the way to a settlement with the Palestinians. Seems a little naive now 14 years later as we struggle with these same issues. That was the focus of the political battle. At the same time, the economy in Israel was in bad shape, so there were other bases on which Peres was being judged by the electorate, but this was the major point of political exchange I think between the embassy and between Washington, the focus of Washington policy. It could not be done openly since that would alienate the Israeli electorate aside from being inappropriate for the American ambassador or for the American government to be conspiring with one party to disadvantage the other in Israel, never something they could openly do and probably had it been openly done, it would have backfired. There was still a sense that this would be a good outcome. Peres who was also trying to achieve this kind of proposal, therefore, consulted closely with Pickering through this period and eventually came up with an idea which he put to Washington. This is now three or four months before the point at which the transition would have to take place to see if he could get Washington's approval and that was occasion for great debate in Washington and I think by the way, I'm being anachronistic here because actually that debate came to a head in Washington after the transition had taken place between Peres and Shamir. By the time that that proposal was put to Washington it was an attempt of Peres to break the government with Shamir as Prime Minister rather than prevent the transition. The parties in fact, in the end that was a damp squib, that went forward as agreed -- the transition. Then Peres as foreign minister, began working on his proposal: the idea again being that he could present this to the parliament it would be reason for the government to dissolve and go to the country. Labour would win and Peres would be back. This is now '87 and the period I was talking about was late '85. I'm sorry, go ahead.

Q: Did you find yourself pulled into this by, I mean, by indirection in talking to political leaders and all that?

HARRISON: Oh, no, not really. Pickering was running this out of his vest pocket. This was throughout this period. He certainly didn't solicit my advice about it or keep me informed about what he was doing. But you know, you hang around the embassy and you see and hear things and you can kind of put two and two together. At the same time, Dan Kurtzer who was working for me as one of the political officers there, and is now the ambassador in Israel, had very good relations with key members of Peres's staff, so he was involved in the process more than I as political counselor was. He had been there when I'd showed up. Dan was a man of great qualities, not just expertise in the region, but keen analytical ability and intelligence. So, not someone that I would have thought would have been taken off that portfolio, even if anyone had agreed I should do that. So, it was not really the main thing I did.

The other initiative in those days was to do something on the aid legislation for Israel, which had been frozen. I had worked on this at the White House at the previous incarnation between their civilian and military aid. This had been pegged at $3.2 billion at that point for oh, I guess for seven or eight years after a lot of to-ing and fro-ing about this in the Ford administration. The Israelis were, because their economy was doing very poorly, very eager to get that age level up and because their weapon systems that they wanted then to purchase were increasing in price and so they would lobby to get their aid appropriation increased, but at the same time the economy in our country, this was the first couple or three years of Reagan was not doing well. Inflation and unemployment were up; budget deficits were skyrocketing, so the notion of increasing foreign aid -- never popular domestically -- would have been even less popular. By the way, I think the case that foreign aid, no matter for whom, is never popular domestically. Israelis don't get an exemption from that once it becomes a public issue. An effort was made to keep it from becoming a public issue and yet increase it and the idea was, which I think was Pickering's idea, he certainly promoted it was to index Israeli aid to inflation. Running about 6% or 7% a year by which Israeli aid would go up every year by whatever inflation index I guess we measured our inflation by denominated in dollars which would have meant over the 15 intervening years, probably doubling that aid request. Pickering was working on the finance committee the Senate side who was a firm supporter of Israel, but what scuppered that idea was that Pollard -- in driving up to the driveway of the Israeli Embassy: Jonathan Pollard, naval intelligence analyst who in fact was being run by Israeli intelligence and had I guess transferred truckloads of classified information. This goes back to an old dispute with Israel about how much intelligence we were willing to make available to them. They always felt that we were being too restrictive on intelligence.

Pollard was about to be arrested, got wind of that and packed his wife in the car and went over to the Israeli Embassy seeking asylum. Well, the Israelis were not about to bite. Eventually the Secret Service came and collected him from the Israeli Embassy and he was put in jail where he remains, thank God, to this day. There was much speculation Clinton might be provoked to pardon him.

Q: Yes, well when Clinton left office there was thought that he might pardon him, but he didn't.

HARRISON: No, the intelligence community has always been extremely opposed to that. When Mark Rich was a relatively uncontroversial pardon compared to what Pollard had been at least among the professional intelligence community.

Q: Was it apparent at that time, I heard Seymour Hersh on the radio once saying this was obviously some years later, but on the Pollard case that Pollard had been tasked, he was a naval, he was working for naval intelligence and he had been tasked by the Israeli handlers to supply up to the minute information on American nuclear submarines, the ones with the missiles on it which could have been of absolutely no interest to the Israelis whatsoever, but of great interest to the Soviets. The theory being that the Israelis were taking this information, peddling it to the Soviets in order to get more goons out of Russia or something like that. Did that come up?

HARRISON: I heard the story. I don't have any reason to think it's true, but it was certainly true that they were beginning to work on the immigration of Soviet Jews at that point -- it didn't begin in earnest in '88 and '89 which is the timeframe, which is a couple of years after Pollard. Whether that played, I certainly wouldn't put it past them to do that, but I don't have any reason to know that they did. Anyway, what Pollard pretty much scuppered was that inflation index idea, because the Israelis were in high odor there for a while. It cost them a lot of money. I mean, if they had gotten that through then that would have been several billion dollars on their aid bill that they would not have gotten or it would have been very difficult that they'd been inflationist off there.

I was going to talk a little bit about Lebanon. One of the portfolios I did have was Lebanon. Oriel Brawny was the coordinator for Lebanon. I would go see him and he would speak elliptically.

Q: He was the Israeli coordinator?

HARRISON: Yes, the Israeli coordinator. At that time the Israelis had their security zone in southern Lebanon this always to the incident of the '82 invasion of Lebanon where the Israelis ended up in Beirut-- after assuring us that they had no such intentions -- with the notion that they were going to put a Maronite Christian government and by that means would pacify Lebanon and albeit to pacify the northern border. A completely antic idea, which got a couple of people, killed in Lebanon for collaborating with them. I think it showed how completely ignorant they were of the politics of their neighbors which I think is something, although they are also supremely confident in their ability to analyze what's going on next door, so their disasters never daunted their confidence in that regard. By '85 when I arrived that Lebanese adventure had resolved into a strip in Southern Lebanon called the security zone where Israel had some troops together with something called the Southern Lebanese Army under a general named Lahad who is now I'm sure in Paris or somewhere. He used to spend a lot of time there at the time. A local militia, villagers from that area who were out of sympathy with the people in Beirut anyway and had ethnic differences and they created this enclave in which they were taking casualties at a relatively steady rate. Brawny was in charge of that and, in general, of the Lebanese policy. I would go talk to him and I became convinced early on that they were going to have to stay in that security zone forever because -- in fact they just left under Barak a couple of years ago -- because of the fact that the answerability of any politician who decided to withdraw if they were then deterioration in security of the Northern areas of Israel because of that withdrawal, whoever withdrew would have a heavy price to pay. It was potentially a lot heavier than the price politically of losing three or four or five soldiers a month up there in ambushes and land mines and so forth. It seemed to me that that situation would continue and it did for a long time although the casualty count mounted and in the end it was absolutely in vain. They achieved nothing in particular and a couple of years ago the Israelis were finally ready to admit it and withdrew giving rise to then this what they called the Hezbollah. The Hezbollah claimed that they had forced this withdrawal and it showed that the Israelis could be forced to make political concessions and therefore was the support for the suicide bombing campaign and bringing pain to bear. There has been sufficient pain in that case and therefore argued you could create sufficient pain in other cases to give you the same result. It had a kind of a dual negative impact on Israel at first by this long accretion of casualties over the years, and then by encouraging their enemies with the misconception that force would be a useful tool against them. Therefore, it was all together a disastrous policy, as the initial force in Lebanon had been disastrous and became the founding event of the Hezbollah movement which is now such a problem for them. A fair going case from beginning to end of miscalculations, stupidity, mendacity and all the other human vices that one can imagine. There was not much actually happening in that area. I was basically monitoring that situation. The Israelis had given up by that point any notion that they could mix successfully in Lebanese politics and had ceded to the Syrians surety in Lebanon, but were very careful about maintaining the military borders of that sovereignty. There were informal agreements brokered by us between the Syrians and the Israelis about where Syrian forces could be stationed and in what form in Lebanon. We would be the intermediaries when the Syrians would push against those limits. We would come in and talk to Rabin. This was always with Pickering and me as note taker and Pickering, Rabin would tell us where the Syrians had violated this informal agreement and that the Israelis would have to destroy those installations and then we would transmit this to Washington. It would go out to Damascus and a demarche would be made and those installations would be abandoned, plowed up, but others would be somewhere else. They were constantly dicing like that with the Syrians and also in the air. The Syrian MIGs defense of the Israeli airplanes over Southern Lebanon taking threatening maneuvers and then breaking off and so forth. There was a miscalculation in '85 resulting in a shoot down of three of the Syrian MIGs. Both sides were interested in keeping that from escalating. There was a lot of fulmination from the Damascus, but no particular consequence. There was I think a lock-on of Syrian radar on some Israeli airplanes and they shot the Syrians down, but it was already evident. There had been an air war at the time of the original invasion of Lebanon between the Syrians and the Israelis. The Syrians had lost 110 aircraft I think to two Israeli losses, some ratio like that. It was already fairly clear that the Syrians did not have a credible air force to contest the Israeli air force. Assad knew that as well as anyone and also had begun to see by the mid-'80s that the Soviets were no longer going to be a reliable resupplier of his losses. They were already insisting on cash on the barrelhead and, of course, soon thereafter the communists were going to disappear altogether on their own. It's one thing to lose an airplane, but somebody else is going to replace it, if it costs $25 million especially if you have this crack brained economic system as the Syrians had then and have now. All in all, that kind of maneuvering went on, but it never seriously threatened to escalate into war. By then as well the Egyptian peace treaty was institutionalized, there was not going to be a two front war for the Israelis, and the Syrians had known all along that they had no chance in any one front contest. Indeed they had no chance in a two front contest either. It was a question of maintaining a certain tension by not allowing that to escalate. Both Assad and Rabin knew each other and had been dealing with other for a long time by proxy, of course, but were similar in the very jaundiced views they took of humanity. They were both realists. I think there was a kind of grudging respect on both sides that and also an understanding that Rabin would do what he said he would do and had the capability of doing it. He's not a man you could bluff. Rabin I think understanding that essentially Assad was going to exercise a restraining influence on Syrian ambitions in the region even though the Israelis had by then incorporated the Golan Heights into Israel and that was something never accepted by Syria that there was no practical possibility the Syrians were going to try to retake that by force as long as Israel remained vigilant and determined to keep it. That was going to be status quo and indeed it was, but the Syrians could bring pressure to bear on the Israelis in Lebanon by supporting those elements in Lebanese society that could attack the Israelis from the northern border and also in the security zone. Rabin was always intent on having an address for the attacks on Israel. It had its origin in Lebanon and so his determination was to make Assad the address -- the Syrians would be responsible for it ultimately and, therefore, since he realized the Syrians could have a restraining influence if they wished to have on what was happening in Lebanon. I think generally a foreign policy principle is that it is more difficult to hold the proxy responsible and there are diplomatic inhibitions against doing, not the least of which is that you can't go attacking the masses all the time or at all. That takes a large commitment force and a large commitment of international diplomatic credit as well and you can't do that for pinpricks, which is what these were. So, as long as it stayed an irritant, but didn't escalate beyond that, the outside could be relatively sure that the Israelis could not massively move against him. They would, by the way, mobilize the tanks every so often and huff and puff around. Assad knew he could keep that situation from escalating from shooting the odd Lebanese when he had to which of course, he was perfectly willing to do.

Q: Did we have any stand on this— what do you call it— the protective zone, were we telling the Israelis at least to get out or were we winking at them?

HARRISON: We were winking at them. We accepted the necessity of the security zone and at the same time our position was for the unified sovereignty of the Lebanese government over all its international territories, so we played both sides of that street, but we were in the same position really as the Israelis I mean you could not urge a withdrawal if we could not also do something about insuring the security in Israel would be guaranteed, and we couldn't do that so nobody was about to get on their case about the security zone.

Q: What about Jerusalem, and the West Bank and how about the Gaza Strip? What were your views on them?

HARRISON: Well, you asked first about the relationship between the embassy and the consulate in Jerusalem in those days, which was interesting. Actually they weren't bad. They had been awful in the period before that when Brandon Grove had been consul general in Jerusalem and Sam Lewis was ambassador down in Tel Aviv. Both men of massive ego. Theoretically, the Jerusalem consulate is subordinate to the embassy in Tel Aviv, but in fact it has always been the de facto embassy to the Palestinians and the consul general in Jerusalem prospers by having good relations with the Palestinian authorities of various sorts. In those days of course, the PLO was verboten but there were all sorts of quasi PLO people you could meet and representing their interests in this interagency battle. The embassy had no interest in that at all. There was a natural friction between the consulate and the embassy, which exacerbated because Grove and Lewis were not best of friends. But Wat Cluverius had come in to be consul general and he was much less assertive of the consul general's prerogatives than Brandon Grove had been. Meanwhile, Pickering was much less interested in subordinating everything Jerusalem did to the embassy than Sam Lewis had been. Although Pickering certainly took the peace process and all those issues for himself, although with Cluverius' input. I think Wat always found he had a role to play there and so in our time, in my time after '85, the relationships were good. Doug Kean was the number two guy there and later was my DCM in Amman and had very good relations with the Palestinian community. The embassy did not have good relations with the Palestinian community because it was concentrated in that consular district and there was a division of labor there. Gaza, on the other hand, was in our bailiwick. We had a Gaza officer, not a very good one in my time. He didn't go down there much. I never could quite figure out what he did, but finding out about Gaza was not among the things that he did and so we didn't have as good coverage as we should have even with Gaza. That relationship was okay. Your sympathies tend to lie in the Foreign Service with those who are your clients, certainly it works out like that.

Q: Where you stand is where you sit as they say?

HARRISON: Yes, so it was natural that if you were in Jerusalem to see the justice of the Palestinian cause in sharper relief than Washington did or the embassy did in Tel Aviv. My view was always that, and is still, that people who can discern a moral superiority of one side of an issue or the other have a finer moral compass than I do and that anyone who thought that the bullshit quotient was higher on one side than the other had a finer bullshit protector than mine, that we ought to be very skeptical about both sides and ought to realize that our interests were separable from the interests of either, but that I don't think has been the prevailing opinion in our government. Since then it certainly is not.

Q: Did you find the embassy staff, I'm particularly thinking of the officers, with their biases there or not?

HARRISON: No, none that I ever saw. I mean, you know, it really always was in the days before political correctness that Jews assigned to Tel Aviv would have a natural sympathy for Israel and one focus of that on the Arab side was Dan Kurtzer who has been ever since. The accusations as he has become increasingly responsible that this is someone who would be biased toward the Israeli point of view. I never saw any hint of that and I had the highest respect for him. I always felt that his analysis was always based on U.S. interests.

Q: What was his job?

HARRISON: He was political officer, was he a second secretary then, he may have been whose portfolio included the peace process. Joe Sullivan who later is ambassador now in Namibia I think was my deputy and his portfolio was the Knesset internal political scene. I had a labor officer guy who did the defense portfolio. We had I think six or seven people. It was a big section and of course, a lot of interest in Washington in what was going on and we reported it. That's one thing about Israel, you always knew what was going on. There were no more secrets in Israel than there are in Washington. Fewer if anything -- very active press, voluble politicians.

Q: Well, I've talked to political officers there and you can tell they had fun. I mean because they could talk to people as opposed on the Arab side where you never really got beyond a certain veil.

HARRISON: That's right. On the Arab side, you could talk to everybody, but they all had the same opinion. There was no purpose in talking to everybody. Talk to one guy and go sit by the pool. In Israel there were as many opinions as there were people to express them. In fact I've always found that the debate about Israeli policy toward the Palestinians is much more honest and lively in Israel than in Washington, including now. They were nothing, nothing was hidden. The whole thing was just an open book. It was like being a surgeon with all the organs exposed, you know, you didn't have to guess at anything. It was about as far from my experience 20 years before in Warsaw as it's possible to imagine. It is for a political officer, it's a good place, it's very fraught, everything is fraught, you know, all issues are a crisis. Everyone's a news junkie. There's always news. A lot of exaggeration in the media, a lot of the newspapers means a lot of funny stories, so a part of what we did -- the real from the phony. But I thought there were some standards you could use to understand Israeli politics which gave you some compass through this morass and one of them was the understanding that it was a brokerage system, again much like our system. That it was a system that abhorred political outcomes which were a zero sum, in which one side contesting something achieved all of its goals and the other side achieved none of its goals. That would always be the way that the issues were framed, as absolutes and there would be a huge rhetorical battle. This still goes on between the one position and the other and then it would reach a crisis very quickly in a day or two as the rhetoric escalated and finally someone would accuse somebody else of a blood libel which seemed to be the signal for people to sit down and begin parceling out the goods very carefully. I always thought the beginning resembled the civil war and the ending resembled the negotiation between General Motors and the United Auto Workers okay, a little of this and a little of that. You get this and I get that, we all live to fight another day. So once you understand not to take the rhetoric seriously, but to understand the positioning that was going on and the system was essentially moderate in the sense that it did not want absolutist outcomes and was designed to avoid them and in that way to accommodate these very wide differences of opinion within that society. It all made sense and I think that's still true.

Q: How about the religious parties, I would think they would be the most difficult ones to reach compromises with?

HARRISON: No, I don't think necessarily. I mean they had things that they wanted from the political system as well and they had things to barter for what they wanted. Knesset votes were one of the things that they had, but also, support for the peace process since the ultra orthodox, I think this has changed a little bit in the meantime, but the ultra orthodox believed that the Israeli state is illegitimate since the Messiah has not returned and, therefore, in those days took no particular strong view of land for peace. The land was not important to the ultra orthodox point of view and, therefore, could be counted on from other coalitions on the peace process as long as you could accommodate on the social economic side. What they wanted for example, was exemption for their yeshiva students from military service and that was granted. They wanted a lot of money to build yeshivas and that was granted. There were all sorts of things from the political system, which they were lining up to receive. Where the rubber met the road; and that could be accommodated, too, because it was just a question of money. Where the rubber met the road was in the socially restrictive laws that they wanted to pass to impose a kind of orthodox social system on society which had a large secular component to it and a militantly secular component. So, there were areas in which they was societal agreement. For example, Shabbat should be respected, no commercial activity during Shabbat, there were people who wanted to engage in it.

Q: Shabbat, we call the Sabbath?

HARRISON: Shabbat, sundown on Friday and Saturday. But there was a general societal consensus that that could be accommodated. That in hotel restaurants and the kosher restaurants they all had to be kosher and that you have to have dairy restaurants and meat restaurants so that the mixing of dairy and meat which is contrary to kashrut, so religious loss would not take place. There would be some area of basic consensus, but there were a lot of areas of friction on the edges of that consensus. For example, if the religious parties tried to push these social restrictions then the secular community would push back. One dispute when I was there was about the starting time for soccer matches after the ending of Shabbat, sundown on Saturday. If the soccer match began too soon after sundown the orthodox argued it would be necessary for people to travel before Shabbat ended in order to be there when the football game began, but in summer to meet the orthodox requirements you would have had to begin those soccer matches at 9:30 or 10:00 at night and the next day was a work day. There was a great pushback against that. In those cases the orthodox would come out in their thousands to demonstrate and the police would wade in and just beat the crap out of them. This would all be broadcast on television and it was a part of the kind of social contract, that is the vicarious whacking of the orthodox community publicly broadcast was a great source of satisfaction to the secular community and social stability in the countries as a whole. I always thought that the whacking which was usually from the mounted policemen and with great enthusiasm, so there was kind of public ritual about this which was stabilizing I thought. Already then and even more now you could see the division of the community into smaller and smaller political groupings which unfortunately was encouraged by the same political system which had been devised to accommodate the different interests, and that is proportional representation. It was a great system in that you have this brokerage system, proportional representation. While having that impact it also encourages even further division of opinion and the multiplications of the parties and therefore, increases the need to do what proportion representation does. That has continued, so the society is divided to a point where the second Intifada began, that the existence of the state was being called into question and indeed, I think, one could argue that Arafat and the radicals who have been the savior of the Israeli political system which really is now -- aside from being unified in opposition to the suicide bombers and so forth, it gets pretty difficult to identify where any consensus at all exists in that country -- but they're absolved from the necessity of having to find one by what is currently going on. I think and it is often said even then that if the Arabs really wanted to destroy Israel they'd make peace and made the Israelis to contest with each other about the future of their state and its Jewishness. There are some contradictions there that were evident already, well been evident for 50 years.

Q: Did you ever see the change with the Soviet Jews coming in at that point?

HARRISON: After my time when they began to come in in numbers, that was seen by Israel as demographically a saving grace because it postponed the date at which the Arab population was going to exceed the Jewish population in most territories claimed by Israel. Probably put it back 10 or 15 years, a million Soviet Jews or so. Of course, not all Jews, as is well documented now. A lot of people who the orthodox had not considered Jewish, which was then another source of conflict in Israel because the orthodox claimed the right to decide who was Jewish and who was not. A lot of the Soviet immigrants didn't meet the qualification, but politically it was impossible to disqualify them. A lot of reasons not to do that. That was another source of societal division. Now, as I understand it, what's happened, of course, the assimilation of Soviet Jews is a great achievement. Luckily it coincided with economic upsurge which coincided with the beginning of the peace process in the early 1990s after the Baker mission. Israel began to grow very rapidly and that made all the difference in terms of assimilating Soviet Jews. Now course the army is the great engine of assimilation in Israel since everyone has to join up except for the orthodox. Universal draft still in effect so everyone goes and everyone has their unit, units are mixed and as in this country, a great social solidifier. The Soviet Jews then still identify themselves as a group, still have grievances they want to address. Sharansky is the head of the party who came in my time. Israel is the kind of forerunner of this immigration in '86 I guess he came. He becomes a considerable political figure in his own right. What happened -- of course, the expectation was then that the Soviet Jews would be in play politically and could tip the balance between the major parties. What actually happened was that the Soviet Jews consulted their own interests and became another party altogether and the two major parties in the mid '80s had begun to erode anyway and it went off to the point where Labor is on the point of extinction altogether and the Likud is no longer a party so much as it is a coalition of convenience, which, when they'd lose power, would break up into constituent elements again. All those trends that were already evident in the mid '80s continue.

Q: What about -- the term gets loose, you know you call it the Jewish lobby and the Israeli lobby, in the United States. At the time you were there, did this effect your reporting, did it affect the operation of the embassy?

HARRISON: No, it had no effect on us and they tried to have no effect on us. They concentrated on Washington and indeed were independent of the Israeli government, especially the Peres government who disapproved of some of the things they did, would have been more open to. The major benchmark for the Jewish lobby in the '80s was arms sales to the Arabs, and that's an issue on which the Israeli government was much more relaxed than the lobby was. The lobby proved its worth to its own members by working against those sales and so the lobby interest really was to keep the donations coming in. You had to show to the American Jewish audience who were supporting you financially that you were effective. One way to do that was to block the arms sales and that was a very clear issue and a politically doable thing and the administrations in this country, Democratic and Republican alike were always running uphill to ease that pressure. Gradually making inroads because they had formidable allies who had formed the companies that wanted to sell those things. Congressmen representing the districts in which those companies were -- increasingly more and more of them. It gradually made progress. But that was where the fault line was; it was certainly not true in Tel Aviv. The Israeli lobby in Washington didn't care what the embassy was reporting, didn't care much what the State Department felt. It cared what Congress thought, and there it could be very active and so we never saw that influence at all. The influence on Israeli politics came from Jewish organizations, which were separate from AIPAC (American Israeli Public Affairs Committee), which is the major Israeli lobbying group. There is the organization of presidents of major Jewish organizations, in those days a moderating influence on Israeli policy. They would come -- these various rabbis and men of import and they were, these were substantial men politically and economically in our community and also in the Israeli community because great contributors and organizers of contributors to the state of Israel. They had a hearing and they had a moderating influence. They tended to be inclined toward Labor in those days and would come sometimes threaten to withhold their contributions under certain circumstances. I think that's all gone now. The American Jewish community has been radicalized too many times, so the restraining influence that they used to exercise is no longer there.

Q: I'm looking at it, could Israel really exist without American financial support, both government and?

HARRISON: Yes. The Arabs tend to exaggerate the impact of that. It used to be a lot greater than it is. It has stayed relatively stable. It's drifted up a little bit, but the Israeli economy in the '90s has increased six fold. It was a period of very rapid; not six fold in real terms, but tripled. At the time it increased with a very rapid growth and the Israelis have become a $100 billion economy, in which of all the contributions externally are probably 5%. Also, they have a self-standing arms industry, although they certainly get better stuff from us. If all of that were to be removed they would still be miles ahead of any combination of their neighbors. You know, there would be some belt tightening and economic austerity, but there would also be some unification in Israeli society if that money went away. The place that it could have been effective was in forcing them to make some hard choices on settlement activity and that's what Bush used. The housing guarantees for settlement as a way of forcing the Israelis to look at their settlement policy and toward peace with the Palestinians. But that pressure is gone now, too. There is no pressure at all on the settlement policy, which is kind of the original sin of Israel now. They have a much stronger political, ethical and security position without the settlements, but it's the tail that now wags the dog in Israel. We're not in that business anymore. I think we'll have to come back into it at sometime.

Q: The current Washington commentators that say that the end game is kind of known to those and that is the Israeli settlements will have to be dissolved and a part of Jerusalem will have to be, you'd given some status and the Palestinians will have a little hunk of Jerusalem and that's the way you're going to end up.

HARRISON: Yes, I think that's Camp David, too. Someone said we have the light, now we have to dig the tunnel. Yes, that's where it's going to end up. Everybody knows what the political outcome has to be and the issue is whether the political will exist to get there and what role we will play in bringing it about. There was some thought early this year that we would do it, as the price of Arab support against Iraq. But that has been successfully countered politically in Washington among those who count, by the argument that regime in Iraq will have a special impact on the peace process. That argument has been turned around and right now all is on hold with regard to that dispute waiting for the other deck to be shuffled by this invasion of Iraq.

Q: While you were there, were nuclear developments an issue at all?

HARRISON: No, they weren't. The only issue was Vanunu, the man who was at the Israeli nuclear site at Dimona who leaked the information details about the Israeli nuclear program. He was picked up in a honey trap, he had a woman, he fell for it, they arrested him and brought him back to Israel where he still sits in jail, but meanwhile had given details of that program. It had been an open secret for some time, but the Israelis had never admitted to it. Washington had no hope of affecting the program already decided so as far as I know, so that issue, except for that brief flurry of activity, didn't come up. The other area in which it played was in nonproliferation efforts, which we were hot to strengthen in those days because of the argument that we had a double standard. We were trying to keep the Arabs from acquiring what the Israelis already had, which weakened our nonproliferation efforts, but in my view, our efforts in that regard would have been useless in any case. Certain Arab countries were determined to get nuclear weapons and they were going to do whatever is necessary to achieve that whether or not we entered the fray. Others saw that as a bad option, the Egyptians didn't pursue it for example, the Iraqis did, the Iranians -- not an Arab country -- were pursuing it from the beginning of Khomeini's time, so we weren't going to effect that outcome.

Q: Were you there when the Israelis bombed a nuclear facility?

HARRISON: No, no, that was four years before I arrived, something they'd take great pride in now. In fact, interesting that the Iraqis just took the newsmen to that facility the other day to show them that it was still destroyed and keeping with Saddam's inherent maladroitness in public relations he takes these newsmen to show them how the Israelis [operate] by preempting and preventing nuclear weapons. I just don't understand who was advising him on that issue, but it's true. Saddam is an opponent right out of central casting. If you could choose a guy to move against in the world, you couldn't construct him from identikit any better than Saddam has been constructed by nature or nurture. He suits our every purpose. He does and seems to, whenever he seems to be gaining in some way in public relations terms, he's careful to screw up something so that he loses that again. Really a complete moron in many ways, but obviously crafty in terms of making power ruthless, but in international terms that guy is such a bozo as is hard to imagine.

Q: Is there anything else we should discuss about Israel?

HARRISON: Well, let me see, were there any other big issues of the day? There's always the usual coming and going. You know the Pickering thing with the London agreement as it was called, was trying to put a piece of the puzzle under the Knesset which would bring Peres back to power, that failed. Washington wouldn't support it. The personality of Shamir, Shamir had been the guy in the Irgun who had told all the secrets. Of course, they didn't want to write any down, this was back in the Palestinian mandate days.

Q: He was a killer, wasn't he? In a sense?

HARRISON: No, he wasn't a killer actually he was the guy back at the home office who ...

Q: Maybe the Stalin who kept the records?

HARRISON: He was never a front line guy. He was the recordkeeping guy. He was told all the secrets. He knew where everybody was, who all the operatives were, where all the bodies were buried because everyone trusted Shamir to keep his mouth shut and that is absolutely true. Shamir never said an unguarded word in my hearing and I'm sure outside my hearing to Pickering. He was absolutely a man who could talk without communicating. He was not susceptible to flattery. He was not susceptible to argument or anything else, blandishment. He was entirely a self-contained individual who knew what he thought and had the wrong sense if he'd ever any doubts, put them aside. I doubt he ever had any. He knew what you wanted and was determined that you wouldn't see it and he was actually comfortable with that. A remarkable guy in many ways. Certainly Pickering, who is a remarkable man in his own right, could never make a dent. Pickering always counted on being able to overwhelm you with eloquence of fact and argument and force of personality. He was kind of the LBJ of the State Department and that tide rolled in and there stood Shamir and the tide broke against the rock and that was it. I watched a lot of that interchange. There was that, the Intifada was still in the future while I was there and it would have amazed us to think in our time that it was going to take place because our assumption was that the Palestinian community was quiescent. The joke that I used to make about it was that as opposed to the radicals elsewhere in the Arab world, the Palestinians always wanted to know, when you wanted them to make a suicide mission, what the getaway plan was. The occupation had been cheap for the Israelis for a long time. They could do it with very few people. There was the occasional demonstration and the occasional Palestinian would be shot, but the economic cost to Israel was small, the personal offering was small and there was no reason to rethink in the summer of '87 when I left that that would change. Certainly we didn't see it coming. Nobody at the embassy and nobody in the intelligence community predicted that this would happen, which is true by the way of almost all the major departures of international relations of which I'm aware. The analytical community in Washington is not equipped to deal with revolutionary departures. They're equipped to deal with nuance in situations, which we all accept as immutable. That was certainly true of the Soviet Union; it was true of each of the individual countries.

Q: There's also a straight-line projection.

HARRISON: Yes, it's the safest thing to project and therefore, the thing the bureaucracy is most likely to project and all the individuals occasionally can be heard as crying in the wilderness but they're almost universally ignored because their supervisors are not willing to take the risks that would be necessary to promote a point of view which depends on things tomorrow being absolutely different than they were today. There is a 90% chance you look foolish and only 10% chance you look prescient and that's a no brainer in the bureaucracy.

LEON WEINTRAUB
Israel Analyst, Bureau of Intelligence and Research
Washington, DC (1986-1988)

Mr. Weintraub was born and raised in New York City, educated at Hunter College, Brooklyn College and the Universities of Pittsburgh and Wisconsin. After service in Liberia with the Peace Corps he entered government service, first with the Navy Department and then with the State Department Foreign Service. His service in Washington and abroad involved him with a variety of countries and issues including African Affairs, International Organizations, Narcotics and Peace-Keeping operations in Africa. His foreign posts were Bogotá, Tel Aviv, Lagos, Quito and Geneva. Mr. Weintraub was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: Today is the 31st of August, 2005. Leon, 1986, you're at INR as analyst for Israel. Is that right?

WEINTRAUB: That's correct.

Q: And you're doing that from '86 to when?

WEINTRAUB: It was a two-year Washington assignment, '86 to '88.

Q: Okay. I would imagine that this would be an interesting but difficult assignment because you're probably swamped in intelligence from the Israelis and from ourselves and all. Anyway, I mean, how did you find, sort of the intelligence side of dealing with Israel?

WEINTRAUB: Well, I think I certainly gained a great deal of respect for the intelligence function and the importance of the intelligence function as an aid to the policymakers in the department. I had expected it to be a bit more- let me try to describe it - maybe I expected it to be a bit more academic, a bit more leisurely than it turned out to be. The word research in there, in INR, that kind of implied for me "research," what I knew coming from an academic background. This was, you know, you take time to do some research and then you put out a product.

In fact, like much of the other bureaus in the department, we were driven by a daily agenda that I discovered once I was there - this was the secretary's "briefing book," if you will, and every day we were potentially liable, depending on, of course, what information was available in the intelligence stream, we were potentially liable to have one of the items for the secretary's briefing book. These were the so-called "front of the book" items, the shorter items that may be only be two paragraphs long, but just picked up on some intelligence, and this is what it may mean relative to this particular issue. And then perhaps once a week, maybe for a country like Israel, you might be expected to do what was called at that time an item for the "back of the book." This would be a longer piece, maybe a page-and-a-half to two pages maximum, a more in-depth piece trying to pull together either some items that had been reported about separately in the past or a new area that was worth that much of the secretary's reading time for him or her to be briefed on.

So it was not the leisurely, feet-up-on-the-desk thinking about things that I had obviously erroneously thought it might be. There were deadlines and you were driven to meet them just as you would be in a regional bureau, for example. But, obviously, we were supposed to think about not so much the immediate policy-driven agenda but, instead, what else was out there that could affect the policy. Obviously I enjoyed the interaction with the regional bureau. This was an assignment that was involved, of course, with the Israel affairs desk. The ambassador in Israel at the time was Tom Pickering, who I had worked with earlier when he was ambassador in Nigeria when I was stationed there. He made a few trips to Washington during this time and I had a chance to meet with him for some policy discussions and intelligence discussion, and it's always nice to meet again with a senior official like that.

I found that in certain cases INR, like other bureaucracies, tends to be driven occasionally by anniversaries. Occasionally, you find out it's 10 years since this or 15 years since that, and it's worth while to write about what has happened since that time. So, for example, in my case 1987 would have been 20 years since the Israeli occupation of the West Bank since the Six Day War. In fact, this is when the initial, the first of the so-called "Intifadas" began in the territories, in the West Bank and Gaza. So there's always a lot to do when you're dealing with a country like Israel that has such a high profile in the department, in the White House, and in the Congress. Almost anything of significance will be accepted as a submission for the secretary's briefing book, assuming it's well written, of course. There's an editorial staff in the front office of INR to go over these materials. Overall, it was a valuable experience for me to get the other side of the policymaking apparatus, to get to the intelligence side, and to work with people in the same office who were doing similar work on Jordan, on Syria. The office had the whole Middle East as our portfolio to draw upon. So I really learned in very specific ways to appreciate the value, the function of intelligence, the reason and why it needs to be kept independent from the policymaking apparatus in the department.

And I personally felt a certain amount of satisfaction and appreciation when, in more recent years, talking about the weapons of mass destruction in Iraq or what would happen after the invasion of Iraq, apparently the consensus in the media at least was that the little, small State Department INR analysis far outclassed the work of the CIA and the military intelligence machines. There were the questions of was there WMD (weapons of mass destruction) in Iraq and what would the situation be like after we overthrew the government? And I think it confirmed my suspicion that it's less a matter of sophisticated equipment - although, obviously you need some sophisticated apparatus, and technical capabilities, and whatever else may be available to the intelligence community - but above all you need smart people, intelligent people who know a subject or an area very well, and who know how to put the pieces together. And I think that the consensus seemed to speak very well of the comparatively very, very small INR capacity in State compared to other intelligence agencies in the government.

Q: What sort of impression did you get of what you were getting from the CIA?

WEINTRAUB: Well, basically the materials we got- obviously we got the raw materials and then we eventually got to compare our own work with what was being produced as well by the CIA. And, you know, they had an ability to come up with no doubt a more polished, a more slick-looking product, they had the equipment to do the fancy graphics and the maps and the satellite photos and everything else in their production, and we were using our Wang word processors at the time. And you know, none of us at State had the opportunity to learn anything really sophisticated on this machinery, and the CIA finished products -- by the very nature of the way they looked -- seemed to carry, I would imagine, a certain amount of "respectability" with them. I could just imagine that when all these competing products were received at the White House, or at the different levels of the Cabinet, that one would have to really look beneath the surface of the finished product and would have to have a feel for what a society was like to really appreciate the value that was inherent in the State work.

I'm not sure that -- you know, it's hard to remember now, it was 19 years ago, I can't remember ever seeing an analysis by the agency that did little more than push forward something incrementally. I can't remember seeing a product that went against the so-called conventional wisdom, that would make me say, wow, this is really interesting, another whole new way of looking at this. I thought it was seen to be somewhat what one would expect. Typically material, I thought, materials were over classified. I think that's a suspicion a lot of us in State have of what the agency does. And obviously, you know, they have a larger budget to take care of this kind of thing than we do. Overall, however, it was obviously helpful for us to read the work of others, and it expanded our horizons, but I can't say I remember being particularly impressed by any of what I saw.

Q: Well, you mentioned the first Intifada. What was happening on your watch, '86 to '88? I mean, including that but what developments were happening? Who was in power?

WEINTRAUB: I'm trying to remember. I think it was Likud. I think it was Yitzhak Shamir in the Likud party. And, obviously, there were always stories about fighting between the Labor and Likud parties. There were always stories about the tensions within Israeli society between the orthodox and the more secular groups, competitions for budgetary resources, for influence over the government. We had the so-called, kind of a peace process with Egypt; there was an exchange of ambassadors for some time. There was always a lot happening. I can't remember particular events, other than the Intifada and the "uprising," if you will, of the Palestinians. I think the major political action -- as far as the occupation of Lebanon, when Israeli troops went all the way up to Beirut -- had already receded by that time; that happened about the time I was leaving Israel.

Q: About '81, '82.

WEINTRAUB: Right, when I was leaving Israel. It was 1982 when the Israelis went in full strength into Lebanon, and this period of mine in INR was four years later. So by this time the evacuation of the Palestinians from Beirut and Lebanon had occurred. The PLO, Yasser Arafat had gone into exile, into, I think it was Tunisia or Morocco.

Q: Tunisia.

WEINTRAUB: It was Tunisia, yes. And, I can't say, other than, again, the Palestinian uprising, that there's any one thing that stands out such as when we were stationed there, when we were on the ground: the assassination of Sadat, the Israeli bombing of the Iraqi nuclear reactor, the invasion of Lebanon. I mean, these were major activities.

Q: Well, how were we seeing the first Intifada? I never could pronounce that correctly.

WEINTRAUB: In-ti-fah-dah.

Q: Intifada. Because as I recall, this one was one the Israelis had a hard time dealing with since it was mainly kids throwing rocks and so you had soldiers shooting maybe rubber bullets or something but armed soldiers shooting at kids with rocks, which is not so much as the whole Arab-Israeli thing as based on public relations and perceptions in the world and this certainly was not a good time for the Israelis.

WEINTRAUB: It was difficult to handle and I don't know, looking back in retrospect -- I'm not sure if that phenomenon marked the start, maybe, or the turning point, in how much of the rest of the world viewed Israel. Israel at the time of the Six Day War was kind of lauded around the world as the hero, as the David against the Goliath, and its influence, if you will, its ability to conduct international relations, you know, might have reached a peak. And I'm not sure if that whole scene of, as you say, soldiers confronting youngsters throwing rocks was the start of a point that eventually reached the point where we are now.

At least in the United States and much of Europe, I think, the left wing often respected Israel against the so-called reactionary Arab states around it, and now that's almost reversed. Typically now in a lot of academic circles and the American left wing Israel is reviled as the occupier, if you will, and the Palestinians are now seen as the underdog. And maybe that was, now that you mention it, maybe that was the start of the public perception changing. Also in the first OPEC oil embargo after the 1973 Yom Kippur war I have no doubt that the ability of OPEC to amass this wealth, to spread resources through a lot of Third World countries had significant results -- no doubt they were able to influence at least the sub-Saharan African countries that then broke relations with Israel. Israel had a lot of pretty good friends in sub-Saharan Africa; they had a lot of agricultural experts there. I mean, they could make the desert bloom, so to speak, and they had a lot of aid programs and agricultural support programs. Not a great deal in the amount of money they could spend. Of course, they were not a wealthy country. But they had a lot of valuable expertise, which was really appreciated in a lot of the sub-Saharan African countries. I think after the Yom Kippur War, OPEC and Arab wealth and influence was just able to undercut that. Arabs sending a lot of money for development projects and I wouldn't be surprised if a lot of that was conditioned on the governments shutting down the operations of these Israeli embassies.

Q: Well, do you recall seeing, particularly the Palestinian cause, as being a much -- you know, at one point it wasn't considered a big deal. I mean a big threat. But do you recall, were we looking at this now from another perspective of saying we've really got to do something about this because the population is growing and the settlement process is not going to help the situation at all?

WEINTRAUB: Well, I think I remember we were starting to get concerned when the settlements on the West Bank were approaching 100,000 people. I think now the latest figures I've seen are 250,000 on the West Bank. I think there was a consensus among most of the analysts I was working with on the Middle East that this probably would be unable to be sustained indefinitely, that Israel needs to come to terms with the Palestinians. I think there was a recognition of the demographics of the situation as well, that this was working against Israel. There was another analyst who wrote particularly about Jordan and the Palestinians. We often did work together or discussed things together. I think we were aware of this happening but it was hard to know where the dynamics were going. I think Jordan had not- maybe it did- I'm trying to think when Jordan under King Hussein had officially renounced his claim to the West Bank -- a claim which was not recognized by anyone in the world, not even the other Arab countries. Of course, once that happened then the West Bank was truly up for grabs. There was a time within Israel when one of the solutions would be to negotiate with Hussein of Jordan and work out some situation on the West Bank. Once that was off the table I think we were aware of it, that this was an issue that Israel would have to address. I can't recall though, enough of the materials that I wrote about.

ARTHUR H. HUGHES
Deputy Chief of Mission
Tel Aviv (1986-1989)

Ambassador Hughes was born in Nebraska and attended the University of Nebraska in 1961. He entered the Foreign Service in 1965 and served in Germany, Venezuela, Denmark, The Netherlands, Israel, and Yemen. In addition, he held several posts within the State Department.

Q: In '86?

HUGHES: In '86. He went there, and I went to Israel.

Q: That was a new area of the world for you, it looks to me. You had spent a lot of time in Europe and Venezuela, but the Middle East was new area, new terrain.

HUGHES: That's true.

Q: Who was Ambassador there at the time?

HUGHES: Tom Pickering was Ambassador, and Arnie Raphel was the principal deputy in NEA

[Bureau of Near East Affairs]. This was basically an idea that Arnie had. I said that I had met him earlier on when I worked on the seventh floor. I had actually met him earlier but got to know him only then. It was something that Arnie basically engineered. I had met Tom Pickering before, didn't know him very well. He was a Deputy in PM when I worked for Bill Macomber, and we'd come into contact on various things, not very intensely or profoundly. Well, you're right, that just changed the whole direction of my career. I was blessed with having a couple of options. I had always wanted to go back to the Germanic world, and I was asked to go to be DCM in Vienna, which was very attractive in some ways, particularly since the East-West conflict was still on. Vienna had some real significance in that area, not in the bilateral sense, but to go to Europe on one of the major political issues of our time and to work for someone of the stature of Tom Pickering was just too much to even hope for, too great an opportunity to pass up.

Q: The DCM in Vienna really wouldn't have been all that different from being in Copenhagen and The Hague - the size of the embassy and some of the same issues.

HUGHES: Not at all.

Q: It wasn't an opportunity to get into something new and challenging.

HUGHES: That's right.

Q: So, this was 1986. What was the situation? This was a little bit after the Lebanon period, but it was before the peace process got underway, before Madrid certainly.

HUGHES: The peace process had been in the doldrums. There was a national unity government in Israel. I arrived there in August of '86, and this was toward the end of the first half of the national unity government. The agreement had been reached in '84 between Likud and Maraf, labor, to form a national unity government, the first two years under the prime ministership of Shimon Perez and the second two years under Yitzhak Shamir. I arrived in August of '86, and in November '86 the national unity government transition took place.

Q: So Shamir became the Prime Minister?

HUGHES: Shamir became the Prime Minister. But the political process in Israel was pretty much frozen as part of the peace process. The major issue really domestically in Israel up through a little bit earlier that summer was the economy and hyperinflation almost, and new policies which brought inflation into control. There had been daily devaluations of the Israel economy, and they went to the shekel, of course. But the peace process was basically frozen. There was a lot of thinking going on about it, and a little bit of probing behind the scenes and so forth, but nothing was happening. I can remember in August two things specifically in my first days - well, three things. First of all, Tom Pickering and Alice Pickering came out to the airport to meet Pat and me personally, which I thought was a wonderful thing for them to do. And then Tom said, "Well, I've got to go to Jerusalem," so he had another car take him, so in his car Alice took Pat and me to our temporary quarters, which was a wonderful gesture, wonderful way to be welcomed to a post. It was not only a human thing, but I also think it was a very nice signal to the rest of the staff that Tom Pickering said, "This is my guy."

Q: "And I think enough of him and his position to make this gesture," and all the others saw that.

HUGHES: Let me digress right here. Something happened in Venezuela that was very important. The ambassador, who was Maurice Sprandow, a career guy, a wonderful guy - we were on the Maracaibo. There was a lot of contempt, I'm sorry to say, for Maracaibo and Puerto La Cruz in the Embassy in Caracas.

Q: Contempt of the American consulate in those two places.

HUGHES: Yes, well, these are kind of second rate places, and probably the people that are assigned there weren't good enough to get assigned to embassies. I'm sorry to say that. I still feel this, you know, 25 years later or whatever it is. So I would go to Caracas occasionally with the bag, with the pouch, of course. We rotated. And I would have a hard time getting anyone to talk to me. I would go to the front office in the embassy. I'd go see the DCM. We'd talk about what was going on and I'd buy Western staples at the commissary. And I always tried to make sure I saw the Ambassador personally. Well, if the Ambassador was there at all, he would say, "Art, have you got time for a cup of coffee?" And I'd say, "Yes, Sir," and we would go down to the cafeteria of the Embassy, Ambassador Birnbaum and Vice Consul Hughes or Vice Consul the other guy, and sitting there with the Ambassador having a cup of coffee, and I thought that was tremendous, that was tremendous. Anyway, I digressed a little bit, but the second thing Tom said, "I'm going on home leave in three weeks. Learn fast." And the third thing, he said, "Anytime I go up to Jerusalem up the hill, I want you to go with me so I can introduce you to all these people I'm dealing with." So we did, and Tom had a habit which, I must say, drove some people in the embassy crazy, because sometimes it left them little work to do. When he'd go to Jerusalem, he'd see everybody from the Prime Minister, the Second Deputy Assistant, U.S. Desk Officer in the Foreign Ministry, and take care of all the business.

Q: In very capable fashion.

HUGHES: Well, with his intelligence, his energy, his imagination, his creativity - all of that, you know. But that was one of the issues that I found I had to deal with. Then what are the roles of all the other guys? And to try to insure that the others understood that this was not a vote against them, that there was real work to be done, that there was plenty of serious work for everyone, but how to deal with that.

Q: At least he wasn't secretive.

HUGHES: On, no, not at all.

Q: He was very open that he was doing these things, because that's a problem sometimes, when you don't know what the front office, what the Ambassador is doing.

HUGHES: Well, he had another great habit that I learned from him, and I carried it on when I became Chief of Mission later on, and that was he would do cables, and he would say, "Art, read them through, and if they make sense, go ahead and send them. If you need to fix a few things, fine. If there's anything really consequential, let's talk about it." But he never sent anything out without saying somebody else ought to get it. And I did the same thing later on when I was a DAS at Defense, Chief of Mission and a DAS at State. I'd say to somebody else, "Take a look at this. This is what I've done."

Q: Look at it seriously. Don't just...

HUGHES: What Tom Pickering was doing was not pridefulness or anything. It was, "Hey, these are opportunities. I can get some stuff done." But anyway that became something that I had to deal with as a DCM and make sure that the rest of the mission also understood that. So we went up and we called on then Foreign Minister before the rotation, and Shamir. And I can remember getting a little bit of business. The RP was just arriving and the Deputy and I'll be gone. I hope you'll treat him as you treat me in my absence. We got into an argument about whether or not Israel would ever go to a peace conference. For Shamir it was a matter of Likud policy never to go to a conference, because they would be overwhelmed, they would be outmaneuvered, they would be outnumbered - all kinds of reasons they did not want to go to conferences. I said, "You're going to need to go. It's the only way things are going to work." "Well, I don't know." We went back and forth. Tom was about a foot and a half taller than Shamir. They were sitting there, Tom and Shamir sitting on the edge of the chair in the Foreign Minister's office. The first meeting I went with Tom and Dick Murphy, representative in Israel for the peace process. That was the result of Secretary Schultz's urgings to Murphy to somehow try to do something more with the peace process. They had walked [and] went down to Tel Aviv. So we went up to see Prime Minister Shimon Perez, who had just been over to Cairo to see Mubarak, President of Egypt. So Tom was leaving the next morning for home, so we went up there, and the Prime Minister was feeling very good. He was very responsive and, of course, one of his objects in life was to try to figure out how to break the national unity government to go to elections before the transition when he would go back to being Foreign Minister. He was trying to figure out ways to use these meetings with Mubarak and what the Egyptians had said to break the NUG, the National Unity Government. That was his objective. So he started talking about these meetings. I don't know if you've ever met Shimon Perez, but he's very loquacious, very articulate.

Q: I've read his book.

HUGHES: Very smart. Goes off to all kinds of literary illusions and refers to people and so forth. I'm a notetaker, right. I've been in the country about three weeks. I've done a lot of reading and studying, but there were some personalities I didn't know, and he would name somebody and sometimes he'd use their first name and sometimes their last name. I wasn't sure if he was talking about one person or two people. So the next morning Tom said, "Okay, write this up. Wat Cluverius will help you, and then get it off. I'm going off on a five a.m. flight, or a four a.m. flight, but go to the house. I'll be doing some work. I'll leave you some notes in the safe. So I go to the house and want to get in the safe. The first thing on the top of that was a note said, "Arnie Raphel called. You've been promoted. Congratulations." But I thought that was also really very nice of Tom. So anyway I worked on that cable. Unfortunately Wat, of course, knew all the people and helped me put it into shape to send it in.

Q: Let me understand a little bit more what his position was. He had been Counsel General in Jerusalem. I know he was there in '84, because I visited him. And this is now '86. What was his position?

HUGHES: Well, how I understand it is that Secretary Schultz had told Dick Murphy that somehow we needed to beef up something regarding the peace process.

Q: Murphy, then the Assistant Secretary.

HUGHES: He was the Assistant Secretary. In talking with Tom, Tom is like a brigade in himself, so it wasn't really necessary to do anything. I seem to recall at some point there was even a mention that maybe Dick Murphy should go and set up camp in Israel to be the Secretary's personal representative to the peace process, which would have been an awful idea. So Murphy managed this request by Secretary Schultz by saying, "Okay, I've got a good guy who's been Ambassador after he's been a DAS in NEA, he's been consul general in Jerusalem, he understands both sides of the issues, he's persona gratis to both sides, so we'll have to put him in Israel, but he will be my representative to the peace process."

Q: And he came under Pickering?

HUGHES: He came under Dick Murphy.

Q: But he lived in Tel Aviv?

HUGHES: Lived in Tel Aviv, had an office in the embassy, and he was also a good friend of Tom's and a good friend of mine, and so it all worked quite well, partially because of the personalities involved, I guess.

Q: Would he travel in the region? Would he see the Palestinians?

HUGHES: See the Palestinians and see the Israelis, and try to just see where there was any overlap.

Q: How long did he do that?

HUGHES: He retired, I think, in '88 to become the Director General of the MFO [Multinational Force and Observers].

Q: Maybe two years or so?

HUGHES: It must have been. I think he had just come down in '86 before I got there.

Q: And he's still in Rome?

HUGHES: Still in Rome.

Q: I heard him speak recently.

HUGHES: Yes.

Q: Yes, it was last fall. You talked about relationships with the embassy in Venezuela years earlier. The relationship between the embassy and Consulate General in Jerusalem is unique.

HUGHES: Jerusalem is one of only two Consuls General, the other in Hong Kong, with direct reporting authority to the capitol, to Washington. But, again, I think from my perspective there were very good relations, both personal relations and policy relations, because we all understood what the issues were, we all understood what the principles were and what we were trying to achieve, and what the limits were on us.

Q: As you said, the Ambassador, you, other members of the embassy staff from Tel Aviv were in Jerusalem leading the government people all the time.

HUGHES: Constantly. We'd often go by the Consulate General to talk about what was going on or to use their secure telephone or between meetings to go and write up notes in a secure environment. Also, somebody from the Consulate General is always welcome to join the big staff meeting.

Q: Otherwise the people in the Consulate General, the Consul General and the staff, were primarily concerned with the people in Jerusalem as opposed to the government as such and certainly the people on the West Bank at that time. Now this was before there was any kind of Palestinian authority.

HUGHES: The division of labor with respect to the Israeli occupation of the territories was the Consulate General in Jerusalem was responsible for the contacts reported on the West Bank. We were responsible for contacts reporting to Gaza, which took me to Gaza fairly frequently. An aside there: I'd like very much to have Gazan and Israeli politicians both right and left at dinner, breaking bread at the same table. That was interesting, our discussions.

Q: And you were able to do that?

HUGHES: I was able to do that, yes. I don't think there was any kind of strain or misunderstanding in the relationship between the Consulate General and the Embassy, and I think part of the function of what we were trying to do and the fact that good people tried to go to Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, so the Bureau in staffing requests usually has the pick of the best.

Q: You had a very good staff in the Embassy at Tel Aviv in the time you were there. Who was the Consul General in Jerusalem?

HUGHES: Phil Wilcox during the second two years, and Maury Draper the first.

Q: Any other major issues involving U.S. and Israel at the time?

HUGHES: Well, maybe two things. My main substantive area of responsibility as the DCM there was working with the defense establishment. So I worked directly with then Defense Minister Rabin and Dr. Melman and we became personal friends. He was very gracious to me when I left and had events that were hosted for us. And also his people in connection with the occupation. We dealt with Israelis. The Consulate General did not deal with the Israeli government. I dealt with them also in the context of the opposition of the West Bank as well as Gaza.

Q: On issues including settlement, for example?

HUGHES: Settlements, human rights.

Q: From the Israeli government point of view, all those issues?

HUGHES: All those issues, intelligence, military intelligence. I worked with the Prime Minister as a terrorism advisor along with the station on some of those issues. But that was very intense, and rewarding in some ways. I think we were able collectively to make some progress on some things. One specific project was getting the Jordanian banks reopened in the West Bank, a lot of their work. I was in a sense a go-between between the Israelis and the Jordanians on this particular issue. I went over to Jordan and talked with the central bank and finance minister and prime minister about traditions and personalities and so forth. But the whole question of human rights and the occupation and so forth was very depressing. On the mission management side, there were a lot of problems, understaffed on the American side, long-term problems.

Q: In the embassy?

HUGHES: In the embassy at that time. Major fraud. The biggest disappointment there was, I think, the fact that visa fraud was more broadly known among the Israeli employees in the mission, who took no action to report it.

Q: This is a continuation of a oral history interview with Arthur H. Hughes. Today is the 6th of May 1998. We're conducting this at the National Foreign Affairs Training Center. When we finished last time, Art, I think we were talking about your assignment from 1986 to '89 as Deputy Chief of Mission in Tel Aviv. That was obviously a big job with management, security, lots of issues, political, peace process, and the relations in the defense area, trade. I guess I would suggest you first maybe remind us who was the Ambassador at that time and what were your most difficult challenges and main responsibilities?

HUGHES: Well, thanks, Ray. The ambassador was Tom Pickering, and he had been there a year before I arrived. The other senior officer there was Wat Cluverius, who had been assigned there by Assistant Secretary Dick Murphy, to be his personal representative for the peace process. Wat had been in Jerusalem as the Consul General, and at the urging of Secretary Schultz to Murphy to become more actively engaged in the peace process, he asked Cluverius to come down. So it was Tom Pickering and Wat Cluverius supposedly reporting directly to Murphy, although they had a very close and good relationship, and then myself. I had been in Europe as DCM in Copenhagen and The Netherlands, and actually the Tel Aviv job was worked out between Arnie Rafel and Tom Pickering. I knew Tom only slightly from some times in the Department. It was clear to Tom, of course, and to Arnie that I had no deep background in the peace process or the Middle East. I had never served in the Middle East. And I think he was looking to me mainly initially to do the traditional inside job of DCM. But I remember when I arrived, he and Mrs. Pickering, Alice Pickering, very graciously met Pat and me at the airport and picked us up on the tarmac from the airplane, and he said, "Learn fast. We're going on home leave in four weeks."

Q: Learn about everything.

HUGHES: Learn about everything. He was great in making sure that I was involved in everything including, between my arrival and when he left on home leave four weeks later, his almost daily trips to Jerusalem included me, to introduce and present me to all the players, all the Israeli players, in which he always said, "Art's my new deputy, and when I'm gone, he acts for me, acts for the U.S. government." Those meetings included people like the Prime Minister, the Foreign Minister, Defense Minister, and everyone else in Israel with whom he was meeting between those times. When Tom did go, Wat was wonderful in also giving me advice. We talked as actually colleagues, and so I think I was able to "learn fast" as Tom had enjoined me to do. But the issues were across the board, of course. The peace process was pretty moribund at that point. As usual, Tom Pickering was chipping away, working at all angles, pushing wherever he could. Secretary Schultz at that point, I think, had decided that there was not much progress being made, and so he was not very active himself at that point. But we had, as you indicated, the full gamut, defense relationships, the question of security, terrorism, economic relationships. We had the free trade agreement with the Israelis, who were very slow in implementing parts that would have opened up their market to us. This continues a bit to this present day. Of course, they had a very protectionist economy, a very statist economy, which they still do to a very large extent. And managing the mission, which is a very large mission with a lot of agencies and a lot of technicalities regarding the occupied territories, regarding who we dealt with in various places and who we did not deal with, where did we not go, and that took a good bit of coordination and keeping track of what was going on and, if necessary, making sure that the various arcanery were in fact followed. We had a good staff and leadership by Tom Pickering, of course. I think the embassy was a darn good embassy.

Q: The staff, I see on a note from you, was about 390 at that time. I assume that's American staff, or American and Israeli?

HUGHES: American and Israeli, yes.

Q: One of the other coordination aspects of the DCM in Tel Aviv is dealing, I suppose, with the Consulate in Jerusalem. Do you want to say anything about that?

HUGHES: Well, that was really a coordination role and a collegial kind of arrangement, because, as you know, there are, I think, still just two independent Consulates General in the U.S. Foreign Service, Hong Kong and Jerusalem, so Jerusalem reported directly back to Washington, although we had excellent relations. Almost always when I would go to Jerusalem, and very frequently when Tom would go to Jerusalem, we would stop by the Consulate General to consult with the Consul General and other people there, and actually we'd use their secure phones and use their place to do up notes and write cables while we were waiting between meetings with the Israeli authorities in Jerusalem. There were differences of perspective, of course, to a certain extent borne by with whom one was talking and the kind of information one was getting, but there was no disagreement about the independence of the Consulate General and the basic policy lines that the U.S. government was trying to pursue at that point.

Q: It was certainly always clearly understood by the Consul General and others in the Consulate General in Jerusalem that, where it came to dealing with the government of Israel, which happened to be located in Jerusalem, in most respects that it would be the embassy, the Ambassador, your responsibility.

HUGHES: That's right, and during most of the time I was there, Phil Wilcox was the Consul General, who was a close personal friend and also an excellent man.

Q: How about the whole issue - you mentioned security and terrorism. Was that a particular problem in this period of '86 to '89 for you?

HUGHES: No, it wasn't, as a matter of fact. It was something that we always had to keep on top of and keep ahead of. A major concern we had was the location of the building, which is fronted between two main streets along the shoreline in downtown Tel Aviv. Of course, it was just a few years before that - I don't remember the exact year - when the Palestinian terrorists blew up a truckload of bottled gas near the American Embassy in Kuwait City. Every time I would see a truckload of bottled gas - they'd come down the street literally ten feet from the front of the embassy - I couldn't help but having a certain thought in my mind. But, of course, as history showed, nothing did happen. The Israelis understood that it was very important that nothing happened, not only for us but in their cities. Of course, later on there were a number of terrorist incidents but not directed at U.S. facilities.

Q: It's a location that is very cramped, very tight, but also, as you say, between two main streets which, unlike Pennsylvania Avenue at the White House, could not be closed off.

HUGHES: No, the way Tel Aviv was laid out, to close off either one of those streets would have just caused chaos in Tel Aviv. Let me maybe just interject here. One of the specific and special responsibilities of the DCM there had been to maintain the relationships with the Ministry of Defense. That was really a fascinating part of my portfolio, because it ranged from Ministry of Defense activities in the occupied territories to Defense relationships including various kinds of cooperation, materiel, training, coordination, joint exercises, and all those things, and that brought me into almost everyday contact with people in the Defense Ministry and probably every few days with Defense Minister Rabin. That was a particular, interesting, and maybe important and also enjoyable and very stimulating part of my job there.

Q: Was the Defense Ministry also in Jerusalem?

HUGHES: No, Tel Aviv. When the state of Israel was declared, the government initially was in Tel Aviv, of course.

Q: Which is why the Embassy was there?

HUGHES: And that's one of the reasons why the Embassy is still there. When the government moved to Jerusalem, the Defense Ministry, for national defense reasons mainly, was kept in Tel Aviv. Other ministries have offices in Tel Aviv, and at least in the days when I was there, there were periodic, if not Cabinet meetings, intergovernmental intradepartmental meetings in Tel Aviv almost every week, the Prime Minister and the members of the Cabinet.

Q: In terms of your liaison responsibility with the Ministry of Defense, you also, of course, had to work with the Defense attaché and other U.S. military people who were part of the mission.

HUGHES: Right, and we were blessed almost entirely with really first-rate people, excellent people who were very sophisticated, very well trained and just good, solid people as human beings as well. So that was an enjoyable part of my responsibilities and, I'd say to a very large extent, a successful one largely because of the kind of people that we had in the Defense attaché and the individual attaché offices.

Q: Did you anticipate that Rabin would become the prime minister? You probably did.

HUGHES: Well, he had been Prime Minister before, of course. The problem was that Shimon Perez controlled the party apparatus and Rabin, given his personality and his own inclinations, had a lot of contempt for party pacts, apparatchiks, and he did not suffer fools gladly. He wore his feelings on his sleeve to a certain extent, I think, as everybody knows. So it was really problematic at that point whether or not he would ever become prime minister again. As it turned out - just to jump ahead to make a comment - the main reason that he did become Prime Minister was that people in the Labor Party were able to push through a rule change to require a party primary for their prime ministerial candidate, and in that primary Rabin did win, then became the candidate and won. In the general election the reason he won was because the body politic of Israel trusted him with the future and the security of Israel, whereas ironically the public did not trust Shimon Perez with the security of the country. They saw him as being a little bit too intellectual, a little bit too remote from certain realities. I say it's ironic because Shimon Perez was the father of the Israeli military industry and even of their nuclear program when he was Director General of the Ministry of Defense early on during the days of Israel. So in spite of all the history of having done those things for the security of Israel, he simply wasn't trusted. Of course, he's got a perfect record of never winning an election. But to go back to your question, it was just a real unknown in that period.

Q: Was there already congressional and other pressure that the embassy ought to be in Jerusalem instead of Tel Aviv? That certainly has been the case over many years.

HUGHES: Yes, there was indeed, and it was successfully managed. I know that Tom Pickering spent a good bit of time on that before he went to Israel and then when he would go back on consultations to go to the Hill and talk with folks there and try to hold things off. Interestingly enough, we went through a period of trying to find a new location for the chancery in Tel Aviv. That was a task that Tom and Washington basically gave to me to manage and to be very active and involved in, and we spent maybe a year working with the Israeli government in trying to find a new location. The reason that it relates to your question about the Hill is a deal had been reached under which we would find locations in both Tel Aviv and Jerusalem for new buildings, and the new building in Jerusalem would be constructed so that it could become an embassy, a chancery, at the right time. That deal basically fell apart. My suspicion is that at the end of the day the Israelis decided they had no interest in following through because they showed us some awful properties in Tel Aviv. At one point I told a senior Israeli with whom I was on very friendly terms, I said, "Look, I don't think it's the job of the U.S. government to build an embassy to be a part of an urban renewal project in blighted areas of Tel Aviv." But at the end of the day, as I said, I think the Israelis decided that it wasn't in their political interest domestically to follow through. So finally a lot of money was spent on rehabing the building in downtown Tel Aviv, where it still is.

Q: Was there also a problem perhaps on possible location sites in Jerusalem?

HUGHES: No, in fact, I looked at property that was located in Jerusalem, and there was apparently clear title. There was a claim later on by some Palestinians that they still had title to the land, and frankly, since the deal fell apart, I lost track of what eventually happened to that. But my understanding at the time was that there was clear title to a quite attractive parcel in Jerusalem.

Q: In East Jerusalem?

HUGHES: No, my recollection is that it was kind of south central, southwest Jerusalem. I think it was a part of a British military camp originally.

Q: When did Tom Pickering leave? I think he left late in '88 maybe, early '89?

HUGHES: He left at the end of December of 1988. Let me come back and just mention the Intifada [uprising] before that, because the Intifada did change that political dynamic among the Palestinians on one hand and among the Israelis and the interaction between the two. Again, another point of irony was that the Intifada was totally accidental as it started, as a traffic accident down in Gaza in which some Palestinians were killed. It was clear it was a pure accident, but it sparked off local demonstrations, rage, and they continued on. Why it was important at the time was that what eventually happened was that the Israeli strategy of preemption and intimidation to create the psychology among the Palestinians that they were incapable of really acting on their own behalf, acting to have an impact on their own future, fell apart. That strategy fell apart, because events as they unfolded showed that the Israelis were not ten feet tall, that the Palestinians were not totally incapable of having an impact on their own future, and it caused some rethinking on both sides about how to proceed. It also had some very unfortunate consequences, of course, in the deaths that were occasioned and the new life it gave to splinter groups of Palestinian terrorists. But I think one can say that in overall terms of history it was a very important event and it maybe had a positive impact on the political dynamic because it caused people to rethink their strategies and their situations and resulted in movement in the peace process.

Q: At what point at the embassy did you all sort of see it that way? Obviously it must have taken a little while to realize that this was a significant change, and to what extent did it impact on embassy operations, activities, perspectives?

HUGHES: Well, in operations first, it made Gaza a little bit more difficult place to go. Coming back to the division of labor between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, the Embassy and the Consular General, the Consular General had responsibility for the West Bank with respect to aid programs, relations with the Palestinians. The Embassy had responsibility for Gaza for the same kinds of things, and, of course, the Embassy had responsibility for dealing with the Israeli government on all of the occupied territories. Initially nobody was sure what the impact was going to be. What did it mean? Was this another incident that was going to be tamped down and then go back to the business as usual before. But because of our contacts with the Israelis across the board and the IDF [Israeli Defense Forces], the MOD [Ministry of Defense] and private individuals, individual military people, and analysts on the Israeli side and also the Palestinian, I can't say, from this remove without having thought about it too much, exactly when, but it became clear that this was a different situation. One thing that sticks in my mind is - well, two things: one, because of my own age when I was there, I had a lot of private Israeli friends about my age whose children were just finishing high school and about to go into the IDF, and they began to talk among themselves about Gaza. When we'd spend time with them, go to dinner or lunch, play tennis, whatever, just in a normal friendly relationships, they'd talk about their concerns about their kids and the purposelessness and the worthlessness of occupying Gaza and the fear that their kids would be sent to Gaza for the occupation. They would rather have them go to Southern Lebanon or be in an elite unit up in the northern part of Israel as opposed to going to Gaza. Then as it went on, they also began to fear the change in the psychology. It was clear that Israelis were being put in a position of true occupiers and oppressors because of the way they had to deal with kids, not in an occasional incident as had been the case for many, many years, but in an ongoing day-to-day basis. I can remember one Israeli friend saying, "You know, it's not what we ought to be doing." And editorial writers started to write that Israelis should not be occupiers. We have been oppressed for centuries. Now we should not be put in a position of being the oppressors. One friend said to me, "I can imagine my son or daughter being down in Gaza and just simply losing an eye from the stones. For what?" There was all of that going on. Then I can remember talking to an Israeli major who was in Gaza, and he came back and he said, "One of the problems we have is that we cannot get any officers of quality to be willing to go to Gaza, so we take the bottom tier of officers, and that compounds the problem." You have people who are not as competent or capable on the one hand dealing with a difficult situation, so you get into over-reaction. Morale is down, so everybody is in a basic hair-trigger kind of psychology.

On the other hand, the Palestinians started taking heart. They also had contacts with certain Israelis. They could read the Israeli press. Everything is always in the Israeli press. There are no secrets in Israel, or maybe one or two. They started to take heart. How could they organize this? Because this happened by the people in Gaza, not by the leadership. So the leadership started to think, how can we take control of this and organize it or shape it into bigger political ends. This was all a gradual process, but it became clearer as days went by that this was a new situation. Plus, just to go back, there was one other point. Toward the end of the first term of the National Unity Government in the latter part of 1986 - the change-over took place on November 1 when Shimon Perez passed the baton to Yitzhak Shamir - Shimon Perez was trying to figure out ways to change the political dynamic in order to break the National Unity Government-enforced elections. Of course, Likud understood that and they were not going to have any of that, because they wanted their two leaders in office. So one of the things that Perez did was to try to work out deals, to see what he could do with President Mubarak of Egypt, but also to try new ideas.

One of the things obviously was Gaza first, which met with some degree of ridicule. Of course, this was way before the Intifada. Gaza first, Gaza first. Historically Israelis, Israel, the biblical Israel, had never really had ongoing control of Gaza, and so forth. This is not a part of the historic part of the land of Israel. We can give it up. Plus, it's nothing but problems. What do we gain by it? And there was a mixed reaction, but later on, of course, we know what has happened just in the last few years.

Q: You mentioned before that the Embassy had the responsibility for Gaza as opposed to the West Bank, Jerusalem. To what extent did you as DCM have contacts with the Palestinians before the Intifada, after the Intifada began? What difference did that make? Was that taking up much of your time, or how did you handle that aspect?

HUGHES: Well, I traveled to Gaza periodically. We also had two officers in the Embassy, one in the economic section to oversee all of the aid programs, because we had no aid people in Israeli-occupied territories. We did everything through NGOs [non-governmental organizations] and PVOs [private volunteer organizations], and then there was an officer in the political section who was responsible for Gaza. I would go down with them periodically. Ambassador Pickering went down occasionally as well. I would invite Gazans to the residence actually to attend receptions and dinners in which I would have people from Gaza together with Israelis, and that made for some very interesting conversation, needless to say. But I thought it was a chance to bring Israelis and Palestinians together in an environment that might be conducive to some thinking and some talk and just to get to know each other for perhaps future purposes, to raise the comfort level in dealing among certain people. I don't know to what extent it had any impact on later events. It's hard to tell. But it was important to go down to Gaza to show the presence, and then eventually before I left we were able to open a small storefront kind of office down there under the Economic Section.

Q: No flag?

HUGHES: Just a little storefront.

Q: At that time, though, Arafat and the leadership of the Palestinian Liberation Organization were still in Tunis. To what extent was there real leadership being shown by the Gazan Palestinians, and to the extent there was leadership being expressed in the occupied territories, was it primarily in Gaza as opposed to the West Bank?

HUGHES: No, it was in both places, and the names, which have become prominent now, as far as the insiders were prominent names there, but in Gaza probably the leadership wasn't as strong as it was on the West Bank, because there were other West Bankers and Jerusalemites. When we would go to Gaza, when I would go around and talk to people, for example, the head of the lawyers' association and other people, it was clear that these people were PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization]. There was absolutely no doubt about it. We knew it, but we'd never talk about it in those terms, because we were forbidden from dealing with the PLO, but these were local personages who had influence on the situation.

Of course, even then there was some difficulty, but not to the extent as later on, between the insiders and the outsiders. Of course, today this is one of the real grievances of the people on the inside, the Palestinians who had stayed in Palestine, stayed in the territories. When Yasser Arafat did come back, he brought people with him whom many Palestinians believed were second and third rate people and to the exclusion to a certain extent of people on the inside. But this reminds me to come to your question of a few moments ago. As I mentioned, the peace process was more at the beginning of my time. Secretary Schultz was not active, but he was actually present. As I understand it, Murphy had become more active, and that is why he's quavering about Tel Aviv as a way - if I can say this - to a certain extent to manage Secretary Schultz, because Murphy understood that if the Secretary of State was not going to be active, for the Assistant Secretary to be active had no particular purpose. Tom Pickering was actually indefatigable regarding trying new ideas, trying to move, trying to press, trying to move things ahead - just always a million ideas in his mind. Finally when Secretary Schultz did come to Israel a couple times toward the end of '88 or '89, I always thought of Tom Pickering as George Schultz's conscience on the peace process, because he would almost badger him about doing things, trying things. Schultz didn't like that very much frankly. Now, it's got to be said historically Schultz left a wonderful gift when he did depart office, and that was his actions that made the PLO a legitimate discussion partner. That was a tremendous breakthrough, a tremendous gift. But before that, he didn't like Tom's pushing, and I often thought that was one reason that Schultz insisted that Tom leave exactly on his third anniversary as ambassador to Israel. You asked when Pickering left. I remember when he left, because I was on leave in the States for Christmas, and I left Wisconsin on the 26th of December to arrive back in Israel the 27th of December to talk with Tom, to take him to the airport, accompany him to the airport on the 28th of December to leave, and later that day to meet Bill and Helen Brown, who were coming in as the new ambassador, who was a recess appointment, by the way.

Q: So you were not chargé for more than a moment.

HUGHES: Not on that occasion. But my point is I think that was Schultz's way of telling Pickering he hadn't appreciated this being badgered, and even though Schultz was leaving, the administration was changing, he insisted that Tom leave after three years.

Q: But he also went to New York?

HUGHES: Well, but that had not been arranged. But I was coming to that. Before I had gone on leave for Christmas, Tom was winding up things, and one of the things he liked to do was drive in the desert. He is an accomplished amateur archaeologist, and he was off in the Egyptian desert with the Army attaché and two four-wheel-drive vehicles out wandering around taking a look at things. So I as chargé got a call one day, "This is the office of Vice President George Bush. He'd like to speak to Ambassador Pickering," and I said, "Well, he's in the Egyptian desert. I'm Art Hughes. I'm the chargé. Can I help you with something?" He said, "No, no. The Vice President wants to speak with Ambassador Pickering. Can you find him?" I said, "Yes, it might take a little while, but we can track him down." So I called Jack Coby, who was the DCM in Cairo, and I said, "Can you find Tom?" He said, "Oh, yes, the Egyptian Army knows where he is." I said,

"Well, he should call this number." Well, it did take him a day and a half, I think. In my mind's eye I see Tom pulling up to a phone booth in the middle of the Egyptian desert and going in and dialing. But he did tell me that they were basically off in the boonies somewhere but did have a phone, an Egyptian Army phone, I guess. He did call, and the Vice President offered him a job in New York. From his experience in New York he thought more could be done, he wanted somebody who had energy and was bright and would like Tom to do the job.

Q: But this was after he was already committed to leaving?

HUGHES: He was already on his way out, right. So then they talked and agreed that Bush would notify him in a few days or a week definitively. At that point he was taking soundings with him. We happened to have CODEL [congressional delegation] in town, and there was a reception at the residence. The phone rang in the library, and I went in and picked it up, and it was the Vice President's office. So I went out and found Tom, who was mingling with his guests, of course, and I said, "Tom, there's a phone call." So he went in and it was the Vice President, who said, "I'd like you to do this job." So Tom came out, and I said, "Is it a go?" and he said, "Yes," and I said, "Do you mind if I make an announcement since it's official?" He said, "No," so I asked everybody's attention and I said, "I'd like to present to you the next American Ambassador Permanent Representative to the United Nations, Thomas R. Pickering," and people were just stunned for a moment and then everybody grinned and applauded and said, "Gosh, when did this happen?" He said, "Well, that was the phone call from Vice President Bush."

Q: You didn't scoop the White House on that announcement?"

HUGHES: Well, I don't know how Bush dealt with the White House. That was his. Washington deals with Washington.

Q: You mentioned that there was a congressional delegation visiting. Certainly probably more visitors, high level from the Executive Branch, Congress, go to Israel than anywhere else in the world. Was this a major dimension of your time there, or was it something that was fairly routine?

HUGHES: No, it was a major dimension. Not only the official CODELS but also the number of congressmen and senators who were invited privately by Israeli organizations. Israel very astutely organized over the years what they called study missions and study visits to Israel, basically to tell their story to American opinion makers and politicians. And they were very, very effective in it. We would almost always be invited by the Israeli sponsoring organization, which was usually a quasi-governmental organization, to attend a dinner or make a presentation or so forth, either at the embassy or at a hotel where they were meeting, and usually that task fell to me. And that was very interesting, also seeing the reaction of various American groups and hearing their questions and so forth. I thought it was important that we be very honest about the American commitment, the American support, and also the problems that we had with Israel on certain areas of human rights, the differences in our legal positions regarding the territories and so forth, and to be very comprehensive and very honest and very straightforward, but to give a comprehensive picture.

The fact that the Israeli organizations kept inviting us back, I guess, meant that they felt we were doing it in a fair way, and the questions that we got from many Americans, I think, also showed that some of the things that we said were new to them, were things that were not always covered in the American press or not covered in other briefings while they were in Israel. But, of course, there's no doubt about the American commitment, and that's where one always began. On official CODELS, you're right, an enormous number. I can't remember that a congressman or senator ever came to the embassy in Tel Aviv. They were always in Jerusalem. They had come down maybe to deal with the defense ministry, but I cannot remember that a single one ever came to the building. I take this back. There was one, who's now active in the Seeds of Peace, from Utah.

Q: Wayne Owens.

HUGHES: Wayne Owens.

Q: How about the President or Secretary of State? Did they come during this period?

HUGHES: Well, the Secretary of State did, but again, he never came to Tel Aviv. He was always in Jerusalem.

Q: Did you always drive back and forth between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem?

HUGHES: Oh, constantly. In fact, a couple of times I actually ate both lunch and dinner in the car on the way the same day.

Q: Back and forth.

HUGHES: I always carried my lunch because I never knew when I was going to have to go to Jerusalem, even if it was scheduled sometimes. I'm in the car for almost an hour. Why don't I use it? I'll take stuff to eat, and I'll eat lunch in the car, which was just a way to save time. Then, as I said, a couple times I actually ate two meals in the car.

Q: You never used to helicopter?

HUGHES: No, no. When there were visitors, if they were landing in Tel Aviv, or coming in at Ben Gurion, they may take a helicopter up to Jerusalem to the helipad by the Knesset or maybe to the MOD just as a time saver for a visitor. One of the interesting visitors we had was Senator Gore. He was one of the most serious and well prepared visitors that we ever had. He came alone, not as a part of a group. I happened to be chargé at the time, so I accompanied him to see Prime Minister Shamir and the foreign minister and others. That was the first time I had ever met him, and I must say I was really impressed with how serious, because frankly a lot of the visits were basically domestic politically oriented and were not very issue oriented at all.

Q: You also had many governors come, I suppose.

HUGHES: A few governors, yes, but they were usually a part of a private study group, so they were taken care of by the Israeli organizations. If we knew they were coming, we'd try to reach out and call them and say, "Would you like a special briefing? Come by." Usually their schedule was so full, they didn't. They just were included in the other briefings.

Q: Did the governor of Arkansas come while you were there?

HUGHES: No, no, unless he came as a part of a private group which was not announced to us, but I know that he did go to Israel as part of a study group, but I don't remember the dates. I remember just reading it later. One of the interesting asides on the domestic politics. I won't mention - well, I will. It was Gary Ackerman from New York. He came with his mother and his aunt. I happened to be chargé, so we went up. We arranged an appointment with the prime minister, Shamir, and so we went in to the prime minister's office and Congressman Ackerman said, "Mr. Prime Minister, I know you're very busy. I don't want to take much of your time, but I really feel honored and delighted to be here. Would you mind if we took a photograph?" He pulled a camera out of his pocket and handed it to me. So I took photographs, about three or four snapshots of the Ackermans and the prime minister, and then the Congressman said, "Mr. Prime Minister, I want to thank you very much for your time. It's been delightful. I know you're very busy, so thank you very much. I won't bother you any longer," and left. But he got mainly what he was there for. He got photographs of himself with the prime minister of Israel.

Q: By a semiprofessional photographer.

HUGHES: Actually Ackerman came back later too. And he's a serious guy. He knew the issues. He had certain well known views, but he was a serious guy, and I also testified before him later on the Foreign Relations Committee. He's, as I said, a worthy congressman.

Q: I think we're probably coming to the end on Tel Aviv, but is there anything you want to say about your period with Ambassador Brown and the beginning of the Bush Administration in '89?

HUGHES: Well, I was not very happy that Pickering was - his term was held to three years, let me put it that way. I thought it was unnecessary. It was clear there was a change of administration and so forth. But as it turned out, of course, Tom went off to New York, where he did great things including the Gulf War. And Bill Brown was a quite different personality and had a quite different kind of approach, but I also enjoyed working with him and I learned some things from him as well. So the seven months or so we were together - six and a half months, I guess - I found personally interesting and personally rewarding as well, and very useful. Bill, of course, had been DCM under the long reign of Sam Lewis, and so Bill had great familiarity with the players. In fact, we'd made arrangements for him right from his arrival to get in the car from the Ben Gurion airport and go to Jerusalem to present copies of his credentials to Misha Aarons, who was the foreign minister then. We had arranged the very next day for him to present his credentials to the president.

Q: Only in Israel would you do both those.

HUGHES: Well, they wanted an active ambassador, of course, and we knew everybody and everybody was accommodating. It was wonderful of them to be accommodating, and there was a mutual interest in getting going. But in the car on the way to Jerusalem Bill reminded me that the last time he had seen Misha Aarons was when Bill was chargé, and Aarons came to him to renounce his American citizenship so he could be appointed ambassador to the United States. All kinds of histories, all kinds of histories, all intertwined between ourselves and Israel.

Q: The interconnections are myriad. We're at the end of your time in Tel Aviv. Is there any sort of general reflection you want to make on the assignment or anything that we haven't covered, before we go on to your next assignment?

HUGHES: I think probably in many respects the most interesting part of my time there was watching up close and being a part of discussions with Israelis about how they grapple with really fundamental question that they're facing, which are existential questions, and talking with people across the whole range of political and philosophical thinking and even theological thinking about where they are, how they got there, and what do they do about the future. That was a real education for me not only on the facts of the matter but into human psychology. One can't help but be impressed with what they've done, be empathetic with their situation, and also very frustrated at times. People ask me often how I look back, what my assignment in Israel was like, and I say, "It was a total experience, a total experience in every way, emotionally, intellectually, physically, stresses and strains, inspirationally from enormous admiration on one hand to pure frustration and irritation on the other." But it was a great experience and great time.

Q: One of those existential issues certainly involves how they relate to their neighbors, the Palestinians and the West Bank, Gaza, and so on, but another relates to who is an Israeli.

HUGHES: Who is a Jew.

Q: Who is a Jew, the whole question of the secular, orthodox and so on. I don't know to what extent that was...

HUGHES: It was very much. This was the first time the issue came up in a very direct way, because the compromise that Ben Gurion had achieved and the concessions - some people call it concessions now - that he made early on, which he apparently thought would wither away over time, that the secular Jews, secular Israelis, would completely overwhelm the religious group, has turned out not to be true, and the compromises that were met are actually being expanded by the religious. But when I was there, there was legislation introduced or discussed to define who was a Jew, and basically they were very, very rigorous rules. I can remember talking to American Jews who came to Israel and particularly understood Jewish law, and only children of a Jewish mother are Jews. "My son married a non-Jew, but these guys are going to tell me that my grandchildren are not Jews." I can remember several elderly Americans, grandfatherly types, talking in this vein. Now, of course, it's come around again. But it was already clear then - and this was 10 years ago - that 12 to 14 percent of the religious Jews had an inordinate degree of influence. Among some secular Jews there was an acknowledgment of the importance, because I often heard from secular Jews that if it had not been for the real religious Jews, maybe Jewry would have been lost over the centuries in time. It was the more religious Jews who kept the main thinking of Judaism alive and Hebrew and so forth, although cultural traditions are still very strong and very rich as well, of course. But there was a lot of argument then about if you're in the study, you're exempt from the military. Secular Jews had the feeling that there was abuse of that, a disproportionate amount of funding to religious schools and to religious purposes as opposed to other purposes. There's quite a bit of antipathy in Israeli society and not much communication. I can remember a fellow who was a deputy minister, a very important guy in the Labor Party - I won't mention his name - who said once to me, "We don't know these guys."

Q: Okay, we were talking about the whole question of who is a Jew in that debate. Finish off your thought on that.

HUGHES: As I was saying, this individual said, "Who are those guys with the black hats? We don't know them." And my reaction to that was, yes, one of the problems is that Labor had never really made an effort to get to know them, and how you can deal with them and how you can reach accommodation or agreement or understandings or compromises if you don't know them.

Q: If you think of them always as the other, the opponent.

HUGHES: Us and them. You're quite right.

Q: Had the great surge of immigration into Israel which, of course, certainly occurred as the Soviet Union ended - was that happening in the late '80s?

HUGHES: No, and another irony: I can remember talking with Prime Minister Shamir, and it was clear that his idea of the demographic ace in the hole was American Jewry. The last untapped reservoir of Jews in the world, largely untapped, untapped to a certain extent, were American Jews in his view. When we were in Israel, there was a lot of study regarding the demographics and birth rates and so forth, and even then there was the projection that maybe by the turn of the century there would be more Arabs between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean than Jews, so they'd be a minority in their own territory, so to speak. I can remember Prime Minister Shamir thinking, boy, American Jewry, work on American Jewry, and that's the ace in the hole. There was almost no thinking at that point that I'm aware of, or discussion, about Soviet Jewry. Of course, there's the discussion now that maybe some of these folks are not Jews really, but that's another problem.

Q: Shamir's thought at the time as expressed to you was that American Jewry would increasingly come to Israel?

HUGHES: Would come to Israel as the economic situation improved, as the national security situation improved, and so forth, that he could attract more American Jews to Israel.

Q: Not just send funds but actually come?

HUGHES: Right.

Q: But there were a large number of U.S. citizens in Israel at the time you were there. Was that an issue for the Consular Section of the embassy, a major problem, or not really?

HUGHES: No, not really. A lot of them were dual nationals, and because of court rulings, the technicalities of dual nationality went away. When you and I started in this business, there were very strict rules about how you retain or how you could lose your nationality, but because of a court ruling in the United States - actually it had to do with an Israeli - it's almost impossible to lose your American nationality now, so those questions basically disappeared. We had a couple of cases of people committing crimes in the United States, and in Israel as a rule they will not extradite one of their own citizens. A couple were even wanted for murder, and they got complicated too, because in one case they were off in one of the settlements in the West Bank, and so what was the jurisdiction and a lot of complications in that regard. Those were fairly few although we did have another one in the aftermath of the spy case, Pollard. Some of the people who had helped Pollard with his spying were in Israel, dual nationals, and we were trying to get access to them for either depositions or one thing or another, or try to get them back to the States, but there was no inclination on their part to go back to the States obviously and there was very reluctant cooperation or engagement by the Israelis on these cases regardless of what was said publicly.

Q: Okay, anything else? A fascinating, great assignment for three years.

HUGHES: Well, just one other thing: One of the things that I think that the embassy could take credit for was the coordination that we did between the Palestinians, the Jordanians and the Israelis on the issue of defense to reopen the Jordanian banks on the West Bank. I had scores of meetings with the head of the civil administration in the ministry of defense for the West Bank and Gaza to help work that out. I'd say that I think the Embassy can take pride and satisfaction, and that is because it did change to some extent the economic dynamic in the West Bank.

Q: Were the issues primarily technical, banking, economic, or was it at least in part political in the sense of what should Jordan's role be?

HUGHES: It was more political than anything. There were always questions or objections raised or sometimes even delays caused by the technical things, but it was basically political issues.

Q: But that served also to in a sense re-engage Jordan a bit?

HUGHES: Yes.

WILLIAM A. PIERCE
Deputy Public Affairs Officer, NEA Bureau
Washington, DC (1987-1989)

Mr. Pierce was born and raised in Georgia and educated at Davidson College and the University of Georgia Law School. Entering the Foreign Service in 1973, he was first posted to Surabaya, Indonesia, followed by a tour at Damascus, Syria. After completing Arabic language studies in Washington and Tunis, Mr. Pierce was assigned as Political Officer to a number of Arabic speaking posts, including Khartoum, Jeddah and Riyadh. In Washington, Mr. Pierce dealt primarily with Middle East Affairs. His final post was Surabaya, where he was Consul General. Mr. Pierce was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: This was the first stone throwing, particularly of young people, against Israeli troops within the Palestinian area.

PIERCE: That's correct. The problem with the Intifada was stones being thrown and the response by Israeli troops first with live ammunition, then with rubber ammunition. Frequently we would try not to become involved in condemning one side or the other, or in a human rights situation or in response to specific situations. In other words, we didn't want to condemn Israel for excesses, but at the same time, as the Palestinian side became more and more amenable to peace and was more interested in taking constructive approaches, we did not want to condemn that side on its own. It's a complicated issue. Generally there was the perception that we were reluctant to push Israel in a public way.

With the Intifada we would try, when it became obvious that hard ammunition was being used against what, in essence, amounted to teenagers throwing rocks, we started pushing for guidances indicating that there was something wrong with using live ammunition in these instances. Our language would get neutralized but we kept pushing and ultimately I think it was obvious that we became far stronger in our public affairs pronouncements on the use of live fire, and also of time to time arbitrary use of rubber bullets, which also can kill.

One of the things that we had to do was to look at the media all of the time. We had CNN (Cable News Network) in our offices. One day at about four-thirty in the afternoon CNN broadcast the story of Iraqi gas attacks against the Kurds in Irbid and there were bodies in the middle of town. After we looked at that it took us a while to get across to a very preoccupied level above us in the hierarchy that this was important. Ultimately – it took some time – by seven o'clock that night we had begun to fashion our guidance basically expressing our extremely strong reaction against the use of gas on the Kurds. When something like that happens you're responsible to make sure it gets to the front office; you're responsible to make sure they, who are normally preoccupied with a host of other issues, know that this is a cutting issue and that we need to respond quickly and decisively in reacting to it. You'd get to the front office and you'd get the statement cleared there. Then you'd get that up to the press spokesman, even at seven o'clock at night. You'd do that.

Q: Well now, going back to the Intifada, this was in a way the first time I suppose you were up against I don't want to use the pejorative term but, basically the influence of the Israeli lobby on our policy wars.

PIERCE: No. It's not the Israeli lobby so much, but understandably when you're involved in promoting dialogue and trying to move towards some type of negotiation between two sides, you don't castigate one side and not the other. You castigate both of them equally – that's the cycle of violence argument – or you are more muted. Given our relationship with Israel there was always a predilection to give the benefit of the doubt in terms of Israelis on the ground calling the shots, or to look carefully when the facts suggested there was some egregious issue that our attention needed to be called to. A good example of that is the Security Assistance Act, where the issue of self-defense was always a factor in what we supplied people or foreign countries. Whenever Israel would make aircraft raids into Lebanon, by and large with our aircraft...

Q: And with our bombs.

PIERCE: And with our bombs, the question that would always come to the press spokesman was, isn't this a violation of the...

Q: It was an obvious violation, wasn't it?

PIERCE: I'm not going to make a judgment.

Q: Okay. (laughs)

PIERCE: That was not an issue that we had to work during my time in Public Affairs. Those issues happened primarily in the early '80s.

Another interesting area was Lebanon; I worked very closely with the Lebanese desk. In terms of internal Lebanese politics, one side or the other – mainly on the Lebanese Christian side – will always attempt to show themselves close to the Americans. This is a prominent political dynamic in Lebanon. Quite often we would learn about manipulation involving one side or the other, each trying to position oneself to become president or to have a better policy or to gain an advantage over an opposing side. Quite often I, with the Lebanese desk officer, would work up guidance which did not address a specific issue, but which would emphasize our position of basic neutrality and that we supported no one parenthetically; lack of preference for any simple person or group – like this guy who is exaggerating his ties with us. Now this type of guidance would never be asked for, so what you would do is call up one of your favorite Lebanese journalists and you would say, "If the question, whatever it is, were to be asked today, I think you might have a story."

Q: Yes. (laughs)

How about the tanker business – was that during your time?

PIERCE: Yes. This was one of the first times that we started a program of trying to bring out a public affairs policy that could be endorsed wholeheartedly by the front office, by the U.S. government, well in advance of actual events. We had very close coordination with DOD and worked out strategies to advance our views.

Q: Was the Stark incident?

PIERCE: Yes, it was. (laughs)

Q: How did that hit us? Could you explain what I meant by saying "the Stark" and its repercussions?

PIERCE: The Stark, as you know, was an American ship that was patrolling...

Q: A destroyer.

PIERCE: A destroyer that was patrolling in the Gulf. We got word of the Iraqi planes dropping a bomb that hit the Stark on a Sunday...

Q: Actually it was a missile.

PIERCE: Oh, yes. It was an Exocet. We got word of the incident on Sunday, and I was called in to the task force, starting I guess about seven o'clock that night. We worked for the next 18 hours on Stark, in essence trying to craft a public affairs strategy to use on Monday morning as well as to field queries. Information was quite sparse throughout the early part of the night – well, quite sparse throughout the whole night. At around two or three in the morning I was able to begin to craft what we needed to say to answer press queries and to have a framework for dealing with this. I'm an FSO-2 at the time, thinking about what we ought to say and what the people who will review it will accept. By say six-thirty in the morning someone – Chuck Redman for example, who was the spokesman at the time, or the deputy assistant secretary - will wander in to the task force and ask what's up. You'll have this in front of them so that they can begin to consider what other aspects to this issue, or other approaches, you need to take into consideration. You make changes, so that by seven or eight o'clock in the morning you have something fresh that the spokesman can begin using, though not in any official briefing. Later in the day, you're going to have official policy that addresses the issue.

Q: Well, I think it points out one of the interesting and often overlooked things about American policy. I mean long-term policy is long-term policy, but so much of what we're doing is reacting.

PIERCE: That's right.

Q: And you're really at the raw cutting-edge of starting the policy process in Public Affairs.

PIERCE: That's true. The interesting thing is that you start with the short-term but you always have a long-term premise in mind. Now that long-term premise may be one that you inherited from statements that go back into time. Our approach to Jerusalem, our basic idea of dialogue in the Israeli-Arab peace issue. Or one that is just beginning, but will have a long future – and that could be our two flag policy, that could be our approach to the Iran-Iraq War. Often you will begin to think these things through and then you'd go and talk to the deputy assistant secretary involved in the issue, or the desk director, or the person you think has the initiative. You began to get maybe a different nuance and incorporate that into the way you want to work things. But yes, you'd begin to slowly evolve the policy, in a way that interacts, obviously, with how the principals want to deal with the issue.

In terms of producing a long-term policy I got the impression that it's very difficult to say on any given day what our policy is on anything. You've got a good feel for it, but until someone in authority actually says it, that's not our policy of the day, because there may be a nuance change.

Q: Just the way that we were sitting around reading who was standing where in the Kremlin and so on in the announcements in the Soviet newspapers, I mean it's got to be quite hard to figure out what the Soviets were up to, but there were other people who were looking at us trying to figure out what we're saying about things.

PIERCE: You have a general idea. The advantage of our approach is that we're consistent; we don't change.

Q: Yes.

PIERCE: I mean, over a period of time you can begin to inject a nuance or the deputy secretary can inject a nuance, or you can have an event that will change things dramatically, but our blessing here is that there is a basic consistency, a basic tenet, in almost all aspects of policy. It will change visibly if it's going to change. I mean it's not going to be subtle – sometimes it happens that way, but... And then the nuance issue or how things develop, as in the Intifada, or as in the PLO (Palestine Liberation Organization) becoming more and more open to dialogue and ultimately a partner in the peace process in the late '80s – I saw that happen. These are significant shifts, but they're all grounded in the continuity of our policy in supporting peace, in trying to get a dialogue going and in trying to get terrorism out of the equation.

AUBREY HOOKS
Economic Counselor
Tel Aviv (1988-1991)

Ambassador Hooks was born and raised in South Carolina and educated at Brevard College and the University of South Carolina. He entered the Foreign Service in 1971 and served abroad in Tel Aviv, Warsaw, Ankara, Port au Prince, Tel Aviv, Rome, Helsinki and Harare. He also had several assignments at the State Department in Washington, DC. In 1995 he was named United States Ambassador to the Republic of Congo at Brazzaville and served there until 1999. He subsequently served as Ambassador to Democratic Republic of the Congo (2001-2004); and as Ambassador to Cote d'Ivoire from 2004 to 2007. Ambassador Hooks was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2009.

Q: You went to Israel and served there from when to when?

HOOKS: I went to Israel and served there from 1988 to 1991.

Q: OK, 1988 when you went there; what was the situation in Israel?

HOOKS: There were two things that I think were important at that time. First, Israel was coming out of a deep economic recession from the mid-1980s. The United States gave more than a billion dollars to bail them out of that problem and get the economy back on track. As a result, we had yearly economic discussions with the Israelis to try to keep track of where they were because they don't rely on the IMF. They rely on the United States in times of economic difficulty.

The second thing is that the intifada started in May of 1987, just before I returned to Washington to study Hebrew. In fact, the intifada dominated our discussions throughout the year that I was at FSI.

Q: Could you explain what the intifada was.

HOOKS: The intifada is the Palestinian uprising in the Occupied Territories against Israeli occupation. Not the Arabs in Israel but the Arabs in the Occupied Territories, in the West Bank and in Gaza. The intifada started in May of 1987 and it continued throughout the years I was there. Prime Minister Rabin commented at the beginning of the intifada: "We need to break their bones in order to bring the intifada to a close." The Israelis could never quite understand what was going on. This was something new, they weren't accustomed to it, and they didn't know how to deal with it initially. They were caught between trying to suppress it and trying to maintain their image as a benign occupier. However, the intifada became a major force that ultimately led to autonomy for the Palestinians as the Israelis came to understand that they simply could not continue the occupation and taking over Palestinian land as before.

Q: In a way they were up against a significant number of children who were involved.

HOOKS: Well, it was a popular uprising against the Israeli occupation and it was something that had broad support. I think the Palestinians were maturing politically. They had already been under Israeli occupation since 1967. As you recall, I mentioned before that I was in Israel from 1971 through 1973. Israel's golden age was from 1967 to 1973. It was after the euphoria of the Six Day War, the old generation of pioneers were still around, but Israeli had not yet experienced the trauma of the Yom Kippur War.

The second time I was there, the Israelis were struggling with the phenomenon of the intifada. At the same time their economy was starting to take off and they were becoming like Southern California in the Middle East. So on the one hand, economically they had made gigantic leaps since the early 1970s. On the political side, on the other hand, they were struggling with a phenomenon which they did not understand, which no one understood fully and which was creating a new paradigm. It was putting the Palestinians on the map, politically, in a sense; not as a terrorist organization but as a popular organization looking for self-expression, self-determination.

Q: Quite different from setting off bombs and having young people throw rocks. There was that horrific picture that I can recall of a Palestinian man caught in crossfire sheltering his son with his body and the kid was killed.

HOOKS: That event came much later during the difficulties in Gaza. That occurred about five, or six or seven or eight years later. When I was there it had not reached that stage and Gaza was not autonomous although it had some sort of self government.

I think the intifada was a phenomenon which led ultimately to some degree of self-determination on the part of the Palestinians. While Arafat was alive, the PLO was important. The intifada was a phenomenon which was not PLO-controlled but sprang up at the grassroots level. Obviously, all the political organizations tried to make the most of it. It was very much a popular expression. I think because of that the Israelis were baffled as to how to deal with a new phenomenon involving young children in the streets throwing rocks.

In some cases rocks were defined as lethal weapons but for most people it is a disproportionate response to shoot people because they are throwing rocks, unless of course, they are endangering someone's life. It was a new phenomenon and it was therefore a change in the political equation in the Middle East to a certain degree; not radically but to a certain degree.

Q: The Israelis had always been portrayed as the good boys and now they are coming out as bullies.

HOOKS: They came out as an armed, trained military dealing with young men with just rocks, basically. Israel's image suffered from this situation but Israel was facing a serious dilemma. What could it do in such a situation? It could not just walk away and withdraw unilaterally from the occupied territories. On the other hand, Israel had to deal with it in such a way that does not lead to condemnation in the world community. The Israeli Government struggled with this situation and still does.

Q: Who was the ambassador when you arrived there?

HOOKS: For the first six months or so after I arrived, Tom Pickering was the Ambassador. He was replaced by Bill Brown.

Q: When you got there, how would you say the embassy officers were dealing with our position because we were so imbedded in the Israeli cause, you might say. Was this causing strains or what?

HOOKS: The intifada obviously led to a certain strain in our relationship with Israel because the United States was caught between wanting to be supportive of Israel's security and Israel's existence as a state, but at the same time not wanting to be seen as insensitive to human rights abuses. For example, in the United States if young people were throwing rocks, it would be unacceptable for the police to fire live ammunition into crowds. Sometimes the Israelis responded to the intifada very forcefully, sometimes less forcefully, but it was a conundrum for the whole time I was there.

Q: You had been there before during a time of euphoria, you might say. Was this really a different embassy, a different officer corps, a different situation? I mean the atmosphere within the embassy, was this you might say, looking at Israelis and saying, "You know, they are an occupying force and they are not handling this very well." I mean a distancing from the Israeli cause or not?

HOOKS: Given the pressures in Israeli society and the pressures of Israeli politics, the American embassy in Tel Aviv is the most intense embassy I have ever worked in. Obviously there is very close scrutiny by Washington. The popular expression in the State Department is that the president of the United States is the desk officer and therefore whatever is said and done gets amplified.

Israeli society is also very intense, very dynamic and I think people either love it or they tend to hate it. You find very few people who are just indifferent to Israel. There was no great divide in the embassy; it was just that some people felt the Israelis were over reacting and riding roughshod over the Palestinians, although there were those who felt the Israelis were under intense pressure and had a serious security problem to deal with. However, the killing of people demonstrating for what many Americans regard as a national right, which is self-expression, led to a serious quandary in a moral sense and a political sense.

Q: What was the government like when you went out there?

HOOKS: I think most of the time I was there the second time it was Shamir who was the prime minister. Israel had changed a lot since my first assignment. The first time I was there the old leaders from pioneer days were still around: Ben-Gurion was still alive although no longer in power, Golda Meier was prime minister when I was there the first time, Abba Eban was Foreign Minister. All of these personalities had moved on, either having passed away or basically retired by the time I returned the second time.

Shamir was never in the category of the early pioneer leaders. Begin had a great deal of respect, although he was really on the margins when I was there the first time because of his extremism during the War of Independence and his smuggling of weapons into the country to maintain a military force alongside Government forces after independence. His party Likud had never been in power. Likud came to power after the Yom Kippur War, but Begin was seen as somewhat of an intellectual and a man of a certain stature. He agreed to withdraw from Sinai, among other things.

Shamir was seen as a guy with very little vision and a much more difficult character to deal with. I think even pro-Israeli Congressmen found him difficult to deal with. He was not open for dialogue. He would speak of greater Israel, which is a curious expression to use. He was a hardliner; he was not a great statesman but he was in power and had to be dealt with.

Q: Had the Israeli government opened up the economy, or was it still sort of the heavy hand of orthodox socialism?

HOOKS: Israel had a kind of East European socialism, which is not surprising since all the early leaders came from Eastern Europe. The state for historical reasons was very much involved in the economy when I was there the first time. The economy was very closed and very protected.

I recall a discussion once with the head of the Chamber of Commerce about the requirements for importing refrigerators. The requirements were such that foreigners could not export refrigerators to Israel because they could only be a certain size and the market was too small to justify producing a model that was just that size. This was obviously an effort to protect the market for Israeli production. The state was involved in many things.

After the events of the early and mid-1980s when the economy was really in crisis and inflation was skyrocketing, the United States stepped in with a huge economic aid package in return for serious economic reform. That is when the Israeli economy started taking off. When I arrived in the late 1980s, the economy was already starting to boom. A large number of government enterprises were privatized and the market was opened up to more imports.

The first time I was there of course the kibbutzim were in their glory days. Kibbutzim were located around the airport and in many of the areas around Tel Aviv that are now residential areas. It was still very much a rural society in some respects. That had changed by the time I came back. Starting in the late 1980's Israel began to foster the development of high tech industries oriented towards exports.

Q: What were you doing? I talked to Sam X who was an economic counselor there. We talked about his frustration because you report on the economy and suggest means of helping the Israelis and the Israelis and those in power would almost laugh at the economic section for bothering to do this because they'd present their own requests almost directly to Congress, which caused great annoyance and frustration. Was that going on in your time?

HOOKS: Of course this sort of thing did occur because the Israelis obviously had very powerful friends back here in Washington, but I think you also have to put it in context. Sometimes American embassies have perhaps an exaggerated sense of their own importance. As I mentioned earlier, the desk officer for Israel is the President of the United States. Bear that in mind. Just because you are in the economic section at the American Embassy in Tel Aviv and have some very good ideas, it's a rather inflated view of your own importance to think that those policies have to be adopted.

Israelis had their own sense of what they wanted to do and they knew they had powerful friends in Washington. They could do many things that no other country in the world could get by with. They knew when it came to political support they could go around the American embassy very easily and go around the State Department, for that matter. I think people working at the embassy had to keep that in mind. I know when I was there, I did an analysis of the budget, with particular focus on the amount of money spent on settlements in the Occupied Territories. Of course, this is a very sensitive subject. One of my cables was leaked in Washington because I had detailed the sums of money being spent on settlements. The following year the Israelis tried to put those expenditures in the budget in such a way that they were not readily apparent.

The American Embassy in Tel Aviv is in a very sensitive situation. It plays an important role but it is only one aspect of a very intense relationship between Israel and the United States, and Israelis can and do go around the embassy on many issues. For example, defense issues were often dealt with directly with the Pentagon, not forwarded through the embassy. The Israelis have direct access to members of Congress and various other organizations, so it is a very broad, very intense, very deep relationship that goes far beyond the embassy. The embassy is an important part of that but it is not an exclusive channel of communication.

Q: I assume the Israeli economic statistics were first-rate, weren't they?

HOOKS: The Israeli economic statistics were very good as far as they go. Of course, they don't always take on certain sensitive issues like defense and the Occupied Territories. Some expenditures are not very evident; sometimes it takes a little digging to find them.

Q: I'm sure the nuclear program was . . .

HOOKS: Was another sensitive issue.

Q: Was there much Israeli-Egyptian economic movement?

HOOKS: After Sadat's visit to Jerusalem in the late 1970s, the door was open for trade to start. It was not a major factor when I was there, but ties were starting to be built. It had not reached the proportions that it became later on, today for instance, but the groundwork was being placed for an economic relationship.

Q: Was there much with Jordan?

HOOKS: There was very little with Jordan. Even in those days there was the official trade and there was unofficial trade. I didn't see it myself but I recall getting reports that in Dubai you could buy Israeli products like jams and preserves. Sometimes you could even find Israeli liquor, shipped there by some means, so there was the official trade and the unofficial trade. The extent of unofficial trade by its very nature is difficult to know.

Q: Did the religious sector have an impact on the economy?

HOOKS: In a society like Israel, religion plays an important role in everything, although not everyone is religious. No more than 25% and probably more like 15 - 20% of the population goes to synagogue. However, religion permeates the culture. There are some people who have a kosher home although they will eat non-kosher outside the home. There are all sorts of gradations. Then of course there are those who are totally unreligious and so forth. Religion had an impact on government policy, especially on the budget. The electoral system in Israel favors the religious parties because any party receiving one percent of the vote could get into the Knesset. Because there is no majority party, the largest party had to form coalitions with small parties, many of them religious. The religious parties have a very well defined agenda: they want money for their school systems, and they were willing to go along on other issues as long as the Prime Minister was willing to throw money at their school systems.

However, the religious parties were very adept at playing politics. For instance, when I was there, the rabbis threatened to withdraw the kosher certificates for any hotels organizing New Year's festivities. New Year is not a Jewish holiday. It is basically a Christian holiday. We don't regard it as a Christian holiday but it is determined by a calendar established by the Pope and therefore it was a non-Jewish holiday. That sounds like silliness to an American, but in Israel it is a factor. If your kosher certificate is withdrawn, that puts you in a different category of restaurant. It has an economic impact.

Q: It shows you might say that the religious powers that be know how to twist the lion's tail from time to time.

HOOKS: I would say more than from time to time. All the religious parties have been very clever at playing the system and getting money for their favorite projects.

Q: How did Washington, the Economic Bureau, impact on your operation? Were you getting all sort of requests or were you pretty much following a routine?

HOOKS: The Econ Bureau was very much involved in the annual economic talks that I mentioned earlier. Ever since the mid 1980s when we had provided extraordinary assistance to help get the Israeli economy back on track and bring inflation down from triple digits, we met regularly with the Israelis to keep not only a sense of the pulse of the Israeli economy which the embassy could do, but to have very high level talks with the head of the Economic Bureau about where the Israeli economy was going and to keep them on track in carrying out the needed reforms. Washington was very closely involved in that. It was led by the head of E who came to Israel annually when I was there.

Q: Shamir sort of having been an ex-terrorist was a rather dour character. You mentioned he was difficult to deal with, but I would think on the economic side, did he have a hand in setting economic policy?

HOOKS: Shamir was not a charismatic figure. He was anything but. No one ever accused him of being a charismatic figure or of having a great vision of moving Israel forward. He basically wanted to keep Israel intact as it was and to keep the Occupied Territories for Israel. The dilemmas for him, as it is for many Israelis, is how to carry out the Zionist dream of the homeland for the Jews versus the reality of the world that you live in. Now, you can argue that you have to be unrealistic to start with. After all, the idea of taking Jews from around the world, bringing them back to Israel, sounded farcical even to most Jews in the early days of Zionism. It was the stuff of legends. However, Herzl's philosophy was that if you want it, if you can dream it, you can do it.

Shamir was not an economist and his focus was not on economics but rather on politics. He did not focus on the economy in terms of reform. The reforms that were introduced were part of the discussions between the United States and Israel in the 1980s, which focused on getting Israel to open up its economy more, focusing more on trade, etc. Those reforms were not driven by Shamir but were accepted as the cost of American aid to keep the economy afloat, although many Israeli economists knew there was no alternative in the long run.

Q: Was there much impact of Russian Jews coming to Israel at that point?

HOOKS: The Russian Jews were coming in large numbers and the question was absorption. The United States provided funds for housing and absorption. However, the Russian Jews were not yet playing the political role they started to play in the 1990s. They began to play a greater political role as their numbers increased. Their presence in Israel was already being noticed in the sense of newspapers and advertising in Russian.

Q: Were you seeing during the time you were there as a plus or was the process of integrating the Russians more of a problem than a plus?

HOOKS: I think it was seen by the Israelis as a very strong plus. After all, the mission statement for the state of Israel is basically to provide a home for Jews from around the world. The arrival of Russian Jews shows success of that mission statement, and I think they were seen as critical for having a larger Jewish population in Israel. After all, the concern was always a large Arab minority with higher birthrates. So the Russian Jews were seen as critical, or extremely important, let's say, in terms of carrying out the Zionist dream, which is an ongoing dream.

The Russian Jewish issue is a sensitive one because many Russian Jews came to the United States or went to Germany or elsewhere, so for Israel to get them to come to Israel was success of the Zionist dream. Those that went to the United States, while they can be helpful in the long term as part of a Jewish lobby, in a sense they were lost to Israel. There were times when more Russian Jews going to Germany than going to Israel which again was a rather curious phenomenon given recent history.

Q: What were you getting from the political officers in the embassy but certainly on the economic side, what was the role of the Arab Israelis? Were they seen as a plus, a minus, a contributing, were they seen as a potential menace or what?

HOOKS: The Israeli Arabs constitute a very interesting phenomenon. They are an important minority. They are over a million. In fact there may be close to two million so it is a very significant proportion. They have a high birthrate and for Israelis thinking in long terms, the long range, would they become such a large minority at one point to even constitute a threat to the Jewish majority in a political sense.

They play also an important role in the economy. They too have benefited from the growth of the Israeli economy. The United States had contacts with Israeli Arabs in Gaza and the West Bank. There was obviously sensitivity during the intifada as to whether the Israeli Arabs would become participants in the intifada. By and large they have not. Obviously their sympathies lie in many cases with the Palestinians, with the people in Gaza and the West Bank. However, they also realize that the Palestinian political leadership is extremist at times and that getting themselves involved in the intifada would be very dangerous to the Israeli Arab community. With the exception of a few individuals, by and large they have not been involved in the intifada.

Q: What about American Jews coming to Israel? Did they have much of an impact on your work? Did you end up escorting a lot of people?

HOOKS: There used to be more congressmen in Israel than in Washington, particularly during recess time, but I think they travel less today than what they used to do. The Israelis always put out the red carpet for U.S. Congressmen. Many visiting American Jewish groups came to the Embassy for briefings. Tom Pickering and Bill Brown led these briefings. It was part of the broad and intense and deep relationship I was referring to earlier, a relationship in which the embassy was an important part but only one part of a very deep relationship.

Q: You were there until when?

HOOKS: I was there until 1991. I was there for the first Gulf War. We all have fond memories of spending time in sealed rooms with our gas masks on. The embassy initially planned to evacuate all dependents and many employees. However, Washington did not support that for political reasons. I was among those slated to leave. We were put together on a group of busses and traveled to Jerusalem to pick up people from the consulate before heading to Eilat in the extreme south of Israel. Actually we were going to an airbase down in the south because the airbase was out of range of SCUD missiles and therefore U.S. Air Force aircraft could fly in and pick us up.

While we were en route to Eilat, Washington back pedaled on this issue. Mandatory evacuation was out of the question because of the message the evacuation would send to American citizens living in Israel. If the Embassy evacuated American embassy staff, the Embassy would be under the obligation to offer the same option to all American citizens living in Israel, of which there were quite a few thousand. We were therefore informed that those who wished to leave on the plane could do so, and those who wished to stay would be bussed to Eilat for the time being.

We went down to Eilat and then were in limbo for almost two weeks while the embassy and Washington tried to decide what to do with us. Of course, you can imagine there were all sorts of administrative issues; who should pay for hotels and food. Staying in a hotel in Eilat was quite an expensive proposition. Ultimately they brought us back to Tel Aviv because Washington did not want to continue paying the hotel bills in Eilat.

Upon our return to Tel Aviv, we faced the SCUD attacks. It was quite an interesting experience for all of us because we all had to have a sealed room with plastic even over the electrical outlets, gas masks even for children. We had to teach children how to use the gas masks and make sure they could breathe properly. Initially we were in our room, preferably above ground as it was assumed that the gas would remain at ground level. That policy would change. We were advised to give up the sealed room because the SCUD missiles did not contain gas. Instead, we were instructed to take cover in our bomb shelter, which most houses had. Our bomb shelter was basically a stairwell down in the basement area which afforded greater protection in case of a direct hit. The children were initially terrified but, children being children, they quickly adapted. My children would count the explosions when Patriots were launched from the domestic airport located not far from our house. They could then tell how many SCUDS were coming in. It became a game, a way of coping with stress.

Initially they were scared as kids are and sort of whimpering when we went through this. The siren was blowing and not something too many American kids are used to, but they began to adapt to it. There is some psychological impact there but I think they learned to cope and then to turn the experience into a game. Obviously we wanted them to not be terrified but to make the best of the situation: the siren is blowing, we've got to put on our gas masks. We'd all head downstairs and put on our gas masks. They'd count, you know. It is a little bit difficult to talk with these things on but they would hold up fingers for each Patriot fired and each SCUD hit. So they adapted to it, but it was an interesting experience to go through.

Q: Were you aware of the battles of the gas masks? I understand both our embassy in Riyadh and in Tel Aviv, there was a shortage of gas masks for a while.

HOOKS: I am not aware of a shortage of gas masks at the embassy in Tel Aviv. We all received gas masks. I have six children, and we received a total of eight gas masks without any delay. We also received tape and plastic sheeting and instructed on how to use them to seal a room. I know in Israel there was concern about getting gas masks for everybody in Israel, but that issue never came up for American Embassy staff.

Q: Maybe it was more down in Saudi Arabia where there was a problem. I've heard accounts of Bill Brown and Chas Freeman, Bill being in Tel Aviv and Chas being in Riyadh, having exchanges on the subject of keeping the Saudis in the war and the Israelis out of the war because if the Israelis got involved in the war, it would screw up our alliances, strange alliances with Egyptian and Syrian troops as part of the greater war effort.

HOOKS: You recall Larry Eagleburger was sent to Tel Aviv to meet with the Israelis. The Israelis have always felt they had to respond to any provocation in order to maintain their credibility and to maintain a level of deterrence. The Arabs know that if they attack the Israelis, the Israelis will hit back and hit hard. They will hurt you. This is the Israelis' philosophy.

When SCUDS started falling in Israel, their natural reaction was to strike back immediately. However, Washington made it clear to the Israelis that, if they attacked Iraq, it would ruin the whole coalition effort because the Arabs would not remain part of a joint war effort with the Israelis in fighting other Arabs. Larry Eagleburger explained to the Israelis that it was in their interests to sit on the sidelines and let the United States and the coalition take care of Saddam Hussein. That was the basic message, obviously stated much more diplomatically than what I have just said, but the message was very clear. The Israelis were clever enough to go along with that.

Q: Diplomatically it is a very interesting time.

HOOKS: It was a very difficult decision for the Israelis to make but the options were very clear. They had no choice in the matter. Although Israelis don't necessarily listen to us and could have done something on their own, they realized it would have been foolish to do so. They understood that when the United States military is beating up on the enemy, don't do anything to get the United States out of the fight. It was that simple. Naturally there was some talk that they could not stand by and let themselves be bombed. The Israelis really had no option in this in terms of getting involved. Had we not been involved in Iraq, they obviously would have had to react, but under the circumstances it would have been foolish to do anything.

Q: They also had problems for the area about what to do with the embassies because I think we made most of our embassy personnel evacuate in most of the Arab world at the time.

HOOKS: The evacuation concerns were based on fear that Arab populations would react to the United States bombing Iraq.

Q: But at the same time we had to keep the Americans, particularly in Dhahran who were involved in pumping oil. In an interview with Ken X who was consul general there, we were evacuating our embassies in the Gulf at the same time trying to keep the Americans on board.

HOOKS: Evacuation is a complicated process. The first to be evacuated are always minor dependents. Next are adult dependents, spouses for the most part. After that, staff members are evacuated depending on whether they play an essential role in the functioning of an embassy in crisis. In a crisis, the role of an embassy changes. The first priority of an embassy is the protection of American citizens. All efforts are concentrated in that direction. Everything else is secondary. Many functions are halted, or continued only on an emergency basis, such as visa issuances, education exchanges, etc. Consuls are the most important people during a crisis, although political officers and military attaches play a critical role in gathering information and maintaining contact with the host government and the various groupings involved in the crisis.

Q: And there are other problems when you start bringing people back if it is not done well. We had an awful lot of people from that war sort of in limbo from various places, very unhappy.

HOOKS: I have worked in a number of embassies where we have had evacuations, and I can tell you, it is a terrible thing to happen. It is actually easier not to be evacuated than it is to be evacuated, because if you are evacuated, you are in total limbo. You don't know how long it is going to last. No one can guarantee you it is going to last only 72 days, for example, and on the 73rd day you will be back at post. Most of the time you are in a situation where no one knows how long it is going to last. When families are involved, the lives of children are totally disrupted. The family can come back to Washington, but what do they do? Even if you have a house here, you generally have leased it out and you can't just tell the tenants to clear out. A rental apartment normally requires a long-term lease. A family has to decide whether to enroll their children in a local school, or just wait out the crisis.

I was chairman of the school board in Tel Aviv in 1991, and we had a tremendous problem trying to adapt to war conditions. We had to close the school down during all the bombing. No one wanted their kids to be in school during an air attack. Everyone wants their kids home. There is nothing more emotional for people than their children. Once the war was over, kids started coming back to school. Out of a school of 360, we only had about 50 kids present when we reopened the school. Afterwards, kids started drifting back. You can imagine how difficult it is to arrange a class program when one day a teacher is teaching three kids and the next day she's got five kids, and a week later 12 kids. It was a very unusual year. It destroys people's morale. For those who went back to post, there is always a dichotomy that exists between those who stayed and those who left, between those who were indispensable and those who were dispensable.

I faced that situation in Abidjan, and no matter what you do, you can never overcome the trauma. It is only overcome when all the actors involved leave post. We are so focused on American employees that we often overlook our local employees, who face the insecurity that drives the evacuation in the first place. Local employees often fear job loss as positions are sometimes cut out if an Embassy only maintains a skeletal staff or closes. This was not the case in Tel Aviv, but it is often the case in Africa.

Q: Chas Freeman also said that something he ran across with a few people who just lost their nerve during the crisis. He said the State Department didn't deal well with this issue. If somebody loses their nerve, do you want to have them as part of your team again. The State Department seemed to almost by-pass this problem. It is a test of character.

HOOKS: It is not a test of character. Character is something else. It is a test of people's emotional state and we will get into it when we talk about Brazzaville, where I went through an evacuation, and closing down an embassy in Abidjan. It has to do with people's emotional state in a given set of circumstances. People react differently at different times. A lot depends on whether you are able to keep people busy and reassure them. It is hard to know how people will react. Sometimes you see someone who is strong and outgoing, and you think that person would be a natural leader in a crisis. Some will be, some will not. Some people who are very quiet and who don't stand out particularly may step forward and be a leader, just as we have seen in every area of life. I think it surprises you at times who steps forward and begins to shine as if their light has been under a bushel basket all these years.

I think most people, however, do surprisingly well. A lot depends on whether you can give people a sense of confidence that you know what you are doing. In the case of Tel Aviv, because of the confusion when Washington back pedaled on the question of evacuation, it created lots of problems. There was an attempted evacuation as people were told they had no choice but to leave, only to be told a few hours later that evacuation was voluntary. Some people did opt to leave, some of whom never came back. The impact was felt throughout the American community. It had an impact especially on the school, and it had an impact on morale. Those situations are only fully healed when all the parties involved move on. That is one of the beauties of the Foreign Service; people do move on after those situations and new ones coming in with a different attitude.

Q: Besides the Gulf War, you did have the collapse of the Soviet Bloc. Was that beginning to impact on Israel as far as great waves of former Soviet immigrants coming and all or was that felt much at your time?

HOOKS: It did not result in great waves of people coming in. Clearly more Jews were coming in than before, but the numbers did not represent a quantum jump.

The collapse of the Soviet Union was a big surprise to almost everybody. It led to many questions about the future, how the former Soviet Union would evolve politically. In 1990 – 1991, there was a lot of discussion about the new world order. There were questions about whether the United States was the only super power left. This was a process that was starting to evolve.

Israel was not impacted so dramatically as it might have been otherwise because it was associated with the United States. Their patron quote unquote was still very much intact, in fact was even stronger than before. They had limited relations with the Soviet Union. If anything, the breakup of the Soviet Union would likely result in less support for Arab states facing Israel. One of the big concerns at the time was the control of weapons, especially nuclear weapons, in the former Soviet Union, especially concern that they may fall into the wrong hands. There was also concern about keeping scientists employed in Russia so they don't go to Iran or elsewhere to work in nuclear facilities. There was a lot of uncertainty about the future.

Q: Compared to the time before, now you are more senior and all, how did you and your family find life in Israel?

HOOKS: Life was very good. This is one of the great posts in the Foreign Service. We loved living in Israel both times, I should add. First of all, the State Department sometimes does things really well, and one of those was to use the money that Israel paid for wheat and other things from the 1950s to buy housing for Embassy staff. In Herzliya Pituah and in Kfar Shmaryahu we had wonderful housing and a great American school. The weather in Israel is perfect and there is so much to see and to do in Israel. While you can't drive to neighboring countries, at least you couldn't in those days very easily, you could still fly to Europe more cheaply than from the United States. In many respects it was a very good life for families. Israelis are very accessible, very friendly, and it is easy to get involved in Israeli society. If you are interested in history, geography, archeology, it was all there. As I said before, Tel Aviv is the most intense embassy I have ever worked in, and I think it attracted really great people in the Foreign Service, some very talented people and therefore I had great colleagues to work with. There was a great sense that you were involved in something really important. Israel obviously was very important to Washington. Decision-makers in Washington barely know where many countries are located, but everybody knew where Israel was. Everybody wanted to be informed, so the messages the Embassy sent back to Washington were looked at very carefully. It isn't enough to see on CNN that something has happened. Washington wants to know immediately what that means. The embassy was trying to put this in context.

Q: Was there a feeling while you were there that things would work out in the Middle East?

HOOKS: Your question is a very broad one and I have to say no, I don't recall anyone being so optimistic as to think that we were seeing the light at the end of the tunnel in terms of resolving issues. I think there was a sense that step by step some issues have been addressed, but some of the very fundamental issues have not been addressed yet. Relations with Egypt have come a long way. However, the question of the Palestinians has not been fully addressed and that is a fundamental issue, including the status of Jerusalem, permanent boundaries, returning occupied territories to Syria, etc. I don't think anyone was even dreaming that we were on track for peace in the Middle East. It is one of those situations where you try to manage a crisis and try to keep moving it forward. You kick the ball further down the field in hopes you will be able to resolve something. Some progress has been made since I first arrived in Tel Aviv in 1971, although the fundamental problems are still actively on the agenda.

Q: Career wise, did you want to be a Middle East hand or what? What were you looking at?

HOOKS: When I came in the Foreign Service, I wanted to focus on the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. When I left Israel at the end of my first assignment, I asked to go to the Soviet Union. Poland was my second choice. That was what I wanted to do in those days, and going back to Israel was not part of an overall strategy on my part. The Israel Desk contacted me when I was in Haiti to invite me to apply for an economic position in Tel Aviv. I was very interested. It was a great experience which I greatly enjoyed and am very glad I went. My original idea of focusing on the Soviet Bloc evolved over time.

PHILLIP C. WILCOX, JR.
Consul General
Jerusalem (1988-1991)

Phillip C. Wilcox, Jr. was born in Colorado in 1937. He received his bachelor's degree from Williams College in 1958 and then immediately after received his law degree from Stanford University in 1961. After graduation he went and taught in Sierra Leone from 1961-1963. During his Foreign Service career he had positions in Laos, Indonesia, Bangladesh, Washington D.C., and Jerusalem. Mr. Wilcox was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in April 1998.

Q: Today is June 22, 1998. Phil, let's move on. 1988 you went to Jerusalem where you served from '88 to '91 as consul general.

WILCOX: That's right.

Q: How did you get the job?

WILCOX: I had been serving as Deputy Assistant Secretary in NEA with responsibility for Israel, the West Bank and Gaza, Syria, Lebanon, and Jordan. I previously had been Director for Arab and Arab-Israeli affairs, so I was prepared for Jerusalem, and when I was asked to go, I readily agreed.

Q: Was there any vetting of you at that point or had you already been vetted by the various, I'm talking about the American-Israeli organizations.

WILCOX: I don't think there was any vetting process outside of the administration. I had been involved in the issue and the policy and knew the players, including the Israelis and the leaders of the American Jewish community, and I was qualified by experience for the job

Q: By any chance during this time that you were in Washington, did you run across Martin Indyk?

WILCOX: Yes, I knew Martin quite well. He was the Director for Research at AIPAC, and I had considerable contact with him while I was on the Israel and Arab-Israel desk, and when I became Deputy Assistant Secretary.

Q: What was your impression, I mean where was he coming from during this time?

WILCOX: He had by the time I left NEA, Martin had already moved over to the job of Director of the newly-created Washington Institute for Middle East Policy Studies. Some of the board members of the Institute were also directors of AIPAC, so there was an intimate relationship between the two groups. Martin himself had been a scholar in his earlier days in Australia and had written his doctoral thesis on the Egypt-Israel peace process, and so he had expertise on the area. I worked with him and other officials of AIPAC when I was on the Israeli desk. It was a friendly, but often adversarial relationship, since AIPAC often opposed administration policies concerning the Middle East, Israel, and the peace process.

Q: Did you find that AIPAC reflected the politics of Israel in that you had equivalent to the Likud which takes a very strong and pro-Israeli line as opposed to Labor which is how can we get along in this difficult part of the world?

WILCOX: AIPAC came of age during the Likud era after 1977 and it grew into a very skilled, well financed and sophisticated lobby. AIPAC's role was to enhance the American-Israeli relationship, and it generally reflected views put forth by the government of Israel. It worked very hard to promote stronger support in Congress, and later began to give attention to the executive branch, the Department of State and the Department of Defense. It had an effective, capable group of people who were knowledgeable, dedicated, hard working, tough, and single minded.

Q: Did it seem to reflect, most of the time in the people who were brought on were true believers even to use an old biblical term zealots as far as the cause of a greater Israel?

WILCOX: No, I wouldn't call them zealots. I think that the leadership in AIPAC were people who believed deeply that a strong U.S.-Israel [relationship] was valuable for the United States, that our interests converged in all major respects. The major point of friction with AIPAC during that time were U.S. arms sales to Arab states, and AIPAC worked aggressively to prevent or postpone or to subject to conditions the sale of U.S. weapons to Saudi Arabia, Jordan and other Arab states which had not made peace with Israel. AIPAC argued that to sell sophisticated weapons to these states would erode the qualitative military edge that it was U.S. policy to preserve for the state of Israel. So there were very difficult and almost chronic disputes whenever an Arab state would propose to purchase U.S. arms, and AIPAC would almost invariably oppose them. AIPAC also preached the Israel view that it was necessary to retain the West Bank and Gaza for security reasons, that there were no moderate Arab states, and that the Palestinians were permanently committed to the violent destruction of Israel.

Q: Could you describe Jerusalem in 1988 when you arrived? The area was kind of keyed up. Okay, we wanted to go back to AIPAC first.

WILCOX: AIPAC was opposed to the administration's view that the basis for peace lay in a land for peace arrangement based on resolution 242. We were also at odds with AIPAC over the question of the PLO office in Washington. The administration realized that this office, which was run by American citizens, would continue operations under some other name if it was closed down, but eventually acceded to strong pressure from the Congress and from AIPAC to shut down the office. As usual, AIPAC played very hard ball on this issue.

AIPAC is a single issue organization. Its members lacked the knowledge and perspective of other foreign policy issues and for that reason, did not have the understanding that there were other U.S. interests that had to be weighed in considering our policy toward Israel and the peace process. So at times it was an adversarial relationship. But the Administration also recognized AIPAC's influence and courted its able Director at that time, Tom Dine, as an important player.

Q: Was the issue raised say particularly with Saudi Arabia, because Saudi Arabia was essentially no threat to Israel. It just didn't have the military capacity, the population. Was the protection of the Persian Gulf, because this obviously became very important in our next episode we are going to be discussing, but was that raised at all with AIPAC saying, you know fellows this is all very nice but Saudi Arabia is being threatened by both Iran and Iraq, and we have to have AWACS and protective weapons and all that.

WILCOX: That, of course, was part of our case. It usually didn't prevail with AIPAC or Congress. The administration won an early fight with AIPAC and Congress over the sale of AWACS surveillance aircraft to Saudi Arabia. After that defeat, AIPAC vowed that it would never be defeated again in such a stand up contest. It wasn't. I believe that AIPAC was every bit as concerned about its own power and influence as Israel's interests. Steve Rosen, AIPAC Director for Research who succeeded Martin Indyk, once acknowledged this to me, saying "we are a fighting organization, and we like to win."

Q: Well, then let's move to Jerusalem. At the beginning things obviously really heated up. Let's talk about when you arrived there in '88. What was the situation? We are talking about the whole area, but basically centered around Jerusalem.

WILCOX: Well, at that time the Likud government and Prime Minister Shamir were governing Israel. Its policy was to promote the Israeli settlements and to hang on to the West Bank and Gaza which they regarded as part of greater Israel. The Likud never proclaimed an intention to annex these areas and absorb them into Israel, realizing that were they to do so, the Palestinians in those areas would have to be enfranchised. That would upset the Jewish demographics of Israel. Still, they wanted to maintain control of these territories under some form of limited autonomy where the major decisions and security would be controlled by Israel. To prevent the emergence of a local Palestinian leadership and self governing institutions, the Israelis removed or deported Palestinian mayors, for example, who had nationalist views, and appointed Arabs who were puppets. Local leadership, therefore, scarcely existed. The Palestinian PLO leadership abroad was in retreat having been driven out of Beirut and landed in exile in Tunisia. There was a deep stalemate.

Q: How had the previous incumbents reported from Jerusalem? How did they perceive their missions as consuls general?

WILCOX: I think reporting from Jerusalem over the years made a real effort to try to understand the dynamics of Palestinian politics, the society, the economy of the West Bank. The embassy was responsible for Gaza.

As for the role of consuls general, by definition they all led schizophrenic lives, living in West Jerusalem among Israelis, and dealing professionally with Palestinians in East Jerusalem and the West Bank. I and some of my predecessors thought it was important to keep an eye on the Jewish side of Jerusalem to keep our Palestinian analysis in context and to look at the city as a whole. While my official contacts were with the Palestinians, since Israel prohibited its officials from dealing with the consulate, I also developed very close contacts with Israeli writers, journalists and academics, especially those who were interested and involved in the peace process and human rights and had contacts with Palestinians. In any case, I viewed my role as the American representative in the City of Jerusalem, as well as our channel to the Palestinians.

While the bulk of our contacts were with Palestinians and we concentrated our reporting on that sector, I gained perspective and insight by keeping in touch with Israelis. Our job, of course, was to encourage the Palestinians to take a more creative and positive view toward peace.

By and large, it was not possible to bring Palestinians and Israelis together at the consulate because of the depth of Palestinian feelings about the occupation and their Israeli adversaries and the embarrassment they felt in associating with Israelis under American auspices in a setting they could only regard as political, not social. We did so only on rare, carefully controlled occasions. Nor did we try to bring together peace-minded Israelis whom we knew were already in touch with Palestinians, since this probably would have been counterproductive. These relations were close, though very discreet, and did not need U.S. sponsorship.

The only major mixed event at the consulate was our annual Fourth of July reception. In the past, following the practice of other consulate generals in Jerusalem, the U.S. held two receptions, one for Palestinians and the other for Israelis. One of my predecessors, Wat Cluverius, broke with this tradition and combined the two parties. I agreed with this policy, since it was designed to demonstrate that the U.S. saw the Jews and the Arabs in Jerusalem as neighbors who had to live together. The Palestinians saw our policy differently, however, and some of them regularly boycotted the event, while otherwise maintained close relations with us. I think they suspected that holding a Fourth of July reception for both communities implied that the U.S. had accepted Israeli control over all of Jerusalem and had abandoned the policy of leaving the question of Jerusalem's status open for future negotiations. That certainly wasn't the intention of having a single reception, but all things in Jerusalem are political including Fourth of July receptions. Mayor Teddy Kollek of Jerusalem made things worse for us by constantly saying in public that he was responsible for persuading the U.S. to hold a combined Fourth of July reception. This made it look to the Palestinians that we were doing the Israelis' bidding, which was not true.

Q: In your talk just now, you always state in Jerusalem and Jerusalem and Jerusalem. What about the West Bank?

WILCOX: The West Bank was under our jurisdiction, and I and all my predecessors traveled extensively in the West Bank, using our Arab drivers. We used Israeli drivers in West Jerusalem. My officers were out in the West Bank every day talking to people, administering a small economic development assistance program, promoting U.S. views, and trying continuously to persuade the Palestinians to take a more activist and positive view toward the peace process and to accept resolution 242.

Q: Could you explain what resolution 242 was?

WILCOX: Resolution 242 has always been the foundation of U.S. policy in the peace process. Essentially, it calls on Israel to withdraw from territory occupied in 1967, that is the West Bank, Gaza, and East Jerusalem, in exchange for peace and mutual recognition. is essentially a bargain for the exchange of land for peace. Resolution 338 calls for the negotiations to bring that process about. The Palestinians for years had been paralyzed in their political approach by refusing to recognize the existence or the permanence of the state of Israel. They clung tenaciously to this view in public that because Israel had taken their land, they had a right to recover it and compromise with Israel was not acceptable. I think most of them did not believe that this was a realistic policy, but nevertheless, they would not bring themselves to admit that, and for reasons of pride they clung to this uncompromising position. So there was a terrible intellectual and ideological lag among the Palestinians on the West Bank. Their policy was one of steadfastness, to hold firm to their views and to hope that somehow someday their cause would prevail. It wasn't prevailing. Their land continued to be taken by the Israelis, settlements were expanding, and steadfastness was a failed policy. We worked to urge the Palestinians to look at their own situation more realistically, to find ways to engage with Israel, and to make peace through a compromise that would salvage something for them and their children. Our view was the only route to peace was a division of the land and a mutual recognition between Israelis and Palestinians.

This was a hard sell, not just because of traditional Palestinian stubbornness and the lack of strong, visionary leadership, but because the Likud governments in those days offered the Palestinians little in return for peace. "Peace for peace" was Shamir's policy, and he envisaged a future of permanent subordination of the Palestinians under effective Israeli control, since his view and that of his colleagues was that the West Bank and Gaza belonged to Israel. It was difficult, to say the least, for the Palestinians to recognize Israel when Israel refused to offer any compromise itself or to recognize the Palestinian as a people with rights and aspirations of their own. The Israelis until well into the late '80s clung to the view that the Palestinians were basically Jordanians, and that Palestinian nationalism and the idea of a Palestinian state were not only illegitimate but dangerous. So there was a grave ideological time warp on both sides. Both thought they were stuck in a zero sum game in which one side had to win and the other had to lose.

Q: Did you have dealings with the Jewish settlers?

WILCOX: Yes, we did. We would meet occasionally with settler representatives in Jerusalem, and members of my staff would sometimes visit settlements and talk to settlement leaders. It was important to learn more about it and to report on the internal politics and dynamics of this movement, which represented a threat to an ultimate peace. We also reported in great detail on the expansion of settlements.

Q: Were you viewed with hostility by the settlement leadership?

WILCOX: Absolutely. The leadership of the settler movement were religious fundamentalists and ultra-nationalist Jews who believed that they were fulfilling a Biblical prophecy by reclaiming the ancient Biblical homelands and had a God given right to take that land and to live on it. The Palestinians would somehow have to make do or leave. They were deeply angry at the U.S. for suggesting that settlements were a threat to peace and stability in the region. Up until the early 1980s, the U.S. government held that settlements were illegal. Unfortunately, President Reagan changed our policy, and our opposition to settlements thereafter was more attenuated and spasmodic.

Q: Did you find when you were there particularly dealing with the settlers, much of the impetus for this movement was being supported particularly in Jewish circles in New York I would have thought. Almost everything you did would be on a hair trigger, and the hair trigger would be almost in New York. New York City I am talking about.

WILCOX: The impetus for the settlement movement didn't come from New York, it came from the various Zionist revisionist ideologues and religious leaders like Rabbi Kook who created a new variant of Jewish philosophy which held that to recover the land of ancient Israel was a divine mandate, central to the future of Judaism and linked to the coming of the messiah. This was a very powerful concept emotionally and religiously. It grew after the Israeli victory in 1967 and the take over of the West Bank which the followers of this stream of Judaism saw as a miraculous act of redemption. It is true that this movement drew support and funds from some American Jewish donors and religious cohorts. Also, a significant number of the most enthusiastic and ideological settlers were American Jews from New York and elsewhere in the U.S., although many were born in Israel.

Q: Did you find yourself caught between you might say this ideological group which was essentially doing something which was against our policy, but the spearhead of which was often American, I mean holding dual passports. When things went wrong of one sort or another, did you have to go in and sort of help Americans who were really Israelis? Did this cause problems?

WILCOX: Any American citizens who requested assistance from an American consulate or embassy would always receive assistance, irrespective of their political views. But militant settlers who were also Americans tended to avoid the consulate. I don't know how many of the Americans who chose to live in Israel retained their American passports. Some did, some did not.

Q: I would have thought that you would have had a problem dealing with your staff Particularly your officers, I mean here in a way was comparable to the situation in South Africa in dealing with what was considered an oppressive government, the white government on the blacks. Here from the perspective of a junior officer, they are focused on the plight of the Palestinians. Yet it is very tricky. The older officers can understand the dynamics of American politics, but young people tend to see things in black and white. This is just; this isn't just. I would have thought that this would be a problem.

WILCOX: Any American diplomat who served in Jerusalem quickly became familiar with the realities of the Palestinian problem. Those who had some previous experience dealing with Israel knew the other side of the issue as well. My officers were young, but while they were deeply involved and had strong views about the situation, they were professionals, did not go off the deep end, and maintained a necessary degree of detachment. I made it a point in myself and encouraged my staff to report objectively and honestly about what was going on, and we called our shots as we saw them. We worked hard to be honest and objective, without glossing over the unpleasant realities of the Israeli occupation and Palestinian failings as well. We saw ourselves as American diplomats representing U.S. interests in the midst of a problem that required a solution.

Q: How did you find your reporting, yours and with your officers. How was that received both in the embassy in Tel Aviv and in Washington? Did you find you had to fine tune the reporting; how did you deal with that?

WILCOX: I paid a great deal of attention to our reporting, and I wanted to make sure that our reporting was not special pleading on behalf of the Palestinians, while at the same time accurately conveying the situation and Palestinians views. I also sought to put our reporting in the larger context of the Palestinian-Israeli dispute. I thought I was in a good position to do that having worked on the Israeli side of the street for some years. I was proud of the reporting the consulate general did at that time. I thought it was timely, analytically rigorous, and directed to the Department's policy concerns. Our reporting officers were in the field constantly. Some of them spoke Arabic and Hebrew. We knew the political and business community in the West Bank and East Jerusalem very well, and reported voluminously on what they were doing and what they were saying.

The response to the reporting was varied. Among colleagues in the department it was appreciated. There were often positive comments, but there were also those in my time and during the tours of all previous consuls general whose reporting I previously read in Washington who thought the consulate's reporting was biased toward the Palestinians. In any case, we believed our professional vocation was to report objectively and honestly. I also thought my job description obliged me to make policy recommendations from time to time and I did so. Those recommendations were sometimes welcomed and sometimes not welcomed, but that is to be expected. I tried to make recommendations with recognition of competing factors, including, sometimes, Israeli equities that Washington policymakers would have to balance and to give my best advice.

Q: Can you comment on any of the recommendations that you made positive and negative back in Washington?

WILCOX: During the Intifada, a young Israeli reservist at a bus stop near Tel Aviv killed a group of Palestinians and serious rioting broke out in Gaza. Israeli forces responded in an excessive and heavy handed way, killing seventeen Palestinians. Palestinian emotions, already running high in the midst of the Intifada, grew even more intense. The local leadership was already involved in a hunger strike against Israeli policies. The PLO introduced a resolution in the UN Security Council condemning the use of excessive force by the Israeli forces. I recommended that we engage in negotiations on this resolution rather than veto it as we were increasingly doing. If we were unable to achieve balanced language, we should abstain from the resolution. Our policy was to oppose the use of excessive force against the Intifada in violation of recognized human rights standards. We were also working to defuse the conflict and to encourage the Palestinians to consider a political solution. I reasoned that a veto would further reduce U.S. influence among the Palestinians and undermine our efforts to get the Israelis to pursue a more sensible response to the Intifada. My recommendation for an abstention was not welcomed in Washington and the U.S. cast a veto in New York. The upshot was that the local Palestinian leadership in the West Bank and Gaza decided to boycott further official contacts with the U.S. officials, including the consulate. This was a foolish, counterproductive move on their part, but it demonstrated their sense of anger, despair and powerlessness.

Some time later while on consultations in Washington, John Kelly, the Assistant Secretary in NEA, who had earlier urged me to give my best advice to Washington, told me, by way of cautioning me, that Robert Gates, the then Deputy National Security Adviser in the White House, had said that “Wilcox has gone off the deep end.” I surmised that my recommendation for an abstention in the Security Council vote, which I thought I had presented in a thoughtful way, taking into account my long experience in Washington dealing with U.S. votes in the UN, was regarded as a radical proposal.

Q: Well, it sounds as though we were locked into almost the same sort of diplomatic response that the Israelis and the Palestinians were. At a certain point we wouldn't engage in any talk. It sounds like a rather sad commentary on diplomacy.

WILCOX: We were frustrated by the tendency of the Palestinians, with the help of some of the Europeans, to go to the Security Council every time there was an issue that should have been addressed through negotiations. We had been trying for years to promote negotiations on the Palestinian issue, but were making little headway with either the Palestinians or the Israelis. The Israelis would not recognize the Palestinians, much less the PLO, as their negotiating partner, the Palestinians expected the U.S. and the international community to do their negotiations with Israel for them, and the U.S. at that time would not deal with the PLO, whom all Palestinians regarded as the address for negotiations. The tendency of the Arabs and the Palestinians to run to the Security Council every time they had a serious grievance, combined with domestic pressures in the U.S. to veto all UN resolutions critical of Israel, tended to increase alienation between the U.S. and the Palestinians and their Arab friends.

I always thought we should have used the Security Council more creatively, with our influence and our leadership, to craft resolutions in the Security Council which would go beyond sterile Israel bashing and help the situation. Instead, the policy in Washington was that when it came to Security Council resolutions on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, we should not negotiate and that the “worst” draft resolutions were the “best” because they were easier to veto.

Q: What was the state, I am a little bit foggy on the chronology, one the Intifada, the uprising. When did or was this to take place? The other one was the beginning of talks with the Arab, the PLO in Tunisia and all of this.

WILCOX: The Intifada began in November, 1987, with riots in Gaza and in the West Bank city of Nablus sparked by the deaths of Palestinian youths in confrontations with the IDF. It spread spontaneously, with strikes, marches, barricades, and stonings of Israeli forces.

In a matter of months a full scale mass protest movement emerged, led by a clandestine Intifada leadership dominated by the PLO Fatah faction. Protesters had no firearms, but used stones against the IDF. The leadership also issued regular leaflets which contained propaganda and calls for strikes, boycotts against Israeli products, and the withholding of Palestinian day laborers from work in Israeli factories and homes and fields. The leaflets contained a lot of rhetoric, as well as the core of the Intifada's ideology and tactical advice to the Palestinians. We read these documents with great care and reported them.

The Israelis were caught by surprise, since the Palestinians had been relatively passive since 1967, and had never before mounted a sustained protest movement. The IDF was forced to deploy many more Israeli troops in the West Bank and Gaza than they ever had in the past. Its strategy was to respond with major force, for fear of being seen as weak, instead of ignoring the riots and letting them play out, which would have been a sounder strategy. So thousands of young Israeli conscripts and older reservists found themselves involved in street battles with stone-throwing Palestinian kids. The IDF saw themselves as a fighting army and they were cast in this new role as policemen to put down street riots. They were unprepared. Although the policy was to use live fire only in self defense, the death toll from live fire grew. Many Palestinians were also killed or wounded by rubber, steel-cored, bullets that were widely used. The IDF also used beatings, curfews, massive arrests, and the confinement of people in whole villages or areas, a form of collective punishment.

Rather than subduing the Intifada, these Israeli practices intensified it, and the IDF was put, increasingly, on the defensive. The uprising had a profound effect on Israeli public opinion which in the past has assumed that the occupation could be maintained without much effort and that the Palestinians had been subdued. Now they were sending their sons and husbands to subdue Palestinian teenagers and they found this troubling. The troops themselves disliked the new role they had been cast in, and a process of soul searching about the occupation began.

At the same time, the Palestinians began to sharpen their propaganda and to articulate more carefully their cause to sympathetic Israeli journalists and to the western media. The western press reported on the Intifada intensively and the specter of heavily armed Israeli armed forces beating up unarmed Palestinian youths created a lot of sympathy in the United States and Western Europe for the Palestinians. [As a result of] this renewed interest and attention to the Palestinian cause, many for the first time saw the human dimension of the occupation and all its anomalies. In Israel, people began to ask how the occupation could be sustained - and the peace movement and political ferment grew.

Some Israelis advocated harsher crackdowns on the Palestinians, but many others said this [was] an untenable [price] for a liberal democracy to pay in terms of repression and violation of human rights and began to advocate a political solution. The Palestinians, themselves gained a new sense of pride. [They] gained new respect and increased understanding in the world, where they had often projected a negative image. This external recognition, plus the fact that the Palestinians had for the first time stood up to the Israelis, gave the Palestinians a new sense of confidence and, in return, realism and honesty about their situation with the Israelis. The fact that the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza took the initiative in the Intifada themselves, without prompting or direction from the external PLO, added to their sense of confidence. As a result, Palestinians began to talk among themselves and to us about recognizing Israel and a negotiated peace which would result in the creation of a Palestinian state which would live peacefully with Israel. Such talk was almost never heard in the '70s or the '80s when I had first met Palestinians. We engaged with Palestinians and encouraged them.

There had been signs over the years of pragmatism and moderation within the PLO, but the mold of rejectionism had not been broken, in part, I think, because the U.S. did not engage with the PLO. A major change in Palestinian doctrine came at the Algiers meeting of the Palestinian National Congress in 1988 when an aide of Arafat's, Bassam Abu Sharif, published a paper, with official blessing, that called for the creation of two states, the recognition of Israel, and peace between them. At first, Washington was skeptical and paid little attention, but this was a seminal document that reflected an important shift in Palestinian thinking.

The Intifada was the impetus for this change. The Palestinians in West Bank and Gaza, for the first time, began to assert themselves with the external PLO. They were in constant touch with Arafat and the PLO leadership and were urging them to be more creative and to seek a political solution with the Israelis. Arafat and his leadership reacted positively, recognizing that they had to be responsive to their constituents in the occupied territories who had initiated and were bearing the brunt of the Intifada. A new synthesis emerged in the PLO that led to its commitment to forswear terrorism and recognize resolution 242 and to the beginnings of a U.S.-PLO dialogue in Tunis. That dialogue was suspended when the gang of Abu Abas, a radical member of the PLO executive committee, staged an abortive attack against Israel on the beach at Herzliyya, near Tel Aviv.

To summarize, the Intifada created real political movement on both the Israeli and Palestinian side in the direction of accommodation. It was an important event in the history of the conflict and the peace process.

Q: What was your role during this time, when the Intifada had reached full proportions. Could you talk about how we were seeing it there? Was there a different perspective from our embassy in Tel Aviv and also with Israeli officials, sort of how did you fit into this and what were you reporting?

WILCOX: The embassy in Tel Aviv received the full weight of Israeli views and reported them. I think the embassy in Tel Aviv also understood that the Intifada was a serious crisis and that it created a new situation which [called] for renewed diplomatic efforts. Tel Aviv was also responsible for covering Gaza, so it had a window into Palestinian affairs. Naturally, since most of the embassy's interlocutors were Israelis, they tended to pay more attention to Israeli urgings and demarches, but I do not think the embassy's reporting was biased or unbalanced. I made a point of visiting the embassy almost weekly and consulting with our ambassador. The ambassador was Tom Pickering when I arrived, and Bill Brown during the latter part of my tour there. I felt it was very important for the embassy and the consulate general to avoid an adversary relationship and become the advocates of their respective clients. I urged my staff and embassy likewise to get our two staffs together so that we could talk about a common U.S. approach to these things. There was not always agreement, but there was regular contact by phone and in person, and I felt it was critical to maintain this. There had been times in the past where there was severe tension between the consulate general and the embassy. In some respects it was kind of built in to this situation. I was aware of this and worked hard to avoid it.

Q: What was the great focus of the press, TV news, CNN with particularly cable news. I mean you can always lead with a story showing Palestinian youths throwing rocks at Israeli troops and groups of Israeli troops firing back. I mean here you were, this was your area of responsibility. Did you find it difficult dealing with the press?

WILCOX: I dealt with them regularly as I always had in Washington. I tried to give them the most objective appraisal I could to expound U.S. policy. The press did a particularly good job of reporting on the Intifada. The U.S. press helped illuminate the issues to the American public, as did the Israeli media for the Israelis. Media reporting helped create the political catharsis on both the Israeli and Palestinian sides that was quite encouraging.

Q: What did you and your staff do during this time to sort of get out the word. You know, this is an opportunity. Whom were you talking to about this?

WILCOX: There wasn't an elected or formally recognized leadership structure in the West Bank. The old municipal leadership had been undermined by Israeli deportation, and the Israelis discouraged the emergence of other leaders by arrests and deportations. This lack of a coherent recognized political structure on the inside made it difficult to find the points of authority and key interlocutors.

The Intifada leadership were young people who were unidentified and carefully concealed. There was an overt tier of respected pro-PLO Palestinians, however, including journalists, lawyers, doctors, businessmen, notables, and political figures like Faisal Husseini who were influential and served as a kind of local leadership. We saw these people regularly. They and the younger clandestine Intifada leadership were all trying to persuade the PLO to move further toward compromise.

There was chronic rivalry among Palestinians, as there had been historically, that threatened their unity and sense of purpose. This rivalry, based on regional and clan ties, weakened the cohesiveness of the community and its ability to deal with their situation. Arafat and the external PLO encouraged this rivalry, since they did not want strong political leaders to emerge in the occupied territories. Disunity was a constant problem when we had American visitors either from the Congress or the executive branch who wanted to talk to Palestinians. Our job was to invite Palestinians who have some stature and who might in some way be representative to meet with Americans. But because of rivalries, it was not always easy to get a group of Palestinians who would come to meet with senior Americans. Often they were interested in who else was coming. That was part of our burden in the consulate general, but we generally succeeded. We had to work very hard with the Palestinians to identify a team of Palestinians to meet with Secretary Baker when he began his round of diplomacy.

Most Palestinians viewed the U.S. as partisan and pro-Israel, and this complicated our relations with them, but most realized the value of contacts with the consulate, and during my first year in Jerusalem we had superb access. However, after the U.S. veto of the Security Council resolution following the killing of the Palestinians at Rishon Lezion and in Gaza in the midst of the Intifada, the most prominent Palestinians decided to boycott all further contacts with Americans. This interrupted some of our contacts, but we stayed in touch with many others and with intermediaries of the boycott group.

Q: During this time of great tension and confrontation, I would have thought you would have been quite concerned about Americans who were settlers there. Just by the filtering process as you say, these tended to be the most zealous of the group who have come over and made this choice. Were you kind of keeping an eye out of saying You know I am a little worried about this guy or group or something. They might start shooting, because they were armed.

WILCOX: One of my colleagues, Bob Silverman, who spent a good deal of time following the settler movement, once approached a settlement and was accosted at gun point by a settler and forced to leave. At my request the embassy protested this to the government of Israel.

Q: What about dealing with the Israeli officials in Jerusalem?

WILCOX: The only relationship we had with Israeli officials was with the municipality of Jerusalem. That tradition was established many years ago, so I would regularly deal with Mayor Teddy Kollek and his deputies. We had housekeeping, security, and logistic problems, so we needed to have contact with the municipality. Those relations were usually cordial and direct.

On the other hand, we did not have formal relationships with the foreign ministry and the foreign ministry instructed its personnel not to deal with consulate officers. Nonetheless, having worked earlier in Israeli affairs, I had friends in the government of Israel and occasionally they would come to my residence, but they did so after hours. There was no formal relationship. Israeli doctrine of the indivisibility of Jerusalem and permanent Israeli control of Jerusalem was vigorously asserted, and the Israelis resented the fact that the Americans had an independent diplomatic mission in Jerusalem that reported directly to Washington, while we maintained our embassy in Tel Aviv. There was always tension there, but it has existed for many years. By and large, Israeli diplomats were professionals, very sophisticated people. They generally handled this in a civilized way.

There was one major exception. Several members of my staff who lived in West Jerusalem reported over a period of months that their apartments had been broken into and items were moved in a way designed to show that someone had been there surreptitiously. Nothing was stolen. When I was convinced that there was a pattern to this, I called on the Director of Protocol at the Foreign Ministry to alert him to this problem. I strongly suspected that Israeli security personnel had entered the apartments as a form of harassment or game playing. I wanted to let the Foreign Ministry know of my concern [by] alleging official involvement. Thereafter, there were no further entries.

Q: When did you go to Jerusalem.

WILCOX: In 1988 in April.

Q: I'm not sure whether you missed it but it is almost a rite of passage that in any election year around the time of spring is when the primaries come. That's when every candidate for anything goes to New York and promises that they are going to see that our embassy is moved to Jerusalem. That hasn't happened, I mean it comes up all the time. It may happen some time. Did that come up in your watch?

WILCOX: It came up constantly. We kept our embassy in Tel Aviv in 1948 after the [Israeli] government moved to Jerusalem, and maintained the independent status of the consulate general in Jerusalem to demonstrate that the status of Jerusalem had to be resolved in negotiations, not unilateral acts. When Israel occupied East Jerusalem in 1967, we regarded that part of the city as occupied territory.

Today, the Palestinians demand the recovery of East Jerusalem and the establishment of the capital of the Palestinian state there. They no longer seek recover West Jerusalem where many tens of thousands of Palestinians lived before 1948 and were forced out of their homes to East Jerusalem or the West Bank or elsewhere.

There was a wall between the East and West sides of the city between 1948 and 1967, and Jews were denied access to their holy sites. Some Israelis fear that if the Palestinians are given East Jerusalem they will re-divide the city. The Palestinians, [however], say they want and need an open city in which the two communities can deal with each other. Jerusalem has enormous emotional significance for both Israelis and Palestinians, and it is wrong to assert that one side or another has a superior claim to Jerusalem or that one or another has more historical significance. The fact is that it is of supreme political and religious importance for both Palestinians and Israelis will ultimately require a Palestinian capital in East Jerusalem and perhaps some novel arrangements for shared sovereignty in certain areas. This can be done, although it is increasingly difficult because of the construction of huge Israeli settlements in large areas of East Jerusalem on confiscated Arab land.

Because a solution of the Jerusalem issue is critical to a comprehensive Palestinian-Israeli peace settlement, the U.S. must continue to insist that the final status of East Jerusalem must be settled by mutual agreement. If we move our embassy to Jerusalem before that happens, we will undermine or role as intermediary and therefore risk prolonging conflict, with resultant damage to our interests in the Middle East and a stable peace for both Israelis and Palestinians.

Q: How did the Gulf War between Iraq and the United States and other powers impact on you?

WILCOX: Staying with Jerusalem, for a minute, there has been a lot of rhetoric about the unity of Jerusalem. But it is, in fact, a deeply divided city in which 30-40% of the population are Arabs who oppose Israeli rule. The city is divided politically, socially, and psychologically, and there is chronic tension. The Jewish-Arab geographical division is far less distinct now because of the settlers in East Jerusalem. The current arrangement is unsatisfactory in every way. I have always believed that a political division of the two peoples in the city will bring about a closer social, economic and cultural relations between them and create a much happier city. The city would remain open, in any case, since the Arabs want an open city as much as the Israelis do.

Q: When you are talking about Jerusalem, did you and your staff have any problem with the tensions there during the time you were there or with the extreme orthodox element?

WILCOX: The ultra orthodox ignored us, but the settlers disliked us because the U.S. opposed settlements and advocated a territorial compromise with the Arabs. However, we watched security very carefully. I think Washington often exaggerated the threat to American citizens in Jerusalem through the frequent issuance of travel advisories, especially during the Intifada. At one time there was pressure to actually move my staff who lived in East Jerusalem into West Jerusalem. I successfully resisted this.

Q: That would be a political move, too.

WILCOX: It would have had profound political significance and would have crippled our mission. The mayor of Jerusalem, Teddy Kollek, was quite unhappy with our security advisories on Jerusalem, and he once called me in and told me that there had been 11 homicides in Jerusalem in I think it was 1989 whereas, there had been X-hundred homicides in the city of Washington that year. He said we should pay more attention to security in our own country and avoid our alarmist security advisories about Jerusalem because it hurt tourism, which was and is hugely important to Jerusalem's economy.

Q: Well, then let's go to the Gulf War. Could you explain one, what the Gulf War was, and then talk about its impact on your operations.

WILCOX: In 1990 and 91, President Bush, mobilized a brilliantly successful coalition of western states who deployed multinational forces led mainly by the U.S. ultimately to drive the Iraqis out of Kuwait. That required vigorous diplomacy with our allies in the UN Security Council. The coalition victory against Saddam Hussein and was a great victory for the United States and the west. The Gulf War drew in Israel because Saddam began to launch SCUD missiles against Israel. The United States, fearing that Israeli retaliation against Iraq would undermine the U.S. Arab cooperation against Saddam, urged that the Israelis forebear from retaliating against Iraq. Deputy Secretary Eagleburger visited Israel in an effort to persuade them not to, and succeeded.

Q: You were saying the Israelis did not respond to these attacks in part because of the Americans and in part because...

WILCOX: The Israelis decided not to respond to the Iraqi attacks in part, because of our urging, but also in part because of the lack of militarily effective means of retaliating. The SCUDs were being launched from the deserts of Iraq. They were very difficult to pinpoint. Aerial attacks from Israel against Iraqi sites would require over flights of Jordan or Syria which those countries certainly would not have permitted, and therefore would have meant a violation of the airspace. The Israelis probably recognized they couldn't find these sites, some of which were mobile, and that bombing them wouldn't be an effective response. They probably also recognized that they did not have the capability of sending ground forces to Iraq to destroy these missile sites, even if they could locate them. Another over flight route would have been over Saudi Arabia.

So, they did not retaliate, departing from the normal tradition of hitting back hard. The Israeli public hunkered down and withstood the missile attacks. Miraculously, they killed no one, but did considerable damage in Tel Aviv in certain neighborhoods. The Iraqi SCUDs were primitive and poorly guided. To help Israel, the U.S. deployed batteries of Patriot anti-missile missiles in Tel Aviv. There was a controversy about how effective these missiles actually were, but it was a political gesture by the United States which helped reinforce the Israeli policy of not retaliating against Iraq.

Q: What about your staff in this? What changes in your work was happening?

WILCOX: There was real concern about the safety of Americans, and a good many Americans from Tel Aviv were evacuated with their wives. A number of my own staff were evacuated also including spouses. My wife Cynda also left, reluctantly. No missiles were launched against Jerusalem. I predicted this, because Jerusalem was also an Arab city, and the site of many Islamic holy places. But, there was real concern. These missiles were also quite inaccurate. We could see their trails passing overhead in the night. You could never tell where they were going to land, so there was much anxiety.

Q: Were you hit with a wave of visa requests?

WILCOX: Some Israelis left the country. Tourism virtually stopped. But for the most part the Israelis hunkered down. There was a massive, well organized civil defense effort. There was great concern about chemical warheads on these missiles, and Israelis were issued gas masks and vinyl sheeting to seal up their houses and Atabrine, a medical antidote, were available. The Israelis did an excellent job in reacting to this. There was no panic.

Q: How about within the West Bank community? One, reaction to Iraq's war and two, how they reacted to the missile threat and what the Israelis were doing to them.

WILCOX: Before the war started, Palestinian intellectuals were for the most part contemptuous of Saddam Hussein. They saw him as an Arab tyrant, not a leader they wanted to emulate. But when the war began and the missile attacks started, there was a spontaneous support among many Palestinians for Saddam. There was shock and chagrin of course, on the part of the Israelis and West that the Palestinians could support Saddam. But this behavior was quite understandable, if regrettable, given the Palestinians enmity for their Israeli occupiers and their apparent helplessness to do anything about it. Arafat, you will recall, actually went to Baghdad and was photographed embracing Saddam., a step he later regretted when Saddam lost the war. The Palestinians support for Iraq alienated them, for awhile, from the U.S. A more important consequence was the expulsion of hundreds of thousands of Palestinians from Kuwait.

Q: Did you have either a problem or a situation to deal with let's say before the missile attacks, because there was a period of a few months almost six months I suppose. The Iraqis went into Kuwait in August of 1990, and we really didn't start attacking until January guess, of 1991. The United States was sort of shocked to see particularly these Jordanians jumping around with joy about what Saddam had done to Kuwait. Did you have the same thing in Jerusalem and the West Bank?

WILCOX: Palestinian support for Saddam was influenced, I think, by the inferior status that the Palestinians had been given in Kuwait where there were thousands and thousands of Palestinians, professionals, working people, businessmen. Very few had been given Kuwaiti citizenship, although they made important contributions to Kuwait. As for Jordan, King Hussein's support for Saddam also infuriated Washington, but given Jordan's critical economic relationship with Iraq and support among the masses for Saddam, the King had less room for maneuver than the U.S. realized.

Q: Did you find yourself having to say come on fellows, Saddam Hussein is our enemy, and you are not helping yourselves. I am talking during this time.

WILCOX: Of course that was our message. We said it was crazy for the Palestinians to support Saddam Hussein when it was in the interest of the Palestinians to make common cause with the United States which was better positioned than anyone else to try to help the Palestinians make peace with the Israelis and do justice to the Palestinians. It was a disaster for the Palestinians.

Q: What was your take when you went out into Jerusalem on Arafat and his leadership, and did this change over the time you were there?

WILCOX: Arafat and his PLO leadership were in part responsible for the stalemate and lack of movement toward a negotiated settlement between Israelis and Palestinians. Arafat as I said earlier, his leaders clung for years to the notion that Israel was not a legitimate entity, that it should not be recognized, and the policy should be steadfast confrontation. There were people in the Palestinian national movement and the Palestinian diaspora who saw clearly some years ago before the Intifada that this was a hopeless position. Israel was a strong powerful state. It was there to stay and had powerful friends, and if the Palestinians wanted to salvage something from the disaster that had befallen them, they would have to treat with Israel for peace and try to divide the land. This view did not prevail in the PLO until 1988. The moderate voices were overruled and some of the moderates were even assassinated by PLO extremist groups, such as Abu Nidal's gang. Arafat's first goal was to preserve a tenuous unity among the PLO factions and to stay on top. He had devoted his career to keeping this diverse group of Palestinian exile organizations. They ranged from the moderately peaceful to the most violent and fanatic. Arafat did this quite successfully over the years.

If Arafat had been a leader of broader vision, he might have faced down the radical factions of the PLO much earlier and pursued a more pragmatic policy toward peace with Israel. If he had done so, he might have found a willing partner in Israel, but he also might not have. Israel is also to be blamed for rejectionism, since for years, there was no interest in Israel in dealing with the PLO, which was regarded as a terrorist organization, and the great majority of the Israelis were in denial about Palestinian nationalism and the need for a Palestinian state and a withdrawal from the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem. So was the United States, which had forsworn any political contacts with the PLO or Arafat. Like Israel, the U.S. failed to understand the reality and depth of Palestinian nationalism and the centrality of the PLO, and continued to pursue the chimera of a Jordanian solution to the Palestinian issue. So, the radicals, the hard liners prevailed for decades among the Palestinians and the Israelis until the Intifada and the Gulf War precipitated changes that led to the Madrid conference and the Oslo Declaration of Principles.

Q: Did Jordan have any, did you see the hand of Jordan any time you were there?

WILCOX: Yes, Jordan itself has a fascinating history of pragmatic relations with the early Zionists and the state of Israel going all the way back to King Abdullah. He was the only Arab leader during the 1930s and '40s who recognized that Zionism and Israel had to be dealt with. Abdullah was also fierce opponent of the Palestinian national movement and saw the Palestinians and the Hashemites as competitors for Palestine, and for this reason he saw that he had a common interest with the Zionists.

In 1948 Jordan assumed that it would remain the sovereign power in the West Bank and Abdullah let the new Israeli government know that he was interested in peace. King Hussein inherited his grandfather's interest in coexistence with Israel, and viewed Palestinian nationalism as a threat to the Hashemite Kingdom. He unwisely bowed to Egyptian and Arab pressure and allowed Jordan to be dragged into the 1967 war, and lost the West Bank to Israel. Jordanian-Palestinian enmity grew worse when in 1970, the PLO, in the Black September movement, challenged Jordan militarily, and lost. Over the next two decades, Hussein gradually began to recognize that it was not in Jordan's strategic interest to recover the West Bank. This would have meant the absorption of two million Palestinians into Jordan which already was composed of a populace that was at least half Palestinian. To have absorbed this additional burden of Palestinians would have threatened the future of the Hashemite dynasty. So, in 1987 as the Intifada was taking root, King Hussein made an historic announcement that he no longer aspired to recover the West Bank, and that the Palestinians were on their own. This reflected his vision as a statesman and a politician.

Q: Although he renounced it, we didn't.

WILCOX: Right. We were still behind the Jordanians. Now we were not committed in any articulate way to the Jordan option, but it was implicitly what we wanted. It was also the arrangement the Israeli Labor party wanted. By the mid-1980s the Labor Party was willing to cede part of the West Bank to Jordan, because it recognized that the status quo was not tenable. They trusted Hussein, and saw the solution in a Jordanian-Palestinian arrangement, with Jordan as the senior partner.

Q: Was there a let down, a disappointment. Iraq collapsed rather quickly. I mean there was supposed to be this great battle, and it turned out that the Iraqis didn't stand up to the allied forces at all, although Saddam Hussein maintained it so. I would have thought that you would on the part of the people in East Jerusalem and the West bank had invested quite a lot of emotional capital in this. Did you see a let down?

WILCOX: There was deep despair. There had been this euphoria, an unrealistic view that somehow the Arab world, the Islamic world would rally to Saddam Hussein. The U.S. victory created a sense of disappointment, and political defeat. By that time the Intifada, which had caused great suffering, was faltering, and it was clear that the Israelis would not yield to the Palestinians. Israeli repression, economic restrictions, various forms of collective punishment had been effective in blunting the Intifada. Internecine rivalries among the Palestinians also played a part. And radical Palestinian groups began killing other Palestinians for political reasons, and to settle scores. It was an ugly business. The early sense of hope and euphoria had faded. So, at the end of the Gulf War, whereas the Intifada had inspired a sense of sort of hope and confidence earlier, this spirit was replaced by disillusionment.

It was at this time that Bush administration recognized the opportunity which the victory of the U.S. in the Gulf and the fall of the Soviet Union offered for a resurrection of the peace process. Bush and Baker seized the moment, using the greatly enhanced power of the U.S. and the favorable new geo-political situation to launch a new peace initiative, and they did so in a very determined way.

Q: When did you leave Jerusalem to get a feel for the timing?

WILCOX: I left Jerusalem in September of 1991, after Secretary Baker had visited there five times for negotiations with local Palestinians and with the Shamir government, a process that ultimately led to the Madrid conference, the beginning of the renewed peace process.

Q: What was your impression of Secretary Baker's engagement, and this was really his first time. I mean we had the collapse of the Soviet Union which was enough on anyone's plate, and in a way he was sort of dragged in to this thing by the Gulf War.

WILCOX: The collapse of the Soviet Union was as you say a factor in emerging American supremacy, and it greatly enhanced our diplomatic leverage in dealing with the Middle East where the Soviets were no longer a factor on behalf of the radical Arabs.

Q: Could you talk about your impression of Secretary Baker, particularly from what you saw because oral history is trying to focus on the view, and also members of his team, Dennis Ross and others.

WILCOX: Baker was a tough, skilled negotiator who understood that here was an opportunity for American leadership and for another effort to resolve this chronic, decades-old problem. The convergence of forces which I have mentioned brought about a genuine, full blown negotiating effort. Baker and Bush deserve great credit for taking this initiative. As Baker became more involved, he got the bit in his mouth and began to push both sides hard. He ultimately succeeded in bringing the parties together at an international conference, one of his finest achievements as Secretary of State.

Q: Did you have much contact with him?

WILCOX: Yes, in Jerusalem when he came, he would meet with Palestinians at my residence. He was tough, persistent negotiator, human, and frank. The Palestinians respected him; I think he respected them too. He understood that they had something to say, and I think, had some sympathy for their position. Of course, I was never with him when he was with the Israelis, but he had the same style with the Israelis. Shamir resisted Baker, all the way, but Baker prevailed, and dragged Shamir against his will to the Madrid Conference.

Q: Well, in a way, this was a real historic thing in that the secretary of state was treating the Palestinians as real people.

WILCOX: The U.S. had never had high level contact with the Palestinians in the past, above the level of the consulate general, at least until the dialogue began in Tunis in 1988, but that was quite limited in content. George Shultz made a gesture to the Palestinians in 1987, I think it was that year, when he offered to meet with a group of Palestinians at the American Colony Hotel in East Jerusalem. They foolishly boycotted him and no one came. So Baker's contacts were really the first at the level of Secretary of State. Shultz met once in Washington with Edward Said and Abraham Abu Loughud, but they were Palestinian-American citizens.

Q: Did you have a responsibility to get the right Palestinians there to talk. You talk about these factions and going through a period of depression, I would have thought it would be difficult to get the right group together.

WILCOX: Very difficult. There was jealousy and no recognizable center in the Palestinian community. I think that's the way Arafat wanted it, and the Israelis had also done their share to prevent the emergence of a strong local leadership, for example, by arresting and often deporting nationalist political leaders, and undermining local government by appointing puppet mayors. One of the most able and respected Palestinians, Faisal Husseini, had been repeatedly jailed by the Israelis for his nationalist views, as had others.

The idea of meeting with Baker was controversial because the Palestinians had a sense of grievance against the U.S., which they saw as pro-Israel. Indeed, at the time the Bush-Baker initiative was conceived, the Palestinians were still boycotting official contacts with all American officials, including the consulate. Also, they had no local representative institutions for choosing leaders to negotiate for them, and none of the local leaders were ever sure where they stood vis a vis the PLO. The meetings that ultimately happened required Arafat's approval, so there was a lot of to and froing with Tunis, by fax and phone, which the Israelis doubtless monitored. So, it was touch and go, and I was never certain whether the first of these meetings would come off.

My principal interlocutor with the Palestinians had been Faisal Husseini, the son of Abdul Khader Husseini, the famous Palestinian military leader, was killed in the battle at Kastel near Jerusalem in the 1948 war. Faisal Husseini was an educated man, committed to the Palestinian cause, from the dominant Palestinian clan that had produced the leader of the nationalist movement in the late thirties and early forties, Haj Amin al-Husseini, the Mufti of Jerusalem.

I called on Faisal Husseini soon after my arrival in Jerusalem after he had been released from prison and established a relationship with him. He had had no contacts with the consulate for many years, and was still considered a dangerous radical by the Israelis. I found him a thoughtful man who had studied the Palestinian-Israeli conflict very deeply and was beginning to evolve a new and realistic view of the need for peace and compromise. Notwithstanding his long imprisonment, he took a statesmanlike view of things and avoided the anti-Israeli hatred and the doctrinaire bombast one often heard from Palestinians. While in prison, he had learned Hebrew, and he was developing close contacts with Israeli liberals and the Peace Now movement.

Husseini had a lot of stature in the Palestinian community, in part because he was smart, steady, and incorruptible, and in part because he was the son of Abdul Quader and the grand nephew of the Mufti. But his aristocratic family lineage was also an obstacle, especially among young radical Palestinians who believed that the time of the old families and “notables” had come and gone, since they had failed to rescue the Palestinians.

When Assistant Secretary John Kelly called me from Washington and announced that Baker wanted to meet with a representative group of Palestinians, I began working to assemble a delegation, putting the word out by phone or in meetings with intermediaries with whom we had kept in touch despite the boycott.

One evening late at night, Faisal Husseini called me at my residence and said it is time to - I think he used the phrase - “turn a new page,” that the Palestinian-U.S. impasse should give way to dialogue, and that the Palestinians recognized Baker’s initiative as an opportunity and would agree to meet with him. This showed courage and leadership on his part, and indicated he had overcome the rejectionists who wanted no contact with the U.S. It also indicated that he had been given the green light from the PLO in Tunis. So working with him, we gradually assembled the right group of Palestinians, and the first meeting took place with Jim Baker. He made five trips while I was in Jerusalem, and there were further meetings when Molly Williamson took over as my successor. Through his meetings with the Palestinians and separate meetings with the Israelis, Baker put together agreed terms of reference for the Madrid peace conference, a major diplomatic breakthrough.

Q: What was the role of Dennis Ross at this point?

WILCOX: Dennis Ross had become Secretary Baker's principal aide and advisor on the peace process. Others on the team were Dan Kurtzer, who later became Deputy Assistant Secretary. Dan is now Ambassador to Egypt. John Kelly, the Assistant Secretary of State, and David Welch who at that time was working on the NSC staff with Dennis Ross.

Q: Did you find yourself having sort of post mortems after these meetings with the Palestinians. You know they would come to you and say what was that all about? I mean it is a normal thing, figure out what we would talk about.

WILCOX: Yes. I tried to set the stage for further meetings and to refine the issues and to urge them to focus more clearly and to sharpen up their understanding of what we were looking for. We didn't start immediately with the concept of an international conference in Madrid. That emerged. Baker's approach was “Here is an opportunity for peace. It is good for you and good for your neighbors and good for us. Let's be realistic and pragmatic, and see what we can put together.” This big sticking point, of course, was that the Israelis would not talk to the PLO, who by then Washington had finally realized represented the Palestinians. Also the Israelis feared an international conference, fearing a gang up. Ultimately Baker sold the Israelis a formula for an opening conference, to be followed by bilateral negotiations.

As Baker's meetings with the Palestinians developed, it was implicit that the Palestinians were not speaking for themselves, but the PLO. Baker understood this, but persuaded the Palestinians to go along with the fiction that the PLO was not involved, so that the Israelis could be brought on board. In the end, all sides agreed to a formula that Baker finally sold, though the Palestinians didn't like it, that the Palestinians would not have their own delegation at Madrid, but would be joined with the Jordanians. At Madrid, the facade of Jordanian primacy was quickly broken and it became clear to the world that the Palestinians were speaking for Palestinians, not Jordan.

Q: Did you have a feeling that you were helping to create Palestinian or at least a West Bank Jerusalem leadership?

WILCOX: We didn't create it, but we encouraged it to think realistically and to engage with the United States and ultimately with Israel. I think that was really the main mission and accomplishment of the consulate general at that time, to cultivate, encourage the local leadership to move in the right direction. This took a lot of sympathy, encouragement and diplomacy. We wanted the Palestinians to know we respected them and that we saw them as a people with equities and a cause that deserved our respect and attention. They needed this, because they felt, justifiably, that their cause had been neglected and misunderstood, and there was a lot of resentment.

The Palestinians on their part did not understand the United States. They had limited grasp of the West and they did not know how to project their cause or articulate it. They had done a lousy job of this over the years, in part because they lacked knowledge of the U.S., and in part because their cause was so clear to them that they assumed everyone else should understand and accept it. Also, I think those elements who used terrorism as a political weapon gravely undermined their cause. For many in the U.S., the Palestinian movement was identified with terrorism rather than the legitimate claims of a people who also deserved our support and respect just as the Israelis did. And terrorism played into the hands of the Israeli hard right who preached that the Palestinians were determined to destroy Israel and that efforts to compromise with them were naïve and dangerous. This view was often promoted, of course, by the Likud and other right wing elements who wanted no compromise and for whom hanging on to the occupied territories was more important than peace. Demonizing the Palestinians provided a rationale for their expansionist ideology.

So giving the Palestinians a sense that they were important and we respected them and they had equities and rights was very important. Baker's willingness to engage with them helped a lot. Of course, that was our job at the consulate.

Q: Were you seeing any growth in a political movement in the United States? You know there is a Jewish Israeli one; there is the Greek one, Irish one, and there are a considerable number of Arabs in the United States from various places in the Arab world, and yet they never seemed to be very cohesive.

WILCOX: It hasn't been very cohesive because it is a very diverse community. The Arab world is vast and varied, and this is reflected in the ethnic, religious, national origin differences among members of the Arab-American community. The Arab American community has sought assimilation as its first goal and has not coalesced into a strong and influential lobbying group. So it hasn't been a major force in articulating the Palestinian point of view in the Congress or the executive branch.

Now they certainly have improved their performance. The National Association of Arab Americans and the Arab-American Anti-Discrimination Committee has an articulate, thoughtful leadership now. They support the peace process and an equitable solution with Israel. There are similarly many American Jewish organizations that have been pro-peace and also backed the Madrid and Oslo processes. Many American Jews were relieved and pleased with this turn of events and strongly supported it during the Peres-Rabin era. When the Likud returned to power, official American Jewish opinion became somewhat more conservative. The voices of the moderate and liberal voices within the American Jewish community were not as prominent as they were during the days of Labor governments, and AIPAC has become more right wing.

WILLIAM ANDREAS BROWN
Ambassador
Israel (1988-1992)

Ambassador William Andreas Brown was born in Winchester, Massachusetts in 1930. He joined the "Holloway Program" which was part of the Naval Reserve Officers Training Program and went to Harvard University, graduating with a Magna cum Laude degree. In 1950 he went to Marine Corps basic training in Virginia and later served in Korea. His Foreign Service career took him to a multitude of places including Honk Kong, Taiwan, Singapore, Malaysia, USSR, India, the UK, and Israel. His career includes an ambassadorship to Israel as well as several positions in the State Department, Environmental Protection Agency. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in November of 1998.

Q: Weren't you looking at the calendar in 1988?

BROWN: I was looking at the calendar because a presidential election was coming up in November, 1988, and I said to myself: "If this assignment is to be made, then let's move now, lest I get hung up in pre-election, political games. I said to Charley Hill [Executive Secretary of the Department of State] and others that I would be delighted to be appointed Ambassador to Israel. However, I said, "For goodness' sake, let's move the nomination process along."

Well, bureaucracy being what it is, I didn't get the call from President Reagan until late April, 1988. At the time I was at the baggage carousel at Kennedy Airport in New York, with the baggage rumbling around. An announcement came over the phone asking Ambassador William Brown to call such and such a number. I went to the phone and plugged in. President Reagan came on the line and asked whether I'd be willing to serve as Ambassador to Israel. I said that I would be deeply honored. I was on Cloud Nine.

Well, I then made some inquiries, and it seemed that things just were not moving. Meanwhile, my own tour as Ambassador to Thailand was coming to an end. I wanted to arrange for a hearing from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and get on with the process of formal appointment as Ambassador to Israel. But the wheels of government grind slowly, and the process went dragged on. Finally, I became very concerned about this appointment.

When I returned to Washington, I consulted with Max Kampelman, a wonderful gentleman who was then Counselor of the Department of State. Then I found that there was a hangup. By now Kampelman, representing Secretary Shultz, had communicated with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee chaired by that venerable Yankee, Senator Claiborne Pell [Democrat, Rhode Island]. Kampelman found a certain disinclination to give me a hearing on the part of Senator Pell and Senator Paul Sarbanes [Democrat, Maryland], a man of Greek ethnic background. They had apparently decided that they would not hold a hearing for me as the prospective Ambassador to Israel or for another prospective Ambassador to Athens, whose name I have forgotten. So we were at a standstill.

Q: Was there any reason given? Was there any objection to you?

BROWN: None given openly. However, the reason seemed to be that they expected Governor Dukakis [Democrat, Massachusetts] would win, and that Dukakis would therefore wish to name his own Ambassadors to Israel and Greece. This had been going on for some time, and here I was, hung up. However, having sought, in vain, a meeting with Senator Sarbanes, I was finally able, after persistent efforts, to arrange a meeting with Senator Pell.

I went to see him alone and first met with two staff aides, who were rather brusque, both before and after the meeting with Senator Pell. I won't name their names. One of them is now an Ambassador. Their clear message to me was: "Don't you get it? You should withdraw your name because the Committee on Foreign Relations isn't going to give you a hearing. That's that. You should withdraw your name, as the candidate to be Ambassador to Athens already has done." I said, "I hear what you're telling me but I'm not going to withdraw my name. I'll want to see Senator Pell."

I was then ushered in to see Senator Pell. He was a courtly gentleman who came from a patrician, Rhode Island, Yankee family. He was very courteous. He said, "Ambassador, as I look at your background and credentials, you seem eminently qualified. In the normal course of events, there would be no problem. However, the fact is that we, as the Democratic majority on this Committee, think that Governor Dukakis will win the election and strongly believe that, as the new President, he ought to have his choice of all Ambassadorial appointments, particularly in this case, for Ambassador to Israel, which is a very important position." Senator Pell was polite, but very firm in his position.

Finally, I said, "Thank you, Senator, for giving me an audience. I will abide by your decision. If your decision is not to give me a hearing, so be it, but I hope that that can be changed. In the meantime, I am going to go and study the Hebrew language. Now, since we're in private, I'll say something personal. The irony of the situation is, and I've never said this to anyone before, all my life I've been a Democrat. As a professional, career officer I've never allowed politics to show. I've been scrupulous in that respect. It so happens that I'm a lifelong Democrat and have never voted for a Republican! It also happens that my wife's maiden name was Eleni Melpomeni Coutchavlis, born of Greek parents in Boston, whose the family doctor was none other than Dr. Dukakis, the father of the Governor. He saved my wife's life by performing an appendectomy. When I joined the Foreign Service, we went to Dr. Dukakis for inoculations and medical consultations. I just find this whole thing ironic. I've even worked with Kitty Dukakis, the wife of Governor Dukakis, as Ambassador to Thailand where I addressed refugee problems which were so important to her. However, if it's your decision, the best I can say is that I'm going to study Hebrew, and thank you very much."

So I started a crash course in Hebrew. I reported my discussion with Senator Pell to Max Kampelman, who talked with Secretary Shultz. There were further conversations between Kampelman and the staffers of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. In the course of these discussions Max Kampelman passed the word that if the Committee would not give me a hearing, then there was another, possible route, that is, an interim appointment when the Congress recessed prior to the elections. Kampelman told me that the Democrats on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee staff had said, "You wouldn't dare!" Kampelman said, speaking on behalf of Shultz: "Just watch us!"

So that's how it went. I was not given a hearing before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Congress recessed, and President Reagan gave me an interim appointment as Ambassador to Israel. This meant that I received just about the same exequatur [commission] which all Ambassadors receive, to hang up on the wall of my office. However, if you looked at the commission carefully, it stated that the appointment was for this session of Congress. That's how it came about.

Now, many years later, I read in the papers about Republicans yowling about the fact that President Clinton was making recess appointments against the will of the Congress, or that there are hangups and delays on judgeships and the play between Senator Jesse Helms [Republican, North Carolina] and the White House on certain, Ambassadorial appointments. Again, this process remains ironic. This was an example of how a professional, senior officer can get unwittingly caught in the gears of a domestic, political hassle.

Q: While this was going on, were you approached by AIPAC [American Israel Political Action Committee] or other groups in Israel?

BROWN: Yes. The word spreads like wildfire on anything to do with Israel. Probably before even I knew of my interim appointment, AIPAC and other Israeli interest groups knew that I was a prospective candidate as Ambassador to Israel in the first instance and that I had received a call from President Reagan on this appointment. So I began to get all kinds of invitations and approaches in this regard, while I was assiduously trying to learn Hebrew, a very difficult language for a man of my age at the time. However, I went at it as best I could, having learned to speak, read, and write a number of other languages. Knowing at least a modicum of Hebrew was to prove very, very useful to me.

Q: Who was our Ambassador who preceded you?

BROWN: Our Ambassador was Tom Pickering, a distinguished diplomat.

Q: Had he left Tel Aviv?

BROWN: No. However, since Secretary Shultz had obtained the interim appointment as Ambassador to Israel for me, he wanted me to go to Tel Aviv as soon as possible. This resulted in one of those situations which frequently happens where the incumbent Ambassador, having served with distinction for a certain period doesn't feel in any hurry to leave the post. The incoming Ambassador wants to get to his post as soon as possible. So, let us say, there was a certain amount of jockeying back and forth.

Finally, Ambassador Pickering and his wife left Tel Aviv. Our paths crossed briefly at the airport in Paris. They were leaving for the United States, and we were on our way to Tel Aviv. We had five or 10 minutes of conversation before we separated.

In that regard I think that it's useful to pause a bit and reflect on the situation as it was in late 1988. Secretary of State Shultz had the courage to engage on a very delicate, contentious initiative by a lame duck [outgoing] administration. That is, he made an offer to Yasser Arafat [of the PLO, the Palestine Liberation Organization] and his supporters. Shultz said that, notwithstanding the by then well-established restraints on official, U.S.-PLO contacts, if Arafat could bring himself to say the necessary words and make the necessary commitment to a peaceful solution with the State of Israel and an end to "terror," we would open a dialogue with the PLO.

You may remember from my previous remarks that people could, and did, get into real trouble on this issue. For example, Andrew Young, Ambassador to the UN in the Carter administration, lost his job due to what turned out to be an unauthorized meeting with a PLO representative in New York. I believe that Ambassador Young initially hid the fact that he had met with the PLO representative. When it was discovered that, in fact, he had met with the PLO representative, he lost his job as Ambassador to the UN. President Carter was very upset at this incident because Ambassador Young was a very valuable asset to Carter, both internationally and domestically. There were those who had long argued for opening a dialogue with the PLO, but President Reagan and Secretary Shultz had initially resisted this. Then they came to the point that, if the necessary conditions were met, such a meeting could be held. That is, if Arafat would renounce terror and support a peaceful solution then we would open, under very special limitations, a dialogue. That dialogue would run through Ambassador Robert Pelletreau in Tunis and a PLO representative of Arafat.

I think that it is also worthwhile to remember how Arafat got to Tunis. Over the years Arafat had carried out many terrorist operations against Israel, some of which affected us. In 1970 he attempted to overthrow King Hussein of Jordan by a coup d'etat. This was the so-called incident of Black September, 1970, which was put down by King Hussein, and Arafat and his supporters were driven from Jordan with heavy losses and took refuge in Lebanon. He then burrowed into Lebanon, moving into the gaps between the Phalange, the Christians, the Syrians, the Shiite Muslims, and the Sunni Muslims. He established in Lebanon what became a sort of mini state on the Israeli-Lebanese border. He then launched paramilitary operations against Israel, which I witnessed as DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] in the American Embassy in Tel Aviv, in the 1979-1982 period.

This PLO activity initially escalated to the point where the Israelis countered, first with Operation Letani in 1978, in the wake of a particularly serious, Palestinian terrorist operation involving an Israeli bus. Then, later on in my time in Israel, in June, 1982, Israel invaded Lebanon and crushed the PLO. The Israelis surrounded the PLO in Beirut and then bombarded them. Finally, with our intercession, Arafat was allowed to leave Beirut, with his PLO forces, and some of their dependents, under U.S. observation and with the UN involved. He initially left Lebanon and was embraced by Papadopoulos in Greece and then found refuge, not in Damascus, [Syria], not anywhere else nearby, but way over in Tunis. So the PLO had suffered a disastrous setback, notwithstanding its own attempts to describe it otherwise.

For years Yasser Arafat hung out in Tunis, where in response to certain PLO provocations he also suffered a couple of Israeli counter raids in the process. Some of his senior lieutenants were killed in these Israeli raids. He was pretty isolated and beleaguered over in Tunis. So Arafat had an interest in making some kind of breakthrough. I was not consulted in all of this, although I was Ambassador-Designate to Israel. My views were not sought, and this operation was run out of Secretary Shultz's office. Do you remember such do-gooders as Rita Hauser and others? They themselves operated in this gray zone with Arafat and his representatives, urging him to say the right thing in public. Arafat reached the point of saying part of it, but he couldn't quite say all of it. Shultz said, "No, that's not good enough." I think that it was at some international conference, possibly in Geneva, where Arafat got in front of the TV cameras and finally read the script which we had crafted for him.

Q: He had his own supporters to conciliate.

BROWN: He had his own constituencies to contend with. PLO extremists damned all of this and called for the inevitable armed struggle with Israel and its total eradication. However, Arafat finally made this statement, just as I was going to Israel.

Q: Had the Intifada started at that point?

BROWN: Oh, yes. In fact, the Intifada had been going on for some time. I think that it began at the end of 1987.

Q: You might explain what that was.

BROWN: The Intifada was an uprising in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank areas, by Palestinian youths, natives of Palestine, the local crowd. They insisted on their own uprising and for their own purposes. In retrospect, it appears to have been very largely domestic and local, to the point where it became embarrassing for Arafat. I would say that, from my vantage point, he appeared to relish the thought of the Israelis being embarrassed and the spectacle of an outbreak against Israel. However, he did not relish the thought or image that this series of incidents was domestic in origin and that he was just an outside player.

The Intifada was a very delicate problem for Arafat, and, as with many other, historic examples, it was fraught with danger for him. Look at the uprisings in Eastern Europe and what happened to those who rose against the communist governments after World War II. Then the Soviet Army moved in and crushed these uprisings, and many native communists who had started them went to the wall. It's a very delicate matter to see domestic liberation or freedom fighters rise up, when you're sitting 1,000 miles away, breathing fire and brimstone.

Anyway, the Intifada began. As I said, it was conducted essentially by Palestinian youth, it was domestic in character, blessed, of course, from Arafat in Tunis, but not really run by him. The Israeli response was conducted by a coalition government which rotated between Shimon Peres [Labour Party] and Shamir [Likud Party]. Under that peculiar arrangement, as of 1988 Shamir was the Prime Minister of Israel. The Defense Minister was none other than Yitzhak Rabin. Rabin's response to the Intifada, as the minister responsible for the occupied territories of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, was reportedly: "Break their bones!" The Israeli military, employed a variety of its riot control techniques, including rubber bullets, and resorted to demolition of terrorists houses by tanks and explosives. Hundreds of these Palestinians were interrogated and given quick, administrative trials. They were then incarcerated in security centers. Some were released after a relatively short time and then ran through the same operation again as the Intifada continued.

So the Intifada was proclaimed as a great success for Arafat, but it was an embarrassment, both domestically and internationally for him.

Q: It was played on TV on a daily basis and made the Israelis look like big bullies.

BROWN: Yes. The Israelis, who had played on the Holocaust theme and acted as the misunderstood of the world, found themselves now under the international spotlight. The publication of our own, annual Human Rights Reports, under successive administrations, made Israel increasingly vulnerable to U.S. criticism. So that was the scene in Israel as I took over my duties as Ambassador.

Now, just before I left for Israel, I had held a whole series of meetings with American Jewish leaders, including AIPAC, B'nai B'rith, the Zionist Organizations of America, the Anti-Defamation League under Abe Foxman, and some other groups which were quieter but still very important, including representatives of the ultra-orthodox Jews.

I met with a significant, ultra-orthodox Jewish leader in his investment office in New York. I had a very interesting conversation with him, which covered not only the views of the ultra-orthodox Jews on Israel but on his group's operations in the Soviet Union as well. For years they had been running ultra-orthodox networks in the Soviet Union, in their determination to keep that aspect of the Jewish faith alive there. It was a sophisticated operation. It involved the distribution of their literature, their own agents, and their own channels. Altogether, it was fascinating.

Of course, we also watched the development of the Sharansky case. You may recall that I had been involved in the Sharansky case years previously in Moscow. In Moscow we dealt with the Sharansky case, the “dissentniks,” and the “refuseniks.” These people met with Secretary Shultz in April, 1987, in Moscow. I was with Shultz when he met with them in Spasso House, the American Ambassador's residence in Moscow, for a Passover or Seder meal. Shultz put on a yarmulke, but had to excuse himself later on, because Soviet Foreign Minister Shevardnadze called him by phone. I stayed with the others. We had a kosher Passover meal in the American Ambassador's residence, with all of these refuseniks and dissentniks, who were later given permission to leave the Soviet Union and go to Israel. A new process was under way. The mood was changing under Soviet President Gorbachev. We didn't yet have the huge influx of these people in Israel, but the way was being prepared for what developed into a massive exodus as the Soviet Union fell apart. A very fascinating period opened there. So that was the background as I went to Israel as American Ambassador.

I arrived in Israel, having been appointed by a lame duck President Reagan. (End of tape)

I went to Israel just as George Bush had been elected President of the United States and was waiting to be sworn into office. Present at my swearing in at the Department of State was James Baker, the prospective Secretary of State. In a surprise move, Secretary Shultz brought Baker into his office, as I was preparing to go out and be sworn in. Baker, wearing his Marine Corps tie, looked at my Marine Corps tie and said, “I don't like the school you went to [Harvard University], but I sure like your tie.”

I had met extensively with Dennis Ross, who was to become a key negotiator on Middle Eastern questions. I met President-Elect Bush in the Vice Presidential office through Dennis Ross. I remember that President-Elect Bush asked Dennis Ross: “Dennis, are you going to stay with us here?” Dennis said, “Well, sir, I think that the better course would be to move over to the Department of State and work from there.” Bush said, “All right, good luck to you.” Bush also wished me well. I'd also met with Larry Eagleburger, who was then President of Kissinger Associates up in New York and was being tapped to be Deputy Secretary of State. When we met, one on one, in Larry's office, it hadn't been officially confirmed, but it was known that this was a done deal. Larry said, “Bill, it's going to be a different ball game. I know these guys, and you're going to see changes made.”

I met with retired General Scowcroft, who was an associate of Eagleburger in Kissinger Associates, down here in the Washington office. I met with him one evening, and it certainly reinforced Eagleburger's comments about prospective changes. Scowcroft was still in the private sector at the time. However, having met and heard what Larry Eagleburger said and then hearing what Scowcroft said, I came to realize that we were in for a distinctly, shall I say, “firmer” attitude toward the Israel in general and the Shamir Government in particular.

Knowing all of this, I realized that I was in for quite a challenge as Ambassador to Israel. All of these cross currents were going to develop and sharpen, if you will, in the new administration.

Q: Did you sense, from your discussions with President-Elect Bush, that there would be a colder eye looking at Israel? Ronald Reagan had come out of the Hollywood atmosphere, but...

ROWN: I didn't sense it immediately, during that brief meeting with Dennis Ross and Bush in the Vice President's office. Incidentally, in the middle of the conversation, Bush and we rushed over to the White House Lawn because President and Mrs. Reagan were taking off in a helicopter and going someplace. The atmosphere was very jovial and convivial. They wished me luck. So I didn't get that impression in that particular meeting, but I certainly got it after Bush became the President of the United States.

So off I went to Israel in these very special circumstances. One could say that the circumstances affecting any new American Ambassador to Israel are special. When I arrived in Tel Aviv at the end of 1988, I was just delighted. You could say that this was my highest career aspiration. I knew that it was going to be tough, but perhaps I didn't realize fully how tough it was to become.

I paid my call on the President of Israel, Chaim Herzog, an old warrior who had an Irish accent, having been born in Ireland. He was the son of the Chief Rabbi, first of Belfast and later of Dublin. Later, his father became the first Chief Rabbi of Palestine and of Israel. President Herzog himself had served in Military Intelligence in the British Army during World War II. Then he became the head of Israeli Military Intelligence and was a noted military historian, having published several books on the Arab-Israeli conflicts. He was a gracious gentleman and I had a very nice meeting with him.

Then I began my calls on the then leaders of the Shamir Government, starting with Prime Minister Shamir, an old, hard line member of the Likud Party. Prior to that the Likud Party had been known as the Herut Party. Before that Shamir had been the head of the "Lehi Stern," or "The Stern Gang," as the British called it, advocating violent struggle for independence from 1946 to 1948. He was a tough man, given to very few words, especially in conversation with an American Ambassador. He would listen very carefully and was very polite. He was unyielding and unbending in his attitude on the basic problem of the Palestinians, but he was willing to listen.

The Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance was Shimon Peres, the leader of the Labour Party. He served alternately with Shamir as Prime Minister, when Likud and Labour had come out of the previous election virtually tied in terms of the number of seats which they held. They agreed to form a National Union Government, with the position of Prime Minister rotating between Peres and Shamir. This was already in effect, and Shimon Peres had already served as Prime Minister for two years, prior to my arrival in Israel. Shamir had previously done his time as Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister and was now the Prime Minister.

Yitzhak Rabin was the Defense Minister. He was a tough figure, and I talked to him many times about the Intifada. The Foreign Minister when I arrived in Israel was Moshe Arens, a fascinating gentleman, a survivor of the Holocaust and an immigrant to the United States at about age 11 or 13, or something like that. He had come up in the world as an aeronautical engineer and was a graduate of MIT [Massachusetts Institute of Technology] and California Technical Institute. He had also served in the U.S. Army. He was a younger member of the Likud Party who had immigrated to Israel with his American accent and outlook, if you will, in the very late 1940s or early 1950s. He had come up in Likud Party politics and had been appointed Ambassador to the United States in 1982, when I was DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] at the American Embassy in Tel Aviv. He had chosen a bright, young man named Binyamin Netanyahu as his DCM in the Israeli Embassy in Washington. So I knew him from those days.

When I arrived in Tel Aviv, I was without instructions. It was expected that I would wait until the new administration came in. However, I knew that what we were coming up against was a revival of the land for peace approach. This had worked with Menachem Begin and Anwar Sadat in dealing with the Sinai, but applying this principle to the West Bank and Gaza in dealing with a Likud government was quite a different matter. There was this problem with the Intifada, there was an unresolved series of issues, especially the Israeli occupied Golan Heights, outstanding with President Hafiz Assad of Syria, while the Israelis were still in Lebanon. It was quite obvious that the new American Government would come up with a variant of the land for peace concept. The question was whether we could persuade a coalition government headed by Prime Minister Shamir, with Foreign Minister Arens and other, tough, Likud Party members in it, to accept this approach.

So I went separately to Prime Minister Shamir and some of his colleagues in the cabinet and, frankly and honestly, said to them: "I am without instructions from my Government. However, what I foresee is an opportunity along the lines of 'land for peace.' I hope that you and your colleagues will think about this, because I wouldn't be surprised to see this coming." I got the standard answer from Prime Minister Shamir, which was polite but, in essence, meant: "We've already made concessions to the Arabs. We've already given up 90 percent of what we took in the 1967 War."

Q: He was mainly referring to the Sinai.

BROWN: The Sinai, yes. Lock, stock, and barrel. He added that I was talking about territories, which, in his view, were of historic, religious significance and of vital security interest as well. He said that there was a way to deal with the Palestinians and he had no desire to act as conqueror. If the Palestinians wished to reach an accommodation with Israel, there was a way for them, even under the Camp David Agreement, to run more of their affairs, peacefully. However, Shamir saw no necessity to give up land to them. He was well aware of my arguments and U.S. positions, but he simply do not see it that way. The same was true as far as Syria and the Golan Heights are concerned. Much blood had been shed there. From the positions the Syrians held they dominated Galilee and approaches to vital Israeli centers. President Assad was a brutal dictator, as shown by what he had done to his own people and to Lebanon. Shamir did not see any need to give up the Golan Heights, a vital piece of land, to Assad. Accommodations could be worked out, but Shamir did not see the need to give up this land.

With Shimon Peres I used a different approach. On the one hand, he was Deputy Prime Minister but he had distinctly different views from those of Shamir, to put it mildly. He had tried, with King Hussein of Jordan and Ambassador Tom Pickering, my predecessor, to work out a Jordanian deal. It had been discovered that he was trying to negotiate this, and that had caused quite a flap. There was also residual criticism of the way the U.S. had handled the Jordanian option in 1982.

You may recall that a land for peace approach had been presented by President Reagan and Secretary of State Shultz in September, 1982, just as I left Israel. So these possibilities had already been tried out, in one form or another. However, now there was a new wrinkle. For the first time there was to be an opening for a U.S.-PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] dialogue in Tunis. In fact, the dialogue began, not with Yasser Arafat, but with one of Arafat's lieutenants. This was a very disturbing development for the Shamir Government in Israel, so I had to cope with that.

In my discussions with the Shamir Government I was speaking truthfully and honestly, but without instructions. I reported on these discussions back to Washington and on the manner by which I had tried to discuss matters with the Israelis. The answer to what I said from the Likud Government was simply, "No."

I returned to Washington for consultations and was ushered in by Dennis Ross to see Jim Baker, the new Secretary of State. I said to Baker: "As I look at the situation, notwithstanding what I heard in response to my initial probes, I believe that there is a chance of making some progress, if this administration really puts its shoulder to the wheel. It would take your efforts, Mr. Secretary, and it would take a presidential stamp to make progress. You can't make progress at a lower level. You will have to spend your time and energy, but I do believe that we are at a moment of opportunity with the new administration. I urge you to push along those lines."

Do you want to take a break here?

Q: I think that this is a good place to do it, so we'll review the last thing you said, about talking to Secretary Baker, when you said that you felt that there was a chance of making progress on an Arab-Israeli settlement. I hope you will discuss the role, as you saw it, of Dennis Ross, and we'll just go on from there.

BROWN: Yes.

Q: Today is August 27, 1999. Bill, let's continue with what you said to Secretary Baker and what Dennis Ross's role was in all of this.

BROWN: When we broke up before, I was describing my arrival in Israel, for the first time as Ambassador.

Q: You were there from when to when?

BROWN: From late 1988 this time through the very beginning of 1992. I retired from the Foreign Service in January, 1992. Like all years in Israel, these were momentous.

I said at the end of my last interview that when I went back to Washington on consultation, although the Israeli Government was headed by Prime Minister Shamir and his tough minded, dominant faction of the Likud Party, I still felt that there could be a breakthrough in the development of the peace process. I said that to Dennis Ross, who had come over to the State Department from the NSC [National Security Council] staff at his own choice. He thought that he could do more to achieve a breakthrough in the peace process under Secretary Baker at the State Department than by just staying on at the NSC, where he had served during the Reagan administration and where he had flourished.

Q: Did I talk to you previously about Dennis Ross, in the context of your relations with him?

BROWN: I knew Dennis only tangentially before. He had, of course, been a key figure in the Washington Near East Policy Institute and was well connected. He was a young, dynamic man with an academic background and a keen interest in Middle East matters.

Q: I was wondering if you would talk about his background, because he was and is an important player in Middle Eastern affairs, and where he seemed to be coming from.

BROWN: At first this remained to be seen. He had a Jewish background. I don't know whether he had studied in Israel, but he had good connections and was a dynamic player. I would say that, in terms of politics, he was middle of the road. His earlier experience happened to have been in the Reagan administration, where he had done well. As I mentioned in a previous interview, I was with him when I paid a brief call on the Vice President and President-Elect George Bush at the White House. On that occasion Bush said to Dennis: "Are you going to stay here in the White House?" Dennis said, "Well, I'd prefer to go over to the Department of State and help Secretary of State Jim Baker in hopes of a breakthrough." Bush said, "Good luck to you!" It was a very instructive conversation. I was aware from that exchange that Dennis had very good credentials with the incoming, Bush administration.

Now, coming back to my arrival in Israel, remember that this was at the end of 1988, in the dying days of the Reagan administration. I mentioned that I had called on Prime Minister Shamir and others on a personal and private basis, stressing that I was not speaking under instructions. The newly-elected Bush administration hadn't yet taken hold. However, I expressed the hope that something meaningful could be developed in terms of land for peace. I was received courteously and graciously by Prime Minister Shamir, but it was quite obvious that we had a long, hard row to hoe, as far as convincing an Israeli Government dominated by the Likud Party that it should give up significant portions of land for peace, in accordance with UN Resolutions 242 and 332. They felt that they had given up an enormous amount of territory in the Sinai Peninsula. That is, they had given up more than 80 percent and, indeed, almost 90 percent of what they had taken in the previous conflicts with the Arabs. They had given up strategic depth, they had given up oilfields, they had given up a massive military infrastructure which they had built in the Sinai. This was obvious to anyone who looks at a map of that area.

Looking at the Syrian situation, one is struck by the bloody battles which for years had raged in and around the Golan Heights. I was again struck by the dominant aspect of the Golan Heights in any offensive movement against Israel. The Shamir Government was also opposed to ceding territory to a Palestinian entity, such as turning over the Jordan Valley to the Palestinians and opening up the possibility that a future, hostile regime, such as a Jordanian regime which might be taken over by Saddam Hussein [of Iraq]. Such a regime, for instance, might wind up on the doorsteps of Israel. All of this was made quite obvious to me. So in recommending that we move ahead on the peace process, I knew full well that we faced very, very severe challenges in this respect. Nevertheless, Israel had a coalition government, with senior elements of the Labour Party in it. Namely, in this respect, it contained Shimon Peres - who had just stepped down as Prime Minister and who was now Deputy Prime Minister and, concurrently, Finance Minister, the latter a very important job, with patronage and so forth - and Yitzhak Rabin as Minister of Defense. I thought that, if we played this right, we would somehow find leverage develop within the coalition government. I would say that I was received enthusiastically by Shimon Peres and Yitzhak Rabin when I called on them.

Q: When did you arrive in Israel as Ambassador? The Reagan administration was still in office...

BROWN: I arrived in Israel in December, 1988. It was in the dying days of the Reagan administration. Secretary of State Shultz met with Moshe Arens, incoming Israeli Minister of Defense in Washington. I was present when they met again in Paris. I think that they met in January, 1989, just before Bush was inaugurated as President.

The Shamir Government was very unhappy with the American announcement at the end of the Reagan administration of the opening of a dialogue with the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] in Tunis. However, I hadn't been involved in that decision. To the contrary, I hadn't even been briefed or approached on this matter. So I didn't have a cloud over my head in terms of the Israeli view of me in this respect.

Q: Did you have the feeling, at this time, that the Shamir Government was looking at Ronald Reagan as coming from California, which is in the movie business and the Jewish element is very strong there. Reagan was considered a very pro-Israeli person. Now George Bush was coming in as President. He represented the Eastern establishment, which was not so infatuated with Israel.

BROWN: Well, I would put it this way. The Israelis have very good biographic files on everybody prominent on the American scene. So they probably had a far better readout of past statements, remarks, and off the record and private comments made by George Bush than I did. I had a sort of neutral feeling concerning President-Elect Bush himself but I had it from none other than Larry Eagleburger, who was to become the Deputy Secretary of State and who was very well plugged in, that there would be changes. The Bush administration included people, such as Brent Scowcroft in particular, whose basic approach to Israel was certainly not to fall all over themselves. They were not anti-Semitic or anti-Israeli, but they had a firmer, more measured and cooler approach to Israel, shall we say. That's the way I saw it at the time.

As time went on, I learned more about the views of President Bush and other key figures in the administration. I didn't have a readout of Secretary of State Jim Baker in that regard. The Israelis sure did, but I didn't. He was an ex-Marine officer, of my age group, and had had a very successful law practice. He also had a reputation for being cool, well-prepared, and a good planner. I had nothing that suggested that he was going to be really tough on Israel, or anything like that. That was to come later.

Now, there's one thing that I want to pause on. In the final period of the Reagan administration negotiations had advanced, through my predecessor as Ambassador to Israel, Tom Pickering, on a convoluted agreement on the buildings of the American diplomatic establishment in Israel. For years the Israelis had been pressing, and Jewish lobbies in the United States had also been pressing, to move the American Embassy from Tel Aviv up to Jerusalem. For years U.S. presidential candidates and their supporters had pledged that this would be done.

Q: This was when the Jewish lobbies in the United States were in New York. I was going to say Miami, but I should blame New York.

BROWN: Time and again, when they were elected to office, and facing the realities of the documented U.S. position on the status of Jerusalem, succeeding Presidents had decided that the time was not ripe to move the Embassy to Jerusalem. However, in recent years there had been some movement on this. The Israelis, playing this issue for all that it was worth, had taken things to the point that formal negotiations were held, on the buildings of the American diplomatic establishment in Israel. As I said, this question is rather convoluted, and I won't go into all of the details.

Basically, a deal was worked out, whereby the Israelis would find a site in Jerusalem for our Embassy. It had been more or less negotiated and chosen. It was a site which was just on the western side of the old line between eastern and western Jerusalem. That is, the line that had formerly divided the Jordanians from the Israelis, prior to 1967. So this site was in the western portion of Jerusalem.

There was no particular time table for moving the American Embassy to Jerusalem. The site, at this particular stage, wasn't necessarily to be called the location of the American Embassy in Jerusalem. However, the Israelis, with their skillful approach to the matter, had negotiated us into a position where this site would be called the location of an American diplomatic facility in Israel. It would be a place where the American Ambassador would do business and so forth. In other words, it wasn't a clear cut statement that the American Embassy was to move to that site in Jerusalem and open up as the American Embassy, but this arrangement represented some movement on this issue.

Meanwhile, the arrangement was that the Israelis would eventually get our building, the old Embassy, in Tel Aviv. As a further possibility, the Israelis would open up other sites in the Tel Aviv area where we might construct a building. So we might go ahead and build something in Jerusalem, and a plot of land was negotiated for this purpose. The Israelis would get our old Embassy in Tel Aviv and the adjacent parking lot for which we had negotiated a lease-purchase option during my previous time as DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission]. This was a rather substantial parking lot which gave us the right to put up a building there. So we had something with which to bargain.

Secretary of State Shultz was responsible for this negotiation. He wanted to cinch it and move ahead. I ended up signing documents as the new Ambassador in Tel Aviv. This culminated the negotiating process which Ambassador Pickering, my predecessor, had started. That background has a relevance, even today. There is a basic document involved in this negotiation, which lays the groundwork for a possible move of the American Embassy to Jerusalem from Tel Aviv.

Q: What about our Embassy in Tel Aviv? Was there a problem with it? You had been in Tel Aviv, and you were saying that you might move to another site. Why would we move?

BROWN: I have to be careful about this, since we are speaking for the record. This is my personal view, Okay? There are many different views on this and related subjects.

Personally speaking, I had reached the view that we should move our Embassy, as an Embassy, to Jerusalem. That certainly was not the mainstream view in the Foreign Service. The issue is complex and highly political. It is loaded in many ways. However, here were a couple of concerns as I saw the matter, apart from my political view that this move should be made from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. In my view the American Embassy in Israel should move to the western side of the city of Jerusalem and handle its business there.

First of all, I don't want to go into detail, but in security terms, the American Embassy in Tel Aviv was, and in my view, remains vulnerable. The setback of the Embassy building in Tel Aviv has been remarkably deficient for years. The setback is the technical term for how far you setback the building from the entrance to the property on which it is located. I don't know what the current standard setback is now, perhaps 150 feet, or something like that. Perhaps the standard setback now is 200 feet, bearing in mind the bombing of the Embassy in Beirut and so forth. However, the setback in Tel Aviv is the width of a sidewalk. There are a couple of concrete barriers between the external wall of the Embassy building and the sidewalk, but a truck well loaded with explosives could easily approach and breach the wall of the Embassy. In short, the Embassy building in Tel Aviv is vulnerable.

There is a parking lot adjacent to the Embassy in Tel Aviv. There are vehicle parking areas all around the Embassy building. The building itself adjoins a bar in a rather seedy district of Tel Aviv. It used to be a red light district, in fact. Next to this bar is another structure. Thus, the location of the Embassy makes it vulnerable to attack in several respects.

Secondly, the Embassy building in Tel Aviv was initially started in the 1950s as a second or third rate hotel. It was not originally constructed as an Embassy. It was purchased in the middle of the construction period. The Embassy building faces the Mediterranean Sea on one side, and the salt in the composition of the concrete construction material produced deterioration of the building over time. One answer to this problem is that we could reconstruct the building, piece by piece. Over the years, as pieces fell off the structure, bits of patchwork were added here and there. Engineers were now telling us: "Hey, this is a serious situation. It's not going to get better. It's going to get worse." The building was crowded because the Embassy staff, over the years, had grown.

As a sailor, I very much enjoyed the building since it was close to the sea. However, we were also vulnerable to terrorist attack from the sea. Indeed, later on in my tenure in Tel Aviv such an attack was launched against Tel Aviv from the sea side. One of the targets of this attack was clearly the American Embassy. This attack was launched by an extremist faction of the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization]. This attack was aided by one of the Navy ships of Colonel Qadhafi of Libya. I'll get to that later on.

I found nothing sacred about the location of the Embassy. Of course, it was downtown. It was close to the Israeli Ministry of Defense, which was a plus. However, access to the Embassy is hindered by traffic involving people who wish to arrange for consular services. There are great streams of people lined up in front of the Embassy's consular section during working hours. That also created another security problem. The Embassy in Tel Aviv was past its time as a functioning Embassy building. Having said that, I would admit that we could function there. It wasn't dangerous to health, apart from the possibility of a terrorist attack.

There was and still is another, major factor. Over the years the U.S. and other foreign governments sternly warned the Israelis not to move any of their government ministries up to Jerusalem. You'll find discussion of that issue in your interviews, when you look back at the old days. The Israelis ignored this advice and, piece by piece, moved their government ministries up to Jerusalem. That meant, for the American Embassy, that more and more of our official business inexorably moved up to Jerusalem. This was handled by having the Ambassador, the DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission], and other officers of the Embassy, both senior and junior officers, travel up the hill to Jerusalem. With the increasing traffic congestion, this trip from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem often took a minimum of one hour and 15 minutes, to an hour and a half, or, under the worst conditions, two hours. Up and down, up and down we went. Let me tell you, this kind of travel is wearing and time consuming. It consumes personnel, vehicles, gasoline, and time.

Especially for an Ambassador and a DCM. I can remember when I was DCM under Ambassador Sam Lewis. It was extremely taxing to go up to Jerusalem, do business at night, come down to Tel Aviv, call in secretaries, dictate cables and other correspondence, and get cables out, because the more important cables have to go out right away. So this process was time consuming and physically wearing.

As I looked further into this process in 1989, I began considering various sites for a new Embassy building. The Israelis would offer us sites in the Tel Aviv area and then withdraw the offers. The objection to one of these sites was that it was too close to the Israeli Mossad [Israeli intelligence organization], or too close to this or that sensitive, security area.

Q: You seem to be saying that the Israelis really didn't want to give us anything.

BROWN: Right. They wanted us to move the Embassy to Jerusalem. However, we had a negotiated deal, and they had to go through the motions, at least, of offering us a decent site in the Tel Aviv area.

Then you got into the predictable Foreign Service controversy about where the American Embassy should be. I don't care where you are, this issue always comes up. I've mentioned my experience in Moscow and elsewhere. It is a Foreign Service syndrome that the American Embassy should be downtown, in the center of town, since the action is symbolically there. Over the years, not only as a result of my experience in Moscow, I had developed a contrary view. That is, you can take the American Embassy and put it in the outskirts of the capital city. In fact, in a small country you can move it just about anywhere you want. Those who want Embassy services, particularly the applicants for consular services, businessmen, and others, will come to you wherever the Embassy is located. They will adjust. There is case after case where an American Embassy, which was originally on the outskirts of the capital city, ended up in the center of the urban mass.

Q: That was the story with the American Embassy in Athens. At one time it was way out in the boondocks. By the time I got to Athens it was not so far out, and now it is virtually in the center of Athens.

BROWN: So, compared with other members of my staff, I was amenable to looking at the outskirts of the city, because of my sense of history and of the way the system works. However, there were those on my staff who understandably said, "Well, if we're going to stay in the area, why not stay where we are?" Or some said, "Goodness, this site that the Israelis are offering us is really shabby, out in some wheat field." However, I was looking at various possibilities very seriously.

Some of the sites offered us were, shall we say, rather trashy. I remember saying to Eli Rubenstein, who was a key player in all of this, as Cabinet Secretary under Prime Minister Shamir. Now Eli is Attorney General of Israel. Anyhow, on one occasion he offered us a site in a town near Tel Aviv. My staff universally turned their noses up at it. I didn't necessarily turn up my nose at it, but in jest I said to him: "Eli, as you know, I'm studying Hebrew, and I'm looking at this site, which you are really pushing. I wonder. How do you say dump in Hebrew?" [Laughter] I meant a place where you dump trash and so forth. Anyway, that effort at that time to find another site for the Embassy in essence came to nothing.

A great deal of the effort to find another site had to do with the Israeli security establishment. There were times when I would go to the Defense Minister, Yitzhak Rabin, and talk to him alone. I would say, "Come on, your people offered us this (or that) site and then withdrew the offer." We went through that process several times. One had to be very diplomatic in these matters because of technical security considerations on both sides which were unmentioned but which were obviously in people's minds.

Q: We're talking now about eavesdropping.

BROWN: Well, you said it. [Laughter]

Q: This was the name of the game all over. The Israelis, of course, wouldn't eavesdrop on the Americans, and the Americans wouldn't eavesdrop on the Israelis.

BROWN: Senior professional people on both sides were concerned about these security considerations.

Q: We're spending a lot of time on real estate, but I think that it's important. This is something you have to consider. After all, Hillary Rodham Clinton is running for the Senate in New York, and we're talking about putting an Embassy up in Jerusalem, which is not surprising.

Anyway, what were you thinking about at the time in terms of the problems of putting our Embassy in Jerusalem? Why not put the Embassy in a place near or next to Jerusalem, but not in Jerusalem?

BROWN: Israel is such a small country that, speaking personally and in a technical, administrative sense, I think that we could have done so. The Embassy could have been on the road between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, provided, and you have to be sensitive in this respect, that it wasn't in the Occupied Territories. The Israelis had eliminated the signs which showed where the Occupied Territories began and ended. You know, the old Green Line and so forth.

Q: You could have put the Embassy in a place where everyone could say that this is Israeli territory. You could have said that it was placed there for security reasons.

BROWN: Except that in practical terms, Stuart, once you start down that road, then there are lobbies and various interest groups which would say, "Well, if you vacate that building in Tel Aviv, why not go all the way," and the natural destination would be Jerusalem.

Now, at the time, as I said, this search for another site didn't go anywhere. We'll come back to this subject later on, because I got heavily involved in another version of this search. However, there is one other element here, and that is, apart from the well-known views of the Israelis, the well-known views of Jewish lobbies in the United States, and the well-known views of sympathetic people who are running for office in the United States or were sympathetic to this view. There is another aspect.

From the peace process negotiating viewpoint, there is a strong feeling still held in certain quarters that this move of the Embassy, if it takes place, should be saved until the end of the peace process. That is, it is a sort of pawn or trump. This would be, in this view, a last, final gesture which, if handled the right way, would advance our causes. By this it is usually meant that this would be useful to push the Israelis over the top. In a tough negotiating situation, you might say, "Okay, if you will do this, this, and this, all of which, we realize, is very tough for you, then we'll move the Embassy. Until then," the argument goes, "We should hold off such a move."

I developed a different view, a view that with the passage of time this question no longer had the importance it had once had, I thought that we should not, how shall I put it, hold such a question hostage to anything. In my mind there would always be at least 111 different reasons from the Arab side why we can never do this. Never, and I'm not joking. There will always be those who fiercely oppose moving the Embassy to Jerusalem and will view this as caving in to the Israelis. I don't believe that an issue of this importance should be held hostage to other factors.

Now, I would like to review my dealings with the Israeli National Coalition Government headed by Prime Minister Shamir. Shimon Peres was the Deputy Prime Minister and former Prime Minister. Moshe Arens was the Foreign Minister, and Yitzhak Rabin was the Defense Minister. The Intifada [Arab uprising] was going on and causing damage to the Israeli image. I had private talks with important Israelis, people whose names you wouldn't necessarily recognize, but men who were former generals or senior security officials. Among these I found that a significant number had sons in the military. These sons were also senior, very tough, battle hardened commanders with great reputations. They were telling their fathers, who were veterans themselves: "What am I doing down in Gaza, commanding troops who are shooting these Palestinian kids with rubber bullets because they're throwing rocks and bricks at us? Who cares about Gaza? Gaza is a miserable, overpopulated, totally underresourced quagmire. What's so important about Gaza in security terms?"

So I sensed that there was a side of the Israeli psyche that was very disturbed about all of this because the Israelis were now so strong that they didn't have to worry about the Palestinians as a major security threat. As an irritant, yes. As something which was damaging their national and domestic, internal image and psyche, yes. However, there was no contest as far as the Palestinians or other Arab countries taking on the Israeli military establishment was concerned. In conventional warfare terms, Israel was capable of defeating any Arab neighbor at the time and, probably, any combination of immediate neighbors such as Syria, Egypt, Jordan, and Lebanon. The Israeli military establishment was a well proven, highly effective force, notwithstanding its deficiencies, of which there were many.

I was finding more indications of concern about the future, particularly on the Labour Party side of the National Coalition Government. We were getting this sort of rumbling.

Q: This was a different feeling that you had when you were DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] in...

BROWN: When I was DCM in 1979-1982 there was no Intifada.

Q: So you were finding a different...

BROWN: This was a different ball game. With communications, TV, the development of human rights consciousness, and the annual U.S. Human Rights Reports, all of this was increasingly important. It had to be dealt with. I had to make demarches to the Israeli Government, which I did. I usually made them to Yitzhak Rabin, the Defense Minister, because he was responsible for the situation in the Occupied Territories. Essentially, everything that went on in the territories fell under the Minister of Defense, Yitzhak Rabin. When the Intifada broke out, he is reliably reported to have said to his commanders: "Break their bones."

Now, when I went to see Rabin on such matters, he was, as always, courteous and polite and received me well. However, I couldn't get very far with him, or, indeed, with any Israeli like him. I would raise the matter of the shootings of Palestinians. The Israelis had carefully read the Human Rights reports and had developed counter arguments. We would quote the Geneva Convention and say that Israel, as the Occupying Power, ought not to be shooting at civilians. They would quote the Geneva Convention or other things back to us and say, "We are working under rules inherited from the British. By the way, Ambassador, if you are so exercised about the rules of engagement, under what circumstances would you raise your rifle and fire your rubber bullet against a mass of young people who are showering you with bricks, projectiles, and so forth? Have you ever managed to get the rules of engagement of your the British, in Northern Ireland? You won't get them. If you were to get them, you would find that they are rather gruesome, by comparison to what we do."

I would say that this business of taking tanks and bulldozers and knocking down the house of the family of a suspected member of the Intifada because he threw a brick or did something similar, is just not done nowadays. Rabin would say, “Oh, no? Would you prefer that I instituted hanging, which is perfectly legal for the occupying power under the Geneva Convention, after due trial and processing?” So these arguments would go on and on. The Israelis knew the script, and I knew the script. However, I had to lodge these protests.

Q: Well, but since you frequently went in to see Israeli Government ministers to discuss these matters and reports of incidents of this kind were on TV almost every day, did the Israelis seem to realize that we were watching what was happening in Gaza and on the West Bank? People back home in the U.S. were saying: “These Israelis are on a losing streak.” Did they understand this?

BROWN: The Israelis studied American public opinion very carefully. There was instant reporting from the Israeli Embassy in Washington and from their Consulates elsewhere in the U.S., in addition to telephonic conversations and backchannel reporting. Oh, yes, the Israelis covered us better than we cover ourselves! So this was a disturbing development to them.

One could sense concern, particularly with a minority party such as Peace Now, Shulamit Alloni's group, and others. Some were adamantly, openly opposed to Israeli suppression of the Intifada, and their voices were increasingly heard. Naturally, in the Labour Party group, there were hardliners, but these matters were the focus of increasing, internal concern. When you talk about Israel, you're talking about a country where mothers are really, genuinely concerned about their 17 and 18 year old sons. They know that their boys are stationed down in some Palestinian village, where they may be hit on the head by a brick. There were casualties in the counter-Intifada operations. People wondered what purpose all of this served. I had many, many conversations with ordinary Israelis on this. However, the concerns expressed by ordinary Israelis didn't seem to have any result. The majority of Israelis supported the government's policy, albeit with increasing concern.

The second factor that was really grating the Bush administration was the ongoing development of Israeli settlements on the West Bank and around Jerusalem. Let me pause a second here and refer to the interviews which you had with Ambassador Sam Lewis, covering seven or eight years of his tenure as American Ambassador to Israel (1977-1985). There are also supplementary comments by others, in this regard.

Way back, during Labour Party dominated governments, they faced the phenomenon of hard line, zealous groups. These groups particularly considered the West Bank area sacred, Jewish ground. They believed that this was documented in the Bible, documented by Jewish cemeteries, by the remains of ancient Jewish synagogues and manifold, other, anthropological data. They were determined that they were going to go back and reestablish a Jewish presence in what Westerners called the “Occupied Territories.” The Israelis call the West Bank “Judea and Samaria.” Gaza is in the Occupied Territories but it has never had the same pull on Israeli heartstrings as the West Bank.

These zealous groups are not necessarily ultra-religious in orientation, but they represent a combination of Zionist and religious groups which are determined to reestablish a permanent presence, particularly in Judea and Samaria, but also in Gaza. The expression they used was that they wanted to reestablish facts on the ground.

Q: Would the term Zionist, in your definition, refer to a religious group?

BROWN: No. You have to be careful there. The Zionists can be secular, religious, or mixed secular and religious. The term is used very loosely. In general, "Zionist" means someone who is dedicated to the proposition that there is a land of Israel and that it should be a Jewish state. At this point you notice some differences between the various Jewish groups. Among the Zionists there are some who hold the view that they need to reestablish a Jewish presence in the Occupied Territories. This certainly was the viewpoint of the Likud Party and of its predecessor, the Herut, which was the hard core of the Likud. Going back to the views of Jabotinsky [founder of the modern revisionist Zionist movement], the revisionist Zionists considered that they were entitled to hold both sides of the Jordan River in modern Palestine. These people take the view that the British behaved disgracefully in 1921 by carving up the old Palestine Mandate and removing from it what the British called "Trans-Jordan." This is what we now call simply "Jordan." The British earmarked "Trans-Jordan" and said that that was an Arab entity under the Amir Abdullah. In other words, no Jewish settlement was allowed. The rest of Palestine was to be a combination of Arab and Jewish. The Jabotinsky school of thought clearly rejected that proposition.

Coming down to the modern period, the "settlement movement," as we currently use the term, began under the Israeli Labour Party Governments. The settlements consisted of isolated groups of Jews who chose such places as the high ground often overlooking an Arab town or city. Often these areas were totally unoccupied and were, in fact, bare hillsides. However, they had some religious, or some religio-political significance to the settlers. They dug into these places. In a more extreme case, they moved into hotel space in Hebron, nominally as tourists. Then they stayed in a hotel and turned it into an armed camp downtown Hebron. This was an "in your face, here we are, and what are you going to do about it," armed presence.

One has to remember that this process began when a rather weak, Israeli Labour-dominated coalition government, led by then Prime Minister Rabin, accommodated itself to this situation, somewhat reluctantly accepting the new settlements. It was on the basis of such new successful settlements that the Movement grew and grew.

Now, when in 1977 Menachem Begin became Prime Minister and Ariel Sharon arrived on the scene, this process really took off. By the time I came back to Israel at the end of 1988, these settlements had mushroomed so that they had become large, well-established communities. They were bedroom communities for commuters to Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. They were advertised as having advantageous mortgage rates, subsidized by the Israeli Government, with a network of highways and other infrastructure in and around them. This was really serious, and it was constantly expanding.

Q: Was American money involved in these construction projects?

BROWN: No U.S. Government money could be identified in these projects. The U.S. Government is dead against this. However, you run into the old problem that money is fungible

[can be transferred from one account to another]. The United States Government gives $3.0 billion annually in easily identifiable aid to the Government of Israel, of which $1.8 and $1.2 billion is for military and civilian aid, and I forget which segment is which. So $3.0 billion in aid is annually appropriated for Israel after debate by Congress, in a bill which is passed and then signed by the President. Furthermore, there are additional amounts of aid for other purposes. There are those who argue that this U.S. aid to Israel frees up Israeli money to be spent on the settlements. Periodically, we would ask for an accounting of these funds. Meanwhile, I made demarches at the Foreign Ministry about the new settlements.

At times I made demarches to the Defense Minister Yitzhak Rabin, whose facial expression and demeanor told me that he was not at all happy with this situation. However, he had other and very important things to do. Rabin would say that some damned woman in the Israeli Ministry of the Interior approved this or that project, unbeknownst to him, and, well, this sort of thing happens. He made it clear that he was not happy with this situation, but he was not going to fall on his sword over this issue. Neither, by the way, was anybody else in the Labour Government, except a tiny group of peaceniks who said, "This is just creating further problems that are going to come back to haunt us later on." Moreover, over time, some people began to say, "Wait a minute. Why are such large subsidies going to the Occupied Territories when that money ought to be spent in my poor, backward, town of Moroccan Jews within Israel proper? These settlements are siphoning off money that I could be getting for my work here."

Q: Was there a certain amount of middle class charity in Israel? I would think that the people who were benefitting from this aid would be better educated...

BROWN: They would be better educated and dedicated. As I said, many of these settlements were bedroom communities where some people with high tech qualifications lived. These people would be prosperous, dynamic, can do, achiever types who moved out there with their wives and kids.

Q: They were being subsidized.

BROWN: They were being heavily subsidized, provided with cheap mortgages on their homes, given schools and other infrastructure, and issued defensive weapons. The Israeli Ministry of Defense was charged with defending these settlements and making sure that they had proper barbed wire barriers and were monitored and patrolled. It was a rapidly growing irritant in the view of the new Bush administration. As a result, as I accompanied, say, the Prime Minister, the Foreign Minister, or the Defense Minister on calls in the United States in the Oval Office at the White House, I saw the President of the United States sooner or later raising this subject. The Israeli visitors, for their part, were sidestepping his remarks and questions.

There was one particular case where Rabin, as Israeli Defense Minister, had a pretty good meeting with President Bush on other matters, but sidestepped the settlement issue. Then Rabin departed to call on Vice President Dan Quayle. Secretary of State Baker and I were the last of the group leaving the Oval Office, when President Bush beckoned us to come back. Baker and I were alone with the President in the Oval Office. The President was very angry over the settlement issue. He thought that he had had assurances from Prime Minister Shamir that the construction of further settlements was going to end or be significantly reduced, and this had not happened. Settlement construction was continuing.

The President said to us: "I'm not going to put up with this," and he began to pound and slash the air with his fist. He got very agitated. Secretary Baker said, "Mr. President, you don't have a problem with Bill Brown. He's on our side." I tell this story to show you the depth of President Bush's feelings on this subject. He felt that he was being double crossed on the issue of Israeli settlements on the West Bank. However, Prime Minister Shamir didn't feel this way at all.

There was a later visit to the United States by Prime Minister Shamir, which was fascinating in many ways. He came on a regularly scheduled visit, as the head of the Israeli Government. I would like to go off on one, tiny, tangential aspect of this visit.

Q: Go off on as many tangents as you wish, because I think that this relationship between Israel and the United States is so important. We all need to talk about it.

BROWN: Let me mention this one, small glimpse at the Israeli psyche as an element in this connection. Prime Minister Shamir moved into Blair House. A dinner was given at the White House in the evening, preceded by a small meeting upstairs between the President and Shamir. Then they were to go down to the diningroom. Anyway, it was a black tie affair.

I received a phone call from the Israelis because they were disturbed about the fact that Shamir wouldn't go to this dinner wearing a black tie tuxedo rig. Here you have a situation which requires you to be so careful about stereotypes. In the stereotyped view of most Americans, the Labour Party of Israel had the open collar, tieless, sort of proletarian, egalitarian approach. The Likud Party, under Menachem Begin, was more accustomed to wearing white shirts and ties. Now here was Yitzhak Shamir invited to a black tie dinner at the White House. He refused to wear a black tie or to put on a tuxedo. Now the members of Shamir's entourage, especially those who had served in the United States, all had tuxedos with them, but they couldn't wear them. So I was asked to explain and resolve the problem. I said, "Sure, just wear a dark suit with a dark tie, and it will be okay." Back home in Israel, the average Israeli official wouldn't dream of wearing a tuxedo. In all of my time in Israel I never wore a tuxedo. Most senior Israeli officials had tuxedos for use overseas, but they didn't wear them in Israel.

There was another interesting reflection of this attitude toward formal attire when Moshe Arens was Foreign Minister. He and I were supposed to address a graduating class of American Jewish medical graduates from the Faculty of Medicine at Tel Aviv University. They now had studied there for three or four years and were getting their degrees as Doctors of Medicine. For such an occasion cap and gown were designated, and I had my Harvard Ph.D. [Doctor of Philosophy] crimson gown and my cap all ready to put on. We got to the university president's office, where they had a black gown for Professor Moshe Arens, who was a Ph.D. and a Professor of Aeronautical Engineering in Israel. Arens said, "I'm not going to wear that gown." He would not put on a cap and gown for this ceremony. The university President said, "But this is the way it's done." Arens said, "I don't care. I'm not going to wear that gown." I said, "Well, if that's the case, I'm not going to wear my cap and gown, either." So Moshe Arens and I went out in business suits. This gives you a little glimpse of the peculiarities in Israel as far as public imagery is concerned.

Anyway, President Bush had a meeting with Shamir, at which I was not present. At the last minute the meeting was made highly restricted, with only Prime Minister Shamir and Yosip Ben Aron, then the Director General of the Prime Minister's office; President Bush; and probably Secretary of State Baker attending. I don't know whether Dennis Ross was there or not. They were in the President's office for quite a while. Then came a larger meeting in the Cabinet Room. I could tell, when President Bush came to this larger meeting that, although he was not discourteous, he was obviously unhappy. He gave a general review of the situation, including the remark that, "We have our differences." Shamir, for his part, was correct and gracious, but I could tell that the atmosphere was not good on this occasion, and then it got worse.

In all of this, harking back to my earlier remarks, my assessment was that, nevertheless, as I said to Secretary of State Baker, I thought that it was worth making the effort to advance the peace process. So in 1989 and continuing through 1990 Secretary Baker led an effort to achieve peace between Israel and the Palestinians. In our view, it was based on the concept of land for peace, and all that UN Security Council Resolution 242 entailed. The negotiations began with a meeting between President Bush and Prime Minister Shamir. The more detailed discussions were conducted by Secretary Baker and Moshe Arens. There was a second track, and that was handled by Secretary Baker and Yitzhak Rabin, the Israeli Defense Minister. At the same time the growing frustration and unhappiness of Shimon Peres was apparent. So was the rivalry between Shimon Peres and Yitzhak Rabin within the Labour Party.

I was faced with handling many messages and conversations, most of them oral. Peres was predictably all for our of approach and was pushing us to go ahead faster, through him.

Q: What was Peres' position in the Israeli cabinet?

BROWN: He had been Prime Minister and then, under the agreement with Shamir, was rotated back down to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. Moshe Arens was the American-accented, highly articulate and hawkish Foreign Minister in the Likud Government. Shamir was Shamir, which meant that he was usually silent. He would receive you courteously, listen to what you had to say, make some facial expressions, but express minimum remarks. He was noncommittal but certainly showed no signs of budging.

However, the attitude of Rabin is the one I want to focus on. We developed a sense that Rabin was willing to negotiate, really negotiate. Now, this situation was exceedingly delicate. The foreign relations between the U.S. and Israeli Governments, at least on paper, are normally conducted between the State Department and the Israeli Foreign Ministry. However, in fact every Israeli Prime Minister has dominated the foreign relations between the two countries. That is, for the major questions.

Shamir was, a tough, quiet-spoken man. Moshe Arens was a highly articulate, former Ambassador to the United States, former Defense Minister and now Foreign Minister. Arens was willing to take on Secretary of State Jim Baker or anybody else on issues of theory, practice, and implementation of initiatives concerning the Palestinians He had been through all of this as the former Chairman of the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee. In his previous role as Ambassador to the United States and as former Defense Minister, he knew the issues backwards and forwards from the viewpoint of a Likudnik. As I said, Rabin was willing to play. This developed to the point that Secretary of State Baker wanted to open a unique, special channel to Rabin. Dennis Ross instructed me to set one up. Indeed, and I think that this is the first time that I have discussed this, I approached Rabin after consultations with Dennis on how to handle this. I had a secure phone at home in a special vault in my residence. I would invite Rabin over for drinks, which he never refused. We would have a glass of this or that, would go upstairs to this special vault, and I would then bring out and key in the secure phone. Having made telephonic contact with Dennis Ross, I would then turn the secure phone over to Rabin, and he and Dennis would conduct a conversation. I didn't involve myself in these conversations. I just kept silent and listened to the proceedings.

A key issue which developed, among others, was whether the Shamir Government would open a dialogue with the Palestinians on our version of a peace process, which meant land for peace. This process had been brokered by the United States. In the longer term this meant that the Palestinians would have more say on the various issues outstanding.

In this context Shamir and Arens immediately began to lay down all kinds of markers [standards]. One of the markers was that the Israelis said that they would never, ever talk with the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization]. They reminded us that we had staunchly supported that Israeli position for many years. They said that nothing should play into the hands of Arafat. Therefore, they did not want to negotiate with the PLO in any way. They would not negotiate with anybody identified with the PLO. This was an old Israeli line: never deal with the PLO. That was the official position of both the Labour and the Likud parties, since the PLO was regarded by them as a bunch of terrorists.

Shamir also said that they wouldn't deal with Palestinian detainees, that is, people who had been arrested by the Israelis. Well, this involved a hell of a lot of people who were important on the Palestinian scene and who had been picked up and detained, one way or another. Sometimes they had been held for a short time, sometimes they had spent years in Israeli jails. The Shamir wouldn't deal with such people or with anybody openly identified with the PLO. Well, as you often found when you talked with anybody on the Palestinian side, no one was going to deny adherence to and support of the PLO. The Israelis also wouldn't deal with outsiders. That is, Palestinians from outside the area, from the Palestinian diaspora.

So, there were many, negative markers laid down by Shamir and Arens. Meanwhile, here was Rabin, who was discussing something extremely delicate in these unique conversations with Dennis Ross. These conversations were taking place in my residence, using my secure phone. Rabin was saying: "I think that I have a list," and Palestinian names would be mentioned. Dennis Ross, on his side, would say, "Have you thought about so-and-so?" Rabin would say, "Yes. On the other hand, there is a problem there." These were extended conversations. Rabin would sometimes indicate that he thought that he could push it and take it to a new level, including some new names as possible interlocutors.

Periodically, Rabin, like other Israeli Defense Ministers, would use his security establishment to summon Palestinians. The standard approach was that an Israeli military jeep would pull up to the home of a prominent Palestinian. An Israeli colonel, or some such person, would jump out and say: "You are wanted to meet an important Israeli figure. You'll see him tonight." It would turn out that it would be Defense Minister Rabin whom he was meeting. Rabin would then hold forth on Israel's peaceful intentions. He would say that the Palestinians should "get their act together" and stop the Intifada.

So Rabin was doing things on his own, some of which we didn't know about. He was using his own channels internally within Israel to carry out his own kinds of probes. This was a delicate matter. Israeli Foreign Minister Arens believed that he was entitled to know what was going on. The Foreign Minister was a sharp, perceptive, well-connected man who communicated with me, as the American Ambassador, and sometimes directly with Secretary of State James Baker.

I remember one evening when there had been an extended telephonic conversation between Secretary Baker and Moshe Arens. By this time the tension between the two of them on where to go next had reached the point where phone conversations had become somewhat contentious. So I received an instruction, from Dennis Ross, to "go in tonight and see Arens. Here are the points which we want you to make. Review the conversation which Secretary Baker has just had with him [Arens] a few hours ago. Baker wants to be very sure that Arens understands the position and doesn't get it distorted." I got a lengthy read out from Dennis Ross on what I should say to Arens. By the time I got all of these points straight and made the appointment with Arens, who lived outside of Tel Aviv, it was about 11:00 PM.

Referring to his conversation with Secretary Baker some hours previously, I said that Baker had asked me to review the discussion and emphasize the following points which he had made during the conversation. Then I read these points out. Arens heard me out and said, "That's not exactly the way I remember the conversation. The way I remember the conversation, Secretary Baker made these points and I made the following replies." I was taking notes on all of this. By now it was after midnight. As I said good night to Arens, he said, "I suppose now that you're going over to see Rabin." I said, "That's right, Moshe."

Then I went over to see Rabin under instructions. By now it was well after midnight. I reviewed the points in the Baker-Arens conversation as Dennis Ross had given them to me, as well as the points which I had made to Moshe Arens. Rabin just sat there in his home, soaking it in. I'll tell you that at times in this process I thought that I was dealing with about four different Israeli Governments, day and night. I deliberately have not mentioned others, but I have just mentioned my conversations with these four major participants in the discussions.

One could get, on any given day or night, four different interpretations on what was at issue and what had been said. However, the delicate and extremely sensitive part of it was that we were running a separate dialogue with Rabin, on my secure phone. At a certain point, after I had been involved in many of these conversations, Rabin made it very clear to me that he was reporting to Prime Minister Shamir. He said, "I want you and Washington to know that I'm not playing games here. I am telling Shamir what's going on." Naturally, I would ask, "And what was his response?" Rabin would say, "Well, he just sits there, listens, and sort of nods." In other words, this was typical behavior by Prime Minister Shamir, who usually played things very close to the chest.

Meanwhile, as time went on, Deputy Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres was getting more and more agitated. He probably had at least a whiff of what was going on. He wanted to participate in more of the action in an effort to move the Israeli coalition government to...

Q: But you were not instructed to go to Peres...

BROWN: Well, at times, yes. At times I would be instructed to make general points to Peres. There was one time when Peres was suddenly taken violently ill. He was up in a provincial hospital at Afula. I hurried over there and found the poor man was receiving IV [Intra Venous] treatment. His face was flushed and he appeared to be running a temperature. He was very unhappy that he wasn't the main channel for these discussions with the Americans. He made a remark that I should understand that "these young men in Washington" were mishandling the situation. He clearly meant that Dennis Ross and his associates ought to be dealing primarily with him.

Remember that Shimon Peres had a strong rivalry with Rabin, in addition to his other problems. As time went on, the Israeli coalition government was under increasing tension internally, on a variety of issues. It became apparent to me that Shimon Peres was maneuvering to bring down the coalition government.

Q: One thing that I would like to comment on. What you're telling me right now is that it sounds as if Moshe Arens was acting something like the British and was being almost too clever by half. He knew so much to counter every argument that, in a way, it was not something that you could deal with. All this is true, but...

BROWN: Wait a minute. Here was Arens, a highly articulate and experienced man. He was the Foreign Minister of the Israeli Government. I was the American Ambassador. Indeed, Secretary Baker had phone conversations with Arens, but Baker was a tough player in his own right, and he and Dennis Ross were not getting back from Arens the kinds of positive material and the wherewithal which they wanted. On the other hand, through the conversations with Rabin, Baker and Ross had the hope that Rabin, given his unique position and his direct entree to Prime Minister Shamir, as well as his reputation as a tough, old warrior, might be able to help them pull something off.

Meanwhile, further settlements were being built or extended, President Bush was very unhappy, and the signs of strain within the Israeli coalition government were growing. It became apparent to me, as I said, that Shimon Peres appears to have decided to bring down the coalition government. He was working to bring it down and to trigger a situation where he could take over and where the Labour Party would become the dominant partner in the government, in one way or another.

Remember that his taking over the government would not necessarily have to be done by a general election. Under the Israeli system of the time, if a Prime Minister resigned, and if you had the necessary votes in the Knesset, you could go to the President of Israel and say, "I can form a government to replace this government, without the need to have automatic elections.” That, apparently, was what Peres had in mind, as time went on.

Again, I would like to refer to Ambassador Sam Lewis in his comments on how an American Ambassador, in delicate times, and they always are delicate times, deals with the Israeli Government. You'll find a great deal of very useful material in Sam Lewis's remarks. I don't want to repeat all of that. The Israeli political process continues, day and night. There are heavy strains on the American Ambassador traveling up and down between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, dealing with different people, not only in the Israeli Government, but with different people in the U.S. Government as well. Remember, too, that Washington has all kinds of players who are going off on their own tangents. So, while in my view the main action was in the hands of Secretary Baker, you have to remember that there were all kinds of other players in Washington who wanted to do their thing.

For example, Jack Kemp, the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, wanted to make a trip to Israel. I became aware that Vice President Dan Quayle also wanted to visit Israel. Neither of these trips took place because Secretary Baker didn't want them to happen. He wanted to control this process and, understandably, he wanted to create an image among the Israelis that, if they wanted to do major business with the United States Government, they should do it with Jim Baker, who represented the President of the United States and who was the all-powerful, Secretary of State. And they had better not forget it.

This situation produced growing tensions and strains which I have outlined here. As an American Ambassador, like my predecessors, I had all kinds of Congressional Delegations and other, high level visitors from the Executive Branch of our government. I had all kinds of leaders of American Jewish organizations coming through. Sometimes there were non-American Jewish groups or individuals coming to see me. With a new government in office, because the Bush administration WAS a new government- (end of tape)

-in its dealings with the Israeli Government. Indeed, the Bush administration was in tough with the Prime Minister's office. In this situation all kinds of unofficial American visitors would arrive to deal with the Israeli leaders. If I was lucky, they would come to see me first. We would discuss things. Sometimes, these visitors came and went, using their own old boy network. In many cases, by a wink and a nod or a brazenly open statement, they would say to their Israeli interlocutors, “I'll tell you the real situation. I'll give you the real dope on what's going on in the White House, and you can deal with me.” It was an amazing parade of individuals. You had to stay in touch. You could not sit and simply deal with the Foreign Ministry. You had to be on your toes day and night. You really had to keep your ear to the ground. You had to have good sources back in Washington. The support of the Israeli desk in the Department of State was of paramount importance. You had to have a Director and Deputy Director of Israeli-Arab Affairs who were well plugged in and who would give you information which was never contained in the cables as to what the real play was and what things to watch out for, as well as what visitors to handle as special cases, and so forth.

I'll give you another example. Inside and outside the U.S. Foreign Service I was considered sympathetic to Israel. I had done my stint as DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] and had now been Ambassador for nearly a year. There came a time when our annual economic assessment of the country was due. My Economic Counselor approached me regarding the Embassy analysis of the budget for military and civilian aid to Israel, which amounted to roughly $3.0 billion. Roughly this level of aid had been provided to Israel for years. Progressively, it had been increased. When I was DCM, it had largely been in the form of loans. By now it had evolved to an outright grant of cash, part of which was used to pay off previous loans, and the rest to purchase military equipment which was needed to upgrade the Israeli military establishment. However, it now was grant aid.

There was a counterpart aid program of nearly $2.0 billion for Egypt, which the Egyptians very much treasured. It had been made quite clear to the Egyptians that they were getting their $2.0 billion as a result of living up to the provisions of the Camp David Agreement and being good guys, for instance maintaining an Egyptian Ambassador in Israel. The $2.0 billion in aid to Egypt was, in my view, far more important to the Egyptians than the $3.0 billion in grant aid was to Israel, given the state of Egyptian finances, the nature of their economy, and their growing population. Of course, other aid recipients around the world were increasingly vocal as they saw their aid totals go down, while aid to Egypt and Israel was maintained and even increased.

In essence my Economic Counselor was asking me what I thought of all this. I knew, of course, that any important message, no matter how labeled, from the American Embassy in Tel Aviv to the State Department would be widely read and distributed. These messages often went beyond the reaches the addressees for whom they were initially intended.

Q: We're talking about the Israeli League, which means that certain Senators receive messages even before the Secretary of State.

BROWN: Well, let us say that they receive these messages concurrently. With that background, my instructions to my Economic Counselor were: "Tell it the way you see it." I had a feeling that I knew where he was going to come out on this issue. That is, he would discuss all aspects of the Israeli economy, as well as our national objectives. His analysis would include the issue of liberalization of the highly statist Israeli economy, which had evolved over the years, under previous, Labour and Likud Governments.

In Israel the state owned or controlled, directly or indirectly, large segments of the Israeli economy. We felt that it was in the U.S. national interest and indeed that of the Israelis, that Israeli Governments should liberalize and privatize the economy. This certainly described our objectives in terms of the Israeli economy. Among other objectives, we also wanted to sell more of our goods to Israel. Of course, their economy was much smaller than ours. We had a free trade agreement with Israel, under which they could sell just about anything in the United States. There were a few minor exceptions to this. At least, they were minor to us. To the Israelis they were major exceptions, including tomatoes and orange juice. However, we were frustrated in our inability to crack the automotive and other markets in Israel, to which all kinds of restrictions and barriers pertained. We found that a large part of the Israeli economy was controlled by state organizations and featherbedding arrangements between management, which meant state management, and the trade unions, which had worked out all kinds of internal adjustments. They may have internal arguments over these arrangements, but, on the whole, they're happy with

Q: You might explain what featherbedding is.

BROWN: Labor and management have a good relationship.

Q: Essentially, it means overstaffing.

BROWN: Yes, overstaffing. Because many of these enterprises were state-owned, labor didn't have to worry about significant job cuts. If there was a threat of job cuts, labor would go out on strike and use the labor movement, the Histadrut, which was controlled by the labor unions, to bring the Israeli Government to a standstill. And even, in some cases, to bring the government down. The Histadrut was traditionally run by Labour Party people.

My Economic Counselor drafted a message...

Q: Who was that, by the way?

BROWN: Clark. I can't recall his first name at the moment. I'll add his name later.

Anyway, the thrust of the draft report which he prepared was that it was time to consider a modest cutback in certain areas. Briefly, Israel didn't need our money as much as it used to need it. The Israeli economy, despite all of its difficulties, had come along very nicely. The Israeli Government had the resources to do things easily which it couldn't do previously. The draft concluded that we ought to consider a gradual cut in the aid level. So I let this go through to Washington as drafted, as a LIMITED OFFICIAL USE [relatively low classification] or LOU report. Perhaps it was classified CONFIDENTIAL...

Q: Which is a relatively low classification.

BROWN: I let this report go in to the Department of State. Wow, was there a reaction! I quickly received a high level, AIPAC [American Israeli Public Affairs Committee] mission, led by Tom Dine, the AIPAC Executive Director. It was obvious that there had been a leak. They knew that I was considered an Ambassador who was sympathetic to Israel. I had good relations with AIPAC. They let me know that they had heard of some such cable, and they couldn't believe that I would have authorized submission of such a report.

I said, in essence: "Gentlemen, at the bottom of that cable is my name. I'm not going to go into the details of this report. I'm not going to discuss a report classified CONFIDENTIAL," and I left it at that. There were AIPAC people who said to me: "We know that it was somebody else in your Embassy who drafted the report." However, I was just noncommittal. I said that I was the Ambassador and I took responsibility for the message.

Little did I realize what was going to happen immediately thereafter. About this time the Soviet Union began to collapse to the point that great numbers of Soviet Jews started to come to Israel. That, in my view, lent an entirely different character to the situation and to the analysis we had prepared.

At the very end of 1989, larger and larger numbers of Russian Jews began to come to Israel. This quickly produced a crisis. Israel was receiving 50,000-60,000 people a month, coming from Russia, the Ukraine and elsewhere in the USSR. Ben Gurion Airport was transformed.

Q: You're talking about Ben Gurion International Airport.

BROWN: Ben Gurion International Airport was transformed into a major staging area for receiving Jewish immigrants from Russia. They came mostly by air but they also came by ship. It was a real flood of immigrants. The all-embracing term used to describe these people was, "The Russian Jews." That's a generic term which went back to Czarist days, when the vast, Czarist Empire included the Baltic States and Poland as well. These people were all referred to as "Russians." In fact, many of these "Russians" came from the Ukraine. However, they were all labeled "Russians."

They came from the various, Soviet republics, predominantly the Ukraine and Belorussia, all of which were becoming increasingly chaotic. That movement of Russian refugees immediately put an enormous strain on the Israeli Government, and the cry went up for more help. At this stage I found myself in a situation where I was doing everything that I could to help the Israelis cope with hundreds of thousands of immigrants who had to be housed, fed, and taken care of.

Guess who the Minister of Housing was. None other than Ariel Sharon. So I had some very interesting conversations with Sharon. I had dealt with Sharon as Deputy Chief of Mission and as Chargé d'Affaires. I had seen him as Minister of Agriculture when he was also Chairman of the Settlements Committee. Later on I had gone head to head with him on Lebanon, when he was Israeli Minister of Defense during the siege of Beirut.

Now we were faced with the attempt to engineer the collapse of the Shamir Government, which didn't work out the way that Shimon Peres had planned it. Peres had engineered a crisis, and a very reluctant Rabin had gone along with it. I remember an evening I spent with Rabin and his wife, Leah Rabin, at the home of a political friend of theirs who was an Orthodox Jew and a key man in their religious contacts. Every major politician in Israel has to work the religious circuit, whether he likes it or not. We were coming to a crunch because in their rivalry and tense relationship, Peres was insisting to Rabin that the time had now come for action.

In this context, Peres insisted that he had the votes of the Moroccan ultra-orthodox party known as "Shas," whose key, young, dynamic director was a well-known figure called Ariele Deri. He is well known. The party leader was a Sephardic Jew, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef. The membership of Shas included a lot of people who would normally vote for the Likud Party on secular matters, but voted for Shas on religious issues. Since Shas was an ultra-orthodox, Moroccan based party, it was interested in getting money through its control of the Ministry of the Interior for its schools, its yeshivas, its social institutions and hospitals, and its educational network, as well as its exemption from military service for its members. This was big politics.

Shas was a member of the coalition government. It was Peres's view that he had worked that circuit well enough that he could engineer a political coup d'etat, as it were, with the result that the Labour Party could take over the Israeli Government. He felt that Labour could form its own government, a national coalition if necessary. Peres assured Rabin that this operation was in the bag.

Rabin was very skeptical and reluctant to go along with this program. However, at this time the situation was finally coming to a crunch, and Mrs. Rabin was livid against Peres and not at all certain that this effort would succeed. They went along with this program, but it failed. Suddenly, there was an Israeli Government without the participation of the Labour Party in it.

Q: This was about when?

BROWN: It happened at the beginning of 1990. It coincided with the beginning of the large influx of "Russian Jews." It was a crisis situation as far as the national effort to accommodate these people was concerned. There was a reshuffling of the government portfolios, because now the Labour Party was out of the coalition. Rabin was out, and his special channel via my secure phone to Secretary of State Jim Baker through Dennis Ross was out. The new Defense Minister was, guess who? Moshe Arens.

The new Foreign Minister was David Levy, a Moroccan born, secular figure who had had only a rudimentary education. He had come up via the Likud Party ladder and now claimed his prize, the prestigious position of Foreign Minister of Israel. He had been heavily involved in settlement development during his previous tenure in the Ministry of Housing and Construction. He was proud of his contributions to the development of settlements outside Jerusalem and beyond. He didn't speak English, which created a language problem for him. I used my broken French and some Hebrew in talking to him.

The head of the U.S. desk in the Foreign Ministry was an old friend of mine. He assured me that David Levy was a man who could and should turn out to be an excellent Foreign Minister. His background in the construction of settlements and his record of making fiery, nationalistic statements notwithstanding, this was a man, I was told, with whom we should be able to work as the new Israeli Foreign Minister. I was assured by my friend that there was a possibility there which, if it were played right, could make David Levy a major player in a breakthrough in the peace process.

In the meantime other things were developing. Tens of thousands of Russian Jews were coming into Israel, day and night. This was an extraordinary development, and Israel needed major help. So a proposal was made for the development of housing loan guarantees. Now Secretary of State Baker was a former Secretary of the Treasury. He knew his Treasury accounting procedures.

When the United States Government really wants to do something, there are all kinds of things that can be done which, to an ordinary Foreign Service Officer, are a little bizarre. A proposal arose whereby in addition to the $3.0 billion a year in military and civilian aid, we would come up with hundreds of millions of dollars worth of loan guarantees, whereby the United States Government would guarantee loans entered into on the U.S. securities market. The Government of Israel would offer to make loans, with a U.S. Government guarantee behind them to make it possible for Israel to get the money at a cheap rate of interest. After all, if you're an investor, and the United States Government is going to guarantee your investment, for some institutions that can be attractive. For the Government of Israel it was a good deal, provided that the rate of interest on these bonds was pegged appropriately low.

Here Jim Baker, as the Secretary of State and a former Secretary of the Treasury, knew what he was about. He now had extra leverage on the Israelis. He could say, "Well, now, there are all kinds of concerns in Congress and elsewhere about our budget, which is getting exceedingly tight. Let's see. We could, perhaps, be accommodating if we had the right kind of accommodation from the Israeli Government." However, the Israeli Government had now been reshuffled, and the Labour Party was out.

We were now in 1990, and a new development came along. However, before I leave this subject, I want to refer to coping with the likes of Ariel Sharon in this situation. First of all, we were sympathetic to helping the Government of Israel with its new housing problem. There were thousands of Russian Jewish immigrants pouring into Israel. It was a crisis situation. Sharon was Minister of Housing. He asked me to call on him, so I went over to see him, accompanied by a couple of notetakers. The situation was so critical that he asked me for assistance from FEMA [Federal Emergency Management Agency]. He said that FEMA must have tents and emergency equipment of all kinds. Sharon said, "I need this. Can you get it for me?" He also said, "You've got construction companies in the United States which can build modular housing units. We need them. I also need the 'loan guarantees' and I need them right away so that I will have the resources to go out and buy this equipment and ship it to Israel. I need emergency shipment to Israel. I need to have it shipped directly to Israel. Let's do away with all of those protectionist maritime provisions, which refer to U.S. crews on ships and involve expensive shipping rates. Let's just get it here and get it here quickly!"

In making these remarks Sharon also referred to the settlements in the Occupied Territories. At this point I said to Sharon: "Mr. Minister, let's just break right here. I'd like to have a little, private discussion with you." So we left the notetakers and went to a different room. I went into Sharon's private office and I said, "Look, Arik," which is his Israeli nickname, "we have business to do here, and I'm willing to do business with you. We have a depression in the U.S. housing industry and those people are looking for new business. However, lay off remarks about Israeli settlements, because you're going to run into a buzzsaw if you do that. Let's keep the focus on resettling these Russian immigrants within Israel proper. You're not going to have the United States Government getting into loan guarantees or any other money identified with moving immigrants into the Occupied Territories. So just 'lay off' that, and we can do business." So that's the way I handled it. Then we resumed the discussion with the notetakers present and went on.

Indeed, suddenly housing construction people were flying in from the United States, because there was money to be made. The housing construction people were looking for all kinds of business, and we began to put deals together. Modular housing units were a possibility but there was a high Israel tariff on foreign made units.

I then ran smack into the opposition of the new Minister of Finance, Moda'i, who was a very articulate man. He was a former businessman and was dead against the use of modular or any form of temporary housing. So I went to call on him. What I ran into was a form of an old Israeli attitude: "Our families came and lived in tents until they were resettled. Why the heck should we spend hundreds of millions of dollars and borrow money on the U.S. market to settle people in temporary, cheap, corrugated, modular housing which, in the end, is going to be dumped? That's a waste of money. They can live in tents the way that others did."

I found myself going back to Sharon and saying: "Moda'i is opposed to modular housing." Now I was involved in a fight between Israeli Government ministries. Finally, I went to Prime Minister Shamir and said to him: "Can you help me overcome this difficulty?" It was a fascinating business. I was going back and forth between these high-level Israeli cabinet ministers. Many of them were rivals within the Likud Party. We're talking now about rivalries which were genuine and personal and the issue involved large sums of money, much of which would have to be borrowed.

Here's a little insight into the complexities that I got into. This was now the spring of 1990. The old peace process using our special channels was gone. We were in a crisis situation where the U.S. Government was, for the record, very sympathetic. However, we had a President and a Secretary of State who were agitated and irritated over the issue of continuing construction of Israeli settlements in the Occupied Areas. They were also frustrated over the loss of the kind of dialogue we had going with Yitzhak Rabin. We were looking at the new Shamir Government and saw that it was even tougher in such attitudes than it had been. Now it was really focused on the new crisis of resettling hundreds of thousands of "Russian Jews." It was a very frustrating situation from the viewpoint of President Bush. Meanwhile, in the spring of 1990 with hundreds of thousands of immigrants into Israel, under the circumstances I have just described, my previous support for gradually reducing U.S. aid to Israel went out the window. I now said, "Israel needs more U.S. help, not less."

Now came a new phenomenon, the rumblings of tension between Saddam Hussein and his neighbors, particularly Kuwait. By the spring of 1990 these rumblings had reached the point that Saddam was talking fire and brimstone about Kuwait, which he considered, as I suppose most Iraqis do, essentially as a breakaway province or state of Iraq proper. Kuwait has been a bone in the throats of the Iraqis for decades. In the view of the Iraqis, Kuwait was an artificial creation which had been sliced off from Iraq. They tended to consider it yet another British creation designed to consolidate British control of the oil [of the Persian Gulf].

Saddam Hussein made more and more threatening statements. As he did so, he began to indulge in a heightened form of anti-Israeli rhetoric, as well. On April 2, 1990, he made a statement that war might come in the Middle East, namely between Iraq and Kuwait, if his demands and challenges were not met. If war came, it could easily spread elsewhere. If this happened, he would liquidate half of Israel with chemical warfare. He said that he would use his missiles and chemical warfare. Life became even more exciting for the American Ambassador in Tel Aviv.

Israeli Defense Minister Moshe Arens asked me to call on him. He drew my attention to these threats which, of course, I had already focused on. He said, "I need to open a dialogue right away with U.S. Secretary of Defense Cheney." Here was Saddam Hussein openly threatening Israel while the U.S. was located a great distance away. Arens said that Israel had nothing to do with Kuwait, and this maniac [Saddam Hussein] was threatening to rain death and destruction by waging chemical warfare against Israel. Arens concluded: "What is the United States going to do in this situation?"

I would refer you, at this point, to Arens' book, called Broken Covenant, in which he detailed what it was to be Israeli Defense Minister, at and from this juncture, and what he considered to be the inadequate responses of the United States Government. Naturally, Washington was very much aware of Arens' unhappiness, but the momentum of the relationship continued.

Saddam Hussein was a military dictator who not only made bombastic statements, but who had also used chemical warfare against the Kurds of Northern Iraq. The Iraqis had some very good diplomats, and some of them were assuring us that this threat against Israel was merely one of those exuberant statements which Saddam Hussein was used to making. As the heat mounted, the Egyptians also tried to calm us down. My colleague in Tel Aviv, Egyptian Ambassador Mohammed Basyouni, met with me and told me: "Pay no attention to Saddam Hussein's statements. You see, we Egyptians know Saddam Hussein like nobody else because he went to school in Cairo. Mubarak has a special relationship with Saddam Hussein. Maybe he is a little rough at the edges, but this can be worked out. Don't get excited." I cite these conversations because they were to change rather dramatically only a few months later.

Q: Yes, this was very much the atmosphere of the time.

BROWN: Remember that we were selling food to Iraq under PL 480 [Public Law 480, covering surplus agricultural commodities] and we were interested in selling more to them. Iraq had a large, affluent economy in certain respects. It was buying many things, including military hardware. There were American businessmen who were looking around Iraq and criticizing the United States Government for not getting enough of the action. The British and other Europeans were selling more to the Iraqis and we were losing market share.

I believe that it was in April, 1990, there was an American Chiefs of Mission Conference in Bonn. The new, Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs was John Kelly. His Deputy Assistant Secretary was Jock Covey, with whom I had served previously. Jock had served in Israeli affairs for quite some time and had been DCM in Jerusalem. If you haven't interviewed him, you should do so.

Q: Where is he now?

BROWN: I don't know. His name is spelled C-o-v-e-y. He is a brilliant officer. We gathered in Bonn, and discussions flowed on area-wide problems. The American Ambassador to Iraq at the time was April Glaspie. As my colleagues at this conference commented, one of our concerns was that we were losing business to the British, French, and Germans throughout the Middle Eastern region because we were still applying artificial, outmoded, outdated approaches. These Arab regimes had money. Somehow, we were not responding, we were not adequately participating in the game. There were many new, economic opportunities which we were missing.

April Glaspie said in effect, "Sure, Saddam Hussein is a military dictator, but there are possibilities in Iraq which we are missing." A rear Admiral attended this conference as a representative from the Central Command of the U.S. Armed Forces. He made a little presentation of the situation in the Middle East from his point of view. He pointed to our budgetary problems, particularly as far as the U.S. Navy was concerned. He said that perhaps it was time to cut back on our naval presence in the Persian Gulf, because it was awfully expensive.

Q: We're talking about our presence in the Gulf.

BROWN: Yes, in the Gulf. Our Ambassadors stationed in the Gulf replied: "Wait a minute. That naval presence is important at this time." The Admiral said, "Well, that may be true, but the naval budget is tight. We are cutting back on our carrier forces, and we have to do something about it." In this atmosphere I made a presentation which I started by saying: "I guess I'm the skunk at your party because I've got a problem here in terms of the Israeli perception, particularly in the wake of these bellicose statements by Saddam Hussein."

I returned to Tel Aviv, and the situation involving Iraq and Kuwait grew more and more tense. As it did so there developed in Israel a palpable concern that war might break out and that Saddam Hussein might live up to his public threats to attack Israel. Indeed, we saw more activity in those portions of Iraq which abutted Jordan and Syria. There were Iraqi air bases in the area, which were beginning to sprout missile batteries. Of course, the Israelis became aware of these developments.

Within Israel and within my Embassy there arose a concern about what was going to happen. In other words, if war came and if Saddam Hussein carried out these threats, what would happen if he hit Israel with missiles? If these missiles had nuclear, bacteriological, or chemical warheads, what would happen?

A dialogue was taking place on the intelligence front and on the broader, defense front, between my Embassy and Washington. Within my Embassy my DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] was now Mark Peres, a wonderful DCM. We were faced increasingly with very concerned members of our Embassy staff. The more they learned about the situation, the more concerned they became about what we were going to do.

I began a dialogue with the Department noting: "On a contingency basis we need gas masks." The initial response from Washington was: "We are the best judges of whether you need gas masks and equipment like that. At this point we don't see the need for this material." I began holding town meetings within my Embassy. I found that the discussion was never ending as we got into hypothetical situations. For example, questions would be asked like: "Suppose they attack with chemical weapons? We heard Saddam Hussein say that he would liquidate half of Israel with chemical weapons. We don't have anything to protect ourselves at this point."

At one of these meetings an enlisted man in my Defense Attaché Office said, "Well, I have my gas mask, but my wife doesn't have one." Everybody immediately turned toward him and said, "What? What do you mean that you have a gas mask?" "Yes," he said, "we've got them in the Defense Attaché Office for the defense attachés and their immediate staff. My problem is that my wife out here in Herzeliya and our kids don't have gas masks." Well, I called up the State Department on the secure phone at a high level now. I was talking to the Deputy Assistant Secretary and to people above him. I was smartly told: "That's an impossibility. We control the distribution of gas masks, and there is no authorization to do so. If we ever had any intimation that there was a real threat, we would distribute them to you." I asked: "Do you want to know the serial numbers on the gas masks in the Defense Attaché Office? My Defense Attachés have gas masks." They told me from Washington: "Well, that's unauthorized." I said, "Unauthorized or not, some members of my Embassy staff have gas masks, while the great majority of the other people in the Embassy do not have them. What are you going to do about it?" We got into a rather contentious, spirited discussion of this.

Meanwhile, we went to the Israelis who, we knew, had supplies of gas masks for issuance to every man, woman, and child in Israel. Gas masks were stored in warehouses in Israel. We negotiated with the Israelis and arranged with them that, unless and until I got the necessary equipment from Washington, my Embassy needs, top to bottom, would be met. We received assurances that we would get gas masks.

There were further town meetings, and Embassy staff members wanted to have gas masks. The Israelis were cautious and said, "Look, the gas masks are there in the warehouses." By stages our Defense Attachés, the professional military people, were allowed to go into these warehouses and see that the gas masks were there. Then my Embassy people wanted to know: "Is my size gas mask there? What about my kids? I have a 6-year-old, or a 3-year-old, or a 2-year old, or a baby three months old. What do you have for babies?" The Israelis progressively let us know that they had different sizes of gas masks. They even had...

Q: Cribs or bassinets?

BROWN: Yes. Well, the agitation was growing, and it was growing inside and outside the Embassy as well, to distribute the gas masks. As the crisis worsened that summer of 1990, eventually we began to receive the gas masks in cardboard boxes, duly labeled. Then people said, "Well, how do I know that it will work? I want to be instructed in their use. Shouldn't we have drills?" Of course, if you use these gas masks, the canister begins to deteriorate and will eventually become useless.

Meanwhile, Washington was coping with this and also with Saudi Arabia. Ambassador Chas Freeman...

Q: We interviewed Ambassador Chas Freeman, who was talking about his problems.

BROWN: Yes. So the discussion went on and on.

Q: I was wondering if this would be a good place to stop. If you would note, and I will note here, that we're talking now about the growing threat from Saddam Hussein during the summer of 1990. Also, you've already talked about the huge increase of Russian Jews...

BROWN: Who were coming through at all hours.

Q: Today is August 31, 1999. This is an interview with Ambassador Bill Brown. Bill, on this same topic that you were discussing before we broke off, did you find, as your officers were looking around, that there was unrest with the Russian Jews arriving in Israel at this time? Were these Russian Jewish immigrants saying: "What the hell is this? We're happy to be out of the Soviet Union, but here is a madman we never heard of before, Saddam Hussein, who is talking about attacking us with biological weapons." I would have thought that the Russian Jews would not have had the same spirit about all of this.

BROWN: Well, perhaps they felt caught between the devil and the deep blue sea. However, the fact is that they kept coming. Later on, even during the Gulf War, they continued to come to Israel.

Now, later on, as the war developed, commercial air flights into Israel, except for EL AL airline [Israeli state-owned airline], were no longer flying into Israel. However, the means were found, and these immigrants kept on coming into Israel. It was quite a phenomenon.

Incidentally, I am certainly no expert on the details of Israeli history. However, there was the history of progressive waves of immigration, and there were the problems that inevitably emerge when large waves descend on a limited economy in a tiny country like that. In a way, there are certain parallels to our own waves of immigration. That is, those whose parents came to Israel don't necessarily take too kindly to those who are currently coming.

Q: Absolutely. Raise the ladder, Charley, I'm aboard!

BROWN: That's right. So, there were mixed feelings because tremendous resources had to be found and had to be concentrated on these immigrants. Tremendous resources had to be found, concentrated, and applied quickly. That inevitably led to discussion as to where to find the money. In other words, who was going to suffer from giving up these resources, and so forth. I mentioned evidence of a split within the Shamir Government on how to house these people. As Minister of Housing and Construction, Ariel Sharon wanted not only whatever he could get from FEMA [Federal Emergency Management Administration] in the United States, but he wanted large-scale shipments of mobile housing, whether made of metal, plastic, wood, or a combination thereof. He wanted this to be shipped expeditiously to Israel.

Moda'i, who, at the time, was Minister of Finance, was against this proposal, saying, in essence, that this would be wasting money because temporary housing of that kind would cost a lot. He felt that, in the end, it would eventually be discarded, and a lot of money would be wasted. He felt that it would be better to go more slowly and house these people in tents, while building something more secure, and so forth.

There were arguments within the Israeli Government as to where to put these people. Should they be housed in the cities, in new suburbs, in the desert, in areas where Moroccan Jews had been settled and were subsidized to live in desert towns? Or should they be left to shift for themselves? Should transient camps be built? Should they be given free food, housing, and language education for a certain period? Should they be given the choice to go out on their own to find housing?

These were subjects for legitimate debate, and compromises were made. Generally speaking, the arrangements were fine tuned to the point where, as these people arrived at Ben Gurion International Airport, the airport was progressively turned into a huge, initial transit station.

The typical immigrant family leader was offered a choice: would he and his family prefer to go into a camp, where they would be housed for six months with a roof over their heads and provided with three meals a day and language education? Or, would they prefer simply to be given a check right away to start them off, with a monthly subsidy to follow, which had been calculated in advance. They could do whatever they wanted to do with this subsidy. A great number of the refugees said, "Give me the check." This was because, in traditional, European, Russian style, they hoped to get help from friends and relatives in Israel, and they figured that they could squeeze into an apartment of minimal size, save some of their money, look around, and try to make a new life for themselves.

It is fascinating to reflect on the contrast with the reaction of the Ethiopian Jews who were transported to Israel. Culturally, the Ethiopian Jews were far behind the significantly, Westernized society of Israel. We saw this later on, when another, new wave of immigrants came to Israel, under, for example, Operation Solomon, when the vast majority of the new immigrants went into special camps. Unfortunately, in many cases, these camps were isolated, and the refugees were provided with a total dole or subsidy by the Israeli Government.

Q: Well, really these settlements turned out to be kind of ghettos, weren't they?

BROWN: Well, "ghetto" is a term that I wouldn't accuse the Israelis of setting up, given their background and all of what that word implies. The Israelis found that the best way to handle this matter of resettling immigrants was to put these people together, in ethnic clumps. These ended up being totally subsidized dole arrangements.

When you have such an arrangement, your only real hope is with the young people. The older generation finds it so much more difficult to adjust and doesn't have the challenge of being forced to go out and find jobs and so forth. When you handle resettlement in that way, it really is the younger people that can adjust the most easily.

However, when the Israelis had to deal with "Russian" immigrants, there was a whole host of special problems. Remember, as I said before, a lot of the refugees were Ukrainians or came from elsewhere in the old Soviet Union, but they were very heavily from the Ukraine. Among these ex-Russian refugees, there were some highly talented people. They included scientists, technicians, and other people with great skills. Culturally speaking, they were a good group. The joke was often told that if a man wasn't carrying a violin, a flute, or a clarinet off the airplane with him, this meant that he was a pianist, and the piano was coming separately. The influx of talented, symphonic orchestra level musicians, or artists and painters was striking. Unfortunately, for a lot of them, there were simply no jobs for them, initially. The question then was how quickly they could adjust, learn the Hebrew language, and so forth.

Russian political parties developed. For example, Sharansky, who came to Israel from Russia in the late 1980s, became an articulate spokesman for these Russian immigrants in Israel. Russian language newspapers bloomed. Of course, Hebrew language classes were available. A lot of areas in Israel became significantly Russianized, and some tension developed in these areas as a result of this development.

Ashkelon and Ashdod on the Mediterranean coast of Israel were newly developed port cities which had been significantly populated by Moroccan or Sephardic, oriental Jews. Over time, as the Russians moved into Israel and took over these areas, some tensions developed. However, to come back to your main question, the Russians kept on coming to Israel, believe me.

Q: Before we move to another subject, I guess that everything will be predicated on the Gulf War and its aftermath. What about the economy of Israel, prior to all hell breaking loose with this influx of immigrants?

BROWN: As always, it was the subject of spirited commentary on the U.S. side. Remember that before I came back to Israel as ambassador, there had been an economic crisis in Israel in 1984-85. Inflation had gone way up, to 400 percent and then up to 1,000 percent. U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz stepped in and told the Israelis: "Okay, if you'll really tighten your belts and take draconian measures to curtail inflation, and if you undertake to reform your economy, we will extend you extra economic support." The Israeli economy is heavily socialized, if you will, or statist, with the government owning or controlling directly or indirectly great chunks of it. I recall that Moshe Arens [former Israeli ambassador to the United States and later Minister of Defense] used to call the Israeli economy a "Bolshevik economy."

A joint U.S.-Israeli economic committee was set up to meet semi-annually. A series of top level U.S. economists agreed to work on this aspect of the Israeli economy. Herbert Stein [former adviser to the President on economic affairs] is a good example. Meanwhile, under Shimon Peres as Israeli Prime Minister, draconian measures against inflation were taken. A general belt tightening program was undertaken. It was tough, but the Israelis did it. However, little progress was made under one Israeli Government or another on the structural, reform side of the Israeli economy.

By the time I arrived in Israel as ambassador, the U.S. side was beginning to get a little tired of meeting with the Israelis on a semiannual basis with little to show for it. Sessions of this joint economic group were slipped to an annual basis. I'll never forget Herb Stein coming over to Israel, meeting with the Israeli Minister of Finance and other top Israeli economists in various sectors, including the Bank of Israel, and finally meeting with Prime Minister Shamir at the Knesset [Israeli Parliament], because the Knesset was in session at the time.

As we started the meeting with Shamir, someone burst into the room and said that there was a vote coming up. Shamir said, "Oh, excuse me. You're doing a great job, but I've got to go now." That was the end of the meeting.

That conversation had begun with Herb Stein looking at Shamir and saying: “Nu?” [what's up]. In other words, what have you done and what are you going to do now? Shamir and his Government at the time were slipping and sliding because they weren't really willing to bite the bullet and face their problems through a basic, painful reform. Now, within Shamir's Government there were people like Arens who had a liberal economic outlook and Moda'i who came from a business background. Moda'i was Minister of Finance under Shamir. Moda'i had gone out and made money selling various products and held certain patents. So there were people within Shamir's Likud Government who were dedicated to breaking this socialist, statist lock on the Israeli economy. This was a combination which, over time and the many years of Labour Party control of the Israeli Government and the economy, with the support of the Histadrut [trade union federation], resulted in the emergence of a kind of feather bed, sweetheart arrangement between the government as the owner of many economic enterprises and the Histadrut labor unions. You find that around the world there are those kinds of attitudes and structural arrangements which are very hard to break.

Then you get into lip service. As the Israelis heard criticism from their true friends, such as Secretary Shultz and others in the U.S. Government, they would often pay lip service to the idea of structural change in the Israeli economy. They would say, “Give us more resources and then we'll work this out.” They were suggesting that this would enable them to carry out structural reform of the Israeli economy faster and further. From the U.S. viewpoint, that was a frustrating situation.

When you came down to a crisis, such as that involved in Russian Jewish immigration into Israel, you came pretty soon to the question of land. If you were going to settle these immigrants in Israel, under what circumstances could this be done? As I was saying, the question was whether you should settle the immigrants in camps or just let them go out and find housing and jobs on the economy. With the great influx of immigrants, the pressures on rents for apartments and so forth grew considerably. You found that the Government of Israel controlled about 90 percent of the land. The question was whether the government would give up this land. Would the government transfer it to the new arrivals and, if so, under what circumstances? These were very difficult questions. Then there was situation in the Knesset and all of the factionalism within any coalition government which would be relevant in this connection. So this created a form of gridlock which was very difficult to break.

Later on, jumping down to the period after my time as ambassador, Prime Minister “Bibi” Netanyahu was an outspoken proponent of breaking up this Bolshevik economy, privatizing and reforming it. However, he had his problems with his own coalition government. I remember a senior Israeli banker much later on, after I had left Israel, telling me that he had met with Netanyahu, when Bibi was in the final stages of his election campaign. They spent more than an hour discussing this situation. Bibi had said, “I am going to break the grip of those who have been stalling. We are going to liberalize this economy.” Well, it didn't quite work out that way.

The point that I want to make is that you have to be careful of stereotypes because the Likud coalition, for instance, had and has its own stereotypes. Behind these stereotypes there are all kinds of factions and cross currents as you'll find in many political party coalition. They can shift and turn, depending on the circumstances. I'll give you an example.

I mentioned, in passing, former Secretary of State Baker's attempts to promote the peace process prior to the Gulf War. I recall visits by [Minister of Defense] Arens in the coalition government which, at the time, had both Labour Party and Likud representatives in it. This coalition government was dominated by Likud, but Rabin was also Minister of Defense. We set up a special channel of communications with Rabin when we were frustrated over the lack of progress in promoting the peace process. Arens, as Defense Minister, privately expressed the need to do something about speeding up the peace process. Prime Minister Shamir, as always, was reticent and often hesitant about taking action. Finally, as a result of debate within the Likud coalition, between Arens, Shamir, and others, with Rabin and Shimon Peres chipping in, or just chipping away, in the case of Peres, an Israeli peace initiative emerged. This initiative was presented by Prime Minister Shamir. It was a subject of great debate. Shamir gave, shall we say, a cut down version of what Arens would have wanted.

Many Israelis, and certainly those on the Likud side, loathed the idea of being dragged into a peace process involving an international conference. They were opposed, in essence, to the idea that Israel might be brought into the docket before an international conference and faced with a consensus of European, Third World, and communist countries, with perhaps the U.S. vacillating. To head off such a conference, Shamir called for a meeting of the Camp David signatories, that is, Egypt and Israel, with the United States, which had been a key player and observer. The Shamir formulation also called for some form of a dialogue with local or native Palestinians. There was a big debate as to whether they should have elections within the [occupied] territories. There was a considerable split over that, bearing in mind that traditionally the Israelis had tried to deal with the established, conservative, Palestinian hierarchy. That is, with the mayors and senior leaders in the Palestinian communities, who came from established families.

However, the Intifada was going on. The Intifada could be described not only as a revolt against the Israelis but also a revolt against the established, Palestinian hierarchical clan leadership. There were those among the Israelis, particularly Arens, who thought that you could run free and fair elections in the occupied territories and could find people who were articulate and with whom you could deal. These people would not necessarily be supporters of the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization]. Of course, the Israelis had their own sources of information, and it was quite obvious that the PLO was dead against free, fair, democratic elections in the occupied territories at that stage, when much of the PLO leadership was in Tunis and had little control in the territories.

However, in all of this, as the Israeli finally came to articulate, through Prime Minister Shamir and Defense Minister Arens, a peace process initiative of their own, lo and behold, a split developed within the Likud. Ariel Sharon, David Levy, and Moda'i, three very different gentlemen, teamed together and declared that they were the Hishupkim, the constrainers. I think that Hishup means a "barrel hoop." These three broke off from the rest of the cabinet and announced that they disagreed with the Shamir initiative as giving away too much.

Now this was obviously an intra-party play here, as they were jockeying for positions in a cabinet which was beginning to get a bit shaky. It was very strange indeed, an arcane kind of thing. You know, Prime Minister Shamir and Defense Minister Arens were being portrayed by people within their own party, Sharon, Levy and Moda'i, as being soft! Come on! [Laughter]

This is important background as we moved into the summer of tension which finally erupted into the Gulf War [in 1990 and 1991]. What had happened was that a rift had opened between Secretary of State Baker and President Bush, on the one hand, and Prime Minister Shamir and Defense Minister Arens, on the other. Remember that we had used a special channel. Rabin and Shamir knew about this. I expect that Arens knew about it, although this was never stated openly to me except in that midnight conversation I told you about, when Arens said, "I suppose that now you're going to tell Rabin," and I said, "Yes."

Secretary of State Baker had given a speech before AIPAC [American Israel Public Affairs Committee] in May, 1989. The speech contained some nice tips of the hat and so forth, but it also was a bit of a bombshell. Baker said in effect: "Give up your dreams of a greater Israel, stop building Israeli settlements in the occupied territories, and let's get on with business." I remember that I was standing against the back wall of the room where the speech was given. When Baker made this remark, there was a stunned silence.

I had already given Baker my initial assessment that, however tough he was and hesitant and resistant, Prime Minister Shamir could be brought to take part in a peace process. Having given Baker that appraisal, this was to be a continuing concern of mine. As time wore on, it was so frustrating and kind of maddening to see the way things dragged on. At the time Baker gave that speech, I wasn't particularly bothered about it. Nevertheless, what emerged was a growing lack of trust between Bush and Baker, on the one hand, and Shamir and Arens, on the other. In other words, the dominant Likud faction of the Israeli Government coalition.

I had mentors and worked hard at keeping up with things in Washington. However, no American official, especially one living overseas, can really measure the Washington scene in most instances as accurately as the Israelis. After a while I came to feeling that, they would conclude that the Baker speech meant, in effect: "No more Mr. Nice Guy," that Bush and Baker were out to get them and cut them down to size through an initiative that would amount somehow to putting Israel in the dock. This would mean a version of land for peace or a territorial compromise whereby, they feared, Israel would end up shorn of everything that it had taken from 1967 onwards. This would also amount to U.S. waffling on the whole question of Jerusalem. So, an important breakdown was taking place in terms of confidence in the dialogue between Israel and the U.S.

Q: Would you say that the Israeli attitude, as I have heard again and again in the interviews in this oral history, was that, "If you're not 100 percent for us, you're against us." In other words, instead of seeing the nuances in the appraisal of the situation between Shamir and Arens, on the one hand, and Bush and Baker, on the other.

BROWN: The Israelis are very astute analysts. I think that at any given juncture I think that they have available to them some very sophisticated analysis of the situation in the U.S., backed by their own polling. They have a tremendous database, if I can use that expression, covering various portions of the spectrum of U.S. opinion. However, among some Israelis there has been a tendency over the years to err in portraying things that way. For historical reasons there was a certain paranoia among some Israelis and a suspicion of our motives. This is certainly understandable, given the enormous disparity between the U.S., as a super power, and a tiny country like Israel.

The Israelis also have their own historical recollections. The older generation of Israeli leaders is well aware that, notwithstanding all of the verbiage that had been expressed over the years in support of Israel, plus the money and very real resources given to Israel in war and peace, yet President Eisenhower had given Prime Minister Ben Gurion an ultimatum in 1956 to “get out of the Sinai, or else.” Going further back, President Harry Truman, although he was the first to recognize Israel [in 1948], had at the same time imposed an arms embargo on all sides, including fledgling Israel. Through all of these U.S. administrations there had always been some people, including Arabists in the State Department and others who had been highly critical of Israel. So the Israelis were well aware of that. However, younger Americans who had the task of dealing with Israel were sometimes somewhat deficient in corporate memory, let us say, on this issue of Israeli suspicion.

Q: During your time as ambassador to Israel, how did you do your own political analysis of who was calling the shots in AIPAC? The American Israeli Political Action Committee was a very powerful lobby. It was called the “Israeli Lobby” in the United States. Somebody, or some entity in the U.S., must have been directing how to analyze the impact of AIPAC.

BROWN: Tom Dine was the Executive Director of the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs. He and I had worked together many years previously in India, when he was one of Ambassador Chester Bowles' staff aides in New Delhi. He was one of Bowles' speechwriters and a real action man for the ambassador.

Q: However, behind this...

BROWN: I didn't really get into an analysis of the various factions of AIPAC. I was meeting all kinds of people, all of the time. I simply didn't have the time to get into that. When the AIPAC people came to us, they were pretty solid in their expressions of support. I didn't have many AIPAC people pulling me aside and saying: “What we really mean, or what I really feel,” is this or that, as opposed to what the AIPAC leadership was saying. Naturally, in an organization that large you will have...

Q: It was pretty solid.

BROWN: Yes.

Q: Before we move on, I have a couple of questions. Going back to the Israeli economy, what was your own feeling, as well as that of the embassy, in addition to what Israeli leaders were saying, about the U.S. role in the Israeli economy? I would have thought that, in a way, it would almost have been pernicious. I mean that our government or Congress, almost at will, could bail out the Israelis and give them money. Then there were Israeli bonds and other forms of support from the United States. The problem is that if Israel ends up being almost a charity case, this will tend to limit our own ability to encourage the development of a self-sustaining, Israeli economy.

BROWN: There were those in economic and intellectual groups in Israel, particularly on the Right, who were coming to the conclusion, when I arrived in Israel as ambassador, that the time was overdue to reform the Israeli economy by privatizing it. These groups felt that there was a certain amount of risk in letting things go on the way they were, because the net result of this would be to perpetuate the status quo.

This was a delicate matter, whether the Israeli Government had been controlled by the Labour Party or the Likud coalition up to that point, including the time I spent in Israel. Any Israeli Government desired to maintain and, if possible, increase the flow of American resources to Israel. Of course, the Russian Jewish immigration flow into Israel provided yet another reason for maintaining or increasing American resources earmarked for Israel. The argument went: "Yes, yes, we should privatize and liberalize. However, in the meantime we need the money to do this or that." Meanwhile, that Israel's economy was already changing dramatically. The old stereotype of the agriculturally based kibbutznik economy was passe. Those living in the kibbutzes in Israel had declined in numbers and now amounted to about one or two percent of the total population. However, in terms of the elite group in the Israeli Defense Forces and in certain other areas the kibbutzniks exercised an influence far greater than that statistic would indicate.

There had emerged some interesting Israeli economic think tanks. A leader of one of them called on me and said that on the one hand, his group stood solidly behind the Likud version of security. That is, Israel should keep control of the Occupied Territories and watch out for security threats now and in the future. For example, if Saddam Hussein in Iraq were to take over Jordan, Israel would face a tremendous peril. Therefore, Israel could not just give away the Jordan Valley, and the Golan Heights. However, that same think tank, and I've forgotten the name of it, argued that the U.S. should apply pressure to privatize and liberalize the Israeli economy. Otherwise, nothing would get done.

There was another consideration. There was great disillusionment with Prime Minister Shamir in the Labour Party. This was particularly the case with those who had Leftish, academic backgrounds. Over time, some of these people became so distraught over the Likud Government's position vis-a-vis the peace process and all of that, that one of them, in despair, said to me on one occasion: "You ought to cut off aid to Israel." I said, "What?" He said, "You ought to cut off aid because there is no other way in which Shamir will change his mind." What he meant was that the U.S. ought to topple the Shamir government by cutting off aid.

I immediately responded: "I am not going to get into that game. Forget it!" I could appreciate the despair of people who held those views, but we weren't going to engage in that kind of behavior.

Now this takes us to the issue of playing in the domestic politics of the other side. There's been a lot of sanctimonious comment on this issue over the years. For example, AIPAC is only one of many pressure groups. It is the largest, but there are many different types of Jewish-American lobbies. Their approaches to members of both Houses of Congress and their political activities on behalf of Israel are well reported. However, let's not kid ourselves; when we invest $3.0 billion a year in the Israeli economy, we are bound to have an effect. When we opened up a special channel via the American ambassador's secure phone to the Israeli Minister of Defense, Rabin, in connection with the peace process, we were playing a role in the Israeli domestic political game. Of course, there are various degrees of involvement, and it is important to distinguish between them. In effect, the Israelis played a lot more in our backyard than we did in their back yard.

Shamir's followers felt threatened, particularly after the speech in May, 1989, by Secretary of State Baker to AIPAC which I mentioned previously. We had already opened a serious dialogue with the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization]. This speech was taken to mean that we were seriously moving ahead to put pressure on the Israelis on the basis of land for peace, and that we expected them to make territorial concessions to the Palestinians in the Occupied Territories. On a worse case basis they could infer from the speech that they stood to lose much or all of the Golan Heights and to face the emergence in some form of a Palestinian entity. This was despite the fact that the official U.S. position, as earlier articulated by Secretary of State Shultz on behalf of the Reagan administration, had been that there should be no Palestinian state. We were opposed to a Palestinian state under the PLO, with its terrorist background.

Nevertheless, the Shamir supporters saw by various means what was going on under the Bush and Baker administration. This seriously concerned the Israelis, and they began to crank up a campaign with their friends in Congress. The State Department received letters from large numbers of members of Congress, expressing great support for Israel and concern that things should be done in the right way, and so forth.

I think that that contributed to the determination of President Bush and Secretary of State Baker to play things very close to the chest and to use a form of stealth in this area, as far as Israeli politics were concerned. So I think that this was a very important part of the political and economic background as we entered the summer of 1990.

Q: Before we discuss the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, I have two other questions. One of the things that has struck me, and please correct me if I am wrong, but I look at Germany before the rise of Hitler and I look at the United States, particularly after the influx of German Jews in the United States. I think what a wonderful boon we have had in terms of artistic growth and so forth. I am a movie fan. The movies owe so much, in particular, to the German Jews. The same thing applies to music, books, and other areas of cultural activity. I know that as a kid I learned so much about what was involved in growing up as a Jewish boy in New York, because I read so many books about it.

I have been struck by the underwhelming impact of Israel in the artistic world in the United States. I'm thinking of movies in particular. I don't know much about the impact of Israel on movies and literature. Compared to the artistic talent that is in Israel, for some reason it just doesn't seem to translate out to very much in the United States. Could you comment on that?

BROWN: That's interesting, Stuart. Let's put another spin on it. From the time I arrived in Israel as DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] in the embassy in Tel Aviv, and certainly later on, when I served as ambassador to Israel, I was profoundly struck by the enormous, cultural base within Israel. You could consider this as a base imported from outside Israel. I used to say, and I don't think that it would be much of an exaggeration, that, after serving in so many countries, I had never seen so much culture in the world, per capita, as I did in Israel. I'm speaking not only of the great Israel Museum up in Jerusalem, or the Tel Aviv Museum. My goodness! Down at the provincial or town level it was amazing to see the number of thriving museums. These were museums that not only had art to display, but offered interpretive classes in creative art appreciation and education, using their local art holdings as platforms.

The number of concerts and the range of musical activity was astounding. It seemed that most towns and cities of any size had symphony orchestras. By the time I returned to Israel as U.S. ambassador, apart from classical music, there was a full spectrum of jazz, rock music, and so forth available. When I first arrived in Israel, I was struck with what I would call an Ashkenazi Jewish culture, the kind of art that was prevalent in Europe in the 1930s and 1940s and so forth. When I returned to Israel, I could see that there had been a distinct evolution in which the Sephardic and Oriental Jewish traditions were growing. I felt that there was a great, cross-cultural development here. We also saw that there was more intermarriage between members of the Ashkenazi and Sephardic communities.

So, in my view, there was a cultural boom going on in Israel. And the Israelis became more high tech in their outlook, going into video and TV. When I was in Israel as ambassador, TV really took off. They turned to CD ROM [Compact Discs, Read Only Memory] software. The Israelis began to score very high in European TV song competitions. They have this split, where part of the reaction, if you will, to the U.S.-Israeli relationship is a desire by many people in Israel to continue to be recognized as a part of Europe. Indeed, many Israelis say, "There is where the bulk of our trade is, and there is where so much of our cultural flow should be, back and forth." However, they have one, major problem. That is, the attitude of many European governmental elites vis-a-vis Israel is very ambiguous, to use a rather charitable word. These Europeans are often perceived by Israelis as anti-Israeli and, in some cases, anti-Semitic. So, it's a mix of these attitudes.

Yours is an interesting observation, as far as Israeli impact on, let us say, U.S. culture. As the Israelis were highly nationalistic in their linguistic approach, they were putting out Hebrew language films, which very few American Jews could understand. I can understand more Hebrew than your average, American Jew. The emphasis on Hebrew as the national language also meant that Yiddish has suffered badly in Israel. So that posed a barrier for older American Jews who understood Yiddish. In sum, there is a major linguistic problem involved here. How many people in the U.S. are really interested in going to a movie theater and seeing a dubbed Israeli film? On the other hand, some of the Israeli vocalists are very impressive. In terms of classical, jazz, and Sephardic music, certainly on the Jewish circuit here in the United States they were making inroads. However, the reception has not been akin to what you have just described.

Q: What about the role of the orthodox [Jewish] establishment in Israel? Does that have much of an influence on Israeli artistic development?

BROWN: I think that there is a widening divide between secular and ultra-orthodox Jews. A large percentage of the artistic group in Israel would be over on the secular side of that divide. That is not to say that the ultra-orthodox, have no artists, musicians, and so forth. Actually, they have quite a few. As far as attitude is concerned, of course the ultra-orthodox are horrified by bare bodies, bikinis, or the portrayal in art of nubile creatures, and so forth. I assure you, however, that there is a lot of music played in the ultra-orthodox community. There is a lot of religious art, at least their form of art, as well. (End of tape)

I might make a further comment about Jerusalem, and particularly the American consulate general there. Let's do an historic tour, bearing in mind that long before the State of Israel was established, long before the existence of Tel Aviv, and long before the existence of an American embassy in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem was a holy city. In that holy city was an American consulate.

Q: In fact, the consulate was first opened in 1845.

BROWN: Yes, and for a long time that office was the site of the United States representation in Palestine. There were consulates there of other countries as well. The Spanish consulate was in Jerusalem prior to the establishment of the United States consulate general. It represented the Spanish King, one of whose many titles was, "Protector of the Faith," the "Protector of Jerusalem," and so forth.

Tel Aviv developed from the status of a tent city, and there was nothing there for many years in terms of official U.S. representation. The American consulate in Jerusalem was the only U.S. office in Palestine. With the establishment of the State of Israel and the arrival of Ambassador McDonald as the head of the American Mission in Israel, it wasn't long before tension developed between the new American embassy [in Tel Aviv] and the consulate up in Jerusalem. Some of the staff of the consulate general in Jerusalem tended to look on the American embassy as pro-Israeli and pro-Jewish. This attitude was reciprocated in broad terms over the years by some of the staff of the American embassy in Tel Aviv, who looked at the consulate general in Jerusalem and its backers in the State Department as a bunch of Arabists.

The legal aspects of this situation were such that the United States officially viewed Jerusalem as an international city known as a "corpus separatum" [separate body] whose final status was still to be determined. As a result, the consulate general in Jerusalem never sought recognition, nor was it recognized officially, diplomatically, or in consular terms by the Government of Israel. Bear in mind that for years, as the Government of Israel began to move piecemeal up to Jerusalem, it was warned by most governments, including the United States Government, not to do this. These governments warned the Israeli Government that they would not do business with the Government of Israel in Jerusalem. The Government of Israel was advised that it should remain in Tel Aviv and conduct its affairs there.

However, as time went on, pieces of the Government of Israel moved up to Jerusalem, including pieces of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. These pieces became larger and larger. Israeli Prime Ministers moved to Jerusalem, and I am speaking of Labour Party Prime Ministers in particular, long before the Likud Party's Prime Minister Menachem Begin moved his office and official residence to Jerusalem.

In all of this many Israelis had a stereotyped view of the American consulate general in Jerusalem as a pro-Arab outfit servicing Arab interests. That is a gross distortion of the reality, but it was a widely held Israeli perception.

Now, as a consular institution, the American consulate general in Jerusalem serviced the passport and visa needs of a growing population, many of whom were Jewish, including ultra-orthodox Jews. The Consular Section of the consulate general in Jerusalem was over on Arab side of the city.

I think that I may previously have touched on the sensitivity of the relationship between the embassy in Tel Aviv and the consulate general in Jerusalem when I spoke of my time as DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] in the embassy in Tel Aviv. That is, during the period from 1979 to 1982. Bear in mind that very senior and very capable Foreign Service officers were appointed to positions on the staff of the consulate general in Jerusalem.

Although the consulate general was relatively small, it was completely independent, so it did not have to clear with the embassy its correspondence to Washington. It had its own consular responsibilities and its own reporting goals and objectives assigned by the Department of State. If the consul general in Jerusalem felt like it, he or she could send off a first person or whatever other kind of message to the Department, completely independently of the embassy in Tel Aviv.

The embassy, of course, was much larger than the consulate general. Given past firefights between the two posts in previous years, when Ambassador Sam Lewis and I were in Tel Aviv, and Brandon Grove was the Consul General in Jerusalem with Jock Covey as his Deputy, we did everything that we could to minimize friction and to establish cross cultural contacts between the two posts. In some cases we arranged for the rotation of officers back and forth between the two posts on a voluntary basis. Ambassador Sam Lewis made a pronounced effort in person, which I tried to emulate, to brief the consul general in times of crisis on developments in and around the consulate general. When Phil Habib [Deputy Undersecretary for Political Affairs] and Ambassador Morris Draper were engaged in shuttle diplomacy involving Lebanon in 1982, they stayed in the residence of the consul general in Jerusalem, rather than at the King David Hotel. Habib drafted and sent his cables from the consulate general, as necessary. Phil Habib talked to the Israeli Prime Minister on the consul general's telephone, went over to call on the Prime Minister from the consul general's residence, and so forth.

So Jerusalem was not an isolated post, and obviously both the consulate general in Jerusalem and the embassy in Tel Aviv had to exercise as much diplomacy as they could toward each other. However, there was a constant danger, in connection with one episode or another, that some American Foreign Service officer would inadvertently create friction through something he might say.

I don't recall whether I've already given you an account of the experience of a congressional delegation, led by then Congressman Lester Wolff, a Jewish Member of Congress from New York. I think this happened in 1982, when I was DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] and maybe Chargé d'Affaires. I briefed CODEL Wolff and took them up to their hotel. We then handed them over to the consulate general for a further briefing. Unfortunately, an officer in the Consulate general, while briefing the Congressmen, was fiddling with Christian religious beads [a Rosary?]. This impressed Congressman Wolff and his associates as follows. Wolff referred to “That SOB [i.e., the officer from the consulate general whom I mentioned], “waving his Palestinian beads at us throughout the whole briefing.” This officer's presentation, which was obviously designed to give them a consulate general perspective, deeply offended Wolff and other members of his CODEL and was seen by them as Anti-Israeli and pro-Palestinian. When he returned to Washington Congressman Wolff made a spectacular affair out of this incident. He wrote a letter to the Secretary of State, demanding that he “bring the consulate general into line with U.S. policy.” He asked how this kind of thing could happen.

The Secretary of State was compelled to write a letter of reply, assuring Congressman Wolff and others that we had a unified policy in Israel and that the American ambassador and the consul general were reading from the same sheet of music.

That background made a deep impression upon me. Before I leave that period I might note that, in those days, the consulate general was a key link with and, within its sphere of responsibility, maintained liaison with the UN commander in Jerusalem, who was, at that time, a Finnish general. The UN commander supervised the bits and pieces of UN personnel assigned to UNTSO [United Nations Truce Supervisory Organization] and other organizations which had military observers in Lebanon and along the Israeli-Lebanese border.

All in all, the consulate general performed very important functions and was an important institution. None of the Foreign Service officers assigned to the consulate general in Jerusalem had an exequatur issued by the Israeli authorities and none had official standing in the eyes of the Israeli Government. It was often viewed with suspicion by many senior Israeli officials. In reporting terms its consular district nominally included the whole city of Jerusalem, as well as the West Bank of the Jordan River. As far as political access was concerned, it was constrained vis-a-vis the Jewish element of Jerusalem, which tended to stay aloof. Obviously, the consulate general was inundated by representations made by Palestinians over the years, in which they described what they regarded as the savagery, unfairness, and inequity of Israeli Government behavior.

When the Israeli settlement program really got under way, this involved the Israeli Government by a variety of means, some sophisticated and some less so, in expropriating land which the Palestinians considered as theirs. Often, these lands were wilderness areas, if you will. However, as the Israelis sequestered these lands, there would be Palestinian rural residents who would protest that “This was our land for generations.” The Israelis would say, “Prove it.” The Palestinians would usually be unable to prove it to the satisfaction of the Israeli authorities, who were tilted against the Palestinians anyway. When court cases on these matters were tried, and sometimes they were, with left-wing lawyers representing Arab clients, most often, in my recollection, the Arab plaintiff would lose, because he was up against the Government legal apparatus, which had done its homework.

Indeed, regarding the sequestering or expropriation, if you will, of land, the Israelis could and did cite British rules and precedents in administering the previous, League of Nations Palestinian Mandate. The British had been pretty adept at doing what they wanted to do and finding legal means to justify this.

Against this background, when I came back to Israel as ambassador, I felt that it was essential to establish and maintain good relations with the consulate general. I did what I could in this respect. I urged my DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] and senior officers of the embassy to do everything that they could to overcome this division between the two posts and minimize friction.

By now, of course, the settlement programs of the Israelis had reached a really high pitch. We're talking now about a big, organized approach to this matter. This activity might involve Israeli groups making a sudden appearance in the middle of the night with earthmoving equipment. We're no longer talking of Israelis with just picks and shovels. We're talking about organized, fully funded, and sophisticated establishment of settlement outposts out on some knoll or hill and rapidly expanding from that point. It was the consulate general's responsibility to spot and pinpoint these developments and describe what was going on. As it did so, of course, consulate general officers were subjected to surveillance by Israeli authorities, who often came to regard these officers as poking their noses into places where they shouldn't, and so forth.

So this was a never-ending struggle. We just had to work at this problem all of the time. Fortunately, we had good leadership provided by our consuls general in Jerusalem and the deputy principal officers, who recognized this and worked with us. However, you could never relax. You just had to keep working at it.

Q: Who was consul general in Jerusalem when you arrived in Israel in 1979?

BROWN: It was Mike Newlin followed by Brandon Grove. When I returned later as Ambassador it was Phil Wilcox. These gentlemen had very impressive backgrounds and were outstanding, senior officers.

As I have said, this situation was, is, and will remain something which has to be worked on all the time. I think that the consulate general in Jerusalem is now the sole, independent consulate general in the Foreign Service.

Q: Yes. The formerly independent consulate general in Hong Kong is now under the embassy in Beijing.

BROWN: By the way, speaking of Hong Kong, when the return of Hong Kong to the motherland of China got under way, I remember warning those who were going to supervise our consulate general in Hong Kong, one of them a particular friend of mine, of this Jerusalem experience. This might sound totally removed from the situation in Hong Kong. However, in the nature of things I thought that this deserved watching, and I understand that they have their problems as well between the consulate general in Hong Kong and the embassy in Beijing.

Q: I'm sure, because this process has been going on since 1949...

BROWN: Furthermore, there is a natural tendency by American ambassadors to attempt to fold consulates general under their wing, so to speak. Remember, watch the money flow. For example, when I was in Singapore in 1962, this office was transformed from being an independent consulate general, with very substantial responsibilities, to being a constituent post of Embassy Kuala Lumpur. Kuala Lumpur had grown from being a tiny consular post to a full-fledged embassy. The American ambassador in Kuala Lumpur who, in his day, had been an independent consul general in Singapore, moved to cut Singapore to being a post with a Class 3 or Class C cashier. That is, money had to flow through the embassy in Kuala Lumpur to the consulate general in Singapore and, with it, the power of decision. That's the nature of our business.

Much of the budget for the consulate general in Jerusalem was handled through the embassy in Tel Aviv, and much of the money flowed through us. I'm talking now, not just about State Department activity, but other U.S. Government services as well. It's a very complicated, delicate business. You have to be careful as an American ambassador not to let a cloud grow there, knowing that the funding flows through your embassy to this independent consulate general.

Q: Did the role of the Israeli Mayor of part of Jerusalem seem significant to you at that time?

BROWN: Well, Teddy Kollek had been Mayor of Jerusalem for many years. He was a very gregarious, significant figure. He was delighted to welcome the American consul general, but he was equally delighted to meet with the American ambassador. For our part the relationship with the Mayor was within the jurisdiction of the American consulate general.

Any Mayor of Jerusalem would naturally seek to have meetings with the American ambassador. However, we made sure that such meetings were arranged through the American consul general in Jerusalem, so that it remained clear that contacts with the Mayor of Jerusalem were within the purview of the consul general. Important elements of symbolism are involved here. You will find accounts of this symbolism and the related tensions over the handling of high level U. S. visitors in Ambassador Sam Lewis' memoirs of his tour of duty in Israel.

When we had senior level U.S. official visitors in those days, the Israelis tried to push such visitors to go to places in Jerusalem, including the Wall, which had been under Jordanian control until the 1967 war when the Israelis took control and declared Jerusalem to be forever undivided. Some people used to call it the Wailing Wall or the Western Wall. Some of these visits were especially delicate from the point of view of the consulate general, such as a visit by the Vice President or even by the President of the United States. The symbolism attached to visits to places which were outside the old West Jerusalem was very tricky given the official stance of the United States that the status of Jerusalem was to be determined later on, and its status as a corpus separatum.

During the period after 1967 Israeli power grew rapidly. The city had been forcibly unified under Israeli control and the Israelis unilaterally expanded its borders. Mayor Teddy Kollek did what he could to break down the barriers between East and West Jerusalem. He was frustrated, beyond a certain point, by the refusal of the Arab Palestinian leadership to go beyond accepting water and also money for their schools and hospitals. The Arab leaders balked at being incorporated through Kollek's rather liberal vision into a Jerusalem organized as a sort of London, with boroughs and free elections. Most Arab residents of Jerusalem boycotted the opportunity to vote in Jerusalem-wide elections, even though they were not Israeli citizens.

During my time in Israel Teddy Kollek was succeeded as Mayor of Jerusalem by Olmert, who was a flashy political operator from a prominent Likud family. He had assiduously cultivated his own American contacts over time. He had, and still has, aspirations to become much more than the Mayor of Jerusalem. In his efforts to defeat Teddy Kollek, an old, established figure, as Mayor, Olmert wooed ultra-orthodox, Jewish voters. The ultra-orthodox, Jewish population of Jerusalem has grown by leaps and bounds over the years. Any Mayor of Jerusalem would have to have his lines out to the religious community, and certainly Olmert promised them enough to get their votes. So that continues as an ongoing saga.

The point I want to reiterate is that, even now, as times change, the American ambassador to Israel, and his staff, have to be extremely conscious of the delicacy of the situation and the role of the American consul general in Jerusalem. Of course, that concern has to be reciprocated.

Q: Now we turn to the summer [of 1990]. Saddam Hussein, the President of Iraq, had been making noises about war in the Middle East. There was a very sizeable, American community in Israel. In fact, many Israelis have two passports [American and Israeli], don't they?

BROWN: Oh, yes. By the way, if I may interject a comment at this point. In the 1940s and 1950s there was a very rigid U.S. approach to dual citizenship. The Department took the view that an American citizen could hold only one passport. However, over time, there was an erosion or liberalization of this position.

Q: The U.S. Supreme Court played a role in this.

BROWN: Yes. As a result, many Israelis, some of them senior senior figures, carried U.S. passports. I may have told this story, but one day after lunch, when I was DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission], I was coming into the embassy in Tel Aviv. I saw an Israeli soldier with an automatic weapon slung over his shoulder and a yarmulke on his head, coming into the embassy. I asked him: "Where are you going, young man?" He said, "To cast my ballot as an absentee voter." This was in the elections of 1980. That would have been unthinkable during our earlier careers in the Foreign Service. The fiction was that this young man had been drafted or conscripted into the Israeli Defense Forces and had no choice in the matter. Therefore, he didn't lose his American citizenship, and he could be a dual citizen. There were Israelis who not only had dual citizenship but had multiple passports.

Q: I was just thinking that war clouds were gathering. There was a distinct threat by Saddam Hussein, who was not somebody whom you could just dismiss. You had this large, quasi-American group there in Israel, whatever you want to call it. What did you do about getting ready for the possibility of hostilities, in terms of evacuation? I'm not talking now about the embassy staff. I'm talking about ordinary Americans resident in Israel. What kinds of things were you doing about this?

BROWN: Let me come back to evacuation matters more specifically later. Like all Foreign Service posts, we had a monitoring system, broken down regionally within the country, to cope with possible disaster, whether earthquake, war, or other difficulties. Our embassy's Consular Section reported that as the tension grew, American residents of Israel began to check to make sure that their U.S. passports were up to date. We could see and feel that process going on.

Things began really to heat up after Saddam Hussein's remarks on April 2, 1990, that if war came, he would liquidate half of Israel by chemical warfare. Incidentally, as I read Charles Freeman's account of his time in the Middle East, during which time he learned Arabic, Chas says that Saddam recalled that Israel had attacked the Iraqi nuclear reactor in 1981. Saddam then said that, if Israel attacked Iraq again, the Iraqis would liquidate half of the Israelis by means of chemical warfare. That may be true, although it was certainly not my understanding of Saddam's remarks that he qualified his threat. I suppose that you would have to dig out FBIS [Foreign Broadcast Information Service] accounts of Saddam's speech. In my recollection, what came across was a relatively stark message that, if war came, he would liquidate half of Israel with chemical weapons. That's the way the Israelis read his speech.

I started to detail this in my previous remarks. The temperature of public opinion in Israel rose, particularly after August 2, 1990, when Iraq invaded Kuwait. We had meetings within the embassy with many American citizens who inquired about what was coming, what would happen, and so forth.

The Israeli gas mask distribution system was activated. The masks had not yet actually been distributed, but the word was going out that the Israeli Government had the necessary equipment on hand. Of course, we told American citizens of this announcement. Then we got into a difficult dialogue, with American citizens asking us whether Saddam Hussein would use conventional, nuclear, chemical, or biological weapons. They would ask us what we had to counter such attacks. American citizens would tell us: "You say that one of these gas masks is waiting for us in an Israeli warehouse. Will this gas mask be able to cope with VX, Sarin, or mustard gas? By the way, if the attack is with mustard gas, what about my skin? Do you have something beyond masks? Do you have rubber suits?" And on and on,

My conversations on these questions with people in the Department of State in Washington were largely over a secure phone. The information I obtained was not very satisfactory. Ambassador Charles Freeman, in Saudi Arabia, certainly had his problems dealing with similar inquiries.

My principal contacts in the State Department were with Jock Covey as the Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs under Assistant Secretary John Kelly and, eventually, Ivan Selig, who was Under Secretary of State for Management. It was with one or both of these officers that I got into some pretty heated conversations when I reported that there was growing consternation among American citizens in Israel about gas masks. I learned at a meeting within the embassy that personnel in the Office of the Defense Attaché had been issued gas masks, or at least that the officers had them, although their family members might not have had them. I was informed by these officers in the Department that this was impossible and was assured that: "We, in the State Department are the ones who authorize such distribution and we haven't authorized it." I said, "Would you like to have me read you the serial numbers on the gas masks?" So there was a jolt for those people in the State Department back in Washington. As I mentioned previously, Ambassador Chas Freeman had a similar problem with the Department.

As the tension grew and we sought specific information, we sometimes got what we felt was a pretty cavalier response in these telephone conversations. At one point I was told: "If we ever thought that Saddam Hussein would attack Israel with poison gas, we would have all of you out of Israel in no time." I remembered those remarks later on.

By August 2, 1990, Israeli Minister of Defense Arens was seeking to arrange a detailed dialogue with U.S. Secretary of Defense Cheney and the American establishment on preparations for war. Arens wasn't very happy with what he was getting. He was getting a pat on the back and was assured: "Don't worry, we're looking into this problem," and so forth. It is in the nature of Israelis in such circumstances to want to have the United States speaking to their needs. You can do that at a professional, technical level. That is, our attachés speaking with their Israeli military counterparts. However, the feeling that Minister of Defense Arens and his associates had was that they were being left behind and sort of left aside and being regarded as just another irritant by U.S. officials who were trying to manage these problems.

In previous remarks I mentioned a little sidelight here when Mohamad Bassiouni, the Egyptian ambassador in Tel Aviv, assured me, as late as August 2, 1990, that the Egyptians knew Saddam Hussein well, and that President Mubarak of Egypt had a special relationship with him. Mubarak had been assured by Saddam Hussein that Iraq was not going to invade or attack Kuwait. Ambassador Bassiouni said that President Mubarak knew Saddam Hussein well because he had been a student of Mubarak's of some kind in Cairo and that the Egyptians knew how to handle him.

That line changed 180 degrees overnight when on August 2, 1990 Saddam Hussein's army invaded Kuwait.. President Mubarak was livid, and Bassiouni, his ambassador to Israel, informed me that the Egyptians had known Saddam Hussein, this SOB, for a long time. He was nothing but a thug and prone to betray his friends and allies and so forth. I was barely able to keep myself from laughing out loud on this occasion.

Q: When Saddam Hussein and his forces invaded Kuwait, did the Israelis set up Defense Condition 3 or something like that?

BROWN: I can't remember what exactly they did, but the level of tension was palpably rising. At the professional, military level there were all kinds of talks going on. Of course, a lot of this had to do with gas masks and so forth.

We slowly got into a situation where the war clouds were gathering and it was clear that the United States Government, led by President George Bush, was preparing for the worst case. By late 1990 visits by American Jewish groups to Israel had declined. However, Russian Jewish immigration continued, right on through the crisis.

Q: Was this before we had started building up our forces in Saudi Arabia?

BROWN: I can't remember the specific details and I don't have any notes on this. However, as tensions mounted and the U.S. began to gear up in anticipation of combat, visits to Israel by large delegations of American Jews began to drop off very sharply. I remember, let us say, that by late October or November, 1990, these visits were down dramatically. I used to say that all was not lost in terms of Israeli-American friendship and that we had to continue to strengthen the bonds between us and prepare for the worst.

If I may, let me digress a bit here. As of about October, 1990, I would say, I tried to look ahead a bit. That is, I asked my political counselor, John Herbst [later consul general in Jerusalem and Ambassador in parts of the former Soviet Union], to look ahead to the possibility of war and what might happen after a war, in terms of renewing the peace process in the Middle East. This cable focused significantly on Syria. I assumed that war was likely and that there would be a series of political earthquakes that would come with such a war. I assumed that with such changes a unique opportunity might open up after the war for a revival of the peace process.

In this connection the Syrian dimension of the situation would be important. Now, as I mention this to you, I can't remember how far we had already gone in persuading President Assad of Syria to join the coalition we were trying to establish, if war came. I'm not clear on this in my memory. However, I mentioned that possibility in this cable. I sent off that message, repeating it to other posts. Ed Djerejian, later Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern Affairs, was then ambassador to Syria.

Now, if I may jump ahead a bit, by February, 1991, I ordered another cable to be drafted, which I think was titled: "Road to Damascus." It referenced that earlier cable and said, "We are now at war, Syria has joined the coalition against Saddam Hussein, which is a remarkable feat."

Q: Absolutely!

BROWN: In this second cable I recommended that we look ahead to a peace process which would significantly focus on Syria. I said that I believed that the time would come to talk about territorial compromise on the Israeli-Syrian border on the Golan Heights. Of course, there was the Lebanese aspect of the border that would have to be dealt with, but the crux of the negotiation would have to be with Syria regarding the Golan Heights. No Israeli Government that I could anticipate would be willing to give up control of all of the Golan Heights, but it might very well be possible for the U.S. to broker a deal under which a significant part of the Golan Heights area was turned back to Syria, along with a number of security guarantees for Israel. I said that this negotiation would be a major challenge for the U.S. Government.

I repeated this telegram to our embassy in Damascus. Ambassador Djerejian immediately weighed in, following up this cable and saying that, of course, that was the way he saw things. However, he pointed out that President Assad would demand the return of all of the Golan Heights area. One has to distinguish here about what the Golan Heights area comprises. When you refer to the Golan Heights, most of us think of the heights of the Golan, that great cliff that dominates the Sea of Galilee. However, the Syrians insist on the return of all the territory that they held before June, 1967. That would include territory approximately 10 yards from the Eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee. That would be the Syrian version of the negotiating package.

So let's return to the war clouds gathering in the fall of 1990 and the determination that we were going to war and our build-up in Saudi Arabia. Do you want to save this for later?

Q: I think that this is probably the best way to do it, because I think that it is best to handle this narrative in segments. So we'll pick this up the next time where we're moving into Desert Shield. One of the questions that I want to ask would be early on in the process, when President Bush and Secretary of State Baker were putting together this remarkable coalition against Iraq. In other words, how to keep the fly in the ointment, namely Israel, out of the negotiations. I would like you to describe your instructions and how you dealt with this problem, because the Israelis were obviously unhappy about how this was handled.

BROWN: Okay. I don't particularly like the expression, "fly in the ointment" to describe Israel. However, we'll talk about this matter later on.

Q: Today is September 15, 1999. Bill, we're still talking about the period which led immediately up to the Gulf War in 1991. Many people had been telling you that they knew Saddam Hussein. I would like to ask about the early period of the crisis, when the initial threats came out. This would have been in the spring of 1990, I guess.

BROWN: Particularly the speech or remarks attributed to Saddam Hussein on April 2, 1990. Speaking of the growing tension in the region and about the possibility of war, Saddam Hussein said something like: "We now have binary, chemical weapons. By God, if the Israelis come at us, or attack us, we will liquidate half of Israel with chemical weapons." That's the way Chas Freeman remembers Saddam's remarks. My recollection was that Saddam didn't qualify his threat by tying it to an Israeli attack, but even if he did, his remarks had a dramatic impact.

Q: Something which I didn't ask concerns the period before anything else happened. You could almost assume that the Israelis would put a couple of nuclear weapons on a plane and take off on an attack against Iraq. Was this one of your assumptions?

BROWN: No, not at that time, although, later on during this crisis the Israelis let our satellites have a peek at some of their Jericho missiles. They knew that that message would get around, and it did.

I think that at this juncture perhaps it would be worthwhile for me to try to examine for the reader or listener to this interview the Israeli baggage as they went into this situation, in strategic, emotional, and other terms.

First of all, old timers in Israel with military backgrounds would tell me personally of their vivid memories of a battalion or so of Iraqi troops deployed in Haifa and on the perimeter of Tel Aviv in 1948. I remember one Israeli figure who later became a diplomat who said that he had actually exchanged words with an Iraqi battalion commander in Haifa during the Arab nations' invasion which followed the proclamation of the State of Israel. So Iraqi forces were physically there on Israeli territory.

I remember another Israeli old-timer, Mordecai Zippori telling me that he had been involved in a counterattack in 1948 against Iraqi troops at Petach Tikva, a suburb of Tel Aviv. When the Israelis overran the Iraqi position, they found the Iraqi troops manacled together in a trench so that they wouldn't run away. So for the old timers, it wasn't just a symbolic thing, that Iraq was just another of the Arab countries, like the Saudis and so forth. Iraq had sent troops to attack Israel. This all happened long before Saddam Hussein was in power in Iraq.

Furthermore, you should remember that in those very early days of the hostilities against the Israelis in 1948, the Iraqis were so virulently anti-Semitic and anti-Israeli that thousands of Jews living in Iraq fled the country and many went to Israel. To this day there is a considerable number of Sephardic, or Oriental Jews from Iraq in Israel. Incidentally, there is a community of Iraqi Kurdish Jews in Israel today. The irony of one of Saddam Hussein's SCUD missile attacks is that a SCUD landed in Ramat Gan, which was predominantly an Iraqi Jewish sector. I remember inspecting the crater left from the explosion of an Iraqi SCUD missile and the buildings demolished around it. It was remarkable that so few casualties were caused by it. Some people died of heart attacks, and there were other people wounded, but there was no large number of casualties.

By the way, Yitzhak Mordecai, a tough retired Israeli general, is a Kurdish Jew. When he retired, he then ran for the Knesset and became Minister of Defense. Initially, he was associated with Bibi Netanyahu. Later, he abandoned Netanyahu and formed his own political party. The Kurdish angle takes us to an interesting sidelight of which most foreign observers are ignorant.

Strategically, given the Israeli defense problem an important part of the Israeli counter to the Arabs over the years was their effort to keep the Arab world divided. That's a formidable task for tiny Israel, but they did what they could. They tried to form alliances with non-Arab, non-Muslim peoples in and around the area. So the Israelis were delighted to hook up with Iran under the Shah. They worked very hard to develop a relationship with Turkey, knowing that many Turks bitterly disliked the Arabs, considering them traitors who had broken away from the Ottoman Empire and cooperated with the British.

They also sought to work with Muslim minorities in the Middle East who were non-Arab in the conventional sense. For years, for example, the Israelis worked hand in glove with the Kurdish nationalists. Many an Israeli military or security type was in those hills of northern Iraq, with the Kurds, training, arming, and participating, if you will, in activities against the Iraqi regime of the time. For example, the former Israeli Defense Forces chief of staff, Rafoul Eytan, was a very hard-nosed anti-Arab figure. In his memoirs he harks back to the good old days when he was stationed in Kurdish areas of Iraq, working with the Kurds. I could name several other, prominent Israelis who had been involved with the Kurds in their revolts against the Iraqis.

With this background, Iraq was viewed not only as anti-Semitic and anti-Israeli but also, as a particularly virulent threat to Israel. I think that that is important to bear in mind. The Israelis had a certain respect or even anxiety for many years about the Iraqis, much more than they felt about the Saudis. The Israelis tended to view the Saudis as weak and corrupt, although potentially dangerous because the Saudis had the money to fund Yasser Arafat and many other Arab radicals, like Assad of Syria. However, the Israelis did not consider the Saudis as a fighting, expansionist threat to Israel. Iraq was a different story.

Apart from the Iraqi nuclear threat, there remained, and still remains today, a strong, Israeli, strategic concern about the possibility that Iraq, under Saddam Hussein or anybody else, could easily overwhelm Jordan. From Baghdad it is an easy 500 kilometer distance to Amman, Jordan, and the Jordanian regime was, and remains, relatively weak. It has a nice little army, but it couldn't stand up against a massive, mechanized attack.

So the Israelis, both for political and propaganda purposes, as well as on the basis of their own, strategic analyses, were, and remain very concerned about the possibility of an Iraqi takeover of Jordan and of the possibility of the Iraqis appearing one day, in mechanized strength, at the edge of the Jordan Valley between Israel and Jordan.

Q: From your Israeli contacts, and particularly the military, and almost anybody that you would deal with in Israel had a military background, what were you getting about the Iraqi military forces? The Iraqis had just had this long war with Iran and come out relatively ahead, if you want to put it that way.

BROWN: It was a mixed view. First, strategically, the Israelis were satisfied, to put it mildly, to see this prolonged and bloody conflict between Iraq and Iran, over a period of seven or eight years. This conflict took a terrible toll on both sides. However, as we went into Desert Shield and Desert Storm, notwithstanding the Israeli propensity to hype the Iraqi threat to Israel as a whole and to Iraq's neighbors, the top Israeli military professionals had a rather poor regard for the Iraqi military in terms of their ability to fight a modern war. Having said that, of course, the Israelis had very good intelligence on the massive numbers of Iraqi tanks, artillery, aircraft, and so forth. So it was a mixed picture.

What they saw was the ability of the Iraqis to overrun Kuwait quickly. They also saw the ability of the Iraqis, if unopposed by a U.S. led intervention, to overrun critical parts of Saudi Arabia, all the way down to the oil fields around Dhahran. They considered this a distinct possibility and even a probability, in the absence of massive intervention of the kind which only the United States could mount.

Going back again to an Israeli perception of an Iraqi threat, one had to bear in mind that among the baggage that the Israelis carried was the nuclear, chemical, and more lately, the biological buildup of the Iraqi military establishment. This had so disturbed the Israelis already that this was the subject of intensive conversations between Prime Minister Begin and Ambassador Sam Lewis and the intelligence communities of both Israel and the United States. The Israelis saw what they regarded as our failure to cope adequately with the ongoing flow of German, French, Swiss, and other type high technology into Iraq. This technology was producing centrifuges nominally for power plants. However, the Israelis also interpreted these centrifuges as part of a massive drive toward achieving a nuclear weapons capability in Iraq.

In my earlier remarks, as you may recall, I mentioned the gap in handling this issue between the outgoing Carter administration in the U.S. and the incoming Reagan administration. The Israelis had repeatedly warned us at a very senior level after high level, intelligence exchanges with the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] on this subject. Considering that we were apparently inert on this matter and that the U.S. attitude had been limited to asking for more time to work on the Italians, the French, and the Germans on nuclear matters, the Israelis bombed the Iraqi nuclear reactor in June, 1981. This action produced a negative outcry at the time in the U.S. and a minicrisis in U.S.-Israeli relations. You may recall at the time that we temporarily cut off supplies of aircraft and aircraft support to Israel.

Q: As you look back on the Israeli bombing of the Iraqi nuclear reactor, what was your feeling on that? Was this a sort of tongue in cheek protest against the U.S., or did we see Iraq as a threat? Did we feel that: "Thank God that somebody did this, or..."

BROWN: Well, there was an outcry in Washington and some tough, critical statements by the some members of the Reagan administration. The Secretary of State at the time was Al Haig. If you look at remarks made about Al Haig's reactions to all of this, let alone his later remarks, you get the impression that even then certain Americans felt that the attack on the Iraqi nuclear reactor was not all a bad thing. As time went on and we became increasingly aware of what was going on in Iraqi nuclear/chemical/bacteriological activities long after that bombing of the Iraqi nuclear reactor, this attack was subsequently viewed as a good thing.

During the Gulf War I heard Secretary of Defense Cheney bless the Israelis for having undertaken this attack. He also said, "Thank God that you did it when you did it." So we need to distinguish between our reaction to the Israeli attack on the Iraqi nuclear facility at the time, our subsequent views, and then our views during the Gulf War itself, as well as what we discovered when UN and predominantly U.S. inspection teams went into Iraq after the Gulf War and discovered the mount of progress which the Iraqis had made in terms of horrible weapons of mass destruction. As you look at Israeli-Iraqi relations during this period, they were marked by a technical state of war. Both Israelis and Iraqis have a very negative view of each other, to put it mildly.

On April 2, 1990, Saddam Hussein made the statement I have already referred to. Israeli Minister of Defense Moshe Arens, whom I considered a friend but who was known in Israel to be hawkish called me in and asked me what the U.S. was going to do about this statement. That began the Israeli push, well-articulated by Arens, for concrete assurances, for increased cooperation to face this common threat to the U.S. and Israel. You should remember that at the same time the political relationship between the Shamir Government, in which Arens was the Minister of Defense, and Secretary of State James Baker was not good. After a cut-down version of a Middle East peace process was articulated by Israeli Prime Minister Shamir, President Bush and Secretary Baker attempted to shape things in their own way. As a result, the peace process went nowhere, and there was bad feeling on both the Israeli and U.S. sides. The Arab Intifada [uprising] in the occupied territories was continuing and was applauded by Iraq.

Within the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] there are many factions, some of them very radical. One of those factions was in Damascus, which directed fire and brimstone not only against the Israelis but against Yasser Arafat [Chairman of the PLO] for being soft. Another one of these PLO factions, which is called “The Palestine Liberation Front,” (PLF) is headquartered in Baghdad. It was a particularly virulent terrorist group. This is the group which seized the SS ACHILLE LAURO, an Italian cruise ship, in the Eastern Mediterranean, and executed one of the passengers on it, a handicapped American citizen, Klinghoffer, in a brutal manner.

At the end of May, 1990, on Shevut, a Jewish religious holiday, a couple of terrorist speedboats headed for the shore of Israel, when many thousands of Israelis were on the beaches. The terrorists from one boat managed to get ashore, there was a firefight, and they were hunted down and killed. The other speedboat ran out of fuel close to my residence! The Israelis picked up this speedboat there, armed to the teeth.

It turned out that these terrorists were members of the Palestinian Liberation Front, a group headquartered in Baghdad, parts of which are now working out of Libya. Colonel Qadhafi had these people trained, they were put on a ship which somehow made its way through our satellite tracking system, and they were launched against the Israeli coast. However, these groups were launched too far out to sea. As a Palestinian terrorist of that time it was poorly coordinated and executed.

When the Israelis collected the survivors of this operation and interviewed them, they got a considerably detailed picture from them of what the terrorists were expected to do. It turned out that the plan was remarkably simplistic. That is, they were given a profile of the Tel Aviv skyline, as seen from the sea. They were told, “Here is the Hilton Hotel, here is the American embassy; go in and kill anybody that you can. Then somehow, after this, work out an escape route.” According to the Israelis, The American embassy in Tel Aviv was specifically mentioned as a target. The Israelis asked me if we would like to have our intelligence people interview these terrorists. I declined.

Then I sat down and wrote a cable to Washington, summarizing what had happened. I noted that there was a dialogue going on with the PLO in Tunis. In view of what had happened, I recommended that, unless Arafat immediately dissociated himself from this faction of the PLO organization, denounced them and did whatever was necessary to make his opposition to this operation clear, we should break off further contacts with the PLO.

I knew that this cable would not necessarily attract great acclaim from the administration in Washington. [Laughter] The Bush administration had assiduously followed up the trail which the Reagan administration had blazed for a probing dialogue with the PLO in Tunis, to be conducted by Ambassador Bob Pelletreau. Understandably, a great hue and cry went up after terrorist incident. About three weeks later the Bush administration declared that it was ending the dialogue with the PLO. It did so in a way which left me and others convinced that this was a most reluctant move and that it was hoped that, somehow, this obstacle could be overcome. However, once again there was an Iraqi element in all of this, even though the operation itself was launched by Colonel Qadhafi.

Q: I don't want to get you off track, but I would like to set the scene. During this period before the Iraqis attacked and occupied Kuwait, were we doing anything with the Israelis about their occupation of a strip of Lebanon immediately North of the border with Israel?

BROWN: Throughout my entire time as DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] in Tel Aviv, and I am referring to the entire 1979-1982 period, as well as this period of my tour as ambassador, we were working under UN Resolution 425, which was unfulfilled in a key respect. The Resolution provided that all non-Lebanese forces were to withdraw from the region occupied by the Israelis and their ally, the South Lebanese Army under Major Haddad. This was a mix of not only Christian Lebanese Arabs but also Christian Druze and Shia Muslims. So whenever we had a dialogue with the Israelis on that particular subject, we were constrained by the need to implement UN Resolution 425, to which we were a party. The Resolution meant in practical terms that the Israelis should pull out of Lebanon and let the UN monitor the situation. The Israelis weren't about to do that under the conditions which then prevailed.

You remember the Lebanese civil war of 1982 in the wake of the Sabra and Shatila scandal. There was a pull-back of Israeli forces orchestrated by then Israeli Minister of Defense Arens, followed by a further pull-back orchestrated by Israeli Prime Minister Rabin. Subsequently, there were periodic episodes of attack and counterattack in southern Lebanon. The Israelis continued air strikes against concentrations of what now had become known as Hezbollah forces. These areas were first held by Palestinian forces, and were later taken over by the Hezbollah brand of Shiite, Iranian backed forces, with the clear acquiescence of the Syrians. Syria was supposedly constrained by the consideration that Hezbollah forces should not go too far, but the Syrians, their assurances to the contrary notwithstanding, were allowing Iran to run weaponry and ammunition, agents, and so forth from Iran, through Damascus, into Lebanon, thereby building up this Hezbollah effort. At times the Israeli combat with Hezbollah paramilitary units was quite sharp. So our position, as conveyed to the Israelis, was that there should be moderation and restraint, as it always had been. Moreover, we were driven by support for UN Resolution 425. This meant that the Israelis should pull out of southern Lebanon.

Q: Did we protest from time to time about the continued presence of Israeli units in Lebanon?

BROWN: Sure, we protested, when we saw that an Israeli action or reaction seemed to have gone too far. My contacts in Israel on this issue included Uri Lubrani a senior civilian within the Israeli military security establishment. He was a highly experienced officer, an articulate gentleman who had great experience with Iranian and Arab issues. He could sit with you and lay out in the most detailed manner why the Israelis were in Lebanon and why they were doing what they were doing. He expressed his own, personal willingness to see things resolved in an equitable manner, if only he could get positive responses from the Arab side. Lubrani was involved in all kinds of quiet efforts to open dialogues with Hezbollah and Shiite representatives and, indeed, others in the Muslim world. These efforts generally came to nothing. At any given time he had all kinds of operations under way, many of which he would discuss with me in confidence.

The Hezbollah position was and is absolute rejection of Israel and a determination to push the Israelis, not only out of southern Lebanon, but out of Israel. They remained totally rejectionist in their expressed attitude toward Israel. In other words, they expressed commitment to the idea of the destruction of the Zionist entity and a return of Palestine to its Arab, Muslim owners.

Against this background, let's go back to April, 1990, and the American reaction to the developing crisis at that time. Shortly after the Saddam Hussein statement of April 2, 1990, to which I referred previously, a U.S. Senatorial delegation headed by then Senate Minority Leader Robert Dole visited the Middle East. It included Senator Dole, his wife Libby Dole, and a few others. I think that it included four Republicans, Senator Howard Metzenbaum [Democrat, Ohio] was the Democratic member of this Delegation. He was included to make the delegation bipartisan. In their various meetings they saw President Mubarak of Egypt. Then they headed for Baghdad. At that time I received an urgent message from Senator Metzenbaum. I ended up talking with his staff member, over an open line, from the Delegation's plane.

If I recall correctly, Metzenbaum's staffer said, "We're headed for Baghdad, and Senator Metzenbaum wants your clearance." [Laughter] Looking on this as a kind of "cover your posterior" approach, I said, "Well, if you're going there, you're going there. Good luck!" They went to Baghdad. From there they came to Israel. I received a somewhat unusual request from Senator Dole that he wanted a big press conference shortly after his arrival at the Hilton Hotel in Jerusalem.

Now, prudent leaders of congressional delegations to Israel usually save their remarks until the end of their visit, after they've seen the Israel Prime Minister and other Israeli big wigs. They usually try to wrap up the visit and put their particular gloss on it. However, Senator Dole had something he wanted to say in public on arrival in Israel.

So it was that Senator Dole held a large, very well attended press conference. The thrust of his remarks was that they had seen President Saddam Hussein of Iraq, they had queried him about his remarks on liquidating Israel. Saddam Hussein had stressed that he had no intent to launch an unprovoked attack against Israel. As far as the lurid accounts of Saddam Hussein's use of chemical warfare against the Kurdish population, and you remember those pictures of ghastly, gas attacks against Kurdish population centers in Iraq, Senator Dole said that Saddam denied that there had been any such gas attacks and offered him a helicopter to go around Iraq and see how the positive the populace felt about Saddam. Senator Dole prudently declined the use of such a helicopter, but wanted to pass on Saddam Hussein's assurances that he meant no ill will against Iraq's neighbors. The general thrust of Senator Dole's extended press conference was that Saddam Hussein was a man who might have made some intemperate statements, but he was a man with whom one could do business. Therefore, hopefully, there was no major threat in the region.

I would say that, as a public relations exercise, it was a disaster at the time. Here we had a very respected Republican leader in the Senate who was later to become a Presidential candidate, reassuring the Israelis and the world on the basis of his discussions with Saddam Hussein. This did not go down well in Israel.

Q: When a U.S. Senator comes in like that, you were the American ambassador, and I can see people in the Israeli Government coming up to you and saying: "Nu?" [What's up?]. [Laughter] What do you do and how do you react to this?

BROWN: How do you respond? You say that the man has just been to Iraq. He tells you what he said in public. You have to weigh this statement. Certainly, his intentions were good. You add that you don't have to point out that Senator Dole was the Senate Minority Leader. Let me add a vignette on Dole: during one of Shamir's visits to Washington he had a breakfast meeting with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Committee Chairman Senator Pell [Democrat, Rhode Island], Senator Jesse Helms [Republican, North Carolina] and Senator Dole were present at this meeting. There was a good turnout, of the kind that an Israeli Prime Minister usually gets. Shamir was given an opportunity to speak and then the Senators made remarks.

At this session, the Intifada came up. Some of the Senators present at the meeting expressed their concern over the handling of the Intifada and received a typical, Shamir response. In all of this, of course, Senator Jesse Helms was very supportive of Israel. At the same time Senator Dole was looking pretty sour. As this meeting ended, Senator Dole walked past me, looked at me, paused, and said, "Boy, if this guy [Shamir] had been from South Africa, we would have really raked him over the coals!" So, shall I say, Senator Dole displayed a manner that the Israelis considered unsympathetic, if not hostile, to Israel, at that particular stage.

However, one always has to temper these impressions because Senator Dole's viewpoint and that of many members of Congress, whatever they said publicly, were affected by the Israeli handling of the Intifada and of the peace process. Remember that the first peace initiative was portrayed as coming from Prime Minister Shamir. Shamir's reaction to the handling of that episode by President Bush and Secretary of State Baker in 1989 and 1990 left much to be desired, to put it mildly.

As tension in the Middle East mounted Israeli Minister of Defense Arens presented proposals for a cooperative effort to handle this threat to our respective national interests. As he did this, the American establishment was obviously getting antsy [disturbed]. It didn't want to jump into bed with the Israelis in handling the emerging crisis. It was working hard to contain the crisis in its own way. It didn't want to be seen to be coordinating with the Israelis.

Israeli Minister of Defense Arens was mounting these probes, these direct inquiries, to U.S. Secretary of Defense Cheney and others. Arens was making trips and was getting a polite but unmistakable stiff arm from the U.S. This was sort of cyclical. As he got the stiff arm, he continued on, and, of course, the Israelis were working through other channels, congressional and so forth, as the heat built up.

On August 2, 1990, Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait. Now, the fat was really in the fire and, with it, Israeli Defense Minister Arens intensified Israeli requests for a coordinated effort to deal with the situation. When you got down to the nitty gritty, what the Israelis wanted was better intelligence on the precise locations of Iraqi missiles which might be used to attack Israel. We had done some overflights of suspected missiles in northern Iraq. On their own, as well as through intelligence exchanges with the U.S., the Israelis knew that the Iraqis had moved SCUD missiles, some of them fixed and some of them mobile, to what were called the H2 and H3 airfields in northern Iraq. From these positions a modified SCUD would have the range to hit Israel.

As time went on the Israelis, by one means or another, developed the intelligence that, not only were these missiles in northern Iraq but these missile deployments were increasing. These missiles were pointed at Tel Aviv or Haifa. So there was a lot of activity on the part of the Iraqis going on in northern Iraq, concurrently with other things. Arens' requests increased, and now what he wanted was very specific. He wanted live, real-time intelligence on what was going on there. He wanted photographs of the targets which would enable a sophisticated recipient of these photographs to pinpoint Iraqi targets.

The U.S. was not providing this target information to the Israelis. We were talking about intelligence exchanges in more generalized terms. We said that these Iraqi missiles were deployed in northern Iraq, but we were not providing the Israelis with specific, reconnaissance photographs of either the H2 and H3 SCUD missiles, both fixed and mobile, or anything else, out of fear that the Israelis might go overboard and resort to some preemptive action against these targets. Secretary of Defense Cheney was polite and friendly in response to these requests from Israeli Defense Minister Arens, but he continued to stiff arm these requests.

Within Israel itself, as we got into the latter part of 1990, the political position of the Shamir Government was weakening in domestic terms. This was almost a normal development for an Israeli coalition government. Remember that this was now the second Shamir cabinet. The Labour Party was excluded after Shimon Peres misplayed his hand in January, 1990. The new cabinet had growing, internal frictions as groups within Likud led by Ariel Sharon, Moda'i, and David Levy, three very different figures, wanted more power and more leverage on Prime Minister Shamir.

In an effort to strengthen his coalition government, Shamir began to try to attract small, extreme Right Wing parties such as that led by Rafoul Eytan, whom I mentioned previously. He was a former Chief of Staff of the Israeli Defense Forces and was a very hard, hawkish individual vis-a-vis all Arabs. Another retired general, Ze'evi, who was nicknamed "Gandhi," was the head of a two-man extremist political party named "Moledet," the Hebrew name for "the Hammer." Ze'evi was an advocate of transfer. That is, the expulsion of the Palestinian population from the occupied territories, in the absence of a major change in attitude on the part of the Palestinians. Moledet was a really hawkish party. That was the kind of internal development occurring within and around the Likud.

As the political tension mounted, the Constrainers, Sharon, Moda'i, and Levy, were critical of everything that Prime Minister Shamir and Minister of Defense Arens did. So this affected not only internal, domestic policy, but it produced a hardening among those whom I mentioned in Likud who were critical of the government. This had an extra-deleterious effect when the Gulf War finally came. Arens and company were pressing for target reconnaissance photography as part of a live, real time intelligence exchange. Trips were being made back and forth. The administration of President Bush was saying, in effect: "Look, we'll manage this. We'll certainly keep Israeli interests in mind. However, don't muck things up, don't do anything pre-emptive. Let us go about our efforts to form a Grand Coalition against Iraq."

When President Bush committed troops to Saudi Arabia, we witnessed the extensive, continuing buildup called Desert Shield. When the Israelis looked at this enormous buildup, they continued their efforts by proposing a direct relationship with General Norman Schwarzkopf [Commander of Central Command and of the buildup of forces committed to Desert Shield, as well as of combat operations under Desert Storm]. This was turned down flat. We said that we would manage this relationship through Washington and that we would give the Israelis what was necessary. However, we made clear that we would manage it our own way.

Q: Were you in the position of trying to say to the Israelis: "Come on, fellows, you understand what the situation is." The Israelis had to know that they could screw things up if they got too close to what we were doing.

BROWN: I had my role and I had my scripts. I can remember situations when Arens was pressing me, along with Washington agencies, for a commitment to provide target photos of Iraq. As I knew what the Washington line was, I was saying: "Will you promise not to attack the Iraqis?" Of course, Arens wouldn't do so. I would then have to report his refusal to provide such a commitment.

Remember that the atmosphere at times was clouded by other, extraneous issues. For instance, as we had been for some time, we were upset about the Israeli relationship with South Africa. There was and had been developing in South Africa a missile program which had progressed so far that we could anticipate the deployment of missiles in South Africa which had a remarkable likeness to the Israeli developed nuclear capable Jericho missile. We were aware of big contracts involving large amounts of money. I had already previously broached this subject with Israeli Minister of Defense Rabin and, later, with Minister of Defense Arens. The Israelis did not take kindly to such approaches. They told us that they had no nuclear cooperation arrangements with the South Africans. They told us that these are well-paying contracts which have to do with conventional matters related to space exploration but not matters involving mass destruction or nuclear weapons.

Well, we were very concerned about this. From time to time I would make strong demarches on this subject. These were not appreciated, particularly when I made them at this time, as Desert Shield was going on. Either under instructions or not under instructions, I also raised with the Israelis their technological exchanges with the People's Republic of China, because I felt so strongly on the subject. We were aware, over time, that the Israelis had been providing the People's Republic of China with fairly sophisticated technology, for example, the PYTHON weapons system. The PYTHON was an Air to Air Missile developed by the Israelis which gave them a BVR [Beyond Visual Range] capability to acquire and hit an aerial target. This made it a deadly and very important advance in aerial warfare. I told Arens that this kind of equipment could change the balance of forces over the Taiwan Strait. I told him that Israel should not be doing this. There were some spirited exchanges with Arens over that matter as well. Again, Arens was particularly irritated that we were raising this kind of subject, given the Iraqi problem. I guess that he felt that it was inappropriate.

We didn't think so. These were issues which came up concurrently, and I, as an old China hand, was particularly zeroed in on the PYTHON Air to Air missile and let this be known.

The enormous U.S. buildup in the Gulf area continued. Saddam Hussein showed no sign of backing down. The overall situation showed more and more the likelihood that war would break out. As the Israelis looked around, they were still getting complaints from the Europeans and others, including ourselves, about the Intifada and the situation in the occupied territories [of Palestine]. The Israelis saw us forming what they regarded as a very strange coalition of countries opposed to Saddam Hussein, and I give full marks to President Bush and Secretary of State Baker for having been able to do so.

This coalition against Saddam Hussein included, among others, Israel's hated enemy, President Assad of Syria. Just a word here. The long, protracted conflict between Syria and Israel was also marked, not only by the Arab-Israeli wars of 1948, 1967, and 1973, but also by the whole conflagration in Lebanon. In 1982 the fighting in Lebanon resulted in the Israelis shooting down considerable numbers of aircraft of the Syrian Air Force and the destruction of numbers of Syria's T-72, Soviet-furnished heavy tanks. The Israelis also destroyed a goodly proportion of Syria's radar and anti-aircraft defenses in Lebanon and also took on Syrian troops stationed in Lebanon and defeated them as necessary in 1982.

Armed conflict between Israel and Syria goes way back. There were all kinds of firefights which took place before 1967 on the Israeli-Syrian front. Once the Israelis took over the Golan Heights in 1973, President Assad was very careful not to precipitate conflict in the Golan area. Rather, he shifted his efforts into Lebanon and into housing and hosting all kinds of ultra-radical terrorist and PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] groups and then gradually, over time, supporting the Hezbollah, in Lebanon. Moreover, over time President Assad was developing his own missile and chemical warfare program, as well as the beginnings of a biological warfare capability. In terms of strike capability and time to target, missiles fired from Syria don't have to travel 500 kilometers, as a souped-up SCUD missile later did when it was fired from the H2 or H3 airfield areas in northern Iraq. Missiles fired from Syria can hit their targets in Israel in almost no time at all. In fact, Syrian aircraft, including the MiGs and so forth which they have, can take off from Syrian bases and can be over Israel in one minute or less. I remember that during my time in Israel a disaffected, Syrian pilot suddenly zoomed in and landed on an Israeli airfield. He was barely discovered in flight by Israeli radar when he was landing in Israel. Suddenly, he was on the ground in Israel.

So to see Syria included in the coalition built against Saddam Hussein did not exactly please the Israelis because with it came the glamor of being a member of such a coalition and nice words being sent to President Assad. A meeting took place between Presidents Bush and Assad in Geneva or Vienna. Bush and Baker didn't come to Israel to meet with Israeli Prime Minister Shamir. So a new relationship was developing between the U.S. and Syria. From our viewpoint this was understandable because it was a remarkable achievement to get Syria into the coalition against Saddam Hussein, even if Assad did nothing but move some troops to the Iraqi border. The Israelis were none too happy about this, but they had to swallow it.

Q: While you were getting this, did the Israelis develop a new respect for the United States from the fact that, by God, when the chips were really down, the U.S. was putting our troops where our mouth was.

BROWN: Yes, the Israelis followed the U.S. scene very carefully, of course. However, the scene was somewhat muddled by the fact that the Democrats in Congress and some defense experts, including retired Admiral William Crowe, went along with the buildup against Saddam Hussein but were also looking for a non-violent, peaceful resolution of this crisis.

Q: The embargo on the shipment of U.S. food and other goods to Iraq was approved at about this time.

BROWN: The embargo was approved, but it didn't have much of an impact on Iraq. The closer we got to open conflict with Iraq, the more concern was articulated on the American scene. Arens and company followed this development very closely. I think that their analysis was that war would come, but there was a concern that the U.S. might just back down rather than go to war.

By December, 1990, the U.S. buildup was so enormous that I would say that Arens and the Israeli defense establishment had concluded that: a) Saddam Hussein, who was so stupid in so many ways, would probably not back down; and b) that the U.S. was now so publicly committed to combat by this massive, growing presence in the Middle East that we wouldn't back down, either. Indeed, we finally got a UN resolution approved which set January 15, 1991, as a deadline for an Iraqi pullout from Kuwait, or else.

I would like to pause at this point and describe a vignette which took place in early December, 1990. This involved a very painful experience for me and highlights the dilemma which I felt at the time. In the midst of this enormous U.S. buildup in the Gulf area, in the midst of all of these Iraqi actions, including the invasion of Kuwait and the butchery that Iraqi forces perpetrated, and their other actions and the revelations of what the Iraqis had done, one a weekend in December, 1990, I received information that the Iraqis had just launched what appeared to be two or three, SCUD missiles from the area around Basra, in southeastern Iraq, to the Northwest. They impacted at a range of around 500 kilometers from the point at which they had been fired. Had these missiles been fired from H2 or H3, their line of flight would have taken these missiles directly to the Tel Aviv/Haifa area. This information was obviously of enormous import to us and to Israel as a likely target.

I immediately charged my Defense Attaché and my CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] Chief of Station with getting clearance from Washington to pass this information to the Israelis. I tried to obtain clearance myself over the secure telephone available to me in the embassy in Tel Aviv. This happened on a Saturday or a Sunday, I can't remember which. Certainly, it was over a weekend. We could not get any action out of Washington. We tried repeatedly, through different channels, but, over and over again, we were stonewalled. I was really pressing my CIA Chief of Station and my Defense Attaché for action. It was obvious that the necessary clearance from Washington had to come through one or both of those channels. My staff tried repeatedly to obtain clearance to pass this information but could not get it.

At this time a Senator visiting in Israel. Maybe it was Senator Oren Hatch [Republican, Utah]. He was due to see Israeli Minister of Defense Arens that evening at about 6:00 PM local time. I was scheduled to accompany the Senator on this call. I pressed all day long in anticipation of the meeting with the Defense Minister that evening. I hoped that I would receive authorization to pass on this vital intelligence information of deadly import to Israel. I thought of this problem in terms of our main objective of keeping the Israelis on the reservation and not doing anything, by commission or omission, which might prompt the Israelis to launch a pre-emptive strike against Iraq. That could have been disastrous at that stage to the coalition against Iraq and our more general objectives in the area.

All day, all afternoon this process went on of trying to obtain clearance to pass the information to the Israelis. No positive reply was obtained. Our Defense Attaché was specifically prohibited from passing this information to the Israelis until clearance was obtained from Washington.

The meeting came between Israeli Defense Minister Arens with the Senator. Arens gave a very serious briefing on the overall situation and his desire for the right kind of U.S. help and so forth. As the meeting broke up, I asked for the opportunity to meet separately with Arens. We said good-bye to the Senator who left, accompanied by other embassy officers. Arens took me into his office, and we were there alone. I sat down and said, "Have you got a map of Iraq handy?" He picked up his phone and asked him to arrange to have someone bring a map of Iraq. It was remarkable how long it took, at least five minutes, before the map was brought. This was a rather strained period. Obviously, Arens was looking at me, wondering why the American ambassador was asking him for a map of Iraq. Finally, the map appeared. The officer who brought it left Arens' office. We spread the map out on his desk. I said to him words to the following effect. "Look, my friend, I am putting my testicles in your hands. There has been, I am sure, a misunderstanding. You are going to get this information. It's just that it's a weekend, and you know how it is on a weekend in Washington, so that formal clearance hasn't come, but I'm sure that it will come. Don't jump to the wrong conclusion." I pointed to Basra on the map and said that the Iraqis had just launched, that day, two or three missiles from about here to about there (I pointed to the two places concerned.) on about a 500 kilometer trajectory.

Q: You mean that this was a test launch. This was not a real missile launch. I want to clarify this point.

BROWN: Yes. This was a launch within Iraqi territory of missiles on a trajectory of about 500 kilometers. I said that it was a launch on a Northwesterly trajectory from here to here (pointing to the map), impacting around there. It didn't take Arens long to figure out that that was the approximate distance from H2 or H3 to Tel Aviv. I emphasized that I was sure that Arens would get this information through regular, security channels anyway, but I just wanted him to know of this development.

As I said this, internally I was sweating bullets. I was very security conscious and very much aware of the clearances in process and all of that. However, I just felt that this had to be done if we were going to maintain a semblance of confidence and trust in achieving our main objective which, as I said, was to keep the Israelis away from launching a preemptive strike at Iraq and keeping them on the reservation.

I left Arens' office at about 6:30 or 7:00 PM. My Defense Attaché called me and said, "You're clean, because the clearance has just come through." That episode is set forth in Arens' book, Broken Covenant. In it he said that I told him that I was putting my life in danger. No, I didn't say that. I said that I was putting my testicles in his hands. [Laughter] Secondly, he says in his book that the follow-up message didn't come through for a couple of days or weeks, in any case much later. That's not accurate. According to my Defense Attaché, the clearance came through just as I was giving Defense Minister Arens the information on my own authority. This is the kind of problem that you can run into in crisis situations like this. You just have to exercise your judgment. As I look back on this episode, I can see that it was a reflection of how uptight Washington was on a weekend with this kind of information.

Later on, I raised this matter with Judge Webster, then Director of CIA [Central Intelligence Agency]. He gave me a peculiar response, to the effect that he had been at a Washington Redskins football game, and there was a communications problem. My own suspicion was that this was probably a decision made by General Brent Scowcroft [National Security Adviser to President Bush]. Scowcroft had a pretty hard view of how to handle such matters. However, I felt that it would have been most damaging to our interests in Israel had we not passed that information on.

Q: Oh, absolutely! Was it the type of thing that you could have reported to Washington: "Unless otherwise instructed..."

BROWN: No. I'd used up my bargaining chips and I'd pressed my Chief of Station and Defense Attaché to the limit on this matter. So there you are. Occasionally, you run into that kind of dilemma. You hope that you won't, but if it does, you have to use your best judgment.

After Iraqi Foreign Minister Tariq Aziz refused Secretary of State Baker's last approach and was asked, on camera, I think, "If it comes to war, does this mean war with Israel?" He replied: "Absolutely." I don't believe that he qualified that by conditioning it on an attack by Israel.

By now the internal demand within Israel for the distribution of gas masks was in full spate. The Defense Ministry did not have enough masks to provide them to the whole population of Israel and of the occupied territories. To minimize the possibility of panic, Arens resorted to partial distribution to the population of urban centers. For this he was heavily criticized by Ariel Sharon, Moda'i, and David Levy. Remember that Levy represented the Moroccan, Sephardic element of the population of Israel. Subsequently, Arens was forced to issue gas masks to all Israeli inhabitants of Jerusalem and to do the best he could.

Then came the cry: "What about chemical warfare?" It was a very difficult task for the Israeli political and military leadership to handle. However, by stages we were issued gas masks in cardboard boxes, which we carried around. Mothers with tiny infants were issued with portable, crib-like devices.

Remember, Saddam Hussein had claimed to have a binary chemical capability. In this context "binary" meant that you could take two chemical substances, shovel them into a SCUD missile nose cone, and they would react with each other on impact to turn the subsequent product into a weapon of mass destruction, whether it was Sarin, VX, mustard gas, or another exotic, terrible weapons system. Tensions were running higher all the time, and there was an increasingly shrill call by Arens and other Israeli leaders for photos of Iraqi missile emplacements.

Now that the U.S. ultimatum to withdraw from Kuwait had been given to the Iraqis and rejected, the pressure increased from Arens to let the Israelis know what our plans were. The Israelis wanted to have immediate, direct contact with the U.S. on the basis of a real time intelligence exchange basis. The Israelis wanted to be plugged in to General Schwarzkopf's command in Saudi Arabia. They wanted to know our plans. They said that we should know that, if Israel was hit, the Israelis had their own plans, and so forth.

Then began our effort to hold the Israelis on the line and keep them on the reservation. In this regard we set up a special, dedicated communications system called "HAMMER RICK." Using this system, Secretary of Defense Cheney and Israeli Minister of Defense Arens could communicate directly with each other on a radio telephone. Under this system, when one person speaks, the other person is cut off. Then the other person has his chance to speak, and the first person is cut off. And so it goes, back and forth. In response to obvious needs we also set up a special alert arrangement through the "HAMMER RICK" system whereby when our satellites spotted the launch of an Iraqi missile, the information would be immediately relayed to Tel Aviv so that the Israeli populace could be instantly warned.

In response to the Israeli request for real time photographs, the answer was that the U.S. would handle that question in our own way, bearing Israeli interests in mind. When that message was received, the decibels rose on the Israeli side because they wanted the real stuff in time and they wanted to be plugged into General Schwarzkopf's command. They let us know, in no uncertain terms, that they had their own contingency plans. The general tenor of their comments was: if the Iraqis strike us, we'll strike back. The Bush administration extracted from Israeli Prime Minister Shamir a commitment not to preempt without provocation. However, Shamir would not promise not to react if attacked by the Iraqis.

In this effort Paul Wolfowitz [Under Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs], for the Pentagon, and Larry Eagleburger, who was Deputy Secretary of State, both well and favorably known to the Israelis, were dispatched out to Israel, just before our first strikes against Iraq. Their task was to talk with Prime Minister Shamir and reach an agreement under which, not only would the Israelis not preempt but also would not react militarily if attacked. They also told the Israelis that on January 15, 1991, hostilities with Iraq would begin.

Now the request that the Israelis would not react militarily if attacked by the Iraqis was an extraordinary request, given Israeli history. We should recall that, in 1967, the Israelis were not first physically attacked by the Arabs, but the Arab buildup reached the point that the Israelis felt, for all intents and purposes, an Arab attack against Israel had already taken place. In effect, they launched on warning. They knew that an Arab attack against Israel was coming in a short time. So, in 1967, the Israelis launched a preemptive attack.

Now we were asking the Israelis to make a commitment not to react militarily, even if attacked by Iraq. In essence, Eagleburger and Wolfowitz assured Shamir that the U.S. would take care of the SCUD missiles at H2 and H3 in northern Iraq. We said that we would devote a major (by implication even a disproportionate) effort to that. If, in spite of our efforts the Iraqis managed to attack Israel with SCUD missiles launched from H2 and H3, Eagleburger and Wolfowitz called on the Israelis not to counterattack. They said that we would continue to devote great resources to take care of this threat against Israel. Furthermore, the U.S. didn't need Israeli forces to be involved in the attacks on Iraq. This could lead to disastrous results, and we could end up shooting each other down. Shamir told Eagleburger and Wolfowitz that while they would not attack Iraq preemptively, the Israelis were not going to commit themselves not to attack Iraq if attacked by Iraq. These conversations were now taking place at 2:00 or 3:00 AM. At one stage Eagleburger said that we could not give Israel the identification modems, or signals for our aircraft operating in the area, and Israeli air operations without those identification signals could be disastrous.

Q: Today is September 3, 1999. Bill, do you want to continue with your discussion of the Eagleburger-Wolfowitz conversations with the Israelis?

BROWN: Fine. Let me again remind our readers or listeners that in this, as in all other instances, I have no notes. It is now nearly nine years after the event, so, in view of the frailties of my memory, this has to be checked. Various memoirs can be double-checked on this.

Just to pause a minute and review. Here we were on the eve of the Gulf War. The Israelis were very disturbed by Saddam Hussein's rhetoric and by their past war experience with the Iraqis. There was an additional factor here, the Jordanian factor. If I may deal briefly with this tangential matter...

Q: Yes.

BROWN: There had long been a relationship between various Israeli governments and King Hussein of Jordan. Over a protracted period, of time there had been clandestine meetings at the highest level. For example, Prime Minister Golda Meir, Moshe Dayan, or other Israeli figures would put on disguises and go to meet the Jordanians. There had been meetings on a yacht in the Gulf of Aqaba. I'm not saying that they took place very frequently, but there had been meetings with King Hussein of Jordan. Clandestine messages had also been passed through one channel or another.

However, the Israelis had also fought with the Jordanians who, in 1948, had seized what we call the "West Bank of the Jordan River," as well as the portion of Jerusalem inhabited by the Arabs. The Jordanians had stayed there, in armed force, as an occupying power. The Jordanians had formally, and unilaterally annexed the West Bank. I believe that this annexation was recognized only by Pakistan and one other country. The Jordanians were expelled from these occupied territories during the war of 1967 after Jordanian forces attacked Israel. There had been border incidents since then. There had been disputes and even minor firefights over water from the Yarmuk River where the Yarmuk River joins the Jordan River, when the Israelis found out that the Jordanians were illegally from the Israeli point of view, diverting that water. Formally, the two countries remained at war. At this stage, although Israel and Egypt had negotiated and signed a peace treaty, the Israelis were technically in an ongoing state of war with Jordan and with most other Arab countries.

In addition to this, during that fateful summer of 1990 the late King Hussein, under pressure, began to take some actions which were very disturbing, from the Israeli point of view. I can't recall them all, but there appeared in Jordan an Iraqi Air Force element. This unit began to exercise in Jordan, sometimes nominally in conjunction with Jordanian air units. Jordan was obviously under pressure. It was gravitating more and more toward Iraq, as the tension mounted in the Middle East. This made the Israelis very unhappy and, of course, it didn't make the U.S. happy at all.

By January, 1991, Jordanian units began to go on a reinforcement and alert basis along their side of the Jordan River. The Israelis began to ask themselves what this portended. Was it just Jordanian nervousness or did it portend, perhaps, in the worst case, an invitation or pretext for the Iraqis to move into Jordan. Suddenly, this could pose a massive, mechanized threat to Israel. This was a very disturbing development as well.

There was a strong feeling on the streets of Amman. At least 60 percent of the population of Jordan was composed of Palestinians. The figure may be as high as 80 percent, but it is somewhere in that 60 to 80 percent range. The Palestinians, and certainly Yasser Arafat [Chairman of the Palestinian Liberation Organization] were applauding Saddam Hussein throughout this whole crisis. During this period of heightened tension, the influence of the Iraqis and Palestinians on King Hussein was obvious, and there were several, other negative developments which I cannot recall. However, taken altogether, it was an unhappy, disturbing extra element of concern for the Israelis.

Q: Through our ambassador to Jordan or through the State Department, or through the Israelis, with their rather constant contact with the Jordanians in one place or another, were markers being put down, such as: "Don't do this, or that will happen," and so forth?

BROWN: I can't remember specifically, but I'm confident that such markers were being put down from the American side. We were leading the coalition against Saddam Hussein, and King Hussein's actions were undermining it. His rhetoric, that of the then Crown Prince of Jordan, his brother, and of the Jordanian media was subversive to our overall efforts.

As the embargo against Iraq in the Persian Gulf went into effect and was tightened, the Iraqis became more and more dependent on the overland supply line, which ran from Aqaba [at the head of the Gulf of Aqaba], which could accommodate fairly large ships, then by heavy truck up to Amman and over to Baghdad. The squeeze began there as well, in terms of a coalition maritime force. This was a subject of increasing tension, as the U.S. dominated force was out to stop war materials going into Iraq. There was constant squabbling as to the contents of these ships. Over a protracted period, representatives of the coalition maritime force were boarding ships which were moving through the Strait of Tiran into the Gulf of Aqaba and unloading their cargoes at Aqaba, [Jordan]. So there was further contention there.

Again, as time went on, there were questions of money, as the total, coalition squeeze tightened on Iraq. The status of Jordan remained a contentious issue throughout all of this. The Iraqis stepped up their presence in Jordan and exploited it. At times one felt that the checkpoint on the Iraqi-Jordanian border in fact was like a sieve, as goods which might have military value flowed around this point in the desert. We were pressing the Jordanians, and they were making excuses.

The second Eagleburger/Wolfowitz mission took place shortly after the outbreak of the Gulf War when in spite of our bombing of fixed Iraqi missile emplacements, and in spite of our use of PATRIOT anti-missile batteries, Iraqi SCUDS fell on Tel Aviv and Haifa. Eagleburger and Wolfowitz urged the Israelis to maintain a low profile and stay put. They promised that we would devote even greater resources to the bombing of SCUD missiles, both static and mobile. The Israelis countered: "We have never, in our history, had to rely on anybody to defend us and, if we continue to be attacked, we can respond." Eagleburger refused repeated requests by the Israelis to prepare joint plans. Some Israelis then said that if we wouldn't prepare joint plans with them, then, if attacked, they could counterattack using their own plans. Given the geography, there is only one direct route to go from Israel to Iraq, and that's through Jordan or else through a small slice of Syria. However, the real answer is through Jordan. The Israelis said that it would be regrettable, but if the Jordanians sent up aircraft up to try to prevent the use of a corridor over and through Jordan, then they would have to take out the Jordanian air force.

That view, expressed by some Israelis below Shamir, created great consternation among the Americans. Eagleburger told Prime Minister Shamir that a refusal to accept our proposals followed by an Israel air attack against Iraq might create a situation where we could not provide Israel with the identification codes for our military aircraft, and a disaster could result. This very clearly meant that in the fog of war we might inadvertently end up shooting down Israeli aircraft or they Israelis might inadvertently shoot down ours.

When Eagleburger and Wolfowitz got back to the hotel from their conversation with Shamir, they reported by secure phone to National Security Adviser Scowcroft and Secretary of Defense Cheney. Eagleburger was talking to Scowcroft, and Wolfowitz was talking to Cheney, on secure phones out of our Control Room in the Hilton Hotel in Jerusalem. I think that Secretary of State Baker was in the Control Room over at the White House, although I am not sure of this. When the import of what Eagleburger had said to Shamir sank in, there was a bit of a flurry, and Eagleburger called back to Prime Minister Shamir in the middle of the night. Eagleburger said something like this, "Mr. Prime Minister, I'm afraid that I may have overstepped my instructions. What I meant was that, in extremis [in the last analysis], we will not cooperate with you on any joint operations. However, what we could do would be to stand down." That is, if after suffering heavy casualties Israel were to launch a counter attack on Iraq by air, and if we had adequate information of this, we could stand down or step aside.

Q: In other words, we could get out of Israel's way.

BROWN: Yes. Meanwhile the situation was a very dicey as the SCUD attacks continued. Within the embassy in Tel Aviv we had all been issued with gas masks. We had them at our side 24 hours a day. We also had put up plastic sheeting, as people did throughout Israel, in at least one room above ground in our homes and within the embassy. Until then Israel had been geared for conventional air attacks and had specially constructed shelters in hotels and municipal buildings. In houses people very often had their shelters for an explosive attack by conventional warheads. Now, we had to consider a chemical warfare attack and, therefore, you wouldn't want to go down below ground. You had to go up and get into an airtight, plasticized room, put on your gas mask, and try to survive. So that had all been prepared. The embassy had had its drills and everybody had been inspected.

Q: Were you losing personnel at this time?

BROWN: Well, there is another, painful subject. As the crisis mounted, naturally enough, we began to develop embassy plans for reducing the size of our staff radically. In the wake of the Iranian disaster of 1979 [when the embassy in Tehran was seized by revolutionaries], I swore to myself that if I ever became a chief of mission or had any power of decision over the matter, I would devise a plan under which I could run an embassy with very few, say five people: the ambassador, a communicator, a consular officer, and an administrative officer or two.

Now, obviously the situation in Israel was not the same kind of situation we had faced in Iran. However, I developed a plan for progressive, staged reductions in staff. As I tried to obtain approval for this plan from the Department, over the secure phone, I ran into a stone wall of opposition in the State Department.

The debate was really aggravating me and to my Washington counterparts. To this day I still don't have the full picture but I concluded that General Brent Scowcroft [National Security Adviser to the President] and probably other people as well, including President Bush didn't want the image of Americans leaving Israel to be displayed. They didn't want it for a variety of reasons, primarily because they feared that a drawdown in Israel might affect the enormous, American presence working in the oilfields of Saudi Arabia.

Q: And in support facilities.

BROWN: And in support facilities in what was the crux of the operations Desert Shield and Desert Storm. There were surely other, political considerations as well.

You can draw all kinds of lines, including voluntary departure and the guidelines for it, the departure of non-essential people, and, in the last analysis, the directed departure of personnel. I struggled over this problem. I don't think that at this stage it is useful to talk about the rhetoric of the matter. However, I say that we had a really, potentially serious situation in this regard. If Saddam Hussein used these weapons of terror, directed against civilian populations, and if we did not get unnecessary people out of here, including wives, babies, other dependents, and eventually non-essential officers, we would be leaving ourselves wide open to all kinds of severe criticism. People might say, "You had all of this time. Why didn't you send some of your personnel home?"

Remember, as we get to the period that I'm now discussing, civilian airlines, except El Al [Israeli state airline], were canceling flights and the insurance rates on shipping were enormously increased, as insurance brokers prudently covered those contingencies. We didn't have an independent airlift in Israel at that time. This was a subject that really worried me.

Q: Also, the available, American airlift was pretty well tied up with the buildup in Saudi Arabia.

BROWN: Oh, yes. Obviously, we had figured out that the Iraqi enhanced SCUD missiles clearly had enough range to reach Tel Aviv and Haifa. Their warheads could be chemical or biological.

There was also the whole question of casualties and hospitalization. The Israelis have long had very sophisticated and detailed plans for military disasters, including gas attack and so forth. Their hospitals are geared toward treatment of these various contingencies. However, we just didn't know at the time what would happen in the last analysis. Perhaps by the time we would get a casualty to the hospital, he or she might be permanently crippled or dead. So there was a contentious dialogue going on all the time, largely between myself and Jack Covey and Ivan Selin in the Department of State. Perhaps I had better just leave it at that.

Q: I would have thought that when you consider what borders need to be crossed, the best thing would be to get buses and take the evacuees to Egypt.

BROWN: Well, if I may jump ahead a bit, there were differences of opinion within our official, American community. My wife, Helen, being a gung ho Foreign Service spouse, said, "I'm not going anywhere." However, a little later, after the first Iraqi SCUD missiles fell, I said to her: "You're going to Eilat" [on the Gulf of Aqaba], because we had figured out that the SCUD's couldn't reach Eilat. I said, "You're going down there. You're going to be a role model and you're going to lead a bus convoy." She vigorously objected but, finally, agreed. She took our cat and led a convoy of Embassy dependents down to Eilat, where we had leased hotel space for the period of the conflict.

Q: As this situation was developing, and I'm not talking about the war but the period just before the war, did you find that regular line people from the Foreign Service also wanted to get the hell out of Tel Aviv?

BROWN: Rarely. There was a particular case in a particular Section of the Embassy. The chief of that Section was sorely disturbed to report to me that one of his officers, an analytical type, wanted to leave the post with his wife. In that agency's history, it was a very gung ho group, so his superior, the Section chief, was very disturbed to tell me this. This involved an individual officer who was well-trained in the Middle East and well-trained in analysis of the Iraqis and so forth. This individual had concluded that, indeed, the Iraqis did have chemical warheads available to them. He believed that the Iraqis would not necessarily be restricted to the use of conventional, high explosive warheads on their SCUD's. Indeed, in retrospect, he was right. They had that capability. Analytically, he was correct as far as Iraqi capabilities were concerned. Thank goodness that Saddam Hussein did not use that capability.

Meanwhile, many dual citizen, Israeli-Americans were swamping the airlines to get reservations to leave Israel. There were strong opinions within Israel on this score. I certainly don't want to point the finger at anybody. These were highly emotional, personal decisions, but they certainly kept our Consular Section busy as people rushed to check their visas, get their passports renewed, and leave while they could do so.

Q: The same thing happened during the 1973 war, too.

BROWN: And Israeli Television occasionally would cover people with long beards and black hats, going up the ramp of an aircraft and into a plane. That was unfortunate in terms of the development of a possibly stereotype. That is, it was thereby suggested that not only ultra-religious Jews did not fight or contribute to defending Israel, but now were bugging out.

Let's move on, then. We were all geared up as an Embassy. We had special wardens, monitors, systems and radios tested. Everybody's houses had been checked. For this particular kind of very detailed planning, including reporting, we had things organized so that, if we were hit, some people within our Embassy could go out on the streets and reconnoiter a bit to contribute to our spot reporting.

So, early on the morning of January 17, 1991, the word came that the Gulf War had started. A massive bombardment of Iraq had begun. Not too long after that, I was on the telephone to Washington. I was operating out of my residence and had a very significant number of people with me, all with gas masks. My residence was sealed with plastic sheeting and so forth. I heard several loud explosions. As an old artilleryman, I picked up the phone and reported to Washington: "We're taking incoming fire from SCUDs," and said that our embassy teams were checking to see whether there were any American casualties. The Operations Center in the Department responded: "Yes, we're seeing it on CNN (Cable News Network)!" CNN and other networks couldn't identify where these explosions were occurring, for security reasons. However, they could give a pretty graphic account of what was happening. Israeli TV itself was on for 24 hours a day. We were off to war on TV.

The explosions were frightening to a people that hadn't previously experienced that. It turned out that, within the Israeli system there were some cases of minor panic. There were some false reports that someone could smell gas. They probably smelled cordite from the explosions.

Q: Or the explosions might have ruptured gas lines.

BROWN: Yes. We began to operate on a 24-hour basis. It turned out that Iraq launched, I believe, 39 SCUDs throughout the period of hostilities. Most of these were launched in the direction of Tel Aviv and some to Haifa. In all cases they were grossly inaccurate, but then they were a weapon aimed at spreading mass terror anyway.

The SCUD explosions had a shattering effect in residential areas. Groups of apartments were damaged or destroyed. Israelis generally live in apartment houses. Most of these apartments had been built in the 1950s or 1960s. They were fairly frail and vulnerable to over pressure waves [which exceeded atmospheric pressure]. So there were a lot of caved in apartments, some of them dramatically so. When you would drive by the site of an explosion, you would see the side of a building sheared away, with beds and other furniture hanging out. A lot of the windows were blown out. However, the number of direct casualties was miraculously low. It was said afterwards that only one person was directly killed by a SCUD missile. Some people were wounded, and then you get into the question of whether they were directly wounded or were wounded by the debris from the explosion.

There were quite a few heart attacks among the elderly. There were some other cases which involved people and their protective kits. These not only contained their gas masks but also contained a syringe of serum against chemical attack. People were instructed that only in case of clear identification of the gas should people inject themselves in their thighs or buttocks. There were people who clutched these syringes, injected themselves in panic, and suffered the consequences thereof. The anger among the people at these SCUD missile attacks, of course, rose very high.

I've already related that when Larry Eagleburger and Paul Wolfowitz made their second visit to Israel, Arens was hinting that Israel might retaliate against the Iraqi SCUD attacks. [See above for the exchanges with Eagleburger and Wolfowitz during their second visit after the war had started.] I might just say that, although Israeli contingency plans were never revealed to us in detail, it didn't take a genius to figure out that the Israelis would go after the H2 and H3 airfield complexes and that they wouldn't necessarily rely on air attacks alone. The more common Israeli response would be to go in with commandos. They clearly had that capability with their C-130 transport aircraft.

By the time of the Iraqi SCUD attacks on Israel Arens reversed course in one sense. Just before the war began, we had been training Israelis to man and operate what were called PATRIOT anti-missile batteries made in the U.S. These were not really anti-missile batteries. They were anti-aircraft batteries, with the prospect or hope that the relevant software would be upgraded so that they could deal with incoming missiles.

Destroying a high-speed jet aircraft is one thing. Destroying an incoming SCUD traveling at missile speed is a different matter. The SCUD missiles would go up 100 miles or so in the atmosphere and then come down at you. This was a different matter, as we were to find out. To the initial offer of some second-hand F-15 fighters and a couple of batteries of U.S. manned PATRIOT missiles, Arens initially said, "No. We'll defend ourselves. Nobody has ever come in here to defend us." However, his own people were still in training on PATRIOT missiles in the United States. With the outbreak of war and the lack of any defense against incoming SCUD missiles, Arens reversed course. So in came several batteries of U.S. manned, PATRIOT missiles, carried on C-5 transport aircraft.

They were a sight to behold. The PATRIOT crews included some women, because structure of our forces was such that women were also operating this weapons system. The women were mostly enlisted personnel, but I think that there were a couple of women officers as well. The PATRIOT missile batteries were deployed in various places. One of them was emplaced at the old, civilian airport at Sedeh Dov, near the Tel Aviv power station. Another battery was deployed in open fields between Tel Aviv and Ben Gurion International Airport. When it rained, these areas often turned into a sea of mud.

When Eagleburger and Wolfowitz came for their second visit, the Israelis pressed even harder for reconnaissance photographs of Iraqi SCUDs and for a direct line into General Schwarzkopf's headquarters. It was obvious that General Schwarzkopf didn't want any such thing, and Washington was certainly backing him in this regard. Finally, a promise was made that General Olson, from Schwarzkopf's command, would come over and would be stationed in Tel Aviv. After several days' delay he arrived, but it was obvious that General Olson had nothing new to give the Israelis.

The Israeli military were really getting angry, at this point. Therefore, we set up a special system whereby reconnaissance photos were first sent to Europe for processing. Then, from Europe they were sent into what had been my USIS [United States Information Service] Library, which had been converted into a Joint U.S.-Israeli Photo Intelligence Interpretation Center which was open 24 hours a day. If I may go off a bit on this tangent, I will tell you that I used the stereoscopic equipment myself. The Israelis would be given photos which showed tracks of mobile SCUD missile launchers. You would see holes in a highway or a large culvert made by U.S. bombs. However, never during this whole exercise was there ever produced a single photograph of a destroyed SCUD missile. You could see tracks that went down a highway and then into a culvert, and you could see a hole from an American bomb nearby. You could hope that, maybe, that bomb had destroyed a SCUD. However, there was never any proof of this.

Similarly, as the first PATRIOT missile batteries were fired in Israel, they were in an automatic release mode. There were whole barrages of PATRIOT missiles fired up into the sky against these incoming SCUDs. Cheers went up from myself and all of those present who watched them. The PATRIOTs went up, and then you'd hear thunderous explosions. Washington was reporting a fantastic kill capability by the PATRIOT missiles. President Bush himself went to the Raytheon factory in Massachusetts and claimed that we had had something like a 95 percent kill rate. Well, this turned out to be absolute rubbish! In fact, I leave the evaluation of the PATRIOT missiles in Saudi Arabia to Ambassador Chas. Freeman. It didn't take long before the Israelis at the professional level turned from cheering, to very serious skepticism, to outright disillusionment. As the Israelis were taking their own photos of the interface between our outgoing PATRIOTs and the incoming SCUDs, and then the aftermath, they determined that, at best, we might have hit one SCUD out of the 39 fired at Israel. Fortunately, the SCUDs were terribly inaccurate. Some of them landed in the Mediterranean Sea. My wife was once playing mah jong in Herzliya Petuach, a suburb of Tel Aviv, while wearing her gas mask during a SCUD attack. She heard a particularly loud explosion probably 500 yards away from her out on the Mediterranean. It really jolted her mah jong game!

We were awfully lucky. Moreover, there were a few humorous moments. Among these, I remember Larry Eagleburger, by now carrying a cane and wearing cold weather boots, slogging through a muddy field, going from PATRIOT launcher to another, then holding a press conference in the auditorium of the Hilton Hotel, his boots covered with mud up to his shins. This made great press copy. Of course, Larry Eagleburger is always great copy.

The spectacle of American troops in the SCUD batteries defending Israel was remarkable. People turned out from all over Israel to watch them. They brought cakes and entertained our troops, many of whom, both officers and the enlisted, were African-Americans or Hispanics. A lesser but still significant number of them were women. The Israelis were not used to women in a combat role. There are women in the Israeli Army, but they were not in line combat outfits. I suppose that one could have argued that PATRIOT missile batteries, as originally configured, were not considered line combat outfits. However, these were certainly line outfits. And here were American women operating these missiles. It was a remarkable display. The Israelis did all that they make our troops feel at home.

However, behind all the camaraderie, at the Israeli professional and leadership levels, there was a lot of heartburn and a lot of very heavy questioning going on as the U.S. military and political establishments were claiming great success for the PATRIOT missiles.

Frantic efforts were being made to upgrade the PATRIOT fire direction software package. We would hear rumors that the American batteries of PATRIOT missiles in Saudi Arabia, which did intercept some SCUDs, had a better software package than those in Israel. We had to assure the Israelis, that our batteries assigned to Israel had the latest features. There was a lot of diplomacy conducted at the political-military level. There were Israeli military personnel stationed in all of our PATRIOT missile fire direction centers, so that they could absorb, first hand, exactly how we were handling the missiles. We had people in the Israeli fire direction centers, so there was a warm feeling between military personnel at the battery level.

As the defeat of Iraq became obvious there was an influx of Congressional and other visitors. American politicians wanted to be photographed with American troops, in action, defending Israel, in a common effort. We had to suit up each and every one of these visitors with gas masks and brief them, upon their arrival at Ben Gurion International Airport.

The pattern which emerged was that, over time, the Iraqis, now under attack and fearing daylight U.S. bombing raids, would wait until dark, launch their SCUDs missiles. That meant that we were vulnerable to SCUD missiles, beginning at about 6:00 PM.

I'll never forget the visit of Congressman Tom Lantos [Democrat, California], a survivor of the World War II holocaust. You may remember that I handled the Taiwan-instigated Henry Liu murder case, which was in his constituency, back in my days in Washington under Wolfowitz. I took Congressman Lantos and his charming wife to the residence of the Deputy Mayor of Tel Aviv, which had been damaged by a SCUD missile. The whole house was askew. The building had been condemned for human habitation. The Deputy Mayor's family was trying to salvage what they could, after living there for decades. Congressman Lantos, charming wife, and I received permission to go upstairs in the house. There we found a collection of dolls scattered across a bedroom floor. The dolls had been knocked out of the closet by the SCUD explosion. The cheekbone of one of the dolls had been broken and was missing. Lantos reached down, picked up this doll, turned it over, and looked at the broken cheekbone. He just emotionally blurted out: "Budapest, 1944." He had undergone bombings there as a young boy. All around us apartment after apartment had badly damaged. Beds and other furnishings were hanging out of the buildings. It was a very moving experience. The SCUD missile had detonated about five feet above the street in downtown Tel Aviv. Thank God that a lot of people were not killed!

I remember another visit by Congressmen Solarz and Ackerman [Democrat, New York], a prominent, Jewish Members of Congress. It was a typical, Solarz itinerary. He wanted to see everybody and do everything. His program showed arrival at about 4:00 PM, a briefing by me, then a trip by car to the site of a missile explosion, then over to see a PATRIOT missile battery. Out came the TV cameras and interview after interview. I had a little surprise for Congressman Ackerman. I had previously learned that there was an ethnic Korean Second Lieutenant in a PATRIOT battery, who was a graduate of West Point. When I asked him where he came from, it turned out that he was from Congressman Ackerman's district. I had him brought in and trotted him out for the TV cameras. On camera, I said to Congressman Ackerman: "You may remember that you appointed him to the U.S. Military Academy at West Point." The Congressman said, "Oh, yes, I remember him very well!" He put his arm around the lieutenant's shoulder, and this was altogether a great, TV photo opportunity.

Finally, I said to Congressmen Solarz and Ackerman: "Gentlemen, it's now 5:45 PM. We have about 15 minutes left. It can soon really get hot around here. These soldiers will probably have to go into action. You've now been briefed, you've seen the missile battery site and you've seen the troops. Rather than go back to the Embassy for a further, extended briefing, I suggest that we send you up to Jerusalem." SCUDs were not hitting Jerusalem, probably because of the Arab population and the Muslim holy sites up there. Solarz said, "No, let's continue. Let's go to the Embassy." So we went to the Embassy and up to the conference room next door to my office, which had been turned into a sealed room. By now almost everybody in the Embassy had left, as it was wartime.

I started to continue the briefing. Suddenly, the air raid sirens went off. If I may pause here, the HAMMER RICK communications system, of which I have already spoken, gave us about three or four minutes' warning time from the time of launch of an Iraqi SCUD from H2 or H3. When the siren sounded, I said "Now, gentlemen, you will put on these gas masks. I will notify Washington." We got the gas masks on them, I went next door, called the Operations Center in the Department of State, and asked them to notify the offices of Congressmen Solarz and Ackerman, telling them that they were in the Ambassador's Conference Room. I said that we were under attack but were okay.

I went back to the Conference Room, and there were Solarz and Ackerman, mumbling with their gas masks on. Months later, when the war was over, Solarz said to me and to others that he had met many Ambassadors and in many situations. However, this was the only time in his 17 year career in Congress that an Ambassador resorted to shutting him up by putting a gas mask on him!

I mentioned that Jerusalem was never subjected to attack by SCUD missiles during the Gulf War. However, at the time, you never knew where they might hit. When those sirens went off, they sounded all over Israel and the occupied territories.

This takes us to another, unfortunate aspect of the whole situation. That is, the Palestinian reaction. Just as there was dancing in the streets of Amman, [Jordan], when the Iraqis launched their missiles against Israel, to the great consternation of Tel Aviv and also Washington, so there were also reports of Palestinians dancing on their roofs in the occupied territories. They were reported to be shouting, "Utrub, utrub," meaning: "hit them (the Israelis) again, hit them again, harder, harder."

One has to be careful here. I was told that in such places as the outskirts of Haifa and elsewhere, some Palestinian Israelis or, as the Israelis used to call them, "Israeli Arabs," would offer an Israeli Jew shelter if he were passing by their home when the air raid alarm went off. There were some such cases. They did this on humanitarian grounds. However, the stereotype and the widely-shared, Israeli image was that Palestinians, in the occupied territories, were all cheering as these Iraqi missile attacks were going on. Jordanians were widely reported in Israel to be dancing in the streets, and Palestinians with them. Perhaps most of the "Jordanians" dancing in their streets were really "Palestinians." I don't know. But that's the sort of unfortunate image which emerged, and for which the Palestinians were to pay a price.

Of course, Yasser Arafat's rhetoric throughout the whole Gulf War was supportive of Saddam Hussein. That was to be very significant later on, as we drove the Iraqi Army out of Kuwait. The Kuwaitis then turned on the Palestinians, who had performed very important functions in Kuwait. They were often the managers of services and can do kind of people. They were deported en masse from Kuwait, having been portrayed as collaborators with the Iraqis. A great number of them ended up, guess where? In Jordan, because nobody else would take them.

In the middle of all of this I got a call from Washington, asking me to go in and arrange for the release of a prominent, Palestinian academic who had arrested by Israeli security authorities. I met with Yusip Ben Aron, the Director General of the Israeli Prime Minister's office, and Eli Rubenstein, the Secretary of the Israeli Cabinet and said that Washington has instructed me to request that this gentleman be released. They were livid! In essence, they said, "Hell, no! This guy, with his cellular phone, was in contact with a PLO [Palestinian Liberation Organization] member in Tunis, during the SCUD attacks." They said that the Tunis contact, said, "Listen, I've got a friend here who'd like to have a word with you." That person then got on the phone and asked this Palestinian in Jerusalem where the SCUD missiles were hitting. This person was the Iraqi Ambassador in Tunis.

According to Rubenstein and Ben Aron, the Jerusalemite said, "Well, they hit here and there." Eli and Yusip then indulged in some strong language and said, "That SOB is under arrest and that's where he belongs." I said, "Gentlemen, first of all, you know and I know that he was talking hot air. He had no more idea than the Man in the Moon as to where, specifically, this or that SCUD hit. This guy was a resident of Jerusalem, and no SCUD missiles hit up here. So the guy was blowing gas, okay? From your viewpoint such conduct is atrocious. On the other hand, let's just say that it was foolish. I realize that this was most unfortunate behavior, but let him go." Well, the Israelis weren't about to let him go immediately, though eventually, they did.

Q: As you were talking about this, you mentioned, off-mike, the report that Arab Palestinians were cheering on the Iraqis. I assume that this kind of news was played up in the Israeli press.

BROWN: Yes. It was just another, very unfortunate episode which contributed to the worst kind of Israeli stereotype of Palestinians, and Arabs in general. According to this stereotype, the Arabs are an unremittingly brutal crowd. This is too bad when one considers that these Arabs are human beings. Many of them are honest, ordinary people. It is sad to see such stereotypes spread around.

I'll go on, since you've raised this issue. On the whole business of how Israel handled the Intifada over the years we made many demarches. During my time, I made them personally, and my officers did, too. Sometimes these were made by instructions from Washington and sometimes without instructions, when we saw what we considered to be overly harsh Israeli reactions to Palestinian Intifada incidents. The Palestinian arrested by the Israelis were routinely incarcerated and subjected to interrogation, under the old, British system of administrative detention in Palestine which avoided full, civilian court procedure. In various cases the Israelis destroyed the homes of the Palestinians suspected of terrorist activities. Their family residences were blown up or bulldozed, and the family members had no recourse.

On one occasion Richard Shifter, then Assistant Secretary of State for Humanitarian Affairs, visited Israel. Dick was Jewish himself, had a distinguished career as a lawyer, and oversaw the preparation of the annual State Department Human Rights Reports covering the whole world. For Dick's visit I had requested a meeting with the Israeli internal security service. This security service was commonly called the "Shin Beth," or the "Shabak." Traditionally, one never revealed the name of the incumbent directors of that service. Now that he is retired, I can say that the name of the Director of Shin Beth at the time was Jacob Perry. Perry had taken over as director in the wake of a public relations disaster. Some Palestinian terrorists in Gaza had carried out a particularly heinous deed. They were captured by Shin Beth operatives and died immediately afterwards. This was covered up at first but then it was revealed.

Q: This was the bus incident, wasn't it?

BROWN: Yes. There was a great scandal, and the chief of the Shin Beth was forced to resign. Perry succeeded him. There was a prestigious commission appointed to investigate the matter, the Agronit Commission, which issued both a public report and then a classified report that wasn't given to us. The classified report went into the question of guidelines on how much pressure could be applied to prisoners under interrogation. This was a very delicate, complex subject.

When Shifter and I talked with Perry, some senior staff members of his service were present. We got into interrogation techniques and were told that the Israelis very frequently picked up the same person on multiple occasions because, once released, these individuals would frequently get into trouble again. They would also relate to their colleagues the details of Israeli interrogation techniques. Therefore, we were told, the Israelis had to resort to a variety of psychological gimmicks including placing a hood over the suspects' heads, using special sound effects, etc. to make the suspects feel uncomfortable and apprehensive without actually hurting them. There are all kinds of techniques in use all over the world for this. It's rather a grim kind of business.

On this occasion Perry took a pencil and lightly ran it over the thigh section of his trousers. Then he said to me: "No officer under my command is allowed to do more than that, or even that, without my permission." This was a rather dramatic statement to make in view of the reports of brutal interrogation. I leave it to the reader to draw his or her own conclusions, but it was a statement by which Perry accepted full responsibility for what was going on. He assured us that the application of pressure on detainees was all "controlled and within the limits."

During our interview with Perry a very thick album of color photos had been placed on the table for our perusal. One of Perry's senior officers asked, "Would you like to see in detail what Palestinians are doing to each other, as they skin each other alive and tear each other to bits?"

He was referring to Palestinian attacks against those who had been suspected collaborators with the Israelis. We said, “No, thank you very much,” because I knew that it was a very grisly collection. Professionally, you have to be very careful in such circumstances.

I'll give you another vignette, and I'm not making excuses of any sort for the Israeli military or security services. We flew down to the headquarters of the Commandant of the Gaza Sector, Major General Vilnai [later a cabinet minister]. He gave us an overall briefing and then summoned into his command bunker, a group consisting of both officers and enlisted men. Some were from the infantry, and some from the Israeli Military Police. They were a mixed group all of whom spoke English. The general said, “You may ask them any question you want, anything whatsoever.” So Assistant Secretary Shifter asked questions on the rules of engagement.

I fixed my attention on one of the officers among them, a lieutenant colonel who was a battalion commander. I asked him: “Why are you, a colonel, carrying a sniper scope on your rifle?” He said, “Because my command to the people in my unit is: 'If you see something which is aggravated and explosive, I want you to come to me, personally, as soon as possible. If possible, I want to deal with this problem myself.’” In other words, he said, he preferred to fire the first shot himself. I said, “But why the sniper scope?” He said, “That is to minimize the possibility of a lethal effect.” Speaking of lethal effects, the Israelis were firing rubber bullets. A rubber bullet is a rubber cased, metallic object which can cause great pain if it hits the human body. If fired close enough to the targeted individual, it can actually kill him. It certainly can fracture a bone and cause significant damage.

I relate that incident for what it's worth. One last scene in that respect is that when we left that same bunker room and headed to another room, I spotted something to which nobody had called attention. It was a paper target reversed. It was in a corner, with a wooden stick behind it. It had obviously been used on a firing range.

So with my Marine Corps background I reached through a pile of trash and pulled the target out of the corner. I turned it around and was so struck by what I saw that I called Assistant Secretary Shifter over. I said, “I want you to look at this target. You'll notice that the shots on the target are all in the legs, hand drawn below the printed torso. From this I conclude that at least this target was used in an exercise in which people were being told: 'Shoot them in the legs,' as opposed to the torso.” I said, “Dick, I have to tell you something. In terms of rules of engagement I'm an old Marine, and I shoot with the Marine Security Guards for practice wherever I've been stationed. The rules of engagement for a Marine Security Guard at an American Embassy are as follows: 'Hold your fire as long as you can, but if you're fired upon or otherwise seriously endangered and you have to respond, shoot to kill.' In all of our target practice for Marine Security Guard units, a hit off the torso is a “miss.” We shoot for a 'head kill,' a 'heart kill,' or as close to them as we can get.”

Well, as I said, I do not in any way wish to exonerate the Israelis. This was just a professional comment on...

Q: Also, the Israelis have been dealing with this problem for a long time. For us, when you can't kill too often, and you're dealing with something like the Intifada, or...

BROWN: The Palestinians were throwing heavy bricks or stones and using slingshots and various things which put out people's eyes and sometimes cause death. God help the Israeli soldier who make the wrong move and blunders alone into a Palestinian mob. If a buddy of yours gets brutally killed by a mob, you are likely to react harshly, whether you are an Israeli or anyone else. This kind of experience tends to harden you. They may well have reacted overly harshly, but the Israelis were trying, in their own way, to cope professionally with a very difficult situation. While we felt that our criticism was warranted, the Israelis believed that their response was also warranted.

Q: A question on the same subject, but bringing it back to the same time line. You had Palestinians who were not friendly to the Israelis. The members of the Israeli security forces were undergoing a certain amount of hostile fire and suffering injuries. Were you getting reports from our Consulate General in Jerusalem, or from your own officers in the Embassy, including from the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency], that a crackdown on the Palestinians during this time of combat had been ordered by the Israelis?

BROWN: If you're asking about the time of the Gulf war, I frankly can't remember. My suspicion is that all eyes, Israeli and Palestinian, were glued to the TV set or to the sky in the evening for SCUDS, that the Israelis imposed a heavy curfew on the Palestinians and that Palestinian attacks on members of the Israeli security forces at this time probably diminished. That's just my impression, nine years after the fact. I don't have anything more precise than that to offer.

Q: If you don't have any memory of that, it probably shows that everybody was kind of waiting. Did the Israelis mobilize their forces at this point?

BROWN: Oh, yes. They were on a full alert. Israeli Defense Ministry officials were clearly implying, without giving specific details, that the Israeli forces had practiced and were rarin' to go against the airfields at H2 and H3 in Iraq. All that Arens was waiting for was the go ahead signal from Shamir.

I spoke with an Israeli general afterwards who volunteered to me that he had opposed Arens' approach. You'll find this subject dealt with in Arens' book, Broken Covenant. There were differences of view among professional Israeli military officers, let alone the division between Prime Minister Shamir and Arens. Arens was pressing Shamir to give him the green light to attack the airfields at H2 and H3, using a corridor through Jordan. This meant that, if the Jordanians tried to stand in the way, there was a strong likelihood of a conflict between the Israeli and Jordanian defense establishments.

President Bush was personally prevailing on Prime Minister Shamir not to do this. Meanwhile, Arens and company constantly pressed us to give them more information so that they could satisfy themselves that we were doing everything we could to destroy the Iraqi SCUDS. With this, over time, came mounting criticism from the Israelis of our efforts. The Israelis said to us: "If you're devoting all of this effort, why isn't it working? If you can't do the job, well, we can do it, one way or another." However, Arens was being thwarted by his own Prime Minister, who was much influenced by President Bush.

There were those within the Israeli Defense Forces who were answering Arens along the following lines: "Look, the Americans are doing our job. The net effect of all of this effort is to severely damage Iraq's military capability. In a strategic sense the Americans are doing our work for us. They've been pounding Baghdad on a sustained basis, for 40 days and nights in a way that we can't do. So why do we have to intervene? If we go through the Jordanian corridor and into H2 and H3, we will encounter a high degree of risk, as far as Israeli casualties are concerned, and anger the Americans."

Arens did not reveal to us that he was facing this dissent from at least some officers. However, this kind of professional debate was going on. His senior military officers were not completely united behind Arens, as he made very strong statements to us. He was an old time, patriotic Israeli, brought up in the tradition that: "We defend ourselves and we react instantly and decisively to an attack." To sit there, as Israeli Minister of Defense and remain passive through SCUD attacks, was virtually intolerable. I suppose, from his viewpoint, this might also set a terrible precedent for the future. In some unforeseen, future contingency, Israel might be asked to do something similar.

Through it all, I felt that Prime Minister Shamir's reaction, in yielding to President Bush's requests, was surprising, given Shamir's background. However, had a SCUD missile hit an Israeli hospital, a school, or a major group of civilians, or a barracks - like the one in Saudi Arabia, where we lost some 20 Americans killed and, perhaps, 90 wounded - who knows how Shamir would have reacted? I don't think that in such a case Shamir could have restrained the Israeli military any longer. It was really a remarkable response by Shamir in overruling his own Defense Minister.

As I said, we had a Joint Photographic Interpretation Center at our Embassy, which I visited periodically. The U.S. side never produced photographic confirmation of a single kill of a SCUD missile. General Olson was replaced by General Armstrong who was articulate and made a far more convincing appearance of trying to respond to Israeli requests for more information, more photos, and so forth. However, like the rest of us, General Armstrong was working to keep the Israelis on the reservation. He gained the respect of the Israelis.

As time went on, the number of SCUD missile attacks diminished. They appeared to go more wildly off any conceivable target. In fact, I think that the last or the next to the last SCUD missile had a concrete warhead, instead of a high explosive warhead. It landed way out in the Negev desert. Baghdad announced that they had attacked the Israeli nuclear weapons plant at Dimona. The missile hit nowhere near there. It became obvious that, for whatever combination of reasons, the SCUD attacks against Israel no longer amounted to much. However, we never knew, right up to the very end, whether a SCUD missile would come down on Israel with terrible, lethal effect. [Addendum: I was happy to hear Secretary of the Air Force James Roche state in a speech at Palm Beach Florida on January 18, 2004 that during the Second Gulf War of 2003 we provided the Israelis with full, live coverage of our operations against Northern Iraqi military installations.]

After the SCUD missile attacks were over, the HAMMER RICK communications arrangements remained in effect for quite a while. The Israelis joined in hailing President George Bush and General Norman Schwarzkopf as great heroes. Eventually, the American PATRIOT missiles were withdrawn from Israel.

The Chief of Staff of the U.S. Air Force, General McPeak, also visited Israel. When he came, he delivered a grand briefing to the Israeli military establishment. He had a surprise for me when he landed at Ben Gurion International Airport. Toward the end of the line of visiting U.S. generals, colonels, etc., a young captain with a moustache appeared before me. It took me a while to realize that he was my son, Alex! He had been a B-52 pilot and now was stationed in Saudi Arabia, flying a VIP [Very Important Person] aircraft. When the Air Force Chief of Staff learned that Alex was in Saudi Arabia, without my knowledge he had Alex join his party in Turkey, and they flew into Israel.

The Israelis were intensely interested in the professional briefing on how the air war had been conducted. It was magnificent. "Buster" Clausson and company were superbly equipped by experience, training, and background to manage the air campaign. Very few, if any Air Forces in the world could have done this sort of thing. Even the British Royal Air Force, who were perhaps the most professional air force after our own Air Force, would have had a hard time in launching this kind of complex sustained attack against Iraq. This was primarily a U.S. effort, but it was also an international effort, using British Tornados and French aircraft among others.

Of course, the Israelis were intensely interested. I would add that my own impression was that in retrospect, we had learned a lot from the Israelis' 1982 effort against the Syrians in Lebanon. That combined attack, on or about June 8, 1982, which simultaneously took out the Syrians' Soviet-built MiGs, tanks, radar and anti-aircraft missiles, as well as other concentrations of weapons systems, all at the same time, was a magnificent victory, which was fully absorbed by our professionals, when the Israelis gave us their readout in 1982.

Q: Did you pick up from the Israeli professionals any form of disquiet, which must exist in all military forces, as they looked at the beginning of smart bombs, the logistics, and the ability to project force abroad, which seemed to be more and more exclusively an American achievement?

BROWN: No, but I'll come back in a special discussion of that. The Israelis themselves were developing these weapons and projection capabilities. Some of this was shared between the U.S. and Israel, some of it was a joint operation and some of it was unilateral. All kinds of subsequent squabbles emerged as to the perceived linkage of American technology. This is a very complex subject. Two sides decide to develop something jointly, or along dual tracks. They agree to share the results with each other. One side winds up turning out a product which it shares with the other side. The other side, let us say that in this case it is the Israeli side, takes this product and keeps working at it. They develop a further refinement of it, for their own use, and then turn around and market an intermediate version. The American side says: "Hey, that's our technology." The Israelis say, "Wait a minute, no. We did this 'add on' and so it's our product." You get into all kinds of ongoing squabbles on matters like this, and it's still going on. You may remember that I mentioned at least one instance of heartburn over Israeli sales to the Chinese Communists, particularly of sophisticated air weapons.

By this time the Israelis had already developed some highly sophisticated smart bombs and used them on the Lebanese front. When they went after Hezbollah bunkers and so forth, in some cases they were using some pretty sophisticated equipment. This takes you into another area. We had this joint military, consultative committee which would meet semiannually. Americans, both civilians and military, and Israelis got together and talked in real, professional terms, looking at possible scenarios and so forth.

Over time, one side or the other would try to enhance the Israeli-American relationship, although we were not formal, treaty allies. However, as one side or the other tried to enhance the relationship, we got into questions like: "Couldn't we do some military exercises together?" It was almost always the American side that was disappointed at the Israeli response. Things would often work out: "Yes, you can come here to Israel and train." It was exceedingly important for the Marines and other units in the U.S. Sixth Fleet, for instance, to be able to come to Israel, get R&R [Rest and Relaxation], repair vessels, up to and including an aircraft carrier in Haifa, and go out and do some port visitations and so forth. By my time in Israel the arrangement had been made that Marines were quietly but effectively training in Israel. As an old Marine, I went out with U.S. Marine units into the boondocks [rural areas] of Israel and accompanied them on a couple of maneuvers. It happened during my time in Israel when the Israelis, in response to our request, said, "Okay, you can have this wide area in a desert canyon situation, you can employ and fire your artillery, if you want to use it in a joint exercise using only American forces. If you want to run some tanks and armored cars and use some air force units and your own form of joint operations, here are the limits of your range. Here's what you can do."

I would talk with U.S. Marine commanders, and ask, "How do you like this; is it useful?" They would say, "Absolutely! We can't do this anywhere else in the Mediterranean area. There's always one excuse or another from the host country. Israel may be a small country, but they're giving us some remarkable terrain in which to exercise. It's deeply appreciated because, as Marines, we really have to be up on our toes. You can't do this on board ship and you can't do it during an average visit to another country in the Mediterranean." So it was very useful.

I'll give you another example. In May, 1990, a U.S. Apache helicopter unit secretly arrived from Germany. Their Apache helicopters had been disassembled, moved to Israel, then reassembled at an Israeli air base in the Negev Desert area. I went down there to join them. I talked with the colonel and the other U.S. officers, who were very excited. I went up in an Apache helicopter. They put me up in the front of the aircraft, with that special, optic device set up for one eye. The pilot, a warrant officer, showed me what this aircraft could do. I'd be looking out at a range of 10,000 yards, and suddenly the object would appear to be only 10 or 100 yards in front of me. He could pop up from behind a hill, shoot his ordnance, and pop back down, using periscopes. He showed me how they could do this at night, and so forth. It was very exciting.

We flew back to base and talked with the colonel commanding this unit. I asked him: "How does it go in Germany?" He said, "We can't do any of this. We can't do what we're doing in Israel today in California or Nevada, due to the environmentalists lobby; there are all kinds of range restrictions." Little did I realize that this unit, only months later, was one of the Apache units that went into Saudi Arabia. This was a magnificent, training opportunity for an outfit that was shortly to distinguish itself in combat.

Q: Yes, it dropped down on all of the Iraqi early warning radar on the first night of the air war.

BROWN: Yes. The Israelis would tell us: "That sort of thing is fine. You come here, you want to train, go ahead. We'll observe." However, when the Americans asked, "How about having our pilots dog fight with your pilots?" The answer was: "No." American forces have run exercises for foreign pilots out West. I forget what it's called. [Actually, "Top Gun"] Foreign pilots who undergo U.S. Air Force training programs often take foreign aircraft and run them against the American F-15 and the F-16 aircraft. Of course, the Israelis have their own F-15s and F-16s, which they have upgraded, using their own modifications. Naturally they're always asking for the best and latest U.S. equipment, and they would play with it. However, the Israelis steadfastly declined to do dog fight with us. This attitude sort of ticked off some of our Air Force officers.

Ben Noon, the commander of the Israeli Air Force, would tell me, in a more candid moment: "Look, we think the world of your pilots, and we're glad to offer them these training facilities. However, we have a problem. It's not intentional on your part, but as we see you training with Arab Air Forces, our intelligence indicates to us that your expertise rubs off on them. If we train with you, some of our tricks will rub off on you, and there is a distinct danger, from our viewpoint, that will somehow be conveyed to a potential, Arab adversary." It was as simple as that, from their viewpoint. This is a difficult problem. Of course, American pilots would say, "Well, I would never do such a thing."

Q: American pilots might say, "That's a good trick. Let me try that. Here is a trick I learned. Why don't you try it?"

BROWN: Perhaps that concern was exaggerated in the Israeli mind. That's not for me to say, but it was there.

Q: I would have thought that they would have welcomed this proposal to get closer to the U.S.

BROWN: They feel that the U.S. has a magnificent Air Force. However, they feel that theirs, that is, the Israeli Air Force, is la creme de la creme. It's an Air Force which has to fly over a postage stamp. In flying terms, Israel is a postage stamp. Flying combat aircraft there requires taking unique risks. Highly sophisticated techniques are involved. The Israelis feel that they can't take risks by divulging everything to us. I think that that about summarizes the attitude. It's also an elitist attitude.

Q: Yes. The other side of it, as you know, is that, if you want to have a good Air Force, you have to train like hell. The other thing is that you need to choose your enemies. In that case, you should choose the Arabs.

BROWN: The Israeli Air Force is an elitist outfit. It has a competitive operating system, which is almost mind-boggling. Every flight that every pilot takes, no matter what it is, flying anything from the latest F-16 to the lowest Boxcar [transport aircraft], is rated competitively. It's a brutal system. The bottom 10 percent of the F-16 pilots are winnowed out and shunted down to F-15s, F-4s or, if necessary, to transport aircraft. It's a brutally competitive system designed to keep them on their toes.

Well, at this point we've reached the end of the Gulf War [1991].

Q: Why don't we pick this up the next time? There are some questions that I would like to ask about the situation at the end of the war. How does that seem to you? I think that for many of us who've looked at this period, we ended the war 24 hours too soon. What analysis were you getting on this matter? We can talk about this next time.

BROWN: Let me get in a brief word now. On the one hand the Israelis had tremendous admiration for the results we achieved, the way we did it, and so forth. Do we still have time on the tape?

Q: Yes.

BROWN: Secondly, from a professional, Israeli viewpoint, they never had, nor, from their viewpoint, will they ever have the luxury of the kind of huge, extended buildup of Desert Shield over a five or six month period. Nor will they ever have the opportunity to launch an extended massive aerial bombardment of 40 days and nights like the one which preceded the actual launch into combat of U.S. ground forces. From the Israeli viewpoint, that is just not in their capability. So the Israelis have a mixed reaction to our modus operandi. They study our techniques but they can never pass on to their students that this is the way to conduct operations. From their viewpoint, their operations have to be stealthy, very rapid and deadly in their initial impact.

Thirdly, as far as our handling of Saddam Hussein is concerned, Prime Minister Shamir was quoted as saying that he almost fell off his chair when he realized that we weren't going to capture Saddam Hussein, seize Baghdad, and so forth. This is not the Israeli style. The Israeli style is to go for the jugular vein, get a firm grasp on it, then squeeze it and bring your adversary not only to a military capitulation but a political settlement as well. We saw that with the encirclement of the Egyptian Army East of the Suez Canal during the Yom Kippur War of 1973 and the chagrin of Henry Kissinger as the Israelis squeezed the thirsty, hungry Egyptian Army. We saw this also in Lebanon and the installation of a new government in 1982. We saw it in the way the Israelis handled the Syrians in that encounter, besieged Arafat in Beirut.

Now, I would imagine that the Israelis were agog, not so much at the military portion of the Gulf War, when General Schwarzkopf dictated the terms, but rather the political aspect, where, as Ambassador Chas. Freeman points out, we ended the war without any direct, political commitment by Saddam Hussein to treat with us. Ever afterwards, the decisions that followed were unilateral, UN Security Council Resolutions, which were terribly important but to which Saddam Hussein and his propaganda apparatus said, "We never agreed to this." They took the view that the war was over and what right did we have to punish them unilaterally on the basis of non-fulfillment of something that they never agreed to in the first place?

Imagine, before I end this portion, what would have been the situation if the Israelis had attacked H2 and H3, not only by air attacks but with ground troops consisting of a commando force. You can bet your bottom dollar that they would have had an extended stay. There would have been a tremendous commotion within the coalition and especially in Washington and a great deal of heartburn at the Israeli reluctance to leave the H2 and H3 area. If they had seized that area, perhaps with significant, Israeli casualties, they might very well, in Israeli style, have held on unless and until the Iraqi Government came to terms with them. That could have been excruciatingly painful and highly embarrassing for us, given the way that we handled the end of the Gulf War.

Q: Okay. We'll pick this up the next time with the postwar peace process. I would also like to ask about something we touched on before, Jonathan Pollard.

BROWN: Okay.

Q: Today is September 10, 1999. Bill, one thing I forgot to ask. During this time, when you were an Ambassador in the Middle East, I imagine that you were somewhat au courant of what was happening in the area. Was there any discussion with people from Washington who came to see you or who were on the circuit about how to end the Gulf War?

BROWN: No. I don't recall anybody asking me that.

Q: This is not surprising, since the Bush administration didn't tell General Schwarzkopf anything. However, the subject had to come up some time.

BROWN: Well, I do not recall anybody coming to me, among our many visitors, and asking how we were going to end the war or should we discuss with the Israelis or others how we should do it. The war was just ended.

Incidentally, by sheer coincidence, I had lunch with someone yesterday who knows Bob Gates [former Acting Director of Central Intelligence]. During the Gulf War Gates was seconded, if you will, to the NSC [National Security Council] under General Scowcroft. My friend said that, shortly after the end of the Gulf War, when he and Gates got together on some other subject, Gates took great pride in saying that he had originated the idea of the Hundred Hours War. That is, bringing the war to an end quickly. Gates asked my friend what he thought of this. My friend replied that he thought that it was a stupid idea and contrary to U.S. interests, etc. Gates looked very unhappy about this because he had taken great pride in bringing the war to an end quickly.

In conversation with my friend yesterday, my response was: "My goodness. Bob Gates, a professional intelligence officer, who had gone all the way up to being Deputy Director of CIA...

Q: He was appointed Director of CIA by the President but never really was confirmed in the job.

BROWN: Yes. That he should wander this far into a blatantly political spin doctor kind of suggestion. However, these things happen to some people as they rise in position and mix with others. So I pass that on for what it's worth.

Q: It's very interesting. I think that, whenever a discussion of the Gulf War comes up, many people feel that it ended prematurely.

BROWN: Well, the story I heard yesterday was that Gates took credit for the idea of the Hundred Hours War and that he sold it to General Scowcroft and his people. When this idea was put to General Colin Powell, Powell was reportedly non-responsive. However, once they had adopted the idea, Powell then contacted General Schwarzkopf. You have Ambassador Chas. Freeman's report that Schwarzkopf said, "Well, at least we achieved the main goal, which was to drive the Iraqis out of Kuwait. We achieved about half of my own, secondary goal, which was to cripple the Iraqi Republican Guard. If you all feel that way in Washington, so be it." And that is reportedly the way the Gulf War ended.

In our last conversation you asked me about Shamir. (End of tape)

If you recall, you asked me how the Israelis felt about how the Gulf War ended, and so forth. I do not recall any high level critique raised with me while I was Ambassador to Israel, although later, when Prime Minister Shamir was interviewed, he said that he had nearly fallen off his chair when he heard of the way the Gulf War was ending. That is, adopting a partial military solution and not fully crippling Iraq. And there was no political agreement by the Iraqis with us, by which they signed their name to a political settlement. However, there we are.

Now, before we go into anything else, I wonder whether I could do a side note, based on a reading of the New York Times the other day, and relating to remarks I made recently about the interrogation and handling of Palestinian prisoners back then. You will recall my account of Assistant Secretary Dick Shifter's trip to Israel to discuss the issue of human rights with Jacob Perry, the Director of Shin Beth, or Sha Bak. Perry told Shifter that none of his officers were permitted to apply significant, physical pressure on a prisoner without Perry's okay. I remarked on the findings by the Agronit Commission following a previous scandal involving a couple of Palestinian terrorists who had committed murders. These terrorists had been killed in situ while they were allegedly being brought back to headquarters. A great scandal resulted, the Director of the Shin Beth was ousted, and Perry was installed in office as his replacement. There was also a classified portion of the Agronit Commission's findings, which was not revealed to us, except for the fact that the classified portion concluded that "a moderate amount of physical pressure" could be routinely used. Then there was a great squabble about what is "a moderate measure of physical pressure."

The New York Times reported the other day that the Israeli Supreme Court admitted that this was a very difficult decision and one that will cause no small debate in Israel and in Israeli society. It would be illegal to continue applying that standard. That is, to apply a "moderate amount of physical pressure" on a routine basis because, whatever the Israeli Supreme Court felt about the merits of the need for Israeli security, the Court felt that this position was legally untenable. That doesn't completely eliminate the possibility of the use of physical pressure in special cases, but obviously the Israeli Supreme Court was speaking to sustained criticism, both international and domestic, against the interpretation of a "moderate measure of physical pressure," which included such things as violently shaking the prisoner.

Q: Violently shaking a prisoner could break bones, and so forth.

BROWN: As well as putting a hood over their head, putting a prisoner in specially uncomfortable positions, and so forth. On that subject I remember that, when we were talking about such matters, it was obvious from the Israeli account that they felt that they faced a dilemma, because so many of these people being interrogated were multiple offenders. When one of these people was released, he would give all of his friends an account of precisely what he could remember of the forms of interrogation to which he had been subjected. So when these friends of the former prisoner were picked up, they wouldn't be psychologically as vulnerable and so forth. As that school of Shin Beth thought runs, you have to keep coming up with new techniques of exercising pressure on prisoners. This is very difficult to do.

Throughout it all, there is a distinct element of humiliation for the prisoners. The Israelis would let their prisoners reach the point where they had to go to the toilet. However, they didn't let them go to the toilet, and the prisoners often would have to relieve themselves in their pants. There were all sorts of stratagems of this kind, which are used around the world to humble or humiliate prisoners and therefore make them more vulnerable to interrogation.

At the end of our last session you asked me to touch on the Jonathan Pollard case.

Q: I thought that we had touched on it before, but maybe we didn't.

BROWN: I don't recall that we did, or at least not in any detail. I don't think so. Anyway, let me give you my own feelings then and now on the politics of the case.

I was always very hard line on the Pollard case. I was not in Washington when it happened. I think that it became public knowledge in 1985. I felt outraged at this dastardly behavior by Pollard. He passed on to the Israelis the equivalent of a large roomful of documents covering the most highly classified materials. At the time I was quite happy that the judge trying the case threw the book at him. This was a case of treason of the first order, in my view, and Pollard's behavior warranted the death penalty, a sentence to life imprisonment, or at least a very severe sentence.

I never believed the Israeli account that this was a rogue operation, a line to which they adhered during my tenure in Israel. It was supposedly a rogue operation under Rafi Eytan, who was a long time security intelligence specialist in a special unit of military intelligence. The Israelis, like ourselves, have several different arms of intelligence, and this was a particular cell within what I might call special operations within Israeli military intelligence.

By the way, in the Israeli system the head of military intelligence is the supreme intelligence officer. He wears two hats as the Director of their equivalent of the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] and also as the Director of Central Intelligence. The Director of Military Intelligence is an Israeli general, to whom that special unit reports, along with other intelligence organizations. I just couldn't believe and don't believe to this day that this was merely a rogue operation, unauthorized above the level of Rafi Eytan. Rafi was a long time intelligence operative.

When I was Ambassador to Israel, approaches would frequently be made to me, primarily by Eli Rubenstein, who was Israeli Cabinet Secretary, and who, at the time of the Pollard episode, was Deputy Chief of Mission [DCM] of the Israeli Embassy in Washington. I think that, at one time, Pollard tried to follow an automobile carrying Eli into the Israeli Embassy. Pollard was denied access to the Embassy by the guard. Eli is a good friend of mine to this day. I don't know whether Eli felt an extra sense of compassion or attachment to Pollard, given the fact that he was the DCM of the Israeli Embassy in Washington when this all took place. In any event, Eli mounted quite a campaign with various interlocutors or high level U.S. officials trying to get a pardon for Pollard.

I remained a hard liner on that score. It is now 1999. A lot of time has passed. Pollard has spent a significant stretch of time in prison. A lot of this time has involved very restrictive confinement, solitary and so forth. My thoughts now tend toward some commutation of his sentence, if you will, notwithstanding the fact that Pollard was guilty of dastardly deeds. When you look at other cases, you realize that no two cases are exactly alike. However, I think that I would now tend toward some commutation of his sentence, but until now I have been very hard on this case.

Q: There's been a recent story about the Pollard case. I haven't read it, but I have seen reports about it. The article is by Seymour Hersh, an investigative reporter for the "New York Times." In the article it is stated that Pollard received instructions from his Israeli handler or case officer to get further information of the kind that he had been supplying concerning American submarine movements, which he had access to. According to Hersh, our knowledge of Soviet submarines was something that the Israeli intelligence people couldn't care less about. However, the knowledge of how we were dealing with Soviet subs would be a very good card to play in trying to get Soviet Jews out of the Soviet Union. Was that factor ever brought up while you were dealing with this case?

BROWN: No, and frankly I don't believe it.

Q: I understand that, supposedly, there were reports to this effect, but you say that you knew nothing about them.

BROWN: No.

Q: Some day we may know.

BROWN: Certainly, it never came up in my time.

Q: Were you ever called upon to make any representations to the Israeli Government on the Pollard case?

BROWN: By the American Government? No. I would report the fact that Eli Rubenstein approached me, but I really don't recall anything from Washington in this regard. Early on, there was another aspect to this case. Before my time, the U.S. Government slapped the wrists of certain, high-ranking Israelis, including Moshe Levi, Chief of Staff or Deputy Chief of Staff of the Israeli Defense Forces, who were in positions of great, military authority at the time. The Israelis were not completely forthcoming about letting some of the officials within the Israeli Government involved in the case be interviewed by U.S. authorities. In retaliation the U.S. denied visitor's visas to the Israeli officials most directly involved. This was taken as a great affront by them. Early during my tenure as Ambassador to Israel, I would get approaches from these officers, to use my good offices with Washington. As I say, I did not believe that this incident was a unique rogue operation carried out without the knowledge of the top Israeli military brass, including at least the Director of Israeli Military Intelligence. Therefore, I didn't have much sympathy for such approaches.

Q: Again, while we're on this subject, did any manifestation come up, while you were dealing with the Israelis on this case, of the Israeli attack on the USS LIBERTY? Was this...

BROWN: Let me say something about the attack on the USS LIBERTY. There was a strange, little vignette, or two sub-vignettes, if you will, involving it.

The first one was that in 1988, as word got around Embassy Bangkok that I was going to be Ambassador to Israel, my secretary told me one day that one of our communicators in the Embassy wanted to call on me. As I did not know the individual or at least did not know him well, I thought that it was to say goodbye, or something like that. Lo and behold, when the individual appeared in my office, he informed me that he had been a member of the crew of the USS LIBERTY. On behalf of his old crewmates, he presented me a copy of a book about the attack on the LIBERTY, written by one of the ship's officers. The communicator was very solemn, when he gave the book to me, and he said, "As a representative of the survivors of the LIBERTY, I would like you to read this book." I said, "Thank you," and he left. That's the first vignette.

I read the book and I must say that it is a remarkable account. The audience may recall that, during the 1967 Arab-Israeli War, the USS LIBERTY, an American spy ship, positioned itself roughly off the coast of the Gaza strip. It was a signals eavesdropping ship. Israeli aircraft and torpedo boats attacked it over a period of many hours, with some interruptions, notwithstanding the fact that its officers and crew claimed that the ship was flying a large, American flag when the attacks occurred during broad daylight. The attacks involved strafing, bombing, and torpedo attacks. The ship almost sank, and, I think, between 20 and 30 lives were lost. Many members of the crew were wounded. The ship finally made it back, under tow, to an Italian port. There was a very considerable hue and cry over the incident. There was a great deal of understandable bitterness on the part of the survivors and the U.S. Navy.

The Israelis always maintained that this was a terrible accident. They finally offered some form of indemnification. As U.S. public opinion swung to the side of the Israelis in the wake of the 1967 War and, later on, as Israeli-American relations warmed up during the 1973 War, this episode faded into the background.

Q: But it would come up from time to time.

BROWN: Yes. Let me now give you another vignette which was a bit of a surprise to me. Rabin was Defense Minister in the Shamir Government until Labour Party was excluded from the Shamir Government in early 1990. Around this time Rabin and I left a social function at about the same time, and we were standing on the steps outside of the house where the function had taken place. Rabin turned to me and said, "By the way, I just want to emphasize something regarding the USS LIBERTY. That was a terrible accident. I was in the command bunker and I can tell you that it was a terrible mistake." To this day I do not know what occasioned Rabin's remark. Rabin was usually pretty tight-lipped, almost always got straight down to business, and seldom went off on tangents. I think that that was characteristic of the man. There must have been something that impelled him to make that unexpected remark.

Q: This incident hasn't gone away. Well, let's go on. The Gulf War was now over [1991]. By the way, were you getting any reverberations from the war and how the United States had performed?

BROWN: Oh, yes. Of course, the Israelis were intensely interested in the war, from a professional viewpoint, in a sense all the more so because they had been deliberately cut out of the fighting. Then the Chief of Staff of the U.S. Air Force, General McPeak flew into Israel with Buster Clausson.

I believe that I gave you an account of the heavily-attended, standing room only review of the air campaign. McPeak introduced Clausson, who gave, I thought, a fairly detailed account of how we conducted the air campaign. This was a very sophisticated operation, involving multinational forces, but with the U.S. Air Force playing the major role. The aircraft involved ran from B-52s to FB-111s, F-15s, and F-16s. Of course, Clausson, who was running the campaign, had to deal with many, conflicting demands from the various elements of the U.S. military. He had to make tough decisions but he stuck with his plan, after adjusting it as necessary.

In the course of that visit by General McPeak, a question came up which I alluded to in my earlier remarks. That is, it is a standard practice for U.S. Air Force officers to try to get the Israeli Air Force to conduct joint training, including dog fighting exercises. The Israelis had always been rather standoffish on this subject. Bin Nun, the commander of the Israeli Air Force, confided to me that the Israeli Air Force was afraid of leakage of tactics and techniques to the Arabs. Not necessarily deliberately by U.S. pilots, but these pilots later on might engage in similar, professional exercises with Arab pilots, Israel's adversaries. However, General McPeak's attitude was: "To hell with them. We're good enough. I'm not in any sense going to be a supplicant to the Israelis in that regard." When he was a fighter pilot, he had previously flown various exercises with the Israelis and he had appropriate regard for them. However, he didn't feel like asking for any favors.

Other things came up. The Israelis had a "Popeye," air to air missile, which they had developed to the point where it could do a u-turn if it missed a target which engaged in evasive tactics. The missile could double back and hit the target. The Israelis wanted to sell that missile system to us. If I remember correctly, General McPeak was interested in it but wasn't about to convey to the Israelis that we were going to fall all over ourselves, pricewise or otherwise, to get it. We had our own weapons systems.

That particular subject came up after I retired, following my service in Israel when Dick Cheney was Secretary of Defense. There was a question as to whether there was U.S. technology in the "Popeye" and, if so, were the Israelis selling this technology to other countries. This takes you into a field which is highly contentious. I may have mentioned before that the U.S. and Israel did a lot of joint research work. A breakthrough might take place on a product which would then be jointly shared. Sales to a third party were to be by joint consent. Then there would be cases where the U.S. side would say, "You're selling our jointly developed technology." The Israelis would say, "No, we did an update, which made the new weapons system a strictly Israeli product. We're not violating any agreement." And you would get into a controversy.

It was not only the Israelis who did this. There were other countries with which we would get into such controversies.

A number of such issues were bubbling along during my time in Israel. I was aware of them and believe that I recounted to you that I made a demarche on instructions on the allegation that the Israelis were selling the PYTHON air to air missile, which was lethal beyond visual range, to the People's Republic of China [PRC]. I felt that this ran strongly against our national interests. That is, maintaining a balance in the Taiwan Straits area was in our national interest. If the PRC were to get these PYTHON missiles in significant numbers, particularly the more advanced PYTHONS, we would be faced with a problem. The earlier model PYTHON was rather big and heavy and was comparatively clumsy. However, over time, if it developed into the anti-missile missile that we had, it could have very deleterious effects on the Taiwan's Air Force as it was equipped at that time. Remember, at that time the most modern fighters that Taiwan had were Northrop F-5s (although they were developing their own Indigenous Defense Aircraft). That was the latest aircraft that we would sell them. They felt that this aircraft was very inadequate, so it was a very delicate subject to me, at the time.

Now, as to the feeling in Israel at the end of the Gulf War. On the one hand President Bush, Secretary of State Baker, and the American Government were flush with victory, and that glow certainly extended to popular opinion in Israel. We had badly crippled Iraq, a primary strategic enemy of Israel's. There were those among the Israelis who felt that we should have finished the job and really destroyed the Iraqi Republican Guard. There were those Israelis who felt that we should have gone into Baghdad and extracted a political settlement, that we should have dispatched Saddam Hussein to oblivion, and so forth. You would hear views like that expressed in Israel and elsewhere around the world, including in the United States.

A secondary and very important subject among all of those in the region was what they could extract immediately out of the situation. There was talk of reducing the debt of those who had participated in defeating Saddam Hussein, for example, the Egyptian debt owed to the United States. This debt ran very high. Well, the Israelis felt that their debt owed to the United States was no small amount, either. Couldn't more be done to forgive that debt? There had been an enormous buildup of equipment in the Gulf area during the period of Desert Shield and then under Desert Storm. It was clear that much of this equipment was not going to come back to the United States. Everybody had their hands out for that equipment, and the Israelis were interested in that, also.

There was a joint strategic war stockpile in Israel. The Israelis asked us to move smart bombs and the more sophisticated equipment assembled for Desert Storm into it. That would take us into a subject which later on would become contentious, because the host country for these stockpiles rapidly acquires a distinctly proprietary attitude toward them. The Israelis were no exception in this respect.

We accommodated the Israelis to a certain degree. It was never enough to satisfy their appetites fully, but there were adjustments made in those areas. The Israelis saw us extracting money from the Saudis for this or that operation. If the United States could get money from the Saudis, the Israelis hoped that they could also get money from the Saudis in the service of their interests. So there were a lot of issues of this kind under discussion.

U.S. Secretary of Defense Cheney made a visit to Israel and had very detailed and sensitive conversations with Israeli Minister of Defense Arens. They knew each other and had a good relationship. I would rather not go into the sensitive subjects which they discussed, at least at this stage. From my previous remarks you can gather some flavor of that. By the way, as Cheney was finishing up a visit to Israel and I was just putting him on his plane, I recall asking him whether he could help me break through a bureaucratic obstacle. The Marine Security Guards and Defense Attaché personnel assigned to the Embassy in Tel Aviv, who had manned the HAMMER RICK communications system on a 24 hour a day basis, frequently under Iraqi bombardment, had been told that they were not eligible for the campaign ribbon for Desert Storm. I felt that their contributions were important enough that they ought to qualify for this ribbon. So I asked Secretary Cheney to break through this bureaucratic obstacle. He nodded, and some weeks or months later, the Marine Security Guards and the Defense Attaché people were made eligible to receive the ribbon. This episode shows how things work out at times. The military has its bureaucracy and its definitions. Sometimes you have to shake the tree in that regard.

We were now in the period when the U.S. launched its peace initiative for the Middle East, following the Gulf War. On or about March 12, 1991, Secretary of State James Baker arrived in Israel for the first time. He had blocked any other Bush Cabinet member from visiting Israel, except, of course, Dick Cheney after the Gulf War. Baker wanted to manage our contacts with Israel out of the Department of State.

Baker's initial meetings during this visit were friendly. I have to pause here and remind you a little bit of Israeli political history. David Levy, a Moroccan born Israeli who had been unemployed and then was a manual laborer, had joined the Likud Party and had risen up over the years to be Minister of Housing. As Minister of Housing he had dealt with settlement housing outside Jerusalem and so forth. By the time that Prime Minister Shamir's peace initiative was announced in 1989, Levy had become an outspoken, vociferous critic of the peace process advocated by Shamir. He had joined Moda'i, Ze'evi, and Ariel Sharon in declaring the Shamir proposal a sell out of Israeli interests. As I said before, they declared that they were the "Constrainers." Levy did this in a highly opportunistic manner to get more power and position for himself. By the time that Baker arrived in Israel, Levy had been installed as Foreign Minister. So here you had a man who both privately within the Likud Party had been through stormy party sessions, and publicly had criticized the peace process initiated by Prime Minister Shamir and Defense Minister Arens which had been endorsed by the United States.

However, now David Levy was Foreign Minister. His actions from then on reflected the ancient, political adage, "Where you stand depends on where you sit." One of Levy's key officers was Eytan Ben Tsour, who was head of the North American desk in the Foreign Ministry. Ironically, is again the Foreign Minister in 1999, and Eytan Ben Tsour is now the Director General of the Foreign Ministry. Back then Eytan and I were very good friends and professional counterparts. He had approached me and said, "Bill, forget all of the hawkish things that you have heard about David Levy. I know him. I was Consul General in Los Angeles when he visited L.A. a number of years ago. David Levy is ready to deal. Baker's host and first interlocutor should be Levy, the Foreign Minister of Israel." I dutifully passed on these views.

When we got down to the real nitty gritty details of who would meet Baker at the airport and accompany him up to Jerusalem and who should be the first to receive Baker in Jerusalem, Eytan's argument was compelling that it should be Levy, who was very sensitive. Apart from the obvious protocolary requirements, above all, Levy really wanted to play in the big leagues. He wanted the public spotlight on him as a dynamic Israeli Foreign Minister. In the Israeli pecking order the Foreign Minister is very important. Many an Israeli Prime Minister (including Shamir) had previously been Foreign Minister.

Well, Levi's desires were accommodated to the degree that on the first trip David Levy met Secretary Baker at the airport, and they drove up the hill together to the Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem. Levy was thus able meet with Baker in his office, then come out to make a statement before a large press audience, introduce the Secretary of State, and bask in the glow of the ensuing publicity. However, everyone knew that we would then be going on to the Prime Minister's office and that Israeli Prime Ministers run the show as far as U.S.-Israeli relations are concerned.

Secretary of State Baker accommodated Levy on this initial leg of the visit. We then went from the Foreign Ministry to visit Yad Veshem, the Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem. Baker went through this exhibit and made the proper kind of remarks that a visitor makes after seeing that expose of Hitler's crimes and slaughter of the Jews during World War II. Then Baker went in to see the Prime Minister and had a relatively affable meeting.

At this point Secretary Baker had been on the road for over a week, so he could give graphic accounts of the Kurdish refugee problem, since he had visited the destitute Kurds in northern Iraq. He then proposed in general terms to reopen the peace process.

I won't go into all of the details. From March to October, 1991, Secretary Baker made nine or 10 trips and orchestrated a great campaign, which culminated in an international conference held in Madrid, Spain at the end of October, 1991. Getting from March, 1991, to October, 1991, became a grinding, really energy-focused process that went through many iterations and caused a lot of heartburn en route.

On his first visit to Jerusalem, having met with Shamir, Secretary Baker also met Palestinians in the residence of the American Consul General in Jerusalem, which was just a couple of blocks from the King David Hotel, on the Western side of Jerusalem. These Palestinians were predominantly, although not exclusively, from the greater Jerusalem elite, if I can use that expression.

They included Faisal Husseini and Hannan Ashrawi, a Christian Arab who had an American Ph.D. and lived in Ramallah. Another one was Sari Nuseibah, of a prestigious, Jerusalem family. His father had been Governor of Jerusalem, and a minister in the Jordanian Government. There was also a scattering, which varied from meeting to meeting of such figures as the moderate Christian Mayor of Bethlehem, Elias Freij, others from, say, Nablus, Ramallah, and, occasionally, Al Agah from Gaza. It was obviously very difficult for them to agree among themselves who would should be their leader for such meetings. It became apparent that they were reporting to Yasser Arafat in Tunis, but they were largely without direction from him.

That relates to the way Arafat handles things. He didn't want to give any power to these people. What he wanted was an Israeli accommodation with the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization]. That was politically not possible at the time. The Shamir Government was adamantly against it. Our own position was not to deal with the PLO on this subject, but to try and find a means to get Palestinians from the occupied territories to be members of a delegation that would be acceptable to the Israelis. That was a matter requiring extreme delicacy, given the guidelines which Shamir laid down for acceptance of Palestinian interlocutors: nobody identified with the PLO, nobody from East Jerusalem, nobody who had been deported, and no outsiders from the Palestinian diaspora. Shamir and company wanted moderate, clean Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza who were not affiliated with the PLO.

Well, that was a very tall order under the circumstances. Those Palestinians who showed up were powerless, after years of Israeli occupation. As a result of a lack of direction by Yasser Arafat, they were essentially on their own, and they resorted to fairly sharp critiques of the whole peace process and demands that the U.S. negotiate with the PLO, which they said was the only true representative of the Palestinian people. Secretary Baker would say, "Come on, let's get over that. Let's talk about the nitty gritty details."

Then there would ensue all kinds of complaints about Israeli occupation practices, and their own difficulties in getting through checkpoints. (End of tape)

If they couldn't get substantive concessions from us and through us, then they wanted as much as they could get, symbolically. For example, they didn't want to meet Secretary Baker in the residence of the American Consul General on the West side of Jerusalem. They wanted to meet him in Arab Jerusalem, which they termed Al-Quds, and the "capital of the future Palestinian State." Baker wasn't about to give them that, yet.

As I said, the first round of meetings in Jerusalem was rather affable. Baker was well prepared. His team, including Dennis Ross and Dan Kurtzer and Aren Miller, had really done their homework. I would like to pause here and give due credit to Dan Kurtzer, because his name isn't mentioned nearly as often as it should be as a conceptualizer in all of this. He happens to be a religious Orthodox Jew. He had served in the American Embassy in Cairo, where he is now our Ambassador. He later came to serve in Tel Aviv just as I was completing my tour as DCM

[Deputy Chief of Mission] under Ambassador Sam Lewis. He could read, write, and speak Hebrew. He was extremely intelligent and well read. He was determined to get a peace process going and to do everything that he could to push it.

[Kurtzer later became U.S. Ambassador to Israel.]

Secretary Baker sometimes referred to his staff as his food processors. You know, people who grind out new formulae, draft speeches, and so forth. Kurtzer's contribution was really remarkable throughout all of this. Dennis Ross, of course, had a great background and was Baker's key advisor.

As time went on, U.S. pressure increased on all other parties involved in the Middle East peace process. Let's just pause here and ask what the different parties wanted.

The U.S. wanted a successful peace process, based on an exchange of territory for peace, in accordance with UN Resolutions 242 and 338. You will recall that my first approaches to the Shamir Government at the end of the Reagan administration I had posed the question: "Would the Shamir Government be willing to proceed under the terms of the concept of 'land for peace?'" On the one hand I was rebuffed but I had nevertheless concluded that this could be done and had so recommended to Secretary Baker during my first trip back to Washington in the early days of the Bush administration. Naturally, we wanted arrangements that would afford Israel proper security. UN Resolutions 242 and 338 meant that there would be some sort of territorial compromise. We left this to the parties concerned to negotiate. We wanted a permanent peace and the diplomatic recognition of Israel by its Arab neighbors, accompanied by trade, tourism, and so forth. This implied the diminution of security threats against Israel.

What did the Arabs want? Well, at this stage, if I could simplify it, Syria wanted all of the Golan Heights on its own terms. The Syrian definition is not merely the Heights as such, but the line that existed prior to June, 1967. In some cases, as I've mentioned, this would extend to within 10 yards of the Eastern shore of the northern portion of the Sea of Galilee. Syrian troops had reached that point, and a DMZ [Demilitarized Zone] curved around there until the 1973 War.

The Lebanese wanted the Israelis out of Lebanon, and so did the Syrians. They wanted a complete Israeli withdrawal from the so-called "Security Zone" in southern Lebanon just North of the Israeli-Lebanese border. The Syrians also wanted to get out from under the cloud of being formally designated by the U.S. as a state supporting terrorist organizations. I think that this designation remains in effect today, although whether President Assad has managed finally to get out from under this cloud more recently, I don't recall.

Q: I don't recall, either.

BROWN: President Assad also wanted money in the form of aid to the very statist, stultified, calcified Syrian economy.

King Hussein of Jordan wanted to get out of the dog house. He had been openly identified with the Iraqi cause. All of his immediate explanations, and those of his brother, Crown Prince Hassan, fell on unsympathetic ears at the time. The Saudis had cut off the subsidies which they'd been giving Jordan for years, amounting to millions of dollars. The Saudis also cut off Jordan's supply of oil. The TAP [Trans Arabian Pipeline] was cut off because of a) non-payment of previous debts and b) Saudi anger at what Hussein had said and done during the Gulf War. The Saudis were not about to accommodate him at that stage at all. So Hussein wanted us to lean on the Saudis to loosen up. Hussein also wanted an accommodation with the Israelis at minimum expense. His great fear in all of this was akin to an Israeli concern. That is, the emergence of an independent, Palestinian state, sandwiched in between Jordan and Israel, bearing in mind that the population of Jordan is about 60 percent Palestinian. The Hashemites in Jordan had a fear that, a Palestinian state would foment a political movement which might endanger the Hussein regime in Jordan. So, Hussein wanted money, he wanted to get out of the dog house, and he wanted an arrangement which would preclude a Palestinian takeover of Jordan.

Hussein also wanted a settlement of another great concern of his, namely, Syria. Over the years President Assad of Syria had repeatedly threatened Jordan by word and by deed. Hussein also wanted water. By this time Jordan was very short of water. The Yarmuk River runs between northwestern Jordan and Syria and flows into the Jordan River at the southern end of the Sea of Galilee. Apart from the contentious water dispute between Jordan and Israel, there also was Jordanian concern because the Syrians were beginning to dam up the tributaries which flow into the Yarmuk. There had been a proposal for a dam, to be jointly financed by Jordan and Syria, with the water to be shared, but this hadn't gone anywhere.

The Saudis wanted everybody to get out of their pockets. Everybody, and especially the United States, was extracting billions of dollars from the Saudis to pay for Desert Storm and Desert Shield. We were coming at the Saudis on behalf of supplicants, both near and far.

The Egyptians wanted forgiveness of their debt and surplus U.S. military equipment. In the afterglow of Desert Storm they wanted an increased flow of U.S. military hardware, both surplus, as well as the latest form of equipment, to flow into their military establishment. They took pride in the noble Coalition effort in which they had participated (although they hadn't done any fighting) and they wanted to share in the spoils.

The Kuwaitis wanted every last Palestinian out of their country as soon as possible. They viewed the Palestinians as collaborators of the Iraqis. By the time the Kuwaiti royal family moved back from exile in London, they had paid a significant part of the costs of Desert Storm. The Kuwaitis booted the Palestinians by the thousands or tens of thousands out of Kuwait. The Palestinians left Kuwait, essentially as refugees. Nobody else would receive them, so they flowed into Jordan. So the Jordanians had an extra problem with the influx into Jordan of thousands of more Palestinians.

Jordan also wanted the end of the embargo which had bottled up the Strait of Tiran [at the mouth of the Gulf of Aqaba]. There was Coalition inspection of shipping going into the Gulf of Aqaba, especially of all cargoes destined for Iraq. Jordan made a nice profit out of this trade with Iraq. Jordan wanted us to ease and lift the embargo on goods flowing into the Gulf of Aqaba, so that the Iraqis could sell them oil above board and all of that. The Jordanian economy was weak to begin with and was in a virtual state of wreckage by the end of the Gulf War.

What did Israel want? It wanted diplomatic recognition by its Arab neighbors; peace and security without giving up the West Bank of the Jordan and the Gaza Strip; and the end of the Arab embargo, which had had such deleterious effects on Israel on a worldwide basis. Among those countries which had succumbed to the Arab embargo against Israel was Japan. As Israel promoted exports of its newly-emergent, high tech products it wanted to break the remnants of the Arab embargo. It wanted the repeal of the UN Resolution which equated Zionism with racism. In the wake of the SCUD missile attacks against Israel, they wanted our PATRIOT missile hardware. We had provided Israel with PATRIOT missile batteries and PATRIOT missile training. However, after the Gulf War we pulled our PATRIOT missile batteries out of Israel. They would have preferred that we left them in Israel, but by now they had acquired some of their own PATRIOTs. They arranged to have the Germans pay for some of that.

A major Israeli priority was our aid in the development of the anti-missile ARROW missile. Before the Gulf War we had, among the joint projects under development with Israel, funded 80 percent of the costs of developing an anti-missile missile which the Israelis code named the ARROW. The ARROW was not the same thing as the PATRIOT. The PATRIOT was essentially a surface launched anti-aircraft missile which had been upgraded to cope with SCUD missiles. The Israelis were not very satisfied with what they had seen of the upgraded PATRIOT missile.

With our money and with our consent the Israelis had embarked on a joint project called the ARROW. The idea was that when you detected the lift-off of an enemy missile, you launched an ARROW high up into the atmosphere to catch the incoming missile at its apogee [highest point], at least. That was a highly sophisticated challenge. No other country had succeeded at this, but the Israelis had very good technicians and felt an urgent need to acquire this weapons system. A sophisticated, warning system would go with the ARROW, so that they could identify the trajectory of an incoming missile as far out as possible, and then launch an ARROW in time to catch this incoming missile before its descent, at a terrific velocity, through the stratosphere. It would be awfully hard to intercept it from then on.

This produced an intensified effort. The Israelis wanted more money for it. They ran into an element within the U.S. missile community that said, "What we need is a theater-wide missile, a worldwide missile, or a Star Wars missile." There were lots of related U.S. plans, none of which had gone beyond the drawing board. These different plans were competing for development funds. So the U.S. military was split on this subject. Those who advocated the development of a missile which would deal with a regional problem advocated support for the ARROW missile. Others said, "This is mighty expensive stuff, and it comes at our expense." They advocated easing up on the ARROW and developing became known as the THAD, a much longer range weapons system.

Q: Theater range missile.

BROWN: It would be a high altitude weapon with theater coverage or, if you will, the rebirth of what we had renounced in our missile negotiations with the Soviet Union. That is, the Star Wars kind of weapons system. Senior U.S. military officials came through to discuss this with the Israelis, who wanted details about this program. However, the Israelis pushed the ARROW program as far and as fast as they could. This meant cutting corners, which then entailed some risk of failure. This weapons system was tried several times but, for one reason or another, it didn't work. However, eventually, it hit the target. Rather than hitting the incoming missile on a point to point basis, the ARROW missile relied on a buckshot or bucket effect. So, as it approached the incoming missile, it didn't have to hit it exactly, nose to nose. Rather, it relied on a kind of proximity fuse, if I may force this analogy. As the ARROW missile approached the incoming missile, the Arrow would fire a charge much like buckshot, and destroy the incoming missile or at least knock it off course.

Of course, there were those outsiders who would say, "This is essentially a missile system. You may call it an 'anti-missile missile,' but what you have is a new missile system."

Q: Then this involves the nuclear capability of the weapons system.

BROWN: Israel was in peril of being lumped with the likes of such countries as Iraq, Syria, and North Korea as we came up with our strategic missile regime. We considered a system under which we compel all of these, and other countries to adhere to our version of a missile regime as follows: 'Thou shalt not launch missiles capable of more than a certain range, say, either 300 or 500 kilometers. Thou shalt not launch a missile with super velocity.'" This concept later on caused a lot of heartburn in Israel when they saw themselves in risk of being named as being in violation of or not adhering to the missile regime.

The first Baker visit was rather friendly, although the Secretary was beginning to drop markers on the Israelis and the Palestinians. In essence, he said to the Israelis: "We're not going to deal with the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] on this. However, you've got to deal realistically on this matter, you have to appreciate our limitations and you will have to make substantive and symbolic concessions."

Shortly thereafter there was a U.S. request for a responsible Israeli to go and see Dennis Ross and Secretary of State Baker quietly. Dan Meridor was a brilliant young minister in the Shamir Government from a prestigious Likud-Herut family. Meridor nominally went to Washington for some other purpose but came back with a letter from Baker containing three, basic questions that were to set the scene for subsequent discussions. They were: 1) Was Israel willing to seek a permanent solution to Arab-Israeli problems, based on UN Resolutions 242 and 338, that is, embodying the concept of exchanging territory for peace? 2) Was Israel willing to attend a regional conference to be co-hosted by the U.S. and the Soviet Union? The Soviet Union was still nominally intact, but by now it was very much weakened. 3) Would the Israelis agree to a moderate-sized, Palestinian Delegation to consist of seven members or so which would not include people from East Jerusalem nor deportees? That harks back to the earlier 1989-90 debate on what kind of Palestinian the Israelis would be willing to deal with.

Those three questions were what the Israeli Government was now faced with. The answers were expected to be "Yes or No." Understandably, the Israelis were divided among themselves. Remember that Prime Minister Shamir had now brought into the government some ultra-Right types, including representatives of Tsomet, headed by Raful Eytan, former Chief of Staff of the Israeli Defense Forces, and "Moledet," which had either two or three members in the Knesset [Israeli Parliament]. Moledet's leader was Ze'evi, whose solution for dealing with the Palestinian Arabs was to transfer them elsewhere. That is, send them to Jordan or wherever. Those groups vociferously denounced this whole idea, from the very beginning, as a sellout which would lead to perdition.

Within the Likud itself there were great divisions as to what they were after, what they would agree to, and so forth. I won't go into all of the details, because you could spend hours and hours on them. Prime Minister Shamir was typically himself. He was reticent, slow-moving, and tended to procrastinate. As such, he would drive people up the wall, including Secretary of State James Baker and some of Shamir's own people. As time went on, more and more pressure came from Baker, who developed a practice of visiting various capitals and giving the Israelis a general picture but not the real nitty gritty details of his discussions with President Assad of Syria or others.

In all of this, by the way, the Egyptian role would come into focus. The Israelis had long felt frustrated that their peace with Egypt was a cold peace. They had given up the Sinai Desert, including Taba, to the Egyptians. Taba was a tiny enclave on the Gulf of Aqaba between Israel and Egypt. However, the Egyptians remained aloof and cold. The Israelis wanted the U.S. somehow to overcome this Egyptian attitude. We also wanted a positive, Egyptian role in implementing a peace process. The Egyptians wanted the positive benefits which would flow from being in the limelight, but they didn't prove to be too useful.

Back and forth went Secretary of State Baker. He developed a style in dealing with the Israelis which personally I considered quite bothersome. In any event, it was obvious to me that if I was going to play a role here, as a loyal Ambassador I would have to mix it up with the Israelis. I had no qualms about that and I gave Secretary Baker my best advice as to the problems and how to overcome them.

Baker rapidly became disillusioned with Israeli Foreign Minister Levy. He saw that Levy was principally interested in gaining the limelight. Levy had some utility to us by posing as being accommodating, but only if he could gain some control, and the control remained in the hands of Shamir. Baker didn't want to stop by Levy's office any longer and just listen to Levy, whom he labeled as a gas bag. (Baker used pejorative terms for his interlocutors, which I'd better not go into.) Instead, Baker preferred to go straight to Prime Minister Shamir's office. So I would have difficulties with Eytan Ben Tsour, who was working for Levy. Eytan would say, "Well, couldn't Baker stop by Levy's office for a minute or two?" with the press outside, and so forth.

Baker talked with Prime Minister Shamir, and he would see Defense Minister Arens occasionally on the side. When Baker saw Shamir, the key sessions would usually end up with Shamir using Eli Rubenstein and Yusip Ben Aron to do the heavy lifting on the Israeli side. They would come, as always, fully prepared and with all kinds of arguments, counter arguments, and proposals for the U.S. to obtain concessions from the Palestinians and other Arabs, in addition to venting criticism over the way things were going. Shamir would just sit there and let the conversation go back and forth. It would end up with Secretary Baker speaking sharply to Rubenstein and Yusip Ben Aron, with Dennis Ross and me really taking them on. We would get into rather heated exchanges, while Prime Minister Shamir just sat there, rather Sphinx-like in his manner, to Secretary Baker's frustration.

Then Baker would go and meet with the Palestinians. They were often, excuse the expression, sort of cry babies, whining and entreating him for help.

Q: What would they have to offer?

BROWN: They had nothing to offer, except the image of Palestinians meeting with the U.S. Secretary of State. They were always criticizing and requesting concessions. Through various channels it became obvious to us that they really had no clout and were sort of winging it as best they could figure, while trying to stay in the good graces of Yasser Arafat, 1,000 miles away in Tunis.

Q: I'm trying to get a feel for this. I would like to ask you about two things. First of all, you say that you were trying to give Secretary Baker the best advice and so forth. Did you feel that there was a mindset which had developed in Washington among Baker's group? They would sort of get their ducks in line in Washington and then almost feel that, once they had done that, they were sure that they had THE solution. Then they would come out to the Middle East and find themselves up against a different world. I know that we came up against this in connection with the Shultz Plan, when Secretary Shultz met with President Assad of Syria. Did you find that? And then I have another question.

BROWN: To a degree, yes, they were trying to apply a pre-determined solution. Now, they were not fools. We're talking about experienced people. Secretary of State Baker was a good leader. He came to the Middle East well-prepared. He brought a terrific team with him, which was up to speed and coming up with ideas and formulas and so forth. What about your second question?

Q: The second question is, was it implicit in everything that we were doing that we were talking to Palestinians who really had no clout or influence? Did we feel that we had to figure out what Arafat wanted? We already had talks going on with...

BROWN: At that stage things were so delicate that, whatever we thought on the side, the stance had to be, "Let's see if we can promote the formation of a native or, if you will, local Palestinian delegation and hope that Arafat would permit this delegation to go along with the game.

Q: Were you getting any input from Ambassador Pelletreau in Tunis? Was he part of the equation?

BROWN: He was doing his reporting, but I can't remember anything in particular of any note. Of course, the Palestinians would tell us, over and over again, that their real leader was Yasser Arafat. We would be in the position of saying: "Yes, but let's not get into that." We knew, of course, that the Israelis knew virtually everything that was going on. After a meeting with Secretary Baker, the Palestinians we were talking to would run out, pull out their cell phones, and start calling Tunis to report in to Arafat.

Q: You say that the Palestinians were going out and reporting to Arafat on their cell phones?

BROWN: Yes, they would immediately get out their cell phones and report to their colleagues who were working with Arafat in Tunis. Of course, the Israelis would intercept these reports and learn what the Palestinians said about their exchanges with Secretary Baker.

I think that it's worth a moment to pause here and speak of other atmospherics. First of all, the Israeli settlement activity continued. This was really angering Washington now. I've mentioned before how this kind of settlement activity had angered President Bush in 1989-90. Now, it made a very bad impression when Washington found out that Prime Minister Shamir was permitting settlement activity to continue. Remember that there had been a tremendous influx of Soviet Jews, and particularly Russians and Ukrainians, most of them coming from urban environments. Most of them wanted to settle in the belt around Tel Aviv, a small number went to settlements in the occupied territories. Remember that a number of these settlements were rather large. We're talking about communities of 10,000 to 20,000 people. These were virtually bedroom communities, from which you could be at a job in Tel Aviv or Jerusalem in 15 or 20 minutes. Considerable publicity ensued regarding both the construction and the extension of settlements, old and new. The Israelis had developed a tricky way of setting up a new settlement by labeling it an extension of an old settlement. I'd protested against this practice on many occasions.

Of course, it was an absolute demand of all Palestinians that this kind of settlement construction had to stop. From the Palestinian viewpoint, it even had to be reversed. Well, Prime Minister Shamir wasn't about to do anything like this. So this was a point of constant aggravation between ourselves and the Israelis.

Coincidentally, the Intifada was still going on, and there was a rash of ongoing, terrorist incidents against Israeli soldiers and civilians both the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Some gruesome, murderous actions also occurred among Palestinians, chiefly against those suspected of collaborating with the Israelis.

As Defense Minister, was in charge of the occupied territories, Arens was in a bind. On the one hand, Arens had come to the conclusion that the Israelis had to deal with the Palestinians and that they could no longer hope somehow to solve this problem through the Jordanians or others. In conversations with me Arens was in effect advocating municipal elections. There were precedents for municipal elections in the occupied territories. This was a subject of contention because Arafat and company could see that the Israeli goal here was to circumvent any possibility of territorial concessions and, once again, go to the U.S. and the world and say in effect, "You see? We have found a local group of Palestinians who have chosen democratically elected village councils. We can do business with these people. They can control cleaning up their own streets, the water system, and that sort of thing. However, nothing more than that."

Prime Minister Shamir was also against elections in the occupied territories. He feared that this would lead to demands by the elected Palestinians for the establishment of an independent, Palestinian entity. Meanwhile, the Intifada and the rash of terrorist incidents continued. Arens proclaimed curfews in Gaza, which was then very heavily dependent on the Israeli economy for employment. 50,000 to 100,000 Gazans were coming across the border with Israel every day to work on farms and do the dirty work at construction sites. This was virtually their only means of earning an income for a very young population of 700,000 which was increasing at an extraordinary rate. Proclaiming a curfew and stopping them from working in Israel was a very serious move. However, Arens, like Rabin before him, on occasion felt that there was no other way to deal with the problem of terrorism. The curfew would be proclaimed. It might be lifted a few days later, but as the terrorist incidents continued, this became a major problem. The situation in Gaza got so bad that the cry arose, particularly in the Likud camp led by Ariel Sharon, for tougher measures such as those which Sharon in the 1970s had imposed in brutally suppressing disturbances in Gaza.

So the atmosphere was by no means calm and cool. It was fractious. President Bush was angry with Prime Minister Shamir, and Secretary Baker developed the habit of stating to Shamir: "If you think what I'm saying is tough, Mr. Prime Minister, you ought to hear what my good friend of 30 years, President George Bush, is saying." The conversations between Baker and Shamir's entourage, myself included, at times became quite sharp.

Baker developed the technique of saying: "Look, I will try to accommodate your concerns here but I've got other concerns with the Syrians. If you will give me what is necessary to work with, I will accommodate you by a separate, side letter." The Israelis would say, "What are you promising the Syrians on this issue?" Baker would temporize in his answer. He would not reveal the nitty gritty details. Of course, the Israelis had their own means of trying to determine that.

Another technique of Baker's was to tell his Ambassadors, and that certainly included me, that there was to be no reporting of his conversations with either Israelis or anyone else. When he and I were alone, he would say to me: "I don't want that 'blankety-blank' AIPAC [American Israeli Public Affairs Committee] to know what's going on." So I prepared no cables or memoranda of conversations which Baker had. It all stayed with me. I had my notes of what was said at these meetings, which were subsequently destroyed. However, knowledge of what was said at these meetings all stayed in-house, that is, in Secretary Baker's entourage. We were instructed not to communicate, back and forth, with our other Ambassadors. I was not to let Ambassador Ed Djerejian [in Damascus] and other Ambassadors on the circuit know what was going on. That would all be handled by Secretary Baker's party. That was an interesting way to run a show...

Q: Yes, but in a way it was almost necessary because the leakage was so bad in the Department of State, considering the presence of friends of Israel in the political context that I can't think of any other way that you could handle this, over a period of time.

BROWN: Well, Stuart, you get into the question of professional, career Ambassadors doing their best to support a diplomatic campaign, and not just an individual visit by the Secretary of State. I feel, as a professional Ambassador, that it would have been useful to know a little bit more about what was going on elsewhere.

Q: I know. What I'm saying is that anything which came from the visits by Secretary Baker, if it went back to the desk in the Department of State, and God knows how this happens, but it's a truism that anything that you write about Israel, and this applies generally in the Foreign Service, is going to end up on a desk in AIPAC and with friends of Israel in the Senate and the House of Representatives. And probably before anybody else could read it.

BROWN: Okay, Stuart, but you would have to reckon with the likelihood that those same addressees would get their own version via the Israelis, anyway. Of course, Secretary Baker and Margaret Tutwiler handled press briefings exclusively. The press was along on all or most of these visits. Baker, using his food processors such as Ross, Kurtzer and others in his traveling party, would let out dribbles to the press. The Palestinians, of course, were had their own circuit.

I completely adhered to Baker's overall goal and objectives. I was a loyal Ambassador and did my best to contribute creatively. Indeed, I engaged in this effort in a spirited manner, using Secretary Baker's arguments with Eli Rubenstein, Yosi Ben Aron, Israeli Defense Minister Arens, and the Israeli Foreign Ministry. However, the atmosphere in which I worked was somewhat shocking, and the image that emerged was that the Bush Government was tough and harsh, vis-a-vis Israel. In effect, we were playing a strong hand and a rough kind of ball with the Israelis.

If I may switch over to the Palestinian side at this point, they were in a very difficult position, as I look back at it. They were always asking for something. At one point Faisal Husseini said to Secretary Baker: "You're talking to a dead man! Threats have been made on my life. There's threatening graffiti on the wall of my house. I have young children," and so forth. Faisal Husseini said that the Israelis were behind all of this. Baker responded, do you need security protection? Maybe we can train some Palestinian security types to give you appropriate protection. We have specialists in this field."

I remember a side conversation in this regard with the head of the Israeli Security Service. The Israeli smiled and said to me, "Yes, Faisal Husseini has problems, but they're not problems with us. His problems are with the Palestinians." The thrust of those remarks was: "If you Americans want to go off and train some Palestinian security people, good luck, but that's not the problem."

I can remember Secretary Baker straining to convey to the Palestinians that he was doing his best. He would imply that if they would only give him more to work with, perhaps he could help them more. Baker was an outstanding negotiator. He made you feel that, by God, he had gone the extra mile for you, but you weren't coming up with enough to give him what he needed to work with. At one point the conversation with the Palestinians in the Consul General's house in Jerusalem went to the point where the Palestinians were asking for an expression of "self-determination." There was a long pause, and Secretary Baker turned to his entourage and asked, "Why can't I use that expression?" Neither Dennis Ross nor anybody else said anything. Finally, I said, "Because, Mr. Secretary, that's political dynamite." For years U.S. administrations had adamantly opposed the use of the expression, "self-determination" for the Palestinians. This was a code word for an independent, Palestinian state, run by the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization]. I felt that at that point and in that kind of conversation I had to say this.

Well, as you can imagine, the Palestinians glared at me, and my name, as the American Ambassador to Israel, which was probably muddled anyhow as far as they were concerned, was muddled even further. However, that's what you have to go through.

Q: We'll play this back and we'll pick this up where you are talking about Secretary Baker dealing with the Palestinians on the issue of self-determination.

Today is September 22, 1999. Bill, you were mentioning, while we were talking about these early negotiations with Secretary of State Baker on the Arab-Israeli problem, what the overall, strategic point of view was, as Baker saw it. Essentially, this was the American point of view.

BROWN: At the risk of some repetition, as I may not have covered this point adequately before, I would like to review the situation, from my viewpoint, at the end of the Gulf War in February-March, 1991. The main components of the situation, as I saw them, were as follows:

1) The Soviet Union had imploded. No longer were we dealing with the traditional, Cold War, balance of forces, play and counterplay, in the Middle East. Already, some time before, the Soviet presence in Syria and Soviet clout and support, in the sense of providing arms, subsidies, and personnel had declined. For many years the Soviets had had hundreds, if not thousands, of military personnel in the area. The Syrian armed forces, for example, were equipped with Soviet weapons. The Syrian Air Force had Soviet aircraft, trained along Soviet lines, and operated in terms of Soviet doctrine. All of this required a very hefty subsidy on the part of Moscow, using Syria to counter Israel and playing for the larger Arab vote as part and parcel of the Cold War struggle with the United States.

All of that was now gone. This meant that the efforts and past influence of Mr. Primakov and others in the Soviet Government, whether you were talking about the KGB [Soviet secret police], the Soviet military, and so forth, were very severely set back, if not wiped out. For all practical purposes, they were practically nil. For the sake of appearances, President Bush and Secretary of State Baker decided to continue going through the motions of having the Soviet Union co-sponsor activities in the Middle East, as we went along. However, that was just showmanship.

2) Secondly, although one can argue that Saddam Hussein and the elite, Iraqi Republican Guard should have been completely eliminated, a tremendous blow had been inflicted on Iraq, in terms of military clout and economic infrastructure. A series of restrictions continue to this. U.S. aircraft are still periodically bombing selected military targets in Iraq. One of the two great, strategic threats to Israel, that is, Iraq, had been knocked out for up to 10 years, depending on how the follow-up to the Gulf War went. The other threat remaining, of course, was Iran, which was farther removed from the scene but which was of concern to the Israelis, in terms of Iran's nuclear and missile potential. In negotiating, whether with the Israelis or with anyone else in what became a multi-faceted process culminating in the Madrid Peace Conference in October, 1991, this was of enormous importance.

Meanwhile, Jordan and the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] were both in the dog house. By word and deed they had acted in a most foolish way, from my viewpoint. Particularly with regard to the Palestinians, one could argue that poor King Hussein, caught between a rock and a hard place, may have felt that he had little choice but to act and speak as he did. However, the Jordanian economy, which was already weak before the Gulf War, was dealt a very heavy blow. The Saudis cut off their subsidy to Jordan, cut off the flow of oil in the pipeline into Jordan, and simply would have nothing to do with the resuscitation of the Jordanian economy or the prestige of King Hussein in any form or manner. The same thing applied to the subsidies formerly paid by the Saudis to the PLO. For years the Saudis, through one means or another, whether private, public, or semi public, had allowed money to flow to Yasser Arafat and various factions in the PLO supporting him. That all stopped. As I mentioned before, Kuwait brutally expelled tens of thousands of Palestinians, charging that the Palestinians had collaborated with the Iraqi occupation forces in Kuwait. So this was a heavy, further blow to the Palestinians in general and to Jordan as well, because when the Palestinians were kicked out of Kuwait, no country would take them except Jordan.

Q: I might add that the Palestinians had publicly demonstrated support of Saddam Hussein on television, which was seen throughout the world.

BROWN: The image used in Israel at that time was that the Palestinians were dancing with joy on the roofs of their homes. Maybe this was an exaggeration, but it was a widely-held stereotype, as a result of which the Palestinians were in a really weak, negotiating position.

At the time there was a great rush to get the goodies in the form of equipment, etc, when the United States finished this major, overseas war effort. We spent a great amount of time and money transporting huge amounts of military equipment to the Middle East. Subsequently, much of this was then deemed surplus to our needs. Rather than ship this equipment back to the United States, U.S. logisticians began looking for ways to get rid of it in the Middle East itself. For the Egyptians, Saudis, the Israelis and others, these goodies were up for grabs. This was something that a negotiator like Secretary Baker could play with.

Inevitably, a cry came from the Egyptians for debt relief. The United States was in a position, if it wanted to, even though at the time our economy was not particularly prosperous, to reward countries which had supported the coalition effort against Saddam Hussein. We did so. The Egyptians' entreaties were answered by the forgiveness of $7.0 billion in debt to the U.S., plus the flow of surplus military equipment and the maintenance of the annual, foreign aid flow to Egypt, which was roughly in the order of nearly $2.0 billion.

The United States had emerged as "El Supremo" as a result of the Gulf War. We were unchallenged. There was no Soviet Union to contend with. We had pulled off a tremendous victory, which was called "The 100 Hours War," with great, added prestige accruing to us. As a result of the Gulf War President Bush was at his height in terms of popularity. Congress, whatever its earlier misgivings about getting into the war, was now, elated. The President's reception by Congress after the end of the war was tumultuous. He was given great acclaim for his achievement.

So, when Secretary Baker toured the Middle East, he had a tremendously favorable, negotiating position. I would add one other thing which was not commonly referred to at the time, and may still not be. Although, the Israelis had emerged relatively unscathed, and miraculously so, in view of 39 SCUD missiles launched against Israel, their economy had come to a grinding halt during the war.

Israel had been transformed in the years since I was there as DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission], 1979-82, into an increasingly, high tech economy. During the Gulf War, as I traveled around Israel on a sort of morale enhancing tour of Israeli industrial and scientific enterprises, I remember visiting a high class firm that made equipment for administering CAT scans. This is a big, highly complex piece of equipment.

Q: Perhaps you could explain what a CAT scan is.

BROWN: Okay. This equipment is built into a horizontal receptacle which measures your brain waves and whether you have cancer here or there, as well as other disorders. This equipment is large, extremely complex, and very expensive. One set of this equipment was selling then for at least $500,000. The Israeli-made CAT scan was meeting and beating Japanese and U.S. CAT scans, which had heretofore been regarded as the best in the world. When I talked to the CEO [Chief Executive Officer] of this Israeli company at the time, he said that the market situation for this equipment was disastrous. News of the SCUD attacks on Israel had caused potential customers around the world to ask, "How can we be sure that equipment ordered from Israel will be delivered?" As a result, orders for this and other hi-tech equipment had taken a beating.

Former Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, who was then a private person, remarked to me at the time, as did Defense Minister Arens, that the Israeli economy was at a standstill. Factories had been closed. The Israeli people had been instructed to stay at home. So the Israeli economy came to a grinding halt. This revealed to me a unique Israeli vulnerability which I had not previously appreciated. When faced with conventional war previously, the Israelis had struck hard and fast struck across their borders. Until the SCUDs attacks of 1991, those wars had been fought elsewhere, outside of Israel or on its borders. The SCUD attacks set in train a new, extra dynamic: the quest for an anti-missile missile and a kind of brand new, radar system which could detect incoming missiles at supersonic speeds, launched from great distances.

This situation also must have set in mind for some Israelis the need for adequate settlements and turning Israel's diplomatic resources to cope with the emergent threats of the future. Not only from Iraq, but...

Q: When you mention settlements, you're not talking about housing on the West Bank of the Jordan, for example, where people lived.

BROWN: No, I'm talking about peace settlements to be negotiated to replace hostilities. Such peace settlements were needed to bring more order and predictability into the region.

These, then, were some of the main factors that Secretary Baker and his outstanding team in the State Department, including Dennis Ross, Dan Kurtzer, Aaron Miller and others, could bring into play. What I'm talking about now is a process involving eight trips to the Middle East between March 12, 1991, through mid-October, 1991, culminating in the Madrid Peace Conference, which started on October 30-31, 1991.

I have to give Secretary Baker and his entourage full marks for pulling off a diplomatic coup. They deserve great credit. I would also note, on the Israeli front, as former Secretary Kissinger and others have said, the Israeli negotiating style is little short of maddening. The Israelis often go into arcane arguments and attempt, over an excruciating length of time, day and night, to extract maximum advantage over as broad a spectrum as they can. That is a well-known pattern in the eyes of professional American negotiators. You find this pattern way back in the time of David Ben-Gurion, Golda Meir, and right on down to the present. Of course, individual Israeli negotiators have their particular traits. Much has been written about Menachem Begin and the negotiations which led to the Camp David agreements. On that score you should also consider Ambassador Sam Lewis' contributions.

In this particular case Prime Minister Shamir's personality and style included a pronounced reticence in front of a U.S. negotiator. Shamir had a distinct tendency to procrastinate in making decisions, particularly tough decisions. This tendency made it even more difficult to negotiate with him. Shamir's way of handling Secretary Baker presented its own problems. Shamir would receive Baker in the Prime Minister's office. Shamir would sit under a stern portrait of Jabotinsky, the revisionist right-wing Herut/Likud visionary, who was well known for his view that Israel should control "both banks of the Jordan River." Shamir would seat Secretary Baker to his immediate right, with myself and Dennis Ross, to Baker's right. To Shamir's left would be Yusip Ben Aron, the Director General of the Prime Minister's office, a former Israeli Foreign Service Officer of pro-Likud, hawkish sentiments, and Eli Rubenstein, who had served many different Israeli Prime Ministers and administrations and who had taken part in many negotiations.

Very often Shamir would just sit there and let Ben Aron and Rubenstein pick holes in any presentation made and ask a whole series of penetrating, difficult questions, which would lead the conversation on and on. Shamir would often preside over such a meeting in relative silence, until it really boiled over. Then he might say a word or two to calm down the atmosphere.

Well, a process like that could be very frustrating for a man like Secretary Baker, who wanted to move on and had a lot on his mind. His itineraries were complex. He would be moving on from seeing Prime Minister Shamir to go to see President Assad up in Syria. Then he might be going to Saudi Arabia to see the Saudis. Baker had many other items on his platter, as well as the peace process itself. The fact that Shamir had his own splits within Likud also further complicated the process. Shamir's coalition government had been in office for some time, and like all Israeli coalitions which have been in office for a time, it was beginning to come apart at the seams. The Right Wing splinter parties in Shamir's Government, which provided him with a majority of five or six seats in the Knesset, were to the Right of the Likud. They were named: "Tsomet," headed by Rafal Eytan, former hard line Chief of Staff of the Israeli Defense Forces and "Moledet," led by Ze'evi, another, former general who advocated the transfer of the Palestinians from the occupied territories to elsewhere...

Q: We call that process "ethnic cleansing" these days.

BROWN: Well, transfer was Ze'evi's expression, and he could cite historical precedents in other countries, including the United States...

Q: An example is the Cherokee Indians.

BROWN: Right. Another of the Right-Wing splinter parties was Tehiya, led by Yakub Neeman.

These splinter parties, and Ariel Sharon within the Likud, were harping away against Prime Minister Shamir's allegedly giving away the farm. They were calling for larger, not smaller settlements in the occupied territories. They were calling for much tougher measures against the Intifada, which, while it was showing some signs of fatigue, was nevertheless a very, very disconcerting phenomenon. They advocated stronger measures in Lebanon, where President Assad of Syria was squeezing the Christian Lebanese more and more tightly, thereby giving more play to what became known as the Hezbollah group [Muslim extremist group]. So Shamir's task was further complicated by this situation.

Having said all of that, I want to stress that, throughout this period, I remained loyal to Secretary Baker and President Bush. I was, after all, their Ambassador to Israel. I supported Bush in every way that I could. I often offered him tactical advice, as a professional Ambassador should do. This situation, where I had internal misgivings, was a very private thing for me. I couldn't go around sharing thoughts with others. I must say that, at times, inwardly and privately, I found Secretary Baker's style disturbing. It was tougher than I thought necessary. From his personal and private remarks to me I felt that his attitude toward certain Israeli leaders, as well as others, bordered on the contemptuous. I remember Secretary Baker repeatedly referring to King Hussein, when we were alone, as the "P. L. K." [Plucky Little King]. It was said in a tone of contempt.

Now, many negotiators, especially those going through a prolonged process of stress, will often lash out in private, so one should take my remarks as the listener or the reader wishes to do. However, this attitude of Secretary Baker's posed a professional dilemma for me. As I said, I was of the view, from the very beginning of my tenure as Ambassador to Israel, that a peace process could be put together. I had so recommended it to Secretary Baker and, by golly, here he was doing it! Baker had many balls in the air at the same time as he negotiated with the Israelis and the Palestinians.

In this context I mean the local Palestinians. Remember that our dialogue with the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] had ceased and remained closed at this stage, given the May 30, 1990, attack against the Israeli coast near Tel Aviv and PLO conduct during the Gulf War. So Secretary Baker had a great deal on his mind.

At times, Secretary Baker's attitude really bothered me. The dilemma is: what should he have done? He was moving ahead. The negotiations in which he was involved were leading to a peace conference, one way or another, which I could readily applaud. If it succeeded, it would give the Israelis a remarkable breakthrough in demolishing the long-standing Arab taboo against negotiating with the Israelis. However, I was disturbed. Nevertheless, what should I have done? Should I have resigned, should I have quit, should I have withdrawn? I felt: "No." My strong, private reservations notwithstanding, I should put my shoulder to the wheel and do everything that I could. So that's the way I conducted myself.

Q: Could I interject something at this point? To me, one of the great problems Americans face in dealing with Israel has always been a tendency to say to ourselves: "Gosh, we're not anti-Semitic. Therefore, we've got to give the Israelis the benefit of this or that doubt. I think that the Israelis realize this and have played it to a fare-thee-well. This was particularly the case with the Bush-Baker administration. They did not seem to be as disturbed about how they treated Israel as most other American administrations had been. We can talk about King Hussein as the "Puffy, Little King." We thought of the Israelis as the "brave Israelis." We often feel that we have to show that we certainly don't have a trace of anti-Semitism in our attitude and therefore have to be more forthcoming to them than, say, we would be to the French. Did you find this a problem?

BROWN: I would say, Stuart, that you are not alone in this opinion and in expressing it. There are many Americans who felt the same way and who expressed this in one form or another.

Going way back to the time when I spoke with Larry Eagleburger before he was actually nominated as Secretary of State and called on General Scowcroft before he was taken on at the National Security Council, Larry's remarks and my contacts with Scowcroft led me to realize that this was a new, or a new/old attitude, however you want to describe it. To put it mildly, this attitude might be summarized as: "No more Mr. Nice Guy." It ranged and was perceived by the successive Shamir cabinets as going much further than that. This was seen as coming from the White House and was not a creation of Secretary of State James Baker. From their various sources it didn't take the Shamir cabinets long to figure out that they had a major problem with the President of the United States and his attitude toward them.

All of that was to sharpen as time went on. I recalled previously how President Bush in my presence and in his office called me in and really pounded the air. He was furious at what he considered a betrayal of assurances he felt he had received from Shamir. Prime Minister Shamir had obviously put off President Bush with some such remark as: "The settlements need not be a problem." However this comment was worded I don't know. I wasn't present at that conversation. Bush took it to mean one thing. Obviously, Shamir intended it to mean something else. President Bush was really furious as time went on, and the new facts on the ground as Sharon and others loved to call them, kept sprouting up, our protestations notwithstanding.

By the time of the outbreak of the Gulf War in 1991, Shamir and company knew that they had a real problem. During the Gulf War itself the question of Soviet or Russian Jewish immigration and its implications had reached the point that the Israelis were asking for housing loan guarantees. What this meant was that they wanted to be able to go to the U.S. corporate bond market and float loans which would be, if you will, guaranteed by the United States Government. They had had enough support for this in a broad spectrum of Congress that they had reasonable hopes of getting it. Well, this wasn't happening.

In February, 1991, during the Gulf War, the then Israeli Ambassador to the United States was Shoval, whom I very much admire, vented some frustration about his inability to achieve movement on these resettlement loan guarantees. He was then and is now a good Ambassador, serving in Washington for the second time around. He may be nearing the end of his second term now. Anyhow, Shoval was a former member of the Israeli Parliament and a man of sophistication, education, and finesse. He had been successful in business and had considerable diplomatic experience. At one time he had helped found a new political party with Moshe Dayan. This man really had background.

Remarks were attributed to Ambassador Shoval by Reuters news agency, to the effect that the Israelis were getting the run around on these guarantees. Well, on the evening of Friday, February 14, 1991, as I was closing up my office in Tel Aviv and getting ready for possible launches of SCUD missiles by the Iraqis, I received a phone call on the secure telephone from Dennis Ross in Washington. Dennis Ross said, "You will go to Prime Minister Shamir immediately and convey the following message: 'Were it not wartime, and U.S.-Israeli relations being what they are, we would have asked for Ambassador Shoval's recall. His comments are outrageous'" and so forth. I urged Dennis to hold off and let things cool down a little bit before I went in with such a strong statement in the middle of a war to a government that was being attacked by the Iraqis. Ross repeated: "Deliver the message." I said, knowing that Dennis was Jewish, "You are aware that it is Shabath [the Sabbath Day]. It's after sundown on Friday, and you are aware that there is a likelihood of SCUDs being fired at Israel. This is not the time to do it. Wait 24 hours, after Shabath." He said, "No, no, it has to be done now."

So I called Yusip Ben Aron and dictated that statement to him. It has subsequently been quoted in Secretary Baker's memoirs. This was a brutal revelation or insight into how strongly they felt in Washington. It was a "gotcha" [got you] mentality. They felt that Israeli Ambassador Shoval had stepped over the line. Sure, he may have deserved a tap on the wrist. I wasn't there at the time. I thought that it was a brutal response. So it was delivered, but it was not a casual thing.

I could talk for hours, giving the historical background and so forth. The main issues were: would the Israelis agree to a Middle Eastern conference based on UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338? This meant land for peace. Would the Israelis agree to an international conference? For good reason the Israelis had a well-founded dislike, having been pilloried, over and over again, particularly at the UN General Assembly and in various specialized agencies of the United Nations, where the Arab countries would gang up on them and use their clout with the Third World, and so forth. Of course, the Russians and other communist states would just pile on. The Israelis had a really strong feeling about getting into anything where they would end up in the dock, as it were. In that situation the rest of the world, including the U.S. as the presumptive convener of an international conference, in essence would put the Israelis under the spotlight, embarrassing and humiliating them and forcing them to submit to the alleged will of the international community.

So the question was: would the Israelis come to some kind of international conference and, if so, where would it be held? From the Israeli viewpoint they had always wanted the action to take place in and on their borders. That is, they wanted face to face negotiations on a bilateral, official basis with their neighbors. During all of those years, given the decisions made by the Arab League and the very strong anti-Semitic, anti-Israeli bias displayed by all of their neighbors, Israel had refused to agree with such negotiations. The Arab countries carried these biases into the peacemaking process. The Arab viewpoint would be: if we're going to have a conference, it should be an international meeting, held elsewhere than in the Middle East. Such a conference ought to be framed in such a way that the outcome is territory for peace. That is, Israel should vacate all of the lands, of any sort, that it has ever taken, if you want the fuller version of the Arab demands.

The Israelis were not about to accept that. The question then was: would the Israelis allow Palestinian participation in such a meeting under constraints? That is to say, no PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization], because the U.S. itself was in a further bind on the PLO, because Arafat had behaved so badly during Desert Storm and was in the dog house with many Arab countries. Would the Israelis accept a proper Palestinian delegation which was not controlled by the PLO, which did not include Palestinians from East Jerusalem at this stage, and so forth? Well, examining these and other issues consumed hours and hours of time, with discussions, proposals, and counter-proposals being presented. Again, I reiterate, full marks should go to Secretary of State Baker for his patience, his tolerance, and his ability, as a deal maker, to set things up where he would lay out all of these Israeli objections and then work to demonstrate all that he had done and was going to do to try and meet them. He said that he would keep trying, but he would need more from the Israelis. He was a wily deal-maker.

Baker would meet with the Palestinians, criticize them for PLO conduct during the Gulf War, and tell them, flat-out, that the Palestinian Delegation to the forthcoming conference wasn't going to be controlled by the PLO. At the same time he would say in effect, "If you play along with me, if you'll go through the right motions and so forth, maybe we can get you more of what you want, if you know what I mean." You may remember my previous example, when the expression "self-determination" came up, he turned and said, rhetorically, "Why can't I use that?" The rest of the American team fell silent, and I finally spoke up and said that it would be political dynamite.

Meanwhile, Russian Jews continued to pour monthly into Israel by the tens of thousands, and the demands for feeding, housing, and employing these people grew. So the put down of Ambassador Shoval in February, 1991, notwithstanding, because the Israelis kept coming back to this issue, Baker, a former Secretary of the Treasury who had a certain knowledge of how things work and can work, began to intimate to the Israelis: "Well, you know, the way a loan guarantee works is that the United States Government guarantees it. However, these bonds are scored. That is, there's a charge pertaining to them, depending on risk assessment and so forth." Baker would say, "I have to tell you, Mr. Prime Minister, there are those who are recommending that the 'scoring' of these bonds should run at about 20 to 30 percent of their face value. There are people who would advocate that." In other words, if you want to borrow $100, it could cost you $20-30 in scoring fees. This, of course, would be a sky high figure. However, the clear implication was that if Baker had the wherewithal, he could throw his weight behind doing something about this. Baker noted that he was a former Secretary of the Treasury, and his best friend over the past 25-30 years was George Bush, who happened to be President of the United States. Then Baker would raise his voice and say to the Israelis: "Would you stop building settlements? Will you give me an ironclad guarantee that you will stop construction work on all settlements, including those in and around Jerusalem?" Of course, Prime Minister Shamir wasn't about to make such a commitment.

As that issue sharpened, so did the U.S. language and Secretary Baker's handling of this matter. That difference of view with Shamir's Government was to last through the whole peace-building process and afterwards.

Q: During the time that you were involved in this negotiation, were your people going out and checking on construction at these settlements?

BROWN: You can bet we were! In fact, the primary reporting responsibility here lay with the Consulate General in Jerusalem. The Consulate General staff was assiduously reporting all of these developments...

Q: The charge was made later that many of these settlements were put up but weren't fully occupied. Was this happening?

BROWN: Oh, there was a whole technique involved in settlement building. All sorts of things were happening. The standard technique, especially when the people behind all of these settlements realized that the U.S. was increasingly focused on them, would be for a small group of people to appear on a distant knob, some distance from an existing settlement. They would set up some tents and bring in a caravan, a couple of trailers, and so forth. After a while, instead of three or four couples living there, there would be 10 or 15 couples and perhaps a couple of mobile homes. Then a road would be built, connecting with a nearby highway or settlement. When the U.S. protest came in, and we were using satellite and ground observation to learn what was happening, the dimensions of this problem grew.

Remember, when I first went to Israel in 1979, there were no more than several thousand Jewish settlers living on the West Bank. However, by this time we were talking about 100,000 Jewish residents on the West Bank. It was now beginning to take on some overtones such as, "Well, maybe some Russian Jews would like to go out there and live." After all, there were all of the incentives. They had a practically free mortgage for the housing, commuter bedroom facilities, good swimming pools, schools, high tech employment on some of these sites themselves, and so forth.

So this was a big issue, and it got sharper and sharper as time went on. Indeed, this continued, even after the peace process began. I'll get back to that in a moment.

Another problem that reared its head was the establishment of the Missile Technology Control Regime. Already U.S. Defense Secretary Dick Cheney had had words in my presence with Arens as Israeli Defense Minister about the alleged leakage of U.S. technology through the Israeli industrial and military complex to other countries. There had been sharp words exchanged, with Arens himself taking part in them. Arens resoundingly rejected these comments by Dick Cheney. As I indicated in previous remarks, it's a terribly complicated issue, not just between the U.S. and Israel but the U.S. and countries X, Y, and Z, such as France or anybody else.

As a result of the Gulf War and the discovery of how far Saddam Hussein's missile technology had advanced, apart from the junky SCUD missiles that were being fired at Israel and U.S. forces, we realized how close he had come to developing a nuclear missile delivery system. This was coupled with the increasingly disturbing news on and about Iran and the flows of technology into Iran from North Korea and from Russian scientific personnel and establishments. The Bush administration was advocating something called the Missile Technology Control Regime. Under this program lists were drawn up of countries that had missiles and missile programs which had not conformed to our version of a control system which said, "Thou shalt not build something which can go more than 400-500 kilometers," and so forth.

Well, since Israel hadn't signed on to this control system, Israel began to appear on these lists. This caused the Israelis great heart-burn at the prospect of yet another, open split with the United States. Secretary Baker could play with this issue. On the one hand, he could say that this was a Department of Defense problem, and, on the other hand, he could say that it wasn't. It was not merely the Department of Defense which was involved in this. It was the State Department Bureau of Political-Military Affairs (PM) which handled the licensing. At this time Dick Clark was the relevant PM Assistant Secretary. Along with others, PM was putting out the preparatory guidelines which constituted a warning to the Israelis: "Hey, you either come to terms on this issue, or else..."

So issues like these were in the background of the negotiations which were under way. In the event, as time went on, Secretary Baker succeeded in successfully completing these negotiations. It was a grinding process. He made eight visits to Israel.

A great deal of showmanship was going on at the same time. I'll give you an example. Very often these trips by Secretary Baker were arranged on very short notice. There would be a brief announcement, we would get ready, and Baker's delegation would arrive in Israel. I remember that one of the trips was scheduled for Hanukkah, a major Jewish festival commemorating the rededication of the Temple of Solomon by Judas Maccabeus in 165 B.C. However, Baker's schedule was such that they had to come then, and Prime Minister Shamir met them.

On one of these occasions we had a truly great Consul General in Jerusalem, Molly Williamson. If you haven't heard of her...

Q: Has she retired?

BROWN: I don't know, but when she does, you will want to interview her. Molly had had some experience in Arab countries. She had also served in the Embassy in Tel Aviv. As I was coming in as the new Ambassador to Israel, she was in the latter part of her tour of duty in Jerusalem. I knew her very well and favorably. She was our first woman Consul General in Jerusalem.

In these negotiations with the Palestinians and in handling herself with Secretary Baker, Molly did a bang up job. There was one occasion when what Baker needed was a visible sign of movement, to the extent that one of the Palestinians was needed to travel to Amman, Jordan, while Baker was making his visit there. This meeting could be presented as evidence that progress was being made. The point could be made that a Palestinian was involved in the negotiations, and he or she had come over all the way from Israel, crossing the Allenby Bridge, and was in Amman.

I received a phone call from Dennis Ross in Washington at midnight or 1:00 AM, local time in Tel Aviv. I was informed that Secretary Baker wanted Hannan Ashrawi to attend this meeting. Hannan was a Christian Arab who held a Ph.D. from a U.S. university. She was a very outspoken lady and very critical of the negotiations. She was one of the nearly constant contacts of Secretary Baker when he visited Jerusalem. She was also one of the major speakers when those groups met.

Q: She was almost constantly on TV.

BROWN: She was on TV very frequently on this occasion and was to be even more so, as the peace process went on. Anyway, the word came from Washington: "Get Hannan Ashrawi across the Allenby Bridge and into Amman, immediately." As I said, by now it was the middle of the night, local time. Secretary Baker needed her there in Amman by the opening of business on the following day.

Well, as you know, the Israelis closed the Allenby Bridge each night, the Intifada was going on, and there were road blocks all over the place. The bridge was closed at sundown and would not normally be opened until 8:00 or 9:00 AM on the following morning. Dennis Ross knew this, and that is why he made the phone call. He knew that he needed me to arrange for Hannan Ashrawi to cross the bridge.

We got in touch with Molly Williamson, the Consul General in Jerusalem. I also got in touch with either Israeli Defense Minister Arens or some other, senior official in the Defense Ministry and asked him to open up the road blocks and so forth. Now, Hannan Ashrawi was not particularly keen about getting up in the middle of the night on the basis of a phone call from Molly Williamson, get dressed, get into Molly's car, go through a whole bunch of tough, military road blocks, to be delivered down at the Allenby Bridge and then run up to Amman. She might well have regarded this as an affront to her dignity. In the event, Molly Williamson had quite a task, convincing Hannan Ashrawi to agree to this. I was on pins and needles as to whether this trip would actually work out. So I did a great deal of almost continuous work on the telephone during the night, to make sure that if Hannan Ashrawi did get up and got into Molly Williamson's car, she would be able to cross the Allenby Bridge and travel up to Amman.

Sure enough, Molly Williamson and Hannan Ashrawi appeared at the Allenby Bridge in the wee hours of the morning. An Israeli Army Colonel said, "Bavakesha" [Please], and waved them across the Allenby Bridge. Hannan Ashrawi was driven up to Amman, and Secretary Baker's public appearance needs were met. That shows you the kinds of things that we could get into.

Q: I was wondering whether you could tell me how you saw your role at these meetings which Secretary Baker had. You were the U.S. Ambassador to Israel. Supposedly, Baker's staff was making arrangements for these trips. You had to run the Embassy and everything else.

BROWN: My role in connection with these meetings was to keep in touch with Yosip Ben Aron and Eli Rubenstein. Dennis Ross and I would hammer against their arguments. The exchanges would often get quite sharp. Prime Minister Shamir would sit there and, after a certain amount of acrimony and so forth, would say something like: "Well, let's move on," or something like that.

Secretary Baker himself would occasionally lash out, and sometimes he did this quite deliberately. He would get sick and tired of what he considered Yosip Ben Aron's and Eli Rubenstein's dilatory tactics. Baker had his own, if you will, Texas deal maker's way of emphasizing a point. I found that this pattern of Baker's was repeated later on in the context of a couple of other, really tense occasions. At the time we had no direct communications with Ambassador Ed Djerejian in Damascus. However, when I put things together later on and made comparative notes, I found that this pattern was not unique.

If frustrated enough or to drive home a point, Baker would snap together, very loudly, this folder he had with him, which had metallic edges, and Baker would then stand up. We were all seated in a tiny circle. Baker would step past a coffee table and go over and look at a map or wall exhibit of some kind. In Prime Minister Shamir's office there were always displays of this kind. He would convey a studied anger for a moment or two and then say, "If that's the way you feel, then there's really no point in going any further." Raising his voice, he would say: "Now, I've tried and I've done everything that I could, Yossi and Eli. I've met this and that request, but you keep on harping away" and so forth. As I say, Baker would deliver himself of a bit of a diatribe against them.

There would be a period of silence, and Shamir would then say, "Well, let's go on" or move the discussion onto a different tack. On more than one occasion Secretary Baker would say to me, and I felt that this was entirely gratuitous, because I was taking notes, along with Dennis Ross and others: "No cables or telegrams reporting this discussion, Ambassador!" Of course, he didn't need to say that. The Israelis were taking down every syllable that Baker was saying, and the Israelis were very good note takers. Several times he would make a similar remark when I was present in discussions with the Palestinians. He would say, "I don't want any cable reporting this!" I felt that this was a gratuitous slap at my expense. There was no need for it, all the more so because we all knew that, as soon as the meeting was over, the Palestinians would run out of the building, get on their cell phones, and phone Yasser Arafat's people at PLO headquarters in Tunis. Of course, the Israelis would be tuning in, so that a record was being made of the discussions.

Q: Was he saying that for some particular purpose?

BROWN: He obviously wanted things to be compartmentalized. I suppose that he wanted to let it be known that what he said to me in private, in the Cadillac, would remain private. In the car, he said to me: "I don't want the blankety-blank AIPAC [American Israeli Public Affairs Committee] and all of those Jewish organizations on my back." In other words, he was afraid of a leak on the way the conversations were going. Of course, I wouldn't have dreamt of sending a cable on these discussions unless it were a first person message personally cleared by Baker on such things. To do otherwise would have been unthinkable. However, there we were.

Baker gradually put this negotiation together. There would be a great deal of acrimony and a great deal of sharpness, particularly on the loan guarantee and missile technology. There would be a lot of harsh words about the continued construction of Israeli settlements or settlement outposts in the occupied territories. He took an increasingly critical attitude toward Israeli operations against growing attacks against Israel by Hezbollah and ultra-radical Palestinians up on the Lebanese front. Baker repeated the old call for moderation and restraint and expressed increasing criticism about Israeli Defense Minister Arens' handling of Intifada incidents. Arens was doing what he could, but Israelis were being killed, and curfews were in effect. Palestinian employment in Israel was cut way back because of the curfew and the closure of the border. These incidents on the border were by no means an Arens invention. The same practices were used before and later on by Yitzhak Rabin.

So there was a lot of acrimony in the air. However, ultimately, an agreement was put together. Then the Baker party requested that a couple of crack DCMs [Deputy Chiefs of Mission] be detailed to Madrid to help complete the preparations for an international conference in Madrid. These included my DCM at the time, Mark Parris, an outstanding DCM [later our Ambassador to Turkey] and former specialist on the Soviet Union. I'd recruited him for the post of DCM in Tel Aviv at the suggestion of Charley Hill, and it was an excellent choice. By now Mark had such a reputation that Margaret Tutwiler and company lifted him out of Tel Aviv to prepare the choreography for the Madrid Conference.

Well, the great moment arrived, and at a critical juncture just before the Madrid Conference, Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy, who had been having his running battles within the Likud and with Prime Minister Shamir, was angered to find that Shamir had decided to lead the Israeli Delegation to the conference himself. In a snit, David Levy boycotted it, which was okay from Shamir's viewpoint. So Shamir led the Israeli Delegation.

I went out to take an El Al flight to Madrid. As I was just leaving my office, my secretary said there was an emergency call from the Director General of Hadassah Hospital. I took the call. He said, "Your Ambassador to Amman, Jordan, has just been very seriously injured in one of your Embassy automobiles on the Jerusalem-Tel Aviv highway. Since there are no communications allowed by the Jordanians between Israel and Jordan, and we can't communicate with his wife or family, I need your authority to operate on the Ambassador immediately. Otherwise, he will die." So I said, "Go ahead."

With that, I ran downstairs with my mobile phone, raced out to Ben Gurion International Airport, and, from the side of the plane, called the Director General of Hadassah Hospital. He said that it was touch and go but the Ambassador would survive.

Q: Who was it?

BROWN: What had happened was that, by arrangement, he had come from Amman to the Allenby Bridge. My driver, Yosi met him in an armored Cadillac from Embassy Tel Aviv, took him from Allenby Bridge to the highway going up to Jerusalem which climbs very precipitously. As my driver was wending his way down, a recently-arrived Russian immigrant lady, on her first and last trip as an Israeli driver, veered out and hit the Embassy Cadillac, head on. She was killed instantly, and her husband lost his legs. The American Ambassador to Jordan, who was in the traditional Ambassadorial position in the right rear seat, had a waist seatbelt. The seat belt saved his life but almost killed him because in the collision the belt dug into his intestines. My driver and the female Security Officer riding with him were badly injured in the accident.

On arrival in Madrid, I was given a briefing by Margaret Tutwiler. She had our places laid out. We were literally seated on a carpet as she went through the scenario with her Southern twang.

She promptly and firmly told us exactly where we were going to sit as Ambassadors, what, when, how, and so forth. It was quite a show and, of course, she delighted in telling all of her interlocutors, not only American but especially Arab and all of the others, that the Royal Palace in Madrid [Palacio de Oriente] is: "The biggest palace in Europe!" She gave us the details as to how palace guards in their traditional uniforms would give their salutes to the arriving dignitaries and how the cameras of the world were all placed.

Well, the Madrid Conference was a great show, a great piece of choreography. Full marks to Margaret Tutwiler. President Bush came, with President Gorbachev, put in a brief appearance, and used an expression, "territorial compromise." This was fascinating to me because, like others, I suspected that what he perhaps meant to convey to his Arab audiences was, in essence: "We'll get you some land, but you're not going to get it all back." It would be a compromise. To Shamir's ears, nothing like that was good. He wasn't particularly interested in any more territorial compromise.

After months and months of negotiating, what we had in front of us was something beyond the wildest dreams of earlier, Israeli generations. That is, leading an Israeli Delegation, Prime Minister Shamir sat in a royal, palatial setting across the table not only from the Delegations of Egypt but also of Syria, led by Syrian Foreign Minister Al-Shara, whose vociferous anti-Israeli attitudes were well known. There was also a combined Jordanian-Palestinian Delegation. This was the subject of great controversy, acrimony, and negotiations, between Secretary Baker and the Palestinians, and the Palestinians and Jordanians and everybody else. The Palestinians wanted to be separate, but we wouldn't let them be separate. Once they were in place, they began acting as independently as they could, anyway. Hannan Ashrawi was now featured, along with Bibi Netanyahu, in the ongoing TV commentaries originating out of Madrid.

For almost the first time the Israelis were meeting formally with their neighbors, including the Egyptians, at an international conference. They already had a peace treaty with Egypt, although it was a cold one. Then there were the Jordanians/Palestinians. There were the Syrians and a Lebanese Delegation which was under the thumb of the Syrians but was seated separately from them, as if it were independent. There, on the side in swirling robes, was a representative of the Gulf Cooperation Council, an Emirate Arab. There was Ambassador Bandar, in his fine robes, a representative of the Royal Family [of Saudi Arabia]. He was the Saudi Ambassador to the United States.

There were also European Community and United Nations observers. Many of these arrangements had been initially strenuously resisted by the Israelis and certain others. Finally, it all worked out. As Jimmy Durante [American comedian of the period 1930-1960] used to say, "Everybody wanted to get into the act," once the act had been put together. President Gorbachev of the Soviet Union put in an appearance with President Bush. It was a sweet, yet sorrowful sight because Gorbachev was already on the way down. I note, by the way, that his wife, Raisa Gorbachev, died yesterday of leukemia.

The arguments presented were standard on all sides. There was no great breakthrough, in substantive terms. However, a key element here came into play, in the sense that a major part of the choreography was that there would be bilateral agreements reached after the end of this conference, to be negotiated in Madrid. The Israelis argued vociferously that they should take place in and around Israel. The Arabs rejected this proposal, and a compromise was reached that bilateral agreements would be worked out in Madrid, at least with the Syrians, immediately after the close of the principal conference. Then, later on, multilateral negotiations would take place on such issues as water, regional and environmental, and economic questions. So there were many breakthroughs in terms of resolving long-standing taboos.

Israeli Prime Minister Shamir turned out reasonably well in comparison with El Shara, who was chief of the Syrian Delegation. Shamir appeared to be quite moderate, certainly for Israeli home consumption. The conference was a magnificent TV sight for the world, including Israel, to watch. There were the Arabs with the TV cameras panning around the conference table. There was Israeli Prime Minister Shamir holding forth, as well as Bibi Netanyahu speaking to a worldwide audience to the conference proceedings broadcast from Madrid TV.

Q: What was Netanyahu's position at the time?

BROWN: He was Deputy Foreign Minister of Israel and highly articulate spokesperson for the Israeli Delegation. He was very, very effective, as was Hannan Ashrawi in her own way, speaking for the Palestinian cause.

A particularly nasty development took place on the last day, a Friday. Prime Minister Shamir took his leave on grounds that, as Prime Minister, he had to be back home in time for the beginning of "Shabat" [Jewish Sabbath] that evening. He apologized for leaving the conference and expressed the hope that no one would take his departure amiss. Once he left the conference, El Shara, the chief of the Syrian Delegation, with whom he had crossed swords during the meeting, made a particularly nasty set of comments and held up a "Wanted" poster published during the British Mandate over Palestine identifying Shamir by his traditional, Polish name. It announced a price on Shamir's head and said that he was wanted as a terrorist. El Shara said that this labeled him forever after as a terrorist. El Shara said that it was intolerable that this man, Shamir, should be lecturing the conference, given all of the horrible things he had done to Arabs during the years. He said that it was well known that Syrian and Arab hospitality had been extended to the Jews over the centuries. He said that Syrians and Arabs had been the most beneficial administrators of the territories under their control. Well, for anyone who had even a rough idea of the plight of the Jewish community in Syria, this was a bit difficult to swallow.

So there we were. The Madrid Conference was a great accomplishment in which the Israelis, including Prime Minister Shamir himself, could bask for some time. However, this atmosphere did not last long. By September, 1991, just before the Madrid peace conference, President Bush, with Secretary of State Baker at his side, had called for a 120 day delay in reaching a decision over the U.S. loan guarantees to Israel. Bush said that the extension of this loan guarantee was very controversial among the Arabs, who had the mistaken impression that U.S. money would flow immediately to Israel and would be used to build new settlements in the territories occupied by Israel since 1967. It was such a hot issue that Bush and Secretary Baker said, "Give peace a chance." They suggested a cooling off period, a delay of 120 days.

Well, AIPAC [American Israeli Public Affairs Committee] and most, if not all of the Jewish organizations in the United States, denounced this linkage between the loan guarantee proposals and the settlement of Russian Jews in Israel. The arrangements for the Russian Jews were specifically designed to settle them in Israel proper, if you will, not the occupied territories. These Jewish organizations took affront. They rose up in protest and gathered their Congressional friends and supporters. President Bush responded, I believe, on September 12, 1991, at a press conference where he pounded the desk and spoke passionately of “powerful, political forces” arrayed against him. He clearly was referring to AIPAC. He characterized himself as “one lonely, little guy” against these forces, trying to resist them and do his job. He went so far as to employ language about how we had risked American lives in defending the Israelis from SCUD missiles.

The whole situation, taken together, was very, very disturbing to me. It was part of a trend. By now I was coming to the end of my tour as Ambassador to Israel. In conversations with me Secretary Baker had asked me what I was interested in doing next. I said that I was fully satisfied, careerwise. To me, being Ambassador in Tel Aviv was enough. I said that I would like to stay on till the end of 1991 and then would be ready to go home and retire. Baker sounded me out as to what might induce me to stay on in the Foreign Service. I mentioned an assignment as Ambassador to Beijing, given my China background. He said, “Well, that's already spoken for.” I may have mentioned the post of Ambassador to Russia. He said that Tom Pickering [then Ambassador to India] was going to get that. Anyway, Baker said, “How would you like to be Assistant Secretary for Political-Military Affairs in the State Department?” He said that there was a large number of buttons on his phone, and I would have instant access to him. I said, “Thank you very much for the offer, and I'll think about it.” However, I had already made up my mind on the spot, “No way would I accept this position.” I did not want to work for Secretary Baker in the capacity of Assistant Secretary or, indeed, in any other capacity.

So I soldiered on as Ambassador in Tel Aviv through the end of 1991. The loan guarantee issue sharpened, the Intifada was significantly reduced as a controversy, but there were some horrible murders taking place of Israelis. One always has to emphasize that many, many more Palestinians lost their lives in the Intifada than did Israelis. The worst sufferers in this whole process were Palestinians.

I remember that in December, 1991, Israeli Defense Minister Arens called me in to discuss the Intifada. The situation had gotten so bad that he was considering the expulsion of some Palestinians, including some particularly notorious terrorists. Without even consulting Washington, I said flat out: “We are absolutely against that.” I made a telephone call to Washington as soon as this conversation with Arens was over. Lo and behold Larry Eagleburger, who was then Deputy Secretary of State, called Arens in the middle of the night to protest about reported Israeli plans to expel some of the Palestinians.

I would like to dwell here a minute on the position of Arens. He was a friend of mine. Professionally, I much admired him. There was a great deal of the American in him, by virtue of his upbringing in the United States. However, he was a 100 plus percent Israeli and he was hawkish. However, here was a man who I knew, throughout this whole process, was genuinely seeking solutions to the problems we were dealing with.

He never said this to me at the time, but he had privately decided, as I deduced from his body language and a particular initiative he was considering, to look for a way to arrange for an Israeli withdrawal from the Gaza Strip. Gaza, in his view, was not part of the holy patrimony of Israel, in ideological terms, as were Judea and Samaria, on the West Bank of the Jordan River. Gaza was an overpopulated, underresourced quagmire of no strategic value. From an Israeli viewpoint, he considered Gaza a bottomless pit and just a general pain in the neck.

Arens had taken an initiative under which he had summoned a number of Western chiefs of mission, myself included, and the Japanese Ambassador to have his experts set out a proposal under which, if they could get further, international backing, in fact, money, the Israelis would vastly expand a program which they had already started. Under this program Gazans in the refugee camps who wanted land for apartments could get it. This program would provide mortgages as a financial vehicle with which to construct new apartments in new areas and make it possible to get out of these horrible refugee slum ghettos. Existing accommodations, for the most part, were filthy, dangerous, and unhealthy.

There were already some Gazans who had opted for this new, financial arrangement. The Israelis could show us actual sites where such new apartments would be built. My European and Japanese colleagues remained absolutely silent when Arens raised this initiative with them. I've forgotten when this was. Perhaps it was in 1991. The French representative made a statement in which he said that he wanted to make it clear that his attendance at this meeting with Arens in no way endorsed anything that was said and that France's position remained the same on the territories occupied by Israel.

On this occasion, I recall asking technical questions. That is, what would be the precise nature of the financial vehicle that would be set up to make this program possible? I asked, "Are you talking about 'soft loans'?" Arens said, "Yes." I asked, with regard to the process of selection of the new occupants of these apartments, when would title pass to the applicant, and so forth. I promptly reported this initiative to the State Department in Washington. However, Washington appeared concerned about anything which could be remotely taken as retreating from the traditional U.S. position on the occupied territories. The Department did nothing about this proposal, and Arens' initiative went nowhere. However, it stuck in my mind as to how far Arens was willing to go to arrange for a decent, Palestinian solution, including the holding of municipal elections. There was a precedent for municipal elections, and Arens wanted to get them going again.

On this matter Arens ran into opposition from Prime Minister Shamir, who didn't want any elections with the Palestinians taking part in them. This was now becoming an archaic position, in any case.

So I finished my tour as Ambassador to Israel on a sweet and sad note - sweet in the sense that I had taken part in a successful initiative toward a peace process. This had been brilliantly orchestrated by Secretary of State Baker and his entourage. We achieved major breakthroughs. We got the Israelis what they wanted in so many important, symbolic terms. We eventually got rid of the much hated United Nations resolutions that "Zionism is equal to racism." We effectively broke the Arab League boycott of Israeli goods. Not that Israel was going to get significant, trade benefits from its Arab neighbors. The Arab economies generally were so poor and weak that, even if they wanted to, which they didn't, there was very little there for the benefit of the Arabs. The Israelis already had a lockhold on the Palestinian economy. They had developed and then maintained that hammer lock for years.

The really key aspect of breaking the Arab boycott lay with Japan, the high tech sector of the international economy, and the great, multinational companies, which in the past had occasionally been caught, pandering to the Arab boycott of Israel. The Madrid Conference, and all that went with it, and the opening of multilateral and bilateral trade negotiations completed the smashing of the Arab trade boycott of Israel. The world was now open to the Israelis, and they went out and sold goods to their key markets.

I retired from the Foreign Service in January, 1992. I received very nice comments as I left the service. Helen and I left the Foreign Service with a great sense of sweetness and considerable elements of sorrow over certain elements of the Bush administration's style and, if you will, its attitudinal problems, which I have just recounted. And off I went into retirement.

I went on the speaking circuit, which took me around the United States. It was a fascinating education for me. I received an offer to join the board of directors of the wholly-owned subsidiary of Bank Leumi in New York, known as the Bank Leumi New York. I was approached by a senior, CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] officer in the summer of 1992 to become a member of a unique organization. As a typical, Foreign Service Officer, I had no particular love of the CIA. I had no desire whatever to join the CIA, but this particular body wasn't "The CIA." This organization was called the "Senior Review Panel," (SRP) which came directly under the Director of CIA, wearing his other hat as the Director of Central Intelligence. This small panel was composed of senior, prestigious people, including two retired Ambassadors, a retired general, and a senior economist with broad commercial and banking background. Our job was to critique the development and the drafts of National Intelligence Estimates (NIEs) as an independent body, reporting to the Director of Central Intelligence. These NIEs were put together by the NIC, the National Intelligence Council, which is itself technically also not part of the CIA. We critiqued these National Intelligence Estimates, with our final comments going to the Director of Central Intelligence [DCI], who then convened the NFIB, the National Foreign Intelligence Board.

The NFIB was chaired by the DCI and included other top, intelligence agency people, who were accompanied by their "spear carriers." I never before, during, or afterwards learned of any organization in the entire United States Government comparable to the SRP. Let's face it. Bureaucracy abhors an independent review group, especially one which has the authority to report directly to the "Boss." This just runs against the whole history of bureaucracy. I was engaged in this job, on a part-time contract basis, from 1992 until the spring of 1993 when, to my great surprise, I was approached by the Clinton administration to go back to Israel for what was described as, perhaps, two or three months, but which lasted several months longer.

Q: Well, Bill, we'll pick this up next time when you received this surprise call in 1993 to go back to Tel Aviv. We'll finish that off and then we'll talk about your time on the Board of Directors of the American Institute on Taiwan.

BROWN: I might also mention a side excursion when I was special negotiator for Myanmar, formerly known as Burma.

Q: Today is September 4, 1999. Bill, would you like to say how you would like to frame things?

BROWN: Yes. However, I would like to hark back to one fascinating episode in Israel which took place in the spring of 1991. In Hebrew it was called "Operation Shlomo," which translates into "Solomon." This involved the movement of Ethiopian Jews from Ethiopia to Israel.

Q: These are the people known as the "Falasha?"

BROWN: Yes, but be careful when you use this term, because in Ethiopian I believe that "Falasha" has a pejorative sense to it, although in Israel they were commonly referred to as the "Falasha." In this regard, if I may, let's back off further. That is, Israel's relations with Ethiopia, on which I'm no expert. This takes you into discussing relations between Israel and Africa. The Israelis had been vigorous over the years in cultivating relationships with all sorts of African nations. Unfortunately, as we found out, so many of these African countries rapidly wound up as dictatorships.

Nevertheless, the Israelis kept their hands in African affairs, as we did. This involved a quest for diplomatic recognition, sympathy, and leverage in the Third World vis-a-vis the Arab countries. I would say that, strategically speaking, and from an Israeli viewpoint, this was part of Israel's overall struggle against Arab and Muslim encirclement. In parts of Africa there was a certain play there, because some of the African countries also had their problems with their Arab/Muslim neighbors, minority or majority, and so forth. In all of this I think that Ethiopia occupied a very special position.

I would say that the long-term Israeli goal from the time of independence was to cultivate good relations with whoever was in power in Ethiopia. For many years it was Emperor Haile Selassie. Then, when he passed from the scene and turmoil ensued, Colonel Mengistu ultimately took power. He rapidly became known as a "bloody butcher," as seen by the manner in which he quelled rebellion, revolt, dissidence, and so forth. He led a brutal, military regime.

I'm sure that the Israelis, like others, were unhappy about Mengistu's taking power, but they sought to maintain decent relations with him. Why? For the reasons I just mentioned, plus the fact that Ethiopia is on the Red Sea and in the Horn of Africa. Bear in mind that the Israelis had seized, first Suez in 1956 and the Sinai Desert in 1956 and again in 1967. In strategic terms Ethiopia is very important territory for them to ensure the onward flow of trade into the Israeli port of Eilat on the Gulf of Aqaba. The Israelis also attached great value to their dominance of the Sinai and the waters around it. In Israeli strategic terms this concern extended down to the Horn of Africa. In this context, Ethiopia was a very important place. The fact that the majority of Ethiopians was non-Muslim and Christian had value to the Israelis.

Then there was the longstanding, emotional, religious, and spiritual tie with the Falasha people of Ethiopia. There were thousands of these people in Ethiopia who considered themselves Jewish by historical, religious tradition. As far as a typical, ultra-orthodox rabbi in Israel is concerned, the Falasha people are not Jews in the normal sense of the word. However, politically, they were an important factor to some Israelis.

Q: There was the link between the Queen of Sheba and Solomon.

BROWN: Yes, there was that story from the Old Testament. There is a strong, Ethiopian tradition that the Ark of the Covenant is really in Ethiopia, having been taken down there. Anyway, Ethiopia was an important Israeli position in strategic and many other terms.

That gives some background why, when I arrived in Israel as U.S. Ambassador, the Israelis were still trying to maintain a decent relationship with Ethiopia, notwithstanding our embargo and our very strong stance against Colonel Mengistu. With that background, in 1990, when I was Ambassador to Israel, the head of Mossad [Israeli foreign intelligence service] called me on the phone and arranged to meet with me. I met with him periodically. In the room with him was none other than the Deputy Chief of Staff of the Israeli Defense Forces, Ehud Barak, who now is Prime Minister of Israel.

After an exchange of pleasantries, what they put to me was, in essence, a proposal for an exemption from the embargo on the shipment of American arms to Ethiopia. This was a typical Israeli approach. They knew how strongly we felt. They outlined their own desire to maintain a relationship with Ethiopia. They wanted to avoid some sort of a collapse in Ethiopia, which might work to the detriment of both Israeli and U.S. interests, as they put it. As they continued, it became apparent that they had already shipped what they called a small quantity of old rifles to Ethiopia. This was often the Israeli way of doing business with you. On the one hand they requested an exemption from our embargo on the shipment of arms to Ethiopia. On the other hand halfway or three-quarters of the way through the conversation you would learn that the Israelis had already shaved their interpretation of the provisions of the U.S. embargo on the shipment of arms to Ethiopia mightily closely.

At the time I told them that I would report their request. However, I gave them an earful on the obvious. That is, we had a very strong policy against military sales to Mengistu, the butcher. I use that as an example of the kind of debate that went on within Israel at high levels on how to handle a problem like this.

Now, by 1991 Mengistu's position had deteriorated to the point that the well-known special operator, Uri Lubrani, was involved. Lubrani had been handling relations between Israel and Lebanon for years. He had once been an unofficial Ambassador to the Shah in Iran. He was a very sophisticated and highly educated and articulate negotiator.

Lubrani called me in to see him in his office at the Israeli Ministry of Defense. He outlined the situation and the fact that he was in touch and negotiating with Mengistu. He said that, at an appropriate point, he might require our assistance and wanted us to be brought up to speed on this matter. As it worked out, Mengistu wanted arms, of course. He also wanted money and he wanted to survive. If he couldn't survive in Ethiopia, he wanted help in getting out of the country so that he could survive somewhere else.

So it was that Lubrani would fill me in on the latest aspects of the situation in Ethiopia. We would compare notes. On my side I had information from Houk, our Chargé d'Affaires in Addis Ababa, an outstanding officer whom I met briefly only recently. You might want to interview him. Lubrani and I would compare notes on Mengistu's position and so forth. Finally, Lubrani came to the point. Funds were deposited in a New York bank for transfer to Mengistu when, and only when, Israeli planes began to take off transporting Falasha people from Ethiopia to Israel. The precise date when this would be done remained a secret.

One day in the spring of 1993, I received an urgent phone call to go quickly to Ben Gurion International Airport. I saw all kinds of Israeli planes which had recently landed, including a Boeing 747 a lot of C-130s. I watched the last C-130 which came in that day. The rear ramp came down, and one could see a sea of humanity in the aircraft. The Israelis had taken all of the equipment out of the aircraft and covered the deck and sides with sheets of black, polyethylene plastic. The aircraft was jam packed with Ethiopian men, women, and children. The smell that came out of the aircraft after that long, long flight with no toilets was rather overpowering. However, it was a tremendously emotional occasion for all who were there.

The last man to leave the plane was a very elderly gentleman in a white, flowing garment and wearing a white cap. He was what the Falasha community called a "Kais," one of their religious leaders. He had a long, flowing beard and a rod or scepter of some kind. Thinking that I was an Israeli liberator, he embraced me, and we did a little dance on the deck of this rather pungent C-130 aircraft. We got off the aircraft, and I was all choked up. I was the only American present. This operation had been pulled off by Israeli security operatives. Shahak, who was to emerge as Deputy Chief of Staff, then Chief of Staff, and is now a cabinet minister under Prime Minister Barak, had flown secretly to Addis Ababa, set up a headquarters there, and pulled this operation off. In 24 hours some 14,000 people were airlifted out of Addis Ababa and flown to safety in Tel Aviv.

Q: And this was "Operation Solomon."

BROWN: Yes. There had been previous flights of Falasha people to Israel some years previously, in which George Bush, then the Director of Central Intelligence, had been involved. This was called "Operation Moses."

Q: His name escapes me now, but I interviewed someone who was intimately concerned with this kind of movement in the Sudan. That is, sneaking people out of the Sudan to Israel.

BROWN: And the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] was involved in assisting the Israelis in this effort. It was a very delicate business, given the attitude of the Sudanese Government at the time.

Operation Solomon was such an impressive job that I put in a phone call to my son Alex, who was then a career Air Force pilot flying B-52 bombers. I said, "Alex, you command a B-52 and are an expert on large aircraft. Let me ask you a question. In an emergency, how many people could you put in a Boeing 747?" My son thought a while and said, "Well, in a real emergency, I could cram some 700 people in it." I said, "How about 1,030 people, or thereabouts?" He said, "What?" I said, "A Boeing 747 has just landed at Ben Gurion International Airport with over 1,000 Ethiopian Falasha people aboard. Put that in your pipe and smoke it." [Laughter] It was really a remarkable achievement. Many of the Falasha's were very thin and emaciated, but just imagine what this involved logistically and in terms of planning and so forth.

The next subject I'd like to cover involves shifting briefly to Prime Minister Shamir, before I leave him and the peace process.

Q: Alright. After we finish that, I would like you to return to African and South American policy while you were in Israel. We haven't touched on that. I would like your comments on these matters. Maybe there are other policy matters, elsewhere in the world during this time, which you would like to discuss.

BROWN: All right. Before going farther down the road, I would like to pause a little bit and discuss Prime Minister Shamir and the peace process. I've covered Secretary of State Baker's eight trips to Israel for a series of grinding negotiations between March, 1991, and concluding with the Madrid Peace Conference in October, 1991.

Later on, perhaps after he had left office as Prime Minister of Israel, Shamir is reported to have said that he never intended to yield an inch of Israeli territory at the Madrid Conference. He said that he went to Madrid holding the position of a piece of territory for peace. He said that he would never have gone much further than that, nor would he have had to, since he had the ideological support of Likud and so forth. Later on, he was particularly critical of Yitzhak Rabin, when he took over the reins of Prime Minister of Israel and entered into negotiations with Yasser Arafat, the leader of the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization].

Shamir may have been correctly quoted along the lines that I have just cited. However, the fact is that Prime Minister Shamir had accepted an invitation to this conference, which was tendered to him specifically on the basis of UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, which amount to an exchange of territory for peace. Shamir was sophisticated. He knew by various means, through intelligence and political reporting channels and so forth, what we were saying to others, including the Palestinians, the Syrians, the Jordanians, the Egyptians, and the Lebanese. Shamir not only agreed to Israel's participation in the Madrid Conference but decided to attend it as the chief of the Israeli Delegation.

The Madrid Peace Conference was the center of world attention at the time and represented a momentous decision on the part of Shamir. I think that any reasonable observer of Israeli political life would realize that the Israelis were now on the path of land for peace. In other words, Shamir had accepted an invitation to attend the Madrid Peace Conference and all that went with it. He pocketed the tremendous gains of the Madrid Conference in terms of breaking the long standing taboo on official contact between Arabs and Israelis. However, the Madrid Conference was permeated with a land for peace atmosphere.

The Madrid Peace Conference was followed by the difficulties involved in the establishment of bilateral relations which went on, first in Madrid and then were shifted to Washington. There were multilateral negotiations, with the U.S. further putting its shoulder to the wheel and overcoming the long standing UN resolution that "Zionism equals racism." The Arab League boycott against Israel was broken. All of these achievements represented wonderful breakthroughs for Israel, but there was a price tag that went with this. The remarks attributed to Shamir and the tough language that many of his associates in the Likud notwithstanding, the fact is that Shamir put his country and his government on a path which would inevitably lead to just about where we are today. I think that that should be mentioned.

Q: Was that implicit, was that something which all of you understood at the time?

BROWN: I can't say that it was something that was understood by all Israelis, but it certainly was understood on the U.S. side. Among the more sophisticated Israelis, it didn't take much to put two and two together. The liberal side of the Israeli political scene was elated that we had maneuvered Shamir to this point. Since some of them are still active now, I won't go into any names. They included professional Israeli diplomats, who were tough, political liberals by background. They confided to me, after the Madrid conference was over, that only the U.S. could have done this. They had tremendous admiration and regard for Secretary of State James Baker.

Q: Do you also think that it took Prime Minister Shamir to take this step, as it took President Nixon to go to China?

BROWN: Nixon initiated the approach to China after receiving a signal from the Chinese. It was his idea and that of Secretary of State Kissinger. He wasn't dragged into making the opening to China. So this is not a similar situation. However, Nixon and Kissinger didn't go to China just on a whim. They went because they had a strategic overview which was very heavily driven by their perception of the strategic threat posed to the United States by the Soviet Union. This was the driving force behind all of this, both for the Chinese Communists and ourselves.

However, underneath the Middle East peace process there was a fundamental Israeli yearning for diplomatic recognition, for breaking through the long-established Arab taboos which I've mentioned. In one way or another the Israelis wanted to get their Arab neighbors to sit down with them, face to face, to negotiate with them, and to improve the Israeli strategic situation. Having essentially neutralized Egypt, through the Camp David Agreements, the Israelis undertook to deal with another powerful and increasingly dangerous neighbor, Syria. That is, Syria, with its newly acquired capabilities to engage in chemical warfare and to fire missiles, was not 600 kilometers away but was right next door to Israel. With all of its problems, and Syria had and has many problems, Syria was still in a position to inflict very heavy damage on Israel should, God forbid, a conflict break out between the two countries. So there was a combination of political, psychological, strategic, and economic considerations which influenced Israeli behavior. There were Israeli businessmen who thought that they could make money by trading with Syria.

Certainly, Israel's high tech industry was delighted with breaking through the Arab boycott and opening up new markets. The Peoples Republic of China opened up to the Israelis and recognized Tel Aviv diplomatically. Israel had long had a business presence in China. All of these were very important considerations.

Q: My question really went to Israeli politics, as compared to the political background of Nixon's policies toward China. A Democratic President would have had a very hard time opening up to China without having the Republicans pile on him.

BROWN: I see your point. An Israeli Labour Party leader would have been roundly criticized for opening up to the Arab countries on a land for peace basis, but Israel has a different, political system. A Labour Party leader like Yitzhak Rabin or, indeed, Peres, with a majority of the votes he needed in the Knesset, could have rammed this change through in Israeli style, as did Prime Minister Menachem Begin with the Camp David agreement. Some in Begin's own party, including Yitzhak Shamir, voted against the Camp David agreements. Arens and Shamir did not vote to approve the Camp David agreements. One of them abstained, and the other one voted against these agreements. I've forgotten which did which here. I'll come back to that later.

There is that difference. However, any Israeli leader on a major initiative like this will want it to carry the country. He is ultimately answerable to the Knesset and may face a revolt in his own party against such an agreement. Prime Minister Shamir had his problems in this respect. So the situation in Israel is not the same as the system in the United States. Yet the fact remains that Menachem Begin led Israel to adopt the Camp David agreements, and Shamir, of all people, led Israel to the Madrid Conference. The Labour Party then started with the fruits of this effort and carried them further.

Now let's shift a bit here. It's 1992. I've retired from the Foreign Service, and Yitzhak Rabin has become Prime Minister of Israel. The Labour Party's election posters said, "Elect Yitzhak Rabin" rather than just "Vote Labour." He was pictured as "Mr. Strong Man." He was pictured as the guy who would make tough decisions, in the economy and politically, and would carry the peace process forward on a realistic basis. He ran, of course, as a Labour Party politician on the Labour ticket. However, the message said in effect, "Elect Rabin, and he'll put together a government," rather than, "Elect the Labour Party and we'll put together a government, and Rabin will probably be the Prime Minister." The Labour Party won this election, holding 44 seats, as opposed to Likud's 32 seats. With smaller, alliance partners, that allowed the Labour Party to maintain a firm grip for a while.

Yitzhak Rabin, was a Sabra, that is, Israeli born. His father had gone from his birthplace in Czarist Russia to Chicago and then he migrated to Israel. Young Yitzhak Rabin had an agricultural education. He was a Young Pioneer-type trained in the Palmach resistance movement. He was a battalion or brigade commander in the struggle during 1948 to take the Jerusalem Road and to keep it open. He was Chief of Staff of the Israel Defense Forces during the 1967 War and was later Ambassador to the United States during the Nixon administration, after the 1973 collapse of Golda Meir's Government. Rabin served in the United States during the Nixon administration, so he had a wide range of very important American contacts, across the board, including Republicans. He had reportedly come out, and this was very unusual, in favor of Nixon's reelection in 1972. This, of course, earned him criticism.

Rabin was Prime Minister during the tumultuous period between 1974 and 1977. The American bank account of Mrs. Rabin became a scandal. [Residents of Israel at this time were not supposed to have foreign bank accounts, but she kept her account from the time she was in the U.S. with Rabin, who was then Israeli Ambassador.] Over time, Rabin's Government weakened and, finally, the religious parties pulled the rug out from under him. He was surprisingly defeated by Menachem Begin in 1977.

Subsequently, Rabin re-emerged as Defense Minister in the later Peres-Shamir coalition governments. He handled the Intifada in a tough way. He was reported to have said, "Break their bones," a comment which he later denied. He was known as "Mr. Tough Guy." However, remember that at the same time he was using my secure telephone to negotiate with Dennis Ross on the composition of the Palestinian Delegation during the Shamir peace initiative, in 1989-1990.

After new elections in 1992 Rabin swept into power again and set up a government. Interestingly enough, he appointed a lot of his old Army buddies to important cabinet and other positions. Danny Yatom, Rabin's military secretary, in fact became chief of the Prime Minister's office. Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, nicknamed "Fuad" because he was born in Iraq and spoke Arabic, had become a general in the Israeli Army and had been in command of the West Bank or a portion thereof. He became Minister of Housing. Ephraim Sneh, also a former general, was another minister in the Rabin cabinet.

The Bush administration immediately reacted positively to Rabin's return to office as Prime Minister. It had been charged with making statements and using sign language very heavily favoring the election of Rabin and against Shamir. There was criticism of that. This interference was denied, but clearly the Bush administration was sick and tired of Prime Minister Shamir and welcomed the prospect of Rabin's election.

Shortly after resuming office as Prime Minister, Rabin traveled to the United States and met President Bush at Kennebunkport, Maine. During this visit he obtained the long sought loan guarantees. In fact, it was reported at the time that Secretary of State Baker said, "For goodness sake, take more," when Rabin asked for either $2.0 or $4.0 billion in loan guarantees. This was said to be an indication that we hadn't been prejudiced against either Israel or the Israelis but that we had a problem with the Shamir approach to settlements in the occupied territories.

In this context I wrote a letter to the President of the United States. I was now a private person. I don't think that I can find a copy of the letter now, but I typed it up at home and mailed it to President Bush. (End of tape)

In this letter I said that Rabin's positive pronouncements came at a high, political price. By that I was referring to his remarks showing flexibility on the Golan Heights, on some territory for the Palestinians, on limiting Israeli settlements and on the kinds of things that we had previously and so assiduously pursued with various Israeli Governments. All of these developments came at what would have been a high, domestic price in Israel for any Prime Minister, including Rabin.

So when I wrote to President Bush, I remember saying, more or less: "Rabin has taken a courageous stance. I think that the time has come to move the American Embassy from Tel Aviv up to that site on which we have negotiated, on the Western side of Jerusalem. In my view we can do this at no cost to our traditional position on Jerusalem. By moving the Embassy to this site we can deal with the reality that the Government of Israel operates from Jerusalem, and that's the place to do business." I never expected a reply from President Bush and I certainly received none. As I said, that was written shortly after Rabin's election, let's say in the spring or early summer of 1992.

Now, I had just been approached by Ambassador Sam Lewis who, having become the Director of the U.S. Institute of Peace, felt that his pro bono position as Director of the Harry Truman Institute for the Advancement of Peace, under the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, might present a conflict of interest. He persuaded me to agree to succeed him as the Director of the Truman Institute. I did this in the spring of 1992, so I was in Israel at the time when Rabin was elected. That would have been the end of May or early June, 1992.

Later in the summer of 1992, I was invited by Martin Indyk, who was the Executive Director of the Washington Institute for Near Eastern Policy, a think tank in Washington, DC, to make a policy trip to Israel. This was against the background that Rabin was now installed in office as Prime Minister of Israel and that an American election was coming up. Indyk gathered a prestigious panel of advisers for this institute, together with and a group of senior figures who would go to Israel, engage in a dialogue with Israelis, and come up with policy recommendations. The visiting group included Madeline Albright [later Secretary of State], Joe Sisco [former Under Secretary of State], and Mendelbaum of Johns Hopkins University. It was widely speculated that Mendelbaum would become a key member of the Clinton policy establishment, should Clinton be elected President.

We went over to Israel and met with Prime Minister Rabin, with Peres, and other Labour Party leaders. We also met with the Likud opposition leaders. We had a separate session with the new American Ambassador, William C. Harrop, whom I had notified that I was arriving with this group and who had succeeded me when I retired from the Foreign Service in January, 1992. Ambassador Harrop briefed us at a hotel in Jerusalem. I sat in the back row and kept my mouth shut, which I thought proper. I wanted an appropriate cooling off period before I took public positions. I didn't want to get in Ambassador Harrop's hair. I had notified him that I was coming with this group.

As Ambassador Harrop briefed us I was disturbed that the facial expressions and body language of several members of this group seemed unfavorable and even negative to him. Comments were made on this afterwards. I said, "For goodness sake, what Ambassador Harrop said was essentially correct. Give him a break! He's a brand new Ambassador and is just getting his feet on the ground."

Q: In the first place, had the members of this group been almost pre-conditioned to take this attitude?

BROWN: I don't know, Stuart. This was in August or September, 1992. I was upset that, somehow, a sophisticated group of this kind would include people who were reacting negatively. Little did I realize that Ambassador Harrop was to have an even deeper problem.

Q: Bill Harrop is a very experienced and senior Foreign Service Officer. However, his attitude is not warm or fuzzy or cuddly.

BROWN: Well, those are your words, Stuart. I am not really in a position to evaluate them. I hadn't known Bill Harrop before. He'd been Ambassador to either four or five African countries, including Zaire. He had also been Inspector General of the Foreign Service.

Q: In fact, he was Deputy Inspector General. He was President of the American Foreign Service Association. I have interviewed him in this Foreign Affairs Oral History Program.

BROWN: He is a highly professional, experienced gentleman. I thought that he would do a good job in Israel. So I told this group: "For goodness sake. Get off his back!"

Q: And I think that you made clear that this was not a group that was sort of sponsored by AIPAC. Or was it?

BROWN: They wanted to take a balanced look at the situation. The Washington Institute for Near Eastern Policy was not an AIPAC group. However, Dennis Ross and Martin Indyk had been somehow associated with AIPAC, though not directly so. The Institute was funded by a husband and wife [the Weinbergs] who are pro-Israeli. However, to this day the Washington Institute manages to attract senior, Arab leaders, Ambassadors, cabinet ministers, and journalists to its meetings. There's no question that this group sponsored by the Washington Institute was pro-Israeli. However, I would say that the members of this group were moderate, experienced, and able to attract and keep an elite establishment in and around their ranks. So, to me, it was bothersome that Bill Harrop was inadvertently making a negative impression among some of the members of this group.

Okay. I continued in my retirement. As I said, I was working part time as a contractor for the Senior Review Panel for the Director of Central Intelligence. I also traveled around on the lecture circuit, was on the Board of Directors of the Bank Leumi of New York, and was adjusting to retirement very nicely and having a good time.

Q: I have a question on that. I understand that you have to treat anything dealing with the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] and the Senior Review Panel with great caution. Did you get any overall impression about the CIA at that time?

BROWN: I'd better be careful in the sense that the gentleman who recruited me was a very senior CIA officer. Therefore, he had access to the Director of Central Intelligence and the top brass of the agency. He had a long background in this respect. He also had long served at top levels of the CIA, or had access to the top, through successive bosses. As I said, the Senior Review Panel reports to the Director of Central Intelligence. The CIA officer who recruited me to this panel had direct and unimpeded access to the Director. He was primus inter pares, [first among equals] if you will. On the Senior Review Panel we were all equal, but he was the regular, the salaried officer, so he could and did give us his views of inside stories. As in any large institution, there are always debates going on, and all of this was fascinating.

Remember that our job on the Senior Review Panel (SRP) was to critique that National Intelligence Estimates, which were approved by the National Intelligence Council (NIC). This council was also mostly regular CIA employees who were assigned to it. However, the NIC was not part of the CIA and its budget of the Council was not part of the regular, CIA budget. Its budget, like our budget, came out of funds available to the Director of Central Intelligence, wearing that second hat. We in the SRP were working in the CIA building as part-time contractors who had clearances and so forth. It was a fascinating experience.

Q: This was obviously a time of great change. The Soviet Union had just gone down the tubes.

BROWN: Yes. As I came on board, William Gates, was Acting Director of Central Intelligence. Shortly afterwards, he left the agency and was succeeded by a series of Directors. First of all, Billy Inman [from the National Security Agency] was not confirmed. Then came Wollsey, Deutch [from the Defense Intelligence Agency], and George Tenet.

Q: It wasn't a happy situation. I don't want to lead you down this path.

BROWN: Well, I was enjoying retirement. Two of my daughters had remained in Thailand, working on refugee affairs. One of them married a Thai architect and had a couple of lovely little daughters. We had been going over annually to Thailand, at least for Christmas and New Year's, sailing and having a wonderful, family reunion. I might add that I love to sail.

As I said, with the election of Rabin in Israel, things improved dramatically for a while, as far as the Bush administration was concerned. Then came a sort of hiatus. Rabin had made his moves. The negotiations in Washington with the Palestinians and Jordanians were semi-comic in the sense that those negotiations ended up in a corridor, because the Palestinians, although they were nominally part of the Jordanian delegation, immediately split off and did everything that they could to ensure that they were dealt with directly. So Eli Rubinstein, who was the head of the Israeli delegation, often had to meet with the Palestinians in the corridor. The Palestinians wouldn't meet in the room with the Jordanians. Those old tensions between Jordanians and Palestinians kept coming out. The negotiations with the Syrians were going on. As I was on the outside now, I began to get a feeling of stasis, that is, there was not much progress being made in these discussions.

Meanwhile, Secretary of State Baker was asked to bear in mind the Jewish constituency and dealing properly with Israel. He was quoted in the press on this occasion as having said at some meeting, I think that it was with Jack Kemp [Secretary of Housing at the time] and perhaps at the White House, "Fuck the Jews. They don't vote for us anyway." This was a remark which caused quite a storm and which was promptly disavowed by Margaret Tutwiler [Baker's spokesperson], when asked for her thoughts on that particular subject. Anyway, this comment bounced around for quite a while. Whether Baker made this remark or didn't, it was reflected, shall we say, in the atmosphere of the time.

Then, lo and behold, Bill Clinton was elected President of the United States in the elections of 1992. Clinton relied very significantly, one read, on some of his friends who happened to Jewish.

With the inauguration of President Clinton came a new, foreign policy team. The Secretary of State was Warren Christopher. Sam Lewis, among many others, was named as the Director of Policy Planning in the State Department. Sam was a very old and dear friend of mine and my boss in Tel Aviv when he was Ambassador to Israel. If you will, he was my mentor. I was delighted for him, although I really wondered how he would function in this position, working under Warren Christopher.

Very early in the spring of 1993, as we were preparing a trip to Thailand and China, Sam Lewis called me and said, "Look, Bill Harrop is going to be replaced. The process of confirming an ambassador often takes months. Would you be willing to go back to Israel for a couple of months to fill in?" By now I was very much enjoying retirement and making some money here and there as a contractor. However, I told Sam: "Absolutely. Yes." I was thrilled at the prospect of contributing to Israeli-American relations, even for a short period of time under a new President.

So my wife Helen and I made a short trip to Thailand, to visit our daughters. Then we flew from Thailand to Kunming, China, where, as I speak Chinese, we were on our own. I didn't use a Chinese guide. We flew up to Chungking and took the famous boat trip down the Yangtze River, which Helen had always wanted to do. That was a wonderful trip because, floating down the Yangtze in 1993, we found that we were the only pale faces on the boat. The entire complement of passengers were from Taiwan, of all places. These were not highly sophisticated people from Taipei. These were more rough-hewn, wealthy, nouveau riche people from the hinterland of Taiwan.

Q: These people were also of Taiwanese origin, as opposed to people from the Mainland who had gone to Taiwan.

BROWN: Yes. They were Taiwanese. They were good, solid, men of the earth who had made money. They brought their local family gods with them! They had a little, canopied, thronelike apparatus with Chinese gods in it. They would take the family gods up on deck in the morning or at noon, as the spirit moved them, and pay obeisance to them. When we stopped in the Chinese river ports, they would go out shopping. It wasn't long before I was in conversation with their guide, who had a police, security background. He was in his 40s and was rather surprised to find out my background. We nattered away in Mandarin. He would relay our conversation in Taiwanese to the other passengers, because they didn't speak Mandarin too well. However, one could get their spicy remarks on the quality of the goods in the local markets and so forth.

All in all, that was a great trip. As soon as it was over and we returned to the U.S., arrangements were made for me to go to Israel. I was ushered in to meet Secretary of State Warren Christopher and had a one on one cordial meeting with him. I said, "Mr. Secretary, you probably don't remember me, but we spent a night together which, I'm sure, neither of us will ever forget." He looked at me in some surprise, and I reminded him that I had been DCM when he, as Deputy Secretary of State, had led the mission to Taipei following President Carter's break in relations with Taiwan and the riots which broke out. His motorcade was mobbed by a howling crowd. The windows of our cars were smashed and some sticks were jabbed into the cars.

It was fascinating because this incident had taken place in December, 1978. Here we were in 1993, some 15 years later. The question popped out of his mouth: "Do you think that Fred Chien was responsible for arranging this incident or was he just part of it?" Fred had been the Chinese Nationalist Deputy Foreign Minister who had been chosen to go out to the airport and meet Christopher. He took Christopher and his party into a VIP [Very Important Person] room and delivered a harangue on how badly the United States had conducted itself by this horrible deed of breaking relations with the Chinese Nationalists. This statement was obviously for domestic consumption in Taiwan. Then we got into the cars and were mobbed on our way out of the airport.

There were those who obviously had told Christopher that it was that "SOB, Fred Chien," who they thought had been part and parcel of this spontaneous demonstration of anger against us. Obviously, this version of events had been so firmly implanted in Secretary Christopher's mind that that question just popped out fifteen years later. Incidentally, Fred Chien and his wife never recovered from the view held by many key Americans that he had been part of setting up this mob scene. He always stoutly denied this. His wife still gets tearful over that memory, by the way.

Anyway, Secretary Christopher wished me well, and off Helen and I went, back to Israel. On arrival in Israel, I was able to say in Hebrew, quoting from the Book of Genesis: "Pa Maim Ki Tov," which means, if I may translate it a little freely, "And on the second day God said that it is good." That means that when something nice happens twice it is good. Within hours I was in the office of Prime Minister Rabin because another, great Lebanese border crisis had broken, and the administration was in frantic negotiations, trying to restore things to normal. That night I went over to Prime Minister/Defense Minister Rabin's office in Tel Aviv and was back in business.

This was the beginning of a remarkable period. I knew Rabin from many meetings previously. We had what was to be perhaps the most favorably disposed, American administration in history, vis-a-vis Israel up to that time. President Clinton's advisers, including his foreign affairs team, were very well and favorably known to the Israelis. Yet, there had been some stagnation, and we were trying to move things along. Again, I must say that, in the midst of all the sweetness of coming back to Israel, there was a sadness due to the fact that Ambassador Harrop had been removed, as well as the manner in which it had been done. I never did get the full story of why this was done, and this was a very sad experience in my view.

Q: Obviously, I don't know the whole story, either. However, I very much got the impression that this was a new administration which was really very nervous on foreign policy issues, even though it included people who were experienced in the field of foreign affairs. However, the political leadership, and especially President Clinton, had never had much foreign experience.

I heard that Ambassador Harrop had made a remark in Israel to the effect: "You have to remember that America doesn't have unlimited pockets."

BROWN: He's not the first American Ambassador to say that.

Q: No. But somehow this remark began to circulate. To me it sounded as if the Clinton administration caved in to the Israelis almost immediately. They didn't have much experience in how to handle some criticism. Perhaps this was a problem which occurred somewhere in the White House, although I may be wrong in this respect. Does that ring any bells with you?

BROWN: Well, Bill Harrop was quoted as having made a remark during a briefing or some occasion in Israel to the effect that the Israeli handling of the Arab Israeli minority would be on the agenda. Whether he said it or not, he was attacked by The Jerusalem Post at the time for interfering in local, Israeli affairs.

There was another phenomenon, too, which Foreign Service Officers find in many administrations. A new administration often finds that it is uneasy about ambassadors inherited from a previous administration. The view circulates: "This Ambassador is a product of the old regime," notwithstanding the fact that he is a career officer doing a professional, career job. There may be a little cloud over his head as a result. That, certainly, can apply in such a key post as Israel, but not only in Israel, by any means. I saw this elsewhere.

Q: It also happened in Central America.

BROWN: This also feeds into the view that the Foreign Service has either favored the previous administration or has been "co-opted. Within a new administration, the view is often held that it's time to clean house, or, "let's get our own guy in there." Something like that. It's a combination of factors, and it's something that career, Foreign Service Officers have to be very much aware of. You find a nervousness that goes through the ranks when a new administration enters office. The word traditionally gets around, although it varies with different administrations. There was a tradition that when a new administration enters office, Ambassadors are expected to tender their resignations, allowing the new administration to decide whether or not to accept this resignation. In other cases Ambassadors are told: "No, hold fast, and we'll see how it turns out."

In any event, Ambassador Harrop was treated brusquely and, I thought, unfairly, by the incoming Clinton administration. I didn't know the full story, had nothing to do with it, and didn't want to get into it. He must have been bitter about the manner of his replacement. The whole thing had come as a surprise to me, and I really felt very sorry for him. So, there we are. However, back to the narrative.

A series of Lebanese border crises followed. There was a sort of spiral effect here. The Hezbollah [an extremist, Islamist terrorist organization] was now very active and much strengthened in terms of its grip on the population of southern Lebanon, particularly in the Shiite Muslim community. It was being supplied and supported in many ways by Iran, with the acquiescence of Syria. Flights were coming through Damascus into Beirut, with cargoes labeled as one thing but actually carrying arms and ammunition and God knows what else.

When asked about these flights, the Syrians, of course, pretended to know nothing about arms cargoes. President Assad of Syria had no love for the Iranians. I'm sure that he had no love for the supporters of the Ayatollah Khomeini in Iran and what they stood for. Assad was a secular type of Muslim. He was particularly vulnerable as a member of the Alawite minority. The Alawites are considered by some of the Sunni Muslim majority in Syria as heretics. Not just different, but heretics. Yet, for his own purposes, President Assad has allowed these Iranian shipments to Hezbollah to continue. His obvious message to Israel is: "Come to terms or else we'll make it harder for you in southern Lebanon."

Prime Minister Rabin was a veteran of years and years of involvement in southern Lebanon, as Arens had been before him and as Rabin had before Arens. In all of this, by the way, I found Uri Lubrani working on various fronts. I spoke of him previously. He had a position in the Israeli Ministry of Defense. So as I saw Rabin in his capacity as Defense Minister, on the military side of things, I saw, as the occasion warranted, Lubrani on the delicate behind the scenes and probing side. Among many other things there was the case of Ron Arad. Ron Arad was the navigator on an Israeli aircraft that crashed in 1982. He was captured by Palestinians and was somehow conveyed into Hezbollah hands. Israeli efforts to negotiate his release through third parties, working through Hezbollah or the Iranians, were unsuccessful. As Lubrani informed me, the Iranians were a tough bunch of negotiators. They tended absolutely to deny that they were holding a given prisoner. Then one gets the very faint hint that it's really a silken carpet that we're talking about here and that there will be a very high price to obtain such a silken carpet. Well, I dealt with Lubrani on such delicate matters, as I had before on the Ethiopian front.

We entered a cycle of violence such that, by late 1992, it went off the edge of the table. Lubrani then gave me a taste of what was to come, unless there was a rapid "stand down" by Hezbollah. He informed me pretty clearly that in such circumstances the best Israeli technique was to make things very difficult for about a quarter of a million people in southern Lebanon, that is, for a very significant portion of the Shiite community. As a result, the Shiites would feel it necessary to move en masse toward Beirut, thus clogging the roads, choking the economic infrastructure, and making life miserable for everybody.

Indeed, that is what happened. The Israelis mounted an enormous bombardment by air and by artillery. They moved heavy artillery, including 175 millimeter guns and so forth, up onto the border and even across it into southern Lebanon. Night after night they answered the rockets of the Hezbollah that were falling into northern Israel in towns like Qiryat Shmona and Matula. The Israelis responded to these rockets by really pounding Hezbollah dominated villages and towns in southern Lebanon. A mass exodus ensued and, in this situation, Dennis Ross in Washington was on the phone to us. We were conducting all kinds of telephone negotiations. I was dealing with Prime Minister Rabin and Danny Yatom as his key military representative in all of this. The Israelis called their campaign "Operation Accountability." In other words, the Hezbollah would be held to account for what the Israelis regarded as their various attacks on Israeli targets.

This was a very difficult situation which suddenly came to me because, in the middle of it all, I found that Dennis Ross had a distinct tendency to bypass the American Ambassadors in the area and negotiate directly by himself and over the telephone with the parties concerned. By rights, I should have been included in the picture and I was quite willing to do what I could.

I also encountered a certain tension between the Assistant Secretary of State and Dennis Ross in this regard. The Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern Affairs, Ed Djerejian, was a key player in all of this. As such, he was in charge of American policy, made trips, and dealt with a wide variety of interlocutors, not all of them Israeli but also Arabs.

I received a call on the secure phone from a senior State Department officer. He said that the following information was for my ears only. He said that the Secretary of State had decided to replace Ed Djerejian as the Middle East negotiator. Ed would continue in office as the Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern Affairs, but the negotiating part of it would now be given to Dennis Ross. That's the way things were handled. Ed was informed that Dennis Ross was willing to stay on under the new administration, but only if he was made the Special Coordinator of Policy.

Q: When you say "negotiator," what do you mean by that? Who was negotiating with whom? Who were the parties involved?

BROWN: Israel, Syria, Jordan, the Palestinians, and Lebanon.

Q: They were all talking to each other?

BROWN: They were talking with each other. Remember, this was the follow up to the Madrid Conference on the Middle East. By this time you had what I called "general stasis." That is, there were acrimonious negotiations, and they were not really leading anywhere in dealing with the problem. The new administration was already getting restive, and the Secretary of State decided to appoint a new negotiator, Dennis Ross. When Ed Djerejian, as I understand it, was informed of this change, he extracted his price. That is, he would become the next American Ambassador to Israel. Having been Ambassador to Syria and having had a distinguished career, he would now become Ambassador to Israel.

All of this was in somewhat characteristic style. None of it was recorded in the cable traffic. It was all handled over the secure phone. Some crockery was broken in the process. Eventually, the announcements were made, and there we were. I think that we might break off here.

Q: Good.

Today is October 1, 1999, and we are continuing with the interview of Bill Brown.

BROWN: It is also the 50th anniversary of Mao Zedong standing up in Tiananmen Square and proclaiming: "China has stood up." [Laughter]

Q: For what it's worth. When you arrived in Israel on this temporary assignment as Ambassador, did you feel that you were putting things together or did you think that you were just taking over on a short term basis?

BROWN: Remember that I had left Israel only a year previously. I had visited Israel as a member of this mission from the Washington Institute on Near East Policy. I was Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Harry Truman Institute for Peace. I had kept a respectful distance from Israeli affairs because we had a new Ambassador, Bill Harrop. However, I was pretty much up on developments, as an outsider, of course, but one who had recently been part of the action. I had an advantage in that I had had plenty of interaction with the key Israeli figures, including Prime Minister Rabin, Peres, and others.

In that regard I think that it might be worthwhile to pause a bit here and talk about the composition, if you will, of the Rabin Government.

Q: When did the Rabin Government come into office?

BROWN: It entered office in the spring of 1992.

Q: This was after you had left Israel?

BROWN: Yes, after I had left. The Labour Party had come in with something like 44 seats in the Knesset. The Likud Party had dropped to 32 seats. However, Labour had put together what was at the beginning a pretty solid coalition. Remember that the election campaign by Labour had been conducted as a “Rabin campaign,” with very heavy emphasis on Rabin, as opposed to the more usual approach. That is, by tradition people voted for a given party, which was headed by X, Y, or Z. In this case Labour was headed by Rabin. Once again Peres had been, if you will, bumped aside within the Labour Party structure. He had to yield to an approach whereby Rabin, a tough man and former Defense Minister, a man of decision, and so forth, was very heavily played up during the campaign.

However, the initial government coalition was fascinating. The Rabin Government had a distinct, Left Wing, peacenik ally, “Meretz,” as it was called. Meretz had a hard core of people associated with the “Peace Now” group. Their line was: “Let's do it, let's get it over with, and let's give the Palestinians a reasonable amount of territory.” Even among hard core Meretz leaders, the view was: “There's going to be a Palestinian state. Let's negotiate on this reality.” It was a minority ally of Rabin, but it was there. This group was very liberal-minded in domestic, social terms and especially on pressing ahead on peace, particularly with the Palestinians.

Another, very important component of the Rabin Government was “Shas.” I've mentioned this group several times. Shas is the acronym for an ultra-orthodox party based on Moroccan immigrants in Israel. This party was led by a spiritual leader, Ovadia Yosef, former Chief Rabbi of the Sephardic Jewish community. Remember, in Israel there are two “Chief Rabbis.” There is, if you will, the Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi and the Sephardic Chief Rabbi.

Q: The Ashkenazi community is essentially composed of Jews of European origin.

BROWN: Yes. However, this is an intricate matter, and I don't want to go too much into detail, but Ovadia Yosef had a Moroccan base. He also had the benefit of having had Lithuanian, ultra-orthodox mentors as a younger man. There was some tension between them. On the one hand he was, if you will, a breakaway. On the other hand, he had had this mentor relationship with Lithuanian advisers. Therefore, not all of Shas could just be automatically pigeonholed under one rubric. Similarly, Shas' driving young leader was Ariele Deri. Deri was in his 30s. He paid total obedience, if you will, to the spiritual leader, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef. However, Deri was the day to say leader of Shas and a young man of great acuity and political dexterity.

I want to dwell on this a moment because there is a tendency on the part of many observers of the Israeli scene to pigeonhole and stereotype Israeli political parties. It is reasonable to do this to some extent, as you have to put tags on people and groups as you analyze the political situation in Israel. However, there was some fluidity within Shas, which ran along the following lines. Its rank and file members were basically conservative. It was a young party made up of young people. It was a growing party, with an increasingly growing element in Jerusalem. It was competitive vis-a-vis other, ultra-orthodox parties. It had managed to survive in different, coalition governments. In other words, it had had a taste of power and authority. Deri had come up very rapidly, nominally as a civil servant. (End of tape)

The Shas had gained control of the Ministry of the Interior, which was a crucial target in this party's political objectives. Through the Ministry of the Interior flow the funds for the "Yeshiva," the religious schools, and other, cultural institutions that Shas was building and expanding. Here was their path into the Central Budget of Israel. This was the price which Shas extracted from various coalition governments and still does, even as we speak.

Now, the rank and file of Shas were conservative. The leaders were, at times willing to be part of the peace front. The rank and file were, I would say, pro-Likud, as far as a tough line vis-a-vis the Palestinians, especially, was concerned.

Arieh Deri himself was close to and could bring along Ovadia Yosef with him to the line that what was good for Israel was what counted. If Jewish lives could be saved by sacrificing some territory and coming to an equitable deal with the Palestinians, so be it. You have to be careful how you say this, but they were amenable and flexible in that sense. Yet they have to manage a rank and file membership which, on the peace issue, was quite conservative and might vote for Likud.

Now, Deri didn't speak English. My knowledge of Hebrew was broken, but improving. As fate would have it, we came together on a very special, American issue. This was an issue which had bothered us for years. That was: the "Black Hebrew" issue. I can't remember whether I've touched on this previously.

Q: I can't recall, but let's go over it again, just to be sure.

BROWN: Many years ago a young man named Carter, from Chicago or Detroit, had a vision which, in very broad terms, was that there were the 12 tribes of Israel, and then there was the "lost tribe" of Israel. According to the tradition, the lost tribe consisted of people with dark complexions. Carter had a vision that he was the leader of the descendants of this lost tribe. According to this vision, they were to be gathered together and go back to the Holy Land and form a pure religious sect. Gradually, he took the name of "Ben Ami" Carter, I think it was. He went to Israel, nominally as a tourist. This began a pattern of American Blacks supporting him, often going to Palestine as tourists or visitors and then disappearing.

Q: What was the time scale? When did he first arrive in Israel?

BROWN: This would have been in the early 1970s, I think. Already, when I was DCM in Israel, 1979-1982, this group of Americans was a problem. As more and more of them infiltrated into Israel and went down into the desert area of the Negev, they began seeking odd jobs. This was against Israeli law. You can't get a job in Israel unless you're a citizen or registered alien, with working privileges. By the way, in Israel, which has a kind of statist socialist approach, once you're a qualified worker, then you're entitled to health benefits, so you're a burden on the Israeli Treasury. You're also entitled to education benefits, and this also is a burden on the Israeli Treasury.

Moreover, the Israeli authorities were disturbed by the character, as they saw it, of Ben Ami Carter's sect. These people said that they were the true Jews. When I first got to Israel, this sect was highly disciplined and very authoritarian in its leadership. They subjected their women, in particular, to very firm control. The net result of it was that, in consular terms, members of this sect, and especially the women, had to hand over their passports to the leadership. If they had any U.S. Social Security, railroad retirement, or any other benefits from the U.S. Government, they had to hand over their checks to the leadership. They were supposed to live an ascetic life.

For the leaders the concept was that an apocalyptic event would occur, fire and water would envelop the earth, and they would have to prepare themselves to enter an opening in the earth, which would then close temporarily behind them while the rest of the world was purged. They would have to fast, as there was no food. They would have to prepare themselves and subject themselves to the leader's discipline. Then, once the fire and water had subsided, they could come out and enjoy the millennium to follow.

In American consular terms, there were very disturbing reports that these American women were being subjected to a form of polygamy. It was also alleged that these women were forced to give birth to their children without access to hospitals. They were vegetarians and were very, very lean. They were making their living on a very fragile basis, producing handicraft items, doing odd jobs, and so forth.

Q: And of course the Jonestown example must have been hanging over them.

BROWN: Jonestown, at that time in 1979, was hanging over us. There was the implication that if they were mishandled, something like the Jonestown event would occur.

Q: Then the poisoned Kool Aid would come out. [A reference to the fact that the leaders at Jonestown used Kool Aid, a drink, to cover the taste of the poison being administered to the people who lived at Jonestown]

BROWN: So it was a real consular problem and also grew to be a political problem. In those days Ambassador Sam Lewis and I ended up dealing with a man who had a great, academic and political background, Yosef Burg, Minister of the Interior, who could, as I may have remarked, speak fluently and joke in six different languages. He was a very nice man but he never gave an inch on the question of the "Black Hebrews."

What we were trying to do was to have their status regularized and get some sort of recognition and stability for them, rather than face a situation where they could be hounded, rounded up, and deported from Israel.

Q: Why not?

BROWN: Among other things, I didn't particularly think that deporting these "Black Hebrews" from Israel would redound to the benefit of Israel in the Chicago, Detroit, or whatever other area they came from.

There were further ramifications. That is, African-Americans who had no connection with this group and might arrive at Ben Gurion International Airport would be subjected to extremely rigorous interrogation and body searches, out of fear that they might be "Black Hebrews" posing as visitors. There were several incidents involving upper middle class, African-Americans who were insulted and humiliated, leaving them furious with the treatment which they had received.

In any event, for several years we got nowhere with the Ministry of the Interior under Yosef Burg as Minister. He was a highly sophisticated gentleman of European origin who was well versed in dealing with Americans. Here I was, years later, as American ambassador to Israel, dealing with a Minister of the Interior who was 35 years old, or whatever his age was. He didn't speak a word of English and came from a Moroccan Jewish background. Lo and behold, I did a deal with him in the Dan Hotel on the beach near Tel Aviv. Under this deal I got at least $1.0 million from the U.S. Congress (thanks to Congressman Charles Rangel of New York) for an arrangement whereby a trust fund was set up so that these "Black Hebrews," who had large, accumulated debts to the Municipality of Dimona, for example, and to hospital authorities over the years, could settle their accounts. They had accumulated these debts because they didn't have the money to pay what they owed for water supply, hospital services, city charges, and so forth. This would ease the political problems of the Israeli leaders in the Negev down there which asked the question: "What are we doing with all of these Blacks who are non-Jews and outsiders in our midst in a situation where there is considerable unemployment?"

The Ministry of the Interior, in turn, could create a category which would be the equivalent of a permanently resident alien, thereby granting them working status which would then trigger health and education benefits. So we stitched this arrangement all together.

Now, Deri was becoming the object of allegations of massive corruption, through the Ministry of the Interior. Indeed, after some time, he was indicted. He then fought that indictment by various means, both legal, of course, and also political. The rank and file members of Shas felt impelled, shall we say, to charge that Deri was the subject of a political smear in order to put down the Moroccan Sephardic community. This case has gone on and is with us, even now. During this last election campaign, Deri, who had been convicted of the charge, which he had appealed to a higher court, finally, and as part of another deal, had stepped down as a candidate for the Knesset. However, Shas now has more seats than ever in terms of its representation in the Knesset and is part of the new government of Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

I am going into this tangent in some detail to inform the reader or the listener of this interview that things can get very complicated in Israel, as they do elsewhere. As I have said, you have to be very careful about pigeon holing a given political party and personality as once and forever this or that. I find that domestic politics and personalities can take you on strange pathways.

Remember, it was Peres' conviction at the end of 1989 or early 1990 that he had Shas in the position that he could bring down the very government of which he was Deputy Prime Minister and which was led by Prime Minister Shamir. He thought that he had a deal with Ovadia Yosef, and so did most observers. He and they were wrong. At the last moment, after ferocious negotiations, in which Ovadia Yosef was receiving Peres and Rabin on the one hand, and somebody else from Likud was on their heels, Shas stayed with Likud, the Labour Party was left completely outside the government, and Rabin was a very bitter man after having been ousted as Minister of Defense. He was extremely bitter about Peres for having constructed this disaster. In any case, Rabin had had a long rivalry with Peres.

All right, now it was 1992. Peres was pushed aside. The Labour Party won, and Rabin came in as Prime Minister, and Peres was back as Minister of Foreign Affairs. I would like to make a rough characterization of the Rabin Government election program, which was essentially as follows: "Look, we're going to have a reordering of the priorities around here. First of all, we're going to take better care of our domestic front, as far as employment and education are concerned." In other words, the secular program. Secondly, "We're going to have a reordering of the priorities as far as the peace process is concerned. We want peace. An equitable and a fair peace, and we are willing to make sacrifices for it, but we're not going to give the farm away."

The new Rabin government's attitude toward Syria was as follows. In effect, it said to President Assad of Syria: "If you want to do business with us, here is a new negotiator named Rabinowitz. He is our ambassador to the United States now. He speaks, reads, and writes Arabic and is an expert on the Syrian scene, among other things. We mean business." This meant "territory for peace." Regarding the Palestinian negotiators, the new government said, "We're not dealing with you as the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] but we're willing to go some distance here if you're really serious about negotiating with us. Of course, we are always ready for negotiations on the Lebanese front, in the knowledge that the Lebanese are in the pockets of the Syrians."

Q: How about Jordan?

BROWN: Regarding Jordan, the same thing. The new government was quite willing to do a deal with them. They made pronouncements that went along these lines. However, ongoing negotiations in Washington bogged down. Notwithstanding what I would call a very forward leaning position of the Israelis, Assad's negotiators remained obdurate. In short, they didn't reach a final agreement.

As far as the Palestinians were concerned, these were nominally local people. There was nobody from East Jerusalem, nobody who was a deportee, and nobody who was openly a supporter of the PLO, even though they were reporting, in one way or another, to Yasser Arafat. These Palestinians wanted to get rid of the Jordanians. They wanted to be treated as an independent group, the arrangement reached at the Madrid Conference notwithstanding.

So this negotiating process dragged on and on. There was growing frustration in Washington on this, as the new Clinton administration took hold. That is the background to this situation.

Now, in the meantime the Lebanese situation was constantly heating up. I described before what became of Operation Accountability. That situation was aggravated by Katusha rocket attacks on northern Israel, conducted by the Hezbollah, as well as attacks not only by the pro-Israeli South Lebanese Army, but also by the Israeli Army itself, in the "Security Zone" in Lebanon as it is called. The Israelis finally countered with a massive bombardment which forced some 250,000 Lebanese from South Lebanon to take to the roads and clog up the transportation system. In all of this we were involved in an intense form of negotiations, much of which was being handled on the telephone. At the same time I've mentioned that Ed Djerejian...

Q: These negotiations involved whom?

BROWN: This was Dennis Ross, with Secretary of State Christopher participating, but it was very largely Dennis Ross. Ed Djerejian had been bumped away from the negotiations, and Ross was appointed as Special Negotiator, while Djerejian remained Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern Affairs.

Meanwhile, I was in an even more delicate position because, if you will, on paper my reporting channel was to Ed Djerejian as Assistant Secretary, while the real action had shifted to Dennis Ross. In that capacity Ross was phoning Rabin and company, he was phoning Shara [Syrian Foreign Minister], he was phoning the Lebanese, and also getting Secretary Christopher on the line. These were open line and fast breaking conversations, conducted at all hours of the day and night.

I found myself in a position which became apparent to me as a trend. That is, Dennis Ross had a distinct tendency to jump over the heads of the local American ambassadors, deal directly with some of the other participants, and conclude things as he saw fit. In my position I really had to be on my toes to play catch up ball with him. I was in direct contact with Prime Minister Rabin, of course, and his military secretary who, in effect, was the chief of staff of his personal cabinet for everything, Major General Danny Yaton. Gen Yaton is a very unique personality and a can do man.[He later became head of Mossad.]

At the same time, I had to keep Ed Djerejian in the picture. There were times when I was frantically phoning Djerejian at, say, 3:00 AM, Washington time. When I couldn't get in touch with him, I called Dennis Ross. Then I filled in Djerejian later on. That was a delicate situation because, obviously, Djerejian had been bruised somewhat by this reshifting of responsibilities regarding the peace process. He was still Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern Affairs, and a very good Assistant Secretary. As I reported to him, there were times when I had the impression that he was very sensitive to the fact that Dennis Ross was really going off on his own, without directly informing Ed and taking more and more control of the process. Djerejian naturally wanted me to continue reporting to him, which is only human.

It was a delicate business. It was to continue this way and to grow as a trend. That is, for whatever reason or combination of reasons, I found increasingly that Dennis Ross moved to jump over the head of his ambassadors and negotiate, or try to negotiate directly with some of the principal parties concerned. I'm sure that for Secretary of State Christopher this was okay. He had to cover the world, and the Middle East was a very important part of it. Dennis Ross might get results, and so forth. Secretary Christopher himself was persuaded by Dennis Ross to engage in a form of shuttle diplomacy to get the negotiating process going again.

And now we come back to the old rivalry between Rabin and Peres, in Israel. Rabin remained a very tough guy, vis-a-vis the Palestinians. Now he was both Prime Minister and Defense Minister. He had a new program, and that program contained a distinct outreach element of approaching the Palestinians, resembling what had happened at the Madrid Conference. In effect, Rabin was saying to the Palestinians: "We're willing to deal with you if you get off your duff. However, Rabin felt a growing frustration that nothing was really coming out of this process.

Peres, in his new-old capacity as Foreign Minister, was wheeling and dealing with me, with Dennis Ross, and with Secretary Christopher when the Secretary came out to the Middle East. It was quite clear to us that Peres was always out pushing the envelope, as it were, trying to accelerate the process and to take new initiatives. In all of these meetings we never, ever met with Rabin and Peres at the same time. Never. That old rivalry and bitterness between the two of them was still too strong. When we reported an apparent willingness of the Government of Israel, as articulated by Foreign Minister Peres, to go far out, what you'd get from Rabin was a dismissive wave of the hand, a grunt, and negative facial and body language, as well as the necessary words to go with it, amounting to: "Oh, that's a lot of bunk." Well, Rabin didn't use the word bunk, but that is the impression he was conveying.

This contrast was fascinating. We knew, on a very private basis, that a couple of Israeli academics were meeting in Oslo, Norway, with some Palestinians, courtesy of the Norwegian Foreign Ministry. I think that Stoltenberg was the Norwegian Foreign Minister at the time. Larson, and Larson's wife, were the key operators for the Norwegians in these talks. Knowledge of these contacts was closely restricted and representative of the new era. There was an open track in Washington with a Palestinian Delegation, but it didn't seem to be going anywhere and we were content to see academicians pursue a parallel track on the side to see what the possibilities were. However, we did not have much regard for these discussions. We concluded that these were talks between a bunch of academic types, but they weren't going to lead anywhere. We felt that the main action was going on in Washington.

Well, I won't go into this very fascinating and complicated bit of history at Oslo. It's in David Mayakovsky's book, Making Peace with the PLO. You'll also find it in the memoirs of Uri Savir, who was the new Director General of the Israeli Foreign Ministry. You'll also find it in the memoirs of Singer, who was an Israeli defense lawyer and a long-time lawyer with a Washington law firm. He also worked with the Israeli Ministry of Defense. He had dealt with sensitive matters, including matters related to West Bank problems.

At the time this was not known to us, but the Palestinian representatives in Oslo said that they were speaking for Yasser Arafat. They stated that they had a mandate from Arafat and that they represented him. These were PLO people who represented the Tunis crowd. They demanded that the Israelis upgrade the talks in Oslo, Norway, from an informal to an official level. As I say, we didn't know this at the time.

Peres finally persuaded Rabin to allow these Oslo talks to be upgraded. As a result, Uri Savir went to Oslo, and Singer, the lawyer, also went to Oslo. As I say, we didn't know this. We tended, therefore, to write off these in Oslo. However, when I met with Peres, he was going farther and farther out in his statements to me about a deal involving an Israeli withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and a portion of the West Bank. He also said that the U.S. Government ought to get with it and join in pressing for this line of action. He felt that we ought to push Prime Minister Rabin. Things got to the point where, at a meeting in the VIP [Very Important Person] Room at Ben Gurion International Airport, Peres went so far with me that I finally said, "Well, Shimon, this is fascinating to hear, but are you representing Prime Minister Rabin in this respect?" He said, "Yes!" I said to myself: "Wow!"

I think that this conversation occurred just as a delegation headed by Secretary Christopher was arriving in Israel. I was sitting down next to Dennis Ross. I told him: "I've got to tell you that something is happening here." Indeed, I went back to the Embassy in Tel Aviv and shocked my Political Section by gathering a couple of my officers together and saying: "I have the impression that something is about to happen. Even though Prime Minister Rabin is dismissive in his remarks about these Oslo talks, give me a draft of a very brief formula for an Israeli withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and 'X.', meaning some portion of the West Bank" My officers said, "What?" I said, "I want something succinct on which we and the U.S. leadership can focus." I had that drafted and gave it to Dennis Ross. My own thinking had gone that far.

Now, bear in mind that I had reported that Prime Minister Rabin had been dismissive of such ideas, and particularly with reference to the role of Shimon Peres. There continued to be a stalemate in the Washington talks. This was summertime in 1993.

Q: While you were dealing with this initial period, how can you deal with a Prime Minister who dismisses the views of his Foreign Minister on something this important? You were not meeting together with them. At a certain point, in effect, you were asking: "Who's calling the shots for Israel?" What was your evaluation of this?

BROWN: My calculation in such a situation and at that time, and a good rule of thumb in general, is that, if there's ultimately one boss, it is the Prime Minister. Never forget this. You have to remember that, traditionally, from David Ben Gurion on, Israeli Prime Ministers, many of whom have been Foreign Ministers, arrogate unto themselves handling the U.S.-Israeli relationship first and foremost. That's the big game. The Prime Minister is in charge of the tough problem. In other words, what is he going to sacrifice, if anything, for a breakthrough with an Arab partner? So it had been with Golda Meir and so it was on down the years. Prime Minister Begin was a perfect example of this practice. His first Foreign Minister was Moshe Dayan. He got rid of him and replaced him with Yitzhak Shamir, who was, in those circumstances, if not a puppet, at least a "Yes man." Begin handled the problem of negotiations with the Arabs himself and the Camp David discussions in particular.

So there we were, and that was the trap. With that mentality and a pattern of Rabin being dismissive, if you will, of references to Shimon Peres and a more radical approach to negotiations with the Arabs, the fact was Rabin himself had a history, including a history of negotiations involving us, of his own practice of outreach. He was a very cautious, skeptical man. However, the lesson to learn from this is that even a very cautious, tough, skeptical guy can, in some cases, switch his position. And that's what happened.

In the summer of 1993 there was a short visit to Israel by the new Norwegian Foreign Minister, Holts. This lasted about two days, or something like that. I received an unusual phone call from the Norwegian ambassador to Israel, or maybe it was from the Norwegian ambassador-designate or chargé d'affaires. Anyway, he asked me if I could see the Norwegian Foreign Minister. Well, it's rather unusual for the Foreign Minister of a European country to ask to see the American ambassador in Israel. However, of course, I was delighted to meet with him.

I had a very cordial meeting with the Norwegian Foreign Minister at the King David Hotel in Jerusalem. He was probing on U.S. attitudes and looking for the latest update on the Washington talks on the Middle East. In the process he let me know that his wife had just published a book. She was a sociologist and had written a book about the plight or situation of the Palestinians, particularly on the West Bank, I think. Throughout that conversation I was saying to myself: "This man is really involved in this matter. This isn't just a casual discussion, for the record. This guy is really involved in the Palestinian problem." Little did I realize how far involved he was in this matter!

To make a long story short, a time came when I was suddenly called in by Prime Minister Rabin. Remember, this was in the middle of the process. We had had all of this shuttle diplomacy by Secretary Christopher and Dennis Ross. Things apparently were still stalemated, as far as formal negotiations were concerned. Anyhow, Rabin called me in and said, "Look, Bill, I don't want you to report this," and I said, "Yes, sir." I didn't report this conversation because I took him at his word, and this was the way he wanted to handle it.

Rabin continued: "You should know that there's been a breakthrough, and Peres is flying to California to meet with Secretary Christopher, and maybe Dennis Ross, if he is there." He then summarized the deal. I realized that it was going to be a hell of a shock if the American leadership...

Q: Well, you realize that if you reported it, this meant that, Washington being what it is...

BROWN: So I held my tongue because Shimon Peres was already in the air, en route to California, and I had promised not to report it.

There was a host of players involved in this, but another key player in all of this was the President of the State of Israel, Ezer Weizman. Weizman, a former, fiery hawk, had gone through an evolution since the Camp David agreements were signed, and now he was a dove. He was a tough dove, but a real dove. Weizman wanted action, and he wanted to be the center of the action, even though the President of the State of Israel is normally a figurehead who is supposed to stay above politics. Weizman couldn't resist involving himself in such matters. He would love to fly to Damascus and do a deal with President Assad, an old aviator like himself. Or he wanted the U.S. suddenly to invite him. I went through a whole process where Weizman's own Director General was pushing me to arrange for an immediate visit of President Weizman to Washington. He told me that Weizman felt that he had to see the U.S. President, but he must be invited, and then big things could happen here.

Things had gotten to the point where Weizman's Director General said to me: "We really have to have this invitation, and now!" I said, "Have you cleared this with the Prime Minister?" He replied: "Oh, yes, that's taken care of." I went to the Prime Minister and met with him on a one on one basis. I said that I had been told that Weizman wanted to visit the United States. I asked Rabin: "Is this what you want?" Rabin said to me: "There's a time and place for such a visit, and now is not the time or place." Now that's the kind of thing that you can really appreciate. [Laughter] Imagine managing this. Finally, Prime Minister Rabin said to me: "I'll take care of this," which is what he should have said, because I was in a very delicate position.

Anyway, a sudden announcement was made that talks were going on in Oslo between the Israelis and Palestinians. Washington went into a temporary state of shock and then, predictably, tried to recover in a way that tried to suggest to the American people and the world that we were aware of this all the time. In fact, we weren't. The shock, if you will, was the result of years of concluding, and rightly so, that such things couldn't be done without us. Over and over again competent people, like myself and certainly people even more competent than I, have stated, when all was said and done, that it takes the U.S. as an honest broker to put something over the top, because feelings and passions all run so deep.

However, it was done. In its attempts at recovery, Washington then instructed me to invite Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres to come to Washington to participate in a ceremony at which Peres, a Palestinian counterpart, and Christopher would participate in a signing ceremony. My outstanding DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] at the time, Jim Larocco, who, I think, is now still ambassador to Kuwait, said to me as I arrived at the Embassy: "We just received this. It's a NIACT [requiring action, even at night], Urgent cable. Do you want me to call Peres' office?" I said, "No, I don't want you to do that. I want you to phone the Director General of the Prime Minister's office and say that we've received this cable. Ask him if we should deliver the invitation to Foreign Minister Peres. Handle it that way."

Q: I assume that your idea was not to go directly to Prime Minister Rabin but to give the Israeli Government a little wiggle time so that you weren't looking across the table at Rabin when you broke the news to him.

BROWN: I knew in my bones that this proposal for a visit to the U.S. by Peres wasn't going to fly. Clinton was already President of the United States. This was big stuff! With Clinton newly installed as President, a ceremony where a couple of Foreign Ministers sign a peace document or go through a signing ceremony was not going to work out. This was presidential stuff. I knew it in my bones. I also knew that Prime Minister Rabin, and particularly his entourage, wouldn't accept the idea of Foreign Minister Peres running off to steal the glory. Invitation or no invitation. So I figured that the way to handle this was to feed it into the Prime Minister's office and they would do whatever was necessary.

Q: Where did you think that the impetus for this ceremony was coming from? Was it just that the Department of State was thinking small?

BROWN: No, this was a case of instantaneous thinking. We had learned that there had been a breakthrough. Secretary Christopher had received the word from Foreign Minister Peres. Therefore, in the eyes of the State Department, it followed that Secretary Christopher should meet with Peres and the Palestinians. You get into Washington politics here. Come on! So that's the way I handled it.

So DCM Larocco called the Director General of Prime Minister Rabin's office and said that Ambassador Brown had asked him to tell the Director General to inform him that we had this invitation for Peres. He asked him: "Shall we deliver it?" The instant answer was: "No! Hold it! Just wait!" [Laughter]

Some hours later, I received another phone call from Dennis Ross in the State Department. He asked: "Have you delivered that invitation?" I said, "Not yet." He said, "Well, forget that one. We want you to go in and invite Prime Minister Rabin." So I sought an immediate, one on one appointment with the Prime Minister. He received me in his office in the Ministry of Defense in Tel Aviv. He served me the ritual cup of Turkish coffee. With a cigarette in his hand, he said, "What's up?" I said, "Mr. Prime Minister, President Clinton instructs me to extend to you a cordial invitation to join him and Yasser Arafat in Washington for a ceremony commemorating this great breakthrough which you have achieved. President Clinton would be very happy to have you come to Washington for this purpose." Rabin took a drag on his cigarette, looked at me, and said, "You know, Bill, there's no business like show business!" [Laughter] So I said, "Yes, sir!"

Q: This was one of the great moments in diplomatic history.

BROWN: And so the Rabin visit to the U.S. was arranged. Rabin very kindly invited me to travel on his plane to the U.S., which was a very nice gesture.

I'll tell you about that flight to the U.S., because it exposed me to a unique window on the Israeli Prime Minister's VIP [Very Important Person] flight. The aircraft was a Boeing 707 configured for VIP travel, Israeli fashion. In the center of the aircraft was a small compartment with two tables, something like a Silver Diner Cafe.

Q: It was like a booth.

BROWN: Yes, a booth. It was one compartment, but it had two booths in it, separated by the aisle. Every other seat on the plane was, if you will, economy class, but in sections. The plane was jammed full with supporters of the Prime Minister and all kinds of very interesting people. In the Prime Minister's compartment sat Rabin and his wife, Leah. They faced a fairly narrow table, which might have been 2.5 feet wide. For a tall person like myself, you'd be touching knees with the person opposite you. Opposite Rabin and his wife was Motta Gur, who was Deputy Defense Minister and the liberator of Jerusalem, and his wife. He was suffering from cancer. He was an old stalwart and friend of Rabin.

At the other table, next to the window, that is, the position farthest away from Rabin sat Shulamit Aloni, who was the representative of a peace party, a highly dedicated lady who had criticized all Israeli Governments, including that of Rabin, for being too timid and for not recognizing a Palestinian state. She was a lawyer. On the aisle, next to Shulamit Aloni, was Shimon Peres, the Foreign Minister. I was seated opposite Peres. Throughout the flight his knees and mine were touching. To my left, at the window, again, the farthest from Rabin, was Yosi Beilin, Deputy Foreign Minister. Again, he was a dove, at one time labeled publicly by Rabin as Peres' poodle for his allegedly crazy ideas about giving too much to the enemy in negotiations. Yosi had been a critical figure in the whole Oslo process. (End of tape)

He had played a critical role in bringing the Oslo process to an official level.

We flew first to Amsterdam, and then to Washington, DC. During the whole trip Prime Minister Rabin sat there with a glass of whiskey or a cup of coffee and a cigarette, chatting with Leah Rabin and Motta Gur. Yosi Beilin sat next to me, reading a novel throughout the whole trip. During the trip Shimon Peres sat writing the speech he was going to deliver on a tablet of long, legal sized paper. He is a very serious man who was obviously struggling to produce the best, philosophical, comprehensive, political statement that he possibly could as Foreign Minister. Prime Minister Rabin's statement had obviously been prepared and was in his pocket.

It was fascinating. This was a long trip. There was a little bit of banter back and forth, but essentially there was no communication between Rabin and Peres, who were just across the aisle from each other. No communication whatsoever. At one time I wrote out, in Chinese characters, a piece of an essay written about in the Eighth century and gave it to Rabin, who turned it around several different ways and said, "What's this?" I said that it referred to great leadership and that I thought that it applied to him.

Well, after we arrived in the U.S., there was a great ceremony on the White House lawn. I want to add this. There was great euphoria, particularly among the American peace-oriented supporters. These included all kinds of kids in special T-shirts representing different faiths which were for peace. Now they were finally in the limelight. You may remember the photo of the handshake which portrayed Yasser Arafat reaching over, past President Clinton, to Prime Minister Rabin. This had all been arranged in advance. It showed an obviously less than enthusiastic Israeli Prime Minister, literally shaking Arafat's hand.

However, what I particularly want to convey here is that when I walked back to the State Department from that ceremony on the White House lawn, I did some real thinking. When I arrived at the State Department, I sat down in the office assigned to me, picked up a pen, and wrote out yet another message, this time to the Secretary of State. I don't have a copy of it now, but it ran along these lines: "I've just come from the great ceremony which you and the President attended. I would say that Prime Minister Rabin has once again demonstrated great, political courage. This is a risky endeavor to which he has now publicly subscribed. I think that, as part of our effort to bolster him and encourage him to move forward, the time has come to move the American Embassy in Israel to the Western part of Jerusalem, where we have a site which has already been negotiated for a diplomatic facility. I gave that handwritten letter to Ed Djerejian, Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern Affairs, to pass up the chain of command.

Well, it was the subject of an animated, spirited, stand-up conversation between Dennis Ross, myself, and Martin Indyk. I think that Ambassador Sam Lewis and some others were standing by. During this conversation I was obviously in a distinct minority. Dennis called this proposal “idiotic, absolute foolishness” at that juncture, using the standard argument that we should save that possible, American move for the very end of the peace process, as a way of putting it over the top.

For my part, I argued that the time was right, and there will always be 111 reasons why we should not move the American Embassy to Jerusalem. I said that the time was right for several reasons. I had in mind the political grounds, for the reasons I just set forth. I had in mind the security grounds, meaning physical security. I had in mind efficiency, manpower, and a whole complex of other reasons as well. Needless to say, that effort went nowhere.

It is interesting that, meanwhile, the United States Congress has moved to a similar position and that certain Presidential candidates, including President Clinton himself, have adopted this position, but that's politics.

Well, there is one other subject that I would like to cover. From the beginning of his new tenure as Prime Minister, Rabin set forth a new set of priorities which provided that, as far as settlements in the occupied territories were concerned, there should be no, new settlements. As far as his efforts to straddle the issue are concerned, there were such strong feelings and differences of opinion on this subject that he had the existing settlements re-categorized into security and non-security divisions. The thrust of this new categorization was that, henceforth, no more public monies would go into non-security establishments. That is, those which were far out, obviously political statements, as opposed to those which, it could be argued, were essential to the security of Jerusalem, the roads leading up to and down from Jerusalem, and the overall security of the country.

That statement immediately triggered the usual uproar in those settlements which were categorized as non-security establishments, as well as efforts to include other settlements in the security category. This meant money, not only for existing facilities, but subsidies for mortgages, and continued growth in terms of infrastructure, roads, and buildings.

The Palestinians, of course, denounced all of this, and it has a certain relevance today, as we speak. Here we are with the Barak Government in 1999. I read in the news the other day that a Palestinian negotiator had said, “This continued expansion of Israeli settlements will kill the whole arrangement.” In reply, Barak's spokesman said, “We're not talking about new settlements. We're talking about the natural growth and expansion of existing settlements, which are vital to our security.” It was a familiar line.

That takes us way back to the early foundation of Israel and its development. It started with Galilee within Israel proper and within the Green Line. It was a standard, Zionist practice, from the very beginning, to put settlements up on high ground, in strategic passes and so forth, as a marker showing that: “This is ours. We're not leaving here. If push comes to shove, we have the high ground and we will dominate the area around it.”

Q: It was very clear in the 1948 battle for Jerusalem.

BROWN: Later on, when a weak Rabin Government permitted a settlers' group to establish themselves on the West Bank of the Jordan River, that was the nucleus from which emerged the situation when I came back to Israel as ambassador. At this time there were 110,000 or 120,000 people living in these settlements on the West Bank and, to a lesser degree, in the Gaza Strip.

This also fits into an Israeli mentality of negotiations. These are tough enemies that they were dealing with. The Israelis felt that one of the best ways to handle this is simply to continue to develop your strength and let your enemies see it. You create "facts on the ground," as the expression has it. If you're a negotiator, whether you say it or not, the implicit message is: "You'd better negotiate while there's something left to negotiate. If you don't negotiate in good faith, there's going to be more and more of this." This practice has caused great agony among Palestinians and Palestinian negotiators. That pattern of negotiations is still very much there.

A second element that I would point out is that, within this new prioritization announced by Rabin, the development of what the U.S. would call settlements in and around Jerusalem continued apace. Indeed, this situation got to the point where I went to the new Minister of Housing, "Fuad," or Benyamin Eleazar, who was born in Iraq who had a military career. He was one of those former military associates of Rabin, in whom Rabin placed trust. Now he was Minister of Housing. He laid the situation right out. In fact, he gave me a map which, when transmitted to Washington, caused a great commotion. It was his updated map of the plan of "Greater Jerusalem," or, if you will, "Municipal Jerusalem." It was the expanded Jerusalem developed with ongoing funds, bulldozing, and so forth. When I talked to him about this, he said, "I'm not trying to put anything over on you. This has always been our plan. It is part of the Labour Party platform. We are merely implementing it. We never said anything about stopping the construction of normal housing developments here in Jerusalem, which has been and will remain unified." He didn't say this, but this is what had been done by previous, Israeli Governments. This is something which is vexing to the Palestinians, to put it mildly. But there it is. And it's there now as we speak, on October 1, 1999.

Bear in mind that when you pigeonhole political parties and party positions, right up to now it has been a Labour Party position that, whatever is done in terms of the staged withdrawal from the West Bank of the Jordan River area and the final settlement with the Palestinians, the Israelis continue to implement their agenda, which includes strengthening Jewish housing settlements in and immediately around Jerusalem. Even the definition of Jerusalem has an increasingly Greater Jerusalem character.

For example, the settlement of Ma'ale Adomin now has more than 20,000 people living there. It is a five or 10 minutes drive from the center of Jerusalem. It started on a barren ridge where some Bedouin goatherds lived. Over time it has grown to be a tremendous community. No Israeli leader that I know of has any idea of a pullback from Ma'ale Adomin or similar settlements in the residential block around there.

All of the Jews now living on the West Bank vote. I don't know what the Jewish population of the West Bank is, but I would say that it is probably now about 130,000 people. These people have full voting rights. So when you get into an election, a referendum, or a fight in the Knesset on assets, one has to remember that the people living in West Bank settlements are a very important, political group.

Ed Djerejian, the new Ambassador-designate to Israel, and I had long agreed that we would spend Christmas in our respective households, he in Washington and I in Israel. I said that I would leave Israel shortly after January 1, 1994, which I did, and then returned to retired status in the U.S. At this time I joined the board of the Israel Discount Bank of New York, which is registered in New York. It is a very conservative and successful bank and a subsidiary of the Israel Discount Bank of Tel Aviv. I did more public speaking and went back for a while to my duties in the small Senior Review Panel at CIA, reporting to the Director of Central Intelligence. I was there through 1997.

Meanwhile, I again became the pro bono Chairman of the Board of the Truman Institute for Peace in Jerusalem. However, in June, 1996 I was asked to go out with Stanley Roth as a Special Envoy on the Burma question. Maybe we can touch on that later.

Q: Yes. Okay, we'll stop here and pick up the Burma question the next time we meet. I also wanted to ask when Jordan abandoned the West Bank.

BROWN: Jordan lost the West Bank in the War of 1967.

Q: I mean the official relationship between Jordan and the West Bank.

BROWN: In 1988 King Hussein, somewhat to the surprise of others, said in effect, "All right, we're now disengaging from the West Bank," although he remained the protector of Islamic rights in Jerusalem.

Q: Jordan isn't mentioned much in the current context. I take it that...

BROWN: Before I close this section, let me mention the Jordanian aspect here. When Rabin reached agreement with the Palestinians, there was also a dramatic breakthrough with the Jordanians, and this was no accident. The Israelis and the Jordanians watch each other very, very carefully. Prime Minister Rabin called me in one day, when I was scheduled to fly to Antalya, Turkey, and do a 10-day cruise on a sailboat. Rabin asked to see me alone, so I knew that it was important. I took Jim Larocco, my DCM, with me and told him to wait outside the Ministry of Defense.

I went to Rabin's office, and he said, "I want to tell you that I've met with King Hussein and have worked out a deal. Here is the outline of the deal." He showed me a document outlining its provisions and summarized the negotiations. He said, "If you want, you can go next door, sit in Danny Yatom's office, and read this document. However, I'm not going to give you a piece of paper. I ask you to handle this on a very confidential basis, because I promised the King that I would handle it this way." So I moved with Danny Yatom to his cubbyhole office next to Rabin's office in the Defense Ministry, and I absorbed the outline of the agreement as rapidly as I could. The outline was a convoluted document which had been submitted and made a part of the record by the King's brother and at the time his nominal successor, Crown Prince Hassan. [Hassan was later passed over in favor of Abdullah who became King]

Anyhow, I memorized the document as best I could. Then I met my DCM and headed for the plane which was to take me to Turkey. I said, "I'm just going to describe this. Take notes as well as you can and report this to Washington. A deal has been made between Israel and Jordan. Here is how it was done." Rabin had used the Deputy Director [later Director] of the MOSSAD, [Israeli foreign intelligence organization], Efraim Levy, as his key adviser. Not a Foreign Ministry officer. This was a typical Rabin maneuver.

PHILIPPE DU CHATEAU
Chief, American Cultural Center, USIS
Tel Aviv (1988-1992)

Mr. du Chateau was born in Illinois and raised in Illinois and Indiana. He was educated at the Universities of Indiana, Cornell and Harvard, and Middlebury College. From 1973 to 1977 he worked with the US Information Service in the Soviet Union, joining its Foreign Service in 1979. Mr. du Chateau served several tours at USIA's Headquarters in Washington, DC. His foreign assignments include Sofia, Moscow, Tel Aviv and Helsinki. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2011.

Q: You were there from when to when?

DU CHATEAU: We were there for four years, from the summer of 1988 to the 1992 summer transfer cycle. You know, everything about Jerusalem is unique, not by the rules, so of course I had a very unusual job.

I was assigned to the Tel Aviv embassy, not the consulate in Jerusalem, which had, probably still has, a special status, and I was accredited to the government of Israel.

My job was to run the American Cultural Center in Jerusalem, which was a branch of USIS Tel Aviv. The embassy had this center in Jerusalem because of the importance of the city. Whatever we officially thought, it's the capital of Israel.

Because I was accredited to the GOI, the government of Israel, I could take visitors into the various government offices and into the prime minister's office, what have you. We were also delivering the Wireless File and other material all over the Israeli side of Jerusalem. The university was part of my domain also. So when someone like Dr. Reich came to Israel, my staff would make all the arrangement for Jerusalem, all the appointments, and I would accompany.

But my boss the Public Affairs Officer was forty miles away in Tel Aviv. Occasionally he would come up, maybe twice a year, and I went down for weekly staff meetings in the embassy and then go shopping in the embassy commissary, and that was about it. So from a work point of view the ACC was completely independent, certainly in the sense of day-to-day work. As I recall, we had an arrangement where we could get our cables and mail at the consulate. Its main building was really just around the corner, a 5-minute walk away, and I would go over to get cables.

I had an absolutely terrific staff - I was so fortunate. All were Israeli Jews, none of them were American citizens. I guess all except Sami, our courier, were dual citizens. One was a Canadian citizen, she was the head of the team. Others were from Australia or South Africa, Britain. At that time we could not employ local Americans in the embassy for whatever reason, though I think that's changed. Anyhow, they ran the political gamut and religious gamut from the Australian guy who was a conscientious objector, which is extremely difficult to be in Israel as everybody, certainly every male, serves in the military if they don't have a religious exemption, all the way through several of the staff who were ultra-Orthodox. One of the ultra-Orthodox, Sara, she ran the place, she was the manager of the office, really good at computers, and just an amazing lady, and she had at least nine children.

There was a similar center down in the embassy building as part of USIS Tel Aviv. That was closed a few years ago because of budget cuts, but the ACC Jerusalem still exists, I looked it up on the Internet the other day. Like Tel Aviv, we ran a research and lending library, we had visiting speakers, we had a nice place for presentations inside the library. The staff members were in constant contact with people in the ministries, who would call to ask research questions.

We supported the consulate, which was just around the corner, with things like the Wireless File and copies of daily news videotapes that we took down on our recording system, but they were entirely separate. I couldn't work for the consulate, though they did do maintenance for the ACC.

Often our visitors would have an East Jerusalem program and the Jerusalem PAO, David Good, who was there our first year, or Gil Sherman, would handle their side of the city. Gil, he and his wife, we were close. We worked together for three years. They both were FSOs, he for USIA and she was the head of the Consular Section. They had two girls who looked after Guzel from time to time. From Jerusalem, after we left, they went to Cairo, and Donna had an aneurism and suddenly died. That was horrible enough, but then Gil died about a year later. I think it was from grief, although he was a diabetic and that was probably the official cause. They were wonderful people. I have a picture, a photo I took of Gil on our wall at home from a wonderful day when we walked down the Kidron Valley together.

So it was a wonderful job. I really walked into something great, but then, anybody who's been to Jerusalem knows it's just an absolutely magic city. To top it all, we lived close by the office in the neighborhood of Talbieh, and had a beautiful, an easy walk, a five minute walk, to where I worked at the ACC or over to the consulate.

We lived in a house originally built in the 30s by an Arab family who left in 1948. The original house had two stories, and then at some point a third story was tacked on top, which is where we lived. It was a three-story walkup, and you could see Mount Zion from our entrance door. We never turned on the air conditioning, it was dry and clear and comfortable even on the hottest days. Of course, when the rains came in November, then that was different, but during the summer, for six months, it was just dry, clear. Hang your laundry on the balcony outside, it'll dry in five minutes.

For me, thousands of years of history were right there, within sight, and we could be walking where it all happened. Just think about the timing. The city walls themselves date from around 1500, which was late in history, built by Suleiman. You could walk around the top of the wall except the area bordering the Haram-esh-Sharif on the east and south.

I was just tossed into the most wonderful place for me and my family. It was magic.

Q: How did the Intifada manifest when you were there?

DU CHATEAU: The uprising, the Intifada, was some 6 months old by the time we got there. The consulate staff who had been living in exposed places like south near Bethlehem, they were moved into western Jerusalem. Others like David Good, the PAO, and his family continued to live in East Jerusalem where things were active from time to time.

We were always aware of so-called strike days, times not to go here, not to go there. Consulate security was very good about keeping everybody informed of what was going on, but we were aware of it anyway. We were part of the Consulate's security responsibility and on their radio net.

There was considerable tension reflected in the Israeli press and it was very difficult for me to handle. I was struck by the hatred and anti-Arab racism in the English language press when I got there, and I assume the Hebrew press was the same. So the intifada was constantly with us.

We had to be careful when we were traveling and know what was going on around us.

At that time, of course, everything, all the land, down to the Dead Sea was all Israeli territory, so we could drive down to the Dead Sea and we would do it all the time. We'd just get on the road and drive down to the Dead Sea, just to do it, for the fun of it, but, you know, when you came back up, you had to think about what roads you were going to use to go through East Jerusalem.

If you went through Arab neighborhoods in eastern Jerusalem, you had to think about it, where you were, what was happening. One time we were over visiting Gil Sherman at his home, which was then right on the border between East Jerusalem and the West Bank. We were coming back at night and my whole family was in the car. We were coming around a bend in the Bethany area east of the Mount of Olives and in the headlights we saw a bunch of rocks across the road and people around with bandanas over their faces. We had diplomatic plates, but that doesn't exactly protect you or it just confuses the situation if the other guy doesn't realize what dip plates are. If we had blue West Bank plates things might have been clearer.

Anyhow, so what to do? Well, in our case it was important not to do anything fast. Our mind-set had to be that we were on their side, as it were. So I rolled down the driver's window and said who we are and tried not to be worried and that's what we did and they let us through. They could have easily rocked out the windshield. That's what happened to a lot of so-called Israeli settlers who lived on the West Bank.

When coming back from our weekly meetings in the Tel Aviv embassy, I never hesitated to drive up the old road through the Modi'in area north of the main road and come into Jerusalem from the north. It was a beautiful drive. It's amazing to think that I was driving around villages that the Maccabees came from. Of course I wouldn't do that drive on a strike day, but I never had any trouble.

For the most part, nothing was happening in West Jerusalem where we worked and shopped. I recall one bomb that went off in a covered market area in Jerusalem called Mahane Yehuda, but that was an exception. So that was constantly around us and we had to know where we were, what the situation was, and think about neighborhoods. But that didn't slow us down. We walked all over the Old City. It was just an incredible time to be there.

Q: What about the religious Orthodox areas and that influence and thinking?

DU CHATEAU: Well, part of my staff, as I said, was Haredi, ultra-Orthodox. In fact, one of my successes was getting one of the ultra-Orthodox rabbis on an international visitor tour to the United States. That was extremely difficult to do, for dietary reasons if nothing else, and he was politically very conservative, but we were able to do it. It could only happen because some on my staff were Haredi. I think it was very worthwhile.

I knew a lot about what was going on in Jerusalem, about who, what, where. And then, of course, within the ultra-Orthodox community there are different ways of belief, different groups among the ultra-Orthodox. Through reading and talking with my colleagues, I got to know pretty well who was what and what they thought was important.

Q: Was there a lot, using an American term, block busting of radical Orthodox Jewish people grabbing hunks of neighborhoods and trying to extend their ...?

DU CHATEAU: I'm not sure how that applies to the ultra-Orthodox. They lived in very definite neighborhoods in West Jerusalem, and any expansion was incremental, maybe from house to house, and those neighborhoods are very dense with lots of kids in every family. I know what you're asking, but the expansion of the ultra-orthodox wasn't that much of an issue then as it has become more recently. It's not the ultra-Orthodox that grabbed hunks of land, not necessarily, much of such activity came from people quite secular moving into Palestinian neighborhoods, and I have the sense that many were non-observant Jews.

I want to emphasize that I really loved living in Israel, but we were there in difficult times. I have a great deal of trouble with Israelis who were born in New York City of parents who were born in the U.S., let's say, and who move to Israel to live. Of course they get immediate Israeli citizenship, because they made aliyah to Israel. Then they go out and they establish settlements in the West Bank, because it's "their land" and they kick out Palestinians, or make life extraordinarily difficult for Palestinians who'd lived there for generations. I have a lot of difficulty seeing that as right and just.

But not everyone in Israel is like that. It's also true that many Israelis have a problem with settlers. The Peace Now movement was quite active when I was there. There was a group called Women in Black who every Friday afternoon in Jerusalem before shabbat, they would meet in a silent protest against the occupation just up the street from the ACC.

Jerusalem starts to shut down on Friday around noon, all work stops around 2 or 3, but people are rushing to get things ready for Shabbat. And then of course everything starts again on Sunday morning, the start of the work week.

But people are out on early Friday afternoon, because they're buying to get ready for the evening. The Women in Black would be out, just up the hill towards prime minister's residence from my office and from where we lived, they'd be out there demonstrating, just silently carrying signs like "Get Rid of the Settlements." It was interesting to watch them and to watch the reaction of Israelis driving past. They were not always very nice, in fact frequently not.

So there's a tension in Israeli society. We had contacts with the whole range of West Jerusalem society, with the academics, the ministers, and the religious. We had contacts, through my staff, with the ultra-Orthodox. We had unofficial contact with the settlers. The sister of one of my staff was living in a West Bank settlement and would come to town every so often and swing past the ACC.

It is very bothersome to see Israelis in civilian clothes walking through Jerusalem with AK-47s, or whatever their have, over their shoulder or for people who are clearly settlers with weapons at their waist. It's very disturbing. I never got used to that. Anyone using the ACC had to check their weapons with our Israeli guard downstairs before coming in.

But, again, many Israelis cannot be lumped in here. It's a fifty-fifty kind of thing, or it was when I was there, the Israelis were quite divided about these things. Of course by now the settlements have expanded, so the situation is worse from my point of view.

Q: Being a former Soviet hand, what about the Soviet Jews? I know Russian society is not very susceptible to other groups and there's a lot of anti-Semitism there.

DU CHATEAU: Still is.

Q: And coming out of the Soviet Union, these are not the most tolerant groups.

DU CHATEAU: No, they're not. Natan Sharansky, for instance, who we worried about while I was in Moscow, he was talked about at every press brief, so finally he got out and of course became and still is, as far as I know, quite conservative, quite far out there on the Israeli right. What's one to make of that? Suppressed in one system, apparently supporting suppression in another.

I'd say, as a terrible generalization, that these new Israelis from Russia did tend to vote far to the right in Israeli political terms, and I think some of the most rightist politicians now in Israeli politics came out of the old country. I'm thinking of Avigdor Lieberman and his followers. Maybe it's a reaction against the anti-Semitism they grew up with. But you know, the U.S. has bred its Israeli radicals, too. Meir Kahane was quite the issue when we lived in Israel.

So anyhow the Russians started coming out while I was there. That would have been after 1991 when the Soviet Union fell apart. They were coming out, trickling out, before, but after 1991, after things fell apart and freer travel and emigration became possible, a lot of Russians came to Israel.

Here's a story – maybe I told it before. Anyhow, when I was getting rid of my car towards the end of my tour, I went down to the equivalent of the Department of Motor Vehicles there to finalize the sale of the car. I started in Hebrew, but then I did it all in Russian as the lady behind the desk, her Russian was better than her Hebrew, and so was mine. I think it is kind of fun to think about, this American diplomat and this new Israeli doing business in Russian.

And, again, I mentioned Kahane earlier, and Americans who move into settlements on the West Bank. When you think about it, the Soviet Jews who come to Israel, they are not that much different from some American Jews who come to live in Israel and end on the far right of things.

Q: I was a consular officer and I've been up against ethnic groups, starting with Germans who came back to Germany after the currency reform of '48, they'd left during the Depression, gone to the United States, got through World War Two, then they came back and they're pretty obnoxious and threw their weight around. I've dealt with other groups, Greek Americans, Yugoslav Americans and all.

The American Jews, I would think they would be pretty much wanting everything and more demanding than not. How did you find them?

DU CHATEAU: Well, again, because of my job, I didn't deal with these people that much. American services would be through the embassy in Tel Aviv or maybe the Jerusalem consulate. The consulate's consular section was on the other side of the Green Line, in East Jerusalem.

So I didn't deal with that every day. We did work with Americans coming in to the American Cultural Center, because we had American books and newspapers and VHS videotapes, and God bless them, that was fine. Occasionally somebody could get very demanding, but I don't know whether I'd want to say that this was any different than it could be anyplace else.

Q: How about sort of the really Orthodox Jews, the ones from New York that followed one of these rabbis who...

DU CHATEAU: Well, folks like Kahane, we didn't have anything to do with them. I'd read about them in the press, but on the job, my job, I wouldn't have anything to do with them. I didn't have to worry about them.

Mind you, my staff didn't want anything to do with them, either. They had no use for these people. My staff came to Israel to make a life, not to change the world into their image.

Q: You were running a cultural center, is that it? Okay, what did that mean?

DU CHATEAU: What did that mean? We were the best place, the best source, for information about the U.S. in our part of Israel, in Jerusalem, where the Israeli government was. We were a very good lending library, we'd do research for people in the Israeli government, and we distributed USG material. For example, and this has all gone away now, but back then we were still getting the Wireless File, that daily compilation of official material and press clippings that USIA sent out, and we distributed it by hand, by courier, to the prime minister's office, what have you.

Anybody who was coming to Israel for any kind of USG program, speakers, what have you, they would always come to Jerusalem and we would take them in to the foreign ministry or up to the university, wherever it was appropriate. I remember it well, I was with a visitor talking with the American Desk officer in the foreign ministry when my wife called, I guess it would have been through our 2-way radio with the ACC as we had no cell phones then, and asked where I had parked our car. That's when I found out that my car had been stolen from right in front of our house. But that is another story, interesting in its way about Israeli society then, and maybe we'll get to it. Anyhow, so we'd take visitors around, and we would be a part of any cultural or political program that the embassy in Tel Aviv was doing.

The bluegrass musician Alison Kraus is extremely well known now, but that wasn't always the case. I guess it would have been about 1988 or 1989 when she was on a tour with her group, Union Station, for the U.S. Information Agency. Hard to believe now that we could book someone like that. Anyhow, so the group was in Jordan playing in Amman and had to come to us. The easiest way to do this was by car. Our courier Sami and I down to the river Jordan with a big van, literally down to the river, to meet them. This really resonates when you think of the importance of the river Jordan in American gospel and country music. Because we had vehicle with diplomatic license plates and the right connections, we could down to the river beyond the military checkpoints, right to the border. So we brought Alison Krauss and her group across the river Jordan. That kind of sounds romantic, doesn't it.

And then I remember taking them through security checks. Israelis went through all their stuff as they would for anyone coming across the river from Jordan. The group's bass player, he had a real acoustic bass in this big case and he had to open it up. What do you know, there were all these dirty clothes packed around the bass. He was a little embarrassed.

Alison Kraus had a following in Jerusalem, to my surprise. We arranged a radio interview for her, and I remember the interviewer asking her why she quit classical violin and came to bluegrass because that's where Alison started, in classical, and she said, "because you can make mistakes." Later I took her and her group into the Old City. She especially wanted to see the Holy Sepulcher and Golgotha - o many songs she'd sung about these places and now she got to see them.

And all our visitors, any of these people, they always wanted to go around the Old City to see things and so I became a really good tour guide. I loved to do it because I was really interested in the history of the city. Golnar and I, and our daughters, we were always in the Old City, we felt very comfortable there, and we got to know where to go.

Then there would be the press part. When I first got to the ACC, I was disappointed that my job did not bring me in contact with the American or Israeli press, because I really enjoyed that part of my job in Moscow. But the IO, the Information Officer, down in Tel Aviv, that was his job and he wanted to make sure that he was the source of information. I guess that made sense.

Anyhow, the ACC did have an important press function. I don't know if I mentioned this, but maybe because of the Intifada, we had a constant stream of visits by secretaries of state or other important USG people, and we would arrange press conferences for them, whatever was needed. The consulate could not do it, and Tel Aviv was too far away. Often they were staying in town, usually at the King David Hotel, and we would run the press center for them there. Usually the SecState would be traveling with American press, so we would make sure they got the Wireless File and anything else needed. Occasionally I would take some of the American press into the Old City on a quick tour. And of course, we did transcripts of press conferences, but, I was so happy, I did not have to do the typing. My wonderful staff did them - I just proofed the transcript. It was such a relief after all those hours doing it in Moscow. They were really good at it, too.

Q: Did you feel that you were being monitored by Jewish opinion?

DU CHATEAU: Well, first of all, kind of apropos of that, everything had, still has, religious connotations in Israel, everything is seen through a religious prism, everything. It is a religious country, a country formed because of a religion. Everybody wants to know where you stand on any topic, but to do that, the first thing they want to know is, are you Jewish or not?

So rather than have that discussion or have anybody worry about it, I made sure everybody on my staff or otherwise knew where I came from on things, same as I did at FSI. I came out of a Christian background, I wasn't Jewish. I also made sure that they knew, ahead of time and didn't have to find out afterwards, that my wife is Muslim. She's about as religious as I am. She doesn't eat pork and that's about the extent of it, though she grew up in a religious household. Her parents were practicing Muslims.

But I just didn't want anybody to be embarrassed by assuming I was Jewish and basically agreed with the Israeli attitude toward Palestinians and Muslims, which tends to be rather harsh. So when I got there, I made sure my staff knew, and I have absolutely no doubt that this information went out around town immediately, who this guy was.

Q: Okay, let's talk a bit about that. How did you feel about the Palestinian cause?

DU CHATEAU: Well, you know, I've never been able to understand the Israelis, because the country was founded by people who were horribly persecuted in Europe, or people who came from Iran, South Africa, or other Middle Eastern countries, they didn't have life any easier there. Some of my staff came from this world.

I understand self defense, I have no problem with that and I've pretty well read into the history of Israel and certainly Jewish history in the 20th Century. But I have difficulty understanding the lack of empathy and the willingness to suppress other people. And the racism and discrimination by people who were subject to it themselves. I understand security and I've been in Israel when it's under attack, but I'm bothered by that attitude. I don't understand it.

Palestinians haven't helped themselves a bit. They have lousy leaders. Arafat was terrible. They missed every opportunity to solve problems. Israel is not going away, you know. Hamas was not an issue when I was there, but it is now and that just makes things worse.

We adopted our younger daughter when she was 9 days old. She was born in Bikur Cholim hospital in West Jerusalem. We started the adoption process pretty soon after we got to Jerusalem, but it took about a year before everything became final. We adopted her through the Israeli adoption agency, whose office turned out to be a block or so up the street from where my office was. It couldn't be easier, in that sense. My daughter's birth mother was Palestinian, Muslim, and her birth father was Israeli, Jewish. That's all we know about her past.

But the point is another story about Israeli society, at least as it was then. Many Israeli Jews we met wanted to adopt children, but they could only adopt Jewish children, which in practice meant adopting from another country like Brazil as so few Jewish Israeli children were available for these people. Often they had to wait for years, and we heard some bitterness about the situation. I had to get a physical with an Israeli doctor before we adopted, and I remember his talking about this as he wanted to adopt. Anyhow, we got to the head of the line because our daughter's birth mother was not Jewish. I felt very uncomfortable with this, but we did not create the situation.

I think I may have mentioned that my wife worked in the consulate, in the West Jerusalem building, as the CLO, the community liaison officer. So we had to get a caregiver for our newborn Leyla. Like in Bulgaria, and in its way in Moscow, we found another wonderful, wonderful person, Huda Arnita, who has an Israeli passport, but who is Palestinian. We didn't talk politics, but we did hear when her brothers had a hard time of it, they would get hassled all the time. When we were working, Huda would take our little daughter to her home in the Old City. She lived just a block from the Holy Sepulcher. Our little girl would be surrounded by these wonderful Palestinian ladies all day. Her feet would never touch the ground.

On a daily basis, it's kind of like a lot of things in the United States, race relations in the U.S., in Washington DC, you read about things, but when are you looking at it right in front of you, you don't know the whole story of what's really going on.

Q: How about Americans coming to the cultural center and all? Did you have you sort of, you might say radical Americans?

DU CHATEAU: I don't recall that, no. I don't recall anything like that.

Q: How about the hand of the embassy?

DU CHATEAU: Well, we got along very well with the embassy, but it was downhill 40 miles away. They knew where we were, but the left us alone. A very light hand, I guess you'd say.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

DU CHATEAU: Ambassador Thomas Pickering was there when I first came, but he left after a year, maybe earlier. When ambassadors came up to Jerusalem for visits, I would be taking them around, I might be the embassy officer to accompany them, if there was no reporting to be done. Somebody has to be with them as the bag carrier, what have you, and that would be my role.

If they were coming up the hill to address a straight political issue, an embassy political officer would accompany them, they'd go directly into the foreign ministry and out, down the hill. But sometimes they were doing something else and I'd be around, perhaps they were up for dinner or something like that.

The rest of the embassy, if they needed help from us, they'd get it, or else they'd work directly with the consulate, if it was a consulate issue, a West Bank or Gaza Strip issue. I'd go down the hill for staff meetings once a week, if that.

Q: Did you get into the West Bank much?

DU CHATEAU: All over it.

Q: What did you observe there, sort of Israeli rule there?

DU CHATEAU: You'd be aware of the checkpoints, the observation posts. They were there in Jerusalem, all over the place in East Jerusalem. I remember them just below the Old City, in what is called the City of David, looking out over the Kidron Valley and Silwan. It was just the way life was.

We would drive through East Jerusalem and down the hill to the Dead Sea just to get out of town. You could go the southern route through Arab east Jerusalem, or you could drive up to the northern part of the city and drop down on the new road that lead directly to some settlements. From there you could drive up and down the Jordan River valley, north toward the Galilee, or you could drive along the Dead Sea down to Masada, and down to Eilat on the Red Sea. That was no problem, we always felt that it was safe, at least during daylight.

Driving on the West Bank itself, in the hills above the Jordan River valley and the Dead Sea, that was an issue. Bethlehem was fine, it is really not much of a walk from south Jerusalem, but below Bethlehem toward Hebron was not. Going on the roads up to Nablus or south to Hebron and further, the consulate did not like us going there. Because of the intifada, it really was not safe, even during daylight. The consulate liked to use armored cars when they moved around the West Bank.

I have driven all the way down the West Bank from Jerusalem through Hebron and down to Be'er Sheva with our unarmored Center station wagon. That may not have been a smart thing to do, but our courier Sami and I did it on a trip down to the university in Be'er Sheva. Otherwise we would have either gone down the Dead Sea route or more likely down toward the Mediterranean, which was longer, but safer. I only did that trip down through Hebron once.

My wife was on a so-call “small grants” committee in the consulate and, as such, she would visit projects of the West Bank on non-strike days. It would all be official and cleared in advance, and she’d go with a consulate driver in a consulate car. And she would bring me along. We got to meet some wonderful people that way. Other times, Phil Wilcox, the Jerusalem Consul General, would arrange trips for the consulate staff to places like Hebron, so I visited the tombs there.

You’re always aware of where you are and that you were not in friendly territory. So we never traveled on the West Bank after dark.

We lived and worked on the west side of Jerusalem, a different world from across the Green Line. When there were strike days, we were not supposed to go into East Jerusalem. It was supposed to be off limits to anyone from the embassy, which meant me, and there were enough other things to do that we didn’t do it, generally speaking. Although I do recall one time, there was a wonderful place where we got bread and something that’s called Armenian pizza in East Jerusalem, it was basically a hole-in-the-wall shop with a big oven and not much else, and we were in there on a day when maybe we shouldn’t be there, my whole family was with me, and here’s the consulate security officer coming in. I said, “You’re not supposed to here.” She was getting bread, too. We laughed about it, that’s all.

So it wasn’t a problem. You just had to be well aware of where you were and what was happening around you. Jerusalem is divided into four quarters. The Jewish Quarter, that wasn’t an issue. The Armenian Quarter, there’s actually just the one road into the quarter. You can go into churches there, but there’s not much else, one pottery shop owned by the Sandroni brothers, that pizza place. The Christian Quarter, I was in there all the time. And the other areas, we wandered there all the time.

Q: Speaking of friendly and unfriendly things that you did, did you ever get mixed up with the priests looking after the various Christian shrines, the Ethiopians were fighting, the Ethiopian Orthodox and the Copts...

DU CHATEAU: No, I didn’t get mixed up in it although I was well aware of it. The Ethiopians were on top of the Holy Sepulcher, literally on the roof, and you’d go up there and see their village, a real African village on top of this old building that was built by the Crusaders. I’ve said that I’m not religious. I don’t count myself as Christian, but I do count myself as being well aware of what’s going on, as best I can. I’m one of those people that read books on religion, books by Karen Armstrong, for instance, or Elaine Pagels.

Anyhow, I’m not sure if I mentioned this, but my parents were very religious. They were Christian Scientists, very devout. Partially because of that, and more because of a lack of interest, I never had any dealings with priests of any kind, Catholic or Orthodox, in my life before I came to Jerusalem. I sure did in Jerusalem. There was one priest, Father Godfrey, who was kind of like “the priest to the consulate” in the sense that he just liked us, perhaps because we, like he, were American. He lived in a building that was just up the street from us at the ACC. He would come to all the consulate receptions - he’d be invited, I guess because he was just a very nice guy.

I remember one time, this would have been in the fall we got there, the consulate had a really neat Halloween party for the consulate kids, American and local staff, in the Consulate Residence building, this century old structure with thick stone walls. Father Godfrey was there dressed in his monastic robes, sitting quietly in the curve of a stairway, quiet, mostly in the dark, but he was holding a scary pumpkin. In his way, he was making fun of himself. He loved children. He loved little gadgets that did things. His rooms, which we visited, were full of them. Just a wonderful person, Father Godfrey, who unfortunately has since passed away here in Washington. He's buried in the Franciscan Monastery in northeast Washington.

Father Jerome Murphy O'Connor, a Dominican, fortunately very much with us still, was another important influence on me. He is an historian. Father Jerry. He lives and teaches at the École Biblique on Nablus Road a bit north of Damascus Gate. He's written much on the history of the Holy Land, including a terrific guidebook to the Holy Land, which I strongly recommend. So he really liked what the UN was trying to do in the Middle East, keep the peace, and the UN was all around us, of course, in Jerusalem. Also he had a great appreciation for the consulate and the cultural center, and certainly for the NGOs working to help people on the West Bank.

I doubt that he still is doing it, but at least to when we left Jerusalem, about once a month he would take us on guided tours to important historic places all over Jerusalem and all over Israel, although not much on the West Bank. You had to be able to get to the place in about a two hour drive or less. He did this roughly once a month on Saturdays. These were incredibly interesting trips, and again, they have had a big influence on my thinking. We would take lunch and make a day of it. I would backpack my little daughter on these walks. But if you were a regular Israeli, or from the Tel Aviv embassy, well, they weren't invited.

I came to very much appreciate these people. They made living there so much richer. So I knew the Jewish side of things and I had my Catholic friends, too. I guess I didn't have much to do with Protestants, though my older daughter went to the Anglican School in Jerusalem and we knew the teachers there. The Anglican School is quite the institution. It may have moved, but at the time it was housed in buildings the British built as a hospital, in the 1930s, I think, but maybe earlier. The classrooms were made of Jerusalem stone, quite beautiful but cold in the winter.

No, I'm wrong. We did get to know a Lutheran pastor at the Redeemer Lutheran Church in the Old City, Pastor Bergman. His son was in my older daughter's class in the Anglican School. So he baptized Leyla, my younger daughter that we adopted in 1989. I think it is quite wonderful, her baptism there. My aunt was able to come from the U.S., and the Shermans, Gil and Donna, were her godparents, Leyla's godparents.

The church is maybe 100 yards from the Holy Sepulcher, but it is a new building. The Germans built it in the 1890s, and the Kaiser came for the dedication ceremony. Funny, like I said, I'm not religious, but it has an emotional impact that Leyla was baptized in Jerusalem and is, at least formally, a Lutheran like her grandmother. She's the only one in my family who was baptized. We had to have her become officially Christian in order to complete the adoption. Everything is religion in Jerusalem, like I said.

And there's now one other neat connection, the kind I like. For the last 5 or 6 years, Golnar has been a pre-school teacher at the Redeemer Lutheran Church in McLean. It's all fate, or something.

Q: It's a fascinating history. At one point I went into the Historian's Office and read all the consular letters and reports talking about the elders of the American Colony who would absorb the younger wives of members into their coterie. It was dirty old men rule for quite a while.

Talk a bit about the intifada, what happened while you were there?

DU CHATEAU: Oh, but first the American Colony. You know the American consul in Jerusalem back then hated that group, so consider the source. This was when, the 1920s maybe? Anyhow, watch out for what you read. It may have been all about religion, for all I know, as the so-call Colony was established by some religious, I guess you could call them radicals. They established a hospital that, I believe, is still in use inside the Old City. But more important, they moved to a building to the north of the Old City that is now just east of the Green Line and is a wonderful hotel, and it's still owned by the descendants of the Spafford family that established the Colony, I think. We'd go there for Saturday or Sunday brunch often. They also had the only swimming pool in Jerusalem that we felt like going to. The kids loved it.

Well, anyhow, the intifada. The intifada kept on going, it was just a constant thing to be aware of. Its main effect on us was travel on the West Bank or in the Old City. It was mainly then passive resistance to Israel rule in East Jerusalem and especially on the West Bank. Settler cars would be stoned, sometimes Israelis would be hurt, and Israelis would fire back. And Palestinians would be killed. It was a constant background, this violence.

But I think more vivid in my memory, certainly, is the first Gulf War. It is not related to the intifada in any way, but certainly was something that got our attention at the time.

Q: Okay, how did that impact on you all?

DU CHATEAU: Oh, immediately and completely. We know how it all came out, now, so that's fine and dandy, but nobody knew what was going to happen at the time. There was a long run up to the Gulf War, you may recall. December 1990 was particularly interesting, with lots of threats around and lots of speculation, but we continued to operate normally in the ACC. I recall setting up a program for my FSI professor, Dr. Reich, during November or December, and of course all we talked about was what Saddam and Israel would do.

During that period, of course, we had, inside the embassy and consulate, our own long buildup. First of all there was a drawdown of staff, people could leave voluntarily if they wanted to. I didn't want to leave and my wife didn't want to leave. We felt safe in Jerusalem and anyhow we had no place to go in the U.S.

In Jerusalem, what was happening was a lot of the religious folk, mostly the ultra-Orthodox living in northern Jerusalem it seemed, they suddenly realized that they were Americans. They came out of the woodwork, these Americans, and registered with the consulate. There was a lot of Xeroxing going on, too much for the consulate, so we just took on a lot of it to try to help.

There was just such a volume of people coming in.

These were Americans who came to live in Israel, usually ultra-Orthodox, but not necessarily, though I do recall lots of black coats and black hats. I think that they were convinced that we would have an airplane to take them out when things got bad.

During this whole period, the Israelis were getting ready too, and their big issue was gas attack. There was a very big fear of gas attacks. Saddam had threatened it and the Israelis took him at his word. So eventually we were issued gas masks. My little daughter, who was maybe 18 months old at that time, she had a plastic cage-like thing, because she was too young, too small, for a mask. The three older people in the family, we all had masks. The Israeli government issued them, but I think we got them through the consulate. Eventually we had to give them back, which was too bad as they were an interesting souvenir. Guzel had to take hers to school every day, of course, and she decorated the gas mask box quite nicely.

The masks were an issue, because a significant part of the population in Israel is Arab and they are Israeli citizens. They did not get gas masks. So that was constantly discussed and added to the tension. I think they eventually got them, but I don't know, I no longer recall. Of course no one on the West Bank got them and I seem to recall some problems inside the Old City.

We had them, we had to go through instruction on how to use them. We also had to make a so-called sealed room in the apartment, a place that we were supposed to go to when under attack. So we got the plastic sheeting and tape and sealed up a room just so we could say to those that worried about this stuff that we had done it. I strongly remember thinking that this was a farce, that there was no way to protect ourselves from gas. It would get everywhere. But we did it.

So December and January 1991 there's this constant rise in tension. Then the war started on January 17, and we watched it on Israeli television. The first missiles went over the next day, heading for Tel Aviv, and at that point, we were told that everybody except for very essential personnel were supposed to get out.

It wasn't that simple. There were no planes, or no space on places down at the Tel Aviv airport, so people from the Tel Aviv embassy came up through Jerusalem and went by bus down to be evacuated by a U.S. government plane from the southern desert area, an airport down there, a military airport down there. A lot of embassy people left.

Q: I'm told that one of the things on Israeli TV was all of these Orthodox, with the dreadlocks and the hats and all, getting the hell out.

DU CHATEAU: Well, they tried to get out on El Al. It must have been horrible for the people running the airport in Tel Aviv, Ben Gurion Airport. Yeah, but I wouldn't want to say it was just the ultra-Orthodox. A lot of people got out. Certainly all the tourists had long since left.

It's interesting. Around this of course is the problem of dual nationalism and loyalty. I felt that constantly in the air. Americans who were living in Israel who were part of the Israeli military, they didn't leave. People who were in the country for just purely religious reasons probably had a little bit less attachment to Israel as a political body, to the government, which the extreme ultra-Orthodox didn't recognize, anyhow. Their motivations were different.

Phil (Philip) Wilcox, he was the Jerusalem consul general at the time and my wife, who was the consulate CLO, community liaison officer, worked very closely with him. We were instructed to pack up our bags and meet down at the West Jerusalem building consulate that evening. We were going to go get on that bus that was taking people from Tel Aviv down to that field in the Negev. We were not essential.

So I shut down the center. I talked to all my staff and explained the situation, that I had orders, told them to just go home and I'll be back whenever, we just closed the place down. I was extremely conflicted about doing this. I was very comfortable living where I was, even with missiles coming over. One always takes chances in life, you do it every day driving down the road, and being in Jerusalem, which was not a target, I wasn't all that worried. I did not feel threatened any more than any Israeli did, than my staff did. I just didn't buy it at all. I couldn't see Saddam attacking Jerusalem. My wife was a little bit more concerned, but I think it's because of the children.

So we went down to the consulate with our luggage, and we sat around waiting. We sat around there and we were very unhappy, because we didn't want to leave at all. I felt very guilty about leaving my staff, I didn't think that was right. We had no place to go in the US, either. This was looking like a disaster coming.

And then after an hour or two Phil came down and said, "Well, you know, I've got permission that anybody who wants to stay here can." I guess it was Ambassador Brown that made the decision, I don't know, but I'm sure that Phil Wilcox was lobbying for us. And so we were very happy. I couldn't thank Phil enough for letting us stay. They brought around a van and we went home. I remember Simon, a consulate driver, I think he was originally from Australia, anyhow he told us how happy he was that we were staying.

Cindy, Phil Wilcox's wife had to leave. One of the communicators in the consulate had a young son, maybe in his early teens, and someone had to be with him on the flight, so Cindy did it, took him to the US. Apparently the trip was just horrible: it took forever to get down there to the airfield in the Negev, there were air raid warnings while they were driving down there that evening, and she couldn't get back for months, as I recall.

This is horrible to say, but in a strange way it turned out to be a good time - you know it was a wonderfully calm and quiet time up in Jerusalem. Everybody had left. All the tourists were gone. The East Jerusalem consulate offices had to be closed down and we were just working with minimal staff. Of course and it was scary for people down in Tel Aviv because the missiles were going towards it. We would hear the sonic boom as they came over.

I let my staff know I was back in town, that I wasn't going anywhere, which made me feel very, very good. We were in touch with each other, but there was no work we could do. I had things to do in the center and I could record the news on videotape for the consulate. We had a satellite disk on the roof to take down television and a good recording system.

It was a time when we could walk everywhere in the city, it was so quiet. One time, towards the end of the war, we went down to Masada with one of my daughter's friends. Her parents were Mennonites who were living in Jerusalem and in charge of an NGO on the West Bank.

And it was eerie, because there was of course very little traffic on the road. But as we were driving south down towards Masada, along the Dead Sea, we were down, right next to the water and there are cliffs over to our right, to the west, and we looked over and we saw an Israeli jet flying very low, very slow, below the horizon, ducking behind buttes, and it was just eerie to see, it was fascinating.

So we went through a lot of air raid alarms, they came most evenings. When the sirens went off, you were supposed to go to your sealed room that I mentioned. The sealed room, we put plastic up on the windows, we sealed it down with brown tape and then we put wet towels around the door. We were supposed to stay in there until there was an all clear and we were supposed to put our gas masks on as well.

After a while we got pretty used to this. We used to go into the sealed room, which was actually little Leyla's bedroom with her crib and all, and we older folk played Hearts and we didn't put on the gas masks and my little daughter would go to sleep in her crib. The three of us had a running game of Hearts and so that's what we did.

And we had our communications radio, we were part of the consulate security net and so they'd call us up for a radio check and we'd say, "Yeah, we're here" and then they would report on what was happening as they learned it. And then "All clear" and then we'd go out and go on watching TV.

The Israelis had a code in Hebrew, which everybody knew, I mean, it wasn't trying to be a secret, of "an airstrike's imminent" and then "go to your sealed rooms" and then "all clear." So you see I've got this tee shirt on today that I got during the war, it's an Israeli tee shirt. And to describe it for the tape, what this tee shirt is, it's got three squares on it and the first one shows a snake, the first square on top, and underneath it in Hebrew is written "venomous snake" and it was what they'd say on the radio to announce that there's an attack coming, that missiles have been launched. And then the second box here in the middle has, it's pretty appropriate as it looks like my family, it has a bunch of people with gas masks, including a little one, a little child in a gas-proof cage, here and it's labeled in Hebrew "patriots." And the third one shows an open sky and that's "all clear." Those were the three parts of Israeli air raid announcements over the regular AM and FM radio during an attack.

Q: Patriots were an anti-missile missile.

DU CHATEAU: They came in to the Tel Aviv embassy, these American anti-missile people, all in uniform. They practically took over the embassy, but then so many regular embassy people had left. They ran the mailroom. The American military was all over the place.

Anyhow, after a time you got used to this stuff, this new way of living, and life went on. So I went down for meetings in the embassy, or to send mail or something like that and I'd go past these fields of these ground-to-air missiles deployed along the Jerusalem to Tel Aviv main highway. As far as I know, they didn't work, but they were there, a lot of military, American military. It made everybody feel good and I guess that's important.

I recall one time very strongly. In the run-up and at the beginning of the war, our main worry was that the Israelis would go it alone and retaliate against Iraq for its missile strikes. Everybody knows the outcome to the war now, but that sure wasn't clear after the missiles started to fly. The Israeli way is to not allow any other country to inflict damage on Israel. We knew about this, it was a constant discussion, what would happen, what would the Israelis do. As I recall, my staff thought they would bomb, and then things would get seriously out of hand. Remember, we all had our gas masks and SCUD missiles were coming in.

And so Secretary of State Eagleburger, I guess he was deputy secretary then, he came to town. Harry Sindel, an Israeli colleague from the center who was in charge of audio-visual stuff, and I were outside the prime minister's office, staking it out, to see if there would be any statement following Eagleburger's meeting. We had to be there because that was our job, but I recall also that we were a little worried because the day was getting late and the missiles could come.

It was a very, very worrisome few hours, to find out what the Israelis would do. Shamir was the prime minister at the time and he was under a lot of pressure to strike, but ultimately he did not.

Later that day of course Eagleburger gave a press conference, it would have been at the King David Hotel, I think, which we recorded, and then we sent the transcript back to the U.S. It was quite a relief that the Israelis decided not to do anything for the time being. I think that was about the time our Patriot missiles came in. It would have been real interesting had the Israelis attacked – who knows what would have happened, I can't imagine.

As it happened, I think the missiles only did some physical damage in Israel. I don't recall that anyone died from being hit, but I could be wrong. But they were dangerous. I think there was a bad hit on Saudi Arabia where lots of people died.

Q: I've interviewed various people about this period. Our effort was to keep the Saudis mobilized and keep the Israelis out of the war.

And the gas mask thing, an awful lot of hanky panky went on. The military and CIA were distributing gas masks to their people, but not to the rest of the embassy and they were trying to do it surreptitiously, which of course didn't work.

DU CHATEAU: I don't recall that. We didn't have any problem with it in Jerusalem.

Q: There were big problems around...

DU CHATEAU: We stayed there and the Anglican school continued to function and my daughter, my older daughter, I'd take her over to the school, drive her over, but the only way she could go to school was with her gas mask. So she'd go with her gas mask in a box, which she decorated, she'd put in on table outside the classroom and then everything went on. It became a new kind of normal life.

I think I said that my beard was quite full before the war, kinda bushy. In order to wear a gas mask, I had to cut my beard way back and so I did. It still wouldn't have worked as gas would have leaked in, but it made everyone feel good. I wonder what the ultra-Orthodox men did? It must have been a problem.

We continued in Jerusalem another year after that, went back to normal operations, as before.

I want to emphasize, I was so glad I was able to stay there with my staff. I felt really bad when it looked like I was going to be forced out and they, my staff, would stay. I didn't like that at all. I couldn't thank Phil Wilcox enough for giving us the possibility to stay.

Q: What about relations with Jordan and Jordanians while you were there?

DU CHATEAU: Well, formally there was a cold peace, so it was fairly easy to drop down to Jericho, to the Jordan River, and cross to Jordan. Israelis of course couldn't go in that direction, or at least didn't do it. I can't recall if there were formal problems or if it was just uncomfortable to travel to Jordan for an Israeli. We could travel over there, no problem. We went all the time, went down to Allenby Bridge and brought visitors over.

I was only able to arrange a trip over to Jordan once. Golnar and I wanted to travel around in Jordan. We couldn't go to Damascus directly from Israel with our Israeli visas in our passports, but we could go to Jordan directly from Israel - that was no problem, Israeli visas in our passports were not an issue.

We had a trip arranged, we were going to go down to Petra and look at the ruins, travel in the desert, maybe get down to Aqaba. This was in the spring before we adopted our daughter, in 1989, so it would be in the first year we were there and doggone it, they, the Jordanians, had some kind of insurrection in southern Jordan and we couldn't go down there. So we never got to Petra, at least not yet.

But that trip we went to places up in the north of Jordan and out to the desert to the east. We were there during Ramadan, and the hotel we stayed at in Amman had an enormous tent in its courtyard for the evening feast, iftar.

Again, we could travel over land to Egypt, no problem at all. No problem using our diplomatic passports with Israeli visas. We drove down to Mount Sinai - just an incredible trip. I fondly recall staying at a beautiful hotel just across the border in Egypt, a place where some terrorists came ashore and shot things up a few years later.

Q: Did you go to Christmas and Easter services there?

DU CHATEAU: I did, in Jerusalem, you mean. We made a point to visit churches on holy days, just to observe. Once, it must have been around Easter, we were outside the Holy Sepulcher and watched the lighting the Holy Fire. That was an experience. We were able to get a place above the courtyard in front of the entrance to the Holy Sepulcher, so we had no trouble being down in the packed crowd in front of the church entrance. Just being here and watching everything that went on was very interesting. A tremendous number of people were out there, thousands maybe crammed in there in the courtyard. It's not uncommon for people to get crushed in the crowd.

Christmas Day we would go down to Bethlehem. It was a kind of tradition with us. Of course the night before, Bethlehem would be packed with people for the midnight service - you could see it on television - but on Christmas day it would be quiet, deserted.

One time I remember driving down, it was raining some, and there was a beautiful rainbow over the area where, traditionally, the Shepherd's Fields were located. It all came together, that special area, beautiful rainbow, a double rainbow actually, it seemed very, very magical. One does not have to be religious to appreciate the symbolism, the event.

I think it was a week or so before our last Christmas there, we went on a tour of the Bethlehem area with Father Jerry, I think I mentioned him earlier. He ended the trip with a prayer in the church there near Shepherd's Fields. I'm not religious, but it's something to remember. Obviously I haven't forgotten.

But going to the church there in Bethlehem on Christmas day, it's quiet, you just look around and think. It was beautiful.

RICHARD T. MCCORMACK
Undersecretary of State for Economic Affairs
Washington, DC (1989-1991)

Ambassador McCormack was born in Bradford, Pennsylvania and educated at Georgetown University and University of Fribourg. He was the United States Ambassador to the Organization of American States from 1985-1989 and the United States Undersecretary of State for Economic and Agricultural Affairs from 1989-1991. The Ambassador was interviewed in 2002 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: What was the situation in Saudi Arabia vis-a-vis our interests at that point?

McCORMACK: It was of course, a very complicated situation. In the 1967 War, Israel expanded its borders.

Q: This was known as the Six-Day War?

McCORMACK: Yes, Israel expanded its borders considerably. There were some in Israel who wanted to have that expansion permanent, which was widely resented in the Arab world. So when an opportunity arose to strike back at Israel with the help of the Russians, a war was organized in 1973 to attack Israel. This attack was an astonishing thing to the Israelis, and for some few days it appeared successful. But for the tactical mistakes of the Syrian army after their original breakthrough near the Golan Heights, they could have driven on through to Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. But instead the Syrian tank armies just circled around under the Golan Heights for two days. By then we were able to provide Israel with enough new weapons to deal with the military crisis they were facing. The Russians not only provided the Arabs with advice, they also provided them with anti-aircraft missiles and all sorts of other things.

Q: Very effective.

McCORMACK: In any case, you had the 1967 Six-Day War, which was a great success for the Israelis. Then you had the 1973 War, which was a disaster. Eventually the Israelis won, but they suffered terrible losses. The Arabs basically felt that the Americans had helped the Israelis in their hour of need, and they threatened us with an oil embargo unless some kind of settlement between Israel and the Palestinians occurred. They confiscated the holdings of the American oil companies in Saudi Arabia and elsewhere. We wound up with an enormous problem. So I went to the Treasury to work on this complex of issues.

In those early days, there were three different theories about what to do about soaring oil prices and OPEC. You had one group of strategists from the outside. Ed Luttwak, for example, wanted to go in with military force to seize Arab oil. He and his friends wrote many articles urging this policy. That was one option. The second option was to do nothing about the increase in the price of oil, which was putting increasing strain on many economies in the world, and simply let one or two major countries go bust. As one man said ironically, "Use the corpse of Italy to flog OPEC into being more reasonable on oil prices." That too was rejected.

The third option was to take the oil dollars and recycle them to other countries using our banks, to prevent the Arabs from directly using the money themselves to extract political leverage. In the meantime, the plan was to encourage as much oil production as possible in as many different places as possible so as to create a supply and demand situation that would no longer allow OPEC to have the clout on prices that it did. It was the third plan that was eventually launched and implemented.

In the Treasury Department, there was a young Assistant Secretary close to Secretary Simon, who was my direct superior. For various reasons, he and I did not enjoy a warm personal relationship. So I returned to the White House and worked at the trade office on a major commodity policy initiative.

The broader situation at Treasury did not improve, however, and press leaks documented an ugly series of personal and policy disputes, spiced by the occasional candid camera incident that lasted until a White House ultimatum stopped the leaks.

Q: Are there any other issues or events you want to record?

McCORMACK: Yes, the Joint Economic Development Group (JEDG) working on the Israeli economy was a challenging part of my job as Under Secretary. Fortunately, I had the services of Dr. Herbert Stein to advise and support me in this effort. He was a truly remarkable man. Not only was Stein an advisor, but he was also a friend, whose friendship lasted until he passed away years later. This special joint group was originally set up to help stabilize the Israeli economy after the large inflation in Israel in the early 1980s, which nearly destroyed the banking system. Herb Stein was then the coordinator of that process under Shultz. When I became Under Secretary, I asked Stein to continue to work with me.

In the 1980s, the U.S. eventually wound up giving a billion dollars to Israel to try to get their finances back in shape after the train had jumped the rails. The JEDG tried to encourage sound economic policies while creating a better and more favorable economy and a climate for business and investment. As you know, Israel was founded by a group of idealistic socialists. So there were all kinds of egalitarian processes built into the Israeli economy beginning with the kibbutz movement and the powerful labor union organizations. But it constipated business and investment.

During this period, Jacob Frankel who was chief economist of the IMF, came to see me and said that he was being considered as the Head of the Bank of Israel. I appealed to him to do it. Frankel was one of the ablest economists I had worked with. There were elections coming up. Prime Minister Shamir naturally wanted to be re-elected. None of us, however, wanted a repeat of Menachem Begin's boom and bust.

When I left government in 1991, I went to the Woodrow Wilson Center and spent the next year writing papers on economic reforms for the Israeli economy. I delivered my reports to audiences in Israel and emphasized also how important defeating inflation and promoting a successful peace process was to future investment and prosperity in Israel. These presentations received a great deal of local media attention.

When Frankel left many years later from the Bank of Israel, there was almost no inflation in the country, and the business climate had dramatically improved.

CHARLOTTE ROE
Tel Aviv, Israel (1989-1991)

Ms. Roe was born and raised in New York State and educated at the University of Colorado, the Sorbonne and Ohio State University. During and after her university training she was involved in political and labor activities. In 1983 she joined the Foreign Service. In the course of her career with the State Department, Ms. Roe served in La Paz, Santiago, Tel Aviv, Budapest and Bogotá, primarily in the political and labor fields. In Washington, she served on the US Mission to the OAS and in the International Organizations and Environmental and Scientific Affairs Bureaus. Ms. Roe was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: Turning to Israel now, you were there from when to when?

ROE: I was in Israel from August 1989 to July 1990, when I took another hard-to-fill assignment in Colombia. I arrived in Tel Aviv after a month of area studies at FSI.

Q: Your job was what?

ROE: I was labor attaché.

Q: Who was the Ambassador at that time?

ROE: William Brown was Ambassador and Mark Parris was deputy Chief of Mission. Mike Metrinko, the consul general, had been one of the hostages in Tehran during the Iranian revolution.

Q: Now, how would you put the status of American-Israeli relations when you arrived?

ROE: Israeli-U.S. relations have been intertwined since the creation of the State of Israel in 1948. The U.S. is Israel's largest trading partner. We carry out joint military planning exercises. We have cooperative institutions in many scientific and technical areas. The political and cultural ties are so close we sometimes seem like members of the same family. Tel Aviv is one of the "special relationship" posts like Mexico City and London where you have a galaxy of eyes watching everything you do, and the policy is mostly determined out of Washington.

Q: While you were there, what were our interests in the labor movement?

ROE: Histadrut (the Israeli labor federation) has been a major player in the country's economy and political landscape since the earliest days of nation-building. It's a trade union and social movement, but also the largest employer after the government. Histadrut has operated the largest industrial conglomerates, the second largest bank, the transportation and building trades and insurance enterprises. Several of these firms including Koor were in fiscal crisis. Histadrut ran the biggest national health care and day care services. It coordinated the agricultural cooperatives – the iconic kibbutzim and moshavim – which were also facing tough times. Its regional institutes cultivate strong connections with developing countries especially in Africa and Latin America. In 1989 the federation represented nearly 60 percent of the adult population. Its 1.6 million members included 247,000 Israeli Arabs and Druze. Some 15 percent of the Histadrut are non-Jews. Housewives belong as well as students.

Q: You didn't have to have a job to join it.

ROE: It's like a big tent. The day workers who come from Gaza and the West Bank pay discounted Histadrut dues and are entitled to representation on the job, but since they're not legal residents, they couldn't be members. The federation mirrors Israeli society and consciousness. Shortly after I arrived, I monitored the Histadrut national elections in November 1989. Israeli political parties contested the elections to Histadrut's leadership conference as well as to the 72 local labor councils. These contests were closely watched as a bellwether for the parliamentary elections of 1990. I recruited Aubrey Hooks, the top econ officer, to join me in covering the balloting. He's a Hebrew speaker, and the process fascinated him.

Q: Whither Aubrey Hooks?

ROE: The Hooks were my sponsors in Tel Aviv. Aubrey went on to be consul general and DCM in Warsaw and is currently Ambassador in Azerbaijan.

Q: What was your impression of this labor federation? You have something that's a huge organization, delving into all sorts of social activities. How effective is it and how bureaucratic has it become and does it deliver?

ROE: When Labor Zionists led by David Ben-Gurion developed a centralized economic infrastructure to support the new state of Israel, they made Histadrut into a quasi-state institution. Over time the organization had become ossified and deeply indebted. Histadrut General Secretary Israel Kessar was a Labor Party leader and a member of the Knesset (Israeli Parliament). Going to call on him was almost like calling on the president of the country. Kessar was an Israeli Yemenite, the first non-Ashkenazi to be elected to this key position. He and many of his officers didn't speak English. I hadn't received Hebrew training, except for a few classes I took at the end of my tour in Santiago. At formal meetings we spoke through an interpreter, who often put his own spin on the conversation. My position was not language-designated, and I strongly recommended that this be changed. Later it was.

Q: Was there a reason for this? Was Histadrut a stronghold of the Zionist movement?

ROE: Historically, yes. The old guard of Histadrut was the successor generation to the Mapai, the Zionist father of the modern Labor party. You had interlocking directorates between Mapai and Histadrut, although this started to break down in the 1970s and 80s. Labor was losing its hegemony as the dominant political party with successive waves of Sephardic immigrants. Unlike the Ashkenazim, the Sephardim were not from northern and eastern Europe and Russia. Many are descended from Jews who were exiled from Spain in the 1400s and settled in Turkey, southeastern Europe, North Africa and other Middle Eastern countries.

Q: Such as Yemen and Morocco—

ROE: Yes. Originally, Ashkenazi meant a person who spoke Yiddish, a dialect of German, and Sephardim meant someone who spoke Ladino, the ancient Judeo-Spanish dialect. Many of the older generation still converse in Ladino. It's a beautiful language that helped my husband and I connect with many Israelis of this heritage.

Histadrut was like an overgrown, paternalistic company. Like Israel itself, it was troubled, defensive, fractious, composed of hundreds of little kiosks run by resourceful technicians, intellectuals and political survivors who are internationalists at heart. One of the more interesting parts of Histadrut is its African institute that has trained local activists and supports local movements for democratic change throughout the continent. Histadrut was crying out for reform. In June 1989, the federation approved a reform blueprint written by Professor Avraham Friedman that called for privatizing many of the Histadrut-owned enterprises and building a more horizontal, democratic trade union structure. Not surprisingly, implementation of the plan was stalled.

Another thorny issue was the relationship of Histadrut to West Bank and Gaza workers. Before my assignment, the Department raised the idea of a dialogue with Palestinian unions, an issue that previous labor attachés apparently saw as the kiss of death. My trade union experience gave me confidence in encouraging the initiative within Histadrut, but naturally there was resistance. Israel Kessar took the stance that “we can’t meet with them because the law says no dealings with the PLO (Palestine Liberation Organization).” He took it for granted that any Palestinian union leader would be part of the political structure and not independent. Now, West Bank and Gaza workers in Israel were charged a 1 percent agency fee in exchange for getting union contract and grievance representation. In practice they received little protection. Unofficially, Histadrut officers acknowledged that this was a compelling reason for dialogue.

In March 1990 Tony Freeman, State’s Special Assistant for Labor Affairs, visited Israel to initiate the first high-level Department contact with Palestinian unions. We coordinated the trip with the U.S. Consulate General in Jerusalem. Our encounters with leaders of the West Bank Palestinian Trade Union Federation (WBPFTU) were memorable. In Nablus, we observed a hotly contested local union election in a shoe factory and later met with WBPFTU leader Shahir Saad, whose organization was founded in 1920. Saad, who defined himself as a moderate, appreciated the chance to open a new door. We asked why he affiliated with the ICFTU (International Confederation of Free Trade Unions) instead of the WFTUF (the communist-oriented World Federation of Trade Unions). He said it was the only way to go, because the ICFTU stands for democratic trade unionism and peaceful social change. Saad’s action’s supported this stance.

At the time, Saad was restricted by a travel ban. After the visit, I wrote Histadrut asking for their help in lifting the ban. In August 1990, Histadrut set up a legal aid office for workers from the occupied territories. Within the next year, the Israeli ban on contacts with the PLO was lifted, and Histadrut began a dialogue with the WBPFTU. I counted these small steps as an important gain in Israel.

An aside -- Tony Freeman later served as Director of ILO’s Washington office from 1994-2004. In that capacity, and after his retirement, I worked closely with him on many issues including labor standards in trade legislation and worker rights in Cuba. He never lost his zeal in fighting for working people and defending their freedom to contract and speak truth to power. Tony passed recently -- a shock and sorrow to everyone who knew him and his joie de vivre. He was a mentor, a friend, a hero to me.

Q: Did you have the feeling that our labor policy and labor attachés had been a little too much in the pocket of the Israelis, and so this opening up to these others, they say well, you can do it but imply that we’d rather you didn’t. I’m just wondering whether or not you got that feeling.

ROE: It’s clear I was skating into unknown territory. Histadrut’s leaders assume you are on their side. When you raise new ideas, such as the need for dialogue with the West Bank & Gaza trade unionists, you need to be very insistent that you’re speaking for the U.S. government. Whether in an informal lunch meeting with Israel Kessar and his colleagues or an official state visit, every word is carefully weighed and registered.

The Middle Eastern area studies program at FSI helped me do some soul-searching. I identified strongly with the Jewish experience. In 1974, a year after the Yom Kippur war, when I first visited Israel, it was a different country. Back then I had wondered if the U.S. policy of even-handedness was fair, and if we shouldn't do more to support Israel. Then in 1989 I read Tom Friedman's book From Beirut to Jerusalem. The book and my Israel experience were eye-openers. Twenty-three years of occupation had transformed the country. Both Israelis and Palestinians seemed to be living on a knife's edge. The U.S. wants to be an honest broker in the conflict, but we lose that standing when we don't engage consistently. It's difficult to discuss the issues fairly when AIPAC is such a powerful influence on the Congress and the news media.

Q: This is the American Israeli Political Action Committee—

ROE: AIPAC is very vocal, well organized, single-minded and nationalistic. Many believe this lobby does not speak for the mainstream of American Jewry. Its saber-rattling hurts those in Israel and the U.S. trying to work for peaceful solutions. I worked with many U.S.-based Jewish organizations in Israel who are quite critical of AIPAC's role. The situation with Histadrut is different. They're dedicated marketeers. The Israeli labor attaché in Washington offered Hector a job as an auto mechanic before he got there. The only hitch is that the government wouldn't give him a work permit – even though the U.S. grants work permits to family members of Israeli diplomats hassle-free under our reciprocity agreement. That was a telling glimpse into the country's bureaucratic labyrinth. Instead, Hector worked for the Colombian ambassador, Edmundo Esquinazi. Esquinazi was a self-made millionaire, a Turkish-born Sephardic Jew who found Israeli culture and business dealings to be challenging in extremis. He was generous with his staff, and couldn't do enough for Hector.

Q: In a way, you've got two masters. You've got the State Department. You also have to a certain extent the American labor movement.

ROE: The Department sets the policy, but labor has historically had a strong and respected voice in this area and human rights in general.

Q: The American labor movement particularly at the top and certainly at intellectual levels has a very strong Jewish participation. This goes back from the very beginning of labor history. Did you find that the Jewish element within the labor movement had a thrust that was different than AIPAC or was it a creature of AIPAC?

ROE: The AFL-CIO is no pawn of AIPAC, and I've always felt that Jewish intellectual input in labor – in any organization – is a real strength. Under AFL-CIO presidents Meany and Kirkland and now Sweeney, American labor has been very engaged on the Israel issue. This stems from labor's World War II era efforts to help resettle and rescue refugees, especially those threatened by the Holocaust. My experience gave me the sense that the occupation was eroding Israel's identity. Not many in the AFL-CIO leadership shared that view, but then again, American labor is not monolithic.

Shortly before my assignment started, the CWA (the Communication Workers International union) planned to hold a meeting in Jerusalem. CWA requested my participation. Our consul general in Jerusalem said if I attended it would imply U.S. support for moving the Embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem (a long-standing Israeli goal). I quickly learned how sensitive these issues can be. AFL-CIO doesn't heed those nuances.

Q: Did they have a meeting in Jerusalem?

ROE: They went ahead, but I couldn't go, and since no one attended from the consulate, it went unreported.

Q: What about the contacts in Gaza and the West Bank. Is this more or a less the realm of our consulate general in Jerusalem? Was this strictly off limits for you?

ROE: It wasn't my usual area, but I visited the West Bank and Gaza on several occasions. The Arabic-speaking human rights officer, John Chamberlain, covered Gaza from Tel Aviv. I coordinated my activities and reporting with respect to West Bank unions with the consulate. Relations with the consul general (CG) were testy at first, because I started out by pressing for answers concerning the CWA initiative. But I understood their concerns, and soon developed a closer relationship with the CG.

Q: Who was that?

ROE: Phil Wilcox -- a very knowledgeable, straight-talking diplomat. He's now working with the Foundation for Middle East Peace.

Q: Did you get a feel for how Arabs were treated in West Bank and Gaza?

ROE: Yes. The intifada (the Palestinian uprising against the occupation) began in the late 1980s, adding fuel to an already grim, conflictive situation. In 1990 over 100,000 Arab workers from the occupied territories worked in Israel. Their labor rights were barely protected and their movements frequently restricted for security reasons. Arab labor contributed to Israel's prosperity. Palestinians watched the growth of Israeli settlements that lock in the occupation, making them exiles from their own land. More are turning to the politics of vengeance.

Israeli Arabs have their own political parties in the Knesset and their own caucus within the Labor Party. They comprise nearly twenty percent of the population and make up over fifteen percent of Histadrut membership. The U.S. Information Service (USIS) had a traveling library that regularly visited Arab villages in Israel. They would invite me to talk on safety net programs in the U.S., how the social security system works, the status of Arab-Americans in the U.S., and other socio-economic issues. Back then, most Israeli Arabs had a cordial regard for the U.S. and some understanding of our role in the Middle East. They identified with the Palestinian cause, but felt rooted in Israel. They faced a lot of discrimination, and their towns had scant resources. Arab-speaking and Jewish children could not attend school together.

Richard Israelovitch, the senior social scientist at Beersheba University, invited me to visit the campus. Richard directed the Israeli bird watching society and also headed the Hubert Humphrey Institute at the university. His associate, Ismael Abu Saad, was the only Bedouin in Israel to earn a post-doctoral degree. Ismael's wife Kathy was a leader in the human rights association fighting for the rights of Bedouins. Hector and I went to Abu Saad's brother's wedding during our last weekend in Israel and observed something I'll never forget. When we arrived at the wedding which was in a small town near Beersheba, we saw a lot of camels in a tiny plot. Their owners, who were relatives of the Saads, had a parcel of land to the south of Tel Aviv. The husband was doing business outside of Tel Aviv, and his wife was manning their shop in the market near where they lived. Without warning, the Israeli "green police" came along and forced them to take all their animals and return to their relatives' place in Beersheba. The authorities claimed the family had no rights to the land, even though they owned clear title. The Israelis not only forcefully moved them, but also make them pay exorbitantly for the transportation of the camels and other livestock. Near the wedding site we also saw some olive trees, and learned that those too were condemned to be destroyed by the state. The Israelis regularly uproot the olive trees that are not grown expressly with their permission. These cases go through the courts, but very slowly.

Q: Of course it takes a decade to get a decision.

ROE: About as long as it takes an olive tree to grow in the desert. Then the authorities make the farmers pay for the uprooting equipment on top of the indignity and economic damage they've experienced. The Israelis are proud of making the desert bloom, but in carrying out these policies they destroy a precious natural resource on which people depend. The irony is that Bedouins played key roles in several Israeli victories against the Arab states. These policies seem guaranteed to turn them into enemies.

Q: Well, I wondered, you had two things going for somebody who was in Israel, an American. One you have this natural affinity towards Israeli, plucky little state, very modern, with the terrible experience of the Holocaust as a backdrop. Politically it's dynamite if you try to oppose it, but the other, but on the other hand you've got this problem of the Israelis being beastly to the Arabs. I mean one can't help but think of South Africa in the time of apartheid. The other one is that Israel seems to be able to lead the United States along by a leash practically when because of the political clout within the American political system.

ROE: What I witnessed was a state of mutual fear, stoked by the Palestinians' blind support for violent solutions and Israeli's exercise of lordly might. The government of Israel effectively plays our system and knows our weaknesses, but we're responsible for our mistakes. Our Congressional leaders seem to assume that unless we stand pat, everything will fall apart. But Israel has grown beyond its infancy. Some of the most astute commentators I found were in military intelligence – men like Efraim Halevy, who headed the Mossad from 1998-2003. They saw the deadly consequences of continuing the status quo with the occupied territories. Americans feel ambivalent about Israel – loving its can-do spirit and heroic accomplishments but uncomfortable with its present. Israelis seem even more divided about their role. They've been heatedly debating the issue for years, without fear of censorship. Take the question of the billion dollar blank check the U.S. writes to Israel each year. Many Israelis feel this aid is corrupting their country from within, creating dependencies, postponing hard decisions about internal reforms. Yet it continues because U.S. policymakers can't bring themselves to question the process.

I saw Israelis struggling with the implications of being an occupying country. An Israeli think tank called the West Bank Data Project did excellent research on policies that could change the equation with the Palestinians. They criticized Israel's post-statehood practice of changing place names to eradicate any history of Palestinian settlement. Attorney General Michael Ben-Yair wrote that after the Six-Day War that Israel "enthusiastically chose to become a colonial society, ignoring international treaties, expropriating land, transferring settlers from Israel to the occupied territories, engaging in theft and finding justification for all these activities." Excessively strong words, maybe -- but most Israelis found that living through the ethnic conflict created a constant tension, like a fault line forming under the simplest of everyday interactions.

Israel's technocratic and business leaders also understood their country couldn't sustain growth in a climate of Balkan-style ethnic conflict. After two decades on the margins, the peace movement was gaining mainstream potency. Some of those participating were industrial leaders and military leaders, including prominent women army officers who simply could not justify Israel's foreign policy. This was no bedraggled minority. Not long after I left Yitzhak Rabin became Prime Minister, raising hopes for reform.

Q: Did you find that you were working more in conjunction with the human rights officer at the Embassy than maybe at some other place?

ROE: I would have liked to see closer cooperation between the human rights and labor functions. I had more support from the economic section and USIS, which were less fragmented and closed off than the political section. The political counselor, John Becker and the deputy polcon, Ted Feifer, were savvy, thoughtful officers, both very different in style but great colleagues. The problem was structural. We were like a microcosm of Israel's splintered bureaucracy. We worked in a section of Tel Aviv that used to be the red light district. It was a little slum of a chancery, and when I asked if it had always been this way, many would say, "Oh, we hardly notice, because we came from Embassy Moscow, which is the real pits." Each part of the political section was locked off in a separate office. These were the last years of the WANG operating system. To send a classified cable, you had to lock your office, go into the main political section and enter a cold storage room that looked like a NASA (National Air and Space Administration) command center. To shut it down took about twenty-five operations at night. This setup and the frenetic climate of Tel Aviv impacted the work environment. One Israeli contact told me that living there was like being on an electric shock bed.

Q: Were you there long enough to feel the results of President George H.W. Bush's attempt to curb the settlements movement and loan guarantees?

ROE: The U.S. was clearly putting pressure on the Israelis. It was a stark contrast from what we have seen under George W. Bush, who in effect gave a green light to settlements. The Administration exerted its financial leverage to deter the settlements. I think Israelis got the message. George H.W. Bush, the father, took the view that Israelis were sabotaging themselves with the settlement activity and losing their international credibility. Israelis pushed back hard; still, they understood our need to play an independent role. But the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin shattered the peace effort and traumatized the Israeli reform movement. The revelation that his killer was a right-wing Israeli fanatic shocked the national psyche. That wound has yet to heal.

Q: What about Russian immigrant? Was that that affecting the labor movement?

ROE: Immigration affected everyone. Israelis were making heroic efforts to absorb the rising stream of immigrants. Soviet immigration reached record numbers – 184,000 in 1990, up from 13,000 the previous year. The government and Histadrut were preparing for another wave of immigrants from Ethiopia. They were processing newcomers in huge absorption centers, providing Hebrew literacy, cultural orientation and training for the job market. The incorporation of what would be a million more immigrants by the mid-1990s was a huge challenge. Unemployment was increasing. It had reached a twenty year high of 9.6 percent in 1990. But somehow the Israeli economy managed to absorb that great immigrant wave. It's a high tech economy, and the Israeli safety net and brainpower resources make the system resilient. The immigrants generated new demands and new jobs. Still, Ethiopians face discrimination in the workplace. Those of Jewish descent were called Falashas (outsiders) in Ethiopia. Many who came to Israel still felt like outsiders.

Q: How did you view the action of the religious parties, the orthodox and ultra-orthodox? Were they much of a factor?

ROE: They're part of a deep divide in Israeli political life. Because of this polarization, no party can get a majority. Labor Zionism made the State of Israel into a kind of civil religion. The new religious party – like Shas -- looks down on secularism. They want to enthrone their view of traditional Judaism within the state and implicitly press a relentless territorial agenda. The ultranationalist religious have weight beyond their numbers, and some of the fringe groups are really fanatic. These zealots connect the settlement of the West Bank – the Biblical Judea and Samaria – to the advent of the Messiah. Their pursuit of a theocracy parallels the goals of the Islamic jihadists. In one neighborhood, shortly after I arrived, a kiosk owner sold newspapers that offended one religious party. Party supporters burned down his store and killed him. This ultranationalist movement gave rise to a terrorist underground that carried out several attacks on West Bank Arab mayors in the 1980's. They planned to destroy the Dome of the Rock mosque in Jerusalem. This fervor led to the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, opening the way to the collapse of the peace process and the second intifada in 2000.

Q: Do they play much of a role within the labor movement?

ROE: Their presence made the Labor party leadership of Histadrut walk on eggshells with respect to certain social issues. Their numbers were growing, but still low. During the November 1989 elections, the Labor list won 55 percent. Kessar drew on a few of the more moderate religious parties for his winning coalition. Likud won only 27 percent, just short of the 30 percent it would take to get a seat on the executive board.

Q: Well, having this huge bureaucracy did you miss the traditional labor leader, the guy or gal who was going out there organizing as you had been doing?

ROE: Israel is not a place where union advocates do much traditional organizing. Histadrut is embedded in local communities, because of the multiple services it offers and its history. It's not perceived as a separate, underdog movement like its counterpart in the U.S. For me, the best times were visiting the small towns and the touring that Hector and I did in our spare moments. I'll never forget the way the Sephardim –immigrants from Morocco and Yemen – opened their homes to strangers on Passover and the joy with which they rekindled their traditions. Or the beauty of Safed, the Sea of Galilee and the archeological treasures in out of the way places. I think Hector had the best of our stay there – every few days he would accompany Ambassador Esquinazi to Jerusalem, and he saw more of the countryside through his job.

Q: Were there other major events while you were there?

ROE: I recall one spring day that rocked Tel Aviv and the American communities. At dawn on May 30, PLO terrorists launched a mini-tanker with half a dozen speedboats from Libya in an effort to attack Tel Aviv's town hall and beachfront hotels. Five of them attempted to board the beach at Herzliya, the suburban township where we lived.

Q: What happened to the raid?

ROE: A Navy gun boat patrolling off Tel Aviv spotted the first boat and made the raiders surrender. Then the Air Force, Navy and police went on high alert. The IDF killed several raiders and rounded up the rest employing attack helicopters and spotter planes. The Israelis had apparently had some advance warning, much earlier, but without specifics. The terrorist also had problems with several of their boats breaking down. As the IDF (Israeli Defense Force) was counter-attacking, the RSO whisked off U.S. Ambassador Brown to safety. However, the Embassy took no steps to warn American citizens away from the beach or protect them. This generated angry responses from several diplomats' families, including the economic counselor. Israelis were also shocked. Few had imagined the beaches would be a front line in the intifada.

This took place as I was being reassigned to Colombia. In April I bid on the labor counselor vacancy in Mexico, a senior position. Ambassador Brown wrote a cable supporting my bid. U.S. Ambassador to Mexico John Negroponte backed me. I was about to be paneled, but the Director General nixed the assignment because it was a two grade hike. Then our DCM called from Bogotá. The deputy political counselor had become a hard to fill position, because families had been evacuated in 1989 due to terrorist threats. Even though families were returning, officers were reluctant to sign on because they knew the security situation could change again. Colombia was gearing up for a constituent assembly which could have a big impact on the country's future and U.S. policy interests. Monitoring the assembly would be my main focus. So I took that assignment.

Tel Aviv (1989-1992)

Ambassador Clarke was born in Georgia in 1941. He attended Dartmouth College and enlisted in the US Army. He later entered Harvard University and then entered the Foreign Service. His career included positions in Germany, Nigeria, Romania, the USSR, and Israel. He was later appointed Ambassador to Uzbekistan. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: You went to Israel in '89?

CLARKE: Right.

Q: What were you doing and how did that come about?

CLARKE: I was not aware that there was a vacancy in Israel, nor was it a place I hoped to go. I was actually phoned by Mark Parris, who was a relatively new DCM there, whom I had worked with elsewhere, and said they needed an economic counselor and if I wanted it, the job was mine. He later strengthened that invitation by saying that they hoped I would serve as acting DCM when that was needed, because they visualized me as the third ranking person for the Embassy in Tel Aviv. I had wanted to be DCM again and had not found such a berth. The call was well timed, and I agreed to it. I went there, half expecting that since I'd been economic counselor to the Soviet Union, that probably in a country the size of Israel, this would not be an excessively difficult job. That was a misjudgment. Israel certainly didn't have anything like the scale or the kinds of problems that we had in the Soviet Union. Nevertheless it turned out to be a very interesting and challenging assignment.

Q: You were there from 1989 to when?

CLARKE: '89 to '92. I arrived thinking that the economic relationship was basically fairly stable. But I arrived just at the time when the United States imposed ceilings on Jewish immigration admissions to the United States. Suddenly thousands of Jews who had hoped to go to the United States decided they couldn't and began emigrating to Israel. That opened a whole dialogue as to what the United States would do to help Israel absorb the Jews that it had always wanted to absorb, now coming from the Soviet Union.

Q: Who was the ambassador of this '89 to '92 period?

CLARKE: Bill Brown was the ambassador most of that time. I got to know him pretty well because I was acting DCM frequently. The econ job was a little different from the one in Moscow. In Moscow it had been largely a reporting function. Separate sections that I did not supervise were doing science or agriculture or whatever. In Tel Aviv, I was responsible for the agricultural operation which consisted of a local employee doing reporting and also for the science relationship. One of my officers was engaged full time in the science relationship. I also supervised an officer and local employees who worked on aid to the Gaza Strip.

Q: Let's talk first about the economic job. You see the disproportionate amount of our aid by far goes to Israel, which strikes me as being an industrial state. It certainly probably needs the money far less than for example, Botswana or some place like that. Can you say how you saw the economy of Israel in this '89 to '92 period?

CLARKE: Israel had a difficult time partly because it needed reform. It was stuck with a socialist economy which was not working very well. In fact, practically no progress was made on privatization during that period. They were getting ready to begin to start for the whole three years I was there. I knew some people working very seriously on it, and it was just going against the political grain for Israel to do this. They were just having a terrible time.

They were running inflation of over 10 percent much of the time and that was irritating people a lot. The constantly depreciating shekel made it hard for them to be competitive. They were exporting but inflation was making it difficult.

Q: Why weren't they making the necessary adjustments? Was it because of theory? Were we supporting a socialist theory?

CLARKE: No. It's because changes in the local setup depended upon political action, political decisions and support in the Knesset. The majorities were never really that secure. If a state-owned company was proposed for privatization, no matter what price they wanted to sell it at, there would be an instant 49 or 51 percent of the Knesset that would say that price was too low. If they put the price too high, they couldn't sell it. So it was just politics. I believe that U.S. financial support tended to cause the shekel to be overvalued, which tended to make exports difficult. I don't know if recent history has proved me right or wrong on that, but I felt that our assistance was a mixed blessing. They tended to rely on it to balance their budget as well as to balance the foreign trade account. It was a huge share of our worldwide economic assistance. As you may know, those big figures consist of a more-than-50-percent share of military assistance and that is a figure that reflects purchases by Israel in the United States so that was not really inflationary in Israel. That was an in-kind subsidy of their military budget, and I don't think it had much economic effect one way or the other.

Q: The economic effect was that we were underwriting their military budget.

CLARKE: It enabled them to have a larger military than they otherwise would have had. Yes, it saved them money from their budget. The economic assistance was a cash transfer, something we don't do in practically any other place.

Q: We talk about politics in Israel, but this was pure politics in the United States, too.

CLARKE: Right, but you get into these commitments through a policy process, however flawed. Not through a really arbitrary decision. You get into them through things like the Camp David process, in which commitments were made to both Israel and Egypt to make it easier for them to agree. We got into it through the economic crisis that occurred in Israel in the 1980s, that I think began the process of convincing Israelis that socialism really was never going to work, e.g., when all of their biggest banks had to be nationalized because they went bust. We then promised more money to help bail them out.

Once you began supplying the money, AIPAC – the American-Israel Political Action Committee – made it its goal in life, during at least the first part of my tour there. Its goal was to increase the flow of funds to Israel by whatever channels and means it could find, generally through getting Congress to write things into legislation. They were very effective at doing that, and they were even more effective in rounding up domestic support if there was any challenge to the existing flow. So they were very, very effective in keeping whatever was in place continuing, even if the original rationale for it was fading. They would keep it in place, and they tended to put in their annual report, “We got four billion dollars for Israel.” So if you wanted to know where all the American inflows into Israel were occurring, it was easier to find them in the publications of AIPAC than it was any where in Israel, where nobody was keeping track.

Q: I interviewed Sam Hart who had your job sometime before, and he mentioned that they would go through an analysis of what would be good for Israel. The Israelis would say that’s very nice, but it means nothing because the whole economic action was essentially a political decision that was happening between AIPAC and Congress and the Israelis who wanted money. I mean it’s really a pretty disgusting situation.

CLARKE: Yes. We prepared, with the approval of the ambassador, a very carefully worded report, suggesting what some of the economic disadvantages for Israel were of continued dependence on American economic assistance. There wasn’t a word in there about the military situation, which was driven by a different logic. Military assistance was support for their budget if you want to look at it that way, but it had a different logic. I did not feel that military assistance should have been reduced at that time. We couldn’t go into a peace process looking like we were too cheap to fund the side that was depending on us. So I was not then in favor of reducing military assistance. It was a subsidy for American business. Almost all the money had to be spent in the United States. There were very few exceptions. But on the economic side, our report pointed out some of the disadvantages and how, through a gradual process, maybe Israel could be weaned from this.

My recollection is we classified this analysis very highly. Reports of the existence of this report and the general gist of it – not the analysis but just what it supposedly concluded – made the American press long before most people in the Department had even gotten their copy to read. The ambassador and I met with some people, with AIPAC about this time, including Tom Dine, and they really gave us a hard time about it. But it was a respectful sort of relationship as I remember it. Maybe it could have been more respectful. The ambassador didn’t want to confirm or deny that we had sent this report, but he defended our right to make those kinds of recommendations if we felt they were appropriate.

Q: What was the common opinion in the embassy about where the leaks would occurred when something like this got out?

CLARKE: The highly classified leaks were in Washington. Both the Embassy and Washington accepted that if there was anything really sensitive, it better not be in writing.

The practice was that some of the embassy's most important instructions were received only over the classified telephone to the ambassador, not ever confirmed in writing. Our reporting, however, was meant to inform a whole lot of people in Washington. It couldn't be limited to a five or even 20 minute conversation on a STU 3 (secure phone line) and certainly not by pumping it all through the poor ambassador. So we had to keep reporting, and I would like to think that we tried very hard to be objective; I know the front office looked at my stuff very, very closely. We would discuss the bottom line on something, e.g., the final little comment section or recommendation section, until we were blue in the face. But I believe we served Washington as well as we possibly could under those circumstances.

That didn't mean we would write a cable quoting the prime minister if the prime minister told us something super-sensitive. That would have to go through the ambassador over the phone. But we reported our analysis of the country on a given issue. We just had to run the risk that somebody would leak it.

Q: As economic counselor, who were you dealing with mainly on the Israeli side?

CLARKE: I dealt with the economic department as I think it was called, the equivalent of the economic bureau of the Foreign Ministry. I dealt with the finance ministry, which was my most important counterpart, the central bank, and a whole host of economic agencies that I had some access to. The most difficult of those relationships was with the Housing Ministry headed by Ariel Sharon, who was reinforcing the settlements in the occupied territories through his ministry. I believe Sharon was acting on behalf of the Shamir government. Sharon was personally committed to building settlements. I was seen as unfriendly to that process. Nobody ever said a word to me personally about it – but they understood that I represented the interest of the United States in discouraging settlements in the West Bank and Gaza. They knew I was looking for data to reinforce my observations, and that was data that they considered secret and I was not going to get. So this is one area of my relationship with Israel that was difficult.

Q: Would you have officers go out to the housing areas and count and that sort of thing?

CLARKE: Sure. The consulate in Jerusalem, being responsible for the West Bank, did it in spades. We in the Embassy were worried about Gaza, and we would sometimes try to track that in Gaza. We had other interests in Gaza as well, so that wasn't necessarily always at the top of our list. We would try to track that, with whatever mechanism we could use. There were statistical reports coming out that we tried to examine. We tried to find how they were prepared and whether we could trust them. On the whole they were not precise, and they were not helpful. But they did actually reinforce the general impression that yes, official resources in Israel were going into settlements in the West Bank and Gaza, where to a reasonably neutral observer, no one would want to go and live without a subsidy. You didn't have to get into any secrets to talk to Israelis and learn how much more it cost to move into a house in one of these settlements and how much more it cost to move into a similar house 10 feet inside of what was called the green line.

Q: Were you involved in the decision of the Bush administration to hold up on loan guarantees for housing? Was this a major issue then?

CLARKE: I was involved with the very first request for housing loan guarantees in 1989 to assist Soviet Jewish immigration to Israel. When I first arrived, the Shamir government was actually a grand coalition, led by the Likud party, and the labor party was also in the coalition at that time. Shimon Peres, then Finance Minister, asked the Ambassador and me for four hundred million in housing loan guarantees. The initial response from the Department, which I believe was probably cleared or maybe even dictated by somebody on the seventh floor, was that we didn't think housing loan guarantees were a good way to assist Israel, "A". And "B", if we did go into something like that, we would have to be sure that any funds that we were providing were not enabling Israel to provide more funds to support settlements in the West Bank and Gaza.

When I saw that instruction, I suddenly realized that we had gotten ourselves into a really major political issue with Israel. Certainly the Likud, leading the government at that time, was counting on support from the settlers and was ideologically committed. I think there was even some hope that with all of these Russians coming in, there would actually be more people who wanted to live in the West Bank and Gaza than before. But being something of an economist, I knew that the freeing up of resources concept, the idea that our money is fungible, made the analysis extremely difficult to do. In fact, I had a huge job, and I spent a lot of energy over the next three years trying to sort that out.

Q: How was it playing out when you were there?

CLARKE: What you would have to show is not that there was some support going to the West Bank and Gaza, because that was already underway. But you had to show whether there was an increase in Israeli assistance to the settlements in occupied territories as a result of our support for settlement of the immigrants in other parts of Israel.

We also got into the business of Export-Import Bank financing for houses which was another thing that came under my supervision. We had to make sure the whole house didn't go to the West Bank or Gaza so we really had to go count houses. I couldn't find any other way to do that. They played it straight on that. As far as I know, none of that stuff ever went. They planned communities – some of them very badly planned, very unwisely planned – out in the Negev, where immigrants were supposed to go. Those houses were out there but nobody wanted to go there because there weren't any jobs. So what exactly they had in mind I don't know. Surely many of those houses were wasted. But those were commercially-financed houses, prefab houses built in the United States and set up by Israeli construction firms in the Negev and other parts of Israel.

Q: Did you feel that this was a time when we were being tougher with Israel than we have at other times?

CLARKE: I read Middle Eastern history to some extent when I was in college, but I don't claim to be in a position to calibrate and compare different periods. We were very committed. This was all a period in which James Baker and his close advisors were really the architects of our relationship with Israel and with the Palestinians. I think he really felt that this business of settlements was a make-or-break issue for the peace process. If the United States were seen to be supporting the expansion of these settlements with our capital, whether we claimed we were against it or not – if in fact our money was fungible and was turning up there, we were never going to have a peace process.

Part of the problem was rhetoric and ideology. In fact there was no great desire on the part of the immigrants or most others in Israel to move into these settlements. There were few Zionists or religious activists not already there who wanted to do it. It wouldn't have been hard for the government of Israel to cap what it was doing and allow the immigrants to settle in places where they wanted to settle. So I spent a lot of time trying to track this issue down, and Shamir and Sharon kept trying to "build facts on the ground" in the occupied territories.

There was some increase in settlement construction. Whether it had been planned before the wave of immigration really got underway or not, I'm not able to say. That would be getting into intentions and into plans that we were not privy to. But we then tried to get the Shamir government to negotiate with the Palestinians, and that was an extremely difficult process. I was not a central player in any of the peace process negotiations themselves. In fact I was often left running the embassy while the ambassador and DCM were busy supporting the frequent Baker visits in Jerusalem. But I was able to stay in pretty close touch with what the country team was able to learn about it. I do feel that some of Baker's success was the result of evenhandedness. Any mediator has to be extremely concerned about that. I also think he accepted what I would call the Kissinger maxim – it may predate Kissinger for all I know – that there isn't going to be a peace process unless Israel believes that its security is guaranteed. That's such a fundamental idea that it meant there were certain things that we should continue to reassure the Israelis on, on which they had been reassured many times dating from 20 years before.

Q: This is back to your point about supporting the military expenditures?

CLARKE: Yes. It's related to it.

Q: Were we concerned at this time about the Israeli military establishment selling advanced items to China and other places?

CLARKE: If there were any ulcers on that, they were mainly in the defense attaché office where they did have to vet proposals for selling military technology. Dual-use technology might have come more under State or Commerce supervision. That was not really a big issue for me in Israel. Every once in a while something would come up. Don't misunderstand me, this was a complex relationship. So many 747s took off every day from Israel to the United States and the same number were coming from the other direction so we had a very, very rich relationship there. If there was a possibility to misdirect technology, I'm sure somewhere along the line it's bound to have happened. But those main concerns were military technology, and the defense people were mainly concerned with that.

Q: Nuclear, did that fall under your responsibility?

CLARKE: No.

Q: I want to ask you about the Gulf War. I'd rather have a little more time to play with.

CLARKE: Oh, okay.

Q: So we'll pick up there. We've talked about most items dealing with your time in Israel, '89 to '92, not the Gulf War. Was there anything else that was going on then?

CLARKE: I got down into the Gaza Strip fairly frequently because unlike most economic sections, I also supervised the AID program for Gaza. I had a Foreign Service officer – a State Department Foreign Service officer – who was spending most of his time doing that. That's worth considering.

I think after I left, that function was replaced by a direct AID role. But I did go down there, not only because of the AID relationship but also because we were interested in the economy of Gaza. That was a very different thing from the economy of Israel. You had to view them as two separate pieces.

Q: Next time we'll pick up the Gulf War and the economy and what you observed in Gaza.

It's the seventh of January, 2000. Henry, let's talk about the Gulf War first. Could you explain how the Gulf War was viewed from Israel. Explain what the Gulf War was and then talk about it.

CLARKE: I believe the Gulf War really began in 1990 when Iraq invaded Kuwait. The U.S. government became very alarmed, not only at the conquest of what had been an independent state for a number of years, but also the threat to Saudi Arabia and the rest of the Gulf States and which seemed implicit in the ease with which Iraq took over Kuwait. What to do about it and all those questions of high policy were not being resolved in Tel Aviv where I was, but rather in Washington. But clearly there was a massive build-up of American troops in Saudi Arabia. The relationship with Israel in one sense became somewhat easier because suddenly they saw us as really doing something to stop aggression in the Middle East, and something against one of the radical states.

Saddam Hussein had been making threats against Israel throughout this period, right up to the invasion of Kuwait and perhaps even after. In any case, the threat that he would use chemical weapons was a matter of particular concern in Israel. Israel undertook to manufacture gas masks and other necessities for every citizen in the country, including foreigners such as ourselves who were in embassies there. We too in the U.S. Embassy began preparing ourselves for what appeared to be another likely phase of the war. The betting was that if pressed, Saddam Hussein would attack Israel as well as Saudi Arabia with scuds and that they might include chemical weapons but that given the huge buildup of American air power, this probably would be a short-lived exercise. The scud launchers would be found and destroyed as soon as they were used.

The question for us in the Embassy was largely whether to draw down the staff at the Embassy, to evacuate dependents, or what if anything, to minimize the Embassy community's exposure to possible Iraqi scud attacks including a possible chemical attack. I was not acting DCM during that period, and wasn't involved first hand in a lot of the debate back and forth. But based on town meetings held by the front office, we were all under the impression that when the war got underway, there would be a draw-down of the Embassy, and at least a voluntary, if not a mandatory, evacuation of dependents.

When the attack did come, I was very much involved because I was the senior duty officer in the Embassy at the time the scuds first came in. The very next day we began gathering up the people who were to be drawn down according to our plan, as well as dependents from both the Embassy in Tel Aviv and the Consulate in Jerusalem, and hauled them down to Eilat. In the meantime Washington changed its posture and decided there wouldn't be a draw-down. The people could take leave. I should add that prior to the first strike, dependents had been given the option of voluntary departure. I would say a majority, but not necessarily a huge majority, had left. The remaining dependents who chose not to leave and those officers and staff who were designated for the draw-down were the people taken down to Eilat, as it was believed to be out of range of the scuds. The plane came in to take them, but they didn't go unless they were willing to go on annual leave. A handful, including my two secretaries, decided to go on annual leave.

That was an amazing reversal and, considering the long planning that had gone into this draw-down, evidence that Washington was simply unable to make a decision and carry it out. The Embassy staff felt this was the result of some political decision in Washington not to be shown to be weak toward the Israelis. It is hard to believe, however, that they had not been consulted. The Israelis, many of whom had relatives in the United States, were crowding every flight out of Tel Aviv to the U.S. Apparently Americans were supposed to stay in Israel to be a good example for them.

Q: How about American citizens, the religious community and Orthodox Jews and all? What did they do?

CLARKE: When we allowed the voluntary departure of dependents, we had arranged for several extra flights to the United States by non-scheduled carriers. We made seats available for others who wanted to go as well. A number of them were provided seating on Pan Am. These were additional flights, not regularly scheduled flights. The regular scheduled flights were packed. My family did in fact take advantage of the voluntary departure, but it was a close call. It seemed by all the advice we were getting that, first of all, the scuds were not very accurate, and secondly that the invincible U.S. Air Force would put them out of action in very short order.

The inaccuracy of the scuds proved to be true. The impacts were scattered all over the Tel Aviv area, although some concentration in central Tel Aviv suggested that they were aiming more or less at the Ministry of Defense complex in the middle of Tel Aviv and anybody else they hit would be fine. But the scuds continued to fall almost daily, and sometimes more than once a day, throughout the Gulf War. There was no indication that our Air Force ever got any of the mobile launchers. They may have knocked out the fixed launchers that were spotted before the war, but the mobile launchers continued to function right up to the end when they lost the terrain that they were firing from.

As a result, I was very much happier that my family was gone when I saw what the situation was, even though of course, the threat of chemical warheads was not in fact carried out. We were told that the Iraqis had that capability. Subsequent to the war, we found out that they did indeed have it. I presume the reason they didn't use it was because they feared Israel would retaliate with a nuclear weapon. But that's just a presumption that we all shared.

In any event, we went about our business. My section had been scheduled for a fairly sharp draw-down because it was the economic section. It was thought that normal economic activities wouldn't be going on during the war and we wouldn't need so many people. As it turned out, we did different things, but we were all very busy. One of my secretaries quickly volunteered to come back, and we agreed to that as an exception to the usual rule. The rule was that once you'd been taken out, you didn't come back until the Department allowed everybody to come back. But we stayed very busy during that time. Nobody on my staff really wanted to be withdrawn, except for one secretary. So it was a good outcome that they weren't.

Q: Were there any cases of Foreign Service people, the professionals in the embassy just getting out, not panicking, but just leaving?

CLARKE: I can't confirm from my own experience anybody acting very panicky. I do know some questions were asked at these town meetings that sounded kind of panicky. I believe that there were a certain number of people, whom I did not know very well, who took this annual leave option very seriously and left. But the prevailing opinion among Foreign Service officers was that if they left and couldn't come back for months because the scuds stopped but the war was still going on, that they would just get stuck in the States. This was one argument against families going back too. I lost about $600 that I was never able to claim. FSOs would be stuck in a temporary situation in the states, losing money, and basically unable to do their jobs. So there wasn't great enthusiasm for going home. I was certainly glad to stay in Israel. This was, as one other officer put it, my first Middle Eastern War, so I was interested to see how it was going to go.

Q: I interviewed Chas Freeman, who was ambassador in Saudi Arabia. There they were faced with a problem that it was essential that they have a full operating embassy. They also did not want to give an example for ARAMCO, and other organizations of Americans to pull out and stop pumping oil. So maybe you were caught in that too, and the idea that Saudi Arabia was going to be more of a target than Israel might have been a factor.

CLARKE: It could well have been, although American Israelis and others were making their own decisions without checking with us. It is true that there was a domestic political issue in Israel that so many people were bugging out because they had relatives in the West. There was also a certain amount of internal migration as well. People were parking their families in hotels and motels and whatnot in those parts of Israel that were seen as difficult to hit or not targeted. It was their home so it's understandable that this was more stressful to Israelis.

Certainly than to people like me. But I can't say that my attitude was necessarily typical. I did spend a certain amount of my time trying to make it possible for economic activity between the United States and Israel to continue normally. Even before the first scud hit, commercial aviation dried up, even though Tel Aviv Airport was too small a target given the range and unreliability of the scuds. Apparently the insurance companies wouldn't insure a plane that went there, so they didn't go there unless there was government insurance provided. We did get some flights in and out on that basis. I think it was Tower Air or another contractor that was operating in the build up and resupply of our colleagues closer to the Gulf, stopping off in Tel Aviv and picking up passengers in Israel. But we had an interest on the part of Tower to expand that service because they had been a carrier, not just a charter company. We had a terrible time convincing people that we should maintain normal trade and transportation links as much as we could. But that was about it.

The major diplomatic effort was to keep the Israelis from intervening, and that was done by then-Deputy Secretary Eagleburger coming out and spending a lot of time in Tel Aviv and showing that he was personally willing to sit it out, not merely to recommend sitting it out. Indeed, perhaps that did help keep the Israelis from retaliating.

Q: Did you get any feeling from your contacts that the Israelis you talked to were thirsting to have a whack at Iraq or were they hoping they could stay out despite the scuds coming in?

CLARKE: The military certainly felt uncomfortable in the role of sitting tight. They were ready to do something and did not like leaving the fighting with Iraq up to other armies. There was a professional concern there, undoubtedly shared by many other Israelis who had served in the military, which is nearly 100 percent of the men and a lot of women. So clearly that sentiment was there, but it was not really a subtle point. They really understood that the Arab coalition that we had organized against Iraq could be broken up if Israel were identified as part of that coalition. This was not too subtle a point. Most Israelis understood it very clearly and realized they were weighing one concern against another. In the end they were pleased with what they had done. I think it was hardest for the political leaders in Israel where for several years tit-for-tat was the rule of the day. If you get struck by Arabs, you strike back. It was no secret we in Israel were certainly being struck and considerable damage was being done. What was fantastic was the small number of Israelis killed by these scuds, even the scuds landing in heavily residential areas, at times of the evening when people were at home. Lots of damage. Only a very few deaths. It's just remarkable. Miraculous.

Q: What about economic activity? Was there just a pause?

CLARKE: There was a considerable pause. There was even a question of whether ships would dock. Haifa was a port. Haifa was fired on very rarely by scuds. There was no real reason not to continue operations out of Haifa. Tel Aviv was not a port, but the airport shut down to all intents and purposes. El Al may have done some flying, but the other airlines did not. It was a period in which it was hard to get in and out of the country.

Q: What about normal shopping and that sort of thing?

CLARKE: There was a real effort to keep things going. In terms of retail trade, they needed to keep serving the public. A lot of restaurants managed to stay open and somehow continue operating. Every place open to the public was supposed to have a sealed room that you could go into when scuds started to land. Everybody was supposed to haul along their gas masks everywhere they went and we pretty much did. I had a little Pan Am bag with my little walkie talkie from the embassy and my gas mask and that just became like a women's purse, part of my uniform for the month or so this was going on.

We did go out to restaurants, but that was a little discouraging because it was in the early evening hours after nightfall in Iraq and therefore dusk and nightfall in Israel that almost all the attacks occurred. There were a few very late at night or in the early morning. The pattern must have been 80 or 90 percent of the scuds in the early evening, so that did break up the business of going out and celebrating. Israel was a quiet and gloomy place compared to the normal scene there. It was also very tense. You were very conscious of the raids. Not only because everybody would listen to the radio and go to their rooms and put on their gas masks in a very disciplined way, but we also had these batteries of missiles that would fire back.

Q: The Patriot missiles.

CLARKE: The Patriot missiles. They made almost more noise than the incoming scuds. They provided a great deal of moral support, especially at first, because it seemed that we could do something besides just sit there if you heard these things firing off. I think two of them were being manned by Americans, and one of the batteries was turned over to the Israelis and they ran it. It was only after the war that we found out that they never hit a thing, that it was totally ineffective. Just as the U.S. Air Force never hit a mobile launcher, the Patriots never hit a warhead.

Q: This was a war that played on TV around the world. After it was over and even at the time, did you feel that this made an impression about how the war was fought with the Israelis?

CLARKE: Our stock with the Israelis as a nation capable of meeting its military commitments was really raised. As they gradually began to figure out that the Patriots weren't doing any good, that aspect of it and the assumption that any technology from the United States must be good technology probably evaporated. The success of the military operation in the Gulf was tremendously impressive, not only to the Israelis but to the Arab countries all around. It was a very unusual kind of war in which we had all of these months in which to get ready and build up. If we hadn't done it, it would have been a great disgrace. As it was, it was a success, and everybody liked to praise it.

Q: Let's go back to the economic side. What were you seeing in Gaza during this time, '89 to

CLARKE: The thing I’ve already hinted at, the incredible contrast between economic conditions in Gaza and economic conditions in Israel was evident to anyone who crossed the line. But not a lot of people were crossing over the line in those days. Traffic in and out of Gaza was mainly those Gazans who were lucky enough to get some work in Israel. They were able to travel into Israel except when the government shut the border, which they did rather regularly in response to acts of terrorism in Israel.

Gaza is one of the most highly concentrated populations in the world, comparable to the extreme levels in Asia and elsewhere, with very little natural basis for economic activity. That was also before the Intifada, the violent uprising of the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza. Before the Intifada, there had been a number of factories developed in which cheap Palestinian labor was working together with Israeli capital and marketing to produce a lot of consumer goods. The Intifada brought that kind of cooperation to a halt. Those factories either shut down or moved away. What was left was against Israeli rule, really extraordinary poverty and poor health conditions, and a steady loss of potable water. Then the settlement movement continued building even in Gaza, the most unlikely place for a settlement movement to be. There’s at least some historical and religious background for settlements in the West Bank, but in Gaza, it was purely exploitative.

There had been claims that there was some military advantage to it, but in fact the military demands of protecting these settlements actually made them a great weakness rather than a military advantage. They used a large part of the available water and arable land, leaving the rest of the Gaza population, basically the urban population, with no means of employment.

We had a very small aid program there. They comprised community development-like activities, either helping Gazans with small business or assisting with medical, and educational and other projects which we maintained on a very low profile basis. But we were anxious to let the Gazans know that these were American projects, and we were financing them, and we certainly looked forward to the day when they would be much more successful economically. This was an issue because some organizations like Save the Children preferred not to have American vehicles and officials and whatnot visiting their projects. For accountability purposes and to report to AID, we had to visit their installations. We insisted on doing so in our cars, even though we tried to do so in a low- key fashion. We wanted to make sure there was no confusion about this. This was not just private donors in the U.S. giving money to Save the Children, although there may have been such funds available. This was a U.S. government-funded aid program. That tension continued the whole time I was there. Interestingly enough, our people carrying out these projects in Gaza and those of us who visited Gaza over this period were almost never harmed or threatened. The Gazans knew what was going on.

Q: We’re talking about Gaza. The Israelis, at the time we’re talking about, were responsible for Gaza. We were giving considerable amounts of money to Israel for aid, and a great deal of it was going to the military, but looking at the non-military as a rational use of our money to Israel, it would go to where it’s needed most. It would strike me that Gaza would be it. If we weren't giving it to Gaza, it would strike me as being in a way racist. Was this an issue?

CLARKE: You have to go back and recognize that it was we and not the Israelis who made a very clear distinction regarding who was responsible and in what way for the occupied territories. We did not consider Gaza to be part of Israel. We did not route our aid to Gaza through Israel in any way. In Washington it was a totally separate little program for the West Bank and Gaza and we had an aid person, an American, in Jerusalem, dealing with the West Bank. That had not always been the case. There had also been a period when there was a State Department officer handling that. But for very clear political reasons, we kept the two programs totally separate. What we were paying to the Israelis was essentially a cash transfer of 1.2 billion dollars per year that went into their budgetary and foreign exchange support. It was not designated for any specific purpose whatsoever, but rather for economic "stabilization." It went back to the crisis period some years before in the Israeli economy. Israel never intended to spend one penny of this on Palestinians.

What we were doing in the West Bank and Gaza was much more the classical type of aid program with technical assistance, small business development, and humanitarian programs, in which we provided money to non-profit organizations. In a few cases they were indigenous, Gazan non-profit organizations. In other cases they were American-run organizations, delivering these very specific programs which required the usual aid thing, verification that the program achieved its goals. And do we want to expand it or contract it or end it or do something different? What do we want to do was always the question. Whereas with Israel there was no such question. This money was not going to be accounted for because once it had been received by the Ministry of Finance, its purpose had already been served. It's two very, very different approaches. The amounts of money that we're talking about in the West Bank and Gaza at no time were substantial compared with the amount we were providing Israel. Israelis who hoped for peace probably would have supported our programs for Palestinians, but AIPAC and the Israeli politicians ignored that aid.

Q: Did this cause any disquiet? Israel does not seem to be an impoverished Third World country. We all understand the basic underpinnings, that this is an American domestic policy, driven by American Jews and by non-Jewish groups within the United States, Friends of Israel, as opposed to real need.

CLARKE: There was practically no reexamination of real need. Once the Israeli economy emerged from its crisis, at some point in the 1980s before I ever got there, inflation was still running high, unemployment was still high by American standards, and they had not undertaken the privatization of their economy. It was still basically a socialist economy, even if democratic. We continued to have an annual or semi-annual dialogue with them, which I continued between sessions, urging them to reform their economy. That was our real economic policy, although I cannot say it was taken seriously by the Israeli leadership. This 1.2 billion dollars was simply a check that was conveyed in Washington annually, based on a commitment made some years before. I mentioned in our last discussion the Airgram that we wrote, suggesting that this economic part of our assistance could be gradually reduced and it would be in Israel's benefit if we did so. As far as I know, not only was that report purely voluntary, some would say it was masochistic for a U.S. government organization to write it, since it was destined to leak and did in fact leak immediately. No one else was justifying these funds, to the best of my knowledge.

Q: I would think at a certain point that your conscience would take over, that you'd have to do something when it's on your watch by saying, "Is this really justified?"

CLARKE: It was on my watch when we sent that in. My deputy and I worked on it. The Ambassador and the DCM went over it with a magnifying glass. I saw the futility of it as soon as it appeared in the newspapers. We'd made our point. Anybody who wanted to could go back and look that up. Basically, nobody gave a damn about that money.

Q: It is a little bit like spitting in a hurricane.

CLARKE: It was considered foolishly quixotic.

Q: You left there in '92. Looking at it from an economic point of view, how did you see Israel as an economic entity?

CLARKE: As so often with Western countries, it was an economy that was doing pretty well, considering what it had going against it in the way of political handicaps. The concept was that they should be on the dole without weighing properly the effects of that on their export industries. The other sorts of socialist things that they did caused damage throughout the economy. I could list a bunch of them, but the damage was particularly obvious in the small business sector.

I actually met a guy who tried to expand his one-man business into a slightly larger one and the regulators drove him out of business. He had to fire his employees, and he went back to being a one man business. That pattern prevailed throughout Israel. In the United States employment is created chiefly by small business. That fact is not only accepted here, it's basically not surprising to anyone. The ruling ideology behind Israeli regulations in those times was that the people who hire other people are exploiting them, not that they are giving them a job and giving them the chance to make a decent living. It was an old Eastern European socialist viewpoint. So Israel was a land of one-person shops and handicrafts, and bloated, inefficient public companies as in Eastern Europe. Real private companies fought to survive and often did not.

Q: Did you see a new generation coming in that would make any difference?

CLARKE: Sure. I felt the most affinity with those officials in the government – in the permanent government, the civil servants – who were determined to try to get some of these reforms to work. Every time I needed a morale boost, the most effective way to get it in terms of what was going on in Israel, was to go have lunch with one of these guys and listen to his frustrations and come away realizing there are people out there trying to improve it. I haven't been back to Israel in a long time, but I would guess by the relative success of their high-tech industries that this is gradually working its way through.

Q: Was there a feeling of concern that they were moving, but all of a sudden the Soviet Union collapsed, just about the end of the time you were there. All of a sudden a lot of former Soviet citizens were coming in. These were not exactly entrepreneurially motivated, at least that's not how they'd been brought up.

CLARKE: They were overwhelmingly doctors and musicians. That had been their employment in the Soviet Union. The result was the concert meister from Kishinev, Moldova, was auditioning for umpteenth violin in the Herzliyya community orchestra. They had a totally skewed employment background. And you're right. They did not bring with them great instincts on how to do business, although some certainly did try to start businesses right away. A good many, no sooner had they parked their bags in Israel, than they tried to set up trade between Israel and the Soviet Union where they really did have contacts and knowledge of possible business opportunities.

Q: You were saying that Israeli government officials were turning their attention to this phenomenon?

CLARKE: The primary Israeli interest in the former Soviet Union was to get Jews to emigrate to Israel. The Jewish Agency in many cases set up shop in places before the Israeli government ever had a chance to set up an embassy or a consulate. The Jewish agency was already there to facilitate emigration because the restrictions on emigration ended before the Soviet Union collapsed. The triggering thing for massive immigration into Israel was our decision to put a cap on refugee admissions to the United States. Those refugee admissions were almost exclusively Jews and Armenians. So we effectively caused a huge backlog of applicants to the United States. People who wanted to leave the Soviet Union because they really thought the place was going to pot, or if they had been refused for many years, then saw Israel as the next best place to go. That caused a big influx. Then when this trade began to develop, a small level of trade at least, it caused the Israeli government to realize there was more to the Soviet Union than just getting more citizens for Israel. I don't know on the macro level how successful it has been, but in almost every capital in the former Soviet Union you'll find some signs of Israeli trade taking place.

DAVID WINN
Deputy Consul General
Jerusalem (1989-1992)

David M. Winn was born in Texas in 1942. He graduated from Swarthmore College in 1964, received an MA from the University of Texas in 1966 and an MPA from Syracuse University in 1969. He served in the Peace Corps and then joined the Foreign Service in 1969. He has served overseas in Vietnam, Lebanon, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, France and Senegal. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: How was the Intifada?

WINN: Well, the Intifada had geared up pretty heavily by the time I got to Jerusalem. As I say, that was the only post in the Foreign Service I bitterly regret, for internal professional reasons. The situation on the ground had become bad of Deputy Principal Officer in Jerusalem - much too bad to take a sick spouse to (her MS had gotten much worse). I was long since used to bombs and rocks and whatever, but it developed so quickly, that from being the most heavily bid post in the Foreign Service - 82 souls bid for the job when I got it, "more than for the Court of St. James," as one diplomat put it Now you cant force people to go to Jerusalem. Virtually no one bid on my job when I left. So, it had become quite a source of concern although nothing like it is now. There were not any suicide bombers then. It was the risk of being brained by rocks every time you got on the road in Arab East Jerusalem, not in West Jerusalem. There were no problems in Israeli Jewish West Jerusalem, by the way where half of our staff lived, but my wife and I lived far out in East Jerusalem, where young Palestinians would throw rocks at my wife.

Q: Why was Jerusalem considered such a good job?

WINN: Oh, for years and years and years, you were in the thick of things, you were at the center of the Arab Israeli problem, it was a very nice city, it was then, but not now. Your reporting always got read in Washington. Its funny how that deputy's job over the years was regarded as a plum. We had a very nice house up in the hills overlooking Jerusalem and East Jerusalem, a beautiful house which had become a slum by the time I got there and was given up when I left. People were living the past, you know the Mandelbaum gate and all that. Everyone in that job looked back at the old British mandate in a way. The '67 War had been just one huge adventure, as indeed were the events of 48. The Consulate was a historic building. Its been there for 100 years. The fact that the job seemed to destroy everyone who served there, their careers were sort of quietly ended with a few exceptions, was overlooked. Everyone was living in the past.

Q: Well, you were there from '89 to?

WINN: '89 to '92.

Q: Who was Consul General?

WINN: When I arrived and for the first two years, a fellow by the name of Phil Wilcox, whom I had never met. He chose me sight unseen from among the candidates. The last of the three years there was Molly Williamson. She is still in the Foreign Service. Phil has retired.

Q: I've interviewed Phil. When you got there, were you seeing Jerusalem with fresher eyes than the people around you do you think?

WINN: Not the people immediately around me because they had been in the thick of it, to their credit. I was shocked when I got there, shocked by the contrast between Jerusalem I imagined and had recalled from Amman, and the Jerusalem, that I found. I recall from Amman in the '70s that there and there was scarcely a distinction between West and East Jerusalem. Israelis on both sides, Palestinians on both sides. I got there in '89 to find a war zone, no Israelis in the East, but the attitudes had changed so gradually over the years that what I found didn't shock everyone else. Everyone else was living in a state of siege that they had taken for granted for sometime and that was more startling to me. I did not expect to find a place where no Israeli socialized with a Palestinian, where you could not have a dinner in your house and mix Israelis and Palestinians. It was incredible, because you could do that back in the '70s. I didn't expect to find a city so strictly divided that no Israeli would set forth in Arab East Jerusalem and regard us as either insane or traitorous for living over there.

Q: Well, what had caused this?

WINN: The Intifada, the stonings. At that time, just stonings would occasionally kill people. I mean our cars, the minute I got there, you know, we had to have Mylar tape reinforcement put in the windows because if you were hit in the head by a big rock it would kill you. The Israelis went around with pistols. For all I know they do to this day. Its so startling to see grown men walking around wearing holsters, I mean it was all so primitive, particularly when they would make the occasional foray for business reasons over into East Jerusalem. I would sit on my porch and look at the main road from Jericho to Jerusalem and watch these kids. In those days we didn't have video cameras and I wish we did. I could see the kids down below the road, get their rocks, I would see them spot a car and I would see them stone it and I would see the drive get out with a pistol and start shooting at them. I wish to heck I had video cameras, they hadn't been invented when I was there. Then I of course, we ourselves were incessantly stoned. They would just see a foreigner and just throw rocks at them. My car was burned up. It was burned in front of the house. So, it was such a strain, given my wife's inability to walk by them

Q: Oh boy. Well, what about how did you find relations between the consulate and the Palestinians?

WINN: Well, our brief there in many ways was to deal with the Palestinians, whereas the embassy in Tel Aviv was supposed to deal with the Israelis. Now, of course, that's very glib and superficial, but of course in Jerusalem we deal with the Israelis, and Phil did a very good job of maintaining contacts on both sides. The only Israeli officials we were permitted to deal with were at Jerusalem City Hall. We didn't go to the Foreign Ministry. We had the absurd spectacle of the Embassy personnel driving an hour up the hill to go to the Foreign Ministry, which was across the street from us. Phil had a wide range of non-governmental Israeli contacts. I had a very few. The Israelis couldn't stand the sight of us, not to put too fine a point on it. They resented our presence in Jerusalem, as did the Israeli man on the street. The minute they found where I lived, that was pretty much the end of any contact with any Israelis, with the exception of a few fringe peace groups. The fact that we lived in the Israeli East Jerusalem was a subject of intense dislike, intense anger even. I remember even before, in Paris, the Israeli embassy diplomats I dealt with were furious that we still lived in, we had a presence in East Jerusalem. So, it was as contentions relationship with the Israelis. So with the exception of the Consul General, we dealt about exclusively with Palestinians. Remember that half or more than half of our staff was in East Jerusalem. The American staff below me. I remember being a little envious of the fact that most of them lived in safe West Jerusalem. We all got a hardship post, we all got a hardship differential in Jerusalem. But I was one of only three or four people in East Jerusalem getting brained by rocks. That's the way it goes and I gather we've all now pretty well left East Jerusalem.

Q: How about the contacts with the Palestinians?

WINN: Well, they were more than happy to see us at every level. That was our bread and butter, the usual list of cast of characters, all of whom are still pretty much active today. I mean Saeb Erekat - I almost rented a house from him down in Jericho. We used to see him all the time. They were happy to see us on the one hand and on the other hand, it was a litany of misery and complaining. The conversation was pretty much all the same as it has been for 30 or 40 years. So, it was kind of a boring job, frankly. The same damn thing over and over. Discouraging.

Q: How did you find relations with the embassy at that time?

WINN: Oh, its always been kind of an odd strained relationship. "You're the Arab lovers up the hill." I would go down once a week to attend their staff meetings, that would take all morning, after all it was an hour drive down, an hour drive up, the meeting itself. Remember, few people recall that Jerusalem is an independent post. We do our own reporting. People always assume we have to have our reporting approved by the embassy, that's not true. We'd send stuff directly in from Jerusalem. So, it didn't always track with what the embassy wanted to hear. Often its a function of the personalities, the Consul General and the ambassador and you know, Phil was his own man, as have all the consuls general there been. I think he worked out a pretty good modus vivendi with the embassy. In later years Ambassadors and Consul Generals scarcely spoke to each other. I wont name names, but rather recently there have been tales of shouting matches and epithets flung between the Consul General and the ambassador in more recent years. He worked out a good modus vivendi, a mutual respect.

Q: Who was the ambassador when you were there?

WINN: Totally forgotten. I met him twice in the three years I was there. The DCM with whom I dealt was Mark Parris, who later became assistant secretary of NEA and ambassador to Turkey and has since moved on to the private sector.

Q: How were we viewing Intifada? Did we see this as a futile effort?

WINN: Well, toward the end of my stay by the way we had the Madrid Peace Conference, but we saw it as, certainly an irritant. Another irritant and a major element of our reporting were the Israeli settlements. Steve Kashkett, whom had been the terrorism guy in Paris, whom I was instrumental in bringing to Jerusalem, was our settlements guy. They of course have expanded exponentially since then. To his credit, Phil Wilcox, we didn't have a very close relationship, but I've got to give him credit, was constantly on top of the settlement and human rights issues. Phil should have been a lawyer. I've got to hand it to him. He wrote detailed and damning cables pointing out human rights and legal abuses of the Israelis' expansion into East Jerusalem. There was a constant keeping an eye on Israeli encroachments on the West Bank. Now, that didn't answer your question. Weekly we would get the latest Palestinian communique of the Intifada resistance, which eventually I think numbered into the hundreds. We had a wonderful political officer there, Marc Foulon, who has since left the Foreign Service in frustration, actually writing speeches for Richard Haas now and he would translate these things every week. I gather to some extent we succeeded in focusing Washington's attention. George Bush finally tied down some of the financial aid, on condition that it could not be used in the settlements. As the months wore on, I found it increasingly irritating to drive to work; I risked my wife and I getting killed by these stupid kids with rocks. I often would pull over to lecture them in Arabic. I would say, "Listen you miserable little sons of bitches, don't you realize who I am? I'm half on your side!" It's so funny, that you could sit there and have a cup of coffee with them. In other words it wasn't personal with the guys who burned my car up. You know, I never feared them for my, never one for my bodily danger as an individual in Jerusalem. One could be a random target, but assassination was not a factor. Although we had no guards, I lived openly. It was always a political thing, these kids throwing rocks at the car because they saw a foreigner and thought it was great fun.

Q: Did you fly the flag?

WINN: Well, that might have almost been a provocation. In any case, we had diplomatic plates. Again in my house, I lived in the thick of it. I repeat, my car was burned up in front of the house, torched in front of the house, but I never once worried about my physical safety as an individual. Oddest situation.

Q: Well, what about monitoring what was going on in the West Bank?

WINN: We would drive around talking to the Palestinians all over the place. We encountered endless Israeli checkpoints as we monitored the settlements physically. That was more Steve's job, but I did my fair share of it. We were met with hostility of course by the settlers. Often the Israeli guards of these individual settlements wouldn't allow us in the settlement, and often they would and we would physically monitor - this house, this wall has been extended. We'd go around and just eyeball everything constantly, particularly Steve. He wrote some wonderful cables counting houses and settlements.

Q: Was there supposedly a stop on the enlargement of the settlements?

WINN: There were so many claims by the Israelis. They would say, we aren't building, just "natural expansion." There was at one point a freeze on new settlements, but they never to this day claimed to put a freeze on this enlargement of existing settlements even if the enlargement was on the next mountaintop. So, they would always get around the restrictions. As I recall there was finally a freeze on settlement building, on new settlements, but never on the expansion of existing ones. Now its quite shocking to see how enormous these settlements are. My God, there's one, Ma'ale Abumim, just basically a huge suburb of Jerusalem, halfway down to the Dead Sea by now. These settlements are enormous suburbs, the size of Reston. Some of them are just a few trailers on a hill, but some of them are huge, huge complexes. Most people don't realize that.

Q: How about American Jews who were also Israelis? Did you have much to do with them?

WINN: Again, to them, to all Israelis, the consulate was pretty much the enemy. It was bizarre how we in the consulate would cling to American policy in order to maintain a hard line, and in other ways conveniently avoid touching on other aspects of American policy - such as the fact that to this day, the USA does not acknowledge Israeli sovereignty over Jerusalem - a fact we were never permitted to mention despite the fact that in the lobby of the consulate, for all I know to this day, there is the old original plaque that says, "The American Consulate General In Palestine." Now that is a provocation to any Israeli who came in. Our international mailing address was always American Consulate General Jerusalem - we would never put Jerusalem, Israel. That's why I say our pathetic little attempt to hold the course but of course we didn't use the international main anyway so because we didn't acknowledge Israeli sovereignty. We were the enemy to the Israelis.

Q: What was your impression of how the Israelis on the West Bank?

WINN: The Americans particularly the American Israelis that we were really traitors, but they couldn't stand us. Every once in a while the settlers committee on the West Bank, most of them were American Jews, Americans, would come in and talk to Phil. They'd put on a suit and tie. I was always struck by that. The Israelis never put on a suit. They would show appropriate respect and come in and have a meeting with Phil and he would hear them out. It was a contentious relationship.

Q: Were we reporting on human rights violations and that sort of thing?

WINN: Oh, boy were we. The annual human rights report was the major event of the year of the Consulate General. Again, that job was like being nibbled at by swarming bees, it was anything but fun. There was not a fun moment. The human rights reports was certainly one of the most agonizing exercises where traditionally, the Consulate General would send in a tough draft and it would be whittled back both by the embassy and by Washington. We would reach agonizing compromises, and I always thought we did a heroic job. I haven't read it in 15 years. I just walked away from that place. Remember my wife died there, so I just walked away. One of our major products was the human rights report in which I thought we acquitted ourselves well.

Q: How did you get your information?

WINN: From Israeli human rights groups, who were vigilant, and Palestinian human rights groups, the Palestinian al-Haq was the Palestinian group that did a very good job. Betsellem was Israeli equivalent. And from our own monitoring and endless talking. It was just a lot of hard, scut work, hard research, going out and talking to people, interviewing people, comparing the notes, comparing notes of the Israeli groups and the Palestinian groups. It was hard research and my hats off to our political officers and the rest of the Consulate staff, including our overworked Consular section. I did, too.

Q: How about did we get involved in trying to protect Palestinian-Americans who were over there?

WINN: Yes, but we worked on behalf of Palestinian non-Americans, in the sense of reporting on Israeli incursions, when they would just plant a settlement in the middle of nowhere. The Israelis would buy up property in East Jerusalem or occupy property in East Jerusalem. I would go, often

Id find myself in East Jerusalem physically eyeballing the settlers with their guns who would then eyeball me. I mean, not threateningly, but they just didn't like to see us and encroachments when the Israelis would go in and just occupy houses in East Jerusalem, just occupy houses that allegedly had been Jewish in biblical times. Many settlements, I've forgotten your question by the way.

Q: Did we get involved with?

WINN: Oh, American Palestinians. Not that often. We would occasionally, yes, when one was arrested. Anne Barry, not to be confused with the consul general, the woman who was chief of our consular section, was very active. Any time a Palestinian-American was detained she would be over there at the prison and trial. Anne Barry, I think she's still in the Foreign Service, we were witnesses at the occasional trial. Yes, we were quite vigilant. Endless, some of these cases went on and on and on. My stepbrother was recently on a bus in Santa Fe, New Mexico and he fell into conversation with the driver of his bus who turned out to be a Palestinian. My brother-in-law said, "Do you know a fellow named David Winn?" He said, "Yes, David Winn saved my house from demolition." I don't remember this incident. That was another thing, we were often involved when the Israelis would threaten to blow up a house and we would occasionally, apparently, I don't recall this guy recalled me personally succeeding in preventing his house from being blown up. I take that story with a grain of salt, just an example of our high profile out there.

Q: What was your impression of how the Israelis were treating the Palestinians?

WINN: Constant humiliation just inside the law. The Palestinians were used to humiliation, with good reason. The Israeli soldiers at checkpoints, would never miss a chance to harass. They would make life difficult for the Palestinians. They would seize on small violations of a property deed or of a building permit to destroy the house. The point was to constantly keep the Palestinians off balance. To constantly remind them they were there at the sufferance of the Israelis. Frankly, the goal was to get them to leave, particularly from East Jerusalem. So, these are small things to the West, but its day to day, day in and day out. Remember this was at a time when there were no bombings in East Jerusalem. Its not like they were a problem to the Israelis, but the goal was basically to humiliate the Palestinians and to make life just miserable enough that they could expand the Israeli presence on the West Bank, let me put it that way. You had the Intifada, which basically was an irritant to any Israeli, who went over to East Jerusalem, but it was not a problem for the Israelis West Jerusalem. It was clear, a constant pressure, lets put it that way.

Q: How about with the other officers, particularly the junior officers there? You know if you have a time of tension like this and things going on, sometimes its hard to keep almost control of the officers because if they see injustices and all they over identify and all this. Was this a problem?

WINN: I take your point. I have to say that the experience of having your car torched - which several officers had - and having rocks thrown at you mitigated to some extent the indignation of seeing Israeli abuses. Over identifying was strangely enough never a problem because the Palestinians, we got so sick and tired of having rocks thrown at us and our cars blown up and torched, it just irritated the hell out of us. "Can't you people see where your bread is buttered? Stop trashing us!" So "clientitis" was not a problem. It might have when life was more comfortable on the Palestinian side, but not when we were there.

Q: So, it was sort of a plague on both your houses?

WINN: Plague on both your houses. We were all ready to leave.

Q: What about the Gulf War and its, you left there when?

WINN: Oh, in '91, I mean the Gulf War came and went.

Q: Tell me about how.

WINN: Well, we were first of all irritated that Arafat came out and declared on the side of the Iraqis. He thought that was great. So did King Hussein as I recall. I'm trying to get back the chronology of this. We had Jim Baker coming and going. Back in January, '91, I heard on the BBC at the crack of dawn that the Iraqis had invaded Kuwait. I got to the consulate to find on my desk an all points NIACT from the ambassador in Kuwait, Ned Howell, in which he said, We've seen these press reports that the Iraqis have invaded Kuwait. Its a ridiculous rumor. Now, I cite that as an example that the embassy was taken utterly by surprise and in defense of April Glaspie. People really didn't see this coming, for all they may say so after the fact. In Jerusalem, it finally got to the point that the hostility in the East became such that we were told to move all our valuables into the embassy, just before the war broke out, so I did take all the clothes to the Consulate because we might have to pull out of East Jerusalem. (My wife was visiting her family in Paris at the time.) Then as tensions began to mount I remember Baker, Secretary of State, had his last meeting with the Iraqis, it broke down. Then, those of us living in the East physically left our houses and apartments in the East and moved into a hotel in East Jerusalem and within 24 hours we had launched Operation Desert Storm. We were woken up in the middle of the night by phone calls and said from the communicator. He said, We have just launched Operation Desert Storm. That reminds me of a colleague in Yemen when he was down in '74. We had a consulate general in Taiz, Yemen. He was woken up in the middle of the night and told that Richard Nixon had just put the U.S. on Nuclear Alert Five. He said, I didn't know what to do but to pull the blinds. That's the way I felt, so I just went back to sleep, but within an hour the Israeli air raid sirens began going off. We had been issued gas masks. We all had our gas masks and we were all hurriedly hustled into various rooms of the hotel, where there were taped rooms with all the other hotel guests which included a large group of American Hasidic Jewish young men, teenagers. So there we all were. I had my radio and to my incredulity I was listening to the communicator talking to the DCM down there saying "We're getting SCUD missiles down in Tel Aviv, hitting Tel Aviv. This was all incredible. At that point the news began to spread around Jerusalem. The Hasidic young men crowded into the bathroom to shave off their beards, because they could not get a close fit on the gas masks otherwise, and they turned on the TV. Were all in this small room taped up and the only thing on Israeli TV was a rock and roll band, which they left on to get the news. Now this quickly became intolerable. This I mean the Israeli rock and roll music. So, I said, I have to go to the consulate. I've got to get out of here. The Israeli soldier wouldn't let me leave the room. I finally talked my way out of there blessedly and made my way to the consulate and we even took a few SCUDS over the next few months in Jerusalem itself. I don't think we took any that night. As you know, only one Israeli was killed during throughout the Gulf War, and that was from a heart attack.

Q: How about were you getting in with Americans and others trying to get out of Israel at that time?

WINN: We weren't. The rush to the airport came from the Hasidic Jewish community. They were the first to leave. A notorious display of Let me out of here, Kimosabi. But people had already left to some extent. There was a rush for the exits, yes. Now in our case the families had already been given what is the term, not ordered departure, but voluntary departure. My wife as it turned out was already in France on vacation. She had chosen that time to go on vacation, and this became ordered departure, so the dependents that were already out were not permitted back in to her fury, to her absolute fury. No, it always remained voluntary. It always remained voluntary, but anyone who had the misfortune to be out then was not allowed back in. So, many wives did stay on throughout.

Q: I think that was a real problem. I've gotten through interviews with Bill Brown who was ambassador.

WINN: Well, that's it, the name I couldn't recall. The problem lay in the Department's not allowing those who had happened to be out of the country to return. That was Renee's dilemma - she couldn't get back to Jerusalem.

Q: He was ambassador to Israel and then with Chas Freeman, particularly the problem with Saudi Arabia. We had a lot of Americans who were essential in running the oil fields even though they were closest to the action and if we got people, Americans out of other parts of the area, then that would cause the Americans, so I mean it was a very tricky situation.

WINN: Yes, we were always voluntary. I remember the fury of my wife trying to get back, couldn't get back to Jerusalem. Wasn't permitted. Finally she came up with a plan of renting a house on the Israeli on the Egyptian side of the border down at Gaza. At least she could be within commuting distance to Jerusalem. By that time the war had ended before she implemented this plan. I remember that Bill Brown wanted it "ordered" for some reason and never got it. He was angry for a different reason. He wanted to get more money for the excuses if it was ordered. I've forgotten the reason why.

Q: I think then if it was there it was under government orders and that meant they had to support the people who left.

WINN: Who left, right, as opposed to those who stayed.

Q: Otherwise it was sort of like a vacation.

WINN: Yes, but yet they couldn't come back. I remember being particularly irritated with Phil, because we had about a 48 hour notice that the war was going to start and I got on the phone to tell my wife to come back in a hurry. But the Department wouldn't let her come back, even though the hostilities hadn't begun. However, DCM Paris down in Tel Aviv allowed family members quietly to return without blabbing to the Department, even after the war had begun. He showed common sense in a practical concern for family welfare. Screw the rules. So, they really did diddle the family members. As I assume they diddle unto this day, but that was minor. Finally, because of her MS, after six weeks into this I had to leave to join her. You know, she couldn't even walk by then. I finally left Jerusalem to my bitter dismay. I didn't want to leave the action. I stayed for with her for three weeks, then returned. She came back a few weeks later.

Q: You talked about the Hasidic Jews.

WINN: Yes, that was not a very seemly spectacle, and many American Israelis, they got the hell out, too. We all had our gas masks. Some took it seriously, others didn't. I remember the Newsweek bureau chief Ted Stanger wouldn't even own one, much less put one on. He's a friend to this day now, he lives in Paris. It was an eerie feeling to be sitting in a restaurant and hear the siren go off and then to see the SCUDS at night. See the scuds go over, you could see them physically go on down to Tel Aviv.

Q: There must have been a certain amount watching these things head towards Tel Aviv?

WINN: Yes, I mean, yes, well of course. Excuse me, I've got someone at the door.

Q: We were talking about you know watching the things heading down.

WINN: Yes, yes, down to Tel Aviv. We had a few hits in Jerusalem, but again no one hurt.

Q: How about, I mean, you know in your part and your fellow officers to see the Israelis jumping up I mean the Palestinians jumping up and down with joy. That must have really...

WINN: That really rankled us. We continued to live in these hotel rooms and we continued to go there to do our reporting realizing that there was no physical danger to us. The fact that has really irritated the hell out of us, yes, of course. The idiocy of Arafat declaring for Saddam. We had to tell him how stupid that was, and we just would press on with our reporting. I always take the Arabs with a grain of salt in any of their public displays. They felt they had to do it and we kind of rolled our eyes.

Q: Did you have any you and your colleagues have any feel for Arafat and his leadership?

WINN: Its funny, Arafat was a dimly perceived figure We dealt with the Palestinian fellow named Hussein al-Husseini who died last year of a heart attack, but they would pay obeisance to Arafat, but we really had a very strong impression of a local, a local leadership - Hussein and his deputies. Arafat is a dim figure.

Q: He was in Tunisia.

WINN: He was in Tunisia.

Q: Traveling around.

WINN: Our day to day contacts with the local guys. They had to tow the line when he came out and declared in favor of Saddam and of course, King Hussein for that matter. It's funny, the Americans seemed to have felt in Jordan they were in greater physical danger for some reason. They really pulled out fast there. There seems to be a greater sense of urgency. Well, its true though to be fair, we left East Jerusalem, of course, that makes sense. They were surrounded. So, as it turned out none of these bodily threats against Americans never did transpire.

Q: Well, you left there before the war ended is that right?

WINN: Yes, yes, and came back just two days after it ended.

Q: While the war was going on, did you begin to notice a change in temperature in the Palestinians as they were watching what we were doing and all?

WINN: You mean more hostility?

Q: Well, in a way less hostility, I mean a realization that Saddam wasn't going to get anywhere?

WINN: Of course, I wasn't on the ground, but I will say when we got back I didn't discover any particular anger. The Arabs, the Palestinians are always going to see which way the wind is blowing. I didn't discover any resentment when I got back. The war was over and that was the end of that and okay, lets move on. If that helps you. Had I been there I might have noticed the fact that they accepted this with some resignation. But it was amazing how it was back to business as usual when I got back. It was back to the peace process. The Gulf War was almost forgotten.

Q: On the personal side, it must have been a terrible strain on you obviously on your wife with this MS.

WINN: The house, the famous house in East Jerusalem, was a three story house so two of the stories were the living quarters and the third was a beautiful pool down below out, which I maintained out of my own pocket. Indeed the first year I was there was spent I must say in total preoccupation with her inability to get from floor to floor of the house, because her condition had worsened in Paris. Had her condition been as bad in Paris when I bid for the job, I never would have done so, and would have taken an offer to be DCM in Madagascar which of course in retrospect I should have done Renee would have had much more personal care there - household staff, etc. My first year there was spent in equipping the house for a handicapped person, to include spending $10,000 of my own money to bring in an elevator, a British made elevator. So, I was so distracted the first year. Inexplicably, the Deputy in Jerusalem is not granted the "perks" that a DCM in an Embassy is - no household staff or expenses. So it was hard finding people to help. The Israeli doctors would not set foot in East Jerusalem. I had to physically go up and take Renee to physical therapy in West Jerusalem and take her back. You can imagine. Half the day I wasn't even in the consulate. So, that was a big strain, yes. But Renee came back after the war, and passed away of liver cancer at Hadassab Hospital once she got back. It was one thing after another. No one looks back with fond memories of Jerusalem. It tends to chew up everyone who serves there. Phil did well. He later became head of S CT and acquired the title of ambassador, but other consuls general, it was almost as if the job cast a cloud over their career. It beats me why anyone would want to be consul general out there frankly.

Q: Did you ever get involved in, I mean to Israel proper, there was this constant stream of congressmen playing obeisance to... sort of like the ones that go to Rome and hit the Pope to make sure they look good to their constituents. How about on your side of the thing?

WINN: They would come up and mainly want to see Teddy Kollek, the mayor, and occasionally they would want to, tour East Jerusalem and would want a settlements tour, not very often. We always had a bit of a tussle there. When they went to the Foreign Ministry they would be accompanied by someone from the embassy. When they went to see Teddy Kollek, they would be accompanied by someone, Phil or if he wasn't there, by me, and this always confused them because the embassy didn't deal with the mayor. Again, we always had the same problem: the Israelis would want to accompany visitors around the old city, and we would tell congressmen that they should not be accompanied by the Israelis around the old city since it was not officially under Israeli control. We had these absurd turf battles that they should be accompanied by me or Phil or someone or an embassy officer around the old city, but that we would not accept an Israeli escort. We wouldn't go with them if they insisted on an Israeli escort. Often a Congressman would take the Israeli position and insist that the Consulate officer not come! I remember once or twice giving senators, or congressmen a tour of the West Bank settlements, who was the guy? Senator Kerry the fellow who lost a leg in Vietnam, I toured him around. But many congressmen weren't that interested in the settlements.

Q: What about Teddy Kollek? What was your impression of him?

WINN: Well, I must say, I have to say that he pretty much lived up to his billing. You know so often these guys you know present one face, but no I think he was sincerely appalled by the settlements and the takeover of Palestinian housing in East Jerusalem. I think he was sincerely appalled by the encroachments in East Jerusalem. I heard him on TV recently and he talked that way privately.

Q: Did you get a feel or was this purely coming from the Israeli side of the really hardlined settler types and all this?

WINN: No, I think they were harder lined than you could imagine. We would occasionally go talk to them, but boy they were bristling with guns. You would go into these places and almost invariably American immigrants from the Bronx. These guys were tough. I always referred to the average settler as a failed filling station attendant from the Bronx and that's only a slight exaggeration. These were just the worlds losers come out there to find meaning in their lives and they would set up these fortresses and they sure didn't want to talk to us. They were pretty mean guys and still are. Now, you got the occasional visionary, sincerely motivated by religion. But they were just a blinkered group if ever there was one out to recreate whatever they wanted to recreate on a mountaintop.

Q: Were they getting solid support from the Israeli government?

WINN: I think so sure. The Israeli government had troops around these settlements. Yes.

Q: Looking at subsidies?

WINN: Oh, subsidies, the whole thing, sure, sure. I mean they are a pretty mean bunch out there and I don't know what to add.

MIKE METRINKO
Consul General
Tel Aviv (1989-1993)

Michael John Metrinko was born in Pennsylvania in 1946. He graduated from Georgetown University in 1968. After entering the Foreign Service in 1974, his postings have included Ankara, Damascus, Tehran, Tabriz, Krakow, Kabul, Tel Aviv and special assignments in Yemen and Afghanistan. Mr. Metrinko was interviewed in 1999 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Well, then, so you went with your mother.

METRINKO: I took my mother to Tel Aviv, yes.

Q: And you went to Tel Aviv. You were there from when to when?

METRINKO: I was there from the summer of 1989 until the late summer of 1993. I extended at post. I did a four-year assignment.

Q: Just to sort of round out the thing, did we open up our embassy again in Kabul?

METRINKO: It's still not open.

Q: Yes.

METRINKO: And that's been from 1989 until now, and the Mujaheddin have still not taken over the city. And I'm sure all the CIA people who kept insisting it was going to happen imminently, have now conveniently forgotten what they were saying.

Q: Well, let's go to Tel Aviv. First let's talk a bit about the embassy, the ambassador, and here is a very high-powered embassy - it always has been - what was sort of the atmospherics and the people who were involved on the ground? Then we'll talk about the situation there and what you did.

METRINKO: Our embassy in Tel Aviv, at least in those years, '89 to '93, was a tortured place. How do I want to say this? It was four years of people with raw nerves who were there for a variety... very few people were there for straight old professional reasons, as in "I want a Middle East assignment; this looks interesting." We had American Jews who were there to rediscover what they thought might be their homeland. We had American - how do I want to say this word? - I don't want to say "fanatic" Christians, but American Christians who were there to find Christ.

Q: Yes.

METRINKO: We had a rather large number of Mormons there, because the Mormons think of Israel as a fairly important place. It was a place where people went for lots of reasons that had nothing to do with professionalism - religious, psychological reasons. And it was a place where the word happy did not exist.

Q: Who was the ambassador - Bill Brown?

METRINKO: Bill Brown was the ambassador when I arrived. And he was the ambassador there for approximately two and a half years after I got there. The DCM was Mark Parris. He had just arrived at post about a month or so before I did. And of course, what we had happening in the country was a full-blown Intifada. The uprising was going on all around the West Bank and Gaza. This was at a time when our relations with the Palestinians were not good and at a time when our relations with Israel were not conducted by the embassy but conducted directly out of Washington and New York, so the embassy was very often shunted aside when it came to dealing with the Government of Israel.

Q: Well, now, how did sort of this religious mix of people, particularly those who wanted to be in Israel to find their soul or their roots or whatever the hell you want to call it, translate itself into a... It sound like it could be a touchy situation, because almost anything you said could be taken the wrong way.

METRINKO: I'll put it this way. The embassy in Israel, the American staff, was one of the most bigoted, prejudiced, racist, completely non-impartial groups of people I had ever worked with, and that went in every direction. We had some who were so pro-Arab they couldn't see straight, others who were so pro-Jewish that anything the Government of Israel did was holy writ. That went all the way up to and included the ambassador. It was an embassy of people who were basically not very professional, and it was a depressing, unhappy place to be for many people.

Q: Well, let's talk about your work there. No, let's talk about the situation there. You say Intifada. What were you all seeing, and how were you dealing with this, really, revolt of Palestinian rock-throwing youth and military attempts to repress this?

METRINKO: Well, it was an uprising by the Palestinian people, who were very, very tired and weary of living in an area that could only be defined as apartheid in full bloom and living as not even second-class citizens, but living as non-people in an area controlled by a very oppressive, very heavy-handed Jewish military presence. How did the embassy, how did this impact on my work? The Consular Section was a big and busy one. I had more than 30 FSNs and, oh, I think seven or eight FSOs. We were responsible for all consular affairs in Gaza, which had more than a million Arabs, Palestinians, and to which we were not supposed to go. We were responsible for all consular affairs, of course, in the State of Israel. We were responsible for a fair amount of consular work in the West Bank, and we were also responsible for much of the consular work in southern Lebanon.

Southern Lebanon is the easiest. I'll start there. Southern Lebanon was occupied by the Israeli Army. Lebanese who lived in the so-called "security zone" could not go to Beirut for consular services, and in fact in Beirut we did not have a functioning consular section most of the time that provided consular services. So if you were Lebanese, you went for consular services to Damascus or Cyprus. If you were from south Lebanon, you came down to Israel and to the embassy. This meant that if you were from south Lebanon, you did not speak, of course, Hebrew; you spoke Arabic. Why was I dealing with the West Bank? In theory, the consulate general in Jerusalem was responsible for consular services in the West Bank, but the consulate general in Jerusalem was not accredited to the Israeli Government. Therefore, whenever they had to deal with the Central Government of Israel, even though that government was located by and large locally in Jerusalem, they would have to contact the embassy for us to arrange appointments, for us to arrange access or entrée. If someone had problems - a Palestinian American, for example, was put in prison in the West Bank - it was the embassy that had to arrange for access by somebody from the consulate to go and visit, at least initially. We had to arrange for appointments with the police. It went on and on like this. It meant that I worked on a daily basis with the consular people from Jerusalem, every day on the phone, constant visits there or their coming down to see us. We did a lot of consular business together, as a matter of fact, just to make sure that we kept the consular relationship going, despite the bad relations between the embassy and the consulate. That coldness was never true of the Consular Sections. We worked together constantly.

The Gaza problem. Gaza is the Gaza Strip and the city of Gaza. We were responsible, my section, for all consular affairs or all consular matters related to the Gaza strip. There was an embassy ruling that said "No embassy officer, unless he or she has an explicit permission on a case-by-case basis from the ambassador or the DCM, can enter the Gaza Strip or the West Bank. So this meant...

Q: What was the rationale behind that?

METRINKO: What was the rationale? The rationale was supposed to be "security concerns." This played very nicely into Israeli hands, because the Israelis thus made sure that people from the American Embassy never went to the West Bank and very rarely to Gaza, so that we did not have a good idea of what was happening there. The consulate people from Jerusalem were allowed to go, of course, to the West Bank. They did not go to Gaza at that point. This meant that even though there were cities in the West Bank that were fine, easy, we could get there very easily, we simply never went there - cities like Tulkarm, Jenin, and Nablus. They were close. I could have been there in a 30-minute drive. I went there once at night, for example. And I did more traveling than most of the people in the embassy. In fact, I did far more than almost anyone else in the embassy. I was always traveling around the State of Israel. I was frequently in Gaza, frequently into the West Bank, but that was because I was doing consular work and I was accompanying either consular people in Jerusalem or I got permission. Soon I realized no one from the Consular Section had been to Gaza for a couple of years before I got there... The head of USIA, for example, in the embassy in Tel Aviv, whose name I have (thank goodness) forgotten, used to brag that he had never been to Gaza and saw no reason to go there. He was fanatically pro-Israel. I could not imagine anyone being that unprofessional and serving the United States, that he refused to go into a whole area that was part of his responsibility. But he was incredibly Zionist, to the point where it was embarrassing to talk to him. And he later partially retired in Israel to a kibbutz there. This was what was going on. It was a time for four years when there were constant street problems. What's going on this week, for example, in Jerusalem, the West Bank, and Gaza with the uprising reinvigorated? What's going on all the time there? We had shootings, we had bombings, we had large numbers of people being hauled into prison. We had a lot of Americans getting caught up in this. American protest groups came to Israel. They got arrested.

Q: They were protesting on what?

METRINKO: Well, in Israel itself - Israel, West Bank, and Gaza - we had at that point something over 100,000 American citizens residing there. They were Jewish Americans, they were Palestinian Americans, and there were a fair number of religious-based Americans, Christians especially who were there as missionaries or priests or nuns assigned to the various churches, monasteries, what have you, hospitals, schools. We had groups coming in. For example, I remember at one point when the Intifada was especially heavy, probably '92, I would guess, we had a group of something like 30 or 40 Americans arrive. It was one of your solid middle-class group of aging liberals who were going to...

Q: Children of the '60s.

METRINKO: Who had gotten a little bit older. It included a few priests, nuns, etc., that group, absolutely fine people who decided that they were going to enter the West Bank despite the efforts of the Israeli police to stop them. So they went up to the northern border of the West Bank and tried walking across, near the Golan Heights, if I remember correctly. They all got arrested. We had about 30 arrest cases in one night. What I did for that was... I knew that they were going to have problems if they went up there. I had already assigned consular officers, pairing them with FSNs, got them all set to go up and conduct a whole series of prison visits that same night. They were arrested in the evening; they all had prison visits from us that same evening. We sent out approximately 30 arrest cables to the State Department that same evening, and by the next day or so they were all released. This was going on.

Q: Something like this, I would imagine that... you know, normally if you have an arrest case you've got to take care of it, and something like this, I would assume that the ambassador would go up to somebody in the Ministry of the Interior and say, "Are you out of your mind?"

METRINKO: Bill Brown didn't give a damn, quite basically. He was extremely pro-Israel. He hated Arabs, and he would say so. He only used the word Arab when he hyphenated it with terrorist. He would say "Arab-terrorist" often in conversation. He had little or no contact with Arabs in the area.

Now what we had were constant arrests of American citizens, Palestinian Americans, basically, by the Israeli armed forces, and a constant refusal by the Israelis to inform us that Americans had been arrested. Approximately a month after I arrived in Israel, two young Americans, aged 15 and 16 years old, were arrested. Their arrests were reported to us by their family. They were first cousins. And the Israelis denied, as they always denied, they had ever heard of these two guys, the two young kids. They denied it, denied it, denied it. We kept insisting. We knew that they had been picked up. The Israelis kept saying, No, we don't have them. And then about a week later, the body of one of the young boys was discovered, shot in the back, lying dead in a wadi - with Israeli bullets, I might add. He'd been killed by the Israeli soldiers. There was a bit of a brouhaha. Even the ambassador had to get a little bit involved, despite his inclinations. What I did at that point was to go up to Ramallah, where the Israeli army had a sort of command headquarters, with the mother and the young sister of the other missing boy and basically sat in the office of the commander. I was accompanied also by the head of the Consular Section from Jerusalem, and we sat there until he finally told us that they had located the other boy. And then we insisted on seeing the other boy and went up to the prison that night to see him. But it was that sort of thing.

Q: Did the boy tell you what happened to the other?

METRINKO: He had been picked up stone-throwing, and they had been separated after they got picked up.

Q: In other words, he -

METRINKO: He didn't know what happened to his cousin.

Q: But they were both in Israeli custody, so it wasn't a matter of his getting shot while throwing rocks.

METRINKO: No, both in Israeli custody. The Israelis killed two American while I was there. That was one. They also killed an old man, an American Palestinian who had retired to the West Bank. He was in his home one evening, and Israeli soldiers broke into the house, insisted that he clean graffiti off some walls on the street. This man had a serious heart condition. He and his wife explained that he had a serious heart condition, that he couldn't do any physical activity. The Israeli soldiers made him drag a ladder out, made him ascend the ladder. He died of a heart attack. Reaction from the American Congress: zero, zero.

Q: Did you have a feeling that - in the consular regulations, all of this stuff normally arouses all sorts of reporting on it - there were sort of "world rules" and "Israeli rules," and Israeli rules were different than treating anywhere else?

METRINKO: I had the impression throughout my four years serving as consul general in Tel Aviv, that the Department of State, NEA, and the Department of State, Consular Affairs, did not give a damn about American citizens who were Palestinian in Israel, the West Bank, or Gaza - that if they could keep it out of the news that was fine, that they weren't going to do anything to rile the Israelis. That was my feeling throughout the time.

Q: Did you have a feeling, too, that you were being monitored, in a way, both by the Israeli intelligence service and by friends of Israel in the United States to see whether you were politically correct on Israel all the time?

METRINKO: Absolutely, completely. Monitored isn't the word - watched constantly. And - how do I want to say this? - threatened, professionally.

Q: How would this go?

METRINKO: I'll give you an example. There was a point when... When did this happen? We were between ambassadors at the time. We had a DCM who was very good, Kent Wiedeman. The Israelis had arrested an American Palestinian, and the Israeli military spokesman declared him guilty of all sorts of terrorist activities, claimed that he had been bringing money and using money for terrorist activities in Israel. I complained to the Israeli Government that the person had been arrested, he had not been tried and found guilty, and said that I considered it inflammatory and unprofessional, etc., for Israeli Government officials to be acting as though he were a tried and convicted criminal, that he was still pretrial status. The Israeli lobby got in touch with Ed Djerejian.

Q: We're talking about APAC, I guess.

METRINKO: Somebody from APAC called up Ed Djerejian, who was then the Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern Affairs and complained to him that I had gone beyond, that I was going too far. I was warned by the State Department to back down. That was fine. Now about three or four days later, there was a small piece in the Israeli press about what was the Israeli Government's... Oh, Ed first had told Consular Affairs and told the embassy that he would raise this issue. Ed told Consular affairs that he would take care of the issue because we were trying to get access to this man and everything else, and here the Israelis had declared him guilty of terrorism. Ed had said that he would take care of it, that he would raise the issue and that he would treat it very seriously. In the Israeli press a few days later, there was a small article about someone who had just met with Ed Djerejian, and the reporter asked him, did he raise the issue of - I think the man's name was Saleh, if I'm not mistaken - of Saleh, the American terrorist, whatever, and the Israeli official laughed and said, "Yes, he did. He brought it up at lunch, but it's not very serious. We just laughed about it." And I wanted to send that newspaper article to the Department. Our front office stopped me, and they said it would just annoy Ed. That's the way it was handled.

Q: I would have thought working under these conditions... You say you extended. Why?

METRINKO: Israel's a fascinating place. Israel is four or five million individuals, not one of whom is boring. I never had what I would say was a happy day in Israel, but I never had a boring day. I would rather be interested and have interesting work than just sit back and be content. Individuals in Israel, whether they are Jewish, Christian, Muslim, whatever - the individuals there were fantastic. I had a huge number of what I consider friends. I knew most of the grand rabbis in Israel. I knew them well. I used to go to their homes. I had access to an incredible array of Israelis, both the religious, the ultra orthodox, the non-religious, the military, and I have no problems with individual Israelis. It was our way of dealing with them, with the State Department, that gave me problems.

Q: Did you have a feeling that here was essentially the United States being represented in a country that could reach out and jerk us around any way that they wanted because of their political clout in the United States?

METRINKO: Absolutely. It was more than a feeling; it was an absolute certainty. And people there knew, too, or we strongly suspected, that if you did anything that was too out of line it would affect your career. NEA was not going to back you up - never. Consular Affairs was certainly not going to back up anybody. Consular Affairs at that point was headed by - Oh, gosh, what was her name?

Q: Joan Clark?

METRINKO: No, Joan Clark had left. Joan Clark was fantastic. She's the one who sent me to Tel Aviv. She left shortly afterwards. The political appointee from New England.

Q: Oh, yes. And she got into deep kimchi, as they say.

METRINKO: The suspected Clinton passport application. What was her name?

Q: It'll come. But she's from New Hampshire.

METRINKO: New Hampshire. She came to Israel when I was there. It was an amazing trip. This gave me an indication of the sort of leadership we had from the Department of State and Consular Affairs. Let me go back a moment. I am talking about a time when we did not have, at least initially, for the first two years I was there, daily contact with Consular Affairs. Today, everybody is on e-mail. Today, you can communicate all day long, very easily leave messages. At the time I'm talking about, you had to send telegrams. Therefore, anything you sent had to be cleared unless it was a standard visa cable or a standard congressional. It had to be cleared by the front office. You couldn't go back with questions about policy, questions about support, questions about how far can I go, how far can you go, will you help me on this? Because it would have to go through the front office. Therefore there wasn't that good a support system in place yet.

I extended in Israel. I did it for personal reasons as well as professional reasons. My mother was living with me. She was diagnosed in Israel with cancer. I had a choice. I could either leave Israel immediately - this was my second year there - to get her back to the United States for treatment, or I could start treatment in Israel. She and I decided after talking to doctors there to let her go through the treatment there. We paid for it out of our own money, instead of using her insurance in the United States, but the doctors were excellent. Her chief doctor had been at Sloan-Kettering in New York. He went over the potential expenses of medical care. He said,

"Look, by the time you finish the entire series of cobalt radiation treatments, it will cost you as much to pay for everything here as you would pay in incidentals if you were in the United States." So we decided to stay. Because we were going to stay, we had to stay for a longer period of time than my original assignment would have lasted. I asked for an extension to give us four years and thus to be able to take a long R&R right in the middle. So it worked out.

To go back to the assistant secretary of state. The day I came back from R&R... It was home leave, one of the first times in the State Department that I was actually able to get home leave from a post. It was great. I had a month off. About two weeks before I was due to go back, the assistant secretary announced that she was going to Israel on a visit. Fine. She arrived in Israel the day after I did from home leave, but my assistant had done everything, and everything was fine. The Assistant Secretary was Betty Tamposi, Elizabeth Tamposi. She wasn't interested in going to the Consular Section. She wasn't interested in seeing it, and she wasn't interested in meeting any of the FSNs. She was interested enough to meet the American officers at someone's home over a brunch, and then I drove her and her special assistant up to Jerusalem, where she was going to meet with the people from the consular section there. In the car going up, she turned to me and said, "Michael, you've been in the Holy Land for a long time now. Have you ever met the Blessed Virgin Mary?" I know, I can see the expression on your face. I looked at her, and I thought first that I was still going through jet lag, because I had just arrived the day before from a 24-hour trip back. And I said, "Excuse me?" And she said, "Well, have you ever met with the Blessed Virgin Mary?" And I said, "I'm not sure what you mean." She said, "Well, you know, she's been appearing so many places. She's been appearing in Yugoslavia, and she's been appearing at that apartment in Maryland" - that was news to me. She said, "I thought that since this was her home she might have appeared here and that you'd had a chance to talk to her." I looked at her special assistant, who averted his eyes immediately and stared out the window. And I just said, "No, I'm sorry, I never have." Fine, fine. We got up to Jerusalem. Before I could warn the head of the section up there about this, Donna got into the car, and Betty Tamposi -

Q: Donna - ?

METRINKO: Donna Sherman, an absolutely wonderful, superb officer who died later in Cairo, absolutely fantastic officer. Donna got in the car and Donna was a rather large woman and very expressive. She sat down, and Betty Tamposi turned toward her and said, "Donna, I'm so glad you're here. I'm glad to meet you." She said, "You know, I wanted to ask you, you're up here in Jerusalem. Have you had a chance to talk to the Mother of God?" And Donna looked at her, and then turned and looked at me, and her eyebrows went all the way up in the air, and I just shrugged, and Donna said, "Well, no, not really." Fine. We got out to the church in Bethlehem. The church in Bethlehem, by the way, was the whole reason Betty Tamposi was in Israel. She didn't seem to care about the consular sections in either place. She wanted to see the church in Bethlehem. We got up to the church in Bethlehem, and the priest whom Donna had arranged to give the tour of the church walked over, and the first question Betty Tamposi said was, "Father..."

Q: Ha, ha, ha, ha.

METRINKO: I asked her special assistant later, "What is going on here? Is she flipped, or what?" He said, "She's been under a lot of stress." She was indeed under a lot of stress. Not long afterward she went passport-application-hunting.

Q: Yes, and it became quite a political scandal in 1988 - no, it was the 1992 election. She was looking for dirt in the passport files against Bill Clinton.

METRINKO: To see whether or not he had actually ever gone to the Soviet Union on a visit when he was a student at Oxford.

Q: And also, I think even there was a rumor that he might have attempted to renounce his citizenship over the Vietnam War.

METRINKO: But that was the kind of support we got from the Department of State. Now, having said that, we did get support in one area. They were absolutely afraid to get involved with Arab-Americans. They were, however, very interested in the problem of the Black Hebrews, and the Black Hebrews are one of the most fascinating consular cases I've ever dealt with. The Black Hebrews, or the Hebrew Israelite Community, were a group of about 1200 black Americans who had migrated to Israel with a charismatic cult leader. His name was Ben Ami Carter. Ben Ami Carter had been a bus driver in Detroit, if I remember correctly, who had had a vision back in the time when black groups were becoming Muslim - Mohammed X, etc. Ben Ami had decided that he was really Jewish, and he had a series of visions and dreams that led him first to go to Liberia looking for the promised land, and then, when he decided that Liberia was not his place, he went to Israel, went in as a tourist, settled down in a small area not too far from the Negev Desert. His followers started to come. And his followers were a very strange group of people. We had, among others, the hairdresser from The Supremes there.

Q: The Supremes being a popular singing group.

METRINKO: I guess we do have to explain The Supremes, don't we?

Q: Well, you know, we're talking about history.

METRINKO: 1966-67. We had the daughter of a bishop. We had a lot of solid, middle-class black Americans who had migrated to Israel and claimed to be going in as tourists and had simply settled there around their leader. Now, the group was a strange group. They dressed in their version of ancient Hebrew/African clothing - long robes, turbans, beautifully embroidered, beautifully colored robes. They looked like what you would envision an Orientalist view of the Middle East circa the year zero. They were vegetarians. They were vegan vegetarians - no meat, no dairy products. They had come in without the Israeli Government really knowing what was going on. They had come in in dribs and drabs and ones and twos and threes and fours, and suddenly the Israelis turned around and realized there were more than a thousand of this community living in a town on the edge of the desert.

Q: Where was their money coming from?

METRINKO: Good question. Well, some of them were escaped felons from the United States.

They had done bank robberies and things like that. There were a number of convictions outstanding for credit card fraud. They had a large... But those were the... Right now I want to say I've always thought those were the exceptions, a couple of people who had done financial crimes at a time when a lot of young black Americans thought that getting the man was okay. It goes back to a time in our history of ultra-ethnic nationalism, ultra-racial nationalism, in the '60s. The money they raised in the United States - they had a large number of followers in the United States - they raised the money. People who went to the community would sell their property and bring the proceeds with them. They also raised money in Israel. They worked illegally in Israel. They made jewelry. They took care of people's houses. They did other things, bits and pieces of work.

Now, what was the situation when I got there? When I had my long conversation with Joan Clark prior to going out to Tel Aviv, she explained about the group to me. She said, "Look, we don't want another Jonestown" - Jonestown being a settlement, a community of Americans who were living in Guyana under the leadership of a somewhat similar cult leader, Jim Jones. They committed suicide en masse, or were murdered, depending on the version. But several hundred or a thousand -

Q: I think we're talking of around 800. There was a mass suicide sort of coerced murder. They all drank poison.

METRINKO: And what was going on in Israel at this time, in 1989, was this. The Israeli Government wanted these people out. They were illegal in Israel. They had no residence permits. They could not work legally. They were existing on charity, handouts of money. They were suspected by the consular section of mistreatment of children, to the point of almost torture of children, of coercion, of forcing people to stay in the group, in the community, not allowing people to break out of the cult. There were requests from the United States. People couldn't locate family members who had joined the cult. They couldn't communicate with them. In order to avoid deportation, the entire community had renounced their American citizenship. Therefore, everyone from the leader on down to young children was stateless, and children who were being born - and there were lots of children being born down in the community - were all being born stateless. Israel does not grant citizenship based on birth on the land of Israel. And they no longer had American citizenship, either of the parents, so the children were being born stateless, which was something awful to contemplate down the road. They had highly annoyed the Israeli religious communities and the Israeli Government. They practiced polygamy, which was biblical, but not legal in Israel. And they just looked "other;" they looked different. They were black Americans wearing long robes and turbans who thought that they were the only true Jews and told the Israelis that they were the true Jews and not the Israelis and that the Israelis had gone astray, period. Okay.

Joan Clark said, "We don't want another Jonestown. Whatever you do, please go down there, get that straightened out. That's what we have to do." My predecessor, for reasons I don't understand, had cut off all relations with the group. He didn't want to see them. Once they renounced American citizenship he didn't want them in the Consular Section. There was a serious problem because they needed help. It took about three years, but working with the Israeli Government, the Ministry of the Interior especially, working with the Jewish-American Congress and a wonderful, intelligent, prescient rabbi who was the head of it in Jerusalem, who saw this as a bombshell for American-Israeli relations, working with the community itself, working with the State Department, we got it solved. It took forever.

Q: How did you come up -

METRINKO: Well, the final arrangement was this. The Black Caucus, number one, was threatening -

Q: This was in Congress.

METRINKO: Yes, the Black Caucus in Congress was threatening retribution against Israeli interests in Congress if the Israelis did anything to this group. That was fine. The Israelis, nonetheless, were trying to get the group out of Israel. They thought they were responsible for every crime that had occurred in the State of Israel. First, I made it a priority to establish relations with the community. I think the first of second day I was in Tel Aviv, I told my chief FSN, I said, "Please call them up, tell them I would like to come down and pay a courtesy call." And that news was greeted with absolute dead silence, and then after a couple of days, "Yes, we'll be happy to receive him." So I went down there and played it straight. "I don't care if you renounced your citizenship or not. I'm still the American Consul General, you still have ties to the United States, and I'm just here to see if there's anything I can do for you." I went over all the problems with them, welcomed them, established a relationship to the point where they started coming back to the consulate, to the embassy, when they needed help, especially for repatriation, especially the younger children, if they could get away from the community and wanted to go back - because very often they had a mother or a father in the United States. There were a lot of divided families in the community. Working with the Jewish-American Congress, convincing the Israeli Government that they had to go easy, and over the course of time, worked out a wonderful deal, where the State Department, Consular Affairs, looked at the whole questions of the renunciations and decided that, except for the top leadership, everyone else had been coerced into renunciation, therefore they were not valid renunciations. Therefore, they could be given their passports back. We even hired a PIT -

Q: A part-time intermittent employee.

METRINKO: We hired a part-time employee just to issue passports. We had to issue more than 1000 passports, and they all had to come in and go through the renunciation of the renunciation ceremony and make sure that everything was on the dotted line. Now we did all this working with the leadership, and the leadership were being excluded. At the same time, working with the Israeli Government and the Jewish-American Congress, we got the Israeli Government to agree to give them residence permits, which gave them permission to work in the country if they got their American passports back. The Israelis wanted to be able to deport them if they had to, but promised they would not unless in an individual case they had a serious reason to. So the Israelis gave them residence permits. We gave them their passports back, and we actually got the Bureau of Population, Refugees, and Migration in the State Department to give a million-dollar grant through IOM, the International Organization for Migration, to this black American community. Now they were American refugees, American citizen refugees, but on the books all of this was absurd. In fact, it was wonderful. We used the million dollars to pay some of the community's debts to the municipality of Dimona. Dimona was the Negev town where they were living. They had not paid their electric bill or their water bill in lord knows how many years. They paid off their bill, made the municipality deliriously happy. We also used the rest of the money, through IOM, to build a school, and the Department of Education in Israel agreed to fund the teachers, hiring people from the community to be teachers in the school. There were a lot of certified teachers there. So what we had, as I approached my last couple of months at the embassy, were 1200 new black American citizens living in Dimona being rediscovered by the Israeli press as sort of an interesting ethnic composition down there, being rediscovered by the tour buses, so that tour buses would pass by and say, to American foreign tourists, "And there is a community of..." you know, da-da da-da.

Q: Did they sell trinkets?

METRINKO: And they would sell trinkets, and they would sell little pieces of silver jewelry, and they would walk around in their wonderful robes. And they started coming on Israeli TV. They were superb entertainers. They had used their methods of cultural expression, singing and dancing, in their services, and they could sing...

They had taken a sort of Christian Gospel approach to music and applied it to Judaism. It was sort of really "out there." And they were getting awards, and they were going to jazz festivals and everything else, and working out.

Now, this still left the leadership. The leadership were a different kettle of fish. Several of them had outstanding federal warrants. They had renounced their citizenship. Nobody liked the leadership. I did. They were fine. They were my kind of people. They had all been rebels, and they were okay. They were okay with me. They did not have their citizenship because they were the ones named by the other 1100 or whatever as the people responsible for forcing them to give up their citizenship. What we did was, I helped them write sort of mea culpa explanations about pressures of society, politics, fear of being deported, etc. that had made them do this. And once again, the State Department came through and sent us permission to reissue passports, and one of my last official acts there was to be able to present his new American passport to the Messianic head of this community. It was great. He came up to the office, and we had a ceremony.

Q: Now, let's talk about another group of Americans I think would be much more difficult, and this would be the Jewish Americans, highly orthodox, maybe Hasidic, maybe not, but of that ilk, who went to Israel, who often seem to be the spearhead of extreme Israeli nationalism.

METRINKO: Orthodox Judaism covers a spectrum of religion. You have the ultra-orthodox, you have the orthodox, you have the Zionist orthodox, and you have the anti-Zionist orthodox, just to name a few. There were a couple of orthodox groups, highly ultra-orthodox groups, that did not accept the existence of a State of Israel, for example, the Satmer group. The Satmer grand rabbi lives in New York City. I had met the Satmer grand rabbi in my old days in Poland, when I hosted him on a visit there once. The Satmer grand rabbi dealt directly, as far as I remember, with the Palestinians. His belief, and the belief of his followers, was that the State of Israel can exist only when the Messiah comes; therefore, anything claiming to be a state, in the absence of the Messiah, is not real. It is an illegal organization. So we had lots of Satmers, and I was on very good terms with the Satmers. They would help me a great deal with other orthodox groups. You had the Vishnitzer and you had the Bostoner and you had the Lubavitcher. The Lubavitcher grand rabbi, the rebbe, as he was called, lived also in New York. In fact, he died when I was in Israel. I had a chance to meet him in New York. I paid a call on him, which was fairly highly publicized. The Lubavitchers were sort of like missionary ultra-orthodox. They felt it was their job to reconvert Jews to true Judaism. They were great. The Lubavitchers actually had an emissary to the embassy who would come in once a week to see me, and he and I would sit down for at least an hour every Friday morning and discuss Israel, Judaism, and various parts of Jewish law, Jewish dietary law, etc. I used to go to his home quite frequently, and I made sure that I took my whole consular staff out to visit their community. Every new group of people went out to visit them. I knew most of the grand rabbis in Israel, and I knew a number of those who were living in the United States because their groups have traditionally lived in the United States. They had an interest in knowing me because they had to deal with the Consular Section constantly. Many of them were American citizens, including some of the grand rabbis. They needed passports. They needed certificates for this, notariats, etc., etc. Their wives and children needed passports and needed documents. If, for example, the Satmers did not like the State of Israel or did not admit to its existence, they certainly had no problems about the government of the United States. That was their country. That was a legal government. Therefore, they always wanted to be sure their American documents were in order, because that's how they lived and traveled. If they weren't American citizens, the members of the ultra-orthodox groups, the ones who followed the grand rabbis, were interested in going to the United States to visit the grand rabbis. The Lubavitcher rebbe had a court in New York, in Brooklyn, to which hundreds and hundreds, if not thousands, of people went every week. Everyone in Israel who followed him - and there were many thousands - traveled to the United States to visit him, to ask questions, just to go and look at him. And so it was incumbent on the Lubavitcher community to have good relations with the embassy. We had excellent relations. And that went all up and down. There was a very ultra-orthodox group that ran a medical charity. I went down to Beni Brak, where they had their center, visited them there. They were very impressed. They ran a medical charity where they would match up people in Israel who needed emergency medical treatment and could not be treated in Israel with doctors in hospitals all around the world, but especially in the United States. And if you qualified for this program, if you were a child with a bad heart or something like that and could not be treated in Israel, this group would pay for everything. They would arrange for your passport, arrange for your visa, arrange for your medical transportation, arrange for a member of your family to accompany you, arrange for a place in the United States to stay, arrange for kosher food, arrange for a doctor and all the hospitalization in the United States.

Q: Admirable.

METRINKO: It was wonderful. They had a huge warehouse of free medical equipment. If you needed a wheelchair you could go there and get one and bring it back, or not bring it back, as the case might be. But I was on good terms with them, and because I knew so many of them, they introduced me to others, to the point where my Jewish staff, a lot of them were offended that I was on such good terms with the ultra-orthodox community. There are large gaps between the ultra-orthodox and regular secular Jews. Not only gaps, there's a great deal of enmity, hostility.

But you talked about American Jews who came there for nationalist reasons, Zionists. Yes, they existed. I did not have very much personal contact with them, because they were basically living up in the West Bank. They were settlers. The American Jews who lived in Tel Aviv or up and down the coastline were a bit laid back. They were there for family reasons, professional reasons. They had gotten citizenship one way or the other. They tended to be very well educated. There was a large contingent of retired Americans, and a lot of these people were my friends. I'd go to their houses for dinner; they'd come to my house. We'd see each other. We'd go on trips together. I'm still in touch with a lot of them. The last time I saw anyone like this was about a month ago here, when two of them came from Tel Aviv, were visiting Washington, I took them out to dinner. They tended to be more liberal, more live-and-let-live, than the type you're talking about on the West Bank.

Q: I would have thought that these people, the type I'm talking about, the extreme nationalists, were in a way sort of a cutting edge of the right wing of the Likud Party, weren't they?

METRINKO: No, they go beyond Likud. In my mind it's so far gone - I'm trying to think of the name of the party that was so famous. It's just slipped my mind right now.

Q: It's something Oshaz, or something.

METRINKO: Yes. No, not Shaz. I just can't think of it. It was declared illegal in Israel anyway. I would see these guys occasionally when they were arrested. And we did have American Jews who were arrested, a steady stream of American Jews, usually for murder, for murdering Arabs. They tended not to stay in jail long. If you were picked up... it's funny, if you were Arab and you killed a Jew, you would go to jail forever. If you were Jewish and you killed an Arab, it was a temporary stay.

Q: Did it remind you of what you'd heard about the deep South?

METRINKO: Oh, very much. It was worse than the deep South - the deep South in the United States, say 1920 or 1930, yes, very much, absolutely. But... Oh, good Lord, all the names are going, thousands of Hebrew names are going through my mind, and I just cannot think of the name of the Party.

Q: You can add this. You will get a -

METRINKO: But basically, my work brought me into contact with every type of person, everything, Christian, Muslim, Arab, Armenian.

Q: Did you get involved in extreme Christianity, people waiting for the Second Coming?

METRINKO: The Messiah complex.

Q: The Messiah thing or something.

METRINKO: Extreme Christianity, a lot of religion in Israel in that area is extreme. If you scratch anybody there you're likely to get a fanatic at one point or another. The extreme religious Christians tended to be up in Jerusalem, and they were specifically a Jerusalem problem. I didn't have to be bothered with them very much. In fact, I don't think I ever even met one. I dealt with a fair scattering of American clergy, your standard Roman Catholic monks and this and that and nuns who worked in Israel for good professional reasons. It dealt with visitors who were there for religious purposes, but none of the Christian fanatic types.

Q: Well, you were there '89-93. I mean, we're talking about the Gulf War and all of that. Can you talk about what your experiences were at that time?

METRINKO: The Gulf War was interesting. As we started to build up to the Gulf War, the United States had laid an ultimatum down: the Iraqi forces had to leave Kuwait or there was going to be trouble. I instituted a policy in the Consular Section of burn, of getting rid of documents, which nobody could understand, but I simply said it's from my experience in Iran. I don't know what's going to happen here, but we might as well go through old files. It's time for it anyway. The embassy had a series of meetings. It was handled pretty well by the ambassador, by the DCM. A series of meetings to go through the various emergency evacuation things and this and that - thank goodness, because it was amazing how ignorant many of the American officials are about emergency procedures. And we went through a series of who's essential to embassy operations, and it was rather funny, when consular sections are often looked down on as not being on the cutting edge of anyone's embassy, in one of the meetings I had the economic counselor say, "Well, nothing we do here is essential in the Economic Section. We could all leave tomorrow and nobody would notice. I can't really say that anything I've done as an economics officer has been essential to running an embassy." Well, as it turned out, by the time push came to shove, we ended up with the ambassador, the DCM, one person from USIA, one political officer, nobody from the Economic Section, and the entire Consular Section, including all the FSNs. And we ran a 24-hour shift in the Consular Section, for the first several days, anyway.

Q: For the first several days of what?

METRINKO: The first several days of when the Iraqis actually... we started to bomb the Iraqis and they started to retaliate and bomb Tel Aviv.

Q: These Scuds were coming in, these rather inaccurate missiles.

METRINKO: If you're going to get hit by a missile, it doesn't matter if you are targeted with finesse or by mistake.

Q: No, they just drop it.

METRINKO: And in effect, it's better if they're targeted well because then you can stay away from them.

Q: I've heard stories about when all of a sudden the going got rough, an awful lot of groups like both who had been posturing and all this all of a sudden decided it was time to get the hell out of Israel and head for back to the States. Did you find that?

METRINKO: This was a funny time, a very funny time. First, a lot of Israelis simply ran away. If there had ever been the old, you know, Leon Uris myth of Exodus and everything else.

Q: You're talking about the '48 War and all.

METRINKO: Yes, all Israelis are brave and heroes and all that. They took off like rabbits. They disappeared. They ran. I mean, it was almost funny to watch. To give you an example of how many people ran, the local newspaper decided to send a reporter to an old-age home in Tel Aviv to see how people who had gone through World War II in Europe were faring now. They got to the old-age home, and all the pensioners were still there, but there was no staff. All the doctors, all the nurses, all the administrators had taken off. The only people who were there taking care of the old people were the Arab char force. And this was reported in the newspapers, that the entire Jewish staff had deserted the hospital.

Q: Where did they go to?

METRINKO: They went to the United States, they went to Europe, they went off to various kibbutz's, they went up to Jerusalem. They just disappeared. Streets in Tel Aviv were empty. One of my consular officers, who lived about a block from me, one night there was a knock on his door, and a man looked at him and said, "You and I are the only two people who have stayed on this entire street. Would you like to come to dinner?" The mayor of Tel Aviv stood up early on, the first day or so or the second day of the Scuds, and started to talk about how all the people who are running away are cowards and traitors, and someone said, "Where is your son?" His son had run away, and he had to stop talking like that.

Q: I'm told the Israeli television sort of relished showing people dressed as orthodox Jews getting on the planes and so forth.

METRINKO: You know, it wasn't only that, it was everybody, and you know, a lot of people came to Israel at the same time, but they tended to be Americans who thought that they were somehow going to help Israel. It was a mixed bag. I had friends who stayed. A lot of my friends stayed. I can't say that it was the orthodox who left or the seculars who left or this group or that group. A lot of people stayed, but far more left.

Now, the State Department. The State Department was fairly supportive in a stupid way. Consular Affairs was not really geared up to assist us, I would say. We had done everything possible. We certainly had made it known... Well, in Israel it was never possible to have what consular officers refer to as the "warden system." In Israel and the surrounding areas, we had 120,000 American citizens residing there, and we had at any given day many, many thousands of tourists. In Israel there are English newspapers that are pretty good. There are English broadcasts on television, English news. You had access to English on the radio, and certainly, the Israeli Government was making every possible announcement about what's going on. Also CNN was making every possible announcement, and you could get CNN in Israel at that point. So there was no way that any American who was there could say that he or she was not notified of what was happening. The buildup had been international press for about two months. Everybody knew this was happening. In fact, the Israelis were so well organized that tourists had access to gas masks. Hotels passed them out to anyone who was staying for the night. The airport in Tel Aviv never closed. The American liners weren't coming in, but El Al was coming and going every day with direct flights to the United States, and we had a deal, an arrangement with travel agencies. We had set up a small consortium of travel agencies, five or six. Any American who called the Consular Section during this period, during the first week or two, who wanted to leave Israel, we could get them a regular seat on an outgoing flight. If they called up and they had had trouble getting through to the airport, we had the emergency numbers, the sort of unpublished numbers of our group of travel agents, and we could put them in direct touch. And we had absolutely no problem. The State Department never quite understood this. But anyway, that was happening.

Now, the problem with the State Department. Right in the middle of all this, when it's getting down to like two days before the rockets are going to start going up in the air, our defense attaché announced that a special plane was coming in to make deliveries and that the military wives, the dependents, were going to be leaving on it. The ambassador went ballistic, so to speak, saying, "You can't do this. If you go, the whole embassy has to go. You're not separate. You can't just call a plane in to take away your dependents, and we are not evacuating this post." It went back and forth. They backed down, but the plane did come in at the last moment, and while it was in the air we were told that there would be 100 or so seats on it for people who wanted to leave. Consular Affairs went a bit ballistic. All this was being done by the ambassador and the defense attachés. We only found out about it in the Consular Section quite late, as the consular section up in Jerusalem found out about it quite late. When I told CA about it, they said no one from the embassy should get on the plane unless there was a public announcement to allow American civilians from Israel to get on the plane. Well, as I told them, the airport was opened; planes were flying routinely; any American who wanted to fly out of Israel could go, get a ticket (and there were seats available on every flight), and leave Israel. It went back and forth, back and forth. The end result was that I think some of the American military dependents did go. A number of dependents from Jerusalem went, even though they were never in the problem, although they didn't know that at the time.

What else was happening? Oh, this was when we finally had to do a sort of ordered departure of all dependents from the embassy, and they were sent down to the Red Sea area, to Elat to spend some time in a hotel. And eventually most of them left there and went back to the United States or to other places to sit out the war.

Q: Well, of course, one of the problems... I've interviewed both Bill Brown and Chas Freeman, who was ambassador to Saudi Arabia. You had this very peculiar situation where we wanted to keep Israel out of the war and keep Saudi Arabia in. Particularly in Saudi Arabia, it was absolutely essential that we not evacuate the American civilians, because they were essentially running the oil companies and you couldn't have done the war.

METRINKO: You could not have done the war. You would have impacted on American oil prices back here because nobody knew how long the thing was going to take.

Q: Yes, but I mean at the time, the oil was -

METRINKO: - the reason for the war.

Q: - and the planes were being fueled by Saudi oil. So you had this peculiar thing where you really didn't want to evacuate, tell all the Americans to get the hell out, and so anything we did anywhere in the neighborhood would impact and scare the people in Saudi Arabia, who were essentially at more risk.

METRINKO: My understanding was that the oil companies and the American companies in Saudi tied their evacuation policy to whatever the evacuation policy of the embassy was. Therefore, if American civilians were evacuated from the embassy, then the oil workers would also have to go with their families. That was sort of a trip-wire.

Q: And so you had essentially sitting there, in a way, using Americans - the term isn't quite right - as hostage to the political situation. But it was a very serious one. Were you aware of this dynamic where you were?

METRINKO: Oh, a little bit, yes. But you know, things were also happening fairly quickly, and as it turned out... Well, what I did, I don't trust the Department of State. I haven't for many, many years. I don't trust the Department of State to protect me. I had my mother with me. She was an invalid. She was also quite old. She also needed help. What I did, I had had a personal friend who was visiting and her vacation was over. She was going back to the States. So about a week before anything happened, I told my mother that I was buying her a ticket and that I wanted her to go back to the States for a month or two. I wasn't going to sit around and wait for our front office or the Secretary of State to make a decision about American dependents when I knew there were so many other factors in play. And I simply sent my invalid mother back to the United States on my own. Any American officer who whines about evacuation policy can do that with his or her family. We can afford plane tickets. We can send our own families anywhere we want to. We don't have to wait for somebody in the Personnel Office at State or a deputy assistant secretary to finally make a decision. We can make our own decisions, and I did it.

Q: As one looks at these things, always after a war, the claims are always much greater than the accomplishments, but what was the sort of the feeling around with American troops coming to Israel, with the Patriot missiles, at the time?

METRINKO: They were highly welcomed by the Israelis. They were fêted, in the sense of 'given feasts.' Israelis gave them gifts, visited them, invited them out to their homes. It was great. I made a number of new friends at the time, too, because there were several retired American Israelis living there who decided it was time to be nice to the people in the embassy and called up to see if they could invite us for dinners. And I went, and I had a great time. Of course, I was out almost every night during this time. It was great, some of the best parties I'd been to. Wars are good for that. Adrenaline runs.

Q: Were you involved at all in the distribution of gas masks and that sort of thing?

METRINKO: No, it wasn't a consular function; it was an admin function, to people in the embassy. But we did not provide gas masks to anybody who was not an official American or an official American dependent because the Israeli Government provided them to everyone in the country - except not on the West Bank.

Q: In the regular work and all, a Consular Section always gets stories, and people come in and our offices are open, and they talk. People talk, you know, getting visas or having problems, and say, "Oh, yes, did you hear that?" Did you find that information coming through the Consular Section... how was it received, say, by the Political and minorly the Economic Section?

METRINKO: In general or during this period?

Q: Well, in general.

METRINKO: In general, unfortunately it was fairly typical in the embassy in Tel Aviv, as it is in many embassies, where political sections and economic sections are not interested in consular sections or in anything they can provide or do. Our DCM was interested. I did long series of reports on visiting Arabs, doing this, doing that, various groups that I'd been involved with, some of my ultra-orthodox contacts, and he encouraged me to write as much as possible. He himself rarely went out, so he didn't have the contacts in the society. I encouraged the officers to write, but what happened there is what usually happens, that consular officers say, "I'm too busy. If I write this reporting telegram, I will never get the 25 visa telegrams out." On the other hand, did we get the interesting stories? It was too much of a mill in many ways. We had the interesting American Israeli stories. We certainly had access to anything in the country, but it wasn't quite the same as when I had been, for example, in Tabriz or in Teheran in the Consular Section.

Q: What about your dealing with the Israeli Government, particularly on the, I guess, Ministry of the Interior and the military, with people who were in trouble and all that? What was your -

METRINKO: As individuals, Israeli officials could be fine. They also lie a lot. They will look you straight in the face and lie about whether or not they have an American in custody. I had one Israeli official who complained about me, lied, made a direct complaint to the ambassador. All I could say was, "He was lying." But that was that. Israeli officials are no better or worse than any other officials. I had good relations with individual police officials and individual army officials, very good relations. It was my good relations with one Israeli military official that got us access, for the first time in the history of the Intifada, to one of the major detention centers. They hadn't been letting anyone at all visit a particular detention center, called Ansar 2, and I met an Israeli at a party, had a great time with him, and he invited me to come and visit him where he worked, and that's when I discovered he was the deputy commander of... all I can say, it was a major concentration camp. I told him I'd been trying to visit there for months and that his government had always refused to allow it. He said, "Call me tomorrow, and I'll arrange it." I did, and he did, and two or three days later, I was visiting American prisoners in a prison that we had never been allowed access to and no foreigner had ever been to.

Q: Well, on this American prisoner thing, I mean, sort of the creed of a consular officer of any country, but especially an American consular officer, you have to see American prisoners who are in jail.

METRINKO: Yes, all that has changed. Consular Affairs no longer does that, as far as I can see. But at the time, yes.

Q: But you did find yourself... I mean, if you couldn't see an American, you knew an American was in a prison - I don't want to overemphasize this point, but I think it's an important one - you didn't feel that back in Washington or the embassy itself, but I mean basically pressure from Washington was not pulling out all stops to make sure that you were able to fulfill your consular functions and your treaty functions?

METRINKO: Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha. That's putting it very diplomatically. Visiting prisoners for me is a personal thing. It's one of the things that I consider the most important of the consular functions. It was personal for me because I had spent so long in prison. I get incensed when I cannot get to Americans who are under my jurisdiction, part of my responsibility, and are in prisons in my area. When I arrived in Tel Aviv, I discovered that the prison visit program had largely been dropped. I don't know why, but my predecessor and the officer responsible for American citizens' services had decided it wasn't so important. They had stopped making visits, and they claimed it was an economy measure, to save money. I looked at the woman officer and said, "How does it save money not to visit prisoners?" She couldn't reply. She said, "Oh, it's an economy measure." I immediately had a total review done of all the prisoner files that we had and announced that effective immediately we would see every prisoner once a month. These in large part were political prisoners, and we were dealing with an Israeli system which tortured prisoners under interrogation and for punishment. You do not drop a prison visit program at a time like that. I put this into effect, and by and large we did it. I went myself on many of the prison visits because I wanted to show the Israelis how important I considered it, that I wasn't just going to send a junior vice-consul on his or her first tour, that the Consul General goes - the same guy whose picture is in the newspaper meeting with the grand rabbi or the chief rabbi of Jerusalem is also tomorrow morning at this prison meeting with an American Palestinian teenager or an American Jewish teenager who's in prison. And over the course of time, we did manage to get a good working relationship with the police, with the military who are responsible for running the prisons on the West Bank and also martial law prisons in Israel proper. And the relationship worked out. It worked out simply by pushing and pushing and pushing and pushing. Now, did we ever get quick notification from the Israelis that they had taken an American prisoner? No. Invariably, they would wait the two full weeks they thought was their due. During those two weeks they would interrogate. During those two weeks they would punish, and they would use methods that are called torture in most civilized countries. Once the visits started, by and large, mistreatment of prisoners stopped - at least for the American prisoners - and in general, once we had established a relationship with whoever was the warden of the time at a particular prison, it worked out okay. We could simply call him up, make arrangements to go. They were quite flexible about times. We would go, have coffee with the warden or have breakfast or something, be given privacy to see the prisoners, and they understood this concept. I'm sure we were being listened to because we were in standard waiting rooms and things like that, but still, given at least superficial privacy. We were allowed to receive letters, to take letters from the prisoners. We were allowed to give them letters. We were allowed to give them things like clothing, vitamins, anything else that their families would send. And it worked out. In fact, I could go on and on about visiting prisons there, because I probably made 40 to 50, at least, prison visits. I was doing this every other month myself - not every prison visit, because it's something also that FSNs do, it's something that junior officers do.

Q: Well, sure. I mean, this is part of their experience, training.

METRINKO: But it got to the point, when I was leaving Israel, the prison camp Ansar 2, where we had had so much trouble getting in... And I have to tell you the story about Bill Brown à propos of that. My last visit there, the warden had become a friend. The deputy warden was a friend. I would see him socially with his wife back in Tel Aviv. On my last visit there - they knew it was my last visit - I had one prisoner there who still had several months to go on his sentence - and I arrived at the prison, went in, as always, you know, to sit and chat with the warden for a while, and he said he had a few gifts for me in honor of my last visit to the prisons since I was going back to America, and he gave me a little metal container to hold visiting cards, and it had the name of the prison and the date on it, and that was nice. And he said, "After you see Mohammed, the staff would like to have you come to lunch to our cafeteria." Fine, thank you, I'd like to. He said, "Oh, and as a the real gift that we want to give you in honor of your last visit, we're giving you your prisoner." What do you mean? He said, "You can take him with you today. We're going to set him free, but you have to take him." And I said, "You can do this?" He said, "Yes, I can." And he said, "We decided it was the most appropriate gift."

Q: How wonderful.

METRINKO: Yes, so I went to see Mohammed, who was, like, a 16-year-old American Palestinian from the USA who had come to the West Bank the year before to stay with his grandmother, had gotten caught up in the stone-throwing. I went to see him. They brought him over to me. I used to go right into the barbed wire areas. And I looked at him and said, "We're not going to talk too long. I have some things from your family here," etc., etc., but basically, "Go back to your cell, say goodbye to your cellmates because you're going with me in about another hour. I'm going to a lunch and I'll be back and pick you up." He said, "What do you mean? I'm here for another three months." And I got him, just took him out. I signed the papers, the "receipt" for him and everything else, and came out with him. My FSN thought this was great. She was a wonderful lady. I got to the driver, who had not been part of any of this, because the driver was not allowed in with the embassy car, and we told him we were going to the West Bank, to a particular town, to take this boy home. And he said, "How do you get there? I've never been to the West Bank." I said, "Well, don't you have a map?" He said no. I turned to the kid, and I said, "You know how to get there don't you?" He said, "No, I've never been in this part. They brought me all the way from home in a van with no windows. I've never seen this part of Israel or the West Bank." But we found it. We got up there, and it was great. It took us a couple of hours to get to his house, of course, which was at the far end of the country, but we drove there in a couple of hours, got him there, and drove him through Jerusalem. He got to see Jerusalem for the first time in his life, got him up to his home. We parked the car outside. There was absolutely nobody. It was a pleasant enough looking village, but nobody around. We said, "Go inside and tell your family you're here. We'll wait until you're inside, and then we'll say goodbye after you come out again." He went inside the house, and about three minutes later there was an explosion of people running out, and it ended up with a big festival in the house and everything else and dinner and the whole bit.

Q: It's wonderful.

METRINKO: It was a good gift. Israelis could do that. They could be that charming, that sensitive, that intelligent. They could also be total bastards who didn't give a damn who they killed or tortured. They'd go flip-flopping back and forth. Cultured, intelligent, educated, well-traveled - you know, nice families, the soul of civilization, and they turn around and they will kill somebody in cold blood, and they don't seem to care. This is why I was never comfortable in the country. And then they'd threaten you if you protested.

Q: You were going to say something about -

METRINKO: Oh, yes, Bill Brown. In one of my prison visits I had come back, and I had written a fairly long report because I was really the first foreign diplomat who was getting into some of these places. And in the report on Ansar I had talked about how the camp was divided and how in one barbed-wire pen, open to the elements... The pens were large barbed-wire fenced areas about the size of a basketball court, for example, just barbed wire, and you might have some canvas over the top or a tent in the middle, but basically prisoners sat outside, sun, rain, snow sometimes. And I was passing one pen by with the guard who was escorting me to my meeting with the warden, I looked at it and it was filled with children. And I looked at it and I said, "Who are they?" And he said, "Oh, those are the ones who are under age." It was a barbed-wire pen filled with young kids, Palestinians, who were in prison. Well, I put this in the report. The ambassador came down. I was eating lunch in the cafeteria the next day, and the ambassador came down and he saw me and he walked over, and he said, "Mind if I sit down?" Sure. He said, "You know, I saw that report about the kids in the pen, and I talked to some of my Israeli friends in the government about it, and you know, Michael, that's done to protect these kids because their lives are so bad at home and they have such terrible living conditions. This is really the way they get trained. This is best for them." I just looked at him and said, "Mr. Ambassador, they were children in prison in a barbed-wire pen." And he finally just got up and left. He really believed that this was appropriate. That was the mindset I'm talking about.

Q: By the way, what was your feeling about... Did you have any relations, particularly on prisoners and all and treatment thereof, with the CIA people at our embassy?

METRINKO: Yes, the CIA people there were basically not interested in anything going on in prisons. Decent social relations, entertainment, etc., go to their homes for dinner and they would come to mine. To the best of my knowledge, we had no one from the Agency working in the consular section, at least no one that I knew of.

Q: Well, then, you left there in '93.

METRINKO: Yes.

Q: What happened?

METRINKO: I left there in '93, having survived two ambassadors and a couple of chargés. I should say, by the way, that our second ambassador, Bill Harrop, who was assigned to Israel, was perhaps the best person for whom I have ever worked - incredibly professional.

Q: And of course he was kicked out of there by -

METRINKO: - the Jewish lobby.

Q: - by the Jewish lobby, yes. Of course he was.

METRINKO: But incredibly professional, sensitive, intelligent. But, anyway... And a nice man. I left there and came back to the States with an assignment to Population, Refugees, and Migration - PRM - in the Refugee Bureau, where I was the office director for what they called ENSA, Europe, Near East, and South Asia. I was the office director for an area filled with hot spots. I had all of Europe, so we had Yugoslavia and a civil war, or whatever kind of war you want to call it.

Q: You were doing this from '93 to when?

METRINKO: '93 to '96, a three-year assignment. I had the collapsing Soviet Union and a whole variety of flashpoints there, everything from, good Lord... I mean, the whole Soviet Union was just -

Q: Yes, you had Georgia and you had Azerbaijan and Armenia.

METRINKO: Chechnya - I had that. I had the remnants of the Afghan situation. I had a civil war in Yemen. That was sort of brief, but I also had the Palestinians and the Jewish Agency. And a major part of our budget, or a huge chunk of my budget, which was about $350 million per year for refugee work in my area, went to the Jewish Agency to support Jewish refugees going to Israel, of which there are none (not by any standard definition of refugee, anyway), and also the Palestinians in the camps. This was at a time, '93, when everybody had decided it would be in our interests, because of Oslo, if we could -

Q: Oslo being the first meeting of the Israelis and the Palestine Liberation Organization.

METRINKO: Everyone had decided, or at least the State Department and the White House had decided it would behoove us to start throwing larger amounts of money at the Palestinians to make it seem that we were doing something to make their lives better. The State Department, through the Refugee Bureau, had been supporting UNRWA, the United Nations Relief and Work Agency for Palestine refugees ever since it was founded and had been the major donor throughout that time for UNRWA. This means that we were the ones providing a major percentage of all the money spent on Palestinian refugees by the United Nations. But both of those portfolios also were handed to me. And a decision sort of had been made in State that AID would take care of doing things for Gaza and the West Bank and that Refugee Bureau money would go to Palestinians in Lebanon, Jordan, and Syria - which was fine. It meant that I had a lot of travel to those areas and traveled to other parts, too. I got to Serbia; I got to Croatia; I got to Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Yemen; and also many times to Jordan and Syria, the West Bank and Gaza, Israel itself, and even into Lebanon once.

Q: Well, let's talk about the whole Palestinian thing. What was your impression of this '93-96 period about what was happening, effectiveness, non-effectiveness?

METRINKO: We had a problem dealing with the Palestinians, as we do dealing with Israel. There are no American political leaders who have the balls to speak frankly or the truth to either the Palestinians or the Israelis. The Palestinians - I'm going to use harsh terms now - have been whining about being refugees since 1947. Most of them are not refugees. All of the Palestinians who went to Jordan, for example, which is the bulk of Palestinians, a couple of million, were given full citizenship status by the Government of Jordan back in the early 1950s. They are citizens of Jordan. They do military service; they pay taxes; they carry Jordanian passports. The present king of Jordan is married to a Palestinian wife. They are fully involved in Jordanian society, and they are some of the richest people in Jordan.

They're up and down throughout the government, every part of the government. And yet when they want to, they continue claim refugee status. This is bullshit. And a couple of times we made - not we in the sense of me, but various administrations in the United States made - feeble attempts to sort of wipe the Jordanian Palestinians off the refugee rolls. The United Nations is trying to do this off and on, too. The Government of Jordan always said, "Please don't do it because if they get told they're no longer refugees, then they will have an uprising here and our government will have trouble." So for Jordanian internal political reasons we still consider the Palestinians in Jordan refugees. They are not. That's like total bullshit. The ones in Syria have full legal status except that they are not citizens. Fine. I guess, in theory, you could consider them refugees, but it's been three generations. That's a bit long to be a refugee. The ones in Lebanon are treated generally despicably by the Lebanese Government. Lebanese Governments are best known for their cupidity and corruption. They have been awful dealing with Palestinians. Early, early on the Christian parts of the Lebanese Government got the Christian Palestinians declared full citizens. They were given Lebanese citizenship back in the late '40s, early '50s. So the Christian Palestinians there are fine. They are full Lebanese citizens and vote - if anyone votes in Lebanon. I guess they get paid for their votes in Lebanon. Am I a bit acidic about the Middle East? But it's all those 16 or 17 years of living there. The Muslim Palestinians have been treated very, very harshly by everybody - by the Lebanese Government, by other Lebanese groups, by Syria, by the Israelis, by the United States. Every time they would stick their heads up and try and get some dignity, we'd call them terrorists and smash them down again. Or we let Israel go in and smash them down again. They are treated very poorly. Yes, they would qualify as refugees because they have never been accepted in Lebanon. Syria, not really, not any more. Jordan, not for a long time. The question used to come up of the Palestinians living in Gaza and the West Bank, areas under Palestinian control. If you have a Palestinian travel document, or if you have a Palestinian passport, are you still a refugee if you're living in a Palestinian area? Well, the legal answer would be no, and yet we've allowed the Palestinians for a long time to continue claiming this. For many it's because they're on the dole. They get education; they get medication; they get other things courtesy of the United Nations. It's a free ride.

Q: Did you feel while you were doing this that you were basically handing out a dole or involved in a -

METRINKO: It was done for political reasons, but I had great fun. I was given many, many millions of dollars. I was the only one in the refugee... I mean, this was my bailiwick, the Refugee Bureau, and I was told to select projects that would be public, look good, make the United States look good, and make it seem for the Palestinians as though there is movement and that they had not been forgotten by the world or by Arafat, who had indeed forgotten them. "We're building you a school. Now shut up!" - basically. "We're putting up this clinic. Now stop making noise."

Q: Well the situation there, but when you go look at it, one almost gets a feeling of a terribly squalid situation.

METRINKO: It depends. You know, the camps in Syria and Jordan are no worse than the Syrian and Jordan towns. I mean they're part of the towns. You really can't tell in most case when you're in the camp and when you're in a normal town. And the squalor is often the irresponsibility of the people living there. If someone doesn't clean the street, it doesn't matter if you're a refugee or a multimillionaire. It looks squalid. A lot of it is the "give me" mentality of the Middle East, just as in Israel. Give me, give me, give me.

Q: Before we move to the Yugoslav thing, what about central Asia and the Soviet Union? What were we doing there?

METRINKO: Logically we had some rather ridiculous programs in the former Soviet Union. And we had some very ridiculous programs in the former Yugoslavia. What were we doing in the former Soviet Union? We were helping in Azerbaijan. We were helping in the Armenian areas.

Q: We were feeding the heavy hand of the Armenian lobby, or not?

METRINKO: You couldn't give direct aid to the Azerbaijani Government or Azerbaijani organizations. You had to work with third parties, but you know, what we were doing, a lot of it was very basic stuff like supporting women, businesses, supporting doles of food. A lot of it was absurd, but we were supporting programs, for example, these mom-and-pop-type minor business enterprises in Russia proper. And I remember I used to bring this up at meetings. Every time we would get a proposal in, we were expected to give a certain amount of money. We couldn't just stop giving money. And I would say things like, "You know, Russia has billions of dollars worth of art that it has locked up in various basements. If they would just sell a painting, they could provide food for this area for the next ten years. Why are we giving them American taxpayer money for something that the Russian central government should handle?" I'm conservative fiscally. But we just continued to give. The refugee business is a business. There are a lot of organizations in Washington, in the United States, and internationally that exist sort of as businesses.

Q: And you have to have refugees.

METRINKO: And you have to have refugees. And if you can't find an active refugee who's running with a pack on her back from a burning town, then find somebody who's been there for the last 20 years but was wretched and is willing to take your money.

Q: I've talked to people who were, say, in places like Thailand looking at refugees from Cambodia and Vietnam who were saying that when they were saying, "You know, these really aren't your real refugees" - these were beginning to move into economic refugees - the NGO organizations would go howling because this was taking away their numbers.

METRINKO: You take away the numbers of refugees and you take away the budget from the organizations; therefore, Jim and Mary, who are nice people, lose their jobs.

Q: Yes, you were breaking their rice bowls.

METRINKO: Breaking their rice bowls, yes, breaking the rice bowls of a lot of middle-class American liberals who enjoy being overseas.

Q: Social welfare has always been considered middle-class welfare, in a way.

METRINKO: In a way it is.

WILLIAM C. HARROP
Ambassador
Israel (1992-1993)

Ambassador William C. Harrop was born in Maryland in 1929. He received a bachelor's degree in English literature from Harvard University. Prior to joining the Foreign Service in 1954, he served in the U.S. Marine Corps and studied for a year in the graduate school of journalism at the University of Missouri. Ambassador Harrop's career included positions in Italy, Belgium, and ambassadorships to Guinea, Zaire, Kenya, and Israel. He retired from the Foreign Service in 1993. Ambassador Harrop was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1993.

Q: How did this appointment come about?

HARROP: I had had a message from the Director General, who called me up to say that I was one of the candidates for Ambassador to Pakistan or Israel. I said that I was surprised to hear that because I didn't have any deep background on those areas but that I would certainly be delighted to take either assignment on. I did not think that such an appointment was likely to be made, because I could think of two or three colleagues who had deeper knowledge of those areas than I did and who might be available for them. In the autumn of 1990 I talked about this with the Director General again, and he said, "No, you are a serious candidate, and I'll let you know if anything comes up." Then I had a visit in Zaire from Congressman Steve Solarz, an old friend of mine who still follows Africa, though at that time he was pretty much focused on Asia...

Q: This is Congressman Steve Solarz...

HARROP: A Congressman from New York.

Q: Very much involved in foreign affairs.

HARROP: Very much so and very much involved in Zaire, as the former chairman of the House of Representatives Subcommittee for Africa. He came for a visit to Zaire. I must say that we had some very interesting discussions with Mobutu during his visit there. When he arrived at the airport [in Zaire], he said, "Well, congratulations! I hear that you're going to be our next Ambassador to Israel." I said, "Well, I'm very glad to learn that." Then on the next day I received a formal note that the President had approved me for that job.

So I set about trying to prepare for it. I had not had experience in the Middle East before that, so it was a great challenge.

Q: Two questions on this early period. First, did you have any feeling that you were being "vetted" by the "American Jewish Lobby" before you went there?

HARROP: No, I don't think so. I must say that, during this whole experience leading up to my appointment and during my service as Ambassador to Israel, I never had a sense of hostility or of "vetting" from the very articulate American Jewish community. There was only one occasion when I went up to address the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations in New York during the autumn of 1991, as I was getting ready to go to Israel. They have a sort of formal program there. This organization is one of the many efforts, and the most successful so far, to try to coordinate and rationalize the "world" of Jewish organizations in this country. American Jews are very competitive, very organization minded, and very political. They have dozens and dozens of overlapping organizations. In an effort to rationalize that situation and to be more effective they set up a Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations. This organization has been in existence for some years.

The occasion was one of their lunchtime meetings, which is their custom. There may have been 45 people there in the room in New York. I gave a talk. There was, I would say, some quite critical questions [asked of me]. There were questions about American relations with Israel, about the loan guarantee, some of the usual political hobby horses about the sentencing of Jonathan Pollard...

Q: He was convicted of spying [for Israel]...

HARROP: That question came up over and over again during my tenure [as Ambassador to Israel]. In fact, it came up just a few weeks ago once again, when Prime Minister Rabin raised it with President Clinton. A number of rather critical questions were asked, but I sensed then -- and afterwards reached the firm conclusion -- that this was a matter of style. I was not being subjected to any particular inquisition, nor were they being particularly hostile toward me. These were questions on which a lot of these organizations had a particular slant, and they were pushing their own slant. [The people attending the luncheon] had to go back to their own boards and report what they said to the new [United States] Ambassador.

I concluded that this process was not a particular case of "vetting." In fact, I really felt that, starting from the beginning and throughout my time in Israel, I had a very satisfactory and successful relationship with the American Jewish leadership. Of course, they come to Israel frequently. I must have spoken an average of once a week to a visiting American delegation of one sort or another. Many of these organizations have their annual, directors' meetings in Jerusalem. I saw a great deal of these Jewish leaders, and some of the individual leaders -- people like Abe Foxman, of the Anti-Defamation League; Robert Lifton, of the American Jewish Congress; or Al Moses, of the American Jewish Committee -- are people whom I regard as good, personal friends. I saw them very often. In fact, I'm going up next week to an award ceremony for Robert Lifton in New York.

Although the American Jewish community, AIPAC [America-Israel Public Affairs Committee] and Jewish organizations maintain a considerable pressure on policy toward Israel, it is a pressure which is not entirely seamless. That is, there are differences within the Jewish community. As a matter of fact, you go from a fairly "liberal" point of view in the American Jewish Congress with Robert Lifton, across the spectrum to really "hard Right," hard "conservative" positions. You can even go to the left of Lifton to the "Americans for Peace Now" group. Some of the senior members of the Clinton administration were active in Peace Now. Peter Adelman, who, I think, holds a sub-cabinet position in the [Clinton] administration and was Assistant Dean at Georgetown University School of Law, was the president of Americans for Peace Now. Then you had the ultra-Orthodox group and you had some hard line Right-wing people, many of whom I dealt with frequently in New York. They are really, I think, to the Right of the Likud Party [in Israel]. They support the concepts of a Greater Israel, "Don't Yield an Inch of Territory," "It is the Biblical right of the Jewish people to this entire land [of Palestine]," and "You cannot trust any agreement made with the Arabs." "The Syrians will attack the Golan Heights if they're allowed to do so again." Really, they hold "harder" positions than you hear, except in unusual quarters, in Israel.

The relationship is an extremely interesting one. You have the situation in which a huge outflow of private money -- around $1.0 billion a year -- goes to Israel in many different forms. I guess you could not call all of that money "grants," because a good deal of it -- several hundred million dollars -- is in the form of State of Israel bonds. These are rather a good economic investment, among other things, because legislation was put through to make this a tax-free investment [in the U. S.]. A lot of money is spent on that. Many people give money to their synagogues by purchasing these bonds in the name of the synagogue.

Anyway, I developed a theory, since I was interested in the Israeli economy and the reform of the Israeli economy -- to try to liberalize it a bit and to get rid of the overhang of socialism from the early days [of Israel]. There is still a very large parastatal sector -- about 40 percent of the economy is either in the hands of the government or in the hands of the great labor union, Histadrut, which, like labor unions throughout the world, is now losing influence and political authority but still has these huge holdings. It owns banks, corporations, conglomerates, and all sorts of things. I was really working, as a matter of fact, with the new Governor of the Bank of Israel, Yaacov Franke, who'd been...

Q: Was this before you went there?

HARROP: No, after I got there. I was just going into one section of my activities there. [Franke] had been a senior executive of the IMF [International Monetary Fund] for some years and was very interested in reform. As a matter of fact, the Faculties of Economics of Hebrew University in Jerusalem and particularly of Tel Aviv University were very active in these matters. The Labor Party was very active in these matters, so that it was a worthwhile issue to follow.

While on this subject, because we were speaking about the American Jewish community, I found that it was a matter of disappointment to many Israelis and to anyone who cares anything about Israel that American backers of Israel are prepared to give extraordinarily generous aid to Israel, but not to invest there. What's needed is investment, particularly in view of the large inflow of new immigrants from the former Soviet Union. Jobs are very important, and the expansion of the economy is crucial. That is what the debate over the [U. S.] loan guarantee was about -- to provide funds for [economic] expansion.

I frequently spoke to the American Jewish community about the fact that if they really wanted to help Israel, they should invest there and not just grant money to the government. Invest in some productive enterprise. They were very reluctant to do it. Only a very few have done that.

Q: Why would they be so reluctant?

HARROP: Well, there are several theories on that. One theory is that successful Americans, whether Jewish or not, are reluctant to put their money in an economy which, in fact, has a lot of difficulties for the investor. There are rather numerous controls -- over regulation, in fact -- on labor, capital, foreign exchange, factory location. American supporters of Israel, as much as anyone else, are concerned about security questions and about the security of their capital. However, you might suppose that some of those questions would not make much sense if you were prepared to give a million dollars to Israel. You might be prepared to invest it there.

In fact, it doesn't work out that way. One theory which people cite is that American Jews who support Israel tend to look on Israel as in some sense a charity. The way they look at their synagogue. You don't do business in the synagogue. You give money to the synagogue to support it. There is an odd, psychological feeling there that you as an American Jew may be in some particular business, where you are a very effective and a very tough businessman, perhaps. But you don't think of Israel as a place where you do that sort of thing. I don't know whether that theory holds water or not, but it's hard to find a theory to explain such a peculiar phenomenon. It was and is too bad.

I was struck by the intensity of interest on issues among the American Jewish community. I had dinner with a group of ultra-orthodox rabbis and others in New York and met with many people of many political viewpoints there. Some American Jews from Washington were extremely helpful to me in arranging meetings with all of the different [Jewish] organizations, setting up schedules for me to meet people. I felt that I was able to get a pretty good footing in this whole community here before I went to Israel.

Q: In getting ready, obviously you had to touch base or become immersed, because of its importance, with the American Jewish political community in all of its factions. What about the other side of the equation, the Arab world? This was not your area, but you were in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs. Did you get involved in that?

HARROP: Not very much, as a matter of fact. I tried to call on Prince Bandar, the Ambassador from Saudi Arabia. I wanted to meet him and talk to him. I had met the Egyptian Ambassador and chatted with him very briefly. However, I was not able to see Ambassador Bandar.

Q: Did this sound like a policy decision [not to meet with you]?

HARROP: I don't know. He tries to keep himself on a lofty plane of political and social activity which makes it hard to get at him. So I would hesitate to say that he made a conscious decision not to see me. He may just not have been available.

Q: What about the "Near Eastern hands" [in the Department]? It was basically a new bureau for you. One of the things that you hear at times is that whoever is our Ambassador to Israel becomes a captive of the Israelis and their supporters and is sort of at odds with the people working in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs. Did you get any of this feeling?

HARROP: No, I didn't. It's a fairly sophisticated bureau. I think that there are some pretty heavy, pro-Israel pressures, but the bureau itself is fairly balanced. The heavy, pro-Israel pressures, which are very subtle indeed, came out of the...Well, I think of Dennis Ross, who is now the coordinator of...

Q: He was on [Secretary of State] Baker's staff.

HARROP: He was Baker's right hand man for both Soviet activities and the Near East and was, in many ways, the creative mind behind Baker's remarkable feat in bringing about the peace talks, [beginning with] the Madrid Conference. [Ross] is a man of extraordinarily high intellect, with a very agile, supple, and creative mind -- a forceful fellow. However, I think that he is essentially concerned about the welfare of the state of Israel. I suppose you can go a step beyond that and say that it's all very well to criticize him for not being impartial, but if, in fact, he's doing something for Israel which is also in the American interest and in the interest of peace, he should be congratulated for that.

But the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs did not give me that impression. I spoke with the former NEA experts, and there I think you find a little more of an anti-Israel slant. I mean all of those people who have worked for so many years on the Middle East, like Talcott Seelye, Dick Parker, Bill Kontos, an old friend of mine, and many other such people. I think that they often have a little difficulty being even-handed, because they have been steeped in the business for so long. They've come to resent the role of Israel very much.

Q: What about Congress? Did you spend a lot of time with...

HARROP: Yes, I did. I called on, probably, 15 members of Congress and met with segments of the [House of Representatives] Foreign Affairs Committee and others there. I found that there's a great deal of interest there, of course. I spent a good deal of time with Senator Lautenberg..

Q: Senator Lautenberg is from...

HARROP: From New Jersey, a Democrat. He is a former President of the United Jewish Appeal in the United States -- a very fine man. I spent some time with Congressman Lee Hamilton [Democrat, Indiana] and quite a few others. It was an interesting experience to hear their point of view. Most of them said, "Well, I'll be seeing you over there," because they visit Israel in large numbers. In fact, it's true. I guess that later on, in Israel, I saw almost all of the members of Congress whom I had called on.

Q: When did you go to Israel?

HARROP: January, 1992. I was delayed a long time in Congress. I did not experience the systematic kind of opposition there that I'd had in the past from various quarters -- Senator Helms and others. It was more a question of bureaucracy and slow-going. I think that when it became known that I was not really intending to go to Israel until early in 1992, the Department did not press as hard to push me forward, because my approval was not as urgent as some of the other nominees.

Q: When you went out to Israel, did you anticipate facing any major problems there? There, more than anywhere else. Some places you go to and you just take things as they come. There are always some issues. What were they [regarding Israel]?

HARROP: The primary issues included the peace process, which had begun. Secretary of State Baker, by a remarkable effort, had made nine trips to the area in eight months. It was just a superhuman effort on his part, and I respect him immensely for it. He had finally broken through to get direct peace talks started between Israel and her four main adversaries, if you will, the Lebanese, Syrians, Jordanians, and the Palestinians themselves. That process had just begun at the end of October, 1991, and more talks were being scheduled. They were still at the point, then, of haggling over the "great" problems of where they should meet, the shape of the table, and that kind of thing. However, the breakthrough had occurred, and advancing the talks was a central preoccupation.

Secondly, we were in the middle of the very tough discussion on loan guarantees for Israel, due to extremely heavy immigration [into Israel]. About half a million Jews from Central Europe and Central Asia had come in...

Q: What was the issue of the loan guarantees?

HARROP: Well, let me go through it. Because there had been this huge immigration into Israel, the Israelis were in need of funds for [their] absorption. Under the laws of Israel any Jew is welcome to come [to Israel] at any time, and, of course, they encourage [this inflow] immensely. They want [Israel] to be the homeland of the Jewish people. They feel that it's a matter of survival for them, since the population growth rate of the Palestinians and Arabs generally is much, much higher than that of the Israelis. So they were looking for financial help to absorb these people. It's very expensive to arrange for housing, care, language instruction, jobs, education, health, and all the rest for these immigrants. More than one-tenth of the previous population of the country came to Israel in this new wave from the Soviet Union. In fact, it was really more like one-fifth. There had been talk of the United States providing guarantees for Israel to raise, in international capital markets, something like $10 billion over an unspecified period of time to use for the absorption of these recent immigrants. They could obtain that money at a vastly more preferable rate of interest and preferable terms if the loans were guaranteed by the United States Government.

We were then dealing with the conservative and hard Right, Likud Party government of Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir. Secretary of State Baker and President Bush had said that the American taxpayer is just not going to finance settlements in the Occupied Territories indirectly. That's all there was to it. They said that the settlement policy of the then Israeli Government was making it very hard to have a peace process of any validity. The Arabs won't talk when the Israeli Government is trying gradually to shift the situation on the ground to the point where there isn't need...

Q: Would you explain for the historical record what "settlement policy" means?

HARROP: The "settlement policy" in this sense was the practice of the Likud government of implanting as many Israeli villages, towns, and settlements in the Occupied Territories -- in the West Bank primarily but also, to some extent, in the Gaza Strip and on the Golan Heights. This was to make the Occupied Territories more "Jewish" and to make it more difficult ever to turn that land back to the Arabs. It was a very systematic operation. The Minister of Housing in the Shamir Government was Ariel Sharon, one of the toughest and hardest of the Right wing Israeli leaders for many years. They were spending a very large part of the Israeli budget on this program, providing all kinds of incentives. The Israeli Government was actually building housing and settlements at a great rate and subsidizing interest rates and, indeed, every aspect of life to encourage Jews to live in the Occupied Territories. In fact, over a period of a few years they more than doubled the Jewish population in the Occupied Territories. The figure varies -- it depends on whether you include the suburbs of East Jerusalem, but the number commonly used is 130,000 or so. That's quite a lot of people. This practice was such an anathema to the whole Arab world, and not only to the Palestinians, that any [Israeli] Government that pursued this kind of policy was fairly clearly not interested in a negotiation based on the exchange of land for peace.

So Secretary of State Baker and President Bush were really tough on this. But it was not just those two leaders who took this view. It was many influential people in Congress as well, particularly Senator Patrick Leahy [Democrat, Vermont], the Chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee and also the Chairman of the [Senate] Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Assistance. The loan guarantees would have to be considered by that Subcommittee.

This was a very difficult issue. AIPAC [America-Israel Public Affairs Committee] was extremely active on this issue, pressing for the loan guarantees to be approved, without any condition on settlement policy.

Q: Just to clear up this point. The [Israeli Government] policy was, basically, very Right wing oriented. Was AIPAC at that time a supporter of the Right wing [in Israel]?

HARROP: Absolutely. AIPAC gave the hard Right, [Israeli Government] its support, because that government, in one form or another, had been in power for 17 years, starting with Prime Minister Begin and the Right wing Likud Party. The American Jewish community has tended to reflect the political outlook of the government in office in Israel -- though this later changed a bit, during the time I was in Israel. The American Jewish community, by and large -- not the Left, not those most interested in negotiations [with the Palestinians] and peace -- from the broad center all the way over to the Right was very much in favor of these loan guarantees to help Israel and to help [the absorption] of the immigrants. It was regarded as a very important thing for everyone concerned that all of these, perhaps two million Jews from the Soviet Union, who were thought of as being under great risk, [be resettled in Israel]. This dates back to the days of the late Senator [Henry] Jackson [Democrat, Washington] who was trying to arrange linkages of all sorts...

Q: The Jackson-Vanik Bill...

HARROP: All sorts of arms control agreements with the Soviets linked to the release of the Jews [from the Soviet Union]. One of the liberal things that Gorbachev did was to allow [these Jews] to leave [the Soviet Union]. They began to pour out. The American Jewish community had a real sense of identification with and support for those people and pushed for [the approval of the loan guarantees]. The watchword was, "Why should you mix up humanitarian questions with political questions?" They felt that it was a matter of humanitarian aid to help in the absorption of these hundreds of thousands of Jews. The political issues of the settlements should be dealt with on other grounds, in this view. Anyway, it was a major debate. That was one of the things that I was going to have to look at.

American defense support of Israel has always been a tricky and difficult question. There were allegations of diversion of American technology by the Israeli arms industry before I went there. I was concerned about that subject.

The intimacy and the breadth of the United States-Israel relationship is such that it's almost impossible for an American Ambassador to complete his homework before going there -- even with the six months that I had.

I called on a good number of the members of the cabinet of the United States Government. You know, you seldom would meet a senior official in any government department in the United States who did not have some type of bilateral program going with a counterpart agency in Israel, who was not that very week receiving a delegation from Israel in his area of concern, or who did not have a delegation or mission over in Israel at the time -- whether it involved questions of environmental science or other matters. I recall that the head of the Federal Aviation Agency, with whom I had a long talk, said that he really had a deep span of cooperative activities with Israel. His was one of the areas where no one could say that it was a one way street, with just the United States helping out Israel. We were, he said, of considerable help to them because of our experience and expertise in air traffic control matters -- a difficult question in Israel because of the minute size of the country. He said that we benefitted immensely from our two-way cooperation and consultation on aviation and airport security, in which the Israelis were probably world leaders in the technology of airport security as well as the practices of...

Q: Perhaps historians in the future won't be concerned about these matters, but we're talking about bombs or weapons being smuggled on board...

HARROP: Sure. They're very expert and very experienced in this. FAA, in fact, was helping to fund some research, and we were purchasing, as I recall, some of this equipment which was particularly effective in the detection of weaponry or explosive devices at airports. But that is just one example. In education, in almost any field that you'd care to look at, such as transportation or communications, there is a rich, two-way exchange of information and cooperation. Israel benefits, really, from research and technical support money from a lot of different government agencies here, which is not covered by foreign assistance appropriations. For example, in the field of agricultural research some of the advances made in Israel in dry land agriculture have been funded in part by American private and public sources. It was really a challenge to try to keep abreast of all of these things. In a way, although it's not quite the same, you could make an analogy between being Ambassador to Israel and being Ambassador to Canada.

Q: I was just going to say that it sounds like that.

HARROP: The parallel, transnational lines of activities are so great, and the telephone is used so commonly. Although the telephone is probably not used quite as commonly between Israel and the United States as between Canada and the United States, this is a major challenge for the American Ambassador to Israel. The Ambassador's mettle is constantly tested in keeping abreast of these things.

Q: What were you getting from the [U. S.] Department of Defense? We had just finished the very successful operation called "Desert Storm," in which our main diplomatic effort seemed to be to keep the Israelis out of the action and from "queering the deal," in a way, because we had Arab allies. I've always felt that the Department of Defense has not been too happy with the Israeli connection because, first, it absorbs an awful lot of its power. Also, as seen from the defense side, [Israel] really isn't all that much of a bastion for the [U.S.] military as it's been touted.

HARROP: There's a certain schizophrenia, I think, in the Pentagon toward Israel. There is some resentment of the fact that a lot of aid and resource transfers to Israel are "imposed" upon the Department of Defense by the Congress. In recent years particularly -- for example during the last three years or so, as the United States budget generally and the defense budget like all the rest have come under increasing pressure -- the strong supporters of Israel in the Congress, seeing that it was going to be difficult to increase the appropriations for foreign assistance under that category, have begun to make inroads within the defense budget to earmark appropriated defense funds for Israel. Whether it's the transfer of excess or supposedly excess equipment or weapons systems or whether it's in the form of the financing of R&D in Israel, this is very large.

Q: "R&D" means Research and Development.

HARROP: Very large funds have been involved there. So the Department of Defense feels some resentment. On the other hand I say the defense attitude is schizophrenic because there is tremendous respect, on the part of the American defense system, for Israel, for Israelis, for the military job that they've done, and for their competence -- both as scientists, engineers, and as military leaders and fighters. There is a very close and warm camaraderie between the Israeli and American military establishments at all levels. I mean, I saw a great deal of it. We have approximately 3,000 Department of Defense visitors to Israel per year, from generals who come to visit -- you almost always have the commanders from NATO [North Atlantic Treaty Organization] forces in Europe -- to people who come down from all the different branches of the [U.S.] military service, as well as the Supreme Allied Commander [of NATO]. This is entirely aside from the large number of joint exercises that we have and entirely aside from the 50,000 or so American sailors who come on shore leave during Sixth Fleet visits to Haifa and Ashdod. Most of the service secretaries come over at one time or another, as well as the Chief of Naval Operations. The Sixth Fleet commander visits Israel several times a year. Other visitors include the heads of the different commands in the United States which do cooperative work with Israel regarding one system or another.

We must have to have a very large Defense Attaché office in Israel. I guess that about 60 percent of my mission was composed of defense personnel, because of the volume of business, commerce, and traffic, back and forth. So I spent a lot of time at the Department of Defense before I went to Israel. We have a structured series of collaborative conferences and consultations every year with Israel. There is a Joint Political Military Group, which meets twice a year, as well as a subgroup which is concerned with military activities, as opposed to political and military activities. The Joint Political Military Group is chaired by either the Under Secretary of State for Security Affairs or by the Assistant Secretary [of State] for Political-Military Affairs. Then there is a separate, annual, structured conference on the setting of the assistance levels for the following year. These are planning groups which have real meaning, and the Israelis attach great importance to them.

Q: You arrived in Israel, when?

HARROP: In January, 1992.

Q: What was your impression of the staffing, size, and composition of the Embassy when you got there?

HARROP: It's a large mission -- about the same size as two other missions which I have headed: Nairobi [Kenya] and Kinshasa [Zaire], although in both Nairobi and Kinshasa a very large component of the mission consisted of personnel from AID [Agency for International Development] and the Peace Corps. In Israel there is no Peace Corps assigned. There was no AID component there when I arrived. Finally, one AID man was assigned in early 1993. I was afraid that it was the opening wedge of a classical large AID personnel presence. The military element in the mission in Tel Aviv was the big component. I would say that it was a well-staffed mission in terms of composition and the structure. We had a good-sized public affairs office with, I guess, five officers. But you need those people, with so much going on. There is a huge Fulbright program, a large selection of Fulbright professors back and forth. We have continual cultural visits. American symphonies and ballet companies come. Arthur Miller came for a visit. I just can't name them all. And the Israeli press is so hyperactive, so omnipresent, and such a large element of society that relations with the media are a very important part of the responsibilities of the Ambassador as well as the USIS [United States Information Service].

We had a single commercial officer to try to expand American exports to Israel. There are a lot of American businesses in Israel -- although not as many as I think there could and should be. But there is a good deal of two-way trade, particularly in the advanced electronic fields. The Israelis are really on the leading edge of many of those areas, in medical and military applications among other things.

We had a five or six man Political Section and a four or five officer Economic Section. We had a very large Consular Section because virtually all of the American citizens who have made "aliyah" -- the term for emigrating to Israel -- have retained American, as well as Israeli citizenship. There are about 100,000 American citizens in Israel. This leads to a tremendous volume of consular work.

Q: How did you deal with the Consulate General in Jerusalem? I've interviewed a number of people over the past decade. The relationship has waxed and waned. The Consulate General is both independent and involved with our Embassy. How did you find it?

HARROP: It's historically been a difficult relationship, because the Consul General [in Jerusalem] is not subordinate to the Ambassador in Tel Aviv, for reasons that are fairly easy to see. We don't recognize Israeli sovereignty over Jerusalem. The Consul General in Jerusalem, aside from being concerned with the city of Jerusalem, is really our liaison link to the Palestinians. That's pretty much what that job is. You have the dangers of bureaucratic frictions or jealousies resulting from the autonomy of the post. There is jealousy on the part of the Ambassador that any Consul General in "his" territory is really independent of him. Then there are the technical problems which you can have over budget matters, such as who's responsible for visits and the division of certain functional support responsibilities. Then there was also the almost inescapable, political unease like that which has at times developed between the Embassies in Athens and Ankara, the Embassies in Algiers and Rabat, Delhi and Rawalpindi, or in many other places in the world where there are conflicts between countries. It seems that American Ambassadors and Embassies, despite their best efforts, can't help but reflect local sentiments to some extent.

I was determined not to have this problem. I spent some time with the new Consul General in Washington before she went to post (a few months ahead of me).

Q: Who was that?

HARROP: Molly Williamson, a person of vast experience in that part of the world. She speaks very fluent Hebrew and Arabic. She is a quite exceptional and very intelligent officer. We just wanted to avoid these problems and we actually did. We inherited certain jealousies because there had not been a good relationship previously. One of the big areas of jealousy was over security -- who was responsible for it and did the Regional Security Officer in Tel Aviv supervise the security operation [in Jerusalem]? You can see how such issues could develop in Jerusalem when a Secretary of State, a cabinet member, or a senior Congressional delegation came to Jerusalem for a visit, which frequently happened. Who was responsible and so forth? You can see that these things could become delicate. Who was responsible for determining the nature of advisory cautions to American citizens when the "Intifada" [Arab Palestinian uprising] became particularly heated and there were shootings...

Q: The Intifada involved attacks on private citizens.

HARROP: We managed to work that out. I had a very capable DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] when I arrived, Mark Parris, a superior Foreign Service Officer. He and I worked very hard with Molly Williamson to arrange the relationship [between the Embassy and the Consulate General in Jerusalem] on the security side -- which I think was quite satisfactory in the end and has worked out well since then.

Then there was also a certain, inescapable jealousy over the fact that, just as a matter of economy, the Budget and Fiscal system, which is, of course, located in Tel Aviv, handles the budget of [the Consulate General in] Jerusalem. The budget [of the Consulate General is handled as a part of] the budget of [the Embassy] in Israel. You have to be very careful of jealousies on that subject.

Obviously, you get to the question of resources and money, and money is such a terrible problem everywhere now, as I'll go into in a moment with regard to Israel. But we worked these problems through.

On the political side, we simply refused to have problems. We kept in very close consultation, and we had only occasional differences. I really rode very hard on my substantive staff to be certain that there was no lack of communication [with the Consulate General in Jerusalem]. Any cables that went out were to be fully discussed between us. The only problems we ever got into were situations in which, from our [the Embassy's] point of view, more junior officers in Jerusalem had sent out messages which were of joint [Embassy-Consulate General] concern but which they had not cleared with us. I'm sure that they felt that we did the same thing. But we really kept this to a minimum. It worked very well.

Q: You're talking about a phenomenon within the Foreign Service where, essentially, the junior officers go out and look at the periphery of things, the dissidents, and the problems. They are younger. They get very much engaged in these things. When you have two organizations doing this, it turns into...

HARROP: Into an area of emotional and ideological involvement. I think that most of our professionals are able to resist the emotional involvement, but it's simply inescapable when you live in a society in which you only hear one point of view, over and over again, day after day. Anyway, as it turned out, that was not a major problem for us. We were able to coordinate very well the visits of Secretary of State Baker and Secretary of State Christopher and of the numerous Congressional groups. That was a matter in which I take satisfaction. I think that Ms. Williamson can, too. We were able to handle our relationship with maturity.

Q: When you arrived there [in Tel Aviv], you mentioned the press. I've been in places where the Ambassador arrives, the press immediately picks up and says, "Ah, Mr. X has come as Ambassador. This means that he's either out to ride roughshod over us, or he's our friend, or something like that." Did you find yourself being characterized before you knew you had any particular character as far as this was concerned?

HARROP: There was a lot of that. Israel is a very special place in many, many ways. One aspect is the press, which is just extraordinarily outspoken. I think that there are more daily newspapers per capita in that country than in any other country in the world. Any Israeli newspaper, almost by definition, is a national paper because the country is the size of New Jersey. Speculation is simply uncontrolled. The line between editorial comment and news doesn't exist, so there was a lot of speculation about the outlook of the new Ambassador -- is he going to be this way or that way? The speculation ran across the whole gamut. A number of theories built up.

One of the things that I had to decide very early was how I was going to relate to the press. This is a big problem, because you get misquoted. If you make a slip when you say something, it's going to be "blown up" to the skies as a major policy declaration. People are going to be after you. You're going to be quoted, efforts will be made to manipulate you, and so forth. Some of my predecessors had taken the position that they simply would not deal with the press. This was true of my immediate predecessor. As the media never tired of telling me, they could never get at him. He would never make any comment. In a country which is so obsessed with and so thirsty for news -- people walk around the streets listening to transistor radios -- this seemed to me to be foregoing voluntarily a major opportunity for communication. Newspapers have a huge circulation. It seemed to be a lost opportunity for the Ambassador not to have some relationship with the media.

So I decided that, with the greatest prudence and with the advice of a very excellent Public Affairs Officer, I would be available and essentially would try to meet with the press fairly often. In fact, after I'd been there for about five or six weeks, I went onto what they called the "Moked" program. This is Israel's "Meet the Press," "Face the Nation," and all the rest, all rolled into one. There's one weekly program featuring an hour's interview of a news making individual. It has astounding ratings. A very large proportion of the country listens to this program. A country that has been through the security experiences that Israel has and a country where hardly a single family has not lost a relative in war is very, very interested in news, in what's going on, in the security situation. That's the explanation for it. I went on that program, and my appearance turned out to be successful. I worked very hard to prepare for it. The interview was in English, and then they "dubbed it over" into Hebrew for the broadcast. I was quite pleased. I was able to make the major points that I wanted to make. I was able to present myself as an individual sympathetic to Israel and aware of the main concerns of the Israeli people, while having a rational, analytical, American view of matters. Also, I was able to avoid appearing to be an intuitive, 100% pro-Israeli American. I was quite pleased with the outcome. I think that, by and large, it went pretty well.

I had other such experiences, interviews, and discussions with the press, both one-on-one's and in group forums. I got into trouble in Washington on several occasions, usually through a slip of the tongue, a choice of words which was picked up and then expanded by the Israeli media, which is always a great danger. That is immediately picked up by the wire services. Several of the American newspapers have full-time correspondents in Jerusalem -- the "Washington Post," the "New York Times," and other large publications. That would happen, and people would get upset back in Washington until they learned the context of the quote. We went through this several times. But I think that, by and large, the gain far outweighed the cost. None of these little slips ever caused a real problem, in policy terms. Everyone is always so nervous about relations with Israel that anything on the news is very much noted. I think that my decision to be occasionally available to the press was the right decision, and it worked out fairly well. It was difficult to deal with the public through the media in Israel, but also enjoyable, in many ways.

Q: You went to Israel. The Shamir Government -- the Likud Party government, you said -- had been in power for about 17 years. It was a "hard Right" wing government. We had our difficulties with it for a long, long time. How did you find dealing with the Shamir Government at that stage of its existence?

HARROP: This was the last six months of the Likud government in Israel, which, as I mentioned, had been in office for about 17 years. It wasn't clear by any means that Likud would lose the election. It looked like a very close election, and it was. The United States is very important to Israel. I could always meet with the Prime Minister or the Foreign Minister, if I wished to. They make themselves available to the American Ambassador. In fact, the government makes itself available to any member of the American Congress. Even a freshman Congressman, in his first months in office, if he comes to Israel, can see the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, or the Foreign Minister if he wishes. They will make themselves available because they recognize the importance of the United States to them.

The situation now, under the Rabin Government, is a little bit different than it was under the Shamir Government, because the perception in Israel [during the Shamir Government] was that the Bush-Baker administration was rather tough on Israel. They felt that they would have to obtain what they sought in the United States, through the Congress -- not the Executive Branch. A great deal of effort was made to work through AIPAC and through the several, intimate friends of Israel in the American Congress -- such as Larry Smith and Tom Lantos in the House of Representatives and Senators Inouye, Moynihan, and Lautenberg in the Senate. Anyway, the relationship with Congress was rather special for that reason. At the present time that's no longer quite the case because one of the changes which Prime Minister Rabin wished to make was to deal directly with the Executive Branch of the American government and not go around it. Prime Minister Rabin made that clear during my first meeting with him. That point came up immediately.

However, it was not difficult to deal with the Likud government because of their perception of the United States. But there were differences. I had a long and difficult interview with Arik

Sharon. He was trying to justify his "settlement policy" but was doing it in a very confrontational way, knowing that I would not agree with him. I had difficult meetings with Ehud Olmert, who is now Mayor of Jerusalem. He was then Minister of Health and was, I thought, irresponsibly critical of the Bush administration. One or two other members of the Shamir Government were difficult, but you could always be received and could always work with the government. Israelis are, by and large, personable, attractive, vivacious, intelligent people. For a diplomat it's an exciting and fun place to be assigned, both professionally and personally.

Q: I've heard this from a number of people who have come [to Israel] from other places where either you're a peripheral person, as an American diplomat, or else, say, involved with the Arabs. You really don't get into [the society]. [In Israel] you were right in the middle of everything.

HARROP: The Israelis are engaged in issues, personally and ideologically, and you talk about issues. I remember that I was taken aback, when I presented my credentials to President Herzog, a most engaging and charming man -- an intellectual and a man of parts. He set an example, which I encountered over and over again. I had presented the diplomatic letter. I said a few words in Hebrew to him, and he said, in English, "Not bad!" Then, as we sat down to have coffee, he turned to me and said, "I don't know what I'm going to do about the Likud [Party]." I said, "What do you mean, Mr. President?" I thought that he was going to open our conversation about the day, what nice weather we were having, or how many children I had and that sort of thing. He said, "I'm trying to change the electoral system. I'm trying to raise the threshold of votes needed to obtain a seat in the Knesset to cut down on the mess we have with this large number of small parties, which makes it hard to form coalitions. I think I've got Labor on board, but Likud is getting difficult again." We immediately entered into a highly substantive and highly political discussion of that, among other issues.

I found subsequently that Israelis simply don't have time for small talk. They don't bother with small talk. You meet someone for the first time and you begin discussing tough economic and political issues, right away, which I rather enjoy. I think that most people do. It's just a national characteristic. I enjoyed my introduction to this, but it was surprising.

There was a little sense of distance with the Likud because, in part, they were disingenuous about the peace process. I think that the global, political circumstances had backed them into agreeing to become engaged in this whole peace discussion. They couldn't resist, when it was offered to them -- direct, face to face negotiations with their Arab counterparts. But they were not serious about it, which I think in retrospect was reprehensible. Prime Minister Shamir actually made a statement which made clear, after he'd left office, that he was not really committed to this process. He was not wholeheartedly or frankly engaging in negotiations. The Likud criticism of the Bush-Baker administration I found offensive. In fact, I spoke publicly about it a number of times because I feel, to this day, that, if you strip away all the rhetoric, and all the pro-Israeli "sweet talk," which is so common in our political system, no American administration has done more for Israel than the Bush-Baker administration. The Gulf War neutralized their primary adversary in the Middle East -- Iraq. [The Bush administration] then went forward with this tremendous commitment to the peace process and was able to reach [agreement] on real negotiations with Israel's adversaries, on Israeli terms. Lastly, the resource transfers to Israel grew during this administration, in part because of the Gulf War. Grant aid to Israel from the United States, you know, is about half of our aid to the entire world. It's more than half in terms of grant military aid -- 53 percent. It's about 45 percent of our grant economic aid to the entire world. I'm not talking about Israel plus Egypt. I'm talking about Israel alone. Transfers like that were actually expanded in various, temporary ways under the Bush administration. I was offended when I encountered a common perception among both Israelis and the American Jewish leadership that the Bush administration was somehow hostile toward Israel. Nothing could have been farther from the truth.

Q: To what do you attribute this?

HARROP: I attribute it to the lack of a kind of "touchy feely" style. There was a kind of pragmatic toughness, a rhetorical toughness within the [Bush] administration. Also, there was no great personal warmth. Actually, President Bush and Prime Minister Shamir really didn't like each other much, and did not easily communicate. It was a big problem. Then there were such things as the celebrated quotation of Secretary of State Baker, using four-letter words about "the Jews" in an American political context. This quotation may or may not have been accurate, but it's the kind of thing that politicians say privately. I think that the context was that someone had asked what the American Jewish reaction would be to this or that. Baker was quoted as having said, "F___ the Jews. They have never been for us anyway." Whether he said it or not, this reported remark had nothing whatsoever to do with the policies of the [U.S.] Government toward Israel, which were, from any objective point of view, extremely favorable.

At any rate the negotiations were very difficult. I dealt a great deal with the members of the negotiating teams. The Israelis had to have several negotiating teams to handle this complex of negotiations [on preparations for the Middle East peace talks]. They were dealing separately with each of these negotiating sessions. All of the teams would come together, gradually focusing in Washington. It was all done in Washington after a time. They would have an Israeli group dealing with Lebanese and an Israeli group dealing with Syrians. There was an Israeli group, a bifurcated, double group, dealing with the Jordanian-Palestinian delegation, which, in fact, was two delegations, and these were separate talks. So there were four separate negotiations going on at once, plus five different, multilateral, regional negotiations including most of the Arab countries. A total of 12 different Arab countries were involved. It was really a success to get them together. There were also the major world powers, the Europeans, Japanese, Chinese, and even some of the smaller powers. The Australians were involved. The Canadians took an active role, as did the Austrians and the Scandinavians. The negotiations concerned water, refugees, arms control, and economic development.

So there were the four, bilateral negotiations that I mentioned with the Syrians, Lebanese, Jordanians, and Palestinians, and then five of these large, multilateral, regional talks on the future of water and water availability for development, on the environment, on refugees -- a very sensitive subject in the Middle East because of all of the Palestinians who left the territory -- on the economic development of the region, and on security and arms control. These [negotiations] were all held separately -- amazingly, in different cities around the world. Our tactic was to involve the world as much as possible in the whole thing. [As a result], we would have arms control and disarmament talks in Moscow; we would have refugee discussions in Canada; we would have the environment discussed in Tokyo; we would have economic development discussed in Paris; and so forth.

That kept everybody very busy and it kept the Israelis extraordinarily busy, because they had to mount delegations for this whole range of talks. They were a participant in every single one. They've done quite a phenomenal job of it. However, it also kept me and my staff very busy, trying to keep in contact, not only with the [Israeli] Prime Minister, the Foreign Minister, and the senior policy makers, but also with all of these delegation heads who were men and women of parts themselves and took a major role in the policy questions. It was a very busy, political job to do all of that.

Q: There was an [Israeli] election about six months after you arrived in Israel.

HARROP: The election was held on June 23...

Q: 1992.

HARROP: 1992. It was a very hard-fought election. In retrospect, I think that historians will say that that election was decided back in March or April [1992], when the first political primary ever held by a party in Israel took place -- in the Labor Party. Yitzhak Rabin won over his longtime rival, Shimon Peres, for leadership of the Labor Party. It was with Rabin that the Labor Party could win, because Israelis tend to be quite conservative on security matters. Although they may be interested, if you can generalize, in a peace process or negotiated peace, but they will resist anything which would appear even remotely to put their security at risk. In Rabin there was the combination of a man who had been a lifelong, professional military officer, who had been chief of staff [of the Israeli Defense Forces] during the Six Day War in 1967, had been present at the liberation of [East] Jerusalem, was thought of as being a hard headed, tough, military man, but also was interested in land for peace and in negotiations. With someone in whom they could have confidence for the security of the nation at the helm, the [Israeli] people were able to vote for the peace process, which is what they did. They put Likud out of office and made clear that the Israeli people wanted to have real negotiations.

At that time the process had been going on for eight or nine months, since October, 1991, but it had not gone very far because of Likud's actual beliefs and policies. But now [after the elections] the process could begin to move more rapidly. That was a sea change in Israeli politics.

Q: Were they trying to drag you in -- you, the American Embassy, and so forth?

HARROP: Into the campaign? Sure, it came up all the time, but we were able to avoid that pretty well. I think that any career Foreign Service Officer, any diplomat who's been around for a number of years during a political campaign is very sensitive to the importance of trying to keep out. Israel is particularly difficult because [the Israelis] were determined to bring us into it. However, we were able to keep out. In fact, the situation was that each side was sort of campaigning against the United States. It was peculiar, but that happens from time to time, as you know. I think that the Embassy was able to emerge unscathed on the issue of partisanship.

Q: There were some other things going on at the time. Were you involved in the General Motors engine scandal, and all of that?

HARROP: The so-called Dotan Affair. Yes. I don't want to spend much time on this, but for the past seven years there has been about $1.8 billion of defense equipment procurement per year by Israel using American grant aid. Israel has purchased squadrons of American aircraft, patrol boats, and all kinds of military equipment in the United States. They have had -- unique among the beneficiaries of American defense support -- their own, very large purchasing office, with scores of people employed, in New York, which undertakes this procurement, rather than having the [U. S.] Department of Defense do it on their behalf. They do this rather skillfully. They are rather good at getting competitive bids from American manufacturers -- the best price, the best goods, and so forth. From a military engineering point of view they are plain competing. They know what they want and what they need for their theater of war. The "Dotan Affair" refers to General Dotan, who was among those responsible for procurement. He was found to have diverted funds in a deal which included General Electric and other American companies. He was tried, convicted, and sent to jail in Israel. The whole story continued to unfold -- particularly on the American side -- after that, but there have been no indictments as yet in the United States. However, the Department of Justice [in the U.S.] was and is very much interested in pressing forward with prosecution in America. It wants some good, exemplary convictions in the United States to "nip off" this kind of thing.

There was a tremendous need to interview General Dotan and get from him the facts in a deposition which could be used in the American courts. The Israelis were very resistant to allowing Dotan to be interviewed. It became a real "cause celebre". We spent a lot of time on it, between Department of State and Department of Justice lawyers and the legal advisers of the Defense and Foreign Affairs Ministries in Israel, trying to work this thing out. It may have been concluded by now. Just as I left, four or five months ago, we'd finally reached an agreement on the nature of an interview which could take place.

I think that the Israelis exposed themselves to suspicion by resisting having Dotan interviewed. People from the United States, critics of Israel, could say, "Now, wait a minute, what are they trying to hide? Is there more here than meets the eye?" Others said, "Well, the Israeli reluctance is [based on the consideration that] they don't want to set a precedent for other powers interviewing [Israelis]." Others said, "Well, they [the Israelis] don't want Dotan to have an opportunity to try to involve people as high as he can, including then Minister of Defense Rabin in this matter. Dotan is a very bitter man, understandably. He's going to try to sour Israeli politics." Anyway, it was rather complicated. It's not over yet.

The other big effect of the Dotan affair was to have many people in the American Congress look with a skeptical eye upon the existence of this [Israeli] purchasing agency [in New York]. Perhaps purchasing should be done by the Pentagon, in the same way as most other programs are handled. I don't know. The Israelis feel that they can do better by purchasing for themselves, than having the Pentagon do it for them. There is a cost to the [U. S.] taxpayer with all of the paperwork. Actually, there's a cost to the Israeli taxpayer as well, in a sense, since the huge costs of the Pentagon bureaucracy doing the purchasing for Israel is deducted from the grant. I think of this off and on but I don't believe it is a major or enduring issue.

Before we get into the Rabin administration, the more important thing of this nature, during my first six months [in Israel] were the allegations of diversion of American military technology, particularly to China and to other powers. The Israeli defense industry is a large, complex, and very effective structure. It is largely government-owned, part of the parastatal system. The Israelis have an active military export program. This enables them to lower unit costs of their own equipment, the same as every other nation which exports [military equipment]. This is a major foreign exchange earner for them, and it is also a way for them to fund research and development, which would be more difficult to fund, [if they did not have] the economies of scale and have customers overseas to do the research for them. They are the world leaders in certain areas, such as night vision, and night flying equipment. In some other areas of electronics and avionics they are at the front of technology. In fact, when they purchase American aircraft, such as the F-15 and the F-16, they actually install their own, classified equipment -- improvements, if you will -- to make these aircraft more adaptable to their own image of what they need to be doing.

Anyway, the major allegation, which became very public indeed, was that the technology having to do with the famous "Patriot" missile, which had defended Tel Aviv and Haifa during the Gulf War, had been, in fact, "leaked" to China. China is a customer of Israel for defense equipment. This became a very serious matter. American intelligence [information] was sufficiently sobering on the subject that we asked for and obtained Israeli permission to send a special team to Israel to do a thorough investigation. This was done along in March or April, 1992. The result was publicly announced that evidence of diversion [of this technology] could not be found. Now, that did not mean that the intelligence information was refuted or brushed aside. There are many people who still feel that there is evidence of some problems in this area, possibly involving the "Patriot" and possibly involving other technology. That is a continuing chancre, a continuing boil that must be lanced. Many Israeli leaders who attach great importance to their relationship with the United States, and are very proud of their own integrity, are extremely bitter that they are suspected [in this connection]. They say, "Why in the world would we divert technology to China or North Korea, which is the charge, which could then be sold back to our enemies here in the Middle East?" They argue that this doesn't make sense.

Other people in the United States say that we have intelligence information which is just so "hard" that we cannot ignore these things. We know that the Israeli Government may not always completely control the Israeli defense industry, the same way as we know from experience that our government does not always control the American defense industry, and leaks could happen, etc. And so it goes, on and on. Efforts are made to set up systematic reviews, cooperative investigations, or other such things which will put these problems to rest. They will never be entirely put to rest at a time when the world arms industry is in great trouble. Obviously, it's part of our domestic political agenda to deal with the problems which major employers like Lockheed, Boeing, and General Dynamics are having. The same thing, of course, is true in Israel. So pressures become more acute. The search for markets for arms is a big issue. That was and is a troublesome bilateral issue between Israel and the United States.

When the Rabin Government came into office, they made it very clear that they were determined to move ahead with the peace process. In fact, the Prime Minister announced that within nine months of taking office there would be a deal with the Palestinians. That proved an unwise kind of a statement to make because such announcements inevitably harden your negotiating partner into feeling, that if he stands fast, you are going to give up some of his own positions in order to meet your own deadline of nine months. This statement may even ensure a lack of cooperation from the Palestinian side. There were plenty of other reasons why Rabin was not going to give in to the Palestinians. The legitimacy of the Palestinian negotiating delegation was not a very solid one. They had not been elected or appointed by any real, recognized political force. They were always playing "catch up" and trying to sell themselves to their own constituencies in the Occupied Territories at the same time that they were trying to negotiate against more experienced, more skilled, and better informed Israeli negotiators.

It was a tough impasse, despite herculean efforts by Prime Minister Rabin and his team. They did step back from the "settlement policy," although there is still some limited financing of settlements going on -- I think more than the Labor Party should be involved in based on its own platform. They could be more forthright on that subject, although they have, by and large, cut back on support of settlements. [Former Housing Minister] Sharon and his friends had made so many commitments and signed so many contracts before they left office. They explicitly and expressly left the maximum amount of ongoing construction in settlement activity. This presented the Labor and Meretz (a Leftist, "Peace Now" party which is the major partner of the government in Israel at the present time) with a great overhang of settlement activity to contend with.

Anyway, negotiations [with the Arabs] were not going anywhere up until this recent breakthrough in August, 1993, following negotiations in Norway. In August, 1992, I accompanied Prime Minister Rabin to Kennebunkport, [ME] to spend a weekend with President Bush and Secretary Baker. On that occasion we had some, I would say, tough but friendly discussions. There was a sense of reestablishment of positive relations between the Israeli Government and the personalities in that government and the United States Government. There was also some very blunt talk about settlements and about what the actual policies were going to be. The end result was what was politically necessary to both sides. The Israeli side agreed to sharply reduce settlement activity, and the American side agreed to go ahead with the large loan guarantee program. This was done, with the proviso, which was very much desired by Senator Leahy as well, that there should be a deduction to reflect settlement construction. Up to $2.0 billion would be guaranteed each year for five years for a total of $10.0 billion. Each year there would be a close accounting made of what money had been spent the previous year on settlement activities. That amount would be deducted from the amount to be guaranteed in the following year.

At present, in November, 1993, this is a big, political issue in the Clinton administration, since we have deducted almost one-fourth, almost $470 million, from the $2.0 billion to be guaranteed in 1994. Our estimate is that that amount was spent by the Israeli government [on building settlements in the Occupied Territories] during the first year of the guarantee [1993].

Q: Because of money committed by the Likud government?

HARROP: Well, it is mostly because of that, but not entirely. These are complicated, political issues. Many people in the Labor Party also do not want entirely to abandon the notion of settlement construction [in the Occupied Territories]. However, more importantly, Labor has to retain its credibility with the public in security terms if it is going to be reelected. Israel is a very real democracy -- no question about it. The relationship of the voter to the government is an ever-important element.

President Clinton, to my dismay, is now speaking about "forgiving" the $470 million or so and allowing it to be guaranteed, despite the fact that that amount of money was spent on settlements. I think that it would be a bad political mistake to do that. I think that the pressure should be kept firmly on the Israeli Government not to engage in settlements. I think that if we are going to have a durable peace in the Middle East, we must really have Israel honestly prepared to trade land for peace. Anyway, that's an issue that's being discussed at the moment.

Q: How did the American election of 1992 impact on Israel and your mission?

HARROP: Well, it impacted on Israel because Israel was a part of the American election. Just as the United States is part of Israeli elections, so Israel is part of American elections. Jews represent about two percent of the American population, or slightly more than five million Jews in this country. It's a matter of great debate and discussion -- who is a Jew, as it is a question everywhere. More than most communities in America, the Jewish community votes and is involved politically. American Jews have normally voted for Democratic Party candidates. In the elections of 1992, because, I believe, of the totally misplaced perception that the Bush-Baker administration had not been a good administration for Israel, a crazy perception, in fact, it was clear that the Republicans were not going to do very well among Jewish voters. For that reason [the Republicans] were trying to do all that they could to improve that situation. In October, 1992, first the loan guarantee went through. One could argue, in some respects, that this was related to the American elections, but I think it would have gone through eventually. Then there were other announcements of defense support for Israel, resource transfers, and so forth along in October, 1992. So to that extent Israeli issues were part of the American elections.

I think that Israelis, by and large, would have preferred to have Clinton win, because they have this notion that Democrats are more friendly to them. However, I think that they're mistaken. You have a lot of rhetoric from the Democratic Party side and you may have a little more money change hands, but pursuit of the peace process was not really an issue in the American election campaign. This was a national concern. Sympathy for Israel is really not an issue in American politics. It may be that we give $3.0-4.0 billion in support to Israel. We definitely give $3.0 billion and how much of the rest is taxpayer money is a matter for debate. The polls in this country have repeatedly shown that it is not just the five-plus million American Jews who favor that. A majority of the American people strongly supports the independence of a democratic Israel, and a two-thirds majority of Americans over and over again have approved of these very large resource transfers to Israel. So it's a national attitude. It's not a question in American politics, whether or not we're going to support Israel. We're going to support both the existence and independence of Israel and the peace process.

I think that there is a perception that the bilateral relationship has a greater influence on elections than, in fact, is the case.

Q: In the 1992 elections Clinton was elected. However, before he assumed office were you feeling noises from the transition team that we have to do things differently?

HARROP: No, I don't think so. There was a great effort being made by the transition team to make clear that, in fact, our policies were not going to change, and particularly our dedication to the peace process and our attention to it. It was difficult for me to imagine that any Secretary of State could spend the proportion of his time on this particular issue that Secretary of State Baker had spent on it. It just seemed impossible for him to do that. For example, they made clear that they were going to keep Djerejian in office as Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs. They appointed Sam Lewis, a well-known Israel supporter, to be Director of Policy Planning [in the Department of State]. They appointed Martin Indyk, a former executive of AIPAC and director of AIPAC's offshoot, a think tank public policy foundation called the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, as the National Security Council's man for the Middle East. So it was clear that they were going to continue in the same direction. In fact, the first overseas trip which Secretary of State Christopher made was to Israel. His first stop was Israel. He made the usual circuit to Cairo, Amman, Damascus, and, for the first time, he even went to Lebanon, which was regarded as rather daring, from the security point of view. That was in March, 1993. No, there was no sense of change. At that time the Norway talks were not really getting anywhere...

Q: You're talking about talks between the...

HARROP: Palestinians and [officials of the] Israeli Foreign Ministry. Interestingly enough, it was the Foreign Ministry, because the rivalry between Peres as Foreign Minister and Rabin as Prime Minister has never stopped. This rivalry has come as near to stopping as it has in the past - right now -- because Peres was the architect of this relationship with the PLO. Rabin saw that he had to go along with that -- indeed, wanted to go along with that. Rabin did a complete reversal of his policy toward the PLO. He recognized the PLO. He made that move. I think that he saw that the only way he was going to get the peace process going was to do that, since without an interlocuteur valable, he wasn't going to be able to make progress. It was clear that, whatever you might think of the PLO, they were the nearest thing to a valid negotiating partner, particularly when it became increasingly apparent that Israel and the PLO had a number of common concerns.

Most of the Arab governments were concerned by the threat of the Islamic fundamentalists in the Middle East. Peres told me shortly before I left [the Embassy in Tel Aviv] at the beginning of May, 1993, that there were talks going on in Norway. We knew that, I guess, but he didn't give me the impression that he thought that they were going to "break through" any more than had a series of other, secret meetings that had been arranged in various locations between Palestinians and Israelis. All of a sudden, during the summer of 1993 that meeting [in Norway] began to acquire substance. Both teams decided that they really were going to make progress, and that's the way it came out. Rabin had been through a difficult spell before that. The American Ambassador was forever calling in to plea for moderation in response to terrorist actions.

There always are incursions from Lebanon down into Israel in the form of Katusha rockets fired at Israeli towns. There are frequent armed attacks against Israeli forces by units of Hezbollah, the extremist Shiite Muslim fundamentalist group in southern Lebanon, which is supported and financed by Iran and operates with the quiet concurrence of the Syrian Government. Israel has occupied that five or eight mile wide security zone in Southern Lebanon to protect itself from these incursions. Whenever these rockets blast into Israel and kill Israelis in Kiryat Sh'mona and other towns in Northern Israel or, and this is a bit more questionable from an ethical point of view, when Israeli forces in the security zone are attacked by the Hezbollah, Israel tends to retaliate with great vigor. Then the American Ambassador finds himself preaching forbearance, trying to limit the retaliation. My colleague in Damascus [at the time], Ambassador Chris Ross, would go to the Syrians and say, "Please use what influence you can with the Hezbollah." I would speak to the Israelis to try to prevent all of this conflict from interfering with the peace process, which was in everybody's interest.

Then the most dramatic event of all, of course, was the second visit of Prime Minister Rabin to Washington. I was in Washington in March, 1993 -- I guess Christopher's visit [to Israel] must have been in February, 1993. Rabin came to Washington in March. There were some particularly bloody murders of Israeli military and civilians in Israel proper by "Hamas," the extremist counterpart of Hezbollah in the Occupied Territories. Rabin cut short his visit, in fact, and went back to Israel because there was such public concern at home. At that time he closed off the Occupied Territories -- sealing off the "Green Line," the border between Israel and both the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. He did not allow Palestinians who worked in Israel -- about 70,000-80,000 in number -- to come over to their jobs. That gave the Israeli public a sense of greater security, with fewer Palestinians present. Also, I think, this contributed to the peace process because many Israelis began to see that they could really live pretty well with that line closed off. They derived a certain encouragement from that.

There had also been the very dramatic deportation of 415 supposedly Hamas leaders in December 1992. They were selected with such speed that not all the right ones were chosen. In fact, some of them were released shortly afterwards because they were not involved with Hamas. The deportation was in retaliation for more Hamas killing of Israelis.

That led to the most difficult negotiation I had when I was in Israel, which was on behalf of Secretary of State Christopher. I met with Prime Minister Rabin seven times in five days. I made a note of this. I must write it up some time, since it was so interesting. [I met with Rabin] to negotiate a confidential agreement between the United States and Israel on how the Israelis would behave in regard to these deported Palestinians. This agreement made it possible for us to maintain our support for Israel in the United Nations, where deportation was a major issue because...

Q: It was on television, showing the plight of these people on a daily basis. You knew what they were doing.

HARROP: It was a very difficult negotiation and one which I was pleased with. I think that Prime Minister Rabin was also pleased, because we were able to reach an understanding which bridged a very real difference between the United States and Israel. Deportation under international law, is a very harsh and politically repugnant move. We were able to get by that. In fact, the last of these deportees will be returned [to Israel or the Occupied Territories] in a matter of a very few days. In December, 1993, the last ones will be sent back.

Q: How did you feel about the dynamics of the relationship between Clinton, the Clinton administration, and Christopher with the Israeli Government? Did you see a change between that and the Bush-Baker administration?

HARROP: Not very great, because they had made such a point of keeping people on. I think that it took a while for Christopher to develop confidence. The [Israelis] knew Baker awfully well. Not just the people in the Likud Party but also the Labor Party people. They met with Baker and knew him very well, understood what his thinking was, how his mind worked, and what he was trying to achieve. After January 1993 there was a certain disarray, as there always is when a new administration comes into office. Christopher is a dramatically different sort of person, reserved, seemingly closed. He is not warm, does not tell jokes, does not have that kind of human rapport which Baker established very quickly with [the Israelis]. I think that they were a little tentative [in their contacts with him]. On the other hand, I felt that in the Clinton administration they had people who would do almost anything for them, as had been repeatedly made clear. The new Administration was determined to be perceived as pro-Israeli and to make that the tenet of its policies.

The relationship picked up fairly quickly. Mr. Christopher had a successful visit to Israel in February, 1993. I guess that we had four meetings with Prime Minister Rabin, two of which were one-on-one meetings between Christopher and Rabin, and two -- one a luncheon and one a larger meeting -- all went pretty well.

Toward the end [of my tour in Israel] I was engaged in economic issues, because I felt it was so important that something be done about the liberalization of the Israeli economy. Investment was not going to be attracted to that economy unless they took further steps to deregulate foreign exchange and capital markets, to simplify licensing and labor regulations, to privatize the 4% of the economy still in Government or Labor Union hands. I had discussed these matters with the Israelis and, in fact, was able to persuade both Mr. Baker in August, 1992, and Mr. Christopher in February, 1993, during their visits while I was there, to raise the subject of privatization and liberalization of the [Israeli] economy. It's one issue on which the American Congress has been ahead of the Executive Branch. Many of the Congressional leaders and even many of those who are the best friends of Israel are quite concerned about this matter. I tried to work on that with them, along with other Israeli leaders. The Israeli Government itself is interested in doing this, but the political obstacles in the Israeli system, as in any other -- political obstacles to privatization and taking these measures -- are very difficult. There are always vested interests howling to be heard when you make these changes.

In fact, the supposed reason why I was replaced [in Israel], and rather abruptly, was a speech that I gave in March, 1993, to the combined Rotary Clubs of Tel Aviv on the economy and economic reform in Israel. In this speech I stated, among other things, that in the course of recent visits to Israel, Senator Inouye and Senator Leahy had each stated that it was going to be difficult, given the end of the Cold War, given the American budgetary deficit, and the shrinkage of the American presence overseas generally, to maintain for very much longer the very high level of resource transfers to Israel. I mentioned their comments in passing as a further reason why there should be more attention paid to liberalizing the economy, so that growth could be maintained and more jobs created without dependence on American largesse to do it. American grant aid represented about 7-8% of the Israeli budget. I pointed out that, in my view, it was not prudent for any government to rely -- even on its staunchest friend -- for that proportion of its national budget.

These remarks brought a great cacophony of criticism and, I think, a somewhat hypocritical outburst in Washington, in the Congress and on the part of the press spokesman of the Department of State. I was removed very quickly but I think it was not really for that reason.

Q: What do you think was the reason?

HARROP: I think there was a perception that I was maybe a little too much of a player myself in the affair and that I spoke too much to people, to the press, and to others in Israel. I had not, perhaps -- I guess the term is -- "gone native" to quite the extent that some of my predecessors had in Israel. I was perhaps not seen by the [Clinton] administration as someone whose every automatic instinct was going to be to support Israel.

Q: Do you think that it was the gut reaction of a new administration on a very politically sensitive subject? I mean, on the political side rather than, you might say, the professional side?

HARROP: I don't really know. I was rather hurt, I must say, by the attitude of Secretary Christopher, whom I'd regarded as a friend. I'd worked with him. I was Deputy Assistant Secretary for Africa when he was last in the Department of State and I'd worked quite closely with him on a number of human rights issues. I was hurt that he never spoke with me at all and never discussed with me why I was being withdrawn. There was no communication of any kind. I was informed that I was to leave very quickly by Peter Tarnoff, who also did not discuss the rationale...

Q: He'd just been through a somewhat bruising...

HARROP: He had the same sort of reaction to a public statement that I did, a few weeks later, although he survived his...

Q: But barely.

HARROP: But it was all right. My wife and I were prepared to [leave]. You know, it's not unusual in a country of that sensitivity for a new Administration to want to have a change. So now they will send [Edward] Djerejian, the Assistant Secretary [for Near East Affairs] to Israel as Ambassador.

Q: I'm sure that one goes through a certain amount of introspection and thinking about this. Did any of this come from the Israeli side?

HARROP: I do not believe so. I do not believe that it came from the Israeli side and I do not believe that it came from the American Jewish community. I'm fairly confident of the latter. I had confidence in these people, I think that they had confidence in me, and I don't believe that that was the case. On the Israeli side I know that my friend, the Governor of the Central Bank, a little bit before this, had mentioned when he was in Washington that he hoped that I would not press too urgently for privatization of the banks, though he and I had in fact been coordinating closely on economic reform. He wanted to delay privatization of certain banks for technical reasons related to changing their structure. Whether a comment of that sort had an effect, I don't know. I'm sure that he did not mean it to have the effect of hurrying my departure.

I don't believe that it was from the Israeli side. It was from the [Clinton] administration itself. I think that it was [Secretary of State] Christopher. It was people right around him -- very likely, Dennis Ross, who had no particular affection for me. What others? I won't mention other names. I don't know who it was, or to what extent it was "ad hominem". I'll probably never know exactly what happened.

Q: What was your reaction after getting this [order of recall]? One knows that things have changed, but to leave sort of under fire leaves the impression...

HARROP: It was a little difficult, and I've had a difficult summer. I haven't gone back and really engaged in things at the Department of State. It seemed to me that after 39 years of service in this system and rising to the top of it -- I guess I was the fourth most senior Foreign Service Officer in the government when I retired in May, 1993. I was the most senior Career Minister. You know, I was hurt by it. I was hurt particularly by the fact, the rather pointed fact, that the administration recalled from retirement and sent back as a temporary "fill in" the officer who had been my immediate predecessor, Bill Brown. But that also, I think, made a point regarding the nature of their concern, since Bill Brown was seen as just a 100 percent, pro-Israeli figure. He's almost, really -- he left Israel to state publicly that he thought that we should not combine humanitarian and political issues over the loan guarantees, at the time that the government was still doing that strongly. He's a member of boards of directors of Israeli banks, he's the Chairman of the Truman Institute of the Hebrew University, and he is thoroughly pro-Israeli and very concerned about Israel. I think that, maybe, that was a point that they wanted to make. They wanted someone who just did not have any reserves at all about total, even uncritical American support for Israel.

I think that it was probably known that I had certain reserves, as I did, about the advisability of our continuing current high levels of grant economic aid -- not the security assistance, which is essential to reassure the Israeli public that they can take some chances in the peace process. But I think that at a time when we cannot afford essential programs at home, and cannot give any aid to poor peoples we'd like to held around the world, it is difficult to justify allocating over one half of all our aid grants to a relatively prosperous country with a growth rate -- at this time -- three times our own. I don't think that it is any secret that I had doubts about our continuing the $1.2 billion of grant economic aid, among other reasons because I think that it is not in Israel's own interest. It is used as a cushion which saves them from taking the hard decisions to reform their own economy, improve their economic circumstances, and attract investment.

JAMES A. LAROCCO
Deputy Chief of Mission/Chargé d’Affaires
Tel Aviv (1993-1996)

Ambassador James Larocco was born in 1948 in Evanston, Illinois. He graduated from the University of Portland (Oregon), and Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies. He entered the Foreign Service in 1973. His overseas assignments include Jeddah, Saudi Arabia; Cairo, Kuwait, Beijing, and Tel Aviv. He was the Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary, Near East Bureau 2001-2004. Ambassador Larocco was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2011.

Q: So you left Taiwan for Tel Aviv when?

LAROCCO: It was three-year assignment, but I only stayed about 20 months. I got a phone call from the State Department, in this case from NEA front office DAS Dan Kurtzer alerting me to an opportunity in Tel Aviv. I then immediately got a call from the PDAS, Mark Parris, who asked if I could report to Tel Aviv to be DCM right away

I said, when is right away? Tomorrow, he said, but we need you there soonest. I saluted smartly, and immediately prepared to leave.

What happened then is the director general of the Foreign Service, Genta Hawkins Holmes, understandably was against this action by NEA without a full bidding process. HR kept telling our admin chief in Taipei that I had no authorization to leave Taipei and absolutely no orders to go to Tel Aviv.

We had a wonderful admin chief who clearly understood the reality of Department regulations (regs, as we called them). There are “the no regs” and “the yes regs.” And guess what? They are the same regs. He asked me to sign a promissory note that I would pay back everything if it turned out I had to return to Taipei, but he said he was sure it would all work out, despite the firm HR objections. Needs of service can justify anything, he remarked.

I flew straight to Washington, leaving my family behind in Taipei till I could get orders and the kids finish school. I went to talk to the head of assignments in personnel for senior officers, who happened also to be an NEA friend. He smiled, said he could absolutely not support me, but then sat me down at a computer terminal with a technician to write orders.

So I co-drafted my orders and set off for Tel Aviv. I took over immediately as DCM, with a former ambassador to Tel Aviv, Bill Brown, brought back to serve as Charge D’Affaires till an ambassador was nominated.

I had to hit the ground running, working even my very first night hours after arriving as I faced a crisis involving one of our employees who had killed an Israeli in a traffic accident and had only partial immunity. I immediately ordered the person sent home on the first available flight, which was around 6am. The next morning I got a call from the Israeli Foreign Ministry formally protesting my move, but adding that what I did made their lives easier. They were grateful I did so. I got off on the right foot with the Israeli MFA and that close relationship lasted throughout my tour.

To finish the story of my arrival in Tel Aviv, it was several months later when I got a call from Genta Hawkins Holmes and she said what are you doing out there in Tel Aviv? I said I was serving as DCM.

She said, well, you know this is all wrong.

I said that I was just doing what I was told to do.

She said, oh well, now that you are out there, do a good job. To make things right in the system, I need you to submit a formal bid for the job so we can panel you. I did so. Once again, it proved to me that there is the system, and then there is “the system.” This understanding served me well when I was PDAS in NEA years later.

Q: The job you were bidding on was what?

LAROCCO: DCM Tel Aviv.

So I had to go back so they could get the system all properly in order. I had to bid on the job I was already out doing.

Q: Let's go back to what caused this.

LAROCCO: What caused this was Bill Harrop, who was an outstanding officer but had run afoul of the new administration related to several things. I never got the full story. I was too busy to be concerned about it, and strangely, no Israelis ever raised it with me, nor did anyone in the embassy. I guess it was a thing of the past by the time I arrived. The DCM, interestingly my predecessor as Econ Minister Counselor in Beijing, Kent Wiedemann, was truly an East Asia specialist, with no experience in the region. He left of his own volition, sizing up the situation, as I was later told. I never found out why and how Kent ended up in Tel Aviv in the first place.

Q: He made this statement which is quite in line with what we said. We can't support every tsunamic request from every country and everybody's got to tighten their belts, including Israel, which didn't sit well with the Jewish lobby.

LAROCCO: Perhaps that's true. I don't know. I didn't hear much about this and didn't pursue it. I jumped into this job after the fact and had no time to think about it.

Q: It was the Clinton administration early days, and they were very nervous.

LAROCCO: In any case, I was confronted with an embassy that was rife with problems. The list seemed endless

Q: What had happened? Obviously, a lack of control.

LAROCCO: I have learned that from the military side. At the end of the day, lack of command and control is almost always responsible for situations like this. Strong, solid, ethical leadership or the lack thereof makes all the difference. I devoted much of my first year dealing with the OIG and cleaning up messes that I had inherited, some of which had gone unresolved for many years. At the same time, I had to deal with serious morale problems left over from the Gulf War. Those who stayed in Tel Aviv when the scuds were falling around them deeply resented the fact that the State Department would not evacuate them, even to Eilat. They were bitter, and there was nothing I could say or do for them. I breathed a deep sigh of relief when the last of them departed post since their bitterness spread throughout the mission

Overall, despite my high expectations for a post in such a lovely setting on the Mediterranean in a lovely country working on high profile issues, I had never seen morale so bad with so many issues poisoning the situation. And this applied to the locally hired staff as well. I decided I must sit down and take this one issue at a time. I must say that there were so many issues that would truly burn your ears off. There were almost too juicy to be credible. For the protection of those involved, I will leave it at that. But I got to see and deal with just about any issue under the sun. After the tour in Tel Aviv, managing anything else seemed downright easy.

The changing leadership of Embassy Tel Aviv

My assignment to Tel Aviv, which lasted three years, was like four separate tours. The first six months, with a temporary Chargé, peace talks beginning, and a huge array of administrative problems was a time when I rarely slept. The next six months, I served with a wonderful ambassador Ed Djerejian, but he only stayed six months. I was the Chargé for over a year, and I served my final ten months as DCM under the brilliant ambassador Martin Indyk.

Bear in mind that the embassy leadership had undergone rapid change the two years before my arrival. That pattern continued the three years I was there.

Bill Brown

Bill Brown was a wonderful officer during an eventful time. As Chargé, he was there to hold the fort till an ambassador came. He did his best, although it became clear from the moment I arrived in Tel Aviv that U.S.-Israeli relations were on such a plane that they were handled directly between Washington and Jerusalem. They were accustomed to do this over the years and expected to deal this way, and that was not about to change. This made it a painful at times for the ambassador, since it was hard to chase down and stay up-to-date with what was really happening. Bill was Chargé for about six months.

Ed Djerejian

I think Ed Djerejian, who had served as ambassador in Damascus and NEA Assistant Secretary, fully expected this to change with his appointment as ambassador to Israel. That was not going to happen, but he also understood that his close relationship with Secretary Baker was not matched by his relationship with Warren Christopher. In any case, he informed me even before his arrival that he would be leaving the job to go Rice University to direct the Baker Center. He confided this only to me and his office manager. To this day, I marvel at the fact that this remained a secret the full six months he was at post. How no one even guessed this when he never moved into the ambassador's suite at the residence, never received a full shipment of household effects, never brought a car, etc. was downright amazing.

Ed was such a wonderful leader, who received so much devotion and affection from the entire mission, that his departure came as a real shock. I called an "all hands meeting" to inform everyone. Some even cried. It was a move never signaled to the staff.

I will relate one particular event that will always stand out in my mind about Ed and his leadership. Once again, it involved an embassy inspection. In preparation for the inspection, I and our outstanding Admin Counselor, Bob Manzanares, drafted a lengthy report to the inspectors assessing every section in the mission, warts and all. We singled out several sections as needing major help. We also listed all the areas where we felt inspectors could do us some good.

This particularly involved our near constant presence in great numbers in Jerusalem to handle the huge groups of official visitors mainly related to the peace process. Keep in mind that 1993-1996 was the only period other than 1978-81 that peace talks accomplished something significant. Coincidentally, I was in Cairo that earlier period, and now I was in Israel for this period.

We thought we had laid out everything, making the inspection easier and hopefully providing solid results. You know the old saying on the two biggest lies in the Foreign Service. They both involve the arrival of inspectors: "we are pleased you are here," the hosts say, as the inspectors respond, "we are here to help you."

The second part of this old adage proved true, much to our disappointment. The inspectors totally ignored our thorough preparatory cable and delved into sections and issues of little importance to the priority tasks of the mission. In the process, our already low morale was made worse. What's more, they didn't even bother to go to Jerusalem to see our situation and needs up there related to visitors.

I was livid when I saw the draft inspection report. I was called in to join the ambassador when the chief inspector provided an oral summary. About ten minutes into the presentation, I stood up and delivered the most passionate, no holds barred, brutally honest criticism of the entire exercise. I could not hide my anger. Our post was drowning in work, our people had no time for a personal life, and if the inspectors were not here to help, they oughta get on a plane and go home immediately.

I sat down feeling relieved that I had said this. I had to. It wasn't for me; it was for our staff and for our vital mission. I honestly didn't care if I was fired on the spot. There was one of those storybook loonnngggg silences in the room, and then Ed spoke. You know, X (I will leave out the name of the head inspector), Jim is absolutely right. He then very dispassionately went through our situation and made clear he would fight this report as written. I wanted to go over and give Ed a huge bear hug.

In the end, the inspection report was completely redone. Our post was lauded for its work, which was nice, but none of the issues we had pointed out in our preparatory analysis was addressed. That was tragic.

An interesting sidelight was that I received an odd IER. I was “criticized” in the IER as being too strong a leader, too decisive, a wheeler-dealer who got things done. When it was presented to me, I responded “guilty as charged,” and signed the IER immediately. I was comfortable seeing this criticism in print for promotion panels to see. And I was not surprised when I was promoted later that year to MC (Minister-Counselor) rank.

Jim Larocco, Chargé d’Affaires

Ed departed, and I was informed that it would be a long time before an ambassador came on board. I would likely be Chargé a year or even longer. Knowing as I did that a Chargé has all the responsibility but may as well wear a sign around his/her neck “I am not the ambassador”, I decided to set a tone for my tenure as Chargé immediately. I used my “loss of confidence” authority to send a number of people home. They were all guilty of one or another unacceptable behaviors or performance. This action sent shock waves through the mission. At my first country team meeting as Chargé, I made it clear: zero tolerance on my watch. You see what I did with the others. Stay clean and do a good job and we will all get through a year that promised to be the busiest yet. Peace talks between Jordan and Israel were now in full swing, so there was a revolving door of official visits, reports to write and bilateral and multilateral issues and events to coordinate.

Management issues

Q: Were there sort of proven cases of malfeasance?

LAROCCO: Oh, yes.

Q: What were these?

LAROCCO: I would rather not say.

I think at one point, we had as many as six individual OIG investigations ongoing. We also had many cases of unacceptable personal behavior, most I prefer not to describe. Interestingly, these were many of the same personal issues I had encountered when I was in Cairo. Perhaps it was the extreme work load and/or the pressures everyone faced both at home and in the office. I and the admin chief and later Martin Indyk all tried to get our arms around this. We never did nail it down precisely. I also think a major factor was that expectations were so high among those coming to post, including myself. Work and life never measured up to these expectations. I had everyone departing post fill out a confidential questionnaire for me, and I would say that upwards of 70 percent were happy to be leaving.

I recall that when Martin Indyk arrived, he simply would not accept that morale could be low in Israel. After all, it is a beautiful country with so much history, so much culture, beaches, mountains, desert...so many places to visit on day trips. Only the far reaches of Israel, like Eilat, required an overnight trip. He was sure it could be fixed. He tried so hard, arranging free movie showings, happy hours, etc. He truly tried. When I left, he was still trying, but I'm afraid that getting morale to a level we all would be more comfortable with remained elusive.

There is another factor, and I hesitate to mention it, but I must. Unique to embassy Tel Aviv was the reality that we had large number of staff who were, what I would call, observant Christians who came to Israel seeking to live and work in the Holy Land. The same applied to a large number of observant Jewish American staff. The reality of Tel Aviv in those days as well as today was that it was a bustling, secular, Mediterranean city... Since our embassy was on the beach, you simply couldn't avoid the roller skaters in bikinis, the beach attired picnickers and the general atmosphere of Tel Aviv which was overwhelming secular. To our observant religious at post, it was downright hedonistic. This was a huge disappointment to those coming to live and breathe and walk and work in the Holy Land. It didn't seem very holy. I'm not quite sure exactly what they were expecting.

At the same time, the pace of activity in Israel, whether it's work or just living, is intense. Life itself is intense there. Every day brings stunning news, nothing mundane as we experience in America. And with the massive influx of Russians during the mid-1980s, one was almost better off with Russian than Hebrew in our area of Israel.

Add to this the reality that we had to go up to Jerusalem, where almost all the government offices were, as often as twice a day, and that so many of us had to stay up there during official visits, quite often for days at a time, we ended up being separated from our families, even on weekends. I found it predictable for the majority of our American staff that they would arrive with soaring expectations, only to see them whittled down steadily over a period of the first few months. By their third month, many had reached a deep hole in their morale and had to decide how they would dig out of it, or not. Many never did.

I must confess that despite my almost limitless and unwarranted optimism, I also reached that point, but not for almost a year. I realized that I had not taken a break, and even when I was with my family, I was always on the cellphone. And these were the days when we had those big, bulky, unreliable phones. I made the executive decision that I would observe Shabbat, the Sabbath, just as so many Israelis do. I would leave all except the most urgent to the duty officers, and I would spend my Saturdays taking my family to one site or another around Israel. I must say that this was the tonic I needed, and we explored all corners of the country. As small as Israel is, and despite more than two years of Saturdays venturing around the country, there were still places on our list we never got to. It is that rich a country.

Q: This is so often true. Paris is not high morale.

LAROCCO: I've heard that as well, but Tel Aviv was the worst I had ever seen. It had a long reputation as the divorce capital of the Foreign Service. That was clearly the case while I was there. Too many families broke up during the three years I was there. By and large, I found most Foreign Service families during my career to be quite stable. This was an aberration.

Q: I would think when you are throwing in sort of Orthodox Jews and fundamentalist Christians, these aren't high divorce groups.

LAROCCO: Indeed, don't forget the Mormons. But even among these groups, there were divorces. Keep in mind that Tel Aviv had many...how can I say this?...pleasurable distractions in addition to the pressure cooker work environment. It was not hard for some to stray. Things happen, to paraphrase a slang expression.

As the DCM, I was the officer in charge of what was called family advocacy. The ambassador was supposed to be shielded from this. I adhered to this rule, and I must say I dealt with some very difficult cases. I did my best to make very difficult situations as painless as possible, but I was no trained counselor, and I looked to a variety of people to assist. My prime task in these cases was to make sure these situations did not affect the work of the mission. In some cases, I sent people home, where they could get appropriate professional help. But in family advocacy cases, it is essential to get the family to recognize the problem and accept the need for professional care.

Q: What is family advocacy?

LAROCCO: They are family problems. We had one case of a teenage boy attempting to kill his mother with an ax. We had children getting into all kinds of trouble and not properly handled by their parents. We had a rape victim. All these cases were extremely sensitive and had to be handled with maximum discretion and tact. I think the Foreign Service was wise to vest this responsibility with the DCM, who is generally low profile and geared toward management. You don't want the ambassador to be involved in delicate, personal issues like this. Then you work with the admin people and counselors, including professionals outside the embassy. As long as it doesn't affect the employee's work, you do your best to sort it out at post. At times, you have to call on the regional psychiatrist or other specialists.

This, of course, is very important at overseas posts. Of course, this isn't relevant in Washington. People sort out their personal problems with their local doctors, counselors, ministers, whatever. While I knew we had to address these issues and not let them fester, I also always kept in mind that issues like wife swapping, non-traditional sexual behavior and other behavioral issues rarely reach the screens of managers in Washington. As long as it doesn't affect the employee's work, I would do my best not to let the rumor mongers run wild with their stories. At the same time, when you are overseas, you have to be careful that errant behavior is not used to blackmail officers. This is a reality that must be taken into account. This is why every time news came to me about someone, I immediately went to see them and have a come to Moses conversation. If I was convinced they were telling the truth, whatever the reality, I would do my best to protect them. If not, I would make it clear that I reserved the right to take action to protect the interests of our mission. This was delicate stuff, to be sure. And it was not uncommon in Tel Aviv.

Q: People, particularly when you've got husband/wife issues and all and these are probably the most delicate things of dealing with and all of a sudden someone is coming from the outside saying stop that. They can take off like a sky rocket.

LAROCCO: We had one case involving spouse swapping among three families. All had kids. The long knives were out in all directions. We had several agencies in that case bringing in their OIGs because of allegations made directly to Washington by the aggrieved parties. Once it involved the OIG, my own role was limited, but still important. Some of my most sensitive conversations via secure telephone calls were made to the OIGs.

Despite the high personal stakes for all, or maybe because of these high stakes, I found this work among my most important. State had invested a lot in these people, and I felt it was my responsibility to find ways to get back on the right course. And then there were the children. In the end, I believe we succeeded in the majority of cases of resolving these issues to the benefit of the families as well as the mission. But it required the highest levels of tact, sensitivity and firmness.

Q: I have served in different posts and I found when I served in Saigon an awful lot of people who went there to get of a marital situation or something like that.

Was there any particular reason why people would go to Tel Aviv for either fun or extracurricular activities or something? Or did it just sort of happen?

LAROCCO: In the case of Tel Aviv, I felt people were not coming to escape. They were seekers, whether it was a good job, a religious experience, a nice climate, a fascinating country. I don't recall anyone going there to escape something else, except perhaps those Europeanists who were choosing Tel Aviv as a "hardship assignment" to escape being sent to Nouakchott or some other notable hardship post.

Much to my disappointment, we had few Arab specialists. I truly felt it was important that those stationed in the Arab World get the Israeli perspective as well.

I had spent time in Israel, as I related earlier, on a kibbutz, so Israel was not new to me. I knew exactly what to expect. But that earlier experience was not a professional experience, it wasn't dealing with both Arabs and Israelis on some very tough issues. In Tel Aviv as DCM, I was responsible for Gaza. I went there often and had many contacts and friends there. Debating Israelis in the morning and Gazans in the afternoon sharpened one's talking points like few other experiences.

Again, this was a very difficult assignment for a lot of Foreign Service officers. I tried to get more NEA people into it because I wanted them to learn about Israel. Also we needed people who knew the Arab side of things as the peace talks progressed and we became more involved in the important work of bringing Palestinians and Israelis together. For the six months that Ed and I were the front office, we had this unprecedented situation of Djerejian and I, Djerejian as ambassador and I as DCM, both of us advanced Arabic speakers and neither of us Hebrew speakers. That's never happened before and never happened since. I must say in all honesty that our experiences in the Arab world made us very popular with Israelis who wanted to know more about Syria, which Ed had great knowledge of, or the Gulf or Egypt, which I was familiar with.

In the end, I absolutely loved managing, no matter how long the day and evening was, no matter how frustrating or challenging the issue was. Speaking in military terms, I felt I owned the embassy. I had ownership; I was responsible for the conduct and performance of the mission.

In this regard, among the countless experiences I had, one of the most memorable for me was during a Clinton visit to Tel Aviv. He was speaking at a large gathering, and the White House advance, which I knew well, arranged for my wife and kids to be positioned back stage for a photo with the President. He walked off the stage, accompanied by then Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, whom I knew well, and an advance man steered them in our family's direction, with a White House photographer ready to snap some photos. Peres turned the President and asked if he could join the photo. He added that the President should know that I was the person who made all this work. I was truly proud to hear those words, and that photo is one of best keepsakes on my wall.

Shimon Peres and the power of the word

Peres was one of the giants of this period, whose life parallels that of Israel itself. He was a semi-tragic figure, never quite able to translate his unparalleled visions into political leadership that could make these happen. That was for Rabin during the period I was there. But Peres was ubiquitous, whose strength as an articulator of policies and programs was needed by Rabin, the leader willing to take risks for peace and able to translate that willingness to action.

Peres was a master wordsmith. His sound bites were unforgettable. They sometimes had nuggets of wisdom, but most of the time were just plain fun. I loved his line when he was addressing a group in Scandinavia: I bring you greetings from the chosen people to the frozen people. He could disarm a foreign audience like no Israeli since Abba Eban. Aaron Miller, on the peace team, kept a file of Peresisms. He would reel some off to lighten things up at times.

One evening, I was hanging around the Knesset, which was not uncommon for me, and I happened to notice Peres sitting in his office alone. I walked in, which was totally permissible at the Knesset in those days, sat in front of him and said: Clinton is coming. Do you have a good sound bite I can suggest he use? He scratched his head, rejected a few lines, and then said: I have one. How about "Let's turn the promised land into the land of promise?" That was vintage Peres.

The Knesset to me was democracy in action, but so much richer than our own Congress. After all, Israel is a parliamentary system, and the Prime Minister, as leader of the majority party, is totally in the mix 24/7. The Knesset cafeteria in those days was a wonderful place for us to hop from table to table, talking with factional leaders and their supporters who were debating this or that issue. There was never a question of denying us from the embassy access. I can recall on a number of occasions welcomed into party meetings as if I were one of them.

Netanyahu's view of the prerequisites for peace

When I was Chargé, I had access to both parties. When I was DCM, I mostly dealt with the opposition party, in this case the Likud. To be honest, they were not treated well by Washington, especially the peace team. They were shunned because they simply would not embrace the peace process and were looking for every opportunity to thwart progress.

But these were formidable political actors, strong leaders, sharp minds and representative in many ways of a majority of Israelis. The coalition supporting Rabin had the votes in the Knesset, but I never felt they had the hearts and minds of the majority of Israelis.

I recall one day going to see Netanyahu. He was alone in his office, and I was alone. He was fuming over his treatment by the peace team during the visits of our senior leaders, when he would be kept waiting or wouldn't get meetings till late at night. I made no comment, simply listening to him vent.

I turned to the peace process, and he launched into a monologue about how misguided it was. At one point I asked him directly: will you ever support peace with the Palestinians, and if so on what terms? I will never forget his response. First, Israel must be economically secure. We are not now. We are a struggling economy, stifled by the powerful labor union Histadrut, miserable financial and tax policies and total lack of competitiveness with the international market. We must not make peace until we can stand on our own, with a vibrant economy that is the real guarantee of economic security.

The second condition, he continued, is population. I feel we must have a Jewish population of perhaps 8 million before we can be secure as a state with a Palestinian state side by side with us. That is a sufficient population to enshrine our identity and our majority.

Third, we must have a presence in the Jordan Valley. That is our most vulnerable border. We can never abandon that area.

Netanyahu pulled out a map that showed a Swiss cheese like Palestinian state, with settlements or outposts breaking up much of the contiguity of a Palestinian state, particularly on the west bank. I never got the impression he had an emotional attachment to the settlements; in his view, they were strategic.

Netanyahu's clout, as far as the U.S. was concerned, was at its lowest ebb at the time, so his views were considered irrelevant. What he thought didn't matter to analysts in Washington. So much has happened in the past twenty years since that conversation, including the peace treaty with Jordan, so I have no idea where Netanyahu's red lines are now. But Israel has certainly achieved one of his objectives: an economic vibrancy and sustainability that is a marvel of the modern day. And he was instrumental in making that happen.

The embassy and the peace process

I arrived in Tel Aviv just a short time before the Oslo Agreement was announced. We had the Jordanian peace agreement. We had constant high level visitors working on so many aspects of the peace process all the time. We had the peace team itself seemingly there every other week. Secretary Christopher came 22 times. It was non-stop action from my arrival till my departure, the day Netanyahu was inaugurated as prime minister. It was a fascinating historic set of bookends, framing arguably the most vibrant and successful era of peace talks in the region.

I note this because while we at the embassy were not directly involved in the talks themselves, playing instead a support role, we did provide what I thought (and our senior visitors acknowledged) was an important substantive role. Before each senior level visit, we did extensive consultation within the embassy and fanned out to a wide array of contacts to put together a “scene setter,” focusing on key domestic issues, personalities and trends that we felt should be taken into account by the visitor as he or she prepared their own points for use in meetings.

In the case of Warren Christopher, he personally related to me how he looked forward to these pieces. He noted, on arrival from Damascus one time, that he was so impressed with our scene setter that he had put it on his lap and read key parts of its to the Syrian President, Hafez Al-Assad, so he would understand the many pushes and pulls on Rabin, the Prime Minister of Israel. Understanding the many complexities of the Israeli scene is simply hard to gauge reading The Jerusalem Post (the only English language daily newspaper those days).

I said, thank you very much sir. I appreciate that. We’ve got a great team in our political section that puts these things together and I will pass this along to them. I was particularly referring to the principal pen of these pieces, Andrew Steinfeld, one of the best contact officers and drafters I encountered in my career. He had served his first tour in Kuwait under my supervision, and now we were back together in Tel Aviv. His wit, intellect and ability to disarm Israeli interlocutors made him an invaluable member of our team. When I conveyed Christopher’s words to Andrew and other members of our team, it was a powerful shot in the arm that you get in the Foreign Service that is so important. That gave them even more incentive to go out and really beat the bushes so we could put together a scene setter that really showed what the currents were going on in Israel at the time.

Someday, I hope a historian of that period gets access to these scene setters via the Freedom of Information Act. I think these messages conveyed better than any other documents or media reports the lay of the land politically at the time when the march toward peace was uncharacteristically successful.

Q: When you were there, what were the currents that were going on?

LAROCCO: Rabin was challenged by Netanyahu, challenged by the settlers. Politics is always, always the national sport in Israel. These guys have to have ice in their veins, the thickest of skins, the quickest minds and the skills of a Machiavelli to navigate the tortuous waters of Israeli politics. The long knives are lurking around every corner. Among all the politicians of that period, Rabin was the master. He could turn lemons into lemonade at the blink of an eye. I was able to spend a great deal of time with him, time I will always cherish.

Yitzhak Rabin and a leaked reporting message about him

One story about him, although I have many. When I was Chargé, I wrote in a long message about Rabin going into a period of deep depression after there had been a string of terrorist attacks which left many innocent people dead. Those bent on destroying the peace process were out in force. The political pressures on him were only one element that weighed him down. He clearly had some grave doubts whether the path he had chosen could succeed. Arafat had proven to be an untrustworthy, corrupt and unwieldy peace partner.

When Rabin was in Tel Aviv at the Defense Ministry, which was quite often since he lived nearby, and where as Defense Minister he was clearly most comfortable, I would hang out in his outer office. I was allowed to, and this provided me an opportunity to talk to so many Israeli leaders, military and civilian. No one seemed to mind that I was there. I was part of the furniture. One could feel the depression that spread outwardly from Rabin's office at that time. So I wrote a long message about this, concluding with a recommendation that a presidential visit may be the best way to break out of this impasse.

The cable was leaked to The Washington Post. I got a call from the NEA front office and they said, just stay calm. We are going to stand by you. I must confess that I was nervous, not from what might happen to me, but more a sense of betrayal by my Israeli interlocutors.

Days passed. I got a call from Rabin's office, from Eitan Haber. "Jeem...Jeem...Jeem," he said, "What did you do? The old man is so disappointed in you." I truly felt rotten.

Two more very long days passed, and I received another call from Haber. He said that the old man wants to see me. I gulped. Every Thursday, Rabin would move down to the defense ministry in Tel Aviv, so it was just a short ride over to The Kiriya, as it was called. I first went to the office of his director, Eitan Haber, who shuffled his papers and did not break into his usual grin. I had grown such admiration for Haber, and now I felt like he was leading me to slaughter. We sat there in silence. The phone on his desk finally rang after seemingly an eternity, and he said let's go.

We go in there. It is just Rabin and Haber and Rabin is at his desk. Rabin has his reading glasses on, which never either fit him or his image. He could never look studied or professorial. He always looked most natural to me in his shirtless t-shirt that he wore on hot evenings during the summer, a cigarette in one hand, a drink in another. He was a man from an earlier Israel, a working class Israel neither accustomed to nor comfortable with any wealth or show of wealth, but the right man for the challenges and opportunities of this time period.

I sit down in front of him, and once again there was an eternity of silence, with both Rabin and Haber bearing glum and gloomy expressions. All of a sudden Rabin and Haber look at each other, bursting into laughter. I am startled, looking around me. Did something funny just happen that I missed? Finally, Rabin looks at me and says, Jim, did you really think I gave more than a passing thought to your leaked message? If so, you really don't know what it's like to be prime minister of Israel. I have arrows shot at my heart, my back, my head, everywhere all day and night long. I would never survive or get anything done if I was affected by this. It goes with the job.

Eitan and I thought you should suffer a bit, feel what it's like. If nothing else, we got a good laugh out of it at your expense, but also with you learning something. We get plenty of arrows from your country as well, and your masters in Washington all too often think they are always doing us favors when in fact they can also make our jobs more difficult. I know they think we can do the same. None of this is out of the ordinary. It is the ordinary, the usual. It's business. We wouldn't have done this if we didn't like you, he said with that awkward but disarming Rabin half smile that he could never hold for more than an uncomfortable moment.

I said, Sir, that was a cruel joke.

He said, "Okay, I understand that but it was a lot of fun for us and you made an old man smile for a few days. I don't get that often enough."

Rabin and Tom Lantos

Another favorite Rabin story of mine related to one of our VIP visitors, for which he had so many, and for which I have enough stories to amuse my grandchildren for decades.

In this case, the larger than life Tom Lantos was the main character. This was not the first time I was "control officer" for an official visit by Tom. The previous one was in Beijing, and it was a remarkable story as well. I will never forget the luncheon I attended with Ambassador Lord, Tom and his wife, Rose, and senior Chinese officials, who were the hosts. The topic of Tibet came up, and the Chinese, as they always did, talked about civilizing these backward people. Tom countered strongly but politely regarding Chinese treatment of the Tibetans, but the Chinese would not back off their party line. Finally, Rose exploded, delivering an emotional tirade against Chinese extermination of the Tibetan culture. To be sure, this left a deep impression on the Chinese, and if they had not understood the importance of this issue to Americans before this, they did then.

Tom was truly a passionate defender of rights and freedoms. A refugee from Hungary, he had never forgotten what he had gone through and what other people were enduring throughout the world. He was an old world gentleman, dapper, erect in his stance, polite to the point of disarming even his roughest interlocutors, and a liberal in the classic meaning of that word, not the political one. Freedoms and rights, and protection of those freedoms and rights, were emblazoned deep in his soul.

But...he at times would come out with some of the most unexpected comments. I escorted Tom in to see Rabin. It was a small gathering, just Tom and me, Rabin and his aide. Rabin had just returned from a trip to Oman to see the Sultan, an unprecedented visit that seemed to auger a thaw in Israel's longstanding isolation in the region. This topic came up in the conversation, and Tom commented out of the blue that it seemed to him there was a natural affinity between gay Arab leaders and Jews. I stopped taking notes. Rabin turned bright crimson, as anyone who dealt with Rabin would recognize when he suddenly was switched on. He turned to look at Tom, and in his inimitable style simply said "Ohhhhhhh?" in an elongated rising, highly accented tone. I honestly don't recall anything else from that conversation, but I can never forget that comment.

Rabin and the fruits of peace

Another memorable moment for me with Rabin occurred when I was the Charge, Secretary of Defense Perry was visiting, and I hosted Perry for a dinner at the ambassador's residence. I was not living there, but we used it for this special event. Prime Minister Rabin was there, and his mood had turned dark. There had been some devastating Palestinian terrorist attacks and many had died. The peace process with the Palestinians was under severe attack by opponents.

In my welcoming remarks to the dinner guests, I told the story that I related earlier in this oral history about bringing our baby daughter to Israel for medical treatment in 1990. I noted that we were the first to drive from Cairo to Jerusalem following the signing of the Camp David Peace Treaty. I said that this taught me what exactly peace is all about: ordinary families, mothers and fathers and children and babies able to live normal lives, sleeping without fear, moving about freely. Without peace, my daughter would not have received the wonderful treatment in Israel that saved her from surgery. When I sat down, Rabin grabbed my hand, noting that he was deeply, deeply touched. And as he was leaving the dinner, took me aside saying how as a grandfather himself, he understood exactly what I was saying. He said that he would never forget this story as he tried to make peace a reality for future generations of Israelis.

In 1995, Rabin invited me to attend his birthday party in his office with his staff. As the only non-Israeli, I indeed felt very special. You can see that photo up there on the wall, with the personal words he wrote to me. This was his last birthday party. He was assassinated later that year. I will always cherish that photo.

The Clinton administration and Israel

Q: I interviewed a long time ago Jim Dobbins. I got the feeling from him that he was sort of repeating the regular line, the sort of older line, that you can't give as much to other countries and this resonated particularly within the American Jewish political, AIPAC and all that how dare you challenge the fact that we can get any money we want or something like that.

You had the feeling that the Clinton administration was new and it didn't, it was very worried from its Jewish slant and Jim was gotten out of there in a hell of a hurry.

Did you get any feel for the Clinton administration and the Jewish side of our relations with Israel?

LAROCCO: I believe that the Clinton administration came into office feeling that some serious repair work needed to be done in our relations with Israel. Trust was always there, but this trust needed to be cemented. Without that trust, peace had no chance.

Q: On the settlements, I think.

LAROCCO: There were a variety of issues, including the settlements. The issue of conditionality to the loan guarantees was still a lingering issue of trust for some. When Clinton came in, there was the belief that they needed to restore an element of trust with the Israelis because that trust had been broken; at least that was my understanding of their assessment of Bush and Baker policy. It wasn't that long after Clinton became President that the Oslo agreement was announced. Again, it was reached without us. The two sides had taken a very bold step for peace, so it was a golden opportunity to build trust, rewarding not just the Israelis, but also the Palestinians. It was an extremely active time.

At that time, the Israelis were of two minds; they truly wanted to stand on their own, to be self-sufficient, and to wean themselves of our economic assistance. They felt they would never be competitive in the international market until they had to sink or swim economically. They also felt that eliminating economic assistance would bring them status as a developed country and in fact remove some of the frictions in our relationship.

At the same time, they believed that they would always need our military assistance, especially technical assistance and access to our best technology and most modern weaponry. Rabin and his top defense officer, David Ivry, were unequivocal about this.

So our whole aid approach was changing even as the amount of our assistance grew. Keep in mind that our aid program with Israel was already long standing by this time. Kissinger's Sinai disengagement pact negotiated twenty years earlier began our annual multi-billion dollar aid packages to Israel. That was bumped up more with the Camp David Peace Treaty.

The Oslo Agreement between Israel and the Palestinians, summer 1993

Q: Today is the 28th of February, 2013 with Jim Larocco. I would like to talk about your impressions of the peace negotiations. This Oslo thing, did we know that it was simmering?

LAROCCO: Keep in mind that I transferred during the summer from the Far East. I had no current knowledge on what was happening in Israel. But...I must say, during that summer, neither I nor the Charge was made aware of any progress in talks that we all knew were ongoing in Oslo. From our understanding, the talks were solely exploratory, unofficial and with no participation by third countries, other than the Norwegians. There have always been unofficial talks, often called "Track II talks", to distinguish them from official talks, called Track I. Few of the Track II talks ever resulted in breakthroughs. Why should this be any different?

The Oslo talks involved well known individuals on both sides. They were dedicated to finding peace, but there was complete deniability to anything they said or pledged. They were empowered to a point, but no further. The seniority of the people on the Palestinian side was higher than the seniority of the Israeli side, which is normal because again for the Israelis they needed a greater degree of deniability, while the Palestinians needed a much higher degree of credibility to be taken seriously.

The time was ripe for a breakthrough. Arafat was essentially trapped in Tunis with few prospects for breaking out of his treadmill there. Rabin was ready to take risks for peace. As Ed Djerejian used to say, "the biology is right." By this he meant that old leaders who have been through hard times have not only all the history in mind, the options in mind, the risk in mind, but also have the credibility of their people. They also are into legacy, and if they are to take the plunge, this would be it. That was partly a factor in the case of Rabin and Arafat. This was also the case between Rabin and Hafez Al-Assad, and I am convinced to this day that peace between Israel and Syria had a realistic chance in those days of success until Rabin was assassinated.

So the agreement was pulled together by August of 1993 and brought to Rabin and Arafat for approval. They both agreed. Both sides knew that they needed a guarantor, and arbiter of sorts, someone to turn to, someone to implement, someone to blame. The U.S. was the only country capable of playing that role. That led directly to the famous handshakes on the White House lawn, awkward and difficult as they were.

Q: Since this agreement essentially was done elsewhere, in a bureaucracy you get something like this, quite often you get an awful lot of dog in the manger sort of response. Your agreement and I didn't have a hand in it so it won't work and I am not going to play ball or did you find a great sigh of relief, thank God we got something going?

LAROCCO: Relief, yes, but only briefly. There was no time except for a brief high five. There was so much work to do, and the peace team and all our bureaucracy swung into overdrive. Keep in mind this was a big change from Bush 41 to Clinton. We hadn't had a Democratic White House for a long time. You had 12 years since the time of Jimmy Carter. This was truly a whole new team that had come in. There were a handful of Carterites, but it was Clinton's team that dominated. From Tony Lake and Martin Indyk at the White House to Dennis Ross, Aaron Miller and Dan Kurtzer, it was an unprecedented team of powerful minds with enough energy to power a small city, maybe a large one. They were tireless, never short of ideas and determined to make this work.

They also clearly understood that they had to play all those roles I just noted. It was a long list of tasks. And there must be more. Dennis, as I recall, was so foresighted in understanding the Israeli need, and I would even call it craving, for some kind of recognition in the region. The launch of the multilateral track involving Arms Control, Refugees, Economic Development and Cooperation, Water and the Environment was truly far sighted. I always believed that having agreements on paper is necessary, but until you can translate those agreements into on the ground work, people-to-people, government-to-government, institution-to-institution, nothing will endure. In this case, neither Camp David nor Oslo had a real built-in mechanism to do this. I will talk about this later.

At the same time, Oslo was simply a framework agreement. The meat had to be put on the bones, there was still a lot of equities to trample on and a lot of risks that both Rabin and Arafat had to take to make this thing happen. Only through U.S. leadership would this be possible.

The White House had everyone's back. And President Clinton always made that clear. That was truly important not only to the peace team, but to Rabin and Arafat as well. The peace team proved determined and tireless. I give them an enormous amount of credit for the success that was achieved. Clearly, the Oslo Agreement was full of holes and was more a vision and a framework than a real process. In the short run, it was problematic but successful. The long run is another story, still being played out. But one thing is clear: Oslo failed in achieving the kind of peace it promised.

I will never forget the occasion when Rabin informed Bill Brown and me that Oslo had succeeded. We were in his office on a Thursday evening, only he and Haber were there, the lights were dim, he was in his t-shirt, drink and cigarette in hand, and we were just shooting the breeze. At one point, he lectured us on the Camp David Treaty, how he had memorized it, how it was in fact a blueprint for a comprehensive peace, how little of it was implemented and how tragic this was. It should never be forgotten. Rabin was at his passionate best, more reflecting to himself than lecturing to us.

He then told us that agreement was reached in Oslo, and the Israeli ambassador in Washington would be informing the White House shortly. All our lives would now change forever. There would be much work to do.

Rabin was sincerely a man of peace and who came to this via his personal experiences with war. He was an Israeli patriot of the highest order. He was willing to take risks, but never if that would jeopardize the security of his country. Peace in his mind was precisely designed to enhance security in the long run. To him, it was not an option; it was the only answer.

He told us that we shouldn't think of this just as an Israeli-Palestinian agreement. He told us it was what should have happened after Camp David, but never did. These talks must be accompanied by efforts with Jordan, Syria and Lebanon. There would never be the peace and security the region needed without Israel being at peace with all its neighbors.

I remember that evening so vividly. He would sit there drinking his glass of scotch and smoking these horrible cigarettes, wearing an ill-fitting, old fashioned tee-shirts, the sleeveless type tee-shirt that were so common in ethnic Chicago when I grew up.

From that moment onward, I had so much respect for that man because he really did believe in it as a strategic choice for the future of Israel that was necessary and that was worth devoting the rest of his life to achieving. He really wanted it to happen and suffered tremendously every step of the way in trying to achieve that goal. He paid for it with his life.

Again, I give the peace team and President Clinton himself enormous credit for all the hard work that was done at this time. We at the embassy just facilitated visits back and forth and communications, in addition to our constant stream of reporting on the domestic political and economic situation in Israel. Otherwise, it was really the work of these guys that translated this agreement into a reality which, among other things, brought the return of Arafat, the establishment of the Palestinian Authority and a degree of self governance that was a radical change for the Palestinian people.

It seems hard to believe now, but the expectations and hopes of the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza were sky high. In a poll, nearly 90 percent of Palestinians saw a brighter future ahead, and a similar percentage repudiated the use of terrorism as a legitimate form of resistance.

I say this in contrast to what I experienced in a recent visit to Jerusalem. I was at Al-Quds University in Abu Dis conducting a seminar with faculty and students. Near the end of the seminar, a young Palestinian student asked the following question: Mr. Ambassador, you have been around the peace process for more than 30 years. Will this all the same 30 years from now? I was devastated by this question. In the 90s, the Palestinians could taste peace, and they wanted it immediately. Their primary criticism was the slow pace of translating peace on paper to peace on the ground. With this question, there was a total absence of urgency conveyed by this young man. It wasn't all about Peace, Now. It was about Peace Someday, perhaps never. I took my time before replying, and did my best to convey hope. It was not easy, and the young man was clearly not convinced. Nor was anyone else in the audience. They had accepted the status quo, and I found that deeply troubling.

The peace team

Q: The team of Miller, Ross, Indyk and all, these are people who are, they were all Jewish and they were all sort of part of the you might say the established pro Israeli group in Washington. I may be wrong on this but did you have the feeling they were really sincere and trying to give the Palestinians self-rule?

LAROCCO: Their sincerity, their commitment to peace was without question. This was not a game; this was the real thing. The members of the peace team had a commitment to peace in their soul that I must confess I never had. I was a professional diplomat, sworn to uphold our policy, and I considered the peace process as essential to regional security and conflict prevention. But I was not going to live or die based on the vagaries of the peace process or lack thereof. I believed that U.S. interests could be sustained without a comprehensive peace, and that belief has been borne out through history. I never joined those who cried loudly that this was the last opportunity for peace, and woe be to the world if this round failed. I hear the same thing regarding Kerry's latest peace efforts. I just don't buy it. I do believe it is essential to keep trying, to build hope, but at the end of the day, the parties themselves must be the true crafters of an agreement and be willing not just to sell it to their people, but to carry it out and be vigilant in enforcing the terms.

Let's be frank: FSOs are at times derided for our lack of enthusiasm regarding certain policies. The reality is that we are left with sweeping up the residue of broken dreams, dashed hopes and poor policies all too often. It fosters not only a natural skepticism, but also the very necessary careful thought to what we may have to do if and when things go wrong. Political types who come on board with every new administration have all kinds of dreams, many of which will either never be realized or will fail. Someone has to be ready on deck to prevent things from going overboard. If Kerry's efforts fail, it will be FSOs who must deal with the aftermath on the ground. I know those out there now are keeping this in the back of their minds. The same applied to Libya, and applies to Afghanistan and Iran.

When it comes to foreign policies, it's all too often our career FSOs who are left holding the bag after political leaders move on to something else, our military withdraws or any number of policies or programs goes sour. When Oslo was successful, we didn't cheer; we started planning our role. When Oslo ran into trouble, as it often did, we started planning how to staunch the flow of blood. In all cases, it is natural for us to plan for "the day after."

To be sure, there were some who felt the peace team leaned too far in favor of the Israelis. If one kept in mind that it was essential to keep the trust of the Israelis every step of the way, these might have viewed the peace process and how it was carried out differently. This was tough going, to be sure, and the peace team was tireless. Rabin was prepared to take historic risks, and it is was essential to stand with him, support him and make clear to one and all that we would do our best to minimize those risks. History will judge what mistakes were made, and peace team members like Dennis, Martin and Dan have already provided their views on what went right and what went wrong. But I believe that in those years, 1993-1996, they gave it their best shot, and I will always admire them for that. At the end of the day, as James Baker used to say, we can't want peace more than the parties themselves. Ultimately, no matter what we did, the substance of the peace was in their hands, not ours.

Arafat in Gaza, 1994

Q: I am not sure about the timing but here in Washington, just watching the daily news, it seemed like there was a calculated Israeli campaign to weaken whatever you want to call it security forces of the Palestinians.

LAROCCO: Again, keep in mind that before Oslo, the West Bank and Gaza were under Israeli control to the extent of a civil administration running Palestinian affairs. There was no such thing as a real Palestinian security force.

A key task in the preparation for Arafat returning to the Territories, as they were called, was preparing for the Palestinians to take over their own security.

The embassy in Tel Aviv, in those days, was responsible for Gaza and the consulate in Jerusalem was responsible for what we did with and in the West Bank. Arafat originally located in Gaza, and one of the tasks I had to do was to help coordinate the supply of equipment to the new security forces. There was surplus equipment in Europe, so my first thought is this would be easy. Wrong. The equipment had to be transferred from the control of European Command in Europe to Central Command in Egypt, and then brought overland to Gaza. I never did get an explanation of the economics or politics of why it didn't come directly from Europe to Israel, then to Gaza, which would have been much quicker and cleaner. Just one military command to work with: EUCOM. Coordinating between two military commands was like working with two empires. It required much more diplomacy than I ever imagined. The experience we had coordinating between two rivals – the Palestinians and Israelis – came in handy. In the end, it was done, and just in the nick of time

Q: And you are talking about stuff.

LAROCCO: Talking about stuff and moving that stuff. It was like being in the TV Show "Mash," and many of us felt like Radar bargaining for trucks and other equipment. There was fortunately several weeks to work this out, and I recall much arriving the day Arafat arrived in 1994. I was down there quite a bit in Gaza and coordinating with the initial designated commander of the Palestinian security forces, Nasser Yusuf, who I just communicated with yesterday. He's in Jordan now.

Everything looked good. Nasser struck me as a pretty decent guy with the respect of his men. His forces, however, were in Jordan, and they never came to Gaza.

What we didn't anticipate was that Arafat was going to govern the same way he had governed in the refugee camps: divide and rule. Within a month, he had created so many different security organizations that everyone was confused. Instead of what had seemed to be a unified command under Nasser Yusuf, within a month Yusuf was virtually neutered. His authority had vanished. Arafat cronies were brought in to run separate security organizations. We needed a program to identify all the players, who played what position, who was back up. Arafat played each off the other, at times favoring one, then shifting to another. It was how he kept order in Beirut refugee camps, and he simply used that same template in the Territories. You can imagine how difficult this was for the Israelis, for us and for other donors.

Arafat's employment scheme was to place as many men as possible in the security forces, especially the police. As I recall, the numbers swelled to over 50,000. But how to pay for them? I remember clearly the priority Washington put on helping Arafat in this regard. When the time came to transfer money to them, the route was the embassy. I refused to support this program. I received several angry phone calls from Washington telling me to make it happen. I was reminded that I did not have the authority to stop this. I reminded them that my name or someone else's at the embassy had to be on the transfers. I would not authorize this.

In one of these calls, which involved a member of the peace team, I explained that I had no intention of going to jail. There was absolutely no accountability for these funds, and we had already seen one check provided by a donor nation taken within minutes to a money changer and end up in Europe. No accountability, no funds transfer.

The transfer of funds was delayed as Washington scrambled to put together a program of accountability, turning this over to a private accounting firm, Coopers and Lybrand, as I recall. Arafat hated this, seeing "his money" watched so carefully. In the end, he was pleased when we bowed out and turned over the willing Norwegians the burden of paying for Palestinian security forces. Several years later, a Norwegian official audit revealed that tens of millions of dollars could not be accounted for. The Norwegian foreign minister, one of the legends of the peace process, Tarye Larsen, was discredited. It was sad, but predictable. I can only imagine if we had looked the other way as he did how many Americans might have gone to jail.

Another factor that caused enormous strain within the Territories was that Arafat and his cronies had not lived there for decades. They were outsiders, and this parachuted in ruling class was deeply resented as local authorities, who had never left Gaza or the West Bank, were pushed aside. Not only did they resent being cut out, but they witnessed and suffered through enormous waste, fraud and mismanagement clearly condoned if not demanded by Arafat and his cronies. He quickly set up monopolies of key products and services, drawing even greater wealth to him and those in his favor, most of whom were returned refugees. It was deeply corrosive, and all of us knew it.

I remember one time when I was with a member of Congress and we were sitting with Rabin. The member of Congress said, "How can you work with this guy? He is just totally untrustworthy, totally corrupt”, speaking of Arafat. Rabin looked at him and said, “My friend, you don’t make peace with your friends. You make peace with your enemies. You can’t choose those enemies and their leaders. I have to deal with what I have to deal with. Is he corrupt? Is he this, is he that? I have to deal with what I have to deal with, but peace is more important.”

I thought that was a great answer. Discussion shifted immediately to a new topic.

AID and the Palestinians post-Oslo

Just like in my days in Cairo in the aftermath of Camp David, there was a rush in the aftermath of Oslo to do aid projects in Gaza and the West Bank. This was at times just as painful as those days in Cairo, as the push for projects often conflicted with either the absorption capacity, the need or the priority.

For example, Washington wanted to build high-rise buildings in Gaza. They were high visibility, Washington argued, so let’s move on it. They will be a visible symbol to all that America cares. To many of us who knew the situation, this was terribly misguided, but it was not unethical. There is a big difference. I did oppose that decision but did not take a firm stand the way I did regarding the transfer of money for the police. In the end, it was not a symbol that America cared. Instead it was a symbol of American support for Arafat’s cronyism. There was never a transparent process on who would occupy the apartments, and we got what we should have expected: Arafat picked them, and they were cronies. Common people felt betrayed.

Our misguided AID program was corrected through the tough leadership and hard work of NEA DAS Toni Verstandig. I had enormous respect for how hard she studied the needs of the common Gazans and reshaped the AID program to fit those needs. She listened when I described the sorry state of our AID program and flew out to see for herself.

I took her down to a city north of Gaza City and said, “Look at this lake.”

She said, “Lake? This is a cesspool. These kids are all playing around it. It is getting into their water and they are all getting sick. Let’s drain this lake and put in a new water system.” And we did. It was an enormous success. We would tease Toni by calling the cesspool “Lake Verstandig.” After it was drained and the entire water system upgraded, the incidence of disease went from high to nothing, and the people in the community were truly grateful for what we had done. ”

Q: I remember talking to a water expert at FSI that came by. He was saying that what the Israelis were doing, I am not sure of the time. This was when the Israelis were dominating in Gaza all the sweet water was going practically in one direction.

LAROCCO: Gaza and the West Bank have always suffered from water shortages. So has Israel. This is an issue that requires constant attention. Always has, always will.

In those days back in the 90s, AID, in my opinion, correctly focused to a great extent on the water issue in terms of water distribution, water purity, cleaning up the water waste. I thought that was an unbelievable winner. We got enormous credit for really changing their lives because they could see that their kids were healthier, they could see that the water was better for both for drinking and washing. It was a real success.

Again, on the security side, what Arafat did with the security forces at the time was impossible to undo, impossible to reorient.

Q: Were they disciplined? It sounds like they wouldn't be a disciplined group.

LAROCCO: They were very disciplined in carrying out Arafat's priorities.

As for our assistance, regardless of the project, we ended up never transferring money directly to the Palestinian Authority. There simply was not sufficient accountability. Arafat continually groused about this, but we had no choice. Our laws were clear and we would abide by them with no exceptions. So money went through a variety of institutions, contractors, suppliers, whatever. They got the money; they produced the product or service. We always had full accountability, even if the project was a poorly done or the end result, as in the housing project in Gaza, was a disappointment.

Q: What was your opinion impression of the sanctity of NGOs dealing with the area? Were they involved in diverting money or were NGOs pretty good?

LAROCCO: We dealt only with NGOs with a proven track record that we could trust. Once again, we allowed no wiggle room.

Always the U.S. government has had a tenuous relationship with NGOs. I have explained this to people by noting that NGOs are values based, mission-oriented. They have values and they will follow them no matter what. They don't have to compromise. They are there to help children or to advance women's rights or whatever. That is their basis for existing. That's how they raise funds. They are values-based organizations so they see no need to compromise on political issues or interests.

When you are there not only promoting your values but your interests, there will be times when you have to compromise. Governments do this every day. It causes frictions with NGOs who view any government with suspicion. There were indeed times when we had a difficult relationship admittedly with some NGOs.

What happened, and this is not unusual in developing countries, because there was limited capacity to use our funds and difficulties with accountability, the pipeline of appropriated but not obligated funds built up enormously with the Palestinians. Money was not spent that was obligated or appropriated or authorized for the Palestinians. In the rush to demonstrate our support for the peace, all kinds of money, significant money was pledged, not just by us, but by many countries. Remember, this is a small population in tiny areas. Gaza is about the size of Washington, D.C.; finding feasible projects was not easy. They just didn't have the capacity. They didn't have the institutions to work through and the accountability issue made it difficult to actually go forward with a lot of projects.

It reminded me of the aftermath of the Camp David Treaty when I was in Egypt. I recall once the AID Director there, at the start of the meeting saying, "Gentlemen, we have to find ways to spend $3 million per day." I was stunned, but this was a correct statement if we were to spend the money appropriated. I would have chuckled if it wasn't so tragic a situation. Feasibility study after feasibility study had the same conclusion: this or that project simply wasn't feasible. Washington howled that things weren't happening. But how could they, if the economy couldn't absorb this shower of new funding. The flipside of this was Egyptian grouching that we promised so much and produced very little. I was always happy I never worked for AID. They were an easy target.

Q: This introduction of massive assistance I would think the embassy would be spending a significant amount of time checking on things.

LAROCCO: Yeah, we did.

I will never forget Dani Pletka, a staffer on the Foreign Relations Committee, who informed us she was coming to Tel Aviv to review our AID program. She came out, expressing deep skepticism about our program. She was sure she would find grounds to conclude there was fraud.

I said, "Fine. Why don't you start out spending time going over our books? I would like to know if you see any thing. I've got our top accountant at AID, he will open all the books and answer any questions you have."

She did that and came back to me two days later and said she was impressed with our solid accountability. "I can't find anything in this."

I said, "That's because it is not there. We are clean." But, I added, the fact that we are clean does not in any way mean that we are spending the money wisely. That's a different story. Having solid accountability is different than spending the money efficiently or effectively, serving our interests, Palestinian development and humanitarian needs and the peace process itself. If you have any advice to improve our AID programs, we would welcome it.

She took the time to go to Gaza and I admired this. She was dead serious in investigating on behalf of the Congress and the taxpayers. When she came back, she acknowledged the difficulties of finding the best uses of funds or even finding any uses. The Palestinian aid program would always be problematic, but it was a politically-motivated program, and would endure.

Q: I remember going back to the 1950s when I was in Dhahran and we were looking at the influence of Palestinians in Saudi Arabia and it was tremendous because these were the educated people. Coming back to your time, logic would say that the education had fallen off, going down, the technical expertise. How was it?

LAROCCO: No, it was a shock the first time I went down to Gaza. 95% literacy. I went to the Jabaliya refugee camp where at that time 70,000 people were crammed into an area less than the size of Foggy Bottom. I visited homes that were so small, only dirt floors and 12 to a room. But all the kids were going to school and everybody was literate in that entire community. This was something I never forget. The Palestinian commitment to education was unparalleled in my experience.

Q: How did you find the schools? Were they getting a hate Israel indoctrination through the school system or not?

LAROCCO: I didn't go into the schools so I can't answer that question. I know there have been a lot of allegations back and forth on that. I haven't ever really looked into it. I just have to be honest with you about that. That was not something I went into, nor was I ever asked to.

Q: What about Iranians?

LAROCCO: Even at that time, whenever we received a threat assessment from the Israelis, and that was often, the Iranians were at or near the top of the list of enemies. I recall standing near Peres at a press conference in Jerusalem when he announced that the Iranians were 3 to 5 years away from a nuclear weapon. That was 1994.

But we were so absorbed in the peace process that Iran got scant discussion. You can talk about other times but at that time, '93 to '96 when I was there, Iran was on the screen but in small letters. Keep in mind that as the Oslo Agreement was being moved onto the next stage, Oslo II in 1995, at the same time negotiations were going on in a very, very serious and significant way with Syria and with Jordan.

Rabin, Christopher and peace with Syria

We in the embassy thought that an agreement with Syria was going to happen in 1994. We thought it would be reached as soon as August of 1994, or about a year after the Palestinian agreement. It seemed that all the pieces were there. I recall standing on the tarmac with Peres when Christopher's plane departed, returning the peace team to Washington after shuttling between Jerusalem and Damascus. He was nearly in tears. "One more shuttle might have done it," he sighed. "Why didn't he stay and get it done?"

I recall raising this in one of our evening get-togethers with Rabin in his Tel Aviv office one Thursday night. He dismissed the likelihood of a peace agreement with Assad. I was startled and asked why. He said the following: Warren Christopher is no James Baker. He recalled that Baker was persistent, tough and in charge. He would have a book on his lap, always open. Rabin said this was unnerving. If the discussion reached a point where Baker felt he could come to closure, he would slam the book shut. This, Rabin said, made him (Rabin) feel like he was no longer talking with James Baker; instead, he was speaking to the Secretary of State of the most powerful country in the world. With this in mind, it was hard to say no to Baker, and it was also easy to go to other Israelis and blame "the Americans." Rabin said if this was Baker's treatment of Israelis, they knew that Baker would do the same with other Arab leaders. And they knew that these leaders would react the same: acquiesce and blame "those Americans."

Rabin said that unlike Baker, Christopher accepted no as an answer. It was too easy. And if he could say no, so could Assad...so could Arafat...so could any other leader in the region. Peace will never come with Christopher, Rabin concluded. And it didn't.

Peace with Syria didn't happen in August 1994, as we hoped and even expected, but King Hussein of Jordan was ready. Some Israelis speculated that Hussein was deeply concerned that Syria would get all the attention of a peace agreement, and Jordan would get the scraps and scant attention following Syria. Whatever the reason, peace talks moved swiftly between the Israelis and Jordanians. A peace agreement was reached and signed with great fanfare on the Jordan-Israeli border at the Wadi Araba.

It was a heady time, with hopes and expectations still riding high. Peace seemed to be spreading rapidly, and the multilateral talks seemed headed to bringing the region closer together. I must say, and I think I have said this already, that I truly felt these multilateral talks were an inspired concept, bringing Arabs and Israelis together, underwritten by the U.S., Europe and others and pointing toward the day of significant benefits throughout the region from a comprehensive peace.

Attention shifted after the Jordan agreement back to Syria. Rounds of talk again brought the parties close, but it was clear that the assassination of Rabin set things back. Even with the assassination, there was a commitment to continue by all parties, with the view that the expected ascendancy of Peres to the prime ministership in elections in the spring of 1996, an agreement would be finalized. Keep in mind that in the latter months of 1995 following the assassination of Rabin, Peres held a 25 point lead in the polls over Netanyahu. His victory seemed certain, but that lead melted away month by month.

Terrorism in Israel, 1994-95

Q: How did the embassy and you receive the news of Rabin's assassination?

LAROCCO: Before I directly answer this question, it's important that I take some time to describe the situation in Israel and the territories building up, at least in my view, to Rabin's assassination.

It wasn't long after the Oslo Agreement that those who opposed this agreement, on either side, Palestinian or Israeli, took up their pens, their microphones or their weapons to sabotage it. In the streets of Jerusalem, in particular, but also in Tel Aviv, odious posters of Rabin began appearing more and more. Rallies against Rabin, Peres and the peace process became increasingly large and vocal. I recall seeing in a suburb of Tel Aviv a march by Israelis opposed to the peace process with several men carrying a casket with Rabin's name on it.

Terrorism came to Tel Aviv in 1994, not far from the embassy, and this wasn't the only time terrorists struck in our area. Just a few months before the Rabin assassination, and shortly after Martin Indyk arrived as ambassador, an attack on nearby Dizengoff Street took place with some of our staff in the area. It occurred around lunch time, as I recall.

There were many other attacks throughout Israel, and of course there was Israel settler attack near Hebron that I recall killed something like 29 Palestinians. Baruch Goldstein was the perpetrator.

I believe I related earlier in the discussion the dinner I hosted for visiting Secretary Perry with Rabin present. This was at a time when the peace process itself seemed in jeopardy because of the increased terrorism. Rabin went into a funk for several weeks. When he came out of it, I happened to be accompanying a Congressional visitor for a call on him. The visitor pressed Rabin on why he doesn't press the pause button on the peace process until the situation calms down. Rabin responded that this is precisely what the terrorists want. They want Rabin to be reactive, to act as if he's terrorized by them. Rabin then said words that have been repeated by others, but which I will never forget: I intend to take on the terrorism as if there is no peace, and to work for peace as if there is no terrorism. These were powerful words, sending clear messages to all parties who had a stake in the success or failure of the peace talks.

I also remember the pressure we felt from the Israelis against our travel advisories. Now let me be clear: this is not unique to the Israelis. Any countries that take in significant revenues from tourism chafe at our travel advisories. I recall the day after a stricter one came out from the State Department, I was at reception attended by the Mayor of Tel Aviv, Ronni Milo, and in his unprepared remarks, and he talked about how safe Tel Aviv was, and then singled me out and the American Embassy for misleading foreign guests who were thinking about visiting Israel. I was stunned by being singled out this way in front of other diplomats and the media. Ironically, the very next there was a terrorist strike in downtown Tel Aviv. We never heard another complaint from the Mayor's office, and over time, the Israelis learned to live with our travel advisories, as all countries do.

Ambassador Martin Indyk and the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin

As for the evening Rabin was assassinated, I was at home. Martin Indyk called me and said, "Rabin has been shot. Please come over to the house. We need to talk to the White House. There will be other things to do." I went over to the residence; Martin said he must go to the hospital to see Rabin and his wife Leah, telling me to stay on the line with White House. Rabin died before I saw Martin again.

I had a pit in my stomach. The week before, Martin and I went over to Rabin's residence to consult on talks related to Oslo II. Peres was phoning in from the talks during the conversation. Why I went with Martin I don't recall. Martin normally took the political counselor with him.

In any case, the meeting broke up, and for some reason, I took longer than Martin to get out the door, trailing him by a minute or so. As I was at the door, Rabin came up to me, grasped both of my hands in his, looked me in the eye and said "goodbye, Jim." At the time, I was spooked. This had never happened before. Rabin was short on ceremony, and courtesies were not his forte. That evening, I related this event to my wife, saying I couldn't get this out of my mind. I never saw Rabin again. He was dead within the week.

The Rabin funeral was only a few days after his assassination. In all honesty, despite the massive number of senior-level U.S. visitors, including Presidents, Secretaries of State, so many members of congress, governors, mayors, etc., it all went smoothly. There was no advance from the White House and State. We were seasoned handlers of VIPs, so they simply had to put themselves in our hands. No second guessing, no redundancy, just get it done. I must add that all the VIP visitors understood our limitations and helped each other. There were some particularly poignant moments as younger congressmen helped older ones climbed Mount Herzl together for the ceremony. The love and respect for Rabin was deeply felt.

This was the busiest time of my life. I don't think I got more than three hours sleep per night for over a year. I loved it. It was exhilarating. I would remind people in Tel Aviv the attention we get from Washington is unequalled anywhere at any other post in the world.

Special section: Carving the world among military combatant commands: a disservice to our vital national security interests

Q: Let's go back to our military relationship with Israel crossed lines of European Command and Central Command. You might explain what we you are talking about.

LAROCCO: This is a good time to go through this complex and important issue.

I think there is a popular misconception that while our civilian departments are like islands floating in a highly bureaucratic and faceless sea, our military is a seamless machine free of bureaucracy, free of stove pipes. It is a team working together to protect America with an efficiency and effectiveness unparalleled in military history.

First, let me be clear: I join so many American citizens thanking God every day for our military and the men and women who put their lives on the line every day so we can enjoy the quiet miracle of normal life. Few people in the history of humankind have enjoyed what I have enjoyed throughout my life. It isn't a miracle; it is constant vigilance, hard work, technological superiority and commitment from our political leadership across the generations and party lines to do all that is necessary to keep us safe.

But...I cannot avoid the conclusion that I know so many books and articles describe in great detail: our military is a highly segmented, stove-piped, disjointed, massively redundant and bloated structure that makes civilian equivalents look like models of structure and efficiency.

There is so much to focus on, but let me deal solely with what used to be called the CINCs and are now referred to as the Combatant Commands, and specifically the regional commands. Each of these is an empire unto itself, dividing the world with artificial lines and crossing them only rarely.

In the case of Israel, despite being located geographically in the Middle East, it comes under European Command (EUCOM). To its north (Lebanon and Syria), east (Jordan and Iraq), south (Egypt and Saudi Arabia), all come under the jurisdiction of Central Command. To show that Israel is not alone in this curious line drawing, Egypt, one of the leaders in Africa, is not in AFRICOM, but rather lies in CENTCOM. In fact, it is the only country in Africa that is not in AFRICOM.

My first encounter with these empires, their lines and the separateness came with the supply of surplus military equipment, which was so abundant in Europe after the fall of the Soviet Union, to the Palestinians arriving in Gaza from Tunis following the Oslo agreement. The equipment had to be transferred from Europe, under EUCOM, to Alexandria in Egypt, under CENTCOM, to Gaza, which was theoretically under EUCOM, but which had heretofore had zero contact with EUCOM except via the Israelis. It was a nightmare making sure CENTCOM and EUCOM worked together in the transference of the equipment.

Let's be clear: Israel was in EUCOM for political reasons. Our military, with the fall of the Soviet Union, "pivoted" away from Europe to focus increasingly on the Middle East. Our military posted tens of thousands of forces at dozens of facilities throughout the Arab world. And this is in peace time. Those states, in those days, and others in CENTCOM, like Afghanistan and Pakistan, wanted no contact with Israel, and the very functioning of CENTCOM was predicated on a total, complete absence of any contact whatsoever with Israel and Israelis. It was such a huge redline, with no exceptions, that as an American, I found totally un-American and contrary to our vital interests.

I recall raising this directly with the Commander in Chief of CENTCOM more than ten years later, and he was unequivocal: no contact with Israel. I countered strongly that my own experience, serving in the Arab World as well as Israel, demonstrated to me how vital it was for any Americans understanding our own interests as well as those of the region, that we maintain strong contacts with both sides. This argument fell on deaf ears.

Only with the ascendance of General David Petraeus as combatant commander of CENTCOM did this start to change. I give him great credit for this.

But the dysfunctionality of the artificial lines goes on to this day. I will provide a few of many examples. When I was Director General of the MFO, our mandate was monitoring the security annex of the Camp David Treaty. Our beat was Israel and Egypt. Since all the American troops were stationed in Cairo, they fell under CENTCOM, which did a superb job ensuring they had all they needed in terms of support.

When terrorism struck for the first time in Sinai, in 2004, I went to CENTCOM for force protection upgrades. They responded immediately, and I was truly grateful for that. But when it came to receiving vital information about events and trends, I kept being told that the exigencies of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq precluded their paying much attention to the Sinai. In fact, they paid almost no attention, which was probably not expected under the circumstances.

Since I was stationed in Rome, and the EUCOM HQ was in Stuttgart, I decided to go there and see what they had, asking as well if they could pay attention to us and pass timely information. They didn't have two wars to fight. I was immediately told that I could not even talk to EUCOM about the MFO without a memorandum of understanding (MOU) between CENTCOM and EUCOM allowing this. I was stunned at this level of segmentation and bureaucracy. I eventually got that MOU, but it wasn't easy.

I later inquired whether, in the case of an emergency in the Sinai involving mass casualties, we could call on one command or the other for immediate support. This did not go over well with either. They simply would not commit to provide for our emergency relief in a timely manner. When I followed the news on EUCOM's reluctance to support emergency needs in Benghazi, I was not surprised.

One particularly vivid example of dysfunctionality: Despite the so-called pivot to Asia and focus in that huge sea expanse on our Navy assets, anti-piracy has its best manifestation in the CTF-151 that falls under NAVCENT in Bahrain. Many countries, including China, participate in this task force that for years has focused on counter piracy emanating primarily from Somalia.

I recall chatting at a conference with a U.S. Navy commander working with that task force. I commented to him that I was surprised to see so many pirates working near the shores of Sri Lanka and southwest India. He laughed, saying the pirates knew exactly where the lines between CENTCOM and PACOM extended through the Arabian Sea and Indian Ocean. They would slip into PACOM waters and watch from a distance as the task force stayed on the CENTCOM side of the line. I shook my head in disbelief. Lines in the ocean? How absurd can you get?

Just think of the implications of these lines. PACOM extends from the vast expanse of the Pacific Ocean to the border of Pakistan and India. New Delhi is as far from PACOM HQ in Honolulu as it is from CENTCOM HQ in Tampa. Of course, it is much closer to the CENTCOM forward HQ in Qatar.

How much can PACOM really pay attention to India, and how well can it grasp the situation if it doesn't have Afghanistan and Pakistan within its scope, knowing their leaders? The flipside of this applies to CENTCOM. How can they get their arms around the AfPak issue without consulting closely with India? I raise the question here: has any CENTCOM commander ever been to New Delhi? I am not aware that any has. No PACOM commander would allow it. If I am correct, this is a gross disservice to our vital strategic interests.

I don't even want to get started on AFRICOM. Originally, it was referred to derisively and dismissively as "AID with guns." Now it has morphed into an important kinetic command as violent extremism has spread from the Mediterranean all the way to the Horn of Africa. But how can you deal with Libya (in AFRICOM) without dealing with Egypt (in CENTCOM)? Or the Horn of Africa, without dealing with the other side of the Red Sea, which is CENTCOM? The JTF in Djibouti is supposed to square this circle, but keep in mind that AFRICOM must depend so much on both EUCOM and CENTCOM assets. It remains an orphan, and a weak one at that.

Now overlay all these Combatant Command (COCOM) artificial lines over the lines at State and DOD, which don't coincide either. It is a bureaucratic nightmare begging for someone to fix, but the iron rice bowls have been hammered so thick that every attempt has been aborted. I keep hoping that if nothing else will force a serious review and remake, it will be the demands of budget cutting. There is so much duplication of effort costing taxpayers not just billions, but tens of billions of dollars every year that can be saved. Every year. That piles up fast.

At the same time, eliminating this duplication and stove-piping will save millions of man hours not just in actual work, but in contacts between officers all the way up the chain. And our top policy makers and appropriators will not have to try to sort out the naturally competing demands of each commander.

The list of what might be improved goes on and on, but I cannot conclude this section without saying that I suspect our bizarre military segmentation wonderfully confuses our enemies. At the same time, however, it confuses our friends. We cannot afford that, especially at a time where the level of distrust in America's role in the world, or lack thereof, has risen to a level not seen since the post-Vietnam era.

Embassy relations with the Consulate General in Jerusalem

Q: How did you find relations between the embassy and our consulate general in Jerusalem?

LAROCCO: There was long established rivalry, competition, grudge...whatever one might call it that I knew about, but never expected to be as difficult as it was. In many respects, it was much worse than the Islamabad-New Delhi rivalry, probably because the Arab-Israeli divide was felt much more deeply and emotionally in Washington and throughout U.S. politics. To be sure, those in the consulate, dealing 24/7 with the Palestinians, were engulfed in non-stop complaints from the Palestinians about their status, treatment by the Israeli and lack of U.S. understanding or regard for their plight. The ConGens documenting of all this was outstanding, and they repeatedly garnered awards for reporting and analysis. We never received any, even though I felt our reporting and analysis was as good as or better than the ConGen's. But...I also recognized that Washington did not have the degree of longstanding direct connections with the Palestinians that they had with so many Israelis, so they often ignored our messages while hanging on every word of the ConGen's.

To be frank, the ConGen felt like they were a bit of an orphan in the scheme of State Department bureaucracy, and they were. They were (along with Hong Kong) an independent post in terms of their substantive work, a freestanding consulate without an embassy. But, administratively, their funding came through us. You can only imagine how deeply their resentment of this was. In addition, their beat was the West Bank and Palestinian Jerusalem. We had Israeli Jerusalem and Gaza.

Since the Israelis were in charge of all the territories before Oslo and even after Oslo controlled all border crossings and security, all complaints conveyed to the ConGen had to be sent to us for handling. The ConGen was not allowed to deal directly with the Israelis. There were days when I would get a raft of calls from ConGen officers which required me to call my Israeli contacts to resolve a difficult situation. And that included stopping our ConGen officials from going places they had been cleared by the Israelis to go.

This dependency on me, controlling their funds and solving many of their daily operational problems, put me in a special spot. I thought I was giving them a fair shake, but I know they resented me (and especially my power) deeply.

When Ed Djerejian came on board as ambassador, he was coming to us from the job of Assistant Secretary of NEA. In this capacity, he had overseen the process of picking the Consul General in Jerusalem. He selected a good friend, Ed Abington. The expectations were high that the problems between our two posts would disappear because of their friendship. No such luck. That's when I realized that it was indeed institutional.

It only got worse when Martin Indyk became ambassador. The suspicion and distrust between him and Abington was profound. I worked closely with the Deputy Consul General to ensure that there was no breakdown in funding streams or handling Palestinian and ConGen operational problems, and while once I believe this worked well, my guess is that ConGen officials at the time, like John Barger, Maura Connelly and Paul Sutphin might respectfully disagree.

But the troubles at the senior level of contacts, reporting, analysis, handling VIP visitors, and other issues that were the purview of Martin and Ed bounced back to the point they were at when I arrived in Tel Aviv. I must admit that navigating between serving my ambassador faithfully and resolving differences with Jerusalem added to my gray hairs.

One of my fondest memories in the Foreign Service, however, was related to this personal and institutional rivalry. On my second to last day of service in Tel Aviv, a young, brilliant officer in the embassy who handled the Palestinian economic account and had bridged as well as anyone the divide between the embassy and ConGen, wrote a script for a drama aimed to drive me totally up the wall. This officer was Jeff Feltman.

He knew I would be preoccupied with the many administrative chores I had to do before leaving post, so his timing was perfect. He had Martin and Ed and many other of the officers in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv participate in this three-act play, which was carried out over a period of hours. The two office managers in our front office were also in on the script, as was the ambassador's special assistant, so this was a complex and complicated ruse played on me.

I was faced with a barrage of phone calls all presenting me with intractable problems, from a political officer whose vehicle broke down at a border crossing to the ambassador driving unannounced for a meeting with Arafat.

The script was so perfectly acted out that at the point where it seemed our two posts were about to go to war, I was left speechless with everyone screaming at me as phones were ringing off the hook. I finally got Ed Abington on the line who delivered a devastating indictment of Martin and then Martin, a person not inclined to hyperbole, ranting against Ed. I was speechless. It just so happened that at that very moment I had $13000 in cash in my hand from the sale of my car. I was desperate to get this outta my hands and to the embassy cashier to arrange a wire transfer to my bank account.

With Ed on one line demanding action by me, Martin on the other demanding action by me, I was speechless and frozen in place, something quite uncommon for me. After a very long pause, Martin said, Jim, this was all a joke. To be honest, and I recall that moment vividly, I didn't believe it. The play acting and script were that good. Then Ed jumped in and said calm down Jim; Martin is here with me and not headed anywhere. I remained dumbstruck for what seemed like a very long time, but when I noticed our two office managers practically falling off their chairs laughing and our special assistant smiling broadly, I finally came back to reality. I had been punked, big time. And masterfully.

I cherish that script in my scrapbook. Among other things, it demonstrated the genius of Jeff Feltman, who the department wisely pushed up the ranks to the top quicker than anyone of his generation.

But did the relationship between the two posts get any better after I left? Not really. It was indeed institutionally ingrained.

Years later, under Condi Rice, the ConGen finally was given its administrative independence and Gaza responsibility as well. That has provided the ConGen with important sustenance. But I imagine the substantive rivalry endures.

Q: Basically the consul general in Jerusalem is ambassador to a hostile power.

LAROCCO: He's a representative to a non-state authority. It's a bit like AIT in the sense that he or she represents U.S. interests to an authority that is not recognized as having sovereign status. The U.S. has always aspired to be an honest broker to the two, and while many will argue this is not possible because of deeply rooted special relationship with Israel and Israelis, the Palestinians to this day recognize that we are the only power that can get them what they aspire to. It's a unique set of circumstances, and while there are some unwritten, recognized rules of the game, there is still a good deal of ad hoc-ery in how we carry out these relations.

Rahm Emmanuel predicts Netanyahu victory over Peres

A few months before that, in the run up to the Israeli elections, we still believed Peres would win, even by as much as 8 points. Keep in mind that following Rabin's death, he held a 25 point lead in the polls. As the months wore on, that lead eroded slowly but steadily day after day.

I recall that Washington, favoring Peres strongly, sent a young Democratic political guru by the name of Rahm Emmanuel to provide an independent assessment. The visit was totally unpublicized and I accompanied him on a number of calls. I remember clearly that just before his departure, I asked him for his thoughts on the election. Peres will lose, he said. I was startled. Why? I asked. He said that Peres leaned too far for Jewish Israeli votes and had been portraying a hard line that both the Israeli Arabs and those in the center were uncomfortable with. He's trying too hard, Emmanuel noted, to capture the center right. It won't work. He forecast that Peres would likely lose by a narrow margin, perhaps 2 percent or less.

Peres lost by 2 percent of the vote. I remember that Martin held a country team meeting the day before the election. He went around the table asking for our guesses. We were completely split. Martin himself felt that Peres would win, perhaps by an even larger margin than the 2 percent many Israeli pundits were forecasting. Martin, I and others stayed up all night following the vote. Peres held a strong lead in the early results, but that lead kept narrowing. After midnight, it had vanished, and Netanyahu's margin was clearly insurmountable.

Peres once again was a tragic figure, and when Martin and I called on him a few days later, he was all alone in his dimly lit office. He blamed the Arabs for their low turnout. He had lost by about 29,000 votes, as I recall, and that could have easily been overcome if more Israeli-Arabs had come to the polls. Rahm Emmanuel called it correctly two months before the election.

A special tribute to the late Ron Brown, Secretary of Commerce

While I have countless stories to tell about those three eventful years in Israel, there is one that I wish to relate because I am sure it has never been revealed. As I have noted, we received literally thousands of American VIPs during those three years. Among them, while I was Charge, was the Secretary of Commerce, Ron Brown. I knew nothing about him, and was bracing for a prima donna based on his obnoxious advance team.

Brown arrived with a full agenda of commercial work, but just before his arrival, there was a terrorist bombing that left a number of young Israeli soldiers dead. Ron said he would like to visit one of the families, if possible. I contacted the Prime Minister's office, expecting a no answer in view of the sensitivities, but instead they offered a family down south not far from the western border with Gaza. Ron immediately agreed. I recall the ride down there with him as most enjoyable. I could feel immediately that he had a way of empathizing and sympathizing that made anyone he was with feel special, like you were the only person in his universe.

We arrived at the modest home, and were escorted in the living room. We sat on a couch, across from the mother and father of the young soldier who had died. Ron stayed quiet, they stayed quiet, and the silence was so discomfiting. Who would break the ice? And how? Ron did, and so touchingly. He noticed a scrap book on a nearby table. He asked if he could look at it. Rather than just take it, he pulled a chair between the mother and father and went through it page by page, picture by picture. The feeling in the room was like nothing I had ever experienced. His connection with these grieving parents was profound and intimate.

At one point, he pointed to a photo of the young man with a young lady. The mother said this was her son's fiancée. They were to be married in three weeks. It turned out that the young lady was also in the house, and she came out to meet with Ron. Once again, there was an instant rapport. It was so hard not to become overwhelmed with emotion, feeling the scarring pain these parents and this young lady were enduring. Terrorism at that moment seemed like the devil incarnate to me.

Ron and I went on to Jerusalem for meetings that day. We said nothing in the car on the ride there. Our emotions were too high.

Late that evening, after meetings concluded and a formal dinner had concluded, Ron asked if I would take him to the Western Wall to pray. I told him we cannot take VIP visitors there; it's off limits because of the high political sensitivities. It was simply too volatile. He just stared at me for a while, and I simply couldn't say no to him. OK, I will take you there, but we must do this as inconspicuously as possible. No photos, no talk, just go to the wall, say your prayer and we will go back to the hotel. He agreed.

We went to the wall plaza and I showed him where to go and what to do. I gave him a kipa to wear. I always carried one with me. He quietly walked to the wall, prayed for a while and then headed back to where I was standing. As we chatted for a minute, a man came up to us dressed in religious garb. He said he thought he recognized Ron from photos in the newspaper the previous day. Ron acknowledged who he was. The man grasped Ron's hands and said: so many VIPs from countries come here for the photo opportunity. I know what they are doing, and I detest them. They do not respect what this means to us. You came to pray. Just to pray. I admire you for this gesture, and being the only here to see and recognize your act, convey the sincerest thanks of all my brethren. I will pray for you all the years of my life. Ron simply bowed in respect.

My few days with Ron Brown were enough to hit me hard when he died in a plane crash a year or so later. I always remind myself of him when I pass judgment on politicians and leaders whom I really don't know but think I do from media reports. We truly don't know these people from the media. I sincerely believe that Ron would have gone on to do truly great things had he lived. We lost an American treasure.

During one of the many Christopher visits, the team from Washington was assembled at Martin's place for a late night discussion after a day full of meetings. Before they started the session, Martin asked me to stay outside the meeting room. I was a bit miffed, but Martin had an inexplicable twinkle in his eye. About ten minutes later, he emerged with the Secretary and his counselor, Tom Donilon. I was asked by Christopher what I wanted to do for my next assignment. He said you did a good job here. You are up for an ambassadorship. What would you like? Without hesitating, I said, Kuwait. They all laughed. Why do you want to go to Kuwait?

I said that I knew Kuwait, I liked it, it was a key strategic ally, but just as important, it was country where the ambassador does not have to worry about phone calls between Washington and the leaders. Nobody in Washington calls anybody in Kuwait, so I will be the full and complete envoy handling the relationship. I will be extraordinary and plenipotentiary in the original meaning of those words applied to envoys. They laughed. If that's what you want, so be it. Thinking fast on my feet, I noted that it would not be open for another year, so I have another request: I want another year of Arabic. On the one hand, I need some time to decompress after Tel Aviv so I can be with my young family, but I also need to refresh my Arabic and take it to a higher level. Donilon said he would ensure this happened, and it did.

JOSEPH G. SULLIVAN
Co-Chairman, Israel-Lebanon Monitoring Group
Washington (1997-1998)

Ambassador Sullivan was born and raised in Massachusetts and educated at Tufts, Georgetown and Yale Universities. Entering the Foreign Service in 1970, he served in the Department of State in Washington, D.C. as well as in posts abroad. His foreign posts include Mexico City, Lisbon, Tel Aviv and Havana. Mr. Sullivan served as US Ambassador to Angola from 1998 to 2001 and as Ambassador to Zimbabwe from 2001 to 2004. Ambassador Sullivan was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2009.

Q: Well the nice thing about it is as career opportunities these things don't get solved.

SULLIVAN: That's right.

Q: Then you are off to the peace and tranquility of the Middle East.

SULLIVAN: Right, exactly.

Q: I can't remember had you served there before?

SULLIVAN: I served four years in Israel in the mid-eighties and so this return to the Middle East was as co-chairman of the Israel-Lebanon Monitoring Group it was called.

Q: You were there from when to when?

SULLIVAN: From approximately July of 1997 until approximately May of 1998. There had been one prior American co-chair, David Greenlee, who had had it for the first year and technically we ended up swapping jobs. He came back to Haiti to be the Haiti special coordinator, while I went out there and did the co-chairman of this monitoring group.

Q: Okay, what was the status of the Middle East Arab-Israeli situation when you got there in May or June of '97?

SULLIVAN: Okay, when I got there, Netanyahu was prime minister. There were peace American process efforts underway with Dennis Ross, the special negotiator, and we used to meet periodically. When I would be back in Washington I would consult with Dennis and give him a briefing on what we had been doing on our part. His focus, of course, was overwhelmingly the core countries and only occasionally focused on Lebanon but was anxious that the situation not flare up again. The agreement on the monitoring group had actually been reached prior to Netanyahu becoming Prime Minister. The agreement in April of 1996 in the course of what had been called the Grapes of Wrath Operation by the Israeli government into South Lebanon was in retribution for missiles fired into Northern Israel. In the course of the operation, the Israelis had launched shells which wound hitting Palestinian refugees taking shelter in the shadow of a UN camp in Q-A-N-A and resulted in the death of I believe a hundred people. The Palestinians were from refugee camps nearby and had clustered around the U.N. compound in hopes of avoiding getting hit in what was an ongoing series of battles between Israeli and Lebanese forces, Hezbollah really. The incident created an international furor.

Secretary Christopher had gone out and negotiated an agreement with all sides and that resulted in a ceasefire agreement/understanding in April of '96. The understanding provided for establishing the monitoring group with the participation of the Syrians, the Lebanese and the Israeli's. This Israeli's and the Lebanese were the signatory parties to the agreement but the Syrians were also going to be present in the monitoring group. The French had sort of pushed their way into being co-chair and actually I must say that the French were very careful in choosing their representatives as people who got along with Americans. The French representatives were reasonable diplomats but the French always had a certain interest in protecting the Lebanese government. That said, the French and the US found ways to work together.

Q: Did you deal with both the Arab side and the Israeli side?

SULLIVAN: Yes, and how the process was set up, I think my first trip out I accompanied David Greenlee in his last session. It was virtually weekly but there was always a complaint by one side or the other that the other side had violated the understanding. Most often the Lebanese side would complain that the Israelis had violated the understanding by shelling near a civilian village and the Israelis would occasionally complain as well that there had been a firing that had gone into northern Israel. The actual attacks on the Lebanese side were carried out by Hezbollah. So we would meet virtually every week to deal with the one or several complaints. Often, if there was one complaint, the other side would file its complaint in effect in response. We would have to reach an understanding among all the sides in the course of however long it took. Sometimes it would take as short as ten or twelve hours and sometimes it would take four or five days. It was not predictable and it didn't always correlate to the seriousness of the incident. In some ways, I think the Lebanese were interested in using the mechanism to demonstrate that the Lebanese government and the Lebanese army, that was the lead representative in the room, was taking care of the civilian population in the area and they would sometimes hold on to a point a very long time, even though it was a relatively minor incident that didn't result in any casualties. Some portion of this also reflected Lebanese politics vis-à-vis Hezbollah.

The Israelis, of course, had an overall view that if they fired at a target, it was because they had received fire from that target and that in most cases the villages that were being complained about had long been abandoned and the houses therein were being used as shields by the people firing at them. It was a weekly enterprise, sometimes relatively easily resolved and other times not very easily. Sometimes, we would think that there never would be the required agreement among the parties. In at least one case, the conflict escalated to the degree that there was indeed firing into Israel with several katyushas launched into Israel and had some very substantial action by Israel inside south Lebanon.

At the end of the day, I would conclude that both sides had at that point an interest in maintaining the accord; both of them got something out of it. The Lebanese had at that point been able to avoid major Israeli operations within south Lebanon for several years, although the Israelis continued to support the south Lebanese army which was their proxy Lebanese force in the region, comprised mostly of Christians. The Israelis could conclude that they had largely avoided katyusha firing into northern Israel. So although both sides complained mightily that the other side was being provocative and not respecting the accord, at the end of the day they wanted to reach some understanding. Our final phrase at the end of every meeting would be that both sides would commit to full respect for the understanding in the future, at least until the next time. Because the agreement of both sides was required in the final statement, only rarely was there clear identification of one side or the other for having violated the understanding in those communiqué's. One might find shading in one or another direction that would indicate that, but not direct sharp language because then both sides would not be able to agree to on a communiqué.

I think it did set the tone when relatively shortly after that when Ehud Barak came to power as the Israeli prime minister, he decided to withdraw all troops withdraw support for the south Lebanese army and end the Israeli effort to maintain a security zone inside South Lebanon. It was perhaps in one sense a conclusion after the experience with the understandings that it wasn't necessary to have proxy forces in the region and that they could accomplish their objectives in other ways. But, the major clash with Hezbollah several years ago demonstrated the risks of not having a proxy South Lebanese army there to protect their interests. The small U.S. and French delegations were based in Cyprus, a neutral location. We would travel to a UNIFIL Headquarters in south Lebanon in a UN facility to have the meetings. But I did travel on two occasions to Beirut, Damascus and Jerusalem and Tel Aviv to have discussions with the governments. Of course, predictable things were said, but the most memorable discussion to me was the statement by the Lebanese army Commander that the Lebanese Army was anxious to resume control of all parts of Lebanon and would deploy to the border if the Israelis were to withdraw their support for the south Lebanese army. Despite his words, this remained a question and when Israel withdrew its support for the South Lebanese army, Hezbollah filled behind those positions and the Lebanese National army did not challenge Hezbollah. So this created the conditions for periodic clashes and on one occasion quite a significant conflict in the following years.

So that's about it on that other than to say you know it was an amicable relationship on most of our parts, although the Lebanese and the Syrian representatives virtually never spoke to the Israeli representatives outside the formal meeting room. We all had pretty Spartan quarters with one outer room and one back bedroom for each delegation. So on those sessions that lasted multiple days, our delegation would have to trade off taking naps. The Syrian representative who was a military officer enjoyed his role of most times not being actively in the acrimony between the Israeli and Lebanese sides, but eventually being the final arbiter on the Lebanese position. He would encourage us to come to him to help resolve any major issues and would take some pride behind the scenes in telling the Lebanese representative to accept the compromise positions that the French and American co-chairmen had put forward.

I'll note another interesting piece of history in view of current developments in Syria. This same Syrian General used to speak to us, the French and American delegations, of Syria's effective suppression of what he described as Muslim fundamentalists in Hama in 1982, a government action reported to have killed some 20,000 residents of Hama. The Syrian General stated that the Syrian Government's action had helped assure that Syria did not have "the fundamentalist problem" that other Arab governments had.

I should add one other incident during my time in this position. During one of my two trips to Beirut for meetings with the Lebanese government, we traveled to Mount Lebanon to meet with the Prime Minister, the late Rafiq Hariri. His was one of the few Muslim houses on Mount Lebanon and looked down on most of the Christian houses on the mountain. Well in the course of our conversation, one of my team members asked a question that would have required a delicate response regarding Syria. Hariri looked at the phone by his side and said that he would answer the question, but not there. So he walked to the far side of the room with us following and answered the question. Several years later, Hariri was assassinated in a car bombing.
