EARL PACKER
Clerk
Petrograd, Volgograd, and Riga (1917-1922)

Earl Packer was born in Utah in 1894. His career in the Foreign Service included positions in the Soviet Union, Hungary, the United Kingdom (Ireland), Turkey, Burma, and Tunisia. Mr. Packer was interviewed by Paul McCusker on October 27, 1988.S

Q: As of today, 94 years old, how did a young fellow born in Utah wind up in the Foreign Service?

PACKER: Well, it's a great story. I was born in a middle class family, and we didn't have too much money. I was the youngest of five sons, and after completing high school in Ogden I had a variety of jobs, which lasted until I got the results of a civil service examination for a clerical job in one of the government departments in Washington. And that resulted in my going to Washington in 1915, and taking a job there in the Bureau of Insular Affairs, in the War Department. It was in a clerical capacity.

Well, I'd been with them approximately a year, until there came, to the State Department, a telegram from Ambassador Francis, in Petrograd, asking for a couple of male stenographic clerks. The appointment clerk in the State Department came to the chief clerk of the Bureau of Insular Affairs and said, "Do you have anybody who would like to go to Petrograd?"

A friend and I talked the thing over, and we put our bid in, and shortly we were on our way to Petrograd. And we got there in time to be present at the time of the Bolshevik Revolution, in 1917 -- November 7, Western style calendar.

Q: Excuse me, Earl. When you first went there, wasn't it still called St. Petersburg?

PACKER: No, I think not. I think they had already changed it to Petrograd.

Q: I see.

PACKER: Well, in a short time the embassy decided to leave Petrograd and go east, and settled in a little provincial capital called Vologda. In the meantime, there were changes in the staff of the embassy proper, and a military mission was created; the head of which was General Judson. He was a colonel, but he was quickly promoted to a Brigadier General.

Q: Why did we have a military mission?

PACKER: We had come into the war, and it was considered desirable -- from a military point of view -- to have this mission created. It was called The American Military Mission to Russia. The job of being a clerk in the military mission came up, and it led -- in due course -- to my being commissioned as a first lieutenant of infantry, United States National Army (USNA).

From Vologda, as things progressed badly for Russia -- on the western front -- the decision of the allies was that intervention should occur, with a view to preventing the deterioration of Russia, as an ally of the Western powers, against Germany. A military expedition was sent into Archangel, and the embassy moved from Vologda to Archangel.

Then, of course, the development of the war on the western front eventually led to the peace, and the withdrawal of American forces from Russia. There was also some sort of intervention in South Russia, the details of which I don't remember. And at Vladivostok, as well as at Murmansk.

Q: Now, the U.S. was not fighting against Germany in Russia, was it? What was the purpose of the mission?

PACKER: The purpose of the mission -- looking at it from the point of view of Washington -- could only have been to somehow keep Russia active as long as possible in the war. But the military mission actually wasn't -- in my opinion -- a great success, because the Russian armed forces were not able to prevent the creation of a Soviet government, which put the Kerensky government out of commission. I would say it was a rather unexpected development, from the point of view of the American organization in Petrograd -- and later in Vologda; likewise in North Russia, in Archangel.

Q: Did you go to Archangel, or did you stay?

PACKER: In the military mission itself there was the general, two colonels, two captains -- one of whom was a National Army officer. He was of American-Russian extraction; his father was in business, and he was in business with his father until this opportunity came to get a commission in the National Army, and become a member of the military mission.

Q: Well, you were there -- in Russia -- at the time the Revolution was going on. Wasn't living difficult for you?

PACKER: Yes and no. We had no family there. Well, I think Prince . . . I don't remember when he got married. We somehow found quarters -- a house; and some of us lived in the house. Some of us were able to get living quarters with a Russian family. And we ran a mess at the military mission, for our own personnel. And we had Russian help there -- in the mission -- to look after the purchase of food, the preparation of food, the serving of food, and so forth.

Q: Okay, let's try another approach. What were your biggest problems, Earl, during that period? Was it being out of touch with the United States?

PACKER: Well, we could buy stuff on the local market, which the Russian people on the staff took care of. And the actual serving of food was arranged. We had Prince -- because he was absolutely perfect in his Russian. His mother was Russian, his father was American. He had a good deal to say about how the mission's Russian staff worked.

Colonel Stewart was the officer in charge of the military expedition to Russia. And Stewart, and our Colonel Ruggels -- who was a regular Army officer -- was in close touch with the military expedition. And there was, of course, a possibility of telegraphic correspondence, and written correspondence, sent through couriers set up by the embassy, to enable messages to go for information purposes, to Washington via use of commercial telegraph services.

Q: So you did have constant communication possibilities?

PACKER: Yes, they were quite handy. And then, of course, the diplomatic side was handled by Ambassador Francis and his staff. He had two or three secretaries -- first secretary, second, and so forth.

Q: Earl, you were carried then as an assistant military attaché?

PACKER: I was made an assistant to the military attaché. As I recall, for some technical reason they had to put the 'to' in there because . . . probably it related to appropriations.

Q: But actually you were a lieutenant, at that time?

PACKER: First lieutenant of infantry, U.S.N.A.

Q: And that was attached to the embassy at Petrograd.

PACKER: Initially in Petrograd, and then went to Vologda, and then to Archangel. Then when the war was over, why, we were all withdrawn.

Q: And you went then to Washington?

PACKER: Then I went back to Washington. I was demobilized. Then I was offered a job in the State Department, with. . . I don't know what it was called; I don't remember. The biographic sketch may show what my title was.

Q: It just shows that you were appointed as a Foreign Service officer and a vice-consul in 1920.

PACKER: When I got settled on this job in the State Department, I resumed my studies at George Washington. In 1921 I got my A.B. In the meantime, I had taken the consular examination. I think there are some mistakes in that State Department Register record, but my recollections are not sufficiently firm to make any changes, really.

Q: Well, obviously because of your experience in Russia, you were assigned to the Division of Russian Affairs.

PACKER: Yes, it seems to me that initially we were an office in the Division of Near Eastern Affairs. And then the Russian division was created. I became, in due course, the assistant chief of the Division of Russian Affairs. Many years later the Division of Eastern European Affairs was created in the Department; and it seems to me I had my initial assignment up to the Baltic States in that period -- before the Division of Eastern European Affairs was created.

Q: That's what the biographic register shows, in fact. But it was 1922 when you were posted to Riga.

PACKER: That is correct. But you see, at that time we hadn't recognized the Baltic States as independent, so they had the . . . some special title there.

Q: Office of American Commissioner, I think.

PACKER: Yes. A fellow named John A. Gade was the commissioner.

Q: But you arrived, in Riga, sent there by the State Department?

PACKER: Then I was sent up to Tallinn, to take charge of the consulate up there; the regular man was off on leave.

Q: How did you get along in Tallinn? Was it difficult for you there?

PACKER: No, I found there was a functioning office, with a Russian girl clerk. And there was an American clerk. I was the only person -- at that time -- with officer status, in Tallinn. And I found the Estonians very pleasant people to work with; until a new full consul was sent out to take charge of the office, and I was ordered back to Riga.

Moscow (1938-1940)

Edward R. Pierce was born in Lexington, Mississippi and raised in Washington, DC. After working in the US Patent Office and attending Strayer College and George Washington University, he took a clerical job in the Foreign Service in 1937. Pierce held positions in Germany, Italy, Washington, DC, and the Bahamas. Pierce was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: You arrived in Moscow in November of 1938. Were you given any briefing when you got to Moscow about security precautions and all that? Was there concern about compromising American personnel or things that could get you into trouble, or things like that?

PIERCE: Actually, no. I knew a lot. See, between the time I was told I was going to Moscow, and I actually left, I knew several people back in the State Department who had served in Moscow. See, the embassy opened in '34, actually '33, but we didn't have anybody in there. They had to staff it. So they sent at least two or three code people from up in David Salomon's outfit.

A couple had come back, one of them had quit or been fired, or something. To be frank with you, there appeared to be an awful lot of homosexuality.

Q: It's interesting, and this is what is known today as politically incorrect, but it does seem that within the code business, and the communications business, many of the people who were involved in this were sort of loners.

PIERCE: They were the ones who were good at it.

Q: It wasn't necessarily just plain homosexuality. They were sort of loners. In a way, they were different than you might say the more gregarious other people, which made them more susceptible, I think.

PIERCE: It's a filthy story, I'm telling you. It's never been told. I know some things I'm not even going to tell you. But the reason is, I'm not sure to this day...the actual people are dead. The clock's taken care of most of them. But who's left behind? They're covering up. Now you can cut some of this out, if you want.

Q: No, we'll leave it here.

PIERCE: There's no question...I wasn't going to do this, but I'm going to show you a picture. You can draw your own conclusions. You see, when you talk about stuff like this, you begin to talk about people who are considered to be icons. When you attack an icon, any fool knows, you're liable to get hurt because most people would say, "Imagine that jerk talking about so-and-so." Truth of the matter is, the absolute facts, the truth has been covered up for 50 years. Fifty years. It's still being covered up. Because all this talk about documents coming out into the open, you know, is carefully managed. There's a lot of them that are not going to know.

Q: What are we talking about, we're talking about the '38 to '40 period. What is this we're talking about?

PIERCE: Well, we're talking about flatly, treason. I mean, you ask me if there were really instructions given to me on security, vulnerability from women, and stuff like that. All that's been going on, you know, for 2,000 years.

Q: But when you go to a place where you know the NKVD [Narodni Kommissariat Vnutrennykh Del - People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs - Soviet secret police] was trapping people...I would think somebody would say, "Watch out for this."

PIERCE: It's a very strange thing, and you ask a very good question. I guess it was assumed that everybody knew it. Certainly I knew it. But maybe I was more educated in the State Department world. But the same applies to any country. You hear it all the time. I mean, Jack Kennedy was supposed to have been involved with some German woman, stuff like that. Let me show you this...

Q: You're saying that William Bullitt supposedly selected his staff. He was the first ambassador there, and he had...because I didn't have the tape on...they were...

PIERCE: ...a weird bunch. A couple of them straight off the Left Bank in Paris. I'm telling you! Well, it's a wonder I wasn't stepped on and squashed long ago.

Q: When you went out there what was your position?

PIERCE: I was a clerk.

Q: All right, there were other clerks who were probably putting you into the picture, weren't they? When you got there, they would say, "You know, watch out for so and so."

PIERCE: Yes, right. Maybe it was my fault. I think I sort of felt I knew more than most of them, anyway. I'd been around longer, and from an early age, and so on and so forth. I'll tell you, even if you were there, staring at it day after day, it really doesn't... Certain things happened later on.

Q: What was the atmosphere at the embassy?

PIERCE: Very strange. It was wintertime when I first got there. Gloomy. The sun comes up at ten in the morning, sets at four in the afternoon. Everybody drank a lot. Anybody who was inclined to drink that was the worst place to send them. There was no organized social life for anybody but the top echelon at the embassy. Everybody else was left on their own. I'm telling you it was really strange. Well, I'm not going to say too much, but there were people there who had been there since the embassy opened. You understand? This is more than four years. Moscow was a hardship post. You're not supposed to spend more than 18 months there. How did these people remain all this time? It wasn't because they were forced to. It's because they wanted to, and somebody wanted them to be there.

Q: You pointed out up above....yes.

PIERCE: Absolutely. There they were. Nobody over a period of time...it was like going into the Army and getting kicked around in boot camp...you don't have a chance. They've got ways of making you miserable, keeping you busy. I'm telling you. I'm probably, I'm not proud of it at all...I'm probably the only clerk that ever went there that had the background to be observant and the tenacity to hang on and be observant and the good friends... since I was 18 years old back in the States...to keep me on the payroll in spite of some efforts to do anything at all...disgrace me and what not. These people were vicious.

Q: Let's talk about this. We're talking basically right now...what type of things were happening, socially...?

PIERCE: The social life was left up to the individual. If you were interested, let's say, in ballet, or music, or something, you could keep really busy there in Moscow. If you were interested in athletics, you could go to ski and ice skate, and do this and do that. But there was no meeting place for, say, a young man like me, American, 27 years old to go and meet nice girls. So you didn't meet any nice girls. You met some bad ones. You had to presume that they were reporting immediately to the secret police, because if they didn't they'd be out in Siberia.

Q: Did you have the feeling...I talked to somebody who was there somewhat later and said there was a hierarchy of I think they're called "sparrows." That if you were at the very top you sort of ended up with a ballet dancer and then you moved down by rank. But you were pretty much aware that these were young ladies who either were assigned to you or if you became acquainted with them they very soon had to make their deals with the NKVD.

PIERCE: Without any question. You had to presume that. But everybody knew that.

Q: Did it make any difference? I would think there would be the normal male/female liaisons.

PIERCE: Absolutely. In these homosexual cases, God knows what they were doing. I had a girlfriend. Not right after I got there. I met her at the Metropole Hotel in a bar or something. I believe she worked for one of the government agencies right around the Kremlin there somewhere. From all appearances, she'd be like some girl you'd meet over at Annandale or Falls Church. But you had to know...it just made sense that...She never asked any questions. But she didn't have to because I would go out with her, and there would be a couple of other guys and their girlfriends, there's bound to be some talk back and forth. You know, they had a number of cases involving these Marines.

Q: We're talking about in the '80s.

PIERCE: Yes.

Q: At that time they had 12 Marines?

PIERCE: Yes. The Marines seemed to think that ordinary rules didn't apply to them. Of course, they didn't. I'll tell you why. Right up to the top everybody was hiding something. A guy like Bohlen, I have a lot of respect for Bohlen, I think Bohlen was one of the very few clean-living men in that embassy, in the sense that he was married. But there's such a strange story about how he got married, how about that.

Q: I'm not familiar with that.

PIERCE: You wouldn't believe it.

But, anyway, it was a very strange setup, and designed to discourage anybody, rapidly. I came in for special attention from the administrative officer, a man named Angus Ward, who was later on glorified for his activities out in Manchuria.

Q: He was incarcerated for more than a year, as consul general in Manchuria, and later ambassador to Afghanistan. He was an odd duck.

PIERCE: He was never incarcerated. Blockaded for a bit. From what I understand now, and I'm not bragging. It was a set up. He was a Soviet agent and they used that stratagem to get him out of nowhere into somewhere and it worked. He's one of the ones they shuffled out of Moscow. They sent him to Vladivostok and they had to invent an office for him because there was none there. They sent him out of Moscow to save his butt.

Q: What was he doing in Moscow?

PIERCE: He was an agent, I'm sure. His record was this: His name was Angus Ivan Ward. His mother was Russian, came from Canada. Came to the States, served a brief time in the U.S. Army, got hurt somehow on a motorcycle. He became an American citizen, went with the food relief people over there in 1919, got fluent in Russian, wound up marrying a Finnish woman. Then he eased his way into the Foreign Service because of his language, and there he was. He was one of the ones that Bullitt took in from Paris who was still there in 1938 working away. I'm going to find this picture. If I've talked this much, I might as well show it to you. You're kind of going to have to use your judgment. I don't care. Because I know I'm on sound ground.

Q: What makes you think that there were a group of Soviet agents, Americans, in the embassy?

PIERCE: It was discovered. You never heard of it, did you? It's a 50-year miracle. It's the darndest story. If it breaks loose, it might be the biggest story in a long, long, time. But I heard it so long ago that I'm probably the only one still around that really has a good enough memory.

Q: How did this come to your attention?

PIERCE: Would you turn that thing off?

Q: We'll quit at this point. We're talking about your time in Moscow and what I would like to do is cover the A-N-T-H-E-I-L, Anthel, Henry...to talk about that case in some detail. What you know about that. Then I would also like to talk about some of the other elements within the embassy. You say you felt there was a certain amount of hostility and there were cliques and all that, let's talk more about that. Then what your impression was of some of the people there, I guess Kennan, Bullitt, Bohlen. Was Llewellyn Thompson there, too?

PIERCE: He'd gone.

Q: Then more about life there and what you were getting from other people regarding the events in the Soviet Union at that particular time. Particularly as the war started.

***

Let me make my announcement here. Today is the sixth of April 1998. Let's start. You were talking about this case, the Anthel case.

PIERCE: This whole thing has so many ramifications. I have gotten immersed in it, more or less, over the years. There's one ramification represented by that board there, with all those pictures.

PIERCE: That's wartime.

Q: So we're sticking to Moscow.

PIERCE: This is the best thing I have. I wish I had more. We had a fire in this house here about 25 years ago and lost a lot of stuff. This is, as you can see...

Q: October 1938.

PIERCE: Rather gloomy-looking picture. It was a gloomy place at that time. I'm not in this picture. I arrived there a month later.

Q: That would be November.

PIERCE: November 1938. At this time the embassy had been open, actually working, since 1934. The United States, Roosevelt, recognized Russia in 1933, and immediately appointed William Bullitt as our first ambassador to Russia. Gave him carte blanche in selecting his personnel which was, of course, tremendously important, etc. Bullitt charged right in, [from] all accounts. I met him a couple of times, but at his rank and at mine, it was just, of course, shaking hands at some cocktail party, or something. Very enthusiastic man, a brilliant man, but also very flawed. A fact which was successfully covered up. Like so many things get covered up. This picture, when I got there in November 1938, just beginning the winter of '38-'39...this man was ambassador.

Q: You're pointing in the picture to Joseph Davies.

PIERCE: This lady sitting here in the front row where all the ladies are...How many of them are there...one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight women, and I would say approximately 30 men. Unfortunately, about one third of them were homosexuals. No question about it. She was highly publicized at that time as the richest woman in the world.

Q: Mrs. Davies.

PIERCE: Marjorie Post Davies. Everybody's eating Post Toasties so they know about that. Here's Joe Davies, the ambassador, who really got famous for his book called Mission to Moscow. The word is, and I believe it, that he wrote about 10 words in the whole book. He didn't even trouble to learn a few words of Russian. He hated the place because she hated it. From all accounts she had all that wealth and they owned the biggest yacht in the world, which they kept moored up at St. Petersburg...

Q: "Leningrad" in those days...

PIERCE: ...and also down on the Black Sea at Odessa. They traveled down there. They spent little time in Moscow. This is the group that was there when I got there. I did not pick Moscow as a place to go to. Because I had been in the State Department, as I think I had told you before, for a long time and I know lots of people who had been in Moscow, clerks, that is, who served in that period between 1934 and when Bullitt arrived with his entourage, and the time when I got there, and everybody says, "Terrible place to go to," but I think I explained it to you...

Q: You did go into how you got assigned there.

PIERCE: So Davies was there but this man was actually running the embassy: Alexander Kirk. A career diplomat. Very smooth type of man, who'd you expect to be high up in the diplomatic service, and also very wealthy. His family, according to all the gossip among the clerks... God knows the gossip there was the time for that, because there wasn't much else to do... He was worth $15-$20 million. He was the sole heir to the Sweetheart Soap Company, a big soap company out in Colorado. Anyway, here's Kirk, Davies, Kirk... this is Lloyd Henderson. Now there's no reason for me to be reticent about these things. There's a room down in the State Department named for him. I feel that he was a traitor and a spy and a lot of other bad things, homosexual besides. There are a lot of fake marriages in here. Henderson's wife is in here somewhere. Here's Bohlen's wife. Here's Mrs. Davies. Ward's wife.

PIERCE: Yes, there is. He's a bully. Everything else, despicable, but there he was. Now he and Henderson got into the Foreign Service by the side door. Which was the food relief program. Angus Ward was born in Canada. His mother was Russian. His name was Angus Ivan Ward. He crossed the frontier into the United States in World War I. Enlisted in the Army, did well, he'd probably make a good soldier, he had some vicious qualities that would make him good at that. He moved up in the Army, became a lieutenant, and became naturalized. He was a naturalized American citizen. No children, it was a fake marriage all over, as many of these marriages are.

I'm telling you the honest truth. These people had no children. Except for the Bohlens, there isn't a couple, and the ambassador and his wife, I think they had a couple of children...nobody had a child. It was a set-up. Regular technique. Ward was married to a Finnish woman. This man here, Chipman, Norris Chipman, was married to a Greek woman. Henderson was married to a Latvian woman but not at this time. That fake marriage occurred later. Kirk never made a pretense to be anything but a homosexual. This is Colonel Thamesville. Called the "Red Colonel" by some. A man named Grumman, etc. Now if I'm bouncing around, and you think I'm too harsh on these things, I'm just telling you what I think.

Q: But that's what we're doing in this oral history. How did this atmosphere affect the work of the embassy?

PIERCE: From my level, which was a clerk...and Ward immediately made me his private clerk, sat right outside his office...but the purpose of that was simply to have a good chance to criticize everything I did. Actually, I was the second best typist in that whole embassy. This man here, named Presley, who was a communist I now know, had lived in Paris on the Left Bank for a long time and was married at one time to Catherine Ann Porter, the author, who wrote Ship of Fools and that sort of thing. Presley was an extremely able office worker. But I determined later, just to my own satisfaction, that [he] was second best. But Ward, I couldn't do anything right for Ward, because his intent was to break my spirit and send me home with my tail between my legs.

Q: Why do you think he did that?

PIERCE: Well, do you really want to hear it?

Q: Sure.

PIERCE: It's the most childish thing in a way that you could possibly think of. There I was working in the State Department from age 18, trying to move up from the position of messenger... See that building there, of course...

Q: You have a picture of the old Department of State.

PIERCE: Well, I knew every room in that building from the basement up. I began in the mail room. Where else do you start when you're 18 years old? I worked every floor in that building out of the mail room. We had it split into three floors to service. The fourth floor, we took turns on that, that was where all the files were, you know. We used to go across the street the west wing of the White House all the time. There was no formality in those days. There was hardly any security at all. Amazing when you think back, but don't forget, this was a different Washington. Anyway, I knew every room in that building, every body, practically, there were only 600 people. From Cordell Hull on down. Of course, Kellogg was Secretary when I first went in there. Well, in any case, here I was, a messenger. I worked up a bit. I got to be a clerk, Class One, so on and so forth. I think I explained this to you before. Somebody got the bright idea about 1931 or '32, '33, of forming a Department of State Recreation Association.

Q: I think you went into that.

PIERCE: I went into that...the tennis. You asked me why Ward was picking on me. They ran the tennis, and I won it three times in a row. I'm not bragging, but I was a very good tennis player and besides I was young. A man named Robert Kelly...I went through this before, was great friends with John Forrest Simmons, who really, I thought... the best high-ranking Foreign Service officer I ever met who was a decent guy. The rest of them were snobs, or this or that or the other thing, in my opinion. Kelly donated the cup exactly...somewhat like that...even bigger..it's up at my daughter's place. Kelly donated the cup assuming that Jack Simmons was going to win it because he'd been the captain of the Princeton tennis team. The champion of the Ivy League, singles. But I beat him, I won the cup. Apparently that made me a great many friends among the clerks, but it certainly made me enemies of a certain group of...particularly Kelly. I found out many years later, from Mildred Dykie, who was the keeper of all secrets in the Foreign Service Personnel Division...one of these nice little old ladies who knows everything, never talks... She felt compelled to tell me years later after I won that tennis tournament the chief clerk, Percy Allen, rewarded me by sending me out to Egypt on a conference...

Q: You mentioned all that.

PIERCE: Yes, I mentioned all that. I earned the hatred of Kelly, there's no question about it. It sounds very petty, and it is very petty, but under certain circumstances it could be a pain in the neck, too. Kelly wrote a personal letter. Here's what happened. I came back from Egypt. I thought the Foreign Service was just the greatest thing in the world, and it had been out in Egypt. I applied for a job right down the hall in the Foreign Personnel Division, and the first thing I know I had gotten a notice to come down there, they told me I was going to Moscow. I was hoping to go to Paris, Madrid, Rio, you know.

Q: Can I stop...[tape interrupted]

PIERCE: ...working right under Ward's nose and it's very difficult, and I'd do this perfect work, and he'd mark it up and I'd have to do it over. I figured out what he was up to and I made up my mind he wasn't going to run me out of there and I stuck around. Where do you want me to go from here? This is the half of the embassy...

Q: We talked about the case...

PIERCE: Antheil? You're talking about dynamite now because that case has never been exposed, and it may be gone too, because the facts are all there. Here's Antheil right here. As usual, shining the shoes of anybody in authority. There's the ambassador.

Q: He's right next to the ambassador, between Kirk and the ambassador.

PIERCE: There's Henderson. This small fellow is Henry Antheil. There's the ambassador. This also is a rotten egg, a mechanic named Hontowski, who was furnished by the Navy. You had to have somebody around there who could fix things. He was an electrician, do this and all that. There's a story about him, too. This is Colonel Thamesville, who became fairly famous. That's Antheil, okay. Now here is a man you may know the name, and you may not. Tyler Kent.

Q: I've heard the name, but Tyler Kent...

PIERCE: Well, Tyler Kent was a spy. Antheil was a spy. I'm pretty sure Morris Shipman, Ward, of course, a couple others in here. Now here is Charles Bohlen, and here is his wife.

Q: You were mentioning about Antheil and what he was up to.

PIERCE: Here's the thing on Antheil. This is all heavy stuff, but I've got all the papers that I need and I've written up enough of it. Enough people know about it now, it's no big secret. First I'll show you the result of a year and a half...I know some people at State still...trying to find out what the Department...see the Department's covered this up 50 years or more. That's what you get out of the State Department when you ask about Henry Antheil.

Q: You presented me with a form showing he was born 1912 in Trenton New Jersey, his address is there, education, high school in New Jersey two years, languages, German, and started at $780. He applied in 1934, for clerkship. He was sent there in 1934 and transferred to Helsinki in 1939. He died in an airplane explosion June 14, 1940.

PIERCE: That's a great record. That tells you a lot, doesn't it, unless you already knew a lot. They're not going to tell anything. Antheil, first place, he lied on his papers to the State Department. He never went to Rutgers. He was a high school graduate and that's all. He had no skills of any kind. He was twenty-one years old in 1933. Bullitt was given absolute carte blanche by Roosevelt to pick his own people to go to Moscow and that's understandable because it was very important. He picked a group....I don't know how many clerks around him, maybe 12 or 15, the language people like Ward, and Henderson, so on and so forth. Couple of military people like Thamesville and these guys over here. He reached out, Bullitt, from Philadelphia, reached out and grabbed this young man. With no office skills, nothing to recommend him. To go to this vital place just opening up. Furthermore, after they got over there within six months, he designated Henry Antheil, by that time 22 years old, as head code clerk of the United States embassy in Moscow. Now just on the surface it's ridiculous. But nobody noticed it enough or had the nerve to throw it to anybody's attention. Who would you throw it to when the ambassador himself picked this young guy out of Trenton, New Jersey, pushed him over there and made him head code clerk. Antheil's brother it turns out, was George Antheil, at that time a quite famous musician. Heard of him, maybe?

Q: I've heard of the name.

PIERCE: He was famous. He was a member of the Left Bank crowd in the early 1920s in Paris along with Hemingway, F. Scott Fitzgerald, Ezra Pound, so on and so forth. He was also a communist, which was very common in that group. Even Hemingway, you know, had leanings that way. Henry Antheil got the job because of his brother, George, who was a personal friend, perhaps even a homosexual friend, of Bullitt. Both of them were bisexual. Certainly Bullitt was. Anyway, Antheil gets the job. 1934. Here we are in '38 four years later, very, very difficult hardship post. Everybody agreed to that. Nobody wanted to stay in Moscow, particularly the clerks. They had no life. These people...

Q: You're looking at the women. You're pointing to the women. The wives.

PIERCE: Because I'm speaking about social matters now. These people and the career officers had access to the foreign diplomatic colony. They had, you couldn't call it a normal life, at that city at that time, under Stalin, the purge going on, and people getting shot every day around the corner at the Lyublyanka Prison. But at least they had a life, they even had a dacha, a country estate outside of Moscow with a tennis court, a swimming pool, riding horses, this that and the other thing. No clerks were invited out to that place with a couple of notable exceptions. This guy was invited out there to fix the plumbing or anything...

Q: We're pointing to the mechanic...

PIERCE: That's Hontowski. Antheil was a sort of a mascot of the women's group. He was quite young still, when I got there. He'd been there four years, can you imagine? It was a strange life.

Antheil had access to all crannies of it, and he made full use of it. Kent had a good background, well educated. Had gone to Princeton for a while, then he went to the Sorbonne, and he was a linguist, so on and so forth. But he was not in the dacha crowd. The reason I'm stressing this is that dacha features in all the history of this entourage up to this point. Chip Bohlen was an excellent tennis player, I played him several times, always managed to win. He and his wife and a man named Charlie Thayer were the backbone of the dacha crowd. They were all wealthy as far as I could tell, certainly from my standpoint. Thayer, there's a fifty-thousand word story right there. Married his sister off to Bohlen. Did you ever read a book called Eyewitness to History by Charles Bohlen?

Q: Yes.

PIERCE: I'm sure you have good memory. Excuse me if I go wandering off down these paths. Listen, Bohlen in his book Eyewitness to History...I'm telling you, this is one of the things that set me off on what I'm doing. That book is 50% lies. Certainly the Russian part of it is. Bohlen credits a lot of his success, and he had tremendous success, culminated, of course, by being chosen to sit beside Roosevelt at Yalta and all that, to the contacts they maintained out at the dacha, horseback riding, this that and the other thing. There was a man on the staff of the German embassy who I got to know slightly because I was permitted to set foot on the sacred dacha grounds because of my tennis. I was invited out there to play.

If you recall from Eyewitness to History, Bohlen credited a lot of his reporting success out of Moscow at that time to his friendship with Johnny von Herbauer, the German Secretary. He was out there a lot. He was certainly out there...I was only out there four or five times and all the whole time I was there...and it was always to play tennis with Bohlen or somebody else who needed to have a pretty decent player on the court, you know. For instance, Jack Kennedy...we'll talk about that later. Bohlen, cultivated this dangerous, that is, for von Herbauer, that's the way Bohlen portrays it in his book, that Herbauer was actually soft towards the United States and was feeding him all this red hot secret information straight from the Kremlin, straight from Molotov, straight from Stalin. Straight from von Schulenberg, the German ambassador. All of those, von Herbauer would accompany von Schulenberg to the Kremlin and around. Then he'd be out in the dacha, they'd take a ride in the woods. He'd spill all this tremendously important information. You can imagine at that time I'm talking about, which was '39 by this time. Bohlen would then go back to the embassy, get a hold of Steinhardt, the ambassador, and spend the rest of the night... They worked all night, many times. Of course, Stalin did that, too. So everybody in Moscow did it. I was one of the two secretaries who were good enough to do this kind of work. This guy was the other one. Anyway, we'd type the stuff up, super secret, eyes only, for Hull, Wells, and then very carefully take it, guess where?

Q: To the code room.

PIERCE: To the code room. To who? To this little traitor here. Henry Antheil. Who would then...he coded all the "eyes only" stuff himself, and decoded it. Which as we found out later, at least I've determined, gave him complete control of incoming and outgoing that he wanted. He could actually write cables and sign them "Steinhardt." He could see it on the incoming cable, like he did with the ones that ordered him to be transferred to London, not long after I got there.

That's what happened to Bohlen's vaunted cables. I would guess within 12 hours, certainly, actual copies...of course, the codes were gone, compromised up to the ears, and had been for years under Antheil. He would walk across...I've got a picture here somewhere...

Q: Well, it doesn't make any difference because we're doing this on tape.

PIERCE: But I wanted to illustrate to you what would happen. Antheil was a snobby little guy because he had this inside track apparently, with all the top brass. He didn't hesitate to throw his little weight around. He was reputed...he didn't seem to have any Russian women friends like many did, or this that and the other thing. I can't swear up and down. Certainly if he was homosexual, he wasn't an aggressive type, and there were a number who were. Antheil would put his little fur hat on and take an evening stroll across Red Square, you could see from my front windows of the embassy, past Lenin's tomb, then you'd lose sight of him. That's an actual fact. You know where he was going? The British embassy.

I never met the guy. In fact, nobody ever met him, but Antheil had planted the...which had become fact in everybody's mind...that he had a boyfriend over in the British embassy across the river. That's how you got there. How long that was going on? He might not have had such a friend. You see, I never got onto this stuff until after I was out of there. It never occurred to me, but he did brush up friendship with me. Although I know now, he knew perfectly well what was going on, that I was under the gun, and the idea was to get me the hell out of there. There was something about me that worried them. And well, it might have been, if I had learned this stuff earlier, you'd have heard about it earlier.

Anyway, Antheil, would take Bohlen's "eyes only"....of course Steinhardt was a very intelligent man, but he knew nothing about embassy work, and he knew less about Russia. Bohlen was the brains of all of this. Second, I would say, would be Grumman, who I think was a straight guy. Bohlen, Grumman...Chipman was a spy, I'm sure of that. Ward, didn't get into the political work. He was administrative officer. So on and so forth. There were a couple...Henderson of course would get into these cables. But the brains was Bohlen. Here's the point. These cables, jammed with this world-shaking information that we were working all night encoding, not encoding, but typing up and whatnot, and revising, then turned them over to Antheil. Those cables had been compromised for at least three or four years. The coding meant nothing.

I'm going to jump ahead. To June 14, 1940. Antheil finally had to leave Moscow, because it just became too apparent, apparently, him hanging on there, you know. Which had to be arranged topside, you know that. He was supposed to go to London, England as head code decoder. He altered the incoming cables and also the outgoing, he was indispensable. He had been doing that for years. This guy got sent to London. The linguist, who really didn't know anything about codes. Tyler Kent. Antheil, it must have been a terrific deal uprooting him out of Moscow to Helsinki, Finland which is as about as close as you can get and still be in the Soviet Union. Do you know the Antheil story at all?

Q: I think you told me, but I think it was off mike. Would you just finish this?

PIERCE: Antheil in September of 1939, right after the war broke out, that is, the Germans attacked Poland, got sent over to Helsinki. He'd been there many, many times before on trips. Christ, he'd been in Moscow five years. He got sent to this little legation in Helsinki as code clerk. Here he'd been head code clerk in Moscow for five years. On June 14, 1940, he wangled somehow, a trip across the Baltic to Tallinn, Estonia. That was done all the time every two weeks, I think, they took turns carrying a bag. You know, it's done all over. They used to do it down in Miami over to Havana or whatnot. The plane that he was on, on a return trip to Tallinn, was shot down by two Red Army fighters. Antheil, there were seven or eight people on the plane, was killed in the attack. So was everybody else. Some Soviet sub... There were Estonian fisherman who witnessed this thing, it was in broad daylight. These fisherman rushed to the scene and started to rescue whoever was there. There was no one, of course, but there was debris. A Soviet sub with a great big red star on it surfaced and chased them away and proceeded to collect whatever was there. No bodies, I don't think. June 14, 1940. The news, of course, got to Helsinki right away. Plane didn't come in and was shot down in broad daylight, everybody was killed. Somebody, and that's something I haven't been able to find out, but I'm sure it exists... Somebody or several people searched, as you would if you had been in charge at Helsinki, or me, his quarters to pack up stuff to send home to his family. Maybe you know all this.

Q: No, I don't.

PIERCE: They discovered, and it's incredible, but true, incontrovertible evidence that Antheil had been a goddam Soviet spy for five years, or four-and-a-half, anyway. Okay, what happens? They covered it up. They, of course, knew in Helsinki what had happened. You couldn't have telephoned in those days, I believe, from Helsinki. But you could still cable. They would have been informed immediately in Washington, the State Department, White House, whatever. Embassy Moscow, certainly. Probably Berlin, Warsaw, etc. They would have notified the big European embassies. By this time Bullitt, who was in on the whole thing, I'm sure, was the ambassador in Paris and considered himself ambassador to Europe for FDR. We all know about that. As of that date, June 14, Bohlen, Steinhardt, the crowd in Moscow, and all these other embassies, top men, State Department and the White House, and FBI, of course, I'm sure, knew that the codes had been invalid for years. Nevertheless, they pulled together in a real tight little ball and successfully covered up the news of this happening. Now, my point is this: It was good reason to do so from their standpoint. There were about a dozen men who became U.S. ambassadors, high ranking. Bohlen, almost made it to Secretary of State. But Bohlen knew from June 14 on, 1940, that all those highly vaunted cables that he based on talks with von Herbauer were false. That they hadn't been secret at all. Nevertheless, he wrote his book. About a dozen guys got to be ambassador. This mystery is perpetuated. Do you know that as we sit here, the Estonians still don't know?

Q: All this is news to me.

PIERCE: Well, it's heavy stuff.

Q: Of course it is.

PIERCE: I don't know what's going to happen to it. It irks me tremendously. I spent three years in the Army, almost got killed a couple times, got a bronze star, shed some blood, I just don't like this crap.

Q: You showed me that...

PIERCE: You think I've got a few documents? Look at this.

Q: You mentioned that Tyler Kent was arrested.

PIERCE: Well, that's part of the cover-up.

Q: He spent six years in a British prison.

PIERCE: Incommunicado. They let him go at the end of the war. He may even have been given money to keep quiet. 'Cause Tyler Kent know all about Anthel. Here's the real point. Kent was arrested in London on May 20, 1940, open and shut. Open and shut because he had hundreds of... They put him in the code room, see? He was a very intelligent guy. I knew Kent for the brief time he served in Moscow, after I had got there.

He was privy to the exchange of very secret messages between Churchill and Roosevelt. Hitler was poised over in Europe after Dunkirk, ready to invade England. Nobody knows quite why he did it. Unless we had come into the war. Strangely enough, many people are still very suspicious about Pearl Harbor, the timing of it. Hitler would have overrun England, there's no question about it. The liaison between Churchill and Roosevelt was priceless. I'm not saying anything in criticism of that. Hitler would have overrun England and the world would be different today.

But here's the point of the story. 1940 was an election year. Roosevelt was elected in '32, '36, and he was running for the third term in 1940. Never been done before. The isolationists, of whom there were millions, were raving away, and gaining ground, really, all the time, because people didn't like the idea of what they saw coming. Father Coughlin, you ever hear of him?

Q: Oh, yes, in Detroit.

PIERCE: He was banging away, and various other people. Roosevelt wasn't even certain of getting nominated for a third term. A lot of people didn't like the idea of a third term.

Q: Oh, yes.

PIERCE: Here's Kent, May 20, 1940, arrested, guilty as he could be. He had hundreds of cables in his apartment including the super-secret stuff between Churchill and Roosevelt. His aim was to get it into the hands of the isolationists in the States. With the idea, and he was correct, if he could get that info there, that Churchill and Roosevelt were under the table maneuvering, Roosevelt probably wouldn't even get nominated much less elected. So what do they do? They put him away for five years on the Isle of Wight digging potatoes or whatever he did. Then when the war is over, late '45, they let him loose. Kent. He married a rich widow. Family that established Hyattsville, I think. Named Martha Hyatt, millionaire woman, much older than he. He just lived out his life, he's dead now, but he remained quiet. Okay, that's Kent. Okay, that's

May 20, 1940. Covered up in a secret trial. Here's an American citizen. They put him away, secret. Three weeks later, on June 14, 1940, what happens?

Q: Antheil was killed.

PIERCE: Murdered. The Russian secret police killed him because he had become very dangerous. That's easy to figure out. May 20, June 14. Here we are, still in June, they haven't even held the conventions yet, political. That had to be kept secret. Those two things coming together would have done this: They would have knocked Roosevelt out of his third term. Wendell Willkie would have been elected. There would have been a turn in our policy, for good or for bad, who knows. That's what happened. Right there in that building, right there.

Q: You're pointing to the pictures of the Old Executive...it was the old War, Navy, and State building.

PIERCE: Yes, they were all in there. On the fourth floor of that building on the side toward the White House is the room that was used for many years by David Salomon, the head of files, codes. I knew him well. He patted me on the back about the tennis, too. There's a fireplace in that room. It's an old-fashioned building. One of the perks that Dave Salomon had was that gloomy days he could have a fire in his office. Anyway, sometime between June 14...you've seen the article that occurred in the New York Times, haven't you? Antheil's death?

Q: No, I'd like to look at it. On this, I'm not sure. This is very interesting and I have no idea...

PIERCE: It's probably outside your beat usually, right?

Q: No. Your oral history will become part of our collection and this will be there. I'd like to go to something else. You were there in September of '39 when the war started. How did that play? There was the Molotov-Ribbentrop agreement. How did that play at the embassy?

PIERCE: September '39, summertime of course, and it was more pleasant than usual in Moscow. It was very tense, of course, because all this big stuff was going on. Steinhardt was the ambassador. Grumman had the rank of consular, I think, or maybe a man named Walter Thurston had showed up to be the consular. But the real political work was being done by Steinhardt and Bohlen. Strangely enough, there was a lot of social activity in the diplomatic corps, not that I got in on that, or any of the clerks. But there was a lot of back and forth feverish entertaining and what not. See, nobody had chosen sides yet. After I won that tournament there...I showed you that cup, didn't I?

Q: Yes, you did.

PIERCE: I'd go up to the German embassy and played a little tennis. The Italian embassy, particularly, because Madam Rosso, the Italian ambassador's wife, was a rich American woman and favored American friends, you know, and invite you over. So actually, it was more open, in a sense, than from the time I first got there. Or maybe it was just because I had become more familiar with life there. Anyway, the high-level stuff, of which I was a very close witness because I was doing...by this time I was doing code work.

Antheil was transferred...and there's something there that I am troubled to think about too much...somebody topside among the bad guys...must have figured out that Antheil had become a liability. Because although it was certainly the Soviets that finally killed him over the Baltic, there, the Soviets couldn't reach in and transfer him to Helsinki. That was done by, I think, Lloyd Henderson, who was by that time back in Washington, DC pulling the strings. He might have been the brains of the whole thing. Antheil got transferred at the height of all this activity to Helsinki. I think about the middle of September. The war had started. You could still go up to Riga and then over to Helsinki.

Within the embassy itself it was around-the-clock code work because so many things were happening. In August, too, a big British delegation arrived in Moscow. We know now they were there to sign a defensive agreement which fell through. Because at one point there in September, I remember going up to the Metropole Hotel, which was only three or four blocks, with a couple of the guys. Which we often did, you know, lot of tension, we had a couple of drinks and relaxed. Von Ribbentrop and his entourage had arrived. While many of them, I'm sure, were staying over at the German embassy, there was also quite a squad of them wandering around the Metropole Hotel. In those Nazi outfits, you know? It was at that point that von Ribbentrop pulled off the coup of the century, diplomatically speaking, and they signed the treaty which started World War II. So, I don't know whether I answered your question or not.

Q: What happened at our embassy when this Molotov-Ribbentrop treaty was signed, or the announcement was made? Did that change things at the embassy?

PIERCE: Nothing that you could...it was already tense and very active. Odd working hours, this that and the other thing. What it did was cut off any travel between Moscow and Berlin and Moscow-Warsaw which had been a customary route. Most of us had come in that way, I had. Other than that, everybody just notched it up a bit. Nobody blew their top or anything.

Q: You said by this time you had moved over to the code room.

PIERCE: I moved up to the ambassador's office on the third floor. I was the second best office worker in that embassy. Eugene Presley, the guy I showed you...how did he get to be number one in Moscow with his background? I'm telling you...the place...the rottenness was back in the States.

Q: What was the problem with Presley?

PIERCE: Presley was two things. He was a homosexual and he was a communist. His background was Left Bank Paris. He was a very intelligent guy. He'd been married to Katherine Ann Porter. Divorced. It's in the records. He was a Left Bank pinko, communist, and he'd gotten his job through some unknown guy, probably Lloyd Henderson or Bullitt, or Ada Burley, maybe. Stuff like that.

Q: I was going to say...but your job, you had moved to the ambassador's office?

PIERCE: Everybody who could read and write and had the aptitude at all was pressed into service in the code room from time to time. Including Tyler Kent. Which is what accounted for the fact that Anthelil was able to shove him into that London assignment. Where he wound up in a prison farm. I was working like everybody else, 14 hours a day, maybe. A lot of my work was at night and also Presley because the big brains, Bohlen and Steinhardt and occasionally Grumman would be out at Spaso House cooking up the cables. We'd get taken out there and brought back, etc.

Q: Spaso House being the ambassador's residence.

PIERCE: From the first day they went into Moscow, that's his residence. It was just a frantic situation every day instead of once in awhile. Strange working hours.

Q: You left there in June 1940?

PIERCE: I left there on May Day 1940. May the first. I came out through Kiev. Bucharest, Budapest, Trieste, Milano, and down to Genoa. I was supposed... See, I was leaving. I wasn't going on leave. If I had any factor for suspicion of people other than what I know for a fact...anybody that ever left Moscow on leave and came back...there was something wrong with them. Unless they were a career officer, whose promotion...

Q: This was a big job. You obviously gained the spotlight by being there, so I can see any officer wanting to be there.

PIERCE: Get ahead, yes. (Inaudible) became ambassadors. If Bohlen and the rest of them had faced the music and realized, or not realized, they knew that these vaunted cables over these years, particularly in the case of Bohlen were spurious, had been betrayed years before, history would be different. Certainly their personal careers would never have... At least ten of them, after they got into this thing, which I am going to call...you know, the Mafia had what they called "omerta," "silence." This career bunch of Foreign Service officers involved with the Russian situation rolled together in a tight ball. I'm sure their wives knew the secret. They knew that Chip Bohlen was their leader and they had no idea he was going to be able to jump right into the seat, next to Roosevelt and become as big as he did.

If he had let it be known what had happened with Herbauer and the cables and Anthelil and Kent, those guys would have wound up as high-ranking language officers, or something. They would never have had those big careers. They all had something in common. What's even worse besides the career officers, there were a number of out and out traitors from the lower ranks who were let go free, never prosecuted, never tampered with until many years later. The most outstanding one of that kind was a man named Carmel Offie. You heard of him?

Q: Yes. Later, he was Bullitt's secretary in Paris.

PIERCE: Let's be frank. He was Bullitt's bedmate all over the world. He was as homosexual as you can get. I don't think he ever held a woman's hand if he could help it. Very intelligent, very energetic, and a spy from the word "go." I think they fixed that guy up, trained him in America. He was a poor boy from up in Pennsylvania. Father was a coal miner. Nothing wrong with that if you're an honest coal miner. But this guy owned William Bullitt. He lasted way past the wartime. He lasted until about 1954 when the Senator had to go on the floor of the Senate and speak about him. Then they got rid of him. But even then he had such protection that they pretended to harass him. He became a millionaire and so on and so forth. Carmel Offie's the worst of the lot, but there were others. I'm going to tell you something else, which I'd appreciate you'd keep to yourself.

Q: Well, I'd better not, because it will be on tape. When I do this, it has to be on tape.

PIERCE: Okay, I'm not going to mention this other name, then. Shocking, but I'll just say this. You know a lot, I'm sure, about English history. These names don't mean anything to you. Burgess, McLean, and Philby.

Q: These were all part of the Cambridge group during the '30s who joined the Communist Party and became spies for the Soviet Union.

PIERCE: Then defected to Moscow. They all...Philby's still alive, I think.

Q: No, I think he died very recently.

PIERCE: They're all dead now. But consider this. Here's these three aristocratic, wealthy well-educated fellows. Big successes. They were trained, it's now known, by the Soviets. They recruited them while they were underclassmen at Cambridge. They were trained to go into, the British Foreign Office and Foreign Service. They were all more or less brilliant guys, very personable, this, that, and the other thing. Burgess was homosexual, McLean was bisexual, nobody really knows what Philby is. I keep repeating that because it's very important. It's goes all the way through all of this stuff. It's never been emphasized, although it's generally known...but these guys were told "when you get out of here and get into the Foreign Office we want you to be the most outspoken anti-Soviet people around. That's the perfect cover for doing what you're going to do for us."

Now, I don't know whether you believe that or not, but I do. Now, here's the other thing. In the scale of things the United States was ten times more powerful than Britain in those days. Do you think that they're going to take all the trouble to penetrate the Cambridge- Oxford crowd, they're going to leave the Ivy League alone here in the States? Can you tell me one single Ivy Leaguer who ever was identified as a spy, a traitor?

Q: Yes, Alger Hiss was from Princeton, I think Princeton.

PIERCE: Yes, Alger Hiss was a special case. Even he was not accused exactly of doing what these guys did. I'm just saying that there should have been ten times the effort to penetrate the Ivy League and it was penetrated by people whose names I'm not going to mention because I can't prove it yet. But it's all there, and some very strange upward movement was attained by people who never even took the exam. You understand? Where did that protection come from?

Q: Yes. Well, who knows.

PIERCE: When I started out on this story...the reason I started out was I got into this Ezra Pound thing. Then as I accumulated stuff on that it dawned on me where the little dotted lines led, here and there. It begins to dawn on you that they pulled off the damndest stuff by just swaggering around assuming privilege, and everybody was willing to give it to them. Everything goes to a certain point and then all of a sudden, there's nothing. Well, it's there, and strangely enough...people make mistakes, it's documented.

Washington, DC (1945-1946)

Willis C. Armstrong was born in 1912 in New York. He received a bachelor's degree from Swarthmore College and a master's degree from Columbia University. His career in the Foreign Service emphasized economic affairs and included posts in the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union. The following are excerpts from Armstrong's interviews with Charles Stuart Kennedy on November 29, 1988 and the British Broadcasting Corporation.

ARMSTRONG: I was a graduate student of Columbia University, teaching in a girls' high school run by the University. It was a progressive school, and they wanted a program taught in Russian history. I didn't know any Russian history, but the principal said, "You can learn." So I started taking courses in Russian history in the graduate faculty, and finally became persuaded that this was a good major field, because there was an endless amount of research material that wasn't being worked on, on hand in the Columbia library. I had a very persuasive professor of Russian history, a great man called Geroid Robinson, who is, unfortunately, gone now. He was later the head of the Russian section of the OSS in the research side here in town.

I studied Russian at the University of California at Berkeley in the summers of 1936-37, and took seminar work in New York. Then about 1938-39, the professor thought it would be a good idea if I went to Moscow to start working on my dissertation. My dissertation was "The Petrograd Soviet, 1917." (That was the right term for that city then.)

So he arranged with the Russian desk of the State Department for me to get a clerk translator's job, which was a temporary short-term assignment, and I went over in July of 1939. The European war started in September 1939, and I never got any research done, and I never finished my dissertation. I stayed in the government for 28 years without interruption. I guess I was one of the early Kremlinologists or Sovietologists in the United States, but I gave it up after the war.

I came back in 1941, and spent the next five years dealing with the USSR on Lend-Lease shipments and also UNNRA shipments. Then I peeled off from that in 1946, and I went into the economic side of the State Department, where on various occasions in the State Department, I had to do with Soviet relations, mostly in the context of keeping things away from them in the COCOM structure. So I've been on the supply side and the withholding side.

I got out of the Russian field at the end of the war, because I looked it over and considered that we were in for a long stretch of Cold War and diplomatic trench warfare, which didn't interest me. I got into things where I dealt more actively with potential friends and allies.

ARMSTRONG: Yes. You can check the dates, but the British-French military mission had gone there, I think a little before I was there, or maybe it happened while I was there. That was late spring, early summer. I was there when the German rapprochement with the Russians came, and I was there, of course, when the war began.

You wanted to know about American relations with the USSR. I'd say they were formal, not particularly friendly. The Stalin regime was never friendly with anybody. Being a foreigner in Moscow meant being ostracized by the local population, not because of anything that might happen to the foreigner, but because the local population was frightened. The Russians had just gone through their major purges in 1937-38, and a very substantial chunk of the elite had disappeared. If you ever did meet any Russians, you could tell that times were very strained. The Russians were kept pretty much in ignorance about what was going on in the world, if you could judge by what was available in the press.

My job in the embassy was to read the press. My first job was being night duty clerk. I did that from about August '39 until about the following March. I did some reading and research, but mostly I was on duty in the office from 6:30 at night until 9:00 in the morning. I had a bed in the office, in the code room. We had a rather primitive code room and rather primitive communication facilities. So throughout the first stage of hostilities in Europe and throughout the Russian-Finnish war, I didn't get a great deal of sleep.

Q: No, I imagine not.

ARMSTRONG: But if you're young, you can stand these things. It was fascinating. Of course, I read the telegram traffic, which didn't amount to much.

American relations with the Russians was formal, nothing very noteworthy. There was hardly any business transacted. We had a new ambassador who came in the summer of 1939.

Q: Who was that?

ARMSTRONG: Laurence Steinhardt. His daughter was high school age, and the ambassador knew from friends in New York about me. Several of his friends had daughters who had gone to the school where I taught. So I fetched up putting her through two years of high school while I was there, in my so-called spare time. She, incidentally, lives in Chevy Chase if you want to talk to her. Her name is Mrs. Sherwood. She lives on Connecticut Avenue just above Chevy Chase Circle. We see her once in a while.

Steinhardt was a lawyer from New York who had served as ambassador to Sweden and Peru, who later served as ambassador to Turkey, Czechoslovakia, and Canada.

Q: What was his approach?

ARMSTRONG: Steinhardt was always interested in all sort of specific human stories, and some people said he was the best consul we ever had. He'd go to any length to help individuals who were caught in the trap of Soviet bureaucracy. He was a good loyal supporter of President Roosevelt, a campaign contributor, a very bright and interesting man. Paradoxically, my wife served under him when he was ambassador in Czechoslovakia, because she was then in the embassy there. She wasn't my wife then; I didn't even know her.

Q: What was his reaction to the Soviet-German agreement?

ARMSTRONG: We weren't at all surprised. We knew it was going to happen.

Q: How did you receive the news?

ARMSTRONG: Germans told us.

Q: The German diplomats?

ARMSTRONG: We were very friendly with the German Embassy. The Germans told us, in effect, that a deal was being worked out, and therefore, our chief political officer, who kept close contact with the Germans, had the story. That was Chip Bohlen, who was later ambassador, a well-trained Russian expert. I worked for him for a while as his translator. That was before I got the night duty. (I got the night duty because I was the lowest ranking worm they could find.) But I had a lot of personal contact with Bohlen and other officers in the embassy. We had Norris Chipman, who was a very good Sovietologist, and we had a man called Ward, who was administrative officer, who was also a very competent, knowledgeable man about Eastern Europe. His wife was Finnish. Our counselor was Mr. Thurston, who had no experience on Russia, but who had a lot of experience on Latin America, and who was a good and sensible man, who handled things well.

The embassy was effectively functioning as eyes and ears of the U.S. Government during that time, but we were mostly spectators. We were spectators as far as what the Germans and the Russians did with each other. One reason we weren't surprised was that we were aware of how weak the Soviet Union was following the purges. Of course, it had a weak economy; it always has. But the whole command structure of the military had been pretty much obliterated, and it didn't look to our military people as if the Russians could fight their way out of a paper bag. Therefore, it was not at all surprising that they would try to get some kind of a cease-fire or standoff with the Germans. Obviously, if their intelligence was working at all, they knew the Germans were going to move in on Poland.

I have a comment on Poland. I went through Poland on my way to Moscow by train in July, from Berlin, woke in the night when we stopped in Frankfurt an der Oder, now, I guess, part of Poland. You could look out over the railroad yard, and you could see, as far as the eye could carry, flatcars loaded with military equipment. This was the middle of July of 1939. It was perfectly obvious that you don't put weapons on flatcars unless you're going to move them somewhere. You don't use your flatcars for storage. I observed that.

Then a chap, an American newspaperman, got on the train in Warsaw to go on to Moscow.

Q: Who was that?

ARMSTRONG: I think his name was Wolf. I'm not sure. He'd been in Warsaw for a couple of weeks. Somebody said, "There's an American up there." So I went up and said hello. This was my first visit to Europe. He said he'd been in Warsaw for two weeks, and he said, "The Poles are unbelievable. They think they're going to beat the Germans."

Q: Oh, no.

ARMSTRONG: They think one good cavalry charge will carry them right into Berlin."

Q: Oh, dear.

ARMSTRONG: Well, you know, it's perfectly true that the Poles have an international reputation for having far more courage than brains. They have a marvelous spirit. They'll fight anybody. Anyway, he said that was the mood in Warsaw: "Let 'em come. We'll beat the hell out of them." Of course, it lasted about 20 minutes, which, of course, the Russians presumably expected.

Q: That must have been clear to you, coming from Berlin, that war was definitely in the offing.

ARMSTRONG: Oh, yes, sure. I didn't stay in Berlin. I just changed trains.

When the Russians moved their troops into eastern Poland, it was obviously by arrangement with the Germans. They had the demarcation line all worked out beforehand. It was an interesting experience to observe. I used to wander around markets and do a little eavesdropping, and I remember a couple of women talking to each other. The minute anything sounded like military activity, the Russians all got out and got into a line for whatever was being sold, because everybody knew that military activity meant shortages. A hundred years of that, and you get used to it. The lines were forming for kerosene. People were buying kerosene, taking it home and storing it in their bathtubs. They didn't wash much, but they kept kerosene in the bathtubs. They'd line up for potatoes, they'd line up for anything. I listened to a couple of women in the

One said, “Well, what do you think about the situation?”

“Oh, I don’t know. We don’t have war, but we seem to have military activities.” “Voyenniye dyeis Taiga.” Then later in that same period, I was over in the barbershop at the International Hotel, and I heard a couple of Russians talking. One said, “What is this? Why are we being chummy with our enemies, the Nazis?” The Russian people had been strongly conditioned by anti-Nazi propaganda. He said, “I find this very peculiar, very strange.”

The other one said, “Oh, don’t worry. (On znayet shto on delayet,)” which means, “He knows what he’s doing,” was the answer. The “he” had a capital H. He was pointing toward the Kremlin, across the street. The Russian people, in general, had confidence that in external matters, the government had done and was doing what was best for the country.

Q: How did the diplomatic community, the people who dealt with you as diplomats, present this?

ARMSTRONG: I didn’t have enough rank to be very active in the diplomatic community. I had a couple of friends, mostly clerical staff in the German, Swedish, British, Norwegian embassies. That was about it. The German girl seemed never to be able to understand why the Americans should have any objection to what the Germans were doing because, as she would try to explain to us, “This is a matter for the Europeans and should not be a matter of any concern for the United States.” We would say gently that we thought we believed in Europe for the Europeans, but to us that meant all Europeans, not just one country. She was also astonished because she found that the Norwegian girl wouldn’t come to the parties if she was coming. They were both called Hilda. This was after the German invasion of Norway.

Q: Well, I’m not surprised at that.

ARMSTRONG: But she didn’t seem to understand. She said, “We went in there for friendly purposes, to help out the Norwegians.” In other words, she believed all her own government’s stuff. She was a nice kid. I always wondered what happened to her with the cataclysm of the war. She came from East Prussia.

The Swedish girl was interesting. She was the most negative about the Russians of anybody in the community. This goes back to the Swedes having known the Russians longer and better than anybody else. She eventually married the clerk in our military attaché’s office, and presumably has lived in the United States in the American service.

Q: Shortly after that, the war broke out.

ARMSTRONG: This was after the war had broken out. This German-Norwegian and other reaction was in the early days of the war.

Q: I see. When the war did break out, how did you receive the news? You were in Moscow at this time.

ARMSTRONG: Nobody was surprised. This was the first stage of the war.

Q: September 1939.

ARMSTRONG: September 1939. Nobody was surprised. We got a little busier, and there were a few little new touches, but mostly life went on in the normal fashion. After all, Russia had declared itself neutral, and it was a neutral country. We were a neutral country. It was spectator sports.

Then during the period of September to spring was what a lot of people called the phoney war, because the Germans were not very active against the West. They were consolidating in Poland and regrouping. The West wasn't up to fighting anybody, anyway, and presumably was pouring a little more concrete on the Maginot Line, which did them no good.

The interesting thing about Russian policy during that period, throughout 1939 to 1941, was that they never lost touch with anybody who might potentially be their ally. In other words, they kept their options open diplomatically. They were perfectly correct with us and quite polite. We had no serious problems in the embassy or otherwise. They maintained correct relations with the British. Sir Stafford Cripps, who was a very important man in the Labor party, was the British ambassador there. He couldn't always get in to see anybody in the Kremlin, but he was there. The French Government in exile, the Petain government, did maintain its post, and everybody else was there.

The war was background, but what everybody focused on, beginning in the autumn of 1939, was the Russian protective measures on the borders. Having taken the eastern half of Poland, they then moved in on the Baltic Straits, as you well recall. They told Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania that they'd like an alliance with them, mutual assistance or whatever. By the following summer of 1940, they had consolidated their control over those three countries.

That first winter, though, 1939-40, they did not intervene in local affairs in Latvia, Lithuania, and so on. I went out to Latvia in January on a courier trip. In those days, our courier would go to Stockholm, Helsinki, the three Baltic capitals, and to Berlin. We ran a shuttle courier from the embassy in Moscow who would go out to Latvia and deliver our pouches, and bring the new pouches in. We all took turns doing this, and we were always delighted to do it, because it gave me a chance to get out of the USSR for a couple of days.

So I was in Latvia in January for a few days, a perfectly normal train trip out, except for the weather and getting stuck on a siding, because of the deep snow. But going around doing business in Latvia, you were still in an independent country and doing business in Latvian currency, doing a lot of shopping for the colleagues and their girlfriends. I came back with 45 pairs of silk stockings. The Russians didn't have silk stockings. Almost everybody had a girlfriend. Not everybody. Some of the clerks were homosexuals.

On that trip I had luck. When I got on the train from Riga to Moscow, I found in the next door compartment Walter Durant, the famous correspondent of The New York Times. Of course, as a student of Russia, I had always been following him in the Times, so I went and got acquainted. I spent the evening with him, sharing sandwiches and brandy and so forth, and found him fascinating. He maintained two families. He had a Russian family and a Western family. He was going in to see his Russian family. I saw him a couple of times after that in Moscow, and I also got to know other American or British correspondents. As a matter of fact, since one of my colleagues and I at the clerical level did all the newspaper reading and daily reporting on the press, the newspaper correspondents in town, the Westerners, frequently would talk to us about our interpretation of what was in the press, and we'd compare notes with them as to their interpretation. That was an external contact that I did have.

Q: Who were some of the American journalists?

ARMSTRONG: Henry Shapiro was one, a very bright and able guy. Jack Scott was another one. He's gone now. I guess Henry's probably gone now. Jack was for years with Time magazine, Time-Life Publications, a very good Russian expert. He had a Russian wife. He got thrown out by the Soviets in about 1940 for reporting that was probably too accurate. There was a great discussion over whether his Russian wife and children would be allowed to go with him. They were. We all went down to the train to see them off.

The Western group of people in Moscow was a very small group, and you tended to know most of them who spoke English, even if you were at a very low diplomatic level. All the foreigners huddled together, all the embassies huddled together, even if their countries may have had great differences of opinion with each other. There's nothing like a Russian environment to bring everybody else together. They were all suffering under the same yoke, as they say.

To go back, I started on the Baltic states. Everybody looked at that and said, "The Russians are protecting themselves and they will eventually gobble up the state." The U.S. took a firm view of this, and the U.S. still has the same view. We do not recognize the Russian acquisition of those three states, and we still have shadow governments in exile representing Estonia, and possibly Latvia, I think, floating around in the United States.

Q: How was this response manifested at the time?

ARMSTRONG: The early stage, technically the sovereignty of those countries was not violated, because the Russians made a mutual defense treaty, which they theoretically fully accepted. But later, of course, when they actually moved and took them over, the way they did it was to organize their own fifth column and have it take over the government. Then having taken over the government, it would petition for admission of the country to the Soviet Union. So as far as the Russians were concerned, this was all done quite legally. Their reaction was, "This is perfectly legitimate. This is what the people in these countries wanted." Believe that and you can believe anything, but that's what most Russian people believed.

Then, of course, after they got in there, they've had a program of decreasing the indigenous population and increasing the Russian component, so that by now, the Estonians are a minority in their own country. I think the Latvians are, too. The Lithuanians are more numerous with a higher birth rate. Lithuanians have shown more resistance because they have the Catholic church. I think it was perfectly transparent, but again, the Russians convinced themselves they were doing it legally. They always liked to convince themselves they were right.

Q: Yes, that sounds rather like the invasion of Finland.

ARMSTRONG: I'm going to come to that next. What happened in about December, I think it was, was that they presented the same set of demands, in effect, on Finland, asking for a piece of territory near Leningrad, asking for bases and so forth, and a change in the Petsamo area so as to cut off the Finnish access to the Arctic Ocean, but really to get hold of the nickel mines. The Finns said no, they weren't interested.

We, of course, were very close to the Finns, diplomatically, and totally sympathetic. So we had an active cable traffic reporting on what the Finns told us about what the Russians had told them. The Finns had a remarkable ambassador there, Paasikivi. Was he there then or later? I think he was there later after they restored relations. He later became president of Finland.

We obviously took a very negative view. Therefore, our relations with the USSR deteriorated, beginning with the Finnish war, primarily, just because of American popular opinion about the Russian invasion of Finland.

Q: I've been watching newsreel reports, and they're not, to say the least, very favorable towards the Russians.

ARMSTRONG: Oh, Lord, no. I wasn't here. I was over there. But we had a lot of fun in the press reading section, because we'd take the Russian communiques every day, and I had some fun one time. They'd given an account of how many kilometers the Soviet troops had advanced, and I did a cumulative analysis of that, and it brought them out somewhere a little west of Norway, out in the North Sea after you'd added it all up.

ARMSTRONG: It was the coldest winter in the history of the Moscow Weather Bureau. There were bread riots in Moscow which had no political connotation whatsoever; they simply arose out of the fact that the weather was so bad that it froze the bread delivery trucks. I was out in it several times when it was 40 below and 45 below, and it's an experience. The town was frozen solid. They could hardly get the streetcars to run. Cars wouldn't start. Of course, cars in those days were pretty primitive, and Russian cars are more primitive than other cars. Their basic car was a Ford model that they got somewhere in the 1920s. Everything came to a grinding halt, including their offensive with Finland.

Of course, then they also made a terrible mistake. They must have ignored any intelligence that they might have had about whether the Finns would fight. Of course, the Finns fought like wildcats. The Russians had gone in with what we would call a National Guard out here. The reservists in the Leningrad military district were the ones who went. They weren't ready for what they got, and they didn't have the right equipment. They got stopped dead. Later, of course, the Russians realized what they were up against, and they regrouped and put in a new troop structure. Then eventually, their manpower was so much greater than the Finns, there could have been no argument. You don't mind an anecdote?

ARMSTRONG: One night in about February or March of 1940, as the Finnish war was beginning to grind down, the Finns wanted to sue for peace, and the Russians didn't want to take over all of Finland, anyhow, they realized it would be an impossibility, they were negotiating privately. I went out to dinner at Henry Shapiro's. This is one of the unusual occasions when I actually met Soviet citizens socially, Soviet citizens of some status. I've forgotten the man and wife. They were somewhere in the artistic world, but they were representative of Russian intelligentsia, very nice people. Henry started to tell them, "Peace is being negotiated." They were astonished. Then he asked me for confirmation, and I didn't know where he got his information. I mean, I knew about it because I read the cables, but I wasn't supposed to talk about it. So I got caught on this.

The thing that was interesting was the reaction of this Russian couple, who could not understand why the Finns had fought them. They said, "We're nice people. We don't have any hard feelings. We're just trying to help protect the Finns. We offered them a defensive alliance. Why is that an occasion for them to fight us?" Sort of, "We can do no wrong. We're nice people." And this is essentially a major Russian self-justificatory view that you find, and it goes right on. It's still there. You read it in Mr. Gorbachev. "We're nice. Nobody's nicer than we are. Why don't you just recognize us? Nobody's more legitimate than we are." You know, all that. "We have civil liberties and we have a Constitution." You know. They tell themselves everything is all right.

There's another thing, too. They can be unspeakably crude, rude, and just plain filthy in their actions, but they always want to have the language be good. Euphemism is a Russian art in terms of describing things that happen in society. "All is for the best" -- Dr. Pangloss. "All is for the best. We're all right. Everybody is out of step but us."

Q: Not very many people outside of the Soviet Union are fooled by this.

ARMSTRONG: Oh, nobody outside is fooled, really, unless he wants to be. But they fool themselves. This is an insight into dealing with them. It makes it that much more difficult to deal with them, because they believe their own hypocrisy, and the public believes the government's hypocrisy.

Q: That does make things rather difficult.

ARMSTRONG: That's a side note about "why we're always right." Anyway, Soviet-American relations were not improved by the Russian attack on Finland.

Q: What was the American response? Did they make protests?

ARMSTRONG: There was a lot of money raised here for Finland, war relief, that sort of thing. Never overlook what the Swedes did for the Finns during that time; they turned out everything they could think of to help the Finns. Through Finnish and Swedish channels, we did a lot of volunteer stuff.

Q: But the American Government didn't do very much other than that?

ARMSTRONG: There were a few debts the Finns owed, and I think the American Government probably offered to forget and forgive interest payments and things like that. The Finns said, "Never mind. We'll pay it." They always pay.

Q: Yes, they always pay their debts.

ARMSTRONG: I visited Finland in the summer of 1940 for a holiday. I traveled all around in the lake steamers and went near the new Soviet border. I went there by flying to Stockholm and then flying over to Helsinki, then came back the same way.

Then in the spring of 1941, I took the train from Moscow to Leningrad, did sightseeing in Leningrad, and then went on to Helsinki by train and back, and stopped in Viborg. By that time it had become a Russian town. The Finns were not giving up. There wasn't much of anything to eat in Finland by the spring of 1941.

I was in the border areas in the summer of '40, near Savonlinna. I said, "I don't see any war damage."

They said, "We don't have any."

I said, "How come? You're only a short distance from the war zone."

"Oh, every so often a Soviet bomber will come over, obviously under instructions to bomb us, and he would fly over the town, then he'd go out over the lake and drop all the bombs in the lake, then fly away." This is a reflection of an early naive Russian teaching of its own military, which was, "We do not bomb civilian populations. It is wrong to bomb a civilian population." There was a certain amount of pacifist idealism in the early Bolshevik view of things. Of course, they got into some real problems and it disappeared.

Q: When they were bombing German cities, they probably took rather a different view.

ARMSTRONG: They didn't bomb any German cities. They didn't have an offensive bomber force.

ARMSTRONG: Moscow didn't get more than one or two air raids. The Germans didn't bomb Moscow. I guess they figured it would be too expensive to use the air arm, and they were going to take it by the infantry. Of course, they never did take it by the infantry.

Anyway, the Finnish war was a major event, and it made the Americans officially quite cool toward the USSR. That carries you over to the spring of 1940. The summer of 1940 sees the German offensive in France, rolling over Belgium, Holland, and everything, and demolishing the French forces and imposing the Vichy regime.

My observation then was that the Soviets were astonished and worried, because they had had, obviously, a better evaluation of the Anglo-French military strength than was warranted by the facts. You could see them. They had vivid accounts in the press every day of what was going on in France, much more vivid than was usual on any activity outside the country. You could tell it bothered them, because: “if they can do that to the British or French, look what they can do to us.” That’s when they first really began, I think, to get scared and more watchful of the Germans.

Q: That was a very dramatic example of what one had to fear from the Germans, non-aggression pact or no.

ARMSTRONG: The Germans are very efficient military people. There’s no arguing about it. I think that was our opinion then, that this kind of scared the daylights out of the Russians. ... From then on, really, until the following summer, they became more apprehensive. They didn’t convey this to the people, though; everything was bland. German-Russian relations were presumably cordial. Their press would be critical of the British and French, and critical of us, and they were obviously in various ways trying to see whether it was possible to please the Germans enough to keep them off their backs. I think it was probably the spring of 1941 by the time they realized this wasn’t going to work.

During the spring of 1941 was when you had the great German walk down through the Balkans, and again the Soviet press was full of lively reports on the German armies rolling into Romania, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia. They made a brief and flickering effort to support the independence of the Yugoslavs, and the Yugoslav military mission came to Moscow to seek support somewhere about spring of 1941.

We got one interesting piece of intelligence. One of the Yugoslav generals who came had gone to the Russian military academy before the revolution, and he was entertained by a couple of his Russian classmates, who were then senior officers in the Red Army. We got a readout on that which is fascinating. The Soviet general who had a fine, formal house, and the servants were in livery.

Q: Oh, my heavens.

ARMSTRONG: To a bunch of peasants like the Yugoslavs, this was something. Who’s democratic, you know?

Q: Yes, indeed. In livery, nonetheless.

ARMSTRONG: In livery, yes. So the Russians kind of let the Germans know, “Look, we don’t like all these things you’re doing,” but they didn’t do anything more than just make motions. I am sure that from the time the Germans rolled into the Balkans, the Russians were then convinced that somebody in Berlin had their name on a card somewhere, and in due course, they would be presented with a bill.

Our general observation in the embassy was that the Russians really were surprised by the German attack in June of 1941. We had tried to warn them.

Q: Yes.

ARMSTRONG: We and the British tried to warn them with perfectly good intelligence, which we gave them.

Q: Where did this intelligence come from?

ARMSTRONG: Agents in Germany and just general open news in Germany, plus knowing what's going on, good hunches and good agents and so forth.

Q: The Russians didn't want to listen?

ARMSTRONG: British intelligence was damned good in those days and still is. Ours was kind of rudimentary, but it was functioning. So this was convincing. The Russians rejected it -- that is, Stalin rejected it. Our theory was that Stalin felt he was a big enough and important enough actor in the world stage so that even Hitler wouldn't dare treat him with contempt, that what he was going to get somewhere along the line was a set of demands -- economic, for supplies, because Germany was hurting, they needed grain, they needed oil, they needed other things, and assurance of non-belligerency, all that.

I think they thought they were going to be presented with a list. They never were. They just got hit on a Sunday morning with the full fire power of the German Army. They were so unsuspecting that they had, on their front airfields, all their fighter squadrons lined up for Sunday morning inspection. The Germans came down and washed them right out. They didn't have any significant defense in depth from the Polish border, and they simply were not prepared, in the military sense, for what hit them. I think probably their front line troops did a heroic job with what they had, but because there was not enough, they moved very rapidly and began to do the thing that they did in France.

Q: It's very similar to Pearl Harbor, don't you think, where the country that gets hit doesn't expect anything nice from their attacker, expects them to make some aggressive move, but not at that time and not in that way.

ARMSTRONG: Not that way. I mean, the German Embassy was still in Moscow and so forth. The Germans told us what they were going to do.

Q: They did? How did this come about?

ARMSTRONG: We were friendly with the German Embassy.

Q: You must have been very much.

ARMSTRONG: This is intelligence. This is an intelligence in an amateur way without having a Central Intelligence Agency or anything. The U.S. Foreign Service is not a bad source of intelligence, and they worked hard at it. Our contacts were good.

Q: How much notice did you get when they told you?

ARMSTRONG: Enough so that we got our women and children out before the war started.

Q: And you went to the Soviets, and they refused to listen?

ARMSTRONG: We didn't go. The embassy didn't go. We'd made the official approach earlier through intelligence channels, and they said, "Baloney."

There were several little things in the press that spring which I recall. Every so often there would be a funny little story in the press which would be hard to fathom. There was one report in some newspaper somewhere in Europe to the effect that the Germans were going to force on the Russians a deal whereby they would take over the Ukraine and have access to the oil and grain.

The Russians ran in Pravda a little humorous article which referred to this and said, "What nonsense." It quoted and said, "We're supposed to be renting Kiev to the Germans. This makes just as much sense as the nursery rhyme." I translated it at the time, but I can't remember it exactly. I quote in Russian a nursery rhyme which sounds good in Russian and translates very awkwardly, which is, "The lobsters are cutting hay in the meadow with hammers." That's the literal translation. They said it makes just as much sense as that. They put this out and kind of let the Germans know that they noticed something and expected to get some kind of reaction, and never got anything.

There were a few minor good relations efforts during the first year of the 1939 Agreement. I remember the Bolshoi Opera decided to do Die Walküre. It was one of the funniest experiences you can imagine. Some of us in the American Embassy went. In the first two rows, there was the German Embassy solid. The stage machinery was excellent, the tenors and the basses were fine, and the spirit of the thing was quite all right. It was good presentation, but the Russians simply did not have any Wagnerian sopranos. They didn't have any women in their cadre who could sing like a German soprano.

Q: Yes, you do rather need that.

ARMSTRONG: In connection with it, they put out a booklet in Russian, explaining the Ring. I think I've probably got it in my souvenirs somewhere. I didn't know much about it either. Wagnerian music had not been my bag, or at least I wasn't interested in the theology of it. We were kind of anti-Nazi around New York, anyway, so who bothered to listen to Wagner? I was fascinated by this pamphlet they put out. The Russians solemnly read it and tried hard to understand it. The Russians love songs and opera and all kinds of shows.

Another point. The Germans, when they did go in, made the grossest of political mistakes because they treated everybody like pigs. If they had gone in with the right kind of political propaganda, if they'd understood what they were dealing with, or if they'd wanted to understand what they were dealing with, they would have gone into the Ukraine as liberators, with Ukrainian-speaking soldiers. "We're not fighting you. We are Ukrainians." You know. Friends and all that. They could have had the whole Ukraine in about 20 minutes.

Q: Just like they wanted.

ARMSTRONG: Which is what they really wanted economically. But instead of that, they shot everybody. Any sentiments of anti-Moscow disappeared in about three minutes and the Ukrainians went out and fought like tigers, too.

Q: This was rather a dramatic time for American policy, as well. One of our historical advisors claims that it's the German invasion of the USSR and the fact that the Soviets were able to hold on throughout that autumn and winter that convinced FDR to continue to pursue the possibility, then, of helping the Allies. What do you think about that?

ARMSTRONG: He was already committed to helping the British.

Q: Yes, indeed.

ARMSTRONG: That was a firm commitment. There was no argument about that. It was a while later that Churchill took over. The British were kind of hard to help at that point.

I'll tell you the reaction in the embassy when the war started. The night before the war was to begin, there were two parties, one of the clerical staff and one of the officers' staff.

Q: This is in September 1939?

ARMSTRONG: This is in June 1941. Of course, the officers were at the ambassador's house. We had ours at one of the apartments in the chancery. We had a clerical party, a clerks' party. Some of the officers came over to visit our party, quite a number of them, in fact. I think they wanted to get away from the ambassador. Our military attaché was at our party, an old friend of mine. He guess he was a major. I had known him as a captain, and we had both studied Russian together at Berkeley, California, a very, very nice guy and a good cavalryman, but not a great intelligence officer. He was satisfied the Russians would be rolled over by the Germans in very short order. I got into an argument with another clerk, in the presence of the military attaché. The clerk said, "The Germans will be in Moscow in three weeks."

I said, "I'll bet you on that."

He said, "How much?"

I said, "Fifty dollars," which was a lot of money for me at that point. I was the one who said, "The Russians will not lose." I don't know why I said that, except that I had a sense of the great strength of the Russian people, and I had a sense of their patriotism. I collected the $50, incidentally. The other guy and I were both in Japan at that point, waiting for a way to get home.

But the military attaché turned to the other guy and said, “Your money’s perfectly safe.” But he was a dear friend and a good guy, and I always liked him. But his intellectual judgments were not great.

Q: You were right, though, in that the Russians did hold on.

ARMSTRONG: Oh, yes, no question about it. If you know Russian history, you know what happened to Napoleon.

Q: Indeed. Same thing happened.

ARMSTRONG: Same thing. Sure. The space and the numbers.

Q: And the winter.

ARMSTRONG: And the winter. So there was a division in the embassy, obviously, on what was going to happen. Ambassador Steinhardt was, I think, busy urging Washington that this was serious, that the Russians deserved some help, but that we ought not to give it to them without getting some political and other satisfaction on some of the things we thought were important.

Q: What did he have in mind?

ARMSTRONG: Some individual cases he was worried about. I know of one case where he told Molotov, “You know, I’ve got some passports here for exit visas.” They were American. “And I’ve got one more passport,” which was British, a local employee of the embassy who was really a Soviet citizen, also. He said, “I want a visa for her.”

Molotov said, “But she’s a Soviet citizen.”

“I know that, but you know, you gave me a list of military supplies you needed. I haven’t sent it home yet. I want the visa on that passport.” He got it. She got out.

Q: Quite effective bargaining.

ARMSTRONG: He was a tough cookie in terms of specific bargaining. Another thing, they were very polite to us all leading up to this period, although they didn’t give in on Finland or the Baltic states, but they were very polite. Somewhere in the spring of 1941, the ambassador called me and said, “I need you this evening. Would you meet me in the courtyard at 7:00 o’clock.”

I said, “Sure.” I got in the car and said, “What are we doing?”

He said, “The Soviet police have picked up an American citizen, and they were decent enough to tell us that they had him on a gun charge and to give us an opportunity to see him.”

So I said, “Where are we going?”

He said, “We’re going to Lubianka,” the headquarters of the NKVD, now the KGB. So I have actually been inside the headquarters of the KGB, the same building, still there, a big square building. We got in there, and in a room full of steely eyed KGB agents, all of their uniform hats on, sitting around, looked like a sea of blue, you know, they brought in a kid who was about 15. I had to translate, only he didn’t know any Russian or any English; he spoke Polish. He had been born in Fall River, Massachusetts, when his family was visiting from Poland, had gone back and grown up in Poland on a farm. He knew enough Russian so he could answer “yes” or “no,” so we had the most tortured conversation. The ambassador realized what the problem was, and he tried to be helpful to me. I was doing the best I could. It was an experience, but we got him out. The charge was kind of trumped up, which became evident when he told his story, and we got him out. The Russians let him go. This was a signal, I thought: “Look, we aren’t going to cause you any minor troubles.”

We had another event that spring, where somebody broke into the Roman Catholic church in Moscow, where the priest was an American, and there was always a great struggle over having him in there, because they didn’t like churches. One day somebody came and stole all the objects off the altar, the host, everything. The priest came screaming into the embassy at 9:00 o’clock in the morning, and I was on my way over to the ambassador’s to tutor his daughter. I said, “I’ll give you a ride.” I took him over, and he told me all about it.

We protested to the Soviet Government, and they sent a note back, which is a marvelous piece of casuistry, which I remember translating, which said that the appurtenances of a religious service are the property of the state and they’re made available to the congregation for its use, provided they take good care of them. The fact that they’ve disappeared indicates that the congregation is not taking proper care, and therefore, it’s your fault.”

Q: Oh, my heavens!

ARMSTRONG: When I translated that, I thought, “When we get the ambassador on this, he’ll go right up through the roof.”

Q: Oh, I wouldn’t blame him at all.

ARMSTRONG: He was Jewish, incidentally. He did go through the roof. He went over and saw Molotov, banged the table and so forth, and said, “I happen to have observed the church is across the street from a major police installation. I thought you had pretty good police in this country. Where is the stuff?” So eventually, they dragged in some bedraggled guy and two-thirds of the stuff or three-quarters of it. Probably melted down some of it. But it was an example. He was a combative man, but he always dealt in specific cases, the specific problems, rather than broad policies. A very effective representative of the United States, a tough guy and good.

... I came back from Russia by way of the Trans-Siberian, 14 days in a second-class car. This was the summer of ‘41, in June and July. I got to Vladivostok, was there two or three days, got on a Japanese ship, and went to Japan. I spent seven or eight weeks in Japan, unable to get out, along with a group of other Americans from the Moscow embassy. Because the U.S. had frozen Japanese funds, and the Japanese had frozen our funds, and because we couldn't travel on a foreign ship under Foreign Service regulations, we had a long unit. There was no American ship stopping in Japan because of the freeze. So we sat and twiddled our thumbs at the Imperial Hotel or up at the embassy every day, to ask if anything had happened. The administrative officer, it so happened, was Chip Bohlen, the former First Secretary in Moscow for whom I'd worked. We had a nice time in Tokyo, more or less. It was a great change from Russia. It was clean. But we got tired of sukiyaki.

Then we got on a Japanese ship and went to Shanghai, were in Shanghai another couple of weeks or so, and then an American ship came into Shanghai which had come from the Philippines. It was, in fact, a requisitioned liner which was then a troop transport, so we came home on that. I got into San Francisco in October, after leaving Moscow in June.

I came to Washington and looked around for something to do. I found that because I spoke and read Russian, I was in considerable demand. I guess I must have had about four or five different offers from different agencies, each of which said it was the most important agency in town. I never heard of some of them again. It was a time of mushrooms sprouting in the bureaucracy.

I joined the Lend-Lease Administration because the Russian section was being run by John Hazard, now still a professor at Columbia, who was an old friend and who had Russian experience, having obtained a law degree from Harvard and then a law degree from Moscow Juridical Institute. He's famous in the field. He was organizing a group of people to help the Russians with war supplies. Russia was not eligible for lend-lease as yet, but we were working on their defense orders and using up their money until it ran out, which didn't take long. I started there in October 1941. I stayed with that program up until the war was over.

My function in the Lend-Lease Administration was to supervise the handling of shipping, transportation. Altogether we moved about 1,750,000 tons of stuff in four years. We had terrible times because of convoy difficulties on the North Cape route in 1941-42. I remember one day we lost 22 out of 33 ships. That was PQ-17.

In the springtime, the Arctic ice pushes out and the space between the North Cape and the ice is narrowed. The daylight begins to be greater, so you're running a great risk. The Germans had a base at Kirkenes in Norway, and they just blew us out of the water. I lost several friends on that route. I'd just sit here and organize convoys. We worked fantastic hours, six and a half days a week, and about ten hours a day. Well, we were not being shot at. Anyway, they did need somebody who spoke Russian and who could deal with the Soviet Purchasing Commission. So I was liaison with them and I became informally the coordinator of Russian lend-lease shipping.

The senior people I worked with included John Hazard, the civilian head of the office; our boss was General Wesson, a former Chief of Ordnance. We had a connection with General James H. Burns, General Sidney Spalding, General York, of the U.S. side of the combined Chiefs of Staff. They had a brief from Harry Hopkins to kind of keep an eye on the Russian program and make sure it worked all right. So I found myself working for three or four generals, and I was conscious of my draft eligibility. They said, "Don't you worry about it. Either we get you commissioned and have you assigned back here, or we can get you deferred."

I said, "Which is easier?"

They said, "It's just easier for us to go on having you deferred if you don't mind not wearing a uniform. It doesn't make any difference to us whether you wear a uniform or not. You're doing your stuff." I had very fine relations with our generals, and in that process, developed a great respect for senior officers in the U.S. Army. All of these gentlemen were absolutely splendid people, people of good judgment, good skills, and fine human beings. This was a very worthwhile experience in that context of getting to know senior military types. I've always continued that to respect, and have a lot of friends who are military people.

In the work, you got to know the Russians quite well, because you were dealing on a bare-bones basis with guys who were working hard, who weren't professional diplomats, but were shipping experts or electronics experts or machine tool experts, armor guys in the military or aircraft guys or whatever. This has all been well described in a couple of books, very well done, which I have and which I can refer anybody to. They are accurate and good accounts. Some of us who worked on this helped the authors.

At the end of the war, all the time we were in Lend-Lease, our liaison with the Department of State was very close. I made sure of that myself because I knew the guys on the Russian desk -- Elbridge Durbrow and other people. Because I'd served in Moscow, they weren't worried about me. They recognized that I had the Moscow experience and was on the same wave length, and that we would do what we had to do for the Russians. As one of my Russian colleagues said, "We are allies through misfortune." And we were. So the State Department Russian people counted on me and John Hazard to keep them informed.

We also worked very closely with the research side of the OSS, where the chief of the Russian unit was Professor Robinson, who had been my professor at Columbia, and where several other guys who had been graduate students of his were working. So the Russians assumed that all of us in Lend-Lease were intelligence officers. Well, we were. Why not? That's the way they worked, so we worked that way.

The way it was handled was very bad. This was the fault of Averell Harriman, who was ambassador in Russia at the time. He came back here. I remember a great meeting in which a lot of people in the State Department and we from the Lend-Lease were talking about what we should do. In Lend-Lease, we had urged people in the State Department to please come to some kind of an agreement with the Russians as to how we would terminate Lend-Lease. They were absolutely stalled from doing anything about post-war planning with the Russians by the White House, because Mr. Roosevelt felt he was going to do it all himself, and he and old Joe would get along all right and they would settle everything after the war. Therefore, no significant preparations were made during the latter part of the war for any kind of a transition out of lend-lease, which I regarded as atrocious. Mr. Roosevelt played his own hand and paid no attention to intelligence about what the Russians were really like.

The interesting thing was the Russians had committed themselves to go to war against Japan within, I think it was, 90 days after cessation of hostilities in Europe. We had a special military program running for them to help supply or resupply their Far Eastern armies. We moved that entire program -- and I was personally responsible for this -- on Russian-flag ships, many of which we had lend-leased to them, right through Japanese waters in the five months before the Russians went to war with the Japanese. I remember the funniest requisition I ever cleared for military supply was 300 tons of hay for the cavalry in the Far Eastern Soviet armies. We declared hay a Lend-Lease article and sent it along. We also sent tanks, small arms, ammunition, and all kinds of stuff like that, right through Japanese waters on the Russian-flag ships.

Therefore, there was a problem. We needed to stop the Lend-Lease in Europe because the war was over. But the other program had to go on because the war wasn't over, and the Russians had a commitment to go in. But Mr. Harriman got awfully upset about this and wanted to cut off everything that went to Russia in Europe. He did it in such a categorical fashion, and everybody was so scared of him, since he was the ambassador, that it got too literal. Orders went out to turn around the ships en route. This was improper, because under Lend-Lease regulations, once you put the stuff on a ship, no matter whose ship it was, the other government accepted the goods. You couldn't just automatically reclaim them. Obviously, you could turn an American ship around, but you couldn't turn a Russian ship around. These were mostly American ships on the Atlantic, because Soviet-flag ships were in the Pacific run.

We turned the ships around and then everybody blew up. The Russians said, "You know, we expected you to cut this off sometime because it would be foolish to continue, but there was some other way of doing it besides stopping the hook at the dock in Philadelphia," (where we did most of the loading.) We sat there with ships half loaded, other ships dithering around the middle of the Atlantic. Do we go back? Do we go forward? What do we do? Finally, of course, what we did was let the ships continue if they were en route. Finally we finished loading the ships that were on berth. We didn't put any new ones on berth on the East Coast. Then we got into a discussion of what we should do about this stuff that was on order, that hadn't been delivered.

I found myself negotiating an agreement with the Russians at the end of the war, about September or October 1945, in which we agreed to give them the stuff that was on order, and they agreed to pay for it. It took a bit of arguing, and they tried an end-run, which was to go to Mr. Crowley, who was the head of the Lend-Lease Administration -- or then the Foreign Economic Administration as it had become by then. They bypassed me. Hazard had left to go off and help prepare the Nuremberg indictment. General Wesson had left to go back into retirement. I was in charge of the office, and I was doing the negotiating with the Russians.

TERESA CHIN JONES
Born in the USSR to Chinese Diplomatic Parents
Novosibirsk (1941)

Mrs. Jones was born in the Soviet Union of Chinese diplomatic parents. She was raised in the USSR and the United States. A specialist in Scientific Affairs, both civilian and military, Mrs. Jones' Washington assignments were primarily in the fields of international nuclear and scientific matters and included non-proliferation, arms control, East-West Trade as well as general Political/Military subjects. Her foreign assignments were in the scientific and consular fields. She holds two degrees from the University of Pennsylvania. Mrs. Jones was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

Q: Today is July 2, 2007. This is an interview with Teresa Chin Jones. This is being done on behalf of the Association for Diplomatic Studies and Training, and I am Charles Stuart Kennedy. You go by Terry.

JONES: Yes.

Q: Well, Terry, let's start at the beginning. When and where were you born?

JONES: I was born November 30, 1941, in Novosibirsk, USSR.

Q: All right. So we want to figure out how you came to be born in USSR in Novosibirsk.

JONES: Well in the summer of '41 Hitler invaded the Soviet Union. My father was a Chinese Nationalist diplomat assigned to the Chinese embassy in Moscow. They sent all the diplomatic dependents to Novosibirsk for safety. My mother still remembers going on the train to Novosibirsk, which was just packed with diplomats and their children, and looking at the troop trains going endlessly in the other direction. She doesn't think too many of those troops ever made it home again.

Q: These were the Siberian divisions that were brought in that sort of turned the tide in the battle for Moscow.

JONES: Well they were a never ending stream of men. Once my "expectant" Mom and Dad got to Novosibirsk, they settled in nicely, but on November 30, she fell down a flight of stairs. She was eight months pregnant when I was born. Even Chinese, coming from wartime China, were horrified at the sanitation standards at the hospital. Doctors didn't wash their hands and wore their outside boots into surgery.

It was no surprise when Mom developed peritonitis - considered 100% lethal before antibiotics or even sulfa drugs existed. But fortunately, at this point in time Stalin wanted the Nationalists as friends, so Malenkov (the Soviet Minister of Foreign Affairs) listened to my father's complaints that a total incompetents dealing with my mother and actually ordered one of the better surgeons in Moscow to go there and take care of her. With no antibiotics, they could only operate to drain the pus that developed internally - at a rate of two operations a week. She was down to about 80 pounds and after several months during which she weakened steadily, they were sure she would die.

A good friend of hers, a Eurasian, the Polish Chinese wife of a Chinese diplomat and a very devout Catholic, managed to somehow find a priest to give my mother last rites and to baptize me -- Teresa, after her favorite saint. She also gave my mother the very last of her holy water from Lourdes which she had gotten years ago when on a pilgrimage.

My mother, then came out of the coma and, at age 85, is frail but still healthy. As my mother told us, she remembered that she died and was greeted by a little boy and a little girl carrying a lantern -- spirits whom traditional Chinese believed were there to escort dead souls to judgment. She prepared to go when she heard a loud voice tell her, "Not your time " - thus shocking her out of her coma.

She still had months of hospitalization during which her Russian became superb. She was 20 years old and a high school graduate, which was considered very well educated for a Chinese woman then. By the time she came out of the hospital she could read War and Peace easily in Russian; she could go to plays; and she could bargain for food in the bazaars.

After Novosibirsk, my father was sent to be the #2 at the Chinese Consulate General in Tashkent. I have only vague memories left of growing up in the Consulate General compound in Tashkent. The Consul General was also named Chin and also from Northern China. It was a busy enough post as there were large numbers of Chinese, probably illegal laborers, who got into trouble with the Soviet government. For example, at that time the easiest thing to get in the world was a Soviet Citizenship You went in to get a ration card, they put your thumb on a card and they told you, "You are now a Soviet Citizen." So there was a whole lot of pleading and begging at the consulate.

The area itself was strongly Muslim; and the locals often looked very Asian-probably as a result of centuries of Mongolian control. Even under Stalin there was very high crime, for example, the policeman in front of the Consulate gate was murdered.. For security the consulate bought a half wolf-half dog hybrid from the city zoo. So growing up I had the strongest impression that dogs kept their tails between their legs and howled.

CLINTON L. OLSON
Deputy Chief of Joint U.S.-U.K. Supply Program for USSR
Moscow (1941-1943)

Military Attaché during World War II
Vladivostok (1943)

Ambassador Clinton L. Olson was born in South Dakota in 1916. He received a bachelor's degree from Stanford University. He entered the U.S. Army in 1941 and subsequently received a master's degree in business administration. Ambassador Olson's Foreign Service career included positions in Iran, Austria, Martinique, the United Kingdom (England), Nigeria, and Sierra Leone. He was interviewed on April 17, 1996 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

OLSON: ...I was a second Lieutenant, and became the Production Control Officer for the Small Arms Division in the Ordnance Department in Washington, DC. As such, I did the Production Control work three machine gun, and machine gun ammunition factories. That was in the spring of 1941 and by the summer of 1941 I was doing that work for nine machine gun factories. It was during this period that I became associated with a lot of people with our military supply programs. We were supplying machine guns to the British, the Aussies, the Dutch, and to some of our own people. One thing led to another and the “powers that be” decided to send a special mission to the Soviet Union -- The Lend Lease Program.

Q: Is this prior to our entrance into the war or after?

OLSON: Prior to our entry in the war. This was September 1941. They sent a joint British and American special mission to set up a Military Supply Program for the Soviet Union. Then out of the clear blue sky, I was selected as one of the staff to go to the Soviet Union. We flew to London where we met with the other members of our mission under Averell Harriman.

We were in London for ten days of conferences with the other members of our mission. Our mission was headed by Averell Harriman. The British part of the mission was headed by Lord Beaverbrook. Our London meetings concluded with a luncheon at 10 Downing St. hosted by Winston Churchill. Our mission then joined our two B-24 bombers at Prestwick, Scotland. This was the 24th of September 1941. This you will realize was before Pearl Harbor but the war in Europe was raging on.

Our bombers were B-24s (Liberators). We had never seen one of these since they were our newest planes. They were numbers 73 and 75 built. The actual numbers were “3” and “5” built. The numbers were to mislead the Germans.

On the late afternoon of September 24th we climbed aboard our planes in Prestwick, Scotland and were off to Russia. Our plane carried the crew and eight passengers, four on each side of the catwalk. They included Colonel Philip Famonville who became Chief of our mission to Moscow, Konstantine Oumanski, the Soviet Ambassador to the U.S. and Quentin Reynolds, Foreign correspondent of Colliers magazine. From Prestwick we headed for Archangel via the North Cape. Off the Shetland Islands, we were suddenly attacked by three strange aircraft out of the setting sun, firing 20 M.M. guns. we thought we had had it, but the firing suddenly stopped and along side came three R.A.F. Spitfires. They wagged their wings to say “sorry chaps.” the word hadn’t reached the R.A.F. that we were flying in that area. Happily we had American flags painted on the wings so they finally recognized us.

It became quite an eventful flight off the North Cape. Some strange planes came after us but we were able to duck into some clouds and lost them.

We were supposed to land at Archangel but we saw that the airfield was too small to get out of if we landed there. After checking our fuel supply, we decided we could probably make Moscow with careful flying. So, to the consternation of the Russians, we flew on. They sent MiG fighters after us who dove on us but didn’t try to knock us down. After about six more hours of flying, we were over Moscow and, after some miscues by the Russians, we landed. As we taxied up to the air terminal, all four engines stopped. We were out of gas! All this after 15½ hours of flying, which set the world over water record at the time. We flew most of the time at about 22,000 feet, which was the maximum altitude for B-24s. We were freezing to death in our heavy sheepskin flying suits but it was about 40 below zero at that altitude.

After landing, we were all taken to the Hotel National in Moscow, which was to be our home for a few days. That first evening, there was a reception for our mission at the ambassador's residence, Spaso House, to make arrangements for the conference.

The conference began the next morning at Spiridonifka, the Government's guest home. Aside from the principal delegates - Beaverbrook and Harriman - the participants were: Soviets - Colonel General Yacolev, Colonel General Colkov, and some other Lt. Generals; the British were General Sir Hastings Ismay, Lt. General Sir Gordon McCready, Lt. General Sir Mason McFarland, Lt. General Sir Allen Brook and Colonel Exham. Our delegation was Major General James Burns, Colonel Bundy and Lt. Olson. What a surprise this was to be named a delegate - participant of the Military Supply Committee.

We met for two days discussing the lists of military and other supplies and equipment each side wanted and what each side was able to supply.

At the end of the day, we were all escorted to the Catherine the Great Room of the Kremlin, where Stalin served as host of an incredible banquet for about 80 people. I was by far the lowest ranking person present. The banquet consisted of 26 courses and there were 36 toasts of vodka, wine, etc., drunk. The session lasted until 3 a.m. with movies, etc. Needless to say no one was in very good shape by the time it was over.

The next day, Harriman called the American side together and announced that agreement had been reached on a military supply program for the Soviet Union, and that some would have to stay behind to administer the program. This was good news for me since it meant, I thought, that I could return home. To my surprise, Harriman said, "General Faymonville, you will be chief of the Military Supply Mission to the Soviet Union. Lieutenant Olson, you will be his deputy, for the time being. And thus it was nearly two years before I got out of Russia.

Q: What was your impression of both your reception in Moscow and also Moscow at this time? This was just at the height of the German offensive.

OLSON: We had the feeling that the Russians were ready for anything. They were losing ground to the Germans everywhere.

Q: What was your impression of Stalin?

OLSON: Well, I met Stalin. He was a man about five feet five inches tall and he shook my hand with a very limp handshake. He noticed the red, white, and blue shoulder patch on my uniform and he asked Oumanski, who was the interpreter, about it. Oumanski said to me, "I guess he thinks you're a Marshall, a big star. That is the sign of a Marshall in the Soviet Union." Quentin Reynolds and Wallace Carroll, who were correspondents, were standing behind me, and unbeknownst to me, they recorded all of this. About three weeks later, an article came out on the front page of the New York Times, saying, "Stalin mistakes American Lieutenant for a Marshall.” Stalin, when you looked at him, had white hair and sallow skin and you wondered if he was this “man-eating dictator” of all the Russians. He was a quiet-looking little man, until you looked at his eyes. Then you could feel that here was a powerful person.

Q: It was a pretty difficult time?

OLSON: Yes, the Germans were at the gate of Moscow. On the morning of October 15th, I was following the reports for the military attaché on the radio and listening in and I went to General Faymonville and said, “I don’t know what our policy is going to be, but it seems to me that we were sent here to help the Red Army even if the Germans come in and try to get around us.” The General said, “Yes, I think that’s right. I’ll go and see the Ambassador.” He went to see Ambassador Steinhardt and I didn’t hear from either of them for several hours. All of a sudden, I got a telephone call from Faymonville and he said, “Clint, don’t disturb anybody, but pass the word around that we’ve got to leave town in four hours.” So I had to race around and get a hold of everybody who was in Moscow and we arranged to get to the American Embassy. In the meantime, a blizzard had come up. We could hear the guns. They were fairly close to Moscow. We had heard the guns earlier. This big storm came up and we were told that we were going to go take the train to the Kazan station and we would move out to the East. At midnight, we finally got the orders to move out. So, carrying what little baggage we had with us, we went to the station and the populace were already starting to panic. So, we marched to the station with the Soviets’ Kremlin Guard holding back the populace. We climbed aboard the train and eventually under way. We headed toward the East or Southeast.

Q: Where did you set up your quarters?

OLSON: First, we were in Moscow. After that, we were in the American Embassy.

Q: When you left Moscow, where did you go?

OLSON: We left Moscow and were en route for almost six days to go 500 miles. We ended up in Kuybyshev. There was an old school building which we took over and that became our quarters and our headquarters. It probably had 25 to 30 small rooms. That became our home away from home. We were not very well supplied. On the train going out, we had few supplies. Not much in the way of food, but we had an excellent supply of liquor. It kept our morale up on the train. It took us about six days to make that trip. There were a couple of trains behind us. One of them had the Bolshoi Opera and the Ballet and just by coincidence, all of us being young Americans, by the time we got to Kuybyshev, the trains were all mixed up. So we had the good luck to get to know a fair number of Bolshoi Ballet. As I said, we didn’t have much to eat, but we had a lot to drink.

Q: To move on, what was your mission doing in Kuybyshev? When were supplies starting to come in?

OLSON: Some were coming in immediately. Our job really was to keep track of those supplies coming in, answering the requests of the Russians for the war supplies that they wanted. As it turned out, most of this was done through Washington, between Moscow and Washington. We really did not, honestly, have a hell of a lot to do a lot of the time.

Q: Could you talk a bit about your Commanding General? He was an infamous figure. How did you see him at the time? I've had other views from books and so on. Jim MacArthur had very strong views about him. But what was your impression of him? Where was he coming from?

OLSON: As you probably know from history, he was rather friendly towards the Soviets - somewhat pro-Communist. He was really one of the guys who selected me for this mission. I didn't know that much about him except that he went to Stanford. He was a brilliant man. He was a bit of a protégé of Eleanor Roosevelt, as it turned out. I didn't know all of this when we first got involved. They were sort of "ultra liberal" in their approach to things. He was very secretive for the most part. He was a very gentle, nice, guy in social occasions. He was so regarded, not only by the attachés, but also by the Embassy in Moscow. Some of them were absolutely convinced after a year or so that he was working for the Soviets. There was nothing to indicate that he was disloyal, but I can understand why these fictions came about. I had many conversations with the General in which I disagreed with him on what the Russians were doing, and on Russian policy. I could say this for Faymonville, instead of knocking my ears down, which he could have done, he allowed me to project my opinions.

Q: From my understanding, part of the atmosphere was that they weren't giving due credit to the fact that these were our supplies coming and also our people were under tremendous restrictions. Here we were allies and were supplying them and we were being treated almost as an enemy. Was that true where you were?

OLSON: Absolutely true. We were under surveillance wherever we went. They were doing some surveillance, as primitive as they were in those days. Although some of them weren't so primitive.

Q: It seems that it happened at that time, it's almost hard to recreate it, but there were people who were like "I saw the future and it works." People were seeing the Soviet Union in a glorified way.

OLSON: Like Joe Davies.

Q: It's as if almost all judgment was suspended.

OLSON: That was the Roosevelt sort of approach to things. That is all very true. I happily had an interesting diplomatic job, not to cross swords with the General and not cross swords with my comrades in the Army. We worked that out okay. That attachés sneaked an FBI guy in at one point and he made a report and about ten years ago when one of the books that was written about that period came out, I was quoted as saying, "General Faymonville is not fit to wear the uniform for the United States." I was very upset with what had been written. I was very upset by that because, while I disagreed with Faymonville on many things, I would never make a statement like that.

Q: As a young man in this very tight little community, I assume that you were getting together with some of our younger officers, Tommy Thompson and those. Were they coming at you and saying, “Can’t you do something about your General?”

OLSON: No, the ones who were coming at us like Mike Michela, the Army attaché, who was really almost paranoid about Faymonville. He had been trained into that by Ivan Yeaton, the previous military attaché. They hated Faymonville. They felt powerless inside the Embassy. They felt the attaché should be more powerful than the Special Mission Officers.

Q: It’s the usual thing. Power goes to who’s got something to hand out. If you’ve got something to hand out you’re not going to get it, so maybe part of Faymonville’s problem was the fact of the jealousy on the part of the attaché.

OLSON: Well, even before that, Faymonville having been the military attaché in Russia back in the 1920’s and 1930’s, was much more experienced than these other guys. They were jealous of the history involved. He was a very capable guy and had quite a following of sycophants. His reputation was further denigrated by Roosevelt sending people like Joe Davies over on Special Missions. Joe Davies was one of the biggest idiots I ever met in my life and everybody knew that.

Q: Yes, he was a very wealthy man who had been Ambassador there who portrayed Stalin as a benign ruler.

OLSON: Well, he started showing his would be “Mission to Moscow” in the American Embassy in Moscow and the British Ambassador and all of the other allied Ambassador’s were there to listen to him. After about half a dozen sentences, there were some giggles and pretty soon half of them got up and left. Joe Davies got mad at that point and walked out. He was mad that these people who had walked out on him. I could go on at length about Joe and my relationship with him.

Q: Why don’t we move on. What happened to you? What did you do?

OLSON: In the spring and summer of 1942, I was sent to Murmansk along with a wonderful Naval Officer, Admiral Frankel, then Captain, was holding the fort in Murmansk. In the meantime, they bombed up to 14 times a day from 20 minutes flying time away. They would drop their loads and would come back. I was blown out of bed and the floor above me blown away on one occasion. Happily, there were no injuries.

Q: What was the impression during this period about the American Military community and the survivability of the Soviet Union, by this tie?

OLSON: By that time, Laurence Steinhardt, who had been the Ambassador and the Military Attaché Ivan Yeaton were of the opinion that the German’s would wipe out the Russians. Then came the evacuation of Moscow and they were all counting on that sort of thing happening. Actually when the Russians started to regain control and set off a couple of offensives that were quite successful in changing the atmosphere. Then everybody was pro Soviet, pro Russian and pro victory, and not afraid of losing.

Q: How were you treated as Americans in Murmansk? The British and the Americans were taking tremendous losses in getting to convoys in Murmansk. How were you treated?

OLSON: On the whole, fairly well. Frankel did a great job in Murmansk in gaining support. He was pretty well liked by the Russians up there and those who were right at the front line in effect were generally pro American. We had no great trouble. We didn't have the type of surveillance up there that we had when we were around Moscow. We were treated much better in North Russian than we were in Moscow.

Q: Were you in Murmansk for long?

OLSON: About two months.

Q: And then where?

OLSON: I went back to Moscow. In the meantime, we moved our headquarters in the Military Mission from Kuybyshev, back to Moscow. That was in January 1942. Then I sent off to Tehran, where we had the Persian Gulf Command coming in and I was involved in establishing communications and liaison with our Mission in Moscow.

JAMES MCCARGAR
Vice Consul
Kuybyshev and Moscow (1942-1944)

James McCargar was born in 1920 and raised in San Francisco, California. He received a bachelor's degree from Stanford University in 1941. Mr. McCargar's Foreign Service career included positions in the Dominican Republic, Hungary, Italy, and France. He was interviewed by Charles Kennedy on April 18, 1995.

Q: How did you go to the USSR? Where did you go, and how did this work?

McCARGAR: The U.S. Government chartered a Pan Am Clipper: the four-engine flying boat that was then the transoceanic air transport. The only way that you could get to Russia was through the Middle East and Iran at that point, unless you went on the supply run around the northern tip of Europe into Murmansk, which was deemed too dangerous for everybody -- and shortly was definitively proved to be just that.

So we took off from New York in the chartered Clipper. It was a very interesting bunch of people on board. Louis Fischer, friend of Chicherin, the great Soviet Commissar of Foreign Affairs during the Twenties, and author of an outstanding history of the Bolshevik Revolution (which I had read at Stanford, and which had made Fischer persona non grata to Stalin) was on his way to India to interview Gandhi (Fischer became a great devotee). Maurice Hindus, whose books on collectivization in the Ukraine and southern Russia (Red Bread, Humanity Uprooted) was on board. There were a number of military headed to India and China, among them pilots on their way to Kunming and the “Flying Tigers.” An Army captain who was in fact in OSS -- then called the COI, Coordinator of Information -- who became a lifelong friend. This was very exciting, and instructive, for a young man just starting out.

We refueled in Miami and then Trinidad. As we crossed the mouth of the Amazon (and the equator) the captain executed a sudden drop in altitude, to initiate us as new subjects of Neptune (a peacetime ceremony adapted from ship crossings of the equator that quickly disappeared). Following which one engine went out. We waited one week in Belem for a replacement engine. Parker Hart was Consul there, and I quickly unloaded into his safe the diplomatic pouch which was chained to my wrist, in order to enjoy the sparkling social life then animating this metropolis of the Amazon.

After Belem we refueled again at Natal, and crossed the South Atlantic from there to Fisherman’s Lake in Liberia -- a route that Pan Am had set up under Government contract. The co-pilot on our plane happened to be a Stanford man whom I’d known very well. He told me that when they first laid out the route they flew into Fisherman’s Lake and, as they were about to drop this huge flying boat down onto the lake, they saw all the fishermen in dugouts on the lake leap out of their dugouts and run to shore. They quickly pulled back up for another round at putting the ship down in what they hoped was deeper water.

After Liberia our final Pan Am stop was to be Lagos, in Nigeria. But this was April 1942, and no one knew what the position of the French military in the West African colonies might be. From Liberia we flew south, far out to sea, and then turned east, following at a distance the line of the coast. From off the British colony of the Gold Coast, we had a fighter escort from the British base at Takoradi, which accompanied us until we were past the three French colonies preceding Nigeria, which was, of course, British.

Q: There was still doubt. Vichy was in control there, and de Gaulle was beginning to make some moves, but that was all?

McCARGAR: De Gaulle was in London, and he hadn’t yet made a move into Africa. He had occupied St. Pierre and Miquelon off Newfoundland the previous December, but he had not yet made his unsuccessful attack on Dakar, in Senegal.

Lagos was jammed with refugees from the Far East. Quarters were scarce. Luckily I could bed down at the American Consulate, before taking off the next morning in an American DC3, C-47 in the military terminology. But it took 3 days to cross Africa. There were not yet any navigational aids between southern Nigeria and the Sudan, so the American military didn’t yet fly at night. Where we landed in late afternoon was where we spent the night. Kano, in the grasslands of northern Nigeria was the first stop, then a night at Maiduguri, near French territory. Next we overflew Chad, avoiding the French base at Fort Lamy, then a stop at El Fasher, already in the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, but still the Sahara, and then a night in Khartoum.

McCARGAR: Khartoum looked like the sumum of civilization, after the land we had crossed to get there. I found the southern Sahara terrifying. It's alternately black, red, black-red, and so on. It looks like hell -- Dante's version. I guess it really is if you're on that ground and you don't know how to make your way out.

From Khartoum we made a refueling stop at Wadi Halfa, on the Egyptian border, and from there we finally got to Cairo. There I spent a week waiting for a plane to get me on to Baghdad.

I Finally took off from Cairo in a British Sunderland flying boat. We landed on the Dead Sea in Palestine, which is, as you know, well below sea level. Geologically, historically fascinating, but as a flight it's hair-raising, unless you're well forewarned, which I was not. The plane takes off from the Nile in Cairo and after flying a bit just above the water, it turns to the east. After some desert, still flying at a very low level, suddenly you see on either side of the plane cliffs rise up. You're in between them. The plane is actually descending a ravine into the Dead Sea. The wing tips looking to be but a few feet from each cliff. Absolutely terrifying.

Q: You're going when? What are we talking about - February or March?

McCARGAR: I left New York in April and we're now well into May.

Q: When you were in Cairo, were people talking about Rommel pounding at the gates? Some of his great offenses were mounted about then.

McCARGAR: When I was in Cairo, I went over to Shepherd's Hotel, which was the place to go. And they had just received Rommel's famous telegram reserving a suite. They said he'd be there shortly. Needless to say, this was the talk of the town. Also needless to say, if you've just supposedly recovered from amoebic dysentery, you don't go through Cairo without doing some penance -- "gypsy tummy" they called it there. I was sharing a room at the Carlton Hotel with two officers, South Africans who had just come in on rest and recreation from the Western Desert. They didn't want to talk about it very much, but what they did say was, "This can't go on, the slaughter is too great, its too horrible, and somebody's got to win this Goddamn thing out there one way or another." Of course, Montgomery finally managed it.

Egypt at the time was not exactly welcoming. I was carrying a courier bag, though not a courier letter, since no one thought that nicety necessary at the time. I was traveling with a diplomatic passport, though. The bag was locked to my wrist as I went through Egyptian Customs. The Customs officer, whose general air was that he was not certain he would allow me into Egypt, asked me, "How much money do you have?" I said "That's none of your business." We had a little argument back and forth. I've forgotten what it was that produced his final remark, but he concluded the discussion with the haughty statement, "This is Egypt. We're neutral in this war."

At the Embassy (though I think it was still a Legation) Wally Barbour (later to be our Ambassador to Israel for eleven years), whom I was to see a number of times over future years on East European problems, was the man with whom I dealt. He took the pouch, quite devoid of any of the sense of awe it had originally bestowed on me. It turned out to contain a coding device for the mission in Saudi Arabia. It was a big, heavy, canvas and leather bag; the device inside was no more than a foot long and ten inches wide. Both Wally and I accepted the assumption that it was very urgent.

But to return to the Dead Sea. I found it difficult to realize where I was. After the British military had completed their errands, they managed to lift the plane off the Dead Sea, and we flew on to Habbaniyah.

Q: Which is a major British base near Baghdad.

McCARGAR: Exactly. That is, it was then. Habbaniyah, of course, is a lake. I was deposited on the dock, and the plane went on to the Persian Gulf, India, and as much of the East as was still in friendly hands.

Two Indian Army soldiers offered me a ride into Baghdad from Habbaniyah. It was a long ride. I was, of course, familiar with the recent events in Iraq: the British occupation to block both pan-Arab and pro-German elements and insure Allied control of Mesopotamia. But completely naive in the more worldly sense, I took the frequent smiles and strange language of my armed escorts as standard procedure. My escorts knew better. They dropped me finally at the American Legation -- at which point with hue and cry they demanded to be paid (in dollars). I was baffled as to what to do. At my most indecisive Fraser Wilkins came out and shooed the Indian Army off. I spent just one night at the Legation. The next day I got on a British land plane which flew up to Tehran, where I had to spend quite a bit of time, about 3 weeks.

Q: What was the situation in Tehran as you saw it?

McCARGAR: In Tehran (also still a Legation) Louis Dreyfus was the Minister. He was a kind host, and I went several times to the Residence for meals. You probably know that Residence. I was stunned by it. One cause was the cool stream running through the dining room. Yet another cause for astonishment was my sudden understanding of the poem, "In a Persian Garden." The American Residence was the only one of the great compounds I entered. But it was enough to explain all "Persian gardens." On the way to Tehran you fly over what looks to be burnt land. In the city itself, the same burnt land is all around you. Stark mountains overlooking dry and dusty streets, buildings of the same dusty color. But then you go behind the walls of the great compounds, and enter into a different land, one of beautiful, towering, almost wild greenery. The American Residence thus lay in what looked to the newcomer like a vast park. As I say, the dining room in the American Residence had a little river through it, gurgle, gurgle, cooling you off, absolutely delightful. A great change from the Ferdowsi Hotel, where I stayed. All honor to the great Persian poet -- but not much of a hotel.

The city itself was full of Poles, practically everywhere you went all were Poles. Through an agreement between the Polish Government-in-Exile in London and the Soviets the Polish Army, General Anders commanding, was being formed in Tashkent from Poles scattered all over the Soviet Union after the Nazi-Soviet partition of Poland. Poles who could make their way to Tashkent (and they numbered in the thousands -- except, of course, the thousands murdered at Katyn) assembled there. The survivors and new recruits would then be sent over the mountains to Tehran. From there units were sent to the west, initially to the Western Desert, where they began the long road that would include Monte Cassino. I frequently ate in one or another of the Polish messes, and became duly fond of fruit soup.

When I left Washington, Loy Henderson had asked me to take care of a Polish diplomat on his way to Kuybyshev, who was on the plane the whole trip with us. He was the most morose -- I mean, morose as Poles can get, and I have a high Polish decoration, so I'm high on Poles -- but this was the most morose Pole I ever encountered. Incidentally, after the war he took the wrong turn and went to the Communists. But I took good care of him. The result was that General Anders, who was in town when I got to Tehran --

Q: He was the head of the Polish Army?

McCARGAR: He was the Commander-in-Chief of the Army he was forming. The Commander-in-Chief of all Free Polish forces was General Sikorsky, who was also Prime Minister of the Polish Government-in-Exile in London. The next year General Anders was given command of the Polish 2nd Corps in Italy. But in Tehran in 1942 he invited me to fly into Tashkent with him. I already had a passion for Central Asia, which I've never assuaged, and this was one of those things in life I really wanted to do. I told the General I was most grateful, and I would check with my authorities. I told the American Legation of what I believed to be an extraordinary opportunity. (No Westerner had been in Central Asia since the indomitable Fitzroy Maclean, of the British Embassy, sneaked in there a few years before.) The next thing I knew was a summons from Minister Dreyfus to the Residence. He read me a terrible riot act; "How do you dare?" and all that sort of thing. I only had one other Foreign Service Officer speak to me that way -- Elbridge Durbrow in one of his rages, also about an airplane flight. Dreyfus said Admiral Standley, our Ambassador in Kuybyshev had --

Q: That's where our Embassy had moved because of the German offensive, after they had evacuated Moscow?

McCARGAR: Yes, after a brief period in Kazan. Ambassador Standley's message via Minister Dreyfus was that he wanted me to come by a route that had been planned (though I had not been let in on the plan), and to bring several sacks of mail waiting in Tehran -- and fresh vegetables. So I didn't go to Tashkent. My thanks and regrets to General Anders were genuine.

So, instead of soaring over Khorasan and down into the valleys and plains of the Oxus and Jaxartes, I joined Maurice Hindus, and Alden Haupt, another FSO, with mail and sacks of vegetables, on a Russian airplane to chuff over the Elburz Mountains and down into Azerbaijan. I'd never before or since seen an airplane like that; it had what looked to be corrugated tin sides.

Q: Sort of like the Junkers, the Ford trimotor, or the German standard transport plane?

McCARGAR: Yes. Plus bicycle wheels and a wooden propeller. None of the side panels fit so you got a good bit of fresh air. From Tehran you go up and over the mountains to get down to the Caspian. The plane has to go to about 18 to 19,000 feet. I think the pass is about 16 and a half, 17,000 feet. The pilot and the co-pilot, a woman, (merely noted, nothing against her, but they were rare at that time) had oxygen. The three passengers in the back, the vegetables, and the mail did not have oxygen. So we just conked out. You fell asleep, that was all. When we awoke there we flying over all this green jungle in Azerbaijan, on our way into Baku. So I can't tell you what lies between Tehran and Baku. I have no idea.

We then had to wait in Baku for about five days while the Russians tried to get us some kind of rail transportation. They finally put us on a train headed for Rostov on the Don. In the middle of the night, when we're half way to Rostov, the Germans captured Rostov. I can't remember if it was the first or second time. The train crew got the word and we screeched to a halt. We then backed up about 180 kilometers to a junction called Tikhoretskaya. A line went from there to Stalingrad. We got off there, in order, as we were instructed by railroad officials, to switch to river transport. This is now late May, early June, and the battle was still 5 months off. Soviet troops were still coming into the city from the south and west.

Q: This was the southern push of the German 1942 offensive?

McCARGAR: It was the early part of it. By late autumn of that year the Germans were on a line that ran from east of Orel (the Soviets had managed to hold onto their traditional artillery manufacturing center of Tula) through Voronezh to Stalingrad, and then south almost to Grozny (now so much in other news). They were on the northern slopes of the Caucasus, and this was when one German patrol climbed Mt. Elburz and planted the Nazi flag there. The whole area through which we had passed after our train left, say, the region of Grozny was in German hands. That push would of course culminate in the Battle of Stalingrad. And it was already on the horizon. On our way to Stalingrad we had to get off the train twice while German aircraft bombed. You just got off the train, lay in a ditch, and when the whistle was blown, got up, boarded the train, and went on.

I took advantage of our one-day stay in Stalingrad to follow the Russian fashion and get myself shaved (not even Russian soldiers shave themselves). It was undeniably one of the worst things that ever happened to me. The young girl engaged in this butchery had a straight razor -- in which even from a distance you could see the nicks in the blade. She'd go down one side, leaning in to follow the line of the cheek, leaving bloody streaks down my cheek with each nick. Anyway, I survived that. Then we got on a ship to go up the Volga to Kuybyshev. You'd be surprised at the name of the ship. It was the "J. V. Stalin." It's capacity was 600 passengers, and we were 3000, mostly Red Army soldiers from the front, on that ship.

We three, with our vegetables and mail, were the only foreigners, and we were given staterooms. But before we could reach our staterooms at night, the officers would order the Red Army soldiers into the passageways in the interior of the ship. They'd have them lie down. Then they'd order a second group to come in and lie down on the top of the first group. And then a third layer would come in and lie down on the top of the second one. Then we were told to walk on them to get to our staterooms. This went on for three nights.

Q: What was your impression looking back on it? A fantastic view of the Soviet Union at the time of its greatest challenge. You were the new boy there, wide-eyed I assume, looking at this thing.

McCARGAR: Well, I was, of course, fascinated by all this. I had a lot of conversations with the Russian soldiers. They were impressive: young, courageous, no trace of discouragement in the face of the continuing German advance. They weren't bothered particularly by the primitive accommodations for them on the ship. I guess they'd rather be stepped and slept on than be at the front at that moment, anyway. I also remember coming through the Kuban, on the train that took us to Stalingrad. Maurice Hindus had not been in the Soviet Union for, I think, ten years -- not since the success of his earlier books on collectivization: Humanity Uprooted, Red Bread, and the famine in the Ukraine and the south of Russia that Stalin had instigated.

Q: The elimination of the kulaks?

McCARGAR: Yes. Hindus would look out the train window as we passed by these villages made up of little huts -- looking like adobe -- with grass and straw roofs and a big grass street between them. (In the Kuban they were mostly Cossack villages, the Cossacks not having been among the most preferred citizens during the events of the 1930's.) Hindus kept saying, "This is marvelous. This is the greatest thing I've ever seen. The improvements that they've done here! What a marvel!" Hindus would go on like this at each village. And there I was, looking at what seemed to me great poverty. A very simple kind of life. I didn't know what Hindus was talking about because I hadn't been there in the earlier times. When we got to Kuybyshev, which is a miserable town -

Q: Kuybyshev was south and east of Moscow?

McCARGAR: It's well south. It's below where the Volga, a little bit after Kazan, starts to turn south. It's sort of half way between Gorki (now again Nizhni Novgorod) and Stalingrad (Volgograd) on the Volga. But it's still a long way from Astrakhan and the Caspian. It was called Tsaritsyn before. I think they've given it a new name; either given it a new name or gone back to the old one. It was a miserable town. They'd moved the whole Diplomatic Corps there. The facilities were very primitive. There was a kind of opera house, or central theater, with some kind of entertainment. All the foreigners gathered there, but the trouble was you'd have to go in the dark and come home in the dark. And you could damn well break your leg and your head, because they had potholes in that city that were even greater than anything I've seen in Washington, D.C.

Q: Well, let me tell you. I was in Kyrgyzstan about a year-and-a-half ago and there were 10 foot holes in the sidewalks. I just didn't go out at night because those were on the sidewalk. You'd drop into the sewer. They couldn't afford to have the street lights on - so its scary.

McCARGAR: Well that's what Kuybyshev was like. I spent a couple of weeks there.

Q: Technically, this was our Embassy there, wasn't it?

McCARGAR: Yes, it was our Embassy.

Q: Who was the Ambassador? What were they doing in this out-of-the-way place?

McCARGAR: Our Ambassador was William Standley, a four-star Admiral. He'd been Chief of Naval Operations and was a great pal of FDR. In fact, Standley had brought along as his Naval Attaché, a man named Jack Duncan, who in due course made Admiral. I think Duncan was later made Ambassador to Peru. But he was in Moscow when I was in Kuybyshev. When I came to know Duncan in Moscow he took pleasure in saying the only reason he was there was that when Admiral Standley was CNO he, Duncan, was in charge of seeing that when the President was on a Navy ship (something he enjoyed very much) the appropriate supplies of gin and vermouth, and whatever else was needed, were aboard ship -- contrary to Naval Regulations.

I was taken to see Admiral Standley. A canny old gentleman, pleasant of manner. When the moment presented itself, I made my respectful protest that he would not let me go to Central Asia. He said "Look, I'm a Navy man, and for us the most important thing in the world is the mail. We haven't been getting our mail here the way we should, and I wanted to try out this new route. That's why I wanted you to come this way through Baku." I said "Yes, sir, yes, sir, yes, sir." Actually, Standley was a very nice gentleman, even if he didn't care about getting some information on Central Asia. You may recall that, later the next year, he came out with this blast that the Russians were making no recognition of the help they were being given them by the United States. In other words, he was also the feisty type.

The chief person I can remember who was helping him at that moment was Eddie Page, the senior man on the staff there. Eddie was a Russian expert. In fact, earlier that same year he had given me my oral Russian-language exam in Washington. He later served Averell Harriman very effectively as a senior aide. I had occasion to come across him six years later when he was in the Rome Embassy, and then again in the mid-fifties, when he was Consul General in Munich. His final FS post was as Ambassador to Bulgaria.

In Kuybyshev I had one strange encounter. While walking in the street, somebody nudged me and pointed out two chaps walking on the other side of the street. My companion said, "That's the Bulgarian Embassy." You may recall that the Bulgarians remained at peace with the Russians throughout the entire Second World War, until, near the very end, the Russians invaded them. The two Bulgarian diplomats spoke to no one, and no one spoke to them, but they kept up the pretense of relations with Mother Russia. We were not allowed to see any Soviet citizens. Kuybyshev didn't have the facilities for such encounters that Moscow had.

But I did see one person there who always impressed me. He came around to the Embassy, usually in the evenings, when either food or drink, or both, were available. He was a rather famous figure in history. His name was George Andreichin. He was a Bulgarian who had been very prominent in the Comintern. How he had survived until 1942, I don't know. He came in and talked very freely with a lot of us in the Embassy. We assumed he went back and reported whatever he picked up. Eventually Stalin had him executed, in 1947. A very interesting man. He knew a lot of history, and he was not averse to telling it. I was fascinated with all of this.

We had just gotten news of the Soviet custody of the crew of the American aircraft that had landed in the Soviet Primorsk Krai (Maritime Province) after General Doolittle's famous raid on Tokyo in April 1942. All I knew, and was told, was that the crew was being held in a town called Penza, which is about half way between Kuybyshev and Moscow. So I was put on a train -- I confess I was poured onto a train in good Russian style -- and went to Moscow. It took 48 hours. I looked out at Penza, but that really didn't help anything.

I was very excited about getting to Moscow which, even in that grim wartime, had a certain magnificence to it, a great weight of history. At the beginning I stayed at Spaso House, the Ambassador's Residence. The Embassy in Moscow at that moment consisted of Tommy Thompson, myself, and two clerks, Newt Waddell and another whose name I've forgotten. All four of us lived at Spaso House, as did Captain, later Admiral, Jack Duncan and two Assistant Naval Attachés. The U. S. Military Mission was located right across from the Kremlin in the Mokhovaya building, a part of Moscow University which the U. S. Government rented from the Soviets as our combined Chancellery and staff residence. A very old friend from Stanford, by then a Major in the Army, was on the staff of the Military Mission.

Brigadier-General Philip Faymonville headed the Military Mission. Faymonville was a very controversial character. He was a San Franciscan, and reputed to be held in high regard by the White House -- more narrowly attributed by rumor to mean either Harry Hopkins or Mrs. Roosevelt. As importantly, he was a very close friend of Lavrenti Beria. Not the kind of person you want to be close friends with.

Q: Beria was the head of the KGB, I mean the NKVD?

McCARGAR: NKVD. He was People's Commissar of Internal Affairs (in succession to the murderous Yagoda and Yezhov).

Q: He was the hatchet man.

McCARGAR: Yes, and how! Faymonville was extremely pro-Russian. He wouldn't listen to a word against the Soviet Union, or anything that went on there. This caused a lot of tension.

Q: You talk about the tensions within the American representation in the Soviet Union. I mean, we were having real problems with the Soviets at that time, weren't we? With our allies?

McCARGAR: Well, there was dissatisfaction on Stalin's part. And this constant pressure for the Second Front. The delays until 1944 in the invasion of Western Europe, the 1942 North African and 1943 Italian campaigns were regarded by many high-ranking Russians, both military and political, as diversions, if not actually evidence of an underlying ill-will towards the Soviet Union.

However, FDR and those who were running affairs were giving the Russians every possible aid they could summon. Sometimes even at the cost of other theaters of war. For example, they had built this whole transport and infrastructure system across Iran so that cargoes unloaded at Abadan could go to the southern Soviet border stations. Planes unloaded from ships at the Persian Gulf could be flown off direct to the Russian front by Soviet pilots. From now on the Russians could take the stuff and make use of it.

Actually, while I was in Moscow, it was the time of the great disaster on the Murmansk run. I've forgotten what the exact figures were, but out of a 32-ship convoy from the British Isles, at least 22 went down. It was terrible. From their bases in Arctic Norway the Germans attacked the convoys with airplanes and subs, also with surface vessels. That had a very great effect on us in Moscow. I must say, partly because we all had personal effects (and food and liquor) on those ships. At that time we were in fact living out of the Kremlin Commissary, and so ate perfectly well. We still had the Chinese servants in Spaso House, and we all, including the Naval Attachés, ate there, except for the Military Mission, who rather remained off to one side. But, even if we did not talk too much about it, none of us underestimated the menace of the German closure of the Northern Route to the Soviet Union.

Q: What was Thompson doing and what were you doing there?

McCARGAR: Thompson was -- well, you had to have somebody in Moscow. Stalin was in Moscow -- after he reappeared following his famous three-day disappearance act when Germany attacked. Tommy was maintaining relations with the Kremlin and those of the leadership -- Molotov, for example -- who were there. We had visitors coming through all the time who had to be taken to the Kremlin. There were messages that bypassed Kuybyshev, or were repeated from there, for destinations in Moscow. There were allies in Moscow -- the British Naval Mission, headed by a very congenial Admiral, and some of their diplomatic staff -- John Russell, among others. And every once in a while Sir Stafford Cripps would drop in. There were others: the Swedes had refused to go to Kuybyshev. All these were part of Tommy's duties.

We made one of the bedrooms at Spaso into a code room, and I slept there. Once we got a message from Laurence Steinhardt in Ankara, where he had been transferred as Ambassador after leaving the Moscow Embassy. It took us half-a-day to decode this missive. It contained an entire list of Steinhardt's belongings which he wanted sent from Moscow to Ankara in wartime. It included, and this is not a joke because I saw it with my own eyes, "a box with string too short to use but too long to throw away." We found that box. To his eternal credit, Newt Waddell was later detached from the Moscow Embassy, and sent down the Volga to Astrakhan with all of Steinhardt's belongings. From there I think he went by ship to Baku, and from there the Russians got him over to Leninakan on the Turkish border. From there Newt and the Steinhardts' boxes and boxes of belongings were trucked to Ankara -- in wartime! This sort of thing made you a little bit nervous.

Q: Was Thompson going in to see Stalin, even though he was pretty low ranking?

McCARGAR: No, he wasn't. He was working through Stalin's Kremlin offices. I don't think he ever went to see him. When Stalin would give a dinner for some visiting American dignitaries, Tommy went. I was too junior to go but Tommy went. Tommy, by that time, was already extremely capable. And he was very astute in avoiding any impression on Ambassador Standley's part that he was usurping his position in any way.

There wasn't a lot of connection with the local citizenry. Of course, there were the correspondents. Practically all of them I got to know quite well, both British and American. There was the sad case of Negley Farson. When I was at Stanford I had read a book by Farson called Way of A Transgressor, which greatly impressed me. It was about his urban life, and then his escape for some years to the wilds of Vancouver Island. Obviously, I was eager to meet him, but his colleagues in the news corps advised against it. Apparently he was in great pain from an incurable leg injury, did not want to see anyone, and drank heavily.

When the Germans essayed an air raid on Moscow, I would usually go to Harold King of Reuters' room at the Metropole Hotel, where the correspondents were billeted. Harold, of whom I would later on see a great deal in Paris, had a room with a balcony. The view over the city was splendid, and we would watch the barrage balloons would go up, and listen to the guns. But I never saw any real damage in the heart of Moscow.

At some point, I moved out of Spaso House and into the Mokhovaya building. Years ago, the building went back to the University of Moscow to which it belonged in the first place. It gave a great view of the Kremlin. It was reasonably comfortable. We were all subject to the wiles of the NKVD's "swallows," as the Russians themselves called these young girls who would call you on the phone, the minute -- it didn't matter where you lived -- the minute you moved into one apartment or another. Some girl would be on the phone and she'd want to meet you at the well-known "National corner" -- the corner of Gorki and Mokhovaya Streets, where stood the National Hotel, just down from the main Post Office.

The Russians, being very hierarchical, arranged things in orderly fashion. Top ranks -- but top ranks only -- had access to a ballerina. I was honored with a circus acrobat. These young ladies were very forthright. They'd say "Look, tomorrow I have to go to the NKVD. I've got tell them what you've been doing. What do I tell them?" (I don't mean to be flip about this aspect of wartime life: some Americans were fortunate to make the acquaintance of some extraordinary Russian women, of great talent and character, and even more fortunate to be able to marry them and to get them out of the Soviet Union.) Ultimately, of course, all this changed.

Q: Were you under any particular constraints? Of course, it was completely different in the Cold War. We're talking about the hot war in which the Soviets are on our side.

McCARGAR: Moscow was much easier once the Germans had been driven back. It was much easier than other places. I was told then that the greatest place any of the people who had been in the Moscow Embassy had ever been was Kazan. At the evacuation of Moscow they were first sent to Kazan. The NKVD hadn't had time to get down there, and the citizens of Kazan, a great many of them, were absolutely friendly and delightful. It was like living in a normal city. Then the Embassy staff were sent on to Kuybyshev. By this time the NKVD was there, and the Embassies were squeezed back into their diplomatic ghetto. Moscow was easier until the Diplomatic Corps came back. I don't recall meeting any male Russians in the time I was in Moscow. And I was there for over two months.

Q: What were you doing?

McCARGAR: Coding and decoding, coding and decoding, coding and decoding.

Q: All this was on the one-time pad or was it a strip machine?

McCARGAR: We had a strip board, so-called machine. Nothing mechanical about it. I don't know why they didn't use the one-time pad, but we were on the strip machine. We also had the Gray Book, which I understand was available in any bookstore the world around. There was a lot of administrative work and the Gray Book was easy to do. There was an Air Corps General, whose name I've forgotten, who came after I'd gone out to the Far East. I was told later he came in and wanted to make a big hit with the Russians. They took him down to Central Asia to show him something. The American General gave the Soviet Air Force in Moscow a strip board so that they could keep in touch while he was in Central Asia.

Q: Wasn't that nice!

McCARGAR: You often wonder.

Q: Did you have the feeling, either in Moscow or in Kuybyshev, (we're talking about the two periods) that the American Embassy was very much engaged or was it pretty much just military aid at that time?

McCARGAR: Oh, no. The Embassy was very much engaged. I don't remember if it was then or little bit later, but, for example, we got queries from the Department. "Do you think that when the Russians reach their former borders that they will get out of the war at that time?" There were a lot of political questions like this that were going back and forth. People in the Department were thinking ahead and the Embassy was getting a lot of queries of this kind. To that extent, they were very useful. Also, through the other diplomatic missions, and this leak and that, the Embassy could pick up quite a bit.

This is the period, incidentally, when Kremlinology got its start. When people learned to figure out what was going on in Russia from these abstruse signs that you got, bird droppings, so to speak, and one thing and another. I remember years later, Walter Stoessel, on his first assignment to Moscow, had to cover the cultural world. And he got onto it. At that point I was back in Washington reading some of these materials. I was struck by the extent to which Walter had caught onto this technique. He could tell you about a performance of "Swan Lake" at the Bolshoi and draw from it the correct political conclusions about what was going on inside the Kremlin. To people who don't know the technique, it seems extremely weird, but it's a perfectly valid thing that worked for a while. It went beyond just looking to see who was on Lenin's Tomb on the First of May or November 7.

Q: I'm told your great analysis of papers, local papers in particular -- who was mentioned, who wasn't mentioned, how often they were mentioned, on what page and things of this nature, were very useful.

McCARGAR: For example, later, the Vladivostok the paper we had -- it was not much of a paper -- but we read it faithfully. We had a Russian woman working at the Consulate General, Ida Borisovna Minovich, our only secretary. A bird-like woman, very bright. She came into my office one day with the paper, and said "Did you see this?" There was the announcement by the Kremlin of a great honor, a medal of some kind, given to a man named Ramzin. If you knew Bolshevik history, this was absolutely astounding. Ramzin, a brilliant engineer, was the head of what they called the Promyshlennost' Part, the Industrial Party, which supposedly opposed Stalin and the Bolsheviks in the Thirties. There had been a big show trial of those people. The British got involved in that, not to their benefit. Ramzin then disappeared. It was assumed that he had been executed. He was not. He was put in a laboratory with all the equipment he needed. He worked throughout the whole war producing what the leadership wanted. He did so well that they publicly decorated him. You could pick up strange things like this all along, which were great insights.

In any event, after my Moscow experience, I got on the Trans-Siberian -- then a 12-day journey from Moscow to Vladivostok. You had to get on with a lot of supplies. I had diplomatic pouches, mail sacks, and boxes and cartons of food. But everyone in the Embassy was after me before I left. The Agricultural Attaché took me aside and said, "You've got to tell me how the corn crop is." I said "I'm a city boy". I'm afraid I wasn't of much use to him. The military, and just about everyone else whispered to me, "You've got to look for the BAM railroad." The BAM railroad branches off from the Trans-Siberian and goes north of Lake Baikal, ending up on the Pacific Ocean, or more properly, Tatar Strait, at, I think, Nikolaevsk-on-Amur, which is just opposite Sakhalin Island. In other words, it's a route much less vulnerable to the Chinese and Japanese. Everyone urged me, "You've got to look at Bodaibo and see if there's a switch leading out to the north from there." Another one that excited everyone was the possibility of a tunnel under the Amur at Khabarovsk. Nobody is going to tell this, but all of us who did this journey leaned out the train window in Bodaibo. Tracks went this way, tracks went that way. How did we know? At Khabarovsk everybody got out and peered into the darkness. What amuses me is, about three years ago, i.e., about 1992, the Russian Government announced the opening of the BAM railroad.

Q: Oh yes. That was a major, and very lengthy, accomplishment.

McCARGAR: Exactly. Here we were fussing about in 1942 and trying to find the damn thing when they had probably advanced only eight kilometers off into the taiga.

Q: I was wondering when you mentioned this. It seems like a time warp because I know this was the great thing of the seventies and eighties.

McCARGAR: But whichever line you cross Russia on, it gives you a very impressive idea of the size of the country. After a week in the same train, you really don't care whether you get there or not.

But there were many interesting things en route besides the BAM railroad. For example, as we got up towards the Urals, towards Sverdlovsk (Yekaterinburg, of ill-repute) you would see long lines of freight cars filled with people on sidings. These were the refugees from Leningrad (who were only able to be evacuated in mid-winter, across frozen Lake Ladoga). Our train stopped about every hour, I don't why, but that's just the way it was. The train stopped, not necessarily in a station. You'd get out, you'd walk up and down, everybody. On these occasions, if you stopped by one of these sidings where people were living in freight cars, they all wanted to know how the war is going, what is going on. News. They wanted news. Everybody exchanged as much information as they had. Nobody had a great deal, but whatever they had. A little later on, we began to get a different group of people in these freight car sidings. These were the evacuees from the Voronezh area -- the refugees from the 1942 German southern offensive you spoke of. The Russians evacuated, I think, 2 million people from the Voronezh area, which was heavily industrialized. The equipment of all the factories was sent out to Siberia. When I went through Novosibirsk going east, it was a city, as I recall, of 400-500,000 in 1942. When I came back, a year later, in 1943, there was almost 2 million people living and working in an around Novosibirsk. What was going on was unbelievable.

And, as I mentioned, the sheer size of the country carried its own lesson. I was always very fond of Rachmaninov's music. You know, Rachmaninov, in all the years before the Second World War, would go out once every year to the Polish-Russian border -- the most unattractive part of Russia, near the Pripet Marshes. He'd spend a whole day out there lying on the ground, looking across at Russia, and crying. I began to understand this passion of the Russian people for their land. It began to mean something to me. I could see it. Some parts are very beautiful (though I'm not much for the steppes). But Russia has everything that you want in terms of topography and climate. And I began to understand some of the Russians' seemingly ineradicable feelings for their land.

I also came eventually to understand something else. When I left Russia it was with that very cynical conclusion that one arrives at, which is that people get the kind of government that they deserve. It is an arguable point. But in time, over years of work and changes in our century, I came to take another view. These people among whom I had lived for two years, in exceptional circumstances, were so cowed, so terrified by what Stalin and company were doing to them (at that point we didn't quite yet blame it all on Stalin) that they were paralyzed. The first view denies the existence of evil. The second admits its existence. It was the Bolshevik and Soviet knout -- and, of course, its earlier versions -- that explained the fact that the Russian people would not and could not stand up for themselves against authority.

You know what was the Russian announcement in those days used by the NKVD when they knocked on the door at night to take people away? It was "Zdyes vlast'," meaning "Here is authority." It didn't say which authority. It didn't say "Here are the police," or "Here is the NKVD." No. "Here is authority." The people did as they were told. As I say, that produced my initial harsh judgment that I came away with after two years there. But in time, after years, that would change. A generation, or more, of dissidents, of intellectuals, of scientists, Solzhenitsyn, Sakharov, countless others, less famed, perhaps, but no less demonstrative of a vigorous individual Russian spirit would produce a more generous, more hopeful basic judgment.

Q: Did you get the feeling, as you looked in Moscow and from the whole trip, that, although tremendous things were being done, there wasn't a very operative system? How did you feel about it? Did things work well?

McCARGAR: Well, they must have worked well somewhere. But they worked with a terribly harsh discipline. For example, the children were working in the factories. Anyone over 12 years of age was working in a factory at that time. Three times late -- execution. For a kid, say a 13-14 year old kid, three times late -- executed. The discipline in the Red Army -- officers had the right to kill the men under their command. (This was traditional, and has been so in the Russian Army for a long time.) There were an enormous number of women serving in the Red Army: the penalty for pregnancy was execution. And so on. The ultimate in terror and discipline. But something was working somewhere. That's for sure.

But let's take Vladivostok. It was then a city of 220,000 people. It could be one of the most beautiful cities on the Pacific Rim. It's typical Pacific Rim: indented bays, forested inlets, mountains rolling down to the sea. And so on. Absolutely lovely. Steep hills, lovely views, all that. But substantially they had gained nothing since the Americans occupied it after the First World War. The Americans built a hospital, they built this, they built that. I had a woman servant, Shura, who was one of the few older inhabitants left in the city. And she would, very shyly, point out "The Americans built that, the Americans built that." But after the Americans left, in 1921-22, the Soviets, in the ensuing twenty years, had built four apartment buildings in town, eight stories high. None of them had running water. If you lived on the eighth floor and you wanted water, you came down to the ground, you pumped the pump and you hauled it up. That was it.

Everything in the city was pretty worn out. Vladivostok's great days were from 1900 to 1910. On the other hand, the port worked well. All investment had gone into the port. You'd go along Lenin Street, and you'd see these very sleek cruisers in the Naval port. The Soviets built only Italian style for their Navy, and their ships had lovely lines.

Q: They still do. They're much nicer than, say, the American or the British, which can be more functional. But I've seen shots of the now-rusting Soviet Fleet and they're beautiful ships.

McCARGAR: The influence of the Italian naval architects. You will recall Stalin's insistence at the end the Second World War on receiving a share of the Italian Fleet.

But to return to Vladivostok, we were really prisoners there. We were allowed to go to the restaurant of a single hotel -- the Chelyuskin, named after the great Soviet polar explorer, but formerly the Versailles (and now given back its original name by its Japanese owners). The clientele was limited to foreigners, high Party functionaries, senior military, etc. The food and vodka was accompanied by the saddest Polish orchestra I have ever heard.

Great parts of the city were closed to us. We couldn't go to the port, for example. We could go outside of town -- towards the north -- on one designated road, but only 19 kilometers. There was a barrier with an armed guard, and we could go no farther. We'd go out sometimes in good weather and have a picnic, just short of the barrier. Always we were followed.

My Stanford friend Major Olson from the Military Mission (later an FSO and Ambassador to Sierra Leone) came out from Moscow in early 1943 to inspect the port. The object was to see if it was capable of handling the amount of Lend-Lease material which it was being planned to send through it (with the Northern Route to Murmansk now abandoned). Olson judged it to be capable. But after listening to our complaints about our isolation in Vladivostok, he said, "Oh, you guys are all exaggerating. We don't get treated that badly in Moscow". So we said, "We'll show you".

We got together seven Americans from the Consulate General: two non-career Vice Consuls, three personnel from the Naval Observer's office (always in civilian clothes), Olson, and myself. (We didn't try to include Angus Ward, the Consul General, who was not one for jokes.) One of us left the building and turned left. From across the street a man emerged and followed him.

Then another American, promptly followed by another NKVD man from across the street. Then another, and so on, until we were a procession of fourteen people, discreetly separated one from the other, trailing through the city in single file. Olson was convinced.

We had a car, a station-wagon, but if we tried to get too clever and dodged the NKVD car that always followed us, we paid. If, after such a success, we would park outside the Chelyuskin and go in for a mild celebration, while we were upstairs the NKVD would puncture our tires with an ice pick. This was no joke because we couldn't possibly get another tire. We did a lot of repair work.

In that restaurant, by the way, we several times saw the brother-in-law of the great black American singer --

Q: Paul Robeson?

McCARGAR: Robeson. I believe the brother-in-law's name was Hunt. He had stayed on in the Soviet Union, and made his living as a wrestler -- what the Russians called "Franzuski Boks." But he would never speak with us. I assume he was scared to. And as a matter of courtesy to him, not to complicate his life, we didn't speak to him.

That was a minor example of what we lived with. A more striking one was provided by a man named Bill Wallace, who came out from Moscow to replace our non-career Vice Consul, Don Nichols. (Wallace had been a Marine in Shanghai before the war. At some point I gather he left the Marine Corps and was taken on the staff of the Shanghai Consulate General.) Come December 1941 he was interned with the rest of our diplomatic and consular personnel, then sent by ship to Lourenço Marques, in Mozambique, for exchange against the Japanese coming from internment in the U. S. But Wallace didn't get on the "Gripsholm" for the rest of the voyage to America. He was sent straight on from Lourenço Marques to Moscow. (In those days when the Moscow Embassy said it wanted personnel, it got them.)

On Wallace's train from Moscow to Vladivostok, there was an absolutely stunning strawberry blond Russian girl on her way to the Soviet Naval Attaché's office in Washington, D.C.. She had to stay in the Chelyuskin Hotel for about a week until her ship sailed. Wallace was also staying in the hotel, until Nichols' quarters in the Consulate General became available. He and the girl were together all the time. Everything seemed happy and pleasant; Wallace was so taken with the girl, and spent so much time with her in that one week, that he had no time to absorb our complaints about life in Vladivostok.

One day we took this girl, along with Olson -- and Wallace, of course -- in the station wagon for a tour of the city -- or of those parts where we could go. One place I knew how to reach was a road on the crest of the range of hills at what was then the northern edge of the city. From there you could see the entire port, the bays, the islands protecting the approaches from the sea, the sea itself.

Sure enough, as we gazed at this splendid panorama, a man in a naval officer's uniform came up to the car, and said, "Dokumenti," meaning, "Show me your papers." I said, "I don't believe we have to,” and argued with him. He said, “According to Soviet law, an officer in the armed forces may ask anyone, including diplomatic personnel, for their documents at any time.” I don’t recall whether he alleged that this was especially so in wartime. But there were others passing by about. So, in the end, I showed mine, and the others in the car showed theirs. Then Wallaces’ beautiful girl, who by now began to realize what was coming, had to show hers. The Navy officer wrote something down and handed her papers back. With a palpable chill in the car, we returned to the Chelyuskin Hotel.

The next morning she was called in by the NKVD, fired from her post in Washington, and sent back to Moscow by the next train. Wallace supported her financially from Vladivostok through friends in the Embassy. Eventually, a year or two later, after he had been transferred to Moscow, they were married. They had a child. But there wasn’t any hope of getting Wallace’s wife, or the child, out of the Soviet Union. The war was over; life, and relations with America, had become even harsher. Wallace’s wife was taken first by the MVD (successor to the NKVD), and the child stayed with the grandmother. Then the grandmother was arrested. With the arrest of the grandmother, Wallace who had meanwhile been transferred from Moscow, never knew what became of his child. I don’t know if Wallace still lives (he left the Service after his next assignment). But this was a typical story of that time.

I know of other situations that I will not mention on this occasion, with happier outcomes -- thanks to greater support from the Department. (Loy Henderson’s departure from Soviet Affairs did not improve matters -- though Chip Bohlen did marvelously well while he was directly in charge). Shortly before I arrived in the Soviet Union, there was one case, an FSO, an especially capable and attractive Officer, who became in due course a very prominent Ambassador. His particular friend in Moscow became pregnant. Accompanied by an Assistant Military Attaché, with an exit visa for the lady, the three headed for Tehran by train. This was before the Germans blocked that route. But on the train, she gave birth. Well, the exit visa was for three adults and here suddenly were three adults and an infant who had been born in the Soviet Union. A very rough problem. The only reason it was resolved in favor of the departure of all four persons was that the Officer got on the telephone to Loy Henderson, and Henderson, discreetly but effectively, exerted the necessary pressure on the Soviets. It worked. They were let out. But it was very exceptional.

Q: What were you doing in Vladivostok?

McCARGAR: Professionally, I issued two visas. One of them was to the father of a very well-known film producer of Russian origin in Hollywood. He later put out a successful film called “Tales of Manhattan.”

Q: That was with Charles Boyer.

McCARGAR: Somehow this producer had gotten to the White House, so the right help came. But as Angus Ward never tired of telling me, “You are personally responsible for these visas.” So I put this poor old gentleman through all the phases of the required interrogation. “Have you ever been a member of the Communist Party?” I was not exactly ashamed; this was my sworn duty (said Angus Ward), but it was an occasion I was happy to forget. The victim of all this was very sweet and very patient. Quietly, he said "I know you have to do this." As the story came out later, the Soviets tried to blackmail the son with threats about the father, and the son went to the FBI and became an agent against the Soviets. Needless to say, when this all came out, years later, it was with maximum publicity for the producer.

The other one I was not at all happy about. This one came through with direct White House intervention. The visa applicant, who showed up at the Consulate General almost simultaneously with a cabled notification from the Department citing White House interest, was a Spaniard named Jesus Hernandez. He was applying for a transit visa to go to Mexico. Hernandez, as I well knew (from my own studies, not from State Department files) had been the chief Soviet liquidator in Spain during the Civil War there, slaughtering first the POUM, then the Spanish Communist Party itself. I learned more about Hernandez later, and although I knew enough about him at the time, it was pretty clear that if I didn't issue this visa I was going to get into trouble.

Q: Was the security lapse due to Roosevelt?

McCARGAR: That was our assumption. It was not necessarily true. I said the White House was interested in this case. The White House is a big place -- even if it is bigger today, it's connections were legion then. I subsequently came to believe that Mrs. Roosevelt was the sponsor for Hernandez. Not for any sinister reasons or connections on that great lady's part. But someone got to her, and she probably said, "Oh, yes, of course, we should help any victim of the Spanish Civil War." Since Hernandez's request was for a transit visa, I gave it. He was a very somber type. To ask him, when I knew perfectly well, "Have you ever been a member of the Communist Party?" made no sense at all. He knew that I knew what he had done in Spain. He went on to Mexico. There he became one of the chief operators for the NKVD, later MVD and then the KGB (or GRU, Soviet Military Intelligence).

Q: Was he involved in the Trotsky business, or had that happened already?

McCARGAR: No. That had happened already. It was something I had been very interested in. One of my professors at Stanford was a great friend of Trotsky -- or purported to be. Perhaps he was merely a sympathizer. But he returned one autumn from his annual visit to Trotsky in Mexico, at just the time the University was constructing the Hoover Institution on War, Revolution, and Peace. He told Trotsky about this new institution, and Trotsky said, "That is exactly the way it will be. First war, then revolution, then peace."

I don't know if you ever knew Bob McGregor? McGregor had been in our Mexico City Embassy charged with contact with Trotsky. He got to Trotsky's villa very shortly the assassin had struck. Trotsky was still alive. He lived for hours after the blow, with the axe in his skull. McGregor had told me all about it in the Department before I went to the Soviet Union. I used to amuse myself going out on the Trans-Siberian with this knowledge. You could talk to people on the train. I remember getting friendly with one chap and saying "By the way, whatever happened to Trotsky?". The look was either of terror or total ignorance. The name had been absolutely purged from existence, a mere fifteen years after Stalin had bested him in their intra-Party rivalry.

I did come across one small incident that might be of interest. On that train, near Irkutsk, they took on fresh onions. (Mostly, our food in restaurant car was one meal a day, usually lopsha soup. Lopsha is a pasta, with little grey dots in it. It's revolting. The meal, day after day, was lopsha soup, followed by lopsha, and that was it.) But at Irkutsk they took on green onions, other delicacies -- and vodka, which was served at the noon meal. In short order, that train was a shambles. I had a cabin in one of those Wagons-Lits cars -- called "Mezhdunarodniy (International) class," being above "soft class" and "hard class" -- that had originally belonged to the Belgians (and I think were legally still their property). They were very comfortable, beautifully done. The corridors had been decorated with an occasional bust, or relief, of Lenin, and appropriate quotations or slogan. As I made my way back from the restaurant car my car attendant came along and said, "Come with me." He led me to my compartment, put me in, and locked the door. There was a huge, very handsome Russian who was also in that car, who was apparently out to get "the foreigner" (me) for some reason or other. I remember him having said to me, at one point, loudly and aggressively, "Ya chistiy russki!" (I am pure Russian!) He tore that car up including busting the bust of Lenin. They took him off the train at the next stop. I don't know what happened to him.

Q: You were there as a regular Vice Consul, is that right?. In the first place could you talk about the Consulate and also about Angus Ward. I've gotten little vignettes of Angus Ward in Harbin and also in Kabul, but I'd like to get something about him.

McCARGAR: Harbin before the war?

Q: Harbin after the war, when he was arrested by the Chinese.

McCARGAR: As a Vice Consul, besides the two visas that I issued, I also issued crew list visas, covering the crews of the Soviet Merchant Marine then beginning to go to our West Coast for Lend-Lease supplies. I also read the papers, monitored the radio (Vladivostok was a place where radio signals bounced, and one of our duties was frequent monitoring -- of broadcasts almost entirely incomprehensible to most of us), and tried to see as much of the city as I could.

I also performed one consular function that brought echoes from the past. One of the diplomatic pouches I brought out from Moscow contained a request to the Vladivostok Consulate General, forwarded by the Department, from Professor Kyril Brynner, one of my Stanford professors of Russian, asking for copies of the divorce papers of his parents, filed at Vladivostok in, I believe, 1921 or 22.

I was happy to provide this service, and in due course obtained the requested document from the local representative of the Narkomindel (Foreign Office). I promptly sent it on by pouch to Washington, for forwarding to Stanford, accompanied by a note to my former professor, stating that in view of the difficulties of wartime correspondence and financial exchange, and with gratitude for his teaching, I had paid the required Consular fee out of my own pocket. It was minimal. But I never heard another word from Brynner. Except that at a lunch with some young Russian Far East specialists (one Navy, one USIA) this year, 1995, I learned to my astonishment that my Professor Brynner was a close relative of the actor, Yul Brynner.

As for Angus Ward, Loy Henderson had spoken to me before I left for Russia. "I'm going to tell you about Angus Ward," he said. "Ward has a terrible temper. He once strangled a dog in Manchuria with his bare hands. Since then he tries to keep himself under control. So watch his temper". He said, "The other thing is that Angus, for one reason or another, is not sending us any political material. We get nothing out of the Vladivostok Consulate." He didn't say what I should do about that. He just mentioned it. Not long after I'd been in Vladivostok, 6 weeks or so, maybe 2 months, Ward went off to Moscow. He needed a little break. He had his wife with him.

Q: His wife was?

McCARGAR: He had a Finnish wife who was very much socially pre-revolutionary Russia. She never, or seldom, talked politics, but it was clear that for her Finland was, at least socially, still the Imperial Grand Duchy.

With Ward away I was left in charge. The first thing I did was to institute a weekly round-up of what was going on in our area. We had a Naval Attaché, in civilian clothes, there at that time with a yeoman and a secretary. We would put together whatever seemed noteworthy: such and such a cruiser is in harbor, this has happened, the paper says this, Comrade Pegov is running for First Secretary of the Krai Party, and so forth. This went on for the whole two months that Ward was gone. When he came back he didn't say a word. But he did not continue the weekly political cable. I got the point that he wasn't happy about my little innovation.

We got along all right. One thing amused me about Ward. He was a Canadian by birth, and a naturalized U. S. citizen. He was furious with Foreign Service Officers who retired abroad. He just couldn't think of anything worse than that. There was at that time a Foreign Service Officer named Washington -- I don't recall his first name, because when I try to I always confuse him with the first elected Mayor of Washington, D.C. But his name was Washington. Ward used to carry on about this man. He said, "Can you imagine, when he retired, he went to --[I can't remember where, but it was not in the United States]!" And Ward would fulminate about this, damning his "disloyal" colleague. Twenty years later, my wife and I spent a year in Spain. We were just leaving to go back to France, and I thought, what the hell. I knew Ward was then living in retirement in Coin, inland from the Costa Brava. So I telephoned Angus and he invited me to lunch. After finding the residence of "El Embajador," as he was known in town, I found Ward and Mrs. Ward in a very expansive layout. I asked him how things were going. He was still working on his Mongolian-English dictionary (that he had been working on twenty years before, that went on forever, and never was published). Anyway, I couldn't resist it, I said "Mr. Ambassador," (he enjoyed the courtesy, as we all would), "Tell me, here you are in Spain and I knew that you'd retired to Virginia. Is there something preferable here?" Both he and his wife came out with the same immediate answer. Very forcefully, they said, "You can't get decent servants in Virginia." So they moved to Spain.

Q: Can you talk a little about Mrs. Ward, because I've heard stories of her as being very difficult.

McCARGAR: She was extremely difficult. I was very careful, but one time I fell afoul of her. There was nothing to do. She asked for the station-wagon to be provided with a driver for some personal errand that she wanted. It conflicted with something we needed in the Consulate General at that time. In effect, as politely as I could, I refused it. Having explained the circumstances, I said, "Can we do this some other time?" She came down on me. First of all she came in and gave me hell. Then, of course, she got Angus to give me a little bit of hell too. He was less obnoxious than she was. She was really impossible. Otherwise, she could be charming. She made a perfectly marvelous salmon caviar dish. Angus had a couple of little dinghies, and he'd go out on Amur Bay and come back with a salmon, which he'd split it open. She'd do the red caviar -- of which I can never get enough -- with sour cream and onions. Admired, she was in her element at that time. Otherwise, I found her to be a very embittered woman. It was obvious she loathed the Russians, that is, the Bolshevik Russians.

Our other problem was the Japanese Consulate General. The Japanese Consul General's residence was next to Ward's, and their relations couldn't have been worse. Quite apart from the war going on, there was another going on over the fence between them, because Ward's cat would go over to the Japanese side. The Japanese, outraged, would throw the cat back over the fence. And so on, back and forth.

Our only other colleagues were the Chinese. The Chinese Consul General, Chang Da-Tien, was married to a Russian woman. They had a son, Dima, in his early 20's, who later had a very successful career in the Diplomatic Service of Taiwan. He was fluent in Chinese, English, and Russian. He was more fun than the rest. He had a vivacious sense of humor. Of his father's Consulate, Dima said, with much laughter, "We have a staff over there, but they all sit around playing mah jong, and that, of course, is forbidden by the Chinese Government. But they still play mah jong." He also told a story about going up to inspect the Chinese Consulate at Blagoveshchensk, a small, miserable, swampy town way north on the Amur River. Apparently they found their local Consul cowering on a table with water swirling all around the Consulate in one of the frequent floods that inundated the place. They rescued him. Dima was pleasant company and very helpful to us. He relieved some of the tedium.

As for my other duties, I was, of course, coding and decoding.

Q: What about American seamen? Did they get in trouble, go to jail?

McCARGAR: There were no Americans, seamen or any other kind. As I came to know as a naval officer several years later, the only traffic across the North Pacific was Soviet.

Q: That's because of the war with the Japanese. You really couldn't get anything through the Pacific. You were there '42 to '43? What were the signs of the threat of the Japanese? The Guangdong Army at that time (later it switched to the other side) must have been a concern.

McCARGAR: It was indeed. We were very conscious of the Guangdong Army, not many miles away to the west, in neighboring Manchuria. At one point we sat around -- we were instructed to do so, but we already thought we'd better do it for our own sakes -- to elaborate an evacuation plan in case the Japanese struck. That, as the years passed, I realized was one of the more pathetic exercises we ever engaged in. We were totally ignorant: we hadn't the vaguest idea what the terrain was like. Because, if you got out you wanted to get north, through the mountains, or along the Pacific coast, the Sea of Japan, actually. We had no idea of the terrain, of the facilities, the communications, the road network -- nothing. We were always uneasy about that but there was nothing we could do about it. We had no advice of any sort from the Department nor from Moscow on that subject, or on any other subject for that matter. And, as I said earlier, Vladivostok was a place where radio waves bounced. We were also thus provided with quite a receiver. So we'd sit around, twirl the dial, and write reports of what we thought we heard. This was done for the FBIS which already existed at that time. It kept us occupied. Vladivostok was also a great place for reading. I finally got a shipment through the port that included a box of books (the Soviet Customs were fascinated by Emil Ludwig's biography of Stalin, a staple of the time). I was almost as grateful for the books as for the food that came with them. One of the books, incidentally, was Koestler's Darkness At Noon. I let our secretary, Ida Borisovna Minovich (who was permanently frantic over the possibility that her young son would reach draft age before the war ended). In any event, at her request, I lent her Koestler's novel. Her comment on returning it was, I thought, a masterpiece of diplomacy, considering her circumstances. "You know," she said, "I think if Stalin were to read this [the implication was clear that he would not] he would say, 'This is the truth.'"

I also had a few illnesses while I was there. Scurvy was one, which would years later cost me my teeth much earlier than normal. Then I came down with erysipelas, a streptococcic infection. At first I got it on my left hand. Our medical recourse was something called the Physiotherapyucheskiy Institut, with a very nice chief physician named Rutkovski. He was great friends with Ward. Erysipelas, sometimes confused today with cellulitis, is not a joke. Woodrow Wilson's (or Coolidge's) son died of it, after a game of tennis at the White House. Rutkovski's reaction was prompt. He came around and he did something I'd never heard of. I was later told by the Navy doctor at the Moscow Embassy, "Jesus, we stopped doing that 50 years ago." The procedure is to take blood out of the infected limb and then jab it in your rear end. It produces a splendid fever, and apparently sets up enough antibodies to dispel the infection. Then I got it in my middle ear, which almost drove me right out of my mind. Sulfa drugs were all there was at that time, and they were very scarce. But they worked.

In the course of this second illness I conceived a great longing for fruit. It was overwhelming. One of my colleagues, a non-career Vice Consul, Don Nichols, the one later relieved by Bill Wallace, had a very well-stocked larder. He came to see me in my apartment, and I said "Don, you pick any can of fruit that you have and I'll give you five dollars for it". And he gave me a can of black cherries, which is still the best fruit I've tasted in my life. Also, he took the five dollars.

When I got my own shipment across the Pacific it included a little phonograph my brother-in-law sent me. I had two records. One of them was Rachmaninov's Second Piano Concerto -- not all of it, just part. The other was a thing I picked up in Moscow. It was a Jewish folk song called Dyecyat' Docheri (Ten Daughters). It was delightful. I played both records night after night and never tired of them.

Q: You went back to Moscow for a while?

McCARGAR: Yes. I was there for about a month the second time.

Q: Had things changed much?

McCARGAR: Enormously.

Q: How about your trip across, was it still the 12 days?

McCARGAR: It was still 12 days. You still had to have your own food and you still had to provide for yourself the best you could. But they didn't get the vodka aboard on this trip so we got through it uneventfully. I must have had 14 mail sacks with me. By the time we got to Moscow I had learned enough about the Soviet Union so, after I unloaded them onto the quai, I summoned a railroad man there and said "I want the Nachal'nik NKVD," (the chief of the NKVD), enough to terrorize any citizen in those days. He went off in a great rush and sure enough there came the chief of the NKVD at that railroad station. A nice young officer, cold but very efficient. I identified myself, showed him my passport, and said "I need assistance here. I can't possibly get these out by myself to a taxi". So the orders were given. They all danced around him. In a flash my sacks and I were out of the station alongside a taxi. You learned that that was the way to get things done in the Soviet Union of that day.

One night in Moscow during that second stay -- I had always had a great, and idiotic, desire to see the inside of the Lyublyanka, the prison attached to NKVD headquarters where so many terrible things had taken place -- and so I acted on it.

Q: This is the prison of the NKVD?

McCARGAR: Yes. It was not far from Red Square. The curfew was 11 o'clock and I managed to be out after 11 in Red Square. As I walked past the GOUM department store, towards the National Hotel where I was staying, a Red Army soldier came up and stopped me. I identified myself, and he said "I'm sorry, you're out after the curfew. You've got to come with me". He collected a fair number of people including a two-star general -- a Red Army general, not an NKVD general. There were about a dozen or fifteen of us, and we were marched over to what was apparently a sort of police station in the Lyublyanka, presided over by a young NKVD Captain. He went through each case and when he got to the general, you should have heard what he said to that general. For starters, he said, "General, you're a disgrace to the uniform. You're a disgrace to the Soviet Union. You're a blockhead." And he went on talking this way -- "You know better than to be out after the curfew." The General kept saying, "Yes, but...", trying to explain himself, and getting nowhere. The Captain really gave him hell and sent him off to a cell. In due course we were all relegated to cells, where we spent the night -- but, interestingly enough, not more than three or four to a cell. My cellmates simply accepted the situation and attempted to sleep on the benches or floor. There was a strong atmosphere of misery, nonetheless. The Captain finally called me in from my cell. Stony-faced, he said "I've called your Embassy and they've never heard of you." A typical trick to produce merriment among the colleagues. The next morning somebody admitted that, yes, they did know me, and I was released. The important point was that the speech and attitude of this junior NKVD officer to the General showed precisely the relationship between the NKVD and the Red Army.

Q: Who was the Ambassador?

McCARGAR: Standley was still the Ambassador in Moscow.

Q: He'd returned?

McCARGAR: Yes. The whole Embassy -- indeed, the entire Diplomatic Corps -- had moved back up from Kuybyshev. As I told you, coming across the Trans-Siberian, I did notice the changes in cities like Novosibirsk. It was absolutely astounding. Omsk as well. The industry that the Soviets had moved from European Russia -- you could see from the train. The growth of these cities and the work that was being done there was visible. In Moscow the Embassy's facilities were by now full up, and that's why I had to stay in a hotel. The National was all right - much sought after, in fact. I spent about a month at the National Hotel.

Q: Did you find the work at the Embassy -- were they well connected to the Soviet Government?

McCARGAR: There was still this tension between the Military Mission and the Embassy itself. By then Ambassador Standley had made his famous denunciation of the Russians' non-appreciation and non-mention of American aid and General Faymonville was publicly regretting that. I had a talk with Faymonville, and he asked me about Vladivostok. I told him it was a prison for us, and described how we were treated. I told him who the head of the NKVD in the Primorsk Krai was -- which I never even told Angus Ward, because Angus wasn't interested. But I added that the NKVD head in the Primorsk Krai (Gvishiani -- whose son married Prime Minister Kosygin's daughter years later, and made something of a splash on the international scene) was one of Stalin's Georgian thug friends. I did all this, needless to say, in the hopes that he might confide in Beria in one of their friendly sessions -- though I did not ask it.

But Faymonville said, "Well, you know how it is. Out at the end of the line they get the order. Then they make it much tougher than it really is at the beginning because they want to make sure they're doing the right thing". He was excusing the whole thing. Actually at that time, the great change was taking place. General Dean was being sent out to replace Faymonville -- who, incidentally, was to be reduced in rank. When he went back to the United States, his Brigadier-General's star was taken from him, and he reverted to Colonel. Admiral Standley left a month or two later, and was replaced by Averell Harriman. This was all in the works while I was in Moscow, although I was not told, since it was all still confidential.

Actually, it was Tommy Thompson and I who went out together through Tehran. Tommy was on his way to London for vacation. This was September of 1943. I asked Tommy, "What are you going to London on vacation for?" and he gave a very good answer. He said, "London is the most exciting city in the world to be in at this moment." We dined with friends of his in Tehran, whose names I don't remember. All I remember is that I was humiliated because a Russian in Vladivostok, one of the few I'd encountered at some point there, gave me a bottle of wine, saying proudly, "This is the greatest wine ever made in Russia." So I carried this wine across the whole Soviet Union, down all the way to Tehran. And insisted on providing it for the dinner given by Tommy's Embassy friends in Tehran. We opened it and it was vile stuff. Tommy wouldn't let me forget that. We had to go through Abadan, filled with American equipment going up the line to the Soviet Union.

Then we flew on from there to Cairo where we had dinner with Alexander Kirk, who was then the Minister. Kirk was a most extraordinary man. I'm surprised there's been so little attention paid to him and his career in the Foreign Service. (When he died, in Colorado, in the eighties, Beatrice Strauss, the daughter of William Phillips, who knew Kirk when her father was Ambassador to Italy, agreed with me that he had been a first-rate diplomat, and insufficiently recognized as such.) First of all, at dinner, Kirk said that he was very proud to have been "a poke in the eye" to all the major governments of the time. He had served in Moscow, Berlin, and Rome at the moment that the Ambassador at each of those posts was withdrawn as a sign of American displeasure, and he was left as Chargé d'Affaires. He was very proud of this.

In some ways Kirk was rather strange. He always wore only grey. I watched him once at a cocktail party. He was a wizard at it. He never gave more than four minutes -- to any such function. He greeted his host, made a few quick turns and was out, because he deplored these social functions. He also made a remark at our dinner with him at the Residence which rested in my mind. The Allies had already gone into Sicily, and I think had begun their assault on the peninsula itself. Apropos of the political problems surrounding these military operations, Kirk, who knew a lot about Italy, said, "I can't imagine who is advising the President on Italian policy but, judging from the results, it must be an Italian".

From Cairo I made my way back, across Africa, then across the South Atlantic. It was a totally different performance from the previous trip across.

Q: How did you get across the Atlantic?

McCARGAR: First of all, it was one straight flight from Cairo to Accra, in the Gold Coast (now Ghana, of course). From Accra we flew, in land planes, to Ascension Island, where the Army engineers had carved the landing strip right through the mountain which makes up most of the island. We fueled there and then flew onto Natal, Brazil. You got a moment's rest and then were put on another plane to Belem, which had a large contingent of American troops there, and had lost a good deal of the colorful life it had manifested two years earlier. From there we were loaded onto a C-46 (a Curtiss-Wright plane which was reputed, no doubt wrongly -- we hoped -- to lose its wings in turbulent weather), and that plane just kept going forever and ever until we got to Miami.

There I got a quick lesson in the difference between being a diplomat abroad and one at home. The Customs inspector said to me -- mind you, we were all pretty exhausted -- "Open your bag." I said, "Do I have to do that?" and he said, "Well, who are you?" I answered, I thought in a normal way, "I'm Third Secretary of the American Embassy in Moscow." He said, "What?" So a little more loudly I repeated myself. He then said, "I didn't get you -- you're what?" This time I gave it full force. "Third Secretary of the American Embassy in Moscow!" He looked at me and said, "That's slicing it sort of thin, isn't it?"

Q: I wonder if we could stop at this point and pick it up next time?

McCARGAR: A week after I came back from the Soviet Union I was examined in Bethesda Naval Hospital. Then I was summoned to an interview with Howland Shaw. I went into the Assistant Secretary's office (it overlooked the West Wing of the White House, that alone being enough to impress anyone). There was Shaw, handsome as ever, and affable. "Well, Mr. McCargar," he said, in a markedly sympathetic fashion, "tell me about Vladivostok." One can be so stupid sometimes. (Some years later, remembering this exchange with Howland Shaw, I delighted in one of Dean Acheson's comments in an essay, in which he explained the attraction of cabinet-making to him: "It is a steady reminder of how stupid one can really be," he wrote).

I told Assistant Secretary Shaw that Vladivostok was a prison. I tried to explain the frustration of living in a city of 220,000 people, and not be able to touch anyone of them, to touch the life of the city, to be a part of it. I went on in this vein and got it all off my chest. Shaw, now looking more magisterial than sympathetic, said, "Oh, come, come, Mr. McCargar, you can't go through life being that sensitive." To which he added, after a brief pause, "After all, you were saving money."

This was a sore rebuff for me. I might as well add now that I got my own back while at my next post -- Santo Domingo. My first Ambassador there was Avra Warren, who taught me a lot about politics. At one point I told him, "Look, I've got all of this material that I learned about the Soviet Far East. What I want to do is send it to the Department. That's where it'll be useful. It's no good just sitting in my brain". Warren said, "You'd better be very careful about this. What you do is, you write to Chip Bohlen. You say that you have this material. Would he like it? If you get a letter from him asking you for it, then you're covered". I was learning. So that's exactly what I did, sending Bohlen the Table of Contents.

Q: Chip Bohlen was doing what at that time?

McCARGAR: Chip was the Russian Desk Officer. He'd taken Loy Henderson's place, Loy having been exiled, as I recall, as Minister to Iraq, being one of those regarded by the White House at the time as too anti-Soviet.

In any event, Bohlen wrote back saying he would like to see my report. I had written the report, and had showed it to Ambassador Warren. His comment was, "You really do want to get into trouble, don't you?" I sent the report to Bohlen. It was titled General Political Conditions in the Primorsk Krai, August 1942 to August 1943, and ran 23 pages single-spaced (the old State Department long pages). I told everything I knew, which was a lot more than Angus Ward had ever conveyed to anyone. I sent it to Washington on March 7, 1944. In May I received a letter dated the 11th, signed by Dean Acheson, which said, "The Department is pleased to advise you that, because of its interest in the subject and of the value of the information contained in your memorandum, it has been given a rating of "Excellent". Your industry and initiative in preparing it are commended." It was a nice ending to that circle.

Q: Wasn't that nice. Wasn't that wonderful. You were going to describe the Consulate General at Vladivostok and the city itself.

McCARGAR: Yes. The Consulate General, during the love affair between Hitler and Stalin, had been the German Consulate General. When that fell apart, the Americans latched on to the building right away and Angus Ward was sent out from Moscow in 1941 to open the office. Prior to that, in late 1939, Angus had been sent, during the confused period of the Russo-German partition of Poland, to the Lvov region to help Americans caught in the turmoil. There were a lot of American citizens in southeastern Poland -- Volhynia, Podolia, lands that would end up being, not in Poland, but in the Soviet Union (and ultimately in Ukraine!). Among those Ward found was a young man named Tony Lapka, an American citizen by birth (although I think his residence in the United States had been minimal). Ward took Lapka on as a U. S. Government employee, used him as a kind of handy man in Lvov and Moscow, and then took him on out to Vladivostok. It was Lapka who tried to keep the place more or less going physically.

The Consulate General was on Tigrovaya Ulitsa, which is Tiger street. It was so named because sometime in 1910, or between 1900 and 1910, somebody saw a tiger, a Siberian tiger, on that street. I understand there are very few of those Siberian tigers left. I never saw one. Tiger Street, like much of the city, was a steep hill. To the south of the Consulate General, going uphill, the street went along the west side of a ridge running north and south which formed, on its opposite, eastern side one edge of the Zolotoi Rog, the Golden Horn, the inner harbor of Vladivostok. The shape and formation of Vladivostok's Golden Horn is remarkably similar to that of its Istanbul namesake. It must have excited the imagination of the first Russian officer to look on it. The part of the Golden Horn before and at the bend was the commercial port. Beyond that was the naval port. Both were forbidden to us.

If we went downhill from the entrance to the Consulate General, the first cross street we came to was Leninskaya Ulitsa, at the corner of which was the Chelyuskin Hotel, locus of our social life. If you continued straight ahead on Tiger Street, it went down to a small inlet of Amur Bay (where Ward kept his boats), on the edge of which was what was still known as the Kitaiskiy Rinok -- the Chinese Market. It was a free market bazaar, permitted by the authorities. The real currency of the day was vodka -- one bottle of vodka, a pair of shoes.

If you turned to the right from Tiger Street, and went along Lenin Street past the Chelyuskin, you passed, in sequence, the Zolotoi Rog Hotel, with a nearby theater, in a side street, the local department store on the left, then a movie house, then the commercial port, and, past the naval port, the House of Culture and Rest of the Pacific Ocean Fleet. We sometimes went to public dances in a garden there in summer. We were not allowed in any of these local landmarks, the Fleet's Culture and Rest garden excepted. For the department store, or the movie house, we were obliged to write a letter to the Diplomatic Agent of the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs, who would then issue us tickets or passes, as might be the case. The citizens of the town, of course, had free access to all these oases -- except the ports.

I should also mention that, as far as the citizens of Vladivostok were concerned, there had been a tremendous upheaval in the years 1936, 1937, and 1938. The Koreans were moved out first. Then -- a major blow to the life of the city -- the Chinese had been moved out. It was the Chinese who provided the fresh vegetables and were, above all, the carriers of water from the pumps at street level, up the hills to the houses and apartments without running water. Then most of the population was moved out, the Russian population, that is, and replaced with Ukrainian deportees. There were a lot of Ukrainians in the city. There were a few old residents, but not many. This was part of Stalin's moving populations around and leaving them in odd places where they were not familiar with the terrain or anything else. So that was the city -- which did boast, on another main street at right angles to Lenin Street, a main Post Office, and, further up the hill, the city's Park of Culture and Rest, which included a parachute jump -- a sport then much in vogue.

We made no use of the department store (except once, when Ward and I went there with official permission, to counter a report spreading in the city that a shipment of shoes, which fell apart after one wearing, were American; we established that they were Argentine, and then made our point loudly.) We were allowed, once as I recall, to attend entertainment at the theater near the Zolotoi Rog Hotel. While the occasion was not without the usual agitprop trimmings, they were reasonable enough for wartime, and the performance was first-rate. The star was an Uzbek singer and dancer, Tamara Khanum, who was also a Captain in the Red Army, a member of the Uzbek Supreme Soviet, and of the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet. She was accompanied by a stringed instrument, and by a Central Asian instrument called a bubnya, almost identical to a tambourine. Tamara Khanum appeared in Red Army uniform, and when she bowed to the audience, her long black hair falling in plaits on either side of her head, next to the brilliant gold shoulder boards of her military rank (the Tsarist epaulettes and ranks had only recently been restored to the Soviet Armed Forces by Stalin) the effect was impressive. But the most impressive was the bubnya player. At intervals, he would toss his instrument to the top of the proscenium arch, and as it fell back down he would catch it in his right hand, between his thumb and forefinger, simultaneously slapping the stretched skin of the instrument with his four fingers, producing a cataclysmic bang that almost shook the theater. The audience loved it, and so did I.

Until the next day, when we were received by the three artists in their rooms at the Chelyuskin. Tamara Khanum radiated presence and charm, and quickly introduced her colleagues. The bubnya player gave me a big smile, and, knowing what was coming, proffered his right hand. I shook it -- and, crying out with pain, wondered if I could ever use my right hand again. The man had a muscle between the thumb and forefinger of his right hand that was more like a biceps. Hence the cataclysmic bang.

In the Consulate General, the furnace was in the basement. On the first floor, on the right, were four rooms: one was Ward's office, one was my office, just outside Ward's, another was the non-career Vice Consul's, and then a small office near the entrance for Ida Borisovna, the Russian secretary. Across the hallway was the Naval Observer's office, who, as I said before, was in civilian clothes. He had a yeoman and a secretary. (I think that the secretary, Irene Matusis, came to a bad end. As I recall, she had been born in New York in 1914 of Russian parents, who subsequently returned. As a dual national the Soviets refused all representations in her behalf by the Moscow Embassy. After her arrest by the Soviets in 1947, she was sentenced to three to five years in a labor camp.) The building's second floor had two apartments, one for each of the Vice Consuls, with a steep garden behind, used mostly for drying laundry in good weather.

To give you a bit of the flavor, so far as I know, there are few survivors of the staff of the Consulate General of the 1941-1947 period. Ward's successor, O. Edmund Clubb (whose real interest was China) died several years ago. He was the last Consul General. After Clubb departed in 1946, Vladivostok was staffed by personnel from Moscow, assigned for six-months periods.

The Consulate General was finally closed in August 1948 -- as the Soviets closed their Consulates General in New York and San Francisco. There has been a story circulated all these years which, even if apocryphal, gives the flavor of American life in Vladivostok in those days. It is that as the Russians invaded Manchuria (and the northernmost Kurile Island, Paramushiro) in August 1945, the Diplomatic Agent of the (by then) Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs summoned an officer from the American Consulate General to protest that the Americans were signaling to the Japanese across the bay, and that they must cease immediately. According to the story, the American officer who was told this, after the Americans had fought for four years across the Pacific to Japan itself, was so infuriated that it affected him physically. But, of course, this was the sort of thing that we went through all the time out there.

Q: You had mentioned the reason why you were moved out of Vladivostok, and why Tommy Thompson] accompanied you out of the Soviet Union. Why don't we talk a little about that to catch the flavor of the old Foreign Service?

McCARGAR: This had to do with our social life, not our professional life. Ward had Mrs. Ward, but the rest of us were quite alone. As one person put it some years later, he said, with fairly good humor, "Oh, Vladivostok was a series of one night stands four months apart".

There were two instances of the cost of mixing with Soviet citizens of which I had personal knowledge. We always flirted with the waitresses in the Chelyuskin restaurant, who were responsive and always joked with us. One of the waitresses, a very pretty girl who had a small son, one night asked me to go to the movies with her. Her name was Valya. I said, "Valya, I can't do that. I have to ask permission to go the kino." She was very offended, not at me, but that any such thing should be possible. She said, "I am a Soviet citizen, and if I want to invite you to go the movies with me, I can do so." So I went. The film was "One Hundred Men and A Girl," starring Deanna Durbin. You had to see the Russian subtitles on the screen to see what the agitprop people could do with a relatively silly movie, designed mainly to give Miss Durbin a chance to sing. The bloodstained capitalists were grinding this lovely young girl and an entire symphony orchestra into misery.

It was mid-winter, the theater smelled something awful (no one removed his or her coat in a Russian theater in cold weather, since there was no heat). So, when at last the show was over, I walked Valya home, which meant going straight up a mountain. We parted at her doorway and I slid back down to Lenin Street and home. At 5 or 6 the next morning, she was arrested. She and her child were taken away. They were sent, I later found out, to a concentration camp near Khabarovsk. Then they were relocated to Novosibirsk. It was put in their dossier that they, she and her child, could never go again to the Primorsk Krai. Not even to visit.

Lapka, whom I spoke of earlier, our handy man, had made a courier trip to Moscow. He was coming back on the Trans-Siberian, in July 1943, and the train stopped in Novosibirsk. He got out to walk around (you'd go crazy if you didn't). And there was Valya, whom he also knew. He told her that I'd be leaving Vladivostok shortly for Moscow. In other words, I would be coming through Novosibirsk. So when I did leave, in August of 1943, the train stopped at 4 in the morning in Novosibirsk. I got out into this cavernous railroad station and there, close to a pillar, was Valya. She had been waiting all night, using as an excuse that she was waiting for the train to her village, some distance outside the city. She'd been watching the Moscow-bound train for a couple of weeks. A deeply touching moment, not to be forgotten. It belies what I said earlier about people getting the government they deserve. But cases like hers were very rare, no question. That kind of courage. I'd met her in the middle of winter and there was that brief and -- as the saying goes -- one innocent evening.

Later on, as summer broke out, and we all emerged from that dreadful icy cold (there was little snow in Vladivostok, almost all was blown away by the wild, icy wind that came straight out of Manchuria to the west), Bill Wallace and I went one night to the House of Culture and Rest of the Pacific Ocean Fleet, where they had a little orchestra playing in the garden. There was dancing and we saw two pretty girls. We invited them to dance and we all got along famously. My memory is not exactly clear whether it was that night, but I think it was that night -- we all went back to the Consulate General, the four of us. The ladies spent the night, and either they were concerned about leaving, because of the NKVD watching across the street, or we explained to them that they should be. We therefore lifted them over the fence in the back of the building, and the NKVD never saw them. I am not certain, but I think we had two more weekends, one including even a picnic out near the 19th kilometer barricade. Afterwards they came again to the Consulate General. This produced an absolute uproar.

On Monday morning, perhaps even Monday afternoon, these girls were still upstairs in the bedrooms. Ward returned to his office from a visit to the Diplomatic Agent -- a career Soviet diplomat named Dyukarev (his young wife had died some months earlier; I last noted, years later, that he was Soviet Consul General in Milan). Ward had constant arguments with him. For example, one of their favorite arguments was about corn. Corn, in the Russian view, is not fit for human consumption. It is for pigs, at best cattle. Ward would say "You don't know what you're talking about. American corn..." etc, etc. This is the kind of relationship the two had. On that particular day Ward had apparently just made some marvelous point that humiliated the Russian. At that point Dyukarev punctured his bubble. He said "Oh, by the way, Mr. Ward, I must protest against your permitting Soviet citizens to establish residence in the American Consulate General. That is not within your rights." Ward was stunned. "What are you talking about?" he said. Dyukarev answered, "There are two Soviet citizens living on the top floor there." (During that particular weekend, the NKVD, which could accomplish miracles in wartime, had, without stepping on our property, installed very strong searchlights all around our building. No more surreptitious exits over the back fence. And they shone right into our windows. Typical NKVD hospitality, but since Ward didn't sleep in the Consulate General he hadn't noticed them.)

Ward returned to the office in a fury. He called me in and said something about "Is there a girl?" I said "Yes, there's a girl," and he said "Get her out!" Then he called in Wallace, who said "Yes, there's a girl," but in a tone that implied "So what?" Ward said, "She's established residence and that's illegal". Wallace said, "Residence? She doesn't even have a change of skivvies! What are you talking about?" Ward said, "Get her out!" So the ladies were let out and were arrested. Actually, I'm not sure if the girl that was with Wallace was arrested. The girl who was with me was named Tamara (her family were Party members, and she worked in the port; blonde and blue-eyed, she once told me that her correct name was Tamisa Shakhilai -- an unusual name that I find ethnically clueless). She was arrested. She was let out, we saw some more of each other, and then she told me that she was pregnant. Then she disappeared, and her friend got word to Wallace that Tamara had been sent to a collective farm outside of Vladivostok. Gvishiani, the NKVD chief of the Krai (she told me she had been taken to see him), was obviously playing a potentially clever game.

So I asked Ward's permission to call on the Diplomatic Agent. I didn't tell him what it was about. I said it was a personal matter that I wanted to discuss with Dyukarev. Ward gave me permission, with no inquiries. Once received, I said to the Diplomatic Agent that I wanted Tamara released. He said, "Why are you interfering in our affairs?" and added some very derogatory remarks about our two female guests. I said, "I don't want the mother of my child working on the collective farm out there." "Oh", he said, "that's different." He woke up and took great interest at that point. "Well, then," he said, "I think we ought to make some arrangement here whereby you're responsible for the support of the child," and so forth. I answered, "I'll take care of that myself," and we parted. The girl was brought back to town and was allowed to see me, but they gave her an abortion. She didn't actually tell me that but I found out. They put her in a clinic in Vladivostok, where I visited her, gave her an abortion, and then let her out again. (Actually, four months after my departure I had a letter from Wallace saying he had seen her as a dancer on the stage of the theater near the Zolotoi Rog Hotel.)

I was very careful to tell Ward exactly what had transpired. After a day or so he started figuring out all kinds of complicated plots to fool the Russians. I said "Look, it's not necessary. I'm just not going to do anything about this, that's all. They're not going to get anything out of me. I'm not going to sign anything, and I'm not going to talk to them again about it." At which time (Ward having done his own coding), word came in of my transfer to the Department, via Moscow. A week or so later I left. Tamara spent my last night in my apartment, and the next morning Dima Chang, the Chinese, sneaked her out so that Ward wouldn't see (the NKVD across the street obviously did), took her to the station, and put her on the Moscow train in my compartment. She rode out 19 kilometers with me, and we parted, she to get the local back to town. It was all very dramatic.

This goes back to what I told you earlier about Loy Henderson. Loy had said to me in Washington before I left, "You tell us if you get into any kind of a jam with women there. We will get you out and nothing will appear in your record." That word was kept. Nobody in the Foreign Service, or elsewhere in the Government has ever mentioned this to me. Nothing ever appeared in my record that I know of -- assuming that Foreign Service Personnel were later obeying the Foreign Service Act of 1947, and showing me everything. I later received at least ten or a dozen Top Secret clearances, going into the middle 1980s. The question never arose. Henderson, and people like him, were men of their word.

Q: You mentioned that Tommy Thompson accompanied you partly to make sure that you got out?

McCARGAR: Yes. That was the whole point. In fact, I had to wait around for quite some time in Moscow. I fell ill so there was no great problem in waiting for Tommy's leave to come up so he could accompany me. While ill, incidentally, a young Russian lady whom I had known in Moscow in 1942, officially a Russian-language teacher for the Embassy staff, but also in 1943 the maitresse-en-titre of one of the Assistant Naval Attachés, came to see me in my room at the National Hotel. She asked me about Vladivostok. Certain that the room was bugged, I gave her the whole story, at length. Among other things I complained about the very comfortable residence in Tiger Street, with full domestic staff, provided to Comrade Pegov, First Secretary of the Krai Party -- a luxury I contrasted with that of the city's workers, who were on very short rations indeed. She listened, and finally, with a smile, she said, "You are more Communist than Stalin."

I think much of all this helps to point out why the State Department personnel, at least those who had served in Moscow, or Kuybyshev, or Vladivostok, had a very definite anti-Soviet bias (but not an anti-Russian bias). The officers that served there came away from this experience of Soviet treatment in the midst of a major war in which we were supplying them with all sorts of things and they were our allies with unavoidable resentment. For those in the State Department who knew, the experience on the ground was that we were basically being treated like enemies. As the revisionist historians get into all this, they should get a feel for the atmosphere at the time, and for how the Soviets operated.

Much of this led to other aspects of my later career which we'll be going into. That is to say, if you worked for the American Embassy or the American Consulate General in the time of Stalin in the Soviet Union (of course it was true even under his successors but particularly so under Stalin), you learned very quickly that the only methods which would help you to get your work done were clandestine. Open diplomacy? -- forget it.

JOHN F. MELBY
Generalist and Acting Director, Office of War Information
Moscow (1943-1945)

John F. Melby was born in Oregon in 1913. He received a bachelor's degree from Wesleyan and a master's degree and doctorate degree from the University of Chicago. He entered the Foreign Service in 1937. His career included positions in Mexico, Venezuela, the Soviet Union, and China. He was interviewed in June of 1989 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Well, how does one go to Moscow? This was 1943. We're at war with Japan and Germany. And our ally Moscow, while not under siege, the war is still very iffy.

MELBY: Yes, it is. My route of march was long when planes didn't fly as far and as fast in those days. So I went to Miami, to British Guyana, mouth of the Amazon to Belem. Recife in Brazil, across the Atlantic to Liberia, to what was then the Gold Coast, now called Ghana. At the time I was leaving, suddenly Litvinov, the Soviet ambassador, was recalled to Moscow, without warning, without even saying goodbye. The White House gave me a pass to try and catch him. Well, he was moving so fast, I never did catch him. I got as far as Ghana and I was exhausted. So I gave up trying to catch him. And I sat on the beaches of Africa for ten days and recuperated.

Then we went over to Khartoum, Cairo, Tel Aviv, Basra, the Persian Gulf, and Tehran. And then up across the Caucasus, across Caspian Sea, to Kuybyshev, which still had some of the American embassy.

Q: That's where the capital and pretty much the whole government had been moved after the major assault in November or December of 1941.

MELBY: But by the time I got there, most embassies had moved back. We just had the remnants of an office in Kuybyshev, in the Urals. Warwick Perkins was in charge of the office, he and a couple of clerks. That was about it. Then I went from Kuybyshev into Moscow.

Q: What was your job in Moscow?

MELBY: I never really had much of a job because the embassy was badly over-staffed. And it was done deliberately because nobody knew whether the Germans were going to break through at Stalingrad. And the embassy would be cut off.

Q: The siege of Stalingrad was going on at this time, wasn't it?

MELBY: Yes. When we flew in, we came over the Elburz mountains and stopped in Baku for breakfast. And then we had to fly at almost ground level up to Kuybyshev to avoid detection from German planes. We were that close to Stalingrad. For the first few months -- Admiral Standley left shortly after I got there -- I overlapped him by only a few weeks. He never returned.

I'd moved into Spaso house, which was the ambassador's residence. I stayed there the whole time I was in Moscow. Harriman came as ambassador after the Moscow conference of foreign ministers. He came with Hull and the others. And he stayed, of course, and became the ambassador.

Q: Were you working in the political or economic sections, or AID?

MELBY: I didn't really do much of anything. I worked part of the time in the code room. We were all taking our turn doing that. Max Hamilton was chargé d'affaires when the admiral left. And he didn't know how long he was going to be there or who was going to replace Standley.

There was a huge military mission there. And all the Russians were interested in was the military affairs. We had no part of that, really. So I didn't have much of anything to do, and neither did anybody else.

Then, when Harriman came in November of 1943, he brought with him Sam Speiwak who had to open up an OWI office.

Q: OWI means Office of War Information. It later was turned into USIA.

MELBY: USIA is abroad; OWI when it's at home.

Sam Speiwak came to be the head of the office. Well, it was quite clear when Sam got there that he wasn't going to stay. And, in fact, he took one look -- he came originally from the Ukraine. I think one reason he had taken the job was his mother still lived in the Ukraine. And I guess that was the reason Averell brought him. Thought he spoke Russian, would be interested. Sam got sick as soon as he got there and the few weeks he was there, before he went back to Washington on consultation, mostly I sat around talking to him. He sat and he just stayed in bed. We had a leak in the ceiling, and he had an umbrella over his head to keep the water and rain off. It was a very entertaining period. We all knew that Sam wasn't coming back. So Averell asked me to take over the office. And for a year, I was the acting director of OWI in Moscow.

Q: So, here you were, chief information person. What could you do? Obviously, you must have been under tremendous constraints. Soviet society was --

MELBY: Surprisingly, no, not at this time. We did the usual function of press releases and so on. There wasn't any censorship involved. The primary job that we had to do was -- Averell's daughter and I, she went to work for me. She had been working for Newsweek in London, and she came with him to be his hostess. Because his wife never came out to Moscow. We had permission to publish a magazine in Moscow called America. Which was the glossy job of all time. It made Vogue, Harper's Bazaar, all the rest of them, look like cheap publications.

Q: Where did you get the equipment to do all this?

MELBY: It was all done in the States. It was the most complicated business. The text was all written in the States. It was cabled out to Moscow. We translated it into Russian. It was then cabled back in Russian to Washington -- because Washington Russian was still Czarist Russian, not Soviet Russian. So we had a lot of changes. It was printed in the states, and shipped out. And it was a very expensive, glossy job.

Q: Well, when you say shipped out, we're talking still about a time when we were having a hell-of-a-time getting convoys through to Murmansk and taking tremendous losses. And part of this was getting this magazine?

MELBY: It was the most popular item ever put out in the Soviet Union. Distribution was about 50,000 copies, and they were all gone before they arrived.

Q: Well, then we're not talking about something that wasn't without value.

MELBY: It was enormously valuable. That and the Sears Roebuck catalog were the most valuable pieces of literature ever distributed in the Soviet Union.

Q: Did you have much reason to call for what the line should be? Or what we were trying to do?

MELBY: No, we had lots of ideas about what should be in it. Washington listened, too.

Q: What were we particularly trying to emphasize about the United States in this popular magazine?

MELBY: Trying to show American life as it was. It was no snow-job at all. Russians didn't believe a lot of the stuff we published. I remember we had one particular item, photographs of River Rouge plant, a Ford plant.

Q: This was at that time a bomber plant, wasn't it?

MELBY: But the shot was of the workers' parking lot. These thousands of automobiles parked there. And the Russians didn't believe those were owned by the workers. They said, "No, this is a fake shot! It can't be true in the land of capitalism."

Q: Did you have any contacts with Soviet officialdom or with Russians?

MELBY: I had a great deal. Of course, we worked for the press office and the foreign office.

Q: Did they have any problems with what we were putting out?

MELBY: Not particularly. We had no trouble with that. In fact, when I finally ended up in China after the San Francisco conference, who should be the new Soviet ambassador in Chungking but the man who'd been head of the press office in the foreign office in Moscow, who was a good friend of mine, A. A. Petrov. And his staff, most of them I'd known in Moscow, too. So it was a sort of old home week for me.

Q: So there was real allied loyalty, at least at your level. What was Harriman like, as a boss?

MELBY: Well, I thought he was pretty good. He had a few misconceptions to get over. When he arrived, he thought he was going to deal with Stalin as he had with Churchill. He was just going to spend weekends at Stalin's dacha, wherever that would be. And it was going to be "Joe" and "Ave" and so on. And, as it turned out, Harriman didn't even see Stalin for weeks. It took him a long time before he could present his credentials. Stalin was a busy man, and he wasn't about to sit around and gossip with one of these upstart ambassadors. Averell never did have anything but correct, pleasant relations -- but he got along with Stalin all right.

He used to have to see Stalin when it suited his purposes, which was usually after midnight. Of course, Stalin went to work at midnight. And then he worked all night, the rest of the night. Slept all day. It was a kind of an irregular life. But if the Russians wanted to live that way, that was their business. After all, it was their country.

So, Harriman never got to know anybody. I mean, he knew Molotov, the foreign minister, but it was strictly on a very formal basis.

Q: How was he as a boss? Did he give you a difficult time? Was he a difficult person to work for?

MELBY: Not at all. He was very easy to work for. He liked the Foreign Service, appreciated it. He had great respect for language officers we had there. I was not one. He enjoyed Kennan and got along well. Thompson, the others.

He was a man with a lot of peculiarities and strange mannerisms sometimes. He very seldom went to the chancery. He set up his office in his own bedroom. He had a huge bedroom in Spaso, and he worked there. He went down to the chancery only once a month or every other week. So he never had his office in the chancery, which was right on Red Square in those days.

Q: George Kennan was the deputy chief of mission at that time?

MELBY: That's right. He was Minister-Counselor

Q: How did you find him?

MELBY: George and I never hit it off particularly well. I think he thought I was not a language officer. He didn't think I was making much progress on learning Russian. He thought I made a better newspaperman than I did a Foreign Service officer. I finally got around to seeing an efficiency report he once submitted on me, that I should never have seen, and I did, under the Freedom of Information Act. In it he said that he thought I would probably be more at home as a newspaperman, but that I undoubtedly had qualities which were enough to warrant keeping me on. It wasn't worth the trouble to get rid of me. And I never did become a language officer.

Q: Well, we're talking about someone assigned in a hurry, rather than taking a couple of years off. The Kennans and the Thompsons had about three years in which they were -- in war time, you go to a post and you don't have that time.

MELBY: I didn't have any difficulties with George.

Q: No, but you found him sort of aloof?

MELBY: Yes, we just didn't have much to say to each other.

Q: What was your impression of the Soviets and the Soviet system at that time? You were coming from a different climate, both Washington and Latin America. And all of a sudden, you're in this thing which you've always wanted to see. I think almost everybody wants to get a look at the system. You had pretty good access. How did you feel about what you saw?

MELBY: I suppose one of the answers to that one is: I've never been back to Moscow, nor have I had any slightest desire to go. Yet despite the fact that it was a lot easier than it had been and certainly a great deal easier than it was before the war was over, leave was like getting out of jail.

I didn't like the climate particularly. I wouldn't like the winter weather much, anyway. My interest was -- I'd seen it, and that was enough. It seemed to me that they had taken a kind of an orthodox Marxism, and even Leninism, and Stalin had perverted it. Worst thing that ever happened to Marxist theory was the Soviet Union.

Q: Were you seeing the dark side of this? Were you and others pretty well isolated at this juncture?

MELBY: Of course we were isolated. We did have Russian friends, particularly among the artistic community. I knew a great many of them. But it was on the kind of easy, easy basis. After all, Moscow had been at war.

And the artists we saw, and the musicians -- for instance, Prokofiev was a good friend of mine. And Shostakovich I knew him too. And I knew his mother even better. But they couldn't do anything in the way of entertaining. They didn't want any foreigners seeing the way they had to live.

Contacts with them were usually set up in someone's apartment that had been provided for that purpose. Otherwise, though we could travel, we had no difficulty once you got away from Moscow. You would just get on a train and go someplace. So I saw quite a bit of Russia when I was there.

Q: You didn't feel you were being shadowed?

MELBY: Sure we did! We knew we were. We knew everything we said was probably being taped or at least being bugged. Except that maybe there wasn't quite as much bugging going on at that time because they were short on manpower. They didn't have the people to do it.

But the people you did know, did meet -- and this was the tragic side of it -- he'd be the only surviving member of his family. After all, the Russians lost 35 million people -- killed! -- in that war. This was the tragic part of it.

Q: Were the people you talked to talking about the great purges of the '30s? Or was this just not a topic of conversation?

MELBY: No. During the war, the whole ideology was thrown out. The whole feel of the propaganda going on at the time, "Fighting for the Russian soil". And even ranks were reinstituted in the Red Army. And they had to put out regulations saying "Officers will not hang on the outside of buses."

Of course, that all changed again when the war was over.

WILLIAM A. CRAWFORD
Moscow (1944-1947)

Ambassador William A. Crawford was born in New York in 1915. He received a bachelor's degree from Haverford College, after which he studied for two years at the School of Political Science in France. Ambassador Crawford's Foreign Service career included positions in Czechoslovakia and France, and an ambassadorship to Romania. He was interviewed by H.G. Torbert on March 23, 1989.

Q: Having gotten through in Havana you went back to the Department for a while or did you get to Moscow?

CRAWFORD: No. I decided toward the end of my tour in Havana that I wanted to go to Moscow. While I was in Havana the Department of State asked for volunteers to go to Moscow. This was in the spring/summer of 1944. They were looking for six officers to learn Russian first, and then go to Moscow. It looked to me like an interesting thing in itself, we were coming to grips with the Russians at that time.

Secondly, it offered an opportunity to get out of the Latin American field. I had begun to feel that I might be typed as a Latin American specialist. Although it was interesting, I preferred the idea of going to Europe. This seemed to offer the possibility of possibly getting into Europe by the back door, that is, Eastern Europe. I put in for it and was accepted. I was trained at Harvard then sent over to Moscow.

Q: Was that primarily the language or training or what?

CRAWFORD: That was all language training. Yes. Although I did study a bit of Russian literature and so on while there. But it was to give you a quick intensive grounding -- in Russian grammar there's certain vocabulary.

Three of us were sent to Moscow, three were sent to Cornell. At that time the Department was trying out the field. I wound up in Moscow, arriving amidst of the victory celebration. I stayed in Moscow until the summer of '47.

Q: Was Averell Harriman still there when you got there or had he left already?

CRAWFORD: Yes. Averell was ambassador and George Kennan was his number two. I served through Averell's tenure from that point on until the spring of '46. I was there during the period when George Kennan sent his long telegram to the Department in February of '46. I stayed on for while with Bedell Smith.

Q: What did a new man in Moscow start out doing in that time?

CRAWFORD: They started you out in the administrative section where you really had to deal with the local staff and the chauffeurs.

Q: And speak Russian.

CRAWFORD: And with Bureau for Foreigners of the Foreign Ministry, which was the bureau for services for foreigners. And speak Russian, yes. So it gave you very good training of that kind. Also you were always your head against the wall dealing with Russians. At that time if you wanted a box of matches you almost had to send a note to the foreign office.

I spent my first two months in administration. Then I was moved up to be the press secretary. There my job was to read the press, and send to the Department any telegrams of items of very special interest. Also to read the Russian political journals and reviews and so on. The rest of my time was spent there. It was a very small operation. It was very stimulating because the group who were there were an exciting group of older and younger officers, all of whom were specialized in the field.

Q: This would have been the period when the happy alliance turned into the Cold War.

Q: Was that clearly noticeable in Moscow to you as a working stiff, so to speak?

CRAWFORD: Yes. Your associations were, first of all, made with a few so called "trained seals" from the Russian government. Then in June of 1947 the Russians passed a state secrets act which made it a crime subject to considerable penalties to talk to any foreigner about almost anything that didn't have to do with daily business. At that point even information from the trained seals almost dried up. So I was there when the Cold War took hold.

Moscow was very exciting. I had one quite interesting experience. I had a wife and two small children by that time, and I had to get them over. The policy at the Embassy in Moscow was then that you could only have living accommodations with one bed - this meant there was no room for my two small children and Barbara couldn't do that. I had to scrounge around and I was lucky enough to find a little dacha outside of town. I got Hannermans's permission to bring over my own furniture and to leave my own bed in Moravia and to set myself up at the dacha and to bring my wife and children. For almost two years we lived that way in the little winterized dacha I finally got fixed up. We were the only ones in Moscow who were living outside of the Embassy compound and it was really quite fascinating.

Q: By the time you got through with that tour did you feel your Russian was pretty good?

CRAWFORD: It was pretty good for practical purposes. I could read the press without any problem. I had some problems on oral Russian. I was sent back then to Washington to the Russian desk. I stayed at the Russian desk for several years. Then I was sent on for advanced Russian training at Columbia in 1949.

Q: Again that was basically language training at Columbia?

CRAWFORD: It included language training and I had a whole year of it. I was there with Walter Stoessel and Dick Davis. We also studied economics and law and other subjects, like Russian history.

MERRITT N. COOTES

Moscow (1945-1947)

Merritt N. Cootes was born and raised in Virginia. His career in the Foreign Service included positions in Haiti, China (Hong Kong), Italy, Portugal, the Soviet Union, Pakistan, and Algeria. Mr. Cootes was interviewed by Lillian Peters Mullin on September 27, 1991.

Q: The war ended in Europe in May, 1945. This was in October, 1945.

COOTES: Yes. I stayed in the Embassy in Moscow for two years. At first our Ambassador was Averell Harriman, whom you knew about later on. After he left, there was a short period when George Kennan was chargé d'affaires. Then came Ambassador Walter Bedell Smith, who had been chief of staff to General Eisenhower, initially in England, when they were talking about the arrangements for the post-war period and what was to be done. You will remember there were a lot of people who maintained that we should insist that the Germans surrender unconditionally. The British were 100% in favor of that. As it worked out, as you know, the surrender was fairly unconditional because the Nazi Government was completely liquidated, and with it came the American, British, and Russian occupation. The three countries occupied different zones in Germany. Later, the French were given an occupation zone, and there was a Four-Power occupation of Berlin.

Q: And the entire country. And there was no German Government at all.

COOTES: The occupation covered the entire country. The German Government was formed later on.

Q: In 1952.

COOTES: In 1952, yes. While the "De-Nazification" process was under way the, Nuremberg Trials were taking place. Goering was one of the German leaders charged, but he committed suicide by taking a lethal pill which, they say, his American guards had helped him obtain. So he bumped himself off.

Q: You were in Moscow in 1945. What was Moscow like? It must have been badly damaged. What were the conditions?

COOTES: Moscow was not particularly badly damaged because, you know, the Germans never really got there. It wasn't like under Napoleon when the French actually got into Moscow. The Germans were defeated at Stalingrad, but Moscow was not much damaged.

Q: Except from the air.

COOTES: Except from the air. There was a certain amount of damage from air raids. The Bolshoi Theater was damaged but not destroyed.

In Germany the British, the Russians, and ourselves had our occupation zones. Our military controlled the situation in our zone, but we had a State Department political adviser to General Eisenhower. Initially, Eisenhower was the American commander in Berlin. However, very shortly thereafter he went elsewhere and left General Clay as his deputy and commander of the American forces. General Clay had Robert Murphy, later Ambassador Murphy, as his Political Adviser. He had inherited him from General Eisenhower. Murphy stayed on in Berlin. Later, the German Government was established, and we set up our Embassy in Bad Godesberg.

There's an amusing story about the time we had the Berlin Airlift. The Russians had cut off access to Berlin by land. General Clay arranged to have an airlift of supplies to Berlin. Our planes took off and landed, I think, every six minutes. According to the story, there was a British correspondent up in the control tower in Berlin, listening to the communications between the tower and the pilot of a plane that was about to take off. The British correspondent heard the American pilot say to the control tower: "Give me the woid and I'll make like a boid." Naturally, the pilot was from Brooklyn. The British correspondent said, "Oh, you Americans. I find it very difficult to understand you."

Q: When you got to Moscow, then, how were the living conditions?

COOTES: Well, as to living conditions, I lived at first, as I say, at the Finnish Legation with Mr. Kennan. Later on, I was moved down to the Mokavaya, an apartment building right on Red Square, which the Russians had turned over to us to use as our Embassy, after the establishment of diplomatic relations in 1933. We had our offices on the first two floors. Above that, were apartments. On the top floor were six studio apartments with a Northern exposure. Evidently, this building had been intended for artists. On Soviet national day, November 7, the anniversary of the "glorious October Revolution" (The calendar had been changed from the Julian to the Gregorian calendar.), when they had military parades in Red Square, all the friendly military attachés came over to our apartments there overlooking Red Square so that they could see things.

Our contacts with the Russians were zero.

Q: This was in 1945?

COOTES: In 1945. Oh, absolutely. We were then, as the saying went, taking over from the British as Number 1 Enemy. We were not allowed to see Russians. The man who was handling American affairs in the Soviet Foreign Ministry had previously served in the Soviet Embassy in Washington. He used to come down to the State Department when I was in EE [Eastern European affairs]. So I saw him regularly in Washington. We exchanged lunches. They always invited us to lunch at the Carlton Hotel because they had some of the waiters on their payroll.

When I got to Moscow, I invited him to lunch frequently, but only once did he come, and that was when Dick Davis and I gave a party to celebrate our moving into this new flat. Our Ambassador came. When I told this man, the head of the American Section at the Foreign Ministry, that our Ambassador would be there, and I hoped that he and the chief of Protocol would be there, they both came. However, a man named John Davies was First Secretary of our Embassy. He devised a wonderful system for handling invitations to a cocktail party. When you invited people to an event of this kind, you kept a list of how many were invited, how many replied, and how many turned up. In our case we issued 117 invitations, 19 replied, and five showed up. So, we were not allowed to see Russians, except when we would go skiing. We could chat with Russians when we went skiing. One time when I was about to leave a ski slope, there was a Russian who had been very nice to me. I said, "Look, I've got a car. Could I give you a ride into town?" He looked at my car and said, "Oh, no. If I went into Moscow and got out of your car, one of the militiamen would pick me up right away and interrogate me." So our contacts with the Russians were absolutely zero.

Q: What kind of parties did you give then?

COOTES: We invited other colleagues -- the British, the French, the Dutch, the Swedes.

Q: What kind of reporting were you doing, then?

COOTES: Well, our other colleagues didn't have any contact with the Russians, either. There was one time each year when the Soviet Foreign Ministry would have one of their men give a party in what had been one of the old houses, like Spaso House, where our Ambassador lived. I lived at the Mokavaya on Red Square, but the Ambassador lived in Spaso House. The Soviet party was given in a very nice apartment, and this man was obviously in public relations. He gave a party and invited people from the various embassies. It was well attended by ballerinas from the Bolshoi, half a dozen skaters, and so forth, who were allowed to be in contact with us that one time. But don't worry. They were pretty closely watched.

Now, it's true that George Kennan and I rented part of a dacha, a country house. This had been turned over to the Allies by the Russians when the Red Cross was operating in the Soviet Union in 1945-1946, and even earlier, during the war. This building had been kept, and George Kennan and I were two of the six people who had access to it. We used to go out there for weekends. There was a custodian, a man who took care of the place when we weren't there. He was really the only Russian we ever got a chance to talk to, person to person. He, obviously, was an ex-farmer, so we weren't getting the highest level opinion of Russian affairs from this man. But at least we did get some feel of what the people were thinking.

I stayed in Russia for two years. During 1947, the last year when I was there, we had the meeting in Moscow of the Conference of Foreign Ministers. This conference had taken place once in the United States and then in England and France, so the Russians said that they would host a meeting, too. They cleared out six floors of the Moskva Hotel, which was the hotel right near Mokavaya Square and our Embassy. They kicked out commissars, under secretaries of state, and people like that to clear the six floors there. There were two floors for the Americans, two for the British, and two for the French.

The Secretary of State was then retired General George Marshall. He came up to this meeting of Foreign Ministers in Moscow, which lasted about a month in March, 1947.

We had a rule then that you did not serve for more than two years in Moscow.

Q: What Section did you serve in when you were in Moscow?

COOTES: Well, I was on the administrative side. I was responsible for physical arrangements at the Embassy, in other words. I was First Secretary of the Embassy. I was responsible for the accounts, the administration, the personnel, and all the rest of it.

Q: How about supplies? How were you getting things like that?

COOTES: They came in by ship through Murmansk.

Q: How did they come down from Murmansk?

COOTES: By train.

Q: That's a long way.

COOTES: It was, indeed. You see, I was there just after the war. They hadn't been able to get anything in during the war. That was the route they used during the war. They couldn't receive supplies through the Baltic republics, -- Latvia, Estonia, and so forth. So they had to go around to the top of the country, to Murmansk.

Q: Why couldn't they come in through the Baltics?

COOTES: Through the Baltics? Lord, no. The Germans had all of that mined.

Q: And the mines weren't cleared out yet?

COOTES: They hadn't been cleared out yet. The other route would have been through Tehran [Iran], but that was very long, devious, and very expensive. Then, after the war was over, we were able to get things in from Berlin, by train. Actually, on one occasion the British, the French, and the Americans got together and placed a big order for alcohol -- wines and things like that. Since the rest of the stuff was coming in through Murmansk, there was a risk that the wines would be frozen. But Mr. [Ernest] Bevin, the British Foreign Secretary, couldn't fly. So he came in by train from Berlin. We got all of the wines loaded on the train that came in from Berlin to Moscow.

Q: You mean that there were cases and cases of booze?

COOTES: Yes. Later on I went to Berry Brothers in London to order some things. I was going down to Algiers later on. I said I wanted three cases of their whisky and two cases of their 12-year-old whisky. They said, "Are you a regular client?" I said, "Do you keep records?" They replied, "Oh, yes, we keep records." I said, "You look it up. Last year I ordered 350 cases of whisky. I guess that makes me a client." You see, I had ordered for the British, French, and ourselves to have the whisky put on Mr. Bevin's train.

So after I'd served for two years in Moscow, I was transferred to Pakistan.

Q: Perhaps you could tell us a little bit more about Moscow before you go on, because we're really interested in what you experienced there.

COOTES: Well, as I say, we had no contact with the Russian people.

Q: Was the Ambassador seeing anyone in the Government?

COOTES: Oh, yes, he'd see high officials in the Soviet Government, but there was no social contact -- no cocktail parties with conversation and so forth. It was all just strictly official. Naturally, we all felt very much cut off from everything. But fortunately, all of our colleagues in the other embassies were pretty well chosen for this post there, so there were really some very stimulating contacts with them. However, not with the people of the country.

Q: Were your families with you?

COOTES: I wasn't married then.

Q: Did the other diplomats have their families with them?

COOTES: Very few of the families were there, because of the housing shortage. You see, we had just this one building. Actually, Mr. Kennan had his wife there. One other American diplomat, Third Secretary Bill Crawford, somehow or other had been able to rent a house from an American lady who had done a great deal of study about the origins of mankind and our descent from an ancestor common to us and the monkeys. She became known as "the monkey woman." Bill Crawford had a house there and was able to bring his wife and two children there. But he had provided housing outside of what was officially available.

Q: The Russians had no objection to that?

COOTES: No.

Q: What about food?

COOTES: Well, we had a commissary there.

Q: Already?

COOTES: Yes. It had basic staples and things like that. Then there was a shop where the foreign diplomats could purchase things. Only the foreign diplomats. The Russians couldn't buy things there because you had to pay in foreign currency. There was very strict rationing in Russia at that time. We used to buy things in that way, and then there was a certain amount of open market activity for fresh vegetables and things like that in the summertime.

Q: Not during the winter.

COOTES: Very seldom. I was horrified the first time I bought anything from the free market.

There was this man standing outside one of the shops there. He had three lemons in his hand. He was trying to sell those for $85, or the equivalent thereof! You see, everything was strictly rationed, and your money wasn't any good unless you had tickets to buy fruit and things like that. They'd rather have three lemons than $85 worth of rubles that they couldn't use for anything else.

Q: Were there ration tickets for everything for the Russian people at that time?

COOTES: Oh, yes. The Russian people were strictly rationed, and, as I say, we could buy from this one store, a limited, diplomatic store. It was called "Torgsin." We paid in foreign currency.

Q: What could you get there?

COOTES: Well, sheets, suits, trousers, and things like that. But most of us brought our own stuff in. But then, as far as food was concerned, we could get meats and things like that which were rationed to the Russian people, but they were available in the diplomatic store there. That really didn't present much of a problem. I was darned lucky. I had a German girl, another one of these Volga Germans, who spoke, naturally, perfect Russian but also spoke German. I'd been to school in Vienna and also spoke Russian. I spoke German to her. She took very good care of us. Of course, she reported everything that happened in our flat to the NKVD [secret police], as it was known then.

Martha Mautner was born in Pennsylvania in 1923. She received a bachelor's degree from Seton Hill College and a master's from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy. Mrs. Mautner's Foreign Service career included positions in Germany and the Soviet Union. She was interviewed by Thomas Dunnigan on November 7, 1995

Q: Did you have any choice of your assignment or were you just told you were going to Moscow?

MAUTNER: We were asked where we would like to go and both of us thought Germany would be good because we had some knowledge of German from school, but the only spot that had an opening for two at the same time, and the two of us were pretty young and naive and scared about going off on our own, was Moscow. We had no background whatsoever.

Q: Now this was shortly after the war in Europe, in 1945. Tell me something about the atmosphere in Moscow in those days? What were the conditions like on your arrival there?

MAUTNER: It is hard to describe them from today's context because you also have to realize I was looking at it as a 21 year old somebody who had never been out of the United States and who took everything for granted.

We were the first State Department people going to Moscow who traveled through Europe. Prior to that everyone had gone via Casablanca, Cairo, Tehran and up that way. So we were sort of a novelty. All of these countries were militarily occupied and we were in the hands of the military.

Q: By traveling through Europe you mean that you went through France and then Germany?

MAUTNER: Yes, and then flew on from Berlin to Moscow. So, I was in Berlin in September, 1945 and I gather we were the first female civilians who had gotten there to fall in the hands of the visitor bureau. They stalled our departure as long as possible but finally arranged for us to get on one of the Russian military aircraft going into Moscow in the latter part of September.

We arrived at Centralny Airport, the military airport right in the center of Moscow, (that was long before they had the big ones outside the city) and were just dumped there. Somebody called the embassy and eventually somebody picked us up and brought us to a billet. We went on from there just taking it as it was.

The atmosphere was very peculiar. In the first place, there were few families there at the embassy. The only wives who were allowed to come were those who were working at the embassy -- because of the housing shortage. That made quite a different atmosphere. Everybody was in the same situation. There were only about 40-45 people on the staff and altogether a foreign colony of maybe 4-500 in all of Moscow, a city of 8 million or so. We were as isolated from the Russian population as the Soviet government could keep us isolated.

Q: Despite the alliance we had had during the war?

MAUTNER: You could still have contact, you could get out and talk to people, but you didn't talk to them twice. The atmosphere was relaxed in one sense: there were no overt restrictions. But at the same time you still had the sense that Soviet people were staying away from foreigners. So, the foreign colony was pretty much incestuous in that we were kept on top of each other all of the time.

But the atmosphere, the morale in the embassy, was very good because of the fact we were all in the same boat. There was no class distinction. The old style Foreign Service wives who made the distinction between themselves and the clerical staff didn't exist because everybody was working. There were only one or two families there and then chiefly because the officer was able to find housing outside on his own. So, for young unattached females, it was a delightful time. Those were the days in the Foreign Service when Foreign Service officers usually didn't get married until they were first secretaries. Bachelor status was preferred because you always needed extra men for dinner. So that meant we had great pickings.

Q: What did you do there?

MAUTNER: I started out as a code clerk, and the other girl I went with was in charge of the file room. Later I moved up into a research position. They had three or four people who did research. Bob Tucker, who became quite famous later on as a historian at Princeton, was there, and Tom Whitney and Spencer Barnes, were all doing background work. I, because of my graduate school background, got moved into that too and was able to carve out a place for myself.

Q: Your ambassador at the time was Averell Harriman?

MAUTNER: Averell Harriman was ambassador when I arrived and then was succeeded by Bedell Smith in the later part of 1946.

Q: Did you have any contact with them?

MAUTNER: Well, much more with Smith than with Harriman. Harriman was never really around the embassy. In fact, I don't ever recall him coming into the embassy building. He did all his work out at Spaso House.

Q: Who was your supervisor there?

MAUTNER: In the code room it was Tommy Senter, but basically supervision came out of the DCM's office. At that time it was George Kennan who had oversight of everything. But there was very little hierarchy in the embassy. Everybody seemed to be on an equal plane.

Q: Rather democratic I would gather.

MAUTNER: Yes. Freddy Reinhardt, Merritt Cootes, Roger Tyler, Dick Davis, Jack McSweeney, John Davies...there were five or six of the first secretaries all working sort of on the same level and everyone pitching in together.

Q: Now this is a period where George Kennan became famous with his long telegram. Were you involved in this at all?

MAUTNER: Ah, yes, this was my great encounter with history. I happened to have late duty in the code room the night Kennan brought in his cable. I happened to have a heavy date that night because there was a big dance at one of the other embassies and I wanted to get out early. He came in at about 7:00 with this five-part opus. My encounter with history involved trying to talk him out of sending it. He didn't pay any attention to me.

Q: Well, history might have changed.

MAUTNER: He said they had asked for that and he was going to give it to them.

Q: Did you have a chance to learn any of the Russian language while over there?

MAUTNER: Oh, yes, we started Russian language lessons as soon as we arrived. I eventually ended up with an ability to read, but not to a serious professional level. I never had any formal training in it.

Q: Now you were there during that famous Foreign Minister's conference in March, 1947, with Secretary Marshall and Molotov, etc. Do you have any remembrances of that?

MAUTNER: Oh yes, very, very vivid remembrances. In the first place, it was quite an occasion because of the big invasion of all kinds of Americans, particularly from Berlin. I shared an apartment with two other girls, one of whom had come from Berlin and was very well acquainted with General William Draper. So, as soon as Draper arrived, he turned up at the apartment. This was one very funny episode because when the plane crews came in with the delegations, the Air Force officers immediately descended on our apartment because they had messages for us from people back in Berlin, that they should look us up, girls, you know. They were all sitting around the apartment trying to impress us with their flyboy stuff when the door bell rang, and there was General Draper walking in. You never saw a batch of Air Force lieutenants disappearing in such a hurry!

The conference, itself, was impressive. John Davies had a very smart idea. He got me detached from my regular duties to set up a reference center in the embassy library with all sorts of background material about the Soviet Union -- Russian social studies, histories, pieces of information designed to give the many journalists a sense, an idea of what was really going on there. None of them had much background in the field. So I rode herd over the backgrounding for journalists on the Soviet scene -- not, of course, on the activities of the conference. That was quite an interesting operation.

Then a good friend of mine who was a first secretary at the British embassy and had no reverence or respect for authority most of the time, swiped the pass of a British delegation economist and gave it to me, so I went to one of the sessions of the conference as a member of the British delegation. So I was able to watch Molotov in action. One episode there that I enjoyed: John Foster Dulles was present and spent the whole time doodling the flags that were in the center of the table, coloring them up in great detail. When the session was over and we were standing around chatting, my English friend picked up the doodle Dulles had done and showed it to him saying, "That is a very professional doodle, Mr. Dulles." Dulles responded, "Do you want me to autograph it?" So, I had Dulles' autograph on this doodle.

Q: That was the first Mautner-Dulles confrontation I take it?

MAUTNER: Yes, it was.

Q: Our delegation must have been very disappointed with the results of that conference.

MAUTNER: They were disappointed in the sense that on the formal agenda, nothing positive had come out of it. On the other hand, everybody was jubilant that we had finally laid down the line to the Soviets; that was the time the Truman Doctrine was announced. There was this sense of finally having enough courage to stand up and not take anymore. So you had this mixed result, the idea that no solution to the world's problems was imminent but at least the air had been cleared.

Q: Did you get a chance to travel at all while in Moscow?

MAUTNER: Not very extensively. I got up to Leningrad, of course, on my way in and out on vacation trips. And I was down through the Ukraine to Odessa on a trip. In the Moscow area, technically speaking we were not allowed more than 25 kilometers outside of the city without special permission. But you couldn't get very far anyway because there weren't many driveable roads. Everything had been damaged and you couldn't have stayed overnight. There were no facilities. But we did drive out as far as we could and saw the rubble, particularly the areas that had been in the path of the German invasion.

Q: While you were in Moscow during that time did you feel that you were under surveillance when you walked around?

MAUTNER: Not when you walked around, but we always had the feeling that big brother was watching you. Any time you met a Russian, or dealt with some of the more obvious Soviets who worked at the embassy, you knew it was being reported back. Our Russian teacher, who we figured was at least a Lt. Colonel in the NKVD at that time, arranged for my roommate and me to meet some Russian fellows "accidentally". She got a young navy lieutenant and I got a chap from the ministry of foreign trade. They took us out for a while, but since nothing came of it they gave up. But you knew what was happening, and you assumed that anything you said in your apartment was being recorded.

Q: That was the time when we lost that young lady, Annabelle Bucar, I think.

MAUTNER: Yes, in fact, when I came back on home leave at the end of 1947, she gave me a whole list of things that she wanted her family to send. A month or two later, after the items had been sent, the great announcement of her defection was made.

Q: Is she still in Russia?

MAUTNER: Yes. She worked for Radio Moscow for years. FBIS picked up a lot of these broadcasts. She and Joey Adamov (I think that was his name) had a talk show in the English language until roughly eight years ago. She came back to the United States several times to visit her family after the thaw.

Q: Any other comments on your tour in Moscow before we go on to other things?

MAUTNER: Well, it was a most fascinating and informative first assignment experience. Totally different from anything to which I had been exposed. But it was the beginning in a lifelong involvement with Soviet and Russian affairs. The mentorship that you got there from people like John Davies or George Kennan was invaluable. They encouraged you.

Q: You could hardly have done better than that.

MAUTNER: Elbridge Durbrow was another one who pushed you along.

***

Q: In 1948 you were transferred back to the Department and I gather you went into research?

MAUTNER: Yes, INR.

Q: Was it called INR at the time?

MAUTNER: OIR, I think. That name changed so many times. I was assigned there because Personnel had a hard time figuring out where to put women who weren't strictly clerical.

Q: What was your job there?

MAUTNER: Basically in the Soviet research area. At the beginning it was basic research on Soviet internal issues, but I was never one who was enamored with deep core research. Then the office set up a current intelligence outfit which produced a lot of pieces about what day-to-day reality was like in the Soviet Union. They might be on Soviet education, or the church system, religion, or anything of this nature. Using all available source material as background, we would produce a sanitized piece that could be made available to journalists for their own purposes. A couple of times we practically won the Stalin prize because a column would appear in the New York Times under the name of a well-known journalist which was largely taken from one of these documents. If the Soviet minister of education or another official protested violently about this canard in a letter to the Times, that was where you got your greatest accolades.

But the project which did the most for my professional reputation was the "Soviet World Outlook", a collection of quotations from the works of Marx, Engels, Lenin and Stalin. I had begun collecting them in Moscow to provide handy citations for inclusion in embassy think pieces, and added more in Washington. These were published as an INR booklet and became so popular in the Department and academia that the Department issued a second edition and charged $1.50 a copy. Those were the days when everyone was citing Lenin and Stalin to prove a point but no one bothered to read the basic texts. So it was a very handy reference -- several thousand copies were sold.

Q: Tell me a little bit about the organization of OIR at that time? Who was the head of it and was it large?

MAUTNER: It was a tremendous outfit at that time because it was essentially the OSS research office which had been taken over intact by the State Department. It was a very departmentalized operation then. My experience was exclusively with the Soviet side. Mose Harvey was in charge of that particular outfit and he ran it as a personal fiefdom. And very effectively too. It had a very extensive staff of really serious scholars on Soviet and Russian affairs. One has to remember that OIR was really the only major center for that kind of work in the years immediately after the end of the war. The universities hadn't developed their Soviet Studies schools at that time.

Q: What was your relations with the new CIA? Had they gotten into this at your level?

MAUTNER: Well, you knew some of the people individually, but most of the OIR-CIA interaction was at a higher level than mine.

Q: There wasn't a lot of cross-fertilization at the working level?

MAUTNER: Not at the working level because it was really only a beginning -- before CIA had developed its own research operations on a large scale.

I stayed in the Soviet research office until early 1949 when I was taken out of there and assigned to the Soviet desk in the European Bureau.

Q: What was the relationship of OIR with the geographic bureaus and the policy planning staff?

MAUTNER: There wasn't much, except at the very top. The point was OIR was considered a foreign body in the State Department and there was a big bureaucratic attempt to kill it. The old mainline officers didn't like the idea of having a second-guess outfit there. So, I would say there was a - I wouldn't say hostile relationship, but it surely wasn't friendly - with very little contact.

Q: So, when you moved, you went to the enemy by moving to the desk?

MAUTNER: That was because people I had been working with in Moscow, like Freddy Reinhardt, Dave Henry, Jack McSweeney and others, had been assigned back to the Department.

I was there for a while and then about the latter part of 1949, Kennan asked me to come up to his office as research aide. He had been moved from the Policy Planning staff to the Office of Counselor and Nitze was phasing in as head of the Policy Planning staff. As Counselor, Kennan wanted some help in background research and remembered me from Moscow.

Q: That must have been a real experience for you getting back together with George Kennan. Tell me something about your work with him, what were you doing?

MAUTNER: He wanted a lot of background data. It could be very light stuff or very heavy stuff depending on the circumstances. For instance, when he was going up to New York to a Council on Foreign Relations meeting and traveling on the train with Walter Lippmann, he wanted data that would counter all the arguments Lippmann was making in the newspapers against our containment policy or opposing something that Kennan was advocating. So I would dig up the requisite data. I remember another project when there was talk about world energy resources petering out, oil supplies, etc. That was one time when old OIR contacts were very useful because I got them to put together a big piece showing how the actual reserves were such that we didn't need to worry for some years to come.

The project that fascinated me the most was Kennan wanting a re-evaluation of all of the papers the Policy Planning staff had done from 1946-47 until the end of his tenure there. So I was handed this whole stack of studies dealing with everything from Russia to Middle East policy to Antarctica, etc., and spent my time reading them and trying to evaluate what had happened to them, how much had been put into effect, how much had been lost by the wayside, how much was misdirected, etc. That was really an amazing experience. I still remember there were 3 volumes, leather bound, that had the first drafts of all these reports in them. They were magnificent pieces of draftsmanship and stood on their own. The only one that I can still recall that hadn't been implemented at the time was on Antarctica because it was about 20 years too early. It has been since.

Q: So they were lopped off from the Department and were put into CIA?

MAUTNER: Yes. The whole biographical operation, all of that was transferred over to CIA. That left INR operating with about 400 people. It became more current focused. We were dealing more with current activities, writing pieces on what the Soviets were up to with their negotiating positions, and sending the stuff directly to the Secretary of State.

Q: How did this dovetail with what the Office of Soviet Affairs was doing? Did you work closely with them or independently of them?

MAUTNER: All of the above. The European Bureau always resented having INR as a second-guessing department. They wanted exclusive jurisdiction. But by that time, they also needed access to the data and particularly to the intelligence information that came through INR, which didn't come through the desks. In those days, intelligence was still pretty well compartmentalized; you usually did not have access to it unless you could prove a "need to know." So, you had this competition. We had good personal relationships with our working level counterparts on the Soviet desk and elsewhere, but at the higher level, assistant secretary level, of course, there was always competition.

Q: Who is going to tell the Secretary?

MAUTNER: Exactly. Who gets there first. But nobody got in the way of Roger Hilsman. So, in this sense INR had much more of an entree than it had before. And the pre-war/immediate post-war generation mainliners were dying out. Remember this was also the time the Department was phasing out all of those permanent civil service officers who had been attached to the geographic bureaus -- the ones who were resented by the Foreign Service because they had too much influence. So, the institutional memories that the bureaus had before were gone.

Q: And sadly missed in some cases.

MAUTNER: Very, very definitely. INR could fill that gap, but at the same time it was a foreign body to the regular establishment. But as that older generation died off, more and more of the Foreign Service officers began to accept INR as a fact of life. A lot of them had assignments there and discovered it was rather interesting and did not hurt their careers. Once they discovered it didn't hurt their careers, then you are accepted.

Q: Now you were there during three of the great crises of the 20th century. The Berlin Wall, the Bay of Pigs Operation and the Cuban Missile Crisis. Could you say a few words first about the Berlin Wall and what role INR played in following that.

MAUTNER: Well, INR, of course, was the conduit for all the intelligence information...

Q: Did INR, by the way, have any indications ahead of time that something like this was coming or possible?

MAUTNER: We had lots of indications that something was coming. Nobody really expected an attempt, to quote Ulbricht, "to put a Chinese wall down the center of the city." He said that two months before the Wall went up. He, after all, wanted the whole city.

We had information of building materials being stockpiled in East Berlin six months or a year before, but it coincided with a big campaign for rebuilding the city. Nobody had immediate intelligence of what was going to happen, because the whole thing was held very, very closely by the top echelon of the East German hierarchy. One thing I would like to point out is that nobody, and that includes the German government and every other government, ever really penetrated the top hierarchy of the East German regime. A lot of people thought they had contacts there, but I have yet to discover anybody who had a real inside link. Only the Soviets knew what Ulbricht and the others were up to, and even they, I am sure, didn't know everything. But, the West Germans never penetrated that system. They were caught totally by surprise when the Wall came down too. Their access evidently never gave them any sense of how weak the regime had become.

MAUTNER: They had penetrated everything and had pretty good reading of the West German scene, but of course the ones at the top who were making the decisions, had a sort of warped mentality. That is the other thing you must keep in mind. The old communists, whether in the Soviet Union or in Eastern Europe, saw things with certain blinders.

Q: Now you were a member of the Berlin Task Force which followed the Wall. Will you say something about that, its composition, how it operated, etc.?

MAUTNER: Well, if one wants to be cynical, the task force was one of those vehicles that got a lot of publicity for being the coordinating center for all government agencies involved in a particular crisis.

Q: You say coordinating. Was it an advisory or decision making body?

MAUTNER: Well, allegedly it was suppose to be the coordinating body that brought together all opinions and distilled the stuff. That is the theory. In practice, it turned out after the first experiment that they served -- if you want to be really cynical about it -- to create a place where everybody from all the various agencies could let off steam. There was an exchange of information, but the decision making was elsewhere, in the White House particularly, and the task force was more or less excluded from it, but got the publicity.

Q: And in the White House who was it?

MAUTNER: Basically the very tight circle around Kennedy and, I will say this, those people didn't know very much about the essentials of the problem. There was an arrogance at that level, a refusal to listen to anybody except their circle of friends -- that kind of thing.

Q: No German experience.

MAUTNER: No German experience and a lot of anti-German prejudice and unwillingness to deal with anyone except people they knew. They knew the big gurus from the Soviet field such as Kennan, Bohlen, and Thompson, none of whom had had grassroots experience in post-war Germany. So decision making was based on a limited amount of feel. The task force could provide the information and create pressure, especially institutional pressure which is very useful when filtered up from below. A lot of people of the old Berlin Mafia used that tactic to develop public pressure and institutional pressure to push things. For instance, the appointment of General Clay who was sent over to Berlin was very much a result of the people like Maggie Higgins and Jimmy O'Donnell on the journalist side putting pressure on the Kennedys, pointing out that it would be politically disastrous if they didn't do something dramatic. It was not something that they really wanted to do.

Q: Who ran the Task Force? Technically, I believe, Secretary Rusk was in charge.

MAUTNER: Well, he never attended any of the sessions of the Task Force. Foy Kohler, who was the EUR Bureau chief, and Martin Hillenbrand generally chaired the sessions and delegated assignments. But what happened after a discussion, the Task Force never found out about because the chairmen then went off to the White House. How much they conveyed of Task Force views there, we never knew. Besides, I don't think they were in the inner loop at the White House.

Q: Within the Task Force itself, who carried the greatest weight? The diplomats in the State Department or the military?

MAUTNER: It depended on the issue. Paul Nitze was on the Task Force, the Secretary of the Navy. The Joint Chiefs had their representative and took very serious notes on everything. (Oddly enough, I got the job of briefing the Task Force every day on all pertinent current intelligence data. It was a five-minute briefing at the start of every meeting. And I did this free-lancing. Nobody in INR paid any attention. Hal Sonnenfeldt would sit in, but that was all.) And then there were people from the Operations Center and from various agencies like the CIA, FBI, Treasury. It allowed for a catharsis; you could get things off your chest and you could raise issues. When Clay came to one of the sessions just before he left for Berlin, the question of Steinstuecken came up.

Q: You might mention Steinstuecken. We didn't talk about that.

MAUTNER: One doesn't often. Steinstuecken was a little area located outside of Berlin proper which was still technically part of the city and the Russians and East Germans were always trying to cut off access to it and absorb it into East Germany, East Berlin.

Q: They never quite succeeded.

MAUTNER: They never succeeded. That issue, after the Wall came up, became a hot potato, and at the Task Force Clay raised the question of how could he get out there and show the flag, or do something. When the military argued he couldn't get there because he would not be allowed access, we on the State side piped up that there was always a helicopter. And that is exactly what Clay used when he went to Steinstuecken, showed the flag and registered the desired effect.

Q: How long did the Task Force continue?

MAUTNER: It probably was still in existence when the Wall came down in 1989. We had a regular roster updated every year with people who could be called on in case anything happened. Daily meetings stopped roughly about a year after the Wall went up; we then met on a weekly or monthly basis. Later it would be convened only in the event of a crisis over air traffic or autobahn problems and such.

Q: Well, those were exciting days. Did the trouble with the Soviets over the missile crisis have any effect on you or not?

MAUTNER: Well, we in INR were again the intelligence coordinators on this. There was all the reconnaissance traffic spotting where the ships and missiles were going, what kind of missiles were involved and what the satellite photography showed, anything picked up from the interception of Soviet communications, etc. We were up to our neck in that one, including the reporting that was going on in the Warsaw Pact at the time. Again, rather interestingly, there were a lot of stories we got about the Soviets rolling out petroleum Pol lines in East Germany in anticipation of activity there at the time of the crisis.

Q: Activity around Berlin?

MAUTNER: Yes, around Berlin and East Germany. Those of us who were familiar with the German scene were always convinced that the Cuban missile crisis had very little to do with Cuba per se. We saw it as a Khrushchev ploy to create a military equation which would allow him to put pressure on us to force negotiations on Berlin. It didn't quite turn out that way, but the Soviets were intending to exploit it in that context because when they once got those missiles installed, they would have leverage against us. The idea that they would attack the United States directly to save Cuba was absurd; rather the basic objective was to get movement on the German/Berlin question. Places closer to home mattered to them much more.

One of the things that INR also did involved those conversations at the White House with Gromyko and Mikoyan and other Soviets who came over here. Martin Hillenbrand was the note taker for most of those sessions and he would allow me to take a look at his notes after each and then I would write up an analysis of Soviet intentions, what they were trying to do and where things were heading. We always had a number of arguments on these, because it was very hard to convince him that Berlin was important in this context. The White House was even more skeptical. Only later did it begin to register.

Ambassador Davis Eugene Boster was born in Ohio in 1920. He received a bachelor's degree from Mt. Union College. He served in the U.S. Navy from 1942-1947 and subsequently entered the Foreign Service. Ambassador Boster's career included positions in the Soviet Union, Germany, Mexico, Poland, and Bangladesh, and an ambassadorship to Guatemala. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on October 20, 1989.

Q: You went to Moscow first as a political officer in 1947. What was the situation at the Embassy at that time. Bedell Smith was the Ambassador at the time. What was the nature of our relations with the Soviets in the 1947-49 period?

BOSTER: It was a very strange period because in theory we were war-time allies who had just concluded a war successfully. But in fact relations were not as cordial as one might have assumed. Already the coolness was beginning to show itself. During my period there, in the second year, the Russians who were emboldened by the war-time collaboration, had begun to make social contacts with the international community in Moscow. The Russians who had these contacts began to disappear. You would go to a cocktail party and some one would say that Natasha was picked up last night with a rap on the door at midnight. Know one knew where she was until six weeks later you would find out that she was in one prison camp or another. Things were turning cold pretty fast and by 1948 we had the Berlin blockade and airlift. My first year in Moscow was spent translating the Russian press by dictating to a secretary in the morning. There were about five of us doing that. We prepared a bulletin that circulated to the Embassy in the afternoon containing translated articles from Pravda or Izvestia. I had no real contacts with the Soviet Government during this period.

In the second year, I was brought into the Embassy to do political reporting. But my rank was too low for any government contacts.

Q: How would a junior officer in an Embassy under these conditions report on what was happening?

BOSTER: We relied mainly on published information that we sent back. We studied the line-up in the Politburo ceremonies; we tried to find new nuances in the press coverage -- what they covered, what they omitted, what phrases they used. It is not the way one functions in a normal Embassy, but we were reduced to this press analysis by circumstances.

Q: Did you share information with other embassies?

BOSTER: Yes. There was a fair amount of that. Some of them actually had first-hand information. You might get something from the Yugoslav Embassy for example that would not be available to us through our own contacts.

Q: What was the atmosphere in the Embassy under Bedell Smith?

BOSTER: You raise a question of two different styles of Embassy leadership. Bedell Smith was an authoritarian, hard task-master. The discipline was tight and he expected everybody to be super-active in fulfilling their duties. He got that -- it was a fine Embassy with good morale, although everybody was conscious that the "old man" was looking over your shoulder and was not going to tolerate any nonsense. He was a very fine Ambassador -- good mind and very able.

His place was taken a year after I arrived in Moscow by Alan Kirk, who had been an Admiral and headed our invasion forces at Normandy. He came in with a totally different approach. He felt that his mission was to provide the kind of constructive atmosphere in which everybody could do a good job according to their abilities and he understood that he had a fine staff working at the Embassy which didn't need to be stood over. He was just a friendly counselor. He also got results because the staff was excellent -- a first rate group of people.

Q: What was your impression of the "Soviet specialists" which were a special breed at the time?

BOSTER: Without any question and generally recognized, they were a special breed. The Soviet "club" was the first, later followed by the Japanese, Chinese and other area "clubs". But back in 1947-49 the result of the work of Bob Kelley and others in the State Department in setting up a program which sent Kennan and Bohlen to various Russian places, immersing them in the language and culture of the country before they went to Moscow. With people like that, the Soviet service had a special stamp on it. I think it dissipated over the years, understandably, but at that time it was very strong with very able people -- Fred Reinhardt, Dick Davis, Foy Kohler, George Morgan, etc.

Q: How did the blockade of Berlin impact on you and the Embassy? Did you feel that the possibility of war was becoming more likely?

BOSTER: Walter Stoessel, later Under Secretary of State, and I had gone to Moscow at about the same time, both without our wives -- Embassy policy was that wives had to wait one year to join their husbands because of lack of room. Our wives, Mary and Mary Ann, came over on the same ship -- the Gripsholm -- to Stockholm. Walter and I left the Embassy a few days earlier and went out through Warsaw and Germany and eventually got to Stockholm and came back to Moscow with our wives. Before they left the States, I had run into the Air Attaché. When he learned that we were bringing our wives to Moscow he said he would never do that. He said that we didn't appreciate the importance of what was going on. He thought we may very well be at war in the very near future. He was very negative about bringing the family -- I had two little children at the time. Although this was the only conversation I had like that, it was typical of the atmosphere at the time. It was certainly a strain to be in Moscow at the time. After my conversation with the Air Attaché, I had cabled my wife suggesting that she not come. She had also been expressing anxiety about the transfer. She said that the people in Hudson, Ohio were counseling her against coming. I told her I would resign and return to the States and look for another career. She felt that I was about to give up my career just to ease her concerns; so of course she came.

Q: After the blockade and the airlift started, did the Embassy look for signs of hostility?

BOSTER: I am sure that the Ambassador and the DCM and the military Attachés undoubtedly would have had indicators in mind in watching the scene, but to say that all of us in the Embassy, particularly at the junior levels, were always on watch, would be to magnify our responsibilities and our daily concerns too much.

Q: Were you aware of horror stories about Stalin or was the Embassy looking for the positive side of the Russian experience?

BOSTER: I don't think there was a better side to look at. But there was no war psychosis in the Embassy. The Air Attaché statement was an exception, although others may have had it in back of their minds as a possible eventuality.

Q: Were you and others trying to turn the United States' perception around? The U.S. after all had gone out of its way to paint the Soviet Union in rosy colors during and right after the War and then in the late 1940s the realities were setting in. Did you have the feeling that the Embassy had to let Washington understand that the situation in 1949 was the real picture?

BOSTER: That was certainly true. We were trying to bring home to the State Department and the general public that circumstances had changed. Kennan's famous article appeared in "Foreign Affairs" at about this time and that was a fundamental part of the re-education of America. We were contributing our part to that perception of the "real world".

Q: You returned to Washington in 1949. Where were you assigned initially?

BOSTER: The first year I was assigned to the research area, working on Soviet activities in the Far East. I am sure that the whole Department of State was taken by surprise by the invasion of Korea. I remember a message from our Embassy in Seoul written by a Soviet specialist there, who had made a trip around Korea, which noted the absence of any war-like tensions. He did not point out that the North was about to roll. I was therefore absolutely startled by the news when in June 1950 the invasion began.

Q: After that year, what was your next assignment?

BOSTER: An officer -- Richard Davis -- who had interviewed me when I applied to State and thereafter was instrumental in bringing me into the Foreign Service -- in the Staff Corps, by the way -- took a personal interest in me. He had returned to Washington from Moscow to be the Director for Soviet Affairs. He decided that it would be useful to have on the Soviet desk, not only Foreign Service officers, but also a Civil Service person who could represent continuity, who would not be reassigned every four years. He called me and asked me whether I would be interested. I said "Yes, of course" and was brought to the Division under his plan. Later, I took advantage of the lateral entry program and joined the Foreign Service as a Reserve Officer because during the McCarthy era, all regular appointments had been held up. So when I was assigned to Bonn, I went as a Reserve Officer.

Q: What effect did the McCarthy area have on the Soviet desk ?

BOSTER: That had a devastating impact. It never affected me personally except for the general atmosphere. there were a number of people that one knew that had come under suspicion for one reason and another. It was a very bad period.

Q: Did it have any effect on the reporting you were seeing? Were people slanting their views to appear tough on the Communists?

BOSTER: This subject was frequently the topic of conversation between officers in the Department, with concern being expressed that it would have that effect. I don't recall any specific instance in which you might have made that comment. It was more in the atmosphere than in specific cases, but I am sure it would have had an effect. It would have taken a bold officer to "cross the line".

Q: In 1959, you moved back to Soviet Affairs.

BOSTER: Dulles died. I remember that Christian Herter, who was Dulles' successor, sent word to me through one of his assistants to tell me if I wanted to stay on, I would be welcomed. A finer man than Herter has never set foot in the Department. That message was in keeping with his personality and character. But I decided that I didn't want to continue. I was told that this was one time I could write my own ticket -- more or less. That is to say that if there were an assignment within reason that I wanted, I would get it. I frankly toyed with the idea of trying to go to Rome, where I always wanted to be assigned. But in the meantime Foy Kohler, who was then Assistant Secretary for European Affairs and who had been in Moscow when I was there, asked me to take a job in Soviet Affairs as officer-in-charge of Soviet Union political affairs. Charlie Stephan was leaving the job and Kohler wanted me to replace him. After stewing about the possibility of asking for Rome or Hungarian language training, I simply accepted what the system suggested that I do and went to Soviet Affairs.

Q: We are now talking about the 1959-61 period. How did you view the internal situation in the USSR?

BOSTER: During that period, Khrushchev came to the United States. I was lucky enough to be included in a lunch for Khrushchev. I remember meeting him then. In general terms, the Soviet Union was still a large black hole as far as our perceptions were concerned. Khrushchev was a rather stimulating, new figure in that black hole. To some degree he was now and then encouraging. There was considerable interest in what he might actually mean for the Soviets. He was not a normal head of the government. His condemnation of Stalin indicated that there might be some hope for new relations. The amazing Gorbachev is more understandable to us after having watched Khrushchev. He has far eclipsed anything Khrushchev did, but the latter did make some signs of taking a more realistic view of things.

Q: When you were looking at the Khrushchev phenomenon, did you see someone who was shaking up things but who had forces opposed to him who would prefer a less adventuresome domestic and foreign policy?

BOSTER: That is probably right, although we were not that sold on Khrushchev. Our interest was aroused by his direction, although always within the context of a Soviet system which was bad. We did not see at that time anything like the upheaval that the USSR is going through now. It is qualitatively different now. But Khrushchev was an interesting figure and gave us more hope than we had before.

I don't think anyone saw a radical change in the Soviet Union. He was not viewed as a Gorbachev.

Q: You served in Moscow as Political Counselor from 1965-67. What was the situation in the USSR at that time?

BOSTER: There had been some relaxation and some contacts permitted between Soviet citizens and the American Embassy. Some of our people were seeing a fair number of Russians -- not the general mass, but people in the fields of the arts, literature, etc. That was different from my previous tour. The results of these contacts formed part of our reporting.

Q: What was the content of these reports?

BOSTER: As always, we were reporting a lot based on the Soviet press. By this time, we had more contacts. We had regular meetings with the British, French, Germans and other colleagues. These were institutionalized to review developments and form a consensus on directions, who was up, who was down, what the policy would be on the Far East and so on.

Q: During this period, we were getting deeper and deeper into Vietnam. Was this impacting in relations?

BOSTER: Vietnam did, inevitably. I can remember going with Foy Kohler to see Gromyko. Sometime he would take John Guthrie, the DCM, but more often he took me as note taker. There was no budging; it was just a collision of view points. There were no substantive collaborative exchanges on any subject. Gromyko was personally cordial enough, but these were tough days.

Q: Were we looking for opening wedges to develop better ties?

BOSTER: No, I don't think so. We took what was going on as the inevitable consequence of their philosophy against ours. We were trying to manage the relationship in such a way that it didn't result in World War III. I certainly have no recollection of us trying to find a way to entice them into a friendlier relationship. I mentioned earlier the difference between Bedell Smith and Alan Kirk. And again, in the case of Kohler and Thompson, we had two excellent men with very different styles. Foy Kohler was a team man. He seldom sent an important telegram to Washington without calling his senior Embassy aides who had competence in the subject matter to the "secure room" for a discussion and more often than not to work on a draft telegram he had prepared. On a number of occasions, Foy would make changes, sometime important changes, in the text as result of the discussion and the views that he heard. If they made sense to him, he would change. Often he would hear the views, but decide that they were not material. But in this sense, he was a team man and in terms of morale of the people working for him, this was wonderful. I felt a productive part of the machine and that I had a role to play that was recognized and appreciated. Llewellyn Thompson who succeeded Kohler -- second time as Ambassador to Moscow -- had a reputation of a "star" figure which he deserved. I was very impressed by him. But he was not a team man. In fact, the problem was to insure that you were seeing all the material he was sending. That was a marked difference in approach. He had a profound knowledge of the Soviet system gained over many years. He read the Soviet press thoroughly. I don't think he ever took anybody with him when he went to see the Soviet leaders. I think he had a conception of his role as one of doing whatever he could to develop and sustain a close and trusting relationship with the Soviet leadership so that it would trust him to be a reliable messenger. He probably thought that the success of his mission would depend on the development of that special relationship. It was a one-man relationship.

Q: During the 1965-67 period, were there any major developments in our relations?

BOSTER: One of the developments concerned a young American man who crossed the Soviet border and was put in jail. He was from Minnesota, I think. They put him in jail and were of course trying to get him out. This went on and on and the Soviets were not being forthcoming at all. Eventually, he was transported from one prison to another and he slashed his wrists. The question was whether he really committed suicide. We took the matter very seriously. The Soviets had a fundamental attitude which was demonstrated again and again, not only in this case, but in many others that the Soviet borders were inviolable and nobody comes over those borders without consequences. There were a series of incidents with airplanes being shot down. They were doing reconnaissance work close to the territorial limits. The Soviets wanted to establish the fundamental principle that the Soviet borders could not be tampered with. They would pay a high price for inculcating this principle into their own people. It was just a natural attitude for the Soviet Union in those days. It characterized their whole approach.

EUGENE KERN & EDWARD GOLDBERGER

Mr. Kern was born in New York and educated at Dartmouth College. After work in the theater and in news broadcasting he joined the Office of War Information during World War II as bureau chief of the motion picture division. In 1945 he joined the State Department as radio commentator – producer and continued with State and USIA, throughout his government career. He served with the Voice of America (VOA) from its earliest days. Mr. Kern was interviewed by Claude “Cliff” Groce in 1986

Mr. Goldberger was born in New York and was educated at the City College of New York. After service in the US Army during WWII he worked in the theater and in broadcasting before joining the Office of War Information. In 1945 he joined the State Department as radio script and drama writer, later becoming Acting Chief of USIA’s International Broadcasting Service. Mr. Goldberger was interviewed by Claude “Cliff” Groce in 1986.

Q: What about Russian?

GOLDBERGER: Russian began in the spring of 1948 under Charlie Thayer and Nikki Nabokov. They recruited the way we must have recruited in the beginning. They went out and grabbed as many people as they could -- people Nabokov knew, people from Novy Mir. The initial reaction of the Embassy to the broadcasts -- in long screeds that would come on the telex -- was: they hated it. They really gave them very bad reviews, worse than Frank Rich in the New York Times. So they decided they had to send somebody up there to try to help them out, and my kind boss Howard Maier volunteered me; I really had no choice. So I went upstairs and sat in the office next to Bob Ross, and down the road a little piece were Thayer and Nabokov. Now understand, I couldn’t read Russian; I couldn’t understand Russian. As far as Thayer and Nabokov went, they really didn’t want to have me there. And I didn’t want to be there! So I did what I could, which was largely to talk with the writers, and to go over scripts with them, as best I could. What they were doing was Russian radio. I showed them how to break it up into voices, how to use different things in their programs, and so forth. This went on for, I guess, about two months, and every time I ran into Muc I would ask him when he was going to spring me from this job.

KERN: Eddie reminds me of something that’s really very important. Up until the days when the Voice started, radio was just one voice reading the news. It was Houseman and Michel and Ernst who started this idea of using more than one voice on the same show. And when the first VOA show went on, the German show, it was a multi-voice show. And from that time on, all news shows had more than one voice -- as many as you could afford. Sometimes we were down to only two voices, but always it was a multi-voice show. It was a new technique.

GOLDBERGER: Anyway, after about a month or so, the reports began to get better from the Embassy, and after two or two and a half months they were good enough so that I could convince Muc to let me go back to work for Howard Maier. After that I kept in touch with some of the people from the Russian Service but I didn't have to handle that any more. Then what happened was that NBC blotted its copybook in 1948 and Congress decided that maybe it was a mistake to let the networks handle this stuff because they didn't know how to do it. And so they sent the languages back to the Voice -- including English. And Gene was put in charge of the English show.

KERN: Let me tell you how that came about. Before they came back to us, I thought we should broadcast in English, and I sold somebody -- I think it was Bob Ross -- on the idea that I would do, myself, a daily 15-minute English show, later expanded to a half-hour. Alone. I had to write it -- I got the news from the newspeople -- and do the transitions and everything else, and find some feature somewhere and put it in, and put on a half-hour show every day. It didn't last very long, and it wasn't very good, I can assure you. Just about that time the operation was returned, and then, because I had done that, I was put in charge of the English show.

GOLDBERGER: And he went looking for people. So once again my kind boss Howard Maier lent me to Gene Kern. He'd already lent me to the Russians, he'd lent me twice to the news desk when they needed somebody to fill in, once because of vacations and once because of a flap. Do you remember that woman who jumped out the window from the Russian consulate? Well, I was on vacation, and that son-of-a-bitch Maier tracked me down to tell me I had to come back, and to start on the night shift on the news desk right away. Fortunately I was working with two very nice people on that overnight, but still this was a loan. And then I was lent to Gene.

General Barmine didn't come aboard until later. I guess it was 1948. He wasn't there at the beginning of the Russian Service. But the Service had some very good people. Nikki Nabokov was a musician but a very bright guy -- Vladimir Nabokov's cousin.

KERN: Was (Eddie) Raquello the producer of the Russian show at that time?

GOLDBERGER: I'm not sure he was the first, but he came in very soon, and if the reports from Moscow got better it was not because of what I did; it was probably because of what Eddie did.

KERN: He came very early into the Voice. He had worked with the Lunts and for Sherwood, and Sherwood got him in.

GOLDBERGER: I've heard that he first came to the United States as Pola Negri's leading man.

MARY ANN STOESEL
Foreign Service Spouse/Code Clerk
Moscow, USSR (1948-1949)

Mary Ann Stoessel was born in Washington, DC in 1921. She was a volunteer with the Red Cross during World War II. She married Foreign Service officer Walter Stoessel in 1946 and accompanied him on his overseas postings to: Moscow, Germany, France, and Poland. Mrs. Stoessel was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

STOESSEL: Well we married in June of '46. He was out of the navy by then, back in the State Department. He was in Soviet affairs. Tommy Thompson was his boss. You probably have heard of him. Anyway, we were to go to Moscow. We were all set to go to Moscow, and it turns out Mary Ann is pregnant. No way was I going to have that baby over there. So in August of '47, he went on ahead to Moscow. I stayed back, stayed in Washington where my parents still lived, and had the baby here. When she was three months old, she and I got on the old Gripsholm which had just been newly recommissioned as a passenger ship. It had been a hospital ship. It took us ten days to get to Sweden. But I am getting ahead of myself.

STOESSEL: Yes. He was there from August until the baby and I joined him in April.

Q: So April, '48. You were in Moscow from when until when?

STOESSEL: It was a horrible time. I was there from April of '48 until about July, something like that, of '49. I hated every minute of it.

Q: Well, let's talk about Moscow in 1948 when you got there.

STOESSEL: It was the Stalin era.

Q: Oh, very much so.

STOESSEL: People really did disappear in the night. Our apartment was totally bugged. Mind you I was an only child, never been outside of the United States, and suddenly thrown into this very oppressive, scary atmosphere.

Q: How did it work with the baby and all that?

STOESSEL: Well in those days because the housing was so critical, in the embassy, well all over the Soviet Union for that matter, but in the embassy that if a wife went over there and took up the space of a clerk, we had to do that clerk or secretary's work. So while I was home in Washington waiting for the baby, I went to secretarial school so I could learn how to type. I never did learn very well, but anyway I did that. So I went to work in the embassy nine to five. We had, everybody had, a Soviet maid. We actually had two because of the baby, a mother-daughter team. So I would go out to the office, and the baby would be taken care of by these two marvelous women. The mother in particular, my baby grew up calling her "Mama." She considered her that, you know. I was somebody who came occasionally. Plus the fact that she heard her own daughter calling her mama. So anyway she called her mama. I will to this day never forget the day we left, and we had, her name was Anna. I will cry if I talk about it; some other time. But anyway, we tried to take her away from Anna, and she kept saying, "Mama, mama." She wanted to go back with Anna. She didn't want to come with me.

Q: How was work in the embassy in those days?

STOESSEL: What do you mean?

Q: What sort of things were you, who were you working for?

STOESSEL: Well I worked in the code room. I hated that. I worked, and I didn't like it so they took me out of there, and they put me in publications. I was just sort of a glorified newspaper carrier going around distributing Magazines and daily papers and things to the offices.

Q: The Berlin blockade started in '48. It must have made things quite tense there.

STOESSEL: Yes, quite scary because we were behind enemy lines really. It was interesting. We didn't think about it an awful lot. Yes, you know when you are young, you can handle most anything.

Q: Well could you get out and around at all?

STOESSEL: Somewhat, not much.

Q: How about just going to the theater or...

STOESSEL: Yes, you could, but tickets were hard to get. My Russian wasn't terribly good. We could only travel 40 kilometers outside of Moscow. There was no traveling, and there was a plane, I am not sure I am getting this right, there was a plane that left for Europe I think it was once a month, something like that. And also when we came in, the Soviets confiscated our passports. So even if we could find a way to get out we had no passport. It was a very unnerving time.

Q: Who was ambassador when you were there?

STOESSEL: Bedel Smith. Then just before we left, Alan Kirk, Admiral Kirk. Incidentally we had dinner with his son last night.

Q: How about with Bedel Smith. How did you find him?

STOESSEL: Well, he was joyous. Everybody knows about Bedel Smith. He was a you know very complex man. I didn't have anything at all to do with him. He had a charming lovely wife. We were pretty junior. One nice thing about Moscow in those days, there was no stratification in the hierarchy there. You go to a party and have secretaries, and ambassadors, it was like being on a little island. We were all there together. It was like being in the same boat. The secretaries in Paris used to write to their friends in Moscow and say, “Moscow sounds wonderful from what you say. Here nobody pays any attention to us. We are totally on our own.” So there was this marvelous esprit, and the friends that we made in those days are friends still today, those that are left.

Q: Did you have any problems with the KGB or all?

STOESSEL: Well sure, they were all over the place. And I said the apartment was bugged. We were followed. The nurse, Anna, and her daughter were KGB.

Q: Were there any provocations or challenges or anything?

STOESSEL: Were we ever accused of anything you mean?

Q: Yes.

STOESSEL: No, I wouldn't be here now if we were. We were very careful, you know, very careful.

Q: What was your husband doing?

STOESSEL: Let me see. Then he was third secretary and consul in the consular section of the embassy. He went from there into the political section. You know for him it was terrible, one woman tried to cut her wrists right in front of him when he told her he couldn't get her out, couldn't give her a visa to leave the Soviet Union and enter the United States.

Q: Oh, boy. Under these circumstances could you meet Russians?

STOESSEL: No. We lived in a country and never had contact with the people. I mean I had contact with Anna and Klava. Those were the two maids in our apartment, and the gardener out at the dacha. This is one godsend for us. The embassy has what is called a dacha which is a summer house outside of Moscow on a little river. On weekends we used to go there, and that kind of saved our sanity.

GEORGE ALLEN MORGAN
Cultural Affairs Officer
Moscow (1948-1949)

Political Officer
Moscow (1949-1950)

Ambassador George Allen Morgan was born in Tennessee in 1905. He received graduate degrees from Emory and Harvard University, where he received a Ph.D. in Philosophy in 1930. His Foreign Service career included positions in Germany, Japan, and the Ivory Coast. Ambassador Morgan was interviewed by Arthur L. Lowrie on December 23, 1989.

Q: Your first post then was in Moscow?

MORGAN: Moscow, where for one year I was head of USIS. My position was Cultural Officer or Cultural Affairs Officer. Then the second year I was moved to the Chancery and became the sort of main Political Officer for Soviet affairs for a year.

Q: Who was the Ambassador then?

MORGAN: The first year it was Bedell Smith. The second year it was Ambassador Alan Kirk.

Q: Did you work fairly closely with both of them?

MORGAN: Well, as Cultural Officer I wasn't, of course, very close to the Ambassador. I was off in another building and doing the sort of affairs that he didn't have much time to get into, but we were on a good friendly basis anyway. In the case of Ambassador Kirk, I was very close because of my new position as the Soviet Specialist in his Chancery and I even lived in Spaso House, the Ambassador's residence with him and Mrs. Kirk, because it was customary to have a Russian language officer live in the residence for cases when they needed a Russian speaker right there. So I got to know the Kirk's extremely well.

Q: What's your view of Ambassador Kirk in the professional sense?

MORGAN: Fine. I liked him very much.

Q: In a professional sense?

MORGAN: Yes. He was a retired Admiral from the Navy. He had been in charge of the D-Day landings, ferrying our troops across to Normandy when we began invading the continent and then he had been Ambassador to Belgium, I think it was, before he came to Moscow.

Q: Within the Embassy, there weren't any great differences of opinion about the approach to the Soviet Union, about the policy of containment and so forth?

MORGAN: Not that I recall.

Q: Anything that I don't ask but that you feel is important to note, please put it in.

MORGAN: Alright.

Q: Anything more about Moscow in those days and Ambassador Kirk?

MORGAN: Well there were lots of details. I don't know that for your purposes what else you would like to hear.

Q: Well, for example, after serving there, seeing Stalin operate firsthand, did you revise any of your views that you'd expressed in this Foreign Affairs article?

MORGAN: No. I actually met Stalin. I went with Ambassador Kirk when he called on Stalin, so I've shaken hands with the biggest murderer in history.

ROBERT O. BLAKE
Consular/Political Officer
Moscow (1950-1952)

Soviet Desk Officer, Bureau of European Affairs
Washington, DC (1954-1957)

Ambassador Robert O. Blake was born in California in 1921. He received a bachelor's degree from Stanford University and a master's degree from the School of Advanced International Studies. He served in the U.S. Navy from 1943-1947 and entered the Foreign Service in 1947. His career included positions in Nicaragua, the Soviet Union, Japan, the Congo, and Mali. Ambassador Blake was interviewed on December 29, 1988 by James D. Mason.

Q: I note that you were later assigned to Russian language studies and that you served in Moscow from, I believe, 1950 to '52. Can you tell me anything about that period?

BLAKE: Sure. Before I went to Managua, I became very interested, as everyone was in those days, in what was happening between the United States and the Soviet Union -- the beginning of the Cold War, and the active effort by Communist Parties throughout the world to do us in. I thought that, perhaps, it would be interesting to work on the problems of Communism in Latin America.

I had gone down to Cuba during my grad-school days and spent some time writing about the Cuban Communist Party and its relation to the Soviet Union. I had got to know a number of people in the embassy down there. I met Fidel Castro who was, at that time, the Student Body President of the Law School of the Havana University. He was a fascinating character. And I decided that Soviet specialization would be a very good way to spend at least a few years of my Foreign Service career. So I put in my application as soon as I got to Managua.

In Managua, I had several interesting assignments down there. The first was as commercial officer. And then our administrative officer had to be carted off to the loony bin and, with no knowledge of the job, I was made administrative officer on the spot. The embassy was in a fascinating position because we had no official relations with the Nicaraguan Government. Somoza was in disfavor in Washington because he had thrown out his uncle who was the nominal president. Washington was unhappy about that.

Then, after awhile, I was made political officer and remained in that job for my remaining time in Managua. I dealt with the opposition elements, many of whom were the lineal descendants of the present Sandinistas. As a whole, the country was very pro-American. But my group tended to be fairly anti-American, even though they weren't, at that time, of very much political importance. They were kept down and didn't have, as far as I could tell, any substantial support in the community. Things were prosperous. Somoza, unlike later, seemed to be relatively benevolent in his hold on the country and things were moving fairly well as far as most people were concerned, including most of the poor.

In Early '49, I heard that I had been chosen for Russian language and area studies and went back in April of 1949 to the State Department to take Russian, again in the same old building on C Street. From April until September we spent eight hours a day on Russian language training. Since then they have reduced the number of hours one spends on language because eight hours was a little bit too heavy. After that summer I moved to Columbia University and the Russian Institute. I continued my Russian language work and also got the equivalent of a Master's Degree in Russian Affairs. After finishing at Columbia, I was ordered to Moscow.

Of course, this was the great adventure of all time. Life was very difficult for the Russian people at that time. They hadn't really recovered from the War. The embassy was very carefully guarded and political relations between ourselves and the Soviets, which were already very bad, were made even worse when the Korean War broke out in June, just a few months after I got there.

My first job in the embassy was as consular officer. I had working with me in the consulate three Russians who, it was quite obvious, were reporting to the Soviet Government -- if, indeed, they weren't members of the KGB. We always assumed they were, in any case. The work of the consulate, as far as normal consular functions were concerned, was almost zero, signing a few passport applications, issuing official visas to Soviet officials traveling to the states..

The real problem was the protection of dual national Americans. Most of them were children born in the United States of people who had come to the Soviet Union at the time of the depression but had become very disillusioned with what was happening there. Many of them had managed to slip out and get back to the United States. I don't remember exactly how many of these people were left, but they were a sad bunch. One after another, the active ones were sent to prison camp in Siberia.

I attended several of the show trials of these people. Literally, there was nothing we could do for them. And it got to the point that we were afraid that even the records that we had, which were about all that these people had to prove they were American citizens, might be destroyed by our locals. So one night we took all the records out and shipped them back to Washington. Essentially, we closed down the operation.

Very soon after that I was transferred to political work. No, first I worked for awhile as a general services officer. We didn't have a very big embassy and everything in the Soviet Union, every job, is very political. The general services required people who spoke Russian as it required people to deal with Soviet authorities. It was very good training for other things that one did later. The general service work was complicated by the difficulty of getting supplies, maintaining cars, and rebuilding buildings in that kind of hostile environment.

Then I went to work in the political section where I spent the rest of my time in Moscow. I worked on the political side of economic development, not much action in that section. One of the highlights of being in Russia was living in Spaso House. I was the inform aide to the ambassador, Admiral Alan Kirk. And being there I was able to participate in all the very fascinating things that happen in Moscow.

Another high point for me was the traveling around the Soviet Union. Despite the difficulties of the times, we did a substantial amount of traveling. I made one very long trip through the Ukraine to the Black Sea at Odessa. And, in fact, I was there and held incommunicado for a day or so when the Korean War broke out. I had no idea what was happening. I just knew that I was being held in our hotel. Then without explanation, I was put on a plane back to Moscow rather than being allowed to continue, as had been planned, to Kiev.

Another high point, of course, was the really interesting people in Moscow's diplomatic colony, not only in our embassy but in other embassies, too -- friendships that I maintained throughout a lifetime -- very, very interesting, well-informed, Russian speaking people from all over the world. Life in Moscow was difficult for the Russians, but for us it was rather pleasant. There was skiing and skating in the winter, visits to dachas in the summer, picnics. All in all, it was at times somewhat hair-raising and somewhat tense, but we had a very, very interesting time.

Q: They say that you were also the officer in charge of the USSR affairs in the Department, I believe, from 1955 to 1957. Do you have any comments on the changes that may have taken place in Russia in between the time you were there and the time you were a desk officer in the Department?

BLAKE: Well, it was actually January 1, 1954, when I came back to the Soviet desk from Japan. I stayed on that job until the fall of 1957, almost four years. I was first the number two on the Russian desk. And then, when Walt Stoessel was transferred, I became the officer in charge.

The big change that had taken place in the meantime, of course, was that Stalin had died. And the period I was there was dominated by the changeover from Malenkov to Khrushchev and Bulganin. Khrushchev was the leading light during that time. We had his first denunciation of Stalin, which was the beginning of some rather remarkable things that Khrushchev did to try to bring new life to the Soviet Union.

I had, in the meantime, been nearly two years in Japan. I had gone there in 1952. I was the political officer working on Soviet affairs and Japanese left-wing politics. I don't know whether you want me to talk about that period or not.

Q: Yes. Go ahead, please. I was trying to tie-in the two Russias.

BLAKE: Right. Maybe you want to go back to finish the Russian part?

Q: Whatever you want to do.

BLAKE: Okay. Well, let's talk about the Russian part for just a minute. The things that stand out most in my mind were the interesting experiences that I had going to some of the big Soviet-Western conferences of the day, the summit conference of 1955, at which Bulganin and Khrushchev met with Eisenhower and with the leaders of France and England. All of us were trying to establish a new, somewhat different relationship than had taken place under Stalin. But, in the end, it was a very Cold War and we could find no real give in the Russian position.

I also was a member of the delegation to the Geneva Conference in 1954 on Indochina and Korea. And that was a fascinating time for observing people like Molotov and Zhou En-lai, the Emperor Bao Dai of Vietnam, a really interesting group of people.

Much of my time on the Soviet desk was spent in trying to move things along for the opening of cultural relations between the Soviet Union and the United States. It was just at the end of the McCarthy period. Senator McCarthy was on the way down. In fact, at one time, I was accused by someone unknown of being a communist and denounced to Senator McCarthy. The reason given was that I was favoring the opening up of cultural relations with the Soviets.

On hearing this, I went right to John Foster Dulles and told him everything I knew. He immediately called up Scott McCleod, the fellow who was more or less working with Senator McCarthy, but was the State Department Security Officer. Dulles told him my story and asked if there was any information other than what was alleged. When McCleod said, "No," Dulles said, "Okay, then, you have to admit that President Eisenhower is a communist because this is his policy and the Soviet desk is carrying out what he wants. And I want to hear no more about it."

In fact, I didn't hear any more. Later when I had an opportunity to review my records in the Department, mention of this charge had been expunged, if, in fact, it had ever been there. That was just a very short byplay, but one sort of indicative of the times.

I spent a certain amount of time with Khrushchev going around the States. He had a rather dramatic tour of the United States. At which point was a trip to Iowa to see Bob Garth and the hybrid corn, which interested Khrushchev very much. He was very interested in US technology, both agricultural and industrial, and spent most of his time looking at that.

Of course, I was involved in all the big events of the moment which concerned the Soviets. Fortunately, despite the tension, but we didn't have any major outbreaks of trouble. It was mostly a period of negotiation. And, of course, much that was happening was happening at a very high level, some of which I didn't even know about. For example, I only had the slightest inkling that something was happening with the U-2 overflights of the USSR. We had a big office with six, seven, or eight officers because we had an enormous amount of work to do in connection with visits back and forth, the first since the war.

Maybe we can go back to Japan for just a minute. When I went there my job was to report on Soviet activity in the Far East and on Japanese communist and socialist activity in the domestic area. It was very interesting. A lot of my information was derivative. It came from Intelligence sources, the Army and the CIA. They were wired in very well, but they didn't have much on what was happening on the Soviet side.

My most important task was to help the Japanese Foreign Ministry set up an adequate Soviet Affairs Section. The Foreign Ministry had just begun to expand with the end of the occupation and they were establishing the normal kind of regional setup in the Ministry, one that they hadn't had before. The man in charge was Niizeki Kinya, who later became Ambassador to the Soviet Union and then Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs. He was an excellent diplomat. He and I spoke mostly in Russian because he hardly spoke any English and my Japanese, while it got better, was never really high quality. We became quite good friends and did a certain amount of traveling around the country together.

I lived in a Japanese house, which was a little bit like camping out in Rock Creek Park in the winter -- paper and glass walls. What heat you had in the winter came from little charcoal braziers, the hibachi, and from the steaming baths that you took early in the morning as soon as you got up. Japan was a very interesting assignment. I did a lot of traveling in the Far East and would have been happy to stay longer. But, of course, I welcomed the Soviet desk assignment. It was a thrill to get back there for that job.

RICHARD TOWNSEND DAVIES
Moscow, USSR (1951-1953)

After graduating from Columbia College in 1942, Ambassador Richard T. Davies served in the U.S. Army in World War II. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1947, Ambassador Davies has held positions in Moscow, Paris, Kabul, Calcutta and Warsaw. He was interviewed by Peter Jessup on November 9 1979.

DAVIES: After a year there we were sent to Moscow, and arrived in Moscow in the fall of 1951.

Q: Who was Ambassador then?

DAVIES: Alan Kirk.

Q: Oh, yes, the Admiral.

DAVIES: Admiral Alan Kirk - Alan G. Kirk - who I guess after that went to Brussels as Ambassador. A very fine naval officer with very close connections to the Chapin family. His wife, Lydia Chapin Kirk, who subsequently wrote a book called Letters from Moscow, is - I believe she is still alive - a Chapin, related to the Chapin family, which has given so many people to the Foreign Service - Selden Chapin, Vinton Chapin. Selden Chapin was Minister in Hungary, and...I can't remember, but there is a younger Chapin in the Service today. It was a family that sort of alternated back and forth between the Navy and the Foreign Service.

Alan Kirk was there until the end of 1951, and then - I can't remember the dates exactly - he left shortly thereafter, and George Kennan we were told was coming, and of course that excited all the younger officers in the Embassy a great deal because George Kennan was very much our idol. He had published his famous Mister X article on the sources of Soviet conduct in the middle of 1947 in Foreign Affairs, and almost immediately thereafter everybody knew who had written it. After his service on the Policy Planning Council in the State Department he had gone up to Princeton. In fact I think he was at Princeton up until shortly before he was appointed. He had been active in initiating or in proposing the initiation of the Free Europe Committee and the Radio Liberation Committee.

But we were terribly excited to hear that he was coming. He was the person on whom most of the younger officers, I think - certainly those in Soviet studies - modeled themselves.

Mac Toon and I in particular were quite interested because in the fall of '51 the Foreign Service Journal had announced an essay contest for the most - I can't remember, I think they said original and imaginative and best essay on new departures in American foreign policy, and the whole idea of this was obviously based upon the concept - George Kennan had written this epoch-making article which was...formulated the doctrine of containment, and the Foreign Service was, I would say, riding high, the American diplomatic service in those years, because here we had emerged suddenly as a world power without much preparation, and the few professionals who had had extensive service before the war and younger men - relatively younger men like Kennan and Bohlen (Charles "Chip" Bohlen) and Tommy (Llewelyn) Thompson...

Q: Let's see, was Acheson Secretary of State or Foster Dulles?

DAVIES: Acheson was by this time Secretary of State. Foster Dulles came...I guess the election was in 1951, was it?

Q: I am not sure.

DAVIES: Oh no, the election must have been in '52, and President Eisenhower was inaugurated in '52, that's right. Acheson was Secretary.

And the Foreign Service Journal announced this essay contest.

Well, Mac Toon and I, we were very ambitious young officers, and we felt, well...

We submitted an article called "After Containment, What?"

Q: An article done by both of you?

DAVIES: Yes, we collaborated on it, and I suppose we fancied ourselves very much...we thought, if Kennan can do it, why can't we? We were younger than he, but (we thought) we could do it too. I have a copy of the article here, which was sent back to me some time after the essay contest was begun. There is a letter here from Mrs. Lois Perry Jones, the managing editor of the Foreign Service Journal, dated December the 16th 1952:

(reads) "I want to thank you for sending us "After Containment, What?" and to apologize for having kept it so long. I am sorry that it neither won the contest nor was accepted for publication. The board reached the latter..."

Well, she says "the later conclusion" but she means "the latter conclusion" reluctantly because of the article's controversial nature," And so forth.

Of course we heard what had happened. We had fancied that we were emulating George Kennan, and that even if he didn't agree with us he'd appreciate the spirit.

Of course it was controversial. We should have... We said containment was not enough. It was understandable, we said, it was quite understandable that we would have this policy now, but it's not enough, it's a defensive policy.

Q: Foreign Affairs would have snapped it up, wouldn't they?

DAVIES: Well, I don't know whether they would have snapped it up, because George Kennan was an adviser to... - or was on the board, I am not sure.

At any rate we agreed, we rather patronizingly I suppose said, "The goal of containment is correct." We agreed with the goal of it. It only remains for us to examine the policy's major premise here, the probability of the internal collapse of Soviet power." Well, we said there was no probability of the internal collapse of Soviet power.

Q: How right you were.

DAVIES: We, "let's look more closely at those facets of the Soviet system which are regarded as seeds of decay" - those were words that Kennan had used.

And in short we thought it was in the right spirit, but it was quite critical of what George Kennan had written.

And then we proposed - of course one can be as critical as one likes, but one should be constructively critical, so we proposed something to go in place of the containment policy. We said we should replace it with a policy "which will lead to the achievement of our aim, the destruction of Stalinism", we said. You know, we were young, relatively young. And critical. I am shocked to see how critical young people used to be.

DAVIES: They still are, yes. (laughs) So then we said, "The strategy to be applied should be the detachment of successive areas of the periphery" - we used long words like that (laughs) because you should if you are writing a serious article - "of the periphery from the Soviet empire." "It should be much easier for the free world to subvert the satellite regimes than it was for Stalin to install them, since the great majority of their subjects are on our side and are potentially our active allies...Upon examination of the Soviet periphery...it becomes immediately apparent that the one area which best fulfills the requirements [for the area we ought to detach first] is the Soviet zone of Germany, the so-called German Democratic Republic [which] has the longest common frontier with the West," and so forth.

"How would the operation be carried through?" (You may well ask.) "The area would be infiltrated by volunteer German agents, acting under central direction, whose task would be to organize tightly knit underground groups." I think we thought that this might be fairly easily done, but I am not so sure now that that was right.

At any rate, "Meanwhile strong pressure would be exerted on the Soviet Army of Occupation...by propaganda and direct action" and so forth, so that may not have been too realistic either.

Then on Liberation Day, "armed bands of German patriots would appear in the streets and move against Soviet installations and an East German Liberation Committee, the cabinet of the underground Parliament would appear."

We based this very much on Polish experience, because both Mac Toon and I had been in Poland and were thoroughly familiar with the history of the underground there. So this East German Liberation Committee - the cabinet of the underground Parliament - which we had postulated would be set up inside East Germany, would appear and appeal for United Nations aid.

"It is probable that such an action, if followed through with lightening speed, could catch the lumbering Soviet machine off guard and achieve its aim before effective countermeasures could be taken.

If, however, such countermeasures should threaten the success of the liberation movement, United Nations troops could knife through the GDR" - it's all rather dramatic - "for example, north and northeast from Hof in Bavaria," where indeed there were American troops in some numbers, "take up positions along the Oder River, and seal the territory off from interference from the East, while other troops move against Soviet installations in support of the German insurrectionaries... The detachment of Eastern Germany would give us a common border with Poland. The Poles need little more than a concrete hope of liberation to undertake a whole series of insurrectionary actions," which I think was quite true at the time.

A "properly conceived and implemented policy of detachment in Eastern Europe could work with the speed of a chain reaction." Everything depended on speed, as you can see - you had to take them off guard.

"Some may question the wisdom of such a policy on the ground that it might precipitate all-out war. Admittedly, there is such a risk" - we were prepared to look facts in the face. "However, there is no evidence, apart from our acceptance at face value of Stalin's threats, that he would initiate World War Three."

"In any event we are already committed to the rearmament of Western Germany, which the Soviet dictator has said he 'will not tolerate.' If this threat is more than calculated bluff, our days of grace are already numbered."

There is a certain amount of casuistry involved in the argument, I must say, now that I look back on it and rehearse it here. It may not have been the most judicious proposal or essay that the Foreign Service Journal received.

"The policy of detachment does not, in our view, accentuate this risk. Rather, it makes our job easier. In the event of Soviet armed action, it offers the assurance of the active support of the peoples of Eastern Europe..."

"Our propaganda efforts up to now have been largely futile, words without deeds. With the adoption of a policy of detachment, propaganda becomes political warfare. We can then offer a positive prospect of freedom to the inmates of Stalin's multinational prison."

Well, as I say we sent that in - it must have been in the fall of 1951, before George Kennan left Washington. George Kennan at the time was in Washington in the Office of Eastern European Affairs, being briefed and reading up in preparation for his coming to Moscow to take up his mission. And Mrs. Lois Perry Jones, the managing editor - it turned out, we heard later - had sent this article over to him for his comments, which struck me as rather an odd way to...

But of course it was inflammatory, certainly, and it should not have been...I quite agree, looking back on it now. I would not...

If I had been George Kennan I would not have recommended that it be published.

In any case apparently George Kennan took considerable umbrage at the presumption of these young pipsqueaks, of these young officers, and was heard to say - we were told later - that these fellows, they don't belong in the Foreign Service.

Q: Really?

DAVIES: Yes. We heard that later, we didn't know that at the time.

So he came to Moscow. It would have been, as I remember now, maybe in late winter, or early spring of '52, and as I say we were prepared to worship at his feet, but of course we got no opportunity to do that.

When he arrived I remember he held a staff meeting, which was very impressive, and he said that when he had been Deputy Chief of Mission to Averell Harriman he had been very unhappy because Averell Harriman had set up a kind of office in Spaso House and spent all his time there, and rarely if ever did he come to the Chancery, and when George Kennan had written things that he thought should go out, then he had to go to Spaso House and show them to Averell Harriman. He showed quite a bit of...

Obviously he had been very displeased with this arrangement.

Averell Harriman's daughter - I am trying to think of her name, I did know it - acted as his secretary and hostess, as a sort of barrier between (him and) George Kennan, I guess, and he said, "Well, we are not going to do that. I mean I want you to know that my door is open," this kind of thing.

But in fact he spent just as much time...

Well, no, that's not fair, because Averell Harriman did have his office in Spaso. They were very short of office space in those days, and it was necessary.

But in fact he spent a lot of time at Spaso, too, and we didn't get the opportunity of sort of learning from the master that we had anticipated.

Q: To get back to the article for a minute - After Containment, What? - that's never seen the light of day?

DAVIES: Well, no, no.

Q: Would you care to include it in the memoir, just as an attachment? Why not?

DAVIES: I think I would. Why not have it xeroxed? Yes. It has a number in sort of oil pencil, "5", so apparently it was read by members of the jury, but I think after George Kennan put his...not his nihil obstat, but the opposite - something obstat. (laughs)

Q: Along with the memoir that would be a useful addendum.

DAVIES: Yes, it would, and it would make clearer what I am (trying to say).

But it was very brash, and certainly injudicious.

Q: But the way you have put it in context, I think it would be very useful, if that's agreeable to you.

DAVIES: Yes. Well, I'd be delighted. I can make a xerox of this, and I will, and bring it along and give it to you.

Now Peer de Silva...

Q: He died recently.

DAVIES: He died recently, a career CIA officer, operations officer who wrote I think, really, a very good book - undoubtedly parts of it were regarded as quite indiscreet two years ago when he first wrote it, Sub Rosa: The CIA and the Uses of Intelligence - New York Times Books, New York, 1978 - (in which) Peer de Silva discusses the question of the establishment of a CIA station in Moscow. There was a proposal, he writes, to do that, and he went and spoke - he was working in Washington then, I guess - with Charles Bohlen, who at the time was working in the State Department. He says here "Assistant Secretary of State for East European Affairs." I am not sure that's accurate, and I notice a number of inaccuracies in the book. Our Ambassador in Moscow, he writes, was George Kennan, who had arrived in the spring of 1953. That's not right - he had arrived in the spring of 1952. He got the wrong year.

And he was authorized to begin discussions with the State Department at an appropriate level on this matter. He talked with Chip Bohlen. He was reluctant - Chip Bohlen was - and eventually came down against the proposal. He did agree that Peer de Silva could go to London to see Kennan late in June, when the Ambassador would be there briefly on personal business.

The implication was that if Ambassador Kennan concurred we might go ahead, otherwise the matter was closed.

Well, Peer de Silva went to London and saw Ambassador Kennan, who turned down the proposal. But the interesting thing, and the thing I am coming to here, is that he writes, "However, during the conversation I had noticed that the Ambassador was very tense and nervous: he was pale, his hands trembled, and he seemed to have much on his mind. At the end of our talk he said there was something he wanted to ask of the agency" - that is, of the CIA. "There is something you must do for me," he said to Peer de Silva - "I have here a letter." And he then handed me a letter, and I noticed that it was addressed to Pope Pius." "I have a very pessimistic view of our immediate future with the Soviets, particularly at the diplomatic level. I want you to get this letter to Allen Dulles, and make sure that it is passed by secure means to the Pope in Rome."

My questioning look brought the following explanation: "I fear that there is a good possibility that I will wind up some day before long on the Soviet radio. I may be forced to make statements that will be damaging to American policy. This letter will show the world that I am under duress, and I am not making statements out of my own free will."

Q: Who wrote this letter?

DAVIES: Kennan.

Q: I see.

DAVIES: "The letter to the Pope will let him make public my position and the true situation there."

That is Peer de Silva.

"I was astounded at the grimness with which these words were delivered," de Silva writes, "but I was in no way prepared for the following."

Again Kennan speaking:

"I understand that the CIA has some form of pill that a person could use to kill himself instantly. Is this right?"

Q: Meaning, not morally, is it correct that there is such a pill?

DAVIES: That there is such a pill. And so the upshot is that Kennan asked Peer de Silva, according to the latter's memoir, for these pills, and Peer de Silva says that through the diplomatic pouch two pills were sent to Ambassador Kennan. Well, I am not sure it says "two pills" but at any rate, some pills were sent to him.

"Shortly thereafter he went from Moscow to Germany on an official visit, where he made a speech with strong critical reference to the USSR. This speech resulted in his being declared persona non grata on the spot. He never returned to Moscow from Berlin.

"Ambassador Kennan finally came back to Washington from Europe. I made an appointment to see him, and asked what had happened to the pills. He told me with a curious smile, "I have already flushed them down the toilet."

"At the time and in the years since I have always thought that the actions of Ambassador Kennan were the actions of a very brave man.

"During the early 1950s, the CIA was aware that the Soviets were experimenting with drugs and tended to destroy a person's natural inhibitions and controls.

"In the Cold War atmosphere of the times Kennan saw himself as a likely target for a Soviet effort along this line. Nevertheless he went back to that environment of danger and was prepared to take his own life rather than let himself be used by the Soviets in a manner degrading or shameful to the United States."

Well, I was intrigued by this because of my own experiences with Ambassador Kennan in Moscow. He came there - I don't know whether you remember, but before he came he gave - I judge that he gave - two interviews, one to Richard Rovere, which was published in The New Yorker, and one to Marquis Childs, which was published...Marquis Childs was working for the St. Louis Post Dispatch, and it was syndicated.

Well, it didn't quote him, but it said, "People close to Kennan, sources close to Kennan," - but it seemed obvious that it was he speaking behind that journalistic convention, and in these interviews, if my suspicion is correct, he said that it was terribly important, that admittedly no individual probably could influence the course of events that much, but nevertheless since Stalin would leave the scene one day, if it should happen that he died or left the Soviet political stage, while Kennan was there this would be very fortuitous because of course Kennan knew the Soviet Union so well and knew the Soviet people so well, and he would be in a position to interpret to the United States the confused situation that ensued upon Stalin's death.

I think that was the clear (implication).

I don't know whether...

I think he may even have said that.

And this might be crucial, because you know, at a critical moment like that to have somebody so knowledgeable as he there might indeed prove to be the case of the right man in the right place at the right time.

And then he came to Moscow, and of course he found a Moscow which was very different from the Moscow he obviously remembered and had anticipated, I suppose, returning to, much less tolerant of foreigners than even during the '30s, and of course during the war things were relatively free and easy there.

George Kennan plays the guitar, and so far as I know very well. He is a folk singer, and apparently during the 30s when he was there first - he was a young man in the first place - there used to be very pleasant evenings, and it was possible to know and see a certain number of Soviet citizens, of Russians who obviously were if not under the control of the Secret Police at any rate had some kind of permission to mingle with foreigners.

Q: People like Ilya Ehrenburg?

DAVIES: Well, I don't know. Yes, I suppose some of the cultural figures, but there was a kind of... I always called it the demi-monde, which grows up in a place like that - people who are licensed to have contact with foreigners: some of them are rather shady characters, and some of them are pitiable characters, but one assumes that all of them cooperate, collaborate with the police. In any case it can still be rather pleasant, if the ballerinas from the Bolshoi, you know, if...

But when he got back there in 1952, the situation was very different. There were no contacts at all of any kind. It was the period that can reasonably be called the Deep Freeze, and he came back into that situation, with his very charming and strong wife, a Norwegian girl by birth - a very fine woman - and he found no contacts at all. Now here is a man who speaks beautiful Russian, who knows Russian literature and appreciates Russian literature and so forth, and who was completely cut off from Soviet society.

Well, one thing he did in order to try to overcome this was to go once a week to the theater, and part of the time he was there - he was there less than a year, around nine months I suppose - Mrs. Kennan was in Norway with her parents, taking care of the older children, having put them in school somewhere, so he was alone a fair amount of time in Moscow, and he would go once a week to the theater, and he would go with a language officer, and if the language officer was married with the language officer's wife. He'd send his car for them and would have them picked up, and then the car would go to Spaso House to pick him up, and they'd go to the theater, and then come back to Spaso House after the play and have a little midnight supper in his study underneath the famous carved eagle with the microphone in it. We didn't know that there was a microphone in it at that point.

Q: How many months or years had that microphone been there?

DAVIES: Not too long; it had been up in the attic, and I think when he got there he went through it and found it. It is a very impressive carved seal of the United States. But I don't even know whether the microphone was in it up in the attic. I don't think so. I think it was (put in it) after it was hung down there, because as I say he was alone in the house, and out of the house a fair amount. I think there would have been ample opportunity for somebody to stick the thing in it.

In any case I remember my wife and I went with him, and we went to see The Inspector General of Nikolai Gogol. I didn't want to go to that because I had seen it at the Moscow Art Theater, but obviously that was what he wanted to go to see, so we went to see it. (laughs)

The thing that got me a little bit was that we had to pay for our own tickets, and I mean I had seen the thing once. If I'd had my druthers I'd have gone elsewhere. However, one didn't question those things, one just went with the Ambassador.

And so we went to the theater, and of course he had these four goons following - these four Secret Policemen - and we went in and they had free seats there and they sat down. There were four people sitting in the row right behind, and these people, these characters came up, and they really didn't have to say anything, they just looked at the people and they said, "You, out, we will sit there." Which they did - the four of them sat behind us.

Q: Were they rough types or sophisticated types?

DAVIES: No, they were muscle men, and it made him feel very... Well, I was used to this. I had been in Poland.

And the anti-American propaganda of course got to him very much. He took it very personally. He walked to work every morning from Spaso to the Embassy, which was on Mokhovaya Street, right next to the National Hotel, across from the Kremlin.

Q: Would you say that this was a calculated policy to isolate him and render him ineffective and drive him out?

DAVIES: No, no, it had nothing to do with him at all. It was a policy that was applied to everybody, to all foreigners, including even Eastern Europeans.

Q: And it was so solidified and concentrated, but he wasn't prepared for it is what you are saying?

DAVIES: He had no idea that this was going on. He had been at Princeton. Of course we had been reporting all this. The thing that surprised me was that he wasn't aware of it. He obviously hadn't been reading. I can only imagine that he hadn't been reading the Soviet press, because you know the anti-American propaganda was all through the press: you couldn't pick up any publication, any newspaper, without reading some horrible story about the alleged atrocities committed by American troops in Korea. Some of them were absolutely... You know, they were modeled on the kind of things that the Nazis had done. The effort was to make us look...to equate us with the Nazis, and they had absolutely horrible stories in there, which you know...

I remember one story about American soldiers who were said to have captured a Korean girl, and with their bayonets had cut off her breasts and had mutilated her. You know, the most...absolutely the most...

Well, as he went to the office he would pass these hoardings of billboards with frightful cartoons against the United States on. Of course we all saw them, but we all sort of understood that this was the game that was being played, and what did one do about it? You could protest about it, and we did protest about some of these things, but it was no good.

At any rate this night at the Moscow Art Theater I remember after the first act of the play we went out to the lobby - in Russian theaters they have this famous what they call "gulyanye," the walking around during the intermission, everybody walks, sort of in a clockwise fashion. We didn't walk, we went over in a corner, and in sort of each of the other corners were two of these goons who were keeping their eyes on the Ambassador, and he was very, very depressed, and finally he sort of looked up and he said, "It's just as though there is a great hand pressing down on all of us." I tried to sort of make some joke, but that was no joking matter to him.

Well, then we went back and saw the rest of the play, and then went back to Spaso for a midnight supper. But it was a very morbid kind of evening.

Q: How old a man was he then?

DAVIES: I am guessing, but I would say he must have been in his latter 40s. That was '51, so he would have been in his late 40s, I would think, perhaps not yet 50. (*) George Kennan was born in 1904, which would make him 47 yrs of age in 1951. [transcriber's note])

He spent a fair amount of time in bed in Spaso, and we had to go over there with the messages that were going out to be cleared, and he'd go over them. He'd be in bed, and it wasn't clear to me what this was. I don't know... I suppose it was physical, I don't know.

Q: A Churchillian use of the bed?

DAVIES: No, not at all, no, he was...the whole thing was very depressing. I wouldn't say that he has a sense of humor. He is dour. I am half Welsh. He is a black Gael - the family I suppose is Scottish way back where. But that kind of brooding - what people call black Irish, you know - (was what he had), although I never saw any signs of the kind of extremes of temper that one can get with certain Irishmen.

Well, in any case, to more or less finish this up, I've often been asked how could he, a professional diplomat - at that time he was regarded as the pinnacle of our service - how could he have done what he did in Berlin, and said what he said, which resulted in his being declared persona non grata, comparing the Soviet Union, life in Moscow, with life in a Nazi internment camp in Germany during the war. And my answer is, well, he found himself in what for him was psychologically an intolerable situation. This is my interpretation, for what it's worth. I recognize the pitfalls of amateur psychologizing. Nevertheless we all indulge in it, and I think what had happened was that he had given these interviews, he had this picture of himself, this self-image, which to a very considerable extent was quite accurate, as the - if not the greatest at least one of the three or four, two or three, maybe two - he and Chip Bohlen, let's say - most highly qualified Soviet experts we had in every sphere, language, knowing the history, having served there before, knowledge of what happened during the war, the whole thing, and on the basis of that he had said to people - not only to Rovere and to Marc Childs, but presumably to others - "I'll be the right man in the right spot at the right time," or "I could be, at any rate."

And then when he got there he found on the contrary this... He was never received by Stalin - a point that he makes a great deal of in his memoirs. In his memoirs he tells about the effort he made to break out of that isolation, having the Deputy Chief of Mission, Hugh Cummings, mention to somebody in the Foreign Office his - Kennan's - desire to have somebody with whom he could speak Russian, to have some contact with somebody. And then a few weeks later this young man coming into the Embassy, obviously in the effort to stage a provocation, saying that he represented an oppositionist group and all they needed was help from the United States, in arms and money, and they would assassinate Stalin, or words to that effect, which was obviously... I think this is his interpretation in the memoirs, or if it's not at any rate the implication is clear that this was the answer to his effort to break out of the isolation, that this was the answer to Hugh Cumming's approach to the Foreign Office.

DAVIES: A provocation was the answer to it.

Q: Did this black Gaelic mood permeate the whole Embassy? It must have had some effect.

DAVIES: Well, it did. It did have a bad effect, I'd say. The morale was not (high). I should say that morale was not bad before he came. Of course we all felt that we were under attack, and under the circumstances there was a certain esprit de corps and a pulling together, and a recognition that everybody was in the same boat and we had to try to help each other. But morale...

I think he had the idea, he projected his depression, his gloom, his discouragement on the rest of us. He thought we were in bad shape. I didn't feel that way at any rate. Of course a lot of us were young and...

And he decided that we must organize ourselves in order to combat this. Consequently he started a number of activities, some of them really quite good. I don't know that ballet classes were possible then, but perhaps they were. But there were a number of kind of hobby groups: painting, you could join a group and sing Russian folk songs - I think he belonged and helped along there, he was really excellent at that, at playing the guitar and singing, perhaps another side of his Celtic heritage, I don't know. One can't possibly...these things are stereotypes.

In any case he set up a study group, which for my sins - which are many, beginning with this article - I was made responsible for. The idea was that at Spaso we were going to meet once a month - on sort of like the last Thursday or something like that - and there would be a lecture.

Oh, no, we didn't really get started until after he'd left there. He was declared persona non grata, as I remember, in December, and Jack McSweeney who was the political counselor, had been pressing me to get on with it and set up a program, and it was with the greatest reluctance that I participated in this, because it involved dragooning people, you know, to make command performances and write lectures, and appear and give speeches, and who had time for it, so to speak? We all were fairly busy with what we considered was our duty.

But no, the Ambassador wanted this, so when he didn't come back Jack McSweeney I think actually was charge then, as I remember - it was the beginning of the Christmas season - and I said to Jack, after the initial shock had passed, I said, "Well, there's one thing, there's one sort of silver lining here. We don't have to go forward with this lecture group." And Jack said, "No, no, no, we are going to go forward with it anyway."

I said, "Why?" I said, "I mean, everybody is grumbling about it."

And he said, "Well, you've got a schedule lined up," which I had by that time, I'd gotten people, and I'd submitted a schedule for six months.

He said, "No, we are going to do it anyway."

Then Jake (Jacob) Beam came as charge. He was in Belgrade, and he came up there as charge. The Beams moved in.

By the time he got there we'd had two lectures as I remember. I gave one of them, and I can't remember who else gave one. Was it Henry Shapiro, the UPI correspondent? I don't remember now.

In any case Jake Beam arrived to find that the house in which he was going to live as charge, Spaso House, was invaded once a month by this motley crew of American and other diplomats and correspondents who would come in and expect to be given some drinks or something like that, and then sit solemnly there and listen to each other lecture. And Jake Beam said, "We'll have one more meeting, at which I will talk on the situation in Yugoslavia, and that will be the end." And that's the way it worked. (laughter) He talked to them, and that was that. After that no more meetings.

But that was already in the middle of 1953 by that time.

In any case, George Kennan - just to finish that part of the story - was going out in December, and as I said I'd been asked how could he have done this.

Well, he sent a telegram before he left, saying he knew very well when he got to Berlin - to the airport of Berlin, Tempelhof - that the correspondents would all be there and would be asking him what his impressions were, and since, he said, he could not reply honestly to them without saying things that would be incompatible with the continuation of his mission in Moscow, he intended simply to say NO COMMENT.

He sent this telegram, almost as though he were trying to ensure it putting it down on paper.

But indeed when he got to Berlin and they asked him, implicitly he made this comparison and was declared persona non grata.

So my answer when people have posed the question to me has been, well, the man was in an impossible situation: he had, both in terms of his own self-image and of the image he felt he had in the eyes of others, somehow failed, which of course he hadn't - he had not failed. What could one have done? No one else could have done (more). But he felt that he should have been able to do more, or he felt perhaps that he'd promised somehow that he would do more, and he'd been unable to do more, and consequently I felt - and I felt for years, long before Peer de Silva's book ever appeared, and I knew about the pills - that finally...how could he get out of that situation? He couldn't go back to President Truman and say, "I have to resign." That would have been a kind of admission of failure. So how to get out of this? And perhaps that was the way. That was the way he got out of it.

So all this kind of boils down to taking some issue with Peer de Silva's interpretation. I don't really think he feared that - that somehow they were going to slip him a Mickey or a truth serum or the opposite rather. I think his fear was not that, but was less specific, and this was the way he got out of it.

Q: I think maybe that was less of an accurate interpretation of Kennan than the indoctrination and lifelong feeling that Peer de Silva had about the enemy?

DAVIES: Yes.

Q: If you know what I mean.

DAVIES: Yes, yes. Well, that's his interpretation. My interpretation would be rather a different one.

A feeling of great insecurity. He was under attack psychologically certainly, as all of us were, but he much more than the rest of us as the head of the mission, as a man who after all was the author of the best articulation of the doctrine which in fact we were following.

Q: Doesn't that draw a parallel between this career man who couldn't fulfill his promise and the average politician who never fulfills his promise and never thinks about it?

DAVIES: Well, yes, yes, there is something kind of interesting there. He was so conscientious, and of course there's another thing that I think, and it's not being really able to... - what should I say? - to laugh at himself, taking himself so seriously. We are all poor sinners on our way to the grave, and we are going to stumble occasionally, we are not divine beings, and that's why we have to have religion, or we used to at any rate. (laughs while speaking) I don't know what we do now.

Q: What did Lenin say? We are dead men on furlough?

DAVIES: Dead men on furlough, yes. Somebody said that, yes.

Well, I suppose there is one postscript.

As long as I was in Moscow, after he got there at any rate, I got very bad efficiency reports.

Q: Really?

DAVIES: ...saying that, well, the young fellow has certain elements of promise, but he's shown that he is incapable of conforming to and subordinating himself to American foreign policy. And the same happened with Mac Toon.

Actually Mac Toon was transferred out of there before his tour would have ended, because it was felt that they'd better break up the dirty duo, the troublesome twosome or whatever it was, (laughs) before they wrote something again.

He was sent to Rome, but he got a bad report, too.

Q: Really?

DAVIES: But some years later Mac Toon told me that he'd seen Kennan on some occasion, (I can't remember - it sticks in my mind that it was in Berlin, Mac was assigned to Berlin at one point, but whether Kennan came there I don't know) and had said to him, "Well, you know, the reports that we got..."

Of course he didn't write the reports. They were written by our supervisors. We were down on the totem pole.

But I don't say he dictated or said that the report should be along those lines. But I got two of them like that, and later when I was being considered for assignment to Afghanistan the people in NEA - the Bureau of Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs - who had my file said, "My gosh, this guy, it says here, he can't follow...he doesn't accept American foreign policy. What does that mean? I mean he really sounds like someone who is really insubordinate - that's hardly an adequate word for it."

Ray Thurston fortunately was then the director of the office - or the deputy director, I can't remember which - of the Office of Eastern European Affairs, and he had been in Moscow on an inspection trip during Kennan's ambassadorship, and he wrote a memo very kindly saying, well, there were disagreements in the Embassy, and this was not the only one on containment, because of course Kennan wrote his famous telegram, large chunks of which were published by I think

Joe Alsop in his column, saying that NATO was all a big mistake, that this had been a very bad idea because it had made the Soviets bellicose somehow.

And I kept trying to point out from my worm's-eye position there that contrary to his interpretation we were not...what we were doing was not provoking them - provoking the Soviets, provoking Stalin - to be bellicose. It was scaring him. And the last thing he wanted after the fright he had had during the Second World War was any kind of a military threat from us.

Well, Kennan saw the thing very much in the opposite direction: he thought that the Soviets were beginning to build up, whipping up their population and so forth, to the point where they would go to war against the West.

I had thought that earlier, when I was in Warsaw, but I had gotten over that when I got to the Soviet Union and saw that this was very largely a defense mechanism - all this anti-American propaganda was an effort to inoculate the Soviet people against their natural feelings of, well, I would say even friendliness, resulting largely from the fact that during the war so many Soviet people and soldiers had been kept alive on American C rations, and had admired so greatly our supplies of Studebakers and jeeps which were highly prized, and boots. So many Soviet people would tell you, if you ever got a chance to speak with them, "Oh, your shoes, your boots, they are so wonderful." They were Army boots. "So wonderful, I wore mine for 15 years." You know it wasn't 15 years, but they said they were wonderful boots. And your C rations, and your SPAM. Oh, SPAM! They loved SPAM. It was great, it was a great delicacy. If you had a can of SPAM, one of the greatest delicacies you could give to a Soviet was a can of SPAM of all things. We thought, well, this was second best or third best.

So there was this great feeling of comradeship in arms and fellowship, which came out when the circumstances were right, when they felt they weren't observed. That was their real feeling, in my opinion. And Stalin and the leadership were trying to inoculate them against it, they were trying to drive that out of them by this propaganda.

But George Kennan accepted it somehow at face value, and I just think that was much too simple a way to regard it, particularly in the case of men whose political perceptions tended to be much more sophisticated than that.

Q: Now did Kennan then go on to any other ambassadorship?

DAVIES: No. You remember what happened was, he came back. In the meanwhile the election had taken place, and Eisenhower had been elected. And he came back, and according to the Foreign Service Act of 1946, a man who had held the position of Ambassador - and there were certain other qualifications - who was not appointed to another position for six months, was automatically retired, and he was the only one - Dulles by that time was Secretary, and he utilized that provision of the Act against him, and again he writes about this in his memoirs, and he is very bitter about it.

Q: Then he went to Princeton.

DAVIES: Then he went back to Princeton, where he'd been before, and I think really he was a brilliant reporting officer. Some of the things he wrote - copies of them were available in the Embassy when I was there - were just brilliant, beautifully written, great insights, but not an ambassador somehow.

And again some of these traits came out when he was Ambassador to Yugoslavia. I was not connected with him then, but needless to say I followed with great fascination what he said, what happened to him and what he did.

Oh, and one other thing. I was in Belgrade in - it would have been I suppose 1964 or '65, after he had been Ambassador to Yugoslavia, and he came on a visit when I was there. Adolph Dubs, who was killed in Afghanistan, was charge d'affaires when I visited there, and I was staying with the Dubses, and Ambassador Kennan came on a visit. He came to a dinner party at "Spike" Dubs's apartment. It was a stag party of just men, and some of the Yugoslav officials with whom he had dealt when he was there attended, and it was a very pleasant evening. Finally all the Yugoslavs left and only Ambassador Kennan, Spike Dubs and I were left. He left then - there was an Embassy car to take him back to his hotel. Spike's living room was about twice as wide as this, and it had no rugs. It had a parquet floor with some scatter rugs, but no wall-to-wall carpeting. And as he walked over this parquet, his footsteps resounding, he walked more and more slowly, until he got to the front door. He turned around and said, just sort of, you know, to nobody in particular, "It's so hard for me to think that I will never be part of this again."

It was sort of poignant.

By then he had given up I guess the idea of coming back into the (Foreign Service).

***

Q: Good evening. This is the second interview with Ambassador Richard Townsend Davies by Peter Jessup from Columbia, and it is nice to have you here this December evening.

I think you remember more clearly where we left off than I do, so I turn it over to you.

DAVIES: (laughs) Well, we did leave off I believe with Ambassador (George Frost) Kennan's statement in Berlin, which resulted in his being declared persona non grata.

I was reading this week a clipping containing an interview by the former Director of Central Intelligence, Richard Helms, with a correspondent of the London Daily Observer, I believe it was, in which former Director Helms was presenting a justification of the MKULTRA program, the agency's involvement in experimentation with drugs, in particular LSD, and he said, among other things, that one reason it had seemed imperative to begin a program to determine what the effects of LSD were was the statement made by Ambassador Kennan.

Q: Which statement was that?

DAVIES: A statement made at the airport in Berlin, when the Ambassador said that he could only compare his - whatever it was - six or eight months in the Soviet Union with the period he had spent in the Nazi internment camp during the Second World War. And Director Helms half said and half implied that this was such an unpredictable or unexpected or astounding result of occurrence that really it could only be explained...or one attempt to explain it involved the hypothesis that the Ambassador had been served something with LSD or some truth drug, with something like that in it, and consequently when he reached Berlin he was unable to do anything but blurt out - that's the implication - what was really in his mind, and was no longer in a position to dissimulate or...

Q: Had you ever heard that?

DAVIES: Well, obviously there is some kind of tie, and I am wondering in fact whether Dick Helms isn't putting some things together, such for example as the material in Peer de Silva's book, because I had never heard this before.

Q: Neither had I.

DAVIES: And our understanding - that is, the understanding of those people who were then in Moscow and who had had a close association, as close as the Ambassador would permit, with him - was that which I tried to outline last time, and which I would summarize by saying that having given the interviews that he did to journalists before he left to take up his post - in which he said that of course no one man could make that much difference, but if any American ambassador could affect future events when Stalin left the scene, then perhaps it would be he with his knowledge of the Soviet Union - I think built up these expectations for his mission, and they were very thoroughly dashed. In the first place, Stalin didn't die soon enough to enable him to play the role that he had forecast in these background interviews he had given, and finding himself in that position, finding himself under enormous psychological pressure, surrounded by suspicion and provocations and the kind of treatment which he being I would say a pretty sensitive person was particularly impressed by - and depressed by - finally there was no other way out for him, although he knew he shouldn't say what he did, than to say something which would result in...

Now that's my hypothesis, that's by belief, and I think it is borne out by a close reading of the Ambassador's memoirs, or reading between the lines, or a Kremlinological analysis of his own memoirs.

I am concerned of course - and I don't think I would be writing this, I wouldn't want to write this, and I intend to be quite careful in controlling what happens to this so long as the Ambassador is alive...

Q: That's understood.

DAVIES: It's not that I feel that there is an obligation after all these years not to talk about these things because they've been talked about and written about first of all by the Ambassador himself time after time in one fashion or the other, and it's also not that I feel that there is an obligation of loyalty, but there is a certain level of discretion that I think should be observed.

I again don't want to seem to be criticizing my superiors. Ambassador Kennan was and is probably one of the two or three leading American historians of the Soviet Union, of Russia. He has just written now a book on Franco-Russian relations and the Franco-Russian Alliance beginning at the end of the 19th century, which I haven't read but which got excellent reviews. He is an outstanding historian, but to those of us who were in Moscow, who as I said were waiting so to speak to worship at his feet and to learn from him, it was needless to say a terrible shock to find that our idol had feet of clay and I think that somehow the historical record somewhere should have room for that kind of perception.

Q: I agree. I think you have stated it now in summation and went into it in considerable detail in the earlier interview.

DAVIES: The other thing I wanted to say about that period also refers of course to Ambassador Kennan and to the containment thesis which he enunciated, to my way of thinking very correctly and cogently and convincingly in the X article.

Actually I think he was articulating what our policy had already become or was already becoming, but he did it in a fashion which made the basis of that policy clear to people who are interested or were interested in foreign affairs in this country.

After that however he began to have second thoughts, because he felt that the policy had been taken to imply that we should construct a kind of "cordon sanitaire" around the Soviet Union, including, if not consisting primarily of, the military bases. I mean he felt that that was a distortion, and he said later that that was a distortion of his hypothesis or of his thesis.

It's quite clear - and again a great deal has been written on this, there was a whole issue I guess of the magazine Foreign Policy, published by the Carnegie Institution, devoted to the subject, edited by Charles Gati some time ago, and it was called "Containment Revisited" or something like that - the clear implication of the thesis, of the article, and I believe also of what the Ambassador was saying at the time in policy recommendations, was that there was an important military dimension to the thesis, but then I think later he did become concerned and disturbed that that military aspect of the resulting policy was not matched somehow with a comparable balancing or perhaps even overbalancing political dimension. Just what that political dimension might have been and how it might have been developed is a whole other, a whole different subject.

When he was in Moscow he sent several telegrams expressing his concern, one in particular that was I believe published by Joe (Joseph) Alsop almost intact in his column, which objected to the establishment of the NATO Alliance, which of course had already been established a couple of years earlier, I guess. No, actually it was less than that. But he said in the message that he felt this was a mistake. Characteristically he did not circulate the draft of the message before he sent it. He sent it and then he asked us to comment on it - he asked the people in the Embassy to comment on it - which did seem a little futile, but...

Q: Now since this is an age of leakage, and Washington has always been the center of leakage, would that reprinting of a State cable almost verbatim by Joe Alsop have been because someone handed it to him? It wasn't Kennan's doing, was it?

DAVIES: I have no way of knowing. I can't believe it was Kennan's doing. I don't know how it happened, but Joe Alsop did have excellent sources. But I just don't know how it happened. It clearly was leaked to or shown to Joe Alsop, and he had enough of an opportunity to study it and perhaps to take notes on it, so that he reproduced whole sections of it, or paraphrased them only very transparently. But this was clearly - and he described it as such, I believe - a message that had come from Ambassador Kennan.

Walter Lippmann criticized the containment thesis, both in terms of principle, so to speak, and in pragmatic terms, saying what is diplomacy for if it's not precisely to find solutions to some of these problems?

Kennan's thesis on the other hand was that you could not do business with Stalin. I think in retrospect we could find evidence to show that we could have done business with Stalin if we had understood how to do business with Stalin, which we did not understand. (laughs)

Kennan I think understood it, I think (Ambassador) Chip Bohlen understood it, but they came out of a tradition in the American Foreign Service which had been primarily that of reporting, observing, not making policy recommendations. That's evident in many ways, for example in Lynn Etheridge Davis's book - I forget the exact title of it - Davis, Lynn E., The Cold War Begins: Soviet-American Conflict Over Eastern Europe, Princeton U. Press, 1974.) on the origin of the cold war, a very fine book, I think. She interviewed a lot of the Foreign Service officers who were in the State Department involved in our relations with the Soviet Union during the War, who subsequently were very critical of our policy as being too friendly towards Stalin. But when she asked some of these officers - and some of those in fact who later were known at least in the Service as real hardliners, one of whom now is very active in the anti-SALT struggle - when she asked them, "Why didn't you stand up at that time and point these things out?" this officer in particular said, "Well, the policy was what The Boss wanted. He wanted it that way, so we tried to carry it out."

Q: By "The Boss" meaning the Secretary of State?

DAVIES: Meaning President Roosevelt.

Q: Oh!

DAVIES: And of course it's difficult to find fault with that. It is the President's job under the Constitution to form foreign policy. Actually the poor old Foreign Service had had its best shot at opposing the President's views in this regard many years earlier, at the time that recognition of the Soviet Union was being worked out, when Robert F. Kelley, who was then the head of the Soviet or the Russian Desk in the State Department - Bob Kelley, who had been our assistant military attache in the Baltic States at the end of the First World War, and was the father of the Soviet specialization in the Foreign Service, he sent Kennan and Bohlen and Eddie Page and all the others off to learn Russian in the '20s, before we had relations, in anticipation of the day when we would have relations - (when Bob Kelley tried) to get the President to negotiate recognition - the terms of recognition - with the Soviets in such a fashion that we would get a meaningful quid pro quo, and failed. I think he wrote and said all the right things, but the President was bound and determined to have recognition, and was not concerned with the modalities, and finally had it, despite all the things that Bob Kelley said and wrote, and Bob Kelley's star of course faded from then on, he was increasingly shoved aside, and...

Q: Did he serve with Ambassador William Bullitt over there or not?

DAVIES: No, he was the man who in essence organized the whole thing from back here in Washington. He continued to be the head of the...on the Desk, but as the years went by he was increasingly put to one side. He had built up this fantastic library in the State Department on the Soviet Union, which was probably unique, certainly in this country - I don't know, people said in the West - over many years, beginning with his own years in Russia at the end of the war, through the Legation in Riga (Latvia), through Berlin, through the Eastern European capitals. He had been procuring publications and laws; he was a real scholar himself, and he built up this fine library which eventually was moved out of the old State War-Navy Building - there wasn't room for it there as other activities began to move in and the library I guess eventually was dispersed.

Bob Kelley himself ended up after the War as the representative in Munich of the Radio Liberty Committee.

Q: I vaguely remember him.

DAVIES: A wonderful, wonderful man. He never married, he died here three or four years ago, he never wrote any memoirs, he said he didn't intend to write any memoirs, but he is a character, a personality who should be remembered, and I hope...maybe...

I'd like to see an adequate biography and study done of him. The problem will be - I just don't believe, I don't know whether he kept any papers or not. I think he had a sister.

But that's sort of the story, which again has been thoroughly documented in a number of books.

After that initial effort, nobody really, it seems to me, succeeded in getting to President Roosevelt with the kinds of recommendations that were needed.

Well, I've gotten away from George Kennan in the period of 1952, when he served in Moscow. So, he objected to NATO, he thought that the Soviets regarded this as a warlike move on our part, and those of us in the Embassy whom he asked to comment on this point of view - after he'd transmitted it to the Department - said, well, we really didn't think that, we regarded it as much more an action by the West in response to what the Soviets had been up to, and George Kennan was warning the Department in those years that now Stalin was beginning to mobilize the Soviet people for war against the West. We tried to tell him that that was not the case, that the anti-American propaganda, which had such an appalling effect on everybody, was essentially a defensive reaction and not an aggressive or a threatening one. The Soviet Union after all was still a shambles, largely from the effects of the war, with 20 million dead and a major percentage of the national productive capacity destroyed.

He was succeeded after he was declared persona non grata...

Oh, I meant to mention one other thing, which again affected him a great deal, and through him all of us.

The American Embassy in those years was on a street next to the National Hotel - Mokhovaya Street, Moss Street, that's where they used to sell the moss with which people chinked their log cabins in the old days, that's how it got its name - right across from the Kremlin, I guess on the north side of the Kremlin.

Stalin ordered us to move. The British Embassy was just across the river, just south of the Kremlin, and the American Embassy was just north of the Kremlin, and it was quite clear that he didn't like...

One imagined him walking the parapets of the Kremlin looking on one side and seeing the Stars and Stripes, and looking on the other side and seeing the Union Jack. He was surrounded.

In any case he gave orders that we should move both embassies. The British, applying the lessons of hundreds of years of successful diplomacy, procrastinated indefinitely until the old man died and never did move. But we being Americans, well, if we have to do it we have to do it - we did move.

We first learned of this requirement from the Soviet Government when Ambassador Kennan called a meeting at Spaso House of all the people in the Embassy, and presented this decision as quite clearly what it was - a move by Stalin out of pique, but designed to show his dislike for us in a tangible way, but one which would not entail any consequences, or at any rate any important consequence for him. And Ambassador Kennan presented it in that fashion, he spoke of the great fondness everybody had for the Embassy at Mokhovaya, which of course not only contained the chancery, the offices, but apartments in which a large number - perhaps half or more - of the personnel of the Embassy lived, and which had been acquired by Charlie Thayer back in the early '30s, the acquisition of which he wrote about in his book Bears in the Caviar. So there was a sort of combined nostalgia and an effort on his part to reassure us that we shouldn't worry, that this was regrettable, but we would all be all right.

Well, I think most of us were a little surprised by this because again it was something that we quite understood. It was part of the game.

Q: You referred in retrospect to the long-standing wisdom of the British, who played it out. Was that evident among the personnel you worked with?

DAVIES: Not at that time, because this was early. The British of course said, "Of course we'll move." They never said, "We won't move."

Like us; we did the same thing.

They said, "Well, show us where we should move to. You control all the property here and the housing, you control the buildings."

And of course this was part of the deal. The Foreign Ministry, which did try I think - to the extent that it had any leeway or latitude in the matter - to be reassuring too and they said, "Of course this is nothing personal, but it's just a question that we have other plans, this and that, urban renewal and what have you, and we'll find not only adequate but superior quarters for you elsewhere, so that you won't regret this at all."

And the British went along with this, but they just kept looking, they were never satisfied with what they were shown. I don't know how many places they were shown, but they were sort of being shown the 20th or the 30th on March the 5th - or whatever it was - in 1953, when the word got out that Stalin had died, at which point the Soviet authorities said, "Now wait a second, you don't need to move now."

By that time we had already started to move. We had found a building which we accepted, the one in which we now have our chancery, on Tchaikovsky Street, on the so-called Garden Ring. The Soviets had undertaken to refurbish it, and we had imported very substantial amounts of American and Western European plumbing and appliances, electrical equipment and what have you, in fact I think several million dollars worth by the time we got done, so we had an investment in the new building by that time, which we could not just write off, and although as a matter of fact the Soviets then did tell us, "You don't have to move if you don't want to, and we'll work out some compensation, we can negotiate a kind of fair value of this equipment with which we are refurbishing your building," and that kind of thing, by that time we had gone so far, and I think by that time too people were beginning to realize that this would be a better deal for us, not right side by side with the Kremlin a hundred yards away from Red Square, but in a very nice location, and the quarters were more adequate, the building in which we had been was old and had never had a fundamental renovation from the day we had moved in, it had been occupied on what one can only call the hot apartment system - one family moved out, and another family moved in the next day - and the furniture was in terrible shape. I was in charge of moving us out of that building, and the filth and decrepitude were really something to behold. The building was in fact falling down around our ears, and under the conditions of crowding that existed there we would never have been able to do the sort of renovation that we needed.

So all in all by that time we decided we might just as well go ahead and move, and we did. The British were still in their fine, old "fin de siecle" - turn-of-the-century - sugar baron's mansion on the other side of the river, and we of course are waiting now to build our new embassy down in the flats of the river bottom behind the present site.

Well, then Chip Bohlen came. As I remember he came right after May Day 1953. We had just completed, or were in the process of completing, moving out of the old building on Mokhovaya Street. I think his only act with regard to the old building was to come down the day that we climbed up and took the seals, the shields, down. They were over the three archways, only one of which was used - the other two were blocked up. But the three seals were there - the Great Seal of the United States - and he climbed up on a ladder for a photographer, and he ceremonially unscrewed one of the screws that was holding it and had been holding it since 1933 or 1934, whenever it was put up.

We took those down, and they were then taken up to the new building.

He of course was very different from Ambassador Kennan, certainly the world's greatest raconteur. I am even tempted to say monologist - sometimes you couldn't even get a word in edgewise, particularly if you were, again, a young and rather worshipful officer - a great raconteur in any number of languages, obviously in addition to English, French, Russian, and for all I know German, and a man of enormous charm and presence and background again in Soviet affairs, very close friend of George Kennan, they corresponded constantly, both when Ambassador Kennan was in Moscow and of course... No, I guess that was Tommy Thompson (Ambassador Llewelyn Thompson) who spoke at his funeral or memorial service at the Cathedral, and told the story about how Chip... - I am confused now, but I think that's right - about how Chip, when he was off to the Embassy in Moscow, had written to Tommy, who I think had also been asked about it and had sort of said, "Is it all right for me to accept it," which was kind of... (as if to say), it won't offend you if I do.

A very fine guy.

Q: But Bohlen was not a subordinate or an acolyte of Kennan. They were sort of coequals.

DAVIES: They were coequals. It's interesting. I talked about Bob Kelley. Bob Kelley...

I don't know how this worked out, but Chip wound up going to France to study Russian. He studied at the Sorbonne, and he lived with a Russian emigre family in Paris. Part of the deal was that he should speak nothing but Russian with them, and that's how he learned his Russian.

George Kennan went to Berlin, initially, and lived with a Russian emigre family there, and then went on to Riga (Latvia) where he did the same thing, and learned his Russian there, and worked in the Soviet section of the Legation at Riga, which was before we had relations - it was one of our principal listening posts or observation posts.

So they had been in different places, but I assume they had known each other as young officers in the Service together, and they were always very close, although they were such totally, diametrically opposite people temperamentally.

Q: I know your bracket was Malcolm Toon and so forth, but were Charlie Thayer and Eddie Page older than you?

DAVIES: Oh, yes, they were of that first generation.

Q: I see.

DAVIES: Now I can't remember whether Charlie actually was...I can't remember whether he was in Riga - he may have been - or whether he was somewhere in Western Europe.

Of course Avis Bohlen was his "Charlie's) sister - is her sister. Both he and Chip are dead, but Avis is still very much alive, and she is Avis Thayer, who married Chip Bohlen, so there was that connection. They were of the first generation, and there was I would say an intermediate generation.

Q: Who were some of the other conspicuous people, like Thayer, Page, other early types? I mean the Soviet specialists.

DAVIES: Well, there was Freddie Reinhardt (Ambassador Frederick Reinhardt), who I guess finished his career as Ambassador to Italy.

Q: Yes.

DAVIES: Dick Davis - Richard Hallock Davis - was of a slightly younger generation; he belongs to what I would call the intermediate group. Tommy Thompson is sometimes classified with them, but he was not a Russian language student like Bohlen, Kennan, Eddie Page. I am not sure Freddie Reinhardt was either, although I tend to think he was.

In any case Tommy Thompson served in the Soviet Union before, just on the eve of, and during the war, and his Russian was pretty good. It was not as good as Bohlen's, Kennan's and Page's, who had lived with Russian families and really were as close to being bilingual in Russian as people who had not come from Russian speaking families could be.

Q: You were talking about early service in Poland, and you mentioned the business of Americans of Polish origin, and you made the observation that they could be very good if they were thoroughly versed in Polish and so forth, and depending on their personalities and qualifications. There weren't many former Russians? That was not possible, was it, to have White Russians or Russian-Americans stationed in the Soviet Union, was it?

DAVIES: No, some of the married Whites, for example Angus Ward. Angus Ward was not one of those especially trained people. He went to the Soviet Union - he was a consular officer primarily, and he went there as a consular officer. But he had married in the Baltic States I believe - or maybe in Finland - a Finnish girl, and I believe she was of the Finnish nobility, a baroness or a countess or something like that, who had been educated at the famous school in St. Petersburg for daughters of the nobility before the First World War.

Ambassador Loy Henderson had married a lady who was from the Baltic nobility. There were others.

Q: Ambassador Norman Armour.

DAVIES: Norman Armour.

Q: And Ambassador Henry Villard.

DAVIES: Henry Villard and...

Q: But that didn't particularly propel them into the Soviet sphere at all.

DAVIES: Not particularly, but they were officers who spent most of their time in Europe, and then they went to the Soviet Union, they were assigned to the Soviet Union.

Now there was an interesting thing - and of course it still persists for that matter, so far as some of these people, and in particular some of these ladies, widows now, who are still alive - the officers who were not specialists, educated in the language and hadn't gone to school as Kennan, Bohlen, Page and some others did, who were married to wives from that part of the world, formed quite a different group, for reasons I think that you can well understand.

They did tend to see things against a background of...of recognizing or paying more attention to the viewpoint of what in the Soviet Union are called the former people, that is the former ruling class.

DAVIES: Spencer Barnes was another, but Spencer was not quite...you know...

Q: But is it a correct summary to say that right after World War One in the Foreign Service people were accepted when abroad? They didn't have any home leave and they were often bachelors.

DAVIES: Oh, obviously, yes.

Q: Some were married and emigres...

DAVIES: Inevitably, certainly they did.

Q: Would you explain about how they didn't... They didn't come home every two years.

DAVIES: No indeed, they didn't. Take just as an example Angus Ward, under whom I served when he was Ambassador to Afghanistan.

Q: Oh, we'll get to that.

DAVIES: Yes, but just to take his example, it's kind of interesting.

He was born in Canada in a Gaelic speaking community - a Scots-Gaelic community, I can't remember whether it was in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, perhaps even in Ontario - and came to this country as a young man, I think. In fact I've heard - and I don't know how true this is, but it wouldn't surprise me - that he only really learned English when he began to go to school in kindergarten or the first grade. He was a high school graduate. He was in the Army then during the First World War. When he was mustered out he stayed in France, he didn't come back to this country. He was employed by the Embassy in Paris as a clerk, and of course the salary was 750 dollars a year or something like that. Then he worked his way into consular work, where he met his wife. I don't really know whether it was in Paris, or later when he was serving in Eastern Europe. She was - and is, because she is still alive - a woman of considerable force of character, very well educated - because that was an excellent school in Petersburg, for any time and place - very strong willed, and he himself was a man of no mean force of character and will power.

But they never came back to the United States. They had no home in the United States. I don't know how much family he had back here, but he spent whole decades abroad without coming back here, or if he did come back it was on very short trips. Mrs. Ward really had no reason to come back here, she didn't particularly like to come back here, she did not like the United States.

Q: And eventually when he retired he retired in Spain, didn't he?

DAVIES: He retired in Malaga, and I believe Mrs. Ward is still living there.

Q: Amazing.

DAVIES: They never came back to the United States, they did not regard the United States as their home, and I have to say that Mrs. Ward did not like America, she did not like American women. I am not sure... I guess she liked...well, she obviously liked one American citizen (laughs). And she made no bones of this.

Q: That's an interesting theory, because he was quite a remarkable man who did great services for the United States, but it's sort of like the mercenary idea. For honorary consul you can hire a person of extreme value and...

DAVIES: Well, of course in the 19th century, before the idea of nationality became quite so important, one did do precisely that. The Tsarist diplomatic service was full of non-Russians, and what's more in many cases people who were not even subjects of the Tsar - they were from France, or Corsica, or Italy, from some of the small states in Italy or the small states in Germany, or at best, if they were subjects of the Tsar, they were Baltic barons, or Poles or something like that, so that the Tsarist diplomatic service, like others for that matter, consisted of people who were professional diplomats and who really, one could say, could represent any country with equal facility if... (laughs)

You know, it was a profession in rather the narrow sense of the term.

And for that matter this country for many years - of course it wasn't really until the end of the Second World War that our Foreign Service became a service which was doing things that most Americans regarded as very important. Before that nobody thought it was doing something very important.

But we had a lot of people for example - in addition to the famous writers like Nathaniel Hawthorne or Washington Irving - who obtained sinecures because they either couldn't live on their writing or wanted to spend some time abroad and didn't have the means to do so, or couldn't find the means to do so in any other way. We had a number of people who came over here as a result of various revolutions or turmoil in Europe, and then more or less turned right around and went back once they'd gotten their citizenships, and became American representatives in various places.

Q: How do you feel about that? Would that tie in at all with that...

I remember Ed Korey's report in which when he was Ambassador to Ethiopia he suggested that we should decide which three or four countries in Africa are of any significance to the United States and have honorary consuls and the rest, and save a lot of money and so forth. Is that a very obsolete point of view, or could it work now?

DAVIES: Well, it makes eminent sense from nearly every point of view except one, and that is the question of the self image of the country concerned. If you have a non-resident ambassador who is sitting let's say in Ghana and representing you in several of the surrounding countries there, and spends his time traveling, each of the countries where he is not resident says in effect, "Well, you don't care about us. You have a resident ambassador in Ghana, but you don't have one here in Cameroon, or wherever."

Q: But that's sort of Third World development.

DAVIES: It is a Third World...

It's a question of why can't I... You know, you are a big, wealthy country, and if you really do care about us you put somebody here.

The same goes for The New York Times, for that matter. If we are such an important country, how come you, The New York Times, only send a correspondent here once every three years when we have an election? You ought to have somebody stationed here.

Q: That's how [things] develop.

DAVIES: That's right. But in Poland when I was there the Times closed its bureau. That was the last American resident special correspondent there. When they pulled him out the Poles were terribly unhappy, and they complained about it, and now there is again a Times correspondent there. They closed the bureau solely for economic reasons - it cost a lot to maintain - but they've come to the conclusion, and I think this is completely accurate, that the potential in Poland is such that they've got to have somebody there to keep following that story on a constant basis.

But the same goes for this business of ambassadors.

I regret terribly that we got involved in this game. It did seem that Benjamin Franklin had the right idea. It was of course done with a certain histrionic effect. I think the reason was his wig had gotten lost en route, but he just clubbed his hair back and went dressed in his rustic American outfit. He knew perfectly how rustic it was because he was a great dandy in fact. But this was...you know, he and the coonskin cap. That was a stroke of great public relations, and we should have continued that. (imitating a sort of southwest accent), "Shucks, I don't want to be an ambassador, I just want to be a minister, and I don't really care," as Henry said, "I don't care, just as long as you call me Excellency..." (laughs) It seems to me we would have been better off not to get into this, but of course inevitably then we say, "Well, then you don't get into the protocol list, and you can't... Actually our Government won't let us become dean of the Diplomatic Corps. We never stay long enough in one place in the first place, and in the second place, even if an American ambassador does reach the point where he is going to become Dean the United States Government in Washington is terribly nervous about that situation, and doesn't want us to do it.

Q: I guess one of the last long term American ambassadors was Wally (Walworth) Barbour in Israel, for about 11 years.

DAVIES: That's right, he was there a long time, and I am sure was - I can only imagine that he ended up as dean of the Diplomatic Corps.

But when that happens the American Government is terribly unhappy. "Oh, dear, you are going to be in the middle," - which of course you will, any dean of the Diplomatic Corps is. I just don't see any reason to worry about that.

Well, Angus Ward really was in a way a kind of expatriate, and many of the people in our service in the '20s and '30s, through no fault of their own - his was an extreme case - simply because the Government paid them so little, did not pay for the home leave - there was no requirement for home leave until the Foreign Service Act of 1946 - didn't pay their way back and forth, during the Great Depression their salaries were cut and on occasion they were not paid... You know, it was a time when unless you had independent means, and not everybody did in those years, it was a very difficult time for people in the Foreign Service. They couldn't get back here. Certainly a young man who went abroad - an unmarried young man - was very likely to end up marrying a foreign girl, and this happened in many cases. I think in most cases it obviously worked out very well, but in some cases the outlook of the officer was inevitably colored by the fact that he'd married a foreign woman.

And that was the case I think with those officers who married women who represented the former ruling class in the Soviet Union. Inevitably they had a more than theoretical or hypothetical antipathy to the Bolsheviks. Some indeed may have had quite intimate family reasons for having very strong emotional reactions to the Bolsheviks. So that when somebody like George Kennan came along, who sort of said, "Well, you know, we have to try to understand these people," this was not regarded with favor, it was regarded like sort of, "Hmmm, can we really trust this guy?" And that was the attitude expressed by some of the older, I'd say, non-specialist people who served in the Soviet Union towards the younger generation, and particularly I think towards George Kennan, who had fallen in love with the culture of the people. I don't know to what extent he was influenced by his uncle, who was one of the great American pioneers in Russia.

Q: What was his name?

DAVIES: George Kennan, who traveled across Russia in the latter part of the 19th century by dog sled, by reindeer sleigh, on horseback, on foot - just a fantastic man. He wrote amazing books about this country, his great work being "Siberia and the Exile System," about the political dissidents, the prisoners in Siberia in those years.

In any event, George Kennan (the nephew) was in love with the country in a way, and still is, and this was terribly resented because some of the people felt, well, he is prejudiced in favor of the Russians. And he certainly was and is, but obviously he was never prejudiced in favor of the Bolsheviks - on the contrary.

The feeling was not that strong against or about Chip Bohlen, who was less intense and didn't quite have that degree of attachment somehow to the country, although he too was intrigued, to put it mildly, by this peculiar...by the Russian character or soul or whatever you want to call it.

Well, I left shortly after Chip Bohlen got there in July or August of 1953.

SOL POLANSKY
Translator

Ambassador Polansky was born in New Jersey and raised in New Jersey and California. He was educated at the University of California, Berkeley, and the Russian Institute, New York City. After service in the U.S. Navy, he joined the Department of State in 1952 and was commissioned Foreign Service Officer in 1957. A Russian specialist, he served in Poznan, East and West Berlin, Moscow, Vienna and Sofia, Bulgaria, where he served as United States Ambassador from 1987 to 1990. In his tours at the State Department in Washington, D.C. he dealt primarily with East Europe Affairs. Ambassador Polansky was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

Q: You could almost check the progression of the Cold War through out this time. By the time you got out of there in 1952, did you feel that you were learning about the enemy?

POLANSKY: Yes, I think we did feel academically that we were learning about the enemy, if you will. That was the way we looked at it. I had the opportunity to go to Moscow, for the State Department, as a translator. At that time, the Foreign Service did not have enough language trained Foreign Service officers and there was in Moscow, a translation bureau that was run by the Americans, British, Canadians, and Australians. It was a joint translation service and they needed somebody. They needed a bachelor. I was engaged at the time, but not married. I took the exam. Bob Tucker was the editor of the joint press reading service in Moscow. I passed the exam and was assigned to Moscow.

Q: This was not the Foreign Service exam, this was a translator's exam?

POLANSKY: Yes. I came in as a staff officer and then was "Wristonized".

The first two years I was in Moscow at the embassy, working as a translator, the atmosphere was a very, very cold one. You had the "Doctor's plot" that was coming up. You felt very much that you were an outsider and you were the enemy. I didn't feel any sense of personal danger, but the political atmosphere was such that, the US was the enemy. There was virtually no contact at the social level. It wasn't a sense of isolation, but no real contact with ordinary Russians, except the few who were working in the translation office with us in a technical capacity. We never really talked about political subjects.

Q: This translation service was an extremely important part of our window into the Soviet Union. I can't think of anything more deadly than reading "Izvestia" and "Politika" day after day. How did you approach this? What were we looking for? What was our coverage?

POLANSKY: First of all, I came in as the new member of the staff and took what was handed to me. The way it worked, in the morning, Bob Tucker and his deputy assigned articles from "Pravda" and "Izvestia" that focused on foreign policy issues or editorials, with the idea of translating those as rapidly as we could into English. You were sitting there with what you were going to translate and a secretary/typist was sitting there with stencil paper in the typewriter and you translated and she typed the translation onto the paper. Then it went into Bob for editing. By the end of the morning, there would be a digest of the major news articles in the day's press and that was made into multiple copies and sent around to the various embassies that subscribed to the service. The afternoon was spent looking at longer articles, either in the newspapers about economic or social issues, or from magazines that would supposedly give a broader picture of what was going on economically or socially. That became a second part or edition of the translation service. All of those that were selected by Bob and his deputy for the political content or possible changes in domestic or foreign policy that might be reflected in those articles.

Q: Were you reaching down into the provincial papers to pick up developments there?

POLANSKY: It was limited to the central newspapers--"Pravda", "Izvestia", "Red Star", and "Trud". You have to realize that at the time, it wasn't always that easy to get subscriptions. The general feeling was that the entire media was so controlled by Moscow that if you were really looking for policy direction, or changes in policy, or hints about leadership changes, that all came out of the central press. The local press was really a reflection of national issues and the local issues were too irrelevant to require much attention.

Q: You were part of this machine that was beginning to feed this new science of Kremlinology. Were your antennae being sharpened or were you too involved in the daily work?

POLANSKY: I think I was so involved in having the right translation, really focusing more on the translations themselves--obviously interested in their content because of my interest in the Soviet Union, but it was up to Bob and his deputy to decide what was to be translated. I think we subconsciously felt that we had done our part and now it was up to the guys in the political and economic sections to do whatever analysis that they could derive from those articles for those who couldn't speak Russian.

Q: What was your feeling about the Embassy? You were there from 1952 until 1955. This was the death of Stalin; the Doctor's plot; the new Troika--it wasn't really a Troika--Malenkov and others. What was life like for you and your impression of the other people at the Embassy.

POLANSKY: Life for us, for me, when I arrived, there were five of us who lived in a house rented by the US government. It was not far from the Foreign Ministry or the Embassy. We had a Russian cook and Russian maids to clean the house. Three of the five were Foreign Service Officers and then there was another translator and myself. At the time we were all bachelors. We all got along well. I work responsibilities didn't keep us separated. We got together in the evening and talked about what was going on. We felt we were a junior part of the Embassy. The other translator and I weren't directly involved in the activities at the Embassy. We weren't excluded from it. After Stalin died, the Embassy itself was forced to move from its location almost on Red Square up to its current location on Tchaikovsky Street. That made it possible to bring together most of the families to one place in terms of apartments. In my case, they went to the Embassy Administrative Officer and DCM and asked if an apartment would be available so that I could get married and bring my wife back to live. They agreed and so I got married by proxy because it was difficult for my wife to get a visa without being married. There were all sorts of problems, but we got that all straightened out. She came and we moved into an apartment in the Embassy compound and we became part of the younger set of the Embassy. Virtually all of the social life at that time focused on the American community, with some interaction with the Canadians, Australians, British, and Germans. There was very little contact with Russians. Not that we didn't look for it; it was a very uncertain period and there was virtually no contact. I spent three years in Moscow the first time. We had a number of chance conversations in Moscow with Russians but we spent our first three years without having actually known a Russian family or individual in any significant way.

Q: While you were there, George Kennan and Charles Bohlen were Ambassadors. I realize they were somewhat removed, but still it was a small Embassy, did you have much contact?

POLANSKY: I arrived in Moscow in time to attend my first diplomatic reception which was given by Mrs. Kennan because Ambassador Kennan was out in Berlin. They wouldn't let him back in. I was saying good-bye to Mrs. Kennan who I had not met before.

Q: He had made his famous statement on ...in Russia, when he got off the plane.

POLANSKY: He didn't come back, so I never really knew him. I met him a couple of times after that. Then Charles Bohlen came. He was a very well liked and respected person and I think he was open to everybody and I think everybody felt that he was very much a leader and we were part of a family in that sense. As a junior member of the Embassy staff by then, I was working in the Agricultural section because the Agricultural Attache knew agriculture but not Russian, and I knew Russian but not agriculture. So we teamed up. We took many trips and I learned a lot from him and saw the Ambassador in that context. When you're a junior officer you hold a senior officer in a certain amount of awe, particularly with the kind of reputation he had. He was very well liked by all the women in the embassy. He was so damn handsome and dashing.

Q: What did the Agricultural Attaché do in the Soviet Union at that time and how did you support him?

POLANSKY: Essentially what we were trying to do was to try and understand what the Soviet agricultural policy was; what the growing conditions were like; what the crops were likely to be, along with the economic and political connotations that that had for the Soviet Union. It amounted to several parts. One was to begin to try to read the pertinent Russian newspapers about agricultural developments. We tried to figure out what was true and what was not. There was also the time when they started their New Lands policy and what that meant for the development of Soviet agriculture, particularly the grain crops. We had that part which was reading the newspaper. The other part, to the extent that we could, was to take trips to the main agricultural regions of the country, either by plane, preferably by train, and sometimes by car. We tried to do that at appropriate times in the growing season, in the harvest season, to try and get first hand impressions as to what the growing season was like and what the crops were like. That wasn't always easy. We had to do all our travel arrangements through .....the Soviet agency that controlled foreigners. We would register a trip and tell them how and when we were going and in effect they would tell us whether we were going and in certain places they would block off part of the proposed schedule. Sometimes they would give us reasons, sometimes they wouldn't. We tried to look as carefully as we could at the crop situation. When we were in cities, we tried to go into as many stores and collective farm markets that we could, to try and get some sense of what the food situation was like; what the food prices were like--whether there were price increases or not. We tried to get some sense of how good the food supply was. This was before the age of satellites so we were, in effect, the eyes and the ears of the US government and of all the agencies that were interested in what was happening in the Soviet Union.

Q: What was the impression of the attaché, whom you were supporting, of the efficiency, the developments in Soviet agriculture?

POLANSKY: In terms of the growing seasons, I think that his general impression was that they were not particularly effective or efficient in areas of land that were particularly well cultivated. There were a lot of weeds and that kind of problem. I think he came from an atmosphere and background that suggested the whole idea of collectivized agriculture was not an efficient way to do things. He tended to have those views reinforced by what he saw--the lack of equipment in the fields; the kind of equipment we saw that was not well tended. We didn't always see a lot of equipment in the field or people working hard. Whereas, if we were in a train or car driving through villages and saw the village private plots, that farmers had, they seemed to be much more densely cultivated. When we went to the market and saw what was available, we came away with the impression that no matter how collectivized they were, people tended to devote more attention, more care, and to the extent they could, to their private plots.

Q: Was there any feel for the New Lands Program? This sort of turned into an ecological disaster.

POLANSKY: I can tell you, we certainly didn't have the opportunity to talk to Russian farmers. We didn't have the opportunity, voluntarily, or otherwise to become part of that exercise. We flew over the New Lands on our way out to Kazakstan, in the fall of 1954, and it went on endlessly. From a plane, we saw mile after mile of newly plowed fields--vast areas. That was really quite impressive. We wondered where all the machinery was that had done it; we just didn't see it. Now I think it is a disaster, in large part.

Q: Of the young officers with whom you were associated with, did any stick out in your mind that you saw later on as the new breed of Soviet specialists?

POLANSKY: Oh yes. Bob Barry is one; Tom Niles is another. Those two certainly stood out. Mark Palmer was also there. In some ways, it is sometimes hard to pinpoint, but you knew that they were exceptional in a very capable group of people. They had entirely different personalities, but they stood out.

Q: This is a period from 1952 until 1955, during McCarthyism. Was this striking at all? Did you get any feel from McCarthyism and this almost anti-intellectual movement in the States?

POLANSKY: I think more in Washington than in the Embassy. I think people were obviously concerned by it, but I can't think of anyone in the Embassy who was affected by it.

Q: How about the security thing? Were the KGB playing games, particularly with you bachelor officers? Or were you pretty isolated from that?

POLANSKY: I think we were subjected to it in various ways. In Moscow, at that time, I don't think it was so obvious. I think we were aware of it and warned against it. I was in Warsaw later and the local security people had gotten to a member of the Embassy. I don't remember security in Moscow at that point, within the Embassy, particularly strong. I think it was there. We were warned about, but I don't think the Embassy security officer was a particularly heavy handed person at the time. It was not a major issue.

Q: How did your wife react to this?

POLANSKY: I think she, in a sense, like I was. Her academic background was not in things Russian. She was an occupational therapist. It sounds strange to people now, but there was really no question about her giving up her possible professional career. We got married and she became part of the Embassy staff. She worked as a typist in JPRS and that added some money so that she could travel on some of the trips that I took. She likes children, so she got involved in teaching younger kids at the Anglo-American school. That was very much part of what she wanted to do and became an important part of making life in Moscow more interesting. She was certainly curious enough about life in the Soviet Union, learned some Russian, interested in the cultural life, went to plays even though she couldn't understand Russian, did as much traveling with me as she could and then with some of the wives from the Embassy. You couldn't travel by yourself then. I think, for her, it was a marvelous experience. Neither she nor I had an idea of what life in an Embassy, in the Foreign Service, would be like, but it worked out very well. She was thoroughly pleased with the assignment and I think with each assignment that we have had, hated to leave, glad to be back to the United States; hated to leave the United States, but once she got where we were going, got very much wrapped up in it and again, would hate to leave when it was time to go. Although we didn't realize it at the time, the whole business of wives being rated, I think grated on her, and she appreciated the liberation in 1972. She thought it should have come earlier. I suspect this is true for most people, you really don't know what you are committing yourself to in the Foreign Service. I think she took the best possible things out of our career in the Foreign Service.

Q: Had you been integrated into the Foreign Service when you came back?

POLANSKY: Yes.

Washington, DC (1961-1964)

Philip H. Valdes was born in New York in 1921. He received a bachelor's degree and master's degree from Yale University. He served in the U.S. Army from 1943-1946 and entered the Foreign Service in 1947. His career included positions in China, Korea, the Soviet Union, Germany, France, and Thailand. Mr. Valdes was interviewed by William Knight on July 11, 1994.

Q: In connection with Russian language study, you had full-fledged language and area training, right?

VALDES: Yes.

Q: Any comment about that training? Was that adequate and good?

VALDES: It was quite good, I think, considering that I'm not really that gifted in languages. The area training at the Russian Institute at Columbia University was very good. The language training involved four months at the Russian Institute and two months at Cornell University, doing nothing but language study. That was an excellent program. Then I had a tutor and also studied Russian at Columbia, while I was taking substantive courses.

Q: So when did you arrive in Moscow?

VALDES: In July, 1952.

Q: Was Ambassador Tommy Thompson there then?

VALDES: No, Ambassador George Kennan was there. We had just been told by the Soviets that we had to move our Embassy, which had been on Mokhovaya Square, just across from the Kremlin. We had apparently disturbed Stalin by our “imperialist” proximity. We and the British had both been told that we had to move. They were just across the [Moscow] River from the Kremlin.

This became a very serious operation, known as the “Move,” with a capital M. Dave Klein, who went to Moscow at the same time I did and had gone through Russian language training with me, and I were assigned to the Administrative Section to help with the “Move.”

This turned out to be a great assignment, in that I was one of the few people who actually got to speak a lot of Russian -- getting things out of Customs and dealing with a Russian labor force in the Embassy. So it was very good training. By the time that we actually did make the “Move” in May [1953], my [fluency in] Russian had improved considerably. I felt that I had no trouble handling the political reporting that I was doing after that.

Q: I would suppose that the security considerations in the “Move” were tremendous, trying to prevent the [Soviets] from “bugging” the new quarters.

VALDES: Yes. Well, of course, they were building the new building. We had a Danish architect supervising it. There wasn’t much he could do. It was a brick building with brick bearing walls, so you couldn’t change the size of the rooms very much, or the building would collapse. There were only Russian workers doing the actual work. So, in fact, they did “seed” a lot of microphones in the building, which we later found.

Q: You mean, most of them.

VALDES: Well, I think we found a good number of them. I’m not sure how useful they would have been to the Soviets, anyway.

Q: You mean that our golden words would not shake the world?

VALDES: I don’t think that the security of the United States was really seriously harmed by that.

Q: You were doing economic work in Moscow?

VALDES: I was doing political work -- internal political reporting. At that time it essentially involved reading the newspapers -- some 15 or so a day -- and talking to whatever people we could find to talk to. It was very difficult then.

When I got there [in July, 1952], it was the height of the Cold War. In fact, I'd only been there for six weeks when the Soviets declared Ambassador George Kennan "persona non grata." When he came out of Moscow on the Ambassador's plane on a trip to Berlin, he remarked to a group of reporters that the current conditions in Moscow were similar to what he had gone through in a Nazi internment camp after December, 1941. This remark clearly upset the Soviets. He was declared "persona non grata," and we had no ambassador until April, [1953] when Ambassador Charles E. Bohlen was assigned.

By that time Stalin had died. There were noticeable changes in the atmosphere -- not very great ones, but enough to notice. The time of his death was a really dramatic period. For about four or five days the center of Moscow inside the Ring Road was blocked off by trucks manned with police. You could hear your footsteps echo. We could get through because of our Embassy being there. I listened to Chopin's "Funeral March" for, I would say, 10 hours a day for four days. It blared over loudspeakers. There was a great amount of concern among the people as to what was going to happen.

Q: What kind of Russians could you see in trying to do your political reporting? I suppose you could not really see anybody official.

VALDES: We couldn't see anybody official. We couldn't see anybody, so to speak, on purpose. For private [Soviet] citizens it was dangerous to be seen with us. Sometimes they'd argue about it, but then they'd notice a dark-suited man looking at them rather suspiciously and they'd decide that maybe it was better if they didn't talk to us. Really, the only way you could talk to people was by accident. You would try to create a number of accidents, such as standing in line with a lot of Russians at restaurants, because you were always seated with people. There couldn't be an empty seat, so often you would be sitting at a table with Russians and sometimes they would start chatting. And often on trips out of Moscow [you could talk to people], because the citizenry hadn't been indoctrinated that well on how to behave with foreigners, since there weren't that many foreigners around.

Q: Did the KGB [Soviet secret police], or whatever it was at the time, have enough people so that you yourself were actually followed on the streets?

VALDES: I don't remember being followed very much. Occasionally, I noticed, I was followed. The military attachés tended to be followed very frequently -- most of the time. For other people it was sporadic.

Q: Could you tell that you were not being followed?

VALDES: Well, at that stage I suppose that I did not have any real Russian friends whose homes I could visit. That was pretty much "out of the question."

Now that changed the second time I was in Moscow. There was a great difference. We could get to know people and could invite them to our apartments. There would have to be some sort of excuse, such as showing a movie. That worked. To do it, we'd have to send the invitation to their institution [or office], such as the Union of Writers, if we were inviting a writer or a translator. The Communist Party representative at the theater, if we were inviting an actor. Sometimes they wouldn't get the invitation and sometimes they would. If you could somehow get hold of them [in advance] and ask them to come, they would say, "Send me an invitation." Some of them would go barging into the Party Secretary's office and say, "I have an invitation from the American Embassy. Do you have it?" Usually, the Party Secretary would back down and hand it to them.

Sometimes it got a little tricky. I remember that a friend, a colleague of mine, was going to hold a party but had to cancel it. I've forgotten why, but he had some reason to cancel it. He sent notices around, saying that he was canceling it. At the office of one person whom he had invited the Party Secretary had obviously decided that "this comrade had already had one invitation from the Americans. I'm not going to let him get another one." So the person who had been invited never got the cancellation notice. He showed up, somewhat angered that there wasn't any party to go to.

Q: Was there anything about your work or living conditions there -- that really surprised you and that you remember, particularly for that period [1952-1954] -- either in the sense of your preconceptions or your ideas about the U. S.-Russian relationship at the time?

VALDES: I would say that the first time I was there [1952-1954] I wasn't really very much surprised by anything, except the friendliness of Russians that you did meet by accident. That surprised me a little bit because, as I said, it was at the height of the Cold War. We were being denounced for "germ warfare" [in North Korea] and everything else that the Soviets could think of. The Russians that we would meet believed some of these charges but some of them they didn't believe. In any case, they usually were quite friendly, when we did meet them. This wasn't always the case, but it was often enough the case that I was surprised.

Q: Then, during your later assignment [to Moscow, 1964-1966], what was the change in that regard? Did they still seem friendly?

VALDES: They seemed very friendly. Both times I was there were exciting periods: the first time, when Stalin died. You could see a change during the year or so that I was there after he died [in 1953]. People were beginning to talk a little bit.

For example, there was my Russian teacher, who had never said anything other than what was necessary to teach me Russian. That changed after Stalin's death. She commented one time, for instance, about the purges [of the late 1930's]. She said that she had worked in a large office with something like 40 people in it. One day she came into the office, and there was only one other person there. The other 38 had "disappeared."

Q: Did they ever come back or were they gone for good?

VALDES: She didn't go into it any further, but presumably they didn't come back.

Q: In the Embassy then, with your political reporting, what was the chain of command above you and who were your direct supervisors? What was your position at that stage, a Second Secretary?

VALDES: A Second Secretary. My immediate supervisor was Dave Henry, a First Secretary.

Q: Was he the Political Counselor?

VALDES: Jack McSweeney was the Political Counselor. The Minister was Elim O'Shaughnessy. He was chargé d'affaires for a long time.

Q: When the Ambassador was there, he would have been DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission]?

VALDES: Yes, he was DCM. And then Jake Beam came to be chargé d'affaires, after Elim O'Shaughnessy had been chargé for a while. Jack McSweeney was the Political Counselor, so he was the second supervisor above me, then Elim O'Shaughnessy, and then Jake Beam. And, of course, later on, Charles E. Bohlen. Beam left after Bohlen arrived.

Q: Would Jack McSweeney, in effect, have been doing the same things that you were doing? Was everybody more or less confined to press reporting?

VALDES: Well, he had contacts with the [Soviet] Foreign Ministry. There were some necessary contacts with them. All of us had contacts with the rest of the diplomatic corps, of course.

Q: There was a lot of "incestuous" partying.

VALDES: Right. It was a pretty closely-knit group at the time. There were some pretty good people in the British, French, and Canadian Embassies. Actually, the Yugoslavs were really good people to know because, even though they were on the "outs" [with the Soviets], they had to be considered communists of a sort by the Soviets. So they got to do a lot of things that we couldn't do.

That became true much later, during my second tour [in Moscow, 1964-1966]. There had been a kind of "reconciliation" between the Soviets and the Yugoslavs. They could go and talk to Party Secretaries when they traveled. We couldn't do that. We could talk to government people, but not the Party people.

Q: Charles Thayer may have been there when you were there. He was the author of the book, "Bears in the Caviar." Was that a reasonably accurate description of the atmosphere?

VALDES: He wasn't there when I was there. It was a reasonably good description of the situation, given the fact that it was pretty funny. I think that Avis Bohlen's [Ambassador Bohlen's wife] comment, that she was glad that he'd written a book, because these stories couldn't get any wilder, was very much to the point.

I saw a lot of the Bohlens because for a year I lived in Spaso House, the Ambassador's residence. It had been a tradition that a Russian language officer would live there. When George Kennan and Chip Bohlen were there as Ambassador, there wasn't really any need for a Russian language officer. But I did deal with housekeeping matters.

Q: You were sort of the resident interpreter and translator.

VALDES: Well, I would have been, except that the Bohlens didn't need an interpreter. I did get to know the Bohlen family quite well.

Q: That is sort of an interesting tidbit. Now did that have its disadvantages -- always to be under the eye of the boss -- actually living in his house?

VALDES: Well, in this case, living with that boss, it was good.

Q: You got a little sleep, did you?

VALDES: Yes.

Q: You had your own bedroom and bathroom and so forth?

VALDES: Yes, and if they didn't have a formal dinner, I often ate with them. Otherwise, food was brought in to me by the Chinese staff, so life was quite comfortable.

Q: [Spaso House is] sort of an 18th century palace.

VALDES: Yes.

Q: How did the aides live?

VALDES: It was very pleasant. I had to leave Spaso House because I was married in Moscow. This slot in the residence was for bachelor officers. So I moved out, and my wife took me in to her apartment.

Q: Was she a member of the [Embassy] staff?

VALDES: Yes. She was the DCM's secretary.

Q: Well, that was lucky. All right, anything else about the Moscow phase of your career, either substantive or otherwise?

VALDES: Well, my second tour was equally interesting. About a week after I arrived, Khrushchev was thrown out.

Q: What year was that?

VALDES: 1964. A troika of Brezhnev, Podgorny, and Kosygin took over. Brezhnev was the First Secretary of the Communist Party, so he eventually weeded out the others.

Q: Did you like being reassigned for a second time to Moscow?

VALDES: Yes, very much.

Q: In other words the fact of being a Soviet specialist worked out for you? You liked that?

VALDES: I enjoyed it.

Q: What exciting things happened during your second tour?

VALDES: Well, we did get to meet a lot more people. As I said, we could have them to our house and we could have meals with them. I was invited out to the Writers' dacha [country house] by three or four writers. I got to know some theater people. It was a lot easier to travel, and we could talk more freely with people when we did.

Q: So what was the length of the two assignments again?

VALDES: Two years each.

Q: Personally, was that easy to take or was it terrible because of the winters?

VALDES: No, I didn't find the winters a problem.

Q: So emotionally it was not really a "hardship" post.

VALDES: The first tour there was a little hard because of the atmosphere. The second tour was much less trying. There was still a lot of strain.

Q: Did you get a paid leave outside of Russia each year -- just to get away? To [Western] Europe, for example?

VALDES: Yes. During the first tour we didn't get that kind of leave, except that I banged up a knee and was sent out [of the Soviet Union] to a hospital in Frankfurt and got to Paris after that for a couple of weeks. During the second tour we had a month of paid leave in Western Europe. I think that it was on the basis of paid travel, probably to Frankfurt -- I don't remember. My wife and I went to Rome.

Q: Probably "hooked" a ride on the Attaché plane, or something like that.

VALDES: Well, on that occasion we took Aeroflot the Soviet airline, an Aeroflot turbo-prop aircraft from Moscow to Rome. And then we took the train back.

***

... I left the French desk in the middle of 1961 to go up to the Office of Soviet Affairs and was there for three years. I handled multilateral affairs, rather than bilateral Soviet matters.

Q: Was the Soviet desk fairly large in those days?

VALDES: Yes. It was an Office -- the Office of Soviet Affairs.

Q: How many people were assigned?

VALDES: Oh, the director and his deputy, about four officers in bilateral affairs, four in multilateral affairs, and two in economic affairs. So that was pretty big.

Q: What were you in that structure?

VALDES: I was in multilateral affairs. During my last year of that assignment to Washington, 1963-1964, I was in charge of multilateral affairs. What I handled particularly was disarmament matters having to do with the Soviets. When I took charge of multilateral affairs, I was involved in Berlin matters.

Q: Were your contacts primarily in other areas of the U.S. Government on those issues or with the Russians themselves in the Soviet Embassy?

VALDES: Not so much with the Russians but primarily with other areas of the U. S. Government.

Q: And other embassies in Washington?

VALDES: Other embassies, yes. I went to Geneva -- I think that it was in 1962. I went with Hugh Dryden, the Deputy Administrator of NASA [National Aeronautics and Space Agency] as State Department representative to talks between NASA and Soviet space people. That was a fascinating 10 days or so.

Q: Why was it fascinating?

VALDES: Because it was the first time that we really seemed to be getting somewhere. We realized that the Soviet space people were really interested in cooperation with NASA. Various lines of agreement came out of these discussions.

Then I went up to the UN in the spring of 1963 for the outer space meetings, where we continued negotiations with the Soviets and reached agreements on assistance to astronauts and cosmonauts in distress and on exchanging information on peaceful uses of space.

Q: Why did you feel that the Soviets were "open" then, when they hadn't been before?

VALDES: Well, I think that they'd always been "open," but for some reason they'd gotten a chance to do something about it -- why, I don't know.

I think that there was a feeling at the beginning of the Kennedy administration [in 1961] that maybe the Soviets thought that they could engage in some useful negotiations with the U. S. The process bogged down. There were some problems. For example, the second meeting I had with the Soviets on outer space, in the spring of 1963, was shortly after the Cuban missile crisis of October, 1962. But the Soviet representatives put that aside and seemed willing to make agreements.

Q: Were they being pinched by shortages of money and scientific know how? Did they want to get that from us?

VALDES: They realized that they could get a lot from us. I think that they also believed that they had a lot to offer us -- which, in fact, they did.

Q: So to some extent they were interested in the substance of the space operations.

VALDES: The Soviet science people were, yes. What the motive of the Soviet regime was -- I'm not really sure. I think it probably hoped that it could get some space advantages, but it seemed to involve more of a willingness to go along, rather than any actually great desire to "diddle" us in anything.

Q: Any comments on their negotiating system or negotiating techniques in that field?

VALDES: In that field they had a man from the Foreign Ministry who tended to slow things down.

Q: I've read, in general, that on the really tough negotiations the Russian stance is absolutely rigid, turning everything down, until finally someone at the top says, "We have to reach an agreement." And then they abandon their previous position.

VALDES: They can be very rigid and tough. In this case they weren't. They were trying to "push" things and were being held back a little. I think that they weren't trying to "push" to any extreme extent. I think that they knew the realities of what they could hope to get from their government in an agreement. The Soviet scientists were more forthcoming than...

Q: They had a certain amount of negotiating room. It happens that...

VALDES: They had a man with them to see that they didn't exceed their negotiating room.

Q: Everything was reported back to Moscow for approval?

VALDES: Oh, sure.

Q: As, in effect, we did, also.

VALDES: They never went way out on a limb.

Q: Right. So those agreements, when they were concluded, were actually implemented?

VALDES: Yes.

Q: What about other agreements in other fields that you were associated with? Was that also true of those?

VALDES: I was a little bit involved in disarmament, working with the Disarmament Agency [Arms Control and Disarmament Agency]. This was the time when we reached the nuclear test ban agreement.

Q: Did you have a particular, "tame" contact in the Soviet Embassy for this work when you were in the Office of Soviet Affairs?

VALDES: No, no particular person. The bilateral people in the Office of Soviet Affairs had much more contact with the people in the Soviet Embassy than I did.

Q: So they didn't come around to you for assistance in contacts with other parts of our bureaucracy?

VALDES: No, they'd raise questions like that with the bilateral people.

Q: That's one thing that the Austrians were always doing. They would come to the Austrian desk officer and ask him to solve their problems for them.

VALDES: We had an office that dealt with questions like that, I'm happy to say.

Q: Anything else on the Soviet desk period? How did the desk play its part in the Department of State and the White House bureaucratic structure?

VALDES: It was pretty far down the ladder. Ambassador Tommy Thompson was really the person who "created" policy toward the Soviet Union, I would say.

Q: Where was he at that point?

VALDES: He was, I think, called "Ambassador at Large." But in effect he was the Soviet specialist in the Department, outside of the desk. The Office of Soviet Affairs would run things through him for approval.

Q: Were you kept adequately advised of what was going on?

VALDES: Yes, enough to do what we were doing. I'm sure that there were things that we were not kept advised of -- but nothing that seemed to make a difference in what we were doing.

JAMES F. LEONARD
Publications Procurement Officer

Ambassador James F. Leonard was born in Pennsylvania in 1920. He received a bachelor's degree from Princeton University. He served in the U.S. Army from 1942-1946 and entered the Foreign Service in 1946. His career included positions in Syria, the Soviet Union, France, China (Taiwan), New York (the United Nations), and Washington, DC. Ambassador Leonard was interviewed by Warren Unna on March 10, 1993.

Q: Then, you went on to Moscow. Since much later in your career you did a lot of negotiating with the Soviets, how much baptism did you get in this first exposure? You'd already studied the Russian language.

LEONARD: We'd studied Russian, yes. The Department gave me first the language training, six months, then nine months at Harvard. Though I had a rudimentary knowledge of the language. I was lucky, I got a job there which called for me to be out on the street a great deal. It was buying books for the Library of Congress because there was no normal exchange of published literature between the US and the Soviet Union at that time and the people back here were very thirsty for whatever was coming out. I'd just go out to all the book stores and buy stacks of books and bring them back, wrap them in brown paper and ship them back to the US. In that way I was able to get some contact with Russians because this was a few months after the death of Stalin in the summer of 1953. The Russian people were terrified of foreign contacts. It was very difficult to have any real sort of relations with anybody other than the diplomatic corps and a few correspondents.

Q: This was the time that Beria ...?

LEONARD: He was arrested actually just a month or so before we got there. It was a dramatic incident which we didn't see. The tanks apparently drove down the main boulevards in front of the Embassy building. The people that saw them didn't know what it was and found out the next day that the tanks were on their way to surround various residences and take him away. In fact to this day it's not really known whether he was killed on the spot or was simply imprisoned and executed later.

Q: And you as part of the Embassy were pretty much in the dark on this?

LEONARD: Yes. The Embassy was really very isolated.

Q: Who was Ambassador then?

LEONARD: Ambassador Bohlen. Chester Bohlen.

Q: And through the Library of Congress book acquisition did you get any familiarity on how to deal with the Russians as you later had to do?

LEONARD: Well, a little bit. Although I must say it was a completely different game many years later when I went to Geneva and was dealing with them face to face on issues of substance. I think in my two years in Moscow I went possibly twice to the Foreign Ministry to go along and take notes when some more senior officer was making a demarche. But our relations were so frosty. The Ambassador had I think meaningful contacts, discussions with the Foreign Ministry and even with I think it was ...

Q: Molotov, was it?

LEONARD: Molotov. But Gromyko replaced him about that time. I guess it was still Molotov when we arrived. But more junior officers had very little dealings of any sorts with any Russians.

Q: Did you get clued in from the top, from the ambassador, or at least ...?

LEONARD: Yes, he was very good. He would discuss problems and our task really was more that of trying to decipher what was going on from the press. In fact, not I but some of the people in the political section did a pretty good job of figuring out that there was a power struggle underway. It turned out to be Malenkov on one side and Khrushchev on the other. A struggle which eventually Khrushchev won.

Q: But Malenkov won on the first ...?

LEONARD: Malenkov was on top to start with.

Q: Wasn't this the period when Malenkov said we were preparing an H-bomb, or the tests began on this?

LEONARD: The H-bomb had already been detonated by that time, their H-bomb. The thing that Malenkov did, which caught everybody's attention was to make a speech which was then reproduced in the paper, that a nuclear war would mean the end of civilization, or the world, or such. He said the first sober thing about the consequences of nuclear weapons that any Russian or any Soviet had ever been known to say, and it was used against him, it appeared by Khrushchev. He was made to seem afraid of the American nuclear weapons in the controversies that went on then. In effect the Soviets repudiated his statement, but it was very interesting that you did begin to see some discussion already in '53 about nuclear weapons, and I remember one of the officers in the political section saying to me that he thought the Soviets really were sincere about wanting some sort of arms control. It didn't happen for quite a while longer, but you could see a bit of intellectual ferment reflected in the press.

Q: So this was your first taste of later arms control, even though you were not part of it at this time?

LEONARD: Yes.

Q: Now, this was Eisenhower's presidency?

LEONARD: This was Eisenhower's.

Q: Eisenhower's and Dulles's? Was the U2 part of your period or not, when that was shot down?

LEONARD: No, that was 1960. Exactly where was I then, I don't know. Either in Taiwan or on home leave.

Q: What about the UN proposals to share nuclear matters. Was that earlier then?

LEONARD: That was being prepared in Washington, although I had no part in that. In that period, Eisenhower, as we know now, was much more uneasy about nuclear weapons than he let on, and so was Dulles. In fact Gerry Smith has dug up some material on Dulles's thinking of that period which indicates that Dulles was not all that happy with massive retaliation, etc. But what it came down to was the proposal, I think it was in 1957, for Atoms for Peace. Arms control was gestating in this period. There were the beginnings of talks but they focused on the problems of Europe, Berlin, Germany, you know, "would some sort of German reunification be permitted?" and things of that sort, because this is the period when in the West we were beginning to crystallize NATO, and consider German rearmament. And that, believe me, got the Russians' attention when we began talking about rearming the Germans.

JOSEPH WALTER NEUBERT
Political/General Services Officer
Moscow (1953-1956)

Mr. Neubert was born in Montana. He attended Yale University and served in the US Army in World War II. Entering the Foreign Service in 1947, Mr. Neubert served as Political and Economic Officer in Yugoslavia and Tunisia. Following Russian language studies at the Foreign Service Institute in Washington, Mr. Neubert was posted to Moscow, Soviet Union, where he served as Political and General Services Officer. From Moscow he was assigned to Tel Aviv as Political Officer, where he served during the 1957 Arab-Israeli War. This Oral History is a self interview, done in 2007.

NEUBERT: There isn't any need to dwell upon Russian language training, first in Washington and then in New York. There are those happy folk who find learning a new language a lark. I'm not one of them. I find it tedious and difficult. But, in the end, I learned enough Russian to be fascinated by going to the U.S.S.R. with some confidence I could communicate with the natives.

After a bit of home leave, I left Seattle on July 4, 1953 en route to Moscow via London. The date provided me with an unexpected bonus. The United Airlines Boeing Stratocruiser I was on had only one passenger to Chicago. Me. In those easy days before terrorism, the captain invited me to ride the co-pilot's seat. And, on a beautiful cloudless day, I watched the glorious West unfold.

In New York, there was excitement of a different kind. On July 5, again in a Pan Am Stratocruiser, we left Idlewild for London. The day was very hot and the captain had elected full fuel and no stop at Shannon. Even though there were only six passengers, he barely bounced off the end of the runway (the outside temperature was over 100 F.) We skimmed out over the bay watching fishermen in boats duck and seeing sheets of spray kicked up by the propeller wash. Then, finally, we climbed away -- to London. The captain had the grace to come back later and say he had misjudged the temperature equation. It is hard to believe this sort of thing in this day of excessively powered jets. No wonder they no longer care what your luggage weighs!

I spent ten days in England becoming, of all things, a spy. At least, I am sure, in Soviet eyes. I was escorted around England and told what various factories made and how to identify them. Do you know that you can tell how much electricity a power line carries? You can, just by looking at it. Or what blue smoke coming from a factory chimney means? You can.

Anyway, I mostly enjoyed the ten days because of the country homes we stayed at. Most, it seemed, were built by Wren and were absolutely delightful. British companies may have had their faults but providing places for guests to stay was not one of them. Not the least of my pleasures was the company of a British brigadier who was later a good friend in Moscow.

In Helsinki, I joined up with Meg and Coby Swank (Coby was later Ambassador to Cambodia) for the train trip to Moscow. We paused for two days in Leningrad and stayed at the Astoria Hotel (both city and hotel later became very well known to me). Then we went on to Moscow in the creaking old prewar Wagon-Lits cars still used on that Helsinki Moscow route. But they are very comfortable, with a lavatory between each two compartments. More than can be said for the modern Red Arrow between Moscow and Leningrad. We all enjoyed our first introduction to the city founded by Peter I and our visits to the Hermitage Museum. I decided then that this had to be the best city in Russia and I believe it even more now, having lived there for the past three years.

The Embassy in Moscow was then (July 1953) the same one that recently burned. But then it was a brand-new converted apartment house into which the Embassy was just completing its move from the former Embassy on Mokhovaya Street, across from the Kremlin, next door to the National Hotel. It all seemed spacious and nicely furnished.

Both Coby Swank and I had been assigned as "political officers." But, when we were ushered in to meet Ambassador Charles Bohlen, it became apparent that these titles had little meaning. Bohlen, clad as usual in flannel "bags" and sport jacket, informed us that Coby would be the administrative officer and I the general services officer (housekeeper). He added, grinning, "Your offices are on the first floor. If you never see me there, it means you're doing a good job." We never saw him -- but we were admittedly deflated as we left his friendly presence.

As General Services Officer (or housekeeper), I had some sixty Russians working for me, only one of whom spoke any English. The rest were carpenters, mechanics, painters, plumbers, laborers, what have you. Two things happened immediately -- I changed the sign on my door to read "Genial Services" and, secondly, I set out to work with my "team." I won't say we were totally successful. We tried to keep people (including Mrs. Bohlen) happy by doing what we could. And, I think, by and large, we succeeded.

There were, of course, some people who could not be kept happy. Like the Air Force Attaché (departing) who called up in a rage one day because we had dismantled his daughter's bicycle to be shipped home. Did we realize it would cost him money to have it reassembled in the U.S.? We put it back together for him -- forget the U.S. taxpayer.

I suppose (in retrospect) the most amusing job I had as GSO was washing the rugs in the main salon at Spaso House. There were, at that time, two Belgian patterned rugs under the awesome main chandelier. After fruitless negotiations with the city organization for dealing with foreign embassies we finally decided it was necessary to do it ourselves. So I and half a dozen Soviet employees got down and washed them ourselves. I can't say our results were spectacular. But I appreciated them twenty years later when one of those rugs turned up as the main rug in the salon of the Residence in Leningrad.

There were other amusing aspects to the job of GSO in Moscow. For one thing, we still had to care for "American House," a barn-like brick structure down on the river. There, the male single staff, military and state, lived. And they had their "bar" -- a large and handsome area -- and their quarters. Their quarters were interesting because they were in what was formerly a morgue. There was many a joke about this, but it was true. During the war, Ambassador Averell Harriman had insisted that the Soviets provide quarters for the American military mission. Eventually, these were the quarters provided -- and converted. A former morgue.

It was, in fact, the best bar in town -- with dances and all. The first orchestra (of Embassy employees) was called the "Dremlin Krows." This eventually was complained about and (the same orchestra) became known as "Joe Commode and his Four Flushers."

My second year in Moscow involved being in the political section. This made life much easier. I received all the local press at my door every morning at eight, went back to bed, read it, then went to the office at noon to dictate the "Daily Press Telegrams." After that, my days were my own. That is to say that I had to do a normal day's work, no matter how long it took.

Still, during this last year, there was some fun. For example, I was at a reception where Khrushchev, Malenkov, and Mikoyan were present. Like every other junior Embassy officer in town, I was breathing down their necks. Suddenly, as I was standing behind Mikoyan, he stepped backwards, and nearly broke my instep with his heel. He had the grace to turn and apologize.

Again, at the American July 4 Reception in 1955, I saw Marshall Zhukov standing grimly alone, with all his medals. I sent up and introduced myself and referred to the presence of an American Chess Team. I asked him if he played chess. He eyed me coldly. "No," he said. I said I was surprised, that from reading Russian novels I assumed all Russian military officers played chess.

Zhukov smiled (sort of) and said that I had been reading the wrong authors. He added, "If you give me my choice between officers who play chess and officers who have never heard of the game, I will take the latter. Under conditions of modern warfare, you must decide quickly, not think -- and chess players always want to think.”

It was during this year that Senator Ellender came to Moscow. Just why was never very clear. He was on a boondoggle involving U.S. aid programs of one kind or another. He had a meeting with the Embassy officers at which he spoke of the evils of aid programs to people who were not very friendly. When reminded, gently, that we had no aid programs to the Soviet Union, he ignored the point and went right on. Well. After that, he wanted to go out and visit a collective farm. For lack of anyone else, I was told off to go as his interpreter. Ha! All I knew of collective farms was what I had read in the press. That, I decided, was enough. So I went. But, it turned out, he didn't want to learn about collective farms; he wanted to tell the Russians about farming in Louisiana. Quite another kettle of fish! I learned a lot about farm terminology and Louisiana that afternoon-- to my eternal embarrassment as the Foreign Office types helped me become an interpreter. Happily, “compost” was still “kompost.”

A day or two later, Ellender went to the Kremlin to meet (for whatever reason) with Mikoyan, the eternal Minister of Foreign Trade. For some reason Mikoyan deprecated “unemployment” in the U.S. and Ellender, quite sensibly, observed that in the U.S.S.R. they had a great deal of “structural unemployment,” that is, they paid people to do little or nothing. Mikoyan got red in the face and, pounding the eternal green baize table, said, “There is no unemployment in the Soviet Union, as God is my witness -- although, of course, I don't believe in God.” That broke up the meeting.

Earlier that year, I had had, at a much lower level, another interesting encounter with the Soviet bureaucracy. The Catholic priest resident in Moscow, Father George Bissonette, had been declared “persona non grata” and told to go home. He left his Chevrolet in my custody. So I set out to get a driver's license. This was not simple. In those days, the Embassy required that any Embassy officer driving in the Soviet Union should -- indeed, must -- have a Soviet driver's license. To get one was not easy, even though the Soviets had just come to recognize that not all chauffeurs were professionals and, therefore, had to be auto mechanics as well as drivers.

A word of explanation is perhaps in order. Until 1954 or so, all drivers in the U.S.S.R. were “professionals,” driving state vehicles. About 1954 a few “lucky” Russians began to get cars of their own. Was it reasonable to insist that those too should be mechanics capable of maintaining their own vehicles mechanically? Obviously not, since the first people in the Soviet Union to have private cars were party big-wigs and their wives. So the laws were changed. A new category called “amateur chauffeur” was introduced. To get a license as an “amateur chauffeur,” it was only necessary to take an examination on “the rules of the road,” not on carburetors, etc.

I applied for a license under the new regulations, first having obtained and memorized the “Rules of the Road.” And it was well I had done so. The examination was individual. I sat across a “sand table” from three steely-eyed inspectors, chief of whom was a tight-lipped woman. We ran through all the hypothetical traffic situations on the “sand table.” Then went on to such questions as “Under what eleven conditions may you not back up?” Fortunately, having memorized the book, I could answer such otherwise unanswerable questions. Finally, however, when I began to feel all was well, the examiners stumped me.

The question, posed by the Dragon Lady, was, “You are stalled on a level railroad crossing. What do you do?” My first reaction was instantaneous, “That’s not in the book.” She smiled acidly, “Even so, what do you do?” I asked, “Which direction will the train come from?” She said she couldn’t say. I said I would put the car in reverse (the lowest gear) and grind it off on the battery. She refused that. I said I would get out, flip a coin to decide whence the next train, and run down the track to try and flag it down.

All to no avail. She informed me I had failed the examination and added that I could come back and do it all again in thirty days. I was not terribly amused and told her the least she could do was tell me the answer to her unauthorized question. She told me I should, under the postulated circumstances, honk the horn three times, and railroad workers would appear and remove the car from the tracks. I’m sure I looked astonished. I said, “But, what if there are no railway workers?” She smiled, sweetly this time, “In the Soviet Union, there are always, railway workers.” And, to give her due credit, I’m sure there are.

Anyway, a month later, I returned to listen to one or two perfunctory questions, and my “amateur chauffeur” license was granted with no further ado. Even the “road test” consisted of driving around the block.

My involvement with Father Bissonette led me to other adventures, prior to his enforced departure. He, obviously, was celibate and I was a bachelor. We spent a certain amount of time having dinner together, playing chess together, and so on. Whether because of our occasional get-togethers or other reasons, his chauffeur and my housekeeper (both Soviets) fell in with each other, and one day my housekeeper announced she had to go off on maternity leave. As one can imagine, I was the butt of a good deal of ribbing, but it was clear where paternity lay. Anyway, she finally left and I asked for a temporary replacement.

After a bit, the Soviet authorities provided me with a grossly fat woman, obviously fresh from the farm, but apparently good-natured. I took her on (partly because I was sure no one else would be offered). Soon, it was born in upon me that there is indeed such a thing as the “envelope” within which people prefer to operate. I am one of those people who prefers generally a distance of three to four feet between me and others. My new housekeeper accepted the “three to four” but substituted inches for feet. And she ate garlic. And she had strong body odor -- mostly stale perspiration. And I couldn’t stand it!

What emerged each morning was indeed a comedy. As a bachelor, I had to give her marching orders for the day. But, as I talked, she got closer and closer, until I was bouncing off her ample “front porch” and trying to evade the garlic. It got so that I would back around the dining room table-pulling out the chairs to create obstacles -- as I ticked off the order of the day.

The whole thing ended rather unfortunately. I came home one evening about five to take a shower before a reception at the Ambassador’s residence. As I was standing naked in my bedroom, about to put on my robe to go shower, she trotted in for some reason or other and I told her -- in mean Russian -- to get lost. She flounced out and I never saw her again. But the Embassy did get a note complaining that I had used abusive language to my housekeeper. Which I had. We never answered the note. And, happily, my regular housekeeper shortly returned.

In the period after I obtained a driver's license I went off on various excursions about the Soviet Union. One of these took me and some of my friends to Kharkov, Poltava, and Kiev-and back. This was instructive for a variety of reasons. On the way Kharkov from Moscow -- a distance of perhaps 600 kilometers -- we met ten vehicles coming toward us and passed twelve going in the same direction. We also encountered one gasoline station. The "year of the automobile" was not yet upon the Soviet Union. Needless to say, the road was rough two-lane macadam all the way.

The road from Kharkov to Poltava and Kiev was no better. Poltava was fascinating because of the museum dedicated to Peter the First's defeat of the Swedes in 1709. But the hotel (allegedly Intourist) was less amusing. It was a two story structure left over from before the war. The rooms were commodious and each had a sink and bathtub. But the toilet facilities were something else again. There was, to be sure, a "ladies" and "gents." But the "gents," at least, had not been cleaned in weeks and none of the plumbing was working. To enter was to enter the Augean stables. Incredible! I, at least, elected to try the back courtyard. But so had everyone else, so this was no improvement. I gathered, without directly inquiring, that the "ladies" was no better. So we hastened on to Kiev.

I should mention, in passing, that the most common question asked us in Poltava, once folk knew we were Americans, was "Lucky Strike?" meaning, "Do you have a Lucky Strike?" All of the townspeople remembered the short-lived U.S. air base at Poltava in 1944 and remembered American cigarettes.

In Kiev we had a wonderful time. The architecture and the people seemed warmer than in Moscow. Perhaps simply because they were more southern. It started when we went up to the rooms and, bags delivered, I offered the bell-boy a tip. He looked outraged and refused. I stepped back into the room. He followed and grinned. "That was just for the 'duty' woman at the key desk." He fidgeted, "I can always use more money. Can't we all?" So he accepted a tip. And was our good friend and consultant thereafter.

The next morning I discovered we had a flat tire. So I changed tires and took the car out to a garage to have the flat fixed. I had to return the next day. I hired a taxi. As we sped -- and I mean sped -- along the rough streets I asked him if he was a Communist. He almost broke up (himself and us) as he guffawed over that. Then he calmed down enough to say, "Why should I be a Communist? They think that people's arms are made to push things away. In fact, they are made to bring things to you." This sounds perhaps innocuous. But he was demonstrating with his arms -- off the wheel -- as we sped along. So I am delighted he and I survived his political lecture. With the point of which, incidentally, I agree. He had it in a nutshell. You can't change human nature. Even the "new Soviet man," I suspect, very much resembles the "old non-Soviet man."

One of the aspects of driving around the Soviet countryside in those days was that you were always followed by KGB vehicles, a fact difficult to hide since there usually were no other vehicles for miles around. I was younger and gayer in those days, and even Chevrolets had more get up and go than Volgas (they still have) so I could resist from time to time stepping it up and watch the pursuing Volga or Volgas drop back, and vanish. Then we would turn off, stop, and have a picnic lunch, and finally wave to the Volgas as they sped painfully past. And, of course, we waved to them again as we went on after lunch. And they picked up the fresh scent. Just what it was they thought we were up to never became clear. But, perhaps it was as much a holiday for them as for us, so perhaps it all came out even.

Sometimes the business of being followed became ridiculous. Once, the Agricultural Attaché, my good friend Horace Davis, and I were making our way south of Kiev toward Odessa, across the “breadbasket” of the Soviet Union. We were not following usual roads but we were in “open” areas. Every once in a while we would stop and finger the wheat crop -- not that I knew anything about wheat, ready or unready. Then we would eat. The funny thing was that in all this emptiness -- and it was empty -- there were one sedan, two jeeps, and one motor cycle with sidecar behind us. About two hundred yards behind us. A flat plain. Nothing for miles. Then this oddly spaced caravan. We had field glasses. They had field glasses. I watched them from time to time as they watched us from time to time. We had lunch. I was never able to observe that they did. Supermen, no doubt.

We almost got our comeuppance. I was driving. Suddenly there was a hole in the road. I swerved but a rear tire dropped in. We stopped. There was nothing sinister in all this. There was a row of holes, obviously for a new fence. One was in the middle of what passed for a road. But there we were. Stuck.

The reaction of our four escorts was interesting. Would they come to help us? Scarcely. They stopped and watched with field glasses. I hope they learned something.

First, Horace and I opened the trunk and got out two iced cans of beer. Then we sat in the shade of the car and drank the beer while we considered the problem. We rapidly concluded that there was no problem -- so we had another beer. After that we decided we might as well move on, so I got out the jack and jacked up the immersed wheel and stepped back while Horace drove the car off onto level ground. We put away the jack, opened another beer, and went on our way, no thanks to the KGB.

Our travels that day in the direction of Odessa became more complicated. We kept running into military types posted at crossroads, who kept pushing us eastward. Finally, about 10 P.M., we arrived at Drevoi Rog, a far cry from Odessa. But there we were and, curiously enough, they had a room for us at the station hotel. (Did they know something we didn't?)

The room was fine, but it had no bath. We insisted on bathing. Fine, but this was possible only two nights a week and this was not one of them. I got on my high horse and insisted on a bath. After a great deal of hoo-hah, it was agreed that we could bathe. And (I can't speak for Horace) it turned out to be a heart-warming experience. I went first down to the basement where an elderly man had a wood-fire under a boiler and, in the adjoining room, there was a large, old fashioned bathtub. The tub was filled -- no nonsense -- by an overhead pipe from the boiler. The attendant added cold water to my taste. Then I got in and, with touching politeness, he asked if I would like him to scrub my back. I said yes, and he washed me and helped me dry off and could not have been pleasanter. When I left, I tried to offer him money, but he refused. He did not, however, complain when I said I had no further use for the bar of soap I had brought and left it beside the tub.

ROBERT R. BOWIE
Policy Planning Staff: U.S. View of Soviet Union: Solarium Exercise
Washington, DC (1953-1957)

A University Professor and senior level Public Servant, Dr. Bowie was educated at Princeton and Harvard Universities. He practiced law in Baltimore before entering the US Army, where he served from 1942 to 1946. After the end of World War II he served in Germany as Deputy Military Governor. His service with the US government included Deputy Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, Counselor of the Department of State and Director of Policy Planning for the State Department. He was also Professor at Harvard University. Dr. Bowie was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1988.

Q: Could we look now at a few of the areas where you obviously were very much involved. How did you and the policy planning staff view the Soviet Union in the period you were there?

BOWIE: Well, as you may remember, Stalin died almost immediately after Eisenhower took office. I think it was March, wasn't it, '53? And in a month or so, Eisenhower decided he would have a major exercise to consider what ought to be the general policy towards the Soviet Union. And he started something called the Solarium Exercise. This was based on the notion of having three teams, each of about five or six, who would be given a particular approach to the Soviet Union and would make the best case they could for it, analyzing the purposes of the Soviet Union and what our interests were, what our means of influencing it were. And one of these teams, by the way, was headed by George Kennan.

Q: So I've often heard that Dulles sort of turned his back, I mean dismissed Kennan out of hand?

BOWIE: Well, there was certainly not a good feeling between them because there had been some sort of a misunderstanding. I think shortly after the Administration took office George, who had been--I think he'd been at the War College--I believe he went out and made a public speech which was highly critical, essentially, of views which he attributed to Dulles. And Dulles took this amiss and I think the result was that he simply let Kennan go. But some of the people on these task forces were brought in from outside the government, and so Kennan actually was asked to head the team which was given the task of making the case for containment. And then there were two others. It's not worth getting into those. But they were different ways of dealing with the USSR [Union of Soviet Socialist Republics], including roll-back.

Q: Roll-back?

BOWIE: This was the idea that we would pressure the Soviets to force them to retract their power, particularly in Eastern Europe, which was an idea which had been talked about in the campaign.

These teams had about three or four weeks to prepare the material, then there was a full presentation before members of the Cabinet and before the assistant secretaries and the Planning Board, almost all the top military officers and a number of other people. And at the end of it the President made his own statement.

Q: The President was at the presentation?

BOWIE: Oh, yes. It was principally for him and the members of the NSC. At a meeting in Princeton a couple of weeks ago for the 100th anniversary of Dulles' birth, which Kennan once more repeated what I had heard him say before, that at the end Eisenhower made an extemporaneous summary of his reactions. Kennan said it showed that he had no peer in the room, that he really had a grasp of the subject which was outstanding. And from George that's quite a high compliment.

In any event, this was the first effort to take a look at Soviet policy, and on the basis of those reports, there was discussion in the NSC. Then we prepared a paper in the NSC Planning Board which was later approved in the NSC which was the First National Strategy Paper (NSC 162/2). Well, by chance in preparing for this conference at Princeton a couple of weeks ago, I went over some of these documents which have been declassified and I reread 162/2 which was prepared in October 1953 - it was the document that took account of this Solarium exercise and was the first so-called National Security Strategy Paper or something of that order. And it was essentially a presentation of our broader set of purposes but also in particular our approach to the Soviet Union. And I think reading it over it was a pretty balanced approach. Essentially it took the view that the Soviet Union was not at all likely to launch any aggressive war in Europe, that it had very substantial military capabilities but it would try to use them politically to extend its influence; that it was engaged in trying broadly to extend its influence wherever it could; that it was on the whole cautious in its pursuit of that purpose but nevertheless unflagging; that its control of the satellites at that point was firm and was not likely to be disrupted because of its military capability to put down any uprisings.

With respect to China, it took the view that its relation with the USSR then was close and cooperative but that over time it seemed unlikely that this would be able to persist, that there were almost sure to be cleavages because of the somewhat different interests of the Soviet Union and China, and that it was quite likely that over time there would be a fissure in that relationship. Not predicting any time, but simply taking the view that it was not forever a solid kind of relationship.

And then the general approach, as I said, stressed our interest in trying to promote development in the developing world, our interest in trying to promote European integration, the importance of NATO as a basis of containment. Toward the USSR, I would say that in general the paper carried forward the basic concept of containment as formulated in the Truman Administration but modified the military strategy to take account of the growing nuclear capability, and to incorporate the "New Look".

I think looking back that it was a pretty balanced appraisal and not extreme or very doctrinaire.

Q: The historians are always revising themselves, looking back on it, but at the time were there any opportunities that maybe we missed of defusing the Cold War? Or do you think that was in the cards in those days?

BOWIE: I don't think there were any missed opportunities myself. But of course as you say, trying to construct alternative theories of history, it's all speculation. You remember an early claim about a lost opportunity in 1952 when the Soviets sent a note to the Truman Administration in which they seemed to say, why don't we discuss the unification of Germany and neutralization of Germany and so on. And this was entirely out of line with the general Western effort to construct Europe that included Germany and the Truman Administration didn't pursue it. Some, including some German historians, treat this as a lost opportunity. I don't think so myself. I don't think at that point the Soviet Union dared to liquidate East Germany. I think what they were trying to do was to start a discussion which they hoped would derail the efforts to create a more unified Europe and NATO, and which didn't necessarily require that they pursue it, if they could get a discussion going which would create tensions and turmoil in Germany itself. Because at that time Schumacher you remember, and his party, was strongly opposed to the integration of Germany into the European Community and into NATO. And I'm sure they thought--

Q: Schumacher was the Socialist--

BOWIE: He was the leader of the SPD. And I can't remember exactly, he died relatively early on, but his party continued the same policy until '58.

Well, my own feeling is that after the death of Stalin the Soviet leaders were very much caught up in their own turmoil about who was to predominate, who was to be the leader. They began with collective leadership, and you remember they put Malenkov in charge to start with, but it was perfectly clear from what went on later that there was constant turmoil among them, and struggle to see who would prevail until Khrushchev took over in about '56. But you remember they shot Beria very early on because he was obviously trying to use the Secret Police as a means of taking charge. They went long for a while under Malenkov, then they demoted him, put in Bulganin, who was nominally in charge at the time of the Summit meeting in '55 in Geneva. But at that meeting while Bulganin was the spokesman, Khrushchev, who was also there, was very self-confident and pretty clearly the principal member of the delegation, although he was not nominally so. About a year later he essentially asserted his authority and, you'll remember, put down the so-called anti-party plot in which some of the others had attempted to oust him.

Our view then was that during that period the Soviets were not in any position to take any explicit initiatives of any major sort. They were interested in keeping things calm, not letting relations with the West get tense, so they conducted a sort of peace initiative. And as a part of that, after NATO finally took in the Germans in '55, they agreed to the Austrian state treaty which had been held up by them for 10 years.

In short, my feeling was that through '56 the Soviets were not in a position, just because the leadership hadn't yet been settled, to make any major changes in the ongoing policy. What they did do was try, as I said, to remove a certain number of lesser disputes or frictions inherited from

Stalin, including such things as the Austrian state treaty. But I don't think they were in a position to make a major change. The West had various meetings with them including one, the Foreign Ministers meeting, in January and February of '54--

Q: Berlin.

BOWIE: Berlin, in which we discussed the whole question of German unification and the situation in Europe. And it was very clear that Molotov was simply not prepared to make any major change which would possibly imperil the continuance of Eastern Germany. Various proposals were made by him that there be some sort of confederation between the East Germans and the West Germans but they were clearly not going to go on and make decisions about whether or not you had elections and how and so on. It was perfectly clear that East Germany wasn't going to commit suicide and these were all just devices for trying to create discord in the West. But fortunately there was a unified view across the board, the French and the British and ourselves, and also the Germans under Adenauer, that we shouldn't be sucked into something that was a mirage.

So I repeat, certainly we didn't think at the time that there was any opportunity that we missed and on the basis of hindsight, trying to reflect on it, I don't see any.

Q: Did you have on your policy planning staff somebody sort of looking for signals? I mean, was the thought that we don't want to miss this if it comes up but just to have somebody sort of you in-house dove or something like that?

BOWIE: Didn't have anybody explicitly designated for that purpose, but we were all constantly reappraising, you know, what was the situation vis-a-vis the Soviet Union, what were the Soviet purposes and whether or not there were changes. It was recognized that there were certain changes in the Soviet Union after Stalin, particularly after Khrushchev came into power there was a loosening up and so on. And certainly there was an end to the use of purges in the way in which Stalin had done. Except for the shooting of Beria, when they decided to demote one of the leaders, as in the case of Malenkov, they sent him off to a minor job.

BOWIE: But he continued to live and make his way. And the same was true even when they came later on to toss out Khrushchev. As a matter of fact, I think Khrushchev, after he has been demoted, removed as the head of the government and the party, says that perhaps his major contribution to the Soviet Union was that he had helped create an atmosphere in which a leader could be demoted and still be allowed to live and to simply retire. And I think that's true, that was a very profound change in the whole political culture in the Soviet Union which, you know, was a real milestone. And they haven't gone back on that. They're not essentially engaged in anything remotely like Stalin's way of governing.

Q: Was the NSC involved, not really the NSC, the policy planning staff, involved in sort of crisis management? Let's say when there were the riots in East Berlin and the Hungarian Revolution?

BOWIE: Well, as I indicated, as head of the policy planning staff I was free to attend any meeting I wanted, and so when meetings were held about Hungary, obviously I took part. I can't really say that the Policy Planning Staff, as such, made some unique contribution to these kinds of things, but we tried--the Hungary case was terribly frustrating because the truth was we didn't see how we could do anything useful at that point to significantly change what was going on.

Q: Right from the beginning this was almost self-understood?

BOWIE: Pretty much I think. I think there were some people in the government who sort of thought--

Q: This is the Hungarian Revolution of 1956.

BOWIE: 1956, yes. And there were some people I think who felt that we could at least do things which were more like gestures, like dropping supplies and things like that. But I think that Eisenhower and Dulles thought that those kinds of gestures might even make the Hungarians think that we were going to do more than we were and that they were therefore ill advised because they might just help cause people to sacrifice themselves under a misapprehension of the degree to which we were going to help. And I think realistically the conclusion was that if you tried to intervene you risked a third world war because of the fact that the control of the Soviet Empire at that time was seen as so vital to their own interests. And if it appeared that the West was really trying to undermine that control in a forceful way, it could produce the kind of a conflict that nobody wanted.

Q: Did Dulles sort of acknowledge that he was having to sort of backtrack on some of the rhetoric? You know, there was talk about rolling back Eastern Europe and he--

BOWIE: I think the truth is that that had been buried at the time of the Solarium Exercise in '53. As I said, one of the task forces in that exercise was given the job of making the best case for essentially trying to roll back Soviet power. And in the discussions of the results of those presentations, and in NSC 162/2, that was simply not pursued. And therefore, to tell the truth, I don't think it was ever a live possibility under Eisenhower, and I think part of his purpose in the Solarium Exercise was to make sure that everybody understood that the basic policy was containment and not roll-back. And of course that was underscored with the riots in East Berlin in June 1953 when there was rioting and the West simply did not try to intervene, for the same reason, which as I said, later on caused people not to think it wise to try to intervene in Hungary. So I don't really think by the time of Hungary that this was thought of at all as a live possibility.

Let me say this. I don't think that meant that people assumed that control by the Soviet Union of Eastern Europe was forever, but I think that what they recognized was that it would have to be domestic or internal forces and historical forces and the ferment within the system over quite a long time which would ultimately probably change the relationship between Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. So it wasn't assumed that this was going to be the status quo forever, but it was certainly recognized that it was not going to be changed by anything we did specifically directed to that end and was certainly not going to change in any short time.

Washington, DC (1955-1957)

Deputy Chief of Mission
Moscow (1967-1969)

Ambassador Emory C. Swank was born in 1914 and raised in Brunswick, Maryland. His career in the Foreign Service included positions in China, the Soviet Union, and Romania, and an ambassadorship to Cambodia. Ambassador Swank was interviewed by Henry Precht in January and February, 1988.

Q: Tell us about your first tour in Moscow. As I recall, Stalin had died in the spring of 1953. It must have been an exciting period.

SWANK: Indeed so. The political process had congealed under Stalin, and we were witness to both a relentless struggle for power among his successors and a gradually unfolding transition to new policies. The best account of this period is by Charles E. Bohlen, Witness to History 1929-1969, who was the U.S. Ambassador. Chip Bohlen was a warm and vigorous man, a gifted briefer and conversationalist, and he took a particular interest in young officers. Following the process of the “thaw” was fascinating. A major effort was made to assure the Soviet people that larger resources would be allocated to producing consumer goods. Political prisoners were quietly released from prison camps -- the Gulag Archipelago Solzhenitsyn later wrote about so eloquently. Externally, the new leaders moved out of the isolation of Stalin’s years. They invited Nehru and others to Moscow, repaired ties with Yugoslavia, and made the first arms sales outside the bloc to Syria and Egypt. In a remarkable speech before he lost out in the struggle for power to Khrushchev and Bulganin, Georgi Malenkov, who had been considered Stalin’s heir apparent, spoke of nuclear war as a conflict no one could win. Negotiations with the West over Germany and Austria were resumed. This period marked the first post-war “detente,” evoked by the media as “The Spirit of Geneva,” where the leaders of the USSR, the U.S., Britain and France met for summit talks in the summer of 1955.

A memorable precursor of that meeting occurred in Moscow on July 4, 1955. In an unprecedented gesture of cordiality, the entire Soviet Politburo turned up en masse at Spaso House, the American residence, to help celebrate Independence Day. As protocol officer for the event, I recall being increasingly intrigued as the evidence mounted in the form of phone calls from the Foreign Ministry that “the Russians were coming.” U.S. officials had become accustomed to consider themselves fortunate when a Deputy Foreign Minister such as Andrei Gromyko appeared. No more striking manifestation of the changes occurring in Soviet policies could have been devised.

Q: Did you enjoy your tour in Moscow?

SWANK: Those of us who spoke the language found Moscow exciting. But life was full of hardships, even for diplomats with privileged access to a country dacha, food imports, and occasional tickets to opera, the ballet, and the theater. We lived in cramped, poorly constructed apartments. Soviet personnel and listening devices in the walls spied on us. For eight months of the year markets contained only cabbages and potatoes. Cuts of meat were either unavailable or unrecognizable. Winters were long and dreary. The Soviet people were sullen and generally fearful of foreigners. If not fearful, we immediately suspected them of being agents. Soviet media, literature, and art parroted the Party line. Foreigners were under round-the-clock surveillance.

As a consequence, we experienced an exhilarating feeling of liberation when we left the country. West Berlin, itself only an island in a Soviet sea, seemed to us paradise after six months in Moscow. Visitors to the U.S.S.R. still experience this uplift on departure. I accompanied a group of American business executives to the Soviet Union on a two-week visit in 1983. When our Finn Air flight left Moscow, they breathed a sigh of collective relief. It was as though a blanket of hostile suspicion and surveillance had been lifted.

Q: In addition to attendance of Politburo members at the July reception in 1955, were there other indications in your relationships with the Russians that a new era had begun? Do you recall other significant events?

SWANK: Let me make the point that few of us mistook the “thaw” for genuine friendship with the West. Soviet actions reflected the conviction of the new leaders that the country could exploit its potential as a great power only by moving out of Stalinist isolation. In unguarded moments they even articulated this motivation, as when Khrushchev announced to a startled U.S.: “We will bury you!”

My following assignment was as an analyst (1955-1957) in State’s Division of Research and Intelligence for the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. Its chief was Boris Klosson, a civil servant (later an FSO) specializing in the Soviet field, and my immediate boss was Frank Siscoe, Chief of the External Branch. Because of the recent summit and innovations in Soviet behavior, there was intense high-level interest in Soviet affairs. Klosson briefed Secretary Dulles weekly on Soviet developments. The Director of CIA was Allan Dulles, John Foster’s brother, and this amity at the top was reflected in close working relationships between State and CIA personnel. My job in State was to write about the accelerating Soviet economic and military aid “offensive” and Soviet efforts to coordinate and develop the economies of the Warsaw Pact nations. I also served as a staffer of the Watch Committee, an interagency group in the Pentagon which had access to all the intelligence available to the U.S. on the U.S.S.R. The Committee produced a highly classified weekly document circulated to the heads of concerned departments and agencies in which it assessed Soviet capabilities and intentions in crises that could lead to involvement of U.S. forces. The period was rife with crises, including the British-French-Israeli invasion of Egypt and the Soviet invasion of Hungary.

I was promoted to Chief of the External Branch in 1957 and anticipated spending another year or two in Washington. I enjoyed being privy to special intelligence (although since retirement I have found that one can be remarkably well informed with access to the multiple unclassified sources that are available), and I developed a much crisper writing style and improved analytical skills on the job.

Q: What was your opinion at that time of the analytical strengths of the American research and intelligence establishment?

SWANK: The analyses of Soviet bloc developments were first rate. The CIA in particular had people who took a level-headed and non-ideological view of Soviet developments, an approach which I approve, and it seemed to me that the estimates they made were usually on the mark.

Q: Were there occasions in which the American intelligence establishment was caught out -- that is, failed to see developing trends -- that you would like to recall?

SWANK: No one forecast that the revolution in Hungary would develop in so dramatic a fashion. But the coverage of what was happening in Czechoslovakia in 1968 was excellent. The problem there was that no one could read Soviet intentions. We had not penetrated the Politburo.

***

SWANK: My second tour in Moscow lasted from June 1967 to May 1969. After two years in Laos, I was sufficiently disenchanted with the situation in Southeast Asia to write Ambassador Foy Kohler requesting he consider me for the position of his deputy in Moscow. I explained that I was anxious to reestablish my connections with Soviet affairs after a series of assignments elsewhere. Foy approved my assignment but was in the meantime reassigned himself to Washington. The new ambassador, Llewellyn Thompson, graciously accepted me as his DCM although he was not well acquainted with me. Tommy Thompson's second tour as Ambassador in Moscow -- he had served there with distinction from 1957 to 1962 -- was a disappointment to him. He had been persuaded by President Johnson and Secretary of State Rusk, somewhat against his better judgment, I always believed, to return to Moscow. He was troubled by a stomach ulcer that sapped his vigor and resilience. But the main cause of his depression was boredom. He no longer had the entree to the Kremlin he had enjoyed with Khrushchev, the Brezhnev regime proving to be both dull and impenetrable. Serious external distractions also weighed against progress in bilateral relations, notably the U.S. involvement in Vietnam and the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968. The favorite preoccupation of all Soviet watchers was to speculate whether an invasion would take place. Tommy confided to me his personal doubt that Brezhnev would be able to stomach Dubcek for long, but he nonetheless decided that he might as well take a deserved vacation from Moscow. He was absent in August when the invasion took place. As Chargé d'Affaires I adhered to the NATO-agreed policy of abstaining from contacts with the Soviet Foreign Ministry and of suspending bilateral programs -- the extent of the sanctions the West was prepared to impose. Within two to three months, normal contacts were resumed.

The framework agreement on construction of new chanceries and residential quarters for the Soviets in Washington and U.S. personnel in Moscow was negotiated in this period. Many of my visits with Georgi Kornienko, then Director of the American Section of the Foreign Ministry, dealt with the principles which were to govern construction in Moscow. An agreement was signed on May 16, 1969, just before I left Moscow. Almost 20 years later, the Embassy offices are still unoccupied in Washington and Moscow because of overriding security problems that have emerged over the intervening years.

I suppose I am more philosophical than incensed about this development. I have the impression from media coverage of the problems that some U.S. officials may be looking for perfect security for our buildings in the U.S.S.R. Perfect security is an illusion. We will always have to proceed on the assumption that new technological breakthroughs will occur and that Soviet efforts to penetrate our mission will be unremitting. Our ultimate security rests less on technology than on the loyalty, common sense, and disciplined discretion of our officials in Moscow.

Q: What was the situation with respect to security at our Embassy during your 1967- 1969 tour?

SWANK: Security was a daily preoccupation. It took up at least a third of my time. The Security Officer, the Technical Security Officer, and I worked closely together. Monthly reports were submitted to Washington recapitulating suspicious actions by Soviet personnel or other Soviet contacts which might be efforts to recruit Americans. There were never fewer than 20 such suspicious incidents a month. I spent much time reviewing these penetration attempts, keeping the staff informed of their responsibilities to report incidents promptly, and handling major provocations, some of them inevitably of a sordid character. I shall cite just one of these, involving an FSO who was accompanying a prominent U.S. politician on a trip outside Moscow. The officer was unknowingly photographed by the KGB in a sexual act in a hotel room with a woman whom he had met on the flight from Moscow. Some weeks later a Soviet writer acquaintance of the officer confronted him with the photographs and sought to recruit him as a spy. To his credit, the officer made a clean breast of the incident to the Ambassador, the Security Officer, and me, and of course to his wife as well. We arranged for his prompt departure from Moscow with his wife and family and recommended that he be continued in the service because of the personal courage and honesty he had demonstrated. The officer served with distinction for more than ten years afterwards.

I'd like to make a comment on listening devices, which have received perhaps undue attention in the media. Everyone assigned to a Soviet post or to a post where Soviet clandestine operations are presumed feasible is thoroughly briefed on the likelihood of acoustic monitoring. In the period 1967-69 the U.S., British, French, German, and Canadian Embassies, to my personal knowledge, were equipped with special acoustically secure rooms for conversations of some import and delicacy. But these facilities were limited, and we had to rely basically on the individual's good sense and discretion. Officers did not use dictation; confidential family discussions were held in places that could not be monitored. I have always doubted that much valuable intelligence is picked up through listening devices. This doubt was fortified when I read British intelligence expert Peter Wright's book , Spycatcher. He confirmed that MI5, British counterpart of the FBI, received little useful material from its monitoring of Soviet and satellite diplomatic establishments in London.

Q: Could I ask two questions on security? First, in the negotiations of the agreement for the construction of offices, was there adequate concern on our side for preventing technological penetration of the structure?

SWANK: As I recall, the agreement provided for continuing access by Americans to the structure during all phases of construction.

Q: Second, with reference to the recent problems of Marine guards in Moscow, can you say a word about how they were dealt with during your tenure?

SWANK: They were very closely supervised by the non-commissioned officer in charge of them, and both the Security Officer and I paid continuing attention to their morale and their social activities. They were excellent men. I cannot help but attribute a good measure of the recently publicized problems -- which appear, by the way, to have been exaggerated as to their degree of seriousness -- to inadequate supervision by Embassy staff.

Q: Your second tour in Moscow, like your first, lasted two years. Is that customary?

SWANK: For junior officers, yes. For senior officers there is greater discretion. Meg and I had hoped to remain a third year, particularly since we had known and worked with Jake (Jacob D.) Beam (who replaced Tommy Thompson in March 1969) in Djakarta. But as soon as he arrived in Moscow, Jake informed me I was to return to Washington to become a Deputy Assistant Secretary in European Affairs with responsibilities for the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe.

May I offer at this point some reflections on U.S.-Soviet relations? They are based on almost 40 years of observation and study, including the decade since my retirement. I have several points to make.

First, it is highly important that State maintain a corps of Russian-speaking specialists with service in the U.S.S.R. Comparable English-speaking Soviet specialists on the United States are, I believe, more numerous than ours and better trained in English than our men and women are in Russian. They also tend to remain in their American specialization longer than our officers in Soviet specialization. If anything, our corps of Russian-speaking specialists needs to be expanded.

Second, as promising as the Gorbachev reforms appear, it is prudent to recall the cyclical nature of both Russian and Soviet history -- repression - relaxation - repression. The record of other than centralized autocratic rule in Russia is nonexistent up to this point, and overmuch decentralization could threaten the cohesion of the Soviet empire, just about the only empire still extant. For these reasons, we should welcome glasnost and perestroika but retain some skepticism as to their durability and their impact on Soviet society. I am among those who hope for an eventual evolution of the Soviet nation into a country we can live more comfortably with than we do now. But it is bound to be a long and tortured process. We must be patiently hopeful.

Third, having expressed this skepticism based on history and experience, I must also note with optimism signs that we may now be at the beginning of the end of the Cold War. There is some prospect that the new Soviet leadership perceives limits to the utility of a continuing over-allocation of resources to military purposes. As early as 1955 I remember asking myself why in a society still so poor so many resources went to the military. Since then the U.S.S.R. has reached rough military parity with the U.S. and is by far the strongest nation in Eurasia. There is no longer any legitimate Soviet military concern other than avoiding the disintegration of the empire. Perhaps Gorbachev perceives this and is ready to negotiate some reduction not only of nuclear but also conventional forces. The withdrawal of Soviet forces from Afghanistan also bespeaks a new realism in Soviet policies.

Fourth, experience suggests that Americans need patience, prudence, and steadiness in dealing with the Soviet Union. We and our political system are not overly endowed with these qualities. Maintenance of military parity between West and East is essential as the Soviet Union goes through its transition to an undisclosed future. Both potential adversaries have been kept prudent by the perception of mutually assured destruction (MAD), and MAD will surely continue to be the governing strategy over the next generation, even if nuclear arsenals are reduced and even if a limited strategic defense is achieved. So we need a Soviet policy for the long haul, one based on the concept of an uneasy, half-truce between us.

Q: May I ask a question on your reflections on the Soviet Union over your tenure? Would you say that the pragmatic view -- so I would describe it -- that you have of the Soviet Union and its relationship with us has been shared by most FSOs, or were there people who held views to the extreme hard-line right and soft-line left?

SWANK: Virtually all the FSOs have been pragmatists. If you opt for Russian language and area training and are prepared to live in the Soviet Union, you are open-minded enough to "deal with the Devil." Conversely, no one can live in the Soviet Union and ignore the oppressiveness of the society and the significant failures of the system. They are an antidote to the fallacies of the soft-line left. Apart from Alger Hiss, who like the British defectors shared an ideological affinity with communism, no American FSO has gone over to the Soviets.

Q: Would you say, then, that the pragmatism of State was shared in defense and CIA?

SWANK: By working professionals, yes. Political appointees are another matter. Anti-Soviet attitudes were pronounced and apparently unshakable in several Reagan appointees to the Pentagon.

Q: Why haven't we done better in training our officers to serve in this important post? Is it a failure of length of assignment, training, or motivation?

SWANK: I would not agree that our personnel policies have failed. I have known many Soviet specialists over the years and almost all of them were top caliber, representing as good men and women as the Service could offer. The problem rests at the political level, with our leaders unwilling to trust career officers in important positions such as those held by Bohlen, Thompson, and Kohler. In degree, the diminished position of the Department of State vis-a-vis the National Security Council, the Department of Defense, and the CIA may also be a factor.

Q: Is it your impression language and area officers are adequately rewarded? Does their dedication and hard work pay off?

SWANK: I cannot cite any officers who have suffered from Soviet specialization. Many assignments are open to them outside Washington and the Soviet Union because of the active role of the U.S.S.R. on the world scene and the centrality in U.S. policy of East-West relations. At one time there were limited assignment opportunities for Chinese language specialists. That has never been a problem for Soviet specialists.

Q: One more question on Soviet affairs, Coby. When Gorbachev took power and began to institute reforms, the American community of Sovietologists seemed taken by surprise. Based on your experience, how well do you think experts within the government really understand the Soviet Union? Obviously there are great difficulties reaching an intimate under-standing of such a closed society. How well have we managed to get around these barriers and obtain an in-depth knowledge of the workings of that system?

SWANK: We do not have an in-depth knowledge of the Politburo. We would give a great deal to penetrate its processes, which are kept very secret even from Soviet citizens. The Russian Tsars operated in much the same way, with a passion for secrecy. Having admitted this important shortcoming, I think that the academicians, journalists, and diplomats who constitute the main body of U.S. Sovietologists have excellent insights into Soviet behavior. Several journalists have written exceptionally perceptive books about Soviet society -- Hedrick Smith, Robert Kaiser, and David Binder, to name only a few. Nor is there any country in the world that is the object of such intense scrutiny by our intelligence community. Concerning your question about Gorbachev, his rise to power was anticipated but the scope and rapidity of his proposals for change astonished many of us. In general, Sovietologists share varying degrees of skepticism, based on experience and example, that the reforms are going to work. On the other hand, most of them are heartened that he's making such an effort to restore dynamism to an inert society.

CATHERMAN: Right. Pic Littell, my colleague from USIA, and I were the first representatives to get an academic year at government expense for the honing of our professional skills. In our case at Columbia University where we were both in Soviet studies. This was 1955 and 1956.

From the Russian Institute at Columbia University, Pic Littell went directly to Moscow and opened a USIA office in our Embassy there. It was not called USIA as the Soviets would not tolerate that. Pic had to essentially rejoin the State Department and go as a State Department officer. At any rate he opened up an operation in Moscow which was connected with USIA and soon after that began to arrange for the publication of Ameryka magazine and started some rudimentary exchanges programs with the Soviet Union.

I went to Vienna and spent the next four years in Vienna operating one of the more interesting things in my experience, a shop called the Special Projects Office in USIS Vienna.

Q: This was not an integral part of the regular USIS program.

CATHERMAN: It was not an integral part of the USIS program. My assignment there was to monitor the East European, what we called satellite, radio and press in those days, and also the media of the Soviet Union, and to get news items out of those media and give them to the Western press covering the Soviet empire from Vienna. In those days practically no journalists went into Eastern Europe, or if they did get in they couldn't do their job because of the Stalinist approach to the Western media. So we got information to them from the satellite and Soviet media. I also had access to Embassy reports and other information sources. I spent time briefing Western journalists, Americans and others about how we saw things developing in the satellite empire.

Q: Were you also furnishing any information to Munich radio and Radio Free Europe?

CATHERMAN: Yes. Although they had a far bigger monitoring effort than we did. We did supply a lot of information to them. We had a good working relationship with them and we got their reports back. Now they were much bigger and more complete. We were a quick moving operation. When we received a news report that looked good we got it out right away. Our advantage and our strength was that we could move fast. We were small. I think there were 15 of us in that shop.

Q: Were you the only American?

CATHERMAN: The only American until 1959 when Phil Arnold joined me. He became one of the PAOs in that area later on. Phil and I were colleagues for two years until 1961 when I was assigned to the Soviet Union. In 1959, I went to the Soviet Union as a member of the staff of our national exhibition there. This was the first major USIA and US Government effort to open the Soviet Union. We spent the summer there and played host to hundreds of thousands of Soviets. The Soviets also had their exhibition in the United States, in New York. That was the start of American public diplomacy in the Soviet Union. Some had been done before by Pic Littell and also Tom Tuch, Tom was my immediate predecessor in Moscow, but that was the big one. The New York Philharmonic with Leonard Bernstein came during that period. We had other large performing arts groups. We really got going in the cultural and information side of things in 1959.

Q: Had Lee Brady come to Moscow by that time?

CATHERMAN: Lee Brady was there. He was Tom Tuch's boss. The reason I mentioned Tom first was that I had a personal friendship with Tom and I always followed, or almost always followed, Tom in assignments. For instance, I replaced Tom in Moscow, later on I replaced him in Berlin, then I replaced him as Deputy Director of the Voice of America in the early '80s. And then, finally, I replaced Tom as country PAO in Germany. Lee was there and was Tom's boss. He was certainly one of the big elements in that program, although Lee himself was not a Soviet specialist. He was seconded into the Soviet program from other interests. He was a marvelous French linguist and had had years in France and returned again some time after leaving the Soviet Union. I was dedicated to Soviet Affairs. Pic Littell who had been there prior to Lee's arrival as the only USIS person was dedicated to Soviet Affairs. Lee came in after that and then left, he never returned to Soviet Affairs. He did some great things otherwise.

Q: When you went for the summer for the first American exhibit, which I gather was the one where the so-called kitchen debate took place,...

CATHERMAN: That's right.

Q: Did you then leave the Soviet Union for awhile and then go back?

CATHERMAN: Yes, I went back to my job in Vienna. I still had two years to go there. I came back to Moscow in 1960 to replace both Tom Tuch and Lee Brady while they went on home leave. I spent the entire summer of 1960 there. In the meantime my operation in Vienna was beginning to change its nature. The iron curtain was beginning to open a little bit and the USIS personnel who were by that time assigned to the embassies in the satellites and the Soviet Union were able to take selected information about the American cultural experience and get it into the hands of people in the Soviet Union who were willing to take the risk of getting this kind of information. I changed that operation, which had been a cold war effort in Vienna, around and made it more of a purveyor of cultural news about the United States for peoples in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. We began to put out cultural bulletins. We began to build small exhibits. We had panel displays for show windows in front of the embassies in those countries and so on. That developed later on into a major effort. So I was happy to see that happen.

***

Then two days after the Kennedy-Khrushchev meeting in Vienna May of 1961, Dottie and I drove from Vienna to Moscow.

Q: Oh, you were able to drive?

CATHERMAN: We were able to drive. We were one of the first ones to do it and it took three days, but we made it. I remember that period very well because I was sleeping on my desk down at the press office during the Kennedy-Khrushchev meeting--for two days--and Dottie was packing. A typical foreign service experience. She had the packers and I had all that going on. That was a very exciting meeting--the young President, John F. Kennedy and the sort of grizzled, party stalwart Nikita Khrushchev. I was assigned to Pierre Salinger, who was Kennedy's press speaker and I spent most of the time in the kitchen of the ambassador's residence or in the waiting room of the Soviet Embassy when the meetings took place there. Pierre would come out and hand me something about what was going on inside and I would take that and read it to the press. Make sure AP and UPI got it and also that it was sent down to the press center where hundreds of journalists were covering that event. So I played my little role in that. I also got some pictures of myself taken by the CIA which they later presented to me. Ernie Wiener sent them to me. He was there with me also. Ernie and I are in several of those pictures together. Ernie and I sort of had a beat of keeping track of Pierre Salinger and making sure that the information he wanted relayed from the site of the talks to the press in fact was delivered. So that was my job there.

Then I went to Moscow for three years. Those were the years of the opening. The national exhibit in 1959 had set the scene. We concluded exchanges and cultural agreements after that. By the time I got to the Soviet Union in May of 1961 we already had a traveling exhibit in the Soviet Union and I took that over for the summer, that was an exhibit on plastics, we had 30 Russian-speaking American guides and I took that exhibit over for its showing in Moscow and Tbilisi. Dottie and I were on our way to Tbilisi on a hot August day of 1961. We had stopped off for two days in Sochi which is a Black Sea resort in the Soviet Union. We tried to get a little swimming in and actually spent almost all day trying to find food; it was tough standing in line trying to get something to eat there. We came back to the hotel on that hot August day. I turned on the radio and found that the Berlin Wall was being constructed. I found this out from the Soviets and it scared the devil out of me. I did not have my own radio along. I had to rely on the hotel radio and it had a spring loaded mechanism that kept the dial focused on Radio Moscow. But with the use of brute strength I could wheel the dial down to VOA and BBC and essentially get Western reports. I was a child of the cold war. I had been in Germany soon after the beginning of the real cold war. I ran a cold war operation in Vienna. In the Soviet Union I was alone with my wife, 1500 miles away from the nearest Americans and I was scared. I thought the red balloon would go up. I was sure we were going to war and I wondered what I would do there if in fact we did go to war. Well, what happened is that we got on a plane the next day and went on to Tbilisi, the capital of Georgia and set up this exhibit down there.

Well, I take pride in being in the Soviet Union in that opening era and I take pride in being the director of that first traveling exhibit. We had a very eventful time in Tbilisi. Those six weeks we were down there in the fall of 1961, that was the period when Khrushchev was trying to scare Kennedy and was blowing up 20 megaton hydrogen bombs in Novaya Zemlya to the north. One of the innumerable Berlin crises was in full swing and there we were down there hosting tens of thousands of Georgians and Soviet citizens on the floor of this exhibit everyday with all the attendant stress and hubbub and security and all of that that went on with those things.

Q: I want to ask a couple of questions. You got to the Soviet Union approximately a year after Gary Powers was shot down.

CATHERMAN: I was in the Soviet Union during that trial.

Q: But not when he was shot down.

CATHERMAN: I was there during the trial.

Q: I had been to the Soviet Union with the National War College group in 1960 when Tommy Thompson was still ambassador. Of course everything seemed to be going very well then. Just a few weeks after we returned to the United States, Powers was shot down and the curtain dropped even further.

CATHERMAN: Right.

Q: So I wondered what the status of the situation was when you got there in 1961. Had it loosened up again considerably after that?

CATHERMAN: Well, it loosened up for one thing because Kennedy came to power and Khrushchev, I think, felt that he could do something with Kennedy. They had their meeting in May in Vienna and it looked as though we could do some things with the Soviets for that initial period. As a matter of fact we did. We had those exchanges which I addressed. We got an academic exchanges program going. We had American students in Leningrad and Moscow and one or two outside of those principal cities. We were beginning to have exchanges of delegations. We had many major performing arts groups on both sides. So we had that starting and it was, of course, endangered in 1962 by the Cuban missile crisis. I was in Moscow during that period and it was very touchy. However, we did not miss a beat in our exchanges programs. Life became a little rough for embassy personnel because of surveillance, although from my point of view, I was able to move around as a representative of the cultural side of the house as freely as I ever did. And I did move around a lot.

Q: You were able to travel extensively within the Soviet Union?

CATHERMAN: Yes, I was able to travel extensively within the Soviet Union. I was subjected to the same regulations about closed areas, etc., and I had to get permission through the Foreign Office and all that, but I did do that and I traveled a lot. I was out in Siberia in mid 1962 with Ruth Adams, the editor of Ameryka magazine. We took, for me, a memorable trip through Siberia and down through Central Asia and into the Caucasus just prior to the eruption of the Cuban missile crisis. I think that those of us who were engaged in the cultural exchanges programs had an easier time of it in those days than did the people who were in the military and political affairs.

Q: I suppose you traveled by train as you went into the hinterland primarily didn't you?

CATHERMAN: Generally I would take a plane for the long distances. We just didn't have time to travel other ways.

Maybe I can give you a feel for the atmosphere in the embassy at that time. There were two people engaged in USIS work. We had a press operation; we had an academic exchanges program which we negotiated; we had a performing arts exchanges program, we negotiated all the contracts with the Soviets on that and also accompanied the performing arts groups. We had to take care of the American academics and students who came. They were always having their problems and we had to go and negotiate with the Soviets about that. So it was a constant 18 hour day right straight through that period. So whenever either one of us took off--and we had to travel of course, we could not just sit in an office in the embassy and handle things--we had to make the trips as compact as possible with very little time for train trips. Although I did take some train trips.

Q: Was Rocky Staples there at that time?

CATHERMAN: Rocky Staples was my boss for the first two years I was there. Yes.

Q: He told me that he traveled quite a bit in the Soviet Union by train and he felt that he was able to speak more freely to the Soviet people in the train compartments than he could most anywhere else in the Soviet Union.

CATHERMAN: Well, that is right. You can do that in planes too. Actually they were good vehicles for conversations. I never had any problems speaking with Russians, or with Soviets. Occasionally I would note how worried they were. They would look over their shoulders furtively to see who was behind them and all that. That was standard treatment in those days. Rocky was a very hard worker. I don't remember that he took any long trips.

Q: He said he took one trip, the one out to Lake Baikal and beyond on the train and he had a better experience in conversation with the Soviets that time than any other time.

CATHERMAN: I don't remember that but certainly, if he said it he did it. He was a very good boss. A very hard worker. A very tough negotiator. A positive influence on Soviet-American relations.

No I had some great experiences in those days. For instance, I accompanied Benny Goodman on his first trip to the Soviet Union in 1962. I was with the New York City Ballet for a few weeks when Balanchine brought his group back in 1962. In 1965, by that time I had left the Soviet Union, but I came back with the Cleveland Orchestra under George Szell and spent six weeks touring. Those were marvelous opportunities to meet cultivated Soviets and to get out of the hot house atmosphere of the embassy.

***

Well, at any rate, in April 1964 I was called back to the United States to take over the Voice of America broadcasts to the Soviet Union. The Soviets stopped jamming VOA in Russian and seven other languages that spring, so the decision was made to bring me back to take over that broadcasting element in the Voice of America. I spent three years running that program. I took the unit over from a former Soviet general. I was the first American in that unit. Alexander Barmine...

Q: The legendary Barmine.

CATHERMAN: The legendary Barmine who had been the youngest general in the Red Army during the civil war in the early '20s, went on to enter Soviet diplomacy. In 1937 he was in Thessaloniki as consul general for the Soviets. He heard that his patron, Marshal Budyenni, had been arrested for treason and knew it would not be long before he would also be arrested. He went upstairs, took some money out of a safe and a gun, went down, got on the train for Paris and left his Soviet experience behind. He eventually came to the United States and was first director of VOA Russian which opened up in 1948. He was director from 1948 until 1964 when I took it over.

The first thing I did was to hire a dozen Russian-speaking young Americans most of whom came from families of Russian heritage; not all of them, some of them were native Americans from other ethnic origins who had learned good enough Russian to do that sort of broadcasting. We tried to change the nature of our broadcasting to take advantage of fact that we were getting in now with a good clear signal. That was a fine experience for me.

Q: Did you feel that utilization of American-born people of Russian or Eastern European ancestry gave you a different accent on the radio and did you feel that was more effective in the Soviet Union than broadcasts by emigres who might be downgraded by virtue of defecting from their home country?

CATHERMAN: Well I think so, that was a big issue. The emigres of which you speak, of course, were language purists and when we brought these Americans in, they didn't always speak the kind of Russian that the old guard would have liked. However, the cooperation was good. I think that the tone of our broadcast measurably improved. For one thing we did not have to cope with the thought that we were not getting through. We were able to develop a much lighter sort of radio style approach. We didn't have to worry about enunciating all of our words very clearly in case someone could hear through the static. We didn't have to repeat our programs four or five times a day. So the approach was very different. With these young Russian-speaking Americans came a new approach to broadcasting. They were not the sort of fully disciplined readers of script that we had had previously. They came in with their approach to life, some of them were teenagers and they found that they could speak openly in front of the microphone, they didn't need to read. So we changed the whole nature of our broadcasts.

Q: So you had a lot of ad-libbing then, I guess.

CATHERMAN: We had a lot of ad-libbing and we began to get audience mail. It was a nice period that didn't last forever. After I left the Voice, of course, jamming recommenced and stayed on until two years ago.

Q: I was going to ask you did it stay on after Khrushchev's fall or did it...

CATHERMAN: Jamming recommenced after his fall.

Q: I realized it was then, but I wondered if it started rather soon after his fall or continued on open reception for a time.

CATHERMAN: I think there was a time there of a year and a half or so, but I have really forgotten that because by that time I was off doing other things.

Q: So, you felt you really not only turned the broadcasting techniques around but that you perhaps got a much broader audience in the Soviet Union. What kind of letters did you get when you got audience response and how did they get out of the Soviet Union?

CATHERMAN: I can't tell you that, but they did. Most of the responses were to our music programs. That's always the case.

Q: Yes, Willis Conover and...

CATHERMAN: Willis was on the English broadcast, he always got lots of response. But we also had our own Russian-language jazz and popular programs. Marie Celiberti, for instance, was one of the great broadcasters in those days. She teamed up with Willis Conover and did a Russian-language version of Willis' broadcast. Most of the fan mail came in response to those music broadcasts. That was obviously an example of Soviets feeling they could get mail out if they stayed in the cultural field because the cultural field was not considered dangerous. Also I assume the censors kept back political content stuff but let the other go through. Anyway we had a good listenership.

I had the great pleasure of going back with the Cleveland Orchestra while I was running the VOA broadcasts. While sitting in the apartment of the Baltimore Sun's correspondent at midnight one night in Moscow I heard the announcer sign off his program saying that their boss Terry was in Moscow that night and they all wanted to wish me good night and sweet dreams Terry. That was a very pleasant experience.

So I was in on the opening of the Soviet Union. I was in on two openings. I was in on the opening of the German society after World War II and I was in on the opening of the Soviet society after Stalin. Those are the two things I feel I contributed in this whole period that I spent with USIA.

VLADIMIR I. TOUMANOFF
Soviet Studies
Harvard University (1956-1957)

Vladimir Toumanoff was born in Constantinople in 1923 to Russian parents. He attended Harvard University and joined the Foreign Service in 1950. He served in several posts including Germany, Iceland, Moscow, and Canada. He was interviewed by William D. Morgan in 1999.

TOUMANOFF: Nothing terribly dramatic happened at Harvard, although Zbig Brzezinski was one of our instructors, as were Marshall Schulman, Adam Ulam and Edward Keenan. All giants in the field.

Q: I think probably at that time it was the best program of the Soviet area studies in the United States.

TOUMANOFF: It was all run out of the Russian Research Center, which had an international group of some 30 scholars in addition to the dozen or so of Harvard faculty. Many, many years later, after I retired from the Foreign Service, I became Associate Director of that Center. But that's a different story.

Q: Courses particularly? Would you like to give us a summary of your experience there?

TOUMANOFF: Well, I had a considerable advantage over the other Officers. I was already fluent in Russian, and familiar with the resources of the University in the Russian/Soviet field. It was an intensive program, especially so for those who also had to study the language. We covered everything; history, foreign and domestic politics, the economy, literature, geography, cultures... Let's see, there were five of us, and all but one carved out notable Government careers in the Soviet/East European field: William Culbert, William Koplowitz, Francis Meehan, and Paul Smith. There must be a record of the class somewhere in the archives.

TOUMANOFF: It does. From there, which was in June 1957, I was assigned to Frankfurt, Germany, in peripheral reporting.

Q: Before you do it, do you want to give just a word or two of your impression of the year in Harvard? Was it a good course? Were they helpful?

TOUMANOFF: It was an excellent course. With my language I could go directly to original sources, and Harvard had large holdings. For the others that was more difficult.

Q: They hadn't learned Russian yet?

TOUMANOFF: They had some Russian, but reading Russian was difficult and slow for them at first. It also took some time for them to become familiar with the original language sources available at Harvard. But the faculty, including those from other universities, were generous in their time, attention and help. It was a fascinating and hugely useful preparatory year in terms of skills and acquisition of knowledge.

Q: And applied to your subsequent work on the Soviet Union? There was a practical side as well.

TOUMANOFF: Oh, very much so. We brought a variety of backgrounds to the program. Some in economics, others in political science, or sociology. I, for example, had not paid much attention to economics in general or to that of the Soviet Union. A number of years had also gone by since I'd been directly involved in keeping track of what was happening in the USSR. In Iceland there wasn't that much to know, outside of Soviet-Icelandic relations, which were not the center of America's or Russia's concerns. I think we all treasured it as a very, very useful, very productive year. I need not tell you how the Foreign Service draws intensely on everything you know, the challenge is so broad. That year at Harvard added greatly, not just to specific applicable knowledge for work on the Soviet Union, but enriched our career capabilities and our lives as a whole.

THEODORE L. ELIOT, JR.
Administrative/Political Officer
Moscow (1956-1958)

Mr. Eliot was born and grew up in the Boston area and graduated from Harvard. He served in numerous posts including Colombo, Moscow and Tehran. In 1973 he became ambassador to Afghanistan and served there for 4 ½ years. He was interviewed by Robert Martens in 1992.

Q: We will devote most of the time to your later career, but with the collapse of the Soviet Union there may be interest in your observations, as well as those of others, in your Soviet period. That was in the mid- '50. After Russian training at FSI, and Harvard's Russian Institute, you served in Moscow from 1956 to '58, first as the administrative officer, and later as a political officer. What were your major impressions, particularly in light of the subsequent collapse of communism?

ELIOT: Well, of course, those were drab years for an American in the Soviet Union. It's a drab country to begin with, but these were particularly drab years with the KGB listening in on you and watching you all the time. My wife and I were fortunate. We were among the first people, I think, in the embassy--maybe the first couple--to get our driver's licenses, and we imported a Volkswagen Bug from Germany, and we had quite a lot of fun with the KGB in that car actually. And we were able to travel a little bit, including with our interviewer to what was then called Stalingrad on one occasion. I think we may have been the first Americans to travel around Stalingrad in a car...

Q: ...on down to the Kalmuk...

ELIOT: ...and on down to the Kalmuk territory, and we saw why the German tanks had bogged down in the mud because that's what happened to us. Then in the fall of '57 we were among the first Americans to visit Riga since World War II, at the time Sputnik went up. And what was interesting in Riga in the fall of '57 was the Latvians would take you aside and say, "Gee, will you help us get rid of these Russians?", which they finally achieved.

Two vignettes I might add, I think some of us coming out of the academic world in those days, who were steeped in Brzezinski's and Carl Friedrich's studies of totalitarianism, were beginning to raise the question as to whether a totalitarian regime could survive if it did not continue to impose terror. Of course, Khrushchev in that period seemed to be easing up a little bit, and that I think raised a question in some of our minds--this may be hindsight, but I'm quite certain I remember some of us raising the question as to whether this regime could survive without terror.

Then there was the question as to whether one could do business with Khrushchev, and my memory also is that most of us, reasonably fresh out of Russian studies at Columbia, Harvard, and elsewhere, really were so down on that regime that we didn't see the possibilities for detente the way our Ambassador Llewellyn Thompson saw them. And he was right, and we were wrong. One of the things I will always remember is my admiration for his skill as a diplomat, which, of course later in his career became evident at the time of the Cuban missile crisis where he played an absolutely key role.

Q: Yes, that's certainly true. Of course he had also been very prominent in the settlement of the Trieste crisis and working out the Austrian State Treaty in May of 1955, which were the first breakthroughs in the Cold War.

ELIOT: Travel was certainly tough in those days, but it was really the only opportunity one had to have talks with Soviet citizens. In Moscow you were constantly shielded from them, and the KGB was inserting itself. But on these trips one had a chance to talk with Soviet citizens and certainly got the impression that their low standard of living bothered them a great deal, and they would ask lots of questions about, for example, how much did our shoes cost? how many days work to buy a pair of shoes? and that sort of thing indicating a craving for consumer goods which was not being satisfied by the regime. I don't remember, in that period--there may have been some but I don't remember in that period--the depth of cynicism about the regime that became evident 15-20 years later.

Q: I felt at the time, I might say, and I wrote a 25 page final report on that which never got out of the embassy.

ELIOT: Well you were more prescient than I.

Q: After you came back from Moscow, you worked briefly, as I recall, on the Soviet desk, but then soon thereafter you began working for Douglas Dillon--this was in the late Eisenhower administration--when Dillon was, I believe, Under Secretary of the Department.

ELIOT: At first he was Under Secretary for Economic Affairs, and then moved up to the number two position.

WILLIAM N. TURPIN
Consular/Economic Officer
Moscow (1956-1958)

William Turpin was born and raised in Georgia. He attended Dartmouth College, Mercer University, and Oxford University. He entered the Foreign Service in 1949 and received his first post as a Kreis officer in 1950. He went on to serve in Munich, Belgrade, Moscow, and The Hague. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q: You served in Moscow from when to when?

TURPIN: August of 56 to August of 58.

Q: Who was the ambassador at that time?

TURPIN: Chip Bohlen the first year and Tommy Thompson (Llewellyn E. Thompson) the second.

Q: Two solid professionals.

TURPIN: Oh, the last ones we had, I think.

Q: What was the state, in 56, of relations with the United States.

TURPIN: Well, remember this was just after the 20th party congress and Khrushchev's secret speech and all that. I didn't have anything much to do with the government's relations. We were carefully, unlike Yugoslavia where you could go where you wanted and talk to who you pleased, it was very, very difficult to do that on any continuing basis in the Soviet Union. I had this terribly frustrated feeling the whole time I was there that here, within a half mile of here, were people that know the answers to all the questions that I would like to ask, like how do you run this planning system.

Q: You were an economic officer?

TURPIN: Yes. Consular first year and then economic officer, but I was doing both most of the time.

Q: When did you arrive there? What time of the year?

TURPIN: August 56.

Q: Well, then you were there during two major things in October, the Hungarian revolution and the Suez crisis.

TURPIN: Yes. And Sputnik.

Q: And Sputnik. Well, let's start with the Hungarian revolution, because this was when the Soviets put their troops and crushed the Hungarians. What was happening in Moscow at the time, from your point of view?

TURPIN: I don't think much of anything. The British had withdrawn all of their military people to do Suez. We had a Hungarian assistant, or an assistant attaché of Hungarian origin. And we sat around a good bit talking about what we ought to do. And I remember going out after church one Sunday and thinking out what we should do. Got back and got into the bull session, which we of course know was being taped. We thought that was a good thing.

And I said, "well I figured out what I think we ought to do. I think we should send Bohlen to the Kremlin, tell them 'we ain't going to reach for big one unless you do. If you do, we'll wipe you out. Meanwhile, get those pungs of yours out of Hungary or we're moving in.'" And the air attaché, who was one of the most brilliant officers I ever knew, of any sort, Tom Wolfe, he says, "just one problem with that." I said, "what's that Tom?" He says, "well I've just come back from a trip to Germany and I can assure you that our troops are in no condition to go anywhere." I said, "well, that sort of puts [an end] to that one, doesn't it."

But I don't know what the people on the street in Moscow were thinking.

Q: Was there a cut off of contacts, or... ?

TURPIN: You didn't have any contacts to cut off. [At least they didn't] amount to anything. I mean, I still doubled the consular section of the foreign office. And that was that and nobody ever mentioned it. It was no place where you mixed with people.

Q: What sort of work were you doing in the consular section?

TURPIN: Trying to get Americans and Russian relatives of Americans out, which we mostly didn't. We were expatriating a fair number of them. And some of it was rather interesting to see these old files which they shipped out to us with expatriations paper signed by Bohlen, Thompson, Thayer and whatnot when they were in Estonia or Latvia or wherever it was they were in the 30s. And I had a slight hair pulling with Virginia, or whatever her name was, in SOB – she was doing all that stuff – because they kept [saying] "don't you want to reconsider expatriating so and so?" And I said, "well, they were expatriated in 1923 for excessive residence abroad and I hardly see that another thirty years of the same, you know, cuts any ice. And they ain't going to get out on an American passport anyway. The Soviets will never recognize that they have American citizenship. And indeed they will say loudly 'this person is not an American citizen as the Embassy'" – we were sending notes all the time asking about this, that and the other – and they would always say that "this is not an American citizen but a Soviet citizen. And one time they sent one back saying ‘this is not an American citizen but a stateless person.’” And I went to Thompson and said, “look, I think you can bitch about this to the foreign office. They have a perfect right to say that somebody is a Soviet citizen. They may be wrong, but they’ve got a legitimate basis for saying so. But they got no basis for saying that somebody can’t be an American citizen and they say he hasn’t got any status at all.” And he wouldn’t do it, probably rightly. Wouldn’t have gotten us anywhere.

Q: We’ve all been in those arguments. Were you dealing with people who were trying to get back who left the United States in the 30s, got enthralled with communism and went there and then said “oh God, let’s get out of here, and then they got trapped.”

TURPIN: Well, I think most of them could have gotten out in the 30s if they wanted to. But after the war, they couldn’t. There were a couple of people whose names I’ve forgotten – Ike was one of them – who’d been in our consulate in Vladivostok and they had him in a concentration camp. Because they were letting a lot of people out of concentration camps in these days.

Q: Yes. Khrushchev had a program for that. Yes.

TURPIN: Yes. And they were showing up at the embassy. Talking about people who went there and wanted to go back, there was a couple by the name of Imshanitski – this was after I was out of the consular business – they threw a rock over the wall of the catholic church and said they were in trouble. So Ed Killum, who took my place as consul, got me out and we went down and met with them, including one occasion on Christmas, which was very helpful. Imshanitski had been thoroughly hauled on board by the Soviets during and just after the war. They promised him the earth. His wife said “don’t be a fool.” If she didn’t run his nose in it particularly. He had diabetes and couldn’t get medicine. He had a terrible time. They wouldn’t let him go stay in Moscow. It was a real mess. And Ed and I decided that if the Soviets really wanted better relations they would keep Imshanitski there. If they wanted to really make us mad they would turn him loose, which they eventually did. And we had to issue them, no, I guess we “visa’d” their Soviet passports. That’s was what we usually did if anybody got out. We’d visa the Soviet passports, even if they were American citizens. And after they got to Copenhagen, they’d be get handed an American passport.

But we had very few of that. There were hundreds, must have been hundreds of people applying, saying they wanted to get Aunt Suzie out, they hadn’t seen her since 1948. And there was a form called a “wizoff” that you had to have. An invitation from somebody in America, signed by the Secretary of State of the state and then endorsed by the Secretary of State of the United States. And they’d send it off to us and the Soviets would say “no.” So you did have the feeling this was kind of a futile operation. We did get some of them out. It’s true. But not any large number.

Q: Were you looking at the economy?

TURPIN: Trying to.

Q: There, I assume you really weren’t able to get out and do much.

TURPIN: Not much. I was allowed contact with this economic section of the academy of sciences. Some bird that I met – I don't even remember how I met up with him – but he was supposed to be in the academy of sciences working on Latin America. And he asked me if I could get any material about American imperialism in Latin America. And I said, "I don't know, but I'll try." And I wrote the state department and INR duly sent out a bunch of Spanish language stuff which I duly handed over to this guy. And in 68, when they wanted me on the Balkan economic desk, this gumshoe interrogated me at great length about "didn't you know this guy was a KGB agent." I said "nope. I assumed he was approved. I didn't know if he was an agent or not." "Well, didn't you hand him some materials." I said, "I sure did." He says, "what were they about?" I said, "I haven't the faintest idea. They were in Spanish, which I don't read. But they were sent to me by INR, so I assume they were innocuous." Anyway, that was a very unpleasant set of interviews. But just gumshoes being gumshoes.

But they did set me up occasionally appointments at the academy of sciences. And I was working very hard on what was called "the price question," which was a big thing in Soviet publications. They were trying to figure out how to set prices, which they didn't know. And in fact there isn't any good answer to it that I know. But I did talk to the author of at least one book who told me that 1956 was the first time a Soviet statistical publication came out, it was a very thin volume indeed – he said, they'd been to, I guess to Khrushchev because Stalin was dead by that time, and said "look, we cannot just keep on grinding out this stuff without some numbers." And they eventually agreed and published this thing and from then on, they published a fairly substantial statistical manual. Not too many of the numbers meant too much, but at least they were publishing.

And I had this long conversation with several of them about the price situation and it finally came down to this: "Look, we didn't start from nowhere. There was a price structure in place in 1928 and we have simply modified it from time to time. Otherwise we just set prices to, we think, get things done the way we want them." But of course, prices didn't mean anything anyway. It was all done by a military system under Lenin, by a guy whose name I've forgotten, but to whom Lenin is supposed to have said, "you have studied these things with the Germans" – meaning operations and general staff – "now look into them for us."

And they did have prices and they were all a mess. I don't think anybody thinks they had the most remote idea what actually happened with production and what not. They were trying to set physical targets for everything. Which was fine in the case of coal, which worked in BTUs. Or in electricity, you worked in kilowatt hours. The story was – I never have known if it was true or not – that first they started setting targets for a nail factory in terms of weight. And the factory started producing railroad spikes. Then they put it on piece work. And they started producing carpet tacks. Then they said quality. And they started making hand hammered brass nails for decorating doors. It was also said there was only one style of shoe, men's shoe I guess they meant, for the entire Soviet Union. And we would see people lined up. They'd line up and then find out what was at the head of the line when they got there. And take it off.

Q: Our impression was that the Soviet Union was a mess, I mean economically...

TURPIN: Well it was not a mess from the point of the view of getting done what Stalin and his successors wanted, which was strengthening the defense power of the country, building up heavy industry and raising the moral and economic level of the populace. And that number three was way, way down. One thing I never saw or heard discussed very much was what the Soviet population really wanted, which was housing. It was a bloody awful mess. They were building stuff. They had a whole bunch of apartment buildings under construction on the way out to the airport. And people coming in would say, "ah, look what's going on." They didn't stay long enough to find out that those cranes were still right where they'd been a year before.

And we had visitors, the Carnegie Foundation started sending economists among other things, right at the time I got there. And they were willingly hoodwinked, as far I could make out. There was somebody that stood in my office when I had just got there and said, "well, of course, you've never been around. You don't know anything. And we see all this going on." I said, "take a look out behind this embassy and you will see people lining up to stand pipe." "Oh," he said, "well that's just propaganda." You know, they weren't about to believe anything.

Had a couple of sociologists that appeared and I took them upstairs to talk to the internal reporting people and they were full about how "I'd met somebody on the train from where to where and they were telling me this that and the other and I'm sure this is something you've never heard of." Well my associates were too polite to say anything. I said, "yes, well that was [so and so] the day before yesterday. And by the way, what language did you do this in?" "Well, chap I was talking to happened to speak English." I'd say "happened?" They'd say, "you don't mean to say that you think that we have been hoodwinked?" "I certainly do." And that did not establish my popularity.

But I did get a call one day after I talked to these academy of sciences people. There were a couple of American economists whose names I have forgotten who were visiting and for whom I had left messages at their hotel saying I would like very much to meet with them. They didn't return. So the guy called and said, "look, we've got these two Americans coming in. Would you come sit in on the meeting?" And when they got there, they found this – because Americans don't want anything to do with the Embassy if possible. Well, okay, there is an awful lot of baloney been written about the Soviet Union, especially the economy, and particularly by the CIA, which, when I got back I discovered that where it was technical stuff like particularly ferrous metallurgy, which I knew something about, and non-ferrous metals and that kind of thing, they had people who really knew their stuff or were fired shortly thereafter. They cleaned house over there in the late 50s or early 60s. But their people of a general subject, absolutely hopeless. They of course went off to be professors of Soviet economics at the University of Virginia. They were playing games.

But when I was there, Dick Morstein from RAND found I think it was volume 4 of an official price list, which gave careful specifications for everything that that covered. And RAND had written the manufacturers of tractors and radios and all of that kind of thing and said, "what would you charge for a tractor meeting the following specifications?" And mostly they wrote back and said "we ain't made one of these things since 1925." They were obviously - even I could figure that out - heavily overweight and underpowered. And the boys were taking those statistics and adding them up, worried about the rapid expansion of Soviet ferrous metallurgy, for example. And the steel delegation, a couple of members of which I went out to Magnitogorsk and we were talking to the director and the chief engineer. They wanted to know how you get such high coefficients of blast furnace use. Well what they did was to prepare the charge much more carefully than we ever did. We can't afford it. They had people out there with shovels mixing this stuff up. With the open hearths, they were preparing, they just made all low carbon steel. The American vice president for research at U.S. Steel who was with me and knew a lot about – spoke Russian, some – and knew a lot about steel in general, he said, “no, we can't use that stuff. Everything we do is specialty steel.” Broadly to interpret that. But they don't get the big, long production runs that the Soviets did. Because we were trying to do something else. And judging by that price list, I'd say that a truck or a tractor weighed at least three or four times as much as the American equivalent would. So that the fact that they were producing a hundred million tons of raw steel a year didn't mean all that much.

Q: Was the feeling at the embassy at that time, this 56 to 58 period, that the Soviets were adventurous as far as trying to do something in Western Europe? Attack Western Europe or...

TURPIN: No. If anybody ever believed that, they never said it to my hearing. No. I don't think anybody then or later thought the Soviets were going to mass divisions across the Elbe or whatever it was. Maybe, but, no, I don't think people were worried about that.

They were worried – my military friends then and later – were worried about the ability of our, however many it was divisions that we had in Germany, to do anything about it if they did. The Fulga Gap and all that. But no, I don't think anybody was expecting an attack any time.

Q: When you left there in 58, where did you go?

ALEXANDER AKALOVSKY
Interpreter
Washington, DC (1956-1960)

Mr. Akalovsky was born in Yugoslavia (Croatia) and educated at Yugoslav, Heidelberg and Georgetown Universities. Entering the United States in 1949, he worked as language Instructor at the US Army Language School before joining the Department of State in 1956 as translator/interpreter. In 1960 he was posted to Geneva, Switzerland, where he served until 1964 as Political Chief with ACDA, the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. He subsequently served as Political Officer at the US Embassy in Moscow from 1965 to 1960. Mr. Akalovsky was interviewed in 2000 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: It's obvious from your career that you did. When you first joined there, was there a Russian division?

AKALOVSKY: There was a Russian unit, yes. Well, I take it back, there were two branches. One was the translating branch and one interpreter branch. I was at first in the translating branch, but my title was interpreter.

Q: This is still the after results of the McCarthy period. I mean was this hitting hard?

AKALOVSKY: None whatsoever. I know it had an effect on some other people, but not me.

Q: So you came in in '56. What were some of the things you were doing at that time?

AKALOVSKY: First of all translation of diplomatic notes, or travel requests from the Soviet embassy, but then I was sent to Mexico City for a conference in '56. Then in '57 I was assigned to the U.S. delegation to the five nation _____ subcommittee of the United Nations, which met in London. The head of the delegation was Harold Stassen, the presidential contender.

Q: Had been the youngest governor of Minnesota, was quite a political still at the time.

AKALOVSKY: I can tell you a long story about him.

Q: Well, let's hear a little about him, because he was a figure. What was your impression of him?

AKALOVSKY: I went to London for six months and I was assigned another duty, not just to interpret for Stassen when we had the bilateral meetings with the Soviets. On the Soviet at that time was Zorin. Remember Zorin?

Q: Oh yes.

AKALOVSKY: So he asked me, ordered me, to write reports on the Soviet press and also reports on means, the reporting officer duty. So I was not only interpreting, but doing substantive work as well. That conference lasted almost six months and then the Soviets walked out in September 1957. Now to come back to Stassen, we celebrated his 50th birthday while we were in London. He was very much from _____ and he thought that Lodge had that job before.

Q: Henry Cabot Lodge.

AKALOVSKY: Right, and then Stassen regarded this as a stepping stone because he was the President's advisor on disarmament, this separate office on Jefferson Street in one of those town houses of the State Department. And then how I got into the arms control business, after that I went to _____ talks and so forth, always as a member of the delegation and not as interpreter, although I did some interpreting on the side. In 1960 the Agency for Arms Control was formed, the predecessor to ACDA (Arms Control and Disarmament Agency). I don't think most people are even aware of that.

Q: No.

AKALOVSKY: It was called the U.S. Disarmament Administration. It was established in August 1960 in response to the campaign proposal by Humphrey, and then Kennedy, to establish ACDA. The Eisenhower administration established this U.S. Disarmament Administration within the State Department. How that separates it [laughter] ... I mean history repeats itself. I was assigned there as an FSR, Foreign Service Reserve officer.

Q: Going back to the staff sometime... how serious are we taking disarmament proposals? Were we feeling in a way marking time that someday something might happen?

AKALOVSKY: Yes, well nobody had great expectations except Stassen maybe. Because, obviously, the situation was not right for them and basically arms control was quite different from what it became later. It was focused on Europe and basically disengagement disputes within the armed forces. There was a Norstad plan-

Q: General Lauris Norstad.

AKALOVSKY: And then Stassen presented the plan to the Soviets, unfortunately, without authorization from Washington. Eisenhower was up in arms in NATO, and then Dulles, and he sent three watchdogs to London. Stassen was recalled. We thought he would never come back when he did. But after the whole thing was over when the Soviets walked out in '57, Stassen was given reprieve. I still remember a Third Bloc cartoon of Stassen shivering behind his desk and icicles on his arms. That was the end of his career in government.

Q: What was your impression of the Soviet delegation when you were there? Zorin and those.

AKALOVSKY: Well, highly capable. They always had continuity.

Q: Did you have the feeling that these were people who were told keep talking for a while but don't do anything.

AKALOVSKY: The Soviets you mean?

Q: Yes.

AKALOVSKY: They couldn't do anything because our position was quite different. Their basic purpose at that time was propaganda war.

Q: Yes.

AKALOVSKY: On the one hand, they were in favor of banning the nuclear bomb. In Britain, especially in Britain at that time, there was strong movement. So they were trying to exploit that and of course there was some of that here too but less of it. Obviously, it was basically a PR war.

Q: Was there any feeling that you could reduce the tension on the borders by thinning out the forces and all?

AKALOVSKY: That was the hope, but the feeling was so different it was impossible to achieve.

Q: Geography always plays its thing. The Soviets could always pull a number of divisions back for two days away and we'd be sitting in the United States with our divisions.

AKALOVSKY: That was the crux of the problem.

Q: Geography at that time, things have changed a lot. Now at that time...

AKALOVSKY: Yes.

Q: This is the way I prefer it. In oral history, more is better than less.

AKALOVSKY: Yes, you can weed out...

Q: So, we'll pick this up again, after Stassen had left and they'd shut down that effort of disarmament after the Soviets walked out. And that was when, about 1957?

AKALOVSKY: Yes.

Q: We'll pick it up then in 1957.

AKALOVSKY: At the time of the establishment of the disarmament administration.

Q: Today is the 30th of June, 2000. Alex, 1957, where were you going?

AKALOVSKY: Well, I think I was talking about September of 1957. After that, we were engaged in negotiations with the Soviet Union about cultural exchanges with Ambassador Lacey, who was in charge of the delegation, and a couple of people from USIA, and then at that time there was an exchange staff in the State Department. Max _____ being one of the officers assigned to that staff. He was in the delegation. So we negotiated that I guess in September or October of 1957.

Q: Let's talk a bit about the negotiations. What were we after and what were the Soviets after?

AKALOVSKY: We were obviously after opening up the Soviet Union. And the Soviets were after information from our side and were not interested in information from their side.

Q: The Americans said that the Soviets only ought to go for information, but in the long run, on our part, the scientific things, even under the best of circumstances, I think it would be very hard to get exchange scholars to go to the Soviet Union to study scientific things. It was not the place to go.

AKALOVSKY: Of course they had a lot of people in the third world there, but not from the West.

Q: How did you find the negotiations went?

AKALOVSKY: Basically I would say it was a draw because on our side, while we were obviously speaking to open up the Soviets as much as possible, we were leery opening up our side too much to them. So there had to be a trade-off. Basically, from that standpoint, I would say it was a draw.

Q: Well, that's what you want. That's really what negotiations should all be about.

AKALOVSKY: That's right.

Q: Was our delegation a pretty professional one? What was your impression of how...

AKALOVSKY: We were doing quite well. We had a very _____, I don't remember his first name, but I remember his middle initials were SB, and he used to tell me, remind the Soviets that my initials are SB which means son of a bitch [laughter].

Q: [laughter] You could say that. [laughter]

AKALOVSKY: [laughter] And then we had another interesting character on our delegation, Shelton was his last name. Turner B. Shelton became famous, or infamous if you will, when he was ambassador to Nicaragua, years later. He was a big guy. During the earthquake, when he isolated himself, he didn't want to ...

Q: Yes, he had a movie connection, didn't he?

AKALOVSKY: Yes, sort of. When he was in the delegation in '57, he was in charge of the motion picture section in USIA. He stayed there for several years, and then became a Foreign Service officer; he told me that was his ambition. He went as chargé, at that time we didn't have an ambassador in Budapest of all places.

Q: Where?

AKALOVSKY: Budapest.

Q: Budapest, oh yes.

AKALOVSKY: I was in Moscow when Ambassador Shelton was leaving Budapest. We got cable after cable from Budapest about farewell parties for him. Citing different people saying how great he was. It was very amusing.

Q: From all accounts, I've heard he was a considerable self-promoter.

AKALOVSKY: Oh, yes.

Q: And other accounts said he was not adverse to making sure that important people, particularly Congressmen and all, had a good time wherever he went.

AKALOVSKY: Well, that's right. When he was in Managua, he was on the ball at first, but then when the earthquake hit...

Q: Yes.

AKALOVSKY: I'll tell you a little something about him a little bit later.

Q: Well, let's talk about the time you were dealing with him.

AKALOVSKY: Well, I had no problem with him. He was quite personable. And then in '58, Eric Johnson, you know who he was...

Q: Yes, he was...

AKALOVSKY: Head of the motion picture association. And Turner Shelton, the two of them plus, Eisenhower's brother, Milton, he was in the delegation too. The three of them, plus me, went to the Soviet Union to negotiate field exchanges under the umbrella of the cultural exchange. The cultural exchange was basically an umbrella agreement and the details in the negotiations between the various organizations, universities, and what not. So, when we arrived in Moscow, Eric Johnson was a special envoy of Roosevelt to the Soviet Union during the war.

Q: Oh, I had forgotten that.

AKALOVSKY: For some special mission. And he was greeted at the airport with pomp and so forth, we wined and dined. When we arrived, the only person who was at the airport was Hans Tuch. Do you know Hans Tuch?

Q: Oh, yes, Hans Tuch of the USIA.

AKALOVSKY: At that time he was a junior officer. No one from the Soviet Union hierarchy, and Eric Johnson looked at that, and he was dismayed that he was so snubbed by that. Then we arrived at the embassy. And Tommy Thompson was the ambassador there on his first tour as ambassador. He was out of the country, and Boris Klosson was DCM. We arrived at the embassy and Eric Johnson said, well I'll take over in the ambassador's office, and Boris said no sir, even I can't take his office. That was sort of the prelude to the trip.

Then we went down to Tashkent because there were movie studios in Moscow and in Tashkent. That was a very interesting experience because we arrived at Tashkent after a couple of days and then we were supposed to fly to _____, just for sightseeing. As we arrived at the airport early in the morning, 7-7:30 in the morning, we were accompanied by a woman, the minister of culture. So we sat down, had breakfast with cognac and they served brandy at breakfast. Then we were supposed to board the plane, and we saw people with bundles and baskets boarding the plane. Then the flight attendant came out and said, I'm sorry, the flight is full and we had been booked on the flight. And the minister of culture said, don't worry, don't worry, I'll take care of it. Just follow me. So we followed her and she counted noses, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, out, out, out, and the poor people meekly got out and we were given seats which was embarrassing to us.

AKALOVSKY: But coming back to Turner Shelton, we went actually to Stockholm and Helsinki, but that was strictly for the motion picture association business.

Q: What were you getting from Johnson on his take on the Soviet film industry at that time?

AKALOVSKY: Frankly, I don't know. He didn't comment at that time that the main issue was money.

Q: He wanted money for the movies...

AKALOVSKY: Right. The bargaining went something like this. He would say, when the movie costs, say $150,000, and the Soviets would come back and say, how much do I need? [laughter]

Q: [laughter]

AKALOVSKY: Literally. And then you say, well maybe $135,000. Well maybe $125, [laughter] bargaining.

Q: A rug merchant or something.

AKALOVSKY: Then we flew back to Moscow, and Cinemascope was a novelty at that time. One of the first movies in it was The Ten Commandments. Johnson, or maybe Turner Shelton, had no problem in showing this movie to the Soviets. Our embassy had no projector for showing the Cinemascope, but the German embassy did have one, so we had arranged for a showing in the German embassy in their hall there. After the end of the movie, the Soviets were polite, but the Minister of Culture, Madam Pultziva, remember her?

Q: Yes, she was the sole woman in the ministry of culture.

AKALOVSKY: In the cabinet. She was up high in the party hierarchy too. Again, I'll tell you something about her later. So the deputy to Pultziva, who had been the head of their delegation for the negotiations in Washington came up to me and said, you know the movie is okay, but why do they have to electrocute God? There was a burning bush and it was so poorly done that you could see the glowing wires, in those days [laughter].

Q: [laughter] They should have shown "How to Marry a Millionaire" with Marilyn Monroe and Betty Grable which came out at the same time. That would have had a much bigger impression in the Soviet Union.

AKALOVSKY: Did I tell you about, going back to '56 if I may, about my trip to the Soviet election observance?

Q: I don't think so. When was this?

AKALOVSKY: In '56, in the Spirit of Geneva, remember the Spirit of Geneva in '55?

Q: Oh yes.

AKALOVSKY: When Bulganin and the rest came to Geneva and then Eisenhower was there.

Q: Khrushchev and Bulganin. Twins.

AKALOVSKY: _____ was still not the highest. Anyway, under that Spirit, we had the first exchange visit by the Soviets to observe our elections and teach them how democracy works and there were three members of their delegation. One was Pudiatsec who was a party hack but also a commentator _____, then a man by the name of Rubenstein, a Russian, who was an elderly economics professor, and then Soloviev who was the head of the trade union associations who later fell into disfavor was _____. So they came in October of 1956, and we were supposed to travel all around the country, we went everywhere around the States. But we skipped _____. It coincided, of course, with the Hungarian uprising.

Q: October 1956 and the Suez.

AKALOVSKY: The Suez didn't affect us because it was earlier in the first place, and it didn't affect the trip, but everywhere we went at the airports there were people with placards, "Murders Go Home." That sort of thing. That, of course, didn't please me. But the people were very interested because they saw the country. The only thing they could not understand, or at least pretended not to understand, was that our parties are not ideological. Everywhere they went, they would ask what's the difference between the Democratic and Republican party in terms of philosophy. Well, especially in those days, it depended where you came from. If you were a Southern Democrat, you were more conservative than a Northern Republican.

Q: Absolutely.

AKALOVSKY: And so forth, so it was very difficult to give an answer.

Another thing that they couldn't understand, the Soviet visitors, was that everywhere we went we were served a traditional American dinner: steak and potatoes [laughter].

Q: [laughter]

AKALOVSKY: And after a while, they said, don't Americans eat anything but steak and potatoes? [laughter]

Q: [laughter]

AKALOVSKY: But we were invited to private homes, and they gave us...

Q: Yes.

AKALOVSKY: Then we arrived in Los Angeles, and at that time – I don't know if it still exists – there was a Russian food for Russians establishment called Bublisky. Not Romanov.

Q: I was thinking Romanov. A fake Romanov.

AKALOVSKY: No, it was called Bublisky. Do you know what Bublic in Russian is?

Q: No.

AKALOVSKY: It's like a bagel, much thinner.

Q: Oh, yes.

AKALOVSKY: Much like geberich in Belgrade. Remember geberich in Belgrade?

Q: Yeah.

AKALOVSKY: There was a famous song during the revolution called _____ Bublisky, Bye Bye Bagel. Our folks in Los Angeles invited us to go there in the evening. It's sort of a bar, night club. So as we arrived, we were greeted by a beautiful young girl who spoke to us in pure Russian. Regal, very polite, she said welcome and so forth. And our guests were stunned. Where did you learn your Russian so well? Very simple, she said, I was born in Crimea [laughter].

Q: [laughter]

AKALOVSKY: Oh, well how did you get here? I moved here with my parents. She was very brash. Well they sort of swallowed it. We went in and sat down and there was an orchestra playing, with balalaika and gypsy songs in Russian with a very good looking woman singing gypsy songs. They wanted to invite her to the table to chat with her, and so she came over to the table and they started talking Russian to her and she said what? They said we thought you speak Russian. No. Well how come you sang in Russian? I just learned the words [laughter].

Q: [laughter]

AKALOVSKY: She was Irish. Then, as I said, it was a pseudo-Russian establishment because it was sort of kitschy stuff, most of it, the décor. Above the bar there was stained glass. It looked like icons or stained glass in the church. One of the Soviets looked at it, actually we were accompanied by a man from the embassy, Gordon Witchcroft, who died in 1977, a nice young fellow. Anyway, I forget who it was, he looked up and said look there are icons up there, aren't there? Should there be icons in a bar? I said does that bother you, and he said, well, you know... it would be unusual. Then we went to Chicago (I'm not relating all this in the proper sequence), and the Sears Tower building was brand new at that time. We went to look at it, and the visitors said it was just a large box, not stylish. Our skyscrapers in Moscow, the Stalin wedding cake styles...

Q: Yes, wedding cake style, a university wasn't it and some apartment buildings?

AKALOVSKY: There were several. The foreign ministers liked that, pseudo Gothic or whatever it is. Have you seen our new embassy in Moscow?

Q: No, I've never been to Moscow.

AKALOVSKY: It's horrible. Like a factory or prison. So they said we don't like this. And the young guy from the embassy Tony _____ said, after New York it's not too bad after all [laughter].

Q: [laughter]

AKALOVSKY: We had a wonderful trip from Oakland to Denver on the California Zephyr train. I don't know if it still exists.

Q: I don't know. The kind with the dome.

AKALOVSKY: It was a 36-hour trip. Beautiful. We arrived in Oakland at the railroad station which was awful, just a shack. I don't know what it's like now. Before boarding, this guy from the embassy came to me and said, can you recommend a book for me to read during the long trip? So, on the newsstand, there were pocketbooks, and the first thing I saw was 1984.

Q: By George Orwell.

AKALOVSKY: I said it's an interesting book but I don't think you will like it. And he said, "No, no, no. What's it about?" I said, "Well, it's about what would happen to our society if certain trends in the world proceeded in the way they were going today." I think they got the hint. I tried to be as diplomatic as possible. And he said, well I'll get it, and he read it on the train. He came to me later and said this is depressing. There's no hope in that book. I said that's the point [laughter].

Q: [laughter] I have to mention this Alex, in the main square, in the big book store there, I saw one time in the agricultural section of the book store, this was during the Ivan Ribar regime, "Animal Farm" was there, which was of course was again by George Orwell, and anti-Communist... [laughter]

AKALOVSKY: [laughter] They didn't read it, didn't know what it was about.

Q: Well-informed Yugoslavs were buying it. They must have thought, oh, boy, we've got a great farming book here. [laughter]

AKALOVSKY: [laughter] Again, if I may digress for just a moment, since you mentioned the Yugoslav book... when I was in Moscow, the DCM who was there, a fellow from Sarajevo, who said he was Croatian, although he was Jewish. You weren't there at that time, were you... '55, '56?

Q: Yes, I was there.

AKALOVSKY: I don't know if you remember but there was a big debate within the Yugoslav academia circle, what was the language, was it Serbo-Croatian or Croatian-Serbian? Remember?

Q: Oh...

AKALOVSKY: Between the two academies.

Q: Oh, yes.

AKALOVSKY: And that was reflected in the embassy in Moscow. It was the DCM saying it was Croatian-Serbian, and the Serbian ambassador and the rest of us saying it was Serbo-Croatian.

Q: Back to this '56 trip, Khrushchev was in and we had great hopes.

AKALOVSKY: No, he wasn't in yet.

Q: Oh, he wasn't in yet.

AKALOVSKY: But we had some hope because of the Spirit of Geneva, which didn't last very long because after that we had the Berlin crisis, and the Soviets sent up Sputnik. Then we went to the big rally in Madison Square Garden, Republican, for Eisenhower. The young Roosevelt girl, she was Roosevelt's grand niece. A Republican, I forget her name. Remember Whitney who was our ambassador in Great Britain.

Q: John Whitney, yes...

AKALOVSKY: She was his stepdaughter; he was married to one of the Roosevelts. They were throwing _____ and eating hot dogs.

Going back to '58, we were with Eric Johnson. I told you about the movie, the Ten Commandments. Then we went to Warsaw from there. We were supposed to visit every Eastern European country, except for Sofia and Belgrade. _____ and from the Soviet perspective so it wasn't covered by our umbrella, even Poland and Czechoslovakia were not, but they were willing to follow through. So when we arrived in Warsaw, Poland, Jake Beam was now our ambassador. We stayed a couple days and then Johnson wanted to fly to Prague, but there were no direct flights to Prague. We had to fly to Vienna, and then Prague. Well he insisted we have a direct flight. He said to Beam to call the Poles and tell them to organize a direct flight. Jake was a very quiet, taciturn person, he said, well if you pay the landing fees for direct flights and so forth, I'll try [laughter]. But Johnson decided not to do that so we flew to Vienna and then Warsaw. Our trips there were not very successful in terms of getting a deal. Then we went to Budapest in '58, which was only two years after Berlin. Budapest was bustling. Lively with nightclubs and so forth although you could still see a lot of damage still on the buildings from the shelling. We went to the embassy, the chargé there saw us. We used to ride around Budapest in a powder blue convertible Cadillac. Cardinal Mindszenty was still in the embassy and Eric Johnson insisted that he wanted to see the Cardinal. And the chargé said, like Boris said about the ambassador's office in Moscow, no way. The only person in the embassy who can see the Cardinal is me. And again that infuriated Johnson. He had a tremendous ego.

AKALOVSKY: But we could see the Cardinal was on the upper floor in the embassy, we could see the big stairway, the open space in the whole building, remember...

Q: Yes.

AKALOVSKY: Like an apartment building. You could see him walking back and forth on the landing there. All we could see was his skirt, basically. Then we went to Bucharest first, and then went to Budapest. Then we were supposed to go to Bucharest again, I forget why. When we were in Budapest, I got a phone call from the embassy in Bucharest saying there was a cable for me. I remember the date – the 23rd of October, 1958. I said what is it about? Well, you have been assigned to the delegation to the nuclear test ban talks in Geneva. Oh, well we are flying to Bucharest and I'll pick up the cable then. So we went back to Bucharest and there was the cable and it said you are assigned to the delegation you are supposed to report to Geneva on the 31st of October, a week later, and due to the shortness of time, suggest you proceed directly after completion of your current mission. I looked at that and then he said, this is the punch line, expect the duration to be three weeks [laughter].

Q: [laughter]

AKALOVSKY: I remember that in '57 when I went to London with Stassen, my initial orders also said three weeks, but I stayed six months in London. I remembered that and with winter coming on, I'd never been to Geneva before and didn't exactly know what to expect. The cable said, "However, if you deem it essential, you are authorized to return to Washington." So, I deemed it essential to return, if only to gather different clothes, and to see my family, and so on.

Q: You were married at that time.

AKALOVSKY: Yes. So that was the end of the cultural exchange episode. And then I went to the test ban.

Q: Overall, how did the Johnson tour work?

AKALOVSKY: They did close a couple of deals for movies. Nothing spectacular. One interesting thing about Turner Shelton. During the entire trip, he would eat nothing but fried eggs, because he was concerned that he might get some disease, and decided that fried eggs were the safest thing [laughter]. Again, you know how Georgians are, Uzbeks are the same way, very hospitable.

Q: Oh yes. And you better participate in what they serve for you.

AKALOVSKY: Wine and everything. He would refuse everything. Just give me fried eggs and the people were shocked of course.

Q: Oh, yes.

AKALOVSKY: He was not the greatest _____. He died some years ago.

Q: This was a test ban...

AKALOVSKY: Yes, you see what happened in 1958, there was pressure for at least stopping atmospheric tests, even earlier. There were big demonstrations, especially in England, less so in this country.

Q: The Soviets had set off some huge...

AKALOVSKY: That was in the '60s. This was _____ moratorium. In '57, the Soviets wanted a permanent ban on atmospheric testing, at least a sense of it. Deep down they didn't. They knew we wouldn't buy it, but they kept pushing for it. And then we came back with some partial proposals like suspension for a year, and then see how things go. The Soviets wouldn't buy that either. Coming back to '58, after some negotiations with the Soviets, we agreed to explore the possibility of a nuclear test ban – including all tests, including underground. We had a scientific meeting in August in New York, with seismologists and people like that. You know Ron Spiers?

Q: Yes.

AKALOVSKY: Ron was part of the delegation on the political side and that lasted about a month. After that, we agreed to have these talks with scientists participated and the delegation. Harold Brown was one of our scientists. He was head of Livermore at the age of 28, at that time in '58. Then he was Secretary of the Air Force, then Secretary of Defense. He is now in California. I don't know what he's doing. A very different kind of character, a very acerbic sense of humor.

Q: When you went out there, what was the American side after?

AKALOVSKY: We were after on-site inspection. We would not buy any plan without on-site inspection, to be foolproof.

Q: In those days, what would on-site inspection mean?

AKALOVSKY: The on-site inspection meant that if you had a wiggle on the seismograph that looked suspicious to you, that indicated that it might be something other than an earthquake, then you were entitled to send a team to that site, to the location of the tremor and inspect to see what really happened.

Q: This would be for underground tests.

AKALOVSKY: Yes. For above ground testing, there was not need, really, because there would be fallout. Those talks lasted until '63.

Q: How long were you there? From when to when?

AKALOVSKY: I was there from October '58 to the end. What happened was there were negotiations between us, the Soviets and the UK, because they were testing on our sites, so they were participating in the negotiations as well. And then in 1962, the 18 nation disarmament committee was established. But when this was established, our negotiations were sort of a subcommittee of that committee, bilateral, but there was no progress and so it petered out. I left in '65, and by that time it had petered out. I left Geneva then. When the Soviets introduced their Troika concept, remember that?

Q: I don't remember what the Troika concept was.

AKALOVSKY: When Hammarskjöld died in the Congo, the question was who would succeed him as Secretary General of the United Nations. The Soviets insisted that it be a three-headed hydra, one from the West, one from the East, and one Alliance. The Alliance was a brand new movement, '68...

Q: Kind of a seven in the Soviet pocket, not quite, but close.

AKALOVSKY: It depended to whom you were talking. But the Soviets certainly wanted to make it, no question about it. They were always leaning in that direction. We refused to do that. It was hard to replace Hammarskjöld but the Soviets applied this concept to a lot of other things. Including, in 1957 when the London disarmament talks were going on, then in 1960 there were no talks except for the nuclear testing. Nothing on disarmament per se. By 1960, we'd reached agreement with the Soviets to have a ten nation committee, five NATO, five Warsaw Pact nations, and they met and I was on the delegation at that time. It lasted two months, in 1960. Of course the U-2 incident occurred. The meetings started sometime in March, went through April, then U-2 came, and it lasted another month or so. And the Soviets walked out again. The entire eastern side walked out.

Q: Was there a feeling at the time... Khrushchev came in during this fight, '58-ish or so, was there a feeling that Khrushchev was interested in a change?

AKALOVSKY: Yes, but he was going hot and cold.

Q: During these initial negotiations, because we are talking about all types of testing, aren't we?

AKALOVSKY: Yes.

Q: Was there the realization of how dangerous the above ground tests were?

AKALOVSKY: And getting into kelp and kelp was used in all kinds of products including ice cream. Well there were arguments among scientists, and I can't judge who was right or wrong, but obviously there must be some ill effects. The U-2 incident, I was in Geneva and then when this happened... going back again. When Khrushchev came to the States, in '59, I went with Nixon to the Soviet Union, spent two weeks with him there and then we went to Poland.

Q: Shall we talk about the Nixon trip?

AKALOVSKY: Sure.

Q: This was really Nixon's first time there. How did he use you and his delegation? What was your impression of Nixon?

AKALOVSKY: He was very, very much relying on everybody. Tommy Thompson was of course our ambassador at that time. I was in Geneva in '59, and got a cable that I was to be interviewed by Nixon's vice president staff. I didn't know what about, and I flew back to Washington and I was called in by General Robert Cushman who became later the head of the Marine Corps. He was at that time Nixon's military aide. A very nice man. And Herb Klein who was at the time director of communications later on in the White House, but at that time he was press secretary. Also a very nice man. So I was called in and they wanted to give me a test in Russian, to see if I even spoke Russian to see how good an interpreter I would be. So it was set up like this, the tape, and so forth, and translated this thing, and it would be examined by experts. To make a long story short, I was selected, out of I don't know how many candidates, to go with Nixon. Prior to our trip, Nixon had a reception in his home, which was somewhere in Spring Valley. Julie and Patricia were tiny girls at that time, and it was a lovely affair, very informal. Nixon was a terrible introvert, one of his basic problems. But on this occasion, very, very nice. And then we went to Moscow. As we arrived, I was quartered in the Ukrainian hotel, which was about ten minutes from the embassy, very nice. It's a huge wedding cake type of hotel on the other side of the Moscow River. On the very first morning in Moscow, Nixon got up early, 6 a.m., and he and one of his security people went for a stroll. He wanted to see the city, and came to a market place and there were vendors, and that, I don't know exactly know what he wanted to buy, but the price was 50 kopeks or a ruble and he gave a ten ruble note to the man, then vendor, and he said keep the change. But the man said, oh, no, we don't accept tips or bribes. This was blown up the same day in the afternoon press, about Nixon's attempt to pay off Soviet citizens and buy their souls as it were. And of course, Nixon had no such intentions, and ten rubles in those days was next to nothing. A dollar or so. So he said there was some misunderstanding, that he was not bribing at all, didn't want anything in return. I was moved from the Ukrainian hotel to the Spaso House, and Nixon was telling me, you stay with me everywhere I go from now on. [laughter]

Q: [laughter]

AKALOVSKY: Which I did. I must say, I had a very good relationship with him.

Q: Most of the Foreign Service when they dealt with Nixon, found him to be someone who really listened and absorbed and was able to use what he absorbed. Did you find this?

AKALOVSKY: Definitely. He sought advice and followed advice.

Q: He never apparently cared for the Foreign Service, but that was almost a social thing, but a lot of them had a lot of respect for him.

AKALOVSKY: One of the episodes that we had...we went to a factory in Sverdlovsk, Yeltsin's hometown, which at that time was a closed area, but they opened it up for Nixon. We also went to [Russian name], it was closed but they opened it up for Nixon, one of the famous academic cities there. When we were in Sverdlovsk, we went to a factory. There were a lot of factories there. There was a pretty young girl there, and Nixon of course said hello, and made small talk, and asked are you married, and she said no. He said, how come? She was offended, and took it the wrong way, and said nobody wanted her. He meant, how come a pretty girl like you, and the stupid men, and so forth, he didn't say all that. She became very offended and blushed and said it's none of your business. I explained it to him and said she really didn't understand it the right way, and I said why don't you embroider it a little? And he went and did that and said, such a pretty girl, and the stupid young men, and ... that sort of thing he found a use for me. Not of course, in official talks.

Q: Now in official talks, were you sitting next to Nixon, and they had somebody, and - How about the kitchen cabinet debate?

Q: Yes, the kitchen debate...

AKALOVSKY: Of course that during trip when Nixon was there.

Q: Another trip.

AKALOVSKY: No, same trip, that was July of '59. That was a model kitchen that even in the States was outlandish, with all the gadgets, dishwasher moving close to the table after you pressed a button... we still don't have that thing, not that we needed it. Anyway, Khrushchev would not be impressed by that thing, and said, again we were trying to pull the wool over their eyes, a fable and this is not true. And Nixon said we are not trying to do anything like that we are just trying to show you what our life is like in the United States. But despite the other reports in that scene, I was not involved. I was there, but the crowd was so big I got pushed back. I could hear but I could not translate. So the Soviet guy did that, and he made some boo boos there, having some trouble translating some of the Russian proverbs and sayings.

There's a Russian saying that literally translated, well I shouldn't because it wouldn't make any sense... but it's, we'll show you Kuzma's mother. What it really means is, we'll teach you a lesson. And Khrushchev used that expression in that debate, saying well, eventually when we catch up to you in terms of reduction [of radiation] in pepto milk and blah blah blah, we'll teach you a lesson. [Speaks Russian] And the poor interpreter didn't want to translate that, and said well this is a saying about Kuzma's mother, and nobody could make any sense out of it. The next day, there was a big story about the Kitchen Debate and how Khrushchev had told off Nixon, etc., but the poor American interpreter didn't know the words and didn't know how to translate.

The same evening, there was a reception, and duBay and Khrushchev's son-in-law, Aleksei I. Adzhubei at that time, married to Rada, a very nice woman. I saw duBay at the reception, and I went up to him and said, you know you were at the kitchen debate when we were in the kitchen, and he said yes, and I said you know who interpreted, and he said yes, so I said so why do you print in your paper that it was I and not your man who goofed? We have freedom of the press, too. That was his response. [laughter]

Q: [laughter] What was your impression during this visit... I mean when the Vice President visits, it's more for show than anything else...

AKALOVSKY: Yes, there were no agreements or anything.

Q: What was your impression of how Khrushchev was dealing with Nixon at that time?

AKALOVSKY: Well, Khrushchev was a very volatile person. Very volatile. He could switch from one mood to another in no time and switch back and forth. But when we arrived in July, or maybe while we were there, Congress had passed a captive nation resolution and Khrushchev was incensed. Here we are greeting you, Mr. Nixon, our honored guest, and so forth, and at the same time, you are, pardon the expression, you are shitting in our tea. And Nixon didn't take that lightly at all, this expression. [laughter]

Q: [laughter]

AKALOVSKY: And he answered in a similar vein. So, you know, he was pretty tough, Nixon. Very tough. But there were not agreements of anything, it was for Nixon to open the exhibit and tour the country.

Q: Did you find that Nixon was taking things in as he went around...

AKALOVSKY: Oh, yes.

Q: Part of this is domestic policy in the United States so you are trying to show that I dealt with the Soviets on an equal basis and I know the country a bit. I was wondering if there was another layer there of a man who was trying to understand the society and asking questions...

AKALOVSKY: Oh he was asking very pertinent questions. And his entourage was interesting too. He had Admiral Rickover, Milton Eisenhower, and a number of people who were quite knowledgeable and interested in the whole thing themselves. Rickover went to look at the famous ice breaker in Leningrad. Rickover was a fun guy. We were flying someplace and he was reading something like this literally... [demonstrates]

Q: You are saying he ran his finger very quickly down the page and went on to another page.

AKALOVSKY: I asked Rickover, "Speed-reading?" He said, no, I'm just looking for something more interesting. [laughter]

Q: [laughter] Did you find it difficult to be an interpreter at this high level?

AKALOVSKY: This was my first high level. Well Stassen was pretty high level too, but not as high as this. In terms of work, it was basically the same thing and I had to adjust it so I wasn't too emotional in the high level things. As I said, the Nixons, both of them, Pat was with him too, are extremely nice, unpretentious, down to earth. The situation changed much later.

Q: Well, situations, particularly crowds are tricky anyway, and one always thinks of the... I'm not sure when it cropped up, but with Khrushchev saying, "We'll bury you", which means we'll live longer than you will. But it sounds like we are going to kill you.

AKALOVSKY: Exactly.

Q: How did that come about? Or that wasn't on your watch...

AKALOVSKY: No, that was way before my watch. No it's the press, among other people. They pick up this and they do it all the way and it's very difficult to change.

Q: Yes, look what we are talking about now. It happened over 50 years ago and we are still talking about that.

AKALOVSKY: Yes, I agree. That was mistranslated, misunderstood.

Q: Things were happening so rapidly, that when you get to proverbs do you have to have a self censor so that you don't come up with something that might be misinterpreted?

AKALOVSKY: Oh, yes, sure. Not only proverbs, but in general. Some words have a different effect in different languages. I'll give you one example, going back to Stassen. Zorin was there, he was head of Soviet resolution in London. In one of his statements he started complaining about the slow paced, turtle-like pace of the negotiations. And Stassen took it as a personal affront to him, that he was a turtle. How he got to that understanding, I don't know. So he turns to me, I was the only one sitting behind him, with a red face and so forth and says, how should I answer that? I said, don't, he didn't mean you, he was just complaining about the slow pace of our negotiations, he didn't do anything wrong. Which was a fact. Sometimes you have to intervene or explain something.

Then we went to Poland with Nixon after that. Jacob Beam was still ambassador. Talking about relations with the Foreign Service, Nixon liked Jake very much. When Nixon was president, he sent him as ambassador to Moscow.

Q: One of the great complaints about these trips of high dignitaries, President, Vice President and so forth, the support staff that goes along with the principle person, is that they are arrogant, they push people aside, and they stir up more ill feelings than the principals can create good will. Did you find this with the Nixon trip?

AKALOVSKY: No, Nixon had a very small entourage, very small, so there was no problem there. But that brings to my mind another thing, which I skipped in '59 before Nixon's visit. There were quite a few incidents. Aleksei Kosygin came, who was then number two in Moscow, for the opening of the Soviet exhibit in the Coliseum in New York. I don't know if you recall, he came the first time on a TU-104, which is a very tall plane, and they didn't have the right steps, the ramp to wheel up to the plane, so they had to put a ladder on top of the ramp so they could get off at JFK. The reason I remember that is, talking about the support staff, we went to the opening of the exhibit in the Coliseum, and it was with Kosygin and some city officials and so forth, and several women on the Soviet delegation, all high ranking. Ministers of culture. We were boarding an elevator, there were a lot of people pushing and shoving, and the security people literally threw out a couple of Soviet women.

Q: Soviet secret service people.

AKALOVSKY: No, no, secret service. That's how they behaved, not thinking what they were doing. They didn't ask who are you and so forth, just push you out. That created a lot of bad feeling for the visitors. So you are right, the entourage...not only security people, Foreign Service or staff aides sometimes behaved very arrogantly.

Q: Oh, yes. I would have thought that it was always difficult to have a Soviet high functionary go to New York because, well no matter what nationality, you've got a dissident group that is going to take violent exception to whoever you are. [laughter]

AKALOVSKY: [laughter] Yes, in the '60s there was the famous shoe incident, you know, with Khrushchev banging his shoe...

AKALOVSKY: At the UN.

Q: Did you run across, in this trip with Nixon, Gromyko at all?

AKALOVSKY: Yes, well I met Gromyko before that.

Q: What was your first impression of him?

AKALOVSKY: Well, contrary to all the reports you see that he was dour or he had no sense of humor.... not true. He had a pretty good sense of humor. He could smile and he could laugh and he was very human. There were a lot of misconceptions that probably came out, not only about Soviets in general themselves public figures. Like when I mentioned Khrushchev, in '61 I went to... well, let's finish this first and I'll come back to it.

Q: Well, after the Nixon trip, you went back to Geneva?

AKALOVSKY: Yes, well maybe I didn't because I was still with the delegation, but I may have stayed here because Khrushchev was coming.

Q: Oh, yes, you were on the Khrushchev trip.

AKALOVSKY: Yes.

Q: Let's talk about that. That's a very famous trip.

AKALOVSKY: The large one, with the official escort. We went to Los Angeles, to Iowa, Knott's Farm, to New York, San Francisco. Khrushchev had been there before, with Nixon, and knew the area, but cause when we were talking about disarmament. Dulles....

Q: What was your impression of Dulles?

AKALOVSKY: Well, I didn't know Dulles too well, but in those days, '56, '57, Khrushchev kept sending Eisenhower missives, primarily about disarmament matters you know, ban the bomb. Long, long letters, which we had to translate of course. Before we went to that process, Dulles used to call me into his office, which was in the old building where the acting director kept his office later. And he wanted me to give him a preliminary translation before he went to the White House, or before it was translated. And he would sit there like you are and I would sit here, and [he'd say] read this and translate this into English, and he would write or read, talk on the phone, or something else, and I would stop, and he'd say, no, no, continue, continue, I'm listening. Well, there was one letter where Dulles was accused of trying to stir up a third world war. Stevenson was against the H-bomb. And Dulles was the bad guy, he was against banning the H-bomb. As I came to this passage and read it to him, he stopped and said, what? What? Would you repeat it again? [laughter]

Q: [laughter]

AKALOVSKY: And then another interesting episode with Dulles. He was sitting at a desk like this, and I was reading one of the missives from Khrushchev. At one point, Jake Beam who was then head of Office Eastern Affairs, came walking in on his tiptoes and said, Mr. Secretary, we just got reports that Soviet troops have surrounded Warsaw. That was during the October '56 Polish crisis, when Garrick and Movoka would be released from prison, and there was some unrest in Poland. And Dulles said, oh, oh, and he got up and viewed the map behind him on the wall and said, Alex, let's look where Warsaw is. [laughter]

Q: [laughter] On the Khrushchev trip to Washington, how did that work?

AKALOVSKY: It was, again, our people wanted to be as hospitable and nice as possible. I'm talking about five people who didn't have any official function, as the hosts were always from private organizations, like in San Francisco, the Economic Club, so he went to that. The Center for Capitalism, things like that. Then in Los Angeles we were met by a representative of the mayor who turned out to be the son of a Russian Jewish family.

Q: Was this Yorty?

AKALOVSKY: The mayor?

Q: Yes. Sam Yorty.

AKALOVSKY: I guess the mayor was Sam Yorty at that time.

Anyway we got in the car, a big limousine, a young man... well Khrushchev and he started talking to the man, who proudly announced that his parents came from Rostov in Russia. And Khrushchev said what were you doing there? And he answered he was in a factory. Khrushchev said, oh, I might have occupied that factory and pushed your parents out of there. It wasn't a very friendly exchange on Khrushchev's part you know.

Q: No.

AKALOVSKY: Then we were hosted by the Hollywood community, the movie stars there, with open arms, spirit of detente, and so forth. And then we went to a movie studio where they were making the movie, Can Can...

Q: Can Can, yes, Cole Porter's...

AKALOVSKY: We saw the scene where the dancing started. We were seated actually where there were actually props of the New Orleans house, balcony, and so forth, and we got seats there to watch the whole thing. And then we went down and Khrushchev started slapping the girls, dancers, on their butts and so forth. He had a great time. But the next day he made a big speech accusing American hosts of exposing him to this filth, you know -

Q: I remember that.

AKALOVSKY: Indecent exposure, etc.

Q: It sounds like the Soviets and Khrushchev were trying too hard to play both ends.

AKALOVSKY: Oh, yes, sure. First of all, the problem was on a personal level he obviously was enjoying the show. I was there watching him enjoy the show.

Q: Yes. Well, did you observe, I've seen where Khrushchev had his own translator.

AKALOVSKY: He actually had two. When he first arrived, it was Teranovski. Teranovski, is the son of a former ambassador to the United States, had friends here. A very nice man. Then they had Sukadar, who became famous with Brezhnev and Khrushchev earlier, primarily as an interpreter. He was very, very good. Teranovski was already being groomed to become Khrushchev's sort of personal aide, because after the first few days, he sort of took over the interpreting function. In knowledge, at that level at least, and he did very well. But both of them had problems with proverbs or sayings or expressions. When Khrushchev was talking about the future of communism and capitalism, he used the Russian expression that communism will never collapse, capitalism will collapse, this will only happen when the shrimp whistles. And Sukadar got lost. How could he translate it? He started saying it literally and nobody got the meaning of it. You know what it means...

Q: Yes, basically when pigs can fly...

AKALOVSKY: Yes, when hell freezes over.

Q: Yes. I would think for someone to translate this sophisticated, to translate for Khrushchev would be very difficult because he really came from a Ukrainian miner's background.

AKALOVSKY: Well, you are wrong, if I may say so. Not Ukrainian. He was born just across the border from the Ukraine. And he told me himself, later, that he worked in the Ukraine, but he was not Ukrainian.

Q: Yes, well he came from essentially peasant worker background where you learn your expressions...

AKALOVSKY: A lot of folksy expressions.

Q: Yes...

AKALOVSKY: A lot of them were more than folksy.

Q: Yes, and a sophisticated Moscow boy would learn English as a boy would not pick up folksy expressions.

AKALOVSKY: Well a lot of them are very common. This particular one is very common [speaks Russian]. Actually the translation of when the shrimp whistles ... when the pike sings, but nobody listened to the first part. But Teranovski had problems just before leaving, before Khrushchev's departure from Washington, there was a national press conference. And they were talking about the Soviets having sent this satellite to the moon. And the question from the press was, when are you going to launch a man to the moon? Teranovski was translating then, because of the big event, so they put him ... in reserve, I guess. And the way he put it in Russian, he used a verb which in Russian can mean two things. One to launch, and the other to neglect or to sort of throw out of sight. So Khrushchev chose to interpret the question the second way, and said, we, we never neglect our people, we take good care of them from cradle to grave and so on and so on. And of course the audience, the press people were confused, what is he talking about? Poor Teranovski didn't have the presence or what not to intervene and say that there's a misunderstanding, that isn't it at all. So the question was never resolved as far as the press was concerned as to why Khrushchev answered that way.

Q: How did you find the time on the Garst farm in Iowa? This almost seemed to be the high point of the trip, was it or did it?

AKALOVSKY: Well there was a big to do about it in the press, and there was also the situation where somebody misrepresented themselves as the son of Garst... There was admission control, and ... who managed to get in who claimed he was Garst's son, and there was a big stink about it. Of course, Khrushchev kept saying they could do the same thing because they had this big program called [Russian word]...

Q: Virgin land.

AKALOVSKY: In Kazakhstan, in that area, in central Asia. They could grow corn from grass, hybrid corn which never prospered apparently. The whole corn program was a fiasco. For one thing, in Russia they don't eat corn. It's fodder.

Q: It's fodder... well that's true in all of Europe.

AKALOVSKY: That's right. Well, in the Balkans and in Yugoslavia they eat corn. And in Italy there's polenta, a corn meal. Otherwise they don't eat corn. So that was not a big success.

Q: At the end of this thing, what was your feeling and other Americans who were involved in the trip...had this helped at all or in trying to show our best face sort of gotten the backs up of the Soviet leadership?

AKALOVSKY: Well our main concern at that time was that the Soviets come out of Berlin. And Eisenhower had Khrushchev to Camp David at the end of this trip. Eisenhower hardly saw Khrushchev before and then we went touring and then came back for a business session basically, at Camp David. At that meeting, Khrushchev backed away from a policy meeting. At least he gave the impression of backing away.

Q: The card that the Soviets kept waving around there and threatening to play was that there would be a peace treaty with the East Germans.

AKALOVSKY: Exactly.

Q: -and once they did it, they would back away and we'd have to deal with the East Germans. And we were saying hell no, and that meant Berlin.

AKALOVSKY: Well Berlin was in a state of_____ -

Q: After, was there a feeling that relations were a little bit better?

AKALOVSKY: Yes, hope, I'm not sure there was a feeling, but there was hope. Then came the U-2. Eisenhower was invited to come to the Soviet Union. It was supposed to be in June and then Khrushchev cancelled the invitation after the U-2 incident.

Q: And Eisenhower was in Paris.

AKALOVSKY: I was there too with him then.

Q: What were you doing?

AKALOVSKY: The Bordeaux Summit.

Q: Had anything started at that summit?

AKALOVSKY: Started? It was just the opposite. The summit had been scheduled before the U-2 incident, primarily at Harold Macmillan's insistence.

Q: Prime Minister of Great Britain.

AKALOVSKY: Yes. He very much wanted the summit because he was desperately trying to get the test ban done, and he thought the summit could resolve this issue. Of course the U-2 incident occurred when we came to Paris, and de Gaulle was sitting there in front of the big fireplace in a regal posture like this, you know, presiding over the whole thing. Here was de Gaulle for example, Khrushchev was sitting on his left, Nixon on his right, and Eisenhower facing on the other side of the table. Khrushchev was flanked by his defense minister and Gromyko. On our side, we had Herter and that was it. Only five people were allowed to be part of the delegation. Dick Walters, then Colonel. He was seated behind Eisenhower, and I was sitting behind Herter. And Chip Bohlen got in the room as note taker, and he was seated at a small table in the back. And the same kind of arrangement for the British, and the Soviets. De Gaulle spoke first, and then Khrushchev gave a fiery speech lambasting the United States for intruding upon their territory and stuff like that. And then Eisenhower's turn came. Eisenhower's face got redder and redder as Khrushchev gave his speech. Eisenhower understood French, spoke it very well, and according to protocol he was first interpreted in the language of the host country. So French came first and Dick Walters did that. But Eisenhower read the first paragraph of the text and stopped. Dick and I both had the text in front of us so we could pay attention. Dick is a delightful fellow, you should talk to him, he has thousands of delightful stories... he wrote a book of these.

AKALOVSKY: That was primarily about Iran. Anyway, I guess his mind must have wandered because when Eisenhower stopped, [Dick] turned to me and said, Alex where did he stop? So I pointed to the end of the first paragraph, and he got up and went into the French translation of the first two paragraphs. In other words, he translated a paragraph that Eisenhower hadn't spoken yet. And Eisenhower sort of good-naturedly said, Dick I don't think I've said that yet. [laughter]

Q: [laughter]

AKALOVSKY: And then I got up and translated only the first paragraph.

Q: Khrushchev came in at that point and sort of...

AKALOVSKY: The summit was never finished anyhow, because he walked out, he never came back. So we had one morning session. He made a speech with de Gaulle saying, well he complained about planes flying over his Soviet territory, it wasn't about your Sputnik flying over my territory. He never lost his calm, de Gaulle. Neither did Eisenhower. Then Khrushchev left. So the three stayed behind and deliberated what to do. Macmillan was almost in tears. Literally. He wanted to stay at the summit. Again, it was at his insistence it was decided to reconvene in the afternoon and see what happened, to see if he would come as scheduled before an afternoon session. So the three came, and we had the French police every once in a while inquire about Khrushchev's whereabouts, what he was doing. What he was doing was traveling all around Paris, sight-seeing, making remarks to the crowd and so forth. And every time his motorcade would turn in the direction of the Elysee Palace Macmillan would say, he's coming, he's coming. But he never came.

Q: What was your feeling that people were saying, I mean the U-2 was not a good idea at that time. It flew over the Soviet Union on May Day, and Eisenhower denied it even happened.

AKALOVSKY: It wasn't May Day, it was the end of May, May 31st.

Q: Oh, May 31st. Was the feeling that this was... something like this could have been taken care of by saying, it was unfortunate... on the Soviet side...

AKALOVSKY: Oh no... They wanted to blow it up, obviously, for their purposes. This incident brings up another different point about translation. In his speech, I don't know if you ever read the book, The U-2 Affair by David Wise...

Q: I think I have.

AKALOVSKY: Well, he mentioned that in his book. In his speech, he said that the Soviet government cannot tolerate activity like that, over flights, and things like that. It was a matter of, to us the Russian word, politizica. And Chip Bohlen interpreted this phrase with great significance, because he thought this meant internal politics, politics, not policy, was the driving force of the war. I didn't believe it that way because I couldn't conceive Khrushchev or any other Soviet leader admitting-

Q: Yes, well, whatever the motivation...

AKALOVSKY: I thought it was simply a matter of our policy, not to tolerate... so Chip and I disagreed on that, and this is mentioned in David Wise's book. But of course, if Chip was right, it was very significant.

Q: Right.

AKALOVSKY: But I couldn't conceive Khrushchev really admitting that there was some internal politicking over this issue.

Q: I don't know if whether over time Khrushchev felt he was unsure...I don't think there was any internal pressure at that time. He was pretty much in control.

AKALOVSKY: That's right.

Q: Maybe this is a good time to stop. We've been going for two hours now. Let's just put at the end, we've just finished the end of the Bordeaux Summit, was it May of 1960?

AKALOVSKY: It was back and forth.

Q: Did you go back to Geneva at this time? Did this end your... or did you get involved in other translation activities at the upper level of the American government?

AKALOVSKY: Well, in '60 I went back to Geneva, yes. In '59 we had the last negotiations on Germany.

Q: Okay, next time, let's pick up in '59 the last negotiations on Germany, and going back to the Geneva negotiations after the aborted Paris summit, okay?

AKALOVSKY: Okay.

HARRY G. BARNES, JR.
Soviet Desk Officer

Ambassador Barnes was born in Minnesota and raised in Minnesota and New York. He was educated at Amherst College and Columbia University. After service in the US Army in World War II, he joined the Foreign Service and was posted in 1950 to Bombay, India. His other foreign posts include Prague, Moscow, Kathmandu and Bucharest. He served as United States Ambassador to Romania (1974-1977; India (1981-1985) and Chile (1985-1996) in addition to having several senior level assignments at the State Department in Washington. Ambassador Barnes was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: Well, then you were in language school from '55 to '56.

BARNES: From summer to summer.

Q: And then to Moscow?

BARNES: I was delayed getting to Moscow because of housing shortages. Instead of going fairly quickly, we didn't get to Moscow until the early part of '57 and I had some time on the Soviet desk.

Q: Then you were in Moscow from '57 until?

BARNES: February, the end of January of '57 until February of '59.

***

Q: Then you were in Moscow from '57 until?

BARNES: February, the end of January of '57 until February of '59.

Q: Who was our ambassador then?

BARNES: Chip Bohlen when I just got there but only for a couple of months. He left later that spring and Tommy Thompson. [Editor's Note: Ambassador Bohlen served in Moscow from April 1953 to April 1957. His successor Ambassador Llewellyn Thompson served from July 1957 to July 1962.]

Q: What was your job?

BARNES: I was the publications procurement officer.

Q: Oh, yes. Could you explain what that?

BARNES: Sure. Essentially I was a book buyer on behalf of U.S. Government entities ranging from the (Central Intelligence) Agency to the Library of Congress, since it was impossible to get Russian books of all sorts essentially outside the Soviet Union, I supposed some could be found in Western Europe. All I had to do was to in effect sort of memorize the requirements of the various agencies, plus I periodically got shopping lists. Look for this, look for that and be in the interesting position of becoming a preferred customer in Moscow bookstores because I would help them fulfill their plan. It was a great job because I had to learn my way around Moscow. I had to learn my way to various provincial cities as well because there was interest in publications in Leningrad or Kiev, but also because things that might be sold out in Moscow for one reason or another you might be able to pick up in other places, so much of my time was spent traveling.

Faced the usual travel problems, of course. When earlier I was comparing Czechoslovakia with Moscow, I had in mind was that in Moscow you had to file forty eight hours ahead of time, you didn't know until the last minute if whether you were going to be able to go. You couldn't drive outside twenty five kilometers of Moscow without permission and if it was a question of plane or train, you'd only get tickets through the state agencies. So you were stuck a good part of the time. So you planned and maybe you went and maybe you didn't. On the whole, I got out a fair amount.

About the second half of my career there, I got involved in cultural exchanges as a de facto like an assistant cultural officer. There was one USIA officer there who took on those responsibilities as a result of those called the Lacy-Zarubin agreement in late '57 – '58 setting the framework for exchanges between the U.S. and the USSR; the Khrushchev thaw period. The opportunities opened up quite rapidly and so it was useful to have a second person, so I worked on student exchanges, I worked on a composers' exchange, an artist exchange. I had a chance to meet Russians in a way I didn't other than my book experience and I also traveled with some of these delegations so that added to my experience.

Q: Let's go back to the book thing first. I would think, I mean obviously you were trying to get published information for information services, I mean you can call them intelligence, but it's farther than that. The Soviets knew what we were doing, did you have any problems?

BARNES: No. I can't be sure, that when I asked for something and was told it was not in stock, or not available, it might have been available, if I had been Russian. On the other hand, my general impression as I say, was I was looked upon with favor in trying to get things or things would be held for me rather than the other way around.

Q: Did you go in and say, "If such and such comes in, could you call me?"

BARNES: Yes. Sometimes they would keep things for me because they knew sort of the pattern. I was interested for example in economic development across the board and there were specialized bookstores which tended to do more in certain areas than in others and so they would know something of my pattern and would say, "We've held this for you. Is this something you would be interested in?" As well as making a note and saying, "I'll let you have it if it comes in."

Q: Were you interested in provincial newspapers too, or were those probably gotten by the translation service.

BARNES: Provincial newspapers we did get some of that and it sort of served as a forwarding agency.

Q: Were there many English or French books, German books, translated into Russian?

BARNES: There were some books primarily in technical fields and some literature, but since I wasn't interested in non-Russian books, I really didn't pay that much attention.

Q: I was told by one of my Yugoslav staff at the embassy, this was just a few years later, "Go to the big bookstore in Belgrade and look under agriculture" and there sure enough was a book called, in English called Animal Farm by George Orwell. (laughter)

Did you find a different attitude when you would go to Kiev or Tashkent or wherever you were going into these stores for buying? Or was it pretty much the same?

BARNES: It varied somewhat; some hesitancy in some places, particularly places where Americans didn't show up that often, hesitancy, puzzlement, and so on but on the whole, fairly friendly. Again in Moscow I had what was in effect a business relationship with a number of bookstores and was a known quantity. In the provinces I would be there less often, in some places I ended up going only once during my tour, some places a couple of times. It was not quite comparable. I think there would always have to be a certain amount of reserve in the back of people's minds just in case. I never concealed the fact that I was from the American Embassy.

Q: I was wondering whether when you went to stay at overnight hotels and all that, were you sort of put at a special table or things of that nature?

BARNES: No, but again it was probably prudent on the part of Soviet citizens not to associate with foreigners. For our part we of course, had been trained to be a little wary. Only once I took a chance and took somebody up on, somebody who had been connected with a bookstore. He invited me out to dinner and it was one of these places where the lines sort of went through the middle of the town in terms of what was acceptable for foreigners to visit and what wasn't. I asked this particular individual was it OK for me to step across that line a hundred meters or something like that. He said yes with enough assurances so I didn't end up worrying.

Another time when I was with a colleague of mine from the embassy, an economic officer, he had a camera and we got stopped because he was accused of filming something that supposedly wasn't filmable. He obviously didn't think so; I have forgotten if it was a mosque in Central Asia, or a market or what not. They eventually let us go, but nothing much more serious than that. With one exception which I will tell you later.

Q: On the cultural exchange side, one of the things that, there seemed to be an imbalance between Americans going over to the Soviet Union, mainly for culture, language and that type of thing whereas the Soviets seemed to send older people going over for hard sciences. Were you finding this?

BARNES: This was pretty much toward the beginning of the exchanges and they tended to be if not precisely reciprocal, pretty close to reciprocal. They had to be reached, the planning had to be done on the mutual basis, at least the principle of such and such a group would be exchanged for such and such a group.

What you are talking about came somewhat later, when it was somewhat easier to move back and forth and that's an accurate characterization of the composition, but as I mentioned before among the first delegations, there were activities in the areas of education – fairly broadly defined, music, art. We had the Philadelphia Orchestra come. So initially, there was more culture.

Q: Were you able to using this I mean just on your own with your wife and all to penetrate into the sort of intellectual, cultural scene of Moscow?

BARNES: Very hard and one of the advantages of these new, at the time, cultural exchange was that that got us into some of the activities that the delegation were involved in. On our own, for example, I don't think we probably could have gotten Soviet citizens to be allowed to accept invitations to our apartment but we organized something for a delegation and then they would come. They probably all come at the same time and all leave at the same time. There were certain artificialities that way. But we got a sense of at least some aspects of the intellectual cultural life through these delegation visits. We could follow up on some of that afterwards.

Q: How was Tommy Thompson as an ambassador?

BARNES: I have to think of accurate enough words; at one level, very relaxed. Clearly, very much at home in terms of the nature of the...

I just had one thing that goes back to Prague for a moment. I mentioned earlier my interest in languages and also the problems of getting language training from the Foreign Service at least up through Prague and so aside from asking my consular section staff to talk in Czech with me whenever possible, I also did a certain amount of studying on my own and at one point Jack Iams, the first secretary told me that I was spending too much time on language and not enough time on sort of the substance of things. Even though I was a consular officer I had to be spending more time learning more about the political economic context of the country. He was both a good friend as well as a mentor, so I took him seriously on it.

Q: While we are at it and going back to that, all of a sudden I realize we'd missed something rather big and that was the Hungarian Revolution. It was October of '56.

BARNES: I was in Washington at that point. This was that rather long interim between finishing at Oberammergau and going on to post.

One other Czech element; again it was related to language. My wife is a novelist, I should say a would-be novelist and was working currently on a novel, part of which was set in Czechoslovakia and this turned out to be useful when I had been able to revive some knowledge of Czech because I act as a part time interpreter for her when we go to Czechoslovakia.

Q: Back when you were doing the cultural exchanges in the USSR, how did this work? Who came up with lists?

BARNES: It was essentially intergovernmental. There was an office in the State Department in the Bureau of European Affairs (EUR) which was called the Office of Soviet and Eastern European Exchanges Staff (EUR/SES), headed initially by William Lacey and subsequently by Frank G. Siscoe for a number of years. The Russians had as their counterpart the State Committee for, I think, it was called Cultural Exchanges, maybe there is another adjective in there. If it was a more specialized question the actual arrangements were made from, in case the Soviets for example might be carried out by the Ministry of Higher Education for student exchanges, the Union of Composers for the composer exchanges, the Union of Writers for the writers and that sort of thing, but under the general supervision of the State Committee for Exchanges. Each side would make proposals in a fairly formal fashion to the other although the two embassies played something of an intermediary role, both in terms of ideas for the respective headquarters and occasionally would suggest ideas to each other.

The Embassy's involvement, in this case in Moscow, was essentially to serve as liaison with the organizing group to vet the program, to share ideas with the Office of Exchanges and the states and through them to the delegation that was coming and then in effect to serve as an escort officer for the delegation when the delegation got there, which ranged all the way from being sometimes a part time interpreter to being a trouble shooter and trying to iron out problem when they happened or to anticipate problems.

Q: Did you have any difficulty with groups coming?

BARNES: No difficulty with the Americans as such, that I remember. Some people obviously much more interesting and more flexible and others somewhat less so but on the whole, most of them saw themselves as a sort of pioneer and were interested in trying to make as much of the opportunity as they could. Where we could be helpful essentially, was giving them a sense of what they were getting into and as I say, if there were problems to try to help solve them. The problems were more in terms of Russian hosts who wouldn't always, usually for, from their standpoint I suppose, security reasons said we couldn't do this, we couldn't do that. So deviations from the agreed program were not always easy to work out.

Q: Now this was a time when Khrushchev had come over to visit Eisenhower and you know, things were looking pretty good, weren't they? Was there sort of an optimistic feel?

BARNES: Yes, there was a sense that, what had been described in the mid-'50s, say '55, '56, as the thaw, in fact there was a work by a Soviet author named Ehrenburg with that title. There was a feeling that things were getting better and could get still better, not very much better, but still the tendency was more hopeful and the exchanges that I was talking about were essentially an expression of that and were a visible sign.

If you had something like the U.S. sending the Marines into Lebanon, this prompted, in '58 the government to organize vast demonstrations outside the American Embassy.

Q: What did you do? I mean, were these sort of rent-a-mob type demonstrations?

BARNES: Yes, certainly in that sort of situation it was, I suppose something closer to home. I wasn't there for the U-2 incident in 1960. I can imagine the U-2 would prompt demonstrations.

Q: Did you get to just plain travel or was it pretty much connected with business?

BARNES: Pretty much connected with business, although occasionally depending on the delegation, my wife would come along as well to the Caucasus say, or to someplace. I did one trip to the Caucasus which was partly business, partly pleasure with a couple from the British Embassy. We arranged to rent some horses and to go by horseback across the hump of the Caucasus, the mountains from what is now not far from Chechnya over to the part of Georgia which is on the Black Sea. And then the embassy had a dacha outside Moscow and we would take turns going to. That was sort of a interim R&R type thing.

One thing I think that afflicted and infected all of us was the strain of living in an atmosphere where you were to some extent the enemy and continued to be portrayed as such. There was a Soviet humor magazine called Krokodil which specialized in anti-American cartoons. In my own case I know what signaled to me that I was feeling the pressure was I started throwing things which I don't ordinarily do and so took advantage of an opportunity a couple of months later to go out to Western Europe for about ten days just to get a change and at least what was known in the diplomatic corps, at least the western diplomatic corps as a breath of fresh air before you came back into it.

Q: Speaking of which, we've had this observation from, for decades, almost fifty years of looking at the Soviet Union and it was considered to be the great menace and all that but it in 1989 or 1991-92 sort of collapsed. Was there any feel that this was a place that wasn't working? I mean looking at the nationality problem, looking at the economics particularly, or was there a feeling this would go on forever?

BARNES: Nationality...you know, the Soviet had a motto as saying "national in form socialist in content," probably because in wandering around bookstores and so on, I also sometimes went into bookstores that specialized in books in the let's say the republic's language. I would sometimes buy Ukrainian books; I would sometimes buy Uzbek books and so on so I got a little bit of feel through that of what it was like to be a non-Russian. There was more than I would have expected, I think of some of the pride and also a defensiveness that is, trying to protect yourself as somebody who is different from the Russians. So in that sense, I wouldn't have thought of it in later day context.

In terms of society functioning, it was clear that provisions of food were at best limited, particularly during the winter. It was clear that housing was a real problem. It was clear that whether because of bureaucracy, inefficiency, or technical incompetence, various things didn't work well. But I think it would be more than I could do to make the jump from there to the collapse of later years.

Q: I mean we all, in one way or another observing this and yet it sort of happened.

BARNES: But if you were there in the '80s you would have had a clearer sense of impending change. That's what I don't know. I went back only once after we left, no twice after we left Moscow; one fairly close to the time we left and one while I was in Bucharest in the mid-'70s so I didn't have a sense of the Soviet Union in the '80s.

Q: Did you feel that you were joining a band of brothers at that time by being in the Soviet thing?

BARNES: Yes, we were all called area specialists or area language officers. We all in a way were students of the society and we were all in some way pushing the realm of the possible particularly the exchanges program. In fact, one of my colleagues was forced to leave at one point when the Soviets contended he was sort of overdoing contacts with university students.

Q: Who was that?

BARNES: John Baker

Q: Yes, I interviewed John.

BARNES: On one of the trips I took to Kiev I met the director of the Kiev Opera and Ballet. Although I didn't know at the time I met him - until somewhat later when we saw each other in Moscow, which was a little bit unusual to have somebody from the provinces look you up – but, he happened to be Khrushchev's son-in-law and he was obviously interested in me as a possible contact to the United States. He wasn't exactly indiscreet but on the other hand he didn't try to hide that much of the fact that we knew each other and I reported all this to Tommy Thompson from time to time. We were due to leave Moscow in January of '57. I was supposed to go back and work on the Soviet desk at the Department but had asked, and Tommy had agreed, to stay on until spring in part because of one of our children being in school there and in part because I just found what I was doing in a different cultural side to be interesting.

One fine day, a youth newspaper, Komsomolskaya Pravda, published an article about, I don't know if this works in Serbian or not, (Russian phrase), "The Packer of Tchaikovsky Street." The article began by saying, "If you walk along Tchaikovsky Street along about number 19/21 you may hear some strange noises coming from the basement of that building and what's going on there? That's where "Harrigay Baruness" (Russian rendition of "Harry Barnes") is working and he buys all these books and he packs them up in crates and sends them off, who knows what sort of interesting purposes" and so on. Satire, basically but by fingering me raised some questions and this led to my consulting with Tommy who was consulting with me and he concluded that this was probably a way of warning me, that also may have been a warning to Khrushchev's son-in-law in some form. Khrushchev was very much in power at that point.

So Tommy's advice was don't stick around, you don't know what will happen next and in fact, not long before that, the Deninsiya [Russian word possibly means 'plainclothesman'] had seen this guy who had given me some information to pass on about, at one level fairly harmless, but at another level not just about some of the problems the country was facing, general economic problems, it was critical. That was not a good thing to do. We were with a delegation of artist, I think at that point, and was scheduled to go into on to the Caucasus from Kiev and I told my wife, we were on the plane, I figured nobody ever would overhear us on the plane about this conversation, and both she and I began to worry a bit about who might know about the conversation from their own listening devices. Was I likely to be the target of anything as we continued to travel? So there was a period of some nervousness until we got back to Moscow and I was able to talk to Tommy. That was the anecdote I wanted to add for the end of the Moscow.

I thought of something I want to mention about Moscow. I came into the Foreign Service having been told that if I didn't take my appointment at the time it was offered I wouldn't get another one, another chance for a couple of years, if then. If this was a scare tactic, I don't know., but I left Columbia University's Russian Institute with only one year of a two year program completed. What happened in Moscow a couple of months before I left, I ran into the head of the Russian Institute who was then visiting Moscow. He said to me, "Why don't you finish your Russian Institute program and get your M.A.?" When I got back to the States, in that period in the early '59 or so, I began to explore what I could do to accomplish that. It turned out I didn't make use of the information until a couple of years later but I was told that they had a statute of limitations for completing the degree program once started but that had been adopted after I had left Columbia so therefore it didn't apply to me. Eventually, I completed the M.A. at Columbia by commuting from Washington to New York. By this time it was 1968.

***

Q: Today is May 3, 2004. Harry, you were on the Soviet desk from when to when?

BARNES: From spring of 1959 until the summer of 1962. I went to the National War College 1962 to '63.

Q: So we are talking about '59 to '62. And this was a period of not the greatest relations with the Soviet Union. Again we are talking about the Cold War. Compared with your Moscow assignment, what was the perspective from Washington? Did you find a different perspective on relations?

BARNES: Let me answer that a little indirectly and give you a little bit of context.

I assume at some point during our previous conversation talking about my assignment in Moscow I had talked about the fact that I had been involved along with another colleague of mine in what was essentially an incipient cultural section of the embassy in Moscow because there had been an agreement in 1958 that was called the Lacy-Zarubin agreement, that provided for some of the first exchanges with the then USSR.

My job on the Soviet desk was essentially that of liaison with the then again quite new European Bureau office which deal with East West exchanges. It was called SES, Soviet and Eastern European Exchanges Staff and I was almost another staff member for that office but working out of the Soviet desk. I also had the responsibility of being the individual who knew the State Department who had to pass on the requests from the Soviet Mission in Washington or the Soviet U.N. delegation for travel outside where they were located. This was a reciprocal arrangement because of the restrictions that had been placed on our people in Moscow. That wasn't very odorous but most of my time then, as I said was spent on the exchanges and there I would say going back to your question, there was an interest, I would say, a willingness to try to see how far we could get in terms of promoting exchanges with the idea of providing Americans an opportunity to spend some time in the Soviet Union and to have some Soviets come to the United States. The calculated risk I suppose one might say that was taken at that time was that on balance exchanges were in our interest as an open society, less so in the Soviet interest, but that because we felt we might gain more, we were prepared to push and to look into what could be accomplished.

In the process, in 1962 I was asked to go with a U.S. cultural group as an escort officer so in a bit it was like what I had done when I was in Moscow. This happened to be a group of university musicians from the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, and it was called the University of Michigan Band and they did a variety of things; classical, popular, Americana type things and I spent the better part of five weeks, five-six weeks touring with them in effect as a, almost like the manager of the orchestra. Not that I was a musician myself but the director was very much, a man named William Revelli, but I was the one who had some background in the Soviet Union, having been there fairly recently, I had some idea of how to deal with the Soviet bureaucracy which of course, was somewhat concerned about having these young American students sort of loose in the Soviet Union so we had people escorting us, keeping track of us as it were. My job in part, as I say, was to share with the students, with the director and his staff my sense of the country, warning about some of the possible pitfalls and then if complications arose, to try to sort out what the complications were. The complications were fortunately never very serious, except the Soviet guides did express concerns that we didn't keep enough track always of our own people. They expressed this concern ostensibly because they wanted to protect us to make sure we didn't fall in with bad company and so on. On the whole, the students got a lot out of it and I think they contributed a lot to the people they met as giving a sense of what young America was like which was rather different from ordinary, what ordinarily they got in the Soviet media.

Q: This was quite early on in the exchange, wasn't it?

BARNES: Yes, because the agreement was a '58 agreement and it began to be implemented in '59 and so I am talking about the third year or so of the agreement.

Q: Who was the head of the Office of Soviet Affairs during your assignment?

BARNES: Several people during the time I was there. I think when I first arrived, it was John Guthrie who had been in the Embassy in Moscow before going back to that job and then before I left it was Bob Owen. We were divided into two sections; bilateral affairs and multilateral affairs. I was in the bilateral part.

The other person to bear in mind because he was the one in charge of the cultural exchange program, the SES, was Frank Siscoe.

Q: You were monitoring who the Soviets were sending over?

BARNES: Well, that was more the job of the SES staff to work out the modalities for an exchange. For example, programs for Soviet students coming to American universities counterpart to the Americans who had begun to go to the Soviet Union in '58. There were negotiations about itinerary, where they could go or where they couldn't go. The Soviets at that point had large areas of their own country closed to foreigners, very often particularly Americans, and so if we wanted to have say, something like this cultural group I was describing go to a place that was closed, the Soviets would probably refuse, although they might say, "All right, then you let one of our groups go someplace in the United States which you have closed, because our closings are essentially retaliatory or reciprocal". Not that there was anything necessarily that important militarily but it was part of the tit for tat type game that we played at that time.

Q: When you were on the Desk, we had the election of 1960, this was when Nixon and Kennedy ran against each other. As Soviet experts did you kind of wonder how are they going to deal with things. How did you feel about it?

BARNES: I can't be very precise on that, except there was speculation you might anticipate anyway what would be the consequences of one or another. President Nixon, of course, had had his own experience in Moscow as vice president. I wasn't there at the time. Kennedy, as I recall, had no particular experience with Eastern Europe. If my memory is right, was it 1960 that the U-2 was shot down?

Q: Yes, it was when Eisenhower was president and I want to say the spring of '60.

BARNES: That of course, cast something of a shadow on the relationship, not that it was all that great, but it was sometimes called a thaw as you could surmise by the cultural exchanges agreement and there had been a book published in the Soviet Union, I have forgotten if it was clandestine or not, called The Thaw by Ilya Ehrenburg which reflected the changes that had begun to take place after Stalin's death. I guess I can't go much further than to say there was speculation of those who were working on Soviet affairs as to what difference would come about as a result of the election.

Q: I know when I talked to people who were in Berlin at the time the Kennedy administration came in they expressed some nervousness because the Kennedy Administration was talking about well, is Berlin that important and all that sort of thing. As you know, a new administration comes in and the new people have a tendency to speculate and shoot off their mouths before they are up against...

BARNES: If they do something different because it wasn't done by the previous administration.

The only other thing I remember from that period, the first years of the Kennedy administration, was the Cuban Crisis. By that time I was at the War College, but I remember listening to the radio, going to and from the college, and hearing the announcements and beginning to wonder whether and when it would be a real conflict, an armed conflict with the Soviet Union.

Q: This was I think in October of '62. With the exchange program, how did you see things developing? Did you feel it was making sense?

BARNES: I would have to say I was probably prejudiced, having worked with some of the first exchange groups and having seen the visible impact, be they artists or composers or students. I thought this was a very good area for the U.S. to focus on and try to expand. My sense of Soviet exchanges, Soviet citizens coming to the U.S., was much more indirect, even though I was working on the exchanges part time when I was on the Soviet desk. I didn't have the opportunity usually to spend much time with the Soviet visitors, so I would have to qualify my judgment perhaps a little bit that way. Both because I thought that they were in themselves beneficial for the United States and also because I thought it was worthwhile trying to take advantage of whatever slight evidence there might be or slight movement there might be in the Soviet Union to open up. I remain very much a partisan.

Q: Did you pick up any feel about Khrushchev at this point? Was he considered to be a moderating force or...?

BARNES: Khrushchev certainly, if only because of his decision to let initially party officials, but then this went beyond that, but some people in the Soviet Union have a sense of incomplete of what the Stalin era was like. It was definitely in my mind almost a revolutionary force in that context, not a revolutionary but he understood enough that something had to be known or had to be known by, made known by him in terms of his being able to do some of the other things he wanted. Secondly, there was a pragmatism about him which was to try to see how things can work. He had a slogan at one point of catching up with and surpassing the United States in the production of wheat, butter and milk, which they never got to, but that pushed them in the direction of well, how do you do some things that are quite tangible, that are of some interest to the population as a whole and not just to the party elite.

There was a, what should I say, actor I guess is the word I would use, there was a sense of being an actor about him. You may remember his banging his desk at the U.N. with his shoe and then you had to wonder then occasionally whether his sense of drama, or what he thought was required, would get in the way of his judgment. That was one of the things I worried somewhat about in that period of the Cuban Missile Crisis, if he had enough sense to pay attention to his pragmatic side or whether he was going to pay more attention to the dramatic side.

EDWARD L. KILLHAM
Consular/Political Officer
Moscow (1956-1959)

Analyst, Soviet Affairs, Bureau of Intelligence and Research
Washington, DC (1968-1970)

Soviet Affairs, Bureau of European Affairs
Washington, DC (1970-1971)

Edward L. Killham was born in Illinois in 1926. He received a bachelor's degree from Northwestern University in 1949, a master's degree from Columbia University in 1950, and a master's degree in public administration from Harvard University in 1957. He joined the U.S. Army during World War II, served from 1944-1946 in Europe. Mr. Killham's Foreign Service career included positions in the United Kingdom, the Soviet Union, Belgium, Austria, and Spain. He was interviewed by Robert Martens on December 18, 1992.

KILLHAM: Anyway, I was accepted for Russian language training in 1955. After I working briefly in EE for Walter Stoessel and 10 months of language training, I went off to Harvard. Luckily, I was the only one in my group of six who had a significant amount of experience as a consular office so I was sent immediately to Moscow. I arrived in 1957 where I met you.

Q: Yes, I had arrived a year earlier.

KILLHAM: And we shared your residence, Spaso House, for a couple of weeks.

Q: Yes, that is right.

KILLHAM: I moved out of there to a flat, very unusually not into one of the Embassy quarters, but a small flat on Khoklovskiy pereulok, which I shared with Dave Mark and John Baker for several months, until Lucy and John's wife arrived. I then moved into a flat in the Embassy Chancery, where our apartment was right upstairs from my office. I was the consular officer there for a full year.

Q: You were a consular officer the first year?

KILLHAM: Yes, that is right.

Q: Then you got into the political section?

KILLHAM: Yes, internal political. We used to tell Washington that our apartment was only a stone's throw from the street and it was, literally. We got lots of rocks thrown through our windows on several occasions. It was a very stimulating period for political officers although from many points of view the consular experience was even more interesting. It was just the beginning of "The Thaw" and things were loosening up a bit. We issued practically the first immigrant visas in Moscow since the war, I believe. The work didn't do my Russian any good because the people who came in were very old Lithuanian ladies who were going off to their relatives in the United States. They didn't speak any Russian. But it was interesting even so.

Even more exciting was the fact that this was the summer of the Moscow Youth Festival. As consular officer I was very heavily involved in that. At the end of the festival, the Chinese government invited a large group of American participants in Moscow to go to China at its expense. A number of them were not able to see why this was annoying their own government considerably, or perhaps didn't care, and they took advantage of the offer. I had to meet them at the railroad station on their return, chide them somewhat, and inspect their passports. I got a lot of coverage over this. It was the first time I made the front page of the New York Times, with a large picture. But the episode went fairly well. No crockery was irretrievably broken.

It was a very stimulating period because Khrushchev was really getting into the swing of things. He liked to come to the American Embassy, as you know, to American receptions. I met him there, along with a lot of other Soviet luminaries.

Q: Incidentally, the years previously that I was there, there was practically no contact with the top people. Once I had shaken hands with Khrushchev at the British Embassy, but relations with us were still bad. When you arrived it was just the time that the exchange program first came in and they opened up to tourists. So there was a certain turning point then.

KILLHAM: It was a turning point in other ways too, because when I was on the train to Moscow, coming in from Helsinki, Khrushchev got rid of the anti-party group.

Q: Oh yes.

KILLHAM: He purged his critics pretty well, which allowed him to move more freely than before. That was part of the loosening up.

Q: Yes. One of the things that I think is particularly interesting, and I have brought this up with some of your colleagues as well, is the degree to which one could get at real Russian people in this period. Most of this contact came from travel. People were much more ready to speak out in the provinces. In Moscow they tended to know that Big Brother was watching them all the time. Elsewhere they were possibly somewhat more naive and spoke to us. I know you had some interesting trips. I recall one was to the Baltic States. I think you were the first one in there because the Baltic States had been a closed area since World War II up until whenever that was -- 1957 or '58. You and someone else, I remember, went out and had quite an interesting trip. Maybe you could talk about that a bit.

KILLHAM: Yes. As a matter of fact we weren't the first, we were shortly after the first. Dave Mark visited Riga, Latvia a few weeks before us and got to know the Intourist guide there, Johnny Westmanis, who was very agreeable and very Latvian and quite outspoken about Latvia's unhappy history. When Dick Harmstone and I got to Riga he was our guide also. Westmanis was later evidently pressured into denouncing Dave Mark as a spy, which was part of the Soviet case against Dave and he was expelled. The account was written up in innumerable Soviet volumes describing the evil ways of Western spies in the Soviet Union.

But Dick and I had a number of remarkable contacts. You are right that it was easier to talk to people outside Moscow. It was even easier, at least at that stage, if you were not trying to speak to Russians. We had much greater success in the minority areas, such as the Baltics.

The first night we were there Dick and I wandered downtown, where they had what was reputed to be the only the night club in the USSR, which was on the top floor of the department store. We wandered around the department store a little bit. Dick, fortunately, was quite tall so he was noticeable. We struck up a conversation with a couple of other tall young men who turned out to be the nucleus of the Latvian basketball team. We got very close, indeed, with them. We had some friendly conversation and they asked us to get together the following night, which we did. They took us on a train to the famous white sands beach outside of Riga -- this was in January. We went walking with them -- about four or five of them and two of us -- along the snow-covered beach, closely pursued by a group of obvious KGB tails. We were discussing all sorts of sensitive things -- politics, international affairs, the evils of the Soviet system, etc. Our friends knew the immediate area very well and knew the train schedule well also so, at one crucial moment, they said, "We all run now." So we all ran like hell and caught the train just as it was leaving the station in the direction of Riga, leaving the KGB watchers behind us. It probably annoyed our KGB tails enormously.

They took us then to a restaurant, also on the coast, and we ate some of the local specialties and again talked, with more than a few toasts along the way. At one stage, in a very touching episode, one of them who was studying English -- he couldn't speak it but he could read it -- pulled out a book containing the American Declaration of Independence and proceeded to read it to us in English. It was really a remarkable scene. Then they bundled us off back to Riga.

We didn't see them again, but the following night we struck up a conversation with a young Latvian musician -- only half Latvian, I believe his father was Russian -- who had another chap with him. We invited them to come to the night club with us and our guide, Johnny Westmanis, which made both of them rather nervous. But the young musician, an aspiring composer, invited us back to meet his folks. That was the first time I had gotten inside a Soviet apartment. They were quite well fixed. We talked with the parents and had a very pleasant evening. We got some feeling for some of the tensions but also for some of the elements that were bringing the Latvians and the local Russians together.

Another occasion where I had some experience dealing with non-Russians was also a lot more vibrant than you usually get. Vlad Toumanoff and I went down to Georgia as sort of a reward for going through Stalino and the industrial towns around it, a collection of the worst polluted areas I have ever seen.

We were on our way to Tbilisi but the plane had to make an emergency landing in Kutaisi, a pretty scrofulous town, where something I ate disagreed with me mightily. Eventually, however, we made our way to Tbilisi, a very charming city, and met up with group of young Georgians. They sitting around drinking wine and eating some kind of long-stemmed grass, both of which seemed to be local specialties. We spent quite a bit of time with them and had a lively and very friendly conversation. But when we encountered a couple of them the next day they, of course, walked right by us with eyes straight ahead. After what was no doubt a routine interview with the local KGB, they wouldn't even look at us and obviously wouldn't talk to us. This was a fairly typical experience when traveling around the countryside.

In Tbilisi, we also encountered a fellow about our age, middle '30s, who was a Georgian Jew who had only one leg. I forget now how he lost his leg, I think it was an industrial accident. But he was profoundly anti-Soviet and anti-Russian. We had a number of conversations with him and at one stage, after perhaps more vodka than any of us should have had, he suggested that we go back to the hotel at which we were staying and continue our discussion. We felt that would be very dangerous for him, but he said, "Don't worry about it. The dezhurnaya (floor monitor) on your floor is my mistress." So he came back with us to the hotel and we sat at one of those alcove tables they seemed to have in all Soviet hotels, and which was about 30 feet from the reputed mistress. She couldn't hear, I believed, but was a little concerned because he was asking for all sorts of dangerous things. He wanted us to airdrop weapons so that he and his friends could lead the rebellion against the Russians, for example. We said that was not really what we were there for. I began to get nervous and started to drum with my fingers on the table, thinking this would help break up the sound, if somebody was taping the conversation. Vlad Toumanoff soon picked it up and then the Georgian did too and so we were all drumming. Finally, it got so loud that we had to shout at each other in order to be heard. It was rather a hilarious scene. I hope he didn't suffer too much from his contact with us.

Those were the two most interesting trips I made, although Lucy and I managed to travel together to Leningrad and Central Asia later on.

Q: Any other observations on that tour in Moscow?

KILLHAM: Well, it was my first foreign language tour. It was a little difficult from that point of view, and of course Russian is a difficult language. But I think I learned a tremendous amount from it. I was ready to go back, but not very soon. I would have liked to go back in five or six years.

***

KILLHAM: I went back to Soviet Affairs. Spike Dubs, who was director of SOV, recruited me to come in and handle the bilateral office. It was pretty active at the time. We had a lot of problems. For example, there were a couple of American Air Force officers who had wandered off course when they took off from their bases in Turkey and wound up in the Soviet Union. We had to extricate them with the least possible embarrassment.

Q: Any particular observations of that situation?

KILLHAM: Just that it seemed to be clear from the first day that it was obviously a gaff on the part of our military colleagues. The Soviets were naturally intent on extracting as much embarrassment for us as they could out of it. But they didn't really intend to take serious action. This was just fun and games -- they were going to make us pay for it in propaganda terms.

Q: Before you go on I might say for the listener that the Office of Soviet Affairs had two major branches -- Multilateral Affairs (Soviet relations with the rest of the world) and Bilateral Affairs, of which you were the head. What other things were you dealing with?

KILLHAM: We were busy setting up the Consulate in Leningrad as well as working on the initial planning for the new Embassy in Moscow. As far as the Embassy in Moscow was concerned, we were convinced that under no circumstances could the Soviets be allowed to play any role, whatever, in its construction. We were going to insist that it be done entirely by either American or neutral construction workers. Unfortunately, that position eroded over time and we all know the cost of that.

We were also involved in the initial exchange about establishing our Consulate in Leningrad and the Soviet Consulate in San Francisco. The Soviets did get a prize spot in San Francisco overlooking the Presidio, which worried some people a good deal. However, it didn't worry the Navy enough to overcome their zeal to get their people into Leningrad. In the end, the U.S. Government decided to pay the price of having the Soviets overlooking the Presidio. That is how it turned out.

Q: To go back to the Embassy chancery, was this erosion of the insistence of an all American or at least an all non-Soviet work force due to the difficulty of negotiation or more to financial considerations?

KILLHAM: It may have had something to do with financial considerations. I think it was more a case of the general erosion in the American stance on such matters. Ambassador Dobrynin was very effective, as we all know, at working on his counterparts at the top levels of the US government. Over time, he managed to persuade them that the Soviets could do much of the construction in Moscow and that there wouldn't be any great security problem. I was not involved with the matter at the time, but that is my impression.

Q: In general, I have always felt that the Soviet Desk was composed of officers who had served in the Soviet Union and tended to be very strong on defending reciprocity and assuring that the Soviets did not have great opportunities for security breaches. However, there would be great pressures from senior people who were impressed by the Dobrynins of this world.

We might go into a discussion of that ship case if you would like?

KILLHAM: Yes, that was easily the most dramatic thing that happened while I was in that particular office.

Early one afternoon I got a telephone call from the Coast Guard saying that they had somebody who had indicated a desire to defect. He was on a Soviet ship where a meeting was taking place between some American Fisheries officials and their Soviet counterparts. The meeting was taking place in U.S. waters and the Coast Guard cutter Vigilant was lying along side. The interpreter then working for the Fisheries office was Alexis Obolensky, who is now a senior interpreter for the State Department. The message from the Coast Guard cutter to Boston headquarters, which was relayed to Washington, said that there was an 80 percent chance that this individual on the Soviet ship was going to try to defect. He had communicated this intention in a cryptic note written in very broken English. This communication included some phrases that were hard to understand: "He was going to go up down onto the American ship." The Coast Guard felt that this could mean that he was going to jump into the water. Apparently, he had a very brief interchange with one of the Americans, observing that the water was not all that cold today. (There was some visiting back and forth going on between the two ships as part of the peace and friendship atmosphere.)

Coast Guard Captain Dahlgren, who was their head of intelligence, called up and talked to me. He said they had this message and a request for advice from Boston. "If this man did jump overboard, what degree and extent of force could be used in order to recover him before the Soviets did?"

I told him that this was a complicated legal question and it would probably take several hours to get a definitive reading on it, by which time he would either have jumped or not have jumped. I noted that the Coast Guard had had a lot of experience at fishing people out of the water and they ought to be able to beat the Russians to the man if he did jump in the water, and they could go ahead and do it. However, they shouldn't encourage him to jump. There was the possibility that this was a provocation. At that stage of the Cold War, we were always worried that the Soviets were going to stage a "provocatsia" involving a phony defector and make us look bad. So I mentioned that to him.

I concluded by saying that if he did jump or defect, to let us know and tell us the circumstances and we would give them a fuller answer on what to do then.

Several hours went by and the Coast Guard Captain called me back at 4:00 p.m.. He said that nothing further had been heard from the ship and that it was already getting dark -- this was November 22. The Coast Guard office closed at 4:00 but if anything happened the duty officer would get in touch with us.

So I briefed Ed Mainland, who was one of the officers in SOV at the time, about what had happened. Spike Dubs was still unavailable. He had been in meetings all day, I think. Around 6:00 we still hadn't heard anything so it seemed conclusive that nothing more would be happening on the matter. Ed Mainland and I left around 7:00, which was what we usually did.

A couple of hours later a duty officer for the State Department got a message from the Coast Guard. It said that the man on the ship, I don't think they even mentioned the nationality of the ship, in Boston had returned to his ship. The Department duty officer didn't understand it but he wrote it down and took it up to his superior who remembered that there had been a little flap earlier. He called Ed Mainland who asked what precisely the Coast Guard had said and got the message that "the man had returned" or "had been returned."

In any case it wasn't until a couple of hours later that Ed started to worry about this and called first the State Department duty officer and then the Coast Guard duty officer trying to find out what had happened. Again, he got essentially the same answer that the man had returned - it was over, the case was closed.

It wasn't until the next morning that the egg really hit the fan. The Fisheries people were on the phone, of course, and word started to leak out to the press about this terrible dereliction of duty and terrible injustice, which it certainly was, returning the man. As further word came in it got worse and worse. He had been beaten up by the Soviets who had taken him back.

Admiral Ellis, the Coast Guard Commander in Boston, had apparently been adamant. He wouldn't ask at any stage for advice from the State Department. Alexis Obolensky had been pleading with the Coast Guard people to get back to the State Department to find out, once he had defected, what should be done. The Coast Guard never told us that Kudirka had slipped aboard the Vigilant and hidden himself there.

Q: We were at the point of discussing Ed's period in the Office of Soviet Affairs...what year was that Ed?

KILLHAM: The end of 1970.

Q: ...around 1970. We were discussing the Kudirka case which was the case of a Soviet seaman who was trying to defect and got brought aboard a Coast Guard vessel and then was sent back to the Soviet vessel by force. It received a lot of attention in the press at the time and was also the subject of a movie, I believe.

KILLHAM: A television movie.

Q: In any case, let's go on where you left off. We were at the point of describing the Coast Guard Admiral not calling the Department of State.

KILLHAM: Well, he had his own views on this. I gather he came from the old Coast Guard school and felt that an absconding crewman was returned to the master's vessel with no questions asked. That seemed to be what was behind it. I testified at his court martial, along with a number of other people. He was allowed to retire. It became clear during the court martial that he had been quite definite about his position. He wouldn't tell the State Department that the guy had actually defected. One of the messages from his Boston headquarters to the Vigilant said that if he jumped into the water they should make every effort to let the Soviets recover him, which is directly contrary to what I had told them.

It was a cause célèbre. There was a major investigation of the whole thing, ending in the court martial. Ellis and his second in command were allowed to retire. The Captain of the Vigilant was issued a letter of reprimand, which I think was rather harsh because he just did what the Admiral insisted he do.

Q: Was Kudirka actually beaten up on the American vessel as shown in the movie?

KILLHAM: They beat him up somewhat. He was very reluctant to return and they beat him to move him along. The Americans had to stand by and watch this being done. So there was great indignation in the nation, including in the White House. Quite aside from the humanitarian aspects of it, Henry Kissinger in the NSC was concerned that it would signal the Soviets that we were blinking on issues. It seemed to suggest that when controversy came up we would bow to Soviet wishes. So the NSC was intent on demonstrating that this was not the case. This was to be seen as an isolated case and had been a mistake, etc.

There was quite a thorough investigation, which reminds me that there were some fairly ludicrous parts to it. We were working like dogs, of course, all of us in Soviet Affairs, trying to pull the facts together and present our case to the State Department and, then, the State Department case to the White House and its investigators.

Bill Macomber at the time was Deputy Under Secretary for Management. He convoked all of us who were concerned one Sunday afternoon. We were discussing strategy and going into the situation at great length. Tempers were quite high on occasion. At one point Macomber denounced me for trying to protect Ed Mainland, but making it more general and said, "I am sick and tired of these guys all protecting one another." It was rather an excruciating experience because the Redskins were playing at the time and Macomber had the TV on. He kept watching the game, erupting from time to time as he reacted to individual plays while we were trying to argue this case, which was pretty much life and death for me and a couple of the other guys. It was a bizarre scene.

Q: What happened to the Soviet seaman? I have a faint feeling that he finally got to the States years later.

KILLHAM: Yes. We found out that his name was Simas Kurdirka. Later, to our astonishment, we discovered that his mother had been an American, who had gone with her parents to Lithuania at some stage. Since his mother had been an American citizen, and because he was illegitimate, there was no doubt about the fact that he was an American citizen. It took several years to work it out but eventually our government was able to get him out of the USSR. He has appeared occasionally on television in New York and when last I heard he was working as a janitor in New York.

Shortly afterwards, Dick Davies summoned the Soviet DCM, who may have been Chargé at the time, and insisted that this had been a terrible mistake and we wanted Kudirka back. I was present at the interview and, of course, he gave us a very snotty laugh, saying in effect, "Don't be ridiculous." This gentleman, Yuli Vorontsov, was very successful in the Soviet Foreign Service. He became a Deputy Foreign Minister and Ambassador to Paris and was the man who negotiated the end to their presence in Afghanistan. He is now their Ambassador to the United Nations. He is, let me tell you, one tough cookie. A Soviet diplomat of the old school!

Q: Is there anything else of significance in that period?

KILLHAM: I think the most significant thing from my point of view was the tremendous press interest. I had hundreds of Lithuanian-Americans parading around outside the State Department demanding my head and several rather prominent journalists were also calling for it. We managed to put that off for quite a while. But after three or four months when the furor still hadn't subsided and every little thing that happened critics would say, "See - that is another indication of the thinking in the State Department. These guys are all soft on communism and cozy with the Soviets, etc." I was offered a position in Copenhagen and thought I would be well advised to accept it, which I did.

WALLACE W. LITTELL
Distributor, *America Illustrated
Moscow (1956-1958)

Counselor for Public Affairs
Moscow (1979-1983)

Wallace W. Littell was born in Meadville, Pennsylvania in 1922 and he was raised in Iowa. He graduated from the College of Iowa in 1947 and later received a master's degree in Russian history from the Russian Institute at Columbia University. In addition, he was a graduate fellow at Heidelberg University in Germany. Mr. Littell's career in the Foreign Service included positions in Poland, Yugoslavia, and Germany. He was interviewed by Robert Martens on October 1, 1992.

Q: Then from Germany you came back to again attend the Russian Institute at Columbia University to work on your doctorate, I believe. That was, I think, in 1955- '56, the same period when I was sent to Columbia by the State Department to the Russian Institute and we first met.

LITTELL: That's right. I went from Hannover down to the embassy in Bonn in 1953 and for two years was editor of OST, Probleme (Problems of the East), which was a German-language digest of the Soviet and satellite press, and then came back on a study assignment to Columbia. I was pulled out of Columbia in April of '56, and sent to Moscow with the initial task of reestablishing the distribution of America Magazine (Amerika) which is a Russian-language, illustrated magazine in Life format.

Q: That magazine had existed in some form previously, I believe, in the war years and it had been canceled in the Stalin period.

LITTELL: That's right. It started out during the war, and was an exchange for a Soviet publication in the United States and was discontinued when the Soviets, at the height of the Stalinist period, were returning more copies as "unsold" than were allowed to be sold. This was 1953 and I went back in in '56 to reestablish distribution.

Q: How many copies were available on each side?

LITTELL: The initial distribution contract called for 50,000 copies to be distributed by SoyuzPechat the All-Union Soviet distribution agency, and 2,000 copies on a complimentary basis by the embassy. The agreement was negotiated initially with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and SoyuzPechat and I dealt directly with SoyuzPechat after that with Boris Pavlovich Stepanov. I remember him as an honest rogue in the communist tradition. He had a good sense of humor and would take everything from you he could get and then some, but you could deal with him. He was later the first head of the State Committee on Radio and Television. The magazine was quite some time in coming out. It took us from June to September to negotiate the agreement and the first issue came out in October of 1956.

Q: My recollection, since I was in Moscow at the same time as a political officer in the embassy, is that the magazine was extremely popular. Any time you went on a trip and you carried America Magazine with you, everybody on the train would come around and want to borrow copies. On one occasion Ted Eliot and I were on a trip by vehicle down near Stalingrad and we had quite a number of copies -- several hundred, I suppose, in the back end of our station wagon -- and when we stopped alongside the road for some reason, a group of workers came by and as soon as they saw the America Magazine they started going to the rear of the car as fast as they could, and there was almost a small demonstration there. We were not able to control it. The popularity was so great they just went all over the place. In fact they probably had a considerable resale value, I would imagine.

LITTELL: Yes, there's no question about that. We had stories of an active black market in the magazine and were given dog-eared copies that were twice the original size because of the repeated turning of the pages. It was popular not only because it was a very good looking publication, but also because it was the only American publication, and actually the only western publication until the British worked out a similar agreement and distributed a quarterly magazine. Then the Germans also after they established diplomatic relations. The problem, of course, was that, although we had a distribution agreement, you could never police it completely.

We did establish that there were about 8 or 10 sales stands in Moscow that got it on a monthly basis, but they sold out in the first 10-15 minutes. In fact, eventually people were bribing the sales stand operators to hold a copy for them so that most of the copies were sold from under the counter. There were also copies sold in the ministries in closed kiosks that only the employees of the ministries could get to. Subscriptions were reserved entirely for the privileged few. The Soviet citizens would turn to us asking for subscriptions, and all we could do was refer them to SoyuzPechat, and of course, there were no subscriptions available there.

Q: The Soviet magazine, though, was not terribly popular, as I understand it.

LITTELL: The Soviet magazine was a little heavy on freight and ideology. They learned to be better on that, and it wasn't that bad. But, of course, it was in competition with the world market on American newsstand, whereas America Illustrated in the Soviet Union had no competition.

Q: I think the oldest joke in the Soviet Union was Pravda nyet Izvestia -- Izvestia nyet Pravda. Pravda was the major newspaper and Izvestia was the second paper in prestige and size in the Soviet Union and the one word -- Pravda means truth, Izvestia means news- - and the joke, of course, and it went back to the early 20s, was that there's no news in Pravda, and there's no truth in Izvestia. That symbolized the attitude, in my opinion at least in the Soviet Union, that people disbelieved their own propaganda to such a degree that anything from the outside was extremely welcome, and that's why people listened to western broadcasts to a great extent, why they were jammed so heavily. But perhaps we can go on into some of these other subjects shortly.

LITTELL: Yes, I think also one of the most important things is that the Soviet efforts to control distribution of a publication like this, and to attack it in the papers and so on, and run it down, were completely counterproductive because the Soviet people thought, well, if they're attacking it that much, and paying that much attention to it, it must be true. And consequently, I think, the Soviet public developed across the years a rather unrealistic picture of the United States as the promised land with no problems and everything gold and glitter.

Q: I ran into that on several occasions myself, but it's not my interview so I won't go into that.

LITTELL: Well, as I say, my first job was establishing the distribution of America Illustrated, but the area and policy offices back in Washington, were interested in broader areas of contact and public affairs than that...

Q: And there was no exchange program at that time.

LITTELL: There was no exchange program until 1958. However, we did have some exchanges which you'll recall, notably in performing arts. We had the Boston Symphony and Porgy and Bess was the first Broadway production of any type that came to the Soviet Union. And then we had opera singers like Jan Peerce, and Blanche Thebom, and they had a tremendous impact. I think Jan Peerce may have had the most personal impact because he had been a cantor in his synagogue, and he also spoke Yiddish. I remember very well, he was accompanied by Alexandrovna, who was the Intourist (KGB) control type, and she was completely frustrated because people would come up to him in the restaurant at the Metropole, and other places, and speak to him in Yiddish, and he'd speak back to them. In some of his encores he sang songs in Yiddish, which was the first time something like that had happened in the Soviet Union.

Q: This was probably after the 20th Party Congress.

LITTELL: This was, yes.

Q: Which was in early 1956.

LITTELL: That's right. When I went in, in early '56, the news of the crimes of Stalin speech, and the 20th Party Congress, weren't really out yet, and I assumed that my going was a result of the 1955 Geneva Conference of Foreign Ministers where the west had proposed exchanges and Molotov had rejected them as interference in internal affairs of the Soviet Union, and so on. But as the word came out of the 20th Party Congress, and as Khrushchev moved into power, I realized, and all of us realized, that this internal liberalization was something that resulted more from the 20th Party Congress.

Q: Of course, it was only a relative liberalization. I've seen a good deal in the press over the last few years in the United States that kind of recalls the post-20th Party Congress Khrushchev period as a sort of golden age of liberalism. But it really wasn't that. It was an extremely tightly controlled society, and only a very few areas opened up. There were no tourists whatsoever. Well, there might have been a few American communists, for example, or a few businessmen buying furs. But there was no real tourism in the Soviet Union even in those days.

LITTELL: No, that's very true. The Soviet Union we knew in those days was tightly controlled, and our access to the Soviet people was minimal, except we took those trips, and had some interesting talks with individuals on the trains. And then, of course too, the suppression of the Hungarian Revolution came along in '56 and that slowed things down considerably.

Q: Put a damper on right away, and then that was also followed by the so-called anti-party group affair the following summer, which put a damper on internally. So whatever liberalization was going on was kind of by fits and starts, and you would get a period where it would open up a bit, and would close down. So its been a very long, slow process to where we are today.

LITTELL: That's very true. I was in and out of the Soviet Union across the years, but then went back again from '79 to '83 as Counselor for Public Affairs and the contrast -- and this, of course, was before the current developments -- but the contrast in access to people was really tremendous. I had contacts with literally all of the Soviet cultural intelligentsia, and got to know them very well in the '79 to '83 period.

Q: Why don't we go on to some of the other areas that you were speaking of?

LITTELL: I think, realistically, that across the years the Voice of America, which continued during the Stalinist period, and despite jamming, was accessible to the people in the period we were there, and across the entire period; I think the Voice of America probably had the broadest impact of any of our programs across the long scope of time. It was jammed in urban areas, as we know very well, but it did get through in the countryside and occasionally you could get it in Moscow in the vernacular languages. They broadcast in 16 Soviet languages plus English. The English was not jammed; there was spill-over jamming, but it was not jammed systematically and consistently. And this is where what is known as “the major Soviet news network” played in, “OBS, Odna babyshlha slkazala. One old grandmother told another;” i.e., word of mouth, played in, because people, when they got together among friends, would pass on what they’d heard on the Voice of America, or on other foreign radio. So I think it had a tremendous impact. And then the music programs among the youth; I’ve come to appreciate what they meant. All of the young Soviet leaders, except in the Komsomol, but maybe in the Komsomol too, as they moved on; and the creative intelligentsia, people like Vassily Aksyonov, the author, who is now in the United States of course, but also Andrey Voznesensky and Bulat Okudzhava, and the writers and poets and so on; jazz was really important to them. It was free expression. And popular music became important too. So I think the Music U.S.A. programs were important in that way.

Q: Some of the other stations were BBC, and of course Radio Free Europe which was much more jammed, much more political...

LITTELL: Yes, Radio Liberty...

LITTELL: Radio Liberty it was called in the Soviet Union. Radio Free Europe broadcast in Eastern European languages. That’s very true, BBC was actively listened to, and had an excellent program. And Radio Liberty across the years, and RFE, have done tremendous research as well as their programming to the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe.

I mentioned Aksyonov. I had an interesting conversation with him before he left the country and his citizenship was lifted. I asked him at one point what he thought had been the most important elements in the liberalization in the ‘50s and on into the ‘60s at the time when the relations were relaxing more and picking up, and he cited the first World Youth Festival in Moscow, which took place while we were there.

Q: It was actually the Sixth World Youth Festival.

LITTELL: The first one in Moscow.

Q: I attended it.

LITTELL: Yes, so did I. He said that was very important because it was meant to be a communist triumph, but actually what it did was introduce the Soviet youth to jazz and jeans, and to the outside world. And then he listed our American National Exhibition in Moscow in 1959 as a second element that had a tremendous impact.

Q: That was the first such exhibition. It was a total breakthrough. That’s the one that Nixon attended and had the famous kitchen debate with Khrushchev.

LITTELL: Yes, the kitchen debate. Well, I was Director of policy and research for that exhibition so I spent a year on it, and was there during the exhibition, and actually tagged along with Nixon and Khrushchev on what was called the “kitchen debate”, which actually began in the art exhibit -- the Museum of Modern Art Exhibit- -and carried on through the exhibition and then bogged down in the kitchen of the model home because there were so many people crowding around that they couldn’t get out to proceed further.

Aksyonov was also very positive on Khrushchev’s exposé of the crimes of Stalin and so on, understandably because it resulted in the release of both of his parents from labor camps; his mother Eugenia Ginzburg, the author, and his father, who was a prominent party man down in Kharkov. He was close to Khrushchev’s son; I met Khrushchev’s son, Sergei at Aksyonov’s dacha on a number of occasions, because Aksyonov felt that Khrushchev had rescued his parents, along with a lot of other people who were in the camps.

Q: The meetings with Aksyonov was in your second tour, not the first.

LITTELL: That’s right. This was the ‘79 to ‘83 period; in the ‘56 to ‘58 period we just met permitted types and Foreign Office and Ministry of Culture people.

Q: Except on trips where you could talk to people more or less by accident.

LITTELL: Yes. We had that one trip which was particularly interesting down in the southwest frontier, of course.

I think on the other cultural items of that period, along with some of those that I’ve mentioned, the Van Cliburn success in the Tchaikovsky competition was sort of a breakthrough. It was the first time that an American had won the Tchaikovsky competition, or a westerner, as far as that’s concerned, and it had a big impact on the young people. And I think they sort of pulled it off with their wild applause every time he played and appeared. That was an interesting development while we were there.

To return to Aksyonov, and the American National Exhibition, as you mentioned, it was the first time we did something like that and it was a large and very varied, and in retrospect, impressive exhibit. It had a lot of items on display. There was not only the Buckminster Fuller geodesic dome, which was the first one seen in Europe to say nothing of the Soviet Union, but also in the dome Charlie Eames, the noted designer, did a multi-screen film which was on the United States -- or American life -- which was very impressive. IBM had their Ramac computers there; these were the first computers the Soviets had seen and they were programmed so people could ask them questions about the United States, and then in 400ths of a millisecond the printers would start printing out the answer to their question, and they could take it with them as a souvenir. “The Family of Man” exhibit, in the presence of Steichen, the photographer, and Carl Sandburg, the poet, his brother-in-law, was an interesting and important exhibit. Then the Museum of Modern Art did an excellent exhibit of modern art and sculpture, which was the first modern art and sculpture most Soviets had seen. There were fashion shows complete with music, and a beauty parlor, and all sorts of consumer goods, and cars, and the model American home, and voting booths. The Soviets could go in and vote on which items in the exhibit they liked particularly. I think the guides probably had the greatest impact. We had 79 young Americans who were fluent in Russian. These were the first Americans most Soviets had encountered and were able to talk to, and ask them questions. They were an outstanding group; in fact, one of them was recently Assistant Secretary of State for the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, Curt Kamman. And many of them have been prominent in academic and government roles. The guides, I think, of the items in the exhibit, including the traveling thematic exhibits we've run since in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, have been the single most important aspect. We've carried them on through the exhibits across the years. These exhibits have been to as many as six Soviet cities on a tour.

One of them that I particularly was impressed with, was the graphic arts exhibit. I was at the opening down in Yerevan, the capital of Armenia, in 1964. It not only showed modern art, but also had a studio in which people were shown how to silk screen, which is a very good method of reproducing things, and any method of reproduction of information is important to the Soviet people.

Q: We've gotten over a little bit into -- and that's fine -- into the period after you left in 1958. The exhibit was in '59. The reason I mention this is that another major event occurred about this time already in '58, but the effects were really coming in more in '59, and after, and that was the signing and beginning of implementation of the first exchange agreement, and it was followed, of course, by a number of others which covered quite a number of areas. It covered cultural exchanges, information exchanges, scientific exchanges, student exchanges, exhibits, and some economic exchanges, and so on. You might want to mention a few words about your experiences with the implementation of this, the slow struggle to widen the contacts. My recollection, since I was also involved in the exchange program in those early years, was that the Soviets were to a great extent interested in the exchange program for scientific exchanges, and getting into fields that were useful to the development of their economy, and perhaps even on the military side, although we tried to limit that. Another point, I guess I've gotten into this partly because of something you said, was that in those early days it was very hard to get our people outside of Moscow and Leningrad. There was a tendency to limit the visits of Americans to the Soviet Union to just two or three cities, and the Soviets on the other hand were pretty much welcome throughout the United States, except that we began to limit them too in order to try to pry greater access loose. Do you want to comment on some of these things?

LITTELL: Well, this is sort of the paradox, I guess. We, who were pushing freedom and so on, were forced into their patterns, and forced to place things on a reciprocity basis. If they were going to control us, we had to control them, so that we could expand the number of cities we could get to, or the number of programs we could do. You probably recall, of course the exchange agreement was negotiated in Washington, but we backstopped it from Moscow, and were involved in that way, and then the first students came in in the fall of 1958, and four of our guides at the 1959 Exhibition actually were first year exchange students.

Q: I might throw in here that among that first group of Soviet students was Alexander Yakovlev who many, many years later became one of the key advisers in setting up Perestroika, and has played a very prominent role in the liberalization that occurred at great speed in the late 1980s and early '90s. And another student of that period was a fellow named Oleg Kulugin, who was in the KGB, and later became a major general but broke with the KGB, and denounced it, and has played a pretty strong role as well in the liberalization of the Soviet society. So one can look back on some of the effects now after all these years that were really even more than we expected, I suppose.

LITTELL: That's very true. I had an encounter across the years too with one of the graduate exchange students, Lev Skvortsov, who studied at Columbia and then was the adviser and right-hand man to Demichev, the Minister of Culture whom I escorted on his tour of the United States, and then saw frequently again during my time in Moscow. I saw him last at the CSCE meeting in Hungary, in Budapest, in 1985. This was the big cultural CSCE conference. Now Skvortsov, I think, was never quite the liberal that Yakovlev, or maybe even Kalugin developed into. But he was very useful in our contacts with Demichev because he understood the United States, and you could put things across to Demichev through Skvortsov that way. I remember one of the funniest examples of that though was on a tour that Demichev made here in the United States. We went up to New York to the opening of a Soviet exhibit at the Metropolitan Museum, and as we came into the exhibit in Demichev's entourage, his security man went out ahead as he would in any crowded situation in the Soviet Union, pushing people bodily out of the way, which Americans don't take to too well, and he pushed a young woman who thought he was a masher or something, and started beating him over the head with her handbag. He shoved her up against the wall, and looked around with a look of astonishment on his face, and Skvortsov ran up and said, "Look comrade, we don't do this in the United States. These Americans don't understand." So this situation with him being taken for a masher or mugger was defused.

I think these programs under the agreement, the educational exchanges, were certainly among the most important, if not the most important. I was in Moscow, of course, and was renegotiating the cultural agreement when the Soviets invaded Afghanistan, and we discontinued the negotiations. But the embassy, as well as the academic community, lobbied very actively when we were cutting off the other exchanges in retaliation for the invasion of Afghanistan, to keep the educational exchanges going, because it was such a problem of building up the infrastructure among the universities across the years, that if you cut it off, it's not like performing arts where you could pick up again the next day. It would be years before you could build it up again, so the educational exchanges were preserved, whereas other exchanges were discontinued at that time, as you'll recall.

There were some other exchanges that I was involved with before and after the agreement, which we had high hopes for but which didn't prove to be as successful as anticipated, and these were in the area of films. The Hollywood film producers for a time came to the Moscow Film Festival but they learned fairly rapidly that there was no commercial benefit in it. The Soviets weren't willing to pay the prices for American films they could get anyplace else in the world. And also there was the problem of pirating of films; showing them without paying fees or copyrights, and so on. So that program diminished rather rapidly. The interest in films and the efforts we made under the agreement to exchange documentary films never really took off because the films the Soviets sent us were either propagandistic or rather boring, and we could never establish that they showed ours. So that didn't pan out too well either.

Books is another area. The American book publishers came to the Moscow Book Fair across the years, and we always had this resultant publicity about censorship, which was interesting. But once again the only books the Soviets bought, or allowed to be bought, were the scientific technological books, and the book publishers, who were quite commercially minded, learned they didn't have to come to the Book Fair to sell the scientific technological books. So that fell off.

Radio and television really never got started for the same reason as the films. The Soviet products tended to be either loaded with propaganda freight, or boring, and we could never establish that they were using ours the way they were supposed to.

Q: Some of the things you've touched on there reminds me of the difficulties in dealing with exchanges with the Soviet Union were compounded by the fact that you obviously had a commercial interest on the side of many American sponsors; not all, the universities, of course, were different. And the fact that on the Soviet side you had a very strong interest in emphasizing scientific and prestigious events. In some of this the Soviets had a great deal to offer. I'm thinking here particularly the performing arts where the great Soviet productions like the Bolshoi Ballet, and the Kirov Ballet, and others, the Moiseyev dancers, and so on, came to the United States. And, of course, the interest on the side of the American entrepreneur sponsoring this, often Sol Hurok was to get the Soviet production into as many cities as possible to make as big a profit from it as possible. And, of course, there was a great interest on the part of American cities throughout the country to receive these events, and they did get very warm receptions, and rightly so. The other side of the coin was that our productions going to the Soviet Union were being sort of sealed off, as I said before, to certain cities. So we had a great deal of difficulty in trying to some degree to limit the Soviet access to the United States, not for its own sake, but for the sake of trying to wedge out of them some wider visitations in the Soviet Union of the big American artistic companies.

LITTELL: Yes, the American performances were enthusiastically received by those who could get to them in the Soviet Union, but the tickets were paid for in rubles, which could not be exported from the Soviet Union, nor converted. So what it amounted to was the Soviets were making a lot of dollars in the United States, and we were paying out dollars to take American groups to the Soviet Union. So they were benefitting both ways, although I do think, despite the great success that the Soviet performing arts groups had in the United States, once again they were in competition with all of the world; whereas American groups in the Soviet Union were quite unique, and were especially popular for that reason.

Q: It's very hard for anyone that was not there in those years; if you're going back to the '50s, to realize to what degree that was a closed society, particularly in Moscow. You could not talk to anyone. Everyone was afraid to speak. The surveillance -- not just on the embassy people -- but on all Americans, or all foreigners, was very close and often oppressive. Of course, that became a different problem later on when great numbers of people began to go as tourism was allowed to take place, and as more exchange groups, both informal and formal, began to take place. The KGB just couldn't cover it all in the same way they once did, although they certainly continued to try. But it was a terribly closed situation. I remember going in and feeling I'm going into a totally different world -- this was in 1956, before anything opened up. It's hard to recall that climate anymore.

LITTELL: Yes. Well, I remember too that when you would fly out from the Soviet Union on leave, or on consultation in Washington or wherever, when you crossed the border of the Soviet Union you could feel literally a physical weight lift from your shoulders.

Q: Yes, I remember the feeling too.

LITTELL: It was a psychological problem too because you didn't want to get a Soviet citizen with whom you were friendly in trouble. If you got too friendly with a Soviet, you had to leave it up to his or her judgment but you were always worried that, out of loyalty, they would get themselves in trouble. And they could get themselves in real trouble in those days. They could wind up in the camps for associating with Americans and being accused of passing on information to them.

Q: Even on trips where you did find much more of an opportunity to speak to people, and the awareness of the control system was not as great in the other regions. Perhaps it was in a few of the large cities like Leningrad and Kiev, but when you really got out in the boondocks so to speak, no. But even there I think we all tried to have one conversation only with people, and you never went back because they always had the excuse that they were called in by the KGB, and they would be called in as a result of the conversation, of saying, "Well this is something that just happened because I was thrown in with this individual;" and they could beg off. But if they were involved in subsequent conversations they really would be in deep trouble.

LITTELL: That's very true, and then another aspect for us traveling as Americans; we always traveled together for protection, but in the Intourist hotels those friendly Soviets who sat at your table were obviously KGB. They weren't valid Soviets, and you could have a conversation with them but you always had to be a little wary of that too. But you did encounter some "Nasto Yashchii," real genuine Soviet people, and those instances you remember, and treasure.

Q: Could we go further now into the differences between the two periods, the 1950s when you were there the first time, and then some 25 years later when you went back the second time? Maybe beginning on the theme of to what extent had the embassy grown, to what extent were there differences in the housing and facilities that people had in the embassy, and different conditions of life and perhaps beyond that you could get into some comments on the fairly large number of ambassadors that you worked for over those years. And then we might go further into some of the people you knew at a later period. We haven't got into that quite as extensively.

LITTELL: Well, as we've indicated in our discussions on difficulties of having contacts with the Soviet people, the difference between the '50s and the late '70s-early '80s, was almost like night and day. So far as the physical situation is concerned, when I came into Moscow in 1956 of course, I was establishing a new office, and a new home and so on. The embassy was much smaller, had much less in the way of facilities...

Q: I might interject here, since I was affected by this personally being a bachelor, there was no housing whatsoever outside the chancery building, with the one exception of the ambassador's residence at Spaso House. And, in fact, I was called in earlier because a bachelor was PNGed -- declared persona non grata -- and I came in to take his place because I was a bachelor trained in Russian affairs, and otherwise no one lived outside the embassy except you. You're the one exception.

LITTELL: That's right. Well, when I came in in '56 I spent -- I forget how many weeks, but it was too many -- in a Soviet hotel, the Leningradskaia, which was not one of the better hotels even, and when my family came we were there in a single room, my wife and two small children and myself, and trying to feed the children in the dining room was an impossibility. The service was not fast to say the least, and with children it was really impossible. We finally got a hot plate and settled on that for our meals. But we moved then into a cold water flat on Khoklovskii Peraylok, actually not too far from the Kremlin, in the center of the city. It was in an area where they had a few foreigners. Our next door neighbor was Ralph Parker, the British defector who wrote all the Korean germ warfare propaganda, and every time I went to work he'd come over and try to get my wife to come have tea with him. I think he wanted some English-speaking company, so that was undoubtedly part of it too. And then there was an American black named Robinson who had come over years ago, who lived there too. Otherwise our neighbors were all Soviets, and naively, undoubtedly, when we moved there we thought we would be able to make friends with our Soviet neighbors. As a matter of fact, the children adopted our children and on a rainy day our house would be full of Soviet children. But the parents would never come in, they'd not even come to pick up the child. They'd send an older child to get them, and although we had friendly, nodding, relationships, we had no real contacts with them.

Eventually then the diplomatic housing areas were established and we moved into one of the first ones, the one out toward the Prospekt Mira...Permanent exhibition.

Q: Yes, I went into that later, 1958, I believe.

LITTELL: Yes, and we moved in, and as you recall the central section of the building were Americans and French, and then one wing was Indians and Third World, and the other wing was the East Germans, Albanians, and Chinese and so on. We were all in the same project, but we didn't have too much to do with each other. But the housing was obviously much better than our first place.

When I went back in 1979, of course, I was Counselor for Press and Culture, so I was in the north wing of the embassy in one of the bigger apartments, along with the Political Counselor and the DCM, and the Counselor for Agriculture. The embassy was much bigger. We had people in seven or eight diplomatic projects out around the city; there were two on Kutuzovskii Prospekt, three on Leninsky Prospekt, and it was a much, much larger embassy. I was a one-man staff in 1956, of course, starting up the Press and Cultural Section. When I was Counselor for Press and Culture, '79 to '83, I had 16 members in Moscow, two in Leningrad, and one in Kiev.

Q: So you had gone almost from 1 to 20 in size.

LITTELL: Yes, in size, and of course the program, the heart of which was the cultural exchanges program, was broader than that too because, as you know, we monitored the Voice of America and gave guidance to it. We had the various informational operations, including America Magazine and a cultural bulletin. We had liaison with Soviet information organizations as well, and tried sometimes successfully to exchange something like films or TV programs with them. So it was a much bigger operation until Afghanistan came along at least, which was fairly early in my second stay.

I did have a number of ambassadors across the years. In the early period the two that you had, Chip Bohlen and Tommy Thompson, who were old Soviet experts from the original group of American- Soviet experts among the Foreign Service officers. There was no thought other than Harriman, I guess, of a political appointee ambassador in those days. But in the '79 to '83 period, when I first came, Mac Toon was ambassador, and of course he was an old timer in Soviet and Eastern European affairs.

Q: A career officer, yes.

LITTELL: A career officer; he had been my ambassador in Yugoslavia. He was a very knowledgeable, somewhat acerbic personality, but I got along with all the ambassadors. I guess Chip Bohlen in '56 was a little uneasy about having somebody from the United States Information Agency join his staff, even though I was transferred to the State Department for the assignment. He was primarily interested in political reporting, and political developments, and I think his feeling was that, at best, I wouldn't cause any trouble and, at worst, I might cause him considerable problems. As a matter of fact, when he left, he congratulated me on not screwing up, and not causing any problems. That was about the nicest thing he had to say, although I liked him very much, and liked his wife as well, and have seen the daughters off and on since.

Q: He was very cautious on other things too though, and with some reason, given the fact that he went there, I guess, just after the declaration of persona non grata of his friend, George Kennan. I remember that no one was allowed to drive in the embassy; I think there was one exception, because there had been an accident previously, and the Soviets had come down very hard and tried to set up a kind of political incident out of this. So the result was that because of the fear of Soviet retaliation, no one was allowed to drive. We had to go by chauffeured car, or walk, or take the subway.

LITTELL: Yes. You may remember, however, I was one of the first of the embassy officers to get a Soviet driver's license. I bought a Pobeda, which looked like every other Soviet taxicab, to get around in. The exam was very tough. You had to know a lot about how to repair an engine in the car, and all sorts of things, as well as a test on all the traffic rules and regulations in order to get it, and I felt fortunate to get the license and have the car. Incidentally, referring to my old friend Boris Pavlovich Stepanov, the head of SoyuzPechat, and his sense of humor, I took a long trip fairly early checking on the distribution of America Magazine in cities around the southern Soviet Union including Kharkov, Kiev, KostovnaDonu and Dnepropetrovsk, and I found out to my surprise that the SoyuzPechat in these cities all said they wanted more of the magazine. They said they couldn't get enough of them, and by then we were beginning to get returns of "unsold" copies up in Moscow. It was one of the rare examples of lack of coordination in that sort of thing that I found. When I came back and reported this to Stepanov and gave him the figures on what so- and-so had said, he turned to Parasov, his deputy, and said, "We've got to take that car away from him, he's getting around too much!"

Q: What about some of the other ambassadors then?

LITTELL: Tommy Thompson, of course, when he came to Moscow, had come from Vienna where there was a good sized USIS operation, and he had had recent experience with it, and was much more relaxed about my situation. And I think he understood it much better than Bohlen did. So I had an easier time with him than I did with Bohlen, although I had no real problems with Bohlen.

Mac Toon, I had served with in Yugoslavia, and he was the ambassador in Moscow when I came in 1979. As we've said, he was an old timer, and an expert on the Soviet Union of his generation comparable to Bohlen and Thompson in their generation. So we got along extremely well. This was in the period before Afghanistan. He left then and there was a period with a Chargé D'Affaires, Mark Garrison, who was a very able, knowledgeable, Soviet specialist -- a young guy.

And then Ambassador Watson came in -- of the IBM Watsons -- as a political appointee. Now he had some background in the Soviet Union in that he had been a pilot -- in fact, the personal pilot for the American General who was the liaison with the Soviets at the time of the World War II airlift, which ran over Great Falls, Montana, Seward AFB in Alaska, Anchorage, on to the Soviet far east, and then to Moscow.

Q: During World War II, yes.

LITTELL: Right, delivering planes during World War II, and he came back with high hopes of building on this to improve relations with the Soviet Union, but of course, Afghanistan came along right away. He was a good ambassador, I would say, I'm sure in contrast to many political appointees. He did not think he knew everything about U.S.-Soviet affairs, so he relied heavily on his staff -- intelligently on his staff. He and Mrs. Watson were very good for staff morale in this time of the post-Afghanistan period when things tightened up and contacts were cut off to a considerable extent. They did a lot of things at Spaso for the staff, and I think they were excellent in that way.

After he left Jack Matlock, who has just concluded his tour as ambassador there, was Chargé D'Affaires for some months, and then Ambassador Art Hartman came in. Art Hartman was a European specialist, but not a Soviet specialist.

Q: Basically a western European specialist, and had been Assistant Secretary though.

LITTELL: That's right. But once again, he was an intelligent man who relied on his staff. He was a quick learner too. I must say, he and his wife were really excellent for staff morale in a difficult period, and I have a lot of respect and affection for the Hartmans.

On the contrasts, I think for me the greatest contrast was the personal contacts I had. Even in the post-Afghanistan period the creative intelligentsia, the theater directors like Lyubimov, writers and poets like Aksyonov, before he left the Soviet Union, Bella Akhmadulina, Andrey Voznesensky, Yevtu Shenko, these people were all accessible, and I got to know them very well, particularly Bella Akhmadulina, and I spent a lot of time at her dacha with creative intelligentsia from all areas of the Soviet Union when they came into Moscow, but particularly those in Moscow. I spent a good bit of time at Voznesensky's dacha too and was very fond of him. One of the most interesting things was the contact that I had through Bella Akhmadulina with the Pasternaks and the time I spent in Pasternak's dacha, which his daughter-in-law, Bella, and others were trying to preserve as a museum and memorial to him.

Q: Boris Pasternak was deceased.

LITTELL: He was deceased. He was buried, of course, in the little cemetery looking right across to his dacha. At that point his friends, and followers, were trying to get the Pasternak dacha preserved as a museum to him. There was a lot of Pasternakian memorabilia there, including the piano that Richter, the night that Pasternak died, played all night in tribute to him.

Q: I knew Richter, when he came to the United States.

LITTELL: So I got to know them well, and actually played a small role, I think, in helping preserve the dacha. The Party wanted to turn it over to some of their top Party people, and I brought in all the western ambassadors that I could round up, and I knew a number of them; there were four or five of them who had served with us in the '50s...

Q: In junior roles then probably.

LITTELL: Giovanni Migliolo, who was the Italian ambassador, and there were a number of others, all came out and put in a good word for the preservation of the dacha. And I was very much involved in things going on at the Taganka in the period when Lyubimov was struggling most actively to try to get things produced there, and I sort of lived the disappointments, and the triumphs, along with him. So it was for me a very rewarding time in a period when our program was cut back substantially because of Afghanistan. I had more time to meet and talk with, and get to know, these people very well. And, of course, I still see Aksyonov in Washington, and see Bella and others when they come. It was a very rewarding period for me in that way.

Q: And they were able to continue even after Afghanistan to have these contacts without too much retribution. Did they ever voice any fears to you about maintaining contact?

LITTELL: Well, the KGB was omnipresent, and they'd even show up at the dachas occasionally too, I think, try to intimidate. But by that time the well-known -- internationally known -- people felt safe enough that they weren't going to be sent off to Siberia, and although Sakharov, of course, was banished, it was not Siberia. So they did, they came to our apartment and to Spaso House regularly.

Q: Very different from the early period.

LITTELL: It was entirely different. They would even come to my apartment in the embassy for a dinner, or a reception, with a written invitation, and they'd show it to the Soviet militia guards down there at the entrance. I'd always have a staff member, or be down there myself, to escort them through, but they would come. And I was invited to their apartments, and dachas regularly.

Q: Did you ever get intimations of hope on the kind of major changes that took place later in the Gorbachev period? Back then did people see it at all, that there might be major change coming down the road in five-ten-fifteen years?

LITTELL: They all believed in change, but like those of us who served there, thought of it as long-term change. I think they, as well as we, thought the system wasn't viable either as a system for dealing with human beings, or as a viable economic or political system. But none of them in their wildest dreams, I think, thought it was going to come this rapidly, as none of us did. I can remember saying to people who asked me, having served elsewhere in Eastern Europe, could this change happen in the Soviet Union? And I remember saying, if they got a leader who would lead them to a counterpart to the Prague Spring as Dubcek did in Czechoslovakia, maybe it could happen. But the thing that astounded me, and I never would have predicted would happen, was that the Party would give up its leading role, and vote itself out of existence! That I never foresaw, and I'm sure none of them did. They had great hopes for the future, and the hopes were frequently dashed. They worked very hard to support each other and to help each other. I remember when Giorgi Vladimov was threatened with being sent back to the camps, having been there of course a good bit of time; there was a lot of behind the scenes support for him, not only at the dachas, but people approaching any contacts they had to try to help him out, including in the KGB. Eventually he was expelled to the west.

Q: How much were there sort of watertight compartments between groups? For example, you're dealing primarily with the creative intelligentsia who obviously did an awful lot to help each other out. Did you feel that there were sort of cross-channels to people in the economic field, in the political field, at all? Of course, the Party was much more dominant in those other areas, but was there a sense of some areas of liberalization, and some areas where one wanted to assist people in areas other than your sort of professional colleagues?

LITTELL: Yes. There were trusted friends, and when I mean trusted friends, it was a small circle. The Soviets understandably, when they are in a group, know everybody there, and they trust everybody there.

Q: Or they know who not to trust.

LITTELL: And they know very well who not to trust. And occasionally if a member of the group fell by the wayside, it was really a great blow to them. I remember the Metropole incident. This was a publication that a group of them put out -- Aksyonov was particularly active in it, but Bella Akhmadulina and Andrey Voznesensky contributed to it. This was an unauthorized publication put out by Soviet writers and poets and got a lot of attention, of course, in the Soviet Union as well as abroad. It was published in Germany and in the United States initially and has never been published in the Soviet Union. It's the thing that really got Aksyonov put under such pressure that he left and his citizenship was revoked. One of these people -- one of the contributors sort of backtracked -- and there was much weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth about that, and examination of why, and why they could have trusted him, and so on, which was quite interesting. They had friends in other areas of Soviet life stretching into the government -- trusted people in the government. Not trusted completely maybe, but substantially, and these people would turn up at the dachas and hear some very sensitive conversations.

Q: Would some of these be at the Party Central Committee, or Politburo level?

LITTELL: Well, Lyubimov, and others, had contacts in the Central Committee. As a matter of fact Andropov was a protector of Lyubimov. They had these contacts, but these people never turned up at the dachas. The people who turned up out at the dachas on the weekends for these long discussions of how they were going to do this or that, or say this or that, or say to the world, were lower level people. But some in the government and in other areas of life, including sports and all areas of culture, of course...

Q: Including the cultural bureaucracy...the people in the Ministry of Culture, or radio- television committee, that sort of thing, Pravda, Izvestia.

LITTELL: Now, Voznesensky's wife, Zoya Boguslauskaya, was a Party member, and also was influential in the Writer's Union. She was not really accepted into the most sensitive situations, but everybody knew she was looking out for Andrey's best interests, and for the best interests of his friends who were people in the inner circles of the cultural intelligentsia, so you had that sort of thing.

Q: There was probably some effort to protect her by not bringing her into some of the more sensitive things that she would be in a position to reveal when she talked to others, or be put under any kind of indirect pressure.

LITTELL: I'm sure that was part of it although the strongest part, I think, was that she was a Party member and therefore she was not considered to be completely trustworthy.

Q: Are there any other comments on the difference between the periods?

LITTELL: Well, of course, as far as the program was concerned, the exchanges program was the heart of my program operation with the big staff in the '79 to '83 period. And when the bulk of the exchanges were discontinued because of Afghanistan, there was considerable talk about decreasing the staff. And as a matter of fact, the officer in Kiev and one of the officers in Leningrad were cut and a couple slots on my staff in Moscow, but we were able to do enough contact work and reporting, and things like the more extensive monitoring of VOA and that type of thing, so that we were able to preserve the staff. I think there was a feeling too, if you cut out the exchanges staff it was going to take you a long time to build up the contacts in the universities again. It's a good training assignment for a young officer, and if you cut those training slots out, what are you going to do when relations are normalized again?

Q: Yes, as they indeed were.

LITTELL: So the staff for the most part, was preserved. As far as the exchanges program was concerned, I had sort of a personal interest in trying to get some true cultural exchangees into the Soviet Union. We did succeed briefly in getting students into the Bolshoi Ballet. We had a young woman -- with whom I'm still in touch -- who studied at the Bolshoi. She was from Ballets West. We had two at the Tchaikovsky Conservatory, a singer and a string instrument student; and we had a student at Gatis in literature, particularly drama. This is the theater school. So we did have some success there. I think that it was a very good training ground for American students, even though some of them came to feel that they'd have been better off staying at their home university for that year than going abroad so far as completing their doctorates was concerned, and in getting on in their academic career. I think the ones who really thought about it deeply, and who had the experience, felt it was a very valuable experience. And as you've indicated, the Soviet students certainly benefitted by it.

Q: At least some did.

LITTELL: Right.

Q: Let me ask, perhaps in concluding this Russian part, unless you have anything more to say, that looking back philosophically, you've been a witness to enormous change over a period of four decades basically, to what degree do you think the exchange program contributed to the course of developments -- the liberalization of Soviet society, the opening up, and any comments you might have on that process?

LITTELL: There's no question in my mind but what our exchanges across the years, and our information operations, played a role in this. However, I realistically think it was things like the secret speech and the...

LITTELL: The internal developments which then were supplemented by the things we did. It enabled people to participate in the exchanges, or to come and see an American exhibit, or perhaps if they were fortunate, get to an American concert, or have contact with a guide at an exhibit, and talk to him or her. This type of thing, I think, was important and it opened their eyes very much to, not only what was going on in the United States and the western world, but also to how strongly their internal situation contrasted, and how unfavorably it contrasted with the situation in the United States and the west, which built more internal pressures for change. I think too, a point that I've made before, the Soviet effort to control these programs once they had admitted them, was completely counterproductive, because once they had admitted them to the Soviet Union, even though you couldn't get a ticket maybe, or couldn't get to something, or couldn't subscribe to a publication, it was legal. Therefore you used every avenue possible to get access to it, and they weren't afraid to come to American things the way they were in the '50s, in our day there together. And also it was counterproductive, because if the Soviets tried to control it as much as they did, and limit it to tried and true Party members or trustworthy people, then it must be a true picture, there must be something to it. The Soviet people came out with a more positive picture of the United States and the west than would have been the case otherwise.

Q: I agree with all of those points. I always felt that even back in the '50s there was a general realization that the Soviet Union was on the wrong track on the part of the people. There was almost total disbelief, and I saw that in incident after incident. It was very visible in the joke system in which you could never hear a sex joke in the Soviet Union because they weren't sexy enough. The jokes were all highly political, and kind of struck at the heart of the system but you could release those deeply felt, but covered up feelings, through jokes that you could not do otherwise.

Another aspect of that period, I think, was that there was a great sense of hopelessness, and a feeling of being out of it. The system would always be there. The controllers were omnipresent, and everlasting. One of the things I think that the program of exchanges and information, and all this, helped to do -- and I have to repeat, helped -- was that it contributed to a gradual increase in courage in which people felt that there was some kind of outside contact, and therefore you were not as isolated. That the society was gradually being pried open by degrees, little by little, and I don't mean pried open from outside, and it was being pried open in multiple ways, mostly internal, but with this outside factor coming into play as well. I think one of the great contributions of this program over the years was, not just what it did in respect to the thoughts of individuals, because that was always there to some degree, it became more overt later on, but was in the allowance by the system of doing more, of having contacts abroad. And every little step along this way prepared the ground for more steps. Everybody would say, well if he can do such and such, why can't I do it? Even a Party official who has not changed much, can make a trip, why can't I have travel abroad? Or if we're allowed to go see this kind of event, why can't we see another kind of event, and so on and so on, all gradually building up drop by drop. In fact one always had to be careful not to push too hard. If it went too fast, then you would cause the Party to crack down, but it was always a matter of gradualism, of seeing what the traffic would bear, but not too much beyond it. I don't mean this was us, the outside world doing this, but it was within the system, and primarily within the system that this was going on, but all this kind of contributed together to the flow of events that has since taken place.

LITTELL: Another point we've discussed on occasion that I ran into in my Soviet and Eastern European assignments, and you did too, was an inability on our part, and on the part of our ambassadors and others, and maybe the State Department too on occasion, to believe what we were hearing. I can recall on occasion an ambassador in a staff meeting saying, "We don't really know what these people are thinking. We really don't know at all what these people are thinking." I took that as sort of a defeatist kind of thinking because when you get out and do talk to people, and get around the country, you found it hard to believe sometimes that these people had any faith whatsoever in their society, and in all this garbage that was being shoved at them. As it turns out that was largely true. I used to argue this; I can recall in staff meetings arguing it, although I must say I have been surprised at how fast the thing collapsed once the artificial controls that held it together were removed.

Q: I must say I saw the same thing in Indonesia though where the totalitarian system which seemed to be omnipresent there too, and there was a tremendous sense of fear and terror. Maybe even greater than in the Soviet Union. When it suddenly collapsed, it collapsed so fast -- it did take two or three months for people to adjust, but within six months people had sort of thrown off these intellectual fetters that they had on them before, and were talking like sensible human beings openly again.

LITTELL: Of course they weren't saddled with it as long as the Soviets. But in the Soviet Union, if you could ever indoctrinate an individual in such a system, they certainly had the time to do it. Even Eastern Europe didn't have that much time, but they weren't successful anywhere in the long run.

Q: It didn't succeed. I think I saw that in the '50s, and I think you did, and others, although I remember that people that were higher up in the embassy and therefore traveled less, tended to be more mesmerized by the system.

LITTELL: The people they saw were the top Soviets, and what they saw was the show the Party put on, and we peons got out and traveled around and talked occasionally to a Nasto Yashchii Chelovek, a real valid Soviet citizen who told us what he or she was thinking.

Q: I remember coming back from trips and you'd have all these experiences where you saw the degree of disbelief, and I would sit down -- and I had to read the Soviet press every day and report on it and most of the reporting was based on the press because that was the only source for real political information -- and you would do that, and about two or three weeks later you would be saying this is two different worlds, and I'm not sure I really experienced those things that happened out there. Then you'd become so filled with this propaganda view, and then you'd go out on a trip again, and after you went out there you couldn't believe that the system was working the way it was in Moscow. Then you would start talking to people, and seeing how the diversity under the surface was really much greater than it appeared from just looking at the system, or the propaganda.

LITTELL: The Moscow scene was a trap too in that you were not only reading the press, and focusing really too much on little signs in the press, and little things that slipped out, and talking about that in staff meetings, and rarely talking about what people saw and encountered on trips. But also the diplomatic cocktail party gossip was all about what was read between the lines in the press or rumors, often planted, about what was going on.

ROBERT J. MARTENS
Political Officer
Moscow (1956-1958)

Robert J. Martens was born in Missouri in 1925. He received a bachelor's degree from the University of Southern California and served in the U.S. Army from 1943-1946. His career in the Foreign Service included positions in Italy, the Soviet Union, Indonesia, Burma, Romania, and Sweden. Mr. Martens was interviewed in September 1991 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: After Salzburg you went to Russian training?

MARTENS: That's correct. I got pulled out early from my Austrian assignment, and although I'd had a couple years of Russian language training at the university level, one doesn't really speaking Russian very well on the basis of academic courses although my vocabulary and my knowledge of the language theoretically was quite extensive. I decided not to try to avoid going through the full course, so I took, with four other people, the full FSI language course.

Q: This was at Oberammergau?

MARTENS: No, this was at the Foreign Service Institute, which at that time was a frame building in the area that is now the State Department, it was on C Street. Ted Eliot was in that course with me, and some others who didn't remain in the Service for a full career. The other four besides me had not had any Russian language background so I was able to keep well up with them although two of them were such brilliant linguists that they eventually kept up with me. The three of us that did the best eventually went to Moscow in 1956. In the meantime, after six months of full time language training, we went to universities, in my case to Columbia's Russian Institute. The others went to Harvard's Russian Research Center.

After an academic year at Columbia, during which I met my wife to be, incidentally, I went off to what was to have been a one year assignment at Oberammergau. I was the only one of the five to get that, but I was pulled out after only three months. The Oberammergau program, "Detachment R," was an advanced language and area course in which the instructors were all recent emigres. They either did not speak or were not allowed to speak English, so we had to take courses in economics, history, politics, and everything else, in the Russian language. That was considered a way to not only advance your knowledge of the Soviet Union, but to get your language capabilities up to a much higher level.

In any case, that program was interrupted after only three months because a bachelor officer in Moscow was being PNGed, and the housing restrictions were so great--there was no housing outside the embassy building except for one bachelor being put in the old billiard room of Spaso House, the Ambassador's house. This position was not that of an aide to the Ambassador at that time, but that of a regular political officer. In essence, I went in as a bachelor to replace another bachelor, and was crammed into that small Spaso House space which was too small for a married couple or family. I remained in Spaso House for the next year and a half of a two year assignment until Ambassador Tommy Thompson, who came in after my first year under Chip Bohlen, decided he needed an aide. When he was successful in getting an aide assigned, the aide was housed in my old space. By then and for the first time in Embassy history, we got housing outside the embassy compound, and I was given an apartment in that new housing complex.

Q: What was the situation as you saw it at that time in the Soviet Union?

MARTENS: This was the height of the Cold War. This was a period when there was almost no contact between East and West. The Iron Curtain atmosphere of that period was something that is unimaginable nowadays, or would have been unimaginable in 1965 or even 1960. There were no tourists going to the Soviet Union. There were no outsiders of any kind. The only people there were the embassy, which was very small, and a few correspondents who were -- a great many of whom were married to Russians, and had been stuck there since the beginning of World War II. So you had this sense of going into the total unknown. I remember as we flew from an airport in East Germany into the Soviet Union, thinking, "God, what am I getting into?" We were buzzed by Soviet fighter planes who made sweeps at us as we began to enter Soviet air space somewhere over Poland. So you were sort of awed by this as you came in, but after you were there a while, of course, you realized that all societies are alike in some ways -- human beings still eat, breathe air, sleep, live in houses, etc.

So the awesomeness began to recede. I had much the same feeling when I crossed the Rhine in Germany in World War II. That was at the time when Winston Churchill made his famous statement about "Allied troops now entering the dark sink of Iniquity." But later you began to see Germans in the villages we went through as human beings living ordinary lives. And so you concluded that things were perhaps not as different as you thought even though you also understood that all this ghastliness of Naziism had gone on at the same time. That's the way it was in the Soviet Union, a realization that this was a terrible society but one still inhabited by human beings that one could understand and hopefully relate to.

In the two years there that followed, however, the atmosphere in Moscow was difficult indeed. One had no contacts of any real depth with the Soviet population. People were scared to death. You also didn't want to have any second meetings with anybody because they very likely would be in serious trouble as a result. The sense that you got from reading the press -- and I had to read an enormous number of Soviet newspapers every day -- was one of total conformity. I began to travel, and you had to apply, I should say, two weeks in advance, if I remember correctly, to go anywhere outside the 25 mile, or 40 kilometer limit, around Moscow. You had to ask permission and wait for about two weeks to see whether you got permission or not. Frequently you would be denied, but at other times, perhaps with changes in the schedule, you would get an itinerary approved. I got so I was applying for travel all the time -- as soon as I got back from one trip, I would put in for another one. So I ended up with a tremendous amount of travel. I spent four months out of my last year outside of Moscow. And the reason I mention this is that, once you were outside of Moscow, while it was still a closed society, you found you were able to have much more contact with people, and rather often have the most enormously interesting conversations.

One experience that I frequently cite as an example, to illustrate the degree to which I thought the Soviet population was opposed to the system even then, was a trip I took out to Siberia on the TransSiberian Railroad. Two and a half days elapsed before we reached our first stop off point at a small city named Petropavlovsk in northern Kazakhstan. I got in a kind of debate with a fellow in my compartment; there were three Russians in the compartment with me, four persons to a compartment being common on Russian trains. The conversation started out in a rather non-ideological way, but it became ideological because this fellow had just graduated from Moscow University in "Political Economy", which meant Marxism-Leninism, and if what I was saying were true, he had to feel that his education was basically false and worthless. So he turned defensive and argued the party line. After a while people from all over the train began to stand around in the corridor and listen in on the conversation, and when I got off two and a half days later in Petropavlovsk in Kazakhstan the entire train -- most of the train -- huge numbers of people, escorted me, all of us crawling across three or four lines of parked boxcars during a half hour stop for them. The message was clear, they were demonstrating that they agreed with me rather than with this fellow's party line. This was not because of my eloquence, but rather because they saw an opportunity to demonstrate what they really thought without committing themselves to speech.

Those kinds of things happened with great frequency. But on every trip, almost, that I went on, every now and then you'd have a fascinating insight into the depth of disbelief, and discontent in Soviet society. So much so that when I left -- my last year had been spent on Soviet internal developments, my first year had been spent on Soviet external matters -- my swan song was to write about a 25-30 page piece on the degree of popular discontent with the system. I did not get that out because a more senior officer -- a very good officer, by the way and a person I had tremendous respect and like for and who was not able to do much travel because of his job -- took an opposite approach. He had been reading the Soviet newspapers like I had all the time in Moscow, and just could not believe that there was that much discontent. So he wrote a despatch, as we called them in those days, that took an opposite position from mine, and he put excerpts of my piece which had not gone out, in an annex as a dissenting viewpoint. I must say that now that things have developed the way they have in the Soviet Union, I think back on what I had said then, and believe that events have proven that the discontent I had described was there all through the years. It's not just a recent phenomenon, but it's something that permeated the society all through those years.

Q: This was really the depth of the Cold War. Again, we try to operate these oral histories as a time machine. Did you see this at that time...in the first place, why was the Soviet government acting in this regard toward the United States, and also was there anything we were doing that maybe we shouldn't have done, or should have done something we didn't do?

MARTENS: No, that type of revisionist thinking is utterly wrong. The Soviet leadership in those days...

Q: This was...Khrushchev the whole time?

MARTENS: Khrushchev was there; his power was not complete. I arrived in September 1956, that was about six months after the 20th Party Congress, which initiated a kind of liberalizing period. That liberalizing period closed down by the time I arrived because of the Hungarian revolution that occurred in October, because of the Suez crisis which had started opening up in September and reached its culmination in October. I did the first report, incidentally, on the "Polish October" that brought Gomulka to power against Soviet opposition by analyzing a revealing article in Izvestia the day before. You could tell that something very extreme was happening in Poland. This is what led to the downfall of the hard-nosed previous regime, and the accession of Gomulka. This was followed almost immediately by the Hungarian revolution on which I did the reporting, by the way, from the Soviet side of that, mainly from the newspapers. So it was a very hard nosed regime. The disbelief in Marxism-Leninism, and the failure of the system had not developed to what it was years later. Khrushchev himself felt the system was on the ascendancy even before, he, several years later, made his famous statement when he got to the United States about "we'll bury you," and he meant their system would outlast ours, and that was inherent in everything he was saying. He was also talking about catching up and surpassing the United States in the production of meat, milk, and butter which became a great slogan of that time.

There's a tendency now to think of that period as one of great openness and liberalism. It was not at all. It was a period in which you could not have contact with anybody. We embassy officers were followed outside of Moscow by enormous hordes of KGB tails; I've been followed by as many as 20 tails at one time. Fear was endemic throughout the society. It was a period in which the threat to the United States and its democratic ideals was enormous throughout the world. So I disagree completely with the kind of revisionist view that the Cold War was all our fault somehow. It was not. It was necessary to stand up to the advance of communism in that period. I was very liberal in those days on U.S. domestic issues, incidentally. But my experience in the Soviet Union probably turned me in a more conservative direction. One saw first hand how rotten that system was, and how it had to be opposed.

Q: You mentioned you arrived in time for the Hungarian October '56 time. How did you, and the people in the embassy, feel about this? Did you feel that this might be the beginning of a war? What was the reaction?

MARTENS: What scared me even more was the Suez crisis. I remember being with Chip Bohlen in Spaso House when the Soviets appeared to deliver an ultimatum to the West that if the British and the French didn't back down, the implication was they were going to launch an attack on the West. This was based on Moscow Radio and, in retrospect, I think they probably made this apparent threat after they saw that the U.S. was already telling the British and French to get out. We had no real information at the time, we had to rely on the Soviet press, Soviet broadcasting, and so on. I remember Bohlen came back from some place saying he had just heard this, and we were scared to death, to tell you the truth. Because if there was a nuclear exchange, of course, we were in Moscow.

Q: In the wrong place.

MARTENS: So there were times when the fear was very great, and the whole Hungarian crisis was one of both elation -- in the early stages of it -- and then a great letdown when the Soviet divisions went in and took the whole thing down.

Q: Were there crowds demonstrating, or anything like that?

MARTENS: There were some. The biggest demonstration, oddly enough, was in 1958, sometime after this, at the time of the Lebanon crisis when Eisenhower sent U.S. forces into Lebanon. That was a kind of follow-up to the fall of Nuri Said in Iraq.

Q: This was July 14th when the pro-Western Iraqi regime fell...

MARTENS: ...and the demonstrations were in July. This is an interesting thing: again an insight into the nature of real feelings in the Soviet Union. We had 100,000 demonstrators outside the embassy, and I happened to be the officer who was assigned to the gate to receive petitions from people coming from various factories and offices that were protesting. "Hands-off Lebanon" was the main propaganda slogan. And instead of just taking petitions at the gate I brought them through the gate -- I refused to take the petition at the gate -- and brought them into a little room just inside the entrance, and I found myself being kissed on both cheeks, with people saying “don’t believe this baloney” or words to that effect. There was one woman who was genuinely angry, but no one else was. I stood at the gate bantering with the crowd, joking. Then the authorities caused a hollow square to be formed after several hours had gone by. They brought in the assault forces which consisted of people dressed in workmen’s clothing carrying sacks that contained rocks, and I retreated into the large entry hall on the first floor of the chancery. Everybody else had gone to the upper floors of the embassy. As I stood behind a pillar, rocks came through the windows until they covered the entire floor, and up to my -- let’s say my ankles. Pellets from BB guns were also being shot through the windows. Slingshots were also being used to deliver pellets, and all sorts of signs designed to show great anger were hung on the building. And even though I’d seen how people had been friendly before, and you knew what was going on, you couldn’t help but be impressed by the show of anti-U.S. feeling.

Two days later a newsreel was advertised at a local theater, “Hands Off Lebanon,” and it was put on with the first American feature movie to be shown in years as an inducement for people to come, I suppose. There was a huge line and it later became clear that people were there to see the American feature movie. This line extended for several blocks, and I got there very early and was nearly at the front of the line -- not quite the front, but very close -- and I began to joke with people in the line, “I’m going to be in this ‘Hands Off Lebanon’ newsreel as the main villain.” Not that I was the main villain but I knew that there were newsreel cameras that had taken pictures at the Embassy gate, and I’d been there, so I thought it was at least possible that my image would come on the screen. Well, finally, an hour later we got into the theater. Naturally they showed the propaganda film first, so everybody would remain, and there was my image suddenly on the screen and a huge guffaw of laughter erupted from the audience. So clearly nobody was angry with me or the United States and it was another one of those insights you got, as I said, every now and then as to what people really thought. Anyhow, that was the biggest and by far the most awesome demonstration that we had there.

Q: When you took these trips, one, I assume that you were encouraged to do this by the embassy and there was money for this. Were there attempts...you were a bachelor, you must have had pretty young girls thrown at you and all that?.

MARTENS: Yes. An example was on that same trip that I mentioned earlier, the trip that began in Petropavlovsk and continued farther in Siberia. The Soviet authorities were very angry at me, I think, because of that conversation I had had on the train and the sort of demonstration that had taken place when I got off in Petropavlovsk. I was going from that town to the next town, which was Barnaul in the Altai Kray not far from the Tibetan border. On the train en route, I got into a conversation in the next compartment with a bunch of people who were playing a Russian card game which they were teaching me. Among that group was a young lady of 25 or 26 years of age, not a tremendous beauty but also not unattractive, I suppose. However, I had no thought of that, she was simply in the group playing cards. When we got off the train -- there were two people with me from our embassy who did not speak Russian, by the way, or spoke very little...there was a tremendous rainstorm, and only one taxi available. I happened by a stroke of luck to get the taxi for the three of us. But then I saw this young lady standing there in the downpour, and knowing there’d probably be only one hotel in town, and there was space in the cab, I told the cab driver to stop and asked her if she would like a lift. She thanked me and said yes, so we dropped her at the same hotel, and there was no sign at that time that there was going to be any continuation of this acquaintanceship. But then she began to appear at our room maybe twice a day, with various excuses -- she wanted to borrow an American magazine, or return an American magazine, or whatever. She was very shy, incidentally. She could not have got through to our room without the sanction and even the connivance of the KGB because there were...there is a kind of guard system on every floor, in Russian hotels, and one could not get past the guard on your floor unless the KGB wanted somebody to get through to you. The only real restaurant in town -- there were in addition a few stolovayas, which are a kind of stand-up eating places -- the only real restaurant in town was in the hotel, and it was closed for repairs. So our meal was delivered from the hotel kitchen, which was still operating, up to our room. We had just finished our meal on the last night there, and this lady came to the room. I should say parenthetically, that this was a day when I had been walking all through the city, and this was a place where I'd been...which I'm not going to do, describe how I knew this, but suffice it to say, there were tails all over the place. So when the young lady came in, very haltingly to return the magazine, I said in a very loud voice -- knowing the room was bugged -- "Come on in and join us for a drink of vodka," which we'd been having at the end of the dinner. And she did, and then I said, also very loudly, "This is the damnedest country I've ever been in. I've been followed all day by the KGB, and now they're even sending women to my room trying to entrap me." And this poor lady began crying. She kept pointing to the walls, and then for the radio to be turned up. So we turned up the radio, and she whispered in my ear, "I had nothing at all to do with this." And she told how the KGB had come to her room after she'd arrived, and forced her to go through with this. So we quickly eased her out the door. That kind of thing happened.

In the next town we went to, Kurgan, there was a young quite good-looking woman seemingly always in the act of undressing with the door open in the room across the hall whenever we came in, or out. Nothing was ever said or done but there is little doubt that the KGB was laying a rather transparent trap if one were foolish enough to make an advance.

Finally, in the next town, Ufa, I was poisoned, and got violently ill -- more ill, I think, than any time in my life. I had to literally creep across the floor; I couldn't even get up on my elbows because of my weakness. I was then thrown out of town by the KGB the next day under accusations that I'd overstayed my authorized itinerary time for nefarious purposes. I won't go into more detail, to save time but suffice it to say that you could get into very difficult situations.

Q: You're taking these trips. What was the purpose? And how did you operate?

MARTENS: There were a number of things. One did some technical things, for example, we would go to the markets and price food in different parts of the Soviet Union. The fellow that went with me on the trip I just mentioned was the deputy Agriculture Attaché' and he looked at the grain, and how the crops were doing, and that sort of thing. One thing I did, I guess I can say after all these years, was when I had nothing better to do -- I didn't do this unless I wasn't able to talk to people -- but I would make notes on streets.

There were no maps of the kind that were freely available in the West in the Soviet Union; virtually everything was regarded by the Soviets as top secret in those days. So as I walked along any given route, I would mark down the names of the streets. At a later time, when I got back to the embassy, I could put my notes into some kind of sketch so one could get some idea of how particular cities were laid out. I won't go into all that in any detail. So there were a variety of things one did. Sometimes you could also arrange meetings with people at various Soviet offices or other institutions. These were innocuous, but of some interest. You might go to a factory that was not regarded as of strategic importance -- a candy factory, let's say -- and talk to people, and conduct a little interview...

Q: These would be set up for you?

MARTENS: The local branch of the Ministry of Culture might set such a meeting up, for example. But the thing that was of most interest was trying, whenever one had a chance, to talk to people. On trains you were always able to talk to people to a greater extent because people tended to open up on Russian trains. Maybe this was because of the great distances. It was very much like travel by ship in the old days in the Foreign Service where everybody got to know each other on a ship when you felt somewhat removed from your ordinary life. Everybody got into pajamas on a Russian train; you wandered up and down the corridors in your pajamas and you'd strike up conversations with people. And a lot of times they were striking up those conversations with you as soon as they saw you were a foreigner. These conversations were not all highly political, but they were all of interest since they gave you some insight into the real Russia, you might say, not just a propaganda view that was all you ever got in Moscow. So a lot was just by chance in who you happened to run into.

Harry Barnes and I went out one time on another trip to Siberia. We were way out in the deepest reaches of eastern Siberia. A couple of insights: traveling from Irkutsk, we went by plane up to Yakutsk, 3,000, maybe only 2,000 miles of primeval forest and nothing in between but a dirt landing strip alongside of a log cabin village named Olekminsk of maybe 100 or so souls, on the banks of the Lena River. We stopped there for a day or two just for the hell of it, and we were living in a bunkhouse at this airport. One had to walk about a mile or two to the village I mentioned where there were no streets, only log cabins. In the bunk next to mine was a Yakut, a fellow who looked very much like an American Indian. As we got to talking, he described where he lived, which was about 1,000 miles north of Olekminsk at the edge of the tundra. He had a cabin up there in which he was trading stuff for the government with the itinerant Eskimo-like tribes that followed the reindeer. Once a year he would get a chance to take leave, and his leave was spent in this place where I now found myself in Olekminsk. He'd come down for one month to this place which I thought, and still think, was the end of the earth. But yet, for him, this was the place he had to go for his annual vacation. And this has become my description of what "relativity" means.

Anyway, we went on to Yakutsk, a fair sized town in the permafrost region of northeastern Siberia, and we were sitting in a kind of large beer hall. A man came up to our table, a Latvian who was rapidly becoming very drunk, and began telling me he had just been released, under Khrushchev's recent edict, from a slave labor camp. He was still unable to go outside his lumbering camp somewhat outside of Yakutsk, except that he could now come into Yakutsk once in a while. He could not go back to Latvia. But he described the life of his family from the time they were picked up by the MVD in 1940, and where they had all died one by one except for him, in camps along the various reaches of the TransSiberian until he ended up at sort of the end of the line out here. It was a tremendously interesting conversation and an insight into the Gulag system. After a while he went to the bathroom and disappeared. I imagine the KGB had been watching us all through this and had grabbed him as soon as he was out of our sight. So you had interesting little insights into things if you got out into the boondocks.

Q: The young officers got out. Whereas the more senior officers got trapped almost. So you would get two very different perspectives. How did that play out at the embassy, at that time -- the dynamics?

MARTENS: I think everybody at the top levels understood what a lousy system it was. There was a sort of basic agreement, I think. The only thing where there might have been some disagreement, and that was implicit more than explicit, was in the understanding of the degree of discontent in the society, which I have alluded to. I don't think it manifested itself in other than this one thing that I mentioned, my final report that didn't come back to the Department. I don't feel any bitterness about it. I don't mean to criticize anyone but it did sort of expose to me that the differences in perception were greater than I imagined they were, and I didn't really realize it until I came back and my report never came through month after month. I kept wondering why.

There was also, I suppose -- this is more true, I think, of Tommy Thompson, than it was of Chip Bohlen -- a great concern that we not do anything that would offend the Soviet authorities. When I came back from the trip I described earlier where I had been poisoned along the way, I wrote a report describing the conversation I had had on the train. Thompson never said anything to me about it, but maybe two or three weeks later he did make some comments in a general staff meeting that I believe were related to my trip report. He did not mention me or allude to my trip but spoke in general terms about the limits that one should put on one's self; that it would be a mistake to push things too far in conversations with Soviet citizens.

It was not our job to get too deep in the debates, the relationship with the Soviet Union could be injured. It was a very sensitive situation. He was very right to say this, and in retrospect, I have thought myself that I probably carried this particular conversation further than I should have. So I may well have been wrong in this. There was no reprimand or anything else, and I continued to talk to people but probably keeping in mind a little bit more Thompson's concerns that one needed to be careful about how far...it was a very fine line that one had to walk, in other words. Obviously our senior management was more conscious of this than the more junior officers.

Q: And also were looking at a different picture. This is often a dynamic within an embassy.

MARTENS: Yes, and particularly true of that kind of a society. I spent a great deal of my career, as we may get into later on, in closed societies and this was one of four assignments in closed societies, and that sort of thing was always there, and I saw it from both sides. I saw it many years later from the other side.

Q: Did you find there were sort of divergent things within our CIA and military attachés, as you saw it from your vantage.

MARTENS: There wasn't much in the way of a CIA establishment. There was one fellow, I think, and he didn't do much of anything. The society was too closed for him to do very much, and later he got PNGed for trying something. And he was not a terribly substantive officer anyway. There was a large military contingent. They were out doing their thing which was not so much...they were generally not interested in talking to people, they were interested in avoiding contact because they were primarily interested in sight observations. I did a little of it in Odessa, but that was not a sensitive thing. The attachés were more interested in looking at military installations, I suppose, equipment and that sort of thing, but I don't want to get into that.

Q: What about...you mentioned Thompson. How about Bohlen? He was there when you first arrived. His style of operation, and how you saw him within the embassy?

MARTENS: I have tremendous admiration for both men. Bohlen was a more outgoing person, easier to talk to. I liked him tremendously. I played poker with both of them, incidentally. I was the only embassy officer to do so on a regular basis and the rest were usually newsmen. It was not just because I was living in Spaso House with him, but because I was a poker player in those days. The Bohlens took me into the family to a much greater extent than Thompson did later. Every Sunday I had dinner with the Bohlens, that was regular. Other times during the week, if they didn't have anything on particularly, they might invite me up for a kind of family evening in their quarters. I remember one thing we did a couple of times was to look for mushrooms in forests -- an old Russian avocation, so to speak -- and the Bohlens liked doing that and I used to do that with them. Bohlen was a much more intuitive type of man than Thompson. Everyone knows of his knowledge of the Russian language, and his insights into the Soviet Union. Sometimes, I think, he could be very wrong because his judgments were to a great extent intuitive, rather than based on reason. I think he carried on the collective leadership thing longer than it probably merited. He believed that the leadership was going to stick together -- this is before the anti-Party group affair where Molotov, Malenkov and Kaganovich were ousted. I don't think he saw the possibility of that. Many of his insights, of course, were extremely useful. I had dealings with him later on too when I was in the Soviet-U.S. exchange program, where he was the chief negotiator, and I was one of three subordinate negotiators under him some years later. I think he was more casual by that time in the negotiating process than Thompson would have been. Thompson was a much more methodical man.

Thompson was a man who was rather remote. When I came back to Washington from my previous experience with him in Vienna, I ran into him in the elevator one day. Even though I had talked to him numerous times in briefings that I had given just prior to his Allied Council Meetings in Vienna, he looked at me and didn't recognize me when I said hello. Later when Thompson first arrived in Moscow, I was showing him around Spaso House -- Bohlen had already left. Of course, he had previously known Spaso House to some degree from the junior officer's assignment he'd had there during World War II but a lot of years had passed, and I was showing him through the building. He asked me where I had served before. He ultimately remembered me after I mentioned Vienna, but he was kind of aloof -- not coldly so, but his mind was elsewhere, you might say. He rarely talked to us junior officers in the embassy, unlike Bohlen who had meetings from time to time in which he got all the substantive officers together and we'd kind of brainstorm various things. It was open to all political and economic officers of whatever rank. Tommy Thompson didn't do that so much. It didn't mean that he was...everybody respected him tremendously. In many ways he was as major, or maybe more of a major player, in the post-war world than Bohlen. There was a book written on what was called “The Wise Men,” which mentioned four figures: Bohlen was one of them, Kennan was another, McCloy and Harriman.

I remember a conversation I had about a year or so ago with Ted Eliot, who was in the embassy in Moscow with me at the time, and Ted was saying (he and I and Pic Littell were out to dinner talking about those days), and Ted said, “I think it was really a tremendous mistake not to have included Tommy Thompson in that book to make it five, because I think he was really more important than any of the others. He was really a key figure in the development of U.S.-Soviet relations over the years that followed.” And I think there is a lot to be said for that.

Q: One other thing. How did you find dealing with Soviet bureaucracy, particularly in Moscow, but elsewhere.

MARTENS: We had practically no relations during my Moscow tour. I was never in the Soviet Foreign Ministry. There were rare occasions where we had meetings with Soviet officials...if there were important visitors from the U.S. I remember a U.S. Joint Atomic Energy Committee delegation was over including Senator Gore and two or three Congressmen, and we had meetings at an Intourist office of all places, to discuss their desire to visit the Dubna nuclear facility. This was a rather unclassified facility, to which a lot of people went later, but up to that time Westerners had not been admitted and I was interpreting for Gore. I knew that the Soviet Intourist man spoke some English, but he wouldn't speak it in this situation. In my interpretation, I tried to tone down some of Gore's rather vitriolic comments. When Gore finally understood that I was toning him down, he chewed me out rather badly about not interpreting properly. But I knew that if we were ever going to get the access desired, that it couldn't be done on that basis. The group finally did get in and it was because the request was put in a more courteous way. Anyway, there were rare occasions when you had contact with Soviet officials but not very often. The only people that would go to the Foreign Ministry at all would be the Ambassador, the DCM, and what was called the Chief of Chancery -- that is the head of the combined political-economic section. At that time we had a combined political-economic section which had six officers, so it was very small. There were three on the external side and three on the internal side including only one economic officer initially.

William Watts was born in 1930 and raised in New York, New York. He received a bachelor's degree from Syracuse University and a master's degree from Harvard University's Russian Regional Studies Program. He served in the U.S. Air Force from 1951-1954. Mr. Watts' Foreign Service career included positions in Korea, the Soviet Union, and Washington, DC. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on August 7, 1995.

Q: Your first assignment was to INR?

WATTS: Yes, in what was called the Soviet internal branch. We worked exclusively on what was going on inside the Soviet Union. There was a monthly report that came out which included both what we did in internal and external, plus the whole East European area. It was I thought an extraordinarily good document. We had some very smart people in there. Some who were civil service and stayed for a long time and some of us Foreign Service who stayed only a couple of years or so. But it was a really powerful thing. We had daily reports and things we would be working on as a special report. We also prepared every morning, and that was strictly done by the people pretty much on the internal branch, but not exclusively, and I had to get in about 5:30 to prepare, the morning briefing report that was given to the head of INR for his morning meeting with the Secretary of State. So, we prepared the head of INR -- Oscar Armstrong and one other while I was there. That was a tough job. You would come staggering in half asleep and have to go through all of the overnight take. And then I went and did the same kind of thing later in the White House for the President, so it was sort of a funny...

Q: What was your impression of our knowledge of what was going on inside the Soviet Union?

WATTS: My feeling was that it was pretty good. I was not aware at that point, I was not cleared, well none of us had clearance for things like the Gamma Guppie Operation. None of us knew about that.

Q: What was Gamma Guppie?

WATTS: That was where we had the telephones of the Soviet leaders' cars wired. All that came out later on. That was just unbelievable intelligence. Well, it was not wired, it was monitoring through satellite. It was just astonishing stuff. I would say that the bulk of our information was reading the Soviet periodicals and papers and despatches from the embassy, which I thought were very good and perceptive.

Q: Who did this? One of the great sources of intelligence for the Peoples Republic of China was the China watchers in Hong Kong who read every local paper they could get a hold of. It is a good way to find out what is happening. Who actually sat down and read these papers? Were they read in Moscow or Washington?

WATTS: In the internal branch, first Ken Kerst and then Gordon Tiger were the heads of it. Then Boris Klosson and Tom Larson ran all of DRS, internal and external. Then we had Heyward Isham. Matlock was there for a while. Paul Smith, Ed Sokol, Fred Armstrong, myself. We had six or seven officers on internal and another four or five on external affairs. Each of us got different papers. I was assigned government and law. So I used to read Izvestia every day. And I would read a lot of law-linked journals, etc. Somebody else read literary stuff. We had somebody reading the economic stuff. That is where Ed Hurwitz was. So, yes, we did a lot of that and it was also done in Moscow. We were both doing a huge amount of reading as was, of course, the Agency and Defense. So you were getting a lot read.

Let me give you an example of how this played out in reality. At the time of the purge of the "Anti-Party Group" in 1957, Ken Kerst, and this was the advantage of having people who stayed there a long, long time...there was a lead editorial in Pravda that made a reference to "no matter how high his post may be," and Ken said, "Uh oh, that is a purge." He wrote a memo that said this indicated a purge is about to occur and the logical person, given a lot of other stuff that was said, was Lavrenti Beria...he asked me to go back into stuff I had been reading in the legal stuff and there were hints of it. He was absolutely right. It was amazing. I think in fact he got some kind of a commendation for that. He predicted this about two or three days before the event. It was very interesting. So you had people with that kind of background.

***

WATTS: In the middle of 1960.

Q: Where did you go?

WATTS: I went to Russian language training. I had been assigned to the embassy in Stockholm, but I think that Marshall Green intervened. I was assigned to the consular section in Stockholm but the assignment was suddenly switched and I went to Russian language training in Oberammergau for a year and then went on to Moscow.

Q: How did you find Oberammergau?

WATTS: It was a gorgeous place to live. We all had very nice housing. I was married by then and actually had one child and a second child born while there. The instruction from my standpoint...I already had a masters in Russian studies from Harvard and so there was virtually nothing in the substance of what was being taught that I hadn't already had. The language part of it was very helpful because the classes were all in Russian. You were supposed to speak Russian all the time, but nobody did. But all the classes were in Russian. We had along with history, geography, politics, etc. also language training at whatever level you were at. I think it was more useful for people who hadn't had the kind of previous academic training that I had. At that time at least it was almost impossible to be assigned to Moscow if you didn't go through Detachment R (Oberammergau Russian Language Training School). The whole Oberammergau outfit was a very sensitive thing. It was a US Army intelligence training base with particular...a lot of military guys were there getting a lot of specialized training before going to Moscow.

Q: You went to Moscow when?

WATTS: I was there from the middle of 1961 to the middle of 1963. I arrived in about July/August 1961 and left just before the fourth of July, 1963.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

WATTS: When I arrived the ambassador was Tommy Thompson, who you know is one of the legendary figures in the Russian field. He was a very distant ambassador to work for. We used to comment that when he was replaced by Foy Kohler that under Thompson the door to the ambassador's office was always closed; with Kohler it was always open. It was sort of indicative of their styles of operating. Thompson tended to work through a very small number of people. The DCM was Boris Klosson, who I had known earlier in INR, in 1956-58. The Thompsons and Klossons were very close. Obviously, other embassy people were invited to receptions, etc., but Thompson did work heavily through Klosson. He was rather remote as an ambassador, but hugely knowledgeable.

Q: During this period, 1961-63, you were there during the time of Khrushchev when he was feeling his most rambunctious.

WATTS: Up through the missile crisis.

Q: How did you see the Soviet Union and what was the situation there when you arrived?

WATTS: First of all I was very fortunate. I was an FSO but assigned to work in the cultural affairs section which at that time was clearly the best job to have in the embassy. My first assignment was to run one of the exchange exhibits we have between the United States and the Soviet Union under the cultural exchange agreement of 1959. I ran, I guess, the third of these exhibits. It was on transportation. I arrived in the Soviet Union, after the Bay of Pigs episode, at the beginning of the thawing. This was when Dudintsev's "Not By Bread Alone" was published in Novy Mir, the literary magazine. We were able to entertain a lot, particularly because I was in the cultural affairs section. We had people like Yevtushenko, Rozhdestvensky, and others would come to dinner. That was a remarkable period up to the Berlin Wall when it just shut down very harshly.

Travel remained very restricted. As I said before, I was surprised how much worse off the Soviet Union was in terms of economic reality than I had anticipated on the basis of my studies. It really was a big third world country where nothing worked right. The telephones didn't work and bugging was so obvious that you could hardly get through all of the static and the clinks and clanks. It was ridiculous.

At the beginning it was a period of not much in the way of interchange. It improved a great deal as we went along. It was the ottepl' -- the thaw period.

I was, as I say, very lucky because running these exhibits I started out in Moscow but then moved down to Stalingrad. It was, in fact, named Stalingrad when we arrived, and in the middle, on November 7...it was the night of November 6 that they came through and tore Stalin's statue down and for three days we had a city with no name. Then it became Volgograd.

Q: Did anybody know this was going to happen?

WATTS: It is very interesting what happened. This is an extraordinary episode, something that is really amazing. I was up in Moscow before we went down to Stalingrad and had bought myself some crummy Soviet clothes at GUM. Particularly at night, because my Russian was 4+,4+, I could go out and pass. People tended to think I came from Leningrad. I always said I was from up north.

Suddenly on the evening of the 6th we were told in the hotel...the dezhurnaya, watch-lady came running and knocked on the doors and said, "Close your windows." So, thinking something was up, I immediately jumped into my Soviet clothes and whipped out the back door. The front door was literally locked, we couldn't get out. I went out in the street and looked up at the Hotel Stalingrad (Gostinitsa Stalingrad) which was next door and started to see the light bulbs going out on the S-T-A-L-I-N, but they left Gostinitsa and grad. Across the big square was the railroad station with it's Stalingradskii Vokzal, and all of a sudden the "Stalin" disappeared.

The next thing that happened was that this military wrecking crew came in with a big crane. They put a big thing around the neck of the statue of Stalin and pulled the statue over. When it came down...I was standing back, there was a huge crowd by this time and the police were very edgy...it killed one of the soldiers. The guy next to me said "the jealous Georgian strikes from the grave." It was a perfect line.

The next day was absolutely fascinating. Word had not gotten fully around that this had happened. When the crowd started to march in from the street square, they suddenly saw no statue and they could see the light bulbs were out. The paper had come out with Stalin in the title cut out. For three or four days it was a city with no name. We had about 25 Russian language people who were hired for these exhibits. We took a pool at the hotel, to see who could guess the new name. A lot of the Russians joined in but then they were called in and told they couldn't participate in the pool because it was a capitalist plot or something. So we had to give them all their five rubles back. But one guy, Norris Garnet, a USIA guy with the exhibit, came up with Volgogorod, that was so close to Volgograd that we declared him the winner.

Then we went from there to Kharkov. So I spent my first almost six months living out in the boonies.

Q: Could you talk a bit about what the exhibit consisted of and how it was received.

WATTS: In the exhibit we had a car, a new Ford; a computer console for making reservations; everything to do with transport. There were things to do with railroads and cars and bicycles and motorcycles and computerization of getting reservations, etc. The exhibit was a tremendous hit. People were lined up for blocks to come in. Mostly, not because they cared that much about the exhibit, frankly, I don't think many did, but they just wanted to come in and talk to a bunch of Americans who could speak Russian. We got into the most amazing discussions. It was really a very lethal injection...I think in Stalingrad particularly, we changed that city in a lot of ways. People saw Americans. Here is this young bunch, mostly in their twenties, fluent in Russian, smart as hell and I remember one guys saying, "You know, you are not devils. We all thought you were all devils and you are not." It really had a big impact in the city. I went back several times later and people would stop me in the street who remembered me. This is a big city and yet they remembered you.

It really was an opening in terms of discussion and dialogue that was really quite striking. People were lined up to get in. They had enormous amount of police control. There was no question, there were just lots of goons in the exhibit all the time. We had one guy who was something of a zealot, I really had to try to calm him down. I said, "You can't cross a certain line. If you try to proselytize people, you are going to get thrown out of here or the exhibit will shut down." He was a real character, John DeLuca. You could see the police coming around and sometimes they would break up discussions and move people along. People then were cowed and did what they were told when the police moved in.

The other thing, of course, was that we were there twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week, so it meant that when the exhibit was over you had all these people running all over town and doing all kinds of stuff. We did have a couple of people who got thrown out. One guy came in with about 150 copies of "Animal Farm" that he passed out at night, which of course they found out about. We had to get him out of town in a big hurry.

Q: I have to tell you that somebody when I was in Belgrade came to me and nudged me and said, "Go down to the bookstore and look in their cultural section." There in English was "Animal Farm." People were taking great interest in farming!

WATTS: That reminds me when one time William L. Shirer went to give a talk in Milwaukee about his monumental book, "Berlin Diary." He arrived and found this absolutely overflowing crowd of people and he couldn't figure out what was happening. He looked and saw the sign, "William L. Shirer, the author of "Berlin Dairy.""

But we had to get this guy out. We had a couple of cases of people who did get seduced by agents and pictures taken and had to get them out. But, by and large the exhibit went very well. As I say, I think it really left quite a big impact in the city.

To have that big group of bright young Americans whose Russian was damn good sort of all over the place... We could eat in the hotel, they had a dining room for us, but after two days nobody did. Everybody was going out and eating at the kiosks, etc. and getting to know people.

The other side about it was that when I would go up to Moscow, the political section people in the embassy would take me up to the safe room at the top of the embassy to debrief me because I was getting a special insight into what was happening in real life, in terms of the daily existence of Russians. A phenomenal experience -- very, very exciting.

Q: What was your impression of how the people were living?

WATTS: They lived a very meager existence, there was no question about it. Long lines everywhere for everything from potatoes to meat. The state farm markets were just pathetic. The one thing where there was no question it was better, was in the private plots which collective farmers had and were allowed to grow. The produce that they brought in from that was really pretty good. The trouble was there wasn't enough of it, although it was what I think kept the place in a way going. The private plot was what added enough food into the economy to prevent what could have been real starvation in some areas. Those private plots were just taken care of like...you could see when you went to a kolkhoz market you could see the collective part and the private part and the growth ratio was like five to one.

I never felt one thing, although I read individual cases of people that were truly very disaffected. But by and large that was not what I ran into, most it was one of anger at shortages, etc. but you didn't feel that there was this seething, like a revolution around the corner that people were actively trying to do something.

I had episodes when I ran into that. One really extraordinary event when I was down in Yerevan in Armenia, a guy came up to me at a restaurant and sat down. The waiters would put an American flag on the table whenever you went to a restaurant to identify you as an American, which meant most people wouldn't come near you at that point. This guy did come and sit down and in perfect English said, "I want to talk to you. Just don't act surprised, but my parents were born in Lynn and Boston and met on one of the ships coming back here during the war." There were a lot of Liberty ships that brought a lot of Armenians back to Armenia. They came voluntarily. He said, "I am born here, but I want to get out." He saw that I smoked. This was all done in a very cool fashion. At first I was wondering if he was an agent and then he said, "I can tell you where all the agents are. You look over two tables to the left and there is a guy who always follows me, etc." He then said, "When you want the next cigarette ask me for a match and then keep asking me for matches all through the dinner." Then another guy joined us. What happened was that over the course of the evening, each of them had written their name and address inside the matchbox. So at the end of it I had eight Americans who had given me their matchboxes and saying they were going to be in Moscow in something like 15 days and would try to come to the embassy in an attempt to go home.

My wife and I just sat there as these guys gave us these things one by one. I had all these things and was then told to go to the men's room and write my telephone where I could be reached in Moscow. I did so and wrote down my home number. And then I said to them, "Look, when you come up and call, for God's sake just say this is John, or something, because the phone is tapped." About three weeks later these guys came up and whoever called me was all excited and he said, "We will be at the embassy at 10:00." I swore to myself and hung up.

I go down to the embassy and at about five to ten I come out and the guards are there, etc. At 10:00 this car comes up and the guys start to get out and these two guards turned around and walked into their little booth and looked away. Two cars came careening around the corner on two wheels and these guys were grabbed and gone in a matter of ten seconds. I turned around yelling at these two guards who said they hadn't seen anything. We put in a protest and were told we didn't know what we were talking about. Who were these people? Of course, I didn't want to give them their names. I don't know what happened to them. It was really sad.

Q: Was Khrushchev's virgin territories program underway? This was opening up the wheat fields which turned into one of the great disasters.

WATTS: Oh, an enormous disaster. I wrote my masters thesis on that and suggested that because I had gotten from some place the weather situation, the rainfall. I shouldn't say that I predicted it, but there were specialists who knew it wouldn't work because it would blow away.

Q: We kind of did it in Colorado and other places like that during World War I. We expanded it during the high rain time and then it blew away.

WATTS: That is what the great Okies situation was all about.

As far as what we were seeing was the rather drab, gloomy life that these people led. It was pretty damn bad.

Q: Efforts to capture Americans, particularly on sex or drinking, was that a big problem at the time you were there?

WATTS: Oh, yes. It was a constant thing, particularly when you traveled. We had one episode when a guy named Carroll Woods, who was head of the economic section, and who has since died, and I went on a terrific road trip together. We were told where installations were and if we could, at least count masts of ships. I was busily taking some pictures when the door broke open and a gal came in with her dress pulled down and right behind her were guys coming in to accuse us of raping her. Fortunately, we had been told what to do, which was to turn your back and don't look around. It was a kind of constant episode -- women with a sultry voice would call you in your hotel room asking to come up and have a drink.

Certainly the people in the embassy were so carefully instructed on this. If there were lapses it was very unusual. The exhibit was a different matter. These gorgeous gals would get these horny guys and the next thing they knew, bam! There were some ugly things like getting a girl to get a guy all aroused and with an erection and then a guy would come running in and grab him and pictures would be taken "proving" he was a homosexual. That sort of thing. Of course, we had to get these guys out when that stuff went on.

If there were cases in the embassy, I certainly was not aware of it. We were very carefully briefed.

Q: After you finished this time with the exhibits, what did you do?

WATTS: I moved into the cultural affairs section of the embassy. There were three of us. The other two guys were regular USIA people. I was seconded to that section, which delighted me because we had much the most fun. We were responsible for all of the exchange stuff, which meant that when any of the programs came -- the New York City Ballet came with Balanchine, the Robert Shaw Choral and Benny Goodman -- we went all over the Soviet Union with them.

We also had to go around to inspect potential sites for future exchange programs. So I did a huge amount of traveling. It was a marvelous job. I couldn't have asked for more fun.

We were also responsible, by the way, for the distribution of Amerika magazine, which mostly we did by throwing it out of train windows. If you put it out in the kiosk, the authorities would just take them away.

Another thing we had to do was sort of a reverse thing. There were lots and lots of foreign exchange students, particularly from Africa who came to Lumumba University and wanted to get out and go to the United States. They were constantly coming into the embassy. I handled all of that.

Q: I was doing somewhat the same thing while in Yugoslavia when Sofia University emptied itself of African students. They got fed up and left. We were screening them. Did we have a brief to talk to these students and picking out the ones that might be good and saying, "Why don't you try, once you get out of the country, to....?"

WATTS: I had a standard program. Every student that came in I interviewed at some length. I would then write a despatch on every one giving the background of where they came from, how they came to the Soviet Union, what they were studying. It was always at Lumumba. What their record seemed to be like, if they had their record we would send it in. And, then we would suggest that when they went back, if they would like to apply there, fine. There was no way that we had access to enough material to make recommendations. The best I could do, I would have a closing paragraph saying that so-and-so appears to be very bright with excellent English, etc.

It was such a known fact that these guys were seeing me that the militia would tell them that it was the first door on the right, Watts is in there. A lot of them, particularly coming from Indonesia and Ghana, during the period of Sukarno and Nkrumah, got on the plane thinking they were going to the United States and when they got off found themselves in Moscow and were absolutely stunned. These were very angry young men, and they hated it. There is tremendous racism in Russia. These people were treated badly. If Russian girls went out with them, they would get beaten up -- considered to be whores. It was a very sad situation. These kids would come in cold and miserable in the winter. It was pathetic. I made a somewhat specious recommendation that I thought in the future, I did put this in a despatch at one point, consideration for all Fulbrights coming to the United States, particularly from Indonesia and Ghana, should be required to spend two months of preparation at Lumumba University to give them a sense of what life would be like there compared to what life was like when they got here.

Q: You were there when the Kennedy Administration came in.

WATTS: Yes, I arrived in the middle of the summer of 1961.

Q: Were you there during the Kennedy/Khrushchev in Vienna?

WATTS: Yes. That was in September, but I was out in the boonies then and out of touch with reality.

Q: It was a time when Khrushchev was very much in his "in your face, challenging" period.

WATTS: It was interesting because it became one of the periods of extraordinarily opening up, one of the very exciting times up until the Wall. We were seeing a lot of people and suddenly it just clamped down.

Q: The Wall came when?

WATTS: I think it was in the middle of 1962, but I can't remember exactly.

Q: This is before the missile crisis.

WATTS: Yes.

Q: Where were you when the Wall went up?

WATTS: I was back in Moscow in the cultural affairs section. There was a famous speech that Suslov, who was the Party ideologue, gave at a Party meeting up in Lenin Hills which came out and essentially brought an end to the thaw. Suddenly people just weren't coming to receptions, etc. It was a real different period, no question. And that remained up to the missile crisis.

Q: Kennedy called up some Reserves after the Wall went up, it was a tense period in the United States. I was back here in Washington and I recall we were really thinking this may be it. How did it translate in Moscow?

WATTS: All I can say is that I have very, very vague memories about it other than it went up. Again, I was in the cultural affairs section and our job was very different than the rest of the embassy. I read some of what was going on, but I didn't live with it day in and day out in terms of my work.

Q: After the Wall when things clamped down, were there things that had to be canceled?

WATTS: Yes, a lot of things. Part of what I did on my day to day work was work with the State Committee for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries run by a guy named Romanovski. And there was a State Committee for Scientific Exchange, the deputy was Penkovsky, who I dealt with quite a bit. What we were doing was making arrangements for exchange of delegations. I went one day to a meeting with the State Committee for Scientific Exchanges and asked the head of the group...we were coming to see the Bratsk Dam and they were coming to see the Grand Coulee Dam, or something. I said, "Oh, you are not Penkovsky, where is Penkovsky?" The guy said that he "was transferred to different work." Well, I just passed it off and we went ahead and had our meeting. I got back and reported to Dick Funkhouser, who was the economic counselor, and said, "Oh, by the way, Penkovsky wasn't there today, I met with a different guy." He looked at me and said, "What?" And then Hugh Montgomery came in who was the security officer who later I learned was the station chief, I didn't know that at the time. I told him that Penkovsky didn't show up, and I had been told that he had been transferred to different work. In retrospect, I didn't think anything of it at the time, Hugh Montgomery was out of that office like a rocket. I guess that was when Penkovsky was arrested. I never saw him again.

Q: Penkovsky was the highest placed person in the Soviet hierarchy...

WATTS: I think he was very senior and was providing us with extraordinary information. I saw not too long ago a British (?) film made on him and Greville Wynne, who I had met at a reception, and that whole operation. It was a sort of documentary on the Penkovsky files. If it was accurate, it was pretty damned amazing. He had real access and was getting into the inner files taking thousands of pictures. Finally he got caught and Greville Wynne got caught.

This was part of what we were doing all the time, these exchange programs. After the Berlin Wall, a lot of these things just didn't happen. Visas would not get issued. They got much tighter on who they would authorize in delegations. They would knock off a lot of names. Presumably they knew who some of the people were they didn't want in.

Q: How did you find the people you worked with on the Russian side? Were they people who just shrugged their shoulders saying you know how things are today?

WATTS: It really varied. I remember there was a guy from the ministry of higher education by the name of Rastaturov, with whom I felt I had a rather useful working relationship. On a couple of occasions, not often, but a few times, when the Department, knowing of this relationship, would send a cable saying, "Would embassy officer Watts, if he feels it appropriate, ask about such and such." Perhaps a visa had been turned down or something like that. I would go to Rastaturov and say that we would really like to have this guy go and what was happening. And a few times I would get it done; a lot of times, not. So, that could happen.

Another guy I got to know well in the State Committee for Cultural Relations, Burov, I don't know whatever happened to him. I think he was a real candidate to defect. He had been at the UN mission and he loved the United States. He was always getting me tickets for special shows. I gave him tickets to go to the Robert Shaw Choral, he and his wife, and they were absolutely thrilled over the performance.

So, there were a few like that. And Burov was another guy that I could say, "Look, this one we want, let's....," and sometimes it worked. You couldn't do it too often. There were a lot of others who were just cold fish and didn't give a damn. It varied. But, I think it was true that you could have exceptions and obviously you had to be able to deliver in return. So I would have to be able to tell the Department that he gave us on this, I am going to come in for the pro quo somewhere and they would usually do it.

Q: Can we talk about the missile crisis (October 1962) which was over in Cuba but this was probably the most dangerous point of the whole Cold War period?.

WATTS: Yes, I think it probably was. Events were developing at the UN, Adlai Stevenson showing those pictures of the missiles, and there were missile carrying ships on the way and we were scouting them like crazy. The tension increased day by day. A letter came into the embassy that I was not aware of, the first letter from Khrushchev to Kennedy. That was sent off to Washington. Then, about Tuesday of that week, a second letter was sent over from Foreign Minister Gromyko to Ambassador Kohler with instructions that this letter was to be totally secret and sent top priority...our equivalent of FLASH, which we used very, very rarely. Kohler gave this letter, it was about two pages long, to four of us and said, "Here, translate this." We had to go up to the secure room in the embassy, which was located on the top floor and was an enclosure inside a room that you went into, shut the door and turned on air pumps. I am not quite sure why we did this since the letter came from Khrushchev, but we did.

The interesting part was that each of us when we got part way through our translations sort of looked up stunned. This letter was intemperate. I recall, and this may now be memory playing tricks with me, in the segment that I translated at one point it was saying, "Kennedi, ti sukina-sin. Kennedy you son of a bitch." In any event, this was an intemperate letter by any stretch of the imagination.

We took this back down and gave it to Kohler, who was impatiently waiting for it. He knew it had to be something important. He read it...we used to kid about Kohler being the whistler because when he got a little nervous he would start to whistle...this time he went into a full symphony. I will never forget when he said two things. "Gentlemen, you may not discuss the contents of this letter with anybody including your wives." And then as he turned to go in and write his cover note, he said, "I think this may mean war." When your ambassador in Moscow says that, that sort of shakes you up.

Well, the message went off. I later was told that in the ExComm meeting, when the second letter was being discussed, and there were various accounts of what happened, but the account I got was via Chip Bohlen who was there. There were lots of different things thrown out as to what to do. Kennedy then turned to Thompson, this was dealing with the second letter and what it meant, and he said, "Well, gentlemen, you are the two top experts on this, I want your advice." This had been agreed before that he was going to turn to them. So, Bohlen opened this discussion, as I understand the meeting, and said, "Mr. President, we have discussed this at great length and are at complete agreement with what Ambassador Thompson is going to say. He is the senior of the two of us, and speaks for both of us." Thompson, according to this account I got, said, "Mr. President, you never received the second letter. Quite frankly we have read this over and over and over and we can't tell whether Khrushchev might have been drunk, might have had somebody with a gun at his head, there may have been a coup underway, we just don't know. But, whatever it is, if you respond to the second letter, whoever is the cause of that letter is on the hook. They are now committed and we don't know how you deal with that. The first letter you can deal with, it calls for two things -- removal of Jupiter missiles from Turkey, which were obsolescent anyway, and essentially a no invasion pledge which is no big deal as we weren't planning to invade anyhow." I was told that President Kennedy said, "Gentlemen, that is why we need career diplomats who know their stuff. Well done."

I told this the other day to a friend of mine, Luke Battle, and he said, "Yes, I had heard about the unanswered second letter and the way I heard it was that somebody said that 'an unanswered letter is a letter that is answered.'" In any event, the thing that was intriguing about this...we didn't know about this yet as it occurred in Washington...and I had been invited to go out to Paris and give a lecture at the NATO Defense College which I can do periodically. Because of my wandering around the Soviet Union I gave them a picture of what was happening there that was quite different. I was leaving Friday to go out. I went to Kohler and said, "Mr. Ambassador, given what is going on, should I cancel the Paris trip?" He said, "No, no, we are going to act as if nothing is wrong. They know you are going and if you cancel it is a signal of something. We are not going to give any hints of any kind.” So, I left, got on the plane and felt like a real shit in a way. I might have been going out and they are all dead. I got into Paris and stayed with my wife’s parents who were then in Paris. In the meantime I hadn’t told her. I took a taxi and went to the apartment and came into the door and Brantz, my then father-in-law, said, “Did you hear the news?” I said, “No.” He said, “The ships just turned around.” They had just heard that news and that was when it was over. That was really high drama.

About a week or ten days later...I did not keep a diary which in retrospect I regret...we had a reception at Spaso House, the ambassador’s residence. I can’t remember what the occasion was, but the guest for the occasion was a pretty big deal. We expected absolutely nobody from the Soviet leadership to show up, we figured they would send...at the most Gromyko might come in for a minute or two. But, then the whole shebang marched in, Khrushchev, Mikoyan, Kosygin, Gromyko, Malinovsky, they were all there. Everybody was completely startled. It was obviously some kind of statement. How that was interpreted back in Washington, I don’t know. And they were all being...Khrushchev as usual was bubbling around. Finally I went to Kohler and said, “Ambassador Kohler, wouldn’t it be interesting to see what Rodion Malinovsky, the minister of defense, might say if I mentioned the second letter to him -- just to see how he would react?” Kohler said, “Okay, once. You can make a reference to the second letter, once and no more. Don’t follow it up. If he starts asking questions about it, just say you don’t know anything about it; just that there was one. Get out of it immediately. Just drop it in a sentence and leave it at that.”

I went over to Malinovsky, who was a caricature of a Soviet general. He was square with medals that went from his shoulders to his waist. You could just see he didn’t want to be there. He was obviously there under command orders; they were making a show of amity. We chatted a little bit and then I said, “What do you think about the second letter?” He just froze. He stared at me for what seemed like hours but was maybe five seconds. Then in this deep voice he said, “Now I can believe in God” and turned around and walked out. Obviously what he realized was that we did get it and didn’t respond to it and that it may have averted war. It was an amazing thing.

Q: I guess Khrushchev was feeling his weaknesses and also he was intemperate anyway at various times.

WATTS: When he was finally overthrown, a key charge against him was “adventurism,” which meant he would go off half-cocked and they didn’t know what he was going to do. A very interesting man though. When Benny Goodman came, Khrushchev came to the reception for Benny Goodman and I wound up interpreting for him for about a half an hour. Goodman was born in Minsk. He was what now would be a Belorussian Jew. Khrushchev was very interesting to interpret for because you never knew what he was going to say. There was an exhibit at the Manezh, an old Tsarist building used as an art gallery, showing of some of the modernist painters. It was shut down after three or four days and he referred to it, to Goodman, as “bychee gavno, dog shit. He didn’t care what he said. He was a fascinating man. I think the Russians when you talked about Khrushchev there was no question that he had a real hold on a lot of Russians. This thing about being seen as a man of the people, I think that’s true.

WATTS: Yes, and he was. I think Gorbachev very consciously tried to pick up on some of that during his period of power.

Q: Although you were on the cultural side, were you getting any feeling from the rest of the embassy about how we felt about Khrushchev?

WATTS: Yes, it was a very close knit group as you can imagine, although lots of tensions as well when you live that close together. You get real groupings within. I certainly had good friends working in the political section so we talked about this stuff a lot. I think there was a general sense that Khrushchev was about as good as we were going to get. But I didn't get any hopes for a huge break through or anything like that.

Q: In your travels were you getting reflections of ethnic, nationality differences, etc.?

WATTS: A lot. When I went down to Tbilisi in Georgia, which I really love, the Georgians are a really wild people. You start off breakfast with a bottle of cognac. The anti-Russian feeling in Georgia was so obvious and the same thing in Armenia and Azerbaijan. It was so clear. A group of us were among the very first in the embassy allowed to go up to the Baltic States. We went to all of their capitals, Riga, Tallinn, Vilnius, and the same thing there. I remember going swimming one day and some guy came along and it turned out he was very open and his Russian was very good. He was very open about his anti-Russian state of mind. He told me, and again you are never sure, some of these may have been agents just trying to feed you stuff, you are never 100 percent certain, but he claimed that a lot of the Russians in all three of the Baltic States, with Estonian, Latvian and Lithuanian passports, were in fact Russians.

What happened would be somebody would die and they would take that person's passport and recreate them. A Russian would be given that name and passport and a new birth date and would just move in. He was telling me that there were tens of thousands of people who now were supposed to be Estonian, Latvian and Lithuanian citizens who were in fact Russian transplants. I don't know whether that is true, although I have heard that elsewhere as well.

Yes, I must say it was not very hard to run up anti-Russian feeling wherever you went.

JOHN A. BAKER, JR.
Political Officer
Moscow (1957-1958)

John A. Baker, Jr. was born in 1927 and raised in Connecticut. He received a bachelor's degree from Yale University. His career in the Foreign Service included positions in Yugoslavia, Germany, the Soviet Union, Italy, and Czechoslovakia. Mr. Baker was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on September 23, 1992.

BAKER: ...I was assigned to the US Consulate General in Munich, but actually posted to Oberammergau where the US Army had established what was called "Detachment R", which sounds rather spooky but was really a two year course taught entirely by Soviet defectors. There was nothing classified taught in this course because none of the people giving it had any access to any. They were giving the course in Oberammergau because most of them, because of the McCarran Act, couldn't come to the United States, having been Communists in various parts of the Soviet Union.

In this sort of sanitized environment in a pretty little town in southern Bavaria, I attended one year of this two year course that the Army had established. That course was taught entirely in Russian. We asked our questions in Russian and did our exams in Russian. So it was excellent preparation both linguistically and substantively for an assignment to Moscow which I was aspiring to and to which at the end of that year I got. It was on the way to that assignment in Oberammergau that I did the audience survey in Yugoslavia.

Q: You served in Moscow in 1957-58?

BAKER: Yes, I went there in June, 1957, after an interesting month that I had spent in Spain at the request of the State Department which had pulled me out of the Soviet area program. The assignment in Spain was to interview the children of the Spanish Civil War who had been taken to Russia as the Civil War was ending in northern Spain. Many of them had been orphaned and as orphans of heroes of the Spanish Republic campaigns, which the Soviets had heavily supported, they were protected citizens in Russia. When the war started they moved out to Central Asia but were never allowed to return to Spain until 1956 when they were given that option. Most of them took the option together with their Russian wives and husbands and came back to Spain. They were one of the first sociological samples that we had of what living in the Soviet Union was like so an interview project was set up. Since I spoke Russian and Spanish, I was asked to participate in that.

Q: What was your impression of this group?

BAKER: They had lived in very difficult circumstances, although probably not any more difficult than the rest of the Soviet population during and after the war. Many of them, particularly the women, probably had gotten better educational and professional opportunities in the Soviet system than they might have in Spain. In Franco Spain, having been children and orphans of Republican heroes might have somewhat limited their opportunities.

They came back to Spain, even those of them who had become chemists and engineers, primarily for Spanish reasons, I concluded. They were Spaniards. They kept on feeling like they were Spaniards even though they were in the Soviet Union. In spite of the fact that most of their adolescence and young adulthood was spent in the Soviet system, they felt like Spaniards and they came back to Spain. Some of them had a rough adjustment, particularly the women, because in the mid-fifties a professional woman in Spain was a rarity. But they were not regretting their decision. They had some respect for the opportunities they had in Russia but a lot of the same kind of discontent with the authoritarian nature of the system that the Russians had as well. I think they also felt they had never really been fully accepted into that society. They had always been regarded as foreigners, different, and maybe not to be totally trusted.

Q: Then you went to Moscow.

BAKER: I got there in June, 1957 just about the time when Khrushchev was dealing with the anti-Party group.

Q: He had already made his 20th Party speech denouncing Stalin and all that. The repercussions must have still been going on.

BAKER: Of course the repercussions of that speech in February, 1956, I had already encountered somewhat in southern Germany and Austria in the fall of 1956 because the Budapest events in the fall of 1956 were certainly a repercussion. There were Hungarians who were roaring through southern Germany back into Budapest to help the people there. A month or two later there were people trying to help them cross the border to escape the Russian reprisal. So by the time I got to Russia the Russian leadership had been somewhat sobered by the consequences of this secret speech at the 20th Congress. They were retrenching a bit. Khrushchev was under pressure both for his initiatives at the Party Congress which had these dangerous, for them, consequences in Eastern Europe, but even more for the reforms he was trying to carry out in the Soviet administration, particularly the administration of industry.

He was creating councils of national economy, giving more local power to bureaucrats in the provinces and republics and less power to the people in the ministries in Moscow. Those were the people who had basically come up through the Moscow Party ranks and formed the basic support of Molotov and Malenkov. They were the people who that group relied on in their effort to unseat Khrushchev in June, 1957. It was these newly empowered people from the provinces around the country who Khrushchev and Zhukov brought in by airplane to the Central Committee who rescued Khrushchev from an adverse vote in the Soviet Politburo.

Q: You were in Moscow when this happened?

BAKER: I arrived in Moscow just afterwards. I was assigned to the political section to analyze Soviet foreign policy. I was interminably analyzing the Soviet press for clues about changes in foreign policy. It was kind of a deadly job. I had to read about seven or eight newspapers a day and produce a telegram that summarized what was significant in them about Soviet foreign policy. It struck me as a kind of bizarre thing to be doing because you could get those same papers back to the research people in Washington within a few days and they could do it probably better. But just to get maybe 48 hours jump...

Q: Sort of being one up or showing you are on top of it for the embassy.

BAKER: That's what it struck me as doing and it just seemed to me, having been trained to be able to move around and talk to people, not to be the best use of my skills.

Consequently I went out, whenever I wasn't poring through these papers, and did things and met people and had some rather unusual experiences, the consequence of which was being expelled from Russia at the end of my first year.

Q: Before we come to that, what about the Embassy? What was the spirit, how did Ambassador Llewellyn Thompson operate?

BAKER: Llewellyn Thompson operated with his cards very close to his chest. Apparently he is a very good poker player. The press used to play poker with him and had a lot of respect for his abilities in that regard. He was a quiet person. He didn't glad hand much with the staff. We had very little contact with him. Neither he nor his wife did a lot of outreach to the staff socially. That was left to the Deputy Chief of Mission, Richard Davis and his wife, Harriet. Harriet Davis was sort of the den mother to the Embassy, more than the Ambassador's wife, Jane Thompson. It was a good embassy. I enjoyed serving in embassies in the Communist countries because you had the sense of working in conditions of adversity and on the front lines of the Cold War. You had colleagues of high quality because I think the Department tried to send people of high quality to those posts.

Q: That was certainly my experience in Belgrade. It was the best group of people I ever served with.

BAKER: So, to me, in terms of working atmosphere and working personal relationships, it was a real high. Those were good people. David Mark was the political counselor. The political section had Foreign Affairs and Internal Affairs sections. Morrie Rothenberg, who had a long career in INR and had been Wristonized, was heading the Foreign Affairs section. In that section with me was Ted Eliot who had come up after a year of doing the admin work in the Embassy. Ted was later Ambassador to Afghanistan and Executive Secretary to the Department. These were, I thought, first rate people. We got along well, had fun together. We had fun with our British counterparts, the Canadians, the French, etc. There wasn't any significant social life with the Russians because a Russian wouldn't want to risk socializing with the Americans.

Q: Did you get involved at all with the Soviet bureaucracy?

BAKER: Not very much. I guess the only people in the Embassy who got involved with them were the people in the Administrative or Consular sections. I went rarely to the Foreign Ministry because we didn't have even that much contact with the Foreign Ministry and what we did have was handled by the Ambassador or the DCM or the chief of the political section. So I had virtually no interaction with the Soviet bureaucracy, except when I went on a field trip of some kind and then I would attempt to call up various local authorities to gather information about that area. That was generally fairly unsatisfactory.

I found most of the standard information I got about that society was a result of accidental one-time exposures. Sitting down next to somebody in a crowded restaurant where the waiter would put you at a table that was already partially occupied. Or sitting next to someone on a plane or a train or in a theater, or at the university.

Those occasions were really extraordinary because often you would feel that the person you were talking to soon realized that you were an American and thought this was the one chance to say everything that he might want to say to an American. It was a chance to say things he wouldn't even say to his neighbor because he couldn't trust him. So you often had a two-hour conversation of the most extraordinary intimacy with somebody you had never met before and who you would never see again. They knew and you knew that they might be able to explain that conversation on the grounds that the guy was sitting next to him, but how would you explain going back for another conversation? You couldn't. If you went back to see that American diplomat you must of been working something against the interests of the Soviet state. So there was that sense that everything had to be said, communicated and exchanged...

Q: What type of things would the discussion evolve around?

BAKER: Often very personal tales of their own experience of great hardship, hardship of their families, losses in their families, pressure by the authorities of one kind or another, often many questions about the United States, on the one hand illustrating that they had been infected by Soviet propaganda, but on the other hand illustrating that they didn't trust it and they wanted to check it against another source.

Q: In your analysis of Soviet foreign policy, how did you see the threat to the West from the Soviet Union?

BAKER: In the fall of 1957, there was a big conclave of all the Communist parties on the 40th anniversary of the October Revolution and that produced a heavily negotiated document about the purposes and goals of the international Communist movement. It was one of the first documents that attempted to do that. It was significant because the Chinese were there and because East Europeans, after these tumultuous events of 1956, were there and because the Yugoslavs were there, beginning to be pulled back into the system but not being sure they wanted to.

That document, I think, illustrated the ambitious intentions of the international Communist movement as led by the Soviets and, significantly, it began to open up the attack on revisionism - revisionism being the kind of thing that happened in Hungary and Poland, but also the Yugoslav variant. So the Yugoslavs didn't sign on to this, or at least not all of it because they could see that the international Communist movement was pulling back away from the promises of the 20th Congress of a more co-existing, open approach to the rest of the world and more tolerance within the international Communist movement.

So this sort of retrenchment was occurring. I don't think we understood fully at the time all the reasons why it was occurring. One of the important reasons, in retrospect, was the Sino-Soviet relationship. The Chinese under Mao were disturbed by what happened in 1956 and they were trying to push the Soviets back towards a more orthodox and confrontational stance vis-a-vis the US. And sure enough in the winter of 1957-58, not only did you have these increasing signs of tightening up within the system with the anti-revisionist drive, but you also had the launch of a campaign vis-a-vis the West in Berlin. That was Khrushchev's declaration that the anomalous situation in Berlin would have to be somehow changed or resolved, or else. It was never very clear what "or else" would be, but it was somewhat menacing and Khrushchev, being a man of temperament, had a way of occasionally adopting a menacing posture.

So that was the atmosphere of that winter. We had seen in the summer of 1957 a sort of benign face of the Soviet system in the form of the First Moscow Youth Festival, where they had really gone all out to make Moscow appear the capital of the Socialist, and not only the Socialist but the non-capitalist world, and it was heavily oriented towards the third world. There were a lot of Africans, and Asians and some Latin Americans there. It really looked like a bid to establish a Communist movement as the leader of the underprivileged of the earth which would eventually encircle the small developed societies grouped around the United States and Europe.

It was run, for Russia, in a very open way. Russian young people had an opportunity that they never had before to meet all these people and to talk freely to them, pretty much. That really blew their minds. So in a way, it had a reverse effect.

I had a chance to experience that because I had a rather unusual experience in that year of 1957-58. In the early fall of 1957 the Embassy got a telegram from the Department saying, "A couple of Russian diplomats have applied to George Washington University." This was the first time that had happened. The Department's general message was: It probably is a healthy thing and we don't have any real way of obstructing that. Washington is not a closed city. George Washington is not a closed university so if they pay the tuition...what do we do? But we want to keep things reciprocal. We want to say to the Russians, "Yeah, sure those guys can go there, but that means there has to be access to Moscow University for some of our diplomats."

So I raised my hand. I didn't want to spend all my time reading the newspapers. I volunteered to go to Moscow University. I had an idea what I might want to do there because I had made some inquiries during the Youth Festival about the history faculty and I had identified a course which I thought sounded quite innocuous and would not frighten anybody that I was taking this course.

We sent a note to the Foreign Ministry saying that Second Secretary John Baker wants to apply to Moscow University and we would appreciate the support and cooperation of the Ministry. Eventually, and it took them about a month to deal with this unusual idea, they gave me the go ahead and I went to the University and saw the Dean and was allowed to attend this one course which was called, "History of the Soviet Union in the Feudal Period." What it really was was a history of the different peoples of the Soviet Union, their respective feudal areas, but they didn't want to say history of Russia because that would be too great Russia. It was a history mostly of Russia but also some lectures on some of the other nationalities from about 800 AD down to the beginning of the 19th century. The professor was fairly good. I went there once a week. They wouldn't give me a student pass because they didn't want me roaming around the buildings, but they would let me in on my own recognizance every Friday morning and I would attend this two-hour lecture.

The students immediately identified me as an American and in the wake of the Youth Festival they thought the fact that I was at the University must make me fair game, that maybe I was some kind of an American leftist, or what have you. I fairly soon identified myself as to what I was and what I was doing. That cooled some of them, but not all of them, particularly not those who were organizing the history faculty's basketball team. I am about 6'4" and played basketball in school and at the University of Geneva in Switzerland, so I agreed to play as long as there was no objection by the administration. So I went out and practiced for about a month with the history faculty's basketball team and got to know these young guys. Partied a little bit with them. Even had some of them come over to my house and listen to records. Sometimes when we got an American hockey team or basketball team in town I would get a few extra tickets. So in a fairly innocuous way I developed a set of acquaintances there which was interesting. Obviously they had no secrets they could share with me other than their personal lives, but it gave me an insight into the society which was unusual.

Eventually the Dean told me that I couldn't play basketball for the history faculty. Clearly I was a revisionist influence on the court! It was put on the fairly legitimate grounds that I wasn't a full time student. I kept up these connections but over the winter the anti-revisionist campaign developed and penetrated the University and I began to be increasingly isolated. The people who I had been friendly with in the fall began to tell me that it was not going to be healthy for them to continue to chat with me.

I had been going to parties occasionally over at the Lenin Hills dorms. Of course, these were never parties in the rooms of Russian students who would be compromised by that. It was all set up so that the hosts would be Egyptians or Syrians, who were very much in vogue at that time and seemed to be willing to stage interminable parties as long as anybody else would provide the vodka. I was barely turning 30 and a lot of these students were in their middle twenties and this was a cheerful and interesting experience. Obviously I was being surveilled all this time and therefore the people who were talking to me eventually were contacted and told to lay off. So by the late winter I wasn't seeing a whole lot of these guys going to class. In May I went on leave to London with my wife and while we were in England, the Embassy contacted me and called me and told me that I had been thrown out of the Soviet Union and couldn't go back. This got a little press coverage. There was protest by the US Embassy. The Chargé, Dick Davis, went in and demanded an explanation. They said that I had violated the norms of diplomatic behavior. Dick said, "What norms had he violated to make sure we don't violate it again?" They said, "Ask Mr. Baker to search his conscience."

Q: Isn't that nice.

BAKER: So I have been searching my conscience since 1958 as to what norms I might have violated. But clearly the norms I violated would not be violable norms in any normal country. I was simply getting more exposure to the Soviet citizenry than was convenient for the authorities and they finally wanted to put a stop to it.

Q: Now it is almost an exquisite ballet of tic for tat. Did a Soviet diplomat get kicked out then?

BAKER: Yes. I don't know to this day whether this was in response to my being kicked out or whether this particular Soviet diplomat had been identified and was known by the Soviets to be about to be thrown out when they threw me out, so that they could make it look like a retaliation. Subsequently, on one or two occasions later in my career when we tried to test the waters as to whether I could return on another assignment, the answer always was, "Yeah, you can return but only if one of ours gets to return." Since most of the Soviet diplomats who were thrown out here were for espionage, that deal was never made.

Q: Just to get a feel for your personal reaction and maybe those around you, after all you had devoted a great deal of time to your Russian training and all and to go there for such a short time and be told "no more," careerwise this is sort of a blow isn't it?

BAKER: Yes, I thought it was quite a blow. A blow from several respects. I had been abroad just two years, one year in Germany and one in Russia, and I had hoped to be abroad at least five years in a couple of assignments and get through the period while we were having young children and use some of the good help you could get overseas. But when I dropped suddenly onto the hands of the personnel system they couldn't drop me into another appropriate European assignment, so I was brought back to the States. That was not very convenient because I had a young son and another on the way.

Secondly, I was dropped into an assignment which didn't look all that promising from a career standpoint. But, it turned out that I was able to make something of it that was kind of interesting.

DAVID E. MARK
Political & Economic Counselor
Moscow (1957-1959)

Ambassador David E. Mark graduated from Columbia University in 1943. Shortly after completing a year of law school, he was drafted into the U.S. Army. Near the end of World War II, Ambassador Mark joined the Foreign Service. He served in Korea, Romania, Switzerland, Burundi, and Washington, DC. He was interviewed by Henry Precht on July 28, 1989.

Q: Okay. So then in 1957 you're off to Moscow as political counselor?

MARK: The title was "Chief of Chancery," a British rank, but for me it was being the political and economic counselor.

Q: Both of them?

MARK: Both of them.

Q: You had never done economic work before?

MARK: No, I had never done economic work. We had ten people in the section including me, and two of them sort of worked on economic matters, to the extent that one could amidst Soviet statistical secrecy. There's nothing I can add to the history of the Khrushchev era that I participated in. I worked for a tremendously able ambassador, Llewellyn Thompson--"Tommy" Thompson. This was the first of his two ambassadorial tours there. He had an easy working relationship with Khrushchev, whom he often saw informally.

It was a time of great change there. Not as much as now with Gorbachev, but since we were much closer to the Stalin era, it seemed like a lot. Moscow was scrubbed of any anti-American posters that I had remembered from 1952. We were able to speak to many more people.

We also had weekly meetings with counterparts from many embassies of NATO allies to exchange specific information and insights. From these many sources and from some contacts during rail and automobile trips in Russia, I came to the conclusion that the Soviet dictatorship was too strongly entrenched to be overturned. This conclusion, of course, would have great significance, if true, for U.S. objectives during the Cold War confrontation. I wrote a long essay on this matter in 1958, and Ambassador Thompson sent it on to Washington with an introduction of his own saying that matters were not as hopeless for a pro-Western outcome as I was predicting. I wanted to rebut his argumentation, but he said that I was being impolite to a superior. So that my addition never went in. I couldn't foresee the Gorbachev era 30 years later, but I wish that Ambassador Thompson were still alive to experience it as a validation of his relative optimism.

Regarding automobile trips, I was the first non-military American to get a driver's license. Nowadays it's done reciprocally. Soviets get them in Washington and we get them in Moscow, but I had to go through the whole exam business.

I was excused from just one thing that Soviet drivers had to do and that's to pass a mechanic's test for repairing the car. But I had to take a big physical exam and then I had to learn all the rules and regulations. There they don't have signs--they didn't then at least--have signs on the streets saying, "Parking Two Hours," or "No Parking," or whatnot. You just learned all the rules, that within ten meters of such and such a lamppost or whatever, one doesn't park. Or when you have double trolley tracks, you can't do certain things about turning left. There was a large book of rules, and I had to study, study, study because you were tested via a sort of a little gaming board, moving cars around, and then you got a road test in addition. And so, as I say, I was the first American to get a license and I had my own car over there.

I don't know--I guess we can say it; enough time has passed, about 30 years. Some things can be declassified. But one day before I went to Moscow the--I guess he was still deputy assistant secretary--Jake Beam, who was soon to become ambassador to Poland, called me in and said, "David, the CIA would like you to support them a bit when you're in Moscow."

And I said, "Well, what do you mean?"

He said, "Well, they don't have anybody in Moscow."

Q: They didn't?

MARK: Well, that's part of the story. [Laughter] "They don't have anybody in Moscow and so they need some help with things. If you agree, why, I'll put you in touch with them and they'll tell you about it." So that happened and I was put in touch with some people from the operational side in the agency.

And they said, "Well, you know, you just have to learn some of the tasks that we have vis-a-vis the USSR, and of course, there will be surveillance on you which you must keep in mind." And so they gave me some sporadic lectures in Washington, before I went out there, and I was to use a channel of communication through the diplomatic pouch.

Well, about four or five months after I got there, someone arrived as a security officer at the embassy, and he turned out to be one of the people with whom I had studied Russian back in 1951 in the Department. And I knew at that time that he was CIA officer, so I immediately asked through my channels, "Well, isn't this a CIA officer?" and they came back in due course and said, "Yes. But we'd still like you to go on with support work." So we only communicated with each other writing inside the embassy, since we suspected that the place was bugged, which it was, as we now know for sure. As it turned out, only occasionally did he ask me to do something, but, at those occasions, I did try to help.

And I guess the Soviets suspected it, because they began tailing me even more closely. I should have guessed this perhaps when, on some Saturday going to visit a country museum near Moscow, I came back to my car, started it off--it was a Jeep station wagon actually--and soon, after I'd gone a little distance back toward Moscow, a taxi driver said at a red light, "Say, you're leaking some oil underneath." And sure enough, the KGB agents, at the museum parking lot, wanting to wreck my motor, had pulled the plug on the oil reservoir. So I got towed the rest of the way back by an embassy truck; and that saved the car.

Then, a little later on, there was another big incident involving their effort to take away my driver's license under some spurious pretext. I kept driving anyway and we complained to the foreign ministry, which eventually returned my license. What this finally led to after I had been in Moscow two years, and when I had been assigned to Tokyo as my next post, was that I was declared PNG (persona non grata).

Q: Was this a reciprocal action because of something that happened here?

MARK: Yes, it was. We had just thrown a guy out of Washington who had been dealing with agents, and about a week later they threw me out. Well, our ambassador complained at the Soviet foreign ministry, and even saw Gromyko; but Gromyko just said, "Oh, well. If you knew about him what I know about him, you'd agree with me, but I can't tell you what I know about him."
[Laughter]

The formal charge was that during a trip to Riga in Latvia, which I had made 19 months earlier as the first U.S. embassy official to visit a Baltic state since their annexation by the USSR in 1940, I had tried to suborn an Intourist agent. They had, in fact, gotten it wrong. It had been a U.S. military man who tried to do the suborning. The Intourist agent paradoxically had just returned--he was a Latvian--had returned from forced exile in Siberia, so he was bitterly anti-Soviet, and beyond suborning anyway. So that was just a pretext, and I'll tell you more about that a little later on.

But I think, you know, in retrospect, the services I performed for the CIA were marginal, and I think it was a great mistake ever to have been asked to do this by the Agency. And I told that to the people in the Agency later on, because the guy who got me involved was later on was the Agency's chief of station in Paris, when I told him that. My job was too prominent in the embassy as the political counselor to get involved in that sort of thing. Now, my job may have made me attractive to the Agency. They may have thought that it was less likely that I would be followed as closely, but I think that since they know the KGB and its operations much better than I, they should have known what the KGB would do, particularly to a person with his own private car. Indeed, Ambassador Beam should have rejected CIA's approach, instead of putting the question to me. And the CIA, after all, knew it was untrue that they had no representation of their own in Moscow.

Q: It would seem in bureaucratic terms, from their standpoint, they were getting the services of someone without the usual risks. They always risk losing someone through compromise and have to start all over training a replacement. They didn't have to worry about that with you.

MARK: A friend of mine in the Service who left--who was "PNGed" from Moscow a year before I came, I think pretty clearly had been in the same position vis-à-vis the CIA, and they had had their own person there at the time, too. So I think that because they were at that time limited to a very small station of their own in Moscow, they wanted to have supplemental "assets." But in using Foreign Service officers to help them they were coming close to upsetting a basic State Department rule that the CIA cannot be given the protective title of "Foreign Service officer" for its own personnel. Or, at least, that is the way it was through 1980.

Q: But the State Department limited the CIA size in Moscow then?

MARK: I think probably we did, but also owing to general circumstances; and the CIA station expanded, I guess, later on. But in any case, this episode really changed my whole career. I mean, I think my career was headed pretty well in the Soviet-U.S. orbit. Still, I must admit that I don't know how far upwards I would have gotten anyway, because I committed one other sin in Moscow within the Service, when I told something to an Egyptian colleague which I shouldn't have done.

Q: That was not a sin that the Soviets objected to?

MARK: No, no, no. No, no, they didn't know. But what happened was that I had been let in on some information that I now know involved the U-2 spy plane. It involved the Gary Powers-type thing that came to public attention in 1960.

Q: You mean the source of the information?

MARK: Yes, the source of the information, and that was sort of the only way such facts could have been known--or by some other means of intelligence operation. And I had not been cleared for that information, and therefore had never really been warned about its sensitivity. Nevertheless, I was given the information in the embassy with an injunction not to pass it on to anyone. But in a conversation, trying to get somewhere, get something in return out of my Egyptian colleague, I mentioned it, and the Egyptians noted it, and it got back to the ambassador, and he was very upset about my mistake. So that my efficiency report for that year said that there was no harder working, no more brilliant reporter in the embassy, but that he, at times, did not show the discretion that he should have. And it took me until 1962 to get promoted--that had been five years--up to Class 2, I think very directly reflecting upon my lapse in Moscow.

But in any case, regardless of how that turned out, getting PNGed by the Soviets changed my whole career pattern. Even in 1973, when I next tried to visit there, the Soviets refused a visa. But I had been assigned to Tokyo anyway. I was to be the officer who followed all Japanese foreign policy, except toward the United States. That is, all other aspects of Japanese foreign policy, and the Department planned to give me an intensive six months Japanese language course using a new pedagogic method, which much appealed to me. But instead of going directly to Tokyo--

MARK: In, I guess it was June 1959. I had arrived in June of '57.

But at the last minute, Washington said, "Well, instead of going to Tokyo right away, could you please put in three months on TDY--temporary duty--in Geneva, because we have this conference going on to ban nuclear weapons." I think at the time, it was soon after the conference to discuss the scientific possibilities of banning nuclear weapons had ended more or less successfully. The final agreement had said that there were enough possibilities of verification scientifically to justify the political negotiation effort. But anyway, they told me, "Would you go down there, because we always have a sort of Soviet expert on the delegation, and our Soviet expert is being pulled away very suddenly for some other job. So until we get another one, could you fill in there?"

I said, "Sure." So I went down to Geneva for three months and began learning something about the subject. I fell into the hands of the extremely able disarmament crowd, including such people as Ron Spiers. And after three months, there was an adjournment. That was at the end of September 1959. These conferences always have periodic adjournments. And they said, "Well, you know, we're going to resume soon and go on up to Christmas. We will see how these things go, but you've learned enough now. So couldn't you stay another three months, and we'll fix it up with the Japan desk about your Tokyo assignment." And I said, "Sure. It's okay with me."

Q: Did you want to stay in Geneva?

MARK: Geneva was a nice place. I went back to the States actually in October 1959 and got engaged at the time. I had met a lady in Moscow, an elegant American lady who was running the Anglo-American school there; she left the year before I did, but we corresponded. I went back to the States, and on that leave in October 1959, we got engaged. So Geneva was sort of closer to Washington than Tokyo, it seemed to me, and thus I went back to Switzerland for another three months.

Well, as you might imagine, by year's end, I had acquired six months of experience, had begun writing many of the speeches for the disarmament delegation for its formal presentation, had begun learning the details of the issues there, and had begun understanding something about how arms control efforts were evolving. This subject was the name of the game at the time; the nuclear test ban was politically important; and so the Department said to me, "Well, you know, if you want to stay in Geneva and don't want to go to Tokyo, you can."

The East Asian office was very upset. They said, "We've had this job vacant nine months now and it's an important job; but, okay, we've taken our lumps," and I went back to Geneva. So I was there four years altogether, until the conference ended in July 1963. By the time it ended, much had happened. We always had a political appointee as the head of the delegation. Initially, it was James Wadsworth, who had been our U.N. ambassador for a while, and then, after that it was Arthur Dean, who had been the head of the prestigious New York law firm of Sullivan and Cromwell.

We had initially had a couple of very distinguished Foreign Service officers as chief of staff. When I first got there it was David Popper, who doesn't need any description, later Ambassador to Chile and Assistant Secretary for UN affairs. Then it became Charles Stelle, who died very suddenly later on but who was, of course, an old Iranian hand, too, like you, Henry (Precht, the interviewer). But anyway, he came to Geneva, and when he left, I became chief of staff, "Coordinator", of the delegation. Thus, I got heavily involved in the disarmament side. I finally received my promotion, because I had sort of worn away the stigma, I guess, of that lapse in Moscow, and because I had learned something useful about disarmament processes with the USSR.

Q: Did you like it? I mean, that technical business is quite different from what you had done in the past.

MARK: Right. But it was political too, because the aim of the conference--there were three countries negotiating it: Britain, Soviet Union, and the United States--the second aim of the conference was to prevent nuclear weapons from spreading to any additional nations, besides the first aim of stopping the testing; and this political aim was going to be realized through the clauses of the eventual test ban treaty. It was a very complicated formula that was going to involve bringing the French and the Chinese into the arrangement.

But no one could envisage in those days what happened subsequently. I mean that, in 1966, a separate treaty was concluded to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons, which is still in existence. Our conference was just on testing, but since non-dissemination was then the side aim of the negotiations, we were heavily engaged in all kinds of political issues at the same time regarding non-spread, and we also wanted to set up the structure of a test ban verification agency. It got us into intrusive verification questions that were, you know, quite insoluble until more recent days.

Also, in the last year of the conference, the test ban issue was subsumed under the new 18 nation disarmament conference that was set up in 1962. We three nations maintained a kind of separate identity as a "subcommittee" within that larger conference. But our delegation--again it was still the same delegation--had now to spend time on the new conference's attempt, that went on for a year, to negotiate general and complete worldwide disarmament, nuclear and conventional.

Q: Did you take this all seriously?

MARK: Well, people didn't take the conventional disarmament side so seriously, but nevertheless there was the glare of publicity on it, and we had to come up with overall disarmament plans. We had all kinds of staged conventional disarmament plans, getting rid of planes, tanks, and artillery and troops and zones and whatnot. I mean, these things were thought out. They've only come to life really in the present day. But 25 years ago, we were discussing lots and lots of these same issues.

Q: But did you really think that you were doing work that would have a practical outcome?

MARK: Yes and no. On the nuclear test ban side, we always had hopes of success because, obviously, the Soviets had an interest there, too. But on the rest, no, we didn't. But nevertheless, it was an exercise in which for the first time we were forced to think about all these matters in a systematic way. I mean, if you were serious--and as far as world public opinion was concerned we had to seem to be serious--then what did you propose you do? What kind of disarmament plans; and what was wrong with the Soviet plans, because they had come up with them, too? So anyway, that was all.

Q: You were talking about your service at the Geneva disarmament conference.

MARK: Well, this conference went through a number of phases. Of course, to jump ahead, we do now have a nuclear test ban treaty; it's a partial test ban treaty. It doesn't cover underground nuclear tests. Our negotiations were aimed at concluding a total nuclear test ban, but we ended up with a partial one as a result of direct negotiations between Kennedy and Khrushchev in 1963, that at the last stages brought in Averell Harriman as chief negotiator.

To jump ahead even further, after the end of this conference, I was sent for my senior Foreign Service training to Harvard to be a Fellow at the Center for International Affairs, of which Henry Kissinger was then deputy director. And one could do almost anything one wanted during that year; and one of the things I did was to write a book about my nuclear test ban experiences. This turned out to be a fairly lengthy book of a couple of hundred pages, and it does record my experiences, as well as describe the details and motivations of the four years of negotiations. Unfortunately, I never could get it published in the United States. I tried a number of university presses and they said, "But you don't have footnotes."

And I said, "Well, a lot of this is my personal recollection."

And they said, "Well, we're not sure it will sell very well."

And I said, "No, but that's why a university press exists." And in any event, the book finally got published in 1965 in German by the German Foreign Policy Association.

Q: You didn't have to translate it?

MARK: No. I didn't have to do the initial translation draft, but after each section was translated, it was sent back to me for correction--the German text was sent back for correction. It had taken me four months to write the book, but it took five months to correct the German.

But incidentally, and this is jumping ahead to the present day (1989), a friend of mine still on duty in the State Department in Soviet matters, who has kept up with disarmament types on the Soviet side all these years, was in Vienna in 1989 to talk with the Soviet diplomat who is now involved in negotiating with us on the conventional arms force cuts. I believe that's the conference that I'm talking about.

Anyway, this man, named Oleg Grinevsky, had been a very, very junior man at the time of the test ban talks. He was then just starting his Soviet Foreign Service career. But he said to my friend that he is now putting together all his recollections to write a book of memoirs about disarmament efforts from the Soviet point of view, but unfortunately, he didn't have any really solid recollections about the test ban negotiations. And my friend said to him, "Oh, haven't you read Dave Mark's book about it?"

He said, "I didn't know he'd written a book."

And my friend said, "Yes. He wrote a book but it's in German, unfortunately."

And the guy said, "Well, I don't read German."

So my friend said, "Well, I'll talk to Dave and find out whether he's got the original English manuscript." And I rummaged around and found an English original and sent it to my friend in Washington, on condition that he xerox me a copy, as well as xerox one for our Soviet colleague. And so now a Soviet has a copy of it and may look through to see how that contributes to his recollections of this conference and to his understanding of American negotiating positions.

But anyway, getting back to the time of the conference, the Eisenhower Administration carried the conference in effect up through November 1960. That's when we adjourned. We adjourned just about the time of the election in which Kennedy was elected. And this was the only Soviet-American negotiation that survived the U-2 crisis in May 1960; it continued going. Much of our emphasis had been on test ban verification problems. How, if we got to a nuclear test ban, how could we be sure on our side that the Russians weren't cheating on the treaty?

Well, nobody had been talking about Gary Powers and the U-2, even though he and his colleagues in U-2s were flying over the Soviet nuclear testing site in Siberia, Semipalatinsk. So we had a lot of intrusion. We could see every time the Soviets began surface preparations for blowing up a nuclear weapon. I mean, there were extensive towers and testing equipment and whatnot, that one could see from the U-2.

Q: And presumably they knew we could see?

MARK: I would think so, because I had not been let in on the U-2, but while in Moscow in 1958, I had read a debriefing report of a defected Soviet soldier, who was really Polish, but had ended up in that part of Poland taken by the Soviet Union in 1944-1945, and who had been drafted into the Soviet army when he got of age. He had been a young boy at the time the war ended. And he told about being in a unit in Siberia which periodically got very agitated. Then, he heard from one of his officers that there was something hostile flying over now and then, but that there was nothing that the Soviets could do about it. He was in an antiaircraft unit, but they couldn't do anything about it and this got everybody very excited.

So, of course, that was the U-2. I didn't know its name then. Even after reading it, I thought, "Well, that's an interesting kind of defector's report." But, in fact, the U-2 was what was going on. So obviously the Soviets did know about it. They knew about it all too well.

But we had the U-2's information, and we also had technical detection possibilities which we talked about, and which meant tracking seismic events. I mean, earthquakes cause seismographs to register, and so do nuclear tests. But then the question was, "Well, if the Russians did it in certain kind of rock layers, wouldn't that tend to mask the seismic waves or cause us to confuse them with natural events?", natural events being the earthquakes. Then we got into the "big hole theory"; namely, that if you had a tremendous cavity in the earth like a salt cavern and the U.S. or the USSR did the explosion in that, it would muffle the sound. And there were, you know, scientific postulations that supported the "big hole theory."

So we said that, obviously, to be sure about things, you had to have on-site inspections. I mean unless you could have on-site inspections, you couldn't ever know what was a "natural event" or a man-made nuclear event, or whatnot. And so the Soviets, naturally, in that era said, "On-site inspection is espionage." But after much to-do, they said, "Well, we'll agree to three of them a year."

That was a tremendous concession. And they agreed to three of them without ever agreeing, then or later, on what an on-site inspection would consist of, on what specific steps the other side could take in terms of looking around the suspected place. That was another whole set of arguments that occupied days of meetings. But the question of whether a mere three could ever be accepted by us was not a very difficult one. The answer was "No." Three were never going to be enough. Because if you used one, then you had two left. And if you used one of those two, you felt that you had none left, because if you ever used it, if you ever used your last one, then the Russians could test with impunity because you had no on-site inspections left.

Q: Did we really want an agreement? Did our side?

MARK: Well, I'm coming to that in a minute. [Laughter]

So what would be enough? Would five be enough per year, or seven, nine, eleven? The question you just asked, "Did we really want an agreement?" then came into play. A lot of people didn't want an agreement, and the top of the Eisenhower Administration was split very clearly. Defense didn't want an agreement; the Joint Chiefs didn't seem to want an agreement; State wanted an agreement; and Disarmament was not then a separate agency, it was within State; Eisenhower wanted an agreement, but only a sound and politically defensible one.

Everybody wanted to get rid of nuclear testing in the atmosphere because it was producing radiation. Strontium-90 was affecting milk and all that sort of thing. Testing was the origin of what we now call the "green movement," but those kinds of tests in the atmosphere could have been easily prohibited by a simple agreement. There was no danger of cheating on that. You didn't need international verification means other than what the U.S. possessed on its own; and our military would have preferred a simple thing of that sort.

But other people wanted a total nuclear test ban, not just an atmospheric ban. I even invented for one of my speeches at the conference, I think sometime in 1960, the phrase, "preventive disarmament." In other words, if we could prevent nuclear tests, we'd prevent all the weapons that new nuclear warheads could go into. As a matter of fact, from what we now know we couldn't have developed MIRV missiles, multiple independently targeted reentry vehicles. We couldn't have had them because, if we had had a complete test ban in the early '60s, we never would have been able to develop a warhead for a MIRV missile. As a matter of fact, our whole range of missiles would have been totally different, much, much simpler. The whole problem of large-scale disarmament would have been totally different if we had arrived at a nuclear test ban treaty.

Q: Why were some people opposed? Why were some people in favor? What was the motivation?

MARK: Well, some people, of course, didn't want to have agreements with Soviet communists under any circumstances. I mean, we find people more or less like that today. I would say the people represented by Richard Perle in current-day Washington (1989).

Q: People so distrusting of communism or fearful of the Russian power?

MARK: Or not wanting to reduce the United States to seem a mere coequal instead of a greater and better nation. You know, if you sign an agreement in which you pledge not to do what they're also pledging not to do, you give them legitimacy as coequals, and these people didn't want to give that status to the Soviet Union. They also thought, there were a lot of people who still thought, we could gain supremacy if we kept on testing. You know, we had more technology and we had more resources.

It's this old idea that has come up again in the Reagan years of spending them into bankruptcy. We have succeeded more or less in doing that, but we've done it to ourselves almost as badly in the course of it, so that's the irony of the thing. But in any case, there were those factors there in the 1960s.

And yet there were other people who were for disarmament, people like Ambassador Gerald Smith, who was already involved in those days and for years after, ultimately as head of the Arms Control and the Disarmament Agency, a Republican serving in all kinds of administrations. I mean these people believe that disarmament is one of the means by which we would gradually reach a Soviet-American entente, or at least an understanding about live and let live. And of course they were urging this in the Khrushchev era, so there was then already some reason to think that evolutionary possibilities existed.

Q: Did you get the sense that there was a similar division on the Russian side?

MARK: Not on those issues, and the Russians were extremely difficult to fathom then. We were only tentatively starting at that time what is now standard practice at disarmament conferences. It began for us in '62 when we merged the nuclear test ban into the new 18-nation disarmament conference. And the new aspect was that, after each meeting of the 3 nation test ban subcommittee, the sides would get together informally and just exchange notes, exchange remarks on the meeting, or sometimes use it as an occasion to talk informally about what might be going on in the other's capital. That began in 1962 and is, as I say, now standard practice, which led to the hit Broadway nuclear disarmament play, "A Walk in the Woods," that sort of thing.

But it had not happened before mid-1962. Before then, at most, we had lunch together every now and then, of which more later. There was also for me another incident. But the Russians were extremely tight-lipped about things. The only hint we got was that there might be a fight in Moscow about whether they should resume nuclear testing. Because the Soviets, when they went into this conference in 1959, had declared a unilateral moratorium on nuclear testing and we had not. I mean, we came to stop testing later, but we didn't declare it officially. So we went on testing in 1959, and then we did get into a short moratorium. But then we said that we were going to come out of the moratorium soon, whereas the Russians were still stuck with their earlier unilateral moratorium; and they obviously were uncomfortable militarily with this one-sided hiatus. We got a sort of threat from them--"Well, if the U.S. doesn't come around, and if the U.S. reserves the right to resume testing, then the Soviets would have to resume testing, and so forth." I mean, they finally did resume in--just to jump ahead--in September, I think, September 1, 1961, but this issue was clearly a problem for them within the delegation.

Also, there was some problem with their scientists. We got into such trouble in 1959 about how to distinguish seismic tests, which were natural events versus to distinguish natural events, that we decided to have another conference of scientists (there had been one in 1958). Indeed, we had a couple of them on different technical issues. And their scientists came to Geneva and clearly they were willing to say certain things about the difficulty of verification with instruments alone; and therefore they implied that one would need on-site inspections, but in saying this, they were deviating from the official line. So much so that after one of these scientific meetings, when there had been a joint U.S.-Soviet declaration by the two teams of scientists, the Soviet government repudiated its own scientists officially at one of our political meetings. So that was another sign of some intra-Soviet disagreement, but that was not on the political side; that was on the scientific side.

Also, we did have the impression that the Soviet delegation took the lead at times in pressing Moscow to agree to adopt a certain position. It wasn't that they were taking sides. They were being creative in proposing ways around impasses with the U.S. and UK. We did feel that happen from time to time. But to get back to the American point of view, there were those differences, and the differences centered most visibly, though not uniquely, on this question of how many on-site inspections per year would be enough. And people in Washington in 1959 generally agreed that ten were probably as much as we needed to ask for, but they said, "Well, but look. We're in a negotiating business with the Russians, so you can't ask for ten because you'll never end up with ten. Let's ask for 20." So they asked for 20. And, of course, once they asked for 20, 20 became a sacred number, supposedly reflecting technical necessity. Everyone forgot, if they ever knew, that 20 had been put in there purely for bargaining purposes, but it became the "scientifically valid" number that the U.S. would need for its security.

Well, of course, there was nothing scientific about any of these numbers, even ten. It was just a value judgment about how intrusive you had to be to keep the Soviets honest, and there were some Americans who thought you really didn't need inspections at all, because you had photographic satellites soon that replaced the U-2. I mean, we had the first, I think, KH-4 satellites, not long after that, and though they weren't as refined as some of the later ones in terms of distinguishing objects on the ground, they certainly could tell about nuclear test preparations. Plus, as I mentioned seismology told us a good bit.

We said that, after all, you don't have to be 100% sure that the Russians had not tested. All you have to do is create a situation that would prove frightfully embarrassing for them before world opinion if they were ever caught red-handed. And you could create such a situation just by your seismic monitoring and a few on-site inspections. That would be enough. The Russians wouldn't dare cheat, particularly when you kept your powder dry, i.e. you kept yourself ready to resume testing whenever they cheated. Indeed, that was one of the conditions that the Joint Chiefs later forced us to append to the ratification protocol in the Senate, that we keep our powder dry, keep our nuclear laboratories going, be ready to test at a moment's notice.

So, anyway, toward the end of the--I guess it was in 1959 that we came to 20--December 1959--this demand for 20 inspections, and that, of course, became a hang-up for all the remaining period of the negotiations, this inflated number. There were lots of other issues that developed, and I can say with all modesty that you can find this recounted ad nauseam in my book on the subject, which is one of only two serious full-length books on the test ban. [Laughter] There other one was written by a law professor at, I think, either Michigan State or the University of Michigan; and I've been told by objective outsiders, who have read both, that if you want to really know what that conference was all about, you must read both books, that each by itself is not as good as taking them together. And I'm sure that very few people ever will so read or ever have done so.

Q: But did Henry Kissinger find your research, or the research you did for him in Harvard, interesting?

MARK: Well, it was written at Harvard, but it wasn't done for him. I don't know that he ever looked at it. I sat in on a course there that he gave, which was a seminar on world security issues. The head of the Harvard Center of the time, though Kissinger later succeeded him, was Bob Bowie, who was later Policy Planning Director in the Department. Maybe he was also an assistant secretary in the Pentagon at one time. He is still, now in his late seventies, very active in foreign affairs matters.

As I say, I attended this Kissinger seminar, and so for some years if we met thereafter in the State Department or wherever, he would say, "Oh, yes. That is my old student." [Chuckles] But that's about as close as I ever got to Henry Kissinger, despite a few occasional meetings later in the State Department on transient issues.

The conference on a nuclear test ban had a long break from November 1960 when Kennedy was elected, because he wasn't going to be inaugurated for a while and would then want to review negotiating policy. He was inaugurated on January 20. And so, after our last meeting in November 1960 we went to a farewell luncheon with the Soviet delegation.

There were three of us on each side, including me, and we ate in a very nice restaurant in Geneva. We started at 1:00 p.m. and everybody drank a lot, and the head of the Soviet delegation, who was named, Simyon Tsarapkin, later the Soviet ambassador to West Germany, drank more and more and more vodka. And about 4:00 in the afternoon that day, he pulled me aside and spoke Russian. Well, he always spoke Russian to me, but this time he spoke used the "you familiar" form, which he had never used before and never used again.

He started by saying to me, "David, I know what you did in Moscow, and it was a terrible thing for a young man to have done such harmful things against our great Soviet motherland. But, you're a young man still, and you can make up for it. There are things you can do which will right the wrong which you committed. I want you to think about that and I want you to do the right thing. And when you've decided to do the right thing, speak to Yuli over here."

Yuli was his number two. "Yuli" is Yuli Vorontsov, the Soviet first deputy foreign minister, currently ambassador to Afghanistan, who I don't think was ever a KGB agent. I think he was pressed into service as liaison for the KGB just as I had been contacted earlier by the CIA. But in any case, I never responded to that effort. I just reported it to my boss and to the CIA; and Tsarapkin, after a few more vodkas, passed out dead drunk. [Laughter]

So the two delegations didn't get together again until March 1961. And I should say, speaking of Tsarapkin, just on the side, that once early in 1963, when we were still negotiating, at that time on general and complete disarmament as well, we were at a cocktail party that someone gave. My wife was there, as well, and Tsarapkin came up to my wife and spoke English to her and said, "I can't tell you how difficult it has been for me all these years sitting opposite your husband."

"Why?" she said, "What's the matter?"

He said, "Because he chews gum, and he's there all the time chewing gum while I'm talking and while everything's going on. It's a terrible habit, you know, and why don't you tell him that he should stop?"

So my wife did, and I said, "Well, the Soviets are right for a change." And not a piece of gum, despite much temptation, has crossed my lips since that day. [Laughter]

IDAR D. RIMESTAD
Administrative Officer
Moscow (1957-1960)

Ambassador Idar D. Rimestad was born in 1916 and raised in North Dakota. He received a Ph.B. from the University of North Dakota in 1940. His Foreign Service career included positions in Moscow, Paris, Geneva, and Washington, DC. Ambassador Rimestad was interviewed by Thomas Stern on June 22, 1990.

Q: Your next assignment was to Moscow?

RIMESTAD: In 1957, I knew that my tour of duty in the Department was coming to an end and I had to think about what my next assignment would be. I talked to Sid Lafoon. He said he would look into overseas possibilities. He said that there were two jobs that he knew would be opening in late 1957: one, was administrative counselor in Madrid and the other was administrative officer in Moscow. There were some other people in the room during this discussion. Everybody jumped and said that I should take Madrid -- beautiful housing, a nice club, etc. Every single person in the room said the same thing. They thought I would be a fool not to take Madrid. It would be a delightful place to spend four years. I thought to myself that I heard this so much -- an officer goes to a post because of family considerations, for reasons having nothing to do with the job. Then he's stuck; he sits for four years doing little in a very nice set-up. So I asked for a few days to consider the choice. I talked to my wife; she thought Madrid would be great. There was a school there. If we went to Moscow, we would have to send our two girls to West Germany -- it had the nearest American school -- a school run by the U.S. military. One of my daughters was to be a junior in high school and the other would just start eighth grade.

I thought about the various issues and finally decided on Moscow. It was a post where things were happening. If I were to make the Foreign Service my career, then that would be the place to go. So I surprised everybody. Fred Irving called me and asked: "Are you sure that this is what you want? You prefer Moscow over Madrid?". I said: "Yes". This was the Fall of 1957. It was one of the career turning points for me because I got to Moscow and everything broke loose. First there was a big American exposition during which the Nixon-Khrushchev "kitchen" debate took place -- I was just a couple of feet away from Nixon during that dialogue. Then the U-2 plane, piloted by Gary Powers, went down -- I was one of the half-dozen officials who got the first view of the plane.

Q: Let me take you back to late 1957 when you were first assigned to Moscow as administrative officer. Until then, your experience had been entirely in the field of personnel. Your Moscow position had a much broader range of responsibilities? How was the transition?

RIMESTAD: It was very easy because as a salary-wage man, I had become familiar with all the administrative jobs. I had spent lots of time in procurement, lots in finance -- reviewing what people were doing. It wasn't going into something that was completely new. As a salary-wage analyst, I had gotten into every one of those administrative activities. And I knew them pretty well.

Q: So you felt comfortable with other areas of administration besides personnel?

RIMESTAD: Yes. I would not have been comfortable getting into economics or political work or public affairs; that I wouldn't have messed with.

Q: Who was the ambassador in Moscow in 1957?

RIMESTAD: Llewellyn Thompson -- a great guy. I didn't know him at all when the assignment was made. Thompson called Fred Irving, whom he knew well. He asked Fred whether he should take me. Fred said: "Yes. Absolutely. Take him". I arrived in Moscow not knowing anybody, the Ambassador, the DCM, anybody, not a single soul.

Q: How did that feel?

RIMESTAD: It was difficult because Fred Irving sent me with some instructions. For example, the Political Section and most of the Economic Section were using Embassy vehicles as if they were their personal cars. Fred wanted that stopped. He was concerned that one of the people would get involved in an accident and that then the Department would have to explain what an officer was doing on a Sunday afternoon on an outing with his family in a government car. These weren't trips in the city; they were going out into the country-side. Fred wanted that practice stopped. So I went to the Ambassador and explained to him that the Embassy had a problem with its senior officers using government cars on weekends for personal use and that I had been instructed to stop the practice. If anyone needed a car, he or she should get either the Ambassador's or my approval, so that we could document the reasons for the use of the car. That new directive did not go over very well because the use of government vehicles for personal purposes had been the practice for many years. We only had five or six sedans and every Friday night, officers would take the cars and use them over the weekend. But that stopped.

Q: What were the living conditions in Moscow in the late 1950s?

RIMESTAD: We had two sets of living quarters for the American staff. We had apartments in the Embassy itself -- that is where I lived -- and then we had an apartment building near the University. I wouldn't say that living conditions were tough. The most difficult aspect of living in Moscow came from the isolation -- we had no Russian friends; all contacts were with other Embassies. The diet was fairly restricted. There were two or three restaurants one could go to. We got a half a dozen tickets to the Bolshoi every week, which would be given to whom ever asked for them. The first year of my tour was alright. It was interesting. The second year was not so interesting. When I got into the third year, I didn't like it at all. It was dull; you couldn't do anything. You could walk the streets, but there was no social life except within your own group. I was very friendly with the Germans, the British, Italians, French and the Scandinavians. We had good relations with the Turkish Embassy and the Japanese Embassy. That was about it.

Q: How often did you get out of Moscow?

RIMESTAD: Every six months. I got out easily because there was the Ambassador's plane that came in every six months. I would take it to Germany to buy goods for the Embassy and the Commissary. I would fly back to Moscow the following week. The plane would also carry about a dozen staff members. There were a lot of people who didn't want to avail themselves of this opportunity because the plane flew into Berlin and then they were on their own. They didn't want to go there. Tickets to Copenhagen and Stockholm were very cheap. So there was no problem in leaving Moscow. People would save up their leave so that they could take an extensive vacation in Italy or France or some other country.

Q: But the limited social life was wearing?

RIMESTAD: Yes. As I said, not for the first year. Everyone enjoyed the first year; it was fun and interesting. Most people didn't stay for more than two years. I stayed more because Eisenhower was scheduled to come to Moscow. That didn't happen, but I was requested to remain at post during the planning period. I didn't leave Moscow until August 1960, although I was eligible to leave the previous November. The Eisenhower visit was canceled because of the U-2 incident.

We had one or two private Americans in Moscow at that time and they found it a hardship. Most of the Foreign Service personnel had been in places like Nicaragua or Indonesia or other Third World countries. They didn't find Moscow too bad in terms of living conditions. They thought they were pretty good.

Q: What is the role of administration in an Embassy like Moscow?

RIMESTAD: Total and complete logistical support, including groceries. We worked with the Russians (BUROBIN was the name of the organization we worked with) in handling problems that our personnel got involved in or getting more trips to Leningrad and matters of that kind -- the social aspects, not the official ones. My office was the contact with the Russians on everything, except for political or economic work.

Q: The Russians provided the local personnel?

RIMESTAD: Yes. All good KGB people. That was well known -- no question about it. We were always finding wire-taps on telephones. Some of the Russians were maids. I'll never forget the Naval Attaché who was fiddling around with his telephone one day. He unscrewed it and out popped a small gadget. It was a listening device which had been placed between the two beds. He said: "Wait until my wife finds out. She is always after me to come over to her bed to visit her. She will be very unhappy!". We found a lot of that type of thing. I remember that when Ambassador Thompson wanted to discuss some sensitive issue, he would hand me a piece of paper and we would exchange written notes instead of conversation. He used to say that there was just no way of knowing how the Russians might have bugged his office. It was about at this time that we got a secure room, but your inclination is to blurt out one sentence assuming that this wouldn't make any difference.

But the whole building was bugged -- every room. They bugged the rooms by placing devices behind the radiators. The bugging system was a single system so that moving one radiator didn't make any difference. You would have to shut the whole water system down. They had been there for several years before I got there. They were there during the two and half years I was there and they were there after that. If someone would have moved his refrigerator, he would have spotted the bug.

Q: The local employees had access to the Embassy?

RIMESTAD: Yes, up to the fifth floor. On the sixth floor, there were the DCM's and the military attaché's residences. The seventh and eighth floors were offices. So the locals did not have access to those floors unless they were escorted by a Marine Guard. My office was on the first floor to which the locals had access.

Q: How was the American staff while you were in Moscow?

RIMESTAD: It had its ups and downs. In general, I thought they were very good. On the administrative side, with probably one exception, I would have hired them all. They were very good. They were a gung-ho group. I didn't realize until I was leaving that one of my officers was an alcoholic. I never knew it. I always wondered why he was never available on weekends. You could never reach him. That is when he would load up. The rest of the week he didn't touch alcohol. He was the only one who could have been a problem. As a matter of fact, after his return to the U.S., he got into some kind of trouble and was let go. I am sure that the Department screened potential assignees very carefully before sending them to Moscow. One had to be pretty well adjusted to be assigned to Moscow.

Q: Did the stress of confinement and limited social activities affect personnel?

RIMESTAD: Yes, particularly the wives. They would be contentious; they would find problems where there weren't any or complain about perceived problems that couldn't be solved. There were problems that went with being in Moscow; if a wife couldn't accommodate to them, I would call in the officer and asked him to get matters under control because there wasn't anything we could do. Moscow was Moscow and couldn't be changed. Some would be unhappy with us for not having fresh vegetables or meat or something along those lines. I would ask the officer whether he wanted to stand in line at the meat market. He or his wife could stand in line for hours, but would probably get some meat. There was no way the Embassy could provide the meat. The complaints were about little stuff. It didn't affect efficiency or subject people to KGB enticements. There were a number of individuals, as history has told us, who apparently did play around, but it was not obvious to us at the time. The KGB was a problem for single people.

Q: You had a Marine detachment during your tour?

RIMESTAD: Yes. They were no problem while I was there. The problems with the Marines came later after my tour. We did have one Army fellow who was socializing too much; so the Army transferred him out.

Q: Who was the DCM when you arrived in Moscow?

RIMESTAD: Richard (Dick) Davis. Just before my departure from Moscow, Davis was replaced

-- he had been the DCM for two of the years I was there. Neither of the DCMs was involved in the management and administration of the Embassy. They generally left me totally and completely alone. Dick would listen to his wife and come back with some tales about alleged problems. For example, we needed a garage for our automobiles. We had a big vacant lot beside the Embassy. I had decided to take one-half and build a garage on it so we could get all our cars under cover. We had eleven vehicles and only three could be inside. The ladies opposed the idea because the vacant area was being used by their children as a playground. I had watched this for sometime; there was a lot of mud when it rained. It wasn't really a playground in any sense of the word. But Mrs. Davis got all the ladies together and they all agreed that no garage should be built and that the playground should remain as it was. I went to the Ambassador and told him that we desperately needed the garage. I pointed out that half of the lot -- 75 feet by 100 feet -- would still be available for play. That is a big lot to play on. He asked: "For heaven's sake, who is creating this problem?". So I told him that Dick Davis's wife was leading the opposition. He said: "Forget it. I'll take care of it". I never heard another word about it. That was the only time that I went to the Ambassador with an administrative problem. We had all sorts of problems on who could get on his airplane -- we had twelve spaces and sixteen wanted to go -- and that sort of thing. But we managed to decide that at my level. The Ambassador made a studied effort not to get involved in my work unless he had to -- like the playground matter.

Q: Was the Embassy staff a congenial group?

RIMESTAD: Yes. I think there was a good team effort. You had the political and economic officers -- that was a clubby group in that they didn't mix much with anybody else. Then you had the administrative, consular and military personnel -- a group that socialized together a lot. At Christmas time or Thanksgiving, the whole Embassy got together. There was no animosity between any of the groups, except that the communication people, the military sergeants, the consular and administrative people -- who were all more or less at the same level -- tended to want to be together. The political and economic officers, of whom there were only six, more or less stuck together. But these divisions didn't create any tensions.

Q: You mentioned car usage as a major problem at the beginning of your tenure. What other administrative problems did you encounter when you were in Moscow?

RIMESTAD: Housing. That was a perpetual problem. There was always a shortage. Our Embassy was growing. Even if Washington assigned one additional person, we had a problem. We were always pushing the Russians to give us more housing. We couldn't do anything with the main building itself. That was completely filled. The Russians had set aside some housing units for the foreign diplomatic community. All were looking for more space. The others would complain that we were getting more than our fair share. It was a constant battle with the Russians to let us have another apartment or two. That was true throughout my tour. The Russians were building at the time; they also broke relations with Israel and other countries. The units occupied by the diplomats from those countries would be immediately reassigned to other foreign missions. But there was a continuous great demand by all, although probably more from us because we had by far the largest Embassy in Moscow.

We didn't have temporary quarters. We wouldn't permit any new arrivals unless we had permanent quarters for them, unless it was for a very short period and then they would stay in a hotel.

Q: What about financial resources? Any problems with that issue?

RIMESTAD: We got extra-special treatment from Washington. When we desperately needed money for something, we would get it. Our needs were small compared to London, Paris or Rome. We would ask for $18,000 when Paris would be asking for $1,800,000. We never had any problems with money. We knew what our budget was and what our expenditures would be. We weren't going to get any more housing, cars or anything else. The Russians put the limits on. So money was never a real problem.

Q: How about visitors?

RIMESTAD: We had lots of visitors. Until the U-2 incident, we had a tremendous flow of visitors. I had opened up a small restaurant in one of the bays of the old garage. Most of the officers objected to it because it would affect their cost of living allowance if it were found that we had a restaurant which would provide breakfast or lunch at lower rates than otherwise would be available. They went to the Ambassador, asking that the restaurant not be opened. The Ambassador found it hard to understand their position. He knew that the facility would be welcomed by a lot of the staff, particularly the single people, who had to go back to their apartments every day to make their sandwiches. So we opened the restaurant and it was a great addition to the Embassy. It is still there. But it was a problem when the visitors heard about it because they could get bacon and eggs there. They came over to the Embassy for breakfast. We couldn't refuse them since most had seen or would see the Ambassador. It would have been impossible to deny them access to the restaurant. The restaurant operated with non-appropriated funds totally and completely. The US government supplied the building and the utilities. The fixtures had been gotten from the American exhibition when that was closed. We made a lot of money from the Commissary sales -- cigarettes and liquor. That supported the operations of the restaurant. If in some months we would run short in the restaurant, we would use the Commissary surpluses to support it. The restaurant was for Americans only.

Q: How much time did the Embassy devote to visitors?

RIMESTAD: In the summer -- June, July and August -- it would devote considerable time. If an Embassy officer was in town, he would have to see any visitor who wanted to see him.

Q: Who were these visitors? Businessmen? Congressmen?

RIMESTAD: I am going to say something I have never said before and my comment applies not only to Moscow, but to many foreign service posts. Americans travel to the post, come to the Embassy, sign in -- usually want to go to the Economic Section -- ask a couple of questions, get the answers and their business is done. Now the businessman has his trip paid because it becomes tax-deductible expenditure as a business expense. I saw more of that in Paris than in Moscow. Many would sign in, do something that was reasonably official and were never seen again by the Embassy.

We had a number of Congressional visitors. That was when I first met John Rooney, whom I found to be a very nice fellow -- contrary to his reputation. He liked to tweak the State Department on such things as too many cars, too many secretaries, plush furniture and those sorts of things. But he always gave us the money.

Q: Rooney had an unusual agenda when he visited Embassies. What did he do in Moscow?

RIMESTAD: In Moscow, he wanted to see the building. I took him through the building. He wanted to go to a typical Russian restaurant. We took him and he thought the food was terrible. He was in Moscow for three nights -- two days. He saw the Ambassador and got a briefing, although he didn't really care for briefings. He just didn't care for them. He had an assistant with him by the name of Jay Howe who took notes and wrote up the trip reports. When we asked whether we could write any of them, he said: "No. Jay will write whatever needs to be written". He did spend a lot of time in the building and Jay took notes on what a terrible place it was. He went to the garage. We had paved the parking area outside the garage and marked it for badminton and basketball courts. He looked at that and said: "Is this what you got several hundred thousands dollars for?". I said that it was for the garage building; this was a parking lot. I added: "Mr. Congressman, the markings that you see on the paved area are the latest markings in parking lots". He laughed and told Jay not to note this innovation.

We also had the Foreign Relations Committee and Agriculture Committee people visiting.

Q: Were these official visitors hard to support?

RIMESTAD: No, because they invariably had contacts already made with the Russians whom they would see. In any case, most of them wanted to leave Moscow as soon as possible and see Leningrad and Kiev. We had enough transportation to support them; if we didn't we would rent cars. We only had four sedans available and needed one or two for the Embassy all the time. We would send cars to meet the official visitors at the airport and bring them back. If they wanted to do some sight-seeing, then we would have to rent cars.

Q: Were the hotels adequate for the visitors?

RIMESTAD: They hated them. But they were the best available. The Ukraina, which was close to the Embassy, was a nice hotel, but it was not a Hilton. Before we close this chapter of my career, I should say that it was a fascinating experience -- absolutely fascinating, mainly because we were dealing with another culture -- totally and completely different. You had to remind yourself of that all the time. Just because we do something one way, doesn't make it right. In their viewpoint, their way was correct.

COLE BLASIER
Temporary Duty
Moscow (1958)

Cole Blasier attended the University of Illinois and Columbia University. He Joined the Foreign Service in 1951 and served in a number of posts including Yugoslavia, Germany, and the USSR.

Q: You had one final temporary duty as a Foreign Service Officer in Moscow in 1958?

BLASIER: Yes, while assigned to the Bureau of Intelligence and Research (INR).

Q: Was this standard practice or was this unusual?

BLASIER: Not unusual, nor frequent.

Q: It was to avail the Department a particular skill on your part or was it to reward you? What was the motivation?

BLASIER: Somebody might have wanted to reward me but I doubt it. No reflection on me but things usually don't work that way. The Embassy had a pressing temporary need and Washington found me and the money to fill it.

Moscow was busier that summer than at any time in recent memory. Moscow embassy was being flooded by delegations from the U.S. and the Embassy wanted to take advantage of new political reporting opportunities created by the "thaw." I served as escort and occasional interpreter for three large delegations and took on a few other odd jobs. I spent most of the rest of my time writing political dispatches on a wide variety of subjects based on trips in Western Russia and Central Asia.

Q: What sort of delegations was this, congressional or...

BLASIER: The three main delegations were: the first for U.S. University Presidents to visit the USSR, a delegation of social scientists, and a delegation of veterinarians. I helped other visitors. My work led me to fascinating political, economic, and cultural topics beyond the scope of this oral history.

Q: Was that when Llewellyn Thompson was American Ambassador to the USSR?

BLASIER: It was. I could add a word about him if you want.

Q: Please, please. What can you tell us about Thompson?

BLASIER: Tommy Thompson was already an icon. I had followed his negotiations on the Austrian State Treaty from Belgrade. The Ambassador was thin and did not appear strong physically. I had the impression he was under great stress, had medical problems, and was caught between boorish leaders in Moscow and Washington. He had to internalize so much of the frictions and controversies that it was a very heavy burden for him to carry. Much of the management of the Embassy was in the hands of his deputy, Richard Davis, who I had met at Columbia. Thompson came into the Embassy to handle the most pressing business and then would leave. I didn't see much of him initially.

My first opportunity came at a smallish reception at Spaso house. During the course of the reception, he invited me sit down for a talk. I have met and talked with many famous people in my life, who almost without exception want to do all the talking. Instead, he wanted to learn about what I'd observed there, and had read my dispatches. His interest was not a compliment to me, but more to him. Few celebrities ask anything about you; they want to tell you about them. He made an indelible impression.

On another occasion I learned about Thompson's interview with the Soviet foreign minister - maybe it was Molotov. Discussing some controversial issue the latter went into a rage against the U.S. that went on for about ten minutes and then he stopped. And then Thompson just sat there in silence for maybe five minutes. Didn't say a word, not a word - just sat there. Silent.

Molotov didn't know what to do, became flustered. At last he said what about this? Thompson replied: "Are you finished?" The Ambassador gave him this silent rebuke.

Q: In your reporting or analyzing time there, what were your particular monuments? Did you do studies of education, studies of the internal processing?

BLASIER: Most of these dispatches are probably in the diplomatic archives nearby in Maryland which I hope to consult some day. Among the subjects I now dimly remember dealt with anti-Semitism, maintenance of public buildings, an interview with the Grand High Mufti of Central Asia, my treatment by the secret police including entrapment efforts and poisoning, descriptive pieces on living conditions, and visits to Central Asia. In order to answer this question properly, I would need to go through these dispatches.

Q: You had an advantage later in your academic career of going back to Moscow in different periods, which gave you a chance to notice changes from one period to another. What struck you doing this? Was change as slow as you thought it would be, or faster?

BLASIER: Many of the underlying aspects of Soviet public opinion and politics were pretty similar from the time of my first visit in 1958. During Khrushchev and the thaw, the USSR was much more open and rational and under Brezhnev authoritarian and bureaucratic themes became stronger again. With Gorbachev trends were in the opposite direction. About all I can say now is that many of the leading themes during Khrushchev, Brezhnev, Gorbachev and Putin were similar but their weight and arrangement varied substantially.

The first time I returned to Moscow after leaving the service was in 1978. I arranged that second visit while on an inter-university travel grant in Warsaw. On that visit I laid the ground work for the U.S.-USSR exchange in Latin American studies. IREX covered the U.S. costs of the delegations of U.S. scholars and the USSR Academy sciences through its Institute of Latin America for theirs during the years 1985 to 1990. As chairman, I went to Moscow one or more times a year for the exchange, and on others for research on my book, The Giant's Rival, the USSR and Latin America. Until 1980 continuities in political attitudes and political organization were greater than the changes. After Gorbachev had been in office attitudes towards the regime and towards the U.S. changed rapidly. What has been wonderfully consistent since the last years of Gorbachev to the present is the free climate for personal and political discussion with Russian friends and colleagues. To answer this question properly requires more space and time than we have here.

The Exchange ended in late 1990. Since that time I have been to Russia every few years on various missions. For example, one was serving as a consultant for the International Executive Service Corps at the State University in Vladivostok. And in 2000 I was an observer for Putin's election as president for the OSCE in Kazan, Tatarstan. I continue to research Russian subjects, especially topics related to Germany.

Q: In 1958 when you were on temporary assignment to the Embassy in Moscow were you already more or less determined to go back to the great outside world?

BLASIER: My conversations with Chancellor Litchfield and other university presidents in 1958 started me thinking. That was probably the most difficult time in my life, a decision-making process that was having adverse impacts on my life.

Q: You discussed this with your chiefs in the INR or did you weigh some offers before you decided to...

BLASIER: No, I didn't. In the end I only had one offer. I looked around at various places. None of the opportunities appealed to me, nor I to them. In the end, I had only one offer that was acceptable and I took it. It was from Everett Case, the President of Colgate University, a former Harvard business school assistant dean, and assistant to the founder of General Electric, Owen D. Young. He was one of the most respected college presidents in the country. He later became president of the foundation of his father-in-law's competitor, Alfred P. Sloan of General Motors.

Q: Oh, I meant offers within the Department of State.

BLASIER: No, I assumed that I would be in INR for some months more and then get another assignment. It seemed too soon to seek another assignment, and besides one assignment was not the issue. Meanwhile, Grover Penberthy, my personnel officer and by chance a personal friend, urged me not to resign and to take extended leave instead. This was good advice and I was touched by his and maybe the Department's concern. Convinced, however, that I had to make a firm decision, I declined and resigned in September 1960.

Q: The Department was the big loser in this, but you went on to a very distinguished career in the academic world, particularly in the field of Latin American studies and relating them to the Soviet Union in part.

BLASIER: Yes, thank you.

EDWARD HURWITZ
Staff Aide to the Ambassador
Moscow (1958-1960)

Edward Hurwitz was born in New York in 1931. He received his bachelor's degree from Cornell University in 1952. After serving in the US Army from 1953-1955 he entered the Foreign Service in 1956. During his career he had positions in Moscow, Seoul, Washington D.C., Afghanistan, Leningrad, and an Ambassadorship to Kyrgyzstan. Ambassador Hurwitz was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in August 1996.

Q: After INR, in 1958 where did you go?

HURWITZ: In 1958 Llewellyn Thompson had just recently arrived in Moscow and he wanted a staff aide. Now, prior to me, not acting as staff aide, but living in the residence, Spaso, was a bachelor officer who had come from Indonesia. He had a job in the embassy but because of the housing shortage and Spaso was a big rambling house, he lived there. Well, Thompson wanted to have a staff aide who would actually live in the residence and also take care of the ordering of his food from commissaries in Frankfurt and deal with the household staff, do his accounts, etc. So, I went out and considered it one of my greatest opportunities in my life, and lived in Spaso.

It is a curious story, though. Once I got out there, Thompson really didn't give me anything to do particularly. At one point, Mrs. Thompson, Jane Thompson, was saying that "Tommy, Ed has to have an office right here at Spaso and I will work with him on a daily basis." Thompson said, "Oh, no, no, he has to come to the embassy every day." So, I went to the embassy every day and Thompson gave me his correspondence. He got lots of letters from the States. The Soviet Union was just opening up to tourism, etc. He would throw these to me and I would answer them. He was very anxious, correctly so, that these letters be answered politely and with as much information as could be given to the writer. I remember one case, for example, where he got a letter from a kid who was collecting soil from around the world. He wanted some Moscow dirt. Already becoming an adept bureaucrat, I said, "Okay, I will assign this letter to be answered by the agricultural attaché." Well, he let it sit until finally what happened was that the kid getting no answer from the American embassy in Moscow, wrote a letter to the Soviet embassy in Washington which dutifully sent the kid some dirt. Probably they went out in the back garden of the Soviet embassy in Washington and dug up some dirt and sent it to him, but at least they responded to him. We found out about it because the kid's congressman wrote to the State Department saying, "See, our American embassy doesn't help us out, but the Soviet embassy did." Thompson was a little annoyed at that. This was precisely what he was trying to avoid with these letters.

So, I did that sort of thing. I did deal with the staff. But, still it took up only a little of my time. The rest of my time I was spending very fruitfully going around to lectures, but that is another story. It turns out the reason Thompson didn't give me anything to do was very curious. We had an inspection, Ed Gullion was the inspector. He later became ambassador to Vietnam. Gullion brought in all the political type officers and staff aide into his office, one by one. When my turn came he said, "Sit down Ed. I have always wanted to see one of you." "One of me? What do you mean?" He said, "I have always wanted to see an FSO who was a member of the CIA." I said, "But, I am not a member of the CIA. I am an honest FSO." He said, "Well, the ambassador thinks you are. Let me go back and check." There were secret files apparently and it turned out I was an FSO. But, Thompson thought because he wanted a single officer and they sent out a Russian speaker that I was really full time CIA. We settled that, of course, and from then on I did a lot more work in the residence.

Q: From your perspective, how did Llewellyn Thompson operate in the Soviet Union?

HURWITZ: Thompson was very self-contained. He wasn't a very articulate guy. He played a lot of things close to the chest. But, he had long experience there during the war. He knew a lot of people. He was able to get along with the Soviet leadership. And, this was a time when Khrushchev would show up occasionally at the embassy, Khrushchev would deal with the diplomats, other Politburo members would come to the Fourth of July. It was a totally different atmosphere from either before or after during the Brezhnev period. So, we saw a lot of the Soviet leadership.

Q: You said you went around to lectures, etc. What were you getting out of these?

HURWITZ: There always had been during all my tours in the Soviet Union, a system of lectures. Some were completely open to the public, some were not publicized. I was an inveterate walker, walking the city endlessly and would see notices on clubs, writers club, etc. about lectures on political, cultural subjects and would go. My Russian by then was getting very good and in short sentences ("I want a ticket to get in" or "What time is it?") they couldn't distinguish me from maybe a Latvian or someone like that, so I got into a lot of these things. The lectures might be straight party line, but the questions often were incredibly revealing about how people felt, their complaints, their living conditions. People would say things you would never see in the press. Why are so many people denied housing? I have been living in a hovel in a basement and nobody is interested in my welfare, I can't get any food. Things that were diametrically opposed to what you would be reading in the Soviet press.

I recall one that was very revealing and we used it quite a bit. I heard a lecturer say point blank at a time when this was not supposed to be known that Castro was a communist. He was getting full support from the Soviets. This was at a time when Castro was trying to force himself off as a home ground revolutionary having nothing to do with the Soviet Union. I remember we got a call from the guy who was then assistant secretary for ARA. I did this throughout my career and turned up a lot of very fascinating stuff.

Q: You were in the Soviet Union this time from when to when?

HURWITZ: This was 1958-60.

Q: Were you able to take any trips outside of Moscow?

HURWITZ: Oh, yes. I went to a lot of interesting places. Most of them by train. For example, one of the more interesting trips was to Yakutsk, way up in eastern Siberia. I went to Vilnius. I went to the out of the way places, Kishinev, which is in Moldavia; Kirov, which is in western Siberia and had just opened up. I did an enormous amount of traveling by train.

Q: How would a typical trip work? What were you trying to do?

HURWITZ: You were just trying to see what was going on. On the typical trip you would go with somebody else, very often a Brit, Canadian, or Australian. We would go to a town and just look around. Go to the market. Go to bookstores and try to buy books that were not on sale elsewhere. We had a very active book buying program but everybody participated. There was a publications procurement officer, but everybody picked up stuff. We would go to restaurants. At that time restaurants were crowded and you were virtually always seated with people who were already at a table. If they felt nobody was listening and they felt you were an American, which was easy for them to determine, they would really open up on what the problems were. So, we were able through these trips into the countryside, where you have to realize that you may have seen this in Visket, but you go 50 kilometers outside of Moscow and you are going back a hundred years in time--people pulling water out of wells with the yokes. Through this we were able to present a picture of the Soviet Union which was totally different than the one that the propaganda machine was trying to purvey and making it clear to what extent the Soviet effort to mount a space program or to what extent the emphasis on military development was really costing the Soviet Union in economic terms, an enormous amount.

Q: Did you have any problems with the KGB during these trips?

HURWITZ: Yes. I was young and silly, I think, my first tour. Rather early on I began to notice the same people around. Someone I had noticed in a crowd last week was there again. So, I began to play a few games with them, which was a big mistake. For example, going down into the subway and then waiting until the last minute to board a train to try to avoid them. I should have realized that from their standpoint that is not a game, that it appears suspicious or malicious. So, I had a few run ins. They got annoyed and began to follow very closely. During my second tour I didn't do that at all and I can't say I wasn't followed all the time. When you went outside of Moscow you would be followed. The local KGB or police were always much more enthusiastic and concerned about having something happen on their turf.

Q: I found this true in Yugoslavia.

HURWITZ: The only real incident I ever had was in 1970 when the Jewish Defense League in New York was really being very nasty with Soviet diplomats and families. It was really scurrilous what they were doing--spitting at wives, etc. So, one day I was taking my morning run in January and as I was running around the area where I lived a car came up onto the sidewalk where I was running and a guy got out blocking my way. He said, "Hurwitz, some day you are going to fall off the platform of the subway or walking under a building and a brick is going to fall from the top of the house." From that day on for two weeks, it was lock step. If I went into a bookstore and stood in front of a shelf, there was a guy at my shoulder. They never touched me. They were very disciplined. This went on for two weeks and then it ended with a crescendo and stopped. The crescendo was that I was in a car with my wife coming back from a reception and there was the follow car which was right on my bumper. I stopped for a light, they stopped and somebody got out (I didn't see him) and went up to the back window and smashed it in. Then it stopped. Sol Polansky was in the embassy at the time and also shared a little bit of that. They may have singled us out. But, their purpose in doing this was from their standpoint perfectly logical and reasonable. We kept telling them in New York, for example, "Look, this is New York City jurisdiction and we can't do anything about it. We have no control over the courts." They couldn't understand this and they turned out to be right because in the wake of all this what happened after they started harassing our people we had some laws passed protecting diplomats.

Q: That was a very difficult period for you. But, back to the time you were there first, 1958-60. You were there during the U2 time. How did that work out?

HURWITZ: I got married in Moscow to the daughter of the Norwegian ambassador. She came in 1958, we met and got married in 1960. Our plan had been to go out of the country, to Vienna for a honeymoon. I think those plans were interfered with by the prospective visit of Eisenhower. In fact, the Soviets were building a golf course some place for him. But, then the U2 stopped the visit. We couldn't resuscitate the Vienna trip at that point. I was leaving pretty shortly. Yes, the U2 was a big deal.

Q: What about demonstrations against the embassy?

HURWITZ: Demonstrations were the order of the day depending on the issue. In July, 1958 there was a huge demonstration outside the embassy in connection with our having landed troops in Lebanon. It was the typical well organized demonstration, by the numbers, with the very carefully done placards saying "Hands Off Lebanon" and that sort of thing. There is an extraordinarily wide, broad street in front of the embassy, Tchaikovsky Street, and it was just solid with people. There was the throwing of ink wells, breaking of windows and that sort of stuff. But, here again, throughout all of this I was never really concerned about my safety vis-a-vis these goons, as we called them, or the demonstrators. It was all thoroughly orchestrated and controlled and almost nobody had any real spleen. The average person, whether organized to do this or not, really liked the United States. That is the strange part of it. So many conversations that I had made that clear. So many people, especially the older people, were appreciative for what the United States had done. So many people would talk about "I remember the canned ham, spam, and the jeep", etc. Even during the darkest days of the Cold War, the United States was still loved by the average Soviet.

Q: Did you get out into the crowds during these demonstrations?

HURWITZ: At that particular one, the Lebanon one, I had been at the ambassador's residence, which is about a fifteen minute walk from the embassy, for lunch. The demonstration had begun while I was having lunch there and the street was filled. I later went back and stood around the fringes of the crowd, without, again, the slightest bit of concern for my personal safety. It is not as if you are in a Pakistani demonstration or something like that.

Q: What was the impression during the time you were there of Khrushchev?

HURWITZ: Khrushchev was considered a wily, but very unorthodox by Soviet standards, person. An earthy, peasant type, who was interested in not having a real confrontation with the United States. He was somebody who Thompson could talk to. He came to the embassy. He talked to any number of American visitors of the Rockefeller type. He was interested even at that time in seeking some kind of common arrangement to avoid confrontation. It was a totally different atmosphere from Stalin and from what came later with Brezhnev. It was an “otopel”, a thaw from what had gone on before. It was a period when Solzhenitsyn was being published and the theater was opening up. A period of blossoming of something that had been suppressed.

Q: Was there a feeling that sort of on the cultural side things were more open?

HURWITZ: Yes, by all means. We had our first contingent of IREX students. We had the Sol Hurok exchanges. We had “Porgy and Bess” coming there. You know, when I was there for a young Foreign Service officer, it was absolutely...I was in seventh heaven. We had Adlai Stevenson, Eleanor Roosevelt, Carl Sandburg, Saroyan, Benny Goodman, Duke Ellington, Gary Cooper and Edward G. Robinson. All of these were opportunities for enormous outpouring of interest on the part of Russians. It was a very active and interesting time. Perhaps the most influential, the most striking evidence of this was a triumph of USIA and US policy initiative there, the US exhibition in 1959. The big kitchen debate venue. This was really a masterpiece because it was all geared to American consumer items. Things that blew the Soviets’ minds. It was done in a very effective way. There were American hairdressers doing Soviet women. There was a huge book exhibit at which we knew the books would disappear. Some genius in USIA had the idea of having a Yiddish book section which was fantastic. I stood there frequently and watched people gaze up at these books and be almost afraid to touch them. I had many really revealing conversations at that area. I would reach up and pull down books trying to encourage other people to pull them down. They were sort of quaking. As I say, the books disappeared in enormous numbers. It was really a great triumph and opened up people’s eyes in the Soviet Union, those who may have believed America is okay if you are rich but for the working person it is no good. They had this theater in the round, a 360 degree film, which even the Soviets would say you couldn’t fake. It showed, for example, a Ford plant with the workers leaving the plant at the end of their shift, going out into the parking lot which was a sea of private cars. So, that was a really beautifully executed...

Q: Did you get any feel for how the famous kitchen debate between Vice President Nixon and Khrushchev went?

HURWITZ: I wasn’t there at that particular debate. Nixon said a few things later on TV that weren’t taken too well. But, by and large, the atmosphere was just...

Q: Were people involved in the arts, ballerinas, musicians, etc. given a little looser leash as far as contacts with the embassy?

HURWITZ: Oh, much so. I was just reading one of the letters I wrote home. We had a number of dances, Mrs. Thompson arranged this, to which ballerinas were invited. I remember writing home that I hoped to be able to dance with Ulanova, who was the queen of Russian ballet. Well, it turns out I danced with somebody else who later became famous. That was something that faded away in time during the Brezhnev years.

Q: You left there when in 1960?

HURWITZ: In July.

Q: What was your impression whither the Soviet Union at that time?

HURWITZ: There was no inkling on my part that it would come to grief later. That the propaganda was totally just that and the realities were completely different. That there were great dissatisfactions. But, that even at that point they were beginning to live better. They had gone through this period of terror, had gone through the war, deprivations of all kinds, but things were better. Whether they would continue to get better, I didn't really consider. But, even then you knew it was physically an enormously rich country. I had the feeling that the people (and this became clear later) despite everybody saying that they wouldn't work, that the system simply discouraged real work, could be motivated to work and that the average person was against war and really did want peace. The people couldn't really be mobilized to fight against the United States unless they were invaded. So, I think I felt the Soviet Union was not destined to come apart by any means, nor was it destined to rule the world, that neither Khrushchev nor the people in charge were interested in doing that sort of thing.

JOHN D. SCANLON
General Services Officer
Moscow, USSR (1958-1960)

Mr. Scanlon was born and raised in Minnesota, educated at the University of Minnesota and served in the US Navy in WWII. Entering the Foreign Service in 1956, he first served in INR in the Department, before being posted to Moscow as General Services Officer. After Polish language study, he was assigned to Warsaw, followed by postings to Montevideo and Poznan. Mr. Scanlon was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

Q: You finished with INR when?

SCANLAN: The spring of 1958 I was asked if I would accept an assignment to Moscow, which delighted me, as general services officer. I didn't know what a general services officer did in those days. I was told that I would be responsible for logistical support and maintenance of the embassy and embassy housing. I was delighted to be able to go to Moscow. I then went back and took the second part of the A100 course. On my own time, I did some Russian language refresher through one of the teachers at the FSI who had been earlier at the University of Minnesota and I knew him. On his own time and my own time, we got together several hours a week. Then they gave me 2 weeks general services training and out to Moscow. I went to Moscow in mid-July 1958.

Q: You were there to when?

SCANLAN: I was there for a little over 2 years. I left in mid-late July 1960. I actually got married on June 28, 1958. We spent about a week in Washington after we got married because I couldn't get visas for my wife until she became my wife, so that was a pretty hectic week. Then we got on a plane and flew to Europe and spent about 10 days going through Europe, various stops, a hectic honeymoon on the way to Moscow.

Q: You were there from '58 to '60. What was your impression of the Soviet Union when you first arrived?

SCANLAN: Our arrival was rather unusual. We went by train from Vienna via Prague to Warsaw because I wanted to see something of that countryside but also because the embassy wanted us to escort in a shipment for the embassy commissary. In those days, we could ship anything we wanted to into Poland. Poles were very liberal in that respect. But we couldn't into Moscow. Some things we could get in; some things we couldn't. So, what we would do is, we would ship things from the Berlin commissary to Warsaw and then we would have a diplomatic traveler going into Moscow pick it up in Warsaw, go in by train, and this shipment would be in the baggage car as part of his personal effects going into Moscow. We were asked to go in via Warsaw and take in 6 tons of frozen meat for the embassy commissary. Part of that operation was, you had to observe the transfer at the border because at the border, the Polish trains were on European standard track and Russian trains were on Russian broadgauge track. At the border, they would take the train off to a railroad yard where they had a system where they would jack them up and take out the Polish wheels and put in the Russian wheels. But they didn't do that with the baggage car. They just pulled up to the baggage shed, which was right near the passenger depot. On one side of the baggage shed was European gauge and the other side was Russian gauge. You had to go there and visually make sure the boxes of meat were transferred.

Well, this was right when we landed troops in Lebanon. And the Russians decided to make an issue of it. When we were in Warsaw for about 3 days, the first big demonstration was held in front of our embassy. Khrushchev was really rattling his saber and suggesting that the Russians were not going to sit back and idly watch this take place. There was actually something of a genuine war scare. So, the embassy in Warsaw asked Moscow whether we should go ahead or hold back a while. Obviously, they needed their frozen meat. They said we should go. So we got on the train in Warsaw. When we got to the border, there was no incident. I watched them transfer the meat and we got back on the train. Now we were on a Russian train going from Brest on the border to Moscow, which was an overnight ride. The Russian trains in those days had loudspeakers in each of the cabins. We had a sleeping compartment. But you couldn't turn the loudspeaker all the way off. You could reduce the volume, but you could still hear it. We were getting all of this bellicose business about mobilization of Russian troops and "Americans must take their hands off Lebanon" sort of thing. Fortunately, my wife did not at that time understand Russian and I didn't tell her what I was hearing.

We arrived in Moscow at Belorussian Station - they had 6 or 7 stations in Moscow and this was the station that came in from the west from Poland - expecting to be met by the embassy. We were out at the end of a long platform. The Russian porters, who liked to work for the Americans because we'd give them some cigarettes and things like that, were there waiting because they knew that somebody was going to be on the train. So, we got off were there waiting because they knew that somebody was going to be on the train. So, we got off the train. We had at least 6 pieces of personal baggage and Peggy in her arrival suit with a little hat and everything. They unloaded everything, including the meat, in a pile on the platform and half a dozen Russian porters standing around waiting for the people from the embassy and nobody came from the embassy. We waited about 15 minutes and they still didn't come. So, I talked to the head porter and he said, "Don't worry. They'll be here." Another 15 minutes, they didn't come. So, I didn't know whether we were at war with Russia or not at that point. So, I said to my wife, "Why don't you stay here with our things?" I asked these guys, "Are there pay phones?" They said, "Oh, yes, there are pay phones up at the depot," which was at least 100 yards off. By this time, we were a lonely group at the end of the platform. Peggy stayed with the baggage and the porters, not terribly confident about her welfare. There were 2 pay phones. One was out of order and the other had a line of about 10 people waiting to use it. I thought, "This won't work," so I walked back again. It seemed like a week but it must have been 45 minutes to an hour before they finally came from the embassy, a sedan and a truck. In the truck were 4 Russian workers who worked for us. In the sedan there was a Russian driver. He was a building maintenance officer. I later on worked with him in GSO. A very nice but kind of excitable fellow named Ted Chariot. He got out and said, "Sorry we're late. We're having a little excitement in the embassy but don't worry about anything. Did you get the meat? Did you get the meat?" It turned out that the last traveler had somehow or other not watched the transaction at the border and they lost about 4 tons of frozen meat. He said, "Okay, you and your wife get in the car and the driver will take you back to the embassy. Don't worry about your baggage. I'll take care of that." We get into the car, the driver pulls up, pretty soon we're on the Koltso, this big 16 lane street that Stalin constructed. We get up near the embassy and I see the embassy slightly ahead of us. There must have been by that time 5,000 or more Russian demonstrators out in front of the embassy being held back by a couple hundred militiamen, including 40-50 on horseback. You could see that things had already started there. Noisy demonstration. So, I said to the driver, who didn't speak English (I remember his name was Tikho Mirov, which in Russian sort of means "quietly, peacefully")... I knew we had reservations in a hotel, so I said to him, "Mozhet' mi poyedim v gostinitzu? [Maybe it's better to go to the hotel and call the embassy]." He said, "Nyet, nyet, no, no. Everything will be alright." He just said, "Lock the doors and we'll be in the embassy soon." So, I told Peggy, "Don't worry about it. These people are here because they're told to be here. This is not a violent crowd and it'll be alright." He pulled up and lined himself up with the gate to the embassy and did a right angle turn and started nudging his car through the crowd. They started rocking the car a little bit and banging gently on the windows. Poor Peggy sort of looked at me. I said, "Don't worry. These people are not an angry crowd. They were trucked in from the factories and they're not going to do..." When we got up near the embassy, the police finally came out and opened the lane for us. We got up to the embassy gate and there were Marines behind the gate and they opened the gates, let us in, and closed the gates. People were there and said, "Welcome to Moscow."

Then we were taken up to a fourth floor apartment. About half of our apartments in those days were in the Tchaikovsky building. We were taken up to the fourth floor apartment of my boss for lunch. In the middle of lunch, an ink bottle came through the window. We could hear the loudspeakers outside saying, “Raz, dva, tri ruki protiv ot Liban. And 1, 2, 3, hands off Lebanon!” At a certain point, they gave them ink bottles and stones and all the small boys and young men were told to fire at the embassy. They started showering us with ink bottles and stones. We moved up to the seventh floor to the DCM’s apartment, where he had a television set. We were watching this process on television. Finally after a couple of hours, by that time, it had reached 80,000 people. The police said, “Okay, demonstration’s over. Everybody go home.” Most of the people went without any trouble, but there were some people whose adrenaline had got worked up in the frontlines. The police had to very gently push their horses into the crowd, moving them back until it was all dispersed. Something like 163 windows in our building were broken. Of course, the whole building was stained with ink. Many apartments, rugs, were stained.

Q: Wasn’t that the last time they used the ink?

SCANLAN: Yes, that was the last time. That was the last time there was ever a really violent demonstration.

Q: I guess the bill came in and they...

SCANLAN: Yes, the bill came in.

Q: Which is your responsibility.

SCANLAN: People were kind of exhausted after this day. It was 6:00 or 7:00 at night by then. We were put in an embassy car and sent to the Leningradsкая Gostinitza, one of these tall Gothic style high rise buildings that they had in Moscow. About 7 of them were gathered around the city. Two of them were hotels. Here we were, first night in Moscow. We were all alone in this cavernous room they gave us in the hotel. We didn’t sleep too comfortably. This was a Friday. The embassy in those days worked Saturdays. I went in. I found that we did have one empty apartment that we had just acquired in an area about 5 kilometers away, a place we called Prospekt Mira after the street, Peace Prospect. We had 20 units in that building. There were well over 100 diplomatic units that the Soviets had set up. We had about 20 where we had fixed up the apartments, linking 2, putting in our own appliances. We had 3 new small 1 bedroom apartments that we hadn’t fixed up. Everything was Russian. The stove was a crummy old gas stove. The sinks... We ultimately replaced all the stuff. I said, “Could we move into an apartment? It’s not very comfortable being in a hotel after that kind of arrival.” So, they agreed. We didn’t have much adequate furniture for it, but they took me out and showed it to me. There were no provisions for closets or drapes or anything. But we moved in enough stuff. We got some old drapes which we tacked up on the windows and we got one of these steel framed clothes hangars on wheels, which was our closet, and we got enough other furniture to furnish the place. That was our honeymoon pad for a couple of months. We gradually improved it, of course. We ultimately moved in to one-

Q: Who was the ambassador at that time?

SCANLAN: Llewellyn Thompson.

Q: How did he operate?

SCANLAN: Very professionally. Rather quiet, reserved individual. But a man who instilled confidence in you immediately. The Russians respected him, among other reasons because he had been there during World War II and had gone with the Russians when they evacuated their government to Kuibeshev. It was a “He was with us during the war” sort of thing. But he was very professional. Very good Russian. I liked him. I felt it was a great honor to begin my diplomatic career working for a man like that. Of course, I was way down in the staff. There were 3 first tour officers assigned: Byron Morton, Ed Horowitz, and myself. We had all entered the Foreign Service with rather strong Russian either in my case from academic Russian; in Bryan and Ed it was both from Army language school. We had all worked in INR before going to Moscow. We had all been in a couple of years and we all had third secretary jobs.

You mentioned the bill for this. I was involved a couple days later when the people came over from the support part of the Russian foreign ministry. It was called UPDK, the administration for providing support services to the diplomatic corps. You literally couldn’t buy a nail in Moscow without going through them. It was that tightly controlled. But they came over. I remember walking through with them. We ran the bill up as much as we could. It really cost them a lot of money to repair our embassy. They accepted the responsibility for doing it. It was all done.

Q: Did they ever make any comments about who the son of a bitch was that handed out the ink bottles?

SCANLAN: No, no, no.

Q: One of the interesting things would be that your job probably put you in closer contact with the Soviets than really the political officers, who were stuck with Reading Izvestia and Pravda.

SCANLAN: You’re right. I didn’t recognize it immediately because I got involved in a lot of mundane things that probably later on helped me out when I bought my first home. I was supervising plumbers, electricians, carpenters, the char force, painters, what have you. We had 80 housing units. I was the only Russian language speaking officer on the administrative staff. I was out on the street a lot, more than in the embassy. I was out doing customs clearance, negotiating with the UPDK, where the people didn’t speak English. I had a great opportunity to practice my Russian at very practical levels. It was great. I was out in the city more dealing with Russians at various levels. There were certain things they let us do. If we wanted to get a batch of furniture reupholstered or something like that, UPDK would say, “Fine, you can use 1 of 2 or 3 shops.” They’d facilitate it and then we’d go and deal directly with people. I had some fascinating conversations on many occasions with Russians who would get to know me. It was great. From that point of view, it was marvelous. Also from the point of view of learning an awful lot about electricity, plumbing, carpentry, and what have you, which served me well several years later when we bought our first house in Falls Church and I became a harried homeowner.

Q: Did you get the feeling that UPDK was trying to give you a rough time?

SCANLAN: Yes. You could measure the state of our relations. When our relations were good, it was very easy to deal with them. We could get anything we wanted that was available. Of course, that was a measure right there. They were friendly, they were helpful, they were responsive when things were going well. When our relations were bad, when there were incidents of various kinds, it was like pulling teeth to get even the most modest type of need fulfilled. That was true in general in Moscow in those days. There were not very many tourists there. There was a very small western presence. There were no western businesses. There was a fairly sizable corps of foreign correspondents, but they were all subject to censorship. They couldn't file stories without going through censorship. And if they violated that, they would be expelled. The Russians had it very well controlled. There were fewer diplomatic missions then and they were smaller. On the one hand, there was a tight foreign community. On the other hand, there was a sense of doing something very important because you were a small presence in an alien world. The other good thing about it was, there were so few of us there that you could go to the Bolshoi Theater on a moment's notice and it probably only cost you about $1.50. What was there was available, 6 really quite good restaurants. I liked the Russian theaters because my Russian was quite good and you could go anytime you wanted to go. Now, I understand that not only does it cost $50-60 or more to go to a Bolshoi, but you maybe get to go twice in a tour or something like that. There were advantages and disadvantages to being there during the height of the Cold War.

Q: As GSO, you were part of the cadre. What was your impression of the American Russian service?

SCANLAN: I was very impressed. I felt very fortunate to be associated with those people. They were a very impressive lot. I thought my Russian was very serviceable and quite good, but I stood in awe of some that were in my view much better, including Ambassador Thompson, people like Lou Bowden, Vlad Toumanoff, Harry Barnes. And not just the language but their understanding, their knowledge, their background. They were impressive people. They helped give me the inspiration to try to measure up to what I perceived them to be doing, although in fact, I probably had the advantage of being out on the street more and out among ordinary Russians more than anyone. They traveled quite a bit. In those days when you traveled everything had to be approved by the Russians in advance. A third of the country at least was out of bounds. You couldn't go more than 50 kilometers from the center of Moscow without permission. And they would give you permission or deny it at the last minute. They made all the reservations for you, the hotels, the trains, every place you went you had to have an Intourist guide. Of course, the Intourist guide was actually KGB. They followed you.

They worked all 3 of the junior officers into travel programs. It was a fairly small embassy and you couldn't travel alone. Frequently a political officer would come to see one of us working in another section and say, "I want to take such and such a trip. I need somebody to go. Could you go with me?" You'd ask your boss if he'd let you off. I took several trips with people in the political section. One fascinating trip was with our cultural counselor, who you'd call a PAO today, when I went with him to 5 cities in Central Asia. It was the first time he got permission to visit universities in that part of the Soviet Union. We went on a 2 week trip and visited 5 Central Asian universities.

Q: What was your impression of the situation in Central Asia at that time? Was there any knowledge or interest in the United States that you found?

SCANLAN: They controlled your contact very much. We were dealing almost exclusively with English speaking university professors, mainly English departments in universities. We would always have the usual formal meeting with the rector, maybe his deputy. They'd maybe entertain us on 1 occasion or another. The only students we were able to have contact with were students of the English language. My impression at that time was that there was a great deal of segregation in education there between the Central Asians and the Russians even in the English department. We noticed this in places like Frunze (now Bishkek), in Alma-Ata (now Almaty), Samarkand... There would be a Russian language university and an Uzbek language university. There was a great deal of segregation. We also noticed that the students of English tended to be much better in the Russian universities than in the Central Asian universities. You really got the impression of the colonial presence of Russians in those countries, probably a little bit less in Uzbekistan because there weren't as many Russians there. But by and large, you got that impression that this was a colonial empire. The Russians had brought technical modernization and some other things there, but by and large, they were the colonial masters. You clearly got that impression. All the important officials seemed to be Russian. I was there last summer to visit my son who was in the embassy in Kyrgyzstan. Now it's quite the opposite, the senior officials are mostly Kyrgyz.

Q: On these trips, were you harassed at all by the KGB?

SCANLAN: There were incidents. I never was. We were clearly followed and sometimes very obviously followed even though we were assigned an Intourist guide. But the Intourist guide wouldn't be with us all the time. You'd walk around the city and be by yourself when you weren't going on official programs. But you always had a sense of being followed. Sometimes it was very obvious. One time I went with Bob Owen, a political officer, head of the internal part of the political section, to Gorky. Then we went by train from Gorky to a place called Penze. Gorky has now reverted to its own name [Nizhniy Novgorod]. In Gorky we were followed very obviously, almost humorously. They'd keep changing their headgear. We used to call it the Comical Hats Program. The same people were following us all the time. Then we went by train to Penze. On the train we met a fellow in our compartment from Penze who was very friendly. I think he was legitimate. He invited us to his apartment in Penze, wanted us to come and visit him. He had been in the Red Army right at the end of World War II and he claimed he had met some American soldiers. He didn't speak more than a few words of English, but he remembered this experience fondly. My recollection is that he was an engineer or something. He had an apartment in the center of Penze. So, we were in Penze 2 or 3 days and we debated whether or not we should go. He hadn't set a time for us to go. He had given us the address. We were to come by in the evening to have hors d'oeuvres and a drink. Finally we decided to risk it, not for ourselves, but we didn't want to get him in trouble. We thought, "Well, he asked us. Maybe he is KGB." We went to his apartment and he and his wife received us. They were extremely nervous the whole evening. We were only there a couple of hours. They were friendly enough but they were very nervous. We concluded that the KGB had observed us on the train and had told him, "Okay, go ahead with this, but we'll be watching you and this is a black mark." But it was that controlled in those days. In 2 years, I was in 3 Russian apartments. Every situation was rather similar to that. On the other 2 cases, Russians insisted on taking me to their apartments, both in Moscow. In both cases, I said, "You probably shouldn't be doing this." I was a little nervous that it might have been a provocation. It wasn't. It was just some Russian that thought he had more freedom than he had. But it was that tight in those days.

Q: Although you weren't working the political angle, you were one of the group. What was the impression during this '58-'60 period of Khrushchev?

SCANLAN: It was a period where it looked like there was going to be an opening to better relations. In the summer of 1959, Nixon visited Moscow. We had the exchange of exhibits, the big American exhibit in Sokolniki Park in July 1959. The Soviets had a big exhibit in New York. Nixon visited Moscow. It was sort of an opening. Khrushchev's deputy went to the United States. Then there were plans made for an Eisenhower visit to Moscow which was to have taken place in June 1960. I think our initial view of Khrushchev was that he was something of a buffoon. On the other hand, he had made that famous destalinization speech to the 20th Congress. So, there was something to him. On the other hand, some of his behavior was either oafish or just bizarre in a way. He would buy on to slogans like "You can grow corn anywhere." We used to jokingly refer to him as "King Corn." Slogans like "Anywhere you can grow wheat, you can also grow corn." This slogan was widely displayed on billboards. He was trying to move Russia into being a more dynamic, more productive society. We didn't recognize right away some of the things that we now recognize, that he was maybe premature but was trying to do... It was early detente. We didn't call it "detente" at the time. He was genuine in this. But initially we regarded him as a buffoon.

Then from the summer of '59 on until the U2 in May of '60, relations warmed up considerably. We had 2 or 3 minor incidents, but by and large relations warmed up. It looked like we were going to really move forward in relations. We then regarded Khrushchev as a liberal force in the Soviet sense.

Ambassador Thompson developed a very good relationship with Khrushchev on Khrushchev's trip to the United States.

Q: Had that taken place while you were in Moscow?

SCANLAN: Yes, it took place... Nixon came to Moscow in July of 1957. Khrushchev went to the United States that fall or early in '60. Thompson accompanied him on that trip. Americans sometimes behave in strange ways. When Khrushchev went to Los Angeles, he wanted to see Hollywood and Disneyland. Hollywood... He was offended by the way they treated him in Hollywood.

Q: Spurrors got up and made a big speech about-

SCANLAN: Spurrors made a big speech-

Q: About making it big in America.

SCANLAN: That's right, about what he had done as a Greek. Then they had these can can dancers. Then he was told he couldn't go to Disneyland because it hadn't been in the initial plan and we couldn't guarantee security. The reporters were beginning to be beastly at that time, too. He went into a supermarket... We were kind of throwing American affluence in his face. "Look how good we've got it." There were some good moments when he was at the Garst Farm in Iowa and things like that. But Los Angeles was bad and it looked like the trip was really going to turn out badly.

It was at this point when Thompson spent a lot of time with him. They went by train from Los Angeles to San Francisco. Thompson calmed him down and worked with the mayor of San Francisco, Christopher, and got things back on track and came back to Moscow feeling that he had developed a good relationship with Khrushchev, as indeed he had. From that point on, even after U2 when there was a freeze of a month or so and the cancellation of the Eisenhower visit, as long as Thompson was in Moscow, he had a pretty good relationship with Khrushchev. As a matter of fact, later on in the '61-'62 period, when we got over the U2 thing, Thompson and his family used to go out to Khrushchev's dacha as his personal guest. We developed great respect for Khrushchev.

Q: You were there during the U2 thing.

SCANLAN: Right.

Q: Did things get tense at that point?

SCANLAN: Very much so, yes. It really hit us by surprise. It happened on May 1. There was a famous photographer for "Life Magazine" who had been assigned to Moscow a year or so before that. He and his charming wife and 2 kids lived in a suite in the National Hotel, which had a great view of Red Square, looking right into Red Square. He invited a group of people to a May 1st party to watch the parade from his apartment. Carl Mayden was his name. Very nice person. We were among those invited. Others invited were Clifton Daniels and his wife, Margaret Truman, who were visiting Moscow at the time, and a lot of the press corps – Max Frankel, lots of others. We were fortunate to have been invited. We were all watching this thing. I was taking movies. The start of the parade was delayed for about an hour. I had a telescopic lense on my camera, one of those old 8 millimeter cameras with a turret. I had this on telescopic focused on the mausoleum when the Marshall of the Red Army came up and reported to Khrushchev and the others and they looked like they were in some sort of animated conversation. Then the parade went on.

We didn't know what had happened. We didn't find out until Saturday or Sunday. There was a meeting of the Supreme Soviets a couple days later. It was at that meeting that Khrushchev announced from the podium the shootdown of the U2. Thompson attended. I was in the embassy when he came back. He was furious. Thompson was a very calm, quiet, very well mannered person who rarely showed emotion. But I just happened to be in the elevator when he came back and he was obviously very upset. I wasn't in the meeting with him after that, but I was told that what upset him so much was the fact that Washington had not told him. He found out about that at that meeting. He was terribly embarrassed. He was subsequently called in by the Soviets and read the riot act to them. Of course, the Eisenhower visit was canceled. We had had a month of beautiful preparation. We had had a series of events, parties, we had brought in all kinds of things, including a beautiful fiberglass motor launch on a trailer which was going to be Eisenhower's gift to Khrushchev and it had on the dashboard a brass plate that said something like "From the President of the United States, Dwight D. Eisenhower, to the Chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Soviet Union, Nikita Sergeyevich Khrushchev on the occasion of the former's visit to the latter in June." This brass plate was on it. Later on, we got instructions from Washington to remove the brass plate and send it back by diplomatic pouch because they didn't want to be embarrassed by having this brass plate. Then we wanted to keep the boat to use at our dacha. There was a nice little river and a small artificial lake near our dacha. We were told, "No, you have to send the boat out. Again, it could be an embarrassment to have that boat." It was under canvas. We had brought it in by air. So, we had to send it back out. I guess we sent it out by rail. Things got chilly pretty fast then after that and remained chilly for the remainder of our tour. We left in July.

Q: How did you and your wife find the social life in Moscow at this time?

SCANLAN: It was totally controlled from the Soviet side. You had very little social contact with the Soviets. You could invite 50 people and maybe 2-4 would come. And only officials would come. It was a little bit better during that honeymoon period between Khrushchev's visit to the United States and the U2. But usually either controlled official presences or cultural people who were involved in cultural exchange. We began to get invited to more things by the Russians, usually musicales or receptions in honor of cultural exchanges. Leonard Bernstein came with the New York Philharmonic. But as far as informal home entertainment, it was almost exclusively the diplomatic corps and other resident foreigners, which meant the press corps. That was your social life. But it was pretty lively, maybe sometimes too lively, with 6 or more events a week. We were never bored.

Q: Were the Soviets into foreign students at that time?

SCANLAN: The first student exchange agreement was formalized with the Russians in the fall of 1958. I was at a reception in the DCM's apartment where this was anointed and toasted. The people who had come from Washington to negotiate it and their Soviet counterparts were there. In those days, we never said "Russian." We always said "Soviet." I remember vividly that reception. We were invited. It was kind of nice being the youngest people in the embassy because they usually invited us to anything that had to do with youth or students. It was a formal agreement. The exchange was supposed to be 20 for 20. It was a graduate student exchange. The following year, the first group of Americans came, maybe not even 20. But most of the Americans were at the University of Moscow. There were 2 or 3 that were in other places. Among those that came, we became close friends with Bill and Heidi Shinn. A year or 2 after that, Bill joined the Foreign Service and had a very good career. Unfortunately, he came down with Parkinsons and had to leave right at the time when we thought he was going to move onward and upward probably to ambassadorial level. But Bill and Heidi were in that first group of American students. They were from Minnesota. I'm from Minnesota. So we developed a good friendship then.

Q: How about foreign students? Did you get any feel of how foreign students were being treated?

SCANLAN: There were a lot of African students there. They had this Patrice Lumumba University. Some of the African students seemed to feel pleased that they were there and others seemed to feel that they weren't being treated very well. We did on occasion see some of these African students, particularly those who were unhappy and hoped that they could go to the United States instead of staying in the Soviet Union. But by and large we didn't see much of foreign students there.

SCANLAN: Yes. There was one noteworthy incident even during that freeze period which was rather interesting because of something else. I was embassy duty officer sometime in mid-June, 1960. It was a Russian holiday, I think Constitution Day. I got a call from a doctor in a small town named Gzhatsk, which was out west of Moscow in the direction of Minsk and Poland, maybe 150 miles west of Moscow. This Russian doctor wanted to tell us about 2 Americans who had been in an automobile accident near Gzhatsk. He had them in his hospital. He said, "Our conditions aren't adequate to take care of them. I'm taking care of them in my office, where I can give them better treatment. They've had a lot of facial cuts, nothing serious. They're ambulatory. But couldn't you come and take them off my hands?" I said, "Well, have you spoken to Intourist?" There was no Intourist in Gzhatsk, but they had called Intourist in Smolenski and they were entirely unresponsive. He said the Americans had been traveling by car from Warsaw to Moscow on their honeymoon and had missed a turn or come off a sharp turn or something and they had gone airborne and landed in a ditch. I said, "Well, I'll see what we can do." I didn't want to be caught in an incident of any kind. Frankly, it was one of those days when practically everyone was gone in the embassy, the ambassador, the DCM, the admin. officer. I had to make decisions on my own. I called our embassy doctor, an Air Force captain. Then I called back and talked to this guy. I had him put the American on. He put the American on and he told me what the situation was. He said, "It's pretty primitive here." He gave me his passport number. It sounded legitimate. So, we decided to give it a try. I called the foreign ministry and told them the situation, asked them to verify it. They verified it and said they would give me permission to go. Our Air Force captain, since he was a military attaché, had to go through the military channel. He got permission.

We both jumped in an embassy sedan. I drove 3 hours to Gzhatsk. We were tailed very closely all the way. We got to Gzhatsk. Talk about squalor, a miserable town, muddy red streets, wooden and log cabin houses, a few brick buildings but in bad shape. We were directed to the hospital. It was a sprawling partly wood, partly brick place. We went in and the doctor's office was decent but the rest of the building smelled of urine and stale bandages and it was really pretty bad. The doctor turned out to be a young fellow in his late 20s who spoke fairly good German. I should have said these Americans spoke reasonably good German, the man in particular. The Americans were mid-20s probably. The reason they had been going to Moscow on their honeymoon was that his parents were of Russian Jewish origin from Moscow and he wanted to go back. They didn't speak any Russian. So, we agreed to take them back, but first we had to go out on the edge of town to arrange to get their car hauled to Moscow. It was right near a collective farm office. We went into this meeting in this really modest meeting room of the collective farm with the chairman of the farm and 6 of his board members and we negotiated. It seems now improbable that you could have done it in those days but we negotiated for 1 of their trucks to take this car to Moscow at a certain price that the American had said he would pay to take it into the American embassy garage. It wasn't that badly banged up. A little sports car, a convertible. The chairman of the collective farm said he'd been out by the highway and he saw the accident. He said, "They took off like angels and landed like the devil." Then we even watched them load the car. In order to load the car, they had to angle the truck into a ditch so that the back of the truck would be at the level of the car and they pushed it up onto the truck. They took off for Moscow and we went back and picked up these 2 Americans. We got about half way to Moscow and we came across the truck by the edge of the highway. We wondered what was going on. They were washing the truck. They said, "Oh, Moscow. 100 rubles fine if you've got a dirty truck or a dirty car." We said, "You know where to take it?" They said, "Yes, the American embassy address." The whole thing worked beautifully. We took these people in. Our doctor took care of them for a couple of days and then they put them on a train back and arranged to have their car fixed up and shipped out. But remember the miserable, squalid town? Unbelievable. Shortly thereafter, the first space flight was by a man named Yuri Gagarin. I read his biography. He was born in Gzhatsk. I thought to myself, "What a contrast. This miserable, squalid town produces the first man in space." That is the contrast of Soviet society. You had all of the assets put into the military industrial complex. They can produce things like that and they would still have in the second half of the 20th century these miserable squalid towns in European Russia, not in Central Asia. I tell this story only because of the Gagarin part. But the other part of it was interesting, too. When I wrote up the report of it, Harry Barnes, who by that time was back in Washington on the Soviet desk, wrote me a nice little note of "Congratulations. You took pretty good initiative. That was the right thing to do. But I'm amazed that they let you do it."

Political Officer
Moscow (1958-1960)

Vladimir Toumanoff was born in Constantinople in 1923 to Russian parents. He attended Harvard University and joined the Foreign Service in 1950. He served in several posts including Germany, Iceland, Moscow, and Canada. He was interviewed by William D. Morgan in 1999.

Q: This would have been, then, September, roughly, of 1958.

TOUMANOFF: That's right, August or September. I was surprised as I had not finished my tour in Frankfurt, but delighted because service in Moscow had been my goal from the start. Remember, to make some contribution to the course of U.S.-Russian relations was the main reason I sought to join the Service.

So I arrive in Moscow, and it comes to me as an extraordinary surprise in a number of ways. One was that having grown up in a Russian family after the Revolution and knowing how profound the changes had been since then, what extraordinary traumas the society had gone through, and the insistence by the Government and the Communist Party that it was remolding everything, destroying the old and remolding entirely the Czarist society, all its institutions, its mores, values, and its very people, I expected to recognize very little from what I had lived with, had learned by living with my parents and their Russian friends, all of whom had grown up under the Czars, before the revolution. I was astounded at how familiar it all was, that except for a certain coarseness in the language, a certain loss of vocabulary and introduction of much bureaucratic slang, the Russian language had changed very little.

Q: And Russian culture, despite the inordinate attempt to change it.

TOUMANOFF: Body language had not changed. Facial expressions had not changed. Forms of humor had not changed. There was really remarkably little of the impact I had expected after nearly 50 years of Soviet power and unbelievable traumas and human sacrifice. It was astounding to me how little the communist experience had changed the people. That was one major surprise. So I found myself being taken for a fellow Soviet. Except for my foreign clothes, I did not stand out as an alien in spite of the enormous and shocking differences in the physical appearance and amenities between Russia and America.

Those were a second surprise, as anyone who visited Russia in the late '50s will attest. Materially, even Moscow was a different civilization, to say nothing of the condition of the rest of the country. The people impoverished, stunted and too often maimed or crippled. Structures, except for Stalinist showpieces, worn out, shabby to slum-like, neglected and crumbling, with huge identical poorly built "new" apartment blocks already breaking down. Crowds and lines everywhere seeking scarce or nonexistent goods. Truly appalling, backward working conditions. And with all that a stalwart, energetic, intelligent, kindly and humorous people, looking aged ahead of their years.

I thought I would be a Rip Van Winkle, that the place would have changed to such an extent that I wouldn't understand it, and it wouldn't understand me. And that was simply not true. Incidentally, I had no relatives or parental friends in Russia. They were wiped out or escaped.

Q: Oh, we should have raised that earlier. That's very important.

TOUMANOFF: Yes, it is. Because had I any relatives or friends, they would have been targeted by the KGB and used against me.

Q: For the record, Helen Semler, Peter Semler and his wife, who were with me in Moscow in 1962-64, was told that they could not go on assignment to the USSR., because of her family back in Russia. But she got it overruled, and the policy ultimately changed. She was the first one to enter, I was told, that had family there.

TOUMANOFF: Good for her.

Q: Now it wasn't the Officer. It was the spouse, but still.

TOUMANOFF: Another surprise was how quickly an event occurred which showed me that the place was not all that friendly, or all that easy to navigate in. The first day in the Embassy, I said to myself, Great Scott, here I am in Moscow! And I went out for a walk, just to look around and soak up the reality that I really was in Moscow, with all the associations the name of that city had for me. And I hadn't gotten a block and a half from the Embassy when I heard footsteps behind me, which quickened when I quickened and slowed when I did, several times. When they were very close behind as I approached an intersection, I turned as I came to the curbstone, to the person who was just behind me at my shoulder and asked, in Russian, whether there was something I could do for them. The individual was rather taken aback, but in very short order it turned out that he was a Yugoslav. He had been incarcerated at some point, jailed or in a Gulag, had been finally amnestied or released having served his term, and he wanted to escape from the country. As a former prisoner, however, he had no right to visit Moscow. He had waited in a barber shop across the street from the Embassy until he saw someone who was obviously an American, or at least a foreigner, dressed in foreign clothing, come out. He hoped an American diplomat could help him escape.

Q: But couldn't do it immediately in front of the embassy or try to enter. The Soviet guard would stop him and it would probably result in his re-arrest.

TOUMANOFF: That's right. He could see the two uniformed and armed Soviet guards, one on each side of the entrance. Moreover, the barber shop may easily have been a KGB observation post to see and record who went in and out. But in his innocence he probably didn't realize that I, as was every American diplomat, was probably being followed by the security "organs" at some distance back. I explained to him that I was an American, in the American diplomatic service, and that my purpose in being in Moscow was not to worsen relations between the United States and Russia but rather, if possible, to improve them, and that even if that were not my purpose and duty, I certainly was not in a position to help him in any conceivable way. I suggested he go to his own, Yugoslav, Embassy, which he rejected in disgust because they would just turn him over to the Soviet police. I then told him that I was probably being followed by the KGB and that he would probably be picked up when he left me. His earlier manner and now obvious terror convinced me that he was genuine, and not a Soviet plant calculated to trap me on my first outing. So I suggested he say he had asked me directions to the post office, I would point down the side street toward the center of town, and we should part. Which we did. I crossed the street and after a few steps looked back. He was already surrounded by several men forcing him against his struggles into the back of a large black car. I did not stop to watch and walked on. They must have driven up quite close behind us as we talked on that corner.

Q: You'd been there only one day.

TOUMANOFF: First day, and first walk on Moscow's streets. That was the first episode which started to tune my radar pretty finely in terms of what to expect. It was not to be the last. But more about that later on.

Q: This is a real experience, versus the briefing you got from security and so forth.

TOUMANOFF: Exactly. I hadn't anticipated that it would happen so soon. I thought I'd have a certain amount of time to acclimatize and get my radar tuned and develop the street smarts that one simply has to have in any city.

Q: Okay, let's back up just a bit. You were assigned to the embassy in Moscow in September, '58, because of this PNG situation. To what position were you assigned?

TOUMANOFF: Second Secretary, Political Officer in External. The Political Section had an "internal" and "external" Sections.

Q: Okay, and how many were there in that section? Could you give us a slight snippet of the atmosphere at that point and who was in charge, so we know the names of the individuals?

TOUMANOFF: Llewellyn Thompson was the ambassador. The Political Counselor, David Marks was PNG'd shortly after I arrived, and Boris Klosson came to replace him. Under him were two Sections of three Officers each, The Internal Section under Robert I. Owen covered Soviet domestic politics, and the External under Ralph Jones, with Francis Meehan and myself covered Soviet international relations.

Q: You had an area of the world that you-

TOUMANOFF: No, there were too few of us for that. Essentially the assignment was that all of us looked quickly, when we first arrived in the morning, through the incoming and outgoing telegrams from the previous 24 hours, and scanned the main Soviet newspapers. These were normally Pravda (the Party paper), Izvestia (the Government), and either Trud (labor) or Sel'skaya Zhizn' (agriculture), and occasionally Krasnaya Zvezda (the military) although the Service Attaches could be relied on for that. I think we divided up the newspapers, but not consistently. We would then meet with the Political Counselor to decide and assign drafting duty among us for anything important enough to warrant a separate cable to the Department. All else worth reporting would be covered and drafted by one of us in a daily round-up cable called the 'presstel.' That was usually a pretty dull chore calling for little if any comment. For press items warranting any extensive comment, we would quickly draft cables to Washington describing the item and adding our interpretation of its significance. For example "The lead editorial in today's Pravda claims the U.S. Government intends to... This new accusation expands on the earlier (Embtel #) intended primarily to cause public concern in the NATO nations over U.S. nuclear weapons policy in advance of the resumption of arms negotiations scheduled next month."

Q: You had a kind of informal list of what you should keep your eyes out for, in terms of Washington's interest.

TOUMANOFF: Nothing formal. The list would have been too long by far, or updated all the time. focus was the purpose of the daily meeting of both sections with Boris Klosson, who reviewed and edited our cables before they were sent.

Q: The "presstel," was probably unclassified, in terms of comments.

TOUMANOFF: The presstel was probably Official Use Only, unless there was some comment in it, as was usual in the separate cables, in which case the comment would define the classification. For example, "There has been no public comment yet from either Beijing or Moscow on the Secretary's announcement last week that... The presence in Moscow of the Chinese Foreign Minister suggests that the topic may be sensitive and coordination of positions awkward," would warrant a higher classification. Once the press coverage was out of the way, we worked on all sorts of other reporting tasks, visiting delegations, negotiations, preparing diplomatic notes, consulting with other diplomatic colleagues, attending public agitprop (agitation and propaganda) lectures, traveling, etc.

Q: Do you want to add in here comments on travel, how you took it, how you arranged it, or is that to be later?

TOUMANOFF: As you know, Bill, from your own experience, very large parts of the Soviet Union, including even parts of Moscow, were closed, off limits to diplomats, especially American diplomats. For the rest, if you wanted to travel at any distance outside of 25 kilometers, I believe it was, from the center of Moscow, you had to have special permission from the Foreign Ministry, whether it was 26 kilometers or someplace way out to the other end of the entire country. So you'd send a note to the Foreign Ministry saying that so-and-so, an officer of the embassy, requests permission to travel on the following itinerary, route and conveyance. Ordinarily that was allowed, sometimes with some emendations by the Foreign Ministry, and if you got this permission, off you went. You didn't even ask to go to places that were closed. We always traveled in pairs, together.

Q: Like nuns.

TOUMANOFF: Well, mainly because a single American diplomat traveling alone would be more vulnerable, more apt to be set up as a target for some sort of provocation or incident, or simply to provide instant assistance and witness in case of accident or illness.

I should recount several incidents. Reasonably frequently, permission for travel would be denied, and I think the one that I found most amusing was that one of our officers had served in the Forestry Service of the U.S. Park Department. He requested permission to go to an "open" Soviet National Park, of which there were many, this one someplace in the Caucasus, I believe. The answer came back refusing permission because that national park was "Closed for repair," which suggested that while officially "open" further requests would be unavailing.

Speaking of Diplomatic Notes. Not specifically for travel, but to give you an idea of the working relations, for the most part at the routine level, with the Soviet Government. Regularly, late in the day on Christmas Eve and on New Year's Eve, the embassy would receive a gigantic diplomatic note running to 15-20 pages and full of nothing much, indeed nothing but the current, routine, standard propaganda boilerplate. The intention, clearly, was to spoil some officer's, or maybe even a couple of officers' Christmas Eve or New Year's Eve, because the Foreign Ministry knew that the moment any diplomatic note arrived duty officers would have to go in to translate it and to prepare and send a cable to Washington with the translation. At that end some other officer would have to come in to the Department to read the cable and decide if it warranted prompt attention from some senior official.

Q: Even though you know it's trash and done for an irritation?

TOUMANOFF: Right, our standing instructions were to read, translate and send to the Department any Note from the Soviet Government. This was just a calculated annoyance, a form of mild harassment.

Q: Anti-religious, perhaps.

TOUMANOFF: Well, perhaps so, but I read or translated several of those, and I never found one that had anything other than the very, very familiar kind of stuff that you read a week or two weeks earlier in an editorial in some newspaper. We didn't retaliate in kind, perhaps because the U.S. set a higher value on diplomatic notes than the Soviets, and didn't want to cheapen ours.

I should go back and talk about what travel was like. It was rather exceptional on several counts.

One had to do with the change in U.S.-Soviet relations during the period of my tour in Moscow, that is 1958-1960. About the time I arrived in Moscow there was some minor problem going on, I think it was over Berlin, but I'm not sure. In any case relations were a little strained, and standard anti-American propaganda was raised to match. Whatever was the problem, it ended quickly. And then, quite rapidly, the great Khrushchev thaw came into effect, and relations improved markedly. A number of exchange agreements were negotiated, (remind me to tell you about one such) including arrangements for the great American exhibition, and for the exchange of visits by Khrushchev and Eisenhower. "Peace and Friendship" and "The Spirit of Camp David" became the new, overwhelming Soviet propaganda slogans. All that has been thoroughly documented in books and articles. What is not so well known is that the bars against contact between Soviet citizens and foreigners, particularly Americans, including American diplomats, suddenly came tumbling down. They didn't vanish by explicit direction from Moscow. They vanished more by the radical change in the atmospherics, the suddenly favorable propaganda treatment of the United States. The Soviet public, which for some half century had been starved of contact with foreigners, with the West and most especially the U.S., by every means up to and including mortal threat, simply stampeded out of the corral.

In my travels and in Moscow, I met many Russians and other Soviet citizens, mostly by chance, and even developed a few genuine friends. A couple of perhaps important observations. One is that in all these random contacts not once did I encounter anger, antagonism or hostility toward the U.S. On the contrary, in spite of the intense efforts by the Communist Party and Soviet Government since at least 1900 to alienate the population from America, there was profound skepticism about the official image ("we know they lie to us"), great hunger for reliable information, eager curiosity about all aspects of America, and a vast reservoir of admiration and good will. Almost frighteningly so: Firstly because much of the admiration tended to be exaggerated in wishful contrast to their own brutally hard half-century; and secondly I heard often enough, and in unlikely places busily fixing up, cleaning up, and painting, "Maybe your President Eisenhower will come here on his visit. If he does we will give him a welcome such as no Soviet leader has ever had!" If I was hearing this often, the KGB must have been picking it up in spades. I'm persuaded that Khrushchev's anti-Stalin liberalization, and this turn towards the U.S. resulted in a widespread Public reaction which was read by Soviet authorities as a dangerously spreading loss of control. Unless contained and reversed, I think they feared, correctly, that it could accelerate and grow to torch them, the Party, and the nation. That fear, I believe, contributed to the Soviet extreme reaction to the U-2 incident, and ultimately (together with much else) to Khrushchev's fall and the Brezhnevite clamp down at home and in Eastern Europe. That may seem to some a very long bow for me to draw. But I would cite in support of my view the invasion of Czechoslovakia as prompted in large part by fear of domestic contagion from the "Prague Spring," as well as the later spontaneous collapse of Soviet control of Eastern Europe.

On a personal level, travel for me was unusual on several counts. In the first place, of course, was the general feeling among Russians that contact with Americans was now safe, indeed, seemingly encouraged by the official line. Random contact was easy to make, indeed, sometimes it was initiated by Russians. With my very Russian name, and because I spoke without an accent, they would take me for a Russian, sort of pulling their leg. That was dangerous for us, as the KGB was still following American diplomats, and would usually question the Soviet after we separated. I did not wish for the KGB to think I was trying to pass for a Russian. So, early in any conversation I would explain that I was not a Russian, that I was an American, an American diplomat, and that I worked in the United States embassy in Moscow. Most often the caution didn't last and after a bit they would say "Okay, fine, but you're not really an American; at heart you're really one of us." and I'd be accepted and the talk would turn unconstrained. Occasionally I'd repeat the caution, promptly disregarded.

Q: My comparable experience was I was always identified as a Latvian, Lithuanian, or Estonian, because I was dressed a little bit differently from the Soviets, even though the others were Soviets, and secondly I had this funny accent in Russian.

TOUMANOFF: Well, I tended to wear some native clothes, by preference, especially in winter, some of it suited the climate or the wear and tear of travel better. But that was not of any great significance, because over all I was obviously a foreigner. The result, however, was some very candid conversations. Outside of Moscow talking with an American fluent in Russian who knew enough about life in the USSR not to be surprised, was almost always a first-in-a-lifetime experience, not to be missed. They were so hungry for such contact. All telephone calls from and to the embassy passed through a Soviet operator, and were, of course tapped and recorded. Russians knew that. It seems hard to believe in retrospect that my office phone would ring and it would be somebody I had met on a trip, or a Muscovite saying, "Here I am in town. Let's have lunch, or dinner. Let's go to a concert. Even, as happened once " I've just finished building my new apartment, I'm having a housewarming. Come with your wife and join the party."

TOUMANOFF: Well, it wasn't, for the most part. I can tell you about how plants worked and how you recognized them. After you had established a measure of friendship the next time you met your friend, an "old wartime comrade" would show up and would be introduced, somewhat awkwardly. Your friend would fade away, usually not to be seen again, while the newcomer would try to substitute. Or a friend, after a while would have some forced question or two to insert into our conversation, easily recognized by content or manner as planted. My tendency was to provide an equally obvious, plausible but worthless reply. That done and out of the way, we would resume with relief our natural relationship. But it was a signal that before too long the friend would be told to end the relationship.

Q: How fortunate you were.

TOUMANOFF: Yes, and of course. But all of that came to a crashing end with the shoot-down of the U-2. The telephone stopped ringing. My Russian friends and acquaintances were totally silent, not to be found. And even random contacts were shunned. I didn't even really try as I, like every Russian, read the strident denunciations of America as a clear signal that contact with Americans was again highly dangerous.

Q: Do you think they were told to, or do you think-

TOUMANOFF: They didn't need to be told. They read the Russian media coverage. They read the total change in the tone of the relationship with Khrushchev, vilifying the United States and the President, calling off Eisenhower's proposed visit, making a tremendous scene in Paris. It was one of those wonderful demonstrations of how sensitive the Russian public is to stark changes of official direction. It was okay, "Peace and Friendship" meant you could have American friends, but as the whole tone of the official line coming out of Moscow, and all the press, turned 180 degrees, so, of course, did the Soviet public, and marched in the opposite direction.

Q: The reversal was dramatic.

TOUMANOFF: The reverse signal came out with the shoot-down of the U-2, and everybody read it, and all of a sudden, all of that friendship was cut off. Once again, it was dangerous to be in contact with Americans - which was back to normal.

With one exception, Bill, and this might be of some interest. The telephone did ring. I was due to leave Moscow in the, let's see, it would have been late summer of 1960. This was just... The U-2 was shot down on May Day of 1960, and the trial had already been held. (I attended the trial, and I'll talk about that later.) But the telephone rang one day in the embassy, and it was one of my friends, who was a good friend. He had come out and stayed with us for a weekend in the American embassy dacha, and whom I had been instrumental in helping during the Nixon visit. He was a journalist, photographer. He had asked me to help him have some contact with the U.S. delegation and Soviet escorts when we were in Central Asia so that he could get a story and some photographs.

Q: For whom did he work?

TOUMANOFF: Oh, he said he was freelance, and I believed him. He went on to become a very gifted, internationally known photographer with shows, not only in the Soviet Union but also in the United States, Japan and elsewhere abroad. Anyway, he was quite an independent figure, and even to this day I won't identify him further. Who knows what kind of trouble he may be in now? Call him Peter. Anyway, he said he knew that I was leaving Moscow soon (I had told him that my tour was due to end in the summer), and he asked me to do him a favor. I said I'd be glad to if I could, what was the favor. He said, "I promised Howard Sochurek [the Life magazine photographer who also covered the Nixon visit] that I would send him some copies of my photographs of the Nixon tour. I wondered if you could take them with you and give them to Sochurek when you get to New York?" I asked why not just put them in the mail?

Q: This wasn't on the phone, I presume.

TOUMANOFF: All on the telephone. I hadn't seen or heard from him since before the U-2. I'm sitting in my office in the embassy, and he doesn't say where or how he is, nor ask about me and Eileen. No ordinary talk, just business, and his voice is strained and speech awkward. Very unlike himself. He paused, and kind of stumbled and mumbled something and finally said, "Well, you know, the mails are not that reliable, and would you do that for me?" I replied that I was sorry but that was not something I could or should do. And with that, the conversation ended, abruptly. About an hour later, the telephone rang again, and a muffled, slightly disguised voice said, "You know who this is?" I recognized his voice and said, yes, I did. The voice said, "I just wanted to tell you how much I've enjoyed our friendship, how much I hope that some day circumstances will be such that we can meet again." Click. And I realized that the KGB had forced him to make that first phone call to try to set me up for arrest at the transfer of documents as they had, and would again, other unwary foreigners. He had made that call reluctantly and with unusual restraint in his speech and constraint in his voice which might alert me. He was risking the second call to apologize for having made the first, and to restore my confidence in him and our friendship.

Q: Trying to get you lined up.

TOUMANOFF: Yes, because while the voice was muffled and semi-disguised, the tonality was totally sincere because I knew him so well. Well, that was part of the life of the Foreign Service in Moscow.

Q: Readers of the interviews with other Moscow veterans presented by this Oral History Project will see that on this subject they all read alike. I think we've all had similar experiences, even back in the old days, the Stalin days, all the way up to the present.

There's something also that has come out in many of these interviews that you haven't given us yet - the family. That is to say, I found wives often kept out of things, just by the classified nature of the work, or difficult language perhaps, and stress, that inability to have a normal relationship with the society. Is this a good time to tell us how your family reacted to this?

TOUMANOFF: Oh, sure, yes. It was atypical, Bill, because in the first place, Eileen, when we first got married, in fact, even before we got married, when we were planning to, Eileen started

Q: This, incidentally, was not authorized by the State Department.

TOUMANOFF: No, both of us were still in college at that point. So she started taking Russian lessons, and she took some lessons from my father and some lessons from my mother, and then she took some lessons while she was still in college. So she knew some Russian, and then she went on with tapes and records before we went to Moscow. She could get around reasonably well. So there were four of us in Moscow, my wife, Eileen, myself, and our two children, age 5 and 6.

Q: And reading.

TOUMANOFF: Oh, yes. No problem reading. She could speak Russian more or less and understand much more by the time we arrived in Moscow. She wanted to continue learning the language so she made a special effort when she went out to shop or to the park with our children to speak with Russians. Obviously a foreigner, she attracted curious Russians, especially when with our small children. In addition we got from the diplomatic service, the official Moscow government diplomatic service for foreigners-

Q: UPDK (Diplomatic Service Agency)?

TOUMANOFF: UPDK, yes... We got a Russian language tutor to give her systematic Russian lessons.

Q: But she had to report back about you to Soviet intelligence.

TOUMANOFF: Of course. We all understood that, it was a given, and so was our discretion. Actually, she turned out to be one of our closest friends - not because Eileen and I were revealing anything to her but because she was educated, she was cultured, she was a professional editor of Russian dictionaries at one of Moscow's academic publishers. Also, work with Eileen was an extraordinary opportunity for her to perfect her English, which she was working on. She and Eileen became good friends and enjoyed each others' company. She had a boyfriend who was a master of sports, a champion of one, I think gymnastics. One of the fun things they did was to ride in parades, including the November 7th parade through Red Square, the civilian part, in which he drove a motorcycle and she rode standing on the handlebars as a kind of Winged Victory of Samothrace. We had dinner at their apartment one evening I remember.

Eileen also did a great deal of shopping in the local markets and stores. In those days, there was not a Moscow store that did not have long lines, which served as Moscow's free wheeling, high speed, news and information channel, run largely by grandmothers. Those conversations were one of Eileen's favorite activities, and occasionally my best source of information and insight.

Q: She'd had more exposure than many of the wives and therefore found herself more satisfied, perhaps.

TOUMANOFF: Oh, hardships aside, she was having a wonderful time. She really was. It was a great experience for her as it was for me.

Q: You both were more fortunate, I think, than most. As well - intentioned as those other officers were.

TOUMANOFF: We were extremely lucky to be there when there was that remarkable openness, curiosity and friendship for Americans and the U.S.; when we were sought after and made welcome. We were also used to Russians from my parents and their friends. So they and their ways were not strange, we felt familiar and safe in their company. All that changed soon.

Q: And didn't feel kept out, felt quite the opposite in many cases.

TOUMANOFF: Well, quite the opposite during this extraordinary period. There's another side to this image. Let me give you an idea of just how secretive Eileen and I were in our apartment because there were microphones - in fact, the first apartment we lived in fell down.

Q: Fell down?

TOUMANOFF: Nearly. It was out on I think it's called Kutuzov Street, opposite the National Economics Exhibit, the National Exhibit of Economic Achievements, I think it was called.

Q: "Achievement" was the word, yes.

TOUMANOFF: The building was a hollow square. The Chinese were in one wing, the Westerners were in another wing, and I forget who was in the rest, Eastern Europeans probably, we had little if any contact with them.

Q: The press, perhaps.

TOUMANOFF: No, probably somebody like the North Koreans.

Q: Friendly.

TOUMANOFF: The building started to grow cracks in the walls, and the cracks grew larger fairly rapidly. The embassy kept calling Soviet authorities saying, "Something's wrong with this building." The answer was always, don't worry about a thing, we'll let you know if there is any problem.

Q: This is good Soviet architecture.

TOUMANOFF: Right, well, I don't know whether they would have claimed that, because it would have been so transparently false because the cracks got longer and wider up and down the walls and in the ceilings, ever longer and wider, inches in a day, until one fine day there was a rapid exchange with the Soviets, and they said we were to be evacuated, the entire building, over the next three days. They had found a building for us which was out on Prospekt Mira, you know, out at the opposite end of town. It was an emergency. We found out later that gas pipes were rupturing. In the mean time, pieces of the building had been falling off.

Q: And they had baskets underneath to catch them?

TOUMANOFF: No, they didn't have baskets, they built a reinforced sort of tunnel from the front door out far enough into the yard so that the pieces of concrete or whatever it was falling down wouldn't actually brain one of us, but bounced off this tunnel. Anyway, literally within 24 hours they had stevedores in and in three days they picked up everything and moved everyone out to the new quarters. I knew where this was, they gave me the address, and I went out on the first day to see what this place looked like that we were being thrown into by the Soviets. It was a brand new building, still under construction, and I had some very interesting experiences. I may as well get into this. I wasn't going to, but it may be of interest to any student of Soviet architecture.

Q: It's personal, so therefore it is relevant, Vlad.

TOUMANOFF: It was another hollow square design. One wing of which was completely finished, and ordinary Russians - well, perhaps not ordinary because they were the lucky few who had new housing, but Russians had already moved in. A second wing was the wing into which we were going to be placed, and it looked just in the last external finishing stages. It was built and it was habitable. I knew which apartment would be ours. There was something of a mess inside. It looked as though the workers had just left and hadn't cleaned up. They left scraps of building materials and junk behind. I won't tell you what condition the toilet was in, but I managed to make it workable. A third wing was still under construction, and as I watched the work, I witnessed one of the flaws that pervaded the Soviet Union, and perhaps still does in Russia.

There were banners all over this construction site. Incidentally, and the huge yard held between these three wings looked like the fields of Flanders after the battle. The ground totally churned up, it looked bombed, with pieces of broken construction materials, hunks of scrap iron, old tires, every conceivable form of trash, some half buried, strewn everywhere.

But back to the banners and posters, which were up everywhere. They exhorted saving. FOR EVERY BAG OF CEMENT YOU SAVE THE BUILDING TRUST SAVES TONS FOR NEW HOUSING. FOR EVERY BRICK YOU SAVE THE TRUST SAVES THOUSANDS, and so on and on. So I watched the bricklayers. They saved! Bricklayers would take a small dab of cement, and put it on the underneath brick, and put two dabs of cement on ends of the brick they were laying, and they'd plunk this thing down, and do the same to the next. Occasionally I could even see what looked like a hole! I talked with one of them while I watched and explained I was an American, as if my obvious western clothes were not enough. I did not want to be taken for an inspector, although, if there were any, I was pretty sure they and the foremen were paid off with kickbacks. Eventually I asked if someone would come along later and do some pointing up. The answer of course was "no."

Q: They were reading the banners, apparently.

TOUMANOFF: Well, it was a dumb question on my part, but I asked, "How about the holes?" He looked at me as if to say "What holes?" and then I got a very candid answer. "You see that banner? I'm saving cement. If I save enough cement on my shift, I get a bonus. If I save enough bricks, and I save a lot of bricks, I get another bonus."

Q: This was motivation of the highest sort.

TOUMANOFF: This was the motivation, planning motivation. And I think it prevailed throughout the economy, even military industry. The apartment, absolutely standard in the stairwell, and probably in that and thousands of other buildings just like it throughout the country, really wasn't bad at all. It was built for at least two families, with a common kitchen and a common bathroom, and five rooms - two rooms and the kitchen on one side of a central hallway, three rooms on the other side, and the bathroom at the end. So each American family was getting the space assigned, theoretically, to two Russian families, but probably in the post-war housing shortage occupied by five, one in each room, with a common kitchen and a common bathroom. One of the problems allegedly discovered by the new American tenants was when they turned on the gas stove, water came out of the burners. It may have been parody, but equally plausibly somebody had connected a water pipe to the gas line.

Q: There had to be a banner to explain this.

TOUMANOFF: That would be my explanation. The more pipes you connect, the more pay you get, the more bonuses you earn, until you make foreman. Then you collect kickback from the workmen, and nobody asks which pipe you connected to which other pipe.

I should mention a couple of other things about it. One is that when I went into the apartment that we were going to get, there was a spot of fresh plaster on a wall in each room. My guess was that each covered a newly installed microphone.

TOUMANOFF: They must have had very short notice of the arrival of American diplomats because of the emergency evacuation. So I think walls which had already been plastered, had to be broken into for the microphones and the holes then covered with new fresh plaster just before my visit. It was really of little interest because we naturally assumed rooms would be bugged one way or another. Some months later one of our Embassy officers managed to open a locked attic door to find a battery of tape recorders, and a man with earphones. The Soviets promptly expelled that officer from the country. Remind me later to tell you about one way of thwarting such microphones.

One day, after we finally got a telephone in the apartment, it failed, and of course, the Embassy had to call UPDK, the diplomatic service bureau; repeatedly, and in vain. After a couple of weeks I decided to break the deadlock. By that time I knew the UPDK telephone number, so I called them from the Embassy, all of whose lines we knew were tapped by the KGB. I explained that, as reported to them earlier several times by the Embassy, my home telephone had gone bad and would they fix it please. They'd say, yes, yes, and nothing would happen. After several more fruitless calls just to build the record for what I was about to do, I called UPDK again and said, "Look, as they must know, the Embassy and I had called many times to request repair of my apartment telephone, and it still doesn't work. It is most inconvenient, and impedes the work of the Embassy. So you leave me no choice. If it is not repaired by the time I get home this evening, I'm going to take it apart and fix it myself." Well, there was a telephone repairman out there in no time at all and when I got home it worked like new. My calculation was that UPDK (an intelligence arm itself) as well as the listening KGB, knew there was a microphone or some other tap in the telephone instrument at home, and they didn't want me to tinker with it, perhaps to find and remove it. That might hit the western press and cause some sort of incident, or protest, or just prompt us to examine all our telephones, or reveal some of their technology. The promptness of repair might have been just coincidence, but I doubt it. Besides, we learned to use the Soviet listening practices occasionally to work to our advantage.

Another example of the same nature: When we first arrived and back when we were still living in the first building, we tried to get someone to help with the housework. So the Embassy called the service agency, and kept calling and calling, only to be told, "Terribly sorry, no one is available." In the meantime, several newly arrived nonaligned diplomatic families had received household help promptly. So finally I called myself and said, "As you know, we've been asking for several months, and a number of other diplomats have received help, diplomats who arrived in Moscow well after we registered our request. If no one is available now, nor by the end of this week, I'll go next Saturday to the collective farm market where I'm sure I can find someone to hire myself." Well, practically instantaneously a lady, Ukrainian, appeared. She was with us until we were evacuated from that building, when she decided to go back to the Ukraine. Interestingly, her reason for returning to the Ukraine was that, unlike our outgoing kids, her own daughter in the care of grandparents was turning into a spoiled, snobbish "aristokratka" and that would never do!

So sometimes you could turn the Soviet system of isolation and control to your advantage.

Q: How to beat the system.

TOUMANOFF: Occasionally, you could use the system, in small, unimportant things. But not abuse it. The country was, and remains, their back yard and they have ultimate sanctions. Some American diplomats, exchange students and others who have overdone it have been expelled, or worse.

In a worst case, an American youth tried to enter the USSR from Helsinki by bus, without a visa. This was possible for Finns on daytrips. He, however, was stopped by Soviet authorities at the border, removed from the bus and told to return to Helsinki to apply for a visa. The bus went on to Leningrad without him. Instead, he tried to sneak across the border through the woods at some distance from the highway. Caught by Soviet border guards, he was tried as a spy and jailed. Tragically, he required medicine which he carried with him. Medicine was extremely valuable in Soviet prisons and in the Gulag. Transported by prisoner train, he was killed en route. When the body was returned, his throat had been cut. The medicine was missing.

But let me finish the story of the evacuation. Having seen the apartments we would occupy, I went in search of a telephone to tell my wife that they would be fine. The telephone was in the construction shack, and chaos reigned there. It seems the pipes in the attic of one wing had frozen in the night and flooded a stairwell under construction. The construction boss was on the only phone, and as I waited and listened he called authority after authority, from the Moscow Government and Party headquarters down through both chains of command; the same with various Construction Trusts involved in the project, from top to bottom, as well as other units I couldn't identify. In part he was absolving himself as the pipes had also frozen earlier that night in another, occupied wing, and all available labor was struggling to stem flooding there. Mainly, I realized, he was spreading responsibility so widely that no ensuing investigation would have much chance of unraveling primary fault, if any.

TOUMANOFF: I was going to tell you something more about travel. There were many trips, and much to tell. Too much. So I'll describe a few episodes which will give you some idea of what it was like in 1959 and '60.

Edward Killham (Political Officer in the Embassy "Internal" Section) and I set off together, first stop by air to Kiev. The plane landed in Kharkov instead, without explanation and was going no further. So we were immediately off our Foreign Ministry approved itinerary. The rules called for notification to the Ministry and effort to get back on the itinerary as soon as possible. We telephoned the Embassy, reported what had happened, set about trying to get back on our itinerary by bus, plane or train. We could manage it by catching a midnight train, which would take us to another train which would get us back on route. At the bus station we had been surrounded by a troop of gypsy beggars, complete with a fake baby, (a doll in swaddling) who backed off promptly when we told them we were Americans and probably being followed. We also saw that we had enough time to take a quick round trip to the next town. That turned out to be a huge cement works, blanketed in cement dust, everywhere. No grass, dead trees, almost no one in the street. Dust everywhere, kicked up in clouds by passing trucks. It was a scene of environmental (and likely health) devastation. We left within a few minutes, back by the next bus. The midnight train was "hard" - open compartments with wooden benches facing each other and a small fold-down table under the window. In the station we had found only a half-liter bottle of pepper Vodka of suspicious color, not even bread. We bought the vodka but the omens were for a sleepless 6-hour night.

As the train started, a middle-aged Russian man sat down on the bench opposite us in the compartment. He lowered the table, opened his suitcase and produced two bottles of vodka, pickles, black bread, hardboiled eggs, and a pie. We added our bottle of pepper vodka, which he promptly threw out the window. At our surprise, he explained that his best friend was the director of a distillery, who, early each month monitored a batch of vodka from start to finish, took it all for himself, and provided his friends including our companion. We still looked puzzled, so he explained further. Everywhere in the Soviet Union the workers slacked off from the beginning until close to the end of each month, when there would be a crashing effort to meet the planned quota or even surpass it by a little for the bonus; a little because if by much they knew that the quota would be simply be ratcheted up. During the crash effort abuse of every kind prevailed, negligence, corruption of input and process, adulteration of materials, disregard of standards, industrial safety. The result was that end-of-month products were not just poor quality, but possibly dangerous. The quality of the monitored early batch of vodka was assured. That is what he was offering us. The pepper vodka was just as likely to be pepper-disguised poison.

He had never before met Americans, let alone Russian speaking diplomats. He showered us with questions and hospitality, sharing all he had brought, at the same time showing much distrust of the official versions of America. After an hour or so a conductor called him out. He returned, a bit preoccupied, but within minutes resumed the conversation as before, this time telling more about himself. He was Chief Engineer (2nd in command) of a very large coal mine, and a Party Member. But mostly we talked of America. Not long after he was called out again, this time for much longer, perhaps half an hour. He returned very upset and angry. After a few minutes of awkward silence I suggested we talk of something else, fishing for salmon in Iceland for example, and started. That quickly became too stilted and artificial to sustain, and he broke out that he held a high position of trust, responsible for the safety and production of thousands of workers, a decorated veteran of the War, and a loyal Party Member, and who were "these people" to tell him he couldn't talk with us! It's not as though he were telling us secrets! With which he pointedly asked us about coal mining in America. Neither Ed nor I knew much about that industry, certainly not enough to match his expertise, which led him to explain the Soviet industry to help us understand his questions. That eventually led to his main concerns, which turned out to be appalling working conditions, water up to the waist, clouds of dust, mechanical failures, shaft collapses, explosions, the prevalence of black lung, phlebitis, and physical injury, resulting in much disability, with high and early mortality. He was called out again, and did not return. I caught a glimpse of him at the next station being hustled off the platform between two burly men in uniform.

Q: Did you keep his vodka?

TOUMANOFF: Everything was left behind. His bag, his coat and hat and the remains of food and vodka, everything. No, we didn't touch it after he left, nor, as I recall, did anyone collect it while we were there. Well, there wasn't much vodka left. We had pretty much demolished the food and most of the vodka by that time, which may account for why he was not more careful. We, too, were at fault for allowing him to run on, following his lead. Although we had identified ourselves as American diplomats, and there was never any question he knew with whom he was speaking.

On another trip we were again deposited by air in the wrong place. Destined for Tbilisi, capital of Georgia, we landed in Sukhumi, on the Black sea coast. Tbilisi, we were told, was socked in. This time, however, after a brief wait in the terminal we were met by a Russian civilian who introduced himself as the Director of the Sukhumi Zoo, to be our escort during our layover. The layover would be until the next day and he suggested a tour of the Zoo until hotel accommodations could be arranged for the night. There being no other offer, and being unexpected guests, so to speak, we made the tour while he described the Zoo as specializing in monkeys due to the benign climate. Monkeys were purchased in large batches from India for the entire USSR, shipped to Moscow, and distributed to the nation's zoos from there. We learned much about the names, habits and antics of various monkeys. Those we saw seemed in good health and comfortable. Things moved rather slowly and we saw only a small part of what appeared to be a large establishment, widely spread out on a wooded hillside. Our escort was bright, informed about zoos, amusing and good company, so it was growing late when he took us to dinner at a hotel. Our room was not quite ready so we sat down to slow motion zakuski (appetizers) and ample quantities of vodka. Time slipped by. The main course eventually appeared, followed eventually by something else, followed by toasts, anecdotes, and random tales. Our room remained on the verge of readiness and there was nothing for it but to wait. Our escort, never flagged and we were enjoying his company in the well lubricated evening. The room was finally ready shortly after midnight. It was bare, with two cots and blankets, no sheets. My blankets were still warm from the previous occupant, who evidently had been granted half a night and then evicted for us. A common bathroom held a hand basin with one spigot, and a rather noxious round hole in the floor. Never mind, we were tired and had a flight to Tbilisi the next morning. Our escort met us, took us to the airport, and mentioned that he came to Moscow occasionally to receive his quota of monkeys, and would look us up at the Embassy. To my surprise he did, leading to lunches and a couple of supper parties at Russian apartments. I was careful not to go alone but always with another American, to suppers with Eileen. At one such supper party the game was that every guest was required to climb to the top of a 4-foot stepladder at the table head, toast the company with a glass of vodka, and climb down backwards. (I learned from watching Eileen to spill a lot of vodka on the way up in pretended inebriation.) At that party our friend from Sukhumi, quite maudlin with drink, drew me aside and whispered that he was a Communist Party member, and had been reporting to the KGB on all our meetings. I assured him with a smile that it was quite all right as I had assumed both from the start. He then asked me if I had been reporting on him to my government. I, truthfully, said no, as he had never told me anything worth reporting. Years later, in Washington, I learned that the "zoo" he had so artfully disguised from us was actually one of the Soviet Union's main research stations for the effects of nuclear radiation. That's where the monkeys came in.

It is astounding, now, to think back that social conversations with Russians had become so routine that we reported selectively, when there was meaningful content.

Another travel episode is the other side of the coin. We had all been cautioned stringently to be very careful when travelling to avoid being trapped into some compromising, sexually compromising, situation. This had happened to others previously, so it was not idle talk. Consequently I was conscious of this, knowing that in some way an attempt might come. Forewarned, I thought, was fore-armed and I was determined to stay alert to fend it off at the first sign. I forget now who was traveling with me on another trip, this time including an overnight train. This train had sleepers, four beds, upper and lower in each compartment. We had made reservations, but after the train was underway we discovered that we had been separated, placed in different compartments and different cars. That was most unusual, but protests were in vain. We both thought "Here it comes," and that I, with my Russian background and language fluency would be the likely target. Sure enough, two husky men and a young woman entered the compartment and my companion was banished to another car. Evening, and bedtime came. Meanwhile the men, one at a time, kept going out and returning, so there had been little conversation except introductions, all of which heightened my apprehensions. The arrangement was that we three men stepped out of the compartment while the woman undressed, got into her lower bunk, and drew the curtains. The men insisted that I, as a foreign guest, should take the other lower bunk and go next. I did and, leaving my shoes on the floor as she had, got into my bunk, drew the curtains, rustled about for a while, and finally stretched out, fully clothed including necktie. I calculated that, under assault, my clothes would either daunt the assailants, or give me time to raise a huge ruckus. The men came in, undressed, and climbed into their bunks. Nothing happened, all was still, but I stayed on my guard. And so it remained, all night long. It was the most uncomfortable, sleepless night I've ever spent, punctuated by dreadful dreams when I dozed off, especially when my necktie wrapped itself around my throat as I tossed and turned. In the morning I stayed in my bunk pretending sleep until they all, considerately, left the compartment for me to emerge, feeling very foolish and doubtless looking worse. They turned out to be kindly, interesting, sociable people, and made me feel at home with a game of dominoes. My traveling companion had a quiet night of restful sleep, and couldn't stop laughing the next day over my "entrapment."

Q: What were they?

TOUMANOFF: They were Russians.

Q: But how had they identified themselves?

TOUMANOFF: Oh, the woman was a teacher, one man was an engineer of some kind, and the third some sort of inspector.

Q: A good cover story, if it was a cover. It might have been real.

TOUMANOFF: Oh, I think it was perfectly real, just the usual reservation muddle. Anyway, that was my sole sexual entrapment episode. More like I trapped myself.

Q: That's marvelous.

TOUMANOFF: One more travel item. This one in Leningrad during that famous Nixon "kitchen debate" trip in 1959. The Leningrad Party boss, a primitive called Romanov (no relation to the Czars) famous for smashing priceless museum china in drunken routs, was Vice President Nixon's host, and on the evening before Nixon's scheduled departure the next day, Romanov gave a dinner for the Nixon delegation. As I recall, it was in a reception room at the theater after a performance of the Leningrad Ballet. Toward the end of that dinner a waiter accidentally poured a good deal of brandy on my shoulder, so I rose and stepped outside the room to fan the fumes out of my jacket. A group of some ten Soviet security men were lounging around the antechamber and one of them, clearly in command, asked me what was going on inside. I told him that Romanov was urging Nixon to extend his visit in Leningrad for an extra day. With which the security man jumped to his feet and exclaimed, "What does he think he's doing! I have ten thousand men on this operation all of whose orders will have to be changed!" He was so shaken he looked to me in dismay, and I realized he took me for a high Russian official, probably from Moscow as he didn't know me, who might be able to intervene to prevent the disaster. With hardly more than a word and wave of my hand I dismissed the talk as mere chit chat, nothing would come of it, and quickly returned to the party. That was a close call. Had he realized to whom it was that he had revealed the scale of KGB security and isolation arrangements for Nixon's tour, I think in the KGB mentality I'd have been guilty of passing for a Russian, if not of espionage. In any case the man's error would demonstrate how dangerous I was, even if unintentionally, and make me a target for expulsion. Being taken for a Russian had its drawbacks.

Actually, by that time I did have some special protection from the KGB. I should explain. The Ambassador during my entire tour in Moscow was Llewellyn Thompson, from September of 1958 to September or thereabouts of 1960. And Bill, if I forget, remind me to tell you about the Francis Gary Powers episode and what a public show trial in Moscow looked like.

Q: And it involved you because you were an observer, or whatever.

TOUMANOFF: Yes, I attended his trial. But, back to the Ambassador. Llewellyn Thompson, by the time I got to Moscow, had established an extraordinary relationship with Khrushchev, and one of the privileges resulting from being the most fluent Russian speaker in the Embassy was that Thompson - whose Russian was really quite good - nevertheless took me along with him for some of his meetings with Khrushchev, and they met fairly frequently. Not to every meeting - he did not take me out to Khrushchev's dacha, those were informal, family affairs and I had not been invited. But to the occasional more official meetings he took me along in case he needed some translation. He would also sometimes check his reporting cables to be sure he had properly understood and had missed nothing.

Q: You took notes. You were the official notetaker.

TOUMANOFF: No, I did not take notes. He never asked me to, and it would have interfered with the atmosphere of informal trust and candor. They spoke Russian quite freely and I recall only two occasions when he asked me for help with a word.

Q: But Thompson often spoke in his native language, which diplomats do to get double time, if you will.

TOUMANOFF: No, actually, the conversations were always in Russian. So far as I know, Khrushchev never brought an interpreter to his meetings with Thompson.

Q: And had to be in Russian.

TOUMANOFF: Right. After I'd gone to the first or second of these I realized that Thompson had established a truly almost unbelievable degree of confidence and trust with this extraordinary personality called Khrushchev. I am convinced that when Thompson finally left Moscow - this was after I had left - Khrushchev lost one of probably the only two people in the entire Soviet Union whom Khrushchev totally trusted. The other being his wife, Nina Petrovna. With Thompson I think he knew he would not be deceived, not be lied to, and that he would get accurate, thoughtful information and opinion - that Thompson genuinely represented the United States Government, the President, and that he had the President's confidence and was the epitome of what an ambassador should be. But to have this happen in the Soviet Union was perfectly extraordinary. Eileen and I came to know Nina Petrovna a little, and she was marvelous. I'm sure that she kept Khrushchev sane, because she was so intelligent, so down-to-earth, so straightforward and so genuine.

Q: And knew the system.

TOUMANOFF: And, well, yes, I'm sure she knew the system, but she did not strike me as manipulative. Just the opposite. I think she must have been emotionally and morally a tower of strength for him. There was no falseness; there was no artificiality; but intelligence and thoughtfulness and acuity. The same was true of Thompson.

Q: Thompson recognized this and therefore could use this quality of his to-

TOUMANOFF: Well, I don't think he could be anything else, it came so naturally to him to have that kind of integrity, presence, acuity, perception, thoughtfulness, accuracy. It did work. I mean, he recognized the nature of the relationship, and he valued it, as did Khrushchev. Now let me tell you of an episode which demonstrated this relationship and, incidentally, why I was not troubled in Moscow by entrapments or police harassment, or anything of the kind. You will recall that when we began these interviews, I said that my Russian ancestry was prominent, privileged, and titled aristocracy, that my father was, his final rank was colonel, in the Imperial Guard, which was a very elite group, close to the Tsar. Obviously, my father fought on the side of the White Russian armies during the Civil War, was an adamant opponent of the Revolution and the Bolsheviks, and in the United States actively and publicly opposed recognition of the USSR. To such an extent was he an enemy of the Bolsheviks that they put a very large price on his head and on the heads of the entire family. My mother, who graduated from the law faculty at Moscow University, was equally dedicated and equally able, intelligent, and skillful in her opposition to the Communists. The Bolsheviks captured my father several times during the revolution and civil war, and on each occasion he broke out of captivity, and even engineered the escape of a prominent General. He was anathema to the Bolsheviks, and, as his son, I was not sure (a) whether the Soviets would let me into the country, even on a diplomatic passport, or (b) what might happen to me after I got there.

Q: Because they obviously knew your background.

TOUMANOFF: Well, that's the interesting thing. I don't think they did. Clearly, there must have been a large dossier on my father his family running into the early thirties, until shortly after U.S./Soviet recognition when my parents settled back into private life. American Communists disrupted some meetings, public lectures and a radio broadcast by my mother while she and my father were actively opposing recognition. So I assume Soviet Intelligence tracked my parents in the United States through 1933. Therefore when I got to Moscow in 1958, I thought I'd probably be more of a target of the KGB than most American diplomats, and I had better be alert and tune my radar pretty sharply.

Q: And no signals had come to you before you had received the assignment, from the Security Office or anything.

TOUMANOFF: None. But the NTS episode in Frankfurt made me think that they might have noticed my presence.

Q: They should have.

TOUMANOFF: They could have, but I guess they were so preoccupied with poisoning the Director of the organization that they didn't bother about the crowd of people who came to that conference.

You remember that when the Germans were approaching Moscow early in World War II, the KGB started destroying and burning their files. My guess is that somewhere in those bonfires the dossier they had on my parents disappeared, and by 1958 nobody remembered anything about Toumanoffs. Otherwise they would have turned up the dossier when the Department applied for my diplomatic visa. Another reason they didn't identify me right away is that the last name, Toumanoff, is a very common Russian name. As common I suppose, as Anderson, or Edwards in the United States. There were probably a hundred thousand or more Toumanoffs in the USSR. Anyway, the following episode transpired, which illustrates, among other things, the nature of Ambassador Thompson's relationship with Khrushchev and his effectiveness as our Ambassador. Khrushchev went off to the Balkans, I forget whether it was Sofia or Bucharest, but he was out of the country. When he returned all the ambassadors went out to the airport to welcome him back, as was customary for a Chief of State, although he was actually chief of the Communist Party. As Khrushchev came down the reception line of ambassadors he stopped at Thompson and said, "There is something I want to talk about with you. When I finish this reception line they will pull up my car and you could ride in to Moscow with me and we can talk on the way."

Q: Down that special reserved lane in the middle of the Ring Road!

TOUMANOFF: Ambassador Thompson had taken me with him to the airport and I stood at his shoulder in the reception line. By that time I had been at several of Thompsons meetings and talks with Khrushchev. He knew that Thompson trusted me and he had accepted me as part of the threesome that met. When they pulled up Khrushchev's limousine, I recall three rings of security personnel between the car and everyone else. I could be wrong on that, perhaps only two, but security was certainly visible and tight. From the car Khrushchev waved to Thompson, who started forward, but I held back as I had not been invited. Khrushchev saw that, called me by name and waved me forward. As I went to the car through those concentric rings of security personnel I knew I was going to be safe for the rest of my tour in Russia unless I did something really stupid, which I had no intention of doing. The fact that Khrushchev knew me by name and trusted me to ride with him would be a considerable shield against KGB harassment or provocation. At the same time, it made me a dangerous person on whom they would concentrate their attention, especially to identify and learn all they could about me. I think they resented that special access and protection, the more so when they finally learned my ancestry. But that was late in my tour, after I had also been the personal escort for Milton Eisenhower, the President's brother, on the Nixon tour of the USSR. (See below.)

Q: So they wouldn't set you up, in order to have you expelled.

TOUMANOFF: Within broad limits on my own behavior, I think that's right. I felt freer than most, but too much of a provocation on my part by single act or a pattern, would provide justification for action against me and bring them down on me. For example, in any but the slightest chance contact with Russians I would always identify myself early in a conversation as an American diplomat, working in the American Embassy in Moscow. To pass for a Russian, which I could have done, would have been a grave mistake.

Q: You weren't a target.

TOUMANOFF: Certainly nothing ever overt. There was a gentle attempt to recruit me, but that was by sheer accident, as the result of a flat tire during the Nixon visit. We'll get to that later. But I think that ride with Khrushchev probably saved me from any trouble. Strangely, I don't even remember what it was he wanted to talk about with Thompson. Nothing very important, I would guess. But the Thompson cables have all, I think, been declassified and released.

In any case, they finally figured out who I was, but this was in the last six months or so of my tour.

Q: How do you know they found out who you were?

TOUMANOFF: They told me.

Q: Oh, they told you. Who's they?

TOUMANOFF: There was some sort of a Soviet affair, an official dinner for some U.S. delegation, perhaps Congressional. In those days there were quite a few American visitors. Before the U-2, that is. I was sitting across from a Soviet official, I don't remember who he was, but not high ranking. In the middle of the dinner he looked me straight in the eye and said meaningfully, almost in a challenging tone. "We know who you are."

Q: That clearly.

TOUMANOFF: That clearly, with emphasis. I brushed it off with, "Oh, fine, good." And that was that. But he was saying that they'd finally figured out who I was. It must have come to them with a jolt to find the son of a titled White Russian, Imperial Guard Colonel and mortal enemy, in their midst meeting and riding with Khrushchev.

Q: And this man was in a position that you recognized that's what he was saying.

TOUMANOFF: Oh, yes.

Q: Because he could have been saying other things by then.

TOUMANOFF: Oh, no. We have identified you, is what he was saying. And he was saying it with a glint.

Q: We finally did it.

TOUMANOFF: We have finally figured out who you are. And there was resentment. There was resentment, in the first place, because it had taken them so long. I represented an embarrassing lapse in their vaunted security services. In the second place, there was resentment because it was too late to do anything about it. There was resentment because they had built a large dossier on me, I'm sure because I had traveled so much, met so many Russians and had friends who telephoned and invited me out, even to their homes. Finally there was resentment that I, of all people, should have enjoyed the kind of access and privileges that none of them had with their own leadership at the highest level.

Q: You were the enemy of enemies.

TOUMANOFF: That would be their immediate assumption from my parentage. But at a more practical level I was a dangerous enemy because Russians I met at random most often treated and spoke with me as to a fellow Russian in spite of my care to identify myself to them. Some simply refused to believe me, and when I showed my Soviet-issued Diplomatic Identification Card, one or two had dismissed it as a hoax, a counterfeit, so common and easily purchased in the USSR. One such randomly met individual offered to show me the district in Moscow where I could buy any sort of counterfeit Soviet document. I demurred.

Q: And you'd been the closest to their leader.

TOUMANOFF: Which they should have prevented.

Q: And trusted by the leader.

TOUMANOFF: And trusted by extension of his trust in the American Ambassador.

Q: But if Khrushchev had been... Maybe that's why he fell, Vlad!

TOUMANOFF: No, many things contributed to his fall. Only one of which, I think, was his turn to the West, and the United States in particular. There are many excellent books written about his rule and fall. Very briefly, let me comment on only one element. Khrushchev launched the Berlin crisis in 1958 amid extravagant missile rattling and threats. That terrified the Soviet population with the prospect of atomic war. Then suddenly he turned to "Peace and Friendship," "The Spirit of Camp David," and an exchange of visits with Eisenhower. The prospect of a visit by Ike, the wartime hero and ally, the epitome of U.S.-Soviet cooperation in an agonizing, mortal struggle, was such a relief from the prevailing fear of war that the Soviet population simply stampeded out of control in their enthusiasm and eagerness to show their gratitude, love for Ike, and yearning for peace with America. All else that coincided with Khrushchev's domestic thaw following his anti-Stalin speech. I think the Kremlin's organs of control were terrified at its increasing loss, and held him to be responsible.

Incidentally, I saw Khrushchev before and after his very successful 1959 trip from coast to coast in the U.S. and there was a real change in him. He had never seen the United States, he had no conception. Remember, his formal education ended with grammar school, about the fourth grade

I think. After that the only education he had was in Communist Party training facilities which gave him a crudely warped picture. So he had no conceivable notion of what the United States was like. He knew little of Western Europe and nearly nothing of the rest of the world. Eastern Europe after the War and Stalinist rule was not altogether different from the USSR. So he was handicapped in dealing on the world scene, and you could tell that he felt himself handicapped when he was talking to Thompson. Somehow he would say things or talk on assumptions about the U.S. and other parts of the world which were simply not so, Party cant. Part of the conversations with Thompson, whom he respected for his knowledge and objectivity, were almost educational, a kind of reality check of his images induced by Communist mythology and propaganda, especially his notions of the United States.

Q: And Khrushchev would be able to listen, and not take it as a criticism or put down. How was his language? How was his level of language, in terms of literacy?

TOUMANOFF: Khrushchev?

Q: Yes.

TOUMANOFF: I didn't see any serious flaw. He loved to use slang, and salty expressions, but that was being a populist.

Q: That's fine, sure. So he never suffered - he never suffered from-

TOUMANOFF: From being inarticulate? No he did not.

Q: Or being embarrassed, maybe, by his equals.

TOUMANOFF: Well, I'm not sure that the latter is true. I think when he ran into cultured Russians who spoke a different kind of Russian language, one of erudition -

Q: As in all languages.

TOUMANOFF: - as you and I might if we spoke with a British don speaking in paragraphs instead of sentences, a very, very articulate Britisher - he would feel this handicap; he would feel that this was a different kind of a person - not superior, because he, after all, had reached the pinnacle and was tough as nails. He had accomplished extraordinary things and had survived extraordinary things, but he knew the difference and felt his discomfort, he was aware of the uncertainty, or unreliability of his knowledge in fields of learning, and was apt to cover it with bombast.

Q: And it didn't enter into the relationship with the ambassador.

TOUMANOFF: Actually, I think it helped. Thompson had genuine respect for Khrushchev and showed it at all times. It was mutual, and they liked each other.

Q: Obviously because he's speaking a foreign language-

TOUMANOFF: No, they spoke in Russian. But this ambassador was the Ambassador of America, and he was different. He represented a great nation, the constant object of Soviet foremost international concerns. Anyway, when Khrushchev came back from his American visit, and I saw him not long after he returned, he had been humbled by his experience in the United States - humbled in the sense of revelation, that is, he never said so in so many words, but you could see that he had been enormously impressed-and challenged. Some part of that sense of challenge and almost defensive reaction was a remark that he made during the trip. He was intentionally driven by car down the New Jersey Turnpike and the Interstate from New York to Washington. It had been arranged to drive rather than fly or go by train with the thought that he would be impressed by the fantastic highway and the unending stream of equally fantastic automobiles carrying ordinary people. Both not to be dreamt of in the USSR. Well, he was impressed. Asked eventually during the ride by Henry Cabot Lodge, who escorted him on that trip, what he thought, Khrushchev turned and, looking at the stream of automobiles, said, "We'll never make that mistake." Of course, they have made that mistake, but their domestic oil reserves are bottomless.

He was thoroughly impressed, how could he not be. By contrast his USSR, still barely recovering from the devastation of the War, was like a moonscape. In Washington, at the end of his trip he had practically flayed the Soviet Ambassador, Menshikov, along the line of "Why haven't you told me the truth about this country?"

Q: "Because I didn't dare."

TOUMANOFF: Well, I wasn't told how Menshikov answered, but he was roundly, roundly scolded by Khrushchev, who was furious that Menshikov had not prepared him for the United States by telling him what kind of a country he was coming to. And poor Menshikov - obviously - you're perfectly correct. Had he described the United States in real terms he -

Q: -would have been removed.

TOUMANOFF: -perhaps even packed off to the Gulag. But to my mind Khrushchev was venting on his Ambassador his own frustrating realization how superior and mighty was the American society. Well informed on U.S. military and technological superiority, he was unprepared for our phenomenal living standard and the scale and efficiency of our national infrastructure. He had already launched his ill-conceived and badly executed "virgin lands" corn campaign, hoping that Garst-like farms would solve his agricultural problem. He promptly ordered supermarkets. At the same time the U.S. challenge spurred his national pride, his genuine patriotism, and his drive for reform with slogans like "overtake and surpass" America. Ultimately, in his impatience he tried to divide the Soviet Communist Party into urban and rural branches to set against each other in an effort to move that glacial apparatus. Small wonder he was deposed.

I think for the moment that's enough about Thompson and Khrushchev. Let me tell you a couple of quick insights on other leadership in the Soviet Union. One was Brezhnev and the other one was Mikoyan.

In 1959 there was the usual 4th of July large reception at Spaso House, the Ambassador's residence, and as this was a time of "Peace and Friendship" a few members of the Politburo and other high Soviet officials came. On this occasion I saw Brezhnev standing alone and looking uncomfortable. So I went over, introduced myself, welcomed him, and invited him to the buffet and drinks table. He refused, bluntly. I asked if I could bring him some refreshment, "No," looking like he suspected poison. I tried to engage him in conversation, small talk, to make him more comfortable. As I recall it was a beautiful summer day, vacation time, so I asked if he had been able to enjoy some leave. He said "No," looking as though I was prying into secrets. I asked if he had been to Spaso before, thinking to tell him a bit about its history. He did not reply. Very plainly he was not interested in small talk and continued to look and feel enormously uncomfortable and awkward. At that moment a Soviet official in a slightly rumpled suit came over to talk to him, whom Brezhnev obviously knew. Brezhnev pounced on him scolding violently for being slightly unshaven. An attempt to explain that he had been working late was cut off in mid-syllable. Brezhnev went on belaboring savagely for so shaming the USSR before Americans by his uncultured behavior, and banished the poor man, fiercely ordering him home to shave. The man cringed under the onslaught and practically ran out the door. Embarrassed to witness so blatant a display of inferiority complex, I had moved off, and I stayed away from Brezhnev, probably making matters worse. I probably should have suggested we have a shot of vodka and forget the incident. But I was in mild shock at this revelation of another, major cultural obstacle, at the top of Soviet power, to U.S.-Soviet relations.

Q: And in front of you. Clearly, you were not spared any of this.

TOUMANOFF: Brezhnev was already feeling out of place, unskilled and powerless to cope with this alien American setting and company. Even as a junior Embassy officer, but speaking his own Russian language fluently while he knew no English, nor probably any other foreign tongue, I increased his discomfort and, for him, a rare sense of inadequacy. He was at a loss for what to say or do or where to turn: Stripped of command. Worse still, this was enemy territory and he was weak and helpless in it. You once asked me whether my training in clinical psychology helped. Well, it helped a great deal. But on that occasion I was taken aback by the scale of the cultural and personal crevasse between him and us, and I failed to bridge it.

Q: At the American embassy residence.

TOUMANOFF: Yes, at Spaso House, the American Ambassadors' residence. But for Brezhnev it was a magnificent pre-revolution, Czarist era, Russian private mansion, full of all these well-dressed, smooth-faced, confident Americans, comfortable, totally at home, speaking Russian on top of everything else. In every way this setting and company was not of his world and it put this tough communist, bred in the Stalin era and barbaric war, this Soviet Politburo boss, completely off his stride.

Q: The Russian inferiority complex-through history.

TOUMANOFF: That vicious, arbitrary tongue-lashing was the result. The poor official, who must have been high-ranking to be invited, had to stand there silently, looking shamefaced and terrified, until the storm was finally exhausted, and then scuttle away home, banished, thinking his career and perhaps ability to feed his family, wrecked.

Q: The unshaven unsuccessful diplomat, or whatever he was.

TOUMANOFF: As an example of Soviet brutality of governance, it was telling.

Q: Yet it was Brezhnev they chose to be leader when Khrushchev was deposed. I shared your opinion of him throughout all of his years at the top, especially towards the end. I mean, Brezhnev was pathetic at the end, and sick.

TOUMANOFF: I remember Thompson telling me, just before he returned, in 1967, for his second tour as Ambassador in Moscow, that Brezhnev and his Politburo were a limited, narrow-minded bunch to whom he would have little access, and probably to little effect. He was not looking forward to his 2nd tour. Well, they kept Brezhnev propped up long after they should have let him lie down.

Now, by contrast, about Mikoyan. At the end of Nixon's 1959, "Kitchen Debate" visit, there was a small dinner at Spaso for the Vice President, and Soviet guests. Khrushchev and Mikoyan came. I was seated, to interpret, between Mikoyan and Mrs. Nixon.

Q: What was Mikoyan at this point?

TOUMANOFF: Well, he was a member of the Politburo, and I don't think he had any ministerial or formal Government post. But he was obviously a very close associate of Khrushchev. Remember? Mikoyan had been sent to the United States in advance of the planned Khrushchev visit (and to abate the mood of crisis over Berlin); and later to Cuba after the Cuban Missile Crisis to pacify Fidel Castro, who was in an uproar that he had not been consulted about the terms of its settlement. Back to the dinner party; and here I'll be quite candid about my impression of Mrs. Nixon, which is not based exclusively on this particular episode. Earlier in the trip I had interpreted for her a bit, and on the day of the dinner for her visit to a Moscow primary school.

Q: Nor known to you exclusively.

TOUMANOFF: At all times she kept herself under tight control, saying and doing little. The same happened at dinner. Mikoyan had already taken the trouble to be thoroughly briefed about her visit to the school, and knew that she had been a school teacher herself. He promptly initiated conversation with Mrs. Nixon by asking her if she had enjoyed the school visit. She said, Yes. It was very nice. What was her impression of the school? It was very interesting. Was it like American schools, or different in some way? Well, it was a long time since she had taught school. Mikoyan was a little bit taken aback, but not daunted, he tried again, and brought up some other activity that she had been engaged in during the visit. He had obviously been thoroughly briefed and had taken the trouble to remember. But he got essentially the same replies, kind of noncommittal-but-pleasant and brief. No one could take offense, or even make much of a news story of them. But it became obvious to him and to me that she was not going to be responsive. He had tried, gracefully, but Mrs. Nixon clearly wished to avoid conversation. So he and I had a brief conversation about the school visit to let him know it had gone well, and Mikoyan turned to his other side. I told Mrs. Nixon what I had said to Mikoyan, which was about the school welcome (nothing about herself) and to her relief we turned quietly to our dinners.

In sum, it is my clear impression that Mrs. Nixon was under the tight constraints of Mr. Nixon's election plans. He was already running for the presidency in the 1960 elections, and on this trip in Russia she must have been strictly enjoined neither to distract the press from him, nor under any circumstances to say or do anything that might damage his press coverage. On the unfamiliar ground of Russia, she chose to do and say as little as possible. I would put it more strongly, I think she was actually fearful lest her husband disapprove of anything she might do.

Back to Mikoyan. At the dinner, the time came for after dinner toasts. Khrushchev rose to make a toast, and he was either tired or had a fair amount of drink. He seemed a bit unsteady on his feet and was plainly garrulous. He started off on what turned out to be a very long toast to the Vice President, Mrs. Nixon, the President's brother, the assembled officials of both nations, relations between the countries, events during the visit, contributions to peace and friendship and on and on. But he wandered off so far afield that he lost track of his theme. He'd gotten off on some side track, came to the end of it, and started to pause trying to remember-

TOUMANOFF: Sort of like you and me in this interview. What was it we were talking about before I got sidetracked? He hesitated for just part of a breath, and Mikoyan interjected a little witticism, just a quick quip which caused a general chuckle but reminded Khrushchev of his theme before the pause became a noticeable silence.

Q: That's a friend.

TOUMANOFF: And Khrushchev took off, back on track. It happened again. There was this momentary hesitation, and Mikoyan injected another little witticism, an amusing quip which again put Khrushchev back on track. Mikoyan did this three times, quickly, skillfully and pleasantly to enable Khrushchev to bring the toast to a successful conclusion.

Q: As a good Armenian would.

TOUMANOFF: -as one of the smoothest, greatest rug dealers of all time. That's an unjust statement. Mikoyan was one of the mysteries of Sovietology. How in the world had he survived as a leading communist from the early '20s through all the deadly Party struggles, all of Stalin's purges, the post-Stalin battles for leadership? He was unique. That evening I began to understand his talents. A lightning quick mind, no ambition for leadership, threatening no one, and with a deft light touch, he made himself indispensable in service to those in power. I think he was never pushy; he was not trying to draw attention to himself, he was not demonstrating any ambition except to be serviceable the best way he could, in a way that I think nobody else in that entourage in the Politburo could match.

Anyway, I did come to know Mikoyan's son, who's here in the United States. He's teaching at the University of Maryland. When he first came he was at the Kennan Institute, and on some occasion I made a point of going up to him to say that I knew his father a little and I admired him greatly. I told him about the dinner at Spaso and he said it was typical of his father. The son, too, is a very intelligent, sensitive, and by nature a gentle human being.

Q: And what does he teach, the son.

TOUMANOFF: Political science and I'm sure Russian-Soviet studies.

Q: Beautiful. That's a nice story to end on the personalities of the leadership of the Soviet Union.

TOUMANOFF: As we're in it already, let's go on about the July 23 - August 3, 1959 Nixon visit and tour in the USSR, the occasion for the famous "kitchen" debate.

In part, it was a kind of test run for the President's planned visit in 1960, his return visit for that of Khrushchev to the U.S. which was to take place later in the summer of 1959. In part it was a demonstration of improving U.S.-Soviet relations. In part it was necessary international experience for Vice President Nixon. And finally it was part of Nixon's presidential election campaign. It quickly became evident that this last was Nixon's overwhelming primary concern. For him it was first and foremost a public relations exercise. He was on stage (as in the "kitchen" debate). Not only did he and the delegation monitor U.S. and Soviet press coverage intensely, but press briefings were of the essence.

I was not involved in the following episode, but I was quietly told by some who were. So this is hearsay. Back in Moscow, at the end of Nixon's country tour, there were three days of negotiations. By agreement they were to be confidential, no publicity. On the evening of the first day (8-hour time difference) U.S. news media carried reports about the talks, favorable to Mr. Nixon. The Soviets complained, confidentially. The second day there were more such reports. The Soviets complained again. On the third day it became evident to some of our participants that the Soviets had lost trust in Nixon and the negotiations, and talked accordingly.

If the above account is true, that Soviet experience came on top of Nixon's reputation, established earlier in his public career, of being harshly anti-Soviet, and for behavior which gave him the sobriquet of "Tricky Dick". I'm unaware of any evidence that such a sacrifice of trust, if true, affected U.S.-Soviet relations during his presidency. But it wouldn't have helped.

Q: But the coverage may have helped him get elected, and that was more important.

TOUMANOFF: The famous "Kitchen" debate at the American Exhibition in Moscow (which, incidentally, Nixon opened during his visit) in which Nixon and Khrushchev publicly harangued each other, served the same purpose. Our press reported that Nixon not only proved he could stand up to the Soviets, he bested Khrushchev in their contention. But Yes, you're right. If he lost the election, trust or no it wouldn't matter. Some more about the visit.

This one is more about the United States and President Eisenhower. At some stage, when the Nixon visit was being planned, President Eisenhower asked his brother Milton Eisenhower to join the group, and he agreed and came. I was lucky enough to be assigned to be Milton Eisenhower's escort officer and interpreter, and kind of guide for all of the trip outside of Moscow. Milton Eisenhower was a very thoughtful, very kind, very intelligent and perceptive man. Now while I did help and interpret occasionally for some of the other members on the voyage, essentially I made that trip with Milton Eisenhower. As a consequence I had a fascinating and easy time. That was a great relief, because there was often a huge mob, and noise, of correspondents, security types, delegation members, local Soviet officials, interpreters and other people surrounding Nixon. In the press toes were stamped, shoes were destroyed, people's clothes were torn, it was dangerous to stumble. A mob scene when he toured a factory or other installation. Milton Eisenhower and I would let the mob go through ahead of us and come along behind, sometimes alone, sometimes with one Soviet official detailed to escort the President's brother.

Q: Because the President's brother wasn't participating in any form, or near to it.

TOUMANOFF: He had no official function, but that's the interesting part of this, that as time went by I got the impression - although Milton Eisenhower never explained his role beyond saying that we needn't move with the throng - that the President had asked him to come for more than just to have his impressions of the USSR. It seemed to me more than that. Clearly the President wanted his brother's assessment of the USSR. Milton Eisenhower was alert, intellectually curious and asked many questions of Soviet escorts. But when we were alone our discussions ranged much more widely. He asked about what we had seen, what we had been told, about the Soviet Union as a whole, and the treatment accorded our delegation by the Soviets. Particularly he wanted to know my opinions of it all, and to check his own. We had some candid talks. There was something about his manner, or approach which suggested some psychological distance between him and Mr. Nixon. I began to think that perhaps the President wanted a wholly independent, astute, reliable and trustworthy account of the Nixon visit. Or perhaps counted on his very presence to exercise some sort of moderating influence. This aspect of it was never mentioned and never articulated by me or Milton Eisenhower or anybody else. But the implication for me was that Ike did not altogether trust his Vice President.

Q: And you went at Milton Eisenhower's direction, in the sense of shall we do this or shall we join them?

TOUMANOFF: Yes, I would ask whether he preferred to tag along behind or get in there with the group. It didn't matter very much if we were safely well behind because we could always catch up. Usually he preferred to avoid the throng.

Q: As I remember, reflecting back into history and up to present times, in the sense of what's been written, I think the relationship between President Eisenhower and Vice-President Nixon wasn't probably the best.

TOUMANOFF: Well, I got the impression that there was not total trust-

Q: "Trust" is the way it's put. And also, Nixon seemed very nervous as he wound himself upward through the route of Vice-President.

TOUMANOFF: Well, Mr. Nixon was a strange person anyway, and I don't think I want to get into-

Q: No, no, I wasn't inviting you to. I'm merely saying how it had been a little bit easier, perhaps, to deduce some of Milton's presence and why.

TOUMANOFF: Bill, let me describe another episode of that visit. It was at the very end, the last night before Nixon was flying home in the morning. He and some of his staff were relaxing in a small group at Spaso after dinner. The visit was over and Nixon was off stage. I think he had some drinks, and he sort of let his hair down. He proceeded to review moments of the visit extolling his own performance, "Wasn't I clever to... Didn't I handle that one... I sure showed them when I... Wasn't that the best answer you ever...", and so on and on, becoming foulmouthed in the process. These were not just rhetorical questions. He was pleading for reassurance and, as nearly always happens, the confirmations and slightly sycophantic replies and comments from his staff did not help. His insecurity was too deep, he was too intelligent, and I surmise he had repeated the same scene too many times and for too many years to fool himself. His anxiety seemed to increase. It looked like a long evening, and it was dangerous. I drifted out.

In sum, my over-all impression of our Vice President by the end of his visit was that he had little, if any moral yardstick, and was not well.

Q: And the President was himself, perhaps, with some insights.

TOUMANOFF: From the open literature one gets the distinct impression it was not a completely happy relationship between the two.

A few more quick episodes and I think we may be done with Moscow.

Admiral Rickover, who was on the delegation, was already famous for having firm opinions and speaking them directly. On a flight between two stops in Siberia he said he wanted to talk to a particularly poisonous Soviet journalist who was on the plane with us, and asked me to interpret for him. That journalist, named Romanovsky, I think, specialized in vitriolic front page editorial articles about the U.S.. He was talented and well connected. When we reached his seat the Admiral's first words to him were, "Why are you such a son-of-a-bitch?" These waters, I thought, are mined. So I explained in Russian that I was an officer serving in the U.S. Embassy, that Admiral Rickover had asked me to interpret for him and I would do so not in my diplomatic capacity but strictly as translator. That said, I did so using an exact equivalent insulting Russian epithet, and waited. What came back was a smile, a chuckle, "What makes you think so?" and an invitation for the Admiral to sit down in an empty seat opposite, all in fluent English. I withdrew. I did notice they talked for quite a while.

On the ground in Siberia a motorcade set off from the country villa where the delegation was housed to a theater performance. It consisted of (at least) one security car in the lead, followed by the Vice President's car; another security car; the car carrying Milton Eisenhower; another security car, and more cars carrying Americans with security cars between each. Ambassador

Thompson's wife, and I rode in the back with Ike's brother, and two unknown, unIntroduced and unresponsive (probably both security) Soviets in front, the driver and another. This was the standard arrangement of those motorcades. We were late, and raced down the road trying to catch up with Nixon's car which had left ahead of us. Mrs. Thompson asked the driver, in her Russian, to slow down. No reply, no effect. Milton repeated the request to me, which I passed to the two in front, emphasizing that it was the President's brother speaking. In vain, nothing. They were under iron orders, so we sat back, crossing our fingers. Around the next corner we came upon a woman crouched in the ditch holding her bloody head in her hands, a bent bicycle, and the VP motorcade stopped beyond. With which our front passenger turned to the driver with a chuckle saying, "That'll teach 'em to get in our way." It turned out the lead security car had struck or blown the bike into the ditch, Nixon had seen it happen, his car stopped only when he demanded it, over vehement Soviet protests Nixon had sent his personal physician who was riding with him back to attend the woman. The motorcade moved on again only when the doctor reported that the injuries, despite the blood, did not seem serious, and Soviet assurances that the accident had been reported and First Aid would arrive shortly.

In another such motorcade, our car blew a tire. Room was made for Ike's brother and Mrs. T. in the following security car and it moved off. I was put in another security car further back. There I was, alone in a car full of KGB officers with the rest of the motorcade already off in the distance. It was a novel experience for all of us, and got more so. I introduced and identified myself promptly. They asked what had happened and I told them. That broke the ice and talk continued. They were very curious about this American diplomat with the Russian name who spoke Russian like a native. They asked, really in wonderment, about that and I explained about growing up in the U.S. in a Russian-speaking family. They asked how long I'd been in Russia, in Siberia, where else in the USSR, how I liked Moscow, which they had never seen. They turned out to be locals, and were asking at random as they had never seen an American, not up close, and not like this one. I think they, too, were beginning to think of me as a Russian when one of them asked, "But don't your heart strings draw you to your native land?" I said I thought they had a great nation and a great people. They took that for a 'yes' and suddenly political reality struck. After a long pause one of them, in a different tone, said, "When?" I replied without hesitation, "Well, someday when your Government cares much more for its people, maybe then I might think about it." The language I used implied that the "someday" was doubtful and, at best, distant. I had expected that, dutifully, there would be some reply defending their government, but our conversation stopped. Siberians are different. They are far from Moscow and its age-old imperative deceptions. More straight forward, their silence suggested they understood, far better than I, the Soviet reality, but would neither discuss it with a foreigner, nor bring themselves to defend it with artifice.

Yes. Let's pick up on the U-2 and the trial of Francis Gary Powers.

Q: It also takes us into the last half, the end of the Peace-and-Friendship era.

TOUMANOFF: Right. The first we came to know of the U-2 was that the Ambassador was invited to attend a session of the Supreme Soviet at which Khrushchev, of course, was going to give a speech, and for whatever reason, Llewellyn Thompson took me along with him, the first and only time I've ever been to a Supreme Soviet session, because they're not open to American diplomats. They certainly were not in those days.

Q: And not that frequent.

TOUMANOFF: And not that frequent. Once a year, as I recall, at which the Supreme Soviet enthusiastically rubber-stamped whatever the Party presented. It was held in the Kremlin, the Great Hall, and Thompson and I were seated prominently in a balcony. It was a gloomy, cloudy, drizzly day, and the Hall had a large skylight. Well, Khrushchev made a long report and toward the end, looking directly at Thompson, he revealed the fact that an American spy plane had been shot down.

Q: For the first time this was revealed.

TOUMANOFF: Yes. This was the first announcement. It was a very long speech by Khrushchev, a kind of state-of-the-nation report, which was of course in wonderful condition and even better than it was the last wonderful time. There were the usual interruptions by applause and exclamations of approval and praise. It went on and on and carried nothing of particular interest for the Ambassador, and I began to wonder why he had been invited. We could have heard it on the radio, or waited to read it the next day when the full text would be in the newspapers, and then report with commentary to the Department. Toward the end of this speech, Khrushchev paused. He stood on stage at an elevated podium in a theatrical position, with all the audience of the Supreme Soviet below him, and Politburo, high Party and Government officials behind. He looked up at Thompson, and announced the shoot-down. At that moment the sun broke through the clouds and a bright ray of sunlight beamed down upon him through the skylight. It was very dramatic, and after a pause the audience went wild in applause and shouts of acclamation. Khrushchev was in his element and launched into his denunciation of America's perfidy. As he went on and on piling accusation upon accusation it seemed clear that the Spirit of Camp David, and the era of Peace and Friendship were over. Meanwhile, the cameras had swiveled and, following Khrushchev's gaze, every eye was on Llewellyn Thompson, the American Ambassador.

Q: Where at the point of the speech did this come?

TOUMANOFF: Oh, at the end, Khrushchev had saved it for the climax. As he went on and on about how appallingly nefarious and dangerous was this action by the United States, he did not accuse the President of ordering or perhaps even of knowing about the flight, but pointed out that if not, any American general could start World War Three. He also said nothing about the pilot. The rhetoric and theatrics were full scale, and the audience applauded often and mightily. It was a trying, not to say traumatic, time for Thompson, but he showed no sign of any kind. (He was, by the way, a masterful poker player.) When it was all over we left quietly, and back at the Embassy he immediately prepared a telegram to the Department in which, my recollection is, he pointed out Khrushchev's silence on the fate of the pilot, which suggested that he may have survived and be in Soviet hands. If so, we should assume the pilot might be forced to tell the Soviets everything he knew.

Q: And didn't take the pill.

TOUMANOFF: Well, actually it wasn't a pill. It was a poisoned pin hidden in a silver dollar. He did not use it. I'm inclined to believe the explanation for it which Powers gave at his trial. Be that as it may, this was the beginning of the great U-2 affair, which has been described and analyzed in book after book, with the benefit of much declassified material and extensive discussions with the Russians. As you know, the President took personal responsibility for the flight. The summit meeting in Paris was aborted and Eisenhower's visit to the Soviet Union was canceled. The Soviet public understood the message, contact with Americans was again taboo, and broken off. In the garage at the embassy was a large motorboat, intended as Ike's gift to Khrushchev. It was one of the first motor boats which was water-jet propelled rather than propeller driven. It had to be sent back to America.

Q: Out at the little dacha where they were to meet, at the corner of the lake and the river the Russians had a jet, their own proud version, and they showed me and told me about it when I visited there three or four years later. They were so proud of their boat, and of Ike's planned visit. Their disappointment was sharp. They felt it deeply. They were local scientists there. I felt their professional and personal sorrow.

TOUMANOFF: As I mentioned earlier, I think the extreme Soviet reaction to the U-2 was prompted, in part, by their fear of a public welcome for Ike so massive as to generate a spontaneous and general public escape from their control. The population, massed in welcome, might realize that opposition to the regime was common, and act on it; as happened later in Eastern Europe. Whether that fear was accurate or not none can tell. But atomization of society, and ruthless suppression of opposition, especially when grouped, was a key component of Soviet rule.

Q: An appreciated foreigner.

TOUMANOFF: Ike was much more than that. If I was seeing and hearing this exuberant public response to the prospect of his visit, the KGB must have been picking it up in spades. And bars really had tumbled down and the stampede out of the corral was everywhere evident. The kinds of conversations that I was having, and that any foreigner could be having, in Russia at that time were such as must have terrified the KGB. I think that was a very large part of the motivation of Khrushchev and the Soviet government in rupturing good relations over the U-2 and going back to essentially Cold War attitudes. After all, the Government knew that U-2s had been overflying the USSR for several years already.

Q: They had to crack down.

TOUMANOFF: I'm not sure they had to. But I'm sure they thought they had to.

Q: Otherwise their system might have fallen.

TOUMANOFF: That's right, That is precisely what they feared. Who knows what might have gotten out of control if Eisenhower had come. So in a sense, we handed them an excuse to do so on a silver platter with that U-2 flight.

Later, they invited the Ambassador to attend the trial of Francis Gary Powers, the U-2 pilot. Obviously, he did not go, but he sent two of his junior officers, Vice Consul Lewis Bowden, and myself.

Q: Trials of American citizens are normally attended by a consular officer anyway. Ambassadors don't go to trials.

TOUMANOFF: Yes, especially Moscow propaganda show trials.

Q: It was also probably wise to send two of you.

TOUMANOFF: Yes, for corroboration, if not for safety. So we two went. Again, that trial has been written up at vast length, but there's one part of it which I have never seen in print, and that was about a part of Francis Gary Powers's behavior in the course of that trial. There he was, on trial for his life so far as he could tell. He had been held for something like three months with no access to anyone except Soviet authorities, interrogators, and a "planted" cellmate. No Americans nor any foreigners. He'd been held completely isolated from information except what the Soviet authorities provided, and that seems to have been exaggerated accounts of the staggering consequences of his "crime." More than enough to warrant execution.

Q: And Bowden hadn't gotten there under any-

TOUMANOFF: No consular visits. Nobody. He was being interrogated for intelligence, and being prepared to be put on show at the trial.

Q: No press, period-not even Soviet?

TOUMANOFF: Bill, they wanted to have total control of what he knew, no surprises or conflicting information at the trial. It was to be as nearly totally scripted as they could manage. He was isolated from the world except as they wished him to think it. Outside, the Soviet propaganda machine was, of course, grinding full speed and at very high volume. Besides, Powers knew no Russian.

So there was Powers, on stage, for a Moscow theatrical, called trial; the full panoply of press from all the world in the balconies, provided with every technical facility; and a packed and picked Soviet audience below, largely KGB and military, plus some carefully selected foreigners, Lew Bowden and myself.

Q: You were the only two foreigners?

TOUMANOFF: The Powers family was there, with their lawyers. I don't know about others except for the press corps, which was international and included a large American contingent. The more press, the more cameras, the more microphones the better. Anybody that would serve their propaganda purposes.

Q: But the press corps was relatively open?

TOUMANOFF: Probably. Remember, this trial was staged for world-wide propaganda. Otherwise they could easily have tried Power in a closed, secret court, as they did with many dissidents.

I believe what follows has never been published. After introductory remarks by the Judge/Prosecutor the trial moved to presentation of evidence, and that is my topic. One bit of evidence presented was Powers' flight map with commentary stressing that the routing over Soviet cities was for bombing run practice to wreak future havoc and slaughter. At the end of the official presentation the Judge asked Powers if he had anything to say. To his surprise Powers rose and asked to see the map. It was the size of a newspaper page. Holding it up with his left hand, he examined it carefully, tracing his flight path with the index finger of his right. The map never shook. It was absolutely still and steady. Satisfied, he confirmed that it was his flight map, and handed it back. Two things struck me: on trial for his life he was suggesting by his request and action that he, at least, thought this court capable of presenting false or tampered evidence; and that he must have nerves of steel not to show the slightest tremor while doing so.

The Court then called a series of learned, scientific commissions, each of which had been tasked to examine other pieces of evidence. Each Commission, in turn, was introduced with elaborate recitations of the members' impressive credentials. Most were members of the Soviet National Academy of Sciences.

Q: Oh, to support the technical aspects.

TOUMANOFF: To support the weight of their testimony and findings. The first commission had been asked to examine his pistol, and they concluded that Powers had been given the pistol to murder innocent Soviet citizens. The judge, having set the precedent, again turned to Powers and asked "Is that your pistol?" The pistol was brought to him, Powers rose, looked at it and replied "Yes, that's my 22-calibre pistol." He then went on to explain that it was part of his survival gear, if down in the some wilderness, to be able to shoot small game such as birds, rabbits or squirrels, for food. The 22-caliber was well known in the Soviet Union, common in most of the world, it is a plinking gun. One that's not much good for anything larger than a woodchuck, or porcupine, if that.

Q: But not Soviet citizens.

TOUMANOFF: But not people. If your purpose were really to go murder people, which includes innocent Soviet citizens, you wouldn't take a .22; - in the 1950s more like a standard army Colt .45, as the Moros taught us in the Philippine War. So here's Powers, on trial for his life, discrediting the learned commission and its testimony, and undermining the validity of the court.

Q: To defend himself.

TOUMANOFF: Certainly in that legitimate mode, but risking his life by undermining the credibility of the Court.

Q: They couldn't cover up, they couldn't change that.

TOUMANOFF: The next learned commission dealt with the poison pin. And they, too, concluded and testified that it was given to Powers for him to murder innocent Soviet citizens, this time in a surreptitious fashion, so they might not even know that they had been poisoned with a deadly poison. Having set the pattern, the Judge felt obliged to turn again to Powers. He explained that this, too, was part of his accident gear. In case he was very badly injured, helpless, in agony, or attacked by wild beasts, with no prospect of survival, the pin would end his life quickly and painlessly.

Q: Or to silence himself under duress which, of course, was the big story.

TOUMANOFF: That aspect never came up in court, and couldn't. It would imply that Soviet interrogation might be savage. But once again, you see, he's attempting, and probably effectively, to discredit these learned commissions and undermine the process. The next learned commission was given what the commission described as "an incendiary device" designed to burn down "our homes, our factories, and our people's economy."

Q: With one airplane, which might have caught fire, but in the end-

TOUMANOFF: I'm not quoting exactly, but the general tenor was that this was to destroy the fabric of the society by flames. Again the Judge turns to Francis Gary Powers and again he rises to address the court, asks to see the device, and they hand him an object, the size of a small box of matches. He looked at it, and explained, "It is also a part of my survival equipment, a form of matches with which, if I'm down in a wilderness, to light a campfire, even with wet wood." Then Powers asked that the object be given to the interpreter so he could read and translate into Russian the instructions on the box. They turned out to be directions on how to build a campfire with wet wood. Powers then asked the interpreter to please turn the box over and describe the picture on the back. The interpreter turned the box, hesitated and looked at the judge. The judge ordered, "Do it!" And he said, "It's a picture of a campfire." Powers sat down.

Q: Out in the middle of the woods.

TOUMANOFF: And here's this extraordinary person, doing his quiet, dignified best, and succeeding, in revealing the court for the propaganda theatrical it was; in demonstrating before the journalists of the world the clumsy and cynical corruption of the Soviet judicial system along with its scholars; in defending his own nation as best he could; and deeply risking his own life in the process. So far as I can tell, the Western press missed it. Not one word of his astounding courage, integrity and loyalty under the most fearful conditions, was ever printed or broadcast. By that time the Western news media, as an entire institution, was in some sort of mass hysteria to condemn and sacrifice Francis Gary Powers for betrayal of America by "failure" to commit suicide. Scapegoating, I call it. I would ask whom and what our media was, itself, betraying by being blind or silent on his actions in court. Was it betrayal of him alone, or of our nation? Would we be better off if we felt betrayed, or if we recognized a heroic act by one of us? If he had used the pin on the ground, unhurt, would the flight not have been flown, the U-2 not crashed, the poison gone undetected, or Soviet response been different? Would we, as a nation, prefer suicide as our model, or Powers' acts in court had they been reported?

Q: Well, you remember, I'm sure, what was being reported in the press, that it was all aimed that way. It was the story.

TOUMANOFF: Oh, yes, of course I remember. It's one of the reasons I'm skeptical about press coverage of large political events.

Q: First of all, it involved an intelligence agency. Secondly, it involved a person who was doing something so secret, so sensitive, and thirdly, our worst enemy. It had to be that way. This was the only story.

TOUMANOFF: Powers couldn't use the pin when falling by parachute. He'd have to have used it on the ground after landing, and with no fatal injuries there would have been an autopsy to determine cause of death and the poison discovered. To my way of thinking, he used his head, and did not betray either his nation or his faith. On the contrary. What he did at that trial was truly heroic, and should have been reported as such. Actually, I suppose the fact that it was never reported probably saved his life. I doubt the Soviets would have forgiven him for so discrediting, before the eyes of the world, the regime and its great show trial.

Q: The prosecutor didn't have to be so stupid, either. They could have read the box of matches first.

TOUMANOFF: Yes, or just adhered strictly to the truth, especially with their commissions and phoney conclusions. They had the plane, they had the pilot, they had all the equipment and all the documentation. They even had the President's confirmation of responsibility. Our action, its danger and its consequences were more than enough to capture the attention of the world. They didn't need the theatricals.

Q: How long was it between-

TOUMANOFF: They held Powers for a couple of months or more before the trial. They had already blown away Ike's visit and the Paris multilateral summit.

Q: Oh, yes. They needed it. They needed all that ideological support, and they just missed it.

TOUMANOFF: They also wanted time to interrogate, to get all the information they could out of Powers, and to prepare him for the trial. The fascinating thing is the psychology of that period. (Maybe I should tell you another travel incident. I'll do that next, you know, another extraordinary kind of vignette of life for a foreigner in Russia.) I mean, for all their interrogation and observation they had failed to see what kind of a human being he was. They had put him up on trial convinced that, faced with the possibility of a death verdict, he would be perfectly compliant and, when asked if he had anything to say, would confirm the preceding "evidence" by having nothing to say, or by acknowledging, "Yes, that's my route map. Yes, that's my pistol, of course, of course. Yes, that's my incendiary device. Yes, that's my poison pin." The last thing in the world they expected was a challenge of the findings of their learned commissions.

Q: And they'd come to all the conclusions from their experience with earlier Moscow show trials of purged communist leaders.

TOUMANOFF: Who admitted to all the false accusations and confirmed those massive propaganda exercises, in the hope of saving their lives and possibly others'.

Q: They couldn't. It wasn't planned enough.

TOUMANOFF: And I was taken aback. At first I couldn't believe my eyes and ears as I watched and heard him, quietly, with respect and dignity, do what he did. And there was a strength and integrity to him that came through, so when he said to the court, "I could never think of shooting a person," it rang true.

Q: Yes, and while he had received his training, he had been well briefed, should this ever happen, and so on. There was just plain self-integrity and intelligence. Maybe they picked him for that reason.

TOUMANOFF: Well, they recruited the right guy.

Q: They did indeed.

TOUMANOFF: Also an enormously skilled pilot.

Q: Help those of us that can't remember the denouement of the story. What happened?

TOUMANOFF: To Powers?

Q: Yes.

TOUMANOFF: It's a tragic story. When he was released by the Soviets it took some time for him to recover. Then he left Government service, was divorced, and had difficulty finding employment. Meanwhile he married a psychiatrist he had worked with during his recovery. Then...

Q: He was married at the time he was released, though. Mrs. Powers withdrew?

TOUMANOFF: I don't know how it happened. Well, she was a difficult person, and in a difficult time.

Q: She had reason to be, in the sense that his U-2 service wasn't a happy lifestyle either.

TOUMANOFF: Yes, well, there were all kinds of reasons why that marriage might not survive. Anyway, they were divorced. And in due course he remarried.

Q: Because he came back relatively soon after his trial?

TOUMANOFF: He was traded for some Soviet agent we had in prison. I've forgotten the details, but it's all published. I think it was more like two or three years later, and he came back to the Agency.

Q: They didn't ask to talk to you.

TOUMANOFF: No, there was no reason for them to talk to me. I'd be very surprised if they didn't have someone at the trial. He eventually wound up in Los Angeles as a helicopter traffic reporter for some Los Angeles radio station. The fuel gauge on his helicopter was faulty and showed empty when there was still a large amount of fuel in the tank. So he would disregard the fuel gauge and keep on flying because he knew how much fuel there was left. He was a very skilled pilot and probably knew the fuel consumption rate of his aircraft. Some klutz of a mechanic fixed the fuel gauge without telling him, and so of course, he ran out of gas, crashed, and was killed.

Q: He was alone, flying alone?

TOUMANOFF: I guess so, no one else was mentioned in the press reports.

Q: I hope the press got it right this time.

TOUMANOFF: I couldn't have known any of this unless it was reported in the press. I'm sure I read it in the newspapers. This was not many years later.

Q: I'm asking this not only for more facts, but also because I was left with the impression that his reputation had not survived the U-2 episode - that he went out of government without a good reputation.

TOUMANOFF: That's right. Yes. And I think totally unfairly. He really should have been a hero. I'm sure there were those who defended him. He must have been defended by part of the press, but he was forever tarnished with that "betrayal" brush.

Q: And the trial was thought of by many as a typical Soviet setup.

TOUMANOFF: Well, it was fascinating for me because you don't often get to see a Moscow show trial. They don't have them all that often. It was fascinating to see how they staged it. This wasn't law or due process or anything like it. It was theater. Very heavy handed theater at that.

I was going to tell you about an episode which demonstrated a different psychology. It was, in essence, an arrest situation.

Every now and then one got tired of being cooped up in Moscow. So Eileen and I decided one early spring day to get in the car and drive out to the 25 kilometer mark, and then turn around and come back, which we could do without going through the tedium of obtaining Foreign Ministry permission. So we picked a highway at random, and headed off. Not very far out of Moscow, but way beyond the limits of the city itself, we came to small church, still standing, down a dirt track. We walked down the track to the church, which was open and contained a collection of icons painted in a style I had never seen. I asked and received permission from an attendant to photograph them, took color pictures of a half dozen, about which the attendant knew nothing, except that they were old. I thought I might have documented a unique, local style. We drove on and came to a large village with a small Kremlin, a sort of a walled citadel, with some church spires showing over the wall. The sun was setting, there was snow everywhere, and this beautiful pink light colored the scene of the wall and church tops with snow on them.

TOUMANOFF: Right! So we stopped and I told Eileen I'd take some pictures and be right back. Eileen stayed in the car, and I hopped out and took a couple of shots. I then said I'd walk around to the other side of the Kremlin, maybe 50 yards, and take some more pictures from there.

Q: You were already in the kremlin.

TOUMANOFF: No, I was taking pictures of the kremlin itself from the road, which went past it along one wall. So I went ahead and around the corner of the wall, out of sight from the car. With the camera to my eye taking the second batch, I felt as though I was sort of collecting a crowd. But that was not unusual for foreigners in Russia in those days, and I went on shooting without lowering my camera. When I did, the crowd turned out to be a half dozen troopers with their rifles pointed at my stomach. They all looked very young, very nervous, but grimly determined. So I kept my hands on the camera at my chest, smiled at them, spotted the sergeant in charge and said to him, "I think you must have a problem of some sort. Tell me about it, and what can I do to help you with it?" using the polite form of "you" and in fluent Russian. Well, nobody expected that, and the sergeant had not been addressed as 'thou' probably since birth, certainly not for years in the army. The tension broke, the troopers' guns started to droop. In a quite normal, almost conversational tone he said, "I have orders to arrest you and bring you in." I replied, "Well, I'll be perfectly happy to come with you, but you can't arrest me because I'm an American diplomat - my name is Vladimir Toumanoff - and we have diplomatic immunity. But if you'll just ask one of your boys to go tell my wife, she speaks Russian, that I'm going with you, I'll be happy to come along and see if I can help solve the problem, whatever it is." By this time the sergeant and his kids, the troopers, were greatly relieved. He said yes he would, took one of his troopers aside for some orders, who then left in the direction of the car, and we set off in the opposite direction trailed by the squad. Of course the trooper didn't, so Eileen was left wondering where I'd disappeared to. We took a small path in the snow across a field. I said, "Well, how far are we going?" and he said, not very far, you can see, there's another village down the path." It was a few hundred yards away.

Q: They were friendly to you.

TOUMANOFF: Yes. I struck up a conversation with the sergeant and we were chatting about the weather and about the birds and the geese and fishing and farming, and I was telling him about raising pheasants in New Hampshire. We had hardly gone a hundred feet when the sergeant, who was walking alongside me, looked at me and said, "You know, you don't have a hat and you're going to catch a dreadful cold. Here, wear my hat." He took off his warm, uniform hat and gave it to me, and I put it on. We walked along chatting happily, with the guys in back listening with all their ears.

Q: You didn't mention your meeting the week before with Khrushchev and the ambassador.

TOUMANOFF: No, no, no. I didn't want to pull rank on this guy. We were talking to each other as equals. You see, he had not arrested me. I was happily coming along to help solve a problem that he had. He took his hat back before we actually entered the village, and everybody sort of straightened up and pulled themselves together, and he marched briskly forward looking more military. He stopped me in the center of a small village square, saying, "You stay here," and left his little troop with me so that I wouldn't run away. He walked into a fairly good-sized hut facing the square, and I gave him about - I suppose I gave him about 15 seconds or so, and walked in after him. The troopers were so surprised they didn't try to stop me, I was walking into the command post after my friend their sergeant!

Q: And it was warmer in there.

TOUMANOFF: Well, they didn't even come in with me. They entered command posts only on orders. They were doubtless obediently staying behind me someplace in the square until ordered to move. There was a central dirt floor with rooms opening off it, and I walked in just in time to see the sergeant walk into the room on the right. Again, I gave him a few seconds to report and walked in after him. There was a desk facing the door with a young man in uniform sitting behind it, and a collection of six or eight people standing around in the room, maybe some 20 feet square. The sergeant, standing before the desk, had evidently just saluted when I walked in. I went up to the desk and asked, "Are you in command here?" Surprised, the man said, "Yes, I am." And I put my hand out, reached across the desk and shook his warmly, introducing myself by name. I said, "I am an American diplomat, Second Secretary of the United States Embassy in Moscow. I understand you have a problem of some kind. What can I do to help you?" It was not combative. It was not confrontational. I was quite sincere, and there obviously was a problem. It was not my problem. It was his problem. And I was here offering to help if I could.

Q: You didn't even talk about the fact that you were within the acceptable travel zone of Moscow.

TOUMANOFF: No, no, no. You know, I wasn't going to start asking questions about what I had done wrong, or justifying myself in advance. That would have been just the wrong foot to start. By that time the officer (he was that, although he never gave me his rank or name) had gathered himself and said, rather formally and authoritatively "I have orders to take your camera."

Q: Okay, that's understandable.

TOUMANOFF: Not only did that tell me the problem was that I had taken a picture of some prohibited object, but it was a considerable relief for me to know that it was nothing more serious. Moreover, I knew that the ultimate solution would likely be exposure of the film. But I was reluctant to do that because I had all those pictures of what might be quite rare and unique icons on the roll. He also was relieved, there would be no language barrier between us, no panic or anger or fear, and he also knew that I was an Officer of the most important Embassy, and probably that I outranked him. So I looked at him seriously and said "Well, you know, I regret it, but I cannot give you my camera. As a diplomat I have diplomatic immunity, and that applies to my personal possessions." He replied equally seriously, not threateningly, "But I have orders to take your camera." I said, earnestly, in the tone of discussing a common problem, "I have with me my Diplomatic Identity Pass issued by your Ministry of Foreign Affairs, which includes the text of the immunity law, and as an American Diplomat accredited to your Government, I may not violate your laws." With that I showed him my Pass.

Q: The law, I guess.

TOUMANOFF: The Soviet law. I was not going to make it easy, and I wanted if possible for him to propose the obvious solution, to expose the film. I was prepared to do that if necessary, but I certainly didn't want to lose my camera if that could be avoided. Besides it was still a very civil conversation.

Q: Or lose your camera because once in their hands it likely would never be returned.

TOUMANOFF: Or lose my camera. But the camera was really sort of a test to see how far he would put up with this kind of legalism coming from me. He could easily have just ordered his men to take the camera - and that would be the last of it. Or just keep me there, knowing Eileen was sitting in the car wondering and worrying. But that would have demonstrated military disregard for Soviet law. In addition, he did not want a diplomatic incident to mar his military record. And in a way he was enjoying the novel experience of dealing with this Official American in easy Russian. He excused himself and went to a telephone on the wall. I did not hear the conversation, but when he returned he said, "Well, give me the film instead of the camera." That was good news. They were prepared to, sort of, negotiate. So I said, "The difficulty is, I can't give you the film for the same reason, but I can take it out of the camera and expose it. But please make sure that solves the problem, because I have these pictures of the icons from that little church back there and I'd hate to lose them for nothing. If it will solve the problem, I'll do it."

"All right, just a minute." and he went to a telephone. More muffled conversation. He came back and said, "Good, expose it." I did, and he said, "Okay, now it's no good to you, so give me the film."

I objected, said I thought we had agreed, and didn't understand why there was still a problem.

He said, "I need to have your film. Those are my orders." So we went back and forth about this a little bit, I was still amicable, still relaxed, although in the presence of others he was a bit more formal and military in his bearing than I, but not showing any strong emotion.

Q: He had his orders.

TOUMANOFF: Yes, he had his orders. So I finally said, "I tell you what. I'll burn it for you." I had given him a little time to propose it himself, but he didn't and couldn't. I found out later why. I was also thinking about Eileen, but assumed the trooper had told her, so she would at least know what to report if I didn't return. But I added that this time he should make sure that would end it, or we might have a much larger problem on our hands. After a much longer telephone call he returned and, to my surprise, said "Okay, burn it." They brought a tin bucket and some matches, and I started to burn the film. Of course it was safety film and would only melt slowly in gobs. At that point a shadowy figure, the only one in the room in civilian clothing, whom I hadn't noticed before, remarked with pride in his voice "Our film burns just like that." and snapped his fingers.

Q: Oh, God love 'em.

TOUMANOFF: And I thought, he has just made three mistakes, and probably regrets it already (he had left the room). He has revealed to me, and to any of the others who didn't already know, that he is KGB; he has told me that Soviet espionage film burns, and may be designed to burn, rapidly; and that a possible reason for the reluctance to propose burning, and the long phone call, is that they may have a process to recover images from a film exposed to daylight.

So I melted the film glob by glob, put the empty spindle in my pocket and said, "Okay, that's it." The Officer said, "Yes, that's fine," and offered me the sergeant as guide back to the car. I turned down the offer with thanks, we shook hands with something of a grin, and I left.

Q: They had an outstanding regulation that said "no cameras."

TOUMANOFF: Well, back at the embassy telling the story I discovered that the small kremlin, churches and all, was used as some kind of military base, and obviously off limits for photography. Typically, there were no signs or notices.

In any case we parted in a friendly way, almost reluctantly.

Q: Except your wife. She wasn't happy sitting back in the car..

TOUMANOFF: Poor Eileen, she was distraught. But while I was gone, seeing her distress some little old grannies had come to the car to comfort her and tell her everything would be all right. They were delighted that she understood them and spoke some Russian, and were terribly solicitous, and I think they brought her some hot tea and a bun or something, and they stayed until they saw me coming.

The point of this long story is that in 1959 there was a deep reservoir of goodwill for America in the Russian population, even, given a chance, for spontaneous friendship between a transgressing, obviously "White" emigré Russian turned U.S. diplomat and wholly Soviet-trained, young Red Army Noncoms and Officers. I fear we've lost all that by the end of the century.

I think the next topic, the U.S./Soviet Science and Technology Exchange Agreement, still about Moscow, is an illustration of Soviet negotiation methods. Detlev Bronk, President of the U.S. National Academy of Sciences, came to Moscow in 1959 as the head of a delegation to negotiate the first scientific and technical exchange program. I was detailed to that delegation. The negotiations went reasonably well. They were not terribly difficult, but there were interests that had to be reconciled on both sides, and there were practical arrangements for implementation. Difficulties arose later in practice and with sub-agreements on particular disciplines, but this master agreement raised no grave problems.

Q: And you didn't sense being misled or tricked or anything like that. It was a scientific exchange.

TOUMANOFF: No. For one thing it became obvious from early on that the Soviet group was under imperative orders to have a successful outcome and a signed agreement before Bronk left. So they were quite cooperative, compared to their usual practice, that is. And it was certainly our intention to have the negotiations succeed. So for the most part it was just a question of arranging the details and the mechanics and the subject matter that would be included in the basic concept of science and technology, and what would or might be not included. Moreover a good deal of preparatory work had been done, and there was no great disagreement over the purpose. So we completed the substantive negotiations and marked up text on the next to last day of Bronk's visit. The Soviet side promised to prepare overnight and deliver the next morning a clean, full text in both languages for signature by Bronk and the Soviet Academy President. That last day Bronk and his delegation were scheduled to be the guests of the Soviet Academy President in visits to various Soviet academic and research centers that would participate in the exchanges, followed by a press conference to report on the negotiations. I was left behind to check both language versions of the full text. I checked the English version first and it was fine. But when I read the Russian I ran into a headlong collision.

Bronk was authorized by the Academy to negotiate an agreement text, but subject to review and approval, or change, by the U.S. Academy. In either case the text was to be returned to Moscow - changes, if any, would be negotiated thereafter.

The English version of that process stated that a signed Agreement text would be taken to Washington by Bronk and submitted for approval to the American Academy, and a text would be returned to Moscow. The Russian language, however has no definite or indefinite articles - no "a" or "an" or "the." So the Russian version read that "signed Agreement text would be taken to Washington by Bronk and submitted to American Academy for approval, and text would be returned to Moscow." In the Russian there was no room for changes, especially as "approval" in this context in the USSR, at every level except the secretive Politburo, meant just that - an automatic, enthusiastic rubber stamp.

I pointed out the resulting important difference between the two language versions and suggested we insert the word "draft" in both. The Russians objected fiercely and refused outright. It became clear to me that, although they never quite admitted it, the Soviet team was under imperative orders to produce a completed, signed, formal Agreement and, given the importance of this first scientific and technical exchange with America, the Russian text must have already been approved at the highest Party and Government levels. I left it that I would have to point out the difference to President Bronk. They pointed out to me that he was probably in a car or they didn't quite know where he might be and they couldn't reach him, so I'd have to wait until he got back. With that in mind I asked when the delegation would return. Stone wall. Nobody knew. I finally took up a post on the grand front steps of the building intending to catch him there. While I waited they assembled a huge crowd, including an array of journalists, correspondents, cameramen, sound technicians, floodlights and a lot of husky security guys on the steps of this pavilion where we had negotiated. So I moved to the bottom of those steps, where the cavalcade of cars would pull up. Time passed. It was well after the time for the scheduled news conference, late in the afternoon, when finally the cavalcade showed up. I assumed the front car would be security and went quickly to the second car, opened the door, and there was Bronk. He looked tired and bleary. I tried to explain, saw I was not getting through, and I got the clear impression that he was not only exhausted but that he had had to drink a lot of toasts. I was still trying to catch his attention and explain about the two versions when a couple of Russians pulled him out on the far side and started to hustle him up the steps. I tried to reach him and was slowed by some very broad backed guys who surged around me. Meantime, other Russians congealed around Bronk and made a hullabaloo escorting him up the steps, saying that everybody was waiting for the press conference and that he had to be rushed through because everything was scheduled, and the lights blazed and cameras ground and correspondents with microphones pressed in asking questions while they hustled him up the stairs with me clambering along trying to catch his attention. Always there seemed to be these great hulks of guys between me and Bronk until he disappeared through the doors while I was elbowed aside. They claimed he was being taken somewhere to freshen up and he was not available to see me. The human barrier remained effective until by the time I managed to get through, the full panoply press conference was already underway with Bronk seated at a beige-covered table signing the Agreement among Soviet dignitaries, and the speeches and celebration began. It was too late. I would never be allowed to disrupt those proceedings, and I didn't want to. So the different versions remained. Their "negotiating" tactics had prevailed.

Q: Vlad, you have to drop the other shoe. Did they come back? Did the U.S. side come back with any problem?

TOUMANOFF: I never did hear the end of the story but assume no issue ever arose, certainly not one important enough to risk the Agreement, or one that couldn't be resolved otherwise.

Q: Much ado about nothing-maybe.

TOUMANOFF: Yes, but part of your task as a Foreign Service Officer, when you bump into such seemingly minor grammatical ambiguities, is either to resolve them if possible, or if not, or if the price of resolution is too high, to make sure that everybody on both sides who has authority and is responsible for the negotiations is aware of the ambiguity and whatever risk they may entail. In this case the Soviets simply manipulated us into an impossibility before the highly public signature. The risk, of course was that any attempt by the American side to make changes in the Agreement pursuant to U.S. Academy review would give the Soviets an excuse to charge us with failure strictly to abide by its terms.

Q: Unable to alert Bronk before the great signing ceremony, you did it at some other time before the departure of the U.S. Delegation?

TOUMANOFF: Yes, I found other members of the Delegation because Bronk was to be inaccessible until he got on the airplane.

Q: Your role was fully played. Just a little bit delayed.

TOUMANOFF: Actually, I never thought so. We, including myself, should have anticipated the possibility of some problem with the two texts on the last day, and made arrangements for the Delegation, or at least Bronk and some senior members to meet privately before the signing. I learned not to place one's self in Soviet hands for all the logistics and other arrangements, and determined to prevent that whenever I could. I think perhaps Bronk learned that, too.

Q: Or perhaps he raised that with the Soviets before he left Moscow.

TOUMANOFF: He may have, or communicated with Washington. But I doubt both. As a wise old bird I suspect he had taken the measure of the Soviet desire for the Agreement, and was sure they would not make an issue of some subsequent changes. Lots of problems arose, but later in the practices of the scientific exchanges. In any case, I dropped out of the picture.

Q: One more role by a Foreign Service Officer. Now are we going to leave Moscow? What items are left?

TOUMANOFF: Well, Bill, there are a couple of more items still from Moscow, which I think might be useful or describe what life was like there and in a good many other posts and, increasingly I'm afraid, in many places where the dangers of the Foreign Service are becoming greater. Also maybe instructive of how to manage these kinds of difficulties, which I think probably everybody in the Foreign Service comes to face sooner or later somewhere. One of them concerns the KGB and the fact that wherever we went, in Moscow or out, we were followed. Every American diplomat was followed. They were sometimes very subtle about it and sometimes very, very obvious, and this was intentional. When you got into your car, for example, there would always be a Soviet counterintelligence car that followed you. Sometimes they'd follow you very, very closely and make themselves almost dangerously obvious, by tailgating. And they'd keep that up for a while and then, all of a sudden, they would stop, and seemingly disappear. If we bothered to keep an eye on our rear-view mirror, they would sometimes be the second car behind you, or the third, or vanish altogether, only to turn up some minutes later. We learned to read number plates, if they happened to carry a number plate. It became sort of a game, like children counting cows on a trip. After a while, one way or another, we came to know their practices, or ways to detect the followers, such as stopping, or taking several turns down side streets. But that game, too, could easily be overdone. Their rules were simple. Never acknowledge their presence, and give them no trouble. They had little sense of humor if you violated their rules. Basically, they wanted you to assume you would always be followed. I suspect that is the practice of counterintelligence services all over the world. Until they suspect you of real espionage, that is. Then, I suppose, they get much more secretive.

The second aspect of this is having listening devices in your housing, your phones, your car or aimed at you outside, trying to overhear everything you said, everything that went on. Let me talk about the microphones in housing. One technique that my wife and I developed, apart from writing each other notes and burning them, which is time consuming and messy. When we wanted to communicate something that we really did not want to have overheard, we used an ordinary mailing tube. You put one end of a cardboard mailing tube to your mouth and the other end to your wife's ear (and vice versa) and whisper, so that no sound escaped into the room. It was quick and easy, and it worked nicely so we got quite used to it, although it was a longish tube. At one hilarious point, we found ourselves one evening, having already gone to bed, with my wife 'way over on her side of the bed and I 'way over on mine, talking to each other through this mailing tube. Well, we broke up in giggles and laughter over this new kind of pillow talk, Soviet style. It was a while before either remembered what we had been talking about. But that's a simple, and turned out to be a fun way to beat the mikes.

Q: Maybe I should make it clear that you and your wife were not exchanging classified information, but rather it was for personal reasons. Would you like to talk a little bit to the kind of information you felt you had to write out or whisper through the tube?

TOUMANOFF: Oh, all sorts of things. Our finances, accounts of conversations with Russian friends. Friends' names. Travel plans and accounts of travels. Impressions and opinions about events and personalities. Thoughts about our children and their reactions to life in Moscow. Health, state of mind. Annoyances and satisfactions. Sometimes it was just personal, about ourselves. or families at home. This is the kind of information which the KGB in those days would accumulate to look for weaknesses.

Q: That's the point, some weakness.

TOUMANOFF: Yes, is this an officer with financial troubles who might be bribable? Is this an officer we can get to through some friends? Is this an officer with sympathies for socialism? Et cetera, et cetera.

Q: It's data-gathering on you as a family.

TOUMANOFF: Yes, it's biographical on our family. Are the husband and wife getting along together, or are they fighting all the time? You know, can we interest this officer or his wife in some Russian romance? Are either one disaffected? How's their mental health?

Q: Is there a weakness in that family that we can exploit?

TOUMANOFF: Exactly, so it's that kind of information. Occasionally I needed to tell her about some Embassy business which would involve her, that the KGB would like to know in advance?

Q: -or a little bit of gossip.

TOUMANOFF: Yes, or a little bit of gossip, so that you tended to play it safe and communicate in some fashion which the KGB could not pick up. Days would go by without the tube, but now and then it was handy.

Q: Something that I know my wife and I very much noticed, and I'm sure you and others, too. It's just to irritate, to get us tensed up - calls in the middle of the night.

TOUMANOFF: Never had midnight calls. But yes, there was a certain element of harassment - which included sending these gigantic useless Foreign Ministry diplomatic notes on Christmas Eve and New Year's Eve. But I mentioned those earlier.

Q: Striped pants life under the Communist system.

TOUMANOFF: Exactly. Let me go back to this business of being followed. The other aspect of it, Bill, is that - as you probably experienced yourself - eventually, maybe after six months or ten months or a year of this, but sooner or later it gets on your nerves. You just get sick and tired of being followed all the time, especially as you are not doing anything that in any way would be hostile or in some fashion illegal or improper. There are several techniques for getting rid of or losing the people who follow you, but you do that at your peril, and under almost every conceivable circumstance I can think of, you simply resist that temptation. You do not play games. You do not even acknowledge to the followers that you're aware of the fact that you are being followed and that they are the followers. It's as though they simply do not exist. That's the-

Q: And we are so briefed because the chances are we will be hurt by or we will make errors.

TOUMANOFF: So sooner or later this following becomes an annoyance, enough on your nerves that you do something which gives them an excuse to throw you out of the country, and that's a disservice to your own country, because once you've been thrown out, the chances are you'll never be able to go back so your usefulness to your own government has suddenly been curtailed sharply for the rest of your career, especially if you're a Soviet specialist. And a good many people do get thrown out - sometimes absolutely arbitrarily with no reason whatsoever, and sometimes for mistakes that they've made - or, you know, some of these techniques of trapping people such as finding some Russian so-called friend who'll hand you a package or paper, and you are immediately pounced upon because the paper, it turns out, allegedly contains some sort of secrets.

Q: The famous one being Professor Barghorn.

TOUMANOFF: So what I'm about to tell you is really a kind of lesson in what not to do. When I was followed it was either in a car or on foot. But I had a bicycle in Moscow, and once I finally got tired of being followed. I knew a path that went across a swamp, went over a brook in the middle on a large gas or oil pipeline, and then out the other side. So I got on my bicycle, took this path, and was careful not to look back. Obviously my Soviet agent companions, who were following me in a car, could neither drive their car nor keep up with my bicycle on foot. It was a big swamp without a road in sight on the other side.

Q: Some very angry KGB people.

TOUMANOFF: Yes, I was playing games, and that's exactly what you should never do. That could have been sufficient to have me thrown out. But by that time, I had this small element of protection from my contact with Khrushchev. The KGB would be a little reluctant to pester me or move against me. That might be at some risk to themselves, because if my action was seemingly innocent - such as this bicycle ride - they would expect that the American ambassador might complain to Khrushchev. I also calculated that they certainly had the capacity to radio ahead to some police car on the other side of the swamp to pick me up as I emerged from the path, so it was not that great a risk. But it is not recommended. Without that special protection - which in this case I was relying on, not relying with certainty but counting on as a possible deterrent, a measure of protection - I would not have done it.

Q: A timely story to end your stay in Moscow?

TOUMANOFF: That's it. That's all for Moscow.

LEWIS W. BOWDEN
Political Officer
Moscow (1958-1960)

U.S. - USSR Economic Council
Washington, DC (1974-1978)

Lewis W. Bowden was born in 1924 and raised in Oklahoma and Kansas. He received a bachelor's degree from Yale University and a master's degree from Columbia University. Mr. Bowden's career with the Foreign Service included positions in Belgrade, Bern, Moscow, and Brasilia. He was interviewed by Robert J. Martins on October 31, 1991.

Q: Then you went back to Russian studies at Oberammergau.

BOWDEN: Yes. I had applied to go to this kind of Russian high school there for eight or nine months.

Q: An advanced Russian course with all the instruction being in Russian by native language speaking officers.

BOWDEN: From that point of view it was very useful. I got my Russian back after no use for a few years. So I felt perfectly at home when I finally did get to the Soviet Union the following year.

Q: You arrived in the summer of 1958, as I recall since I was about to leave when you arrived.

BOWDEN: Yes, I replaced you. That was an interesting time to arrive. You may remember that when I got there I was taken to the apartment from the airport. I phoned in the next morning to find out when I should report in and was told not to come downtown because the Embassy was surrounded by agitators and people protesting the landing of the Marines in Lebanon.

I should add that later on I found they also threw ink pots filled with ink. They went all over the rugs and walls in the Embassy apartments. This created a big clean up job later on.

Within a couple of days I managed to get into the Embassy and reported for work. I moved into your old job. Incidentally when they did a very thorough search of that building some years later they discovered microphones behind the radiator in your office and mine. They never found out if the microphones worked, but they surely were in the wall and got taken out eventually by security.

Q: No great surprise.

BOWDEN: Hardly a surprise. They were pretty cleverly hidden because the radiator was made of metal and when the detectors went around the room they got thrown off by the metal in the radiators.

I was dealing with internal matters with a guy named Bob Owens. That year from rocking throwing at the Embassy, about a year later we were all at Sekolniki Park with Vice President Nixon, who opened the first ever American exhibition in the country...and that is where he and Khrushchev got into the big argument...

BOWDEN: The kitchen debate. That was the high point of that year. Then the following year, the high point came on May 1 or 2 when we learned that the Russians had shot down one way or another the U-2 and had Francis Gary Powers, the pilot, in their custody. I spent from May until the time I left in August, tracking everything I could find in the Soviet press and radio and television about the U-2 and the background of flights over the USSR, etc. I did not attend the trial which started shortly after I left because I was at that time in the political section and the judgment had been made that someone from the consular section should appropriately go under our consular convention to be our Embassy's amicus curiae, friend of the court. As a matter of fact Powers was visited by our consular people and indeed somebody was present at the trial.

Q: Would you comment on this and the ups and downs of that period -- the degree to which you had contact and any opinions you might have formed regarding the attitudes of the population towards the system?

BOWDEN: The atmosphere was certainly a changing one... Through the exchanges that were being set in motion and was culminated in the exhibition probably. There was a certain loosening up under very tight controls and set of rules. It was monitored, of course, from the Soviet side, but still there was an increase in contacts of all kinds in various fields.

I don't really have any first hand experience of people expressing dissent about the system except possibly, as you were saying, when you got outside of Moscow. Access to the Embassy was absolutely controlled. It was virtually impossible to get into anybody's house. We did have access occasionally through people like Ed Stevenson, who lived outside. He was a newspaperman who had been there for ages and had a Russian wife. It was possible to meet people at his house who were kind of in a halfway world. They had a green light to go there where there was foreknowledge that Embassy people would be there. That kind of contact was where people got their principal information about things that never appeared in the press.

I think probably this whole process of slight loosening up would probably have gone on and pursued its course if it had not been for the U-2. You remember that Eisenhower went to Geneva and Khrushchev came back from Geneva having rejected everything that was proposed in light of what had happened. So the U-2 put a definite stop for a period of time to the loosening up that had been underway.

The U-2 affair drew very strange reactions from the Russians, including Khrushchev himself. We learned, for example, as a result of the U-2 affairs, that the Soviets knew for many years that we were doing overflights. In fact, we were doing overflights in lumbering airplanes like C-54s with open doors through which people would put a camera out and take pictures. Because the Soviets did not have a coordinated radar air control they couldn't actually pin point the aircraft to do any surveillance. They would send their fighters up and look all over the Ukraine looking for these airplanes but never found them. It was frustrating as could be.

Then they revealed that they had been watching the U-2 go over for a couple of years and were unable to reach it with their anti-aircraft rockets. This was a further frustration to them.

Then when they displayed the remains of the U-2 with the photographs it was taking, all the Russians both official and regular public were astounded at the technology of this aircraft and cameras. The Russians had nothing remotely like it at the time and it simply reinforced in the Soviet mind the conviction that the West was technologically far more advanced than they were not withstanding all the propaganda and ballyhoo. So it had a certain sobering and healthy affect on a lot of the policy makers in the USSR. But they had rejected, you remember, Eisenhower's Open Skies plan. We said that if they rejected it we would do it anyway, so we opened up their skies and were studying their installations. This gave them quite a start when they finally realized the full extent of the intelligence we had available as a result of these flights.

***

BOWDEN: I was part of the original group that drafted the charter for the US-USSR Economic Council. It was part and parcel of the Trade Agreement and designed to provide a forum where American businessmen could find out opportunities, sales and purchases that existed in the Soviet Union and since it had equal representation from the Soviets they would be able to provide the information necessary on their economy to get trade and financial activity going.

In theory, I think it was a find idea. Although, as you indicated, some of the fundamental assumptions never actually materialized. Like the MFN, Most Favored Nation status for the USSR, which probably would have stimulated some more exports from the USSR. It is never clear if you run things like this out mathematically how much difference it would have made. We would have had a chance to find out if the Soviet Union hadn't fallen apart recently.

In any event, things never really got off the ground. There were a lot of meetings, in fact there are still meetings of this Council. A lot of very important people have been associated with it -- Don Kendell, was chairman for a long time. What was done is not very clear. I mean in terms of things that are not done other wise. But I think it was a good idea at the time to really try to get things moving between us in an economic sense.

I have to comment that this is a concept that we had since the early 1930s. One of the reasons for reestablishing relations with Russia by President Roosevelt in 1933, was to stimulate trade and economic energy between the two countries. We had moved pretty clearly into the depression period and it was thought that the USSR would be a purchaser of things manufactured and grown in the United States, and this would help to pull us out of the depression. This is clear from letters that President Roosevelt wrote at the time. And this never materialized because the Soviet economy was going more on all the time due to the policies adopted by the government. As far as I know there was nothing but a steady decline from 1928 to 1948. I have been told the trade turnover between our two countries, if you take the grain element out...the Soviets buy grain when they are not able to produce enough to satisfy domestic needs.

Q: This was a period on the political side where Stalin, going back to the 30s, regarded the Soviet Union being besieged on all sides by a hostile world. Economic aspects flowed out of the political picture as well.

BOWDEN: It did not want to be dependent on any foreign economic source because that would be a source of weakness which could be exploited by your enemies.

So we had this in the early 1930s and again in the 70s. It periodically rears its head. It really leads you to the question if you look at the two economies and trade patterns, are we natural trading partners or isn't that just some kind of a myth that has grown among us and is not very likely ever to be realized. I think that is probably the case. The natural partners of Russia may very well be in Europe and Asia and not the United States. But now it is very difficult to tell, sitting here today.

Q: The Soviet Union hasn't sorted out enough to tell much of anything. Lets go back now to your entering Treasury.

BOWDEN: The exact name of this thing was the US-Saudi Commission on Technical Cooperation. It was an Executive Agreement negotiated between us and the Saudis. Treasury, the State Department, the Embassy and the Ministry of Finance out there were all involved in this. In effect what it led to was a kind of AID program for the transfer of technology from the United States to Saudi Arabia in a number of fields...agriculture, manual training, computer technology, you name it, for which they would foot the bill. They were even willing to fund all the positions in the Treasury Department related to the coordinating role, which was my role basically. But we had 12 or 13 other US Government agencies involved in this program together with a number of private businesses. As the program grew it was our policy to try to enlist the private sector to the extent possible, where it clearly had the resources to do the job rather than put an agency of the US Government into the act which in turn would probably have had to engage private resources in any event.

This program grew from nothing...when I arrived it was nothing but a piece of paper, there was no staff, no program or anything else...by the end of the four years, at the time I left, there were 19 or 20 projects worth about a billion dollars. We had all told probably between 350 and 400 people in Saudi Arabia in various locations doing these projects and here in Washington about 100 people as back up, making sure that the resources got sent and that our people were served and dealing with the private companies, etc.

So it was a big program, an interesting thing. In fact I feel it was the most creative thing I ever did in the Foreign Service. It certainly didn't do me any good in terms of the Foreign Service because, if you look back on it I left the State Department in 1970 and by 1978 nobody remembers that I belonged to the State Department. I had not gone back to the State Department since leaving in the summer of 1970. There is obviously a lesson there, out of sight, out of mind.

There was an election in 1976 and President Carter came in with his new crew and the position that I occupied at the Treasury Department was officially a political level position. Politics had nothing to do with my being there. It was absolutely an accident. I was the guy they knew and thought could do the job and pulled me in as I was also available. But when the new Administration came in, my boss, and I think in general at Treasury the new regime looked upon me as a Republican political appointment, regardless of all my protestations, that was the way it was seen.

So it quickly became apparent that I had no future in that Administration because I felt I was ready to go on to bigger and better things. In fact anything that anybody wanted to assign me to of a non-technical nature I felt quite confident I could handle. I thought I had demonstrated that. But that was not to be because I was persona non grata within the Treasury Department to the Administration. So I looked down the road and said I guess the only thing I can do is go out and get a job in the private sector, which is what I did.

I retired out of the Treasury at the end of 1978 and was very pleased to have my retirement ceremony party in the cash room at Treasury, which is one of the most beautiful rooms in the entire city. It is now used exclusively for official state banquets by the Secretary of the Treasury. It was remodeled and brought into absolutely superb shape when Jim Baker was Secretary of Treasury. He spent a lot of money putting the Treasury put back into beautiful shape and it certainly shows up today. Now nobody would be able to use it for a retirement ceremony.

I have no regrets...it was destiny to make the things fall that way. I don't blame anybody. I can understand, I guess, why the new Democratic Administration would not accept the fact that I was a Foreign Service Officer.

***

Q: After your retirement you have continued to have an interest in Soviet Affairs and I understand you work closely with the Atlantic Council for one thing. If you have any comments on that, that is fine, but otherwise perhaps you might want to look back on the 47 years you have been connected with the Soviet Union in one way or another and make any comments you might care to make on overall, generalized observations of where we have come and insights into continuing factors in Soviet society.

BOWDEN: Let me try to put both ends of this together -- beginning in 1945 and now bringing us right up to the present time where I am involved in the Atlantic Council in an ongoing dialogue with the Russians, mainly from think tanks from Moscow, but also from the Russian Parliament, the Foreign Office, the General Staff, etc. So it is a pretty broad range of people we have been talking to. Our talks cover the great spectrum of outstanding world problems. My last three or four years have been involved in visiting the Soviet Union several times and having many, many Russians here.

I think this tends to bring back to me and confirm a number of the early impressions I had as a naval officer and that is that the formation of what we call Russian society and it applies to a lot of the people who have been intimately associated with the Russians for many centuries, has taken place over a period of maybe 800 to a thousand years and that certain concepts and values are very deeply built into the Russian mind which were not erased under communism, are still there as a tribal memory, and will assert themselves in the future, as they are doing now, in ways that are really quite unpredictable.

The principal aspect, I think, that is of importance is the concept of society as a collective and not simply as a kind of free floating [group of] individuals. Russians, in this long historical period, have always belonged to some kind of community or collective and it is very difficult for them to look at themselves as a lonely and isolated settler in the United States going to North Dakota...

What I was just saying translates into modern terms I think as a very deep and abiding conviction that what we call the welfare state or welfare state of society, is considered a very proper state as far as the Russian mind is concerned. We are already seeing this. In effect, you might say that people want to have their cake and eat it too. They also don't want to pay for very much more. So something is bound to give along the way here and we really won't know where it comes out for a long time.

There is another aspect where the Russian soul rebels against its containment in this collective and community and launches off sometimes into very strange directions. You find examples of this in Dostoevski, and in all great Russian literature. But in general I think the delineation of future society will bear the marks of this other collectivist aspect very strongly in one way or another.

Q: There is sort of a tension you might say between anarchical ideas and hyper- individualism on the one hand and the need for a collective, part of a bigger whole, desire for an authority to keep this anarchical tendency within bounds on the other. Is that a fair comment?

BOWDEN: Yes, that is a fair comment. You find these days that when you talk to the Russians in general, the thing that they are deathly afraid of is the thing they call chaos. They don't really know what chaos really is, but it means something out there without a structure. In other words, suddenly you are absolutely a free agent, you are free to fail, free to starve, free to die, free to make a million, free to murder other people, and they recoil from this concept in a very strong way. What this can further translate into is agreement to a kind of regime or government or administration which is not fundamentally very democratic. I don't think that is going to bother a lot of Russians that I know. They are going to put a higher premium on other things than the right to choose and reject leaders and policies, etc.

Maybe all this reflects is the fact that to really acquire a working democratic system requires a very long period of human history as it has for us..let's say coming from at least the 13th century up to the present time.

I guess the only other comment I would like to make is that I see today what is happening in the Soviet Union and really in much of Europe and the rest of the world as a period of immense turbulence. The equivalent to the 1918-1919 period when much of the world appeared to be fragmenting, flying apart in all directions and people were desperately searching for some way to try to hold parts of it together or make new arrangements, configurations. And that is true to a greater extent now, perhaps, than it was in the 1918-19 period. It certainly is going to be a much different world than the essentially bipolar world that we lived in for more than 50 years.

Where the Russians and all these other people in the Eurasian heartland are going to come out and find their alliances, connections and natural allegiances and trade patterns is, I think, at this point absolutely unpredictable.

ARTHUR A. HARTMAN
Intelligence Officer, Bureau of Intelligence and Research
Washington, DC (1958)

Ambassador Arthur Hartman was born in New York, New York in 1926. He received a bachelor's degree from Harvard University. His career in the Foreign Service included positions in France, Vietnam, and the United Kingdom (England), and an ambassadorship to the Soviet Union. This interview was conducted by Bill Miller on May 31, 1989.

Q: Were you aware of the Soviet sensitivity to all of this? How much did the Soviet factor come into the planning of the German rearmament?

HARTMAN: Oh it was, not in the sense of the sensitivity - it was a response to a challenge. I mean the feeling; I can remember the clearly the feeling in 1950 when Korea was invaded. All of us I think had the feeling, "Well Europe is next!" If Stalin, we had absolutely no doubt that the North Koreans were ordered in by Stalin. That was the common assumption and you know it hasn't much been challenged since but we know a little bit more about North Koreans now, maybe there was a little more complication than just that. It didn't seem to us that if the Soviets had wanted to stop it that they made very much of an effort to stop. It seemed to us to be a major challenge and so there was a; and again you had tremendous leadership in Europe at that time. It was the time of Adenauer, of Schuman, of DeGasperi, of Spaak in Belgium, of Beck in Luxembourg; I mean even the small countries have great leaders. These people just worked tirelessly to put this thing together, they felt very much under the gun and there was a real unity. There were a lot of stickers on the wall, "Go home this one, go home that one" but basically the, I think the overwhelming majority of people in Europe responded out of fear - it was fear genuine fear.

In universities this year, a very common document that is examined and studied rather hard is NSC-68. And as you may recall, that portrayed the Soviets as determined to go to war sometime in the fifties; perhaps the early fifties. Therefore, we had to rearm, and of course NATO was one response. The definite conclusion of that document and those who wrote it was that we were in a life and death struggle with this formidable power that had once been an ally. You had many of the figures that we now have on the world scene on opposite sides of the question; for example, George Kennan and Paul Nitze. George Kennan was saying that they had no intention of doing that, however it was necessary to bring Europe together.

The author of the containment policy felt in his later writings anyway that his view had been taken out of context. What he was really talking about was a way to bring the European powers back together to restore their morale, their economic viability, and their political integrity; he did not see the Soviets as likely to attack, and then he leaves the scene. I think he was very much a gadfly in that period. I think the dominant view, and this is before Dulles' arrival, this is in the time of Acheson - the late forties. This view was definitely that there was a military and security challenge, that some of the understandings that people thought had been made of restraint for the post-war period; that is in the Yalta agreements and Potsdam and so forth, that there indeed would be free elections. The hope was that the Soviet Union wouldn't insist on a virtual occupation of Eastern Europe, that while many people in the United States wanted an even more forceful putting down of Germany; as the reconstruction period started, there were some thoughts that you couldn't rule out reunification. As long as you kept Germany divided, Europe was going to be divided and there was going to be a source of tension. The French were at least of that view if I may say, the French rather liked the idea I think. They never said it because they didn't want to antagonize the Germans, but basically they were happy that Germany was divided.

No, I think that most people felt this way at this time, and this was before the Korean invasion. With the Korean invasion, there was a tremendous effect there. Looking back at what happened in Greece where people felt that this was an effort by the Soviets to arm a group in Greece to take over the country, and Azerbaijan. In other words, that looking again at Communist policy in the post war period, people felt that the ideology was taking over; that they were going to lead revolutionary groups, that they were going to arm, they were going to feed them, and that there was danger in Europe. There was a feeling that unless this reconstruction of the Western Europe economies, which were after all the strongest economies in the world after the United States, took place in a Democratic atmosphere that there was a real danger that the Communist parties could take over. Some of these were virtual handmaidens of Stalin, they were Stalinist in their orientation, perhaps even more than some of the statements of Soviet government policy. You had a history in a place like France after the war, with a tremendous rivalry between the Maquis resistance groups that were governed by the Communists and the others. In fact, probably the Communists had a better war record along with many others in France, than some of the more conservative elements that had been hooked up with the Vichy government and even more collaborationist. So in France there was a split in the society and we came in with our aid programs basically helping those people who were fighting to keep the Communists from gaining control. I think the leadership of that whole period, and you have to remember that the Christian Democratic movement played a very major role, and Catholics particularly played a very major role in the three man countries.

For example, that is in Italy where the Christian Democrats were in power the whole time, where France was heavily influenced by this emergence after the war of the MRP movement, the Catholic movement that produced Schuman and others in the leadership; and Adenauer all of whom had this desire to kind of bring things together and it was almost going back to Charlemagne. Charlemagne, it's no mystery today I think that the major prize given to a European for his work in unifying Europe is the Charlemagne prize. There was a rejection of that and the formalism of the Church, and indeed the role of the Church during the war. These were people who were reformers out of the Church and who felt their Catholicism very strongly, but wanted to put it to political effect with these higher goals of unifying Europe and breaking down national barriers - but very anti-communist. They felt that Communism was a real challenge.

Q: Was it Stalinism or something else?

HARTMAN: No, Communism was really equated with Stalinism and there was a lot of reason for this. After all if you looked at what was going on in the Soviet Union at that time and the suppressions that were taking place in Eastern Europe. Add in things like the Doctors' plot that came along as Stalin really produced some of his greatest excesses, not the greatest but at least noticeable excesses in that period. He closed down the openness that was beginning to be shown because people were cooperating during the war. The openness absolutely ended and the behavior of their people in these four power meetings that were taking place all during these periods. One of the things we've sort of forgotten are the sort of rigorous kind of schedule required of the four power meetings. It seems a little strange to us today that the greats of the world would be Foster Dulles and I don't know, I can't remember who was the French Foreign Minister at that time, it was again one of the great Catholic - the man who was always drunk, what was his name Bidaud and from Germany a variety of leaders and Anthony Eden before he became Prime Minister was the Foreign Minister.

The people, the four powers without the Germans when you are talking about the settlement in Europe with Molotov at first, then later - much later with Gromyko, that was the structure. Today we think of the big power summit and it's the United States and the Soviet Union. In those days meetings in Paris in the old Palais Rose, I can remember Acheson came there and they met for a month talking about these problems. So that kind of structure has changed a lot, but the main feeling that all of us had and that was general in Europe was this fear, and it was fear of direct invasion. That fear was credible and that's why people took seriously the rearmament effort. A momentum of these moves really didn't change very much. There was no sort of outside, there were trips that people took, Malenkov - I can't remember now what the sequence of time was but there were these trips around before Khrushchev took power and they began to show themselves more in the world. I think to the Europeans generally it was not a very appealing process. There were a lot of other things that went on, there were these youth conferences and that scared the leadership. They get these people over there and the reports would come back from the young people who went exactly what was going on, they took over these meetings and sort of beat a lot of propaganda into them. For a while we used to try and send people in fact as it turned out we subsidized a few youth groups from the CIA and elsewhere. Some of our political leaders came through that process and were people who had actually attended these meetings and sort of cut their teeth in politics arguing in those sessions. It was a period when, it's easy to look back on it and kind of rewrite history, but there was a genuine feeling of fear and with some reason. There was a tremendous amount of military force on the other side, a tremendous putting down of any outcroppings of individual liberty or rioting that might have taken place, students expressing their views in any of the Eastern European countries and nothing going on in the Soviet Union until there was a kind of a thaw after Khrushchev.

When he actually took over there was a little thaw at least in the intellectual sense a little like what you have today which I hesitate to say is also reversible. He found it useful at that time to allow that to happen.

GIFFORD D. MALONE

Intelligence Officer, Soviet Affairs, Bureau of Intelligence and Research
Washington, DC (1958-1961)

Russian Language Training
Oberammergau, Germany (1963-1964)

Administrative Officer
Moscow (1964-1966)

Soviet Affairs Desk, Bureau of European Affairs
Washington, DC (1966-1969)

Gifford Malone was born in Richmond, Virginia in 1930. He received his bachelor's degree from Princeton University and his master's from Columbia University. He served in the US army from 1953-1956. His career with the Foreign Service included assignments in Poland and the Soviet Union. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in December of 1991.

Q: What was your impression about the state of the intelligence community in the State Department and the Soviet Union at the time? What were the tools you used and what was the attitude?

MALONE: The tools we used as intelligence research was always mainly published sources. Of course we had access to what CIA was producing, at least some of it. We had reporting from Moscow and all that, but we were all reading the Soviet press and it was a kind of Kremlinology. Those things all combined into the ultimate product. INR was a good deal bigger in those days than it is now, and the number of people engaged in Soviet Affairs in INR were more numerous than later was the case.

They were trying in those days, and I think with good reason, to assign some people to the Soviet section who had just come back from Moscow to give a fresh slant on things. I think it was a pretty good group and I had the impression that in those days INR was doing pretty well. Later, due partly to budgetary reasons, and partly because the Department decided it was unnecessary, it considerably reduced the size of INR all together, including the Soviet section.

Q: What was the interplay with the Desk?

MALONE: There was a fair amount of interplay then, although it is a little hard to compare. I later served on the Desk and at that stage we had a great deal of interplay with INR. We talked with them every day. It may have been a little less when I was serving there myself, although I am not sure of that. My general impression was that there was a good deal of communication. In other words, what we were doing was relevant to what they were doing and they wanted to know what we were thinking and how we analyzed things.

Q: To give a feel for this. Okay you are reading Pravda, Izvestia, etc. and looking at the various reports coming out, what sort of things would you do that would be of use to American foreign policy at that time?

MALONE: Basically what I was doing, remember I was at the most junior level, was producing written reports about various subjects. I was in military affairs so I read among other things the military press. A lot of it was keeping track of who was in charge of what and producing very factual reports of that sort. I wouldn't say, at least what I was doing, could be called deep, deep think pieces. There was some of that that went on in INR. INR contributed to the National Intelligence Estimates, and met with CIA people when these things were being put together. But it was mostly very factual stuff.

Q: What was your feel when you got together with your CIA colleagues on this? Were they looking at it in a different way? And also the military?

MALONE: Let me say first, I didn't get together with CIA colleagues very often. The only times that I remember was when you were trying to get an agreed position on a National Intelligence Estimate concerning the Soviet Union. In those days CIA would have a draft, INR would have a draft and we would try to produce something on which everyone could agree. I don't want to suggest that there were any dramatic disagreements, there weren't. But I was just looking at a small slice of it.

Q: What was the National Intelligence Estimate?

MALONE: The National Intelligence Estimate was a broad government wide estimate, in this case about the Soviet Union...there were sections to these estimates and then there were updates and revisions. It was an effort to achieve a government wide view on what was happening in the Soviet Union. There has been a lot of talk in later years about disagreements within the government on these things. I didn't sense that in those days, remember this is the late 1950s, that there was a lot of that. If there was it certainly didn't come to my attention. But people would have been talking about it had there been. Later, I think, there were some fairly serious disagreements. I know certainly later in my career I became aware that there tended always to be disagreements between the CIA and often joined by State on the one hand, and Defense Intelligence Agency on the other. But that wasn't evident to me in these early days.

Q: To put this in context, we are talking 1991, in the last year or so we have seen essentially the end of the Cold War and complete disintegration of the Soviet Union. We don't even know what to call it today, except the ex-Soviet Union. At that time when you were in INR, how did it look to the United States? Was it a threat? How did we feel about it?

MALONE: We looked upon it as a threat, which I think was an accurate view. We looked upon it as a country that was very hard to get information about. After all it was a closed society. We tried to understand to what degree there was dissent in the Soviet Union. We were not very successful at that, although from time to time you would get some inkling of a labor unrest here or there, that sort of thing. Basically we were just trying to understand this very different society, this very controlled society, which we all felt quite sincerely was a threat to the United States and the West in general.

Q: Then you went for more Russian training, even though you had a lot of previous study. Why was that?

MALONE: I applied to go to Oberammergau, what was then called Detachment R to which the State Department normally sent two or three people. I applied really to insure my ticket to Moscow. I felt if they accepted me for Oberammergau, then I would automatically go, and that proved to be the case. As a matter of fact when I got there I found that being back in the Russian language was very helpful because my Russian had sort of gotten all mixed up with Polish by that time. Just linguistically it was very useful.

The school was actually a very useful experience. It was not primarily a language school. We had, I think, only one hour a day of language instruction. You were suppose to know Russian by the time you got there. It was an area study program taught by émigrés from the Soviet Union. So all the classes were in Russian and we wrote our exams in Russian. Although not all the subjects were particularly well taught, you certainly got a very different slant than you would have gotten from an American professor, for example.

One striking example of that was in the field of Soviet law. They had a course at Oberammergau taught by a Russian who had been on Prosecutor Vishinsky's staff.

Q: This would be the great trials of the military during the late 1930s.

MALONE: This guy had been on his staff when Vishinsky was Prosecutor General of the USSR. I forget his exact title. I had previously taken a course on Soviet law with Professor John Hassard of Columbia University and I can tell you that the viewpoint of this man at Oberammergau about Soviet law was very different than that of John Hassard. It certainly gave me insights. This man's view was totally cynical but I learned a great deal about the subject in a very different way.

We had a couple of people on the faculty who had been military intelligence officers. Some of the courses were purely on military subjects and most of us from the State Department didn't take those. But it was a good course. Another very good thing about it was it included a trip to the Soviet Union. About a week after I arrived in the summer of 1963 for that course, we departed on a trip in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union by bus from Oberammergau. We went first to Poland which didn't interest me particularly, but then on by bus into the Soviet Union and driving essentially the same route that Napoleon had taken all the way to Moscow, stopping at Smolensk, Minsk and other places. We spent a month in the Soviet Union traveling around all over the place. It was really a very useful experience.

Q: I am surprised the Soviets let you do it.

MALONE: It was an on again, off again thing. Some years they allowed the group to come, some years they didn't. We, of course, speculated about this and concluded that the reason they did was because they felt they would get a lot of biographic intelligence about us by listening to us. And they probably did. But I think the trade-off was well worth it because it was a wonderful introduction to visit many parts of the Soviet Union and to be speaking Russian and to see what the place where I was going to be serving was really like.

So the next year when I went to the Soviet Union I was speaking Russian well by this time and all this background of actually having been there, I was really able to hit the ground running.

Q: You were there from 1964-66. What were you doing initially when you went to the Soviet Union?

MALONE: In those days the policy at the Embassy was to take people of my grade, by then I was FSO-5, and try to give them different kinds of experiences. That normally meant a tour one year in one part of the Embassy and for a year in another part. My first year was spent as assistant administrator. I was the American member of the Administrative staff who spoke Russian. The rest didn't ...the GSO, the Admin Officer, etc.

One of the most important parts of that job was being liaison with the various elements of the Soviet bureaucracy with whom we dealt. Customs, the large organization that serviced the diplomatic corps...all of that was controlled and centralized in the Soviet Union. They had an organization that was subordinate to the Foreign Ministry, whose job it was to take care of all administrative needs of the diplomatic corps. It was partly designed to enable the various foreign embassies in Moscow to get things done because if they had to do it on their own they never would have managed it. And it was also an element of control. We couldn't rent an apartment without going through that organization. We couldn't hire a chauffeur, we couldn't do anything.

As it turned out it was a wonderful practical experience for me because I would go over there practically every day negotiating with them on one thing or another all in Russian. It gave me an insight into Soviet life that I never would have gotten if I had been in any other job.

Q: I was just thinking that if you looked at the political job which is supposed to be the glamour job, you really don't have that type of contact at all.

MALONE: I had constant contact, daily contact. I didn't realize at the time how valuable it was. It was only later that I really understood that. I knew it was valuable linguistically because I had to speak Russian all the time, but beyond that it really gave me a knowledge of Soviet society that I just wouldn't have gotten. One of the things that I discovered later in negotiating with the Soviets about various things was that they behaved exactly the same way at the higher diplomatic level as they had when I was negotiating for a chauffeur, or to get an apartment remodeled.

Q: What was the Soviet negotiating style that you found at this time?

MALONE: Very hard bargaining requiring on one's part great patience. If they were going to come around they would do so at the end of the process. Also recognizing what kind of country you represented made an enormous difference. We represented a great power and there was no question that therefore we got more out of the Soviets in the administrative field than let us say some poor African ambassador who didn't have any leverage at all. We had leverage. We didn't have as much then as the State Department developed in later years when they developed some kind of an apparatus to take care of the diplomatic corps, making it difficult for the Soviets to do some of the things they had normally done in our own free society.

I found, too, that you could also deal with them as people. If there wasn't some kind of political impediment, they could be reasonably decent and carry on as though everything was really okay. I also discovered that they were shameless liars. I think it was just a different attitude towards truth. I found that even at the level I dealt with they wouldn't hesitate to tell the most outrageous lies, which they knew I understood was a lie, but was part of the whole process. It is very hard to articulate all the ways in which it helped one understand the Soviets, but it clearly did.

Q: What was your impression of the Embassy? This was at the height of the Cold War with a little bit of thawing with the Khrushchev period...he was about to go or had gone by that time.

MALONE: Khrushchev? Yes, I was there when he left.

Q: We will cover that in a minute. But how did you find the Embassy? This was the period when our Embassy in Moscow was still considered the first team. Did you feel that?

MALONE: I felt it was very professional. The Ambassador, who was Foy Kohler when I was there was very good. Most of the people on the staff were people who knew something about Soviet affairs. All the more senior people had been there before. The percentage of Americans who spoke the language was very high. Yes, I felt it was a very competent group. There was very high morale. We all felt we were doing something important being there. I had very positive feelings about it.

Q: What was your impression of Foy Kohler?

MALONE: My impression of him was of a very practical, sensible man who was down to earth, understood the Russians pretty well, and was easy to deal with. I would say just thoroughly competent. He had a good team. Walter Stoessel was his DCM. Mac Toon was his Political Counselor. All these people were good.

Q: Did you find there were security problems the same as in Poland?

MALONE: Much more so. You lived a very controlled life. You knew that they were listening in to you. Sometimes it was very crude. One day in the apartment that we lived in, an apartment house almost exclusively lived in by foreigners, some one went up into the attic which for some reason was unlocked. There were all these tape machines going.

Another time my wife had the experience, which happened once or twice to other people, of talking on the phone and then picking it up to make another call and hearing her conversation being played back. So you knew perfectly well that they were listening to you all of the time. If you really wanted to say something to one's own family that you didn't want the Russians to hear you would go out and take a walk or write a note. We were careful at the Embassy too as to where we said what. But it was needed.

The controls were very evident every time you traveled. I couldn't go into a railroad station and buy a ticket. They would spot me as a foreigner right away and they wouldn't sell me one. You could only go through the Intourist organization. So all of that was controlled. Various parts of the Soviet Union, of course, were closed. I mean large parts really, but that still left a lot we could go to. But then the supposedly open areas were sometimes closed for temporary reasons. You couldn't go beyond 25 kilometers of Moscow without submitting a Note to the Foreign Ministry saying that you intended to travel to Leningrad, let's say. If they didn't respond within two days you assumed that was all right. Of course they also had control over you because your tickets were purchased through a central organization. But sometimes they would declare Leningrad, for example, temporally closed. Particularly if a Naval Attaché wanted to go up there at a particular time and look around the dock. This sort of thing happened. Sometimes you could go some place only by air but not by train, or vice versa. There were always restrictions.

I think everyone had occasions when they knew somebody was trying to set them up...some KGB operative. We knew a number of Soviet citizens and we would have them to our apartment for meals, but you never could be sure whether they were KGB or not. There were some that you were quite sure were and some we were quite sure were not. And then there was a sort of middle element that you never knew. But even there it was all controlled.

A number of people we knew were writers, translators, etc. The only way to get them to come...you could invite them but you would also have to send them an invitation through the Writers Union. The Writers Union had in it a foreign desk which, of course, was manned by the KGB and they would tell these people whether they could go or not. So even on that level things were controlled.

Q: Did you find that dealing with the Embassy's local Soviet staff that you could get a feel for the society?

MALONE: Yes, there too.

Q: I am speaking about my experience in Yugoslavia. One could say that they are all spying on you, but on the other hand in the day to day working with them you often get something that you wouldn't get if it were an all American staff.

MALONE: That is right. Because I was in the Administrative Section my first year, I dealt with the local staff all the time. The local clerical people, the mechanics, the laborers, chauffeurs. Yes, I think I developed very good relations with most of them. There were a couple of incidents in which you became particularly aware of the pressures they were under.

I remember one chauffeur suddenly didn't come to work any more. This would happen from time to time. A couple of months later I saw him out back in the courtyard. He was driving for another diplomatic mission. I said, "I see you are driving for them." He said, "I wanted to work for you but they told me I couldn't anymore." I don't remember his exact words, but it was clear that he wasn't giving them enough information.

And there were other local employees that from time to time would tell me things like that. They had divided loyalties. They basically liked working for the Americans. They liked Americans, I think...most of them did. We liked them. But they were under control and surely would not have been able to work there if they were not willing to report on various things that were going on. It was a strange relationship.

Q: How did the coup against Khrushchev play out in the Embassy when he was kicked out?

MALONE: One of the amusing things about it was...of course nobody foresaw it at all. There was a local journalist by the name of Victor Louis who lived in Moscow. He was the alleged correspondent for a London newspaper but of Russian background and was regarded by everyone as being a KGB agent. He used to feed people information from time to time. I suppose to establish his own credentials. He came by one day and told the Administrative Officer that Khrushchev was out. Now this is a very odd person to tell this to. The Administrative Officer moments later said to me, "Khrushchev is out." I asked how he knew that and he said that Victor Louis told him. He went upstairs and told Mac Toon, who was the Political Counselor. Mac said, "That is nonsense, nonsense!" But of course within a few hours we knew that Khrushchev had been removed.

It was interesting to be there when that happened because there was no visible sign at all. All the pictures came down, of course. But if you went out and mingled with the crowds, etc., nobody was talking about it. They were probably thinking about it, but visibly it was as though it had happened on the moon. Here was one of the most important people in the world suddenly gone and nobody was talking about it.

One of my colleagues went out the following day to one of the local magazine bookstores which they had all around the city and where pictures of leaders were always on sale. He asked about a picture of Nikita Sergeyevich and the woman said, "No, and there won't be any."

Of course it was actually a very important event and over time it became evident that there would be changes because Khrushchev was gone, but that wasn't immediately evident then.

Q: Were there any "popular" manifestations of hostilities towards the United States during this time?

MALONE: Yes. This was during the Vietnam War. We had a couple of demonstrations at the American Embassy that were connected with that. Petitions would come in as well. They were all organized, of course. We were under instructions to receive the petitions in the Consular Section, so people who were bringing petitions against the United States with respect to the Vietnam War were directed there. Of course, these tended to come in batches. Once there would be lots of petitions and then months and months would go by and there would be nothing.

One of my friends who was in the Consular Section, he was head of the section, was receiving these petitions and he said to one of these bearers of these petitions one day, "You know it is interesting that they all seem to come at the same time." And the Russian said, "We are an organized people."

We had three major demonstrations against the American Embassy, which, of course, are organized by local authorities. One of them had to do with Africa and I forget what touched that off. It was African students there. The police would be obviously alerted before these things happened and would start setting up blockades and the mounted police would come in.

The first such demonstration was not as well organized by the Soviets as the later two and there was a great deal of breaking of windows for which ultimately they paid for after months of negotiations.

Another one was by the Chinese in Moscow primarily. There were, let's say, 3,000 Chinese students studying in Moscow then and they organized a demonstration against the American Embassy for which the Soviets were very well prepared. They not only had the mounted police, but this was in the winter and the streets are very broad in Moscow and the street on which the American Embassy is located is probably eight or ten lanes wide. The Soviets had put in front of the Embassy, bumper to bumper, city trucks used to haul snow away to create a barrier. The demonstrators were supposed to go down the other side of that barrier from the Embassy. But in this case the demonstration got out of hand and the people poured over the trucks and were throwing things, of course, at Embassy windows. Some with slingshots were firing ball bearings and fighting with the police, as it turned out. The Chinese and the Russians didn't like each other very much. That was quite a melee.

But there were these kinds of things and constant criticism about the Vietnam War.

On the other hand, that didn't seem to have any particular effect on the other relationships that were going on. The Soviets were always able to keep these things in compartments. It did affect me personally. For example, I would have to go in and start negotiating with the authorities about getting all these windows prepared. But the tone was just the same as it always had been.

They claimed that they had no responsibility and that we had to understand that these people were all fired up, etc. There was an ambivalence there.

Q: You were reporting on the Soviet economy. Later this became a tremendous bone of contention in the last year that we thought the Soviets had a much better economy and greater strength than it turned out was true. The economy was the real Achilles' heel in the Soviet system. At that time how did you see it and how did you report it?

MALONE: We were all misled. I think all Americans were misled about the strength of the economy. To put it another way, we didn't realize what a fragile system it was. It seemed to be highly controlled with things under control. At the time I was there, there was a lot of talk about economic reform. That is what we were particularly following. There were some fairly prominent Soviet economists who were writing articles in the economic journals about this. It was an effort to make the economy a little more decentralized and to try to introduce very modified market principles into the economy. And as this happened, there was a government commission working on it. There was some expectation that they might do something reasonably radical. Not restore private property or anything like that.

The man who was associated with this was the Prime Minister, Kosygin. It was in his name that the reforms were finally reported out. They were considerably watered down over what some of these, I supposed you could call liberal economists had been advocating, but nevertheless seemed to amount to some kind of change in the economy. But it was very soon after that that Kosygin, himself, lost authority and actually none of the reforms ever amounted to anything. But we were caught up in it because it was going on and we were reporting on it and trying to understand.

Q: You mentioned being caught up in it and I just wonder, you go to Europe which had gone through a devastating war and yet 20 odd years after the war the place is booming and then you go to Eastern Europe and immediately you are in another world where everything was hard. For the American or any other observer to say that it was just different there and not really look and say, "God if they can't deliver food and the stuff is shoddy and all this, what is going on?"

MALONE: Obviously there was an ambivalence in our own thinking about it. It is true we were aware of all of these shortages, of the very primitive nature of the economy compared to the United States. No question about that. I think where we perhaps overestimated was perhaps on the military side. We felt they were better than they were...I am not sure of that, but we may have. Although we didn't realize they were devoting even quite as large a percentage of GNP to the military as we now know they did, we knew it was huge. We knew in certain elements of the scientific field they were devoting resources and as observers on the scene we knew that they were a talented people and if they chose in this huge unwieldy economy to focus their efforts on certain key things like the military and science -- putting up a sputnik or whatever -- that they could do it.

But at the same time you couldn't help but see in comparison with any Western country that the standard of living was low; that consumer goods were very poor; that people had to wait two, three, four years on a waiting list to get a car, which wouldn't be very good when they finally did get it; that the road system was very poorly developed; that Aeroflot, although covering a large area and maintaining a large network, was pretty primitive by Western standards...traveling by Aeroflot was not fun.

So all of these things came in to you and you tried to put it all together and I think where we all sort of came out was...Yes, in some respects this is some kind of a third country, but it is immensely strong in certain key areas and somehow they are making this command economy do the kind of job we see being done in terms of what was being produced, etc. I don't think many of us thought there was a great deal of room for improvement in this system. We were interested in the economic reforms because it was going on, but I don't think any of us thought that if this actually takes place it is going to make a radical difference, and clearly it didn't.

Of course you were also struck by the enormous difference in the Soviet Union between what was available in Moscow, which was a favored city, and what was available in smaller places. That is one of the reasons that the Embassy made a great point having people get out and travel to see how it was out in the provinces because it was very different in many cases. Now you have a situation in the Soviet Union where people from Moscow are going out to the small places to buy things because they can't get them in Moscow.

Q: Did you have the feeling that the Communist Party hierarchy was really somewhat removed from the regular people?

MALONE: Yes, as far as we knew. One of the things that the hierarchy was pretty good at was sort of hiding its privileges. Everybody knew that they, the people meant the rulers, lived better than the other people, etc. But they didn't flaunt it. There were special stores that were never seen by the ordinary Soviet citizen. The ordinary Soviet citizen would see the big black limousines racing down the middle of the street in Moscow, but they never got to see the dachas that these people had outside. I think although they knew that these people must live pretty well, they didn't realize how different it was.

We got a little taste of it because we as diplomats were favored to the extent that we could go to the one foreign currency store for foreigners where there were things available for hard currency that were not available to the ordinary citizen. But we could not tell to what extent the rulers were separated psychologically...did or did not understand what ordinary people were thinking. There was no way of doing that.

***

Q: Okay, we will close now and pick up next time on your return from Washington. Today is March 6, 1992 and this is a continuation of an interview with Gifford D. Malone. Giff we finished the period you were in Moscow from 1964-66. So let's start there. You then came back to Washington to the State Department where you worked from 1966-71. Were you on the Soviet Desk?

MALONE: I worked from 1966-69 on the Soviet Desk. Then I worked in the Operations Center for two years.

Q: Why don't we talk about the Soviet Desk. This was in the height of the Cold War. What was the Soviet Desk?

MALONE: The Soviet Desk was in the Office of Soviet Union Affairs in the Bureau of European Affairs. It was, I think, the largest office in the Bureau at that time. I can't remember how many people we had, but we were divided into three sections -- Bilateral Relations, Multilateral Relations and Economics. I worked in the Bilateral Relations section where all of the five or six officers were concerned with our relations with the Soviet Union on specific matters. We had our duties and portfolios divided up.

Q: Who was in charge in the Department of overall Soviet Affairs?

MALONE: Well, in those days, the Department didn't have as many layers as it does now, and far fewer Deputy Assistant Secretaries. In the Bureau of European Affairs you had two Deputy Assistant Secretaries, one of whom was responsible for the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. That was Walter Stoessel. At the time I came into SOV, which is what the Soviet Desk was called, Mac Toon was the Country Director. He was in charge of the Office of Soviet Union Affairs. In those days you did not have a lot of people concerning themselves with Soviet policy above the Bureau. In other words, when Mac Toon wanted to talk with the Under Secretary for Political Affairs, who was Foy Kohler, about Soviet Affairs, he simply called him on the phone. As a matter of fact I would say the person in the Department of State at that time who was primarily responsible for Soviet affairs and probably played the most important role was the Country Director, Mac Toon. That wouldn't be true today and hasn't been true for a good many years.

Q: In this period of 1966-69, from your vantage point in Washington what were the most consuming elements of the American-Soviet relationship?

MALONE: Well, you recall it was a period not long after Khrushchev had been put aside by his colleagues in the Kremlin and Brezhnev had come in. It was a time when the Soviet leadership was consolidating its position. It was the period of the Vietnam War so that was a point of major discord between the Soviets and the United States. Although it was not as serious a point of discord as you might have thought by reading the Soviet press. In other words, Pravda and Izvestia were filled with denunciations of the United States every day, but normal diplomatic relations went on. I wouldn't say that US-Soviet relations were particularly damaged by that, but it was always there in the background.

What we were trying to do really was to sort of continue to try to open things up a little in the Soviet Union. For example, during the period I was in SOV we were negotiating a consular agreement with the Soviets. We didn't have a consular agreement. That took a lot of doing. Negotiations with the Soviets always take a lot of time, but setting some rules for what happens to Americans who are tossed in jail in the Soviet Union, etc. was felt to be a first step. We regarded it as something useful and important.

Interestingly enough, it is hard to believe it these days, there was a lot of opposition in the United States to signing that treaty or any treaty with the Soviet Union. I used to go out on speaking tours quite a lot in those days and people would say, "How can you sign a treaty with the Soviets? How can you trust them?" I would say, "Well, you can't always trust them, but in this case you have an agreement where there are obligations on both sides and if one side doesn't live up to it, the other side knows it instantly and can do something about it or take retaliatory actions." So that was something that we would do.

Q: Did you as a professional who had served in the Soviet Union have any concern on your part that by our pounding the drums of anti-Sovietness and all that we may have been impeding our ability to deal with this superpower because we had painted everything so black that it was difficult to convince the elements of the American public that we could deal with these people?

MALONE: I don't think so. Some of that may be true. It is very hard obviously for people who are not professional diplomats and not thinking about foreign affairs to recognize that you can deal with an unfriendly country which really is a threat to you. It is possible at the same time to have more or less normal diplomatic relations in some other ways.

Some of the feeling on the part of the public is due to what you suggest. But by and large the Soviet record had been so terrible from the end of the Second World War on that it was simply hard for people to understand how you could also go ahead and sign these agreements with them. In that sense, although I don't think you could accuse a single person in SOV of being a dove, we probably seemed to some of these people in the American community as being soft on the Soviets.

One group that would not have agreed with that at that time were a lot of the Vietnam War protesters who...it was sort of an automatic carryover from their opposition to the war...began to think that the North Koreans and North Vietnamese are okay...hard to believe but they said that...and therefore everything we have been told about the Soviets is too. So it was really the beginning of the revisionist history in the United States starting with very young people.

MALONE: We were but not so much as later. That was just in its infancy. But we were trying to follow a reasonable course. I think anyone who has ever served in Moscow would agree that if you did not...Americans had travel restrictions and that sort of thing. And when one of our people would not be able to travel to some city that had been declared open, as frequently happened in the Soviet Union, we would automatically bar some Soviet diplomat here from going some place. And, of course, the American public found that ridiculous and hard to understand.

The Soviet Embassy played that for all it was worth. Let's say a university in an area that we had closed in retaliation for areas they had closed would invite some member of the Soviet Embassy to come and speak. He would agree to come and at the last minute call up and say that he couldn't come because the State Department wouldn't let him. That was hard to beat.

But while we were doing that we were conducting negotiations with the Soviets on other kinds of treaties. Obviously there were some kind of arms discussions going on [static].

I was involved, for example, in civil aviation. We had no civil aviation agreement with the Soviet Union. Therefore we had no direct flights between the Soviet Union and the United States.

Q: Did you find that you spent a lot of time working on the Soviet form of negotiating, which I am told is holding on very long and hard and sort of giving their concessions at the last minute whereas the American way is to sort of make concession along the way? Both come out about the same, but did you find the two styles didn't mesh and it was a problem?

MALONE: ...We in SOV understood the Soviets pretty well. Most of us there had experience in Moscow. Some of the more senior people had served there a couple of times. We understood this about the Soviets. It really wasn't for us a problem. It was a problem for some of the other people in the State Department who had not previously negotiated with the Soviets. That was one of the reasons why whenever negotiations went on with another agency there would be someone there from SOV advising the American negotiator how to deal with these people. It wasn't very difficult, they caught on very quickly.

Q: What was the basic advise you would give?

MALONE: The basic advise was that the Soviets would hang tough, would start out with an extreme position which they didn't expect to have accepted, that you have to be firm all the way through and if there are going to be many concessions made they tend to be made at such a point when the Soviets are totally convinced that they are not going to get anything unless they give.

Now, obviously, the way that takes place varies with the subject matter. To give you an example, fisheries. In those days, we held negotiations with the Soviets on Atlantic fisheries. We did not have a 200 mile fishing zone in those days as we have now. We had a 3 mile territorial limit. The Soviets would come right up to nearly that limit in their great fleet of fishing vessels and factory ships. They would take enormous quantities of fish. It was already clear that the stocks were going down. Well, of course, we would have these negotiations because the Soviets wanted concessions too. They realized by bargaining they might get something, they might be better off too. But the first step would be the United States saying this is what is happening to the fishing stocks. The Soviets would deny that any such thing was happening to the fishing stocks. So you would have to get over that hurdle first and that would take quite a while. Those negotiations always ended more or less favorably for both sides, because they were perfectly straight forward practical kinds of things that had literally nothing to do with ideology. Talking about fish is fairly basic.

Q: How about the consular agreement?

MALONE: The consular agreement was eventually signed. That was more difficult on the American side because you not only had to convince Americans and therefore members of Congress, you had to convince J. Edgar Hoover, Chief of the FBI, who testified before Congress that what we proposed would make his job much more difficult. But those things were eventually settled and the consular agreement was signed and as far as I know since that date has been mostly adhered to.

Q: You were there on the Soviet Desk during the last years of the Johnson Administration.

MALONE: That is right.

Q: Where you there when the Nixon Administration came in or had you moved to the Secretariat?

MALONE: Let's see.

Q: He came in in 1969.

MALONE: I was there at the very beginning of the Nixon Administration, but I moved to the Secretariat in the spring of 1969. I was involved at the end of the Johnson Administration in helping to write the history of the foreign policy of the Johnson Administration. After Lyndon Johnson decided he would leave, that he would not seek another term, he decided to have the history of the Johnson Administration produced in every Department. So the State Department organized itself for that. A small group was formed in the Department in which I became, for three months or so, one of the three editors. I produced first the history of the Johnson Administration in Soviet Relations and they decided that that was a good piece of work and they would promote me. So I took time off for about three months from SOV to do that.

Q: How did you feel about an exercise like this? Were you pretty much conscious that this was almost a political exercise or did you feel that this was an honest attempt on the part of the principals who were looking at this to make an addition to history?

MALONE: Well, I felt as far as the State Department product was concern that it was an honest attempt. I was never aware of any political pressure to make things look good or anything of that sort. That may or may not have been true in other Departments, I don't know. As far as I am aware there was never any effort on the Department to change anything that anybody had written that didn't quite conform. Basically these histories were not revelations. They were, I suppose you could say, more or less official histories. This is what happened in US foreign policy during this particular period. We didn't and weren't equipped to go much below the surface and to discuss personalities and that sort of thing. It was pretty much a written record of what had happened in those four years. It was fairly straight forward.

Q: How did you feel about the rise of Brezhnev? With the departure of Khrushchev how did you feel the Soviet Union was turning internally and in dealing with the United States?

MALONE: As I think I told you in our last discussion, at the time Khrushchev was removed there wasn't any visible change. Not only was there no visible change in Moscow with regards to reactions of the ordinary citizens as far as we could tell, there weren't any visible changes at that time in US-Soviet relations. I don't think that in that period, in the latter part of the 1960s, we were aware of serious changes in the Soviet Union going on as the result of the Brezhnev ascension.

Looking backwards and with a greater span of time to look at, you could see a kind of loosening up, and this is all relative, that had begun under Khrushchev was gradually chopped off little by little. Things for the artist in the Soviet Union, for people who wanted to speak a little more freely than was allowed... those things got worse. That was happening and we could see some of the visible signs of it, but I don't think there was much change in US-Soviet relations.

In some ways I think many of us felt that if it were not for the Vietnam War going on, to which the Soviets had to give at least lip service for their allies, the North Vietnamese, that we might have made more progress in reaching agreement on various issues. But it is now clear, if you look at the whole Brezhnev period, that there was a change, at least internally, from Khrushchev days. In the early Brezhnev period before Brezhnev had consolidated his position, there was an effort at economic reform in the Soviet Union which ultimately failed because the Soviets just couldn't take that step. That too, I think, was due mainly to Brezhnev and the people around him who were basically a very conservative lot. I don't mean to suggest that there would have been a radical economic reform by today's standards, but even in its modest form it was very quickly watered down and in the end didn't amount to anything.

WALTER B. SMITH, II
U.S.-USSR Exchanges Program Officer
Moscow (1959)

Publications Procurement/Political Officer
Moscow (1965-1967)

Intelligence Officer, Soviet Affairs, Bureau of Intelligence and Research
Washington, DC (1969-1970)

Walter B. Smith, II was born in Providence, Rhode Island on December 10, 1929. He received a bachelor's degree from Princeton University. He served in the U.S. Army from 1951-1953. Mr. Smith's career in the Foreign Service included positions in Germany, Israel, Poland, and the Soviet Union. He was interviewed in 1988 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

SMITH: ...My first assignment, because I had studied the Russian language, was to what was, in effect, the U.S.-Soviet Exchanges Staff, handling scientific, cultural, and academic exchanges between the United States and the Soviet Union. The exchange program was only a year or two old at that time. Details of these exchanges were negotiated by the Director of the Staff with a Minister in the Soviet Embassy in Washington on a weekly basis. I was the note-taker for these meetings. I had been in the Foreign Service for a grand total of three months when I started doing this. It was very heady stuff. Also, there was a Special Assistant to the Secretary, Ambassador "Wild Bill" Lacy, who was in charge of so-called "East-West Contacts." He would meet with “Smiling Mike” Menshikov, then Soviet Ambassador to the United States, from time to time. And Ambassador Lacy used me as his note-taker. So this was very exciting, indeed. Scarcely a year after I entered the Foreign Service, USIA [United States Information Agency] and the Department of Commerce were setting up what was to be the American National Exhibition in Moscow. They suddenly realized that they could not handle it all. They sent an SOS to the Department of State, and three young, bushy-tailed Foreign Service officers, having some knowledge of Russian, myself included, were sent to Moscow in the summer of 1959.

That was heady stuff, too. I had never been there before.

Q: Before we get to that, how did we view the exchange program? Wasn't it a major concern of ours that we'd be sending real exchange people, and they'd be sending over KGB agents?

SMITH: That is exactly what it was. There was enormous, well-intended, but naive interest in the United States in the exchange program. The main role of our little staff, among other things, was to obtain some kind of reciprocity in return for giving the Soviets a free intelligence and propaganda ride inside the United States. We tried to make sure that Americans could be exposed, to some extent, to the public inside the Soviet Union. Another and not so unimportant role was to play “Dutch Boy with Finger in the Dyke” with their favorite points of attack, trying to keep Americans -- radio stations in Minnesota, if you will -- from falling prey to alleged “people to people” ploys, which were part of the Soviet system. The Soviets were forever trying to “end run” the U.S. federal government and set up so-called exchange arrangements directly with well-intended but rather ill-informed American groups. With absolutely no authority we did head off at the pass a lot of these initiatives. That is what the exchange operation was from the Washington end.

Q: Was the concern that these so-called unofficial or “end run” types of exchange...

SMITH: We would have no reciprocity. If they were not negotiated directly between the two governments, the Soviets could get more or less what they wanted in the United States and they would not give us any chance to try and convey the American point of view to the Soviet people. The only way we got to travel inside the Soviet Union and to have some contact with public groups, other than through strictly and tightly controlled channels, was by negotiating very hard, when the Soviets wanted to do something in the United States.

Q: Then you went to Russia, the Soviet Union...

SMITH: Just for three months, in the summer of 1959. But it was quite an eye opener. My initial, two-year tour with the exchanges staff was running out. I had, of course, hoped that I would be assigned, if not to Moscow, then to some other, so-called “Iron Curtain” post. However, that was not the way it worked. In those days newly appointed officers not only received consular assignments at the beginning of their Foreign Service careers but usually were assigned to some very large consular operation. I was no exception. I was sent to Frankfurt-am-Main as a citizenship officer during my first year. There were three vice consuls whose sole function in life at that time was to register the births of American citizen children.

***

Q: You were in Moscow from when to when?

SMITH: 1965 to 1967.

Q: What were you doing there?

SMITH: For the first six months I was in charge of publications procurement, for which I had, during home leave in the summer of 1965, a rather interesting orientation, primarily run by CIA. CIA had an enormous interest in this program. It was legitimate espionage -- that is what it was. In the course of those six months I traveled 15,000 km inside the Soviet Union, because the bookstores in Moscow -- especially in Moscow, but also in Leningrad -- would run out of key books which we needed to buy in bulk. We would buy as many as 30 or 40 copies of newly published books. You did not just order the books. You physically took possession of them. We had a system for this, which had been worked out with some imagination. We carried cartons with us. What is that wonderful tape that is totally unbreakable? To the absolute amazement of Soviet bookstore personnel, we would buy the books on the spot and load them into our cartons and push them on one of those rollers. We would hire a taxi for the whole day, and by the end of the day the taxi would be bulging at the seams with cartons and cartons of books.

We went to the provinces to get books which were totally unavailable in Moscow, almost immediately after publication. The more obscure the city, the better the chances that we would be able to buy these books. We were not just buying for the American intelligence community. We were also buying for the Library of Congress, public libraries, and some universities with Russian and Soviet affairs programs. So it was not just to satisfy the insatiable appetite of the intelligence "gurus" that we were engaged in this activity. It was exhausting.

In Moscow we did not have our German "nanny," who refused to come with us. We had a very good Danish nanny, and my wife went with me on every one of those trips. She had enormous powers of observation. While I was beating my brains out going into bookstores, she was learning about the history and the cultural life of the given city we visited -- in all of the republics of the Soviet Union. We never got to Siberia. That is the one part of the Soviet Union which we did not visit. On one occasion we were flying from Alma Ata, Kazakhstan, back to Moscow. Because our flight had been overbooked, we were routed over the Aral Sea, the one that is almost completely dried up as a result of Soviet ecological malfeasance. It was broad daylight. First of all, no Westerner was supposed to fly over that sea. Secondly, if a Westerner had to go anywhere near the area, it was supposed to be only on a night flight. But it was daylight. My wife looked down and saw the Soviet nuclear testing site, located right next to that inland sea. I also looked and realized what it was, and I said, "Please try to remember what you are seeing." She had an almost photographic memory. On arrival in Moscow, many hours later, we went directly to the Chancery. She sat down and drew a map of what she had seen, which was a "mini coup" for the intelligence people.

So any Foreign Service officer who had a chance to travel in the Soviet Union -- and the heaviest traveler of all was the publications procurement officer -- had a number of "coincidental" requests from the intelligence people. We cooperated with that sort of activity because the opportunities were so precious and rare to collect...

Q: Why did the Soviets let you get away with this?

SMITH: Letting us buy books was the price that they paid to be able to travel around the United States, buying books in the United States. They were already overwhelmed with information about the United States, but somehow they thought that they needed more. Therefore, I gather that they thought that their book buying operation was as important to them as ours was to us. In terms of the availability of the information, our operation was infinitely more important for our purposes than theirs could possibly have been to them. Theirs was also economic and technological espionage, not just political and military. They did not have much that we did not know how to do better, but it was important to them, and, therefore, they allowed us to do this.

At the end of six months I was assigned to the Political Section to follow Soviet relations with Western Europe, Latin America, and the Middle East -- all three combined. Subsequently, the Embassy peeled these off and had separate individuals doing it. There was one person handling African relations because the Bureau of African Affairs in the Department of State at the time had a lot of money and was quite new, because independent Africa was new. The Bureau of African Affairs funded its own "slot," so to speak, in the Political Section [in the Embassy in Moscow]. There was one person handling East Asia, who was usually a "China hand." There was one person handling Soviet relations with Eastern Europe. I think that he belonged to "another agency" [i. e., CIA], which stands to reason. Then everything else was piled together on my platter, which made my job very, very interesting, because I maintained contact with Latin American, West European, and Middle Eastern diplomats in Moscow. At the time the Middle Eastern crisis was heating up. This was the summer and fall of 1966. The 1967 War was coming...

Q: Yes, in June, 1967...

SMITH: The Soviets were meddling and behaving very irresponsibly and, because we duly reported this and Washington already sensed this, a great deal of misguided U.S. suspicion built up, in my judgment, about the unreliability of the Soviets in any respect, as far as the Arab-Israeli conflict was concerned. That June war in 1967 "scared the pants" off the Soviets. People do not realize how close that war came to turning into World War III. It was a very, very tense time.

That war is a very interesting thing, in my opinion, in terms of the evolution of U.S.-Soviet relations, because our "little friend," Israel, clobbered what looked to be the large and powerful armed forces of neighboring Arab states, which, with the exception of Jordan, were totally armed by the Soviet Union. So U.S. made arms smashed Soviet made arms, with a tremendous difference in odds, in terms of sheer numbers. But, in fact, the Soviets played it well. We were declared persona non grata in every single Arab capital except Saudi Arabia and a couple of other countries. We had a tough time regaining the confidence of the Arabs because they chose to blame us for the Israeli success.

Q: There was also the widely believed view [in the Arab countries] that American planes had attacked the Egyptian Air Force.

SMITH: That is right. Even Jordan made accusations of that kind. It made it much easier for the Arabs to live with their humiliating defeat, if they could attribute it to a super power, and not to their little, hated neighbor. So we had a tough row to hoe after that. And between the two Middle Eastern wars, I got so interested in following Soviet activities in the Middle East that, within a year, I had shifted out of Soviet affairs and into the Middle East.

Q: Tell me, can you give me any examples of how the Soviets reacted to the Middle Eastern crisis when you were there -- in terms of what you were seeing?

SMITH: Subsequently, when I was assigned to INR, I read all of the EXDIS [Exclusive Distribution] and a good deal of the NODIS [No Distribution Outside a limited list] telegraphic correspondence, covering our contacts, both planned and by chance, with Soviet officials worldwide, but particularly in Washington and Moscow. My reading of the situation was that the Soviets were so scared that they really meant it when they said, "Let us collaborate to try to contain this situation." It is my opinion that all through the summer and fall of 1967, when the UN Security Council was having a terrible time hammering out a resolution on the Arab-Israeli problem to achieve some degree of stability there, the Soviets, while certainly not doing our work for us, and, in fact, occasionally disrupting what we were trying to do, were nevertheless behaving relatively responsibly. The issue of what the negotiating history was of Resolution 242, which, as you know, was adopted in November, 1967, became critical in the U.S.-Israeli dialogue.

Many years later -- in fact, in 1977 and 1978 -- Secretary of State Cyrus Vance asked me to do a paper on the negotiating history of Resolution 242. Fortunately, the NODIS telegrams could still be found. I reviewed once again the exchanges between ourselves and the British and French, but especially between ourselves and the Russians, as to the meaning of that resolution -- and also our exchanges with the Israelis on the same subject. There was no question but that the resolution meant virtually total Israeli withdrawal from the Occupied Territories [West Bank of the Jordan, Gaza, and the Golan Heights]. It certainly meant withdrawal on all fronts. Obviously, Secretary Vance was bolstered by this, because he "hung in there," as capped by Camp David, and that is what we were cranking up for at the time.

Pardon the historical digression, but you asked me how the Soviets were behaving. I think that the war of June 1967 was a watershed in terms of relatively responsible Soviet behavior in the Middle East.

Q: Were you getting demonstrations in front of the Embassy in Moscow and things like that?

SMITH: Oh, yes, they could crank up one of those on a moment's notice, and they did. I remember vividly that one of the staged demonstrations we had was related to Vietnam. Yes, the Soviets would put on wonderful, real scary shows in front of the American Embassy with, maybe, 50,000 or more people, over Vietnam at that time. There were plenty of other things beside the Middle East to "churn the waters" between the United States and the Soviet Union.

Q: You were saying that the KGB sort of assigned people to be your “friends,” or something like that. How did this work and was this of any advantage to us?

SMITH: I think so because, as I said before, with great misgivings the security officers at the Embassy in Moscow lived with the fact that we were exchanging evenings in each other's homes. Two couples who ostensibly did not know each other -- they probably knew of each other; we never mentioned one to the other -- were our interlocutors or social points of contact. One couple was much more impressive, brighter, and more attractive than the other -- but never mind. My wife and I had gotten to know the “more attractive” couple quite well during the summer of 1959, when there were so many Westerners in Moscow that the KGB just totally lost its ability to monitor the situation. At that time these people were students and came frequently, for the sake of English practice, to the U.S. exhibition in Moscow. The woman did not speak any English, but the man did. We went to their apartment...

Q: This was when you were at the Exhibition?

SMITH: That is right. We went to their apartment once. Also, when his parents were away he took us to his parents' apartment which, by Soviet standards, was quite elegant. The KGB somehow had gotten wind of this and put the “squeeze” on this guy. Well, guess what, we looked him up when we came back in 1965, figuring that he would make it very clear whether this were dangerous or awkward for him. He had already been allowed to go to France several times because his hobby was automobile racing. I have forgotten the race in southern France, but...

Q: Le Mans or something like that.

SMITH: Yes, he was one of several, but very few Soviet participants in that race. So the KGB and he had made their peace long ago. In any case, he was a bright fellow. Of course, he tried very hard to say nothing to me or even share opinions with me that would be useful from my point of view. But being bright and loquacious, he could not help it. I think that Uncle Sam got a lot more out of these visits back and forth than the KGB did. I would simply report the man's views and opinions -- that was all. There were so few such contacts. It is hard for anybody living today to imagine what a thorough job the KGB did in cutting off normal, informal, human contacts between our representatives in Moscow and the Soviet public. So each and every fragment of semi-relaxed, human contact was potentially quite valuable in terms of insights -- that is all.

Q: Who was the Ambassador then?

SMITH: We had two. The first one was Foy Kohler. The second was Llewellyn K. “Tommy” Thompson.

Q: Could you talk a little about your impression of those two men?

SMITH: Foy Kohler was a scrappy, vigorous little man -- a very small guy. He was quite popular at the Embassy in Moscow. Thompson was sent back to Moscow after Kohler left the post. He had been the Ambassador before Kohler. Thompson was a very shy, reserved man. He had spent more time working on Soviet affairs than Foy Kohler had. I do not think he wanted to be there at all. We got to know his wife, who is a delightful person, fairly well. I do not know what else I can tell you about their tours there. I was sufficiently junior that I did not see all that much of them, though I saw them on a personal basis, particularly the Thompsons, again because they were old friends of my in-laws [Mr. and Mrs. Ted Achilles].

That relationship made me very nervous, I should mention, during the first eight years of my Foreign Service career because I did not want anyone among my peers ever to think that anything I achieved in the Foreign Service could possibly have been in part because of this family connection. And I do not think that it was. But it did give me a leg up on others as a learning experience in the sense that in my 20's and 30's I was meeting with very senior people on an informal, relaxed basis. Sometimes it would just be Thompson and his wife, and my wife and myself, for supper at Spaso House. This gave me a sense of the thinking and style of senior people in the Foreign Service, which could only be beneficial.

Q: How would you characterize morale of the Embassy in Moscow at that time? The morale of our Embassy in Moscow seems to wax and wane.

SMITH: I do not think that the morale of our Embassy in Moscow was ever a serious problem, though I could be wrong, until the late 1970's and the early 1980's. I attribute that deterioration of morale in Moscow to a slippage in the interest of the Foreign Service in Soviet affairs. I do not know what that was all about, either, because the Soviets continued to be our main contestant for world influence. When I came into the Service -- I do not know whether you share this opinion -- I found that there were very good people who fought like panthers to get involved in Soviet affairs. I considered myself extremely lucky to be in Moscow.

Q: This was the elite there of one type. There were several such groups, but I would...

SMITH: It was one of the choice activities for people in the political field at the time. It was one of the more interesting areas to be in, and the culmination of work in Soviet affairs was to get yourself assigned to Moscow. So I do not think that there was a person there who was not glad to be there. Administrative people were glad to be there. Some of them were trained in the Russian language and some not, at that time. I think that morale in Moscow was high because it was such a plum to get to go there. Life was difficult at the Embassy, but everyone was well forewarned about that, and so no one could be surprised about the U.S. self-imposed rules, not to mention the success of the KGB in interfering with any kind of normal relationships. I think that the morale problem came later and I think it came up because people were not falling all over themselves to get assigned to Moscow. Some people went there rather reluctantly. Then the tough conditions -- there was no psychic reward for the tough conditions for those people.

Q: So you left there in...

SMITH: 1967. Before we leave Moscow, could I return to one thing that I remember that is of no great consequence, but you asked me what my personal reading was of Soviet behavior in the Middle East? I said that the Soviets really changed before and after that war the Arab-Israeli War of 1967. Probably for many other reasons they wanted to collaborate with the United States in at least one important region of the world. It was impossible to do this in East Asia because of Vietnam, and so the Middle East was a candidate as an experiment on the part of the Soviet Union in trying to establish themselves as a legitimate interlocutor with the United States. The Soviets had great ambitions -- really from World War II on -- to play a respectable role in the world, if we would let them. So Middle East diplomacy after the 1967 Arab-Israeli War became their chosen area to try to "cozy up" to us and to gain prestige. In any case there were reasons why the Soviets were behaving reasonably responsibly, in my judgment.

I became sufficiently concerned about the prevalent view in our government, based on pre-1967 War Soviet activities in the Middle East, that the Soviets were continuing to be totally ruthless and untrustworthy, that I stayed up nights, writing a paper based on unclassified materials, namely, Foreign Broadcast Information Service [FBIS] transcriptions, of Middle Eastern broadcasts in the two months leading up to the 1967 War. I tried to show that a good deal of what was assumed to be Soviet mischief was, in fact, an effort on the part of the Arabs, including our friends, not only the radical Arabs, but including the Saudis, the Jordanians, and other conservative Arab regimes, to get the super powers involved in that problem. The Soviets, obviously, did not have anything to do with it, in the case of the Saudis and Jordanians. The Soviets did not even have an embassy in Saudi Arabia, as you know, until very recently. I wrote this paper to show that we were going overboard in our inclination to blame all kinds of problems in the Middle East on Soviet mischief. The outgoing chief of the Political Section in the Embassy in Moscow -- Gene Boster -- suppressed it. He was a man whom I liked very much, but he was afraid of his shadow and he was not going to "buck" Washington, even though he may very well have been persuaded that this view was right.

In came David Klein, about a week before I left the post Moscow. Now that I think of it, it was not Gene Boster -- I am being unfair. It was Alex Akalovsky, who was acting chief of the Political Section...

Q: And a very famous translator...

SMITH: That is right. He was an astute observer. Obviously, despite his language skills -- he wrote English well -- he was one of the most nervous bureaucrats. I liked Alex. He was my immediate boss throughout my tour in the Political Section. Then he became acting chief of the Political Section when Boster left. It took a month to write this report after the June 1967 War. Akalovsky would not allow the report to move forward.

David Klein arrived about four days before I left Moscow. I became a very good, amazingly good friend of Klein's. He was a controversial figure and a strong-willed individual who made his reputation, I think, in his next tour as, in effect, chief of the Political Section in West Berlin [USBER]. There was nothing in East Berlin then. I think that Klein finally sent the report to Washington. Anyhow, I thought that that was worth mentioning on two accounts: one, suppression of reporting, which does not happen any more, at least in theory; and, secondly, it reinforces my point that the June 1967 War really was a watershed in Soviet behavior in the Middle East.

Q: Well, then, what happened to you after you left Moscow?

SMITH: I was assigned to INR for two years to the Soviet part of INR under Helmut Sonnenfeldt, who was running it then. He was an interesting character. I was given the Middle Eastern portfolio in the Soviet part of INR.

As you may recall, the Soviets kept trying to engage us throughout 1968 in major power talks about the Arab-Israeli problem. This is what the Arabs wanted them to do, to spare them having to negotiate with Israel. They wanted the Soviets to work out a deal with the Americans and to bring in the British and French if necessary. We resisted this, but the Soviets kept inching closer to the Israeli position in these highly confidential discussions. I was called in on New Year's Eve 1968 by Sonnenfeldt and sent to Roy Atherton, then Director of Arab-Israeli Affairs in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs -- NEA. Atherton was already Joe Sisco's right hand man. Joe Sisco was shifting from the position of Assistant Secretary of State for UN Affairs to the position of Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs. The Soviet Ambassador to the U.S. had come in once again on or about December 29, 1968, with still another position paper on the Arab-Israeli problem and had delivered it to the Under Secretary of State. I was sent by Sonnenfeldt to be of assistance to Atherton in analyzing what the Soviets were up to.

That fired my interest. Atherton was able to gain access to the NODIS telegram file. Over the next three months I went furiously through every recorded conversation between senior U.S. and Soviet officials and also second hand reports from our people of Soviet discussions with Western officials. Generally, my objective was to tabulate the evolving Soviet position on the substance of the Arab-Israeli points of contention. I distinctly sensed a progression between 1967 and the beginning of 1969. I wrote this paper, listing all the Arab-Israeli points of contention and showing an evolution of Soviet classified posturing in our direction. I also did a tabulation of published Soviet positions on these issues to show how much daylight there was between their diplomatic stance and their public, propaganda stance.

Sisco suddenly was called in because the Soviet Ambassador -- Dobrynin -- came [to the Department of State]. Out of this flowed what were called the Sisco-Dobrynin talks on the Middle East. These began in March 1969. Sisco was given the "green light" from Secretary of State William Rogers to start, on a tentative basis, secret talks with Dobrynin on the Middle East. The Israelis did not know about them, and SOV [Office of Soviet Affairs in the Department of State] did not even know about them, at first. Sisco wanted an assessment, at the outset of these talks, of the Soviet position. And guess what? Intuitively, I had done just what he needed. Sisco yanked me out of INR, and I worked for Sisco intensively for the following eight months, together with Roy Atherton, as one of the three participants in the Sisco-Dobrynin talks on the Middle East. For a relatively junior officer -- I was, I guess, 39 years old -- this was a heady experience. We went to Moscow and met with Andrei Gromyko, Soviet Foreign Minister, for two weeks because the Soviets, for reasons of "amour propre" [self esteem] had to be able to say that the talks were also taking place in Moscow and not only in Washington. We stayed in Spaso House. Jacob Beam was our Ambassador to the Soviet Union -- this was in the summer of 1969, my last visit to Moscow, I am sorry to say. But staying in Spaso House was fun, too, per se. That was one of the most important moments in my Foreign Service career.

Q: Before we get to what you were seeing going on, may we go quickly back to INR? Sonnenfeldt was your immediate superior. He's a figure that keeps cropping up in foreign policy matters.

SMITH: He is a senior personage today.

Q: How did you read him at the time? How did he operate at that time?

SMITH: Sonnenfeldt was a very smooth operator. He is an astute, political animal. I do not think that he believed for an instant in my view that the Soviets were behaving relatively responsibly and that it behooved the United States to hear them out and see what kind of relationship we could work out with them. I think that he was instinctively very suspicious of the Soviets then and, until not too many years ago, continued to be rather a "hard liner." He saw that I had a commodity which was in demand, as far as the Secretary of State was concerned, and he pushed me to a fare-thee-well. That is how I got into the Sisco-Atherton operation. Sonnenfeldt pushed me in their direction. I think he must have felt that, from a political point of view, it was going to be very helpful to him. Actually, the minute I "belonged" to Sisco, I did not "belong" to Sonnenfeldt any more, although on paper I did for about six months. Then Sisco eventually had me assigned to NEA.

Q: From your point of view, what did you see in those secret Soviet-American talks on the Middle East? What were the major points and how did they develop?

SMITH: In light of the evolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict since then, the points at issue seem ludicrous, but, based on the history of the question up to that time, they were not so funny. The Soviets were twisting the arm of the Egyptians, in particular. The Soviets cleared their position with the Egyptians each step of the way. We gave the Israelis only a general idea of what we were up to. We did not clear our position with the Israelis. I guess we thought that that would create too big a row. We were going to have a showdown with the Israelis when and if we ever got to the point of what we considered a balanced or tentative arrangement with the Soviets. We knew, from intelligence that I cannot go into -- incontrovertible intelligence -- that the Soviets were twisting the Egyptians' arm. Since I still had an INR "portfolio," I was able to have access to certain rarified intelligence. It was just fascinating to me to see what the Soviets were doing. They were moving very slowly, playing "hard ball" with the Egyptians -- but they were moving. And so were we.

Then the "deep penetration raids" began after the first U.S. "Phantom" jets [F-4 fighters] arrived in Israel, in September 1969. To our dismay the Israelis began using these planes to do "dare-devil" things across the Suez Canal. By October 1969 they were bombing targets around Cairo, if you remember.

Q: The "war of attrition..."

SMITH: Yes, indeed, and the windows were rattling in the American School in Cairo. We complained to the Israelis, and they said, "Move your school." They were not about to stop bombing Cairo for our convenience. I guess, in retrospect, that I can understand that, but it sounded a little arrogant at the time.

After that the Soviets introduced Soviet pilots because the Egyptians were being humiliated. Gradually, Soviet planes began pushing the Israeli air campaign back. The United States was so upset by this, in late 1969, that we broke off the U.S.-Soviet talks. We knew that this was something that meant more to them than it did to us, at least potentially. So, I suppose, we figured that this was a way of showing them how angry we were at what they were doing in Egypt. You can hardly blame them for what they were doing in Egypt. If you reverse the situation -- if the Soviets had been the “sponsor” of Israel and we had been the “sponsor” of Egypt -- you know perfectly well that there would have been U.S. pilots in there. So it was really the pot calling the kettle black, I thought. It was foolish of us to break off the talks. The Soviets resisted doing anything to help the Egyptians until Nasser blew the whistle on them. Nasser died in September, 1970!

There was an interplay between the situation on the ground in the area, which the Israelis really provoked, and our ability to continue any kind of dialogue with the Soviets. So, of course, anything the Soviets had to say, starting in 1970, was suspect, and instead of making any further effort with the Soviets, we launched what became known as the “Jarring Initiative,” which the Israelis made sure would fail, and which did by March or April 1970. At that point Joe Sisco, who had an extraordinarily fertile imagination, dreamt up the so-called “Proximity Talks.” He tried to get an Israeli and Egyptian to sit on different floors in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York. He was going to run back and forth [between them]. The effort to organize the “Proximity Talks” continued through 1970 and 1971 and gradually sputtered out after the change of administrations in 1972, with Henry Kissinger’s arrival on the scene as Secretary of State.

Hans N. Tuch was born in Germany in 1924. He received a bachelor’s degree from the University of Kansas City and a master’s degree from the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies. He served in the U.S. Army from 1943-1945. Mr. Tuch’s career in the Foreign Service included positions in the Soviet Union, Germany, and Brazil. The following excerpts are from Mr. Tuch’s interviews with Benis Frank, Cliff Groce, and G. Lewis Schmidt conducted in 1988.

Q: Before we got off on a tangent, you mentioned how there were problems in getting the Soviet Government to accept you as a second officer, and you went to Voice of America in Munich.

TUCH: Right. Then the Soviets, frankly, just wouldn’t give me a visa because I was a USIA officer, so the resolution of that particular problem was that I resigned from USIA, I applied and was appointed by the Department of State, and I was made a State Department officer, and I got my visa to the Soviet Union. I arrived there in July.

Now, I might just, by way of introduction, why I think this particular period, to me, at least, was a fascinating period.

Q: Let me just ask you one question beforehand. Were you USIA people not given diplomatic immunity at this time, or was it just Russia that refused to recognize?

TUCH: The Soviet Union just would not give a USIA officer -- I mean a propaganda officer -- a visa to join the embassy staff, so I resigned. I was appointed by the Department and was assigned as the press and cultural attaché as a second secretary of the embassy, and I was the last one. The people who came after me fared much better and stayed within USIA.

The reason that my period, my three years in the Soviet Union, were a particularly interesting period for me is two-fold, two unrelated reasons. One, it was a really roller coaster period of our relationship with the Soviet Union. It started out, when I got there, with the spirit of Camp David, and the following year, we had our first big American national exhibition with the Nixon visit to the Soviet Union, and the relationship under Khrushchev on the Soviet side, Eisenhower on the American side, seemed to take really a very, very steep upward turn.

Then came, in 1960 -- May 1, 1960 -- the U-2 affair with Gary Powers, and our relationship took, really, a nose-dive, way, way down back into, really, almost a Cold War period.

Q: Was it that they didn't know about the U-2 flights?

TUCH: I think they knew about it, but they hadn't been able to do anything about it until that particular time.

Q: So was it a manufactured nose-dive or a nose-dive that came out of, "Now we've caught you"?

TUCH: It was a double one, because our first initial reaction, if you remember correctly, we would not admit it. Actually, my one accidental accomplishment in that whole period was an interesting little anecdote. We did not know -- the Americans did not know -- where the U-2 had been shot down. We knew it had been shot down somewhere in the Soviet Union, and we could not find out from the Soviets where, actually, they had shot down. That became a very important issue for us, because here was Eisenhower still claiming publicly that obviously they had shot down near the border or it was an accident, that it strayed across, and it hadn't strayed across. We were sort of aggressive in our reaction. This was May 1st when it was announced, and all through that whole day, it was just back and forth between Washington and Moscow -- "Where was this plane? Where was it shot down?" We were saying it was not shot down inside the Soviet Union.

That evening, there was a press reception that the Union of Journalists were sponsoring for May 1st, and because of our improving relationship up to that time, I had been invited to that reception for the first time ever. Of course, I got to the reception, I was surrounded by very, very angry Soviet journalists, and all kinds of, "How can you do this? You are ruining the relationship and spying," etc., etc.

I said, "Well, you know, it's an unfriendly act to shoot down the plane of a nation that you are supposedly having a good relationship with, so it's an unfriendly act that you committed shooting down the plane."

One of the journalists said, "Gospadin Tuch, what can you do? What could we have done? The plane was over Sverdlovsk. We had to shoot it down."

And I said, "Where?" And he kind of backed away from me, and they all sort of dispersed.

I went back to the embassy. It was about 11:00 o'clock by that time, and I thought, "This is an item of information that I think I'm going to wake up Llewellyn Thompson," our ambassador, Tommy Thompson. I went to the residence. I did not want to take a chance of using the telephone. I went to the residence, and I didn't wake him up, but he was in his robe. I told him what I'd heard, and in his very quiet sort of laid-back way, which was, of course, Ambassador Thompson's technique, at least as long as I knew him, very quiet, soft-spoken, he looked me and said, "I think you'd better go back to the embassy and report this to Washington." And on what they called a NIACT cable in those days, which was an immediate telegram, "And be sure to wake up the communicator to send that message, because I think this is one item of information they'd like to get." So, you know, that's what I did.

But at any rate, I was talking about the roller coaster.

Q: I'd like to ask you a couple of questions before we go to the roller coaster. Number one, I would assume that maybe outside of the ambassador and the military attachés, maybe, that no one at the embassy knew about the U-2 program, which had to be at that time very, very closely held.

TUCH: I don't know.

Q: You didn't know about it?

TUCH: I certainly did not know about it. I doubt that -- maybe the ambassador knew about it. I would think that he probably did, and I would think that probably our Central Intelligence Agency representatives knew about it.

Q: Good gracious! CIA?

TUCH: Yes. But I certainly don't think that probably our attachés knew about it at that time.

Q: It was a CIA program, anyway. It wasn't a military program.

TUCH: No.

Q: Okay. Number two, you mentioned Tommy Thompson, Llewellyn Thompson, professional, one of the real experts on Soviet Russia going way back to, I guess, the blitz days, when Thayer and some of the other ones were there. You might want to personalize and characterize him. What did he look like? I think he was red-haired, if I remember.

TUCH: No. Sandy.

Q: Sandy. Right. But I think I've heard him described as sandy-haired.

TUCH: He, of course, is one of my four, so to speak, godfathers -- ideals -- as far as people that I've worked for. Just to mention the other three, being Edward R. Murrow, John Crimmins, and Arthur Burns. But he was really my first boss, with whom, as a relatively junior officer, when I was 34 years old when I got to Moscow, and I was a relatively junior officer. But you had in Moscow at that time, it was an ideal, from my point of view, an ideal American embassy. You had no hierarchy, you had no protocol. It was a small embassy. I counted -- we had 14 substantive officers in the embassy, other than the military. There were 14 substantive officers, there were 16 military officers, and there were about ten administrative types in the embassy, and that was it.

Q: Was Leo Du Lac there at the time?

TUCH: Yes, he was there. He was the assistant naval attaché. He was a great Marine officer, just a great Marine officer, and he did a marvelous job there. We were very good friends.

Q: And also that's the time before the agricultural attachés and all the other agencies in government.

TUCH: I count the agricultural attaché as part of the 14 substantive officers. But we had, for instance, an ambassador, we had a deputy chief of mission, minister of the embassy. We had no counselors. We had one first secretary, politico-economic, sort of almost like the British system, a chancery head. He was a chancery head. And the rest of us were second secretaries. We were all working stiffs -- the political section, the economic section, agricultural section, and the publications procurement officer, one officer who bought books for the whole U.S. Government, who just did nothing but go around Moscow buying books at bookstores. I helped him, because he helped me. His name was Harry Barnes, who's now ambassador to Chile. He and I did share the cultural and press relations work. It was too much to do for one person, so he helped me, and I helped him buy books. But at any rate, it was a very tight, very small, very collegial type of embassy in those days. Everybody knew everybody, and everybody worked for the ambassador and the deputy chief of mission, who was sort of the executive officer, by the name of "Dick" Richard Davis. Not Davies, but Davis.

It was, from my point of view, an ideal situation working for an ambassador who recognized -- and here we come back to the public diplomacy angle -- who recognized that in a situation in which we functioned, the cultural and press relations work was the most substantive activity that an embassy could do. Obviously, we read the papers and reported on political areas, economic developments, agriculture developments, but he saw that the only people who really got out to talk to people were the people who did public affairs work. There was, at that time, only one -- myself.

He was terribly supportive about the cultural affairs work. For instance, say you had a delegation of American composers there, and you wanted to have a party. Well, you knew that the Soviet officials would not come to your apartment to be with these American composers. But they may come to the residence. The ambassador's house was open to any kind of a party or reception or get-together, where we all felt that the Soviet officials and maybe even some composers and musicians might come to the Spaso house, the ambassador's official residence, but they wouldn't come to my place. He was very, very supportive of this, and he, having been in the Soviet Union during World War II, in the 1940s, knew a lot of the -- at that time, younger, creative people, ballet dancers, opera singers from the early Forties, who now were fairly old and many of them retired, but he knew them, and they would come sometimes to his place. Therefore, he provided the opening that was so important for us.

Why it was interesting for me to be in the Soviet Union during that period of time. The relationship, from its nadir, took an upward turn with the election of President Kennedy, and the release of the RB-47 pilots, who had been another sort of semi-spy plane, who had been shot down in Murmansk, in the ocean, had been shot down, something that was really not much talked about. But that's another story, because there's an interesting anecdote, too, about the release of these two pilots.

But anyway, I think Khrushchev wanted to make a gesture vis-a-vis Kennedy, and by releasing these guys, it had been a sore point in our relationship, and the relationship took an up-turn until the Bay of Pigs invasion. Then even worse, it took the real down-turn again after the meeting between Khrushchev and Kennedy in July 1961 in Vienna, where Kennedy got his real first taste of what it was like to negotiate or to relate or to be up against the Soviet Union in the form of Nikita Khrushchev. As a matter of fact, there was one interesting anecdote. I wasn't there. I was in Moscow still. But when Tommy Thompson, who had gone to Vienna to be with the President, came back, we asked him how things went, and he said, "You know, after the first day of the meetings, of the relationship, the President turned to me and says, 'Ambassador Thompson, now I understand why you want to get out of the Soviet Union so badly.'" [Laughter] At any rate, it took a down-turn again, and that is really when I left Moscow.

The other interesting point to mention about the whole assignment, my three years in Moscow, I was the first American embassy officer to serve more than two years after World War II. There was a hard and fast rule by the Department of State that you could not serve longer than two years in Moscow, a rule that Tommy Thompson had tried to break for a number of years, because he felt that some people didn't become useful to the embassy until they'd been there for about two years. And so he negotiated with George Allen, who was at that time the Director of USIA, who was also, of course, a State Department officer, career Foreign Service officer, on whether he could assign me for a third year. He did that without asking me. Then when George Allen said yes, he called me in and said, "I would like to keep you for a third year." Well, I felt so flattered by being asked anything by Tommy Thompson, that I immediately said yes, and only then realized I should really talk this over with my wife first, because the assignment in Moscow, professionally, probably one of the most interesting assignments one could have, the roughness or the really bad part of the assignment was more on the wife and the children than it was on the officer, because the officer had the interesting political developments to contend with, whereas the wife only had the hardships to contend with.

Q: Which comes to a good point, because I was about to ask you, since this is your interview, the personal side -- where you lived, how you existed, whether you lived on the local economy or had to bring in foodstuffs from outside the country, the day-to-day living, schooling for the children, whether or not your wife and children became fluent in Russian, etc.

TUCH: Well, life was pretty tough in Moscow in those days.

Q: There was no compound as there is today?

TUCH: Well, before I got there, everybody who was assigned to the embassy had lived in the embassy building, which was located on the Tchaikovsky Ring, and was a 12-story building where our offices and apartments were located. But before I came to the embassy, about two years before I came to the embassy, there was some expansion, and people were assigned apartments by the Soviet Government in other areas. Where we were assigned to was a huge compound with about 800 apartments, which had been built as a diplomatic compound for diplomatic families of all nations, East and West. At that time, for instance, a large wing was occupied by the Chinese, still, because the relationship was still fairly decent at that time. We lived in an apartment in there, which, by Soviet standards, was, I guess, fairly good. We had three bedrooms, and it was spacious, but by American standards -- well, the anecdote that I'd like to relate, we arrived on an evening, we were taken up to our apartment, and we walked in. The first thing I looked for was the front door, because I thought I'd been taken up through the back door, you know, where there was a freight elevator and so forth. [Laughter] Of course, we had been taken through the front door, which looked like that kind of an apartment. It was fairly primitive by American standards, but it had been supplied by us, by the embassy, with an American refrigerator, American stove. We had brought washing machine and dryer with us, which were put out into the hallway, because there was no other place to put it.

But at any rate, we knew it was going to be a hardship post, and the wonderful thing about this assignment in Moscow was because it was a hardship post, because everybody lived sort of under the same condition and was up against it, all but the administrative officer, who had a wonderful place in the chancery, we all held together, and the enemy was the administrative officer as much as the Soviets in this respect.

Q: He was FSO?

TUCH: No, he wasn't FSO. He rose very high and very rapidly in the Foreign Service and at one time became the Under Secretary of State for Administrative Affairs. You do know him -- Idar Rimestad. So he kind of focused the animosity that was not directly to the Soviets on himself, deservedly so. But at any rate, we lived in this apartment.

Q: We have heroes and villains in these interviews.

TUCH: We lived in this apartment for nine months, and then a very strange thing happened. Suddenly, one noticed that the building was deteriorating much more rapidly than most new buildings in Moscow deteriorated. We were used to the fact that over the first floor of most apartment buildings, new apartment buildings in Moscow, there was a net so that falling bricks from the building would hit the net and not the pedestrian walking down the street. But that was sort of standard throughout Moscow. In the newest sections, you had nets over the sidewalks for falling bricks. Well, we had that, too, and nobody paid very much attention to that because it was standard. Then they built a canopy, a wooden canopy, over the entrance so that you wouldn't be hit by falling things as you entered the building. Suddenly, many of us noticed cracks in our walls -- real cracks -- in even the supporting walls. We reported this and were told, among others, by Idar Rimestad, "Don't worry, these are not supporting walls. This is just the building settling." It was built about a year before that time. So one worried, but one didn't worry too much, because the apartment was fairly decent.

One morning, in our apartment, we were sitting at breakfast, and there was a tremendous crash. We rushed into the living room, and the window plus the frame had simply broken out and crashed outward. In other words, the building had shifted, so that the frame and the windows just disappeared. This was duly reported. Suddenly, the Soviets became apparently very concerned, because one of the gas mains had cracked, too, in the basement, and they were immediately afraid of gas explosions.

Q: What period of year was this?

TUCH: This was in the spring of '59, March of '59.

Q: Still cold.

TUCH: We were ordered -- remember there were 800 apartments, roughly, 120 per block, and there were about six blocks, 800 apartments -- we were ordered, every diplomatic mission was ordered to move out within three days, but no place was given to us where to move to. There were negotiations with the Soviets. Finally, the Soviets came up with a new block of apartments which had been built for the Soviets, but the Soviets hadn't moved in yet. Some had moved in and were kicked out, and these were new apartments, and we were supposed to move into them within three days. Here Mr. Rimestad came into the fray again. These were supposed to be temporary apartments, and he didn't want to move our refrigerators, our stoves, our sinks, into them, because, after all, that was going to cause a lot of commotion. There was a stove and a sink in the apartment, the Soviet one, and he wasn't going to do this for us. After all, when you come to Moscow, "You don't plan," -- these were his exact quotes -- "to live in a white frame house with a picket fence around the garden." This notwithstanding that he had an apartment in the chancery which was right next to the DCM's, to the minister's apartment, and it was, you know, one of the really nice apartments.

At any rate, that's when these 30 or 40 embassy families, who were the core of our -- you know, we were all very close and friends, we revolted. We asked for a meeting with the ambassador, and we said, "We're going to send our families out because the hygienic conditions are such that unless we have refrigerators and unless we have our own stoves, we just can't afford to leave our families here, and we're going to send our families to Vienna or Berlin or to Germany to live, because we just could not do this."

Well, the ambassador looked into it and ordered either Rimestad to move our refrigerators and stoves to these temporary apartments. I emphasize the word "temporary," because this was April '59. These apartments are now still in use by our embassy families. They were that temporary.

At any rate, one other aspect of this was peculiar. When these were advertised by our administrative officer as brand-new Soviet apartments, the best new construction available, and we took this with a grain of salt. There was one Soviet newspaper in those days, which was the Moscow evening newspaper, the Chernya Moskva, which was not always only devoted to official decrees. They had a little bit of news items from time to time in that paper. It so happened, just in those days when we were to move, there was a major expose in that newspaper which one of my colleagues discovered and read out loud in translation, because Idar Rimestad didn't speak any Russian, so at the staff meeting, he translated for those who didn't speak Russian. It appears that a new housing complex had been built and had been built so badly that the citizens who lived in that housing complex started complaining to their local Communist Party headquarters about the bad conditions. For instance, when one stepped out of the balcony, the balcony crumpled and collapsed, so it couldn't even hold one person out on the balcony, the concrete was so bad. People had to hold onto the railing in order not to be catapulted to the ground. As a result of these complaints, the local engineer had turned off the hot water and told the occupants of this housing block that they could not get their hot water back until they stopped complaining to Communist Party headquarters. So they had been without hot water, plus their bad living conditions, for about two weeks. Then in the last final paragraph, the address was given of this housing block, and it was the housing block where we were moving in, the Leninsky Prospect number four. [Laughter] That was our housing block.

At any rate, we moved into this place and it was fairly much of a shambles for at least the next year or two. The apartment size depended on the number of people we had, so we were given two apartments on the same floor, one two-room apartment and one three-room apartment, separated by the hallway. We had two children with us. One was a first-grader and the other one was kindergarten. We also had brought with us, because this was really the only way to handle it, we had brought with us a German au pair, who was to kind of help us with the children, because the Soviet situation with help was very unreliable, because when the Soviets would get mad or wanted to do you a dirty trick, they would just withdraw the maid and say, "Well, nobody wants to work for you American spies and you American warmongers," and you couldn't get any help. In the meantime, your wife, at that time, also was really very much preoccupied and occupied with, really, making the family be able to live. She stood in line in the stores during the day to shop, because there was no Soviet diplomatic grocery store. There was not even a dollar store where you could buy things for dollars, as now exists throughout the Soviet Union. We were completely dependent upon our own resources.

One of the things we were authorized to do before we came to the Soviet Union, we were allowed to bring with us 4,000 pounds of food or household products. In those days, it was really a very interesting phenomenon, because all of us, obviously, we went and purchased 4,000 pounds of whatever we thought was most important for us to keep around. We, for instance, brought 250 pounds of coffee with us, because we figured that would last us for two years. We were very adamant we wanted our coffee. My wife was very adamant that she was going to bring soap products and cleaning products with us, so in her case, the 4,000 pounds, a large amount was coffee and cleaning products. The hell with the rest of it. But the fact is that when you compared notes among your embassy colleagues, everybody brought 4,000 pounds of something. In those days, whatever you brought 4,000 pounds worth cost 1,000 bucks. This was sort of standard that it was roughly $1,000 to $1,200 that you spent on those 4,000 pounds of food or household products. Anyway, we brought these 4,000 pounds of products, but you had absolutely no place to put them, because you had no storage space. So what you did is you built shelves in your hallway and in your bedrooms, and you had your products on those shelves, wooden shelves. As you walked into the apartment, you had these shelves on which all your products were located. Then, of course, you didn't have a balcony or any place, unless your dryer was working, which it very often wasn't, so you had to hang all your laundry in your apartment also. So you know, your apartment was both a place to live, but also for your utilities, your laundry to hang on.

I remember very vividly one occasion when Congressman Wayne Hayes, who was a great critic of the Department and the Foreign Service and really our whole foreign relations establishment and always considered everybody in the Foreign Service as striped pants and cookie-pushers, when he made a visit, came to visit the Soviet Union to see how gloriously we lived in the socialist capital, and so we all got together, and we invited him to have lunch in one of our apartments. It was my neighbor's apartment. We saw to it that this apartment was, you know, really in its most normal, typical fashion at that particular time. For instance, when he came in, there were wet bed sheets hanging in the front closet, and they had to be lifted up so that he could go underneath in order to get into the living room. Somebody, of course, dropped it just as he was coming under, so he got a little wet. Anyway, we had him for lunch, and we served him the food that our wives really were able to purchase on the local economy after standing in line, and those things that we were able to have brought with us in our initial shipment, which was canned corn beef and canned chicken. Those were the foods. Not Spam -- I mean, we were past the period of Spam, but you were still with canned corned beef kind of thing, which the British loved and we hated. But at any rate, we served them that, and then whatever was available that we'd imported to our little commissary which we had in the embassy, where we'd brought in things from Helsinki and sometimes from Copenhagen and sometimes from Berlin -- always under escort, incidentally. Anything that had to be brought in had to be brought in by diplomatic courier with an escort.

At any rate, we had him for lunch. Then, of course, after lunch, he excused himself to go to the bathroom. Well, one of the things we didn't tell him, that all toilets in the Soviet Union, when you flush them, the water spit out. So, obviously, you had learned very early in the game that before you flushed the toilet, you stepped to the side and then flushed it so you would not get hit by the spray of water. Well, we obviously did not tell him to go to the bathroom, and sure enough, when he came out, he was sort of crossing his legs and walking very carefully and this kind of thing. [Laughter] Just to make the point that we were living on the economy, which practically -- not completely, because, as I said, we did import things from Berlin, mostly staples, some fresh meats, turkeys for Thanksgiving and Christmas, and some cheeses and some dairy products. We had the reputation that we import everything. The Scandinavian embassies could never understand that we would even buy the butter of the local economy and eggs, because they imported everything from their Scandinavian home countries -- milk, eggs, butter, dairy products. We did it to some extent, but really very little. Never eggs and butter, because you just depended upon what you could find locally.

Q: Is this because of your administrative officer?

TUCH: No. We were just not that organized, and we considered it a hardship post, and to go to Moscow was part of the hardship, just like when people went to Africa. They didn't get air-conditioning units for every room; if they had one, they were lucky. So this was just part of your assignment to Moscow, that you really had to live the way the Soviets lived. You didn't have to, but couldn't live otherwise.

Q: Idar Rimestad, I think, was famous throughout his career for building elaborate embassy commissaries and bars, etc.

TUCH: There is an anecdote there, too. One day, we had imported via Air France. We had sort of a contract with Air France at Christmas time and Thanksgiving time to bring in turkeys and a large food shipment by air. Air France was one of the few airlines that was flying at that time into Moscow.

Q: I assume there were food purveyors back in the country who catered?

TUCH: Ostermann Peterson was the most famous, and Peter Justesen were the two Danish firms that really were specializing in providing foodstuffs and products to diplomatic missions throughout the world, not just Eastern Europe, throughout the world. We lived off of Peterson Justesen's and Ostermann Peterson. But Air France had sent in this large shipment for which we paid, but they, in order to be gracious, suddenly I came down to the commissary in the morning, and there was a huge Gruyère cheese on the counter with a little mark on it, with a little flag on it, "Help yourself." And Idar Rimestad standing there saying, "Help yourself to this cheese." This had been donated by Air France to our embassy as sort of a dividend, this one big cheese. So you cut off a slice for yourself. I said, "Idar, how come you didn't take this one completely for yourself?" Which he could have; nobody would have been the wiser.

He said, "No, no, no, no. This one is for you all. I already have two." So Idar was completely honest in his crookedness.

Q: Did he ever serve in Germany?

TUCH: Oh, sure. Idar Rimestad was the personnel officer of HICOG when you and Schechter and I served in HICOG. I, to this day, have two letters in my personnel file RIFing me -- firing me -- from . . .

Q: Was he before Glenn Wolf came?

TUCH: No, he was working for Glenn Wolf. Glen Wolf was administrator, reddish-haired, and he was the chief personnel officer at that time. He had a reputation to uphold by this time. He was one of the very few people, I must admit, who hoodwinked Llewellyn Thompson completely. You know, he did everything. Thompson was not demanding, but he saw to it -- I mean, there were always things done. Tommy Thompson's wishes were anticipated by Idar Rimestad, and therefore, he was highly regarded by the ambassador.

Q: There are people such as he throughout the world.

TUCH: Oh, yes.

Q: In every institution.

TUCH: Sure, sure.

Q: What about children, schooling and medical?

TUCH: There was an Anglo-American school in Moscow which exists to this day, which was a small school run jointly by the British and American Embassy and open to all other embassies, priority to the American and British embassies, but it had other children from other embassies, too, those that wanted to have their children have an English-speaking education. We had about two or three teachers, one British, one American, hired and brought in, and then a number of mothers who had either training or desire to be helpful, did the kindergarten bit and the teacher's aide kind of thing. That worked reasonably well for the time we were there. During my first year in Moscow, there was no opportunity -- the Soviets would not permit the American Embassy children to attend a Soviet school. During our second and third year, they did open up their schools to small children whose parents wanted to send them to Soviet schools. Some parents did, with mixed success, some with a good deal of success, and the kids really did learn Russian and were able to succeed. Others, it was not a very successful experience. In some cases, it was also a negative political experience. The children, you know, came home telling their parents what their teachers told them about America, and there was a lot of problems involved. But in some cases it was successful.

At any rate, we had a first-grader and a kindergartner, and then a second- and third-grader, and then second, third, and fourth, and our Andrea, our daughter, was nursery school, kindergarten, and first grade.

Q: The wives who served to support the schooling, were they paid?

TUCH: Yes.

Q: Or were they volunteer?

TUCH: No, they were paid. They had to be qualified.

Q: We will continue on with answering the question that was asked you about the mothers who were the teachers' aides.

TUCH: I really can't remember. I can't be completely positive on whether they were paid or not, but you know, it was sort of a situation, with the exception of the professional teachers who were imported, that everybody pitched in and did something. For instance, it wasn't asked of you. It was the sort of situation where, for instance, you were expected to come to the ambassador's receptions, and the ambassador, especially during our second and third year, when the relationship developed so much, used to have three receptions per week just to accommodate all the American visitors and congressional delegations and things that came in, we divided the embassy up in platoons of a third each, so that not everybody had to go to these and work at these receptions, but the point is that the wives, obviously, tried to get to these receptions. On one occasion I came, and we had two sick children. Our au pair, our German girl, was also not well. My wife really just couldn't come, and I said something to Jane Thompson, Mrs. Thompson, who was the ambassador's wife, "I'm very sorry my wife didn't come to this reception," although this was expected of her. She said, "Don't tell me even why she couldn't come. She obviously is busy with something. Remember, I'm a mother, too, here in Moscow, and I know what wives go through. So forget it. Let her do her thing." So it was the kind of a relationship that you had there which, of course, I may have experienced in one other post -- Bulgaria and Sofia, but really nowhere else where the relationship was a collegial, family type of an embassy. I mean, where the frustrations that everybody had were really shared.

Q: It's an interesting point. I've read in a number of places the problems there were vis-a-vis wives, as a matter of fact, that the FSOs were marked on fitness reports, how effective their wives were, how much they threw themselves in and did things, for which they weren't paid and for which they hadn't been hired. I think that happens with any institution or corporation or the military. Of course, in some cases, with higher officials, in the case of the military, the wives are used to wearing their husband's rank or, in the case of an ambassador, it's "Mrs. Ambassador," and the wives are all their aides and so on. I'm sure it's a real problem which exists in a highly concentrated institutional situation such as a diplomatic or military post.

TUCH: You worked in an entirely different social framework from the one that you do now -- an entirely different social framework. Of course, it had its negative side. It did have ambassadors' wives who were ogres, you know, who were just really vicious or very, very bad in their relationships as their husbands, spouses, in a particular post situation. But on the other hand . . .

Q: I suppose in the case of those wives of professional career FSOs, it had been done to them, and now it's their chance.

TUCH: Yes. Right. And there were some who had a reputation. I won't name them, but everybody knows them now. I mean, most of them are dead by now, but they existed, and you knew them and you knew before you got to the post that this was going to be one of your problems. But on the other hand, you also had the situation that when you joined the Foreign Service, I think you made the commitment as a husband and wife, and it was more or less, as I said, a different era of our social history, that your wife was expected to participate and not be paid for it, but to participate in her husband's career as an adjunct. Let's face it. Now, I don't think this is necessarily good, but this was the situation, and it has changed completely since that time. The wives were rated. But, for instance, in Moscow, where the situation was tough for the wives, for the families, they participated and they were, on the other hand, given the credit, and they were appreciated by, in this case, Ambassador Thompson and Jane Thompson, who said, "We could not function here as an embassy without the wives participating fully." It was recognized and appreciated. Not much was said about it or done about it, but I am sure that in every efficiency report written in Moscow by the ambassador or by the DCM, the wives were given full credit for their participation. They knew they were being rated, and they were given full credit for it. It was a team effort. They were being harassed by the Soviets as the officers were, too.

I remember on my first long trip outside of Moscow, I went on a ten-day trip down to Central Asia to Samarkand, Tashkent and Frunze [now Bishkek], and my wife was called every night four times for the first week at 2:00, 3:00, 4:00, and 5:00 o'clock in the morning. The phone rang, and there was silence. This is harassment, I mean, for a wife. Every night she was awakened, and there was just breathing and then hung up. That kind of thing. They were harassed. There was no doubt about it. So it was a different atmosphere and a different situation. It is a different atmosphere now in Moscow, an entirely different kind of situation. But in those days, well, I think it probably had even been different ten years before when the embassy -- there was a mystique about serving in Moscow. Those people who served there before 1953 and those who served after 1953, the real old Moscow hands were the ones who had served there before 1953 when our embassy was located on a street called Bukavaya Street, which was right off Red Square. In the Stalin days, Stalin didn't want to have the British and American embassies that close to Red Square, and we were told to move. The Americans, in typical fashion, we moved. The British procrastinated, and to this day they still have their beautiful -- the located residence right across the river from Red Square, looking onto Red Square. We moved to this other embassy building, and this is where we're still now, pending our moving to our new embassy compound. When that will be, I don't know.

At any rate, what I did want to mention, in getting back to the substantive part, I mentioned the roller coaster affair, which made it interesting for me, about our relationship. The other thing was that in 1958, in January, before I got to Moscow, we had signed our first cultural and scientific exchange agreement with the Soviet Union, and that opened up the whole area of what I would call cultural and informational relationship with the Soviet Union, whereby we published the magazine Amerika which was distributed in the Soviet Union. That is an entire chapter. We had our first performing arts groups coming with the New York Philharmonic and "My Fair Lady" and Michigan University Concert Band, and we had our first exchanges of cultural personalities, composers, painters, and writers. I can name them, who they were, who participated. We had, first of all, our first major exhibition, the American National Exhibition in Moscow, and the Soviet National Exhibition in New York, which took place in '59.

You really completely occupied yourself, so much so that everybody in Washington and in Moscow -- the ambassador and Mr. Allen and the State Department -- agreed that one cultural affairs and press officer could not do the job. I was supposed to get an assistant. Everybody signed off on this, and it was always very complicated because housing was so tight, and if a new officer was to be added to the embassy, it was a very major bureaucratic process through which you went before this position was approved. Well, it was approved. I was to get an assistant. At the last moment, the decision was made in Washington that what we really needed in Moscow at this stage was a high-ranking cultural counselor to administer this huge new cultural affairs program. Of course, I was too low grade for that position, so a cultural counselor at a very high grade was assigned, and I became the assistant. So the moral of the story is, "Never ask for an assistant, because you may be it." I became the assistant to the cultural counselor for the next two years of my assignment.

Q: Who was this?

TUCH: Lee Brady. Lee Brady became my boss and served there for two years. His assignment started off in a very, very, very bad way. This is, of course, another chapter. When we will interview him, I will interview him personally, but he went through the first local appendectomy in the American Embassy within two months after he arrived. I was present in the operating room when it took place, and it was done without the benefits of anesthetic. That was a horrible, horrible experience, worse for me, witnessing such an operation in an operating room where there were two other operations going on simultaneously in front of you, a mangled arm and a fallopian pregnancy. The reason that took place is we had a new embassy doctor. You asked me about medical arrangements earlier. We had an embassy doctor who was normally an Air Force officer, one of the Air Force slots to supply a medical officer to the American Embassy. They were usually very good officers, very good doctors, medical doctors, and they really were part of the family. The doctor who had been there had left. We had a new doctor who was not an armed services officer, but a civilian, a marvelous doctor, but he was new. Lee Brady came up with what he identified as a ruptured appendix, and he really didn't know of any other way but to take him to the diplomatic hospital. This is where this happened. We took him over, and they performed the operation.

The next morning, I walked into the room. Lee had fainted; he had been in deep shock. He was in deep shock, and he was lying in bed, bare to his chest, and he had these big red splotches on his chest. I said, "My God, what happened to you now?"

And he says, "You wouldn't know, Tom."

I said, "What do you mean, you wouldn't know? What is it? What are these red splotches?"

He said, "Well, they just cupped me."

I said, "They did what?"

He said, "I knew you wouldn't know what this is. They cupped me."

I said, "What is cupping?"

He said, "Look at this." There were two cups on his night table, and they had put these suction cups on his chest in order to get out the impurities of this blood system.

Q: Like leeches.

TUCH: Like leeches, but they didn't use leeches. They certainly used cups on him, and this was sort of the . . .

Q: Modern Soviet medical.

TUCH: Modern Soviet medical science. The story connected with this one -- and I might just go on and tel it -- his incision drained for about six weeks, and finally the doctor just put him on an airplane and shipped him out to Copenhagen, and he was in Copenhagen for about three weeks to just get the incision closed off and get him back into normal state.

One of our first delegations I remember was a delegation of three American surgeons from North Carolina, young American surgeons who were interested in Soviet surgical procedures. They were taken in hand in the Soviet Union by a professor by the name of Mischnevsky, who was the famous surgeon who had invented the Soviet heart-lung machine. This is one of the things that they wanted to examine. They had been there for about two weeks, and just before they went back to the States, they came to some reception at the American Embassy, and they were holding forth on the wonders of Soviet medicine and medical treatment. I said, "Frankly, this is maybe true, but you ought to see or hear about the other side of Soviet medicine. Come on over. I want you to meet my boss, Lee Brady. Lee, tell your story." And Lee did.

One of the doctors said, "You know, Mr. Brady, frankly, I just do not believe what you've told me, on the basis of my experience."

Lee Brady said, "Suit yourself. Don't believe me."

They went back to their host, Professor Mischnevsky, the next morning and said, "We heard this crazy story at the American Embassy last night about one of the embassy officers being cupped after an operation. You don't do this kind of thing."

And Mischnevsky turned and said, "Of course we do this."

They said, "Would you do this?"

"Of course. I do it all the time. Let me demonstrate it." He showed them how he administers cupping on the legs.

The doctor came back to the embassy just before he left and apologized to Lee Brady. He said, "I have never, never in my life experienced anything like this before, where you have, on one hand, a very, very advanced medical technology science and, on the other hand, the treatment of patients at such a low grade." And that, as far as I'm concerned, throughout my experience there, persisted -- namely, that when the Soviets want to concentrate on one or another development, whether it is in military technology or whether you put up a Sputnik or to develop a heart-lung machine, they are able to do this, because they can order their scientists into a certain channel, and they can pick the best ones and say, "This is what you're going to be doing, and this is what you're going to develop," and they come up with some very, very fine things. Whereas the regular, whether it's Soviet building technology or whether it's Soviet medicine or whether it's the how the infantry operates in the Soviet Union, it's at a very, very primitive level.

Q: There's a great fear, then, on the part of the embassy personnel, of getting sick or having a major illness.

TUCH: Well, after that experience, when anybody even complained of a stomach ache, the doctor would just pack you off with ice, with dry ice, [laughter] and pack you off on the next plane to wherever the plane was going West, whether it was Vienna or Copenhagen. No, at that time, you had maybe three, four times a week foreign airplanes coming in, and whatever plane it was that day, he would put you on it and out you go. He would not take another chance.

Q: You were talking about buying dairy products. The Americans bought the dairy products on the local economy, eggs and cheese and so on. We're you concerned about pasteurization and all?

TUCH: Yes. Never milk. We lived on powdered milk. The children -- powdered milk was it. Eggs, we did try to find on the Soviet economy, and they were expensive, but you know, whatever you could. Again, if you had a shipment coming in from Berlin, a food shipment, if you did go to the Berlin U.S. Army commissary and somebody went out and bought for the embassy and made arrangements, say, 6,000 pounds of food to bring it in, sure, maybe we would take 100 cartons of eggs on that particular shipment, but that was iffy, because eggs don't travel very well. Sometimes, you know, you'd buy frozen food, and you'd have to escort it as a courier from Berlin to Warsaw to Brest -- it was Brest Litovsk -- where the Soviet border, where the passenger train, they changed the wheels because the gauge is different. But on the baggage cars where the food was on, they actually had to transfer from one baggage car to the next. I had the singular experience of being an escort for a food shipment from Berlin, 6,000 pounds of food that I had brought from Berlin to Warsaw to Brest. The train was three hours late, and they changed the wheels on the passenger cars, but they refused to transfer the shipment from one baggage car to the other, and I was on the platform arguing with them that I wasn't going to leave without the food. He says, "Well, if you don't want to leave without the food, you're going to stay right here in Brest, because here goes your train."

I jumped on the train, and I arrived in Moscow, where we had our embassy truck backed up to the train station. I got off without my food shipment, and I never lived that down. As a matter of fact, they accused me of having done it on purpose, because about half of the 6,000 pounds of food apparently was seafood and fish, and the people knew I was allergic to seafood and fish, and they accused me of doing it on purpose, of leaving the shipment in Brest. Well, you see, what happened was -- this was in October, and the shipment, in Brest it was freezing, in Moscow it was not yet freezing. Fortunately, they brought the food in 24 hours later, and it had not defrosted, so it wasn't lost. But there was this chance. But this was the kind of experience that you would constantly have in your food shipments to bring in things that you wanted to have.

Sometimes we would go out as individuals or maybe as couriers. You had courier runs to Helsinki, and if you went to Helsinki on a courier run, your first stop would be at Stockman's Department Store. Now, Stockman's is the Macy's of Helsinki, and it is a lovely, beautiful department store.

Q: You went by train?

TUCH: We went by train, yes. It was a 24-hour, 26-hour trip by train to Helsinki. Stockman's was a marvelous, marvelous store. They catered to all the diplomats in Moscow. When you arrived at Stockman's, because you didn't speak Finnish, the first thing they would do is they would assign to you an interpreter who would go throughout the store with you, take the orders, mark them down, make a list of them. You would then give them a check, your own personal check on an American bank, and you would forget about it. Stockman's would deliver the shipment to you on your plane, to your compartment or to the baggage care, and you would have it delivered. Stockman's became sort of the heaven of the American and all the embassies in Moscow. Of course, they were doing this for a good profit, but they really served us extremely well. It was very, very nice.

Q: To me, it sounds that even in '59 and '60, the period that you were there, Russia and Moscow sounds almost like a Third World country today, almost.

TUCH: Oh, in many, many, many -- and in terms of amenities and living conditions and food supplies, you know, every afternoon my wife would go to her favorite bread store and wait in line for the bread to be delivered. Now, we wanted a certain bread because we lived this particular bread, but if she did not go there that afternoon and stand in line and wait for the bread shipment to arrive, she would not have gotten it. She would have gotten bread, but not her variety of bread, maybe.

Q: They did not bake it there?

TUCH: No, no. They would come to the various stores to be delivered. But she got very much used to it. I mean, this became natural. If there was a line, you joined it, and then you asked what it was. [Laughter] So this became natural, and there were a lot of jokes and a lot of stories. Maybe we should shut off this with one wonderful anecdote.

Q: Yes, please.

TUCH: My favorite Soviet joke about the rumor that got around at this particular Leningrad food store that caviar was going to be sold there one day. So of course, during the night before, the line formed, and it was two blocks long by the time the manager arrived to open the store in the morning. He looked at the line, and he got up and said, "Citizens, this line is much too long. We're never going to have enough caviar to accommodate all of you people here, so I might as well make an arbitrary decision. I'm going to decide right now that all the Jews in the line might as well go home. I'm not going to sell you any caviar." So the line got about half shorter; all the Jewish people left. And he came out two hours later, and he says, "Gee, the line is still much too long. I'm not going to have that much caviar available. So only members of the Communist Party are going to get caviar. Everybody else go home." And to make this story shorter, after a half hour he came out and says, by this time, "Comrades, I'm still not going to have enough caviar to go along, so only people who fought in the Great Patriotic War and were present at the Siege of Leningrad are going to be able to get caviar.” So the line got shorter again. And he came out and says, “Only members of the Central Committee who fought in the Great Patriotic War and participated in the siege of Leningrad are going to get any caviar today.” And by that time it had been reduced to five people. And he said, “Okay, you five people, you come on in.” He took them into the store, and he took them into his office, and he sat them down and he says, “With you five comrades, I can be absolutely frank. We never had any caviar. We don’t have any caviar today, and we will never have any caviar in the future.”

Whereupon one says, “You see, the Jews won again. They could go home first.”

TUCH: That’s great.

Q: ... I think the only thing I want to do now is to ask you first whether there’s anything you want to say about your Moscow experience that you feel you didn’t say before, because the first part of it was covered almost entirely by your personal experiences, and less of the actual program. Is there anything that you want to say about your experience in the Soviet program before we go on to the other parts of your career?

TUCH: Well, I’m not quite sure how much we covered in that interview, it’s such a long time ago. However, the one thing that one might just mention briefly, is that in regard to the work that we did, was that we signed our first U.S.-Soviet cultural agreement in January 1958. I appeared in Moscow in July ‘58 just when the first implementation of that agreement took place.

We were suddenly, and for the first time since World War II, involved in what I would call a real USIS program, except that it was not called a USIS program. It was called a Press and Cultural Program, because at that time at least, the Soviets did not recognize USIA as an organization. I myself, in order to be given a visa to work in Moscow, had to resign from USIA. I returned to State and was assigned to the embassy as a State Department second secretary. However, I was charged with conducting what normally a public affairs officer would do.

For the first year I was alone trying to manage or trying to coordinate the implementation of this new exchange program, which involved exchanges of graduate students, pre-doctoral or post-doctoral students; second, the preparation of our major American National Exhibition in Moscow in 1959; third, a number of performing art events, the first one of which was the tour of the New York Philharmonic in the fall of 1959; and the visits of a number of distinguished American composers delegations, and artists’ delegation, several performing artists, and a writers’ delegation. I was the only officer charged with these responsibilities. I had, however, the help and cooperation of a number of other embassy officers, who enjoyed doing this kind of work because we were the only ones who got out of the embassy. We were the only ones who were, so to speak, communicating with the Soviet public, although very much restricted.

During that time it was determined that I needed help, that I needed another officer to assist me, and I was told that I was going to get an assistant. However, as things in the Foreign Service often happen, at the last moment it was decided that what that new program really needed was a high ranking, prestigious officer, and so a new cultural counselor was appointed, Lee Brady, and I became his assistant. Which proves the old adage, “Never ask for an assistant because you may

At any rate, from the fall of 1959 we were then two officers, Lee Brady and myself. I was the number two, and we divided up our responsibilities in that he took the more intellectual exchanges, and I took the performing arts and handled the press in the embassy, was the press attaché.

The program was very much enlarged during those first two years, ‘59-’60. We had a tremendous number of activities, the biggest, of course, the American National Exhibition in the fall of ‘59. A number of other USIA officers were involved with that, Jack Masey was the head of design. Actually, Abbott Washburn, the Deputy Director of USIA, was coordinator in Washington of the whole thing under George Allen, who was the USIA Director. George Allen came to the opening accompanying Vice President Nixon.

Then, we had the big affair with Vice President Nixon and the interaction with Khrushchev, the famous “Kitchen Debate,” the trip out to Siberia with the vice president, and all the activities surrounding his visit. At the same time with the National Exhibit, the tour of the New York Philharmonic with Leonard Bernstein.

Our program suddenly became very large. Many activities. Now this was during the so-called “spirit of Camp David,” where there was a slow rapprochement between the Soviets and us, for the first time, an easing of our relationship. That continued: the Soviets also had an exhibit in New York, and there were many Soviet performing arts groups, among them the Bolshoi Ballet and the Moiseyev dance ensemble coming to the United States. There was a plethora of exchange activities.

Q: You didn’t find that the “Kitchen Debate” put any damper on that warming of relationships?

TUCH: No. It just became, I would say, a symptom of that relationship in that we were always at each other, but in a way that we could manage the relationship much more easily than we had before.

Now this came to an immediate and very abrupt stop on May 1, 1960, when the U-2 with Gary Powers was shot down, and our relations sank back into the cellar. They canceled President Eisenhower’s trip to the Soviet Union; Khrushchev made some very antagonistic and very unfriendly statements about him and about the United States, and our relationship became worse -- what had previously become a more normal relationship wasn’t very good.

However, our exchange activities continued even during this new period of tension. That tension was increased because of Khrushchev’s aggressive statements about Berlin at that time. However, the exchanges continued under our first agreement, and in 1960, after the Gary Powers incident, after the U-2 incident, was renegotiated in Moscow, and renewed for another two years.

Now gradually the exchanges continued, the relationship moved upward again, culminating in the election of President Kennedy and some movements by the Soviets vis-a-vis the new president, indicating that they wanted to have better relationship again. The first thing that happened after his election, the day before the inauguration, was the release of two other pilots who had been shot down, the RB-47 pilots who had been held prisoner by the Soviets. They released them on the day after the inauguration.

Again, our relationship, almost like a roller coaster, moved upward again until the Bay of Pigs invasion in April '61, and then the first meeting between Khrushchev and Kennedy in July 1961 in Vienna, at which Ambassador Llewellyn Thompson was present. When he came back from that visit, he told us how genuinely shocked President Kennedy had been at that meeting with the crudeness, antagonism, and unfriendliness expressed by Chairman Khrushchev, vis-a-vis Kennedy, vis-a-vis the United States. So our relationship again sank deeper. It really did not revive again until after the Cuban missile incident in October 1962.

***

I left Moscow at the end of July 1961, was assigned to Washington. Ed Murrow was Director of USIA, and I was assigned to a new organizational unit in USIA, namely the Assistant Director of USIA for the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, which he created. I became the deputy director of that office, Lee Brady was the director. For the next four years the two of us worked very closely with and for Ed Murrow, and Ed insisted that his assistant directors spend a good part of their time in the area for which they were responsible. So during the next four years, between 1961 and 1965, I spent quite a bit of time each year both in the Soviet Union and in the countries of Eastern Europe for which we were responsible.

Q: I'd like to go back and ask just a couple of questions about the Moscow time before we go on further with this inter- view. Do I understand that the Soviets probably knew about the overflights of the U-2 or did they? They must have known or they wouldn't have been able to shoot it down. Had they known for some time, as far as you can determine?

TUCH: Well, I really don't know all the facts, but we suspected that they knew about the overflights, but could not do anything about them because they were flying so high and they just couldn't reach them. It wasn't until the U-2 was shot down, that was their first success in this. I suspect that they knew but, they couldn't reach them.

Q: The other question I wanted to ask you, and I think in your earlier interview you mentioned getting out on the streets and making contact with a number of Soviet citizens and, therefore, being able to report to some extent to the embassy what was going on, and what might be thought by some of the locals. To what extent was that possible? Were you able to contact many people, and would they talk, or was this limited to a very restricted set of circumstances when you were mainly able to pick up information, say, in certain instances when you went to receptions of the type you just described or on train trips in the USSR?

TUCH: It was very restricted. We were very circumscribed. We were never left alone without the KGB "goons," as we called them, following us and being with us at every moment of the day and night when we went out. Even when you went to theater or to the opera, the ballet, they would always be with you.

The only exception to that -- it's not really an exception -- but the only opportunity that we had to talk to people at some length was on trips. That is why we tried to make a lot of train trips out of Moscow. We always had to ask permission 48 hours in advance if we wanted to go beyond a 25-kilometer radius of Moscow. And then very often, I would say at least half the time, they refused us permission to go on these trips. So on a regular schedule we asked for permission to go on trips, and traveled rather widely within the Soviet Union in areas which were open to travel by foreign diplomats. I would say more than half of the country was closed to travel by us and, in addition to that, often when we wanted to go to a certain place we would be told that the area had been "temporarily closed" to travel by foreign diplomats.

At any rate, we did travel, and we traveled very often by train because we felt that on long train trips -- you know, some of them take two, three, four, five days -- you were in a compartment with other Soviet citizens; you were closed in with them, and you really had to have contact with them, conversations, and even though there may be a KGB agent on the train with you he normally was not in your compartment.

TUCH: He was not in the compartment with you, or quite often on the train we wouldn't have anybody. We would be followed to the train and then be picked up again at the station where we got off. This happened frequently. So on train trips, you sometimes had the possibility to have very extensive, long conversations over a two-and three-day period, which would start usually, I would say, on insignificant subjects. But Soviet citizens were tremendously interested in anything that an American had to say to them, and they immediately, when they found out you were an American, surrounded you and asked you questions about your living standards, about your life, about your customs and various things. Over a period of time you could also find out what they were interested in.

The thing that amazed us constantly is that in spite of the, at that time, forty years of vicious propaganda against Americans, that we were spies, that we were trying to overthrow the Soviet Union, that in spite of this pervasive anti-American propaganda, the people were very, very friendly towards us. Many of them expressed this friendliness by saying, "We were allies in World War II, and we must get onto the same level of a relationship again. We must be friends."

The interesting thing was that the basis of this friendship goes back before World War II, that many people referred to the friendliness, the cooperation of the Americans back in the early 1920s when Herbert Hoover ran a food aid program for the country and helped the newly established Soviet Union overcome its hunger problems.

Q: This was true even though American troops had joined those that were invading the Soviet Union in support of the White Russians at that time?

TUCH: Absolutely. It was amazing to us that this was constantly being brought up. The gratitude that they felt towards Americans for saving them from starvation.

Q: Did you find any cases in which they gave critiques of their own country; were they criticizing at any point? Of course, I don't imagine you tried to probe for that, but did they voluntarily express any dissatisfactions?

TUCH: No. Usually not. What they would say, and this was, I think, a unique thing in the Soviet Union at that time -- unique from other countries under communist rule: In the Soviet Union you still had a great number of people, mostly simple people, who were convinced that communism for them was the paradise of the future; that they may live in misery now and that they may not have the good things in life in the way of shelter, and food, and clothing, but their children will, and their grand- children will. So they were still, were, what I would call, "believers" and had a rather simplistic idea that communism was going to bring them all the things that the previous hundreds of years had not brought them in Russia.

That was the difference I felt that whenever I left the Soviet Union and went anywhere else in communist Eastern Europe, that in these other countries you had no ideologically convinced communists anymore. You had members of communist parties who felt that communism was giving them the good life and it was their ticket to a better life, but they were not ideologically convinced. In the Soviet Union at that time you still had that.

Q: Did you encounter any of the ethnic differences such as have surfaced many times now, and especially recently? The reason that I ask this is that in my very limited contact with people from the Soviet Union, on a couple of occasions I have made the mistake of saying, "Well, our Russian friend . . ." And had a Ukrainian or a Georgian say, "I am not a Russian. I am Ukrainian, or Georgian"

TUCH: Many Soviet citizens felt very proud of their ethnic heritage, especially when you went down to a place like Georgia or Armenia. It was less pronounced in places like Uzbekistan, Tajikistan, but I'm sure it existed though it was not expressed to us. In Georgia, very much so. It was very, very distinctive whenever we went to the Baltics; Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia. During my first year, the three Baltic states were still off limits; they were opened during my tour of duty there. A colleague of mine and I were the first ones to go to Riga, to Latvia, and we spent three or four days there. We found a tremendous amount and intensity of nationalism, nationalist pride and a great deal of antagonism towards their Russian masters. In the Baltics it was very clear; it was very pronounced anti-Soviet, anti-Russian. In Georgia it was less anti-Russian, but very pro-Georgian nationalism. They felt that they were different. They were not Russians, they were Georgians, as you just said. But at that time of course, you did not have any of the ethnic manifestations which have erupted during the last year.

TUCH: You shouldn't have asked that question. {Laughter} The first exchange agreement had a provision saying that there would be a subsequent agreement on the showing of American and Soviet films that would be negotiated separately. Indeed, in October 1959 an American delegation came to Moscow headed by the then President of the American Motion Picture Association, Eric Johnston. The deputy of the American delegation was Turner Shelton who at that time was head of the motion picture division in USIA. Turner Shelton was a colorful, Hollywood type. One of my memories of this particular negotiation was the first morning when the American delegation walked into the Minister of Culture where the Soviet delegation was assembled, waiting. And the American delegation walked in and Eric Johnston, Turner Shelton, several bag carriers, interpreters, secretaries, behind them, all of them wearing dark sunglasses, a la Hollywood, as they walked into this very dark room. The Soviets just looked at them as though this is Hollywood personified. {Laughter}

The negotiation was not a particularly good one. It did result in an agreement but the agreement was not going to work very well. For one thing, the Soviets were interested in having their picture shown in the United States. Their films at that time just were not commercially marketable. They were terrible and they just would not sell in the United States. No exhibitor wanted to show them. They wanted the American government to see to it that they were shown, but the American Government has no great influence with American motion picture exhibitors.

On the other hand, our films, whatever film we showed, was going to be popular in the Soviet Union. The last American films that had been shown in the Soviet Union, I think in 1944, was "Sun Valley Serenade," the Glenn Miller band. I think Sonia Henie was in that film. The other one was a Deanna Durbin film, I think it was called "A Thousand Men and a Girl," or something like that. But Deanna Durbin was the big American film star in the Soviet Union, and this is 1959.

One of the first new American films that was to be shown in the Soviet Union was "Roman Holiday" with Audrey Hepburn and Gregory Peck. I remember that without telling us anything about it, they put on this film in the Olympic Sports Palace. For three days they showed eight showings a day in English, without subtitles and without dubbing. They filled the sports hall eight times a day, it held nine thousand people, and they showed it for three days. There was never a seat to be had in those showings, and they were able to use the admission fees for those three days of showing to dub the film before they distributed it all over the Soviet Union.

Q: I see.

TUCH: At any rate, our films then were also not shown very widely and in a restricted fashion because their films weren't showing in the United States and we were constantly haggling over what films were to be exchanged.

Messrs. Johnston and Shelton felt that the U. S. Government ought to make the determination of what American films should be shown in the Soviet Union. Eric Johnston had a certain amount of control and influence over the Motion Picture Association of America and its members. So he could control them, but he could not control those film producers who wanted to show their films independently and make deals with the Soviet Union. Often those were films which were not particularly complimentary to, say, our own society, which were critical of our system. On the other hand the Soviets wanted to get particularly those films to the Soviet Union to show, "Here are the Americans, look they themselves are showing how bad things are in the United States." So it was not a very successful operation because Johnston and Turner Shelton could not control what films the Soviets were going to import from the U.S. So they were finally interested in not having this exchange of commercial films continued.

Q: Well, how was the agreement set up? Was there a specified number of films that could be shown in any given period of time, or how was it that it was possible for the U. S. side to be sure that all their films were distributed rather widely, or that only films fairly complimentary to America would be available in the USSR?

TUCH: I don't have specific numbers, but I think it was six or eight films which were going to be exchanged over the two years of the agreement. They were going to be dubbed and shown widely in the Soviet Union. The first problem came about when the Soviets learned they could not show their films in this country because nobody wanted to show them. Therefore, they were reluctant to show our films. At the same time, once the door was open to film exchanges, it became very difficult for the American Government to tell American producers, "You cannot make deals separately with the Soviet Union." How could we restrict them? We had no control over them, so the Soviets took advantage of that and started dealing with independent American film makers to show films that our government would have preferred not to have shown.

Q: Did the Soviets still count those films as part of the quota that had been established?

TUCH: I don't recall. The exchange became a shambles. It was never really settled. Then the Soviets started having film festivals every two years in Moscow and invited the United States. We participated and showed films which were normally not very good films because they were the only films that the State Department would agree to show. For instance, I remember the first one was "Sunrise at Campobello." That's not a very good film!

Q: I remember that.

TUCH: Yet, this was our official entry into the Soviet film festival, and we were embarrassed to have that kind of a film shown, but this is what the U. S. Government proposed and produced. U.S. film delegations came to these festivals, and I remember the first time there was a delegation of a number of producers and directors; there were no film stars, if I remember correctly. We were introduced to the public before the American film was shown on the stage, and as we lined up and our names were called -- I was a member of the delegation that's why I was on the stage. There was polite applause as our names were called, and suddenly one member of our delegation whom none of us had ever really heard of before -- I don't recall his name right now -- was introduced and a roar of applause went up.

Q: It was an actor?

TUCH: No, he had been involved in the production of "Sun Valley Serenade" 15 years before, and everybody in the Soviet Union remembered him; nobody in this country knew him. {Laughter} The delegation the second year included Edward G. Robinson, Gary Cooper with his wife and daughter (Maria, the wife of Byron Janis now) and a number of directors. This was a bigger show at that time because these were known personalities. That was a good delegation because Edward G. Robinson and Gary Cooper were interesting people.

Q: Was there subsequently a later film exchange agreement worked out, or did the thing continue on the basis of the initial one?

TUCH: There was never, to the best of my recollection, another formal negotiation of the agreement. The film exchange was incorporated in the renegotiation of the other big agreement, and it said something to the effect that our exchanges of films will continue on the basis of our previous agreement.

Q: I see. I'm not going to repeat them here, but the stories were legion about Turner Shelton's experience in the Soviet Union, including his initial arrival at the airport and his insistence that Soviet Customs officials could not examine his baggage, but that's another story.

TUCH: We could have a tape just on that subject alone. Should I go back briefly now, I think we've exhausted the Soviet Union.

During those four years as the area deputy director and then as the area director for the Soviet Union-Eastern Europe, we renegotiated the U.S.-Soviet exchange agreement. The first renegotiation took place in 1960 while I was still in Moscow; the second one in 1962 in Washington, and then again in Moscow in 1964. Now the State Department was still heading the negotiation process. In 1960 it was Ambassador Thompson, who was head of the U.S. delegation; in 1962 it was Ambassador Bohlen, and in 1964 -- for the moment I can't remember who it was. I was no longer involved in '64, but in '62, I participated in the renegotiating of the agreement under Chip Bohlen, and our program expanded greatly.

We had a number of traveling exhibits in the Soviet Union every year; exhibits which the Soviets really did not want, but we made it clear, we wanted these exhibits very much because it permitted us for first time to get into the hinterland of the Soviet Union, to the provincial cities. Not only did we have our exhibits there, but the really important element was that we had Russian speaking American guides.

Q: It opened a new possibility, I gather, for talking to the Soviet citizens, because you couldn't do otherwise.

TUCH: Absolutely. These guides were able to communicate as Americans in the Russian language with Soviet citizens all over the Soviet Union. The Soviets did not like the exchange of exhibits because they did not see much value in their exhibits in the United States, and frankly, they didn't have much of an impact here. But we thought this was a good thing for the United States and we insisted on it, and we even threatened that if they would not permit us to have the exhibit exchange we would curtail other exchanges which they were particularly interested in, namely the exchanges in graduate students.

Also, I must say that the years I spent in Washington working for Ed Murrow, were for me very productive years, simply because I had the feeling that Ed Murrow understood what we were trying to do in the Soviet Union and not only supported it, but spearheaded it. He furthered it in every respect, getting the right people to go to the Soviet Union.

I remember on one occasion when he persuaded Danny Kaye to go to the Soviet Union on behalf of USIA and do his communications job. What I'm trying to say is that Ed was personally very much involved in the programming and in the efforts to communicate with the Soviet Union.

Now, on one occasion he took a direct hand in it and that was, I think, in September or October 1961, shortly after I had come back from the Soviet Union when the Soviets started nuclear testing again. He was so personally incensed at this that he wrote a commentary for the Voice of America himself and ordered all transmitters -- we were still being jammed at that time -- and he ordered all transmitters that were available to the Voice of America to be massed for that particular commentary to be broad-cast. It was a very tough commentary but he had written it himself and he had broadcast it. That was an interesting phenomenon because while he did this, he went to a National Security Council meeting and advised the President, President Kennedy, not to take a retaliatory hard line against this. In other words, he cautioned the administration to be deliberate in their reply. He knew what he was doing. He himself broadcast this commentary, yet he cautioned the administration to be calm and deliberate in their reply on this.

Q: I know that one of the bases on which we sold Ed Murrow the idea and he supported it very extensively, was that he felt the present administration and the European area were so involved with programming for western Europe that they weren't giving an adequate amount of attention to the kind of material that was going into the Soviet Union. He felt that there were other approaches that could be taken but were not going to be taken if we didn't have a separate organization. Consequently, I'm not surprised that he involved himself so deeply in the programming and planning for what went in there, because that was the main basis for setting up this separate organization.

TUCH: Right. One of the things that he was interested in was what we were broadcasting on the Voice of America into the Soviet Union. He was instrumental at the time in changing our whole attitude and tone in our broadcast. He wanted to have an American with experience in the Soviet Union, an American officer who spoke Russian with recent experience to be the head of the VOA Soviet division.

Q: How did that grab Barmine?

TUCH: Well, that was the issue. Alexander Barmine -- General Barmine, as he liked to be called -- had been the head of the Russian division of the Voice of America, I think, almost ever since it started in the late '40s. He was a very hard line anti-communist who had left the Soviet Union in the late '30s when he defected. He had been the charge of the Soviet Embassy in Athens and was about to be purged in the Great Purge, Stalin's purge, and he defected and came to the United States. He was a very conservative, I would say, almost reactionary, military type who just brooked no interference with what he thought should be broadcast to the Soviet Union. However, he was very well-known and highly regarded on the hill, Congress.

Yet, Ed Murrow felt that a change of direction was in order and needed to be taken. So he worked out a system whereby Terry Catherman, who had succeeded me in Moscow, when he came back in 1964, took over the Russian division of the Voice of America. But what could be done with Alexander Barmine?

So an arrangement was devised whereby Alex Barmine was "promoted" to be my special assistant. I was the area director and he was to be my Soviet advisor in the area. We brought him uptown and he was treated courteously; he was given a nice office right next to my office and from time to time Ed Murrow greeted him and talked to him briefly and made Alex Barmine feel good. He did not feel that he had been demoted. I remember on one occasion when I was invited to the Soviet Embassy for a reception, I said to Alex, "You've got to come along with me. You're the Soviet expert in this and you come along with me, and I'll see to it that you get an invitation." They indeed sent him an invitation. He was at first very reluctant to go into the Soviet Embassy, but finally agreed.

We went to the Soviet Embassy and, lo and behold, he became the center of attraction to all the military types, Soviet military types at the Soviet Embassy who had remembered this famous General Barmine of the 1930s. He enjoyed it. Then, on the way out he told me the story about his defection from his embassy, the Soviet Embassy in Athens, when he walked out knowing that if he had not walked out of that embassy at the moment he did, he would have been arrested and possibly shot.

Q: You said Barmine had been with the Voice since the late '40s, actually, he had started even earlier than that. Perhaps as early as the mid-'40s, I don't know just what year he defected, but I know he started with the Voice when they were still in New York.

TUCH: Yes, indeed, because he defected in 1938, I remember that. This was during the purge. He was a protégé of Marshal Tukhashevskii, who was one of the marshals who was purged, and when he heard that Marshal Tukhashevskii had been arrested, he realized his time had come and defected to Paris.

He came to the United States, I think, very soon there- after. The Voice did not start until 1942 and it was located in New York. I'm not sure exactly when we started broadcasting in Russian to the Soviet Union. I think it was probably 1948, '49, but the date of that we can check with Cliff Groce.

Q: It's not significant, anyway.

TUCH: At any rate, these four years in working with the Soviet Union in Eastern Europe, making frequent trips there. I remember one particular trip in October 1962. I wanted to get back to the Soviet Union and I wanted to travel, and I felt that one of the best ways that I could do that without much attention being directed towards me by the KGB, was to accompany the New York City Ballet as the USIA-State Department escort officer. So I went with them and we went to Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, Tbilisi in Georgia, and Baku the capital of Azerbaijan. We were in Leningrad right in the middle of the Cuban missile crisis. It turned out afterwards, I didn't know it at the time, that I was actually the only American diplomat who was outside of Moscow during that time. They did not permit anybody else to leave Moscow, but I was with the ballet and they didn't stop me.

I was in Leningrad during the worst part of the missile crisis, being, however, absolutely oblivious of what was going on. I didn't know anything until the embassy called me, and they very circumspect asked me, "How are things going in Leningrad?"

I said, "Fine. Ballet's having a big success, cheers and applause every night."

"What is the atmosphere like?" I was asked.

"Oh, it's fine, great, we had no problems."

They said, "Have you been listening to the Voice of America? Have you been listening to the radio?"

I had a radio with me and I said, "No, I haven't been listening. The batteries are dead and I haven't really been able to listen to the Voice of America. Besides, I've been very busy with the ballet."

They said, "You listen to the Voice of America." So that night I made a point of listening and I found out what was going on. Of course, by that time the crisis was over, it had passed.

Q: Had any information filtered out?

TUCH: No. No, people in Leningrad, to the best of my knowledge, were absolutely unaware of what was going on. That compared to the American reaction of the missile crisis -- I had a letter from my wife about two weeks later, written right at the worst point of the crisis, and she was obviously very concerned about me and didn't know what was going to be happening to me. But I was completely unaware of it, which is also one of the interesting experiences.

Q: Are there any other things you'd like to say in this retrospect on your four years with the Eastern European area, or should we go on now and talk a little bit again about Bulgaria?

TUCH: The interesting thing, and I think the significant thing during those four years was that we ought to differentiate our relationship between the Eastern European countries and the Soviet Union. We started to look at openings that we could have in Eastern Europe in our program exchanges, public diplomacy program, also in our VOA broadcasts. How could we differentiate and adjust our programs to actual realities of the relationship and what could we accomplish?

It became possible for us, for instance, to have academic exchanges with Poland, other exchanges with Poland without an agreement. On the one hand, with Romania and with Czechoslovakia, not with East Germany and, at that time, not with Bulgaria, and with Hungary, we began having agreements. Not necessarily formal agreements, but arrangements for exchanges whereby we negotiated certain exchanges without having a formal agreement as we had with the Soviet Union, in order to conduct programs that we felt were mutually beneficial to our efforts in Eastern Europe.

We did begin some really interesting and fruitful exchanges, exhibits, academic exchanges, magazines in the Eastern European countries. Always, of course, different from what we were doing in Yugoslavia because we did not feel that Yugoslavia was part of that Soviet-bloc mentality.

Q: Was Yugoslavia under your jurisdiction?

TUCH: No. Yugoslavia was always part of the Western European area. in my view that was correct, at that time.

Q: Incidentally, you know there was a lot of opposition among the area directors to setting up the East European area. I was the one that recommended it to Ed Murrow, and he supported me. I think the only other person who supported me was the Latin American area, and the rest of them had varying degrees from direct opposition to doubts about it. But Ed was very strongly determined to set it up for a time.

TUCH: Well, Bill Cody, who was the European area director, of course, opposed it. His little empire was being cut in half. If I remember correctly, so was Walter Roberts, who was his deputy. But with your help, Ed felt strongly that there was so much concentration of USIA's efforts vis-a-vis the communist world of Eastern Europe at that time, and it was so different from what we were doing in Western Europe that he insisted that the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe should be set up as a separate area directorate.

Lee left in 1964 to be PAO in Paris, and then I succeeded him. By that time -- Freudian slip. Who was the director at that time?

Q: Carl Rowan?

TUCH: Oh. By that time, Carl Rowan had succeeded Ed Murrow as the director. Even though I was supposed to go to Warsaw as PAO, he would not let Lee Brady and me both depart at the same time. So I succeeded Lee Brady for a year, and I was then supposed to go to Warsaw in 1965. Dick Davies came in to succeed me as the area director, but at the last moment -- and this is sort of an interesting little side light of the history of USIA vis-a-vis the relationship with the State Department -- at the last moment, about three weeks before I was scheduled to leave for Warsaw, the State Department and USIA came to an agreement to exchange officers at a higher level.

SAMUEL G. WISE, JR.
Bureau of Intelligence & Research
Washington, DC (1959-1961)

Samuel G. Wise, Jr. was born in Illinois on May 11, 1928. He received his BA from the University of Virginia in 1951 and his MIA from Columbia University in 1953. He served in the US Marine Corps from 1946 to 1948. His career has included positions in Italy, Russia, and Czechoslovakia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1995.

Q: At Oberammergau, were they pushing the Army side, or were they really preparing you for the Soviet Union? How did you feel about that?

WISE: I thought it was a pretty well-rounded program. They had the military side, but there were some optional courses, so you didn't have to take all the military courses if that wasn't your focus. They had history - some of the things were repetition of what I had learned earlier, but they were all done quite well. They were taught almost exclusively by people from the former Soviet Union and a lot of the teaching was done in Russian, so you really had to dig in. I thought it was a pretty well-rounded program. After the time came at Oberammergau for my next assignment, I, of course, wanted to go to Moscow. But, as somebody in the Soviet Office told me several years later, "Well, in those days, we couldn't assign you to Moscow if you hadn't been to Moscow." So, I didn't get assigned. I was disappointed, but I did get assigned right after Oberammergau, to Moscow for three months as a Protocol and Escort Officer. Three of us were assigned to the U.S. National Exhibition in 1959. This, you may remember, was the Exhibition's first big American presence in the Soviet Union. This is where the Kitchen Debate took place between Khrushchev and Nixon. My very clear recollection of that is when Nixon came out of the room as the loser in the Kitchen Debate, but a winner as far as how he got it portrayed back here in this country. That was a very intense, interesting, out of job experience for a Foreign Service Officer.

Q: What was the exhibit about and what were you doing?

WISE: We had all kinds of activities, trying to demonstrate how we did things in the United States. One exhibit was of machines that made certain cups. There was one done by a USIA guy that explained how we did things in a social, economic, political way. There were Sears and Roebuck catalogues, demonstrations of goods. The Soviets didn't have much of those, so it was a tremendous success. But I'm sure the Soviet leadership was very nervous about this whole thing, but they agreed, in a period of detente, to do it. I remember the lines of visitors: if they saw a line, they'd get in it. I remember asking someone at the end of it, "What are you standing in line for?" He said, "I don't know - there must be something good up there!"

Q: Where was the exhibit taking place?

WISE: It was taking place in a place called [Sakomakay Park], a little bit on the outskirts of Moscow. I was staying in the Ukraine Hotel and then going back out. I remember I went up from Oberammergau in the summer for this thing. The three months were beginning in August, I think. My job as a Protocol and Escort Officer was, technically, at the beginning, meeting American VIPs who came out to see this thing. So, we were shuffling back and forth to the airport. Another fellow named Walter Bedell-Smith, who's since passed away, was another one of the Officers. But, eventually, we got involved in the management and running of the exhibit, which was an unforeseen development, which I thoroughly enjoyed. We worked with different parts of it. We kept up with things: crowd control, all sorts of things. The overall manager just called on us to do it, and so we did it. We enjoyed it.

Q: What was your impression of the Soviet Union? You'd been studying it at various places and now, here you were seeing it.

WISE: It's always hard to describe the place. It has a tremendous fascination. I was glad to at last be there, to use the language. I was struck how run down most of it looked. There were signs all over: "In Repair" on practically all the buildings. Except for the Kremlin and a few showcase places that were kept up, the place looked like a very run down city. The people generally seemed very approachable and seemed to like Americans. The officials, on the other hand, I thought were very officious and difficult to deal with. However they felt personally, they approached us in a very official manner. You couldn't get near any of them. You couldn't get near even the people on a casual basis. Say, if you ran into somebody and got to chatting and, afterwards, said, "Why don't we go out and have dinner or something together," they would generally refuse because they knew they were being observed by the Secret Police and that they would be questioned afterwards about their contact with me or any American. They generally didn't want the hassle.

Q: You came back to INR in 1969...

WISE: No, this would be in the late fifties. I came back to INR in 1959.

Q: And you were there from when to when?

WISE: 1959-1961, at which time I was assigned to Moscow.

Q: What were you doing in INR?

WISE: We had a small unit called "Research on the Soviet Union." The initials were RSB, as I recall. There were five of us. We followed Soviet foreign policy initiatives and actions. One of us would follow the Soviet Union in India or the Soviet Union in China, the Far East, the Soviet Union in South America... There was that kind of division in the office.

Q: What was your particular bailiwick?

WISE: I had the Soviet Union in Eastern Europe. I watched the relations of the center of the Communist world with its satellite.

Q: What was your impression of how the Soviet Union stood with these countries, with the Eastern European countries?

WISE: It's clear that it was a relationship of master to slave or master to servant, that these other countries were just meant to service the Soviet Union, the Motherland, and to provide a buffer with the Western world. We generally felt that there was a great unwillingness on the part of the population. But they had the effective puppet leaders in all of these countries, who couldn't do much more than the bidding in Moscow.

Q: Prior to your coming to that job, there had been the Hungarian revolt of the fall of '56. And there had been the East German ones in '53 or '54 in Berlin, and then there had been something in Poland, too. There was obviously unrest, but did we see this as a potential for a problem, or that the Soviets had it pretty much in hand.

WISE: I think we felt that they had it in control. In more optimistic moments, we let our hearts run away with our minds and think that this was the basis for some real change. But, realistically, the cards were all in Moscow's hands. At that time, things were very controlled.

Q: How was INR used, as far as you were concerned? Did you feel that it was being used by the Soviet Desk, or that you operated in a vacuum?

WISE: Probably more the latter. I would have to say that that assignment was probably the least satisfactory for me in the Foreign Service. I had a strong feeling about what I felt was the futility of the work because I didn't think it was being used to any appreciable degree. The main salient product that we produced was an early morning briefing memorandum for the Director of INR, who took it to the Secretary. Basically, we were getting stuff in from different parts of the world, which I didn't find very different from what was in the newspaper.

Q: Did you get any feel for the CIA and what it was doing?

WISE: Not at that time. I knew that they were doing things, too, but most of my contacts then and since then have led me to the view that in most cases, their information is fairly routine and humdrum, too. There are obviously some things that they've gotten a jump on. But an awful lot of things that are treated very high and classified as sensitive, I don't find that way at all.

KEMPTON B. JENKINS
Political Officer
Moscow (1960-1962)

Soviet Desk Officer, Bureau of European Affairs
Washington, DC (1962-1964)

Kempton B. Jenkins was born in Florida in 1926. As part of a military family, he moved often while growing up. He attended the Navy Officer's Training Program at Bowling Green University in Ohio and did graduate work at George Washington University and Harvard University. Mr. Jenkins served in the U.S. Army from 1944-1946. His Foreign Service career included positions in Germany, Thailand, Venezuela, the Soviet Union, and Washington, DC. Mr. Jenkins was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on February 23, 1995.

JENKINS: We arrived, as I recall, August of 1960. It was a shock. From the air Moscow looks beautiful. There had already been some light snow, oddly enough...maybe it was September because I remember clearly there was some snow on the fields, not much. But all the pines and the birches from the air looked beautiful. When you arrived at the airport, Sheremetyevo, the international airport, it was three buildings. It was and still is tacky. You hit the ground, and all of a sudden you realize that “this place needs new management!” Everything was run down, the two years that I lived in the Soviet Union and frequent visits thereafter, it has always been one of the strongest impressions -- God, this place is so badly maintained. (I have not been back since Yeltsin took over.)

Q: I've been reading some travel books, but also some travel books of the 19th century and there does seem to be a certain thread that runs through it. That the Russians maintain that they're European, but...

JENKINS: ...really are different.

Q: ...really are different and one of the things is that they don't do a lot of things very well.

JENKINS: That's right. The society has never provided incentives to maintain things. Whereas all of western societies at various times, there have been such incentive. I must admit that right now in the District we're lacking those incentives, and the District is beginning to look very run down. Garbage on the streets this morning, for example, because there was no pick-up yesterday, and so on. But in the Soviet Union there had never been incentives. So you had these beautiful architectural gems which could fit very nicely into an expensive Georgetown neighborhood, but the woodwork had never been painted, and everything was either rotting or peeling. The average dwelling built for one family, would have four families in it. When I was there, there was a statistic which I thought captured it very well: there were 18 adults for every toilet in the Soviet Union. And the toilets frequently were no more than holes in the floor (which takes you to Asia). And I never really learned how to squat over one of those holes comfortably, so I had a lot of problems.

Q: I served in the Balkans, and they were called Turkish bombsights.

JENKINS: That's right, exactly. But arriving there right from the beginning we ran into the other aspect of Soviet and Russian society, it's an incredible bureaucracy. It wasn't evil, sort of secret police control, it was just these people had about eight people doing everything that could be done by one. So consequently there are eight times as many forms to fill out. We came in on diplomatic passports obviously, went into the diplomatic lounge where we were met by embassy staff. All that went reasonably smoothly. But we had our Airedale with us. Well, the Russians had never seen an Airedale in the first place. So when we arrived at the airport, they didn't know what to do. They decided he had to go through customs, but we didn't have a customs declaration, and they didn't have a form for a living dog. So we went back and forth. The agricultural department got into it, etc., and we finally got clearance. But I would say it was a three hour process, with a lot of moments in those three hours when it looked like they would not allow the dog to enter the Soviet Union. Since this was our pet Airedale and he had been with us for 12 years, there was no way we were not going to take that dog with us.

Well, we finally got in, and then went down to the Hotel Ukraine where our temporary quarters were, where we subsequently had to live for six weeks. It was very difficult, the conditions were not good. As we arrived, we walked into the desk, with the Airedale on the leash, and our three boys, and put our passports down. They confirmed, yes, they do have a reservation for us, a suite of two rooms back-to-back. And then the woman looks up and said, "Of course, we do not allow dogs in the hotel." This was a real challenge, and I must say probably in my entire diplomatic career, I handled this more diplomatically than anything I ever faced. A bolt of lightning came to me, and I decided, okay, this is the land of non-sequiturs, here we go. I told the woman profusely, "I am so impressed. Do you know on the entire European continent, the Soviet Union is apparently the only country where dogs are not allowed in hotels. You are so progressive, that's so sensitive to sanitary considerations," and I had to go into that, "I really take my hat off to you." And she nodded and smiled and said, "That's right. No dogs allowed in the hotel." We picked up our passports and the keys and the dog, and went right up to our room. She never said a word. And as we came back out about two hours later to take the dog for a walk along the Moscow River, she looked up and wagged her finger, and said, "Remember no dogs." And I said, "Yes, I do remember. I can't wait to write to tell my friends." And she beamed and nodded. For six weeks every day she would say, "No dogs." And I'd say, "Absolutely."

Q: How about the concierge?

JENKINS: No problem with her, she didn't give a damn. She was asleep most of the time anyhow. But that was a hell of an experience. Then we had one other little flare-up in that period. We were walking the dog, and I didn't normally keep him on a leash because he was very well trained. We were right along the edge of the river, and there was about a three foot drop down into the river, and occasionally there would be stairs going down where boats could tie up. Well, all of a sudden the dog saw a fish, and he jumped in. The Moskva River is a filthy place, covered with an oil slick. I eventually got him back out again, up one of those little stair platforms. We took him back into the hotel and tried to wipe him off with newspapers, and this was a little tricky. The woman at the desk didn't happen to be looking. We got him up in the room and had to call the embassy doctor to help us get the oil off his coat. There were three days of constant bathing, and not a happy Airedale.

Q: You arrived there maybe September 1960. This is the end of the Eisenhower period. I guess the U-2, and the summit had just blown up.

JENKINS: That had been about eight months earlier.

Q: But Khrushchev was in...

JENKINS: Khrushchev was in. The relationship was extremely confrontational. The Berlin crisis was in full flower. While shortly after we got there, and I don't remember the exact dates and I have to get back and get this I suppose, we did the ill-fated Bay of Pigs landing.

Q: That would have been during the Kennedy time.

JENKINS: That's right, a little later.

Q: ...February-March of '61.

JENKINS: That's right, and it was a huge embarrassment. We had a lot of things happen in the two years in Moscow which were very exciting.

Q: In the first place, what was your job?

JENKINS: I was in the political section. The political section was divided into two parts, internal and external. Dick Davies ran the internal, and he was busy analyzing the Politburo, and the domestic problems, etc., and the first signs of unease and unhappiness, dissension in the literary circles among the intelligentsia. Khrushchev had started to loosen up internal controls. He gave his famous speech at the Party Congress. The thaw had begun domestically. Internationally, Khrushchev became more of a gambler, convinced that we really didn't have the willpower to use our military physical power and that therefore he could muscle us and expand their borders. They became very aggressive in many ways, not only in the Cuban situation, but also in Africa. They founded Lumumba University while I was there and they brought in a couple thousand young Africans for four years of study and training. Ideally, they were supposed to go back as committed Soviet agents, but most of them were so turned off by the experience they went back as anti-communists.

Q: I dealt with Bulgarians around this time and the Yugoslavians, the Africans in Bulgaria did not like to be called black monkeys.

JENKINS: I can't imagine why.

Q: ...for some reason by the general population, and they up and left.

JENKINS: Well, Lumumba was more or less the same experience. We had a number of...I'd say hundreds of Lumumba students turn up at the USIS reading room because being non-Soviets they could push their way into the Cultural Center. We ended up pouring out Time magazines, and America magazines to them, and they would take them back to the Lumumba building, campus-dormitory, and then from there they'd spread them all over the place. So it became really a running sore for the KGB and the Soviet control mechanism. These people would talk to us and tell us what was happening, what was being taught. We did a number of despatches on this program, and our basic assessment was that the Soviets in opening Lumumba University did us a great favor, and greatly undermined their own effectiveness, by bringing these people face-to-face with Soviet reality which was very unattractive.

I was in the external section working with Culver Gleysteen and Frank Meehan. And when Frank left to go to Berlin (back to my old job), Spike Dubs replaced him. So once again the Hamburg cadre of Meehan, Dubs and Jenkins were all together, this time in Moscow.

Q: First, let's talk about the ambassador. Who he was, and how he operated.

JENKINS: The ambassador was Llewellyn Thompson, who is in my judgment, the finest career officer I ever had associated with. He was not a strong personality like Chip Bohlen had been, he was shy and retiring, but absolutely a splendid and decent man. He had a sensitivity to political realities, and the Soviet Union, a very good dialogue with Khrushchev and his entire Politburo. And he had terrific insights.

Russia was very interested in being accepted in the world cultural scene as legitimate, which she really wasn't. But we played on that, and we arranged for playwrights to come from the United States under the exchanges program which they tolerated because they wanted their scientists to get in and steal whatever they could in terms of technology. In exchange for that we sent people who had political influence into the Soviet Union. We worked with the FBI to trust these Soviet scientists contained them basically. But in exchange for that we did have a fairly successful flow of important Americans visiting Moscow. Benny Goodman came to Moscow while I was there with his band. For three nights they had concerts. The first night the audience was all invited apparatchiks, and they all sat there stolidly, while Benny put on a magnificent performance. The second night a lot of the intelligentsia and the younger people came and they went crazy, absolutely crazy. It was a huge success. Another event we had was the Michigan University marching band, where they played the Michigan fight song, etc. That was put on at Lushniki sports palace where there are seats for 10,000 people. The audience was packed with military people in uniform. They were trying to limit the impact...well, the Michigan band is so great, that these guys in uniform went wild. They were all standing up on their chairs, and cheering and applauding. The band was a huge success. The appetite for things western, especially American, was so dramatically revealed in things like this that every time there would be a crack, we'd push something through it. I subsequently was in charge of USIA's programs for five years for that part of the world, and had a chance to cash in on the experience that I had in Moscow.

Khrushchev allowed this opening. In Stalin's time, none of that would be permitted. He was afraid of western influence. Khrushchev seemed to realize that the influence was coming and that he had to try to get ahead of the power curve. He permitted things on a controlled basis which we were able to do.

Q: How did we feel about the Virgin Territories?

JENKINS: The New Lands, the Virgin Territory. All of our agricultural experts, and we had two very good Ag Attachés in the embassy who spent all of their time on the road looking at crops, etc., said this was a disaster in the making, and we predicted that.

Q: We went through that same thing in 1917.

JENKINS: Precisely, it's the dust bowl. They were creating a dust bowl.

Q: Were we telling them?

JENKINS: Well, the information was certainly there. When they traveled it was obvious. Soviet agricultural policy was a disaster from 1920 on. It was always driven by politics, not productivity. Collectivization was not designed to make more efficient farms, it was designed to remove the political independence that farmers had, and the leverage they had on the regime. If they didn't deliver their crops, the country went hungry. So they had to somehow get away from that, and they did it by collectivizing. They broke the farmers. Everything they did in the agriculture area was designed to increase productivity, but politics always came first. And for Khrushchev the Virgin Lands was a new campaign. It was a way to be a popular president. He wanted desperately to be genuinely popular, and he was switching from rule by terror, to what he thought was going to be rule by popular acclaim. He was dead serious about it, he failed, but it wasn't for lack of trying. In his efforts to do this, he opened up the Soviet Union quite a bit to western influence.

To get back to Matlock, he eventually ended up in the political section, and then, of course, he went back to Moscow as DCM, and then he went back again as ambassador. I think all together he spent some 11 years in the Soviet Union. And in the Gorbachev era, when Jack was ambassador, was DCM and then ambassador, he was so good, he knew so much about them, that he eventually became almost an informal member of their cabinet. He met with Gorbachev regularly. He would attend meetings of the Central Committee to speak on things. He was able to have a tremendous influence. I think history is going to record the incredible accomplishments of Matlock, who is the latest in a series of outstanding career ambassadors in Moscow. They're all steeped in Soviet affairs, three-timers usually by the time they got to be ambassadors, they all went through an education program, like I did at Harvard, they all arrived with the Russian language. It was absolutely a superb performance by the United States, and we dwarfed other embassies there in terms of our competence.

Q: Did you find as an embassy, you were the people they came to from other embassies?

JENKINS: Yes, all the time. It wasn't only our power, it was our knowledge. There were a few areas where we were deficient, the Japanese, for example, had a fisheries attaché, but we didn't have anybody in fisheries. But they came to us for our agricultural attachés. The French had a stronger cultural section than we did in terms of the number of people, diversity of contacts, etc. But in everything else, we were the best informed.

Of course we had an extremely close working relationship with our allied counterparts. I was the Berlin man in the embassy. Maybe I should talk about that first.

Q: Why don't we talk about the whole Berlin thing.

JENKINS: Okay. Arriving there it became my responsibility to interpret what I could see in the papers, by attending lectures, and traveling. I might interject that we had "a travel program." I was the travel officer in the political section, among my other duties, and we deliberately laid out territories, or areas, of the Soviet Union we wanted somebody to cover. The Defense Department attachés were on the road all the time for their own reasons, but we shared maps. If we wanted to go to Frunze, and Alma Ata, which I did, and the Defense attachés had not been able to get certain information about the kinds of factories which were present, etc., for their purposes, we would share requirements. And they would come back and give us things like programs from cultural events where we could see who was actually appearing. And we would pay calls on the local editors in the newspapers in these outlying republics, and we'd call on the republic foreign minister, who of course was a sham, but he was thrilled when we showed up. That was the event of the year. So we would get something out of that every time. I would say three-fourths of the Soviet Union was off-limits, even though on the official map it was all open. You had to apply for authority, propusk to go there. Then the Soviets would reply and say, "Sorry, there are no hotel rooms this week," which meant it was a closed area. They didn't want to admit that that much of the Soviet Union was closed. We had similar controls back here which I ran when I came back to the Soviet desk in the State Department subsequently.

But having arrived in Moscow, I immediately picked up on the Berlin subject -- read all the articles, and the magazine articles, and I met the person at the foreign ministry who was dealing with it, and his boss, who was the deputy foreign minister for Western Europe. He had three people under him, and I got to know all of them -- one of them quite well, even socially. And I was getting all the reports from Berlin, and from Washington, and the intelligence community about what was happening in Berlin. This was just before the wall went up. I was convinced when I left Berlin, because the flood of refugees was becoming so strong through West Berlin, that the Soviets would have to cut it off somehow. And I predicted in a telegram from Berlin, which I had a lot of trouble getting out from Moscow, because my immediate superior, Culver Gleysteen, felt that as a "junior officer," a new boy in Moscow, and that I shouldn't be dealing with such high policy matters, I should focus on interpreting what was in the newspapers. But I had my own views about that, and having been in Berlin, and right in the middle of it at a fairly high level for two years, I was convinced that I was right, and I wrote this message predicting that the Soviets would seal off Berlin. Actually I thought they would put the fence around all of Berlin, keeping our access to East Berlin open and thereby preserving the city's quadripartite status. What they did, of course, was put the wall right through the middle. Two weeks before they built the wall Hal Sonnenfeldt, who was in the Department at that time, had come out to Moscow on a visit, I shared my message with Hal, and he took it back. I never did get it out in its initial form from the embassy because Culver sat on it. I didn't feel that I could go directly to "Tommy" properly. Confronted with a bureaucratic block like that, I probably should have gone to the Ambassador. But anyhow, the message got out, I got it back through Hal. And lo and behold it happened. At that point our relationship with the Soviets became extremely tense.

Q: Kennedy was in when this...

JENKINS: That's right.

Q: Before we move to that, did you...

JENKINS: I was in Moscow when the election occurred, and I watched the debates between Nixon and Kennedy in the snack bar at the back of the embassy building. We had our western colleagues and journalists in to watch this. We got the tapes, we didn't see the TV live, but it was taped and flown out to us. And we shared that, and we were all pretty excited about Kennedy.

Q: What was your reading about the Kennedy administration, and the Russians?

JENKINS: Well, we in Moscow initially, were all thrilled, and the Russians were scared to death because Kennedy was a political sex symbol all over the world. They couldn't cope with that. This was a popularity. Eisenhower had been disliked by a lot of people, he was regarded as too old, too cautious. He was a military man, so in Third World countries he was looked upon as sort of an American imperialistic symbol. When Kennedy came in that was dissolved. And all of a sudden the United States became the image and symbol of young, vibrant, creative peace loving, tough, all the right words. And in Moscow the Russians all felt this way. The people would come up to us in the streets, and say, “Voroshe.” It was very satisfying. John Glenn went into space at that time, and that was a plus, and again all the westerners, and the Russians, applauded us. Nobody among the Russian people really wanted us to fail, because we were what they wanted to become.

However, we began to run into the arrogance of the Kennedy White House early on. It was difficult. Tommy was extremely impressive and careful, and he nurtured his ties, and played his hand very carefully. He was very secretive, he didn’t broadcast like Kennan did -- his telegrams for everybody to see and to show off. He really wrote telegrams for Kennedy and for Dean Rusk alone. I think our impression of the Kennedy administration at first was very hopeful. We had felt that Dulles and Eisenhower, and Chris Herter, the former governor of Massachusetts, were weak on Berlin, didn’t seem to grasp that it was our will that was being contested. It was essential, just as in dealing with any playground bully, that when you’re tested, you have to stand up the first time, or you’re just going to spend all your time rolling over. It was that simple. It was never fully taken at face value by the Eisenhower administration. When Kennedy came in we were very hopeful that this would change. Here was a PT boat hero, young, and vigorous. Dean Rusk was solid, and a wonderful man. But Kennedy’s White House, like Clinton’s, was full of arrogant friends who all were convinced they knew better than anybody. Dickie Goodwin, Schlesinger, the historian, John Kenneth Galbraith, were absolutely convinced that they were intellectually far superior to these drones in the Foreign Service and in the embassy, etc.

This attitude prevailed. So we became very nervous. We were competing for Kennedy’s mind, we thought. Things like Jack Matlock’s airgrams about dissent among the intelligentsia, were very important. Kennedy read those, and Jack received a personal commendation from Kennedy for them. Tommy was very trusted. Kennedy trusted him, so Tommy was able to dampen down a lot of the mischief that Bobby Kennedy and all of his cohorts were promoting. And Bobby Kennedy was a big part of the foreign policy process in the Kennedy administration, including in my judgment, putting our troops into combat in Vietnam instead of remaining “advisers.”

Q: You’re talking about Vietnam.

JENKINS: Yes. But as we went on into this Berlin confrontation, it became more and more serious. We faced the Khrushchev ultimatum. The Soviets began creating incidents in the air corridors which had been sacrosanct up until then. I remember once Sir Christopher Steele, the British ambassador, flew from Bonn to Berlin in the corridor, and two MiGs came in and actually brushed the wings of his plane. That was a huge confrontation, and it was one of the occasions when our collaboration with our allies was so close.

In the French embassy, Jacques Andreani, the present ambassador; in the German embassy, Jorg Kasti, who is now retired; and in the British embassy, John Tretwell, and I were a four-power working group on Berlin in Moscow. We were all of one mind, and we shared everything in reporting. We ran over everything in the telegrams with one another, and then cross-reported. That was very valuable because we all had somewhat distinct access to different kinds of Soviets. We would meet once a week at least, just to meet, but frequently we’d meet every day depending on what was going on.

Q: Just one little detail. Bugging was always...how would you meet?

JENKINS: Each one of our embassies had a secure room, which is a plastic room built within the room where you meet. It's up on plastic stilts, and has clear plastic walls -- they're plastic bricks, little squares and they're all bolted together with plastic. We had a conference room, a table with chairs around it, and we had a sound machine.

Q: A sound-making machine with sound around the outside.

JENKINS: Yes, it wasn't very comfortable, and the temperature was never really very good, but we assumed that anywhere else the Soviets could hear us. So we would meet usually in our bubble, but sometimes in the British bubble and a couple of times in the German and the French bubbles. Our bubbles were all very similar. We would meet and analyze events, and decide what we were going to report, and we'd tell each other what we were going to report. And then we'd go back and report to our respective ambassadors, and keep them informed. The ambassadors would also meet frequently as a group, sometimes with us, sometimes without. In the Steele aircraft incident, to illustrate how closely we worked together, it was decided that we had to do a protest immediately. When Steele's plane was buzzed and brushed, we couldn't wait for our four capitals to coordinate a message and send it back to us. It required an immediate protest in the strongest language. So Tommy and Sir Frank Roberts, the British ambassador, and the French and German ambassadors, all agreed. I took it upon myself to write the first draft with my three colleagues sitting around the table with me. Then they suggested changes and we ended up with a 2-page demarche, which we had drafted together. So without waiting for approval, we flashed these back to our capitals, and the ambassadors went in simultaneously with these protests. We informed Washington instead of requesting permission. It was very tough language, "we will take appropriate steps, including the use of force if necessary, and if you want to bring our relations to a crisis point where world peace is threatened, this is a good way to do it." The message was delivered, the Soviets took note of it, there was never another incident again. The only reaction out of our capitals came from the British. Lord Hume was then Foreign Minister. He wrote and commended the drafters of the demarche for an outstanding job demonstrating initiative, etc., in the finest tradition of the British service, etc. So Sir Frank and John Tretwell shared Lord Hume's message with Tommy. That was a very satisfying and exciting thing to be part of.

Q: At that time what was Khrushchev and his...

JENKINS: What were they up to? They were testing us, convinced that we didn't have the willpower. They were pushing and slicing constantly, we called it salami slicing, to see how far they could get. The goal was to eventually force us out of Berlin. They seemed convinced that we would pick up our marbles and go home, because it was too scary to continue the confrontation. And if that had happened, in my judgment, the psychological impact in Europe would have been decisive. And I think instead of the Cold War going our way, it would have at least temporarily gone their way.

Q: You mentioned when you were in Berlin that you did not find support back in Washington.

JENKINS: It was still the case under Kennedy. There was great intellectual unrest about this. Rusk was not that strong at the White House, Mac Bundy constantly agonized over things, he was more interested in the intellectual process than he was in the substance. The sense of history which Kissinger reflected so well (and Acheson in his time), was missing. Rusk had a sense of history, but it was all Asian oriented. I thought Dean Rusk was a magnificent human being, but obviously he was basically mistaken about our role in Asia, and the Vietnam war.

Q: Did you have that feeling at the embassy of unease?

JENKINS: Yes, we did. We were not comfortable. We did not have the sense that the policy was firm. We were constantly fighting for Kennedy's mind. We had great confidence in Tommy, and we knew that Tommy was very effective in his dialogue with Kennedy, and even with Bundy. But we also knew that around them were the Dickie Goodwins of the world. Goodwin was the Stephanopoulos of the Kennedy White House. He even had the woolly head hair-do which was not yet fashionable. They were arrogant...

Q: Stephanopoulos for the record is William Clinton's chief of communications...

JENKINS: Policy adviser. All of these men had come out of the campaign. Pierre Salinger was part of this but he wasn't a serious policy player. They were cocky as hell, and convinced that we were a bunch of drones, and that we couldn't be trusted, and if they could only get Khrushchev off in a room with Kennedy for an hour, why, it would all work out. Which, of course, they eventually did in Vienna and it didn't work out at all. What we said was true. Khrushchev came in, stepped on his foot, kneaded him in the balls to look at his reaction. And the reaction was weak, and therefore Khrushchev ratcheted up his initiative.

Q: What were you getting out of this? Kennedy went to Austria after a very successful PR trip to France, particularly because Jackie was...

JENKINS: ...because Jackie was such a hit, that's right.

Q: The Kennedy meeting with Khrushchev in Vienna was an important part of the Berlin crisis. What were you getting in this respect?

JENKINS: We felt it was the golden opportunity for him to be charming, to have Jackie charm Khrushchev, etc., and then have Kennedy come in and say, "Now look, I want to say this perfectly straight. Get your bloody hands off Berlin or we'll destroy you." But he never did. He was constantly talking about, we've got to find a way out, what can we do to reassure you, we don't want you to distrust our motives, we're not aggressive. He played right into Khrushchev's impression, and Tommy was upset. He didn't articulate that to us because he was just too professional for that. But we knew he wasn't happy with the way it went, and we indeed saw further deterioration in the confrontation as a result of that meeting.

But in the key period, in the winter of 1961 and '62, I believe the confrontation in Berlin, the ultimatum having been raised, came down to "access." So Khrushchev switched his target, and he insisted that we accept East German control of the access, which had been part of their focus from the beginning. Remember Dulles originally had this idea that we would accept East Germans as “agents of Moscow,” and legally our position would be unimpaired, he felt that way. Well, this was not a legal issue, it was a psychological confrontation. And Kennedy continued to futz around the issue. But the Russians got so aggressive finally that we had to have a series of special negotiations on Berlin access. Thompson and Gromyko, and Semyonov on the Russian side. I went with Tommy. I was “the Berlin man” in our embassy. We had these long cables come out from the Department with instructions. I would boil them down and interpret them for Tommy. They were replete with details. And, of course, I had lived in Berlin so I would get the instructions, and I’d work out a talking points paper for Tommy, and then the two of us would go in and meet Gromyko. We had five meetings. They were all very high profile, reported in the New York Times on the front page. (My picture was on the front page of the New York Times with Tommy.)

The first meeting we held agreed to have these consultations on Berlin access (which already made us nervous because we didn’t want to consult on something which was “a right”). But that’s what Kennedy insisted on. As we arrived at the first meeting Gromyko received us in his outer office and escorted us into his little sitting room. Gromyko was extremely friendly. “Tommy, how’s Jane? How are your little girls? Is everything going well, I hope it’s not too uncomfortable. It is a difficult time for us, but it has always been a great pleasure for me to work with you professionally because you are so professional.” He turned to me, and this was all in Russian even though Gromyko spoke beautiful English, and we chatted a little bit, and he complimented me on my Russian, and asked where I lived, where was my apartment, etc. Semyonov was also friendly. They had a translator, Victor, who had been Khrushchev’s translator and subsequently became Gorbachev’s translator, he attended every meeting.

Q: A gentlemen with a bald head and a mustache?

JENKINS: No, Victor was a young man with wavy hair. He had gone to school in Washington as a boy, and had very good English.

We sat down and agreed that we would have another meeting the next week, and then we tabled our position, and they tabled theirs, we both agreed we’d study the positions and report back to our government. And we left. It was a very pleasant meeting, about 45 minutes.

The second meeting took place about a week later. We had long instructions from Washington about what to present, etc. We walked in and Gromyko was absolutely a changed personality. He was cold, hostile, unfriendly, abruptly told us to sit down, and then launched into a 45 minute tirade about American irresponsibility and aggression, and lack of legal basis for being in Berlin at all, and how we’re going to do this, and we’re going to do that. And at one point he said, “You know, you’ve got to recognize that if you allow Berlin to become the flashpoint for a war, we will incinerate New York City in 24 hours.” That’s pretty heavy stuff. Tommy is sitting there on the couch, and I’m sitting on the couch next to him -- Tommy was a chain smoker (eventually he died of lung cancer), and he’s smoking quietly. Gromyko stopped. He gave this oration in a fairly high pitched voice, it was not a casual conversation. He was pounding on the coffee table. And Tommy just kept smoking, and there was silence. About 30 seconds went by, Tommy never said a word. Gromyko said, “Well, Mr. Ambassador?” And Tommy very quietly stubbed out his cigarette, and looked up at Gromyko, and said, “Oh, are you through Mr. Minister?” It was a beautiful deflation. And of all the things I witnessed, that was the coolest diplomatic performance I ever saw. I was sitting there, my blood pressure was going up, of course, I didn’t open my mouth but I was taking notes. In these meetings I was the scribe, everything that they said, or that we said in response, I wrote down as best I could. And because it was first spoken in Russian, and I could understand the Russian, and then repeated in English, I was able to do it because I’d catch three-fourths of it, or half of it the first time, and fill it in the second round. And when we spoke, the same thing happened. Tommy spoke slowly and deliberately, but if I missed anything I got it in a Russian translation from Sukhodrov.

Tommy sat there and waited and then said this, Gromyko’s face fell. He was clearly embarrassed. And then Tommy very quietly, in about two paragraphs, said, “I deeply regret that you have been required to put on this performance, which I regard as irresponsible, undiplomatic, and certainly below your high level of diplomatic and professional behavior. You know, and I know you do, and I’m sure Mr. Khrushchev appreciates this, that if we ever get into the beginning of a nuclear exchange, that no doubt you can damage an American city or two, but you also know that the entire Soviet Union will become a rubble heap within 24 hours. It’s your choice of time frame, it will take a lot less than that.” And he stood up, and we left. Gromyko’s mouth was open. It was a dramatic performance.

After each meeting, we would return to the residence and Tommy and I would sit down and review my notes. He was writing also on a pad, his interpretation of what was happening, and then I would review his notes. And I would make suggestions, and he would incorporate some of them, which was very heady stuff for a young diplomat, and then he would correct some of the things that I had done, or add an interpretative phrase. I would take the notes and go back to the embassy with a driver, which was about a mile away where we had two secretaries standing by. We’d go into the bubble, and they would type up my verbatim account of the discussion, and Tommy’s interpretation. This would take maybe an hour, and then I would take those two papers, get back in the car and go back to Spaso. This time we’d have a drink together, and Tommy would review them, and say, fine. He’d make a few changes here and there, I’d get back in the car, back to the embassy, and they’d go off Flash/Eyes Only for the President and the Secretary of State. We sent six pairs of telegrams like that in this time. It was very exciting.

And one time, after the third meeting, and I’ll go back to those meetings in a minute, I came down and there was no car at Spaso. I called the embassy and I couldn’t get an answer, so there was no transportation. So, I took these two drafts in my pocket and I walked the one mile from Spaso knowing...at first I was really nervous thinking, what the hell should I do and I decided, damn it, they’ll follow me closely and I’m probably going to be safer making this walk than any time in my life. It was very cold, this was in February, the snow was scrunching under my shoes, and I was invigorated and began thinking, God, this is great drama, and I’m in the middle of it and what a lucky fellow I am, and I’m making a contribution. I got to the embassy and we typed it up, then I got in my car and came back and we sent it out. But it was that one time, I never saw anybody, a little shadow here and there, but I know as I walked those blocks that within a half a block there were probably three or four people surrounding me with a security cocoon.

Q: What was the impression of the speech of Gromyko? When you report this back, you’re not catching the body language, and expressions.

JENKINS: Oh, we did. In Tommy's interpretive telegram he referred to that, and he characterized Gromyko's performance as theatrical, dramatic, "staged," and I think, as I recall -- I'd have to get my notes out -- that it was another deliberate probe of our will. A deliberate attempt to intimidate.

Q: But the important thing is that the professional diplomat was able to diffuse this issue before reporting back and scaring the bejesus out of the Kennedy team.

JENKINS: The language that Gromyko delivered was reported verbatim practically. Tommy's interpretation was also reported. Now, some people in Washington would dismiss Tommy's interpretation and be paralyzed by the threat. The President, I believe, because he had developed this confidence in Tommy, and many other people, anybody who was witting and on top of it, realized that Tommy was the best interpreter that the United States had, and that his words were extremely weighty. I think that we helped stiffen the American spine by our interpretative comments. The reaction in policy terms in Washington is reassuring in that regard. But we knew that there were people back there saying, what are we doing in Berlin? We've got to get out of Berlin, this is crazy. We're jeopardizing the United States' security by this. Why are we there? This is a beachhead, we shouldn't be there. Let's withdraw. There are a lot of people going that way, and they were on both sides of the political aisle. You know, this bully is threatening me, we've got to stand up and whip him. So we always felt this was always in the balance, and the Russians clearly felt that way. They wouldn't have gone through all this if they'd known for sure it was going to be counterproductive.

Q: I must say, I think almost always in the profession, never felt that World War III was going to start over Asia or some other place like that. If it's ever going to happen, it was going to be over Berlin.

JENKINS: Well, it's interesting. Those of us who had been in Berlin, especially me, I guess some people didn't agree with me perhaps, always felt that World War III could start by miscalculation anywhere, but especially in Berlin. But that in terms of a calculated military engagement, there was no risk at all. Our real danger was to make sure that the Soviets didn't misinterpret our anguish, intellectual approach, and massaging as weakness. But they did frequently, as we saw. Khrushchev in Vienna misinterpreted Kennedy's performance as weakness. It was just his intellectual approach to things: they can't be black and white. But in Berlin, one of the rare occasions in my career, it was pure black and white. And I reflected that and Tommy reflected that in his own very quiet way.

Q: Was there ever a concern...I mean I used to kind of feel this in my gut that the real problem in Berlin was that maybe the Germans in East Germany might take something to the wrong hands, and the West Germans might get involved, and all of a sudden we would find ourselves...

JENKINS: ...drawn into something.

Q: ...essentially with an East German revolt which we couldn't contain.

JENKINS: Well, that was always a possibility, but I think we always felt that the West Germans were basically frightened. Adenauer was trying to cut deals with East Germans long before we indicated any flexibility. Brandt was better. Brandt was very strong in Berlin as a mayor. When he became chancellor, that seemed to dissipate considerably. But I think we, both in Berlin where we regarded the Germans almost as ploys in this whole thing, and in Moscow where the German embassy was weak (Kastl was strong but his ambassador was an ego-maniac). The German Ambassador thought he could seduce Khrushchev by being nice to him. Khrushchev played him like a fiddle. I don't think we ever felt that the German card would ever get out in front of our negotiations because we and the Soviets were both so focused on them, we weren't going to let that happen. I mean, there was an East German revolt, the refugee flow, and they put the fence up. We didn't fight that. That's an example. We weren't going to start World War III over East German attitudes, human rights in East Germany. If we were going to start World War III it was going to be because the Russians were deliberately trying to abolish our rights in Berlin. And as long as we drew that line, and made it clear, they respected it, and there wasn't going to be a world war. All the East Germans in East Germany wanted to either riot, or flee.

Q: Did the Berlin wall happen while you were there?

JENKINS: No. It didn't happen while I was in Berlin. It did happen while I was in Moscow. The Cuban missile crisis happened shortly after I got back to the Department. The wall went up while I was in Moscow.

We would get our Quadripartite team together, share telegrams with them. The interpretative ones we didn't always share, but the factual reports we did, and we shared our instructions with them each time. The western press was all over us. When we'd walk out of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs Marvin Kalb, Semore Topping, and UPI, were right there taking notes. This was the Berlin access crisis, and the world all thought we were close to World War III.

Q: When you came away from the performance of Gromyko, did we just walk out and say, no comment.

JENKINS: We went out the door and said, we'll report your views back to our government, we regret this was necessary, and we left. Now, Gromyko called us in for another meeting a week later, in the meantime we had another set of instructions, of course, which were very strong. We presented our instructions. The Russians rebutted them, and we went back to another round. We ended up with the Russians agreeing that there had to be a formulation. They essentially folded in front of our stern refusal to back down. They didn't give up their theoretical position, but in terms of practice they agreed to stop harassing our access. There was a Quadripartite working group set up to consider access problems after that. But basically Khrushchev backed off, and that phase of the Berlin crisis ended. It was very exciting and Tommy was a real hero. It was the high point of my diplomatic career.

Q: Before we finish Berlin, how did the wall going up...you were in Berlin when the wall went up...

JENKINS: No, I was in Moscow.

Q: Did we see this as almost a backing down? In other words they weren't going to go for the whole hog.

JENKINS: Yes, that was one interpretation of it. There was a big policy battle going on within the west, mostly within the United States, with those who said we should never have accepted the wall, that our access to East Berlin as opposed to our access to Berlin generally, was a violation of the Quadripartite agreement on Berlin. General Clay was sent in at that time to reassure the Berlin population that accepting the wall didn't mean that we were abandoning Berlin. We were constantly trying to make sure that we didn't lose this confrontation by losing the Berliners. If they gave up and started fleeing to the West, which they could do, the Russians would have picked up Berlin. So we were trying to stiffen their confidence. We regarded the Wall going up as a step short of trying to get all of Berlin. That was part of the back down. Yes, I had never quite said it that way, but you're absolutely right.

A number of interesting anecdotes in this time in Moscow. I attended public lectures frequently. I went to one at a higher military education school in Moscow, which was sort of like the War College. They would advertise once a month a public lecture at the academy. And almost everybody there was in uniform, and I went with my British counterpart to two of these. Everybody got very excited when we walked in. An officer rushed up to the speaker and pointed to us, etc. They went ahead as they're programmed to do. One of them was a speech on Germany and Berlin. It was full of denunciations and the failures of the imperialists in Germany, and how the German population was being exploited by the capitalists, etc. These officers would then stand up in the audience and say, "I was stationed in East Germany. I've been to West Berlin. I've seen Germany. If Germany is in such terrible shape, and the West German government is so bad, and the Americans are so bad, why is the standard of living so much higher in West Germany than it is in East Germany? Which in turn is so much higher than it is here." The speakers would get very nervous. They knew we were watching this, and the officers knew that we were there, and they were in a sense recording this. Frequently these public lectures would break down into total disorder, almost chaos, because the crowd would hoot at these people. And that was very interesting, very insightful as the real attitudes of Soviets.

We had a lot of very interesting colleagues in Moscow. Generally speaking foreign countries sent their most qualified professionals there. I had this great working group on Berlin, for example, but we also worked hard to entertain ourselves. We had a dacha out in the country which belonged to the ambassador obviously, but it was there for all the embassy to use. And one day Ambassador Thompson had a party with a lot of westerners, and the new Brazilian ambassador (who subsequently became Foreign Minister). He had just arrived and was invited to the party. We had a soccer game. And, of course, the Brazilians are all big soccer fans, and he got in the middle of it. Our Naval Attaché was dribbling the ball down this very rough field, and the Brazilian ambassador came in to try to take it away and the Naval Attaché gave it a boot and caught the Brazilian ambassador's leg and broke it. Of course, he was in great pain. I drove him back in to his embassy and got the American embassy doctor (We had a doctor in the embassy.) He was put in a splint and eventually flown out to Helsinki, to be taken care of.

But on the way going back in the car, he was sitting there with tears coming down his face it hurt so much, and I was trying to comfort him, and assure him that everything was going to be fine, etc. He looked over with a sort of sick smile on his face, and said, "It hurts like hell," but he said, "it guarantees that even though I've only been here a week, tomorrow I will be a hero in Brazil." "Ambassador breaks leg in soccer game with Americans." A great guy.

We had a lot of action with the Indians and the Egyptians, and others of the third world. They were always in touch with a different set of Soviets, and Western defectors. There was a colony of people, international Marxists in Moscow, Burgess and McLean were part of this.

Q: The two British defectors.

JENKINS: Right. And Alfred Gonzales, my counterpart at the Indian Embassy, was a great friend of mine. He was very sharp-tongued, British educated, teasing in his pronouncements. Personally, we were very good friends, and he was crazy about my wife. When I would take a trip, he'd always invite my wife, "C", to bridge and dinner. He would have people like Wilford Burchett and McLean for this bridge party, with my wife, which was so interesting. Wilford Burchett was an Australian journalist, who covered the Korean War from the North Korean side, and was sympathetic to the North Korean side. He was at this point stationed in Moscow, and not allowed to go back to Australia. Certainly McLean wasn't welcomed anywhere else. So my wife would play bridge with these guys and come back full of interesting information. One, she was charming, and two, she was smart and fun to be with and they just talked a lot to her because they were starved for conversation. That was all very interesting.

My Australian colleagues were terrific fellows generally. Rob Lowrie was an especially close friend who went on to become ambassador to Poland. Then a man who subsequently became Australian Minister of Defense, who was an extremely left-wing Laborite, came out to replace the first secretary. He had an American wife, who was also a very left-wing Marxist, and we couldn't "educate" them. It was very frustrating because we kept saying, this is what's going to happen, you can't do this. He said, "I'm going to have a big party. All my new friends are going to come." So he invited 20 or 30 of us, and about 50 Soviets. One showed up. We had warned him that nobody would come, and if they did it would just be the KGB to come watch the rest of us. And that's exactly what happened. He began to get educated in this process, but he was very cocky and he had a lot to learn.

Another funny event occurred when the President of Ecuador visited; a new president who was an alcoholic and very left-wing. The Soviets really went after him because they were trying everywhere to build new outposts, and they made great progress with this fellow. He bought MiGs, and invited Russian military advisers in, etc. He came to Moscow on a state visit. He wasn't important enough to spend all his time with Khrushchev, but he did meet with Khrushchev and there was a picture in Pravda, etc. He was staying at the Sovietskaya Hotel, which was one of the prominent, seedy establishments, but all hotels were seedy. This was reserved for VIPs. Later I stayed there when I was negotiating with them on trade with Harriman. But we would go there for dinner sometimes because the restaurants for foreigners tended to be better than the other restaurants. This was a party for Frank Meehan who was leaving to go to Berlin, and the Tretwells, and the Meehans and the Jenkins, and key colleague Sam and Mary

Wise were all together. We were having drinks -- the vodka was always good, we always got a lot of caviar which was magnificent, and a lot of cashews. Usually you couldn't eat the meat but you'd drank so much vodka and caviar you didn't care. We had a good time, and we were in very gay spirits, when lo and behold at a big table next to us here's the bloody Ecuadorian president, and his entourage of Ecuadorians. There were about six with him, and four KGB goons who were in charge of taking care of him. Their job obviously was to get him drunk, and then get him some women, and tuck him away for the night, which was his lifestyle. So we're sitting there at the next table. Mary Tretwell, John's wife, had been raised in the Philippines (her father was an ex-pat), and she spoke fluent Spanish. She was also a stunning girl, tall, black hair and it was sort of tight on her head, and she had big eyes, and she was a great girl, a terrific personality (still is). We're sitting there, and my wife was cute, Meehan's wife was cute, Mary Wise was adorable, so we had four good looking women at our table, Mary particularly. The Ecuadorian was very interested in all of this, and was sort of ogling the girls all the time. And at one point, right out of the blue, I mean nobody prompted her to do this, Mary turned to one of the Ecuadorians who was there, and in fluent Spanish said, "I do hope you're having a good time, this is a rather boring hotel." They got up from the table, came over and joined our table, all clustered around Mary, and the KGB goons were frantic. It didn't ever lead to anything except a lot of drinking at the restaurant but it was a lot of fun.

Q: Did you have any problems with the KGB trying to set you up, or anything like that?

JENKINS: We had a lot of first stage confrontations. When I traveled, for example, which I did I think six times in two years, and I went to various regions of the Soviet Union. Invariably, on the train or in the hotel, there would be some bimbo come up and brush against me, and ask if I would buy her a drink, and that sort of thing. It was never too aggressive, it was always just probing a little bit. They had an eye, and they were very clever for marriages that were in trouble. And Moscow was a tremendous pressure cooker, and if you didn't have a solid marriage, it would really come unglued there. Or it would be made solid. And some of our people had marital problems, and inevitably they would get targeted for a more serious approach.

We had a friend who was a single woman, UPI reporter, Eileen Mosley, who was the number two person there, and a great girl, very bright, very attractive, nice, good Russian. They set her up. They drugged her coffee, and then took her into a KGB office some place, took all her clothes off, and photographed her in various poses, being attacked by various men, and then sent the photographs to her and suggested that she cooperate or else they'd be sent back to headquarters. We were outraged. I was mad at the press because Henry Shapiro, who ran UPI, and who had been there forever, and who cherished his unique contacts, exercised a veto and the press refused to report this because the rule was that if anybody was going to report on the activities of another newspaper, that newspaper had to concur. It's a logical enough rule, I guess, but in this case we found it very upsetting. We felt that story should have been blown sky high to teach the Russians not to do that anymore. But it wasn't, and Eileen was shipped out, and that was the end of it. I never trusted or liked Henry Shapiro. He was a very wise man, knew a great deal, but he had so much invested in his unique post that he didn't want to jeopardize it.

Q: This is always a problem when somebody feels they have something, they can be used.

JENKINS: That's right. They can be exploited, and the KGB was extremely clever about that. A great book has been written about the Wennerstrom case, the Swedish military attaché in Moscow, who was not there when I was there, who was seduced on an ego basis, not on women, not money, not drink. They persuaded him that he was going to be a key player in saving the world from World War III. They gave him all kinds of things, and information, and he passed it, and he became a two-way viaduct, and they got him hooked. He came to the United States as Swedish military attaché, and of course we treated the Swedes as NATO members practically, and he fed all kinds of stuff back to the Soviets. Eventually he was caught in Sweden, he was convicted. An Englishman wrote a very good book, Agent of Choice. It reflected how sophisticated the KGB was in exploiting psychological frailties.

The German ambassador, who was such an ego-maniac, was named Kroll, he was a politician, not a career man.

Oh, I know one other thing, a high point in my time in Moscow. While I was there, John J. McCloy came to Moscow. He became essentially the arms control spokesman for the administration. He was a very prominent man having been High Commissioner in Germany, etc. He came out to Moscow with a very high powered delegation to initiate what became the beginning of the arms control dialogue, it was called the McCloy Zorin talks, Zorin being the ambassador on the Russian side who was McCloy's counterpart. Gromyko served as Zorin's deputy in these talks. McCloy had Butch Fisher, the legal adviser from the State Department, as his deputy. But there were several other people on the team: Hal Sonnenfeldt was one. We had Dick Gardner who is now ambassador in Spain, who was a UN expert. A fellow named Tom Wolfe, who was an Air Force colonel, who was extremely competent on weapons systems. And I was part of that delegation. We met with Zorin and his delegation a half a dozen times and we reached an agreement. It was the first step, and it had to do with testing, and exchange of information. It was the first step in a series of negotiations which culminated with SALT II. McCloy was impressive. While he was there in the middle of the negotiations Khrushchev took him down to Crimea for a weekend with his daughter. They had a family weekend together, and he came back with very interesting information from Khrushchev which underlined the fact that Khrushchev did indeed want serious arms control negotiations. The Russians were very tough negotiators, but McCloy was extremely capable, a very bright man. And Butch was brilliant, and it was a very interesting thing for me, and I stayed involved in arms control issues throughout my career, never in the center, never full time, but I did a lot of speaking on behalf of the SALT agreement around the country when we had trouble getting it confirmed, etc. I would say the Berlin and arms control were the two big issues for me.

I covered Latin America as well. Frank Meehan did the NATO and African issues, and Culver did the China, Vietnam and Laos issues. We all had things we had to read because the Soviet position was always reflected to some degree in their publications. We read provincial papers when we could get them whenever we traveled because you've got a different story there. They were telling their people out in the country-side something that they didn't want people in Moscow to read. We monitored their TV programs, we went to the theater, we traveled and talked to people on trains and in hotels whenever we could. And we developed, I think, better than any other embassy, a real flow of material from within Russia, and it was certainly never just the newspapers, but they were an important part of it.

Q: Was Brezhnev a figure at all at that time?

JENKINS: Yes, he was the number two man. He was regarded as something of a puppet for Khrushchev. Khrushchev was very rude, and even crude, about people around him. He was always putting people down, and ridiculing them, and demonstrating publicly that he was in charge. And he treated Brezhnev like a puppet. We were never that impressed with him. Tommy thought Polansky was going to be the next leader. He, of course, came a cropper in the agriculture arena. I don't know what has ever happened to him. Gromyko survived through all of them. Mikoyan survived through all of them.

Q: One last thing. You mentioned that you were involved with Harriman at one point.

JENKINS: Well, I was. This was back in the Department and we got into negotiations with the Russians on the air agreement. However, departing from Moscow was a genuine emotional wrench. I remember we flew back on KLM to Amsterdam and then picked up PanAmerican to the United States, 1962 in September. We got out to the airport, a lot of farewell parties. A very intense effort was made to entertain ourselves collectively. I'm sure this was true when you were in Belgrade too. Costume parties, and the girls all got very fancy.

Q: We skinny-dipped in the ambassador's pool when he was away.

JENKINS: There was a lot of that, and everybody had a lot of intensity. But there was a special camaraderie. We left with very heavy hearts because we loved all the people that were there. We knew that this was a high point in our relationship, and although we have stayed friends with all of them to one degree or another, it never is quite the same.

But we got on that KLM plane and it was just marvelous. The dog was in the hold in his box, and the three boys were taken up front by the airline hostesses and entertained while we sat back in our seats, my wife and I, and had about four martinis apiece while we flew to Amsterdam. Although we had known Amsterdam it seemed such a beautiful city. It was before the days of graffiti, I might add. It just hit us with such an onrush. We had gone outside to Copenhagen on a vacation one summer for two weeks, but other than that we were in the Soviet Union non-stop, and it was a big, big event in our lives. We all lost weight, because we were strung out, but we were all on a high because we were doing such exciting and important things. And the people around us were all such great people. We didn't know it at the time, but the CIA station people, and we knew who two or three of them were, but there were some we didn't know like Alex Davidson the doctor who took care of the Brazilian ambassador. He was an Air Force first lieutenant, or captain. It turned out five years later when we read the Penkovsky papers, that Alex was one of the key contacts. And one of our great British friends was the man in charge of Penkovsky, and it was his wife who pushed the baby buggy in which Penkovsky would drop his documents. We knew them well and had a lot of fun with them socially, and had no idea that was going on. We were as close to the intelligence activities in the embassy as any non-intelligence member, but that was so well done, and so professionally done, I've great admiration for the way the agency guys did that, and the way the British people did it.

We played tennis in a British embassy tennis court, and we had squash at the Indian embassy in the dead of winter. The place would be at zero where we were playing, the ball was dead as a rock and we'd go down there and drink three cognacs apiece, and then start playing, and by the end of the first set we were down to T-shirts. That was fun.

William D. Morgan was born in Rochester, New York in 1925. He received a bachelor's degree from the University of Rochester and did graduate work at the University of Maryland. He served in the U.S. Army from 1943-1946. His Foreign Service career included positions in the United Kingdom (England), the Soviet Union, Lebanon, France, Canada, and Washington, DC. Mr. Morgan interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1988 and Lester Sadow in 1995.

Q: If you could put yourself back in time, can you say what you expected or what the life of a Foreign Service Officer would be in the Soviet Union in the early 1950's?

MORGAN: That's a wonderful question, because my first answer is, "I really don't remember." I don't have any negative feelings coming back from my memory -- no anxieties, no fears, nothing like that, except how would this assignment affect the children and my wife? I could never exclude them from this consideration. Back in those days the Department sent the post report to us, and still does. In those days it was very important and very helpful. It talked about schools and living conditions.

Q: What did the post report for Moscow say about schools?

MORGAN: Well, it said that life in the Soviet Union was difficult, and facilities were far from Western standards. It described the housing available. The Soviets assigned certain buildings to foreign diplomats. The post report described, and I subsequently learned, what it meant professionally to serve in the Soviet Union. Service there clearly meant entry into a very special group. That was not meant in a "snooty" way but in a proud, professional way. Everybody assigned to Moscow at that time had to know Russian. I would be going through a year's study of Russian in the United States and then a period of time at a university. As it turned out these two years were followed by a few months in Oberammergau Germany. So any anxieties that I might have had about the Moscow assignment and about how I would be prepared linguistically, academically, and from the intelligence point of view were quickly put to rest. I also soon learned that, despite the form of government and the nature of the Soviet “beast,” there was Russia, a country with a great history, with many similarities with the United States.

The wives, however, didn’t get any preparation. They didn’t receive Russian or university training. On their own, they went to libraries to read about the Soviet Union and Russian culture and history. When you’re spending much of your time raising children, running a home and adding to the income by part-time or volunteer work you also don’t have too much time to learn about the next tour of duty. That, to me was the greatest drawback in the process of preparation for an assignment, especially as demanding a one as to Moscow. Oh, my wife and I did prepare for Moscow together. But a lot of it involved my passing on information to her. She tried to study Russian but it’s hard on one’s own. It’s a hard language. She knew -- and I knew -- that her association with Russian-speaking people would be next to zero. We could find English-speaking people, but we knew that she would be excluded from contact with most individual Russians. I knew that my job would not be speaking Russian so much but mostly reading, although I didn’t know that my duties as Publications Procurement Officer would take me all over the Soviet Union and in close contact with Russians, at least bookstore salespersons!

That is a lengthy answer, but I think that, maybe, this is a good time to go into these considerations. What you’re asking is how I felt at the beginning. My first answer was, “I don’t know, I don’t remember.” Obviously, some of my answer came at the beginning and some of it in the course of the two years of preparation for this assignment.

Q: I’m also trying to get at how you felt about the Cold War and how that affected you as an “insider” in the U. S. Government, how that affected your professional outlook.

MORGAN: I think that I already partially answered that question when we talked about NATO. I had had an introduction to the realities of the Cold War and America’s role in it. I learned some things about the Soviets and their system then. There were intelligence reports in USRO about conditions in the Soviet Union. Even though I read stacks of telegrams every morning, at first I did not focus on the Soviet Union. However, I learned about it.

Q: No, you have covered it. Were you aware of the realities of living in the Soviet Union, meaning the physical infrastructure, the political structure, and so forth?

MORGAN: Yes, once I got into the training program. I absorbed a lot [in the classes and then I started reading. The academic year at Columbia University -- the university I was assigned to after the year of Russian at FSI (1960 and 61) -- obviously had a great deal of material and courses that related to the Soviet Union and its authoritarian and ideological systems.

Q: You’re saying that you read enough to understand, as opposed to what the general public knew, that the Soviet Union, on an economic or physical level, was not a super power. Were you at that point?

MORGAN: That’s a major question. I don’t know that anybody could answer that yet. If that had been the case, we wouldn’t have done some of the things that we did. I think that we thought of the Soviets as “10 foot giants.” But once we lived in the Soviet midst and saw first hand we saw it indeed less as the superpower.

On the very day that we left Moscow, bag and baggage, even the elevator in our 9-floor apartment -- and we were on that floor -- didn't work. How in hell could they get to the moon? Looking back on it, I was aware of the very real weakness and oppression in the system and the reasons why the system could fall. Nevertheless, I was amazed when the Soviet Union fell -- and the way that it did. Now, today, I say that. Were we “hoodwinked?” We knew the weaknesses. However, the Soviet Union seemed to have such strength, in terms of nuclear armaments, KGB intelligence, and the total control of the population.

My boss in the Political Section when I was in the Embassy in Moscow was Mac Toon. He always said, “Don't you know how strong they are?” This point was relevant the minute you stopped and thought, “These people are really weak!”

But to return to your opening question on how I felt about the assignment. I knew that I was going to serve in the “heart” of the Foreign Service. I had learned in USRO that given the realities of the Cold War that our Embassy in Moscow was the heart of our Foreign Service efforts. An up and coming Foreign Service Officer needed to have that particular ticket “punched.” The career path through Moscow also was a very interesting and satisfying one. We knew also that there had to be major changes in the Soviet Union. If not, we had a “sick joke” in Moscow: If war comes, we'll go first, and clean, by “good” bombs.

Q: So you had a big career change when you accepted the assignment to Moscow. Part of the training involved two years of preparation? One year at the FSI (Foreign Service Institute) And a second year at Columbia. Was the university optional?

MORGAN: No.

Q: So the year at Columbia University was part of the program?

MORGAN: Yes. In those days it was a two-year training program. One year of language training and a second year at a university. The university was chosen each year. I was fortunate to be assigned to the Russian Institute at Columbia. The State Department had used other universities, including the University of California. The four other Foreign Service Officers and I who were in Russian training on this route to Moscow were Dick Funkhouser, Tom Fain, Peter Semler, and Carroll Woods. We went through nine months of Russian language training, from September, 1960, until June, 1961. Just to confuse you, Carroll Woods went right on to Moscow, in part because he had previously served there and largely because he had position to fill immediately. Dick Funkhouser worked in the summer months at the Army school in Oberammergau, Germany, and then to his more senior job as Economic Counselor. But Fain, Semler and I were left to find a job for ourselves in the three months before our academic year began.

Q: Until the fall?

MORGAN: Yes, until the Russian Institute at Columbia started up in September, 1961. We were literally without a job. We were told to go anywhere we wanted to go. I got a job in the Department in the East-West Exchanges Program in Washington. There were three principal areas which dealt with Soviet affairs: the Soviet desk in the Bureau of European Affairs; the East-West Exchanges Program which, by then, had grown into a very important part of Soviet-American bilateral relations; and the Soviet Union unit in the Office of Research for Eastern Europe in INR (Bureau of Intelligence Research). The four of us went to different places. One of the others went with me to the East-West Exchanges Program.

It was fascinating. We were engaged in negotiations with the Soviets during part of this time. This was very helpful when I came back from the Embassy in Moscow to the Soviet desk (EUR/SOV), because one of my areas of responsibility there was to be SOV's representative on the committee handling the exchanges program with the Soviet Union. This was a fascinating program.

Q: We'll come back to that later. Let's switch now to the Foreign Service Institute and the beginning of your Russian language training. Could you talk a little bit about the training and courses you took at the Foreign Service Institute, from September, 1960, to June, 1961?

MORGAN: I remember that time as days of agony, but most people who have gone through language courses look at them with less than joy. Of course, as most of those who read or listen to these tapes know, the FSI was one of the first institutions to start a new type of language training. In fact, the FSI adopted the system developed, I think, at Syracuse University. Like a child, you started with simple phrases and kept building them up. You did not learn the "grammar" of the language, as most of us, including me, learned French, for example. Rather, you learned the language something like the way a child learns. It involved constant repetition of words and phrases. I remember that the word for "railroad" in Russian was insufferably long. We learned it in bits and pieces, as it were. The system works. Of course, most of us older people -- and we were all well along in our 30's, and some in our 40's -- had a terrible time adjusting to this system. The three Russian teachers that we had found this system equally difficult to adjust to. They all thought that this system was terrible. It was hard for them, because they were repeating and repeating these words and phrases.

I will never forget some of these phrases and remember them to this day -- even some that I never used. Some of them were hard to pronounce. Pronouncing Russian is hard for the American tongue. Some of the sounds are very difficult or virtually impossible for us to duplicate -- like Chinese, for example, or Arabic. However, by drilling the words and phrases in this way, it somehow stays in your memory. That's what it was -- nine months of that. Of course, we made some progress, but we never, ever, studied Russian "grammar." We never, ever, made translations of what we studied. We could never ask the teacher, "What does it mean? What are you saying?" No, you had to say it in Russian. On the first day she would lift up a pen or pencil and say in Russian, "What is this?" Then we would move on, having no idea what the word meant. I think that we didn't have a book for two months. This was deliberate, because they wanted these sounds driven into our heads. Finally, we got a book. At the end of nine months I came out with a grade of 3-3 (Speaking - Useful, and Reading - Useful). As many of you know, 0 is none, 5 is absolutely bilingual. These numbers apply to both speaking and reading a language. I was sort of in the middle, as most of us were.

It's difficult in most of the "hard" languages, such as Russian, Chinese, Arabic, Albanian, and some others, to get a much higher score. The course in Arabic and Chinese, I think, lasts for two years, before you reach a 3-3 level. The alphabet would be completely different with Arabic, and Chinese uses characters or ideographs, but that is irrelevant. First of all, we didn't even deal with an alphabet, until we were well into the language. The Russian Cyrillic alphabet makes sense. Some of the more difficult sounds are represented in it. The FSI training system works, but it involves back-breaking effort.

Q: So it was a complete "immersion" system.

MORGAN: Total. We would use tapes at night. We got quite a bit of homework. You had your tapes, which you would take home. You played them back. Then, when we did get books, we had a text which I still have. The pages are brown with age and worn. The text "walked you through" both Cyrillic spelling and the phonetic spelling.

Q: What can you tell us about the "focus" of the language [training]? Did it all involve oral communication?

MORGAN: Yes. That's the only weak point. We complained about it. It was corrected a bit when we got to Oberammergau, which I'll tell you about in due course. A lot of the vocabulary was not "practical." It did not involve how to analyze what a visa applicant was saying or how to "deal with" a Soviet Intourist guide. It all involved things like, "Hello. How are you today?" "Oh, I must go down to the railroad," with emphasis on some of the more sophisticated but necessary parts of the complexities of the language. That is, whether this involves a "verb of motion" or parts of an automobile, in full adjectival declension!. And the grammar, of course, was simply insane. They didn't teach it as grammar, but it was there -- the complexities of the endings, the complexities of the verbs and the conjugations. While we never conjugated a verb, as we know it in the old-fashioned way of language instruction, it was all out there. The "immersion" system supposedly got you into the grammar and syntax, but some of us could never get rid of this feeling, "I would like to know the grammar and see how this verb looks when it is conjugated."

Q: How big was your class at the FSI? Did they all make it through?

MORGAN: They all made it through. We were five in the class, but never more than two or three in a given class room at any one time. We were mixed around a bit. The three persons in the class weren't always the same, though they tended to be. I think that we were assigned at first into groups. One of them included people like myself, who had "zero" knowledge of Russian. The other two had either served in Moscow as Marine Guards or, perhaps, had studied Russian in college. They had a little knowledge of Russian.

Q: What was their status -- were they all Foreign Service Officers?

MORGAN: Yes. Dick Funkhouser's specialty was in petroleum. One had served in Yugoslavia. Another one had previously served in Russia, but without the language. Another one was married to a Russian woman. He spoke some Russian. He was the first one to “break the old rule” of not serving in a communist country with close family member ties to that country.

Q: Did all of them end up in the Soviet Union at some point?

MORGAN: Yes. Some of us went directly out of the FSI and did not go to Columbia. Three of us went to the Russian Institute at Columbia:

Q: Tell us a little about why the Foreign Service wanted to send you to Columbia and why they decided not to send other people in your class to Columbia.

MORGAN: Before World War II, and definitely during World War II, when people like George Kennan went into the training program, the Department had a language and area studies program. Some of the students attending it went to a university for the language and area. By “area,” I mean the area of specialization of that particular country. Cornell, Harvard, Columbia Universities and the University of California at Berkeley were all used for Russian studies. Similar programs existed for other languages and evolved into the FSI, plus one year area studies such as the Russian one.

When it was our turn to go to the area part we were told Columbia had been picked. The year before that it may have been Harvard or Princeton. I presume this was negotiated between the Office of Personnel in the State Department and the university. Each year Personnel probably goes out and looks around at the various universities. People in the State Department still go to universities. They go for management studies, and there might still be some area studies. I believe that there isn’t a Russian language/area program any more.

Q: Can you tell me something about the courses that you took at Columbia and discuss the teachers.

MORGAN: Yes. In fact, Columbia was a high point of my career. It was a brilliant, wonderful year. The Department paid the tuition. You did not have to work for a degree, but you did have to write a paper, which I did: “Soviet Ideology and Science”. The people in the Department gave us some guidance, but they didn’t get into catalogues and say that we had to take this or that. We had to report to the Department which courses we were signing up for. We then got an “OK” on it.

The assignment covered a full academic year. We were detailed to the Russian Institute, which was, technically, our “home” at Columbia. The three of us reported to the Russian Institute together and were assigned to a “mentor” by the name of Zbigniew Brzezinski, who, at the time, was an eminent professor, or at least so proclaimed by “Zbigy,” but maybe by a few others too. He ended up as National Security Adviser with the Carter administration. With us he was very helpful and understanding. I’ll be very blunt about it. He said that he enjoyed working with us because he also had to be a mentor to some of the military. He found them very difficult at the educational and intellectual levels that he was used to. He didn’t like the military, as he proved later at the NSC.. We met with him individually and the three of us as a group once a month.

I didn't take any of my other courses with the other two FSOs except one on the Soviet system with "Zbigy." He was brilliant. He was the most impressive and practical of the instructors during that whole year. I took courses on 16th and 19th century Russian literature, a course in Russian history, under Florinsky, an eminent professor of Russian history. He "wrote the book," as it were. This course covered two semesters. I took a course in 20th century Russian/Soviet economics and another course in what amounted to Soviet ideology, under a very distinguished professor, whose name I've forgotten. I wrote my paper under him. This largely covered the period of the 1930's and 1940's, when Stalin exercised control over the sciences -- particularly sociology, to make sure that they were ideologically "pure." There were other courses which I have forgotten. However, I was free to study what I wanted. The "bottom line" for all of us was to build a body of knowledge, not only for the history, economic life, and even present day realities that affect the Soviet people, but to get a perception of the "Soviet/Russian mind." In other words, the realities of today and how they got that way. I also took a course in Eastern European history as an elective. I felt that I had to find out how the Soviet Bloc was operating.

Area studies worked! Without that year I don't know how it would have been like. However, I felt that, during my two years in Moscow and subsequent years on the Soviet desk in the State Department, I was extremely well-equipped.

Q: Tell us, then, what your feelings were toward the Soviet people and the Soviet Government -- before you went to Moscow. Do you recall that?

MORGAN: I guess, to think back to that period, I probably felt like anybody who knew anything about the Soviet Union in a primitive sense. I had done university work in French and European history, so I knew something about Russia, but it was just another "blob" up there on the map. I certainly didn't have any strong feeling about it -- except, of course, that after several years in the State Department and in USRO in particular the Soviet Union was "the enemy." However, to be able to distinguish between Russia and Russian history, civilization, and culture, and the Soviet Union -- this is what Columbia University did for me. And Brzezinski in particular. He was very good at this. I did another paper on Peter the Great's visit to France -- how he was "ripped apart" by the French and talked down to. That gave me an insight into the complexities of their feeling as "second class people" and how they learned that the world looked down on Russia. On the religious side, my own knowledge of religion in Russia was very limited.

By the time I was ready to go to the Soviet Union -- and particularly after my time in Oberammergau, which came that summer, after the end of the course at Columbia -- I really felt that I knew the Russians. I felt that I could distinguish between Soviet authoritarian dictatorship and the Ruskaya dusha, the Russian soul. Some people argue that there is no such thing as a "soul," and I was weak on communism. However, I feel that you need to know that feeling to understand fully the doings of the Russians. How you deal with it and how you take it varies with the individual. My background in French literature, history, and so on probably led me to have a greater appreciation for the history and civilization of Russia.

Q: Were you thinking about the Russian people -- how they suffered under the Soviet Government and their mentality? Were you looking beyond this Soviet mentality?

MORGAN: Well, I take your question but I can't answer it quite that way. The Soviet Government and mentality, on the one hand, and the outlook of the Russian people, on the other, are so interrelated. I think that I knew that 50 years -- really, two generations under that controlled system -- had made their impact. As a result of my area studies I learned a lot about the Soviet system; about half of my courses related to the Soviet controls and techniques. After all, the Russian people were used to living in a controlled society. The Czar obviously controlled the people, as their fathers and the church controlled their lives. I knew that the Russian people had fought against that system of control. They wrote about it, they mimicked it, and they wrote marvelous comedies about those forms of control -- especially during the 19th century. There was a Russian "drive" not to be ashamed, to stand up -- a feeling of nationalism, if you will, which goes back to the 14th and 15th centuries. There were intellectual schools of nationalism. I studied those movements and activities.. I guess that what I'm doing is twisting your question to say that it isn't a matter of distinction. It's integration, or how the Russians survived. You can ask this question today: how did the Russian people "tolerate" the Soviet system? Because it was the only way to survive. You "ratted" on your mother, if that was called for.

Q: So the Russian language training at the Foreign Service Institute and your studies at Columbia University ended in June, 1962. How did you get your orders to Moscow?

MORGAN: Again, there was the summer. We finished at Columbia in June, 1962 and were due at the Embassy in Moscow in September, 1962. Well, at the Department of State they told us that they didn't know what to do with us. Dick Funkhouser, who had been with us the year before at FSI and faced a similar issue, found out that the U. S. Army had a special "spy school," if you will, as an extension of its advanced language courses at Monterey, California. This special school was located at Oberammergau, Germany. He found out that they didn't operate in summer. So they had all of those wonderful professors there, with not a thing to do. When asked, the Army said, "You-all come." So the three of us from Columbia followed in Dick's footsteps of the year before.

Problem solved: we three went to Oberammergau for three months, with our families. It was a beautiful setting. We attended classes from 8:00 AM until, I think, 3:00 PM, or something like that. Meanwhile our wives and children enjoyed the scenery of Bavaria. We had no formal classes but rather private lessons. There was a "sea" of teachers up there, some of whom had fled very recently from the Soviet Union. They were "real" contemporary Soviets.

Q: For the record, can I humbly admit that I don't know where this Army school at Oberammergau really is. Can you say where it is and what its purpose is?

MORGAN: Oberammergau is near Garmisch-Partenkirchen in Bavaria, about 40 miles south of Munich. The center is there to "process" refugees from the Soviet Union, particularly military and intelligence types, to learn from them the most recent intelligence information on what's going on in the Soviet Union. By "intelligence," I just mean "knowledge." They would ask the refugees, "What's it like on the farm? What were you doing, what do you think of the regime," and many other questions. It was run by U. S. Army intelligence, but I presume that the other services had access to the product. It was basically gathering "background" information. These people, men and women, had defected from the Soviet Union. They were refugees and somehow had gotten across the Iron Curtain. They were “picked up” by the U. S. Army and interrogated and, in some cases, put on the faculty at this center. Some ended up as language tutors, but at the advanced level. All of the U.S. military students were there for, I think, two years. They start with zero knowledge of Russian. The Army gave us this summer deal because the professors were available.

Q: So Oberammergau is not only a refugee processing center. It is also a language center for U. S. personnel.

MORGAN: Yes, but let me state it differently. It is not really a “refugee processing center” in the sense that the INS (Immigration and Naturalization Service) is involved.

Q: It is an intelligence processing center.

MORGAN: Yes. It involves bringing together refugees who possess military and general intelligence. As you know, that can involve anything about the contemporary USSR. It largely concerns “attitudinal” information. Army intelligence personnel interrogated these people. That was the purpose of this center. The Army’s Russian language training school was part of it. I don’t know whether it began as that.

As “teachers” for the three of us, they had no curriculum, no texts or the like. I sat down with one of them. He said, “What can I now tell you about live in the USSR?” Each of us had our own tutors.. The U.S. director of the Oberammergau center would say, “This instructor has just arrived, and I think that she’ll be good at talking to you about life in Moscow.” They would do anything that you asked them to do. I told them that I was going to the American Embassy in Moscow, that it was my first assignment there, and that I would be Publications Procurement Officer.

I said to one of them, “Teach me the practical Russian -- language and mannerisms I need to survive and get the job done successfully.. He answered (in Russian. None of them spoke any English): I will be rude to you”. I will be just like the clerk that is going to be in the bookstore. I will be like the KGB [Soviet intelligence] officer trailing you. Actually, that was my job before I defected. I will do all these things to you.” He knew a great deal of “street” Russian and the kind of Russian which, he said, “will turn their ears onto you.” And he actually did that for most of those three months. Above all, this gave me confidence that I could step off the plane in Moscow and really walk into that situation. He told me story after story. He had lived in Moscow for a while and in other places which I subsequently visited. He was able to show me what the Soviet Union was really like, using his heart and tears. Yes, “tears.” He had had to leave his family behind. He was a wonderful man. He would tell stories about the realities of the Soviet Union. Back at the FSI and Columbia, the teachers were great, but they were academics in their approach.

Q: Can you remember any of the stories he told you?

MORGAN: Not specifically at the moment. He would tell me story after story -- when you walk along the street, when you get on a bus, when you walk into a store. He would say, “Don’t do this. Do that.” I am reflecting back on the full two years of training: my year at the FSI and the year at Columbia when my wife and children stayed back here in Washington. I rented a room in a house owned by a Russian couple. I took Russian lessons from them and spoke only Russian with them. But that Russian was, of course, "Czarist Russian," because they had been refugees from "White" Russia back in the 1920's. The Russian I spoke would make my teacher at Oberammergau laugh his head off. He said, "They don't speak that way any more. It sounds ridiculous the way you say it." And then there were the acronyms and special words used in contemporary, Soviet society. I learned them from him, thank Heavens..

Q: I asked that because before, when I was in the Soviet Union, there were several stories that stuck in my mind. They were my first, real life and personal impressions.

MORGAN: Well, you are younger and closer to that time when you were in the Soviet Union. I am trying to remember what happened 25 or 30 years ago.

Q: Well, did you work with any of the refugees?

MORGAN: No.

Q: It was strictly at the school?

MORGAN: Well, the teachers at the school were all refugees. This man I have spoken of was a refugee -- or defector, if you wish. I use the word "refugee" to mean someone who had "fled", sought refuge from the Soviet Union for a variety of reasons -- political or personal or whatever. They were refugees in that sense.

Q: Did you ever witness any of the interrogations or debriefings?

MORGAN: No. You see, nothing was going on during the summer we were there. The school was closed when we were there. The U.S. and most of the Soviets faculty was on vacation. However, when they weren't on vacation, there they sat, with absolutely nothing to do. The U. S. taxpayers -- you and me -- were paying their salaries. The Army welcomed being able to put them to work. We could do anything that we wanted to do, as long as we showed up with our mentor.

Q: Did you live off base?

MORGAN: Yes, just off base -- about a quarter of a mile down the road. The Base was in the country, not in a regular town. The hotel we lived in was a regular Bavarian picturesque place. It even had nasturtiums hanging from each balcony.

Q: Then orders came in. At what point did you know that you were going to Moscow?

MORGAN: I knew that from the very beginning. When I was assigned to Russian language and area training, there was a whole "block" order issued, covering everything, including the actual assignment to Moscow.

Q: Why did the Foreign Service wait from June until September, 1962? You finished your language study at the Foreign Service Institute and your training at Columbia in June.

MORGAN: September, 1962 was when my predecessor, Herb Okun, was leaving Moscow. We were all replacing other people, and we replaced them when they left Moscow. I think that we probably “overlapped” for a short time. We got to Moscow in late August, and Herb Okun left in early September. Also, there was the matter of housing. You had to have a place to stay, so you had to get your predecessor out of the apartment so you could move in, after a repainting job!.

***

Q: May we come to Moscow now? May I ask about your immediate impressions of the Soviet Union, if you can remember them, on your first arrival?

MORGAN: First impressions, above all, I will never forget. My wife, children, and I were met by the Embassy driver.

Q: Did you fly in on a commercial flight?

MORGAN: Let me think. We flew from Munich to Vienna, then Aeroflot from Vienna to Moscow, non-stop. About the only way you could get into Moscow in those days was from Vienna. There was no Pan Am or any other commercial airline service available. Maybe there was a flight available from Paris, but I can’t remember it.

It was an afternoon flight. We got off the plane about 7:00 or 8:00 PM. It was a Sunday night, as I remember. It had to be a Sunday night. It was dark by the time we were through the formalities. I think that Peter Bridges from the Embassy came to the airport and met us. We took the apartment for temporary visitors in a part of the Embassy where the Marine Guards and the DCM lived. There were four or five apartments like this when we first arrived. Peter Bridges, his wife, and children were in the adjoining apartment. He brought us up to our apartment and then brought us over to theirs for drinks and to meet his wife, and kids-on-kids. At that point, after this nice, warm welcome, and the feeling you get in the Foreign Service or any other organization, where people take care of their colleagues, we looked out at the skies of Moscow. On our way into Moscow we drove past the Kremlin and through Red Square. We had a nice view of Moscow, which was lighted. There was a tremendous display of fireworks. The skies were just filled with flares and sounds.. Well, it wasn’t for us, of course. Every Sunday night the Soviets have fireworks. So our first arrival in Moscow was just fine.

Q: Did you have any trouble going through customs?

MORGAN: No.

Q: Did you have a diplomatic passport?

MORGAN: Yes. I don’t remember any delays. I’m sure that if there had been any, I would recall. If my wife were here, she would remember more particularly, I’m sure. After what I had heard about the bureaucracy and the heaviness, I thought, “My God, Are we really in the Soviet Union?”

Q: How did your children feel?

MORGAN: The kids couldn't have cared less. They were about 10 and 7 years old. They wondered who their new friends would be and where their new school was. I should have asked my son that question before I came here today. He should remember those early days because a few weeks later we moved into our assigned apartment. The very first word of Russian that he learned was “durok”, the Russian word for “stupid” or “idiot,” as you know. That's what a Russian “neighbor” kid said in the courtyard of the apartment building when he hit my son over the head with a brick! I saw my son scraping up the stairs with blood running down his face. He said that a Russian kid had called him “durok.” My son asked its meaning; it was his first serious encounter with Soviet society.

As new arrivals we were waiting for our Finnish maid to arrive and getting ourselves together. Of course, I went to work at the Embassy. My wife was well taken care of by other Embassy wives. She did the rounds and met people.

Q: Do we still have the same Embassy?

MORGAN: Yes, it's in the old building on Tchaikovsky Street..

Q: It's a very nice building.

MORGAN: That's a real joke. It's a dump! I mean, you're crowded. It's a small place.

Q: It's very crowded. When I visited the Embassy three years ago, the space for the Visa Section was extremely crowded.

MORGAN: Very poor conditions. I think that it's changed.

Q: The Soviets who were waiting for visas said that the conditions are terrible.

MORGAN: A few years ago the Soviet authorities dismissed all of the Russian employees. So the Embassy until recently has had none of the support staff to help us in communicating with and doing the staff work necessary to process the visa applicants. Let me interrupt this train of thought to make a point clear. I'm not sure how long this was the personnel policy before and after me, but during my time in Moscow all junior and mid-level Foreign Service Officers who had gone through the Russian language and area courses and were then assigned to the Embassy in Moscow got, with very few exceptions, two different work assignments during their tour.. They had one year in one Section and one year in another. For most of us the first year was in the Administrative, Consular, or Publications Procurement Section. I was in Publications Procurement. Then, during the second year, you were assigned to the Political or Economic Sections, depending on your background. My second year was spent in the Political Section. If you went to Moscow as the Science Officer, a highly specialized assignment, it was different. For example, Dick Funkhouser was the Economic Counselor during his whole tour. If you were assigned as DCM, that's what you were. But most of us had come into the Russian program at the junior or middle level and went to Moscow as middle level officers. There was nobody below us. That was the program, and I thought that I should make that clear.

Q: All right. Where did you live and what kind of Embassy regulations did you live under -- from Personnel? And what kind of Soviet regulations were you subject to?

MORGAN: We had two main apartment houses some distance from the Embassy: at Sorok pyat (45) Leninsky Prospekt, the one we were assigned to, and another similar one whose name I forget. The Soviets assigned us the space, as they did all foreigners living in Moscow. They were supposedly "new, modern buildings.", but that was all: "new".

Our building was a nine-story shaft, in the sense that it had one staircase up the middle of our wing of this enormous U-shaped monster. Everyone on that "shaft" was from the American Embassy, with the exception of maybe one or two American correspondents. One of them was really a reputedly KGB "employee" named Ed Stevens, who lived on one of the lower floors. There were two apartments on each floor. Each family was there for two years, coincidentally with their tours of duty. Our neighbors were the Perrys, Kirks, Semlers, Morans and others. We were all good friends and neighbors. You better be under those circumstances.

Of course, there was a big, ever-alert guard at the entrance. Allegedly there to protect us (from whom?), no one else could come in but us or other authorized diplomats. Additionally, we had a so-called concierge on the ground floor. Since she helped us in no way I presumed she was just the secondary line of defense to make sure that we didn't do anything "unauthorized or unobserved". Her main function was to suffer our curses as we went by her whenever the elevator didn't work -- which was frequently. We lived on the ninth floor. It seemed that the elevator never worked on what we called "commissary days" when the Embassy Commissary received a shipment of milk, lettuce, and fresh vegetables, which came in from Finland. That would be the day when we would come home with huge cases of groceries which lasted a couple of weeks, at least. But the elevators wouldn't work, due to "technical difficulties."

On our last day in Moscow, we were all ready to leave for good. Our kids and suitcases were out at the elevator -- and, of course, it didn't work. So down we went, lugging our bags and baggage. Of course, now, there is a procedure to go through on your way out. This was a happy moment. The concierge was there, grinning. We said goodbye. I said that the elevator still wasn't working. I had to give her my last words in impeccable Russian: "You got to the moon, but you can't even get an elevator to the ninth floor! So that was my farewell to the USSR. Smell a little bit of paranoia?..."

Q: As an anecdote, you said that you had an American correspondent in your building who was really a KGB agent?

MORGAN: Yes, reportedly

Q: What paper did he represent?

MORGAN: He was one of the top correspondents. I think that he represented the AP Associated Press, or perhaps it was a British paper.. We all suspected that he was a KGB agent. There has been some discussion about this in recent months about an American correspondent who was in Moscow for a number of years. He was accused by "Time" magazine of being a KGB agent. Then came Warren Zimmermann's (DCM at the time), and our Department's responses, in part, to that. Everyone serving in Moscow gets a share of his information from people who are tied into the KGB in some way. The KGB is one of the best sources of information. Does that make you an "agent"? If you know about your source you make allowances for it. We, in the Embassy, more or less knew who is what, though not always.

Another news agency American was Shapiro who had been in Moscow for 30 or 40 years. He was considered reliable. How can you survive that? How can you be tolerated in the Soviet Union and have that kind of knowledge -- and not have some sort or another of a connection with the KGB? But I think that Ed Stevens, by the way, "alluded" that he was closely tied with the KGB. But an "agent," using KGB information, often was spreading "disinformation," along with good information. Such an agent is probably paid, just as the CIA (Central Intelligence Agency) has people who are recruited to provide information and at times disseminate some. However, Stevens, as I remember when I was in the Political Section, was known as a source of potentially flawed information.

Q: Did you ever have any social contact with him?

MORGAN: Yes. He was at cocktail parties I went to, and I saw him about our apartment "shaft". He was not a "friend" in any real sense. Also, correspondents live a different life than diplomats do. They are always after different stories, which ultimately appear in the media or publications. At the time I was in Moscow the American community was very small. It was just about limited to correspondents and diplomats. There was also a delightful American Catholic priest whose position had been there since the time of Litvinov-Roosevelt agreements in the early 1930's. There were no resident businessmen, apart from an American Express representative. However, I think that even he was a Russian national. I don't think that he was an American. So, we "fed" on each other -- and still do. Correspondents are marvelous sources of information.

Q: Could you tell us a little bit more about the demographics of the foreign community there and, in particular, the American community, and their role?

MORGAN: I can't give you the number of people in the foreign community. There must have been about 50 or more full-fledged embassies. They were there for their own reasons. The British, the French -- the NATO embassies, if you will -- were there as normal embassies in the capital of an "enemy" country, the Soviet Union. The Ambassadors of these NATO countries would get together and have regular meetings. The people in the British, French, and Canadian Embassies were probably our closest social and professional contacts. We got together for cocktail parties and small dinners. They were small because our apartments were small. You could get six or eight people in our dining room for dinner, and that was it. You could have a "stand up" cocktail party or buffet, and there were an awful lot of them. As a matter of fact -- and I am now rather "picky" about it -- that was probably, believe it or not, one of the greatest pressures on us in those two years in Moscow. This way of life meant going out an awful lot -- for personal and professional survival. Just to be able to talk to people. Also, you needed to exchange information with people. You needed to tell stories, just plain old stories about life. These social contacts provided a means to “let loose.” In a very closed society, that is what you have to do. This is how you can be human.

Also, to get back to your question as to what it’s like to live in the Soviet Union, given Russian history and authoritarian realities. Some foreigners lived there for a number of years. Some of them were really “bilingual” or even “multilingual.” Press people would show up on these occasions, but it was usually American Embassy functions within the Embassy or with other diplomats. There were rarely Soviets who showed up, and if so, very “authorized” bureaucrats. You rarely tried to invite Soviets to your house. The chances were “zero” that they would show up. We had acceptances from Soviet acquaintances, but practically never had the honor of their coming. Of course to Spaso House, the Ambassador’s residence was something different. But he also never was certain who would arrive at the front door. We in attendance had fun guessing who’d come to his affairs.

My wife had one special experience. If I may diverge here, I will mention this because it was to us a very special example of the realities of the Soviet Union. I was on a trip to Central Asia shortly after President Kennedy was assassinated in November, 1963. When I came back, my wife said that she had had a phone call. She knew well that she had to be careful about her calls, which might be harassing KGB calls to shake her up while I was absent. They are seldom from friendly Russians who are calling to find out what the price of eggs is in New York. Although Russians lived in other wings of this huge enclave of perhaps 200 apartments, some with more than one family to an apartment, they didn’t dare to contact you directly, unless authorized. You might look out the window, see a funeral, and realize that one of them had died. However, you never had any direct contact with ordinary Soviets. That was a near impossibility.

My wife received one of these rare telephone calls. We knew that it had been “taped,” as all of our phones were. The man concerned was a young Russian in tears. He wanted to know how saddened he was by Kennedy’s assassination and that most Russians felt as he did. I came on the phone and he went on and on, recalling how he and my wife had met and he wanted us to know how ashamed he was of the Soviet control system and had been caught up in it when he had accepted a dinner invitation to our house some months before.

He had actually met my wife when I was away on a trip the previous summer. She was out with the children at the diplomatic, or almost totally diplomatic beach on the Moscow River, where the Soviets allowed us to swim. This man came up to her as she was reading a James Bond novel. He started speaking to her in English. It was most unusual in itself that such a contact would be made. It was a beach scene, and there are no “barriers” around the area. However, ordinary Soviets don’t go there. If a Russian went there, he would be picked up by the police. They would be interrogated and asked, “What are you doing?” Probably, they would just be whisked away.

So she was approached by this fellow who spoke quite good English. It ended up that she gave him our telephone number. He called again, a few days later, while I was still away. My wife said, “Come on over.” He said that he would like to come over. When I returned to Moscow, we set up a date for him to drop in for a drink and have dinner. I even called him back on the phone so that the Soviet authorities would know about it and that is was totally on the up and up. He said that he had been told that he could not accept but he had asked for reconsideration. So we thought that he must be a KGB officer. We even arranged to have him picked up by an American Embassy car. This was so above board We even learned more about who he was -- a writer of some sort. The bottom line of all of this is that the driver went to pick him up, and there was no such address whatsoever. The whole thing had vanished. It really upset my wife.

Back to you question about the diplomatic community. While the most numerous ties contacts were with representatives of the Scandinavian and NATO countries, we also had contacts with the Indians, Indonesians, Arabs, and so on. Many of these colleagues had their own special functions to perform. India's mission, for example, had its special relations with the Soviets. The Arabs were something else, but most had particular issues to pursue because of their geographical proximity to the USSR and that they were largely Third-World, trying to maintain a balance with the West and the Communist world.

The African countries had "Lumumba University," established by the Soviets to teach the African people of newly free nations, how "evil" the capitalist countries were, and particularly the United States, and how wonderful the Soviet system was. These students went back to their own countries, fully trained in Russian and in Russian techniques and ideology. These countries obviously had somewhat different kinds of diplomatic missions than we did. Most of these non-NATO and non-Western embassies were there to make sure that the Soviet Union was not harming them but, rather, was giving them support. The Cuban mission obviously had a very special relationship with the Soviets. Once in front of our apartment there was a very dramatic, special parade. Groups were assembled by bus loads to applauded Fidel Castro with great gusto. After he went by, calm returned and away they went in the organized buses..

I can't leave this story without telling you about the special "access" these non-Western diplomats had to Soviet sources. Their apartments were often filled with exceptional works of Russian art and pre-Revolutionary antiques. I remember we were once invited by the Second Secretary of the Indonesian Embassy to come to dinner. There were just my wife and I and he and his wife present. Very soon after we arrived and had had drinks, he took us back to his spare bedroom. It was covered, top to bottom, and all over the floor with magnificent, really "genuine" 13th to 19th century Russian religious ikons. There were paintings -- forbidden paintings under the Soviet system -- by contemporary, "impressionist" Russian artists. They were "good buys" -- very good buys. When you left the Soviet Union, you could sell anything that you wanted -- your car, for example, and the kind of "junk" that you wanted to get rid of at a yard sale, for example. Only embassy people came -- from most of the Arab countries, India, Indonesia, etc. They "swarmed" through our apartment. They took my clothes out of the closets. They would give me almost any price I asked. They were prepared to buy everything that we had, except that, obviously, we didn't want to sell most of it. The Sudanese ambassador bought my beat-up old British Ford! So this was one aspect of the "unique" nature of Moscow society among the Diplomatic Corps.

Q: Did you use the diplomatic community as a source of information, say diplomats from the non-aligned countries, for example?

MORGAN: Yes, indeed. But they were very poorly informed. Most of what they had in the way of basic political and economic information came from us. We were trained, we were the experts, we were the major power. They knew that, even though Moscow and Washington were at odds, what we were told and how we were told it, was significant to them. It probably was useful to them. Now, how reliable they were as sources of information to us was another question.. That didn't mean that there were not well-informed, professional and intelligent people among them. However, you had to be careful. Were they in the pay of the KGB or even innocently passing on to us disinformation? The amount of useful, reliable information which you could obtain from them was surprisingly limited. Some, of course, had deep ties -- family and other -- into the Soviet society. Some had lived there for years. Others had a abetter life in Moscow than in their own countries.

Q: I should have asked this question before we began to discuss your time in Moscow. Did you have any kind of special security training before you went to Moscow -- on how to behave, the KGB, and so forth?

MORGAN: Oh, yes. "Training" probably is too formal a word. I don't remember that there was any course which you attended for a week or so. We did have to go through a security briefing given by SY (Office of Security). We were warned that we would be followed and that the Soviets would try to get us to "defect." They talked about Soviet KGB "methodology". But this was the kind of the thing that you would have picked up anyway by reading the "Washington Post." It wasn't any particular kind of "inside" information. The security people, for example, finally discovered the place where all of the tapping of the Embassy was done. One day the "Seabees"...

Q: What's a "Seabee"?

MORGAN: A "Seabee" is an engineering, plumbing, technical, or electronic specialist from a Navy Construction Battalion on loan to the State Department for construction work in the American Embassy in Moscow. The American Embassy building had been built during the Stalin era. Stalin couldn't abide the fact that our previous building had been practically under the Kremlin Wall. He wanted to get us away from Red Square and gave us this building on the Ring Road, Ulitsa Tchaikovskogo. It was reportedly "built" for us, but in fact was constructed for VIP Soviet authorities. It was a nine story apartment type building in a nice district between the Moscow River and the Kremlin, with a big courtyard. It would have been a great residence for senior officials of the Communist Party. Therefore, the building was already totally "bugged" with electronic listening devices, since above all the KGB had to listen in on their own leaders. From Stalin's point of view the building was perfect for us. It was making Stalin's dream come true, because it got us out of Red Square and into a well "surveyed" embassy. So in the late 1940's or early 1950's, I think it was, the Embassy moved to the building on Tchaikovsky Street, which, as I said, was all nicely "bugged." We knew that. We knew that something was wrong. The telephones in those days, as you probably know -- they're more sophisticated now -- were a wonderful source of information for the Soviets, because the telephone lines belonged to the Soviet Union. Their wires ran right down to your desk, and the phones made wonderful "speakers." Actually, the "speaker" was the telephone itself, because the "vibrator" on the telephone takes your voice and converts it into minuscule vibrations. If you send these vibrations into the telephone wires, an electronic device can reconvert them into the words you actually use. But they can't make elevators work effectively! It's a matter of priorities.

What we did was to "unplug" the telephones by installing a kind of "circuit breaker" between the telephone instrument and the telephone wire. That broke the circuit, so that the sounds that came through the telephone could not get easily into the telephone lines, and the Soviets could no longer "tap" the telephones. For a long time we had known that they were doing this and probably had other tapping devices built into the building. We knew they were actively trying to listen in to our conversations because you could see them doing it. I could look out my office window and see on top of the adjoining building some but not all of the equipment they were using. We knew what they were doing. Once in a while we could see someone "fiddling around" with the machinery up there on top of the roof.

Q: Do you remember the church across the street from the Embassy?

MORGAN: Yes, in the back.

Q: I was told that the church was completely taken over by the KGB.

MORGAN: Oh, I am sure of that. Also, the building across the street and in front of the Embassy a big apartment/office building and obviously was being used by the Internal Security Forces. What I'm getting at is that we knew that there was an "inner" listening system, in our building, but we couldn't find it. The Seabees came in while I was there. Behind my free standing, hot water radiator they found the first evidence of where the listening devices of the "inner" listening system were. They ripped out the radiator and went at it. What they discovered was that behind the radiator, to make it harder to find the listening device behind it, was a pinhole. The Seabees found it because the paint job wasn't very good behind the radiator and they used "sound waves" beamed through the whole Embassy wiring system. Out came the first metal, straw shaped device about six inches long. That went into a total wiring system buried in the middle of the walls throughout the entire Embassy. So the Seabees went through the Embassy, ripping out entire walls and uncovering this system. But that story is a long way from your question about security training I was given!

Q: I asked you whether you had been warned and briefed about security before you went to Moscow.

MORGAN: Well, we knew or learned things like that. We also knew that we were being followed, we knew that the intention was to get me to "defect" to the Soviets and tell them all my secrets -- which I didn't have!

Q: Were you ever "approached" by the KGB?

MORGAN: Oh, yes. During my first year as a Publications Procurement Officer...Shall I tell you now about the two jobs I had in the Embassy in Moscow? Would that fit in now?

Q: Yes, why not describe your work, and then we can work around to the security aspect. You started work in the Embassy in Moscow in September, 1962, as a Publications Procurement Officer.

MORGAN: Right. There were two of us -- Bob German and I. The briefings before I left Washington were at the CIA, the Library of Congress, and so on.

Q: This was a briefing on how to do your job?

MORGAN: Yes. The job, publications procurement, was exactly that. I bought books and periodicals. In those days -- and from the beginning of our diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union in the 1930's, through World War II, and since then -- the PPO job was probably the single most important source of intelligence about the Soviet Union. (PPO is obviously the acronym.) This was because our contacts with anti-Soviet agents and defectors in and from the Soviet Union were limited. As you know, the entire world of the CIA and other such agencies is to decide what is good intelligence, what is important, and what goes to the President. What is decided on the basis of such information is another matter. The Penkovsky Affair was the big spy/intelligence story of our time, or at least my tour there. In fact, my colleague, Bob German, was accused of being involved in that case. I'll get back to that later.

The publications procurement job involves going out and buying a copy of every new book that you could lay your hands on published in the Soviet Union, "period". We called this "WF," a not so terribly secret acronym for the funds given us by the CIA. It stood for the "Working Fund," and the Soviets must have known this. We had a delightful Russian national packer down in the Embassy storage area. He would bundle up books for us, once a week, to be shipped out by diplomatic pouch. He must have known the purpose of his labors and the source of his salary, or should I say salaries. That's how we shipped the books out to 19 agencies, as I remember, in the U. S. Government. The principal customer was "WF." They (the CIA) paid all of the bills, then, back in Washington, the various agencies would resettle the accounts. The second biggest customer was the Library of Congress. The Library of Congress wanted a copy of every new book, magazine, newspaper and map published in the Soviet Union, except novels! They would scold me if I sent them a novel by mistake.

Q: Would it affect their color scheme?

MORGAN: I would like to accept that as the rationale, but I don't think that was the reason. Other customers included the Library of the State Department, the Department of Defense, and other major U. S. Government agencies. I can't remember which ones they were in those days, but agencies concerned with the environment, education, and so forth. So all I had to do was to settle my accounts a month later or so with the "Working Fund," and then the other Washington agencies settled the bills with "WF"..

The actual modus operandi was that Bob German and I would divide up the Soviet Union. We would make trips to every single republic and to Siberia. One or the other of us were on the road, most of the time. Usually a given trip lasted for about a week. We would go to the capitals of the various Soviet republics, because we were pretty much restricted by the authorities from going anywhere else. They wouldn't let us into smaller places -- and certainly not to the more interesting places. Leningrad was, thank Heavens, one of the exception.

In Moscow, Bob or I went to Bookstore No. 1 every Monday. We had a marvelous relationship with the lady there who ran the shop. She said to us once, "You help me to fulfill my monthly quota!" She loved us. She set books aside for us, as did many of the other, specialized bookstores in Moscow, and particularly the Map Library. We had a special, and very good contract with the U.S. Army Map Service. In turn, we had a special arrangement with the guy at the Map Store in Moscow. He knew where his maps were going, but he could meet his quota with our help. He would curse us for buying maps by the dozens to ship to "the enemy", but then grin an appreciation whenever Bob or I would go into his store, and Bob or I would do quite often. The Map Store had a different name in Leningrad, now St. Petersburg.

However, in Moscow the principal outlet was Bookstore No. 1 -- I can't remember the full name in Russian. When the bookstore lady got in a shipment of new books, she always set aside one copy for us. I would arrive at the shop and go back to her office. She would pull out of a cupboard stacks -- sometimes 100 or several hundred -- new books. I would take every one of those books. In pencil, up in the corner I would put 0, 5, 15, 100 or whatever. Mentally, I had to figure out which of my "customers" wanted this particular book, and how many copies. What I did was to turn to the back of the book, look at the "tirage" -- number of copies published -- and thereby whether this was a relatively "rare" or limited publication book.

Q: The term is "the number of books in print."

MORGAN: Yes. Then I had to be careful. If I took all 100 copies of the book, then she would say, "I can't do that, because I have to provide this to this or that other customer." So you had to figure out how to settle this. Our "coup" the book by a Soviet general -- Sokolov, as I remember -- on new Soviet nuclear power strategy. Somehow, this book got through the distribution system and was published. The U. S., military, and others at home, went wild about that one. We bought about 300 copies of it over a period of time. It was "the" document used by the U. S. military for years as "the Bible" as far as our relationship was with the Soviets in terms of our nuclear power interface. That is just an example. The Russians were very precise. They don't "lie" unless they have to, for some ideological reason. They are proud of their scientific research, their map making, and all of this. So we knew that what we were buying was pretty good stuff -- unless it was deliberately intended to mislead us.

But that's the way we did our job. We marked the copies. Then the bookseller might say, "Oh, I only have 10 copies. I don't have the 20 copies you want." Then she'd say, "Why do you want 20 copies? Who back there [in the United States wants 20 copies?]" And she'd laugh. She couldn't care less.

I would go to other bookstores, although less often, all over Moscow and the Soviet Union. I went to Leningrad, probably every two months. Kiev we did every two or three months. The Dom Knigi (House of Books) in Leningrad had the same arrangement with us as Book Store No. 1, in Moscow. They loved to have us come, and were even more friendly and less "heavy". The farther you were from Moscow, the more relaxed the booksellers were and the more they enjoyed it -- with some exceptions, and that's where the KGB came in. They knew what we were doing but they didn't dare stop us. If they did, we could, although to a less effective degree, pull down the curtains in the U. S. on them and make their purchasing of U. S. books more difficult. I hope that they knew in their heart of hearts that their information, which we were getting, was far more valuable than what they could get out of public sources in the U. S.

To go back to your question about the context and atmosphere of our trips during my first year in Moscow as PPO, that was where Bob German was caught. "Caught" is the wrong word, but that's what happened, in connection with the Penkovsky story. Bob was publicly named as having been in a certain bookstore, taking information from Penkovsky. It was in the newspapers as part of the material bought up at Penkovsky's "trial," at which Penkovsky was found guilty and subsequently executed. I was not included as one of the "evil" Pops. We concluded German was singled out in order to blacken or at least throw suspicion on our book-buying and perhaps caution our book store helpers.

Q: For our readers, could you give us a brief overview of the Penkovsky affair?

MORGAN: Yes. Penkovsky was a Soviet military officer who defected to us "inside" the Soviet Union. Those who defect decide that they wish to associate themselves with the United States or another country. Those who stay in their country are the greatest sources of intelligence because they remain "plugged into" the system. He was a Soviet Air Force officer, I believe, although I am not sure. It doesn't matter. He was high enough up to have access to some very interesting material at the time of the Cuban missile crisis in 1962. This relationship with Penkovsky lasted over a period of years. Our Embassy doctor was an Air Force officer. I don't think he was the CIA Chief of Station. Anyway, he was the principal contact with Penkovsky, "under the lights and by the bridge" as was reported in the Soviet press. The "doctor" was PNGed -- declared Persona Non Grata -- and kicked out of the Soviet Union.

What the KGB caught Penkovsky on was passing information over a lengthy period of time. But the most significant thing was that he -- as I understand it, though not from my own sources but from the newspapers -- was the principal source for information about Cuba over the years regarding what the Soviets were going to do and how they were going to do it. This climaxed after the Cuban missile crisis in 1962.

Q: Did you ever meet him?

MORGAN: No. Good gracious, no American ever met him! That would be denied categorically. Americans assigned to go to the "lamp post" may have met him, but...

Q: What does that mean, "go to the lamp post"?

MORGAN: That's where they exchanged information and money, the traditional -- or at least written in spy novels, and Pravda -- way in which espionki (espion agents) do their business. They do it in a mail box, or by lamp poles, "under the bush," or something like that.

Q: You said that Bob German was approached by the KGB?

MORGAN: No. Well, no more than I was, in terms of being roughed up by some huge guy behind you. Harassment.

Q: Tell us a little bit about the harassment.

MORGAN: Well, middle of the night telephone calls. You're all set to go on a trip, and it's canceled. You go to the train station to catch a train, and you're not allowed to board it. Your permission has been canceled.

Q: When you say "harassment by telephone," what are we talking about?

MORGAN: Things like telephone calls at unusual hours and "heavy breathing." We used to get those at our apartment frequently, and in patterns. People would come to our apartment.

This story was not exactly harassment aimed at me, but I put it into the general Soviet anti-US antics. I was called in the middle of the night by the Embassy Duty Officer since I was on the Embassy fire team or its housing group. The story given me was that the building was on fire. One of our Marine Guards, who should have known better, had his replacement or a new Marine on duty for the first night. The new Marine was brand new to Moscow and, poorly briefed, assigned to burn the classified waste for the day. The place that you burned the classified material was up in the Embassy building attic. The poor guy burned the material in the wrong place. He actually started his fire next to the open ventilation system of the entire Embassy. Flames and smoke were going through the vents. Well, we had to call the police and finally called the fire department. That's when I was called in. Several other officers of the Embassy and I stood there, preventing the Fire Department from getting into where they wanted to go, which was the Code Room. They kept insisting, "The fire is back here on this level." We kept saying, "It's upstairs! You can see it up there. That's where the flames are."

Q: You kept them from entering which building?

MORGAN: We prevented the Soviet firemen and other "authorities" from going into that part of the Embassy where the Code Room was, which is where they really wanted to go. They used every ruse (I wonder where we got that word?) they could to say that the fire was back there. They said, "That's where the water system is." We kept saying, "No, the fire is up in the attic." And then the firemen proceeded to put the fire out. I think that we could have as effectively put the fire out. Of course, the Marine Guard involved was on the next plane out of the Soviet Union.

Q: Was anyone in the Embassy, to the best of your knowledge, ever "roughed up"?

MORGAN: Yes, or poisoned, which was one of the principal ways of doing it.

Q: Tell us about it.

MORGAN: Say you are on a trip. You have dinner. You always travel in pairs -- like nuns. Someone slips something into your food. When I say "poison," it can be anything. You wake up in the middle of the night and wish you were dead -- in pain and so forth. It never happened to me, but to several of those with me at the time. My "misadventures" of that sort were in Eastern Europe. In Romania I had a woman come into my shower to proposition me.. That's the closest I came to being poisoned!

I would say that almost every U. S. military officer, who traveled all the time, has had an experience with poisoning or drugging. And often the whole party of who were together, sometimes other NATO attachés They were traveling in areas that were very "questionable." Their Soviet counterparts wanted to discourage them from such trips, or just simple harassment.

Q: How can they be sure that it is "poisoning"?

MORGAN: You often can't be sure, which is why they the Soviets did it they way they did..

Q: What I meant was that when I was traveling in the Soviet Union, I personally suffered from food poisoning several times.

MORGAN: They know the way to do it! Or how about just plain bad food?

Q: They got me that time.

MORGAN: You don't know, nor did we always know. You often can't prove anything. By the time they get to our own doctor, so that the contents of their stomach can be analyzed, they're "clean" -- they're purged. I don't know of anybody that died in one of these "drugging: episodes. But the object is to intimidate and/or ultimately to "get through" to you. They try to find out your weaknesses -- whether sexual, or you can't stand to be around mice, or whatever. They do their best to "turn" you psychologically. Then, at the right time, they make the right offer to you, or simple blackmail. I'm rather proud of saying that none of them ever succeeded in "turning" a Foreign Service Officer, or at least in Moscow. The "forces" did get through to one in Warsaw, using sex. Some of us didn't do as well. After you read the latest "spy" novel, or even non-fiction, you wonder whether the effort was worth all the resources that the KGB put in, particularly when they profited so seldom their efforts. But then, every Ames is worth it to them, as Penkovsky was to us..

In fact, the easiest target is one who is ideologically favorable to the Soviet Union, or just needs the money. That happened in a number of cases in the 1930's and 1940's, in the early days when communism seemed an attractive alternative to capitalism. But usually, like the Ames case, it's a matter of money, sex, or greed. Another motivation is that somebody is "mad" at his boss. The KGB would work on that. They would come across such a fact, and use it. Or they would try to trap your wife in some weakness or indiscretion; they would try to find something that would cause you to "step over the line."

In most cases the harassment, including drugging, is intended to keep you "on edge" and to let you know who's "in control, the boss." Let you know whose country you are in.

Q: What sort of regulations were you subjected to from the Soviet as well as the American side?

MORGAN: The Soviet side was easy. The number one technique was to use travel controls.

Q: What was that, specifically?

MORGAN: You couldn't travel more than 25 kilometers, I think it was -- or 40 kilometers outside of Moscow without Soviet permission. You couldn't travel to certain areas at all -- prohibited zones. A large part of Moscow and the "open areas" were also off limits. You couldn't take a trip without the permission of the UPRK (Upravleniye po Diplomaticheskoy Korpusom -- Office of the Diplomatic Corps), a branch of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, but really run by the KGB. So travel was a primary and specific means of control.

Q: Tell us about the procedures you would have to go through to get that permission.

MORGAN: You went first to one of our Foreign Service Nationals, Yelena, in our personnel office. A charming, highly qualified FSN, who we understood to be a Lt. Colonel in the KGB.. She would get you tickets to the Bolshoi ballet and various special cultural programs. She would do all of these "wonderful" things for you, like half a pint jar (you brought the jar) of Black Beluga caviar for $25, or was it $15?. Only she could do them. You couldn't go down to the Bolshoi Theater and buy, say, three tickets. I could try. Sometimes it worked but usually it didn't, especially if the box office found out you were a diplomat. She'd get tickets when nobody else could get tickets. So you used her. However, incidentally, she also took all travel itineraries when she got the tickets.

May I interrupt to tell a story. I was tutoring, doing some teaching, at the fourth grade of my grammar school behind my house where I now live in Alexandria, Virginia.. I had two Russian kids in the class -- one from St. Petersburg, and the other one from Moscow. The parents of both of them came to the school for a "show and tell" night. One of the fathers came up to me and chatted at great length. He was asking me about my time in Moscow. I mentioned the UPRK. He said, "Ah, I was a junior diplomat in that office!" He said, "I didn't like to be mean to you diplomats.. I thought it was terrible, but it was my job. Today (at my job in the Russian Embassy in Washington) it is very hard to stop being communist and authoritarian!" You don't just undo all your previous life-style. His office is now in charge of commercial affairs.. He was thinking of quitting the service and going into business as a capitalist travel agent. But it's very hard to get that old way of doing things out of your system.

Yelena handled all of the travel for our Embassy officers. So you would give her an itinerary. When I was the Publications Procurement Officer, I laid out the travel plans myself. I didn't need permission from my superiors but I did send my proposed trip to other offices in case there were any projects I might do for others. We were supposed to "cover" the Soviet Union as well as possible. The travel money came from other sources. It wasn't paid by the State Department, so we didn't have to worry about funding authority as much as other Embassy officers..

I would give Yelena my itinerary. Then you would wait and wait. Usually, the day before your scheduled departure she would phone and say, "Oh, Mr. Morgan, I'm very happy to tell you that there is room for you on the train." or at the hotels. That was always the way she put it. Or, in the case of air travel, "We found a plane that goes there!" What it meant was that you had permission to go. Or sometimes she would say, "Oh, I'm sorry, Mr. Morgan, there's no room left on the train," or, "Oh, Mr. Morgan, there's no plane that goes there!" That was the way they handled it. Sometimes an hour before I was to leave, she would call and say, "Oh, I made a terrible mistake! The train has been canceled." So all of my plans went out the window, in terms of getting out of Moscow to do part of my job. It was very frustrating.

The same procedures and results happened for all of the other offices in the Embassy. So my next year in the political section our trips were subject to the whims of the Soviet authorities. Only then I also was subject to the fiscal strictures of the State Department.

I mention travel controls as the primary harassment thrown at us. There was just that idea of inefficiency mixed in with control over your daily lives. You weren't in charge. They were. And then the idea that your phones were "tapped," or whatever you want to call it. The Soviets called it "regulations." No way. It meant simply, "We will keep our eyes on you." There were purely Soviet realities. For example, shopping for food on the local market. Although we used our commissary and imported food, we did try the open markets for some things, or just to get out and shop. My wife came back from the market one day with four, wonderful pears. I asked, "How much did you pay for them?" She said, "I paid $8 for these four." I said, "Well, how much in rubles?" She said, "Well, 80; you divide by 10." I said, "You don't divide by 10. It's the same thing as $80 for those four pears." But everyone had to suffer that, obviously most Soviets. That was the system, I guess, not the regulations.

Whenever they wanted to "get" you, or you were doing something which they didn't consider proper, they would just "PNG" you -- declare you "persona non grata." If you had "crossed the line" -- their line -- they would say, "You are engaging in conduct not suitable for a diplomat." That was always the term used. But I would argue that many of those :PNGed were in retaliation (reciprocity?) for one we had kicked out -- for cause. The other half of your question concerned U. S. Government controls or regulations on us. I never felt really "controlled." I never was told, "Do this or do that." You were treated like an officer and a gentleman, if you will, well-trained linguistically and in area studies, etc. And everyone -- all your bosses -- treated you accordingly. Foy Kohler was my Ambassador during almost all of this period. He knew the Soviet system. He had been the head of the Voice of America. He knew what was expected of us. I never, ever, felt that someone was "directing" me. I might go to my bosses for advice and general instructions. I might say what had happened, or I would say that I was going on a trip and was seeking "input" on what I should look for in such and such a place or how best to undertake a project.

The only way I can really answer your question on U. S. controls on me while I was in the Soviet Union brings up a very interesting and fundamental question. And this point came clearly to me as I've pulled together the Association of Diplomatic Studies and Training "Reader" or "Collection" of oral history interviews of fellow FSOs who have served in the Soviet Union. My impression from the views of others is that I think that it is fair to say that there are some with Soviet experience who might be considered as "soft" on the Soviets and people who are "hard" on them. A new Ambassador or supervisor would arrive. He would be looked at and, say, found to be very "rigid" and perhaps characterized as "anti-Soviet." These are extremes I am dealing with in using such words. Obviously we were all more to the center and conversant with the complexities of the world we were dealing with. What I'm trying to say is that some FSOs were seen in terms of their over-all attitudes toward the USSR and Russia.

For example, take Ambassador Mac Toon. I had a series of bad experiences with him at an earlier stage, when he was my boss in the Political Section. We are talking now about inter-relationships in the Embassy, "control," mechanisms and so forth. Mac just considered, in my view, that the Soviets were a bunch of SOB's. His attitude was, "Don't be fooled by anything they do. Don't have anything to do with the artists, don't have anything to do with other such groups, because they don't have power." Really, I think, that attitude came, not so much from Mac's feelings about the Soviets as his impression that he was mistreated and misunderstood in his position on power -- especially when he was Ambassador. We didn't serve together then at that later point.

Subsequently and since he's retired, he has just gone on and on, at great length, in the same vein. He was appointed the head of a presidential commission to look into allegations that the Soviets had held American "prisoners of war" from World War II, the Korean War, and the Vietnam War. He was on television and radio a year or so ago. He came out with the same old stories. He said, "When I served in Moscow, especially as Ambassador, they didn't relate to me, they didn't share their information with me." Well, of course they didn't. They had other people, they had other ways of conveying information to U.S. authorities. They didn't necessarily go through the American Ambassador in Moscow. So there was that kind of "school." You can call them "hard liners" or people who had basically only bad experiences in the Soviet Union, who were "PNGed," and who had reason to feel the way they do. Maybe they are a little "right wing," maybe they are a little less "liberal," if you will.

And then there are others, like Peter Semler, my colleague at Columbia and in Moscow, and a number of other officers, who knew and appreciated Soviet history and culture. They had more of a place in their hearts for the "Russian" side of things. I am exaggerating this in part, but there was that sort of feeling. I'm giving you this more for the real answer to the issue of "control" over the officers in our Embassy in Moscow I guess I'm sort of talking about "thought control"!!

Certain people were in positions of authority or influence, for example, military attachés, bosses in the Political Section, the Ambassador, or the Deputy Chief of Mission. They would tend to react to what you had done -- or not done. This could have been advance guidance or after the fact. You might have your hands "whacked" for having done something which the Ambassador, the DCM, or your boss felt was "uninformed." They might say, "You almost asked to be arrested. You put the Embassy in a difficult position. Do you realize, Mr. Morgan, that the U.S. Government has spent two years training you for service in the Soviet Union? They've spent all of this money, and you're in a very important job. Now you're about to be 'PNGed.' Do you realize that all of this effort is now 'down the drain,' just because you did this stupid thing of walking up to this man on the street corner and chatting with him?" Obviously, I'm making up a "speech-story". I wasn't PNGed. But there was that anxiety -- especially felt by some of U. S. military people assigned to the Embassy in Moscow. They were in the most precarious position of being PNGed or doing something that State Department officials questioned.

The military were very daring and got themselves into very difficult positions. That's why some of them were “poisoned” at dinner, and so on. And the Ambassador would “go through the ceiling” -- particularly with the military. Some of the military would think, “Who the hell does he think he is? He’s supposed to be the American Ambassador. Why isn’t he ‘with’ me on this?”

I’ve heard many stories about Ambassador Llewellyn “Tommy” Thompson and Ambassador George Kennan. They would say, perhaps, “Why did they ‘blow’ this thing? They know what the Soviets are like. They know that they’re impossible to deal with rationally, in some ways. So deal with them as we know them. If you don’t, you’re going to be ‘PNGed.’” Or, “You’re going to create serious problems for the United States Government. In some cases just your being arrested or beaten up might have tremendous bilateral significance. It could even result in World War III, if you will.” That’s what I’m trying to say in terms of U.S. control by the Embassy over what you do.

There was control. It was subtle control. It was a varied type of control. The only explicit controls that I can think of was that any time you met with a Soviet citizen, you were to report it to the Security Officer. That is security control. Most of us didn’t do this. For example, I was in touch with Soviet citizens all the time. I wasn’t going to prepare little memos about what the Intourist guide said or did to me, or whatever. I think that, in Kathmandu, Nepal, maybe, it’s better to report something like this, but not in the Soviet context, where it happened repeatedly. Of course we did report to various elements in the Embassy, Security included, when we had something to say about the contact and the setting in which it took place. Full trip reports were of course made, but not to bookstores in Moscow That’s the only direct or technical control that I can think of.

However, as I said, there was all kinds of “indirect guidance.”

Q: My impression is also that there was a requirement that you travel with another American.

MORGAN: Oh, yes. That’s another form of control. Right.

Q: Were your travel companions limited to Americans or could it be with “good guys” people from friendly countries?

MORGAN: You could, in certain circumstances, travel with “good guys.” I never traveled with non-Americans, but I know that some of the U. S. military did. I know that the American military often traveled with their Canadian counterparts, because they all were traveling all the time. They couldn’t afford to “wipe out” their staff by requiring travel in pairs of Americans. However, it was largely Canadians and British -- but not French.

Q: Where would the U. S. military travel and why?

MORGAN: Any place and every place that they could get to.

Q: To collect intelligence?

MORGAN: Oh, yes, or shall we call it information? That’s the only reason that they were there in Moscow. They were not there to work out bilateral agreements with the Soviets or sell them arms, as we do in many other countries!

Q: While we're on the subject, I think that it's a good time to cover CIA's role at that time in Moscow.

MORGAN: Yes. CIA had what was called a small "Station" or group in Moscow. It just wasn't something one talked about, especially in-country. You knew who they were, in most cases. I don't think that I was ever surprised, because it was such a small group. You knew that the Embassy doctor was from CIA, because of the Penkovsky case. He was an Air Force doctor seconded to CIA. The Chief of Station, also served as the Embassy Security Officer. He and I took Russian language lessons together two times a week. The Russian teacher was there throughout the time I was in Moscow. She would just "pick" at me. A new Chief of Station arrived just before I left, Dick Stolz; a great guy who recently retired from the CIA in a most senior position. I must tell you a side-bar at this point. I mention his name because when he retired he did so with lots of publicity. He was in charge of the clandestine, "black", side of CIA operations (the Directorate of Operations or DO). He was one of those mentioned concerning the Ames case because of his position..

Q: What does the "black" side mean?

MORGAN: Les, this is not an interview on the CIA. However, as is well publicized, the Agency is basically divided into Intelligence Research (Directorate of Intelligence) and Operations (Directorate of Operations). The "black" side is the Operations side, the DO.

Q: Does the Operations side include "covert action"?

MORGAN: Yes, covert action. The other people are analysts who analyze books and other, written material, including reports from the field. Dick Stolz arrived shortly before I left Moscow. We got to know each other right off. He said, "Bill, you know, I've got to do some travel. I'd like to go to Leningrad. I understand that you are going there on your final trip." I said, "Sure, I'd be glad to go with you." We got permission from the Soviets, in the sense I described above; that is, tickets etc. were available. We took off, and the plane landed at Leningrad airport. The pilot was maneuvering on one of the tarmacs. We were right in the middle of the main tarmac. We had landed and turned around and were about to move to the arrival gate. The pilot stopped the aircraft, right in the middle of the tarmac. Dick, sitting next to me, could see a plane landing -- coming down onto our tarmac. Dick was a very responsible, level-headed person, with a lot of experience. He said, "Bill, isn't that plane coming down where we are?" I said, "Yeah, it looks like it." He said, "But you don't seem concerned." I said, "Oh, I guess I don't feel particularly troubled." Well, this other plane kept coming down, and he said, "It's going to hit us!" I said, "It's a Soviet plane, and they can't afford to lose one." So the plane that had been about to land pulled up and flew right over us! Dick and I were together in the Soviet Union for a month or so more. Every place we went he would tell this story. He said, "Some day I will really understand the Soviets when I know that they consider a plane more important than human lives or because they can't afford to lose one."

The CIA had a very small Station in Moscow. It was in a very delicate situation. Obviously, I didn't know what they were doing, because I didn't have any "need to know." You might wonder why they were the principal suppliers of the funds for publications procurement and why they didn't have their own people doing it. Well, they were indeed the biggest "consumers" of published Soviet material and had been given responsibility in the Washington intelligence community to do financial analysis on the Soviet economy, rather than leave it to their Station in Moscow to do. Obviously, they also were recipients of State and Agricultural Departments reports which did a lot of analysis. All we had to do as Pops was to buy and package the books we bought and send them to the various Washington agencies. I should add that we also did periodicals but these we published routinely through Soviet sources. This free and efficient "flow" of information never became a problem; our office subscribed routinely along with Embassy subscriptions. We always bought independently, and enthusiastically, periodicals to which you couldn't subscribe, say from the Republic capitals and large cities. Somehow, editors in the boonies seemed a bit freer, or perhaps naive, what they published so you got some interesting insights into Soviet life in the far-away places.

When we would get back to the Embassy the books up on a shelf in the basement. We had a shelf for "WF", "LC," (Library of Congress), Interior, State, etc. -- and the names of all the other agencies which received books from us. I would open up the packages. Sometimes we'd only get half of the number I wanted.. The FSN packer, who had enough knowledge of the letters of the English alphabet to pack them, or keep them on the shelf if I indicated we needed to get some more : "to meet our quota". He understood that! Once a week -- I think that it was every Monday -- Igor, or whatever his name was -- would pack them up in bundles for shipment in the diplomatic pouch..

I don't think that I had to make any accounting for the books. In Washington they took what they got, gratefully, and bills went out. Once in while I'd get a cable or letter singling out some "treasure" they particularly appreciated, or a gentle "reminder/reprimand" if we strayed from target. (50 copies of "Gone with the Wind"?)

I only went to the Eastern European countries twice during my service in Moscow to encourage and give guidance to the part-time PPO's. That's how I got "approached in Bucharest!"

It wasn't a CIA "operation" at all. The CIA was just the principal "consumer" of books and publications and the paymaster. However, the State Department would "go wild" when they received some of these books. You can go to the Library of the State Department today and find some of those books on the shelves there. They continue to flow to the State Department -- probably not as many books, though. This program, during my time in Moscow, involved looking at virtually every book that was published. To use that position as "cover" for a CIA agent could have been very dangerous. It's very hard to do the PPO job, which is a full-time one. Think what would have happened if that person's other job were "blown." What would happen to the PPO job? It would just stop. You don't walk into that position easily. It was, traditionally, a Foreign Service job, and it was a good one. You need to know Russian, you travel, and you get to know Moscow and other cities as much as possible. We picked up our own "sense" of what was going on. I would do reports for the Political, Economic and Military Sections on things I had seen.

Q: While we're at it, could you tell me a little bit about the Embassy itself? What was the staffing and what were your relations with the people in the different parts of the Embassy?

MORGAN: During the time I was a PPO, I the FSN who wrapped up the books. He had some other functions as well, in Admin as I remember. I don't think that he was really a KGB agent, the poor soul. But, God love him, he had a terrible case of "B. O." I had an American administrative assistant who would not go down to that room when he was there. She could "smell" him.

We also had a nicely equipped Embassy library, run by an FSN, under my "guidance"; obviously me, I was the book man.. She told me one day that she had been a colonel in the KGB. She'd been "demoted" and threatened with dismissal by the KGB because she hadn't gotten enough information out of us. The Soviets were going to demote her to captain, or something like that. She was in tears and went on and on. She asked if I could do something. I think that her name was Yelena. She asked, "Couldn't you give me some little, interesting things that I can give to my bosses?" I told her to make up any stories she wanted. She continued on her job in the library and I never heard anything more. I guess she must have satisfied the KGB with U.S. "disinformation".

Then we had an Embassy wife who worked as our American part-time administrative staff person who kept our books and did our travel vouchers. She worked with us and helped downstairs, when "he" wasn't there..

On paper (to the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs and on the diplomatic list) I was assigned to the USIA operation. Officially, there was no USIS (United States Information Service) operation (in the Embassy in Moscow). I did some of the cultural exchange program work. The Soviets considered USIA as a propaganda agency and would only accept USIS's work in Press and Cultural Exchanges. They were aware that I also worked for USIA. Rocky Staples, Public Affairs Office and in charge of the USIA operation, was my immediate boss. As one of my USIA assignments, I took the Robert Shaw Chorale all over the Soviet Union -- right in the middle of the Cuban Missile Crisis, which was a fascinating story in itself. I took professors from the University of Michigan down to Chechen Ingush Autonomous Republic(s) which nobody ever heard of and never would have, except that Chechnya happens to be in the newspapers these days.. Such escort assignments gave added credence to my position. The Soviets liked it that way, too. I think they thought Publications Procurement belonged better in Cultural Affairs. We had a fairly "open" cultural exchanges program with the Soviets for many years.

Now on to my second year in Moscow: The Political Section had a Political Counselor, with Internal and External Political Units. I served in the Internal Political Unit. The officers assigned to that unit were the "Kremlin Wall" watchers, so to speak, dealing with internal Soviet matters. The External Unit was concerned with Soviet relations with third countries -- such as Indonesia, Cuba, and so forth. During my time in the Political Section the Political Counselors were Dick Davies and then Malcolm (Mac) Toon. There were two senior Political Officers under them as deputies and then a batch of Junior Officers. These junior officers were Jack Matlock, Peter Bridges, Bill Luers, and myself, under the boss, Ken Kerst, a U.S. Civil Service employee from INR (Bureau of Intelligence Research) and a specialist in Soviet affairs. He was a wonderful person and a superb boss. Going back in this interview when we talked about bosses, I talked about Kerst as a sophisticated and human leader. He understood all of the complexities about the Soviet Union. He knew how to deal with and lead us as younger, inexperienced but learning FSOs. One of my colleagues, Peter Bridges, followed the arts and the literary types. He had a real challenge; his job was to talk to people that we weren't supposed to talk to, at least under our boss's boss's directions. That's a throw away thought, but an excellent example in my mind of how we did our job and under certain controls and leadership pressures.

The External Unit of the Political Section had, as I remember, a leader and two FSOs at the mid-to junior levels as was I and my three colleagues in Internal. They had area expertise, Africa and China/Vietnam. They all concentrated on USSR-rest of the world relations and how they affected the U.S. This involved such complex topics as Cuba, Vietnam, NATO, Disarmament, China, et al.

Dick Funkhouser, fellow Russian language student from FSI, was the Economic Counselor. Under him, we had an Agricultural Attaché from the U. S. Department of Agriculture, with an assistant as well. Finally, in the Economic Section, were Commercial and Science Officers and a State Department FSO Economic Officer.

The Administrative Section was relatively large. Jim Moran was the Administrative Counselor. He was great, because he really knew what the administrative function was all about and he also knew how to deal with people. He had a bunch of young FSO's assigned to him. We had some Foreign Service Staff people, including a Budget and Fiscal Officer and a Security Officer. We had a Personnel Officer who was from the Staff Corps but also had Jack Perry, an FSO going through this multi-assignment two year program. I would say that about half of the people in the Administrative Section were Foreign Service Staff specialists and the other half were on the first part of their tour as language and area FSOs. They went to the Administrative Section instead of being Publications Procurement Officers or working in the Consular Section.

The Consular Section, was headed by Tom Fain, fellow language and area colleague; he stayed in that position for two years. In those days the Consular Section was busy and important. Not that it isn't always important, but it was a particularly challenging job at the time. There were a lot of Americans who had come to the Soviet Union in the 1920's and 1930's and had become Soviet citizens but who now wanted to go home to the U. S., especially people from Soviet Armenia. There was total Soviet control of all exits from the Soviet Union for everybody. "Tourists" didn't exist. There were "official" visits, all tightly controlled, all on a "quid pro quo" basis. For every Soviet scientist who visited the U. S. you had an American scientist who could come to the Soviet Union. The Soviets going to the U. S. were all well briefed on the "evils" to anticipate in that capitalist country. Additionally, most Soviet travelers were ineligible for an American visa since they were members of the Communist Party. So it was necessary to obtain waivers from the U. S. Attorney General for these Soviet scientists, for example, to get a visa to enter the U. S. In addition to Tom Fain, Jack Matlock was the other Consular Officer there for my first year.

There were two officers and a very excellent, support staff of four or five Russian FSNs.

Excellent, but also KGB officers. Nevertheless, since there is something absorbing and demanding about consular work, I sensed, and learned from what my colleagues said and I could see, that maybe these Foreign Service Nationals were quite proud of working at the American Embassy. Incidentally, the Soviet authorities got more valuable information from them concerning those wishing to leave the U.S., Soviet or American. We certainly knew that they reported back to the KGB on anyone who came into the Consular Section. There were problems, of course, with those affected by such information.

There was an American Catholic priest who surfaced many years after his arrival in the Soviet Union; most of the time he was in a prison in Siberia. We finally got the Soviets to release him out solely because of a Civil Service employee back in Washington in SOV (Soviet Affairs) in the State Department. She kept after Embassy offices and in SOV to get him out. There were other prisoners -- people who had "vanished." All of them were entitled to protection as American citizens, except that the protection of Americans in the Soviet Union is quite a limited, to put it mildly.

Q: When I visited the Soviet Union, I met a man who was working as an electrician in the building where my company was located. He was an American named John -- I can't remember his last name. He had come over to the Soviet Union in the 1920's. His parents had brought him over as a child. He was "stuck" in the Soviet Union. The authorities wouldn't let him out. Now he's 70 years old and can barely speak English.

MORGAN: There were a lot of people like that, especially in Soviet Armenia. The minute we went into a hotel restaurant in Yerevan, Armenia, we'd be surrounded by all of these guys speaking Brooklyn English. They had been brought over to the Soviet Union as kids and had grown up there. They were brought to the Soviet Union by their parents for ideological reasons. Armenians, as you know, were given a special welcome by the Soviets. But the family kept their English, and their accents!

Q: I wonder if you could tell us if you ever encountered or can mention any first hand incident with American citizens or former American citizens who were "kept" in the Soviet Union. Were there any particular problems that we had to deal with or any "sticky" issues in this connection?

MORGAN: Not at first hand, because I was not in the Consular Section. There were stories I got at second hand and have forgotten them. These were traditional cases, except for those which I became acquainted with when I was on the Soviet desk in the Department on my next assignment. There was Virginia James, the Civil Servant I mentioned above who worked for years there. It was part of her "job" to take care of issues like this. Basically, she was involved in consular "support" activity.

Specifically, on this Catholic priest, I was on the Soviet Desk and became aware that we needed an American "detained" in the Soviet Union to exchange with a Soviet. I was involved in "exchanges" of "prisoners" when in SOV and the U.S. had decided to return a Soviet citizen that the Soviets wanted back and we had no problem releasing. As a quid pro quo, they would return an American. So Virginia James said, "It's got to be Father So-and-So!" I don't know how long it had been, but after 30 some years that this priest had been held in the Soviet Union. She really, through her persistence, caused it to happen. They probably thought that we were idiots to ask for a priest, but we did.

I don't have anything else to mention from my first year and in general about Moscow.

Q: Okay, one last question about your days as a PPO. Can you tell us what you really got out of it? What did you learn from being a PPO?

MORGAN: I was able to travel and I got everything that goes with travel. I had more freedom than most of my colleagues to get out and see Russians and other people of Soviet nationality. I got to see the Soviet Union -- every republic in it. Central Asia will always have a special place in my heart. And that goes for Siberia, Lake Baikal and the vastness of the frozen north. I will never forget this experience. It's different. But you could get to hate it in some ways because of the Soviet bureaucrats and general inefficiency of the system. You always had these Intourist guides with you. They were generally "horrible" people.

Q: I don't think that you mentioned that you had to travel with a guide as well.

MORGAN: Well, I didn't exactly travel with a guide. I traveled with my companion from the Embassy. However, once we got to our destination, we had to deal with "Intourist," the Soviet national travel agency, so called, to get a taxi or a car, to take a local tour of the area, to get a service at the hotel, or to do anything. They were at "your service". Not that they were good at watching you at all times. They didn't go with me to the bookstores. I would explain to the Intourist guide that I was going to spend the day at bookstores. He or she would say, "I don't understand why you do that. What a waste of time! I could go and buy a book for you." They did anything they could do to harass you, if you will, or to find out what you really do when you're buying the books. He wanted to know where the books would go. The Intourist guide would say, "Tell me, Gospadin Morgan, exactly who are the customers." I would say, "Come on, Sonya, or whatever the guide's name was, don't be so dumb to ask such a straightforward question." Then I would think, "Oops, I shouldn't say that. I could get PNGed" Under stress you could get so angry and frustrated that you might make an "provocative" (they loved the word "provokatzy") remark].

Or you might have to bunk with three Soviet travelers who were completely drunk. You couldn't sit at just any table in a restaurant. If just any Russian sat with you, innocently or for the excitement of it, the Intourist guide, or maitre-d' would say, "Oh, no, they really don't want you to sit with them". Then we might start a provokatzy!

Or take the little lady, actually she was huge, fat and not really too lady-like, that we in Odessa. This was when I was in the political section and I was traveling with a USIA officer. We took a ship from Odessa to Sochi just North of the border between the Russian and Georgian Republics. Or was it to Batumi in Georgia?.

We were having dinner one night in Odessa when this "lady" in question, and a very young and attractive woman came over and sat down near us. Well, you know, it was so obvious what happened that it became pathetic. They approached our table and said, or at least the "trainer" did, that they wanted to practice their English because they were learning it. The conversation, not to mention the antics, became ridiculous. My traveling companion, Jerry Prehn, and I had a couple of glasses of wine. About that time our inhibitions were lowering[. We finally said to the two women, "Look, you've gotten about as much out of us as you can. Go back and tell your bosses what you did. We will send you a letter of recommendation, but please, enough is enough. You are being very amateurish and doing a very poor job of picking us up." The older woman said, "Oh, don't say that! Look at this woman whom I am training. I'm trying to show her that I'm a model person and I want to help you Americans." So we said, "Enough," paid our bill, and walked up a hill, which was fairly steep, at a relatively fast pace, to our hotel. After us came "Mamma" with her so-called "daughter." I said to Jerry, "Let's go a little faster." So we did, and the poor lady just puffed in defeat. They both also were wearing shoes with high heels, because they were very "chic," you know. They were very "kulturny", you know. They finally couldn't keep up with us. The older lady was puffing. We turned around and waved goodbye. But they had tried!

Experiences like that really don't add greatly to oral history but they meant a lot to me at the time as revealing the realities of the USSR. I tell it to give you an example of how we had always to be on the alert, to be careful. You know, you didn't know whether that extra glass of wine or vodka would make you tell them what you really thought of the internal security system. It "controlled" you. That was their goal.

Q: Well, let's move on to your position as a Political Officer working on the internal affairs of the Soviet Union, beginning in September, 1963. Is that correct?

MORGAN: Yes, it sounds right. I had that job for a year.

Q: Tell us how your position was changed and why.

MORGAN: The Embassy made such internal assignments. If you were a language and area officer you weren't assigned to a specific job in Washington, just to replace a person scheduled to leave. However, I knew that I was going first to the PPO job, though I didn't know what I was going to do in the second year. That second assignment was handled by the DCM and the Ambassador, probably about half way through your first year, during which time they could see your strengths and weaknesses. There were openings coming up in other parts of the Embassy. There were openings coming up in the Economic or Political Section, in most cases. It was a "sore point" if you didn't get moved up to one of those positions. The officers were moved up were congratulated and you knew that you had made it on that "promotion list," which is silly. However, that's life in any organization. There are certain jobs which are regarded as being "better" and more interesting and "main track, substantive" than others. The Political Section was one of those jobs. That spirit permeates the Foreign Service.

I was told that I was going to the "Internal Affairs Unit" of the Political Section. There my responsibilities included reading newspapers, because you couldn't meet anybody, except when you traveled, and then with difficulty. Even then, there's only so much that you can talk about when you meet people. The farther you got out of Moscow, the more people would talk to you. I went to Central Asia. I could tell you story after story about people telling you how they feel. But these times were rare.

Dushanbe, capital of the Tajik Republic. was the locale of one of my favorite stories. I think that Jack Perry and I were “fellow travelers”.. I remember asking our waitress, a lovely and charming person in her 50’s or 60’s, where she was from. Americans are usually initially identified as coming from Estonia, Latvia, or Lithuania. The local people thought that we had to be Soviets and certainly couldn’t be Americans, because foreigners don’t get to Dushanbe very often. The Baltic States are considered “sophisticated” and well dressed, as we appeared to the waitress.

The farther away you get from Moscow, the more relaxed the local people are. This woman was very pleased to talk to us. We told her a few stories in answer to her many questions of what it was like “out there”. Most questions begin with, “Is it true that...?” I noticed the meat skewers in our kebab that we were served (the only entrée) were interestingly made. I told her, “Do you know that I spent an hour today at your market, trying to get some meat skewers? My wife would love to get some real, Central Asian meat skewers. Do you know where I might buy some?” This is before we were assigned to Beirut, where they have lots of skewers. She said, “Oh, yes, I can go to the chef. I’m sure that he has some skewers that he can sell you.” Shortly after that she reappeared very, very upset, with the chef right behind her. He wanted to meet an American, because she had obviously identified us.. He was great, and we had a nice, long chat. He said, “I understand that you are having some trouble getting skewers. Here we have a supply system which is insane, it’s crazy, it’s terrible.” Then he reached for the plate, shook off the skewers, and said, “These are for you.” I said, “How much?” He said, “Nothing! Do you think that I would charge you for this? Take these skewers and good health to you!” I still have those skewers to this day.

Such are the long-lasting memories you preserve from traveling in the Soviet Union. First, you learn about what people feel. That woman was in Dushanbe for one, simple reason. She said, “I had to get out of Leningrad. It was too controlled.” She said, “Out here I’m a waitress and I’m poor, but I’m free. I can say things that I want to say.” She had been a professor of English, I believe. Those are the kinds of things you learned. They are all fed into at least a trip report and perhaps into a larger report on a more general topic. You kept files. Other people in the Embassy might use them for something they were writing about. They gave reports a certain amount of local flavor and supporting examples.

I will give you one other example. I read newspapers from all of the republics, whenever we could lay our hands on them. I was responsible for military affairs, a large part of the Soviet power structure, and struggles, education, and all aspects of Soviet-American bilateral relations. We divided up the Soviet Union among the three of us in the Internal Affairs Unit of the Political Section. As I recall, I followed developments in Leningrad. I had been reading a biography of Nikita Sergeyevich Khrushchev, who at the time was the leader of the Soviet Union. It was one of those rare books which, I think, the PPO gave me. It was relatively new. It was simple, pure, and unadulterated propaganda. However, I found myself -- as I was supposed to do -- focusing on what might be new or little known about him, as well as any between the lines insights into what made him tick, or at least the author thought about him. After all, all leaders can be succeeded. That’s the kind of thing the Political Section does.

I read other newspapers from Leningrad, including the “Vyechorka,.” slang in Russian for the evening newspapers, which are published in most of the larger cities. They are real “gossip sheets,” comparatively speaking. That’s where you can often find out what is really going on, or at least between the lines. They are controlled by the Communist Party or the local government, of course. But they also focus on movie and theater schedules and have a lot of local “goings on,” the equivalent of Soviet gossip, less ponderous reporting. So I was reading the “Vechernaya Leningrad.” It carried a letter to the editor from an leading educator in the city. It didn’t exactly complain, but you could read between the lines. Whenever you read Soviet newspapers, you had to read between the lines, of course. I looked for this “hint.” I gave it [the article] to one of my colleagues, who said, “Well, you look for one word.: “odnaka” -- “however”, in English. There was extensive praise about Nikita Sergeyevich and how great a leader he was. Then another paragraph began, “Odnaka”. That’s when you start reading carefully. In fact, that’s the only reason you read the newspapers. Otherwise, you couldn’t possibly get through all of the garbage that was there.

You look for the “counter arguments,” if you will, which begins with, “However.” The article continued, “However, Nikita Sergeyevich is making a great mistake,” or words to that effect -- obviously not that strong -- in his educational reform program. But the article said things like, “Vice Minister So-and-So,” who was Khrushchev’s “follower, stooge” Khrushchev had really put forward this new educational program. I mean it was a real reform, a masterful, “liberal” reform. So I went in to my immediate boss, Ken Kerst and I said, “It might be that this is a real complaint.” He agreed and said, “Draft a telegram.” And I did. I drew some material from this book which I was reading and pulled it all together as a sort of report due at an appointed time. As you know, that is what most reporting is. It is not someone’s immediate reaction to something. In reporting from the Soviet Union it is mostly “think pieces” which have developed over a period of time. This report was on education.

Mac Toon, who was the Political Counselor and Ken’s immediate boss, threw the telegram back to me and put a note on it: “See me.” “Do you really believe this? Do you really think that this is indicative of weakness in the Soviet structure?” I said, “Well, I’m just reporting what I saw in this article,” and how I had come to the conclusion I did. I was indeed my defensive self, especially in front of strong-man Toon. These aren’t the exact words that Mac used with me, but he said, “If you insist, I suggest that you put it in an Airgram,” a slow way by mail of getting words back and probably not read in Washington, at least by the people in power. I went back to Ken and said, “I’m not happy. I don’t think this is right.” He said, “You know, Mac feels strongly that he’s not around to train you.” I said, “Then who trains me?” Ken answered, “Well, he feels that he’s above that.” I’ll never forget that. Hopefully, I kept that with me for the rest of my career. That is, you are there to train subordinates, no matter who you are, the Ambassador or anyone else. Ken said, “Well, Mac won’t sign off on a telegram.”

That was in late August, early September, 1964, just before I was leaving. I had the “pleasure,” one month or so later, at the most, while painting my fence on Home Leave to hear on the radio that Nikita Sergeyevich Khrushchev had fallen. You can imagine my reactions. Such silly things as, “if only I could have gotten that draft telegram approved.” On the other hand, perhaps it shows you how people react to bosses sometimes and way we run things.

The final answer to your question about what the Political Section does or how I functioned in it is that the highlight of that year was Khrushchev's political decline and demise, and we didn't see it coming. The highlight of the previous year, when I was PPO, was when we declared an embargo on Cuba. I was the only foreign diplomat permitted to travel during that time. I was in Leningrad with the Robert Shaw Chorale. I was assigned to be the escort for the group to a number of cities in the Soviet Union -- I think, five or six.

Q: Can you tell us what the Robert Shaw Chorale is?

MORGAN: Robert Shaw is one of our great, American conductors. He was the conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra at the time. He was subsequently with the Atlanta Symphony. I think that he is retired now, or close to it. He also established a choir, which he developed during the years when he conducted symphony orchestras in various cities. His chorale was a group of about 50 or 60 singers. They are magnificent -- probably the best in the United States. They came to the Soviet Union under our Cultural Exchanges Program. I think they were the first group of that size to come to the Soviet Union under that program. Among other things they performed the Bach B Minor Mass which, of course, made people fall apart when they heard it. That was on the program performed in Leningrad. They also did a lot of American folk music, classical and religious choral work. But the Bach B Minor Mass the peak of it all.

I was with the Chorale for about weeks or longer -- a long time -- as "escort officer", which means the official, Embassy person who goes along to give them guidance and support and solve problems if they arise. Goskoncert is the Soviet agency responsible for all concerts and musical shows in the Soviet Union. It is in charge of all the logistics and overall management of the tours.. We had a delightful man from Goskoncert, who really ran the show, of course with the help and arrangements of the local representatives. I was just a little American Embassy presence and make sure the group was not "mislead" or got into any serious troubles. Some called me their "Nanny". I didn't actually do much except keep Robert Shaw as sober as I could and the group from squabbling with each other, as artists tend to do.

A few of the members of the Chorale were of Russian ancestry or actually had emigrated. They wanted to see the "motherland". The Soviets loved the performances. People stood in line for 24 hours at a time, waiting for tickets. Often high Soviet and local society was present. The Russians appreciated the beautiful music the Chorale performed and the simple fact that an American group of such calibre was in the USSR.

At the end of the program of Leningrad, the center of culture in the Soviet Union, or at least the Leningraders thought so, there was a standing ovation that lasted for 30 or more minutes. People would not sit down and would not stop clapping. They were doing the Russian-style, synchronized clapping. Robert Shaw was up there, bowing and getting all of the members of the Chorale to bow with him. He was in tears. I was in tears every time I attended one of their performances and watched the appreciated Soviet audience.

MORGAN: In the middle of the Leningrad performance of the Robert Shaw Chorale, I got a telephone call from Bob German, my deputy, at the Embassy. He said, "There's a little something going on that I think you should know about, which you can read about in the papers." I said, "Well, I did look at 'Pravda.'" Bob continued, "Well, actually, the United States has proclaimed a quarantine around Cuba. All diplomats of every nation have been recalled to Moscow.” I said, “OK, Bob, what do you want me to do?” He said, “What would you like to do?” I said, “Well, I’ll tell Bob Shaw. I don’t know what his reaction will be, but I’d prefer to stay with the Chorale. We still have a couple of performances. I’ll call you right back.”

So I went to see Bob Shaw. He said, “That’s too bad. If you’re withdrawn, you can tell the Embassy that I will not perform another note. I’m going to pack up the Robert Shaw Chorale and leave for the United States. You can tell them that.” I said, “Well, our Soviet hosts have to know about this.” There was this poor, sweet old guy whom I told. He said, “You cannot do this!” He was a man of the arts who genuinely seemed to love us very much. So he said, “I must make my [phone] call.” So I said, “Go ahead and let me know.” He came back in a few minutes and said, “Yes, it is true. My government has called all diplomats back to Moscow.” I said, “What did they say?” He said, “They said that they would make no exception for you.” Well, I said, you’d better find out because I’m about to call my Embassy. After a short while my Soviet colleague came to be and said that his authorities had said they would reconsider their decision. I called Bob German back and said, “I’ve had a Soviet reply; I presume that you’ve been doing something from your side.” He confirmed that the Ambassador had called the Foreign Ministry, but it was unwilling to make any exceptions. I told Bob that apparently, the Soviet authorities were having an internal communications problem. Bob agreed but added that he understood that every diplomat was back in Moscow, except me. In about an hour Bob German called with the words: “The Soviet Foreign Ministry has withdrawn their demand, you may stay with the Robert Shaw Chorale, and they may continue with their program.”

Before and after this “mini crisis” Bob German and I had done a little “double talk,” although I’m not sure how “double” it was. Bob’s real message was, “keep your eyes open.” He hoped that there would be no anti-American demonstrations or activities because of the Cuban events. I said, “On the contrary, I think it is the opposite.” I also understood him to be telling me to keep my eyes on the Soviet ships in the Leningrad harbor. I knew that if the ships set sail, that would indicate that there were some problems with the Soviets militarily reacting to the Cuban missiles crisis. But our indications, apparently through Penkovsky, were that the Soviets didn’t intend to do anything. The Soviet ships already en route to Cuba would reverse course and in fact honor the quarantine. So I would reported to the Embassy over the next few days in “double talk” on the location of Soviet Navy ships in Leningrad; they were not moving, nor was there any anti-American demonstration. Nothing. All was incredibly calm.

I thought about this later as I was reading a front page story in the “New York Times.” It reported that I was the only American diplomat who had not returned to Moscow, that the status of the program of the Robert Shaw Chorale was probably indicative of the trend of events, and that the Soviet Union was not about to do anything “inflammatory,” for whatever reasons.

That happened in October, 1962, during my first year in Moscow. I’m giving you that anecdote in response to your question about what happened when I was in the Political Section. I said that I would have to go back in time to my PPO days and tell you one of my best “political” tales: the “Cuban Missile events.”

Against this background, the next dramatic bilateral event that took place occurred when I was in fact in the Political Section. That was the assassination of President Kennedy in November, 1963. I've already told you how my wife was involved in that and how the Soviets really showed their grief. During the actual assassination, we were at the Embassy "dacha" (country house), outside of Moscow, a place where you could go to relax. The Ambassador had a "dacha," and, adjoining that, was a "dacha" for the rest of the Embassy staff and their families. It had about 4 or 5 bedrooms. We were there with Tom Fain and his wife and were enjoying the evening very much.

I had gone to bed. I was awakened by my wife who said that Jack Perry had just called from the Embassy. The President was dead. He had been assassinated. Ambassador Kohler had issued special instructions to everybody. Tom Fain and I were part of "everybody," and the Embassy knew that we were at the dacha. We were told that, under no circumstances, were we to display any outward feelings toward any Soviets about this incident -- in the sense of who might have killed President Kennedy, why he was killed, or anything else. Not that we would be dealing with any Soviets, but this was an extraordinarily delicate time. I think that Jack said this over the tapped phone for the obvious reasons since the Soviets already were being seen by some as behind the assassination. Some people at home were apparently saying this was done deliberately, and some were merely speculating. When we got back to the Embassy, I remember Ambassador Foy Kohler talking to us and to the American staff of the Embassy in general, about the delicateness of the times. He said how final this was. There would be lots of rumors and accusations and we were in the heart of the activity.

In that context a couple of weeks later -- maybe it was a couple of months -- the DCM, the Deputy Chief of Mission, Walter Stoessel, called me up to his office and said, "Bill, I've just had a call from my counterpart over in the British Embassy. The British had a 'walk-in,' a Soviet citizen, who says that he knows who killed the President." This man had defected from the KGB and was in the British Embassy, seeking protection. The British had a Russian language officer there to interview him, and they wanted someone from the American Embassy to be present as well, for obvious reasons.

Three hours later, after a very lengthy interview with this Soviet defector, the British decided to release him. They said that they couldn't give him any kind of protection there. They let him out the back door of the British Embassy so that he could escape, if he were legitimate. Obviously, the fundamental question which my British colleague and I were trying to determine was whether he was a legitimate defector. The Soviet talked at length about Lee Harvey Oswald, and his Soviet wife whom he said he knew well in Minsk. The defector was trying to make the case that Oswald, and particularly his wife, were KGB agents. He said that Oswald had killed President Kennedy on orders from the Soviet KGB. This was pretty heavy stuff.

I went back to the American Embassy and told Walter Stoessel what had happened. Like a good boss, he said, "What do you think? Do you think he is telling the truth?" I said, "Walter, I don't know. Frankly, my greatest concern was whether I got every word right which the defector had said." Here we were, talking to somebody who was rattling away in Russian. I had agreed with the British Embassy officer that he and I would sit down afterwards and talk it over, comparing notes to make sure that we had the right verbs and nouns, etc., to see what we were sure he said and to compare our conclusions.

So we did this afterwards. As I remember, my British Embassy colleague and I pretty much agreed that we couldn't conclude he was a "legitimate" defector or a KGB "plant". To carry out his defection the way he did certainly tilted our opinion to the view that he was a "plant." You can't get into any Embassy in Moscow -- British or American -- without having to walk past Soviet guards. He came into the British Embassy via a back entrance. But he was there and we did hear what he said, but it was only his story, all verbal.

Q: So what made you virtually certain that he actually knew all of that much about the case? I think that the name of Oswald's wife was Maria (Marina?).

MORGAN: Yes, that was a question. I guess that we were more satisfied on that matter. But then, again, he could have been "briefed" on how to do the whole thing. So I sent off a report on the interview, through Walter Stoessel. We had asked the State Department how this information should be submitted; to whom. It wasn't really a "normal" Embassy report on the Soviet Union. It was somewhat "privileged" information, concerning the assassination of President Kennedy. As I remember, we were instructed to send it to the Warren Commission. It went out as an Airgram.

Nothing ever happened as a result of this report. I've been waiting to be called since then. When I was Deputy Director of the Visa Office 15 years later, I got a call from a person I had inspected in Mexico City. She was on the Mexican desk in the State Department. She said, "I need your authorization for something." So I went over to her office. The subject was my Airgram on the interview with this alleged Soviet KGB "defector", which was in files sent to her from Mexico City concerning Oswald's days in Mexico. The Warren Commission or post Warren Commission phase keeps going on and on.

Q: This was on the role of the KGB in Mexico?

MORGAN: Something like that. My Airgram surfaced, having obviously got to Embassy Mexico City because it concerned Oswald. I think that there was a request for material under the Freedom of Information Act or a Congressional inquiry. I had to "sign off" on reducing the security classification I had put on the original document. I had to agree that making this information public would not endanger U.S. security, etc. I was so embarrassed to see this report after so many years. I thought, "Did I write so poorly while in Moscow? This language is terrible! Even the spelling is off. How did Walter Stoessel ever let me send this report off?" That was my chief concern. My initial concern had been my Russian language ability. My second concern was my English language ability in drafting the report. Ego does play a part of our professional careers. I'm sure that the document was released. That's the end of my Oswald story, and that piece of history.

Q: It might be a little beyond the scope of this interview, but what would be the purpose of a Soviet "plant," claiming that Oswald was working for the KGB?

MORGAN: That's a very good question. At the time, I'm sure that I had a detailed answer to it. However, thinking about it now, perhaps the objective was to create confusion, to mislead, and to test the British Embassy's handling of "informants". Perhaps they also were testing the American reaction. Those are a few ideas which come off the top of my head. Because it wasn't an "authorized" KGB operation -- I'm assuming that it was a "plant" -- it had to be done by the KGB. Remember that the KGB at that time, under Khrushchev, probably was more "sensitive" to criticism. Probably, it was more "sensitive" to whatever role it did play. We do know some things about Oswald and his wife and his connection with the KGB, etc. "Disinformation" is often used to mislead or to try to confuse you. You may recall from the days of World War II that there was a view that we should "give the [Abwehr] highly detailed information so that Germany would fall from the weight of this information, since they wouldn't know how to file it all." There is that consideration. However, finally, I don't know. It may have been stupidity, and the Soviet Union was fond of intrigue and complexity. Don't forget that a lot of the things they did were just "dumb." Is that enough for this interview?

Q: Yes. Let's turn now to the post-Moscow period, which was in the fall of 1964. Is that correct?

MORGAN: Yes. About September, 1964, the point when Nikita Sergeyevich Khrushchev fell from power.

Q: You were assigned back to the Department of State to work as a desk officer in the Office of Soviet Union Affairs. How did you get the assignment?

MORGAN: Routinely, in the sense that most of us in those days who had served in the Embassy in Moscow were "lined up" for a job in INR (Bureau of Intelligence Research), working on Soviet Affairs, a job in the USSR Exchanges of Persons program, or the Soviet desk in the Bureau of European Affairs. Most of us went to the latter, unless we were highly specialized, like a petroleum or science officer or something like that -- or came from some other place. But those of us who were "trainees", if you will, or were involved in a two-year language and area studies assignment in Moscow, would go to one of those positions. I was assigned to SOV (Office of Soviet Union Affairs).

***

Q: Tell us about the office and how it was set up. Some of our readers may not be so familiar with the State Department. What exactly is a "country desk"? You might think of people sitting around a table who were the greatest experts in the world on a given subject.

MORGAN: Well, we were. That's characteristic of the State Department. It still has "tables of experts." However, the real answer to your question is that the Department of State, to put it very simply, is basically cut into two parts. One is composed of "functional" bureaus, and the other is geographic bureaus. The functional bureaus include consular, intelligence, economic, political-military, administration, general services, and so on. Those are all "functional" areas. They are big offices. They have "desks", let's call them offices, where the specialists of varying degrees work. They are a combination of Civil Service employees and Foreign Service Officers and staff. The same is true of the geographic bureaus, which have both civil service and Foreign Service Officers. They are very much intermingled. However, the functional bureaus largely deal with their [particular] function. The Consular Bureau, for example, has to carry out the laws dealing with consular affairs -- visas, the protection of Americans [overseas], and passports.

The geographic bureaus cover the world, which is broken down into geographic areas: Europe and Canada, East Asia, South Asia, the Near East and North Africa, South of the Sahara Africa, and Latin America. Those are the geographic bureaus. Within each one of these geographic bureaus are subordinate offices, sometimes called desks if the office is confined to one country.. SOV is part of the Bureau of European Affairs, although it also covers that part of the former Soviet Union, now mostly Russia, which extends into Asia. In fact, responsibility for Moscow is assigned to the European Bureau. Canada was under the European Bureau, but finally, the Canadians "got their independence" and the Bureau of European Affairs became the Bureau of European and Canadian Affairs. Within the European Bureau there are many desks. SOV had about 12 officers assigned there, plus eight or so support staff, including secretaries and clerical help. We focused on the Soviet Union, which in turn was broken down into three parts within the Office of Soviet Affairs. First was Soviet Bilateral Affairs, to which I was assigned. It dealt only with U.S.-U.S.S.R. relations in all of their dimensions. Another section was Soviet Multilateral Affairs, which dealt with U.S.S.R.-third country or international organizations such as NATO, UN affairs and how they affected the U.S. interests. Soviet-U.S. economic issues was the third element of SOV and was a very small office consisting of two or three officers. This is not to be confused with the Economic Bureau of the Department!. Yes, they all worked together, but this was a specialized area within SOV, the Soviet "desk." It focused largely on Soviet agricultural and economic affairs. In my Soviet Bilateral Affairs section I was deputy to Carroll Woods, the director. We had two other, more junior officers, neither of whom had served in the Soviet Union. Also was Virginia James, about whom I spoke above and, as a Civil Service employee, had served in SOV for many, many years. She largely followed issues with a need for continuity, like people in jail, for example.

In turn, to go on with your question, we divided responsibility for specific aspects of our bilateral relations among the three or four officers in SOV. Carroll Woods, as the Office Director, was involved in all of issues and some topics he was especially interested or qualified in. As one of the three Office Directors in SOV, he reported to the head of the Soviet "desk," who was, my first year, David Henry. Mac Toon succeeded him. There was also a Deputy Director. They took care of the larger problems that related to the Soviet Union, many of which started with us subordinates or at least were tracked on a routine basis until they escalated to the bosses, including the White House. I have read with great interest of recent efforts to "de-layer" -- remove supervisory personnel -- the bureaucracy. It's not easy, as you naturally report through your own channels to bosses of more authority, and hopefully more skills and knowledge. There were numerous such layers at that time. Nevertheless, I reported to Carroll Woods, period. Once in a while I would find myself taking guidance or direction directly from Toon or Henry or even from an Assistant Secretary of State -- although that was most extraordinary. The structure was very "layered."

Finally, there were my specific "areas of competence", as we called them. Whether I was really "competent" or not didn't matter; the desk called them that. They included maritime, military and general consular affairs. I also followed the activities of those "spying" Soviet diplomats as they maneuvered around our society. I looked into such things as violations of their travel status. Another responsibility of mine was the control of travel by Soviet diplomats in the U. S.. This was a result of the Soviets' restricting our travel and access the Soviet Union. I did the same thing against them, in "retaliation". I made sure that in the case of any diplomatic note which came from the Soviet Embassy to the State Department, advising of the travel plans of Soviet diplomats, that the local authorities in whatever state knew that they were coming there and what they were coming for. And I "made note of" and advised them in writing when they violated the approved itinerary. That was a "black mark" against them.

Q: I think that I remember hearing that even until recently cities like St. Louis, Seattle, and other places that either had military installations or buildings with military significance, like the Boeing Company or McDonnell-Douglas aircraft factories, were "off limits" to Soviet diplomats.

MORGAN: I don't know specifically that those areas were "off limits" but let me use the case of the Boeing factory, because I think that it is a very good example of the difficulties of U. S. relations with the U. S. S. R. Certainly, this was the case in those days and up until the fall of the Berlin Wall, communism, and the Soviet Union.

Q: Do these restrictions continue today?

MORGAN: Yes, every nation has the right and obligation to guard its own national secrets. So if you have a naval base or an air force base, you "close" it. You "close" it also to Americans in that sense. I'm sure that today there still are special rules about keeping Russians or Poles or French or Canadians away from certain installations. They may be still today applied on the basis of reciprocity; I just don't know. Remember, there are two considerations here. We and the Soviets had the "need" to protect certain facilities. At the same time, some of the effort we exerted to keep the Soviets away from some installations was sheer "pressure" on them to give up their control on our diplomats in areas which, as far as we were concerned, should have been "wide open." There was no military interest in them at all. They just wanted to control us. I underscore that.

When the Soviets first applied a travel restriction on us -- I should remember the date, but I do not -- they started saying that you cannot go beyond a 40 kilometer (25 mile) circle of certain areas in the Soviet Union, Moscow for instance. You cannot travel to these areas. You must get permission to go any place else in the Soviet Union. There were certain areas which, by definition, were "closed." You needed special permission to go there. Other areas were "open," but you still had to get specific permission to travel there. All of that was a bore and a symbol of authoritarian controls by a totalitarian state of the worst sort. It was a symbol of a bureaucracy which had run "amuck." I can assure you that an awful lot of these restrictions were cases of bureaucracy at its worst. It wasn't really that the Soviets wanted unnecessarily to harass us, although they enjoyed doing that very much. It wasn't to keep secrets. It was just the bureaucracy. This kept a lot of people very, very busy, watching where we were going and then turning over to the KGB all of this information so that they could follow us.

Obviously, the first purpose of these controls was to preserve secrecy, but it was also just to keep the system going. This was like winning World War II by inundating the Germans with too many documents. I think that the Soviet Union, in part, fell because of the heavy and inefficient bureaucracy -- just plain inefficiency.

Seriously, though, those are some of the things I did on the Soviet desk for my two years there (1964-66). I had to follow where the Soviets went, constantly reminding them that we were not going to harass them. We did it largely to convince them that their excessive travel controls was a system which they should abandon. Of course, both sides had to protect those areas which were highly sensitive for military or other truly sensitive reasons. Remember that the Soviets thought that some of the areas which were "sensitive" were non-military in character or were "sensitive" for non-military reasons. They were embarrassed -- or there were problems there that they wished to keep from foreigners, or often from their own citizens. There may have been internal issues, not that a revolution was under way, but there were a lot of reasons to keep us out. They didn't want us to see certain areas, lest they be shown to be not up to standard, etc.

What we did was constantly work at them and remind them that, "Yes, you must ask permission to go to St. Louis. It's a wide open and wonderful city. The only reason that we are doing this is in reciprocity for what you have done to our Embassy people in the Soviet Union."

Q: Can you tell us exactly how you would do that?

MORGAN: Yes. We did the exact same thing they did. Doesn't that sound awful. Every time that travel was scheduled to a university, a meeting, a lecture, or any other purpose Soviet diplomats in the U. S. were required to send us a diplomatic note with a schedule of the proposed trip. I would get the note and copies of the note would go out to the areas concerned and to U.S. government concerned agencies. If a Soviet diplomat were going to visit the University of California to make a speech on this or that subject, they had to put down the specific reason, the date, the method of transportation, and so on. This schedule was turned over to the FBI (Federal Bureau of Investigation), the University of California, and the local authorities (in California), so that they knew who was coming and what the purpose was. We would also confirm the schedule with the sponsoring group. Of course, under an agreement with the United Nations, anyone going to New York could not be restricted. However, we insisted on knowing when they were going and what the circumstances were.

If the purpose of the travel was in connection with a controversial meeting of some sort and the press had already learned of it, or there were groups opposed to that Soviet official going there, we might double check the circumstances and ramifications of the travel]. Sometimes I found myself caught between groups that wanted a Soviet representative at a meeting and groups which did not want him there. Going back to your question about the aviation industry -- a visit to the Boeing Aircraft factory in Seattle and so on -- not all U. S. Government agencies were in agreement on how to handle such a matter. CIA might want one thing, the FBI might want something different, and the U. S. military might want something still different -- or had different inputs into the reasons for making certain areas "out of bounds" for travel by Soviet diplomats. Some of the proposed travel resulted in long, inter-agency battles.

Q: Can you "walk us through" one such controversial case that you can remember -- that really takes us through the decision-making process?

MORGAN: Well, as you can imagine, picking a specific case out of my memory is not easy, but let me walk you through the process. Then I'll either come up with one example and/or give you a typical case. First of all, not every single request for travel requires the approval of a huge "sea" of bureaucrats. Most of these requests were very, very routine and were approved without difficulty. Let's take first the case where only the State Department was concerned. That would involve reciprocity. We would have reason, because of a very bad case recently in Moscow, where the Defense Attaché ran into one of these very difficult situations in connection with, for example, a proposed visit of his to Vladivostok. We wished to retaliate. So our comparable "reciprocity" in this case would be to delay action on the next application by a Soviet diplomat to visit some place in the United States. This request might involve the simplest, most acceptable, proposed visit in the world. However, it well might involve an application for permission to travel by a man of relatively the same rank as our man in Moscow who had been denied permission to travel. In other words, we would try to find a case as similar as we could find. We usually we make no reference to the case in Moscow, at least by name, etc. That was our way of showing that we disapproved of the way the Soviets had handled a comparable case in the Soviet Union. But the Soviets knew, of course. In such cases the State Department acted on its own authority, in retaliation. Reciprocity is the word we would use. To say it today, thirty years later and post-USSR, it sounds a bit childish. But we were convinced at the time it was an essential quid pro quo to get the Soviets to make changes in their system, if they wanted to "play with the big boys".

Take another case involving the State Department and other U. S. Government agencies, but not in the intelligence community. Let's say that St. Louis University had invited some Soviet scientists to go out to St. Louis, as well as the Science Officer in the Soviet Embassy in Washington to join them. The Soviet scientists would come under the exchanges program. That would have been approved ahead of time -- their itinerary, and so forth. Their visit came under my counterpart in the US-USSR Exchanges office. The Soviet scientists were in exchange for a comparable program of scientists from the U.S. going to the Soviet Union.. Both itineraries, their programs, and their leaders were all agreed to in advance, and visa applications submitted and approved, or turned down. My office was not directly, "operationally" involved, although both of us in the State Department went through the same process of U.S. clearance.

Now we have the case of the Science Officer of the Soviet Embassy wanting to join in at the program at the university. The embassy officer has received some previous bad local publicity. This all results in a tremendous, local brouhaha. The White House and several Members of Congress have gotten involved. There are various groups taking pro and con positions. We would find ourselves at the State Department -- and this is something like approving a visa, if you will -- working at this issue from the political point of view. Is it in the U. S. national interest to have this issue go one way or the other? The Secretary of State -- and maybe the President -- would have to decide. Many of these questions reach the very highest level. An issue like this is not an intelligence one, but a policy question, including the integrity of the Exchanges Agreement.

Q: Exactly how was that decision made? When you received such a request for permission for the Science Officer of the Soviet Embassy to attend a meeting, what did you do with it?

MORGAN: I “worked” the Science Officer’s diplomatic note. I knew the purpose of his visit and the opposing views. I’d wrap the elements of the case into a “Decision Memo”, get clearances from all those with differing views, largely in the Department and then start the paper “upward”. I would probably make a recommendation. Cases like the one above were settled in the State Department, probably at the Assistant Secretary Level or maybe just by the Soviet desk. In some cases a functional bureau, say, the Consular Bureau, if a visa were involved, or the Economic, Science, or Energy Bureaus on other issues might have a strong “vote” in the decision. But most discussions largely focused -- were worked -- on the geographic desk. This was not just the case with the Soviet desk. Whenever there are issues that need to be decided, reconciled, they always end up on the geographic desk. If they can’t be settled at a lower level by the desk, in consultation with other parties, they go up to the level of the Assistant Secretary. From there, they may go up to the Secretary of State or even the White House -- the “Seat of Authority” of Power. That’s the route involved, to answer your question as to how you get a request approved or disapproved.

If the Secretary of State should approve the request and another agency such as the ABC (Atomic Energy Commission -- now Nuclear Regulatory Commission) -- didn’t like that decision, it can appeal to the President. And that’s what it does. Then there is Congress, of course. Let’s not forget that members of the House of Representatives and the Senate are involved in such issues all the time, usually because there is a constituent who has expressed himself one way or the other, or because there is a Congressman whose area of competence causes him to get involved.

What you’re getting at is the more routine, clearance procedure needed for national security related issues. All of those others were basically “political” issues, in which the State Department is primarily involved in U.S.-U.S.S.R. bilateral relations. However, a decision may involve other areas, such as a military base or a KGB agent who is off “spying” or “ensnaring”. That was also my area of “expertise.” We pretty much knew who was who. We kept a little book listing who was and who wasn’t a KGB agent. Of course, no government agency would say, “So and so is a KGB agent.” The phraseology would always be, “He is believed to be a KGB or GRU (military intelligence) agent.” I would say that a good 50% of the people assigned to the Soviet Embassy in Washington were KGB agents. But the distinction between diplomats who were employed by that agency or other Soviet agencies, as far as security is concerned, is moot.

Remember, they had no “local American” staff -- no equivalent of the Foreign Service National staff. They were all Soviet citizens. Many of them at the theoretically “lower” levels, in fact, were intelligence operatives. Other officials in the Embassy often took their directions from them. KGB officials often had the “cover” of “First Secretary for so and so.” The senior officer of the KGB was known as the “Rezident,” and most in the Soviet Embassy knew who he was. I think that he “passed” semi-officially as “Rezident.” Beyond that, other agents were sort of “buried” in the Consular Section or other parts of the Embassy. The Soviet Ambassador’s chauffeur was probably at least a colonel in the KGB. Then other Soviet citizens holding various jobs, such as journalists were also considered to be, if not under the control of the KGB, certainly under its influence. At the Embassy, too, those not employed directly by the KGB might be real Soviet Foreign Office people. However, they walked a very careful line. The Ambassador was not a KGB officer, but he listened carefully to the Rezident.

The other intelligence group was the GRU, the military intelligence organization. They were a large group but they focused on military questions, just as in Moscow we had a large, military attaché office. The people in our Embassy in Moscow were largely from DIA (Defense Intelligence Agency). Some of them were associated with the CIA.

When GRU people traveled or were out “doing something,” they were looked at very carefully by all of the members of the clearance committee. On the committee were representatives of the military, CIA, FBI, I think, maybe, the ABC—all of those agencies involved in national security in one way or another were members of the clearance committee. We didn’t meet around a table. It was very rare that we sat down and discussed some issue. We handled it by telephone.

Obviously, we were not discussing classified material on the telephone, but we knew what the issue was. We also used interagency memoranda transmitted by secure, interagency means, much like telegrams from our Embassies abroad. If the FBI, for example, had a reason to object to a certain person leaving Washington, they would send a “No” back to the State Department and often come and visit me to discuss the problem. We would have to go back to them and say that you can’t just say “No.” A negative response was only acceptable if one of the agencies had a very strong defensible objection to the individual’s travel. Usually, there weren’t many objections. For instance, you didn’t have the FBI and the CIA squabbling over whether one Soviet official went on a particular trip or didn’t go. Usually, if there was a serious doubt, they didn’t go.

Often, reciprocity was the principal consideration. I don’t say that we did it to be mean. We would declare someone persona non grata, taking the next person in the list I kept of folks deserving to be expelled. Action of this kind wasn’t taken out of meanness. It was because the persons involved had the biggest or the most “black marks” against them and/or because it was time to exercise reciprocity for what was being done in Moscow.

Q: You mentioned the “black box.” First of all, what did that mean and how did you rank the bad guys?

MORGAN: I had 5” x 7” file cards and a black file box big enough to hold them. It was three or four inches thick. I kept cards which I made out myself, every time a new Soviet diplomat arrived, with his (there were few “hers” in those days) name and probably date of birth, as well as his title. The CIA keeps regular biographies on these people. I probably prepared a summary of their biographies on the front of the card. Basically, these were UNCLASSIFIED cards. That is, there was UNCLASSIFIED information on them, but it was not to be distributed. I didn’t put extraordinarily sensitive information on the cards, but I indicated on the card whether they were believed to be GRU or KGB. I indicated what their assignment might be.

Routinely, FBI information flowed to us on these people, as they were observed in their functions, or were visited, perhaps, by somebody. As you know, it’s rather common knowledge that the FBI kept a keen eye and ear on what happened within the Soviet Embassy and when Embassy personnel traveled. FBI reports on these people went across my desk. I would read them. They tended to be terribly involved, extraordinarily bureaucratic, and written in a kind of “double talk.” Never could they say that the information came from eavesdropping, because they would never admit it. They would say that the information came from “a known, reliable source,” a “thought to be reliable source,” a “suspected to be reliable source,” or a “sometimes reliable source.” They used these “jargon” words to describe a mechanical device or, in some cases, a real person “who is known to be.” The report contained those “caveats,” and I would then make a note -- if the man had been “caught” servicing a suspected] mail box or “lamp post”. In other words, activity which involved really serious indications that the man was “performing duties not in accordance with his diplomatic status.” That, of course, was the basis for declaring him persona non grata. This, of course, is what the Soviets did frequently, but it was a matter of degree or seriousness behind their motive.

I would put little sentences on the card which would accumulate over the year or years that the Soviet diplomat had behaved in “improper” fashion. Then I shuffled the cards in “rank” order of black marks. Number one card probably was PNGed next.

Q: Was it really at your discretion to pull out a card, give it to your superiors, and say to him, “This is the next person in line to be ‘PNGed’?”

MORGAN: Yes, but the only word I would argue with is “discretion.” It was a mechanical thing. I kept records of this kind on these people in the box, basically in chronological order. As new people arrived, I would put them at the back of the box, to work their way forward. What we tried to do was what the Soviets tried to do. That was to “PNG” the right person. Obviously, there would be people whom we would “PNG” in their own right. If a person really got caught “red handed,” the FBI wanted to kick him out of the country. Sometimes they’d go “public” which forced our hands. We objected, but the CIA really raised the roof: “Now they’ll get one of ours”. The question would get into the newspapers, and the American public would demand, “Get this man out of our country.”

However, often -- and I don’t have any specific recollection of a real case -- if the Soviets “PNGed” one of our people, later on they would say that it was their right to do this, and they of course were correct. Hopefully, it would be somebody who was nearing the end of his tour in Moscow. To expel somebody early in his tour meant that you were “throwing him out” forever, because once a person is “PNGed,” he will seldom be able to go back to that country. In a very few cases we were able to arrange for people who had been “PNGed” to go back to Moscow, but there were very few of these. So by “PNGing” somebody, you were ending that person’s career in Soviet affairs, as well as blow years of preparation and expertise.

So PNGing was a very serious step. It applied to the Soviet Bloc countries, too. The Soviets also did not want their person to have to leave the United States after he had only been here for, say, a week or a month. He would have gone through an enormously extended period of training. Read the book, “The Charm School,” by Nelson De Mille, for example, to get some idea of the years of training involved for some of them. Our people are trained for a shorter period, but it still involves a long period of time and lots of resources.

So the decision to “PNG” somebody was a chronological decision. You tried to find someone who had been in, say, Washington about the same length of time as the person expelled from our Embassy in Moscow. However, the thickness of the card, the length of the entries, “earning” his place at the top of the list (or front of the box) because of the behavior he had been involved in would also play a role in the selection of the person for expulsion. Maybe there had been clear, previous expressions of our dismay at the behavior of the person. That sort of thing would cause such a person to come to the front of the box. I would maintain the box mechanically, but often driven by the length of service in Washington.. I would be asked, "Who's next?" And I would say, "Abramov," or whoever. I would prepare a memorandum giving the reasons for the choice - maybe attaching the full FBI reports which I had received and filed away. The final decision would always be decided at a very high level. Maybe it would require approval by the Secretary of State for someone to be "PNGed," because of the possible ramifications

Q: Could we talk about some of the other things that you did. Did you monitor the movement of ships?

MORGAN: Yes. For lack of a more specific term, I had a sort of "military" responsibility: the military, in general, although certainly our political-military people and our military people had a big piece of that. However, on bilateral political issues, I was pretty much responsible for military matters. Very few of these involved the Soviet Army or Air Force. Once in a while an incident would occur in which a U. S. plane had been shot down by mistake, deliberately, or whatever. But that was rare. The same was true of the Soviet Army. All of the exercises held were so routine that nobody ever crossed the line into the Federal Republic of Germany.

I think that the biggest thing I got involved in concerned John Hemenway, a former U.S. military officer and later an FSO, diplomat in Moscow. He was on the German desk when I was in SOV. He came storming into my office one day and said, "Bill, we must get ready to go to war!" He was livid. I asked, "What happened?" He said, "Well, the Soviet Army in Berlin is making us lower the tail gates of our trucks." We had refused to lower our tail gates, and this became a very serious issue between the Soviet Army and the U. S. Army. Things like that were rare. That was more a question of John Hemenway getting excited than it was an issue between the Soviet and American Armies, because in Berlin all sides kept things fairly under control and orderly. They weren't "poking" each other. Incidentally, John calmed down, eventually, and we didn't go to war, and I can't remember what we did with our tail gates!

That left the Navy -- and the Treasury, because, I might remind you -- the Department of the Treasury was then responsible for the Coast Guard. (I believe the Coast Guard came under the Department of Transportation in 1967.) The Coast Guard was where most of the "action" was for me. But, first of all, the Navy. Both the Soviet and the American Navy -- I would like to say, absolutely equally -- like to play "chicken." I think it must be something written in the manuals of both navies. My son is in the Navy. I must ask him to say what the manual says about encounters with Soviet Navy ships. Clearly, it was part of the "game" -- to break the boredom, that's what you do on the high seas in the North, when the icebergs are coming at you. You play "chicken." to test each other -- each other's prowess and professional abilities. I exaggerate somewhat, but not a lot. When we got into these cases afterwards, we found out that that's what was happening. They had become too damned "clever" and "cute." And, of course, I would have to blame the other side for being equally "cute," or I think I used the word "provocative" in the diplomatic note I drafted. I knew the Soviets would understand that word. I got into such incidents, encounters; they ended up on my desk.

Q: Can you remember one, specific incident? What does that mean and how did it reach your desk?

MORGAN: Let's say that it happened near Murmansk, out on the high seas, where there are more Soviet than American ships. We have an American submarine, and there is a Soviet submarine operating nearby. Or an American cruiser or destroyer. A Soviet flotilla is coming out from Soviet territorial waters and into the high seas, off Norway. The first thing you know an American cruiser is passing a Soviet cruiser, six yards apart. Or they scrape each other or back into each other. They are "playing games" on the high seas and at some speed. This was happening -- and still happens. It's a way -- I should not go on any further in characterizing this behavior. But it was trouble, because you had to back your way through "non-apologies," through "who saw it first," through "intensive examinations," through things that took an awful lot of time for just one, simple thing. From one Navy to another Navy. And no lessons learned whatsoever, nor victories claimed.

The big thing with the Navy, with the Coast Guard, in part, and with the Canadian Government, because it sometimes happened in Canadian territorial waters, transit through the "Northwest Passage," for example, in the area of pack ice, and sometimes under the ice. The Navy made an annual or maybe semi-annual trip through the Northwest Passage. Some of the trip was by submarine under the ice. A lot of it was by cruisers through the pack ice, preceded by icebreakers. It was our Navy's way of asserting our "rights." We did not accept Canadian claim of national waters or said all navies have the right of transit from one national territory to another. This basically is international naval law and what keeps lawyers in business. The high seas are anyone's territory. There was a big question regarding the Dardanelles Strait, which flows into the Mediterranean Sea, and other, similar issues, involving international waters. Who proves that they are international waters? The fleets of the various nations. That's where we got into trouble. Sometimes it involved the Canadians. They said that the Northwest Passage is in their territory, and we have to ask their permission to pass through it. The Soviets would go through, our Navy would go through, and we would find ourselves involved in encounters and disputes -- sometimes caused by "provocative acts" on our part or on their part. In some cases these were accidental. Some of these incidents were tragic, in which some people lost their lives.

But naval tradition was also the basis for one of the nicer aspects of bilateral Soviet-American relations. Let me now switch 180 degrees. When one sailor is in trouble, another sailor helps. It doesn't matter what country it is. If there is an accident on the high seas, a ship of another Navy will come to the rescue. I've seen some cases of the Soviet Navy helping the American Navy.

As an outgrowth of the Navy and other U.S. agencies, I remember case of exceptional cooperation. When I was in SOV I got very much involved in a program which the Soviets wanted. It first came up when I was on a trip to Siberia and visited the Far North. The topic is "permafrost." -- permanently frozen earth just inches under the surface. The Soviets had an excellent Permafrost Institute in Yakutsk up near the Arctic Circle. I spent a day there with the director and staff. We had some undertakings with Canada, especially since we adjoined territorially in the frozen north. With the Soviets, who joined in with Canada and the U.S. some wonderful things developed -- testing permafrost conditions and exchanging information. That was one of the more positive things that happened with the USSR back in the days of the Cold War.

Contact with the Coast Guard was really the area where most of my time with maritime affairs was spent. This involved Soviet ships coming, either by request or by accident, into American ports. There were far fewer American ships going into Soviet ports, in part because the USSR doesn't have the number or types of ports that we do. Soviet ports are located in a very limited area along the Pacific Ocean and the Baltic and Black Seas. We had some problems with the Black Sea when American ships tried to get to Soviet ports. Actually, some of the Soviet ships had accidents or problems off our coasts and they needed to be rescued or assisted. But all of that needed our permission -- literally, my agreement.

We had one official from the office of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury who was responsible for Coast Guard affairs. We had some stressful moments. I guess that I "excited" him, particularly when I had to raise a problem with him in the middle of the night, such as Treasury's ok for a Soviet ship to come into New York. Usually, under such extreme conditions, such a request involved an accident to the ship's engines or something like that. In other cases it was deliberate -- they were merely testing us. Finally, in some cases, it was simply a "formal" request.

We in State were always looking for ways to try to improve Soviet-American relationships. Sometimes, there were little things like these maritime issues which were symbolic and which both sides, down into the two system, wanted. That is, the U. S. Coast Guard and the Soviet Maritime fleets and counterparts. There were a lot of forces out there that weren't trying to find ways to show us as enemies but, rather, how we might relieve some of the tensions that existed between the two superpowers..

This often involved working within the Soviet system of bureaucratic controls. We knew that if we could "eat away" at rigid, "knee jerk" reactions to Cold War antagonisms it would eventually produce a more relaxed relationship, detente, if I may use the exact term.. It would be better to keep working at this tactic: the visitor exchanges program, for example.. By the way, the Soviets had -- how shall we say it -- ideological reasons to support such exchange agreements. They were ideological in the sense of showing the Soviet Union as a country rich in cultural affairs such as music, opera, ballet, literature...and highly competitive in scientific research and accomplishments. It was rewarding to see some of our military colleagues -- certainly maritime - - recognize that it was in our national interest to strive to reduce tensions and sources of disagreement.

JACK R. PERRY
Exchanges Officer, Soviet Exchanges Staff, Bureau of European Affairs
Washington, DC (1960-1962)

Personnel/Political Officer
Moscow (1962-1964)

Ambassador Jack R. Perry was born in 1930 and raised in Georgia. He received a bachelor's degree from Mercer University and a master's degree and doctorate from Columbia University. He served in the U.S. Army from 1951-1954.

Ambassador Perry's career in the Foreign Service included positions in Moscow, Paris, Prague, and Stockholm, and an ambassadorship to Bulgaria. Ambassador Perry was interviewed by Henry Mattox on July 2, 1992.

PERRY: My first assignment, to my astonishment, was the State Department. I had thought that everybody went overseas first, but back in those days, at least, not everybody did -- because we got stuck in Washington for two years, living in a very inferior apartment which we had thought we were only going to be in for a few months. However, the job was great. My first assignment was the Soviet Exchanges Staff, which was created in 1957, I think, to follow up on the "spirit of Geneva." Our office handled cultural exchanges with the Russians. So my first two years I spent working in the Bureau of European Affairs on Soviet exchanges, a fascinating assignment.

Q: Give me an example of what you might do, what your office was responsible for.

PERRY: My boss for those two years was a very fine FSO named Frank Siscoe, who had already served in Moscow. Frank assigned me to cover, among other things, tourism. There was an effort then to increase tourism to the Soviet Union, and to try to get more Russians to come to the United States, which was, of course, a very different kettle of fish.

One of my fun endeavors was to escort a group of Soviet tourist experts around the United States, to places like Miami and Chicago and other places that Soviet tourists might be going. And, needless to say, that was a great learning experience.

Another fun time I had was when we were staging exhibits in the Soviet Union, and they were staging exhibits reciprocally in the United States. We were about to open a medical exhibit in Moscow, and they were about to open one in Oklahoma City. The Soviets were not giving us the kind of facilities in Moscow we felt we had to have to stage a successful exhibit. So Frank Siscoe, my boss, being a pretty combative fellow, determined that, by God, if they weren't going to let us do it right, we weren't going to have the exhibit, and we weren't going to let them open their exhibit in Oklahoma City. So he sent me out to Oklahoma City to stand in the door, as it were, and forbid the Russians from opening their exhibit. Well, it was sort of a nervous assignment, because the Oklahoma State Fair was going to feature this medical exhibit from the Soviet Union, and, needless to say, in those days (this was 1961, I suppose), there was a lot of excitement about Soviet exhibits. I literally had to go up to the tent and say, "You cannot open." And since the State Department's not used to having that kind of power, I wasn't sure it would work. But, sure enough, it did work. And it turned out to be quite a pleasant time, because the people of Oklahoma City understood and they didn't blame us -- and they took those Russian doctors (there was a whole gaggle of them with this exhibit) to their hearts. And so the Russian doctors had a wonderful time, because they were entertained by the doctors of Oklahoma City every night.

Q: Were we in a period of detente at that time?

PERRY: It's always hard to say exactly what was "a period of detente," but I think you would say so. I can't remember the exact timing of this, but I believe it may have been in the last year of the Eisenhower administration or the first year of the Kennedy administration. At any rate, it was before the Cuban missile crisis, and therefore things were relatively good.

Q: With that kind of background and that kind of initial assignment, you were clearly on track for a Moscow assignment. According to my estimation, you went off in '62 as personnel officer.

PERRY: Yes, being personnel officer was a funny thing. The embassy in Moscow was trying to expand its number of officers who spoke Russian, because there were so many things to be done besides work in the office. Since all of our officers in Moscow who spoke Russian (and most of us did) could travel and could see the country in a way you couldn't in Moscow, they could potentially make contacts with the Russians and all the rest of it, so they were trying to expand the staff. And they came up the idea of adding that year a personnel officer and an assistant GSO (General Services Officer), both of whom were youngish, junior Russian speakers. So I felt lucky to get the job.

It was a very tedious job. I kept the leave cards and planned people's travel and other 'personnelly' type things for a year before I got promoted (I guess it's a promotion) to the Political Section.

But the interesting thing about it, I think, is that the Soviets seemed to think that my job was a CIA position. I guess to them personnel seemed a little bit sensitive, and they seemed to think that I might be CIA. And they treated me with a great deal of attention. The surveillance that I got (and my wife, too, who got even more than I did) was very strong.

There was a Yale professor, Frederick Barghoorn (this was the second year of the Kennedy administration), who was more or less kidnaped by the Russians on the streets of Moscow, and it was quite a cause célèbre at the time. I was told by my friends who had access to the information that the Soviets asked Barghoorn repeatedly about me and what I did at the embassy. Well, Barghoorn had never heard of me or seen me, and I was nothing to him, so he couldn't give them any answer. But I took that as a sort of a gratifying sign that the Soviets must think I was much more important than I was.

Q: You had been in Army Intelligence, though.

PERRY: Well, not really. I was in the Army Security Agency, which was electronic intercept stuff. And very low level, at that.

Q: But as far as the KGB would be concerned...

PERRY: Well, they probably thought so. They probably did.

Q: Well, I don't know. I'm just sort of fishing here.

PERRY: Probably true, yes. They may have put that together. In any event, they were wrong. For me, "personnel" meant leave cards, not spying.

Q: Did you find that you had, in the two years...I assume it was exactly two years you were in Moscow...

PERRY: Just about, yes.

Q: Did you find that the stresses and strains and tensions got to you, as many people have said about their tours during those times?

PERRY: I don't think so. My wife and I (two of our four children had been born at that time) had a very pleasant time. We remember Moscow most pleasantly.

There were certain things that happened, that all the old Moscow hands of those days know went on -- the surveillance, the wiretaps, even the microwaving of the embassy (which caused us some nervousness later when we found out about it). Those things went on, and it was not a particularly pleasant atmosphere, but the excitement of it and the knowledge that you were doing something really fascinating and important buoyed one up. To serve in Moscow in the early sixties was a privilege and an enjoyment as well, even if the Cold War atmosphere did close in about you at times.

I would also say that the spirit at the embassy in those days was really very good. We were close to each other. If the Foreign Service ever had a post, it seems to me, where people were fond of each other and enjoyed each other's company and formed a very warm little colony, it was Moscow in the early sixties.

You have to remember that we went through some trying times. We were there for the Cuban missile crisis. We were there for Kennedy's assassination. And we were there for some spy-trial stuff that caused a great deal of surveillance at the embassy -- Penkovsky, the Soviet colonel who was spying for the United States, was arrested while we were there. And the Penkovsky incident caused a lot of us to be declared persona non grata (not me, thank God), and just sort of stirred things up greatly.

But I guess I would have to say that all in all we found service in Moscow most exciting and most agreeable.

Q: Well, I'm quite prepared to believe that, but you were there, according to the list of things that you have just laid out, during some very tension-filled times, the Cuban missile crisis, perhaps, above all. Did you notice at the time, then, a perceptible tightening-down of surveillance or other kinds of harassment?

PERRY: Well, the Cuban missile crisis was an especially interesting time. Needless to say, I was just about the most junior officer at the embassy, and I had no real idea of what was going on. I mean, I wasn't privy to the cables. I know that the cars would go dashing over towards the Soviet Foreign Ministry with messages, and we'd see them go, but I didn't know what was in those messages.

It's hard to document this, but the feeling that my wife and I and our friends felt was that the Russian people were, by and large, trying to show us Americans that they were our friends and that they did not want war. In a general way, this has always been true. Whenever I've been in the Soviet Union (I have, of course, visited many times), most Russians like Americans and they've generally tried to show it. But during the Cuban missile crisis, I think that we felt a particularly strong feeling that the Russians were trying to communicate to us, in any way they could, that, gosh, we don't want war, and we have nothing against you.

To give you an example of how you felt this a little bit "in the air," we had a performing arts attraction that was touring the Soviet Union at the time. As I recall, it was the Shaw Chorale. They had been touring for some time before the Cuban missile crisis, and they were having a successful tour, but not an overwhelming tour. And then all of a sudden the Cuban missile crisis came, and they started getting these tumultuous ovations that would last for ten minutes or so. The embassy officers who were traveling with them (they were out in the boondocks) would call us up and say, "We don't know what's going on; all of a sudden these people have become well loved." And so our explanation for this is that the Russians were trying to show this American group: "We love you. We don't want to fight you; we love you." Well, one never knows about those things.

It was a somewhat tense time, there's no doubt about that. And the Russians did send mobs outside the embassy.

One of the experiences I'll never forget is that our next-door neighbors in our apartments, which were quite some miles from the embassy, had a governess, whom they had brought with them from British Guiana (now Guyana; then British Guiana). She was very religious, and she had been told that the Russians were atheists, and therefore she was somewhat fearful, and she wouldn't leave the apartment. And our friends, the Woods, kept saying, "You really must go out and enjoy life a little bit." So, about this time, they had lined up some tickets to go the Bolshoi Ballet, on a Saturday afternoon. They picked the worst possible time, because it was the day that the Russians decided to demonstrate about the Cuban missile crisis. They loaded the governess in the car with their children and the two of them, and they had to come by the embassy to pick up their tickets. And, of course, they drove straight into this mob of several thousand howling Russians. They were able to get out of the car, and all of us at the embassy were taken upstairs to the Marine apartment, which was on the top floor, that being considered the safest place, because people were throwing bottles at the embassy, and so forth. This poor woman from Guiana sat there and trembled for a couple of hours, and after that, I think she more or less refused to leave the apartment.

This riot, by the way, was the time that has become rather famous because an officer from the embassy went outside and mingled with the crowd and asked somebody, "How long do you think this will last?" And the guy looked at his watch and said, "It's going to be over in twenty-two minutes."

Q: Who was the ambassador then?

PERRY: Well, when we first went to Moscow, in the summer, it was Tommy Thompson. Llewellyn Thompson was there on his first tour, and then he went back later. But he left soon after we got there, and the new ambassador was Foy Kohler, who then stayed several years.

Q: And the DCM?

PERRY: The DCM was Jack McSweeney, our first year. The second year, it was Walter Stoessel. And Mac Toon was political counselor. So we had a pretty strong team; with Kohler, Stoessel, and Toon, it was quite a lineup.

Q: Stoessel, rather shockingly and unexpectedly, died not long ago.

PERRY: Right. In fact, among old Moscow hands, when we get together, one always brings up things like that -- the early deaths of so many of us -- and I suppose this is a phenomenon you would expect. But it was documented that the embassy was bombarded with microwaves for a long time by the Soviets. And we always compare notes as to how many of our colleagues died of cancer. And, to us, it always seems that there were large numbers that did so. But, of course, there are large numbers of people everywhere who die of cancer. I will say that Walter was exposed to an awful lot of those microwaves, because the ambassador's office was right up on the top floor, where it was probably pretty bad. So who knows.

VLADIMIR LEHOVICH
USIS Exhibition Tour
Soviet Union (1961-1962)

Vladimir Lehovich was born in New York in 1939 and received his Bachelor's Degree from Harvard University 1961. He was positioned in Saigon, Brussels, Bonn and Vienna. Charles Stuart Kennedy interviewed Lehovich on March 25, 1997.

Q: So, you came into the Foreign Service when?

LEHOVICH: Right after college. I followed up on a lead and called USIA and very soon found myself in a little group of people in Washington preparing to go off with a set of cultural exhibits to tour the Soviet Union. I went with two cultural exhibits, one on medicine and one on transportation.

Q: This is 1961.

LEHOVICH: In '61 and '62. I toured it for 9 or 10 months, from September 1961 until May of the following year. We had a grand time. We went to places like Stalingrad, Moscow, Kharkov, Kiev, and put up our show with about 20 guides. Our show was absolutely mobbed. We had as many as 10,00 visitors a day. I remember at that time I was keeping an informal log of my own social activities. My count was that I was invited by an average of 30-40 people a day to go and do something afterwards, at the end of the day. I was keeping this mental log because we were all a little worried about having the KGB take care of our free time for us. If you get 30 or 40 spontaneous invitations a day, you're changing the odds a great deal in your own favor. I simply followed my instinct and was out probably five to seven nights a week with some or other character or other.

Q: I think it's very interesting because contact between the East and West was normally so circumscribed in this. What type of things would you be doing?

LEHOVICH: A very good area -because it gets a little into the social history of the former Soviet Union. This was the Khrushchev period, '61 and '62. There was no question that it was much freer than things had been a few years earlier. This was the high Khrushchev period. Things were easier then than they became a few years later. So, I had a surprising amount of communication compared to what I had expected. There was a fair amount of surveillance, I think. Anytime one was out more than once with the same person, there would either be surveillance or the other party would be contacted. There was a real fine calculus of how much you want to see people on the one hand because you are attracted to them because they're nice people, and how much you don't want to put them in a tight spot. What one did, it's very simple. One went outdoors. One goes outdoors for two or three reasons. The abysmal housing shortage which has been the hallmark of the Soviet Union; the horrible cold nature of the winter; the shortness of the day. And, no privacy. All this means you're stuck and there's nowhere to go. So, what does one do? One spends enormous amounts of time taking walks. That was probably the biggest single thing that I did with any of the large number of folks that I got together with at one time or another in the former Soviet Union, take walks. It's a little like Adam and Eve. "Adam, do you love me?" "Of course, Eve, who else?" "Did you take a walk?" "Of course, what else is there to do?" There isn't much else to do. You can go to communal centers. You can go to some rather foul movie theaters. You couldn't really go to restaurants, normally speaking. They either didn't exist or were too crowded to get in, a real short commodity. Cafes were a little hard for the same reason. There really weren't places like that were accessible. So, one took long walks and got to know neighborhoods very well, very enjoyable.

Q: What did you find yourself imparting to the people you would walk with and they to you?

LEHOVICH: We had fairly endless conversations that would be a lot about society. A lot of it would be their showing me what was going on. With people one got to know very well, there was a very quick transition to a whole set of frustrations about the environment they were coming from. In the case of several people, the relationship was heavily based on humor. I'm a good audience and if somebody is a good raconteur or a good joke teller, I'm a person who is happy to shut up for very large periods of time. I listen and, above all, I laugh. Laughter is very spontaneous. I had a couple of people I met over there who were great raconteurs. I was a very good listener. Afterwards, I wrote down some of their best products and for a short time had one of the better joke books.

Q: So many of the jokes were nationally political, weren't they?

LEHOVICH: The jokes were delightfully political, a lot of them. They were basically jokes that were based on the sadness of the human condition or the sadness of the political condition or the sadness of the lack of food or the sadness of the shortness of the male organ or some other thing like that. In that sense, they're very similar to Yiddish humor and come from a mournful period.

Q: I always think of a sardine as a whale that has passed through all phases of socialism.

LEHOVICH: Actually, it's very good because it gives wonderful insights into a society. It's also terribly funny.

Q: Yes. Our society doesn't lend itself to spontaneous humor.

LEHOVICH: I think we're being badly hurt by what we see on television, one liners, where some bozo is writing poor jokes and it passes for humor. A lot of it is sarcasm packaged as a joke. I agree with you, Stu.

Q: In the first place, what did USIA before you went out; and, at the time, did you have an equivalent to a den mother or somebody who was trying to keep you under control?

LEHOVICH: Stu, thank you. I want to talk for minute or two about an amazing thing USIA did then. USIA took groups like the one I was a member of - i.e., groups of 10 to 20 people that they were sending off to a place like the former Soviet Union. Before sending them off to do, in effect, high class propaganda or high class publicity work on behalf of the US, they gave us a training program. My training program at USIA was two weeks. Many years later, it's still one of the most brilliant pieces of education and communication I've ever seen. For that two week period, it was run by Paul Conroy and Charles Vetter. Chuck Vetter is still around. Whenever you see Chuck Vetter, remember he was a terrific educator on behalf of USIA, as was Paul Conroy. They ran something not too different from what had been done with some of the civil rights crusaders. They were given training in how to react to a hostile environment without either imploding or exploding. We were given much the same stuff. We worked with these folks and then later with each other for a couple of weeks on dealing with issues, with likely questions, and with different forms of unpleasantness or confrontation that might be thrown at us - a very useful experience.

We did have some keen leaders or den mothers who went with us. They were very unusual people as well. One was Fran Macy, one of the most distinguished young public servants I had ever met at that time. Another was Jack Masey, a man with artistic flair and a terrific leader. They were not related. They both happened to be together and were very much our leaders at that time. On one of these exhibits, we were led by Andrew Falkiewicz, a USIA officer. Andy, in addition to being a very smart and very entertaining man and a good leader, was also a concert-quality pianist, a mathematician, and a very good chess player. Quite an unusual guy. Career USIA officer. I met him later in Vietnam when we were both down there.

Q: Were you provoked at all? I mean, I assume you would be getting up and explaining what various things were.

LEHOVICH: Yes, we were provoked quite a bit. It was typically done by these young people who were local party activists who got their kicks by going out on weekends with red armbands on their arms and enforcing public order and doing things like that. I guess for the first week or so it was pretty daunting to be baited by these people, but not for long. The reason is that about a week later we got better at it than they were. How many ways can you be abrasive to somebody that the person won't figure out after a while? You learn certain techniques of saying nothing for a while, knowing perfectly well what you're going to say a minute later when the fellow digs himself a little deeper or you let other people tell him to shut up because he's offensive.

Q: I'm sure, in a way, in a crowd like that, you're not going to find, you might say, the full discipline that you would find maybe in some other type of meeting.

LEHOVICH: In public, we never had to deal with truly gifted opponents because they weren't there to bait us. If they were, they were being quiet.

Q: Were you feeling any of the political tensions that were coming up about this time? We're within a few months of the rather difficult time for Kennedy after his first meeting with Khrushchev in Vienna, which didn't go well at all. We were calling up the Reserves. I was here in Washington and we really felt the pressure was moving up at that particular point.

LEHOVICH: It was. Later, not too long later, with the Cuban Missile Crisis, it moved up further. The amazing thing is, at this time, the only real tension that one felt in an international relations sense was Russian-Chinese relations. Somehow, this was the hot topic. To the extent that the Russians at that time were raising international topics spontaneously in private or group settings, that was very much the direction. It was very clear that something was changing and it was clear that the word had gone out that the Chinese were entering the bad list. The Americans had also been on a bad list, but it was so much better than a year or two before. We were pretty easy to deal with at that time.

Q: Did you find that you or any of your colleagues - were there attempts by the KGB to compromise you?

LEHOVICH: Yes, there were attempts to compromise a couple of my other colleagues. I was not put in that particular situation. I think what they were doing was conducting very intensive biographic intelligence on me, personality surveillance, psychological profiling. I think they were looking at me much more in terms of the long term than anything they wanted to mess up right there and then. I presume they knew that I was going to join the diplomatic service. I didn't conceal this kind of thing. So, the KGB was actually very decent to me. I knew that they were around all the time. They got me cabs without my knowing it or asking for it. Once, they pulled me out of a very nasty situation with a half-crazy drunk whose hobby was fist-fighting. He was very good at it. A half crazy drunk on a snowy night attacked me and was amusing himself by having me on the ground and was stomping on my ears. That's a very frustrating situation, Stu, when some guy is stomping on your ears, when you're lying on the ground, with the heel of his foot. Luckily, I had a hat on, which didn't come off. Even more luckily, a taxi pulled up, which I should have noticed earlier was in the neighborhood because of me. The driver got out and I saw from the ground out of the corner of my eye, he took the guy who was stomping on me, he hit him only once in the back of the neck, and then he stacked him like a big bag of potatoes against the wall. Then he changed the expression on his face to a friendly one and in a friendly way asked me if I wanted a taxi ride. That was the KGB. So, I didn't have any hostile behavior. The rules we played by, those of us who were reasonable about it, was not to make life hard for those guys and we didn't.

Q: I would have thought though, using young people - I've had problems with young Foreign Service officers who start playing games. I think, as you get older, you understand your surveillants are people doing their job and you don't play games. Why make it more difficult for them?

LEHOVICH: There's a big temptation to do it. I remember clearly that we were told in a very unambiguous way before and during not to do that. Apparently, it was convincing. The real reason you don't do it is because they have one of the dumber jobs in the country, and they were not being well-rewarded for it. It's not a particular glamorous job to tail people like me around. If you don't bother them, they think they've done a great job. They think they've followed you all day, know a lot about you, and have not fallen into disgrace and you haven't made an obscene gesture at them or anything like that. The only thing I ever did to those guys, which I think was a good thing to do on balance, was one evening when I was with a young lady at a cafe, one of these hard to find cafes in Moscow, called "The Cafe Lyra," which was open rather late every day and had a good omelette and very cheap champagne, a very drinkable kind. I sent a bottle of champagne and a glass with my compliments to the KGB monitor who followed me around most evenings. This fellow then left. I didn't mean for him to leave. I hoped he might enjoy the champagne, but he left. I felt more like James Bond than I ever had before or ever have since. I don't think that was an unfriendly thing to do to the guy.

Q: Did you find there was interest in the fact that, obviously, Vladimir Lehovich is not Joe Smith. I mean, the fact about your family and all of that.

LEHOVICH: There was. That tended to be something one had to get past in every conversation. Had to get past because for me, at least, it became very monotonous. Interestingly enough, one got past it very quickly because they were actually at that time much more interested in someone as a representative of another society with whom they could communicate in their language. But it was certainly an interest.

Q: What about connections with the American Ballet company and all of that? Did you find your mother's connection there. Was ballet at all a subject of interest at that time as far as American ballet goes?

LEHOVICH: Well, it was unknown. They were very full of their own ballet. At that time, their own ballet was absolutely excellent, but it had sort of the quality of a fine piece of Thai sculpture from the Ayuthya period. When you have a fine piece of Thai sculpture from the Ayuthya period, it's the same for 300 years. It's absolutely gorgeous but each rendition is the same. Russian ballet was gorgeous stuff, but had been done the same way for quite a long time, with sumptuous costume and great style. Unfortunately, America hadn't yet visited. They would get there soon afterwards. In serious art circles, American dance caused quite a sensation. Sorry if I go on about this stuff. I really enjoy the arts; it's an exciting theme..

Q: No, I'm trying to capture the times. Were there any elements of the United States that the people you would meet would particularly dwell on? I'm not talking about the ones who were set up to criticize you, but of genuine concerns. I'm thinking of race or the role of women.

LEHOVICH: I'll tell you, one wanted to get past that fairly soon. These issues, while real ones, were raised by people who had come with the intention of disrupting public conversation. The thing that was really interesting and the thing that people wanted to know about when they could speak more privately were not social issues or politics. They wanted to find out if it was true that... For example: "Is it true that in your society, you can get a telephone in a month?" "No, it's not. You can get a telephone in a day." "Well, I don't believe that." "Anyhow, you can get a telephone." "Is it true that the American economy is as generous to its people as we always heard?" It was asked in a hundred ways. There were also questions about freedoms -what you can read in the papers, what you can write about. The freedom that was the show stopper of all of them - so basic that people often did not realize that it existed - was that there was no national identity card in America, no system of required registration for where one lived, could live, that one could go and change jobs and change locations and seek one's employment or fortune or education anywhere in the country. This was the most unbelievable thing of all and still is to some degree. Amazing stuff. The political stuff was rhetoric for a public setting, in front of other people. These were the real questions, and they were really very exciting. Freedom to travel abroad, that type of thing. America had enjoyed a golden image in Russia from probably the 1910s on. It got heightened by some very good Soviet authors in the 1920 and 1930s and by word of mouth.

Q: And also World War II and the GIs who came over and all that.

LEHOVICH: I remember one guy who came up to me at one of these exhibits who had a rather fanatical look to him. He couldn't have been more unpleasant. He made life miserable for me for 35 minutes with nasty put-down comments, political, personal, and everything else. I really didn't like this guy at all. So, when I had a chance, I went off to spend a few quiet moments. We took breaks every once in a while. This guy comes up to me. I figured it was going to take all my self control with this guy. He comes up to me, but he's a different person. He comes up to me and says, "I have a question for you." I'm a nice guy, so instead of telling him to go to Hell, I said, "What's your question?" He says, "Listen. Do you know Brooklyn? Do you know such and such street in Brooklyn? That's where my brothers live. Now, what I want to do is, I want to talk to you about New York. I want to talk to you about Brooklyn." This guy had spent 35 minutes making an artificial spectacle of being rude and negative to me so that he could then get away with it when he came up privately to make contact about his relatives overseas. Very interesting. That's word of mouth. Those people knew.

Q: Did you find yourself dealing with people who had such a rosy view of the United States that you want to say, "Yes, but we've got our problems. I mean, this is not a perfect society."

LEHOVICH: Stu, that was a constant problem. There's a question of ethics. If people had too rosy a view, you had to let them down. But you had to do it gently. If you let them down too fast, they would think "God dammit, we've got another one of these fellow travelers from America over here." But there were people whose views, for example, of the racial society were totally rosy. They'd say, "We know that was absolute baloney, all the propaganda we're told, blah, blah, blah." I would have to say, "No, that's a case where some of what you're hearing is not boloney." But the too rosy a view has been, of course, a problem not only in the former Soviet Union, but it's a problem in all parts of the world where there is a notion that the streets of America are paved with gold.

Q: As you say, it's a matter of ethics, but it's also a matter of practicality. People should understand that we have our problems and we're wrestling with them and there is a lot of unfinished work to do.

LEHOVICH: Absolutely.

Q: Vlad, as we move away from this particular episode- But it's fascinating. This is why I wanted to spend some time on it. Obviously, you were going to go into the Foreign Service. What did you come away from the Soviet Union with, the system and...

LEHOVICH: Very simple ideas. I came away with the idea that a highly intelligent person working for years and years could not invent a worse system, primarily economic. I felt that the uniquely bad features of the Soviet Union were economic. The reason is that you can find repressive politics in a lot of other places. You could find repressive politics all over Europe in the 1930s, not just Germany, not just Italy, but it was all those poor new democracies that became little dictatorships. But you couldn't find an economy that had managed to underachieve so badly for so long. The Soviets could go into outer space, but they couldn't make toilet paper and a whole host of other things that are absolutely basic. An absolutely miserable economic system. The other thing I found which has fascinated me for years later and also in other situations, I discovered the ability of a whole society to repress certain kinds of knowledge and information. I dealt a lot with people my own age. I was 21 and 22 when I was over there. I dealt a lot with people in their late teens, early '20s, mid '20s, bright people. I fell in with a group of folks who were musicians and were very gifted kids in Moscow (I had a lot of fun with them) from privileged families and in several other places. These folks had much less knowledge of what had happened in their own country in the 1930s than I did at that time and other reasonably well informed Americans in reading the newspapers. You didn't have to be a scholar. This was pretty obvious stuff. You didn't have to be steeped in Joseph McCarthy; this was obvious stuff. I saw the same phenomenon later in Germany and then Austria. One just finds it time and time again. Society will omit from family discourse and from the oral tradition that which it doesn't like.

But one of the fascinating things I learned from Russia and from that year there is something a lot of reporters also learned - a lot of reporters and a lot of young people who were going over there at that time from America and other parts of the West thinking, "Wow, we're going to really find out, is this place great? Is it awful? How much propaganda have we been getting?" The amazing thing is, these folks would come back and say, "It wasn't propaganda, what we heard." This was the case with some very good reporters over there at that time. Basically a lot of them had gone over feeling that maybe this was a lot better experiment than we thought. They came back from there thinking it's a total failure. Very useful to go there. I took my kids many years later to Czechoslovakia and Hungary. This was before the collapse of communism when my kids were young. In three or four days, without any prompting from their parents, they reached some conclusions that had were extraordinarily valuable political insights for them as young people ever since. The details aren't important, but they saw certain things that simply don't happen in other societies. It's there hanging out, it's festooned all over.

RICHARD TOWNSEND DAVIES
Political Officer
Moscow (1961-1963)

After graduating from Columbia College in 1942, Ambassador Richard T. Davies served in the U.S. Army in World War II. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1947, Ambassador Davies has held positions in Moscow, Paris, Kabul, Calcutta and Warsaw. He was interviewed by Peter Jessup on November 9 1979.

DAVIES: But I'm ahead of my story because at about that point, I left Washington to go back to Moscow to the embassy there again. Tommy (Llewellyn) Thompson was there. The interesting thing that happened - that was in the middle of 1961 - I was in the internal political section; I was first heading that - and we had the 22nd Party Congress, Soviet Party Congress at the end of that year, at which Khrushchev attempted to put through his de-Stalinization effort again, as he had at the - on two earlier occasions when he made the famous secret speech and then at the Party Conference that had been held a couple of years earlier.

Ambassador Thompson - Tommy Thompson - had a remarkable relationship with Khrushchev who liked to see Western ambassadors and conceived what I think was a personal rapport or affection insofar as that can exist under those circumstances between the two. He believed that Khrushchev was thoroughly in command, that he was Number One without any qualifications.

Kenneth A. Kerst, who was for many years in the Bureau of Intelligence Research in the Department, head of the Soviet branch there - he's now retired - was there working with me in the internal political section. We had been there earlier, in fact, in 1951 to 1953, when Stalin died. So we were back there and we didn't think that Khrushchev was unchallenged inside the Party, and we believed that the course of the Congress showed that, because they did publish the speeches and some of the debates. It was possible to form from them, by close analysis, an idea of the outcome; that it was clear, to us at any rate, that Khrushchev was asking the Congress to pass measures which would result in a thorough investigation of the so-called crimes of the Stalin era. Of course, being Party Secretary, he would have been in a position to insure that the people he didn't like were those who were tried, one assumes, and that he himself would not be. But he did not succeed in that. He did succeed in some things such as having Stalin's body moved out of Lenin's tomb. And then there was a commission established, in fact, to investigate the crimes of the Stalin era but it never reported. It was a dead letter before it got started.

And there was also some kind of resolution to consider building a monument to the victims of the cult of personality, and nothing ever came of that either. These were all obviously abortive efforts on his part to create a situation in which he would be able to enhance his power by moving against, or at any rate, by threatening people who were, perhaps, more culpable than he, or whom he would be able to accuse successfully of having stained their hands with blood during the Stalin era.

It was a time of enormous ferment. Again, as whenever this subject arose, we went around Moscow. They had these public lecture sessions put on by various societies: the Society for Spreading Political Knowledge. And we used to go to their lectures and for a matter of a month there, all these people who had been released from the concentration camps in 1956, the period after Stalin's death but particularly in 1956 and thereafter, rehabilitated - these older people, many of them bearing on their persons the marks of years not to say decades that they spent in hard places like Kolyma and Siberia and various places, were showing up at those meetings and making fiery speeches demanding that justice should be done and that there should be retribution. A lot of them, of course, had been perfectly good communists in the twenties and thirties, many of them, I suppose, idealistic communists who then had been purged by Stalin or others for little or no reason except Stalin's tactic of using terror to establish himself.

And they were demanding that the things that Khrushchev was arguing for should be implemented. And the people who were running these meetings and lectures were very much on the defensive, making all kinds of promises, saying, "Well, the Congress had passed a resolution and this would all happen in the fullness of time, comrades."

And these older people were saying, well, frankly, they didn't have the fullness of time to wait because, you know, after 20 or 25 years in the places they'd been in, they didn't expect to be around much longer and frankly, they wanted to get their pound of flesh or whatever, the weight of retribution, which they judged was owing to them, before they left, shuffled off this mortal soil. There were some moving scenes. It gave you a real appreciation of how explosive an issue this was on which Khrushchev was playing, quite calculatedly for his own political advantage.

Well, Ken and I tried to make these arguments with the Ambassador and he really just wasn't buying any of it. He would not admit that there were divisions in the leadership. So far as he was concerned, Khrushchev had the whole thing very well in hand.

So it was a very interesting time to be there. You remember, of course, that in 1958, Khrushchev delivered the ultimatum on Berlin. Ever since, he'd been trying to deliver on that ultimatum. He talked at first about, I don't know, six months or a year. Then he kept extending this one way or the other. In the summer then of 1961, actually shortly after I got there I believe it was - I think it was the summer of 1961 - he had put up the prices for milk, meat, butter. There had been quite a riot in Novocherkassk on the lower Volga down towards the Black Sea. He was beating the drums at the same time about Berlin. He had troubles inside the country. We pointed all these things out, or tried to, but we didn't get very far.

Then in the summer of 1962, Ambassador Thompson left.

Q: For what reason?

DAVIES: Well, he was reassigned back to Washington and Foy Kohler came. Let's see, was that Tommy Thompson's second tour? I guess it was just at the end of his first tour. He'd been there a long time.

Incidentally, I think that of all the post-war ambassadors we have had, despite the fact that he didn't agree with our perceptions which I think were quite correct and borne out of course by what happened afterward, he was far and away the ablest - and if for no other reason than that after he came back, when the Cuban missile crisis developed, he played a key role there as an expert, so to speak. For that alone, I think, in that advice he gave, he showed how wise he was. I always felt he was far and away the ablest of our post-war ambassadors.

So Foy Kohler came in the late summer or early fall, September I guess it was, maybe August, and I began to go around with him and make all the calls on various people. It was in that period, of course, that - it must have been the middle of September that Khrushchev called him. I think on that occasion, Jack McSweeney went with him, the DCM, Deputy Chief of Mission, who died here not too long ago, less than a year ago. And Khrushchev, of course, told Ambassador Kohler not to worry about Cuba, that the Soviets had no intention of putting any offensive weapons in there. And after the election, there would be time enough to talk about those things. But after the election, it would be necessary to try to resolve the Berlin crisis. However the talk was very reassuring.

Of course, the Ambassador reported all this. Meanwhile, - yes, well, of course, the Vienna meeting between Kennedy and Khrushchev must have been the previous summer. So then at the end of September, - I wrote some of this stuff up a long time ago - I made a copy of it which I can leave with you - there was a U-2 incident when I think it was a U-2 overflew Sakhalin on August the 30th.

We had gotten a note. By this time, I had become Political Counselor. The Political Counselor, Boris Klasson, had come back here to the State Department, and I moved up. We got this note to deliver in response to a Soviet protest. The Soviets protested this violation of their air space in a note of September the 4th. Well we got this note about 6 or 7 o'clock at night and it said to deliver it immediately to the highest ranking - it was one of these things, you know, that betrays a lack of knowledge of the way things work. (Laughs) Obviously the President himself had been involved in this. The instructions made it clear. It said, "The President wants this delivered immediately to the highest ranking available official of the Ministry." And sort of "Return receipt requested." "As soon as you've done it, let us know."

So we had to do something about it. I telephoned. By this time - you know, they work from 9 to 5 and literally 5. I mean, you know, it's 4.49 : 4.59 : 59 and everybody's out of there, you know. The last one out turns out the lights.

But there was a duty officer on there and I had the phone number for the duty officer. So I called the guy over there and I said, "Hey, we've got this note in and it will take us a little while now to type it up in the proper form but I should have it ready for you in a couple of hours, or maybe sooner than that, an hour and a half; as soon as we can get it typed up. And then I'll bring it over."

And he said, "Aw, deliver it tomorrow morning when the mailroom opens at 9."

And I said, "Well..."

He said, "Well, if you can get it here by 9 o'clock tonight, deliver to the mailroom, that's fine." But we couldn't make it. By that time, it was 7.30 or 8. We had a girl stenographer-typist coming in to do the work, the duty stenographer. And I said, "Well, this is a hell of a note. I mean, after all, we have instructions and..."

He said, "Oh, well, you know, it's not civilized."

The instructions said DELIVER. So as soon as it was typed up I got a driver - and all these drivers, we didn't know, but they certainly were trusted. [They were] cleared. Whether they were colonels in the K.G.B. I doubt, but maybe some of them were.

Well, I got a driver to take the note over to the Foreign Ministry, and he was back in about ten minutes - we weren't that far from the Foreign Ministry - and he said, "Well, you know, the mailroom is closed, there was a major, I think, of the militia, a police major guarding the main entrance of the Ministry, and he refused to accept it; he said he had no authority to accept it, and consequently we have to bring it back tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock."

And I said, "Damn it, the instruction says..." And then I said, "Come on, we'll go back and we'll get it in."

He pleaded with me and said, "Please don't try to do that," and I said why not? I have been told to deliver it, it's an official communication.

In fact I am not sure whether it was a letter from the President or not, or whether he'd enclosed a letter or not. I don't remember. Anyway I said we had instructions to deliver the damn thing, and he said, uh, well...

He took me back there in the car.

Q: Back where?

DAVIES: Back to the Ministry, and I went up to the door - they had these great big double doors of glass, monumental doors - and here was this major. I succeeded in getting him to open the door - you know, very gruff...

"What do you want?"

"Well, I have instructions to deliver this note tonight. I have to deliver it now and report to Washington, and I have done so."

He said (imitates stentorian voice), "I am not allowed to receive any official communications. I am just in the police, I am not in the diplomatic service."

Well, it was obvious - big uniform, very nice.

And I said, "Well, I understand that, but there is a duty officer here. Call the duty officer."

"Oh, no, I can't call the duty officer."

"Why can't you call him?" And we went on like this, and getting more and more heated.

Finally I said, "Look, this is ridiculous. When I was in Washington, at any hour of the day or night your people in the Embassy would call up, and I would go down there and open up and take anything they had to deliver."

"Oh, well, you do it your way and we do it our way."

So I tried to...to slip it into...

He was wearing this greatcoat, and I tried to slip it into this, tried to shove it there.

I said, "All right, I am going to leave it on the floor here, right in front of the door. So far as I am concerned it has been delivered. I am going to go back and send a telegram and tell my Ministry that I have delivered the note."

Then he got very agitated (and said), "Oh, you can't leave it on the floor! That's an important state document." (hearty laughter)

I said, "Yes, that's right, it is an important state document, that's why I want you to take it. But if you won't take it..."

By this time the chauffeur had come in, and he was pleading with me. He was saying, "Oh, please, Mr. Davies, don't. Let's not make a fuss."

I said, "Oh, I am not making any fuss, I am just trying to deliver the note."

So the upshot was I did leave it on the floor. The police major - the militia major - wouldn't touch it, but he was shouting at me, "You can't do that, you can't leave it on the floor!"

When we got back into the car the driver was saying, "Oh, go and pick it up, it's an important document." And I said oh, I have a copy of it.

So we went back to the Embassy.

Well, it became clear that somebody had picked it up - I think the Major did, obviously - because the next day in Izvestia or Pravda - they published a translation of it. It was an apology, it expressed regret. In fact I think the President had given orders, and he was pretty sore that they found out this plane a little before it had overflowed Soviet territory.

But I went back and sent a telegram.

Well, all this by way of prelude to the Cuban missile crisis, which we really knew nothing of. I don't think Ambassador Kohler knew anything about it either, until - I can't remember whether it was Saturday. No, it was Sunday, October 21st, I've got it down here - we received from the State Department the text of the President's speech that he was going to give the following day at 7 P.M. Eastern Daylight Saving Time, his famous speech on the discovery of the Soviet missiles on Cuba. And we were instructed to deliver the text of the speech under cover of a letter from the President to Chairman Khrushchev to a high official of the Soviet Ministry for urgent transmittal to the Chairman at precisely 6 P.M. on Monday evening, simultaneous with the briefing of Dobrynin. Dobrynin was going to be given a copy of the speech by Dean Rusk in Washington.

So at the same time, parallel with that, we were to deliver.

There was only one problem, and that was that 6 P.M. Eastern Daylight Saving Time was 1 A.M. Moscow time the following day, and we had all this fuss.

So we talked about this, and finally it was decided that I would go over and see the deputy head of the American Section of the Foreign Office - a fellow named Sergei Kudriyavtsev, who subsequently became Ambassador to Cuba, he served in Asia in various places and had a very good career in the service, and he was a fellow I knew as well, perhaps even better, than most of the guys over there, he had even been at our apartment, which was very unusual, he and his wife, for dinner, and I kind of liked him, he is a very clever man and very flexible by their standards - and it was agreed...Ambassador Kohler and Jack McSweeney, the DCM, said "You go over, and without intimating to them that you are really going to have anything to deliver, talk about this problem in general terms: what are we going to do if we get an important message that has to be delivered after the mailroom closes at 9 P.M. and before it opens again at 9 A.M.? This is the middle of the 20th century, and we can't be dependent on bureaucratic habits."

Of course the whole thing had been just the opposite when Stalin was alive: they never started work over there until 6 P.M. in the evening, and they worked until 4 A.M. in the morning, because Stalin worked all night long, Stalin slept all day long.

But now they were back to normal hours, and nobody was going to make them break them.

So they said, "Talk about this in general terms." And I said okay.

I went over and saw Kudriyavtsev, who was very understanding, and I said, "Look, this is ridiculous. If something should come in, if there should be an emergency, we should be able to call somebody and deliver something, if need be, in the middle of the night, if it's really important."

I said, "Look, don't worry, we are not going to be sitting over there trying to figure out reasons and pretexts for coming over here in the middle of the night. Not at all. We don't want to do it, but if we have to there should be some arrangement."

Well, he made no commitment - this was Monday morning - but he said, "Well, we'll look into it."

So that evening - meanwhile during the day we had the text of the note typed up, and of course by that time already there were rumors back here and some word on the wires, an atmosphere of crisis and this that and the other, so they were forewarned to that extent, although they didn't know, I think. I think we did. I think we had the advantage of surprise...

So at approximately 5.30 or so I called the duty officer, because by that time the offices were closed.

Well, it was after the offices were closed, between 5 and 9. I called him and I said, "Look, I will have a note to deliver to you. My instructions are to deliver it at 1 A.M., which is 6 P.M. Daylight Saving Time. Will you come down to the front door and receive it?"

He said, "Yes, I'll be there." I forget his name now. He was a nice young fellow who worked for Kuznetsov, the Deputy Foreign Minister, who was Deputy Foreign Minister for years, and now is president or one of the chairmen of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet or something like that, who incidentally worked in Pittsburgh in the steel mills in the 1930s, and was trained in the United States.

So at 1 A.M. I took the note over there with the President's speech, and this very nice young fellow was there when I arrived and he received it, and he was quite concerned, it was clear. He was very polite, and he said, "Oh, this is bad news you have for us."

I said, "You'll have to decide for yourself, but it's serious business."

Well, that was the beginning, at 1 A.M. on Tuesday morning, and it was a very satisfying week, needless to say. It was the most pleasant time I ever spent. I got practically no sleep, but we had them on the run from the beginning, we were in complete control of the situation.

Seymour Topping, who was the New York Times correspondent, came in along about Wednesday very disconsolate and he said, "Dick, this is a terrible situation. I can't get any stories in the paper, because everything is happening in Washington, and no sooner do I get something written and sent in, it's been overtaken. They call me from New York and say, we can't use that, Sy, because there has been this and that."

Needless to say we were all pretty concerned because it was a serious business.

I don't know whether you remember, but I think it would have been on Tuesday - or maybe it was a little later in the week - that again a U-2, or an American plane at any rate, blundered into Soviet air space, but it was obvious when that happened, when we heard about it - that was the occasion when I think the President made the statement, "There is always some poor dumb son of a bitch who doesn't get the word" - it was obvious that the attitude of the Soviets was totally different from that they displayed on the occasion of the plane that violated Soviet air space on August the 30th. They played it down, they were very concerned not to make anything of it. One could envisage the instructions that had gone out when they got word that this unidentified aircraft was approaching. They undoubtedly ordered all the aircraft gunners and missile people to be kept a minimum six feet away from their weapons, don't shoot it down!

They were scared to death. They were scared to death. So it was very satisfying.

Then on Tuesday, I guess it was, we got the instruction on the blockade, the order which we had to deliver, and there was a provision for certification of the vessels. There was this list of forbidden items - offensive weapons, beginning with missiles and aircraft and various other types of weapons systems and offensive munitions, which were contraband, were forbidden - and I took this over to the Foreign Ministry. It must have been at 6 A.M. in the morning, and they received me there. They were there, and the lights were burning late and early over there, just as they were in our chancery.

There was a provision for inspection of a cargo by officials, by officers of the Naval Attache's Office.

If an American naval officer were permitted to go aboard a ship in the harbor from which the ship was about to sail, and make an inspection at the time just before the hatches were closed, then he could write a naval certification - a nav cert - which said that it contained no contraband, and with that naval certification the master of the ship would be passed through the blockade. Of course this was high impertinence, but I took the thing over there and said, "We'd like to make arrangements."

This was before we knew whether they were going to respect the blockade. I said, "We'd be glad to make arrangements for Captain So-and-so" - I can't remember the guy's name now - "and for his subordinates in the Naval Attaché's Office to go up to Leningrad or down to Odessa or to Vladivostok."

Of course they never let us into the harbor areas in any of those places - certainly not people from the Naval Attaché's Office - but I explained this with a straight face to them, and they took this all in and asked some questions, and I left it there.

About an hour later I got a phone call, and they were never so polite. That week was such a pleasure, because they were so polite. They would call up, and in great contrast to the usual brusque - at best brusque and often rude - treatment that they gave everybody, they were gushingly polite. They would call up and they'd say, "Mr. Davies, how is Mrs. Davies? How are the children? How are you feeling? Is everything all right? Are you happy in our country?"
(laughs)

And at that moment I was very happy there, so I had no problem.

But they called me up about an hour later, very politely, and said, "Could you come back over? We know it's an inconvenience, but could you come back over here again?"

I said certainly, what is it about?

They said, "Well, it's about this document you left an hour ago."

I said, sure, I would be right over.

So I went over there, and they gave it back to me, very politely. They said, "We are sorry, but we can't accept this."

And of course it was a bit insulting - I mean from their point of view - that we were telling them that we would be glad to inspect their ships and let them through, and that was the only condition under which their ships could get through the blockade. (laughs) And they didn't recognize the blockade.

It was on one of those trips over there - I think it may have been on that one, I can't remember - and it was early in the week, Tuesday or maybe Wednesday, and I forget which floor the American Section was on - it was the 10th or 12th, and with these rickety old elevators they had - but they always met you at the door and you were always escorted inside the door, and I was escorted up there, and just as we got off the elevator a man who walked very fast - he was almost running - passed in front of the elevator. We stepped out, and this fellow from the American Section who was with me looked neither to right or left as he was heading for the office to which he was conducting me, but I saw this guy, and this guy had a gas mask on. It was an old, sort of World War Two canister type hanging at his hip, you know, a gas mask, and it looked as though they had gone down in the basement, maybe not in the building, but in some basement - it was rusty, you know - and found some of these old, disused gas masks. Maybe it was just an empty can, I don't know. But quite clearly - I had no doubt of it at the time, but even less now - it was staged for my benefit, because inevitably they knew that I had to go back to the Embassy and report it.

Well, you know, they were getting on the war footing in the Foreign Ministry. They were taking this seriously.

Of course this was a response to the fact that we on our part were very much getting on a war footing and making no bones of it. Troops were streaming into the Southeast, SAC was on the alert, the submarines, POLARIS's, were at sea sending their messages in clear back and forth.

Q: On purpose.

DAVIES: On purpose. And they didn't dare do anything like this, because they were afraid, and with great justice, I am convinced, that there would have been panic in the country.

So how to respond to this, without really being able to respond to it?

Well, so when Davies comes over the next time you have a guy with a gas mask, an old disused gas mask, disappearing around the corner, so don't give him too good a look at you, but...(laughs)

So of course I went back, and we were supposed to send...Golly, what was the acronym? Anyhow (we were supposed to send) a flash message, any indication of preparation for hostilities. There was a certain name for it, but I have forgotten it now. (CRITIC)

Q: They change every few years.

DAVIES: They change every few years.

Q: It's the maximum.

DAVIES: The maximum kind of thing. So I sent that. I mean I had to, because according to the regulations...

Q: It fitted them.

DAVIES: It fitted exactly, I had to send it, but at the same time we sent also flash precedence, a message saying that well, this was so obviously staged that that should be taken into account. Or maybe this was in the same message.

Nevertheless that was...

And of course they did many things. For example we had people traveling in the country, and they ordered all foreign diplomats to return to Moscow, again in an effort to show that they were serious, but without unnecessarily alarming their own people. We had the Robert Shaw Chorale traveling there - a wonderful success they had. Among other things they sang the Bach B Minor Mass, and it was the first time since before the Revolution that the Bach B Minor Mass had been sung in the Soviet Union, and my gosh, we went to Tchaikovsky Hall in Moscow and it was packed with people sitting in the aisles, just jammed, following the score - there were a lot of music students with the score - and many people just weeping over it. It hadn't been performed in nearly 50 years, 45 years.

So the Robert Shaw Chorale was going around, and we had one other thing. What was it? We had another traveling orchestra or something, and they didn't bother those attractions that were taking place.

Oh, the New York City Ballet - George Balanchine - for the first time was there. Those two. Enormous success, of course. For the Russians to see what had happened to ballet in the West...

Theirs of course was, and still largely is, a museum of ballet - ballet frozen as it was in 1910. No development.

Q: A set thing. Certain set things.

DAVIES: Certain set things which had been carried out. There are some new ones, like The Red Poppy - so-called revolutionary - and Spartacus, but basically it's the classical pre-World War One, the classical 19th century ballet that they have preserved there. And Balanchine very correctly said when he came, "I can't understand this adoration of Soviet or Russian ballet. We in the West are the ones who have developed ballet." And he said this to everybody. Of course it wasn't published in the papers, but...

So that was an enormous success. There was no interference with either of those presentations, because they were following schedules, they were going to different places in the country, they had been sold out for months, there were no tickets to be had - the tickets were going at fantastic prices. In fact most extraordinarily they scheduled an extra performance of the Robert Shaw Chorale in Moscow. They had to find another theater, but the demand was so enormous for people to see these things.

And at the same time you had this fantastic crisis going on. You would have thought that the people would have (stayed away). But no, people came, they were applauding.

In the press and in the Soviet media they were doing everything they could to play down the immediacy of this thing.

It was an enormous debacle for Khrushchev, and it was certainly the beginning of the end for him, no doubt about that. Thereafter it was two years I guess, but it was all downhill as far as he was concerned.

There were many other things involved, but that was the principal thing: he lost the gamble, and this gave an opening to his enemies, of whom there were many, and he just didn't last that much longer.

Q: What was Khrushchev specifically ethnically? He was not a pure Ukrainian, was he?

DAVIES: No, he was Russian. He was born, like so many - you know it's a very mixed area - in a village which is on the borderland between the Ukraine and Russia, he worked in the Ukraine in a coal mine. But again it was a mixed region. But he was a pure Russian. The name is a very ancient one. There was a noble family, Khrushchev, which the last major representative of - they were counts or barons, I don't know which - was living in Rfo. A count. And presumably Khrushchev's family came from one of the estates belonging to this very well known family, and that's where he got the name.

Q: Khrushchev's manners were a matter of style then, weren't they?

DAVIES: A great actor.

Q: He wasn't a rough-hewn peasant who didn't know how to use a fork?

DAVIES: Well, he was, he was very coarse and could be even coarser if he wanted to, and he did frequently want to. As I think I mentioned, his wife - Nina Petrovna - was not from the gentility, but she was an educated woman and she worked on him and tried to refine him a little, but he was so exuberant that he was hard to refine. He had very little formal education. All the education he got was in party schools after he had joined the party.

Q: What about his use of language? Was it just prosaic or was it pretty colorful?

DAVIES: Very colorful.

Q But not erudite?

DAVIES: No, not at all, not at all. He was a very intelligent man, and he was nobody's fool, by no means, but very colorful and coarse. I think I mentioned to you when he was speaking with Nixon the barnyard language that he used that so embarrassed the interpreter who came from a refined, aristocratic Russian family. He could do that, he could carry on the way he did at the U.N., pounding on the desk with his shoe. But these were calculated things. A great deal of that was calculated. He was a very excellent actor, and of course you have to be if you want to be a Soviet leader, to survive you have to be able to put on a front. As for example he did with Eisenhower in Paris. That was a great Academy Award winning performance, calculated again.

Q: When he first met President Kennedy in Vienna wasn't that a bulldozer performance?

DAVIES: Oh, without a doubt. He attempted to cow him, and he did cow him, or at least he thought he'd cowed him. It was a combination. I mean he attacked him on the Bay of Pigs ferociously, and to the point that Kennedy really finally said, "It's been a terrible mistake." And he wouldn't let go of it, because he was intent upon establishing this psychological superiority, gaining the psychological upper hand. They put a great deal of importance on doing that. And he did. He got the psychological upper hand over Kennedy, and it was a terrible mistake that somebody - I don't know who might have done it - didn't warn Kennedy.

Q: That this was a ploy?

DAVIES: Well, that it's a ploy and you've got to go in there.

But of course Kennedy wasn't that way, he was quiet and understated and self mocking, kind of, when he was dealing with somebody so different.

From that meeting Khrushchev took away the idea that this was a man who could be cowed. I mean he had the Bay of Pigs evidence - "Well, you know, a guy who doesn't really understand these things, he won't go all the way..."

Q: "He'll cave..."

DAVIES: "He'll cave." And then he had the evidence in Vienna, "Well, this young fellow, you know, I can master him."

Because of course the Soviets at that time were very much weaker than we. They did not have the power, they did not have the missiles, there was a missile gap, but in the opposite direction. They were very much weaker than we, and that was why Khrushchev tried to put intermediate and medium range ballistic missiles on Cuba.

Yes, Khrushchev. Well, he was a gambler, and he gambled and lost.

But that whole Cuban missile crisis was such a beautifully conducted crisis management operation, right from the outset.

Q: Following one that was so badly managed.

DAVIES: Following one that was so badly managed.

Q: Who were some of the people who get credit for pursuing it in such perceptive detail?

DAVIES: Well, I think Bobby Kennedy had a lot to do with it the way I read it. You know, when you read the accounts - I don't claim to have read them all...

Elie Abel wrote an excellent book. I spoke with him. I was back by then, and he interviewed me and he talked with everybody. I thought it was the best account.

Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. wrote a very good account. Of course most of the time - that is beginning October the 22nd, the Monday, when Kennedy gave his speech - he was up in New York working with Adlai Stevenson, so he wasn't there the week of the crisis itself. He was there before that. But then again he wasn't a member of the executive committee.

Ted Sorenson's book is very good. And Elie Abel's. And Bobby Kennedy's book itself is excellent. But they were all parti pris, they all had preconceived opinions. Inevitably they couldn't be objective. You can't be, particularly when you are involved the way both Sorenson and Bobby Kennedy and to a lesser extent Arthur Schlesinger were.

Then Elie Abel came along and wrote, and he put all this down I thought very well, as somebody who was outside - a correspondent - but close enough.

But I think out of that come two or three things: Bobby Kennedy forced these high officials to really look at the options. Two parties formed. There were two parties: one that believed in going in and doing the bombing, and the other which believed you should start with the blockade, which I think was clearly the right thing to do.

As it was it's remarkable when you look back on it. There was a lot of skepticism - the British press, and the world press generally was very skeptical of the American position - because we didn't go out with photographs immediately. If we had come out with photographs I think it would have made a big difference, but nobody thought that that was necessary, until it became clear that for example in Britain there was a lot of skepticism.

Then in a couple of days you remember Adlai Stevenson used them up at the U.N., and they were published in all the papers. Then a lot of people were convinced, as they should have been.

I think Bobby Kennedy, (Robert) McNamara - I mentioned Tommy Thompson (Ambassador Llewelyn Thompson) and I think he played a big role. Dean Acheson was always for going right in there and bombing.

Q: Did the military?

DAVIES: The military wanted to do that, too, you know.

Q: Were there any less-than-hardliners among the military?

DAVIES: Well, I don't think so. Paul Nitze was a hardliner, as you would expect, although finally when the decision was made I think it was he who worked very closely with Ted Sorenson or Abe (Abraham) Chayes (State Department legal counsel) - I can't remember who it was - drawing up the blockade declaration.

But you know I think everybody who played a role in it comes out of it pretty darn well, even though there was a lot of backbiting afterwards.

Stevenson in particular was accused of having wanted to sell out and give them the missiles, the Jupiters in Turkey, and give them Guantanamo. And he did mention these as possibilities to the President at some point.

But I think everybody played a pretty creditable role.

And finally the President.

I mentioned Bobby Kennedy. Bobby Kennedy kept saying, in contrast to the hawkish position I thought he displayed at the outset - "We'll have to invade them, if we don't invade them this year we'll have to invade them next year..." - he argued from the outset against the bombing, saying that we cannot be the ones, it's not in the American tradition, we can't be the ones who go in there and..."

You know, you talk about surgical strikes. Well, it turned out that when they pinned the military down they said, well, of course, between 10,000 and 25,000 people... will be killed, and they won't all be Russians, either, there aren't 10,000 to 25,000 Russians there. So it will be a lot of Cubans who'll be killed.

Bobby Kennedy said, "You can't do that. This President can't do that. We can't be the ones to mount a Pearl Harbor. We may have to do it sooner or later, but we've got to start with something that is not so threatening and build up to it, if we do, gradually. We just can't first crack out of the box and go in with bombs."

So I think that spoke very well I would say for what he'd learned in the short space of one year, because I am not at all sure he would have felt that way if all this had been happening a year earlier. I don't know.

Q: So it sort of...

DAVIES: Yes. The way the whole thing was done, judging by the accounts one reads, was very intelligent, I thought. Getting the principals together - getting the principal people together - and making them argue this thing out, until really finally when the President decided that the blockade, or the preventive quarantine or whatever they called it, was the way to do it, all the rest were pretty much in agreement. There were still those who felt, well... Dean Acheson for example never reconciled himself to anything less than the bombing, and I think he was wrong. But you know, he was a crusty old coot. A wonderful man, but thank goodness he didn't prevail on that occasion. And then of course he did a beautiful job of going and talking to DeGaulle and Adenauer.

So I think... I don't know...

None of it was planned. Jack Kennedy did not like big meetings. They only had one meeting of the National Security Council, one formal meeting just before - I can't remember now whether it was on Sunday or Saturday - to ratify the decisions that had been taken by this executive committee as they came to call it.

But certainly the way the whole thing worked was a model of the way - anyway from our vantage point in Moscow, as Seymour Topping said, those people were way behind the curve throughout the whole thing, scared to death, literally scared to death, afraid that they had been caught and that they were going to be very heavily punished, which they weren't in fact.

Khrushchev had talked about a meeting with the President, and he said he had told visitors there - including a lot of Europeans who visited there - that he would come to the United Nations after the American election, and he told us that nothing would be done until after the American election. And then of course he did intend to spring this. I think he would have come first to see the President, and as somebody somewhere wrote - I think Michel Tatu, in the famous beautiful book that he did, because there are two books I think, Elie Abel's and Michel Tatu, and Tatu has a long treatment in his book Le Pouvoir en URSS (Power in the Kremlin, as it was translated here) on the Cuban missile thing. He and I were there, he was in Moscow, and we spent a lot of time afterwards talking about all this. He has a beautiful treatment I think of that whole thing, seen from the Soviet angle.

Well, Michel said that as it turned out Kennedy showed the pictures of the Soviet missiles in Cuba, but Khrushchev's plan was that he should show the pictures to Kennedy, (laughs heartily) at that meeting presumably in November.

Q: His pictures or our pictures?

DAVIES: Well, they would have been his pictures, not our pictures.

Q: Yes.

DAVIES: It would have been his pictures, and he would have shown the pictures and said, "Well, Mr. President, this is what we have there."

Q: [Inaudible]

DAVIES: That's right. "And now can we talk about Berlin?"

And again I think it's Michel Tatu - or maybe it's Elie Abel, I can't remember now - who says that they were put there not to be used, but to be traded for something. And the trade would have been for something in Berlin. That was what Khrushchev wanted, and of course he failed to get it.

So it was a great gamble on his part which failed.

Q: The Vienna meeting had occurred before.

DAVIES: Oh, yes, that was the year before.

Q: When Khrushchev had sized this guy up as a weakling or a pushover.

DAVIES: He thought so, yes.

He told Robert Frost - Robert Frost came there about a month before all this, in the fall of 1962, it must have been September, a wonderful man, my gosh, we met him there -

DAVIES: Yes, you know. Another great actor, obviously. He loved to have people sort of sitting at his feet.

I think he went down to the Crimea to see Khrushchev - I can't remember now - and Khrushchev told him, he said, "Oh, you Americans are too liberal to fight."

And Frost was very disturbed that this was the perception that Khrushchev had. Of course none of us realized then that what was in his mind - in Khrushchev's mind - obviously that was part of it.

He formed this incorrect perception, and he tried to exploit what he thought he saw to the limit. Certainly it was a turning point in the postwar era. A turning point in a way which...

After this was over, on November the 6th, Kosygin gave the annual speech just on the eve of the November 7th holiday, and it was clear, in that speech he talked quite clearly about the necessity for building up Soviet strength, and that was the beginning of the buildup that has resulted in the present balance of missilery. I can't remember now whether it was before that or after that that Spike Dubs (later Ambassador Adolph Dubs, assassinated in Kabul) the head of...

The political section was divided into two parts - internal political and external. We used to call them "intolerable" and "extraneous" or something like that. But in and ex were the abbreviations.

Well, Spike Dubs was the head of the external political section, and he drafted a telegram - I think it was perhaps after Kosygin's speech, which I thought was excellent, and we tried very hard to get... and Jack McSweeney agreed to it and we tried to get Foy Kohler to send it and he wouldn't - proposing a summit meeting on the heels of this experience. We thought that, at such a summit meeting, the American President would have a great deal of clout, and that he'd be able to make some proposals about disarmament, and control of nuclear weapons.

Well, of course a year later...

No, it was two years later, in the summer of 1964, that we got the first test ban agreement, but we thought then that it would be possible to make some proposals on control of nuclear weapons and strategic arms.

Q: This was thinking ahead of his time, wasn't it?

DAVIES: Well, it was. We didn't really know what you could do, but we said from the political point of view we've got them now at some disadvantage, and if we were able to put this politically in a way that would attract public attention...

You remember that Bertrand Russell had been very active during the crisis itself, making all kinds of crazy suggestions for summit conferences, and we said okay, let's follow up on this, and try to turn some of Earl Russell's anti-American suggestions - because they were primarily anti-American - to our advantage for a change.

But Foy Kohler wasn't prepared to send those out. I don't quite know why: he just felt that they wouldn't get very far.

And when I got back to Washington a year later - in the summer of 1963 - I spoke with David Klein, who was then in the National Security Council staff working on European affairs, and he'd been very much involved at the working level - not at the policymaking level - in the missile crisis and in the aftermath in particular. And I told him that we'd drafted this message and wanted to send it in and we couldn't, and he said that it wouldn't have made any difference because everybody here was so relieved, because they felt we'd come so close, everybody was so relieved to have the thing over that nobody was prepared to contemplate any kind of major political initiative at that point.

And it was only a year later that President Kennedy made his American University speech. Of course that was again... You look back on these things and...

He began his Administration with a rather aggressive stance - no place we won't go and nothing we won't do, in defense of freedom. Laudable sentiments, but...

And then by 1963 he had, as a result of the Cuban missile crisis, come to the view that he expressed in the American University speech, which was one of recognizing that you have to try to find some political settlement of these problems.

So there was kind of an evolution there.

But that was a matter of what, four months before he was assassinated, so that that was the end of that initiative.

It's a big problem in our country: four years - and he only had three years - four years is not enough for a President to introduce a policy and carry it through. And yet if he has to run for re-election, that takes six months to a year out, so I don't know.

Well, it was a fascinating thing to live through.

There were people in the Embassy who had their bags packed, and we really kind of laughed at them, and we said, "You know, where you are going if anything happens you won't need to take a bag with you, you'll go straight up (laughs heartily while speaking) no baggage! Your baggage will be vaporized!"

Spike Dubs was a very religious guy.

Q: Was he? He was later killed in Afghanistan.

DAVIES: Yes.

Q: He also served in Yugoslavia?

DAVIES: That's right. He was kind of the heart and soul of our little (group). There was a Catholic priest there - an American Catholic priest, an Assumptionist Father.

Q: Wasn't that Father Bissonette?

DAVIES: Yes, Father George Bissonette, a wonderful man. And then we finally got a Protestant chaplain there, and Spike was really the heart of the Protestant group. He played the piano beautifully, played the organ, sang very well, wonderful.

But after the crisis was over he and his then wife and my wife and I had a small dinner, the four of us. I'll never forget, he began by saying grace, very eloquent, just giving thanks that we had all survived it, that it hadn't happened.

Q: Was he a Protestant?

DAVIES: Yes, his family came from the Volga. They were Volga Germans.

Q: Was he a Lutheran?

DAVIES: I suppose Lutheran, I don't really know what precise denomination he belonged to. Perhaps even Mennonite. But they were very devout people, and they had emigrated from there in the early years of the century.

Q: With all your years in Moscow, what is your opinion of the caliber of foreign diplomats there? Because the Soviet Union was a superpower did Japan, Italy and everybody else send their best people, or did some country say, "What a drag, we'll just send anybody to Russia?" I mean were there really top-notch people there from all countries, or didn't they impress you that way particularly?

DAVIES: By and large they were good people. Yes, by and large they were. Other countries did have good people. The Canadians have always had excellent representation. In fact Ambassador Ford - who has been there now for... I think he is now in his second term - they arrived shortly before we left, in 1962 or 1963, so it's really 18 years or something like that. It's fantastic. But he is a real expert.

Q: They once had a man called Wilgress, didn't they?

DAVIES: Yes: (Leolyn) Dana Wilgress, very good. Now I am trying to think of the name of the guy...Arnold Smith. Top-notch. He was there the first part of the... He then went to be Secretary of the Commonwealth. You know they set up a kind of a commonwealth committee or council in London, a sort of permanent organization for the commonwealth, and Arnold Smith who went there was picked to be the first executive secretary. Just an outstanding man. I suppose he is retired now, but really outstanding.

The Norwegians have always had good people there. The Finns, outstanding people. The Swedes... I don't know.

The Ambassador who was there for so many years...

You know, it's a mistake - I don't know how Ambassador Ford... By and large it's a mistake to keep people for such a long period of time. They get into ruts, I think.

I believe very strongly that if you have experts, if you build a service with regional expertise as a principle, you should not leave people too long. I'd say three years or four years is the maximum. Then take them away, use them somewhere else, take them back to the capital, send them to another area, and send them back after between five and ten years.

Q: That's what you did, isn't it?

DAVIES: Well, it is what I did. And you know there is always a temptation to think that the way you did is the right way, but I have seen just too many cases of people who retired in place. After you are there for a while you've seen it all. There is this terrible attitude of deja vu, you know. Sort of "Yes, well, of course, but it really doesn't mean anything. They always talk that way. It's all propaganda," or something like that.

You've got a hundred reasons for not being serious about what happens or analyzing it carefully, and unless the home office is very demanding - and you know the way bureaucracies are - you fall into a rut. So I think that there should be a constant process of rotation. I mean you do need fresh blood, you do need people coming in and taking a fresh look at the place. And it's important of course too that the people who come there have some background, whether they served there before or not - you can argue it either way - I think it's useful to have a mixture, a certain number of people who have served there before together with younger people who haven't served there before, so you get different points of view expressed.

But other countries? The Japanese, very good, outstanding. They you know have huge embassies, they are very highly specialized, and they do very well.

The Chinese I suspect are also quite good, if rather narrow from some points of view. They were good in Warsaw. They do develop experts and keep sending them back. They rotate them between the country in which they are an expert and Peking.

The British of course have a long tradition. The French, the Germans - I would say by and large good.

The Latin Americans are very mixed. It's such a political thing...

Q: It's not quite so important to them.

DAVIES: It's not quite so important, although even there you find some people who are pretty good.

Some of the Southern Europeans, a little mixed. The Italians usually pretty good. The Greeks - well, they had a good man there at that time, when we were there.

Q: What about the caliber of military attaches? Did everybody try to send the top people?

DAVIES: Yes, very good.

Q: Who would learn everything they could?

DAVIES: Yes, very good, really excellent. We had some top-notch people there, and so did the others, at least the major powers.

Q: Did they compare notes?

DAVIES: Oh, yes, they were constantly meeting. And indeed the Western Ambassadors, the NATO Ambassadors, had a regular meeting. In fact there were more meetings of the Ambassadors, the DCMs, the political counselors, the economic counselors, everybody was getting together, and they still do there, because you can have a division of labor and pool the results of that division of labor very effectively. And there is a lot of work to be done, a lot that can be learned. Travel is terribly important, so when somebody goes out and makes a trip it's useful to find out what they saw and what their impressions were.

Well, one thing that came out of this whole Cuban missile crisis of course was - I started by talking about the difficulties of delivering notes - one thing that came out of it was the hot line, and that came out primarily because the White House and the President got very disturbed by the length of time it took to get the notes that we received back to Washington.

Typically we received - as I said and as Sy Topping pointed out, the initiative was with Washington, and we kept giving them communications, to which they responded, only much later, so that it wasn't until Tuesday afternoon - the President gave his speech on Monday evening and it was late Tuesday that we got a response from them. It was 5 or 6 o'clock. And that was the typical pattern. They weren't able to get us anything during working hours, the pace was so hot and rapid.

Then all the Russian language officers in the Embassy would get the different notes. They were in Russian and they were lengthy, and we'd parcel them out, a page or two to each officer, and he'd go off and translate them, and then we'd get the English translations together, and two or three of those who had had the most experience with Russian would sit down and try to edit the thing into a more or less unified document.

It would take three or four hours to do that, and it would be nine o'clock - maybe ten o'clock - before the telegram would get out, and there was already an eight hour or more time difference. So it took a long time for those things to get back, and the White House was very upset by this.

I never felt the slightest guilt. We were criticized in fact publicly. The President expressed his displeasure with this slowness. I never felt the slightest guilt, because when we got the darn things we translated them as quickly as we could. On the other hand, these were important documents, and you don't want to make a mistake in handling a document like that, so we did check them twice before we sent them out.

And I never felt in the slightest apologetic for the way we did it.

But the President said, "My gosh," and this again is a kind of a 19th century hangover.

And of course then towards the end of that week the Russians were using all kinds of alternative channels. You remember that John Scali who used to be an AP correspondent was used at one point, and they were getting messages through.

But towards the end of the week they were going on the air almost simultaneously with their delivery of the note to us, and broadcasting the text in Russian, which was then being picked up by monitors in London and translated there and wired back to Washington. I don't know whether they managed to beat our time or not.

We were getting the notes. It was interesting. The notes that came to us towards the end of the week - in one case I remember the guy delivered a note and there was no seal on it, and ordinarily there is a rubber stamp, without which nothing is valid, in the European tradition, and he apologized profusely. In the first place it's completely unprecedented that in a capital the Foreign Ministry delivers a note to the Embassy. No, they call you up and ask you to come over and pick it up. But no, they were sending them around, and these guys were not coming from the Ministry. And this young man, when he delivered the note to me he said, "Please excuse the fact that there is no stamp, no seal on this, but I came right from the Kremlin, and I was instructed to come right here and not to bother to go by the Ministry and have the seal put on it."

And it was even more striking I think in the famous note of Friday, when it was all jumbled up: there were corrections made in green ink, in the same hand as that of the signature, N. Khrushchev. Ordinarily they were most meticulous, as everybody is - you type it, it's clean, no mistakes, no erasures. But no no, here words were crossed out, and other words written in. Obviously these things were being edited and changed right up to the last minute, and they didn't have time to retype them.

And the young fellow who brought that again was very apologetic.

And these guys were really rather admiring. "You are really keeping us moving very fast." (laughs) A little pressure on them.

So that was the origin of the hot line. The President said after this whole thing was over, "We can't go through this kind of thing again."

Q: Wasn't it also the origin of... in addition to the hot line didn't he say, "Now look around quickly. Who can distribute these cables faster or better," or something, and so State relinquished their communications overseas to the CIA for the actual communicators and so forth, and State maintained their communications records, but the people doing the machines and everything were the Agency, and that persisted up until about now, when State is trying to get back, because there were many debates about the privacy of communications, and what guarantee did an Ambassador have if he had just an exclusive message...

DAVIES: Well, I have never understood.

The way it works now, Peter, is that the communicators are Agency people, but the code clerks are State.

Q: That's true, but...

DAVIES: There is no question of privacy, the message is encoded by a State...

Q: Before it even goes into the machine?

DAVIES: Sure.

Q: But somehow I think some people felt that it wasn't as private as they thought, and I know there's a debate going on now, and...

But anyhow, to get back to your point, the time that Kennedy pressed for the hot line he also made this particular pitch.

DAVIES: He did? Could be. I wasn't aware of that.

Q: But that was the first of the hot line?

DAVIES: That was the origin of the hot line.

Q: Which is exactly what?

DAVIES: Well, the hot line is a terminal in the Pentagon, and there are terminals in State and in the...

Q: White House Situation Room.

DAVIES: White House Situation Room. But the principal terminal is in the Pentagon, and initially there was just...now let me think, I think there was just a land line, yes. Well, it went by cable, an undersea cable, and across Finland, and as a matter of fact a couple of times it was cut by farmers in Finland, I don't know how, plowing or some damn thing.

But now there is a satellite link as well. There is a redundancy there, so that if you haven't got one you've got the other, and it is not a telephone. People sometimes have the impression that it's a telephone link, but of course there is no point in having a telephone link because 99 times out of 100 there is no common language, so there is no question of Brezhnev talking with Carter.

But it is a teletype machine, which probably is scrambled on the way. There may even be a code.

Q: With a mutual...

DAVIES: Oh, yes, so that... But it comes out here... I've been at the machine, you know, and they send test messages on a regular schedule - once an hour, I don't know - and they transmit it. The Russians send English, and the Americans send Russian, something like that. And they have transmitted all the Russian classics seven times over now, and the Russians have sent Jack London - I don't know - several times over.

Q: But it is a way for Carter and Brezhnev to talk to each other on urgent matters?

DAVIES: Absolutely, yes, without having to go through... Each terminal is manned by language trained personnel, our terminal by people - Army military personnel - who know the language.

Q: And it's strictly an emergency thing? It isn't used for holiday greetings or anything of that kind?

DAVIES: No, it's strictly an emergency thing, and it has been used a number of times.

Q: Now if President Carter felt very indignant about Afghanistan he might use that to express his indignation, or would he go through more conventional channels?

DAVIES: Well, it would depend upon the urgency. If it were something that "we've got to get this over to Moscow right away" he could use that link. If it's something for which 24 hours or 48 hours aren't going to make that much difference, then you don't use it, because you are supposed to reserve it for time urgent situations.

Q: And it's really only for chiefs of state, isn't it? I mean people on a lower level can't...

DAVIES: No, no. It's reserved strictly - in fact the agreement provides, the agreement sets out in great detail who will use it. It's messages between the top leaders on either side.

Q: Now is that a completely exclusive thing, or does West Germany have a hot line, to Moscow?

DAVIES: I don't know, I don't think so, I think it's just between the superpowers, and it arose because there was a recognition then - I said how scared they were and we were in Moscow, and Dave Klein told me when I got back here how scared everybody was there, and with absolute justice, because we did come within an ace...

You know, two or three funny things happened.

I mentioned the airplane, and that was a great revelation to us, how the Soviets took that, they were very careful not to let that disturb them in any way, shape or form.

But we had - I forget whether it was a UPI or an AP ticker in the office there, and along about Wednesday on this ticker there was a little three or four line item from London that said, LLOYDS OF LONDON HAVE INCREASED THEIR INSURANCE RATES FOR SHIPMENTS TO THE CARIBBEAN BY SUCH AND SUCH A PERCENT. (laughs heartily)

Oh, you are darn right! Lloyds was taking it seriously too. But you know, typical - Lloyds of London had increased the insurance rate in the midst of all this.

But I think it was a close-run thing.

We were waiting, and of course those ships were steaming closer and closer to the line that had been designated to the Soviets, and finally of course the word came that they were hove to in the water, steaming in circles.

And eventually they turned around and went back.

Boy, oh, boy.

We felt that a lot of it was bluff on the Soviet side, but you can't be sure.

Of course the idea of the hot line is that if you ever get into a situation that is as close-run as that again, you will not be constrained by the difficulties of transmittal.

One thing we were never sure of - because our stuff went through the Soviet post office. I mean we had a wire from our communicators - several wires, telephone wires - to the post office, and they'd sit down and play these things out on a code machine and it'd come out, and now we had the punched tape, and that's put into the machine, and that's transmitted to the post office. But we were never sure how rapidly that went through, whether they didn't hold it up for a period of time. You couldn't be sure, and I am still not sure. I think at least one of those messages may have been held up in the post office. It wasn't clear to me.

So this obviates that. This is an instantaneous thing. Or nearly instantaneous, because obviously there is a certain lapse of time, but you can be almost immediately in contact and you don't have to worry about language problems, because you have got language trained personnel at either end, the link is constantly being tested, the language capabilities of the people at either end are constantly being perfected, so in effect you've got as close to instantaneous communication as you can have between leaders who don't have a common language. It's not like the President talking with Margaret Thatcher or Giscard d'Estaing, who speaks beautiful English, or with Schmidt, who speaks beautiful English.

If something happens it won't be because you are not able to get through.

Q: It might be, "This is it, Joe."

DAVIES: Yes. (laughs) Well, that was a fascinating episode.

Well, nothing really so interesting occurred during the remainder of my stay there.

Q: You stayed there how many more months?

DAVIES: That was in October, and I stayed until July or August, and then Mac Toon came and replaced me as political counselor.

SAMUEL G. WISE, JR.
Consular Officer
Moscow (1961-1964)

Samuel G. Wise, Jr. was born in Illinois on May 11, 1928. He received his BA from the University of Virginia in 1951 and his MIA from Columbia University in 1953. He served in the US Marine Corps from 1946 to 1948. His career has included positions in Italy, Russia, and Czechoslovakia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1995.

Q: You finally got off to Moscow in '61?

WISE: I went there in March.

Q: You were in Moscow from when to when?

WISE: Sixty-one to sixty-four. Still the period of Khrushchev, but still a very tempestuous period since they were Missile Crisis years, the Cuban Missile Crisis. It was also the time of the big flurry over a Soviet spy named Oleg Penkovsky, who was apprehended by the Soviet authorities and executed for dealing with the Americans. From what I've read about it, he apparently was a fairly important source for us. The whole Embassy was caught up in this thing when it happened.

Q: Tell me, what was your job when you went out there?

WISE: I was in the Consular Section.

Q: How big was the Consular Section at that time?

WISE: Three Officers and one secretary and I think three locals.

Q: What type of work were you doing?

WISE: Again, there was somewhat of a variety. Mainly, visa work - not immigrant visas primarily. It was visitors to the United States. If you look at it on a volume basis, it wasn't very big, but all the cases were fairly complicated in those days, so you spent a lot of time on them. And there were some immigrant visa cases. There were death cases, some defector cases, including the man who shot Kennedy. He came out there before I was at the Embassy. He, as I was told and have read since, went to Dick Sneider, who was head of the Consular Section, and said that he wanted to give up his citizenship and live in the Soviet Union. Sneider talked to him and asked him to come back. For some time, they went back and forth. They were trying to stall him, because they'd had previous cases like this. A number of them in which people came over and said they wanted to give up their citizenship and the Consul had said "Alright" and taken the oath to give it up. And then the person had found themselves in limbo, because they couldn't get Soviet citizenship. And, very often, they were disturbed, cooky sort of people that the Soviets didn't want, so the U.S. ended up taking them back. When Oswald walked in, they'd had a bunch of these cases, so they stalled him off. And he eventually left Moscow, without giving up his citizenship and went down to Belarus, where he married his wife and had a child. By the time I arrived on the scene, he came back to Moscow, having decided that he wanted to go back to the United States. He came into the Consulate and to Sneider, who I think was still there, and we conferred with Washington, and he eventually got his passport. He also asked for a repatriation loan; he didn't have any money. So I processed that, but all this was sort of routing. Eventually, he went back to the United States. I was in Trieste when Kennedy was assassinated and, when I heard the name, I just about fell over. I remember him as a very arrogant person; arrogant in the sense of demanding his rights. I mean, here's a person who wanted to give up his citizenship, but he was certainly not humble or on his knees when he came in to get his passport. He was demanding that we do this and that.

Q: What was the spirit of the Embassy at the time? It was a difficult time. Let's talk about before the Cuban Missile Crisis. Who was the Ambassador?

WISE: The first Ambassador was Llewellyn Thompson.

Q: Did you have any impression about how he operated?

WISE: He had a very, very high reputation. He was one of our Senior Ambassadors at the time. Very gentlemanly, very polite, clearly very bright, not terribly close to the staff, at least at the junior level. I had the impression not up the line. He had a much more sprightly wife, who was more friendly. But everyone considered him a good, solid professional, who was in charge of the Embassy. I had one occasion where I had a strong difference with him. I had an incident I was involved in: as a Consular Officer, we would get these calls from people who thought they had a claim to American citizenship or otherwise wanted to come in and visit the Consular Section. That wasn't easy in those days, because they had Soviet guards ringed around the Embassy and, to get into the Embassy, they had to run the gauntlet of these guards. One of the ways that we could get people in was that somebody would call and we'd say, "Okay, we'll meet you outside at such and such a time." And we'd go outside, the Vice Consuls, and go past the guards. The person would come up (they'd tell us what they'd be wearing, so we could recognize them) and we'd shake hands and then turn around and take them into the Embassy. And this worked for quite a while. But then, evidently, the orders got changed one day, and I was out there to meet someone. When we came back up into the Embassy, the guards - two or three big, beefy guys - just stopped in front of us and said, "He can't go in." I said, "Why not" and we had a big argument there. It ended up that there were some fists flying and they eventually dragged him off and I went back in the Embassy. I was just furious and, of course, reported it to the DCM and the Ambassador learned about it. We recommended that some sort of comparable treatment be done to the Soviets, in Washington or somewhere. But this was not the view of the Embassy. They felt that there were other irons in the fire and that we shouldn't react to a situation like that, except in a very mild way. I think maybe there was some sort of a protest to the Consular Section, to the Foreign Ministry. Anyway, as a young Officer, I was a little upset.

Q: He was replaced by Foy Kohler. What was he like? Did you get a feel for him at all?

WISE: Yes. He was certainly more outgoing. And he established early on a policy in making his initial calls to Soviet officials of taking an Embassy Officer with him. And this extended all the way down to the Junior Officers. It would be the job of the Officer accompanying to take the notes and draft a cable afterwards to Washington about what occurred at the meeting. It was a chance to meet the Ambassador, riding in the car over there and back, and engaging in a little personal talk, as well as professional. He seemed much more approachable in that sense.

Q: Obviously, at an Embassy such as Moscow at that time, although you were in different sections, all the Officers are pretty much sewn together, aren't they?

WISE: Very much.

Q: Did you find that you were having problems with security, being bugged or enticed or anything like that? Was this a problem?

WISE: The assumption was that everything was bugged, including the Embassy, except for one or two floors up at the top - the floor where the Ambassador and the DCM and some others were. It was assumed that everything else was open to eavesdroppers. Of course, we found out subsequently that even the areas we thought were secure were not always secure. But this was true the apartments as well. The very sophisticated (for those days, '61 - '64) equipment could penetrate through the windows of your apartment and pick up conversation. So the only time we really felt safe in talking was when you were out on the street. Very often, you'd save your most sensitive conversations for that sort of venue.

Q: How did the Officers feel about Khrushchev at that time? Was there a sort of an Embassy that you were getting, particularly from those in the Political Section?

WISE: I don't know this is an assessment of the Political Section of the Embassy or not. I think that Khrushchev was considered a colorful character - certainly an improvement over Stalin, and the revelations that he had permitted to come out about Stalin and the Stalin Era made him certainly a step ahead of Stalin. But he was a convinced Communist, still running the place in a way of a convinced Communist. He was also considered, being colorful, somewhat unpredictable. I think that caused people a lot of concern.

Q: How did the Missile Crisis play out? How did it hit you all?

WISE: It didn't hit me directly in the Consular Section, except that my wife and another wife of an Embassy Officer were traveling in the Caucasuses when this thing broke out. They were mysteriously hustled back to Moscow, without being told what happened. They said that something was happening and certainly scared them a little bit. My main memory of the Missile Crisis was in dealing with some of the Officers in the Political Section. A Political Counselor, a fellow named Richard Davies, he and I were fairly close. As you said before, it was a close Embassy. We were all sort of hemmed in so, socially, we knew each other quite well. I remember, being in his office quite a few times, that he had delivered one or two messages to his counterpart in the Foreign Ministry during the course of the Crisis. A couple times, I remember, big sighs of relief because such and such a message had been received in such and such a way. There was, overall, a tremendous tenseness at the time. Certainly, we all had the realization that, if there were a nuclear exchange, we'd be wiped out by our own people. But there's not much you can do about it.

Q: Would you go out to the market and wander around and get any feeling for what was happening at the time? Was this part of the work of all types of Officers, to go out and almost take the temperature of the crowd?

WISE: Yes, that was very much the case. I recall doing it less in Moscow. I guess my wife did most of the shopping in Moscow. But even she said that when she'd go to a market, she'd be followed. They followed all the Americans. I did most of that sort of thing when we'd take trips. The Embassy had a policy then, which I think was an excellent policy, of whenever an Officer could be spared for a period of time, to take a trip to some part of the Soviet Union. We'd always travel at least in pairs; they didn't want anybody going alone. We'd go to Central Asia, (Samarkand, Tashkent, and Bokhara). There was a visitor from the Department who was along at that time, too. We would go out to the markets and talk to people and get a feeling for the place. We'd go to the bookstores and do all sorts of things that would expose us to how the place ran. We would concentrate less on meeting officials. It was more of an orientation to the society. It was very useful, I think.

Q: By the time you left there, what was your impression of the Soviet Union?

WISE: I thought it was, as I said earlier, a run down place. The contrast between the general state of the place as you saw it and its might in the military fields, its nuclear abilities, didn't seem to jive somehow - except by draining all of its economic resources in one direction, they could produce this military thing. Naively, I thought that this could go on perhaps indefinitely. My feeling was, "I can't see how they'd done it now, but if they've done it, I guess it can go on indefinitely."

Q: Were we looking at the nationality problem in the Soviet Union, as far as being a potential device...

WISE: It was certainly being looked at in an academic way. But I don't think that people made any plans that the country was going to break up because of the nationality problem. And that's exactly what happened. It didn't break up because of the nationality problem so much as because of the economic problems. And then the nationality realities came out. But I certainly didn't get a great sense of nationality unrest in traveling around the country. People were afraid to talk to us. They just don't come up and say what they really think. If they thought they were being oppressed, they didn't do it because they knew we were being followed and that anybody who came in contact with us was going to be questioned. I remember one particular case, that I must say was a contrast. It was a very touching moment. I was traveling with, I think, Bill Watts, down to Rostov on the Don. We arrived overnight and we went in the hotel and started talking, two or three Officers from the Embassy. This cleaning woman came into the room and said, "I want to clean." We said, "Well, go away." We were trying to prepare ourselves for some meetings with some officials. She insisted; she came back. She pointed up to the ceiling; she was telling us that we were being listened to. Well, we assumed we were, too. But, for a Soviet citizen in those days to stick their neck out, to tell foreigners (the so-called "enemy") that they were being listened to was a rather touching little thing. So, you did see very occasional glimpses of decency.

Q: How did your wife respond to life in the Soviet Union?

WISE: I think she found it a very fascinating experience, difficult in terms of shopping, trying to raise a family and keep things going. We had a son born not in the Soviet Union, but while we were stationed there. She went to Helsinki to have our son. So, after his arrival, we had three children there. Two of the children, the girls, went to a Russian kindergarten. They would come home and sing the praises of Lenin, all the little songs the children had to learn. We took it with more amusement than anger, but they did learn some Russian. We liked that. They had a cultural life, of course, in Moscow and other major cities that, as foreign diplomats, we had almost unique access to, so we could go to the Bolshoi, or the opera or the ballet, even things like their famous circus, museums. So, that was a good part of the experience. You felt under a tremendous pressure, which you got used to after a while. You didn't feel it in your day-to-day operation. You were careful about your conversations. You knew you were being followed. But it became part of the routine. The only time that you really realized how heavy it was was when you left the Soviet Union. We occasionally would go to Helsinki, to Finland, to accompany a diplomatic pouch, or for a shopping trip or something like that.

Ambassador Roger Kirk was born in Rhode Island in 1930. He received a bachelor's degree from Princeton University and entered the Foreign Service in 1955. His career included positions in Italy, the Soviet Union, and Vietnam, and ambassadorships to Somalia, Romania and the U.S. Mission to the United Nations in Austria. Ambassador Kirk was interviewed by Horace G. Torbert in May 1991.

Q: You finally got to Moscow after that, did you?

KIRK: Yes, after the meeting in Secretary Herter's office I went down to SOV on the public affairs side. That is preparing press guidance. I did that for a little over a year, worked for David Klein who was the head man for the press. Then he went over to the NSC staff with Mac Bundy. I then took over that job. It was Jack McSweeney who was office director. Dick Davis was the Deputy Assistant Secretary. Of course, we started at the beginning of the Kennedy administration. The basic marching orders were that there was going to be a new look at American-Soviet relations, and it was going to be a good deal more positive than it had been under the Republicans. Some of us, myself included, were a little skeptical about this. The words were somewhat more positive, but the degree of positiveness became strained by such things as Cuban Bay of Pigs, and then the Cuban missile crisis.

I had not been involved in the Bay of Pigs business when I was working for Secretary Herter, but I knew there was a project going on. People were dealing directly with him, not going through the staff aides.

Then I went off to Garmisch-Partenkirchen, the Russian area and language training facility run by the Department of the Army for their people. Its part of their so-called fast program which involves a year's study at Monterey, a year's study at an academic institution, two years at Garmisch, a year of further training, and then you're ready. That was the fast program. The Department of State had a somewhat different version -- you had nine months at Garmisch and then went to Moscow. It was excellent training because you were supposed to have a working knowledge of Russian before you went to the school. The military had a years' training beforehand. All of your class discussions, your term papers, your reading was all in Russian. You lived it in the language for eight or nine months. When I first went, even though I'd spoken Russian pretty well, I had not used it for eleven years hardly at all.

Q: And that's a language you forget.

KIRK: And I had forgotten a good deal. I could still read pretty well, and understand reasonably well, but speaking was very difficult, coming up with anything. We had a grammar exam at the beginning and I put together the declension and conjugation tables by remembering various songs in Russian. Every time I would come to a word I knew what the word was. If I could ferret which case it was in, I'd fill in the ending for that word, and that gender in that case, like a crossword puzzle. It was very good training in terms of the instructors who were there, who were all people who had operated in Soviet society. It was in Europe originally because these people came out of the DP camps. Most of them had backgrounds that made them totally ineligible for entry into the United States -- members of the communist party, members of the police, members of the Army. But that was fortunate, of course, and what made them valuable. That experience was very fine. That included two bus trips into Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union; one the northern route and into Moscow, one the southern route into Romania, Bulgaria, Turkey, Yugoslavia. That was in the fall of '62 and the spring of '63. It gave me my first taste of what we then called satellite countries, the basic message from that trip having been that the countries in Eastern Europe were quite different even then, in their character or their outlook, from each other. Some things that have become very apparent today.

After the year at Garmisch, or Oberammergau -- we lived in Garmisch and went to school in Oberammergau -- we drove to Moscow, myself, my wife, our four children and a nursemaid in a mid-sized American station wagon. We drove up to Stockholm, over to Helsinki, and then down into Moscow, the objective being to reduce to the extent possible the amount of time we were driving behind the curtain in case of any accidents. We arrived safely and well.

I was assigned to the consular section for my first year in Moscow, and the political section the second year. Two weeks after we arrived there was the signing of the limited test ban treaty in Moscow for which the Secretary of State and a variety of other dignitaries arrived for the formal ceremonies. Betty and I, even though very junior, were assigned to Senator and Mrs. Fulbright, he then being the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, to take them around Moscow and show them what was there. I, of course, as I say, had been there a total of two weeks though I had been there in 1949 and 1950. I quickly learned that the thing to do when asked, "What's that building?" was to give an answer even though I hadn't the foggiest notion, because to say, "I'm sorry Senator, I've been here two weeks, I don't know," was highly unsatisfactory. Whereas if one said, "Post and telegraph," or "Ministry of Agriculture, Ministry of Industry," he would forget immediately, as we all would, and they came away at least satisfied that the embassy knew. So we did that, and we went with the Fulbrights up to Leningrad, and enjoyed their company very much I must say. They're both very fine people. He already at that point was struggling with the question of the relative balance between giving large amounts of assistance abroad and the needs of his home state of Arkansas and places like that in the United States. It was interesting to see this great internationalist's mind at work trying to balance these different priorities. For my mind, who always the thought internationally primarily, it was an interesting insight into the other side of the use of our resources. Not to use them just for foreign aid, because we had a real obligation to our own people. There are some very poor places in our own country.

The Consular Section in Moscow was a reasonably routine place. There was a consul and two vice consuls. My tour there was enlivened by the fact that it was during that time that we negotiated the consular convention with the Soviet Union. I was chosen by the Political Counselor, Mac Toon, to be his assistant in that respect. So the better part of that year we went once or twice a week to the Foreign Ministry to negotiate that convention. I was essentially preparing the papers and listening while Toon and his opposite number on the other side spoke. His opposite number was the deputy legal advisor of the Foreign Ministry, Oleg Khlestov, who interestingly enough was my opposite number in Vienna as ambassador to the UN organizations there some 20 years later.

Q: Which is one of the practical fascinations of a career in the Foreign Service that you have known these people.

KIRK: Absolutely. Those contacts you think you won't see them again but you do time and again, your own people, your own nationals, but especially foreigners. We often swapped tales about that time. We were at the interesting position -- we, the Embassy; and we, the Department of State -- of wanting maximum protection for our consular officers and personnel in the Soviet Union, recognizing full well we then would have to give maximum immunity to Soviet consular and personnel in the United States, something the FBI and others were not at all enthusiastic about. So we had a dual negotiation going, one with Washington, and one with the Soviets. We and the Soviets, to some extent, being on the same side in the question. They, of course, wanted maximum protection for their people. The negotiation went quite well. We were nearly done and our ambassador, Ambassador Kohler, was about ready to go back to the United States on a visit. The Political Counselor and I thought that it would be nice if he could go back with this agreement concluded, or at least initialed. So we told the Soviets we'd like to finish within two or three weeks. And immediately they began to stonewall. They obviously felt we were under some pressure to conclude the agreement. They went back on some of the suggestions that they had made, and it took us a full six months of simply -- well, not quite that much -- let's say three months of simply showing no interest in these meetings whatsoever, making no phone calls, before we could get back to where we had been.

Q: But this is great training.

KIRK: Absolutely. And to tell the Soviets that all we wanted to do was give our ambassador something nice when he went home, of course was totally rejected by them as unworthy of consideration as a reason. But I've often thought of that. If you seem to be under pressure, they, or maybe some others with whom you negotiate, will immediately up the ante.

Two other things in the consular section. There were a number of American Armenians, some of whom came from the Soviet Union, from Armenia, in the 1930's, or '20's, or even before. Some of whom were born in the United States to the people who had come out during the '20's or even a little earlier. They had gone back to the Soviet Union. In 1945 one shipload went back, and in 1947 another went back. They went back in response to the Soviet propaganda they were building a new Armenia and the sort of euphoria of the post-war alliance. And once back there these people were never allowed to leave even though many of them were American born citizens. And during the time that we were there -- that I was there in the consular section -- the first one of these was allowed by the Soviets to make contact with the embassy. I remember one of the most rewarding moments of my life was reissuing American passports to an Armenian family who had gotten Soviet permission to leave, and could leave as Americans and come back to the United States. It was not easy because the Department queried as to why they had not been in contact with the American embassy all these years if they were so anxious to come back to the United States. We reported that one had tried and spent ten years in prison as a result. We thought that was a little too high a standard; it was quite a disincentive. So the Department eventually relented and, of course, since then thousands of these people have come out. Even under Stalin's time they preserved their American customs, they played baseball, they preserved their knowledge of English. They did some really quite heroic things in that sense, and that was nice.

The only other thing, I suppose, of any eventfulness was we had one of these prisoner swaps where we were exchanging a Soviet spy for someone the Soviets had alleged was a spy, or someone they had held for many years. And there was a man called Father Ciszole. Father Ciszole had been taken prisoner by the Soviets in the early '40s I suppose. There was one person in Soviet Affairs... Virginia James, who remembered Father Ciszole. No one else seemed to know him, as they had come to SOV long after he'd been taken. And when the time came to look for two people to swap with the Soviets -- one was obvious, I've forgotten who he was -- and she said, "How about Father Ciszole?" So sure enough we put his name on the proposal for the exchange. The Soviets were quite puzzled but eventually did find him out in Siberia somewhere. He has since described how he was on his 20th year, or 15th year in Siberia when he got word to come to the camp office, was given a new set of clothes, a shave and a haircut, and was told he was going to the United States -- to his total astonishment.

KIRK: Just because one lady remembered his name. Otherwise he never would have gotten out. We realized at that point how dependent we were on the local staff. We had to prepare the American visas, and in a couple of cases American passports, for these people without the local staff knowing. This whole thing was very hush- hush, and it was very difficult to find the seals, find the ribbons, knowing where to sign, just the mechanics of getting things together. We were, as I guess most of us are, totally dependent for that kind of clerical help in the consular section. I often thought of that when I heard the Soviets had denied the locals access to the embassy from one day to the next. The consular section in Moscow must have been in a hell of a mess, along with everybody else.

Q: We were in the same boat in Budapest and in Sofia -- much more so in Budapest actually.

KIRK: And, of course, some of those locals had been there for many many years. There were a couple who had been there when I was there in 1949 and were still there. They knew very well what was going on.

Q: his is one of the thorns in our side. Theoretically, you could say, well we'll do nothing but have our own people there who will have the language, but you lose an awful lot by doing that.

KIRK: Oh, I think so, and there is no way that you can keep a consular section where you have visitors come, where you have people actually come to get there visas, no way you can keep it free of bugs because anyone can come in to get a visa and plant a bug under a chair. I'm a proponent of the theory that you have certain areas of the embassy, or certain buildings, that are free from locals getting in. I think that is a good idea, but in the consular section, the USIA library, or residences, you don't try to keep them out, and you accept the fact, or at least the hypothesis, that everything you say is being listened to.

Q: Do you have any particular comment about Foy Kohler who was your ambassador the whole time you were there, wasn't he?

KIRK: Foy Kohler was our ambassador the whole time we were there, and he was actually DCM in Moscow up until the time my father came to Moscow. Just coincidentally, there was a change of DCM as well. I therefore had seen the Kohlers for a couple of days in '49. But during the period I was in Moscow from 1963 to 1965 Kohler was the ambassador. I thought very highly of him. He was a very good person to work for; he was very fair. You knew that he would stand up for you, that he would demand good performance, but that if you did good performance, that would be reflected in your record, and that if for some reason there was some mistake, then he would stand up for you. I made some stupid mistake in a note to the Soviets and it could have been trouble but he took full responsibility and backed us up wholly. And in the consular convention business he was a tower of strength. Very approachable, very human and humane person.

The second year in Moscow, I was in the political section working on external affairs, Soviet-American relations basically, but also Soviet relations with Middle East and Africa -- I can't remember now; Soviet-American relations primarily. I was also the travel officer, which meant I assigned myself as many trips as possible. That, of course, was one of the most fascinating...

Q: You had a priority to keep the traveling going.

KIRK: We worked very hard to keep the travel going. You always had to have two people going, and you were occasionally looking for someone to go along with an officer. And I had traveled a good deal even in 1949 and '50. I think it's very important in that kind of country, where you're very isolated from people, to get out, because once you're outside the capital city, you have a little more chance to talk to people. The Soviets, at least in those days, would not necessarily give you a compartment by yourself even though there were two of you traveling. The compartments were for four people, and there would often be two other people in the compartment, not necessarily KGB people -- sometimes they were, but not always. And in the course of several days on the train that you would often spend, you got a chance to chat with people. So it was very rewarding.

Q: Did you ever have anything spectacular in that sense of picking up any interesting information?

KIRK: Oh, nothing really spectacular. I suppose at the time that we created the most trouble with the Soviets quite unknowingly, was when shortly before my departure from Moscow in 1950, the first time I was there, I had said to my father that I really wanted to see Siberia before I left. He agreed that that was a fine idea, and he would like to as well. So my father, Dick Service, who was our Far Eastern specialist, and myself, took a trip on the TransSiberian just as far out in Siberia as we were allowed to go. It was on the shore of Lake Baikal, a small village called Sludyanka. And then we turned around and came back for about a day and a half or two days on the train until we came to a city where we were allowed to change to an airplane. We spent over a week on the train going out and several days coming back. When we arrived back at the airport in Moscow, the DCM, Wally Barbour, met my father with the news that North Korea had invaded South Korea a few hours before. And I often thought of the Soviets trying to figure out why the American ambassador to Moscow, for no apparent reason, suddenly took it into his head to spend a week on the TransSiberian just when they were moving supplies and things for the North Korean invasion of South Korea. But when I think of the trains we must have derailed, and the schedules we must have thrown out of commission, it was quite a trip.

On Moscow then, the second time that is, in the mid-'60s, what else does one say? Oh, yes, Khrushchev fell during that period. The embassy did not expect it to happen, and we did not have foreknowledge of it. When people ask me about that, I say, "That is certainly the case," but I also point out, "that Khrushchev didn't know either, and that his sources of information should be somewhat better than ours" -- the American embassy's.

Q: That's a good answer. All that is fascinating. Well, I think probably we better be...

KIRK: Close it up? One final point on Moscow would probably be enough. One of my jobs in Moscow was to mingle with -- it was Vietnam time, we were starting to bomb Vietnam -- and the Soviets were organizing demonstrations outside of the embassy. We wanted to get some sense as to what the mood of the demonstration was. So I, because my Russian was fairly good I suppose, and because I was doing Soviet-American relations, was elected to be the person to go out and mingle with the demonstrators. So I would put on my borrowed Russian hat and put on my overcoat and go out and mingle with the crowd. I came away with two or three conclusions. First of all, what the embassy security people said, that is to say, "the best defense is to show no sign of life in the embassy whatsoever," is absolutely correct. Because when you're outside and people were throwing stones at an embassy, if someone sticks their head out and yells at you, it simply incites the crowd. It gets a dialogue going, it gets them excited. It's much better to present a completely impassive face, if a window breaks, a window breaks, that's just too bad. The crowd was quite orderly, but reasonably enthusiastic about seeing how many windows they could break, who could throw the furthest. I carefully should add, truthfully, I did not throw a stone, tempting as it might have been just because of the enthusiasm of the moment. But no one bothered me. I'm sure the KGB knew I was there and were watching. Someone did come over one time and said, "Where did you get those shoes? They don't look like Russian shoes." And I said, "I got them abroad," and moved away. There was no real hostility towards me.

In the final demonstration the Chinese students at the Soviet University joined by prearrangement. They were much less docile than the Russian students. They actually tried to run through the police lines and there were some ugly moments. A water cannon truck was brought up. I remember I was quite close to this truck when it came up. It was interesting to sense the mood of the crowd change as this truck came up. They became much more hostile. The driver was a very friendly, personable, outgoing guy. He leaned out of the window and kidded with people, and joshed with them, and defused this potentially difficult situation. They never used the water but again one got a sense as to how the mood of a crowd could change. The Chinese, as I say, were somewhat obstreperous, and the Chinese then made a big fuss later about the Soviets having beaten up their students. That was the last demonstration. The outrage of the Soviet people against American barbarism stopped suddenly. But the reason, of course, was that the Soviets were having trouble controlling the demonstration. They were always very wary about demonstrations.

Anyway, so much for that Moscow interlude.

PETER S. BRIDGES
Assistant General Services Officer/Political Officer
Moscow (1962-1964)

Ambassador Bridges was born in New Orleans and raised in Chicago. He attended Dartmouth College and Columbia University and served in the US Army in France. He entered the Foreign Service in 1957 and held positions in Panama, Moscow, Italy, and served as Ambassador to Somalia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

BRIDGES: So I came back from my trip in June and then my family and I had home leave. We left for Moscow in September 1962.

Q: You were in Moscow from '62 to '64. When did you get to Moscow in 1962?

BRIDGES: It was in September, might have been September 10th.

Q: That's an important time. Before we get to the little problem between the United States and Soviet Union, what were you doing?

BRIDGES: Well, I was to be the assistant general services officer, which was certainly not the job I wanted; I wanted to be a political officer. But they said they just didn't have enough spaces for two of us who would be political officers; we were assigned to administrative jobs. I was assistant general services officer and Jack Perry was the personnel officer. So I was assistant GSO for a year, and not a terribly good one; certainly not an enthused one. The chief GSO was James Moran, who ended his career as a senior admin officer and then ambassador to the Seychelles. I did my job 40 hours a week, but after hours I read all I could in Soviet modern literature and culture because I was hoping that the second year I would get into the political section.

Q: How did the Cuban Missile Crisis hit you? What happened over there?

BRIDGES: I don't remember the first news we had, but of course we heard about it very quickly in October. It was worse. We understood the danger, but it was only two years later when we came back the United States, in 1964, that we understood for the first time how scared people had been in the United States. The difference was the media; the American media had been scaring the people, and of course the Soviet media was not scaring the Soviet people because there was no advantage to them doing so. Our mood was, I would say, one of concern. As assistant GSO I was not privy to all the communications to and from the Department, but the ambassador generally informed us as to what was going on. There were a couple of funny incidents. One Saturday, my wife and I - we were told to stay inside the compound, so that there wouldn't be some kind of provocation - I said to my wife, "Let's leave the kids with a sitter and go for a walk." So we went for a long walk through town and were coming back down the Garden Ring on which the embassy sat. About a mile short of the embassy, I said, "Look, there's no traffic on the Garden Ring," which is a very wide boulevard. We couldn't quite figure that out, but we got towards the embassy and we could see there was a crowd in the street outside the embassy. So we began to understand what was going on. I'd seen a real mob in Panama; this was a contrived mob. The Soviets had gotten together, I suppose, two or three hundred factory workers, God knows who they were, and made placards saying "Hands off Cuba" and "Down with Imperialism" and so forth and so on. The incensed demonstrators were standing in the streets holding up their placards but not doing anything, but they would occasionally be told to chant some slogan and so they would. There was a line of sawhorses between the mob and the sidewalk and the people were all carefully behind the sawhorses. So Mary Jane and I walked up the sidewalk and looked at the so-called mob on the left, and the policemen. We walked into the embassy and at this point we found that the DCM had said staff should go to the upper floors just in case they started throwing rocks at the windows and things like that. We lived on the eighth floor, so we went upstairs, and soon enough - maybe they had been waiting for the two of us to get back inside - the demonstrators were given the signal and they threw some ink bottles and a few rocks at some windows and did some minor damage. But it was such a contrast between the real mob in Panama and these demonstrators.

Q: As assistant GSO didn't you feel like going out and saying, "For God's sake don't throw ink..."

BRIDGES: Well, we didn't see the ink as we walked past; they were not showing the bottles and we did send a note later to the foreign ministry demanding payment for the damages done. I don't recall that they paid us but anyway it kind of made me mad because I had to get all the stuff washed off.

Q: I was in Belgrade at the time. Our ambassador was George Kennan, and I recall some serious things, but I don't recall running for cover or anything...

BRIDGES: It was only in subsequent years that I understood how the American people were frightened to read of the exchanges between the Soviet Union and the United States.

Q: What were you picking up when you arrived at the embassy about Khrushchev?

BRIDGES: I can't remember too well, the early signals about Khrushchev. I can certainly remember what we were thinking and seeing in 1964. In '63 I finished my year in general services and I was assigned to the political section and was given what to me was the best job in the embassy. The political section was divided into an external and an internal side; the internal side was following developments inside the Soviet Union. There were three of us: head of the internal side was Kenneth Kerst who was a Civil Service officer from the Bureau of Intelligence Research who was given a Foreign Service Reserve commission and sent to Moscow for two years. So he was my boss. The second ranking officer in internal affairs was Bill Morgan, who has since retired, after a very good career later in the consular field. My job was to follow developments on the cultural side, developments in religion, developments in nationalities, and maybe a couple of other things. It was a great job, it was a hard job.

In 1963 there was a disastrous harvest in the Soviet Union. It didn't rain, they didn't have grain reserves. Khrushchev had foolishly embarked on a so-called virgin lands campaign, basically to plow up marginal pasture land, a lot of it in Kazakhstan, and grow grain. It worked for a year or two, I can't remember when he started the campaign, but in '63 they had a disastrously tiny harvest and it was after that they first decided they had to buy grain from the United States. Not a proud accomplishment for Khrushchev. We could also see that Khrushchev was not liked much by the top Soviet military command. He was reducing the size of the Soviet armed forces, not drastically, but there were indications that the Soviet marshals and generals didn't like that. His cultural policy was sort of a mess, you might say. At the end of 1962 I was reading the Soviet literary journals when I stayed after hours when I was in General Services, and in late 1962 the journal Novyi Mir, or New World, which was the best known literary journal, published a novella called "One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich," by Alexander Solzhenitsyn, a totally unknown writer. That was a bomb going off in the Soviet intellectual world, that something like that could be published. Solzhenitsyn published a couple of other things after that, not so quite interesting as his account of labor camp life. There was all this ferment; and I got to know some interesting people in this field; for example a young writer, he was my age, born in 1932, named Vasily Aksyonov. He was the best known, best liked younger Soviet writer who could be published. There were a lot of writers in the Soviet Union who basically wrote, as they said, for the drawer, because what they wrote they couldn't publish.

Q: Was the Samizdat business going on?

BRIDGES: Well, it was going on but not to the extent that it was later in the '70s or '80s. Our ambassador had a deal with Hollywood where he could get new American films from the U.S.A. So he would have a film showing every month or two at his residence. And we all had to suggest interesting people he could invite, I was a reader, among other things, of a journal called Inostrannaya Literatura, foreign literature. I read two or three things in that by a writer named R. Orlova on American literature, and it was pretty straight criticism; it was not propaganda but it was pretty good stuff. So I suggested that we invite Orlova to a movie at the residence. I met her - her full name was Raisa Davydovna Orlova - and we had a good talk, and a month later we invited her to another movie, and she said, "I'm not going to come again unless you invite my husband." I said, "I didn't know you had a husband." She said, "Oh, yes, he is a literary critic, too, his field is German literature." So he came, and it turned out that they were willing to come to dinner occasionally at our apartment if the invitation was sent through the Union of Soviet Writers. His name was Lev Zalmanovich Kopelev. We got to know them fairly well, we'd have them over as often as we could, they were always talking about having us out to their dacha, but it never seemed feasible. We understood why they would not want to do that. We knew they were both Jewish, we knew that he had been an army officer in World War II, and had spent eight years in a Soviet labor camp starting soon after the end of the war. There were limits to what we knew about their lives; they both came from bourgeois families, they were certainly not proletarian by birth. It was only soon after I left the Soviet Union that I learned that it was Kopelev who had taken Solzhenitsyn's manuscript of Ivan Denisovich to the editor of Novyi Mir and urged him to get the approval for having it published. Kopelev had in fact been a fellow prisoner of Solzhenitsyn in a labor camp for several years, and in fact Kopelev appears in Solzhenitsyn's novel The First Circle. I can't think of his name in that novel. It's the one about the prison where they put scientists and the like. We decided that Kopelev and Orlova must have thought that since I was in American intelligence - but I was not - we knew all about them. But we didn't. Anyway, they were interesting people; we were very pleased to have a chance to see them. Kopelev, later, after the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968, wrote a very strong letter protesting the invasion. It was published in the Austrian communist newspaper. He was expelled from the Soviet writers' union and he and his wife emigrated to western Germany where later he got the big German literary prize; he has died since then. As I mentioned in something I wrote, I think my book Safrika, years later I read Orlova's memoir in which talked about how she had had to report to the KGB on their contacts with foreigners. I said in my book that I hoped that she had ended that practice by the time we knew them; but I doubt it, I'm sure they had to report on foreigners.

Q: This was the expected...

BRIDGES: Kopelev also wrote a memoir, Memoirs of a True Believer, and he describes very graphically his part as a young Communist in the collectivization drive in Ukraine in the 1930s, and how they were taking grain away from peasants who were obviously going to starve to death as a result. It was a very frank confession.

Q: So often in the Communist world the artistic side has been given a certain amount of freedom with regards to contacts and all that. I take it this was happening in a way. You had much better access to them then you would have if you were a political officer or some other part of the society.

BRIDGES: I have to say that these Soviet writers were brave people to be willing to have contact with such a person as me. I was sometimes surprised that I would get to see them. These were not the only writers or intellectuals that I saw. There was a young Russian named Andrei Amalrik who had been expelled from Moscow State University, and who had pretensions of being a writer. I got to know him and on Saturday mornings sometimes Mary Jane and I would pick him up and he would take us out to see an unorthodox artist or two. That was fun, and we would occasionally buy a painting for not very much. Again, there was a certain amount of bravery involved on these people's parts. The artists were not members of the official Union of Soviet Artists but they managed to make a living selling to foreigners. They were also selling to Soviet scientists. Soviet scientists were to some extent patrons of unofficial art in the Soviet Union.

Q: How about poetry? Was poetry a strong element in the literary or intellectual field?

BRIDGES: Oh, yes, very much. These were the days in which a young Yevgeny Yevtushenko was reaching his heights; I knew him, though not well, he came to dinner one time. He asked me if I was an intelligence agent and I said, "No", and I then asked him if he was, and he said, "No", and we went on from there. His nickname among the liberal Soviet intellectuals was Zhenya Gapon, which takes a little bit of explaining. Father Gapon was an Orthodox priest who was also a police agent, and who in 1905 led a mob of demonstrators to the Winter Palace, where they got mowed down. And Zhenya was the nickname for Yevgeny. So his nickname suggested he was in cahoots with the police.

Q: Did you sense in the intellectual community that you were dealing with a strong Jewish element?

BRIDGES: The Jews had been purged after World War II, they'd been hit very hard in the late years of Stalinism. There were still a lot of Jewish writers and artists. Aksyonov was half Jewish; his mother was Yevgenia Ginzberg, and her memoir of the purges and labor camp was smuggled out and first published in Italy in the late 1960s. One of the artists we went to see was a man named Oskar Rabin, who was half-Jewish and who emigrated later to France. There was a lot of official anti-Semitism. The people at the top of the official Writers' Union were all ethnic Russians and not Jews as far as I can remember.

Q: Was the writers' union... was there sort of a Stalin apparatchik top level...

BRIDGES: There sort of was. I can't tell you that I got to know a gamut of Soviet writers, I got to know quite a few of them and some of them were old Stalinists; I remember surprising one of them, I can't remember who but in writing my masters at Columbia I had read probably a hundred post-war Soviet novels. Once or twice I would surprise these old Stalinist hacks who were still around by saying, "Oh, yes, I read your Red Star in the East." And he'd say, "My God, you did?" I'm forgetting to say that the most fun I had as a political officer was when John Steinbeck came to the Soviet Union in October 1963. I had not long before then entered the political section. Steinbeck agreed to the suggestion of Leslie Brady, to pay a visit to the Soviet Union; he had not been there since soon after World War II when he had gone there with Robert Capa, the photographer, and they had done a book about Russia rebuilding. Steinbeck said that he would go if a younger writer would come too, so Edward Albee agreed to come and arrived a little bit after Steinbeck. Steinbeck said that he wanted somebody from the embassy who spoke Russian and could come along and keep him out of trouble, and that turned out to be me. So it was fun, and Steinbeck's wife Elaine, who died not long ago, came too, and Mary Jane traveled along with us when she could, she had not long before become manager of the embassy commissary. So she did some of the traveling but most of it was the Steinbecks, their Soviet Writers' Union interpreter, and me. Albee came, and his escort officer was William Luers, who had joined the embassy a year after I did. Anyway that gave me a number of additional insights into the Soviet intellectual world and a few more contacts.

Q: If I recall, Steinbeck was a big darling of the Soviets at one time. The Grapes of Wrath was representative of showing how awful things were.

BRIDGES: Sure. And before that the novel immediately before Grapes of Wrath had as a hero a union organizer in California who as I recall was a Communist. So the Soviets looked at him as sort of a progressive, and when he had gone to Moscow with Robert Capa in 1947, they produced a book that was very favorable to the Soviet Union, about Russia rebuilding after the ravages of World War II. That was in '48, now it's fifteen years later; they didn't understand that Steinbeck's politics were certainly not left at this point, he was supporting the American effort in Vietnam very strongly, his son served there. He was a Democrat; he was a strong supporter of Kennedy and later LBJ. He was not the sort of progressive writer the Soviets hoped he would be. Frankly, though, before he came, I was a little bit dubious to what his politics might be; I had read this postwar book that he and Capa had done and I was worried that part of my travels with Steinbeck might be having to tell him that it's not the way you think it is, it's worse. But he was not at all deceived and we got on fine and he was great to travel with, and we stayed in contact for several years after that. He was very kind to me, and in fact he and Elaine very generously gave me the use of their Manhattan apartment for two months in the fall of 1965, when I was working at the United Nations.

Q: I read this story - I don't know if it's true or not, but at one point they were showing the movie The Grapes of Wrath to show how the poor people were, and people would say, "Look, they have a car." They had this old rickety truck in the movie.

BRIDGES: He had written the Moon is Down during World War II, basically about occupied Norway although the characters have Anglo names. The Soviets put that on as a play and took him to see it and he was mad as hell, because first of all they hadn't asked him about it, and secondly, at this point the Soviets weren't paying royalties. He did not need the money but he was angry that the Soviets did not agree to take part in and sign the International Copyright Convention, and he gave them a pretty hard time on the subject of royalties. Incidentally, the biography of Steinbeck called The True Adventures of John Steinbeck, Writer by Jackson Benson has a lot about Steinbeck's 1963 Soviet visit.

When we got to Kiev, our Embassy phoned me to say that the Foreign Ministry had told them that I would not be permitted to travel onward to Tbilisi and Yerevan. I told Steinbeck, who wrote a paragraph saying that if they would not permit his friend and colleague Peter Bridges to travel, then he wouldn't travel, either. I said that that was flattering but he shouldn't do such a thing. He told me to send it to the right place in Moscow. I cabled the text to Smirnovsky, the head of the USA section in the Foreign Ministry, and the next day the Embassy called me again to say that for reasons they didn't quite understand, the Ministry had relented and said I could continue on the trip.

Q: What was your observation of the interchange between Steinbeck and Russian people he would meet?

BRIDGES: He got on fine, but the question was how to get away from the apparatchik element and see good writers. For example, when we went from Moscow to Kiev, John was to be the guest of the Ukrainian branch of the Union of Soviet Writers. He wanted to see some honest writers. There was one writer living in the Ukraine who had published a diary of his trip to the United States; it was well read, pretty frank. So he wanted to see him and we made that clear, and the two of them finally got together.. Then I told the Soviets that Steinbeck wanted to see a number of younger writers, and Steinbeck said, "Give them some names if you can." So I gave them some names. The head of the Ukrainian writers' union finally put together a boat ride on the Dnieper river one afternoon, on somebody's big launch, together with some of the big-name Ukrainian writers. To their credit, they also produced about eight of the younger writers, who were almost completely cowed and wouldn't say very much. Finally Steinbeck said, "Well, you don't want to say too much to me, so I'll talk to you." So he talked to them for hours, and I think it must have been encouraging to them. I wondered later what happened to some of them; one was a young poet named Vingranovsky, and it was fun to meet him because he had starred in a recent Soviet film about World War II, though he wasn't a professional actor. Mary Jane and everybody agreed that he looked like my twin brother. Not too long ago I looked on the Internet to see if I could find him and I found that he had indeed he had been made, not many years since, after the fall of the Soviet regime, a member of the Ukrainian Academy. So he is still alive, and I hope well.

Q: What sort of things were you using as contacts? Was this a matter of sort of letting this group know that we cared or did we get anything from them, or what was the purpose of the visit?

BRIDGES: The purpose of the Steinbeck and Albee visit was cultural exchange, to put prominent American writers in touch with Soviet writers and try to promote the cause of liberalism in the Soviet intellectual field. They were limited, most of them, in what they could read and we could help them only a little on that. I should add that the United States Information Service had a marvelous Moscow chief named Rocky Staples, Eugene Staples, who had gotten an arrangement with U.S. publishers of paperback books. They would provide the USIA with copies of recent American paperbacks which were then shipped to the embassy in Moscow. I guess we had some thousands of copies of these paperbacks, so whenever we would go traveling I would always take an extra briefcase full of paperbacks, and on a train I would pull out a paperback and sometimes there was a fellow passenger who knew some English, and I would say, "Here, you can have this, I have another copy at home." I remember a particular trip I made to the Western Ukraine with an officer of the Australian embassy, and they took us to see the local branch of the writers' union in Chernovtsy. There were three local writers there: one was Ukrainian, one was Russian, and one was Jewish and his name was Melamud. And I said, "Mr.

Melamud, I happen to have in my briefcase two or three books by the best American writer, whose name is Malamud.” And he said, “Oh, with that name he must be my cousin.” Anyway, I really made his day; I gave him three copies of Bernard Malamud’s recent novels. So that was one thing we were doing, promoting cultural exchange in small ways on our own if we couldn’t get a big writer to visit the Soviet Union. Secondly, we were reporting to the Department and Washington on what was going on in the Soviet intellectual world which had some relevance to the overall nature of the Soviet regime and governance in the Soviet Union.

Q: The Russians intellectual side seemed to play a much stronger role than it does in the United States. I somehow think of all these people sitting around drinking vodka around the kitchen table in deep conversation. Were there currents that we were able to pick up of concern about their society?

BRIDGES: Yeah, I won’t exaggerate. I’ve never reviewed all the reports I did. I did some years ago put in a Freedom of Information request so I could get copies of the reporting I did during Steinbeck’s visit. One of the interesting currents was in 1962 and ’63, the Soviet unorthodox artists had been given some additional freedom. There was a sort of opening in culture, a writer like Solzhenitsyn got published and artists found that they could paint and sell things at work. Unorthodox artists; they were not socialist realists. There was an exhibition of contemporary Soviet painters at the Manege, the old riding hall just outside the wall of Kremlin. It seems that there were some right-wingers in the Soviet leadership who insisted that Khrushchev go see this exhibition; they expected that he would explode when he saw this stuff, and they were right. He made his famous artistic judgment, that the paintings looked like droppings from a donkey’s tail, and then there was a crackdown; there was a limited crackdown on art, there was only one member of the Union of Soviet Artists who was expelled. His name was Kropovnitsky, and he was the father-in-law of Oscar Rabin, the artist whom we used to visit on Saturday.

Q: How about the movies? Were they pretty much, boy meets tractor, tractor and boy live happily ever after?

BRIDGES: Yes, with some exceptions. I didn’t see all the new Soviet films but every now and then we went to the movies. There was one that was really fun, it was a comedy about a World Organization of Youth convention in Moscow; there really was such a convention around 1960, but the story of the film is that a gang of pickpockets gets together and decides to make hay while the sun shines during the congress. It was a genuinely funny movie about the Soviet underworld, which the Soviets in general didn’t admit existed.

Q: In your travels did you ever have problems with the KGB?

BRIDGES: I was lucky; I wondered in fact why they didn’t hit me when they might have. It was probably in 1963 or ’64, Jack Perry who had been our personnel officer was now working on the external side of the political section, and I on the internal side. One day Jack told me that the cops were after Betsy, his wife, that they were following her everywhere and sometimes just a couple of feet behind her on the sidewalk. They were trying to cow her, but also we guessed that they had a theory that she was maybe an intelligence officer. And it was very unpleasant. So Jack at one point said, “Let’s the two of us have lunch and then after lunch we’ll go for a walk, and somebody will be after us, I'm sure, and then at a particular corner, you go left and I'll go right and we'll see which way the follower goes." And we did that, and the follower followed Jack. But in Moscow I was not often bothered, not always aware that somebody was on me. Traveling was much more onerous, and I've written a little about that too. I wrote an article called "May Days in Siberia," that was published in an anthology called Tales of the Foreign Service by the University of South Carolina press, I think in 1978. I mentioned there how the cops had been on me and my traveling companion. We tried to take a boat upstream to an island near the Chinese border and they simply kicked us off the boat which for once was honesty on their part.

Q: Was this when they were having trouble on the Ussuri?

BRIDGES: Yes, there had been troubles in 1961 and '62 and this was in the spring of '63. I traveled to Siberia with an Australian colleague named Bill Morrison, who was then number-two in the Australian embassy in Moscow. He later left diplomacy for politics, and became Australian defense minister. Anyway, the Soviets were not about to let an Australian and an American diplomat go up to the Chinese border, but we thought, nothing ventured nothing gained. We went to the local Intourist office when we got to Khabarovsk, and asked what they could do for us. We said we wanted to go for a ride on the river. They told us that there was no traffic on the river, there was ice on the river. Well that was a lie, and we knew it. Maybe there was ice further north but not at Khabarovsk in May. So we walked down to the river and there was the boat station, and probably three or four of these passenger boats that were a hundred and fifty feet long. We knew that in Moscow you could go on a river boat and buy your ticket on board. We went to the ticket office, but the ticket window woman saw us coming and shut the window, so we just got on the boat. The sign indicated it was leaving soon to go somewhere upstream. The young mate came up and said, "You have your tickets?" And we said, "No, we'll buy them later", and he walked off. The conventional wisdom was that the KGB officer civilians wore green fedoras because the color for Interior Ministry troops was green on their uniforms. So the story was that KGB boys wore green fedoras. We had already seen a guy in such a fedora once or twice in town. Well anyway, we were on the boat, waiting to buy our tickets and up comes the guy with a green fedora with a colonel of the Soviet militia. And the colonel said, "Where do you think you're going?" And we say, "On a ride." He said, "You're not going anywhere. Get your asses off the boat." So we did, protesting, but at least he was honest because they were terrible liars, but this guy was straight and direct. So then we took a taxi out of town. The understanding was that in any city you could go up to 40 kilometers from the center, 25 miles. So we got in a taxi and said, "Take us down the road toward Vladivostok. We want to go to 38, 40 kilometers, when you get to that point, turn around." We got about ten kilometers, there was a fork in the road and there were two soldiers in the fork and they waved down the driver and walked up to him and said, "Show your documents", and he did. They didn't even look at us. And they said, "Go back to town, your brakes don't work." We were stymied; they wouldn't let us see anything. We wanted to see a factory, they said there was no factory, and we wanted to see the writers' union, there was none, no collective farm although we had seen some from the plane. So we finally left a day early and went back to Irkutsk.

Q: Did you get any feel for the nationalities' divisions?

BRIDGES: It was clear to me that the nations in the Caucasus - I got to Georgia and Armenia - that the Georgians were sort of doing their own thing, with limits, there was a strict police regime everywhere. But they were doing a sort of Georgian thing. There seemed to be a sort of permissiveness in Georgian culture that was permitted, as far as the KGB permitted, probably in part because the top cultural people in Moscow in people didn't know Georgian. They maintained their individuality in many ways. Very few Georgians spoke Russian, in contrast with people in probably every other Soviet republic. Almost all Armenians, many Central Asians, most educated non-Russians, spoke fairly good Russian. People in the Baltic states spoke it well even though they didn't want to. But the Georgian census of around 1960 showed rather few people speaking Russian. The Baltic states certainly had not been absorbed the way the Soviets wanted to absorb them; the Latvians and Estonians still had, for example, national singing festivals every several years that were occasions for nationalistic expression.

Q: Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia were off limits to you?

BRIDGES: No, they were not; not entirely. I never got to Lithuania. I got to Latvia, but you could only visit the capital city, Riga. So I got to Riga once with Raymond Garthoff, who was later ambassador to Bulgaria. At the time he was an expert on the Soviet military - and probably still is. His wife was Latvian by origin. He was visiting Moscow, but he wanted to go to Riga to see it. I'd not been there, so we went and spent a weekend there. You had to fly to Riga, you weren't permitted to take the train. I visited Tallinn in Estonia, four times I think. You could not fly to Tallinn, but you could take the train from Leningrad. Every time I went to Tallinn I'd go into a café, which was a very un-Russian sort of establishment, they were European style café s, there were people sipping coffee and drinking their brandy. I think that any time I sat down in a café in Tallinn it took about five minutes until someone at the next table would tell me how much they hated the Russians and so forth and so on. Their sentiment was very strong.

Q: You left in 1964. Khrushchev was kicked out in '64?

BRIDGES: Yes, and I wrote in my book Safirka I published a sort of confession. The question, in August and September 1964 was whether Khrushchev was going to last. The Chinese were making fun of him and there were a lot of problems internally. The Soviet military had problems with him, the harvest, the economy was not working, the intellectual world was a problem. He had competition; he was not the strongest leader, he was not the leader that Stalin had been. It came to me to draft a telegram on whether Khrushchev was going to stay or go. I think my main argument was that the Soviets couldn't afford to get rid of him because of the Chinese, which is really not good argumentation. My draft went up the line to the counselor for political affairs and then to the DCM and to the ambassador, and when it was all agreed upon, the cable was sent. That was around Labor Day 1964. I left later in September, and probably in the beginning of October I was on home leave in Chicago and my brother-in-law came to town from New Orleans and asked me to come to lunch with him and his company's Chicago agent. We had a two martini lunch and I was probably into my second martini and lunch was coming when the public affairs system of this private club said, "Sorry to interrupt but the press is reporting that Nikita Khrushchev has been kicked out." I said, "Excuse me," and walked off. My brother-in-law told me years later that he and his agent had thought that I had gone off and telephoned Washington. Well, in fact I had gone to the men's room. It was really not a very good time for the author of the telegram explaining why Khrushchev was not going to be kicked out should go and call the

Q: Well, then where did you go?

BRIDGES: Back to Washington, where my orders said I was to spend four years. My first two years would be spent on detail to the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency.

Q: Before we move on, talk a little bit about your wife and living in Moscow with the family. How was that?

BRIDGES: As far as my wife was concerned, she is a very hardy type. The years we were there we had three young children. The oldest, our son, entered first grade there, the older of our two daughters started kindergarten there, and our youngest was not yet in kindergarten. So we had one, then two kids in the Anglo-American school, which was not a bad school, housed in what had once been the house of Kropotkin, the 19th century thinker. Most of the children came from western embassies; I suppose there were more Americans and British than anything. The second year we were there my wife managed the embassy commissary which was a fairly big enterprise, we depended heavily on the commissary for food. Its turnover was something around a million dollars a year, which in 1964 was big money. When we could, we'd get out and go west for a bit, especially in the summers. It was interesting in Moscow, though; there were a number of things to do. The year that Mary Jane was the commissary we decided we had to have an au pair. So in the summer of 1963 we went to western Germany on vacation, me for two or three weeks and then my wife and kids stayed for another month. She advertised in the Munich newspapers for an au pair. We initially hired a German woman who was probably about 40 years old and was working for the Siemens company and who basically thought she could take a leave of absence for a year; she really wanted to see the Soviet Union. But in the end she decided she would rather not do it; her name was Elizabeth von Rundstedt, and she was the niece of the field marshal. She was afraid that they might not receive her too well. So instead we hired a young Canadian girl who was 21 or 22 years old, who was making a living teaching English, and she was great fun; she was a very good skater so the children first learned to skate with her. And that was our winter sport, skating in the little rink behind the embassy and at Gorky Park. The park was great fun because they would spray all the sidewalks and there were three rinks in the park, too, so you could skate all over the place and they had speakers with waltz music and it was a great outlet. The Canadian left us, but for the last few months we were there we had a marvelous Danish girl working for us.

SOL POLANSKY
Office of Soviet Affairs
Washington, DC (1962-1966)

Ambassador Polansky was born in New Jersey and raised in New Jersey and California. He was educated at the University of California, Berkeley, and the Russian Institute, New York City. After service in the U.S. Navy, he joined the Department of State in 1952 and was commissioned Foreign Service Officer in 1957. A Russian specialist, he served in Poznan, East and West Berlin, Moscow, Vienna and Sofia, Bulgaria, where he served as United States Ambassador from 1987 to 1990. In his tours at the State Department in Washington, D.C. he dealt primarily with East Europe Affairs. Ambassador Polansky was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

Q: You then moved back to Washington. You were with Soviet affairs for four years, from 1962 until 1966. How was Soviet affairs set up? Where did fit, in those days, in the Department's scheme of things?

POLANSKY: Yes, I was in the Office of Soviet Affairs. It was part of EUR and Eastern Europe was a separate office within the Office of Soviet Affairs. There were essentially two parts. There was a bilateral section. I think I had my choice of going into the bilateral or multi-lateral section and I decided I would go into the multi-lateral section. That essentially, not an extension of what I was doing in Moscow, but it was working with different geographic bureaus on Soviet foreign policy issues as they affected us. For a fair amount of the time, I had that part of the office that dealt with European affairs. The idea was to provide the Soviet element with whatever issue was coming up between us and a western or eastern European country. I had also the Far East and southeast Asia, less so Africa and Latin America, although they were there and important.

Q: Who was the head person as far as Soviet affairs were concerned?

POLANSKY: Bob Owen was Director of the Office of Soviet Affairs at first and Herb Okun was his deputy and for awhile Vlad Manoff was in charge of multi-lateral affairs and then Phil Valdez came in after Vlad. I'm sorry, Mac .... was in charge of the Office and Bob was in charge of bilateral affairs.

Q: Were you there in time for the Missile Crisis?

POLANSKY: Yes. It was handled above us however. It was not an issue with which we became fully involved at our level.

Q: What were your main concerns during this period from 1962 until 1966?

POLANSKY: There was concern about Germany and about Soviet/German relations and how that had an impact on us.

Q: Did we feel that West Germany was solidly in the western camp or did we feel that if the Soviets made the right moves they could nudge them towards a neutral position?

POLANSKY: There was some concern about that, but it was not overwhelming. The Russians couldn't offer Germany anything at that point that could induce it towards any kind of neutrality.

Q: Did we feel that there was much for the Soviets, either through their surrogate Communist parties in Western Europe or as a military force to mess around in Western Europe?

POLANSKY: Yes, but I remember more about when Malenkov and Kosygin left the scene. I remember more about the business of Khrushchev secret speech about Stalin, which we didn't know about until later. It was the 20th Congress speech.

Q: How about the speech that the CIA eventually published all over the world. I remember, I was in Saudi Arabia, and I was happily spreading copies around to very disinterested Saudis. It was the first time that Stalin and his regime were attacked in this so-called secret speech. Do you remember how that played when it first came out.

POLANSKY: There was some skepticism about whether it was for real or not and how it was smuggled. It became clear, fairly soon, it seemed to hang together and made a lot of sense and tended to confirm what people in Western Europe and the United States had known about the early parts of the Stalinist regime. I think after the initial skepticism, there wasn't much doubt about the authenticity of the speech.

Q: Was there any difference between how your office, the State Department was looking at the Soviet Union?

POLANSKY: I don't think there was much of a feeling that somehow they had a better insight into the Russians and what they were up to than we did. I don't think the analyses of what the Soviets were doing in different parts of the world were terribly different. In some ways, they had individual sources that were helpful, but I think they were more inclined to generalize about a particular development from an individual source, than we would have been. I don't recall any major disagreement about analyses.

*Q: Were you getting any feel about the China-Soviet relationship?
Were we still talking about China and the Soviet Union being together?*

POLANSKY: Yes. I don't think when I was there that there was much of a feeling that there was much of a wedge that you could drive between the two of them.

THOMPSON R. BUCHANAN
Intelligence Research Specialist
Moscow (1962-1964)

Soviet Affairs
Washington, DC (1968-1970)

Political Counselor
Moscow (1970-1973)

Thompson R. Buchanan was born in Beverly Hills, California in 1924. He received a bachelor's degree from Yale University. He served in the U.S. Navy from 1943-1946. Mr. Buchanan's Foreign Service career included positions in Germany, France, Russia, Burundi, Gabon, and Norway. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on March 15, 1996.

Q: So, you went to Moscow in 1962 and were there until when?

BUCHANAN: Until 1964.

Q: Who was the ambassador at that time?

BUCHANAN: Foy Kohler. I arrived in time to accompany him on some of his courtesy calls on his colleagues. After being offered cognac at 10 in the morning, he commented once that what you needed to be an ambassador was a modicum of intelligence, but above all a strong stomach.

Q: I would like to talk a little about the embassy first.

BUCHANAN: Well, I took over from Spike Dubs in Moscow. As I said before, I arrived with the arrogance of youth, and of a professional with more continuity in Soviet affairs than most Foreign Service colleagues. But that was my only advantage. I had to learn from scratch what had become old hat for most of my colleagues, namely, how to write a cable, protocol issues, how to make a call on the foreign ministry, etc. But it was an exciting time. Within the first two weeks, I went on a book buying trip with the publications procurement officer, Bill Morgan. We went to the Caucasus, first to the Baku, where the KGB agent watching us, slipped and fell on his face in the first heavy snow the city had in 25 years. Security kept getting tighter and tighter. We were placed, in effect, in a closet with clothes hung all around us as we flew into Yerevan. We were allowed, however, to take a train along the heavily guarded border with Turkey, with its ploughed areas and border guards on horseback. On the high hill above Tbilisi, Georgia, near Stalin's statue, we suddenly read on a wall poster that five of our Embassy colleagues had been PNGed. The Soviets had finally caught our spy, Colonel Penkovsky. Lovely Tania, our Intourist guide, showed us around town, explaining how a radio commentator, who was a direct descendant of the Kings of Georgia, had recently married a girl of the same noble lineage. At the airport, Tania managed to get our 40 boxes of books onto Aeroflot, despite the glowering presence of two huge thugs, in green felt hats and comically wide pants, standing over us...Hollywood casting...

Q: Penkovsky was a famous CIA and British agent.

BUCHANAN: My old colleague and neighbor in Moscow, Bob German, was almost PNGed too because the Soviets thought initially he was part of the CIA group working with Penkovsky.

Q: Could you talk a bit about what a book buying trip is?

BUCHANAN: We had an agreement with the Soviets that each of us could buy books of interest to our respective governments, and had officers in our embassies with that function. You would go usually to what was then the union republic's capitals, and visit the main bookstore, look at their list of books and select those you wanted. You would sign a chit and they boxed up the books. What sometimes happened, though, you arrived and discovered that "by chance" it was "inventory day." That was usually a sign that every book store in town was closed to you. If book-buying wasn't always successful, it allowed you to travel and get some insight into the country.

Q: You had been dealing with the Soviet Union for really a considerable period of time, from 1948-62, after being there were there any shocks or changes of attitude about things?

BUCHANAN: Of course, Khrushchev was in power. It was a period of so-called thaw. There was hope and excitement in the air. Unorthodox books started being published, one called, for example, "Not by Bread Alone," by Dudintsev. During my first tour at the embassy we were fortunate to live out on Leninsky Prospekt, alongside Soviets and East Europeans, not in an American ghetto. On my first taxi ride into town I asked the driver how things were now compared to Stalin's day. There was the same nostalgia we hear today. The driver replied: "Ah, must worse. In Stalin's day you could buy a bottle of vodka for two kopeks," a gross exaggeration.

It was an exciting period because Khrushchev was a very lively leader and he had no compunction about visiting with foreigners. I remember I was at a businessman's reception and I got into an argument with some KGB type from the Ministry of Commerce. He finally grabbed me (he had had a few drinks) and said, "Here is a man who can answer our argument," and started dragging me across the room. Good grief, he was dragging me to Khrushchev who had just entered. So, it was an exciting time.

Q: Were you there during the missile crisis over Cuba?

BUCHANAN: I was. We were in many ways much more insulated against the panic and fears that one would have had if one had been in Washington. We didn't have the newspapers and TV to alarm us every day. The Soviet press was pretty bland on this issue. I was personally not very heavily involved, the negotiations were very closely held by the ambassador, the DCM, Jack McSweeney, and Dick Davies, Political Counselor. But I also came to Russia with a strong belief that the Russians huff and puff but then retreat. They are not adventurous, but conservative in their policies. So, I was not inclined to be scared.

It was an interesting time on another level. The Robert Shaw Chorale was in Russia at that time. They sang the Bach B Minor Mass, which the Russians had never been allowed to hear. It was a very moving experience. We were present when a young Russian artist, who had managed to get a second black market ticket, and spent all night painting a picture of Christ, rushed up to present it to Robert Shaw the following day after the concert. Shaw told us that the Russians in Leningrad had asked him if he would agree to serve there as choral director, an honor he declined.

Q: What was your impression of the embassy, how it operated, the morale, the ambassador, the staff?

BUCHANAN: It is a very different embassy than now. We didn't have professional area specialists, for example. The most interesting area in those days were in Asia, particularly Laos. So as head of the foreign political section I made myself "the Asian expert," not really knowing much about Asia. I remember once Kohler saying, "I hope you know something about Laos, Tom, because no one else does." The Brits also didn't seem to know a great deal.

On that score, one of the more amusing incidents was in the summer of 1963 when Harriman came to discuss Laos with Gromyko. Gromyko started his usual diatribe, Harriman listened for about a minute and then ostentatiously turned off his listening aid, so Gromyko was talking to himself for 20 minutes. Afterwards we had the usual VIP lunch at the Foreign Ministry guest house. Bill Sullivan and Mike Forrestal, Harriman's aides, were there. Both of them regaled Gromyko by saying that the governor was called "the crocodile." Gromyko was quite amused, but not the governor.

Q: How did you find morale there?

BUCHANAN: I thought that it was good. Any situation where people feel themselves under pressure and isolated, brings out their inner resources and feeling of comradeship. These feelings extend to officers in other diplomatic missions during my first tour, the diplomatic colony remained small enough so that there was a good cross section of diplomats from all parts of the globe at social events, in contrast to the 1970s when parties tended to be regionally segregated. Morale was better in the 1960s than later, but that may simply be because I was a younger, more lighthearted officer. To hear the old hands speak who served in Stalin's time, that was truly the belle époque of service in Moscow.

Q: What was the view of Khrushchev during this particular time?

BUCHANAN: To some extent the feeling was that this was someone with whom we could do business, and in fact, of course, we did. We negotiated the nuclear test ban treaty and kept up a dialogue. He was a very tough negotiator and a highly erratic human being, so you never knew which way he was going to jump. But, he certainly was the most interesting leader that we had to deal with, and there was some hope.

Q: How was the death, the assassination, of President Kennedy treated?

BUCHANAN: Well, I was at the French commercial counselor's smoking a large Cuban cigar, which was making me increasingly green when the Agence France Press correspondent went to the phone and came rushing back and told us the shocking news. I was happy to be able to dash out of the room at that point. The Russians treated this as though we had killed their leader. In a certain sense he was, for he was their ideal, the sort of young leader they would have liked to have had. So, there were recriminations from people in the streets, how could we have allowed this to happen. Khrushchev came and signed the condolence book at the embassy. It was a very moving period.

Q: Was the Oswald connection...?

BUCHANAN: Consular affairs, of course, had a flap to find out what they could on Oswald, pull out the file. But the Soviet press didn't publish it for obvious reasons. We on the political side never thought this was a KGB plot to kill Kennedy. We just thought Oswald was a nut.

Q: Yes, because we dealt with these nuts in our business so much that you know that they are out there. Did you and your family have any interesting experiences with the Russians?

BUCHANAN: Let me give you a few examples. Our daughter and a pretty French friend of hers visited us in the summer and very quickly attracted the attention of two nice looking young Russians, obviously children of the Nomenklatura living in our area. The Russians used to take them out to Gorky Park, where they would sneak into restaurants by the back door, and obviously have fun. The boys would turn up their coat collars to avoid being recognized as they walked by the militia outside our entrance when they came to visit us, but they stood out because they were much better dressed than the American kids.

I took my son to Central Asia during his Easter vacation and we visited Frunze, now called Bishkek, the capital of Kyrgyzstan. It was memorable in part because the police were so obnoxious, blocking everything we wanted to do. It was so bad that when we went see the Imam (religious leader) of Kirghizia, who had invited us to come and have a real Kirghiz meal, and we saw a car with four toughs sitting outside his door, we told him that another time would probably be better. He was visibly relieved. So instead, we went to a restaurant, with a good jazz band, where a fight broke out between a well-dressed group of Iraqi air force pilots and a drunken Kirghiz, who was almost knifed.

A young Russian, who was accompanying the Iraqis, then attached himself to us, or rather to the attractive, red head teacher from the Anglo-American school who was accompanying us. We said we were going to church because it was Easter. He said he would like to come along, claiming to be an ex-MVD officer who was now studying to become a surgeon. In any case, we got to the church through about a foot and a half of mud, pouring rain and women milling around trying to get into the church. It was the best show in town on a Saturday night, so all the young Komsomol thugs were trying to push their way into the church, and being thrown back down the steps by muscular babushki. It ended up with our self-appointed guide and I standing on steps, helping the ladies. Finally, our "friend" pulled our teacher into the church. She had the impression that he really did want to see the service. At that point the little old ladies all turned on me, assuming that I was a militia officer, saying "aren't you ashamed of yourself allowing these hooligans to behave this way?" When I explained who we were, they apologized, put their umbrellas up over us, and then asked: "Is it true that in America the Easter service is broadcast over television?" Word of the West had traveled even here to the Afghan border.

One of our neighbors on Leninsky Prospekt was Victor Louis, a notorious KGB agent coopté. He tried to ingratiate himself with us by introducing us to Oskar, a dissident artist. When we went back to Moscow on our second tour, we found that he had moved up in the world, with a house in Peredelkino, a fashionable artistic suburbanite. He had his own ski lift, a Mercedes and Jaguar. We had finally given him a visa to visit the US An American, whom he had visited, told us that Viktor had asked him to ship back $1,000 worth of miscellanea that he had bought at Hammacher and Schlemmer. Basically, Viktor was a 19th century buccaneer, who knew how to use the Soviet system to the best advantage of himself and his English nanny wife, Jennifer, who regularly attended Sunday church service with their children at the English Embassy.

Q: Wasn't he also sort of used by us as someone we could talk to?

BUCHANAN: He used us and we used him, to hear what Viktor had to say. It was often interesting, something the Soviets wanted us to know. On one occasion, he basically told our Administrative officer that Khrushchev had been overthrown, but the officer did not appreciate what he was being told and waited a day before passing on the information. The Soviets used to send Viktor off to places like Israel, where they did not have relations, to sort of sniff out the terrain. He claimed to have an in-law in Copenhagen, who was in the rug business, to explain how he was able to bring back large quantities of rugs for all of his Nomenklatura friends. As I said, he knew how to work the system.

You asked about morale. I think where morale wasn't very good was among the children. It was a very difficult post for children. The only place they had to play was in a sort of little playground next to the garbage dump. They were always getting into trouble for obvious reasons. One time they set a fire in the chancery's only elevator. So, it was difficult. Our son went to the Anglo-American School there which was run jointly by the two embassies. It had some good teachers, but later he said he wished in a way he had gone to a Soviet school. Some people, who sent their children to Moscow schools, found it was a good experience and we had thought about it. But, Campbell had been in a German school in Frankfurt and came away with a heavy German accent in English; then he had been in French school and left feeling more French than American, so we said no, we didn't want him confused again.

My two years flew by and the time came for the April Fool sheet. As I mentioned I had become hooked on Africa and applied to go to a French-speaking, Sub-Saharan post on the water. From a career standpoint obviously, I would have been smarter to have tried to stay in EUR and get involved in "important" political-military affairs. But, I was always more interested in doing what I enjoyed than what might professionally advance my career.

Q: That is one of the great fun of the Foreign Service. You can sort of pick an area of the world and say, "Gee, I would like to go there," and there is a reasonable chance if you try hard enough that you can go there.

BUCHANAN: Exactly. I was thinking about being on the water, Dakar or Abidjan, but I couldn't fault Personnel when they sent me to Bujumbura on the longest lake in the world, Lake Tanganyika, French speaking, sub-Sahara.

Q: Before we move to Burundi, while in Moscow you dealt with Soviet foreign affairs. What was the Soviet policy towards the rest of the world?

BUCHANAN: Khrushchev's offensive into the Third World was still continuing. He was having problems because so many Third World states were becoming disenchanted and the Soviets, themselves, were becoming disenchanted with their greedy “allies”. Foreign aid was about as popular in Russia as it is in the Middle West of the United States, with all sorts of anecdotes...”If we get one more ally we are going to go broke.” Nevertheless, Khrushchev was an activist and it didn’t matter whether you were talking about Asia or Africa, his diplomats and his KGB types were out there, trying to weaken our influence and promote Soviet interests.

In the area of bilateral relations, as I mentioned, we began to do business. Khrushchev was an impressionable person, in the sense that even though he was an ideologue, who felt that by going back to some of Lenin’s policies he could revitalize the Communist Party, he was open to outside influences. He was tremendously impressed by his trip to the United States and, of course, very impressed by what we could do in the area of agriculture. He also, I think, genuinely got along very well and had personal respect for General Eisenhower. So, from that standpoint the U-2 incident was a personal disappointment for Khrushchev. It was also a great embarrassment to him to have to admit that the Americans had been able to overfly Russian territory for years and take photographs, and the Soviet military hadn’t been able to do anything about it. I think his apoplectic reaction in Paris was basically embarrassment, and an effort to protect himself politically. In retrospect, of course, he was under greater pressure internally than we realized at the time. To be sure, there were rumors that he had his problems, that there was an opposition. A variety of names kept surfacing as potential rivals. But, when he was actually bounced, I had already left, we were more relaxed because that year there had been a very good crop. The previous year, 1963, when we were in Russia, there had been basically a famine. Bread to the Russians is very important and some of the bread you bought in shops was almost inedible. It was a very difficult time. So, logically we thought if Khrushchev was going to be bounced, that he would have been removed in 1963.

In a sense we all found him an interesting person to deal with, yet he made us somewhat nervous because he was, as the Russians accused him, subjective, volatile, and erratic. And quite arbitrary and impulsive. He decided for example, that since the Americans had such success growing corn, it should be grown all over the Soviet Union. It did not matter whether local conditions favored the growth of corn or not. His huge program earned him the name of “Nikita Kukuruznik”, the corn grower. He began a similar massive campaign to grow vegetables. He got into much greater political trouble, however, when he decided to split the regional Communist Party organizations into urban and agricultural sections, thereby depriving powerful Party officials of part of their fiefdoms. When he undertook a serious program of arms reduction, cutting the armed forces by over a million men, many coddled officers found themselves sent out to collective farms to become collective farm chairmen. By the time of his ouster, Khrushchev had managed to alienate virtually every powerful group in that population. That made it easy for Brezhnev to topple him.

I went back into Soviet affairs, on the desk, and became de facto deputy to Spike Dubs.

Q: You were there from when to when?

BUCHANAN: From 1968-70. I arrived just when the Czech crisis was coming to a head.

Q: Explain this crisis.

BUCHANAN: It was the Prague Spring when Communist Party leader Alexander Dubcek, challenged Moscow by a program of radical change in Czechoslovakia aimed at the creation of a "Socialism with a human face." Spike Dubs and I were impressed by the sang froid of the old Soviet hands, Chip Bohlen and Mac Toon, during the tense weeks that led up to the Soviet invasion. While we bit our nails, wondering if Moscow would react, they went off and played golf, convinced no doubt that there was nothing that the US could do, realistically, that would affect Moscow's decision. It was during this period when Spike continued to smoke his three to four packs of cigarettes a day, and I increased my intake from a maximum of ten to a pack and a half, that I made my decision to stop smoking. I have not smoked since.

Q: From the desk, how did we view the Soviet Union during this 1968-70 period?

BUCHANAN: As an assertive, muscular and somewhat unpredictable power. The proclamations of the so-called Brezhnev doctrine, in connection with Moscow's invasion of Czechoslovakia, whereby the Soviets asserted their right to intervene wherever a Communist regime was threatened, introduced an element of increased tension into East-West relations. We felt that we must demonstrate that we were not going to be pushed around whether in Berlin or elsewhere. But we were also concerned to probe and determine what agreements we could reach with the Soviets that were of mutual benefit. I was head, at the time, of the Bilateral Section in EUR/SOV. The travel program whereby we monitored the travel of Soviet officials in the US, authorizing travel on a strict reciprocity basis, depending on who was allowed to travel in Moscow, and what difficulties they encountered. I inherited the program whereby our two sides exchanged chancery sites and agreed on the terms of construction. There is a general impression that the State Department gave away the store in allowing the Soviets to build their new chancery on Mount Alto on Wisconsin Avenue. I learned that this was a distortion of what happened. In fact, the Soviets had tried to purchase two other estates, Tregarin and Bonnie Brae, before agreeing to Mount Alto. In each case, neighbors objected strongly to having a Soviet Embassy nearby. It was finally agreed that we needed to find federal property, over which we had full control, if any exchange was to take place. The only obviously suitable federal property was the old Veterans hospital on Mt. Alto. Initially there was little understanding among diplomats on either side, I suspect, of the intelligence value of being on high ground. Eventually, of course, Soviet technical experts doubtless reassured their diplomatic colleagues that they had made a good deal, and we, on our side, realized that we had made a mistake. If Ambassador Llewellyn Thompson had been briefed about the potential of radio intercepts in Moscow, he might not have so cavalierly rejected Stalin's offer of some 15 acres of land on Lenin Hills, but he thought at the time that Stalin was trying to isolate the Americans, away from the center of town. We ended up, therefore, with a property next to our old embassy on Tchaikovsky Prospekt, which was dominated by higher buildings all around. The Soviets then rejected our request to build a chancery building thirteen stories high, and we had to compromise with eight stories.

I recall being very much concerned with the issue of security in constructing our new embassy. My thought was to try to have everything built off site in Denmark, Germany or in the United States. But our hands were tied because the head of the Federal Buildings Organization (FBO) had been basically nominated by Wayne Hayes, who headed the Appropriations Committee in Congress. Hayes had been told years before that the embassy would cost $36 million, and no one had had the guts to tell him that that figure was totally unrealistic, particularly if we tried to build much of the embassy off site. To some extent, therefore, concern to try to keep our budget somewhere within the projected figure took priority over concern for security. But we were also arrogant in our belief that we could take care of any “bugs” that the Soviets planted during the construction phase. After all, we were technically more advanced!

A major issue was who should be allowed to carry out the actual construction. We insisted that we should be allowed to bring in our own workmen, and do most of the construction ourselves in Moscow. The Soviets argued that this was “humiliating;” that they were perfectly competent to do the construction for us. I recall the present Russian Ambassador to Washington, Vorontsov, who was then Deputy Chief of Mission, saying to me: “But Mr. Buchanan, why should you object? After all, we don’t insist that Cubans build our embassy here. We are prepared to let your construction people build our embassy. I can assure you that your FBI is no less clever than our KGB.” Well, actually I don’t think it would have made any great difference even if all my plans had materialized, because none of us foresaw the skill with which the Soviets introduced listening devices into the great steel girders, which we would probably have considered much too expensive to import.

Q: At a later date, the ‘80s I guess, it became quite evident that the new embassy was riddled with listening devices and that...

BUCHANAN: They were so sophisticated that to this day I am not sure we know entirely how they work.

Q: And it has been unusable more or less. I don’t know what has happened to it.

BUCHANAN: Well, it should be used, it could have been used. In fact, when I went there in 1992 for Humanitarian Aid, I thought what we should be doing is putting all the unclassified aspects of the embassy -- AID, USIA, Commerce -- should have all been put in that building. They didn’t need any classified section. But we continued to have different technicians working inside the embassy to uncover the damage, and it remained unused. Finally, as you know we seem to have decided what we are going to do with the building, but it has been a long story.

Another big issue on my plate involved the exchange of consulates between Leningrad and San Francisco, notably the definition of our respective consular districts. Our last consulate in the U.S.S.R., in Vladivostok, was closed in 1948. This was an effort, in a sense, to get back to the era when we had some consular listening posts. My major problem was how to define our consular district in the Baltic states without seeming to acknowledge Soviet occupation of the area in 1940. Under the final compromise, the capital cities of the Baltic states, Riga, Tallinn and Vilnius, were placed within the Leningrad consular district, but the remainder of the Baltic territory was the responsibility of our Embassy in Moscow. To avoid appearing to accept Soviet rule in the capital cities, we developed a whole protocol for our visits. When I was Consul General, I was authorized to meet officials up to the Deputy Minister rank, but not above; and I could fly the flag but not when I was visiting an official building like the Foreign Ministry. The local population seemed to appreciate my flying the flag in driving around town, as a symbol of our interest in their future. My French colleague in Leningrad, who was not allowed to visit the Baltic States, with obvious envy, accused us correctly of “hypocrisy.” After the agreement on the exchange of consulates was concluded, I accompanied a CODEL to Moscow, where I was embarrassed to see our representatives silent in the face of Soviet vituperation, on the principle apparently that guests should not talk back to their hosts. They did not understand that Russians only respect people who stand up for their principles. On the way back from Tashkent, where I let the delegation go on to a Parliamentary Union meeting in India, I stopped off in Leningrad to try and identify consular property that would meet our various specifications. I thought at the time that we must have owned Embassy property before the revolution, and I thought that it would be fun to try and rent the same property, if appropriate. I discovered, however, that we had never owned property, that our ministers and ambassadors had always rented their residences and chanceries, depending on their pocketbooks. The 1914 Baedeker listed our chancery at 11 Million street behind the Hermitage. Since the collapse of Communism, the street has reverted to its pre-revolutionary name. I thought that it would be appropriate for the great Capitalist power to be lodged on Million Street, but unfortunately the building was too large, too many people would have had to be evicted. As it was, the Soviets offered us property on Petra Lavrova, almost opposite our last chancery site at No. 24, as I requested in the note I wrote upon my return to Washington. The Soviets told my predecessors that our last Embassy had been in a building which housed a "wedding palace" on Petra Lavrova. But my research showed that not to be the case. George Kennan made a photograph of our former Embassy when he visited it in the 1930s to recover Embassy archives that had been left there by the Norwegians, who represented American interests after we broke relations following the revolution. This search for our former chancery properties became a hobby when I was stationed in Leningrad.

Q: Had we reached a point as far as sort of the way we thought that the Soviets might launch an attack on Western Europe?

BUCHANAN: I was always very skeptical of this scenario. I am not the one to ask. Many of my colleagues were more concerned than I that if we showed weakness the Soviets would attack. I think a greater concern, and one more generally shared, was what was called "Finlandization" -- a term which I consider an insult to a very brave and diplomatically adept nation. The fear, of course, was that, through pressure tactics, the U.S.S.R. would so intimidate the countries of Western Europe that they would not have the courage to stand up for their national interests, if they conflicted with Soviet interests.

Q: Having come out of Personnel I guess you would still have an eye on personnel. Our Russian specialists had always been an elite. Was this still the case?

BUCHANAN: Yes, we continued to look to our Soviet hands to staff our key posts in the U.S.S.R. and Eastern Europe. In Leningrad, Culver Glisten was the first Consul General, opening the consulate in July 1973. He lived in the Astoria hotel with his Swedish wife, cooking on a one-burner stove for the whole staff for several months. In the daytime, the staff would go and look at the walls of our future consulate building to spot the wet concrete where the KGB had tried to install its listening apparatus the previous night. It was Culver who had the sense of style to select the very handsome residence that we now rent. It was originally a gift from the uncle of the Tsar, Konstantin Konstantinovich, to a ballerina friend. The fact that it was a kindergarten during the blockade of Leningrad helped save the building. The Hermitage agreed to restore it in the style of a typical building of the mid-19th century. My first time into that building, I watched a young girl, who looked as though she had just been milking cows on her collective farm, doing intricate relief work on the ballroom ceiling. In fact, the Soviets selected the best of their construction teams, usually girls from the collective or state farms, to work on the construction trusts responsible for the restoration of historic buildings. I must also thank Culver for having conned the Art-in-Embassy program under the very tough Mrs. Llewellyn Thompson to make an exception and provide the consulate residence with paintings from the National Gallery, in view of the imminent arrival of President Nixon in Leningrad. We had four Catlins on loan, plus some wonderful American natives and a huge abstract canvas for the library. When I arrived in the fall of 1977, I began a rear-guard action to delay the return of these wonderful paintings to the National Gallery. Of course, I eventually lost, and the National Gallery was furious with the way the Hermitage had packed our large abstract painting.

In Leningrad, we had a succession of old Soviet hands. Bob Barry and Garry Mathews worked with Culver, as I recall. My successors, Chris Squires, Bill Shinn, Edward Hurwitz and Charlie Magee were also Soviet hands, as were their successors. So it was kept very much within the "Soviet family," for the obvious reason that we needed officers with fairly fluent Russian and a working experience of the U.S.S.R. Did we look on ourselves as an elite? Probably, after all, we were dealing with Enemy No. 1. In fact, of course, we were probably no more an elite than the hard language specialists who staffed our posts in the Near East and the Far East, or for that matter, any other part of the globe. Perhaps it was our compensations for a life style that was substantially less pleasant and relaxing than that in most other parts of the world.

Q: You left the Soviet desk in 1970. Where did you go?

BUCHANAN: Then I was sent to Moscow as political counselor.

Q: You were in Moscow from when to when?

BUCHANAN: From July, 1970 to June, 1973.

Q: Who was the ambassador at that time?

BUCHANAN: The ambassador was Jake Beam. For quite a bit of the time the DCM was my old boss, Boris Klosson. Spike Dubs was later DCM and Chargé for a long time.

Q: What were the political developments during this period?

BUCHANAN: When we arrived, relations were very tense because of Vietnam. We had periodic demonstrations, the usual Soviet, carefully planned demonstrations. You probably remember the story of the demonstration outside the British embassy. The British Ambassador went out and asked the policeman how long it was going to last. He looked at his watch and said another half hour. The crowds were always well controlled for the good reason that any damage to our embassy had to be paid for by the Soviets. So they were very careful. They might throw some ink at the embassy, but that was about it.

On one occasion, however, the Chinese students from Moscow University and Lumumba decided they would show these bourgeois traitors, the Russians, how to run a really good anti-imperialist demonstration. They came and broke windows and threw things at the embassy, and we ended up with a great melee outside where we watched the Soviet cops beating up on the Chinese students to our great delight.

In 1970, when Boris Klosson was Chargé, we had one of these cases where a plane with some American military, including a General, flew by error or was lured across the Turkish border into Armenia, where it crashed. They apparently wanted to show the General Mount Ararat near the border. We had great difficulty in sending an officer down to Armenia to repatriate the bodies.

It was in this period that President Nixon and Kissinger were developing their strategy for dealing with Russia, using the opening of relations with China as leverage to persuade the Soviets that they needed to protect their flank by becoming more cooperative with the United States. Unfortunately, the Embassy played the role largely of a bystander throughout this period. My only substantive contribution was a lengthy analysis of the politics of detente within Soviet leadership circles that Sonnenfeldt passed on to Kissinger. Kissinger would flit in and out of Moscow, and, as he was departing, would phone Ambassador Beam to tell him what he thought he should know about the meetings that had taken place with Brezhnev at the guest house on Lenin Hills. This was a highly embittering experience for Beam. The culmination, of course, was the first Nixon Summit in Moscow in May, 1972.

The White House advance party setting up the meeting was typically aggressively obnoxious and rude toward the ambassador and our whole Embassy staff. It appears to be a congenital disease with these parties regardless who is President. Our little chore involved counting the number of steps in the Kremlin that Nixon would have to take to walk from his apartment to where he would meet with Brezhnev. As part of the many agreements that Kissinger wanted to sign with the Soviets, to link them to the United States, I was asked to check the text in Russian of an agreement on the protocol of polar bears, which I had never seen before.

The high Point for all of us was the dinner held, as usual, in the vaulted hall of the Kremlin Palace of Facets. I think anyone who didn't know the players and looked at our two leaders would have concluded that the man who passed expressionless, stiff legged along the reception line, as though wrapped in a glass cage, was the Communist; that the red-faced jovial soul, slapping backs, shaking hands like the mayor of any American city, was the Capitalist, the American. Despite my very negative feelings and impressions of both Nixon and Kissinger, I voted for Nixon in 1972. I was impressed that, perhaps for the first time, we had such a thoroughly articulated foreign policy, with a program of stick and carrot in dealing with Russia. But what happened. The carrot was supposed to be trade and once again American domestic politics got in the way and we were left with primarily the stick. Under the Jackson Amendment, the carrot was linked to the number of Jews who were allowed to leave the Soviet Union, and this reduced substantially our flexibility. I know the amendment complicated life for many Jews in the Soviet Union and did not necessarily help them to get out.

A little footnote on Kissinger. He was always very well informed about what his colleagues were doing in the bureaucracy, and he evidently learned that when Secretary of State Rogers had come to Moscow he had never bothered to come to the embassy and see the rabbit warren conditions in which we worked, and this had caused some unhappiness. So, in a rather typical move, he made a point himself of coming to the embassy on one of his trips. He met with us in the secure “box” and said, “Of course, there is nothing I can tell you, you are the experts.” And, he, of course, didn’t tell us anything.

One of the nicer aspects of detente. Perhaps because I was still involved in authorizing Soviet travel in the US, advising the Soviet desk whether to approve or deny travel depending on how we were treated in Moscow, or perhaps simply because it was the year of detente, the Soviets decided to honor a long-standing request from my wife and me to ski on Mt. Elbrus in the Caucasus, the highest mountain in Europe. We were the first foreign diplomats, to my knowledge, to be allowed to ski there. The Austrian Ambassador had tried, as I had, in the 1960s, and again now as Ambassador. I suppose the facilities were not quite up to Ambassadorial standards, and he was also not American. Our first night in the A-frame hotel at Itkol near Elbrus, a young ski instructor had obviously been given orders to put on a good party. He invited all the golden youth of Moscow and Leningrad in the area, and later, learning of Nancy’s interest in art, introduced us to a local Carbadinian artist, who, as it happened, hated Russians. I should note that we were in the Balkar-Carbadinian Autonomous Republic, an area from which the inhabitants had been exiled to Central Asia during World War II, and only amnestied after Stalin’s death. Well, our ski instructor had obviously gone beyond his instructions, and we did not see him again, and only briefly the artist who had spent all night pounding out a metal bas relief of a leopard rampant, the symbol of his people, which we still treasure. We were then put in charge of a senior Party official, an engineer who was building all the hotels and ski lifts in the area. He had spent two years in the Antarctic, and ten years on the Soviet downhill ski team. We actually became good friends, as much as one could in Russia where one always wondered whether one was being set up. For example, after one late party, we found the hotel locked, and ended up sleeping in their bed, waking up to find people sleeping in the apartment, whom they barely knew. Such was Russian hospitality in a resort area. Was this all by accident? We will never know. We used to exchange dinners later when they came to Moscow. And when I went to Russia in 1994, his very attractive wife, now divorced and married to an American in Yukon, Oklahoma, arranged for me to go to the Caucasus, where she still had contacts. She claimed that she had refused to cooperate in the old days when the KGB had requested her to report on our meetings -- which, I, of course, do not believe.

On the social side, life was, of course, very busy. Unlike our first tour in Moscow we lived now in a representation apartment in the Chancery building. Our guests had to pass the scowling guards at the Chancery gate, and we were also more exposed to microwave bombardment, living permanently in the Chancery.

Q: Will you explain what you mean by microwave ?

BUCHANAN: When I was on my first tour I heard of something strange called TUMS, it appeared that the Russians were bombarding the embassy with microwaves apparently to disrupt certain types of communications in the embassy. At least we think that was the purpose. When I was there in the ‘70s, it was still not general public knowledge. Once it became public knowledge, it became policy that anybody being assigned to the embassy would be briefed and given an option of going to Moscow, or not. It became very controversial. Many of the women and wives, particularly, felt there was an undue high incidence of breast cancer resulting from living and working in the embassy. To this day we will never know whether the leukemia that killed Ambassador Walter Stoessel was provoked or aggravated by the microwaves, as his wife certainly believes.

Q: Could you just give me an idea at this time how political officers, yourself and other officers in the political section, went about doing their job of political reporting?

BUCHANAN: We were under constant pressure from Washington to analyze the Soviet reaction to virtually any development of any import occurring around the world and within the USSR itself. This left us less time to explore the Moscow scene and meet with Soviet contacts than we would have liked. The Soviet press, radio and public lectures remained important sources of information. Depending on the official at the Foreign Ministry, access had improved. I could have a civilized dialogue with Fedoseyev in the USA Section; I always wondered how he managed to survive among acerbic colleagues like Komplektov. We tried to travel as much as time and travel restrictions allowed. When we did, we asked to meet with the local Party or Government officials, and to visit agricultural and industrial projects in the area. Time usually prevented our trips from being as well researched before departure as we would have liked. Our military colleagues would also ask us to keep our eyes open for specific information of interest to them, and we would return the favor, asking for their assistance when they traveled. On that score, when I arrived in Moscow I found that the political section and the military were not talking but rather spitting at each other. Fortunately the new Defense Attaché and I arrived at about the same time and we both agreed that this was nonsense. We went out of our way to set up briefings so that members of the military would feel more at home in an embassy, and when we traveled we would consult each other in an effort to try to improve the mutual take. Relations warmed somewhat.

There were certainly differences in evaluation between the embassy and Washington. The Pentagon and Washington had often what we considered an exaggerated view of the Russian military threat and what the Russians were doing. From our viewpoint, we saw a great deal of inefficiency and internal weakness. For example, Washington was convinced that the Russians had set up a vast underground civil defense program that was going to be able to save millions of Russian lives in case of nuclear attack, providing them with real leverage in a crisis. We accordingly attended local lectures on civil defense and we looked for underground civil defense installations, but apart from the Moscow subway, which of course had extensive antiblast and radiation doors, we didn't see the evidence for this extensive network. We also thought that, given the inefficiency of the system that it was unrealistic to think that literally millions of Russians could be evacuated in a crisis.

Our ability to gather information varied, not only depending on the target, but from region to region, the farther you went away from Moscow. When you went to Siberia, for example, and you talked to people you often got a much straighter story. The Siberians were rather more like our Westerners, more open. You could ask a question and get something closer to an honest answer. When I traveled with Ambassador Toon to Khabarovsk in the late 1970s, for example, we were both impressed by the self-confidence and frankness of the regional Party secretary.

Q: Was the art of Kremlinology still weaving the exquisite changes in the major newspapers, or had things opened up a little more and a little broader than they had been?

BUCHANAN: It was certainly broader. We had access, of course, to many dissidents, and some of them offered insight into attitudes and intrigue in Communist Party circles. A disproportionate amount of our time continued to be taken up with the issue of Soviet Jewry. Our contacts with leading Jewish dissidents provided an interesting, but not always balanced view of what was happening in Soviet society. What was unfortunate was that the various dissident groups, in rather typical Russian fashion, did not cooperate with each other. If the Jewish, Sakharov and other critical strains of Soviet social life had managed to be less parochial, and more willing to work with one another, they might have been able to exert more effective pressure for reform, at least in the field of human rights. Soviet officials remained very sensitive, of course, to the appearance of knuckling under to outside pressure, whether from abroad or from within their own dissident community.

Kremlinology was less important, but it continued to be a helpful tool of analysis. It was not by chance that one prominent official would be named ahead, or behind another official in the press; or that the portrait of one leader would be placed ahead or behind that of another. Differences in wording and emphasis between the public statements of Party or government officials also provided us with esoteric clues to what was really happening behind the facade of Party unity. I was not always privy in Moscow to some of our most highly classified intelligence sources. I only became aware after my return to Washington that we had been listening in on the conversations in Brezhnev's limousine. It was certainly thanks to the revelations of Colonel Penkovsky that we became aware that the publicized "missile gap" was much over-blown, and the Soviets much weaker than we had feared.

The longer one worked in the U.S.S.R., the more convinced one became that the Soviet mania for secrecy, and concern to limit our access to other than the capital cities of the union republics, was intended to conceal, not so much military information, as the sheer backwardness and internal weakness of our "super power" competitor. Soviet officials were ashamed to reveal the extent to which Russia remained an undeveloped country, with enormous disparities in living standards between the capital cities and their hinterland. And afraid that we might conclude that Russia was a giant, with feet of clay.

Inevitably when you deal with a country as long as all of us have, you develop a certain instinct, a certain feel. You could tell a little bit about the political atmosphere simply from the attitude of your contacts. I used to meet with Victor Matveyev, for example, of Izvestiya, a very sophisticated journalist. I remember we were discussing Somalia and Ethiopia one time and he finally said with a smile, "You know Tom, we have Somalia and you have Ethiopia. Maybe tomorrow it will be the other way around. Relax." What was certainly true in my day is that the Soviets, like ourselves, were becoming increasingly aware of how we were being played off against one another by the Third World states as suckers. In my reading of Soviet theoretical writings on the Third World, it was interesting to see how analysts, like the present Russian Foreign Minister Primakov, were hinting that blind support of Third World states was not always in the USSR's interests, just because they happened to be anti-American.

Q: Is there anything else you would like to cover during this tour in Moscow?

BUCHANAN: I don't think so.

Q: Oh, just one other question. What was your impression of the American press?

BUCHANAN: The American press was pretty knowledgeable, particularly about the dissident community. The embassy was criticized for not being sufficiently in touch with that side of life. We thought, however, that they exaggerated the role of the dissidents. Hedrick Smith's "The Russians" is based on very much the same dissident sources and research as Bob Kaiser's "Russia: the People and the Power." Smith got his book on the market a couple of weeks before Kaiser, and received the Pulitzer Prize.

I feel, in retrospect, that I did not take as much advantage as I should have of the old timers among the press corps, who had married Russian women and lived for years in Moscow at a time when Stalin would not allow Russian wives to leave the country. While Ed Stevens had won a Pulitzer Prize in 1948, for his series of articles on the USSR in the Christian Science Monitor, he had lost much of his drive by the time that I had met him. He and his shrewd and energetic Russian wife, Nina, had moved from one of the lovely three story log houses, that Khrushchev was tearing down in Moscow as unsuitable for a modern capital, to a large house and garden nearer to the area where Westerners lived. Their frequent salons for the diplomatic corps, and operations in the dissident art world encouraged speculation about their KGB affiliations.

Then there was Henry Shapiro, who was sort of the Dean of the American press corps. His lovely Russian wife, Ludmilai, used to show mine around town, pointing out the handsome old buildings that were still to be found in the back streets of Moscow. Like Ed Stevens, Shapiro remained quite close-mouthed about sensitive issues in Soviet society, always concerned not to jeopardize his relations with Soviet officials. Shapiro claimed, for example, he had had a 4-6 hour interview with Khrushchev, which he had never published. When Shapiro finally retired to Wisconsin, an old friend of ours, Mark Hopkins, a former VOA correspondent, who was giving a course on the USSR at a local university, used to ask Shapiro leading questions and tape record his answers, to get him to open up to the students. So far as I know Shapiro never wrote any memoirs but I heard only recently from a former Moscow journalist that there is an oral history that someone extracted from Ed Stevens. These old-timers had so much more to say than most Western journalists, who focused on the dissident communities.

There were, of course, in addition extremely knowledgeable non-American journalists, with good connections in leftist circles, like Michel Tatu of Le Monde. It took intervention at the highest level in the French Government to persuade the Soviets to let Tatu leave with his Russian wife and child, typical petty harassment of a vocal critic of the regime.

There were other long-time residents of Moscow outside the circle of journalists who were good value for their insight into the local scene. The Greek employee of the Canadian Embassy, Kastakis, who assembled one of the finest collections of avant garde Soviet art in the world, comes to mind. After years of negotiations, he was allowed to leave with perhaps one-third of his collection, donating the balance to the Tretyakov Gallery. We had a variety of sources to which to turn for information, but all suffered from the same difficulty of obtaining accurate information in a closed society.

Q: You seem to believe that the activities of the dissidents made for good headlines, but these people by their very nature were not as well plugged in as others.

BUCHANAN: Absolutely. It is sort of like saying the protesters of the '60s were all typical Americans. Dissidents were even less typical in Russia. To be sure, many educated Russians like Gorbachev, held many of the same critical views of Soviet society as the dissidents, but it would never occur to them to articulate these views outside of a small circle of friends. Some probably even admired the dissidents, but considered them "nuts." "Why stick out your neck" in a society known for chopping off heads? In short, the views of the dissidents were perhaps more representative of the views in critical intellectual circles in Russia than their behavior. In this sense, dissidents were a useful source of information.

When Bill Schaufele was ambassador to Poland he told one of his staff that he never understood why Buchanan turned down a post in Africa to go to Leningrad, but it was a decision that I never regretted.

Q: Well, Leningrad is big time.

BUCHANAN: Yes. I had some fifty-five people in the consulate. Leningrad was the main game in town with my background. I suppose in the back of my mind I thought perhaps after Leningrad something would come up. But, by that time all of my contacts in the African bureau had gone, and when I talked to the new Assistant Secretary for African Affairs, Bill Harrop, after Leningrad he said, "I understand you don't want to go to a post in Africa." I said that that was not quite accurate. It was just that the posts at the time did not compare in challenge and interest with Leningrad.

Q: You were in Leningrad from when to when?

BUCHANAN: I arrived in Leningrad around October, 1977, after doing several weeks brush up course in Russian at Garmisch, which was a great experience. I understood the shock that all our language officers who go to Garmisch must have experienced when they go from this idyllic little mountain resort, with a view of the Zugspitze out their apartment windows and arrived in Moscow in a grimy apartment. Garmisch is a beautiful spot, with a great school run by former dissidents. All the lectures were in Russian. You wrote in Russian. It was a very good brush-up course for me and a very pleasant break. The work in the African bureau had been pretty tiring, and it gave me a little vacation before going to Leningrad.

I arrived pretty much in time for the Marine Ball. At the Marine Ball the most attractive couple there was the young Russian lady who worked in our general services office and her husband.. She was the daughter of the leading cultural honcho of Leningrad. She arrived in a very décolleté Western dress with her husband, supposedly a scientist, in white tie and tails. She made a pass at me during the party and I realized I was back in the old Russia. She was, I suppose, one of the arguments that our security people made for getting rid of Russian employees. At the same time she could be very helpful, and you knew with whom you were dealing. You just had to be careful. When we got rid of Russian employees, we hired a lot of Americans about whom we knew very little. I would prefer, myself, to deal with Russians who give you some feel for the country and what is happening, because over time many Russian employees developed a little bit of mixed loyalty. They liked working for Americans and they liked working in the embassy or consulate. You got to know them and could ask them provocative questions to get a feedback. With Americans, you never knew with whom you were dealing, and some of them were certainly good bait for the KGB because they were just there for the money. We have seen in the Walker case, and other cases, that American patriotism is skin deep sometimes.

Q: And also there is much more the ability to get into trouble. This would be true anywhere. The local employees belong to the country and you know who you are dealing with. I found this in Yugoslavia. When you get an American clerk you get an American clerk who is a fish out of water and either needs a lot of hand holding or taking out of trouble or are much more susceptible to outside pressures.

JAMES A. KLEMSTINE
Consular Officer

James A. Klemstine was born in Pennsylvania in 1930. He received a bachelor's degree from the University of Pennsylvania and a master's degree from Yale University. He served in the U.S. Army from 1952-1954 and entered the Foreign Service in 1956. Mr. Klemstine's career included assignments to Germany, the Soviet Union, China (Taiwan), and Korea. He was interviewed by Jeff Broadwater on April 15, 1993.

Q: I want to ask you a couple of questions about the time you spent in Moscow. You went to the Soviet Union in 1963, and stayed until '65. What did you do there?

KLEMSTINE: Consular work. The first year I worked in the section, the second year I ran the consular section in Moscow. There were some interesting things, and in some respects it was probably a valuable experience, though at that time I sort of felt shunted aside. Over time I have realized that in some respects I was able to get a better picture and travel around the Soviet Union more than say political officers, or other officers, who the Russians sort of kept on a leash. As consular officer, after they decided I was not CIA or anything like that, I was able to travel around fairly freely and extensively. I've been everywhere west of the Urals, Central Asia, the Caucasus, Ukraine, the Baltic states, and places like that. And also I was able to talk with a lot of Russian citizens who came into the Embassy. And I'd go to the Foreign Ministry and talk to the consular people, and it was a more free exchange. There was not the tension or putoffs that sometimes I think political people would get, because they wanted visas, for certain groups who they wanted to get into the States. I mean the Soviet officials wanted things to run smoothly in this area, and so they were rather accommodating.

An interesting thing happened when I was chief of the consular section, and that's when I learned about the invisible economy, the black market. This is an interesting story, its nothing of high politics, but sort of a sidelight on human interest. There were a lot of Armenians in the United States who had immigrated to the Soviet Union after World War II. Stalin gave them incentives, and a lot of them thought to go back to the great homeland. And there were also a lot of Americans who went over there in the '30s who thought this was the future. By the 1960s all of these people were disillusioned and wanted to get out.

I always remember one poor old lady, an American, who had gone down to the Ukraine with her family, and unfortunately she had renounced her citizenship. And she'd come up once a year just to talk to Americans. She was still a convinced Marxist, but she'd always say, "This is a terrible place because all these people are a bunch of peasants, and they don't really know what Marxism is," and things like that. We'd have long talks.

But getting back to the Armenians. One day a group came in and they had a suitcase. I mean not a valise, but a regular suitcase. They opened it up in front of me, and it was filled with 100 ruble notes. This is one of these that you see in the movies, a suitcase full of money, stacks about that high. I don't know how many thousands of rubles were in there. At first I thought, "Boy, this is one of these KGB things." I thought, "This is pretty stupid." That's when I learned in Armenia about this underground black market economy. And these people were making money hand over fist down there. They were able to immigrate because a lot of them had kept their American citizenship and after a time the Russians would let them go, and they wanted to take their money with them. They wanted me to change the money to dollars. Well, in the first place I didn't have money to do this. And secondly, what would I ever do with stacks of rubles so high that it would take me a hundred years living in the Soviet Union, at that time, to ever spend it. Plus, of course, its illegal, but the whole thing was rather silly.

Q: I was going to say, the ruble wasn't convertible.

KLEMSTINE: Well, that's why they wanted me to change it. And the Russians wouldn't let them take the money out. The first case I thought this was a KGB plant, and I said, "Oh, my God." I just said, I couldn't do anything, I'm sorry, blab-blab-blab. Then about the second or third time I began to realize what was going on, and it finally got across to me this wasn't a game that the KGB was playing. These people really wanted to take their money out, and there was no way to take it out. And as a result I came up with one idea and it evidently worked, at least for a while. I told these people to go down to the GUM, that's the Russian department store, and buy fur coats with this money, and they could take it out as clothing -- sables, or fur hats, things like that. At least some of them did it because I remember getting a letter from one of them cryptically saying, "We had a nice fur sale in New York," something like that.

But the point I want to really get across is that in this socialist economy, I learned by talking to these people, that there was a separate economy underneath where evidently a helluva lot of money was being made.

Q: I wanted to ask you. You traveled around and talked to a lot of Russians. What was your general impression of living standards, or quality of life in the parts of the Soviet Union that you visited?

KLEMSTINE: It was low. You can't get around it. The thing that really surprised me in some places were the factory conditions. I thought they looked more to me like what you read in Charles Dickens of the working conditions: the dirt, and the lack of standards and safety than anything that I ever saw in the west; and anything that I ever saw subsequently in the orient.

Q: Did you sense much discontent with the government?

KLEMSTINE: No, this was the '60s, this was Khrushchev's time. This is when the Russian economy was growing. This was when a lot of our own people, including CIA, were fooled. The Russian growth rates were actually a quite good 5-6%, and Khrushchev himself you may remember, was predicting that by 1980 they would reach pure communism, and that they'd surpass the U.S. in production -- more milk and all that sort of thing. No real discontent with the regime that I ever came across, as I said, except for dissatisfied Americans, the Americans that immigrated into the Soviet Union. But most of the Russians, I think, in the 1960s were seeing an increase in their standards compared to the immediate post-war years. It was evidently not until the late '70s that things turned around, and started to go back down as they threw money into armaments.

I went over there just after the Cuban missile crisis, and the Russians had not yet started their big rearmament program at that time. So a lot of money was going into the civilian economy, and Khrushchev in a sense tried to help the Russians out in consumer goods compared to what happened in the 1970s when they started the rearmament, and things were shuttled away from the consumer. So, no, not in the 1960s was there any real discontent, just occasional grumbling.

Q: Were you in the Soviet Union in October '64 when Khrushchev was ousted?

KLEMSTINE: Yes, I was there.

Q: What did you think about that at the time?

KLEMSTINE: Well, it came as a surprise. Any yet a couple of days before it happened...I didn't know what was going on, but things weren't right. I would sense this when I went to the Foreign Ministry. I remember about two days before the ouster, I went to the Foreign Ministry, and at that time I had a sense that something was wrong because they just put everything off. I couldn't get any answers, "Well, come back next week." "We can't really make a decision now," and things like that. And there were some people whose visas were being held up. Their permission from OVIR, that was the office that gave them permission to leave the Soviet Union, they had got it and then suddenly at the last minute canceled. At least I had a feeling that something was going on, but I mean I didn't know what it was, but I just felt that the Russian bureaucracies that I had to deal with at that time, seemed somewhat preoccupied. They didn't want to take any decisions. They wouldn't do anything. And even some of the decisions they had made a couple of days before, they suddenly said no, or wait a week or so. I remember saying something upstairs but there was not really that much to substantiate it. It was more of an impression I got by dealing with these people that they were not in a position to do anything or else didn't want to.

And shortly after that came the coup, which came as a surprise.

Q: Then you left and returned to Washington shortly after that, in '65, and stayed in Washington until '70 and you worked at the Soviet Exchange.

KLEMSTINE: That was a dead end.

Q: What was that?

KLEMSTINE: When I was there it was nothing going on as the result of Vietnam. There was an exchange agreement between the U.S. and the Soviet Union to exchange scientists, artists, agricultural technicians, and others, back and forth. But as a result of Vietnam at the end of '65, the Soviets shut it down. So for about two years I was sitting there doing nothing, or next to that. This was bureaucracy at its worst. Occasionally there would be a few people coming or going, but there was nothing like there was supposed to be under a large exchange program. And as a consequence, I have to confess, I spent most of the time reading books. There was really very little to do. I made myself unpopular by advocating the whole section be disbanded and put on the Soviet desk. Actually, this has subsequently been done. There had been a big exchange program up until '65. I guess they revived it sometime later, but when I was there I was unfortunate in having very little to do except, as I say, a few exchanges in the technical field and scientific fields.

R. KEITH SEVERIN
Assistant Agricultural Attaché
Moscow (1963-1966)

Mr. Severin was born in Texas and raised in California. He was educated at Chaffee College, the University of California at Davis and Stanford University. Joining the US Department of Agriculture in 1951, Mr. Severin began his career as an Agriculture Instructor in American Samoa, after which he served in Moscow as Assistant Agricultural Attaché. In the Department in Washington, Mr. Severin held senior positions dealing with Foreign Agriculture Relations and Grain Export Subsidies. Mr. Severin was interviewed by Allan Mustard in 2006.

SEVERIN: But while there with Dr. Volin in that shop, Stan Brown and Don Krisler and Mil Davis, and I was doing some work on East European agriculture, and at the same time seeing the importance of the Soviet Union and, particularly, having become interested in it because of Dr. Volin, and that all he had done and was doing. I started learning to read some Russian and learned to read Sel'skaya zhizn' and that. And, lo and behold, early part of 1963, I was asked whether I would be interested in going to Moscow as the assistant agricultural attaché because the fellow who had been there in that position, Rod Carlson, had been asked by the Soviets to kindly leave.

So in June of 1963 – wait, let me back up just a second. Like I say, I'd begun to learn to read some Russian, but if I was going to be over there, I needed to be able to speak a little bit of it. And so while there wasn't a lot of time for it, I had maybe one month of Russian language, conversational, instruction. Anyway, in June of 1963, early June of 1963, Barbara, Kenneth and Bailey and I showed up over there.

Our son, Ken, was eight years old, and Bailey was an 11-week-old bird dog, German short-haired pointer puppy. And, in fact, his momma, Keck, was already in whelp at the time that we had been asked whether we wanted to go to Moscow. And Bailey was the last of the litter to go, so what the heck, why not? And it was a good thing to do. What great icebreakers Kenneth and Bailey turned out to be.

We rented our house in Vienna and Charlie, Barbara, the fellow who ran the local Esso station bought our old 1956 Chevy station wagon. He took us down to National Airport, Kenneth, Bailey, Barb and I. We got on the airplane that morning and flew up to Idlewild. Bailey was in his pet pack, as it were, so we left him there because, not knowing what the Soviets were going to be doing to us, and that was 1963, Cold War times, didn't know what all we might be subjected to.

We had a day there in New York City, so we went to the United Nations and we certainly went off to the Statue of Liberty, Kenneth, Barbara and I. We got back to the airport late that afternoon, early evening, and went to check on Bailey, and we saw his pet pack was opened. Where is the puppy?

Looked up on the desk there, and someone had taken the pup and put his coat out on the desk there and Bailey was lying up there, sleeping. So, that evening, Barb and Ken and Bailey and I got on Pan Am, first class. That's the way to go, Bailey in his pet pack under our seat. And we took off and we flew and landed in Stockholm, Oslo, the next morning. I've forgotten which and, anyway, just to refuel.

So I took Bailey outside and walked him around the airplane and he emptied out and we got back on the airplane, flew on to Helsinki, not very far away. And then Barb and Ken and I and Bailey spent a couple of days there in Helsinki. We had a nice hotel, gratefully just across the street from a park.

So I would get up quietly in the morning, get dressed. Then I'd wake Bailey up and pick him up, get him across the street, into the park, before he was permitted to put his feet down. Then, in Helsinki, we got onboard a train and, as you know, the rail line between Helsinki and Leningrad, or the Soviet border, Russian border, is kind of crooked and back and forth for one reason. But we got on over there and went straight on into Moscow and went to the Leningradskiy vokzal [Leningrad Railstation in Moscow, the terminus for trains from Leningrad -- now St. Petersburg]. And Bill Horbaly was there to meet us, and maybe he was a little bit surprised to see Bailey, but, the heck, I had a diplomatic passport. Doesn't everybody travel with a bird dog puppy, as well as family?

So we went on and got ensconced in the third-floor apartment of the embassy building and we were on the third floor and there was a balcony off Kenneth's bedroom. And that balcony, our apartment was right over what was the exit. There was one way into the embassy compound and one way out. Our apartment was right over the exit way. It was nice to have that balcony there off Kenneth's bedroom and, yes, we grew a few Kentucky wonder beans and that and it was just a nice place to have some light.

And, incidentally, it was in probably November of 1964, shortly before we left there, that was the only demonstration outside the embassy that there was while we were there, and an ink bottle was thrown through one of the windows in Kenneth's bedroom, just off that balcony. We'd been warned that there was going to be the demonstration, and it was because the Soviets were not happy with some action that the United States was taking in the Congo, if I remember correctly.

But that balcony, too, was also interesting, because Kenneth went to Soviet public school. P.S. 69 is the elementary school, the grammar school, just down the street on the right-hand side, as you come out of Spaso House. But Kenneth would come on home and maybe some of his little Soviet classmates would be with him, and he needed to get something to them, so he would go up and write a note or whatever it was and fold up a piece of paper, airplane, and fly it off the balcony there, and the militiamen would wonder what was going on with those youngsters doing that.

And in this same vein, too – Kenneth was a great icebreaker in that regard, as I've said, and so was Bailey, but Bailey was more than that in some regards, because Bailey had very good ears and our apartment had parquet flooring. And Bailey would sometimes sit around and cock his head, what am I hearing, what am I hearing? Like the RCA Victor dog, Nipper. He was hearing things and, of course, it was Cold War times and so we were very circumspect about what we said there in the embassy, anywhere, anywhere, because you just didn't know what was being picked up.

We saw the reason, certainly, for having stainless steel sinks. You go ahead and write out what you need to say to your wife or to whomever and burn it in the sink. But, anyway, we got there in June of 1963 and almost immediately after we got there, it was one of the highlights, almost immediately it was – I'm sure not later than the end of June – we showed up there, but Secretary of Agriculture Orville Freeman, and his entourage, Dorothy Jacobson, who was his assistant secretary, a lady who also came from Minnesota, as Mr. Freeman did, and Dr. Volin. Grand to see him, not only again, but kind of an old stomping grounds. And then there were Gene Olson and Jack McDonald, too, who was a speechwriter.

I later on saw Jack a long time afterwards in Brazil, where he was the ag attaché in Rio. But, anyway, they came and of course Bill Horbaly was very busy taking care of them and he had a dinner party, I remember one evening, for the secretary. That was fine, because that meant that Barbara and I were able to take care of our good friend Dr. Volin and Dorothy Jacobson and Gene Olson and Jack McDonald.

But that was a good time, and then, after the secretary left – and just for context here, you may remember that it was Orville Freeman who made the nominating speech for John Kennedy to become President of the United States. There was some banter going back, that Mr. Freeman, who had been in the Marine Corps in World War II and had had part of his jaw shot away. I saw him lots of times thereafter, and what a nice fellow he was, but, anyway, there was some banter going back and forth that in thanks for and in return for that nominating speech, what job would you like within the administration? "Anything except being Secretary of Agriculture," which is where he showed up, of course.

And we had not been in Moscow but a couple of days, until Barbara developed a bit of a tooth problem, and we had it checked out, dentally and all the rest of that before we left, but she developed a tooth problem. Well, what do you know? She got a ride back to the United States on a U.S. Air Force. And so she was able to go back to the United States, go to our local dentist here. It was still Dr. Bosco in Vienna, and get it taken care of and she was back within three days. Well, how did she do that?

Well, an airplane had come in, brought a whole slug of United States senators, including Hubert Humphrey. They came over for the signing of the Test Ban Treaty. Then the airplane came back a few days later to take them home, so Barb hitchhiked a ride back and forth, but it was the signing of the Test Ban Treaty.

One of the fellows, one of the State Department officers, I've forgotten his name, but Bob something. I can still see him, but, anyway, he was the one who escorted Mr. Humphrey and he said it was kind of embarrassing, because Mr. Humphrey would walk up to some Soviet military guy, "Hey, what are you going to do? Y'know, we just signed the Test Ban Treaty. You're going to be out of a job. What are you going to be doing?" But the brashest of the American politicians, all right, fine. That was one of the things that happened early on.

And then, two, you remember what the ambassador's 4th of July parties are. Well, we had a group of veterinarians there on the 4th of July of 1963. We had the head of the – I've forgotten his name, but he was head of Communicable Diseases Center in Atlanta. He was head of the delegation. Dunn, Dr. Dunn, I believe he was head of the vet school in Pennsylvania and then we had the head of the vet school from Illinois, and then there was somebody else from the Communicable Diseases Center who spoke Russian.

But, anyway, those four fellows were there, and three high-powered vets. And so after the 4th of July party, Ambassador Kohler, Foy Kohler, at his place there, Spaso House, we all had tired feet. So we thought that the fellows should be taken care of. I don't think Horbaly was there. Otherwise, I couldn't have gotten away with it, I reckon.

But, anyway, those four fellows all came to our apartment. We took our shoes off, sat down, put our feet up. Well, Bailey at that juncture, Bailey was whelped in March, I believe it was, so Bailey was about four months old and he needed his shots and inoculations and that, and I had all the material there.

So here it is, here are these high-flown vets and we get ahold of Bailey and get him down and these high-flown vets give Bailey his shots. We had a grand time. We just had a grand time, and, again, it's getting along with people. It's working with them and being not only a little bit knowledgeable of what they're about and what they're interested in, but having a sincere appreciation for it.

Q: There are a couple of things I'd like you to touch on, one of which gets into a little bit of that, and one of which is maybe a little bit more just your historical perspective. The first is crop travel, because agricultural officers typically do more travel out of Moscow and out of the city than other sections of the embassy. And if you could talk a little bit about what it was like doing crop travel in the Soviet Union back in the '60s, during the Cold War, with the surveillance that you were under and what the ground rules were and just your perspective on that.

And then the other thing, of course, is 1964, that was a landmark year because that was the year the Soviets did their massive grain imports.

SEVERIN: No, '63.

Q: Sixty-three, okay, in '63. It was '64 that Khrushchev was thrown out of office for having...

SEVERIN: He made a mistake. He went on vacation down to the Black Sea.

Q: So if you could talk a little bit about both of those.

SEVERIN: Sure. I'll get into it a little bit by the next thing I was going to say, is that it was August and September, I suppose, soon after we had gotten there in June, that I went off for just about a full month on a trip with Floyd Domonie, who was at that time commissioner of the Bureau of Land Reclamation. I think that's the right name, but he was head of it, and he came over with four or five fellows, spent about a month.

And, yes, we went to Tashkent, we went to Andizhan, the Fergana Valley, to Osh and to Baku and through the Absheron Peninsula. Then we went to Yerevan, and we drove from Yerevan, had a fantastic picnic organized by Minister of Irrigation Bagramyan there in Armenia and then drove from there over the mountains to Tbilisi, this whole group. And we were accompanied by a fellow, Sam Ofengenden, and another irrigation engineer, Lyudmila Moreno, and we were taken well care of. But that was my first trip outside, as it were, and so I saw more agriculture, certainly all down in the area that needed to be irrigated and reclaimed and that.

But one of the interesting things about this is while we were in Yerevan, one of the fellows, one of the locals, he was editor of their newspaper, "Kommunist", Eduard. Some way, we got a little bit acquainted. In November, he came up to Moscow and got in touch with me and Kenneth and I took him to a hockey match one evening, and we took him back to his hotel, the Praga. And then we came back to the embassy, and as we came in, Harriet, I think, was her first name, Harriett Scott, the air attaché's wife, came out. And she said, "Keith, Keith, have you heard? Have you heard? President Kennedy's been shot."

When all that took place, Kenneth and I were out with Eduard from Yerevan. And then later on, Ken and Barb and another lady from the embassy took a trip and they went through Yerevan and around a couple of places and Eduard took good care of them.

But on this thing of crop travel, it really didn't exist, and particularly relative to what can be done today, it really did not exist in the '60s, or when I was there. Because, in order to go anywhere, to make any kind of a trip, you had to have permission from the Ministry of Agriculture. You had to have an appointment wherever it was you were going to go. You had to have hotel reservation to wherever it was you were going to go, and you had to have your travel reservations, whether on train or on airplane. And if you didn't have any one of those, you were shot down, or you could have 'em, have your suitcase and going out the door, telephone rings, "Hey, no more seats on that flight," so you stayed at home.

If you traveled anywhere by vehicle, yes, you had to have where you were going, who you were going to see, where you were going to stay. And then, if you're driving a vehicle, what vehicle it is, what's the license number, who's going to be traveling with you. So you were completely at their drop-of-the-hat mercy in any one of those things.

There was no crop travel, as such, really. The way that we got our information, every day we got Sel'skaya zhizn', Pravda, Izvestia, and then the newspapers from each one of the republics. And if you read one of those good, you didn't have to read the rest of them. You had to have the match flights. They were absolute duplicates as it were. So that was our primary source of information.

But, now, having said that, I was on very good terms with people in the embassy in other departments, and particularly the military. If they were going to go somewhere, they'd say, "Keith, we're going to go someplace, wherever it happened to be. What is it that we ought to see? What is it that you're looking for?" And they'd come back and tell me what's out there now, and what would be different. And, by the same token, hey, we all work for Uncle Sam, if I were going to go somewhere, "I'm going to go somewhere, is there anything I need to be particularly attentive about?"

And that made a big difference, and I'll never forget one night, when there as a party at Spaso House and Jimmy Shapiro, Commander Shapiro's wife, and he later on was head of Naval Intelligence. Anyway, she came up to him when we were talking and she said something about, well, you fellows in the State Department. I said, "I'm not State Department." She said, "I've been wondering why you're so different. I've been wondering why you were so different."

The fellow who was going around with Hubert Humphrey was Bob Bragdon. I was different, and there's another thing, too, that fits this whole picture, is that while we were there, our ambassador was Foy Kohler and Mrs. Kohler, and they liked us. They liked the Severins a whole lot, and when we were getting ready to go home, and it was less than a two-year assignment because we'd come in to fill in for the tail end of Rod Carlson and that, and one day I was going across the courtyard and I heard, "Keith, Keith."

I looked and Mrs. Kohler was in the car and she said, "Come here, come here." She said, "What's this I hear about you and Barbara going? You can't be doing that. You can't leave us."

But the Kohlers expected you to work, and there's a reception and you're going to be there and I don't want to see one of you talking with another American or English-speaking person. You will work. It was done in a good kind of a way and at the time that we were there, the list of officers in the embassy was on the front of a legal-size sheet of paper.

We parked our American car in the embassy. That's how few of us that there were there, and we all got along so doggone well. Bill Van Meter, who was in the Air office, a Lieutenant Colonel, and we got to know him and Julie quite well, and we stayed with them later on, in Sofia, when he was a military attaché there, but Bill Van Meter and Adolph "Spike" Dubs and I. You had to make your own fun, as it were.

We would have popcorn popping contests. We'd start off with the same number of kernels in the pot and get them popped and how few kernels you'd have left. Spike, sometimes I'd run into him in the middle of the night, down out back, washing the car as the chauffeurs in the car were taken care of. The folks who took care of the car, they were done and gone home and all the embassy cars were cleaned up, and so we'd be down there, cleaning up our own.

Spike was such a wonderful, wonderful man, and he was our ambassador in Kabul. He was assassinated down there, just a grand guy. And another thing I'll remember about him, too, was later on, probably in 1975, maybe '76, Roger Neetz was the attaché then, whenever that was, but under one of the exchange teams that went over, one of the teams that went over on the exchange agreement, they were going to send us off somewhere that made absolutely no sense at all. And so Spike Dubs, who was acting DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] at the time, I believe, and he went with me and pounded the table with Runov and didn't do any good. [Boris Aleksandrovich Runov, former deputy minister of agriculture of the Soviet Union, who spoke fluent English as a consequence of having studied at Iowa State University following World War II, and who was the youngest Hero of the Soviet Union to come out of World War II.]

Then that night, I was there with – I don't know if Art Shaw was along or not, and then there was a fellow, McDonald, from North Dakota. I'd gone over with an inkling that they were not going to let us go wherever we wanted to go. It wasn't Art Shaw. It was Wes Tausig from North Dakota.

I had an inkling that they were going to try to shoot us down and send us someplace we didn't want to go. They never did really receive the team officially, and I'd gone over with the permission to bring the team home, if I thought that that was the best thing to do. Anyway, that evening, after Spike Dubs and I had been talking with Runov. There was a reception at Spaso [Spaso House, the American Ambassador's official residence in Moscow] and the military guys said, "Hey, we're hearing you may be taking our team home. That's good."

The State Department were saying, "Hey, you can't take the team home, that doesn't do us any good with the Soviet relations." Ricki Neetz, Roger's wife, had chewed me out like anything, "You're spoiling our relationships with the Soviets and that. You can't do it." Anyway, we brought the team home. Hell with them.

Q: Well, could you talk a little bit – I want to get into the exchanges, the post-1972 era, at some point, which is when the agreement was signed on exchanges, so I'd like to get into that. But, before we go to that, if we could talk about '63.

SEVERIN: Yes, well, that's exactly what I was thinking. Well, another highlight in 1963, and it was a fantastic one that carried over. The effects of it carried over. Nineteen-sixty-three, the Soviets had a real crop bust and they came to the United States and I've forgotten how much they bought, but I remember the S.S. Manhattan put into Odessa. I think the Manhattan carried 108,000, 109,000 tons of grain. It was immense, just a huge, huge thing, and real big and that whole operation was a Michel Fribourg [Michel Fribourg was chairman of Continental Grain at the time].

Michel Fribourg was the honcho for cotton and grain and exports. What a nice fellow he was, the chairman exports. I've forgotten his first name, Matveyev, but big parties and priyoms [receptions] and that there at the National Hotel. The fact that the Soviets came into the market that year, and particularly to the extent that they came into the market that year, just put the international grain trade right on its ears.

If I remember correctly, that because of the fact that the Soviets were in as buyers that year that the grain import food bill for the U.K. was up something like 20 pence per capita, so that was a huge unexpected outlay that the U.K. had to make to feed its people. As a consequence of that, everybody was really wanting to know, what's going to happen next year? Are we going to have another crop bust next year? What's going to happen? What's going to happen?

Well, as it turns out, Horbaly had gone home. Brice Meeker, who was to succeed him, was not there yet. Stan Brown was sent in on a very temporary basis, but basically Keith Severin was the only guy in Moscow, Westerner in Moscow, who knew anything at all about agriculture.

I was on the ground a lot. I was on the trip a lot. The Canadians did not have their ag attaché in there anymore, so they sent Fred Hillhouse in, who was their man from Bonn. I learned a lot from Fred, traveled with Fred a lot. I'll never forget, we were somewhere where I talked about us Americans, or about the Americans, and Fred said, "Hey, I'm an American, too. I come from North America." But, anyway, the Canadians sent Fred Hillhouse in, and, needless to say, the Brits were there, too.

Ted Orchard came in and he was from their INR [State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research] or whatever it is, but, anyway, I traveled with Ted and that was the first time I was ever in Barnaul. We got on out there and it was rainy and it was probably in September, and things were pretty rudimentary and Ted was tired and he'd gone off to his little cubicle, as it were, and I stayed in my little room, which had just some sheets drawn around and the lady came to me and she said, "What do you want to eat?" And I said, "Well, if one is in Siberia, you're supposed to eat pelmeni."

She said, "Fine, I'll call you." So that evening I had about two dozen svezhiye pel'meni, ochen' vkusno bylo. [fresh pel'meni, it was very tasty] And I had music, too. They had taped some music off I suppose Voice of America and it was a tape. It would run and it would get through it. It would start over again and start over again. But that was my first trip to Barnaul.

Brice Meeker came in sometime late, I've forgotten exactly when, and I took Brice on his first road trip and we went – I remember we got to Donetsk, and we were driving. We were driving. We were in Donetsk at the time of the world football match, and they took us in the back of one of the big, fancy, just-for-us-only restaurants and we watched the world football match there.

And it must have been before we went to Odessa, that the car broke down. We were driving a Ford and the car broke down in Rostov, and took it to the same checkpoint that I'd been to in late April, when the car had broken down. I remember the mechanic there said, "Hey, I've seen two of your Fords now. Next time, bring me a Lincoln."

But, anyway, Brice and I, we'd gone to Odessa and we put the car onboard ship, the Abkhazia, and the ship would normally have put in at Sevastopol, but that being a big naval base and that, it anchored some ways out and so they had to lighten the regular passengers and that.

But, anyway, we got our car off board at Yalta, and then we went from Yalta on back up to Moscow. And kind of in the same vein, Dave Schoonover came over to succeed me and I took Dave on his first trip. I will never forget that. We went out to Tselinograd and went up to Shortandy and visited with Barayev. But Dave had a lot to learn, because he had more experience at being treated well by the Russians.

Dave didn't have much experience and didn't take to it too well. I'll never forget that. We were going along and he had his head stuck out the window. And then, also, in 1964, like I said, the Canadian was there, the Brit was there, and that was the year that Ed Jaenke came over, Bill Starkey and Jim – anyway, from AMS [Agricultural Marketing Service] and Roland Blue, Shorty Blue, who was an assistant administrator.

Ed was associate administrator. Ed was associate administrator in charge of production policy for grains and soybeans at that juncture. And I'll never forget, they would not let me travel with Ed and his group.

Q: They being who, the Soviets?

SEVERIN: The Soviets would not. And Stan was there at the beginning of their trip. I want to say Stan Brown was there, because when the crew came in, when those four fellows came in, we took them. They were put up at the Ostankino Hotel. And it was so funny, because all those fellows were tall, big guys, and as we were taking them into dinner that evening, the Russian band there played "When the Saints Go Marching In." What a hoot.

The Soviets would not let me travel with Ed and his crew, and they came through Moscow a time or two, so I took them their mail and I picked up stuff that they had. There was a little short gal who was their interpreter, and she wasn't interpreting. My Russian, it's never been all that great, but I know a little bit, but she wasn't giving them the straight line on some stuff.

I'll never forget the last meeting that they had, and they were the last group of foreigners to come in, and so a big, long table and of course the Americans were always put on the side of the table that had to face the light and that. Ed said that they'd been traveling and they'd seen this and that and they were curious what the prospects were for the 1964 crop. I don't know who it was that they were meeting with, but they said, "Well, we don't count our chickens before they hatch, and we really don't what it's going to be." So Ed said, "You don't count your chickens before they hatch."

"No." He said, "Well, your 1963 chickens hatched a long time ago. What was the size of your crop then?" And the Soviet responded, "It was such a bad crop, we're embarrassed about it. We don't talk about it yet."

At that juncture, Ed got up from his side of the table, thump, thump, thump, thump, thump, all the way around to the other side, and the fellow kind of looked it and Ed said, "Thank you, that's the first honest answer I've heard since we've been here." And that was I think on September the 14th of 1964. The reason I remember that date is because September the 14th is Ed's birthday, the same date as my brother Kenneth, who was killed in the airplane crash.

Ed likes martinis, so we were going to give him a good going away party and the Minsk had just opened up there on Gorky Street. It was the place to go, so we went over there and I took two big thermoses of honest-to-God martinis over to Jaenke's birthday party. So, as I said, I got along very well with Ed Jaenke and it wasn't long after I came back from Moscow that Ed had me working in ASCS [Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service]. And ostensibly I was on Shorty Blue, who was commodity operations. Ostensibly, I was working for him, but Ed had a private line from his desk to my desk.

And then, too, just another thing about when we moved here into this house on September the 1st of 1970, who was it that helped us move out of our house from Vienna, here, spent all day helping us move? It was Ed Jaenke.

Q: Coming back before you left Moscow, you were there for the transition from the Khrushchev era to the Brezhnev era. That would have happened in '64. Were you there when the Central Committee plenum took place and Khrushchev was officially retired and Brezhnev came in? Or were you already gone by that time?

SEVERIN: Pretty well gone, because, you see, he got the boot in November. We left on the 1st of December.

Q: So you were pretty much on the way out at that point.

SEVERIN: We were on the way out. And at that juncture, too, going back about crop travel and how we learned things, one of the big jobs, of course, was the food supply. And so you went to the collective farm market and to the state stores. I would always try to do it on Sunday morning or Wednesday afternoon, do it at the same time so as to get some degree of measure in there. What is the supply? What is the quantity? We would always go and we'd take some American newspaper because you always had to wrap your own stuff.

You only needed two sheets to wrap it in, but you'd leave the rest of the paper there. "Oh, those are good looking potatoes. Where did they come from? Well, what else is going on?" You learned things, and Kenneth was a great help in that regard because he went to the same barber as the other little Soviet boys and wore the same uniform. He worked up and he had his own contact, particularly in the dairy sections. He would help me remember prices and get prices.

It was as much fun as it was work, but, again, as I put it, it's howdy-doing the folks. It's learning something about them and there were things that happened, so much fun. And Horbaly was gone, clearly, because John Kenneth Galbraith, who was the U.S. ambassador to India at the time was coming through, and he was there.

Ambassador Kohler invited him to lunch, and Mr. Obolenskiy, who was head of agricultural economics at the time and his perevodchik [interpreter], Viktor, Viktor Nazarenko. [Viktor Nazarenko was later scientific secretary of the All-Union Academy of Agricultural Sciences (VASKhNIL)].

Q: Who is still alive and living in Moscow. Viktor Nazarenko is still around in Moscow.

SEVERIN: And checking on his right bottle of Tsinandali and all that stuff. I was there. So there were the five of us for lunch at Spaso, and Severin sometimes doesn't show proper judgment, I suppose. But I just had been to the rynok [market] that morning. I said, oh, I noticed something really very interesting. This morning, I was at the collective farm market and there were some people from Central Asia there, and they had some really lovely strawberries, a very interesting variety of strawberries. Kakoy sort? Chemodanchik.

"What variety of strawberries were they?" Suitcase. That's the way they were brought up from down there, 15 rubles to get there, round-trip ticket, and Nazarenko didn't think that was too funny.

Q: He wouldn't have.

SEVERIN: But, again, you have some fun along the way and you keep your eyes open. Our big burden for Horbaly and me, for our office, was of course, and it's not all that much different, I suppose, is that the econ section, State econ section, thought that they ran the ag section. They know more about it and you can't write anything unless we okay it and all the rest of that.

Well, our big job was having a weekly input to the weekly economic report. So you'd read, you'd talk to, you'd find out what you could and you had your contribution to the weekly economic report. One fellow that was there in the embassy, I've forgotten. He was either the DCM or the acting DCM, I suppose, was Jack Sweeney, or McSweeney, and he was horrible. He was horrible.

I think he had a bulldog and Ken Kurst, they had a bulldog, and Bailey, we had our dogs. But Sweeney, or McSweeney, was absolutely horrible. We had a wonderful DCM later on, Walter Stoessel. He was so good, Walter and Maryanne, his wife, just good folks. And Mac Toon was head of the political section part of the time we were there. [ Both Walter Stoessel and Malcolm Toon later served as U.S. Ambassadors to the Soviet Union.]

I had a wonderful time traveling with some of the young State Department fellows, Peter Bridges, who later went. And then right after Kennedy was killed, I had a good trip down to Kharkov then on to Kishinev with Roger Kirk, and his father had been ambassador there, went over Red Square. And Roger's son was also an Alan Kirk, and Peter Bridges, little guy.

Peter Bridges had a son, also, and he was about the same age as Ken, and he was the one who came running across the courtyard, I suppose it was in January of 1964, just after Barb and Ken and I had come back from going off for a Christmas holiday in Switzerland with Barbara's family. But the little Bridges guy came running across the courtyard, "Ken, Ken, did you hear? Did you hear? Bailey ate the Marines' Christmas turkey."

The Marines had said, when they were up on the sixth floor on the north wing there, they said they'd take care of Bailey. I said, "You know he's a puppy. I wouldn't trust him." Well, Buck had roasted the turkey and left it out to cool while they went to have a drink and came back and Bailey...

Q: Helped himself.

SEVERIN: But Bailey was so good and Ken and I, we would take Bailey for a walk, and we'd be somewhere over yonder. We were tailed everywhere we went, and Bailey would, sniff, "Hey, buddy, what you're doing here? You're normally guarding the gate at the embassy. Get away, get away, get away."

Q: So he made your tail all the time.

SEVERIN: And the Marines one time took Bailey out and there was some grandma there and had a youngster and the youngster came up to Bailey and the youngster had an ice cream cone. The youngster came up to Bailey and Bailey ate it.

But they were big icebreakers, those two. And Kenneth went to P.S. 69, as I say, went in the mornings from eight until noon or eight until 12:30, or something. Well, the embassy, we were closed on Wednesday afternoon, and that was time that Kenneth and I had a wonderful time. We'd take a walk somewhere, or we would take the tramvay [Tram, the tracked trolley car used widely for public transportation in Soviet and Russian cities.] somewhere and walk back. We would go somewhere, just poke around, Ken and I, and that, plus going to the collective farm markets, we just had a grand time.

Q: Why was the embassy closed on Wednesday afternoons?

SEVERIN: Well, we were open Saturday morning, so we closed Wednesday afternoons.

Q: Why were you open on Saturday mornings?

SEVERIN: Because we were closed Wednesday afternoon.

Q: I see. We don't operate that way anymore.

SEVERIN: And another thing, too, about Bailey as an icebreaker, where the embassy is located now, that was just a big vacant lot, and that's where the people in that area got together every evening to let their dogs run and jump and play and exercise. And Bailey and I were a part of that crowd. It was just another way of getting to know the folks.

After I'd been gone from that long trip in September, I came back, I was somewhere across town, and a lady says, "You've been gone, mister, you've been gone. Who's been taking care of your puppy?" But those two were grand icebreakers, Kenneth and Bailey.

RALPH E. LINDSTROM
Economic Officer
Moscow (1963-1965)

Economic Counselor
Moscow (1967-1969)

Ralph E. Lindstrom was born in 1925 and raised in Anoka, Minnesota. He served in the U.S. Army during World War II and subsequently received a bachelor's degree in government from Harvard University. Mr. Lindstrom entered the Foreign Service in 1952. His career included positions in Afghanistan, France, China (Hong Kong), Germany, the Soviet Union, Kenya, Saudi Arabia, and Washington, DC. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on November 29, 1994.

Q: You went to Moscow from 1963 to 1965. How would you describe the relationship between the United States and the Soviet Union?

LINDSTROM: Khrushchev was still in power. I'd say the relationship was somewhat improving, but again against the backdrop of the troubles with Vietnam. But Khrushchev himself did visit the United States as you may recall.

Khrushchev was a very interesting leader. I had a chance to meet him several times in connection with American businessmen visiting the Soviet Union. He became very much aware of the economic problems that were beginning to affect the economy increasingly, and wanted to do something about them, but didn't really know what to do. He put, of course, a lot of emphasis, as they did way back to the Czars, on getting more ideas and inventions from foreigners, either buying them, stealing them, or however you could get them. That perhaps would solve some of the problems with the economy. He was, of course, deposed about a year after I got there, and this amazingly created very little stir inside the Soviet Union. I guess he was not particularly appreciated by the people. I went down to Red Square on the night that he had been toppled just to see what was going on, and there was absolutely nothing, no security precautions to speak of, only one militia vehicle, and people coming out of the theaters located in the Kremlin, and talking with each other. I sort of listened in to see if they wouldn't be talking about the major event of the world, and there was not a word about it. They were just talking about the theater, the weather, and personal things.

Q: When you went there, what was your position?

LINDSTROM: I went there as an economic officer the first tour, and the second tour, which was two years after the first, was back as Economic Counselor.

Q: Let's talk about the first tour, the '63 to '65 one. What was the embassy like at that time?

LINDSTROM: Foy Kohler was the ambassador, and we were trying, despite all the obstacles, to get some contacts with Soviets. It was almost impossible to do useful reporting which was based to a considerable measure on the press, just reading the press. It was a little easier for those of us who were in the economic section. We weren't as harassed by the KGB as the people in the political section, for example. The embassy was well run, comfortable, the same old building as I think we are still using even today, and very much run down now. It was much easier then to have contacts say with the artistic community under Khrushchev than it was later under Brezhnev, when it became more of a crackdown. This was of some interest. I managed to buy a few paintings and get acquainted with a leading painter, my wife and I. She was able to get some entree into the museums and that kind of thing, and go with other American women. She'd had the opportunity to study Russian in Oberammergau as I had. So there were openings there. You had to work at them, and we tried to travel whenever we could. This was useful too. Often when you traveled you had more of an opportunity to meet people, as you could talk to them, and they could talk to you with relative impunity, in a railway car, or even sometimes in an airplane. So we did quite a lot of that, as much as we could.

Q: Here you're in the economic section, and we're now talking in 1994 when what was the Soviet Union, now is a broken up mass, just an absolute economic disaster, and the economic side the cause of disaster. The system didn't work. But trying to go back to the time you were there looking at this, how did we feel about the economic situation and the short-long term prognosis for it?

LINDSTROM: We could see the weaknesses. I made it a point to visit as many factories as I could, and I think I visited a couple dozen factories of various types. It was one of the things they did permit you to do. Of course, they only showed you the relatively nice factories, but even there you could see there wasn't much, morale was very low in the work force. The factories were real safety hazards. Russians are the least safety conscious people in the world, I think. It's something about the character. Typically you'd go around in a factory and there'd be pieces of broken frayed cable on the floors, grease on the floor, and that type of thing. Although everyone was supposed to wear a hard hat, they very rarely ever did. The crane operators were usually women, way up high in these big high overhead cranes. And I remember taking a group of American businessmen into a plant in Leningrad, its very much like the Schenectady plant up in New York, and I asked him why are the crane operators almost always women?

The chief engineer replied to me, without any hesitation, in Russian. "Because they don't drink, so it's a safety measure." And in that time I think Russian women were very sober and did not drink. I understand it has changed quite a bit since then.

Q: What I'm getting at is, that somehow or other we acknowledge all the problems of the Soviet Union, yet we seem to think that here was something that would almost go on forever, and that the controls were such. How did we look at the economy in those days?

LINDSTROM: It was basically a command economy, run like a military institution, and this could go on, and obviously did go on for quite some time without really coming apart. They were beginning to see the weaknesses and the experimentation with economic reform, which Khrushchev encouraged. But they were groping with something obviously extremely difficult. They haven't really worked it out even today, how to reform that type economy and make it work like an efficient capitalist economy. So they started playing around with little indicators, and really didn't get much of anyplace with those.

Q: Were any of the Soviet economists, or the people you were talking to, reflecting any disquiet or asking questions, how does your system work, or something like that, or not?

LINDSTROM: It was hard to get to see Soviet economists. They were beginning to be concerned about it, no question about that. They didn't know what to do either. Some good work was being done, I learned later, out in Novorossiysk and this scientific academy. One of the top economists there, eventually was brought to prominence, I think during the Gorbachev era, but he'd been kept under wraps during all that period. But yet he'd been allowed to continue doing his work, and he was attacked in the beginning for trying to tackle these problems. How can we make this economy more efficient? How can we borrow from capitalism? I still remember once when Khrushchev said in one of his speeches, and again acknowledging the problem they had, he said, "Even after the entire world has gone communist, we'll have to keep one country around as a capitalist country, so we'll know how to set our prices." That was in a public speech, because how do you set the prices in a system like that, and have them make any sense.

Q: There's this old story about they pretend to pay us, and we pretend to work, that type of thing. Were the indicators that it was a very productive work force?

LINDSTROM: No, from what my observations were, they had a lot of problems. Excessive use of alcohol for example, except perhaps by the women, and absenteeism. And then again, it was a so-called planned economy and they would have to towards the end of the month always have a storming -- a literal translation -- to achieve the plan, and then everybody would work twice or three times as hard as normal and somehow or other they would fulfill the plan. So that was another obvious thing. But you could see it too in their growing weakness vis-a-vis the rest of the world in terms of advanced technology. Their aircraft industry was falling way behind. Yet they had one of the largest airlines in the world, for example, Aeroflot. I remember being invited to go on board -- actually this was in my second tour, but I'll mention it, it seems to be relevant -- the IL-144, which was their answer to the Concorde, a supersonic passenger aircraft. They had stolen the plans from the French, and done a pretty good job of copying the Concorde, except they couldn't copy the engines unfortunately, so they had great trouble flying it. But I went on board that plane, took some American businessmen with me, and one of them was from a paint company and he said, "Ralph, run your hand along the side of the fuselage there. What does it feel like?" And I said, "Paint brush marks." And he said, "That's it." So here they are, a supersonic aircraft and they don't even have the technology to put spray paint on it, so you'd see a lot of things like that.

They were very defensive, of course, about their backwardness. It came up over and over again, and they really were aware of it. Many times when we were turned down for travel it was not because it was a military city that we wanted to go to. It was because it was an area with no paved roads and that kind of thing, and just mud streets and they didn't want foreigners to be seeing that kind of thing.

Q: Well, Foy Kohler was the ambassador. How did he operate?

LINDSTROM: He was a rather quiet man. In those days it was difficult to have very much contact with the Soviet leadership, but he did the best he could on that. And he had good relationships with the staff. One of the things we did in Embassy Moscow, and this went on for many, many years, was to have a press backgrounder for the American press corps, as I recall, was on Fridays. About 20 or maybe more American press people would come by and the ambassador would try to give them a few insights on what had happened. This generated a little bit of information for us as well.

Q: The press would respond?

LINDSTROM: And sometimes, if not during the group, they never liked to talk in front of the other people, some of them would pick up something that was too hot to report that might lead to their expulsion but they would share it with us individually. So this was a useful relationship to maintain, and all of our ambassadors tried to do that.

Q: What about security problems there? Really basic life in the Soviet Union at that time? I'm thinking of surveillance.

LINDSTROM: Surveillance was just terribly heavy at all times. But not particularly heavy for the economic section, unless we did something very unusual and then they would pick up on it almost immediately. But they were just all over the military attachés at all times. I remember a couple times taking trips with people and we always used the buddy system. If my wife couldn't go with me, take someone else, and if that person were more suspect than I was, we'd usually have somebody accompanying us in a rather obvious way. So that was a deterrent in many ways to getting to know what was going on in the country, and that is what it was intended to be.

Security in the sense of theft and that kind of thing was all right. For the most part we didn't even have to lock our doors in those days because, of course, the KGB was every place. I understand that has changed drastically. Once in a while some Soviet embassy cars have been stolen here in Washington, and we'd have tit-for-tat theft of vehicles from the American embassy in Moscow. But that didn't happen many times that I can recall.

Q: You were there at the time Kennedy was assassinated, weren't you?

LINDSTROM: Yes.

Q: How did that play out there?

LINDSTROM: I remember learning about it on the Voice of America. Roger Kirk was living in the same building with me and he came up to tell us that Kennedy had been assassinated. We rushed down and listened to the commentary on Voice of America. And insofar as the Soviets were concerned, Khrushchev personally came over and signed the condolence book in the embassy and was crying. They're very impressed by death, perhaps because at that time they didn't believe there was any place else to go. I think insofar as the man on the street was concerned, I was traveling at that time, and we talked to taxi drivers, and the typical line was that Kennedy had been a great man. They didn't say so while he was alive. But then they'd say that Johnson is a very bad man. No real basis for that, just something they didn't like about Johnson's looks. It seemed to be almost a standard thing you'd pick up all across the Soviet Union. But they clearly seemed to be very sorry to see Kennedy perish that way.

Q: You had to deal with Soviet statistics. How did you deal with them?

LINDSTROM: Basically we'd leave the super interpretation up to Washington and the large number of people we had working on that kind of thing and in all parts of the U.S. government. This was an overwhelming task in trying to make some sense out of those statistics. It's not something we could do single handed. So what we did was just try to get whatever statistics we could get that wouldn't otherwise be available to Washington, and get them into Washington. We'd make a special effort to get an advance copy of the foreign trade statistics, which weren't classified by the Soviets, but which were of great interest to us. So that was our approach in the field to getting information, anything that Washington wasn't likely to learn about through some other means.

Q: I know getting information out of China, for years our China hands got an awful lot from local newspapers in China. How did you find the local press for that type of thing?

LINDSTROM: I would say it was somewhat similar to what we used to do when I was in Hong Kong reading the Chinese press. But we didn't have any large section translating it for us. So we had to do our own reading and analysis of the press, the major newspapers, to the extent we had time. And then, of course, we sent on much more than we could read to Washington for further analysis. This was certainly helpful to follow the workings of their economic reform programs and that kind of thing. We did a fair amount of that. Another thing we did in the economic section was to meet with our western counterparts at lunch, as I recall about every two weeks or so, during which we would just talk business, exchange information on our trips, and what experiences we'd had with the Soviets. We knew we were quite likely being taped, but we didn't care since there were not high grade secrets or anything like that. And I think it was mutually beneficial. We continued that during the whole time that I was there, both my first and second tours. And some of the other countries obviously had a little more entree than we did, because we had so relatively little foreign trade with the Soviet Union. Whereas the western European countries were making a much bigger effort which gave them more of an opportunity to get other insights as to what was really happening in the economy.

Q: You mentioned the fall of Khrushchev, and the rise of Brezhnev. Did you see any curtailment in certain economic activities and enhancement of others, or anything like that?

LINDSTROM: One thing that became pretty clear was that Brezhnev and his people didn't have much use for the quest for economic reform. They said it hasn't been successful, which was true, just a waste of time, so we'll go on with our military style economy, if you will. And that didn't completely cut off the work that I mentioned before in the academies on economic reform. But he just didn't feel it was yielding any great results, and thought all we've got to do is continue on the old way, and keep up the pressures of one kind or another through the planning system. It was much harder to get close to him, than it was to Khrushchev to find out what was going on. We screened the press as best we could and drew our conclusions from that.

Q: How about agriculture? Khrushchev had made a great deal about opening up virgin lands, areas which had not been under wheat cultivation, for example. What was the impression we were getting about Soviet agriculture during this period?

LINDSTROM: It was also having a great many problems. In the Soviet Union the land mass is not Iowa, and never will be. It doesn't have the same climatic conditions that we have in this country. So they have good years sometimes, and then very bad years, maybe two or three years in a row. I had the opportunity to visit Khrushchev's new lands on a train trip once, which was quite interesting. They took a group of diplomats out there just to show them what a fine harvest they had had that year. And it was indeed a good harvest. I went with our Agricultural Attaché, and he confirmed that. We would try whenever possible to visit the farming areas, and report on what the status of the crops was, which would help the Department of Agriculture make their estimates of Soviet crops.

Q: You then left Moscow for a while. You came back to Washington from '65 to '67. What were you doing?

LINDSTROM: I did a tour in what used to be called the E Bureau, the EB Bureau, working on international finance primarily for Dick Cooper, who later became Under Secretary for Economic Affairs. This was not a terribly interesting area, because we're not the main movers and shakers in the State Department insofar as international finance is concerned. It was more of a liaison with Treasury, releasing their telegrams and going to meetings.

Q: You went back to Moscow from '67 to '69. That's a rather relatively rapid turnaround, wasn't it? How did that come about?

LINDSTROM: Well mainly I was offered the job. It was a class 2 rated job so I did have to get permission from the Department...

Q: This was the old FSO-2, now Minister Counselor.

LINDSTROM: Right. So anyway I got the approval to go there. I liked my first tour and I welcomed the opportunity to go back a second time, and of course could do quite a bit more having the higher rank. One of the most interesting things I did during that second tour was to negotiate the opening of Aeroflot and Pan American service between Moscow and the United States. This process went on for well over a year with daily instructional telegrams, and I would go back with what the Soviets would tell me. It gave me some insights into the military side of intelligence, GRU, because almost all of Aeroflot was staffed by GRU officers and when I first started going over there they'd be in full military regalia. I had never seen this before. As you may have heard, Aeroflot really started out as just an arm of intelligence, and they never quite broke away from that.

Q: There must have been on both sides very concerned ideas about what route they would fly, because obviously you have to assume that there are cameras going off. Were their routes over the United States very carefully monitored?

LINDSTROM: I don't think we were really worried much about what they might do from that point of view. But I think they were more worried about us. One of the things that complicated these negotiations was their insistence on introducing this new all-jet aircraft rather than the old turboprops that they were using on their own runs, which made them look very backward. They were using these on their run to Japan, and the Japanese press would poke fun at them all the time. It really bothered them. So they insisted on waiting until this Ilyushin 62 was ready for flight, and of course, it had never really flown anywhere. So part of my job was to get the data on this, so we would be convinced that it was a safe aircraft to bring to the United States. This was like pulling teeth. I learned later they had never had to do this sort of thing. They just somehow or other put these planes together without too much testing, what speeds they'd do, this, that and the other thing. So I got these detailed instructions from FAA on what kind of documentation they would have to provide us. This is one of the things that slowed up the process a lot because the man who gave me this nicely printed book on the character, and the qualities of the Ilyushin 62, confessed to me, "We've never done this before." In the meanwhile, Washington suspected that the delay was being called by political reasons, and it wasn't political at all. It was just technological reasons. But anyway, once I got this book NASA said could I have an extra copy and he said, "There aren't any more." I sent that in and that quieted Washington down for a while. So finally they scheduled a proving flight. They had the rights to fly to Canada, to Montreal, and they would go to Montreal and there they would be met by a couple FAA pilots, and then they would go down and make a missed approach over Logan airport in Boston, and then a missed approach over Kennedy, and a missed approach over the Philadelphia airport, and then finally down to Dulles airport. They weren't allowed to land at any of these other airports, because the Port Authority in New York, for example, wouldn't even give them the rights until they had gone through all the tests on the ground. Finally we got around this because the federal government owns Dulles airport and they had to accept that. There were some other things that the New York authority required. I didn't go on that flight, but later I talked to one of the FAA pilots and he told me, "You know, if it had been any country other than the Soviet Union that sent these pilots over on this aircraft, I would have sent them back." But he said, "The pilots who he felt were fairly good pilots came over and the only flight paths they had were penciled lines on an old National Geographic map, over these congested areas. That's all they had with them." The pilots though did accept the idea of getting additional training in the United States before they started flying. They could see how terribly congested it was around the New York area. They had nothing like that. But their bosses didn't want to agree to that. Again, Russian pride coming out. Eventually they did agree to it.

Oh, one of the things the FAA pilot told me about the inside of the plane was that this was one of the early models. It was so badly balanced that the attitude could only be kept on the level through big tanks of water which the pilots with very strong arms could shift the water around, two tons of water, and showed how poor the plane was. They cracked up quite a few of those. I think they had improved models later on. I think they still use it even today, but it was four jets in the rear. So this gave me some additional insights into the weaknesses of the great threat to the United States.

Q: How about Ambassador Llewellyn Thompson who was there at that time? How did he operate?

LINDSTROM: He operated in sort of, to use his own terms, more or less in splendid isolation. He kept contrasting what he did during this tour with what he had been able to do much earlier. I can't remember the exact time frame, way before I was there. He was able to have direct contact with Khrushchev in the earlier Khrushchev period, and just be a one man embassy. So when he came back this time, he said several times, "It doesn't really matter because my boys," referring to the counselors of embassy, "now can have contacts that they couldn't have earlier." This was generally speaking true. But he found it rather frustrating, I think, not to be able to do that. I remember when I first met him when I arrived he said, "Now remember, always distinguish between my telegrams and embassy telegrams, if there's a first person in there I want to see it. It's nothing new but he was very much conscious of that.

Q: What about your contacts? Did you find as Minister-Counselor it was a different world?

LINDSTROM: It improved quite a lot, yes. I was doing more things such as that Aeroflot business. But I also got involved in merchant marine affairs. This was a very useful ministry, and I had quite a few contacts over there. This stemmed from the fact that the Soviet's actually goes back to my first tour, had really decided to import grain from the United States for the first time in history. I had to go down to Odessa to look at the port, and see how we could get that grain in because, Odessa had been created back before communism as a grain exporting port, not an importing port, so everything was sort of wrong. I remember negotiating with the Ministry of the Merchant Marine, and they said, "Of course, you don't have most-favored-nation treatment on the shipping rates. You'll have to pay the higher non-most favored rates." And I reported that back to Washington. I didn't know one way or the other. Washington came back and said, "But we do have most-favored-nation treatment. We signed an agreement with them in 1937, and we are pouching you the book on that, the published volume." So I remember taking that into the Ministry of Merchant Marine, and they were really impressed, reading from this. So they had to acknowledge it and I heard later from somebody else in one of the other ministries (this was the talk of the Soviet bureaucrats at that time), that I had come in with that big book of treaties and found something they weren't really aware of. So they backed off. I found that if you did your guest list properly, you could occasionally have working luncheons with Soviets. Not with other nationalities usually, just Americans and Soviets, including someone who was a KGB type. That relaxed them a little bit. So we did a number of luncheons like that. We all had to speak Russian reasonably well to be assigned to Moscow in the first place, and have the luncheons in Russian.

Q: What was the feeling Leonid Brezhnev within the embassy? He was fairly new on the scene as a leader. How did you all evaluate him at that point?

LINDSTROM: He was so much less visible than Khrushchev, that he was sort of a puzzle, I think, to evaluate. This was something they worked very hard on in the political section just using standard Kremlinological techniques. They got more and more little insights into what the man was like and what he was doing. But he had a very different style, of course, from that of Khrushchev.

Q: Kremlinology is trying to figure out whose is doing what to whom, and who is ranking where.

LINDSTROM: Oh, all that sort of thing. Reading the press very, very carefully, looking for any little minor thing. It's a technique that did yield some benefits, not an awful lot.

Q: But in the economic field, you didn't have to worry about that too much, did you?

LINDSTROM: Not too much, no, except again we did our kind of detective work looking to see what they were doing with economic reform, and major plans, major industries and that kind of thing. But the real fine analysis had by necessity to be done back here in Washington in INR or CIA. They had the staff to really go through this stuff.

Q: Did you find that there was any economic analysis coming out of the Soviet press? Or was it pretty much just displaying whatever the bureau or the...

LINDSTROM: I wouldn't really call it analysis in our sense of the word very often. Again, you're just looking for reporting of things that are going on in particular industries, and their annual plan reports, and all of that sort of thing. So there was not too much that we could rely on there.

Q: Did you get any insight into economic training at the universities?

LINDSTROM: I tried to, and I did get a card to go to the Lenin Library, actually something of a privilege, which is quite an experience. The lady librarian there said, "You're free to look at anything here. You go from one room to another." She had a key that would lock the door behind me. Also, I used to call, from time to time, at part of the Academy of Science that dealt with economics and these conversations were occasionally worth reporting. They didn't really open up the office safe or anything like that, but they were allowed some academic freedom.

Q: Economics is such an international science. Were they at all plugged into the economic international role? I mean would John Kenneth Galbraith come over and talk or vice versa.

LINDSTROM: Yes, sometimes somebody like that would come over. Galbraith came over, but not to discuss economics. But we did have other luminaries and they would be invited to go out to Moscow State University to give a lecture on some topic. And the approved people, the advanced people in their university could do that. But in terms of setting up anything that was equivalent to the kind of training we have in this country for economics, no. I understand they have great difficulty in even starting that up now. I read something just recently and they were still using old textbooks from the Soviet era. So there was very little of that going on. Yet there were some high level contacts -- a man who was number two in the powerful State Committee for Science and Technology. He developed and it exists today, a special relationship with the Sloan Institute at MIT. He's a very powerful figure, his name, as you might guess, is a Georgian name. The Georgians would always get along, and he may have been involved in one of these spy scandals earlier, but it didn't hurt him. I always found that the State Committee for Science and Technology was a more useful place to go than the Ministry of Foreign Trade. These were my two prime ministries. But it was very much dominated by the KGB, and the GRU, the top intelligence organizations. But they had very bright people, and they were sufficiently confident so that they could talk to you. They were great door openers. If I wanted to go out to a visit out to the Baltic states, for example, I would see if I couldn't get their help and get me some appointments out there, as well as the Foreign Trade Ministry. But the mission of the State Committee for Science and Technology was, as the name suggests, to acquire foreign technology, by fair means or foul.

Q: Was there much interest in Soviet developments in science from the outside? I mean outside the Soviet Union.

LINDSTROM: Oh, yes, a great deal. In fact while I was there, during my first tour, we sent our first science officer over, Glenn Schweitzer, who has been working the Soviet beat ever since then, not out of the State Department, but out of the Academy of Science, our Academy of Sciences. I saw him just recently. Since then we have always had a science officer there, and they've been able to do some useful reporting. They were a little more independent insofar as security was concerned than other parts of the Soviet regime we dealt with.

RICHARD FUNKHOUSER
Economic Counselor
Moscow (1964-1965)

Ambassador Richard Funkhouser was born and raised in Trenton, New Jersey. He graduated from Princeton University with a Degree in the Liberal Arts. He began working for Standard Oil but eventually moved on to the Foreign Service in 1945. During his active duty he has served in Paris, Syria, Lebanon, Iraq, Moscow, Gabon, Vietnam, and Scotland. This interview was conducted on February 2, 1988 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Well, turning to that, I would like to move to your assignment to Moscow as Economic Counselor in 1961 to 1964.

FUNKHOUSER: I arrived in Moscow September 1, 1961, at four o'clock in the afternoon and departed September 1, 1964 at four PM. Three years to the dot. (Tours of duty at Moscow, a maximum "hardship post," rarely exceeded two years. When asked to serve a third year, I had to promise my wife "not one minute more.")

Q: How did this come about?

FUNKHOUSER: Well, it was sort of a natural progression. I had been in economic and commercial affairs a good part of my career in the Middle East, in Western Europe, in Syria. I also had political experience in Middle Eastern affairs. I had been bombed in Cairo by American Lend-Lease B-17s with American pilots making $1,000 a flight over Cairo flying for the Zionists. I saw the Palestine situation from the beginning. Fifty years later, it is hard to remember how popular the U.S. was throughout the Middle East. Unlike the colonial powers, Americans had established the only Western-type universities in the region with the result that the ruling classes were predominantly pro-American. This changed overnight in 1948 with the partition of Palestine and American sponsorship of the state of Israel over the vehement objections of Secretary of State General Marshall and all other top officials except Truman's Domestic Affairs Advisor, Clark Clifford. I have often wondered whether Truman's decision pushed his candidacy over Dewey over the top several months later? I had been assigned to Palestine and to a dozen Arab countries. And when I was in Syria during the Suez Crisis it became very clear to me, not so much through cynicism I think, but through realism, if you know the Middle East, you know that the United States is quite unable to take and treat Arabs and Israelis evenhandedly.

I got tired seeing my Arab friends come across a crowded room shaking their finger, "Why do you take these positions," knowing what they were going to say. I was sympathetic to their point of view to an extent, but nevertheless was reluctant to get in the middle of an ancient fight between two "brothers." I learned on the Iraq, Syria and Lebanon Desk that lesson when I invited the top Arab whom I knew in Washington to meet with the Special Advisor to the Secretary, the top representative of the Jewish point of view in Washington. I'll never forget it. I drove up in a little Topolino, which was a cheap Italian car which you could pick up and the sort of convertible that you put the top back with one hand. Up drove Kayali, the military attache from the Syrian embassy...he was very bright and had very good connections...in a big blue, I think it was, big blue convertible Cadillac. He was followed by the representative in the State Department on Jewish affairs in a big white Cadillac convertible. It was hard to tell them apart. They looked very, very similar and swarthy. They both had a certain weight. Both were very, very bright. And we went up to Kayali's apartment. And within five minutes of the conversation, and here I was trying to get the point of view from both sides, it became very evident to me they liked each other, they knew everything about the other's business. They were fun to be around. They enjoyed each other's company. I thought to myself, "Why in heaven's name are you, Dick Funkhouser, and/or the United States, trying to get between these two?" And I resolved that that was an unresolvable question for the United States Government. I guess it was cowardly, but I wanted no further part of Middle Eastern Affairs, because I thought it was and would be a disaster. I later prepared a "Doomsday Scenario" along the lines of Nevil Shute's "On the Beach" in which nuclear disaster starts in the Middle East. I visualized unlimited U.S. political/financial/military/media support for Israel driving the Arabs first to despair, next to terrorism, then to oil blockade, then to war (non-nuclear).

Current Middle East and other press reports asserting that Secretary of State Albright has stacked her Middle East staff with Jewish officers, that she believes power exists to be used, that she plans to extend NATO eastwards to Israel might rekindle this scenario, however off my timetable. Equally off in timing was my last message to the Department January 30, 1976 on retirement in which my “swan song” depicted the Middle East as the foremost, long-term threat to U.S. security because of our blank-check for Israel under all Congresses and Presidents (except Eisenhower). I concluded irreverently, “Holy Christ...what would He think as a Jew, prophet or Son of God to return home?” I was reminded of how we scoffed at the outlandish statement of our UN Ambassador, Warren Austin, during the UN debates on Palestine in 1948, “Why can’t the Arabs and Jews act like good Christians?!” Fifty years later, this possibility of the Golden Rule replacing “an eye for an eye” (or rather “10 eyes for an eye”) seems even more remote.

And so, I tried to get out. When I got assigned to the National War College, I did my thesis on what I knew, which was the Middle East, and what I hoped to know, which was its border problems with the Soviet Union. I studied Russian in the early morning FSI [Foreign Service Institute] classes and I did my thesis on the historical establishment of the land boundaries between Russia and Turkey, Afghanistan, Persia.

Q: So you saw your career going in one direction, you made a very conscious effort to turn it around.

FUNKHOUSER: I did indeed. To move into an area that I wanted to be in. It’s not unique. Many officers want to leave the Third World, whether Africa or South America or the Middle East, and try to get into countries that really are closer to Western civilization, where most families basically prefer to be.

Q: When you went to Moscow as Economic Counselor, again we’re talking about 1961 to 1964, what were your main tasks? This was the beginning of the Kennedy Administration, obviously a time of testing and strain and all. But as Economic Counselor, what were your jobs?

FUNKHOUSER: Well, the Economic Counselor in Moscow has on his staff various experts: on nuclear energy, on agriculture. One of my major jobs there was to work on budgetary problems, particularly those that might indicate where the Soviets were spending their money, given all of the vast difficulties of figuring out anything significant from what the Soviets published, such as the progress on the Five Year Plan. Certainly nothing was more important to the Embassy or Washington than to try to analyze how the Soviets were doing when they put out their progress report on how they were fulfilling their Five Year Plan. Whether they were putting more money into, as Khrushchev did, into agriculture....he plowed up the virgin lands, for example. We, through our very expert agricultural attaches, would go wherever we were allowed to go, look at the crops and see whether the harvest would be such as to support what the Soviets were claiming.

Q: This was quite a gamble, wasn’t it, on Khrushchev’s part?

FUNKHOUSER: Oh, it was a gamble, and it helped seal his doom. It was a disaster. He plowed up the virgin lands. You know he went to Iowa, saw our corn there and thought that maybe because it was flat, the virgin lands of Kazakhstan might have had the same fertility and the same soil that we do in the West. But it wasn’t that way. The topsoil was far thinner. And the virgin fields blew into the Caspian when he plowed it up, like plowing up the wild grass on a sand dune. But we followed that closely, and this was important from an economic standpoint to the United States because we like to sell them vast quantities of wheat. And so a very key part of what we did was in that field, and I would say we totally missed drawing the right conclusion.

One of the things I learned as Economic Counselor there was the extent to which the Soviet society and government can surprise the West. Even with satellite pictures you can't tell what amount of grain the Soviets have in their storage bins. We went into a negotiation with the Soviets, and so did the Canadians, on wheat in 1964. (cf. New York Times, front page 3/3/64.) We knew the harvest was bad. That was evident from reading between the lines in Pravda and grain journals, agricultural journals, and from what they would allow us to see.

But we were totally startled to find out when the negotiations started that the Soviets wanted a billion dollars worth of grain. This was the world's largest grain deal ever proposed, and we were totally taken by surprise. Why? Was the Foreign Service not doing its job? No. The problem was that we didn't know that Russia had no reserves. That was obviously a very strategic and military secret, which we did not know. We should have known more back in Washington. If the Agency, if State, or if Commerce had been smarter in those days, they would have noted that the Soviets were chartering up tankers two weeks before the negotiations started. They chartered all of the grain tankers that they could, and this should have been noted and given us a hint. It would have had great importance to figure out how much money the Soviets were going to put on the table. And so this was a very personal lesson in the ability of another society to totally surprise us.

During my tour in Moscow, the Soviet ability to surprise the world was demonstrated three times: 1) this billion-dollar wheat deal, 2) missiles in Cuba and 3) the overnight ouster of Khrushchev, which no diplomat or correspondent there claimed to have expected. In trouble, yes, but to wake up and find him gone peacefully, never. However, perhaps even more surprising in my diplomatic experience was not the acts of secret enemy societies but of our allies, i.e., Suez, where our closest allies, the British, French and Israelis, attacked Egypt without our foreknowledge. I have never understood how our intelligence services could have failed to uncover this plot or, if they did, to inform the President! As is known, he was infuriated, particularly since the Soviets picked the occasion to invade Hungary, and he forced our allies (and Zionists at home and abroad) to backtrack, quite a feat.

Q: Well now, this is speaking within our own society and the bureaucracy, what you were doing, the analyzing of the Five Year Plan is exactly the sort of thing that the CIA is supposed to do, too.

FUNKHOUSER: Oh, yes. We worked very closely together.

Q: Was this a cooperative effort, or were they doing on their side, while you were doing it on yours? Or did you have a feeling of real cooperation there?

FUNKHOUSER: I had great respect their economic cadre, I guess the CIA calls it, and the economic and financial experts in the CIA. I had to be briefed before I went to the Soviet Union. We would get from the Agency a list of non-classified questions which they considered any intelligent American business man or diplomat should try to get answers to. And they're basically pretty simple. What is the grain harvest? What are the papers saying? What are their reserves? which we never could answer. And I found that they relied heavily on us. We had covert CIA people from their Directorate of Operations in the Embassy, but I had no working relationship with them. I worked very closely with the agents (Directorate of Intelligence) on economic subjects, because none of it basically was covert. It was all open. We were all trying to get to the same point.

The extent of cooperation back in the Department, I think, was cooperative, but bureaucratically jealous.

Q: A certain amount of competitiveness.

FUNKHOUSER: Basically, State had one person in Soviet Affairs that I reported to on economic policy. In fact, he was an older gentleman, not as old as I am now, but he was very relaxed, and he did very, very little. Almost all the economic reporting and the economic intelligence on the Soviet Union in 1961 to 1964 was, I would say, 95% done by the Agency overtly. I guess almost all overtly, because you just can't be very covert in the economic area.

In-house secrecy can, of course, be essential when it comes to covert CIA operations in an Embassy. "Need to know" rules. Two such operations stand out in my personal experience. One, the Penkovsky affair in Moscow (described later) and two, the U.S.-UK plot to overthrow the pro-Soviet President of Syria in 1956. In neither case was I "in the loop" although serving as Counselor of Embassy at the time. The Damascus plot was exposed to me inadvertently by ineptitude of the plotters, e.g., the CIA station chief was stone-deaf and could be heard inside or outside the Embassy without bugging devices. To me, the most bizarre twist in this foiled plot was that the date chosen for our plot was the identical day our allies picked to invade the Suez Canal! I've always wondered if they could have pulled a historic "scam" by diverting us from Suez and implicating us at the same time in their Middle East plot to overthrow Nasser and his allies.

So I was their man in Moscow, I would say, and they were my backers in Washington, because the State Department basically deferred to the Agency on agricultural and economic policy. Not policy so much, but getting the facts. So I'd say we worked extremely closely. That doesn't mean we didn't have knock-down, drag-out fights. In my amateurism, I had chosen to attempt an analysis of the direction of the Soviet military budget and policy by dissecting the speeches, the written word, the top statements made by Khrushchev and others at key occasions, and note when adjectives changed in such statements as "We are giving the 'top' priority to development of higher standard of living for Soviet citizens, including more money into consumer goods and into agriculture and food." And then you'd see, "We are giving 'high' priority to the development of consumer goods and agricultural reserves."

I can't really repeat the language now, but I did a very provocative report on the military trend, which indicated in 1962 that, judged on an economic basis only, all of the adjectives and all of the nuances which I in the Economic Section could find were tilting towards heavy industry and towards strengthening the military, compared to whatever existed. The nuances were all moving towards the military.

Tommy Thompson, the Ambassador, fully supported my report. But Boris Klosson, Political Counselor, was upset with an Economic Counselor getting into political reporting.

Q: He was the DCM at this time?

FUNKHOUSER: No, he was my opposite number.

Q: Political Counselor.

FUNKHOUSER: He was Political Counselor, I was Economic Counselor, and Jack McSweeney was DCM. And Tommy Thompson, Ambassador Thompson to me then. We did play poker up to his death, together...thought it was an excellent report and decided we would challenge Washington on the diversion. All the evidence we cited, some of it seemingly trivial, showed the Soviets were tilting increasingly towards the military. The CIA ripped me apart, because they were the experts on budget. And they came back with the most microeconomic analysis that no general Foreign Service officer could possibly match, proving I was wrong. Six months later Cuba took place, and I got some credit for being one of the few that at least got on the record a Soviet military buildup six months before the massive military operation that took place in Cuba.

Another of my major responsibilities, not unrelated to a shift of resources to the military, was the “Big Inch Pipeline” crash project designed to tie both East and West Europe into dependency on Soviet oil while earning scarce hard currency. Over strong objections in certain Western circles, notably France, the West German Economic Counselor and I were successful in persuading the necessary authorities to cancel the West German Mannesmann steel plant contract to roll 36 inch pipe for the Soviets. Khrushchev was of course apoplectic; he claimed that the Soviets could roll their own 36 inch pipe, a rarity at the time for steel mills. He had boasted that he was going to “bury” us. In the end, the line was delayed an indeterminate time and completed only to the East German border. What this disruption of the Soviet economy and its long-term plans contributed to the eventual Soviet collapse is for those with access to Soviet archives to determine.

Q: The Cuban missile crisis. That was October of 1962. How did this play for you in the Embassy in Moscow?

FUNKHOUSER: Well, it was, as you know, startling. When the crisis broke one of the things that impressed me, as in the Middle East, mobs formed, so called. Crowds formed. But unlike the Middle East nobody got stoned, as an American would during the Suez crisis.

The so-called mobs and demonstrators in Moscow would stop when the red traffic light came on! They’d stop!

Q: We used to call them “rent-a-mobs” in Yugoslavia.

FUNKHOUSER: Oh, did you? You know exactly what I’m talking about. But to see any demonstration in the Soviet Union was really new to everyone. We were all told not to provoke the crowd. Just board up the windows at the Tchaikovsky Boulevard Embassy. Some of us lived there. Not to appear in the windows, which would be mob-inciting, as it certainly would in any underdeveloped country. Of course, we peeked out, and I remember, and this is illustrative of the question you asked. Here's this great demonstration. A few ink bottles thrown at the Embassy. The police were down with the demonstrators, but not doing anything. And one of the New York Times correspondents, Ted Shabad, we noted leaving, which we were forbidden to do, but you can't control the press. Leaving the embassy compound, going out into the mob, the demonstrators.

Well, we wondered what would happen. And a circle formed around him, and the police were near him. When he came back, we asked. Nothing apparently happened, except that's what happened. They all wanted to know what the news was. They were scared to death that there might be trouble--really worried. And there's no doubt that the worse the crisis got, the Soviets in every conceivable way, the Soviet people--we had an artistic group there, and they weren't all that good--but they got so many ovations during this period that they had to move the Soviets out of the theater. We took it as an expression of "We don't want any fight, bad relations, particularly a war with the United States." It was quite clear that the people were demonstrating that they didn't want any part of confrontation with the U.S. That must have influenced Khrushchev, as well as the bombers we sent towards Soviet Union.

Q: Did the Russian bureaucracy during this period shut down on you?

FUNKHOUSER: No, no. In no way. No way. I dealt with Gherman Gvishiani, who was the Deputy Minister for Scientific and Technical Research, the organization that basically is charged with stealing our commercial secrets. Oleg Penkovsky, our famous spy who tipped us off on missiles in Cuba, was one of my principal overt contacts in his capacity as Protocol Officer of Gherman Gvishiani's Committee for Scientific and Technical Research. But until shortly before he was caught, tortured and shot, I was kept in the dark about his spy role. I found him rather pompous and gave little deference to him, undoubtedly to his surprise and annoyance. Only when the DCM Jack McSweeney wrote out on a piece of paper (to maintain mandatory audio-security in the Embassy) asking whether I had invited Penkovsky with other Committee officials to my periodic "movie night" in my Embassy apartment did I suspect his vital role. "Need to know" had been successfully followed. I learned later that it was in my bathroom that he was tipped off that the KGB was closing in on him and that he had sent his last fortunately erroneous warning to the USG that the Soviets were to launch their nukes! Ironically, I was the temporarily ranking officer in the Embassy when called to the Foreign Office to receive the official Soviet protest of U.S. spying. (See New York Times 12/26/62 front page.) But he was a very powerful man, son-in-law of Central Committee member Kosygin, and I had no trouble doing my work. It was quite the opposite.

The officials were like the French during times when DeGaulle was being very difficult with the Americans, and I became Political Counselor in Paris. They showed great concern that they might be talking to an American during the critical periods, but never was the door closed to me in Paris or Moscow during those times. It was obvious that they wanted no part of the government policy.

Q: Well, you served under two of our major Russian Sovietologists, Tommy Thompson and Foy

Kohler.

FUNKHOUSER: Three really. Chip Bohlen in Paris.

Q: Bohlen in Paris. I'll come to him later.

FUNKHOUSER: I was lucky...

Q: I wonder, could you compare, contrast their operating styles?

FUNKHOUSER: Well, the three of them were totally different, I would say. Tommy Thompson was very reserved. He wasn't a hail-fellow-well-met, and he was very precise. He was the most, I would say, attentive to details. After all, he negotiated the only withdrawal known at that time, or maybe since, withdrawal of Soviet troops from a foreign country.

Q: Iran?

FUNKHOUSER: No, in Vienna. He did the Vienna negotiation. He had seen it all. He had dealt with the Soviets, and no one of the three, I think, had his experience in negotiating with the Soviet Union, so nothing really interested him more than building up an accurate file on information that could have policy considerations for the United States more than the other two, I would dare say, although I'd hate to have to have Foy Kohler hear me say that. All of them were top flight diplomats. But you asked about style. Tommy Thompson was 'do the work, forget the fun and games,' although he had two children and was a very fine parent. Sent one of them to a Russian public school together with my son. But a very serious, cold externally, warm at heart, but a man who ran a very precise staff meeting. He would understate what he wanted, and a few people who thought that they had a special relationship with Thompson, such as Boris Klosson, would go see movies in Thompson's flat and really was a favorite of the Ambassador socially, could overestimate the value of friendship over professional performance. I recall one staff meeting where I had heard the Ambassador ask Boris softly, "I would like a report at earliest possible date on this subject." And Boris had either forgotten it or didn't do it, and he'll never forget it, because the Ambassador aimed a reprimand at him which froze the entire staff meeting. I learned a lesson: "If the Ambassador ever asks for anything, and he didn't often, but by God drop everything, get at it and get back to him as fast as you possibly can." That's the way he operated. He only said it once, but you'd better pay attention. Style again.

Foy Kohler, quite the opposite. Delightful, showed up at all the American parties, which Thompson would rarely do. Was an easier man to get along with.

After all, we were under pressure in the Soviet Union; the families, the wives. We all lived together and worked together, as you know from Yugoslavia, only it was much, much worse. We couldn't open our windows in the offices; we couldn't even type on a typewriter; we had to write everything out in longhand. Security was heavy on us. Moscow was a crucible, which was very hard on the wives particularly. Some took to drink. There would be a morning drinking clutch. Martinis at 11 o'clock. Some became alcoholics. Mental distress from living that closely together, Americans don't do it like Russians, and a man like Foy Kohler, who had no children of his own, nevertheless he and his wife both spent an awful lot of time trying to build a family atmosphere in the Embassy, with great success. He obviously was extremely good at everything he did.

The Soviets, I think, had the greatest respect for Thompson of the three. I didn't know about Chip Bohlen in Moscow. But Bohlen spoke by far best the Russian and could really do business in Russian, which neither Thompson nor Kohler, although they were "three/three" in Russian, could. One revealing difference between Bohlen and Thompson was exposed in poker in which they both reveled. Tommy, the Scot, made far more money by judicious conservatism; Chip handled his chips more freely...always wanted to see the last card, a known fatality in the game. Both played for stakes in which a thousand dollars could be won or lost...I always thought it was a security risk in Moscow to open the game to anyone in the Embassy, including low-paid code clerks!

Q: "Three/three" refers to the speaking/reading level. Five speaking, five reading is the top or bilingual level.

FUNKHOUSER: So they were so-called "fluent." No one in the Moscow Embassy was allowed to go unless he spent one year in a room with a native speaker getting to the three/three level. There are exceptions. For guys who couldn't make it the U.S. government still paid for them to have private tutoring for one year; even a "two/two," which my deputy was, will be sent to Moscow after his year of language training. But Bohlen was by far the best Russian speaker. He started off his career in Russian school in Paris.

MARSHALL BREMENT
Political Officer
Moscow (1964-1966)

Political Counselor
Moscow (1974-1976)

Soviet Desk, National Security Council, White House
Washington, DC (1978-1980)

Ambassador Marshall Brement was born in New York in 1932. He received a bachelor's degree from Brooklyn College and a master's degree from the University of Maryland. He served in the U.S. Air Force from 1952-1955. Ambassador Brement's career in the Foreign Service included positions in Hong Kong, Moscow, Singapore, Djakarta, and Saigon, and an ambassadorship to Iceland. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on April 11, 1990.

Q: Now because we had this other interview which covers some of the transitional bridges, lets move to a completely different subject and this is going to Moscow, you were there from '64 to '66? What were you doing while you were there?

BREMENT: I was Second Secretary in the Political Section and I had the Far-eastern job. I was covering Soviet relations with all the countries from Australia through India, which at that time was sort of the premier job in the political section because I had Sino-Soviet relations, I had the Vietnam war, a coup in Indonesia, I had the Indo- Pakistan war where Kosygin was the mediator. Soviet-Japanese relations were always interesting. So 60-70% of the cables written in the political section were done by me.

Q: You had this almost unique ability to look, was there a difference between the Soviet hand and the China hand? I'm talking about in the American Foreign Service. Did you see any differences?

BREMENT: Yes, I think so, definitely. The China hand tended to be quite enamored of China and Chinese civilization. He certainly liked the comfort of it, the food. The Chinese are easy to deal with. Chinese servants, if you have good ones, are wonderful. So when you were in the China milieu you were a gentleman and you lived a pretty good life, sort of a happy life anyway, at least in Hong Kong and Taiwan or anywhere in Southeast Asia. And certainly it is true in Peking. I know several people who have served in Peking and Moscow both. And there is no question that they liked Peking better, even though it is quite a dusty place.

You have to differentiate between those people who came to the Soviet Union from a West European background and those who came from other backgrounds. Those who came from a West European background, and their wives, certainly never got over a sort of culture shock -- the grimness, the dour sort of nature of the Russians which is only on the surface, but it is there. If you get into an elevator with a bunch of Russians they will all be stone-faced, whereas we tend to smile at strangers. It is a cultural thing. But the inconveniences of life, the terrible climate, all these things wear on people, and of course the microphones everywhere have a big effect. Somehow they don't seem to have as big an effect in China, I don't know why. Microphones are there too, but in the Soviet Union it really got to a lot of people.

If psychologically you are the kind of person who would find it very difficult having a microphone in your bedroom, then you found life in the Soviet Union very difficult indeed. So when you finally crossed the border into Finland or Poland or wherever you went it was like a great weight coming off your shoulders. I never particularly felt that. I enjoyed Moscow because professionally it was really what it was all about. I was working for the State Department and that was what the State Department was focusing on. I was happy there in that sense and also culturally. Moscow was a world class city if you like music and theater. They had their own style, but when it was good it was certainly as good as anybody. It was a great cosmopolitan center, with a genuine culture which was fascinating. It could be oppressive. I think it was important to get out of Moscow. But I think it is important to get out of anyplace occasionally.

Q: The prime focus of your work was obviously on the Sino-Soviet relationship at that point. How did you see it? You are looking at it from absolutely the other side of the moon. Were the Soviets sort of "lovers rebuffed?" or how were you seeing that they were reacting to this? Did they understand this or were they trying to do anything about it?

BREMENT: The Soviets understood it. I was there for the full show. Kosygin, who was really the number one at that point, did try to repair relations with China. And I think the Soviets would have gone much further if the Chinese had been interested. But the Chinese were really not interested in anything less than a capitulation. And the Soviets, for perfectly good reasons from their point of view, really couldn't capitulate to China without giving up their leadership of the world communist movement, which at that point was inconceivable to them. These were all people who came to the forefront under Stalin and very much felt that one of the reasons that Khrushchev had to go was because he handled things so badly diplomatically in the international sphere and also in the international communist movement. They were just about to have a conference in Bucharest in December '64 where the international communist movement was about to split apart. By removing Khrushchev and postponing that convergence and by taking what they called a "principled" position, which meant support for Vietnam among other things, they reasserted themselves within the communist movement. The communist movement was coming apart. You had the Chinese communists on the left and the Euro-communists on the right, along with the Yugoslavs. The Soviets felt this pressure and felt they had to do something about it and the way to go about it was to adopt a sensible, reasonable, principled policy that would appeal to most communist parties and would move the Chinese way out to the fringe, which they did.

Q: Were the Soviets as you watched in the international sphere sort of dumping on the Chinese?

BREMENT: Yes, they were using every opportunity to dump on the Chinese, and their line essentially was, "look, these guys are talking this revolutionary line but they really aren't acting that way." Here we are really supporting the Vietnamese; we want to send more goods, ship more arms and so on, but they won't even let us send things to Vietnam across China. It is defeating the Vietnamese war effort. We, the Soviets are faithful to our international obligations. The Chinese talk a good game but they really don't do anything." That is essentially what the Soviets were saying, and I think they did turn the situation around. In only three or four years, only the Asian parties were with the Chinese. This was not a question of the rightness or the wrongness of the line they were propounding, it was just a question of politics.

But it was more than that. It was a situation where the Soviets benefited enormously -- and had no reason at all to help us extract ourselves from Vietnam. We were not giving them any reason to change their policy or to try to influence the Vietnamese to change their policy, because we were saying right from the start, "this is not between us, we don't have any quarrel with you," as though the Soviets had nothing to do with it. But of course it was Soviet weaponry that was being used by the Vietnamese to kill Americans. It was Soviet oil that was being used to drive the weapons. And we were just ignoring that minor fact. Indeed, we were offering no pain to the Soviets because of their actions.

Q: Was there any thought of saying, "well if we are going to do this let's blockage the country?"

BREMENT: Indeed, I wrote a letter that Foy Kohler, who was my Ambassador then, saying missions like the Harriman mission don't make any sense, that the Soviets benefit enormously from the Vietnam war and if we want to make them change we have to impose penalties on them for having this war continue. In other words, we have to up the ante. We have to make it dangerous. We have to give them reasons to want this situation to end. If we don't do that, they will not only not help us out of the situation, but they will do everything they can to keep us in the treacle, in a situation that we can't get out of. Amazingly enough we got a letter from Tommy Thompson saying we can't do that because it might push the Soviets and the Chinese back together again, which I found completely extraordinary at that point. This was '65 or '66 and I was following Sino-Soviet affairs and knew that there was nothing the United States could do that could drive the Soviets and the Chinese back together again.

Q: This was the "wish is father to the thought." I'm not sure if that was the right expression, but we saw things, we were going to be helping Vietnam, and no matter what we do...we were always worried that something else would happen that would deter us.

BREMENT: That's right. It was very difficult for us to see the real chasms because maybe we were too hung up on the ideology. We kept thinking of Communism as a world movement, and it was hard to see that you could have two major communist powers split without them coming back together at some point. That certainly was the perception. And then the perception at home was that you could have guns and butter at the same time. You could fight a war, keep it a moderate war and at the same time have a good society, or "Great Society," I should say, and all that implied. I remember I was at Stanford after I left Moscow. I remember Paul Kreisberg coming through. He was one of the State Department speakers and I heard him saying that. I had grave doubts at that point myself as to whether we could have guns and butter, since I was living through the cultural revolution in California at the time. I think the answer was, that we couldn't. You can't fight a war sort of half-way. If it's a real war, you are paying heavily for that war. If you are fighting against someone who is giving a total effort and you are giving a partial effort, you are not going to prevail.

Q: Moving on to another question, how did you see the reaction of the Soviets to the Indonesian coup in 1965 when Suharto moved Sukarno out, and took care of the Communists? It was a peculiar thing in that it would stick on doing something to Chinese Communists, but here was a really major nation although very often underrated. Were the Soviets sort of chuckling at this? How did they feel about it?

BREMENT: They very much low-keyed the situation. They said, we are out of there and this doesn't have very much to do with us. I think that a certain amount of satisfaction could be gleaned. Of course they had been kicked out by Sukarno, and there was very much of a Chinese involvement in the killing of the Indonesian general, which led to a counter-coup. So I think that quiet satisfaction is how one would characterize Moscow's reaction. But it didn't get much play in the Soviet press.

Q: Speaking about this, how did you deal with the Soviets? Were you able to talk to Soviet officials, or others, or was it pretty much a press operation?

BREMENT: In those days you were very restricted in terms of your dealing with Soviets. Indeed, it was possible to establish friendly relations with Soviets but only with Soviets who had their tickets punched to do that sort of thing. So I did have a couple of friends who were either in the Institutes, or...one was a newspaper man of sorts. He died shortly thereafter. He was quite frank, or moderately frank, but always within certain limitations. So you mainly got your impressions from the press, from talking to other people in the foreign community. At that point, Moscow was the only place where I had been where the diplomatic community was very useful. In every other place I had been, the American embassy was a useful tool for other people. But really you didn't get too much out of the other diplomats. You had Asian diplomats there to talk with if you were covering Asia. You had the Indians there who were really quite close to the Soviets and very smart diplomats. They were very worthwhile talking to about the whole range of affairs. You had Australians.

When I was there -- before the six day war -- you had Israelis who were excellent, because they were natives to the Soviet Union. They would be like you or me being a diplomat in Washington. You have a certain sense of the country that you can't get otherwise. Of course, a certain amount of information came through normal diplomatic intercourse with the Soviets, but since I was covering third country things, I didn't have that much of it in my first tour. I had some of it when the Ambassador would go in to talk about Vietnam, or he'd talk to some of the other Ambassadors. I would go along with him about Asian matters.

You were spending your full time focusing on it, which was of course a wonderful way to get the mind together. So you were picking up a lot by osmosis. All your antennae were out to try to get it, but it was not so much directly retrieved from the Soviets. The big difference between my first tour in Moscow and my second, separated by eight years, was that in the second tour there were dissidents, so you could actually talk to Soviets who were anti-regime, which you couldn't do at all the first time.

Q: You were there during the fall of the Khrushchev, how did you and the others in the Embassy view the fall of Khrushchev, and Kosygin coming in? Was this a good thing for us or a bad thing? How did we feel about it?

BREMENT: Well, I remember, it was interesting, on October 15th we had a meeting at the Embassy. Mac Toon, who was the Political Counselor, had come in that night and done a preliminary cable saying why Khrushchev fell. And everyone of the people at the meeting who were specializing in anything at the embassy came up with their own reasons for his fall. The Agricultural Attaché probably had it better than anybody else, it was because Khrushchev was trying to split the party into agricultural and industrial branches, which really got at some very deep seated power positions of people. But of course I said it was because the international communist movement was heading for an irrevocable split, with the Chinese becoming more prominent. The economists said things were terrible in the economy. So everybody had his own reasons and they added up to the fact that Khrushchev had alienated all the Soviet power bases.

We did not see it as particularly good or bad for the United States. I think in retrospect, Khrushchev comes out as much more a positive individual and more of a positive force than we felt at the time. Most people thought of him in terms of the Cuban missile crisis, the Berlin crises. We thought of this blusterer who kept making crises and kept bringing us trouble and who indeed talked in a menacing way about Soviet military capabilities...sometimes he talked one way and sometimes the other. But sometimes he talked a very tough line, and would threaten war. So I don't think anybody thought we were losing much when they got rid of Khrushchev.

In retrospect I think we missed a lot. We missed a lot in 1955 I think, we missed opportunities with Khrushchev, and that is too bad, too bad that we missed them. I think we just weren't looking. And we didn't have a strategy or a receptivity to change in the Soviet Union. So much depends on the mental construct that you bring to a situation, even before you get into it. I think we had this idea of a Stalinist country and Khrushchev was the new Stalin in a different way. And although he was doing certain things that were quite revolutionary, we didn't want to take advantage of them because they were at variance with our preconceptions.

Q: I saw pictures of him standing behind Stalin, he was one of the crew. I think this is one of the things, we hope as we go through this oral history, we go back and see how we looked at things at the time.

BREMENT: There's certainly a difference in my own view. I would certainly have subscribed to the view that Khrushchev was a very dangerous man. And therefore when he fell, it was very interesting, it was of course the first coup d'état in communist history, but it was not really seen as being of great benefit and as not much difference for the United States.

Q: No matter what it was it was basically really a monolith which had its own ideology which was hostile to us and that was that.

BREMENT: Yes, exactly. He was the guy who exploded the largest nuclear bomb ever done by man, the one who started the rocket forces, who was going to threaten us with intercontinental ballistic missiles. All that. But I think clearly in retrospect he was also someone with whom we could have come to agreements that would have been beneficial to us and beneficial to the world.

Q: I suppose one of the things I am getting at is as diplomats, sometimes, I think there is a tendency to look for somebody who is trying to be consistent. Even if they're opposed to us at least you know where they stand. Khrushchev seemed to be all over the place and this can sometimes be a bit disturbing to somebody with a diplomatic frame of mind. I think this may have played a role in this.

BREMENT: Yes, I think that is right. He was an innovator and we bureaucrats and diplomats don't much like innovation. We like somebody who is predictable. He was a little too unpredictable. It is not just a bureaucratic prejudice. His style was too unpredictable for us to do business with.

Q: And this was part of the cause of his downfall with his own bureaucracy.

BREMENT: Absolutely, they couldn't get a reading on him and that's why they couldn't function within their own system of central planning. Each member of the Politburo from his own bureaucratic perspective wanted to get rid of Khrushchev. That is why they could come together with only one dissenting vote, and that was Mikoyan, who only had all the force of foreign trade. There was no power there. I think there is something about the Foreign Service perspective that probably makes it not a useful tool for policy.

Q: We are in fast moving events sometimes.

BREMENT: Yes.

Q: On this, you had two Ambassadors who are quite well known. Foy Kohler and Walter Stoessel. Could you characterize how you saw them and how they operated and how you felt their effectiveness was?

BREMENT: Stoessel was of course DCM in Moscow the first time I was there, when Kohler was the Ambassador and he was instrumental in bringing me to Moscow to become Political Counselor, thereby yanking me out of Saigon after only thirteen months there.

Q: Let's talk about Foy Kohler now and we will talk about Stoessel later.

BREMENT: O.K., Kohler was a quiet, effective good Ambassador. He was highly skeptical of the Soviets, as well he should have been at that particular point. My impression (and I have never really talked to him about this) was that he felt that he was there at a period when nothing much could be done to move the relationship forward, and that he was holding the fort, so to speak, and carrying out our policy. But we were dealing with an essentially hostile power at a time when relations were getting worse, because the Soviets saw a need for both internal and external orthodoxy. And there wasn't much that could be done in terms of negotiating anything or coming to any agreements that would improve the relationship.

Q: One final thing here, two things, one that was in your bailiwick was the Japanese- Soviet relationship.

BREMENT: Well, as I saw it at that time and since, it is a real conundrum. The benefits to the Soviets of making a positive gesture to Japan are obvious. Yet they have refused to make one for 40 years. First of all, I would say about Brezhnev that he really was racially prejudiced against the Orientals. That's one thing that came out clearly in summit meetings with him. And this was true against both the Japanese and the Chinese. Indeed, during several summit meetings he went off on the Chinese and just went on and on about their iniquity and about the common threat they pose to both of us. Clearly, it was deeper than just policy differences. The Russians also have a bad feeling about the Japanese, a feeling, by the way, that is returned by the Japanese. And they haven't forgotten the Russo-Japanese War. They see themselves as quite vulnerable in East Asia. They see the Japanese as an ultimate threat. Even in the Gorbachev period, it's hard to understand why they simply don't make some kind of move in terms of the Northern Islands, the so-called "northern territories." It is such an obvious ploy. You say, "Look, we'd give you back the northern territories, but we can't because you've got the Seventh Fleet in Yokosuka and we don't want the waters around those islands to be used as passages for warships and for submarines to go into the Bering Sea and the Sea of Japan. If you demilitarize them and if you will allow us to put observers on them to monitor what ships are going in, you can have those islands back."

It seems like such an obvious solution. It's been obvious for years, but I'll never forget my surprise that Brezhnev in '78 actually fortified those islands and put ten thousand people on them for no reason at all, except probably his Far East TVD commander thought it was a good idea. But that doesn't mean he has got to do it. So, you really run into a sort of dead-end here, in that there is no expert on the Soviet Union or Japan or on Soviet-Japanese relations who can really come up with a good theory as to why the Soviets haven't done that except that they don't like and don't trust the Japanese. They still remember and, in fact, they are just commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of the battle of Khalkin Gol which the Japanese call Nomonhan, which took place in August of 1939 as the Soviets were negotiating the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact. At the same time, the same day, a major pitched battle was going on the Mongolian-Manchurian border where the Soviets claimed they killed 60,000 Japanese and only lost 18,000 Soviets and where the Japanese suffered a truly major defeat. This was Marshal Zhukov's first great battle. It was a classic double envelopment of the Japanese, where he simply destroyed the Sixth Japanese Army. And the Soviets remember that. They are publishing all sorts of books about it. And Japan is simply not seen as a potential economic savior which it could be. The Soviets also are very uncomfortable that the Japanese have passed them in gross national product.

Q: One last thing on the Soviet side, right now as we are talking, really in the last year, 1989-90, the Soviet Union really is an empire. We used to say it in the Foreign Service as sort of lip-service, but we used to see it as a really unified whole. How were we seeing that, you were in the Soviet Union, I mean all these disparate nationalities, did you see this thing as having potential weakness or was this just sort of talk?

BREMENT: I think most of us mirrored the actual Soviet view of the problem, and that was that it wasn't much of a problem. And although you can say that we were obviously wrong, because of the latest developments, I am not sure that we were. Because the problem was then under control. It is Gorbachev who has allowed it to get out of control. I mean, there was no question about the unhappiness of some of the nationalities. But the fact was that they were effectively repressed. You didn't have to be a very acute or astute political observer to take a trip to the Baltic Republics and discover an awful lot of anti-Russian feeling. In fact, I remember I arrived in Tallinn at 5:00 a.m. one morning at the train station in January and it was at least 40 below, with the wind blowing hard. I got out on the platform and looked around hopefully for someone to meet me and, of course, there wasn't anyone. And there was a line for cabs across the platform with about 40 or 50 people lined up. So I went up to the train master in a little booth there and I said to him, I want to find a hotel. I had the name of the hotel I was going to and he said, rather he gestured to me, I don't understand you, what are you saying. I was talking Russian, of course. And then I said to him, "I am from the American Embassy and I was hoping there would be a car to meet me. But there isn't and I want to find the hotel.

Then he answered me in perfect Russian, saying the hotel is only fifty yards up the road. You can walk up there. It is very easy." This was in the sixties. Of course there was enormous anti-Russian feeling in the Baltics and much less anywhere else that you went. You found some to a certain extent. But that is only natural in any multi-national, multi-ethnic state. I mean you find some of that kind of animosity in Chicago, or Minneapolis or wherever you go with large ethnic groups or with people of different races living side by side. If you have this kind of situation you are going to find a certain amount of animosity. The question was never whether there was animosity, but whether it was under control. And it was under control. This was not just some outside observer talking; this was the way the Soviets felt. They felt it was under control, because they had no problems.

Gorbachev's book Perestroika, published in 1987, specifically states that the nationalities problem has been solved. But it obviously wasn't. It was merely concealed under a large KGB rock. The problems really only occur when you lift the rock. Then they are going to occur, sure. But every place outside the Baltics the problems are more inter-ethnic than anti-Russian. Many of those nationalities, like the Armenians, looked on the Russians as essentially their saviors, from the Muslim hordes or the Turks. So it is an Empire and now that the Pandora's box has been opened, it is hard to see how, in fact it will be shut. I think you can say that without question. But were we wrong in our thoughts about it at the time? Was I wrong? I don't think so. At the time I think we were essentially mirroring the view of the people who were there, both the Russians and the nationalities themselves.

Q: And we were reporting as it really was at the time. This is the way it was.

BREMENT: No. It wasn't like the Intifada. Nobody dared to throw a rock or to question authority.

Q: The Intifada being the repression of the Israelis on the Palestinians. Yes, I mean you could have been in Israel and you could have said the Palestinian problem is under control, and not foreseeing the Intifada, because that was the way it was. But it was a little different. The Intifada was going to happen. In the Soviet Union, it didn't have to happen the way it did happen and certainly if you are running a large empire you have to use a certain amount of force, and once you let everybody know you are not going to use force, you are going to have a lot of difficulties.

SAMUEL E. FRY, JR.
Soviet Desk Officer, Bureau of European Affairs
Washington, DC (1964-1966)

Consular Officer
Moscow (1966-1968)

Samuel E. Fry, Jr. was born in New York, New York in 1934. He received a bachelor's degree from Dartmouth College in 1956 and then spent a year as a Dartmouth Fellow at the University of Edinburgh in Scotland. He served in the U.S. Army in Germany in 1958-1959. His career in the Foreign Service included positions in Norway, Finland, Romania, and the Soviet Union.. This interview was conducted on January 26, 1993 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: What were you doing in Soviet Affairs? You were there from October of 1963 to June of 1965.

FRY: The principal activity right at the start had to do with Kennedy's decision to sell grain to the Soviet Union. It has become commonplace in recent years for countries to sell to the Soviet Union. It is hard to remember that this was a terribly controversial decision. This was aiding and abetting the very enemy that you said you were going to fight. It was assisting their economy, which led to "a fat Russian is a happy Russian," "you won't erode communism with people being fed, you will erode communism without any bread," right down to very silly things. The right wing launched a tremendous campaign which had a letter writing element, because of which I spent half my time in responding to Congressional inquiries. One which I remember very clearly: the reason that the Soviet Union is buying the grain is so that it can make alcohol which it can use as primers for a special hand grenade they have invented which will be used against NATO forces. Another: the Soviet Union is taking the grain sacks and putting, instead of USA and the handshake symbol, USSR on them and sending them to other countries. No grain to the Soviet Union was shipped in sacks, it was shipped in things like the sterilized tanker Manhattan and other bulk cargo grain ships, it was off loaded with suction pumps in Odessa, and so forth and so on. We had to answer all this stuff because there were people who really believed it. That was one of the first things.

The other thing was that I had to process, this was my specific job, all the visa requests for any "Soviet businessman" who was coming to the United States or was coming to confer with the Amtorg Trading Company, which was a US corporation. This was a holdover from the pre-Second World War and Second World War Russian Purchasing Agency in New York that had American employees as well as Russian employees. It was considered a hotbed of spying and industrial espionage. So every time a Russian wanted to come over here and said he was coming on business, I had to call up the businesses, make sure of the exact time of the appointment, etc. It was very time consuming; I might be working on three or four at one time and have to make thirty or forty calls for each one. Then at the end of each week the FBI liaison with the State Department would come in and I would give him all the information so that they could surveil these people. Then we had to get the visa approved and I had to write the waiver request, and so on. So that was another element of the work. For each Russian businessman--and plenty of them weren't businessmen, they were obviously a certain level of espionage, but not the Abels and the spies of fame; these were the journeymen, plumbers coming in to see what they could see in the factories--it took a lot of time.

Other things included working on the air traffic arrangement; Pan American and Aeroflot were chosen to have reciprocal flights between the countries. You remember that we had no American planes flying into the Soviet Union directly when I first started working on Soviet affairs. To have a military flight go in to supply the Embassy was a very big deal and it took a very long time to arrange each and every flight. The end of all this work--and I worked on this all the time that I was on the desk; I was in the group that was meeting with the Russians because it had the economic slant, of course, on the freight and passenger revenue--was that the first flight came through when I was consul in Moscow in the fall of 1967 or spring of 1968. I was at the airport collecting the passports from the pilots after the first Pan Am flight came in. We had other agreements that we were working on--I wasn't involved directly but I would sit in and take notes when I was called upon to do it--and one was the first consular agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union. We had Americans in jail, we had Americans who had been arrested for manslaughter, accidents, and so on, without the benefit of a consular agreement. There was no access to prisoners unless the Soviets allowed it. I later benefited from the consular agreement during my time in Moscow; I processed five arrests of Americans, attended trials, hired lawyers for them. I was benefiting at that time at least from the first muscle-flexing of the agreement. Later the agreement was far more effective when the bugs were worked out.

Q: Back to your time when you were on the Soviet desk. What was your impression of the Soviet officials that you had to deal with?

FRY: I dealt with very few Soviet officials directly, except for some junior officers in the Soviet Embassy whom I later found out were usually of the intelligence variety. I met them mainly socially through the encouraging of all junior officers of Embassies to join our International Junior Foreign Service Officers Club in the State Department.

Q: This was a period of, what was it called--JFSOC? This was very much a part of the Kennedy mystique--youth is important. The young Foreign Service Officers had a lot of clout at that time.

FRY: We were encouraged to socialize with other Embassies, but of course the Russians were very suspicious of this as were the Eastern Europeans. We also sponsored and raised money for and did all the administrative work for the Junior Foreign Service Officers' Fourth of July reception which was popular for many years before the eighth floor was rebuilt. We had over a thousand people, including Lyndon Johnson's daughters, two years in a row, who would come to see the fireworks from the balcony of the State Department. I met a couple of Russians that way. Then I did meet some Russians because I had to deal on visa matters and I sometimes had to clarify something about the businessmen who were coming. And so in 1964 and 1965, when I was in Russian language training, I was invited to the Embassy on Soviet National Day. I knew enough people there to be invited. There was very little socializing except in a formal setting. Almost none that I know of. I asked a Russian diplomat to come to a friend's house to watch a Muhammad Ali fight in the mid-'60s and he very much wanted to come because there would be a lot of junior diplomats there, but in the end he didn't come.

Q: How did they operate?

FRY: They were very, very professional. I had great admiration for their language training and the background that they had received prior to their assignment to the United States. One of the people we dealt with was Georgi Korniyenko. Korniyenko later became one of the highest ranking officials in the Soviet Foreign Ministry and had a very successful career. After the retirement of Ambassador Anatoly Dobrynin he was really their top American specialist for many, many years. The reason I knew him and watched him operate was that I was called up fairly frequently to take notes for memoranda of conversation, as one of the junior officers, for such Deputy Assistant Secretaries as Dick Davis, Richard Davies and for William Tyler, who was then Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs. Sometimes there would be just the two of them and myself, and I would have to do the whole memcon. When I first did it I was very nervous and scared; I read up on how to do it and I practiced and got to be pretty good at it. Then they asked for me because I always went right down and wrote it out in longhand--we had no computers in those days--and gave it to a secretary or typed it myself. They always wanted it quickly to do a telegram to Moscow. I also very often was called to escort the long-time Soviet Ambassador Anatoly Dobrynin from the diplomatic entrance. He was dean of the Diplomatic Corps when he left. That was how long he had been here. He probably ranks in the top five of all the diplomats that I know anything about, certainly of the ones I have read about. We are talking about a man who was simply superb in his diplomatic role. That is why he was kept in this country for twenty some years, and he had been deputy chief of mission before that.

I got to know Dobrynin well enough so that when I was married in 1965, I was still on the Soviet desk, he heard about it and congratulated me in the elevator. When I was courting my wife, we were walking along the C&O canal up near Great Falls. It turns out that the circle that Russians were allowed to travel in fell just short of Great Falls. I knew it because I had to keep track of my Russian businessmen. Dobrynin was coming up the towpath with his wife beyond the permissible point. He saw us and we stopped and I introduced him to my fiancée and we had a nice chat. I wanted to say, "Mr. Ambassador, you are out of bounds," but I had such deep respect and awe for the man that I couldn't find it in my heart to ever tell anybody about it and I don't think he had a clue. I figured a man the stature of Dobrynin on the tow path was going to be just fine as far as I was concerned.

Q: While you were on the Soviet desk, what were you absorbing from those who were dealing with the Soviet Union as professionals at the time?

FRY: I think that what I was absorbing was that there were two elements you always had to take into account in dealing with the Soviet Union. The first was that you had to follow the shield that the administration wanted to put on its activities. You didn't want to look like you were coddling communists--there was still a lot of that pressure. On the other hand we were involved in the day to day operations of trying to manage a relationship between two increasingly armed superpowers. You simply could not start each day by saying, "What can I do today to weaken communism?" What you started your day with was, "What can I do to solve this problem? How can we get this eighty-year old Jewish woman out of the Soviet Union for medical treatment that her brother is willing to pay for in New York? How can we get the Bolshoi Ballet out this time more simply, for a tour?" In all of those things it was the human problems, it was the day to day mechanics of managing a relationship.

What I learned from people who were later Chiefs of Mission--Foy Kohler, Spike Dubs who was Ambassador to Afghanistan and was subsequently assassinated, and many other senior officials at that time--was that you don't carry any Cold War emotions or any other personal beliefs into the relationship that you are building on a professional diplomatic level with your counterparts. You do your business, you do it professionally, you don't raise your voice. I heard Richard Harding Davis, then a Deputy Assistant Secretary, call in a Soviet diplomat to complain about a border incident or something in Berlin and give him very harsh words in a very dignified, civilized, soft-spoken voice. He realized, and then I learned, that the tone of your voice with your counterpart over the table has nothing to do with how things come out, or how problems are solved or not solved. What it can do is to arouse human antagonisms which may simply cloud the real issues; you don't want that so you don't do it.

I learned that making your point very clearly, so there is absolutely no doubt on the other side as to precisely why you called them in, was the whole point, and shouting did no good. Also, as in all diplomatic relations, there were those on the military or intelligence side who welcomed confrontations with the Soviet Union. They saw it as an opportunity for their work or for disruption of the system. That was not necessarily compatible with what you were trying to do, not that you would stand in the way of it. So there would be times when reciprocity ruled. If an American's tire was slashed in Moscow, for whatever reason, you can bet that a Soviet tire would be slashed in Arlington, in Bethesda, on 16th Street, or wherever, about a week later. And vice versa. Even if it was a hoodlum with no connection to anybody in America it would wind up with some poor Foreign Service officer having to buy a new Goodyear out in Moscow. So reciprocity was the name of the game and the order of the day. If I allowed a Soviet diplomat a waiver to go to San Francisco to talk with someone there it was only done with the understanding that an American would be allowed to go to a closed area.

The closed areas in the United States and the closed areas in the Soviet Union were monitored very carefully and they were part and parcel of the relationship. It occupied a lot of time. The Soviets actually began their closed areas program, that is areas denied to foreigners for any reason except on a very special waiver, long before we did. We tried to negotiate out of it, but they wouldn't so we just began one. I had a map in my office, and a map at home in case I was called there, and a list of cities that were especially closed--under no circumstances would waivers be granted. I had rings around New York, rings around Washington, where they couldn't go beyond. If a policeman called the State Department and said, "I arrested this guy for speeding in Chappaqua, New York [sixty-five miles from New York City], what do I do with him?" then we had one on them and they would have to let one of our guys off when they caught him outside the ring in Moscow. It is minutiae like that that actually took up a lot of time on the desk.

Q: Then you went to Russian training, is that right?

FRY: I asked to go to Moscow and as part of that there was Russian language training at the Foreign Service Institute. I had started trying to learn some Russian on my own, to get an idea of the language. I was accepted for assignment to Moscow, to go in June or early July of 1966, so in September 1965--I had been married in the summer of 1965--I was released from the desk and began Russian language training for one year.

Q: So you were taking Russian from 1965 to 1966?

FRY: From the late summer of 1965 to the end of June in 1966 and then went to Moscow immediately afterwards.

Q: You served in Moscow from 1966 through 1968. What was the situation there when you arrived?

FRY: In a curious way, we were allowed to do things then that subsequently we were not allowed to do. I will tell you a quick story. When I went to Europe from New York in the summer of 1966, my wife and I took the United States, landed in Le Havre and drove--I had my Ford Fairlane which had been specially built for Russian roads, special springs and so on -- through Scandinavia, stopping in Copenhagen, Stockholm and Helsinki, and on to Leningrad where we stayed for three days over Soviet Naval Day. I had a movie camera -- I had never signed in at the Embassy, I was going strictly on my visa, the Soviets gave me permission to drive in, the Embassy gave me permission to drive in -- and went up along the Neva River and filmed the whole review of the Soviet fleet and the newest cruiser, the head of the Soviet Navy coming across in his launch; I took pictures of the crowd, people waving at me. Then we went to Novgorod, stayed overnight in a hotel there and did all the tourism there. Finally we drove through Kalinin, which might have been a bit closed because it was industrial, had almost no surveillance that I recall, got to the Embassy in Moscow, parked the car and went in and introduced myself and that was the way I started my work. Several years after that our side would never have allowed you to drive a car in and not check in with the Embassy first as they would have feared a provocation or something like that.

In any case, I began work immediately in the consular section and my wife began work, as a contract employee with USIA, in the downstairs cultural section which adjoined the consular section and used the same waiting room. That was where the library was. Mainly Africans students and foreign students came in to use our materials. Very few Russians were allowed in because the militia wouldn't let them pass the gate.

The embassy situation was very correct but you were very much aware of the heavy hand -- the militia outside the Embassy, the concern that your Russian nationals were working both sides as they probably had to. On the other hand, the professionalism of the consular staff, that is the Russians -- they were all women, there were four and later five when I was there, headed by a woman named Mary Litvenienko, famous to a whole generation of Foreign Service Officers -- was excellent and so cooperative and helpful. We weren't handling anything in the consular section that was particularly sensitive, so the working environment with our Russian colleagues was excellent. I became devoted to them, and showed them movies when the Embassy was closed on Wednesday afternoon. They never came to my house, but when I left they gave me a little chit on a commission store, which is like our second-hand store, and said, "Go there and give this to the woman." That is all they told me. When I went there I was given a beautiful samovar that they had arranged to give me which I still have.

Also, at that time we were experiencing a rather sharp increase in the number of American tourists that were allowed to come in. For the first time Americans were allowed to drive into the Soviet Union from Finland -- which I was allowed to do as a diplomat -- and from Poland through Minsk and down into Moscow, and I think they could drive from the crossing in Czechoslovakia -- later closed after the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia -- through Kiev and on to Moscow. So there was an increase in tourism. Eventually the Pan-Am flights started and American tour companies began to sell more and more tours. What this meant was a lot more work for the consular section.

It also meant that the Russians had to begin to realize that you cannot allow tourism and then treat tourists like prisoners. You can herd them around with Intourist but there are people who are going to want to photograph a bridge or a cathedral in the center of town. To have militiamen come up and want to snatch the camera for photographing a bridge that is on a postal card being sold in the Soviet stores is ridiculous. We had to keep reminding them that they were in the big time now and if they wanted tourists they were going to have to be responsible for providing the tourists with the tour they had paid for. We would get all kinds of complaints in the consular section about rooms that didn't look out on the Kremlin and "what are you going to do about it," a lot of aggravations because we had to treat those complaints seriously or tourists would report us to their Congress person.

But on the serious side we also began to get elderly American citizens who were returning to see relatives in the Soviet Union that they hadn't seen since the '30s or the post-war period, and they died. Or those who were on tour ships, like the Moore-McCormick Line that came into Leningrad and later Odessa, who simply had a heart attack while they were on Soviet soil on tours. That required us to do all of the Foreign Service things regarding death of US citizens abroad, to arrange for shipment of the remains to the family, consular report of death, etc. A lot of things began during my first watch in the Soviet Union that we simply hadn't been doing before.

Another thing was that American tourists, not diplomats, were allowed to fly into the Soviet Union from Afghanistan -- from Kabul to Tashkent in Uzbekistan -- and then continue on a Soviet domestic flight, which was about a tenth the price of a direct international flight to Scandinavia. They were booked from Kabul, say, to Stockholm via a domestic flight. What happened was that a few Americans thought that when they entered the Soviet Union they were just going to transfer to another flight, then they would fly up to Leningrad and transfer to another flight and go out to Helsinki. The first one, in the fall of 1966, brought in hashish taped to his body; I won't say that he was an addict but he later told me that he had made more than fifty LSD trips in college in the mid-'60s and he was pretty messed up. He had also brought in hashish in a suitcase that had a false bottom which we subsequently found out was provided to him by a KGB informer in Kabul. The KGB has primary jurisdiction at ports of entry so it meant that the minute the arrest was made at the airport we were dealing with the KGB. We were not dealing with the KGB part that sent espionage agents abroad, it was the domestic counter-intelligence and border guards. But in any case, you were dealing directly with the KGB. On the first arrest I went down to Tashkent and was able to talk with the gentleman. I went alone, incidentally, and that was the first time in the Embassy's memory, I won't say ever but certainly in a long time, that an officer had gone out alone some 4,000 miles from the Embassy.

Over all the time I was there I had four arrests in Tashkent; I went to Tashkent eight or ten times round trip and I had a lot of surveillance but no harassment. The KGB was very correct; sometimes I had to wait three days for an interview and it made me pretty angry to sit around. But then I walked around the city and got to know it better and began to do some reporting on what I saw, so it turned out to be pretty valuable. I was also buying local newspapers; when you were out of Moscow you bought up all the local newspapers you could and took them with you. Usually the Russians let you do that. One time they stole them from my hotel room because I had been down there more than a week and they finally decided I was getting too much conceptive information rather than one or two papers. They claimed that the cleaning woman took them. I said get them back and they said that it wasn't possible. Then I saw the non-velvet hand of the KGB stepping in to remind me that I was alone down there and had better behave like a good consular officer instead of a showboat getting all the local literature. I did manage to buy some books that we hadn't been able to get and they let me get those. I guess they didn't realize what I was doing. I had to take my notes with me, notes that I took at the trial: since I was writing more than was said at the trial I had to carry those with me. Because it was very hot down there, my wife helped me fabricate a case which was plastic so the papers wouldn't get wet but was cloth on the outside. I would fold that in half and tuck that into my shirt so that I always had that with me. I don't know if they knew that. So I went to Tashkent for those trials.

The first person was released in November of 1967 on the fiftieth anniversary of the Soviet Union. For two subsequent arrests, both gentlemen in question went to prison. They got three to five years at Potma, which was in the R.S.F.S.R. southwest of Moscow, where foreigners were kept. It was a minimum regime labor camp where you made gloves and chessmen and things like that. One of the guys was actually a deserter from the Vietnam draft from Ford Ord, California. He wanted, for his defense, to throw himself on the mercy of the court because he refused to fight against the Vietnamese. I argued against this and his lawyer also thought this was not a good idea. I had hired a lawyer for him who was a member of the Jewish community in Tashkent and whose family had lived there for hundreds of years -- there is a big Jewish community down there, including a synagogue. Well the guy wanted this defense and did throw himself on the mercy of the court. What he forgot, and what I had warned him of in the few moments when I was alone with him, was that Russians don't like disloyal citizens, draft dodgers, and deserters. He got three to five years at Potma.

I might say, as to the Soviet system of law, that I first saw it as a complete aberration of law and order. But later on, in curious ways, I came to respect the system in this sense: the preliminary investigation conducted by Soviet authorities is extremely thorough. It encompasses the crime and the person's past; recidivism, the recommitting of a crime, is very serious under Soviet law. Soviet law is surprisingly lenient, or was, in many first cases, in particular with young people. The second time you are caught it is very, very hard on you. You almost always get a medium regime, or hard regime, labor camp, or even prison. Labor camps aren't considered prisons. This young man, the deserter, had a very clean record; the Soviets knew that I had documents showing what a fine young man he was and who went astray just this one time. Whether it was true or not, the documents were introduced into court. But he kept playing on the idea that he could have been fighting in Vietnam but instead was for peace. I tried to tell him that this was not necessarily a good defense in the Soviet Union because the Soviet authorities, and in general the Soviet people, do not respect persons who will not do their military obligations. It is a very serious offense in the Soviet Union, a long penal sentence.

I did not see that this defense would play as well as he was expecting it to and indeed it did not. Basically, there is a judge and two lay assessors, who are factory people put into white shirts for the day, but the judge makes the decision. After the American had a chance to testify and his lawyer appealed for him, the prosecutor asked for five years. The judge sentenced him to three to five years. The judge concentrated on the fact that he had entered the Soviet Union with the drugs, that he would have had an opportunity to try and sell them in the Soviet Union, and even if it was not in the Soviet Union he was going to take them to another country where he would condemn people to a life of using drugs. The Russians were very, very strict and very much law and order both on their own people and on foreigners in the matter of drugs. This was long before it was fashionable in the US to be so hard on port of entry drugs; we were strict but not anything like it became later.

The Russians were very hard on these people. He went to prison, and two others that I handled all served their time. One, who was an Hispanic-American, opted hard-line, that is wouldn't cooperate and took a Buddhist stance and refused to help his defense attorney; he went into a silence strike when he was sentenced to prison. Finally the Russians got tough with him and put him into a medium regime part of the camp where he had to work pretty hard. The end product was that instead of getting out in three years they made him stay four. That proved to me that the best thing you could do once you were in their hands was to cooperate in every way, because you weren't going to make your point in a totalitarian system by pretending that you were tougher than the camp guards. The final case I was working on as my esteemed colleague Robert Barry, who later became Ambassador to Bulgaria, and Indonesia, and many high level stops along the way, came to replace me. The outcome of that trial was Potma, also.

One of the saddest cases I had was a person not in good health; he was a drug user, had been working in Spain, owned a bar there, was married to a British woman, one thing and another. He got all involved in stolen cars, driving them to the Middle East, and had decided finally to make a killing on the hashish. He went to the same store, got a false bottom suitcase -- the same store that supplied the first American with a false bottomed suitcase -- and when he walked into that airport they had dogs, photographs, the works. He also had a vest, which was de rigueur for smugglers in those days, lined with flat pressed hashish. Never was a person nabbed and nailed so cleanly. They had a movie of undressing him while he was standing there with a shocked expression, peeling all this stuff back with the dogs going crazy. Anyway he was not in such good health and the upshot of this was that he went into the labor camp -- this was before prisoners were brought up to Moscow where we could see them and offer them medicines in the program that the State Department introduced into the consular system to make sure right at the start that there were no medical problems -- with a vitamin E deficiency. He lost most of his hair, a lot of his teeth, and his skin was bad. When he finally was released, he got three to five years but I think they let him out a little early because the Russians were getting worried, my colleagues saw him at the airport on his exit flight and he looked like an old man and he was only in his early '30s. This was the down side of messing with Soviet authorities. Even if you tried to cooperate you were still in a labor camp far, far away from, in those days, any direct Embassy support or moral support; you just didn't see anybody for a long time that you could talk to. Plus, the camps were very dangerous.

There was the case of Newcomb Mott. As I was preparing for the Soviet Union, a young American illegally but inadvertently used a small border crossing in north Norway that was only for Norwegians. He was tried in Murmansk and was sentenced to the Gulag, I forget for how long, for illegal border illegal crossing, another KGB operation. This was in the spring of 1966. The Soviets said that Newcomb Mott committed suicide. We say that he was murdered, probably by other prisoners who were on the train who were hard core criminals and really tough. They probably killed him for his watch and whatever else he had on him. An autopsy quite a bit later did find what was compatible with a stab wound, among other things; he was beaten and was probably strangled.

This was a very serious game in the Soviet Union with regard to Americans who were arrested and we took it very seriously. I traveled about sixty thousand miles alone in the Soviet Union; to Odessa, Kishinev, Minsk, Kiev, Leningrad where two young Americans were arrested. They had just been released from the Army. This was in the fall of 1966 shortly after I arrived. They did some black marketing and also stole a bronze bear from the Europa hotel in Leningrad. They were charged with all kinds of things. What was interesting about their trial was that the Russians allowed the Intourist guides (women) who had helped them along on their trip, and served as interpreters, to testify at the trial. The prosecutor showed the notes that the women had taken about the behavior of the men before they committed their crime and it was a real eye opener -- why the Soviets did it I didn't understand at the time -- to see the detailed reports that were made on each and every tourist the women were with. How they joked about their own country, whether they appeared loyal to the United States, etc. In other words, they were being set up as possible co-optees if later on they professed a love for the Soviet Union and didn't like the American military. What was bad about these two arrests was that one of the Americans had been a pilot of a prop plane that used to fly along the East German- Czech border on patrols and he kept part of his flight book with him. He had violated US Army regulations, US regulations, everything; plus, it was just dumb.

Even more interesting about this case was that the Soviet Union, for the first time ever, allowed what we would call bail for one of the young men. His father came over and the son was allowed to come down to Moscow on $10,000 bail. It wasn't a bond. They had to send $10,000 to Soviet authorities which was put in a dollar account until the disposition of the trial. The other, the military pilot, was not allowed to leave his cell so the consul, Harlan Moen, and I had to go and visit him in his cell a number of times. Both Americans were tried and both of them were found guilty, but both were released with heavy fines. Wouldn't you know that the fine for the one was the $10,000 that was already on record. The other one I think was $15,000. I was thinking today that one of the two young men came from Arkansas, and I wonder if he is still down there and voted for Governor Clinton.

We were talking before about businesslike relations as opposed to the Cold War hysteria. My message from those trials was that the Russians were telling us to tell our tourists to be very careful, and to obey Soviet laws whatever they thought of them. That is why they let us see and hear what the Intourist women had recorded. They didn't do this by chance; they wanted us to know that they were following people very carefully. So we put into our brochure, "You don't joke about the Soviet system. You can discuss your country honestly, you can be a normal American. In the Soviet Union you do not take souvenirs from your hotel room, you do not take towels, you do not take bronze bears that turn out to be by a famous sculptor. You toe the mark, however painful it might be. The Soviets do not look on these things as shenanigans; it is hooliganism and its a crime and you may be arrested." You didn't want to scare the bejesus out of people who were coming in to have a nice tour and most of the people were no problem. On the other hand when you started getting younger people coming over on language exchange programs you really had to give them a hard briefing.

Q: It was also a period of student rebellion which in an earlier time -- and maybe even now -- would not have been accepted. In those days young men, up to their early '30s, could get away with a lot more in the States and maybe Western Europe.
